[We think that it] is not too much to say that a person sitting down in New England to consume a good New England fish chowder embarks on a gustatory [taste-related] adventure which may entail the removal of some fish bones from his bowl as he proceeds. We are not inclined to tamper with age-old recipes by any amendment reflecting the plaintiff's view of the effect of the Uniform Commercial Code upon them. We are aware of the heavy body of case law involving foreign substances in food, but we sense a strong distinction between them and those relative to unwholesomeness of the food itself [such as] tainted mackerel, and a fish bone in a fish chowder. * * * [W]e consider that the joys of life in New England include the ready availability of fresh fish chowder. We should be prepared to cope with the hazards of fish bones, the occasional presence of which in chowders is, it seems to us, to be anticipated, and which, in the light of a hallowed tradition, do not impair their fitness or merchantability.

- Decision and Remedy The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts "sympathized with a plaintiff who has suffered a peculiarly New England injury" but entered a judgment for the defendant, Blue Ship Tea Room. A fish bone in fish chowder is not a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability.

- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This classic case, phrased in memorable language, was an early application of the UCC's implied warranty of merchantability to food products. The case established the rule that consumers should expect to find, on occasion, elements of food products that are natural to the product (such as fish bones in fish chowder). Courts today still apply this rule.

CASE 23.2 CONTINUED • The E-Commerce Dimension If Webster had made the chowder herself from a recipe that she had found on the Internet, could she have successfully brought an action against its author for a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability? Explain.

Implied Warranty of Fitness for a Particular Purpose The implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises when any seller or lessor (merchant or nonmerchant) knows the particular purpose for which a buyer or lessee will use the goods and knows that the buyer or lessee is relying on the skill and judgment of the seller or lessor to select suitable goods [UCC 2-315, 2A-213].

Particular versus Ordinary Purpose. A “particular purpose” of the buyer or lessee differs from the “ordinary purpose for which goods are used” (merchantability). Goods can be merchantable but unfit for a particular purpose. For example, suppose that you need a gallon of paint to match the color of your living room walls—a light shade somewhere between coral and peach. You take a sample to your local hardware store and request a gallon of paint of that color. Instead, you are given a gallon of bright blue paint. Here, the salesperson has not breached any warranty of implied merchantability—the bright blue paint is of high quality and suitable for interior walls—but she or he has breached an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose.

Knowledge and Reliance Requirements. A seller or lessor need not have actual knowledge of the buyer’s or lessee’s particular purpose. It is sufficient if a seller or lessor “has reason to know” the purpose. For an implied warranty to be created, however, the buyer or lessee must have relied on the skill or judgment of the seller or lessor in selecting or furnishing suitable goods. Moreover, the seller or lessor must have reason to know that the buyer or lessee is relying on her or his judgment or skill.

For example, Bloomberg leases a computer from Future Tech, a lessor of technical business equipment. Bloomberg tells the clerk that she wants a computer that will run a complicated new engineering graphics program at a realistic speed. Future Tech leases Bloomberg an Architex One computer with a CPU speed of only 2 gigahertz, even though a speed of at least 3.2 gigahertz would be required to run Bloomberg’s graphics program at a “realistic speed.” After discovering that it takes forever to run her program, Bloomberg wants a full refund. Here, because Future Tech has breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, Bloomberg normally will be able to recover. The clerk knew specifically that Bloomberg wanted a computer with enough speed to run certain software and was relying on the clerk’s judgment. Furthermore, Bloomberg relied on the clerk to furnish a computer that would fulfill this purpose. Because Future Tech did not do so, the warranty was breached.

Other Implied Warranties Implied warranties can also arise (or be excluded or modified) as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2-314(3), 2A-212(3)]. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, when both parties to a sales or lease contract have knowledge of a well-recognized trade custom, the courts will infer that both parties intended for that custom to apply to their contract. For example, if it is an industry-wide custom to lubricate a new car before it is delivered and a dealer fails to do so, the dealer can be held liable to a buyer for damages resulting from the breach of an implied warranty. (This, of course, would also be negligence on the part of the dealer.)

Third Party Beneficiaries of Warranties

One of the general principles of contract law is that unless you are one of the parties to a contract, you have no rights under the contract. In other words, privity of contract must exist between a plaintiff and a defendant before any action based on a contract can be maintained. In Chapter 16, you learned about two notable exceptions to the rule of privity—assignments and third party beneficiary contracts. Another exception is made under warranty laws so that third parties can recover for harms suffered as a result of breached warranties, both express and implied.

There has been sharp disagreement among state courts as to how far warranty liability should extend, however. In view of this disagreement, the UCC offers three alternatives for liability to third parties [UCC 2-318, 2A-216]. All three alternatives are intended to eliminate the privity requirement with respect to certain types of injuries (personal versus property) to certain beneficiaries, such as household members or bystanders. For example, in some jurisdictions if the injured plaintiff was a guest in the home of the person who purchased the warranted product, the privity requirement is waived.

Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act

The Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act of 1975⁶ was designed to prevent deception in warranties by making them easier to understand. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC) primarily enforces the act (the FTC's role in protecting consumers will be discussed in Chapter 44). Additionally, the attorney general or a consumer who has been injured can enforce the act if informal procedures for settling disputes prove to be ineffective. The act modifies UCC warranty rules to some extent when consumer transactions are involved. The UCC, however, remains the primary codification of warranty rules for commercial transactions.

Under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, no seller is required to give a written warranty for consumer goods sold. If a seller chooses to make an express written warranty, however, and the cost of the consumer goods is more than $25, the warranty must be labeled as either "full" or "limited." In addition, the warrantor must make certain disclosures fully and conspicuously in a single document in "readily understood language." These disclosures state the names and addresses of the warrantor(s), what specifically is warranted, procedures for enforcing the warranty, any limitations on warranty relief, and that the buyer has legal rights.

Full Warranty Although a full warranty may not cover every aspect of the consumer product sold, what it does cover ensures some type of consumer satisfaction in the event that the product is defective. A full warranty requires free repair or replacement of any defective part; if the product cannot be repaired within a reasonable time, the consumer has the choice of either a refund or a replacement without charge. There is frequently no time limit on a full warranty. Any limitation on consequential damages must be conspicuously stated. Additionally, the warrantor need not perform warranty services if the problem with the product was caused by damage to the product or unreasonable use by the consumer.

Limited Warranty A limited warranty arises when the written warranty fails to meet one of the minimum requirements of a full warranty. The fact that only a limited warranty is being given must be conspicuously disclosed. If the only difference between a limited warranty and a full warranty is a time limitation, the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act allows the warrantor to identify the warranty as a full warranty by such language as "full twelve-month warranty."

Implied Warranties Implied warranties do not arise under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act; they continue to be created according to UCC provisions. Implied warranties may not be disclaimed under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act, however. A warrantor can impose a time limit on the duration of an implied warranty, but it must correspond to the duration of the express warranty.⁷ (See Concept Summary 23.1 on the next page for a review of the various types of warranties.)

Overlapping Warranties

Sometimes, two or more warranties are made in a single transaction. An implied warranty of merchantability, an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, or both can exist in addition to an express warranty. For example, when a sales contract for a new car states that "this car engine is warranted to be free from defects for 36,000 miles or thirty-six months, whichever occurs first," there is an express warranty against all defects, as well as an implied warranty that the car will be fit for normal use.

When the Warranties Are Consistent

The rule under the UCC is that express and implied warranties are construed as cumulative if they are consistent with one another [UCC 2–317, 2A–215]. In other words, courts interpret two or more warranties as being in agreement with each other unless this construction is unreasonable. If it is unreasonable for the two warranties to be consistent, then the court looks at the intention of the parties to determine which warranty is dominant.

Conflicting Warranties If the warranties are inconsistent, the courts usually apply the following rules to interpret which warranty is most important:

7. This time limit must, of course, be reasonable, conscionable, and set forth in clear and conspicuous language on the face of the warranty.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 23.1

Types of Warranties

Concept	Description
WARRANTIES OF TITLE	The UCC provides for the following warranties of title [UCC 2-312, 2A-211]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Good title—A seller warrants that he or she has the right to pass good and rightful title to the goods. 2. No liens—A seller warrants that the goods sold are free of any encumbrances (claims, charges, or liabilities—usually called liens). A lessor warrants that the lessee will not be disturbed in her or his possession of the goods by the claims of a third party. 3. No infringements—A merchant-seller warrants that the goods are free of infringement claims (claims that a patent, trademark, or copyright has been infringed) by third parties. Lessors make similar warranties.
EXPRESS WARRANTIES	An express warranty arises under the UCC when a seller or lessor indicates any of the following as part of the sale or bargain [UCC 2-313, 2A-210]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. An affirmation or promise of fact. 2. A description of the goods. 3. A sample or model shown as conforming to the contract goods.
IMPLIED WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABILITY	When a seller or lessor is a merchant who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased, the seller or lessor warrants that the goods sold or leased are properly packaged and labeled, are of proper quality, and are reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used [UCC 2-314, 2A-212].
IMPLIED WARRANTY OF FITNESS FOR A PARTICULAR PURPOSE	An implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose arises when the buyer's or lessee's purpose or use is known by the seller or lessor, and the buyer or lessee purchases or leases the goods in reliance on the seller's or lessor's selection [UCC 2-315, 2A-213].
OTHER IMPLIED WARRANTIES	Other implied warranties can arise as a result of course of dealing or usage of trade [UCC 2-314(3), 2A-212(3)].
MAGNUSON-MOSS WARRANTY ACT	Express written warranties covering consumer goods priced at more than $25, if made , must be labeled as either a full warranty or a limited warranty. A full warranty requires free repair or replacement of defective parts and refund or replacement for goods that cannot be repaired in a reasonable time. A limited warranty arises when less than a full warranty is being offered.

1. Express warranties displace inconsistent implied warranties, except implied warranties of fitness for a particular purpose.
2. Samples take precedence over inconsistent general descriptions.
3. Exact or technical specifications displace inconsistent samples or general descriptions.

In the example presented earlier on page 464, suppose that when Bloomberg leases the computer at Future Tech, the contract contains an express warranty concerning the speed of the CPU and the application programs that the computer is capable of running. Bloomberg does not realize that the speed expressly warranted in the contract is insufficient for her needs until she tries to run the software and the computer slows to a crawl. Bloomberg later claims that Future Tech has breached the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose because she made it clear that she was leasing the computer to perform certain tasks. Although the express warranty on CPU speed takes precedence over the implied warranty of merchantability, it normally does not take precedence over an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Bloomberg normally will prevail.

Warranty Disclaimers and Limitations on Liability

The UCC generally permits warranties to be disclaimed or limited by specific and unambiguous language, provided that this is done in a manner that protects the buyer or lessee from surprise. Because each type of warranty is created in a different way, the manner in which a seller or lessor can disclaim warranties varies with the type of warranty:

Express Warranties

As already stated, any affirmation of fact or promise, description of the goods, or use of samples or models by a seller or lessor creates an express warranty. Obviously, then, express warranties can be excluded if the seller or lessor carefully refrains from making any promise or affirmation of fact relating to the goods, describing the goods, or using a sample or model. In addition, a written (or an electronic record) disclaimer in language that is clear and conspicuous, and called to a buyer's or lessee's attention, can negate all oral express warranties not included in the written sales or lease contract [UCC 2-316(1), 2A-214(1)]. This allows the seller or lessor to avoid false allegations that oral warranties were made, and it ensures that only representations made by properly authorized individuals are included in the bargain.

Note, however, that a buyer or lessee must be made aware of any warranty disclaimers or modifications at the time the contract is formed. In other words, any oral or written warranties—or disclaimers—made during the bargaining process cannot be modified at a later time by the seller or lessor without the consent of the buyer or lessee.

Implied Warranties

Generally speaking, unless circumstances indicate otherwise, the implied warranties of merchantability and fitness are disclaimed by the expressions “as is,” “with all faults,” and other similar phrases that in common understanding for both parties call the buyer's or lessee's attention to the fact that there are no implied warranties [UCC 2-316(3)(a), 2A-214(3)(a)]. (Note, however, that some states have passed consumer protection statutes forbidding “as is” sales or making it illegal to disclaim warranties of merchantability on consumer goods.)

Disclaimer of the Implied Warranty of Merchantability

The UCC also permits a seller or lessor to specifically disclaim an implied warranty either of merchantability or of fitness. A merchantability disclaimer must specifically mention merchantability. It need not be written; but if it is, the writing (or record) must be conspicuous [UCC 2-316(2), 2A-214(4)]. Under the UCC, a term or clause is conspicuous when it is written or displayed in such a way that a reasonable person would notice it. For example, terms can be made conspicuous by using capital letters, a larger font size, or a different color that sets them off from the surrounding text.

Disclaimer of the Implied Warranty of Fitness

To disclaim an implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose, the disclaimer must be in writing and be conspicuous. The writing does not have to mention the word fitness; it is sufficient if, for example, the disclaimer states, “THERE ARE NO WARRANTIES THAT EXTEND BEYOND THE DESCRIPTION ON THE FACE HEREOF.”

Buyer's or Lessee's Examination or Refusal to Inspect

If a buyer or lessee actually examines the goods (or a sample or model) as fully as desired before entering into a contract, or refuses to examine the goods on the seller's or lessor's request that he or she do so, there is no implied warranty with respect to defects that a reasonable examination would reveal or defects that are found on examination [UCC 2-316(3)(b), 2A-214(2)(b)].

For example, suppose that Joplin buys a lamp at Gershwin's Home Store. No express warranties are made. Gershwin asks Joplin to inspect the lamp before buying it, but she refuses. Had Joplin inspected the lamp, she would have noticed that the base of the lamp was obviously cracked and the electrical cord was loose. If the lamp later cracks or starts a fire in Joplin's home and causes damage, she normally will not be able to hold Gershwin's liable for breach of the warranty of merchantability. Because Joplin refused to examine the lamp when asked by Gershwin, Joplin will be deemed to have assumed the risk that it was defective.

Unconscionability

The UCC sections dealing with warranty disclaimers do not refer specifically to unconscionability as a factor. Ultimately, however, the courts will test warranty disclaimers with reference to the UCC's unconscionability standards [UCC 2-302, 2A-108]. Such things as lack of bargaining position, “take-it-or-leave-it” choices, and a buyer’s or lessee’s failure to understand or know of a warranty disclaimer will be relevant to the issue of unconscionability.

Statute of Limitations

A cause of action for breach of contract under the UCC must be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues—that is, within four years after the breach occurs. The parties can reduce this period to not less than one year in their original agreement, but they cannot extend it beyond four years [UCC 2-725(1), 2A-506(1)]. An action for breach of warranty accrues when the seller or lessor tenders delivery, even if the aggrieved party is unaware of the breach at that time [UCC 2-725(2), 2A-506(2)]. In addition, the aggrieved party usually must notify the breaching party within a reasonable time after discovering the breach or be barred from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2-607(3)(a), 2A-516(3)].

Product Liability

Those who make, sell, or lease goods can be held liable for physical harm or property damage caused by those goods to a consumer, user, or bystander. This is called product liability. Because one particular product may cause harm to a number of consumers, product liability actions are sometimes filed by a group of plaintiffs acting together. (For a discussion of a law that requires claims filed by a large group of plaintiffs to be heard in federal courts, see this chapter’s Emerging Trends feature on pages 470 and 471.)

Product liability may be based on the warranty theories just discussed, as well as on the theories of negligence, misrepresentation, and strict liability. We look here at product liability based on negligence and on misrepresentation.

Product Liability Based on Negligence

In Chapter 7, negligence was defined as the failure to exercise the degree of care that a reasonable, prudent person would have exercised under the circumstances. If a manufacturer fails to exercise “due care” to make a product safe, a person who is injured by the product may sue the manufacturer for negligence.

Due Care Must Be Exercised Due care must be exercised in designing the product, selecting the materials, using the appropriate production process, assembling and testing the product, and placing adequate warnings on the label informing the user of dangers of which an ordinary person might not be aware. The duty of care also extends to the inspection and testing of any purchased components that are used in the product sold by the manufacturer.

Privity of Contract Not Required A product liability action based on negligence does not require the injured plaintiff and the negligent defendant-manufacturer to be in privity of contract (see Chapter 16). In other words, the plaintiff and the defendant need not be directly involved in a contractual relationship (that is, in privity). Thus, any person who is injured by a product may bring a negligence suit even though he or she was not the one who actually purchased the product. A manufacturer, seller, or lessor is liable for failure to exercise due care to any person who sustains an injury proximately caused by a negligently made (defective) product. Relative to the long history of the common law, this exception to the privity requirement is a fairly recent development, dating to the early part of the twentieth century.⁸

Product Liability Based on Misrepresentation

When a fraudulent misrepresentation has been made to a user or consumer and that misrepresentation ultimately results in an injury, the basis of liability may be the tort of fraud. In this situation, the misrepresentation must have been made knowingly or with reckless disregard for the facts. For example, the intentional mislabeling of packaged cosmetics and the intentional concealment of a product’s defects would constitute fraudulent misrepresentation. The misrepresentation must be of a material fact, and the seller must have had the intent to induce the buyer’s reliance on the misrepresentation. Misrepresentation on a label or advertisement is enough to show an intent to induce the reliance of anyone who may use the product. In addition, the buyer must have relied on the misrepresentation.

8. A landmark case in this respect is MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 217 N.Y.382, 111 N.E. 1050 (1916).

Strict Product Liability

Under the doctrine of strict liability (discussed in Chapter 7), people may be liable for the results of their acts regardless of their intentions or their exercise of reasonable care. In addition, liability does not depend on privity of contract. The injured party does not have to be the buyer or a third party beneficiary, as required under contract warranty theory. In the 1960s, courts applied the doctrine of strict liability in several landmark cases involving manufactured goods, and it has since become a common method of holding manufacturers liable.

Strict Product Liability and Public Policy

The law imposes strict product liability as a matter of public policy. This public policy rests on the threefold assumption that (1) consumers should be protected against unsafe products; (2) manufacturers and distributors should not escape liability for faulty products simply because they are not in privity of contract with the ultimate user of those products; and (3) manufacturers, sellers, and lessors of products are in a better position to bear the costs associated with injuries caused by their products—costs that they can ultimately pass on to all consumers in the form of higher prices.

California was the first state to impose strict product liability in tort on manufacturers. In a landmark 1962 decision, Greenman v. Yuba Power Products, Inc.,⁹ the California Supreme Court set out the reason for applying tort law rather than contract law (including laws governing warranties) in cases involving consumers who were injured by defective products. According to the Greenman court, the “purpose of such liability is to [e]nsure that the costs of injuries resulting from defective products are borne by the manufacturers . . . rather than by the injured persons who are powerless to protect themselves.” Today, the majority of states recognize strict product liability, although some state courts limit its application to situations involving personal injuries (rather than property damage).

The Requirements for Strict Product Liability

The courts often look to the Restatements of the Law for guidance, even though the Restatements are not binding authorities. Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, which was originally issued in 1964, has become a widely accepted statement of the liabilities of sellers of goods (including manufacturers, processors, assemblers, packagers, bottlers, wholesalers, distributors, retailers, and lessors).

9. 59 Cal.2d 57, 377 P.2d 897, 27 Cal.Rptr. 697 (1962).

The bases for an action in strict liability, which are set forth in Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts and commonly applied by the courts, can be summarized as a series of six requirements, which are listed here. Depending on the jurisdiction, if these requirements are met, a manufacturer’s liability to an injured party can be virtually unlimited.

1. The product must be in a defective condition when the defendant sells it.
2. The defendant must normally be engaged in the business of selling (or otherwise distributing) that product.
3. The product must be unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer because of its defective condition (in most states).
4. The plaintiff must incur physical harm to self or property by use or consumption of the product.
5. The defective condition must be the proximate cause of the injury or damage.
6. The goods must not have been substantially changed from the time the product was sold to the time the injury was sustained.

Proving a Defective Condition Under these requirements, in any action against a manufacturer, seller, or lessor the plaintiff need not show why or in what manner the product became defective. The plaintiff does, however, have to prove that the product was defective at the time it left the hands of the seller or lessor and that this defective condition makes it “unreasonably dangerous” to the user or consumer. Unless evidence can be presented to support the conclusion that the product was defective when it was sold or leased, the plaintiff will not succeed. If the product was delivered in a safe condition and subsequent mishandling made it harmful to the user, the seller or lessor is normally not strictly liable.

Unreasonably Dangerous Products The Restatement recognizes that many products cannot be made entirely safe for all uses; thus, sellers or lessors are liable only for products that are unreasonably dangerous. A court could consider a product so defective as to be an unreasonably dangerous product in either of the following situations:

1. The product was dangerous beyond the expectation of the ordinary consumer.

EMERGING TRENDS IN BUSINESS LAW

Removing Class-Action Lawsuits to the Federal Courts

Many product liability actions are class actions. A class action is a lawsuit in which a single person or a small group of people represents the interests of a larger group. Women allegedly injured by silicone breast implants, for example, sued the manufacturers as a class, as did many of those allegedly injured by asbestos and tobacco. The idea behind class actions is that an individual consumer who has been injured by a product is unlikely to have the financial means to pursue complex litigation against a large corporation. A class action allows all those injured by a product to pool their resources and obtain competent legal counsel to bring a single lawsuit on their behalf.

Federal courts have always had specific requirements for class actions. For example, the class (the group of plaintiffs) must be so large that individual suits would be impracticable, and the case must involve legal or factual issues common to all members of the class. Until 2005, however, any state or federal court could hear class actions.

The Class Action Fairness Act of 2005

way class actions are tried. Though it affects all class actions, the CAFA was primarily designed to shift large, interstate product liability and tort class-action suits from the state courts to the federal courts. Under the act, federal district courts now have original (trial) jurisdiction over any civil action in which there are one hundred plaintiffs from multiple states and the damages sought exceed $5 million.

Under the CAFA, a state court can retain jurisdiction over a case only if more than two-thirds of the plaintiffs and at least one principal defendant are citizens of the state and the injuries were incurred in that state. If more than one-third but less than two-thirds of the plaintiffs live in a state, the act allows a federal judge to decide (based on specified considerations) whether the trial should be held in state or federal court.

In addition, the act makes it easier for a defendant to remove (transfer) a case from a state court to a federal court, even if the defendant is a citizen of the state where the action was filed. In cases involving multiple defendants, the CAFA also allows one defendant to remove the case to federal court without the consent of all the defendants (as was previously required). In sum, the act encourages all class actions to be heard in federal courts, which have historically been less sympathetic to consumers' product liability claims than state courts have been.

Goals of the Act

One of the main goals of the CAFA was to prevent plaintiffs' lawyers from "forum shopping," or looking for the state court that is most likely to be sympathetic to their claims. Corporate lawyers and business groups have long complained that class actions are often brought in states and counties where the judges and juries have a reputation for awarding large verdicts against corporate defendants. Sometimes, cases are even brought in states where only a small number of the plaintiffs reside. According to these critics, the CAFA will prevent such practices and help cut down on frivolous lawsuits. Not only will the business community benefit, but consumers will gain as well because businesses will no longer have to bear the costs of frivolous suits and will therefore be able to lower prices. President George W. Bush said that the act marks a critical step toward ending the "lawsuit culture in our country."^b

Critics of the act contend, however, that class actions are the only way that individual consumers

2. A less dangerous alternative was economically feasible for the manufacturer, but the manufacturer failed to produce it.

As will be discussed next, a product may be unreasonably dangerous due to a flaw in the manufacturing process, a design defect, or an inadequate warning.

Product Defects

Because Section 402A of the Restatement (Second) of Torts did not clearly define such terms as defective and unreasonably dangerous, these terms have been subject to different interpretations by different courts. In 1997, to address these concerns, the American Law Institute (ALI) issued the Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability. This Restatement defines the three types of product defects that have traditionally been recognized in product liability law—manufacturing defects, design defects, and inadequate warnings.

Manufacturing Defects According to Section 2(a) of the Restatement (Third) of Torts, a product "contains a manufacturing defect when the product departs from its intended design even though all pos-can obtain redress for injuries suffered from defective products. They say that by making it more difficult to pursue class actions, the CAFA is making it harder for injured parties to hold large corporations accountable for their wrongful acts and harmful products.

Even with the CAFA, Removing a Class Action to Federal Court Is Not Always Easy

The CAFA contains numerous ambiguities that the courts are still interpreting as they try to establish the new “rules of engagement” under the act. PepsiCo, Inc., found this out when it tried to remove a class-action suit from a New Jersey state court to a federal district court under the CAFA. The plaintiff had brought the suit against PepsiCo “for herself and on behalf of all persons in New Jersey who, within the past four years, purchased beverages with the tendency to contain benzene.” The federal court held, however, that the case did not meet the CAFA’s requirement that the amount in controversy exceed $5 million.^c c. Lamond v. PepsiCo, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.N.J. 2007).

Alabama Power Company suffered a similar fate when it also tried to remove a class action to a federal district court. When it appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, the court denied the company’s request in a seventy-seven-page ruling that addressed not only the $5 million threshold requirement but a number of other unresolved issues raised by the CAFA as well.^d

In essence, the Eleventh Circuit raised the burden of proof for defendants seeking to remove cases to federal court. To do so, defendants must now prove that the amount-in-controversy requirement is a legal certainty. Prior to this ruling, the tradition was the use of a “preponderance of the evidence” standard.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE BUSINESSPERSON

1. Product liability actions may still be tried in state courts. The CAFA applies only to class actions in which the plaintiffs seek damages of more than $5 million.
2. Businesspersons should be aware that even though a law appears to change only procedural rules, such as where and how a dispute is litigated, it may have consequences that affect substantive rights, including a party’s ability to litigate.

d. Lowery v. Alabama Power Co., 483 F.3d 1184 (11th Cir. 2007).

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. Do you agree that the CAFA will be effective in curtailing frivolous lawsuits? What other methods can you suggest to stop plaintiffs from filing suits that have no merit?
2. Critics of the CAFA argue that this legislation deprives Americans of “their day in court” when they are wronged by powerful corporations. Under what circumstances could this criticism be justified?

sible care was exercised in the preparation and marketing of the product.” Basically, a manufacturing defect is a departure from a product unit’s design specifications. A glass bottle that is made too thin and explodes in a consumer’s face is an example of a manufacturing defect. Liability is imposed on the manufacturer (and on the wholesaler and retailer) regardless of whether the manufacturer’s quality control efforts were “reasonable.” The idea behind holding defendants strictly liable for manufacturing defects is to encourage greater investment in product safety and stringent quality control standards. Cases involving allegations of a manufacturing defect are often decided based on the opinions and testimony of experts.¹⁰

Design Defects Unlike a product with a manufacturing defect, a product with a design defect is made in conformity with the manufacturer’s design specifications but nevertheless results in injury to the user because the design itself was improper. The product’s design creates an unreasonable risk to the user. A product “is defective in design when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the adoption of a reasonable alternative design by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the alternative design renders the product not reasonably safe.”¹¹

Test for Design Defects. To successfully assert a design defect, a plaintiff has to show that a reasonable alternative design was available and that the defendant’s failure to adopt the alternative design rendered the product not reasonably safe. In other words, a manufacturer or other defendant is liable only when the harm was reasonably preventable. In one case, for example, Gillespie, who cut off several of his fingers while operating a table saw, alleged that the blade guards on the saw were defectively designed. At the trial, however, an expert testified that the alternative design for blade guards used for table saws could not have been used for the particular cut that Gillespie was performing at the time he was injured. The court found that Gillespie’s claim that the blade guards were defective must fail because there was no proof that a guard with a “better” design would have prevented his injury.¹²

Factors to Be Considered. According to the Restatement, a court can consider a broad range of factors, including the magnitude and probability of the foreseeable risks, and the relative advantages and disadvantages of the product as it was designed and as it could have been designed. Basically, most courts engage in a risk-utility analysis, determining whether the risk of harm from the product as designed outweighs its utility to the user and to the public.

For example, suppose that a nine-year-old child finds rat poison in a cupboard at the local boys’ club and eats it, thinking that it is candy. The child dies, and his parents file a suit against the manufacturer alleging that the rat poison was defectively designed because it looked like candy and was supposed to be placed in cupboards. In this situation, a court would probably consider factors such as the foreseeability that a child would think the rat poison was candy, the gravity of the potential harm from consumption, the availability of an alternative design, and the usefulness of the product. If the parents could offer sufficient evidence for a reasonable person to conclude that the harm was reasonably preventable, then the manufacturer could be held liable.

Inadequate Warnings A product may also be deemed defective because of inadequate instructions or warnings. A product will be considered defective “when the foreseeable risks of harm posed by the product could have been reduced or avoided by the provision of reasonable instructions or warnings by the seller or other distributor, or a predecessor in the commercial chain of distribution, and the omission of the instructions or warnings renders the product not reasonably safe.”¹³

Important factors for a court to consider include the risks of a product, the “content and comprehensibility” and “intensity of expression” of warnings and instructions, and the “characteristics of expected user groups.”¹⁴ A “reasonableness” test applies to determine if the warnings adequately alert consumers to the product’s risks. For example, children would likely respond readily to bright, bold, simple warning labels, whereas educated adults might need more detailed information.

If a warning is provided with a product, can its manufacturer or seller assume that the warning will be read and obeyed? That was a question in the following case.

CASE 23.3

Crosswhite v. Jumpking, Inc.

United States District Court, District of Oregon, 2006. 411 F.Supp.2d 1228.

AIKEN, J. [Judge]

* * * *

On May 11, 2002, plaintiff, Gary Crosswhite, was jumping on a trampoline with another boy. The trampoline was owned by Jack and Misty Urbach * * *. The 14-foot round-shaped “backyard” trampoline was manufactured by defendant * * *, Jumpking [Inc.], and purchased by the Urbachs from Costco, Inc. sometime in 1999.

While on the trampoline, plaintiff attempted to execute a back-flip and accidentally landed on his head and neck. The force of the fall caused a fracture in plaintiff's cervical spine resulting in paraplegia. Plaintiff was sixteen years old at the time of his injury. Plaintiff alleges that his injuries were caused by * * * inadequate warnings and instructions [among other things]. Plaintiff brings this lawsuit [in a federal district court] against Jumpking alleging * * * strict liability [and other product liability claims]. * * *

Plaintiff, represented by counsel, filed this lawsuit on September 1, 2004. Over one year later, on November 10, 2005, defendant filed the summary judgment motion at bar. * * *

* * * * *

* * * *A product is not in a defective condition when it is safe for normal handling. * * * If the injury results from abnormal handling * * * the seller is not liable. Where, however, the seller has reason to anticipate that danger may result from a particular use, * * * the seller may be required to give adequate warning of the danger * * * and a product sold without such warning is in a defective condition.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * [T]o prevent the product from being unreasonably dangerous, the seller may be required to give directions or warning, on the container, as to its use. However, where warning is given, the seller may reasonably assume that it will be read and heeded; and a product bearing such a warning is not in a defective condition, nor is it unreasonably dangerous.

Defendant's trampoline is manufactured with nine warning labels that are affixed to various trampoline components. In addition to these nine warning labels, defendant also provides a large laminated warning placard that is designed to be attached by the consumer to the metal frame near the ladder upon which jumpers mount the trampoline. Defendant further provides consumers with a detailed User Manual and a videotape that instructs both users and supervisors about safe and responsible trampoline use. * * *

Uniform trampoline safety standards are published by the American Society for Testing and Materials (ASTM). The ASTM standard sets forth specific warning language to accompany trampolines. The record supports defendant's allegation that the trampoline at issue, including the warning that accompanied it, complied with all ASTM standards relevant at the time. Moreover, the ASTM standards at that time did not require warnings against users performing somersaults (flips) and/or jumping with multiple people to appear on the trampoline itself, however, defendant did affix those warnings to the trampoline as well as on a large warning placard attached to the trampoline at the point of entry or mounting. Specifically, one warning attached to the trampoline frame leg stated:

! WARNING

Do not land on head or neck.

Paralysis or death can result, even if you land in the middle of the trampoline mat (bed).

To reduce the chance of landing on your head or neck, do not do flips.

Accompanying these warning labels is a "stick-figure" drawing of an individual landing on his head. The drawing is located above the warning language and is enclosed in a circular "x-ed" or "crossed-out" notation, commonly understood to mean that the conduct described should be avoided.

Another pair of warning labels affixed to the trampoline legs read:

! WARNING

Only one person at a time on the trampoline. Multiple jumpers increase the chances of loss of control, collision, and falling off.

This can result in broken head, neck, back or leg.

Accompanying these warnings and placed above the warning language is a drawing of two individuals jumping on a single trampoline, which is also enclosed in a "crossed-out" or "x-ed" notation. These same warning labels warning users against performing flips or somersaults and against jumping with multiple people were also on the trampoline frame pad, the large 8" × 11" warning placard framed by the colors orange and yellow and attached to the trampoline frame at the point of entry, and in various places throughout the User Manual. The court notes that these warnings went beyond what was required by the ASTM safety standards.

Further, Jack Urbach testified that the warning placard, which specifically warns against both multiple jumping and performing flips or somersaults and the risk of paralysis, was included in the trampoline he purchased, and that he attached the placard to the trampoline upon its initial assembly. Urbach further testified that he had his entire family watch the safety video provided by defendant prior to assembling and using the trampoline.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

QUESTIONS

1. If Crosswhite had proved that he had not seen, before his accident, the warnings that Jumpking provided, would the court have considered the trampoline defective or unreasonably dangerous? Why or why not?
2. Is the danger from jumping on a trampoline so obvious that even if Jumpking's product had lacked warnings, the manufacturer should not be held liable for a user's injuries? Explain.

Obvious Risks. There is no duty to warn about risks that are obvious or commonly known. Warnings about such risks do not add to the safety of a product and could even detract from it by making other warnings seem less significant. As will be discussed later in the chapter, the obviousness of a risk and a user's decision to proceed in the face of that risk may be a defense in a product liability suit based on an inadequate warning. Nevertheless, risks that may seem obvious to some users will not be obvious to all users, especially when the users are likely to be children. For example, suppose that an eleven-year-old child dives into a shallow, above-ground pool, hits the bottom, and is paralyzed as a result. She later sues the pool maker. The manufacturer cannot escape liability for failing to warn about the hazards of diving into a pool simply by claiming that the risk was obvious.¹⁵

Foreseeable Misuses. Generally, a seller must warn those who purchase its product of the harm that can result from the foreseeable misuse of the product as well. The key is the foreseeability of the misuse. Sellers are not required to take precautions against every conceivable misuse of a product, just those that are foreseeable.

Market-Share Liability

Ordinarily, in all product liability claims, a plaintiff must prove that the defective product that caused his or her injury was the product of a specific defendant. In a few situations, however, courts have dropped this requirement when plaintiffs could not prove which of many distributors of a harmful product supplied the particular product that caused the injuries. For example, in one case a plaintiff who was a hemophiliac received injections of a blood protein known as antihemophilic factor (AHF) concentrate. The plaintiff later tested positive for the AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) virus. Because it was not known which manufacturer was responsible for the particular AHF received by the plaintiff, the court held that all of the manufacturers of AHF could be held liable under the theory of market-share liability.¹⁶

15. Bunch v. Hoffinger Industries, Inc., 123 Cal.App.4th 1278, 20 Cal.Rptr.3d 780 (2004).

16. Smith v. Cutter Biological, Inc., 72 Haw. 416, 823 P.2d 717 (1991); Sutowski v. Eli Lilly & Co., 82 Ohio St.3d 347, 696 N.E.2d 187 (1998); and In re Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether ("MTBE") Products Liability Litigation, 447 F.Supp.2d 289 (S.D.N.Y.2006).

Courts in many jurisdictions do not recognize this theory of liability, believing that it deviates too significantly from traditional legal principles.¹⁷ In jurisdictions that do recognize market-share liability, it is usually applied in cases involving drugs or chemicals, when it is difficult or impossible to determine which company made a particular product.

Other Applications of Strict Product Liability

Virtually all courts extend the strict liability of manufacturers and other sellers to injured bystanders. Thus, if a defective forklift that will not go into reverse injures a passerby, that individual can sue the manufacturer for product liability (and possibly bring a negligence action against the forklift operator as well).

Strict product liability also applies to suppliers of component parts. For example, suppose that General Motors buys brake pads from a subcontractor and puts them in Chevrolets without changing their composition. If those pads are defective, both the supplier of the brake pads and General Motors will be held strictly liable for the damages caused by the defects.

Defenses to Product Liability

Defendants in product liability suits can raise a number of defenses. One defense, of course, is to show that there is no basis for the plaintiff's claim. For example, in a product liability case based on negligence, if a defendant can show that the plaintiff has not met the requirements (such as causation) for an action in negligence, generally the defendant will not be liable. In regard to strict product liability, a defendant can claim that the plaintiff failed to meet one of the requirements for an action in strict liability. For example, if the defendant establishes that the goods have been subsequently altered, normally the defendant will not be held liable.¹⁸ Defendants may also assert the defenses discussed next.

17. For the Illinois Supreme Court's position on market-share liability, see Smith v. Eli Lilly & Co., 137 Ill.2d 222, 560 N.E.2d 324 (1990). Pennsylvania law also does not recognize market-share liability. See Bortell v. Eli Lilly & Co., 406 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C.2005).

18. See, for example, Edmondson v. Macclesfield L-P Gas Co., 642 S.E.2d 265 (N.C.App. 2007); and Pichardo v. C. S. Brown Co., 35 A.D.3d 303, 827 N.Y.S.2d 131 (N.Y.App. 2006).

Assumption of Risk

Assumption of risk can sometimes be used as a defense in a product liability action. To establish such a defense, the defendant must show that (1) the plaintiff knew and appreciated the risk created by the product defect and (2) the plaintiff voluntarily assumed the risk, even though it was unreasonable to do so. For example, if a buyer failed to heed a seller's product recall, the buyer may be deemed to have assumed the risk of the product defect that the seller offered to cure. (See Chapter 7 for a more detailed discussion of assumption of risk.)

Product Misuse

Similar to the defense of voluntary assumption of risk is that of product misuse, which occurs when a product is used for a purpose for which it was not intended. Here, in contrast to assumption of risk, the injured party does not know that the product is dangerous for a particular use. The courts have severely limited this defense, however. Even if the injured party does not know about the inherent danger of using the product in a wrong way, if the misuse is reasonably foreseeable, the seller must take measures to guard against it.

Comparative Negligence (Fault)

Developments in the area of comparative negligence, or fault (discussed in Chapter 7), have also affected the doctrine of strict liability. In the past, the plaintiff's conduct was never a defense to liability for a defective product. Today, courts in many jurisdictions will consider the negligent or intentional actions of both the plaintiff and the defendant when apportioning liability and damages.¹⁹ This means that a defendant may be able to limit at least some of its liability if it can show that the plaintiff's misuse of the product contributed to his or her injuries. When proved, comparative negligence does not completely absolve the defendant of liability (as do other defenses), but it can reduce the total amount of damages that will be awarded to the plaintiff.

Note that some jurisdictions allow only intentional conduct to affect a plaintiff's recovery, whereas other states allow ordinary negligence to be used as a defense to product liability. For example, Dan Smith, a mechanic in Alaska, was not wearing a hard hat at work when he was asked to start the diesel engine of an air compressor. Because the compressor was an older model, he had to prop open a door to start it. When he got the engine started, the door fell from its position and hit Smith's head. The injury caused him to suffer from seizures and epilepsy. Smith sued the manufacturer, claiming that the engine was defectively designed. The manufacturer contended that Smith had been negligent by failing to wear a hard hat and propping open the door in an unsafe manner. Smith's attorney argued that ordinary negligence could not be used as a defense in product liability cases. The Alaska Supreme Court ruled that defendants in product liability actions can raise the plaintiff's ordinary negligence to reduce their liability proportionately.²⁰

Commonly Known Dangers

The dangers associated with certain products (such as matches and sharp knives) are so commonly known that, as already mentioned, manufacturers need not warn users of those dangers. If a defendant succeeds in convincing the court that a plaintiff's injury resulted from a commonly known danger, the defendant will not be liable.

A classic case on this issue involved a plaintiff who was injured when an elastic exercise rope she had purchased slipped off her foot and struck her in the eye, causing a detachment of the retina. The plaintiff claimed that the manufacturer should be liable because it had failed to warn users that the exerciser might slip off a foot in such a manner. The court stated that to hold the manufacturer liable in these circumstances "would go beyond the reasonable dictates of justice in fixing the liabilities of manufacturers." After all, stated the court, "[a]lmost every physical object can be inherently dangerous or potentially dangerous in a sense. . . . A manufacturer cannot manufacture a knife that will not cut or a hammer that will not mash a thumb or a stove that will not burn a finger. The law does not require [manufacturers] to warn of such common dangers."²¹ 21. Jamieson v. Woodward & Lothrop, 247 F.2d 23 (D.C. Cir.1957).

Knowledgeable User

A related defense is the knowledgeable user defense. If a particular danger (such as electrical shock) is or should be commonly known by particular users of a product (such as electricians), the manufacturer need not warn these users of the danger.

In one case, for example, the parents of a group of teenagers who had become overweight and developed health problems filed a product liability suit against McDonald's. The teenagers claimed that the well-known fast-food chain should be held liable for failing to warn customers of the adverse health effects of eating its food products. The court rejected this claim, however, based on the knowledgeable user defense. The court found that it is well known that the food at McDonald's contains high levels of cholesterol, fat, salt, and sugar and is therefore unhealthful. The court's opinion, which thwarted future lawsuits against fast-food restaurants, stated: "If consumers know (or reasonably should know) the potential ill health effects of eating at McDonald's, they cannot blame McDonald's if they, nonetheless, choose to satiate their appetite with a surfeit [excess] of supersized McDonald's products."²²

Statutes of Limitations and Repose

As previously discussed, statutes of limitations restrict the time within which an action may be brought. The statute of limitations for product liability cases varies according to state law, and unlike warranty claims, product liability claims are not subject to the UCC's limitation period. Usually, the injured party must bring a product liability claim within two to four years. Often, the running of the prescribed period is tolled (that is, suspended) until the party suffering an injury has discovered it or should have discovered it. To ensure that sellers and manufacturers will not be left vulnerable to lawsuits indefinitely, many states have passed laws, called statutes of repose, that place outer time limits on product liability actions. For example, a statute of repose may require that claims be brought within twelve years from the date of sale or manufacture of the defective product. If the plaintiff does not bring an action before the prescribed period expires, the seller cannot be held liable.

REVIEWING Warranties and Product Liability

Shalene Kolchek bought a Great Lakes Spa from Val Porter, a dealer who was selling spas at the state fair. Porter told Kolchek that Great Lakes spas are “top of the line” and “the Cadillac of spas” and indicated that the spa she was buying was “fully warranted for three years.” Kolchek signed an installment contract; then Porter handed her the manufacturer’s paperwork and arranged for the spa to be delivered and installed for her. Three months later, Kolchek noticed that one corner of the spa was leaking onto her new deck and causing damage. She complained to Porter, but he did nothing about the problem. Kolchek’s family continued to use the spa. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Porter’s statement that the spa was “top of the line” and “the Cadillac of spas” create any type of warranty? Why or why not?
2. If the paperwork provided to Kolchek after her purchase indicated that the spa had no warranty, would this be an effective disclaimer under the Uniform Commercial Code? Explain.
3. One night, Kolchek’s six-year-old daughter, Litisha, was in the spa with her mother. Litisha’s hair became entangled in the spa’s drain and she was sucked down and held underwater for a prolonged period, causing her to suffer brain damage. Under which theory or theories of product liability can Kolchek sue Porter to recover for Litisha’s injuries?
4. If Kolchek had negligently left Litisha alone in the spa prior to the incident described in the previous question, what defense to liability might Porter assert?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

23-1. Moon, a farmer, needs to install a two-thousand-pound piece of equipment in his barn. This will require lifting the equipment thirty feet up into a hayloft. Moon goes to Davidson Hardware and tells Davidson that he needs some heavy-duty rope to be used on his farm. Davidson recommends a one-inch-thick nylon rope, and Moon purchases two hundred feet of it. Moon ties the rope around the piece of equipment; puts the rope through a pulley; and, with a tractor, lifts the equipment off the ground. Suddenly, the rope breaks. The equipment crashes to the ground and is severely damaged. Moon files a suit against Davidson for breach of the implied warranty of fitness for a particular purpose. Discuss how successful Moon will be in his suit.

23-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Colt manufactures a new pistol. The firing of the pistol depends on an enclosed high-pressure device. The pistol has been thoroughly tested in two laboratories in the Midwest, and its design and manufacture are in accord with current technology. Wayne purchases one of the new pistols from Hardy’s Gun and Rifle Emporium. When he uses the pistol in the high altitude of the Rockies, the difference in pressure causes the pistol to misfire, resulting in serious injury to Wayne. Colt can prove that all due care was used in the manufacturing process, and it refuses to pay for Wayne's injuries. Discuss Colt's liability in tort.

23-3. Baxter manufactures electric hair dryers. Julie purchases a Baxter dryer from her local Ace Drugstore. Cox, a friend and guest in Julie's home, has taken a shower and wants to dry her hair. Julie tells Cox to use the new Baxter hair dryer that she has just purchased. As Cox plugs in the dryer, sparks fly out from the motor, and sparks continue to fly as she operates it. Despite this, Cox begins drying her hair. Suddenly, the entire dryer ignites into flames, severely burning Cox's scalp. Cox sues Baxter on the basis of negligence and strict liability in tort. Baxter admits that the dryer was defective but denies liability, particularly because Cox was not the person who purchased the dryer. In other words, Cox had no contractual relationship with Baxter. Discuss the validity of Baxter's defense. Are there any other defenses that Baxter might assert to avoid liability? Discuss fully.

23-4. Implied Warranties. Shalom Malul contracted with Capital Cabinets, Inc., in August 1999 for new kitchen cabinets made by Holiday Kitchens. The price was $10,900. On Capital's recommendation, Malul hired Barry Burger to install the cabinets for $1,600. Burger finished the job in March 2000, and Malul contracted for more cabinets at a price of $2,300, which Burger installed in April. Within a couple of weeks, the doors on several of the cabinets began to "melt," as the laminate (surface covering) began to pull away from the substrate (the material underneath the surface). Capital replaced several of the doors, but the problem occurred again, involving a total of six out of thirty doors. A Holiday Kitchens representative inspected the cabinets and concluded that the melting was due to excessive heat, the result of the doors being placed too close to the stove. Malul filed a suit in a New York state court against Capital alleging, among other things, a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. Were these goods "merchantable"? Why or why not? 23-5. Product Liability. In January 1999, John Clark of Clarksdale, Mississippi, bought a paintball gun. Clark practiced with the gun and knew how to screw in the carbon dioxide cartridge, pump the gun, and use its safety and trigger. He hunted and had taken a course in hunter safety education. He knew that protective eyewear was available for purchase, but he chose not to buy it. Clark also understood that it was "common sense" not to shoot anyone in the face. Chris Rico, another Clarksdale resident, owned a paintball gun made by Brass Eagle, Inc. Rico was similarly familiar with the gun's use and its risks. At that time and place, Clark, Rico, and their friends played a game that involved shooting paint-balls at cars whose occupants also had the guns. One night, while Clark and Rico were cruising with their guns, Rico shot at Clark's car but hit Clark in the eye. Clark filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Brass Eagle to recover for the injury, alleging, among other things, that its gun was defectively designed. During the trial, Rico testified that his gun "never malfunctioned." In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [Clark v. Brass Eagle, Inc., 866 So.2d 456 (Miss. 2004)]

Mary Jane Boerner began smoking in 1945 at the age of fifteen. For a short time, she smoked Lucky Strikes (a brand of cigarettes) before switching to the Pall Mall brand, which she smoked until she quit altogether in 1981. Pall Malls had higher levels of carcinogenic tar than other cigarettes and lacked effective filters, which would have reduced the amount of tar inhaled into the lungs. In 1996, Mary Jane developed lung cancer. She and her husband, Henry Boerner, filed a suit in a federal district court against Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co., the maker of Pall Malls. The Boerners claimed, among other things, that Pall Malls contained a design defect. Mary Jane died in 1999. According to Dr. Peter Marvin, her treating physician, she died from the effects of cigarette smoke. Henry continued the suit, offering evidence that Pall Malls featured a filter that actually increased the amount of tar taken into the body. When is a product defective in design? Does this product meet the requirements? Why or why not? [Boerner v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co., 394 F.3d 594 (8th Cir. 2005)]

23-7. Express Warranties. Videotape is recorded magnetically. The magnetic particles that constitute the recorded image are bound to the tape's polyester base. The binder that holds the particles to the base breaks down over time. This breakdown, which is called sticky shed syndrome, causes the image to deteriorate. The Walt Disney Co. made many of its movies available on tape. Buena Vista Home Entertainment, Inc., sold the tapes, which it described as part of a "Gold Collection" or "Masterpiece Collection." The advertising included such statements as "Give Your Children The Memories Of A Lifetime—Collect Each Timeless Masterpiece!" and "Available For A Limited Time Only!" Charmaine Schreib and others who bought the tapes filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Disney and Buena Vista, alleging, among other things, breach of warranty. The plaintiffs claimed that the defendants' marketing promised the tapes would last for generations. In reality, the tapes were as subject to sticky shed syndrome as other tapes. Did the ads create an express warranty? In whose favor should the court rule on this issue? Explain.

23-8. Product Liability. Bret D’Auguste was an experienced skier when he rented equipment to ski at Hunter Mountain Ski Bowl, Inc., owned by Shanty Hollow Corp., in New York. The adjustable retention/release value for the bindings on the rented equipment was set at a level that, according to skiing industry standards, was too low—meaning that the skis would be released too easily—given D’Auguste’s height, weight, and ability. When D’Auguste entered a “double black diamond,” or extremely difficult, trail, he noticed immediately that the surface consisted of ice and virtually no snow. He tried to exit the steeply declining trail by making a sharp right turn, but in the attempt, his left ski snapped off. D’Auguste lost his balance, fell, and slid down the mountain, striking his face and head against a fence along the trail. According to a report by a rental shop employee, one of the bindings on D’Auguste’s skis had a “cracked heel housing.” D’Auguste filed a suit in a New York state court against Shanty Hollow and others, including the bindings’ manufacturer, on a theory of strict product liability. The manufacturer filed a motion for summary judgment. On what basis might the court grant the motion? On what basis might the court deny the motion? How should the court rule? Explain. 23-9. Implied Warranties. Peter and Tanya Rothing operate Diamond R Stables near Belgrade, Montana, where they bred, trained, and sold horses. Arnold Kallestad owns a ranch in Gallatin County, Montana, where he grows hay and grain, and raises Red Angus cattle. For more than twenty years, Kallestad has sold between three hundred and one thousand tons of hay annually, sometimes advertising it for sale in the Bozeman Daily Chronicle. In 2001, the Rothings bought hay from Kallestad for $90 a ton. They received delivery on April 23. In less than two weeks, at least nine of the Rothings’ horses exhibited symptoms of poisoning that was diagnosed as botulism. Before the outbreak was over, nineteen animals died. Robert Whitlock, associate professor of medicine and the director of the Botulism Laboratory at the University of Pennsylvania, concluded that Kallestad’s hay was the source. The Rothings filed a suit in a Montana state court against Kallestad, claiming, in part, breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. Kallestad asked the court to dismiss this claim on the ground that, if botulism had been present, it had been in no way foreseeable. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? [*Rothing v. 23-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Jillian, age 3. In March 1998, Calles bought an Aim N Flame utility lighter, which she stored on the top shelf of her kitchen cabinet. A trigger can ignite the Aim N Flame after an “ON/OFF” switch is slid to the “on” position. On the night of March 31, Calles and Victoria left to get videos. Jenna and Jillian were in bed, and Amanda was watching television. Calles returned to find fire trucks and emergency vehicles around her home. Robert Finn, a fire investigator, determined that Jenna had started a fire using the lighter. Jillian suffered smoke inhalation, was hospitalized, and died on April 21. Calles filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Scripto-Tokai Corp., which distributed the Aim N Flame, and others. In her suit, which was grounded, in part, in strict liability claims, Calles alleged that the lighter was an “unreasonably dangerous product.” Scripto filed a motion for summary judgment. [Calles v. Scripto-Tokai Corp., 224 Ill.2d 247, 864 N.E.2d 249, 309 Ill.Dec. 383 (2007)]

- A product is “unreasonably dangerous” when it is dangerous beyond the expectation of the ordinary consumer. Whose expectation—Calles’s or Jenna’s—applies here? Why? Does the lighter pass this test? Explain.
- A product is also “unreasonably dangerous” when a less dangerous alternative was economically feasible for its maker, who failed to produce it. Scripto contended that because its product was “simple” and the danger was “obvious,” it should be excepted from this test. Do you agree? Why or why not?
- Calles presented evidence as to the likelihood and seriousness of injury from lighters that do not have child-safety devices. Scripto argued that the Aim N Flame is a useful, inexpensive, alternative source of fire and is safer than a match. Calles admitted that she was aware of the dangers presented by lighters in the hands of children. Scripto admitted that it had been a defendant in at least twenty-five suits for injuries that occurred under similar circumstances. With these factors in mind, how should the court rule? Why?

Domestic and International Sales and Lease Contracts

Transactions involving the sale or lease of goods make up a great deal of the business activity in the commercial and manufacturing sectors of our economy. Articles 2 and 2A of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) govern the sale or lease of goods in every state except Louisiana. Many of the UCC's provisions express our ethical standards.

Good Faith and Commercial Reasonableness

The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC and help to prevent unethical behavior by businesspersons. These two key concepts are read into every contract and impose certain duties on all parties. Additionally, reasonableness in the formation, performance, and termination of contracts underlies virtually all of the UCC's provisions.

As an example, consider the UCC's approach to open terms. Section 2-311(1) states that when a term is to be specified by one of the parties, "[a]ny such specification must be made in good faith and within limits set by commercial reasonableness." The requirement of commercial reasonableness means that the term subsequently supplied by one party should not come as a surprise to the other. The party filling in the missing term may not take advantage of the opportunity to add a term that will be beneficial to himself or herself (and detrimental to the other party) and then demand contractual performance of the other party that was totally unanticipated. Under the UCC, the party filling in the missing term is not allowed to deviate from what is commercially reasonable in the context of the transaction. Courts frequently look to course of dealing, usage of trade, and the surrounding circumstances in determining what is commercially reasonable in a given situation.

Good Faith in Output and Requirements Contracts

The obligation of good faith is particularly important in so-called output and requirements contracts. UCC 2-306 states that "quantity" in these contracts "means such actual output or requirements as may occur in good faith." For example, suppose that Mandrow's Machines has fifty employees assembling personal computers. Mandrow's has a requirements contract with Advanced Tech Circuit Boards, under which Advanced Tech is to supply Mandrow's with all of the circuit boards it needs. If Mandrow's suddenly quadruples the size of its business, it cannot insist that Advanced Tech supply it with all of its requirements, as specified in the original contract.

Consider another example. Assume that the market price of the goods subject to a requirements contract rises rapidly and dramatically because of an extreme shortage of materials necessary to their production. The buyer could claim that her needs are equivalent to the seller's entire output. Then, after buying all of the seller's output at the contract price (which is substantially below the market price), the buyer could turn around and sell the goods that she does not need at the higher market price. Under the UCC, this type of unethical behavior is prohibited, even though the buyer in this instance has not technically breached the contract.

Bad Faith Not Required A party can breach the obligation of good faith under the UCC even if the party did not show "bad faith"—that is, even when there is no proof that the party was dishonest. For example, in one case a large manufacturer of recreational boats, Genmar Holdings, Inc., purchased Horizon, a small company that produced a particular type of "deep-V" fishing boat. Genmar bought Horizon to expand into the southern boat market and to prevent Horizon from becoming a potential future competitor. At the time of the sale, Genmar executives promised that Horizon boats would be the "champion" of the facility and vowed to keep Horizon's key employees (including the founder and his family) on as managers. The contract required Genmar to pay Horizon a lump sum in cash and also to pay "earn-out consideration" under a specified formula for five years. The "earn-out" amount would depend on the number of Horizon brand boats sold and on the annual gross revenues of the facility.

One year after the sale, Genmar renamed the Horizon brand of boats "Nova" and told employees at the facility to give priority to producing the original Genmar brand of boats over the Nova boats. Because the Genmar boats were more difficult and time consuming to make than the Nova boats, the facility's gross revenues and production decreased, and Genmar was not required to pay the "earn-out" amounts. Eventually, Genmar fired the former Horizon employees and stopped manufacturing the Nova brand of boats entirely. The former employees filed a suit alleging that Genmar had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The defendants argued that they could not have violated good faith because there was no proof that they had engaged in fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation. The court held for the plaintiffs, however, and the decision was affirmed on appeal.¹ It is possible for a party to breach its good faith obligations under the UCC even if the party did not engage in fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation.

Commercial Reasonableness Under the UCC, the concept of good faith is closely linked to commercial reasonableness. All commercial actions—including the performance and enforcement of contract obligations—must display commercial reasonableness. A merchant is expected to act in a reasonable manner according to reasonable commercial customs.

The concept of commercial reasonableness is clearly expressed in the doctrine of commercial impracticability. Under this doctrine, which is related to the common law doctrine of impossibility of performance, a party's nonperformance of a contractual obligation may be excused when, because of unforeseen circumstances, performance of the contract becomes impracticable. The courts make clear, however, that before performance will be excused under this doctrine, the nonperforming party must have made every reasonable effort to fulfill his or her obligations.

The Concept of the Good Faith Purchaser

The concept of the good faith purchaser reflects the UCC's emphasis on protecting innocent parties. Suppose, for example, that you innocently and in good faith purchase a boat from someone who appears to have good title and who demands and receives from you a fair market price. The UCC believes that you should be protected from the possibility that the real owner—from whom the seller may have fraudulently obtained the boat—will later appear and demand his boat back. (Nothing, however, prevents the true owner from bringing suit against the party who defrauded him.)

Ethical questions arise, however, when the purchaser is not quite so innocent. Suppose that the purchaser has reason to suspect that the seller may not have good title to the goods being sold but nonetheless goes ahead with the transaction because it is a "good deal." At what point does the buyer, in this situation, cross over the boundary that separates the good faith purchaser from one who purchases in bad faith? This boundary is a significant one in the law of sales because the UCC will not be a refuge for those who purchase in bad faith. The term good faith purchaser means just that—one who enters into a contract for the purchase of goods without knowing, or having any reason to know, that there is anything shady or illegal about the deal.

Unconscionability

The doctrine of unconscionability represents a good example of how the law attempts to enforce ethical behavior. This doctrine suggests that some contracts may be so unfair to one party as to be unenforceable, even though that party originally agreed to the contract's terms. Section 2-302 of the UCC provides that a court will consider the fairness of contracts and may hold that a contract or any clause of a contract was unconscionable at the time it was made. If so, the court may refuse to enforce the contract, enforce the contract without the unconscionable clause, or limit the application of the clause so as to avoid an unconscionable result.

The Test for Unconscionability The UCC does not define the term unconscionability. The drafters of the UCC, however, have added explanatory comments to the relevant sections, and these comments serve as guidelines for applying the UCC. Comment 1 to Section 2-302 suggests that the basic test for unconscionability is whether, under the circumstances existing at the time of the contract's formation, the clause in question was so one sided as to be unconscionable. This test is to be applied against the general commercial background of the contract. For example, a court might find that a contract between a merchant-seller and a marginally literate consumer was unfair and unenforceable, but the court might uphold the same contract when it was made between two merchants.

1. O'Tool v. Genmar Holdings, Inc., 387 F.3d 1188 (10th Cir. 2004).

Unconscionability—A Case Example In one case applying Section 2-302, a New York appellate court held that an arbitration clause was unconscionable and refused to enforce it. Gateway 2000, Inc., which sold computers and software directly to consumers, included in its retail agreements a clause specifying that any dispute arising out of the contract had to be arbitrated in Chicago, Illinois, in accordance with the arbitration rules of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC).

A number of consumers who had purchased Gateway products became incensed when they learned that ICC rules governing arbitration required advance fees of $4,000 (more than the cost of most Gateway products), of which the $2,000 registration fee was nonrefundable—even if the consumer prevailed at the arbitration. Additionally, the consumers would have to pay travel expenses to Chicago. In the class-action litigation against Gateway that followed, the New York court agreed with the consumers that the “egregiously [flagrantly] oppressive” arbitration clause was unconscionable: “Barred from resorting to the courts by the arbitration clause in the first instance, the designation of a financially prohibitive forum effectively bars consumers from this forum as well; consumers are thus left with no forum at all in which to resolve a dispute.”²

Warranties

A seller or lessor has not only a legal obligation to provide safe products but also an ethical one. When faced with the possibility of increasing safety at no extra cost, every ethical businessperson will certainly opt for a safer product. An ethical issue arises, however, when producing a safer product means higher costs. To some extent, our warranty laws serve to protect consumers from sellers who may be tempted to neglect ethical concerns if what they are doing is both legal and profitable.

Express and Implied Warranties Both express and implied warranties are recognized by the UCC. Under UCC 2-314 and 2A-212, goods sold by a merchant or leased by a lessor must be fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used, be of proper quality, and be properly labeled and packaged. The UCC injects greater fairness into contractual situations by recognizing descriptions as express warranties. Hence, a seller or lessor of goods may be held to have breached a contract if the goods fail to conform to the description. In this way, the UCC acknowledges that a buyer or lessee may often reasonably believe that a seller or lessor is warranting his or her product, even though the seller or lessor may not use a formal word such as warrant or guarantee. Thus, the law imposes an ethical obligation on sellers and lessors in a statutory form.

Warranty Disclaimers The UCC requirement that warranty disclaimers be sufficiently conspicuous to catch the eye of a reasonable purchaser is based on the ethical premise that sellers of goods should not take advantage of unwary consumers, who may not—in the excitement of making a new purchase—always read the “fine print” on standard purchase order forms. As discussed in Chapter 23, if a seller or lessor, when attempting to disclaim warranties, fails to meet the specific requirements imposed by the UCC, the warranties will not be effectively disclaimed. Before the UCC was adopted by the states, purchasers of automobiles frequently signed standard-form purchase agreements drafted by the auto manufacturer without learning the meaning of all the fine print until later.

Although freedom of contract reflects a basic ethical principle in our society, courts have made it clear that when such freedom leads to gross unfairness, it should be curbed. (Several examples of the exceptions to freedom of contract that courts will make were offered in the Focus on Ethics feature at the end of Unit Three.) Nonetheless, before the UCC was in effect, courts generally would not intervene in cases involving warranty disclaimers in fine print or otherwise “hidden” in a standard purchase order form. Exceptions were made only when the resulting unfairness “shocked the conscience” of the court. By obligating sellers and lessors to meet specific requirements when disclaiming warranties, the UCC has made dealing fairly with buyers and lessees—already an ethical obligation of all sellers and lessors of goods—a legal obligation as well.

Today, if a warranty disclaimer unfairly “surprises” a purchaser or a lessee, chances are that the disclaimer was not sufficiently conspicuous. In this situation, the unfairness of the bargain need not be so great as to “shock the court’s conscience” before a remedy will be granted.

UCC Section 2-207 provides that a contract can be entered into even though the acceptance includes additional terms. Conflicts often arise because whether a form is defined as an offer or an acceptance can have significant consequences for the parties. Indeed, one of the results of Section 2-207 is that buyers and sellers go to great lengths to draft their responses as “offers” or “counteroffers” (instead of acceptances) so that their terms will control any resulting contracts. Remember that under UCC 2-207(2), between merchants additional terms in an acceptance that materially alter the contract do not become part of the contract—the terms of the offer control.

Some courts have taken a different approach in resolving contract disputes when the parties are in fundamental disagreement over a material term. Rather than looking to UCC 2-207(2), they apply the rule expressed in UCC 2-207(3). This rule provides that when the parties’ conduct and communications clearly indicate that a contract was formed, any conflicting material terms may simply be stricken from the contract. This rule is sometimes referred to, aptly enough, as the “knock-out rule.” Thus, this UCC provision leaves it to the discretion of the courts to determine whether, under the circumstances, a contract has been formed and what the terms of the contract are—which will be the terms on which the parties agree.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Review the UCC provisions that apply to the topics discussed in Chapters 20 through 23. Discuss fully how various UCC provisions, excluding the provisions discussed above, reflect social values and ethical standards.
2. How can a court objectively measure good faith and commercial reasonableness?
3. Generally, the courts determine what constitutes “reasonable” behavior in disputes between contract parties over this issue. Should the UCC be more specific in defining what will be deemed reasonable in specific circumstances so that the courts do not have to decide the issue? Why or why not?
4. Why does the UCC protect innocent persons (good faith purchasers) who buy goods from sellers with voidable title but not innocent persons who buy goods from sellers with void title?

The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments

A negotiable instrument is a signed writing (or record) that contains an unconditional promise or order to pay an exact amount of money, either on demand or at a specific future time. The checks you write to pay for groceries, rent, your monthly car payment, insurance premiums, and other items are negotiable instruments.

Most commercial transactions that take place in the modern business world would be inconceivable without negotiable instruments. A negotiable instrument can function as a substitute for cash or as an extension of credit. For example, when a buyer writes a check to pay for goods, the check serves as a substitute for cash. When a buyer gives a seller a promissory note in which the buyer promises to pay the seller the purchase price within sixty days, the seller has essentially extended credit to the buyer for a sixty-day period. For a negotiable instrument to operate practically as either a substitute for cash or a credit device, or both, it is essential that the instrument be easily transferable without danger of being uncollectible. This is a fundamental function of negotiable instruments. Each rule described in the following pages can be examined in light of this function.

The law governing negotiable instruments grew out of commercial necessity. In the medieval world, merchants engaging in foreign trade used bills of exchange to finance and conduct their affairs, rather than risk transporting gold or coins. Because the English king's courts of those times did not recognize the validity of these bills of exchange, the merchants developed their own set of rules, which were enforced by "fair" or "borough" courts. Eventually, the decisions of these courts became a distinct set of laws known as the Lex Mercatoria (Law Merchant). The Law Merchant was codified in England in the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882. In 1896, in the United States, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) drafted the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law. This law was the forerunner of Article 3 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC

Negotiable instruments are governed by Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC. In this chapter and in Chapters 25 and 26, we will focus on the law as established by Article 3. You will learn about the different types of negotiable instruments, the requirements that all negotiable instruments must meet, the process of negotiation (transferring an instrument from one party to another), and the responsibilities of parties to negotiable instruments. Note that UCC 3-104(b) defines an instrument as a "negotiable instrument." For that reason, whenever the term instrument is used in this book, it refers to a negotiable instrument. Article 4 governs bank deposits and collections as well as bank-customer relationships—topics that we will examine in Chapter 27.

The 1990 Revision of Articles 3 and 4

In 1990, a revised version of Article 3 was issued for adoption by the states. Many of the changes to Article 3 simply clarified old sections; some, however, significantly altered the former provisions. As of this writing, all of the states except New York and South Carolina have adopted the revised article. Therefore, all references to Article 3 in this chapter and in the following chapters are to the revised Article 3. When the revisions to Article 3 have made important changes in the law, however, we discuss the previous law in footnotes. Article 4 was also revised in 1990. In part, these changes were necessary because the changes in Article 3 affected Article 4 provisions. The revised Articles 3 and 4 are included in their entirety in Appendix C.

The 2002 Amendments to Articles 3 and 4

In 2002, the NCCUSL and the American Law Institute approved a number of amendments to Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC. One of the purposes of the amendments was to update the law with respect to e-commerce. For example, the amended versions of the articles implement the policy of the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (see Chapter 19) by removing unnecessary obstacles to electronic communications. Additionally, the word writing has been replaced with the term record throughout the articles. Other amendments relate to such topics as telephone-generated checks and the payment and discharge of negotiable instruments.

Most states have not yet adopted these amendments. Therefore, in this text we provide footnotes discussing the amendments only if they will significantly alter existing law. Keep in mind, however, that even when the changes are not substantive, some section numbers may change slightly once a state has adopted the amendments to Article 3 (subsection 9 may become subsection 12, for example).

Types of Negotiable Instruments

The UCC specifies four types of negotiable instruments: drafts, checks, notes, and certificates of deposit (CDs). These instruments, which are summarized briefly in Exhibit 24-1, are frequently divided into the two classifications that we will discuss in the following subsections: orders to pay (drafts and checks) and promises to pay (promissory notes and CDs).

Negotiable instruments may also be classified as either demand instruments or time instruments. A demand instrument is payable on demand—that is, it is payable immediately after it is issued and thereafter for a reasonable period of time.¹ Issue is “the first delivery of an instrument by the maker or drawer . . . for the purpose of giving rights on the instrument to any person” [UCC 3-105]. All checks are demand instruments because, by definition, they must be payable on demand. A time instrument is payable at a future date.

Drafts and Checks (Orders to Pay)

A draft is an unconditional written order that involves three parties. The party creating the draft (the drawer) orders another party (the drawee) to pay money, usually to a third party (the payee). The most common type of draft is a check.

Time Drafts and Sight Drafts A time draft is payable at a definite future time. A sight draft (or demand draft) is payable on sight—that is, when it is presented for payment. A sight draft may be payable on acceptance. Acceptance is the drawee’s written promise to pay the draft when it comes due. An instrument is usually accepted by writing the word accepted across the face of the instrument, followed by the date of acceptance and the signature of the drawee. A draft can be both a time and a sight draft; such a draft is payable at a stated time after sight.

Exhibit 24-2 shows a typical time draft. For the drawee to be obligated to honor the order, the drawee must be obligated to the drawer either by agreement or through a debtor-creditor relationship. For example, on January 16, Ourtown Real Estate orders $1,000 worth of office supplies from Eastman Supply Company, with payment due April 16. Also on January 16, Ourtown sends Eastman a draft drawn on its account with the First National Bank of Whiteacre as payment. In this scenario, the drawer is Ourtown, the drawee is Ourtown’s bank (First National Bank of Whiteacre), and the payee is Eastman Supply Company. First National Bank is obligated to honor the draft because of its account agreement with Ourtown Real Estate.

Trade Acceptances A trade acceptance is a type of draft that is frequently used in the sale of goods. In a trade acceptance, the seller of the goods is both the drawer and the payee. Essentially, the draft orders the buyer to pay a specified amount to the seller, usually at a stated time in the future.

For example, Midwestern Style Fabrics sells $50,000 worth of fabric to D & F Clothiers, Inc., each spring on terms requiring payment to be made in ninety days. One year, Midwestern Style needs cash, so it draws a trade acceptance that orders D & F to pay $50,000 to the order of Midwestern Style Fabrics ninety days hence. Midwestern Style presents the draft to D & F, which accepts the draft by signing and dating the face of the instrument. D & F then returns the draft to Midwestern Style Fabrics. D & F's acceptance creates an enforceable promise to pay the draft when it comes due in ninety days. Midwestern Style can now obtain the cash it needs by selling the trade acceptance in the commercial money market (a financial market for short-term borrowing that businesses use). Trade acceptances are the standard credit instruments in sales transactions (see Exhibit 24-3).

1. “A promise or order is ‘payable on demand’ if it (i) states that it is payable on demand or at sight, or otherwise indicates that it is payable at the will of the holder, or (ii) does not state any time of payment” [UCC 3-108(a)]. The UCC defines a holder as “the person in possession if a negotiable instrument is payable either to bearer or to an identified person [who] is the person in possession” [see UCC 1-201(21)(A)]. The term bearer will be defined later in this chapter.

When the draft orders the buyer's bank to pay, it is called a banker's acceptance. A banker's acceptance is commonly used in international trade.

Checks As mentioned, the most commonly used type of draft is a check. The writer of the check is the drawer, the bank on which the check is drawn is the drawee, and the person to whom the check is made payable is the payee. As mentioned earlier, checks are demand instruments because they are payable on demand. (Do other countries always consider checks to be negotiable instruments? For a discussion of this issue, see this chapter's Insight into the Global Environment feature on the following page.)

Checks will be discussed more fully in Chapter 27, but it should be noted here that with certain types of checks, such as cashier's checks, the bank is both the drawer and the drawee. The bank customer purchases a cashier's check from the bank—that is, pays the bank the amount of the check—and indicates to whom the check should be made payable. The bank, not the customer, is the drawer of the check, as well as the drawee. The idea behind a cashier's check is that it functions the same as cash, so there is no question of whether the check will be paid—the bank has committed itself to paying the stated amount on demand.

Promissory Notes and CDs (Promises to Pay)

A promissory note is a written promise made by one person (the maker of the promise to pay) to another (usually a payee). A promissory note, which is often referred to simply as a note, can be made payable at a definite time or on demand. It can name a specific payee or merely be payable to bearer (bearer instruments are discussed later in this chapter). For example, on April 30, Laurence and Margaret Roberts sign a writing unconditionally promising to pay “to the order of” the First National Bank of Whiteacre $3,000 (with 8 percent interest) on or before June 29. This writing is a promissory note. A typical promissory note is shown in Exhibit 24-4 on page 491.

Promissory notes are used in a variety of credit transactions. Often a promissory note will carry the name of the transaction involved. For example, suppose that a note is secured by personal property, such as an automobile. This type of note is referred to as a collateral note because the property pledged as security for the satisfaction of the debt is called collateral.²

2. To minimize the risk of loss when making a loan, a creditor often requires the debtor to provide some collateral, or security, beyond a promise that the debt will be repaid. When this security takes the form of personal property (such as a motor vehicle), the creditor has an interest in the property known as a security interest. Security interests will be discussed in detail in Chapter 29.

INSIGHT INTO THE GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

The Negotiability of Checks in Other Nations

Checks have a long history of being accepted the “same as cash” in the United States. Indeed, for many people in the United States, checks are the ultimate negotiable instrument. In many other countries, however, checks are disappearing as a means of payment.

Where Checks Are Rarely Used Today

In many European nations, including Austria, Germany, and the Netherlands, people rarely write checks today. Instead, they rely on direct bank transfers and electronic payments (both of which will be discussed in Chapter 27). For most Europeans, for example, recurring monthly bills, such as phone bills, utility bills, and mortgage payments, are paid through automatic bank transfers—payments are automatically transferred from customers’ bank accounts directly to the billing companies’ accounts.

In Great Britain, where checks have been used even longer than in the United States, checks are rapidly becoming a thing of the past. Since 2001 British businesses have received more payments electronically than by check. Now many businesses are trying to phase out checks altogether. In 2006, ASDA, Britain’s second largest supermarket chain and a subsidiary of Wal-Mart, announced that, beginning in the London area and extending soon to all Britain, it would no longer accept checks as payment. Boots, the country’s largest pharmacy chain, has instituted a similar policy, and British utility companies are also discouraging the use of checks by charging an extra fee to customers who pay by check.

The shift away from checks in Europe has been spurred by the European Union’s low-cost electronic payment system, which is much faster and more efficient than the systems available in the United States. The combination of lower costs and better protection from identity theft has led many Europeans to abandon their checks.

Even When Used, Checks Are Often Nonnegotiable

Another reason Europeans have been willing to give up their checks is that the checks often are not actually negotiable. In France, for example, some people still use checks, but, unlike in the United States, the payee named on a check cannot indorse the check to a third party. (As will be discussed briefly later in this chapter and in detail in Chapter 25, by indorsing, or signing, a check, the payee can transfer her or his ownership rights in it to a third party.) Furthermore, the payee cannot walk into any bank in France and cash the check. In France, a check can only be deposited into the payee’s account at a bank. Considering the inconvenience a check presents, it is no wonder that more and more shops in France are refusing to accept checks.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

What are the disadvantages of not being able to indorse checks to other parties?

A note payable in installments, such as installment payments for a large-screen television over a twelve-month period, is called an installment note.

A certificate of deposit (CD) is a type of note. A CD is issued when a party deposits funds with a bank, and the bank promises to repay the funds, with interest, on a certain date [UCC 3-104(j)]. The bank is the maker of the note, and the depositor is the payee. For example, on February 15, Sara Levin deposits $5,000 with the First National Bank of Whiteacre. The bank promises to repay the $5,000, plus 3.25 percent annual interest, on August 15.

Certificates of deposit in small denominations (for amounts up to $100,000) are often sold by savings and loan associations, savings banks, commercial banks, and credit unions. Certificates of deposit for amounts greater than $100,000 are referred to as large or jumbo CDs. Exhibit 24-5 shows a typical small CD.

Requirements for Negotiability

For an instrument to be negotiable, it must meet the following requirements:

1. Be in writing.
2. Be signed by the maker or the drawer.
3. Be an unconditional promise or order to pay.
4. State a fixed amount of money.
5. Be payable on demand or at a definite time.
6. Be payable to order or to bearer, unless it is a check.

Written Form

Negotiable instruments normally must be in written form.³ Clearly, an oral promise can create the danger of fraud or make it difficult to determine liability. The writing must be on material that lends itself to permanence. Promises carved in blocks of ice or inscribed in the sand or on other impermanent surfaces would not qualify as negotiable instruments. The UCC nevertheless gives considerable leeway as to what can be a negotiable instrument. Checks and notes have been written on napkins, menus, tablecloths, shirts, and a variety of other materials.

3. UCC Section 3-104, which defines negotiable instruments, does not explicitly require a writing. The writing requirement comes from the UCC's definitions of an order (as a written instruction) and a promise (as a written undertaking) [UCC 3-103(a)(6), (9)]. Note, however, that since the widespread adoption of the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA), discussed in Chapter 19, an electronic record may be sufficient evidence of a written instruction to constitute a negotiable instrument (see UETA Section 16). Additionally, a handful of states have adopted the 2002 amendments to Article 3 of the UCC, which, as explained earlier, were issued explicitly to authorize electronic records. Thus, these states allow electronic negotiable instruments.

The writing must also have portability. Although the UCC does not explicitly state this requirement, if an instrument is not movable, it obviously cannot meet the requirement that it be freely transferable. For example, suppose that Cullen writes on the side of a cow, "I, Cullen, promise to pay to Merrill or her order $500 on demand.” Technically, this meets the requirements of a negotiable instrument, but because a cow cannot easily be transferred in the ordinary course of business, the “instrument” is nonnegotiable.

Signatures

For an instrument to be negotiable, it must be signed by (1) the maker if it is a note or a certificate of deposit or (2) the drawer if it is a draft or a check [UCC 3-103(a)(3), (5)]. If a person signs an instrument as an authorized agent for the maker or drawer, the maker or drawer has effectively signed the instrument [UCC 3-402]. (Agents’ signatures will be discussed in Chapter 26.)

Signature Requirements The UCC grants extreme latitude in regard to what constitutes a signature. UCC 1-201(39) provides that a signature may include “any symbol executed or adopted by a party with present intention to authenticate a writing.” UCC 3-401(b) expands on this by stating that a “signature may be made (i) manually or by means of a device or machine, and (ii) by the use of any name, including a trade or assumed name, or by a word, mark, or symbol executed or adopted by a person with present intention to authenticate a writing.” Thus, initials, an X (if the writing is also signed by a witness), or a thumbprint will suffice as a signature. A trade name or an assumed name is also sufficient. Signatures that are placed onto instruments by means of rubber stamps are permitted and frequently used in the business world. If necessary, parol evidence (discussed in Chapter 15) is admissible to identify the signer. When the signer is identified, the signature becomes effective.

There are virtually no limitations on the manner in which a signature can be made, but one should be careful about receiving an instrument that has been signed in an unusual way. Furthermore, an unusual signature clearly decreases the marketability of an instrument because it creates uncertainty.

Placement of the Signature The location of the signature on the document is unimportant, although the usual place is the lower right-hand corner. A handwritten statement on the body of the instrument, such as “I, Kammie Orlik, promise to pay Janel Tan,” is sufficient to act as a signature.

Unconditional Promise or Order to Pay

The terms of the promise or order must be included in the writing on the face of a negotiable instrument. The terms must also be unconditional—that is, they cannot be conditioned on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of some other event or agreement [UCC 3-104(a)].

Promise or Order For an instrument to be negotiable, it must contain an express promise or order to pay. A mere acknowledgment of the debt, such as an I.O.U. (“I owe you”), might logically imply a promise, but it is not sufficient under the UCC. This is because the UCC requires that a promise be an affirmative (express) undertaking [UCC 3-103(a)(9)]. If such words as “to be paid on demand” or “due on demand” are added to an I.O.U., however, the need for an express promise is satisfied. Thus, if a buyer executes a promissory note using the words “I promise to pay $1,000 to the order of the seller for the purchase of X goods,” then this requirement for a negotiable instrument is satisfied.

A certificate of deposit is exceptional in this respect. No express promise is required in a CD because the bank’s acknowledgment of the deposit and the other terms of the instrument clearly indicate a promise by the bank to repay the sum of money [UCC 3-104(j)].

An order is associated with three-party instruments, such as trade acceptances, checks, and drafts. An order directs a third party to pay the instrument as drawn. In the typical check, for example, the word pay (to the order of a payee) is a command to the drawee bank to pay the check when presented, and thus it is an order. A command, such as “pay,” is mandatory even if it is accompanied by courteous words, as in “Please pay” or “Kindly pay.” Generally, the language used must indicate that a command, or order, is being given. Stating “I wish you would pay” does not fulfill this requirement. An order may be addressed to one person or to more than one person, either jointly (“to A and B”) or alternatively (“to A or B”) [UCC 3-103(a)(6)].

Unconditionality of the Promise or Order A negotiable instrument’s utility as a substitute for cash or as a credit device would be dramatically reduced if it had conditional promises attached to it. Investigating the conditional promises would be time consuming and expensive, and therefore the transferability of the negotiable instrument would be greatly restricted. Suppose that Granados promises in a note to pay McGraw $10,000 only if a certain ship reaches port. No one could safely purchase the promissory note without first investigating whether the ship had arrived. Even then, the facts disclosed by the investigation might be incorrect. To avoid such problems, the UCC provides that only instruments with unconditional promises or orders can be negotiable [UCC 3-104(a)].

A promise or order is conditional (and not negotiable) if it states (1) an express condition to payment, (2) that the promise or order is subject to or governed by another writing, or (3) that the rights or obligations with respect to the promise or order are stated in another writing. A mere reference to another writing, however, does not of itself make the promise or order conditional [UCC 3-106(a)]. For example, including the phrase “as per contract” or “This debt arises from the sale of goods X and Y” does not render an instrument nonnegotiable.

Payment Out of a Particular Fund. Similarly, a statement in the instrument that payment can be made only out of a particular fund or source will not render the instrument nonnegotiable [UCC 3-106(b)(ii)]. Thus, for example, terms in a note that include the condition that payment will be made out of the proceeds of next year’s cotton crop will not make the note nonnegotiable. (The payee of such a note, however, may find the note commercially unacceptable and refuse to take it.)

Note Secured by a Mortgage. Finally, a simple statement in an otherwise negotiable note indicating that the note is secured by a mortgage does not destroy its negotiability [UCC 3-106(b)(i)]. Actually, such a statement might even make the note more acceptable in commerce. Realize, though, that the statement that a note is secured by a mortgage must not stipulate that the maker’s promise to pay is subject to the terms and conditions of the mortgage [UCC 3-106(a)(ii)].

A Fixed Amount of Money

Negotiable instruments must state with certainty a fixed amount of money, with or without interest or other charges described in the promise or order, to be paid at the time the instrument is payable [UCC 3-104(a)]. This requirement ensures that the value of the instrument can be determined with clarity and certainty.

Fixed Amount The term fixed amount means that the amount must be ascertainable from the face of the instrument. Interest may be stated as a fixed or variable rate. A demand note payable with 10 percent interest meets the requirement of a fixed amount because its amount can be determined at the time it is payable [UCC 3-104(a)].

The rate of interest may also be determined with reference to information that is not contained in the instrument if that information is readily ascertainable by reference to a formula or a source described in the instrument [UCC 3-112(b)]. For example, an instrument that is payable at the legal rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute) is negotiable. Mortgage notes tied to a variable rate of interest (a rate that fluctuates as a result of market conditions) can also be negotiable.

Payable in Money UCC 3-104(a) provides that a fixed amount is to be payable in money. The UCC defines money as “a medium of exchange authorized or adopted by a domestic or foreign government as a part of its currency” [UCC 1-201(24)].

Suppose that the maker of a note promises “to pay on demand $1,000 in U.S. gold.” Because gold is not a medium of exchange adopted by the U.S. government, the note is not payable in money. The same result occurs if the maker promises “to pay $1,000 and fifty magnums of 1994 Chateau Lafite-Rothschild wine” because the instrument is not payable entirely in money. An instrument payable in government bonds or in shares of IBM stock is not negotiable because neither is a medium of exchange recognized by the U.S. government. The statement “Payable in $1,000 U.S. currency or an equivalent value in gold” renders the instrument nonnegotiable because the maker reserved the option of paying in money or gold. Any instrument payable in the United States with a face amount stated in a foreign currency can be paid in the foreign money or in the equivalent in U.S. dollars [UCC 3-107].

Payable on Demand or at a Definite Time

A negotiable instrument must “be payable on demand or at a definite time” [UCC 3-104(a)(2)]. Clearly, to ascertain the value of a negotiable instrument, it is essential to know when the maker, drawee, or acceptor is required to pay (an acceptor is a drawee who has accepted, or agreed to pay, an instrument when it is presented later for payment). It is also necessary to know when the obligations of secondary parties, such as indorsers,⁴ will arise. Furthermore, it is necessary to know when an instrument is due in order to calculate when the statute of limitations may apply [UCC 3-118(a)]. Finally, with an interest-bearing instrument, it is necessary to know the exact interval during which the interest will accrue to determine the instrument's value at the present time.

Payable on Demand Instruments that are payable on demand include those that contain the words “Payable at sight” or “Payable upon presentment.” When a person takes the instrument to the appropriate party for payment or acceptance, presentment occurs. Presentment means a demand made by or on behalf of a person entitled to enforce an instrument to either pay or accept the instrument [UCC 3-501].

The very nature of the instrument may indicate that it is payable on demand. For example, a check, by definition, is payable on demand [UCC 3-104(f)]. If no time for payment is specified and the person responsible for payment must pay on the instrument's presentment, the instrument is payable on demand [UCC 3-108(a)].

At the center of the dispute in the following case was a note that required payments in monthly installments beginning several months before the note was executed. Was this a demand note?

Supreme Court of Virginia, 2006. 272 Va. 246, 634 S.E.2d 714.

Opinion by Justice ELIZABETH B. LACY.

FACTS

In November 1998, John Stathis began operating a granite countertop business. He filed Articles of Organization (Articles) in 1999 and was issued a certificate of organization for Granite Depot, LLC. * * * Stathis acted as the manager. Shortly thereafter, Stathis offered [Patrick] Gowin employment and promised that after two years, Gowin would receive either 20% of the company or $250,000. Gowin accepted the employment offer and began working at Granite Depot in June 1999.

On November 9, 2000, Gowin became a member of Granite Depot * * * .^b Stathis' percentage of membership interest in the LLC [was] 80% and his capital contribution [was] $50,000, while Gowin's percentage of membership interest was 20% and his capital contribution was $12,500. In conjunction with * * * [Granite Depot's Operating Agreement, which allowed Gowin to satisfy the capital contribution requirement with a promissory note], Gowin signed a promissory note (the Note) payable to Granite Depot, LLC, in the amount of $12,500. However, at the time Gowin executed the Note, Stathis told him that the Note was “something the company's lawyer said had to be done” and that he was “not to worry about it, the company would take care of it.” Gowin made no payments on the Note, and Granite Depot made no demands for payment.

In 2001, the relationship between Stathis and Gowin began to deteriorate. Gowin left his employment position on May 31, 2002, but he did not resign his membership in the company. * * * Stathis as the majority member, executed a written consent of members eliminating Gowin as a member of the LLC for failing “to make his required contribution to the Company by defaulting on the promissory note he executed.”

After receiving notice that his membership in the LLC had been eliminated, Gowin filed this action [in a Virginia state court against Granite Depot and Stathis] * * * .

* * * *

a. An LLC is a limited liability company, which is a form of business organization discussed in detail in Chapter 37.

b. A member in an LLC has many of the same rights as a partner in a partnership but is not personally liable for the obligations of the firm. See Chapters 36 and 37.

* * * [T]he trial court dismissed Gowin's * * * action. [The Virginia Supreme Court] awarded Gowin an appeal.

DISCUSSION

Gowin * * * [argues in part that] Stathis acted unlawfully in eliminating Gowin's membership interest based on Gowin's failure to pay the Note * * * .

* * * *

* * * Gowin asserts that the Note was a demand note and, because no demand for payment had been made, he had not failed to make a contribution he was obligated to make and therefore, under the terms of the termination amendment, his membership could not be terminated.

[Virginia] Code [Section] 8.3A-108(a) [Virginia's version of UCC 3-108(a)] defines a demand note as a note that "(i) states that it is payable on demand or at sight, or otherwise indicates that it is payable at the will of the holder, or (ii) does not state any time of payment." A note payable at a definite time, in contrast, "is payable on elapse of a definite period of time * * * or at a fixed date or dates" [under Code Section 8.3A-108(b), Virginia's version of UCC 3-108(b)].

The Note in this case is dated January 15, 2000, in the amount of $12,500 at 9% annual interest "payable in twenty-four (24) monthly installments * * * commencing on February 1, 2000, with each successive payment due on the first (1st) day of each and every month thereafter until fully paid." It purports to be a note payable at a definite time because it states the first payment is due February 1, 2000, while remaining payments are due "on the first (1st) day of each and every month thereafter until fully paid." Nevertheless, the stated execution and initial payment dates precede the actual execution date of the Note, November 9, 2000, making compliance with the stated dates impossible.

The parties in this case agree that the dates appearing on the face of the Note are incorrect, but neither asserts that such mistakes invalidate the Note. Although we have held that a note with no stated time for payment is a demand note, we have not previously considered whether a note with incorrect or impossible dates of issue or payment is a demand or an installment note. Because of the error in the payment dates in this Note, the Note is effectively a note that states no date of payment and is, therefore, a demand note under the provisions of Code [Section] 8.3A-108(a)(ii). [Emphasis added.]

As relevant here, a demand note does not become overdue until the day after demand is made or the instrument has remained outstanding for an "unreasonably long [time] under the circumstances," whichever occurs first [under Code Sections 8.3A-304(a)(1) and (3), Virginia's version of UCC 3-304(1) and (3)]. This demand note never became overdue because neither Stathis nor Granite Depot ever demanded payment, and the record does not contain evidence of an unreasonable delay in nonpayment under the circumstances. Thus, though the Note matured and became payable at once, it never became overdue and Gowin never failed to make a payment he was obligated to make. As a result, Stathis' termination of Gowin's membership based on nonpayment of the Note representing Gowin's capital contribution was improper and Gowin remains a member of Granite Depot, LLC. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

CONCLUSION

In summary, * * * because we conclude that the Note was a demand note and no demand was made for payment, Gowin's membership in Granite Depot could not be terminated based on a failure to make a capital contribution * * * and, therefore, Gowin remains a member of Granite Depot, LLC. Accordingly, we will remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

 QUESTIONS

1. Did Gowin's delivery of the note to Granite Depot meet his capital contribution requirement without further payment? Why or why not?
2. Why is a note with no stated time for payment considered a demand note rather than an unenforceable note?

Payable at a Definite Time If an instrument is not payable on demand, to be negotiable it must be payable at a definite time. An instrument is payable at a definite time if it states that it is payable (1) on a specified date, (2) within a definite period of time (such as thirty days) after being presented for payment, or (3) on a date or time readily ascertainable at the time the promise or order is issued [UCC 3-108(b)]. The maker or drawee is under no obligation to pay until the specified time.

When an instrument is payable by the maker or drawer on or before a stated date, it is clearly payable at a definite time. The maker or drawer has the option of paying before the stated maturity date, but the holder can still rely on payment being made by the maturity date. The option to pay early does not violate the definite-time requirement. For example, suppose that John gives Ernesto an instrument dated May 1, 2009, that indicates on its face that it is payable on or before May 1, 2010. This instrument satisfies the definite-time requirement.

In contrast, an instrument that is undated and made payable “one month after date” is clearly nonnegotiable. There is no way to determine the maturity date from the face of the instrument. Whether the time period is a month or a year, if the date is uncertain, the instrument is not payable at a definite time. Thus, an instrument that states, “One year after the death of my grandfather, Jeremy Adams, I promise to pay to the order of Lucy Harmon $5,000. [Signed] Jacqueline Wells,” is nonnegotiable.

Acceleration Clause An acceleration clause allows a payee or other holder of a time instrument to demand payment of the entire amount due, with interest, if a certain event occurs, such as a default in payment of an installment when due. (Under the UCC, a holder is any person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to the bearer or to an identified person that is the person in possession [UCC 1-201(20)].)

Assume that Martin lends $1,000 to Ruth, who makes a negotiable note promising to pay $100 per month for eleven months. The note contains an acceleration provision that permits Martin or any holder to immediately demand all the payments plus the interest owed to date if Ruth fails to pay an installment in any given month. If, for example, Ruth fails to make the third payment and Martin accelerates the unpaid balance, the note will be due and payable in full. Ruth will owe Martin the remaining principal plus any unpaid interest to that date.

Under the UCC, instruments that include acceleration clauses are negotiable, regardless of the reason for the acceleration, because (1) the exact value of the instrument can be ascertained and (2) the instrument will be payable on a specified date if the event allowing acceleration does not occur [UCC 3-108(b)(ii)]. Thus, the specified date is the outside limit used to determine the value of the instrument.

In the following case, the question was whether a party entitled to installment payments on a promissory note that contained an acceleration clause waived the right to exercise this provision when the party accepted late payments from the maker.

Court of Appeals of Kansas, 2007. 37 Kan.App.2d 890, 159 P.3d 1042.

- Background and Facts In April 2004, CTP, LLC, bought a truck stop in South Hutchinson, Kansas. As part of the deal, CTP borrowed $96,000 from Foundation Property Investments, LLC. The loan was evidenced by a promissory note, which provided that CTP was to make monthly payments of $673.54 between June 1, 2004, and June 1, 2009. The note stated that on default in any payment, “the whole amount then unpaid shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder without notice.” CTP paid the first four installments on or before the due dates, but beginning in October 2004, CTP paid the next ten installments late. In July 2005, citing the late payments, Foundation demanded full payment of the note by the end of the month. CTP responded that the parties’ course of dealing permitted payments to be made beyond their due dates. Foundation filed a suit in a Kansas state court against CTP to collect the note’s full amount. CTP asserted that Foundation had waived its right to accelerate the CASE 24.2 CONTINUED note by its acceptance of late payments. The court determined that Foundation was entitled to payment of the note in full, plus interest and attorneys' fees and costs, for a total of $110,975.58, and issued a summary judgment in Foundation's favor. CTP appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
GREEN, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The general rule is that where a [note] contains an acceleration clause relating to default of a required payment, the [holder] is entitled because of such default to enforce the acceleration clause at once according to its terms. * * * [H]owever, an acceleration clause may be waived. A waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right, and intention may be inferred from conduct. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Foundation argues that the provisions of the note should be strictly construed against CTP because it was the drafter of the note. Foundation also points to one of the note's provisions: "Upon default in payment of any interest, or any installment of principal, the whole amount then unpaid shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder without notice." Foundation argues that under this provision, CTP expressly waived demand of payment and notice of nonpayment.

Foundation's arguments afford no basis for saying that it did not waive the condition of prompt payment by routinely accepting late payments. There is no dispute that CTP drafted the note or that the language of the note allowed Foundation to accelerate payment at its option, without notice to CTP. The fact that the note affords Foundation the option to accelerate, however, does not mean that Foundation could not waive the acceleration clause, especially when the note does not contain an anti-waiver provision. Consequently, the question that we must determine is whether Foundation waived the option to accelerate based on its pattern of accepting late payments from CTP.

CTP argues that Foundation's acceptance of late payments over 9 months' time (October 2004–June 2005) established a course of dealing by which late payments would be accepted. Course of dealing is defined [in Kansas Statutes Annotated Section 84-1-205(1), Kansas's version of UCC 1-205(1)] as a "sequence of previous conduct between the parties to a particular transaction which is fairly to be regarded as establishing a common basis of understanding for interpreting their expressions and other conduct." [Emphasis added.]

Foundation alleges that course of dealing cannot be found in the present case because this concept * * * only relates to conduct between the parties that occurs before the agreement in question.

Contrary to Foundation's argument, * * * the course of dealing concept is applicable * * * . [A]bsent an anti-waiver provision in the note or actual notice that future late payments will not be accepted, a previous practice of accepting late payments precludes acceleration of the note.

In the present case, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Foundation ever objected to CTP's late payments before the July 2005 letter stating that Foundation was exercising its option to accelerate payment on the note. Foundation's action of accepting late payments from CTP was inconsistent with its claim or right to receive prompt payments. Accordingly, the trial court incorrectly determined that Foundation's conduct did not constitute a waiver of its right of acceleration.

Foundation, however, suggests that CTP suffered no detrimental reliance because Foundation's delay in accelerating the payment actually benefited CTP: the principal balance was less than it would have been had Foundation exercised the acceleration clause upon any of CTP's previous late payments. Nevertheless, CTP had reasonably relied on Foundation accepting late payments without exercising the acceleration clause. Moreover, CTP will clearly suffer prejudice if forced to now pay the note in full. It would be inequitable to permit Foundation to accelerate the entire note without Foundation first giving notice to CTP that Foundation would no longer accept late payments.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court held that Foundation's acceptance of late payments constituted a waiver of its right to exercise the note's acceleration clause. The Extension Clause The reverse of an acceleration clause is an extension clause, which allows the date of maturity to be extended into the future [UCC 3-108(b)(iii), (iv)]. To keep the instrument negotiable, the interval of the extension must be specified if the right to extend the time of payment is given to the maker or the drawer of the instrument. If, however, the holder of the instrument can extend the time of payment, the extended maturity date need not be specified.

Suppose that Alek executes a note that reads, "The maker has the right to postpone the time of payment of this note beyond its definite maturity date of January 1, 2010. This extension, however, shall be for no more than a reasonable time." A note with this language is not negotiable because it does not satisfy the definite-time requirement. The right to extend is the maker's, and the maker has not indicated when the note will become due after the extension.

In contrast, suppose that Alek's note reads, "The holder of this note at the date of maturity, January 1, 2010, can extend the time of payment until the following June 1 or later, if the holder so wishes." This note is a negotiable instrument. The length of the extension does not have to be specified because the option to extend is solely that of the holder. After January 1, 2010, the note is, in effect, a demand instrument.

Payable to Order or to Bearer

Because one of the functions of a negotiable instrument is to serve as a substitute for cash, freedom to transfer is essential. To ensure a proper transfer, the instrument must be "payable to order or to bearer" at the time it is issued or first comes into the possession of the holder [UCC 3-104(a)(1)]. An instrument is not negotiable unless it meets this requirement.

Order Instruments An order instrument is an instrument that is payable (1) "to the order of an identified person" or (2) "to an identified person or order" [UCC 3-109(b)]. An identified person is the person "to whom the instrument is initially payable" as determined by the intent of the maker or drawer [UCC 3-110(a)]. The identified person, in turn, may transfer the instrument to whomever he or she wishes. Thus, the maker or drawer is agreeing to pay either the person specified on the instrument or whomever that person might designate. In this way, the instrument retains its transferability. Suppose that an instrument states, "Payable to the order of James Crawford" or "Pay to James Crawford or order." Clearly, the maker or drawer has indicated that payment will be made to Crawford or to whomever Crawford designates. The instrument is negotiable.

Except for bearer instruments (explained in the following subsection), the person specified must be named with certainty because the transfer of an order instrument requires an indorsement. An indorsement is a signature placed on an instrument, such as on the back of a check, generally for the purpose of transferring one's ownership rights in the instrument. Indorsements will be discussed at length in Chapter 25.

If an instrument states, "Payable to the order of my nicest cousin," the instrument is nonnegotiable because a holder could not be sure that the person who indorsed the instrument was actually the "nicest cousin" who was supposed to have indorsed it.

Bearer Instruments A bearer instrument is an instrument that does not designate a specific payee [UCC 3-109(a)]. The term bearer refers to a person in possession of an instrument that is payable to bearer or indorsed in blank (with a signature only, as will be discussed in Chapter 25) [UCC 1-201(5), 3-109(a), 3-109(c)]. This means that the maker or drawer agrees to pay anyone who presents the instrument for payment. Any instrument containing terms such as the following is a bearer instrument:

1. "Payable to the order of bearer."
2. "Payable to Simon Reed or bearer."
3. "Payable to bearer."
4. "Pay cash."
5. "Pay to the order of cash."

In addition, an instrument that “indicates that it is not payable to an identified person” is a bearer instrument [UCC 3-109(a)(3)]. Thus, an instrument that is “payable to X” can be negotiated as a bearer instrument, as though it were payable to cash. The UCC does not accept an instrument issued to a nonexistent organization as payable to bearer, however [UCC

3-109, Comment 2]. Therefore, an instrument “payable to the order of the Camrod Company,” if no such company exists, is not a bearer instrument or an order instrument and, in fact, does not qualify as a negotiable instrument. (See Concept Summary 24.1 for a convenient summary of the basic rules governing negotiability.)

CONCEPT SUMMARY 24.1 Requirements for Negotiability

Requirements	Basic Rules
MUST BE IN WRITING UCC 3-103(6), (9)	A writing can be on anything that is readily transferable and that has a degree of permanence.

A signature may be made in a representative capacity.
MUST BE A DEFINITE PROMISE OR ORDER UCC 3-103(a)(6), (9) UCC 3-104(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. A promise must be more than a mere acknowledgment of a debt. 2. The words “I/We promise” or “Pay” meet this criterion.
MUST BE UNCONDITIONAL UCC 3-106	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Payment cannot be expressly conditional on the occurrence of an event. 2. Payment cannot be made subject to or governed by another agreement.
MUST BE AN ORDER OR PROMISE TO PAY A FIXED AMOUNT UCC 3-104(a) UCC 3-107 UCC 3-112(b)	An amount may be considered a fixed sum even if payable in installments, with a fixed or variable rate of interest, or at a foreign exchange rate.
MUST BE PAYABLE IN MONEY UCC 3-104(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Any medium of exchange recognized as the currency of a government is money. 2. The maker or drawer cannot retain the option to pay the instrument in money or something else.

Any instrument that is payable on sight, presentment, or issue or that does not state any time for payment is a demand instrument. 2. An instrument is still payable at a definite time, even if it is payable on or before a stated date or within a fixed period after sight or if the drawer or maker has the option to extend the time for a definite period. 3. Acceleration clauses do not affect the negotiability of the instrument.
MUST BE PAYABLE TO ORDER OR TO BEARER UCC 3-104(a)(1) UCC 3-109 UCC 3-110(a)	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. An order instrument must identify the payee with reasonable certainty. 2. An instrument whose terms intend payment to no particular person is payable to bearer.

Factors Not Affecting Negotiability

Certain ambiguities or omissions will not affect the negotiability of an instrument. Article 3's rules for interpreting ambiguous terms include the following:

1. Unless the date of an instrument is necessary to determine a definite time for payment, the fact that an instrument is undated does not affect its negotiability. A typical example is an undated check, which is still negotiable. If a check is not dated, under the UCC its date is the date of its issue, meaning the date on which the drawer first delivers the check to another person to give that person rights on the check [UCC 3-113(b)].
2. Antedating or postdating an instrument does not affect its negotiability [UCC 3-113(a)]. Antedating occurs when a party puts a date on an instrument that precedes the actual calendar date. Postdating occurs when a party puts a date on an instrument that is after the actual date. For example, suppose that Crenshaw draws a check on his account at First Bank, payable to Sung Imports. Crenshaw postdates the check by fifteen days. Sung Imports can immediately negotiate the check, and, unless Crenshaw tells First Bank otherwise, the bank can charge the amount of the check to Crenshaw's account [UCC 4-401(c)].
3. Handwritten terms outweigh typewritten and printed terms (preprinted terms on forms, for example), and typewritten terms outweigh printed terms [UCC 3-114]. For example, if your check is printed "Pay to the order of," and in handwriting you insert in the blank "Anita Delgado or bearer," the check is a bearer instrument.
4. Words outweigh figures unless the words are ambiguous [UCC 3-114]. This rule becomes important when the numerical amount and the written amount on a check differ. Suppose that Paruzzo issues a check payable to Cheaper Appliance Company. For the amount, she fills in the number "$100" but writes out the words "One thousand and 00/100" dollars. The check is payable in the amount of $1,000.
5. When an instrument simply states "with interest" and does not specify a particular interest rate, the interest rate is the judgment rate of interest (a rate of interest fixed by statute that is applied to a monetary judgment awarded by a court until the judgment is paid or terminated) [UCC 3-112(b)].
6. A check is negotiable even if there is a notation on it stating that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3." Any other instrument, however, can be made nonnegotiable by the maker's or drawer's conspicuously noting on it that it is "nonnegotiable" or "not governed by Article 3" [UCC 3-104(d)].

REVIEWING The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments

Robert Durbin, a student, borrowed funds from a bank for his education and signed a promissory note for its repayment. The bank lent the funds under a federal program designed to assist students at postsecondary institutions. Under this program, repayment ordinarily begins nine to twelve months after the student borrower fails to carry at least one-half of the normal full-time course load at his or her school. The federal government guarantees that the note will be fully repaid. If the student defaults on the repayment, the lender presents the current balance—principal, interest, and costs—to the government. When the government pays the balance, it becomes the lender, and the borrower owes the government directly. After Durbin defaulted on his note, the government paid the lender the balance due and took possession of the note. Durbin then refused to pay the government, claiming that the government was not the holder of the note. The government filed a suit in a federal district court against Durbin to collect the amount due. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

- Using the categories discussed in the chapter, what type of negotiable instrument was the note that Durbin signed (an order to pay or a promise to pay)? Explain.
- Suppose that the note did not state a specific interest rate but instead referred to a statute that established the maximum interest rate for government-guaranteed school loans. Would the note fail to meet the requirements for negotiability in that situation? Why or why not?
- For the government to be a holder, which method must have been used to transfer the instrument from the bank to the government?
- Suppose that in court, Durbin argues that because the school closed down before he could finish his education, there was a failure of consideration: he did not get something of value in exchange for his promise to pay. Assuming that the government is a holder of the promissory note, would this argument likely be successful against it? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

24-1. Sabrina Runyan writes the following note on a sheet of paper: "I, the undersigned, do hereby acknowledge that I owe Leo Woo one thousand dollars, with interest, payable out of the proceeds of the sale of my horse, Lightning, next month. Payment is to be made on or before six months from date." Discuss specifically why this is not a negotiable instrument.

24-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Juan Sanchez writes the following note on the back of an envelope: "I, Juan Sanchez, promise to pay Kathy Martin or bearer $500 on demand." Is this a negotiable instrument? Discuss fully.

- For a sample answer to Question 24-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

24-3. A college student, Austin Keynes, wished to purchase a new entertainment system from Friedman Electronics, Inc. Because Keynes did not have the cash to pay for the entertainment system, he offered to sign a note promising to pay $150 per month for the next six months. Friedman Electronics, eager to sell the system to Keynes, agreed to accept the promissory note, which read, "I, Austin Keynes, promise to pay to Friedman Electronics or its order the sum of $150 per month for the next six months." The note was signed by Austin Keynes. About a week later, Friedman Electronics, which was badly in need of cash, signed the back of the note and sold it to the First National Bank of Halston. Give the specific designation of each of the three parties on this note.

24-4. Adam's checks are imprinted with the words "Pay to the order of" followed by a blank. Adam fills in an amount on one of the checks and signs it, but he does not write anything in the blank following the "Pay to the order of" language. Adam gives this check to Beth. On another check, Adam writes in the blank "Carl or bearer." Which, if either, of these checks is a bearer instrument, and why?

24-5. Negotiability. In October 1998, Somerset Valley Bank notified Alfred Hauser, president of Hauser Co., that the bank had begun to receive what appeared to be Hauser Co. payroll checks. None of the payees were Hauser Co. employees, however, and Hauser had not written the checks or authorized anyone to sign them on his behalf. Automatic Data Processing, Inc., provided payroll services for Hauser Co. and used a facsimile signature on all its payroll checks. Hauser told the bank not to cash the checks. In early 1999, Robert Triffin, who deals in negotiable instruments, bought eighteen of the checks, totaling more than $8,800, from various check-cashing agencies. The agencies stated that they had cashed the checks expecting the bank to pay them. Each check was payable to a bearer for a fixed amount, on demand, and did not state any undertaking by the person promising payment other than the payment of money. Each check bore a facsimile drawer's signature stamp identical to Hauser Co.'s authorized stamp. Each check had been returned to an agency marked "stolen check" and stamped "do not present again." When the bank refused to cash the checks, Triffin filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Hauser Co. Were the checks negotiable instruments? Why or why not? [Triffin v. Somerset Valley Bank, 343 N.J.Super. 73, 777 A.2d 993 (2001)]

24-6. Negotiability. In October 1996, Robert Hildebrandt contracted with Harvey and Nancy Anderson to find a tenant for the Andersons' used-car lot. The Andersons agreed to pay Hildebrandt "a commission equal in amount to five percent up to first three years of lease." On December 12, Paramount Automotive, Inc., agreed to lease the premises for three years at $7,500 per month, and the Andersons signed a promissory note, which stated that they would pay Hildebrandt $13,500, plus interest, in consecutive monthly installments of $485 until the total sum was paid. The note contained an acceleration clause. In a separate agreement, Paramount promised to pay $485 of its monthly rent directly to Hildebrandt. Less than a year later, Paramount stopped making payments to all parties. To enforce the note, Hildebrandt filed a suit in an Oregon state court against the Andersons. One issue in the case was whether the note was a negotiable instrument. The Andersons claimed that it was not, because it was not "unconditional," arguing that their obligation to make payments on the note was conditioned on their receipt of rent from Paramount. Are the Andersons correct? Explain. [Hildebrandt v. Anderson, 180 Or.App. 192, 42 P3d 355 (2002)]

In July 1981, Southeast Bank in Miami, Florida, issued five cashier's checks, totaling $450,000, to five payees, including Roberto Sanchez. Two months later, in Colombia, South America, Sanchez gave the checks to Juan Diaz. In 1991, Southeast failed. Under federal law, notice must be mailed to a failed bank's depositors, who then have eighteen months to file a claim for their funds. Under an "Assistance Agreement," First Union National Bank agreed to assume Southeast's liability for outstanding cashier's checks and other items. First Union received funds to pay these items but was required to return the funds if, within eighteen months after Southeast's closing, payment for any item had been not claimed. In 1996, in Colombia, Diaz gave the five cashier's checks that he had received from Sanchez to John Acevedo in payment of a debt. In 2001, Acevedo tendered these checks to First Union for payment. Does First Union have to pay? Would it make any difference if the required notice had not been mailed? Why or why not? [Acevedo v. First Union National Bank, 357 F3d 1244 (11th Cir.2004)]

24-8. Negotiability. In September 2001, Cory Babcock and Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., bought a new 2001 Chevrolet Corvette from Cox Chevrolet in Sarasota, Florida. Their retail installment sales contract (RISC) required monthly payments until $52,516.20 was paid. The RISC imposed many other conditions on the buyers and seller with respect to the payment for, and handling of, the Corvette. Cox assigned the RISC to General Motors Acceptance Corp. (GMAC). In August 2002, the buyers sold the car to Florida Auto Brokers, which agreed to pay the balance due on the RISC. The check to GMAC for this amount was dishonored for insufficient funds, however, after the vehicle's title had been forwarded. GMAC filed a suit in a Florida state court against Honest Air and Babcock, seeking $35,815.26 as damages for breach of contract. The defendants argued that the RISC was a negotiable instrument. A ruling in their favor on this point would reduce any damages due GMAC to less than the Corvette's current value. What are the requirements for an instrument to be negotiable? Does the RISC qualify? Explain. [General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., 933 So.2d 34 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 2006)]

24-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In November 2000, Monay Jones signed a promissory note in favor of a mortgage company in the amount of $261,250, using the deed to her home in

CHAPTER 24 The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments

Denver, Colorado, as collateral. Fifth Third Bank soon became the holder of the note. After Jones defaulted on the payment, in September 2001 she and the bank agreed to raise the note's balance to $280,231.23. She again defaulted. In November, the bank received a check from a third party as payment on Jones's note. It was the bank's policy to refuse personal checks in payoff of large debts. The bank representative who worked on Jones's account noted receipt of the check in the bank's records and forwarded it to the "payoff department." A week later, the bank discovered that the check had been lost without having been posted to Jones's account or submitted for payment. The bank notified Jones, and both parties searched, without success, for a copy of the check or evidence of the identity of its maker, the drawee bank, or the amount. In late 2002, the bank filed a suit in a Colorado state court to foreclose on Jones's home. She insisted that the note had been paid in full by a cashier's check issued by an Arkansas bank at the request of her deceased aunt. [Fifth Third Bank v. Jones, 168 P3d 1 (Colo.App. 2007)]

- (a) What evidence supports a finding that Jones gave the bank a check? Does it seem more likely that the check was a cashier's check or a personal check? Would it be fair for a court to find that the check had paid the note in full?
- (b) Under UCC 3-310, if a cashier's check or other certified check "is taken for an obligation, the obligation is discharged." The bank argued that it had not "taken [Jones's check] for an obligation" because the bank's internal administrative actions were still pending when the check was lost. Would it be fair for the court to rule in the bank's favor based on this argument? Why or why not?

Transferability and Holder in Due Course

Once issued, a negotiable instrument can be transferred to others by assignment or by negotiation. Recall from Chapter 16 that an assignment is a transfer of rights under a contract. Under general contract principles, a transfer by assignment to an assignee gives the assignee only those rights that the assignor possessed. Any defenses that can be raised against an assignor can normally be raised against the assignee. This same principle applies when a negotiable instrument, such as a promissory note, is transferred by assignment to an assignee.

Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), negotiation is the transfer of an instrument in such form that the transferee (the person to whom the instrument is transferred) becomes a holder [UCC 3-201(a)]. A holder receives, at the very least, the rights of the previous possessor [UCC 3-203(b), 3-305]. Unlike an assignment, a transfer by negotiation can make it possible for a holder to receive more rights in the instrument than the prior possessor had [UCC 3-305]. A holder who receives greater rights is known as a holder in due course, a concept we discuss in this chapter. First, though, we look at the requirements for negotiation and examine the various types of indorsements that are used when order instruments are negotiated.

Negotiation

There are two methods of negotiating an instrument so that the receiver becomes a holder. The method used depends on whether the instrument is an order instrument or a bearer instrument.

Negotiating Order Instruments

An order instrument contains the name of a payee capable of indorsing, as in “Pay to the order of Elliot Goodseal.” If an instrument is an order instrument, it is negotiated by delivery with any necessary indorsements (indorsements will be discussed shortly). For example, suppose that the Carrington Corporation issues a payroll check “to the order of Elliot Goodseal.” Goodseal takes the check to the bank, signs his name on the back (an indorsement), gives it to the teller (a delivery), and receives cash. Goodseal has negotiated the check to the bank [UCC 3-201(b)].

Negotiating order instruments requires both delivery and indorsement. If Goodseal had taken the check to the bank and delivered it to the teller without signing it, the transfer would not qualify as a negotiation. In that situation, the transfer would be treated as an assignment, and the bank would become an assignee rather than a holder.

Negotiating Bearer Instruments

If an instrument is payable to bearer, it is negotiated by delivery—that is, by transfer into another person’s possession. Indorsement is not necessary [UCC 3-201(b)]. The use of bearer instruments thus involves a greater risk of loss or theft than the use of order instruments.

Assume that Alonzo Cruz writes a check payable to “cash,” thus creating a bearer instrument. Cruz then hands the check to Blaine Parrington (a delivery). Parrington puts the check in his wallet, which is subsequently stolen. The thief now has possession of the check. At this point, the thief has no rights in the check.

If the thief “delivers” the check to an innocent third person, however, negotiation will be complete. All rights to the check will pass absolutely to that third person, and Parrington will lose all right to recover the proceeds of the check from that person [UCC 3-306]. Of course, Parrington can recover his funds from the thief if the thief can be found.

Indorsements

As just described, an indorsement is required whenever an order instrument is negotiated. An indorsement is a signature with or without additional words or statements. It is most often written on the back of the instrument itself. If there is no room on the instrument, the indorsement can be written on a separate piece of paper, called an allonge,¹ and affixed to the instrument. A paper affixed to a negotiable instrument is part of the instrument [UCC 3-204(a)].

A person who transfers a note or a draft by signing (indorsing) it and delivering it to another person is an indorser. The person to whom the check is indorsed and delivered is the indorsee. For example, suppose that Luisa Parks receives a graduation check for $100. She can transfer the check to her mother (or to anyone) by signing it on the back. Luisa is an indorser. If Luisa indorses the check by writing “Pay to Aretha Parks,” Aretha Parks is the indorsee.

We examine here four categories of indorsements: blank indorsements, special indorsements, qualified indorsements, and restrictive indorsements.

Blank Indorsements

A blank indorsement specifies no particular indorsee and can consist of a mere signature [UCC 3-205(b)]. Hence, a check payable “to the order of Mark Deitsch” can be indorsed in blank simply by writing Deitsch’s signature on the back of the check. Exhibit 25-1 shows a blank indorsement.

EXHIBIT 25-1 • A Blank Indorsement

1. Pronounced uh-lohnyj.

An instrument payable to order and indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument and can be negotiated by delivery alone [UCC 3-205(b)]. In other words, as will be discussed later, a blank indorsement converts an order instrument to a bearer instrument, which anybody can cash. Suppose that Rita Chou indorses in blank a check payable to her order and then loses it on the street. If Coker finds the check, he can sell it to Duncan for value without indorsing it. This constitutes a negotiation because Coker has made delivery of a bearer instrument (which was an order instrument until it was indorsed in blank).

Special Indorsements

A special indorsement identifies the person to whom the indorser intends to make the instrument payable; that is, it names the indorsee [UCC 3-205(a)]. For example, words such as “Pay to the order of Russell Clay” or “Pay to Russell Clay,” followed by the signature of the indorser, are sufficient. When an instrument is indorsed in this way, it is an order instrument.

To avoid the risk of loss from theft, a holder may convert a blank indorsement to a special indorsement. This changes the bearer instrument back to an order instrument. A holder may “convert a blank indorsement that consists only of a signature into a special indorsement by writing, above the signature of the indorser, words identifying the person to whom the instrument is made payable” [UCC 3-205(c)].

For example, a check is made payable to Hal Cohen. He signs his name on the back of the check—a blank indorsement—and negotiates the check to William Hunter. Hunter is not able to cash the check immediately but wants to avoid any risk should he lose the check. He therefore writes “Pay to William Hunter” above Cohen’s blank indorsement. In this manner, Hunter has converted Cohen’s blank indorsement into a special indorsement. Further negotiation now requires William Hunter’s indorsement, plus delivery. Exhibit 25-2 shows a special indorsement.

EXHIBIT 25-2 • A Special Indorsement

Qualified Indorsements

Generally, an indorser, merely by indorsing, impliedly promises to pay the holder, or any subsequent indorser, the amount of the instrument in the event that the drawer or maker defaults on the payment [UCC 3-415(a)]. Usually, then, indorsements are unqualified indorsements. In other words, the indorser is guaranteeing payment of the instrument in addition to transferring title to it. An indorser who does not wish to be liable on an instrument can use a qualified indorsement to disclaim this liability [UCC 3-415(b)]. The notation “without recourse” is commonly used to create a qualified indorsement.

Suppose that a check is made payable to the order of Sarah Jacobs. Sarah wants to negotiate the check to Allison Jong but does not want to assume liability for the check’s payment. Sarah could create a qualified indorsement by indorsing the check as follows: “Pay to Allison Jong, without recourse, [signed] Sarah Jacobs” (see Exhibit 25-3).

EXHIBIT 25-3 • A Qualified Indorsement

Pay to Allison Jong, without recourse
Sarah Jacobs

The Effect of Qualified Indorsements

Qualified indorsements are often used by persons acting in a representative capacity. For example, insurance agents sometimes receive checks payable to them that are really intended as payment to the insurance company. The agent is merely indorsing the payment through to the insurance company and should not be required to make good on a check if it is later dishonored. The “without recourse” indorsement relieves the agent from any liability on the check. If the instrument is dishonored, the holder cannot obtain recovery from the agent who indorsed “without recourse” unless the indorser has breached one of the transfer warranties that will be discussed in Chapter 26. These warranties relate to good title, authorized signature, no material alteration, and other requirements.

Special versus Blank Qualified Indorsements A qualified indorsement (“without recourse”) can be accompanied by either a special indorsement or a blank indorsement. A special qualified indorsement includes the name of the indorsee as well as the words “without recourse,” as in Exhibit 25-3. The special indorsement makes the instrument an order instrument, and it requires an indorsement, plus delivery, for negotiation. A blank qualified indorsement makes the instrument a bearer instrument, and only delivery is required for negotiation. In either situation, the instrument still transfers title to the indorsee and can be further negotiated.

Restrictive Indorsements

A restrictive indorsement requires the indorsee to comply with certain instructions regarding the funds involved but does not prohibit further negotiation of the instrument [UCC 3-206(a)]. Restrictive indorsements come in many forms, some of which we discuss here.

Indorsements Prohibiting Further Indorsement

An indorsement such as “Pay to Julie Thrush only, [signed] Thomas Fasulo” does not destroy negotiability. Thrush can negotiate the paper to a holder just as if it had read “Pay to Julie Thrush, [signed] Thomas Fasulo” [UCC 3-206(a)]. If the holder gives value, this type of restrictive indorsement has the same legal effect as a special indorsement.

Conditional Indorsements When payment depends on the occurrence of some event specified in the indorsement, the instrument has a conditional indorsement [UCC 3-204(a)]. For example, suppose that Ken Barton indorses a check as follows: “Pay to Lars Johansen if he completes the renovation of my kitchen by June 1, 2009, [signed] Ken Barton.” Article 3 states that an indorsement conditioning the right to receive payment “does not affect the right of the indorsee to enforce the instrument” [UCC 3-206(b)]. A person paying or taking an instrument for value (taking for value will be discussed later in the chapter) can disregard the condition without liability.

A conditional indorsement (on the back of the instrument) does not prevent further negotiation of the instrument. If conditional language appears on the face (front) of an instrument, however, the instrument is not negotiable because it does not meet the requirement that a negotiable instrument must contain an unconditional promise to pay.

Indorsements for Deposit or Collection

A common type of restrictive indorsement makes the indorsee (almost always a bank) a collecting agent of the indorser [UCC 3-206(c)]. Exhibit 25-4 illustrates this type of indorsement on a check payable and issued to Marcel Dumont. In particular, the indorsements “For deposit only” and “For collection only” have the effect of locking the instrument into the bank collection process. Only a bank can acquire the rights of a holder following one of these indorsements until the item has been specially indorsed by a bank to a person who is not a bank [UCC 3-206(c), 4-201(b)]. A bank’s liability for payment of an instrument with a restrictive indorsement of this kind will be discussed in Chapter 27.

EXHIBIT 25-5 • Trust (Agency) Indorsements

Pay to Stephanie Contento

or

The fiduciary restrictions—restrictions mandated by a relationship involving trust and loyalty—on the instrument do not reach beyond the original indorsee [UCC 3-206(d), (e)]. Any subsequent purchaser can qualify as a holder in due course unless he or she has actual notice that the instrument was negotiated in breach of a fiduciary duty. For a synopsis of the various indorsements and the consequences of using each type, see Concept Summary 25.1 on page 509.

Trust (Agency) Indorsements Indorsements to persons who are to hold or use the funds for the benefit of the indorser or a third party are called trust indorsements (also known as agency indorsements) [UCC 3-206(d), (e)]. For example, assume that Ralph Zimmer asks his accountant, Stephanie Contento, to pay some bills for him while he is out of the country. He indorses a check, drawn by a friend, to Stephanie Contento “as agent for Ralph Zimmer.” This trust (agency) indorsement obligates Contento to use the funds from his friend’s check only for the benefit of Zimmer.

The result of a trust indorsement is that legal rights in the instrument are transferred to the original indorsee. To the extent that the original indorsee pays or applies the proceeds consistently with the indorsement (for example, in an indorsement stating “Pay to Ellen Cook in trust for Roger Callahan”), the indorsee is a holder and can become a holder in due course (a status that will be described shortly). Sample trust (agency) indorsements are shown in Exhibit 25-5.

How Indorsements Can Convert Order Instruments to Bearer Instruments and Vice Versa

As we saw earlier, order instruments and bearer instruments are negotiated differently. The method used for negotiation depends on the character of the instrument at the time the negotiation takes place. Indorsement can convert an order instrument into a bearer instrument. For example, a check originally payable to “cash” but subsequently indorsed with the words “Pay to Arnold” must be negotiated as an order instrument (by indorsement and delivery), even though it was previously a bearer instrument [UCC 3-205(a)].

As mentioned earlier, an instrument payable to the order of a named payee and indorsed in blank becomes a bearer instrument [UCC 3-205(b)]. For example, a check made payable to the order of Jessie Arnold is issued to Arnold, and Arnold indorses it by signing her name on the back. The instrument, which is now a bearer instrument, can be negotiated by delivery without indorsement. Arnold can negotiate the check to whomever she wishes merely by delivery, and that person can negotiate by delivery without indorsement. If Arnold loses the check after she indorses it, anyone who finds the check can negotiate it further.

Similarly, a bearer instrument can be converted into an order instrument through indorsement. Suppose that Arnold takes the check that she indorsed in blank (now a bearer instrument) and negotiates it, by delivery, to Jonas Tolling. Tolling indorses the check “Pay to Mark Hyatt, [signed] Jonas Tolling.” By adding this special indorsement, Tolling has converted the check into an order instrument. The check can be further negotiated only by indorsement (by Mark Hyatt) and delivery [UCC 3-205(b)]. Exhibit 25-6 illustrates how an indorsement can convert an order instrument into a bearer instrument and vice versa.

Miscellaneous Indorsement Problems

Of course, a significant problem occurs when an indorsement is forged or unauthorized. The UCC rules concerning unauthorized or forged signatures and indorsements will be discussed in Chapter 26 in the context of signature liability. These rules will be examined again in Chapter 27 in the context of the bank's liability for payment of an instrument containing an unauthorized signature. Here we look at some other difficulties that may arise with indorsements.

Misspelled Names

An indorsement should be identical to the name that appears on the instrument. A payee or indorsee whose name is misspelled can indorse with the misspelled name, the correct name, or both [UCC 3-204(d)]. For example, if Marie Ellison receives a check payable to the order of Mary Ellison, she can indorse the check either “Marie Ellison” or “Mary Ellison.” The usual practice is to indorse with the name as it appears on the instrument followed by the correct name.

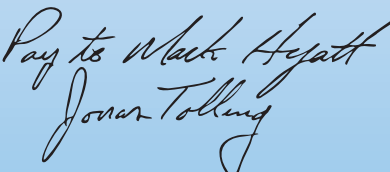

Instruments Payable to Entities

A negotiable instrument can be drawn payable to an entity such as an estate, a partnership, or an organization. In this situation, an authorized representative of the entity can negotiate the instrument. For example, a check may read “Pay to the order of the Red Cross.” An authorized representative of the Red Cross can negotiate this check. Similarly, negotiable paper can be payable to a public officer. For example, checks reading “Pay to the order of the County Tax Collector” or “Pay to the order of Larry White, Receiver of Taxes” can be negotiated by whoever holds the office [UCC 3-110(c)].

Alternative or Joint Payees

An instrument payable to two or more persons in the alternative (for example, “Pay to the order of Ying or Mifflin”) requires the indorsement of only one of the payees [UCC 3-110(d)]. If, however, an instrument is made payable to two or more persons jointly (for

CONCEPT SUMMARY 25.1

Types of Indorsements and Their Effect

Type of Indorsement	Description	Examples	Legal Effect
BLANK INDORSEMENTS	Indorser does not identify the person to whom the instrument is payable; can consist of a mere signature.	“Elana Guitierrez” “Mark Deitsch”	Creates a bearer instrument, which can be negotiated by delivery alone.
SPECIAL INDORSEMENTS	Indorser identifies the person to whom the instrument is payable.	“Pay to the order of Russell Clay” “Pay to William Hunter”	Creates an order instrument; negotiation requires delivery and indorsement.
QUALIFIED INDORSEMENTS	Indorser includes words indicating that he or she is not guaranteeing or assuming liability for payment.	“Without recourse, Elana Guitierrez” (blank qualified indorsement) “Pay to Allison Jong without recourse, Sarah Jacobs” (special qualified indorsement, which creates an order instrument)	Relieves indorser of any liability for payment of the instrument; frequently used by agents or others acting on behalf of another.
RESTRICTIVE INDORSEMENTS	Indorser includes specific instructions regarding the funds involved or states a condition to the right of the indorsee to receive payment.	“For deposit only” “For collection only” “Pay to Stephanie Contento as agent for Ralph Zimmer” “Pay to Ellen Cook in trust for Roger Callahan”	Only a bank can become a holder of instruments that are indorsed for deposit or collection. In a trust indorsement, the third party agent or trustee has the rights of a holder but has fiduciary duties to use the funds consistently with the indorsement.

example, “Pay to the order of Bridgette and Tony Van Horn”), all of the payees’ indorsements are necessary for negotiation.

Alternative Payees Presumed If the Instrument Is Ambiguous If an instrument payable to two or more persons does not clearly indicate whether it is payable in the alternative or payable jointly, then “the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively” [UCC 3-110(d)]. The same principles apply to special indorsements that identify more than one person to whom the indorser intends to make the instrument payable [UCC 3-205(a)]. These principles were applied in the following case.

EXTENDED CASE 25.1 Hyatt Corp. v. Palm Beach National Bank

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Third District, 2003. 840 So.2d 300.

LEVY, Judge.

* * * Skyscraper Building Maintenance, LLC [limited liability company—see Chapter 37], had a contract with Hyatt [Corporation] to perform maintenance work for various Hyatt hotels in South Florida. Skyscraper entered into [an] agreement with J & D [Financial Corporation]. As part of the * * * agreement, J & D requested Hyatt to make checks payable for maintenance services to Skyscraper and J & D. Of the many checks issued by Hyatt to Skyscraper and J & D, two were negotiated by [Palm Beach National Bank] but endorsed only by Skyscraper. They were made payable as follows:

1. Check No. 1-78671 for $22,531 payable to:
J & D Financial Corp. Skyscraper Building Maint[enance] * * *

2. Check No. 1-75723 for $21,107 payable to:
Skyscraper Building Maint[enance] J & D Financial Corp. * * *

Only one of the payees, Skyscraper, endorsed these two checks. The bank cashed the checks. According to J & D, it did not receive the benefit of these two payments.

J & D filed a complaint [in a Florida state court] against * * * Hyatt and the bank [and others]. J & D sought damages * * * against Hyatt and the bank for negotiation of the two checks.

The bank argued that the checks were payable to J & D and Skyscraper alternatively, and thus the bank could properly negotiate the checks based upon the [indorsement] of either of the two payees. * * *

Hyatt's position was that the checks were not ambiguous, were payable jointly and not alternatively, and thus * * * the checks could only be negotiated by [indorsement] of both of the payees. J & D similarly argued that the checks were payable jointly. The trial court granted Summary Judgment in favor of the bank * * *. Hyatt appealed. J & D filed a cross-appeal.

In 1990, Article 3 of the UCC was revised, and the language of UCC Section 3-116 was added to UCC Section 3-110 and became subsection (d). Revised UCC Section 3-110(d), which added language to follow former 3-116(a) and (b), states, "If an instrument payable to two or more persons is ambiguous as to whether it is payable to the persons alternatively, the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively." The net effect of the amendment was to change the presumption. What was unambiguous before is now ambiguous.

Turning to our jurisdiction, Florida has adopted the statutory revision to UCC 3-110, with its enactment of Section 673.1101, Florida Statutes. Section 673.1101(4) now provides the following:

(4) If an instrument is payable to two or more persons alternatively, it is payable to any of them and may be negotiated, discharged, or enforced by any or all of them in possession of the instrument. If an instrument is payable to two or more persons not alternatively, it is payable to all of them and may be negotiated, discharged, or enforced only by all of them. If an instrument payable to two or more persons is ambiguous as to whether it is payable to the persons alternatively, the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively.

* * * *

* * * [T]he predecessor statute provided that if an ambiguity existed as to whether multiple payees were intended as joint or alternative payees, they were deemed joint payees, while the amended statute applicable to this case reverses the prior rule.

* * * *

We conclude that based on the 1990 amendment to the Uniform Commercial Code, when a check lists two payees without the use of the word "and" or "or," the nature of the payee is ambiguous as to whether they are alternative payees or joint payees. Therefore, the UCC amendment prevails and they are to be treated as alternative payees, thus requiring only one of the payees' signatures. Consequently, the bank could negotiate the check when it was [indorsed] by only one of the two payees, thereby escaping liability: [Emphasis added.]

* * * As the parties correctly point out, this is a case of first impression in Florida appellate courts. * * *

* * * [W]e hold that the trial court was correct in granting the Summary Final Judgment.

Affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Other than negotiation, what is the significance of the UCC provision at issue in this case?
2. If an instrument made payable to two persons without specifying and or or (a stacked-payee designation) was considered unambiguous and payable jointly before the amendment of this provision of the UCC, should that same payee designation be considered unambiguous after the amendment? Explain.

Suspension of the Drawer's Obligation

When a drawer gives one alternative or joint payee a check, the drawer's obligation on the check to other payees is suspended [UCC 3-310(b)(1)]. The payee who has possession of the check holds it for the benefit of all of the payees.

On the check's negotiation, is the drawer obliged to ensure that the funds are disbursed between the payees? In the following case, one of the parties—a payee on a "co-payable" check—contended in effect that a drawer has such a duty.

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2007. 862 N.E.2d 716.

● Background and Facts Vernon and Shirley Graves owned a commercial building and the property on which it was located in Kokomo, Indiana. The Graveses leased the premises to John and Tamara Johnson, who operated Johnson's Towing & Recovery on the property. The Johnsons insured the property and their business through Westport Insurance Company. A fire destroyed the building in November 2003. Westport hired Claims Management Services, Inc. (CMS), to investigate and pay the claim. On CMS's behalf, Robert Davis met with Vernon, who was acting as the rebuilding contractor, and agreed that Westport would pay $98,000 in three "progress payments" with the checks to be "co-payable" to Johnson's Towing and Vernon. Westport issued two checks, for $30,000 and $29,000, respectively, and delivered them to Vernon, who deposited them into his account. A third check for $68,037.42 was tendered to the Johnsons. They did not remit the funds to the Graveses, however, who subsequently filed a suit in an Indiana state court against the Johnsons and Westport.^a The court entered a summary judgment in Westport's favor. The Graveses appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

As to method of payment, there is no dispute that Westport agreed to make progress payments to Vernon and agreed to make the payments by check. Furthermore, [Vernon] does not dispute that Westport informed him that any check would be made payable to Vernon and Johnson's Towing, the named insured on the insurance policy. Vernon made no objection to the method of payment and acquiesced to it when he took the first check.

* * * *

We find no dispute that Westport sent the Check in accordance with the terms it set forth to the Graveses and as agreed upon by the Graveses * * * .

* * * The Graveses argue that Westport did not discharge its obligation to them because they never received or took the Check. * * * [W]e find this argument unpersuasive.

In determining whether an obligation is suspended as to all joint payees when a check is taken by one joint payee, * * * payment to and possession by one joint payee is constructive possession by the other joint payee. * * * [W]here one joint payee takes and possesses a check, it suspends all obligations as to other joint payees not in actual possession of the check as the party possessing the draft holds the draft for the benefit of himself and the other payee. [Emphasis added.]

Furthermore, as to the actual discharge of a debt, it is well settled * * * that once a check is paid, it extinguishes the debt for which it is presented. Such debt is extinguished even where a jointly payable check is sent to one co-payee and that co-payee embezzles the funds. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Furthermore, this Court relie[s] on Indiana Code [S]ection 26-1-3.1-310 in finding that payment of the settlement check extinguished [Westport's] obligation * * * .

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Westport's tender of the check to the Johnsons suspended the insurance company's obligation to both payees, including the Graveses. Payment of the check "extinguished" the firm's obligation to its insured and their landlord.

● The Ethical Dimension Does a drawer who acts as Westport did—consulting with, and delivering the first two checks to, the Graveses—create an ethical obligation with respect to the delivery of the third check? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Is there a method, other than payment, that would have discharged Westport's obligation as the drawer of the check? Explain.

Holder versus Holder in Due Course

The rules contained in Article 3 of the UCC govern a party's right to payment of a check, draft, note, or certificate of deposit.² Problems arise when a holder seeking payment of a negotiable instrument learns that a defense to payment exists or that another party has a prior claim to the instrument. In such situations, it becomes important for the person seeking payment to have the rights of a holder in due course (HDC). An HDC takes a negotiable instrument free of all claims and most defenses of other parties.

2. The rights and liabilities on checks, drafts, notes, and certificates of deposit are determined under Article 3 of the UCC. Other kinds of documents, such as stock certificates, bills of lading, and other documents of title, meet the requirements of negotiable instruments, but the rights and liabilities of the parties on these documents are covered by Articles 7 and 8 of the UCC. See Chapter 47, on bailments, for information about Article 7.

Status of an Ordinary Holder

As pointed out in Chapter 24, the UCC defines a holder as "the person in possession of a negotiable instrument that is payable either to bearer or to an identified person that is the person in possession" [UCC 1-201(21)(A)]. An ordinary holder obtains only those rights that the transferor had in the instrument. In this respect, a holder has the same status as an assignee (see Chapter 16). A holder normally is subject to the same defenses that could be asserted against the transferor, just as an assignee is subject to the defenses that could be asserted against the assignor.

Status of a Holder in Due Course (HDC)

In contrast, a holder in due course (HDC) is a holder who, by meeting certain acquisition requirements (to be discussed shortly), takes an instrument free of most of the defenses and claims to which the transferor was subject. Stated another way, an HDC can normally acquire a higher level of immunity than can an ordinary holder in regard to defenses against payment on the instrument or ownership claims to the instrument by other parties.

An example will help to clarify the distinction between the rights of an ordinary holder and the rights of an HDC. Debby Morrison signs a $10,000 note payable to Alex Jerrod in payment for goods. Jerrod negotiates the note to Beverly Larson, who promises to pay Jerrod for it in thirty days. During the next month, Larson learns that Jerrod has breached his contract with Morrison by delivering defective goods and that, for this reason, Morrison will not honor the $10,000 note. Whether Larson can hold Morrison liable on the note depends on whether Larson has met the requirements for HDC status. If Larson has met these requirements and thus has HDC status, she is entitled to payment on the note. If Larson has not met these requirements, she has the status of an ordinary holder, and Morrison's defense against payment to Jerrod will also be effective against Larson.

Requirements for HDC Status

The basic requirements for attaining HDC status are set forth in UCC 3-302. An HDC must first be a holder of a negotiable instrument and must have taken the instrument (1) for value; (2) in good faith; and (3) without notice that it is overdue, that it has been dishonored, that any person has a defense against it or a claim to it, or that the instrument contains unauthorized signatures or alterations or is so irregular or incomplete as to call into question its authenticity. We now examine each of these requirements.

Taking for Value

An HDC must have given value for the instrument [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(i), 3-303]. A person who receives an instrument as a gift or inherits it has not met the requirement of value. In these situations, the person normally becomes an ordinary holder and does not possess the rights of an HDC.

How an Instrument Is Taken for Value

Under UCC 3-303(a), a holder takes an instrument for value if the holder has done any of the following:

1. Performed the promise for which the instrument was issued or transferred.
2. Acquired a security interest or other lien in the instrument (other than a lien obtained by a judicial proceeding).³
3. Taken the instrument in payment of, or as security for, an antecedent (preexisting) claim. For example, Zon owes Dwyer $2,000 on a past-due account. If Zon negotiates a $2,000 note signed by Gordon to Dwyer and Dwyer accepts it to discharge the overdue account balance, Dwyer has given value for the instrument.
4. Given a negotiable instrument as payment. For example, Martin has issued a $5,000 negotiable promissory note to Paulene. The note is due six months from the date issued. Paulene needs funds and does not want to wait until the maturity date to collect. She negotiates the note to her friend Kristen, who pays her $2,000 in cash and writes her a check—a negotiable instrument—for the balance of $3,000. Kristen has given full value for the note by paying $2,000 in cash and issuing Paulene the check for $3,000.
5. Given an irrevocable commitment (such as a letter of credit described in Chapter 22 on page 453) as payment.

The Concept of Value in Negotiable Instruments Law

The concept of value in the law of negotiable instruments is not the same as the concept of consideration in the law of contracts. An executory promise (a promise to give value in the future) is clearly valid consideration to support a contract [UCC 1-201(44)]. In contrast, it normally does not constitute sufficient value to make the promisor an HDC. UCC 3-303(a)(1) provides that a holder takes the instrument for value only to the extent that the promise has been performed. Therefore, if the holder plans to pay for the instrument later or plans to perform the required services at some future date, the holder has not yet given value. In that situation, the holder is not yet an HDC.

In the Morrison-Jerrod-Larson example presented earlier, Larson is not an HDC because she did not take the instrument (Morrison's note) for value—she has not yet paid Jerrod for the note. Thus, Morrison's

3. Security interests will be discussed in Chapter 29. Other liens will be discussed in Chapter 28.

EXHIBIT 25-7 • Taking for Value

By exchanging defective goods for the note, Jerrod breached his contract with Morrison. Morrison could assert this defense if Jerrod presented the note to her for payment. Jerrod exchanged the note for Larson's promise to pay in thirty days, however. Because Larson did not take the note for value, she is not a holder in due course. Thus, Morrison can assert against Larson the defense of Jerrod's breach when Larson submits the note to Morrison for payment. If Larson had taken the note for value, Morrison could not assert that defense and would be liable to pay the note.

defense of breach of contract is valid against Larson as well as against Jerrod. If Larson had paid Jerrod for the note at the time of transfer (which would mean she had given value for the instrument), she would be an HDC. As an HDC, she could hold Morrison liable on the note even though Morrison has a valid defense against Jerrod on the basis of breach of contract. Exhibit 25-7 illustrates these concepts.

Exceptions In a few situations, the holder may pay for the instrument but does not acquire HDC status. For example, when the instrument is purchased at a judicial sale, such as a bankruptcy or creditor's sale, the holder will not be an HDC. Similarly, if the instrument is acquired as a result of taking over a trust or estate (as administrator), or as part of a corporate purchase of assets, the holder will have only the rights of an ordinary holder [UCC 3-302(c)].

Taking in Good Faith

The second requirement for HDC status is that the holder take the instrument in good faith [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(ii)]. Under Article 3, good faith is defined as "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" [UCC 3-103(a)(4)].⁴ The good faith requirement applies only to the holder. It is immaterial whether the transferor acted in good faith. Thus, a person who in good faith takes a negotiable instrument from a thief may become an HDC.

The good faith requirement means that the purchaser, when acquiring the instrument, must honestly believe that it is not defective. If a person purchases a $10,000 note for $300 from a stranger on a street corner, the issue of good faith can be raised on the grounds of both the suspicious circumstances and the grossly inadequate consideration (value). The UCC does not provide clear guidelines to determine good faith, so each situation must be examined separately. In the following case, the court considered whether a bank observed "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" to fulfill the good faith requirement and become an HDC.

4. Before the revision of Article 3, the applicable definition of good faith was "honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned" [UCC 1-201(19)].

• Background and Facts Forsgard Trading, Inc., opened an account at Mid Wisconsin Bank in July 1999. The account agreement stated, "Any items, other than cash, accepted for deposit * * * will be given provisional credit only until collection is final." Mid Wisconsin's practice is to give immediate credit on deposits, but an employee may place a hold on a check if, for example, there is reasonable doubt about it. On May 7, 2001, Lakeshore Truck and Equipment Sales, Inc., wrote a check payable to Forsgard in the amount of $18,500. On May 8, Forsgard deposited the check in its account at Mid Wisconsin, which gave Forsgard immediate credit. The same day, Lakeshore issued a stop-payment order (an order to its bank not to pay the check—see Chapter 27). When Mid Wisconsin received notice on May 16 that payment had been stopped, it deducted the $18,500 from Forsgard's account. Because of transfers from the account between May 8 and May 16, the deduction resulted in a negative balance. Before this incident, Forsgard had overdrawn the account twenty-four times but, on each occasion, had deposited sufficient funds to cover the overdraft. Forsgard did not do so this time. Mid Wisconsin filed a suit in a Wisconsin state court against Forsgard, Lakeshore, and others to recover the loss. The court issued a summary judgment in Mid Wisconsin's favor. Lakeshore appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT*PETERSON, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Lakeshore claims Mid Wisconsin was not a holder in due course of the check Forsgard deposited. Wisconsin Statutes Section 403.305 [Wisconsin's version of UCC 3-305] gives a holder in due course the right to recover from a drawer who places a stop-payment order on a check. According to [Wisconsin Statutes Section] 403.302(1) [UCC 3-302(a)], a holder in due course is one who takes an instrument for value and in good faith. There is no dispute Mid Wisconsin took the check for value. Lakeshore argues, however, that Mid Wisconsin did not take the check in good faith. [Wisconsin Statutes Section] 403.103(1)(d) [UCC 3-103(a)(4)] defines good faith as "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." Lakeshore concedes that Mid Wisconsin took the check with honesty in fact, but contends Mid Wisconsin did not observe reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing. [Emphasis added.]

First, Lakeshore contends that Mid Wisconsin's banking agreement with Forsgard did not allow it to give immediate credit, so that the Bank was not observing reasonable commercial standards when it granted the credit. The banking agreement states, "Any items, other than cash, accepted for deposit (including items drawn 'on us') will be given provisional credit only until collection is final * * * ." Lakeshore contends that this means Mid Wisconsin could not grant immediate credit. Lakeshore misinterprets the agreement. In fact, Mid Wisconsin complied with the agreement. Mid Wisconsin gave Forsgard provisional credit, which the agreement allows. When Lakeshore stopped payment on the check, the Bank deducted the amount of the check from Forsgard's account. This also was in accordance with the agreement. However, Forsgard did not cover the negative balance that resulted from the deduction.

Next, Lakeshore maintains that under the circumstances, reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing should have led Mid Wisconsin to place a hold on the check instead of giving immediate credit. Lakeshore notes that * * * Forsgard's account had been overdrawn many times in the past.

To begin with, Wisconsin courts have approved of the practice of extending immediate credit on deposited checks. * * * [E]xtending immediate credit is consistent with reasonable banking standards. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * It would hinder commercial transactions if depository banks refused to permit the withdrawal prior to the clearance of checks. * * * [B]anking practice is to the contrary. It is clear that the Uniform Commercial Code was intended to permit the continuation of this practice and to protect banks [that] have given credit on deposited items prior to notice of a stop payment order * * * . [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The state appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment that Mid Wisconsin had observed reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing and was an HDC of the check.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Forsgard's account at Mid Wisconsin already had been overdrawn when the check was deposited. How might the result in this case have been different?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Should the court have given more weight to the fact that Forsgard's account had been overdrawn twenty-four times? Why or why not?

Taking without Notice

The final requirement for HDC status concerns notice of defects. A person cannot be a HDC if she or he knows or has reason to know that the instrument is defective in any one of the following ways [UCC 3-302(a)]:

1. It is overdue.
2. It has been dishonored.
3. It is part of a series of which at least one instrument has an uncured (uncorrected) default.
4. The instrument contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered.
5. There is a defense against the instrument or a claim to the instrument.
6. The instrument is so incomplete or irregular as to call into question its authenticity.⁵

What Constitutes Notice? Notice of a defective instrument is given whenever the holder (1) has actual knowledge of the defect; (2) has received a notice of the defect (such as a letter from a bank identifying the serial numbers of stolen checks); or (3) has reason to know that a defect exists, given all the facts and circumstances known at the time in question [UCC 1-201(25)]. The holder must also have received the notice “at a time and in a manner that gives a reasonable opportunity to act on it” [UCC 3-302(f)]. A purchaser’s knowledge of certain facts, such as insolvency proceedings against the maker or drawer of the instrument, does not constitute notice that the instrument is defective [UCC 3-302(b)].

Overdue Instruments What constitutes notice that an instrument is overdue depends on whether it is a demand instrument (payable on demand) or a time instrument (payable at a definite time).

Demand Instruments. A purchaser has notice that a demand instrument is overdue if he or she either takes the instrument knowing that demand has been made or takes the instrument an unreasonable length of time after its date. For a check, a “reasonable time” is ninety days after the date of the check. For all other demand instruments, what will be considered a reasonable time depends on the circumstances [UCC 3-304(a)].

Time Instruments. Normally, a time instrument is overdue on the day after its due date; hence, anyone who takes a time instrument after the due date is on notice that it is overdue [UCC 3-304(b)].⁶ Thus, if a promissory note due on May 15 is purchased on May 16, the purchaser will be an ordinary holder, not an HDC. If an instrument states that it is “Payable in thirty days,” counting begins the day after the instrument is dated. For example, a note dated December 1 that is payable in thirty days is due by midnight on December 31. If the payment date falls on a Sunday or holiday, the instrument is payable on the next business day.

A series of notes issued at the same time with successive maturity dates is overdue when any note in the series is overdue. This serves to notify prospective purchasers that they cannot qualify as HDCs [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(iii)].

If the principal is to be paid in installments, the default or nonpayment of any one installment will make the instrument overdue and provide notice to prospective purchasers of the default. The instrument will remain overdue until the default is cured [UCC 3-304(b)(1)]. An instrument does not become overdue if there is a default on a payment of interest only [UCC 3-304(c)]. Most installment notes provide that any payment shall be applied first to interest and the balance to the principal. This serves as notice that any installment payment for less than the full amount results in a default on an installment payment toward the principal.

Dishonored Instruments An instrument is dishonored when the party to whom the instrument is presented refuses to pay it. If a holder knows or has reason to know that an instrument has been dishonored, the holder is on notice and cannot claim HDC status [UCC 3-302(a)(2)]. Thus, a person who takes a check clearly stamped “insufficient funds” is put on notice.

For example, suppose that Gonzalez holds a demand note dated September 1 on Apex, Inc., a local business firm. On September 17, she demands payment, and Apex refuses (that is, dishonors the instrument). On September 22, Gonzalez negotiates the note to Brenner, a purchaser who lives in another state. Brenner does not know, and has no reason to know, that the note has been dishonored. Because Brenner is not put on notice, Brenner can become an HDC.

5. Section 302(1)(c) of the unrevised Article 3 provided that HDC protection is lost if a holder has notice that an instrument is overdue or has been dishonored or if there is a claim to or a defense against it.

6. A time instrument also becomes overdue the day after an accelerated due date, unless the purchaser has no reason to know that the due date has been accelerated [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(iii), 3-304(b)(3)].

Notice of Claims or Defenses A holder cannot become an HDC if he or she has notice of any claim to the instrument or defense against it [UCC 3-302(a)(2)(v), (vi)]. Knowledge of claims or defenses can be imputed (attributed) to the purchaser if these claims or defenses are apparent on the face of the instrument or if the purchaser otherwise had reason to know of them from facts surrounding the transaction.⁷

Knowledge of a Defense. It stands to reason that a purchaser cannot be an HDC if she or he knows that a party to an instrument has a defense that entitles that party to avoid the obligation. For example, a potential purchaser who knows that the maker of a note has breached the underlying contract with the payee cannot thereafter purchase the note as an HDC.

Knowledge of one defense precludes a holder from asserting HDC status in regard to all other defenses. For example, Litton, knowing that the note he has taken has a forged indorsement, presents it to the maker for payment. The maker refuses to pay on the ground of breach of the underlying contract. The maker can assert this defense against Litton even though Litton had no knowledge of the breach, because Litton's knowledge of the forgery alone prevents him from being an HDC in all circumstances.

Knowledge of Wrongful Negotiation by a Fiduciary. Knowledge that a fiduciary has wrongfully negotiated an instrument is sufficient notice of a claim against the instrument to preclude HDC status. Suppose that O'Banion, a university trustee, improperly writes a check on the university trust account to pay a personal debt. Lewis knows that the check has been improperly drawn on university funds, but she accepts it anyway. Lewis cannot claim to be an HDC. When a purchaser knows that a fiduciary is acting in breach of duty, HDC status is denied [UCC 3-307(b)].

Incomplete Instruments A purchaser cannot become an HDC of an instrument so incomplete on its face that an element of negotiability is lacking (for example, the amount is not filled in) [UCC 3-302(a)(1)]. Minor omissions (such as the omission of the date—see Chapter 24) are permissible because these do not call into question the validity of the instrument [UCC 3-113(b)].

Similarly, when a person accepts an instrument that has been completed without knowing that it was incomplete when issued, the person can take it as an HDC [UCC 3-115(b), 3-302(a)(1)]. Even if an instrument that is originally incomplete is later completed in an unauthorized manner, an HDC can still enforce the instrument as completed [UCC 3-407(c)].

To illustrate: Peyton asks Brittany to buy a textbook for him when she goes to the campus bookstore. Peyton writes a check payable to the campus store, leaves the amount blank, and tells Brittany to fill in the price of the textbook. The cost of the textbook is $85. If Brittany fills in the check for $150 before she gets to the bookstore, the bookstore cashier sees only a properly completed instrument. Therefore, because the bookstore had no notice that the check was incomplete when it was issued, the bookstore can take the check for $150 and become an HDC. (Material alterations will be discussed in Chapter 26.)

Irregular Instruments Any irregularity on the face of an instrument (such as an obvious forgery or alteration) that calls into question its validity or ownership, or that creates an ambiguity as to the party to pay, will bar HDC status. A difference between the handwriting used in the body of a check and that used in the signature will not in and of itself make an instrument irregular. Antedating or postdating a check or stating the amount in digits but failing to write out the numbers normally will not make a check irregular [UCC 3-113(a)].⁸ Visible evidence of forgery of a maker's or drawer's signature, however, will disqualify a purchaser from HDC status. Conversely, a good forgery

7. If an instrument contains a statement required by a statute or an administrative rule to the effect that the rights of a holder or transferee are subject to the claims or defenses that the issuer could assert against the original payee, the instrument is negotiable, but there cannot be an HDC of the instrument. See UCC 3-106(d) and the discussion of federal limitations on HDC rights in Chapter 26.

8. Note that some courts have held that the postdating of a check may raise substantial suspicions about its authenticity, particularly if it is a commercial check. See, for example, Bay Shore Check Cashing Corp. v. Landscapes by North East Construction Corp., 776 N.Y.S.2d 742 (N.Y. Dist. 2004).

of a signature or a careful alteration can go undetected by reasonable examination; therefore, the purchaser can qualify as an HDC [UCC 3-302(a)(1)].

Losses that result from well-crafted forgeries usually fall on the party to whom the forger transferred the instrument (assuming, of course, that the forger cannot be found). This means that a bank that accepts checks for deposit despite apparent evidence on the faces of the checks that they were irregular will bear the loss if the checks later turn out to be forged.⁹

9. See, for example, Firststar Bank, N.A. v. First Star Title Agency, Inc., 2004 WL 1906851 (Ohio App. 2004).

Holder through an HDC

A person who does not qualify as an HDC but who derives his or her title through an HDC can acquire the rights and privileges of an HDC. This rule, which is called the shelter principle, is set out in UCC 3-203(b):

Transfer of an instrument, whether or not the transfer is a negotiation, vests in the transferee any right of the transferor to enforce the instrument, including any right as a holder in due course, but the transferee cannot acquire

Rules

A holder is defined as a person in possession of an instrument “if the instrument is payable to bearer or, in the cases of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession” [UCC 1-201(20)].

A holder gives value by doing any of the following [UCC 3-303]:

1. Performing the promise for which the instrument was issued or transferred.
2. Acquiring a security interest or other lien in the instrument (other than a lien obtained by a judicial proceeding).
3. Taking the instrument in payment of, or as security for, an antecedent debt.
4. Giving a negotiable instrument as payment.
5. Giving an irrevocable commitment as payment.

Good faith is defined for purposes of revised Article 3 as “honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing” [UCC 3-103(a)(4)].

A holder must not be on notice that the instrument is defective in any of the following ways [UCC 3-302, 3-304]:

1. The instrument is overdue.
2. The instrument has been dishonored.
3. There is an uncured (uncorrected) default with respect to another instrument issued as part of the same series.
4. The instrument contains an unauthorized signature or has been altered.
5. There is a defense against the instrument or a claim to the instrument.
6. The instrument is so irregular or incomplete as to call into question its authenticity.

A holder who cannot qualify as an HDC has the rights of an HDC if he or she derives title through an HDC [UCC 3-203(b)].

CHAPTER 25 Transferability and Holder in Due Course rights of a holder in due course by a transfer, directly or indirectly, from a holder in due course if the transferee engaged in fraud or illegality affecting the instrument.

The Purpose of the Shelter Principle

The shelter principle extends the benefits of HDC status and is designed to aid the HDC in readily disposing of the instrument. Anyone, no matter how far removed from an HDC, who can ultimately trace her or his title back to an HDC comes within the shelter principle. Normally, a person who acquires an instrument from an HDC or from someone with HDC rights receives HDC rights on the legal theory that the transferee of an instrument receives at least the rights that the transferor had. By extending the benefits of HDC status, the shelter principle promotes the marketability and free transferability of negotiable instruments.

Limitations on the Shelter Principle

Nevertheless, there are some limitations on the shelter principle. Certain persons who formerly held instruments cannot improve their positions by later reacquiring the instruments from HDCs [UCC 3-203(b)]. Therefore, if a holder was a party to fraud or illegality affecting the instrument or if, as a prior holder, he or she had notice of a claim or defense against the instrument, that holder is not allowed to improve his or her status by repurchasing the instrument from a later HDC.

To illustrate: Matthew and Carla collaborate to defraud Lorena. Lorena is induced to give Carla a negotiable note payable to Carla's order. Carla then specially indorses the note for value to Larry, an HDC. Matthew and Carla split the proceeds. Larry negotiates the note to Stuart, another HDC. Stuart then negotiates the note for value to Matthew. Matthew, even though he obtained the note through an HDC, is not a holder through an HDC, because he participated in the original fraud and can never acquire HDC rights in this note.

See Concept Summary 25.2 on the facing page for a review of the requirements for HDC status.

REVIEWING Transferability and Holder in Due Course

The Brown family owns several companies, including the J. H. Stevedoring Company and Penn Warehousing and Distribution, Inc. Many aspects of the companies' operations and management are intertwined. Dennis Bishop began working for J. H. and Penn in 1999. By 2008, Bishop was financial controller at J. H., where he was responsible for approving invoices for payment and reconciling the corporate checkbook. In December 2008, Bishop began stealing from Penn and J. H. by writing checks on the corporate accounts and using the funds for his own benefit (committing the crime of embezzlement). Several members of the Brown family signed the checks for Bishop without hesitation because he was a longtime, trusted employee. Over the next two years, Bishop embezzled $1,209,436, of which $670,632 was used to buy horses from the Fasig-Tipton Company and Fasig-Tipton Midlantic, Inc., with Penn and J. H. checks made payable to those firms. When Bishop's fraud was revealed, J. H. and Penn filed a suit in a federal district court against the Fasig-Tipton firms (the defendants) to recover the amounts of the checks made payable to them. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What method was most likely used to negotiate the instruments described here?
2. Suppose that all of the checks issued to the defendants were made payable to "Fasig-Tipton Co., Fasig-Tipton Midlantic, Inc." Under the Uniform Commercial Code, were the instruments payable jointly or in the alternative? Why is this significant?
3. Do the defendants in this situation (the two Fasig-Tipton firms) meet the requirements of an HDC? Why or why not?
4. In whose favor should the court rule and why?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

25-1. A check drawn by Cullen for $500 is made payable to the order of Jordan and issued to Jordan. Jordan owes his landlord $500 in rent and transfers the check to his landlord with the following indorsement: "For rent paid, [signed] Jordan." Jordan's landlord has contracted to have Deborah do some landscaping on the property. When Deborah insists on immediate payment, the landlord transfers the check to Deborah without indorsement. Later, to pay for some palm trees purchased from Better-Garden Nursery, Deborah transfers the check with the following indorsement: "Pay to Better-Garden Nursery, without recourse, [signed] Deborah." Better-Garden Nursery sends the check to its bank indorsed "For deposit only, [signed] Better-Garden Nursery."

- Classify each of these indorsements.
- Was the transfer from Jordan's landlord to Deborah, without indorsement, an assignment or a negotiation? Explain.

25-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Celine issues a ninety-day negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Hayden. The amount of the note is left blank, pending a determination of the amount that Hayden will need to purchase a used car for Celine. Celine authorizes any amount not to exceed $2,000. Hayden, without authority, fills in the note in the amount of $5,000 and thirty days later sells the note to First National Bank of Oklahoma for $4,850. Hayden does not buy the car and leaves the state. First National Bank has no knowledge that the instrument was incomplete when issued or that Hayden had no authority to complete the instrument in the amount of $5,000.

- Does the bank qualify as a holder in due course? If so, for what amount? Explain.
- If Hayden had sold the note to a stranger in a bar for $500, would the stranger qualify as a holder in due course? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 25-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

25-3. Through negotiation, Emilio has received from dishonest payees two checks with the following histories:

- The drawer issued a check to the payee for $9. The payee cleverly altered the numeral on the check from $9 to $90 and the written word from "nine" to "ninety."
- The drawer issued a check to the payee without filling in the amount. The drawer authorized the payee to fill in the amount for no more than $90. The payee filled in the amount of $900.

Discuss whether Emilio, by giving value to the payees, can qualify as a holder in due course of these checks.

25-4. Bertram writes a check for $200 payable to "cash." He puts the check in his pocket and drives to the bank to cash the check. As he gets out of his car in the bank's parking lot, the check slips out of his pocket and falls to the pavement. Jerrod walks by moments later, picks up the check, and later that day delivers it to Amber, to whom he owes $200. Amber indorses the check "For deposit only, [signed] Amber Dowel" and deposits it into her checking account. In light of these circumstances, answer the following questions:

- Is the check a bearer instrument or an order instrument?
- Did Jerrod's delivery of the check to Amber constitute a valid negotiation? Why or why not?
- What type of indorsement did Amber make?
- Does Bertram have a right to recover the $200 from Amber? Explain.

25-5. Transfer of Instruments. In July 1988, Chester Crow executed a promissory note payable "to the order of THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SHREVEPORT or BEARER" in the amount of $21,578.42 at an interest rate of 3 percent per year above the "prime rate in effect at The First National Bank of Shreveport" in Shreveport, Louisiana, until paid. The note was a standard preprinted promissory note. In 1999, Credit Recoveries, Inc., filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Crow, alleging that he owed $7,222.57 on the note, plus interest. Crow responded that the debt represented by the note had been canceled by the bank in September 1994. He also contended that, in any event, to collect on the note Credit Recoveries had to prove its legitimate ownership of it. When no evidence of ownership was forthcoming, Crow filed a motion to dismiss the suit. Is the note an order instrument or a bearer instrument? How might it have been transferred to Credit Recoveries? With this in mind, should the court dismiss the suit on the basis of Crow's contention? [Credit Recoveries, Inc. v. Crow, 862 So.2d 1146 (La.App. 2 Cir. 2003)]

25-6. Alternative or Joint Payees. Hartford Mutual Insurance Co. issued a check for $60,150 payable to "Andrew Michael Bogdan, Jr., Crystal Bogdan, Oceanmark Bank FSB, Goodman-Gable-Gould Company." The check was to pay a claim related to the Bogdans' commercial property. Besides the Bogdans, the payees were the mortgage holder (Oceanmark) and the insurance agent who adjusted the claim. The Bogdans and the agent indorsed the check and cashed it at Provident Bank of Maryland. Meanwhile, Oceanmark sold the mortgage to Pelican National Bank, which asked Provident to pay it the amount of the check. Provident refused. Pelican filed a suit in a Maryland state court against Provident, arguing that the check had been improperly negotiated. Was this check payable jointly or in the alternative? Whose indorsements were required to cash it? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain. [Pelican National Bank v. Provident Bank of Maryland, 381 Md. 327, 849 A.2d 475 (2004)]

25-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In September 2001, Cory Babcock and Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., bought a new 2001 Chevrolet Corvette from Cox Chevrolet in Sarasota, Florida. Their retail installment sales contract (RISC) required monthly payments until $52,516.20 was paid. The RISC imposed many other conditions on the buyers and seller with respect to the payment for, and handling of, the Corvette. Cox assigned the RISC to General Motors Acceptance Corp. (GMAC). In August 2002, the buyers sold the car to Florida Auto Brokers, which agreed to pay the balance due on the RISC. The check to GMAC for this amount was dishonored for insufficient funds, however, after the vehicle's title had been forwarded. GMAC filed a suit in a Florida state court against Honest Air and Babcock, seeking $35,815.26 as damages for breach of contract. The defendants argued that the RISC was a negotiable instrument. A ruling in their favor on this point would reduce any damages due GMAC to less than the Corvette's current value. What are the requirements for an instrument to be negotiable? Does the RISC qualify? Explain. [General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. Honest Air Conditioning & Heating, Inc., 933 So.2d 34 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 2006)]

25-8. Holder in Due Course. Robert Triffin bought a number of dishonored checks from McCall's Liquor Corp., Community Check Cashing II, LLC (CCC), and other licensed check-cashing businesses in New Jersey. Seventeen of the checks had been dishonored as counterfeit. In an attempt to recover on the items, Triffin met with the drawer, Automatic Data Processing, Inc. (ADP). At the meeting, Triffin said that he knew the checks were counterfeit. When ADP refused to pay, Triffin filed suits in New Jersey state courts to collect, asserting claims totaling $11,021.33. With each complaint were copies of assignment agreements corresponding to each check. Each agreement stated, among other things, that the seller was a holder in due course (HDC) and had assigned its rights in the check to Triffin. ADP had not previously seen these agreements. A private investigator determined that the forms attached to the McCall's and CCC checks had not been signed by their sellers but that Triffin had scanned the signatures into his computer and pasted them onto the agreements. ADP claimed fraud. Does Triffin qualify as an HDC? If not, did he acquire the rights of an HDC under the shelter principle? As for the fraud claim, which element of fraud would ADP be least likely to prove? [Triffin v. Automatic Data Processing, Inc., 394 N.J.Super. 237, 926 A.2d 362 (App.Div. 2007)]

As an assistant comptroller for Interior Crafts, Inc., in Chicago, Illinois, Todd Leparski was authorized to receive checks from Interior's customers and deposit the checks into Interior's account. Between October 2000 and February 2001, Leparski stole more than $500,000 from Interior by indorsing the checks "Interior Crafts—For Deposit Only" but depositing some of them into his own account at Marquette Bank through an automated teller machine owned by Pan American Bank. Marquette alerted Interior, which was able to recover about $250,000 from Leparski. Interior also recovered $250,000 under its policy with American Insurance Co. To collect the rest of the missing funds, Interior filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Leparski and the banks. The court ruled in favor of Interior, and Pan American appealed to a state intermediate appellate court. [Interior Crafts, Inc. v. Leparski, 366 Ill.App.3d 1148, 853 N.E.2d 1244, 304 Ill.Dec. 878 (3 Dist. 2006)]

- What type of indorsement is "Interior Crafts—For Deposit Only"? What is the obligation of a party that receives a check with this indorsement? Does the fact that Interior authorized Leparski to indorse its checks but not to deposit those checks into his own account absolve Pan American of liability? Explain.
- From an ethical perspective, how might a business firm such as Interior discourage an employee's thievery such as Leparski's acts in this case? Discuss.

25-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 25." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Negotiability & Transferability: Indorsing Checks. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) According to the instructor in the video, what are the two reasons why banks generally require a person to indorse a check that is made out to cash (a bearer instrument), even when the check is signed in the presence of the teller?
- (b) Suppose that your friend makes out a check payable to cash, signs it, and hands it to you. You take the check to your bank and indorse the check with your name and the words "without recourse." What type of indorsement is this? How does this indorsement affect the bank's rights?

- (c) Now suppose that you go to your bank and write a check on your account payable to cash for $500. The teller gives you the cash without asking you to indorse the check. After you leave, the teller slips the check into his pocket. Later, the teller delivers it (without an indorsement) to his friend Carol in payment for a gambling debt. Carol takes your check to her bank, indorses it, and deposits the money. Discuss whether Carol is a holder in due course.

Liability, Defenses, and Discharge

Two kinds of liability are associated with negotiable instruments: signature liability and warranty liability. Signature liability relates to signatures on instruments. Those who sign negotiable instruments are potentially liable for payment of the amount stated on the instrument. Warranty liability, in contrast, extends to both signers and nonsigners. A breach of warranty can occur when the instrument is transferred or presented for payment.

Note that the focus is on liability on the instrument itself or on warranties connected with the transfer or presentment of the instrument as opposed to liability on any underlying contract. Suppose, for example, that Donna agrees to buy one thousand compact discs from Luis and issues a check to Luis in payment. The liability discussed in this chapter does not relate directly to the contract (for instance, whether the compact discs are of proper quality or fit for the purpose for which they are intended). The liability discussed here is the liability arising in connection with the check (such as what recourse Luis will have if Donna's bank refuses to pay the check due to insufficient funds in Donna's account or Donna's order to her bank to stop payment on the check).

The first part of this chapter covers the liability of the parties who sign instruments—for example, drawers of drafts and checks, makers of notes and certificates of deposit, and indorsers. It also covers the liability of accommodation parties and the warranty liability of those who transfer instruments and present instruments for payment. The chapter then examines the defenses that can be raised to avoid liability on an instrument. The final section in the chapter looks at some of the ways in which parties can be discharged from liability on negotiable instruments.

Signature Liability

The key to liability on a negotiable instrument is a signature. As discussed in Chapter 24, the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) broadly defines a signature as any name, word, mark, or symbol executed or adopted by a person with the present intention to authenticate a writing [UCC 1-209(39), 3-401(b)]. A signature can be made manually or by use of any device or machine.

The general rule is as follows: "A person is not liable on an instrument unless (i) the person signed the instrument, or (ii) the person is represented by an agent or representative who signed the instrument and the signature is binding on the represented person"

[UCC 3-401(a)]. Essentially, this means that every person, except a qualified indorser,¹ who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily or secondarily liable for payment of that instrument when it comes due. The following subsections discuss these two types of liability, as well as the conditions that must be met before liability can arise.

Primary Liability

A person who is primarily liable on a negotiable instrument is absolutely required to pay the instrument—unless, of course, he or she has a valid defense to payment. Liability is immediate when the instrument is signed or issued. No action by the holder of the instrument is required. Makers and acceptors are primarily liable [UCC 3-412, 3-413].

Makers The maker of a promissory note promises to pay the instrument according to its terms. It is the maker's promise to pay that renders the instrument negotiable. If the instrument was incomplete when the maker signed it, the maker is obligated to pay it according to either its stated terms or terms that were agreed on and later filled in to complete the instrument [UCC 3-115, 3-407, 3-412]. For example, suppose that Tristan executes a preprinted promissory note to Sharon, without filling in the due-date blank. If Sharon does not complete the form by adding the date, the note will be payable on demand. If Sharon subsequently writes in a due date that Tristan authorized, the note is payable on the stated due date. In either situation, Tristan (the maker) is obligated to pay the note.

Acceptors An acceptor is a drawee that promises to pay an instrument when it is presented later for payment, as mentioned in Chapter 24. When a drawee accepts a draft (usually by writing "accepted" across its face), the drawee becomes primarily liable to all subsequent holders of the instrument. In other words, the drawee's acceptance is a promise to pay that places the drawee in virtually the same position as the maker of a promissory note [UCC 3-413]. A drawee that refuses to accept a draft that requires the drawee's acceptance (such as a trade acceptance) has dishonored the instrument. (Dishonor of an instrument occurs when payment or acceptance of the instrument, whichever is required, is refused even though the instrument is presented in a timely and proper manner.)

Acceptance of a check is called certification, as will be discussed in Chapter 27. Certification is not necessary on checks, and a bank is under no obligation to certify checks. If it does certify a check, however, the drawee bank occupies the position of an acceptor and is primarily liable on the check to any holder [UCC 3-409(d)].

Secondary Liability

Drawers and indorsers have secondary liability. On a negotiable instrument, secondary liability is similar to the liability of a guarantor in a simple contract (described in Chapter 28) in the sense that it is contingent liability. In other words, a drawer or an indorser will be liable only if the party that is responsible for paying the instrument refuses to do so (dishonors the instrument). With respect to drafts and checks, a drawer's secondary liability does not arise until the drawee fails to pay or to accept the instrument, whichever is required. In regard to notes, an indorser's secondary liability does not arise until the maker, who is primarily liable, has defaulted on the instrument [UCC 3-412, 3-415].

Dishonor of an instrument thus triggers the liability of parties who are secondarily liable on the instrument—that is, the drawer and unqualified indorsers. For example, suppose that Lamar writes a check for $1,000 on her account at Western Bank payable to the order of Carerra. Carerra indorses and delivers the check, for value, to Deere. Deere deposits the check into his account at Universal Bank, but the bank returns the check to Deere marked "insufficient funds," thus dishonoring the check. The question for Deere is whether the drawer (Lamar) or the indorser (Carerra) can be held liable on the check after the bank has dishonored it. The answer to the question depends on whether certain conditions for secondary liability have been satisfied.

Parties who are secondarily liable on a negotiable instrument promise to pay on that instrument only if the following events occur:²

1. The instrument is properly and timely presented.
2. The instrument is dishonored.
3. Timely notice of dishonor is given.³

Proper and Timely Presentment As discussed in Chapter 24, presentment is the formal demand for the payment or acceptance of a negotiable instrument. The UCC requires that a holder present the instrument to the appropriate party, in a timely fashion, and in a proper manner (providing reasonable identification if requested) [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e), 3-501]. The party to whom the instrument must be presented depends on the type of instrument involved. A note or certificate of deposit (CD) must be presented to the maker for payment. A draft is presented to the drawee for acceptance, payment, or both.

2. An instrument can be drafted to include a waiver of the presentment and notice of dishonor requirements [UCC 3-504]. Presume, for simplicity's sake, that such waivers have not been incorporated into the instruments described in this chapter.

3. Note that these requirements are necessary for a secondarily liable party to have signature liability on a negotiable instrument, but they are not necessary for a secondarily liable party to have warranty liability (to be discussed later in this chapter).

CHAPTER 26 Liability, Defenses, and Discharge

A check is presented to the drawee (bank) for payment [UCC 3-501(a), 3-502(b)].

Presentment can be made by any commercially reasonable means, including oral, written, or electronic communication [UCC 3-501(b)]. It can also be made at the place specified in the instrument. Ordinarily, presentment is effective when the demand for payment or acceptance is received (if presentment takes place after an established cutoff hour, however, it may be treated as occurring the next business day).

One of the most crucial criteria for proper presentment is timeliness [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e), 3-501(b)(4)]. Failure to present within a reasonable time is a common reason for improper presentment and can lead to the instrument's dishonor and potentially discharge parties from secondary liability. A reasonable time for presentment is determined by the nature of the instrument, any usage of banking or trade, and the facts of the particular case. If the instrument is payable on demand, the holder should present it for payment or acceptance within a reasonable time. For domestic, uncertified checks, the UCC establishes a presumptively reasonable time period [UCC 3-414(f), 3-415(e)]. An ordinary check should be presented for payment within thirty days of its date or the date that it was indorsed. A drawer is not automatically discharged from liability for checks presented after thirty days, but the holder must be able to prove that the presentment after that time was reasonable.⁴ The time for proper presentment for different types of instruments is shown in Exhibit 26-1.

4. For a seminal case in which a state's highest court held that presentment more than thirty days after the date of an uncertified check did not discharge the liability of the drawer, see Grist v. Osgood, 90 Nev. 165, 521 P2d 368 (1974).

Dishonor As mentioned earlier, an instrument is dishonored when payment or acceptance of the instrument is refused in spite of proper and timely presentment. An instrument is also dishonored when the required presentment is excused (as it would be, for example, if the maker had died) and the instrument is not properly accepted or paid [UCC 3-502(e), 3-504].

In certain situations, a delay in payment or a refusal to pay an instrument will not dishonor the instrument. When presentment is made after an established cutoff hour (not earlier than 2:00 P.M.), for instance, a bank can postpone payment until the following business day without dishonoring the instrument [UCC 3-501(b)(4)]. In addition, when the holder refuses to exhibit the instrument, to give reasonable identification, or to sign a receipt for the payment on the instrument, a bank's refusal to pay does not dishonor the instrument [UCC 3-501(b)(2)]. Returning an instrument because it lacks a proper indorsement also is not a dishonor [UCC 3-501(b)(3)(i)].

Proper Notice Once an instrument has been dishonored, proper notice must be given to secondary parties (drawers and indorsers) for them to be held liable. Notice may be given in any reasonable manner, including an oral, written, or electronic communication, as well as by writing or stamping on the instrument itself [UCC 3-503(b)].⁵ If the party giving notice is a bank, it must give any necessary notice before its midnight deadline (midnight of the next banking day

5. Note that written notice is preferable, as oral notice makes it possible for a secondary party to claim that notice was not received. Also, to give proper notice of the dishonor of a foreign draft (a draft drawn in one country and payable in another country), a formal notice called a protest is required [UCC 3-505(b)].

EXHIBIT 26-1 • Time for Proper Presentment after receipt) [UCC 3-503(c)]. If the party giving notice is not a bank, the party must give notice within thirty days following the day of dishonor or the day on which the person receives notice of dishonor [UCC 3-503(c)].

Accommodation Parties

An accommodation party is one who signs an instrument for the purpose of lending his or her name as credit to another party on the instrument [UCC 3-419(a)]. Requiring an accommodation party is one way to secure against nonpayment of a negotiable instrument. When one person (such as a parent) cosigns a promissory note with the maker (such as the parent's son or daughter), the cosigner is an accommodation party, and the maker is the accommodated party.

If the accommodation party signs on behalf of the maker, he or she is an accommodation maker and is primarily liable on the instrument.⁶ For example, if Alex takes out a loan to purchase a car and his uncle cosigns the note, the uncle becomes primarily liable on the instrument. In other words, Alex's uncle is guaranteeing payment, and the bank can seek payment directly from the uncle.

If, however, the accommodation party signs on behalf of a payee or other holder (usually to make the instrument more marketable), she or he is an accommodation indorser and, as an indorser, is secondarily liable. For example, suppose that Frank Huston applies to Northeast Bank for a $20,000 loan to start a small business. Huston's lender (who has possession of the note) has Finch Smith, who has invested in Huston's business, sign the note. In this situation, Smith is an indorser and his liability is secondary; that is, the lender must pursue Huston first before seeking payment from Smith. If Smith ends up paying the amount due on the note, he has a right to reimbursement from Huston (the accommodated party) [UCC 3-419(e)].

Authorized Agents' Signatures

The general law of agency, covered in Chapters 31 and 32, applies to negotiable instruments. Questions often arise as to the liability on an instrument signed by an agent. An agent is a person who agrees to represent or act for another, called the principal. Agents can sign negotiable instruments, just as they can sign contracts, and thereby bind their principals [UCC 3-401(a)(ii), 3-402(a)]. Without such a rule, all corporate commercial business would stop, as every corporation can and must act through its agents. Certain requirements must be met, however, before the principal becomes liable on the instrument. A basic requirement to hold the principal liable on the instrument is that the agent be authorized to sign the instrument on the principal's behalf.

6. A 2002 amendment to UCC Article 3 expressly provides that an accommodation party is primarily liable if the party indicates on the instrument that he or she guarantees payment or "does not unambiguously indicate an intention to guarantee collection rather than payment" [Amended UCC 3-419(e)]. Recall from Chapter 24, however, that as yet only a few states have adopted the 2002 amendments to Article 3.

Liability of the Principal Generally, an authorized agent binds a principal on an instrument if the agent clearly names the principal in the signature (by writing, mark, or some symbol). In this situation, the UCC presumes that the signature is authorized and genuine [UCC 3-308(a)]. The agent may or may not add his or her own name, but if the signature shows clearly that it is made on behalf of the principal, the agent is not liable on the instrument [UCC 3-402(b)(1)]. For example, either of the following signatures by Sandra Binney as agent for Bob Aronson will bind Aronson on the instrument:

1. Aronson, by Binney, agent.
2. Aronson.

If Binney (the agent) signs just her own name, however, she will be personally liable to a holder in due course who has no notice of her agency status. An agent can escape liability to ordinary holders if the agent proves that the original parties did not intend the agent to be liable on the instrument [UCC 3-402(a), (b)(2)].⁷ In either situation, the principal is bound if the party entitled to enforce the instrument can prove the agency relationship.

Liability of the Agent An authorized agent may be held personally liable on a negotiable instrument in two other situations. An agent can be personally liable when the instrument is signed in both the agent's name and the principal's name but nothing on the instrument indicates the agency relationship. For example, if Binney signs the instrument "Sandra Binney, Bob Aronson" or "Aronson, Binney," she may be held personally liable because it is not clear that there is an agency relationship. When the agent indicates agency status in signing a negotiable instrument but fails to name the principal (for example, “Sandra Binney, agent”), the agent may also be liable [UCC 3-402(b)(2)]. Because the above forms of signing are ambiguous, however, parol evidence is admissible to prove the agency relationship.

An important exception to the rules on agent liability is made for checks that are signed by agents. If an agent signs his or her own name on a check that is payable from the account of the principal, and the principal is identified on the check, the agent will not be personally liable on the check [UCC 3-402(c)]. For example, suppose that Binney, who is authorized to draw checks on Aronson Company’s account, signs a check that is preprinted with Aronson Company’s name. The signature reads simply “Sandra Binney.” In this situation, Binney will not be personally liable on the check.

Unauthorized Signatures

Unauthorized signatures arise in two situations—when a person forges another person’s name on a negotiable instrument and when an agent who lacks the authority signs an instrument on behalf of a principal. The general rule is that an unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative and will not bind the person whose name is signed or forged. Assume, for example, that Pablo finds Veronica’s checkbook lying on the street, writes out a check to himself, and forges Veronica’s signature. If a bank negligently fails to ascertain that Veronica’s signature is not genuine and cashes the check for Pablo, the bank generally will be liable to Veronica for the amount. (The liability of banks for paying instruments with forged signatures will be discussed further in Chapter 27.)

If an agent lacks the authority to sign the principal’s name or has exceeded the authority given by the principal, the signature does not bind the principal but will bind the “unauthorized signer” [UCC 3-403(a)]. Assume that Maya Campbell is the principal and Lena Shem is her agent. Shem, without authority, signs a promissory note as follows: “Maya Campbell, by Lena Shem, agent.” Because Maya Campbell’s “signature” is unauthorized, Campbell cannot be held liable, but Shem is liable to a holder of the note. This would be true even if Shem had signed the note “Maya Campbell,” without indicating any agency relationship. In either situation, the unauthorized signer, Shem, is liable on the instrument.

Exceptions to the General Rule There are two exceptions to the general rule that an unauthorized signature will not bind the person whose name is signed:

1. When the person whose name is signed ratifies (affirms) the signature, he or she will be bound [UCC 3-403(a)]. For example, a principal can ratify an unauthorized signature made by an agent, either expressly (by affirming the validity of the signature) or impliedly (by other conduct, such as keeping any benefits received in the transaction or failing to repudiate the signature). The parties involved need not be principal and agent. For example, a mother may ratify her daughter’s signature forging the mother’s name so that the daughter will not be prosecuted for forgery.
2. When the negligence of the person whose name was forged substantially contributed to the forgery, a court may not allow the person to deny the effectiveness of an unauthorized signature [UCC 3-115, 3-406, 4-401(d)(2)]. For example, Rob, the owner of a business, leaves his signature stamp and a blank check on an office counter. An employee, using the stamp, fills in and cashes the check. Rob can be estopped (prevented), on the basis of his negligence, from denying liability for payment of the check [UCC 3-115, 3-406, 4-401(d)(2)]. Whatever loss occurs may be allocated, however, between certain parties on the basis of comparative negligence [UCC 3-406(b)]. If Rob, in this example, can demonstrate that the bank was negligent in paying the check, the bank may bear a portion of the loss. The liability of the parties in this type of situation will be discussed further in Chapter 27.

When the Holder Is a Holder in Due Course

A person who forges a check or signs an instrument without authorization can be held personally liable for payment by a holder in due course, or HDC [UCC 3-403(a)]. This is true even if the name of the person signing the instrument without authorization does not appear on the instrument. For example, if Michel Vuillard signs “Paul Richaud” without Richaud’s authorization, Vuillard is personally liable just as if he had signed his own name. Vuillard’s liability is limited, however, to persons who in good faith pay the instrument or take it for value. A holder who knew the signature was unauthorized would not qualify as an HDC and thus could not recover from Vuillard on the instrument. (The defenses that are effective against ordinary holders versus HDCs will be discussed in detail later in this chapter.)

Special Rules for Unauthorized Indorsements

Generally, when an indorsement is forged or unauthorized, the burden of loss falls on the first party to take the instrument with the forged or unauthorized indorsement. This general rule is premised on the concept that the first party to take an instrument is in the best position to prevent the loss.

For example, Jenny Nilson steals a check drawn on Universal Bank and payable to the order of Inga Leed. Nilson indorses the check “Inga Leed” and presents the check to Universal Bank for payment. The bank, without asking Nilson for identification, pays the check, and Nilson disappears. In this situation, Leed will not be liable on the check because her indorsement was forged. The bank will bear the loss, which it might have avoided if it had requested identification from Nilson.

This general rule has two important exceptions. These exceptions arise when an indorsement is made by an imposter or by a fictitious payee. We look at these two situations here.

Imposters An imposter is one who uses mail, Internet, telephone, or other means to induce a maker or drawer to issue an instrument in the name of an impersonated payee. If the maker or drawer believes the imposter to be the named payee at the time of issue, the indorsement by the imposter is not treated as unauthorized when the instrument is transferred to an innocent party. This is because the maker or drawer intended the imposter to receive the instrument. In this situation, under the UCC’s imposter rule, the imposter’s indorsement will be effective—that is, not considered a forgery—insofar as the drawer or maker is concerned [UCC 3–404(a)].

For example, suppose that Kayla impersonates Donna and induces Edward to write a check payable to the order of Donna. Kayla, continuing to impersonate Donna, negotiates the check to First National Bank. In this situation, Kayla’s signature will be considered effective, and Edward, as the drawer of the check, is liable for its amount to First National. (The state can still file criminal charges against Kayla for her conduct, of course.)

The comparative negligence standard mentioned previously also applies to situations involving imposters [UCC 3–404(d)]. Thus, if a bank fails to exercise ordinary care in cashing a check made out to an imposter, the drawer may be able to recover a portion of the loss from the bank.

Fictitious Payees When a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee who will have no interest in the instrument, the payee is referred to as a fictitious payee. A fictitious payee can be a person or firm that does not truly exist, or it may be an identifiable party that will not acquire any interest in the instrument. Under the UCC’s fictitious payee rule, the payee’s indorsement is not treated as a forgery, and an innocent holder can hold the maker or drawer liable on the instrument [UCC 3–404(b), 3–405].

Situations involving fictitious payees most often arise when (1) a dishonest employee deceives the employer into signing an instrument payable to a party with no right to receive payment on the instrument or (2) a dishonest employee or agent has the authority to issue an instrument on behalf of the employer and issues a check to a party who has no interest in the instrument.

How a Fictitious Payee Can Be Created—An

Example. Assume that Goldstar Aviation, Inc., gives its bookkeeper, Leslie Rose, general authority to issue company checks drawn on First State Bank so that Rose can pay employees’ wages and other corporate bills. Rose decides to cheat Goldstar out of $10,000 by issuing a check payable to the Del Rey Company, a supplier of aircraft parts. Rose does not intend Del Rey to receive any of the funds, nor is Del Rey entitled to the payment. Rose indorses the check in Del Rey’s name and deposits the check in an account that she opened in West National Bank in the name “Del Rey Co.” West National Bank accepts the check and collects payment from the drawee bank, First State Bank. First State Bank charges Goldstar’s account $10,000. Rose transfers $10,000 out of the Del Rey account and closes the account. Goldstar discovers the fraud and demands that the account be recredited.

Who Bears the Loss? According to the UCC’s fictitious payee rule, Rose’s indorsement in the name of a payee with no interest in the instrument is “effective,” so there is no “forgery” [UCC 3–404(b)(2)]. Under this provision, West National Bank is protected in paying on the check, and the drawee bank is protected in charging Goldstar’s account. Thus, the employer-drawer, Goldstar, will bear the loss. Of course, Goldstar has recourse against Rose, if she has not absconded with the funds. Additionally, if Goldstar can prove that West National Bank’s failure to exercise reasonable care contributed substantially to the loss, the bank may be required to bear a proportionate share of the loss under the UCC’s comparative negligence standard

[UCC 3-404(d)]. Thus, West National Bank could be liable for a portion of the loss if it failed to exercise ordinary care in its dealings with Rose.

Whether a dishonest employee actually signs the check or merely supplies his or her employer with names of fictitious creditors (or with true names of creditors having fictitious debts), the result is the same under the UCC. Assume that Dan Symes draws up the payroll list from which employees' salary checks are written. He fraudulently adds the name Penny Trip (a real person but a fictitious employee) to the payroll, thereby causing checks to be issued to her. Trip cashes the checks and shares the proceeds with Symes. Again, it is the employer-drawer who bears the loss. For a synopsis of the rules relating to signature liability, see Concept Summary 26.1.

Signature Liability

Concept	Description
PRIMARY AND SECONDARY LIABILITY	Every party (except a qualified indorser) who signs a negotiable instrument is either primarily or secondarily liable for payment of the instrument when it comes due. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Primary liability—Makers and acceptors are primarily liable [UCC 3-409, 3-412, 3-413]. 2. Secondary liability—Drawers and indorsers are secondarily liable [UCC 3-414, 3-415, 3-501, 3-502, 3-503]. Parties who are secondarily liable on an instrument promise to pay on that instrument only if the following events occur: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. The instrument is properly and timely presented. b. The instrument is dishonored. c. Timely notice of dishonor is given.
ACCOMMODATION PARTIES	An accommodation party is one who signs an instrument for the purpose of lending his or her name as credit to another party on the instrument [UCC 3-419]. Accommodation makers are primarily liable; accommodation indorsers are secondarily liable.
AGENTS' SIGNATURES	An agent is a person who agrees to represent or act for another, called the principal. Agents can sign negotiable instruments and thereby bind their principals. Liability on the instrument depends on whether the agent is authorized and on whether the agent's representative capacity and the principal's identity are both indicated on the instrument [UCC 3-401, 3-402, 3-403]. Agents need not indicate their representative capacity on checks—provided the checks clearly identify the principal and are drawn on the principal's account.
UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURES	An unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative as the signature of the person whose name is signed unless: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The person whose name is signed ratifies (affirms) it or is precluded from denying it [UCC 3-115, 3-403, 3-406, 4-401]. 2. The instrument has been negotiated to a holder in due course [UCC 3-403].
SPECIAL RULES FOR UNAUTHORIZED INDORSEMENTS	An unauthorized indorsement will not bind the maker or drawer of the instrument except in the following circumstances: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. When an imposter induces the maker or drawer of an instrument to issue it to the imposter (imposter rule) [UCC 3-404(a)]. 2. When a person causes an instrument to be issued to a payee who will have no interest in the instrument (fictitious payee rule) [UCC 3-404(b), 3-405].

Warranty Liability

In addition to the signature liability discussed in the preceding section, transferors make certain implied warranties regarding the instruments that they are negotiating. Liability under these warranties is not subject to the conditions of proper presentment, dishonor, and notice of dishonor. These warranties arise even when a transferor does not indorse the instrument (as in delivery of a bearer instrument). Warranty liability is particularly important when a holder cannot hold a party liable on her or his signature.

Warranties fall into two categories: those that arise from the transfer of a negotiable instrument and those that arise on presentment [UCC 3-416, 3-417]. Both transfer and presentment warranties attempt to shift liability back to the wrongdoer or to the person who dealt face to face with the wrongdoer and thus was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing.

Transfer Warranties

The UCC describes five transfer warranties [UCC 3-416]. For transfer warranties to arise, an instrument must be transferred for consideration. For example, Quality Products Corporation sells goods to Royal Retail Stores, Inc., and receives in payment Royal Retail's note. Quality then sells the note, for value, to Superior Finance Company. In this situation, the instrument has been transferred for consideration. One who transfers an instrument for consideration makes the following transfer warranties to all subsequent transferees and holders who take the instrument in good faith (with some exceptions, as will be noted shortly):

1. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument.
2. All signatures are authentic and authorized.
3. The instrument has not been altered.
4. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor.
5. The transferor has no knowledge of any bankruptcy proceedings against the maker, the acceptor, or the drawer of the instrument.⁸

8. A 2002 amendment to UCC 3-416(a) adds a sixth warranty: "with respect to a remotely created consumer item, that the person on whose account the item is drawn authorized the issuance of the item in the amount for which the item is drawn." UCC 3-103(16) defines a "remotely created consumer item" as an item, such as a check, drawn on a consumer account, that is not

Parties to Whom Warranty Liability Extends

The manner of transfer and the type of negotiation that are used determine how far and to whom a transfer warranty will run. Transfer of an order instrument by indorsement and delivery extends warranty liability to any subsequent holder who takes the instrument in good faith. The warranties of a person who, for consideration, transfers without indorsement (by delivery of a bearer instrument), however, will extend only to the immediate transferee [UCC 3-416(a)].

Suppose that Wylie forges Kim's name as a maker of a promissory note. The note is made payable to Wylie. Wylie indorses the note in blank, negotiates it for consideration to Bret, and then leaves the country. Bret, without indorsement, delivers the note for consideration to Fern. Fern, also without indorsement, delivers the note for consideration to Rick. On Rick's presentment of the note to Kim, the forgery is discovered. Rick can hold Fern (the immediate transferor) liable for breach of the warranty that all signatures are genuine. Rick cannot hold Bret liable because Bret is not Rick's immediate transferor; rather, Bret is a prior nonindorsing transferor.

Note that if Wylie had added a special indorsement ("Payable to Bret") instead of a blank indorsement, the instrument would have remained an order instrument. In that situation, Bret would have had to indorse the instrument to negotiate it to Fern, and his transfer warranties would extend to all subsequent holders, including Rick. This example shows the importance of the distinction between transfer by indorsement and delivery (of an order instrument) and transfer by delivery only, without indorsement (of a bearer instrument). For a synopsis of the rules on transfer warranty liability, see Concept Summary 26.2.

Recovery for Breach of Warranty A transferee or holder who takes an instrument in good faith can sue on the basis of breach of a warranty as soon as he or she has reason to know of the breach [UCC 3-416(d)]. Notice of a claim for breach of warranty must be given to the warrantor within thirty days after created by the payor bank and does not contain the drawer's handwritten signature. Suppose that a telemarketer submits an instrument to a bank for payment, claiming that the consumer on whose account the instrument purports to be drawn authorized it over the phone. Under this amendment, a bank that accepts and pays the instrument warrants to the next bank in the collection chain that the consumer authorized the item in that amount.

Transfer Warranty Liability for Transferors Who Receive Consideration

Transferors

INDORSERS WHO RECEIVE CONSIDERATION

Transferees to Whom Warranties Extend If Consideration Is Received

Five transfer warranties extend to all subsequent holders:

1. The transferor is entitled to enforce the instrument.
2. All signatures are authentic and authorized.
3. The instrument has not been altered.
4. The instrument is not subject to a defense or claim of any party that can be asserted against the transferor.
5. The transferor has no knowledge of insolvency proceedings against the maker, acceptor, or drawer of the instrument.

NONINDORSERS WHO RECEIVE CONSIDERATION

Same as for indorsers, but warranties extend only to the immediate transferee.

the transferee or holder has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, or the warrantor is not liable for any loss caused by a delay [UCC 3-416(c)]. The transferee or holder can recover damages for the breach in an amount equal to the loss suffered (but not more than the amount of the instrument), plus expenses and any loss of interest caused by the breach [UCC 3-416(b)].

These warranties can be disclaimed with respect to any instrument except a check [UCC 3-416(c)]. In the check-collection process, banks rely on these warranties. For all other instruments, the immediate parties can agree to a disclaimer, and an indorser can disclaim by including in the indorsement such words as “without warranties.”

Presentment Warranties

Any person who presents an instrument for payment or acceptance makes the following presentment warranties to any other person who in good faith pays or accepts the instrument [UCC 3-417(a), (d)]:

1. The person obtaining payment or acceptance is entitled to enforce the instrument or is authorized to obtain payment or acceptance on behalf of a person who is entitled to enforce the instrument. (This is, in effect, a warranty that there are no missing or unauthorized indorsements.)
2. The instrument has not been altered.

3. The person obtaining payment or acceptance has no knowledge that the signature of the drawer of the instrument is unauthorized.⁹

These warranties are referred to as presentment warranties because they protect the person to whom the instrument is presented. The second and third warranties do not apply in certain circumstances (to certain parties). It is assumed, for example, that a drawer will recognize her or his own signature and that a maker or an acceptor will recognize whether an instrument has been materially altered.

Presentment warranties cannot be disclaimed with respect to checks, and a claim for breach must be given to the warrantor within thirty days after the claimant knows or has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, or the warrantor is not liable for any loss caused by a delay [UCC 3-417(e)].

How should these warranties apply when two banks dispute whether a check was altered and its paper copy has been destroyed, leaving only its digital image? That was the question in the following case.

⁹ As discussed in footnote 8, the 2002 amendments to Article 3 of the UCC provide additional protection for “remotely created” consumer items, such as a check drawn on a personal account that the account holder authorized over the phone but did not physically sign.

CASE 26.1 Wachovia Bank, N.A. v. Foster Bancshares, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, 2006. 457 F.3d 619.

• Background and Facts Sunjin Choi deposited in her account at Foster Bank in Chicago, Illinois, a check for $133,026, on which she appeared to be the payee. The check was drawn on the account of MediaEdge, LLC, at Wachovia Bank, N.A., in Charlotte, North Carolina. Foster presented the check to Wachovia, which paid it and debited MediaEdge's account. Wachovia then made a digital copy of the check and destroyed the paper copy. The payee of the check as originally issued was not Choi, however, but CMP Media, Inc. Before MediaEdge learned that CMP had not received the check, Choi withdrew the funds from her account and disappeared. MediaEdge asked Wachovia to recredit its account. Wachovia filed a suit in a federal district court against Foster, seeking the amount of the check on the basis of the presentment warranty that an instrument has not been altered. The court issued a summary judgment in Wachovia's favor. Foster appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. Because only the digital copy of the check existed and there was no way to determine from it whether the paper copy had been altered, Foster argued that it should be assumed that the check was forged. Under that assumption, Wachovia, not Foster, would be liable for the loss. (Liability on a forged check will be discussed in detail in Chapter 27.)

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT POSNER, Circuit Judge.

The bank argues that Wachovia, because it cannot produce the paper check, cannot prove that the check was altered. For all we know, rather than the check being "altered" in the usual sense, Choi used sophisticated copying technology to produce a copy that was identical in every respect to the original check * * * except for an undetectable change of the payee's name. Had the original paper check not been destroyed, it could be examined and the examination might reveal whether the check had been forged * * * or the payee's name had been changed by * * * some * * * method that utilized rather than replaced the original check.

The bank on which a check is drawn (Wachovia in this case) warrants to the presenting bank that the check is genuine, hence not forged, while as we know the presenting bank warrants that the check hasn't been altered since its issuance. When checks were inspected by hand, when copying technology was primitive, and when cancelled checks were stored rather than digitized copies alone retained, this allocation of liability was consistent with the sensible economic principle that the duty to avoid a loss should be placed on the party that can prevent the loss at lower cost. * * * [Either party would have been] in as good a position as [the other] to spot an alteration on the check. [Emphasis added.]

But this last point assumes that a payee's name would be altered in the old-fashioned way, by whitening out or otherwise physically effacing the name on the paper check. If Choi created a new check, there would be no physical alteration to alert Foster when she deposited the check with the bank. That is why Foster complains that Wachovia's failure to retain the paper check prevents determining how the "alteration" was effected—more precisely, whether it is a case of alteration or of forgery. * * *

So the case comes down to whether, in cases of doubt, forgery should be assumed or alteration should be assumed. If the former, Foster wins, and if the latter, Wachovia. It seems to us that the tie should go to the drawer bank, Wachovia. Changing the payee's name is the classic alteration. It can with modern technology be effected by forging a check rather than by altering an original check, but since this is a novel method, the presenting bank must do more than merely assert the possibility of it. Granted, it is the duty of the drawee bank to take reasonable measures to prevent the forging of its checks, as by marking them in a way that a forger could not discover and therefore duplicate. But Foster has made no effort to show that retention of mountains of paper checks—which would be necessary to determine whether the original check had such a marking—would be a reasonable method of determining whether the drawee bank or the presenting bank should be liable for the loss.

Nor did Foster make any effort to show * * * that duplication of the entire check (that is, forgery of the check deposited with the presenting bank), rather than just physical alteration of the payee's name on the original check, has become a common method of bank fraud. Nor did it try to show that banks have, as they are allowed to do, been contracting around the provisions of the UCC relating to the warranties of drawee and presenting banks in cases such as this. Nor did it try to show what Choi's modus operandi was, assuming that she had stolen money in this way on other occasions, though such evidence may of course have been unobtainable.

Even if Foster had shown that forgery of the entire check has become a routine method of altering the payee's name, we would not adopt the rule for which it contends * * *. The question of which bank was, in the language of economic analysis of law, the "cheaper cost avoider" would still be open. * * * A depository bank can sometimes discover an alteration of the payee's name even when there is no physical alteration in the check presented to the bank for deposit. The size of the check may be a warning flag that induces the bank to delay making funds deposited by the check available for withdrawal. The check that Choi deposited with Foster was for a hefty $133,000, and there is no evidence that Choi had previously deposited large checks. We do not suggest that Foster was careless in deciding to make the money available for withdrawal when it did. But the uncertainties that the bank has made no effort to dispel counsel against adopting the legal change that it urges. Reform if needed in the light of modern copying technology should be left to the [National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws] rather than [be] engineered by a federal court * * * .

• Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment. If the payee of a check presented for payment is not the payee of the check as it was originally issued, it should not be assumed that the entire check is a forgery.

• The E-Commerce Dimension How might the principles in this case have been applied if there had never been a paper copy of the check—if, for example, Choi's deposit and withdrawal of funds had occurred entirely online?

• The Legal Environment Dimension What is the practical basis for the warranty that a check presented for payment has not been altered since its issuance? (Hint: Presentment warranties often shift liability back to the party that was in the best position to prevent the wrongdoing.)

Defenses

Depending on whether a holder or a holder in due course (HDC)—or a holder through an HDC—makes the demand for payment, certain defenses can bar collection from persons who would otherwise be liable on an instrument. There are two general categories of defenses—universal defenses and personal defenses, which are discussed below and summarized in Exhibit 26–2 on the following page.

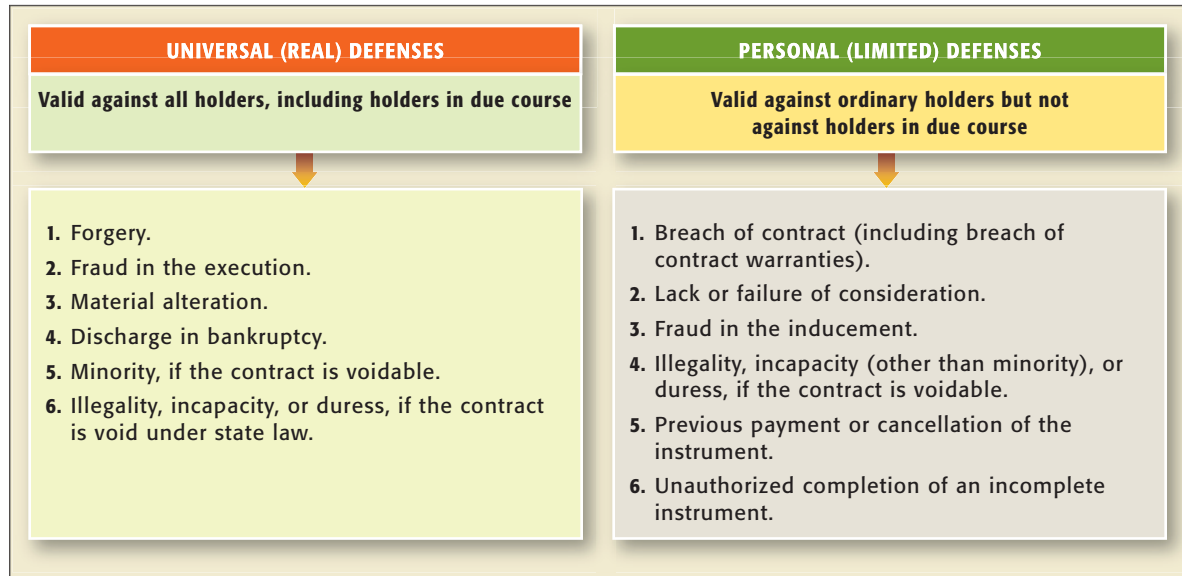

Universal Defenses

Universal defenses (also called real defenses) are valid against all holders, including HDCs and holders through HDCs. Universal defenses include those described in the following subsections.

Forgery Forgery of a maker's or drawer's signature cannot bind the person whose name is used unless that person ratifies (approves or validates) the signature or is precluded from denying it (because the forgery was made possible by the maker's or drawer's negligence, for example) [UCC 3–401(a), 3–403(a)]. Thus, when a person forges an instrument, the person whose name is forged has no liability to pay any holder or any HDC the value of the forged instrument.

Fraud in the Execution If a person is deceived into signing a negotiable instrument, believing that she or he is signing something other than a negotiable instrument (such as a receipt), fraud in the execution (or inception) is committed against the signer [UCC 3–305(a)(1)(iii)]. For example, Gerard, a salesperson, asks Javier, a customer, to sign a paper, which Gerard says is a receipt for the delivery of goods that Javier is picking up from the store. In fact, the paper is a promissory note, but Javier is unfamiliar with the English language and does not realize this. In this situation, even if the note is negotiated to an HDC, Javier has a valid defense against payment.

This defense cannot be raised, however, if a reasonable inquiry would have revealed the nature and terms of the instrument. Thus, the signer's age, experience, and intelligence are relevant because they frequently determine whether the signer should have understood the nature of the transaction before signing.

Material Alteration An alteration is material if it changes the contract terms between two parties in any way. Examples of material alterations include completing an instrument, adding words or numbers, or making any other unauthorized change that relates to a party's obligation [UCC 3-407(a)]. Any change in the amount, the date, or the rate of interest—even if the change is only one penny, one day, or 1 percent—is material. It is not a material alteration, however, to correct the maker's address, to draw a red line across the instrument to indicate that an auditor has checked it, or to correct the total final payment due when a mathematical error is discovered in the original computation. If the alteration is not material, any holder is entitled to enforce the instrument according to its original terms.

Material alteration is a complete defense against an ordinary holder but only a partial defense against an HDC. An ordinary holder can recover nothing on an instrument that has been materially altered [UCC 3-407(b)]. In contrast, when the holder is an HDC and an original term, such as the monetary amount payable, has been altered, the HDC can enforce the instrument against the maker or drawer according to the original terms but not for the altered amount [UCC 3-407(c)(i)]. If the instrument was originally incomplete and was later completed in an unauthorized manner, alteration can no longer be claimed as a defense against an HDC, and the HDC can enforce the instrument as completed [UCC 3-407(b), (c)]. This is because a drawer or maker who has issued an incomplete instrument normally will be held responsible for such an alteration, which could have been avoided by the exercise of greater care. If the alteration is readily apparent (such as a number changed on the face of a check), then obviously the holder has notice of some defect or defense and therefore cannot be an HDC [UCC 3-302(a)(1), (2)(iv)].

Is a note that allows for an extension of the time for payment materially altered when, on its expiration, its maker and payee execute a second note that the payee insists is only an extension of the time for payment but that in reality increases the balance due? That was the question in the following case.

EXTENDED Keesling v. T.E.K. Partners, LLC
C A S E 26.2 Indiana Court of Appeals, 2007. 861 N.E.2d 1246.

NAJAM, Judge.

* * * *

In January 1998, Heritage Land [Company] and M.G. Financial [Services of Indiana, Inc.,] formed Heritage/M.G. [, LLC.] for the purpose of developing a residential neighborhood known as Ironwood Estates in Delaware County [, Indiana]. On May 25, 1999, Heritage/M.G. executed * * * [a] note to Peoples Bank and Trust Company, custodian for the James Henke, I.R.A. (“Henke I.R.A.”), in the amount of $300,000 to partially finance the development. The final installment under the note was due June 1, 2001. [The note authorized an extension of the time for payment.] The signatories [included Thomas McMullen, on behalf of Heritage/M.G., and Larry and Vivian Keesling.] * * *

Heritage/M.G. did not complete the payments under the original note by the June 2001 deadline. On January 3, 2002, the balance due on the note was $48,228.69. * * *

Then, on May 24, 2002, * * * without the knowledge or consent of the Keeslings * * *, Heritage/M.G. executed [a] second note to the Henke I.R.A. in the amount of $102,000. * * * No payments were ever made on the second note.

Accordingly, on September 2, 2004, 1st National Bank and Trust Company, [which had succeeded Peoples Bank] as custodian for the Henke I.R.A., filed * * * [a complaint in an Indiana state court] against the Keeslings [and others]. On October 25, 2004, the Henke I.R.A. assigned * * * both the original note and the second note to T.E.K. [Partners, LLC] * * *. On November 19, 2004, the trial court entered an order substituting T.E.K. for 1st National Bank as plaintiff. Following a * * * trial, the trial court * * * concluded in relevant part that * * * T.E.K. is entitled to judgment * * * in the sum of $365,905.07 plus $10,000 in attorney fees, for a total judgment of $375,905.07. * * * The Keeslings * * * bring this appeal [to a state intermediate appellate court].

In sum, the Keeslings * * * contend that because they were accommodation parties on the original note, and the second note constitutes a material alteration of the original note, they are discharged from further personal liability under the original note, and they have no liability under the second note.

* * * *A guaranty is * * * a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person. It is an agreement collateral to the debt itself and represents a conditional promise whereby the guarantor promises to pay only if the principal debtor fails to pay.* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Under Indiana common-law principles, when parties cause a material alteration of an underlying obligation without the consent of the guarantor, the guarantor is discharged from further liability * * *. A material alteration which will effect a discharge of the guarantor must be a change which alters the legal identity of the principal’s contract, substantially increases the risk of loss to the guarantor, or places the guarantor in a different position. The change must be binding. [Emphasis added.]

Here, Heritage/M.G. is the principal obligor. The Keeslings are guarantors on the original note payable to the Henke I.R.A., which was the original obligee. As guarantors, the Keeslings are accommodation parties.

* * * *

The original note was past due. * * * T.E.K. maintains that the second note merely extended the time for payment of the original note, as authorized by that note, and did not constitute a material alteration of the original obligation. The trial court agreed, finding that the second note for $102,000 was merely given “to evidence the current amount of monies then due and owing” under the original note “and extend the due date for payment” of the original note. Those findings are clearly erroneous.

* * * The evidence shows that * * * on May 24, 2002, * * * McMullen, on behalf of Heritage/M.G., executed the second note for $102,000 payable to the Henke I.R.A. * * * . McMullen, who signed both notes, testified that the “difference [between $48,228.69 and $102,000] was used to pay vendors,” as well as to pay “interest and stuff.”

The evidence clearly shows that the second note did not merely extend the time of payment on the “current amount of monies then due and owing” on the original note. Instead, the facts demonstrate that the second note included additional money to “pay the bills.” * * *

The second note also capitalized interest due on the original note, that is, it converted interest due on the original note to principal in the second note. The capitalization of interest meant that the contract interest rate of 12% and the default interest rate of 24% would be charged against the interest added to the second note, thereby compounding the payment of interest and the effective interest rate. In itself, this capitalization of interest was a material alteration.

Thus, the second note not only added new debt but increased the total principal draws beyond the $300,000 face amount of the original note. [James] Henke testified that under the original note, his I.R.A. was committed to advance “up to $300,000” for the project. The Henke I.R.A. advanced two $130,000 draws to Heritage/M.G. under the original note, for a total of $260,000. But the second note of $102,000 brought total draws to $362,000 * * * which was $62,000 more in draws than the original note authorized.

* * * [T]he original note was an unambiguous “promise to pay * * * the sum of $300,000.” The note contains a promise to pay a sum certain and does not provide for total draws greater than that sum. The original note was not a revolving line of credit. The accommodation parties assumed the risk of a $300,000 loan, not some multiple of $300,000.

* * *

In sum, the second note constitutes a material alteration of the original obligation. As such, the Keeslings * * * are discharged from their personal liability on the original note, and they have no liability for the additional sums advanced under the second note, which they did not sign. We reverse the trial court’s judgment [against the Keeslings] * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. If the court had affirmed the judgment in favor of T.E.K., against whom might the Keeslings have had a right of recourse?
2. What might the parties who executed the second note have done at the time to avoid the outcome in this case?

Discharge in Bankruptcy Discharge in bankruptcy (see Chapter 30) is an absolute defense on any instrument regardless of the status of the holder [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(iv)]. This defense exists because the purpose of bankruptcy is to finally settle all of the insolvent party’s debts.

Minority Minority, or infancy, is a universal defense only to the extent that state law recognizes it as a defense to a simple contract. Because state laws on minority vary, so do determinations of whether minority is a universal defense against an HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(i)]. (See Chapter 13 for further discussion of the contractual liability of minors.)

Illegality Certain types of illegality constitute universal defenses, whereas others are personal defenses. If a statute provides that an illegal transaction is void, then the defense is universal—that is, absolute against both an ordinary holder and an HDC. If the law merely makes the instrument voidable, then the illegality is a personal defense against an ordinary holder, but not against an HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. Note that courts sometimes treat the word void in a statute as meaning voidable to protect an HDC.

Mental Incapacity If a court has declared a person to be mentally incompetent, then any instrument issued by that person is void. The instrument is void ab initio (from the beginning) and unenforceable by any holder or HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. Mental incapacity in these circumstances is a universal defense. If a court has not declared a person to be mentally incompetent, then mental incapacity operates as a personal defense against ordinary holders but not HDCs.

Extreme Duress When a person signs and issues a negotiable instrument under such extreme duress as an immediate threat of force or violence (for example, at gunpoint), the instrument is void and unenforceable by any holder or HDC [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. (Ordinary duress is a personal, rather than a universal, defense.)

Personal Defenses

Personal defenses, such as those described next, are used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder of a negotiable instrument, but not to an HDC or a holder through an HDC.

Breach of Contract or Breach of Warranty

When there is a breach of the underlying contract for which the negotiable instrument was issued, the maker of a note can refuse to pay it, or the drawer of a check can stop payment. Breach of warranty can also be claimed as a defense to liability on the instrument.

For example, Elias purchases two dozen pairs of athletic shoes from De Soto. The shoes are to be delivered in six weeks. Elias gives De Soto a promissory note for $1,000, which is the price of the shoes. The shoes arrive, but many of them are stained, and the soles of several pairs are coming apart. Elias has a defense to liability on the note on the basis of breach of contract and breach of warranty. (Recall from Chapter 23 that a seller impliedly promises that the goods being sold are at least merchantable.) If, however, the note is no longer in the hands of the payee-seller (De Soto) but is presented for payment by an HDC, the maker-buyer (Elias) will not be able to plead breach of contract or warranty as a defense against liability on the note.

Lack or Failure of Consideration The absence of consideration may be a successful defense in some instances [UCC 3-303(b), 3-305(a)(2)]. For example, Tony gives Cleo, as a gift, a note that states, "I promise to pay you $100,000," and Cleo accepts the note. No consideration is given in return for Tony's promise, and a court will not enforce the promise.

Similarly, if delivery of goods becomes impossible, a party who has issued a draft or note under the contract has a defense for not paying it. Thus, in the hypothetical athletic-shoe transaction described previously, if delivery of the shoes became impossible due to their loss in an accident, De Soto could not subsequently enforce Elias's promise to pay the $1,000 promissory note. If the note was in the hands of an HDC, however, Elias's defense would not be available against the HDC.

Fraud in the Inducement (Ordinary Fraud)

A person who issues a negotiable instrument based on false statements by the other party will be able to avoid payment on that instrument, unless the holder is an HDC. To illustrate: Gerhard agrees to purchase Carla's used tractor for $26,500. Carla, knowing her statements to be false, tells Gerhard that the tractor is in good working order and that it has been used for only one harvest. In addition, she tells Gerhard that she owns the tractor free and clear of all claims. Gerhard pays Carla $4,500 in cash and issues a negotiable promissory note for the balance. As it turns out, Carla still owes the original seller $10,000 on the purchase of the tractor, and the tractor is subject to a valid security interest (discussed in Chapter 29). In addition, the tractor is three years old and has been used in three harvests.

In this situation, Gerhard can refuse to pay the note if it is held by an ordinary holder. If, however, Carla has negotiated the note to an HDC, Gerhard must pay the HDC. Of course, Gerhard can then sue Carla to recover the funds.

Illegality As mentioned, if a statute provides that an illegal transaction is void, a universal defense exists. If, however, the statute provides that an illegal transaction is voidable, the defense is personal. For example, a state may make gambling contracts illegal and void but be silent on the payment of gambling debts. Thus, an instrument given in payment of a gambling debt becomes voidable and is a personal defense.

Mental Incapacity As mentioned, if a maker or drawer has been declared by a court to be mentally incompetent, mental incapacity is a universal defense [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)]. If a maker or drawer issues a negotiable instrument while mentally incompetent but before a formal court hearing has declared him or her to be so, however, the instrument is voidable. In this situation, mental incapacity can serve only as a personal defense.

Other Personal Defenses A number of other personal defenses can be used to avoid payment to an ordinary holder, but not an HDC, of a negotiable instrument, including the following:

1. Discharge by payment or cancellation [UCC 3-601(b), 3-602(a), 3-603, 3-604].
2. Unauthorized completion of an incomplete instrument [UCC 3-115, 3-302, 3-407, 4-401(d)(2)].
3. Nondelivery of the instrument [UCC 1-201(14), 3-105(b), 3-305(a)(2)].
4. Ordinary duress or undue influence rendering the contract voidable [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(ii)].

Federal Limitations on HDC Rights

The federal government limits HDC rights in certain circumstances because the HDC doctrine sometimes has harsh effects on consumers. Consider an example. A consumer purchases a used car under an express warranty from an automobile dealer. The consumer pays $5,000 down and signs a promissory note to the dealer for the remaining $10,000 due on the car. The dealer sells the bank this promissory note, which is a negotiable instrument, and the bank then becomes the creditor, to whom the consumer makes payments.

The car, however, does not perform as warranted. The consumer returns the car and requests a refund of the down payment and cancellation of the contract. Even if the dealer refunds the $5,000, however, under the traditional HDC rule, the consumer would normally still owe the remaining $10,000 because the consumer's claim of breach of warranty is a personal defense and the bank is an HDC.

Thus, the traditional HDC rule leaves consumers who have purchased defective products liable to HDCs. To protect consumers, in 1976 the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) issued Rule 433,¹⁰ which effectively abolished the HDC doctrine in consumer credit transactions.

Requirements of FTC Rule 433 FTC Rule 433, entitled "Preservation of Consumers' Claims and Defenses," limits an HDC's rights in an instrument that evidences a debt arising out of a consumer credit transaction. The rule attempts to prevent a consumer from being required to make payment for a defective product to a third party (the bank, in the previous example) who is an HDC of a promissory note that

FTC Rule 433 applies to any seller of goods or services who takes or receives a consumer credit contract. The rule also applies to a seller who accepts as full or partial payment for a sale the proceeds of any purchase-money loan¹¹ made in connection with any consumer credit contract. Under this rule, these parties must include in the consumer credit contract the following provision:

NOTICE

ANY HOLDER OF THIS CONSUMER CREDIT CONTRACT IS SUBJECT TO ALL CLAIMS AND DEFENSES WHICH THE DEBTOR COULD ASSERT AGAINST THE SELLER OF GOODS OR SERVICES OBTAINED PURSUANT HERETO OR WITH THE PROCEEDS HEREOF RECOVERY HEREUNDER BY THE DEBTOR SHALL NOT EXCEED AMOUNTS PAID BY THE DEBTOR HEREUNDER.

Effect of the Rule FTC Rule 433 allows a consumer who is a party to a consumer credit transaction to bring any defense she or he has against the seller of a product against a subsequent holder as well. In essence, the rule places an HDC of the instrument in the position of a contract assignee. The rule makes the buyer's duty to pay conditional on the seller's full performance of the contract. Both the seller and the creditor are responsible for the seller's misconduct. The rule also clearly reduces the degree of transferability of negotiable instruments resulting from consumer credit contracts. An instrument that contains this notice or a similar statement required by law may remain negotiable, but there cannot be an HDC of such an instrument [UCC 3-106(d)].

What if the seller does not include the notice in a promissory note and then sells the note to a third party, such as a bank? Although the seller has violated the rule, the bank has not. Because the FTC rule does not prohibit third parties from purchasing notes or credit contracts that do not contain the required rule, the third party does not become subject to the buyer's defenses against the seller. Thus, some consumers remain unprotected by the FTC rule.¹²

11. A purchase-money loan is one in which a seller or lessor advances funds to a buyer or lessee through a credit contract to purchase or lease the goods, as will be discussed in Chapter 29.

12. Under a 2002 amendment to UCC 3-305(e), a third party holder in possession of a note or other instrument that is required to include this notice would be subject to a buyer's defenses against a seller even if the instrument did not include the notice.

Discharge

Discharge from liability on an instrument can occur in several ways, including by payment, by cancellation, and, as previously discussed, by material alteration. Discharge can also occur if a party reacquires an instrument, if a holder impairs another party's right of recourse, or if a holder surrenders collateral without consent.

Discharge by Payment or Tender of Payment

All parties to a negotiable instrument will be discharged when the party primarily liable on it pays to a holder the amount due in full [UCC 3-602, 3-603].¹³ The liability of all parties is also discharged if the drawee of an unaccepted draft or check makes payment in good faith to the holder. Payment by any other party (for example, an indorser) discharges only the liability of that party and subsequent parties. The party making such a payment still has the right to recover on the instrument from any prior parties.¹⁴

A party will not be discharged when paying in bad faith to a holder who acquired the instrument by theft or who obtained the instrument from someone else who acquired it by theft (unless, of course, the person has the rights of an HDC) [UCC 3-602(b)(2)].

If a tender of payment is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument and the tender is refused, indorsers and accommodation parties with a right of recourse against the party making the tender are discharged to the extent of the amount of the tender

13. This is true even if the payment is made with knowledge of a claim to the instrument by another person unless the payor knows that "payment is prohibited by injunction or similar process of a court of competent jurisdiction" or, in most situations, "the party making payment accepted, from a person having a claim to the instrument, indemnity against loss resulting from refusal to pay the person entitled to enforce the instrument" [UCC 3-602(a), (b)(1)].

14. Under the 2002 amendment to UCC 3-602(b), when a party entitled to enforce an instrument transfers it without giving notice to the parties obligated to pay it, and one of those parties pays the transferor, that payment is effective. For example, suppose that Roberto borrows $5,000 from Consumer Finance Company on a note payable to the lender. Consumer Finance transfers the note to Delta Investment Corporation but continues to collect payments from Roberto. Under this amendment, those payments effectively discharge Roberto to the extent of their amount.

[UCC 3-603(b)]. If a tender of payment of an amount due on an instrument is made to a person entitled to enforce the instrument, the obligor's obligation to pay interest after the due date on the amount tendered is discharged [UCC 3-603(c)].

Discharge by Cancellation or Surrender

Intentional cancellation of an instrument discharges the liability of all parties [UCC 3-604]. Intentionally writing "Paid" across the face of an instrument cancels it. Intentionally tearing up an instrument cancels it. If a holder intentionally crosses out a party's signature, that party's liability and the liability of subsequent indorsers who have already indorsed the instrument are discharged. Materially altering an instrument may discharge the liability of all parties, as previously discussed [UCC 3-407(b)]. (An HDC may be able to enforce a materially altered instrument against its maker or drawer according to the instrument's original terms, however.)

Destruction or mutilation of a negotiable instrument is considered cancellation only if it is done with the intention of eliminating obligation on the instrument [UCC 3-604(a)(i)]. Thus, if destruction or mutilation occurs by accident, the instrument is not discharged, and the original terms can be established by parol evidence [UCC 3-309]. A note's holder may also discharge the obligation by surrendering the note to the person to be discharged [UCC 3-604(a)(i)].

Discharge by Reacquisition

A person who reacquires an instrument that he or she held previously discharges all intervening indorsers against subsequent holders who do not qualify as HDCs [UCC 3-207]. Of course, the person reacquiring the instrument may be liable to subsequent holders if the instrument is dishonored.

Discharge by Impairment of Recourse

Discharge can also occur when a party's right of recourse is impaired [UCC 3-605]. A right of recourse is a right to seek reimbursement. Ordinarily, when a holder collects the amount of an instrument from an indorser, the indorser has a right of recourse against prior indorsers, the maker or drawer, and accommodation parties. If the holder has adversely affected the indorser's right to seek reimbursement from these other parties, however, the indorser is not liable on the instrument (to the extent that the indorser's right of recourse is impaired). This occurs when, for example, the holder releases or agrees not to sue a party against whom the indorser has a right of recourse. It also occurs when a holder agrees to an extension of the instrument's due date or to some other material modification that results in a loss to the indorser with respect to the right of recourse [UCC 3-605(c), (d)].¹⁵

Discharge by Impairment of Collateral

Sometimes, a party to an instrument gives collateral as security that her or his performance will occur. When a holder "impairs the value" of that collateral without the consent of the parties who would benefit from the collateral in the event of nonpayment, those parties to the instrument are discharged to the extent of the impairment [UCC 3-605(e), (f)].

For example, suppose that Jerome and Myra sign a note as co-makers, putting up Jerome's property as collateral. The note is payable to Montessa. Montessa is required by law to file a financing statement with the state to put others on notice of her interest in Jerome's property as collateral for the note. If Montessa fails to file the statement and Jerome goes through bankruptcy—which results in his property's being sold to pay other debts and leaves him unable to pay anything on the note—Montessa has impaired the value of the collateral to Myra, who is discharged to the extent of that impairment.

In other words, when Jerome goes through bankruptcy, Montessa's earlier failure to file the statement prevents her from taking possession of the collateral, selling it, and crediting the amount owed on the note. Myra, as co-maker, is then responsible only for any remaining indebtedness, instead of the entire unpaid balance. Thus, Myra is discharged to the extent that the proceeds from the sale of the collateral would have discharged her liability on the note.

15. The 2002 amendments to UCC 3-605 essentially apply the principles of suretyship and guaranty (to be discussed in Chapter 28) to circumstances that involve the impairment of the right of recourse of "secondary obligors," which include indorsers and accommodation parties. One important difference from the principles of suretyship and guaranty, however, is that under amended UCC 3-605(a), the release of a principal obligor by a person entitled to enforce a check grants a complete discharge to an indorser of the check without requiring proof of harm.

REVIEWING Liability, Defenses, and Discharge

Nancy Mahar was the office manager at Golden Years Nursing Home, Inc. She was given a signature stamp to issue checks to the nursing home's employees for up to $100 as advances on their pay. The checks were drawn on Golden Years' account at First National Bank. Over a seven-year period, Mahar wrote a number of checks to employees exclusively for the purpose of embezzling funds for herself. She forged the employees' indorsements on the checks, signed her name as a second indorser, and deposited the checks in her personal account at Star Bank. The employees whose names were on the checks never actually requested them. When the scheme was uncovered, Golden Years filed a suit against Mahar, Star Bank, and others to recover the funds. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. With regard to signature liability, which provision of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) discussed in this chapter applies to this scenario?
2. What is the rule set forth by that provision?
3. Under the UCC, which party, Golden Years or Star Bank, must bear the loss in this situation? Why?
4. Based on these facts, describe any transfer or presentment warranties that Mahar may have violated.

26-1. What are the exceptions to the rule that a bank will be liable for paying a check over an unauthorized indorsement?

26-2. Waldo makes out a negotiable promissory note payable to the order of Grace. Grace indorses the note by writing on it “Without recourse, Grace” and transfers the note for value to Adam. Adam, in need of cash, negotiates the note to Keith by indorsing it with the words “Pay to Keith, Adam.” On the due date, Keith presents the note to Waldo for payment, only to learn that Waldo has filed for bankruptcy and will have all debts (including the note) discharged. Discuss fully whether Keith can hold Waldo, Grace, or Adam liable on the note.

26-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Niles sold Kennedy a small motorboat for $1,500, maintaining to Kennedy that the boat was in excellent condition. Kennedy gave Niles a check for $1,500, which Niles indorsed and gave to Frazier for value. When Kennedy took the boat for a trial run, she discovered that the boat leaked, needed to be painted, and required a new motor. Kennedy stopped payment on her check, which had not yet been cashed. Niles has disappeared. Can Frazier recover from Kennedy as a holder in due course? Discuss.

- For a sample answer to Question 26-3, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

26-4. Williams purchased a used car from Stein for $1,000. Williams paid for the car with a check (written in pencil) payable to Stein for $1,000. Stein, through careful erasures and alterations, changed the amount on the check to read $10,000 and negotiated the check to Boz. Boz took the check for value, in good faith, and without notice of the alteration and thus met the Uniform Commercial Code’s requirements for the status of a holder in due course. Can Williams successfully raise the universal (real) defense of material alteration to avoid payment on the check? Explain.

26-5. Gil makes out a $900 negotiable promissory note payable to Ben. By special indorsement, Ben transfers the note for value to Jess. By blank indorsement, Jess transfers the note for value to Pam. By special indorsement, Pam transfers the note for value to Adrien. In need of cash, Adrien transfers the instrument for value by blank indorsement back to Jess. When told that Ben has left the country, Jess strikes out Ben’s indorsement. Later she learns that Ben is a wealthy restaurant owner in Baltimore and that Gil is financially unable to pay the note. Jess contends that, as a holder in due course, she can hold Ben, Pam, or Adrien liable on the note. Discuss fully Jess’s contentions.

26-6. Unauthorized Indorsements. Telemedia Publications, Inc., publishes Cablecast magazine, a weekly guide to the listings of the cable television programming in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Cablecast hired Jennifer Pennington as a temporary employee. Pennington’s duties included indorsing subscription checks received in the mail with the Cablecast deposit stamp, preparing the deposit slip, and taking the checks to be deposited to City National Bank. John McGregor, the manager of Cablecast, soon noticed shortages in revenues coming into Cablecast. When he learned that Pennington had taken checks payable to Cablecast and deposited them into her personal account at Premier Bank, N.A., he confronted her. She admitted to taking $7,913.04 in Cablecast checks. Cablecast filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Premier Bank. The bank responded in part that Cablecast was solely responsible for losses caused by the fraudulent indorsements of its employees. At trial, Cablecast failed to prove that Premier Bank had not acted in good faith or that it had not exercised ordinary care in its handling of the checks. What rule should the court apply here? Why? [Cablecast Magazine v. Premier Bank, N.A., 729 So.2d 1165 (La.App. 1 Cir. 1999)]

26-7. Agents’ Signatures. Robert Helmer and Percy Helmer, Jr., were authorized signatories on the corporate checking account of Event Marketing, Inc. The Helmers signed a check drawn on Event Marketing’s account and issued to Rumarson Technologies, Inc. (RTI), in the amount of $24,965. The check was signed on July 13, 1998, but dated August 14. When RTI presented the check for payment, it was dishonored due to insufficient funds. RTI filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the Helmers to collect the amount of the check. Claiming that the Helmers were personally liable on Event Marketing's check, RTI filed a motion for summary judgment. Can an authorized signatory on a corporate account be held personally liable for corporate checks returned for insufficient funds? Are the Helmers liable in this case? Discuss. [Helmer v. Rumarson Technologies, Inc., 245 Ga.App. 598, 538 S.E.2d 504 (2000)]

26-8. Defenses. On September 13, 1979, Barbara Shearer and Barbara Couvion signed a note for $22,500, with interest at 11 percent, payable in monthly installments of $232.25 to Edgar House and Paul Cook. House and Cook assigned the note to Southside Bank in Kansas City, Missouri. In 1997, the note was assigned to Midstates Resources Corp., which assigned the note to The Cadle Co. in 2000. According to the payment history that Midstates gave to Cadle, the interest rate on the note was 12 percent. A Cadle employee noticed the discrepancy and recalculated the payments at 11 percent. When Shearer and Couvion refused to make further payments on the note, Cadle filed a suit in a Missouri state court against them to collect. Couvion and Shearer responded that they had made timely payments on the note, that Cadle and the previous holders had failed to accurately apply the payments to the reduction of principal and interest, and that the note "is either paid in full and satisfied or very close to being paid in full and satisfied." Is the makers' answer sufficient to support a verdict in their favor? If so, on what ground? If not, why not? [The Cadle Co. v. Shearer, 69 S.W.3d 122 (Mo.App.W.D. 2002)]

Ameripay, LLC, is a payroll services company that, among other things, issues payroll checks to the employees of its clients. In July 2002, Nu Tribe Radio Networks, Inc. (NTRN), based in New York City, hired Ameripay. Under their agreement, Ameripay set up an account on NTRN's behalf at Commerce Bank. NTRN agreed to deposit funds in the account to cover its payroll obligations. Arthur Piacentini, an owner of Ameripay, was an authorized signatory on the account. On the checks, NTRN was the only identified company, and Piacentini's signature appeared without indicating his status. At the end of the month, four NTRN employees cashed their payroll checks, which Piacentini had signed, at A-1 Check Cashing Emporium, Inc. The checks were returned dishonored. Ameripay had stopped their payment because it had not received the funds from NTRN. A-1 assigned its interest in the checks to Robert Triffin, who filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Ameripay. What principles determine who, between a principal and an agent, is liable for the amount of an unpaid instrument? How do those principles apply in this case? Is Ameripay liable? Why or why not? [Triffin v.

26-10. Accommodation Parties. Donald Goosic, a building contractor in Nebraska, did business as "Homestead" builders. To construct a house on "spec" (without a pre-construction buyer), Donald obtained materials from Sack Lumber Co. on an open account. When Donald "got behind in his payments," his wife, Frances, cosigned a note payable to Sack for $43,000, the outstanding balance on the account. Donald made payments on the note until he obtained a discharge of his debts in a bankruptcy proceeding to which Frances was not a party. Less than a year later, Sack filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Frances to collect on the note. She contended that she was an accommodation party, not a maker, and thus was not liable because the applicable statute of limitations had run. She testified that Donald "made more debt than . . . money" and that she was "paying the bills out of [her] income." The Goosics' most recent tax returns showed only losses relating to Homestead. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, a person receiving only an indirect benefit from a transaction can qualify as an accommodation party. How would you rule on this question of fact? Why? 26-11. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Clarence Morgan, Jr., owned Easy Way Automotive, a car dealership in D'Lo, Mississippi. Easy Way sold a truck to Loyd Barnard, who signed a note for the amount of the price payable to Trustmark National Bank in six months. Before the note came due, Barnard returned the truck to Easy Way, which sold it to another buyer. Using some of the proceeds from the second sale, Easy Way sent a check to Trustmark to pay Barnard's note. Meanwhile, Barnard obtained another truck from Easy Way, financed through another six-month note payable to Trustmark. After eight of these deals, some of which involved more than one truck, an Easy Way check to Trustmark was dishonored. In a suit in a Mississippi state court, Trustmark sought to recover the amounts of two of the notes from Barnard. Trustmark had not secured titles to two of the trucks covered by the notes, however, and this complicated Barnard's efforts to reclaim the vehicles from the later buyers. [Trustmark National Bank v. Barnard, 930 So.2d 1281 (Miss.App. 2006)]

- (a) On what basis might Barnard be liable on the Trustmark notes? Would he be primarily or secondarily liable? Could this liability be discharged on the theory that Barnard's right of recourse had been

- impaired when Trustmark did not secure titles to the trucks covered by the notes? Explain.
- (b) Easy Way's account had been subject to other recent overdrafts, and a week after the check to Trustmark was returned for insufficient funds, Morgan committed suicide. At the same time, Barnard was unable to obtain a mortgage because the unpaid notes affected his credit rating. How do the circumstances of this case underscore the importance of practicing business ethics?

Checks and Banking in the Digital Age

Checks are the most common type of negotiable instruments governed by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Although debit cards now account for more retail payments than checks, commercial checks remain an integral part of the U.S. economic system. Issues relating to checks are governed by Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC. As noted in the preceding chapters, Article 3 establishes the requirements that all negotiable instruments, including checks, must meet.

Article 3 also sets forth the rights and responsibilities of parties to negotiable instruments. Article 4 establishes a framework for deposit and checking agreements between a bank and its customers. Article 4 also governs the relationships of banks with one another as they process checks for payment. A check therefore may fall within the scope of Article 3 and yet be subject to the provisions of Article 4 while in the course of collection. If a conflict arises between Article 3 and Article 4, Article 4 controls [UCC 4-102(a)].

In this chapter, we first identify the legal characteristics of checks and the legal duties and liabilities that arise when a check is issued. Then we examine the collection process. Increasingly, credit cards, debit cards, and other devices and methods for transferring funds electronically are being used to pay for goods and services. In the latter part of this chapter, we look at the law governing electronic fund transfers.

Checks

A check is a special type of draft that is drawn on a bank, ordering the bank to pay a fixed amount of money on demand [UCC 3-104(f)]. Article 4 defines a bank as “a person engaged in the business of banking, including a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union or trust company” [UCC 4-105(1)].¹ If any other nonbank institution (such as a brokerage firm) handles a check for payment or for collection, the check is not covered by Article 4.

Recall from the preceding chapters that a person who writes a check is called the drawer. The drawer is usually a depositor in the bank on which the check is drawn. The person to whom the check is payable is the payee. The bank or financial institution on which the check is drawn is the drawee. Thus, if Anne Tomas writes a check on her checking account to pay her college tuition, she is the drawer, her bank is the drawee, and her college is the payee.

Between the time a check is drawn and the time it reaches the drawee, the effectiveness of the check may be altered by some event—for example, the drawer may die or order payment not to be made, or the account on which the check is drawn may be depleted. To avoid this problem, a payee may insist on payment by an instrument that has already been accepted by the drawee. Such an instrument may be a cashier’s check, a traveler’s check, or a certified check.

Cashier’s Checks

Checks are usually three-party instruments, but on some checks, the bank serves as both the drawer and the drawee. For example, when a bank draws a check on itself, the check is called a cashier’s check and is

1. The unrevised Article 4 does not define the term bank, except to distinguish among banks that deposit, collect, and pay instruments. The term was generally considered to include only commercial banks, which at the time the unrevised Article 4 was written were the only banks that could offer checking accounts. Revised Article 4’s definition makes it clear that other depository institutions now have the authority to issue and otherwise deal with checks.

a negotiable instrument on issue (see Exhibit 27-1) [UCC 3-104(g)]. Normally, a cashier's check indicates a specific payee. In effect, with a cashier's check, the bank assumes responsibility for paying the check, thus making the check more readily acceptable in commerce.

For example, Blake needs to pay a moving company $7,000 for moving his household goods to a new home in another state. The moving company requests payment in the form of a cashier's check. Blake goes to a bank (he need not have an account at the bank) and purchases a cashier's check, payable to the moving company, in the amount of $7,000. Blake has to pay the bank the $7,000 for the check, plus a small service fee. He then gives the check to the moving company.

Cashier's checks are sometimes used in the business community as nearly the equivalent of cash. Except in very limited circumstances, the issuing bank must honor its cashier's checks when they are presented for payment. If a bank wrongfully dishonors a cashier's check, a holder can recover from the bank all expenses incurred, interest, and consequential damages [UCC 3-411]. This same rule applies if a bank wrongfully dishonors a certified check (to be discussed shortly) or a teller's check. (A teller's check is usually drawn by a bank on another bank; when drawn on a nonbank, it is payable at or through a bank [UCC 3-104(h)].)

Traveler's Checks

A traveler's check is an instrument that is payable on demand, drawn on or payable at a financial institution (such as a bank), and designated as a traveler's check. The issuing institution is directly obligated to accept and pay its traveler's check according to the check's terms. Traveler's checks are designed as a safe substitute for cash when a person is on vacation or traveling and are issued for a fixed amount, such as $20, $50, or $100. The purchaser is required to sign the check at the time it is purchased and again at the time it is used [UCC 3-104(i)]. Most major banks today do not issue traveler's checks; rather, they purchase and issue American Express traveler's checks for their customers (see Exhibit 27-2 on the following page).

Certified Checks

A certified check is a check that has been accepted by the bank on which it is drawn [UCC 3-409(d)]. When a drawee bank agrees to certify a check, it immediately charges the drawer's account with the amount of the check and transfers those funds to its own certified-check account. In effect, the bank is agreeing in advance to accept that check when it is presented for payment and to make payment from those funds reserved in the certified-check account. Essentially, certification prevents the bank from denying liability. It is a promise that sufficient funds are on deposit and have been set aside to cover the check.

To certify a check, the bank writes or stamps the word certified on the face of the check and typically writes the amount that it will pay.² Either the drawer or the holder (payee) of a check can request certification, but the drawee bank is not required to certify a check. A bank's refusal to certify a check is not a dishonor of the check [UCC 3-409(d)]. Once a check is certified, the drawer and any prior indorsers are completely discharged from liability on the check [UCC 3-414(c), 3-415(d)]. Only the certifying bank is required to pay the instrument.

The Bank-Customer Relationship

The bank-customer relationship begins when the customer opens a checking account and deposits funds that the bank will use to pay for checks written by the customer. The rights and duties of the bank and the customer are contractual and depend on the nature of the transaction. Essentially, three types of relationships come into being, as discussed next.

Creditor-Debtor Relationship

A creditor-debtor relationship is created between a customer and a bank when, for example, the customer

2. If the certification does not state an amount, and the amount is later increased and the instrument negotiated to a holder in due course (HDC), the obligation of the certifying bank is the amount of the instrument when it was taken by the HDC [UCC 3-413(b)].

makes cash deposits into a checking account. When a customer makes a deposit, the customer becomes a creditor, and the bank a debtor, for the amount deposited.

Agency Relationship

An agency relationship also arises between the customer and the bank when the customer writes a check on his or her account. In effect, the customer is ordering the bank to pay the amount specified on the check to the holder when the holder presents the check to the bank for payment. In this situation, the bank becomes the customer's agent and is obligated to honor the customer's request. Similarly, if the customer deposits a check into his or her account, the bank, as the customer's agent, is obligated to collect payment on the check from the bank on which the check was drawn.

Contractual Relationship

Whenever a bank-customer relationship is established, certain contractual rights and duties arise. The rights and duties of the bank and the customer are contractual and depend on the nature of the transaction. The respective rights and duties of banks and their customers are discussed in detail in the following pages.

Honoring Checks

When a banking institution provides checking services, it agrees to honor the checks written by its customers, with the usual stipulation that sufficient funds must be available in the account to pay each check. When a drawee bank wrongfully fails to honor a check, it is liable to its customer for damages resulting from its refusal to pay. The UCC does not attempt to specify the theory under which the customer may recover for wrongful dishonor; it merely states that the drawee is liable [UCC 4-402(b)].

The customer's agreement with the bank includes a general obligation to keep sufficient funds on deposit to cover all checks written. The customer is liable to the payee or to the holder of a check in a civil suit if a check is not honored. If intent to defraud can be proved, the customer can also be subject to criminal prosecution for writing a bad check.

When the bank properly dishonors a check for insufficient funds, it has no liability to the customer. The bank may rightfully refuse payment on a customer's check in other circumstances as well. We look here at the rights and duties of both the bank and its customers in relation to specific situations.

Overdrafts

When the bank receives an item properly payable from its customer's checking account but the account contains insufficient funds to cover the amount of the check, the bank has two options. It can either (1) dishonor the item or (2) pay the item and charge the customer's account, thus creating an overdraft, providing that the customer has authorized the payment and the payment does not violate any bank-customer agreement [UCC 4-401(a)].³ The bank can subtract the difference from the customer's next deposit because the check carries with it an enforceable implied promise to reimburse the bank.

When a check "bounces," a holder can resubmit the check, hoping that at a later date sufficient funds will be available to pay it. The holder must notify any indorsers on the check of the first dishonor, however; otherwise, they will be discharged from their signature liability, as discussed in Chapter 26.

A bank can expressly agree with a customer to accept overdrafts through what is sometimes called an "overdraft protection agreement." If such an agreement is formed, any failure of the bank to honor a check because it would create an overdraft breaches

3. When customers have a joint account, the bank cannot hold any customer on the account liable for payment of an overdraft unless that customer has signed the check or has benefited from the proceeds of the check [UCC 4-401(b)].

this agreement and is treated as a wrongful dishonor [UCC 4-402(a), (b)].

Postdated Checks

A bank may also charge a postdated check against a customer's account, unless the customer notifies the bank, in a timely manner, not to pay the check until the stated date. The notice of postdating must be given in time to allow the bank to act on the notice before committing itself to pay on the check. The UCC states that the bank should treat the notice like a stop-payment order (to be discussed shortly). If the bank fails to act on the customer's notice and charges the customer's account before the date on the postdated check, the bank may be liable for any damages incurred by the customer. Damages include those that result from the dishonor of checks that are subsequently presented for payment and are dishonored for insufficient funds [UCC 4-401(c)].

Stale Checks

Commercial banking practice regards a check that is presented for payment more than six months from its date as a stale check. A bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months from its date [UCC 4-404]. When receiving a stale check for payment, the bank has the option of paying or not paying the check. If a bank pays a stale check in good faith without consulting the customer, the bank has the right to charge the customer's account for the amount of the check.

Death or Incompetence of a Customer

Neither the death nor the incompetence of a customer revokes a bank's authority to pay an item until the bank knows of the situation and has had reasonable time to act on the notice [UCC 4-405]. Thus, if, at the time a check is issued or its collection is undertaken, a bank does not know that the customer who wrote the check has been declared incompetent, the bank can pay the item without incurring liability. Even when a bank knows of the death of its customer, for ten days after the date of death it can pay or certify checks drawn on or before the date of death. Without this provision, banks would constantly be required to verify the continued life and competence of their drawers. An exception to the rule is made if a person claiming an interest in the account of the deceased customer, such as an heir or an executor of the estate (see Chapter 50), orders the bank to stop payment.

Stop-Payment Orders

A stop-payment order is an order by a customer to her or his bank not to pay a certain check.⁴ Only a customer or a “person authorized to draw on the account” can order the bank not to pay the check when it is presented for payment [UCC 4-403(a)]. A customer has no right to stop payment on a check that has already been certified (or accepted) by a bank, however. Also, a stop-payment order must be received within a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner to permit the bank to act on it [UCC 4-403(a)]. Although a stop-payment order can be given orally, usually by phone, the order is binding on the bank for only fourteen calendar days unless confirmed in writing.⁵ A written stop-payment order (see Exhibit 27-3) or an oral order confirmed in writing is effective for six months, at which time it must be renewed in writing [UCC 4-403(b)].

Bank’s Liability for Wrongful Payment If the bank pays the check over the customer’s properly instituted stop-payment order, the bank will be obligated to recredit the customer’s account. In addition, if

- 4. Note that although this discussion focuses on checks, the right to stop payment is not limited to checks; it extends to any item payable by any bank. See Official Comment 3 to UCC 4-403.
- 5. Some states do not recognize oral stop-payment orders; the orders must be in writing.

the bank’s payment over a stop-payment order causes subsequent checks written on the drawer’s account to “bounce,” the bank will be liable for the resultant costs the drawer incurs. The bank is liable only for the amount of the actual loss suffered by the drawer because of the wrongful payment, however [UCC 4-403(c)].

Assume that Toshio Murano orders one hundred cellular telephones from Advanced Communications, Inc., at $50 each. Murano pays in advance for the phones with a check for $5,000. Later that day, Advanced Communications tells Murano that it will not deliver the phones as arranged. Murano immediately calls the bank and stops payment on the check. Two days later, in spite of this stop-payment order, the bank inadvertently honors Murano’s check to Advanced Communications for the undelivered phones. The bank will be liable to Murano for the full $5,000.

The result would be different, however, if Advanced Communications had delivered and Murano had accepted ninety-nine phones. Because Murano would have owed Advanced Communications $4,950 for the goods delivered, Murano’s actual loss would be only $50. Consequently, the bank would be liable to Murano for only $50.

Customer’s Liability for Wrongful Stop-Payment Order A stop-payment order has its risks for a customer. The drawer must have a valid legal ground for issuing such an order; otherwise, the holder can sue the drawer for payment. Moreover, defenses sufficient to refuse payment to a payee may not be valid grounds to prevent payment to a subsequent holder in due course [UCC 3-305, 3-306]. A person who wrongfully stops payment on a check not only will be liable to the payee for the amount of the check but also may be liable for consequential damages incurred by the payee as a result of the wrongful stop-payment order.

Checks Bearing Forged Signatures

When a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, generally the bank suffers the loss.⁶ A bank may be able to recover at least some of the loss from the customer, however, if the customer's negligence substantially contributed to the forgery. A bank may also obtain partial recovery from the forger of the check (if he or she can be found) or from the holder who presented the check for payment (if the holder knew that the signature was forged).

The General Rule A forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a drawer [UCC 3-403(a)]. For this reason, banks require a signature card from each customer who opens a checking account so that the bank can determine whether the signature on a customer's check is genuine. The general rule is that the bank must recredit the customer's account when it pays on a forged signature. (Note that banks today normally verify signatures only on checks that exceed a certain threshold, such as $1,000, $2,500, or some higher amount. Even though a bank sometimes incurs liability costs when it has paid forged checks, the costs involved in verifying the signature on every check signature would be much higher.)

Note that a bank may contractually shift to the customer the risk of forged checks created by the use of facsimile or other nonmanual signatures. For example, the contract might stipulate that the customer is solely responsible for maintaining security over any device affixing a signature. The contract might also provide that any nonmanual signature is effective as the customer's signature regardless of whether the person who affixed the signature was authorized to do so.⁷

Customer Negligence When a customer's negligence substantially contributes to a forgery, the bank normally will not be obligated to recredit the customer's account for the amount of the check [UCC 3-406(a)]. If negligence on the part of the bank (or other "person") paying the instrument or taking it for value or for collection substantially contributed to the customer's loss, however, the customer's liability may be reduced by the amount of the loss caused by the bank's negligence [UCC 3-406(b)].⁸

Suppose that CompuNet, Inc., uses a check-writing machine to write its payroll and business checks. A CompuNet employee uses the machine to create a check payable to himself for $10,000, and CompuNet's bank subsequently honors it. CompuNet requests the bank to recredit $10,000 to its account for incorrectly paying on a forged check. If the bank can show that CompuNet failed to take reasonable care in controlling access to the check-writing equipment, the bank will not be required to recredit its account for the amount of the forged check. If CompuNet can show that negligence on the part of the bank (or another person) contributed substantially to the loss, however, then CompuNet's liability may be reduced proportionately.

In the following case, a bank that had paid a forged check claimed that the account holder's negligence had contributed to the forgery. Specifically, the bank alleged that the account holder had failed to exercise ordinary care to prevent his wife from forging a check on the account.

6. Each year, check fraud costs banks many billions of dollars—more than the combined losses from credit-card fraud, theft from automated teller machines, and armed robberies.

CASE 27.1 Nesper v. Bank of America

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Sixth District, Ottawa County, 2004. __ Ohio App.3d __, __ N.E.2d __.

- Company Profile In 1904, Amadeo Giannini founded the Bank of Italy in San Francisco, California. Later, Giannini acquired Bank of America of Los Angeles and was soon operating as Bank of America. In the 1950s, the company introduced BankAmericard, which eventually became the Visa card.

In 1998, NationsBank of Charlotte, North Carolina, acquired the firm and assumed the name Bank of America Corporation (BOA) (www.bankofamerica.com). Today's BOA provides banking and other financial services to consumers, businesses, and governments throughout the world. For all sizes of commercial operations, for example, BOA's "Global Corporate and Investment Banking" division offers lending products and financial advisory services.

● Background and Facts Robert Nesper knew his wife, Patricia Nesper, had engaged in financial misconduct both before and after their marriage. The misconduct included forging Robert's name on applications for credit cards and a contract to buy a vehicle. The couple continued to live together, but Robert kept a bank account in only his name at Bank of America, N.A. He kept the unused checks for the account hidden in their house in a room that could be locked, although the room was not kept locked all of the time. In early 2002, he became aware that Patricia had forged his name to the account's check number 275 in the amount of $2,000. Robert filed a suit in an Ohio state court against the bank, seeking the return of the $2,000 to his account. Robert argued that banks have a responsibility to refuse to honor forged checks, regardless of the marital status of the forger. The court ruled in Robert's favor. The bank appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT*KNEPPER, J. [Judge]

* * * Bank of America argues that the trial court ignored evidence of appellee's [Robert's] negligence, as well as evidence that appellee ratified his wife's forgery. Bank of America further argues that * * * allowing appellee to recover in this case would cause banks to be reluctant to cash any checks between a husband and wife "because of the potential problem of abuse."

* * * *

"(A) A person whose failure to exercise ordinary care substantially contributes to an alteration of an instrument or to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the alteration or the forgery against a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection. * * * "

The relationship between a bank and its customer is based on both statutory and contractual principles. The definition of "ordinary care" on the part of a bank is statutorily defined in R.C. Section 1303.01(A)(9) [UCC 3-103(7)] as the observance of "reasonable commercial standards that are prevailing in the area * * * ." In contrast, "ordinary care" on the part of a bank's customer, while not statutorily defined, has been described by Ohio courts as the duty of the customer to perform his or her obligations to the bank with care, skill, reasonable expedience, and faithfulness * * * . This duty has been applied in cases where a party who has notice that his signature has been forged in the past is negligent in failing to prevent further forgeries by the same person.

In addition to its statutory remedies, Bank of America seeks to invoke the common-law defense of ratification. *Ratification occurs when a party, by his conduct, affirms a prior act which did not bind him but which was done or professedly done on his account whereby the act * * * is given effect as if it was originally authorized by him.* Affirmance can be established by showing that the party had knowledge of the facts and manifested his intent to approve the transaction. [Emphasis added.]

As to the issue of ordinary care, the record demonstrates that appellee knew his wife was capable of financial misconduct, including forgery. The record also shows that appellee attempted to keep his wife from having access to his checkbooks by keeping them hidden in a room that was usually, although not always, locked. * * * Mrs. Nesper refused to respond when she was confronted * * * about the forgery. The record contains no evidence as to how Mrs. Nesper actually obtained the blank checks.

As to the issue of ratification, Bank of America directs our attention to that portion of the record which shows that appellee unsuccessfully attempted to discuss the forgery with his wife. The rest of the record shows that appellee notified [the bank] and the police of his wife's actions, filled out police reports, and filed the complaint herein seeking return of his funds. * * *

This court has reviewed the entire record of proceedings in this case and, upon consideration thereof, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion by finding that the record contains insufficient evidence to show that appellee's failure to exercise ordinary care substantially contributed to the forging of his signature on check no. 275, or by not finding that appellee ratified his wife's forgery. * * *

The judgment of the [lower court] is affirmed.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The bank failed to prove that Robert did not exercise ordinary care with respect to Patricia's forgery of his signature on check number 275. Consequently, the bank was obliged to recredit its customer's account for the amount of the check.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If the bank had shown that Robert had failed to take reasonable care in controlling access to the blank checks for his account, would the outcome in this case have been different? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Would the result in this case have been different if the bank had made Robert's canceled checks available for review only online? Explain.

Timely Examination of Bank Statements Required. Banks typically send or make available to their customers monthly statements detailing the activity of the customers' checking accounts. Banks are not obligated to include the original canceled checks themselves with the statement sent to the customer. If the bank does not send the canceled checks, however, it must provide the customer with information (check number, amount, and date of payment) on the statement that will allow the customer to reasonably identify each check that the bank has paid [UCC 4-406(a), (b)]. Sometimes, banks send photocopies of the canceled checks with the statement. If the bank retains the canceled checks, it must keep the checks—or legible copies of them—for seven years [UCC 4-406(b)]. The customer may obtain a canceled check (or a copy of the check) from the bank during this period of time.

The customer has a duty to promptly examine bank statements (and canceled checks or photocopies, if they are included with the statements) with reasonable care when the statements are received or made available to determine whether any payment was not authorized [UCC 4-406(c)]. The customer must report any alterations or forged signatures, including forged signatures of indorsers if discovered (to be discussed later). If the customer fails to fulfill this duty and the bank suffers a loss as a result, the customer will be liable for the loss [UCC 4-406(d)].

Consequences of Failing to Detect Forgeries. When a series of forgeries by the same wrongdoer has taken place, the UCC provides that the customer, to recover for all of the forged items, must have discovered and reported the first forged check to the bank within thirty calendar days of the receipt or availability of the bank statement (and canceled checks or copies, if they are included) [UCC 4-406(d)(2)]. Failure to notify the bank within this time period discharges the bank's liability for all forged checks that it pays prior to notification.

For example, Joseph Montanez, an employee and bookkeeper for Espresso Roma Corporation, used stolen computer software and blank checks to generate company checks on his home computer. The series of forged checks spanned a period of more than two years and totaled more than $330,000. When the bank statements containing the forged checks arrived in the mail, Montanez sorted through the statements and removed the checks so that the forgeries would go undetected. Eventually, Espresso Roma did discover the forgeries and asked the bank to recredit its account. The bank refused and litigation ensued. The court held that the bank was not liable for the forged checks because Espresso Roma failed to report the first forgeries within the UCC's time period of thirty days.⁹

When the Bank Is Also Negligent. In one situation, a bank customer can escape liability, at least in part, for failing to notify the bank of forged or altered checks within the required thirty-day period. If the customer can prove that the bank was also negligent—that is, that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care—then the bank will also be liable, and the loss will be allocated between the bank and the customer on the basis of comparative negligence [UCC 4-406(e)]. In other words, even though a customer may have been negligent, the bank may still have to recredit the customer's account for a portion of the loss if the bank failed to exercise ordinary care.

Section 3-103(a)(7) of the UCC defines ordinary care as the “observance of reasonable commercial standards, prevailing in the area in which [a] person is located, with respect to the business in which that person is engaged.” As mentioned earlier, it is customary in the banking industry to manually examine signatures only on checks over a certain amount (such as $1,000, $2,500, or some higher amount). Thus, if a bank, in accordance with prevailing banking standards, fails to examine a signature on a particular check, the bank may or may not have breached its duty to exercise ordinary care.

Regardless of the degree of care exercised by the customer or the bank, the UCC places an absolute time limit on the liability of a bank for paying a check with a forged customer signature. A customer who fails to report her or his forged signature within one year from the date that the statement was made available for inspection loses the legal right to have the bank recredit her or his account [UCC 4-406(f)].

Other Parties from Whom the Bank May Recover As noted earlier, a forged signature on a check has no legal effect as the signature of a drawer; a forged signature, however, is effective as the signature of the unauthorized signer [UCC 3-403(a)]. Therefore, when a bank pays a check on which the drawer's signature is forged, the bank has a right to recover from the party who forged the signature. The bank may also have a right to recover from a party (its customer or a collecting bank—to be discussed later in this chapter) who transferred a check bearing a forged drawer's signature and received payment (see the discussion of transfer warranties discussed in Chapter 26). This right is limited, however, in that the bank cannot recover from a person who took the check in good faith and for value or who in good faith changed position in reliance on the payment or acceptance [UCC 3-418(c)].

Checks Bearing Forged Indorsements

A bank that pays a customer's check bearing a forged indorsement must recredit the customer's account or be liable to the customer (drawer) for breach of contract. Suppose that Carlo issues a $500 check “to the order of Sophia.” Marcello steals the check, forges Sophia's indorsement, and cashes the check. When the check reaches Carlo's bank, the bank pays it and debits Carlo's account. The bank must recredit Carlo's account for the $500 because it failed to carry out Carlo's order to pay “to the order of Sophia” [UCC 4-401(a)]. (Carlo's bank will in turn recover—under the principle of breach of warranty—from the bank that cashed the check [UCC 4-207(a)(2)].)

Eventually, the loss usually falls on the first party to take the instrument bearing the forged indorsement because, as discussed in Chapter 26, a forged indorsement does not transfer title. Thus, whoever takes an instrument with a forged indorsement cannot become a holder.

The customer, in any event, has a duty to report forged indorsements promptly on discovery or notice. Failure to report forged indorsements, whether discovered or not, within a three-year period after the forged items have been made available to the customer relieves the bank of liability [UCC 4-111].¹⁰

Altered Checks

The customer's instruction to the bank is to pay the exact amount on the face of the check to the holder. The bank has an implicit duty to examine checks before making final payments. If it fails to detect an alteration, it is liable to its customer for the loss because it did not pay as the customer ordered. The loss is the difference between the original amount of the check and the amount actually paid. Suppose that a check written for $11 is raised to $111. The customer's account will be charged $11 (the amount the customer ordered the bank to pay). The bank will normally be responsible for the $100 [UCC 4-401(d)(1)].

Customer Negligence As in a situation involving a forged drawer's signature, a customer's negligence can shift the loss when payment is made on an altered check (unless the bank was also negligent). A common example occurs when a person carelessly writes a check, leaving large gaps around the numbers and words where additional numbers and words can be inserted (see Exhibit 27-4).

Similarly, a person who signs a check and leaves the dollar amount for someone else to fill in is barred from protesting when the bank unknowingly and in good faith pays whatever amount is shown [UCC 4-401(d)(2)]. Finally, if the bank can trace its loss on successive altered checks to the customer's failure to discover the initial alteration, then the bank can reduce its liability for reimbursing the customer's account [UCC 4-406].¹¹ The law governing the customer's duty to examine monthly statements and canceled checks, and to discover and report alterations to the bank, is the same as that applied to a forged drawer's signature.

In every situation involving a forged drawer's signature or an alteration, a bank must observe reasonable commercial standards of care in paying on a customer's checks [UCC 4-406(e)]. The customer's contributory negligence can be asserted only if the bank has exercised ordinary care.

Other Parties from Whom the Bank May Recover

The bank is entitled to recover the amount of loss (including expenses and any loss of interest) from the transferor who, by presenting the check for payment, warrants that the check has not been altered.¹²

There are two exceptions, however. If the bank is the drawer (as it is on a cashier's check and a teller's check), it cannot recover on this ground from the presenting party if the party is a holder in due course (HDC) acting in good faith [UCC 3-417(a)(2), 4-208(a)(2)]. The reason is that an instrument's drawer is in a better position than an HDC to know whether the instrument has been altered.

Similarly, an HDC, acting in good faith in presenting a certified check for payment, does not warrant to the

11. The bank's defense is the same whether the successive payments were made on a forged drawer's signature or on altered checks. The bank must prove that prompt notice would have prevented its loss. For example, notification might have alerted the bank not to pay further items or might have enabled it to catch the forger.

12. Usually, the party presenting an instrument for payment is the payee, a holder, a bank customer, or a collecting bank. A bank's customers include its account holders, which may include other banks [UCC 4-104(a)(5)]. As will be discussed later in this chapter, a collecting bank is any bank handling an item for collection except the bank on which the check is drawn [UCC 4-105(5)].

check's certifier that the check was not altered before the HDC acquired it [UCC 3-417(a)(2), 4-208(a)(2)]. Consider an example. Alan, the drawer, draws a check for $500 payable to Pam, the payee. Pam alters the amount to $5,000. National City Bank, the drawee, certifies the check for $5,000. Pam negotiates the check to Don, an HDC. The drawee bank pays Don $5,000. On discovering the mistake, the bank cannot recover from Don the $4,500 paid by mistake, even though the bank was not in a superior position to detect the alteration. This is in accord with the purpose of certification, which is to obtain the definite obligation of a bank to honor a definite instrument. For a synopsis of the rules governing the honoring of checks, see Concept Summary 27.1.

Accepting Deposits

A bank has a duty to its customer to accept the customer's deposits of cash and checks. When checks are deposited, the bank must make the funds represented by those checks available within certain time frames. A

CONCEPT SUMMARY 27.1 Honoring Checks

Situation	Basic Rules
WRONGFUL DISHONOR [UCC 4-402]	The bank is liable to its customer for actual damages proved if it wrongfully dishonors a check due to mistake.
OVERDRAFT [UCC 4-401]	The bank has a right to charge a customer's account for any item properly payable, even if the charge results in an overdraft.
POSTDATED CHECK [UCC 4-401]	The bank may charge a postdated check against a customer's account, unless the customer notifies the bank of the postdating in time to allow the bank to act on the notice before the bank commits itself to pay on the check.
STALE CHECK [UCC 4-404]	The bank is not obligated to pay an uncertified check presented more than six months after its date, but the bank may do so in good faith without liability.
DEATH OR INCOMPETENCE OF A CUSTOMER [UCC 4-405]	So long as the bank does not know of the death or incompetence of a customer, the bank can pay an item without liability. Even with knowledge of a customer's death, a bank can honor or certify checks (in the absence of a stop-payment order) for ten days after the date of the customer's death.
STOP-PAYMENT ORDER [UCC 4-403]	The customer (or a "person authorized to draw on the account") must institute a stop-payment order in time for the bank to have a reasonable opportunity to act. Oral orders (if allowed) are binding for only fourteen days unless they are confirmed in writing. Written orders are effective for only six months, unless renewed in writing. The bank is liable for wrongful payment over a timely stop-payment order to the extent that the customer suffers a loss. A customer has no right to stop payment on a certified check or an accepted draft and can be held liable for stopping payment on any check without a valid legal ground.
FORGED SIGNATURE OR ALTERATION [UCC 4-406]	The customer has a duty to examine account statements with reasonable care on receipt and to notify the bank promptly of any unauthorized signatures or alterations. On a series of unauthorized signatures or alterations by the same wrongdoer, examination and report must be made within thirty calendar days of receipt of the first statement containing a forged or altered item. The customer's failure to comply with these rules releases the bank from liability unless the bank failed to exercise reasonable care; in that event, liability may be apportioned according to a comparative negligence standard. Regardless of care or lack of care, the customer is estopped (prevented) from holding the bank liable after one year for unauthorized customer signatures or alterations and after three years for unauthorized indorsements.

bank also has a duty to collect payment on any checks payable or indorsed to its customer and deposited by the customer into his or her account. Cash deposits made in U.S. currency are received into the customer's account without being subject to further collection procedures.

Availability Schedule for Deposited Checks

The Expedited Funds Availability Act of 1987¹³ and Regulation CC,¹⁴ which was issued by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors (the Federal Reserve System will be discussed shortly) to implement the act, require that any local check deposited must be available for withdrawal by check or as cash within one business day from the date of deposit. A check is classified as a local check if the first bank to receive the check for payment and the bank on which the check is drawn are located in the same check-processing region (regions are designated by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors). For nonlocal checks, the funds must be available for withdrawal within not more than five business days. (Note that eventually, under the Check 21 Act discussed later in this chapter, a bank will have to credit a customer's account as soon as the bank receives the funds.)

In addition, the act requires the following:

1. That funds be available on the next business day for cash deposits and wire transfers, government checks, the first $100 of a day's check deposits, cashier's checks, certified checks, and checks for which the banks receiving and paying the checks are branches of the same institution.
2. That the first $100 of any deposit be available for cash withdrawal on the opening of the next business day after deposit. If a local check is deposited, the next $400 is to be available for withdrawal by no later than 5:00 P.M. on the next business day. If, for example, you deposit a local check for $500 on Monday, you can withdraw $100 in cash at the opening of the business day on Tuesday, and an additional $400 must be available for withdrawal by no later than 5:00 P.M. on Wednesday.

A different availability schedule applies to deposits made at nonproprietary automated teller machines (ATMs). These are ATMs that are not owned or operated by the bank receiving the deposits. Basically, a five-day hold is permitted on all deposits, including cash deposits, that are made at nonproprietary ATMs. Other exceptions also exist. For example, a banking institution has eight days to make funds available in new accounts (those open less than thirty days) and has an extra four days on deposits that exceed $5,000 (except deposits of government and cashier's checks).

Interest-Bearing Accounts

Under the Truth-in-Savings Act (TISA) of 1991¹⁵ and Regulation DD,¹⁶ the act's implementing regulation, banks must pay interest based on the full balance of a customer's interest-bearing account each day. For example, Vogel has an interest-bearing checking account with First National Bank. Vogel keeps a $500 balance in the account for most of the month but withdraws all but $50 the day before the bank posts the interest. The bank cannot pay interest on just the $50. The interest must be adjusted to account for the entire month, including those days when Vogel's balance was higher.

Before opening a deposit account, new customers must be provided certain information in a brochure, pamphlet, or other handout. The information, which must also appear in all advertisements, includes the following:

1. The minimum balance required to open an account and to be paid interest.
2. The interest, stated in terms of the annual percentage yield on the account.
3. How interest is calculated.
4. Any fees, charges, and penalties and how they are calculated.

Also, under the TISA and Regulation DD, a customer's monthly statement must declare the interest earned on the account, any fees that were charged, how the fees were calculated, and the number of days that the statement covers.

The Traditional Collection Process

Usually, deposited checks involve parties who do business at different banks, but sometimes checks are written between customers of the same bank. Either situation brings into play the bank collection process as it operates within the statutory framework of Article 4 of the UCC. Note that the check-collection process described in the following subsections will be modified in the future as the banking industry implements the Check Clearing in the 21st Century Act,¹⁷ also known as the Check 21 Act, which will be discussed shortly.

Designations of Banks Involved in the Collection Process The first bank to receive a check for payment is the depository bank.¹⁸ For example, when a person deposits a tax-refund check from the Internal Revenue Service into a personal checking account at the local bank, that bank is the depository bank. The bank on which a check is drawn (the drawee bank) is called the payor bank. Any bank except the payor bank that handles a check during some phase of the collection process is a collecting bank. Any bank except the payor bank or the depository bank to which an item is transferred in the course of this collection process is called an intermediary bank.

During the collection process, any bank can take on one or more of the various roles of depository, payor, collecting, or intermediary bank. To illustrate: A buyer in New York writes a check on her New York bank and sends it to a seller in San Francisco. The seller deposits the check in her San Francisco bank account. The seller's bank is both a depository bank and a collecting bank. The buyer's bank in New York is the payor bank. As the check travels from San Francisco to New York, any collecting bank handling the item in the collection process (other than the ones acting as depository bank and payor bank) is also called an intermediary bank. Exhibit 27-5 illustrates how various banks function in the collection process.

17. 12 U.S.C. Sections 5001-5018.

18. All definitions in this section are found in UCC 4-105. The terms depository and depository have different meanings in the banking context. A depository bank refers to a physical place (a bank or other institution) in which deposits or funds are held or stored.

Check Collection between Customers of the Same Bank An item that is payable by the depository bank that receives it (which in this situation is also the payor bank) is called an "on-us item." If the bank does not dishonor the check by the opening of the second banking day following its receipt, the check is considered paid [UCC 4-215(e)(2)]. For example, Oswald and Martin both have checking accounts at First State Bank. On Monday morning, Martin deposits into his own checking account a $300 check from Oswald. That same day, the bank issues Martin a “provisional credit” for $300. When the bank opens on Wednesday, Oswald’s check is considered honored, and Martin’s provisional credit becomes a final payment.

Check Collection between Customers of Different Banks Once a depository bank receives a check, it must arrange to present the check, either directly or through intermediary banks, to the appropriate payor bank. Each bank in the collection chain must pass the check on before midnight of the next banking day following its receipt [UCC 4-202(b)].¹⁹ A “banking day” is any part of a day that the bank is open to carry on substantially all of its banking functions. Thus, if only a bank’s drive-through facilities are open, a check deposited on Saturday would not trigger a bank’s midnight deadline until the following Monday. When the check reaches the payor bank, that bank is liable for the face amount of the check, unless the payor bank dishonors the check or returns it by midnight of the next banking day following receipt [UCC 4-302].²⁰

Because of this deadline and because banks need to maintain an even work flow in the many items they handle daily, the UCC permits what is called deferred posting. According to UCC 4-108, “a bank may fix an afternoon hour of 2:00 P.M. or later as a cutoff hour for the handling of money and items and the making of entries on its books.” Any checks received after that hour “may be treated as being received at the opening of the next banking day.” Thus, if a bank’s “cutoff hour” is 3:00 P.M., a check received by a payor bank at 4:00 P.M. on Monday will be deferred for posting until Tuesday. In this situation, the payor bank’s deadline will be midnight Wednesday.

Does a delay of more than one month in a bank’s notice to its customer that a check deposited in his or her account is counterfeit reduce the customer’s liability for overdrafts in his or her account? That was the customer’s contention in the following case.

19. A bank may take a “reasonably longer time” in certain circumstances, such as when the bank’s computer system is down because of a power failure [UCC 4-202(b)].

20. Most checks are cleared by a computerized process, and communication and computer facilities may fail because of electrical outages, equipment malfunction, or other conditions. If such conditions arise and a bank fails to meet its midnight deadline, the bank is “excused” from liability if the bank has exercised “such diligence as the circumstances require” [UCC 4-109(d)].

CASE 27.2 Bank One, N.A. v. Dunn

Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Second Circuit, 2006. 927 So.2d 645.

• Background and Facts Floyd Dunn, a U.S. citizen, was hired to lobby in the United States for Zaire (now named the Democratic Republic of the Congo). After three years of efforts on Zaire’s behalf, Dunn submitted a bill for $500,000. Instead of paying, Zaire agreed to trade computers to Dunn, who was to sell them to Nigeria for $32.1 million. “Senator Frank,” who claimed to be from Nigeria, told Dunn that he would receive his $32.1 million after he paid “back taxes” supposedly due to that country. Frank offered to facilitate the payments. Dunn gave Frank the number of his account at Bank One, N.A., in Shreveport, Louisiana. As part of the deal, on August 1, 2001, a check in the amount of $315,000 drawn on the account of Argenbright Security, Inc., at First Union National Bank of Georgia was deposited into Dunn’s account—which had never held more than $5,000—and sent out for collection. Because it contained an incorrect routing number, its processing was delayed. Meanwhile, on Frank’s instructions, Dunn wired $277,000 to an account at a Virginia bank. On September 24, the $315,000 check was returned to Bank One as counterfeit. Bank One filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Dunn, alleging that he owed $281,019.11, the amount by which his account was overdrawn. The court issued a summary judgment in Bank One’s favor. Dunn appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

DREW, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Dunn * * * contends that Bank One is liable for damages because it acted unreasonably by its delay in determining the counterfeit nature of the check. In making this argument, Dunn relies on [Louisiana Revised Statutes Section 10:4-214(a), Louisiana's version of UCC 4-214(a)], which provides:

If a collecting bank has made provisional settlement with its customer for an item and fails by reason of dishonor, suspension of payments by a bank, or otherwise to receive settlement for the item which is or becomes final, the bank may revoke the settlement given by it, charge back the amount of any credit given for the item to its customer's account, or obtain refund from its customer, whether or not it is able to return the item, if by its midnight deadline or within a longer reasonable time after it learns the facts it returns the item or sends notification of the facts. If the return or notice is delayed beyond the bank's midnight deadline or a longer reasonable time after it learns the facts, the bank may revoke the settlement, charge back the credit, or obtain refund from its customer, but it is liable for any loss resulting from the delay. These rights to revoke, charge back, and obtain refund terminate if and when a settlement for the item received by the bank is or becomes final.

A bank is required to exercise ordinary care in sending notice of dishonor after learning that the item has not been paid or accepted. Notifying the customer of dishonor after the bank's midnight deadline may constitute the exercise of ordinary care if the bank took proper action within a reasonably longer time, but the bank has the burden of establishing timeliness. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [T]he right of charge back does not relieve the bank from any liability for failure to exercise ordinary care in handling the item, and the measure of damages for such failure is stated in [Louisiana Revised Statute Section 10:4-103(e) [UCC 4-103(e)], which provides:

The measure of damages for failure to exercise ordinary care in handling an item is the amount of the item reduced by an amount that could not have been realized by the exercise of ordinary care. If there is also bad faith it includes any other damages the party suffered as a proximate consequence.

When it is established that some part or all of the item could not have been collected even by the use of ordinary care the recovery is reduced by the amount that would have been in any event uncollectible.

Dunn's liability is not diminished because of Bank One's delay in notifying Dunn that the check was counterfeit. Even if Dunn had received earlier notice from Bank One that the check was counterfeit, he still had no recourse against Argenbright Security. The $315,000 was uncollectible against Argenbright Security. * * * The motion for summary judgment was properly granted * * * .

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. Even if Dunn had received notice of the counterfeit status of the check from Bank One before September 24, he would not have been able to collect the amount of the check from Argenbright Security.

● The Ethical Dimension Does a bank have a duty to protect its customers from their own naiveté, as exemplified in this case by Dunn's trusting someone he did not know with his bank account information? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension How would electronic check presentment (to be discussed shortly) have affected the timeliness of the events in this case and ultimately the outcome?

How the Federal Reserve System Clears Checks The Federal Reserve System is a network of twelve district banks, which are located around the country and headed by the Federal Reserve Board of Governors. Most banks in the United States have Federal Reserve accounts. The Federal Reserve System has greatly simplified the check-collection process by acting as a clearinghouse—a system or a place where banks exchange checks and drafts drawn on each other and settle daily balances.

For example, suppose that Pamela Moy of Philadelphia writes a check to Jeanne Sutton of San Francisco. When Jeanne receives the check in the mail, she deposits it in her bank. Her bank then deposits the check in the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, which transfers it to the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia. That Federal Reserve bank then sends the check to Moy's bank, which deducts the amount of the check from Moy's account.

Electronic Check Presentment In the past, most checks were processed manually—the employees of each bank in the collection chain would physically handle each check that passed through the bank for collection or payment. Today, however, most checks are processed electronically. In contrast to manual check processing, which can take days, electronic check presentment can be done on the day of the deposit. With electronic check presentment, items may be encoded with information (such as the amount of the check) that can be read and processed by other banks' computers. In some situations, a check is retained at its place of deposit, and only its image or

A person who encodes information on an item after the item has been issued warrants to any subsequent bank or payor that the encoded information is correct [UCC 4-209]. This is also true for a person who retains an item while transmitting its image or information describing it as presentation for payment. This person warrants that the retention and presentment of the item comply with a Federal Reserve or other agreement.

Regulation CC provides that a returned check must be encoded with the routing number of the depository bank, the amount of the check, and other information and adds that this “does not affect a paying bank's responsibility to return a check within the deadlines required by the UCC.” What happens when a payor bank fails to properly encode an item and thereby causes the check to be returned to the depository bank after the required deadline? That was the question in the following case.

21. UCC 4-110 assumes that no bank will participate in an electronic presentment program without an express agreement (which is no longer true since Check 21 went into effect).

EXTENDED NBT Bank, N.A. v. First National Community Bank
CASE 27.3 United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, 2004. 393 F.3d 404.

SMITH, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * [A] small group of Pennsylvania business entities arranged to write checks on one account, drawing on non-existent funds, and then cover these overdrafts with checks drawn on another account that also lacked sufficient funds. * * * The scheme collapsed when three checks initially deposited at [NBT Bank, N.A.] and subsequently presented for payment to [First National Community Bank (FNCB)] were discovered by FNCB to have been drawn on an FNCB account that lacked sufficient funds. There is no dispute between the parties that two of these three checks were properly returned by FNCB to the [Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia] prior to the applicable midnight deadline.

The Disputed Check (i.e., the third check, for $706,000) was drawn on an FNCB account and drafted by an entity called Human Services Consultants, Inc. On March 8, 2001, the Disputed Check was proffered [handed over] for deposit at NBT by an entity called Human Services Consultants Management, Inc., [doing business as] “PA Health.” * * *

* * * *

After the Disputed Check was presented for deposit at NBT, the bank gave provisional credit to the depositor, PA Health, for the amount of the Disputed Check. NBT also transmitted the Disputed Check to the Reserve Bank for presentment to FNCB. * * * The Reserve Bank then forwarded the Disputed Check to FNCB, and FNCB received it on March 12, 2001. * * *

* * * *

On March 13, 2001, FNCB determined it would not pay the Disputed Check because of the absence of sufficient funds in the account on which the check was drawn. That same day, FNCB sought to return the Disputed Check to NBT through the Reserve Bank. * * * [T]he Disputed Check was physically delivered to the Reserve Bank prior to 11:59 P.M. on March 13. * * * FNCB also sent a notice of dishonor to NBT * * * in which FNCB indicated that it did not intend to pay the Disputed Check. NBT received this notice prior to the close of business on March 13. * * *

When FNCB sent the Disputed Check to the Reserve Bank on March 13, 2001, FNCB * * * erroneously encoded [it] with the routing number for PNC Bank instead of the routing number for NBT [Bank].

* * * Because the Disputed Check was improperly encoded, NBT did not receive it back * * * until March 16, 2001. * * * NBT suffered no damages or actual loss as a result of the encoding error * * * .

NBT instituted this action [in a federal district court] against FNCB on May 25, 2001. * * * NBT claimed that FNCB's encoding error meant FNCB had failed to return the Disputed Check prior to the midnight deadline as required by the UCC, and that FNCB was therefore accountable to NBT for the full amount of the Disputed Check. * * *

The District Court granted FNCB's motion [for summary judgment]. NBT appeals.

* * * Federal law forms part of the legal framework within which check-processing activities take place. Of particular relevance to this appeal are the 1988 regulations adopted by the Federal Reserve implementing the Expedited Funds Availability Act. These regulations, referred to collectively as "Regulation CC," complement but do not necessarily replace the requirements of Article 4 of the UCC.

* * * Regulation CC indisputably binds the parties, pursuant to both its own terms, as well as [13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Annotated Section 4103 (Pennsylvania's version of UCC 4-103)], which indicates that "Federal Reserve regulations" are to be treated as agreements that may vary the terms of the UCC. * * *

Because Regulation CC * * * is binding on the parties, and because Regulation CC is the source of the encoding requirement invoked by NBT, the extent of FNCB's liability for its encoding error must be measured by the standards set forth in Regulation CC. *Regulation CC states that a bank that fails to exercise ordinary care in complying with the [encoding] provisions of * * * Regulation CC * * * "may be liable" to the depository bank.* Then, in broad, unrestricted language, Regulation CC states:

The measure of damages for failure to exercise ordinary care is the amount of the loss incurred, up to the amount of the check, reduced by the amount of the loss that the [plaintiff bank] would have incurred even if the [defendant] bank had exercised ordinary care.

This provision does not provide an exception to this standard for measuring damages in instances where noncompliance with Regulation CC is alleged to have resulted in noncompliance with the UCC's midnight deadline rule. Here, the parties have stipulated that NBT suffered no loss as a result of FNCB's encoding error. Thus, under the plain language of Regulation CC, NBT may not recover from FNCB for the amount of the Disputed Check. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Accordingly, * * * we affirm the order of the District Court * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. How might the result in this case have been different if NBT had committed the encoding error and FNCB had suffered the loss?
2. If a bank warrants that the information it encoded on an item is correct and FNCB committed an error in encoding, then why did the court not hold FNCB liable for the amount of the check?

Check Clearing and the Check 21 Act

In the traditional collection process, paper checks had to be physically transported before they could be cleared. To streamline this costly and time-consuming process and to improve the overall efficiency of the nation's payment system, Congress passed the Check Clearing in the 21st Century Act²² (Check 21), which went into effect on October 28, 2004.

Purpose of Check 21 Prior to the implementation of Check 21, banks had to present the original paper check for payment in the absence of an agreement for presentment in some other form. Although the UCC authorizes banks to use other means of presentment, such as electronic presentment, a broad-based system of electronic presentment failed to develop because it required agreements among individual banks. Check 21 has changed this situation by creating a new negotiable instrument called a substitute check. Although the act did not require any bank to change its current check-collection practices, the creation of substitute checks will certainly facilitate the use of electronic check processing over time.

What Is a Substitute Check? A substitute check is a paper reproduction of the front and back of an original check that contains all of the same information required on checks for automated processing. Banks create a substitute check from a digital image of an original check. Every substitute check must include the following statement somewhere on it: "This a legal copy of your check. You can use it in the same way you would use the original check."

In essence, those financial institutions that exchange digital images of checks do not have to send the original paper checks. They can simply transmit the information electronically and replace the original checks with the paper reproductions—the substitute checks. Banks that do not exchange checks electronically are required to accept substitute checks in the same way that they accept original checks.

The Gradual Elimination of Paper Checks Because financial institutions must accept substitute checks as if they were original checks, the original checks will no longer be needed and will probably be destroyed after their digital images are created. By eliminating the original check after a substitute check is created, the financial system can prevent the check from being paid twice. Also, eliminating original checks and retaining only digital images will reduce the expense of storage and retrieval. Nevertheless, at least for quite a while, not all checks will be converted to substitute checks. That means that if a bank returns canceled checks to deposit holders at the end of each month, some of those returned checks may be substitute checks, and some may be original canceled paper checks.

Since the passage of Check 21, financial institution customers cannot demand an original canceled check. Check 21 is a federal law and applies to all financial institutions, other businesses, and individuals in the United States. In other words, no customers can opt out of Check 21 and demand that their original canceled checks be returned with their monthly statements. Also, businesses and individuals must accept a substitute check as proof of payment because it is the legal equivalent of the original check.

Reduced "Float" Time Sometimes, individuals and businesses write checks even though they have insufficient funds in their accounts to cover those checks. Such check writers are relying on "float," or the time between when a check is written and when the amount is actually deducted from their account. When all checks had to be physically transported, the float time could be several days, but as Check 21 is implemented, the time required to process checks will be substantially reduced—and so will float time. Thus, account holders who plan to cover their checks after writing them may experience unexpected overdrafts.

Though consumers and businesses will no longer be able to rely on float time, they may benefit in another way from Check 21. The Expedited Funds Availability Act (mentioned earlier in this chapter) requires that the Federal Reserve Board revise the availability schedule for funds from deposited checks to correspond to reductions in check-processing time. Therefore, as the speed of check processing increases under Check 21, the Federal Reserve Board will reduce the maximum time that a bank can hold funds from deposited checks before making them available to the depositor. Thus, account holders will have faster access to their deposited funds.

Electronic Fund Transfers

The application of computer technology to banking, in the form of electronic fund transfer systems, has helped to relieve banking institutions of the burden of having to move mountains of paperwork to process fund transfers. An electronic fund transfer (EFT) is a transfer of funds made by the use of an electronic terminal, a telephone, a computer, or magnetic tape. The law governing EFTs depends on the type of transfer involved. Consumer fund transfers are governed by the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA) of 1978.²³ Commercial fund transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC.

The benefits of electronic banking are obvious. Automatic payments, direct deposits, and other fund transfers are now made electronically; no physical transfers of cash, checks, or other negotiable instruments are involved. Not surprisingly, though, electronic banking can also pose difficulties. For example, it is difficult to issue stop-payment orders with electronic banking. In addition, fewer records are available to prove or disprove that a transaction took place, and the possibilities for tampering with a person's private banking information have increased.

Types of EFT Systems

Most banks today offer EFT services to their customers. The following are the four most common types of EFT systems used by bank customers:

1. Automated teller machines (ATMs)—The machines are connected online to the bank's computers. A customer inserts a debit card (a plastic card, also called an ATM card) issued by the bank and keys in a personal identification number (PIN) to access her or his accounts and conduct banking transactions.
2. Point-of-sale systems—Online terminals allow consumers to transfer funds to merchants to pay for purchases using a debit card.
3. Direct deposits and withdrawals—Customers can authorize the bank to allow another party, such as the government or an employer, to make direct deposits into their accounts. Similarly, a customer can request the bank to make automatic payments to a third party at regular, recurrent intervals from the customer's funds (insurance premiums or loan payments, for example).

4. Internet payment systems—Many financial institutions permit their customers to access the institution's computer system via the Internet and direct a transfer of funds between accounts or pay a particular bill, such as a utility bill. Payments can be made on a onetime or a recurring basis.

Consumer Fund Transfers

The Electronic Fund Transfer Act (EFTA) provides a basic framework for the rights, liabilities, and responsibilities of users of EFT systems. Additionally, the act gave the Federal Reserve Board authority to issue rules and regulations to help implement the act's provisions. The Federal Reserve Board's implemental regulation is called Regulation E.

The EFTA governs financial institutions that offer electronic transfers of funds involving customer accounts. The types of accounts covered include checking accounts, savings accounts, and any other asset accounts established for personal, family, or household purposes. Telephone transfers are covered by the EFTA only if they are made in accordance with a prearranged plan under which periodic or recurring transfers are contemplated.

Disclosure Requirements The EFTA is essentially a disclosure law benefiting consumers. The act requires financial institutions to inform consumers of their rights and responsibilities, including those listed here, with respect to EFT systems.

1. If a customer's debit card is lost or stolen and used without her or his permission, the customer may be required to pay no more than $50. The customer, however, must notify the bank of the loss or theft within two days of learning about it. Otherwise, the customer's liability increases to $500. The customer may be liable for more than $500 if she or he does not report the unauthorized use within sixty days after it appears on the customer's statement.
2. The customer has sixty days to discover and notify the bank of any error on the monthly statement. The bank then has ten days to investigate and must report its conclusions to the customer in writing. If the bank takes longer than ten days to do so, it must return the disputed amount to the customer's account until it finds the error. If there is no error, however, the customer must return the funds to the bank.

23. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1693-1693r. The EFTA amended Title IX of the Consumer Credit Protection Act.

3. The bank must furnish receipts for transactions made through computer terminals, but it is not obligated to do so for telephone transfers.
4. The bank must provide a monthly statement for every month in which there is an electronic transfer of funds. Otherwise, the bank must provide a statement every quarter. The statement must show the amount and date of the transfer, the names of the retailers or other third parties involved, the location or identification of the terminal, and the fees. Additionally, the statement must give an address and a phone number for inquiries and error notices.
5. Any preauthorized payment for utility bills and insurance premiums can be stopped three days before the scheduled transfer if the customer notifies the financial institution orally or in writing. (The institution may require the customer to provide written confirmation within fourteen days of an oral notification.) For other EFT transactions, however, the EFTA does not provide for the reversal of an electronic transfer of funds once the transfer has occurred.

Unauthorized Transfers Because of the vulnerability of EFT systems to fraudulent activities, the EFTA clearly defined what constitutes an unauthorized transfer. Under the act, a transfer is unauthorized if (1) it is initiated by a person who has no actual authority to initiate the transfer, (2) the consumer receives no benefit from it, and (3) the consumer did not furnish the person “with the card, code, or other means of access” to his or her account. Gaining unauthorized access to an EFT system constitutes a federal felony, and those convicted may be fined up to $10,000 and sentenced to as long as ten years in prison.

Violations and Damages Banks are held to strict compliance with the terms of the EFTA. If they fail to adhere to the letter of the law of the EFTA, they will be held liable for the violation. For a bank’s violation of the EFTA, a consumer may recover both actual damages (including attorneys’ fees and costs) and punitive damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1,000. In a class-action suit, the punitive-damages award can be up to $500,000 or 1 percent of the institution’s net worth. (Unlike actual damages, punitive damages are assessed to punish a defendant or to deter similar wrongdoers.) Failure to investigate an error in good faith makes the bank liable for treble damages (three times the amount of damages). Even when a customer has sustained no actual damage, the bank may be liable for legal costs and punitive damages if it fails to follow the proper procedures outlined by the EFTA in regard to error resolution.

Commercial Fund Transfers

Funds are also transferred electronically “by wire” between commercial parties. In fact, the dollar volume of payments made via wire transfers is more than $1 trillion a day—an amount that far exceeds the dollar volume of payments made by other means. The two major wire payment systems are the Federal Reserve wire transfer network (Fedwire) and the New York Clearing House Interbank Payments Systems (CHIPS).

Commercial wire transfers are governed by Article 4A of the UCC, which has been adopted by most of the states. Article 4A uses the term funds transfer rather than wire transfer to describe the overall payment transaction. The full text of Article 4A is presented in Appendix C.

As an example of the type of funds transfer covered by Article 4A, assume that American Industries, Inc., owes $5 million to Chandler Corporation. Instead of sending Chandler a check or some other instrument that would enable Chandler to obtain payment, American Industries tells its bank, North Bank, to credit $5 million to Chandler’s account in South Bank. North Bank debits American Industries’ North Bank account and wires $5 million to South Bank with instructions to credit $5 million to Chandler’s South Bank account. In more complex transactions, additional banks would be involved.

E-Money and Online Banking

New forms of electronic payments (e-payments) have the potential to replace physical cash—coins and paper currency—with virtual cash in the form of electronic impulses. This is the unique promise of digital cash, which consists of funds stored on microchips and other computer devices. Digital cash is increasingly being used to launder money, as discussed in this chapter’s Emerging Trends feature on pages 564 and 565.

Various forms of electronic money, or e-money, are emerging. The simplest kind of e-money system uses stored-value cards. These are plastic cards embossed with magnetic strips containing magnetically encoded data. In some applications, a stored-value card can be

Using Digital Cash Facilitates Money Laundering

As Chapter 9 pointed out, criminals often engage in money laundering to make their illegitimate funds appear legitimate. Profits illegally obtained—through drug trafficking, for example—are processed through a series of financial transactions that conceals their criminal origin. For example, Colombian drug cartels have used some of their profits to buy the most advanced computers and programming available so that they can engage in digital money laundering using secret Web sites. At a typical encrypted private Web site operated by a drug cartel, black market money changers bid on cash in U.S. and other currencies and eventually enable it to be converted to Colombian pesos.

Investigators for the U.S. Treasury Department estimate that these private Web sites can launder as much as $3 billion per year. Although most countries have legislation against money laundering, it is estimated that worldwide more than $600 billion in drug-trafficking profits is laundered every year—an amount equal to between 2 and 5 percent of the world's gross domestic product.^a

Reporting Requirements for Cash Transfers

Under current law, U.S. financial institutions must report transactions or fund transfers involving more than $10,000 in cash.^b In the past, to avoid running afoul of these reporting requirements, drug traffickers—and terrorist groups—had to move their cash a little at a time in numerous transactions or smuggle bundles of cash across borders. Now the advent of digital cash has given them new options.

a. This statistic was taken from the Web site of the U.S. Department of Justice, www.usdoj.gov/dea/programs/money.htm.

b. The Bank Secrecy Act of 1970, 18 U.S.C. Sections 1956–1957, as amended by the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986, 31 C.F.R. Section 103.22(a)(1); and as modified by Title III of the Patriot Act of 2001.

Laundering Money through Prepaid ATM Cards

Today, many drug traffickers, terrorist groups, and other criminals who must move large amounts of cash are turning to prepaid ATM cards. From a would-be money launderer's perspective, a prepaid ATM card offers several advantages over a standard ATM or debit card issued by a bank. Any bank-issued card is linked to the customer's bank account. Thus, using such a card creates a paper trail (albeit electronically) that can be easily traced.

In contrast, a prepaid ATM card has no link to a bank account. It is essentially a stored-value card. The purchaser simply pays a specific amount to the card provider, and that amount is loaded onto the card. The user can then access those funds anywhere in the world without having to provide identification or have a bank account. Students and travelers use prepaid ATM cards as a convenient and safe substitute for cash. So, too, do about 75 million used only to purchase specific goods and services offered by the card issuer. For example, university libraries typically have copy machines that students operate by inserting a stored-value card. Each time a student makes copies, the machine deducts the per-copy fee from the card. Stored-value cards in the form of prepaid ATM cards can be used at any place that accepts ATM cards.

Another form of e-money is the smart card. Smart cards are plastic cards containing computer microchips that can hold much more information than magnetic strips. A smart card carries and processes security programming. This capability gives smart cards a technical advantage over stored-value cards. The microprocessors on smart cards can also authenticate the validity of transactions. Retailers can program electronic cash registers to confirm the authenticity of a smart card by examining a unique digital signature stored on its microchip. (Digital signatures were discussed in Chapter 19.)

Online Banking Services

Increasingly, many bank customers are conducting at least part of their banking online. Today, most online bank customers use three kinds of services. One of the most popular is bill consolidation and payment. Another is transferring funds among accounts (which may often also be accomplished by phone or through an ATM). The third is applying for loans, which many banks permit customers to do via the Internet. Customers typically must appear in person to finalize the terms of a loan, however.

Two important banking activities generally are not yet available online: depositing and withdrawing funds. With smart cards, people could transfer funds on the Internet, thereby effectively transforming their personal computers into ATMs. Many observers believe that people will eventually be introduced to e-money and smart cards through online banking.

Since the late 1990s, several banks have operated exclusively on the Internet. These “virtual banks” have residents of the United States who do not have bank accounts.

More important for money laundering purposes is that prepaid ATM cards can be purchased anonymously at retail and check-cashing stores across the nation—businesses that are not yet subject to the government's reporting requirements. Thus, drug traffickers and terrorist groups can pay for the cards with large amounts of cash and then use the cards to move funds across the border—a much easier process than smuggling physical cash.

Using Virtual Gaming Currency to Launder Money

The growing popularity of virtual gaming has opened the door to cyber laundering—and provided money launderers with a new source of prepaid ATM cards. For years, gamers in virtual worlds have been selling their digital monies, goods, and properties for real-world compensation. Initially, players were able to convert their virtual dollars or credits to real-world cash only by selling them on online auction sites, such as eBay. Now, however, gamers can go to various Web sites and exchange their virtual currency for real-world ATM cards. In 2006, for example, the makers of Entropia Universe began offering prepaid ATM cards in exchange for virtual assets.

With these new types of ATM cards, a gamer can instantly convert his or her virtual-world assets into physical currency and withdraw “real” cash from any Versatel brand ATM in the world. This means that a person can generate and hold financial assets anonymously in the virtual world without having to report the proceeds to the government or pay taxes on them. More importantly, these assets can be purchased, transferred, and accessed from any place in the world and are completely unregulated and unreported. Once the funds are withdrawn from a virtual account, they are “clean” and cannot be traced to an identifiable source. Hence, the virtual world holds great appeal for those who wish to hide their assets from the government's view and transfer funds internationally without risking detection.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE BUSINESSPERSON

1. Be aware that all banks are required to report any wire transfers more than $10,000 to the U.S. Treasury.
2. Be prepared for increased government regulation of digital cash transactions.

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. Should only banks and regulated financial institutions be allowed to issue ATM cards? Why or why not?
2. How else might the government regulate digital funds to reduce the potential for cyber laundering?

no physical branch offices. Because few individuals are equipped to send funds to virtual banks via smart-card technology, the virtual banks have accepted deposits through physical delivery systems, such as the U.S. Postal Service, FedEx, UPS, or DHL.

Regulatory Compliance

Banks have an interest in promoting the widespread use of online banking because it has significant potential for reducing costs and thus increasing profits. As in other areas of cyberspace, however, determining how laws apply to online banking activities can be difficult.

The Home Mortgage Disclosure Act²⁴ and the Community Reinvestment Act (CRA) of 1977,²⁵ for example, require a bank to define its market area and also to provide information about its deposits and loans. Under the CRA, banks establish market areas situated next to their branch offices. The banks map these areas using boundaries defined by counties or standard metropolitan areas and annually review the maps. The purpose of these requirements is to prevent discrimination in lending practices.

How does a successful “cyberbank” delineate its community? If, for example, Bank of Internet becomes a tremendous success, does it really have any physical communities? Will the Federal Reserve Board simply allow a written description of a cybercommunity for Internet customers? Such regulatory issues are new, challenging, and certain to become more complicated as Internet banking widens its scope internationally.

Privacy Protection

At the present time, it is not clear which, if any, laws apply to the security of e-money payment information and e-money issuers' financial records. This is partly because it is not clear whether e-money issuers fit within the traditional definition of a financial institution.

E-Money Payment Information The Federal Reserve has decided not to impose Regulation E, which governs certain electronic fund transfers, on e-money transactions. Federal laws prohibiting unauthorized access to electronic communications might apply, however. For example, the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986²⁶ prohibits any person from knowingly divulging to any other person the contents of an electronic communication while that communication is in transmission or in electronic storage.

E-Money Issuers' Financial Records Under the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978,²⁷ before a financial institution may give financial information about you to a federal agency, you must explicitly consent. If you do not, a federal agency wishing to access your financial records normally must obtain a warrant. A digital cash issuer may be subject to this act if that issuer is deemed to be (1) a bank by virtue of its holding customer funds or (2) any entity that issues a physical card similar to a credit or debit card.

Consumer Financial Data In 1999, Congress passed the Financial Services Modernization Act,²⁸ also known as the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act, in an attempt to delineate how financial institutions can treat customer data. In general, the act and its rules²⁹ place restrictions and obligations on financial institutions to protect consumer data and privacy. Every financial institution must provide its customers with information on its privacy policies and practices. No financial institution can disclose nonpublic personal information about a consumer to an unaffiliated third party unless the act's disclosure and opt-out requirements are met.

REVIEWING Checks and Banking in the Digital Age

RPM Pizza, Inc., issued a check for $96,000 to Systems Marketing for an advertising campaign. A few days later, RPM decided not to go through with the deal and placed a written stop-payment order on the check. RPM and Systems had no further contact for many months. Three weeks after the stop-payment order expired, however, Toby Rierison, an employee at Systems, cashed the check. Bank One Cambridge, RPM's bank, paid the check with funds from RPM's account. Because of the amount of the check, and because the check was more than six months old (stale), the signature on the check should have been specially verified according to standard banking procedures and Bank One's own policies, but it was not. RPM filed a suit in a federal district court against Bank One to recover the amount of the check. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. How long is a written stop-payment order effective? What else could RPM have done to prevent this check from being cashed?
2. What would happen if it turned out that RPM did not have a legitimate reason for stopping payment on the check?
3. What are a bank's obligations with respect to stale checks? Should Bank One have contacted RPM before paying the check? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Rierison's indorsement on the check was a forgery. Would a court be likely to hold the bank liable for the amount of the check because it failed to verify the signature on the check? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

27-1. Checks are usually three-party instruments. On what type of check, however, does a bank serve as both the drawer and the drawee? What type of check does a bank agree in advance to accept when the check is presented for payment?

Gary goes grocery shopping and carelessly leaves his checkbook in his shopping cart. His checkbook, with two blank checks remaining, is stolen by Dolores. On May 5, Dolores forges Gary's name on a check for $10 and cashes the check at Gary's bank, Citizens Bank of Middletown. Gary has not reported the loss of his blank checks to his bank. On June 1, Gary receives his monthly bank statement and copies of canceled checks from Citizens Bank, including the forged check, but he does not examine the canceled checks. On June 20, Dolores forges Gary's last check. This check is for $1,000 and is cashed at Eastern City Bank, a bank with which Dolores has previously done business. Eastern City Bank puts the check through the collection process, and Citizens Bank honors it. On July 1, on receipt of his bank statement and canceled checks covering June transactions, Gary discovers both forgeries and immediately notifies Citizens Bank. Dolores cannot be found. Gary claims that Citizens Bank must recredit his account for both checks, as his signature was forged. Discuss fully Gary's claim.

27-3. On January 5, Brian drafts a check for $3,000 drawn on Southern Marine Bank and payable to his assistant, Shanta. Brian puts last year's date on the check by mistake. On January 7, before Shanta has had a chance to go to the bank, Brian is killed in an automobile accident. Southern Marine Bank is aware of Brian's death. On January 10, Shanta presents the check to the bank, and the bank honors the check by payment to Shanta. Later, Brian's widow, Joyce, claims that because the bank knew of Brian's death and also because the check was by date over one year old, the bank acted wrongfully when it paid Shanta. Joyce, as executor of Brian's estate and sole heir by his will, demands that Southern Marine Bank recredit Brian's estate for the check paid to Shanta. Discuss fully Southern Marine's liability in light of Joyce's demand.

27-4. Yannuzzi has a checking account at Texas Bank. She frequently uses her access card to obtain cash from the bank's automated teller machines. She always withdraws $50 when she makes a withdrawal, but she never withdraws more than $50 in any one day. When she received the April statement on her account, she noticed that on April 13 two withdrawals for $50 each had been made from the account. Believing this to be a mistake, she went to her bank on May 10 to inform it of the error. A bank officer told her that the bank would investigate and advise her as to the result. On May 26, the bank officer called her and said that bank personnel were having trouble locating the error but would continue to try to find it. On June 20, the bank sent her a full written report telling her that no error had been made. Yannuzzi, unhappy with the bank's explanation, filed suit against the bank, alleging that it had violated the Electronic Fund Transfer Act. What was the outcome of the suit? Would it matter if the bank could show that on the day in question it deducted $50 from Yannuzzi's account to cover a check that cleared the bank on that day—a check that Yannuzzi had written to a local department store?

27-5. Forged Signatures. Visiting Nurses Association of Telfair County, Inc. (VNA), maintained a checking account at Security State Bank in Valdosta, Georgia. Wanda Williamson, a VNA clerk, was responsible for making VNA bank deposits, but she was not a signatory on the association's account. Over a four-year period, Williamson embezzled more than $250,000 from VNA by forging its indorsement on checks, cashing them at the bank, and keeping a portion of the proceeds. Williamson was arrested, convicted, sentenced to a prison term, and ordered to pay restitution. VNA filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the bank, alleging, among other things, negligence. The bank filed a motion for summary judgment on the ground that VNA was precluded by Section 4-406(f) of the Uniform Commercial Code from recovering on checks with forged indorsements. Should the court grant the motion? Explain. [Security State Bank v. Visiting Nurses Association of Telfair County, Inc., 568 S.E.2d 491 (Ga.App.2002)]

27-6. Forged Signatures. Cynthia Stafford worked as an administrative professional at Gerber & Gerber, P.C. (professional corporation), a law firm, for more than two years. During that time, she stole ten checks payable to Gerber & Gerber (G&G), which she indorsed in blank by forging one of the attorney's signatures. She then indorsed the forged checks in her name and deposited them in her account at Regions Bank. Over the same period, G&G deposited in its accounts at Regions Bank thousands of checks amounting to $300 million to $400 million. Each G&G check was indorsed with a rubber stamp for deposit into the G&G account. The thefts were made possible, in part, because G&G kept unindorsed checks in an open file accessible to all employees and Stafford was sometimes the person assigned to stamp the checks. When the thefts were discovered, G&G filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Regions Bank to recover the stolen funds, alleging, among other things, negligence. Regions Bank filed a motion for summary judgment. What principles apply to attribute liability between these parties? How should the court rule on the bank's motion? Explain. [Gerber & Gerber, P.C. v. Regions Bank, 266 Ga.App.8, 596 S.E.2d 174 (2004)]

27-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In December 1999, Jenny Triplett applied for a bookkeeping position with Spacemakers of America, Inc., in Atlanta, Georgia. Spacemakers hired Triplett and delegated to her all responsibility for maintaining the company checkbook and reconciling it with the monthly statements from SunTrust Bank. Triplett also handled invoices from vendors. Spacemakers' president, Dennis Rose, reviewed the invoices and signed the checks to pay them, but no other employee checked Triplett's work. By the end of her first full month of employment, Triplett had forged six checks totaling more than $22,000, all payable to Triple M Entertainment, which was not a Spacemakers vendor. By October 2000, Triplett had forged fifty-nine more checks, totaling more than $475,000. A SunTrust employee became suspicious of an item that required sight inspection under the bank's fraud detection standards, which exceeded those of other banks in the area. Triplett was arrested. Spacemakers filed a suit in a Georgia state court against SunTrust. The bank filed a motion for summary judgment. On what basis could the bank avoid liability? In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Spacemakers of America, Inc. v. SunTrust Bank, 271 Ga.App. 335, 609 S.E.2d 683 (2005)]

27-8. Forged Indorsements. In 1994, Brian and Penny Grieme bought a house in Mandan, North Dakota. They borrowed for the purchase through a loan program financed by the North Dakota Housing Finance Agency (NDHFA). The Griemes obtained insurance for the house from Center Mutual Insurance Co. When a hailstorm damaged the house in 2001, Center Mutual determined that the loss was $4,378 and issued a check for that amount, drawn on Bremer Bank, N.A. The check's payees included Brian Grieme and the NDHFA. Grieme presented the check for payment to Wells Fargo Bank of Tempe, Arizona. The back of the check bore his signature and in hand-printed block letters the words "ND Housing Finance." The check was processed for collection and paid, and the canceled check was returned to Center Mutual. By the time the insurer learned that NDHFAs indorsement had been forged, the Griemes had canceled their policy, defaulted on their loan, and filed for bankruptcy. The NDHFA filed a suit in a North Dakota state court against Center Mutual for the amount of the check. Who is most likely to suffer the loss in this case? Why? [State ex rel. North Dakota Housing Finance Agency v. Center Mutual Insurance Co., 720 N.W.2d 425 (N.Dak. 2006)]

- Issue: The main issue in this case concerned the effect of an item on the face of a check and a specific time period. What was the item, what was the time period, and what was the question?

From the 1960s, James Johnson served as Bradley Union's personal caretaker and assistant, and was authorized by Union to handle his banking transactions. Louise Johnson, James's wife, wrote checks on Union's checking account to pay his bills, normally signing the checks "Brad Union." Branch Banking & Trust Co. (BB&T) managed Union's account. In December 2000, on the basis of Union's deteriorating mental and physical condition, a North Carolina state court declared him incompetent. Douglas Maxwell was appointed as Union's guardian. Maxwell "froze" Union's checking account and asked BB&T for copies of the canceled checks, which were provided by July 2001. Maxwell believed that Union's signature on the checks had been forged. In August 2002, Maxwell contacted BB&T, which refused to recredit Union's account. Maxwell filed a suit on Union's behalf in a North Carolina state court against BB&T. [Union v. Branch Banking & Trust Co., 176 N.C.App. 711, 627 S.E.2d 276 (2006)]

- (a) Before Maxwell's appointment, BB&T sent monthly statements and canceled checks to Union, and Johnson reviewed them, but no unauthorized signatures were ever reported. On whom can liability be imposed in the case of a forged drawer's signature on a check? What are the limits set by Section 4-406(f) of the Uniform Commercial Code? Should Johnson's position, Union's incompetence, or Maxwell's appointment affect the application of these principles? Explain.
- (b) Why was this suit brought against BB&T? Is BB&T liable? If not, who is? Why? Regardless of any violations of the law, did anyone act unethically in this case? If so, who and why?

Negotiable Instruments

Articles 3 and 4 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which deal with negotiable instruments, constitute an important part of the law governing commercial transactions. These articles reflect several fundamental ethical principles. One principle is that individuals should be protected against harm caused by the misuse of negotiable instruments. Another basic principle—and one that underlies the entire concept of negotiable instruments—is that the laws governing the use of negotiable instruments should be practical and reasonable to encourage the free flow of commerce.

Here, we look first at some of the ethical implications of the concept of a holder in due course (HDC). We then examine some other ethical issues that frequently arise in relation to these instruments.

Ethics, the HDC Concept, and Ort v. Fowler

The drafters of Article 3 did not create the HDC concept out of thin air. Indeed, under the common law, courts had often restricted the extent to which defenses could successfully be raised against a good faith holder of a negotiable instrument. As an example, consider a classic 1884 case, Ort v. Fowler.¹

Case Background Ort, a farmer, was working alone in his field one day, when he was approached by a stranger who claimed to be the statewide agent for a manufacturer of iron posts and wire fencing. The two men conversed for some time, and eventually the stranger persuaded the farmer to act as an area representative for the manufacturer. The stranger then completed two documents for Ort to sign, telling him that they were identical copies of an agreement in which Ort agreed to represent the manufacturer.

Because the farmer did not have his glasses with him and could read only with great difficulty, he asked the stranger to read the document to him. The stranger then purported to do so, not mentioning that the document was a promissory note. Both men signed each document. The stranger later negotiated the promissory note he had fraudulently obtained from Ort to a party that today we would refer to as an HDC. When this party brought suit against him, Ort attempted to defend on the basis of fraud in the execution.

The Court's Decision The Kansas court deciding the issue entertained three possible views. One was that because Ort never intended to execute a note, he should not be held liable for doing so. A second view was that the jury should decide, as a question of fact, whether Ort was guilty of negligence under the circumstances. The third view was that because Ort possessed all of his faculties and was able to read the English language, signing a promissory note solely in reliance on a stranger's assurances that it was a different instrument constituted negligence.

This third view was the one adopted by the court in 1884. The court held that Ort's negligence had contributed to the fraud and that such negligence precluded Ort from raising fraud as a defense against payment on the note. Today, the UCC expresses essentially the same reasoning: fraud is a defense against an HDC only if the injured party signed the instrument "with neither knowledge nor a reasonable opportunity to learn of its character or its essential terms" [UCC 3-305(a)(1)(iii)].

The Reasoning Underlying the HDC Concept

Although it may not seem fair that an innocent victim should have to suffer the consequences of another's fraudulent act, the UCC assumes that it would be even less fair if an HDC could not collect payment. The reasoning behind this assumption is that an HDC, as a third party, is less likely to have been responsible for—or to have had an opportunity to protect against—the fraud in the underlying transaction.

In general, the HDC doctrine, like other sections of the UCC, reflects the philosophy that when two or more innocent parties are at risk, the burden should fall on the party that was in the best position to prevent the loss. For businesspersons, the HDC doctrine means that they should exercise caution when issuing and accepting commercial paper in order to protect against the risk of loss through fraud.

Good Faith in Negotiable Instruments Law

Clearly, the principle of good faith reflects ethical principles. The most notable application of the good faith requirement in negotiable instruments law is, of course, the HDC doctrine. Traditionally, to acquire the protected status of an HDC, a holder must have acquired an instrument in good faith. Yet other transactions subject to Articles 3 and 4 also require good faith—as, indeed, do all transactions governed by the UCC.

1. 31 Kan. 478, 2 P. 580 (1884).

The Importance of Good Faith A party that acts in bad faith may be precluded from seeking shelter under UCC provisions that would otherwise apply. This point was emphasized by a Pennsylvania court's decision with respect to the fictitious payee rule. The bank in this case had accepted 882 payroll checks generated and indorsed by Dorothy Heck, a payroll clerk employed by Pavex, Inc. The checks were made payable to various current and former Pavex employees, indorsed by Heck with the payees' names, and deposited into Heck's personal checking account at her bank.

Although the indorsements on the checks that Heck deposited did not exactly match the names of the payees—as was required by the bank's policy—the bank allowed Heck to deposit the checks anyway. Because the bank failed to follow its own policy, the court held that the bank had acted in bad faith and could not assert the fictitious payee rule as a defense. The bank was therefore liable for approximately $170,000 of the $250,000 loss suffered by Pavex.²

A different court reached a very different result in another case when a dishonest insurance agent took 279 checks written to his employer, Brooks Insurance; indorsed them; and deposited them into his own bank account. The bank in this case had a policy that any checks written to a business entity should be deposited into an account with that business's name. Although the bank violated its own policy when it allowed the agent to deposit the checks into an account with a different name, the court decided that this was not enough to show bad faith. Even though the bank may have acted negligently, the court allowed the bank to assert the fictitious payee rule and avoid liability.³

How Should Good Faith Be Tested? There has long been a division of opinion as to how good faith should be measured or tested. At one end of the spectrum of views is the position that the test of good faith should be subjective in nature. In other words, as long as a person acts honestly, no matter how negligent or foolish the conduct may be, that person is acting in good faith. At the other end of the spectrum is the "objective" test of good faith. Under this test, honesty in itself is not enough. A party must also act reasonably under the circumstances. Whereas a fool might pass the subjective test, he or she would not meet the objective test.

Over time, the pendulum seems to have swung from one end of the spectrum to the other. When the UCC was initially drafted, the definition of good faith set forth in UCC 1-201(19) established a subjective test for good faith. It defined good faith as "honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned." The only UCC article that incorporated a more objective test for good faith was Article 2. Section 2-103(1)(b) defined good faith as both honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade. Under this test, a person who acts honestly in fact but does not observe reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing will not meet the good faith requirement.

This more objective measure of good faith has since been incorporated into other articles of the UCC, including Articles 3, 4, and 4A.

Criticisms of the Objective Standard Some critics claim that while the subjective test of "honesty in fact" is manageable, the objective test that requires the "observance of reasonable commercial standards" opens the door to potentially endless litigation. After all, it is difficult to determine what is commercially reasonable in a given context until you hear what others in that commercial situation have to say. Thus, parties to a dispute can nearly always make some kind of good faith argument, and any time the issue is raised, litigation can result.

How Good Faith Standards Can Affect HDC Status

Whether the objective or the subjective standard of good faith is used has considerable impact on HDC status, as an example will illustrate. Mitchell was a farmer who operated a multistate farming operation on leased property. Runnells, a grain broker, had sold Mitchell's 2001 grain crop. Mitchell instructed Runnells to use the crop proceeds to draw checks payable to Mitchell's various landlords in fulfillment of his rent obligations. The checks totaled more than $153,000. The landlords accepted the checks in payment of the farmer's rent—completely unaware that Mitchell had already pledged the proceeds from the sale of his crops as collateral for a loan from Agriliance (security interests will be discussed in Chapter 29). Agriliance filed a lawsuit in a federal court against Runnells and the various landlords for conversion (wrongful taking of personal property—see Chapter 6).

According to the UCC, an HDC takes a negotiable instrument free of any claim to the instrument, including claims of prior secured parties. Thus, the outcome of the case depended on whether Runnells and the landlords were HDCs. Under the subjective standard, the landlords would be HDCs because they had taken the checks without actual knowledge of Agriliance's claim to the crop proceeds. The objective standard, however, dictated a different result. Because it is common for farmers to put their crops up as collateral for loans, the court held that reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing required Mitchell's creditors (Runnells and the landlords) to conduct a search of the public records. Such a search would have revealed the existence of Agriliance's prior secured claim. Runnells and the landlords in this case could not be HDCs because they failed to meet the objective element of good faith. The court, therefore, ruled that Agriliance was entitled to the crop proceeds.⁴

Efficiency versus Due Care

A major problem faced by today's banking institutions is how to verify customer signatures on the billions of checks that are processed by the banking system each month. If a bank fails to verify a signature on a check it receives for payment and the check turns out to be forged, the bank will normally be held liable to its customer for the amount paid. But how can banks possibly examine, item by item, each signature on every check that they pay?

The banks' solution to this problem is simply to not examine all signatures. Instead, computers are programmed to verify signatures only on checks exceeding a certain threshold amount, such as

4. Agriliance, L.L.C. v. Runnells Grain Elevator, Inc., 272 F.Supp.2d 800 (S.D. Iowa 2003).

$1,000 or $2,500 or perhaps some higher figure. Checks for less than the threshold amount are selected for signature verification only on a random basis. In other words, serious attention is restricted to serious matters. As a result, many, if not most, checks are paid without signature verification. This practice, which has become an acceptable standard in today's banking industry, is economically efficient for banks. Even though liability costs are sometimes incurred—when forged checks are paid—the total costs involved in verifying the authenticity of each and every signature would be far higher.

Some people have argued that banks using such procedures are not exercising due care in handling their customers' accounts. Under the UCC, banks are held to a standard of "ordinary care." At one time in the banking industry, ordinary care was generally interpreted to mean that a bank had a duty to inspect all signatures on checks. But what constitutes ordinary care in today's world? Does a bank exercise ordinary care if it follows the prevailing industry practice of examining signatures on only a few, randomly selected checks payable for under a certain amount? Or does ordinary care still mean that a bank should examine each signature?

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Because the UCC offers special protection to HDCs, innocent makers of notes or drawers of checks in fraudulent transactions often have no legal recourse. From an ethical standpoint, how could you justify to the "losers" in such situations the provisions of the UCC that fail to protect them? Can you think of a way in which such problems could be handled more fairly or ethically than they are under the UCC?
2. What do you think would result if the law was changed to allow personal defenses to be successfully raised against HDCs? Who would lose, and who would gain? How would such a change in the law affect the flow of commerce in this country?
3. Do you think that the UCC's provisions have struck an appropriate balance between the interests of banks and those of bank customers? Why or why not?

Creditors' Rights and Remedies

Normally, creditors have no problem collecting the debts owed to them. When disputes arise over the amount owed, however, or when the debtor simply cannot or will not pay, what happens? What remedies are available to creditors when a debtor defaults (fails to pay as promised)? In this chapter, we focus on some basic laws that assist the debtor and creditor in resolving their dispute without the debtor's having to resort to bankruptcy—a topic to be discussed in Chapter 30. In Chapter 29, we will discuss the remedies that are available only to secured creditors (those whose loans are supported or backed by collateral) under Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

Laws Assisting Creditors

Both the common law and statutory laws other than Article 9 of the UCC create various rights and remedies for creditors. We discuss here some of these rights and remedies, including liens, garnishment, creditors' composition agreements, and mortgage foreclosure.

Liens

A lien is a claim against a debtor's property that must be satisfied before the property (or its proceeds) is available to satisfy the claims of other creditors. As mentioned, liens may arise under the common law or under statutory law. Statutory liens include mechanic's liens, whereas artisan's liens were recognized at common law. Judicial liens are those that represent a creditor's efforts to collect on a debt before or after a judgment is entered by a court. Liens are a very important tool for creditors because they generally take priority over other claims against the same property (priority of claims will be discussed in depth in Chapter 29).

Mechanic's Liens When a person contracts for labor, services, or materials to be furnished for the purpose of making improvements on real property but does not immediately pay for the improvements, the creditor can place a mechanic's lien on the property. This creates a special type of debtor-creditor relationship in which the real estate itself becomes security for the debt.

For example, a painter agrees to paint a house for a homeowner for an agreed-on price to cover labor and materials. If the homeowner cannot pay or pays only a portion of the charges, a mechanic's lien against the property can be created. The painter is the lienholder, and the real property is encumbered (burdened) with the mechanic's lien for the amount owed. If the homeowner does not pay the lien, the property can be sold to satisfy the debt. Notice of the foreclosure (the enforcement of the lien) must be given to the debtor in advance, however.

Note that state law governs the procedures that must be followed to create a mechanic's lien. Generally, the lienholder has to file a written notice of lien against the particular property involved. The notice of lien must be filed within a specific time period, measured from the last date on which materials or labor was provided (usually within 60 to 120 days). If the property owner fails to pay the debt, the lienholder is entitled to foreclose on the real estate on which the improvements were made and to sell it to satisfy the amount of the debt. Of course, as mentioned, the lienholder is required by statute to give notice to the owner of the property prior to foreclosure and sale. The sale proceeds are used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings; the surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.

Artisan's Liens An artisan's lien is a device created at common law through which a creditor can recover payment from a debtor for labor and materials furnished in the repair of personal property. In contrast to a mechanic's lien, an artisan's lien is possessory. This means that the lienholder ordinarily must have retained possession of the property and have expressly or impliedly agreed to provide the services on a cash, not a credit, basis. The lien remains in existence as long as the lienholder maintains possession, and the lien is terminated once possession is voluntarily surrendered—unless the surrender is only temporary.

For example, Whitney leaves her diamond ring at the jewelry shop to be repaired and to have her initials engraved on the band. In the absence of an agreement, the jeweler can keep the ring until Whitney pays for the services that the jeweler provides. Should Whitney fail to pay, the jeweler has a lien on Whitney's ring for the amount of the bill and can sell the ring in satisfaction of the lien.

Modern statutes permit the holder of an artisan's lien to foreclose and sell the property subject to the lien to satisfy payment of the debt. As with a mechanic's lien, the lienholder is required to give notice to the owner of the property prior to foreclosure and sale. The sale proceeds are used to pay the debt and the costs of the legal proceedings, and the surplus, if any, is paid to the former owner.¹

Judicial Liens When a debt is past due, a creditor can bring a legal action against the debtor to collect the debt. If the creditor is successful in the action, the court awards the creditor a judgment against the debtor (usually for the amount of the debt plus any interest and legal costs incurred in obtaining the judgment). Frequently, however, the creditor is unable to collect the awarded amount.

To ensure that a judgment in the creditor's favor will be collectible, the creditor is permitted to request that certain nonexempt property of the debtor be seized to satisfy the debt. (As will be discussed later in this chapter, under state or federal statutes, some kinds of property are exempt from attachment by creditors.) If the court orders the debtor's property to be seized prior to a judgment in the creditor's favor, the court's order is referred to as a writ of attachment. If the court orders the debtor's property to be seized following a judgment in the creditor's favor, the court's order is referred to as a writ of execution.

1. An artisan's lien has priority over a filed statutory lien (such as a title lien on an automobile or a lien filed under Article 9 of the UCC) and a bailee's lien (such as a storage lien).

Writ of Attachment. In the context of judicial liens, attachment refers to a court-ordered seizure and taking into custody of property prior to the securing of a judgment for a past-due debt. (As you will read in Chapter 29, this word has a different meaning in the context of secured transactions. Under UCC 9-203, attachment refers to the process through which a security interest becomes effective and enforceable against a debtor with respect to the debtor's collateral.) Normally, attachment is a prejudgment remedy, occurring either at the time a lawsuit is filed or immediately thereafter. In order to attach before a judgment, a creditor must comply with the specific state's statutory restrictions. The due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution also applies and requires that the debtor be given notice and an opportunity to be heard (see Chapter 4).

The creditor must have an enforceable right to payment of the debt under law and must follow certain procedures. Otherwise, the creditor can be liable for damages for wrongful attachment. Typically, the creditor must file with the court an affidavit (a written or printed statement, made under oath or sworn to) stating that the debtor has failed to pay and delineating the statutory grounds under which attachment is sought. The creditor must also post a bond to cover at least the court costs, the value of the property attached, and the value of the loss of use of that property suffered by the debtor. When the court is satisfied that all the requirements have been met, it issues a writ of attachment, which directs the sheriff or other officer to seize nonexempt property. If the creditor prevails at trial, the seized property can be sold to satisfy the judgment.

Writ of Execution. If a creditor obtains a judgment against the debtor and the debtor will not or cannot pay the judgment, the creditor is entitled to go back to the court and request a writ of execution. A writ of execution is an order that directs the sheriff to seize (levy) and sell any of the debtor's nonexempt real or personal property that is within the court's geographic jurisdiction (usually the county in which the courthouse is located). The proceeds of the sale are used to pay the judgment, accrued interest, and the costs of the sale. Any excess is paid to the debtor. The debtor can pay the judgment and redeem the nonexempt property at any time before the sale takes place. (Because of exemption laws and bankruptcy laws, however, many judgments are virtually uncollectible.)

Garnishment

An order for garnishment permits a creditor to collect a debt by seizing property of the debtor that is being held by a third party. In a garnishment proceeding, the third party—the person or entity on whom the garnishment judgment is served—is called the garnishee. Typically, the garnishee is the debtor's employer, and the creditor is seeking a judgment so that part of the debtor's usual paycheck will be paid to the creditor. In some situations, however, the garnishee is a third party that holds funds belonging to the debtor (such as a bank) or who has possession of, or exercises control over, funds or other types of property belonging to the debtor. Almost all types of property can be garnished, including tax refunds, pensions, and trust funds—so long as the property is not exempt from garnishment and is in the possession of a third party.

Garnishment Proceedings State law governs garnishment actions, so the specific procedures vary from state to state. According to the laws in many states, the judgment creditor needs to obtain only one order of garnishment, which will then apply continuously to the judgment debtor's weekly wages until the entire debt is paid. Garnishment can be a prejudgment remedy, requiring a hearing before a court, or a post-judgment remedy.

Laws Limiting the Amount of Wages Subject to Garnishment

Both federal and state laws limit the amount that can be taken from a debtor's weekly take-home pay through garnishment proceedings.² Federal law provides a minimal framework to protect debtors from losing all their income to pay judgment debts.³ State laws also provide dollar exemptions, and these amounts are often larger than those provided by federal law. Under federal law, an employer cannot dismiss an employee because his or her wages are being garnished.

The question in the following case was whether payments to an independent contractor for services performed could be garnished.

2. A few states (for example, Texas) do not permit garnishment of wages by private parties except under a child-support order.

3. For example, the federal Consumer Credit Protection Act, 15 U.S.C. Sections 1601–1693r, provides that a debtor can retain either 75 percent of his or her disposable earnings per week or an amount equivalent to thirty hours of work paid at federal minimum wage rates, whichever is greater.

CASE 28.1 Indiana Surgical Specialists v. Griffin

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2007. 867 N.E.2d 260.

- Background and Facts Helen Griffin owed Indiana Surgical Services a certain amount. When the debt was not paid, Indiana Surgical filed a suit in an Indiana small claims court against Griffin. Griffin did not answer the complaint. In 2001, the court issued a default judgment against her. Four years later, Indiana Surgical learned that Griffin worked for MDS Courier Services. On Indiana Surgical's request, the court issued a garnishment order against MDS to "withhold from the earnings of" Griffin the appropriate amount until her debt was paid. MDS responded, MDS Courier Services, Inc. employs drivers on a "contract" basis, therefore, drivers are not actual employees, but rather "contracted" to do a particular job. Because of this, we are not responsible for any payroll deductions including garnishments.

Indiana Surgical asked the court to hold MDS in contempt. Dawn Klingenberger, an MDS manager, testified that Griffin was a subcontractor of MDS, called as needed, compensated per job at "thirty-five percent of whatever she does," and paid on a biweekly basis. The court ruled that "the judgment debtor is a subcontractor, and not an employee," and that her earnings could not be garnished. Indiana Surgical appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT MAY, Judge.

* * * *

Indiana Surgical argues the trial court erred by declining to enforce the garnishment order issued to MDS on the ground Griffin was a "subcontractor" and not an employee of MDS.

Indiana Surgical asserts the trial court's "distinction between wages subject to withholding and other earnings" is not supported in law. Under the facts of this case, we agree.

Garnishment refers to "any legal or equitable proceedings through which the earnings of an individual are required to be withheld by a garnishee, by the individual debtor, or by any other person for the payment of a judgment" [under Indiana Code Section 24-4.5-105(1)(b)]. * * *

Earnings are [defined in Indiana Code Section 24-4.5-1-301(9) as] "compensation paid or payable for personal services, whether denominated as wages, salary, commission, bonus, or otherwise, and includes periodic payments under a pension or retirement program."^a In discussing the [provision in the Consumer Credit Protection Act that is the] federal counterpart to the Indiana statute, the [United States] Supreme Court stated: "There is every indication that Congress, in an effort to avoid the necessity of bankruptcy, sought to regulate garnishment in its usual sense as a levy on periodic payments of compensation needed to support the wage earner and his family on a week-to-week, month-to-month basis." [Emphasis added.]

Griffin received "periodic payments of compensation" for her personal services as a courier. These payments were earnings that could be garnished through a garnishment order. The trial court erred to the extent it held otherwise. We reverse and remand for further proceedings including, but not limited to, a determination of MDS's liability for payments made to Griffin after Indiana Surgical acquired an equitable lien upon service of process in [garnishment proceedings]. In light of our holding, the trial court should also determine whether MDS should be held in contempt of the garnishment order.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court held that payments for the services of an independent contractor fall within the applicable definition of "earnings" and thus Griffin's earnings as an independent contractor could be garnished. The court reversed the decision of the lower court and remanded the case.

● The Ethical Dimension Should some persons be exempt from garnishment orders? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension Building contractors and subcontractors are typically classified as independent contractors. Could payments to these parties also fall within the definition of "earnings" applied in this case? Discuss.

a. Indiana's definition of earnings is included in the part of the Indiana Code known as the Uniform Consumer Credit Code, which was derived from the federal Consumer Credit Protection Act. The federal provision defining earnings is identical.

Creditors' Composition Agreements

Creditors may contract with the debtor for discharge of the debtor's liquidated debts (debts that are definite, or fixed, in amount) on payment of a sum less than that owed. These agreements are referred to as composition agreements or creditors' composition agreements and are usually held to be enforceable unless they are formed under duress.

Mortgages

A mortgage is a written instrument giving a creditor an interest in (lien on) the debtor's real property as security for the payment of a debt. Financial institutions grant mortgage loans for the purchase of property—usually a dwelling (real property will be discussed in Chapter 48). Given the relatively large sums that many individuals borrow to purchase a home, defaults are not uncommon. Mortgages are recorded with the county in the state where the property is located. Recording ensures that the creditor is officially on record as holding an interest in the property. As a further precaution, most creditors require mortgage life insurance for debtors who do not pay at least 20 percent of the purchase price as a down payment at the time of the transaction.

Mortgage Foreclosure In the event of a debtor's default, the entire mortgage debt becomes due and payable. If the debtor cannot pay, the mortgage holder has the right to foreclose on the mortgaged property. The usual method of foreclosure is by judicial sale of the property, although the statutory methods of foreclosure vary from state to state. If the proceeds of the foreclosure sale are sufficient to cover both the costs of the foreclosure and the mortgage debt, any surplus goes to the debtor. If the sale proceeds are insufficient to cover the foreclosure costs and the mortgage debt, however, the mortgagee (the creditor-lender) can seek to recover the difference from the mortgagor (the debtor) by obtaining a deficiency judgment.

The mortgagee obtains a deficiency judgment in a separate legal action that is pursued subsequent to the foreclosure action. The deficiency judgment entitles the creditor to recover from other property owned by the debtor. Some states do not permit deficiency judgments for certain types of real estate interests.

Redemption Rights Before the foreclosure sale, a defaulting mortgagor can redeem the property by paying the full amount of the debt, plus any interest and costs that have accrued. This is known as the right of redemption. Some states even allow a mortgagor to redeem the property within a certain period of time after the foreclosure sale—called a statutory period of redemption. In states that allow redemption after the sale, the deed to the property usually is not delivered to the purchaser until the statutory period has expired.

Concept Summary 28.1 provides a synopsis of the remedies available to creditors.

Suretyship and Guaranty

When a third person promises to pay a debt owed by another in the event that the debtor does not pay, either a suretyship or a guaranty relationship is created. Exhibit 28-1 illustrates these relationships. The third person's credit becomes the security for the debt owed.

Suretyship

A contract of suretyship is a promise made by a third person to be responsible for the debtor's obligation. It is an express contract between the surety (the third party) and the creditor. In the strictest sense, the surety is primarily liable for the debt of the principal. This means that the creditor can demand payment from the surety from the moment the debt is due and that the creditor need not exhaust all legal remedies against the

EXHIBIT 28-1 • Suretyship and Guaranty Parties

In a suretyship or guaranty arrangement, a third party promises to be responsible for a debtor's obligations. A third party who agrees to be responsible for the debt even if the primary debtor does not default is known as a surety; a third party who agrees to be secondarily responsible for the debt—that is, responsible only if the primary debtor defaults—is known as a guarantor. As noted in Chapter 15, normally a promise of guaranty (a collateral, or secondary, promise) must be in writing to be enforceable.

principal debtor before holding the surety responsible for payment. Thus, a suretyship contract is not a form of indemnity; that is, it is not merely a promise to make good any loss that a creditor may incur as a result of the debtor's failure to pay. Moreover, a surety agreement does not have to be in writing to be enforceable, although usually such agreements are in writing.

For example, Jason Oller wants to borrow funds from the bank to buy a used car. Because Jason is still in college, the bank will not lend him the funds unless his father, Stuart Oller, who has dealt with the bank before, will cosign the note (add his signature to the note, thereby becoming jointly liable for payment of the debt). When Mr. Oller cosigns the note, he becomes primarily liable to the bank. On the note's due date, the bank can seek payment from Jason Oller, Stuart Oller, or both jointly.

Guaranty

A guaranty contract is similar to a suretyship contract in that it includes a promise to answer for the debt or default of another. There are some significant differences between these two types of contracts, however.

Suretyship versus Guaranty With a suretyship arrangement, the surety is primarily liable for the debtor's obligation. With a guaranty arrangement, the guarantor—the third person making the guaranty—is secondarily liable. The guarantor can be required to pay the obligation only after the principal debtor defaults, and usually only after the creditor has made an attempt to collect from the debtor.

For example, a corporation, BX Enterprises, needs to borrow to meet its payroll. The bank is skeptical about the creditworthiness of BX and requires Dawson, its president, who is a wealthy businessperson and owner of 70 percent of BX Enterprises, to sign an agreement making herself personally liable for payment if BX does not pay off the loan. As a guarantor of the loan, Dawson cannot be held liable until BX Enterprises is in default.

Under the Statute of Frauds, a guaranty contract between the guarantor and the creditor must be in writing to be enforceable unless the main purpose exception (discussed in Chapter 15) applies.⁴ A suretyship agreement, by contrast, need not be in writing to be enforceable. In other words, surety agreements can be oral, whereas guaranty contracts must be written.

In the following case, the issue was whether a guaranty of a lease signed by the officer of a corporation was enforceable against the officer personally even though he claimed to have signed the guaranty only as a representative of the corporation.

4. Briefly, the main purpose exception provides that if the main purpose of the guaranty agreement is to benefit the guarantor, then the contract need not be in writing to be enforceable.

EXTENDED JSV, Inc. v. Hene Meat Co., Inc.
CASE 28.2 Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2003. 794 N.E.2d 555.

BARNES, Judge.

* * * *

On August 30, 1999, JSV, Inc. (“JSV”) signed a lease to rent a portion of a building in Indianapolis from Hene [Meat Company.] [Mark] Kennedy signed the lease on behalf of JSV as one of that corporation’s officers. In addition, Kennedy signed a document simply denominated [labeled] “GUARANTY.” The document indicated that it was “an absolute and unconditional guaranty” of the lease’s performance by JSV * * *. Kennedy’s printed name and signature on the document are not followed by any corporate officer designation.

JSV stopped paying rent to Hene in September 2000. On June 5, 2001, Hene sued both JSV under the lease and Kennedy under the guaranty [in an Indiana state court]. * * *

On April 16, 2002, Hene moved for summary judgment. * * * On September 9, 2002, * * * the trial court * * * granted Hene’s summary judgment motion and entered judgment against both JSV and Kennedy personally for the sum of $75,041.07. Kennedy alone now appeals.

* * * *

The * * * argument of Kennedy’s that we address is whether the trial court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of Hene on its claim that Kennedy was personally liable under the guaranty he executed. * * *

The interpretation of a guaranty is governed by the same rules applicable to other contracts. Absent ambiguity, the terms of a contract will be given their plain and ordinary meaning and will not be considered ambiguous solely because the parties dispute the proper interpretation of the terms. * * * [Emphasis added.]

We conclude that the guaranty Kennedy executed was unambiguously a personal guaranty * * *. It is axiomatic [clear] under Indiana law that a guaranty agreement must consist of three parties: the obligor, the obligee, and the surety or guarantor. Here, Hene as landlord under the lease was the obligee and JSV as the tenant was the obligor; the disputed issue is the identity of the guarantor. Kennedy claims he signed both the lease and the guaranty as an officer of JSV.

However, there would have been no point in Hene’s obtaining Kennedy’s guaranty of the lease if he was doing so only in his official capacity as an officer of JSV. Such an action would have been equivalent to JSV guaranteeing JSV’s performance of the lease and to JSV being both the obligor under the lease and the guarantor under the guaranty. * * * [S]uch a result would be paradoxical and untenable. In [a different case] we concluded that where a corporate officer executed a guaranty with respect to credit extended to the corporation, the guaranty was a personal one and the officer personally was the guarantor despite the fact that the officer placed his corporate title after his signature on the guaranty. We further concluded that this was apparent as a matter of law and summary judgment on the issue was appropriate. In this case, the guaranty is even more clearly a personal one * * * because Kennedy’s signature thereon is not followed by any corporate officer designation. The trial court did not err in concluding that the guaranty Kennedy executed was a personal one as a matter of law and in granting summary judgment against Kennedy personally. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The trial court * * * properly concluded that Kennedy was personally liable to Hene on the guaranty he executed for any breach of the underlying lease by JSV. We affirm.

QUESTIONS

1. How significant should the court have found the omission of the word personal from the guaranty? Explain your answer.
2. If Hene had misled Kennedy into believing he was signing the guaranty only in his capacity as an officer of JSV, how might the result in this case have been different?

The Extent and Time of the Guarantor's Liability The guaranty contract terms determine the extent and time of the guarantor's liability. For example, the guaranty can be continuing, designed to cover a series of transactions by the debtor. Also, the guaranty can be unlimited or limited as to time and amount. In addition, the guaranty can be absolute or conditional. With a conditional guaranty, the guarantor becomes liable only on the happening of a certain event. When a guaranty is absolute, the guarantor becomes liable immediately on the debtor's default.

Defenses of the Surety and the Guarantor

The defenses of the surety and the guarantor are basically the same. Therefore, the following discussion applies to both, although it refers only to the surety.

Actions Releasing the Surety Certain actions will release the surety from the obligation. If the principal obligation is paid by the debtor or by another person on behalf of the debtor, the surety is discharged from the obligation. Similarly, if valid tender of payment is made, and the creditor for some reason rejects it with knowledge of the surety's existence, then the surety is released from any obligation on the debt.

In addition, if a creditor surrenders the collateral to the debtor or impairs the collateral while knowing of the surety and without the surety's consent, the surety is released to the extent of any loss suffered as a result of the creditor's actions. The primary reason for this requirement is to protect a surety who agreed to become obligated only because the debtor's collateral was in the possession of the creditor.

Finally, making any material modification in the terms of the original contract between the principal debtor and the creditor can operate to discharge a surety's obligations. For example, a gratuitous surety will be completely discharged if the principal debtor and the creditor materially modify the contract without first obtaining the surety's consent. (A gratuitous surety is one who receives no consideration in return for acting as a surety, such as a father who agrees to assume responsibility for his daughter's debt obligation.) A surety who is compensated (such as a venture capitalist who will profit from a loan made to the principal debtor) will be discharged to the extent that the surety suffers a loss.

Defenses of the Principal Debtor

Generally, the surety can use any defenses available to the principal debtor to avoid liability on the obligation to the creditor. The ability of the surety to assert any defenses the debtor may have against the creditor is the most important concept in suretyship. It means that most of the defenses available to the debtor are also those of the surety. A few exceptions do exist, however. The surety cannot assert the principal debtor's incapacity or bankruptcy as a defense, nor can the surety assert the statute of limitations as a defense.

Obviously, a surety may also have his or her own defenses—for example, incapacity or bankruptcy. If the creditor fraudulently induced the surety to guarantee the debt, the surety can assert fraud as a defense. In most states, the creditor has a legal duty to inform the surety, prior to the formation of the suretyship contract, of material facts known by the creditor that would substantially increase the surety's risk. Failure to so inform is fraud and makes the suretyship obligation voidable.

Rights of the Surety and the Guarantor

Generally, when the surety or guarantor pays the debt owed to the creditor, the surety or guarantor is entitled to certain rights. Because the rights of the surety and the guarantor are basically the same, the following discussion applies to both.

The Right of Subrogation First, the surety has the legal right of subrogation. Simply stated, this means that any right the creditor had against the debtor now becomes the right of the surety. Included are creditor rights in bankruptcy, rights to collateral possessed by the creditor, and rights to judgments obtained by the creditor. In short, the surety now stands in the shoes of the creditor and may pursue any remedies that were available to the creditor against the debtor.

The Right of Reimbursement Second, the surety has a right of reimbursement from the debtor. Basically, the surety is entitled to receive from the debtor all outlays made on behalf of the suretyship arrangement. Such outlays can include expenses incurred as well as the actual amount of the debt paid to the creditor.

The Right of Contribution Third, in the situation of co-sureties (two or more sureties on the same obligation owed by the debtor), a surety who pays more than her or his proportionate share on a debtor's default is entitled to recover from the co-sureties the amount paid above the surety's obligation. This is the right of contribution. Generally, a co-surety's liability either is determined by agreement or, in the absence of agreement, is set at the maximum liability under the suretyship contract.

For example, assume that two co-sureties are obligated under a suretyship contract to guarantee the debt of a debtor. Together, the sureties' maximum liability is $25,000. Surety A's maximum liability is $15,000, and surety B's is $10,000. The debtor owes $10,000 and is in default. Surety A pays the creditor the entire $10,000. In the absence of agreement, surety A can recover $4,000 from surety B ($$10,000/$25,000 \times $10,000 = $4,000$, surety B's obligation).

Protection for Debtors

The law protects debtors as well as creditors. Certain property of the debtor, for example, is exempt under state law from creditors' actions. Consumer protection statutes (see Chapter 44) also protect debtors' rights. Of course, bankruptcy laws, which will be discussed in Chapter 30, are designed specifically to assist debtors in need of help.

In most states, certain types of real and personal property are exempt from execution or attachment. State exemption statutes usually include both real and personal property.

Exempted Real Property

Probably the most familiar exemption is the homestead exemption. Each state permits the debtor to retain the family home, either in its entirety or up to a specified dollar amount, free from the claims of unsecured creditors or trustees in bankruptcy. (Note that federal bankruptcy laws after 2005 place a cap of $125,000 for debtors in bankruptcy who have recently moved and are seeking to use state homestead exemptions—see Chapter 30 for details.)

For example, suppose that Beere owes Veltman $40,000. The debt is the subject of a lawsuit, and the court awards Veltman a judgment of $40,000 against Beere. Beere's homestead is valued at $50,000, and the homestead exemption is $25,000. There are no outstanding mortgages or other liens on his homestead. To satisfy the judgment debt, Beere's family home is sold at public auction for $45,000. The proceeds of the sale are distributed as follows:

1. Beere is given $25,000 as his homestead exemption.
2. Veltman is paid $20,000 toward the judgment debt, leaving a $20,000 deficiency judgment (that is, "left-over debt") that can be satisfied from any other nonexempt property (personal or real) that Beere may own, if allowed by state law.

In a few states, statutes allow the homestead exemption only if the judgment debtor has a family. If a judgment debtor does not have a family, a creditor may be entitled to collect the full amount realized from the sale of the debtor's home.

Exempted Personal Property

Personal property that is most often exempt from satisfaction of judgment debts includes the following:

1. Household furniture up to a specified dollar amount.
2. Clothing and certain personal possessions, such as family pictures or a Bible.
3. A vehicle (or vehicles) for transportation (at least up to a specified dollar amount).
4. Certain classified animals, usually livestock but including pets.
5. Equipment that the debtor uses in a business or trade, such as tools or professional instruments, up to a specified dollar amount.

REVIEWING Creditors' Rights and Remedies

Air Ruidoso, Ltd., operated a commuter airline and air charter service between Ruidoso, New Mexico, and airports in Albuquerque and El Paso. Executive Aviation Center, Inc., provided services for airlines at the Albuquerque International Airport. When Air Ruidoso failed to pay more than $10,000 that it owed on its account for fuel, oil, and oxygen, Executive Aviation took possession of Air Ruidoso's plane, claiming that it had a lien on the plane. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Executive Aviation establish an artisan's lien on the plane? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that Executive Aviation files a lawsuit in court against Air Ruidoso for the $10,000 past-due debt. What two methods discussed in this chapter would allow the court to seize Air Ruidoso's plane to satisfy the debt?
3. Suppose that Executive Aviation discovers that Air Ruidoso has sufficient assets in one of its bank accounts to pay the past-due amount. How might Executive Aviation attempt to obtain access to these funds?
4. Suppose that a clause in the contract between Air Ruidoso and Executive Aviation provides that "if the airline becomes insolvent, Braden Fasco, the chief executive officer of Air Ruidoso, agrees to cover its outstanding debts." Is this a suretyship or a guaranty agreement?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

28-1. Sylvia takes her car to Caleb's Auto Repair Shop. A sign in the window states that all repairs must be paid for in cash unless credit is approved in advance. Sylvia and Caleb agree that Caleb will repair Sylvia's car engine and put in a new transmission. No mention is made of credit. Because Caleb is not sure how much engine repair will be necessary, he refuses to give Sylvia an estimate. He repairs the engine and puts in a new transmission. When Sylvia comes to pick up her car, she learns that the bill is $2,500. Sylvia is furious, refuses to pay Caleb that amount, and demands possession of her car. Caleb insists on payment. Discuss the rights of both parties in this matter.

28-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Kanahara is employed part-time by the Cross-Bar Packing Corp. and earns take-home pay of $400 per week. He is $2,000 in debt to the Holiday Department Store for goods purchased on credit over the past eight months. Most of this property is nonexempt and is now in Kanahara's apartment. Kanahara is in default on his payments to Holiday. Holiday learns that Kanahara has a girlfriend in another state and that he plans on giving her most of this property for Christmas. Discuss what actions are available to and should be taken by Holiday to collect the debt owed by Kanahara.

28-3. Natalie is a student at Slippery Stone University. In need of funds to pay for tuition and books, she asks West Bank for a short-term loan. The bank agrees to make a loan if Natalie will have someone who is financially responsible guarantee the loan payments. Sheila, a well-known businessperson and a friend of Natalie's family, calls the bank and agrees to pay the loan if Natalie cannot. Because of Sheila's reputation, the loan is made.

Natalie is making the payments, but because of illness she is unable to work for one month. She requests that West Bank extend the loan for three months. West Bank agrees, raising the interest rate for the extended period. Sheila is not notified of the extension (and thus does not consent to it). One month later, Natalie drops out of school. All attempts to collect from Natalie fail. West Bank wants to hold Sheila liable. Discuss the validity of West Bank's claim against Sheila.

28-4. Grant is the owner of a relatively old home valued at $45,000. He notices that the bathtubs and fixtures in both bathrooms are leaking and need to be replaced. He contracts with Jane's Plumbing to replace the bathtubs and fixtures. Jane replaces them, and on June 1 she submits her bill of $4,000 to Grant. Because of financial difficulties, Grant does not pay the bill. Grant's only asset is his home, but his state's homestead exemption is $40,000. Discuss fully Jane's remedies in this situation.

28-5. Guaranty. In 1988, Jamieson-Chippewa Investment Co. entered into a five-year commercial lease with TDM Pharmacy, Inc., for certain premises in Ellisville, Missouri, on which TDM intended to operate a small drugstore. Dennis and Tereasa McClintock ran the pharmacy business. The lease granted TDM three additional five-year options to renew. The lease was signed by TDM and by the McClintocks individually as guarantors. The lease did not state that the guaranty was continuing; in fact, there were no words of guaranty in the lease other than the single word "Guarantors" on the signature page. In 1993, Dennis McClintock, acting as the president of TDM, exercised TDM's option to renew the lease for one term. Three years later, when the pharmacy failed, TDM defaulted on the lease. Jamieson-Chippewa filed a suit in a Missouri state court against the McClintocks for the rent for the rest of the term, based on their guaranty. The McClintocks filed a motion for summary judgment, contending that they had not guaranteed any rent payments beyond the initial five-year term. How should the court rule? Why? [Jamieson-Chippewa Investment Co. v. McClintock, 996 S.W.2d 84 (Mo.App.E.D. 1999)]

28-6. Garnishment. Susan Guinta is a real estate salesperson. Smythe Cramer Co. went to an Ohio state court and obtained a garnishment order to attach Guinta's personal earnings. The order was served on Russell Realtors to attach sales commissions that Russell owed to Guinta. Russell objected, arguing that commissions are not personal earnings and are therefore exempt from attachment under a garnishment of personal earnings. An Ohio statute defines personal earnings as "money, or any other consideration or thing of value, that is paid or due to a person in exchange for work, labor, or personal services provided by the person to an employer." An employer is "a person who is required to withhold taxes out of payments of personal earnings made to a judgment debtor." Russell does not withhold taxes from its salespersons' commissions. Under a federal statute, earnings means "compensation paid or payable for personal services, whether denominated as wages, salary, commission, bonus, or otherwise." When the federal definition is more restrictive and results in a smaller garnishment, that definition is controlling. Property other than personal earnings may be subject to garnishment without limits. How should the court rule regarding Russell's objection? Why? [Smythe Cramer Co. v. Guinta, 116 Ohio Misc.2d 20, 762 N.E.2d 1083 (2001)]

Karen and Gerald Baldwin owned property in Rapid City, South Dakota, which they leased to Wyoming Alaska Corp. (WACO) for use as a gas station and convenience store. The lease obligated the Baldwins to make repairs, but WACO was authorized to make necessary repairs. After seventeen years, the property was run-down. The store's customers were tripping over chunks of concrete in the parking lot. An underground gasoline storage tank was leaking. The store's manager hired Duffield Construction, Inc., to install a new tank and make other repairs. The Baldwins saw the new tank sitting on the property before the work began. When WACO paid only a small portion of the cost, Duffield filed a mechanic's lien and asked a South Dakota state court to foreclose on the property. The Baldwins disputed the lien, arguing that they had not requested the work. What is the purpose of a mechanic's lien? Should property owners who do not contract for improvements be liable for the cost under such a lien? How might property owners protect themselves against a lien for work that they do not request? Explain. [Duffield Construction, Inc. v. Baldwin, 679 N.W.2d 477 (S.D. 2004)]

28-8. Guaranty. In 1981, in Troy, Ohio, Willis and Mary Jane Ward leased a commercial building to Buckeye Pizza Corp. to operate a pizza parlor. Two years later, Buckeye assigned its interest in the building to Ohio, Ltd. In 1985, Ohio sold its pizza business, including its lease of the Wards' building, to NR Dayton Mall, Inc., an Indiana corporation and a subsidiary of Noble Roman's, Inc. As part of the deal, Noble Roman's agreed that it "unconditionally guarantees the performance by N.R. DAYTON MALL, INC., of all its obligations under the . . . Assumption Undertaking." In the "Assumption Undertaking," NR agreed to accept assignment of the Ward lease and to pay Buckeye's and Ohio's expenses if they were sued under it. A dozen years later, NR defaulted on the lease and abandoned the premises. The Wards filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Noble Roman's and others, contending that the firm was liable for NR's default. Noble Roman's argued that it had guaranteed only to indemnify Buckeye and Ohio. The Wards filed a motion for summary judgment. Should the court grant the motion? Explain. [Noble Roman's, Inc. v. Ward, 760 N.E.2d 1132 (Ind.App. 2002)]

tracted with Marlin Broadcasting, LLC, to air commercials on WCCC-FM, 106.9 "The Rock." Avery, who was the sole member of his firm, helped to create the ads, which solicited direct contact with "defense attorney Kent Avery," featured his voice, and repeated his name and experience to make potential clients familiar with him. When WCCC was not paid for the broadcasts, Marlin filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Avery and his firm, alleging an outstanding balance of $35,250. Pending the court's hearing of the suit, Marlin filed a request for a writ of attachment. Marlin offered in evidence the parties' contracts, the ads' transcripts, and WCCC's invoices. Avery contended that he could not be held personally liable for the cost of the ads. Marlin countered that the ads unjustly enriched Avery by conferring a personal benefit on him to Marlin's detriment. What is the purpose of attachment? What must a creditor prove to obtain a writ of attachment? Did Marlin meet this test? Explain. [Marlin Broadcasting, LLC v. Law Office of Kent Avery, LLC, 101 Conn.App. 638, 922 A.2d 1131 (2007)]

In January 2003, Gary Ryder and Washington Mutual Bank, F.A., executed a note in which Ryder promised to pay $2,450,000, plus interest at a rate that could vary from month to month. The amount of the first payment was $10,933. The note was to be paid in full by February 1, 2033. A mortgage on Ryder's real property at 345 Round Hill Road in Greenwich, Connecticut, in favor of the bank secured his obligations under the note. The note and mortgage required that he pay the taxes on the property, which he did not do in 2004 and 2005. The bank notified him that he was in default and, when he failed to act, paid $50,095.92 in taxes, penalties, interest, and fees. Other disputes arose between the parties, and Ryder filed a suit in a federal district court against the bank, alleging, in part, breach of contract. He charged, among other things, that some of his timely payments were not processed and were subjected to incorrect late fees, forcing him to make excessive payments and ultimately resulting in "non-payment by Ryder." [Ryder v. Washington Mutual Bank, F.A., 501 FSupp.2d 311 (D.Conn. 2007)]

- The bank filed a counterclaim, seeking to foreclose on the mortgage. What should a creditor be required to prove to foreclose on mortgaged property? What would be a debtor's most effective defense? Which party in this case is likely to prevail on the bank's counterclaim? Why?
- The parties agreed to a settlement that released the bank from Ryder's claims and required him to pay the note by January 31, 2007. The court dismissed the suit, but when Ryder did not make the payment, the bank asked the court to reopen the case. The bank then asked for a judgment in its favor on Ryder's complaint, arguing that the settlement had "immediately" released the bank from his claims. Does this seem fair? Why or why not?

Secured Transactions

Whenever the payment of a debt is guaranteed, or secured, by personal property owned by the debtor or in which the debtor has a legal interest, the transaction becomes known as a secured transaction. The concept of the secured transaction is as basic to modern business practice as the concept of credit. Logically, sellers and lenders do not want to risk nonpayment, so they usually will not sell goods or lend funds unless the promise of payment is somehow guaranteed. Indeed, business as we know it could not exist without laws permitting and governing secured transactions.

Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) governs secured transactions as applied to personal property, fixtures (certain property that is attached to land—see Chapter 47), accounts, instruments, commercial assignments of $1,000 or more, chattel paper (any writing evidencing a debt secured by personal property), agricultural liens, and what are called general intangibles (such as patents and copyrights). Article 9 does not cover the creditor devices, such as liens and mortgages, that were discussed in Chapter 28. Because the revised version of Article 9 has now been adopted by all of the states, we base this chapter's discussion of secured transactions entirely on the provisions of the revised version.

In this chapter, we first look at the terminology of secured transactions. We then discuss how the rights and duties of creditors and debtors are created and enforced under Article 9. As will become evident, the law of secured transactions tends to favor the rights of creditors; to a lesser extent, however, it offers debtors some protections as well.

The Terminology of Secured Transactions

The UCC's terminology is now uniformly adopted in all documents used in situations involving secured transactions. A brief summary of the UCC's definitions of terms relating to secured transactions follows.

1. A secured party is any creditor who has a security interest in the debtor's collateral. This creditor can be a seller, a lender, a cosigner, or even a buyer of accounts or chattel paper [UCC 9-102(a)(72)].
2. A debtor is the party who owes payment or other performance of a secured obligation [UCC 9-102(a)(28)].

3. A security interest is the interest in the collateral (such as personal property, fixtures, or accounts) that secures payment or performance of an obligation [UCC 1-201(37)].
4. A security agreement is an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(73)].
5. Collateral is the subject of the security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(12)].
6. A financing statement—referred to as the UCC-1 form—is the document that is normally filed to give public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest [UCC 9-102(a)(39)].

Together, these basic definitions form the concept under which a debtor-creditor relationship becomes a secured transaction relationship (see Exhibit 29-1).

EXHIBIT 29-1 • Secured Transactions—Concept and Terminology

In a security agreement, a debtor and a creditor agree that the creditor will have a security interest in collateral in which the debtor has rights. In essence, the collateral secures the loan and ensures the creditor of payment should the debtor default.

Creating a Security Interest

A creditor has two main concerns if the debtor defaults: (1) Can the debt be satisfied through the possession and (usually) sale of the collateral? (2) Will the creditor have priority over any other creditors or buyers who may have rights in the same collateral? These two concerns are met through the creation and perfection of a security interest. We begin by examining how a security interest is created.

To become a secured party, the creditor must obtain a security interest in the collateral of the debtor. Three requirements must be met for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest:

1. Either (a) the collateral must be in the possession of the secured party in accordance with an agreement, or (b) there must be a written or authenticated security agreement that describes the collateral subject to the security interest and is signed or authenticated by the debtor.
2. The secured party must give the debtor something of value.
3. The debtor must have rights in the collateral.

Once these requirements have been met, the creditor's rights are said to attach to the collateral. Attachment gives the creditor an enforceable security interest in the collateral [UCC 9-203].¹

1. Note that the term attachment has a different meaning in secured transactions than it does in the context of judicial liens, as was mentioned in Chapter 28. In the context of judicial liens, attachment refers to a court-ordered seizure and taking into custody of property prior to the securing of a court judgment for a past-due debt.

Written or Authenticated Security Agreement

When the collateral is not in the possession of the secured party, the security agreement must be either written or authenticated, and it must describe the collateral. Note here that authentication means to sign, execute, or adopt any symbol on an electronic record verifying that the person signing has the intent to adopt or accept the record [UCC 9-102(a)(7)]. If the security agreement is in writing or authenticated, only the debtor's signature or authentication is required to create the security interest. The reason authentication is acceptable is to provide for electronic filing (the filing process will be discussed later).

A security agreement must contain a description of the collateral that reasonably identifies it. Generally, such phrases as "all the debtor's personal property" or "all the debtor's assets" would not constitute a sufficient description [UCC 9-108(c)].

Secured Party Must Give Value

The secured party must give the debtor something of value. Under the UCC, value can take any of several forms, including a binding commitment to extend credit and, in general, any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract [UCC 1-201(44)]. Normally, the value given by a secured party involves a direct loan or a commitment to sell goods on credit.

Debtor Must Have Rights in the Collateral

The debtor must have rights in the collateral; that is, the debtor must have some ownership interest or right to obtain possession of that collateral. The debtor's rights can represent either a current or a future legal interest in the collateral. For example, a retail seller–debtor can give a secured party a security interest not only in existing inventory owned by the retailer but also in future inventory to be acquired by the retailer.

One common misconception about having rights in the collateral is that the debtor must hold title to it. This is not a requirement. A beneficial interest in a trust (trusts will be discussed in Chapter 50), when the trustee holds title to the trust property, can be the subject of a security interest for a loan that a creditor makes to the beneficiary.

Perfecting a Security Interest

Perfection is the legal process by which secured parties protect themselves against the claims of third parties who may wish to have their debts satisfied out of the same collateral. Whether a secured party's security interest is perfected or unperfected may have serious consequences for the secured party if, for example, the debtor defaults on the debt or files for bankruptcy. What if the debtor has borrowed from two different creditors, using the same property as collateral for both loans? If the debtor defaults on both loans, which of the two creditors has first rights to the collateral? In this situation, the creditor with a perfected security interest will prevail.

Perfection is usually accomplished by filing a financing statement with the office of the appropriate government official. In some circumstances, however, a security interest becomes perfected without the filing of a financing statement.

Where or how to perfect a security interest sometimes depends on the classification or definition of the collateral. Collateral is generally divided into two classifications: tangible collateral (collateral that can be seen, felt, and touched) and intangible collateral (collateral that consists of or generates rights). Exhibit 29–2 on pages 589 and 590 summarizes the various classifications of collateral and the methods of perfecting a security interest in collateral falling within each of those classifications.²

2. There are additional classifications, such as agricultural liens, commercial tort claims, and investment property. For definitions of these types of collateral, see UCC 9–102(a)(5), (a)(13), and (a)(49).

Perfection by Filing

The most common means of perfection is by filing a financing statement—a document that gives public notice to third parties of the secured party's security interest—with the office of the appropriate government official. The security agreement itself can also be filed to perfect the security interest. The financing statement must provide the names of the debtor and the secured party, and must indicate the collateral covered by the financing statement. A uniform financing statement form (see Exhibit 29–3 on page 591) is now used in all states [UCC 9–521].

Communication of the financing statement to the appropriate filing office, together with the correct filing fee, or the acceptance of the financing statement by the filing officer constitutes a filing [UCC 9–516(a)]. The word communication means that the filing can be accomplished electronically [UCC 9–102(a)(18)]. Once completed, filings are indexed in the name of the debtor so that they can be located by subsequent searchers. A financing statement may be filed even before a security agreement is made or a security interest attaches [UCC 9–502(d)].

The Debtor's Name The UCC requires that a financing statement be filed under the name of the debtor [UCC 9–502(a)(1)]. Slight variations in names normally will not be considered misleading if a search of the filing office's records, using a standard computer search engine routinely used by that office, would disclose the filings [UCC 9–506(c)].³ If the debtor is identified by the correct name at the time of the filing of a financing statement, the secured party's interest retains its priority even if the debtor's name later changes. Because most states use electronic filing systems, UCC 9–503 sets out detailed rules for determining when the debtor's name as it appears on a financing statement is sufficient.

Specific Types of Debtors. For corporations, which are organizations that have registered with the state, the debtor's name on the financing statement must be “the name of the debtor indicated on the public record of the debtor's jurisdiction of organization” [UCC 9–503(a)(1)]. If the debtor is a trust or a trustee with respect to property held in trust, the filed financing statement must disclose this information and must provide the trust's name as specified in its official documents [UCC 9-503(a)(3)]. For all others, the filed financing statement must disclose "the individual or organizational name of the debtor" [UCC 9-503(a)(4)(A)]. As used here, the word organization includes unincorporated associations, such as clubs and some churches, as well as joint ventures and general partnerships. If an organizational debtor does not have a group name, the names of the individuals in the group must be listed.

3. If the name listed in the financing statement is so inaccurate that a search using the standard search engine will not disclose the debtor's name, then it is deemed seriously misleading under UCC 9–506. See also UCC 9–507, which governs the effectiveness of financing statements found to be seriously misleading.

Trade Names. In general, providing only the debtor's trade name (or a fictitious name) in a financing statement is not sufficient for perfection [UCC 9-503(c)]. Assume that a loan is being made to a sole proprietorship owned by Peter Jones. The trade, or fictitious, name is Pete's Plumbing. A financing statement filed in the trade name Pete's Plumbing would not be sufficient because it does not identify Peter Jones as the actual debtor. As will be discussed in Chapter 35, a sole proprietorship (such as Pete's Plumbing) is not a legal entity distinct from the person who owns it. The reason for this rule is to ensure that the debtor's name on a

For purchase-money security interest, attachment (that is, the creation of a security interest) is sufficient; for boats, motor vehicles, and trailers, filing or compliance with a certificate-of-title statute is required; for other consumer goods, general rules of filing or possession apply.
2. Equipment [UCC 9-301, 9-310(a), 9-313(a)]	Goods bought for or used primarily in business (and not part of inventory or farm products)—for example, a delivery truck [UCC 9-102(a)(33)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
3. Farm Products [UCC 9-301, 9-310(a), 9-313(a)]	Crops (including aquatic goods), livestock, or supplies produced in a farming operation—for example, ginned cotton, milk, eggs, and maple syrup [UCC 9-102(a)(34)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.
4. Inventory [UCC 9-301, 9-310(a), 9-313(a)]	Goods held by a person for sale or under a contract of service or lease; raw materials held for production and work in progress [UCC 9-102(a)(48)].	Filing or (rarely) possession by secured party.

financing statement is one that prospective lenders can locate and recognize in future searches.

Changes in the Debtor's Name If the debtor's name changes, the financing statement remains effective for collateral the debtor acquired before or within four months after the name change. Unless an amendment to the financing statement is filed within this four-month period, collateral acquired by the debtor after the four-month period is unperfected [UCC 9-507(b) and (c)]. A one-page uniform financing statement amendment form is available for filing name changes and for other purposes (see the discussion of amendments later in this chapter) [UCC 9-521].

Description of the Collateral The UCC requires that both the security agreement and the financing statement contain a description of the collateral in which the secured party has a security interest. The security agreement must describe the collateral because no security interest in goods can exist unless the parties agree on which goods are subject to the security interest. The financing statement must also describe the collateral to provide public notice of the fact that certain goods of the debtor are subject to a security interest. Other parties who might later wish to lend funds to the debtor or buy the collateral can thus learn of the security interest by checking with the state or local office in which a financing statement for that type of collateral would be filed. For land-related security interests, a legal description of the realty is also required [UCC 9-502(b)].

Sometimes, the descriptions in the two documents vary, with the description in the security agreement being more precise than the description in the financing statement, which is allowed to be more general. For example, a security agreement for a commercial loan to a manufacturer may list all of the manufacturer's equipment subject to the loan by serial number, whereas the financing statement may simply state "all equipment owned or hereafter acquired." The UCC permits broad, general descriptions in the financing statement, such as "all assets" or "all personal property."

Usually, whenever the description in a financing statement accurately describes the agreement between the secured party and the debtor, the description is sufficient [UCC 9-504].

Where to File In most states, a financing statement must be filed centrally in the appropriate state office, such as the office of the secretary of state, in the state where the debtor is located. Filing in the county where the collateral is located is required only when the collateral consists of timber to be cut; fixtures; or items to be extracted, such as oil, coal, gas, and minerals [UCC 9-301(3) and (4), 9-502(b)].

The state in which a financing statement should be filed depends on the debtor's location, not the location of the collateral (as was required under the unrevised Article 9) [UCC 9-301]. The debtor's location is determined as follows [UCC 9-307]:

1. For an individual debtor, it is the state of the debtor's principal residence.
2. For an organization registered with the state, such as a corporation or limited liability company, it is the state in which the organization is registered. For example, if a debtor is incorporated in Delaware and has its chief executive office in New York, a secured party would file the financing statement in Delaware because that is where the debtor's business is registered.
3. For all other entities, it is the state in which the business is located or, if the debtor has more than one office, the place from which the debtor manages its business operations and affairs (its chief executive offices).

Consequences of an Improper Filing Any improper filing renders the secured party unperfected and reduces the secured party's claim in bankruptcy to that of an unsecured creditor. For example, if the debtor's name on the financing statement is inaccurate or if the collateral is not sufficiently described on the filing statement, the filing may not be effective. The following case provides an illustration.

EXTENDED CASE 29.1 Corona Fruits & Veggies, Inc. v. Frozsun Foods, Inc.

Court of Appeal of California, Second District, Division 6, 2006.
143 Cal.App.4th 319, 48 Cal.Rptr.3d 868.

YEGAN, * * * P.J. [Presiding Judge]

Shakespeare asked, "What's in a name?" We supply an answer only for the Uniform Commercial Code lien priority statutes: Everything when the last name is true and nothing when the last name is false. When a creditor files a UCC-1 financing statement, the debtor's true last name is crucial because the financing statements are indexed by last names. A subsequent creditor who loans money to a debtor with the same name is put on notice that its lien is secondary.

* * * *

In 2001, appellants [Corona Fruits & Veggies, Inc., and Corona Marketing Company] subleased farmland [in Santa Barbara County, California,] to a strawberry farmer (debtor) who went by the last name of “Munoz.” The sublease, as well as other documents given to appellants, stated that debtor’s name was “Armando Munoz Juarez.” That was and is his full true name. But he signed the sublease “Armando Munoz.”

Appellants advanced money for payroll and farm production expenses. On July 2, 2001, appellants filed a UCC-1 financing statement listing debtor’s name as “Armando Munoz” and a second UCC-1 financing statement on January 17, 2002, listing the same name.

In December 2001, debtor contracted with respondent Frosun Foods, Inc. (Frosun Foods) to sell processed strawberries. Frosun Foods advanced money which was secured by a January 17, 2002 UCC-1 financing statement listing debtor’s last name as “Armando Juarez.”

As of July 26, 2002, debtor owed appellants $230,482.52 and owed Frosun Foods $19,648.52. When debtor was unable to meet his loan obligations, appellants took back the farmland, harvested the strawberry crop, and kept the crop proceeds.

Appellants and Frosun Foods filed * * * actions [in a California state court to collect the unpaid balances of the debts]. The trial court found that debtor’s true legal name was “Armando Munoz Juarez, * * * as shown on his identification documents as well as the documents of [appellants] and Frosun Foods, Inc. * * * .” The trial court concluded that appellants and Frosun Foods knew debtor’s true legal name, “but only Frosun Foods, Inc. recorded its UCC-1 statement under that full name. Its recording supercedes the two recordings by [appellants] using only part of Munoz’s name.”

* * * *

In California, the filing of a UCC-1 financing statement is generally required to perfect a security interest or agricultural lien. The requirement that a financing statement provide the debtor’s name is particularly important. Financing statements are indexed under the name of the debtor, and those who wish to find finance statements search for them under the debtor’s name.

Substantial evidence supports the finding that debtor’s true last name was “Juarez” and not “Munoz.” The pleadings state that debtor’s last name is “Juarez,” as do many of appellants’ business records. Debtor provided appellants with a photo I.D. and Green Card bearing the name “Armando Munoz Juarez.” The name appears on the sublease and other documents including the Farmer Agreement, a Crop Exhibit, a second sublease agreement (identifying debtor as “Juarez Farms, Armando Munoz Juarez”), a crop assignment, appellants’ accounting records, receipts for advances, appellants’ letters to debtor, and checks issued by appellants. Debtor identified himself by the last name “Juarez” on two tax returns, in tax documents issued by appellants, in debtor’s dealings with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, in debtor’s bankruptcy petition, and in debtor’s business dealings with Frosun Foods.

As a general rule, minor errors in a UCC financing statement do not affect the effectiveness of the financing statement unless the errors render the document seriously misleading to other creditors. [California Uniform Commercial Code] Section 9506, subdivision (b) [California’s version of UCC 9–506(b)], however, provides: “[A] financing statement that fails sufficiently to provide the name of the debtor in accordance with subdivision (a) of Section 9503 is seriously misleading.” There is a safe harbor [under California UCC Section 9506, subdivision (c)]. “[I]f a search of the filing office’s records under the debtor’s correct name, using the filing office’s standard search logic, if any, would nevertheless disclose that financing statement, the name provided does not make the financing statement seriously misleading.” [Emphasis added.]

The record indicates that Frosun’s agent conducted a “Juarez” debtor name search and did not discover appellants’ UCC-1 financing statement. No evidence was presented that the financing statement would have been discovered under debtor’s true legal name, using the filing office’s standard search logic. Absent such a showing, the trial court reasonably concluded that the “Armando Munoz” debtor name in appellants’ financing statement was seriously misleading. The secured party, not the debtor or uninvolved third parties, has the duty of insuring proper filing and indexing of the notice. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Appellants knew that debtor's legal name was "Armando Juarez" or "Armando Munoz Juarez." Elodia Corona, appellants' account manager, prepared the UCC Financing Statements and testified: "I don't know why I didn't put his [i.e., debtor's] last name [on the UCC-1 financing statement]. I could have made a mistake * * * ." Ms. Corona was asked: "So the last name on all the Agreements is Juarez, but on the U.C.C. 1 Forms, you filed them as Munoz?" Ms. Corona answered, "Yes."

* * * *

Appellants are estopped by their pleadings, the contracts, business records, the checks for the cash advances, debtor's identification papers and tax papers, and the testimony of appellants' account manager. Appellants could have protected themselves by using both names on their financing statements. The trial court did not err in finding that the UCC-1 financing statement filed by Frozsun Foods perfected a security interest superior to appellants' liens.

The judgment is affirmed.

 QUESTIONS

1. Under what circumstances might a financing statement be considered effective even if it does not identify the debtor correctly?
2. In most Latin American countries, a person's surname consists of the father's name followed by the mother's name. Should this fact have changed the result in this case? Why or why not?

Perfection without Filing

In two types of situations, security interests can be perfected without filing a financing statement. The first occurs when the collateral is transferred into the possession of the secured party. The second occurs when the security interest is one of a limited number under the UCC that can be perfected on attachment (without a filing and without having to possess the goods) [UCC 9-309]. The phrase perfected on attachment means that these security interests are automatically perfected at the time of their creation. Two of the most common security interests that are perfected on attachment are a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods (defined and explained below) and an assignment of a beneficial interest in a decedent's estate [UCC 9-309(1), (13)].

Perfection by Possession In the past, one of the most frequently used means of obtaining financing under the common law was to pledge certain collateral as security for the debt and transfer the collateral into the creditor's possession. When the debt was paid, the collateral was returned to the debtor. Although the debtor usually entered into a written security agreement, oral security agreements were also enforceable as long as the secured party possessed the collateral. Article 9 of the UCC retained the common law pledge and the principle that the security agreement need not be in writing to be enforceable if the collateral is transferred to the secured party [UCC 9-310, 9-312(b), 9-313].

For most collateral, possession by the secured party is impractical because it denies the debtor the right to use or derive income from the property to pay off the debt. For example, suppose that a farmer takes out a loan to finance the purchase of a piece of heavy farm equipment needed to harvest crops and uses the equipment as collateral. Clearly, the purpose of the purchase would be defeated if the farmer transferred the collateral into the creditor's possession. Certain items, however, such as stocks, bonds, instruments, and jewelry, are commonly transferred into the creditor's possession when they are used as collateral for loans.

Perfection by Attachment—The Purchase-Money Security Interest in Consumer Goods Under the UCC, fourteen types of security interests are perfected automatically at the time they are created [UCC 9-309]. The most common of these is the purchase-money security interest (PMSI). A PMSI in consumer goods is created when a person buys goods primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, and the seller or lender agrees to extend credit for part or all of the purchase price of the goods.

The entity that extends the credit and obtains the PMSI can be either the seller (a store, for example) or a financial institution that lends the buyer the funds with which to purchase the goods [UCC 9-102(a)(2)].

Automatic Perfection. A PMSI in consumer goods is perfected automatically at the time of a credit sale—that is, at the time the PMSI is created. For example, suppose that Jamie wants to purchase a new high-definition television set from ABC Television, Inc. The purchase price is $2,500. Not being able to pay the entire amount in cash, Jamie signs a purchase agreement to pay $1,000 down and $100 per month until the balance plus interest is fully paid. ABC is to retain a security interest in the purchased goods until full payment has been made. Because the security interest was created as part of the purchase agreement, it is a PMSI. ABC does not need to do anything else to perfect its security interest.

Exceptions to the Rule of Automatic Perfection. There are two exceptions to this rule of automatic perfection for PMSIs. First, certain types of security interests that are subject to other federal or state laws may require additional steps to be perfected [UCC 9-311]. For example, many jurisdictions have certificate-of-title statutes that establish perfection requirements for security interests in certain goods, including automobiles, trailers, boats, mobile homes, and farm tractors. If a consumer in these jurisdictions purchases a boat, for example, the secured party will need to file a certificate of title with the appropriate state official to perfect the PMSI. A second exception involves PMSIs in nonconsumer goods, such as livestock or a business's inventory, which are not automatically perfected (these types of PMSIs are discussed later in this chapter in the context of priorities) [UCC 9-324].

Effective Time Duration of Perfection

A financing statement is effective for five years from the date of filing [UCC 9-515]. If a continuation statement is filed within six months prior to the expiration date, the effectiveness of the original statement is continued for another five years, starting with the expiration date of the first five-year period [UCC 9-515(d), (e)]. The effectiveness of the statement can be continued in the same manner indefinitely. Any attempt to file a continuation statement outside the six-month window will render the continuation ineffective, and the perfection will lapse at the end of the five-year period.

If a financing statement lapses, the security interest that had been perfected by the filing now becomes unperfected. A purchaser for value can take the property that was used as collateral as if the security interest had never been perfected [UCC 9-515(c)]. For a synopsis of the rules for creating and perfecting a security interest, see Concept Summary 29.1 on the next page.

The Scope of a Security Interest

In addition to covering collateral already in the debtor's possession, a security agreement can cover various other types of property, including the proceeds of the sale of collateral, after-acquired property, and future advances.

Proceeds

Proceeds means whatever is received when collateral is sold or disposed of in some other way [UCC 9-102(a)(64)]. A security interest in the collateral gives the secured party a security interest in the proceeds acquired from the sale of that collateral. For example, suppose that a bank has a perfected security interest in the inventory of a retail seller of heavy farm machinery. The retailer sells a tractor out of this inventory to a farmer, who is by definition a buyer in the ordinary course of business. The farmer agrees, in a security agreement, to make monthly payments to the retailer for a period of twenty-four months. If the retailer should go into default on the loan from the bank, the bank is entitled to the remaining payments the farmer owes to the retailer as proceeds.

A security interest in proceeds perfects automatically on the perfection of the secured party's security interest in the original collateral and remains perfected for twenty days after the debtor receives the proceeds. One way to extend the twenty-day automatic perfection period is to provide for such extended coverage in the original security agreement [UCC 9-315(c), (d)]. This is typically done when the collateral is the type that is likely to be sold, such as a retailer's inventory—for example, of computers or DVD players. The UCC also permits a security interest in identifiable cash proceeds to remain perfected after twenty days [UCC 9-315(d)(2)].

Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest

Concept	Description
CREATING A SECURITY INTEREST	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Unless the creditor has possession of the collateral, there must be a written or authenticated security agreement signed or authenticated by the debtor and describing the collateral subject to the security interest. 2. The secured party must give value to the debtor. 3. The debtor must have rights in the collateral—some ownership interest or right to obtain possession of the specified collateral.
PERFECTING A SECURITY INTEREST	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Perfection by filing—The most common method of perfection is by filing a financing statement containing the names of the secured party and the debtor and indicating the collateral covered by the financing statement. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Communication of the financing statement to the appropriate filing office, together with the correct filing fee, constitutes a filing. b. The financing statement must be filed under the name of the debtor; fictitious (trade) names normally are not sufficient. 2. Perfection without filing— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. By transfer of collateral—The debtor can transfer possession of the collateral to the secured party. For example, a pledge is this type of transfer. b. By attachment—A limited number of security interests are perfected by attachment, such as a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in consumer goods. If the secured party has a PMSI in consumer goods (bought for personal, family, or household purposes), the secured party's security interest is perfected automatically.

After-Acquired Property

After-acquired property is property that the debtor acquired after the execution of the security agreement. The security agreement may provide for a security interest in after-acquired property [UCC 9-204(1)]. This is particularly useful for inventory financing arrangements because a secured party whose security interest is in existing inventory knows that the debtor will sell that inventory, thereby reducing the collateral subject to the security interest.

Generally, the debtor will purchase new inventory to replace the inventory sold. The secured party wants this newly acquired inventory to be subject to the original security interest. Thus, the after-acquired property clause continues the secured party's claim to any inventory acquired thereafter. This is not to say that the original security interest will take priority over the rights of all other creditors with regard to this after-acquired inventory, as will be discussed later.

To illustrate: Amato buys factory equipment from Bronson on credit, giving as security an interest in all of her equipment—both what she is buying and what she already owns. The security agreement with Bronson contains an after-acquired property clause. Six months later, Amato pays cash to another seller of factory equipment for additional equipment. Six months after that, Amato goes out of business before she has paid off her debt to Bronson. Bronson has a security interest in all of Amato's equipment, even the equipment bought from the other seller.

Future Advances

Often, a debtor will arrange with a bank to have a continuing line of credit under which the debtor can borrow funds intermittently. Advances against lines of credit can be subject to a properly perfected security interest in certain collateral. The security agreement may provide that any future advances made against that line of credit are also subject to the security interest in the same collateral [UCC 9-204(c)]. Future advances need not be of the same type or otherwise related to the original advance to benefit from this type of cross-collateralization.⁴ Cross-collateralization occurs when an asset that is not the subject of a loan is used to collateralize that loan.

For example, Stroh is the owner of a small manufacturing plant with equipment valued at $1 million. He has an immediate need for $40,000 of working capital, so he obtains a loan from Midwestern Bank and signs a security agreement, putting up all of his equipment as security. The bank properly perfects its security interest. The security agreement provides that Stroh can borrow up to $500,000 in the future, using the same equipment as collateral for any future advances. In this situation, Midwestern Bank does not have to execute a new security agreement and perfect a security interest in the collateral each time an advance is made, up to a cumulative total of $500,000. For priority purposes, each advance is perfected as of the date of the original perfection.

The Floating-Lien Concept

A security agreement that provides for a security interest in proceeds, in after-acquired property, or in collateral subject to future advances by the secured party (or in all three) is often characterized as a floating lien. This type of security interest continues in the collateral or proceeds even if the collateral is sold, exchanged, or disposed of in some other way.

A Floating Lien in Inventory Floating liens commonly arise in the financing of inventories. A creditor is not interested in specific pieces of inventory, which are constantly changing, so the lien “floats” from one item to another, as the inventory changes.

Consider an example. Suppose that Cascade Sports, Inc., a corporation formed in Oregon, operates as a cross-country ski dealer and has a line of credit with Portland First Bank to finance an inventory of cross-country skis. Cascade and Portland First enter into a security agreement that provides for coverage of proceeds, after-acquired inventory, present inventory, and future advances. Portland First perfects its security interest in the inventory by filing centrally with the office of the secretary of state in Oregon. One day, Cascade sells a new pair of the latest cross-country skis and receives a used pair in trade. That same day, Cascade purchases two new pairs of cross-country skis from a local manufacturer for cash. Later that day, to meet its payroll, Cascade borrows $8,000 from Portland First Bank under the security agreement.

Portland First gets a perfected security interest in the used pair of skis under the proceeds clause, has a perfected security interest in the two new pairs of skis purchased from the local manufacturer under the after-acquired property clause, and has the new amount of funds advanced to Cascade secured on all of the above collateral by the future-advances clause. All of this is accomplished under the original perfected security interest. The various items in the inventory have changed, but Portland First still has a perfected security interest in Cascade’s inventory. Hence, it has a floating lien on the inventory.

A Floating Lien in a Shifting Stock of Goods The concept of the floating lien can also apply to a shifting stock of goods. The lien can start with raw materials; follow them as they become finished goods and inventories; and continue as the goods are sold and are turned into accounts receivable, chattel paper, or cash.

Priorities

When more than one party claims an interest in the same collateral, which has priority? The UCC sets out detailed rules to answer this question. Although in many situations the party who has a perfected security interest will have priority, there are exceptions that give priority rights to another party, such as a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

General Rules of Priority

The basic rule is that when more than one security interest has been perfected in the same collateral, the first security interest to be perfected (or filed) has priority over any security interests that are perfected later. If only one of the conflicting security interests has been perfected, then that security interest has priority. If none of the security interests have been perfected, then the first security interest that attaches has priority. The UCC’s rules of priority can be summarized as follows:

1. A perfected security interest has priority over unsecured creditors and unperfected security interests. When two or more parties have claims to the same collateral, a perfected secured party’s interest has priority over the interests of most other parties

4. See Official Comment 5 to UCC 9–204.

[UCC 9-322(a)(2)]. This includes priority to the proceeds from a sale of collateral resulting from a bankruptcy (giving the perfected secured party rights superior to those of the bankruptcy trustee as discussed in Chapter 30).

2. Conflicting perfected security interests. When two or more secured parties have perfected security interests in the same collateral, generally the first to perfect (by filing or taking possession of the collateral) has priority [UCC 9-322(a)(1)].
3. Conflicting unperfected security interests. When two conflicting security interests are unperfected, the first to attach (be created) has priority [UCC 9-322(a)(3)]. This is sometimes called the “first-in-time” rule.

Exceptions to the General Rule

Under some circumstances, on the debtor's default, the perfection of a security interest will not protect a secured party against certain other third parties having claims to the collateral. For example, the UCC provides that in some instances a PMSI, properly perfected,⁵ will prevail over another security interest in after-acquired collateral, even though the other was perfected first. We discuss several significant exceptions to the general rules of priority in the following subsections.

Buyers in the Ordinary Course of Business Under the UCC, a person who buys “in the ordinary course of business” takes the goods free from any security interest created by the seller even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence [UCC 9-320(a)]. In other words, a buyer in the ordinary course will have priority even if a previously perfected security interest exists as to the goods. The rationale for this rule is obvious: if buyers could not obtain the goods free and clear of any security interest the merchant had created, for example, in inventory, the unfettered flow of goods in the marketplace would be hindered. Note that the buyer can know about the existence of a perfected security interest, so long as he or she does not know that buying the goods violates the rights of any third party.

The UCC defines a buyer in the ordinary course of business as any person who in good faith, and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another in the goods, buys in ordinary course from a person in the business of selling goods of that kind [UCC 1-201(9)]. For example, on August 1 West Bank perfects a security interest in all of Best Television's existing inventory and any inventory thereafter acquired. On September 1, Carla, a student at Central University, purchases one of the television sets in Best's inventory. If, on December 1, Best goes into default, can West Bank repossess the television set sold to Carla? The answer is no, because Carla is a buyer in the ordinary course of business (Best is in the business of selling goods of that kind) and takes the television free and clear of West Bank's perfected security interest. This is true even if Carla knew that West Bank had a security interest in Best's inventory when she purchased the TV.

In the following case, an auto dealer's creditor sought to recover amounts advanced on the dealer's purchase of two vehicles that were subsequently sold to buyers in the ordinary course of business.

Court of Appeals of Ohio, Tenth District, 2007. 171 Ohio App.3d 132, 869 N.E.2d 746.

● Background and Facts Hook & Motter, Inc., is an auto dealer in Ohio that does business as Dublin Auto Sales. Dublin Auto granted a security interest in its inventory to Heartland Bank for a $300,000 line of credit. Heartland perfected its security interest by filing financing statements with the appropriate state offices. Dublin Auto used $9,000 of its credit to buy a 1997 Ford F-150 and $13,000 to buy a 1999 Jeep Cherokee. Dublin Auto delivered the certificates of title, which designated Dublin Auto as the owner, to Heartland. In March 2002, Dublin Auto sold the F-150 for $15,386.63 to Joe and Michael Murphy, and the Jeep for $14,045 to Michael Laxton. National City Bank financed both purchases. New certificates of title designated the buyers as the owners and Heartland as the “first lienholder.” Heartland received none of the funds from the sales and consequently filed a suit in an Ohio state court against National City and others, seeking a declaration that its security interest in the vehicles took priority. The court ruled in National City's favor. Heartland appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

PETREE, Judge.

* * * *

This case involves the interplay between Ohio's version of revised Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC"), which is codified at [Revised Code (R.C.) Chapter 1309], and Ohio's Certificate of Motor Vehicle Title Law ("Certificate-of-Title Law"), which is embodied in R.C. Chapter 4505. * * *

R.C. 1309.320(A) [Ohio's version of UCC 9-320(a)] provides:

[A] buyer in the ordinary course of business * * * takes free of a security interest created by the buyer's seller even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence.

R.C. 4505.04(A) provides:

No person acquiring a motor vehicle from its owner, whether the owner is a * * * dealer * * *, shall acquire any right, title, claim, or interest in or to the motor vehicle until there is issued to the person a certificate of title to the motor vehicle * * * .

R.C. 4505.13(A) provides:

(1) Chapter 1309 and [S]ection 1701.66 of the Revised Code do not permit or require the deposit, filing, or other record of a security interest covering a motor vehicle, except as provided in division (A)(2) of this section.

(2) Chapter 1309 of the Revised Code applies to a security interest in a motor vehicle held as inventory for sale by a dealer. The security interest has priority over creditors of the dealer as provided in Chapter 1309 of the Revised Code without notation of the security interest on a certificate of title * * * .

Additionally, R.C. 4505.13(B) provides:

Subject to division (A) of this section, any security agreement covering a security interest in a motor vehicle, if a notation of the agreement has been made * * * on the face of the certificate of title * * * is valid as against the creditors of the debtor * * * and against subsequent purchasers, secured parties, and other lienholders or claimants. * * *

* * * According to Heartland, R.C. 4505.04(A), and not the provisions of R.C. Chapter 1309, controls in this case, and pursuant to R.C. 4505.04(A), its security interests remained protected because the certificates of title remained in its possession. Heartland also argues * * * that pursuant to R.C. 4505.13(B) its security interests remained protected because they were notated on the certificates of title for the motor vehicles at issue.

We disagree with Heartland's statutory analysis. R.C. 4505.13(A)(2) provides that R.C. Chapter 1309 (which includes R.C. 1309.320(A)) "applies to a security interest in a motor vehicle held as inventory for sale by a dealer." Contrary to Heartland's argument, language in the first sentence of R.C. 4505.13(B) does not create an exception to that principle when a notation of a lien is made on the face of the certificate of title. * * * However, that provision is "[s]ubject to" R.C. 4505.13(A)'s specific designation of R.C. Chapter 1309 as applying to security interests in motor vehicles held as inventory for sale by a dealer. Thus, as to the perfection and priority of security interests in motor vehicles held as inventory for sale by a dealer, R.C. Chapter 1309 controls. This finding is consistent with the cross-reference within R.C. Chapter 1309 citing R.C. Chapter 4505 as governing the perfection of security interests in motor vehicles that are not inventory held for sale by a dealer. * * *

Therefore, R.C. Chapter 1309, and necessarily R.C. 1309.320(A), applies to Heartland's security interest in the motor vehicles at issue in this case because, according to Heartland, the vehicles were held as inventory for sale by a dealer. As outlined above, R.C. 1309.320(A) provides that a buyer in the ordinary course of business takes free of a security interest created by the buyer's seller, even if the security interest is perfected and the buyer knows of its existence. It is undisputed that both Laxton and the Murphys were buyers in the ordinary course of business under the Revised Code. Applying R.C. 1309.320(A) to these facts, Heartland's security interest as against Laxton and the Murphys in the motor vehicles at issue was extinguished upon the sale of those motor vehicles. Thus, we conclude that the trial court properly granted summary judgment in favor of National City. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Under UCC 9-320(a)—which applied to the security interest in the vehicles in this case because a dealer held those vehicles as inventory for sale—Heartland's interest was extinguished on the sale of the vehicles to the Murphys and Laxton, who met the definition of buyers in the ordinary course of business.

● The Global Dimension Motor vehicles can be moved easily from one jurisdiction to another. Is it likely that the result would have been different if the Murphys and Laxton had purchased the vehicles in, say, Canada? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Would the outcome in this case have been affected if the title certificates had been filed in a database that could be accessed online? Explain.

PMSI in Goods Other Than Inventory and Livestock

An important exception to the first-in-time rule involves certain types of collateral, such as equipment, that is not inventory (or livestock) and in which one of the secured parties has a perfected PMSI [UCC 9-324(a)]. Suppose that Sandoval borrows funds from West Bank, signing a security agreement in which she puts up all of her present and after-acquired equipment as security. On May 1, West Bank perfects this security interest (which is not a PMSI). On July 1, Sandoval purchases a new piece of equipment from Zylex Company on credit, signing a security agreement. The delivery date for the new equipment is August 1.

Zylex thus has a PMSI in the new equipment (that is not part of its inventory), but the PMSI is not in consumer goods and thus is not automatically perfected. If Sandoval defaults on her payments to both West Bank and Zylex, which of them has priority with regard to the new piece of equipment? Generally, West Bank would have priority because its interest perfected first in time. In this situation, however, Zylex has a PMSI, and provided that Zylex perfected its interest in the equipment within twenty days after Sandoval took possession on August 1, Zylex has priority.

PMSI in Inventory Another important exception to the first-in-time rule has to do with security interests in inventory [UCC 9-324(b)]. For example, on May 1, SNS Television borrows funds from West Bank. SNS signs a security agreement, putting up all of its present inventory and any inventory thereafter acquired as collateral. West Bank perfects its interest (not a PMSI) on that date. On June 10, SNS buys new inventory from Martin, Inc., a manufacturer, to use for its Fourth of July sale. SNS makes a down payment for the new inventory and signs a security agreement giving Martin a PMSI in the new inventory as collateral for the remaining debt. Martin delivers the inventory to SNS on June 28. Because of a hurricane in the area, SNS's Fourth of July sale is a disaster, and most of its inventory remains unsold. In August, SNS defaults on its payments to both West Bank and Martin.

Does West Bank or Martin have priority with respect to the new inventory delivered to SNS on June 28? If Martin has not perfected its security interest by June 28, West Bank's after-acquired collateral clause has priority because it was the first to be perfected. If, however, Martin has perfected and gives proper notice of its security interest to West Bank before SNS takes possession of the goods on June 28, Martin has priority.

Buyers of the Collateral The UCC recognizes that there are certain types of buyers whose interest in purchased goods could conflict with those of a perfected secured party on the debtor's default. These include buyers in the ordinary course of business (as discussed), as well as buyers of farm products, instruments, documents, or securities. The UCC sets down special rules of priority for these types of buyers. Exhibit 29-4 describes the various rules regarding the priority of claims to a debtor's collateral.

EXHIBIT 29-4 • Priority of Claims to a Debtor's Collateral

Parties	Priority
Perfectured Secured Party versus Unsecured Parties and Creditors	A perfected secured party's interest has priority over the interests of most other parties, including unsecured creditors, unperfected secured parties, subsequent lien creditors, trustees in bankruptcy, and buyers who do not purchase the collateral in the ordinary course of business.
Perfectured Secured Party versus Perfectured Secured Party	Between two perfected secured parties in the same collateral, the general rule is that the first in time of perfection is the first in right to the collateral [UCC 9-322(a)(1)].
Perfectured Secured Party versus Perfectured PMSI	A PMSI, even if second in time of perfection, has priority providing that the following conditions are met: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Other collateral—A PMSI has priority, providing it is perfected within twenty days after the debtor takes possession [UCC 9-324(a)]. 2. Inventory—A PMSI has priority if it is perfected and proper written or authenticated notice is given to the other security-interest holder on or before the time the debtor takes possession [UCC 9-324(b)]. 3. Software—Applies to a PMSI in software only if used in goods subject to a PMSI. If the goods are inventory, priority is determined the same as for inventory; if they are not, priority is determined as for goods other than inventory [UCC 9-103(c), 9-324(f)].
Perfectured Secured Party versus Purchaser of Debtor's Collateral	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Buyer of goods in the ordinary course of the seller's business—Buyer prevails over a secured party's security interest, even if perfected and even if the buyer knows of the security interest [UCC 9-320(a)]. 2. Buyer of consumer goods purchased outside the ordinary course of business—Buyer prevails over a secured party's interest, even if perfected by attachment, providing the buyer purchased as follows: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. For value. b. Without actual knowledge of the security interest. c. For use as a consumer good. d. Prior to the secured party's perfection by filing [UCC 9-320(b)]. 3. Buyer of chattel paper—Buyer prevails if the buyer: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Gave new value in making the purchase. b. Took possession in the ordinary course of the buyer's business. c. Took without knowledge of the security interest [UCC 9-330]. 4. Buyer of instruments, documents, or securities—Buyer who is a holder in due course, a holder to whom negotiable documents have been duly negotiated, or a bona fide purchaser of securities has priority over a previously perfected security interest [UCC 9-330(d), 9-331(a)]. 5. Buyer of farm products—Buyer from a farmer takes free and clear of perfected security interests unless, where permitted, a secured party files centrally an effective financing statement (EFS) or the buyer receives proper notice of the security interest before the sale.
Unperfected Secured Party versus Unsecured Creditor	An unperfected secured party prevails over unsecured creditors and creditors who have obtained judgments against the debtor but who have not begun the legal process to collect on those judgments [UCC 9-201(a)].

Rights and Duties of Debtors and Creditors

The security agreement itself determines most of the rights and duties of the debtor and the secured party. The UCC, however, imposes some rights and duties that are applicable in the absence of a valid security agreement that states the contrary.

Information Requests

Under UCC 9-523(a), a secured party has the option, when making the filing, of furnishing a copy of the financing statement being filed to the filing officer and requesting that the filing officer make a note of the file number, the date, and the hour of the original filing on the copy. The filing officer must send this copy to the person designated by the secured party or to the debtor, if the debtor makes the request. Under UCC 9-523(c) and (d), a filing officer must also give information to a person who is contemplating obtaining a security interest from a prospective debtor. The filing officer must issue a certificate that provides information on possible perfected financing statements with respect to the named debtor. The filing officer will charge a fee for the certification and for any information copies provided [UCC 9-525(d)].

Release, Assignment, and Amendment

A secured party can release all or part of any collateral described in the financing statement, thereby terminating its security interest in that collateral. The release is recorded by filing a uniform amendment form [UCC 9-512, 9-521(b)]. A secured party can also assign all or part of the security interest to a third party (the assignee). The assignee becomes the secured party of record if the assignment is filed by use of a uniform amendment form [UCC 9-514, 9-521(a)].

If the debtor and the secured party agree, they can amend the filing—by adding or substituting new collateral, for example—by filing a uniform amendment form that indicates the file number of the initial financing statement [UCC 9-512(a)]. The amendment does not extend the time period of perfection, but if new collateral is added, the perfection date (for priority purposes) for the new collateral begins on the date the amendment is filed [UCC 9-512(b), (c)].

Confirmation or Accounting Request by Debtor

The debtor may believe that the amount of the unpaid debt or the listing of the collateral subject to the security interest is inaccurate. The debtor has the right to request a confirmation of the unpaid debt or listing of collateral. The secured party must either approve or correct this confirmation request [UCC 9-210].

The secured party must comply with the debtor's confirmation request by authenticating and sending to the debtor an accounting within fourteen days after the request is received. Otherwise, the secured party will be held liable for any loss suffered by the debtor, plus $500 [UCC 9-210, 9-625(f)].

Termination Statement

If the secured party perfected its interest in the collateral by filing, the debtor is entitled to have a termination statement filed once the debt has been fully paid. Such a statement demonstrates to the public that the filed perfected security interest has been terminated [UCC 9-513].

Whenever consumer goods are involved, the secured party must file a termination statement (or, alternatively, a release) within one month of the final payment or within twenty days of receiving the debtor's authenticated demand, whichever is earlier [UCC 9-513(b)].

When the collateral is other than consumer goods, on an authenticated demand by the debtor, the secured party must either send a termination statement to the debtor or file such a statement within twenty days [UCC 9-513(c)]. Otherwise, when the collateral is other than consumer goods, the secured party is not required to file or to send a termination statement. Whenever a secured party fails to file or send the termination statement as requested, the debtor can recover $500 plus any additional loss suffered [UCC 9-625(e)(4), (f)].

Default

Article 9 defines the rights, duties, and remedies of the secured party and of the debtor on the debtor's default. Should the secured party fail to comply with his or her duties, the debtor is afforded particular rights and remedies.

The topic of default is one of great concern to secured lenders and to the lawyers who draft security agreements. What constitutes default is not always clear. In fact, Article 9 does not define the term. Consequently, parties are encouraged in practice—and by the UCC—to include in their security agreements certain standards to be applied in determining when default has actually occurred. In so doing, parties can stipulate the conditions that will constitute a default [UCC 9–601, 9–603]. Often, these critical terms are shaped by the creditor in an attempt to provide the maximum protection possible. The ultimate terms, however, cannot go beyond the limitations imposed by the good faith requirement and the unconscionability provisions of the UCC.

Any breach of the terms of the security agreement can constitute default. Nevertheless, default occurs most commonly when the debtor fails to meet the scheduled payments that the parties have agreed on or when the debtor becomes bankrupt.

Basic Remedies

The rights and remedies of secured parties under Article 9 are cumulative [UCC 9–601(c)]. Therefore, if a creditor is unsuccessful in enforcing rights by one method, she or he can pursue another method.⁶ Generally, a secured party's remedies can be divided into the two basic categories discussed next.

Repossession of the Collateral On the debtor's default, a secured party can take peaceful or judicial possession of the collateral covered by the security agreement [UCC 9–609(b)]. This provision, because it allows the secured party to take peaceful possession of the collateral without the use of the judicial process, is often referred to as the “self-help” provision of Article 9. This provision has been controversial, largely because the UCC does not define what constitutes peaceful possession. The general rule, however, is that the collateral has been taken peacefully if the secured party has taken it without committing (1) trespass onto realty, (2) assault and/or battery, or (3) breaking and entering. On taking possession, the secured party may either retain the collateral for satisfaction of the debt [UCC 9–620] or resell the goods and apply the proceeds toward the debt [UCC 9–610].

6. See James J. White and Robert S. Summers, Uniform Commercial Code, 5th ed. (St. Paul: West Publishing Co., 2000), pp. 908–909.

Judicial Remedies Alternatively, a secured party can relinquish the security interest and use any judicial remedy available, such as obtaining a judgment on the underlying debt, followed by execution and levy. (Execution is the implementation of a court's decree or judgment. Levy is the obtaining of funds by legal process through the seizure and sale of nonsecured property, usually done after a writ of execution has been issued. These writs were discussed in Chapter 28.) Execution and levy are rarely undertaken unless the collateral is no longer in existence or has declined so much in value that it is worth substantially less than the amount of the debt and the debtor has other assets available that may be legally seized to satisfy the debt [UCC 9–601(a)].⁷

Disposition of Collateral

Once default has occurred and the secured party has obtained possession of the collateral, the secured party can retain the collateral in full satisfaction of the debt (subject to limitations, discussed next) or sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the collateral in any commercially reasonable manner [UCC 9–602(7), 9–603, 9–610(a), 9–620]. Any sale is always subject to procedures established by state law.

Retention of Collateral by the Secured Party

The UCC acknowledges that parties are sometimes better off if they do not sell the collateral. Therefore, a secured party may retain the collateral unless it consists of consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent or more of the purchase price in a PMSI or debt in a non-PMSI (as will be discussed shortly) [UCC 9–620(e)].

This general right, however, is subject to several conditions. The secured party must send notice of the proposal to the debtor if the debtor has not signed a statement renouncing or modifying her or his rights after default [UCC 9–620(a), 9–621]. If the collateral is consumer goods, the secured party does not need to give any other notice. In all other situations, the secured party must also send notice to any other secured party from whom the secured party has received written or authenticated notice of a claim of interest in the collateral in question. The secured party must also send notice to any junior lienholder (one holding a lien that is subordinate to one or more other liens on the same property) who has filed a statutory lien (such as a mechanic's lien—see Chapter 28) or a security interest in the collateral ten days before the debtor consented to the retention [UCC 9-621].

7. Some assets are exempt from creditors' claims under state statutes (as was discussed in Chapter 28) or bankruptcy laws (to be described in Chapter 30).

If, within twenty days after the notice is sent, the secured party receives an objection sent by a person entitled to receive notification, the secured party must sell or otherwise dispose of the collateral in accordance with the provisions of UCC 9-602, 9-603, 9-610, and 9-613 (disposition procedures will be discussed shortly). If no such written objection is forthcoming, the secured party may retain the collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the debtor's obligation [UCC 9-620(a), 9-621].

Consumer Goods When the collateral is consumer goods and the debtor has paid 60 percent of the purchase price on a PMSI, or 60 percent of the debt on a non-PMSI, the secured party must sell or otherwise dispose of the repossessed collateral within ninety days [UCC 9-620(e), (f)]. Failure to comply opens the secured party to an action for conversion or other liability under UCC 9-625(b) and (c) unless the consumer-debtor signed a written statement after default renouncing or modifying the right to demand the sale of the goods [UCC 9-624].

Disposition Procedures A secured party who does not choose to retain the collateral or who is required to sell it must resort to the disposition procedures prescribed under UCC 9-602(7), 9-603, 9-610(a), and 9-613. The UCC allows a great deal of flexibility with regard to disposition. UCC 9-610(a) states that after default, a secured party may sell, lease, license, or otherwise dispose of any or all of the collateral in its present condition or following any commercially reasonable preparation or processing. The secured party may also purchase the collateral at a public sale, but not at a private sale—unless the collateral is of a kind customarily sold on a recognized market or is the subject of widely distributed standard price quotations [UCC 9-610(c)].

The Sale Must Be Accomplished in a Commercially Reasonable Manner. One of the major limitations on the disposition of collateral is that it must be accomplished in a commercially reasonable manner. UCC 9-610(b) states as follows:

Every aspect of a disposition of collateral, including the method, manner, time, place, and other terms, must be commercially reasonable. If commercially reasonable, a secured party may dispose of collateral by public or private proceedings, by one or more contracts, as a unit or in parcels, and at any time and place and on any terms.

Whenever the secured party fails to conduct a disposition in a commercially reasonable manner or to give proper notice, the deficiency of the debtor is reduced to the extent that such failure affected the price received at the disposition [UCC 9-626(a)(3)].

The issue in the following case was whether it was commercially reasonable on a debtor's default for the creditor to delay in selling the debtor's stock, which served as the collateral for the parties' loan. Between the time of the default and the sale of the stock, the stock's market value declined significantly.

United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 2005. 395 F.3d 271.

● Background and Facts Charles Johnson was the chief executive officer of PurchasePro.com, Inc. Geoff Layne was the company's marketing director. Johnson and Layne entered into two separate loan agreements with Bank One, Kentucky, N.A., and Banc One Securities Corporation (collectively, Bank One), secured by their shares of PurchasePro.com stock. Layne's agreement included a loan-to-value (LTV) ratio of 50 percent. This meant that the market value of the stock had to be at least twice the outstanding balance on the loan. Johnson's agreement had a 40 percent LTV ratio, which meant that the stock's market value had to be two and one-half times the balance. If the market value dropped, Layne and Johnson had five days to provide more collateral or pay off the loans. Otherwise, they would be in default, and Bank One could sell the stock. In February 2001, the price of the stock fell below these limits. After months of unsuccessful negotiations, Bank One sold Johnson's shares in July, recovering $524,757.39 in proceeds to pay down his debt but leaving an unpaid balance of approximately $2.2 million. Layne and Johnson filed a suit in a federal district court against Bank One, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. Bank One filed counterclaims against Johnson and Layne, seeking payment on the loans. The court issued a summary judgment in Bank One's favor. Johnson appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit.

* * * *

Johnson's * * * argument raised on appeal is that Bank One violated Kentucky law by failing to dispose of the PurchasePro stock in a commercially reasonable manner. * * * [Kentucky Revised Statutes Annotated Section 355.9-610 (Kentucky's version of UCC 9-610)] requires that "[e]very aspect of a disposition of collateral, including the method, manner, time, place, and other terms, must be commercially reasonable." The purpose of the provision is to protect the debtor's interest by ensuring he will receive the market price of his collateral. [Kentucky Revised Statutes Annotated Section 355.9-627(2), its version of UCC 9-627(b)] also provides a "recognized market" safe harbor, which states that:

[A] disposition of collateral is made in a commercially reasonable manner if the disposition is made:

- (a) In the usual manner on any recognized market;
- (b) At the price current in any recognized market at the time of disposition; or
- (c) Otherwise in conformity with reasonable commercial practices among dealers in the type of property that was the subject of the disposition.

* * * [A] "recognized market" [is] one in which the items sold are fungible [commercially interchangeable] and prices are not subject to individual negotiation. For example, the New York Stock Exchange is a recognized market. Sales on a recognized market are commercially reasonable because the price on the recognized market represents the fair market value of the collateral from day to day. Therefore, where the collateral is sold in a recognized market, Kentucky courts have found the transaction to be commercially reasonable as a matter of law. Courts in other states have held similarly that a sale on a recognized market is per se commercially reasonable. Moreover, [Kentucky Revised Statutes Annotated Section 355.9-627(1), its version of UCC 9-627(a)] provides that "[t]he fact that a greater amount could have been obtained by * * * disposition * * * at a different time or in a different method from that selected by the secured party is not of itself sufficient to preclude the secured party from establishing that the * * * disposition * * * was made in a commercially reasonable manner." [Emphasis added.]

Applying the U.C.C. provisions to this case, the district court was correct to find that Bank One's disposition of the PurchasePro shares through a sale on the NASDAQ [National Association of Securities Dealers Automated Quotations^a] national market was commercially reasonable. Johnson * * * [argues] that delaying the sale of the pledged stock from February was commercially unreasonable. Johnson's argument, however, misinterprets the statute. Section 9-610 does not impose an obligation on a lender to liquidate and sell the collateral stock at a specific time during the life of the loan. Put another way, Section 9-610 does not address whether a lender should dispose of its collateral, but rather once that decision has been made, how the disposition should occur. When Johnson's loan fell below the LTV ratio, Bank One attempted to restructure the loan and secure additional collateral rather than sell the shares. Under the [loan] agreement and Kentucky law, Bank One was not under any obligation to sell the stock at that point. In late May, after repeated negotiations with Johnson fell through, Bank One decided to begin the liquidation process, which was completed by July. The sale of the stock was on the NASDAQ, a recognized market, and thus ensured that Johnson received the fair market value for his stock shortly after the decision to liquidate was made, which is all that Section 9-610 requires. Therefore, we conclude that the sale of Johnson's PurchasePro stock was commercially reasonable and the district court's grant of summary judgment on this issue is affirmed. [Emphasis added.]

a. NASDAQ is an automated information system that gives price quotations on publicly traded securities, including stock traded among stockbrokers and others.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Bank One was not liable for the depreciation in the value of the PurchasePro.com shares that it held as collateral for the loan to Johnson. Also, by selling the stock on a national stock exchange, Bank One acted in a commercially reasonable manner in disposing of the collateral.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Bank One had refused to negotiate with Johnson and Layne, and had sold their stock as soon as their loans were in default, would the result in this case have been different? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Should a court's scrutiny of the price paid for collateral be different when the purchaser is the secured party or someone related to the secured party? Explain.

Notification Requirements. Unless the collateral is perishable or will decline rapidly in value or is a type customarily sold on a recognized market, a secured party must send to the debtor and other identified persons "a reasonable authenticated notification of disposition" [UCC 9-611(b), (c)]. The debtor may waive the right to receive this notice, but only after default [UCC 9-624(a)].

Proceeds from Disposition Proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default on the underlying debt are distributed in the following order:

1. Expenses incurred by the secured party in repossessing, storing, and reselling the collateral.
2. Balance of the debt owed to the secured party.
3. Junior lienholders who have made written or authenticated demands.
4. Unless the collateral consists of accounts, payment intangibles, promissory notes, or chattel paper, any surplus goes to the debtor [UCC 9-608(a); 9-615(a), (e)].

Noncash Proceeds Whenever the secured party receives noncash proceeds from the disposition of collateral after default, the secured party must make a value determination and apply this value in a com-mercially reasonable manner [UCC 9-608(a)(3), 9-615(c)].

Deficiency Judgment Often, after proper disposition of the collateral, the secured party still has not collected all that the debtor owes. Unless otherwise agreed, the debtor is liable for any deficiency, and the creditor can obtain a deficiency judgment from a court to collect the deficiency. Note, however, that if the underlying transaction was, for example, a sale of accounts or of chattel paper, the debtor is entitled to any surplus or is liable for any deficiency only if the security agreement so provides [UCC 9-615(d) and (e)].

Redemption Rights At any time before the secured party disposes of the collateral or enters into a contract for its disposition, or before the debtor's obligation has been discharged through the secured party's retention of the collateral, the debtor or any other secured party can exercise the right of redemption of the collateral. The debtor or other secured party can do this by tendering performance of all obligations secured by the collateral and by paying the expenses reasonably incurred by the secured party in retaking and maintaining the collateral [UCC 9-623]. Concept Summary 29.2 provides a review of the secured party's remedies on the debtor's default.

REVIEWING Secured Transactions

Paul Barton owned a small property-management company, doing business as Brighton Homes. In October, Barton went on a spending spree. First, he bought a Bose surround-sound system for his home from KDM Electronics. The next day, he purchased a Wilderness Systems kayak and roof rack from Outdoor Outfitters, and the day after that he bought a new Toyota 4-Runner financed through Bridgeport Auto. Two weeks later, Barton purchased six new iMac computers for his office, also from KDM Electronics. Barton bought each of these items under an installment sale contract. Six months later, Barton's property-management business was failing, and he could not make the payments due on any of these purchases and thus defaulted on the loans. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

REVIEWING CONTINUES

1. For which of Barton's purchases (the surround-sound system, the kayak, the 4-Runner, and the six iMacs) would the creditor need to file a financing statement to perfect its security interest?
2. Suppose that Barton's contract for the office computers mentioned only the name Brighton Homes. What would be the consequences if KDM Electronics filed a financing statement that listed only Brighton Homes as the debtor's name?
3. Which of these purchases would qualify as a PMSI in consumer goods?
4. Suppose that after KDM Electronics repossesses the surround-sound system, it decides to keep the system rather than sell it. Can KDM do this under Article 9? Why or why not?

29-1. Redford is a seller of electric generators. He purchases a large quantity of generators from a manufacturer, Mallon Corp., by making a down payment and signing an agreement to make the balance of payments over a period of time. The agreement gives Mallon Corp. a security interest in the generators and the proceeds. Mallon Corp. properly files a financing statement on its security interest. Redford receives the generators and immediately sells one of them to Garfield on an installment contract, with payment to be made in twelve equal installments. At the time of the sale, Garfield knows of Mallon's security interest. Two months later, Redford goes into default on his payments to Mallon. Discuss Mallon's rights against Garfield in this situation.

29-2. Marsh has a prize horse named Arabian Knight. Marsh is in need of working capital. She borrows $50,000 from Mendez, who takes possession of Arabian Knight as security for the loan. No written agreement is signed. Discuss whether, in the absence of a written agreement, Mendez has a security interest in Arabian Knight. If Mendez does have a security interest, is it a perfected security interest?

Delgado is a retail seller of television sets. He sells a color television set to Cummings for $600. Cummings cannot pay cash, so she signs a security agreement, paying $100 down and agreeing to pay the balance in twelve equal installments of $50 each. The security agreement gives Delgado a security interest in the television set sold. Cummings makes six payments on time; then she goes into default because of unexpected financial problems. Delgado repossesses the set and wants to keep it in full satisfaction of the debt. Discuss Delgado's rights and duties in this matter.

29-4. Purchase-Money Security Interest. When a customer opens a credit-card account with Sears, Roebuck & Co., the customer fills out an application and sends it to Sears for review; if the application is approved, the customer receives a Sears card. The application contains a security agreement, a copy of which is also sent with the card. When a customer buys an item using the card, the customer signs a sales receipt that describes the merchandise and contains language granting Sears a purchase-money security interest (PMSI) in the merchandise. Dayna Conry bought a variety of consumer goods from Sears on her card. When she did not make payments on her account, Sears filed a suit against her in an Illinois state court to repossess the goods. Conry filed for bankruptcy and was granted a discharge. Sears then filed a suit against her to obtain possession of the goods through its PMSI, but it could not find Conry's credit-card application to offer into evidence. Is a signed Sears sales receipt sufficient proof of its security interest? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain. [Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Conry, 321 Ill.App.3d 997, 748 N.E.2d 1248, 255 Ill.Dec. 178 (3 Dist. 2001)]

29-5. Priorities. PC Contractors, Inc., was an excavating business in Kansas City, Missouri. Union Bank made loans to PC, subject to a perfected security interest in its equipment and other assets, including "after-acquired property." In late 1997, PC leased heavy construction equipment from Dean Machinery Co. The lease agreements required monthly payments, which PC often made late or missed completely. After eighteen months, Dean demanded that PC either return the equipment or buy it. While attempting to obtain financing for the purchase, PC continued to make monthly payments. In November 2000, Dean, which had not filed a financing statement to cover the transaction, demanded full payment of the amount due. Before paying the price, PC went out of business and surrendered its assets to Union, which prepared to sell them. Dean filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Union to recover the equipment, claiming, in part, that the bank's security interest had not attached to the equipment because PC had not paid for it. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Dean Machinery Co. v. Union Bank, 106 S.W.3d 510 (Mo.App.W.D. 2003)]

29-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In St. Louis, Missouri, in August 2000, Richard Miller orally agreed to loan Jeff Miller $35,000 in exchange for a security interest in a 1999 Kodiak dump truck. The Millers did not put anything in writing concerning the loan, its repayment terms, or Richard's security interest or rights in the truck. Jeff used the amount of the loan to buy the truck, which he kept in his possession. In June 2004, Jeff filed a petition to obtain a discharge of his debts in bankruptcy. Richard claimed that he had a security interest in the truck and thus was entitled to any proceeds from its sale. What are a creditor's main concerns on a debtor's default? How does a creditor satisfy these concerns? What are the requirements for a creditor to have an enforceable security interest? Have these requirements been met in this case? Considering these points, what is the court likely to rule with respect to Richard's claim? [In re Miller, 320 Bankr. 911 (E.D.Mo. 2005)]

29-7. Creating a Security Interest. In 2002, Michael Sabol, doing business in the recording industry as Sound Farm Productions, applied to Morton Community Bank in Bloomington, Illinois, for a $58,000 loan to expand his business. Besides the loan application, Sabol signed a promissory note that referred to the bank's rights in "any collateral." Sabol also signed a letter that stated, "the undersigned does hereby authorize Morton Community Bank to execute, file and record all financing statements, amendments, termination statements and all other statements authorized by Article 9 of the Illinois Uniform Commercial Code, as to any security interest." Sabol did not sign any other documents, including the financing statement, which did, however, contain a description of the collateral. Less than three years later, without having repaid the loan, Sabol filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court to declare bankruptcy. The bank claimed a security interest in Sabol's sound equipment. What are the elements of an enforceable security interest? What are the requirements of each of those elements? Does the bank have a valid security interest in this case? Explain. [In re Sabol, 337 Bankr. 195 (C.D.Ill. 2006)]

- Issue: What step in the process of perfecting a security interest was at the center of the dispute in this case?
- Rule of Law: On which principal requirement with respect to fulfilling this step did the court focus in its review?
- Applying the Rule of Law: What factors did the court identify as important for indicating whether a creditor could have met this requirement?
- Conclusion: Did the court conclude that the creditor merited a judgment in its favor? Why or why not?

29-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 1995, Mark Denton cosigned a $101,250 loan that the First Interstate Bank (FIB) in Missoula, Montana, issued to Denton's friend Eric Anderson. Denton's business assets—a mini-warehouse operation—secured the loan. On his own, Anderson obtained a $260,000 U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) loan from FIB at the same time. The purpose of both loans was to buy logging equipment with which Anderson could start a business. In 1997, the business failed. As a consequence, FIB repossessed and sold the equipment and applied the proceeds to the SBA loan. FIB then asked Denton to pay the other loan's outstanding balance ($98,460) plus interest. When Denton refused, FIB initiated proceedings to obtain his business assets. Denton filed a suit in a Montana state court against FIB, claiming, in part, that Anderson's equipment was the collateral for the loan that FIB was attempting to collect from Denton. [Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 Mont. 169, 142 P3d 797 (2006)]

- (a) Denton's assets served as the security for Anderson's loan because Anderson had nothing to offer. When the loan was obtained, Dean Gillmore, FIB's loan officer, explained to them that if Anderson defaulted, the proceeds from the sale of the logging equipment would be applied to the SBA loan first. Under these circumstances, is it fair to hold Denton liable for the unpaid balance of Anderson's loan? Why or why not?
- (b) Denton argued that the loan contract was unconscionable and constituted a "contract of adhesion." What makes a contract unconscionable? Did the transaction between the parties in this case qualify?

What is a "contract of adhesion"? Was this deal unenforceable on that basis? Explain.

- (b) What, if anything, must the bank have done to perfect its interest in the editing equipment?
- (c) If the bank exercises its self-help remedy to repossess Onyx's editing equipment, does Laura have any chance of getting it back? Explain.
- (d) Assume that the bank had a perfected security interest and repossessed the editing equipment. Also assume that the purchase price (and the loan amount) for the equipment was $100,000, of which Onyx has paid $65,000. Discuss the rights and duties of the bank with regard to the collateral in this situation.

Bankruptcy Law

Historically, debtors had few rights. Today, in contrast, debtors have numerous rights. Some of these rights were discussed in Chapters 28 and 29. In this chapter, we look at another significant right of debtors: the right to petition for bankruptcy relief under federal law. Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution gave Congress the power to establish “uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States.” Bankruptcy law in the United States has two goals—to protect a debtor by giving him or her a fresh start, free from creditors’ claims, and to ensure equitable treatment to creditors who are competing for a debtor’s assets. Federal bankruptcy legislation was first enacted in 1898 and has undergone several modifications since that time, most recently in 2005 as a result of the Bankruptcy Reform Act.¹ The 2005 act significantly overhauled certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Code for the first time in twenty-five years.

1. The full title of the act is the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, Pub. L. No. 109-8, 119 Stat. 23 (April 20, 2005). The bulk of the act became effective 180 days after being signed by the president on April 20, 2005. Thus, the new provisions took effect in October 2005. (Bankruptcy petitions that were filed before the act became effective continued to be administered and governed by the 1978 Reform Act, as amended.)

Bankruptcy Proceedings

Bankruptcy proceedings are held in federal bankruptcy courts, which are under the authority of the U.S. district courts, and rulings from bankruptcy courts can be appealed to the district courts. Although bankruptcy law is federal law, state laws on secured transactions, liens, judgments, and exemptions also play a role in federal bankruptcy proceedings.

The Role of the Bankruptcy Courts

Essentially, a bankruptcy court fulfills the role of an administrative court for the federal district court concerning matters in bankruptcy. The bankruptcy court holds proceedings dealing with the procedures required to administer the estate of the debtor in bankruptcy (the estate consists of the debtor’s assets, as will be discussed shortly). A bankruptcy court can conduct a jury trial if the appropriate district court has authorized it and the parties to the bankruptcy consent.

Types of Bankruptcy Relief

Title 11 of the United States Code encompasses the Bankruptcy Code, which has eight chapters. Chapters 1, 3, and 5 of the Code contain general definitional provisions, as well as provisions governing case administration, creditors, the debtor, and the estate. These three chapters normally apply to all kinds of bankruptcies. The next five chapters of the Code set forth the different types of relief that debtors may seek. Chapter 7 provides for liquidation proceedings (the selling of all nonexempt assets and the distribution of the proceeds to the debtor’s creditors). Chapter 9 governs the adjustment of a municipality’s debts. Chapter 11 governs reorganizations. Chapters 12 and 13 provide for the adjustment of debts by parties with regular incomes (family farmers and family fishermen under Chapter 12 and individuals under Chapter 13).² A debtor (except for a municipality) does not have to be insolvent³ to file for bankruptcy relief under any chapter of the Bankruptcy Code. Anyone obligated to a creditor can declare bankruptcy.

In this chapter, we deal first with liquidation proceedings under Chapter 7 of the Code. We then examine the procedures required for Chapter 11 reorganizations and Chapter 12 and 13 plans. (The latter three chapters of the Code are known as “rehabilitation” chapters.)

Special Treatment of Consumer-Debtors

To ensure that consumer-debtors are fully informed of the various types of relief available, the Code requires that the clerk of the bankruptcy court provide certain information to all consumer-debtors before they file for bankruptcy. (Recall from Chapter 29 that a consumer-debtor is a debtor whose debts result primarily from the purchase of goods for personal, family, or household use.) First, the clerk must give consumer-debtors written notice of the general purpose, benefits, and costs of each chapter of the Bankruptcy Code under which they might proceed. Second, under the 2005 act, the clerk must provide consumer-debtors with informational materials on the types of services available from credit counseling agencies.

Liquidation Proceedings

Liquidation under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code is generally the most familiar type of bankruptcy proceeding and is often referred to as an ordinary, or straight, bankruptcy. Put simply, a debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy turns all assets over to a trustee. The trustee sells the nonexempt assets and distributes the

2. There are no Chapters 2, 4, 6, 8, or 10 in Title 11. Such “gaps” are not uncommon in the United States Code. This is because chapter numbers (or other subdivisional unit numbers) are sometimes reserved for future use when a statute is enacted. (A gap may also appear if a law has been repealed.)

3. The inability to pay debts as they become due is known as equitable insolvency. A balance sheet insolvency, which exists when a debtor’s liabilities exceed assets, is not the test. Thus, it is possible for debtors to petition for bankruptcy voluntarily or to be forced into involuntary bankruptcy even though their assets far exceed their liabilities. This may occur when a debtor’s cash flow problems become severe.

proceeds to creditors. With certain exceptions, the remaining debts are then discharged (extinguished), and the debtor is relieved of the obligation to pay the debts.

Any “person”—defined as including individuals, partnerships, and corporations⁴—may be a debtor in a liquidation proceeding. Railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan associations, investment companies licensed by the Small Business Administration, and credit unions cannot be debtors in a liquidation bankruptcy, however. Other chapters of the Bankruptcy Code or other federal or state statutes apply to them. A husband and wife may file jointly for bankruptcy under a single petition.

A straight bankruptcy may be commenced by the filing of either a voluntary or an involuntary petition in bankruptcy—the document that is filed with a bankruptcy court to initiate bankruptcy proceedings. If a debtor files the petition, it is a voluntary bankruptcy. If one or more creditors file a petition to force the debtor into bankruptcy, it is called an involuntary bankruptcy. We discuss both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy proceedings under Chapter 7 in the following subsections.

Voluntary Bankruptcy

To bring a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, the debtor files official forms designated for that purpose in the bankruptcy court. The Bankruptcy Reform Act of 2005 specifies that before debtors can file a petition, they must receive credit counseling from an approved nonprofit agency within the 180-day period preceding the date of filing. The act provides detailed criteria for the U.S. trustee (a government official who performs appointment and other administrative tasks that a bankruptcy judge would otherwise have to perform) to use to approve nonprofit budget and counseling agencies and requires that a list of approved agencies be made publicly available.⁵ A debtor filing a Chapter 7 petition must include a certificate proving that he or she received individual or group briefing from an approved counseling agency within the last 180 days (roughly six months).

4. The definition of corporation includes unincorporated companies and associations. It also covers labor unions.

5. The Bankruptcy Reform Act of 2005 also required the director of the Executive Office for the U.S. Trustees to develop a curriculum for financial-management training and create materials that can be used to educate individual debtors on how to better manage their finances.

The Code requires a consumer-debtor who has opted for liquidation bankruptcy proceedings to confirm the accuracy of the petition's contents. The debtor must also state in the petition, at the time of filing, that he or she understands the relief available under other chapters of the Code and has chosen to proceed under Chapter 7. If an attorney is representing the consumer-debtor, the attorney must file an affidavit stating that she or he has informed the debtor of the relief available under each chapter of the Bankruptcy Code. In addition, the 2005 act requires the attorney to reasonably attempt to verify the accuracy of the consumer-debtor's petition and schedules (described below). Failure to do so is considered perjury.

Chapter 7 Schedules The voluntary petition must contain the following schedules:

1. A list of both secured and unsecured creditors, their addresses, and the amount of debt owed to each.
2. A statement of the financial affairs of the debtor.
3. A list of all property owned by the debtor, including property that the debtor claims is exempt.
4. A list of current income and expenses.
5. A certificate of credit counseling (as discussed previously).
6. Proof of payments received from employers within sixty days prior to the filing of the petition.
7. A statement of the amount of monthly income, itemized to show how the amount is calculated.
8. A copy of the debtor's federal income tax return for the most recent year ending immediately before the filing of the petition.

As previously noted, the official forms must be completed accurately, sworn to under oath, and signed by the debtor. To conceal assets or knowingly supply false information on these schedules is a crime under the bankruptcy laws.

With the exception of tax returns, failure to file the required schedules within forty-five days after the filing of the petition (unless an extension of up to forty-five days is granted) will result in an automatic dismissal of the petition. The debtor has up to seven days before the date of the first creditors' meeting to provide a copy of the most recent tax returns to the trustee.

Additional Information May Be Required

At the request of the court, the trustee, or any party in interest, the debtor must file tax returns at the end of each tax year while the case is pending and provide copies to the court. This requirement also applies to Chapter 11 and 13 bankruptcies (discussed later in this chapter). Also, if requested by the trustee, the debtor must provide a photo document establishing his or her identity (such as a driver's license or passport) or other such personal identifying information.

Substantial Abuse Prior to 2005, a bankruptcy court could dismiss a Chapter 7 petition for relief (discharge of debts) if the use of Chapter 7 would constitute a "substantial abuse" of that chapter. The Bankruptcy Reform Act of 2005 established a new system of "means testing" (the debtor's income) to determine whether a debtor's petition is presumed to be a "substantial abuse" of Chapter 7.

When Abuse Will Be Presumed. If the debtor's family income is greater than the median family income in the state in which the petition is filed, the trustee or any party in interest (such as a creditor) can bring a motion to dismiss the Chapter 7 petition. State median incomes vary from state to state and are calculated and reported by the U.S. Bureau of the Census.

The debtor's current monthly income is calculated using the last six months' average income, less certain "allowed expenses" reflecting the basic needs of the debtor. The monthly amount is then multiplied by twelve. If the resulting income exceeds the state median income by $6,000 or more,⁶ abuse is presumed, and the trustee or any creditor can file a motion to dismiss the petition. A debtor can rebut (refute) the presumption of abuse "by demonstrating special circumstances that justify additional expenses or adjustments of current monthly income for which there is no reasonable alternative." (An example might be anticipated medical costs not covered by health insurance.) These additional expenses or adjustments must be itemized and their accuracy attested to under oath by the debtor.

When Abuse Will Not Be Presumed. If the debtor's income is below the state median (or if the debtor has successfully rebutted the means-test presumption), abuse will not be presumed. In these situations, the court may still find substantial abuse, but the creditors will not have standing (see Chapter 2) to file a motion to dismiss. Basically, this leaves intact the prior law on substantial abuse, allowing the court to consider such factors as the debtor's bad faith or circumstances indicating substantial abuse.

Can a debtor seeking relief under Chapter 7 exclude voluntary contributions to a retirement plan as a reasonably necessary expense in calculating her income?

The Code does not disallow the contributions, but whether their exclusion constitutes substantial abuse requires a review of the debtor's circumstances, as in the following case.

EXTENDED Hebbring v. U.S. Trustee

CASE 30.1 United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2006. 463 F.3d 902.

WARDLAW, Circuit Judge.

Lisa Hebbring filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy petition in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the District of Nevada on June 5, 2003, seeking relief from $11,124 in consumer credit card debt. Her petition and accompanying schedules show that Hebbring owns a single-family home in Reno, Nevada valued at $160,000, on which she owes $154,103; a 2001 Volkswagen Beetle valued at $14,000, on which she owes $18,839; and miscellaneous personal property valued at $1,775. Hebbring earns approximately $49,000 per year as a customer service representative for SBC Nevada. Her petition reports monthly net income of $2,813 and monthly expenditures of $2,897, for a monthly deficit of $84. In calculating her income, Hebbring excluded a $232 monthly pre-tax deduction for a 401(k) plan and an $81 monthly after-tax deduction for a retirement savings bond. When she filed for bankruptcy Hebbring was thirty-three years old and had accumulated $6,289 in retirement savings.

The United States Trustee ("Trustee") moved to dismiss Hebbring's petition for substantial abuse, see 11 U.S.C. [Section] 707(b), arguing that she should not be allowed to deduct voluntary retirement contributions from her income and that her recent paystubs showed that her gross income was higher than she had claimed. As a result, the Trustee contended, Hebbring's monthly net income was actually $3,512, leaving her $615 per month in disposable income, sufficient to repay 100% of her unsecured debt over three years.

The bankruptcy court granted the Trustee's motion to dismiss * * * [and ultimately Hebbring appealed the dismissal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit].

* * * *

* * * In determining whether a petition constitutes a substantial abuse of Chapter 7, we examine the totality of the circumstances, focusing principally on whether the debtor will have sufficient future disposable income to fund a Chapter 13 plan that would pay a substantial portion of his unsecured debt. To calculate a debtor's disposable income, we begin with current monthly income and subtract amounts reasonably necessary to be expended * * * for the maintenance or support of the debtor or a dependent of the debtor.

* * * [Some] courts * * * have adopted a case-by-case approach, under which contributions to a retirement plan may be found reasonably necessary depending on the debtor's circumstances.

We believe this * * * approach better comports [is consistent] with Congress's intent, as expressed in the language, purpose, and structure of the Bankruptcy Code. By not defining the phrase "reasonably necessary" or providing any examples of expenses that categorically are or are not reasonably necessary, the Code suggests courts should examine each debtor's specific circumstances to determine whether a claimed expense is reasonably necessary for that debtor's maintenance or support. We find no evidence that Congress intended courts to employ a per se rule against retirement contributions, which may be crucial for debtors' support upon retirement, particularly for older debtors who have little or no savings. Where Congress intended courts to use a per se rule rather than a case-by-case approach in classifying financial interests or obligations under the Bankruptcy Code, it has explicitly communicated its intent. Congress's decision not to categorically exclude any specific expense, including retirement contributions, from being considered reasonably necessary is probative [an indication] of its intent. [Emphasis added.]

Requiring a fact-specific analysis to determine whether an expense is reasonably necessary is sound policy because it comports with the Code's approach to identifying substantial abuse of the Chapter 7 relief provisions. * * * Congress chose [not] to define "substantial abuse" * * * . Congress thus left a flexible standard enabling courts to address each petition on its own merit. That Congress granted courts the discretion to identify substantial abuse necessarily suggests it intended courts to have the discretion to answer the subsidiary question of whether particular expenses are reasonably necessary.

In light of these considerations, and in the absence of any indication that Congress sought to prohibit debtors from voluntarily contributing to retirement plans per se, we conclude that bankruptcy courts have discretion to determine whether retirement contributions are a reasonably necessary expense for a particular debtor based on the facts of each individual case. In making this fact-intensive determination, courts should consider a number of factors, including but not limited to: the debtor's age, income, overall budget, expected date of retirement, existing retirement savings, and amount of contributions; the likelihood that stopping contributions will jeopardize the debtor's fresh start by forcing the debtor to make up lost contributions after emerging from bankruptcy; and the needs of the debtor's dependents. Courts must allow debtors to seek bankruptcy protection while voluntarily saving for retirement if such savings appear reasonably necessary for the maintenance or support of the debtor or the debtor's dependents. [Emphasis added.]

Here, the bankruptcy court * * * found * * * that Hebring's retirement contributions are not a reasonably necessary expense based on her age and specific financial circumstances. * * * When she filed her bankruptcy petition, Hebring was only thirty-three years old and was contributing approximately 8% of her gross income toward her retirement. Although Hebring had accumulated only $6,289 in retirement savings, she was earning $49,000 per year and making mortgage payments on a house. In light of these circumstances, the bankruptcy court's conclusion that Hebring's retirement contributions are not a reasonably necessary expense is not clearly erroneous.

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, the district court's order affirming the bankruptcy court's order dismissing this case is AFFIRMED.

QUESTIONS

1. Is it fair for the court to treat retirement contributions differently depending on a person's age?
2. Is it likely to have made a difference to the result in this case that the debtor's retirement contributions were automatically and electronically deducted from her pay? Explain.

Additional Grounds for Dismissal As noted, a debtor's voluntary petition for Chapter 7 relief may be dismissed for substantial abuse or for failing to provide the necessary documents (such as schedules and tax returns) within the specified time. In addition, a motion to dismiss a Chapter 7 filing might be granted in two other situations under the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 2005. First, if the debtor has been convicted of a violent crime or a drug-trafficking offense, the victim can file a motion to dismiss the voluntary petition.⁷

7. Note that the court may not dismiss a case on this ground if the debtor's bankruptcy is necessary to satisfy a claim for a domestic-support obligation.

Second, if the debtor fails to pay postpetition domestic-support obligations (which include child and spousal support), the court may dismiss the debtor's Chapter 7 petition.

Order for Relief If the voluntary petition for bankruptcy is found to be proper, the filing of the petition will itself constitute an order for relief. (An order for relief is a court's grant of assistance to a petitioner.) Once a consumer-debtor's voluntary petition has been filed, the clerk of the court or other appointee must give the trustee and creditors notice of the order for relief by mail not more than twenty days after entry of the order.

Involuntary Bankruptcy

An involuntary bankruptcy occurs when the debtor's creditors force the debtor into bankruptcy proceedings. An involuntary case cannot be commenced against a farmer⁸ or a charitable institution. For an involuntary action to be filed against other debtors, the following requirements must be met: If the debtor has twelve or more creditors, three or more of these creditors having unsecured claims totaling at least $13,475 must join in the petition. If a debtor has fewer than twelve creditors, one or more creditors having a claim of $13,475 may file.

If the debtor challenges the involuntary petition, a hearing will be held, and the bankruptcy court will enter an order for relief if it finds either of the following:

1. The debtor is generally not paying debts as they become due.
2. A general receiver, assignee, or custodian took possession of, or was appointed to take charge of, substantially all of the debtor's property within 120 days before the filing of the petition.

If the court grants an order for relief, the debtor will be required to supply the same information in the bankruptcy schedules as in a voluntary bankruptcy.

An involuntary petition should not be used as an everyday debt-collection device, and the Code provides penalties for the filing of frivolous petitions against debtors. Judgment may be granted against the petitioning creditors for the costs and attorneys' fees incurred by the debtor in defending against an involuntary petition that is dismissed by the court. If the petition is filed in bad faith, damages can be awarded for injury to the debtor's reputation. Punitive damages may also be awarded.

Automatic Stay

The moment a petition, either voluntary or involuntary, is filed, an automatic stay, or suspension, of virtually all actions by creditors against the debtor or the debtor's property normally goes into effect. In other words, once a petition has been filed, creditors cannot contact the debtor by phone or mail or start any legal proceedings to recover debts or to repossess property.

8. The definition of farmer includes persons who receive more than 50 percent of their gross income from farming operations, such as tilling the soil, dairy farming, ranching, or the production or raising of crops, poultry, or livestock. Corporations and partnerships may qualify under certain conditions.

A secured creditor or other party in interest, however, may petition the bankruptcy court for relief from the automatic stay. The Code provides that if a creditor knowingly violates the automatic stay (a willful violation), any injured party, including the debtor, is entitled to recover actual damages, costs, and attorneys' fees, and may be awarded punitive damages as well.

Underlying the Code's automatic-stay provision for a secured creditor is a concept known as adequate protection. The adequate protection doctrine, among other things, protects secured creditors from losing their security as a result of the automatic stay. The bankruptcy court can provide adequate protection by requiring the debtor or trustee to make periodic cash payments or a one-time cash payment (or to provide additional collateral or replacement liens) to the extent that the stay may actually cause the value of the property to decrease.

Exceptions to the Automatic Stay The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act provided several exceptions to the automatic stay. A new exception was created for domestic-support obligations, which include any debt owed to or recoverable by a spouse, former spouse, or child of the debtor; a child's parent or guardian; or a governmental unit. In addition, proceedings against the debtor related to divorce, child custody or visitation, domestic violence, and support enforcement are not stayed. Also excepted are investigations by a securities regulatory agency, the creation or perfection of statutory liens for property taxes or special assessments on real property, eviction actions on judgments obtained prior to filing the petition, and withholding from the debtor's wages for repayment of a retirement account loan.

Limitations on the Automatic Stay Under the new Code, if a creditor or other party in interest requests relief from the stay, the stay will automatically terminate sixty days after the request, unless the court grants an extension⁹ or the parties agree otherwise. Also, the automatic stay on secured debts (see Chapter 29) will terminate thirty days after the petition is filed if the debtor had filed a bankruptcy petition that was dismissed within the prior year. Any party in interest can request the court to extend the stay by showing that the filing is in good faith.

9. The court might grant an extension, for example, on a motion by the trustee that the property is of value to the estate.

If two or more bankruptcy petitions were dismissed during the prior year, the Code presumes bad faith, and the automatic stay does not go into effect until the court determines that the filing was made in good faith. In addition, if the petition is subsequently dismissed because the debtor failed to file the required documents within thirty days of filing, for example, the stay is terminated. Finally, the automatic stay on secured property terminates forty-five days after the creditors' meeting (to be discussed shortly) unless the debtor redeems or reaffirms certain debts (reaffirmation is discussed later in this chapter). In other words, the debtor cannot keep the secured property (such as a financed automobile), even if she or he continues to make payments on it, without reinstating the rights of the secured party to collect on the debt.

Property of the Estate

On the commencement of a liquidation proceeding under Chapter 7, an estate in property is created. The estate consists of all the debtor's legal and equitable interests in property currently held, wherever located, together with community property (property jointly owned by a husband and wife in certain states—see Chapter 48), property transferred in a transaction voidable by the trustee, proceeds and profits from the property of the estate, and certain after-acquired property. Interests in certain property—such as gifts, inheritances, property settlements (from divorce), and life insurance death proceeds—to which the debtor becomes entitled within 180 days after filing may also become part of the estate. Under the 2005 act, withholdings for employee benefit plan contributions are excluded from the estate. Generally, though, the filing of a bankruptcy petition fixes a dividing line: property acquired prior to the filing of the petition becomes property of the estate, and property acquired after the filing of the petition, except as just noted, remains the debtor's.

Creditors' Meeting and Claims

Within a reasonable time after the order for relief has been granted (not less than twenty days or more than forty days), the trustee must call a meeting of the creditors listed in the schedules filed by the debtor. The bankruptcy judge does not attend this meeting, but the debtor is required to attend and to submit to examination under oath by the creditors and the trustee. At the meeting, the trustee ensures that the debtor is aware of the potential consequences of bankruptcy and of his or her ability to file for bankruptcy under a different chapter of the Bankruptcy Code.

To be entitled to receive a portion of the debtor's estate, each creditor normally files a proof of claim with the bankruptcy court clerk within ninety days of the creditors' meeting.¹⁰ The proof of claim lists the creditor's name and address, as well as the amount that the creditor asserts is owed to the creditor by the debtor. A proof of claim is necessary if there is any dispute concerning the claim. Generally, any legal obligation of the debtor is a claim (except claims for breach of employment contracts or real estate leases for terms longer than one year).

Exemptions

The trustee takes control over the debtor's property, but an individual debtor is entitled to exempt certain property from the bankruptcy. The Bankruptcy Code exempts the following property:¹¹

1. Up to $20,200 in equity in the debtor's residence and burial plot (the homestead exemption).
2. Interest in a motor vehicle up to $3,225.
3. Interest, up to $525 for a particular item, in household goods and furnishings, wearing apparel, appliances, books, animals, crops, and musical instruments (the aggregate total of all items is limited, however, to $10,775).¹²
4. Interest in jewelry up to $1,350.
5. Interest in any other property up to $1,075, plus any unused part of the $20,200 homestead exemption up to $10,125.
6. Interest in any tools of the debtor's trade up to $2,025.
7. Any unmatured life insurance contract owned by the debtor.
8. Certain interests in accrued dividends and interest under life insurance contracts owned by the debtor, not to exceed $10,775.

10. This ninety-day rule applies in Chapter 12 and Chapter 13 bankruptcies as well.

11. The dollar amounts stated in the Bankruptcy Code are adjusted automatically every three years on April 1 based on changes in the Consumer Price Index. The adjusted amounts are rounded to the nearest $25. The amounts stated in this chapter are in accordance with those computed on April 1, 2007.

12. The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act clarified that "household goods and furnishings" includes, for example, one computer, one radio, one television, and one videocassette recorder. Other items, such as works of art, electronic entertainment equipment with a fair market value of more than $500, and antiques and jewelry (except wedding rings) valued at more than $500, are not included.

9. Professionally prescribed health aids.
10. The right to receive Social Security and certain welfare benefits, alimony and support, certain retirement funds and pensions, and education savings accounts held for specific periods of time.
11. The right to receive certain personal-injury and other awards up to $20,200.

Individual states have the power to pass legislation precluding debtors from using the federal exemptions within the state; a majority of the states have done this (see Chapter 28). In those states, debtors may use only state, not federal, exemptions. In the rest of the states, an individual debtor (or a husband and wife filing jointly) may choose either the exemptions provided under state law or the federal exemptions.

The Homestead Exemption

The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act significantly changed the law for those debtors seeking to use state homestead exemption statutes (which were discussed in Chapter 28). Under prior law, the homestead exemptions of six states, including Florida and Texas, allowed debtors petitioning for bankruptcy to shield unlimited amounts of equity in their homes from creditors. The 2005 act places limits on the amount that can be claimed as exempt in bankruptcy. Also, under the act, a debtor must have lived in a state for two years prior to filing the petition to be able to use the state homestead exemption (the prior law required only six months).

In general, if the debtor acquired the homestead within three and a half years preceding the date of filing, the maximum equity exempted is $136,875, even if state law would permit a higher amount. (This does not apply to equity that has been rolled over during the specified period from the sale of a previous homestead in the same state.) Moreover, the debtor may not claim the homestead exemption if he or she has committed any criminal act, intentional tort, or willful or reckless misconduct that caused serious physical injury or death to another individual in the preceding five years. Similarly, a debtor who has been convicted of a felony may not be able to claim the exemption.

The Trustee

Promptly after the order for relief in the liquidation proceeding has been entered, a trustee is appointed. The basic duty of the trustee is to collect the debtor's available estate and reduce it to cash for distribution, preserving the interests of both the debtor and unsecured creditors. This requires that the trustee be accountable for administering the debtor's estate. To enable the trustee to accomplish this duty, the Code gives the trustee certain powers, stated in both general and specific terms. These powers must be exercised within two years of the order for relief.

Under the 2005 act, the trustee has additional duties with regard to means testing debtors and protecting domestic-support creditors. The trustee is required to promptly review all materials filed by the debtor to determine if there is substantial abuse. Within ten days after the first meeting of the creditors, the trustee must file a statement indicating whether the case is presumed to be an abuse under the means test. The trustee must provide all creditors with a copy of this statement. When there is a presumption of abuse, the trustee must either file a motion to dismiss the petition (or convert it to a Chapter 13 case) or file a statement setting forth the reasons why a motion would not be appropriate. If the debtor owes a domestic-support obligation (such as child support), the trustee is required to provide written notice of the bankruptcy to the claim holder (a former spouse, for example).

The Trustee's Powers The trustee occupies a position equivalent in rights to that of certain other parties. For example, the trustee has the same rights as a creditor who could have obtained a judicial lien or levy execution on the debtor's property. This means that a trustee has priority over an unperfected secured party (see Chapter 29) as to the debtor's property.¹³ This right of a trustee, which is equivalent to that of a lien creditor, is known as the strong-arm power. A trustee also has power equivalent to that of a bona fide purchaser of real property from the debtor.

The Right to Possession of the Debtor's Property The trustee has the power to require persons holding the debtor's property at the time the petition is filed to deliver the property to the trustee. (Usually, though, the trustee takes constructive, rather than actual, possession of the debtor's property. For example, to obtain control of a debtor's business inventory, a trustee might change the locks on the doors to the business and hire a security guard.)

Avoidance Powers The trustee also has specific powers of avoidance—that is, the trustee can set aside a sale or other transfer of the debtor's property, taking it back as a part of the debtor's estate. These powers include any voidable rights available to the debtor, preferences, certain statutory liens, and fraudulent transfers by the debtor. Each of these powers is discussed in more detail below. Note that under the 2005 act, the trustee no longer has the power to avoid any transfer that was a bona fide payment of a domestic-support debt.

13. Nevertheless, in most states a creditor with an unperfected purchase-money security interest may prevail against a trustee if the creditor perfects (files) within twenty days of the debtor's receipt of the collateral. This is normally true even if the debtor files a bankruptcy petition before the creditor perfects.

The debtor shares most of the trustee's avoidance powers. Thus, if the trustee does not take action to enforce one of the rights mentioned above, the debtor in a liquidation bankruptcy can still enforce that right.¹⁴

Voidable Rights A trustee steps into the shoes of the debtor. Thus, any reason that a debtor can use to obtain the return of her or his property can be used by the trustee as well. These grounds include fraud, duress, incapacity, and mutual mistake.

For example, Ben sells his boat to Tara. Tara gives Ben a check, knowing that she has insufficient funds in her bank account to cover the check. Tara has committed fraud. Ben has the right to avoid that transfer and recover the boat from Tara. Once an order for relief under Chapter 7 of the Code has been entered for Ben, the trustee can exercise the same right to recover the boat from Tara, and the boat becomes a part of the debtor's estate.

Preferences A debtor is not permitted to transfer property or to make a payment that favors—or gives a preference to—one creditor over others. The trustee is allowed to recover payments made both voluntarily and involuntarily to one creditor in preference over another. If a preferred creditor (one who has received a preferential transfer from the debtor) has sold the property to an innocent third party, the trustee cannot recover the property from the innocent party. The preferred creditor, however, generally can be held accountable for the value of the property.

To have made a preferential payment that can be recovered, an insolvent debtor generally must have transferred property, for a preexisting debt, within ninety days prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition. The transfer must have given the creditor more than the creditor would have received as a result of the bankruptcy proceedings. The trustee need not prove insolvency, as the Code presumes that the debtor is insolvent during this ninety-day period.

Preferences to Insiders. Sometimes, the creditor receiving the preference is an insider—an individual, a partner, a partnership, a corporation, or an officer or a director of a corporation (or a relative of one of these) who has a close relationship with the debtor. In this situation, the avoidance power of the trustee is extended to transfers made within one year before filing; however, the presumption of insolvency is confined to the ninety-day period. Therefore, the trustee must prove that the debtor was insolvent at the time of a transfer that occurred prior to the ninety-day period.

Transfers That Do Not Constitute Preferences.

Not all transfers are preferences. To be a preference, the transfer must be made for something other than current consideration. Most courts generally assume that payment for services rendered within fifteen days prior to the payment is not a preference. If a creditor receives payment in the ordinary course of business from an individual or business debtor, such as payment of last month's telephone bill, the trustee in bankruptcy cannot recover the payment. To be recoverable, a preference must be a transfer for an antecedent (preexisting) debt, such as a year-old printing bill. In addition, the Code permits a consumer-debtor to transfer any property to a creditor up to a total value of $5,475, without the transfer's constituting a preference (this amount was increased from $600 to $5,000 by the 2005 act). Payment of domestic-support debts does not constitute a preference.

Liens on Debtor's Property The trustee has the power to avoid certain statutory liens against the debtor's property, such as a landlord's lien for unpaid rent. The trustee can avoid statutory liens that first became effective against the debtor when the bankruptcy petition was filed or when the debtor became insolvent. The trustee can also avoid any lien against a good faith purchaser that was not perfected or enforceable on the date of the bankruptcy filing.

Fraudulent Transfers The trustee may avoid fraudulent transfers or obligations if they were made within two years of the filing of the petition or if they were made with actual intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor. Transfers made for less than a reasonably equivalent consideration are also vulnerable if by making them, the debtor became insolvent or intended to incur debts that he or she could not pay. Similarly, a transfer that left a debtor engaged in business with an unreasonably small amount of capital may be considered fraudulent. When a fraudulent transfer is made outside the Code's two-year limit, creditors may seek alternative relief under state laws. Some state laws often allow creditors to recover for transfers made up to three years prior to the filing of a petition.

14. Under a Chapter 11 bankruptcy (to be discussed later), for which no trustee other than the debtor generally exists, the debtor has the same avoidance powers as a trustee under Chapter 7. Under Chapters 12 and 13 (also to be discussed later), a trustee must be appointed.

Distribution of Property

The Code provides specific rules for the distribution of the debtor's property to secured and unsecured creditors. (We will examine these distributions shortly.) Anything remaining after the priority classes of creditors have been satisfied is turned over to the debtor. Exhibit 30-1 illustrates graphically the collection and distribution of property in most voluntary bankruptcies.

In a bankruptcy case in which the debtor has no assets (called "no-asset cases"), creditors are notified of the debtor's petition for bankruptcy but are instructed not to file a claim. In no-asset cases, the unsecured creditors will receive no payment, and most, if not all, of these debts will be discharged.

Distribution to Secured Creditors The rights of perfected secured creditors were discussed in Chapter 29. The Code provides that a consumer-debtor must file with the clerk a statement of intention with respect to the secured collateral. The statement must be filed within thirty days of filing a liquidation petition or before the date of the first meeting of the creditors (whichever is first). The statement must indicate whether the debtor will redeem the collateral (make a single payment equal to the current value of the property), reaffirm the debt (continue making payments on the debt), or surrender the property to the secured party.¹⁵ The trustee is obligated to enforce the debtor's statement within forty-five days after the meeting of the creditors. As noted previously, failure of the debtor to redeem or reaffirm within forty-five days terminates the automatic stay.

If the collateral is surrendered to the perfected secured party, the secured creditor can either accept the property in full satisfaction of the debt or foreclose on the collateral and use the proceeds to pay off the debt. Thus, the perfected secured party has priority over unsecured parties as to the proceeds from the disposition of the collateral. When the proceeds from sale of the collateral exceed the amount of the perfected secured party's claim, the secured party also has priority to an amount that will cover the reasonable fees and costs incurred. Any excess over this amount is returned to the trustee and used to satisfy the claims of unsecured creditors. If the collateral is insufficient to cover the secured debt owed, the secured creditor becomes an unsecured creditor for the difference.

¹⁵ Also, if applicable, the debtor must specify whether the collateral will be claimed as exempt property.

EXHIBIT 30-1 • Collection and Distribution of Property in Most Voluntary Bankruptcies

This exhibit illustrates the property that might be collected in a debtor's voluntary bankruptcy and how it might be distributed to creditors. Involuntary bankruptcies and some voluntary bankruptcies could include additional types of property and other creditors.

Distribution to Unsecured Creditors

Bankruptcy law establishes an order of priority for classes of debts owed to unsecured creditors, and they are paid in the order of their priority. Each class must be fully paid before the next class is entitled to any of the remaining proceeds. If there are insufficient proceeds to pay fully all the creditors in a class, the proceeds are distributed proportionately to the creditors in that class, and classes lower in priority receive nothing.

The new bankruptcy law elevated domestic-support (mainly child-support) obligations to the highest priority of unsecured claims—so these are the first debts to be paid. After that, administrative expenses related to the bankruptcy (such as court costs, trustee fees, and attorneys' fees) are paid; next come any expenses that a debtor in an involuntary bankruptcy incurs in the ordinary course of business. Unpaid wages, salaries, and commissions earned within ninety days prior to the petition are paid next, followed by certain claims for contributions to employee benefit plans, claims by some farmers and fishermen, consumer deposits, and certain taxes. Claims of general creditors rank last in the order of priority, which is why these unsecured creditors often receive little, if anything, in a Chapter 7 bankruptcy.

Discharge

From the debtor's point of view, the primary purpose of liquidation is to obtain a fresh start through a discharge of debts.¹⁶ As mentioned earlier, once the debtor's assets have been distributed to creditors as permitted by the Code, the debtor's remaining debts are then discharged, meaning that the debtor is not obligated to pay them. Any judgments on the debts are voided, and creditors are enjoined (prevented) from bringing any actions to collect them. A discharge does not affect the liability of a co-debtor.

Certain debts, however, are not dischargeable in bankruptcy. Also, certain debtors may not qualify to have all debts discharged in bankruptcy. These situations are discussed next.

16. Discharges are granted under Chapter 7 only to individuals, not to corporations or partnerships. The latter may use Chapter 11, or they may terminate their existence under state law.

Exceptions to Discharge Discharge of a debt may be denied because of the nature of the claim or the conduct of the debtor. A court will not discharge claims that are based on a debtor's willful or malicious conduct or fraud,¹⁷ or claims related to property or funds that the debtor obtained by false pretenses, embezzlement, or larceny. Any monetary judgment against the debtor for driving while intoxicated cannot be discharged in bankruptcy. When a debtor fails to list a creditor on the bankruptcy schedules (and thus the creditor is not notified of the bankruptcy), that creditor's claims are not dischargeable.

Claims that are not dischargeable in a liquidation bankruptcy include amounts due to the government for taxes, fines, or penalties.¹⁸ Additionally, amounts borrowed by the debtor to pay these taxes will not be discharged. Domestic-support obligations and property settlements arising from a divorce or separation cannot be discharged. Certain student loans and educational debts are not dischargeable (unless payment of the loans imposes an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents),¹⁹ nor are amounts due on a retirement account loan. Consumer debts for purchasing luxury items worth more than $550 and cash advances totaling more than $825 generally are not dischargeable.

In the following case, the court considered whether to order the discharge of a debtor's student loan obligations. What does a debtor have to prove to show "undue hardship"?

17. Even if a debtor who is sued for fraud settles the lawsuit, the United States Supreme Court has held that the amount due under the settlement agreement may not be discharged in bankruptcy because of the underlying fraud. See Archer v. Warner, 538 U.S. 314, 123 S.Ct. 1462, 155 L.Ed.2d 454 (2003).

18. Taxes accruing within three years prior to bankruptcy are nondischargeable, including federal and state income taxes, employment taxes, taxes on gross receipts, property taxes, excise taxes, customs duties, and any other taxes for which the government claims the debtor is liable in some capacity. See 11 U.S.C. Sections 507(a)(8), 523(a)(1).

19. For a case discussing whether a student loan should be discharged because of undue hardship, see In re Savage, 311 Bankr. 835 (1st Cir. 2004).

United States Court of Appeals, Eleventh Circuit, 2007. 494 F.3d 1320.

- Background and Facts Keldric Mosley incurred student loans while attending Georgia's Alcorn State University between 1989 and 1994. At Alcorn, Mosley joined the U.S. Army Reserve Officers'

Training Corps. During training in 1993, Mosley fell from a tank and injured his hip and back. Medical problems from his injuries led him to resign his commission. He left Alcorn to live with his mother in Atlanta from 1994 to 1999. He worked briefly for several employers, but depressed and physically limited by his injury, he was unable to keep any of the jobs. He tried to return to school but could not obtain financial aid because of the debt he had incurred at Alcorn. In 1999, a federal bankruptcy court granted him a discharge under Chapter 7, but it did not include the student loans. In 2000, after a week at the Georgia Regional Hospital, a state-supported mental-health facility, Mosley was prescribed medication through the U.S. Department of Veterans' Affairs for depression, back pain, and other problems. By 2004, his monthly income consisted primarily of $210 in disability benefits from the Veterans' Administration. Homeless and in debt for $45,000 to Educational Credit Management Corporation, Mosley asked the bankruptcy court to reopen his case. The court granted him a discharge of his student loans on the basis of undue hardship. Educational Credit appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit.

JOHN R. GIBSON, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * To establish undue hardship [the courts require:] * * *

(1) that the debtor cannot maintain, based on current income and expenses, a "minimal" standard of living * * * if forced to repay the loans; (2) that additional circumstances exist indicating that this state of affairs is likely to persist for a significant portion of the repayment period of the student loans; and (3) that the debtor has made good faith efforts to repay the loans.

Educational Credit does not contest that Mosley has satisfied the first requirement, an inability to maintain a minimal standard of living, as he lives below the poverty line and has for several years. It contends that the bankruptcy court improperly relaxed Mosley's evidentiary burden [duty to produce enough evidence to prove an assertion] on the second and third requirements * * *. The bankruptcy court concluded that Mosley established undue hardship with his credible testimony that he has tried to obtain work but, for ten years, his "substantial physical and emotional ailments" have prevented him from holding a steady job. * * * Educational Credit argues that corroborating medical evidence independent from the debtor's testimony is required * * * where medical disabilities are the "additional circumstances" * * * .

 We * * * decline to adopt a rule requiring Mosley to submit independent medical evidence to corroborate his testimony that his depression and back problems were additional circumstances likely to render him unable to repay his student loans. We see no inconsistency between * * * holding that the debtor's detailed testimony was sufficient evidence of undue hardship and the * * * cases cited by Educational Credit where debtors' less detailed testimony was held to be insufficient. * * *

Educational Credit also argues that Mosley's medical prognosis [prediction about how a situation will develop in the future] is a subject requiring specialized medical knowledge * * * and that Mosley was not competent to give his opinion on this matter. Mosley, however, did not purport to give an opinion on his medical prognosis, but rather testified from personal knowledge about how his struggles with depression, back pain, and the side effects of his medication have made it difficult for him to obtain work. * * *

We now turn to Educational Credit's argument that the record does not support a conclusion of undue hardship because Mosley's testimony did not establish * * * that he likely will be unable to repay his student loans in the future and that he has made good faith efforts to repay the loans. * * *

* * * In showing that "additional circumstances" make it unlikely that he will be able to repay his loans for a significant period of time, Mosley testified that his depression and chronic back pain have frustrated his efforts to work, and thus his ability to repay his loans, as well as to provide himself with shelter, food, and transportation, for several years. * * * Mosley's testimony * * * is * * * unrefuted and is corroborated by his Social Security earnings statements. He testified that his back problems preclude him from heavy lifting, which rules out most of the jobs available [through the Georgia Department of Labor where] he seeks work. Exacerbating [aggravating] the problem, his medications make it difficult for him to function. He did not finish college and has been unable to complete the training necessary to learn a trade. Mosley relies on public assistance programs for health care and food, and * * * there is no reason to believe that Mosley's condition will improve in the future. * * *

The bankruptcy court also correctly concluded that Mosley's testimony established the * * * requirement that he has made good faith efforts to repay his student loans. * * * Good faith is measured by the debtor's efforts to obtain employment, maximize income, and minimize expenses; his default should result, not from his choices, but from factors beyond his reasonable control. Mosley has attempted to find work, as demonstrated by the series of jobs he held while living with his mother from 1994 to 1999 and his participation in the [state] labor pool since 2000. Because of his medical conditions, Mosley has been largely unsuccessful, and thus has not had the means even to attempt to make payments. * * * [H]is income has been below the poverty line for years. He lives without a home and car and cannot further minimize his expenses. [Emphasis added.]

• Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit affirmed the lower court's discharge of the debtor's student loans. The debtor's medical problems, lack of skills, and "dire living conditions" made it unlikely that he would be able to hold a job and repay the loans. Furthermore, the debtor "has made good faith efforts to repay his student loans and would suffer undue hardship if they were excepted from discharge."

• The Ethical Dimension Should a debtor be required to attempt to negotiate a repayment plan with a creditor to demonstrate good faith? Why or why not?

• The Global Dimension If this debtor were to relocate to a country with a lower cost of living than the United States, should his change in circumstances be a ground for revoking the discharge? Explain your answer.

Objections to Discharge In addition to the exceptions to discharge previously discussed, a bankruptcy court may also deny the discharge of the debtor (as opposed to the debt). In the latter situation, the assets of the debtor are still distributed to the creditors, but the debtor remains liable for the unpaid portion of all claims. Grounds for the denial of discharge of the debtor include the following:

1. The debtor's concealment or destruction of property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud a creditor.
2. The debtor's fraudulent concealment or destruction of financial records.
3. The granting of a discharge to the debtor within eight years of the filing of the petition. (This period was increased from six to eight years by the 2005 act.)
4. The debtor's failure to complete the required consumer education course (unless such a course is unavailable).
5. Proceedings in which the debtor could be found guilty of a felony (basically, a court may not discharge any debt until the completion of felony proceedings against the debtor).

Revocation of Discharge On petition by the trustee or a creditor, the bankruptcy court can, within one year, revoke the discharge decree. The discharge decree will be revoked if it is discovered that the debtor acted fraudulently or dishonestly during the bankruptcy proceedings. The revocation renders the discharge void, allowing creditors not satisfied by the distribution of the debtor's estate to proceed with their claims against the debtor.

Reaffirmation of Debt

An agreement to pay a debt dischargeable in bankruptcy is called a reaffirmation agreement. A debtor may wish to pay a debt—for example, a debt owed to a family member, physician, bank, or some other creditor—even though the debt could be discharged in bankruptcy. Also, as noted previously, under the 2005 act a debtor cannot retain secured property while continuing to pay without entering into a reaffirmation agreement.

Reaffirmation Procedures To be enforceable, reaffirmation agreements must be made before the debtor is granted a discharge. The agreement must be signed and filed with the court (along with certain required disclosures, described next). Court approval is required unless the debtor is represented by an attorney during the negotiation of the reaffirmation and submits the proper documents and certifications. Even when the debtor is represented by an attorney, court approval may be required if it appears that the reaffirmation will result in undue hardship on the debtor.²⁰ When court approval is required, a separate hearing will take place. The court will approve the reaffirmation only if it finds that the agreement will not result in undue hardship to the debtor and that the reaffirmation is consistent with the debtor's best interests.

New Reaffirmation Disclosures To discourage creditors from engaging in abusive reaffirmation practices, the 2005 act added new requirements for reaffirmation. The Code now provides specific language for several pages of disclosures that must be given to debtors entering reaffirmation agreements. Among other things, these disclosures explain that the debtor is not required to reaffirm any debt, but that liens on secured property, such as mortgages and cars, will remain in effect even if the debt is not reaffirmed.

The reaffirmation agreement must disclose the amount of the debt reaffirmed, the rate of interest, the date payments begin, and the right to rescind. The disclosures also caution the debtor: "Only agree to reaffirm a debt if it is in your best interest. Be sure you can afford the payments you agree to make." The original disclosure documents must be signed by the debtor, certified by the debtor's attorney, and filed with the court at the same time as the reaffirmation agreement. A reaffirmation agreement that is not accompanied by the original signed disclosures will not be effective.

Reorganizations

The type of bankruptcy proceeding most commonly used by corporate debtors is the Chapter 11 reorganization. In a reorganization, the creditors and the debtor formulate a plan under which the debtor pays a portion of the debts and is discharged of the remainder. The debtor is allowed to continue in business. Although this type of bankruptcy is generally a corporate reorganization, any debtors (including individuals but excluding stockbrokers and commodities brokers) who are eligible for Chapter 7 relief are eligible for relief under Chapter 11.²¹ In 1994, Congress established a "fast-track" Chapter 11 procedure for small-business debtors whose liabilities do not exceed $2.19 million and who do not own or manage real estate. This allows bankruptcy proceedings without the appointment of committees and can save time and costs.

The same principles that govern the filing of a liquidation (Chapter 7) petition apply to reorganization (Chapter 11) proceedings. The case may be brought either voluntarily or involuntarily. The same guidelines govern the entry of the order for relief. The automatic stay and adequate protection provisions are applicable in reorganizations as well. The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act's exceptions to the automatic stay also apply to Chapter 11 proceedings, as do the new provisions regarding substantial abuse and additional grounds for dismissal (or conversion) of bankruptcy petitions. Additionally, the 2005 act contained specific rules and limitations for individual debtors who file a Chapter 11 petition. For example, an individual debtor's postpetition acquisitions and earnings become the property of the bankruptcy estate.

Must Be in the Best Interests of the Creditors

Under Section 305(a) of the Bankruptcy Code, a court, after notice and a hearing, may dismiss or suspend all proceedings in a case at any time if dismissal or suspension would better serve the interests of the creditors. Section 1112 also allows a court, after notice and a hearing, to dismiss a case under reorganization "for cause." Cause includes the absence of a reasonable likelihood of rehabilitation, the inability to effect a plan, and an unreasonable delay by the debtor that is prejudicial to (may harm the interests of) creditors.²²

20. Under the provisions of the 2005 act, if the debtor's monthly income minus the debtor's monthly expenses as shown on her or his completed and signed statement is less than the scheduled payments on the reaffirmed debt, undue hardship will be presumed. The debtor can rebut the presumption by providing a statement that explains and identifies additional sources of funds from which the debtor will make the agreed-on payments.

21. In addition, railroads are eligible for Chapter 11 relief.

22. See 11 U.S.C. Section 1112(b). Debtors are not prohibited from filing successive petitions, however. A debtor whose petition is dismissed, for example, can file a new Chapter 11 petition (which may be granted unless it is filed in bad faith).

Workouts

In some instances, creditors may prefer private, negotiated adjustments of creditor-debtor relations, also known as workouts, to bankruptcy proceedings. Often, these out-of-court workouts are much more flexible and thus more conducive to a speedy settlement. Speed is critical because delay is one of the most costly elements in any bankruptcy proceeding. Another advantage of workouts is that they avoid the various administrative costs of bankruptcy proceedings.

Debtor in Possession

On entry of the order for relief, the debtor generally continues to operate the business as a debtor in possession (DIP). The court, however, may appoint a trustee (often referred to as a receiver) to operate the debtor's business if gross mismanagement of the business is shown or if appointing a trustee is in the best interests of the estate.

The DIP's role is similar to that of a trustee in a liquidation.²³ The DIP is entitled to avoid preferential payments made to creditors and fraudulent transfers of assets. The DIP has the power to decide whether to cancel or assume prepetition executory contracts (those that are not yet performed) or unexpired leases. The DIP can also exercise a trustee's strong-arm powers.

Creditors' Committees

As soon as practicable after the entry of the order for relief, a creditors' committee of unsecured creditors is appointed. If the debtor has filed a reorganization plan accepted by the creditors, however, the trustee may decide not to call a meeting of the creditors. The committee may consult with the trustee or the DIP concerning the administration of the case or the formulation of the plan. Additional creditors' committees may be appointed to represent special interest creditors. Under the 2005 act, a court may order the trustee to change the membership of a committee or to increase the number of committee members to include a small-business concern if the court deems it necessary to ensure adequate representation of the creditors.

Orders affecting the estate generally will be entered only with the consent of the committee or after a hearing in which the judge is informed of the position of the committee. As mentioned earlier, businesses with debts of less than $2.19 million that do not own or manage real estate can avoid creditors' committees. In these cases, orders can be entered without a committee's consent.

The Reorganization Plan

A reorganization plan to rehabilitate the debtor is a plan to conserve and administer the debtor's assets in the hope of an eventual return to successful operation and solvency.

Filing the Plan Only the debtor may file a plan within the first 120 days after the date of the order for relief. Under the 2005 act, the 120-day period may be extended but not beyond eighteen months from the date of the order for relief. If the debtor does not meet the 120-day deadline or obtain an extension, and if the debtor fails to procure the required creditor consent (discussed below) within 180 days, any party may propose a plan up to twenty months from the date of the order for relief. (In other words, the 180-day period cannot be extended beyond twenty months past the date of the order for relief.) For a small-business debtor, the time for the debtor's filing is 180 days.

The plan must be fair and equitable and must do the following:

1. Designate classes of claims and interests.
2. Specify the treatment to be afforded the classes. (The plan must provide the same treatment for all claims in a particular class.)
3. Provide an adequate means for execution. (The 2005 act requires individual debtors to utilize postpetition assets as necessary to execute the plan.)
4. Provide for payment of tax claims over a five-year period.

Acceptance and Confirmation of the Plan

Once the plan has been developed, it is submitted to each class of creditors for acceptance. Each class must accept the plan unless the class is not adversely affected by it. A class has accepted the plan when a majority of the creditors, representing two-thirds of the amount of the total claim, vote to approve it. Confirmation is conditioned on the debtor certifying that all postpetition domestic-support obligations have been paid in full. For small-business debtors, if the plan meets the listed requirements, the court must confirm the plan within forty-five days (unless this period is extended).

Even when all classes of creditors accept the plan, the court may refuse to confirm it if it is not "in the best interests of the creditors.”²⁴ A former spouse or child of the debtor can block the plan if it does not provide for payment of her or his claims in cash. Under the 2005 act, if an unsecured creditor objects to the plan, specific rules apply to the value of property to be distributed under the plan. The plan can also be modified on the request of the debtor, a trustee, or a holder of the unsecured claim. Tax claims must be paid over a five-year period.

Even if only one class of creditors has accepted the plan, the court may still confirm the plan under the Code's so-called cram-down provision. In other words, the court may confirm the plan over the objections of a class of creditors. Before the court can exercise this right of cram-down confirmation, it must be demonstrated that the plan is fair and equitable, and does not discriminate unfairly against any creditors.

Discharge The plan is binding on confirmation; however, the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 2005 provides that confirmation of a plan does not discharge an individual debtor. Individual debtors must complete the plan prior to discharge, unless the court orders otherwise. For all other debtors, the court may order discharge at any time after the plan is confirmed. The debtor is given a reorganization discharge from all claims not protected under the plan. This discharge does not apply to any claims that would be denied discharge under liquidation.

Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12

In addition to bankruptcy relief through liquidation and reorganization, the Code also provides for individuals' repayment plans (Chapter 13) and family-farmer and family-fishermen debt adjustments (Chapter 12).

24. The plan need not provide for full repayment to unsecured creditors. Instead, creditors receive a percentage of each dollar owed to them by the debtor.

Individuals' Repayment Plan

Chapter 13 of the Bankruptcy Code provides for "Adjustment of Debts of an Individual with Regular Income." Individuals (not partnerships or corporations) with regular income who owe fixed (liquidated) unsecured debts of less than $336,900 or fixed secured debts of less than $1,010,650 may take advantage of bankruptcy repayment plans. Among those eligible are salaried employees; sole proprietors; and individuals who live on welfare, Social Security, fixed pensions, or investment income. Many small-business debtors have a choice of filing under either Chapter 11 or Chapter 13. Repayment plans offer several advantages, however. One advantage is that they are less expensive and less complicated than reorganization proceedings or, for that matter, even liquidation proceedings.

Filing the Petition A Chapter 13 repayment plan case can be initiated only by the filing of a voluntary petition by the debtor or by the conversion of a Chapter 7 petition (because of a finding of substantial abuse under the means test, for example). Certain liquidation and reorganization cases may be converted to repayment plan cases with the consent of the debtor.²⁵ A trustee, who will make payments under the plan, must be appointed. On the filing of a repayment plan petition, the automatic stay previously discussed takes effect. Although the stay applies to all or part of the debtor's consumer debt, it does not apply to any business debt incurred by the debtor. The automatic stay also does not apply to domestic-support obligations.

The Bankruptcy Code imposes the requirement of good faith on a debtor at both the time of the filing of the petition and the time of the filing of the plan. The Code does not define good faith—it is determined in each case through a consideration of "the totality of the circumstances." Bad faith can be cause for the dismissal of a Chapter 13 petition, as the following case illustrates.

25. A Chapter 13 repayment plan may be converted to a Chapter 7 liquidation either at the request of the debtor or, under certain circumstances, "for cause" by a creditor. A Chapter 13 case may be converted to a Chapter 11 case after a hearing.

CASE 30.3 In re Buis

United States Bankruptcy Court, Northern District of Florida, Pensacola Division, 2006. 337 Bankr. 243.

- Background and Facts In 2000, Roger and Pauline Buis bought an air show business, including a helicopter, a trailer, and props, from Robert and Annette Hosking. The price was $275,000, which the Buises agreed to pay in installments. The Buises formed Otto Airshows and decorated the helicopter as “Otto the Clown.” They performed in air shows and took passengers on flights for a fee. In 2003, the Buisés began accusing a competitor, Army Aviation Heritage Foundation and Museum, Inc. (AAHF), of safety lapses. AAHF filed a suit in a federal district court against the Buisés and their company, alleging defamation. The court issued a summary judgment in AAHF’s favor. While the amount of the damages was being determined, the Buisés stopped doing business as Otto Airshows. They formed a new firm, Prop and Rotor Aviation, Inc., to which they leased the Otto equipment. Within a month, they filed a bankruptcy petition under Chapter 13. The plan and the schedules did not mention AAHF, the Prop and Rotor lease, a settlement that the Buisés received in an unrelated suit, and other items. AAHF filed a motion to dismiss the case, asserting, among other things, that the Buisés filed their petition in bad faith.

LEWIS M. KILLIAN, JR., Bankruptcy Judge.

* * * *

* * * In considering the totality of circumstances surrounding the debtors’ filing of their petition, it is clear to me that this case was filed in bad faith and therefore should be dismissed. [Emphasis added.]

First, the debtors did not accurately state their assets and liabilities on their initial bankruptcy petition. The debtors failed to list AAHF as a creditor, which is especially hard for the court to comprehend when the debtor admitted that it was AAHF’s judgment that pushed them into bankruptcy. The debtors listed income on their schedules from “[r]ent from personal property lease,” but did not list any such lease on [the schedules] and did not report any income from leases in their statement of financial affairs or list any agreement with Prop and Rotor anywhere in their schedules * * *. The debtors also did not disclose the $55,000.00 personal injury settlement they received prepetition. In addition to all of these omissions, the debtors also “forgot” about a Kubota lawn tractor worth $10,000 and their generator, worth $400. The debtors did not amend their schedules to reflect any of this until the day of the hearing on this motion. [Emphasis added.]

Next, the timing of the debtors’ petition leads to the conclusion of bad faith, in two ways. First, the debtors filed their Chapter 13 petition after they were found liable in the District Court Action and after an unsuccessful mediation with AAHF, but before a final judgment could be entered. * * * It appears to me that *the timing of the bankruptcy filing was an ultimately futile attempt to keep the debtors eligible to file for relief under Chapter 13, because the debts owed to AAHF would be dischargeable in a * * * so-called Chapter 13 “super discharge.”* The other reason the timing of the petition is suspect involves the grant of [certain] interests in [some of the Buisés’ assets to some of their creditors]. While the granting of these * * * interests may not have been fraudulent transfers as a matter of law, they certainly would have been preferences subject to avoidance * * * had they been made within 90 days of the filing of the petition. All of these transfers appear to have been made between 90 and 120 days pre-petition. Thus, the debtors granted these * * * interests, * * * waited 90 days so they would “stick,” then filed their petition. The debtor admitted that he began planning to avoid AAHF’s judgment through a Chapter 13 bankruptcy shortly after the adverse ruling on summary judgment in the District Court. The timing of the bankruptcy petition further demonstrates both the debtors’ attempt to continue in their pre-petition pattern of egregious [flagrant] behavior towards AAHF and their bad faith in filing their petition. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The court dismissed the Buisés’ petition. The debtors had not included all of their assets and liabilities on their initial petition and had timed its filing to avoid payment on the judgment to AAHF. They had also attempted to transfer interests in some of their assets in preference to certain creditors. The court determined that “the debtors filed their petition in bad faith and it is in the creditors’ and estate’s best interests that this case be dismissed.”

● What If the Facts Were Different? If AAHF had lost its defamation suit against the Buisés, would the result in this case have been the same? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension Could the Buisés have shipped their assets to Canada or Mexico to prevent them from being included in the bankruptcy estate? Explain.

The Repayment Plan Only the debtor may file the repayment plan. This plan may provide either for payment of all obligations in full or for payment of a lesser amount.²⁶ The plan must provide for the following:

1. The turning over to the trustee of such future earnings or income of the debtor as is necessary for execution of the plan.
2. Full payment through deferred cash payments of all claims entitled to priority, such as taxes.²⁷
3. Identical treatment of all claims within a particular class. (The Code permits the debtor to list co-debtors, such as guarantors or sureties, as a separate class.)

Time Allowed for Repayment. Prior to the 2005 act, the time for repayment under a plan was usually three years unless the court approved an extension for up to five years. Under the new act, the length of the payment plan (three or five years) is determined by the debtor's family income. If the debtor's family income is greater than the state median family income under the means test (previously discussed), the proposed plan must be for five years.²⁸ The term may not exceed five years, however.

The Code requires the debtor to make "timely" payments from her or his disposable income, and the trustee must ensure that the debtor commences these payments. The debtor must begin making payments under the proposed plan within thirty days after the plan has been filed. Failure of the debtor to make timely payments or to commence payments within the thirty-day period will allow the court to convert the case to a liquidation bankruptcy or to dismiss the petition.

Confirmation of the Plan. After the plan is filed, the court holds a confirmation hearing, at which interested parties (such as creditors) may object to the 26. Under the 2005 act, a plan under Chapter 13 or Chapter 12 (to be discussed shortly) may propose to pay less than 100 percent of prepetition domestic-support obligations that were assigned, but only if disposable income is dedicated to a five-year plan. Disposable income is also redefined to exclude the amounts reasonably necessary to pay current domestic-support obligations.

27. As with a Chapter 11 reorganization plan, full repayment of all claims is not always required.

28. See 11 U.S.C. Section 1322(d) for details on when the court will find that the Chapter 13 plan should extend to a five-year period.

plan. Under the 2005 act, the hearing must be held at least twenty days, but no more than forty-five days, after the meeting of the creditors. Confirmation of the plan is dependent on the debtor's certification that postpetition domestic-support obligations have been paid in full and that all prepetition tax returns have been filed. The court will confirm a plan with respect to each claim of a secured creditor under any of the following circumstances:

1. If the secured creditors have accepted the plan.
2. If the plan provides that secured creditors retain their liens until there is payment in full or until the debtor receives a discharge.
3. If the debtor surrenders the property securing the claims to the creditors.

In addition, for confirmation, the plan must provide that a creditor with a purchase-money security interest (PMSI—see Chapter 29) retains its lien until payment of the entire debt for a motor vehicle purchased within 910 days before filing the petition. For PMSIs on other personal property, the payment plan must cover debts incurred within a one-year period preceding the filing.

Objection to the Plan. Unsecured creditors do not have the power to confirm a repayment plan, but they can object to it. The court can approve a plan over the objection of the trustee or any unsecured creditor only in either of the following situations:

1. When the value of the property (replacement value as of the date of filing) to be distributed under the plan is at least equal to the amount of the claims.
2. When all of the debtor's projected disposable income to be received during the plan period will be applied to making payments. Disposable income is all income received less amounts needed to pay domestic-support obligations and/or amounts needed to meet ordinary expenses to continue the operation of a business. The 2005 act also excluded from disposable income charitable contributions up to 15 percent of the debtor's gross income and the reasonable and necessary costs for health insurance for the debtor and his or her dependents.

Modification of the Plan. Prior to completion of payments, the plan may be modified at the request of the debtor, the trustee, or an unsecured creditor. If any interested party objects to the modification, the court must hold a hearing to determine whether the modified plan will be approved.

Discharge After the debtor has completed all payments, the court grants a discharge of all debts provided for by the repayment plan. Except for allowed claims not provided for by the plan, certain long-term debts provided for by the plan, certain tax claims, payments on retirement accounts, and claims for domestic-support obligations, all other debts are dischargeable. Under prior law, a discharge of debts under a Chapter 13 repayment plan was sometimes referred to as a “superdischarge” because it allowed the discharge of fraudulently incurred debt and claims resulting from malicious or willful injury.

The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act, however, deleted most of the “superdischarge” provisions, especially for debts based on fraud. Today, debts for trust fund taxes, taxes for which returns were never filed or filed late (within two years of filing), domestic-support payments, student loans, and injury or property damage from driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs are nondischargeable. The new law also excludes fraudulent tax obligations, criminal fines and restitution, fraud by a person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and restitution for willfully and maliciously causing personal injury or death.

Even if the debtor does not complete the plan, a hardship discharge may be granted if failure to complete the plan was due to circumstances beyond the debtor's control and if the value of the property distributed under the plan was greater than what would have been paid in a liquidation. A discharge can be revoked within one year if it was obtained by fraud.

Family Farmers and Fishermen

In 1986, to help relieve economic pressure on small farmers, Congress created Chapter 12 of the Bankruptcy Code. In 2005, Congress extended this protection to family fishermen,²⁹ modified its provisions somewhat, and made it a permanent chapter in the Bankruptcy Code (previously, the statutes authorizing Chapter 12 had to be periodically renewed by Congress).

Definitions For purposes of Chapter 12, a family farmer is one whose gross income is at least 50 percent farm dependent and whose debts are at least 50 percent farm related. The total debt for a family farmer must not exceed $3,544,525. (Prior law required a farmer's debts to be 80 percent farm related and not to exceed $1.5 million.) A partnership or closely held corporation (see Chapter 38) at least 50 percent owned by the farm family can also qualify as a family farmer.

A family fisherman is defined by the 2005 act as one whose gross income is at least 50 percent dependent on commercial fishing operations³⁰ and whose debts are at least 80 percent related to commercial fishing. The total debt for a family fisherman must not exceed $1,642,500. As with family farmers, a partnership or closely held corporation can also qualify.

Filing the Petition The procedure for filing a family-farmer or family-fishermen bankruptcy plan is very similar to the procedure for filing a repayment plan under Chapter 13. The debtor must file a plan not later than ninety days after the order for relief. The filing of the petition acts as an automatic stay against creditors' and co-obligors' actions against the estate.

A farmer or fisherman who has already filed a reorganization or repayment plan may convert it to a Chapter 12 plan. The debtor may also convert a Chapter 12 plan to a liquidation plan.

Content and Confirmation of the Plan

The content of a plan under Chapter 12 is basically the same as that of a Chapter 13 repayment plan. The plan can be modified by the debtor but, except for cause, must be confirmed or denied within forty-five days of filing.

Court confirmation of the plan is the same as for a repayment plan. In summary, the plan must provide for payment of secured debts at the value of the collateral. If the secured debt exceeds the value of the collateral, the remaining debt is unsecured. For unsecured debtors, the plan must be confirmed if either (1) the value of the property to be distributed under the plan equals the amount of the claim, or (2) the plan provides that all of the debtor's disposable income to be received in a three-year period (or longer, by court approval) will be applied to making payments. Disposable income is all income received less amounts needed to support the farmer or fisherman and his or her family and to continue the farming or commercial fishing operation. Completion of payments under the plan discharges all debts provided for by the plan. See Concept Summary 30.1 for a comparison of bankruptcy procedures under Chapters 7, 11, 12, and 13.

29. Although the Code uses the terms fishermen and fisherman, Chapter 12 provisions apply equally to men and women.

30. Commercial fishing operations include catching, harvesting, or aquaculture raising fish, shrimp, lobsters, urchins, seaweed, shellfish, or other aquatic species or products.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 30.1

Forms of Bankruptcy Relief Compared

Issue	Chapter 7	Chapter 11	Chapters 12 and 13
PURPOSE	Liquidation.	Reorganization.	Adjustment.
WHO CAN PETITION	Debtor (voluntary) or creditors (involuntary).	Debtor (voluntary) or creditors (involuntary).	Debtor (voluntary) only.
WHO CAN BE A DEBTOR	Any "person" (including partnerships, corporations, and municipalities) except railroads, insurance companies, banks, savings and loan institutions, investment companies licensed by the Small Business Administration, and credit unions. Farmers and charitable institutions also cannot be involuntarily petitioned. If the court finds the petition to be a substantial abuse of the use of Chapter 7, the debtor may be required to convert to a Chapter 13 repayment plan.	Any debtor eligible for Chapter 7 relief; railroads are also eligible. Individuals have specific rules and limitations.	Chapter 12 —Any family farmer (one whose gross income is at least 50 percent farm dependent and whose debts are at least 50 percent farm related) or family fisherman (one whose gross income is at least 50 percent dependent on commercial fishing operations and whose debts are at least 80 percent related to commercial fishing) or any partnership or closely held corporation at least 50 percent owned by a family farmer or fisherman, when total debt does not exceed a specified amount ($3,544,525 for farmers and $1,642,500 for fishermen). Chapter 13 —Any individual (not partnerships or corporations) with regular income who owes fixed unsecured debts of less than $336,900 or fixed secured debts of less than $1,010,650.
PROCEDURE LEADING TO DISCHARGE	Nonexempt property is sold with proceeds to be distributed (in order) to priority groups. Dischargeable debts are terminated.	Plan is submitted; if it is approved and followed, debts are discharged.	Plan is submitted and must be approved if the value of the property to be distributed equals the amount of the claims or if the debtor turns over disposable income for a three-year or five-year period; if the plan is followed, debts are discharged.
ADVANTAGES	On liquidation and distribution, most debts are discharged, and the debtor has an opportunity for a fresh start.	Debtor continues in business. Creditors can either accept the plan, or it can be "crammed down" on them. The plan allows for the reorganization and liquidation of debts over the plan period.	Debtor continues in business or possession of assets. If the plan is approved, most debts are discharged after the plan period.

REVIEWING Bankruptcy Law

Three months ago, Janet Hart's husband of twenty years died of cancer. Although he had medical insurance, he left Janet with outstanding medical bills of more than $50,000. Janet has worked at the local library for the past ten years, earning $1,500 per month. Since her husband's death, Janet also receives $1,500 in Social Security benefits and $1,100 in life insurance proceeds every month, for a total monthly income of $4,100. After she pays the mortgage payment of $1,500 and the amounts due on other debts, Janet has barely enough left over to buy groceries for her family (she has two teenage daughters at home). She decides to file for Chapter 7 bankruptcy, hoping for a fresh start. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under the Bankruptcy Code after the 2005 act, what must Janet do before filing a petition for relief under Chapter 7?
2. How much time does Janet have after filing the bankruptcy petition to submit the required schedules? What happens if Janet does not meet the deadline?
3. Assume that Janet files a petition under Chapter 7. Further assume that the median family income in the state in which Janet lives is $49,300. What steps would a court take to determine whether Janet's petition is presumed to be "substantial abuse" using the means test?
4. Suppose that the court determines that no presumption of substantial abuse applies in Janet's case. Nevertheless, the court finds that Janet does have the ability to pay at least a portion of the medical bills out of her disposable income. What would the court likely order in that situation?

30-1. Burke has been a rancher all her life, raising cattle and crops. Her ranch is valued at $500,000, almost all of which is exempt under state law. Burke has eight creditors and a total indebtedness of $70,000. Two of her largest creditors are Oman ($30,000 owed) and Sneed ($25,000 owed). The other six creditors have claims of less than $5,000 each. A drought has ruined all of Burke's crops and forced her to sell many of her cattle at a loss. She cannot pay off her creditors.

- (a) Under the Bankruptcy Code, can Burke, with a $500,000 ranch, voluntarily petition herself into bankruptcy? Explain.
- (b) Could either Oman or Sneed force Burke into involuntary bankruptcy? Explain.

Peaslee is not known for his business sense. He started a greenhouse and nursery business two years ago, and because of his lack of experience, he soon was in debt to a number of creditors. On February 1, Peaslee borrowed $5,000 from his father to pay some of these creditors. On May 1, Peaslee paid back the $5,000, depleting his entire working capital. One creditor, the Cool Springs Nursery Supply Corp., extended credit to Peaslee on numerous purchases. Cool Springs pressured Peaslee for payment, and on July 1, Peaslee paid Cool Springs half the amount owed. On September 1, Peaslee voluntarily petitioned himself into bankruptcy. The trustee in bankruptcy claims that both Peaslee's father and Cool Springs must turn over to the debtor's estate the amounts Peaslee paid to them. Discuss fully the trustee's claims.

- For a sample answer to Question 30-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

30-3. Montoro petitioned himself into voluntary bankruptcy. There were three major claims against his estate. One was made by Carlton, a friend who held Montoro's negotiable promissory note for $2,500; one was made by Elmer, an employee who was owed three months' back wages of $4,500; and one was made by the United Bank of the Rockies on an unsecured loan of $5,000. In addition, Dietrich, an accountant retained by the trustee, was owed $500, and property taxes of $1,000 were owed to Rock County. Montoro's nonexempt property was liquidated, with proceeds of $5,000. Discuss fully what amount each party will receive, and why.

30-4. Automatic Stay. On January 22, 2001, Marlene Moffett bought a used 1998 Honda Accord from Hendrick Honda in Woodbridge, Virginia. Moffett agreed to pay $20,024.25, with interest, in sixty monthly installments, and Hendrick retained a security interest in the car. (As discussed in Chapter 29, Hendrick thus had the right to repossess the car in the event of default, subject to Moffett's right of redemption.) Hendrick assigned its rights under the sales agreement to Tidewater Finance Co., which perfected its security interest. The car was Moffett's only means of traveling the forty miles from her home to her workplace. In March and April 2002, Moffett missed two monthly payments. On April 25, Tidewater repossessed the car. On the same day, Moffett filed a Chapter 13 plan in a federal bankruptcy court. Moffett asked that the car be returned to her, in part under the Bankruptcy Code's automatic-stay provision. Tidewater asked the court to terminate the automatic stay so that it could sell the car. How can the interests of both the debtor and the creditor be fully protected in this case? What should the court rule? Explain. [In re Moffett, 356 F.3d 518 (4th Cir. 2004)]

30-5. Discharge in Bankruptcy. Between 1980 and 1987, Craig Hanson borrowed funds from Great Lakes Higher Education Corp. to finance his education at the University of Wisconsin. Hanson defaulted on the debt in 1989, and Great Lakes obtained a judgment against him for $31,583.77. Three years later, Hanson filed a bankruptcy petition under Chapter 13. Great Lakes timely filed a proof of claim in the amount of $35,531.08. Hanson's repayment plan proposed to pay $135 monthly to Great Lakes over sixty months, which in total was only 19 percent of the claim, but said nothing about discharging the remaining balance. The plan was confirmed without objection. After Hanson completed the payments under the plan, without any additional proof or argument being offered, the court granted a discharge of his student loans. In 2003, Educational Credit Management Corp. (ECMC), which had taken over Great Lakes' interest in the loans, filed a motion for relief from the discharge. What is the requirement for the discharge of a student loan obligation in bankruptcy? Did Hanson meet this requirement? Should the court grant ECMC's motion? Discuss. [In re Hanson, 397 F.3d 482 (7th Cir. 2005)]

30-6. Exceptions to Discharge. Between 1988 and 1992, Lorna Nys took out thirteen student loans, totaling about $30,000, to finance an associate of arts degree in drafting from the College of the Redwoods and a bachelor of arts degree from Humboldt State University (HSU) in California. In 1996, Nys began working at HSU as a drafting technician. As a "Drafter II," the highest-paying drafting position at HSU, Nys's gross income in 2002 was $40,244. She was fifty-one years old, Her net monthly income was $2,299.33, and she had $2,295.05 in monthly expenses, including saving $140 for her retirement, which she planned for age sixty-five. When Educational Credit Management Corp. (ECMC) began to collect payments on Nys's student loans, she filed a Chapter 7 petition in a federal bankruptcy court, seeking a discharge of the loans. ECMC argued that Nys did not show any "additional circumstances" that would impede her ability to repay. What is the standard for the discharge of student loans under Chapter 7? Does Nys meet that standard? Why or why not? [In re Nys, 446 F.3d 938 (9th Cir. 2006)]

James Stout, a professor of economics and business at Cornell College in Iowa City, Iowa, filed a petition in bankruptcy under Chapter 7, seeking to discharge about $95,000 in credit-card debts. At the time, Stout had been divorced for ten years and had custody of his children: Z. S., who attended college, and G. S., who was twelve years old. Stout's ex-wife did not contribute child support. According to Stout, G. S. was an "elite" ice-skater who practiced twenty hours a week and had placed between first and third at more than forty competitive events. He had decided to home school G. S., whose achievements were average for her grade level despite her frequent absences from public school. His petition showed monthly income of $4,227 and expenses of $4,806. The expenses included annual home school costs of $8,400 and annual skating expenses of $6,000. They did not include Z. S.'s college costs, such as airfare for his upcoming studies in Europe, and other items. The trustee allowed monthly expenses of $3,227—with nothing for skating—and asked the court to dismiss the petition. Can the court grant this request? Should it? If so, what might it encourage Stout to do? Explain. [In re Stout, 336 Bankr. 138 (N.D. Iowa 2006)]

30-8. Discharge in Bankruptcy. Rhonda Schroeder married Gennady Shvartshteyn (Gene) in 1997. Gene worked at Royal Courier and Air Domestic Connect in Illinois, where Melissa Winyard also worked in 1999 and 2000. During this time, Gene and Winyard had an affair. A year after leaving Royal, Winyard filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court under Chapter 7 and was granted a discharge of her debts. Sometime later, in a letter to Schroeder who had learned of the affair, Winyard wrote, "I never intentionally wanted any of this to happen. I never wanted to disrupt your marriage." Schroeder obtained a divorce and, in 2005, filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Winyard, alleging "alienation of affection." Schroeder claimed that there had been "mutual love and affection" in her marriage until Winyard engaged in conduct intended to alienate her husband's affection. Schroeder charged that Winyard "caused him to have sexual intercourse with her," resulting in "the destruction of the marital relationship." Winyard filed a motion for summary judgment on the ground that any liability on her part had been discharged in her bankruptcy. Is there an exception to discharge for "willful and malicious conduct"? If so, does Schroeder's claim qualify? Discuss. [Schroeder v. Winyard, 375 Ill.App.3d 358, 873 N.E.2d 35, 313 Ill.Dec. 740 (2 Dist. 2007)]

In October 1994, Charles Edwards formed ETS Payphones, Inc., to sell and lease pay phones as investment opportunities—an investor would buy a phone from ETS, which would lease it back. ETS promised returns of 14 to 15 percent but consistently lost money. To meet its obligations to existing investors, ETS had to continually attract new investors. Eventually, ETS defrauded thousands of investors of more than $300 million. Edwards transferred the funds from ETS to himself. In 2000, ETS filed a petition in a federal bankruptcy court to declare bankruptcy. Darryl Laddin was appointed trustee. On the debtor's behalf, Laddin filed a suit against Reliance Trust Co. and others, alleging, among other things, that the defendants helped defraud investors by "ignoring the facts" and "funneling" the investors' funds to ETS, causing it to "incur millions of dollars in additional debt." Laddin sought treble (triple) damages. [Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors of PSA, Inc. v. Edwards, 437 F.3d 1145 (11th Cir. 2006)]

- The defendants argued, in part, that the doctrine of in pari delicto, which provides that a wrongdoer may not profit from his or her wrongful acts, barred Laddin's claim. Who should be considered ethically responsible for the investors' losses? Explain.
- Laddin contended that his actions, as trustee on behalf of the debtor, should not be subject to the doctrine of in pari delicto because that doctrine depends on the "personal malfeasance of the individual seeking to recover." The defendants filed a motion to dismiss Laddin's complaint. Do you think that the court should rule in favor of Laddin or the defendants? Why?

- In the video, a crowd (including Mel Gibson) is gathered at a farm auction in which a neighbor's (Jim Antonio's) farming goods are being sold. The people in the crowd, who are upset because they believe that the bank is selling out the farmer, begin chanting "no sale, no sale." In an effort to calm the situation, the farmer tells the crowd that "they've already foreclosed" on his farm. What does he mean?
- Assume that the auction is a result of Chapter 7 bankruptcy proceedings. Was the farmer's petition for bankruptcy voluntary or involuntary? Explain.
- Suppose that the farmer purchased the homestead three years prior to filing a petition for bankruptcy and that the current market value of the farm is $215,000. What is the maximum amount of equity the farmer could claim as exempt under the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act?
- Compare the results of a Chapter 12 bankruptcy as opposed to a Chapter 7 bankruptcy for the farmer in the video.

Creditors' Rights and Bankruptcy

We have certainly come a long way from the period in our history when debtors' prisons existed. Today, debtors are in a much more favorable position—they can file for protection under bankruptcy law. Indeed, after the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 was passed, some claimed that we had gone too far toward protecting debtors and had made it too easy for them to avoid paying what they legally owed. Critics of the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act are concerned that the pendulum has swung too far in the opposite direction—favoring creditors' interests and making it too difficult for debtors to obtain a fresh start. Clearly, it is hard to protect the rights of both debtors and creditors at the same time, and laws governing debtor-creditor relationships have traditionally been perceived, by one group or another, as being unfair.

It is obviously not possible for the law to protect both debtors and creditors at all times under all circumstances. Attempts to balance the rights of both groups necessarily raise questions of fairness and justice. In this Focus on Ethics feature, we look at several aspects of debtor-creditor relationships that frequently involve issues of fairness, and we examine the ethical ramifications of the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act for debtors and creditors.

“Self-Help” Repossession

Section 9–503 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) states that “[u]nless otherwise agreed, a secured party has on default the right to take possession of the collateral. In taking possession, a secured party may proceed without judicial process if this can be done without breach of the peace.” The underlying rationale for this “self-help” provision of Article 9 is that it simplifies the process of repossession for creditors and reduces the burden on the courts. Because the UCC does not define “breach of the peace,” however, it is not always easy to predict what behavior will constitute such a breach.

One problem is that the debtor may not realize what is happening when agents of the creditor show up to repossess the collateral. Often, to avoid confrontation with the debtor and any potential violence or breach of the peace, a secured creditor will arrange to have the collateral repossessed during the night or in the early-morning hours, when the repossession effort is least likely to be observed. But a debtor who awakens in the night and sees his or her car being towed away may not realize that it is being repossessed.

At the same time, repossession can be risky for the creditor; if the repossession results in a breach of the peace, the creditor may be liable for substantial damages. Inevitably, repossession attempts will occasionally result in confrontations with the debtor. Indeed, some contend that the self-help provision encourages violence by providing an incentive for debtors to incite creditors to breach the peace, which may entitle the debtors to damages.

Ethics and Bankruptcy

As we have seen, the first goal of bankruptcy law is to provide relief and protection to debtors. Society has generally concluded that everyone should be given the chance to start over. But how far should society go in allowing debtors to avoid obligations that they voluntarily incurred? This question has been debated for some time, and it is certainly at the forefront of the issues raised by the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act.

Consider the concept of bankruptcy from the point of view of the creditor. The creditor has extended a transfer of purchasing power from herself or himself to the debtor. That transfer of purchasing power represents a transfer of an asset for an asset. The debtor obtains the asset of funds, goods, or services, and the creditor obtains the asset of a secured or unsecured legal obligation to repay. Once the debtor is in bankruptcy, voluntarily or involuntarily, the asset that the creditor owns most often has a diminished value. Indeed, in many circumstances, that asset has no value. Yet the easier it becomes for debtors to discharge their debts under bankruptcy laws, the greater will be the incentive for debtors to use such laws to avoid paying amounts that are legally owed.

Clearly, bankruptcy law is a balancing act between providing a second chance for debtors and ensuring that creditors are given reasonable protection. Understandably, ethical issues arise in the process.

Bankruptcy and Economics

Among other things, the increasing number of bankruptcies since the early 1990s meant that creditors incurred higher risks in making loans—because bankruptcy shifts the cost of the debt from the debtor to the creditor. To compensate for these higher risks, creditors take one or more of the following actions: increase the interest rates charged to everyone, require additional security (collateral), or be more selective in granting credit.

Thus, with more lenient bankruptcy laws, debtors who find themselves in bankruptcy will be better off, but those debtors who will never be in bankruptcy will be worse off. Ethical concerns regarding this trade-off must be matched with the economic concerns of other groups of individuals affected by the law.

Consequences of Bankruptcy Under the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act, filing for personal bankruptcy (particularly under Chapter 7) has become more difficult. Although the stigma attached to bankruptcy today is less than it once was, bankruptcy is never easy for debtors. Many debtors feel a sense of shame and failure when they petition for bankruptcy. After all, bankruptcy is a matter of public record, and there is no way to avoid a certain amount of publicity. In one case, for example, a couple who filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy wanted to use their attorney's mailing address in another town on their bankruptcy schedules in an effort to prevent an elderly parent and one of their employers from learning about the bankruptcy. The court, however, held that debtors are not entitled to be protected from publicity surrounding the filing of their cases.¹

A court in another case held that the public interest in information involving a particular bankruptcy debtor (Gitto Global Corporation) was important enough to justify disclosing a previously sealed report from a bankruptcy examiner. In essence, the court gave the media access to the bankruptcy examiner's report on the misconduct of more than 120 individuals at the debtor company.²

Bankruptcy also has other consequences for debtors, including blemished credit ratings for up to ten years and higher interest charges for new debts, such as those incurred through the purchase of cars or homes. Some private employers may even refuse to hire a job applicant who has filed for bankruptcy. The courts provide little relief for applicants who are denied a job for this reason.³

Thus, bankruptcy can have adverse effects for both debtors and creditors. Because of the consequences of bankruptcy, debtors do not always get the fresh start promised by bankruptcy law. At the same time, creditors rarely are able to recover all that is owed them once a debtor petitions for bankruptcy.

Is It Fair to Increase the Costs for Debtors Seeking Bankruptcy Relief? The 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act increased the costs of filing for bankruptcy. Not only did the filing fee for Chapter 7 bankruptcies increase from $155 to $200, but attorneys' fees also increased in many instances. Attorneys' fees, rather than filing fees, typically constitute the major expense for bankruptcy filings. Many attorneys have raised the fees they charge to handle bankruptcy cases in the wake of the 2005 act because they are assuming greater risk. Under the 2005 law, the debtor's attorney must certify the accuracy of all factual allegations in the bankruptcy petition and schedules under the penalty of perjury. In other words, attorneys may be subject to sanctions (fines) if there are any factual inaccuracies.

Because attorneys are held accountable for factual inaccuracies, the debtor's attorney may decide to independently investigate the truth of the facts stated in the petition and schedules. This may entail hiring private investigators, appraisers, and auditors for assistance in accounting for all of the debtor's income and assets. If the debtor enters a reaffirmation agreement, it will not be enforceable unless the attorney certifies that the debtor is capable of making the payments due under the agreement. Thus, another round of investigations may be needed before the attorney will sign the certification. Obviously, the debtor ends up paying these costs. Is this fair considering that a main goal of bankruptcy is to give debtors a fresh start?

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Do you think that the law favors debtors at the expense of creditors or vice versa? Is there any way to achieve a better balance between the interests of creditors and those of debtors?
2. So long as a breach of the peace does not result, a lender may repossess goods on the debtor's default under the self-help provision of Article 9. Do you think that debtors have a right to be told in advance about a planned repossession? Some observers argue that the self-help remedy under Article 9 should be abolished. Do you agree? Why or why not?
3. Is it unethical to avoid paying one's debts by going into bankruptcy? Does a person have a moral responsibility to pay his or her debts?
4. Are borrowers better off as a result of the 2005 Bankruptcy Reform Act? Why or why not? Do credit-card companies have a duty to reduce the interest rates they charge to all consumers if their costs fall? Should they?

Agency Formation and Duties

One of the most common, important, and pervasive legal relationships is that of agency. As discussed in Chapter 26, in an agency relationship involving two parties, one of the parties, called the agent, agrees to represent or act for the other, called the principal. The principal has the right to control the agent's conduct in matters entrusted to the agent. By using agents, a principal can conduct multiple business operations simultaneously in various locations. Thus, for example, contracts that bind the principal can be made at different places with different persons at the same time.

A familiar example of an agent is a corporate officer who serves in a representative capacity for the owners of the corporation. In this capacity, the officer has the authority to bind the principal (the corporation) to a contract. Indeed, agency law is essential to the existence and operation of a corporate entity because only through its agents can a corporation function and enter into contracts.

Most employees are also considered to be agents of their employers. Thus, some of the concepts that you will learn about in Chapters 33 and 34, on employment law, are based on agency law. Generally, agency relationships permeate the business world. For that reason, an understanding of the law of agency is crucial to understanding business law.

Agency Relationships

Section 1(1) of the *Restatement (Second) of Agency*¹ defines agency as “the fiduciary relation [that] results from the manifestation of consent by one person to another that the other shall act in his [or her] behalf and subject to his [or her] control, and consent by the other so to act.” The term fiduciary is at the heart of agency law. The term can be used both as a noun and as an adjective. When used as a noun, it refers to a person having a duty created by his or her undertaking to act primarily for another's benefit in matters connected with the undertaking. When used as an adjective, as in the phrase “fiduciary relationship,” it means that the relationship involves trust and confidence.

Agency relationships commonly exist between employers and employees. Agency relationships may sometimes also exist between employers and independent contractors who are hired to perform special tasks or services.

Employer-Employee Relationships

Normally, all employees who deal with third parties are deemed to be agents. A salesperson in a department store, for instance, is an agent of the store's owner (the principal) and acts on the owner's behalf. Employment laws (state and federal) apply only to the employer-employee relationship. Statutes governing Social Security, withholding taxes, workers' compensation, unemployment compensation, workplace safety, employment discrimination, and other aspects of employment (see Chapters 33 and 34) are applicable only when an employer-employee relationship exists. These laws do not apply to an independent contractor.

Because employees who deal with third parties are normally deemed to be agents of their employers, agency law and employment law overlap considerably. Agency relationships, though, as will become apparent, can exist outside an employer-employee relationship, and thus agency law has a broader reach than employment law does.

Employer-Independent Contractor Relationships

Independent contractors are not employees because, by definition, those who hire them have no control over the details of their work performance. Section 2 of the Restatement (Second) of Agency defines an independent contractor as follows:

[An independent contractor is] a person who contracts with another to do something for him [or her] but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other's right to control with respect to his [or her] physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking. He [or she] may or may not be an agent.

Building contractors and subcontractors are independent contractors; a property owner who hires a contractor and subcontractors to complete a project does not control the details of the way they perform their work. Truck drivers who own their vehicles and hire out on a per-job basis are independent contractors, but truck drivers who drive company trucks on a regular basis usually are employees.

The relationship between a principal and an independent contractor may or may not involve an agency relationship. To illustrate: An owner of real estate who hires a real estate broker to negotiate the sale of her property not only has contracted with an independent contractor (the real estate broker) but also has established an agency relationship for the specific purpose of selling the property. Another example is an insurance agent, who is both an independent contractor and an agent of the insurance company for which he or she sells policies. (Note that an insurance broker, in contrast, normally is an agent of the person obtaining insurance and not of the insurance company.)

Determining Employee Status

The courts are frequently asked to determine whether a particular worker is an employee or an independent contractor. How a court decides this issue can have a significant effect on the rights and liabilities of the parties. For example, employers are required to pay certain taxes, such as Social Security and unemployment taxes, for employees but not for independent contractors.

Criteria Used by the Courts In deciding whether a worker is categorized as an employee or an independent contractor, courts often consider the following questions:

1. How much control does the employer exercise over the details of the work? (If the employer exercises considerable control over the details of the work and the day-to-day activities of the worker, this indicates employee status. This is perhaps the most important factor weighed by the courts in determining employee status.)
2. Is the worker engaged in an occupation or business distinct from that of the employer? (If so, this points to independent-contractor, not employee, status.)
3. Is the work usually done under the employer's direction or by a specialist without supervision? (If the work is usually done under the employer's direction, this indicates employee status.)
4. Does the employer supply the tools at the place of work? (If so, this indicates employee status.)
5. For how long is the person employed? (If the person is employed for a long period of time, this indicates employee status.)
6. What is the method of payment—by time period or at the completion of the job? (Payment by time period, such as once every two weeks or once a month, indicates employee status.)
7. What degree of skill is required of the worker? (If a great degree of skill is required, this may indicate that the person is an independent contractor hired for a specialized job and not an employee.)

Sometimes, workers may benefit from having employee status—for tax purposes and to be protected under certain employment laws, for example. As mentioned earlier, federal statutes governing employment discrimination apply only when an employer-employee relationship exists. The question in the following case was whether, for the purpose of applying one of these statutes, a television show's co-host was an employee or an independent contractor.

CASE 31.1 Alberty-Vélez v. Corporación de Puerto Rico

www.ca1.uscourts.gov^a

• Background and Facts In July 1993, Victoria Lis Alberty-Vélez (Alberty) began to co-host a new television show, Desde Mi Pueblo, on WIPR, a television station in Puerto Rico. The show profiled Puerto Rican cities and towns. Instead of signing a single contract, Alberty signed a new contract for each episode. Each contract obligated her to work a certain number of days. She was not obliged to do other work for WIPR, and WIPR was not obliged to contract with her for other work. During the filming, Alberty was responsible for providing her own clothing, shoes, accessories, hairstylist, and other services and materials. She was paid a lump sum, ranging from $400 to $550, for each episode. WIPR did not withhold income or Social Security taxes and did not provide health insurance, life insurance, a retirement plan, paid sick leave, maternity leave, or vacation pay. Alberty became pregnant, and after November 1994, WIPR stopped contracting with her. She filed a suit in a federal district court against WIPR's owner, Corporación de Puerto Rico para la Difusión Pública, alleging, among other things, discrimination on the basis of her pregnancy in violation of a federal statute. The court issued a judgment in the defendant's favor. Alberty appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT HOWARD, Circuit Judge.

* * * We * * * will apply the common law test to determine whether Alberty was WIPR's employee or an independent contractor.

*Under the common law test, a court must consider * * * the hiring party's right to control the manner and means by which the product is accomplished.* Among other factors relevant to this inquiry are the skills required; the source of the instrumentalities [means] and tools; the location of the work; the duration of the relationship between the parties; whether the hiring party has the right to assign additional projects to the hired party; the extent of the hired party's discretion over when and how long to work; the method of payment; * * * whether the work is part of the regular business of the hiring party; whether the hiring party is in business; the provision of employee benefits; and the tax treatment of the hired party. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Several factors favor classifying Alberty as an independent contractor. First, a television actress is a skilled position requiring talent and training not available on-the-job. In this regard, Alberty possesses a master's degree in public communications and journalism; is trained in dance, singing, and modeling; taught within the drama department at the University of Puerto Rico; and acted in several theater and television productions prior to her affiliation with "Desde Mi Pueblo."

Second, Alberty provided the tools and instrumentalities necessary for her to perform. Specifically, she provided, or obtained sponsors to provide, the costumes, jewelry, and other image-related supplies and services necessary for her appearance. * * *

Third, WIPR could not assign Alberty work in addition to filming "Desde Mi Pueblo." * * *

Fourth, the method of payment favors independent-contractor status. Alberty received a lump sum fee for each episode. Her compensation was based on completing the filming, not the time consumed. If she did not film an episode she did not get paid.

Fifth, WIPR did not provide Alberty with benefits. * * *

Sixth, Alberty's tax treatment suggests independent-contractor status. * * *

Despite these factors favoring independent-contractor status, Alberty argues that she was WIPR's employee because WIPR controlled the manner of her work by directing her during filming, dictated the location of her work by selecting the filming sites, and determined the hours of her work * * *. While "control" over the manner, location, and hours of work is often critical to the independent contractor/employee analysis, it must be considered in light of the work performed and the industry at issue. Considering the tasks that an actor performs, we do not believe that the sort of control identified by Alberty necessarily indicates employee status. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Alberty's work on "Desde Mi Pueblo" required her to film at the featured sites at the required times and to follow the instructions of the director. WIPR could only achieve its goal of producing its program by having Alberty follow these directions. Just as an orchestra musician is subject to the control of the conductor during concerts and rehearsals, an actor is subject to the control of the director during filming. * * *

* * * *

While no one factor is dispositive [determines the outcome], it is clear, based on the parties' entire relationship, that a reasonable fact finder could only conclude that Alberty was an independent contractor. * * * Accordingly, we conclude that Alberty was an independent contractor as a matter of law and therefore cannot maintain [this] action against WIPR.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment in WIPR's favor. The court stated, "The parties structured their relationship through the use of set length contracts that permitted Alberty the freedom to pursue other opportunities and assured WIPR that it would not have to pay Alberty for the weeks that it was not filming. Further, the lack of benefits, the method of payment, and the parties' own description of their relationship in tax documents all indicate independent-contractor status."

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Alberty had been a full-time, hourly worker and that such status was common among television hosts, but WIPR had manipulated the benefits and tax withholdings to favor independent-contractor status. How might the result have been different?

● The Global Dimension Would Alberty have been defined as an employee if she had been a foreign correspondent who reported on stories from international locations and WIPR had paid her travel and related expenses? Explain.

Criteria Used by the IRS Businesspersons should be aware that the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) has established its own criteria for determining whether a worker is an independent contractor or an employee. Although the IRS once considered twenty factors in determining a worker's status, guidelines in effect since 1997 encourage IRS examiners to look closely at just one of those factors—the degree of control the business exercises over the worker.

The IRS tends to scrutinize closely a firm's classification of a worker as an independent contractor rather than an employee because employers can avoid certain tax liabilities by hiring independent contractors instead of employees. Even when a firm has classified a worker as an independent contractor, if the IRS decides that the worker is actually an employee, the employer will be responsible for paying any applicable Social Security, withholding, and unemployment taxes. For example, in one widely publicized case, Microsoft Corporation was ordered to pay back payroll taxes for hundreds of temporary workers who had contractually agreed to work for Microsoft as independent contractors.²

Employee Status and "Works for Hire"

Under the Copyright Act of 1976, any copyrighted work created by an employee within the scope of her or his employment at the request of the employer is a "work for hire," and the employer owns the copyright to the work. In contrast, when an employer hires an independent contractor—a freelance artist, writer, or computer programmer, for example—the independent contractor normally owns the copyright. In this situation, the employer can own the copyright only if the parties agree in writing that the work is a "work for hire" and the work falls into one of nine specific categories, including audiovisual and other works.

2. Vizcaino v. U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington, 173 F3d 713 (9th Cir. 1999).

In one case, for example, Graham marketed CD-ROM discs containing compilations of software programs that are available free to the public. Graham hired James to create a file-retrieval program that allowed users to access the software on the CDs. James built into the final version of the program a notice stating that he was the author of the program and owned the copyright. Graham removed the notice. When James sold the program to another CD-ROM publisher, Graham filed a suit claiming that James's file-retrieval program was a "work for hire" and that Graham owned the copyright to the program. The court, however, decided that James—a skilled computer programmer who controlled the manner and method of his work—was an independent contractor and not an employee for hire. Thus, James owned the copyright to the file-retrieval program.³

Formation of the Agency Relationship

Agency relationships normally are consensual; in other words, they come about by voluntary consent and agreement between the parties. Generally, the agreement need not be in writing,⁴ and consideration is not required.

A person must have contractual capacity to be a principal.⁵ Those who cannot legally enter into contracts directly should not be allowed to do so indirectly through an agent. Any person can be an agent, however, regardless of whether he or she has the capacity to contract. Because an agent derives the authority to enter into contracts from the principal and because a contract made by an agent is legally viewed as a contract of the principal, it is immaterial whether the agent personally has the legal capacity to make that contract. Thus, even a minor or a person who is legally incompetent can be appointed as an agent.

3. Graham v. James, 144 F.3d 229 (2d Cir. 1998).

4. There are two main exceptions to the statement that agency agreements need not be in writing. An agency agreement must be in writing (1) whenever agency authority empowers the agent to enter into a contract that the Statute of Frauds requires to be in writing (this is called the equal dignity rule, to be discussed in the next chapter) and (2) whenever an agent is given power of attorney.

5. Note that some states allow a minor to be a principal. When a minor is permitted to be a principal, however, any resulting contracts will be voidable by the minor principal but not by the adult third party.

An agency relationship can be created for any legal purpose. An agency relationship created for a purpose that is illegal or contrary to public policy is unenforceable. If LaSalle (as principal) contracts with Burke (as agent) to sell illegal narcotics, the agency relationship is unenforceable because selling illegal narcotics is a felony and is contrary to public policy. It is also illegal for physicians and other licensed professionals to employ unlicensed agents to perform professional actions.

Generally, an agency relationship can arise in four ways: by agreement of the parties, by ratification, by estoppel, and by operation of law. We look here at each of these possibilities.

Agency by Agreement

Most agency relationships are based on an express or implied agreement that the agent will act for the principal and that the principal agrees to have the agent so act. An agency agreement can take the form of an express written contract. For example, Henchen enters into a written agreement with Vogel, a real estate agent, to sell Henchen's house. An agency relationship exists between Henchen and Vogel for the sale of the house and is detailed in a document that both parties sign.

Many express agency relationships are created by oral agreement and are not based on a written contract. Suppose that Henchen asks Grace, a gardener, to contract with others for the care of his lawn on a regular basis. If Grace agrees, an agency relationship exists between Henchen and Grace for the lawn care.

An agency agreement can also be implied by conduct. For example, a hotel expressly allows only Hans Cooper to park cars, but Hans has no employment contract there. The hotel's manager tells Hans when to work, as well as where and how to park the cars. The hotel's conduct manifests a willingness to have Hans park its customers' cars, and Hans can infer from the hotel's conduct that he has authority to act as a parking valet. Thus, there is an implied agreement that Hans is an agent for the hotel and provides valet parking services for hotel guests.

Agency by Ratification

On occasion, a person who is in fact not an agent may make a contract on behalf of another (a principal). If the principal approves or affirms that contract by word or by action, an agency relationship is created by ratification. Ratification involves a question of intent, and intent can be expressed by either words or conduct.

The basic requirements for ratification will be discussed in Chapter 32.

Agency by Estoppel

When a principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal's agent, and the third person acts to his or her detriment in reasonable reliance on that belief, the principal is "estopped to deny" (prevented from denying) the agency relationship. In such a situation, the principal's actions have created the appearance of an agency that does not in fact exist. The third person must prove that he or she reasonably believed that an agency relationship existed, however.⁶

Suppose that Jayden accompanies Grant, a seed sales representative, to call on a customer, Palko, who owns a seed store. Jayden has performed independent sales work but has never signed an employment agreement with Grant. Grant boasts to Palko that he wishes he had three more assistants "just like Jayden." By making this representation, Grant creates the impression that Jayden is his agent and has authority to solicit orders. Palko has reason to believe from Grant's statements that Jayden is an agent for Grant. Palko then places seed orders with Jayden. If Grant does not correct the impression that Jayden is an agent, Grant will be bound to fill the orders just as if Jayden were really his agent. Grant's representation to Palko has created the impression that Jayden is Grant's agent and has authority to solicit orders.

Note that the acts or declarations of a purported agent in and of themselves do not create an agency by estoppel. Rather, it is the deeds or statements of the principal that create an agency by estoppel. If Jayden walked into Palko's store and claimed to be Grant's agent, when in fact he was not, and Grant had no knowledge of Jayden's representations, Grant would not be bound to any deal struck by Jayden and Palko.

Under what other circumstances might a third party reasonably believe that a person is an agent of and has the authority to act for a principal when the person does not actually have this authority? The following case provides an illustration.

6. These concepts also apply when a person who is in fact an agent undertakes an action that is beyond the scope of her or his authority, as will be discussed in Chapter 32.

C A S E 31.2 Motorsport Marketing, Inc. v. Wiedmaier, Inc.

Missouri Court of Appeals, Western District, 2006. 195 S.W.3d 492.

- Background and Facts Wiedmaier, Inc., owns and operates Wiedmaier Truck Stop in St. Joseph, Missouri. The owners are Marsha Wiedmaier and her husband, Jerry. Their son Michael does not own an interest in the firm, but in 2002 and 2003, he worked for it as a fuel truck operator. Motorsport Marketing, Inc., sells racing collectibles and memorabilia to retail outlets. In April 2003, Michael faxed a credit application to Motorsport's sales manager, Lesa James. Michael's mother, Marsha, signed the form as "Secretary-Owner" of Wiedmaier; after she signed, Michael added himself to the list of owners. A credit line was approved. Michael formed Extreme Diecast, LLC, and told Motorsport that it was part of Wiedmaier. He then began ordering Motorsport merchandise. By early 2004, however, Michael had stopped making payments on the account, quit his job, and moved to Columbus, Ohio. Patrick Rainey, the president of Motorsport, contacted Marsha about the account, but she refused to pay. Motorsport filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Wiedmaier and others to collect the unpaid amount. The court entered a judgment in favor of Motorsport, assessing liability against the defendants for the outstanding balance of $93,388.58, plus $13,406.38 in interest and $25,165.93 in attorneys' fees. The defendants appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 31.2 CONTINUED To establish the apparent authority of a purported agent, Motorsport must show that

*(1) the principal manifested his consent to the exercise of such authority or knowingly permitted the agent to assume the exercise of such authority; (2) the person relying on this exercise of authority knew of the facts and, acting in good faith, had reason to believe, and actually believed, the agent possessed such authority; and (3) the person relying on the appearance of authority changed his position and will be injured or suffer loss if the transaction executed by the agent does not bind the principal. * * * [Emphasis added.]*

We find that Motorsport has shown that each of the criteria for establishing Michael's apparent agency has been satisfied. First, * * * [t]he credit application constituted a direct communication from Wiedmaier, Inc. (through Marsha) to Motorsport causing Motorsport to reasonably believe that Michael had authority to act for Wiedmaier, Inc.

Second, Motorsport, relying on Michael's exercise of authority and acting in good faith, had reason to believe, and actually believed, that Michael possessed such authority. Motorsport received a credit application from Wiedmaier, Inc. signed by owner Marsha Wiedmaier, listing Michael as an owner. Motorsport had no reason to believe that Michael was not an owner of Wiedmaier or was otherwise unauthorized to act on Wiedmaier, Inc.'s behalf.

Wiedmaier, Inc. argues that even if Motorsport's reliance on Michael's apparent authority was reasonably prudent on April 10, 2003, when Michael submitted the credit application, such reliance could not have been and was not reasonably prudent from and after June 23, 2003. At that time, Michael personally made the first payment on the account with a check drawn on the account of Extreme Diecast. * * * At the very least, Wiedmaier, Inc. argues, Motorsport had "red flags waving all around it suggesting that Michael was something other than the agent of Wiedmaier, Inc." * * *

We find that this argument is without merit. * * * [I]t is a common practice for a truck stop to have a separate division with a separate name to handle its diecast and other related merchandise, and * * * Michael represented that this is exactly what Extreme Diecast was. * * * This evidence explains what Wiedmaier, Inc. characterizes as "red flags" concerning Michael's authority to act on behalf of Wiedmaier, Inc., and negates any alleged duty on Motorsport's part to investigate Michael's authority.

Third, Motorsport changed its position and will be injured or suffer loss if the transaction executed by Michael does not bind Wiedmaier, Inc. Motorsport extended credit to Wiedmaier, Inc. based on its interaction with Michael and based on its belief that it was dealing with Wiedmaier, Inc. Marsha Wiedmaier has refused to pay the account balance. If the transaction executed by Michael does not bind Wiedmaier, Inc., Motorsport will suffer the loss of the balance due on the account.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court, echoing the conclusion that "Michael acted as an apparent agent of Wiedmaier, Inc. in its dealings with Motorsport." In other words, Motorsport reasonably believed that Michael acted as Wiedmaier's agent in ordering merchandise.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Motorsport's sales manager had telephoned Marsha Wiedmaier. Further suppose that Marsha had vouched for Michael's creditworthiness but informed Motorsport that she and her husband owned Wiedmaier and that Michael worked for them. How might the outcome of this case have been different in that situation?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Should the court have applied the law differently in this case if Michael had done business with Motorsport entirely online? Explain.

Agency by Operation of Law

The courts may find an agency relationship in the absence of a formal agreement in other situations as well. This may occur in family relationships. For example, suppose that one spouse purchases certain basic necessaries (such as food or clothing—see Chapter 13) and charges them to the other spouse's charge account. The courts will often rule that the latter is liable for payment for the necessaries, either because of a social policy of promoting the general welfare of the spouse or because of a legal duty to supply necessities to family members.

Agency by operation of law may also occur in emergency situations, when the agent's failure to act outside the scope of her or his authority would cause the principal substantial loss. If the agent is unable to contact the principal, the courts will often grant this emergency power. For example, a railroad engineer may contract on behalf of his or her employer for medical care for an injured motorist hit by the train. Concept Summary 31.1 reviews the various ways that agencies are formed.

Duties of Agents and Principals

Once the principal-agent relationship has been created, both parties have duties that govern their conduct. As discussed previously, the principal-agent relationship is fiduciary—one of trust. In a fiduciary relationship, each party owes the other the duty to act with the utmost good faith. In this section, we examine the various duties of agents and principals.

Agent's Duties to the Principal

Generally, the agent owes the principal five duties—performance, notification, loyalty, obedience, and accounting.

Performance An implied condition in every agency contract is the agent's agreement to use reasonable diligence and skill in performing the work. When an agent fails to perform his or her duties, liability for breach of contract may result. The degree of skill or care required of an agent is usually that expected of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Generally, this is interpreted to mean ordinary care. If an agent has represented herself or himself as possessing special skills, however, the agent is expected to exercise the degree of skill or skills claimed. Failure to do so constitutes a breach of the agent's duty.

Not all agency relationships are based on contract. In some situations, an agent acts gratuitously—that is, without payment. A gratuitous agent cannot be liable for breach of contract, as there is no contract; he or she is subject only to tort liability. Once a gratuitous agent has begun to act in an agency capacity, he or she has the duty to continue to perform in that capacity in an acceptable manner and is subject to the same standards of care and duty to perform as other agents.

For example, Bower's friend Alcott is a real estate broker. Alcott offers to sell Bower's farm at no charge. If Alcott never attempts to sell the farm, Bower has no legal cause of action to force her to do so. If Alcott does find a buyer, however, but negligently fails to follow through with the sales contract, causing the buyer to seek other property, then Bower can sue Alcott for negligence.

Notification An agent is required to notify the principal of all matters that come to her or his attention

CONCEPT SUMMARY 31.1 Formation of the Agency Relationship

Method of Formation	Description
BY AGREEMENT	The agency relationship is formed through express consent (oral or written) or implied by conduct.
BY RATIFICATION	The principal either by act or by agreement ratifies the conduct of a person who is not in fact an agent.
BY ESTOPPEL	The principal causes a third person to believe that another person is the principal's agent, and the third person acts to his or her detriment in reasonable reliance on that belief.
BY OPERATION OF LAW	The agency relationship is based on a social duty (such as the need to support family members) or formed in emergency situations when the agent is unable to contact the principal and failure to act outside the scope of the agent's authority would cause the principal substantial loss.

concerning the subject matter of the agency. This is the duty of notification, or the duty to inform. For example, suppose that Lang, an artist, is about to negotiate a contract to sell a series of paintings to Barber's Art Gallery for $25,000. Lang's agent learns that Barber is insolvent and will be unable to pay for the paintings. Lang's agent has a duty to inform Lang of Barber's insolvency because it is relevant to the subject matter of the agency—the sale of Lang's paintings. Generally, the law assumes that the principal is aware of any information acquired by the agent that is relevant to the agency—regardless of whether the agent actually passes on this information to the principal. It is a basic tenet of agency law that notice to the agent is notice to the principal.

Loyalty Loyalty is one of the most fundamental duties in a fiduciary relationship. Basically stated, the agent has the duty to act solely for the benefit of his or her principal and not in the interest of the agent or a third party. For example, an agent cannot represent two principals in the same transaction unless both know of the dual capacity and consent to it. The duty of loyalty also means that any information or knowledge acquired through the agency relationship is confidential. It is a breach of loyalty to disclose such information either during the agency relationship or after its termination. Typical examples of confidential information are trade secrets and customer lists compiled by the principal (see Chapters 8 and 13).

In short, the agent's loyalty must be undivided. The agent's actions must be strictly for the benefit of the principal and must not result in any secret profit for the agent. For example, Don Cousins contracts with Leo Hodgins, a real estate agent, to negotiate the purchase of an office building as an investment. While working for Cousins, Hodgins discovers that the property owner will sell the building only as a package deal with another parcel. If Hodgins then forms a limited partnership with his brother to buy the two properties and resell the building to Cousins, has he breached his fiduciary duties? The answer is yes, because as a real estate agent, Hodgins had a duty to communicate all offers to his principal and not to secretly purchase the property and then resell it to his principal. Hodgins is required to act in Cousins's best interests and can become the purchaser in this situation only with Cousins's knowledge and approval.⁷

Obedience When an agent is acting on behalf of the principal, the agent has a duty to follow all lawful and clearly stated instructions given by the principal. Any deviation from such instructions is a violation of this duty. During emergency situations, however, when the principal cannot be consulted, the agent may deviate from the instructions without violating this duty. Whenever instructions are not clearly stated, the agent can fulfill the duty of obedience by acting in good faith and in a manner reasonable under the circumstances.

Accounting Unless an agent and a principal agree otherwise, the agent has a duty to keep and make available to the principal an account of all property and funds received and paid out on behalf of the principal. The agent has a duty to maintain separate accounts for the principal's funds and the agent's personal funds, and the agent must not intermingle the funds in these accounts. Whenever a licensed professional (such as an attorney) violates this duty to account, he or she may be subject to disciplinary proceedings carried out by the appropriate regulatory institution (such as the state bar association) in addition to being liable to the principal (the professional's client) for failure to account.

As you read in Chapter 27, a bank acts as an agent for its customer when collecting an item presented for payment. Suppose that the item is an international check to be paid in currency subject to a variable rate of exchange. Does the bank have a duty to account for the difference between the amount paid to the customer and the amount collected on the check? That was a question in the following case.

EXTENDED Gossels v. Fleet National Bank

CASE 31.3 Appeals Court of Massachusetts, Suffolk, 2007. 69 Mass.App.Ct. 797, 876 N.E.2d 872.

GELINAS, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * * [Peter] Gossels received a check from the German government for 85,071.19 euros, drawn on Dresdner Bank of Germany. [The check was a payment in reparation for the seizure by the Third Reich of property belonging to Gossels's family.] On October 15, 1999, he took the check to a branch of Fleet [National Bank] in Boston and presented it to the international teller. * * *

* * * [The] teller failed to inform Gossels * * * that Fleet paid international checks at a “retail exchange rate” several percentage points lower than the interbank “spot rate” for foreign currency. * * *

As Gossels started to indorse the check, the international teller also incorrectly instructed Gossels not to indorse the check * * * .

* * * * *

Fleet, as collecting bank, sent the check to * * * Fleet’s foreign correspondent bank in Germany, Deutsche Bank [which sent it to Dresdner Bank. After a delay to obtain Gossels’s indorsement] Dresdner Bank debited the funds from the appropriate account and sent 85,071.19 euros to Deutsche Bank, which * * * credited 84,971.19 euros to Fleet’s account at Deutsche Bank (100 euros having been deducted as a collection fee).

On December 15, 1999, Gossels received notice from Fleet that it had credited his account with check proceeds in the amount of $81,754.77, which was based on the December 15, 1999, retail exchange rate offered by Fleet for 84,971.19 euros. The same number of euros would have been worth $88,616.45 based on the October 15, 1999, retail exchange rate offered by Fleet, or $92,023.80 based on the October 15, 1999, spot rate offered by Dresdner Bank.

[When Gossels learned of the different rates, he filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Fleet. The court entered a judgment for Gossels on a ground of negligent misrepresentation. Both parties appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.]

* * * * *

Under [Section 4–201(a) of the Uniform Commercial Code] Fleet became Gossels’s agent when he passed the check to Fleet, and Fleet accepted the check, for collection. * * *

* * * * *

As Gossels’s agent and fiduciary, Fleet was obliged to disclose fully all facts material to the transaction. *The principal has a right to be informed of all material facts known to the agent in reference to the transaction in which he is acting for his principal, and good faith requires a disclosure of such facts by the agent. Whenever facts known to the agent but not to the principal may affect the desires and conduct of the principal, the agent must communicate that information to the principal * * * particularly if the agent is engaging in any arrangement * * * adverse to the principal’s interest.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * * *

* * * Fleet was required, as a fiduciary, to advise Gossels that it would pay his international check at a retail exchange rate that was several percentage points lower than the spot rate it received for foreign currency. * * * Nowhere in the transaction did Fleet reveal that it would pay Gossels, its principal, a retail rate of exchange substantially less than the spot rate it obtained for the item, which former rate was set out daily on a “secret” rate sheet that bank employees were advised not to disclose to the public, and that it would profit by effectively keeping the difference. * * *

* * * * *

* * * By failing to disclose the rate, and by withholding the amount without giving Gossels an adequate explanation, Fleet further committed a breach of its fiduciary duty to give a complete accounting of the disposition of the funds * * * . *An agent or fiduciary is under a duty to keep and render accounts and, when called upon for an accounting, has the burden of proving that he properly disposed of funds which he is shown to have received for his principal * * * .* [Emphasis added.]

* * * [I]f there is no prior agreement with regard to the profit, the agent must not only render an account of it, but must pay the funds over to the principal. Fleet was bound to account for the amounts it kept in the rate arbitrage [the profits it earned on the transaction], and to pay it over to Gossels. * * *

* * * * *

* * * The [trial] judge’s finding * * * that Fleet is liable to Gossels for negligent misrepresentation has not been shown to be erroneous. Fleet is also liable to Gossels * * * for breach of fiduciary duty. * * * The judgment is vacated and we remand the case to the trial court for entry of a single judgment in favor of Gossels on the aforementioned claims * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. Was the specific exchange rate that the bank used important to the disposition of this case? Explain.
2. Should the court have considered whether the bank had a corrupt intent to deprive its customer of funds? Why or why not?

Principal's Duties to the Agent

The principal also has certain duties to the agent. These duties relate to compensation, reimbursement and indemnification, cooperation, and safe working conditions.

Compensation In general, when a principal requests certain services from an agent, the agent reasonably expects payment. The principal therefore has a duty to pay the agent for services rendered. For example, when an accountant or an attorney is asked to act as an agent, an agreement to compensate the agent for this service is implied. The principal also has a duty to pay that compensation in a timely manner. Except in a gratuitous agency relationship, in which the agent does not act in exchange for payment, the principal must pay the agreed-on value for the agent's services. If no amount has been expressly agreed on, then the principal owes the agent the customary compensation for such services.

Reimbursement and Indemnification

Whenever an agent disburses funds to fulfill the request of the principal or to pay for necessary expenses in the course of a reasonable performance of her or his agency duties, the principal has the duty to reimburse the agent for these payments.⁸ Agents cannot recover for expenses incurred by their own misconduct or negligence, though.

Subject to the terms of the agency agreement, the principal has the duty to indemnify (compensate) an agent for liabilities incurred because of authorized and lawful acts and transactions. For example, if the agent, on the principal's behalf, forms a contract with a third party, and the principal fails to perform the contract, the third party may sue the agent for damages. In this situation, the principal is obligated to compensate the agent for any costs incurred by the agent as a result of the principal's failure to perform the contract.

Additionally, the principal must indemnify the agent for the value of benefits that the agent confers on the principal. The amount of indemnification is usually specified in the agency contract. If it is not, the courts will look to the nature of the business and the type of benefits to determine the amount. Note that this rule applies to acts by gratuitous agents as well.

Cooperation A principal has a duty to cooperate with the agent and to assist the agent in performing his or her duties. The principal must do nothing to prevent that performance. For example, when a principal grants an agent an exclusive territory, creating an exclusive agency, the principal cannot compete with the agent or appoint or allow another agent to so compete in violation of the exclusive agency. If the principal does so, she or he will be exposed to liability for the agent's lost sales or profits.

Safe Working Conditions The common law requires the principal to provide safe working premises, equipment, and conditions for all agents and employees. The principal has a duty to inspect working areas and to warn agents and employees about any unsafe situations. When the agent is an employee, the employer's liability is frequently covered by state workers' compensation insurance, and federal and state statutes often require the employer to meet certain safety standards (see Chapter 33).

Rights and Remedies of Agents and Principals

It is said that every wrong has its remedy. In business situations, disputes between agents and principals may arise out of either contract or tort law and carry corresponding remedies. These remedies include monetary damages, termination of the agency relationship, an injunction, and required accountings.

8. This principle applies to acts by gratuitous agents as well. If a finder of a dog that becomes sick takes the dog to a veterinarian and pays the required fees for the veterinarian's services, the agent is entitled to be reimbursed by the owner of the dog for those fees.

Agent's Rights and Remedies against the Principal

For every duty of the principal, the agent has a corresponding right. Therefore, the agent has the right to be compensated, reimbursed, and indemnified and to work in a safe environment. An agent also has the right to perform agency duties without interference by the principal.

Tort and Contract Remedies Remedies of the agent for breach of duty by the principal follow normal contract and tort remedies. For example, suppose that Aaron Hart, a builder who has just constructed a new house, contracts with a real estate agent, Fran Boller, to sell the house. The contract calls for the agent to have an exclusive, ninety-day listing and to receive 6 percent of the selling price when the home is sold. Boller holds several open houses and shows the home to a number of potential buyers. One month before the ninety-day listing terminates, Hart agrees to sell the house to another buyer—not one to whom Boller has shown the house—after the ninety-day listing expires. Hart and the buyer agree that Hart will reduce the price of the house by 3 percent because he will sell it directly and thus will not have to pay Boller's commission. In this situation, if Boller learns of Hart's actions, she can terminate the agency relationship and sue Hart for damages—including the 6 percent commission she should have earned on the sale of the house.

Demand for an Accounting An agent can also withhold further performance and demand that the principal give an accounting. For example, a sales agent may demand an accounting if the agent and principal disagree on the amount of commissions the agent should have received for sales made during a specific period of time.

No Right to Specific Performance When the principal-agent relationship is not contractual, the agent has no right to specific performance. An agent can recover for past services and future damages but cannot force the principal to allow him or her to continue acting as an agent.

Principal's Rights and Remedies against the Agent

In general, a principal has contract remedies for an agent's breach of fiduciary duties. The principal also has tort remedies if the agent commits misrepresentation, negligence, deceit, libel, slander, or trespass. In addition, any breach of a fiduciary duty by an agent may justify the principal's termination of the agency. The main actions available to the principal are constructive trust, avoidance, and indemnification.

Constructive Trust Anything that an agent obtains by virtue of the employment or agency relationship belongs to the principal. An agent commits a breach of fiduciary duty if he or she secretly retains benefits or profits that, by right, belong to the principal. For example, Andrews, a purchasing agent for Metcalf, receives cash rebates from a customer. If Andrews keeps the rebates for himself, he violates his fiduciary duty to his principal, Metcalf. On finding out about the cash rebates, Metcalf can sue Andrews and recover them.

Avoidance When an agent breaches the agency agreement or agency duties under a contract, the principal has a right to avoid any contract entered into with the agent. This right of avoidance is at the election of the principal.

Indemnification In certain situations, when a principal is sued by a third party for an agent's negligent conduct, the principal can sue the agent for an equal amount of damages. This is called indemnification. The same holds true if the agent violates the principal's instructions. For example, Parke (the principal) owns a used-car lot where Moore (the agent) works as a salesperson. Parke tells Moore to make no warranties for the used cars. Moore is eager to make a sale to Walters, a customer, and adds a 50,000-mile warranty for the car's engine. Parke may still be liable to Walters for engine failure, but if Walters sues Parke, Parke normally can then sue Moore for indemnification for violating his instructions.

Sometimes, it is difficult to distinguish between instructions of the principal that limit an agent's authority and those that are merely advice. For example, Gutierrez (the principal) owns an office supply company; Logan (the agent) is the manager. Gutierrez tells Logan, "Don't purchase any more inventory this month." Gutierrez goes on vacation. A large order comes in from a local business, and the inventory on hand is insufficient to meet it. What is Logan to do? In this situation, Logan probably has the inherent authority to purchase more inventory despite Gutierrez's command. It is unlikely that Logan would be required to indemnify Gutierrez in the event that the local business subsequently canceled the order.

REVIEWING Agency Formation and Duties

James Blatt hired Marilyn Scott to sell insurance for the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. Their contract stated, "Nothing in this contract shall be construed as creating the relationship of employer and employee." The contract was terminable at will by either party. Scott financed her own office and staff, was paid according to performance, had no taxes withheld from her checks, and could legally sell products of Massachusetts Mutual's competitors. But when Blatt learned that Scott was simultaneously selling insurance for Perpetual Life Insurance Corp., one of Massachusetts Mutual's fiercest competitors, Blatt withheld client contact information from Scott that would have assisted her insurance sales for Massachusetts Mutual. Scott complained to Blatt that he was inhibiting her ability to sell insurance for Massachusetts Mutual. Blatt subsequently terminated their contract. Scott filed a suit in a New York state court against Blatt and Massachusetts Mutual. Scott claimed that she had lost sales for Massachusetts Mutual—and her commissions—as a result of Blatt's withholding contact information from her. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Who is the principal, and who is the agent in this scenario? By which method was an agency relationship formed between Scott and Blatt?
2. What facts would the court consider the most important in determining whether Scott was an employee or an independent contractor?
3. How would the court most likely rule on Scott's employee status?
4. Which of the four duties that Blatt owed Scott in their agency relationship has probably been breached?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

31-1. Paul Gett is a well-known, wealthy financial expert. Adam Wade, Gett's friend, tells Timothy Brown that he is Gett's agent for the purchase of rare coins and shows Brown a local newspaper clipping mentioning Gett's interest in coin collecting. Brown, knowing of Wade's friendship with Gett, contracts with Wade to sell a rare coin valued at $25,000 to Gett. Wade takes the coin and disappears with it. On the payment due date, Brown seeks to collect from Gett. Gett denies liability and claims that Wade was never his agent. Discuss fully whether an agency was in existence at the time the contract for the rare coin was made.

Peter hires Alice as an agent to sell a piece of property he owns. The price is to be at least $30,000. Alice discovers that the fair market value of Peter's property is actually at least $45,000 and could be higher because a shopping mall is going to be built nearby. Alice forms a real estate partnership with her cousin Carl, and she prepares for Peter's signature a contract for the sale of the property to Carl for $32,000. Peter signs the contract. Just before closing and passage of title, Peter learns about the shopping mall and the increased fair market value of his property. Peter refuses to deed the property to Carl. Carl claims that Alice, as agent, solicited a price above that agreed on when the agency was created and that the contract is therefore binding and enforceable. Discuss fully whether Peter is bound to this contract.

- For a sample answer to Question 31-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

31-3. Ankir is hired by Jamison as a traveling salesperson. Ankir not only solicits orders but also delivers the goods and collects payments from his customers. Ankir deposits all payments in his private checking account and at the end of each month draws sufficient cash from his bank to cover the payments made. Jamison is totally unaware of this procedure. Because of a slowdown in the economy, Jamison tells all his salespeople to offer 20 percent discounts on orders. Ankir solicits orders, but he offers only 15 percent discounts, pocketing the extra 5 percent paid by customers. Ankir has not lost any orders by this practice, and he is rated as one of Jamison's top salespersons. Jamison learns of Ankir's actions. Discuss fully Jamison's rights in this matter.

31-4. Agency Formation. Ford Motor Credit Co. is a subsidiary of Ford Motor Co. with its own offices, officers, and directors. Ford Credit buys contracts and leases of automobiles entered into by dealers and consumers. Ford Credit also provides inventory financing for dealers' purchases of Ford and non-Ford vehicles and makes loans to Ford and non-Ford dealers. Dealers and consumers are not required to finance their purchases or leases of Ford vehicles through Ford Credit. Ford Motor is not a party to the agreements between Ford Credit and its customers and does not directly receive any payments under those agreements. Also, Ford Credit is not subject to any agreement with Ford Motor "restricting or conditioning" its ability to finance the dealers' inventories or the consumers' purchases or leases of vehicles. A number of plaintiffs filed a product liability suit in a Missouri state court against Ford Motor. Ford Motor claimed that the court did not have venue. The plaintiffs asserted that Ford Credit, which had an office in the jurisdiction, acted as Ford's "agent for the transaction of its usual and customary business" there. Is Ford Credit an agent of Ford Motor? Discuss. [State ex rel. Ford Motor Co. v. Bacon, 63 S.W.3d 641 (Mo. 2002)]

31-5. Agent's Duties to Principal. Sam and Theresa Daigle decided to build a home in Cameron Parish, Louisiana. To obtain financing, they contacted Trinity United Mortgage Co. At a meeting with Joe Diez on Trinity's behalf, on July 18, 2001, the Daigles signed a temporary loan agreement with Union Planters Bank. Diez assured them that they did not need to make payments on this loan until their house was built and that permanent financing had been secured. Because the Daigles did not make payments on the Union loan, Trinity declined to make the permanent loan. Meanwhile, Diez left Trinity's employ. On November 1, the Daigles moved into their new house. They tried to contact Diez at Trinity but were told that he was unavailable and would get back to them. Three weeks later, Diez came to the Daigles' home and had them sign documents that they believed were to secure a permanent loan but that were actually an application with Diez's new employer. Union filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against the Daigles for failing to pay on its loan. The Daigles paid Union, obtained permanent financing through another source, and filed a suit against Trinity to recover the cost. Who should have told the Daigles that Diez was no longer Trinity's agent? Could Trinity be liable to the Daigles on this basis? Explain. [*Daigle v. 31-6. Principal's Duties to Agent. Josef Boehm was an officer and the majority shareholder of Alaska Industrial Hardware, Inc. (AIH), in Anchorage, Alaska. In August 2001, Lincolnshire Management, Inc., in New York, created

AIH Acquisition Corp. to buy AIH. The three firms signed a "commitment letter" to negotiate "a definitive stock purchase agreement" (SPA). In September, Harold Snow and Ronald Braley began to work, on Boehm's behalf, with Vincent Coyle, an agent for AIH Acquisition, to produce an SPA. They exchanged many drafts and dozens of e-mails. Finally, in February 2002, Braley told Coyle that Boehm would sign the SPA "early next week." That did not occur, however, and at the end of March, after more negotiations and drafts, Boehm demanded more money. AIH Acquisition agreed and, following more work by the agents, another SPA was drafted. In April, the parties met in Anchorage. Boehm still refused to sign. AIH Acquisition and others filed a suit in a federal district court against AIH. Did Boehm violate any of the duties that principals owe to their agents? If so, which duty, and how was it violated? Explain. [AIH Acquisition Corp., LLC v. Alaska Industrial Hardware, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (S.D.N.Y. 2004)]

In July 2001, John Warren viewed a condominium in Woodland Hills, California, as a potential buyer. Hildegard Merrill was the agent for the seller. Because Warren's credit rating was poor, Merrill told him he needed a co-borrower to obtain a mortgage at a reasonable rate. Merrill said that her daughter Charmaine would "go on title" until the loan and sale were complete if Warren would pay her $10,000. Merrill also offered to defer her commission on the sale as a loan to Warren so that he could make a 20 percent down payment on the property. He agreed to both plans. Merrill applied for and secured the mortgage in Charmaine's name alone by misrepresenting her daughter's address, business, and income. To close the sale, Merrill had Warren remove his name from the title to the property. In October, Warren moved into the condominium, repaid Merrill the amount of her deferred commission, and began paying the mortgage. Within a few months, Merrill had Warren evicted. Warren filed a suit in a California state court against Merrill and Charmaine. Who among these parties was in an agency relationship? What is the basic duty that an agent owes a principal? Was the duty breached here? Explain. [Warren v. Merrill, 143 Cal.App.4th 96, 49 Cal.Rptr.3d 122 (2 Dist. 2006)]

31-8. Agent's Duties to Principal. Su Ru Chen owned the Lucky Duck Fortune Cookie Factory in Everett, Massachusetts, which made Chinese-style fortune cookies for restaurants. In November 2001, Chen listed the business for sale with Bob Sun, a real estate broker, for $35,000. Sun's daughter Frances and her fiancé, Chiu Chung Chan, decided that Chan would buy the business. Acting as a broker on Chen's (the seller's) behalf, Frances asked about the Lucky Duck's finances. Chen said that each month the business sold at least 1,000 boxes of cookies at a $2,000 profit. Frances negotiated a price of $23,000, which Chan (her fiancé) paid. When Chan began to operate the Lucky Duck, it became clear that the demand for the cookies was actually about 500 boxes per month—a rate at which the business would suffer losses. Less than two months later, the factory closed. Chan filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Chen, alleging fraud, among other things. Chan's proof included Frances's testimony as to what Chen had said to her. Chen objected to the admission of this testimony. What is the basis for this objection? Should the court admit the testimony? Why or why not? [Chan v. Chen, 70 Mass.App.Ct. 79, 872 N.E.2d 1153 (2007)]

31-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Emergency One, Inc. (EO), makes fire and rescue vehicles. Western Fire Truck, Inc., contracted with EO to be its exclusive dealer in Colorado and Wyoming through December 2003. James Costello, a Western salesperson, was authorized to order EO vehicles for his customers. Without informing Western, Costello e-mailed EO about Western's difficulties in obtaining cash to fund its operations. He asked about the viability of Western's contract and his possible employment with EO. On EO's request, and in disregard of Western's instructions, Costello sent some payments for EO vehicles directly to EO. In addition, Costello, with EO's help, sent a competing bid to a potential Western customer. EO's representative e-mailed Costello, "You have my permission to kick [Western's] ass." In April 2002, EO terminated its contract with Western, which, after reviewing Costello's e-mail, fired Costello. Western filed a suit in a Colorado state court against Costello and EO, alleging, among other things, that Costello breached his duty as an agent and that EO aided and abetted the breach. [Western Fire Truck, Inc. v. Emergency One, Inc., 134 P.3d 570 (Colo.App. 2006)]

- Was there an agency relationship between Western and Costello? In determining whether an agency relationship exists, is the right to control or the fact of control more important? Explain.
- Did Costello owe Western a duty? If so, what was the duty? Did Costello breach it? How?
- A Colorado state statute allows a court to award punitive damages in "circumstances of fraud, malice, or willful and wanton conduct." Did any of these circumstances exist in this case? Should punitive damages be assessed against either defendant? Why or why not?

Liability to Third Parties and Termination

As discussed in the previous chapter, the law of agency focuses on the special relationship that exists between a principal and an agent—how the relationship is formed and the duties the principal and agent assume once the relationship is established. This chapter deals with another important aspect of agency law—the liability of principals and agents to third parties.

We look first at the liability of principals for contracts formed by agents with third parties. Generally, the liability of the principal will depend on whether the agent was authorized to form the contracts.

The second part of the chapter deals with an agent's liability to third parties in contract and tort, and the principal's liability to third parties because of an agent's torts. The chapter concludes with a discussion of how agency relationships are terminated.

Scope of Agent's Authority

The liability of a principal to third parties with whom an agent contracts depends on whether the agent had the authority to enter into legally binding contracts on the principal's behalf. An agent's authority can be either actual (express or implied) or apparent. If an agent contracts outside the scope of his or her authority, the principal may still become liable by ratifying the contract.

Express Authority

Express authority is authority declared in clear, direct, and definite terms. Express authority can be given orally or in writing. In most states, the equal dignity rule requires that if the contract being executed is or must be in writing, then the agent's authority must also be in writing. Failure to comply with the equal dignity rule can make a contract voidable at the option of the principal. The law regards the contract at that point as a mere offer. If the principal decides to accept the offer, the acceptance must be ratified, or affirmed, in writing.

Assume that Pattberg (the principal) orally asks Austin (the agent) to sell a ranch that Pattberg owns.

Austin finds a buyer and signs a sales contract (a contract for an interest in realty must be in writing) on behalf of Pattberg to sell the ranch. The buyer cannot enforce the contract unless Pattberg subsequently ratifies Austin's agency status in writing. Once the contract is ratified, either party can enforce rights under the contract.

Modern business practice allows an exception to the equal dignity rule. An executive officer of a corporation, when acting for the corporation in an ordinary business situation, is not required to obtain written authority from the corporation. In addition, the equal dignity rule does not apply when the agent acts in the presence of the principal or when the agent's act of signing is merely perfunctory. Thus, if Healy (the principal) negotiates a contract but is called out of town the day it is to be signed and orally authorizes Scougall to sign, the oral authorization is sufficient.

Power of Attorney Giving an agent a power of attorney confers express authority.¹ The power of attorney is a written document and is usually notarized. (A document is notarized when a notary public—a public official authorized to attest to the authenticity of signatures—signs and dates the document and imprints it with her or his seal of authority.) Most states have statutory provisions for creating a power of attorney. A power of attorney can be special (permitting the agent to perform specified acts only), or it can be general (permitting the agent to transact all business for the principal). Because of the extensive authority granted to an agent by a general power of attorney (see Exhibit 32-1), it should be used with great caution and usually only in exceptional circumstances. Ordinarily, a power of attorney terminates on the incapacity or death of the person giving the power.²

Implied Authority

An agent has the implied authority to do what is reasonably necessary to carry out express authority and

2. A durable power of attorney, however, continues to be effective despite the principal's incapacity. An elderly person, for example, might grant a durable power of attorney to provide for the handling of property and investments or specific health-care needs should he or she become incompetent (see Chapter 50).

accomplish the objectives of the agency. Authority can also be implied by custom or inferred from the position the agent occupies. For example, Carlson is employed by Packard Grocery to manage one of its stores. Packard has not expressly stated that Carlson has authority to contract with third persons. Nevertheless, authority to manage a business implies authority to do what is reasonably required (as is customary or can be inferred from a manager's position) to operate the business. This includes making contracts for hiring personnel, for buying merchandise and equipment, and even for advertising the products sold in the store.

In general, implied authority is authority customarily associated with the position occupied by the agent or authority that can be inferred from the express authority given to the agent to perform fully his or her duties. For example, an agent who has authority to solicit orders for goods sold by the principal generally would not have the authority to collect payments for the goods unless the agent possesses the goods. The test is whether it was reasonable for the agent to believe that she or he had the authority to enter into the contract in question.

Also note that an agent's implied authority cannot contradict his or her express authority. Thus, if a principal has limited an agent's authority—by forbidding a manager to enter contracts to hire additional workers, for example—then the fact that managers customarily would have such authority is irrelevant.

Apparent Authority and Estoppel

Actual authority (express or implied) arises from what the principal makes clear to the agent. Apparent authority, in contrast, arises from what the principal causes a third party to believe. An agent has apparent authority when the principal, by either word or action, causes a third party reasonably to believe that the agent has authority to act, even though the agent has no express or implied authority. If the third party changes his or her position in reliance on the principal's representations, the principal may be estopped (prevented) from denying that the agent had authority.

Apparent authority usually comes into existence through a principal's pattern of conduct over time. For example, Bain is a traveling salesperson with the authority to solicit orders for a principal's goods. Because she does not carry any goods with her, she normally would not have the implied authority to collect payments from customers on behalf of the principal. Suppose that she does accept payments from Corgley Enterprises, however, and submits them to the principal's accounting department for processing. If the principal does nothing to stop Bain from continuing this practice, a pattern develops over time, and the principal confers apparent authority on Bain to accept payments from Corgley.

At issue in the following case was a question of apparent authority or, as the court referred to it, "ostensible agency."

C A S E 32.1 Ermoian v. Desert Hospital

Court of Appeal of California, Fourth District, Division 2, 2007.
152 Cal.App.4th 475, 61 Cal.Rptr.3d 754.

- Background and Facts In 1990, Desert Hospital in California established a comprehensive perinatal services program (CPSP) to provide obstetrical care to women who were uninsured (perinatal is often defined as relating to the period from about the twenty-eighth week of pregnancy to around one month after birth). The CPSP was set up in an office suite across from the hospital and named "Desert Hospital Outpatient Maternity Services Clinic." The hospital contracted with a corporation controlled by Dr. Morton Gubin, which employed Dr. Masami Ogata, to provide obstetrical services. In January 1994, Jackie Shahan went to the hospital's emergency room because of cramping and other symptoms. The emergency room physician told Shahan that she was pregnant and referred her to the clinic. Shahan visited the clinic throughout her pregnancy. On May 15, Shahan's baby, named Amanda, was born with brain abnormalities that left her severely mentally retarded and unable to care for herself. Her conditions could not have been prevented, treated, or cured in utero. Amanda filed a suit in a California state court against the hospital and others, alleging "wrongful life." She claimed that the defendants negligently failed to inform her mother of her abnormalities before her birth, depriving her mother of the opportunity to make an informed choice to terminate the pregnancy. The court ruled in the defendants' favor, holding, among other things, that the hospital was not liable because Drs. Gubin and Ogata were not its employees.

Amanda appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, contending in part that the physicians were the hospital's "ostensible agents."

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT*KING, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Agency may be either actual or ostensible [apparent]. Actual agency exists when the agent is really employed by the principal. Here, there was evidence that the physicians were not employees of the Hospital, but were physicians with a private practice who contracted with the Hospital to perform obstetric services at the clinic. The written contract between the Hospital and Dr. Gubin's corporation (which employed Dr. Ogata) describes Dr. Gubin and his corporation as "independent contractors with, and not as employees of, [the] Hospital." [Maria Sterling, a registered nurse at the clinic and Shahan's CPSP case coordinator] testified that Drs. Gubin and Ogata, not the Hospital, provided the obstetric services to the clinic's patients. Donna McCloudy, a director of nursing [who set up the CPSP] at the Hospital, testified that while the Hospital provided some aspects of the CPSP services, "independent physicians * * * provided the obstetrical care * * * ." Based upon such evidence, the [trial] court reasonably concluded that the physicians were not the employees or actual agents of the Hospital for purposes of vicarious [indirect] liability.

Ostensible [apparent] agency on the other hand, may be implied from the facts of a particular case, and if a principal by his acts has led others to believe that he has conferred authority upon an agent, he cannot be heard to assert, as against third parties who have relied thereon in good faith, that he did not intend to confer such power * * * . The doctrine establishing the principles of liability for the acts of an ostensible agent rests on the doctrine of estoppel. The essential elements are representations by the principal, justifiable reliance thereon by a third party, and change of position or injury resulting from such reliance. Before recovery can be had against the principal for the acts of an ostensible agent, the person dealing with an agent must do so with belief in the agent's authority and this belief must be a reasonable one. Such belief must be generated by some act or neglect by the principal sought to be charged and the person relying on the agent's apparent authority must not be guilty of neglect. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Here, the Hospital held out the clinic and the personnel in the clinic as part of the Hospital. Furthermore, it was objectively reasonable for Shahan to believe that Drs. Gubin and Ogata were employees of the Hospital. The clinic was located across the street from the Hospital. It used the same name as the Hospital and labeled itself as an outpatient clinic. Numerous professionals at the clinic were employees of the Hospital. [Carol Cribbs, a comprehensive perinatal health worker at the clinic] and Sterling indicated to Shahan that they were employees of the Hospital and that the program was run by the Hospital. Sterling personally set up all of Shahan's appointments at the main Hospital rather than giving Shahan a referral for the various tests. Shahan was referred by individuals in the emergency room specifically to Dr. Gubin. When she called for an appointment she was told by the receptionist that she was calling the Hospital outpatient clinic which was the clinic of Dr. Gubin. On days when Shahan would see either Dr. Gubin or Dr. Ogata at the clinic, she would also see either Cribbs or Sterling, whom she knew were employed by the Hospital.

* * * At her first appointment she signed a document titled "patient rights and responsibilities," which would unambiguously lead a patient to the conclusion that the clinic "was a one-stop shop for the patient," and that all individuals at the clinic were connected with the Hospital. All of Shahan's contacts with the physicians were at the Hospital-run clinic. Most, if not all, of the physician contacts occurred in conjunction with the provision of other services by either Sterling or Cribbs. The entire appearance created by the Hospital, and those associated with it, was that the Hospital was the provider of the obstetrical care to Shahan.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court decided that, contrary to the lower court's finding, Drs. Gubin and Ogata were "ostensible agents of the Hospital." The appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling, however, on Amanda's "wrongful life" claim, concluding that the physicians were not negligent in failing to advise Shahan to have an elective abortion.

● The Ethical Dimension Does a principal have an ethical responsibility to inform an unaware third party that an apparent (ostensible) agent does not in fact have authority to act on the principal's behalf?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Could Amanda have established Drs. Gubin and Ogata's apparent authority if Desert Hospital had maintained a Web site that advertised the services of the CPSP clinic and stated clearly that the physicians were not its employees? Explain.

Emergency Powers

When an unforeseen emergency demands action by the agent to protect or preserve the property and rights of the principal, but the agent is unable to communicate with the principal, the agent has emergency power. For example, Fulsom is an engineer for Pacific Drilling Company. While Fulsom is acting within the scope of his employment, he is severely injured in an accident at an oil rig many miles from home. Dudley, the rig supervisor, directs Thompson, a physician, to give medical aid to Fulsom and to charge Pacific for the medical services. Dudley, an agent, has no express or implied authority to bind the principal, Pacific Drilling, for Thompson's medical services. Because of the emergency situation, however, the law recognizes Dudley as having authority to act appropriately under the circumstances.

Ratification

Ratification occurs when the principal affirms, or accepts responsibility for, an agent's unauthorized act. When ratification occurs, the principal is bound to the agent's act, and the act is treated as if it had been authorized by the principal from the outset. Ratification can be either express or implied.

If the principal does not ratify the contract, the principal is not bound, and the third party's agreement with the agent is viewed as merely an unaccepted offer. Because the third party's agreement is an unaccepted offer, the third party can revoke it at any time, without liability, before the principal ratifies the contract. The agent, however, may be liable to the third party for misrepresenting her or his authority.

The requirements for ratification can be summarized as follows:

1. The agent must have acted on behalf of an identified principal who subsequently ratifies the action.
2. The principal must know all of the material facts involved in the transaction. If a principal ratifies a contract without knowing all of the facts, the principal can rescind (cancel) the contract.³

3. The principal must affirm the agent's act in its entirety.
4. The principal must have the legal capacity to authorize the transaction at the time the agent engages in the act and at the time the principal ratifies. The third party must also have the legal capacity to engage in the transaction.
5. The principal's affirmation (ratification) must occur before the third party withdraws from the transaction.
6. The principal must observe the same formalities when approving the act done by the agent as would have been required to authorize it initially.

Concept Summary 32.1 on the next page summarizes the rules concerning an agent's authority to bind the principal and a third party.

Liability for Contracts

Liability for contracts formed by an agent depends on how the principal is classified and on whether the actions of the agent were authorized or unauthorized. Principals are classified as disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed.⁴

A disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is known by the third party at the time the contract is made by the agent. A partially disclosed principal is a principal whose identity is not known by the third party, but the third party knows that the agent is or may be acting for a principal at the time the contract is made. An undisclosed principal is a principal whose

3. If the third party has changed position in reliance on the apparent contract, however, the principal can rescind but must reimburse the third party for any costs.

4. Restatement (Second) of Agency, Section 4.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 32.1

Authority of an Agent to Bind the Principal and a Third Party

Authority of Agent	Definition	Effect on Principal and Third Party
EXPRESS AUTHORITY	Authority expressly given by the principal to the agent.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
IMPLIED AUTHORITY	Authority implied (1) by custom, (2) from the position in which the principal has placed the agent, or (3) because such authority is necessary if the agent is to carry out expressly authorized duties and responsibilities.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
APPARENT AUTHORITY	Authority created when the conduct of the principal leads a third party to believe that the principal's agent has authority.	Principal and third party are bound in contract.
UNAUTHORIZED ACTS	Acts committed by an agent that are outside the scope of his or her express, implied, or apparent authority.	Principal and third party are not bound in contract— unless the principal ratifies prior to the third party's withdrawal.

identity is totally unknown by the third party, and the third party has no knowledge that the agent is acting in an agency capacity at the time the contract is made.

Authorized Acts

If an agent acts within the scope of her or his authority, normally the principal is obligated to perform the contract regardless of whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed. Whether the agent may also be held liable under the contract, however, depends on the disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed status of the principal.

Disclosed or Partially Disclosed Principal

A disclosed or partially disclosed principal is liable to a third party for a contract made by the agent. If the principal is disclosed, an agent has no contractual liability for the nonperformance of the principal or the third party. If the principal is partially disclosed, in most states the agent is also treated as a party to the contract, and the third party can hold the agent liable for contractual nonperformance.⁵

Undisclosed Principal When neither the fact of an agency relationship nor the identity of the principal is disclosed, the undisclosed principal is bound to perform just as if the principal had been fully disclosed at the time the contract was made.

When a principal's identity is undisclosed and the agent is forced to pay the third party, the agent is entitled to be indemnified (compensated) by the principal. The principal had a duty to perform, even though his or her identity was undisclosed,⁶ and failure to do so will make the principal ultimately liable. Once the undisclosed principal's identity is revealed, the third party generally can elect to hold either the principal or the agent liable on the contract.

Conversely, the undisclosed principal can require the third party to fulfill the contract, unless (1) the undisclosed principal was expressly excluded as a party in the written contract; (2) the contract is a negotiable instrument signed by the agent with no indication of signing in a representative capacity;⁷ or (3) the performance of the agent is personal to the contract, allowing the third party to refuse the principal's performance.

6. If the agent is a gratuitous agent, and the principal accepts the benefits of the agent's contract with a third party, then the principal will be liable to the agent on the theory of quasi contract (see Chapter 10).

7. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), only the agent is liable if the instrument neither names the principal nor shows that the agent signed in a representative capacity [UCC 3-402(b)(2)].

5. Restatement (Second) of Agency, Section 321.

Unauthorized Acts

If an agent has no authority but nevertheless contracts with a third party, the principal cannot be held liable on the contract. It does not matter whether the principal was disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed. The agent is liable, however. For example, Scammon signs a contract for the purchase of a truck, purportedly acting as an agent under authority granted by Johnson. In fact, Johnson has not given Scammon any such authority. Johnson refuses to pay for the truck, claiming that Scammon had no authority to purchase it. The seller of the truck is entitled to hold Scammon liable for payment.

If the principal is disclosed or partially disclosed, the agent is liable as long as the third party relied on the agency status. The agent's liability here is based on the theory of breach of the implied warranty of authority, not on breach of the contract itself.⁸ The agent's implied warranty of authority can be breached intentionally or by a good faith mistake.⁹ For example, Kilmer (the principal) is a reclusive artist who hires Higgs (the agent) to solicit offers for particular paintings from various galleries, but does not authorize him to enter into sales agreements. Olaf, a gallery owner, desires to buy two of Kilmer's paintings right away for an upcoming show. Higgs tells Olaf that he will draw up a sales contract. By doing so, Higgs impliedly warrants that he has the authority to enter into sales contracts on behalf of Kilmer. If it later turns out that Kilmer does not wish to ratify the sales contract signed by Higgs, Olaf cannot hold Kilmer liable, but he can hold Higgs liable for breaching the implied warranty of authority.

Note that if the third party knows at the time the contract is made that the agent does not have authority, then the agent is not liable. Similarly, if the agent expresses to the third party uncertainty as to the extent of her or his authority, the agent is not personally liable.

Actions by E-Agents

Although standard agency principles once applied only to human agents, today these same agency principles are being applied to e-agents. An electronic agent, or e-agent, is a semiautonomous computer program that is capable of executing specific tasks. E-agents used in e-commerce include software that can search through many databases and retrieve only relevant information for the user.

The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA), which has been adopted at least in part by the majority of the states (see Chapter 19), includes several provisions relating to the principal's liability for the actions of e-agents. Section 15 of the UETA states that e-agents may enter into binding agreements on behalf of their principals. Presumably, then—at least in those states that have adopted the act—the principal will be bound by the terms in a contract entered into by an e-agent. Thus, if you place an order over the Internet, the company (principal) whose system took the order via an e-agent cannot claim that it did not receive your order.

The UETA also stipulates that if an e-agent does not provide an opportunity to prevent errors at the time of the transaction, the other party to the transaction can avoid the transaction. Therefore, if an e-agent fails to provide an on-screen confirmation of a purchase or sale, the other party can avoid the effect of any errors. For example, Finig wants to purchase three each of three different items (a total of nine items). The e-agent mistakenly records an order for thirty-three of a single item and does not provide an on-screen verification of the order. If thirty-three items are then sent to Finig, he can avoid the contract to purchase them.

Liability for Torts and Crimes

Obviously, any person, including an agent, is liable for his or her own torts and crimes. Whether a principal can also be held liable for an agent's torts and crimes depends on several factors, which we examine here. In some situations, a principal may be held liable not only for the torts of an agent but also for the torts committed by an independent contractor.

Principal's Tortious Conduct

A principal conducting an activity through an agent may be liable for harm resulting from the principal's own negligence or recklessness. Thus, a principal may be liable for giving improper instructions, authorizing the use of improper materials or tools, or establishing improper rules that result in the agent's committing a tort. For instance, if Jack knows that Lucy cannot drive but nevertheless tells her to use the company truck to deliver some equipment to a customer, he will be liable for his own negligence to anyone injured by her negligent driving.

8. The agent is not liable on the contract because the agent was never intended personally to be a party to the contract.

9. If the agent intentionally misrepresents his or her authority, then the agent can also be liable in tort for fraud.

Principal's Authorization of Agent's Tortious Conduct

Similarly, a principal who authorizes an agent to commit a tort may be liable to persons or property injured thereby, because the act is considered to be the principal's. For example, Selkow directs his agent, Warren, to cut the corn on specific acreage, which neither of them has the right to do. The harvest is therefore a trespass (a tort), and Selkow is liable to the owner of the corn.

Note that an agent acting at the principal's direction can be liable as a tortfeasor (one who commits a wrong, or tort), along with the principal, for committing the tortious act even if the agent was unaware that the act was wrong. Assume in the above example that Warren, the agent, did not know that Selkow lacked the right to harvest the corn. Warren can still be held liable to the owner of the field for damages, along with Selkow, the principal.

Liability for Agent's Misrepresentation

A principal is exposed to tort liability whenever a third person sustains a loss due to the agent's misrepresentation. The principal's liability depends on whether the agent was actually or apparently authorized to make representations and whether the representations were made within the scope of the agency. The principal is always directly responsible for an agent's misrepresentation made within the scope of the agent's authority.

Assume that Bassett is a demonstrator for Moore's products. Moore sends Bassett to a home show to demonstrate the products and to answer questions from consumers. Moore has given Bassett authority to make statements about the products. If Bassett makes only true representations, all is fine; but if he makes false claims, Moore will be liable for any injuries or damages sustained by third parties in reliance on Bassett's false representations.

Apparent Implied Authority When a principal has placed an agent in a position of apparent authority—making it possible for the agent to defraud a third party—the principal may also be liable for the agent's fraudulent acts. For example, Frendak is a loan officer at First Security Bank. In the ordinary course of the job, Frendak approves and services loans and has access to the credit records of all customers. Frendak falsely represents to a borrower, McMillan, that the bank feels insecure about McMillan's loan and intends to call it in unless McMillan provides additional collateral, such as stocks and bonds. McMillan gives Frendak numerous stock certificates, which Frendak keeps in her own possession and later uses to make personal investments. The bank is liable to McMillan for losses sustained on the stocks even though the bank was unaware of the fraudulent scheme.

If, in contrast, Frendak had been a recently hired junior bank teller rather than a loan officer when she told McMillan that the bank required additional security for the loan, McMillan would not have been justified in relying on her representation. In that situation, the bank normally would not be liable to McMillan for the losses sustained.

The following case focused on a partner's potential liability for claims against the partnership arising from the torts of its manager. The partner argued that he could not be liable because the manager did not have the apparent authority to commit torts. Among those with claims against the firm was the partner's mother.

CASE 32.2 In re Selheimer & Co.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, 2005. 319 Bankr. 395.

- Background and Facts Selheimer & Company was formed as a partnership in 1967 to act as a securities broker-dealer, buying and selling stocks and bonds and providing other financial services, in Pennsylvania. In 1994, during an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), the firm closed.^a Perry Selheimer, the managing partner, was charged with various crimes and pleaded guilty to mail fraud. Other partners, including Edward Murphy, and the firm's clients, including Murphy's mother, Jeanne Murphy, filed claims with the Securities Investor Protection Corporation (SIPC) to be reimbursed for their losses. The SIPC advanced more than $250,000 to pay these claims. Because the firm had more than $1 million in claims outstanding, the SIPC petitioned the firm into involuntary bankruptcy in 2002. Because the firm had few assets, the SIPC asked the court to rule that the personal assets of the individual partners could be used to cover the liability.^b The SIPC filed a motion for summary judgment on this issue. Edward Murphy opposed the request.

STEPHEN RASLAVICH, Bankruptcy Judge.

* * * *

* * * [I]n Pennsylvania a partner is jointly and severally [separately] liable for certain torts chargeable to the partnership [if those torts are committed within the ordinary course of the partnership business]. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Murphy maintains that he is not * * * liable for Selheimer's acts because the record does not show that such conduct was within the ordinary course of business of the partnership * * * .

The record demonstrates that Selheimer & Co. perpetrated its fraud under the guise of operating a brokerage firm. The partnership was a registered securities broker-dealer that accepted [funds] from clients for investment purposes. Instead, Selheimer embezzled those funds. Selheimer's criminal acts were performed within the normal operation of this partnership's business. Put another way, at the time Selheimer was defrauding clients, it was acting in the ordinary course of the partnership's business. The partnership is therefore liable for those acts of Mr. Selheimer. And if the partnership is liable for those debts, then individual partners, including Murphy, are jointly and severally liable as well.

Alternatively, Murphy argues that there is no evidence of partnership liability * * * because there is nothing to indicate that Selheimer was acting within the scope of his apparent authority when defrauding customers. In this Commonwealth, the doctrine of apparent authority has been incorporated into the principles of agency law. Apparent authority has been defined [in the Restatement (Second) of Agency, Section 8] as "the power to affect the legal relations of another person by transactions with third persons, professedly as agent for the other, arising from and in accordance with the other's manifestations to third persons." [According to the Restatement (Second) of Agency, Section 27, the] general rule governing the creation of apparent authority is:

Except for the execution of instruments under seal or for the conduct of transactions required by statute to be authorized in a particular way, apparent authority to do an act is created as to a third person by written or spoken words or any other conduct of the principal which, reasonably interpreted, causes the third person to believe that the principal consents to have the act done on his behalf by the person purporting to act for him.

Apparent authority exists when a principal, by words or conduct, leads people with whom the alleged agent deals to believe the principal has granted the agent authority he or she purports to exercise. Apparent authority may result when a principal permits an agent to occupy a position [in] which, according to the ordinary experience and habits of mankind, it is usual for that occupant to have authority of a particular kind. The nature and extent of an agent's apparent authority is a question of fact for the fact-finder. [Emphasis added.]

Murphy misinterprets agency law when he argues that Selheimer lacked authority, express or apparent, to defraud clients. His argument operates from the erroneous premise that the record must show that Selheimer & Co., as principal, gave Perry Selheimer, as agent, license to steal. If that were so, then the doctrine of apparent authority would be eviscerated [gutted]. What matters is whether Selheimer & Co. was authorized to accept client funds for investment. And the record shows that it certainly was: Selheimer & Co. was a broker-dealer registered with the SEC. Mr. Selheimer formally admitted—pleaded guilty, in fact—to having committed "an abuse of trust" as to his clients. Client confidence would not have been placed in him unless he held himself out as

b. As you will read in Chapter 36, in most states, the partners in a partnership are both jointly and severally (separately, or individually) liable for all partnership obligations.

an honest broker-dealer of financial investments; otherwise, clients simply would have taken their business elsewhere. There is thus sufficient proof to support a finding that Selheimer was acting within his apparent authority when defrauding clients. That, in turn, supports a finding of liability as to the partnership which may be assessed against Murphy.

● Decision and Remedy The court found that "Selheimer & Co. is deficient; that Murphy was a partner of Selheimer & Co.; and that he is indirectly liable under Pennsylvania law for the acts of Perry Selheimer which are chargeable to Selheimer & Co." on a theory of apparent authority. The court issued a summary judgment "in a liquidated amount for the $251,158.12 in claims advanced by [the] SIPC and an additional $840,667 for the customer claim of Jeanne Murphy."

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Selheimer & Company had not had the authority to accept funds for investment, did not authorize its manager to accept such funds, and did not represent that the manager or the firm had this authority, would the outcome in this case have been different? Explain.

● The Global Dimension Suppose that Selheimer & Company handled accounts for a number of clients located in foreign nations. Would these foreign clients be able to sue under U.S. agency law and hold Murphy indirectly liable for the acts of his partner Selheimer? Why or why not?

Innocent Misrepresentation Tort liability based on fraud requires proof that a material misstatement was made knowingly and with the intent to deceive. An agent's innocent mistakes occurring in a contract transaction or involving a warranty contained in the contract can provide grounds for the third party's rescission of the contract and the award of damages. Moreover, justice dictates that when a principal knows that an agent is not accurately advised of facts but does not correct either the agent's or the third party's impressions, the principal is directly responsible to the third party for resulting damages. The point is that the principal is always directly responsible for an agent's misrepresentation made within the scope of authority.

Liability for Agent's Negligence

Under the doctrine of respondeat superior,¹⁰ the principal-employer is liable for any harm caused to a third party by an agent-employee within the scope of employment. This doctrine imposes vicarious liability, or indirect liability, on the employer—that is, liability without regard to the personal fault of the employer for torts committed by an employee in the course or scope of employment.¹¹ Third parties injured through the negligence of an employee can sue either that employee or the employer, if the employee's negligent conduct occurred while the employee was acting within the scope of employment.

Rationale Underlying the Doctrine of Respondeat Superior

At early common law, a servant (employee) was viewed as the master's (employer's) property. The master was deemed to have absolute control over the servant's acts and was held strictly liable for them no matter how carefully the master supervised the servant. The rationale for the doctrine of respondeat superior is based on the social duty that requires every person to manage his or her affairs, whether accomplished by the person or through agents, so as not to injure another. Liability is imposed on employers because they are deemed to be in a better financial position to bear the loss. The superior financial position carries with it the duty to be responsible for damages.

Generally, public policy requires that an injured person be afforded effective relief, and a business enterprise is usually better able to provide that relief than is an individual employee. Employers normally

10. Pronounced ree-spahn-dee-uht soo-peer-ee-your. The doctrine of respondeat superior applies not only to employer-employee relationships but also to other principal-agent relationships in which the principal has the right of control over the agent.

11. The theory of respondeat superior is similar to the theory of strict liability covered in Chapter 7.

carry liability insurance to cover any damages awarded as a result of such lawsuits. They are also able to spread the cost of risk over the entire business enterprise.

The doctrine of respondet superior, which the courts have applied for nearly two centuries, continues to have practical implications in all situations involving principal-agent (employer-employee) relationships. Today, the small-town grocer with one clerk and the multinational corporation with thousands of employees are equally subject to the doctrinal demand of “let the master respond.” (Keep this principle in mind as you read through Chapters 33 and 34.)

Determining the Scope of Employment

The key to determining whether a principal may be liable for the torts of an agent under the doctrine of respondet superior is whether the torts are committed within the scope of the agency or employment. The Restatement (Second) of Agency, Section 229, outlines the following general factors that courts will consider in determining whether a particular act occurred within the course and scope of employment:

1. Whether the employee’s act was authorized by the employer.
2. The time, place, and purpose of the act.
3. Whether the act was one commonly performed by employees on behalf of their employers.
4. The extent to which the employer’s interest was advanced by the act.
5. The extent to which the private interests of the employee were involved.
6. Whether the employer furnished the means or instrumentality (for example, a truck or a machine) by which an injury was inflicted.
7. Whether the employer had reason to know that the employee would perform the act in question and whether the employee had done it before.
8. Whether the act involved the commission of a serious crime.

The Distinction between a “Detour” and a “Frolic” A useful insight into the concept of “scope of employment” may be gained from Judge Baron Parke’s classic distinction between a “detour” and a “frolic” in the case of Joel v. Morison (1834).¹² In this case, the English court held that if a servant merely took a detour from his master’s business, the master will be responsible. If, however, the servant was on a “frolic of his own” and not in any way “on his master’s business,” the master will not be liable.

Consider an example. Mandel, a traveling salesperson, while driving his employer’s vehicle to call on a customer, decides to stop at the post office—which is one block off his route—to mail a personal letter. As Mandel approaches the post office, he negligently runs into a parked vehicle owned by Chan. In this situation, because Mandel’s detour from the employer’s business is not substantial, he is still acting within the scope of employment, and the employer is liable. The result would be different, though, if Mandel had decided to pick up a few friends for cocktails in another city and in the process had negligently run his vehicle into Chan’s. In that circumstance, the departure from the employer’s business would be substantial, and the employer normally would not be liable to Chan for damages. Mandel would be considered to have been on a “frolic” of his own.

Employee Travel Time An employee going to and from work or to and from meals is usually considered to be outside the scope of employment. In contrast, all travel time of traveling salespersons or others whose jobs require them to travel is normally considered to be within the scope of employment for the duration of the business trip, including the return trip home, unless there is a significant departure from the employer’s business.

Notice of Dangerous Conditions The employer is charged with knowledge of any dangerous conditions discovered by an employee and pertinent to the employment situation. Suppose that Brad, a maintenance employee in an apartment building, notices a lead pipe protruding from the ground in the building’s courtyard. Brad neglects either to fix the pipe or to inform his employer of the danger. John falls on the pipe and is injured. The employer is charged with knowledge of the dangerous condition regardless of whether Brad actually informed the employer. That knowledge is imputed to the employer by virtue of the employment relationship.

Borrowed Servants Employers sometimes lend the services of their employees to other employers. Suppose that an employer leases ground-moving equipment to another employer and sends along an employee to operate the machinery. Who is liable for injuries caused by the employee’s negligent actions on the job site? Liability turns on which employer had the primary right to control the employee at the time the injuries occurred. Generally, the employer who rents out the equipment is presumed to retain control over her or his employee. If the rental is for a relatively long period of time, however, control may be deemed to pass to the employer who is renting the equipment and presumably controlling and directing the employee.

The following case illustrates the two-pronged test that courts often use to determine liability in situations in which one employer lends an employee to another company for a particular project.

EXTENDED CASE 32.3 Galvao v. G. R. Robert Construction Co.

Supreme Court of New Jersey, 2004. 179 N.J. 462, 846 A.2d 1215.

Justice LaVECCHIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

On October 27, 1998, plaintiff, Sergio Galvao, was injured while working on the Route 21 Viaduct Replacement Project (the Project) in Newark [New Jersey]. Specifically, a rebar cage used for the pouring of concrete failed and plaintiff fell twenty feet onto another rebar cage. Employees of [G. R. Robert Construction Company (Robert)] had constructed the defective rebar cage. * * * George Harms Excavating Company (Excavating), * * * [was] the payor of plaintiff's salary. * * *

Robert and Excavating are wholly owned subsidiaries of George Harms Construction Company (GHCC) * * * .

Robert and Excavating serve as payroll companies that supply employees to GHCC and receive reimbursement from GHCC for their respective payroll expenses. * * *

* * * [W]hen plaintiff was injured, GHCC was performing construction and related services on the Project pursuant to a contract (the Contract) with the New Jersey Department of Transportation (DOT). * * *

In respect of the performance of work on the Project, GHCC controlled the direction and supervision of all workers, which necessarily included all employees of Robert and Excavating. * * *

In May 1999, plaintiffs filed this * * * action [in a New Jersey state court] against Robert, asserting liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior for the alleged negligent construction of the rebar cage by Robert's employees. Plaintiffs already had filed a workers' compensation claim against GHCC and received benefits. The trial court dismissed the complaint on Robert's motion for summary judgment. * * *

* * * [A state intermediate appellate court] affirmed * * * . [The New Jersey Supreme Court] granted plaintiffs' petition for certification. * * *

* * * [T]he test * * * for determining whether a general employer (i.e. Robert) may be held vicariously liable for the alleged negligence of its special employee loaned to a special employer (i.e. GHCC) necessarily contains two parts. The threshold inquiry is whether the general employer controlled the special employee. By "control," we mean control in the fundamental respondeat superior sense, which * * * [is] the right to direct the manner in which the business shall be done, as well as the result to be accomplished, or in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done. In addition to evidence of direct or "on-spot" control over the means by which the task is accomplished, we will infer an employer's control based on the method of payment, who furnishes the equipment, and the right of termination. The retention of either on-spot, or broad, control by a general employer would satisfy this first prong. [Emphasis added.]

If a general employer is not found to exercise either on-spot, or broad, control over a special employee, then the general employer cannot be held vicariously liable for the alleged negligence of that employee. If the general employer did exercise such control, however, then it must be ascertained whether the special employee furthered the business of the general employer. A special employee is furthering the business of the general employer if the work being done by the special employee is within the general contemplation of the general employer, and the general employer derives an economic benefit by loaning its employee. If the answer to the second question is in the affirmative, the general employer may be held vicariously liable for the alleged negligence of a special employee. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

In this matter, we are confident that plaintiffs cannot satisfy either prong necessary to hold Robert vicariously liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior. In respect of the first prong concerning control, * * * Robert did not have the type of broad influence over the Project from which we might infer the right to control, such as paying plaintiff's salary, furnishing construction materials or equipment for the Project, or retaining the right to hire forepersons and assign employees to particular aspects of the Project. Nor is there any evidence that Robert had on-spot control of the special employees. Robert did not direct the on-site work, design the rebar cages, or have any responsibility for safety. Thus, under the facts of this matter, Robert did not control the Project or the activities on the Project. For that reason alone, we conclude that Robert cannot be held vicariously liable under respondeat superior for plaintiff's injuries.

Although the lack of control ends the inquiry, for completeness we add the following analysis of the second prong. Robert did not derive any economic benefit by providing special employees to GHCC. Robert's only income was reimbursement from GHCC for its payroll expenses, a pass-through transaction. Any benefit derived from the use of Robert's employees on the Project, economic or otherwise, was GHCC's alone. It was GHCC that created Robert and Excavating * * * , and it was GHCC that entered the contract with, and was paid by, DOT for completing the Project. The only beneficiaries of the contract between DOT and GHCC, other than the principals themselves, were the employees who received remuneration for their services. Therefore, as with the control prong, plaintiff failed to meet the business-furtherance prong to demonstrate that Robert may be held vicariously liable for the alleged negligence of the special employees here.

* * * *

The judgment of the [state intermediate appellate court] is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. What are the two "prongs" of the test for liability for injuries caused by the negligence of borrowed servants (employees) under the doctrine of respondeat superior, according to the court in the Galvao case?
2. How does the basis for the second "prong" of this test resemble the basis for the imposition of strict liability in other cases?

Liability for Agent's Intentional Torts

Most intentional torts that employees commit have no relation to their employment; thus, their employers will not be held liable. Nevertheless, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the employer can be liable for intentional torts of the employee that are committed within the course and scope of employment, just as the employer is liable for negligence. For example, an employer is liable when an employee (such as a "bouncer" at a nightclub or a security guard at a department store) commits the tort of assault and battery or false imprisonment while acting within the scope of employment.

In addition, an employer who knows or should know that an employee has a propensity for committing tortious acts is liable for the employee's acts even if they would not ordinarily be considered within the scope of employment. For example, if an employer hires a bouncer knowing that he has a history of arrests for criminal assault and battery, the employer may be liable if the employee viciously attacks a patron in the parking lot after hours.

An employer is also liable for permitting an employee to engage in reckless actions that can injure others. For example, an employer observes an employee smoking while filling containerized trucks with highly flammable liquids. Failure to stop the employee will cause the employer to be liable for any injuries that result if a truck explodes. Needless to say, most employers purchase liability insurance to cover their potential liability for employee conduct in many situations (see Chapter 49).

Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts

Generally, an employer is not liable for physical harm caused to a third person by the negligent act of an independent contractor in the performance of the contract. This is because the employer does not have the right to control the details of an independent contractor's performance. Exceptions to this rule are made in certain situations, though, such as when the contract involves unusually hazardous activities—for example, blasting operations, the transportation of highly volatile chemicals, or the use of poisonous gases. In these situations, an employer cannot be shielded from liability merely by using an independent contractor. Strict liability is imposed on the employer-principal as a matter of law. Also, in some states, strict liability may be imposed by statute.

Liability for Agent's Crimes

An agent is liable for his or her own crimes. A principal or employer is not liable for an agent's or employee's crime simply because the agent or employee committed the crime while otherwise acting within the scope of authority or employment. An exception to this rule is made when the principal or employer participated in the crime by conspiracy or other action. In some jurisdictions, under specific statutes, a principal may be liable for an agent's violating, in the course and scope of employment, such regulations as those governing sanitation, prices, weights, and the sale of liquor.

Termination of an Agency

Agency law is similar to contract law in that both an agency and a contract may be terminated by an act of the parties or by operation of law. Once the relationship between the principal and the agent has ended, the agent no longer has the right (actual authority) to bind the principal. For an agent's apparent authority to be terminated, though, third persons may also need to be notified that the agency has been terminated.

Termination by Act of the Parties

An agency relationship may be terminated by act of the parties in a number of ways, including those discussed here.

Lapse of Time An agency agreement may specify the time period during which the agency relationship will exist. If so, the agency ends when that time expires. For example, Akers signs an agreement of agency with Janz “beginning January 1, 2009, and ending December 31, 2010.” The agency is automatically terminated on December 31, 2010. If no definite time is stated, then the agency continues for a reasonable time and can be terminated at will by either party. What constitutes a reasonable time depends on the circumstances and the nature of the agency relationship.

Purpose Achieved An agent can be employed to accomplish a particular objective, such as the purchase of stock for a cattle rancher. In that situation, the agency automatically ends after the cattle have been purchased. If more than one agent is employed to accomplish the same purpose, such as the sale of real estate, the first agent to complete the sale automatically terminates the agency relationship for all the others.

Occurrence of a Specific Event An agency can be created to terminate on the happening of a certain event. For example, if Posner appoints Rubik to handle her business affairs while she is away, the agency automatically terminates when Posner returns.

Mutual Agreement Recall from basic contract law that parties can rescind (cancel) a contract by mutually agreeing to terminate the contractual relationship at any time. The same holds true in agency law regardless of whether the agency contract is in writing or whether it is for a specific duration.

At the Option of One Party As a general rule, either party can terminate the agency relationship—because agency is a consensual relationship, and thus neither party can be compelled to continue in the relationship. The agent's act is said to be a renunciation of authority. The principal's act is a revocation of authority. Although both parties may have the power to terminate the agency, they may not possess the right to terminate and may therefore be liable for breach of contract.

Wrongful Termination. Wrongful termination can subject the canceling party to a lawsuit for breach of contract. For example, Rawlins has a one-year employment contract with Munro to act as agent in return for $65,000. Munro has the power to discharge Rawlins before the contract period expires. If Munro discharges Rawlins, though, he can be sued for breaching the contract and will be liable to Rawlins for damages because he had no right to terminate the agency.

Even in an agency at will—that is, an agency that either party may terminate at any time—the principal who wishes to terminate must give the agent reasonable notice. The notice must be at least sufficient to allow the agent to recoup his or her expenses and, in some situations, to make a normal profit.

Agency Coupled with an Interest. A special rule applies in an agency coupled with an interest. This type of agency is not an agency in the usual sense because it is created for the agent's benefit instead of for the principal's benefit. For example, suppose that Julie borrows $5,000 from Rob, giving Rob some of her jewelry and signing a letter authorizing him to sell the jewelry as her agent if she fails to repay the loan. After Julie receives the $5,000 from Rob, she attempts to revoke his authority to sell the jewelry as her agent. Julie will not succeed in this attempt because a principal cannot revoke an agency created for the agent's benefit.

An agency coupled with an interest should not be confused with a situation in which the agent merely derives proceeds or profits from the sale of the subject matter. For example, an agent who merely receives a commission from the sale of real property does not have a beneficial interest in the property itself.

Notice of Termination When an agency has been terminated by act of the parties, it is the principal's duty to inform any third parties who know of the existence of the agency that it has been terminated (notice of the termination may be given by others, however).

Although an agent's actual authority ends when the agency is terminated, an agent's apparent authority continues until the third party receives notice (from any source) that such authority has been terminated. If the principal knows that a third party has dealt with the agent, the principal is expected to notify that person directly. For third parties who have heard about the agency but have not yet dealt with the agent, constructive notice is sufficient.¹³

No particular form is required for notice of termination of the principal-agent relationship to be effective. The principal can personally notify the agent, or the agent can learn of the termination through some other means. For example, Manning bids on a shipment of steel, and Stone is hired as an agent to arrange transportation of the shipment. When Stone learns that

13. With constructive notice of a fact, knowledge of the fact is imputed by law to a person if he or she could have discovered the fact by proper diligence. Constructive notice is often accomplished by publication in a newspaper.

Manning has lost the bid, Stone's authority to make the transportation arrangement terminates. If the agent's authority is written, however, normally it must be revoked in writing (unless the written document contained an expiration date).

Termination by Operation of Law

Certain events will terminate agency authority automatically because their occurrence makes it impossible for the agent to perform or improbable that the principal would continue to want performance. We look at these events here. Note that when an agency terminates by operation of law, there is no duty to notify third persons—unless the agent's authority is coupled with an interest.

Death or Insanity The general rule is that the death or insanity of either the principal or the agent automatically and immediately terminates an ordinary agency relationship.¹⁴ Knowledge of the death or insanity is not required. For example, Grey sends Bosley to Japan to purchase a rare book. Before Bosley makes the purchase, Grey dies. Bosley's agent status is terminated at the moment of Grey's death, even though Bosley does not know that Grey has died. (Some states, however, have changed the common law by statute to make knowledge of the principal's death a requirement for agency termination.)

An agent's transactions that occur after the death of the principal are not binding on the principal's estate. Assume that Bosley is hired by Grey to collect a debt from Cochran (a third party). Grey dies, but Bosley, not knowing of Grey's death, still collects the debt from Cochran. Cochran's payment to Bosley is no longer legally sufficient to discharge the debt to Grey because Bosley no longer has Grey's authority to collect the funds. If Bosley absconds with the funds, Cochran must pay the debt again to Grey's estate.

Impossibility When the specific subject matter of an agency is destroyed or lost, the agency terminates. For example, Gonzalez employs Raich to sell Gonzalez's house. Prior to any sale, the house is destroyed by fire. Raich's agency and authority to sell the house terminate. Similarly, when it is impossible for the agent to perform the agency lawfully because of a change in the law, the agency terminates.

14. There is an exception to this rule in banking. UCC 4-405 provides that the bank, as agent, can continue to exercise specific types of authority even after the customer's death or insanity unless it has knowledge of the death or incompetence. As discussed in Chapter 27, when the bank has knowledge of the customer's death, it has authority for ten days after the death to pay checks (but not notes or drafts) drawn by the customer unless it receives a stop-payment order from someone who has an interest in the account, such as an heir.

Changed Circumstances When an event occurs that has such an unusual effect on the subject matter of the agency that the agent can reasonably infer that the principal will not want the agency to continue, the agency terminates. Suppose that Baird hires Joslen to sell a tract of land for $40,000. Subsequently, Joslen learns that there is oil under the land and that the land is therefore worth $1 million. The agency and Joslen's authority to sell the land for $40,000 are terminated.

Bankruptcy If either the principal or the agent petitions for bankruptcy, the agency is usually terminated. In certain circumstances, such as when the agent's financial status is irrelevant to the purpose of the agency, the agency relationship may continue. Insolvency (defined as the inability to pay debts when they come due or when liabilities exceed assets), as distinguished from bankruptcy, does not necessarily terminate the relationship.

War When the principal's country and the agent's country are at war with each other, the agency is terminated. In this situation, the agency is automatically suspended or terminated because there is no way to enforce the legal rights and obligations of the parties. See Concept Summary 32.2 for a synopsis of the rules governing the termination of an agency.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 32.2

Termination of an Agency

Method of Termination	Rules	Termination of Agent's Authority
ACT OF THE PARTIES
1. Lapse of time.	Automatic at end of the stated time.	Notice to Third Parties Required— 1. Direct to those who have dealt with agency. 2. Constructive to all others.
2. Purpose achieved.	Automatic on the completion of the purpose.
3. Occurrence of a specific event.	Normally automatic on the happening of the event.
4. Mutual agreement.	Mutual consent required.
5. At the option of one party (revocation, if by principal; renunciation, if by agent).	Either party normally has a right to terminate the agency but may lack the power to do so, which can lead to liability for breach of contract.
OPERATION OF LAW
1. Death or insanity.	Automatic on the death or insanity of either the principal or the agent (except when the agency is coupled with an interest).	No Notice Required— Automatic on the happening of the event.
2. Impossibility—destruction of the specific subject matter.	Applies any time the agency cannot be performed because of an event beyond the parties' control.
3. Changed circumstances.	Events so unusual that it would be inequitable to allow the agency to continue to exist.
4. Bankruptcy.	A bankruptcy decree (not mere insolvency) usually terminates the agency.
5. War between principal's country and agent's country.	Automatically suspends or terminates the agency—no way to enforce legal rights.

REVIEWING Liability to Third Parties and Termination

Lynne Meyer, on her way to a business meeting and in a hurry, stopped at a Buy-Mart store for a new pair of nylons to wear to the meeting. There was a long line at one of the checkout counters, but a cashier, Valerie Watts, opened another counter and began loading the cash drawer. Meyer told Watts that she was in a hurry and asked Watts to work faster. Instead, Watts only slowed her pace. At this point, Meyer hit Watts. It is not clear from the record whether Meyer hit Watts intentionally or, in an attempt to retrieve the nylons, hit her inadvertently. In response, Watts grabbed Meyer by the hair and hit her repeatedly in the back of the head, while Meyer screamed for help. Management personnel separated the two women and questioned them about the incident. Watts was immediately fired for violating the store's no-fighting policy. Meyer subsequently sued Buy-Mart, alleging that the store was liable for the tort (assault and battery) committed by its employee. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under what doctrine discussed in this chapter might Buy-Mart be held liable for the tort committed by Watts?
2. What is the key factor in determining whether Buy-Mart is liable under this doctrine?
3. How is Buy-Mart's potential liability affected depending on whether Watts's behavior constituted an intentional tort or a tort of negligence?
4. Suppose that when Watts applied for the job at Buy-Mart, she disclosed in her application that she had previously been convicted of felony assault and battery. Nevertheless, Buy-Mart hired Watts as a cashier. How might this fact affect Buy-Mart's liability for Watts's actions?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

32-1. Adam is a traveling salesperson for Peter Petri Plumbing Supply Corp. Adam has express authority to solicit orders from customers and to offer a 5 percent discount if payment is made within thirty days of delivery. Petri has said nothing to Adam about extending credit. Adam calls on a new prospective customer, John's Plumbing Firm. John tells Adam that he will place a large order for Petri products if Adam will give him a 10 percent discount with payment due in equal installments thirty, sixty, and ninety days from delivery. Adam says he has authority to make such a contract. John calls Petri and asks if Adam is authorized to make contracts giving a discount. No mention is made of payment terms. Petri replies that Adam has authority to give discounts on purchase orders. On the basis of this information, John orders $10,000 worth of plumbing supplies and fixtures. The goods are delivered and are being sold. One week later, John receives a bill for $9,500, due in thirty days. John insists he owes only $9,000 and can pay it in three equal installments, at thirty, sixty, and ninety days from delivery. Discuss the liability of Petri and John only.

32-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Alice Adams is a purchasing agent-employee for the A & B Coal Supply partnership. Adams has authority to purchase the coal needed by A & B to satisfy the needs of its customers. While Adams is leaving a coal mine from which she has just purchased a large quantity of coal, her car breaks down. She walks into a small roadside grocery store for help. While there, she runs into Will Wilson, who owns 360 acres back in the mountains with all mineral rights. Wilson, in need of cash, offers to sell Adams the property for $1,500 per acre. On inspection of the property, Adams forms the opinion that the subsurface contains valuable coal deposits. Adams contracts to purchase the property for A & B Coal Supply, signing the contract "A & B Coal Supply, Alice Adams, agent." The closing date is August 1. Adams takes the contract to the partnership. The managing partner is furious, as A & B is not in the property business. Later, just before closing, both Wilson and the partnership learn that the value of the land is at least $15,000 per acre. Discuss the rights of A & B and Wilson concerning the land contract.

- For a sample answer to Question 32-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

32-3. Paula Enterprises hires Able to act as its agent to purchase a 1,000-acre tract of land from Thompson for $1,000 per acre. Paula Enterprises does not wish Thompson to know that it is the principal or that Able is its agent. Paula wants the land for a new country housing development, and Thompson may not sell the land for that purpose or may demand a premium price. Able makes the contract for the purchase, signing only his name as purchaser and not disclosing the agency relationship to Thompson. The closing and transfer of deed are to take place on September 1.

- If Thompson learns of Paula's identity on August 1, can Thompson legally refuse to deed the property on September 1? Explain.
- Paula gives Able the funds for the closing, but Able absconds with the funds, causing a breach of Able's contract at the date of closing. Thompson then learns of Paula's identity and wants to enforce the contract. Discuss fully Thompson's rights under these circumstances.

32-4. ABC Tire Corp. hires Arnez as a traveling salesperson and assigns him a geographic area and time schedule in which to solicit orders and service customers. Arnez is given a company car to use in covering the territory. One day, Arnez decides to take his personal car to cover part of his territory. It is 11:00 A.M., and Arnez has just finished calling on all customers in the city of Tarrytown. His next appointment is at 2:00 P.M. in the city of Austex, twenty miles down the road. Arnez starts out for Austex, but halfway there he decides to visit a former college roommate who runs a farm ten miles off the main highway. Arnez is enjoying his visit with his former roommate when he realizes that it is 1:45 P.M. and that he will be late for the appointment in Austex. Driving at a high speed down the country road to reach the main highway, Arnez crashes his car into Thomas's tractor, severely injuring Thomas, a farmer. Thomas claims that he can hold ABC Tire Corp. liable for his injuries. Discuss fully ABC's liability in this situation.

32-5. Undisclosed Principal. John Dunning was the sole officer of the R. B. Dunning Co. and was responsible for the management and operation of the business. When the company rented a warehouse from Samuel and Ruth Saliba, Dunning did not say that he was acting for the firm. The parties did not have a written lease. Business faltered, and the firm stopped paying rent. Eventually, it went bankrupt and vacated the property. The Salibas filed a suit in a Maine state court against Dunning personally, seeking to recover the unpaid rent. Dunning claimed that the debt belonged to the company because he had been acting only as its agent. Who is liable for the rent, and why? [Estate of Saliba v. Dunning, 682 A.2d 224 (Me. 1996)]

32-6. Liability for Employee's Acts. Federated Financial Reserve Corp. leases consumer and business equipment. As part of its credit-approval and debt-collection practices, Federated hires credit collectors and authorizes them to obtain credit reports on its customers. Janice Caylor, a Federated collector, used this authority to obtain a report on Karen Jones, who was not a Federated customer but who was the former wife of Caylor's roommate, Randy Lind. When Jones discovered that Lind had her address and how he had obtained it, she filed a suit in a federal district court against Federated and the others. Jones claimed, in part, that they had violated the Fair Credit Reporting Act, the goal of which is to protect consumers from the improper use of credit reports. Under what theory might an employer be held liable for an employee's violation of a statute? Does that theory apply in this case? Explain. [Jones v. Federated Financial Reserve Corp., 144 F.3d 961 (6th Cir. 1998)]

32-7. Liability for Independent Contractor's Torts. Greif Brothers Corp., a steel drum manufacturer, owned and operated a manufacturing plant in Youngstown, Ohio. In 1987, Lowell Wilson, the plant superintendent, hired Youngstown Security Patrol, Inc. (YSP), a security company, to guard Greif property and "deter thieves and vandals.” Some YSP security guards, as Wilson knew, carried firearms. Eric Bator, a YSP security guard, was not certified as an armed guard but nevertheless took his gun, in a briefcase, to work. While working at the Greif plant on August 12, 1991, Bator fired his gun at Derrell Pusey, in the belief that Pusey was an intruder. The bullet struck and killed Pusey. Pusey’s mother filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Greif and others, alleging, in part, that her son’s death was the result of YSP’s negligence, for which Greif was responsible. Greif filed a motion for a directed verdict. What is the plaintiff’s best argument that Greif is responsible for YSP’s actions? What is Greif’s best defense? Explain. [Pusey v. Bator, 94 Ohio St.3d 275, 762 N.E.2d 968 (2002)]

32-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In 1998, William Larry Smith signed a lease for certain land in Chilton County, Alabama, owned by Sweet Smitherman. The lease stated that it was between “Smitherman, and WLS, Inc., d/b/a [doing business as] S & H Mobile Homes” and the signature line identified the lessee as “WLS, Inc. d/b/a S & H Mobile Homes . . . By: William Larry Smith, President.” The amount of the rent was $5,000, payable by the tenth of each month. All of the checks that Smitherman received for the rent identified the owner of the account as “WLS Corporation d/b/a S & H Mobile Homes.” Nearly four years later, Smitherman filed a suit in an Alabama state court against William Larry Smith, alleging that he owed $26,000 in unpaid rent. Smith responded, in part, that WLS was the lessee and that he was not personally responsible for the obligation to pay the rent. Is Smith a principal, an agent, both a principal and an agent, or neither? In any event, in the lease, is the principal disclosed, partially disclosed, or undisclosed? With the answers to these questions in mind, who is liable for the unpaid rent, and why? Discuss. [Smith v. Smitherman, 887 So.2d 285 (Ala.Civ.App.2004)]

32-9. Apparent Authority. Lee Dennegar and Mark Knutson lived in Dennegar’s house in Raritan, New Jersey. Dennegar paid the mortgage and other household expenses. With Dennegar’s consent, Knutson managed their household’s financial affairs and the “general office functions concerned with maintaining the house.” Dennegar allowed Knutson to handle the mail and “to do with it as he chose.” Knutson wrote checks for Dennegar to sign, although Knutson signed Dennegar’s name to many of the checks with Dennegar’s consent. AT&T Universal issued a credit card in Dennegar’s name in February 2001. Monthly statements were mailed to Dennegar’s house, and payments were sometimes made on those statements. Knutson died in June 2003. The unpaid charges on the card of $14,752.93 were assigned to New Century Financial Services, Inc. New Century filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Dennegar to collect the unpaid amount. Dennegar claimed that he never applied for or used the card and knew nothing about it. Under what theory could Dennegar be liable for the charges? Explain. [New Century Financial Services, Inc. v. Dennegar, 394 N.J.Super. 595, 928 A.2d 48 (A.D.2007)]

32-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Warren Davis lived with Renee Brandt in a house that Davis owned in Virginia Beach, Virginia. At Davis’s request, attorney Leigh Ansell prepared, and Davis acknowledged, a durable power of attorney appointing Ansell to act as Davis’s attorney-in-fact. Ansell was authorized to sign “any . . . instrument of . . . deposit” and “any contract . . . relating to . . . personal property.” Ansell could act “in any circumstances as fully and effectively as I could do as part of my normal, everyday business affairs if acting personally.” A few days later, at Davis’s direction, Ansell prepared, and Davis signed, a will that gave Brandt the right to occupy, rent-free, the house in which she and Davis lived “so long as she lives in the premises.” The will’s other chief beneficiaries were Davis’s daughters, Sharon Jones and Jody Clark. According to Ansell, Davis intended to “take care of [Brandt] outside of this will” and asked Ansell to designate Brandt the beneficiary “payable on death” (POD) of Davis’s $250,000 certificate of deposit (CD). The CD had no other named beneficiary. Less than two months later, Davis died. A suit between Brandt and Davis’s daughters ensued in a Virginia state court. [Jones v. Brandt, 645 S.E.2d 312 (Va.2007)]

- Should the language in a power of attorney be interpreted broadly or strictly? Why?
- In this case, did Ansell have the authority under the power of attorney to change the beneficiary of Davis’s CD? Explain.
- Ansell advised Davis by letter that he had complied with the instruction to designate Brandt the beneficiary of the CD. Davis made no objection. On these facts, what theory might apply to validate the designation?

Liability in Agency Relationships

CHAPTER 33

Employment and Labor Law

Traditionally, employment relationships in the United States were governed primarily by the common law. Today, in contrast, the workplace is regulated extensively by federal and state statutes. Recall from Chapter 1 that common law doctrines apply only to areas not covered by statutory law. Common law doctrines have thus been displaced to a significant extent by statutory law. In this chapter, we look at the most significant laws regulating employment relationships. We examine other important laws regulating the workplace—those prohibiting employment discrimination—in the next chapter.

Keep in mind, however, that certain aspects of employment relationships are still governed by common law rules, including the rules under contract, tort, and agency law discussed in previous chapters of this text. Given that many employees (those who deal with third parties) normally are deemed to be agents of their employer, agency concepts are especially relevant in the employment context, as is the distinction between employees and independent contractors. Generally, the laws discussed in this chapter and in Chapter 34 apply only to the employer-employee relationship and not to independent contractors. Here, we begin our discussion by examining one other common law doctrine that has not been entirely displaced by statutory law—that of employment at will.

Employment at Will

Traditionally, employment relationships have generally been governed by the common law doctrine of employment at will. Under this doctrine, either the employer or the employee may terminate an employment contract at any time and for any reason, unless the contract specifically provides to the contrary. This doctrine is still in widespread use, and only one state (Montana) does not apply it. Indeed, as discussed in the Contemporary Legal Debates feature in Chapter 12 on pages 260 and 261, the legal status of the majority of American workers is “employee at will.” Nonetheless, as has occurred in many other areas of employment law, federal and state statutes have partially displaced the common law and now prevent the doctrine from being applied in a number of circumstances. Today, an employer may not fire an employee if to do so would violate a federal or state statute, such as one prohibiting termination of employment for discriminatory reasons (see Chapter 34).

Exceptions to the Employment-at-Will Doctrine

Under the employment-at-will doctrine, as mentioned, an employer may hire and fire employees at will (regardless of the employees’ performance) without liability, unless the decision violates the terms of an employment contract or statutory law. Because of the harsh effects of the employment-at-will doctrine for employees, courts have carved out various exceptions to this doctrine. These exceptions are based on contract theory, tort theory, and public policy.

Exceptions Based on Contract Theory

Some courts have held that an implied employment contract exists between the employer and the employee. If the employee is fired outside the terms of the implied contract, he or she may succeed in an action for breach of contract even though no written employment contract exists.

For example, an employer's manual or personnel bulletin may state that, as a matter of policy, workers will be dismissed only for good cause. If the employee is aware of this policy and continues to work for the employer, a court may find that there is an implied contract based on the terms stated in the manual or bulletin. Generally, the key consideration in determining whether an employment manual creates an implied contractual obligation is the employee's reasonable expectations.

Oral promises that an employer makes to employees regarding discharge policy may also be considered part of an implied contract. If the employer fires a worker in a manner contrary to what was promised, a court may hold that the employer has violated the implied contract and is liable for damages. Most state courts will consider this claim and judge it by traditional contract standards. In some cases, courts have held that an implied employment contract existed even though the employees agreed in writing to be employees at will.¹ In a few states, courts have gone further and held that all employment contracts contain an implied covenant of good faith. In those states, if an employer fires an employee for an arbitrary or unjustified reason, the employee can claim that the covenant of good faith was breached and the contract violated.

Exceptions Based on Tort Theory In some situations, the discharge of an employee may give rise to an action for wrongful discharge under tort theories. Abusive discharge procedures may result in intentional infliction of emotional distress or defamation. In addition, some courts have permitted workers to sue their employers under the tort theory of fraud. Under this theory, an employer may be held liable for making false promises to a prospective employee if the person detrimentally relies on the employer's representations by taking the job.

For example, suppose that an employer induces a prospective employee to leave a lucrative position and move to another state by offering "a long-term job with a thriving business." In fact, the employer is having significant financial problems. Furthermore, the employer is planning a merger that will result in the elimination of the position offered to the prospective employee. If the person takes the job in reliance on the employer's representations and is laid off shortly thereafter, he or she may be able to bring an action against the employer for fraud.²

Exceptions Based on Public Policy The most widespread common law exception to the employment-at-will doctrine is that made on the basis of public policy. Courts may apply this exception when an employer fires a worker for reasons that violate a fundamental public policy of the jurisdiction.

Requirements for the Public-Policy Exception. Generally, the courts require that the public policy involved be expressed clearly in the statutory law governing the jurisdiction. The public policy against employment discrimination, for instance, is expressed clearly in federal and state statutes. Thus, if a worker is fired for discriminatory reasons but has no cause of action under statutory law (because, for example, the workplace has too few employees to be covered by the statute), that worker may succeed in a suit against the employer for wrongful discharge in violation of public policy.³

Whistleblowing and Public Policy. On occasion, a public-policy exception will also be made to protect an employee who has engaged in whistleblowing—that is, reporting to government officials, upper-management authorities, or the press that the employer is involved in some unsafe or illegal activity. Whistleblowers have sometimes been protected from wrongful discharge for reasons of public policy, as have employees who were fired for refusing to perform an illegal act when directed to do so by the employer.

Does a nursing home employee have a cause of action against her employer for a discharge in violation of public policy when she is fired for reporting the abuse of a patient as mandated by a state statute? That was the question in the following case.

1. See, for example, Kuest v. Regent Assisted Living, Inc., 111 Wash.App.36, 43 P3d 23 (2002).

2. See, for example, Lazar v. Superior Court of Los Angeles Co., 12 Cal.4th 631, 909 P2d 981, 49 Cal.Rptr.2d 377 (1996); and Helmer v. Bingham Toyota Isuzu, 129 Cal.App.4th 1121, 29 Cal.Rptr.3d 136 (2005).

3. See, for example, Molesworth v. Brandon, 341 Md.621, 672 A.2d 608 (1996); and Wholey v. Sears Roebuck, 370 Md.38, 803 A.2d 482 (2002).

C A S E 33.1 Wendeln v. The Beatrice Manor, Inc.

Supreme Court of Nebraska, 2006. 271 Neb. 373, 712 N.W.2d 226.

● Background and Facts Rebecca Wendeln, a twenty-one-year-old certified nursing assistant, worked as a staffing coordinator at The Beatrice Manor, Inc., in Beatrice, Nebraska. One of the patients at Beatrice Manor was wheelchair-bound. Moving the patient required two persons and a gait belt (an ambulatory aid used to transfer or mobilize patients). In December 2001, two medical aides told Wendeln that the patient had been improperly moved and had been injured. Wendeln reported the incident to the Nebraska Department of Health and Human Services, as required under the state Adult Protective Services Act (APSA). A few days later, Wendeln's supervisor angrily confronted her about the report. Intimidated, Wendeln asked for a day off, which was granted. On her return, she was fired. She filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Beatrice Manor, alleging, among other things, that her discharge was a violation of the state's public policy. A jury returned a verdict in her favor, awarding damages of $79,000. Beatrice Manor appealed to the Nebraska Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT McCORMACK, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * * Beatrice Manor asserts that * * * “[t]here is no clear legislative enactment declaring an important public policy with such clarity as to provide a basis for [Wendeln’s] civil action for wrongful discharge.”

The clear rule in Nebraska is that unless constitutionally, statutorily, or contractually prohibited, an employer, without incurring liability, may terminate an at-will employee at any time with or without reason. We recognize, however, a public policy exception to the at-will employment doctrine. Under the public policy exception, we will allow an employee to claim damages for wrongful discharge when the motivation for the firing contravenes public policy. * * * [H]owever, * * * it [is] important that abusive discharge claims of employees at-will be limited to manageable and clear standards. Thus, the right of an employer to terminate employees at will should be restricted only by exceptions created by statute or to those instances where a very clear mandate of public policy has been violated. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [A]n employee could state a cause of action for retaliatory discharge based upon the allegation that the employee was terminated from her employment because she filed a workers’ compensation claim. * * * Nebraska law neither specifically prohibit[s] an employer from discharging an employee for filing a workers’ compensation claim, nor specifically [makes] it a crime for an employer to do so. Nevertheless, * * * the general purpose and unique nature of the Nebraska Workers’ Compensation Act itself provides a mandate for public policy. * * * [T]he Nebraska Workers’ Compensation Act was meant to create * * * rights for employees and * * * such [a] beneficent purpose would be undermined by failing to adopt a rule which allows a retaliatory discharge claim for employees discharged for filing a workers’ compensation claim. This is because were we not to recognize such a public policy exception to the employment-at-will doctrine, the * * * rights granted by the Nebraska Workers’ Compensation Act could simply be circumvented by the employer’s threatening to discharge the employee if he or she exercised those rights.

* * * [In Nebraska] the law imposes an affirmative obligation upon an employee to prevent abuse or neglect of nursing home residents, and the employee fulfills that obligation by reporting the abuse [and may be subject to criminal sanctions for failing to do so. An employer’s termination of employment for fulfillment of the legal obligation exposes the employer to a wrongful termination action under the fundamental and well-defined public policy of protecting nursing home residents from abuse and neglect. * * * By applying the public policy exception * * * , employees [are] relieved of the onerous burden of choosing between equally destructive alternatives: report and be terminated, or fail to report and be prosecuted. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [T]he purpose of the APSA would be circumvented if employees mandated by the APSA to report suspected patient abuse could be threatened with discharge for making such a report. The [Nebraska] Legislature articulates public policy when it declares certain conduct to be in violation of the criminal law. The APSA makes a clear public policy statement by utilizing the threat of criminal sanction to ensure the implementation of the reporting provisions set forth to protect the vulnerable adults with which the APSA is concerned. Thus, we determine that a public policy exception to the employment-at-will doctrine applies to allow a cause of action for retaliatory discharge when an employee is fired for making a report of abuse as mandated by the APSA.

● Decision and Remedy The state supreme court affirmed the trial court's judgment. The appellate court emphasized that under the employment-at-will doctrine an employer may fire an at-will employee at any time with or without cause. The court recognized an exception to this principle, however, "for wrongful discharge when the motivation for the firing contravenes public policy." Under this exception, an employee has a cause of action for retaliatory discharge when she is fired for reporting abuse of a nursing home patient, as state law requires.

● The Ethical Dimension Is it fair to sanction an employer for discharging an employee who reports on the employer's unsafe or illegal actions to government authorities or others? Discuss.

● The Global Dimension In many countries, discharging an employee is more difficult and costly for the employer than it is in the United States. Why?

Whistleblowing Statutes. Today, whistleblowers also have some protection under statutory law. For example, most states have enacted so-called whistleblower statutes that protect whistleblowers from subsequent retaliation on the part of employers. On the federal level, the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989⁴ protects federal employees who blow the whistle on their employers from their employers' retaliatory actions. Whistleblower statutes may also provide an incentive to disclose information by providing the whistleblower with a monetary reward. For example, under the federal False Claims Reform Act of 1986,⁵ a whistleblower who has disclosed information relating to a fraud perpetrated against the U.S. government will receive between 15 and 25 percent of the proceeds if the government brings a suit against the wrongdoer.

Wrongful Discharge

Whenever an employer discharges an employee in violation of an employment contract or a statutory law protecting employees, the employee may bring an action for wrongful discharge. Even if an employer's actions do not violate any express employment contract or statute, the employer may still be subject to liability under a common law doctrine, such as a tort theory or agency. For example, suppose that an employer discharges a female employee and publicly discloses private facts about her sex life to her co-workers. In that situation, the employee could bring a wrongful discharge claim against the employer based on the tort of invasion of privacy (see Chapter 6).

Wage and Hour Laws

In the 1930s, Congress enacted several laws regulating the wages and working hours of employees. In 1931, Congress passed the Davis-Bacon Act,⁶ which requires the payment of "prevailing wages" to employees of contractors and subcontractors working on government construction projects. In 1936, the Walsh-Healey Act⁷ was passed. This act requires that a minimum wage, as well as overtime pay at 1.5 times regular pay rates, be paid to employees of manufacturers or suppliers entering into contracts with agencies of the federal government.

4. 5 U.S.C. Section 1201.

5. 31 U.S.C. Sections 3729–3733. This act amended the False Claims Act of 1863.

6. 40 U.S.C. Sections 276a–276a-5.

In 1938, with the passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act⁸ (FLSA), Congress extended wage-hour requirements to cover all employers engaged in interstate commerce or in the production of goods for interstate commerce. Here we examine the FLSA's provisions in regard to child labor, maximum hours, and minimum wages.

Child Labor

The FLSA prohibits oppressive child labor. Children under fourteen years of age are allowed to do certain types of work, such as deliver newspapers, work for their parents, and be employed in the entertainment and (with some exceptions) agricultural areas. Children who are fourteen or fifteen years of age are allowed to work, but not in hazardous occupations. There are also numerous restrictions on how many hours per day and per week they can work. For example, minors under the age of sixteen cannot work during school hours, for more than three hours on a school day (or eight hours on a nonschool day), for more than eighteen hours during a school week (or forty hours during a nonschool week), or before 7 A.M. or after 7 P.M. (9 P.M. during the summer). Most states require persons under sixteen years of age to obtain work permits.

Working times and hours are not restricted for persons between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, but they cannot be employed in hazardous jobs or in jobs detrimental to their health and well-being. None of these restrictions apply to those over the age of eighteen.

Hours and Wages

The FLSA provides that a minimum wage of a specified amount (which will reach $7.25 per hour by 2009) must be paid to employees in covered industries. Congress periodically revises this minimum wage.⁹ Under the FLSA, the term wages includes the reasonable costs of the employer in furnishing employees with board, lodging, and other facilities if they are customarily furnished by that employer.

Under the FLSA, any employee who works more than forty hours per week must be paid no less than 1.5 times her or his regular pay for all hours over forty. Note that the FLSA overtime provisions apply only after an employee has worked more than forty hours per week. Thus, employees who work for ten hours a day, four days per week, are not entitled to overtime pay because they do not work more than forty hours per week.

Overtime Exemptions

Certain employees—usually executive, administrative, and professional employees; outside salespersons; and computer programmers—are exempt from the overtime provisions of the FLSA. Employers are not required to pay overtime wages to exempt employees. In order for an exemption to apply, an employee's specific job duties and salary must meet all the requirements of the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL) regulations. In the past, because the salary limits were low and the duties tests were complex and confusing, some employers were able to avoid paying overtime wages to their employees. This prompted the DOL to substantially revise the overtime regulations in 2004 for the first time in more than fifty years. The revisions effectively expanded the number of workers eligible for overtime by nearly tripling the salary threshold.¹⁰

Employers can continue to pay overtime to ineligible employees if they want to do so, but they cannot waive or reduce the overtime requirements of the FLSA. The exemptions to the overtime-pay requirement do not apply to manual laborers or other workers who perform tasks involving repetitive operations with their hands (such as nonmanagement production-line employees, for example). The exemptions also do not apply to police, firefighters, licensed nurses, and other public-safety workers. White-collar workers who earn more than $100,000 per year, computer programmers, dental hygienists, and insurance adjusters are typically exempt—though they must also meet certain other criteria. An employer cannot deny overtime wages to an employee based solely on the employee's job title.¹¹ (Does the FLSA require employers to pay overtime

Paying Overtime in the Virtual Workforce

According to WorldatWork, a research organization for human resources professionals, nearly 46 million U.S. workers perform at least part of their job at home, and close to 13 million of them are full-time telecommuters, meaning that they work at home or off-site by means of an electronic linkup to the central workplace. Just because employees work at a remote location does not mean that they are automatically exempt from overtime-pay requirements (or minimum-wage laws). Federal (and sometimes state and local) wage and hour laws often apply to the virtual workforce, as many businesses are finding out the unfortunate way—through litigation.

Telecommuters and Overtime-Pay Requirements

As described in the text, the U.S. Department of Labor revised its regulations in 2004 to clarify how overtime exemptions apply to employees in various occupations. The new regulations established a primary duty test to be used in classifying workers.^a In general, workers whose primary duty involves the exercise of discretion and independent judgment are more likely to be exempt from the overtime-pay requirements. So are those whose positions require advanced knowledge or specialized instructions, such as computer systems analysts and software engineers.

Although the regulations appear detailed, they do not specifically address how these exemptions apply to telecommuters. Since the new rules went into effect in 2004, telecommuters have filed a barrage of a. See 29 C.F.R. Sections 541.203 and 541.400.

lawsuits claiming that their employers violated the Fair Labor Standards Act by failing to pay them for overtime work and to compensate them for work-related tasks.

An Increasing Number of Cases and Settlements

To date, more cases have been filed in California than in any other state—mostly by telecommuting information technology workers, pharmaceutical sales representatives, and insurance company employees. Suits are also pending in Colorado, the District of Columbia, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, and Ohio.

Some defendants with large numbers of employees have decided to settle before the case goes to trial. Computer Sciences Corporation in El Segundo, California, for example, paid $24 million to settle a case brought by telecommuters and call-center wages to workers who telecommute? See this chapter's Emerging Trends feature for a discussion of this issue.)

Under the overtime-pay regulations, an employee qualifies for the executive exemption if, among other requirements, his or her “primary duty” is management. This requirement was the focus of the dispute in the following case.

C A S E 33.2 Mims v. Starbucks Corp.

United States District Court, Southern District of Texas, 2007. __ F.Supp.2d __.

- Company Profile Starbucks Corporation (www.starbucks.com) is the largest and best-known purveyor of specialty coffees and coffee products in North America. Named after the first mate in Herman Melville's Moby Dick, Starbucks does business in more than 10,000 retail locations in the United States and forty-one foreign countries and territories. Starbucks also supplies premium, fresh-roasted coffee to book stores, grocery stores, restaurants, airlines, sports and entertainment venues, movie theaters, hotels, and cruise ship lines throughout the world. Starbucks' success is predicated on the consistently high quality of its coffees and the other products and services it provides. Starbucks has a reputation for excellence and is recognized for its knowledgeable staff and service.
- Background and Facts In Starbucks Corporation's stores, baristas wait on customers, make drinks for customers, serve customers, operate the cash register, clean the store, and maintain its equipment. In each store, a manager supervises and motivates six to thirty employees, including baristas, shift supervisors, and assistant managers. The manager oversees customer service and processes employee employees,^b and International Business Machines Corporation (IBM) settled a similar suit for $65 million.^c Other defendants have refused to settle. Farmers Insurance Exchange went to trial but lost and faced a significant jury verdict. On appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, however, the company prevailed.^d In contrast, Advanced Business Integrators, Inc., had to pay nearly $50,000 in overtime compensation to a computer consultant who had spent the majority of his work time at

1. The litigation discussed here illustrates the importance of properly tracking hours worked for compensation purposes. Even though recording the hours worked by telecommuters may be difficult, allowing employees to work from home without an accounting of how many hours they actually work may lead to class-action claims for overtime pay.
2. Businesspersons may consider whether a particular job is appropriate for telecommuting and then allow only exempt employees to telecommute.

e. Eicher v. Advanced Business Integrators, Inc., 151 Cal.App.4th 1363, 61 Cal.Rptr.3d 114 (2007).

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. Why might telecommuting employees sometimes accept being wrongly classified as "executives" or "professionals" under the overtime-pay requirements and thus be exempt from overtime pay?
2. If more class-action lawsuits claiming overtime pay for telecommuters are successful, what do you think will be the effect on telecommuting? Why?

records, payrolls, and inventory counts. He or she also develops strategies to increase revenues, control costs, and comply with corporate policies. Kevin Keevican was hired as a barista in March 2000. Keevican was subsequently promoted to shift supervisor, assistant manager, and, in November 2001, manager. During his tenure, Keevican doubled pastry sales at one store, nearly tripled revenues at another, and won sales awards at both. As a manager, Keevican worked seventy hours a week for $650 to $800, a 10 to 20 percent bonus, and fringe benefits such as paid sick leave that were not available to baristas. Keevican resigned in 2004. He and other former managers, including Kathleen Mims, filed a suit in a federal district court against Starbucks, seeking unpaid overtime and other amounts. The plaintiffs admitted that they performed many managerial tasks, but argued that they spent 70 to 80 percent of their time on barista chores. Starbucks filed a motion for summary judgment.

EWING WERLEIN, JR., United States District Judge.

* * * *

* * * An employee's primary duty is usually what the employee does that is of principal value to the employer, not the collateral tasks that she may also perform, even if they consume more than half her time.

* * * *

Where an employee spends less than 50 percent of his time on management, as both Plaintiffs claim they did, management may still be the employee's primary duty if certain pertinent factors support such a conclusion. The four factors ordinarily considered are: (1) the relative importance of managerial duties compared to other duties; (2) the frequency with which the employee makes

discretionary decisions; (3) the employee's relative freedom from supervision; and (4) the relationship between the employee's salary and the wages paid to employees who perform relevant non-exempt work. * * * [Emphasis added.]

The uncontroverted [not put into question] * * * record establishes that Plaintiffs' significant managerial functions—such as ordering and controlling inventory; deciding whom to interview and hire for barista positions; training and scheduling employees; special marketing promotions; and monitoring labor costs—were critical to the successes of their respective stores. If Plaintiffs while each managing a store with annual sales exceeding $1 million were able to spend 70 or 80 percent of their time pouring coffee and performing other barista chores that six to 30 subordinates also performed, those activities of the manager quite obviously were of minor importance to Defendant when compared to the significant management responsibilities performed during the other 20 to 30 percent of their time, management responsibilities that directly influenced the ultimate commercial and financial success or failure of the store.

It is uncontroverted that Plaintiffs, as the highest-ranking employees in their stores, made decisions on matters such as deciding whom to interview and hire as a barista, whom to assign to train new hires, when to discipline employees, whom to deploy in certain positions, what promotions to run, and the amount of product to order for efficient inventory control. Plaintiffs argue, however, that they infrequently exercised discretion because they worked under the "ultimate managing authority" of their district managers, who had authority to hire more senior employees, approve changes to Plaintiffs' work schedules, set rates of pay for newly-hired employees if the pay exceeded Starbucks's guidelines, and establish guidelines for Plaintiffs when completing performance reviews. However, the manager of a local store in a modern multi-store organization has management as his or her primary duty even though the discretion usually associated with management may be limited by the company's desire for standardization and uniformity. * * * [Emphasis added.]

Plaintiffs also contend that they were not relatively free from supervision because their district managers spent "substantial amounts of time" in Plaintiffs' stores. * * * On the other hand, it is uncontroverted that each Plaintiff as store manager was the single highest-ranking employee in his particular store and was responsible on site for that store's day-to-day overall operations. Indeed, department and assistant managers have been held exempt under the executive exemption even when their superiors worked in close proximity to them at the same location. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Plaintiffs still were vested with enough discretionary power and freedom from supervision to qualify for the executive exemption.

The final factor is the relationship between Plaintiffs' salary and the wages paid to non-exempt employees. Plaintiffs argue, with no supporting evidence, that their compensation "approximated that received by some assistant store managers." It is undisputed, however, that Plaintiffs received nearly twice the total annual compensation received by their highest-paid shift supervisors, and Plaintiffs received bonuses and benefits not available to other employees (including assistant managers). This marked disparity in pay and benefits between Plaintiffs and the non-exempt employees is a hallmark of exempt status.

● Decision and Remedy The court issued a summary judgment in Starbucks' favor and dismissed the claims of the plaintiffs, who were exempt from the FLSA's overtime provisions as executive employees. The court concluded that during their employment the plaintiffs' "primary duty" was management.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Keevican's job title had been "glorified barista" instead of "manager." Would the result have been different? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension What might the court have concluded if the store could have operated successfully without the plaintiffs' performing their "managerial" functions?

Labor Unions

In the 1930s, in addition to wage-hour laws, Congress enacted several other laws regulating employment relationships. These laws protect employees' rights to join labor unions, to bargain with management over the terms and conditions of employment, and to conduct strikes.

Federal Labor Laws

Federal labor laws governing union-employer relations have developed considerably since the first law was enacted in 1932. Initially, the laws were concerned with protecting the rights and interests of workers. Subsequent legislation placed some restraints on unions and granted rights to employers. We look here at four major federal statutes regulating union-employer relations.

Norris-LaGuardia Act Congress protected peaceful strikes, picketing, and boycotts in 1932 in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.¹² The statute restricted the power of federal courts to issue injunctions against unions engaged in peaceful strikes. In effect, this act declared a national policy permitting employees to organize.

National Labor Relations Act One of the foremost statutes regulating labor is the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) of 1935.¹³ The purpose of the NLRA was to secure for employees the rights to organize; to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; and to engage in concerted activities for organizing, collective bargaining, and other purposes. The NLRA specifically defined a number of employer practices as unfair to labor:

1. Interference with the efforts of employees to form, join, or assist labor organizations or to engage in concerted activities for their mutual aid or protection.
2. An employer's domination of a labor organization or contribution of financial or other support to it.
3. Discrimination in the hiring of or the awarding of tenure to employees for reason of union affiliation.
4. Discrimination against employees for filing charges under the act or giving testimony under the act.

12. 29 U.S.C. Sections 101–110, 113–115.

13. 20 U.S.C. Sections 151–169.

5. Refusal to bargain collectively with the duly designated representative of the employees.

To ensure that employees' rights would be protected, the NLRA established the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). The NLRB has the authority to investigate employees' charges of unfair labor practices and to file complaints against employers in response to these charges. When violations are found, the NLRB may also issue cease-and-desist orders—orders compelling employers to stop engaging in the unfair practices. Cease-and-desist orders can be enforced by a circuit court of appeals if necessary. Disputes over alleged unfair labor practices are first decided by the NLRB and may then be appealed to a federal court.

To be protected under the NLRA, an individual must be an employee or a job applicant (otherwise, the NLRA's ban on discrimination in regard to hiring would mean little). Additionally, the United States Supreme Court has held that individuals who are hired by a union to organize a company (union organizers) are to be considered employees of the company for NLRA purposes.¹⁴

Labor-Management Relations Act The Labor-Management Relations Act (LMRA) of 1947¹⁵ was passed to proscribe certain unfair union practices, such as the closed shop. A closed shop is a firm that requires union membership by its workers as a condition of employment. Although the act made the closed shop illegal, it preserved the legality of the union shop. A union shop is a firm that does not require union membership as a prerequisite for employment but can, and usually does, require that workers join the union after a specified amount of time on the job.

The LMRA also prohibited unions from refusing to bargain with employers, engaging in certain types of picketing, and featherbedding (causing employers to hire more employees than necessary). In addition, the act allowed individual states to pass their own right-to-work laws—laws making it illegal for union membership to be required for continued employment in any establishment. Thus, union shops are technically illegal in the twenty-two states that have right-to-work laws.

Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act

The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act (LMRDA) of 1959¹⁶ established an employee bill of rights and reporting requirements for union activities. The act strictly regulates unions' internal business procedures, including elections. For example, the LMRDA requires unions to hold regularly scheduled elections of officers using secret ballots. Former convicts are prohibited from holding union office. Moreover, union officials are accountable for union property and funds. Members have the right to attend and to participate in union meetings, to nominate officers, and to vote in most union proceedings.

The act also outlawed hot-cargo agreements, in which employers voluntarily agree with unions not to handle, use, or deal in goods of other employers produced by nonunion employees. The act made all such boycotts (called secondary boycotts) illegal.

Union Organization

Forming a union requires support from a majority of the employees in a defined bargaining unit, such as all of the workers at a specific automotive plant or all of the nurses employed by a particular hospital. Typically, the first step union organizers (unionizers) take is to have the workers that the union is seeking to represent sign authorization cards. An authorization card usually states that the worker desires to have a certain union, such as the United Auto Workers, represent the workforce. If a majority of the workers sign authorization cards, the organizers can present the cards to the employer and ask for formal recognition of the union. The employer is not required to recognize the union at this point, but it may do so voluntarily on a showing of majority support. (Under legislation that was proposed in 2007, the employer would have been required to recognize the union as soon as a majority of the workers had signed authorization cards—without holding an election, as described next.¹⁷)

Union Elections If the employer refuses to voluntarily recognize the union after a majority of the workers sign authorization cards—or if fewer than 50 percent of the workers sign authorization cards—the union organizers can petition the NLRB for an election. For an election to be held, the NLRB requires that unionizers demonstrate that at least 30 percent of the workers to be represented support a union or an election on unionization. The NLRB supervises the election and ensures that the voting is secret and that the voters are eligible. If the proposed union receives majority support (more than 50 percent of the votes) in a fair election, the NLRB certifies the union as the bargaining representative for the employees.

Union Election Campaigns Many disputes between labor and management arise during union election campaigns. Generally, the employer has control over union solicitation activities that take place on company property and during working hours. The employer can limit union solicitation activities to nonwork areas, such as the cafeteria or parking lot, and to nonwork hours, such as lunch hours, coffee breaks, and before and after work. The employer must have a legitimate business reason for limiting the union solicitation activities and cannot discriminate against the union in its policies on solicitation.

For example, suppose that a union is seeking to organize clerks at a department store owned by Amanti Enterprises. Amanti can prohibit all union solicitation in areas of the store open to the public because the unionizing activities could interfere with the store's business. It can also restrict union-related activities to coffee breaks and lunch hours. Amanti cannot, however, allow solicitation for charitable causes during work hours or in the public part of the store if it prohibits union-related solicitation.

An employer may campaign among its workers against the union, but the NLRB carefully monitors and regulates the tactics used by management. Otherwise, management might use its economic power to coerce the workers to vote not to unionize. If the employer issues threats ("If the union wins, you'll all be fired") or engages in other unfair labor practices, the NLRB can issue a cease-and-desist order. The NLRB may also ask a court to order a new election, or it may certify the union even though it lost the election. Like an employer, a union and its supporters may not engage in unfair labor practices during a union election campaign.¹⁸

Collective Bargaining

If the NLRB certifies the union, the union becomes the exclusive bargaining representative of the workers. The central legal right of a union is to engage in collective

17. The U.S. House of Representatives passed the Employee Free Choice Act, also known as the Card Check Bill (H.R. 800), in March 2007, but the bill (S 1041) was defeated in the U.S. Senate in June 2007. Because this pro-labor measure enjoyed wide support, similar legislation is likely to be proposed in the future.

18. See, for example, Associated Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 296 F.3d 1055 (11th Cir. 2002).

bargaining on the members' behalf. Collective bargaining is the process by which labor and management negotiate the terms and conditions of employment, including wages, benefits, working conditions, and other matters. Collective bargaining allows union representatives elected by the union members to speak on their behalf at the bargaining table.

When a union is officially recognized, it may demand to bargain with the employer and negotiate new terms or conditions of employment. In collective bargaining, as in most other business negotiations, each side uses its economic power to pressure or persuade the other side to grant concessions.

Bargaining does not mean that one side must give in to the other or that compromises must be made. It does mean that a demand to bargain with the employer must be taken seriously and that both sides must bargain in "good faith." Good faith bargaining requires that management, for example, be willing to meet with union representatives and consider the union's wishes when negotiating a contract. Examples of bad faith bargaining on the part of management include engaging in a campaign among workers to undermine the union, constantly shifting positions on disputed contract terms, and sending bargainers who lack authority to commit the company to a contract. If an employer (or a union) refuses to bargain in good faith without justification, it has committed an unfair labor practice, and the other party may petition the NLRB for an order requiring good faith bargaining.

Strikes

Even when labor and management have bargained in good faith, they may be unable to reach a final agreement. When extensive collective bargaining has been conducted and an impasse results, the union may call a strike against the employer to pressure it into making concessions. A strike occurs when the unionized employees leave their jobs and refuse to work. The workers also typically picket the workplace, walking or standing outside the facility with signs stating their complaints.

A strike is an extreme action. Striking workers lose their right to be paid, and management loses production and may lose customers, if it cannot fill their orders. Labor law regulates the circumstances and conduct of strikes. A union may strike when the employer has engaged in unfair labor practices, but most strikes are "economic strikes," which are initiated because the union wants a better contract. For example, in 2007, the United Auto Workers engaged in an economic strike when General Motors (GM) proposed that its workers accept wage cuts and pay much higher monthly premiums for health care. Approximately 73,000 GM employees walked off the job, shutting down several plants in the United States and Canada. Although the strike was settled quickly, it nevertheless resulted in lost production and profits for the company, its suppliers, and its contractors, as well as lost wages for the strikers.

The Right to Strike The right to strike is guaranteed by the NLRA, within limits, and strike activities, such as picketing, are protected by the free speech guarantee of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Nonworkers have a right to participate in picketing an employer. The NLRA also gives workers the right to refuse to cross a picket line of fellow workers who are engaged in a lawful strike. Employers are permitted to hire replacement workers to substitute for the striking workers.

The Rights of Strikers after a Strike Ends An important issue concerns the rights of strikers after a strike ends. In a typical economic strike, the employer has a right to hire permanent replacements during the strike and need not terminate the replacement workers when the economic strikers seek to return to work. In other words, striking workers are not guaranteed the right to return to their jobs after the strike if satisfactory replacement workers have been found.

If the employer has not hired replacement workers to fill the strikers' positions, however, then the employer must rehire the economic strikers to fill any vacancies. Employers may not discriminate against former economic strikers, and those who are rehired retain their seniority rights. Different rules apply when a union strikes because the employer has engaged in unfair labor practices. In this situation, the employer may still hire replacements but must give the strikers back their jobs once the strike is over.

Worker Health and Safety

Under the common law, employees injured on the job had to rely on tort law, contract law, or agency law principles (discussed in Chapters 31 and 32) to seek recovery from their employers. Today, numerous state and federal statutes protect employees from the risk of accidental injury, death, or disease resulting from their employment. This section discusses the primary federal statute governing health and safety in the workplace, along with state workers' compensation acts.

The Occupational Safety and Health Act

At the federal level, the primary legislation protecting employees' health and safety is the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970.¹⁹ Congress passed this act in an attempt to ensure safe and healthful working conditions for practically every employee in the country. The act not only imposes a general duty on employers to keep workplaces safe but also requires them to meet specific standards.

Enforcement Agencies Three federal agencies develop and enforce the standards set by the Occupational Safety and Health Act. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), which is part of the U.S. Department of Labor, has the authority to promulgate standards, make inspections, and enforce the act. OSHA has issued safety standards governing many workplace details, such as the structural stability of ladders and the requirements for railings. OSHA also establishes standards that protect employees against exposure to substances that may be harmful to their health.

The National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health is part of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. It conducts research on safety and health problems and recommends standards for OSHA to adopt. Finally, the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission is an independent agency set up to handle appeals from actions taken by OSHA administrators.

Procedures and Violations OSHA compliance officers may enter and inspect the facilities of any establishment covered by the Occupational Safety and Health Act.²⁰ Employees may also file complaints of violations. Under the act, an employer cannot discharge an employee who files a complaint or who, in good faith, refuses to work in a high-risk area if bodily harm or death might result.

Employers with eleven or more employees are required to keep occupational injury and illness records for each employee. Each record must be made available for inspection when requested by an OSHA inspector. Whenever a work-related injury or disease occurs, employers must make reports directly to OSHA. Whenever an employee is killed in a work-related accident or when five or more employees are hospitalized in one accident, the employer must notify the Department of Labor within forty-eight hours. If the company fails to do so, it will be fined. Following the accident, a complete inspection of the premises is mandatory.

Criminal penalties for willful violation of the Occupational Safety and Health Act are limited. Employers may be prosecuted under state laws, however. In other words, the act does not preempt state and local criminal laws.²¹

State Workers' Compensation Laws

State workers' compensation laws establish an administrative procedure for compensating workers injured on the job. Instead of suing, an injured worker files a claim with the administrative agency or board that administers the local workers' compensation claims.

Employees Who Are Covered by Workers' Compensation Most workers' compensation statutes are similar. No state covers all employees. Typically, domestic workers, agricultural workers, temporary employees, and employees of common carriers (companies that provide transportation services to the public) are excluded, but minors are covered. Usually, the statutes allow employers to purchase insurance from a private insurer or a state fund to pay workers' compensation benefits in the event of a claim. Most states also allow employers to be self-insured—that is, employers that show an ability to pay claims do not need to buy insurance.

Requirements for Receiving Workers' Compensation In general, the right to recover benefits is predicated wholly on the existence of an

Although this case has not been overruled, the Supreme Court subsequently indicated that statutory inspection programs can provide a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant. employment relationship and the fact that the worker's injury was accidental and occurred on the job or in the course of employment, regardless of fault. Intentionally inflicted self-injury, for example, would not be considered accidental and hence would not be covered. If an injury occurs while an employee is commuting to or from work, it usually will not be considered to have occurred on the job or in the course of employment and hence will not be covered.

An employee must notify his or her employer of an injury promptly (usually within thirty days of the injury's occurrence). Generally, an employee must also file a workers' compensation claim with the appropriate state agency or board within a certain period (sixty days to two years) from the time the injury is first noticed, rather than from the time of the accident.

Workers' Compensation versus Litigation

An employee who accepts workers' compensation benefits is prohibited from suing for injuries caused by the employer's negligence. By barring lawsuits for negligence, workers' compensation laws also prevent employers from raising common law defenses to negligence, such as contributory negligence or assumption of risk, to avoid liability. A worker may sue an employer who intentionally injures the worker, however.

Income Security, Pension, and Health Plans

Federal and state governments participate in insurance programs designed to protect employees and their families from the financial impact of retirement, disability, death, hospitalization, and unemployment. The key federal law on this subject is the Social Security Act of 1935.²²

Social Security

The Social Security Act of 1935 provides for old-age (retirement), survivors', and disability insurance. The act is therefore often referred to as OASDI. Both employers and employees must "contribute" under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (FICA)²³ to help pay for benefits that will partially make up for the employees' loss of income on retirement.

The basis for the employee's and the employer's contribution is the employee's annual wage base—the maximum amount of the employee's wages that is subject to the tax. The employer withholds the employee's FICA contribution from the employee's wages and then matches this contribution. The annual wage base increases each year to take into account the rising cost of living. In 2008, employers were required to withhold 6.2 percent of each employee's wages, up to a maximum wage base of $102,000, and to match this contribution.

Retired workers are eligible to receive monthly payments from the Social Security Administration, which administers the Social Security Act. Social Security benefits are fixed by statute but increase automatically with increases in the cost of living.

Medicare

Medicare, a federal government health-insurance program, is administered by the Social Security Administration for people sixty-five years of age and older and for some under age sixty-five who are disabled. It originally had two parts, one pertaining to hospital costs and the other to nonhospital medical costs, such as visits to physicians' offices. People who have Medicare hospital insurance can obtain additional federal medical insurance if they pay small monthly premiums, which increase as the cost of medical care rises.

As with Social Security contributions, both the employer and the employee "contribute" to Medicare, but unlike Social Security, there is no cap on the amount of wages subject to the Medicare tax. In 2008, both the employer and the employee were required to pay 1.45 percent of all wages and salaries to finance Medicare. Thus, for Social Security and Medicare together, in 2008 the employer and employee each paid 7.65 percent of the first $102,000 of income (6.2 percent for Social Security + 1.45 percent for Medicare), for a combined total of 15.3 percent. In addition, all wages and salaries above $102,000 were taxed at a combined (employer and employee) rate of 2.9 percent for Medicare. Self-employed persons pay both the employer and the employee portions of the Social Security and Medicare taxes (15.3 percent of income up to $102,000 and 2.9 percent of income above that amount in 2008).

Private Pension Plans

The Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) of 1974²⁴ is the major federal act regulating employee retirement plans set up by employers to supplement Social Security benefits. This statute empowers the Labor Management Services Administration of the U.S. Department of Labor to enforce its provisions governing employers who have private pension funds for their employees. ERISA does not require an employer to establish a pension plan. When a plan exists, however, ERISA provides standards for its management.

A key provision of ERISA concerns vesting. Vesting gives an employee a legal right to receive pension benefits at some future date when she or he stops working. Before ERISA was enacted, some employees who had worked for companies for as long as thirty years received no pension benefits when their employment terminated because those benefits had not vested. ERISA establishes complex vesting rules. Generally, however, all of an employee's contributions to a pension plan vest immediately, and the employee's rights to the employer's contributions vest after five years of employment.

In an attempt to prevent mismanagement of pension funds, ERISA has established rules on how they must be invested. Managers must choose investments cautiously and must diversify the plan's investments to minimize the risk of large losses. ERISA also includes detailed record-keeping and reporting requirements.

Unemployment Compensation

To ease the financial impact of unemployment, the United States has a system of unemployment insurance. The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) of 1935²⁵ created a state-administered system that provides unemployment compensation to eligible individuals. Under this system, employers pay into a fund, and the proceeds are paid out to qualified unemployed workers. FUTA and state laws require employers that fall under the provisions of the act to pay unemployment taxes at regular intervals.

FUTA generally determines covered employment and imposes certain requirements on state unemployment programs, but the states determine individual eligibility requirements and benefit amounts. To be eligible for unemployment compensation, a worker must be willing and able to work and be actively seeking employment. Workers who have been fired for misconduct or who have left their jobs without good cause normally are not eligible for benefits.

COBRA

Federal legislation also addresses the issue of health insurance for workers who have lost their jobs and are no longer eligible for group health-insurance plans. Employers who have twenty or more employees and provide a group health plan must comply with the requirements of the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act (COBRA) of 1985.²⁶ COBRA basically gives employees a right to continue the group health benefits provided by their employers for a limited time after the voluntary or involuntary loss of employment. The act also applies to workers who are no longer eligible for coverage under the employer's health plan because their hours have been decreased. Spouses, former spouses, and dependent children who were covered under the plan also have the right to continue health coverage.

Procedures under COBRA An employer must notify an employee of COBRA's provisions if the worker faces termination or a reduction of hours that would affect her or his eligibility for coverage under the plan. The worker has sixty days (beginning with the date that the group coverage would stop) to decide whether to continue with the employer's group insurance plan. If the worker chooses to discontinue the coverage, then the employer has no further obligation. If the worker chooses to continue coverage, the employer is obligated to keep the policy active for up to eighteen months but is not required to pay for the coverage.²⁷

Usually, the worker (or beneficiary) must pay the premiums for continued coverage, plus an additional 2 percent administrative fee. The coverage provided must be the same as that enjoyed by the worker prior to the termination or reduction of employment. If family members were originally included, for example, COBRA prohibits their exclusion.

Employer's Obligations under COBRA

The employer is relieved of the responsibility to provide COBRA coverage if the worker fails to pay the premium, becomes eligible for Medicare, or is covered under another health plan (such as a spouse's or new employer's). The employer is also relieved of the obligation if the employer completely cancels its group benefit plan for all employees. An employer that fails to comply with COBRA risks substantial penalties, such as a tax of up to 10 percent of the annual cost of the group plan or $500,000, whichever is less.

Employer-Sponsored Group Health Plans

The Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA),²⁸ which was discussed in Chapter 4 in the context of its privacy protections, contains provisions that affect employer-sponsored group health plans. HIPAA does not require employers to provide health insurance, but it does establish requirements for those that do. One provision of HIPAA limits an employer's ability to exclude persons from coverage for "preexisting conditions" to conditions for which medical treatment was received within the previous six months (excluding pregnancy). Another provision requires that an employee be given credit for previous health coverage (including COBRA coverage) to decrease any waiting period before coverage becomes effective.

In addition, employers that are plan sponsors have significant responsibilities regarding the manner in which they collect, use, and disclose the health information of employees and their families. Employers must comply with numerous administrative, technical, and procedural safeguards (such as training employees, designating privacy officials, and distributing privacy notices) to ensure that employees' health information is not disclosed to unauthorized parties. Failure to comply with HIPAA regulations can result in civil penalties of up to $100 per person per violation (with a cap of $25,000 per year). The employer is also subject to criminal prosecution for certain types of HIPAA violations and can face up to $250,000 in criminal fines and imprisonment for up to ten years if convicted.

Family and Medical Leave

In 1993, Congress passed the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA)²⁹ to protect employees who need time off work for family or medical reasons. A majority of the states also have legislation allowing for a leave from employment for family or medical reasons, and many employers maintain private family-leave plans for their workers.

Coverage and Application of the FMLA

The FMLA requires employers who have fifty or more employees to provide an employee with up to twelve weeks of family or medical leave during any twelve-month period. Generally, an employee may take family leave to care for a newborn baby, an adopted child, or a foster child, and medical leave when the employee or the employee's spouse, child, or parent has a "serious health condition" requiring care.³⁰ Employees suffering from certain chronic health conditions, such as asthma, diabetes, and pregnancy, may take FMLA leave for their own incapacities that require absences of fewer than three days.

The employer must continue the worker's health-care coverage and guarantee employment in the same position or a comparable position when the employee returns to work. An important exception to the FMLA, however, allows the employer to avoid reinstating a key employee—defined as an employee whose pay falls within the top 10 percent of the firm's workforce. (The employer must continue to maintain health benefits for the key employee during the leave, however.) Also, the act does not apply to part-time or newly hired employees (those who have worked for less than one year).

The FMLA expressly covers private and public (government) employees. Nevertheless, some states argued that public employees could not sue their state employers in federal courts to enforce their FMLA rights unless the states consented to be sued.³¹ This argument came before the United States Supreme Court in the following case.

29. 29 U.S.C. Sections 2601, 2611–2619, 2651–2654.

30. The foster care must be state sanctioned before such an arrangement falls within the coverage of the FMLA.

31. Under the Eleventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, a state is immune from suit in a federal court unless the state agrees to be sued.

CASE 33.3

Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs

Supreme Court of the United States, 2003. 538 U.S. 721, 123 S.Ct. 1972, 155 L.Ed.2d 953.

Chief Justice REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Petitioners include the Nevada Department of Human Resources (Department) * * * . Respondent William Hibbs (hereinafter respondent) worked for the Department's Welfare Division. In April and May 1997, he sought leave under the FMLA to care for his ailing wife, who was recovering from a car accident and neck surgery. The Department granted his request for the full 12 weeks of FMLA leave and authorized him to use the leave intermittently as needed between May and December 1997. Respondent did so until August 5, 1997, after which he did not return to work. In October 1997, the Department informed respondent that he had exhausted his FMLA leave, that no further leave would be granted, and that he must report to work by November 12, 1997. Respondent failed to do so and was terminated.

Respondent sued petitioners in [a] United States District Court * * * . The District Court awarded petitioners summary judgment on the grounds that the FMLA claim was barred by the [U.S. Constitution's] Eleventh Amendment * * * . Respondent appealed * * * . The Ninth Circuit reversed.

We granted certiorari * * * .

The history of the many state laws limiting women's employment opportunities is chronicled in—and, until relatively recently, was sanctioned by—this Court's own opinions. For example, in [previous cases] the Court upheld state laws prohibiting women from practicing law and tending bar * * * . State laws frequently subjected women to distinctive restrictions, terms, conditions, and benefits for those jobs they could take. In [one case] for example, this Court approved a state law limiting the hours that women could work for wages, and observed that 19 States had such laws at the time. Such laws were based on the related beliefs that (1) woman is, and should remain, the center of home and family life, and (2) a proper discharge of a woman's maternal functions—having in view not merely her own health, but the well-being of the race—justifies legislation to protect her from the greed as well as the passion of man. Until [1971] it remained the prevailing doctrine that government, both federal and state, could withhold from women opportunities accorded men so long as any basis in reason—such as the above beliefs—could be conceived for the discrimination.

Congress responded to this history of discrimination by abrogating [revoking] States' sovereign immunity in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 * * * .^a But state gender discrimination did not cease. * * * According to evidence that was before Congress when it enacted the FMLA, States continue[d] to rely on invalid gender stereotypes in the employment context, specifically in the administration of leave benefits. * * *

* * * *

Congress * * * heard testimony that parental leave for fathers * * * is rare. Even * * * where child-care leave policies do exist, men, both in the public and private sectors, receive notoriously discriminatory treatment in their requests for such leave. Many States offered women extended "maternity" leave that far exceeded the typical 4- to 8-week period of physical disability due to pregnancy and childbirth, but very few States granted men a parallel benefit: Fifteen States provided women up to one year of extended maternity leave, while only four provided men with the same. This and other differential leave policies were not attributable to any differential physical needs of men and women, but rather to the pervasive sex-role stereotype that caring for family members is women's work.

* * * *

* * * Because employers continued to regard the family as the woman's domain, they often denied men similar accommodations or discouraged them from taking leave. These mutually reinforcing stereotypes created a self-fulfilling cycle of discrimination that forced women to continue to assume the role of primary family caregiver, and fostered employers' stereotypical views about women's * * * value as employees. * * *

a. This statute will be discussed in detail in Chapter 34.

* * * *

By creating an across-the-board, routine employment benefit for all eligible employees, Congress sought to ensure that family-care leave would no longer be stigmatized as an inordinate drain on the workplace caused by female employees, and that employers could not evade leave obligations simply by hiring men. By setting a minimum standard of family leave for all eligible employees, irrespective of gender, the FMLA attacks the formerly state-sanctioned stereotype that only women are responsible for family caregiving, thereby reducing employers' incentives to engage in discrimination by basing hiring and promotion decisions on stereotypes. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [T]he FMLA is narrowly targeted at the fault line between work and family—precisely where sex-based overgeneralization has been and remains strongest—and affects only one aspect of the employment relationship.

* * * *

For the above reasons, we conclude that [the FMLA] is congruent [harmonious] and proportional to its remedial object, and can be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior. The judgment of the Court of Appeals [holding that the Eleventh Amendment did not bar the plaintiff's suit] is therefore Affirmed.

 QUESTIONS

1. What did the Court hold with respect to the primary issue in this case?
2. How might a law foster discrimination even when the law is not obviously discriminatory?

Remedies for Violations of the FMLA

Remedies for violations of the FMLA include (1) damages for unpaid wages (or salary), lost benefits, denied compensation, and actual monetary losses (such as the cost of providing for care of the family member) up to an amount equivalent to the employee's wages for twelve weeks; (2) job reinstatement; and (3) promotion, if a promotion had been denied. A successful plaintiff is entitled to court costs, attorneys' fees, and—in cases involving bad faith on the part of the employer—two times the amount of damages awarded by a judge or jury. Supervisors may also be subject to personal liability, as employers, for violations of the act when the supervisor exercises sufficient control over the employee's leave.³²

Employers generally are required to notify employees when an absence will be counted against leave authorized under the act. If an employer fails to provide such notice, and the employee consequently suffers an injury because he or she did not receive notice, the employer may be sanctioned.³³

33. Ragsdale v. Wolverine World Wide, Inc., 535 U.S. 81, 122 S.Ct. 1155, 152 L.Ed.2d 167 (2002); and Mondaine v. American Drug Stores, Inc., 408 F.Supp.2d 1169 (D.Kan. 2006).

Interaction with Other Laws

The FMLA does not affect any other federal or state law that prohibits discrimination. Nor does it supersede any state or local law that provides more generous family- or medical-leave protection. For example, if a California state law allows employees who are disabled by pregnancy to take up to four months of unpaid leave, an employer in California would have to comply with that law (in addition to the provisions of the FMLA). Also, an employer who is obligated to provide more extensive leave under a collective bargaining agreement must do so, regardless of the FMLA.

Employee Privacy Rights

In the last thirty years, concerns about the privacy rights of employees have arisen in response to the sometimes invasive tactics used by employers to monitor and screen workers. Perhaps the greatest privacy concern in today's employment arena has to do with electronic monitoring of employees' activities. Clearly, employers need to protect themselves from liability for their employees' online activities. They also have a legitimate interest in monitoring the productivity of their workers. At the same time, employees expect to have a certain zone of privacy in the workplace. Indeed, many lawsuits have alleged that employers' intrusive monitoring practices violate employees' privacy rights.

Electronic Monitoring in the Workplace

According to the American Management Association, more than two-thirds of employers engage in some form of electronic monitoring of their employees. Types of monitoring include monitoring workers' Web site connections, reviewing employees' e-mail and computer files, video recording of employee job performance, and recording and reviewing telephone conversations and voice mail.

Various specially designed software products have made it easier for an employer to track employees' Internet use. Software allows an employer to track almost every move an employee makes on the Internet, including the specific Web sites visited and the time spent surfing the Web. Filtering software, which was discussed in Chapter 4, can be used to prevent access to certain Web sites, such as sites containing sexually explicit images. Other filtering software may be used to screen incoming e-mail for viruses and to block junk e-mail (spam).

Although the use of filtering software by public employers (government agencies) has led to charges that blocking access to Web sites violates employees' rights to free speech, this issue does not arise in private businesses. This is because the First Amendment's protection of free speech applies only to government restraints on speech, not restraints imposed in the private sector.

Employee Privacy Protection under Constitutional and Tort Law Recall from Chapter 4 that the United States Supreme Court has inferred a personal right to privacy from the constitutional guarantees provided by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution. Tort law (see Chapters 6 and 7), state constitutions, and a number of state and federal statutes also provide for privacy rights.

When determining whether an employer should be held liable for violating an employee's privacy rights, the courts generally weigh the employer's interests against the employee's reasonable expectation of privacy. Normally, if employees are informed that their communications are being monitored, they cannot reasonably expect those communications to be private. If employees are not informed that certain communications are being monitored, however, the employer may be held liable for invading their privacy. For this reason, today most employers that engage in electronic monitoring notify their employees about the monitoring.

For the most part, courts have held that an employer's monitoring of electronic communications in the workplace does not violate employees' privacy rights. Even if employees are not informed that their e-mail will be monitored, courts have generally concluded that employees have no expectation of privacy if the employer provided the e-mail system.³⁴ Courts have even found that employers have a right to monitor the e-mail of an independent contractor (such as an insurance agent) when the employer provided the e-mail service and was authorized to access stored messages.³⁵

The Electronic Communications Privacy Act

The major statute with which employers must comply is the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA) of 1986.³⁶ This act amended existing federal wiretapping law to cover electronic forms of communications, such as communications via cellular telephones or e-mail. The ECPA prohibits the intentional interception of any wire or electronic communication or the intentional disclosure or use of the information obtained by the interception. Excluded from coverage, however, are any electronic communications through devices that are "furnished to the subscriber or user by a provider of wire or electronic communication service" and that are being used by the subscriber or user, or by the provider of the service, "in the ordinary course of its business."

This "business-extension exception" to the ECPA permits an employer to monitor employees' electronic communications in the ordinary course of business. It does not, however, permit an employer to monitor employees' personal communications. Under another exception to the ECPA, however, an employer may avoid liability under the act if the employees consent to having their electronic communications intercepted by the employer. Thus, an employer may be able to avoid liability under the ECPA by simply requiring employees to sign forms indicating that they consent to such monitoring.

Other Types of Monitoring

In addition to monitoring their employees' online activities, employers also engage in other types of employee screening and monitoring practices. The practices discussed below have often been challenged as violations of employee privacy rights.

Lie-Detector Tests At one time, many employers required employees or job applicants to take polygraph examinations (lie-detector tests). To protect the privacy interests of employees and job applicants, in 1988 Congress passed the Employee Polygraph Protection Act.³⁷ The act prohibits employers from (1) requiring or causing employees or job applicants to take lie-detector tests or suggesting or requesting that they do so; (2) using, accepting, referring to, or asking about the results of lie-detector tests taken by employees or applicants; and (3) taking or threatening negative employment-related action against employees or applicants based on results of lie-detector tests or on their refusal to take the tests.

Employers excepted from these prohibitions include federal, state, and local government employers; certain security service firms; and companies manufacturing and distributing controlled substances. Other employers may use polygraph tests when investigating losses attributable to theft, including embezzlement and the theft of trade secrets.

Drug Testing In the interests of public safety and to reduce unnecessary costs, many employers, including the government, require their employees to submit to drug testing.

Public Employers. Government (public) employers, of course, are constrained in drug testing by the Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures (see Chapter 4). Drug testing of public employees is allowed by statute for transportation workers and is normally upheld by the courts when drug use in a particular job may threaten public safety.³⁸ The Federal Aviation Administration also requires drug and alcohol testing of all employees and contractors (including employees of foreign air carriers) who perform safety-related functions.³⁹ When there is a reasonable basis for suspecting public employees of drug use, courts often find that drug testing does not violate the Fourth Amendment.

Private Employers. The Fourth Amendment does not apply to drug testing conducted by private employers.⁴⁰ Hence, the privacy rights and drug testing of private-sector employees are governed by state law, which varies from state to state. When testing is not allowed by state statute, employees sometimes file suit against their employers for the tort of invasion of privacy, although such claims have not met with much success.

Many states have statutes that allow drug testing by private employers but put restrictions on when and how the testing may be performed. A collective bargaining agreement may also provide protection against drug testing (or authorize drug testing under certain conditions). The permissibility of a private employee's drug test often hinges on whether the employer's testing was reasonable. Random drug tests and even "zero-tolerance" policies (that deny a "second chance" to employees who test positive for drugs) have been held to be reasonable.⁴¹

AIDS and HIV Testing A number of employers test their workers for acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) or the presence of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), the virus that causes AIDS. Some state laws restrict such testing, and federal statutes—particularly the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990⁴² (see Chapter 34)—offer some protection to employees or job applicants who have AIDS or have tested positive for HIV. Employees may not be discharged and job applicants may not be discriminated against based on the results of AIDS tests. Employers are also required to safeguard a person's protected medical information and cannot disclose an employee's test results to unauthorized parties under HIPAA, which was discussed earlier in this chapter.

Employment-Related Immigration Laws

The most important immigration laws governing employment relationships are the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986⁴³ and the Immigration Act of 1990.⁴⁴

Immigration Reform and Control Act

The Immigration Reform and Control Act (IRCA), which is administered by the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, prohibits employers from hiring illegal immigrants. Employers must complete a special form—called Form I-9—for each employee, on which the employer verifies that the employee is either a U.S. citizen or is otherwise entitled to work in this country. The IRCA also provides that it is an unfair immigration-related employment practice for an employer to discriminate against any individual (other than an unauthorized alien) with respect to hiring or discharging the individual from employment.⁴⁵ (Employment discrimination will be discussed in Chapter 34.)

43. 29 U.S.C. Section 1802.

44. This act amended various provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 8 U.S.C. Sections 1101 et seq.

45. 8 U.S.C. Section 1324b.

Despite the law prohibiting employers from hiring illegal immigrants, a large number of companies do hire illegal workers, which in turn contributes to the problem of illegal immigration. In the last ten years, the government has been more aggressive in investigating and prosecuting alleged immigration violations by major U.S. firms, including Wal-Mart, Swift & Company, and Tyson Foods.

Immigration Act

U.S. immigration law is designed to serve the interests of both employers and workers. Employers desire to fill critical positions with the most qualified individuals, which sometimes means they must look beyond the domestic labor market and hire foreign-born employees. The Immigration Act of 1990 placed caps on the number of visas (entry permits) that can be issued to immigrants each year, but it also increased the number of employment-sponsored immigrants from 54,000 to 140,000 annually. (This number has not been increased since 1990, however.)

Under the act, employers recruiting employees from other countries must complete a certification process designed to protect U.S. workers. To obtain certification, the employer must demonstrate to the U.S. Department of Labor that the existing labor market in that particular area will not be harmed by the employment of a foreign worker. Typically, employers establish this lack of harm by showing that there is a shortage of qualified U.S. workers capable of performing the work.

REVIEWING Employment and Labor Law

Rick Saldona began working as a traveling salesperson for Aimer Winery in 1979. Sales constituted 90 percent of Saldona's work time. Saldona worked an average of fifty hours per week but received no overtime pay. In June 2009, Saldona's new supervisor, Caesar Braxton, claimed that Saldona had been inflating his reported sales calls and required Saldona to submit to a polygraph test. Saldona reported Braxton to the U.S. Department of Labor, which prohibited Aimer from requiring Saldona to take a polygraph test for this purpose. In August 2009, Saldona's wife, Venita, fell from a ladder and sustained a head injury while employed as a full-time agricultural harvester. Saldona delivered to Aimer's Human Resources Department a letter from his wife's physician indicating that she would need daily care for several months, and Saldona took leave until December 2009. Aimer had sixty-three employees at that time. When Saldona returned to Aimer, he was informed that his position had been eliminated because his sales territory had been combined with an adjacent territory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Saldona have been legally entitled to receive overtime pay at a higher rate? Why or why not?
2. What is the maximum length of time Saldona would have been allowed to take leave to care for his injured spouse?

3. Under what circumstances would Aimer have been allowed to require an employee to take a polygraph test?
4. Would Aimer likely be able to avoid reinstating Saldona under the key employee exception? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

33-1. Calzoni Boating Co. is an interstate business engaged in manufacturing and selling boats. The company has five hundred nonunion employees. Representatives of these employees are requesting a four-day, ten-hours-per-day workweek, and Calzoni is concerned that this would require paying time and a half after eight hours per day. Which federal act is Calzoni thinking of that might require this? Will the act in fact require paying time and a half for all hours worked over eight hours per day if the employees' proposal is accepted? Explain.

33-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Denton and Carlo were employed at an appliance plant. Their job required them to perform occasional maintenance work while standing on a wire mesh twenty feet above the plant floor. Other employees had fallen through the mesh, and one of them had been killed by the fall. When Denton and Carlo were asked by their supervisor to perform tasks that would likely require them to walk on the mesh, they refused because of their fear of bodily harm or death. Because of their refusal to do the requested work, the two employees were fired from their jobs. Was their discharge wrongful? If so, under what federal employment law? To what federal agency or department should they turn for assistance?

- For a sample answer to Question 33-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

33-3. Suppose that Consolidated Stores is undergoing a unionization campaign. Prior to the union election, management states that the union is unnecessary to protect workers. Management also provides bonuses and wage increases to the workers during this period. The employees reject the union. Union organizers protest that the wage increases during the election campaign unfairly prejudiced the vote. Should these wage increases be regarded as an unfair labor practice? Discuss.

33-4. Unfair Labor Practice. The New York Department of Education's e-mail policy prohibits the use of the e-mail system for unofficial purposes, except that officials of the New York Public Employees Federation (PEF), the union representing state employees, can use the system for some limited communications, including the scheduling of union meetings and activities. In 1998, Michael Darcy, an elected PEF official, began sending mass, union-related e-mails to employees, including a summary of a union delegates' convention, a union newsletter, a criticism of proposed state legislation, and a criticism of the state governor and the Governor's Office of Employee Relations. Richard Cate, the department's chief operating officer, met with Darcy and reiterated the department's e-mail policy. When Darcy refused to stop his use of the e-mail system, Cate terminated his access to it. Darcy filed a complaint with the New York Public Employment Relations Board, alleging an unfair labor practice. Do the circumstances support Cate's action? Why or why not?

[Benson v. Cuevas, 293 A.D.2d 927, 741 N.Y.S.2d 310 (3 Dept. 2002)]

33-5. Collective Bargaining. Verizon New York, Inc. (VNY), provides telecommunications services. VNY and the Communications Workers of America (CWA) are parties to collective bargaining agreements covering installation and maintenance employees. At one time, VNY supported annual blood drives. VNY, CWA, and charitable organizations jointly set dates, arranged appointments, and adjusted work schedules for the drives. For each drive, about a thousand employees, including managers, spent up to four hours traveling to a donor site, giving blood, recovering, and returning to their jobs. Employees received full pay for the time. In 2001, VNY told CWA that it would no longer allow employees to participate “on Company time,” claiming that it experienced problems meeting customer requests for service during the drives. CWA filed a complaint with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB), asking that VNY be ordered to bargain over the decision. Did VNY commit an unfair labor practice? Should the NLRB grant CWA’s request? Why or why not? [Verizon New York, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 360 F.3d 206 (D.C. Cir. 2004)]

33-6. Workers’ Compensation Laws. The Touch of Class Lounge is in a suburban shopping plaza, or strip mall, in Omaha, Nebraska. Patricia Bauer, the Lounge’s owner, does not own the parking lot, which is provided for the common use of all of the businesses in the plaza. Stephanie Zoucha was a bartender at the Lounge. Her duties ended when she locked the door after closing. On June 4, 2001, at 1:15 A.M., Zoucha closed the bar and locked the door from the inside. An hour later, she walked to her car in the parking lot, where she was struck with “[l]ike a tire iron on the back of my head.” Zoucha sustained a skull fracture and other injuries, including significant cognitive damage (impairment of speech and thought formation). Her purse, containing her tip money, was stolen. She identified her attacker as William Nunez, who had been in the Lounge earlier that night. Zoucha filed a petition in a Nebraska state court to obtain workers’ compensation. What are the requirements for receiving workers’ compensation? Should Zoucha’s request be granted or denied? Why? 33-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Jennifer Willis worked for Coca Cola Enterprises, Inc. (CCE), in Louisiana as a senior account manager. On a Monday in May 2003, Willis called her supervisor to tell him that she was sick and would not be able to work that day. She also said that she was pregnant, but she did not say she was sick because of the pregnancy. On Tuesday, she called to ask where to report to work and was told that she could not return without a doctor’s release. She said that she had a doctor’s appointment on “Wednesday,” which her supervisor understood to be the next day. Willis meant the following Wednesday.

More than a week later, during which time Willis did not contact CCE, she was told that she had violated CCE’s “No Call/No Show” policy. Under this policy, “an employee absent from work for three consecutive days without notifying the supervisor during that period will be considered to have voluntarily resigned.” She was fired. Willis filed a suit in a federal district court against CCE under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA). To be eligible for FMLA leave, an employee must inform an employer of the reason for the leave. Did Willis meet this requirement? Did CCE’s response to Willis’s absence violate the FMLA? Explain. [Willis v. Coca Cola Enterprises, Inc., 445 F.3d 413 (5th Cir. 2006)]

33-8. Unemployment Insurance. Mary Garas, a chemist, sought work in Missouri through Kelly Services, Inc. Kelly is a staffing agency that places individuals in jobs of varying duration with other companies. Through Kelly, Garas worked at Merial Co. from April 2005 to February 2006. After the assignment ended, Garas asked Kelly for more work. Meanwhile, she filed a claim for unemployment benefits with the Missouri Division of Employment Security (DES). In March, Kelly recruiter Rebecca Cockrum told Garas about a temporary assignment with Celsis Laboratory. Garas said that she would prefer a “more stable position,” but later asked Cockrum to submit her résumé to Celsis. Before the employer responded, Kelly told the DES that Garas had refused suitable work. Under a Missouri state statute, a claim for unemployment benefits must be denied if “the claimant failed without good cause . . . to accept suitable work when offered the claimant . . . by an employer by whom the individual was formerly employed.” The DES denied Garas’s claim for benefits. She filed an appeal with a state court. Was the DES’s denial right or wrong? Why? [Garas v. Kelly Services, Inc., 211 S.W.3d 149 (Mo. App. E.D. 2007)]

Beverly Tull had worked for Atchison Leather Products, Inc., in Kansas for ten years when, in 1999, she began to complain of hand, wrist, and shoulder pain. Atchison recommended that she contact a certain physician, who in April 2000 diagnosed the condition as carpal tunnel syndrome “severe enough” for surgery. In August, Tull filed a claim with the state workers’ compensation board. Because Atchison changed workers’ compensation insurance companies every year, a dispute arose as to which company should pay Tull’s claim. Fearing liability, no insurer would authorize treatment, and Tull was forced to delay surgery until December. The board granted her temporary total disability benefits for the subsequent six weeks that she missed work. On April 23, 2002, Berger Co. bought Atchison. The new employer adjusted Tull’s work so that it was less demanding and stressful, but she continued to suffer pain. In July, a physician diagnosed her condition as permanent. The board granted her permanent partial disability benefits. By May 2005, the bickering over the financial responsibility for Tull's claim involved five insurers—four of which had each covered Atchison for a single year and one of which covered Berger. - (a) When an injured employee files a claim for workers' compensation, a proceeding is held to assess the injury and determine the amount of compensation. Should a dispute between insurers over the payment of the claim be resolved in the same proceeding? Why or why not?

- (b) The board designated April 23, 2002, as the date of Tull's injury. What is the reason for determining the date of a worker's injury? Should the board in this case have selected this date or a different date? Why?
- (c) How should the board assess liability for the payment of Tull's medical expenses and disability benefits? Would it be appropriate to impose joint and several liability on the insurers (holding each of them responsible for the full amount of damages), or should the individual liability of each of them be determined? Explain.

Employment Discrimination

Out of the 1960s civil rights movement to end racial and other forms of discrimination grew a body of law protecting employees against discrimination in the workplace. This protective legislation further eroded the employment-at-will doctrine, which was discussed in Chapter 33. In the past several decades, judicial decisions, administrative agency actions, and legislation have restricted the ability of employers, as well as unions, to discriminate against workers on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, gender, age, or disability. A class of persons defined by one or more of these criteria is known as a protected class.

Several federal statutes prohibit employment discrimination against members of protected classes. The most important statute is Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.¹ Title VII prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, and gender. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act of 1967² and the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990³ prohibit discrimination on the basis of age and disability, respectively. The protections afforded under these laws extend to U.S. citizens who are working abroad for U.S. firms or for companies that are controlled by U.S. firms—unless to do so would violate the laws of the countries in which their workplaces are located. This “foreign laws exception” prevents employers from being subjected to conflicting laws.

This chapter focuses on the kinds of discrimination prohibited by these federal statutes. Note, however, that discrimination against employees on the basis of any of the above-mentioned criteria may also violate state human rights statutes or other state laws prohibiting discrimination.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and its amendments prohibit job discrimination against employees, applicants, and union members on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, and gender at any stage of employment. It prohibits discrimination in decisions concerning hiring, firing, promotion, demotion, discipline, compensation, opportunities for additional job training, and any other term and condition of employment.

Title VII expressly applies to employers affecting interstate commerce with fifteen or more employees, labor unions with fifteen or more members, labor unions that operate hiring halls (to which members go regularly to be rationed jobs as they become available), employment agencies, and state and local governing units or agencies. A special section of the act prohibits discrimination in most federal government employment. When Title VII applies to the employer, any employee—including an undocumented (alien) worker—can bring an action for employment discrimination.

Moreover, an employer with fewer than fifteen employees is not automatically shielded from a lawsuit filed under Title VII, as the following case illustrates.

C A S E 34.1 Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp.

Supreme Court of the United States, 2006. 546 U.S. 500, 126 S.Ct. 1235, 163 L.Ed.2d 1097.
www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

● Background and Facts For nine months, Jenifer Arbaugh worked as a bartender and waitress at the Moonlight Café, a restaurant in New Orleans, Louisiana, owned and operated by Y & H Corporation (Y & H). Yalcin Hatipoglu was one of Y & H's owners. Arbaugh quit the Moonlight's employ and filed a suit in a federal district court against Y & H under Title VII. She alleged that Hatipoglu's improper conduct had forced her to resign. (This is known as constructive discharge, a topic discussed in more detail later in this chapter.) The court entered a judgment in her favor, awarding damages of $40,000. Two weeks later, Y & H filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that the court did not have "federal subject-matter jurisdiction." Y & H asserted—for the first time in the case—that it had fewer than fifteen employees and therefore was not subject to suit under Title VII. The dispute turned on the status of eight drivers who made deliveries for the restaurant and the company's owners, including two managers and their spouses. The court concluded that none of these individuals qualified as "employees" for Title VII purposes and dismissed the case. Arbaugh appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which affirmed the lower court's decision. Arbaugh appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * The question here presented is whether the numerical qualification contained in Title VII's definition of "employer" affects federal-court subject-matter jurisdiction or, instead, delineates a substantive ingredient of a Title VII claim for relief.

* * * *

* * * To spare very small businesses from Title VII liability, Congress provided that:

"[t]he term 'employer' means a person engaged in an industry affecting commerce who has fifteen or more employees for each working day in each of twenty or more calendar weeks in the current or preceding calendar year, and any agent of such a person * * *."

Congress has broadly authorized the federal courts to exercise subject-matter jurisdiction over all civil actions arising under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. * * * In 1964, however, when Title VII was enacted, * * * [federal] jurisdiction contained an amount-in-controversy limitation: Claims could not be brought * * * unless the amount in controversy exceeded $10,000. Title VII, framed in that light, assured that the amount-in-controversy limitation would not impede an employment-discrimination complainant's access to a federal forum. The Act thus contains its own jurisdiction-conferring provision, which reads:

"Each United States district court and each United States court of a place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have jurisdiction of actions brought under this subchapter."

[Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The objection that a federal court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction may be raised by a party * * * at any stage in the litigation, even after trial and the entry of judgment. * * * By contrast, the objection that a complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted may not be asserted [after a] trial. * * *

* * * *

* * * [S]ubject-matter jurisdiction, because it involves the court's power to hear a case, can never be forfeited or waived. Moreover, courts, including this Court, have an independent obligation to determine whether subject-matter jurisdiction exists, even in the absence of a challenge from any party. Nothing in the text of Title VII indicates that Congress intended courts, on their own motion, to assure that the employee-numerosity requirement is met. [Emphasis added.]

a. In the "Browsing" section, click on "2006 Decisions." When that page opens, scroll to the name of the case and click on it to read the opinion.

Of course, Congress could make the employee-numerosity requirement “jurisdictional” * * * . Instead, the 15-employee threshold appears in a separate provision that does not speak in jurisdictional terms * * * . Given the unfairness and waste of judicial resources entailed in tying the employee-numerosity requirement to subject-matter jurisdiction, we think it the sounder course to refrain from constricting * * * Title VII’s jurisdictional provision and to leave the ball in Congress’ court. If the Legislature clearly states that a threshold limitation on a statute’s scope shall count as jurisdictional, then courts and litigants will be duly instructed and will not be left to wrestle with the issue. But when Congress does not rank a statutory limitation on coverage as jurisdictional, courts should treat the restriction as nonjurisdictional in character. Applying that readily administrable bright line to this case, we hold that the threshold number of employees for application of Title VII is an element of a plaintiff’s claim for relief, not a jurisdictional issue. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court reversed the lower court’s decision and remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court held that “the numerical threshold does not circumscribe federal-court subject-matter jurisdiction. Instead, the employee-numerosity requirement relates to the substantive adequacy of Arbaugh’s Title VII claim, and therefore could not be raised defensively late in the lawsuit.” Y & H waited too long to argue that it had too few employees to be subject to Title VII.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the lower court had determined that the Moonlight’s drivers and owners qualified as employees for Title VII purposes. How might the course of this case have been changed?

● The Global Dimension Equal employment opportunity is not a universal policy, and some countries restrict the role of women in employment. Should a U.S. firm doing business in those countries respect this position? Discuss.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) monitors compliance with Title VII. A victim of alleged discrimination, before bringing a suit against the employer, must first file a claim with the EEOC. The EEOC may investigate the dispute and attempt to obtain the parties’ voluntary consent to an out-of-court settlement. If voluntary agreement cannot be reached, the EEOC may then file a suit against the employer on the employee’s behalf. If the EEOC decides not to investigate the claim, the victim may bring his or her own lawsuit against the employer.

The EEOC does not investigate every claim of employment discrimination. Generally, it takes only “priority cases,” such as cases that affect many workers, cases involving retaliatory discharge (firing an employee in retaliation for submitting a claim with the EEOC), and cases involving types of discrimination that are of particular concern to the EEOC. In recent years, the EEOC has been receiving and investigating an increasing number of claims of religious discrimination in the workplace.⁴

Intentional and Unintentional Discrimination

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits both intentional and unintentional discrimination.

Intentional Discrimination Intentional discrimination by an employer against an employee is known as disparate-treatment discrimination. Because intent may sometimes be difficult to prove, courts have established certain procedures for resolving disparate-treatment cases. Suppose that a woman applies for employment with a construction firm and is rejected. If she sues on the basis of disparate-treatment discrimination in hiring, she must show that (1) she is a member of a protected class, (2) she applied and was qualified for the job in question, (3) she was rejected by the employer, and (4) the employer continued to seek applicants for the position or filled the position with a person not in a protected class.

If the woman can meet these relatively easy requirements, she makes out a prima facie* case of illegal discrimination. Making out a prima facie case of discrimination means that the plaintiff has met her initial burden of proof and will win in the absence of a legally acceptable employer defense. (Defenses to claims of employment discrimination will be discussed later in this chapter.) The burden then shifts to the employer-defendant, who must articulate a legal reason for not hiring the plaintiff. For example, the employer might say that the plaintiff was not hired because she lacked sufficient experience or training. To prevail, the plaintiff must then show that the employer's reason is a pretext (not the true reason) and that discriminatory intent actually motivated the employer's decision.

Unintentional Discrimination Employers often use interviews and testing procedures to choose from among a large number of applicants for job openings. Minimum educational requirements are also common. Employer practices, such as those involving educational requirements, may have an unintended discriminatory impact on a protected class. Disparate-impact discrimination occurs when a protected group of people is adversely affected by an employer's practices, procedures, or tests, even though they do not appear to be discriminatory. In a disparate-impact discrimination case, the complaining party must first show statistically that the employer's practices, procedures, or tests are discriminatory in effect. The plaintiff must show a causal link between the practice and the discriminatory effect. Once the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the practices or procedures in question were justified. There are two ways of proving that disparate-impact discrimination exists, as discussed next.

Pool of Applicants. A plaintiff can prove a disparate impact by comparing the employer's workforce to the pool of qualified individuals available in the local labor market. The plaintiff must show that as a result of educational or other job requirements or hiring procedures, the percentage of nonwhites, women, or members of other protected classes in the employer's workforce does not reflect the percentage of that group in the pool of qualified applicants. If a person challenging an employment practice can show a connection between the practice and the disparity, she or he makes out a prima facie case and need not provide evidence of discriminatory intent.

Rate of Hiring. Disparate-impact discrimination can also occur when an educational or other job requirement or hiring procedure excludes members of a protected class from an employer's workforce at a substantially higher rate than nonmembers, regardless of the racial balance in the employer's workforce. This "rates analysis" compares the selection rate for whites with that for nonwhites (or other members of a protected class). The plaintiff does not have to prove that the workforce does not reflect the percentage of qualified nonwhite persons available in the local labor market.

The EEOC has devised a test, called the "four-fifths rule" or the "80 percent rule," to determine whether an employment examination is discriminatory on its face. Under this rule, a selection rate for protected classes that is less than four-fifths, or 80 percent, of the rate for the group with the highest rate will generally be regarded as evidence of disparate impact. To illustrate: One hundred majority-group applicants take an employment test, and fifty pass the test and are hired. One hundred minority-group applicants take the test, and twenty pass the test and are hired. Because twenty is less than four-fifths (80 percent) of fifty, the test would be considered discriminatory under the EEOC guidelines.

Discrimination Based on Race, Color, and National Origin

Title VII prohibits employers from discriminating against employees or job applicants on the basis of race, color, or national origin. If an employer's standards or policies for selecting or promoting employees have a discriminatory effect on employees or job applicants in these protected classes, then a presumption of illegal discrimination arises. To avoid liability, the employer must then show that its standards or policies have a substantial, demonstrable relationship to realistic qualifications for the job in question.

For example, suppose that a city fires Cheng Mai, a Chinese American, who has worked in the city's planning department for two years. Mai claims that he was fired because of his national origin and presents evidence that the city's "residents only" policy has a discriminatory effect on Chinese Americans. The policy requires all city employees to become residents of the city within a reasonable time after being hired. Cheng Mai has not moved to the city but instead has continued to live with his wife and children in a nearby town that has a small population of Chinese Americans. Although residency requirements sometimes violate antidiscrimination laws, if the city can show that its residency requirement has a substantial, demonstrable relationship to realistic qualifications for the job in question, then normally it will not be illegal.

Reverse Discrimination Note that discrimination based on race can also take the form of reverse discrimination, or discrimination against “majority” individuals, such as white males. For example, in one Pennsylvania case, an African American woman fired four white men from their management positions at a school district. The men filed a lawsuit for racial discrimination alleging that the woman was trying to eliminate white males from the department. The woman claimed that the terminations were part of a reorganization plan to cut costs in the department. The jury sided with the men and awarded them nearly $3 million in damages. The verdict was upheld on appeal (though the damages award was reduced slightly).⁵

Potential “Section 1981” Claims Victims of racial or ethnic discrimination may also have a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1981. This section, which was enacted as part of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to protect the rights of freed slaves, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race or ethnicity in the formation or enforcement of contracts. Because employment is often a contractual relationship, Section 1981 can provide an alternative (and potentially advantageous) basis for a plaintiff’s action.⁶ Unlike Title VII, Section 1981 does not place a cap on damages (see the discussion of Title VII remedies later in this chapter). Thus, if an employee can prove that he or she was discriminated against in the formation or enforcement of a contract, the employee may be able to obtain a larger damages award under Section 1981 than would be available under Title VII.

Discrimination Based on Religion

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 also prohibits government employers, private employers, and unions from discriminating against persons because of their religion. An employer must “reasonably accommodate” the religious practices of its employees, unless to do so would cause undue hardship to the employer’s business. For example, if an employee’s religion prohibits him from working on a certain day of the week or at a certain type of job, the employer must make a reasonable attempt to accommodate these religious requirements. Employers must reasonably accommodate an employee’s religious belief even if the belief is not based on the doctrines of a traditionally recognized religion, such as Christianity or Judaism, or a denomination, such as Baptist. The only requirement is that the belief be sincerely held by the employee.⁷

Discrimination Based on Gender

Under Title VII, as well as under other federal acts (including those discussed here), employers are forbidden from discriminating against employees on the basis of gender. Employers are prohibited from classifying jobs as male or female and from advertising in help-wanted columns that are designated male or female unless the employer can prove that the gender of the applicant is essential to the job. Furthermore, employers cannot have separate male and female seniority lists. Generally, to succeed in a suit for gender discrimination, a plaintiff must demonstrate that gender was a determining factor in the employer’s decision to hire, fire, or promote him or her. Typically, this involves looking at all of the surrounding circumstances.

The Equal Pay Act of 1963⁸ prohibits employers from engaging in gender-based wage discrimination. For the act’s equal pay requirements to apply, the male and female employees must work at the same establishment doing similar work. The work need not be identical, provided there is substantial equality of skill, effort, responsibility, and working conditions. To determine whether the Equal Pay Act has been violated, a court will look to the primary duties of the two jobs. It is the job content rather than the job description that controls.⁹ If a court finds that the wage differential is due to any factor other than gender, such as a seniority or merit system, then it does not violate the Equal Pay Act.

6. See, for example, E.E.O.C. v. Sephora USA, LLC, 419 F.Supp.2d 408 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

The Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978,¹⁰ which amended Title VII, expanded the definition of gender discrimination to include discrimination based on pregnancy. Women affected by pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions must be treated—for all employment-related purposes, including the provision of benefits under employee benefit programs—the same as other persons not so affected but similar in ability to work.

Constructive Discharge

The majority of Title VII complaints involve unlawful discrimination in decisions to hire or fire employees. In some situations, however, employees who leave their jobs voluntarily can claim that they were “constructively discharged” by the employer. Constructive discharge occurs when the employer causes the employee’s working conditions to be so intolerable that a reasonable person in the employee’s position would feel compelled to quit.

Proving Constructive Discharge The plaintiff must present objective proof of intolerable working conditions, which the employer knew or had reason to know about yet failed to correct within a reasonable time period. Courts generally also require the employee to show causation—that the employer’s unlawful discrimination caused the working conditions to be intolerable. Put a different way, the employee’s resignation must be a foreseeable result of the employer’s discriminatory action.

For example, Khalil’s employer humiliates him by informing him in front of his co-workers that he is being demoted to an inferior position. Khalil’s co-workers then continually insult, harass, and make derogatory remarks to him about his national origin (he is from Iraq). The employer is aware of this discriminatory treatment but does nothing to remedy the situation, despite repeated complaints from Khalil. After several months, Khalil quits his job and files a Title VII claim. In this situation, Khalil would likely have sufficient evidence to maintain an action for constructive discharge in violation of Title VII. Although courts weigh the facts on a case-by-case basis, employee demotion is one of the most frequently cited reasons for a finding of constructive discharge, particularly when the employee was subjected to humiliation.

Applies to All Title VII Discrimination

Note that constructive discharge is a theory that plaintiffs can use to establish any type of discrimination claims under Title VII, including race, color, national origin, religion, gender, pregnancy, and sexual harassment. Constructive discharge has also been successfully used in situations that involve discrimination based on age or disability (both of which will be discussed later in this chapter). Constructive discharge is most commonly asserted in cases involving sexual harassment, however.

Sexual Harassment

Title VII also protects employees against sexual harassment in the workplace. Sexual harassment can take two forms: quid pro quo harassment and hostile-environment harassment. Quid pro quo is a Latin phrase that is often translated as “something in exchange for something else.” Quid pro quo harassment occurs when sexual favors are demanded in return for job opportunities, promotions, salary increases, or other benefits. Hostile-environment claims, in contrast, arise when a person is subjected to unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct or communication of a sexual nature. The United States Supreme Court has stated that hostile-environment harassment occurs when “the workplace is permeated with discriminatory intimidation, ridicule, and insult, that is sufficiently severe or pervasive to alter the conditions of the victim’s employment and create an abusive working environment.”¹¹

The courts determine whether the sexually offensive conduct was sufficiently severe or pervasive as to create a hostile environment on a case-by-case basis. Typically, a single incident of sexually offensive conduct is not enough to permeate the work environment (although there have been exceptions when the conduct was particularly severe). For example, if a male supervisor makes suggestive gestures and tells a female employee on one occasion that he would like to have sexual relations with her, that may not be enough to make the work environment hostile.¹² If a supervisor repeatedly makes sexually offensive comments, however, or asks for specific details about the sexual conduct of a co-worker on several occasions, this may be enough to create a hostile environment.¹³

10. 42 U.S.C. Section 2000e(k).

Harassment by Supervisors For an employer to be held liable for a supervisor's sexual harassment, the supervisor must have taken a tangible employment action against the employee. A tangible employment action is a significant change in employment status, such as firing or failing to promote an employee, reassigning the employee to a position with significantly different responsibilities, or effecting a significant change in employment benefits.

Only a supervisor, or another person acting with the authority of the employer, can cause this sort of injury. A co-worker can sexually harass another employee, and anyone who has regular contact with an employee can inflict psychological injuries by offensive conduct. A co-worker cannot dock another's pay, demote her or him, or set conditions for continued employment, however.

Supreme Court Guidelines. In 1998, in two separate cases, the United States Supreme Court issued some significant guidelines relating to the liability of employers for their supervisors' harassment of employees in the workplace. In Faragher v. City of Boca Raton,¹⁴ the Court held that an employer (a city) could be held liable for a supervisor's harassment of employees even though the employer was unaware of the behavior. The Court reached this conclusion primarily because, although the city had a written policy against sexual harassment, the policy had not been distributed to city employees. Additionally, the city had not established any procedures that could be followed by employees who felt that they were victims of sexual harassment. In Burlington Industries, Inc. v. Ellerth,¹⁵ the Court ruled that a company could be held liable for the harassment of an employee by one of its vice presidents even though the employee suffered no adverse job consequences.

In these two cases, the Court set forth some commonsense guidelines on liability for harassment in the workplace that are helpful to employers and employees alike. On the one hand, employees benefit by the ruling that employers may be held liable for their supervisors' harassment even though the employers were unaware of the actions and even though the employees suffered no adverse job consequences. On the other hand, the Court made it clear in both decisions that employers have an affirmative defense against liability for their supervisors' harassment of employees if the employers can show the following:

1. That they have taken "reasonable care to prevent and correct promptly any sexually harassing behavior" (by establishing effective harassment policies and complaint procedures, for example).
2. That the employees suing for harassment failed to follow these policies and procedures.

In 2004, the Supreme Court further clarified the tangible employment action requirement as it applies in constructive discharge cases. The Court held that "[t]o establish constructive discharge, a plaintiff alleging sexual harassment must show that the work environment became so intolerable that resignation was a fitting response. An employer may then assert the Ellerth/Faragher affirmative defense unless the plaintiff quit in reasonable response to a tangible employment action."¹⁶

Retaliation by Employer. Charges of sexual harassment by supervisors—and other claims under Title VII as well—have sometimes resulted in attempts by the employer to retaliate against the employee bringing the claim by demoting him or her or by making some other change in his or her employment status. Title VII includes an antiretaliation provision that makes it unlawful for an employer to "discriminate against" an employee or applicant who has "opposed" a practice that Title VII prohibits. In a retaliation claim, the individual asserts that she or he has suffered a harm as a result of making a charge, testifying, or participating in a Title VII investigation or proceeding.

The courts disagreed, however, on what the plaintiff had to show to prove retaliation. Some courts required a plaintiff to show that the challenged action resulted in an adverse effect on the terms or conditions of employment. Other courts required a plaintiff to show only that the challenged action would have been material to a reasonable employee. In the following case, the United States Supreme Court considered whether Title VII's ban on retaliation covers acts that are not job related.

EXTENDED CASE 34.2 Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Railway Co. v. White

Justice BREYER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

* * * Sheila White [was] the only woman working in the Maintenance of Way department at [Burlington Northern & Santa Fe Railway Company's] Tennessee Yard. * * *

In September 1997, White complained to Burlington officials that her * * * supervisor, Bill Joiner, had repeatedly told her that women should not be working in the Maintenance of Way department. [Joiner was disciplined. White was reassigned from forklift duty to "track laborer" tasks.] * * *

* * * *

On October 10, White filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC * * *).

[In December, White's supervisor, Percy Sharkey, complained to Burlington officials that White had been insubordinate. She was suspended without pay but reinstated after an investigation and awarded back pay for the period of the suspension. White filed a second charge with the EEOC.]

* * * *

* * * [Later] White filed this Title VII action against Burlington in federal [district] court. * * * [S]he claimed that Burlington's actions—(1) changing her job responsibilities, and (2) suspending her * * * without pay—amounted to unlawful retaliation in violation of Title VII. A jury found in White's favor * * * [and] awarded her $43,500 in * * * damages * * * .

* * * [On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that Title VII's antiretaliation ban is limited to acts that adversely affect the terms, conditions, or benefits of employment, and] affirmed the District Court's judgment in White's favor on both retaliation claims. [Burlington appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

* * * *

* * * The language of the [antidiscrimination] provision differs from that of the anti-retaliation provision in important ways. * * *

The * * * words in the [antidiscrimination] provision—"hire," "discharge," "compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment," "employment opportunities," and "status as an employee"—explicitly limit the scope of that provision to actions that affect employment or alter the conditions of the workplace. No such limiting words appear in the anti-retaliation provision. * * *

* * * [T]he two provisions differ not only in language but in purpose as well. The anti-discrimination provision seeks a workplace where individuals are not discriminated against because of their racial, ethnic, religious, or gender-based status. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to secure that primary objective by preventing an employer from interfering (through retaliation) with an employee's efforts to secure or advance enforcement of the Act's basic guarantees. The [antidiscrimination] provision seeks to prevent injury to individuals based on who they are, i.e., their status. The anti-retaliation provision seeks to prevent harm to individuals based on what they do, i.e., their conduct. [Emphasis added.]

To secure the first objective, Congress did not need to prohibit anything other than employment-related discrimination. * * *

But one cannot secure the second objective by focusing only upon employer actions and harm that concern employment and the workplace. * * * An employer can effectively retaliate against an employee by taking actions not directly related to his employment or by causing him harm outside the workplace. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [W]e conclude that * * * the anti-retaliation provision extends beyond workplace-related or employment-related retaliatory acts * * * .

* * * *

* * * [A] plaintiff must show that a reasonable employee would have found the challenged action materially adverse, which in this context means it well might have dissuaded a reasonable worker from making or supporting a charge of discrimination.

* * * *

* * * [In this case] the track labor duties were by all accounts more arduous and dirtier; * * * the forklift operator position required more qualifications, which is an indication of prestige; and * * * the forklift operator position was objectively considered a better job and the male employees resented White for occupying it. Based on this record, a jury could reasonably conclude that the reassignment of responsibilities would have been materially adverse to a reasonable employee.

* * * *

For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the Court evaluate the language of Title VII's "antidiscrimination" and "antiretaliation" provisions in this case?
2. What was the Court's interpretation of those provisions?

Harassment by Co-Workers and Nonemployees Often, employees alleging harassment complain that the actions of co-workers, not supervisors, are responsible for creating a hostile working environment. In such cases, the employee still has a cause of action against the employer. Generally, though, the employer will be held liable only if it knew or should have known about the harassment and failed to take immediate remedial action.

Employers may also be liable for harassment by nonemployees under certain conditions. Suppose that a restaurant owner or manager knows that a particular customer repeatedly harasses a waitress and permits the harassment to continue. In this situation, the restaurant owner may be liable under Title VII even though the customer is not an employee of the restaurant. The issue turns on the control that the employer exerts over a nonemployee. In one case, the owner of a Pizza Hut franchise was held liable for the harassment of a waitress by two male customers because no steps were taken to prevent the harassment.¹⁷

In another case, a female sales representative at Merck & Company, Inc., was temporarily assigned to work in Mexico at Merck-Mexico (a subsidiary of Merck & Company). She claimed that she was being sexually harassed and informed the supervisor in Mexico, who allegedly warned her not to report the harassment to Merck's U.S. headquarters. When she filed a lawsuit, Merck argued that it should not be liable because the alleged harassers were employed by Merck-Mexico and not by the U.S.-based Merck & Company. Although the trial court granted a summary judgment in Merck's favor, an appellate court reversed that decision. The appellate court held that there was a sufficient issue of fact as to whether Merck and its corporate affiliate in Mexico could be considered a single employer for purposes of a Title VII claim. In other words, the court ruled that there was enough evidence of Merck's control over the alleged harassers for the employee to take her case to a jury trial.¹⁸

Same-Gender Harassment The courts have also had to address the issue of whether men who are harassed by other men, or women who are harassed by other women, are also protected by laws that prohibit gender-based discrimination in the workplace. For example, what if the male president of a firm demands sexual favors from a male employee? Does this action qualify as sexual harassment? For some time, the courts were widely split on this question. In 1998, in Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Services, Inc.,¹⁹ the Supreme Court resolved the issue by holding that Title VII protection extends to situations in which individuals are harassed by members of the same gender.

Nonetheless, it can be difficult to prove that the harassment in same-gender harassment cases is “based on sex.” Suppose that a gay man is harassed by another man at the workplace. The harasser is not a homosexual and does not treat all men with hostility—just this one man. Does the victim in this situation have a cause of action under Title VII? A court may find that the harasser’s conduct does not qualify as sexual harassment under Title VII because it was based on the employee’s sexual orientation, not on his “sex.”²⁰

Note that although Title VII does not prohibit discrimination or harassment based on a person’s sexual orientation, a growing number of companies are voluntarily establishing nondiscrimination policies that include sexual orientation. According to some reports, at the end of 2006, approximately 80 percent of the companies in the Fortune 500 had banned workplace discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.²¹ In addition, an increasing number of states have passed legislation that explicitly prohibits sexual orientation discrimination in the workplace.²²

Online Harassment

Employees’ online activities can create a hostile working environment in many ways. Racial jokes, ethnic slurs, or other comments contained in e-mail may become the basis for a claim of hostile-environment harassment or other forms of discrimination. A worker who regularly sees sexually explicit images on a co-worker’s computer screen may find the images offensive and claim that they create a hostile working environment. For a discussion of some new areas in which an employer may potentially be liable for an employee’s online conduct, see this chapter’s Emerging Trends feature on pages 706 and 707.

Nevertheless, employers may be able to avoid liability for online harassment by taking prompt remedial action. For example, in one case Angela Daniels, an employee under contract to WorldCom Corporation, received racially harassing e-mailed jokes from another employee. After receiving the jokes, Daniels complained to WorldCom managers. Shortly afterward, the company issued a warning to the offending employee about the proper use of the e-mail system and held two meetings to discuss company policy on the use of the system. In Daniels’s discrimination suit against WorldCom, a federal district court concluded that the employer was not liable for its employee’s racially harassing e-mails because the employer took prompt remedial action.²³

Remedies under Title VII

Employer liability under Title VII may be extensive. If the plaintiff successfully proves that unlawful discrimination occurred, he or she may be awarded reinstatement, back pay, retroactive promotions, and damages. Compensatory damages are available only in cases of intentional discrimination. Punitive damages may be recovered against a private employer only if the employer acted with malice or reckless indifference to an individual’s rights. The statute limits the total amount of compensatory and punitive damages that the plaintiff can recover from specific employers (ranging from $50,000 against employers with one hundred or fewer employees to $300,000 against employers with more than five hundred employees).

Discrimination Based on Age

Age discrimination is potentially the most widespread form of discrimination, because anyone—regardless of race, color, national origin, or gender—could be a victim at some point in life. The Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) of 1967, as amended, prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of age against individuals forty years of age or older. The act also prohibits mandatory retirement for nonmanagerial workers. The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that the text and the legislative history of the ADEA show that it was meant to protect relatively old workers from discrimination that gives an unfair advantage to the relatively young. Therefore, the ADEA does not necessarily prohibit an employer from eliminating a health-insurance benefits program for workers under age fifty but retaining the program for workers over fifty.²⁴

For the act to apply, an employer must have twenty or more employees, and the employer’s business

EMERGING TRENDS IN BUSINESS LAW

New Issues in Online Privacy and Employment Discrimination

As computers come to be used for more aspects of both personal and professional life, the line between personal use and work-related use is becoming blurred. As this chapter has explained, employers are legally required to prevent discrimination in the workplace, including a hostile environment created by workers' online activities. That employers have a right—or even obligation—to monitor their employees' computer use to this end is generally established. Indeed, as discussed in Chapter 33, courts generally have held that employees have no expectation of privacy in their workplace computers when a private employer supplies the equipment. The limits of this privacy exception are still being tested, however, as a number of issues related to computers, privacy, and employment discrimination remain unresolved. A new issue that is just emerging is whether employers can obtain information about job applicants by conducting online searches when asking for the same information on a job application or in an interview might be illegal.

Searches of Workplace Computers

An employee who uses his or her workplace computer to view sexually explicit photographs may create a hostile environment if the photographs can be seen by other employees. Furthermore, if the photographs involve children, the employee's activities may be illegal. Courts generally have held that employers can search a workplace computer for evidence of employee misconduct^a and that they can also consent to a search by government officials. If the computer is in a locked office, however, does the employee have a greater expectation of privacy? In United States v. Ziegler^b in 2007, the court had to answer this question.

The Internet service provider for Frontline Processing Corporation informed the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) that one of Frontline's computers had been used to access child-pornography Web sites in violation of federal criminal law. The FBI investigated and determined that Jeffrey Ziegler, Frontline's director of operations, had used the computer in his office to search for and view online photos of "very young girls in various states of undress." Frontline agreed to cooperate with the FBI, and at some point, corporate employees entered Ziegler's locked office and made a backup copy of the hard drive on his computer without his consent.

Ziegler appealed his subsequent conviction for possessing child pornography on the ground that the search of his computer violated his Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable search and seizure. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit first held that Ziegler had no reasonable expectation of privacy, but on rehearing, the court changed its ruling and held that Ziegler did have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the contents of the computer in his locked office. Because the employer (Frontline) owned the computer, however, the court held that Frontline's consent validated the search. According to the court, a "computer is the type of workplace property that remains within control of the employer 'even if the employee has placed personal items in it.'"

Unresolved Issues

Certainly, the trend is clearly toward limiting employees' expectations of privacy in employer-owned computers in the workplace, but several questions still remain open.

What expectations of privacy does an employee have in a laptop computer that is provided by the company but is used by the activities must affect interstate commerce. The EEOC administers the ADEA, but the act also permits private causes of action against employers for age discrimination.

Procedures under the ADEA

The burden-shifting procedure under the ADEA is similar to that under Title VII. If a plaintiff can establish that he or she (1) was a member of the protected age group, (2) was qualified for the position from which he or she was discharged, and (3) was discharged under circumstances that give rise to an inference of discrimination, the plaintiff has established a prima facie case of unlawful age discrimination. The burden then shifts to the employer, who must articulate a legitimate reason for the discrimination. If the plaintiff can prove that the employer's reason is only a pretext and that the plaintiff's age was a determining factor in the employer's decision, the employer will be held liable under the ADEA.

If an employer offers several nondiscriminatory reasons, based on a variety of events, for an act of alleged discrimination, does the employee need to rebut every reason by proving that the events did not occur? That was the question in the following case.

employee at home or on the road? Similarly, if the employee works at home on an employer-owned computer, to what degree can the employer justify monitoring the employee's online activities? Although computers in remote locations could be used to send harassing e-mail, other employees are unlikely to view offensive material on such computers, so that justification for monitoring Internet use seems less valid.

Other issues have to do with whether employers must tell employees that their computer use will be monitored and the degree to which employers should monitor employees' online activities that are mostly personal. To date, only two states (Connecticut and Delaware) have passed laws specifically requiring private employers to inform employees that their workplace Internet activities will be monitored. Personal blogs raise an even more complex issue: Does an employer have the right to monitor its employees' personal blogs? If an employee's personal blog contains racially or sexually offensive comments about co-workers, what should the employer do? Thus far, in most of the cases involving employees dismissed for computer misuse, the employer had a written Internet policy and presented evidence that the employee knew about and disregarded the policy. According to recent surveys, however, most organizations do not have policies on employees' blogs.

Facebook, MySpace, and Job Applications

Even more problematic is another issue that is just emerging. Today, many college students and recent graduates belong to social networking sites such as Facebook.com and MySpace.com, at which they can post photographs, comments, blogs, or even videos about themselves. Some of this material is sexually suggestive, to say the least. A number of employers have begun to use search engines to search for information on job applicants. A search may turn up photos that the applicant intended to be viewed only by close friends. Such searches may reveal information about the applicant's marital status, sexual orientation, or political or religious views that the employer could not ask for on a job application or discuss in a job interview. Nevertheless, this information is now readily available to employers.

Some colleges and employment counselors are beginning to advise job seekers to make sure that they remove any information they do not want a prospective employer to see, but the issue of whether employers have a right to search for this information is likely to persist.

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE BUSINESSPERSON

1. Employers should explicitly inform all employees that their company-provided computers, even if used at home, can be monitored by the employer.
2. It is not illegal for employers to conduct an online search for information about job applicants, including their blogs and their postings at social networks such as Facebook and MySpace.

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. Suppose that an employee writes a message to like-minded persons concerning religious beliefs or political views. Can the employee be fired in that situation? Who decides what is acceptable Internet activity when there is no written policy?
2. How might an employee avoid the possibility that his or her employer will discover objectionable items on the employee's computer?

CASE 34.3 Cash Distributing Co. v. Neely Mississippi Supreme Court, 2007. 947 So.2d 286.

www.mssc.state.ms.us^a

- Background and Facts Cash Distributing Company is a distributorship for Anheuser-Busch Corporation products, including Budweiser and Michelob beers. The company has offices in Columbus, Starkville, and Tupelo, Mississippi. In 1973, James Neely began to work for Cash. At the time, the company often relaxed or ignored Anheuser-Busch rules. By the late 1990s, Neely had become the manager of the Columbus office. In 1997, Anheuser-Busch began to insist on Cash's compliance with certain standards. Danny Cash, Cash's chief executive officer, announced that he intended to strictly enforce the new rules. Part of the newly required documentation was a tracking form to detect out-of-date beer. Danny also required Neely to, among other things, submit daily call sheets to disclose where he had been and what he had done and to submit regular written employee evaluations. Neely generally refused to provide the new documents. In March 2000, Danny terminated Neely's employment, replacing him with Tony Carley, who was then thirty-eight years old. Neely filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Cash, alleging, among other things, a violation of the ADEA. Neely was awarded $120,000 in back pay. Both parties appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, which reversed the lower court's failure to grant additional remedies to Neely. Cash appealed to the Mississippi Supreme Court.

DICKINSON, Justice, for the Court.

* * * *

Where a plaintiff establishes a prima facie case, discrimination is presumed unless the employer provides a nondiscriminatory explanation for the adverse employment action.

* * * *

* * * [An] ADEA plaintiff [does not need] to rebut with specific evidence each and every nondiscriminatory reason offered by an employer for [a] termination. * * * [T]he plaintiff must * * * have an opportunity to prove * * * that the legitimate reasons offered by the defendant were not its true reasons, but were a pretext for discrimination. Requiring courts to provide this opportunity is, we think, quite different from saying that the plaintiff must present specific rebuttal evidence as to each nondiscriminatory reason for the dismissal. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Cash argues that Neely failed to rebut every nondiscriminatory reason offered for his termination. We take Cash's argument to mean that Neely had to offer proof that each of the events Cash claims led to his dismissal did not actually happen. For instance, under Cash's view of the rebuttal requirement, once Cash asserts it terminated Neely because he refused to fill out certain forms, Neely must come forward with some proof that he actually did fill out the forms. * * * [But a jury's] disbelief of the reasons put forward by the defendant does not require the [jury] to disbelieve a particular event occurred, but rather requires the [jury] to find that—even if it did occur—it was not the motivating reason for the dismissal. The jury in this case could very well have found that all of Danny's testimony about Neely's insubordination, while true, was not the real reason for Neely's dismissal.

Stated another way, * * * Neely [is required to] rebut Cash's nondiscriminatory reasons for the dismissal [only] by persuading the jury that, true or not, the reasons offered by Cash were not the motivating reasons for his termination. Thus, Neely was free to admit that some or all of the wrongful acts attributed to him by Cash were true but were not the real reason for his dismissal.

It is not enough, of course, for Neely simply to make the claim. He must produce some proof which persuades the jury that the true reason for his termination was impermissible age discrimination. * * *

* * * *

Cash does not contest that Neely established a prima facie case of discrimination under the ADEA. Instead, Cash claims it discharged Neely for the nondiscriminatory reasons of insubordination and his failure to discover and report out-of-date product on a particular occasion while riding with a salesman. Neely might have claimed that this event never happened at all, which would have served as evidence to rebut Cash's proffered [offered] reason for termination. * * *

Instead, Neely did not deny that most of the events claimed by Cash occurred. However, Neely offered substantial evidence that these events were not the reason for his termination. For instance, Neely offered evidence that despite Cash's claims of insubordination and poor performance, his operation in Columbus received perfect scores following several evaluations by the Brewery. Neely also offered evidence that out-of-date product was fairly common and that the extremely meticulous audit of his territory was unprecedented, amounting to (according to another witness) a "witch hunt."

Additionally, Neely offered evidence showing that Danny possessed discriminatory animus toward him. * * *

The jury in this case obviously credited Neely's account of his dismissal and the evidence supporting it over explanations supplied by Cash. This Court has no basis to disturb that decision on appeal. The jury was free to find that even if, as Cash claimed, Neely had been insubordinate, that justification was pretextual [untrue] based on evidence of unequal treatment [and] age-related statements made by Cash's CEO * * * .

● Decision and Remedy The Mississippi Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's judgment. An employee can prevail in an ADEA suit without rebutting every nondiscriminatory reason that an employer offers for an act of discrimination. Neely did not have to prove that the events Cash claimed led to his dismissal did not actually happen.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Neely had admitted that he had committed all of the "wrongful" acts attributed to him by Cash, would the outcome of this case have been different? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Why is discrimination presumed under the ADEA when a plaintiff establishes a prima facie case, unless the employer provides a nondiscriminatory explanation for the adverse employment action?

Replacing Older Workers with Younger Workers

Numerous age discrimination cases have been brought against employers who, to cut costs, replaced older, higher-salaried employees with younger, lower-salaried workers. Whether a firing is discriminatory or simply part of a rational business decision to prune the company's ranks is not always clear. Companies typically defend a decision to discharge a worker by asserting that the worker could no longer perform her or his duties or that the worker's skills were no longer needed.

The employee must prove that the discharge was motivated, at least in part, by age bias. Proof that qualified older employees are generally discharged before employees who are younger or that co-workers continually made unflattering age-related comments about the discharged worker may be enough. The plaintiff does not need to prove that she or he was replaced by a person "outside the protected class" (under the age of forty years), so long as the replacement is younger (or substantially younger) than the plaintiff.²⁵ Nevertheless, the bigger the age gap, the more likely the individual is to succeed in showing age discrimination.

25. O'Connor v. Consolidated Coin Caterers Corp., 517 U.S. 308, 116 S.Ct. 1307, 134 L.Ed.2d 433 (1996).

State Employees Not Covered by the ADEA

Generally, the states are immune under the Eleventh Amendment from lawsuits brought by private individuals in federal court—unless a state consents to the suit. For example, in separate cases, professors and librarians contended that their employers—two Florida state universities—denied them salary increases and other benefits because they were getting old and their successors could be hired at lower cost. The universities claimed that as agencies of a sovereign state, they could not be sued without the state's consent. The cases ultimately reached the United States Supreme Court, which held that the Eleventh Amendment bars private parties from suing state employers for violations of the ADEA.²⁶

State immunity under the Eleventh Amendment is not absolute, however, as the Supreme Court explained in 2004. In some situations, such as when fundamental rights are at stake, Congress has the power to abrogate (abolish) state immunity to private suits through legislation that unequivocally shows Congress's intent to subject states to private suits.²⁷ Generally, though, the Court has found that state employers are immune from private suits brought by employees under the ADEA (for age discrimination), the Americans with Disabilities Act (for disability-based discrimination),²⁸ and the Fair Labor Standards Act (the wage and hour law discussed in Chapter 33).²⁹ As explained in Chapter 33, state employers are not immune from the requirements of the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA).³⁰

Discrimination Based on Disability

The Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) of 1990 is designed to eliminate discriminatory employment practices that prevent otherwise qualified workers with disabilities from fully participating in the national labor force. Prior to 1990, the major federal law providing protection to those with disabilities was the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. That act protected only federal government employees and those employed under federally funded programs. The ADA extends federal protection against disability-based discrimination to all workplaces with fifteen or more workers (with the exception of state government employers, who are generally immune under the Eleventh Amendment, as just discussed). Basically, the ADA requires that employers “reasonably accommodate” the needs of persons with disabilities unless to do so would cause the employer to suffer an “undue hardship.”

Procedures under the ADA

To prevail on a claim under the ADA, a plaintiff must show that he or she (1) has a disability, (2) is otherwise qualified for the employment in question, and (3) was excluded from the employment solely because of the disability. As in Title VII cases, a claim alleging violation of the ADA may be commenced only after the plaintiff has pursued the claim through the EEOC, which administers the provisions of the act relating to disability-based discrimination in the employment context. The EEOC may decide to investigate and perhaps even sue the employer on behalf of the employee. The EEOC can bring a suit on behalf of the employee under the ADA even if the employee signed an arbitration agreement with the employer.³¹

If the EEOC decides not to sue, then the employee may do so. Plaintiffs in lawsuits brought under the ADA may seek many of the same remedies that are available under Title VII. These include reinstatement, back pay, a limited amount of compensatory and punitive damages (for intentional discrimination), and certain other forms of relief. Repeat violators may be ordered to pay fines of up to $100,000.

What Is a Disability?

The ADA broadly defines persons with disabilities as persons with physical or mental impairments that “substantially limit” their everyday activities. More specifically, the ADA defines a disability as “(1) a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more of the major life activities of such individuals; (2) a record of such impairment; or (3) being regarded as having such an impairment.”

Health conditions that have been considered disabilities under federal law include blindness, alcoholism, heart disease, cancer, muscular dystrophy, cerebral palsy, paraplegia, diabetes, acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS), testing positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV, the virus that causes AIDS), and morbid obesity (which exists when an individual’s weight is two times that of a normal person). The ADA excludes from coverage certain conditions, such as kleptomania (the obsessive desire to steal).

Although the ADA’s definition of disability is broad, starting in 1999, the United States Supreme Court has issued a series of decisions narrowing the definition of what constitutes a disability under the act.

Correctable Conditions In 1999, the Supreme Court reviewed a case raising the issue of whether severe myopia, or nearsightedness, which can be corrected with lenses, qualifies as a disability under the ADA. The Supreme Court ruled that it does not.³² The determination of whether a person is substantially limited in a major life activity is based on how the person functions when taking medication or using corrective devices, not on how the person functions without these measures.

In a similar case in 2002, a federal appellate court held that a pharmacist suffering from diabetes, which could be corrected by insulin, did not have a cause of action against his employer under the ADA.³³ In other cases decided in the early 2000s, the courts have held that plaintiffs with bipolar disorder, epilepsy, and other such conditions do not fall under the ADA's protections if the conditions can be corrected.

Repetitive-Stress Injuries For some time, the courts were divided on the issue of whether carpal tunnel syndrome (or any other repetitive-stress injury) constitutes a disability under the ADA. Carpal tunnel syndrome is a condition of pain and weakness in the hand caused by repetitive compression of a nerve in the wrist. In 2002, in a case involving this issue, the Supreme Court unanimously held that it does not. The Court stated that although the employee could not perform the manual tasks associated with her job, the condition did not constitute a disability under the ADA because it did not “substantially limit” the major life activity of performing manual tasks.³⁴

Reasonable Accommodation

If a job applicant or an employee with a disability can perform essential job functions with reasonable accommodation, the employer must make the accommodation. Required modifications may include installing ramps for a wheelchair, establishing flexible working hours, creating or modifying job assignments, and designing or improving training materials and procedures.

Generally, employers should give primary consideration to employees' preferences in deciding what accommodations should be made. If an applicant or employee fails to let the employer know how his or her disability can be accommodated, the employer may avoid liability for failing to hire or retain the individual on the ground that the individual has failed to meet the “otherwise qualified” requirement.³⁵

34. Toyota Motor Manufacturing, Kentucky, Inc. v. Williams, 534 U.S. 184, 122 S.Ct. 681, 151 L.Ed.2d 615 (2002).

35. See, for example, Beck v. University of Wisconsin Board of Regents, 75 F.3d 1130 (7th Cir. 1996); and White v. York International Corp., 45 F.3d 357 (10th Cir. 1995).

Undue Hardship Employers who do not accommodate the needs of persons with disabilities must demonstrate that the accommodations would cause undue hardship. Generally, the law offers no uniform standards for identifying what is an undue hardship other than the imposition of a “significant difficulty or expense” on the employer.

Usually, the courts decide whether an accommodation constitutes an undue hardship on a case-by-case basis. For example, suppose that Bryan Lockhart works for a cell phone company that provides parking to its employees. Lockhart, who uses a wheelchair, informs the company supervisors that the parking spaces are so narrow that he is unable to extend the ramp on his van that allows him to get in and out of the vehicle. Lockhart therefore requests that the company reasonably accommodate his needs by paying a monthly fee for him to use a larger parking space in an adjacent lot. In this situation, a court would likely find that it would not be an undue hardship for the employer to pay for additional parking for Lockhart.

Job Applications and Preemployment Physical Exams

Employers must modify their job-application and selection process so that those with disabilities can compete for jobs with those who do not have disabilities. A job announcement that has only a phone number, for example, would discriminate against potential job applicants with hearing impairments. Thus, the job announcement must also provide another way for applicants to contact the prospective employer. Employers are also restricted in the kinds of questions they may ask on job-application forms and during preemployment interviews.

Additionally, employers cannot require persons with disabilities to submit to preemployment physicals unless such exams are required of all other applicants. An employer can condition an offer of employment on the applicant's successfully passing a medical examination, but can disqualify the applicant only if the medical problems discovered would render the applicant unable to perform the job. For example, when filling the position of delivery truck driver, a company cannot screen out all applicants who are unable to meet the U.S. Department of Transportation's hearing standard. The company would first have to prove that drivers who are deaf are not qualified to perform the essential job function of driving safely and pose a higher risk of accidents than drivers who are not deaf.³⁶

36. Bates v. United Parcel Service, Inc., 465 F.3d 1069 (9th Cir.2006).

Substance Abusers Drug addiction is considered a disability under the ADA because it is a substantially limiting impairment. Note that the ADA only protects persons with former drug addictions—those who have completed a supervised drug-rehabilitation program or who are currently participating in a supervised rehabilitation program. Those who are currently using illegal drugs are not protected by the act, nor are persons who have used drugs casually in the past. They are not considered addicts and therefore do not have a disability (addiction).

People suffering from alcoholism are protected by the ADA. Employers cannot legally discriminate against employees simply because they suffer from alcoholism and must treat them the same way other employees are treated. For example, an employee with alcoholism who comes to work late because she or he was drinking excessively the night before cannot be disciplined any differently than an employee who comes to work late for another reason. Of course, employers have the right to prohibit the use of alcohol in the workplace and can require that employees not be under the influence of alcohol while working. Employers can also fire or refuse to hire a person with alcoholism if he or she poses a substantial risk of harm either to himself or herself or to others and the risk cannot be reduced by reasonable accommodation.

Health-Insurance Plans Workers with disabilities must be given equal access to any health insurance provided to other employees. Nevertheless, employers can exclude from coverage preexisting health conditions and certain types of diagnostic or surgical procedures. An employer can also put a limit, or cap, on health-care payments under its particular group health policy as long as the cap is applied equally to all insured employees and does not discriminate on the basis of disability. Whenever a group health-care plan makes a disability-based distinction in its benefits, the plan violates the ADA (unless the employer can justify its actions under the business necessity defense, as will be discussed later in this chapter).

Defenses to Employment Discrimination

The first line of defense for an employer charged with employment discrimination is, of course, to assert that the plaintiff has failed to meet his or her initial burden of proof—proving that discrimination did in fact occur. As noted, plaintiffs bringing cases under the ADA may find it difficult to meet this initial burden because they must prove that their alleged disabilities are disabilities covered by the ADA. Furthermore, plaintiffs in ADA cases must prove that they were otherwise qualified for the job.

Once a plaintiff succeeds in proving that discrimination occurred, then the burden shifts to the employer to justify the discriminatory practice. Often, employers attempt to justify the discrimination by claiming that it was the result of a business necessity, a bona fide occupational qualification, or a seniority system. Alternatively, they may assert that employee misconduct should limit their liability. In some situations, as noted earlier, an effective antiharassment policy and prompt remedial action when harassment occurs may shield employers from liability for sexual harassment under Title VII.

Business Necessity

An employer may defend against a claim of disparate-impact (unintentional) discrimination by asserting that a practice that has a discriminatory effect is a business necessity. If requiring a high school diploma, for example, is shown to have a discriminatory effect, an employer might argue that a high school education is required for workers to perform the job at a required level of competence. If the employer can demonstrate to the court's satisfaction that a definite connection exists between a high school education and job performance, then the employer normally will succeed in this business necessity defense.

Bona Fide Occupational Qualification

Another defense applies when discrimination against a protected class is essential to a job—that is, when a particular trait is a bona fide occupational qualification (BFOQ). Race, color, and national origin, however, can never be justified as a BFOQ.

Generally, courts have restricted the BFOQ defense to instances in which the employee's gender or religion is essential to the job. For example, a women's clothing boutique might legitimately hire only female salespersons if part of a salesperson's job involves assisting clients in the boutique's dressing rooms. Similarly, a state prison might legitimately respond to prior complaints of sexual abuse of female prisoners by hiring only female staff to work in the prison units housing women.³⁷

37. Everson v. Michigan Department of Corrections, 391 F.3d 737 (6th Cir.2004).

Seniority Systems

An employer with a history of discrimination may have no members of protected classes in upper-level positions. Even if the employer now seeks to be unbiased, it may face a lawsuit seeking a court order that members of protected classes be promoted ahead of schedule to compensate for past discrimination. If no present intent to discriminate is shown, however, and if promotions or other job benefits are distributed according to a fair seniority system (in which workers with more years of service are promoted first or laid off last), the employer normally has a good defense against the suit.

According to the United States Supreme Court, this defense may also apply to claims of discrimination under the ADA. If an employee with a disability requests an accommodation (such as an assignment to a particular position) that conflicts with an employer's seniority system, the accommodation will generally not be considered "reasonable" under the act.³⁸

After-Acquired Evidence of Employee Misconduct

In some situations, employers have attempted to avoid liability for employment discrimination on the basis of "after-acquired evidence" of an employee's misconduct. For example, suppose that an employer fires a worker, who then sues the employer for employment discrimination. During pretrial investigation, the employer learns that the employee made material misrepresentations on his employment application—misrepresentations that, had the employer known about them, would have served as a ground to fire the individual. Can this after-acquired evidence be used as a defense?

According to the United States Supreme Court, after-acquired evidence of wrongdoing cannot be used to shield an employer entirely from liability for employment discrimination. It may, however, be used to limit the amount of damages for which the employer is liable.³⁹

Affirmative Action

The laws discussed in this chapter were designed to reduce or eliminate discriminatory practices with respect to hiring, retaining, and promoting employees. Affirmative action programs go a step further and attempt to "make up" for past patterns of discrimination by giving members of protected classes preferential treatment in hiring or promotion. During the 1960s, all federal and state government agencies, private companies that contracted to do business with the federal government, and institutions that received federal funding were required to implement affirmative action policies.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 neither requires nor prohibits affirmative action. Thus, most private companies and organizations have not been required to implement affirmative action policies, though many have done so voluntarily.

Affirmative action programs have aroused much controversy over the last forty years, particularly when they result in reverse discrimination which, as mentioned previously, is discrimination against members of a majority group, such as white males. At issue is whether affirmative action programs, because of their inherently discriminatory nature, violate employee rights or the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Bakke Case

An early case addressing this issue outside the employment context, Regents of the University of California v. Bakke,⁴⁰ involved an affirmative action program implemented by the University of California at Davis. Allan Bakke, who had been turned down for medical school at the Davis campus, sued the university for reverse discrimination after he discovered that his academic record was better than the records of some of the minority applicants who had been admitted to the program.

The United States Supreme Court held that affirmative action programs were subject to intermediate scrutiny. Recall from the discussion of the equal protection clause in Chapter 4 that any law or action evaluated under a standard of intermediate scrutiny, to be constitutionally valid, must be substantially related to important government objectives. Applying this standard, the Court held that the university could give favorable weight to minority applicants as part of a plan to increase minority enrollment so as to achieve a more culturally diverse student body. The Court stated, however, that the use of a quota system, in which a certain number of places are explicitly reserved for minority applicants, violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Adarand Case

Although the Bakke case and later court decisions alleviated the harshness of the quota system, today's courts are going even further in questioning the constitutional validity of affirmative action programs. In 1995, in its landmark decision in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Peña,⁴¹ the United States Supreme Court held that any federal, state, or local affirmative action program that uses racial or ethnic classifications as the basis for making decisions is subject to strict scrutiny by the courts.

In effect, the Court's ruling in Adarand means that an affirmative action program is constitutional only if it attempts to remedy past discrimination and does not make use of quotas or preferences. Furthermore, once such a program has succeeded in the goal of remedying past discrimination, it must be changed or dropped. Since then, other federal courts have followed the Supreme Court's lead by declaring affirmative action programs invalid unless they attempt to remedy past or current discrimination.⁴²

The Hopwood Case

In 1996, in Hopwood v. State of Texas,⁴³ the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held that an affirmative action program at the University of Texas School of Law in Austin violated the equal protection clause. In that case, two white law school applicants sued the university when they were denied admission. The court decided that the affirmative action policy unlawfully discriminated in favor of minority applicants. In its decision, the court directly challenged the Bakke decision by stating that the use of race even as a means of achieving diversity on college campuses "undercuts the Fourteenth Amendment." The United States Supreme Court declined to hear the case, thus letting the lower court's decision stand. Federal appellate court decisions since then have been divided on whether such programs are constitutional.⁴⁴

Subsequent Court Decisions

In 2003, the United States Supreme Court reviewed two cases involving issues similar to that in the Hopwood case. Both cases involved admissions programs at the University of Michigan. In Gratz v. Bollinger,⁴⁵ two white applicants who were denied undergraduate admission to the university alleged reverse discrimination. The school's admission policy gave each applicant a score based on a number of factors, including grade point average, standardized test scores, and personal achievements. The system automatically awarded every "underrepresented" minority (African American, Hispanic, and Native American) applicant twenty points—one-fifth of the points needed to guarantee admission. The Court held that this policy violated the equal protection clause.

In contrast, in Grutter v. Bollinger,⁴⁶ the Court held that the University of Michigan Law School's admission policy was constitutional. In that case, the Court concluded that "[u]niversities can, however, consider race or ethnicity more flexibly as a 'plus' factor in the context of individualized consideration of each and every applicant." The significant difference between the two admissions policies, in the Court's view, was that the law school's approach did not apply a mechanical formula giving "diversity bonuses" based on race or ethnicity.

In 2007, the United States Supreme Court ruled on two more cases involving racial classifications used in assigning students to schools in Seattle, Washington, and Jefferson County, Kentucky. Both school districts had adopted student assignment plans that relied on race to determine which schools certain children attended. The Seattle school district plan classified children as white or nonwhite and used the racial classifications as a "tiebreaker" to determine the particular high school students attended. The school district in Jefferson County classified students as black or other to assign children to elementary schools. A group of parents from the relevant public schools filed lawsuits claiming that the school districts' racial preferences violated the equal protection clause. The Supreme Court applied strict scrutiny and held that the school districts failed to show that use of racial classifications in their student assignment plans was necessary to achieve their stated goal of racial diversity.⁴⁷

State Laws Prohibiting Discrimination

Although the focus of this chapter is on federal legislation, most states also have statutes that prohibit employment discrimination. Generally, the same kinds of discrimination are prohibited under federal and state legislation. In addition, state statutes often provide protection for certain individuals who are not protected under federal laws. For example, a New Jersey appellate court held that anyone over the age of eighteen was entitled to sue for age discrimination

47. The court consolidated the two cases and issued only one opinion to address the issues presented by both cases. Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist. No. 1, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2738, 168 L.Ed.2d 508 (2007).

under the state law, which specified no threshold age limit.⁴⁸

Furthermore, state laws prohibiting discrimination may apply to firms with fewer employees than the threshold number required under federal statutes, thus offering protection to more workers. Even when companies are too small to be covered by state statutes, state courts may uphold employees' rights against discrimination in the workplace for public-policy reasons.⁴⁹ State laws may also provide for additional damages, such as damages for emotional distress, that are not provided for under federal statutes.⁵⁰ Finally, some states, such as California and Washington, have passed laws that end affirmative action programs in those states or modify admission policies at state-sponsored universities.

REVIEWING Employment Discrimination

Amaani Lyle, an African American woman, was hired by Warner Brothers Television Productions to be a scriptwriters' assistant for the writers of Friends, a popular, adult-oriented television series. One of her essential job duties was to type detailed notes for the scriptwriters during brainstorming sessions in which they discussed jokes, dialogue, and story lines. The writers then combed through Lyle's notes after the meetings for script material. During these meetings, the three male scriptwriters told lewd and vulgar jokes and made sexually explicit comments and gestures. They often talked about their personal sexual experiences and fantasies, and some of these conversations were then used in episodes of Friends.

Lyle never complained that she found the writers' conduct during the meetings offensive. After four months, Lyle was fired because she could not type fast enough to keep up with the writers' conversations during the meetings. She filed a suit against Warner Brothers, alleging sexual harassment and claiming that her termination was based on racial discrimination. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Lyle's claim of racial discrimination be for intentional (disparate-treatment) or unintentional (disparate-impact) discrimination? Explain.
2. Can Lyle establish a prima facie case of racial discrimination? Why or why not?

3. When Lyle was hired, she was told that typing speed was extremely important to the position. At the time, she maintained that she could type eighty words per minute, so she was not given a typing test. It later turned out that Lyle could type only fifty words per minute. What impact might typing speed have on Lyle's lawsuit?
4. Lyle's sexual-harassment claim is based on the hostile work environment created by the writers' sexually offensive conduct at meetings that she was required to attend. The writers, however, argue that their behavior was essential to the "creative process" of writing for Friends, a show that routinely contained sexual innuendos and adult humor. Which defense discussed in the chapter might Warner Brothers assert using this argument?

34-1. Discuss fully whether either of the following actions would constitute a violation of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, as amended:

- (a) Tennington, Inc., is a consulting firm and has ten employees. These employees travel on consulting jobs in seven states. Tennington has an employment record of hiring only white males.
- (b) Novo Films is making a movie about Africa and needs to employ approximately one hundred extras for this picture. Novo advertises in all major newspapers in Southern California for the hiring of these extras. The ad states that only African Americans need apply.

Chinawa, a major processor of cheese sold throughout the United States, employs one hundred workers at its principal processing plant. The plant is located in Heartland Corners, which has a population that is 50 percent white and 25 percent African American, with the balance Hispanic American, Asian American, and others. Chinawa requires a high school diploma as a condition of employment for its cleaning crew. Three-fourths of the white population complete high school, compared with only one-fourth of those in the minority groups. Chinawa has an all-white cleaning crew. Has Chinawa violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964? Explain.

34-3. Discrimination Based on Disability. PGA Tour, Inc., sponsors professional golf tournaments. A player may enter in several ways, but the most common method is to compete successfully in a three-stage qualifying tournament known as the "Q-School." Anyone may enter the Q-School by submitting two letters of recommendation and paying $3,000 to cover greens fees and the cost of a golf cart, which is permitted during the first two stages, but is prohibited during the third stage. The rules governing the events include the "Rules of Golf," which apply at all levels of amateur and professional golf and do not prohibit the use of golf carts, and the “hard card,” which applies specifically to the PGA tour and requires the players to walk the course during most of a tournament. Casey Martin is a talented golfer with a degenerative circulatory disorder that prevents him from walking golf courses. Martin entered the Q-School and asked for permission to use a cart during the third stage. PGA refused. Martin filed a suit in a federal district court against PGA, alleging a violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act. Is a golf cart in these circumstances a “reasonable accommodation” under the ADA? Why or why not? [PGA Tour, Inc. v. Martin, 531 U.S. 1049, 121 S.Ct. 652, 148 L.Ed.2d 556 (2001)]

34-4. Discrimination Based on Age. The United Auto Workers (UAW) is the union that represents the employees of General Dynamics Land Systems, Inc. In 1997, a collective bargaining agreement between UAW and General Dynamics eliminated the company’s obligation to provide health insurance to employees who retired after the date of the agreement, except for current workers at least fifty years of age. Dennis Cline and 194 other employees over the age of forty but under age fifty objected to this term. They complained to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, claiming that the agreement violated the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) of 1967. The ADEA forbids discriminatory preference for the “young” over the “old.” Does the ADEA also prohibit favoring the old over the young? How should the court rule? Explain. [General Dynamics Land Systems, Inc. v. Cline, 540 U.S. 581, 124 S.Ct. 1236, 157 L.Ed.2d 1094 (2004)]

Kimberly Cloutier began working at the Costco store in West Springfield, Massachusetts, in July 1997. Cloutier had multiple earrings and four tattoos, but no facial piercings. In June 1998, Costco promoted Cloutier to cashier. Over the next two years, she engaged in various forms of body modification, including facial piercing and cutting. In March 2001, Costco revised its dress code to prohibit all facial jewelry except earrings. Cloutier was told that she would have to remove her facial jewelry. She asked for a complete exemption from the code, asserting that she was a member of the Church of Body Modification and that eyebrow piercing was part of her religion. She was told to remove the jewelry, cover it, or go home. She went home and was later discharged for her absence. Cloutier filed a suit in a federal district court against Costco, alleging religious discrimination in violation of Title VII. Does an employer have an obligation to accommodate its employees’ religious practices? If so, to what extent? How should the court rule in this case? Discuss. [Cloutier v. Costco Wholesale Corp., 390 F.3d 126 (1st Cir.2004)]

34-6. Discrimination Based on Gender. For twenty years, Darlene Jespersen worked as a bartender at Harrah’s Casino in Reno, Nevada. In 2000, Harrah’s implemented a “Personal Best” program that included new grooming standards. Among other requirements, women were told to wear makeup “applied neatly in complimentary colors.” Jespersen, who never wore makeup off the job, felt so uncomfortable wearing it on the job that it interfered with her ability to perform. Unwilling to wear makeup and not qualifying for another position at Harrah’s with similar compensation, Jespersen quit the casino. She filed a suit in a federal district court against Harrah’s Operating Co., the casino’s owner, alleging that the makeup policy discriminated against women in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Harrah’s argued that any burdens under the new program fell equally on both genders, citing the “Personal Best” short-hair standard that applied only to men. Jespersen responded by describing her personal reaction to the makeup policy and emphasizing her exemplary record during her tenure at Harrah’s. In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [Jespersen v. Harrah’s Operating Co., 444 F.3d 1104 (9th Cir.2006)]

34-7. Discrimination Based on Disability. Cerebral palsy limits Steven Bradley’s use of his legs. He uses forearm crutches for short-distance walks and a wheelchair for longer distances. Standing for more than ten or fifteen minutes is difficult. With support, however, Bradley can climb stairs and get on and off a stool. His condition also restricts the use of his fourth finger to, for example, type, but it does not limit his ability to write—he completed two years of college. His grip strength is normal, and he can lift heavy objects. In 2001, Bradley applied for a “greeter” or “cashier” position at a Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., Supercenter in Richmond, Missouri. The job descriptions stated, “No experience or qualification is required.” Bradley indicated that he was available for full- or part-time work from 4:00 P.M. to 10:00 P.M. any evening. His employment history showed that he currently worked as a proofreader and that he had previously worked as an administrator. His application was rejected, according to Janet Daugherty, the personnel manager, based on his “work history” and the “direct threat” that he posed to the safety of himself and others. Bradley claimed, however, that the store refused to hire him due to his disability. What steps must Bradley follow to pursue his claim? What does he need to show to prevail? Is he likely to meet these requirements? Discuss. [EEOC v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 477 F.3d 561 (8th Cir.2007)]

Titan Distribution, Inc., employed Quintak, Inc., to run its tire mounting and distribution operation in Des Moines, Iowa. Robert Chalfant worked for Quintak as a second shift supervisor at Titan. He suffered a heart attack in 1992 and underwent heart bypass surgery in 1997. He also had arthritis. In July 2002, Titan decided to terminate Quintak. Chalfant applied to work at Titan. On his application, he described himself as disabled. After a physical exam, Titan's physician concluded that Chalfant could work in his current capacity, and he was notified that he would be hired. Despite the notice, Nadis Barucic, a Titan employee, wrote "not pass px" at the top of his application, and he was not hired. He took a job with AMPCO Systems, a parking ramp management company. This work involved walking up to five miles a day and lifting more weight than he had at Titan. In September, Titan eliminated its second shift. Chalfant filed a suit in a federal district court against Titan, in part, under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Titan argued that it had not hired Chalfant because he did not pass the physical, but no one—including Barucic—could explain why she had written "not pass px" on his application. Later, Titan claimed that Chalfant was not hired because the entire second shift was going to be eliminated. [Chalfant v. Titan Distribution, Inc., 475 F.3d 982 (8th Cir. 2007)]

- What must Chalfant establish to make his case under the ADA? Can he meet these requirements? Explain.
- In employment-discrimination cases, punitive damages can be appropriate when an employer acts with malice or reckless indifference in regard to an employee's protected rights. Would an award of punitive damages to Chalfant be appropriate in this case? Discuss.

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 34." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Parenthood. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, Gil (Steve Martin) threatens to leave his job when he discovers that his boss is promoting another person to partner instead of him. His boss (Dennis Dugan) laughs and tells him that the threat is not realistic because if Gil leaves, he will be competing for positions with workers who are younger than he is and willing to accept lower salaries. If Gil takes his employer's advice and stays in his current position, can he sue his boss for age discrimination based on the boss's statements? Why or why not?
- Suppose that Gil leaves his current position and applies for a job at another firm. The prospective employer refuses to hire him based on his age. What would Gil have to prove to establish a prima facie case of age discrimination? Explain your answer.
- What defenses might Gil's current employer raise if Gil sues for age discrimination?

Agency and Employment

Ethical principles—and challenging ethical issues—pervade the areas of agency and employment. As you read in Chapter 31, when one person agrees to act on behalf of another, as an agent does in an agency relationship, that person assumes certain ethical responsibilities. Similarly, the principal also assumes certain ethical duties. In essence, agency law gives legal force to the ethical duties arising in an agency relationship. Although agency law also focuses on the rights of agents and principals, those rights are framed by the concept of duty—that is, an agent's duty becomes a right for the principal, and vice versa. Significantly, many of the duties of the principal and agent are negotiable when they form their contract. In forming a contract, the principal and the agent can extend or abridge many of the ordinary duties owed in such a relationship.

Employees who deal with third parties are also deemed to be agents and thus share the ethical (and legal) duties imposed under agency law. In the employment context, however, it is not always possible for an employee to negotiate favorable employment terms. Often, an employee who is offered a job must either accept the job on the employer's terms or look elsewhere for a position. Although numerous federal and state statutes protect employees, in some situations employees still have little recourse against their employers. At the same time, employers complain that statutes regulating employment relationships impose so many requirements that they find it hard to exercise a reasonable amount of control over their workplaces.

In the following paragraphs, we focus on the ethical dimensions of selected issues in agency and employment law.

The Agent's Duty to the Principal

The very nature of the principal-agent relationship is one of trust, which we call a fiduciary relationship. Because of the nature of this relationship, an agent is considered to owe certain duties to the principal. These duties include being loyal and obedient, informing the principal of important facts concerning the agency, accounting to the principal for property or funds received, and performing with reasonable diligence and skill.

Thus, ethical conduct would prevent an agent from representing two principals in the same transaction, making a secret profit from the agency relationship, or failing to disclose the agent's interest in property being purchased by the principal. The expected ethical conduct of the agent has evolved into rules that, if breached, cause the agent to be held legally liable.

Does an Agent Also Have a Duty to Society? A question that sometimes arises is whether an agent's obligation extends beyond the duty to the principal and includes a duty to society as well. Consider, for example, the situation faced by an employee who knows that her employer is engaging in an unethical—or even illegal—practice, such as marketing an unsafe product. Does the employee's duty to the principal include keeping silent about this practice, which may harm users of the product? Does the employee have a duty to protect consumers by disclosing this information to the public, even if she loses her job as a result? Some scholars have argued that many of the greatest evils in the past thirty years have been accomplished in the name of duty to the principal.

Does an Agent's Breach of Loyalty Terminate the Agent's Authority? Suppose that an employee-agent who is authorized to access company trade secrets contained in computer files takes those secrets to a competitor for whom the employee is about to begin working. Clearly, in this situation the agent has violated the ethical—and legal—duty of loyalty to the principal. Does this breach of loyalty mean that the employee's act of accessing the trade secrets was unauthorized? The question has significant implications because if the act was unauthorized, the employee will be subject to state and federal laws prohibiting unauthorized access to computer information and data. If the act was authorized, the employee will not be subject to such laws. Although one court has held that the moment the employee accessed trade secrets for the purpose of divulging them to a competitor, the employee's authority as an agent terminated,¹ most courts have held that an agent's authority continues.

In one case, for example, three employees of Lockheed Martin Corporation copied confidential information and trade secrets from Lockheed's computer network onto compact discs and BlackBerries (personal digital assistants). Lockheed had authorized the employee-agents to access these files but was understandably upset when the three resigned and went to work for a competitor taking the trade secrets with them. Lockheed sued the former agents under the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act (discussed in Chapter 6), arguing that they accessed the data without authorization. The federal district court, however, held that the individuals did have authorization to access the computer network and did not lose this authorization when they breached the duty of loyalty. Therefore, the court dismissed the case.²

1. Shurgard Storage Centers, Inc. v. Safeguard Self Storage, Inc., 119 F.Supp.2d 1121 (W.D.Wash. 2000).

The Principal's Duty to the Agent

Just as agents owe certain duties to their principals, so do principals owe duties to their agents, such as compensation and reimbursement for job-related expenses. Principals also owe their agents a duty of cooperation. One might expect principals to cooperate with their agents out of self-interest, but this does not always happen. Suppose that a principal hires an agent on commission to sell a building, and the agent puts considerable time and expense into finding a buyer. If the principal changes his mind and decides to retain the building, he may try to prevent the agent from completing the sale. Is such action ethical? Does it violate the principal's duty of cooperation? What alternatives would the principal have?

Although a principal is legally obligated to fulfill certain duties to the agent, these duties do not include any specific duty of loyalty. Some argue that employers' failure to be loyal to their employees has resulted in a reduction in employee loyalty to employers. After all, they maintain, why should an employee be loyal to an employer's interests over the years when the employee knows that the employer has no corresponding legal duty to be loyal to the employee's interests? Employers who do show a sense of loyalty toward their employees—for example, by not laying off longtime, faithful employees when business is slow or when those employees could be replaced by younger workers at lower cost—base that loyalty primarily on ethical, not legal, considerations.

Apparent Authority and Agency by Estoppel

Agency law is designed to enforce the ethical or fiduciary duties that arise once an agency relationship is established. To perhaps an even greater extent, agency law is designed to protect third parties—people outside the agency relationship. The doctrines of apparent authority and agency by estoppel stem primarily from ethical considerations that arise when third parties suffer a loss from an apparent agency relationship.

Sometimes, for example, a third party may be led by the actions of the principal to believe that an individual is acting in the capacity of an agent, when in fact the individual is not an agent at all. For instance, a patient treated by a physician in a hospital's emergency room may assume that the physician is an agent of the hospital, even though the physician is an independent contractor and has no agency relationship with the hospital. If the patient suffers harm because of the physician's negligence and sues the hospital, some courts may hold the hospital liable under a theory of apparent agency.

For example, in one case a man and his wife were shopping at a mall when the man experienced signs and symptoms of a stroke. His wife called an ambulance and asked the driver to take her husband to a hospital that could render emergency services for a stroke. He was taken to Kenner Regional Medical Center in Louisiana and seen by Dr. Roland LeBlanc. After many hours of waiting at Kenner Regional, the man's family had him transferred to another hospital for treatment of a stroke. Later, the family filed a lawsuit against Kenner Regional based on Dr. LeBlanc's negligent failure to render emergency services for the stroke in a timely manner. Because Dr. LeBlanc was not an employee but only an independent contractor at the hospital, the trial court granted a summary judgment dismissing Kenner Regional from the lawsuit. The appellate court reversed, however, reasoning that the man was entitled to assume that the treating physician at the emergency room was an employee of the hospital.³ It would be unethical to allow the hospital to avoid liability for the negligent conduct of the physicians it has working in its emergency room simply because of the physicians' status as independent contractors.

Respondeat Superior

Another legal concept that addresses the effect of agency relationships on third parties is the doctrine of respondeat superior. This doctrine raises a significant ethical question: Why should innocent employers be required to assume responsibility for the tortious, or wrongful, actions of their agent-employees? Again, the answer has to do with the courts' perception that when one of two innocent parties must suffer a loss, the party in the best position to prevent that loss should bear the burden. In an employment relationship, for example, the employer has more control over the employee's behavior than a third party to the relationship does.

Another reason for retaining the doctrine of respondeat superior in our laws is based on the employer's assumed ability to pay any damages that are incurred by a third party. One of our society's shared beliefs is that an injured party should be afforded the most effective relief possible. Thus, even though an employer may be absolutely innocent, the employer has "deeper pockets" than the employee and will be more likely to have the funds necessary to make the injured party whole.

Should an Employee Who Participates in Fraud Be Rewarded for Whistleblowing?

Many whistleblowing statutes reward employees who report their employers' wrongdoing with a percentage of the funds recovered after a lawsuit. In other words, employees have a strong financial incentive to offer up their employers for civil litigation. But what if the employee is somehow involved in the wrongdoing? Should the employee still receive a share of the proceeds?

Consider, for example, the largest Medicaid fraud settlement in U.S. history, involving a deal between Bayer Corporation and Kaiser Permanente, a health-maintenance organization. As one of Bayer's biggest customers, Kaiser demanded a discount price on Cipro, an antibiotic manufactured by Bayer. By law, however, Bayer could not sell the antibiotic to Kaiser for less than it sold Cipro to the federal government for use in the Medicaid program. (Medicaid helps low-income persons pay for necessary medical services.) If Bayer lowered the price of Cipro to Kaiser, it would have to refund millions of dollars to Medicaid. Therefore, Bayer "privately labeled" the same antibiotic using a different name and sold it to Kaiser at a 40 percent discount. Ironically, the person who blew the whistle on the fraudulent scheme—George Couto—was the marketing manager who actually negotiated the private labeling deal with Kaiser. Although Couto did not initiate the labeling scheme—and had suspected that it was illegal—he was instrumental in its success. Even though Couto had been a prime mover in the fraudulent scheme on behalf of Bayer, he was given 24 percent of the government's share of the $257 million settlement.⁴

Whistleblower statutes exist to encourage employees to report the wrongdoing of their employers with the ultimate objective of inhibiting such wrongdoing. But is it fair for an employee who participates in the employer's wrongdoing to benefit financially to such a large degree? Will this practice effectively inhibit, or could it even encourage, wrongful acts?

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. How much obedience and loyalty does an agent-employee owe to an employer? What if the employer engages in an activity—or requests that the employee engage in an activity—that violates the employee's ethical standards but does not necessarily violate any public policy or law? In such a situation, does an employee's duty to abide by her or his own ethical standards override the employee's duty of loyalty to the employer?
2. When an agent acts in violation of his or her ethical or legal duty to the principal, should that action terminate the agent's authority to act on behalf of the principal? Why or why not?
3. If an agent-employee injures a third party during the course of employment, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, the employer may be held liable for the employee's action even though the employer did not authorize the action and was not even aware of it. Is it fair to hold the employer liable in this situation? Would it be more equitable if the employee alone was held liable for his or her tortious (legally wrongful) actions to third parties, even when the actions were committed within the scope of employment?
4. Should an employee who is involved in but later "blows the whistle" on an employer's wrongdoing be allowed to collect a financial reward under whistleblower statutes? Why or why not?

Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Anyone who starts a business must first decide which form of business organization will be most appropriate for the new endeavor. In making this decision, the entrepreneur (one who initiates and assumes the financial risk of a new enterprise) needs to consider a number of factors, especially (1) ease of creation, (2) the liability of the owners, (3) tax considerations, and (4) the need for capital. In studying this unit, keep these factors in mind as you read about the various business organizational forms available to entrepreneurs. You may also find it helpful to refer to Exhibit 40-4 on pages 831 and 832 in Chapter 40, which compares the major business forms in use today with respect to these and other factors.

Traditionally, entrepreneurs have relied on three major business forms—the sole proprietorship, the partnership, and the corporation. In this chapter, we examine the sole proprietorship and the franchise, which, though not really a separate business organizational form, is widely used today by entrepreneurs. In Chapter 36, we will examine the second major traditional business form, the partnership, as well as some newer variations on partnerships. The third major traditional form—the corporation—will be discussed in detail in Chapters 38 through 41. We will also look at the limited liability company (LLC), a relatively new and increasingly popular form of business enterprise, and other special forms of business in Chapter 37. We conclude this unit with a chapter (Chapter 42) discussing practical legal information that all businesspersons should know, particularly those operating small businesses.

Sole Proprietorships

The simplest form of business is a sole proprietorship. In this form, the owner is the business; thus, anyone who does business without creating a separate business organization has a sole proprietorship. More than two-thirds of all American businesses are sole proprietorships. They are usually small enterprises—about 99 percent of the sole proprietorships in the United States have revenues of less than $1 million per year. Sole proprietors can own and manage any type of business from an informal, home-office undertaking to a large restaurant or construction firm.

Advantages of the Sole Proprietorship

A major advantage of the sole proprietorship is that the proprietor owns the entire business and receives all of the profits (because she or he assumes all of the risk). In addition, starting a sole proprietorship is often easier and less costly than starting any other kind of business, as few legal formalities are required.¹ No documents need to be filed with the government to start a sole proprietorship (though a state business license may be required to operate certain businesses).

This type of business organization also provides more flexibility than does a partnership or a corporation. The sole proprietor is free to make any decision he or she wishes concerning the business—such as whom to hire, when to take a vacation, and what kind of business to pursue. In addition, the proprietor can sell or transfer all or part of the business to another party at any time and does not need approval from anyone else (as would be required from partners in a partnership or normally from shareholders in a corporation).

1. Although starting a sole proprietorship involves fewer legal formalities than other business organizational forms, even small sole proprietorships may need to comply with zoning requirements, obtain licenses, and the like.

A sole proprietor pays only personal income taxes (including Social Security and Medicare taxes) on the business's profits, which are reported as personal income on the proprietor's personal income tax return. Sole proprietors are also allowed to establish certain tax-exempt retirement accounts.

Disadvantages of the Sole Proprietorship

The major disadvantage of the sole proprietorship is that, as sole owner, the proprietor alone bears the burden of any losses or liabilities incurred by the business enterprise. In other words, the sole proprietor has unlimited liability, or legal responsibility, for all obligations that arise in doing business. Any lawsuit against the business or its employees can lead to unlimited personal liability for the owner of a sole proprietorship. Creditors can go after the owner's personal assets to satisfy any business debts. This unlimited liability is a major factor to be considered in choosing a business form.

The sole proprietorship also has the disadvantage of lacking continuity on the death of the proprietor. When the owner dies, so does the business—it is automatically dissolved. Another disadvantage is that in raising capital, the proprietor is limited to his or her personal funds and any personal loans that he or she can obtain.

The personal liability of the owner of a sole proprietorship was at issue in the following case. The case involved the federal Cable Communications Act, which prohibits a commercial establishment from broadcasting television programs to its patrons without authorization. The court had to decide whether the owner of a sole proprietorship that installed a satellite television system was personally liable for violating this act by identifying a restaurant as a "residence" for billing purposes.

CASE 35.1 Garden City Boxing Club, Inc. v. Dominguez

United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 2006. __ F.Supp.2d __.

- Background and Facts Garden City Boxing Club, Inc. (GCB), which is based in San Jose, California, owned the exclusive right to broadcast via closed-circuit television several prizefights, including the match between Oscar De La Hoya and Fernando Vargas on September 14, 2002. GCB sold the right to receive the broadcasts to bars and other commercial venues. The fee was $20 multiplied by an establishment's maximum fire code occupancy. Antenas Enterprises in Chicago, Illinois, sells and installs satellite television systems under a contract with DISH Network. After installing a system, Antenas sends the buyer's address and other identifying information to DISH. In January 2002, Luis Garcia, an Antenas employee, identified a new customer as Jose Melendez at 220 Hawthorn Commons in Vernon Hills. The address was a restaurant—Mundelein Burrito—but Garcia designated the account as residential. Mundelein's patrons watched the De La Hoya–Vargas match on September 14, as well as three other fights on other dates, for which the restaurant paid only the residential rate to DISH and nothing to GCB. GCB filed a suit in a federal district court against Luis Dominguez, the sole proprietor of Antenas, to collect the fee.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT LEINENWEBER, J. [Judge]

* * * *

Section 605(a) [of the Cable Communications Act] states "[a]n authorized intermediary of a communication violates the Act when it divulges communication through an electronic channel to one other than the addressee." Mundelein Burrito was clearly a commercial establishment. The structure of the building, an exterior identification sign, and its location in a strip mall made this obvious. Mundelein Burrito paid only the residential fee for the four fights it broadcast to its patrons. It was not an authorized addressee of any of the four fights. By improperly listing

Mundelein Burrito as a residence, Antenas Enterprises allowed the unauthorized broadcast of the Event, and three additional fights, to Mundelein Burrito. Antenas Enterprises is liable under [Section] 605 of the Act.

* * * *

The unauthorized broadcast of the four separate events deprived GCB of the full value of its business investment. * * * [Under the Cable Communications Act] an aggrieved party * * * may recover an award of damages “for each violation of [Section 605(a)] involved in the action in a sum of not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, as the court considers just.” If the violation was willful and for purposes of commercial advantage or private financial gain, the court in its discretion may increase the award of damages—by an amount not more than $100,000. The court must award attorneys’ fees to the prevailing party.

GCB argues that the Antenas Enterprises failure to properly list Mundelein Burrito resulted in four separate violations. According to the license fee charged for each of the four fights that were illegally broadcast by Mundelein Burrito, the proper amount would have been $20.00 times the maximum fire code occupancy (46) or $3,680.00. Instead, due to the improper identification of the account as residential, Mundelein Burrito paid only $184.40 to broadcast the four events. GCB did not receive any of the $184.40. * * *

* * * [Considering] the willfulness of the defendant’s conduct and the deterrent value of the sanction imposed * * * twice the amount of actual damages is reasonable for this case. Therefore, Antenas Enterprises is liable to GCB for the sum of $7,360.00. Pursuant to the Act, GCB is also entitled to reasonable attorneys’ fees. * * *

* * * *

GCB argues Luis Dominguez is personally liable for Antenas Enterprises’ violation of [Section] 605 of the Act. The term “person” in the Act means an “individual, partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, corporation or governmental entity.”

Antenas Enterprises is a sole proprietorship, owned by Dominguez. A sole proprietor is personally responsible for actions committed by his employees within the scope of their employment. Accordingly, Dominguez is personally liable for the damages caused by the violation of [Section] 605 of the Act. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The court issued a summary judgment in GCB’s favor, holding that the plaintiff was entitled to the amount of Mundelein’s fee, for which Dominguez was personally liable, plus damages and attorneys’ fees.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Mundelein had identified itself as a residence when ordering the satellite system, how might the result in this case have been different?

● The Global Dimension Because the Internet has made it possible for sole proprietorships to do business worldwide without greatly increasing their costs, should they be considered, for some purposes, the equivalent of other business forms? Why or why not?

Franchises

Instead of setting up a business form for marketing their own products or services, many entrepreneurs opt to purchase a franchise. A franchise is an arrangement in which the owner of a trademark, a trade name, or a copyright licenses others to use the trademark, trade name, or copyright in the selling of goods or services. A franchisee (a purchaser of a franchise) is generally legally independent of the franchisor (the seller of the franchise). At the same time, the franchisee is economically dependent on the franchisor’s integrated business system. In other words, a franchisee can operate as an independent businessperson but still obtain the advantages of a regional or national organization. Today, franchising companies and their franchisees account for a significant portion of all retail sales in this country. Well-known franchises include McDonald’s, 7-Eleven, and Holiday Inn.

Types of Franchises

Many different kinds of businesses now sell franchises, and numerous types of franchises are available. Generally, though, franchises fall into one of three classifications: distributorships, chain-style business operations, and manufacturing or processing-plant arrangements.

Distributorship With a distributorship, a manufacturing concern (franchisor) licenses a dealer (franchisee) to sell its product. Often, a distributorship covers an exclusive territory. An example is an automobile dealership or beer distributorship, such as Anheuser-Busch.

Chain-Style Business Operation In a chain-style business operation, a franchise operates under a franchisor's trade name and is identified as a member of a select group of dealers that engage in the franchisor's business. The franchisee is generally required to follow standardized or prescribed methods of operation. Often, the franchisor insists that the franchisee maintain certain standards of performance. In addition, the franchisee may be required to obtain materials and supplies exclusively from the franchisor. McDonald's and most other fast-food chains are examples of this type of franchise. Chain-style franchises are also common in service-related businesses, including real estate brokerage firms, such as Century 21, and tax-preparing services, such as H & R Block, Inc.

A Manufacturing or Processing-Plant Arrangement With a manufacturing or processing-plant arrangement, the franchisor transmits to the franchisee the essential ingredients or formula to make a particular product. The franchisee then markets the product either at wholesale or at retail in accordance with the franchisor's standards. Examples of this type of franchise include Coca-Cola and other soft-drink bottling companies.

Laws Governing Franchising

Because a franchise relationship is primarily a contractual relationship, it is governed by contract law. If the franchise exists primarily for the sale of products manufactured by the franchisor, the law governing sales contracts as expressed in Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code applies (see Chapters 20 through 23). Additionally, the federal government and most states have enacted laws governing certain aspects of franchising. Generally, these laws are designed to protect prospective franchisees from dishonest franchisors and to prevent franchisors from terminating franchises without good cause.

Federal Regulation of Franchises in Certain Industries The federal government has enacted laws that protect franchisees in certain industries, such as automobile dealerships and service stations. These laws protect the franchisee from unreasonable demands and bad faith terminations of the franchise by the franchisor. If an automobile manufacturer-franchisor terminates a franchise because of a dealer-franchisee's failure to comply with unreasonable demands (for example, failure to attain an unrealistically high sales quota), the manufacturer may be liable for damages.² Similarly, federal law prescribes the conditions under which a franchisor of service stations can terminate the franchise.³ Federal antitrust laws (to be discussed in Chapter 46) also apply in certain circumstances to prohibit certain types of anticompetitive agreements.

The Franchise Rule In 1978, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) issued the Franchise Rule, which requires franchisors to disclose material facts that a prospective franchisee needs to make an informed decision concerning the purchase of a franchise.⁴ The rule was designed to enable potential franchisees to weigh the risks and benefits of an investment. Basically, the rule requires the franchisor to make numerous written disclosures to prospective franchisees.

For example, a franchisor is required to disclose whether the projected earnings figures are based on actual data or hypothetical examples. If a franchisor makes sales or earnings projections based on actual data for a specific franchise location, the franchisor must disclose the number and percentage of its actual franchises that have achieved this result. All representations made to a prospective franchisee must have a reasonable basis. Franchisors are also required to explain termination, cancellation, and renewal provisions of the franchise contract to potential franchisees before the agreement is signed. Those who violate the Franchise Rule are subject to substantial civil penalties, and the FTC can sue on behalf of injured parties to recover damages.

Amendments to the Franchise Rule that went into effect in July 2007 allow franchisors to provide disclosure documents via the Internet as long as they meet certain requirements. For example, prospective franchisees must be able to download or save all electronic disclosure documents. The amendments also bring the federal rule into closer alignment with state franchise disclosure laws (discussed next) and require additional disclosures on lawsuits that the franchisor has filed against franchisees and settlement agreements that it has entered into with them.

State Protection for Franchisees State legislation varies but often is aimed at protecting franchisees from unfair practices and bad faith terminations by franchisors. Approximately fifteen states have laws similar to the federal rules requiring franchisors to provide presale disclosures to prospective franchisees.⁵ Some states also require a disclosure document (known as a Uniform Franchise Offering Circular, or UFOC) to be filed with a state official. To protect franchisees, a state law might require the disclosure of information such as the actual costs of operation, recurring expenses, and profits earned, along with facts substantiating these figures. To protect franchisees against arbitrary or bad faith terminations, the law might also require that certain procedures be followed in terminating a franchising relationship. State deceptive trade practices acts (see Chapter 44) may also prohibit certain types of actions on the part of franchisors.

For example, the Illinois Franchise Disclosure Act prohibits any untrue statement of a material fact in connection with the offer or sale of any franchise. If Miyamoto, a franchisor of bagel stores, understates the start-up costs and exaggerates the anticipated yearly profits from operating a bagel shop to a franchisee, he has violated state law.⁶

The Franchise Contract

The franchise relationship is defined by a contract between the franchisor and the franchisee. The franchise contract specifies the terms and conditions of the franchise and spells out the rights and duties of the franchisor and the franchisee. If either party fails to perform its contractual duties, that party may be subject to a lawsuit for breach of contract. Furthermore, if a franchisee is induced to enter into a franchise contract by the franchisor's fraudulent misrepresentation, the franchisor may be liable for damages. Generally, statutes and the case law governing franchising tend to emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in franchise relationships.

Because each type of franchise relationship has its own characteristics, it is difficult to describe the broad range of details a franchising contract may include. We look next at some of the major issues that typically are addressed in a franchise contract.

Payment for the Franchise The franchisee ordinarily pays an initial fee or lump-sum price for the franchise license (the privilege of being granted a franchise). This fee is separate from the various products that the franchisee purchases from or through the franchisor. In some industries, the franchisor relies heavily on the initial sale of the franchise for realizing a profit. In other industries, the continued dealing between the parties brings profit to both. In most situations, the franchisor receives a stated percentage of the annual sales or annual volume of business done by the franchisee. The franchise agreement may also require the franchisee to pay a percentage of the franchisor's advertising costs and certain administrative expenses.

Business Premises The franchise agreement may specify whether the premises for the business must be leased or purchased outright. Sometimes, a building must be constructed to meet the terms of the agreement. Certainly, the agreement will specify whether the franchisor or the franchisee is responsible for supplying equipment and furnishings for the premises.

Location of the Franchise Typically, the franchisor determines the territory to be served. Some franchise contracts give the franchisee exclusive rights, or "territorial rights," to a certain geographic area. Other franchise contracts, while defining the territory allotted to a particular franchise, either specifically state that the franchise is nonexclusive or are silent on the issue of territorial rights.

Many franchise cases involve disputes over territorial rights, and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing often comes into play in this area of franchising. Suppose that the franchise contract either does not give the franchisee exclusive territorial rights or is silent on the issue. If the franchisor allows a competing franchise to be established nearby, the first franchisee may suffer a significant loss in profits. In this situation, a court may hold that the franchisor's actions breached an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

Business Organization The franchisee's business organization is of great concern to the franchisor. As part of the franchise agreement, the franchisor may require that the business have a particular form and capital structure. The franchise agreement may also provide standards of operation in such aspects of the business as sales quotas, quality, and record keeping. Additionally, a franchisor may retain stringent control over the training of personnel involved in the operation and over administrative aspects of the business.

Quality Control Although the day-to-day operation of the franchise business normally is left up to the franchisee, the franchise agreement may provide for some degree of supervision and control by the franchisor so that it can protect the franchise's name and reputation. When the franchise is a service operation, such as a motel, the contract often states that the franchisor will establish certain standards for the facility and will be permitted to make periodic inspections to ensure that the standards are being maintained.

As a general rule, the validity of a provision permitting the franchisor to establish and enforce certain quality standards is unquestioned. Because the franchisor has a legitimate interest in maintaining the quality of the product or service to protect its name and reputation, it can exercise greater control in this area than would otherwise be tolerated. Increasingly, however, franchisors are finding that if they exercise too much control over the operations of their franchisees, they may incur vicarious (indirect) liability under agency theory for the acts of their franchisees' employees (see Chapter 32). The actual exercise of control, or at least the right to control, is the key consideration. If the franchisee controls the day-to-day operations of the business to a significant degree, the franchisor may be able to avoid liability, as the following case illustrates.

EXTENDED CASE 35.2 Kerl v. Dennis Rasmussen, Inc.

Wisconsin Supreme Court, 2004. 2004 WI 86, 273 Wis.2d 106, 682 N.W.2d 328.

DIANE S. SYKES, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * * [On June 11, 1999] Harvey Pierce ambushed and shot Robin Kerl and her fiancé David Jones in the parking lot of a Madison [Wisconsin] Wal-Mart where Kerl and Jones worked. Kerl was seriously injured in the shooting, and Jones was killed. Pierce, who was Kerl's former boyfriend, then shot and killed himself. At the time of the shooting, Pierce was a work-release inmate at the Dane County jail who was employed at a nearby Arby's [Inc.] restaurant operated by Dennis Rasmussen, Inc. ("DRI"). Pierce had left work without permission at the time of the attempted murder and murder/suicide.

Kerl and Jones' estate sued DRI and Arby's, Inc. [in a Wisconsin state court.] * * * [T]he plaintiffs alleged that Arby's is vicariously [endured for someone else] liable, as DRI's franchisor, for DRI's negligent supervision of Pierce. The * * * court granted summary judgment in favor of Arby's, concluding that there was no basis for vicarious liability. The [state intermediate] court of appeals affirmed. [The plaintiffs appealed to the Wisconsin Supreme Court.]

Vicarious liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior depends upon the existence of a master/servant agency relationship. Vicarious liability under respondeat superior is a form of liability without fault—the imposition of liability on an innocent party for the tortious conduct of another based upon the existence of a particularized agency relationship. As such, it is an exception to our fault-based liability system, and is imposed only where the principal has control or the right to control the physical conduct of the agent such that a master/servant relationship can be said to exist.

A franchise is a business format typically characterized by the franchisee's operation of an independent business pursuant to a license to use the franchisor's trademark or trade name. A franchise is ordinarily operated in accordance with a detailed franchise or license agreement designed to protect the integrity of the trademark by setting uniform quality, marketing, and operational standards applicable to the franchise.

The rationale for vicarious liability becomes somewhat attenuated [weak] when applied to the franchise relationship, and vicarious liability premised upon the existence of a master/servant relationship is conceptually difficult to adapt to the franchising context. If the operational standards included in the typical franchise agreement for the protection of the franchisor's trademark were broadly construed as capable of meeting the "control or right to control" test that is generally used to determine respondeat superior liability, then franchisors would almost always be exposed to vicarious liability for the torts of their franchisees. We see no justification for such a broad rule of franchisor vicarious liability. If vicarious liability is to be imposed against franchisors, a more precisely focused test is required. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Applying these principles here, we conclude that Arby's did not have control or the right to control the day-to-day operation of the specific aspect of DRI's business that is alleged to have caused the plaintiffs' harm, that is, DRI's supervision of its employees. We note first that the license agreement between Arby's and DRI contains a provision that disclaims any agency relationship. * * *

The license agreement contains a plethora [a large number] of general controls on the operation of DRI's restaurant * * *.

These provisions in the license agreement are consistent with the quality and operational standards commonly contained in franchise agreements to achieve product and marketing uniformity and to protect the franchisor's trademark. They are insufficient to establish a master/servant relationship. More particularly, they do not establish that Arby's controlled or had the right to control DRI's hiring and supervision of employees, which is the aspect of DRI's business that is alleged to have caused the plaintiffs' harm.

The agreement's provisions regarding the specific issue of personnel are broad and general. * * *

By the terms of this agreement, DRI has sole control over the hiring and supervision of its employees. Arby's could not step in and take over the management of DRI's employees. * * * Accordingly, we agree with the court of appeals and the [trial] court that there is no genuine issue of material fact as to whether DRI is Arby's servant for purposes of the plaintiffs' respondeat superior claim against Arby's: clearly it is not. Arby's cannot be held vicariously liable for DRI's alleged negligent supervision of Pierce.

* * * *

We conclude that the quality, marketing, and operational standards and inspection and termination rights commonly included in franchise agreements do not establish the close supervisory control or right of control over a franchisee necessary to support imposing vicarious liability against the franchisor for all purposes or as a general matter. We hold that a franchisor may be subject to vicarious liability for the tortious conduct of its franchisee only if the franchisor had control or a right of control over the daily operation of the specific aspect of the franchisee's business that is alleged to have caused the harm. Because Arby's did not have control or a right of control over DRI's supervision of its employees, there was no master/servant relationship between Arby's and DRI for purposes of the plaintiffs' respondeat superior claim against Arby's. Arby's cannot be held vicariously liable for DRI's negligent supervision of Pierce. [Emphasis added.]

The decision of the court of appeals is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Should a franchisor be allowed to control the operation of its franchisee without liability for the franchisee's conduct? Explain your answer.
2. What would constitute the "right to control" under a franchise contract?

Pricing Arrangements Franchises provide the franchisor with an outlet for the firm's goods and services. Depending on the nature of the business, the franchisor may require the franchisee to purchase certain supplies from the franchisor at an established price.⁷ A franchisor cannot, however, set the prices at which the franchisee will resell the goods because such price setting may be a violation of state or federal antitrust laws, or both. A franchisor can suggest retail prices but cannot mandate them.

Franchise Termination

The duration of the franchise is a matter to be determined between the parties. Generally, a franchise relationship starts with a short trial period, such as a year, so that the franchisee and the franchisor can determine whether they want to stay in business with one another. Usually, the franchise agreement specifies that termination must be “for cause,” such as the death or disability of the franchisee, insolvency of the franchisee, breach of the franchise agreement, or failure to meet specified sales quotas. Most franchise contracts provide that notice of termination must be given. If no set time for termination is specified, then a reasonable time, with notice, is implied. A franchisee must be given reasonable time to wind up the business—that is, to do the accounting and return the copyright or trademark or any other property of the franchisor.

7. Although a franchisor can require franchisees to purchase supplies from it, requiring a franchisee to purchase exclusively from the franchisor may violate federal antitrust laws (see Chapter 46). For two landmark cases in these areas, see United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 87 S.Ct. 1956, 18 L.Ed.2d 1249 (1967); and Fortner Enterprises, Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 89 S.Ct. 1252, 22 L.Ed.2d 495 (1969).

Wrongful Termination

Because a franchisor’s termination of a franchise often has adverse consequences for the franchisee, much franchise litigation involves claims of wrongful termination. Generally, the termination provisions of contracts are more favorable to the franchisor than to the franchisee. This means that the franchisee, who normally invests a substantial amount of time and financial resources in making the franchise operation successful, may receive little or nothing for the business on termination. The franchisor owns the trademark and hence the business.

It is in this area that statutory and case law become important. The federal and state laws discussed earlier attempt, among other things, to protect franchisees from the arbitrary or unfair termination of their franchises by the franchisors. Generally, both statutory and case law emphasize the importance of good faith and fair dealing in terminating a franchise relationship.

The Importance of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

In determining whether a franchisor has acted in good faith when terminating a franchise agreement, the courts generally try to balance the rights of both parties. If a court perceives that a franchisor has arbitrarily or unfairly terminated a franchise, the franchisee will be provided with a remedy for wrongful termination. If a franchisor’s decision to terminate a franchise was made in the normal course of the franchisor’s business operations, however, and reasonable notice of termination was given to the franchisee, normally a court will not consider the termination wrongful.

At issue in the following case was whether General Motors Corporation acted wrongfully in terminating its franchise with a motor vehicle dealer in Connecticut.

CASE 35.3 Chic Miller’s Chevrolet, Inc. v. General Motors Corp.

United States District Court, District of Connecticut, 2005. 352 F.Supp.2d 251.

- Background and Facts Chapin Miller began work as a mail clerk with General Motors Acceptance Corporation (GMAC). By 1967, Miller had succeeded sufficiently within the organization to acquire Chic Miller’s (no relation) Chevrolet, a General Motors Corporation (GM) dealership, in Bristol, Connecticut. As part of its operations, Chic Miller’s entered into lending agreements, commonly known as floor plan financing, to enable it to buy new vehicles from GM. At first, the dealership had floor plan financing through GMAC. In 2001, however, Miller felt that GMAC was charging interest “at an inappropriately high rate” and negotiated a lower rate from Chase Manhattan Bank. In November 2002, Chase declined to provide further financing. Unable to obtain a loan from any other lender, Chic Miller's contacted GMAC, which also refused to make a deal. Under the parties' "Dealer Sales and Service Agreement," GM could terminate a dealership for "Failure of Dealer to maintain the line of credit." GM sent several notices of termination, but Chic Miller's remained open until March 2004, when it closed for seven days. GM sent a final termination notice. Chic Miller's filed a suit in a federal district court against GM, alleging, among other things, a failure to act in good faith in terminating the franchise. GM filed a motion for summary judgment.

ARTERTON, District Judge.

* * * *

* * * [T]here is no dispute of material fact concerning Chic Miller's lack of floor plan financing after November 2002. * * * [T]he dealership contract unambiguously places the burden on the dealer to find and maintain floor plan financing. Without floor plan financing, the plaintiff was in clear breach of * * * the dealership contract, justifying GM's termination of the contract * * * .

* * * *

In order to lawfully terminate a franchise under the Connecticut [Franchise Act, which applies in this case], a franchisor must: provide notice that complies with statutory requirements; have "good cause" for the termination; and act "in good faith." [Emphasis added.]

"Good cause" exists [under the statute] if "[t]here is a failure by the dealer to comply with a provision of the franchise which is both reasonable and of material significance to the franchise relationship * * * ." According to James Ragsdale, Northeast Region Zone Manager for GM, floor plan financing is a material aspect of a dealership agreement because "without floor plan financing, a dealership is unable to purchase motor vehicle inventory, which, in turn, severely limits a dealership's ability to earn income from vehicle sales. * * * If a dealership is without floor plan financing for an extended period of time, it will eventually lose its ability to generate revenues and become financially insolvent, and will not be able to conduct customary sales and service operations." Miller does not dispute that floor plan financing is a material term of his franchise contract with GM. As discussed above, GM was justified under the contract in terminating Miller's franchise for failure to maintain floor plan financing. Because that term is material to the agreement, GM had "good cause" under the Connecticut dealer statute for terminating the franchise because of Miller's uncured breach.

GM also had good cause to terminate the contract because it has shown that Chic Miller's Chevrolet failed to conduct customary sales and service operations between March 1 and March 8, 2004. A sign posted on the door of the dealership during that time stated: "CHIC MILLER'S CHEVROLET IS CLOSED. Please bring your vehicle to the dealer of your choice. Thank you for your past patronage." Although Miller asserts that the dealership was only temporarily closed for repair, the sign does not say that the dealership would reopen, and the phrases "bring your vehicle to the dealer of your choice" and "thank you for your past patronage" certainly suggest permanent closure * * * . [T]he dealership contract permits GM to terminate the agreement for "[f]ailure of the Dealer to conduct customary sales and service operations during customary business hours for seven consecutive business days." Since that term is material to the agreement, GM had "good cause" under the Connecticut dealer statute for terminating the franchise because of Plaintiff's breach.

Chic Miller's Chevrolet alleges that by "prematurely seeking the ultimate remedy of termination of the dealership franchise, the Defendant has not acted in good faith * * * ." The undisputed record shows that GM extended the period several times for Miller to try to obtain replacement floor plan financing after his arrangement with Chase ended. GM first notified Plaintiff of its breach of the dealership contract on December 20, 2002, with an amended notice on January 2, 2003 * * * . [O]n March 7, 2003, GM extended the deadline until March 31, and when Miller was still unable to find a lender, GM gave him another extension until July 1. * * * While Miller may have expected, based on GM's past practices, more than GM provided to him, Miller has not offered evidence to show that GM was acting "prematurely" or in bad faith during the course of the dealings recounted above.

* * * *

CHAPTER 35 Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Because Plaintiff has not offered evidence from which a factfinder could conclude that GM acted without good cause or good faith, GM is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on Plaintiff's claims under the Connecticut Franchise Act.

• Decision and Remedy The court granted GM's motion for summary judgment. GM acted in good faith, with good cause under the applicable state statute to terminate Chic Miller's franchise. The dealer failed to maintain floor plan financing, a material requirement under the franchise agreement. The dealer also failed to conduct sales and service operations for seven consecutive business days, another material requirement under the parties' contract.

• What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that in March 2004, Chic Miller's had placed one newspaper ad promoting its services and had sold one car. Would the result have been different?

• The Global Dimension Should General Motors Corporation, or any domestic franchisor, be allowed to impose different contract terms on franchisees in foreign countries than it does on franchisees in the United States? Why or why not?

REVIEWING Sole Proprietorships and Franchises

Carlos Del Rey decided to open a Mexican fast-food restaurant and signed a franchise contract with a national chain called La Grande Enchilada. The contract required the franchisee to strictly follow the franchisor's operating manual and stated that failure to do so would be grounds for terminating the franchise contract. The manual set forth detailed operating procedures and safety standards, and provided that a La Grande Enchilada representative would inspect the restaurant monthly to ensure compliance. Nine months after Del Rey began operating his restaurant, a spark from the grill ignited an oily towel in the kitchen. No one was injured, but by the time firefighters were able to put out the fire, the kitchen had sustained extensive damage. The cook told the fire department that the towel was "about two feet from the grill" when it caught fire, which was in compliance with the franchisor's manual that required towels be placed at least one foot from the grills. Nevertheless, the next day La Grande Enchilada notified Del Rey that his franchise would terminate in thirty days for failure to follow the prescribed safety procedures. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What type of franchise was Del Rey's La Grande Enchilada restaurant?
2. If Del Rey operates the restaurant as a sole proprietorship, who bears the loss for the damaged kitchen? Explain.
3. Assume that Del Rey files a lawsuit against La Grande Enchilada, claiming that his franchise was wrongfully terminated. What is the main factor that a court would consider in determining whether the franchise was wrongfully terminated?
4. Would a court be likely to rule that La Grande Enchilada had good cause to terminate Del Rey's franchise in this situation? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

35-1. Maria, Pablo, and Vicky are recent college graduates who would like to go into business for themselves. They are considering purchasing a franchise. If they enter into a franchising arrangement, they would have the support of a large company that could answer any questions they might have. Also, a firm that has been in business for many years would be experienced in dealing with some of the problems that novice businesspersons might encounter. These and other attributes of franchises can lessen some of the risks of the marketplace. What other aspects of franchising—positive and negative—should Maria, Pablo, and Vicky consider before committing themselves to a particular franchise?

35-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

National Foods, Inc., sells franchises to its fast-food restaurants, known as Chicky-D's. Under the franchise agreement, franchisees agree to hire and train employees strictly according to Chicky-D's standards. Chicky-D's regional supervisors are required to approve all job candidates before they are hired and all general policies affecting those employees. Chicky-D's reserves the right to terminate a franchise for violating the franchisor's rules. In practice, however, Chicky-D's regional supervisors routinely approve new employees and individual franchisees' policies. After several incidents of racist comments and conduct by Tim, a recently hired assistant manager at a Chicky-D's, Sharon, a counterperson at the restaurant, resigns. Sharon files a suit in a federal district court against National. National files a motion for summary judgment, arguing that it is not liable for harassment by franchise employees. Will the court grant National's motion? Why or why not?

35-3. Otmar has secured a particular high-quality ice cream franchise. The franchise agreement calls for Otmar to sell the ice cream only at a specific location; to buy all the ice cream from the franchisor; to order and sell all the flavors produced by the franchisor; and to refrain from selling any ice cream stored for more than two weeks after delivery by the franchisor, as the quality of the ice cream declines after that period of time. After two months of operation, Otmar believes that he can increase his profits by moving the store to another part of the city. He refuses to order even a limited quantity of the "fruit delight" flavor because of its higher cost, and he has sold ice cream that has been stored longer than two weeks without customer complaint. Otmar maintains that the franchisor has no right to restrict him in these practices. Discuss his claims.

35-4. Omega Computers, Inc., is a franchisor that grants exclusive geographic territories to its franchisees with retail locations, including Pete's Digital Products. After selling more than two hundred franchises, Omega establishes an interactive Web site. On the site, a customer can order Omega's products directly from the franchisor. When Pete's sets up a Web site through which a customer can also order Omega's products, Omega and Pete's file suits against each other, each alleging that the other is in violation of the franchise agreement. To decide this issue, what factors should the court consider? How might the parties have avoided this conflict? Discuss.

35-5. Franchise Termination. In 1985, Bruce Byrne, with his sons Scott and Gordon, opened Lone Star R.V. Sales, Inc., a motor home dealership in Houston, Texas. In 1994, Lone Star became a franchised dealer for Winnebago Industries, Inc., a manufacturer of recreational vehicles. The parties renewed the franchise in 1995, but during the next year, their relationship began to deteriorate. Lone Star did not maintain a current inventory; its sales did not meet the goals agreed to by the parties, and Lone Star disparaged Winnebago products to consumers and otherwise failed to actively promote them. Several times, the Byrnes subjected Winnebago employees to verbal abuse. During one phone conversation, Bruce threatened to throw a certain Winnebago sales manager off Lone Star's lot if he appeared at the dealership. Bruce was physically incapable of carrying out the threat, however. In 1998, Winnebago terminated the franchise, claiming, among many other things, that it was concerned for the safety of its employees. Lone Star filed a protest with the Texas Motor Vehicle Board. Did Winnebago have good cause to terminate Lone Star's franchise? Discuss. [Lone Star R.V. Sales, Inc. v. Motor Vehicle Board of the Texas Department of Transportation, 49 S.W.3d 492 (Tex.App.—Austin 2001)]

35-6. Franchise Termination. In the automobile industry, luxury-car customers are considered the most demanding segment of the market with respect to customer service. Jaguar Cars, a division of Ford Motor Co., is the exclusive U.S. distributor of Jaguar luxury cars. Jaguar Cars distributes its products through franchised dealers. In April 1999, Dave Ostrem Imports, Inc., an authorized Jaguar dealer in Des Moines, Iowa, contracted to sell its dealership to Midwest Automotive III, LLC. A Jaguar franchise generally cannot be sold without Jaguar Cars' permission. Jaguar Cars asked Midwest Auto to submit three years of customer satisfaction index (CSI) data for all franchises with which its owners had been associated. (CSI data are intended to measure how well dealers treat their customers and satisfy their customers' needs. Jaguar Cars requires above-average CSI ratings for its dealers.) Most of Midwest Auto's scores fell below the national average. Jaguar Cars rejected Midwest Auto's application and sought to terminate the franchise, claiming that a transfer of the dealership would be "substantially detri-

Walik Elkhatib, a Palestinian Arab, emigrated to the United States in 1971 and became an American citizen. Eight years later, Elkhatib bought a Dunkin’ Donuts, Inc., franchise in Bellwood, Illinois. Dunkin’ Donuts began offering breakfast sandwiches with bacon, ham, or sausage through its franchises in 1984, but Elkhatib refused to sell these items at his store on the ground that his religion forbade the handling of pork. In 1995, Elkhatib opened a second franchise in Berkeley, Illinois, at which he also refused to sell pork products. The next year, Elkhatib began selling meatless sandwiches at both locations. In 1998, Elkhatib opened a third franchise in Westchester, Illinois. When he proposed to relocate this franchise, Dunkin’ Donuts refused to approve the new location and added that it would not renew any of his franchise agreements because he did not carry the full sandwich line. Elkhatib filed a suit in a federal district court against Dunkin’ Donuts and others. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. Did Dunkin’ Donuts act in good faith in its relationship with Elkhatib? Explain. [Elkhatib v. Dunkin’ Donuts, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Ill. 2004)]

35-8. The Franchise Contract. On August 23, 1995, Climaco Guzman entered into a commercial janitorial services franchise agreement with Jan-Pro Cleaning Systems, Inc., in Rhode Island for a franchise fee of $3,285. In the agreement, Jan-Pro promised to furnish Guzman with “one (1) or more customer account(s) . . . amounting to $8,000.00 gross volume per year. . . . No portion of the franchise fee is refundable except and to the extent that the Franchisor, within 120 business days following the date of execution of the Franchise Agreement, fails to provide accounts.” By February 19, Guzman had not received any accounts and demanded a full refund. Jan-Pro then promised “two accounts grossing $12,000 per year in income.” Despite its assurances, Jan-Pro did not have the ability to furnish accounts that met the requirements. In September, Guzman filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Jan-Pro, alleging, in part, fraudulent misrepresentation. Should the court rule in Guzman’s favor? Why or why not? [*Guzman v. 35-9. Sole Proprietorship. James Ferguson operates “Jim’s 11-E Auto Sales” in Jonesborough, Tennessee, as a sole proprietorship. In 1999, Consumers Insurance Co. issued a policy to “Jim Ferguson, Jim’s 11E Auto Sales” covering “Owned ‘Autos’ Only” Auto was defined to include “a land motor vehicle,” which was not further explained in the policy. Coverage extended to damage caused by the owner or driver of an underinsured motor vehicle. In 2000, Ferguson bought and titled in his own name a 1976 Harley-Davidson motorcycle, intending to repair and sell the cycle through his dealership. In October 2001, while riding the motorcycle, Ferguson was struck by an auto driven by John Jenkins. Ferguson filed a suit in a Tennessee state court against Jenkins, who was underinsured with respect to Ferguson’s medical bills, and Consumers. The insurer argued, among other things, that because the motorcycle was bought and titled in Ferguson’s own name, and he was riding it at the time of the accident, it was his personal vehicle and thus was not covered under the dealership’s policy. What is the relationship between a sole proprietor and a sole proprietorship? How might this status affect the court’s decision in this case? [Ferguson v. Jenkins, 204 S.W.3d 779 (Tenn.App. 2006)]

35-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In August 2004, Ralph Vilardo contacted Travel Center, Inc., in Cincinnati, Ohio, to buy a trip to Florida in December for his family to celebrate his fiftieth wedding anniversary. Vilardo paid $6,900 to David Sheets, the sole proprietor of Travel Center. Vilardo also paid $195 to Sheets for a separate trip to Florida in February 2005. Sheets assured Vilardo that everything was set, but in fact no arrangements were made. Later, two unauthorized charges for travel services totaling $1,182.35 appeared on Vilardo’s credit-card statement. Vilardo filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Sheets and his business, alleging, among other things, fraud and violations of the state consumer protection law. Vilardo served Sheets and Travel Center with copies of the complaint, the summons, a request for admissions, and other documents filed with the court, including a motion for summary judgment. Each of these filings asked for a response within a certain time period. Sheets responded once on his own behalf with a denial of all of Vilardo’s claims. Travel Center did not respond. [Vilardo v. Sheets, ___ Ohio App.3d ___, ___ N.E.2d ___ (12 Dist. 2006)]

- Almost four months after Vilardo filed his complaint, Sheets decided that he was unable to adequately represent himself and retained an attorney who asked the court for more time. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? Ultimately, what should the court rule in this case?
- Sheets admitted that “Travel Center, Inc.” was a sole proprietorship. He also argued that liability might be imposed on his business but not on himself. How would you rule with respect to this argument? Why? Would there be anything unethical about allowing Sheets to avoid liability on this basis? Explain.

Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships

Traditionally, one of the most common forms of business organization selected by two or more persons is the partnership. A partnership arises from an agreement, express or implied, between two or more persons to carry on a business for a profit. Partners are co-owners of a business and have joint control over its operation and the right to share in its profits. In this chapter, we examine several forms of partnership.

We begin the chapter with an examination of ordinary partnerships, or general partnerships, and the rights and duties of partners in this traditional business entity. We then examine some special forms of partnerships known as limited partnerships and limited liability partnerships, which receive a different treatment under the law.

Basic Partnership Concepts

Partnerships are governed both by common law concepts (in particular, those relating to agency) and by statutory law. As in so many other areas of business law, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws has drafted uniform laws for partnerships, and these have been widely adopted by the states.

Agency Concepts and Partnership Law

When two or more persons agree to do business as partners, they enter into a special relationship with one another. To an extent, their relationship is similar to an agency relationship because each partner is deemed to be the agent of the other partners and of the partnership. The agency concepts that were discussed in Chapters 31 and 32 thus apply—specifically, the imputation of knowledge of, and responsibility for, acts carried out within the scope of the partnership relationship. In their relationship to one another, partners are also bound by the fiduciary ties that bind an agent and principal under agency law.

Partnership law is distinct from agency law in one significant way, however. A partnership is based on a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons who agree to place some or all of their funds or other assets, labor, and skills in a business with the understanding that profits and losses will be shared. In a nonpartnership agency relationship, the agent usually does not have an ownership interest in the business, nor is he or she obligated to bear a portion of ordinary business losses.

The Uniform Partnership Act

The Uniform Partnership Act (UPA) governs the operation of partnerships in the absence of express agreement and has done much to reduce controversies in the law relating to partnerships. Except for Louisiana, all of the states, as well as the District of Columbia, have adopted the UPA. A majority of the states have enacted the most recent version of the UPA, which was adopted in 1994 and amended in 1997 to provide limited liability for partners in a limited liability partnership.¹ Excerpts from the latest version of the UPA, including the 1997 amendments, are presented in Appendix E.

1. At the time this book went to press, more than half of the states, as well as the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the U.S. Virgin Islands, had adopted the UPA with the 1997 amendments. We therefore base our discussion of the UPA on the 1997 version and refer to older versions of the UPA in footnotes when necessary.

When Does a Partnership Exist?

Parties sometimes find themselves in conflict over whether their business enterprise is a legal partnership, especially in the absence of a formal, written partnership agreement. The UPA defines the term partnership as “an association of two or more persons to carry on as co-owners a business for profit” [UPA 101(6)]. The intent to associate is a key element of a partnership, and one cannot join a partnership unless all other partners consent [UPA 401(i)].

In resolving disputes over whether a partnership exists, courts usually look for the following three essential elements of partnership implicit in the UPA’s definition:

1. A sharing of profits or losses.
2. A joint ownership of the business.
3. An equal right to participate in the management of the business.

If the evidence in a particular case is insufficient to establish all three factors, the UPA provides a set of guidelines to be used. For example, the sharing of profits and losses from a business creates a presumption that a partnership exists. No presumption is made, however, if the profits were received as payment of any of the following [UPA 202(c)(3)]:

1. A debt by installments or interest on a loan.
2. Wages of an employee or for the services of an independent contractor.
3. Rent to a landlord.
4. An annuity to a surviving spouse or representative of a deceased partner.
5. A sale of the goodwill of a business or property.

To illustrate: A debtor owes a creditor $5,000 on an unsecured debt. To repay the debt, the debtor agrees to pay (and the creditor, to accept) 10 percent of the debtor’s monthly business profits until the loan with interest has been paid. Although the creditor is sharing profits from the business, the debtor and creditor are not presumed to be partners.

Joint Property Ownership and Partnership Status

Joint ownership of property does not in and of itself create a partnership. Therefore, the fact that, say, MacPherson and Bunker own real property as joint tenants or as tenants in common (forms of joint ownership that will be discussed in Chapter 47) does not by itself establish a partnership. In fact, the sharing of gross returns and even profits from such ownership “does not by itself establish a partnership” [UPA 202(c)(1) and (2)].² Thus, if MacPherson and Bunker jointly own a piece of farmland and lease it to a farmer for a share of the profits from the farming operation in lieu of set rental payments, the sharing of the profits ordinarily will not make MacPherson, Bunker, and the farmer partners.

Note, though, that although the sharing of profits from ownership of property does not prove the existence of a partnership, sharing both profits and losses usually does. For example, two sisters, Zoe and Cienna, buy a restaurant together, open a joint bank account from which they pay for supplies and expenses, and share the proceeds that the restaurant generates. Zoe manages the restaurant and Cienna handles the bookkeeping. After eight years, Cienna stops keeping the books and does no other work for the restaurant. Zoe, who is now operating the restaurant by herself, no longer wants to share the profits with Cienna. She offers to buy her sister out, but the two cannot agree on a fair price. When Cienna files a lawsuit, a question arises as to whether the two sisters were partners in the restaurant. In this situation, a court would find that a partnership existed because the sisters shared management responsibilities, had joint accounts, and shared the profits and the losses of the restaurant equally.

Entity versus Aggregate

A partnership is sometimes called a company or a firm, terms that suggest that the partnership is an entity separate and apart from its aggregate members. The law of partnership recognizes the independent entity for most purposes but may treat the partnership as a composite of its individual partners for some purposes.

Partnership as an Entity At common law, a partnership was never treated as a separate legal entity. Thus, a common law suit could never be brought by or against the firm in its own name; each individual partner had to sue or be sued. Today, most states provide specifically that a partnership can be treated as an entity for certain purposes. These usually include the capacity to sue or be sued, to collect judgments, and to have all accounting procedures carried out in the name of the partnership. In addition, the UPA clearly states, “A partnership is an entity” and

2. See, for example, In re Estate of Ivanchak, 169 Ohio App.3d 140, 862 N.E.2d 151 (2006).

“A partnership may sue and be sued in the name of the partnership” [UPA 201 and 307(a)]. As an entity, a partnership may hold the title to real or personal property in its name rather than in the names of the individual partners. Finally, federal procedural laws frequently permit a partnership to be treated as an entity in such matters as lawsuits in federal courts and bankruptcy proceedings.

Partnership as an Aggregate In one circumstance, the partnership is not regarded as a separate legal entity but is treated as an aggregate of the individual partners. For federal income tax purposes, a partnership is not a taxpaying entity. The income and losses it incurs are “passed through” the partnership framework and attributed to the partners on their individual tax returns. The partnership itself has no tax liability and is responsible only for filing an information return with the Internal Revenue Service. In other words, the firm itself pays no taxes. A partner’s profit from the partnership (whether distributed or not) is taxed as individual income to the individual partner.

Partnership Formation

As a general rule, agreements to form a partnership can be oral, written, or implied by conduct. Some partnership agreements, however, must be in writing to be legally enforceable within the Statute of Frauds (see Chapter 15 for details). For example, a partnership agreement that authorizes the partners to deal in transfers of real property must be evidenced by a sufficient writing (or record).

The Partnership Agreement

A partnership agreement, called articles of partnership, can include virtually any terms that the parties wish, so long as the terms are not illegal or contrary to public policy or statute [UPA 103]. The terms commonly included in a partnership agreement are listed in Exhibit 36-1 on the next page. (Notice that this list includes an arbitration clause, which is often included in a partnership agreement.)

Duration of the Partnership

The partnership agreement can specify the duration of the partnership by stating that it will continue until a designated date or until the completion of a particular project. This is called a partnership for a term. If this type of partnership is dissolved (broken up) without the consent of all of the partners prior to the expiration of the partnership term, the dissolution constitutes a breach of the agreement. The responsible partner can be held liable for any resulting losses.

If no fixed duration is specified, the partnership is a partnership at will. Any partner can dissolve this type of partnership at any time without violating the agreement and without incurring liability for losses to other partners that result from the termination.

A Corporation as Partner

In a general partnership, the partners are personally liable for the debts incurred by the partnership. If one of the general partners is a corporation, however, what does personal liability mean? Basically, the capacity of corporations to contract is a question of corporate law. At one time, many states had restrictions on corporations becoming partners, although such restrictions have become less common over the years.

The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (see Appendix G) allows corporations generally to make contracts and incur liabilities. The UPA specifically permits a corporation to be a partner. By definition, “a partnership is an association of two or more persons,” and the UPA defines person as including corporations [UPA 101(10)].

Partnership by Estoppel

Sometimes, persons who are not partners nevertheless hold themselves out as partners and make representations that third parties rely on in dealing with them. In such a situation, a court may conclude that a partnership by estoppel exists and impose liability—but not partnership rights—on the alleged partner or partners. Similarly, a partnership by estoppel may be imposed when a partner represents, expressly or impliedly, that a nonpartner is a member of the firm. Whenever a third person has reasonably and detrimentally relied on the representation that a nonpartner was part of the partnership, partnership by estoppel is deemed to exist. When this occurs, the nonpartner is regarded as an agent whose acts are binding on the partnership [UPA 308].

For example, Moreno owns a small shop. Knowing that Midland Bank will not make a loan on his credit alone, Moreno represents that Lorman, a financially secure businesswoman, is a partner in Moreno’s business. Lorman knows of Moreno’s misrepresentation but fails to correct it. Midland Bank, relying on the strength of Lorman's reputation and credit, extends a loan to Moreno. Moreno will be liable to the bank for repaying the loan. In many states, Lorman would also be held liable to the bank. Because Lorman has impliedly consented to the misrepresentation, she will normally be estopped (prevented) from denying that she is Moreno's partner. A court will treat Lorman as if she were in fact a partner in Moreno's business insofar as this loan is concerned.

nership agreement, the law imposes the rights and duties discussed in the following subsections. The character and nature of the partnership business generally influence the application of these rights and duties.

Rights of Partners

The rights of partners in a partnership relate to the following areas: management, interest in the partnership, compensation, inspection of books, accounting, and property.

Management In a general partnership, "All partners have equal rights in the management and conduct of partnership business" [UPA 401(f)]. Unless the partners agree otherwise, each partner has one vote in management matters regardless of the proportional size of his or her interest in the firm. In a large partner-

Partnership Operation

The rights and duties of partners are governed largely by the specific terms of their partnership agreement. In the absence of provisions to the contrary in the part-ship, partners often agree to delegate daily management responsibilities to a management committee made up of one or more of the partners.

The majority rule controls decisions on ordinary matters connected with partnership business, unless otherwise specified in the agreement. Decisions that significantly affect the nature of the partnership or that are not apparently for carrying on the ordinary course of the partnership business, or business of the kind, however, require the unanimous consent of the partners [UPA 301(2), 401(i), 401(j)]. Unanimous consent is likely to be required for a decision to undertake any of the following actions:³

1. Altering the essential nature of the firm's business as expressed in the partnership agreement or altering the capital structure of the partnership.
2. Admitting new partners or engaging in a completely new business.
3. Assigning partnership property to a trust for the benefit of creditors.
4. Disposing of the partnership's goodwill.
5. Confessing judgment against the partnership or submitting partnership claims to arbitration. (A confession of judgment is an act by a debtor permitting a judgment to be entered against him or her by a creditor, for an agreed sum, without the institution of legal proceedings.)
6. Undertaking any act that would make further conduct of partnership business impossible.
7. Amending the terms of the partnership agreement.

Interest in the Partnership Each partner is entitled to the proportion of business profits and losses that is designated in the partnership agreement. If the agreement does not apportion profits (indicate how the profits will be shared), the UPA provides that profits will be shared equally. If the agreement does not apportion losses, losses will be shared in the same ratio as profits [UPA 401(b)].

For example, Rico and Brett form a partnership. The partnership agreement provides for capital contributions of $60,000 from Rico and $40,000 from Brett, but it is silent as to how they will share profits or losses. In this situation, they will share both profits and losses equally. If their partnership agreement had provided that they would share profits in the same ratio as capital contributions, however, 60 percent of the profits would go to Rico, and 40 percent would go to Brett. If the agreement was silent as to losses, losses would be shared in the same ratio as profits (60 percent and 40 percent, respectively).

Compensation Devoting time, skill, and energy to partnership business is a partner's duty and generally is not a compensable service. Partners can, of course, agree otherwise. For example, the managing partner of a law firm often receives a salary in addition to her or his share of profits for performing special duties, such as managing the office or personnel.

Inspection of Books Partnership books and records must be kept accessible to all partners. Each partner has the right to receive (and the corresponding duty to produce) full and complete information concerning the conduct of all aspects of partnership business [UPA 403]. Each firm retains books for recording and securing such information. Partners contribute the information, and a bookkeeper typically has the duty to preserve it. The books must be kept at the firm's principal business office (unless the partners agree otherwise). Every partner, whether active or inactive, is entitled to inspect all books and records on demand and can make copies of the materials. The personal representative of a deceased partner's estate has the same right of access to partnership books and records that the decedent would have had [UPA 403].

Accounting of Partnership Assets or Profits An accounting of partnership assets or profits is required to determine the value of each partner's share in the partnership. An accounting can be performed voluntarily, or it can be compelled by court order. At common law, an accounting was generally not available to partners prior to the dissolution of the partnership. Under UPA 405(b), in contrast, a partner has the right to bring an action for an accounting during the term of the partnership, as well as on the firm's dissolution and winding up.⁴ The UPA also provides partners with access to the courts during the term of

3. The previous version of the UPA specifically listed most of these actions as requiring unanimous consent. The current version of the UPA omits the list entirely to allow the courts more flexibility. The Official Comments explain that most of these acts, except for submitting a claim to arbitration, will likely still remain outside the apparent authority of an individual partner.

4. Under the previous version of the UPA, a partner could bring an action for an accounting only if the partnership agreement provided for an accounting, the partner was wrongfully excluded from the business or its property or books, another partner was in breach of his or her fiduciary duty, or other circumstances rendered it "just and reasonable."

the partnership to resolve various claims against the partnership and the other partners.

Property Rights Property acquired by a partnership is the property of the partnership and not of the partners individually [UPA 203]. Partnership property includes all property that was originally contributed to the partnership and anything later purchased by the partnership or in the partnership's name (except in rare circumstances) [UPA 204]. A partner may use or possess partnership property only on behalf of the partnership [UPA 401(g)]. A partner is not a co-owner of partnership property and has no right to sell, mortgage, or transfer partnership property to another [UPA 501].⁵

In other words, partnership property is owned by the partnership as an entity and not by the individual partners. Thus, a creditor of an individual partner cannot seek to use partnership property to satisfy the partner's debt. Such a creditor can, however, petition a court for a charging order to attach the individual partner's interest in the partnership (her or his proportionate share of the profits and losses and right to receive distributions) to satisfy the partner's obligation [UPA 502]. (A partner can also assign her or his right to a share of the partnership profits to another to satisfy a debt.)

Duties and Liabilities of Partners

The duties and liabilities of partners that we examine here are basically derived from agency law. Each partner is an agent of every other partner and acts as both a principal and an agent in any business transaction within the scope of the partnership agreement. Each partner is also a general agent of the partnership in carrying out the usual business of the firm "or business of the kind carried on by the partnership" [UPA 301(1)]. Thus, every act of a partner concerning partnership business and "business of the kind" and every contract signed in the partnership's name bind the firm. The UPA affirms general principles of agency law that pertain to the authority of a partner to bind a partnership in contract or tort.

Fiduciary Duties The fiduciary duties that a partner owes to the partnership and the other partners are the duty of care and the duty of loyalty [UPA 404(a)].

5. Under the previous version of the UPA, partners were tenants in partnership. This meant that every partner was a co-owner with all other partners of the partnership property. The current UPA does not recognize this concept.

Duty of Care. A partner's duty of care is limited to refraining from "grossly negligent or reckless conduct, intentional misconduct, or a knowing violation of law" [UPA 404(c)].⁶ A partner is not liable to the partnership for simple negligence or honest errors in judgment in conducting partnership business, but is liable for any grossly negligent or reckless conduct that causes damage to the firm.

Duty of Loyalty. The duty of loyalty requires a partner to account to the partnership for "any property, profit, or benefit" derived by the partner in the conduct of the partnership's business or from the use of its property. A partner must also refrain from dealing with the firm as an adverse party or competing with the partnership in business [UPA 404(b)]. The duty of loyalty can be breached by self-dealing, misusing partnership property, disclosing trade secrets, or usurping a partnership business opportunity.

A classic example is the 1928 case of Meinhard v. Salmon.⁷ Salmon leased a building on Fifth Avenue in New York City for twenty years. The building had been a hotel, and Salmon wanted to convert it into a commercial building and lease it out to shops and offices. Salmon formed a partnership with Meinhard, who put up half of the capital. Both men received a percentage of the profits and shared the losses equally, but Salmon had the sole power to manage the building. A few months before the lease was set to expire, the property owner approached Salmon about leasing several adjacent properties and constructing a $3 million building on them.

Salmon did not inform Meinhard about this business opportunity and instead signed a new lease in the name of his own business (in which Meinhard was not an owner). The new lease covered the adjacent properties and the original development. In the lawsuit that followed, the court held that Salmon had breached his fiduciary duty by failing to inform Meinhard of a business opportunity and secretly taking advantage of the opportunity himself. The court granted Meinhard a 50 percent interest in the new lease.

Breach and Waiver of Fiduciary Duties. A partner's fiduciary duties may not be waived or eliminated in the partnership agreement, and in fulfilling them, each partner must act consistently with the obligation of good faith and fair dealing [UPA 103(b), 404(d)]. Note that a partner may pursue his or her own interests without automatically violating these duties [UPA 404(e)]. The key is whether the partner has disclosed the interest to the other partners.

6. The previous version of the UPA touched only briefly on the duty of loyalty and left the details of the partners' fiduciary duties to be developed under the law of agency.

7. 249 N.Y. 458, 164 N.E. 545 (N.Y.App. 1928).

For example, a partner who owns a shopping mall may vote against a partnership proposal to open a competing mall, provided that the partner has fully disclosed her interest in the shopping mall to the other partners at the firm. Similarly, suppose that in the case Meinhard v. Salmon discussed previously, Salmon had informed Meinhard about the opportunity of leasing and developing the additional properties. If Meinhard was not interested in extending the partnership's lease to cover the nearby properties, then Salmon would have been able to take advantage of the opportunity on his own. A partner cannot make secret profits or put self-interest before his or her duty to the interest of the partnership, however.

Authority of Partners The UPA affirms general principles of agency law that pertain to a partner's authority to bind a partnership in contract. A partner may also subject the partnership to tort liability under agency principles. When a partner is carrying on partnership business or business of the kind with third parties in the usual way, apparent authority exists, and both the partner and the firm share liability.

The partnership will not be liable, however, if the third parties know that the partner has no such authority. For example, Patricia, a partner in the partnership of Heise, Green, and Stevens, applies for a loan on behalf of the partnership without authorization from the other partners. The bank manager knows that Patricia has no authority to do so. If the bank manager grants the loan, Patricia will be personally bound, but the firm will not be liable.

A partnership may file a "statement of partnership authority" to limit a partner's capacity to act as the firm's agent or transfer property on its behalf [UPA 105, 303]. Any limit on a partner's authority, however, normally does not affect a third party who does not know about the statement. Statements limiting the partners' authority to transfer real property that are filed with the appropriate state records office (the office that records real property transfers—see Chapter 48) will bind third parties, whether or not they know about the limitation.

The agency concepts relating to apparent authority, actual authority, and ratification that were discussed in Chapter 32 also apply to partnerships. The extent of implied authority is generally broader for partners than for ordinary agents, however.

The Scope of Implied Powers. The character and scope of the partnership business and the customary nature of the particular business operation determine the implied powers of partners. For example, each partner in a trading partnership—essentially, any partnership business that has goods in inventory and makes profits buying and selling those goods—has a wide range of implied powers, such as to advertise products, hire employees, and extend the firm's credit by issuing or indorsing instruments, such as checks.

In an ordinary partnership, the partners can exercise all implied powers reasonably necessary and customary to carry on that particular business. Such powers include the authority to make warranties on goods in the sales business and the power to enter into contracts consistent with the firm's regular course of business. Most partners also have the implied authority to make admissions and representations concerning partnership affairs. A partner might also have the implied power to convey (transfer) real property in the firm's name when such conveyances are part of the ordinary course of partnership business.

Authorized versus Unauthorized Actions. If a partner acts within the scope of authority, the partnership is legally bound to honor the partner's commitments to third parties. For example, a partner's authority to sell partnership products carries with it the implied authority to transfer title and to make usual warranties. Hence, in a partnership that operates a retail tire store, any partner negotiating a contract with a customer for the sale of a set of tires can warrant that "each tire will be warranted for normal wear for 40,000 miles."

This same partner, however, does not have the authority to sell office equipment, fixtures, or the partnership's retail facility without the consent of all of the other partners. In addition, because partnerships are formed to generate profits, a partner generally does not have the authority to make charitable contributions without the consent of the other partners. Such actions are not binding on the partnership unless they are ratified by all of the other partners.

Liability of Partners One significant disadvantage associated with a traditional partnership is that the partners are personally liable for the debts of the partnership. Moreover, the liability is essentially unlimited because the acts of one partner in the ordinary course of business subject the other partners to personal liability [UPA 305]. The following subsections explain the rules on a partner's liability.

Joint Liability. Each partner in a partnership is jointly liable for the partnership's obligations. Joint liability means that a third party must sue all of the partners as a group, but each partner can be held liable for the full amount. Under the prior version of the UPA, which is still in effect in a few states, partners were subject to joint liability on partnership debts and contracts, but not on partnership debts arising from torts.⁸ If, for example, a third party sues a partner on a partnership contract, the partner has the right to demand that the other partners be sued with her or him. In fact, if the third party does not sue all of the partners, the assets of the partnership cannot be used to satisfy the judgment. Under the theory of joint liability, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before creditors can reach the partners' individual assets.⁹

Joint and Several Liability. In the majority of the states, under UPA 306(a), partners are both jointly and

8. Under the previous version of the UPA, the partners were subject to joint and several liability, which is discussed next, on debts arising from torts. States that follow this rule include Connecticut, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

9. For a case applying joint liability to partnerships, see Shar's Cars, LLC v. Elder, 97 P.3d 724 (Utah App. 2004).

severally (separately, or individually) liable for all partnership obligations, including contracts, torts, and breaches of trust. Joint and several liability means that a third party has the option of suing all of the partners together (jointly) or one or more of the partners separately (severally). This is true even if a partner did not participate in, ratify, or know about whatever it was that gave rise to the cause of action. Normally, though, the partnership's assets must be exhausted before a creditor can enforce a judgment against a partner's separate assets [UPA 307(d)].

A judgment against one partner severally (separately) does not extinguish the others' liability. Those not sued in the first action normally may be sued subsequently, unless the first action was conclusive on the question of liability. Suppose that Renalt brings a malpractice (professional negligence) action against one partner in a firm and then discovers that another partner was involved in the negligence. Normally, he may also file a lawsuit against the second partner (unless the court held that no one at the firm breached the standard of care with regard to Renalt).

If a plaintiff is successful in a suit against a partner or partners, he or she may collect on the judgment only against the assets of those partners named as defendants. A partner who commits a tort is required to indemnify (reimburse) the partnership for any damages it pays. The question in the following case was whether a partnership must indemnify a partner for liability that results from negligent conduct occurring in the ordinary course of the partnership's business.

CASE 36.1 Moren v. Jax Restaurant

Minnesota Court of Appeals, 2004. 679 N.W.2d 165.

● Background and Facts "Jax Restaurant" is a partnership that operates Jax Restaurant in Foley, Minnesota. One afternoon in October 2000, Nicole Moren, one of the partners, finished her shift at the restaurant at 4:00 P.M. and picked up her two-year-old son, Remington, from day care. About 5:30 P.M., Moren returned to the restaurant with Remington after Amy Benedetti, the other partner and Moren's sister, asked for help. Moren's husband offered to pick up Remington in twenty minutes. Because Moren did not want Remington running around the restaurant, she brought him into the kitchen with her, set him on top of the counter, and began rolling out pizza dough using a dough-pressing machine. While she was making pizzas, Remington reached his hand into the dough press. His hand was crushed, causing permanent injuries. Through his father, Remington filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against the partnership, alleging negligence. The partnership filed a complaint against Moren, arguing that it was entitled to indemnity (compensation or reimbursement) from Moren for her negligence. The court issued a summary judgment in favor of Moren on the complaint. The partnership appealed this judgment to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
CRIPPEN, Judge.

* * * *

Under Minnesota's Uniform Partnership Act [the most recent version of the UPA], a partnership is an entity distinct from its partners, and as such, a partnership may sue and be sued in the name of the partnership. [Under the UPA] "[a] partnership is liable for loss or injury caused to a person * * * as a result of a wrongful act or omission, or other actionable conduct, of a partner acting in the ordinary course of business of the partnership or with authority of the partnership." Accordingly, a "partnership shall * * * indemnify [reimburse] a partner for liabilities incurred by the partner in the ordinary course of the business of the partnership * * * ." Stated conversely, an "act of a partner which is not apparently for carrying on in the ordinary course the partnership business or business of the kind carried on by the partnership binds the partnership only if the act was authorized by the other partners." Thus, under the plain language of the UPA, a partner has a right to indemnity from the partnership, but the partnership's claim of indemnity from a partner is not authorized or required. [Emphasis added.]

The [lower] court correctly concluded that Nicole Moren's conduct was in the ordinary course of business of the partnership and, as a result, indemnity by the partner to the partnership was inappropriate. It is undisputed that one of the cooks scheduled to work that evening did not come in, and that Moren's partner asked her to help in the kitchen. It also is undisputed that Moren was making pizzas for the partnership when her son was injured. Because her conduct at the time of the injury was in the ordinary course of business of the partnership, under the UPA, her conduct bound the partnership and it owes indemnity to her for her negligence.

* * * *

Appellant * * * claims that because Nicole Moren's action of bringing Remington into the kitchen was partly motivated by personal reasons, her conduct was outside the ordinary course of business. Because it has not been previously addressed, there is no Minnesota authority regarding this issue. * * * [W]e conclude that the conduct of Nicole Moren was no less in the ordinary course of business because it also served personal purposes. It is undisputed that Moren was acting for the benefit of the partnership by making pizzas when her son was injured, and even though she was simultaneously acting in her role as a mother, her conduct remained in the ordinary course of the partnership business.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment. "Minnesota law requires a partnership to indemnify its partners for the result of their negligence." The appellate court also reasoned that "the conduct of a partner may be partly motivated by personal reasons and still occur in the ordinary course of business of the partnership." Thus "[l]iability for Nicole Moren's negligence rested with the partnership, even if the partner's conduct partly served her personal interests."

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Moren's predominant motive in bringing her son to the restaurant had been to benefit herself by feeding him free pizza. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension What seems to have occurred in this case that might have served as an alternative basis for imposing liability on the partnership? (Hint: Who besides Moren had the authority to act on behalf of the partnership?)

Liability of Incoming Partners. A partner newly admitted to an existing partnership is not personally liable for any partnership obligation incurred before the person became a partner [UPA 306(b)]. In other words, the new partner's liability to existing creditors of the partnership is limited to her or his capital contribution to the firm. Suppose that Smartclub is a partnership with four members. Alex Jaff, a newly admitted partner, contributes $100,000 to the partnership. Smartclub has about $600,000 in debt at the time Jaff joins the firm. Although Jaff's capital contribution of $100,000 can be used to satisfy Smartclub's obligations, Jaff is not personally liable for partnership debts that were incurred before he became a partner. Thus, his personal assets cannot be used to satisfy the partnership's antecedent (prior) debt. If, however, the managing partner at Smartclub borrows funds after Jaff becomes a partner, Jaff will be personally liable for those amounts.

Dissociation of a Partner

Dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the partnership business. Although a partner always has the power to dissociate from the firm, he or she may not have the right to dissociate. Dissociation normally entitles the partner to have his or her interest purchased by the partnership, and terminates his or her actual authority to act for the partnership and to participate with the partners in running the business. Otherwise, the partnership can continue to do business without the dissociating partner.¹⁰

Events Causing Dissociation

Under UPA 601, a partner can be dissociated from a partnership in any of the following ways:

1. By the partner's voluntarily giving notice of an "express will to withdraw" (Note that when a partner gives notice of her or his intent to withdraw, the remaining partners must decide whether to continue or give up the partnership business. If they do not agree to continue the partnership, the voluntary dissociation of a partner will dissolve the firm [UPA 801(1)].)
2. By the occurrence of an event agreed to in the partnership agreement.
3. By a unanimous vote of the other partners under certain circumstances, such as when a partner transfers substantially all of her or his interest in the partnership, or when it becomes unlawful to carry on partnership business with that partner.

10. Under the previous version of the UPA, when a partner withdrew from a partnership, the partnership was considered dissolved, its business had to be wound up, and the proceeds had to be distributed to creditors and among partners. The new UPA provisions dramatically changed the law governing partnership breakups and dissolution by no longer requiring that the partnership end if one partner dissociates.

4. By order of a court or arbitrator if the partner has engaged in wrongful conduct that affects the partnership business, breached the partnership agreement or violated a duty owed to the partnership or the other partners, or engaged in conduct that makes it "not reasonably practicable to carry on the business in partnership with the partner" [UPA 601(5)].
5. By the partner's declaring bankruptcy, assigning his or her interest in the partnership for the benefit of creditors, or becoming physically or mentally incapacitated, or by the partner's death. Note that although the bankruptcy or death of a partner represents that partner's "dissociation" from the partnership, it is not an automatic ground for the partnership's dissolution (dissolution will be discussed shortly).

Wrongful Dissociation

As mentioned, a partner has the power to dissociate from a partnership at any time, but a partner's dissociation can be wrongful in a few circumstances [UPA 602]. When a partner's dissociation is in breach of a partnership agreement, for instance, it is wrongful. For example, a partnership agreement states that it is a breach of the partnership agreement for any partner to assign partnership property to a creditor without the consent of the others. If a partner, Janik, makes such an assignment, she has not only breached the agreement but has also wrongfully dissociated from the partnership. Similarly, if a partner refuses to perform duties required by the partnership agreement—such as accounting for profits earned from the use of partnership property—this breach can be treated as wrongful dissociation.

With regard to a partnership for a definite term or a particular undertaking, dissociation that occurs before the expiration of the term or the completion of the undertaking can be wrongful. In such partnerships, the dissociation normally is considered wrongful if the partner withdraws by express will, is expelled by a court or an arbitrator, or declares bankruptcy [UPA 602].

A partner who wrongfully dissociates is liable to the partnership and to the other partners for damages caused by the dissociation. This liability is in addition to any other obligation of the partner to the partnership or to the other partners. Thus, a wrongfully dissociating partner would be liable to the partnership not only for any damage caused by the breach of the partnership agreement, but also for costs incurred to replace the partner's expertise or to obtain new financing.

Effects of Dissociation

Dissociation (rightful or wrongful) terminates some of the rights of the dissociated partner, creates a mandatory duty for the partnership, and alters the liability of both parties to third parties.

Rights and Duties On a partner's dissociation, his or her right to participate in the management and conduct of the partnership business terminates [UPA 603]. The partner's duty of loyalty also ends. A partner's other fiduciary duties, including the duty of care, continue only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation, unless the partner participates in winding up the partnership's business (discussed later in this chapter). For example, Debbie Pearson is a partner who is leaving an accounting firm, Bubb & Pearson. Pearson can immediately compete with the firm for new clients. She must exercise care in completing ongoing client transactions, however, and must account to the firm for any fees received from the old clients based on those transactions.

After a partner's dissociation, his or her interest in the partnership must be purchased according to the rules in UPA 701. The buyout price is based on the amount that would have been distributed to the partner if the partnership had been wound up on the date of dissociation. Offset against the price are amounts owed by the partner to the partnership, including damages for wrongful dissociation.

In the following case, the court had to decide how the buyout price of a partner's interest should be determined on his dissociation from his family's ranch business, which had been operated as a partnership for more than twenty years.

CASE 36.2 Warnick v. Warnick

Supreme Court of Wyoming, 2006. 2006 WY 58, 133 P.3d 997.

- Background and Facts In 1978, Wilbur and Dee Warnick and their son Randall Warnick bought a ranch in Sheridan County, Wyoming, for $335,000. To operate the ranch, they formed a partnership—Warnick Ranches. The partners' initial capital contributions totaled $60,000, of which Wilbur paid 36 percent, Dee paid 30 percent, and Randall paid 34 percent. Wilbur and Dee moved onto the ranch in 1981. Randall lived and worked on the ranch during the 1981 and 1982 summer haying seasons and again from 1991 to 1998. The partners each contributed funds to the operation and received cash distributions from the partnership. In the summer of 1999, Randall dissociated from the partnership. When the parties could not agree on a buyout price, Randall filed a suit in a Wyoming state court against the other partners and the partnership to recover what he believed to be a fair price. The court awarded Randall $115,783.13—the amount of his cash contributions, plus 34 percent of the partnership assets' increase in value above all partners' cash contributions, with interest from the date of his dissociation. The defendants appealed to the Wyoming Supreme Court, arguing that, in the calculation, $50,000 should be deducted from the appraised value of the ranch, its livestock, and its equipment for the estimated expenses of selling these assets.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT BURKE, Justice.

* * * *

The district court was charged with calculating the amount owed to Randall Warnick pursuant to the applicable provisions of [Wyoming Statutes Section 17-21-701 (Wyoming's version of UPA 701)]. That amount, or the buyout price, is the amount that would have been paid to the dissociating partner following a settlement of partnership accounts upon the winding up of the partnership, if, on the date of dissociation, the assets of the partnership were sold at a price equal to the greater of the liquidation value or the value based on a sale of the business as a going concern without the dissociating partner. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *
 * * * Warnick Ranches claims that the [lower] court erred in the first step of its calculation of the buyout price by overvaluing the ranch assets. The asserted error is the [lower] court's failure to deduct estimated sales expenses of $50,000 from the value of the partnership assets. * * *

Critical to our determination in this case is the recognition that the assets of this partnership were not, in fact, liquidated. Instead, the record reflects that the assets were retained by Warnick Ranches. Randall Warnick's dissociation from the partnership did not require the winding up of the partnership. * * * Accordingly, the deduction urged by Warnick Ranches is for hypothetical costs. * * *

* * * *
 * * * Contrary to the interpretation asserted by Warnick Ranches, liquidation value is not the amount of the seller's residual cash following a sale. We find that the meaning of liquidation value in the statute is best understood by comparing it to the other method provided. When contrasted with "going concern value" it is clear that "liquidation value" simply means the sale of the separate assets rather than the value of the business as a whole. [Emphasis added.]

Additionally, under either valuation method, * * * [Section] 17-21-701(b) directs that the sale price be determined "on the basis of the amount that would be paid by a willing buyer to a willing seller, neither being under any compulsion to buy or sell, and with knowledge of all relevant facts." * * * This "willing buyer" and "willing seller" language does not present a novel legal concept, as it sets forth precisely what has long been the legal definition or test of "fair market value." * * *

* * * *
 Considering the language of [Section 17-21-701(b)] as a whole, we conclude that "liquidation value" does not have the meaning that Warnick Ranches desires, i.e. the amount a seller would "net" upon liquidation. Rather, "liquidation value" represents the sale price of the assets based upon fair market value. It is one thing to say that a business is worth little more than its hard assets. It is quite another * * * to deduct the substantial cost of a liquidation which all parties agree will not take place. Where it is contemplated that a business will continue, it is not appropriate to assume an immediate liquidation with its attendant transactional costs and taxes.

● Decision and Remedy The Wyoming Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the lower court, holding that "purely hypothetical costs of sale are not a required deduction in valuing partnership assets" to determine the buyout price of a dissociated partner.

● The Ethical Dimension Was it unethical for Randall to file a suit against his parents to obtain what he regarded as a fair price for his interest? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension How and why might the value of a partnership interest in a going concern differ from the value of the same interest as a result of a liquidation?

Liability to Third Parties For two years after a partner dissociates from a continuing partnership, the partnership may be bound by the acts of the dissociated partner based on apparent authority [UPA 702]. In other words, the partnership may be liable to a third party with whom a dissociated partner enters into a transaction if the third party reasonably believed that the dissociated partner was still a partner. Similarly, a dissociated partner may be liable for partnership obligations entered into during a two-year period following dissociation [UPA 703].

To avoid this possible liability, a partnership should notify its creditors, customers, and clients of a partner's dissociation. Also, either the partnership or the dissociated partner can file a statement of dissociation in the appropriate state office to limit the dissociated partner's authority to ninety days after the filing [UPA 704]. Filing this statement helps to minimize the firm's potential liability for the former partner and vice versa.

Partnership Termination

The same events that cause dissociation can result in the end of the partnership if the remaining partners no longer wish to (or are unable to) continue the partnership business. Not every type of dissociation will cause dissolution of the partnership, though. Only certain departures of a partner will trigger dissolution, and generally the partnership can continue if the remaining partners consent [UPA 801].

The termination of a partnership is referred to as dissolution, which essentially means the commencement of the winding up process. Winding up is the actual process of collecting, liquidating, and distributing the partnership assets.¹¹ We discuss here the dissolution and winding up of partnership business.

Dissolution

Dissolution of a partnership generally can be brought about by the acts of the partners, by operation of law, and by judicial decree [UPA 801]. Any partnership (including one for a fixed term) can be dissolved by the partners' agreement. Similarly, if the partnership agreement states that it will dissolve on a certain event, such as a partner's death or bankruptcy, then the occurrence of that event will dissolve the partnership. A partnership for a fixed term or a particular undertaking is dissolved by operation of law at the expiration of the term or on the completion of the undertaking.

Any event that makes it unlawful for the partnership to continue its business will result in dissolution [UPA 801(4)]. Under the UPA, a court may order dissolution when it becomes obviously impractical for the firm to continue—for example, if the business can only be operated at a loss [UPA 801(5)]. Additionally, a partner's impropriety involving partnership business (for example, fraud perpetrated on the other partners) or improper behavior reflecting unfavorably on the firm may provide grounds for a judicial decree of dissolution. Finally, if dissension between partners becomes so persistent and harmful as to undermine the confidence and cooperation necessary to carry on the firm's business, a court may grant a decree of dissolution.

Winding Up and Distribution of Assets

After dissolution, the partnership continues for the limited purpose of the winding up process.¹² The partners

11. Although "winding down" would seem to describe more accurately the process of settling accounts and liquidating the assets of a partnership, English and U.S. statutory and case law have traditionally used "winding up" to denote this final stage of a partnership's existence.

12. Note that at any time after dissolution but before winding up is completed, all of the partners may decide to continue the partnership business and waive the right to have the business wound up [UPA 802].

cannot create new obligations on behalf of the partnership. They have authority only to complete transactions begun but not finished at the time of dissolution and to wind up the business of the partnership [UPA 803,804(1)].

Winding up includes collecting and preserving partnership assets, discharging liabilities (paying debts), and accounting to each partner for the value of his or her interest in the partnership. Partners continue to have fiduciary duties to one another and to the firm during this process. UPA 401(h) provides that a partner is entitled to compensation for services in winding up partnership affairs (and reimbursement for expenses incurred in the process) above and apart from his or her share in the partnership profits.

Both creditors of the partnership and creditors of the individual partners can make claims on the partnership's assets. In general, partnership creditors share proportionately with the partners' individual creditors in the partners' assets, which include their interests in the partnership. A partnership's assets are distributed according to the following priorities [UPA 807]:

1. Payment of debts, including those owed to partner and nonpartner creditors.
2. Return of capital contributions and distribution of profits to partners.¹³

If the partnership's liabilities are greater than its assets, the partners bear the losses—in the absence of a contrary agreement—in the same proportion in which they shared the profits (rather than, for example, in proportion to their contributions to the partnership's capital).

Partnership Buy-Sell Agreements

Usually, when people enter into partnerships, they are getting along with one another. To prepare for the possibility that the situation might change and they may become unable to work together amicably, the partners should make express arrangements during the formation of the partnership to provide for its smooth dissolution. A buy-sell agreement, sometimes called simply a buyout agreement, provides for one or more partners to buy out the other or others, should the situation warrant. Agreeing beforehand on who buys what, under what circumstances, and, if possible, at

13. Under the previous version of the UPA, creditors of the partnership had priority over creditors of the individual partners. Also, in distributing partnership assets, third party creditors were paid before partner creditors, and capital contributions were returned before profits.

what price may eliminate costly negotiations or litigation later. Alternatively, the agreement may specify that one or more partners will determine the value of the interest being sold and that the other or others will decide whether to buy or sell.

Under UPA 701(a), if a partner's dissociation does not result in a dissolution of the partnership, a buyout of the partner's interest is mandatory. The UPA contains an extensive set of buyout rules that apply when the partners do not have a buyout agreement. Basically, a withdrawing partner receives the same amount through a buyout that he or she would receive if the business were winding up [UPA 701(b)].

Limited Liability Partnerships

The limited liability partnership (LLP) is a hybrid form of business designed mostly for professionals who normally do business as partners in a partnership. The major advantage of the LLP is that it allows a partnership to continue as a pass-through entity for tax purposes but limits the personal liability of the partners.

The first state to enact an LLP statute was Texas, in 1991. Other states quickly followed suit, and by 1997, virtually all of the states had enacted LLP statutes. LLPs must be formed and operated in compliance with state statutes, which may include provisions of the UPA. The appropriate form must be filed with a central state agency, usually the secretary of state's office, and the business's name must include either "Limited Liability Partnership" or "LLP" [UPA 1001, 1002]. In addition, an LLP must file an annual report with the state to remain qualified as an LLP in that state [UPA 1003]. In most states, it is relatively easy to convert a traditional partnership into an LLP because the firm's basic organizational structure remains the same. Additionally, all of the statutory and common law rules governing partnerships still apply (apart from those modified by the LLP statute). Normally, LLP statutes are simply amendments to a state's already existing partnership law.

The LLP is especially attractive for two categories of enterprises: professional services and family businesses. Professional service firms include law firms and accounting firms. Family limited liability partnerships are basically business organizations in which the majority of the partners are related to each other.

Liability in an LLP

Traditionally, many professionals, such as attorneys and accountants, have worked together using the partnership business form. As previously discussed, a major disadvantage of the general partnership is the unlimited personal liability of its owner-partners. Each partner in a general partnership is exposed to potential liability for the malpractice of another partner.

The LLP allows professionals to avoid personal liability for the malpractice of other partners. A partner in an LLP is still liable for her or his own wrongful acts, such as negligence, however. Also liable is the partner who supervised the party who committed a wrongful act. This is generally true for all types of partners and partnerships, not just LLPs.

Although LLP statutes vary from state to state, generally each state statute limits the liability of partners in some way. For example, Delaware law protects each innocent partner from the "debts and obligations of the partnership arising from negligence, wrongful acts, or misconduct." In North Carolina, Texas, and Washington, D.C., the statutes protect innocent partners from obligations arising from "errors, omissions, negligence, incompetence, or malfeasance." The UPA more broadly exempts partners from personal liability for any partnership obligation, "whether arising in contract, tort, or otherwise" [UPA 306(c)]. Although the language of these statutes may seem to apply specifically to attorneys, virtually any group of professionals can use the LLP (depending on the state statute).

Family Limited Liability Partnerships

A family limited liability partnership (FLLP) is a limited liability partnership in which the majority of the partners are persons related to each other, essentially as spouses, parents, grandparents, siblings, cousins, nephews, or nieces. A person acting in a fiduciary capacity for persons so related can also be a partner. All of the partners must be natural persons or persons acting in a fiduciary capacity for the benefit of natural persons.

Probably the most significant use of the FLLP form of business organization is in agriculture. Family-owned farms sometimes find this form to their benefit. The FLLP offers the same advantages as other LLPs with certain additional advantages, such as, in Iowa, an exemption from real estate transfer taxes when partnership real estate is transferred among partners.¹⁴

14. Iowa Statutes Section 428A.2.

Limited Partnerships

We now look at a business organizational form that limits the liability of some of its owners—the limited partnership. Limited partnerships originated in medieval Europe and have been in existence in the United States since the early 1800s. In many ways, limited partnerships are like the general partnerships discussed at the beginning of this chapter, but they differ from general partnerships in several ways. Because of this, they are sometimes referred to as special partnerships.

A limited partnership consists of at least one general partner and one or more limited partners. A general partner assumes management responsibility for the partnership and has full responsibility for the partnership and for all its debts. A limited partner contributes cash or other property and owns an interest in the firm but does not undertake any management responsibilities and is not personally liable for partnership debts beyond the amount of his or her investment. A limited partner can forfeit limited liability by taking part in the management of the business. A comparison of the characteristics of general partnerships and limited partnerships appears in Exhibit 36-2 on page 752.¹⁵

Until 1976, the law governing limited partnerships in all states except Louisiana was the Uniform Limited Partnership Act (ULPA). Since 1976, most states and the District of Columbia have adopted the revised version of the ULPA, known as the Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (RULPA). Because the RULPA is the dominant law governing limited partnerships in the United States, we refer to the RULPA in the following discussion. Note, however, that in 2001 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws adopted a new, more flexible version of this law (ULPA 2001), which has been adopted in a minority of states.

Formation of a Limited Partnership

In contrast to the informal, private, and voluntary agreement that usually suffices for a general partnership, the formation of a limited partnership is formal and public. The parties must follow specific statutory requirements and file a certificate with the state. In this regard, a limited partnership resembles a corporation

15. Under the UPA, a general partnership can be converted into a limited partnership and vice versa [UPA 902, 903]. The UPA also provides for the merger of a general partnership with one or more general or limited partnerships [UPA 905].

more than it does a general partnership. A limited partnership must have at least one general partner and one limited partner, as mentioned previously. Additionally, the partners must sign a certificate of limited partnership, which requires information similar to that found in a corporate charter (see Chapter 38), such as the name, mailing address, and capital contribution of each general and limited partner. The certificate must be filed with the designated state official—under the RULPA, the secretary of state. The certificate is usually open to public inspection.

Rights and Liabilities of Partners

General partners, unlike limited partners, are personally liable to the partnership's creditors; thus, at least one general partner is necessary in a limited partnership so that someone has personal liability. This policy can be circumvented in states that allow a corporation to be the general partner in a partnership. Because the corporation has limited liability by virtue of corporation statutes, if a corporation is the general partner, no one in the limited partnership has personal liability.

Rights of Limited Partners Subject to the limitations that will be discussed shortly, limited partners have essentially the same rights as general partners, including the right of access to partnership books and the right to other information regarding partnership business. On dissolution of the partnership, limited partners are entitled to a return of their contributions in accordance with the partnership certificate [RULPA 201(a)(10)]. They can also assign their interests subject to the certificate [RULPA 702, 704].

The RULPA provides that a limited partner has the right to sue an outside party on behalf of the firm if the general partners with authority to do so have refused to file suit [RULPA 1001].¹⁶ In addition, investor protection legislation, such as securities laws (discussed in Chapter 41), may give some protection to limited partners.

Liabilities of Limited Partners In contrast to the personal liability of general partners, the liability of a limited partner is limited to the capital that she or he contributes or agrees to contribute to the partnership [RULPA 502].

A limited partnership is formed by good faith compliance with the requirements for signing and 16. For a case from a jurisdiction that does not follow the RULPA in this respect, see Energy Investors Fund, L.P. v. Metric Constructors, Inc., 351 N.C. 331, 525 S.E.2d 441 (2000).

EXHIBIT 36-2 • A Comparison of General Partnerships and Limited Partnerships

Characteristic	General Partnership (UPA)	Limited Partnership (RULPA)
Creation	By agreement of two or more persons to carry on a business as co-owners for profit.	By agreement of two or more persons to carry on a business as co-owners for profit. Must include one or more general partners and one or more limited partners. Filing of a certificate with the secretary of state is required.
Sharing of Profits and Losses	By agreement; or, in the absence of agreement, profits are shared equally by the partners, and losses are shared in the same ratio as profits.	Profits are shared as required in the certificate agreement, and losses are shared likewise, up to the amount of the limited partners' capital contributions. In the absence of a provision in the certificate agreement, profits and losses are shared on the basis of percentages of capital contributions.
Liability	Unlimited personal liability of all partners.	Unlimited personal liability of all general partners; limited partners liable only to the extent of their capital contributions.
Capital Contribution	No minimum or mandatory amount; set by agreement.	Set by agreement.
Management	By agreement, or in the absence of agreement, all partners have an equal voice.	General partner or partners only. Limited partners have no voice or else are subject to liability as general partners (but only if a third party has reason to believe that the limited partner is a general partner). A limited partner may act as an agent or employee of the partnership and vote on amending the certificate or on the sale or dissolution of the partnership.
Duration	Terminated by agreement of the partners, but can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	Terminated by agreement in the certificate or by retirement, death, or mental incompetence of a general partner in the absence of the right of the other general partners to continue the partnership. Death of a limited partner, unless he or she is the only remaining limited partner, does not terminate the partnership.
Distribution of Assets on Liquidation—Order of Priorities	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Payment of debts, including those owed to partner and nonpartner creditors. 2. Return of capital contributions and distribution of profit to partners. 	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Outside creditors and partner creditors. 2. filing the certificate, even if it is incomplete or defective. When a limited partner discovers a defect in the formation of the limited partnership, he or she can avoid future liability by filing the appropriate amendment or correction with the state or by renouncing an interest in the profits of the partnership [RULPA 304]. If the limited partner takes neither of these actions on discovery of the defect, however, the firm's creditors can hold the partner personally liable [RULPA 207].

Limited Partners and Management Limited partners enjoy limited liability so long as they do not participate in management [RULPA 303].¹⁷ A limited partner who participates in management will be just as liable as a general partner to any creditor who transacts business with the limited partnership and believes, based on the limited partner's conduct, that the limited partner is a general partner [RULPA 303]. The degree to which a limited partner can participate—by, for example, reviewing partnership operations or providing advice—before being exposed to liability is an unsettled question.¹⁸ A limited partner who knowingly permits his or her name to be used in the name of the limited partnership is liable to creditors who extend credit to the limited partnership without knowledge that the limited partner is not a general partner [RULPA 102, 303(d)].

Although limited partners cannot participate in management, this does not mean that the general partners are totally free of restrictions in running the business. The general partners in a limited partnership have fiduciary obligations to the partnership and to the limited partners. Suppose that a limited partnership is formed to build and operate a shopping mall. The parties reach an agreement under which the limited partners have several options for handling their 15 percent interest in the mall. If the general partner transfers the partnership's interests in the mall into a trust vehicle (see Chapter 50) without informing the limited partners or obtaining their consent, the general partner has violated his fiduciary duties to the limited partners.¹⁹

Dissociation and Dissolution

A general partner has the power to voluntarily dissociate, or withdraw, from a limited partnership unless the partnership agreement specifies otherwise. A limited partner theoretically can withdraw from the partnership by giving six months' notice unless the partnership agreement specifies a term, which most do. Also, some states have passed laws prohibiting the withdrawal of limited partners.

In a limited partnership, a general partner's voluntary dissociation from the firm normally will lead to dissolution unless all partners agree to continue the business. Similarly, the bankruptcy, retirement, death, or mental incompetence of a general partner will cause the dissociation of that partner and the dissolution of the limited partnership unless the other members agree to continue the firm [RULPA 801]. Bankruptcy of a limited partner, however, does not dissolve the partnership unless it causes the bankruptcy of the firm. Death or an assignment of the interest of a limited partner does not dissolve a limited partnership [RULPA 702, 704, 705]. A limited partnership can be dissolved by court decree [RULPA 802].

On dissolution, creditors' claims, including those of partners who are creditors, take first priority. After that, partners and former partners receive unpaid distributions of partnership assets and, except as otherwise agreed, amounts representing returns on their contributions and amounts proportionate to their shares of the distributions [RULPA 804].

In the following case, two limited partners wanted the business of the partnership to be sold on its dissolution, while another limited partner and the general partner wanted it to continue.

17. Note that the 2001 version of this law provides limited liability to limited partners for entity obligations "even if the limited partner participates in the management and control of the limited partnership" [ULPA 2001, Section 303].

18. The question is unsettled partly because state laws differ on this issue. Factors to be considered under the RULPA are listed in RULPA 303(b), (c).

EXTENDED CASE 36.3 In re Dissolution of Midnight Star Enterprises, L.P.

Supreme Court of South Dakota, 2006. 2006 SD 98, 724 N.W.2d 334.

* * * *

Midnight Star Enterprises, L.P. (Midnight Star) is a limited partnership, which operates a gaming, on-sale liquor and restaurant business in Deadwood, South Dakota. The owners of Midnight Star consist of: Midnight Star Enterprises, Ltd. (MSEL) as the general partner, owning 22 partnership units; Kevin Costner (Costner), owning 71.50 partnership units; and Francis and Carla Caneva (Canevas), owning 3.25 partnership units each. Costner is the sole owner of MSEL and essentially owns 93.5 partnership units.

The Canevas managed the operations of Midnight Star, receiving salaries and bonuses for their employment. According to MSEL, it became concerned about the Canevas' management and voiced concerns. Communications between the * * * partners broke down * * * .

MSEL * * * brought a Petition for Dissolution [in a South Dakota state court]. In order to dissolve, the fair market value of Midnight Star had to be assessed. MSEL hired Paul Thorstenson, an accountant, to determine the fair market value. * * * [T]he Canevas solicited an "offer" from Ken Kellar, a Deadwood casino, restaurant, and hotel owner * * * .

* * * Thorstenson determined the fair market value was $3.1 million based on the hypothetical transaction standard of valuation. * * * The * * * court * * * found Kellar's offer of $6.2 million to be the fair market value * * * [and] ordered the majority owners to buy the business for $6.2 million within 10 days or the court would order the business to be sold on the open market. [MSEL appealed to the South Dakota Supreme Court.]

[The] Canevas claim the partnership agreement does not allow the general partner to buy out their interest in Midnight Star. Instead, the Canevas argue, the agreement mandates the partnership be sold on the open market upon dissolution. * * * Article 10.4 provides:

After all of the debts of the Partnership have been paid, the General Partner * * * may distribute in kind any Partnership property provided that a good faith effort is first made to sell * * * such property * * * at its estimated fair value to one or more third parties * * * .

* * * *

* * * This provision clearly states the General Partner "may distribute in kind any partnership property" if the property is first offered to a third party for a fair value. While the General Partner may offer the property on the open market, Article 10.4 does not require it. * * * .

This interpretation is reinforced when read together with Article 10.3.1 * * * [which] instructs that "no assets * * * shall be sold or otherwise transferred to [any partner] unless the assets are valued at their then fair market value * * * ." If Article 10.4 requires a forced sale, then there would be no need to have the fair market value provision of Article 10.3.1. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [R]ead as a whole, the partnership agreement does not require a mandatory sale upon dissolution. Instead, the general partner can opt to liquidate using either a sale or transfer under Article 10.3.1. * * * Because MSEL decided to pursue dissolution under Article 10.3.1, we decide the correct standard for determining the fair market value of the partnership.

* * * *

MSEL claims the correct standard * * * is the hypothetical transaction analysis * * * . [The] Canevas argue that * * * the offer from Kellar represented the fair market value * * * .

* * * *

* * * [There are] sound policy reasons why an offer cannot be the fair market value. * * * . What if a businessman, for personal reasons, offers 10 times the real value of the business? What if the partnership, for personal reasons, such as sentimental value, refuses to sell for that absurdly high offer? These arbitrary, emotional offers and rejections cannot provide a rational and reasonable basis for determining the fair market value. [Emphasis added.]

Conversely, the hypothetical transaction standard does provide a rational and reasonable basis for determining the fair market value * * * by removing the irrationalities, strategies, and emotions * * * .

* * * *

Since it was error for the [lower] court to value Midnight Star at $6.2 million, it was also error to force the general partners to buy the business for $6.2 million or sell the business. * * * .

* * * *

* * * Instead of ordering the majority partners to purchase the whole partnership for the appraised value, the majority partners should only be required to pay any interests the withdrawing partner is due. * * * [T]he majority partners should only be required to pay the Canevas the value of their 6.5 partnership units * * * .

* * * [W]e reverse and remand for further proceedings * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the court hold that a forced sale of the property of the limited partnership was not appropriate in this case?
2. Under what circumstances might a forced sale of the property of a limited partnership on its dissolution be appropriate?

Limited Liability Limited Partnerships

A limited liability limited partnership (LLLP) is a type of limited partnership. An LLLP differs from a limited partnership in that a general partner in an LLLP has the same liability as a limited partner in a limited partnership. In other words, the liability of all partners is limited to the amount of their investments in the firm.

A few states provide expressly for LLLPs.²⁰ In states that do not provide for LLLPs but do allow for limited partnerships and limited liability partnerships, a limited partnership should probably still be able to register with the state as an LLLP.

20. See, for example, Colorado Revised Statutes Annotated Section 7-62-109. Other states that provide expressly for limited liability limited partnerships include Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Nevada, Texas, and Virginia.

REVIEWING Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships

Grace Tarnavsky and her sons, Manny and Jason, bought a ranch known as the Cowboy Palace in March 2006, and the three verbally agreed to share the business for five years. Grace contributed 50 percent of the investment, and each son contributed 25 percent. Manny agreed to handle the livestock, and Jason agreed to handle the bookkeeping. The Tarnavskys took out joint loans and opened a joint bank account into which they deposited the ranch's proceeds and from which they made payments toward property, cattle, equipment, and supplies. In September 2008, Manny severely injured his back while baling hay and became permanently unable to handle livestock. Manny therefore hired additional laborers to tend the livestock, causing the Cowboy Palace to incur significant debt. In September 2009, Al's Feed Barn filed a lawsuit against Jason to collect $32,400 in unpaid debts. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Was this relationship a partnership for a term or a partnership at will?
2. Did Manny have the authority to hire additional laborers to work at the ranch after his injury? Why or why not?
3. Under the current UPA, can Al's Feed Barn bring an action against Jason individually for the Cowboy Palace's debt? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that after his back injury in 2008, Manny sent his mother and brother a notice indicating his intent to withdraw from the partnership. Can he still be held liable for the debt to Al's Feed Barn? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

36-1. Daniel is the owner of a chain of shoe stores. He hires Rubya to be the manager of a new store, which is to open in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Daniel, by written contract, agrees to pay Rubya a monthly salary and 20 percent of the profits. Without Daniel's knowledge, Rubya represents himself to Classen as Daniel's partner, showing Classen the agreement to share profits. Classen extends credit to Rubya. Rubya defaults. Discuss whether Classen can hold Daniel liable as a partner.

36-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Dorinda, Luis, and Elizabeth form a limited partnership. Dorinda is a general partner, and Luis and Elizabeth are limited partners. Consider each of the separate events below, and discuss fully which event(s) constitute(s) a dissolution of the limited partnership.

- Luis assigns his partnership interest to Ashley.
- Elizabeth is petitioned into involuntary bankruptcy.
- Dorinda dies.

- For a sample answer to Question 36-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

36-3. Meyer, Knapp, and Cavanna establish a partnership to operate a window-washing service. Meyer contributes $10,000 to the partnership, and Knapp and Cavanna contribute $1,000 each. The partnership agreement is silent as to how profits and losses will be shared. One month after the partnership begins operation, Knapp and Cavanna vote, over Meyer's objection, to purchase another truck for the firm. Meyer believes that because he contributed $10,000, the partnership cannot make any major commitment to purchase over his objection. In addition, Meyer claims that in the absence of any provision in the agreement, profits must be divided in the same ratio as capital contributions. Discuss Meyer's contentions.

36-4. Liability of Partners. Frank Kolk was the manager of Triples American Grill, a sports bar and restaurant. Kolk and John Baines opened bank accounts in the name of the bar, each signing the account signature cards as "owner." Baines was often at the bar and had free access to its office. Baines told others that he was "an owner" and "a partner." Kolk told Steve Mager, the president of Cheesecake Factory, Inc., that Baines was a member of a partnership that owned Triples. On this basis, Cheesecake delivered its goods to Triples on credit. In fact, the bar was owned by a corporation. When the unpaid account totaled more than $20,000, Cheesecake filed a suit in a New Mexico state court against Baines to collect. On what basis might Baines be liable to Cheesecake? What does Cheesecake have to show to win its case? [Cheesecake Factory, Inc. v. Baines, 125 N.M. 622, 964 P.2d 183 (1998)]

36-5. Indications of Partnership. In August 1998, Jea Yu contacted Cameron Eppler, president of Design88, Ltd., to discuss developing a Web site that would cater to investors and provide services to its members for a fee. Yu and Patrick Connelly invited Eppler and Ha Tran, another member of Design88, to a meeting to discuss the site. The parties agreed that Design88 would perform certain Web design, implementation, and maintenance functions for 10 percent of the profits from the site, which would be called "The Underground Trader." They signed a "Master Partnership Agreement," which was later amended to include Power Uptik Productions, LLC (PUP). The parties often referred to themselves as partners. From Design88's offices in Virginia, Design88 designed and hosted the site, solicited members through Internet and national print campaigns, processed member applications, provided technical support, monitored access to the site, and negotiated and formed business alliances on the site's behalf. When relations among the parties soured, PUP withdrew. Design88 filed a suit against PUP and the others. Did a partnership exist among these parties? Explain.

36-6. Fiduciary Duties. Charles Chaney and Lawrence Burdett were equal partners in a partnership in Georgia known as BMW Partners. Their agreement was silent as to the effect of a partner's death on the firm. The partnership's sole asset was real property, which the firm leased in 1987 to a corporation that the partners co-owned. Under the lease, the corporation was to pay the partnership $8,000 per month, but after a few years, the corporation began paying $9,000 per month. Chaney died on April 15, 1998. Burdett wanted to continue the partnership business and offered to buy Chaney's estate's interest in it. Meanwhile, claiming that the real property's fair rental value was $4,500 (not $9,000) and that the corporation had overpaid the rent by $80,000, Burdett adjusted the rental payments to recoup this amount. Bonnie Chaney, Charles's widow and his estate's legal representative, filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Burdett, alleging, in part, that he had breached his fiduciary duty by adjusting the amount of the rent. Did Burdett's fiduciary duty expire on Chaney's death? Explain. [Chaney v. Burdett, 274 Ga. 805, 560 S.E.2d 21 (2002)]

36-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

At least six months before the 1996 Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta, Georgia, Stafford Fontenot, Steve Turner, Mike Montelaro, Joe Sokol, and Doug Brinsmade agreed to sell Cajun food at the Games and began making preparations. Calling themselves "Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana," on May 19 the group applied for a license with the Fulton County, Georgia, Department of Public Health–Environmental Health Services. Later, Ted Norris received for the sale of a mobile kitchen an $8,000 check drawn on the "Prairie Cajun Seafood Catering of Louisiana" account and two promissory notes, one for $12,000 and the other for $20,000. The notes, which were dated June 12, listed only Fontenot "d/b/a [doing business as] Prairie Cajun Seafood" as the maker. On July 31, Fontenot and his friends signed a partnership agreement, which listed specific percentages of profits and losses. They drove the mobile kitchen to Atlanta, but business was "disastrous." When the notes were not paid, Norris filed a suit in a Louisiana state court against Fontenot, seeking payment. What are the elements of a partnership? Was there a partnership among Fontenot and the others? Who is liable on the notes? Explain. [Norris v. Fontenot, 867 So.2d 179 (La.App.3 Cir.2004)]

36-8. Partnership Status. Charlie Waugh owned and operated an auto parts junkyard in Georgia. Charlie's son, Mack, started working in the business part-time as a child and full-time when he left school at the age of sixteen. Mack oversaw the business's finances, depositing the profits in a bank. Charlie gave Mack a one-half interest in the business, telling him that if "something happened" to Charlie, the entire business would be his. In 1994, Charlie and his wife, Alene, transferred to Mack the land on which the junkyard was located. Two years later, however, Alene and her daughters, Gail and Jewel, falsely convinced Charlie, whose mental competence had deteriorated, that Mack had cheated him. Mack was ordered off the land. Shortly thereafter, Charlie died. Mack filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the rest of the family, asserting, in part, that he and Charlie had been partners and that he was entitled to Charlie's share of the business. Was the relationship between Charlie and Mack a partnership? Is Mack entitled to Charlie's "share"? Explain. [Waugh v. Waugh, 265 Ga.App. 799, 595 S.E.2d 647 (2004)]

36-9. Indications of Partnership. In August 2003, Tammy Duncan began working as a waitress at Bynum's Diner, which was owned by her mother, Hazel Bynum, and her stepfather, Eddie Bynum, in Valdosta, Georgia. Less than a month later, the three signed an agreement under which Eddie was to relinquish his management responsibilities, allowing Tammy to be co-manager. At the end of this six-month period, Eddie would revisit this agreement and could then extend it for another six-month period. The diner's bank account was to remain in Eddie's name. There was no provision with regard to the diner's profit, if any, and the parties did not change the business's tax information. Tammy began doing the bookkeeping, as well as waiting tables and performing other duties. On October 30, she slipped off a ladder and injured her knees. At the end of the six-month term, Tammy quit working at the diner. The Georgia State Board of Workers' Compensation determined that she had been the diner's employee and awarded her benefits under the diner's workers' compensation policy with Cypress Insurance Co. Cypress filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Tammy, arguing that she was not an employee, but a co-owner. What are the essential elements of a partnership? Was Tammy a partner in the business of the diner? Explain. [Cypress Insurance Co. v. Duncan, 281 Ga.App. 469, 636 S.E.2d 159 (2006)]

36-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 1991, Hassan Mardanlou and Ali Ghaffarian signed a lease for 3960 South State Street in Salt Lake City, Utah. Ghaffarian paid $6,000 for the first and last months' rent, and said to Mardanlou, "We are in this together, partner." Mardanlou bought business cards for "Access Auto" with his and Ghaffarian's names on the cards. Both men were listed on Access Auto's insurance policy. Mardanlou bought the firm's furniture. Ghaffarian did the bookkeeping and bought the inventory. Mardanlou did not have access to the books but wrote checks on the firm's account, sold its inventory, and managed the sales staff. In March 1993, Ghaffarian gave Mardanlou a check for $10,000. Otherwise, Mardanlou was paid a fixed amount each month. Later that year, without telling Mardanlou, Ghaffarian bought the leased property with the firm's funds but titled it in his name. In 1995, Mardanlou learned of this deal and confronted Ghaffarian, who said, "Don't worry, we're partners." Ghaffarian filed the firm's tax returns in his name only, despite Mardanlou's repeated objections. Finally, in 1997, Mardanlou quit the firm and filed a suit in a Utah state court against Ghaffarian to dissolve the partnership and obtain a share of the profits. [Mardanlou v. Ghaffarian, 2006 UT App 165, 135 P3d 904 (2006)]

- (a) What factors indicate that Mardanlou and Ghaffarian were partners? What factors indicate that they were not partners? If you were the judge, how would you resolve this dispute?
- (b) Is Mardanlou entitled to a share of the value of the real property that Ghaffarian bought in his own name? If so, how much? From an ethical point of view, what solution appears to be the fairest? Discuss.
- (c) Is Mardanlou entitled to a share of Access Auto's profits? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 37

Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms

In the preceding chapters, we have examined sole proprietorships, partnerships, and several forms of limited partnerships. Before we move on to discuss corporations, one of the most prevalent business forms, we pause to examine a relatively new form of business organization called the limited liability company (LLC). The LLC is a hybrid form that combines the limited liability aspects of the corporation and the tax advantages of a partnership. Increasingly, LLCs are becoming an organizational form of choice among businesspersons—a trend encouraged by state statutes permitting their use.

In this chapter, we begin by examining the LLC. After looking at the LLC form of business in some detail, we describe a number of business forms that can be used for special types of business ventures.

Limited Liability Companies

Limited liability companies (LLCs) are governed by state LLC statutes. These laws vary, of course, from state to state. In an attempt to create more uniformity among the states in this respect, in 1995 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued the Uniform Limited Liability Company Act (ULLCA). To date, fewer than one-fourth of the states have adopted the ULLCA, and thus the law governing LLCs remains far from uniform.¹ Some provisions are common to most state statutes, however, and we base our discussion of LLCs in this section on these common elements.

Evolution of the LLC

In 1977, Wyoming became the first state to pass legislation authorizing the creation of an LLC. Although LLCs emerged in the United States only in 1977, they have been used for more than a century in other areas, including several European and South American nations. For example, the South American limitada is a form of business organization that operates more or less as a partnership but provides limited liability for the owners.

1. Note that the ULLCA was revised in 2006, but no state has yet adopted the revised version of this uniform act.

Taxation of the LLC In the United States, after Wyoming's adoption of an LLC statute, it still was not known how the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) would treat the LLC for tax purposes. In 1988, however, the IRS ruled that Wyoming LLCs would be taxed as partnerships instead of corporations, providing that certain requirements were met. Prior to this ruling, only one other state—Florida, in 1982—had authorized LLCs. The 1988 ruling encouraged other states to enact LLC statutes, and in less than a decade, all states had done so.

IRS rules that went into effect on January 1, 1997, also encouraged more widespread use of LLCs in the business world. Under these rules, an unincorporated business will automatically be taxed as a partnership unless it indicates otherwise on the tax form. The exceptions involve publicly traded companies, companies formed under a state incorporation statute, and certain foreign-owned companies. If a business chooses to be taxed as a corporation, it can indicate this preference by checking a box on the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) form.

Foreign Entities May Be LLC Members

Part of the impetus behind creating LLCs in this country is that foreign investors are allowed to become LLC members. Thus, in an era increasingly characterized by global business efforts and investments, the LLC offers U.S. firms and potential investors from other countries flexibility and the opportunity for limited liability and increased tax benefits.

The Nature of the LLC

LLCs share many characteristics with corporations. Like corporations, LLCs are creatures of the state. In other words, they must be formed and operated in compliance with state law. Like the shareholders of a corporation, the owners of an LLC, who are called members, enjoy limited liability [ULLCA 303].² Also like corporations, LLCs are legal entities apart from their owners. As a legal person, the LLC can sue or be sued, enter into contracts, and hold title to property [ULLCA 201]. The terminology used to describe LLCs formed in other states or nations is also similar to that used in corporate law. For example, an LLC formed in one state but doing business in another state is referred to in the second state as a foreign LLC.

Can a member, manager, or agent of an LLC be held responsible for its contractual obligations or tort liability based solely on the individual's position in the LLC? That was the question in the following case.

2. Members of an LLC can also bring derivative actions, which you will read about in Chapter 39, on behalf of the LLC [ULLCA 101]. As with a corporate shareholder's derivative suit, any damages recovered go to the LLC, not to the members personally. See, for example, PacLink Communications International, Inc. v. Superior Court, 90 Cal.App.4th 958, 109 Cal.Rptr.2d 436 (2001).

CASE 37.1 McFarland v. Virginia Retirement Services of Chesterfield, L.L.C.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Virginia, 2007. 477 F.Supp.2d 727.

- Background and Facts Virginia Retirement Services of Chesterfield, L.L.C., does business as Magnolias of Chesterfield (Magnolia), a retirement community. In May 2005, Penny McFarland became Magnolia's activities director and office manager. McFarland was responsible for coordinating and conducting activities for the residents. In June 2006, Effie Stovall, McFarland's supervisor, told the staff to take the residents outside for a walk. The temperature was 95 degrees. Out of concern for the residents, someone complained to the state licensing board. An inspector contacted McFarland, who immediately told Stovall. When Mary Dunmoyer, Magnolia's executive director, learned of the contact, she had Stovall discharge McFarland for trying to "sabotage" the community. McFarland filed a suit in a federal district court against Virginia Retirement Services, Dunmoyer, and other individual defendants, alleging, among other things, wrongful discharge—that she was terminated because she provided information regarding the health and safety of Magnolia's residents in response to the inspector's inquiry. The individual defendants, who were members, managers, or agents of Magnolia, filed a motion to be dismissed from the suit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

DENNIS W. DOHNAL, United States Magistrate Judge.

* * * *

[Under the Virginia Limited Liability Company Act] "no member, manager, organizer or other agent of a limited liability company shall have any personal obligation for any liabilities of a limited liability company, whether such liabilities arise in contract, tort or otherwise, solely by reason of being a member, manager, organizer or agent of a limited liability company." * * * Since Defendant Magnolia is a limited liability company, its members, managers, and agents can have no personal obligation for any liabilities of Magnolia "solely" by virtue of their positions as members, managers, or agents of the LLC, even when such liability arises from a tort. [Emphasis added.]

It is clear from the face of [McFarland's] Complaint that the only member, manager, or agent of Magnolia alleged to have personally participated in or contributed to McFarland's alleged wrongful termination is Mary Dunmoyer, the Executive Director of Magnolia. * * *

* * * [T]he Virginia Limited Liability Company Act * * * explicitly pronounces that [an] LLC is an independent entity designed to generally shield its members and managers from personal liability. * * * [D]ecisions from the Supreme Court of Virginia [permit] a common law wrongful discharge claim to proceed against those officers or agents of a company who have played a key role in contributing to the company's tortious conduct allegedly inflicted on a wrongfully discharged plaintiff. Indeed, under Virginia law, an officer or director of a corporation is liable only for those intentional torts he or she commits or authorizes on behalf of the corporation, and there is no reason to believe that such a rule should not equally apply to LLCs because even though [an] LLC is an entity that, like a corporation, is designed to shield its members from personal liability based on actions of the entity, [an] LLC member should still be held individually liable if he or she personally participates in a tort committed by the LLC or directs it to be done. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [O]f course, at the motion to dismiss stage in the proceedings, the issue is not whether the plaintiff will ultimately prevail, but whether the claimant is entitled to offer evidence to support the claims. * * *

It seems apparent to the Court that if a member, manager, or agent of a Virginia LLC cannot, as a matter of law, be liable in tort for actions of the LLC solely because that person is a member, manager, or agent of that LLC, then a plaintiff should plead facts demonstrating a particular member's culpability [guilt] in the LLC's tortious conduct that extends beyond that person's mere status as a member of the company [the LLC]. McFarland has only made such allegations with respect to Defendant Mary Dunmoyer. Therefore, the individual Defendants (with the exception of Mary Dunmoyer) are dismissed from * * * McFarland's * * * Complaint, with leave to amend should the discovery process produce evidence to the effect that the other individual Defendants played meaningful roles in the decision to terminate McFarland's employment.

● Decision and Remedy The court dismissed the individual defendants, except for Dunmoyer, from McFarland's suit because they were not alleged to have personally participated in her discharge. The members, managers, and agents of an LLC are not responsible for its liabilities "solely" by virtue of their status.

● The Ethical Dimension Did any of Magnolia's members, managers, or agents act unethically? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension Why is the liability of the members of an LLC limited with respect to the firm's debts and other obligations?

LLC Formation

As mentioned, LLCs are creatures of statute and thus must follow state statutory requirements. To form an LLC, articles of organization must be filed with a central state agency—usually the secretary of state's office [ULLCA 202]. Typically, the articles are required to include such information as the name of the business, its principal address, the name and address of a registered agent, the names of the owners, and information on how the LLC will be managed [ULLCA 203]. The business's name must include the words Limited Liability Company or the initials LLC [ULLCA 105(a)]. In addition to filing the articles of organization, a few states require that a notice of the intention to form an LLC be published in a local newspaper. Although a majority of the states permit one-member LLCs, some states require at least two members.

Jurisdictional Requirements

One of the significant differences between LLCs and corporations has to do with federal jurisdictional requirements. Under the federal jurisdiction statute, a corporation is deemed to be a citizen of the state where it is incorporated and maintains its principal place of business. The statute does not mention the state citizenship of partnerships, LLCs, and other unincorporated associations, but the courts have tended to regard these entities as citizens of every state in which their members are citizens.

The state citizenship of an LLC may come into play when a party sues the LLC based on diversity of citizenship. Remember from Chapter 2 that when parties to a lawsuit are from different states and the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000, a federal court can exercise diversity jurisdiction. Total diversity of citizenship must exist, however. For example, Fong, a citizen of New York, wishes to bring a suit against Skycel, an LLC formed under the laws of Connecticut. One of Skycel's members also lives in New York. Fong will not be able to bring a suit against Skycel in federal court on the basis of diversity jurisdiction because the defendant LLC is also a citizen of New York. The same would be true if Fong was bringing a suit against multiple defendants and one of the defendants lived in New York.

Advantages and Disadvantages of the LLC

The LLC offers many advantages, and relatively few disadvantages, to businesspersons.

Advantages A key advantage of the LLC is that the members are not personally liable for the debts or obligations of the entity: their risk of loss is limited to the amount of their investments. An LLC also offers flexibility in regard to both taxation and management, as will be discussed shortly. Another advantage is that an LLC is an enduring business entity that exists beyond the illness or death of its members. In addition, as mentioned earlier, an LLC can include foreign investors.

An LLC that has two or more members can choose to be taxed as either a partnership or a corporation. As will be discussed in Chapter 38, a corporate entity must pay income taxes on its profits, and the shareholders pay personal income taxes on profits distributed as dividends. An LLC that wants to distribute profits to the members may prefer to be taxed as a partnership to avoid the double taxation that occurs with corporate entities. Unless an LLC indicates that it wishes to be taxed as a corporation, the IRS automatically taxes it as a partnership. This means that, as in a partnership, the LLC as an entity pays no taxes but “passes through” its profits to the members, who then personally pay taxes on the profits. If an LLC's members want to reinvest profits in the business, however, rather than distribute the profits to members, they may prefer to be taxed as a corporation. Corporate income tax rates may be lower than personal tax rates.

An LLC that has only one member cannot be taxed as a partnership, however. For federal income tax purposes, one-member LLCs are automatically taxed as sole proprietorships unless they indicate that they wish to be taxed as corporations. With respect to state taxes, most states follow the IRS rules, but a few states tax LLCs even though they do not tax partnerships.

Disadvantages One disadvantage of the LLC is that state LLC statutes are not uniform. Therefore, businesses that operate in more than one state may not receive consistent treatment. Generally, though, most states will apply to a foreign LLC (an LLC formed in another state) the law of the state where the LLC was formed. Another disadvantage is that in order to be treated as a partnership for tax purposes, an LLC must have at least two members (as previously noted).

The LLC Operating Agreement

As mentioned, an advantage of the LLC form of business is the flexibility it offers in terms of operation and management. The members get to decide who will participate in the management and operation of their business, and how other issues will be resolved. Members normally do this by forming an operating agreement [ULLCA 103(a)]. Operating agreements typically contain provisions relating to management, how profits will be divided, the transfer of membership interests, whether the LLC will be dissolved on the death or departure of a member, and other important issues.

In many states, an operating agreement need not be in writing and indeed need not even be formed for an LLC to exist. Generally, though, LLC members should protect their interests by forming a written operating agreement. As with any business arrangement, disputes may arise over any number of issues. If there is no agreement covering the topic under dispute, such as how profits will be divided, the state LLC statute will govern the outcome. For example, most LLC statutes provide that if the members have not specified how profits will be divided, they will be divided equally among the members.

Generally, when an issue is not covered by an operating agreement or by an LLC statute, the principles of partnership law are applied. The following case illustrates what can happen in the absence of a written operating agreement when one of the members of the LLC has a “bad intent.”

C A S E 37.2 Kuhn v. Tumminelli

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 2004. 366 N.J.Super. 431, 841 A.2d 496.
lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/search.shtml#party^a

• Background and Facts Clifford Kuhn, Jr., and Joseph Tumminelli formed Touch of Class Limousine Service, doing business as Touch of Elegance Limousine Service, under the New Jersey Limited Liability Company Act in 1999. They did not sign a written operating agreement, but orally agreed that Kuhn would provide the financial backing and procure customers, and that Tumminelli would manage the day-to-day operations of the company. Tumminelli embezzled $283,000 from the company after cashing customers' checks at Quick Cash, Inc., a local check-cashing service. Quick Cash deposited the checks in its bank account with First Union National Bank, N.A., which collected on the checks from the drawee banks, Bank of America Corporation and Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A. Kuhn filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Tumminelli, the banks, and others to recover the embezzled funds. The court ordered Tumminelli to pay Kuhn and to transfer his interest in Touch of Class to Kuhn, but issued a summary judgment in favor of the other defendants. Kuhn appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, arguing, among other things, that Quick Cash and the banks were liable because Tumminelli did not have the authority to cash the company's checks and convert the funds.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT LEFELT, J.A.D. [Judge, Appellate Division]

* * * *

New Jersey enacted the Limited Liability Company Act in 1994. Its purpose was to enable members and managers of LLCs to take advantage of both the limited liability afforded to shareholders and directors of corporations and the pass-through tax advantages available to partnerships.

Under the LLC Act, when a limited liability company is managed by its members, unless otherwise provided in the operating agreement, each member shall have the authority to bind the limited liability company. Moreover, except as otherwise provided in an operating agreement, a member or manager may lend money to, borrow money from, act as a surety, guarantor or endorser for, * * * an LLC. [Emphasis added.]

In the absence of a written operating agreement providing to the contrary, Tumminelli as a 50% owner of the LLC had broad authority to bind the LLC * * * and specific authority * * * to endorse and presumably cash checks payable to the LLC. If more limited authority was desired, Kuhn and Tumminelli had to so provide in a written operating agreement.

* * * *

* * * [T]he LLC Act contemplates that its provisions will control unless the members agree otherwise in an operating agreement. When executing an operating agreement, which must be written if the LLC has more than one member, the members are free to structure the company in a variety of ways and are free to restrict and expand the rights, responsibilities and authority of its managers and members. [Emphasis added.]

The LLC Act is, therefore, quite flexible and permits the LLC members great discretion to establish the company structure and procedures, with the statute controlling in the absence of a contrary operating agreement. The legislative intent is revealed by the directive that the LLC Act is to be liberally construed to give the maximum effect to the principle of freedom of contract and to the enforceability of operating agreements.

* * * *

Tumminelli was authorized under the LLC Act to endorse the checks. In fact, considering Tumminelli's position at the LLC, his responsibilities, and daily functions along with the statutory grant of authority, it can be inferred that Tumminelli had actual authority to receive the checks, endorse the checks, and cash them at Quick Cash, especially because Kuhn knew that Tumminelli was paying business expenses in cash.

* * * Under Kuhn's argument, even if a person had been authorized to endorse and cash a check, if that person converts the funds to an unauthorized use, a depository bank would be liable, as if the check had been paid on a forged endorsement. * * *

We disagree that an authorized endorsement can become unauthorized by a subsequent unauthorized use of the funds. Rather, we view the circumstances as constituting two acts, the endorsement necessary to obtain the funds and the subsequent use of the funds. These acts are not inseparable. The misappropriation of the funds is unauthorized, but does not convert an authorized endorsement into a forgery. [Emphasis added.]

It defies reason to allow an event that occurs after the endorsement to affect the validity of the endorsement. The use to which the agent later puts the check does not affect the agent's authorization to endorse it. The validity of an endorsement does not depend upon the agent's subjective motivation at the time of the endorsement. * * * [H]ow can a bank or anyone else protect themselves against someone's bad intent?

If the agent is otherwise authorized * * * the fact that the agent had an improper purpose in making or endorsing the instrument in the authorized form does not prevent a bona fide purchaser in due course, or a subsequent transferee from one, from having the same rights in the instrument and against the principal as if the agent's act were authorized.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's judgment in favor of Quick Cash and the banks. Tumminelli had the authority to accept, indorse, and cash checks on behalf of Touch of Class, under the LLC Act and in the absence of a written operating agreement, which might have specified otherwise. His "bad intent" to convert the funds to his own use did not affect this authority.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Kuhn and Tumminelli had signed a written operating agreement that required both members' indorsements when cashing customers' checks. Assuming that Quick Cash would have known of this requirement, would the result in this case have been different? If so, how?

● The Legal Environment Dimension What does the outcome in this case suggest to potential members of LLCs who want to avoid the negative consequences of debt and litigation to which Kuhn was subject?

Management of an LLC

Basically, the members have two options for managing an LLC—the members may decide in their operating agreement to be either a “member-managed” LLC or a “manager-managed” LLC. Most state LLC statutes and the ULLCA provide that unless the articles of organization specify otherwise, an LLC is assumed to be member managed [ULLCA 203(a)(6)].

Participation in Management

In a member-managed LLC, all of the members participate in management, and decisions are made by majority vote [ULLCA 404(a)]. In a manager-managed LLC, the members designate a group of persons to manage the firm. The management group may consist of only members, both members and nonmembers, or only nonmembers. Managers in a manager-managed LLC owe fiduciary duties to the LLC and its members, including the duty of loyalty and the duty of care [ULLCA 409(a), 409(h)], just as corporate directors and officers owe fiduciary duties to the corporation and its shareholders.

Operating Procedures

The members of an LLC can include provisions governing decision-making procedures in their operating agreement. For instance, the agreement can include procedures for choosing or removing managers. Although most LLC statutes are silent on this issue, the ULLCA provides that members may choose and remove managers by majority vote [ULLCA 404(b)(3)].

The members are also free to include in the agreement provisions designating when and for what purposes they will hold formal members' meetings. Most state LLC statutes have no provisions regarding members' meetings, which is in contrast to most state laws governing corporations, as you will read in Chapter 38.

Members may also specify in their agreement how voting rights will be apportioned. If they do not, LLC statutes in most states provide that voting rights are apportioned according to each member's capital contributions. Some states provide that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, each member has one vote.

Dissociation and Dissolution of an LLC

Recall from Chapter 36 that in the context of partnerships, dissociation occurs when a partner ceases to be associated in the carrying on of the partnership business. The same concept applies to LLCs. A member of an LLC has the power to dissociate from the LLC at any time, but he or she may not have the right to dissociate. Under the ULLCA, the events that trigger a member's dissociation from an LLC are similar to the events causing a partner to be dissociated under the Uniform Partnership Act (UPA). These include voluntary withdrawal, expulsion by other members or by court order, bankruptcy, incompetence, and death. Generally, even if a member dies or otherwise dissociates from an LLC, the other members may continue to carry on the LLC business, unless the operating agreement has contrary provisions.

Effect of Dissociation

When a member dissociates from an LLC, he or she loses the right to participate in management and the right to act as an agent for the LLC. His or her duty of loyalty to the LLC also terminates, and the duty of care continues only with respect to events that occurred before dissociation. Generally, the dissociated member also has a right to have his or her interest in the LLC bought out by the other members of the LLC. The LLC's operating agreement may contain provisions establishing a buyout price, but if it does not, the member's interest is usually purchased at a fair value. In states that have adopted the ULLCA, the LLC must purchase the interest at "fair" value within 120 days after the dissociation.

If the member's dissociation violates the LLC's operating agreement, it is considered legally wrongful, and the dissociated member can be held liable for damages caused by the dissociation. Suppose that Chadwick and Barrel are members in an LLC. Chadwick manages the accounts, and Barrel, who has many connections in the community and is a skilled investor, brings in the business. If Barrel wrongfully dissociates from the LLC, the LLC's business will suffer, and Chadwick can hold Barrel liable for the loss of business resulting from her withdrawal.

Dissolution

Regardless of whether a member's dissociation was wrongful or rightful, normally the dissociated member has no right to force the LLC to dissolve. The remaining members can opt to either continue or dissolve the business. Members can also stipulate in their operating agreement that certain events will cause dissolution, or they can agree that they have the power to dissolve the LLC by vote. As with partnerships, a court can order an LLC to be dissolved in certain circumstances, such as when the members have engaged in illegal or oppressive conduct, or when it is no longer feasible to carry on the business.

When an LLC is dissolved, any members who did not wrongfully dissociate may participate in the winding up process. To wind up the business, members must collect, liquidate, and distribute the LLC's assets. Members may preserve the assets for a reasonable time to optimize their return, and they continue to have the authority to perform reasonable acts in conjunction with winding up. In other words, the LLC will be bound by the reasonable acts of its members during the winding up process. Once all of the LLC's assets have been sold, the proceeds are distributed to pay off debts to creditors first (including debts owed to members who are creditors of the LLC). The member's capital contributions are returned next, and any remaining amounts are then distributed to members in equal shares or according to their operating agreement.

Special Business Forms

In addition to the LLC and the other traditional business forms discussed in this unit, several other forms can be used to organize a business. For the most part, these special business forms are hybrid organizations—that is, they have characteristics similar to those of partnerships or corporations, or combine features of both. These forms include joint ventures, syndicates, joint stock companies, business trusts, and cooperatives.

Joint Venture

A joint venture is a relationship in which two or more persons or business entities combine their efforts or their property for a single transaction or project or a related series of transactions or projects. Unless otherwise agreed, joint venturers share profits and losses equally and have an equal voice in controlling the project. For instance, when several contractors combine their resources to build and sell houses in a single development, their relationship is a joint venture.

Joint ventures range in size from very small activities to huge, multimillion-dollar joint actions carried out by some of the world's largest corporations. Large organizations often undertake new products or services by forming joint ventures with other enterprises. For example, Intel Corporation and Micron Technology, Inc., formed a joint venture to manufacture NAND flash memory, a data-storage chip widely used in digital cameras, cell phones, and portable music players including some iPods made by Apple, Inc. Also, Mitsubishi Chemical Corporation formed a joint venture with Exxon Chemical Corporation to start Mytex Polymers, a company that produces certain plastic compounds used by automakers in the United States and Japan.

Similarities to Partnerships The joint venture resembles a partnership and is taxed like a partnership. The main difference is that a joint venture is typically created for a single project or series of transactions, whereas a partnership usually (though not always) involves an ongoing business. For this reason, most courts apply the same principles to joint ventures as they apply to partnerships. For instance, the joint venturers owe to each other the same fiduciary duties, including the duty of loyalty, that partners owe each other.

Like partners, the joint venturers have equal rights to manage the activities of the enterprise. Control of the operation may be given to one of the members, however, without affecting the status of the relationship.³

The question in the following case was whether two vintage aircraft makers had formed a joint venture.

EXTENDED CASE 37.3 SPW Associates, LLP v. Anderson

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 2006. 2006 ND 159, 718 N.W.2d 580.

* * * *

[Murdo] Cameron is a commercial airline pilot who is interested in the vintage P-51 Mustang airplane. He developed and manufactured graphite body parts and other components to make replicas of the P-51. He placed advertisements in aviation magazines seeking someone to design and manufacture additional parts and construct the airplanes.

Douglas Anderson answered Cameron's advertisement and, in 1996, Anderson and Cameron entered into a written agreement to build two airplanes. Cameron was to provide an engine for the first airplane and various other component parts for both airplanes, and Anderson was to design and manufacture additional parts and build the airplanes. Upon the first flight of one of the planes, Anderson was to pay Cameron for the engine, with the price dependent upon the amount of time it took Anderson to build the airplane. Although not expressly stated in the written agreement, Cameron and Anderson had agreed that each would keep one of the two completed airplanes. The parties intended to build additional planes for sale to the public.

In 1997, Anderson * * * entered into a loan agreement with SPW [Associates, LLP] to finance the operation. The first airplane was pledged as security for the loan * * *. Anderson did not disclose to SPW his agreement with Cameron and did not disclose to Cameron the loan transaction with SPW. The second airplane was never built.

a. In the "Title:" box, type "SPW" and click on "Execute." In the result, click on the name of the case to access the opinion. The North Dakota Supreme Court maintain this Web site.

Anderson defaulted on the loan * * * .

SPW commenced this action [in a North Dakota state court against Anderson, Cameron, and others] in 2002, seeking a declaratory judgment that it was entitled to possession of the aircraft * * * . [T]he * * * court found that Anderson and Cameron had entered into a joint venture and that Anderson was authorized to grant SPW a security interest in the airplane, which was joint venture property. The court determined that SPW had a perfected security interest in the airplane superior to any rights of Cameron and was entitled to possession of the plane. * * * On appeal [to the North Dakota Supreme Court], Cameron contends that there was no joint venture * * * .

* * * *

* * * A joint venture is generally considered akin to a partnership, although more limited in scope and duration, and principles of partnership law apply to the joint venture relationship. [Emphasis added.]

[North Dakota Century Code] Section 45-15-01(1) * * * provides that a partner is an agent of, and may bind, the partnership * * * .

* * * Applying these principles in this case, if Anderson was a joint venturer with Cameron, he had the authority to grant a security interest in joint venture property and the security agreement would be valid.

For a business enterprise to constitute a joint venture, the following four elements must be present:

- (1) contribution by the parties of money, property, time, or skill in some common undertaking * * * ;
- (2) a proprietary interest and right of mutual control over the engaged property; (3) an express or implied agreement for the sharing of profits * * * ; and (4) an express or implied contract showing a joint venture was formed.

* * * *

In this case there is no dispute on three of the four elements. Both parties made contributions to the enterprise, both exerted a degree of control over the enterprise, and there was a written contract evidencing the agreement. Cameron contends, however, that there was no evidence showing an agreement, either express or implied, to share profits.

In this case the parties admittedly contemplated building additional airplanes for sale to the public * * * . The parties' written agreement also expressly recognized that additional planes would be built for sale. For example, the agreement provided that Cameron would provide computerized documentation and lab test results on composite parts he manufactured to Anderson "and future aircraft purchasers," and Anderson was to "develop an inspection and documentation process on the first two airplanes, and all future airplanes purchased." The agreement further provided that construction of "all appliances" to be used in the manufacturing process "will be such that they can be used for multiple year production runs." * * * *

* * * *

We conclude the * * * court did not err in determining that Cameron and Anderson had entered into a joint venture.

QUESTIONS

1. On what basis might Cameron maintain a suit against Anderson?
2. How might the outcome of this case have been different if Cameron had been merely an aircraft parts supplier, with his only profit to be from the sale of components to Anderson?

Differences from Partnerships Joint ventures differ from partnerships in several important ways. The members of a joint venture have less implied and apparent authority than the partners in a partnership. As discussed in Chapter 36, each partner is treated as an agent of the other partners. Because the activities of a joint venture are more limited than the business of a partnership, the members of a joint venture are presumed to have less power to bind their co-venturers. In addition, the death of a joint venturer ordinarily does not terminate a joint venture, whereas the death of a partner causes dissociation and potentially terminates the firm. A joint venture normally terminates when the project or transaction for which it was formed is completed, unless the members have otherwise agreed.

Syndicate

A group of individuals or firms that get together to finance a particular project, such as the building of a shopping center or the purchase of a professional basketball franchise, is called a syndicate, or an investment group. The form of such groups varies considerably. A syndicate may be organized as a corporation or as a general or limited partnership. In some instances, the members merely own property jointly and have no legally recognized business arrangement.

Joint Stock Company

A joint stock company is a true hybrid of a partnership and a corporation. It has many characteristics of a corporation in that (1) its ownership is represented by transferable shares of stock, (2) it is usually managed by directors and officers of the company or association, and (3) it can have a perpetual existence. Most of its other features, however, are more characteristic of a partnership, and it is usually treated as a partnership. Like a partnership, a joint stock company is formed by agreement (not statute); property is usually held in the names of the members; shareholders have personal liability; and generally the company is not treated as a legal entity for purposes of a lawsuit. In a joint stock company, however, shareholders are not considered to be agents of each other, as they would be in a true partnership.

Business Trust

A business trust is created by a written trust agreement that sets forth the interests of the beneficiaries and the obligations and powers of the trustees. With a business trust, legal ownership and management of the trust's property stay with one or more of the trustees, and the profits are distributed to the beneficiaries.

The business trust form of business was started in Massachusetts in an attempt to obtain the limited liability advantage of corporate status while avoiding certain restrictions on a corporation's ownership and development of real property. A business trust resembles a corporation in many respects. Beneficiaries of the trust, for example, are not personally responsible for the trust's debts or obligations. In fact, in a number of states, business trusts must pay corporate taxes.

Cooperative

A cooperative is an association that is organized to provide an economic service to its members (or shareholders); it may or may not be incorporated. Most cooperatives are governed by state statutes for cooperatives, general business corporations, or LLCs. Generally, an incorporated cooperative will distribute dividends, or profits, to its owners on the basis of their transactions with the cooperative rather than on the basis of the amount of capital they contributed. Members of incorporated cooperatives have limited liability, as do shareholders of corporations or members of LLCs. Cooperatives that are unincorporated are often treated like partnerships. The members have joint liability for the cooperative's acts.

The cooperative form of business is generally adopted by groups of individuals who wish to pool their resources to gain some advantage in the marketplace. Consumer purchasing co-ops are formed to obtain lower prices through quantity discounts. Seller marketing co-ops are formed to control the market and thereby obtain higher retail prices from consumers. Co-ops range in size from small, local consumer cooperatives to national businesses such as Ace Hardware and Land O'Lakes, the well-known producer of dairy products.

REVIEWING Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms

A bridge on a prominent public roadway in the city of Papagos, Arizona, was deteriorating and in need of repair. The city posted notices seeking proposals for an artistic bridge design and reconstruction. Davidson Masonry, LLC, which was owned and managed by Carl Davidson and his wife,

REVIEWING Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms, Continued

Marilyn Rowe, decided to submit a bid for a decorative concrete project that incorporated artistic metalwork. They contacted Shana Lafayette, a local sculptor who specialized in large-scale metal forms, to help them design the bridge. The city selected their bridge design and awarded them the contract for a commission of $184,000. Davidson Masonry and Lafayette then entered into an agreement to work together on the bridge project. Davidson Masonry agreed to install and pay for concrete and structural work, and Lafayette agreed to install the metalwork at her expense. They agreed that overall profits would be split, with 25 percent going to Lafayette and 75 percent going to Davidson Masonry. Lafayette designed numerous metal sculptures of salmon that were incorporated into colorful decorative concrete forms designed by Rowe, while Davidson performed the structural engineering. The group worked together successfully until the project was completed. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would Davidson Masonry automatically be taxed as a partnership or a corporation?
2. Is Davidson Masonry member managed or manager managed?
3. When Davidson Masonry and Lafayette entered an agreement to work together, what kind of special business form was created? Explain.
4. Suppose that during construction, Lafayette had entered into an agreement to rent space in a warehouse that was close to the bridge so that she could work on her sculptures near the site where they would eventually be installed. She entered into the contract without the knowledge or consent of Davidson Masonry. In this situation, would a court be likely to hold that Davidson Masonry was bound by the contract that Lafayette entered? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

37-1. John, Lesa, and Tabir form a limited liability company. John contributes 60 percent of the capital, and Lesa and Tabir each contribute 20 percent. Nothing is decided about how profits will be divided. John assumes that he will be entitled to 60 percent of the profits, in accordance with his contribution. Lesa and Tabir, however, assume that the profits will be divided equally. A dispute over the question arises, and ultimately a court has to decide the issue.

What law will the court apply? In most states, what will result? How could this dispute have been avoided in the first place? Discuss fully.

Bateson Corp. is considering entering into two contracts—one with a joint stock company that distributes home products east of the Mississippi River and the other with a business trust formed by a number of sole proprietors who are sellers of home products on the West Coast. Both contracts will require Bateson to make large capital outlays in order to supply the businesses with restaurant equipment. In both business organizations, at least two shareholders or beneficiaries are personally wealthy, but both organizations have limited financial resources. The owner-managers of Bateson are not familiar with either form of business organization. Because each form resembles a corporation, they are concerned about potential limits on liability in the event that either business organization breaches the contract by failing to pay for the equipment. Discuss fully Bateson's concern.

37-3. Joe, a resident of New Jersey, wants to open a restaurant. He asks Kay, his friend, an experienced attorney and a New Yorker, for her business and legal advice in exchange for a 20 percent ownership interest in the restaurant. Kay helps Joe negotiate a lease for the restaurant premises and advises Joe to organize the business as a limited liability company (LLC). Joe forms Café Olé, LLC, and with Kay's help, obtains financing. Then, the night before the restaurant opens, Joe tells Kay that he is "cutting her out of the deal." The restaurant proves to be a success. Kay wants to file a suit in a federal district court against Joe and the LLC. Can a federal court exercise jurisdiction over the parties based on diversity of citizenship? Explain.

37-4. Limited Liability Companies. Gloria Duchin, a Rhode Island resident, was the sole shareholder and chief executive officer of Gloria Duchin, Inc. (Duchin, Inc.), which manufactured metallic Christmas ornaments and other novelty items. The firm was incorporated in Rhode Island. Duchin Realty, Inc., also incorporated in Rhode Island, leased real estate to Duchin, Inc. The Duchin entities hired Gottesman Co. to sell Duchin, Inc., and to sign with the buyer a consulting agreement for Gloria Duchin and a lease for Duchin Realty's property. Gottesman negotiated a sale, a consulting agreement, and a lease with Somerset Capital Corp. James Mitchell, a resident of Massachusetts, was the chairman and president of Somerset, and Mary Mitchell, also a resident of Massachusetts, was the senior vice president. The parties agreed that to buy Duchin, Inc., Somerset would create a new limited liability company, JMTR Enterprises, L.L.C., in Rhode Island, with the Mitchells as its members. When the deal fell apart, JMTR filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against the Duchin entities, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. When the defendants tried to remove the case to a federal district court, JMTR argued that the court did not have jurisdiction because there was no diversity of citizenship between the parties:

all of the plaintiffs and defendants were citizens of Rhode Island. Is JMTR correct? Why or why not? [JMTR Enterprises, L.L.C. v. Duchin, 42 F.Supp.2d 87 (D.Mass. 1999)]

37-5. Foreign Limited Liability Companies. Walter Matjasich and Cary Hanson organized Capital Care, LLC, in Utah. Capital Care operated, and Matjasich and Hanson managed, Heartland Care Center in Topeka, Kansas. LTC Properties, Inc., held a mortgage on the Heartland facilities. When Heartland failed as a business, its residents were transferred to other facilities. Heartland employees who provided care to the residents for five days during the transfers were not paid wages. The employees filed claims with the Kansas Department of Human Resources for the unpaid wages. Kansas state law provides that a corporate officer or manager may be liable for a firm's unpaid wages, but protects limited liability company (LLC) members from personal liability generally and states that an LLC cannot be construed as a corporation. Under Utah state law, however, the members of an LLC can be personally liable for wages due the LLC's employees. Should Matjasich and Hanson be held personally liable for the unpaid wages? Explain. [Matjasich v. Department of Human Resources, 271 Kan. 246, 21 P.3d 985 (2001)]

37-6. Limited Liability Companies. Michael Collins entered into a three-year employment contract with E-Magine, LLC. E-Magine was in business for only a brief time, during which it incurred considerable losses. In terminating operations, which ceased before the term of the contract with Collins expired, E-Magine also terminated Collins's services. In exchange for a payment of $24,240, Collins signed a "final payment agreement," which purported to be a settlement of any claims that he might have against E-Magine. Collins filed a suit in a New York state court against E-Magine, its members and managers, and others, alleging, among other things, breach of his employment contract. Collins claimed that signing the "final payment agreement" was the only means for him to obtain what he was owed for past sales commissions and asked the court to impose personal liability on the members and managers of E-Magine for breach of contract. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? [Collins v. E-Magine, LLC, 291 A.D.2d 350, 739 N.Y.S.2d 121 (1 Dept. 2002)]

37-7. Joint Ventures. In 1993, TOG Acquisition Co. attempted to acquire the Orleander Group, a manufacturer of bicycle accessories, but failed for lack of financing. Orleander then granted to Herrick Co. an exclusive right to negotiate for the sale of the business. In August, representatives of TOG, Herrick, and SCS Communications, Inc., signed a letter in which they agreed "to work together to acquire the business of the Orleander Group.” The “letter agreement” provided that the parties would contribute “equal amounts of capital” and that all of the terms of the acquisition required the approval of each party. On November 19, TOG and SCS told Herrick that it was out of the deal and, ten days later, acquired Orleander without Herrick. Herrick filed a suit in a federal district court against SCS and others, alleging, among other things, that the “letter agreement” was a contract to establish a joint venture, which TOG and SCS had breached. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [SCS Communications, Inc. v. Herrick Co., 360 F.3d 329 (2d Cir. 2004)]

Westbury Properties, Inc., and others (collectively, the Westbury group) owned, managed, and developed real property. Jerry Stoker and the Stoker Group, Inc. (the Stokers), also developed real property. The Westbury group entered into agreements with the Stokers concerning a large tract of property in Houston County, Georgia. The parties formed limited liability companies (LLCs), including Bellemeade, LLC (the LLC group), to develop various parcels of the tract for residential purposes. The operating agreements provided that “no Member shall be accountable to the [LLC] or to any other Member with respect to [any other] business or activity even if the business or activity competes with the [LLC’s] business.” The Westbury group entered into agreements with other parties to develop additional parcels within the tract in competition with the LLC group. The Stokers filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the Westbury group, alleging, among other things, breach of fiduciary duty. What duties do the members of an LLC owe to each other? Under what principle might the terms of an operating agreement alter these duties? In whose favor should the court rule? Discuss. [Stoker v. Bellemeade, LLC, 272 Ga.App. 817, 615 S.E.2d 1 (2005)]

37-9. Limited Liability Companies. A “Certificate of Formation” (CF) for Grupo Dos Chiles, LLC, was filed with the Delaware secretary of state in February 2000. The CF named Jamie Rivera as the “initial member.” The next month, Jamie’s mother, Yolanda Martinez, and Alfred Shriver, who had a personal relationship with Martinez at the time, signed an “LLC Agreement” for Grupo, naming themselves “managing partners.” Grupo’s business was the operation of Dancing Peppers Cantina, a restaurant in Alexandria, Virginia. Identifying themselves as Grupo’s owners, Shriver and Martinez borrowed funds from Advanceme, Inc., a restaurant lender. In June 2003, Grupo lost its LLC status in Delaware for failing to pay state taxes, and by the end of July, Martinez and Shriver had ended their relationship. Shriver filed a suit in a Virginia state court against Martinez to wind up Grupo’s affairs. Meanwhile, without consulting Shriver, Martinez paid Grupo’s back taxes. Shriver filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Martinez, asking the court to dissolve the firm. What effect did the LLC Agreement have on the CF? Did Martinez’s unilateral act reestablish Grupo’s LLC status? Should the Delaware court grant Shriver’s request? Why or why not? [In re Grupo Dos Chiles, LLC, ___ A.2d ___ (Del.Ch. 2006)]

37-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Blushing Brides, L.L.C., a publisher of wedding planning magazines in Columbus, Ohio, opened an account with Gray Printing Co. in July 2000. On behalf of Blushing Brides, Louis Zacks, the firm’s member-manager, signed a credit agreement that identified the firm as the “purchaser” and required payment within thirty days. Despite the agreement, Blushing Brides typically took up to six months to pay the full amount for its orders. Gray printed and shipped 10,000 copies of a fall/winter 2001 issue for Blushing Brides but had not been paid when the firm ordered 15,000 copies of a spring/summer 2002 issue. Gray refused to print the new order without an assurance of payment. On May 22, Zacks signed a promissory note payable to Gray within thirty days for $14,778, plus interest at 6 percent per year. Gray printed the new order but by October had been paid only $7,500. Gray filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Blushing Brides and Zacks to collect the balance. [Gray Printing Co. v. Blushing Brides, L.L.C., ___ N.E.2d ___ (Ohio App. 10 Dist. 2006)]

- Under what circumstances is a member of an LLC liable for the firm’s debts? In this case, is Zacks personally liable under the credit agreement for the unpaid amount on Blushing Brides’ account? Did Zacks’s promissory note affect the parties’ liability on the account? Explain.
- Should a member of an LLC assume an ethical responsibility to meet the obligations of the firm? Discuss.
- Gray shipped only 10,000 copies of the spring/summer 2002 issue of Blushing Brides’ magazine, waiting for the publisher to identify a destination for the other 5,000 copies. The magazine had a retail price of $4.50 per copy. Did Gray have a legal or ethical duty to “mitigate the damages” by attempting to sell or otherwise distribute these copies itself? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 38

CORPORATIONS— Formation and Financing

The corporation is a creature of statute. A corporation is an artificial being, existing only in law and neither tangible nor visible. Its existence generally depends on state law, although some corporations, especially public organizations, are created under federal law. Each state has its own body of corporate law, and these laws are not entirely uniform.

The Model Business Corporation Act (MBCA) is a codification of modern corporation law that has been influential in the codification of state corporation statutes. Today, the majority of state statutes are guided by the most recent version of the MBCA, often referred to as the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA). Excerpts from the RMBCA are included in Appendix G of this text. Keep in mind, however, that there is considerable variation among the regulations of the states that have used the MBCA or the RMBCA as a basis for their statutes, and several states do not follow either act. Consequently, individual state corporation laws should be relied on to determine corporate law rather than the MBCA or RMBCA.

In this chapter, we examine the nature of the corporate form of business enterprise and the various classifications of corporations. We then discuss the formation and financing of today's corporation.

The Nature and Classification of Corporations

A corporation is a legal entity created and recognized by state law. It can consist of one or more natural persons (as opposed to the artificial legal person of the corporation) identified under a common name. The corporation substitutes itself for its shareholders in conducting corporate business and in incurring liability, yet its authority to act and the liability for its actions are separate and apart from the individuals who own it.

Corporate Personnel

When an individual purchases a share of stock in a corporation, that person becomes a shareholder and an owner of the corporation. The shareholders elect a board of directors who are responsible for the overall management of the corporation. The directors make all policy decisions and hire the corporate officers and other employees to run the daily business operations of the corporation.

Unlike the members in a partnership, the body of shareholders can change constantly without affecting the continued existence of the corporation. A shareholder can sue the corporation, and the corporation can sue a shareholder. Additionally, under certain circumstances, a shareholder can sue on behalf of a corporation. The rights and duties of all corporate personnel will be examined in Chapter 39.

The Limited Liability of Shareholders

One of the key advantages of the corporate form is the limited liability of its owners (shareholders). Corporate shareholders normally are not personally liable for the obligations of the corporation beyond the extent of their investments. In certain limited situations, however, the “corporate veil” can be pierced and liability for the corporation’s obligations extended to shareholders—a concept that will be explained later in this chapter. Additionally, to enable the firm to obtain credit, shareholders in small companies sometimes voluntarily assume personal liability, as guarantors, for corporate obligations.

Corporate Taxation

Corporate profits are taxed by various levels of government. Corporations can do one of two things with corporate profits—retain them or pass them on to shareholders in the form of dividends. The corporation normally receives no tax deduction for dividends distributed to shareholders. Dividends are again taxable (except when they represent distributions of capital) to the shareholder receiving them. This double-taxation feature of the corporation is one of its major disadvantages.¹

1. Congress enacted a law in 2003 that mitigated this double-taxation feature to some extent by providing a reduced federal tax rate on qualifying dividends. The Jobs Growth Tax Relief Reconciliation Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-27, May 28, 2003, is codified at 26 U.S.C.A. Section 6429.

Retained Earnings Profits that are not distributed are retained by the corporation. These retained earnings, if invested properly, will yield higher corporate profits in the future and thus cause the price of the company’s stock to rise. Individual shareholders can then reap the benefits of these retained earnings in the capital gains they receive when they sell their shares.

Offshore Low-Tax Jurisdictions In recent years, some U.S. corporations have been using holding companies to reduce—or at least defer—their U.S. income taxes. At its simplest, a holding company (sometimes referred to as a parent company) is a company whose business activity consists of holding shares in another company. Typically, the holding company is established in a low-tax or no-tax offshore jurisdiction, such as those shown in Exhibit 38–1. Among the best known are the Cayman Islands, Dubai, Hong Kong, Luxembourg, Monaco, and Panama.

Sometimes, a major U.S. corporation sets up an investment holding company in a low-tax offshore environment. The corporation then transfers its cash, bonds, stocks, and other investments to the holding company. In general, any profits received by the holding company on these investments are taxed at the rate of the offshore jurisdiction in which the company is registered, not the U.S. tax rates applicable to the U.S.

EXHIBIT 38–1 • Offshore Low-Tax Jurisdictions

corporation or its shareholders. Thus, deposits of cash, for example, may earn interest that is taxed at only a minimal rate. Once the profits are brought “onshore,” though, they are taxed at the federal corporate income tax rate, and any payments received by the shareholders are also taxable at the full U.S. rates.

Constitutional Rights of Corporations

A corporation is recognized under state and federal law as a “person,” and it enjoys many of the same rights and privileges that natural persons who are U.S. citizens enjoy. The Bill of Rights guarantees persons certain protections, and corporations are considered persons in most instances. Accordingly, a corporation as an entity has a right of access to the courts and can sue or be sued. It also has a right to due process before denial of life (corporate existence), liberty, or property, as well as freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures and from double jeopardy.

Under the First Amendment, corporations are entitled to freedom of speech. As we pointed out in Chapter 4, however, commercial speech (such as advertising) and political speech (such as contributions to political causes or candidates) receive significantly less protection than noncommercial speech.

Generally, a corporation is not entitled to claim the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Therefore, agents or officers of the corporation cannot refuse to produce corporate records on the ground that it might incriminate them.² Additionally, the privileges few circumstances. See, for example, In re Three Grand Jury Subpoenas Duces Tecum Dated January 29, 1999, 191 F.3d 173 (2d Cir. 1999); and United States v. Bedell & Co., 2006 WL 3813792 (E.D.N.Y. 2006).

Torts and Criminal Acts

A corporation is liable for the torts committed by its agents or officers within the course and scope of their employment. This principle applies to a corporation exactly as it applies to the ordinary agency relationships discussed in Chapter 32. It follows the doctrine of respondereat superior.

Under modern criminal law, a corporation may also be held liable for the criminal acts of its agents and employees, provided the punishment is one that can be applied to the corporation. Although corporations cannot be imprisoned, they can be fined. (Of course, corporate directors and officers can be imprisoned, and in recent years, many have faced criminal penalties for their own actions or for the actions of employees under their supervision.)

The question in the following case was whether a corporation could be convicted for its employee’s criminal negligence.

CASE 38.1 Commonwealth v. Angelo Todesca Corp.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 2006. 446 Mass. 128, 842 N.E.2d 930.

● Background and Facts Brian Gauthier worked as a truck driver for Angelo Todesca Corporation, a trucking and paving company. During 2000, Gauthier drove a ten-wheel tri-axle dump truck, which was designated AT-56. Angelo’s safety manual required its trucks to be equipped with back-up alarms, which were to sound automatically whenever the vehicles were in reverse gear. In November, Gauthier discovered that AT-56’s alarm was missing. Angelo ordered a new alarm. Meanwhile, Gauthier continued to drive AT-56. On December 1, Angelo assigned Gauthier to haul asphalt to a work site in Centerville, Massachusetts. At the site, as Gauthier backed up AT-56 to dump its load, he struck a police officer who was directing traffic through the site and facing away from the truck. The officer died of his injuries. The commonwealth of Massachusetts charged Gauthier and Angelo in a Massachusetts state court with, among other wrongful acts, motor vehicle homicide. Angelo was convicted and fined $2,500. On Angelo's appeal, a state intermediate appellate court reversed Angelo's conviction. The state appealed to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, the state's highest court.

SPINA, J. [Justice]

* * * *
* * *

[On this appeal, the] defendant maintains that a corporation never can be criminally liable for motor vehicle homicide * * * because * * * a "corporation" cannot "operate" a vehicle. The Commonwealth, however, argues that corporate liability is necessarily vicarious [indirect, or secondary], and that a corporation can be held accountable for criminal acts committed by its agents, including negligent operation of a motor vehicle causing the death of another * * * . [Emphasis added.]

We agree with the Commonwealth. Because a corporation is not a living person, it can act only through its agents. By the defendant's reasoning, a corporation never could be liable for any crime. A "corporation" can no more serve alcohol to minors, or bribe government officials, or falsify data on loan applications, than operate a vehicle negligently: only human agents, acting for the corporation, are capable of these actions. Nevertheless, * * * a corporation may be criminally liable for such acts when performed by corporate employees, acting within the scope of their employment and on behalf of the corporation. * * * [Emphasis added.]

The defendant further contends that it cannot be found vicariously liable for the victim's death because corporate criminal liability requires criminal conduct by the agent, which is lacking in this case. Operating a truck without a back-up alarm, the defendant notes, is not a criminal act: no State or Federal statute requires that a vehicle be equipped with such a device. Although the defendant is correct that criminal conduct of an agent is necessary before criminal liability may be imputed to the corporation, it mischaracterizes the agent's conduct in this case. Gauthier's criminal act, and the conduct imputed to the defendant, was not simply backing up without an alarm, as the defendant contends; rather, the criminal conduct was Gauthier's negligent operation of the defendant's truck, resulting in the victim's death * * * . Clearly, a corporation cannot be criminally liable for acts of employee negligence that are not criminal; however, [a Massachusetts state statute] criminalizes negligence in a very specific context (the operation of a motor vehicle on a public way) and with a specific outcome (resulting in death). Furthermore, nothing in that statute requires that the negligence be based on a statutory violation; the fact that a back-up alarm is not required by statute, then, is irrelevant to the issue whether vehicular homicide committed by an employee can be imputed to the corporation. If a corporate employee violates [this statute] while engaged in corporate business that the employee has been authorized to conduct, we can see no reason why the corporation cannot be vicariously liable for the crime.

● Decision and Remedy The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court affirmed Angelo's conviction. The court recognized that a corporation is not a "living person" and "can act only through its agents," which may include its employees. The court reasoned that if an employee commits a crime, "while engaged in corporate business that the employee has been authorized to conduct," a corporation can be held liable for the crime.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Gauthier had been an independent contractor rather than Angelo's employee, would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension Under what circumstances might an employee's supervisor, or even a corporate officer or director, be held liable for the employee's crime?

Corporate Sentencing Guidelines

Recall from Chapter 9 that the U.S. Sentencing Commission created standardized sentencing guidelines for federal crimes. These guidelines went into effect in 1987. The commission subsequently created specific sentencing guidelines for crimes committed by corporate employees (white-collar crimes).³ The net effect of the guidelines has been a significant increase in the penalties for crimes committed by corporate personnel. Penalties depend on such factors as the seriousness of the offense, the amount involved, and the extent to which top company executives are implicated. Corporate lawbreakers can face fines amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, though the guidelines allow judges to impose less severe penalties in certain circumstances.

When a company has taken substantial steps to prevent, investigate, and punish wrongdoing, such as by establishing and enforcing crime prevention standards, a court may impose less serious penalties. Many states' corporate laws now require corporations to have adequate systems for detecting and reporting misconduct that can be attributed to corporations. Corporate sentencing guidelines that became effective in 2004 require corporations to train employees on how to comply with relevant laws. Additionally, corporate directors have a fiduciary duty to prevent employee misconduct, which means that if they discover an employee has committed a crime, they have a duty to promptly report it. As will be discussed in Chapters 41 and 51, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act also requires corporate attorneys to report possible corporate misconduct (both civil and criminal) to officials within the corporation. (For a detailed discussion of corporate governance and compliance issues, see Chapter 41.)

Classification of Corporations

Corporations can be classified in several ways. The classification of a corporation normally depends on its location, purpose, and ownership characteristics, as described in the following subsections.

Domestic, Foreign, and Alien Corporations

A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation by its home state (the state in which it incorporates). A corporation formed in one state but doing business in another is referred to in the second state as a foreign corporation. A corporation formed in another country (say, Mexico) but doing business in the United States is referred to in the United States as an alien corporation.

3. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 stiffened the penalties for certain types of corporate crime and ordered the U.S. Sentencing Commission to revise the sentencing guidelines accordingly—see Chapter 41.

A corporation does not have an automatic right to do business in a state other than its state of incorporation. In some instances, it must obtain a certificate of authority in any state in which it plans to do business. Once the certificate has been issued, the corporation generally can exercise in that state all of the powers conferred on it by its home state. If a foreign corporation does business in a state without obtaining a certificate of authority, the state can impose substantial fines and sanctions on the corporation, and sometimes even on its officers, directors, or agents.

Note that most state statutes specify certain activities, such as soliciting orders via the Internet, that are not considered “doing business” within the state. Thus, a foreign corporation normally does not need a certificate of authority to sell goods or services via the Internet or by mail.

Public and Private Corporations A public corporation is one formed by the government to meet some political or governmental purpose. Cities and towns that incorporate are common examples. In addition, many federal government organizations, such as the U.S. Postal Service, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and AMTRAK, are public corporations. Note that a public corporation is not the same as a publicly held corporation (often called a public company). A publicly held corporation is any corporation whose shares are publicly traded in a securities market, such as the New York Stock Exchange or the over-the-counter market.

In contrast to public corporations (not public companies), private corporations are created either wholly or in part for private benefit. Most corporations are private. Although they may serve a public purpose, as a public electric or gas utility does, they are owned by private persons rather than by the government.⁴

Nonprofit Corporations Corporations formed for purposes other than making a profit are called nonprofit or not-for-profit corporations. Private hospitals, educational institutions, charities, and religious organizations, for example, are frequently organized as nonprofit corporations. The nonprofit corporation is a convenient form of organization that allows various groups to own property and to form contracts without exposing the individual members to personal liability.

4. The United States Supreme Court first recognized the property rights of private corporations and clarified the distinction between public and private corporations in the landmark case Trustees of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 17 U.S. (4 Wheaton) 518, 4 L.Ed. 629 (1819).

Close Corporations In terms of numbers, not size, most corporate enterprises in the United States fall into the category of close corporations. A close corporation is one whose shares are held by members of a family or by relatively few persons. Close corporations are also referred to as closely held, family, or privately held corporations. Usually, the members of the small group constituting a close corporation are personally known to each other. Because the number of shareholders is so small, there is no trading market for the shares.

In practice, a close corporation is often operated like a partnership. Some states have enacted special statutory provisions that apply to close corporations. These provisions expressly permit close corporations to depart significantly from certain formalities required by traditional corporation law.⁵

Additionally, a provision added to the RMBCA in 1991 gives a close corporation considerable flexibility in determining its rules of operation [RMBCA 7.32]. If all of a corporation's shareholders agree in writing, the corporation can operate without directors, bylaws, annual or special shareholders' or directors' meetings, stock certificates, or formal records of shareholders' or directors' decisions.⁶

Management of Close Corporations. A close corporation has a single shareholder or a closely knit group of shareholders, who usually hold the positions of directors and officers. Management of a close corporation resembles that of a sole proprietorship or a partnership. As a corporation, however, the firm must meet all specific legal requirements set forth in state statutes.

To prevent a majority shareholder from dominating a close corporation, the corporation may require that more than a simple majority of the directors approve any action taken by the board. Typically, this would apply only to extraordinary actions, such as changing the amount of dividends or dismissing an employee-shareholder, and not to ordinary business decisions.

Transfer of Shares in Close Corporations. By definition, a close corporation has a small number of shareholders. Thus, the transfer of one shareholder's shares to someone else can cause serious management problems. The other shareholders may find themselves required to share control with someone they do not know or like.

Suppose that three brothers, Terry, Damon, and Henry Johnson, are the only shareholders of Johnson's Car Wash, Inc. Terry and Damon do not want Henry to sell his shares to an unknown third person. To avoid this situation, the corporation could restrict the transferability of shares to outside persons. Shareholders could be required to offer their shares to the corporation or the other shareholders before selling them to an outside purchaser. In fact, a few states have statutes that prohibit the transfer of close corporation shares unless certain persons—including shareholders, family members, and the corporation—are first given the opportunity to purchase the shares for the same price.

Control of a close corporation can also be stabilized through the use of a shareholder agreement. A shareholder agreement can provide that when one of the original shareholders dies, her or his shares of stock in the corporation will be divided in such a way that the proportionate holdings of the survivors, and thus their proportionate control, will be maintained. Courts are generally reluctant to interfere with private agreements, including shareholder agreements. The effect of a close corporation's stock transfer restriction was at the heart of the following case.

5. For example, in some states (such as Maryland), a close corporation need not have a board of directors.

6. Shareholders cannot agree, however, to eliminate certain rights of shareholders, such as the right to inspect corporate books and records or the right to bring derivative actions (lawsuits on behalf of the corporation—see Chapter 39).

In 1952, Deseret News and the predecessor in interest of KTLLC entered into the Joint Operating Agreement (“JOA”), the purpose of which was to share overhead expenses related to the production of The Salt Lake Tribune and the Deseret News. The JOA created the Newspaper Agency Corporation (NAC) to be the agent of KTLLC and Deseret News. * * * KTLLC and Deseret News each own 50% of the stock in the NAC * * *.

* * * Through the statute, Utah plainly embraces the validity of stock transfer restrictions. * * * *The only issue we must resolve * * * is whether the stock transfer restriction contained in * * * the JOA is designed to serve a reasonable purpose.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The desire to limit the participation of outsiders in a close corporation like the NAC has long been recognized as a reasonable purpose for a share transfer restriction. * * * The particular significance of the “close” character of a corporation * * * lies very clearly in the fact that such a share transfer restriction is inherently more “reasonable” when applied to the stock of a corporation having only a few shareholders who are generally active in the business * * * than when imposed upon the stock of a corporation which has numerous shareholders who * * * do not participate actively in the day-to-day management and conduct of the corporation’s affairs. [Emphasis added.]

Finding unpersuasive Tribune Publishing’s arguments that * * * the JOA is invalid, we conclude that the stock transfer restriction is valid and enforceable.

* * * *

With regard to ownership of the Tribune Assets, we disagree with and reverse the district court’s ruling * * *.

* * * The district court concluded that Tribune Publishing had a clear entitlement under the Option Agreement to receive “all, and not less than all” of the Tribune Assets upon exercise of the option. It felt, however, that it could not fashion the relief requested by Tribune Publishing: a decree of specific performance requiring the transfer of all of the Tribune Assets.

We find that the district court read too narrowly the relief sought by Tribune Publishing in its complaint. * * * We read Tribune Publishing’s complaint as seeking whatever combination of equitable and legal relief the court may award to remedy a refusal by KTLLC to perform under the

Accordingly, the district court's order denying Tribune Publishing's motion for a preliminary injunction is AFFIRMED in part and REVERSED in part and the matter REMANDED for further proceedings.

QUESTIONS

1. What is the relationship between NAC and its shareholders, and how is that relationship different from the usual relationship between a corporation and its shareholders?
2. The plaintiff in this case argued, among other things, that the stock transfer restriction was a "restraint on alienation (transfer of ownership)," constituting "an unreasonable incursion on the free flow of commerce." How do the facts of this case show that this is not a valid argument?

S Corporations A close corporation that meets the qualifying requirements specified in Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code can operate as an S corporation. If a corporation has S corporation status, it can avoid the imposition of income taxes at the corporate level while retaining many of the advantages of a corporation, particularly limited liability.

Qualification Requirements for S Corporations.

Among the numerous requirements for S corporation status, the following are the most important:

1. The corporation must be a domestic corporation.
2. The corporation must not be a member of an affiliated group of corporations.
3. The shareholders of the corporation must be individuals, estates, or certain trusts. Nonqualifying trusts and partnerships cannot be shareholders. Corporations can be shareholders under certain circumstances.
4. The corporation must have no more than one hundred shareholders.
5. The corporation must have only one class of stock, although all shareholders do not need to have the same voting rights.
6. No shareholder of the corporation may be a non-resident alien.

Benefits of S Corporations. At times, it is beneficial for a regular corporation to elect S corporation status. Benefits include the following:

1. When the corporation has losses, the S election allows the shareholders to use the losses to offset other taxable income.
2. When the shareholder's tax bracket is lower than the tax bracket for regular corporations, the S election causes the corporation's entire income to be taxed in the shareholder's bracket (because it is taxed as personal income), whether or not it is distributed. This is particularly attractive when the corporation wants to accumulate earnings for some future business purpose.

In the past, many close corporations opted for S corporation status to obtain these tax benefits. Today, however, the limited liability partnership and the limited liability company (discussed in Chapters 36 and 37, respectively) offer similar advantages plus additional benefits, including more flexibility in forming and operating the business. Hence, the S corporation has lost some of its appeal.

Professional Corporations Professionals such as physicians, lawyers, dentists, and accountants can incorporate. Professional corporations are typically identified by the letters P.C. (professional corporation), S.C. (service corporation), or P.A. (professional association). In general, the laws governing professional corporations are similar to those governing ordinary business corporations, but there are a few differences with regard to liability that deserve mention.

First, there is generally no limitation on liability for acts of malpractice or obligations incurred because of a breach of duty to a client or patient of the professional corporation. In other words, each shareholder in a professional corporation can be held liable for any malpractice liability incurred by the others within the scope of the corporate business. The reason for this rule is that professionals, in contrast to shareholders in other types of corporations, should not be allowed to avoid liability for their wrongful acts simply by incorporating. Second, in many states, professional persons are liable not only for their own negligent acts, but also for the misconduct of persons under their direct supervision who render professional services on behalf of the corporation. Third, a shareholder in a professional corporation is generally protected from contractual liability and cannot be held liable for the torts—other than malpractice or a breach of duty to clients or patients—that are committed by other professionals at the firm. See Concept Summary 38.1 for a review of the ways in which corporations are classified.

Corporate Formation

Up to this point, we have discussed some of the general characteristics of corporations. We now examine the process by which corporations come into existence. Incorporating a business is much simpler today than it was twenty years ago, and many states allow businesses to incorporate online.

One of the most common reasons for creating a corporation is the need for additional capital to finance expansion. Many of the Fortune 500 companies started as sole proprietorships or partnerships and then converted to a corporate entity. A sole proprietor in need of funds can seek partners who will bring capital with them. Although a partnership may be able to secure more funds from potential lenders than the sole proprietor could, the amount is still limited. When

CONCEPT SUMMARY 38.1 Classification of Corporations

Classification	Description
DOMESTIC, FOREIGN, AND ALIEN CORPORATIONS	A corporation is referred to as a domestic corporation in its home state (the state in which it incorporates). A corporation is referred to as a foreign corporation by any state that is not its home state. A corporation is referred to as an alien corporation if it originates in another country but does business in the United States.
PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CORPORATIONS	A public corporation is formed by a government (for example, a city, town, or public project). A private corporation is formed wholly or in part for private benefit. Most corporations are private corporations.
NONPROFIT CORPORATION	A corporation formed without a profit-making purpose (for example, charitable, educational, and religious organizations and hospitals).
CLOSE CORPORATION	A corporation owned by a family or a relatively small number of individuals; because the number of shareholders is small and the transfer of shares is usually restricted, the shares are not traded in a public securities market.
S CORPORATION	A small domestic corporation (must have no more than one hundred shareholders) that, under Subchapter S of the Internal Revenue Code, is given special tax treatment. S corporations allow shareholders to enjoy the limited legal liability of the corporate form but avoid its double-taxation feature (shareholders pay taxes on the income at personal income tax rates, and the S corporation is not taxed separately).
PROFESSIONAL CORPORATION	A corporation formed by professionals (for example, physicians or lawyers) to obtain the advantages of incorporation (such as tax benefits and limited liability). In most situations, the professional corporation is treated like other corporations, but sometimes the courts will disregard the corporate form and treat the shareholders as partners, especially with regard to malpractice liability.

a firm wants significant growth, continuing to add partners can result in so many partners that the firm can no longer operate effectively. Therefore, incorporation may be the best choice for an expanding business organization because a corporation can obtain more capital by issuing shares of stock. (Corporate financing is discussed later in this chapter.)

Promotional Activities

In the past, preliminary steps were taken to organize and promote the business prior to incorporating. Contracts were made with investors and others on behalf of the future corporation. Today, however, due to the relative ease of forming a corporation in most states, persons incorporating their business rarely, if ever, engage in preliminary promotional activities. Nevertheless, it is important for businesspersons to understand that they are personally liable for all preincorporation contracts made with investors, accountants, or others on behalf of the future corporation. This personal liability continues until the corporation assumes the preincorporation contracts by novation (discussed in Chapter 12).

Incorporation Procedures

Exact procedures for incorporation differ among states, but the basic steps are as follows: (1) select a state of incorporation, (2) secure the corporate name, (3) prepare the articles of incorporation, and (4) file the articles of incorporation with the secretary of state. These steps are discussed in more detail in the following subsections.

Selecting the State of Incorporation The first step in the incorporation process is to select a state in which to incorporate. Because state laws differ, individuals may look for the states that offer the most advantageous tax or incorporation provisions. Another consideration is the fee that a particular state charges to incorporate as well as the annual fees and the fees for specific transactions (such as stock transfers).

Delaware has historically had the least restrictive laws and provisions that favor corporate management. Consequently, many corporations, including a number of the largest, have incorporated there. Delaware's statutes permit firms to incorporate in that state and conduct business and locate their operating headquarters elsewhere. Most other states now permit this as well. Generally, though, closely held corporations, particularly those of a professional nature, incorporate in the state where their principal shareholders live and work. For reasons of convenience and cost, businesses often choose to incorporate in the state in which most of the corporation's business will be conducted.

Securing the Corporate Name The choice of a corporate name is subject to state approval to ensure against duplication or deception. State statutes usually require that the secretary of state run a check on the proposed name in the state of incorporation. In some states, the persons incorporating a firm must do the check themselves at their own expense. Specialized Internet search engines are available for checking corporate names, and many companies will perform this service for a fee. Once cleared, a name can be reserved for a short time, for a fee, pending the completion of the articles of incorporation. All states require the corporation name to include the word Corporation (Corp.), Incorporated (Inc.), Company (Co.), or Limited (Ltd.).

A new corporation's name cannot be the same as (or deceptively similar to) the name of an existing corporation doing business within the state (see Chapter 8). The name should also be one that can be used as the business's Internet domain name. Suppose that an existing corporation is named Digital Synergy, Inc. A new corporation cannot choose the name Digital Synergy Company because that name is deceptively similar to the first. The state will be unlikely to allow the corporate name because it could impliedly transfer a part of the goodwill established by the first corporate user to the second corporation. In addition, the new firm would not want to choose the name Digital Synergy Company because it would be unable to acquire an Internet domain name using the name of the business.

If those incorporating a firm contemplate doing business in other states—or over the Internet—they also need to check on existing corporate names in those states as well. Otherwise, if the firm does business under a name that is the same as or deceptively similar to an existing company's name, it may be liable for trade name infringement.

Preparing the Articles of Incorporation

The primary document needed to incorporate a business is the articles of incorporation. (For a sample

CHAPTER 38 CORPORATIONS—Formation and Financing form of articles of incorporation, see Exhibit 38-2.)⁷ The articles include basic information about the corporation and serve as a primary source of authority for its future organization and business functions. The person or persons who execute (sign) the articles are called incorporators. Generally, the articles of incorporation must include the following information [RMBCA 2.02].

7. In some states, the articles of incorporation may be referred to as the corporate charter, especially after the state has approved or granted its authority for the existence of the corporation. Under some circumstances, such as when a corporation fails to pay taxes, a state can revoke the firm's corporate charter, or status as a corporation. See, for example, Bullington v. Palangio, 345 Ark. 320, 45 S.W.3d 834 (2001).

1. The name of the corporation.
2. The number of shares the corporation is authorized to issue.
3. The name and address of the corporation's initial registered agent.
4. The name and address of each incorporator.

In addition, the articles may set forth other information, such as the names and addresses of the initial board of directors, the duration and purpose of the corporation, a par value of shares of the corporation, and any other information pertinent to the rights and duties of the corporation's shareholders and directors. Articles of incorporation vary widely depending on the jurisdiction and the size and type of the corporation.

Frequently, the articles do not provide much detail about the firm's operations, which are spelled out in the company's bylaws (internal rules of management adopted by the corporation at its first organizational meeting).

Shares of the Corporation. The articles must specify the number of shares of stock the corporation is authorized to issue [RMBCA 2.02(a)]. For instance, a company might state that the aggregate number of shares that the corporation has the authority to issue is five thousand. Large corporations often state a par value of each share, such as $.20 per share, and specify the various types or classes of stock authorized for issuance (see the discussion of common and preferred stock later in this chapter). Sometimes, the articles set forth the capital structure of the corporation and other relevant information concerning equity, shares, and credit.

Registered Office and Agent. The corporation must indicate the location and address of its registered office within the state. Usually, the registered office is also the principal office of the corporation. The corporation must also give the name and address of a specific person who has been designated as an agent and who can receive legal documents (such as orders to appear in court) on behalf of the corporation.

Incorporators. Each incorporator must be listed by name and address. The incorporators need not have any interest at all in the corporation, and sometimes signing the articles is their only duty. Many states do not have residency or age requirements for incorporators. In some states, only one incorporator is needed, but other states require as many as three. Incorporators frequently participate in the first organizational meeting of the corporation.

Duration and Purpose. A corporation has perpetual existence unless the articles state otherwise. The owners may want to prescribe a maximum duration, however, after which the corporation must formally renew its existence.

The RMBCA does not require a specific statement of purpose to be included in the articles. A corporation can be formed for any lawful purpose. Some incorporators include a general statement of purpose "to engage in any lawful act or activity," while others specify the intended business activities (such as "to engage in the production and sale of agricultural products").

The trend is toward allowing corporate articles to state that the corporation is organized for "any legal business," with no mention of specifics, to avoid the need for future amendments to the corporate articles [RMBCA 2.02(b)(2)(i), 3.01].

Some states prohibit certain licensed professionals, such as physicians or lawyers, from forming a general business corporation and require them instead to incorporate as a professional corporation (discussed previously).⁸ Also, in some states, businesses in certain industries—such as banks, insurance companies, or public utilities—cannot be operated in the general corporate form and are governed by special incorporation statutes.

Internal Organization. The articles can describe the corporation's internal management structure, although this is usually included in the bylaws adopted after the corporation is formed. The articles of incorporation commence the corporation; the bylaws are formed after commencement by the board of directors. Bylaws cannot conflict with the incorporation statute or the articles of incorporation [RMBCA 2.06].

Under the RMBCA, shareholders may amend or repeal the bylaws. The board of directors may also amend or repeal the bylaws unless the articles of incorporation or provisions of the incorporation statute reserve this power to the shareholders exclusively [RMBCA 10.20]. Typical bylaw provisions describe such matters as voting requirements for shareholders, the election of the board of directors, the methods of replacing directors, and the manner and time of holding shareholders' and board meetings (these corporate activities will be discussed in Chapter 39).

Filing the Articles with the State Once the articles of incorporation have been prepared and signed by the incorporators, they are sent to the appropriate state official, usually the secretary of state, along with the required filing fee. In most states, the secretary of state then stamps the articles "Filed" and returns a copy of the articles to the incorporators. Once this occurs, the corporation officially exists. (Note that some states issue a certificate of incorporation, or corporate charter, which is similar to articles of incorporation, representing the state's authorization for the corporation to conduct business. This procedure was typical under the unrevised MBCA.)

8. See, for example, New Jersey Statutes Annotated Titles 14A:17-1 et seq.

First Organizational Meeting to Adopt Bylaws

After incorporation, the first organizational meeting must be held. Usually, the most important function of this meeting is the adoption of bylaws—the internal rules of management for the corporation. If the articles of incorporation named the initial board of directors, then the directors, by majority vote, call the meeting to adopt the bylaws and complete the company's organization. If the articles did not name the directors (as is typical), then the incorporators hold the meeting to elect the directors, adopt bylaws, and complete the routine business of incorporation (authorizing the issuance of shares and hiring employees, for example). The business transacted depends on the requirements of the state's incorporation statute, the nature of the corporation, the provisions made in the articles, and the desires of the incorporators.

Defects in Formation and Corporate Status

The procedures for incorporation are very specific. If they are not followed precisely, others may be able to challenge the existence of the corporation. Errors in incorporation procedures can become important when, for example, a third party who is attempting to enforce a contract or bring suit for a tort injury learns of them. On the basis of improper incorporation, the plaintiff could seek to make the would-be shareholders personally liable. Additionally, when the corporation seeks to enforce a contract against a defaulting party, that party may be able to avoid liability on the ground of a defect in the incorporation procedure.

To prevent injustice, the courts will sometimes attribute corporate existence to an improperly formed corporation by holding it to be a de jure corporation or a de facto corporation, as discussed below. Occasionally, a corporation may be held to exist by estoppel.

De Jure and De Facto Corporations

If a corporation has substantially complied with all conditions precedent to incorporation, a corporation is said to have de jure (rightful and lawful) existence. In most states and under RMBCA 2.03(b), the secretary of state's filing of the articles of incorporation is conclusive proof that all mandatory statutory provisions have been met [RMBCA 2.03(b)]. Because a de jure corporation is one that is properly formed, neither the state nor a third party can attack its existence.⁹ If, for example, the articles listed an incorrect address for an incorporator, the corporation was improperly formed, but most courts will uphold its de jure status.

Sometimes, there is a defect in complying with statutory mandates—for example, the corporation failed to hold an organizational meeting. Under these circumstances, the corporation may have de facto (actual) status, meaning that it will be treated as a legal corporation despite the defect in its formation. A corporation with de facto status cannot be challenged by third persons (only by the state). In other words, the shareholders of a de facto corporation are still protected by limited liability (provided they are unaware of the defect). The following elements are required for de facto status:

1. There must be a state statute under which the corporation can be validly incorporated.
2. The parties must have made a good faith attempt to comply with the statute.
3. The enterprise must already have undertaken to do business as a corporation.

Corporation by Estoppel

If a business holds itself out to others as being a corporation but has made no attempt to incorporate, the firm normally will be estopped (prevented) from denying corporate status in a lawsuit by a third party. This usually occurs when a third party contracts with an entity that claims to be a corporation but has not filed articles of incorporation. It can also occur when a third party contracts with a person claiming to be an agent of a corporation that does not in fact exist. When justice requires, the courts treat an alleged corporation as if it were an actual corporation for the purpose of determining the rights and liabilities in particular circumstances. A corporation by estoppel is thus determined by the situation. Recognition of its corporate status does not extend beyond the resolution of the problem at hand.

9. There is an exception: a few states allow state authorities, in a quo warranto proceeding, to bring an action against the corporation for noncompliance with a condition subsequent to incorporation. This might occur if the corporation fails to file annual reports, for example.

Corporate Powers

Under modern law, a corporation generally can engage in any act and enter into any contract available to a natural person in order to accomplish the purposes for which it was formed. When a corporation is created, the express and implied powers necessary to achieve its purpose also come into existence.

Express Powers

The express powers of a corporation are found in its articles of incorporation, in the law of the state of incorporation, and in the state and federal constitutions.

Corporate bylaws and the resolutions of the corporation's board of directors also grant or restrict certain powers. Because state corporation statutes frequently provide default rules that apply if the company's bylaws are silent on an issue, it is important that the bylaws set forth the specific operating rules of the corporation. In addition, after the bylaws are adopted, the corporation's board of directors will pass resolutions that also grant or restrict corporate powers.

The following order of priority is used if a conflict arises among the various documents involving a corporation:

1. U.S. Constitution.
2. Constitution of the state of incorporation.
3. State statutes.
4. Articles of incorporation.
5. Bylaws.
6. Resolutions of the board of directors.

Implied Powers

Certain implied powers arise when a corporation is created. Barring express constitutional, statutory, or charter prohibitions, the corporation has the implied power to perform all acts reasonably appropriate and necessary to accomplish its corporate purposes. For this reason, a corporation has the implied power to borrow funds within certain limits, to lend funds, and to extend credit to those with whom it has a legal or contractual relationship.

To borrow funds, the corporation acts through its board of directors to authorize the loan. Most often, the president or chief executive officer (see Chapter 39) of the corporation will execute the necessary papers on behalf of the corporation. Corporate officers such as these have the implied power to bind the corporation in matters directly connected with the ordinary business affairs of the enterprise. A corporate officer does not have the authority to bind the corporation to an action that will greatly affect the corporate purpose or undertaking, such as the sale of substantial corporate assets, however.

Ultra Vires Doctrine

The term ultra vires means “beyond the power.” In corporate law, acts of a corporation that are beyond its express or implied powers are ultra vires acts. Most cases dealing with ultra vires acts have involved contracts made for unauthorized purposes. For example, Suarez is the chief executive officer of SOS Plumbing, Inc. He enters into a contract with Carlini for the purchase of twenty cases of brandy. It is difficult to see how this contract is reasonably related to the conduct and furtherance of the corporation's stated purpose of providing plumbing installation and services. Hence, a court would probably find the contract to be ultra vires.

In some states, when a contract is entirely executory (not yet performed by either party), either party can use a defense of ultra vires to prevent enforcement of the contract. Under Section 3.04 of the RMBCA, the shareholders can seek an injunction from a court to prevent the corporation from engaging in ultra vires acts. The attorney general in the state of incorporation can also bring an action to obtain an injunction against the ultra vires transactions or to institute dissolution proceedings against the corporation on the basis of ultra vires acts. The corporation or its shareholders (on behalf of the corporation) can seek damages from the officers and directors who were responsible for the ultra vires acts.

Piercing the Corporate Veil

Occasionally, the owners use a corporate entity to perpetrate a fraud, circumvent the law, or in some other way accomplish an illegitimate objective. In these situations, the court will ignore the corporate structure and pierce the corporate veil, exposing the shareholders to personal liability [RMBCA 2.04]. Generally, when the corporate privilege is abused for personal benefit or when the corporate business is treated so carelessly that the corporation and the controlling shareholder are no longer separate entities, the court will require the owner to assume personal liability to creditors for the corporation's debts.

In short, when the facts show that great injustice would result from the use of a corporation to avoid individual responsibility, a court will look behind the corporate structure to the individual shareholder. The following are some of the factors that frequently cause the courts to pierce the corporate veil:

1. A party is tricked or misled into dealing with the corporation rather than the individual.
2. The corporation is set up never to make a profit or always to be insolvent, or it is too "thinly" capitalized—that is, it has insufficient capital at the time it is formed to meet its prospective debts or potential liabilities.
3. Statutory corporate formalities, such as holding required corporation meetings, are not followed.
4. Personal and corporate interests are mixed together, or commingled, to the extent that the corporation has no separate identity.

In the following case, when a corporation's creditors sought payment of its debts, the owners took for themselves the small value in the business, filed a bankruptcy petition for the firm, and incorporated under a new name to continue the business. Could the court recover the business assets from the new corporation for distribution to the original firm's creditors?

C A S E 38.3 In re Aqua Clear Technologies, Inc.

United States Bankruptcy Court, Southern District of Florida, 2007. 361 Bankr. 567.

- Background and Facts Harvey and Barbara Jacobson owned Aqua Clear Technologies, Inc., a small Florida business that installed and serviced home water softening systems. Barbara was Aqua's president, and Sharon, the Jacobsons' daughter, was an officer, but neither participated in the business. Although Harvey controlled the day-to-day operations, he was not an Aqua officer, director, or employee, but an independent contractor in service to it. Aqua had no compensation agreement with the Jacobsons. Instead, whenever Harvey decided that there were sufficient funds, they took funds out of the business for their personal expenses, including the maintenance of their home and payment for their cars, health-insurance premiums, and charges on their credit cards. In December 2004, Aqua filed a bankruptcy petition in a federal bankruptcy court. Three weeks later, Harvey incorporated Discount Water Services, Inc., and continued to service water softening systems for Aqua's customers. Discount appropriated Aqua's equipment and inventory without a formal transfer and advertised Aqua's phone number as Discount's own. Kenneth Welt, Aqua's trustee, initiated a proceeding against Discount, seeking, among other things, to recover Aqua's assets. The trustee contended that Discount was Aqua's "alter ego." (An alter ego is the double of something—in this case, the original company.)

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT JOHN K. OLSON, Bankruptcy Judge.

* * * *

* * * To disregard the corporate entity form and find that one entity is the alter ego of another, three elements must be established under Florida law:

- a. Domination and control of the corporation to such an extent that it has no independent existence;
- b. That the corporate form was used fraudulently or for an improper purpose; and
- c. That the fraudulent or improper use of the form proximately caused the creditor's injury.

* * * *

The Debtor and Defendant Discount Water were in substantially the same business. They used the same telephone number. They operated from the same business address. They serviced the same geographic area and many of the same customers. Until April 27, 2005, when Barbara Jacobson resigned as President of Discount Water, she was the only President either the Debtor or Discount Water had and a director of both. The Debtor and Discount Water had identical officers and directors. The Court may presume fraud when a transfer occurs between two corporations controlled by the same officers and directors. There is no credible evidence before the Court that suggests that Discount Water is anything other than a continuation of the Debtor's business under a new name. [Emphasis added.]

Perhaps the clearest piece of evidence demonstrating the identity of the Debtor and Discount Water is in the following letter sent to Aqua Clear's health insurance carrier:

* * * *

We are changing the name of Aqua Clear Technologies Inc., * * * to DISCOUNT WATER SERVICES INC. Please change your records as soon as possible. * * *

* * * *

Clearly, the author of the letter is declaring that Discount Water Services and the Debtor are one and the same. * * *

* * * The evidence makes clear that the Jacobsons created Discount Water simply to continue the business of the Debtor using the Debtor's assets. The Jacobsons divested the Debtor of such assets as it retained at the time of its bankruptcy filing, motivated in large part by a desire to thwart the collection efforts of * * * judgment creditor[s] * * *. The Jacobsons thus delivered an empty shell of the Debtor to the bankruptcy court in contravention of their duty to their creditors.

*When conducting an analysis concerning a fraud to avoid the liabilities of a predecessor, * * * the bottom line question is whether each entity has run its own race, or whether there has been a relay-style passing of the baton from one to the other.* Here, the assets transferred from the Debtor to Discount Water were in exchange for no bona fide consideration, let alone for reasonably equivalent value. * * * Discount Water took the baton passed by the Debtor and has run with it and in the process has become the Debtor's alter ego. Discount Water is therefore liable to the Debtor's creditors for all of the Debtor's liabilities * * *. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The court issued a judgment against Discount, and in the trustee's favor, for $108,732.64, which represented the amount of the claims listed in Aqua's bankruptcy schedules. The court also promised to add the administrative expenses and all other claims allowed against Aqua once those amounts were determined.

● The Ethical Dimension Was the Jacobsons' disregard for corporate formalities unethical? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension If the scope of the Jacobsons' business had been global, should the court have issued a different judgment? Explain.

The Commingling of Personal and Corporate Assets

The potential for corporate assets to be used for personal benefit is especially great in a close corporation, in which the shares are held by a single person or by only a few individuals, usually family members. In such a situation, the separate status of the corporate entity and the sole shareholder (or family-member shareholders) must be carefully preserved. Certain practices invite trouble for the one-person or family-owned corporation: the commingling of corporate and personal funds; the failure to remit taxes, including payroll and sales taxes; and the shareholders' continuous personal use of corporate property (for example, vehicles).

For example, Donald Park incorporated three sports companies—SSP, SSI, and SSII. His mother was the president of SSP and SSII but did not participate in their operations. Park handled most of the corporations' activities out of his apartment and drew funds from their accounts as needed to pay his personal expenses. None of the three corporations had any employees, issued stock or paid dividends, maintained corporate records, or followed other corporate formalities. Park—misrepresenting himself as the president of SSP and the vice president of SSII—obtained loans on behalf of SSP from Dimmitt & Owens Financial, Inc. When the loans were not paid, Dimmitt filed a suit in a federal district court, seeking, among other things, to impose personal liability on Park. Because Park had commingled corporate funds with his personal funds and failed to follow corporate formalities, the court “pierced the corporate veil” and held him personally responsible for the debt.¹⁰

Loans to the Corporation

Corporation laws usually do not specifically prohibit a shareholder from lending funds to her or his corporation. When an officer, director, or majority shareholder lends the corporation funds and takes back security in the form of corporate assets, however, the courts will scrutinize the transaction closely. Any such transaction must be made in good faith and for fair value.

Corporate Financing

Corporations are financed by the issuance and sale of corporate securities. Securities (stocks and bonds) evidence the obligation to pay funds or the right to participate in earnings and the distribution of corporate assets. Stocks, or equity securities, represent the purchase of ownership in the business firm. Bonds (debentures), or debt securities, represent the borrowing of funds by firms (and governments). Of course, not all debt is in the form of debt securities. For example, some debt is in the form of accounts payable and notes payable, which typically are short-term debts. Bonds are simply a way for corporations to split up their long-term debt so that they can market it more easily.

10. Dimmitt & Owens Financial, Inc. v. Superior Sports Products, Inc., 196 F.Supp.2d 731 (N.D.Ill. 2002).

Bonds

Bonds are issued by business firms and by governments at all levels as evidence of the funds they are borrowing from investors. Bonds almost always have a designated maturity date—the date when the principal, or face amount, of the bond (or loan) is returned to the investor—and are sometimes referred to as fixed-income securities because their owners receive fixed-dollar interest payments during the period of time prior to maturity.

The characteristics of corporate bonds vary widely, in part because corporations differ in their ability to generate the earnings and cash flow necessary to make interest payments and to repay the principal amount of the bonds at maturity. Furthermore, corporate bonds are only a part of the total debt and the overall financial structure of a corporate business. The different types of corporate bonds are described in Exhibit 38–3.

Stocks

Issuing stocks is another way for corporations to obtain financing [RMBCA 6.01]. The ways in which stocks differ from bonds are summarized in Exhibit 38–4 on page 790. Basically, stocks represent ownership in a business firm, whereas bonds represent borrowing by the firm.

Exhibit 38–5 on page 790 offers a summary of the types of stocks issued by corporations. The two major types are common stock and preferred stock.

EXHIBIT 38–3 • Types of Corporate Bonds

Type	Definition
Debenture Bonds	Bonds for which no specific assets of the corporation are pledged as backing. Rather, the bonds are backed by the general credit rating of the corporation, plus any assets that can be seized if the corporation allows the debentures to go into default.
Mortgage Bonds	Bonds that pledge specific property. If the corporation defaults on the bonds, the bondholders can foreclose on the property.
Convertible Bonds	Bonds that can be exchanged for a specified number of shares of stock under certain conditions.
Callable Bonds	Bonds that may be called in and the principal repaid at specified times or under conditions stipulated in the bonds when they are issued.

EXHIBIT 38-4 • How Do Stocks and Bonds Differ?

Stocks	Bonds
1. Stocks represent ownership.	1. Bonds represent debt.
2. Stocks (common) do not have a fixed dividend rate.	2. Interest on bonds must always be paid, whether or not any profit is earned.
3. Stockholders can elect the board of directors, which controls the corporation.	3. Bondholders usually have no voice in or control over management of the corporation.
4. Stocks do not have a maturity date; the corporation usually does not repay the stockholder.	4. Bonds have a maturity date, when the corporation is to repay the bondholder the face value of the bond.
5. All corporations issue or offer to sell stocks. This is the usual definition of a corporation.	5. Corporations do not necessarily issue bonds.
6. Stockholders have a claim against the property and income of the corporation after all creditors' claims have been met.	6. Bondholders have a claim against the property and income of the corporation that must be met before the claims of stockholders.

Common Stock The true ownership of a corporation is represented by common stock. Common stock provides a proportionate interest in the corporation with regard to (1) control, (2) earnings, and (3) net assets. A shareholder's interest is generally in proportion to the number of shares he or she owns out of the total number of shares issued.

Any person who purchases common stock acquires voting rights—one vote per share held. Voting rights in a corporation apply to the election of the

EXHIBIT 38-5 • Types of Stocks

Type	Definition
Common Stock	Voting shares that represent ownership interest in a corporation. Common stock has the lowest priority with respect to payment of dividends and distribution of assets on the corporation's dissolution.
Preferred Stock	Shares of stock that have priority over common-stock shares as to payment of dividends and distribution of assets on dissolution. Dividend payments are usually a fixed percentage of the face value of the share. Preferred shares may or may not be nonvoting shares.
Cumulative Preferred Stock	Preferred shares for which required dividends not paid in a given year must be paid in a subsequent year before any common-stock dividends can be paid.
Participating Preferred Stock	Preferred shares entitling the owner to receive (1) the preferred-stock dividend and (2) additional dividends after the corporation has paid dividends on common stock.
Convertible Preferred Stock	Preferred shares entitling the owner to convert his or her shares into a specified number of common shares either in the issuing corporation or, sometimes, in another corporation.
Redeemable, or Callable, Preferred Stock	Preferred shares issued with the express condition that the issuing corporation has the right to repurchase the shares as specified.

firm's board of directors and to any proposed changes in the ownership structure of the firm. For example, a holder of common stock generally has the right to vote in a decision on a proposed merger, as mergers can change the proportion of ownership. State corporation law specifies the types of actions for which shareholder approval must be obtained.

Holders of common stock are investors who assume a residual position in the overall financial structure of the business. In terms of receiving returns on their investments, they are last in line. They are entitled to earnings only after the corporation pays all other groups—suppliers, employees, managers, bankers, governments, bondholders, and holders of preferred stock—what is due them. Once those groups are paid, the owners of common stock may be entitled to all the remaining earnings. (The board of directors normally is not under any duty to declare the remaining earnings as dividends, however.)

Preferred Stock Preferred stock is an equity security with preferences. Usually, this means that holders of preferred stock have priority over holders of common stock as to dividends and to payment on dissolution of the corporation. The preferences must be stated in the articles of incorporation. Preferred stockholders may or may not have the right to vote. Sometimes, there is more than one class of preferred stock (see Exhibit 38-5), and one class is given preferences over another class.

Preferred stock is not included among the liabilities of a business because it is equity. Like other equity securities, preferred shares have no fixed maturity date on which the firm must pay them off. Although firms occasionally buy back preferred stock, they are not legally obligated to do so. Investors who hold preferred stock have assumed a rather cautious position in their relationship to the corporation. They have a stronger position than common shareholders with respect to dividends and claims on assets, but they will not share in the full prosperity of the firm if it grows successfully over time. This is because preferred shares will not rise as rapidly in value as common shares during a period of financial success. Preferred stockholders do receive fixed dividends periodically, however, and they may benefit to some extent from changes in the market price of the shares.

From an investment standpoint, preferred stock is more similar to bonds than to common stock, even though preferred stock appears in the ownership section of the firm's balance sheet. As a result, preferred stock is often categorized with corporate bonds as a fixed-income security, even though the legal status is not the same.

Venture Capital and Private Equity Capital

As discussed, corporations traditionally obtain financing through issuing and selling securities (stocks and bonds) in the capital market. In reality, however, many investors do not want to purchase stock in a business that lacks a track record, and banks are generally reluctant to extend loans to high-risk enterprises. Numerous corporations fail because they are undercapitalized. Therefore, to obtain sufficient financing, many entrepreneurs seek alternative financing.

Venture Capital Start-up businesses and high-risk enterprises often obtain venture capital financing. Venture capital is capital provided by professional, outside investors (venture capitalists, usually groups of wealthy investors and investment banks) to new business ventures. Venture capital investments are high risk—the investors must be willing to lose their invested funds—but offer the potential for well-above-average returns at some point in the future.

To obtain venture capital financing, the start-up business typically gives up a share of its ownership to the venture capitalists. In addition to funding, venture capitalists may provide managerial and technical expertise, and nearly always are given some control over the new company's decisions. Many Internet-based companies, such as Google and Amazon, were initially financed by venture capital.

Private Equity Capital In recent years, private equity firms have been playing a larger role in corporate financing. These firms obtain their capital from wealthy investors in private markets—hence, the name private equity. The firms use their private equity capital to invest in existing—often, publicly traded—corporations. Usually, they buy an entire corporation and then reorganize it. Sometimes, divisions of the purchased company are sold off to pay down debt. Ultimately, the private equity firm may sell shares in the reorganized (and perhaps more profitable) company to the public in an initial public offering (usually called and IPO—see Chapter 41). In this way, the private equity firm can make profits by selling its shares in the company to the public. When DaimlerChrysler wanted to sell its less-than-successful Chrysler division, it sold 80 percent of it to the private equity firm Cerberus Capital Management, LP.

Locating Potential Investors Online

Today, the Internet allows anyone to access, easily and inexpensively, a large number of potential investors. A number of online “matching services” are available to match potential investors with companies or future companies that are seeking investors. Online matching services enable entrepreneurs to reach a wide group of potential investors quickly and with relatively little effort. An incorporator or a small company seeking capital investment can pay a fee to one of these services, which will then include a description of the company in a list that it makes available to investors, also for a fee.

Some matching services specialize in matching entrepreneurs in specific industries with potential investors. Other services focus on matching start-up companies with foreign investors or restrict their operations to firms within a certain region, such as the Pacific Northwest. These companies sometimes also assist businesspersons in creating effective business plans or managing financial issues.

REVIEWING CORPORATIONS—Formation and Financing

William Sharp was the sole shareholder and manager of Chickasaw Club, Inc., an S corporation that operated a popular nightclub of the same name in Columbus, Georgia.

Sharp maintained a corporate checking account but paid the club’s employees, suppliers, and entertainers in cash out of the club’s proceeds. Sharp owned the property on which the club was located. He rented it to the club but made mortgage payments out of the club’s proceeds and often paid other personal expenses with Chickasaw corporate funds. At 12:45 A.M. on July 31, 2005, eighteen-year-old Aubrey Lynn Pursley, who was already intoxicated, entered the Chickasaw Club. A city ordinance prohibited individuals under the age of twenty-one from entering nightclubs, but Chickasaw employees did not check Pursley’s identification to verify her age. Pursley drank more alcohol at Chickasaw and was visibly intoxicated when she left the club at 3:00 A.M. with a beer in her hand. Shortly afterward, Pursley lost control of her car, struck a tree, and was killed. Joseph Dancause, Pursley’s stepfather, filed a tort lawsuit in a Georgia state court against Chickasaw Club, Inc., and William Sharp, seeking damages. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under what theory might the court in this case make an exception to the limited liability of shareholders and hold Sharp personally liable for the damages? What factors would be relevant to the court’s decision?
2. Suppose that Chickasaw’s articles of incorporation failed to describe the corporation’s purpose or management structure as required by state law. Would the court be likely to rule that Sharp is personally liable to Dancause on that basis?
3. Suppose that the club extended credit to its regular patrons in an effort to maintain a loyal clientele, although neither the articles of incorporation nor the corporate bylaws authorized this practice. Would the corporation likely have the power to engage in this activity? Explain.
4. How would the court classify the Chickasaw Club corporation—domestic or foreign, public or private?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

38-1. Jonathan, Gary, and Ricardo are active members of a partnership called Swim City. The partnership manufactures, sells, and installs outdoor swimming pools in the states of Arkansas and Texas. The partners want to continue to be active in management and to expand the business into other states as well. They are also concerned about rather large recent judgments entered against swimming pool companies throughout the United States. Based on these facts only, discuss whether the partnership should incorporate.

38-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Cummings, Okawa, and Taft are recent college graduates who want to form a corporation to manufacture and sell personal computers. Peterson tells them he will set in motion the formation of their corporation. First, Peterson makes a contract with Owens for the purchase of a piece of land for $20,000. Owens does not know of the prospective corporate formation at the time the contract is signed. Second, Peterson makes a contract with Babcock to build a small plant on the property being purchased. Babcock's contract is conditional on the corporation's formation. Peterson secures all necessary subscription agreements and capitalization, and he files the articles of incorporation. A charter is issued.

- (a) Discuss whether the newly formed corporation, Peterson, or both are liable on the contracts with Owens and Babcock.
- (b) Discuss whether the corporation is automatically liable to Babcock on formation.

- For a sample answer to Question 38-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

38-3. Oya Paka and two business associates formed a corporation called Paka Corp. for the purpose of selling computer services. Oya, who owned 50 percent of the corporate shares, served as the corporation's president. Oya wished to obtain a personal loan from her bank for $250,000, but the bank required the note to be cosigned by a third party. Oya cosigned the note in the name of the corporation. Later, Oya defaulted on the note, and the bank sued the corporation for payment. The corporation asserted, as a defense, that Oya had exceeded her authority when she cosigned the note on behalf of the corporation. Had she? Explain.

38-4. Disregarding the Corporate Entity. Steven and Janis Gimbert leased a warehouse to a manufacturing business owned by Manzar Zuberi. Zuberi signed the lease as the purported representative of "ATM Manufacturing, Inc.," which was a nonexistent corporation. Zuberi was actually the president of two existing corporations, ATM Enterprises, Inc., and Ameri-Pak International. Under the Ameri-Pak name, Zuberi manufactured a household cleaning product in the Gimberts' warehouse. The hydrochloric acid used in the operations severely damaged the premises, and the Gimberts filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Zuberi personally to collect for the damage. On what basis might Zuberi be held personally liable? Discuss fully. [Zuberi v. Gimbert, 230 Ga.App. 471, 496 S.E.2d 741 (1998)]

38-5. Corporate Powers. InterBel Telephone Cooperative, Inc., is a Montana corporation organized under the Montana Rural Electric and Telephone Cooperative Act. This statute limits the purposes of such corporations to providing "adequate telephone service" but adds that this "enumeration . . . shall not be deemed to exclude like or similar objects, purposes, powers, manners, methods, or things." Mooseweb Corp. is an Internet service provider that has been owned and operated by Fred Weber since 1996. Mooseweb provides Web site hosting, modems, computer installation, technical support, and dial-up access to customers in Lincoln County, Montana. InterBel began to offer Internet service in 1999, competing with Mooseweb in Lincoln County. Weber filed a suit in a Montana state court against InterBel, alleging that its Internet service was ultra vires. Both parties filed motions for summary judgment. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Weber v. InterBel Telephone Cooperative, Inc., 2003 MT 320, 318 Mont. 295, 80 P.3d 88 (2003)]

38-6. Torts and Criminal Acts. Greg Allen is an employee, shareholder, and director of Greg Allen Construction Co., and its president. In 1996, Daniel and Sondra Estelle hired Allen's firm to renovate a home they owned in Ladoga, Indiana. To finance the cost, they obtained a line of credit from Banc One, Indiana, which required periodic inspections before it would disburse funds. Allen was on the job every day and supervised all of the work. He designed all of the structural changes, including a floor system for the bedroom over the living room, the floor system of the living room, and the stairway to the second floor. He did all of the electrical, plumbing, and carpentry work and installed all of the windows. He did most of the drywall taping and finishing and most of the painting. The Estelles found much of this work to be unacceptable, and the bank's inspector agreed that it was of poor quality. When Allen failed to act on the Estelles' complaints, they filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Allen Construction and Allen personally, alleging, in part, that his individual work on the project was negligent. Can both Allen and his corporation be held liable for this tort? Explain. [Greg Allen Construction Co. v. Estelle, 798 N.E.2d 171 (Ind. 2004)]

38-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Thomas Persson and Jon Nokes founded Smart Inventions, Inc., in 1991 to market household consumer products. The success of their first product, the Smart Mop, continued with later products, which were sold through infomercials and other means. Persson and Nokes were the firm's officers and equal shareholders, with Persson responsible for product development and Nokes in charge of day-to-day operations. By 1998, they had become dissatisfied with each other's efforts. Nokes represented the firm as financially "dying," "in a grim state, . . . worse than ever," and offered to buy all of Persson's shares for $1.6 million. Persson accepted. On the day that they signed the agreement to transfer the shares, Smart Inventions began marketing a new product—the Tap Light—which was an instant success, generating millions of dollars in revenues. In negotiating with Persson, Nokes had intentionally kept the Tap Light a secret. Persson filed a suit in a California state court against Smart Inventions and others, asserting fraud and other claims. Under what principle might Smart Inventions be liable for Nokes's fraud? Is Smart Inventions liable in this case? Explain. [Persson v. Smart Inventions, Inc., 125 Cal.App.4th 1141, 23 Cal.Rptr.3d 335 (2 Dist. 2005)]

38-8. Improper Incorporation. Denise Rubenstein and Christopher Mayor agreed to form Bayshore Sunrise Corp. (BSC) in New York to rent certain premises and operate a laundromat. BSC entered into a twenty-year commercial lease with Bay Shore Property Trust on April 15, 1999. Mayor signed the lease as the president of BSC. The next day—April 16—BSC's certificate of incorporation was filed with New York's secretary of state. Three years later, BSC defaulted on the lease, which resulted in its termination. Rubenstein and BSC filed a suit in a New York state court against Mayor, his brother-in-law Thomas Castellano, and Planet Laundry, Inc., claiming wrongful interference with a contractual relationship. The plaintiffs alleged that Mayor and Castellano conspired to squeeze Rubenstein out of BSC and arranged the default on the lease so that Mayor and Castellano could form and operate their own business, Planet Laundry, at the same address. The defendants argued that they could not be liable on the plaintiffs' claim because there had never been an enforceable lease—BSC lacked the capacity to enter into contracts on April 15. What theory might Rubenstein and BSC assert to refute this argument? Discuss. [Rubenstein v. Mayor, 41 A.D.3d 826, 839 N.Y.S.2d 170 (2 Dept. 2007)]

38-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Mike Lyons incorporated Lyons Concrete, Inc., in Montana, but did not file its first annual report, so the state involuntarily dissolved the firm in 1996. Unaware of the dissolution, Lyons continued to do business as Lyons Concrete. In 2003, he signed a written contract with William Weimar to form and pour a certain amount of concrete on Weimar's property in Lake County for $19,810. Weimar was in a rush to complete the entire project, and he and Lyons orally agreed to additional work on a time-and-materials basis. When scheduling conflicts arose, Weimar had his own employees set some of the forms, which proved deficient. Weimar also directed Lyons to pour concrete in the rain, which undercut its quality. In mid-project, Lyons submitted an invoice for $14,389, which Weimar paid. After the work was complete, Lyons invoiced Weimar for $25,731, but he refused to pay, claiming that the $14,389 covered everything. To recover the unpaid amount, Lyons filed a mechanic's lien as "Mike Lyons d/b/a Lyons Concrete, Inc." against Weimar's property. Weimar filed a suit in a Montana state court to strike the lien, which Lyons filed a counterclaim to reassert. [Weimar v. Lyons, 338 Mont. 242, 164 P.3d 922 (2007)]

- Before the trial, Weimar asked for a change of venue on the ground that a sign on the courthouse lawn advertised "Lyons Concrete." How might the sign affect a trial on the parties' dispute? Should the court grant this request?
- Weimar asked the court to dismiss the counterclaim on the ground that the state had dissolved Lyons Concrete in 1996. Lyons immediately filed new articles of incorporation for "Lyons Concrete, Inc." Under what doctrine might the court rule that Weimar could not deny the existence of Lyons Concrete? What ethical values underlie this doctrine? Should the court make this ruling?
- At the trial, Weimar argued in part that there was no "fixed price" contract between the parties and that even if there was, the poor quality of the work, which required repairs, amounted to a breach, excusing Weimar's further performance. Should the court rule in Weimar's favor on this basis?

CORPORATIONS— Directors, Officers, and Shareholders

A corporation joins the efforts and resources of a large number of individuals for the purpose of producing greater returns than those persons could have obtained individually. Corporate directors, officers, and shareholders all play different roles within the corporate entity. Sometimes, actions that may benefit the corporation as a whole do not coincide with the separate interests of the individuals making up the corporation. In such situations, it is important to know the rights and duties of all participants in the corporate enterprise. This chapter focuses on these rights and duties and the ways in which conflicts among corporate participants are resolved.

Roles of Directors and Officers

The board of directors is the ultimate authority in every corporation. Directors have responsibility for all policymaking decisions necessary to the management of all corporate affairs. Just as shareholders cannot act individually to bind the corporation, the directors must act as a body in carrying out routine corporate business. The board selects and removes the corporate officers, determines the capital structure of the corporation, and declares dividends. Each director has one vote, and customarily the majority rules. The general areas of responsibility of the board of directors are shown in Exhibit 39-1.

Directors are sometimes inappropriately characterized as agents because they act on behalf of the corporation. No individual director, however, can act as an agent to bind the corporation; and as a group, directors collectively control the corporation in a way that no agent is able to control a principal. In addition, although directors occupy positions of trust and control over the corporation, they are not trustees because they do not hold title to property for the use and benefit of others.

Few qualifications are required for directors. Only a handful of states impose minimum age and residency requirements. A director may be a shareholder, but that is not necessary (unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws require ownership).

Election of Directors

Subject to statutory limitations, the number of directors is set forth in the corporation's articles or bylaws. Historically, the minimum number of directors has been three, but today many states permit fewer. Normally, the incorporators appoint the first board of directors at the time the corporation is created, or the corporation itself names the directors in the articles. The initial board serves until the first annual shareholders' meeting. Subsequent directors are elected by a majority vote of the shareholders.

A director usually serves for a term of one year—from annual meeting to annual meeting. Longer and staggered terms are permissible under most state statutes. A common practice is to elect one-third of the board members each year for a three-year term. In this way, there is greater management continuity.

Removal of Directors A director can be removed for cause—that is, for failing to perform a required duty—either as specified in the articles or bylaws or by shareholder action. Even the board of directors itself may be given power to remove a director for cause, subject to shareholder review. In most states, a director cannot be removed without cause unless the shareholders have reserved the right to do so at the time of election.

Whether shareholders should be able to remove a director without cause is part of an ongoing debate about the balance of power between a corporation and its shareholders. It is also the pivotal question at the heart of the battle for corporate control in the following case.

EXTENDED Relational Investors, LLC v. Sovereign Bancorp, Inc.

CASE 39.1 United States District Court, Southern District of New York, 2006. 417 F.Supp.2d 438.

ALVIN K. HELLERSTEIN, District Judge.

* * * *

In June of 2004, Relational [Investors, LLC] * * * began acquiring a significant equity stake in Sovereign [Bancorp, Inc., a Pennsylvania firm], accumulating approximately 8 percent of Sovereign's issued and outstanding common stock, and becoming Sovereign's largest shareholder. In late 2004 and early 2005, Relational began to express dissatisfaction about Sovereign's management and, in May 2005, disclosed that it would seek representation on Sovereign's board at the 2006 annual meeting scheduled to be held in April. Under the terms of Sovereign's classified board structure, two of the six incumbent directors are to stand for re-election at the 2006 annual meeting * * * .

In the immediate wake of Relational's announcement, Sovereign announced, on October 24, 2005, that it had reached * * * [an] agreement with Santander [Central Hispano, S.A., a bank incorporated under the laws of Spain] pursuant to which Santander is scheduled to purchase 19.8 percent of Sovereign's common stock for approximately $2.4 billion.

* * * *

Shortly thereafter, on December 22, 2005, Relational announced that it intended to seek to remove Sovereign's entire board at the next shareholder meeting. Following Relational's December

22 announcement, Sovereign filed its complaint [in a federal district court against Relational] seeking a declaration that its board could be removed only for cause * * * .

* * * Relational filed * * * [a] motion for judgment [on the pleadings] declaring that removal of Sovereign’s directors could be effected without cause.

At the time of Sovereign’s incorporation in 1987, Pennsylvania law expressly provided for the removal of directors without cause. [Section 1405(a) of the] Pennsylvania Business Corporation Law (“PaBCL”), as enacted in 1933, provided that “the entire board of directors, * * * or any individual director may be removed from office without assigning any cause.”

Subsequently, as concerns about hostile corporate takeovers grew, several states began enacting legislation to limit the ability of shareholders to remove directors * * * .

It was within this climate * * * that the Pennsylvania legislature repealed [Section] 1405(a) in order to limit the ability of shareholders to remove directors without cause to situations where the company’s charter and by-laws permitted such actions. Section 1726(a)(1) of the 1988 PaBCL * * * [provided]:

Unless otherwise provided in a bylaw adopted by the shareholders, the entire board of directors, * * * or any individual director of a business corporation may be removed from office without assigning any cause by the vote of shareholders * * * . Notwithstanding the first sentence of this paragraph, unless otherwise provided in the articles, the entire board of directors, * * * or any individual director of a corporation * * * , may be removed from office by vote of the shareholders entitled to vote thereon only for cause * * * .

*Thus, under the terms of the statute as amended in 1989, and as in effect at the time that Relational filed its * * * [complaint], the presumption was that removal of a director * * * could be effected only for cause, absent indication to the contrary in the articles of incorporation. [Emphasis added.]*

* * * Relational [argues] * * * that * * * Sovereign’s Articles clearly and unambiguously allow for removal without cause. * * *

* * * Article Eighth [of Sovereign’s articles of incorporation] sets out the applicable standard for removal of Sovereign’s directors. It provides, simply and clearly, that a majority vote of qualified shareholders may remove directors from office:

No director of the Corporation shall be removed from office as a director, by the vote of shareholders, unless the votes of shareholders cast in favor of the resolution for the removal of such director constitute at least a majority of the votes which all shareholders would be entitled to cast at an annual election of directors.

* * * Sovereign contends that, since the language of Article Eighth was adopted prior to enactment of [Section] 1726(a)(1), it could not have been intended as an “opt out” to the revised statute which thereafter provided for a presumption of removal only for cause. [This argument is] without merit. The plain language of Article Eighth, and an analysis of the law in effect at the time of its enactment in 1987, makes clear that the original Articles of Incorporation provided for removal without cause. The enactment of [Section] 1726(a)(1) did not alter this original intent.

* * * Relational’s [motion] for judgment on the pleadings is granted.

QUESTIONS

- 1. What does this case indicate about the importance of corporate articles and bylaws with respect to corporate governance?
2. If you could dictate a corporation’s rule with respect to the removal of its directors, what would you prescribe? Why?

Vacancies on the Board of Directors

Vacancies can occur on the board of directors because of death or resignation or when a new position is created through amendment of the articles or bylaws. In these situations, either the shareholders or the board itself can fill the position, depending on state law or on the provisions of the bylaws. Note, however, that even when the bylaws appear to authorize an election, a court can invalidate an election if the directors were attempting to diminish the shareholders' influence in it.

For example, the bylaws of Liquid Audio, a Delaware corporation, authorized a board of five directors. Two directors on the board were elected each year. Another company had offered to buy all of Liquid Audio's stock, but the board of directors rejected this offer. An election was coming up, and the directors feared that the shareholders would elect new directors who would go through with the sale. The directors therefore amended the bylaws to increase the number of directors to seven, thereby diminishing the shareholders' influence in the vote. The shareholders filed an action challenging the election. The Delaware Supreme Court ruled that the directors' action was illegal because they had attempted to diminish the shareholders' right to vote effectively in an election of directors.¹

Compensation of Directors

In the past, corporate directors rarely were compensated, but today they are often paid at least nominal sums and may receive more substantial compensation in large corporations because of the time, work, effort, and especially risk involved. Most states permit the corporate articles or bylaws to authorize compensation for directors. In fact, the Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) states that unless the articles or bylaws provide otherwise, the board of directors may set their own compensation [RMBCA 8.11]. Directors also gain through indirect benefits, such as business contacts and prestige, and other rewards, such as stock options.

In many corporations, directors are also chief corporate officers (president or chief executive officer, for example) and receive compensation in their managerial positions. A director who is also an officer of the corporation is referred to as an inside director, whereas a director who does not hold a management position is an outside director. Typically, a corporation's board of directors includes both inside and outside directors.

Board of Directors' Meetings

The board of directors conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. The dates of regular meetings are usually established in the articles or bylaws or by board resolution, and no further notice is customarily required. Special meetings can be called, with notice sent to all directors. Today, most states allow directors to participate in board of directors' meetings from remote locations via telephone or Web conferencing, provided that all the directors can simultaneously hear each other during the meeting [RMBCA 8.20].

Unless the articles of incorporation or bylaws specify a greater number, a majority of the board of directors normally constitutes a quorum [RMBCA 8.24]. (A quorum is the minimum number of members of a body of officials or other group that must be present for business to be validly transacted.) Some state statutes specifically allow corporations to set a quorum as less than a majority, but not less than one-third of the directors.²

Once a quorum is present, the directors transact business and vote on issues affecting the corporation. Each director present at the meeting has one vote.³ Ordinary matters generally require a simple majority vote; certain extraordinary issues may require a greater-than-majority vote. In other words, the affirmative vote of a majority of the directors present at a meeting binds the board of directors with regard to most decisions.

Rights of Directors

A corporate director must have certain rights to function properly in that position. The right to participation means that directors are entitled to participate in all board of directors' meetings and have a right to be notified of these meetings. As mentioned earlier, the dates of regular board meetings are usually preestablished and no notice of these meetings is required. If special meetings are called, however, notice is required unless waived by the director [RMBCA 8.23].

A director also has a right of inspection, which means that each director can access the corporation's books and records, facilities, and premises. Inspection rights are essential for directors to make informed decisions and to exercise the necessary supervision over corporate officers and employees. This right of inspection is virtually absolute and cannot be restricted (by the articles, bylaws, or any act of the board of directors).

When a director becomes involved in litigation by virtue of her or his position or actions, the director may also have a right to indemnification (reimbursement) for the legal costs, fees, and damages incurred. Most states allow corporations to indemnify and purchase liability insurance for corporate directors [RMBCA 8.51].

Committees of the Board of Directors

When a board of directors has a large number of members and must deal with a myriad of complex business issues, meetings can become unwieldy. Therefore, the boards of large, publicly held corporations typically create committees, appoint directors to serve on individual committees, and delegate certain tasks to these committees. Committees focus on individual subjects and increase the efficiency of the board. The most common types of committees include the following:

1. Executive committee. The board members often elect an executive committee of directors to handle the interim management decisions between board of directors' meetings. The executive committee is limited to making management decisions about ordinary business matters and conducting preliminary investigations into proposals. It cannot declare dividends, authorize the issuance of shares, amend the bylaws, or initiate any actions that require shareholder approval.
2. Audit committee. The audit committee is responsible for the selection, compensation, and oversight of the independent public accountants who audit the corporation's financial records. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 requires all publicly held corporations to have an audit committee (as discussed in Chapters 41 and 51).
3. Nominating committee. This committee chooses the candidates for the board of directors that management wishes to submit to the shareholders in the next election. The committee cannot select directors to fill vacancies on the board, however [RMBCA 8.25].

4. Compensation committee. The compensation committee reviews and decides the salaries, bonuses, stock options, and other benefits that are given to the corporation's top executives. The committee may also determine the compensation of directors.
5. Litigation committee. This committee decides whether the corporation should pursue requests by shareholders to file a lawsuit against some party that has allegedly harmed the corporation. The committee members investigate the allegations and weigh the costs and benefits of litigation.

In addition to appointing committees, the board of directors can also delegate some of its functions to corporate officers. In doing so, the board is not relieved of its overall responsibility for directing the affairs of the corporation. Instead, corporate officers and managerial personnel are empowered to make decisions relating to ordinary, daily corporate activities within well-defined guidelines.

Corporate Officers and Executives

Officers and other executive employees are hired by the board of directors. At a minimum, most corporations have a president, one or more vice presidents, a secretary, and a treasurer. In most states, an individual can hold more than one office, such as president and secretary, and can be both an officer and a director of the corporation. In addition to carrying out the duties articulated in the bylaws, corporate and managerial officers act as agents of the corporation, and the ordinary rules of agency (discussed in Chapters 31 and 32) normally apply to their employment.

Corporate officers and other high-level managers are employees of the company, so their rights are defined by employment contracts. Regardless of the terms of an employment contract, however, the board of directors normally can remove a corporate officer at any time with or without cause—although the officer may then seek damages from the corporation for breach of contract.

The duties of corporate officers are the same as those of directors because both groups are involved in decision making and are in similar positions of control. Hence, officers and directors are viewed as having the same fiduciary duties of care and loyalty in their conduct of corporate affairs, a subject to which we now turn. For a synopsis of the roles of directors and officers, see Concept Summary 39.1.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 39.1

Roles of Directors and Officers

Aspect	Description
ELECTION OF DIRECTORS	The incorporators usually appoint the first board of directors; thereafter, shareholders elect the directors. Directors usually serve a one-year term, although the term can be longer. Few qualifications are required; a director can be a shareholder but is not required to be. Compensation is usually specified in the corporate articles or bylaws.
BOARD OF DIRECTORS' MEETINGS	The board of directors conducts business by holding formal meetings with recorded minutes. The dates of regular meetings are usually established in the corporate articles or bylaws; special meetings can be called, with notice sent to all directors. Usually, a quorum is a majority of the corporate directors. Once a quorum is present, each director has one vote, and the majority normally rules in ordinary matters.
RIGHTS OF DIRECTORS	Directors' rights include the rights of participation, inspection, compensation, and indemnification.
BOARD OF DIRECTORS' COMMITTEES	Directors may appoint committees and delegate some of their responsibilities to the committees and to corporate officers and executives. Common committees include the executive committee , which handles ordinary, interim management decisions between board of directors' meetings; the audit committee , which hires and supervises the independent public accountants who audit the corporation's financial records; the nominating committee , which chooses the candidates for the board of directors to be put to a shareholder vote; the compensation committee , which reviews and decides management's salaries, bonuses, stock options, and other benefits; and the litigation committee , which decides whether the corporation should pursue lawsuits requested by the shareholders.
ROLE OF CORPORATE OFFICERS AND EXECUTIVES	The board of directors normally hires the corporate officers and other executive employees. In most states, a person can hold more than one office and can be both an officer and a director of a corporation. The rights of corporate officers and executives are defined by employment contracts.

Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers

Directors and officers are deemed to be fiduciaries of the corporation because their relationship with the corporation and its shareholders is one of trust and confidence. As fiduciaries, directors and officers owe ethical—and legal—duties to the corporation and the shareholders as a whole. These fiduciary duties include the duty of care and the duty of loyalty.

Duty of Care

Directors and officers must exercise due care in performing their duties. The standard of due care has been variously described in judicial decisions and codified in many corporation codes. Generally, directors and officers are required to act in good faith, to exercise the care that an ordinarily prudent person would exercise in similar circumstances, and to do what they believe is in the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 8.30(a), 8.42(a)]. Directors and officers whose failure to exercise due care results in harm to the corporation or its shareholders can be held liable for negligence (unless the business judgment rule applies).

Duty to Make Informed and Reasonable Decisions

Directors and officers are expected to be informed on corporate matters and to conduct a reasonable investigation of the situation before making a decision. This means that they must do what is necessary to keep adequately informed: attend meetings and presentations, ask for information from those who have it, read reports, and review other written materials. In other words, directors and officers must investigate, study, and discuss matters and evaluate alternatives before making a decision. They cannot decide on the spur of the moment without adequate research.

Although directors and officers are expected to act in accordance with their own knowledge and training, they are also normally entitled to rely on information given to them by certain other persons. Most states and Section 8.30(b) of the RMBCA allow a director to make decisions in reliance on information furnished by competent officers or employees, professionals such as attorneys and accountants, and committees of the board of directors (on which the director does not serve). The reliance must be in good faith, of course, to insulate a director from liability if the information later proves to be inaccurate or unreliable.

Duty to Exercise Reasonable Supervision

Directors are also expected to exercise a reasonable amount of supervision when they delegate work to corporate officers and employees. Suppose that Dale, a corporate bank director, fails to attend any board of directors' meetings for five years. In addition, Dale never inspects any of the corporate books or records and generally fails to supervise the efforts of the bank president and the loan committee. Meanwhile, Brennan, the bank president, who is a corporate officer, makes various improper loans and permits large overdrafts. In this situation, Dale (the corporate director) can be held liable to the corporation for losses resulting from the unsupervised actions of the bank president and the loan committee.

Dissenting Directors Directors are expected to attend board of directors' meetings, and their votes should be entered into the minutes. Sometimes, an individual director disagrees with the majority's vote (which becomes an act of the board of directors). Unless a dissent is entered in the minutes, the director is presumed to have assented. If a decision later leads to the directors being held liable for mismanagement, dissenting directors are rarely held individually liable to the corporation. For this reason, a director who is absent from a given meeting sometimes registers with the secretary of the board a dissent to actions taken at the meeting.

The Business Judgment Rule Directors and officers are expected to exercise due care and to use their best judgment in guiding corporate management, but they are not insurers of business success. Under the business judgment rule, a corporate director or officer will not be liable to the corporation or to its shareholders for honest mistakes of judgment and bad business decisions. Courts give significant deference to the decisions of corporate directors and officers, and consider the reasonableness of a decision at the time it was made, without the benefit of hindsight. Thus, corporate decision makers are not subjected to second-guessing by shareholders or others in the corporation.

The business judgment rule will apply as long as the director or officer (1) took reasonable steps to become informed about the matter, (2) had a rational basis for his or her decision, and (3) did not have a conflict of interest between his or her personal interest and that of the corporation. In fact, unless there is evidence of bad faith, fraud, or a clear breach of fiduciary duties, most courts will apply the rule and protect directors and officers who make bad business decisions from liability for those choices. Consequently, if there is a reasonable basis for a business decision, a court is unlikely to interfere with that decision, even if the corporation suffers as a result.

Duty of Loyalty

Loyalty can be defined as faithfulness to one's obligations and duties. In the corporate context, the duty of loyalty requires directors and officers to subordinate their personal interests to the welfare of the corporation.

For example, directors may not use corporate funds or confidential corporate information for personal advantage. Similarly, they must refrain from putting their personal interests above those of the corporation. For instance, a director should not oppose a transaction that is in the corporation's best interest simply because pursuing it may cost the director her or his position. Cases dealing with the duty of loyalty typically involve one or more of the following:

1. Competing with the corporation.
2. Usurping (taking personal advantage of) a corporate opportunity.
3. Having an interest that conflicts with the interest of the corporation.
4. Engaging in insider trading (using information that is not public to make a profit trading securities, as discussed in Chapter 41).

5. Authorizing a corporate transaction that is detrimental to minority shareholders.
6. Selling control over the corporation.

The following classic case illustrates the conflict that can arise between a corporate official's personal interest and his or her duty of loyalty.

CASE 39.2 Guth v. Loft, Inc.

Supreme Court of Delaware, 1939. 23 Del.Ch. 255, 5 A.2d 503.

● Background and Facts Loft, Inc., made and sold candies, syrups, beverages, and food from its offices and plant in Long Island City, New York. Loft operated 115 retail outlets in several states and also sold its products wholesale. Charles Guth was Loft's president. Guth and his family owned Grace Company, which made syrups for soft drinks in a plant in Baltimore, Maryland. Coca-Cola Company supplied Loft with cola syrup. Unhappy with what he felt was Coca-Cola's high price, Guth entered into an agreement with Roy Megargel to acquire the trademark and formula for Pepsi-Cola and form Pepsi-Cola Corporation. Neither Guth nor Megargel could finance the new venture, however, and Grace was insolvent. Without the knowledge of Loft's board, Guth used Loft's capital, credit, facilities, and employees to further the Pepsi enterprise. At Guth's direction, Loft made the concentrate for the syrup, which was sent to Grace to add sugar and water. Loft charged Grace for the concentrate but allowed forty months' credit. Grace charged Pepsi for the syrup but also granted substantial credit. Grace sold the syrup to Pepsi's customers, including Loft, which paid on delivery or within thirty days. Loft also paid for Pepsi's advertising. Finally, losing profits at its stores as a result of switching from Coca-Cola, Loft filed a suit in a Delaware state court against Guth, Grace, and Pepsi, seeking their Pepsi stock and an accounting. The court entered a judgment in the plaintiff's favor. The defendants appealed to the Delaware Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

LAYTON, Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the Court:

* * * *

Corporate officers and directors are not permitted to use their position of trust and confidence to further their private interests. * * * [T]hey stand in a fiduciary relation to the corporation and its stockholders. A public policy, existing through the years, and derived from a profound knowledge of human characteristics and motives, has established a rule that demands of a corporate officer or director, peremptorily [not open for debate] and inexorably [unavoidably], the most scrupulous observance of his duty, not only affirmatively to protect the interests of the corporation committed to his charge, but also to refrain from doing anything that would work injury to the corporation * * *. The rule that requires an undivided and unselfish loyalty to the corporation demands that there shall be no conflict between duty and self-interest. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [I]f there is presented to a corporate officer or director a business opportunity which the corporation is financially able to undertake [that] is * * * in the line of the corporation's business and is of practical advantage to it * * * and, by embracing the opportunity, the self-interest of the officer or director will be brought into conflict with that of his corporation, the law will not permit him to seize the opportunity for himself. * * * In such circumstances, * * * the corporation may elect to claim all of the benefits of the transaction for itself, and the law will impress a trust in favor of the corporation upon the property, interests and profits so acquired. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * The appellants contend that no conflict of interest between Guth and Loft resulted from his acquirement and exploitation of the Pepsi-Cola opportunity [and] that the acquisition did not place Guth in competition with Loft * * *. [In this case, however,] Guth was Loft, and Guth was Pepsi. He absolutely controlled Loft. His authority over Pepsi was supreme. As Pepsi, he created and controlled the supply of Pepsi-Cola syrup, and he determined the price and the terms. What he offered, as Pepsi, he had the power, as Loft, to accept. Upon any consideration of human characteristics and motives, he created a conflict between self-interest and duty. He made himself the judge in his own cause. * * * Moreover, a reasonable probability of injury to Loft resulted from the situation forced upon it. Guth was in the same position to impose his terms upon Loft as had been the Coca-Cola Company.

* * * The facts and circumstances demonstrate that Guth's appropriation of the Pepsi-Cola opportunity to himself placed him in a competitive position with Loft with respect to a commodity essential to it, thereby rendering his personal interests incompatible with the superior interests of his corporation; and this situation was accomplished, not openly and with his own resources, but secretly and with the money and facilities of the corporation which was committed to his protection.

● Decision and Remedy The Delaware Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the lower court. The state supreme court was "convinced that the opportunity to acquire the Pepsi-Cola trademark and formula, goodwill and business belonged to [Loft], and that Guth, as its President, had no right to appropriate the opportunity to himself."

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law This early Delaware decision was one of the first to set forth a test for determining when a corporate officer or director has breached the duty of loyalty. The test has two basic parts—whether the opportunity was reasonably related to the corporation's line of business, and whether the corporation was financially able to undertake the opportunity. The court also considered whether the corporation had an interest or expectancy in the opportunity and recognized that when the corporation had "no interest or expectancy, the officer or director is entitled to treat the opportunity as his own."

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Loft's board of directors had approved Pepsi-Cola's use of its personnel and equipment. Would the court's decision have been different? Discuss.

Conflicts of Interest

Corporate directors often have many business affiliations, and a director may sit on the board of more than one corporation. Of course, directors are precluded from entering into or supporting businesses that operate in direct competition with corporations on whose boards they serve. Their fiduciary duty requires them to make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts of interest that might arise in any corporate transaction [RMBCA 8.60].

Disclosure Requirements Sometimes, a corporation enters into a contract or engages in a transaction in which an officer or director has a personal interest. The director or officer must make a full disclosure of that interest and must abstain from voting on the proposed transaction.

For example, Ballo Corporation needs office space. Stephan Colson, one of its five directors, owns the building adjoining the corporation's headquarters. He negotiates a lease with Ballo for the space, making a full disclosure to Ballo and the other four directors. The lease arrangement is fair and reasonable, and it is unanimously approved by the other members of the corporation's board of directors. Under these circumstances, the contract is valid. The rule is one of reason; otherwise, directors would be prevented from ever having financial dealings with the corporations they serve.

State statutes set different standards for corporate contracts. Generally, though, a contract will not be voidable if it was fair and reasonable to the corporation at the time it was made, there was a full disclosure of the interest of the officers or directors involved in the transaction, and the contract was approved by a majority of the disinterested directors or shareholders [RMBCA 8.62].

Corporations with Common Directors

Often, contracts are negotiated between corporations having one or more directors who are members of both boards. Such transactions require great care, as they are closely scrutinized by the courts. (As will be discussed in Chapter 46, in certain circumstances—if two large corporations are competing with each other, for example—having a director sit on the boards of both companies may constitute a violation of antitrust laws.)

Liability of Directors and Officers

Directors and officers are exposed to liability on many fronts. They can be liable for negligence in certain circumstances, as previously discussed. Corporate directors and officers may be held liable for the crimes and torts committed by themselves or by corporate employees under their supervision, as discussed in Chapters 9 and 38. Additionally, if shareholders perceive that the corporate directors are not acting in the best interests of the corporation, they may sue the directors, in what is called a shareholder's derivative suit, on behalf of the corporation. (This type of action is discussed later in this chapter, in the context of shareholders' rights.) In addition, directors and officers can be held personally liable under a number of statutes, such as statutes enacted to protect consumers or the environment (see Chapters 44 and 45). See Concept Summary 39.2 for a review of the duties and liabilities of directors and officers.

The Role of Shareholders

The acquisition of a share of stock makes a person an owner of and a shareholder in a corporation. Shareholders own the corporation but have no right to manage it. Basically, the shareholders' ownership control is limited to voting to elect or remove members of the board of directors and deciding whether to approve fundamental changes in the corporation. Shareholders are not agents of the corporation, nor do they have legal title to the corporation's property, such as its buildings and equipment: they simply have an equitable (ownership) interest in the firm.

Ordinarily, corporate officers and other employees owe no direct duty to individual shareholders (unless some contract or special relationship exists between them in addition to the corporate relationship). The officers' duty is to act in the best interests of the corporation and its shareholder-owners as a whole. In addition, as you will read later in this chapter, controlling shareholders owe a fiduciary duty to minority shareholders.

In this section, we look at the powers of shareholders, which may be established in the articles of

CONCEPT SUMMARY 39.2 Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers

Aspect	Description
DUTIES OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> Duty of care—Directors and officers are obligated to act in good faith, to use prudent business judgment in the conduct of corporate affairs, and to act in the corporation's best interests. If a director or officer fails to exercise this duty of care, he or she may be answerable to the corporation and to the shareholders for breaching the duty. The business judgment rule immunizes a director from liability for a corporate decision as long as it was within the power of the corporation and the authority of the director to make and was an informed, reasonable, and loyal decision. Duty of loyalty—Directors and officers have a fiduciary duty to subordinate their own interests to those of the corporation in matters relating to the corporation. Conflicts of interest—To fulfill their duty of loyalty, directors and officers must make a full disclosure of any potential conflicts between their personal interests and those of the corporation.
LIABILITIES OF DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS	Corporate directors and officers are personally liable for their own torts and crimes (when not protected under the business judgment rule). Additionally, they may be held personally liable for the torts and crimes committed by corporate personnel under their direct supervision (see Chapters 9 and 38).

incorporation and under the state's general corporation law.

Shareholders' Powers

Shareholders must approve fundamental changes affecting the corporation before the changes can be implemented. Hence, shareholder approval normally is required to amend the articles of incorporation or bylaws, to conduct a merger or dissolve the corporation, and to sell all or substantially all of the corporation's assets. Shareholder approval may also be requested (though it is not required) for certain other actions, such as to approve an independent auditor.

Shareholders also have the power to vote to elect or remove members of the board of directors. As described earlier, the first board of directors is either named in the articles of incorporation or chosen by the incorporators to serve until the first shareholders' meeting. From that time on, selection and retention of directors are exclusively shareholder functions.

Directors usually serve their full terms; if they are not satisfactory, they are simply not reelected. Shareholders have the inherent power, however, to remove a director from office for cause (breach of duty or misconduct) by a majority vote.⁴ As noted earlier in this chapter, some state statutes (and some articles of incorporation) permit removal of directors without cause by the vote of a majority of the shareholders entitled to vote.⁵

Shareholders' Meetings

Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually. In addition, special meetings can be called to deal with urgent matters.

Notice of Meetings A corporation must notify its shareholders of the date, time, and place of an annual or special shareholders' meeting at least ten days, but not more than sixty days, before the meeting date [RMBCA 7.05].⁶ (The date and time of the annual meeting can be specified in the bylaws, however.) Notices of special meetings must include a statement of the purpose of the meeting; business transacted at a special meeting is limited to that purpose.

4. A director can often demand court review of removal for cause, however.

5. Most states allow cumulative voting (which will be discussed shortly) for directors. If cumulative voting is authorized, a director may not be removed if the number of votes against removal would be sufficient to elect a director under cumulative voting. See, for example, California Corporations Code Section 303A. See also Section 8.08(c) of the RMBCA.

6. The shareholder can waive the requirement of notice by signing a waiver form [RMBCA 7.06]. A shareholder who does not receive notice but who learns of the meeting and attends without protesting the lack of notice is said to have waived notice by such conduct.

Proxies It usually is not practical for owners of only a few shares of stock of publicly traded corporations to attend a shareholders' meeting. Therefore, the law allows stockholders to either vote in person or appoint another person as their agent to vote their shares at the meeting. The signed appointment form or electronic transmission authorizing an agent to vote the shares is called a proxy (from the Latin procurare, meaning "to manage, take care of"). Management often solicits proxies, but any person can solicit proxies to concentrate voting power. Proxies have been used by groups of shareholders as a device for taking over a corporation (corporate takeovers will be discussed in Chapter 40). Proxies are normally revocable (that is, they can be withdrawn), unless they are specifically designated as irrevocable. Under RMBCA 7.22(c), proxies last for eleven months, unless the proxy agreement mandates a longer period.

Proxy Materials and Shareholder Proposals

When shareholders want to change a company policy, they can put their ideas up for a shareholder vote. They do this by submitting a shareholder proposal to the board of directors and asking the board to include the proposal in the proxy materials that are sent to all shareholders before meetings. (See this chapter's Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 808 and 809 for a discussion of a proposal that would increase shareholders' access to the proxy process.)

The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), which regulates the purchase and sale of securities (see Chapter 41), has special provisions relating to proxies and shareholder proposals. SEC Rule 14a-8 provides that all shareholders who own stock worth at least $1,000 are eligible to submit proposals for inclusion in corporate proxy materials. The corporation is required to include information on whatever proposals will be considered at the shareholders' meeting along with proxy materials. Only those proposals that relate to significant policy considerations rather than ordinary business operations must be included. Under the SEC's e-proxy rules that went into effect on July 1, 2007,⁷ companies now may furnish proxy materials to shareholders by posting them on a Web site (see the discussion of these rules in the Insight into E-Commerce feature in Chapter 41).

Proxy Materials Concerning Executive Pay

The issue of executive compensation has become increasingly contentious in recent years. In particular, shareholders have complained about “excessive” executive pay when the returns to shareholders declined during the same period that top executives received tens (or hundreds) of millions of dollars in compensation. Activist shareholders argue that shareholders in general should have a say in what top management earns. At least one bill was submitted to the 110th Congress that would allow investors to vote on the level of executive pay. The proposed law would require corporations to ask the shareholders to vote on whether they approve of executive compensation. Although corporations would be required to include the information in their proxy materials, the bill would give shareholders only an advisory vote on executive pay (shareholder disapproval would not be binding on management).

Shareholder Voting

Shareholders exercise ownership control through the power of their votes. Corporate business matters are presented in the form of resolutions, which shareholders vote to approve or disapprove. Each common shareholder is entitled to one vote per share, although the voting techniques discussed below all enhance the power of the shareholder’s vote. The articles of incorporation can exclude or limit voting rights, particularly to certain classes of shares. For example, owners of preferred shares are usually denied the right to vote [RMBCA 7.21]. If a state statute requires specific voting procedures, the corporation’s articles or bylaws must be consistent with the statute.

Quorum Requirements For shareholders to act during a meeting, a quorum must be present. Generally, this condition is met when shareholders holding more than 50 percent of the outstanding shares are in attendance. In some states, obtaining the unanimous written consent of shareholders is a permissible alternative to holding a shareholders’ meeting [RMBCA 7.25].

Once a quorum is present, voting can proceed. A majority vote of the shares represented at the meeting is usually required to pass resolutions. Assume that Novo Pictures, Inc., has 10,000 outstanding shares of voting stock. Its articles of incorporation set the quorum at 50 percent of outstanding shares and provide that a majority vote of the shares present is necessary to pass ordinary matters. Therefore, for this firm, at the shareholders’ meeting, a quorum of stockholders representing 5,000 outstanding shares must be present to conduct business, and a vote of at least 2,501 of those shares is needed to pass ordinary resolutions. Thus, if 6,000 shares are represented, a vote of 3,001 will be necessary.

At times, more than a simple majority vote will be required either by statute or by the articles of incorporation. Extraordinary corporate matters, such as a merger, a consolidation, or the dissolution of the corporation (see Chapter 40), require approval by a higher percentage of the representatives of all corporate shares entitled to vote, not just a majority of those present at that particular meeting [RMBCA 7.27].

Voting Lists The RMBCA requires a corporation to maintain an alphabetical voting list of shareholders. The corporation prepares the voting list before each shareholders’ meeting. Ordinarily, only persons whose names appear on the corporation’s stockholder records as owners are entitled to vote.⁸ The voting list contains the name and address of each shareholder as shown on the corporate records on a given cutoff date, or record date. (Under RMBCA 7.07, the bylaws or board of directors may fix a record date that is as much as seventy days before the meeting.) The voting list also includes the number of voting shares held by each owner. The list is usually kept at the corporate headquarters and must be made available for shareholder inspection [RMBCA 7.20].

Cumulative Voting Most states permit, and some require, shareholders to elect directors by cumulative voting, a voting method designed to allow minority shareholders to be represented on the board of directors.⁹ With cumulative voting, each shareholder is entitled to a total number of votes equal to the number of board members to be elected multiplied by the number of voting shares that the shareholder owns. The shareholder can cast all of these votes for one candidate or split them among several nominees for director. All nominees stand for election at the same time.

8. When the legal owner is deceased, bankrupt, mentally incompetent, or in some other way under a legal disability, his or her vote can be cast by a person designated by law to control and manage the owner’s property.

9. See, for example, California Corporations Code Section 708. Under RMBCA 7.28, however, no cumulative voting rights exist unless the articles of incorporation so provide.

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

A Shareholder Access Rule

Although shareholders elect the board of directors, shareholders who own a relatively small percentage of the outstanding shares of a corporation are unlikely to be successful even in nominating candidates for director positions. Enter the possibility of a "shareholder access" rule that would make it easier for dissident shareholders to use the proxy process to elect their candidates to the board of directors of a publicly held company. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) made a modest attempt to allow such shareholder access in the early 2000s, but the proposed change was highly controversial and died in 2003.

Recently, however, it has been resurrected. Until late 2006, the SEC interpreted its own rule as specifically allowing a corporation to refuse to include in its proxy materials any shareholder proposal that "relates to an election for membership on the company's board of directors."^a Now the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has rejected the SEC's interpretation.^b The court ruled that a corporation

b. American Federation of State, County, & Municipal Employees v. American International Group, Inc., 462 F.3d 121 (2d Cir. 2006). Note that the SEC disagreed with the court in this case and has since proposed a change to clarify its rules. 72 Federal Register 43488-01 (August 3, 2007).

could not exclude from its proxy materials a shareholder proposal that, if adopted by the majority of shareholders, would amend the bylaws to require the corporation to publish the names of shareholder-nominated candidates for director positions, in addition to the candidates nominated by the corporation's board of directors.

Investor Activists Are in Favor of Shareholder Access

Whatever action the SEC takes on this interpretation of its rule in the wake of this court decision, shareholder access will remain controversial. Investor activists have always claimed that without a shareholder access rule, directors have little incentive to pay attention to the concerns of their shareholders. Furthermore, the current system not only discourages shareholders from trying to take an active role in guiding the corporation but also leads to litigation. Because shareholders have no way to engage in dialogue with the corporation to alter what they regard as questionable behavior, they have no choice but to resort to lawsuits against the company. The media have also generally applauded shareholder access as a way to level the playing field between small shareholders and giant corporations.

When cumulative voting is not required by statute or under the articles, the entire board can be elected by a majority of shares at a shareholders' meeting.

Suppose that a corporation has 10,000 shares issued and outstanding. The minority shareholders hold 3,000 shares, and the majority shareholders hold the other 7,000 shares. Three members of the board are to be elected. The majority shareholders' nominees are Alomon, Beasley, and Caravel. The minority shareholders' nominee is Dovrik. Can Dovrik be elected to the board by the minority shareholders?

If cumulative voting is allowed, the answer is yes. The minority shareholders have 9,000 votes among them (the number of directors to be elected times the number of shares, or $3 \times 3,000 = 9,000$ votes). All of these votes can be cast to elect Dovrik. The majority shareholders have 21,000 votes ($3 \times 7,000 = 21,000$ votes), but these votes must be distributed among their three nominees. The principle of cumulative voting is that no matter how the majority shareholders cast their 21,000 votes, they will not be able to elect all three directors if the minority shareholders cast all of their 9,000 votes for Dovrik, as illustrated in Exhibit 39-2.

Other Voting Techniques A group of shareholders can agree in writing prior to a shareholders' meeting, in a shareholder voting agreement, to vote their shares together in a specified manner. Such agreements usually are held to be valid and enforceable. A shareholder can also appoint a voting agent and vote by proxy, as mentioned previously.

Another technique is for shareholders to enter into a voting trust. A voting trust is an agreement (a trust contract) under which a shareholder transfers the shares to a trustee, usually for a specified period of time. The trustee is then responsible for voting the shares on behalf of the beneficiary-shareholder. The agreement can specify how the trustee is to vote, or it

Shareholder Access May Mean Lower Returns for Shareholders

Others are not so sure that shareholder access will benefit shareholders. Opponents of shareholder access, such as law professor Lynn A. Stout of the UCLA-Sloan Research Program on Business Organizations, argue that such a rule is unnecessary because shareholders today have more influence and power over top management and directors than ever before. Shareholders can join in class-action lawsuits against corporations, and they gained additional protections under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002. Moreover, small investors can purchase their shares through mutual funds, which wield much more power than individual shareholders.

Furthermore, says Professor Stout, shareholder access would dramatically accelerate “an already dangerous trend: ‘the flight of corporations away from public investors into the arms of private equity.’” As Chapter 38 described, an increasing number of public corporations are going private because they have been purchased by private equity firms. A shareholder access rule could enhance this process because the rule would impose additional costs on publicly held companies. As the costs of having public shareholders increase, more top managers may decide that the corporation should eliminate the shareholders. In other words, more publicly held companies will let private equity firms know that they are for sale. When a company is taken private, its public shareholders receive a small premium over the market value of their shares, but once the company goes private, of course, they are no longer shareholders and are unable to benefit from the company’s growth under new management (if that growth materializes). Consequently, in the long run public shareholders may earn lower returns if a shareholder access rule is adopted.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Several dozen managers and directors of foreign-based pension plans and insurance companies—which invest in U.S. securities—wrote a joint letter to the head of the SEC. In that letter, they stated that “experience in the United Kingdom, Australia, and the Netherlands has shown that boards whose members may be removed by shareholders are much more sensitive to shareholder opinion and are much more likely to engage in a meaningful dialogue with the institutions that holds their shares.” How important is such a dialogue? What might be some of the topics of such a dialogue?

can allow the trustee to use his or her discretion. The trustee takes physical possession of the stock certificate and in return gives the shareholder a voting trust certificate. The shareholder retains other rights of ownership (for example, the right to receive dividend payments) except the power to vote the shares [RMBCA 7.30].

Rights of Shareholders

Shareholders possess numerous rights. A significant right—the right to vote their shares—has already been discussed. We now look at some additional rights of shareholders in the following subsections.

EXHIBIT 39-2 • Results of Cumulative Voting

Stock Certificates

A stock certificate is a certificate issued by a corporation that evidences ownership of a specified number of shares in the corporation. In jurisdictions that require the issuance of stock certificates, shareholders have the right to demand that the corporation issue certificates and record their names and addresses in the corporate stock record books. In most states and under RMBCA 6.26, the board of directors may provide that shares of stock will be uncertificated (that is, no actual, physical stock certificates will be issued). When shares are uncertificated, the corporation may be required to send each shareholder a letter or some other notice containing the same information that is required to be included on the face of stock certificates.

Stock is intangible personal property, and the ownership right exists independently of the certificate itself. If a stock certificate is lost or destroyed, ownership is not destroyed with it. A new certificate can be issued to replace the one that was lost or destroyed.¹⁰ Notice of shareholders' meetings, dividends, and operational and financial reports are all distributed according to the recorded ownership listed in the corporation's books, not on the basis of possession of the certificate.

Preemptive Rights

Sometimes, the articles of incorporation grant preemptive rights to shareholders [RMBCA 6.30]. With preemptive rights, a shareholder receives a preference over all other purchasers to subscribe to or purchase a prorated share of a new issue of stock. In other words, a shareholder who is given preemptive rights can purchase the same percentage of the new shares being issued as she or he already holds in the company. This right does not apply to treasury shares—shares that are authorized but have not been issued.

The Purpose of Preemptive Rights Preemptive rights allow each shareholder to maintain her or his proportionate control, voting power, or financial interest in the corporation. Generally, preemptive rights apply only to additional, newly issued stock sold for cash, and the preemptive rights must be exercised within a specified time period, which is usually thirty days.

10. For a lost or destroyed certificate to be reissued, a shareholder normally must furnish an indemnity bond, which is a written promise to reimburse the holder for any actual or claimed loss caused by the issuer's or some other person's conduct. The bond protects the corporation against potential loss should the original certificate reappear at some future time in the hands of a bona fide purchaser. See Sections 8-302 and 8-405(2) of the Uniform Commercial Code.

For example, Tron Corporation authorizes and issues 1,000 shares of stock, and Omar Loren purchases 100 shares, making him the owner of 10 percent of the company's stock. Subsequently, Tron, by vote of its shareholders, authorizes the issuance of another 1,000 shares (by amending the articles of incorporation). This increases its capital stock to a total of 2,000 shares. If preemptive rights have been provided, Loren can purchase one additional share of the new stock being issued for each share he already owns—or 100 additional shares. Thus, he can own 200 of the 2,000 shares outstanding, and his relative position as a shareholder will be maintained. If preemptive rights are not reserved, his proportionate control and voting power will be diluted from that of a 10 percent shareholder to that of a 5 percent shareholder because the additional 1,000 shares were issued.

Preemptive Rights in Close Corporations

Preemptive rights are most important in close corporations because each shareholder owns a relatively small number of shares but controls a substantial interest in the corporation. Without preemptive rights, it would be possible for a shareholder to lose his or her proportionate control over the firm.

Stock Warrants

Stock warrants are rights to buy stock at a stated price by a specified date that are given by the company. Usually, when preemptive rights exist and a corporation is issuing additional shares, it gives its shareholders stock warrants. Warrants are often publicly traded on securities exchanges.

Dividends

As mentioned in Chapter 38, a dividend is a distribution of corporate profits or income ordered by the directors and paid to the shareholders in proportion to their respective shares in the corporation. Dividends can be paid in cash, property, stock of the corporation that is paying the dividends, or stock of other corporations.¹¹

11. On one occasion, a distillery declared and paid a "dividend" in bonded whiskey.

Sources of Funds for Dividends State laws vary, but every state determines the general circumstances and legal requirements under which dividends are paid. State laws also control the sources of revenue to be used; only certain funds are legally available for paying dividends. Once declared, a cash dividend becomes a corporate debt enforceable at law like any other debt. Depending on state law, dividends may be paid from the following sources:

1. Retained earnings. All states allow dividends to be paid from the undistributed net profits earned by the corporation, including capital gains from the sale of fixed assets. As mentioned in Chapter 38, the undistributed net profits are called retained earnings.
2. Net profits. A few states allow dividends to be issued from current net profits without regard to deficits in prior years.
3. Surplus. A number of states allow dividends to be paid out of any kind of surplus.

Directors' Failure to Declare a Dividend

When directors fail to declare a dividend, shareholders can ask a court to compel the directors to meet and declare a dividend. To succeed, the shareholders must show that the directors have acted so unreasonably in withholding the dividend that their conduct is an abuse of their discretion.

Often, a corporation accumulates large cash reserves for a legitimate corporate purpose, such as expansion or research. The mere fact that the firm has sufficient earnings or surplus available to pay a dividend is not enough to compel the directors to distribute funds that, in the board's opinion, should not be distributed.¹² The courts are hesitant to interfere with corporate operations and will not compel directors to declare dividends unless abuse of discretion is clearly shown.

Inspection Rights

Shareholders in a corporation enjoy both common law and statutory inspection rights. The RMBCA provides that every shareholder is entitled to examine specified corporate records [RMBCA 16.02]. This includes inspecting voting lists, as discussed earlier [RMBCA 7.20]. A shareholder who is denied the right of inspection can seek a court order to compel the inspection. The shareholder's right of inspection is limited, however, to the inspection and copying of corporate books and records for a proper purpose, provided the request is made in advance. The shareholder may inspect in person, or an attorney, accountant, or other authorized assistant may do so as the shareholder's agent.

12. A striking exception to this rule was made in Dodge v. Ford Motor Co., 204 Mich. 459, 170 N.W. 668 (1919), when Henry Ford, the president and major stockholder of Ford Motor Company, refused to declare a dividend notwithstanding the firm's large capital surplus. The court, holding that Ford had abused his discretion, ordered the company to declare a dividend.

The power of inspection is fraught with potential abuses, and the corporation is allowed to protect itself from them. For example, a shareholder can properly be denied access to corporate records to prevent harassment or to protect trade secrets or other confidential corporate information.¹³ Some states require that a shareholder must have held her or his shares for a minimum period of time immediately preceding the demand to inspect or must hold a minimum number of outstanding shares.

Transfer of Shares

Corporate stock represents an ownership right in intangible personal property. The law generally recognizes the right of an owner to transfer property to another person unless there are valid restrictions on its transferability. Although stock certificates are negotiable and freely transferable by indorsement and delivery, transfer of stock in closely held corporations (see Chapter 38) is usually restricted. These restrictions must be reasonable and may be found in the bylaws or stated in a shareholder agreement. The existence of any restrictions on transferability must always be indicated on the face of the stock certificate.

When shares are transferred, a new entry is made in the corporate stock book to indicate the new owner. Until the corporation is notified and the entry is complete, all rights—including voting rights, notice of shareholders' meetings, and the right to dividend distributions—remain with the current record owner.

Rights on Dissolution

When a corporation is dissolved and its outstanding debts and the claims of its creditors have been satisfied, the remaining assets are distributed on a pro rata basis among the shareholders. The articles of incorporation may provide that certain classes of preferred stock will be given priority. If no class of stock has been given preferences in the distribution of assets, all of the stockholders share the remaining assets. (See Chapter 40 for a full discussion of the process of dissolution, including the circumstances under which shareholders may petition a court to have the corporation dissolved.)

The Shareholder's Derivative Suit

When the corporation is harmed by the actions of a third party, the directors can bring a lawsuit in the name of the corporation against that party. If the corporate directors fail to bring a lawsuit, shareholders can do so “derivatively” in what is known as a shareholder's derivative suit. A shareholder cannot bring a derivative suit until ninety days after making a written demand on the corporation (the board of directors) to take suitable action [RMBCA 7.40]. Only if the directors refuse to take appropriate action can the derivative suit go forward.

The right of shareholders to bring a derivative action is especially important when the wrong suffered by the corporation results from the actions of the corporate directors. This is because the directors and officers would probably be unwilling to take any action against themselves. Nevertheless, a court will dismiss a derivative suit if the majority of directors or an independent panel determines in good faith that the lawsuit is not in the best interests of the corporation [RMBCA 7.44].

When shareholders bring a derivative suit, they are not pursuing rights or benefits for themselves personally but are acting as guardians of the corporate entity. Therefore, if the suit is successful, any damages recovered normally go into the corporation's treasury, not to the shareholders personally. (The shareholders may be entitled to reimbursement for reasonable expenses of the lawsuit, including attorneys' fees.)

Liability of Shareholders

One of the hallmarks of the corporate organization is that shareholders are not personally liable for the debts of the corporation. If the corporation fails, the shareholders can lose their investments, but that is generally the limit of their liability. As discussed in Chapter 38, however, in certain instances of fraud, undercapitalization, or careless observance of corporate formalities, a court will pierce the corporate veil (disregard the corporate entity) and hold the shareholders individually liable. But these situations are the exception, not the rule.

A shareholder can also be personally liable in certain other rare instances. One relates to watered stock. Also, in some instances, a majority shareholder who engages in oppressive conduct or attempts to exclude minority shareholders from receiving certain benefits can be held personally liable.

Watered Stock

When a corporation issues shares for less than their fair market value, the shares are referred to as watered stock.¹⁴ Usually, the shareholder who receives watered stock must pay the difference to the corporation (the shareholder is personally liable). In some states, the shareholder who receives watered stock may be liable to creditors of the corporation for unpaid corporate debts.

For example, during the formation of a corporation, Gomez, one of the incorporators, transfers his property, Sunset Beach, to the corporation for 10,000 shares of stock at a par value of $100 per share for a total price of $1 million. After the property is transferred and the shares are issued, Sunset Beach is carried on the corporate books at a value of $1 million. On appraisal, it is discovered that the market value of the property at the time of transfer was only $500,000. The shares issued to Gomez are therefore watered stock, and he is liable to the corporation for the difference between the value of the shares and the value of the property. Concept Summary 39.3 reviews the role played by shareholders in a corporation.

Duties of Majority Shareholders

In some instances, a majority shareholder is regarded as having a fiduciary duty to the corporation and to the minority shareholders. This occurs when a single shareholder (or a few shareholders acting in concert) owns a sufficient number of shares to exercise de facto (actual) control over the corporation. In these situations, the majority shareholders owe a fiduciary duty to the minority shareholders.

A common example of a breach of fiduciary duty occurs when the majority shareholders “freeze out” the 14. The phrase watered stock was originally used to describe cattle that were kept thirsty during a long drive and then were allowed to drink large quantities of water just prior to their sale. The increased weight of the “watered stock” allowed the seller to reap a higher profit.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 39.3

Role of Shareholders

Aspect	Description
SHAREHOLDERS' POWERS	Shareholders' powers include approval of all fundamental changes affecting the corporation and election of the board of directors.
SHAREHOLDERS' MEETINGS	Shareholders' meetings must occur at least annually; special meetings can be called when necessary. Notice of the time and place of a meeting (and its purpose, if the meeting is specially called) must be sent to shareholders. A minimum number of shareholders (quorum) must be present to vote.
SHAREHOLDERS' RIGHTS	Shareholders have numerous rights, which may include the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Voting rights. 2. The right to receive stock certificates (depending on the jurisdiction). 3. Preemptive rights (depending on the corporate articles). 4. The right to receive dividends (at the discretion of the directors). 5. The right to inspect the corporate records. 6. The right to transfer shares (this right may be restricted in close corporations). 7. The right to receive a share of corporate assets when the corporation is dissolved. 8. The right to sue on behalf of the corporation (bring a shareholder's derivative suit) when the directors fail to do so.
SHAREHOLDERS' LIABILITY	Shareholders may be liable for watered stock. In certain situations, majority shareholders may be regarded as having a fiduciary duty to minority shareholders and will be liable if that duty is breached.

minority shareholders and exclude them from certain benefits of participating in the firm. For example, Brodie, Jordan, and Barbuto formed a close corporation to operate a machine shop. Each owned one-third of the shares in the company, and all three were directors. Brodie served as the corporate president for twelve years but thereafter met with the other shareholders only a few times a year. After disagreements arose, Brodie asked the company to purchase his shares, but his requests were refused. A few years later, Brodie died and his wife inherited his shares in the company. Jordan and Barbuto refused to perform a valuation of the company, denied her access to the corporate information she requested, did not declare any dividends, and refused to elect her as a director. In this situation, a court found that the majority shareholders had violated their fiduciary duty to Brodie's wife.¹⁵

A breach of fiduciary duties by those who control a closely held corporation normally constitutes what is known as oppressive conduct. The court in the following case examined a pattern of conduct by those in control to determine whether it was oppressive.

C A S E 39.3 Kaplan v. First Hartford Corp.

United States District Court, District of Maine, 2007. 484 F.Supp.2d 131.

• Background and Facts First Hartford Corporation (FHC) was incorporated in Maine in 1909 to compete in the textile industry. As textiles declined, FHC focused on buying, developing, and managing real estate. During the 1980s and 1990s, FHC struggled to stay in business. The company went through bankruptcy and downsized from 143 employees to 21. It held no board or shareholders' meetings and issued no audited financial statements. During this time, Ned Ellis managed FHC. He had been a director since 1966 and president since 1968, and owned about 43 percent of FHC's stock. Ellis also owned and operated Green Manor Corporation, which owned still other companies. Ellis treated FHC as part of a common enterprise with his other companies, often failing to document their transactions, which included interest-free loans, property exchanges, forgiveness of debts, and other deals, totaling millions of dollars. By 2000, FHC had grown profitable, chiefly through Ellis's efforts. A market began to develop for its stock, and the firm began to hold shareholders' meetings. Ellis's nephew, Richard Kaplan, owned about 19 percent of the stock. After several lawsuits in which Kaplan sought information about the deals between FHC and Ellis's companies, Kaplan filed a suit in a federal district court against FHC and Ellis, alleging that Ellis had operated the company oppressively for his own benefit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
HORNBY, District Judge.

* * * *

* * * Under Maine corporate law, a corporation is subject to judicial dissolution or alternative remedies, if it is established that the directors or those in control of the corporation have acted, are acting or will act in a manner that is * * * oppressive * * * .

* * * *

In general, Ellis has treated FHC as his own property, moving [funds] back and forth among his various companies including FHC, as he thinks beneficial. * * *

* * * *

* * * These transactions demonstrate that Ellis disregards corporate formalities, inadequately documents self-interested transactions, treats FHC as part of his common enterprise, and benefits his own interests over FHC.

Even while this litigation was pending, Ellis paid himself a $400,000 bonus in 2006. This bonus was on top of the dividends that Ellis received as a 43% shareholder and on top of his regular salary of over $200,000. * * * This was clearly a self-interested transaction because Ellis was not a disinterested director in choosing to pay himself this amount * * * . Ellis * * * failed to demonstrate the fairness of this $400,000 bonus.

No one of these actions alone would meet the oppression standard * * * . Instead, it is the pattern of abusive conduct that establishes oppression. Kaplan has successfully sued FHC four times, yet the pattern of oppressive conduct continues. The Maine oppression statute should relieve minority shareholders, facing a pattern of abusive conduct, from having to file a new lawsuit for each individual instance. [Emphasis added.]

I recognize that without Ellis, his work, his funds and his credit, FHC would not have emerged from its financial morass, and the investment of shareholders like Kaplan would long ago have become worthless. But Ellis chose to continue the real estate business under FHC's auspices, a corporate form where there were other shareholders to whom the directors had corresponding obligations. He therefore was obliged to operate FHC accordingly, not treating the company as part of his general family assets, but as an independent entity of which he was a director (and controlling shareholder) with statutory and fiduciary obligations to others. Whatever good intentions he had originally, his actions cumulatively demonstrate a pattern of preemptory [dictatorial] and oppressive treatment of minority shareholders. * * * It is true that FHC has reinstated independent audits, resumed shareholder meetings, hired an internal auditor and a new securities law firm, and this year for the first time in memory paid dividends. But at the same time, Ellis has transferred assets away from FHC to his other enterprises * * * . He has also manifested extreme hostility to a shareholder's [Kaplan's] attempt to exercise legitimate rights * * * , and has paid himself an excessive bonus as a 43% shareholder. It is in that respect that I conclude that FHC and Ellis have treated other shareholders oppressively.

● Decision and Remedy The court concluded that Ellis "contributed greatly to the corporation (it undoubtedly would not have survived without his efforts)" but "has also engaged in oppressive conduct with respect to minority shareholders" and thus Kaplan was entitled to relief. The court gave the parties further time to present their positions on an appropriate remedy.

CHAPTER 39 CORPORATIONS—Directors, Officers, and Shareholders

- The Ethical Dimension Was Ellis's treatment of FHC and his conduct with respect to Kaplan unethical? Explain.
- The E-Commerce Dimension Would the court's decision in this case likely have been different if FHC had been engaged in the more volatile technology industry rather than real estate? Why or why not?

REVIEWING CORPORATIONS—Directors, Officers, and Shareholders

David Brock is on the board of directors of Firm Body Fitness, Inc., which owns a string of fitness clubs in New Mexico. Brock owns 15 percent of the Firm Body stock and is also employed as a tanning technician at one of the fitness clubs. After the January financial report showed that Firm Body's tanning division was operating at a substantial net loss, the board of directors, led by Marty Levinson, discussed the possibility of terminating the tanning operations. Brock successfully convinced a majority of the board that the tanning division was necessary to market the clubs' overall fitness package. By April, the tanning division's financial losses had risen. The board hired a business analyst, who conducted surveys and determined that the tanning operations did not significantly increase membership. A shareholder, Diego Peñada, discovered that Brock owned stock in Sunglow, Inc., the company from which Firm Body purchased its tanning equipment. Peñada notified Levinson, who privately reprimanded Brock. Shortly thereafter Brock and Mandy Vail, who owned 37 percent of the Firm Body stock and also held shares of Sunglow, voted to replace Levinson on the board of directors. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What duties did Brock, as a director, owe to Firm Body?
2. Does the fact that Brock owned shares in Sunglow establish a conflict of interest? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that Firm Body brought an action against Brock claiming that he had breached the duty of loyalty by not disclosing his interest in Sunglow to the other directors. What theory might Brock use in his defense?
4. Now suppose that Firm Body did not bring an action against Brock. What type of lawsuit might Peñada be able to bring based on these facts?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

39-1. Oxy Corp. is negotiating with the Wick Construction Co. for the renovation of the Oxy corporate headquarters. Wick, the owner of the Wick Construction Co., is also one of the five members of the board of directors of Oxy. The contract terms are standard for this type of contract. Wick has previously informed two of the other directors of his interest in the construction company. Oxy's board approves the contract by a three-to-two vote, with Wick voting with the majority. Discuss whether this contract is binding on the corporation.

39-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

AstroStar, Inc., has a board of directors consisting of three members (Eckhart, Dolan, and Macero) and has approximately five hundred shareholders. At a regular board meeting, the board selects Galiard as president of the corporation by a two-to-one vote, with Eckhart dissenting. The minutes of the meeting do not register Eckhart's dissenting vote. Later, an audit discovers that Galiard is a former convict and has embezzled $500,000 from the corporation that is not covered by insurance. Can the corporation hold directors Eckhart, Dolan, and Macero personally liable? Discuss.

39-3. Superal Corp. authorized 100,000 shares and issued all of them during its first six months in operation. Avril purchased 10,000 of the shares (10 percent). Later, Superal reacquired 10,000 of the shares it originally issued. With shareholder approval, Superal has now amended its articles so as to authorize and issue another 100,000 shares. It has also, by a resolution of the board of directors, made plans to reissue the 10,000 shares of treasury stock (the shares reacquired by the corporation). The corporate articles do not include a provision dealing with shareholders' preemptive rights. Because of her ownership of 10 percent of Superal, Avril claims that she has the preemptive right to purchase 10,000 shares of the new issue and 1,000 shares of the stock being reissued. Discuss her claims.

39-4. Lucia has acquired one share of common stock of a multimillion-dollar corporation with more than 500,000 shareholders. Lucia's ownership interest is so small that she is not sure what her rights are as a shareholder. For example, she wants to know whether this one share entitles her to (1) attend and vote at shareholders' meetings, (2) inspect the corporate books, and (3) receive yearly dividends. Discuss Lucia's rights in these three matters.

39-5. Inspection Rights. Craig Johnson founded Distributed Solutions, Inc. (DSI), in 1991 to make software and provide consulting services, including payroll services for small companies. Johnson was the sole officer and director and the majority shareholder. Jeffrey Hagen was a minority shareholder. In 1993, Johnson sold DSI's payroll services to himself and a few others and set up Distributed Payroll Solutions, Inc. (DPSI). In 1996, DSI had revenues of $739,034 and assets of $541,168. In 1997, DSI's revenues were $934,532. Within a year, however, all of DSI's assets were sold, and Johnson told Hagen that he was dissolving the firm because, among other things, it conducted no business and had no prospects for future business. Hagen asked for corporate records to determine the value of DSI's stock, DSI's financial condition, and "whether unauthorized and oppressive acts had occurred in connection with the operation of the corporation which impacted the value of" the stock. When there was no response, Hagen filed a suit in an Illinois state court against DSI and Johnson, seeking an order to compel the inspection. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that Hagen had failed to plead a proper purpose. Should the court grant Hagen's request? Discuss. [*Hagen v. 39-6. Duty of Loyalty. Digital Commerce, Ltd., designed software to enable its clients to sell their products or services over the Internet. Kevin Sullivan served as a Digital vice president until 2000, when he became president. Sullivan was dissatisfied that his compensation did not include stock in Digital, but he was unable to negotiate a deal that included equity (shares of ownership in the company). In May, Sullivan solicited ASR Corp.'s business for Digital while he investigated employment opportunities with ASR for himself. When ASR would not include an "equity component" in a job offer, Sullivan refused to negotiate further on Digital's behalf. A few months later, Sullivan began to form his own firm to compete with Digital, conducting organizational and marketing activities on Digital's time, including soliciting ASR's business. In August, Sullivan resigned after having all e-mail pertaining to the new firm deleted from Digital's computers. ASR signed a contract with Sullivan's new firm and paid it $400,000 for work through October 2001. Digital filed a suit in a federal district court against Sullivan, claiming that he had usurped a corporate opportunity. Did Sullivan breach his fiduciary duty to Digital? Explain. 39-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In 1978, David Brandt and Dean Somerville incorporated Posilock Puller, Inc. (PPI), to make and market bearing pullers. Each received half of the stock. Initially operating out of McHenry, North Dakota, PPI moved to Cooperstown, North Dakota, in 1984 into a building owned by Somerville. After the move, Brandt's participation in PPI diminished, and Somerville's increased. In 1998, Somerville formed PL MFG as his own business to make components for the bearing pullers and sell the parts to PPI. The start-up costs included a $450,000 loan from Sheyenne Valley Electric Cooperative. PPI executed the loan documents and indorsed the check. The proceeds were deposited into an account for PL MFG, which did not sign a promissory note payable to PPI until 2000. When Brandt learned of PL MFG and the loan, he filed a suit in a North Dakota state court against Somerville, alleging, in part, a breach of fiduciary duty. What fiduciary duty does a director owe to his or her corporation? What does this duty require? Should the court hold Somerville liable? Why or why not? [Brandt v. Somerville, 2005 ND 35, 692 N.W.2d 144 (2005)]

39-8. Duties of Majority Shareholders. Steve and Marie Venturini were involved in the operation of Steve's Sizzling Steakhouse in Carlstadt, New Jersey, from the day their parents opened it in the 1930s. By the 1980s, Steve, Marie, and her husband Joe were running it. The business was a corporation with Steve and Marie each owning half of the stock. Steve died in 2001, leaving his stock in equal shares to his sons Steve and Gregg. Son Steve had never worked there. Gregg did occasional maintenance work until his father's death. Despite their lack of participation, the sons were paid more than $750 per week each. In 2002, Marie's son Blaise, who had obtained a college degree in restaurant management while working part-time at the steakhouse, took over its management. When his cousins became threatening, he denied them access to the business and its books. Marie refused Gregg and Steve's offer of about $1.4 million for her stock in the restaurant, and they refused her offer of about $800,000 for theirs. They filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against her, claiming, among other things, a breach of fiduciary duty. Should the court order the aunt to buy out the nephews or the nephews to buy out the aunt, or neither? Why? [Venturini v. Steve's Steakhouse, Inc., ___ N.J.Super. ___, ___ A.2d ___ (Ch.Div. 2006)]

39-9. Fiduciary Duties and Liabilities. Harry Hoaas and Larry Griffiths were shareholders in Grand Casino, Inc., which owned and operated a casino in Watertown, South Dakota. Griffiths owned 51 percent of the stock and Hoaas 49 percent. Hoaas managed the casino, which Griffiths typically visited once a week. At the end of 1997, an accounting showed that the cash on hand was less than the amount posted in the casino's books. Later, more shortfalls were discovered. In October 1999, Griffiths did a complete audit. Hoaas was unable to account for $135,500 in missing cash. Griffiths then kept all of the casino's most recent profits, including Hoaas's $9,447.20 share, and, without telling Hoaas, sold the casino for $100,000 and kept all of the proceeds. Hoaas filed a suit in a South Dakota state court against Griffiths, asserting, among other things, a breach of fiduciary duty. Griffiths countered with evidence of Hoaas's misappropriation of corporate cash. What duties did these parties owe each other? Did either Griffiths or Hoaas, or both of them, breach those duties? How should their dispute be resolved? How should their finances be reconciled? Explain. [Hoaas v. Griffiths, 2006 SD 27, 714 N.W.2d 61 (2006)]

39-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

New Orleans Paddlewheels, Inc. (NOP), is a Louisiana corporation formed in 1982 when James Smith, Sr., and Warren Reuther were its only shareholders, with each holding 50 percent of the stock. NOP is part of a sprawling enterprise of tourism and hospitality companies in New Orleans. The positions on the board of each company were split equally between the Smith and Reuther families. At Smith's request, his son James Smith, Jr. (JES), became involved in the businesses. In 1999, NOP's board elected JES as president, to be in charge of day-to-day operations, and Reuther as chief executive officer (CEO), to be in charge of marketing and development. Over the next few years, animosity developed between Reuther and JES. In October 2001, JES terminated Reuther as CEO and denied him access to the offices and books of NOP and the other companies, literally changing the locks on the doors. At the next meetings of the boards of NOP and the overall enterprise, deadlock ensued, with the directors voting along family lines on every issue. Complaining that the meetings were a "waste of time," JES began to run the entire enterprise by taking advantage of an unequal balance of power on the companies' executive committees. In NOP's subsequent bankruptcy proceeding, Reuther filed a motion for the appointment of a trustee to formulate a plan for the firm's reorganization, alleging, among other things, misconduct by NOP's management. [In re New Orleans Paddlewheels, Inc., 350 Bankr. 667 (E.D.La. 2006)]

- Was Reuther legally entitled to have access to the books and records of NOP and the other companies? JES maintained, among other things, that NOP's books were "a mess." Was JES's denial of that access unethical? Explain.
- How would you describe JES's attempt to gain control of NOP and the other companies? Were his actions duplicitous and self-serving in the pursuit of personal gain or legitimate and reasonable in the pursuit of a business goal? Discuss.

CORPORATIONS— Merger, Consolidation, and Termination

A corporation typically extends its operations by combining with another corporation through a merger, a consolidation, a purchase of assets, or a purchase of a controlling interest in the other corporation. This chapter examines these four types of corporate expansion. Dissolution and winding up are the combined processes by which a corporation terminates its existence. The last part of this chapter discusses some of the typical reasons for terminating a corporation's existence and the methods used in the termination process.

Merger and Consolidation

The terms merger and consolidation traditionally referred to two legally distinct proceedings. Today, however, the term consolidation generally is used as a generic term to refer to all types of combinations, including mergers (discussed below) and acquisitions (discussed later in this chapter). Whether a combination is a merger, a consolidation, or a share exchange, the rights and liabilities of shareholders, the corporation, and the corporation's creditors are the same. Note also that the power to merge, consolidate, and exchange shares is conferred by statute, and thus state law establishes the specific procedures.

Merger

A merger involves the legal combination of two or more corporations. After a merger, only one of the corporations continues to exist. For example, Corporation A and Corporation B decide to merge. They agree that A will absorb B. Therefore, after the merger, B ceases to exist as a separate entity, and A continues as the surviving corporation. Exhibit 40-1 illustrates this process.

After the merger, A is recognized as a single corporation possessing all of the rights, privileges, and powers of itself and B. Corporation A automatically acquires all of B's property and assets without the necessity of a formal transfer. Corporation A also becomes liable for all of B's debts and obligations. Finally, A's articles of incorporation are deemed amended to include any changes that are stated in the articles of merger.

In a merger, the surviving corporation inherits the disappearing corporation's preexisting legal rights and obligations. For example, if the disappearing corporation had a right of action against a third party, the surviving corporation can bring a suit after the merger to recover the disappearing corporation's damages.

EXHIBIT 40-1 • Merger

In this illustration, Corporation A and Corporation B decide to merge. They agree that A will absorb B, so after the merger, B no longer exists as a separate entity, and A continues as the surviving corporation.

Similarly, following a merger, a third party who had a right of action against the disappearing corporation normally will now have the right to bring an action against the successor (surviving) corporation. The court applied these principles regarding successor liability in the following case.

CASE 40.1 Rodriguez v. Tech Credit Union Corp.

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2005. 824 N.E.2d 442.
www.findlaw.com/11stategov/in/inca.html^a

• Background and Facts In January 2000, Catalina Rodriguez became the general manager of LTV Steel Employees Federal Credit Union in East Chicago, Indiana, subject to an employment contract. At the time, LTV was in poor financial condition, with a large number of delinquent and unpaid loans. In January 2002, LTV's board of directors terminated Rodriguez's employment for, among other things, extending loan payment periods for individuals with whom she had personal relationships and directing some of LTV's insurance business to Airey Insurance and Financial Services, Inc., which employed her son as a sales representative. On April 27, Tech Credit Union Corporation acquired LTV. The "Agreement of Merger" stated, "The LTV Steel Employees Federal Credit Union shall be merged into Tech Credit Union under the name and charter of Tech Credit Union." The agreement was silent as to whether Tech acquired LTV's liabilities. LTV dissolved. Later, Rodriguez filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Tech and others, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. Tech filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court granted. Rodriguez appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT BAKER, Judge.

* * * *

Rodriguez argues that summary judgment was improper * * *. Specifically, she argues that Tech was responsible for LTV's alleged breach of her employment contract because it acquired LTV through a merger * * *.

* * * *

* * * Generally, only a party to the contract can be held liable for its breach because contractual obligations are personal in nature. Nevertheless, following a merger, the surviving corporation succeeds to all the rights, powers, liabilities and obligations of the merging corporation. However, where one corporation purchases the assets of another, the buyer does not assume the debts and liabilities of the seller. * * * Generally recognized exceptions to this rule include (1) an implied or express agreement to assume the obligation; (2) a fraudulent sale of assets done for the purpose of escaping liability; (3) a purchase that is a de facto consolidation or merger; or (4) instances where the purchaser is a mere continuation of the seller. Successor in assets liability, under these exceptions, takes place only when the predecessor corporation no longer exists, such as when a corporation dissolves or liquidates in bankruptcy. [Emphasis added.]

Rodriguez contends that Tech succeeded to LTV's liabilities because it acquired LTV through a merger, while Tech asserts that it merely purchased the assets of LTV, which would mean that Tech did not acquire LTV's liabilities. We find Tech's argument to be rather disingenuous, considering the document under which Tech acquired LTV is entitled, "Agreement of Merger." Moreover, the Agreement repeatedly refers to the transaction as a merger. Thus, Tech, as the surviving corporation, succeeded to LTV's liabilities. Even if we were to find that Tech purchased LTV's assets, the transaction would fit under the exception to the rule that a buyer does not acquire the liabilities of the seller because this would be a de facto merger, inasmuch as LTV, the predecessor corporation, no longer exists.

This does not end the question * * *. [W]e must determine if LTV would have been entitled to summary judgment. We do so by addressing the issue of whether the Board Members acted within the scope of their authority in terminating Rodriguez because if the Board Members, as agents of LTV, committed no wrongdoing, then LTV committed no wrongdoing.

[An Indiana statute] immunizes * * * directors from civil liability for an action taken as a director, or for failure to take an action, unless they have not exercised their business judgment in a. In the "Court of Appeals" section, in the "2005" row, click on "March." In the result, scroll to the name of the case and click on "html" to access the opinion.

CASE 40.1 CONTINUED good faith, with the care of an ordinarily prudent person, in a manner reasonably believed to be in the best interests of the corporation, and the breach or failure to perform constitutes willful misconduct or recklessness. [Emphasis added.]

The record demonstrates that LTV was failing financially when Rodriguez became the general manager but that things did not improve on her watch. Questionable loans and extensions were made and collections efforts were ineffective. In addition, Rodriguez signed a contract with Airey [Insurance], then presented it to the Board of Directors as a proposal rather than as an existing contract. Although Rodriguez may have informed the original Board of Directors of her son's employment with Airey, she did not give the new Board of Directors the same information after the election. * * * Furthermore, Rodriguez directly contravened [disobeyed] orders of the Board that LTV perform its own collections work * * *. This evidence, when taken together, demonstrates that the Board Members exercised their business judgment in good faith and acted in the best interest of the corporation. Thus, the Board Members committed no wrongdoing and are immune from civil liability. As such, LTV committed no wrongdoing, and the trial court did not err in granting summary judgment * * *.

• Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Tech acquired the liabilities of LTV in their merger. Because neither LTV nor its board acted wrongfully with respect to Rodriguez, however, there was no basis for assessing liability against Tech.

• What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the document under which Tech acquired LTV was not titled "Agreement of Merger" and that it did not refer to the transaction as a "merger." Would the result have been different? Explain.

• The E-Commerce Dimension How might the Internet prevent a prospective acquiring company from unknowingly assuming the liabilities of the disappearing firm on their merger?

Consolidation

In a consolidation, two or more corporations combine so that each corporation ceases to exist and a new one emerges. Corporation A and Corporation B consolidate to form an entirely new organization, Corporation C. In the process, A and B both terminate.

EXHIBIT 40-2 • Consolidation

In this illustration, Corporation A and Corporation B consolidate to form an entirely new organization, Corporation C. In the process, A and B terminate, and C comes into existence as an entirely new entity.

Corporation C comes into existence as an entirely new entity. Exhibit 40-2 illustrates this process.

The results of a consolidation are similar to those of a merger—only one company remains—but it is an entirely new entity (the consolidated corporation). C is a new corporation and a single entity; A and B cease to exist. C inherits all of the rights, privileges, and powers previously held by A and B. Title to any property and assets owned by A and B passes to C without a formal transfer. C assumes liability for all debts and obligations owed by A and B. The articles of consolidation take the place of A's and B's original corporate articles and are thereafter regarded as C's corporate articles.

When a merger or a consolidation takes place, the surviving corporation or newly formed corporation will issue shares or pay some fair consideration to the shareholders of the corporation or corporations that cease to exist. True consolidations have become less common among for-profit corporations because it is often advantageous for one of the firms to survive. In contrast, nonprofit corporations and associations may prefer consolidation because it suggests a new beginning in which neither of the two initial entities is dominant.

Share Exchange

In a share exchange, some or all of the shares of one corporation are exchanged for some or all of the shares of another corporation, but both corporations continue to exist. Share exchanges are often used to create holding companies (companies that own part or all of other companies' outstanding stock—see Chapter 38). For example, UAL Corporation is a large holding company that owns United Airlines. If one corporation owns all of the shares of another corporation, it is referred to as the parent corporation, and the wholly owned company is the subsidiary corporation.

Merger, Consolidation, and Share Exchange Procedures

All states have statutes authorizing mergers, consolidations, and share exchanges for domestic (in-state) and foreign (out-of-state) corporations. The procedures vary somewhat among jurisdictions. In some states, a consolidation resulting in an entirely new corporation simply follows the initial incorporation procedures discussed in Chapter 38, whereas other business combinations must follow the procedures outlined below.

The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (RMBCA) sets forth the following basic requirements [RMBCA 11.01–11.07]:

1. The board of directors of each corporation involved must adopt a plan of merger or share exchange.
2. The plan must specify any terms and conditions of the merger. It also must state the basis of valuing the shares of each merging corporation and how they will be converted into shares or other securities, cash, property, or other interests in another corporation.
3. The majority of the shareholders of each corporation must vote to approve the plan at a shareholders' meeting. If any class of stock is entitled to vote as a separate group, the majority of each separate voting group must approve the plan. Although RMBCA 11.04(e) requires only a simple majority of the shareholders entitled to vote once a quorum is present, frequently a corporation's articles of incorporation or bylaws require greater than a majority approval. In addition, some state statutes require the approval of two-thirds of the outstanding shares of voting stock, and others require a four-fifths approval.
4. Once approved by the directors and the shareholders of both corporations, the surviving corporation files the plan (articles of merger, consolidation, or share exchange) with the appropriate official, usually the secretary of state.

5. When state formalities are satisfied, the state issues a certificate of merger to the surviving corporation or a certificate of consolidation to the newly consolidated corporation.

Short-Form Mergers

RMBCA 11.04 provides a simplified procedure for the merger of a substantially owned subsidiary corporation into its parent corporation. Under these provisions, a short-form merger—also referred to as a parent-subsidiary merger—can be accomplished without the approval of the shareholders of either corporation. The short-form merger can be used only when the parent corporation owns at least 90 percent of the outstanding shares of each class of stock of the subsidiary corporation. Once the board of directors of the parent corporation approves the plan, it is filed with the state, and copies are sent to each shareholder of record in the subsidiary corporation.

Shareholder Approval

As mentioned, except in a short-form merger, the shareholders of both corporations must approve a merger or other plan of consolidation. Shareholders invest in a corporation with the expectation that the board of directors will manage the enterprise and make decisions on ordinary business matters. For extraordinary matters, normally both the board of directors and the shareholders must approve of the transaction.

Mergers and other combinations are extraordinary business matters, meaning that the board of directors must normally obtain the shareholders' approval and provide appraisal rights (discussed next). Amendments to the articles of incorporation and the dissolution of the corporation also generally require shareholder approval. Sometimes, a transaction can be structured in such a way that shareholder approval is not required, but if the shareholders challenge the transaction, a court might require shareholder approval. For this reason, the board of directors may request shareholder approval even when it might not be legally required.

Appraisal Rights

What if a shareholder disapproves of a merger or a consolidation but is outvoted by the other shareholders? The law recognizes that a dissenting shareholder should not be forced to become an unwilling shareholder in a corporation that is new or different from the one in which the shareholder originally invested. Dissenting shareholders therefore are given a statutory right to be paid the fair value of the number of shares they held on the date of the merger or consolidation. This right is referred to as the shareholder's appraisal right. So long as the transaction does not involve fraud or other illegal conduct, appraisal rights are the exclusive remedy for a shareholder who is dissatisfied with the price received for the stock.

Appraisal rights normally extend to regular mergers, consolidations, share exchanges, short-form mergers, and sales of substantially all of the corporate assets not in the ordinary course of business. Such rights can be particularly important in a short-form merger because the minority stockholders do not receive advance notice of the merger, the directors do not consider or approve it, and there is no vote.¹ Appraisal rights are often the only recourse available to shareholders who object to parent-subsidary mergers.

Appraisal Rights Procedures Each state establishes the procedures for asserting appraisal rights in that jurisdiction. Generally, the corporation must notify shareholders that appraisal rights are or may be available [RMBCA 13.20]. The dissenting shareholders usually must file a written notice of intent to demand payment with the corporation, before the shareholders' vote on the proposed transaction [RMBCA 13.21]. The "fair value of shares" normally is the value on the day prior to the date on which the vote was taken [RMBCA 13.21]. The corporation must make a written offer to purchase a dissenting shareholder's stock, accompanying the offer with a current balance sheet and income statement for the corporation. If the shareholder and the corporation do not agree on the fair value, a court will determine it.

Shareholders may lose their appraisal rights if they do not adhere precisely to the procedures prescribed by statute. When they lose the right to an appraisal, dissenting shareholders must go along with the transaction despite their objections.

Appraisal Rights and Shareholder Status Under the RMBCA, once a dissenting shareholder elects appraisal rights, the shareholder loses her or his shareholder status [RMBCA 13.23]. Without that status, the shareholder cannot vote, receive dividends, or sue to enjoin whatever action prompted the dissent. In some jurisdictions (and under the RMBCA), shareholder status may be reinstated if the shareholder decides to withdraw from the appraisal process. In other jurisdictions, shareholder status may not be reinstated until the appraisal is concluded.

1. See, for example, Glassman v. Unocal Exploration Corp., 777 A.2d 242 (Del.Sup.Ct. 2001).

Purchase of Assets

When a corporation acquires all or substantially all of the assets of another corporation by direct purchase, the purchasing, or acquiring, corporation simply extends its ownership and control over more assets. Because no change in the legal entity occurs, the acquiring corporation usually does not need to obtain shareholder approval for the purchase.²

Both the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, however, have issued guidelines that significantly constrain and often prohibit mergers that could result from a purchase of assets. (These guidelines are part of the federal antitrust laws that will be discussed in Chapter 46.)

Sales of Corporate Assets

Note that the corporation that is selling all of its assets is substantially changing its business position and perhaps its ability to carry out its corporate purposes. For that reason, the corporation whose assets are being sold must obtain approval from both its board of directors and its shareholders [RMBCA 12.02]. In most states and under RMBCA 13.02, dissenting shareholders of the selling corporation can demand appraisal rights.

Successor Liability in Purchases of Assets

Generally, a corporation that purchases the assets of another corporation is not automatically responsible for the liabilities of the selling corporation. Exceptions to this rule are made in the following circumstances:

2. Shareholder approval may be required in a few situations. If the acquiring corporation plans to pay for the assets with its own corporate stock but not enough authorized unissued shares are available, then shareholders must vote to approve an amendment to the corporate articles. Also, if the acquiring corporation is a company whose stock is traded on a national stock exchange and it will be issuing a significant number (at least 20 percent) of its outstanding shares, shareholders must approve.

1. When the purchasing corporation impliedly or expressly assumes the seller's liabilities.
2. When the sale transaction is actually a merger or consolidation of the two companies.³
3. When the purchasing corporation is merely a continuation of the selling corporation—that is, the buyer continues operating the seller's business in the same manner and retains the same personnel (same directors, officers, and shareholders).
4. When the sale is entered into fraudulently for the purpose of escaping liability.

In any of these situations, the acquiring corporation will be held to have assumed both the assets and the liabilities of the selling corporation.

Purchase of Stock

An alternative to the purchase of another corporation's assets is the purchase of a substantial number of the voting shares of its stock. This enables the acquiring corporation to gain control of the acquired corporation, or target corporation. The process of acquiring control over a corporation in this way is commonly referred to as a corporate takeover.

Tender Offers

In seeking to purchase the stock of the target corporation, the acquiring corporation deals directly with the target's shareholders by making a tender offer. A tender offer is a proposal to buy shares of stock from a target corporation's shareholders either for cash or for some type of corporate security of the acquiring company. The tender offer can be conditioned on the receipt of a specified number of outstanding shares by a certain date. As a means of inducing shareholders to accept the offer, the tender price offered generally is higher than the market price of the target's stock prior to the announcement of the tender offer. For example, in the 2006 merger of AT&T and BellSouth, BellSouth shareholders received approximately $37.09 per share—a 16 percent premium over the market price of the stock.

3. See, for example, Cargo Partner AG v. Albatrans, Inc., 352 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2003) applying New York law on de facto mergers; and Village Builders 96, L.P. v. U.S. Laboratories, Inc., 121 Nev. 261, 112 P.3d 1082 (2005).

Federal securities laws strictly control the terms, duration, and circumstances under which most tender offers are made. Generally, the offering corporation does not need to notify the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) or the target corporation's management until after the tender offer is made. The offeror must then disclose to the SEC the source of the funds used in the offer, the purpose of the offer, and the acquiring corporation's plans for the firm if the takeover is successful.

In addition, a majority of states have passed anti-takeover statutes. Although some of these state statutes have been found to violate the commerce clause of the U.S. Constitution, others have been upheld as constitutional.⁴

Responses to Tender Offers

A firm may respond to a tender offer in numerous ways. If the target firm's board of directors views the tender offer as favorable, the board will recommend that the shareholders accept it. Frequently, though, the target corporation's management opposes the proposed takeover.

To resist a takeover, a target company may make a self-tender, in which it offers to acquire stock from its own shareholders and thereby retain corporate control. The target corporation may also engage in a media campaign to persuade its shareholders that the tender offer is not in their best interests. Another possible defense is for the target firm to issue additional stock, thereby increasing the number of shares that the acquiring corporation must purchase to gain control.

Alternatively, a target corporation might resort to one of several other tactics to resist a takeover (see Exhibit 40-3). In one commonly used tactic, known as a poison pill, a target company gives its shareholders rights to purchase additional shares at low prices when there is a takeover attempt. A poison pill is an attempt to prevent a takeover by making it prohibitively expensive.

Concept Summary 40.1 on page 826 reviews all of the ways in which a corporation may expand its operations.

Dynamics Corp. of America*, 481 U.S. 69, 107 S.Ct. 1637, 95 L.Ed.2d 67 (1987). For a case in which a federal district court found that Arizona's statute was unconstitutional, see Rocket Acquisition Corp. v. Ventana Medical Systems, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Ariz. 2007).

EXHIBIT 40-3 • The Terminology of Takeover Defenses

Type	Definition
Crown Jewel	When threatened with a takeover, management makes the company less attractive to the raider by selling to a third party the company's most valuable asset (the "crown jewel").
Golden Parachute	When a takeover is successful, top management is usually changed. With this in mind, a company may establish special termination or retirement benefits that must be paid to top managers if they are "retired." In other words, a departing high-level manager's parachute will be "golden" when he or she is forced to "bail out" of the company.
Greenmail	To regain control, a target company may pay a higher-than-market price to repurchase all of the stock bought by the acquiring corporation. When a takeover is attempted through a gradual accumulation of target stock rather than a tender offer, the intent may be to induce the target company to buy back the shares at a premium price—a concept similar to blackmail.
Pac-Man	Named after the Atari video game, this is an aggressive defense in which the target corporation attempts its own takeover of the acquiring corporation.
Poison Pill	The target corporation issues to its stockholders rights to purchase additional shares at low prices when there is a takeover attempt. This makes the takeover undesirably or even prohibitively expensive for the acquiring corporation.
White Knight	The target corporation solicits a merger with a third party, which then makes a better (often simply a higher) tender offer to the target's shareholders. The third party that "rescues" the target is the "white knight."

Takeover Defenses and Directors' Fiduciary Duties

As mentioned, the board of directors of the target corporation often opposes the takeover. Clearly, board members have an interest in keeping their jobs and control, but they also have a fiduciary duty to the corporation and its shareholders to act in the best interests of the company. In a hostile takeover attempt, sometimes directors' duties of care and loyalty collide with their self-interest. Then the shareholders, who would have received a premium for their shares as a result of the takeover, file lawsuits alleging that the directors breached their fiduciary duties in defending against the tender offer.

In this situation, courts apply the business judgment rule (discussed in Chapter 39) to analyze whether the directors acted reasonably in resisting the takeover attempt. The directors must show that they had reasonable grounds to believe that the tender offer posed a danger to the corporation's policies and effectiveness. In addition, the board's response must have been rational in relation to the threat posed.⁵ Basically, the defensive tactics used must have been reasonable, and the board of directors must have been trying to protect the corporation and its shareholders from a perceived danger. If the directors' actions were reasonable under the circumstances, then they are not liable for breaching their fiduciary duties.

Takeovers and Antitrust Law

Sometimes, a target corporation will seek an injunction against an aggressor on the ground that the attempted takeover violates antitrust laws. This defense may succeed if a court finds that the takeover would result in a substantial increase in the acquiring corporation's market power. Because antitrust laws are designed to protect competition rather than competitors, incumbent Federal and state securities laws strictly control the terms, duration, and circumstances under which most tender offers are made. 2. Target responses—The ways in which target corporations respond to takeover bids include self-tender (the target firm's offer to acquire its own shareholders' stock) and numerous other strategies (see Exhibit 40-3 on page 825).

managers who are able to avoid a takeover by resorting to the use of private antitrust actions are unintended beneficiaries of the laws.

As will be discussed in Chapter 46, antitrust challenges to mergers may also be brought by the government rather than by private parties. Hence, the antitrust considerations involved in a proposed takeover can exist apart from the consideration of defense tactics.

Termination

The termination of a corporation's existence has two phases—dissolution and winding up. Dissolution is the legal death of the artificial “person” of the corporation. Winding up is the process by which corporate assets are liquidated, or converted into cash and distributed among creditors and shareholders according to specific rules of preference.⁶

6. Some prefer to call this phase liquidation, but we use the term winding up to mean all acts needed to bring the legal and financial affairs of the business to an end, including liquidating the assets and distributing them among creditors and shareholders. See RMBCA 14.05.

Voluntary Dissolution

Dissolution can be brought about voluntarily by the directors and the shareholders. State incorporation statutes establish the required procedures for voluntarily dissolving a corporation. Basically, there are two possible methods: by the shareholders' unanimous vote to initiate dissolution proceedings,⁷ or by a proposal of the board of directors that is submitted to the shareholders at a shareholders' meeting.

When a corporation is dissolved voluntarily, the corporation must file articles of dissolution with the state and notify its creditors of the dissolution. The corporation must also establish a date (at least 120 days after the date of dissolution) by which all claims against the corporation must be received [RMBCA 14.06].

A corporation's creditors want to be notified when the firm is dissolved so that they can file claims for payment. If a corporation is dissolved and its assets are liquidated without notice to a party who has a claim against the firm, who is liable for the debt? That was the question in the following case.

7. Only some states allow shareholders to initiate corporation dissolution. See, for example, Delaware Code Annotated Title 8, Section 275(c).

EXTENDED CASE 40.2 Parent v. Amity Autoworld, Ltd.

New York District Court, Suffolk County, Third District, 2007. 15 Misc.3d 633, 832 N.Y.S.2d 775.

C. STEPHEN HACKELING, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The plaintiff [Christine Parent] leased an automobile from Amity Autoworld, Ltd. (hereafter “Amity”) [in Amityville, New York] in January 2002.

Amity sold all its Toyota automobile franchise assets * * * to respondent J S Autoworld, Ltd. (hereafter “Atlantic”) pursuant to agreement in May 2002. * * * [T]he alleged payments for the Amity dealership were made * * * directly to John Staluppi, Jr. * * *

The plaintiff made a written claim for money damages to Amity on June 11, 2002.

The plaintiff commenced a small claims action [in a New York state court] against Amity via complaint dated March 9, 2005 and obtained a $2,643 * * * award. * * *

The Suffolk County Sheriff returned the plaintiff's execution against Amity as unsatisfied on July 12, 2006, advising that the Toyota dealership is now owned by Atlantic.

* * * *

Amity's principal stockholder [was] John Staluppi, Jr., who is the son of Atlantic's principal stockholder John Staluppi, Sr. John Staluppi, Jr. is listed with the N.Y. State Division of Corporation database as the “chairman, chief executive officer, executive officer and agent for process of Amity Autoworld, Ltd.” * * *

* * * *

* * * Even in the absence of fraud, it [is] a violation of a duty on the part of the directors of a corporation to divest itself of all its property without affording a reasonable opportunity to its creditors to present and enforce their claims before the transfer becomes effective. [Emphasis added.]

CASE CONTINUES

The assets of a corporation constitute a * * * fund for the payment of its debts. After the return of an unsatisfied execution against the defunct corporation, a creditor may maintain an action against a shareholder to reach assets received by him. Directors incur derivative personal liability when they undertake to divest a corporation of all its property and in reality dissolve it without undertaking the proceedings for voluntary dissolution. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * [Section] * * * 1007 of the [New York] Business Corporation Law * * * provides:

* * * *

[Section] 1007. Notice to creditors; filing or barring claims

(a) At any time after dissolution, the corporation may give a notice requiring all creditors and claimants * * * to present their claims in writing and in detail at a specified place and by a specified day, which shall not be less than six months after the first publication of such notice. Such notice shall be published at least once a week for two successive weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the county in which the office of the corporation was located * * * .

The Court notes that the use of the language “may give notice” to creditors in [Section] 1007 is permissive in nature. As such, * * * New York law allows for a corporation to informally dissolve by transferring all its assets without giving notice to creditors. However, * * * the cost of an informal dissolution is that directors cannot shield themselves against corporate creditor liability. Directors who undertake to divest a corporation of all its property without taking the proceedings for a voluntary dissolution do so at their peril. * * *

In the matter presented, it is undisputed that Amity was informally liquidated and dissolved without notice to creditors and that its sole shareholder, John Staluppi, Jr. received in excess of $4,000,000 personally. * * * Accordingly, the Court authorizes the amendment of the plaintiff’s complaint to include John Staluppi, Jr. as a * * * defendant and directs the Clerk of the Court to serve * * * a copy of the amended summons and this decision upon John Staluppi, Jr. * * * The Clerk shall also schedule a trial of the matter.

QUESTIONS

1. A corporation may do business under a variety of names—the name of one of its owners or officers, the name under which it is incorporated, or the name on a sign at its business premises, for example. How strictly should the law require a judgment to be issued against a corporation in its “true” name?
2. Could a corporation’s former directors or shareholders, or its successors, avoid liability following its informal dissolution by claiming that they did all they felt was necessary to protect its creditors? Why or why not?

Involuntary Dissolution

Because corporations are creatures of statute, the state can also dissolve a corporation in certain circumstances. The secretary of state or the state attorney general can bring an action to dissolve a corporation that has failed to pay its annual taxes or to submit required annual reports, for example [RMBCA 14.20]. A state court can also dissolve a corporation that has engaged in ultra vires acts or committed fraud or misrepresentation to the state during incorporation. Courts can also dissolve a corporation for mismanagement [RMBCA 14.30].

In some circumstances, a shareholder or a group of shareholders may petition a court to have the corporation dissolved. The RMBCA permits any shareholder to initiate an action for dissolution in any of the following circumstances [RMBCA 14.30]:

1. The directors are deadlocked in the management of corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and the corporation is suffering irreparable injury as a result or is about to do so.

2. The acts of the directors or those in control of the corporation are illegal, oppressive, or fraudulent.
3. Corporate assets are being misapplied or wasted.
4. The shareholders are deadlocked in voting power and have failed, for a specified period (usually two annual meetings), to elect successors to directors whose terms have expired or would have expired with the election of successors.

As noted above, a court may dissolve a corporation if the controlling shareholders or directors have engaged in fraudulent, illegal, or oppressive conduct. For example, Mt. Princeton Trout Club, Inc. (MPTC), was formed to own land in Colorado and provide fishing and other recreational benefits to its shareholders. The articles of incorporation prohibited MPTC from selling or leasing any of the property and assets of the corporation without the approval of a majority of the directors. Despite this provision, MPTC officers entered into leases and contracts to sell corporate property without even notifying the directors. When a shareholder, Sam Colt, petitioned for dissolution, the court dissolved MPTC based on a finding that its officers had engaged in illegal, oppressive, and fraudulent conduct.⁸

The issue in the following case was whether the circumstances satisfied the statutory requirements for a court to dissolve a trucking corporation.

8. Colt v. Mt. Princeton Trout Club, Inc., 78 P3d 1115 (Colo.App. 2003).

C A S E 40.3 Sartori v. S & S Trucking, Inc.

Supreme Court of Montana, 2006. 2006 MT 164, 332 Mont. 503, 139 P.3d 806.

● Background and Facts Tony Stacy approached his friend Justin Sartori about buying a trucking business and operating it together. Sartori agreed, and because he had a good credit rating and Stacy did not, Sartori borrowed $78,493.68 from First Interstate Bank in Eureka, Montana, to buy the business. In September 2003, they formed S & S Trucking, Inc., and agreed to be its only directors, officers, and shareholders, with each owning an equal number of shares. Within weeks, however, they realized that they were incompatible. For example, Sartori often did not show up when and where Stacy expected, and they differed over the payment of earnings from S & S's income. In October, Sartori incorporated Brimstone Enterprise to undermine S & S. He had S & S's mail forwarded to Brimstone, transferred S & S's licenses to Brimstone, and attempted to attract S & S's customers to Brimstone. In mid-November, he quit working for S & S and filed a suit in a Montana state court against S & S and Stacy, demanding that the firm be dissolved. The court set a deadline for the dissolution. The defendants appealed to the Montana Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice W. WILLIAM LEAPHART delivered the Opinion of the Court.

* * * *

The [lower] Court dissolved S & S pursuant to [Montana Code Section] 35-1-938(2), which states that a * * * court may dissolve a corporation in a proceeding by a shareholder if it is established that:

- (a) the directors are deadlocked in the management of the corporate affairs, the shareholders are unable to break the deadlock, and irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally because of the deadlock * * * .

Stacy maintains on appeal that, rather than dissolving the corporation, the * * * Court * * * should have simply removed Sartori as a shareholder and director of the corporation. While Stacy appears to concede that he and Sartori were unable to break their management deadlock as to corporate affairs, he argues that the court failed to find any harm to the corporation per the statutory language. Stacy stresses the fact that S & S is now a twelve-employee company that has thrived in the wake of Sartori's departure. Since there has been no corporate injury, Stacy argues, there can be no dissolution.

In making this argument, Stacy ignores relevant statutory language. Section 35-1-938(2)(a) * * * provides that the court may order dissolution if "irreparable injury to the corporation is threatened or being suffered or the business and affairs of the corporation can no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders generally because of the deadlock." Stacy and Sartori were S & S's only shareholders. Although the corporation may not have suffered irreparable injury, the [lower] Court found that the management deadlock led Sartori to take numerous steps to sabotage the corporation. As a result, the business and affairs of S & S could no longer be conducted to the advantage of the shareholders, Stacy and Sartori. The court properly exercised its statutory authority when it dissolved S & S. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The Montana Supreme Court held that the dissolution of a corporation may be ordered without a finding that the firm has suffered or is threatened with an injury if its business can no longer be conducted to its shareholders' advantage. Thus, the order for the dissolution of S & S was correct, and the court affirmed the decision of the lower court.

● The Ethical Dimension Did Sartori or Stacy behave unethically toward each other or toward their corporation? Discuss.

● The Legal Environment Dimension At the time of the defendants' appeal, S & S had twelve employees and, according to Stacy, its business was thriving. Should the court have taken these factors into consideration when deciding whether to order the dissolution of the firm? Explain.

Winding Up

When dissolution takes place by voluntary action, the members of the board of directors act as trustees of the corporate assets. As trustees, they are responsible for winding up the affairs of the corporation for the benefit of corporate creditors and shareholders. This makes the board members personally liable for any breach of their fiduciary trustee duties.

When the dissolution is involuntary—or if board members do not wish to act as trustees of the assets—the court will appoint a receiver to wind up the corporate affairs and liquidate corporate assets. Courts may also appoint a receiver when shareholders or creditors can show that the board of directors should not be permitted to act as trustees of the corporate assets. On dissolution, the liquidated assets are first used to pay creditors. Any remaining assets are distributed to shareholders according to their respective stock rights; preferred stock has priority over common stock. Generally, the preferences are stated in the corporate articles.

Major Business Forms Compared

As mentioned in Chapter 35, when deciding which form of business organization to choose, businesspersons normally consider several factors, including ease of creation, the liability of the owners, tax considerations, and the need for capital. Each major form of business organization offers distinct advantages and disadvantages with respect to these and other factors. Exhibit 40-4 on pages 831-832 summarizes the essential advantages and disadvantages of each of the forms of business organization discussed in Chapters 35 through 40.

EXHIBIT 40-4 • Major Forms of Business Compared

Characteristic	Sole Proprietorship	Partnership	Corporation
Method of Creation	Created at will by owner.	Created by agreement of the parties.	Authorized by the state under the state's corporation law.
Legal Position	Not a separate entity; owner is the business.	Is a separate legal entity in most states.	Always a legal entity separate and distinct from its owners—a legal fiction for the purposes of owning property and being a party to litigation.
Liability	Unlimited liability.	Unlimited liability.	Limited liability of shareholders—shareholders are not liable for the debts of the corporation.
Duration	Determined by owner; automatically dissolved on owner's death.	Terminated by agreement of the partners, but can continue to do business even when a partner dissociates from the partnership.	Can have perpetual existence.
Transferability of Interest	Interest can be transferred, but individual's proprietorship then ends.	Although partnership interest can be assigned, assignee does not have full rights of a partner.	Shares of stock can be transferred.
Management	Completely at owner's discretion.	Each general partner has a direct and equal voice in management unless expressly agreed otherwise in the partnership agreement.	Shareholders elect directors, who set policy and appoint officers.
Taxation	Owner pays personal taxes on business income.	Each partner pays income taxes in proportion to her or his share of the net profits, whether or not they are distributed.	Double taxation—corporation pays income tax on net profits, with no deduction for dividends, and shareholders pay income tax on disbursed dividends they receive.
Organizational Fees, Annual License Fees, and Annual Reports	None or minimal.	None or minimal.	All required.
Transaction of Business in Other States	Generally no limitation.	Generally no limitation. ^a	Normally must file a foreign qualification form to do business in another state.

a. A few states have enacted statutes requiring that foreign partnerships qualify to do business there.

Characteristic	Limited Partnership	Limited Liability Company	Limited Liability Partnership
Method of Creation	Created by agreement to carry on a business for a profit. At least one party must be a general partner and the other(s) limited partner(s). Certificate of limited partnership is filed. Charter must be issued by the state.	Created by an agreement of the member-owners of the company. Articles of organization are filed. Charter must be issued by the state.	Created by agreement of the partners. A statement of qualification for the limited liability partnership is filed.
Legal Position	Treated as a legal entity.	Treated as a legal entity.	Generally, treated same as a general partnership.
Liability	Unlimited liability of all general partners; limited partners are liable only to the extent of capital contributions.	Member-owners' liability is limited to the amount of capital contributions or investments.	Varies, but under the Uniform Partnership Act, liability of a partner for acts committed by other partners is limited.
Duration	By agreement in certificate, or by termination of the last general partner (retirement, death, and the like) or last limited partner.	Unless a single-member LLC, can have perpetual existence (same as a corporation).	Remains in existence until cancellation or revocation.
Transferability of Interest	Interest can be assigned (same as general partnership), but if assignee becomes a member with consent of other partners, certificate must be amended.	Member interests are freely transferable.	Interest can be assigned same as in a general partnership.
Management	General partners have equal voice or by agreement. Limited partners may not retain limited liability if they actively participate in management.	Member-owners can fully participate in management, or management is selected by member-owners who manage on behalf of the members.	Same as a general partnership.
Taxation	Generally taxed as a partnership.	LLC is not taxed, and members are taxed personally on profits "passed through" the LLC.	Same as a general partnership.
Organizational Fees, Annual License Fees, and Annual Reports	Organizational fee required; usually not others.	Organizational fee required; others vary with states.	Fees are set by each state for filing statements of qualification, foreign qualification, and annual reports.
Transaction of Business in Other States	Generally no limitations.	Generally no limitation, but may vary depending on state.	Must file a statement of foreign qualification before doing business in another state.

REVIEWING CORPORATIONS—Merger, Consolidation, and Termination

In November 2002, Mario Bonsetti and Rico Sanchez incorporated Gnarly Vulcan Gear, Inc. (GVG), to manufacture windsurfing equipment. Bonsetti owned 60 percent and Sanchez owned 40 percent of the corporation's stock, and both men served on the board of directors. In January 2006, Hula Boards, Inc., owned solely by Mai Jin Li, made a public offer to Bonsetti and Sanchez to buy GVG stock. Hula offered 30 percent more than the market price per share for the GVG stock, and Bonsetti and Sanchez each sold 20 percent of their stock to Hula. Jin Li became the third member of the GVG board of directors. In April 2008, an irreconcilable dispute arose between Bonsetti and Sanchez over design modifications of their popular Baked Chameleon board. Sanchez and Jin Li voted to merge GVG with Hula Boards under the latter name, despite Bonsetti's dissent. Gnarly Vulcan Gear was dissolved and production of the Baked Chameleon ceased. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What rights does Bonsetti have (in most states) as a minority shareholder dissenting to the merger of GVG and Hula Boards?
2. Could the parties have used a short-form merger procedure in this situation? Why or why not?
3. What is the term used for Hula's offer to purchase GVG stock? By what method did Hula acquire control over GVG?
4. Suppose that after the merger, a person who was injured on a Baked Chameleon board sued Hula (the surviving corporation). Can Hula be held liable for an injury? Why or why not?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

40-1. Gretz is the chair of the board of directors of Faraday, Inc., and Williams is the chair of the board of directors of Firebrand, Inc. Faraday is a manufacturing corporation, and Firebrand is a transportation corporation. Gretz and Williams meet to discuss the possibility of combining their corporations and activities into a single corporate entity. They consider two alternative courses of action: (1) Faraday acquires all of the stock and assets of Firebrand, or (2) the two corporations combine to form a new corporation, Farabrand, Inc. Both chairs are concerned about the necessity of a formal transfer of property, liability for existing debts, and the need to amend the articles of incorporation. Explain what the two proposed combinations are called, and discuss the legal effect each has on the transfer of property, the liabilities of the combined corporations, and the need to amend the articles of incorporation.

40-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Alir owns 10,000 shares of Ajax Corp. Her shares represent a 10 percent ownership in Ajax. Zeta Corp. is interested in acquiring Ajax in a merger, and the board of directors of each corporation has approved the merger. The shareholders of Zeta have already approved the acquisition, and Ajax has called for a shareholders' meeting to approve the merger. Alir disapproves of the merger and does not want to accept Zeta shares for the Ajax shares she holds. The market price of Ajax shares is $20 per share the day before the shareholder vote and drops to $16 on the day the shareholders of Ajax approve the merger. Discuss Alir's rights in this matter, beginning with the notice of the proposed merger.

- For a sample answer to Question 40-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

40-3. Alitech Corp. is a small midwestern business that owns a valuable patent. Alitech has approximately 1,000 shareholders with 100,000 authorized and outstanding shares. Block Corp. would like to have the use of the patent, but Alitech refuses to give Block a license. Block has tried to acquire Alitech by purchasing Alitech's assets, but Alitech's board of directors has refused to approve the acquisition. Alitech's shares are selling for $5 per share. Discuss how Block Corp. might proceed to gain the control and use of Alitech's patent.

40-4. Saunders Corp. has been experiencing losses for several years but still has valuable fixed assets. The shareholders see little hope that the corporation will ever make a profit. Another corporation, Topway Corp., has not paid state taxes for several years or filed annual reports as required by statute. In addition, Topway is accused of committing gross and persistent ultra vires acts. Discuss whether these corporations will be terminated and how the assets of each would be handled on dissolution.

40-5. Successor Liability. In 1996, Robert McClellan, a licensed contractor doing business as McClellan Design and Construction, entered into a contract with Peppertree North Condominium Association, Inc., to do earthquake repair work on Peppertree's seventy-six-unit condominium complex in Northridge, California. McClellan completed the work, but Peppertree failed to pay. In an arbitration proceeding against Peppertree to collect the amount due, McClellan was awarded $141,000, plus 10 percent interest, attorneys' fees, and costs. McClellan filed a suit in a California state court against Peppertree to confirm the award. Meanwhile, the Peppertree board of directors filed articles of incorporation for Northridge Park Townhome Owners Association, Inc., and immediately transferred Peppertree's authority, responsibilities, and assets to the new association. Two weeks later, the court issued a judgment against Peppertree. When McClellan learned about the new association, he filed a motion asking the court to add Northridge as a debtor to the judgment. Should the court grant the motion? Why or why not? [McClellan v. Northridge Park Townhome Owners Association, Inc., 89 Cal.App.4th 746, 107 Cal.Rptr.2d 702 (2 Dist. 2001)]

40-6. Corporate Dissolution. Trans-System, Inc. (TSI), is an interstate trucking business. In 1994, to provide a source of well-trained drivers, TSI formed Northwestern Career Institute, Inc., a school for persons interested in obtaining a commercial driver's license. Tim Scott, who had worked for TSI since 1987, was named chief administrative officer and director. Scott, a Northwestern shareholder, disagreed with James Williams, the majority shareholder of both TSI and Northwestern, over four equipment leases between the two firms under which the sum of the payments exceeded the value of the equipment by not more than $3,000. Under four other leases, payments were $40,000 less than the value of the equipment. Scott also disputed TSI's one-time use, for purposes unrelated to the driving school, of $125,000 borrowed by Northwestern. Scott was terminated in 1998. He filed a suit in a Washington state court against TSI, seeking, among other things, the dissolution of Northwestern on the ground that the directors of the two firms had acted in an oppressive manner and misapplied corporate assets. Should the court grant this relief? If not, what remedy might be appropriate? Discuss. [Scott v. Trans-System, Inc., 148 Wash.2d 701, 64 P3d 1 (2003)]

40-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In January 1999, General Star Indemnity Co. agreed to insure Indianapolis Racing League (IRL) race cars against damage during on-track accidents. In connection with the insurance, General Star deposited $400,000 with G Force LLC (GFCO), a Colorado firm, to enable it to buy and provide parts for damaged cars without delay. GFCO agreed to return any unspent funds. Near the end of the season, Elan Motorsports Technologies (EMT) acquired GFCO. In 2000, EMT incorporated G Force LLC in Georgia (GFGA), and GFCO ceased to exist. GFGA renewed the arrangement with General Star and engaged in the same operations as GFCO, but EMT employees conducted GFGA's business at EMT's offices. In 2002, EMT assumed ownership of GFGA's assets and continued the business. EMT also assumed GFGA's liabilities, except for the obligation to return General Star's unspent funds. General Star filed a suit in a Georgia state court against EMT, seeking to recover its deposit. What is the rule concerning the liability of a corporation that buys the assets of another? Are there exceptions? Which principles apply in this case? Explain. [General Star Indemnity Co. v. Elan Motorsports Technologies, Inc., 356 F.Supp.2d 1333 (N.D.Ga. 2004)]

40-8. Purchase of Assets. Paradise Pools, Inc. (PPI), also known as "Paradise Pools and Spas," was incorporated in 1981. In 1994, PPI entered into a contract with Bromanco, Inc., to build a pool in Vicksburg, Mississippi, as part of a Days Inn Hotel project being developed by Amerihost Development, Inc. PPI built the pool, but Bromanco, the general contractor, defaulted on other parts of the project, and Amerihost completed the construction itself. Litigation ensued in Mississippi state courts, and Amerihost was awarded $12,656.46 against PPI. Meanwhile, Paradise Corp. (PC) was incorporated in 1995 with the same management as PPI, but different shareholders. PC acquired PPI's assets in 1996, without assuming its liabilities, and soon became known as "Paradise Pools and Spas." Amerihost obtained a writ of garnishment against PC to enforce the judgment against PPI. PC filed a motion to dismiss the writ on the basis that it was "not a party to the proceeding." Should the court dismiss the case? Why or why not? [Paradise Corp. v. Amerihost Development, Inc., 848 So.2d 177 (Miss. 2003)]

40-9. Dissolution. Clara Mahaffey operated Mahaffey's Auto Salvage, Inc., in Dayton, Ohio, as a sole proprietorship. In 1993, Kenneth Stumpff and Mahaffey's son, Richard Harris, joined the firm. Stumpff ran the wrecker and bought the vehicles for salvage. Harris handled the day-to-day operations and the bookkeeping. They became the company's equal 50 percent shareholders on Mahaffey's death in 2002. Harris, who inherited the land on which the firm was located, increased the rent to $1,500 per month. Within two years of Mahaffey's death, and without consulting Stumpff, Harris raised the rent to $2,500. Stumpff's wife died, and he took a leave of absence, during which the company paid him $2,500 a month and provided health insurance. After two years, Harris stopped the payments, discontinued the health benefits, and fired Stumpff, threatening to call the police if he came on the premises. Stumpff withdrew $16,000 from the firm's account, leaving a balance of $113. Harris offered to buy Stumpff's interest in the business, but Stumpff refused and filed a suit in an Ohio state court against Harris. A state statute permits the dissolution of a corporation if the owners are deadlocked in its management. Should the court order the dissolution of Mahaffey's? Why or why not? [Stumpff v. Harris, ___ N.E.2d ___ (Ohio App. 2 Dist. 2006)]

40-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Topps Co. makes baseball and other cards, including the Pokemon collection, and distributes Bazooka bubble gum and other confections. Arthur Shorin, the son of Joseph Shorin, one of Topps's founders and the inspiration for "Bazooka Joe" (a character in the comic strip wrapped around each piece of gum), worked for Topps for fifty years and had served as its board chairman and chief executive officer since 1980. Shorin's son-in-law, Scott Silverstein, served as Topps's president and chief operating officer. When Topps's financial performance began to lag, the board considered selling the company. Michael Eisner (formerly head of Disney Studios) offered to pay $9.75 per share and to retain Topps's management in a merger with his company. Upper Deck Co., Topps's chief competitor in the sports-card business, offered $10.75 per share but did not offer to retain the managers. Topps demanded that Upper Deck not reveal its bid publicly, but Topps publicized the offer, without accurately representing Upper Deck's interest and disparaging its seriousness. Upper Deck asked Topps to allow it to tell its side of events and to make a tender offer to Topps's shareholders. Topps refused and scheduled a shareholder vote on the Eisner offer. Topps's shareholders filed a suit in a Delaware state court against their firm, asking the court to prevent the vote. [In re Topps Co. Shareholders Litigation, 926 A.2d 58 (Del.Ch. 2007)]

- The shareholders contended that Topps's conduct had "tainted the vote." What factors support this contention? How might these factors affect the vote?
- Why might Topps's board and management be opposed to either of the offers for the company? Is this opposition ethical? Should the court enjoin (prevent) the scheduled vote? Explain.

CORPORATIONS— Securities Law and Corporate Governance

The stock market crash of October 29, 1929, and the ensuing economic depression caused the public to focus on the importance of securities markets for the economic well-being of the nation. Congress was pressured to regulate securities trading, and the result was the Securities Act of 1933¹ and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934.² Both acts were designed to provide investors with more information to help them make buying and selling decisions about securities—generally defined as any instruments evidencing corporate ownership (stock) or debts (bonds)—and to prohibit deceptive, unfair, and manipulative practices in the purchase and sale of securities.

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 77a–77aa.
2. 15 U.S.C. Sections 78a–78mm.

This chapter discusses the nature of federal securities regulation and its effect on the business world. We begin by looking at the federal administrative agency that regulates securities transactions, the Securities and Exchange Commission. Next, we examine the major traditional laws governing securities offerings and trading. We then discuss corporate governance and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which significantly affects certain types of securities transactions. In the concluding pages of this chapter, we look at how securities laws are being adapted to the online environment.

The Securities and Exchange Commission

The 1934 act created the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) as an independent regulatory agency that would administer the 1933 and 1934 acts. The SEC plays a key role in interpreting the provisions of these acts (and their amendments) and in creating regulations governing the purchase and sale of securities. The basic functions of the SEC are listed in Exhibit 41–1.

Organization of the SEC

The SEC's broad responsibilities are organized into four divisions—Corporate Finance, Market Regulation, Investment Management, and Enforcement. Each division handles different aspects of securities regulation in coordination with the other divisions.

EXHIBIT 41–1 • Basic Functions of the SEC

The Division of Corporate Finance reviews the documents that publicly held corporations are required to file with the SEC, including registration statements for new stock issues, quarterly and annual filings, and proxy materials. The Division of Market Regulation provides day-to-day oversight of the major securities market participants, including the national and regional securities exchanges and securities firms (brokers, dealers, and others). The Division of Investment Management interprets the laws affecting investment companies and supervises the activities of mutual fund companies.

The SEC is a law enforcement agency, and the Division of Enforcement carries out this function. This division investigates alleged securities law violations and recommends whether the agency should pursue civil or criminal sanctions against a violator and whether the action should be brought before an administrative law judge or in a federal court.

Updating the Regulatory Process

The SEC is working to make the regulatory process more efficient and more relevant to today's securities trading practices. To this end, the SEC has embraced modern technology and communications methods, especially the Internet, more completely than many other federal agencies have. For example, the agency now requires—not just allows—companies to file certain information electronically so that it can be posted on the SEC's EDGAR (Electronic Data Gathering, Analysis, and Retrieval) database. The EDGAR database includes material on initial public offerings (IPOs), proxy statements, corporations' annual reports, registration statements, and other documents that have been filed with the SEC. Investors can access the database via the Internet to obtain information that can be used to make investment decisions. (See the Law on the Web section at the end of this chapter for instructions on how to access the EDGAR database.)

In another example of how the SEC is adapting to the growing use of the Internet, in 2007 the agency issued new rules allowing companies to post their proxy materials on their Web sites rather than mailing the materials to shareholders (see the Insight into E-Commerce feature on pages 838 and 839 for a discussion of these new rules). Of course, the online environment can be used to perpetrate fraud as well as to disseminate information, and the SEC is taking steps to combat online securities fraud, as described later in this chapter.

The Securities Act of 1933

The Securities Act of 1933 governs initial sales of stock by businesses. The act was designed to prohibit various forms of fraud and to stabilize the securities industry by requiring that investors receive financial and other significant information concerning the securities being offered for public sale. Basically, the purpose of this act is to require disclosure. The 1933 act provides that all securities transactions must be registered with the SEC unless they are specifically exempt from the registration requirements.

What Is a Security?

Section 2(1) of the Securities Act of 1933 contains a broad definition of securities, which generally include the following:³

1. Instruments and interests commonly known as securities, such as preferred and common stocks, treasury stocks, bonds, debentures, and stock warrants.
2. Any interests commonly known as securities, such as stock options, puts, calls, or other types of privilege on a security or on the right to purchase a security or a group of securities in a national security exchange.
3. Notes, instruments, or other evidence of indebtedness, including certificates of interest in a profit-sharing agreement and certificates of deposit.
4. Any fractional undivided interest in oil, gas, or other mineral rights.
5. Investment contracts, which include interests in limited partnerships and other investment schemes.

In interpreting the act, the United States Supreme Court has held that an investment contract is any transaction in which a person (1) invests (2) in a common enterprise (3) reasonably expecting profits (4) derived primarily or substantially from others' managerial or entrepreneurial efforts. Known as the Howey test, this definition continues to guide the determination

INSIGHT INTO E-COMMERCE

Moving Company Information to the Internet

Anyone who has ever owned shares in a public company knows that such companies often are required to mail voluminous paper documents that relate to proxies. As of July 1, 2007, publicly held companies can now voluntarily utilize e-proxies.

Notice and Access: E-Proxy Rules

New Security and Exchange Commission (SEC) rules^a allow publicly held companies to furnish proxy materials to shareholders by posting them on a Web site and notifying the shareholders that the proxy materials are available online. This is called the “notice and access” model. (The SEC has also proposed an amendment to the proxy rules that would require publicly held companies to use e-proxies.)

The notice and access model involves the following steps:

1. The company posts the proxy materials on its publicly accessible Web site.
2. Subsequently, the company sends a (paper) notice to each shareholder at least forty calendar days prior to the date of the shareholders’ meeting for which the proxy is being solicited.

a. 17 C.F.R. Parts 240, 249, and 274.

3. No other materials can be sent along with the initial notice (unless the proxy is being combined with the meeting notice required by state law).
4. The notice must be written in plain English, and it must include a prominent statement of the following: the date, time, and location of the shareholders’ meeting; the specific Web site at which shareholders can access the proxy materials; an explanation of how they can obtain paper copies of the proxy materials at no cost; and a clear and impartial description of each matter to be considered at the shareholders’ meeting.
5. Next, the company must wait at least ten days before sending a “paper” proxy card to the shareholders. This ten-day waiting period provides shareholders with sufficient time to access the proxy materials online or to request paper copies.
6. If a shareholder requests paper proxy materials, the company must send them within three business days.
7. After receiving the initial paper notice, a shareholder can permanently elect to receive all future proxy materials on paper or by e-mail.

of what types of contracts can be considered securities.⁴

For our purposes, it is convenient to think of securities in their most common form—stocks and bonds issued by corporations. Bear in mind, though, that securities can take many forms, including interests in whiskey, cosmetics, worms, beavers, boats, vacuum cleaners, muskrats, and cemetery lots. Almost any stake in the ownership or debt of a company can be considered a security. Investment contracts in condominiums, franchises, limited partnerships in real estate, oil or gas or other mineral rights, pay-phone programs, and farm animals accompanied by care agreements have qualified as securities.⁵ Businesspersons may need to seek the advice of an attorney to determine whether a given transaction involves securities.

Registration Statement

Section 5 of the Securities Act of 1933 broadly provides that if a security does not qualify for an exemption, that security must be registered before it is offered to the public. Issuing corporations must file a registration statement with the SEC and must provide all investors with a prospectus. A prospectus is a written disclosure document that describes the security being sold, the financial operations of the issuing corporation, and the investment or risk attaching to the security. The 1933 act requires a prospectus to be delivered to investors, and issuers use this document as a selling tool. A company can also deliver a prospectus to investors electronically via the Internet.⁶ In principle, the registration statement and the prospectus supply sufficient infor-

6. Basically, an electronic prospectus must meet the same requirements as a printed prospectus. The SEC has special rules that address situations in which the graphics, images, or audio files in a printed prospectus cannot be reproduced in an electronic form. 17 C.F.R. Section 232.304.

Internet Postings and Blogs

Some commentators want the SEC to go even further in allowing information to be delivered online. On September 25, 2006, Jonathan Schwartz, the chief executive officer (CEO) of Sun Microsystems, Inc., sent a letter to the chair of the SEC arguing that the company should be able to use its Web site to disseminate information required by the SEC. Schwartz pointed out that Sun's Web site receives nearly one million hits per day and is a "tremendous vehicle for the broad delivery of timely and robust information." In his blog, which appears on the company's Web site, Schwartz lamented that until the SEC changed its rules, companies would still be "consuming trees with press releases."

The SEC's current rule, Regulation Fair Disclosure, or Regulation FD,^b does not allow significant information about a publicly held corporation to be distributed on the company's Web site or in its CEO's blog. Regulation FD was created in an attempt to ensure that some investors do not have more information than the general public. Under Regulation FD, when a company gives "material nonpublic information" about its prospects to certain individuals or entities, it must disclose that information to the public. To comply with the regulation, corporate executives typically first meet with stock market analysts, either in person or by teleconference, and then hold a press conference to disseminate the information to the public. Schwartz contends that "the proliferation of the Internet supports a new policy that online communications fully satisfy Regulation FD's broad distribution requirement."^c

So far, though, the SEC has not budged. Professor Adam Pritchard, who teaches securities law at the University of Michigan Law School, thinks that Schwartz's idea is commendable. He even suggests that a public company could just go ahead and use the corporate blog for disclosure, as nothing in the current SEC rules prohibits such use.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES

Clearly, continuing to use paper proxy materials and press releases printed on paper has an impact on the environment. Even when the paper is recycled, the sludge from the ink presents a problem. What might be preventing the SEC from mandating the use of online proxy materials to prevent the waste of so much paper?

c. Schwartz's letter is posted with a short article titled "One Small Step for the Blogosphere" at blogs.sun.com/jonathan/entry/one_small_step_for_the.

mation to enable unsophisticated investors to evaluate the financial risk involved.

Contents of the Registration Statement

The registration statement must be written in plain English and fully describe the following:

1. The securities being offered for sale, including their relationship to the registrant's other capital securities.
2. The corporation's properties and business (including a financial statement certified by an independent public accounting firm).
3. The management of the corporation, including managerial compensation, stock options, pensions, and other benefits. Any interests of directors or officers in any material transactions with the corporation must be disclosed.
4. How the corporation intends to use the proceeds of the sale.
5. Any pending lawsuits or special risk factors.

All companies, both domestic and foreign, must file their registration statements electronically. As mentioned previously, electronic filing enables the SEC to include the information in its electronic database, EDGAR, so that investors can access the information via the Internet.

Registration Process The registration statement does not become effective until after it has been reviewed and approved by the SEC. The 1933 act restricts the types of activities that an issuer can engage in at each stage of the registration process. If an issuer violates the restrictions discussed here, investors can rescind their contracts to purchase the securities. During the prefiling period (thirty days before filing the registration statement), the issuer cannot sell or offer to sell the securities. Advertising of an upcoming securities offering is not allowed during the prefiling period.

Waiting Period. Once the registration statement has been filed, a waiting period of at least twenty days begins during which the SEC reviews the registration statement for completeness. Typically, the staff members at the SEC who review the registration statement ask the registrant to make numerous changes and additions, which can extend the length of the waiting period.⁷

During the waiting period, the securities can be offered for sale but cannot be sold by the issuing corporation. Only certain types of offers are allowed. All issuers can distribute a preliminary prospectus, called a red herring prospectus.⁸ A red herring prospectus contains most of the information that will be included in the final prospectus but often does not include a price. General advertising is permitted, such as a tombstone ad, so named because historically the format resembled a tombstone. Such ads simply tell the investor where and how to obtain a prospectus.⁹

In 2005, the SEC, in recognition of modern communications technologies, reformed its rules to authorize the use of a free-writing prospectus during this period.¹⁰ A free-writing prospectus is any type of written, electronic, or graphic offer that describes the issuer or its securities and includes a legend indicating that the investor may obtain the prospectus at the SEC's Web site. The issuer normally must file the free-writing prospectus with the SEC no later than the first date it is used. Certain inexperienced issuers are required to file a preliminary prospectus prior to the filing of a free-writing prospectus.

Posteffective Period. Once the SEC has reviewed and approved the registration statement and the

7. It is common for the SEC to require a registrant to provide additional information more than once. Only after the registration statement has gone through several rounds of changes does the SEC give its approval. In these circumstances, because the process may have taken months to complete, registrants frequently request an acceleration of the twenty-day waiting period. If the SEC grants the request, registration can become effective without the issuer having to wait the full twenty days.

8. The name red herring comes from the legend printed in red across the prospectus stating that the registration has been filed but has not become effective.

9. During the waiting period, the SEC also allows road shows, in which a corporate executive travels around speaking to institutional investors and securities analysts, as well as electronic road shows, which are viewed via real-time communications methods, such as Web casting.

10. See SEC Rules 164 and 433. Note also that companies that qualify as "well-known seasoned issuers" under the SEC's rules (large corporations with at least $700 million of value of stock in the hands of the public) can even use a free-writing prospectus during the prefiling period.

twenty-day period has elapsed, the registration is effective. The issuer can now offer and sell the securities without restrictions. If the company issued a preliminary prospectus to investors, it must provide those investors with a final prospectus either prior to or at the time they purchase the securities. The issuer can require investors to download the final prospectus from a Web site, but it must notify investors of the Internet address at which they can access the prospectus.

To review the entire process, suppose that Delphia, Inc., wants to make a public offering of its common stock. The firm files a registration statement and a prospectus with the SEC. On the same day, the company can make offers to sell the stock and start using a free-writing prospectus, but it cannot actually sell any of its stock. Delphia and its attorneys continue to work with the SEC and provide additional information to it for nearly six months. When the SEC finally indicates that it has all the necessary information for the registration statement to be approved, Delphia can request an acceleration of the twenty-day waiting period. Only after the SEC declares the registration to be effective and the waiting period has elapsed or been accelerated can Delphia sell the first shares in the issue.

Exempt Securities

A number of specific securities are exempt from the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. These securities—which can also generally be resold without being registered—include the following:¹¹

1. Government-issued securities.
2. Bank and financial institution securities, which are regulated by banking authorities.
3. Short-term notes and drafts (negotiable instruments that have a maturity date that does not exceed nine months).
4. Securities of nonprofit, educational, and charitable organizations.
5. Securities issued by common carriers (railroads and trucking companies).
6. Any insurance, endowment, or annuity contract issued by a state-regulated insurance company.
7. Securities issued in a corporate reorganization in which one security is exchanged for another or in a bankruptcy proceeding.
8. Securities issued in stock dividends and stock splits.

11. 15 U.S.C. Section 77c.

Exhibit 41–2 summarizes the securities and the transactions (discussed next) that are exempt from the registration requirements under the Securities Act of 1933 and SEC regulations.

Exempt Transactions

In addition to the exempt securities listed in the previous subsection, certain transactions are exempt from registration requirements. The most important exemptions to the 1933 act are the transaction exemptions, which are very broad and can enable an issuer to avoid the high cost and complicated procedures associated with registration. Because the coverage of the exemptions overlaps somewhat, an offering may qualify for more than one. Therefore, many sales of securities occur without registration. Even when a transaction is exempt from the registration requirements, the offering is still subject to the antifraud provisions of the 1933 act (as well as those of the 1934 act, to be discussed later in this chapter).

Regulation A Offerings Securities issued by an issuer that has offered less than $5 million in securities during any twelve-month period are exempt from registration.¹² Under Regulation A,¹³ the issuer must file with the SEC a notice of the issue and an offering circular, which must also be provided to investors before the sale. This process is much simpler and less expensive than the procedures associated with full registration. Companies are allowed to “test the waters” for potential interest before preparing the offering circular. To test the waters means to determine potential interest without actually selling any securities or requiring any commitment on the part of those who express interest. Small-business issuers (companies with annual revenues of less than $25 million) can also use an integrated registration and reporting system that requires simpler forms than the full registration system.

Some companies have sold their securities via the Internet using Regulation A. In 1996, the Spring Street Brewing Company became the first company to sell securities via an online initial public offering (IPO). Spring Street raised about $1.6 million—without having to pay any commissions to brokers or underwriters. Such online IPOs are particularly attractive to small companies and start-up ventures that may find it difficult to raise capital from institutional investors or through underwriters. By making the offering online under Regulation A, the company can avoid both commissions and the costly and time-consuming filings required for a traditional IPO under federal and state law.

Small Offerings—Regulation D The SEC's Regulation D contains several separate exemptions from registration requirements for limited offers (offers that either involve a small dollar amount or are made in a limited manner). Regulation D provides that any of these offerings made during any twelve-month period are exempt from the registration requirements.

Rule 504. Noninvestment company offerings up to $1 million in any twelve-month period are exempt.¹⁴ Noninvestment companies are firms that are not engaged primarily in the business of investing or trading in securities. (In contrast, an investment company is a firm that buys a large portfolio of securities and professionally manages it on behalf of many smaller shareholders/owners. A mutual fund is the best-known type of investment company.)

For example, Beta, L.P., is a limited partnership that develops commercial property. Beta intends to offer $600,000 of its limited partnership interests for sale between June 1 and next May 31. The buyers will become limited partners in Beta. Because an interest in a limited partnership meets the definition of a security (discussed earlier in this chapter), its sale is subject to the registration and prospectus requirements of the Securities Act of 1933. Under Rule 504, however, the sales of Beta's interests are exempt from these requirements because Beta is a noninvestment company making an offering of less than $1 million in a twelve-month period. Therefore, Beta can sell its interests without filing a registration statement with the SEC or issuing a prospectus to any investor.

Rule 505. Private, noninvestment company offerings up to $5 million in any twelve-month period are exempt. Under this exemption, the offer may be made to an unlimited number of accredited investors. Accredited investors are defined to include banks, insurance companies, investment companies, employee benefit plans, the issuer's executive officers and directors, and persons whose income or net worth exceeds a certain threshold.

There can be up to thirty-five unaccredited investors, but if there are any unaccredited investors, then all investors must be given material information about the offering company, its business, and the securities before the sale. The issuer must provide any unaccredited investors with disclosure documents that are generally the same as those used in registered offerings. Unlike Rule 506 (discussed next), Rule 505 does not require that the issuer believe each unaccredited investor "has such knowledge and experience in financial and business matters that he [or she] is capable of evaluating the merits and the risks of the prospective investment."¹⁵

The SEC must be notified of the sales, and precautions must be taken against nonexempt, unregistered resales.¹⁶ Precautions are necessary because these are restricted securities and may be resold only by registration or in an exempt transaction. (The securities purchased and sold by most people who handle stock transactions are called, in contrast, unrestricted securities.) The purchasers must buy for investment and may not sell the securities for at least a year. No general solicitation or advertising is allowed.

14. 17 C.F.R. Section 230.504. Rule 504 is the exemption used by most small businesses, except those in California, which may also be exempt under SEC Rule 1001. California's rule permits limited offerings of up to $5 million per transaction if they satisfy the conditions of Section 25102(n) of the California Corporations Code. These offerings, however, can be made only to "qualified purchasers" (knowledgeable, sophisticated investors).

15. 17 C.F.R. Section 230.505.

16. Precautions to be taken against nonexempt, unregistered resales include asking the investor whether he or she is buying the securities for others; disclosing to each purchaser in writing, before the sale, that the securities are unregistered and thus cannot be resold, except in an exempt transaction, without first being registered; and indicating on the certificates that the securities are unregistered and restricted.

Rule 506. Private, noninvestment company offerings in unlimited amounts that are not generally solicited or advertised are exempt if the SEC is notified of the sales and precaution is taken against nonexempt, unregistered resales. As with Rule 505, there can be an unlimited number of accredited investors and up to thirty-five unaccredited investors. The issuer must provide any unaccredited investors with disclosure documents that are generally the same as those used in registered offerings. In contrast to Rule 505, the issuer must believe that each unaccredited investor has sufficient knowledge or experience in financial matters to be capable of evaluating the investment's merits and risks.¹⁷

This exemption is perhaps the most important one for those firms that want to raise funds through the sale of securities without registering them. It is often referred to as the private placement exemption because it exempts “transactions not involving any public offering.”¹⁸ This provision applies to private offerings to a limited number of persons who are sufficiently sophisticated and able to assume the risk of the investment (and who thus have no need for federal registration protection). It also applies to private offerings to similarly sophisticated institutional investors.

For example, Citco Corporation needs to raise capital to expand its operations. Citco decides to make a private $10 million offering of its common stock directly to two hundred accredited investors and a group of thirty highly sophisticated, but unaccredited, investors. Citco provides all of these investors with a prospectus and material information about the firm, including its most recent financial statements. As long as Citco notifies the SEC of the sale, this offering will likely qualify as an exempt transaction under Rule 506. The offering is nonpublic and not generally advertised. There are fewer than thirty-five unaccredited investors, and each of them possesses sufficient knowledge and experience to evaluate the risks involved. The issuer has provided all purchasers with the material information. Thus, Citco will not be required to comply with the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933.

Small Offerings—Section 4(6) Under Section 4(6) of the Securities Act of 1933, an offer made solely to accredited investors is exempt if it does not exceed $5 million. Any number of accredited investors may participate, but no unaccredited investors may do so. No general solicitation or advertising may be used; the SEC must be notified of all sales; and precautions must be taken against nonexempt, unregistered resales. Like other restricted securities, securities sold under Section 4(6) may be resold only by registration or in an exempt transaction.¹⁹

Intrastate Offerings—Rule 147 Also exempt are intrastate transactions involving purely local offerings.²⁰ This exemption applies to most offerings that are restricted to residents of the state in which the issuing company is organized and doing business. For nine months after the last sale, virtually no resales may be made to nonresidents, and precautions must be taken against this possibility. These offerings remain subject to applicable laws in the state of issue.

Resales Most securities can be resold without registration (although some resales may be subject to restrictions, as discussed above in connection with specific exemptions). The Securities Act of 1933 provides exemptions for resales by most persons other than issuers or underwriters. The average investor who sells shares of stock need not file a registration statement with the SEC. Resales of restricted securities acquired under Rule 505, Rule 506, or Section 4(6), however, trigger the registration requirements unless the party selling them complies with Rule 144 or Rule 144A. These rules are sometimes referred to as “safe harbors.”

Rule 144. Rule 144 exempts restricted securities from registration on resale if there is adequate current public information about the issuer, the person selling the securities has owned them for at least one year, they are sold in certain limited amounts in unsolicited brokers' transactions, and the SEC is given notice of the resale.²¹ “Adequate current public information” consists of the reports that certain companies are required to file under the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. A person who has owned the securities for at least two years is subject to none of these requirements, unless the person is an affiliate. An affiliate is one who controls, is controlled by, or is in common control with the issuer.

21. 17 C.F.R. Section 230.144.

Rule 144A. Securities that at the time of issue are not of the same class as securities listed on a national securities exchange or quoted in a U.S. automated interdealer quotation system may be resold under Rule 144A.²² They may be sold only to a qualified institutional buyer (an institution, such as an insurance company or a bank, that owns and invests at least $100 million in securities). The seller must take reasonable steps to ensure that the buyer knows that the seller is relying on the exemption under Rule 144A. A sample restricted stock certificate is shown in Exhibit 41-3.

Violations of the 1933 Act

It is a violation of the Securities Act of 1933 to intentionally defraud investors by misrepresenting or omitting facts in a registration statement or prospectus. Liability is also imposed on those who are negligent for not discovering the fraud. Selling securities before the effective date of the registration statement or under an exemption for which the securities do not qualify results in liability.

Criminal Penalties The U.S. Department of Justice brings criminal actions against those who willfully violate the 1933 act. Violators may be penalized by fines up to $10,000, imprisonment up to five years, or both.

Civil Sanctions The SEC is authorized to impose civil sanctions against those who willfully violate the 1933 act. It can request an injunction to prevent further sales of the securities involved or ask a court to grant other relief, such as ordering a violator to refund profits.

Private parties who purchase securities and suffer harm as a result of false or omitted statements or other violations may bring a suit in a federal court to recover their losses and additional damages. If a registration statement or a prospectus contains material false statements or omissions, for example, damages may be recovered from those who signed the statement or those who provided information used in preparing the statement (such as accountants and other experts—see Chapter 51).

Defenses There are three basic defenses to charges of violations under the 1933 act. First, even if a statement was not true or a fact was left out of the registration statement, a defendant can avoid liability if he or she can prove that the statement or omission was not material. Second, a defendant can avoid liability by proving that the plaintiff knew about the misrepresentation and bought the stock anyway.

EXHIBIT 41-3 • A Sample Restricted Stock Certificate

The third and most important is the due diligence defense, which can be asserted by any defendant, except the issuer of the stock. This defense requires the defendant to prove that she or he reasonably believed, at the time the registration statement became effective, that the statements in it were true and there were no omissions of material facts. (This defense will be discussed further in Chapter 51, in the context of the liability of accountants.)

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 provides for the regulation and registration of securities exchanges, brokers, dealers, and national securities associations, such as the National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD). Unlike the 1933 act, which is a one-time disclosure law, the 1934 act provides for continuous periodic disclosures by publicly held corporations to enable the SEC to regulate subsequent trading.

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 applies to companies that have assets in excess of $10 million and five hundred or more shareholders. These corporations are referred to as Section 12 companies because they are required to register their securities under Section 12 of the 1934 act. Section 12 companies are required to file reports with the SEC annually and quarterly, and sometimes even monthly if specified events occur (such as a merger).

The act also authorizes the SEC to engage in market surveillance to deter undesirable market practices such as fraud, market manipulation, and misrepresentation. In addition, the act provides for the SEC's regulation of proxy solicitations for voting (discussed in Chapter 39).

Section 10(b), SEC Rule 10b-5, and Insider Trading

Section 10(b) is one of the most important sections of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. This section prohibits the use of any manipulative or deceptive device in violation of SEC rules and regulations. Among the rules that the SEC has promulgated pursuant to the 1934 act is SEC Rule 10b-5, which prohibits the commission of fraud in connection with the purchase or sale of any security.

Applicability of SEC Rule 10b-5 SEC Rule 10b-5 applies in virtually all cases concerning the trading of securities, whether on organized exchanges, in over-the-counter markets, or in private transactions. The rule covers, among other things, notes, bonds, agreements to form a corporation, and joint-venture agreements. Generally, it covers just about any form of security. It is immaterial whether a firm has securities registered under the 1933 act for the 1934 act to apply.

Although SEC Rule 10b-5 is applicable only when the requisites of federal jurisdiction—such as the use of the mails, stock exchange facilities, or any instrumentality of interstate commerce—are present, virtually no commercial transaction can be completed without such contact. In addition, the states have corporate securities laws, many of which include provisions similar to SEC Rule 10b-5.

Insider Trading One of the major goals of Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5 is to prevent so-called insider trading, which occurs when persons buy or sell securities on the basis of information that is not available to the public. Corporate directors, officers, and others such as majority shareholders, for instance, often have advance inside information that can affect the future market value of the corporate stock. Obviously, if they act on this information, their positions give them a trading advantage over the general public and other shareholders.

The 1934 Securities Exchange Act defines inside information and extends liability to those who take advantage of such information in their personal transactions when they know that the information is unavailable to those with whom they are dealing. Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5 apply to anyone who has access to or receives information of a nonpublic nature on which trading is based—not just to corporate “insiders.”

Disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5 Any material omission or misrepresentation of material facts in connection with the purchase or sale of a security may violate Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5. The key to liability (which can be civil or criminal) under this rule is whether the information omitted or misrepresented is material.

The following are some examples of material facts calling for disclosure under SEC Rule 10b-5:

1. Fraudulent trading in the company stock by a broker-dealer.
2. A dividend change (whether up or down).

3. A contract for the sale of corporate assets.
4. A new discovery, a new process, or a new product.
5. A significant change in the firm's financial condition.
6. Potential litigation against the company.

Note that any one of these facts, by itself, is not automatically considered material. Rather, it will be regarded as a material fact only if it is significant enough that it would likely affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase or sell the company's securities. For example, Tron Corporation is involved in a product liability lawsuit. Tron's attorney, Paula Frasier, advises the firm's directors, officers, and accountants that the company likely will be required to pay damages as a result of the suit. If Tron wants to make a stock offering before the end of the trial, it must disclose its potential liability in the litigation and the financial consequences to the firm. These facts are significant enough that they would likely affect an investor's decision as to whether to purchase Tron's stock.

The case that follows is a landmark decision interpreting SEC Rule 10b-5. The SEC sued several of Texas Gulf Sulphur Company's directors, officers, and employees under SEC Rule 10b-5 after they purchased large amounts of the company's stock prior to the announcement of a rich ore discovery by the corporation. At issue was whether the ore discovery was a material fact that had to be disclosed under Rule 10b-5.

CASE 41.1 SEC v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1968. 401 F.2d 833.

• Background and Facts Texas Gulf Sulphur Company (TGS) conducted aerial geophysical surveys over more than 15,000 square miles of eastern Canada. The operations indicated concentrations of commercially exploitable minerals. At one site near Timmins, Ontario, TGS drilled a hole that appeared to yield a core with an exceedingly high mineral content. TGS kept secret the results of the core sample. Officers and employees of the company made substantial purchases of TGS's stock or accepted stock options (rights to purchase stock) after learning of the ore discovery, even though further drilling was necessary to establish whether there was enough ore to be mined commercially. Several months later, TGS announced that the strike was expected to yield at least 25 million tons of ore. Subsequently, the price of TGS stock rose substantially. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) brought a suit against the officers and employees of TGS for violating SEC Rule 10b-5. The officers and employees argued that the information on which they had traded had not been material at the time of their trades because the mine had not then been commercially proved. The trial court held that most of the defendants had not violated SEC Rule 10b-5, and the SEC appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT WATERMAN, Circuit Judge.

* * * [W]hether facts are material within Rule 10b-5 when the facts relate to a particular event and are undisclosed by those persons who are knowledgeable thereof will depend at any given time upon a balancing of both the indicated probability that the event will occur and the anticipated magnitude of the event in light of the totality of the company activity. Here, * * * knowledge of the possibility, which surely was more than marginal, of the existence of a mine of the vast magnitude indicated by the remarkably rich drill core located rather close to the surface (suggesting mineability by the less expensive openpit method) within the confines of a large anomaly (suggesting an extensive region of mineralization) might well have affected the price of TGS stock and would certainly have been an important fact to a reasonable, if speculative, investor in deciding whether he should buy, sell, or hold. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [A] major factor in determining whether the * * * discovery was a material fact is the importance attached to the drilling results by those who knew about it. * * * [T]he timing by those who knew of it of their stock purchases * * *—purchases in some cases by individuals who had never before purchased * * * TGS stock—virtually compels the inference that the insiders were influenced by the drilling results.

CASE 41.1 CONTINUED • Decision and Remedy The appellate court ruled in favor of the SEC. All of the trading by insiders who knew of the mineral find before its true extent had been publicly announced violated SEC Rule 10b-5.

• Impact of This Case on Today's Law This landmark case affirmed the principle that the test of whether information is "material," for SEC Rule 10b-5 purposes, is whether it would affect the judgment of reasonable investors. The corporate insiders' purchases of stock and stock options indicated that they were influenced by the drilling results and that the information about the drilling results was material. The courts continue to cite this case when applying SEC Rule 10b-5 to cases of alleged insider trading.

• What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that further drilling revealed that there was not enough ore at this site for it to be mined commercially. Would the defendants still have been liable for violating SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not?

The Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995

One of the unintended effects of SEC Rule 10b-5 was to deter disclosure of forward-looking information. To understand why, consider an example. A company announces that its projected earnings in a certain time period will be X amount. It turns out that the forecast is wrong. The earnings are in fact much lower, and the price of the company's stock is affected—negatively. The shareholders then bring a class-action suit against the company, alleging that the directors violated SEC Rule 10b-5 by disclosing misleading financial information.

In an attempt to rectify this problem and promote disclosure, Congress passed the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995. Among other things, the act provides a "safe harbor" for publicly held companies that make forward-looking statements, such as financial forecasts. Those who make such statements are protected against liability for securities fraud as long as the statements are accompanied by "meaningful cautionary statements identifying important factors that could cause actual results to differ materially from those in the forward-looking statement."²³

After the 1995 act was passed, a number of class-action suits involving securities were filed in state courts to skirt the requirements of the 1995 federal act. In response to this problem, Congress passed the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act of 1998 (SLUSA).²⁴ The act placed stringent limits on the ability of plaintiffs to bring class-action suits in state courts against firms whose securities are traded on national stock exchanges. Does SLUSA prevent only the purchasers and sellers of securities from bringing class-action fraud claims under state securities laws? Or does it also apply to those investors who are fraudulently induced to hold on to their securities? That was the question in the following case.

or current brokers who, while employed by Merrill Lynch, purchased (for themselves and for their clients) certain stocks between December 1, 1999, and December 31, 2000. * * * Dabit * * * advanced his claims under Oklahoma state law.

* * * [Dabit's theory was that Merrill Lynch] research analysts * * * issued overly optimistic appraisals of the stocks' value; the brokers * * * relied on the analysts' reports in advising their investor clients * * * ; and the clients and brokers both continued to hold their stocks long beyond the point when, had the truth been known, they would have sold. * * * [W]hen the truth was actually revealed * * * , the stocks' prices plummeted.

* * * *
* * * [The case was transferred] to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York * * * [which granted Merrill Lynch's motion to dismiss. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed this ruling. Merrill Lynch appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

* * * *
The magnitude of the federal interest in protecting the integrity and efficient operation of the market for nationally traded securities cannot be overstated. In response to the sudden and disastrous collapse in prices of listed stocks in 1929, and the Great Depression that followed, Congress enacted the Securities Act of 1933, and the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. Since their enactment, these two statutes have anchored federal regulation of vital elements of our economy.

* * * *
Policy considerations * * * prompted Congress, in 1995, to adopt [the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act] targeted at perceived abuses of the class-action vehicle in litigation involving nationally traded securities. * * *

* * * *
* * * [P]laintiffs and their representatives began bringing class actions under state law, often in state court. * * * To stem this shift from Federal to State courts * * * , Congress enacted SLUSA.

* * * *
The core provision of SLUSA reads as follows:

* * * No * * * class action based upon the * * * law of any State * * * may be maintained in any * * * court by any private party alleging—* * * a misrepresentation or omission of a material fact in connection with the purchase or sale of a * * * security * * * .

* * * *
* * * Under our precedents, it is enough that the fraud alleged “coincide” with a securities transaction—whether by the plaintiff or by someone else. The requisite showing, in other words, is deception “in connection with the purchase or sale of any security,” not deception of an identifiable purchaser or seller. Notably, this broader interpretation of the statutory language comports [is consistent] with the longstanding views of the SEC. [Emphasis added.]

Congress can hardly have been unaware of the broad construction adopted by both this Court and the SEC when it imported the key phrase—“in connection with the purchase or sale”—into SLUSA's core provision. *And when judicial interpretations have settled the meaning of an existing statutory provision, repetition of the same language in a new statute indicates * * * the intent to incorporate its * * * judicial interpretations as well.* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * A narrow reading of the statute would undercut the effectiveness of the 1995 Reform Act and thus run contrary to SLUSA's stated purpose “to prevent certain State private securities class action lawsuits alleging fraud from being used to frustrate the objectives” of the 1995 Act. * * *

* * * The prospect is raised, then, of parallel class actions proceeding in state and federal court, with different standards governing claims asserted on identical facts. That prospect * * * squarely conflicts with the congressional preference for national standards for securities class action lawsuits involving nationally traded securities.

* * * *
The judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is vacated, and the case is remanded * * * .

1. If Dabit had filed his suit only on his own behalf, rather than on behalf of others, how might the result in this case have been different?
2. Should class-action suits involving securities be limited further, or are they too restricted now? Why?

Outsiders and SEC Rule 10b-5 The traditional insider-trading case involves true insiders—corporate officers, directors, and majority shareholders who have access to (and trade on) inside information. Increasingly, however, liability under Section 10(b) of the 1934 act and SEC Rule 10b-5 has been extended to include certain “outsiders”—those who trade on inside information acquired indirectly. Two theories have been developed under which outsiders may be held liable for insider trading: the tipper/tippee theory and the misappropriation theory.

Tipper/Tippee Theory. Anyone who acquires inside information as a result of a corporate insider’s breach of his or her fiduciary duty can be liable under SEC Rule 10b-5. This liability extends to tippees (those who receive “tips” from insiders) and even remote tippees (tippees of tippees).

The key to liability under this theory is that the inside information must be obtained as a result of someone’s breach of a fiduciary duty to the corporation whose shares are traded. The tippee is liable under this theory only if (1) there is a breach of a duty not to disclose inside information, (2) the disclosure is in exchange for personal benefit, and (3) the tippee knows (or should know) of this breach and benefits from it.²⁵

Misappropriation Theory. Liability for insider trading may also be established under the misappropriation theory. Under this theory, an individual who wrongfully obtains (misappropriates) inside information and trades on it for her or his personal gain is held liable because the individual stole information rightfully belonging to another.

The misappropriation theory has been controversial because it significantly extends the reach of SEC Rule 10b-5 to outsiders who ordinarily would not be deemed fiduciaries of the corporations in whose stock they trade. For example, in one landmark case, James O’Hagan was a partner at the law firm of Dorsey & Whitney. A large corporation hired the firm to assist in a takeover of the Pillsbury Company. O’Hagan bought shares of Pillsbury stock. After the tender offer was announced, the stock price increased by more than 35 percent, and O’Hagan sold his shares for a profit of more than $4 million. The SEC prosecuted O’Hagan for securities fraud in violation of Rule 10b-5 under the misappropriation theory. Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court upheld O’Hagan’s conviction under the misappropriation theory because he secretly converted the client-corporation’s inside information for personal gain.²⁶

Insider Reporting and Trading—Section 16(b) Section 16(b) of the 1934 act provides for the recapture by the corporation of all profits realized by certain insiders on any purchase and sale or sale and purchase of the corporation’s stock within any six-month period. It is irrelevant whether the insider actually uses inside information; all such short-swing profits must be returned to the corporation. In this context, insiders means officers, directors, and large stockholders of Section 12 corporations (those owning 10 percent of the class of equity securities registered under Section 12 of the 1934 act).²⁷ To discourage such insiders from using nonpublic information about their companies to their personal benefit in the stock market, they must file reports with the SEC concerning their ownership and trading of the corporation’s securities.

Section 16(b) applies not only to stock but also to warrants, options, and securities convertible into stock. In addition, the courts have fashioned complex rules for determining profits. Note that the SEC exempts a number of transactions under Rule 16b-3.²⁸ For all of these reasons, corporate insiders should seek the advice of competent counsel before trading in the corporation's stock. Exhibit 41-4 compares the effects of SEC Rule 10b-5 and Section 16(b).

Regulation of Proxy Statements

Section 14(a) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 regulates the solicitation of proxies (see Chapter 39) from shareholders of Section 12 companies. The SEC regulates the content of proxy statements. Whoever solicits a proxy must fully and accurately disclose in the proxy statement all of the facts that are pertinent to the matter on which the shareholders are to vote. SEC Rule 14a-9 is similar to the antifraud provisions of SEC Rule 10b-5. Remedies for violations are extensive, ranging from injunctions to prevent a vote from being taken to monetary damages.

Violations of the 1934 Act

As mentioned earlier, violations of Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5, including insider trading, may lead to both criminal and civil liability. For either criminal or civil sanctions to be imposed, however, scienter must exist—that is, the violator must have had an intent to defraud or knowledge of his or her misconduct (see Chapter 14). Scienter can be proved by showing that the defendant made false statements or wrongfully failed to disclose material facts.

Violations of Section 16(b) include the sale by insiders of stock acquired less than six months before the time of sale (or less than six months after the sale if selling short). These violations are subject to civil sanctions. Liability under Section 16(b) is strict liability. Neither scienter nor negligence is required.

Criminal Penalties For violations of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5, an individual may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. A partnership or a corporation may be fined up to $25 million. Under Section 807 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, for a willful violation of the 1934 act the violator can be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years (in addition to being subject to a fine). In a criminal prosecution under the securities laws, a jury is not allowed to speculate about whether a defendant acted will-

29. See, for example, United States v. Stewart, 305 F.Supp.2d 368 (S.D.N.Y. 2004), a case involving Martha Stewart, founder of a well-known media and homemaking empire, who was later convicted on other charges.

In criminal prosecutions under Sections 10(b) and 14(a), the standard for assessing the materiality of a defendant's false statements to shareholders is the perspective of the reasonable investor. The issue in the following case was whether that standard also applies to statements in documents filed with the SEC.

CASE 41.3 United States v. Berger

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2007. 473 F.3d 1080.

• Background and Facts Craig Consumer Electronics, Inc., bought car stereos, compact music centers, and small personal stereos from its offices in Hong Kong and sold the goods from its offices in California to retail stores. Richard Berger was Craig's president, chief executive officer, and board chairman. In 1994, Craig entered into a $50 million loan agreement with BT Commercial Corporation and other lenders. Under the agreement, Craig could borrow up to 85 percent of the value of its accounts receivable (the amount owed to it by retail stores) and up to 65 percent of the value of its inventory. Each business day, Craig provided the lenders with a "Borrowing Certificate" to report the amount of its accounts receivables and inventory. By early 1995, Craig lacked sufficient receivables and inventory to borrow funds for its operations. To hide these facts, Berger and others falsified the information in the certificates. They also hid Craig's true financial condition in reports filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). In 1997, owing the banks more than $8.4 million, Craig filed for bankruptcy. Berger and others were convicted in a federal district court of, among other things, criminal violations of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 for the false statements in the reports filed with the SEC. Berger was sentenced to six months in prison, fined $1.25 million, and ordered to pay the banks $3.14 million in restitution. Berger appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT PREGERSON, Circuit Judge.

* * * * *
* * * [T]he indictment alleged that Berger made material omissions in mandatory filings with the SEC, in violation of [S]ection 13(a) * * * and [S]ection 32(a) of the 1934 Act. Section 13(a) is a mandatory filing provision, that requires certain companies to file with the SEC "information and documents * * * to keep reasonably current the information * * * in * * * [a] registration statement" as well as "annual reports * * * and * * * quarterly reports." Section 32(a) provides criminal penalties for "any person who willfully and knowingly makes * * * any statement in any * * * report or document required to be filed * * * which statement was false or misleading with respect to any material fact * * * ." [Emphasis added.]

Berger contends that when applying [S]ection 32(a), courts should assess materiality from the perspective of the SEC [and asserts that in this case there was insufficient evidence that the falsehoods were material to the SEC]. * * *

* * * Berger contends that the SEC, as a regulatory body, makes decisions based on the information contained in a company's mandatory filings. Thus, Berger argues that the materiality of false statements made to the SEC * * * must also be assessed not from the reasonable investor's perspective, but from the SEC's perspective, in the context of its own regulatory decisions.

We disagree with Berger. The purpose of the 1934 Act was to benefit and protect investors, with proper agency decision making as a secondary concern. * * *

Applying the "reasonable investor" materiality standard to Section 32(a) is consistent with the goals of the SEC. * * * [T]he agency itself commences actions on filings it considers materially misleading to investors. In addition to being a regulatory body, the SEC acts as a repository of information intended to be disseminated to and used by the public. The mandatory filings at issue in this case, for example, were meant for investors' use. * * * It is clear that the reporting requirements under the 1934 Act are intended to protect investors, and that materiality should be assessed from the reasonable investor's perspective. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Finally, Berger argues that "materiality must be assessed in the context of a decision." He points to Sections 10(b) and 14(a) for comparison. In the Section 10(b) context, courts assess materiality by examining a fact's potential to influence an investor's particular decision—the decision to buy or sell a security. Similarly, in Section 14(a), the false statement must have a tendency to influence a decision—how an investor will vote. Section 32(a), however, only criminalizes the filing of false information and does not expressly implicate any specific type of investment decision. * * *

We disagree. In Sections 10(b) and 14(a), * * * the decision to buy or sell shares and the decision to vote a particular way * * * are enumerated as elements of the statutes. The language of Section 32(a) is distinct; it criminalizes the mere filing of a material false statement without requiring that the statement affect a particular investment decision. It thus appears that Congress intended Section 32(a) to act as a catch-all provision to punish those who file a false statement, whether or not the filing can be shown to affect a specific investment decision, as long as the false statement could affect a reasonable investor.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the materiality of false statements in reports filed with the SEC "must be assessed from the perspective of the reasonable investor" and affirmed Berger's conviction and the restitution order. The court vacated the prison term and fine, however, on the ground that certain factors were omitted or mistakenly applied, and remanded the case for reconsideration of the sentence.

● The Ethical Dimension Assuming that Craig's default on the loan was inevitable, what did Berger do that was unethical? Explain.

● The Global Dimension Considering that Craig bought goods overseas to sell in the United States, how much blame should the court have attributed to global electronics markets for the banks' losses?

Civil Sanctions The SEC can also bring a suit in a federal district court against anyone violating, or aiding in a violation of, the 1934 act or SEC rules by purchasing or selling a security while in the possession of material nonpublic information.³⁰ The violation must occur on or through the facilities of a national securities exchange or from or through a broker or dealer.³¹ The court may assess as a penalty as much as triple the profits gained or the loss avoided by the guilty party. Profit or loss is defined as "the difference between the purchase or sale price of the security and the value of that security as measured by the trading price of the security at a reasonable period of time after public dissemination of the nonpublic information."³²

The Insider Trading and Securities Fraud Enforcement Act of 1988 enlarged the class of persons who may be subject to civil liability for insider-trading violations. This act also gave the SEC authority to award bounty payments (rewards given by government officials for acts beneficial to the state) to persons providing information leading to the prosecution of insider-trading violations.³³

Private parties may also sue violators of Section 10(b) and Rule 10b-5. A private party may obtain rescission (cancellation) of a contract to buy securities or damages to the extent of the violator's illegal profits. Those found liable have a right to seek contribution from those who share responsibility for the violations, including accountants, attorneys, and corporations.³⁴ (The liability of accountants and attorneys for violations of the securities laws is discussed in

The Supreme Court has held that a private cause of action under Section 10(b) and SEC Rule 10b-5 cannot be brought against accountants, attorneys, and others who "aid and abet" violations of the act. Chapter 51.) For violations of Section 16(b), a corporation can bring an action to recover the short-swing profits.

Corporate Governance

Corporate governance can be narrowly defined as the relationship between a corporation and its shareholders. The international Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), based in France, provides a broader definition:

Corporate governance is the system by which business corporations are directed and controlled. The corporate governance structure specifies the distribution of rights and responsibilities among different participants in the corporation, such as the board of directors, managers, shareholders, and other stakeholders, and spells out the rules and procedures for making decisions on corporate affairs.³⁵

Although this definition has no legal value, it does set the tone for the ways in which modern corporations should be governed. In other words, effective corporate governance requires more than compliance with laws and regulations.

The Need for Effective Corporate Governance

The need for effective corporate governance arises in large corporations because corporate ownership (by shareholders) is separated from corporate control (by officers and managers). In the real world, officers and managers are tempted to advance their own interests, even when such interests conflict with those of the shareholders. The collapse of Enron Corporation and other well-publicized scandals in the corporate world in the early 2000s provide a clear illustration of the reasons for concern about managerial opportunism.

Attempts at Aligning the Interests of Officers with Those of Shareholders

Some corporations have sought to align the financial interests of their officers with those of the company's shareholders by providing the officers with stock options, which enable them to purchase shares of the corporation's stock at a set price. When the market price rises above that level, the officers can sell their shares for a profit. Because a stock's market price generally increases as the corporation prospers, the options give the officers a financial stake in the corporation's well-being and supposedly encourage them to work hard for the benefit of the shareholders.

Options have turned out to be an imperfect device for providing effective governance, however. Executives in some companies have been tempted to "cook" the company's books in order to keep share prices high so that they could sell their stock for a profit. Executives in other corporations have experienced no losses when share prices dropped; instead, their options were "repriced" so that they did not suffer from the share price decline and could still profit from future increases above the lowered share price. Thus, although stock options theoretically can motivate officers to protect shareholder interests, stock option plans have sometimes become a way for officers to take advantage of shareholders.

With stock options generally failing to work as planned and numerous headline-making scandals occurring within major corporations, there has been an outcry for more "outside" directors (see Chapter 39). The theory is that outside, independent directors will more closely monitor the actions of corporate officers. Hence, today we see more boards with outside directors. Note, though, that outside directors may not be truly independent of corporate officers; they may be friends or business associates of the leading officers. A study of board appointments found that the best way to increase one's probability of appointment was to "suck up" to the chief executive officer.³⁶

Corporate Governance and Corporate Law

Effective corporate governance standards are designed to address problems (such as those briefly discussed above) and to motivate officers to make decisions to promote the financial interests of the company's shareholders. Generally, corporate governance entails corporate decision-making structures that monitor employees (particularly officers) to ensure that they are acting for the benefit of the shareholders. Thus, corporate governance involves, at a minimum:

1. The audited reporting of financial conditions at the corporation so that managers can be evaluated.

35. Governance in the 21st Century: Future Studies (OECD, 2001).

36. Jennifer Reingold, "Suck Up and Move Fast," Fast Company, January 2005, p. 34.

2. Legal protections for shareholders so that violators of the law, who attempt to take advantage of shareholders, can be punished for misbehavior and victims may recover damages for any associated losses.

The Practical Significance of Effective Corporate Governance Effective corporate governance may have considerable practical significance. A study by researchers at Harvard University and the Wharton School of Business found that firms providing greater shareholder rights had higher profits, higher sales growth, higher firm value, and other economic advantages.³⁷ Better corporate governance in the form of greater accountability to investors may therefore offer the opportunity to enhance institutional wealth considerably.

Governance and Corporation Law

Corporate governance is the essential purpose of corporation law in the United States. These statutes set up the legal framework for corporate governance. Under the corporate law of Delaware, where most major companies incorporate, all corporations must have in place certain structures of corporate governance. The key structure of corporate law is, of course, the board of directors. Directors make the most important decisions about the future of the corporation and monitor the actions of corporate officers. Directors are elected by shareholders to look out for their best interests.

The Board of Directors Some argue that shareholder democracy is key to improving corporate governance. If shareholders could vote on major corporate decisions, shareholders could presumably have more control over the corporation. Essential to shareholder democracy is the concept of electing the board of directors, usually at the corporation's annual meeting. Under corporate law, a corporation must have a board of directors elected by the shareholders. Virtually anyone can become a director, though some organizations, such as the New York Stock Exchange, require certain standards of service for directors of their listed corporations.

Directors have the responsibility of ensuring that officers are operating wisely and in the exclusive interest of shareholders. Directors receive reports from the officers and give them managerial directions. The board in theory controls the compensation of officers (presumably tied to performance). The reality, though, is that corporate directors devote a relatively small amount of time to monitoring officers.

Ideally, shareholders would monitor the directors' supervision of officers. As one leading board monitor commented, "Boards of directors are like subatomic particles—they behave differently when they are observed." Consequently, monitoring directors, and holding them responsible for corporate failings, can induce the directors to do a better job of monitoring officers and ensuring that the company is being managed in the interest of shareholders. Although the directors can be sued for failing to do their jobs effectively, directors are rarely held personally liable.

Importance of the Audit Committee

As mentioned in Chapter 39, the board of directors normally creates an audit committee (and it is required for publicly held corporations). The audit committee plays a crucial role in overseeing the corporation's accounting and financial reporting processes, including both internal and outside auditors. Unless the committee members have sufficient expertise and are willing to spend the time to carefully examine the corporation's bookkeeping methods, however, the audit committee may be ineffective.

The audit committee also oversees the corporation's "internal controls." These are the measures taken—largely by the company's internal auditing staff—to ensure that reported results are accurate. For example, these controls help to determine whether a corporation's debts are collectible. If the debts are not collectible, it is up to the audit committee to make sure that the corporation's financial officers do not simply pretend that payment will eventually be made.

The Role of the Compensation Committee

Another important committee mentioned in Chapter 39 is the compensation committee, which determines the compensation to be paid to the company's officers. As part of this process, the committee is responsible for assessing the officers' performance and for designing a compensation system that will better align the officers' interests with those of the shareholders.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002

As discussed in Chapter 5, in 2002, following a series of corporate scandals, Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (see Appendix H for excerpts and explanatory comments). Generally, the act attempts to increase corporate accountability by imposing strict disclosure requirements and harsh penalties for violations of securities laws. Among other things, the act requires chief corporate executives to take personal responsibility for the accuracy of financial statements and reports that are filed with the SEC.

Additionally, certain financial and stock-transaction reports must now be filed with the SEC earlier than was required under the previous rules. The act also created a new entity, called the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, that regulates and oversees public accounting firms. Other provisions of the act created new private civil actions and expanded the SEC's remedies in administrative and civil actions.

Because of the importance of this act, we present some of its key provisions relating to corporate accountability in Exhibit 41–5 on page 856. (Provisions of the act that relate to public accounting firms and accounting practices will be discussed in Chapter 51, in the context of the liability of accountants.)

More Internal Controls and Accountability

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act includes some traditional securities law provisions but also introduces direct federal corporate governance requirements for public companies (companies whose shares are traded in the public securities markets). The law addresses many of the corporate governance procedures just discussed and creates new requirements in an attempt to make the system work more effectively. The requirements deal with independent monitoring of company officers by both the board of directors and auditors.

Sections 302 and 404 of the act require high-level managers (the most senior officers) to establish and maintain an effective system of internal controls. Moreover, senior management must reassess the system's effectiveness on an annual basis. Some companies already had strong and effective internal control systems in place before the passage of the act, but others had to take expensive steps to bring their internal controls up to the new federal standard. These include "disclosure controls and procedures" to ensure that company financial reports are accurate and timely. Assessment must involve the documenting of financial results and accounting policies before reporting the results. By the beginning of 2008, hundreds of listed publicly held companies had reported that they had identified and corrected shortcomings in their internal control systems.

Certification and Monitoring As described in Exhibit 41–5, Section 906 requires that chief executive officers and chief financial officers certify the accuracy of the information in the corporate financial statements. These corporate officers are subject to both civil and criminal penalties for violations of this section. This requirement makes the officers directly accountable for the accuracy of their financial reporting and precludes any "ignorance defense" if shortcomings are later discovered.

Another requirement is to improve directors' monitoring of officers' activities. All members of the corporate audit committee for public companies must be outside directors. The New York Stock Exchange has a similar rule that also extends to the board's compensation committee. The audit committee must have a written charter that sets out its duties and provides for performance appraisal. At least one "financial expert" must serve on the audit committee, which must hold executive meetings without company officers being present. The audit committee must also establish procedures to encourage whistleblowers (see Chapter 33) to report violations. In addition to reviewing the internal controls, the committee also monitors the actions of the outside auditor.

State Securities Laws

Today, all states have their own corporate securities laws, or blue sky laws, that regulate the offer and sale of securities within individual state borders. (The phrase blue sky laws dates to a 1917 United States Supreme Court decision in which the Court declared that the purpose of such laws was to prevent "speculative schemes which have no more basis than so many feet of 'blue sky.'"³⁸) Article 8 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which has been adopted by all of the states, also imposes various requirements relating to the purchase and sale of securities.

Requirements under State Securities Laws

Despite some differences in philosophy, all state blue sky laws have certain features. Typically, state laws have

EXHIBIT 41-5 • Some Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 Relating to Corporate Accountability

Certification Requirements—Under Section 906 of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the chief executive officers (CEOs) and chief financial officers (CFOs) of most major companies listed on public stock exchanges must now certify financial statements that are filed with the SEC. For virtually all filed financial reports, CEOs and CFOs have to certify that such reports “fully comply” with SEC requirements and that all of the information reported “fairly represents, in all material respects, the financial conditions and results of operations of the issuer.”

Under Section 302 of the act, for each quarterly and annual filing with the SEC, CEOs and CFOs of reporting companies are required to certify that a signing officer reviewed the report and that it contains no untrue statements of material fact. Also, the signing officer or officers must certify that they have established an internal control system to identify all material information and that any deficiencies in the system were disclosed to the auditors.

Loans to Directors and Officers—Section 402 prohibits any reporting company, as well as any private company that is filing an initial public offering, from making personal loans to directors and executive officers (with a few limited exceptions, such as for certain consumer and housing loans).

Protection for Whistleblowers—Section 806 protects whistleblowers—those employees who report (“blow the whistle” on) securities violations by their employers—from being fired or in any way discriminated against by their employers.

Blackout Periods—Section 306 prohibits certain types of securities transactions during blackout periods—periods during which the issuer’s ability to purchase, sell, or otherwise transfer funds in individual account plans (such as pension funds) is suspended.

Enhanced Penalties for—

- Violations of Section 906 Certification Requirements—A CEO or CFO who certifies a financial report or statement filed with the SEC knowing that the report or statement does not fulfill all of the requirements of Section 906 will be subject to criminal penalties of up to $1 million in fines, ten years in prison, or both. Willful violators of the certification requirements may be subject to $5 million in fines, twenty years in prison, or both.
- Violations of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934—Penalties for securities fraud under the 1934 act were also increased (as discussed earlier in this chapter). Individual violators may be fined up to $5 million, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. Willful violators may be imprisoned for up to twenty-five years in addition to being fined.
- Destruction or Alteration of Documents—Anyone who alters, destroys, or conceals documents or otherwise obstructs any official proceeding will be subject to fines, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both.
- Other Forms of White-Collar Crime—The act stiffened the penalties for certain criminal violations, such as federal mail and wire fraud, and ordered the U.S. Sentencing Commission to revise the sentencing guidelines for white-collar crimes (see Chapter 9).

Statute of Limitations for Securities Fraud—Section 804 provides that a private right of action for securities fraud may be brought no later than two years after the discovery of the violation or five years after the violation, whichever is earlier.

disclosure requirements and antifraud provisions, many of which are patterned after Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5. State laws also provide for the registration or qualification of securities offered or issued for sale within the state and impose disclosure requirements. Unless an exemption from registration is applicable, issuers must register or qualify their stock with the appropriate state official, often called a corporations commissioner.

Additionally, most state securities laws regulate securities brokers and dealers.

Concurrent Regulation

State securities laws apply mainly to intrastate transactions. Since the adoption of the 1933 and 1934 federal securities acts, the state and federal governments have regulated securities concurrently. Issuers must comply with both federal and state securities laws, and exemptions from federal law are not necessarily exemptions from state laws.

The dual federal and state system has not always worked well, particularly during the early 1990s, when there was considerable expansion of the securities markets. In response, Congress passed the National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996, which preempted state power to regulate many aspects of securities. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws then substantially revised the Uniform Securities Act and recommended it to the states for adoption in 2002. Unlike the previous version of this law, the new act is designed to coordinate state and federal securities regulation and enforcement efforts. Since 2002, thirteen states have adopted the Uniform Securities Act, and several other states are considering adoption.³⁹

Online Securities Fraud

A major problem facing the SEC today is how to enforce the antifraud provisions of the securities laws in the online environment. In 1999, in the first cases involving illegal online securities offerings, the SEC filed suit against three individuals for illegally offering securities on an Internet auction site.⁴⁰ In essence, all three indicated that their companies would soon go public and attempted to sell unregistered securities via the Web auction site. All of these actions were in violation of Sections 5, 17(a)(1), and 17(a)(3) of the 1933 Securities Act. Since then, the SEC has brought a variety of Internet-related fraud cases, including cases involving investment scams and the manipulation of stock prices in Internet chat rooms. The SEC regularly issues interpretive releases to explain how securities laws apply in the online environment and revises its rules to address new issues that arise in the Internet context.

39. At the time this book went to press, the 2002 version of the Uniform Securities Act had been adopted in Hawaii, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Vermont, as well as in the U.S. Virgin Islands. Adoption legislation was pending in the District of Columbia and Washington. You can find current information on state adoptions at www.nccusl.org.

Investment Scams

An ongoing concern for the SEC is how to curb investment scams. One fraudulent investment scheme involved twenty thousand investors, who lost, in all, more than $3 million. Some cases have involved false claims about the earnings potential of home businesses, such as the claim that one could “earn $4,000 or more each month.” Others have concerned claims of “guaranteed credit repair.”

Using Chat Rooms to Manipulate Stock Prices

“Pumping and dumping” occurs when a person who has purchased a particular stock heavily promotes (“pumps up”) that stock—thereby creating a great demand for it and driving up its price—and then sells (“dumps”) it. The practice of pumping up a stock and then dumping it is quite old. In the online world, however, the process can occur much more quickly and efficiently.

A famous example in this area involved Jonathan Lebed, a fifteen-year-old from New Jersey, who became the first minor ever charged with securities fraud by the SEC. The SEC charged that Lebed bought thinly traded stocks. After purchasing a stock, he would flood stock-related chat rooms with messages touting the stock’s virtues. He used numerous false names so that no one would know that a single person was posting the messages. He would say that the stock was the most “undervalued stock in history” and that its price would jump by 1,000 percent “very soon.” When other investors bought the stock, the price would go up quickly and Lebed would sell out. The SEC forced the teenager to repay almost $300,000 in gains plus interest but allowed him to keep about $500,000 of his profits.

The SEC has been bringing an increasing number of cases against those who manipulate stock prices in this way. Many of these online investment scams are perpetrated through mass e-mails (spam) and online newsletters, as well as chat rooms.

Hacking into Online Stock Accounts

The last few years have seen the emergence of a new form of “pumping and dumping” stock that involves hackers who break into existing online stock accounts and make unauthorized transfers. Millions of people now buy and sell investments online through online brokerage companies such as E*Trade and Ameritrade. Sophisticated hackers have learned to use online investing to their advantage.

By installing keystroke-monitoring software on computer terminals in public places, such as hotels, libraries, and airports, hackers can gain access to online account information. They simply wait for a person to access an online trading account and then monitor the next several dozen keystrokes to determine the customer's account number and password. Once they have the log-in information, they can access the customer's account and liquidate her or his existing stock holdings. The hackers then use the customer's funds to purchase thinly traded, microcap securities, also known as penny stocks. The goal is to boost the price of a stock that the hacker has already purchased at a lower price. Then, when the stock price goes up, the hacker sells all the stock and wires the funds to either an offshore account or a dummy corporation, making it difficult for the SEC to trace the transactions and prosecute the offender.

For example, Aleksey Kamardin, a twenty-one-year-old Florida student, purchased 55,000 shares of stock in Fuego Entertainment using an E*Trade account in his own name. Kamardin then hacked into other customers' accounts at E*Trade, Ameritrade, Schwab, and other brokerage companies, and used their funds to purchase a total of 458,000 shares of Fuego stock. When the stock price rose from $.88 per share to $1.28 per share, Kamardin sold all of his shares of Fuego, making a profit of $9,164.28 in about three hours. Kamardin did this with other thinly traded stocks as well, allegedly making $82,960 in about five weeks and prompting the SEC to file charges against him in January 2007.⁴¹

So far, the brokerage companies have been covering their customers' losses from this new wave of frauds, but the potential for loss is substantial. E*Trade and Ameritrade have also increased security measures and are changing their software to prevent further intrusions into customers' online stock accounts.

41. You can read the SEC's complaint against Kamardin by going to the SEC's Web site at www.sec.gov, clicking on the link to litigation releases, and selecting LR-19981. The case had not been resolved by the time this book went to press.

REVIEWING CORPORATIONS—Securities Law and Corporate Governance

Dale Emerson served as the chief financial officer for Reliant Electric Co., a distributor of electricity serving portions of Montana and North Dakota. Reliant was in the final stages of planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks, Inc., a natural gas distributor that operated solely within North Dakota. Emerson went on a weekend fishing trip with his uncle, Ernest Wallace. Emerson mentioned to Wallace that he had been putting in a lot of extra hours at the office planning a takeover of Dakota Gasworks. On returning from the fishing trip, Wallace met with a broker from Chambers Investments and purchased $20,000 of Reliant stock. Three weeks later, Reliant made a tender offer to Dakota Gasworks stockholders and purchased 57 percent of Dakota Gasworks stock. Over the next two weeks, the price of Reliant stock rose 72 percent before leveling out. Wallace then sold his Reliant stock for a gross profit of $14,400. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would registration with the SEC be required for Dakota Gasworks securities? Why or why not?
2. Did Emerson violate Section 10(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 and SEC Rule 10b-5? Why or why not?
3. What theory or theories might a court use to hold Wallace liable for insider trading?
4. Under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, who would be required to certify the accuracy of the financial statements Reliant filed with the SEC?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

41-1. Estrada Hermanos, Inc., a corporation incorporated and doing business in Florida, decides to sell $1 million worth of its common stock to the public. The stock will be sold only within the state of Florida. José Estrada, the chair of the board, says the offering need not be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission. His brother, Gustavo, disagrees. Who is right? Explain.

41-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Huron Corp. has 300,000 common shares outstanding. The owners of these outstanding shares live in several different states. Huron has decided to split the 300,000 shares two for one. Will Huron Corp. have to file a registration statement and prospectus on the 300,000 new shares to be issued as a result of the split? Explain.

41-3. Violations of the 1934 Act. 2TheMart.com, Inc., was conceived in January 1999 to launch an auction Web site to compete with eBay, Inc. On January 19, 2TheMart announced that its Web site was in its “final development” stages and expected to be active by the end of July as a “preeminent” auction site, and that the company had “retained the services of leading Web site design and architecture consultants to design and construct” the site. Based on the announcement, investors rushed to buy 2TheMart’s stock, causing a rapid increase in the price. On February 3, 2TheMart entered into an agreement with IBM to take preliminary steps to plan the site. Three weeks later, 2TheMart announced that the site was “currently in final development.” On June 1, 2TheMart signed a contract with IBM to design, build, and test the site, with a target delivery date of October 8. When 2TheMart’s site did not debut as announced, Mary Harrington and others who had bought the stock filed a suit in a federal district court against the firm’s officers, alleging violations of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. The defendants responded, in part, that any alleged misrepresentations were not material and asked the court to dismiss the suit. How should the court rule, and why? [In re 2TheMart.com, Inc. Securities Litigation, 114 F.Supp.2d 955 (C.D.Ca.2000)]

41-4. Insider Reporting and Trading. Ronald Bleakney, an officer at Natural Microsystems Corp. (NMC), a Section 12 corporation, directed NMC sales in North America, South America, and Europe. In November 1998, Bleakney sold more than 7,500 shares of NMC stock. The following March, Bleakney resigned from the firm, and the next month, he bought more than 20,000 shares of its stock. NMC provided some guidance to employees concerning the rules of insider trading, and with regard to Bleakney’s transactions, the corporation said nothing about potential liability. Richard Morales, an NMC shareholder, filed a suit against NMC and Bleakney to compel recovery, under Section 16(b) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, of Bleakney’s profits from the purchase and sale of his shares. (When Morales died, his executor Deborah Donoghue became the plaintiff.) Bleakney argued that he should not be liable because he relied on NMC’s advice. Should the court order Bleakney to return his profits to the corporation? Explain. [Donoghue v. Natural Microsystems Corp., 198 F.Supp.2d 487 (S.D.N.Y.2002)]

41-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Scott Ginsburg was chief executive officer (CEO) of Evergreen Media Corp., which owned and operated radio stations. In 1996, Evergreen became interested in acquiring EZ Communications, Inc., which also owned radio stations. To initiate negotiations, Ginsburg met with EZ’s CEO, Alan Box, on Friday, July 12. Two days later, Scott phoned his brother Mark, who, on Monday, bought 3,800 shares of EZ stock. Mark discussed the deal with their father Jordan, who bought 20,000 EZ shares on Thursday. On July 25, the day before the EZ bid was due, Scott phoned his parents’ home, and Mark bought another 3,200 EZ shares. The same routine was followed over the next few days, with Scott periodically phoning Mark or Jordan, both of whom continued to buy EZ shares. Evergreen's bid was refused, but on August 5, EZ announced its merger with another company. The price of EZ stock rose 30 percent, increasing the value of Mark's and Jordan's shares by $664,024 and $412,875, respectively. The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) filed a civil suit in a federal district court against Scott. What was the most likely allegation? What is required to impose sanctions for this offense? Should the court hold Scott liable? Why or why not? [SEC v. Ginsburg, 362 F3d 1292 (11th Cir.2004)]

41-6. Securities Laws. In 1997, WTS Transnational, Inc., required financing to develop a prototype of an unpatented fingerprint-verification system. At the time, WTS had no revenue, $655,000 in liabilities, and only $10,000 in assets. Thomas Cavanagh and Frank Nicololois, who operated an investment banking company called U.S. Milestone (USM), arranged the financing using Curbstone Acquisition Corp. Curbstone had no assets but had registered approximately 3.5 million shares of stock with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). Under the terms of the deal, Curbstone acquired WTS, and the resulting entity was named Electro-Optical Systems Corp. (EOSC). New EOSC shares were issued to all of the WTS shareholders. Only Cavanagh and others affiliated with USM could sell EOSC stock to the public, however. Over the next few months, these individuals issued false press releases, made small deceptive purchases of EOSC shares at high prices, distributed hundreds of thousands of shares to friends and relatives, and sold their own shares at inflated prices through third party companies they owned. When the SEC began to investigate, the share price fell to its actual value, and innocent investors lost more than $15 million. Were any securities laws violated in this case? If so, what might be an appropriate remedy? [SEC v. Cavanagh, 445 F3d 105 (2d Cir.2006)]

41-7. Securities Trading. Between 1994 and 1998, Richard Svoboda, a credit officer for NationsBank N.A., in Dallas, Texas, evaluated and approved his employer's extensions of credit to clients. These responsibilities gave Svoboda access to nonpublic information about the clients' earnings, performance, acquisitions, and business plans in confidential memos, e-mail, credit applications, and other sources. Svoboda devised a scheme with Michael Robles, an independent accountant, to use this information to trade securities. Pursuant to their scheme, Robles traded in the securities of more than twenty different companies and profited by more than $1 million. Despite their agreement that Robles would do all of the trading, Svoboda also executed trades on his own and made profits of more than $200,000. Aware that their scheme violated NationsBank's policy, they attempted to conduct their trades so as to avoid suspicion. When NationsBank questioned Svoboda about his actions, he lied, refused to cooperate, and was fired. Did Svoboda or Robles commit any crimes? Are they subject to civil liability? If so, who could file a suit and on what ground? What are the possible sanctions? What might be a defense? How should a court rule? Discuss. [SEC v. Svoboda, 409 FSupp.2d 331 (S.D.N.Y.2006)]

41-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

*Melvin Lyttle told John Montana and Paul Knight about a "Trading Program" that purportedly would buy and sell securities in deals that were fully insured, as well as monitored and controlled by the Federal Reserve. Without checking the details or even verifying whether the Program existed, Montana and Knight, with Lyttle's help, began to sell interests in the Program to investors. For a minimum investment of $1 million, the investors were promised extraordinary rates of return—from 10 percent to as much as 100 percent per week—without risk. They were told, among other things, that the Program would "utilize banks that can ensure full bank integrity of The Transaction whose undertaking[s] are in complete harmony with international banking rules and protocol and who guarantee maximum security of a Funder's Capital Placement Amount." Nothing was required but the investors' funds and their silence—the Program was to be kept secret. Over a four-month period in 1999, Montana raised approximately $23 million from twenty-two investors. The promised gains did not accrue, however. Instead, Montana, Lyttle, and Knight depleted investors' funds in high-risk trades or spent the funds on themselves. [SEC v. Montana, 464 FSupp.2d 772 (S.D.Ind. 2006)]*

CHAPTER 42

Law for Small Businesses

Small businesses create much of the wealth and many of the new jobs in the United States. According to the Census Bureau, there are around 5 million firms with ten or fewer employees. The Small Business Administration (SBA) reports that small businesses employ half of all private-sector employees in the country, generate more than half of the nation's gross domestic product, and obtain a disproportionate number of patents. The SBA also reports, however, that more than half of small businesses fail within four years. A lack of understanding of legal issues and how to respond to them is one of the reasons that new businesses fail.

Some relatively new companies, such as Microsoft and Google, have become highly successful. Understanding business law and the legal environment has often been crucial to business success. Consider that Microsoft's and Google's growth is grounded to some extent in the smart decisions about contracts that those companies made in their early days.

For the most part, the laws of particular interest to small-business owners are the same general business laws covered throughout this text, and this chapter provides a review of some of those laws. In this chapter, we examine a number of the options and legal requirements faced by those who wish to start their own small businesses. We also indicate how the general legal principles discussed throughout this book apply in the context of a small-business enterprise. Because legal compliance is crucial for any venture, we begin with a discussion of the importance of obtaining legal counsel.

The Importance of Legal Counsel

Nearly everyone who starts a business enterprise faces the following question: "Do I need an attorney?" The answer to this question will likely be "yes." Today, it is virtually impossible for nonexperts to keep up with the myriad rules and regulations that govern the conduct of business in the United States. Indeed, businesspersons sometimes incur penalties for violating laws or regulations of which they are totally unaware, as noted in Chapter 5. Obtaining competent legal counsel can help a small business avoid a number of pitfalls. An attorney may be very helpful when a business undertakes certain types of transactions, including the following:

- Negotiating a franchise agreement.
- Creating standard business forms, such as purchase orders and contract confirmations.
- Buying or selling real property or a business.
- Negotiating agreements to license intellectual property rights.
- Obtaining new outside investors.

Relevant questions thus include how to find the right attorney for your needs and how to hold down legal costs as much as possible.

Although attorneys may seem expensive, the cautious business owner will make sure that he or she is not "penny wise and pound foolish." The consultation fee paid to an attorney may be a drop in the bucket compared with the potential liability facing a businessperson for violating a statutory law or regulation. Also, outside legal help may be essential for certain tasks associated with forming a new business, such as drafting and filing the documents necessary for incorporation. Failure to comply with specific state incorporation requirements may subject the owners of the new enterprise to personal liability for contracts or other obligations. Exhibit 42-1 provides estimated average attorneys' fees for a few basic small-business transactions. Of course, these amounts will vary depending on the complexity of the job and the geographic area where the business is located.

Finding an Attorney

In selecting an attorney, most businesspersons rely on referrals from friends, business associates, and other local entities. Business networks, such as chambers of commerce and bar organizations, may also help identify knowledgeable attorneys. Attorneys and their areas of specialty are often listed in the Yellow Pages of the telephone book. A good source of information is the Martindale-Hubbell Law Directory, which can be found at most law libraries. (It is also accessible online at www.martindale.com.) This directory lists the names, addresses, telephone numbers, areas of legal practice, and other information for more than 900,000 attorneys and law firms in the United States. A number of lawyers specialize in small-business law. Many states now have certification programs that identify specialists in various legal areas.

Retaining an Attorney

Retaining an experienced attorney will yield benefits beyond the resolution of legal problems. Many attorneys have beneficial contacts, including potential investors in your enterprise. An attorney may also have valuable business expertise. Furthermore, because the law protects the confidentiality of attorney-client communications, an attorney provides a useful sounding board for business plans.

At the start-up stage, you may not have the financial resources to pay a lawyer, especially one who charges a high hourly rate. Attorneys have responded to this situation by offering innovative fee arrangements, especially in such hotbeds of entrepreneurship as Silicon Valley, south of San Francisco. Most attorneys will not charge for an initial consultation, and some will provide a substantial amount of service in exchange for a promise of future legal business after the venture is established. Some attorneys may accept an equity (ownership) stake in the new business in lieu of a cash payment. As a client, you often have the opportunity to negotiate your attorney's compensation system to suit your needs.

Some small-business owners keep an attorney on retainer. This means that the client pays the attorney a fixed amount every month, and the attorney handles all necessary legal business that arises during the month. The amount of the retainer is negotiated with an eye toward expected legal needs. Thus, this approach probably will not save much overall, but it will make your legal costs stable and predictable over time.

Retaining an Accountant

In a new business, the proper management of accounts receivable and accounts payable is critical. There are software accounting programs to handle this job, but many small businesses hire professional accountants to do their bookkeeping. Although it is more expensive, having an accountant adds to your credibility with potential investors and lenders. Bookkeeping accuracy is also legally important, as errors often provoke litigation.

EXHIBIT 42-1 • Average Attorneys' Fees for Selected Small-Business Transactions

Selecting an Appropriate Business Form

The various forms of business organization available to businesspersons were discussed in detail in Chapters 35 through 41; we will review them here in the context of small businesses. In the earliest stages, a small business may operate as a sole proprietorship, which requires few legal formalities. The law considers all new, single-owner businesses to be sole proprietorships unless the owner affirmatively adopts some other form. Once business is under way, however, the sole proprietorship form may become problematic if additional investors are needed or the personal financial risks of the business become too great. You and the additional investors (owners) may then want to establish a more formal organization, such as a limited partnership, a corporation, a limited liability company (LLC), or a limited liability partnership (LLP).

Each business form has its own particular advantages and disadvantages. Factors to consider when choosing a business form include liability, taxation, continuity of life, and the legal formalities and costs associated with starting the business. In addition, there may be other considerations for businesses that are contemplating doing business over the Internet—see the Insight into the Global Environment feature for a discussion of these issues.

Limitations on Liability

A key consideration in starting a business is whether the business form chosen will limit the owner's personal liability for business debts and obligations. If you form a limited liability entity, such as a corporation, you can normally avoid personal liability if, say, a customer slips and breaks his ankle in your store, sues your store, and is awarded damages by a court. Although the business entity may be liable for damages, you and the other owners often will not be personally liable beyond the extent of your contributions to the firm. Legal limited liability is generally necessary for those who wish to raise outside capital.

All corporate business forms offer limited liability to the shareholder-owners. In a general partnership, however, there is no limited liability—each partner is personally liable for the debts and obligations of the partnership. In a limited partnership, the limited partners have limited liability. A limited partnership requires at least one general partner, however, who remains personally liable for the partnership's obligations. Note that limited personal liability does not obviate the need to obtain insurance for significant business liability risks (see Chapter 49). Limited liability organizations protect only personal assets, and a substantial uninsured liability can bankrupt the business and cause the owner to lose her or his entire investment. Moreover, limited personal liability may be lost by contract (such as by giving a personal guarantee) or by failure to comply with the rules for a business form.

All states now permit businesspersons to conduct their business operations as limited liability companies (LLCs). Also, many states now provide for limited liability partnerships (LLPs). These increasingly popular business forms also offer the advantage of limited personal liability for business debts and obligations (see Chapters 36 and 37 for a more detailed discussion of this aspect of LLCs and LLPs).

Tax Considerations

Taxes are another critical factor to be considered in choosing a small-business form. A sole proprietorship is not a separate legal entity, and the owner pays taxes on business income as an individual. All revenues are taxable, but business expenses can be deducted, so the owner is taxed only once on the business's profits.

All corporations must pay certain state and local taxes—such as franchise taxes (annual taxes imposed for the privilege of doing business in a state)—but the key consideration involves corporate income taxes. The corporate form entails what is known as double taxation. The company must pay a corporate income tax on its profits, and the shareholder-owners must also pay individual income tax on any distributions of the remaining profits that they receive from the corporation. Double taxation is limited to distributions of profits, though, so corporations are taxed only once on retained earnings. (See Chapter 38 for a complete discussion of corporate taxation.) Partnerships, LLCs, and LLPs avoid double taxation and provide for “pass-through” taxation, in which profits are passed through to the partners or members and are taxed only on their individual returns, not at the business level.

Continuity of Life

Continuity of life is another concern in selecting a business form. Businesses may fail to prepare for the possibility that an owner may die, resign, be expelled, or become incapacitated. Corporations have continuity of life—that is, they survive their owners—except in the unusual event that the corporate documents provide otherwise. On the death of a corporate shareholder-owner, normally that shareholder's ownership interest simply passes to his or her heirs.

In many states, a partnership will not terminate on the death or withdrawal of a partner, unless the partners have expressly provided otherwise. (In those states that have not adopted the most recent version of the Uniform Partnership Act, however, the death of a partner will automatically dissolve the partnership—

INSIGHT INTO THE GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

Moving Your Small Business Online: Seller Beware

Today, almost every small business seems to have a Web site. Before you set up a Web site, though, you need to consider some of the implications of establishing an all-inclusive online presence for your business.

Jurisdictional Problems

A small-business owner who creates a Web site that allows individuals to purchase goods or services may run into jurisdictional issues. Because the Internet is a worldwide communications device, there is no way that you can effectively prevent your Web site from being viewed by almost everyone with Internet access throughout the world. Even within the United States, you cannot put a disclaimer on your Web site stating that you will sell your goods or services only within the state where your business has its principal office. Thus, if any customers are not satisfied with your products, they may attempt to bring lawsuits against you in other states or even other countries.

You may encounter other problems in foreign countries as well. If you are an online book seller, for example, you can legally sell a copy of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf to anyone in the United States. But if you ship that same book to a resident of Germany, you will have violated German law. Similarly, you may run afoul of Germany's strict antidiscrimination laws if you ship certain novels by Charles Dickens to German customers because many view these novels as anti-Semitic. If you start an online auction site and allow Nazi memorabilia to be offered for sale on the site, you will be violating French law if you allow the site to be viewed by French citizens.^a

Regulation of Informational Content on Web Sites

Suppose that you establish an online business that provides information, such as summaries of current news articles, events of the day, book reviews, and scholarly articles. If some of the content appears to insult Islam, the government of Malaysia may attempt to prosecute you. If one of the articles on your site expresses a negative view of the government of Zimbabwe, you may find yourself being tried in absentia (without being present) by that government. If your site includes an article that appears to deny the Holocaust,^b the German government may prosecute both you and the author of the article.

Trademark Issues

Before the advent of the Internet, an entrepreneur starting a new business would only have to check the state in which she or he was doing business to make sure that the business's name did not infringe on the name of an established business. Now a business's name often becomes part of its Web site address. Consequently, an entrepreneur will want to choose a business name that can also be purchased for use in the Web address. That means selecting a name that does not infringe on some other company's trademark, even if that company is based in Europe or Asia.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO TECHNOLOGY

Researchers are attempting to create technology that would allow Web site operators to screen out users from certain geographic areas. What global issues discussed in this feature might be less of a problem if such technology becomes cheap and effective?

b. This is the general term used for all of Hitler's actions to exterminate Jews during World War II.

see Chapter 36.) By definition, a sole proprietorship terminates with the death of the sole proprietor.

Legal Formality and Expense

Businesspersons also need to consider the legal formalities and expenses involved in starting a business. The requirements and costs associated with forming and operating as a corporation can be considerable.

The expense of establishing a limited partnership may also be significant. For these reasons, some individuals initially undertake business operations as sole proprietorships or general partnerships—and run considerable financial risk because of the personal liability associated with each of these business forms. Start-up formalities and costs are generally less extensive for LLCs than for corporations or limited partnerships.

Requirements for All Businesses Although sole proprietorships and general partnerships avoid the legal formalities associated with incorporating or creating a limited partnership, sole proprietors and partners must still comply with many laws. Any business, whatever its form, has to meet a variety of legal requirements, which typically relate to the following:

- Business name registration.
- Occupational licensing.
- State tax registration (for example, to obtain permits for collecting and remitting sales taxes).
- Health and environmental permits.
- Zoning and building codes.
- Import/export regulations.

If the business has employees, the owner must also comply with a host of laws governing the workplace. (We will look at many of these laws in the final section of this chapter.)

Formalizing the Business The owner should not overlook the potential benefits that may be gained by establishing a more formal business arrangement than a sole proprietorship. Consider a family business that is owned and operated by a husband and wife. At the outset, the spouses should consider the possibility that they may have a falling-out in the future. If they run their enterprise as a sole proprietorship, it may be difficult to establish their respective ownership rights in the business should a dispute arise.

If they form a partnership, however, they can specify in a written partnership agreement how profits and losses will be shared, as well as the extent of each partner's ownership interest in the partnership. Alternatively, the spouses could incorporate and draw up a shareholder agreement providing for various eventualities (shareholder agreements are discussed later in this chapter) and permitting the company's continuation. Formalizing the business is critical to its potential expansion as well.

The Limited Liability Company

For most new small businesses, the LLC has become the preferred choice of organization. The LLC structure offers a small business the benefit of limited liability without the double taxation associated with a corporation. In addition, although forming an LLC involves filing a certificate with the state and paying a fee, the process is far less complex than that required for a corporation.

The Basic LLC Structure

The structure of an LLC roughly parallels that of a corporation. Instead of articles of incorporation, though, an LLC has an operating agreement that serves as the organization's charter. The owners of an LLC are called members, not shareholders. A member need not be a natural person but may be a separate corporation or other organized entity. Those who run the day-to-day operations of an LLC are known as managers. Two important aspects of an LLC's structure are its flexibility and the fiduciary duties of its members and managers.

Flexibility in Determining Members' Rights Under state law, LLCs have much more legal flexibility than corporations enjoy. Whereas corporations must comply with numerous requirements, LLCs are generally given the flexibility to alter the statutory rules in their operating agreements. Generally, the state statute includes default rules that will govern an LLC unless its operating agreement provides otherwise. For example, default rules typically provide that profits, voting rights, and assets on liquidation will be apportioned according to the value of each member's contribution. An LLC's operating agreement, however, may apportion the members' voting rights equally or according to their financial contributions or some other criteria. Similarly, the operating agreement may provide for profits and losses, and distributions to members, to be allocated on some other basis.

As another example, state statutes typically presume that an LLC's members will be its managers, but the agreement may provide otherwise. Usually, LLC membership interests cannot be transferred, and new memberships may not be issued, without the consent of all existing members. These default rules may also be modified by the agreement. Unlike a corporation, an LLC is not required by law to hold a formal annual meeting, but the agreement may require such a meeting. One leading case even found that the agreement could require all disputes among an LLC's members to be resolved by arbitration, disallowing any court challenges.¹

The following case demonstrates how the rights of a terminated LLC member can be limited by the operating agreement.

EXTENDED Mixon v. Iberia Surgical, L.L.C.

CASE 42.1 Court of Appeal of Louisiana, Third Circuit, 2007. 956 So.2d 76.

COOKS, Judge.

* * * *

Iberia Surgical [L.L.C.] was formed, in August 1998, by a group of physicians practicing in Iberia Parish [Louisiana] for the purpose of establishing an ambulatory, outpatient surgery center. * * * Dr. [Tynes] Mixon was one of the original organizers and became the managing partner.

In June 1999, Iberia Surgical, in a joint ownership venture with Iberia Medical Center, formed New Iberia Surgery Center, L.L.C., an outpatient surgical facility. * * *

Not long after the formation of Iberia Surgical, Dr. Mixon became dissatisfied with the operation of the new facility and management practices of his fellow physicians. * * * After months of discord, * * * on August 28, 2002, Dr. Mixon was terminated from Iberia Surgical by unanimous vote of the membership. Pursuant to the Buy-Out provisions of the Operating Agreement, Dr. Mixon was paid $71,356.85 * * * .

[Mixon filed a suit against Iberia Surgical in a Louisiana state court, presenting evidence that the fair market value of his interest in the business was $483,100. The trial court issued a summary judgment in the defendant's favor. Mixon appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.]

* * * *

* * * Article 3.2(g) of the Operating Agreement provides:

Termination Without Cause. A Member may be Terminated Without Cause, by unanimous vote in writing of the remaining Members of the Company. * * *

* * * Dr. Mixon asserts the exercise of this contractual right by Iberia Surgical to terminate his membership was an abuse of right and violates moral rules, good faith, and elementary fairness. He also contends there was an absence of a serious or legitimate motive for the exercise of the right and, therefore, he concludes it was done to cause harm. * * *

* * * *

* * * The members of Iberia Surgical, including Dr. Mixon, negotiated a business agreement the purpose of which was to establish a profitable outpatient surgery center. There is ample evidence in the record, including Dr. Mixon's own testimony, to establish he objected to the way the facility was being managed * * * . His views were not well received and represented the minority opinion within the organization. * * * A decision was made to buy-out Dr. Mixon's interest and sever financial ties with him. The Operating Agreement, which Dr. Mixon negotiated and signed, gave Iberia Surgical the right to terminate one of its members without cause. Dr. Mixon has provided no evidence to suggest the termination was done to cause him harm or for any other reason than a legitimate business reason. The provisions of the Operating Agreement are straightforward * * * . There is no evidence to suggest the terms of the Operating Agreement violate moral rules, good faith, or elementary fairness. * * *

* * * *

Dr. Mixon contends he was not adequately compensated for his interest in Iberia Surgical. The * * * Operating Agreement * * * provides:

* * *

(c) Purchase Price and Terms. The Purchase Price of a Former Member's Interest * * * shall be determined as follows:

* * * *

(ii) The "Book Value" means the "fair market value" of a Membership Interest computed in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, of the net equity of the Company as of the end of the last full taxable year immediately preceding the year in which the Event giving rise to the purchase and sale of the Membership Rights or Interest occurred. * * *

Dr. Mixon contends "Book Value" is not synonymous with "Fair Market Value." He contends the Operating Agreement requires his membership share should be computed according to the "Fair Market Value," which he defines as the price a seller is willing to accept and a buyer is willing to pay on the open market. * * *

We agree the terms “Book Value” and “Fair Market Value” are not synonymous and have generally recognized meanings in accounting in valuation. * * * Under the terms of the Operating Agreement, the parties agreed to use the “book value” in determining the value of a member’s interest, not fair market value. The book value of a business has a well-defined meaning, is unambiguous, and is susceptible of only one construction. It is the value as shown by the books of the business, and no other value. Book value is calculated by measuring the assets of the business against its liabilities. Good will, actual value or value in the open market, is not considered in determining book value. [Emphasis added.]

* * * * *

Based on the foregoing review of the record, we affirm the decision of the trial court granting summary judgment in favor of Iberia Surgical * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. What might Mixon and the other members of Iberia Surgical have done to avoid the litigation and its ultimate result in this case?
2. Does the outcome in this case underscore the advantages or the disadvantages of the limited liability company form of business organization? Explain.

Extent of Fiduciary Duties A key element of corporate law involves the fiduciary duties of directors and officers to shareholders. The nature and scope of these duties are not as fully defined for LLCs, but the states have imposed some requirements of fair and honest dealing by members and managers. Like many other aspects of the LLC, however, the duties of members and managers may be set out and limited in the LLC agreement.

Converting an LLC into a Corporation

If a small business begins as an LLC and thrives, the owners may wish to convert it to a corporation. By incorporating, the larger business can attract more outside capital, and because it will be retaining its earnings to fund future growth, rather than distributing them to the owners, it will not experience the double-taxation disadvantage of the corporate form. In addition, the corporate structure facilitates equity-based employee incentive plans and a more expansive management structure.

If the LLC agreement does not provide otherwise, this conversion may require the unanimous consent of the members. The LLC must then file articles of dissolution with the state. The members will agree on a process to assign ownership interests in the new corporation by shareholdings. Then, they will go about forming the successor corporation, a procedure discussed in the next section.

Creating the Business Entity

As explained earlier in this chapter, the different forms of business organization differ considerably in the formalities and expenses required to create a business. There are no special legal requirements for creating a sole proprietorship, and a general partnership requires only an agreement between the partners. Forming an LLC involves slightly more legal work. Forming a limited partnership is more complicated. The limited partnership agreement, often called a certificate of limited partnership, must be prepared and recorded with the appropriate governmental authority. State laws also regulate the names of limited partnerships, require certain record keeping, and govern other aspects of the business. The procedures required for the creation of a corporation are perhaps the most complicated of all, so the remainder of this section is devoted to them.

Choosing a Corporate Name

To incorporate, you first must choose a corporate name and file it with the appropriate state office, usually the office of the secretary of state. The name must be different from those used by existing businesses (even unincorporated businesses). Although private databases can be used to check names, the secretary of state’s office should have all of the information necessary. The name of your new company should also include the word Corporation, Company, or Incorporated (abbreviated Corp., Co., and Inc., respectively).

Note that filing a name with the appropriate state official will protect the name as a trade name only within the state. Therefore, businesspersons who anticipate doing business nationally—via the Internet, for example—will want to make sure that their trade names will be protected under trademark law (to be discussed shortly).

Articles of Incorporation, Bylaws, and Initial Meeting

The second key step in incorporation is preparing and filing the articles of incorporation. Other steps involve drafting the corporate bylaws and holding the initial board of directors' meeting.

Articles of Incorporation As discussed in Chapter 38, states have different requirements as to the provisions that must be included in the articles. For example, some states require a minimum number of incorporators or directors, or a minimum capital contribution. As mentioned, entrepreneurs typically engage an attorney to help them draft and file the documents necessary to incorporate, including the articles of incorporation.

Drafting Corporate Bylaws Another important step in the incorporation process is drafting the bylaws, which become the company's governing rules. The bylaws establish the dates on which annual meetings will be held, the number required for a voting quorum, and other rules. The articles of incorporation should not include all of the corporate rules because the articles are relatively difficult to change. Bylaws are binding, but they are more easily modified. Usually, bylaws can be changed by a majority vote of the shareholders; in some states, the bylaws can be modified by the board of directors.

Holding the Initial Board of Directors' Meeting The corporation then holds its first board of directors' meeting. The initial corporate directors are designated in the articles of incorporation. The directors adopt the agreed-on bylaws, appoint corporate officers and define their respective authority, issue stock, open a bank account, and take other necessary actions. The directors will continue to meet periodically and must stand for election at annual shareholders' meetings.

Creating a Corporate Records Book

The next step is to establish a corporate records book in which the corporation's important documents, such as the articles of incorporation and the minutes of directors' and shareholders' meetings, will be kept. If the state requires stock certificates, they will have to be printed and distributed to the owners. The corporation may also need a corporate seal because banks and other institutions sometimes require that seals be placed on certain documents. Again, an attorney typically handles these tasks as part of the incorporation process.

Intellectual Property

Protecting rights in intellectual property is the central concern for some businesses. For example, software companies depend on their copyrights and patents to protect their investments in the research and development required to create new programs. Without copyright or patent protection, a competitor or a customer could simply copy the software. Laws governing rights in intellectual property were discussed in detail in Chapter 8. Here, we examine some aspects of intellectual property law that individuals should consider at the outset of any business venture.

Choosing and Protecting a Trademark

Choosing a trademark or service mark and making sure that it can be protected under trademark law can be crucial to the success of a new business venture. A factor to consider in choosing a name for your business entity is whether you will use your business name as a trademark. Assume that you plan to incorporate your business. When the firm is incorporated, the secretary of state (or other state agency with which the business name is filed) approves your company's name only as a trade name—the name that you can use on checks, invoices, and letterhead stationery. You have legal ownership of your trade name only in that state.

If you decide to use your business (trade) name as a trademark, then you need to follow the principles of trademark law. The general rule is that your trademark cannot be the same as or so similar to another's mark that a customer might think that your product was produced by someone else.

Historically, the first business that actually used a trademark in the marketplace owned it. Today, for national trademark protection, the business must be the first to register the trademark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (PTO) in Washington, D.C. First use still takes some precedence over federal registration, however. Suppose that you have used a particular trademark for two years but have not registered the mark with the PTO. If another company then registers the same mark with the PTO, you will probably have the traditional common law right to continue using that mark but only in the geographic region in which you have been operating. Outside that region, the federal registrant will own the mark.

Choosing a Trademark A trademark should be distinctive. Use of your name or a mere description of your product will probably receive, at most, only weak protection. If you have started a new online company, you cannot call it “Internet” and expect to receive protection. Although using a slight twist on the word may be tempting, this may lead to confusion—thousands of companies already have the word net as part of their names. A distinctive made-up word (such as Exxon or Kodak) may be a good choice.

Once you have chosen a mark, you should do a trademark search to ensure that the mark is not too similar to existing marks. You can hire a trademark search firm or do the search yourself. Sources to consult include the Yellow Pages in any area in which you do business and the Gale Trade Names Directory (available in your local library). You can also look at the federal trademark register, as well as the trademark register in your state. (Go to www.uspto.gov to check the PTO’s online federal trademark register.) Other trademark databases, such as TrademarkScan, are also available on the Internet.

Registering a Trademark After selecting a trademark that appears to be available and that is not confusingly similar to an existing mark, you should register the mark with both the state government and the federal government. As explained earlier, registration is not required, but if you do not register, your protection may be limited to the area in which you do business. Federal registration gives your trademark nationwide protection, provided that the trademark is already in use or will be used within six months. Even if your current business is only local, registration for national protection is important to protect long-term corporate growth.

To register your trademark with the PTO, you must submit an application that includes a specimen (picture) of your trademark, a list of marked goods and/or services, and the date on which you first used the trademark. You may want to register more than one mark. If your logo consists of a distinctive name as well as a graphic, you can register each item independently. For example, Apple, Inc., uses a rainbow-colored apple as a registered logo and the name Apple as a trademark. The apple logo and the Apple name could be registered separately to get independent protection. The PTO now allows online filing through the Trademark Electronic Application System, available at www.uspto.gov/teas.

Protecting a Trademark After registering your trademark, you must take care of it. If your mark is federally registered, you may use the symbol® with your mark; this puts others on notice of your registration. Even if you have not registered, you can use the symbol™ with your mark. Five years after you initially register your mark, you should renew your registration with the PTO. Thereafter, you can renew at ten-year intervals. Filing for renewal informs the PTO that your mark is still in use and ensures that others cannot contest its validity.

Protecting your mark also entails remaining alert to possible trademark infringement. If another company uses your trademark or a mark very similar to yours, you should take prompt action by sending a letter of complaint and consider filing a lawsuit for trademark infringement. If you ignore the problem, you may lose rights in your trademark. If, for example, a media outlet improperly refers to your trademark as if it were a generic word, send a letter of correction and keep a copy in your files. You may at some point need to demonstrate that you have consistently sought to enforce your rights in the mark, or it may be deemed abandoned.

Protecting Trade Secrets

Much of the value of a business may lie in its trade secrets. As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets are business secrets that have value and might be appropriated by another company, such as a competitor. Trade secrets may include information concerning product development, production processes and techniques, or customer lists.

As a practical matter, trade secrets must be divulged to key employees, and thus any business runs the risk that those employees might disclose the secrets to competitors—or even set up competing businesses themselves. Generally, protecting against the possibility that valuable trade secrets will fall into the hands of others, especially competitors, presents an ongoing challenge for businesses, including new enterprises.

Nondisclosure and Noncompete Agreements To protect their trade secrets, companies may require employees who have access to trade secrets to agree in their employment contracts never to divulge those secrets. A company may also include a covenant not to compete in an employment contract. A non-compete covenant will help to protect against the possibility that a key employee may go to work for a competitor or set up a competing business—situations in which the company's trade secrets will likely be disclosed.

Misappropriation of Trade Secrets As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets are protected under the common law.² Thus, a company can sue an individual or a firm that has misappropriated its trade secrets. In one case, for example, two engineers who had developed new software for their company left to work at a new, smaller firm. After the engineers developed a similar product for their new employer, the first company sued for infringement of trade secrets and prevailed in court. The new company was prohibited from selling any of the contested products for three years.³

Raising Financial Capital

Raising financial capital is critical to the growth of most small businesses. In the early days of a business, the sole proprietor or partners may be able to contribute sufficient capital, but if the business becomes successful, more funds may be needed. The owner or owners may want to raise capital from external sources to expand the business. One way to do this is to borrow funds. Another is to exchange equity (ownership rights) in the company in return for funds, either through private arrangements or through public stock offerings.

2. The theft of trade secrets is also a federal crime under the Economic Espionage Act of 1996 (see Chapter 9).

3. Scully Signal Co. v. Joyal, 881 F.Supp. 727 (D.R.I. 1995).

Loans

A small business may find it beneficial to obtain a bank loan because raising capital in this way allows the founder to retain full ownership and control of the business (though the bank may place some restrictions on future business decisions as a condition of granting the loan). Bank loans may not be available for some businesses, however. Banks are usually reluctant to lend significant sums to businesses that are not yet established. Even if a bank is willing to make such a loan, the bank may require personal guaranty contracts from the owners, putting their personal assets at risk (see Chapter 28).

Loans with desirable terms may be available from the federal Small Business Administration (SBA). One SBA program provides loans of up to $25,000 to businesspersons who are women, low-income individuals, or members of minority groups. Be aware that the SBA requires business owners to put some of their own funds at risk in the business. Some entrepreneurs have even used their credit cards to obtain initial capital.

Venture Capital

As discussed in Chapter 38, many new businesses raise needed capital by exchanging certain ownership rights (equity) in the firm for venture capital. In other words, an outsider contributes funds in exchange for an ownership interest in the company. Venture capitalists, often organized into major firms, seek out promising enterprises and fund them in exchange for equity stakes. Akin to venture capitalists are “angels,” individuals who typically invest somewhat smaller sums in new businesses.

According to the U.S. National Venture Capital Association, U.S. venture capitalists invested $25.5 billion in 2,978 deals in 2007. On average, a venture capitalist invests about $5 million to $10 million in a company. In addition to providing needed financing, venture capitalists offer other advantages for businesses. Venture capitalists are often experienced managers who can provide invaluable assistance to entrepreneurs with respect to strategic business decisions, marketing, and important business contacts. Obtaining this assistance may be crucial to a new company's success. The disadvantage is that a venture capitalist with a substantial equity stake will demand a corresponding degree of operational control over the company and a similar proportion of future profits.

To attract outside venture capital, you will need a business plan that describes the company, its products, and its anticipated future performance. The plan should be relatively concise (fewer than fifty pages). After considering your plan, a venture capitalist may decide to investigate your venture further. This step may require you to disclose trade secrets, and you should insist that the potential investor sign a confidentiality agreement. If all goes well, you will then negotiate the terms of financing. A key point to be negotiated is how much ownership and control the venture capitalist will receive in exchange for the capital contribution. Exhibit 42–2 summarizes some key issues that may arise in negotiations with venture capitalists.

Although venture capital may be crucial to a small business's growth, accepting venture capital sometimes carries certain risks, as the following case illustrates.

CASE 42.2 InfoSAGE, Inc. v. Mellon Ventures, L.P.

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 2006. 896 A.2d 616.

● Background and Facts InfoSAGE, Inc., a software development company, funded its initial development with $5 million from its founders and two rounds of venture capital financing that provided another $5 million. Mellon Ventures, L.P., furnished the initial round of venture capital financing. InfoSAGE prepared a business plan predicated on a third round of venture capital financing to be used for its marketing efforts.

After the additional financing did not materialize, InfoSAGE's board voted to enter into a so-called bridge loan contract with Mellon. The company contacted numerous venture capital firms but was never able to obtain a third round of financing. It filed for Chapter 11 proceedings in bankruptcy court. The founders of InfoSAGE accused Mellon of interfering with their efforts to obtain the third round of financing and filed a lawsuit, alleging tortious interference with business relations and breach of fiduciary duty on the part of Mellon's director appointee (Charles Billerbeck). The trial court granted summary judgment for Mellon, and InfoSAGE appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT McCAFFERY, Judge.

* * * *

Appellant's arguments focus on evidence showing suspicious behavior on the part of Billerbeck linked with an abandonment of all interest from the venture capital firms Appellant had contacted. Before appellant could have presented a jury with evidence of Billerbeck's behavior, however, it would have had to establish that its prospective contractual relations with the venture capital firms had progressed to a point showing, or were based on, a reasonable likelihood or probability that these relations would result in a contract. We cannot assume that Appellant would have obtained its investors absent the alleged wrongful acts of the Appellees. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Further, the evidence adduced [presented] by Appellant intended to show a breach of fiduciary duty is insufficient because (1) there is no evidence of an unjust enrichment by Billerbeck or Mellon, a prerequisite to the finding of such a breach, and (2) the jury would be required to glue the shreds of Appellant's evidence together with speculation and conjecture in order to return a verdict in Appellant's favor.

● Decision and Remedy The court affirmed the summary judgment in favor of Mellon.

● The Ethical Dimension Although the court did not find Mellon legally liable to InfoSAGE, could Mellon's actions be interpreted as unethical? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension What fact missing from the circumstances of this case was most important to InfoSAGE's cause of action and could have led to a different result if it had existed?

EXHIBIT 42-2 • Venture Capital Issues

Type and Quantity of Stock	The venture capitalists will negotiate the amount of stock (which will determine their ownership share of the enterprise) and the type of stock (which will usually be preferred stock).
Stock Preferences	If the venture capitalists receive preferred shares, the shares will generally (1) provide for an annual per-share dividend to be paid before common stockholders receive any dividends and (2) give the venture capitalists priority among shareholders in the event of the firm's liquidation.
Conversion and Antidilution Rights	The preferred shares will be convertible into common stock at the option of the venture capitalists, and the company will be restrained from issuing new stock in an amount that would materially dilute the venture capitalists' ownership interests.
Board of Directors	The venture capitalists will define their proportionate representation on the board of directors.
Registration Rights	Should the company conduct a public offering or register its shares at a later date, the venture capitalists will have the right to have their shares registered also ("piggybacked"), making those shares more marketable.
Representations and Warranties	The owner will be required to make representations about the firm's capital structure, its possession of necessary government authorizations, its financial statements, and other material facts.

Securities Regulation

Anyone raising capital needs to be aware of the regulations that govern securities. Many small-business owners raise funds from friends or business acquaintances instead of from venture capitalists. Whatever method is used, the investor exchanges capital for an interest in the enterprise. If this interest consists of shares of stock (or otherwise qualifies as a security under federal or state law), the business may become subject to extraordinarily detailed regulatory requirements. The securities may have to be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) or with the state in which the offering is made, unless the offering falls within an exemption to the securities laws.

Private Offerings In certain circumstances, legal exemptions are available so that businesspersons need not worry about full registration or compliance with all of the securities regulations. (Securities regulations and exemptions were discussed in detail in Chapter 41.) In short, the exemptions permit you to raise a limited amount of funds from a limited number of investors in what is sometimes called a private offering. If your offering qualifies, you need not register your shares as securities with the SEC. States have separate regulatory schemes and different terms for their exemptions from registration. In a private offering, capital is typically raised through a private placement memorandum distributed to selected potential investors.

Public Offerings If your business proves especially successful, you may make a public offering in which a certain number of your shares are offered for purchase by members of the public at a price that you have set. Public offerings are highly regulated, but they may allow you to raise very large amounts of capital. Securities issued through public offerings must be registered with the SEC and applicable state regulatory agencies.

Full registration is complex, but the states and the SEC have jointly created a simplified securities registration process for small businesses. The Small Corporate Offering Registration (SCOR), which requires a form with only fifty questions, can be used for small offerings. Forty-three states have adopted the SCOR process, but with varying laws relating to use of the form.

Buy-Sell Agreements and Key-Person Insurance

In the excitement of forming a new business, it is easy to overlook the possibility that partners or shareholders may die or become disabled or that disputes among partners or shareholders may make business decision making impossible. At the outset of any enterprise involving two or more owners, the owners should decide—and put in writing—how such problems will be resolved.

Shareholder Agreements

Even if a new company has only two owners, they should have a shareholder agreement that defines their relative ownership rights and interests. Such agreements are vital for small, closely held companies, in large part because shares in such entities cannot be readily sold to outsiders. This means that an owner may be locked into the investment against her or his will with little return.

Buy-Sell Agreements A key aspect of the shareholder agreement is a buy-sell agreement. (This type of agreement was discussed in Chapter 36 in the context of a partnership agreement.) In a corporate shareholder agreement, a buy-sell agreement provides for the buyout of a shareholder and establishes criteria for the price to be paid for that shareholder's ownership interest. The death of a shareholder might trigger a buy-sell agreement, enabling the decedent's heirs to cash out the investment. Other common triggering events include a shareholder's bankruptcy, a shareholder's divorce, and the legal attachment of a shareholder's shares for other reasons.

Provisions in Buy-Sell Agreements The buy-sell agreement should include a provision for pricing the shares that will be sold. The price may be a set price or be calculated according to a formula. Buy-sell agreements can also resolve serious deadlocks that may develop between co-owners as the business grows. The agreement might provide that one owner has an option to buy out the others in the event that such a deadlock occurs. Alternatively, all co-owners might submit sealed bids to buy each other out, with the highest bidder being allowed to buy out the others.

A buy-sell agreement might also include a provision for a right of first refusal, which restricts the transferability of the shares for a specified duration. Such a provision will prevent an owner from selling to a third party without first giving the other owners an opportunity to buy out his or her interest. An alternative to the right of first refusal is a provision for a “take-along right,” which allows an investor to participate in any sale of shares to a third party. This right can protect relatively passive investors from the possibility that managing shareholders may “bail out” of the corporation by selling their shares to third parties.

Key-Person Insurance

Much of the value of a small enterprise may rest in the skills of one or a few employees (such as a software designer or a top management executive). To protect against the risk that these key persons may become disabled or die, business enterprises typically obtain key-person insurance (see Chapter 49). The proceeds of a key-person insurance policy can help cover the losses caused by the death or disability of essential employees. Venture capitalists or other investors may require that the company take out a key-person insurance policy as a condition of investing in the corporation.

Contract Law and Small Businesses

Any business venture will require that contracts be formed and signed. For example, if you lease business premises, you will need to sign a lease contract. Any purchases or sales of equipment will also involve contracts. Understanding the basic contract law principles that were covered in Chapters 10 through 19 can help to ensure that any contracts you form will be valid and enforceable. As a general rule, you should make sure that any contractual agreement is in writing. Then, should a dispute arise, there will be written evidence of the contract's terms. Additionally, as discussed in Chapter 15, some contracts—such as contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more⁴—fall under the Statute of Frauds, which means that they must be evidenced by a writing to be enforceable.

Creating Contract Forms

Small-business owners often consult with their attorneys in creating contract forms for specific purposes. For example, a business may wish to provide a warranty for its products but also limit the scope of that warranty. This decision is best made through the mutual judgment of the businessperson and her or his attorney to ensure that both business and legal concerns are addressed.

4. There was an attempt in 2003 to raise this amount to $5,000 in a new version of Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code, but no state adopted the newer version, so, for the moment, the relatively low $500 figure remains in force.

Avoiding Potential Personal Liability

Contract law contains traps, and the businessperson should be aware of them. If you incorporate, you will want to enter contracts as an agent of the corporation, not in your individual capacity. Otherwise, you may be personally liable on the contracts. This principle applies to negotiable instruments as well. For example, if you sign a promissory note on behalf of the corporation, you should indicate that you are signing in a representative capacity (see Chapter 26 for further details on signature liability with respect to negotiable instruments). The same advice applies to partners and partnerships. Ultimately, though, liability is simply a matter of contract interpretation, as demonstrated by the following case.

CASE 42.3 DBL Distributing, Inc. v. 1 Cache, L.L.C.

Court of Appeals of Utah, 2006. 147 P.3d 478.

● Background and Facts 1 Cache, L.L.C., applied for a line of credit with DBL Distributing, Inc. Gary Bracken, the president and a shareholder of 1 Cache, completed and signed the credit application on 1 Cache's behalf. Another officer, Aaron Bracken, signed the application as well. The credit application contained the following clause: "The undersigned agrees to unconditionally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." The application had a single signature line captioned "By:," under the line, "Owner/Corporate Officer/Partner/Principal" was printed.

Near the beginning of 2001, DBL updated its credit application form. The updated form modified the guarantee language as follows: "The undersigned agrees to personally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." The updated application also altered the signature block section to include separate lines for the applicant's firm name, signature, and title. DBL apparently sought to have each of its existing customers complete an updated application. On April 24, 2001, the Brackens completed and signed an updated application on behalf of 1 Cache. This time, Gary added the handwritten notation "president, only in his representative capacity" next to his signature in the space for his title.

1 Cache filed for Chapter 7 bankruptcy on August 26, 2002. Two years later, on August 4, 2004, DBL filed a complaint against 1 Cache and Gary Bracken, asserting, among other things, that Bracken was personally liable for the outstanding debt incurred by 1 Cache. Bracken filed a motion to dismiss, and DBL moved for summary judgment. The trial court granted Bracken's motion to dismiss and denied the motion for summary judgment, and DBL appealed.

THORNE, Judge.

* * * *

* * * The 1999 credit application signed by Gary Bracken stated that "[t]he undersigned agrees to unconditionally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." In 2001, both Gary and Aaron Bracken signed credit applications stating that "[t]he undersigned agrees to personally guarantee payment of all sums owed pursuant to this Agreement." Despite this guarantee language, the Brackens argue that they signed the various documents solely in their capacity as corporate officers, and not as individuals. They rely on the general proposition that a corporate signatory is not individually liable on an instrument that he signs in a representative capacity. * * *

To relieve an individual signer from liability, the signer's corporate capacity must be clear from the form of signature. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Gary and Aaron Bracken's 2001 signatures on the updated credit applications provide additional potential sources of liability despite those signatures' indication of corporate capacity. The 2001 documents present a conflict between the substance of the documents, each of which specifically indicates personal liability against whoever signs it, and the signatures themselves, which suggest only corporate liability. Several Utah cases address this very conflict and hold that clear language of personal guarantee in a document can result in personal liability despite a corporate signature. * * *

• Decision and Remedy The court reversed the dismissal of DBL's claims but affirmed the denial of DBL's motion for summary judgment. It remanded the case for further proceedings, potentially including a trial on the contested factual issues.

• What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Bracken had signed the credit application "Gary Bracken, president, for 1 Cache, L.L.C." Would he have been personally liable for the debt to DBL? Why or why not?

• The E-Commerce Dimension If Bracken had submitted the application online, with "Gary Bracken, president, for 1 Cache, L.L.C." typed in the space for a signature, would either he or 1 Cache have been bound to repay the debt? Explain.

Employment Issues

Small businesses are exempt from some employment laws. For example, businesses with fewer than fifteen employees are exempt from federal laws prohibiting employment discrimination and certain other federal acts, such as the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993.⁵ Some state statutes have similar exemptions for small businesses. Nevertheless, even the smallest businesses are subject to many employment laws, so a knowledge of employment law is crucial for entrepreneurs starting up businesses.

For example, the rather detailed regulations of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration have no small-business exemptions. Small businesses may be less likely to be inspected for violations, but if enforcement and penalties are applied, they can be far more disastrous for start-up companies than for larger, established firms that are in a better position to absorb these costs. Similarly, just one successful lawsuit against a small business can mean bankruptcy for the business, as indicated earlier in this chapter.

Hiring Employees

Hiring good employees can be crucial to business success. You should keep several legal issues in mind during this process.

- Be sure that the person you hire will not be disclosing any protected trade secrets of a former employer.

5. 29 U.S.C. Sections 2601, 2611–2619, 2651–2654.

- Do not make promises of job security unless you are sure you can keep them. If you promise that an employee's job will be permanent and the employee relies on your assurances, you may find it difficult to fire her or him.
- Determine what screening tests are appropriate for the job. In some circumstances, you may be able to require the applicant to take a drug test.
- Comply with all of the requirements imposed by federal immigration laws with respect to verifying whether workers are U.S. citizens and whether those who are not citizens are authorized to work in this country.

Employment Contracts Generally, you should put all employment agreements in writing. This is generally done in an offer letter that sets forth the basic terms of employment, including wages and benefits. An employment contract might specify that the contract is for at-will employment (see Chapter 33), meaning that you can fire the employee at any time for any reason, provided that no employment laws are violated. In new businesses, an employee might want stock or options in lieu of part of his or her salary. Although granting equity to an employee saves scarce cash, it dilutes the other owners' interests. For high-level employees at least, you would be wise to consult an attorney regarding what contractual provisions should be included before awarding an equity interest in the firm.

Verifying Applicants' Credentials and Job Experience It goes without saying that you should contact former employers of job applicants and verify the applicants' credentials and job experience. You should also make sufficient inquiries to avoid a negligent-hiring lawsuit. Suppose that you hire a person who has been convicted twice for criminal assault. If that employee attacks a customer, the customer could sue your business for negligence in screening the worker's background during the hiring process. You therefore should check to see if a job applicant has any history of criminal conduct. You should also check a job applicant's driving record if the job involves driving a vehicle for business purposes. Additionally, actions of dishonest employees can cause a small business to suffer substantial economic losses. Thorough screening procedures will help you to avoid such problems.

Workers' Compensation

Most states require that employers carry workers' compensation insurance. If one of your employees is injured in the course of employment, the employee will be compensated for the injury by the state workers' compensation fund. That employee generally cannot sue you for further damages.

Workers' compensation insurance premiums are often high, and they may constitute one of a small business's greatest expenses. Premiums are initially based on the size of your payroll and the amount of risk involved in the business that you operate. After some time, your rates may be raised or lowered, depending on the safety record of your company. The fewer claims made against you, the lower your workers' compensation insurance costs will be.

Firing Employees

At one time or another, a small-business owner will probably find it necessary to fire a worker. Unless otherwise specified in employment contracts, your employees are presumptively at-will employees, and you can fire them without having to give any reason for doing so. Nevertheless, it is generally advisable to document good cause for terminating a worker—otherwise, he or she may succeed in a lawsuit against you for unlawful discrimination or some other legal violation.

Employee Files Generally, you should keep a file on each employee that includes the employee's application, performance reviews, and other relevant information. If you fire the employee, full documentation of why she or he was fired should be added to the file.

Realize, though, that nearly half of the states have laws that allow employees to have access to their personnel records.

Severance Pay If you fire a worker, you might want to offer severance pay, which is a payment in addition to the employee's wages owed on termination. As a condition of receiving the severance pay, you might ask the employee to sign a release promising not to sue. Severance pay may be especially appropriate if the termination is not the employee's fault. Normally, you are not required to give severance pay (unless you have previously promised to do so or a union contract requires it). Most states have laws governing when you must provide the employee with his or her final paycheck, however.

Wrongful Discharge Some states recognize a legal action for wrongful discharge, but these actions are generally limited to terminations in bad faith. You must be aware of any promises you made to an employee in a written contract, in an employee handbook, or even orally. These promises may prevent you from firing the employee without due process, good cause, or whatever else you may have promised.

Using Independent Contractors

Independent contractors are not considered to be employees. As explained in Chapter 31, according to the Restatement (Second) of Agency, an independent contractor is "a person who contracts with another to do something for him [or her] but who is not controlled by the other nor subject to the other's right to control with respect to his [or her] physical conduct in the performance of the undertaking."

Benefits of Using Independent Contractors The use of independent contractors offers many advantages to small businesses. For one thing, you need not withhold income taxes and Social Security and Medicare taxes from payments made to independent contractors, as you are required to do when you pay wages to employees. Furthermore, you need not match the amount withheld for Social Security and Medicare taxes, which can be costly for an employer. Additionally, you need not pay premiums for workers' compensation insurance or unemployment insurance with respect to independent contractors.

Another important benefit of hiring workers as independent contractors rather than employees is that you are not subject to laws governing employment relationships, including laws prohibiting discrimination. Normally, a court will not permit an independent contractor to bring a suit against you for age discrimination, for example, or for any other type of discrimination prohibited by federal or state laws governing employment relationships—because these laws protect only employees, not independent contractors.

Liability for Misclassification of Workers

Of course, the trade-off in using independent contractors is that you cannot exercise a significant amount of control over how they perform their work. If you do, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) or another government agency may decide that they are, in fact, employees and not independent contractors. Misclassification of an employee as an independent contractor can subject you to considerable tax liability, including penalties.

Microsoft Corporation certainly realized the potential seriousness of misclassification in 1999. In a tax audit, the IRS concluded that Microsoft exercised significant control over workers who had been designated by the company as independent contractors. The IRS reclassified them as employees. The company accepted the ruling and paid overdue employment taxes. Then several hundred independent contractors sued the company to recover the benefits that Microsoft had made available to its employees but not to the independent contractors. The court held that the workers were entitled to participate in Microsoft's stock-purchase plan and other employee benefits—benefits worth millions of dollars.⁶

6. Vizcaino v. U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington, 173 F.3d 713 (9th Cir. 1999). This case was also mentioned in Chapter 31 in the discussion of the IRS criteria for determining when an agent is an employee.

REVIEWING Law for Small Businesses

APC, Inc., is a venture capital firm that invests in new businesses to help them grow. Wyatt Newmark owns and serves as a chef at "Earp's," a restaurant with a Western design that he operates as a sole proprietorship. Newmark has five employees at his restaurant—three servers, another chef, and a janitor. Newmark has had great success and hopes to expand or franchise the business. Newmark, who has not even retained an attorney for his small business, has approached APC for an investment. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What approaches may APC take in order to invest in the restaurant, and what are the legal implications of each approach?
2. If APC takes an equity interest, the restaurant will need a new legal organizational form. What form would you recommend? Why?
3. In order to preserve the opportunity for growth and a possible franchise, what legal filings should Newmark's entity undertake?
4. What is the difference between employee status and independent-contractor status? Which form of employment relationship would be more advantageous to Newmark? Why should employers be cautious when designating workers as independent contractors?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

42-1. George Overton has plans for establishing a new business with Elena Costanza. They will both be managers, and each will take an annual salary of $50,000. The company will have other expenses of $175,000. They expect to take in $375,000 in the first year of operation and share the profits equally. George and Elena have not yet decided whether to incorporate the new business or run it as a partnership. What are the tax differences between the two approaches?

42-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Amy forms Best Properties, LLC (BP), to own real estate as a long-term investment. BP acquires a 40,000-square-foot warehouse for $500,000, with the financing arranged for, and guaranteed by, Amy. Later, Carl and Dave become BP members. They sign a “member’s agreement,” which states, “Amy shall own a 50 percent interest in the capital, profits, and losses of BP and shall have 50 percent of the voting rights. Carl and Dave, collectively, shall own a 50 percent interest in the capital, profits, and losses of BP and shall have 50 percent of the voting rights.” BP’s sole asset is the warehouse. When relations among the members become strained, Amy executes a deed transferring the warehouse to Excel, LLC, for $500,000. Excel has two members—Amy, with a 60 percent interest, and Carl, with 40 percent. Neither Amy nor Carl discuss the warehouse transfer with Dave, but Amy mails him a check that purports to represent his 25 percent interest in the warehouse. Dave files a suit against Amy and Carl, alleging that the transfer was unfair. On what basis might the court rule in favor of the defendants? Why might the court decide in Dave’s favor? Explain.

42-3. Hiring and Firing. Lori McKenzie worked as a personnel director for Renberg’s, Inc. She warned the company president that Renberg’s was going to be sued for specific violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act. After this encounter, the president stopped speaking to her and fired her sixteen days later. McKenzie sued the company for wrongful discharge. The company claimed that she had been fired for improperly and negligently notarizing a “contract” between two other workers for sexual favors. The jury ruled that she had been improperly fired, but the trial court overruled this finding, holding that the company had adequate legal grounds for firing her. McKenzie appealed. Discuss whether the trial court’s ruling should be upheld. [McKenzie v. Renberg’s Inc., 94 F.3d 1478 (10th Cir. 1996)]

42-4. Owner Liability. Gregory and Dale Stires and Stanley Hall owned and operated the Elk Valley Game Ranch as partners. Hall bought thirty-eight head of elk from Martin Carelli and signed a promissory note agreeing to pay $36,000. Hall also signed a security agreement identifying the elk as collateral. Both the note and the security agreement referred to Hall but not to the Stireses. The elk were kept at the ranch. After Hall quit the partnership, the Stireses continued to operate the ranch. When the note was not paid, Carelli filed a suit in a Montana state court against Hall and the Stireses. The court ruled in Carelli’s favor. The Stireses appealed, claiming that Hall was personally liable and they were not. What will the appellate court decide? Why? [Carelli v. Hall, 926 P.2d 756 (Mont. 1996)]

42-5. Owner Liability. Harry Lipson was the president of The Folktree Concertmakers, Inc. To obtain concert advertising in the Boston Globe, Lipson completed the newspaper’s “Standard Application for Credit.” He signed the application “Harry Lipson as President of Folktree Concertmakers, Inc.” The application package also contained a form called a Guaranty, which he signed simply as “Harry Lipson.” Between 1970 and 1995, Folktree placed about $67,000 in advertising with the paper but failed to pay bills totaling $8,556.55. The Boston Globe Newspaper Co. sued both Folktree and Lipson, and the trial court granted summary judgment for the newspaper. Lipson appealed on the ground that he was not personally liable for the debt. Can Lipson be held personally liable for the debt? What should the appellate court decide? Discuss fully. [The Boston Globe Newspaper Co. v. The Folktree Concertmakers, Inc., 1998 Mass.App.Div. 206 (1998)]

42-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Carol Anstett was a salaried, at-will employee of the Plastics Division of Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc. The Plastics Division had an express severance policy under which “[s]alaried employees terminated other than for cause or voluntary separation” were entitled to certain benefits. In July 1997, Eagle-Picher sold the Plastics Division to Cambridge Industries, Inc. Eagle-Picher notified the Plastics Division employees of what was happening to their health insurance and retirement benefits on “termination of service.” Cambridge immediately reemployed nearly all of the Plastics Division personnel, including Anstett. The employees believed that the sale of the division triggered an application of the severance policy and asked Eagle-Picher to pay. The company refused, claiming that the employees had not been terminated. Anstett and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Eagle-Picher, seeking the separation benefits. Eagle-Picher responded that the policy was intended only to cover employees who suffered a loss of income, not to cover a corporate asset sale in which the purchaser immediately rehired the employees. How should the court rule? Explain.

[Anstett v. Eagle-Picher Industries, Inc., 203 F.3d 501 (7th Cir. 2000)]

42-7. Trade Secrets. J. K. Harris & Co. was a small business that was established to help taxpayers settle delinquent accounts. Harris hired Vicki Dye on February 6, 2001. After several weeks, she was given a "Confidentiality/Non-Disclosure, Non-Solicitation and Non-Compete Agreement" to sign. The company fired Dye on October 2, 2001. Dye subsequently went to work for another small tax-resolution business and sent multiple letters to her former clients. Harris informed Dye that her actions were a serious breach of the confidentiality and noncompete agreement and later filed a suit against her in a federal district court. Harris sought an injunction preventing Dye from contacting former clients and offering tax-resolution services. How would you settle this dispute? Explain. [J. K. Harris & Co., LLC v. Dye, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Minn. 2001)]

42-8. Trademarks. National Distillers Products Co. was founded to market and sell a vodka called Teton Glacier, and the company registered this mark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. National Distillers sought to market the product as an ultrapremium vodka, but it was not very successful. Within a year, Refreshment Brands, Inc. (RBI), began advertising that it would be selling a new vodka product called Glacier Bay. After RBI produced the product, National Distillers sued for trademark infringement. Should the plaintiff prevail? [National Distillers Products Co., L.L.C. v. Refreshment Brands, Inc., 198 F.Supp.2d 474 (S.D.N.Y. 2002)]

42-9. Employee Compensation. Between June 10 and September 23, 1998, Jerry Gieg worked for DDR, Inc., doing business as Courtesy Ford in Portland, Oregon. Gieg was a finance and insurance manager. His duties included verifying information in the deals between customers and the sales staff and completing the required forms. He also sold credit-insurance policies, extended warranties, alarm systems, and paint and fabric protection packages. Gieg was paid exclusively through commissions on the products he sold, not from the sales or leases of vehicles. He earned $24,025.16, which exceeded one and a half times the minimum wage. Seeking overtime pay, Gieg filed a suit in a federal district court against DDR. The Fair Labor Standards Act exempts employers from paying overtime to "any employee of a retail or service establishment" if the employee's regular rate of pay is more than one and a half times the minimum wage and if "more than half his compensation . . . represents commissions on goods or services." Gieg claimed, in part, that he was not subject to this provision because he was not engaged in Courtesy's "retail" activity. How should the court rule? Why? [Gieg v. DDR, Inc., 407 F.3d 1038 (9th Cir. 2005)]

42-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Sean McNamee was the owner of an accounting firm, W. F. McNamee & Co., LLC (WFM), which he founded and formed in Connecticut as a limited liability company (LLC). For federal tax purposes, an LLC can elect to be treated as a corporation or as a sole proprietorship by checking the appropriate box on a certain tax form. A corporation's income is subject to double taxation—the corporation is taxed directly, and its shareholders are taxed on dividends paid to them from the income—but its owners normally are not liable if the firm does not pay its taxes. A sole proprietorship is taxed only once—the owner pays an individual's income tax on the business's income—but its owner is liable if the tax is not paid. In 2000, an LLC with a single owner that did not elect corporate treatment was taxed as a sole proprietorship. McNamee did not elect to have WFM treated as a corporation. During the last six months of 2000 and all of 2001, WFM employed an average of six persons but did not pay any payroll taxes. The unpaid total was $64,736.18. WFM went out of business in 2002. The U.S. Department of the Treasury, through the Internal Revenue Service (IRS), assessed the amount of the unpaid tax against McNamee personally. [McNamee v. Department of the Treasury, 488 F.3d 100 (2d Cir. 2007)]

- McNamee objected to the IRS's attempt to collect the tax from him, pointing to Connecticut statutes under which the members of an LLC are not personally liable for its debts. He argued that the IRS's action was "in direct conflict with the right of an LLC member." How would the IRS likely respond to this objection? Do you agree with McNamee or the IRS? Why? What might McNamee have done to avoid this dispute?
- In October 2005, the IRS proposed to amend the check-the-box regulation to relieve the owner of a single-member LLC from the possibility of personal liability for the LLC's payroll tax liability. Does this proposal show that the check-the-box regulation under which McNamee was personally assessed with the amount of the unpaid taxes was "unethical" or "wrong"? Why or why not?

Business Organizations

Every now and then, scandals in the business world rock the nation. Certainly, this was true in the early 2000s when the activities of Enron Corporation and a number of other companies came to light. As noted in several chapters in this unit, Congress responded to public outcry in 2002 by passing the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, which imposed stricter requirements on corporations with respect to accounting practices and statements made in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The lesson for the business world is, of course, that if business leaders do not behave ethically (and legally), the government will create new laws and regulations that force them to do so. We offered suggestions on how business decision makers can create an ethical workplace in Chapter 5. Here, we look at selected areas in which the relationships within specific business organizational forms may raise ethical issues.

The Emergence of Corporate Governance

The well-publicized corporate abuses of the last ten years have fueled the impetus for businesspersons to create their own internal rules for corporate governance (discussed in Chapter 41). In a few situations, officers have blatantly stolen from the corporation and its shareholders. More frequently, though, officers receive benefits or “perks” of office that are excessive. To illustrate: Tyco International bought a $6,000 shower curtain and a $15,000 umbrella stand for its chief executive officer’s apartment.

Corporate officers may be given numerous benefits that they may or may not deserve. A leading corporate officer can receive compensation of $50 million or more in a year when the company’s share price is actually declining. Even if corporate officers are scrupulously honest and have modest personal tastes, their behavior may still raise concerns: they may not be good managers, and they may make incompetent corporate choices. They may be a little lazy and fail to do the hard work necessary to investigate corporate decisions. Alternatively, officers may simply fail to appreciate the concerns of shareholders on certain matters, such as maximizing short-term versus long-term results.

Corporate governance controls are meant to ensure that officers receive only the benefits they earn. Governance monitors the actions taken by officers to make sure they are wise and in the best interests of the company. In this way, the corporation can be confident that it is acting ethically toward its shareholders.

Fiduciary Duties Revisited

The law of agency, as outlined in Chapters 31 and 32, permeates virtually all relationships within any partnership or corporation. An important duty that arises in the law of agency, and applies to all partners and corporate directors, officers, and management personnel, is the duty of loyalty. As caretakers of the shareholders’ wealth, corporate directors and officers also have a fiduciary duty to exercise care when making decisions affecting the corporate enterprise.

The Duty of Loyalty Every individual has his or her own personal interests, which may at times conflict with the interests of the partnership or corporation with which he or she is affiliated. In particular, a partner or a corporate director may face a conflict between personal interests and the interests of the business entity. Corporate officers and directors may find themselves in a position to acquire assets that would also benefit the corporation if acquired in the corporation’s name. If an officer does purchase the asset without offering the opportunity to the corporation, however, she or he may be liable for usurping a corporate opportunity.¹

Most courts also hold that a corporate officer or director has a fiduciary duty to disclose improper conduct to the corporation. The Supreme Court of Arkansas weighed in on this issue in 2007. Thomas Coughlin was a top executive in theft prevention at Wal-Mart who held several other high-level positions prior to becoming a member of the corporation’s board of directors. He retired in 2005 and entered into a retirement agreement and release of claims with Wal-Mart under which he was to receive millions of dollars in benefits over the years.

Then Wal-Mart discovered that Coughlin, prior to retiring, had been abusing his position of authority and conspiring with subordinates to misappropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars in property and cash through various fraudulent schemes. Wal-Mart filed a lawsuit alleging that Coughlin had breached his fiduciary duty of loyalty by failing to disclose his misconduct before entering a self-dealing contract. Ultimately, the state’s highest court agreed and held that the director’s fiduciary duty obligated him to divulge material facts of past fraud to the corporation before entering the contract. The court stated, “[W]e are persuaded, in addition, that the majority view is correct, which is that the failure of a fiduciary to disclose material facts of his fraudulent conduct to his corporation prior to entering into a self-dealing contract with that corporation will void that contract.”²

The Duty of Care In addition to the duty of loyalty, every corporate director or officer owes a duty of care. Due care means that officers and directors must keep themselves informed and make businesslike judgments. Officers have a duty to disclose material information that shareholders need for competent decision making. Some courts have even suggested that corporate directors have a duty to detect and “ferret out” wrongdoing within the corporation.³ In fact, a number of courts applying Delaware law have recognized that directors may be held liable for failing to exercise proper oversight.⁴ Corporate law also creates other structures to protect shareholder interests, such as the right to inspect books and records.

Although traditionally the duty of care did not require directors to monitor the behavior of corporate employees to detect and prevent wrongdoing, the tide may be changing. Since the corporate sentencing guidelines were issued in 1991, courts have the power to impose substantial penalties on corporations and corporate directors for criminal wrongdoing. The guidelines allow these penalties to be mitigated, though, if a company can show that it has an effective compliance program in place to detect and prevent wrongdoing by corporate personnel. Since the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 required the sentencing commission to revise these guidelines, the penalties for white-collar crimes, such as federal mail and wire fraud, have increased dramatically.

Fiduciary Duties to Creditors It is a long-standing principle that corporate directors ordinarily owe fiduciary duties only to a corporation’s shareholders.

Directors who favor the interests of other corporate “stakeholders,” such as creditors, over those of the shareholders have been held liable for breaching these duties. The picture changes, however, when a corporation approaches insolvency. At this point, the shareholders’ equity interests in the corporation may be worthless, while the interests of creditors become paramount. In this situation, do the fiduciary duties of loyalty and care extend to the corporation’s creditors as well as to the shareholders? The answer to this question, according to some courts, is yes. In a leading case on this issue, a Delaware court noted that “[t]he possibility of insolvency can do curious things to incentives, exposing creditors to risks of opportunistic behavior and creating complexities for directors.” The court held that when a corporation is on the brink of insolvency, the directors assume a fiduciary duty to other stakeholders that sustain the corporate entity, including creditors.⁵

Online Chat Rooms and Securities Fraud

The Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) typically claims that fraud occurs when a false statement of fact is made. Many statements about stock, however, such as “this stock is headed for $20,” are simply opinions. Opinions can never be labeled true or false at the time they are made; otherwise, they would not be opinions. As long as a person has a “genuine belief” that an opinion is true, then presumably no fraud is involved. Yet what if negative “opinions” about a certain company cause the price of its stock to drop? Does the company have any legal recourse against those expressing the opinions?

The Problem Facing GTMI Consider the problem facing Global Telemedia International, Inc. (GTMI). In March 2000, GTMI’s stock was trading at $4.70 per share. That month, persons using various aliases began to post messages in the GTMI chat room on the Raging Bull Web site. (Raging Bull is a financial service Web site that organizes chat rooms dedicated to publicly traded companies.) The messages were critical of GTMI and its officers. Over the next six months, GTMI’s stock price declined significantly—by October, the stock was closing at $0.25 a share. In an attempt to recoup damages, GTMI sued the "John Does" for defamation (see Chapter 6).

Had Defamation Occurred? The court noted that defamation of a publicly traded company requires a "false statement of fact made with malice that caused damage." The defendants (those who posted the messages) asserted that their online statements were not actionable because they were statements of opinion, not statements of fact. Ultimately, the court agreed with the defendants.

In reaching its decision, the court looked at the "totality of the circumstances," including the context and format of the statements, as well as the expectations of the audience in that particular situation. Here, said the court, the context and format of the statements—anonymous postings "in the general cacophony of an Internet chat room in which about 1,000 messages a week are posted about GTMI"—strongly suggested that the postings constituted opinion, not fact.⁶

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act and Insider Trading

The attorney-client privilege generally prevents lawyers from disclosing confidential client information—even when the client has committed an unlawful act. The idea is to encourage clients to be open and honest with their attorneys to ensure competent representation. The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, however, requires attorneys to report any material violations of securities laws to the corporation's highest authority.⁷ The act does not require that the lawyer break client confidences, though, because the lawyer is still reporting to officials within the corporation.

In August 2003, the SEC went one step further than the Sarbanes-Oxley Act to permit attorneys to disclose confidential information to the SEC without the corporate client's consent in certain circumstances.⁸ Although the American Bar Association modified its ethics rules to allow attorneys to break confidence with a client to report possible corporate fraud, not all state ethics codes allow attorneys to disclose client information to the SEC. Thus, by reporting possible violations of securities law to the SEC, corporate lawyers may violate the state ethics code of their profession.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Three decades ago, corporations and corporate directors were rarely prosecuted for crimes, and penalties for corporate crimes were relatively light. Today, this is no longer true. Under the corporate sentencing guidelines and the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, corporate wrongdoers can receive strict penalties. Do these developments mean that corporations are committing more crimes today than in the past? Will stricter laws be effective in curbing corporate criminal activity? How can a company avoid liability for crimes committed by its employees?
2. Do you agree that when a corporation is approaching insolvency, the directors' fiduciary obligations should extend to the corporation's creditors as well as to the shareholders? Why or why not?
3. "When opinions about a company's reputation are exchanged in Internet chat rooms and those opinions cause the price of the company's stock to decline, the company may have a cause of action for defamation." How would you argue in favor of this proposition? How would you argue against it?
4. Should corporate lawyers who become aware that someone at the client corporation may have violated securities laws report their suspicions only to persons within the corporation, or should they report their concerns to the SEC? Explain.

Administrative Law

Government agencies established to administer the law have a great impact on the day-to-day operations of the government and the economy. Administrative agencies issue rules covering virtually every aspect of a business's activities. At the federal level, the Securities and Exchange Commission regulates a firm's capital structure and financing, as well as its financial reporting. The National Labor Relations Board oversees relations between a firm and any unions with which it may deal. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission also regulates employer-employee relationships. The Environmental Protection Agency and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration affect the way a firm manufactures its products, and the Federal Trade Commission influences the way it markets those products.

Added to this layer of federal regulation is a second layer of state regulation that, when not preempted, may cover many of the same activities as federal regulation or regulate independently the activities that federal regulation does not cover. Finally, agency regulations at the county or municipal level also affect certain types of business activities.

The rules, orders, and decisions of administrative agencies make up the body of administrative law. You were introduced briefly to some of the main principles of administrative law in Chapter 1. In the following pages, we look at these principles in much greater detail.

The Practical Significance of Administrative Law

Unlike statutory law, administrative law is created by administrative agencies, not by legislatures, but it is nevertheless of paramount significance for businesses. When Congress—or a state legislature—enacts legislation, it typically adopts a rather general statute and leaves its implementation to an administrative agency, which then creates the detailed rules and regulations necessary to carry out the statute. The administrative agency, with its specialized personnel, has the time, resources, and expertise to make the detailed decisions required for regulation. For example, when Congress enacted the Clean Air Act, it provided only general directions for the prevention of air pollution. The specific pollution-control requirements imposed on business are almost entirely the product of decisions made by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).

Legislation and regulations have great benefits—in the example of the Clean Air Act, a much cleaner environment than existed in decades past. At the same time, these benefits entail costs for business. The EPA has estimated the costs of compliance with the Clean Air Act at tens of billions of dollars yearly. Although the agency has calculated that the overall benefits of its regulations often exceed their costs, the burden on business is substantial. In 2001, the Small Business Administration estimated the costs of regulation to business, by size of business, and produced the figures shown in Exhibit 43-1.¹ These costs are averages and vary considerably by type of business (for example, retail or manufacturing). The costs are proportionately higher for small businesses because they cannot take advantage of the economies of scale available to larger operations. Clearly, the costs of regulation to business are considerable—and are significantly higher today than they were in 2001.

EXHIBIT 43-1 • Costs of Regulation to Businesses

All federal	$6,975	$4,463

Given the costs that regulation entails, business has a strong incentive to try to influence the regulatory environment. Whenever new regulations are proposed, as happens constantly, companies may lobby the agency to try to persuade it not to adopt a particular regulation or to adopt one that is more cost-effective. These lobbying efforts consist mainly of providing information to regulators about the costs and problems that the rule may pose for business. At the same time, public-interest groups may be lobbying in favor of more stringent regulation. The rulemaking process, including these lobbying efforts, is governed by administrative law. If persuasion fails, administrative law also provides a tool by which businesses or other groups may challenge the legality of the new regulation.

Agency Creation and Powers

To create an administrative agency, Congress passes enabling legislation, which specifies the name, purposes, functions, and powers of the agency being created. Federal administrative agencies may exercise only those powers that Congress has delegated to them in enabling legislation. Through similar enabling acts, state legislatures create state administrative agencies, which commonly parallel federal agencies.

An agency's enabling statute defines its legal authority. An agency cannot regulate beyond the powers granted by the statute, and it may be required to take some regulatory action by the terms of that statute.

Enabling Legislation—An Example

Consider the enabling legislation for the Federal Trade Commission (FTC). The enabling statute for this agency is the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914.² The act prohibits unfair methods of competition and deceptive trade practices. It also describes the procedures that the FTC must follow to charge persons or organizations with violations of the act, and it provides for judicial review of agency orders. The act grants the FTC the power to do the following:

1. Create “rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the Act.”
2. Conduct investigations of business practices.
3. Obtain reports from interstate corporations concerning their business practices.
4. Investigate possible violations of federal antitrust statutes.³
5. Publish findings of its investigations.
6. Recommend new legislation.
7. Hold trial-like hearings to resolve certain kinds of trade disputes that involve FTC regulations or federal antitrust laws.

The authorizing statute for the FTC allows it to prevent the use of “unfair methods of competition,” but does not define unfairness. Congress delegated that authority to the commission, thereby providing it with considerable discretion in regulating competition.

When regulated groups oppose a rule adopted by an agency, they often bring a lawsuit arguing that the rule was not authorized by the enabling statute and is therefore void. Conversely, a group may file a suit claiming that an agency has illegally failed to pursue regulation required by the enabling statute.

3. The FTC shares enforcement of the Clayton Act with the Antitrust Division of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Types of Agencies

As discussed in Chapter 1, there are two basic types of administrative agencies: executive agencies and independent regulatory agencies. Federal executive agencies include the cabinet departments of the executive branch, which were formed to assist the president in carrying out executive functions, and the subagencies within the cabinet departments. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration, for example, is a subagency within the Department of Labor. Exhibit 43–2 on page 891 lists the cabinet departments and some of their most important subagencies.

All administrative agencies are part of the executive branch of government, but independent regulatory agencies are outside the major executive departments. The Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission are examples of independent regulatory agencies. These and other selected independent regulatory agencies, as well as their principal functions, are listed in Exhibit 43–3 on page 892.

The accountability of the regulators is the most significant difference between the two types of agencies. Agencies that are considered part of the executive branch are subject to the authority of the president, who has the power to appoint and remove federal officers. The president could give orders to the head of an executive agency and fire him or her for failing to carry them out. This power is less pronounced in regard to independent agencies, whose officers serve for fixed terms and cannot be removed without just cause. In practice, however, the president's ability to exert influence over independent regulatory agencies is often considerable because the president has the authority to appoint the members of the agencies.

All three branches of government exercise certain controls over agency powers and functions, as will be discussed later in this chapter, but in many ways administrative agencies function independently. None of the other branches, including the presidency, has the time and resources necessary to monitor the multitude of administrative actions constantly under way.

For this reason, administrative agencies, which constitute the bureaucracy, are sometimes referred to as the “fourth branch” of the U.S. government.

The Administrative Procedure Act

All federal agencies must follow specific procedural requirements in their rulemaking, adjudication, and other functions. Sometimes, Congress specifies certain procedural requirements in an agency's enabling legislation. In the absence of any directives from Congress concerning a particular agency procedure, the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) of 1946⁴ applies.

The Arbitrary and Capricious Test

One of Congress's goals in enacting the APA was to provide for more judicial control over administrative agencies, which had assumed greater powers during the expansion of government that had taken place as a result of the Great Depression of the 1930s and World War II (1939–1945). To that end, the APA provides that courts should “hold unlawful and set aside” agency actions found to be “arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law.”⁵ Under this standard, parties can challenge regulations as contrary to law or so irrational as to be arbitrary and capricious.

The definition of what makes a rule arbitrary and capricious is a vague one, but it includes factors such as whether the agency has done any of the following:

1. Failed to provide a rational explanation for its decision.
2. Changed its prior policy without justification.
3. Considered legally inappropriate factors.
4. Entirely failed to consider a relevant factor.
5. Rendered a decision plainly contrary to the evidence.

The following case considers the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard.

EXTENDED CASE 43.1 Fox Television Stations, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 2007. 489 F.3d 444.

POOLER, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

The [Federal Communications Commission's (FCC's)] policing of "indecent" speech stems from 18 U.S.C. [Section] 1464, which provides that "[w]hoever utters any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication shall be fined * * * or imprisoned not more than two years, or both." * * * The FCC first exercised its statutory authority to sanction indecent (but non-obscene) speech in 1975, when it found Pacifica Foundation's radio broadcast of comedian George Carlin's "Filthy Words" monologue indecent * * * .

* * * Under the Commission's definition, "indecent speech is language that describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards for the broadcast medium, sexual or excretory activities and organs." * * * "

* * * During [a] January 19, 2003, live broadcast of the Golden Globe Awards, musician Bono stated in his acceptance speech "this is really, really, fing brilliant. Really, really, great." * * *

* * * [On a complaint about the broadcast by individuals associated with the Parents Television Council, the] FCC held that any use of any variant of "the F-Word" inherently has sexual connotation and therefore falls within the scope of the indecency definition. * * * The Commission found the fleeting and isolated use of the word irrelevant and overruled all prior decisions in which fleeting use of an expletive was held not indecent.

On February 21, 2006, * * * the Commission found * * * [Fox Television Stations, Inc.'s] broadcast of the 2002 Billboard Music Awards [and] Fox's broadcast of the 2003 Billboard Music Awards * * * indecent and profane. * * * [On the 2002 broadcast] Cher stated: "People have been telling me I'm on the way out every year, right? So f 'em." * * * [On the 2003 broadcast] Nicole Richie * * * stated: "Have you ever tried to get cow shit out of a Prada purse? It's not so fing simple." * * *

Fox * * * filed a petition for review of the [FCC's] Order in [the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit]. * * *

Agencies are of course free to revise their rules and policies. Such a change, however, must provide a reasoned analysis for departing from prior precedent. When an agency reverses its course, a court must satisfy itself that the agency knows it is changing course, has given sound reasons for the change, and has shown that the rule is consistent with the law that gives the agency its authority to act. In addition, the agency must consider reasonably obvious alternatives and, if it rejects those alternatives, it must give reasons for the rejection * * * . [T]he agency must explain why the original reasons for adopting the rule or policy are no longer dispositive [a deciding factor]. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * The primary reason for the crackdown on fleeting expletives advanced by the FCC is the so-called "first blow" theory * * * . [I]ndecent material on the airwaves enters into the privacy of the home uninvited and without warning. * * * To say that one may avoid further offense by turning off the [television or] radio when he hears indecent language is like saying that the remedy for an assault is to run away after the first blow. * * *

We cannot accept this argument as a reasoned basis justifying the Commission's new rule. First, the Commission provides no reasonable explanation for why it has changed its perception that a fleeting expletive was not a harmful "first blow" for the nearly thirty years between [the decisions in Pacifica's case] and Golden Globes. More problematic, however, is that the "first blow" theory bears no rational connection to the Commission's actual policy regarding fleeting expletives. * * * [A] re-broadcast of precisely the same offending clips from the two Billboard Music Award programs for the purpose of providing background information on this case would not result in any action by the FCC * * * .

The * * * Order makes passing reference to other reasons that purportedly support its change in policy, none of which we find sufficient. For instance, the Commission states that even non-literal uses of expletives fall within its indecency definition because it is "difficult (if not impossible) to distinguish whether a word is being used as an expletive or as a literal description of sexual or excretory functions." This defies any commonsense understanding of these words, which, as the general public well knows, are often used in everyday conversation without any “sexual or excretory” meaning. * * * [E]ven the top leaders of our government have used variants of these expletives in a manner that no reasonable person would believe referenced “sexual or excretory organs or activities.” [The court proceeded to recount examples of when President Bush and Vice President Cheney had used the questionable words in public.]

* * * * *

Accordingly, we find that the FCC’s new policy regarding “fleeting expletives” fails to provide a reasoned analysis justifying its departure from the agency’s established practice. For this reason, Fox’s petition for review is granted, the * * * Order is vacated, and the matter is remanded to the FCC for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. According to the court’s opinion in this case, is an administrative agency locked into its first interpretation of a statute? Why or why not?
2. Were the agency’s reasons for its actions rejected in this case because the court disagreed with those reasons? Explain.

Rulemaking Procedures

Today, the major function of an administrative agency is rulemaking—the formulation of new regulations, or rules, as they are often called. The APA defines a rule as “an agency statement of general or particular applicability and future effect designed to implement, interpret, or prescribe law and policy.”⁶ Regulations are sometimes said to be quasi-legislative because, like statutes, they have a binding effect. Like those who violate statutes, violators of agency rules may be punished. Because agency rules have such great legal force, the APA established procedures for agencies to follow in creating rules. Many rules must be adopted using the APA’s notice-and-comment rulemaking procedure.

Notice-and-comment rulemaking involves three basic steps: notice of the proposed rulemaking, a comment period, and the final rule. The APA recognizes some limited exceptions to these procedural requirements, but they are seldom invoked. If the required procedures are violated, the resulting rule may be invalid. The impetus for rulemaking may come from various sources, including Congress, the agency itself, or private parties who may petition an agency to begin a rulemaking (or repeal a rule). For example, environmental groups have petitioned for stricter pollution controls to combat global warming.

Notice of the Proposed Rulemaking When a federal agency decides to create a new rule, the agency publishes a notice of the proposed rulemaking proceedings in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the executive branch that prints government orders, rules, and regulations. The notice states where and when the proceedings will be held, the agency’s legal authority for making the rule (usually its enabling legislation), and the terms or subject matter of the proposed rule. Courts have ruled that the APA requires an agency to make available to the public certain information, such as the key scientific data underlying the proposal.

Comment Period Following the publication of the notice of the proposed rulemaking proceedings, the agency must allow ample time for persons to comment in writing on the proposed rule. The purpose of this comment period is to give interested parties the opportunity to express their views on the proposed rule in an effort to influence agency policy. The comments may be in writing or, if a hearing is held, may be given orally.

The agency need not respond to all comments, but it must respond to any significant comments that bear directly on the proposed rule. The agency responds by either modifying its final rule or explaining, in a statement accompanying the final rule, why it did not make any changes. In some circumstances, particularly when the procedure being used in a specific instance is less formal, an agency may accept comments after the comment period is closed. The agency should summarize these ex parte (private, “off-the-record”) comments in the record for possible review.

The Final Rule After the agency reviews the comments, it drafts the final rule and publishes it in the Federal Register. Such a final rule must contain a “concise general statement of . . . basis and purpose” that describes the reasoning behind the rule.⁷ The final rule may change the terms of the proposed rule, in light of the public comments, but cannot change the proposal too radically, or a new proposal and a new opportunity for comment are required. The final rule is later compiled along with the rules and regulations of other federal administrative agencies in the Code of Federal Regulations (C.F.R.). Final rules have binding legal effect unless the courts later overturn them. For this reason, they are sometimes referred to as “legislative rules.”

The court in the following case considered whether to enforce rules that were issued outside the rulemaking procedure.

7. 5 U.S.C. Section 555(c).

CASE 43.2 Hemp Industries Association v. Drug Enforcement Administration

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2004. 357 F.3d 1012.

• Background and Facts The members of the Hemp Industries Association (HIA) import and distribute sterilized hemp seed and oil and cake derived from hemp seed. They also make and sell food and cosmetic products made from hemp seed and oil. These products contain only nonpsychoactive trace amounts of tetrahydrocannabinols (THC).^a On October 9, 2001, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) published an interpretive rule declaring that “any product that contains any amount

a. A nonpsychoactive substance is one that does not affect a person's mind or behavior. Nonpsychoactive hemp is derived from industrial hemp plants grown in Canada and in Europe, the flowers of which contain only a trace amount of the THC contained in marijuana varieties grown for psychoactive use.

of THC is a Schedule I controlled substance.”^b On the same day, the DEA proposed two legislative rules. One rule—DEA-205F—amended the listing of THC in Schedule I to include natural, as well as synthetic, THC. The second rule—DEA-206F—exempted from control nonpsychoactive hemp products that contain trace amounts of THC not intended to enter the human body. On March 21, 2003, without following formal rulemaking procedures, the DEA declared that these rules were final. This effectively banned the possession and sale of the food products of the HIA’s members. The HIA petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to review the rules, asserting that they should not be enforced.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT*BETTY B. FLETCHER, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * Appellants * * * argue that DEA-205F is a scheduling action—placing nonpsychoactive hemp in Schedule I for the first time—that fails to follow the procedures for such actions required by the Controlled Substances Act (“CSA”). * * *

* * * *

Under 21 U.S.C. [Section] 811(a) [of the CSA]:

the Attorney General may by rule—

(1) add to * * * a schedule * * * any drug or other substance if he—

* * *

(B) makes with respect to such drug or other substance the findings prescribed by subsection (b) of [S]ection 812 of this title * * * .

Rules of the Attorney General under this subsection shall be made on the record after opportunity for a hearing pursuant to the rulemaking procedures prescribed by [the Administrative Procedure Act (APA).]

* * * Formal rulemaking requires hearings on the record, and [the APA] invites parties to submit proposed findings and oppose the stated bases of tentative agency decisions, and requires the agency to issue formal rulings on each finding, conclusion, or exception on the record. We will not reproduce the entirety of the [APA] here; it suffices to say that the DEA did not and does not claim to have followed formal rulemaking procedures. [Emphasis added.]

In addition, the DEA did not comply with [Section] 811(a)(1)(B), because the findings required by [Section] 812(b) were not made. Section 812(b) states:

(b) Placement on schedules; findings required. * * * [A] drug or other substance may not be placed in any schedule unless the findings required for such schedule are made with respect to such drug or other substance.

* * * *

The DEA does not purport to have met the requirements for placement of nonpsychoactive hemp on Schedule I * * * . Instead, the DEA argues that naturally occurring THC in those parts of the hemp plant excluded from the definition of “marijuana” have always been included under the listing for “THC” * * * .

* * * *

Two CSA provisions are relevant to determining whether Appellants’ hemp products were banned before [DEA-205F and DEA-206F]: the definition of THC and the definition of marijuana. Both are unambiguous * * * : Appellants’ products do not contain the “synthetic” “substances or derivatives” that are covered by the definition of THC, and nonpsychoactive hemp is explicitly excluded from the definition of marijuana.

* * * *

Under 21 U.S.C. [Section] 802(16) [of the CSA]:

The term “marihuana” means all parts of the plant Cannabis sativa L. * * * . Such term does not include the mature stalks of such plant, fiber produced from such stalks, oil or cake made from the seeds of such plant, any other compound, manufacture, salt, derivative, mixture, or preparation of such mature stalks (except the resin extracted therefrom), fiber, oil, or cake, or the sterilized seed of such plant which is incapable of germination.

b. A controlled substance is a drug whose availability is restricted by law.

The nonpsychoactive hemp in Appellants' products is derived from the "mature stalks" or is "oil and cake made from the seeds" of the Cannabis plant, and therefore fits within the plainly stated exception to the CSA definition of marijuana.

* * * Congress knew what it was doing, and its intent to exclude nonpsychoactive hemp from regulation is entirely clear.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that DEA-205F and DEA-206F "are inconsistent with the unambiguous meaning of the CSA definitions of marijuana and THC," and that the DEA did not follow the proper administrative procedures required to add a substance to Schedule I. The court issued an injunction against the enforcement of the rules with respect to nonpsychoactive hemp or products containing it.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the statutory definitions of THC and marijuana covered naturally occurring THC and nonpsychoactive hemp. Would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

● The E-Commerce Dimension How might the Internet expedite formal rulemaking procedures such as those required by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in this case? Discuss.

Informal Agency Action

Rather than take the time to conduct notice-and-comment rulemaking, agencies have increasingly been using more informal methods of policymaking. These include issuing "interpretive rules," which are specifically exempted from the APA's requirements. Such rules simply declare the agency's interpretation of its enabling statute's meaning, and they impose no direct and legally binding obligations on regulated parties. In addition, agencies issue various other materials, such as "guidance documents," that advise the public on the agencies' legal and policy positions.

Such informal actions are exempt from the APA's requirements because they do not establish legal rights—a party cannot be directly prosecuted for violating an interpretive rule or a guidance document. Nevertheless, an agency's informal action can be of practical importance because it warns regulated entities that the agency may engage in formal rulemaking if they fail to heed the positions taken informally by the agency.

Judicial Deference to Agency Decisions

When asked to review agency decisions, courts historically granted some deference (significant weight) to the agency's judgment, often citing the agency's great expertise in the subject area of the regulation. This deference seems especially appropriate when applied to an agency's analysis of factual questions, but should it also extend to an agency's interpretation of its own legal authority? In Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc.,⁸ the United States Supreme Court held that it should, thereby creating a standard of broadened deference to agencies on questions of legal interpretation.

The Holding of the Chevron Case

At issue in the Chevron case was whether the courts should defer to an agency's interpretation of a statute giving it authority to act. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) had interpreted the phrase "stationary source" in the Clean Air Act as referring to an entire manufacturing plant, and not to each facility within a plant. The agency's interpretation enabled it to adopt the so-called bubble policy that allowed companies to offset increases in emissions in part of a plant with decreases elsewhere in the plant—an interpretation that reduced the pollution-control compliance costs faced by manufacturers. An environmental group challenged the legality of the EPA's interpretation.

The Supreme Court held that the courts should defer to an agency's interpretation of law as well as fact. The Court found that the agency's interpretation of the statute was reasonable and upheld the bubble policy. The Court's decision in the Chevron case created a new standard for courts to use when reviewing agency interpretations of law, which involves the following two questions:

1. Did Congress directly address the issue in dispute in the statute? If so, the statutory language prevails.
2. If the statute is silent or ambiguous, is the agency's interpretation "reasonable"? If it is, a court should uphold the agency's interpretation even if the court would have interpreted the law differently.

When Courts Will Give Chevron Deference to Agency Interpretation

The notion that courts should defer to agencies on matters of law was controversial. Under the holding of the Chevron case, when the meaning of a particular statute's language is unclear and an agency interprets it, the court must follow the agency's interpretation as long as it is reasonable. This led to considerable discussion and litigation to test the boundaries of the Chevron holding. For instance, are courts required to give deference to all agency interpretations or only to those interpretations that result from adjudication or formal rulemaking procedures? What about informal agency interpretations through opinion letters and internal memorandums, are they entitled to deference?

In the following landmark decision, the United States Supreme Court had to decide whether a "ruling letter" from the U.S. Customs Service that reclassified an imported item for purposes of taxation was entitled to Chevron deference. The Court's decision limited the scope of the Chevron holding somewhat, and therefore is an important case for companies subject to federal regulation.

C A S E 43.3 United States v. Mead Corporation

Supreme Court of the United States, 2001. 533 U.S. 218, 121 S.Ct. 2164, 150 L.Ed.2d 292.

● Background and Facts The Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States authorizes the U.S. Customs Service to classify and fix the rate of duty on imports, under rules issued by the secretary of the treasury. "Ruling letters" set tariff classifications for particular imports. Mead Corporation imported "daily planners," which had been tariff free for several years. The Customs Service issued a ruling letter reclassifying them as "bound diaries," which were subject to a tariff. Mead brought a lawsuit in the Court of International Trade and lost but successfully appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit. That court held for Mead and found that the ruling letters should not receive "Chevron deference" because they were not put into effect pursuant to notice-and-comment rulemaking. The government appealed the decision to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * * *
* * * It is fair to assume generally that Congress contemplates administrative action with the effect of law when it provides for a relatively formal administrative procedure tending to foster the fairness and deliberation that should underlie a pronouncement of such force. * * * That said, and as significant as notice-and-comment is in pointing to Chevron authority, the want of that procedure here does not decide the case, as we have sometimes found reasons for Chevron deference even when no such administrative formality was required and none was afforded. * * *

There are, nonetheless, ample reasons to deny Chevron deference here. The authorization for classification rulings, and Customs's practice in making them, present a case far removed not only from notice-and-comment process, but from any other circumstances reasonably suggesting that Congress ever thought of classification rulings as deserving the deference claimed for them here. * * * On the face of the statute, to begin with, the terms of the congressional delegation give no indication that Congress meant to delegate authority to Customs to issue classification rulings with the force of law. * * * [Emphasis added.]
* * * * *

In sum, classification rulings are best treated like "Interpretations contained in policy statements, agency manuals, and enforcement guidelines." * * * They are beyond the Chevron pale.

● Decision and Remedy The judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit was vacated, and the case was remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion, which recognized that some lesser standard of deference than that of Chevron might still be appropriate.

• Impact of This Case on Today's Law The decision in the Mead case was widely regarded as significantly limiting the circumstances in which Chevron deference is given to agency interpretations of law. For agencies to be assured of such judicial deference, they must meet the formal legal standards for notice-and-comment rulemaking and cannot evade those requirements with more informal declarations. This ruling strengthened the legal hand of those challenging administrative actions.

• The Ethical Dimension Is it ethical for an administrative agency to reverse or otherwise alter its policy when the change increases the financial burden on the regulated parties? Explain.

Agency Enforcement and Adjudication

Although rulemaking is the most prominent agency activity, enforcement of the rules is also critical. Often, an agency itself enforces its rules. It identifies alleged violators and pursues civil remedies against them in a proceeding held by the agency rather than in federal court, although the agency's determinations are reviewable in court.

Investigation

After final rules are issued, agencies conduct investigations to monitor compliance with those rules or the terms of the enabling statute. A typical agency investigation of this kind might begin when a citizen reports a possible violation to the agency. Many agency rules also require considerable compliance reporting from regulated entities, and such a report may trigger an enforcement investigation. For example, environmental regulators often require reporting of emissions, and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) requires companies to report any work-related deaths.

Inspections Many agencies gather information through on-site inspections. Sometimes, inspecting an office, a factory, or some other business facility is the only way to obtain the evidence needed to prove a regulatory violation. Administrative inspections and tests cover a wide range of activities, including safety inspections of underground coal mines, safety tests of commercial equipment and automobiles, and environmental monitoring of factory emissions. An agency may also ask a firm or individual to submit certain documents or records to the agency for examination. For example, the Federal Trade Commission often asks to inspect corporate records for compliance.

Normally, business firms comply with agency requests to inspect facilities or business records because it is in any firm's interest to maintain a good relationship with regulatory bodies. In some instances, however, such as when a firm thinks an agency's request is unreasonable and may be detrimental to the firm's interest, the firm may refuse to comply with the request. In such situations, an agency may resort to the use of a subpoena or a search warrant.

Subpoenas There are two basic types of subpoenas. The subpoena ad testificandum ("to testify") is an ordinary subpoena. It is a writ, or order, compelling a witness to appear at an agency hearing. The subpoena *duces tecum*⁹ ("bring it with you") compels an individual or organization to hand over books, papers, records, or documents to the agency. An administrative agency may use either type of subpoena to obtain testimony or documents.

There are limits on the information that an agency can demand. To determine whether an agency is abusing its discretion in its pursuit of information as part of an investigation, a court may consider such factors as the following:

1. The purpose of the investigation. An investigation must have a legitimate purpose. Harassment is an example of an improper purpose. An agency may not issue an administrative subpoena to inspect business records if the agency's motive is to harass or pressure the business into settling an unrelated matter.
2. The relevance of the information being sought. Information is relevant if it reveals that the law is being violated or if it assures the agency that the law is not being violated.
3. The specificity of the demand for testimony or documents. A subpoena must, for example, adequately describe the material being sought.

9. Pronounced doo-cheez tee-kum.

4. The burden of the demand on the party from whom the information is sought. In responding to a request for information, a party must bear the costs of, for example, copying the documents that must be handed over; a business is generally protected from revealing such information as trade secrets, however.

Searches during Site Inspections As mentioned, agency investigations often involve on-site inspections. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) frequently conducts inspections to enforce environmental laws. For example, the EPA may inspect a site to determine if hazardous wastes are being stored properly or to sample a facility's wastewater to ensure that it complies with the Clean Water Act. Usually, companies do not resist such inspections, although in some circumstances they may do so.

The Fourth Amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures by requiring that in most instances a physical search for evidence must be conducted under the authority of a search warrant. An agency's search warrant is an order directing law enforcement officials to search a specific place for a specific item and present it to the agency. Although it was once thought that administrative inspections were exempt from the warrant requirement, the United States Supreme Court held in Marshall v. Barlow's, Inc.,¹⁰ that the requirement does apply to the administrative process.

Agencies can conduct warrantless searches in several situations. Warrants are not required to conduct searches in highly regulated industries. Firms that sell firearms or liquor, for example, are automatically subject to inspections without warrants. Sometimes, a statute permits warrantless searches of certain types of hazardous operations, such as coal mines. Also, a warrantless inspection in an emergency situation is normally considered reasonable.

Adjudication

After conducting an investigation of a suspected rule violation, an agency may begin to take administrative action against an individual or organization. Most administrative actions are resolved through negotiated settlements at their initial stages, without the need for formal adjudication (the process of resolving a dispute by presenting evidence and arguments before a neutral third party decision maker).

10. 436 U.S. 307, 98 S.Ct. 1816, 56 L.Ed.2d 305 (1978).

Negotiated Settlements Depending on the agency, negotiations may take the form of a simple conversation or a series of informal conferences. Whatever form the negotiations take, their purpose is to rectify the problem to the agency's satisfaction and eliminate the need for additional proceedings.

Settlement is an appealing option to firms for two reasons: to avoid appearing uncooperative and to avoid the expense involved in formal adjudication proceedings and in possible later appeals. Settlement is also an attractive option for agencies. To conserve their own resources and avoid formal actions, administrative agencies devote a great deal of effort to giving advice and negotiating solutions to problems.

Formal Complaints If a settlement cannot be reached, the agency may issue a formal complaint against the suspected violator. If the EPA, for example, finds that a factory is polluting groundwater in violation of federal pollution laws, the EPA will issue a complaint against the violator in an effort to bring the plant into compliance with federal regulations. This complaint is a public document, and a press release may accompany it. The factory charged in the complaint will respond by filing an answer to the EPA's allegations. If the factory and the EPA cannot agree on a settlement, the case will be adjudicated.

Agency adjudication may involve a trial-like arbitration procedure before an administrative law judge (ALJ) (arbitration was discussed in Chapter 2). The Administrative Procedure Act (APA) requires that before the hearing takes place, the agency must issue a notice that includes the facts and law on which the complaint is based, the legal authority for the hearing, and its time and place. The administrative adjudication process is described below and illustrated graphically in Exhibit 43-4 on the following page.

The Role of the Administrative Law Judge

The ALJ presides over the hearing and has the power to administer oaths, take testimony, rule on questions of evidence, and make determinations of fact. Although technically, the ALJ is not an independent judge and works for the agency prosecuting the case (in our example, the EPA), the law requires an ALJ to be an unbiased adjudicator (judge).

Certain safeguards prevent bias on the part of the ALJ and promote fairness in the proceedings. For example, the APA requires that the ALJ be separate from an agency's investigative and prosecutorial staff. The APA also prohibits ex parte (private) communications between the ALJ and any party to an agency proceeding, such as the EPA or the factory. Finally, provisions of the APA protect the ALJ from agency disciplinary actions unless the agency can show good cause for such an action.

EXHIBIT 43-4 • The Process of Formal Administrative Adjudication

Hearing Procedures Hearing procedures vary widely from agency to agency. Administrative agencies generally exercise substantial discretion over the type of procedure that will be used. Frequently, disputes are resolved through informal adjudication proceedings. For example, the parties, their counsel, and the ALJ may simply meet at a table in a conference room to attempt to settle the dispute.

A formal adjudicatory hearing, in contrast, resembles a trial in many respects. Prior to the hearing, the parties are permitted to undertake discovery—involving depositions, interrogatories, and requests for documents or other information, as described in Chapter 3—although the discovery process is not quite as extensive as it would be in a court proceeding. The hearing itself must comply with the procedural requirements of the APA and must also meet the constitutional standards of due process. During the hearing, the parties may give testimony, present other evidence, and cross-examine adverse witnesses. A significant difference between a trial and an administrative agency hearing, though, is that normally much more information, including hearsay (secondhand information), can be introduced as evidence during an administrative hearing. The burden of proof in an enforcement proceeding is placed on the agency.

Agency Orders Following a hearing, the ALJ renders an initial order, or decision, on the case. Either party can appeal the ALJ's decision to the board or commission that governs the agency. If the factory in the previous example is dissatisfied with the ALJ's decision, it can appeal the decision to the EPA. If the factory is dissatisfied with the commission's decision, it can appeal the decision to a federal court of appeals. If no party appeals the case, the ALJ's decision becomes the final order of the agency. The ALJ's decision also becomes final if a party appeals and the commission and the court decline to review the case. If a party appeals and the case is reviewed, the final order comes from the commission's decision or (if that decision is appealed to a federal appellate court) that of the court.

Limitations on Agency Powers

Combining the functions normally divided among the three branches of government into an administrative agency concentrates considerable power in a single organization. Because of this concentration of authority, one of the major policy objectives of the government is to control the risks of arbitrariness and overreaching by administrative agencies without hindering the effective use of agency power to deal with particular problem areas, as Congress intends.

The judicial branch of the government exercises control over agency powers through the courts' review of agency actions. The executive and legislative branches of government also exercise control over agency authority.

Judicial Controls

As described earlier, the Administrative Procedure Act provides for judicial review of most agency decisions. Agency actions are not automatically subject to judicial review, however. Procedural doctrines such as exhaustion and ripeness may limit the opportunity of judicial review.

The Exhaustion Doctrine The exhaustion doctrine requires that a regulated party use all of its potential administrative remedies before going to court, even though the party might prefer to go straight to the independent federal courts, rather than going through the administrative adjudication process. Requiring the administrative process first allows the agency to evaluate the argument and enables a court to take advantage of the agency's own fact-finding capabilities before ruling. The exhaustion of administrative remedies is not required, though, if the party can demonstrate that those remedies are inadequate to address its challenge.

In the classic exhaustion case, a company was served with a complaint from the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) alleging that it had engaged in unfair labor practices.¹¹ The company argued that because it was not operating in interstate commerce, the NLRB had no jurisdiction. The United States Supreme Court rejected this argument and held that the company was required to first use administrative procedures to challenge the complaint.

The Ripeness Doctrine Under what is known as the ripeness doctrine, a court will not review an administrative agency's decision until the case is "ripe for review." Generally, a case is ripe for review if the parties can demonstrate that they have met certain requirements. The party bringing the action must have standing to sue the agency (the party must have a direct stake in the outcome of the judicial proceeding), and there must be an actual controversy at issue. Recall from Chapter 2 that these are basic judicial requirements that must be met before any court will hear a case.

Standing requires that a plaintiff have an actual injury, that the injury be causally connected with the challenged action, and that the injury be one that can be successfully redressed by a judicial resolution of the case. The rationale for this doctrine is to prevent courts from entangling themselves in abstract disagreements over administrative policies. The doctrine also protects agencies from judicial interference until an administrative decision has been formalized and its effects are clear. The court can then evaluate both the appropriateness of an issue for judicial resolution and the hardship that the plaintiff will suffer if the court refuses to hear the case.

Executive Controls

The executive branch of government exercises control over agencies both through the president's power to appoint federal officers and through the president's veto power. The president may veto enabling legislation presented by Congress or congressional attempts to modify an existing agency's authority. In addition, the president has created a process whereby the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) of the Office of Management and Budget reviews the cost-effectiveness of agency rules. The OIRA also reviews agencies' compliance with the Paperwork Reduction Act,¹² which requires agencies to minimize the paperwork burden on regulated entities. These reviews provide regulated entities with a pathway to challenge rules, through lobbying, even after the rules have been adopted. The reviews are not subject to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act.

Legislative Controls

Congress also exercises authority over agency powers. Through enabling legislation, Congress gives power to an agency. Of course, an agency may not exceed the power that Congress has delegated to it. Through subsequent legislation, Congress can take away that power or even abolish an agency altogether. Legislative authority is required to fund an agency, and enabling legislation usually sets certain time and monetary limits on the funding of particular programs. Congress can always revise these limits.

In addition to its power to create and fund agencies, Congress has the authority to investigate the implementation of its laws and the agencies that it has created. Individual legislators may also affect agency policy through their "casework" activities, which involve attempts to help their constituents deal with agencies.

Congress also has the power to “freeze” the enforcement of most federal regulations before the regulations take effect. Under the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996,¹³ all federal agencies must submit final rules to Congress before the rules become effective. If, within sixty days, Congress passes a joint resolution disapproving of a rule, its enforcement is frozen while the rule is reviewed by congressional committees.

Another legislative check on agency actions is the Administrative Procedure Act, discussed earlier in this chapter. Additionally, the laws discussed in the next section provide certain checks on the actions of administrative agencies.

Public Accountability

As a result of growing public concern over the powers exercised by administrative agencies, Congress passed several laws to make agencies more accountable through public scrutiny. We discuss here the most significant of these laws.

Freedom of Information Act

Enacted in 1966, the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA)¹⁴ requires the federal government to disclose certain records to any person or entity on written request. The FOIA exempts certain types of records, such as those pertaining to national security, and records containing information that is confidential or personal.

A request that complies with the FOIA procedures need only contain a reasonably specific description of the information sought. Many agencies now accept requests via e-mail, as well as by fax. The agency has twenty working days to answer a request and must notify the individual if the information sought is being withheld and which exemptions apply. The agency typically charges the person requesting the information a fee for research, copying, and other services.

An agency's failure to comply with a FOIA request may be challenged in a federal district court. The media, industry trade associations, public-interest groups, and even companies seeking information about competitors rely on these FOIA provisions to obtain information from government agencies.

Under a 1996 amendment to the FOIA, all federal government agencies must make their records available electronically on the Internet, on CD-ROMs, and in other electronic formats. Any document an agency creates must be accessible by computer within a year after its creation. Agencies must also provide a clear index to all of their documents.

Government in the Sunshine Act

Congress passed the Government in the Sunshine Act,¹⁵ or open meeting law, in 1976. It requires that “every portion of every meeting of an agency” be open to “public observation.” The act also requires the establishment of procedures to ensure that the public is provided with adequate advance notice of scheduled meetings and agendas. Like the FOIA, the Sunshine Act contains certain exceptions. Closed meetings are permitted when (1) the subject of the meeting concerns accusing any person of a crime, (2) an open meeting would frustrate the implementation of agency actions, or (3) the subject of the meeting involves matters relating to future litigation or rulemaking. Courts interpret these exceptions to allow open access whenever possible.

Regulatory Flexibility Act

Concern over the effects of regulation on the efficiency of businesses, particularly smaller ones, led Congress to pass the Regulatory Flexibility Act¹⁶ in 1980. Under this act, whenever a new regulation will have a “significant impact upon a substantial number of small entities,” the agency must conduct a regulatory flexibility analysis. The analysis must measure the cost that the rule would impose on small businesses and must consider less burdensome alternatives. The act also contains provisions to alert small businesses—through advertising in trade journals, for example—about forthcoming regulations. The act reduces some record-keeping burdens for small businesses, especially with regard to hazardous waste management.

Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act

As mentioned earlier, the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act (SBREFA) of 1996 allows

13. 5 U.S.C. Sections 801–808.

14. 5 U.S.C. Section 552.

15. 5 U.S.C. Section 552b.

16. 5 U.S.C. Sections 601–612.

Congress to review new federal regulations for at least sixty days before they take effect. This period gives opponents of the rules time to present their arguments to Congress.

The SBREFA also authorizes the courts to enforce the Regulatory Flexibility Act. This helps to ensure that federal agencies, such as the Internal Revenue Service, will consider ways to reduce the economic impact of new regulations on small businesses. Federal agencies are required to prepare guides that explain in “plain English” how small businesses can comply with federal regulations.

The SBREFA also set up the National Enforcement Ombudsman at the Small Business Administration to receive comments from small businesses about their dealings with federal agencies. Based on these comments, Regional Small Business Fairness Boards rate the agencies and publicize their findings.

Finally, the SBREFA allows small businesses to recover their expenses and legal fees from the government when an agency makes demands for fines or penalties that a court considers excessive.

REVIEWING Administrative Law

Assume that the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) has a rule that it will enforce statutory provisions prohibiting insider trading only when the insiders make monetary profits for themselves. Then the SEC makes a new rule, declaring that it will now bring enforcement actions against individuals for insider trading even if the individuals did not personally profit from the transactions. In making the new rule, the SEC does not conduct a rulemaking procedure but simply announces its decision. A stockbrokerage firm objects and says that the new rule was unlawfully developed without opportunity for public comment. The brokerage firm challenges the rule in an action that ultimately is reviewed by a federal appellate court. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Is the SEC an executive agency or an independent regulatory agency? Does it matter to the outcome of this dispute? Explain.
2. Suppose that the SEC asserts that it has always had the statutory authority to pursue persons for insider trading regardless of whether they personally profited from the transaction. This is the only argument the SEC makes to justify changing its enforcement rules. Would a court be likely to find that the SEC's action was arbitrary and capricious under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA)? Why or why not?
3. Would a court be likely to give Chevron deference to the SEC's interpretation of the law on insider trading? Why or why not?
4. Now assume that a court finds that the new rule is merely “interpretive.” What effect would this determination have on whether the SEC had to follow the APA's rulemaking procedures?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

43-1. For decades, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) resolved fair trade and advertising disputes through individual adjudications. In the 1960s, the FTC began promulgating rules that defined fair and unfair trade practices. In cases involving violations of these rules, the due process rights of participants were more limited and did not include cross-examination. Although anyone found violating a rule would receive a full adjudication, the legitimacy of the rule itself could not be challenged in the adjudication. Any party charged with violating a rule was almost certain to lose the adjudication. Affected parties complained to a court, arguing that their rights before the FTC were unduly limited by the new rules. What will the court examine to determine whether to uphold the new rules?

43-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Assume that the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), using proper procedures, adopts a rule describing its future investigations. This new rule covers all future circumstances in which the FDA wants to regulate food additives. Under the new rule, the FDA is not to regulate food additives without giving food companies an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses. At a subsequent time, the FDA wants to regulate methylisocyanate, a food additive. The FDA undertakes an informal rulemaking procedure, without cross-examination, and regulates methylisocyanate. Producers protest, saying that the FDA promised them the opportunity for cross-examination. The FDA responds that the Administrative Procedure Act does not require such cross-examination and that it is free to withdraw the promise made in its new rule. If the producers challenge the FDA in court, on what basis would the court rule in their favor?

- For a sample answer to Question 43-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

43-3. Rulemaking. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) is part of the U.S. Department of Labor. OSHA issued a “Directive” under which each employer in selected industries was to be inspected unless it adopted a “Comprehensive Compliance Program (CCP)” — a safety and health program designed to meet standards that in some respects exceeded those otherwise required by law. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States objected to the Directive and filed a petition for review with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The Chamber claimed, in part, that OSHA did not use proper rulemaking procedures in issuing the Directive. OSHA argued that it was not required to follow those procedures because the Directive itself was a “rule of procedure.” OSHA claimed that the rule did not “alter the rights or interests of parties, although it may alter the manner in which the parties present themselves or their viewpoints to the agency.”

What are the steps of the most commonly used rulemaking procedure? Which steps are missing in this case? In whose favor should the court rule and why? [Chamber of Commerce of the United States v. U.S. Department of Labor, 174 F3d 206 (D.C. Cir. 1999)]

43-4. Arbitrary and Capricious Test. Lion Raisins, Inc., is a family-owned, family-operated business that grows raisins and markets them to private enterprises. In the 1990s, Lion also successfully bid on more than fifteen contracts awarded by the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA). In May 1999, a USDA investigation reported that Lion appeared to have falsified inspectors’ signatures, given false moisture content, and changed the grade of raisins on three USDA raisin certificates issued between 1996 and 1998. Lion was subsequently awarded five more USDA contracts. Then, in November 2000, the company was the low bidder on two new USDA contracts for school lunch programs. In January 2001, however, the USDA awarded these contracts to other bidders and, on the basis of the May 1999 report, suspended Lion from participating in government contracts for one year. Lion filed a suit in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims against the USDA, seeking, in part, lost profits on the school lunch contracts on the ground that the USDA’s suspension was arbitrary and capricious. What reasoning might the court employ to grant a summary judgment in Lion’s favor? [Lion Raisins, Inc. v. United States, 51 Fed. Cl. 238 (2001)]

43-5. Investigation. Maureen Droge began working for United Air Lines, Inc. (UAL), as a flight attendant in 1990. In 1995, she was assigned to Paris, France, where she became pregnant. Because UAL does not allow its flight attendants to fly during their third trimester of pregnancy, Droge was placed on involuntary leave. She applied for temporary disability benefits through the French social security system, but her request was denied because UAL does not contribute to the French system on behalf of its U.S.-based flight attendants. Droge filed a charge of discrimination with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), alleging that UAL had discriminated against her and other Americans. The EEOC issued a subpoena, asking UAL to detail all benefits received by all UAL employees living outside the United States. UAL refused to provide the information, in part, on the grounds that it was irrelevant and compliance would be unduly burdensome. The EEOC filed a suit in a federal district court against UAL. Should the court enforce the subpoena? Why or why not? [Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. United Air Lines, Inc., 287 F3d 643 (7th Cir. 2002)]

43-6. Judicial Controls. Under federal law, when accepting bids on a contract, an agency must hold “discussions” with all offerors. An agency may ask a single offeror for “clarification” of its proposal, however, without holding “discussions” with the others.

Regulations define clarifications as “limited exchanges.” In March 2001, the U.S. Air Force asked for bids on a contract. The winning contractor would examine, assess, and develop means of integrating national intelligence assets with the U.S. Department of Defense space systems, to enhance the capabilities of the Air Force’s Space Warfare Center. Among the bidders were Information Technology and Applications Corp. (ITAC) and RS Information Systems, Inc. (RSIS). The Air Force asked the parties for more information on their subcontractors but did not allow them to change their proposals. Determining that there were weaknesses in ITAC’s bid, the Air Force awarded the contract to RSIS. ITAC filed a suit in the U.S. Court of Federal Claims against the government, contending that the postproposal requests to RSIS, and its responses, were improper “discussions.” Should the court rule in ITAC’s favor? Why or why not? [Information Technology & Applications Corp. v. United States, 316 F.3d 1312 (Fed.Cir.2003)].

43-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Riverdale Mills Corp. makes plastic-coated steel wire products in Northbridge, Massachusetts. Riverdale uses a water-based cleaning process that generates acidic and alkaline wastewater. To meet federal clean-water requirements, Riverdale has a system within its plant to treat the water. It then flows through a pipe that opens into a manhole-covered test pit outside the plant in full view of Riverdale’s employees. Three hundred feet away, the pipe merges into the public sewer system. In October 1997, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) sent Justin Pimpare and Daniel Granz to inspect the plant. Without a search warrant and without Riverdale’s express consent, the agents took samples from the test pit. Based on the samples, Riverdale and James Knott, the company’s owner, were charged with criminal violations of the federal Clean Water Act. The defendants filed a suit in a federal district court against the EPA agents and others, alleging violations of the Fourth Amendment. What right does the Fourth Amendment provide in this context? This right is based on a “reasonable expectation of privacy.” Should the agents be held liable? Why or why not? [Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55 (1st Cir.2004)]

43-8. Rulemaking. The Investment Company Act of 1940 prohibits a mutual fund from engaging in certain transactions in which there may be a conflict of interest between the manager of the fund and its shareholders. Under rules issued by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), however, a fund that meets certain conditions may engage in an otherwise prohibited transaction. In June 2004, the SEC added two new conditions.

A year later, the SEC reconsidered the new conditions in terms of the costs that they would impose on the funds. Within eight days, and without asking for public input, the SEC readopted the conditions. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States—which is both a mutual fund shareholder and an association with mutual fund managers among its members—asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review the new rules. The Chamber charged, in part, that in readopting the rules, the SEC relied on materials not in the “rulemaking record” without providing an opportunity for public comment. The SEC countered that the information was otherwise “publicly available.” In adopting a rule, should an agency consider information that is not part of the rulemaking record? Why or why not? [Chamber of Commerce of the United States v. Securities and Exchange Commission, 443 F.3d 890 (D.C.Cir.2006)]

43-9. Agency Powers. A well-documented rise in global temperatures has coincided with a significant increase in the concentration of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere. Some scientists believe that the two trends are related, because when carbon dioxide is released into the atmosphere, it produces a greenhouse effect, trapping solar heat. Under the Clean Air Act (CAA) of 1963, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is authorized to regulate “any” air pollutants “emitted into . . . the ambient air” that in its “judgment cause, or contribute to, air pollution.” Calling global warming “the most pressing environmental challenge of our time,” a group of private organizations asked the EPA to regulate carbon dioxide and other “greenhouse gas” emissions from new motor vehicles. The EPA refused, stating, among other things, that Congress last amended the CAA in 1990 without authorizing new, binding auto emissions limits. The petitioners—nineteen states, including Massachusetts, and others—asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review the EPA’s denial. Did the EPA have the authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from new motor vehicles? If so, was its stated reason for refusing to do so consistent with that authority? Discuss. [Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency, — U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 1438, 167 L.Ed.2d 248 (2007)]

43-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

To ensure highway safety and protect driver health, Congress charged federal agencies with regulating the hours of service of commercial motor vehicle operators. Between 1940 and 2003, the regulations that applied to long-haul truck drivers were mostly unchanged. (Long-haul drivers are those who operate beyond a 150-mile radius of their base.) In 2003, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration (FMSCA) revised the regulations significantly, increasing the number of daily and weekly hours that drivers could work. The agency had not considered the impact of the changes on the health of the drivers, however, and the revisions were overturned. The FMSCA then issued a notice that it would reconsider the revisions and opened them up for public comment. The agency analyzed the costs to the industry and the crash risks due to driver fatigue under different options and concluded that the safety benefits of not increasing the hours did not outweigh the economic costs. In 2005, the agency issued a rule that was nearly identical to the 2003 version. Public Citizen, Inc., and others, including the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to review the 2005 rule as it applied to long-haul drivers. [Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association, Inc. v. Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, 494 F.3d 188 (D.C. Cir. 2007)]

- (a) The agency's cost-benefit analysis included new methods that were not disclosed to the public in time for comments. Was this unethical? Should the agency have disclosed the new methodology sooner? Why or why not?
- (b) The agency created a graph to show the risk of a crash as a function of the time a driver spent on the job. The graph plotted the first twelve hours of a day individually, but the rest of the time was depicted with an aggregate figure at the seventeenth hour. This made the risk at those hours appear to be lower. Is it unethical for an agency to manipulate data? Explain.

CHAPTER 44

Consumer Law

All statutes, agency rules, and common law judicial decisions that serve to protect the interests of consumers are classified as consumer law.

Traditionally, in disputes involving consumers, it was assumed that the freedom to contract carried with it the obligation to live by the deal made. Over time, this attitude has changed considerably. Today, myriad federal and state laws protect consumers from unfair trade practices, unsafe products, discriminatory or unreasonable credit requirements, and other problems related to consumer transactions. Nearly every agency and department of the federal government has an office of consumer affairs, and most states have one or more such offices to help consumers. Also, typically the attorney general's office assists consumers at the state level.

In this chapter, we examine some of the major laws and regulations protecting consumers.

Because of the wide variation among state consumer protection laws, our primary focus in this chapter is on federal legislation. Realize, though, that state laws often provide more sweeping and significant protections for the consumer than do federal laws. Exhibit 44-1 indicates many of the areas of consumer law that are regulated by federal statutes.

Deceptive Advertising

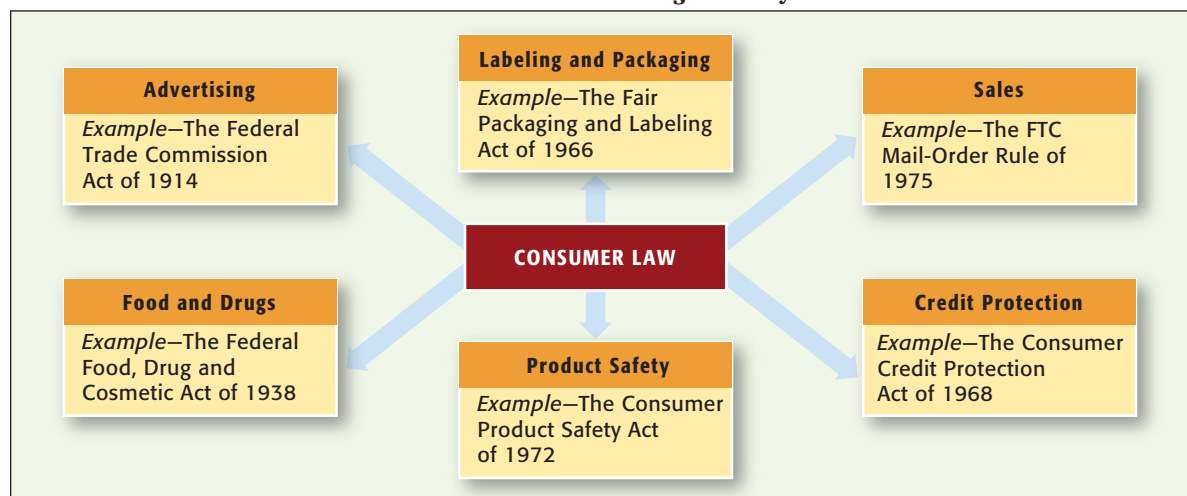

One of the earliest federal consumer protection laws—and still one of the most important—was the Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914 (mentioned in Chapter 43).¹ The act created the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) to carry out the broadly stated goal of preventing unfair and deceptive trade practices, including deceptive advertising.²

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 41–58.

2. 15 U.S.C. Section 45.

EXHIBIT 44-1 • Selected Areas of Consumer Law Regulated by Statutes

Generally, deceptive advertising occurs if a reasonable consumer would be misled by the advertising claim. Vague generalities and obvious exaggerations are permissible. These claims are known as puffery. When a claim takes on the appearance of literal authenticity, however, it may create problems. Advertising that appears to be based on factual evidence but in fact is not reasonably supported by some evidence will be deemed deceptive.

Some advertisements contain “half-truths,” meaning that the presented information is true but incomplete and therefore leads consumers to a false conclusion. For example, the makers of Campbell’s soups advertised that “most” Campbell’s soups were low in fat and cholesterol and thus were helpful in fighting heart disease. What the ad did not say was that Campbell’s soups are high in sodium, and high-sodium diets may increase the risk of heart disease. The FTC ruled that Campbell’s claims were thus deceptive. Advertising that contains an endorsement by a celebrity may be deemed deceptive if the celebrity does not actually use the product.

Bait-and-Switch Advertising

The FTC has issued rules that govern specific advertising techniques. One of the most important rules is contained in the FTC’s “Guides Against Bait Advertising,”³ issued in 1968. The rule seeks to prevent bait-and-switch advertising—that is, advertising a very low price for a particular item that will likely be unavailable to the consumer, who will then be encouraged to purchase a more expensive item. The low price is the “bait” to lure the consumer into the store. The salesperson is instructed to “switch” the consumer to a different, more expensive item. Under the FTC guidelines, bait-and-switch advertising occurs if the seller refuses to show the advertised item, fails to have a reasonable quantity of the item in stock, fails to promise to deliver the advertised item within a reasonable time, or discourages employees from selling the item.

Online Deceptive Advertising

Deceptive advertising may occur in the online environment as well. The FTC has been quite active in monitoring online advertising and has identified hundreds of Web sites that have made false or deceptive advertising claims for products ranging from medical treatments for various diseases to exercise equipment and weight-loss aids.

The FTC has issued guidelines to help online businesses comply with existing laws prohibiting deceptive advertising.⁴ These guidelines include three basic requirements. First, all ads—both online and offline—must be truthful and not misleading. Second, any claims made in an ad must be substantiated; that is, advertisers must have evidence to back up their claims. Third, ads cannot be “unfair,” which the FTC defines as “caus[ing] or . . . likely to cause substantial consumer injury that consumers could not reasonably avoid and that is not outweighed by the benefit to consumers or competition.”

The guidelines also call for “clear and conspicuous” disclosure of any qualifying or limiting information. The FTC suggests that advertisers should assume that consumers will not read an entire Web page. Therefore, to satisfy the “clear and conspicuous” requirement, online advertisers should place the disclosure as close as possible to the claim being qualified or include the disclosure within the claim itself. If such placement is not feasible, the next-best location is on a section of the page to which a consumer can easily scroll. Generally, hyperlinks to a disclosure are recommended only for lengthy disclosures or for disclosures that must be repeated in a variety of locations on the Web page.

FTC Actions against Deceptive Advertising

The FTC receives complaints from many sources, including competitors of alleged violators, consumers, consumer organizations, trade associations, Better Business Bureau, government organizations, and state and local officials. When the agency receives numerous and widespread complaints about a particular problem, it will investigate. If the FTC concludes that a given advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it drafts a formal complaint, which is sent to the alleged offender. The company may agree to settle the complaint without further proceedings; if not, the FTC can conduct a hearing in which the company can present its defense (see Chapter 43).

If the FTC succeeds in proving that an advertisement is unfair or deceptive, it usually issues a cease-and-desist order requiring the company to stop the

3. 16 C.F.R. Part 238.

4. Advertising and Marketing on the Internet: Rules of the Road, September 2000.

challenged advertising. It might also impose a sanction known as counteradvertising by requiring the company to advertise anew—in print, on the Internet, on radio, and on television—to inform the public about the earlier misinformation. The FTC may institute multiple product orders, which require a firm to cease and desist from false advertising in regard to all of its products, not just the product that was the subject of the action.

In some instances, the FTC may seek other remedies. In the following case, for example, after receiving more than five hundred consumer complaints, the FTC sought restitution of the amounts that the consumers had paid.

EXTENDED Federal Trade Commission v. Verity International, Ltd.

CASE 44.1 United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 2006. 443 F.3d 48.

JOHN M. WALKER, JR., Chief Judge.

The incessant demand for pornography, some have said, is an engine of technological development. The telephonic system at dispute in this appeal is an example of that phenomenon—it was designed and implemented to ensure that consumers paid charges for accessing pornography and other adult entertainment. The system identified the user of an online adult-entertainment service by the telephone line used to access that service and then billed the telephone-line subscriber for the cost of that service as if it was a charge for an international phone call to Madagascar. This system had the benefit that the user's credit card never had to be processed, but it had a problem as well: It was possible for someone to access an adult-entertainment service over a telephone line without authorization from the telephone-line subscriber who understood herself contractually bound to pay all telephone charges, including those that disguised fees for the adult entertainment.

The Federal Trade Commission (“FTC”) took a dim view of this billing system and brought suit [in a federal district court] to shut it down as a deceptive and unfair trade practice within the meaning of [Section] 5(a)(1) of the Federal Trade Commission Act (“FTC Act”). The FTC sued Verity International, Ltd. (“Verity”) and Automatic Communications, Ltd. (“ACL”), corporations that operated this billing system, as well as Robert Green and Marilyn Shein, who controlled these corporations. * * *

* * * [The] court entered * * * [a judgment] against the defendants-appellants for a total of $17.9 million. * * * The defendants-appellants timely appealed * * * [to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit].

* * * *To prove a deceptive act or practice under [Section] 5(a)(1) [of the FTC Act], the FTC must show three elements: (1) a representation, omission, or practice, that (2) is likely to mislead consumers acting reasonably under the circumstances, and [that] (3) * * * is material.* * * * [Emphasis added.]

The FTC contends that the first element is satisfied by proof that the defendants-appellants caused telephone-line subscribers to receive explicit and implicit representations that they could not successfully avoid paying charges for adult entertainment that had been accessed over their phone lines—what we call a “representation of uncontestability [cannot be disputed].” * * * [T]he defendants-appellants caused charges for adult entertainment to appear on * * * phone bills as telephone calls, thereby capitalizing on the common and well-founded perception held by consumers that they must pay their telephone bills, irrespective of whether they made or authorized the calls. * * * [This] conveyed a representation of uncontestability.

* * * [As for the second element, the] FTC contends that the representation of uncontestability was false and therefore likely to mislead consumers who did not use or authorize others to use the adult entertainment in question; the defendants-appellants contend that the representation was rendered true by * * * agency principles. * * *

*Under common law agency principles, a person is liable to pay for services that she does not herself contract for if another person has * * * authority to consent on her behalf to pay for the services.* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * [But a] computer * * * is not primarily understood as a payment mechanism, and in the ordinary habits of human behavior, one does not reasonably infer that because a person is authorized to use a computer, the subscriber to the telephone line connected to that computer has authorized the computer user to purchase online content * * * .

* * * [T]he FTC proved the second element of its * * * claim.

Finally [with respect to the third element] * * * telephone-line subscribers found the representation material to their decision whether to pay the billed charges because of the worry of telephone-line disconnection, the perception of the futility of challenging the charges, the desire to avoid credit-score injury, or some combination of these factors.

* * * *

The district court measured the appropriate amount of [the judgment] as “the full amount lost by consumers.” This was error. The appropriate measure * * * is the benefit unjustly received by the defendants. * * *

* * * *

* * * [Phone service providers] received some fraction of the money * * * before any payments were made to the defendants-appellants. * * *

* * * *

* * * [Also] some fraction of consumers * * * actually used or authorized others to use the services at issue * * * .

* * * *

We affirm all components of the district court’s * * * order of relief except for the monetary judgment * * * . The case is remanded to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. How might the defendants have avoided the charges against them in this case?
2. As an administrative agency, what powers might the FTC use to determine more precisely the number of consumers who paid their phone bills but did not use, or authorize others to use, the defendants’ services?

Telemarketing and Electronic Advertising

The Telephone Consumer Protection Act (TCPA)⁵ prohibits telephone solicitation using an automatic telephone dialing system or a prerecorded voice. Most states also have statutes regulating telephone solicitation. The TCPA also makes it illegal to transmit ads via fax without first obtaining the recipient’s permission. (Similar issues have arisen with respect to junk e-mail, called “spam”—see Chapters 6 and 9.)

The Federal Communications Commission (FCC) enforces the TCPA. The FCC imposes substantial fines ($11,000 each day) on companies that violate the junk fax provisions of the act and has even fined one company as much as $5.4 million.⁶ The TCPA also provides for a private right of action under which consumers can recover actual losses resulting from a violation of the act or receive $500 in damages for each violation, whichever is greater. If a court finds that a defendant willfully or knowingly violated the act, the court has the discretion to treble (triple) the amount of damages awarded.

The Telemarketing and Consumer Fraud and Abuse Prevention Act of 1994⁷ directed the FTC to establish rules governing telemarketing and to bring actions against fraudulent telemarketers. The FTC’s Telemarketing Sales Rule of 1995⁸ requires a telemarketer to identify the seller’s name, describe the product being sold, and disclose all material facts related to the sale (such as the total cost of the goods being sold). The rule makes it illegal for telemarketers to misrepresent information or facts about their goods or services. A telemarketer must also remove a consumer's name from its list of potential contacts if the customer so requests. An amendment to the Telemarketing Sales Rule established the national Do Not Call Registry, which became effective in October 2003. Telemarketers must refrain from calling those consumers who have placed their names on the list.

Labeling and Packaging Laws

A number of federal and state laws deal specifically with the information given on labels and packages. In general, labels must be accurate, and they must use words that are easily understood by the ordinary consumer. For example, a box of cereal cannot be labeled "giant" if that would exaggerate the amount of cereal contained in the box.

In some instances, labels must specify the raw materials used in the product, such as the percentage of cotton, nylon, or other fiber used in a garment. In other instances, the product must carry a warning. Cigarette packages and advertising, for example, must include one of several warnings about the health hazards associated with smoking.⁹

Federal Statutes

There are numerous federal laws regulating the labeling and packaging of products. These include the Wool Products Labeling Act of 1939,¹⁰ the Fur Products Labeling Act of 1951,¹¹ the Flammable Fabrics Act of 1953,¹² and the Fair Packaging and Labeling Act of 1966.¹³ The Comprehensive Smokeless Tobacco Health Education Act of 1986,¹⁴ for example, requires that producers, packagers, and importers of smokeless tobacco label their product with one of several warnings about the use of smokeless tobacco.

Food Labeling

Because the quality and safety of food are so important to consumers, several statutes deal specifically with food labeling. The Fair Packaging and Labeling Act requires that food product labels identify (1) the product; (2) the net quantity of the contents and, if the number of servings is stated, the size of the serving;

(3) the manufacturer; and (4) and the packager or distributor. The act includes additional requirements concerning descriptions on packages, savings claims, components of nonfood products, and standards for the partial filling of packages.

Food products must bear labels detailing the nutritional content, including how much fat the food contains and what kind of fat it is. The Nutrition Labeling and Education Act of 1990¹⁵ requires standard nutrition facts (including fat content) on food labels; regulates the use of such terms as fresh and low fat; and authorizes certain health claims, subject to the federal Food and Drug Administration's approval. The Department of Health and Human Services, as well as the FTC, enforces these rules.

Sales

A number of statutes protect consumers by requiring the disclosure of certain terms in sales transactions and providing rules governing unsolicited merchandise and various forms of sales, such as door-to-door sales, mail-order sales, and referral sales. The FTC has regulatory authority in this area, as do other federal agencies. The Federal Reserve Board of Governors, for example, has issued Regulation Z,¹⁶ which governs credit provisions associated with sales contracts, as discussed later in this chapter.

Many states have also enacted laws governing consumer sales transactions. Moreover, states have protected consumers to a certain extent through adopting the Uniform Commercial Code (discussed in Chapters 20 through 23) and, in a few states, the Uniform Consumer Credit Code.

Door-to-Door Sales

Door-to-door sales are singled out for special treatment in the laws of most states, largely because of the potential for high-pressure sales tactics. Repeat purchases are not as likely as they are in stores, so the seller has less incentive to cultivate the goodwill of the purchaser. Furthermore, the seller is unlikely to present alternative products and their prices. Thus, a number of states have passed "cooling-off" laws that permit the buyers of goods sold door to door to cancel their contracts within a specified period of time, usually two to three days after the sale.

15. 21 U.S.C. Section 343.1.

16. 12 C.F.R. Sections 226.1–226.30.

An FTC regulation also requires sellers to give consumers three days to cancel any door-to-door sale, and this rule applies in addition to any state law. The FTC rule further requires that consumers be notified in Spanish of this right if the oral negotiations for the sale were in that language.

Telephone and Mail-Order Sales

The FTC Mail or Telephone Order Merchandise Rule of 1993, which amended the FTC Mail-Order Rule of 1975,¹⁷ provides specific protections for consumers who purchase goods over the phone or through the mail. The 1993 rule extended the 1975 rule to include sales orders transmitted using computers, fax machines, or other means involving a telephone line. Among other things, the rule requires merchants to ship orders within the time promised in their catalogues or advertisements and to notify consumers when orders cannot be shipped on time. Merchants must also issue a refund within a specified period of time when a consumer cancels an order.

In addition, under the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970,¹⁸ a consumer who receives unsolicited merchandise sent by U.S. mail can keep it, throw it away, or dispose of it in any manner that she or he sees fit. The recipient will not be obligated to the sender. Suppose that Serena receives a copy of the “Cookbook of the Month” from a company via U.S. mail, even though she did not order the cookbook. She gives it to her friend, Vaya, who loves to cook. The following month, Serena receives a bill for $49.99 from the company that sent the cookbook. Under the 1970 act, because the cookbook was sent to her unsolicited through the U.S. mail, Serena is not obligated to pay the bill.

Online Sales

Protecting consumers from fraudulent and deceptive sales practices conducted via the Internet has proved to be a challenging task. Nonetheless, the FTC and other federal agencies have brought a number of enforcement actions against those who perpetrate online fraud. Additionally, the federal statute prohibiting wire fraud that was discussed in Chapter 9 applies to online transactions.

Some states have amended their consumer protection statutes to cover Internet transactions as well. For example, the California legislature revised its Business and Professions Code to include transactions conducted over the Internet or by “any other electronic means of communication.” Previously, that code covered only telephone, mail-order catalogue, radio, and television sales. Now any entity selling over the Internet in California must explicitly create an on-screen notice indicating its refund and return policies, where its business is physically located, its legal name, and a number of other details. Various states are also setting up information sites to help consumers protect themselves.

Credit Protection

Because of the extensive use of credit by American consumers, credit protection has become an especially important area of consumer protection legislation. A key statute regulating the credit and credit-card industries is Title I of the Consumer Credit Protection Act (CCPA),¹⁹ which is commonly referred to as the Truth-in-Lending Act (TILA).

The Truth-in-Lending Act

The TILA is basically a disclosure law. It is administered by the Federal Reserve Board and requires sellers and lenders to disclose credit terms or loan terms so that individuals can shop around for the best financing arrangements. TILA requirements apply only to persons who, in the ordinary course of business, lend funds, sell on credit, or arrange for the extension of credit. Thus, sales or loans made between two consumers do not come under the protection of the act. Additionally, this law protects only debtors who are natural persons (as opposed to the artificial “person” of a corporation); it does not extend to other legal entities.

The disclosure requirements are contained in Regulation Z, which was promulgated (publicized) by the Federal Reserve Board. If the contracting parties are subject to the TILA, the requirements of Regulation Z apply to any transaction involving an installment sales contract that calls for payment to be made in more than four installments. Transactions subject to Regulation Z typically include installment loans, retail and installment sales, car loans, home-improvement loans, and certain real estate loans if the amount of financing is less than $25,000.

17. 16 C.F.R. Sections 435.1–435.2.

18. 39 U.S.C. Section 3009.

19. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1601–1693r.

Under the provisions of the TILA, all of the terms of a credit instrument must be clearly and conspicuously disclosed. The TILA provides for contract rescission (cancellation) if a creditor fails to follow exactly the procedures required by the act.²⁰ TILA requirements are strictly enforced.

Equal Credit Opportunity In 1974, Congress enacted the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA)²¹ as an amendment to the TILA. The ECOA prohibits the denial of credit solely on the basis of race, religion, national origin, color, gender, marital status, or age. The act also prohibits credit discrimination on the basis of whether an individual receives certain forms of income, such as public-assistance benefits.

Under the ECOA, a creditor may not require the signature of an applicant's spouse, other than as a joint applicant, on a credit instrument if the applicant qualifies under the creditor's standards of creditworthiness for the amount and terms of the credit request. For example, Tonja, an African American, applied for financing with a used-car dealer. The dealer looked at Tonja's credit report and, without submitting the application to the lender, decided that she would not qualify. Instead of informing Tonja that she did not qualify, the dealer told her that she needed a cosigner on the loan to purchase the car. According to a federal appellate court in 2004, the dealer qualified as a creditor in this situation because the dealer unilaterally denied the credit and thus could be held liable under the ECOA.²²

Credit-Card Rules The TILA also contains provisions regarding credit cards. One provision limits the liability of a cardholder to $50 per card for unauthorized charges made before the creditor is notified that the card has been lost. Another provision prohibits a credit-card company from billing a consumer for any unauthorized charges if the credit card was improperly issued by the company. Suppose that a consumer receives an unsolicited credit card in the mail and the card is later stolen and used by the thief to make purchases. In this situation, the consumer to whom the card was sent will not be liable for the unauthorized charges.

20. Note, however, that amendments to the TILA enacted in 1995 prevent borrowers from rescinding loans because of minor clerical errors in closing documents [15 U.S.C. Sections 1605, 1631, 1635, 1640, and 1641].

21. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1691–1691f.

22. Treadway v. Gateway Chevrolet Oldsmobile, Inc., 362 F.3d 971 (7th Cir. 2004).

Other provisions of the act set out specific procedures for both the credit-card company and its cardholder to use in settling disputes related to credit-card purchases. These procedures would be used if, for example, a cardholder thinks that an error has occurred in billing or wishes to withhold payment for a faulty product purchased by credit card.

Consumer Leases The Consumer Leasing Act (CLA) of 1988²³ amended the TILA to provide protection for consumers who lease automobiles and other goods. The CLA applies to those who lease or arrange to lease consumer goods in the ordinary course of their business. The act applies only if the goods are priced at $25,000 or less and if the lease term exceeds four months. The CLA and its implementing regulation, Regulation M,²⁴ require lessors to disclose in writing (or by electronic record) all of the material terms of the lease.

The Fair Credit Reporting Act

In 1970, to protect consumers against inaccurate credit reporting, Congress enacted the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA).²⁵ The act provides that consumer credit reporting agencies may issue credit reports to users only for specified purposes, including the extension of credit, the issuance of insurance policies, and compliance with a court order, and in response to a consumer's request for a copy of his or her own credit report. The act further provides that whenever a consumer is denied credit or insurance on the basis of her or his credit report, or is charged more than others ordinarily would be for credit or insurance, the consumer must be notified of that fact and of the name and address of the credit reporting agency that issued the credit report.

Under the FCRA, consumers may request the source of any information being given out by a credit agency, as well as the identity of anyone who has received an agency's report. Consumers are also permitted to access the information about them contained in a credit reporting agency's files. If a consumer discovers that an agency's files contain inaccurate information about his or her credit standing, the agency, on the consumer's written request, must investigate the matter and delete any unverifiable or erroneous information within a reasonable period of time.

23. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1667–1667e.

24. 12 C.F.R. Part 213.

25. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1681–1681t.

As part of its investigation, the agency should systematically examine its records and contact the creditor whose information the consumer disputes.²⁶ An agency that fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000 and attorneys' fees.²⁷

The FCRA protects consumers from inaccurate information in credit reports by requiring that lenders and other creditors report correct, relevant, and up-to-date information in a confidential and responsible manner. The FCRA allows an award of punitive damages for a "willful" violation.²⁸ Did the circumstances in the following case warrant an award of punitive damages? That was the question before the court.

28. Under the FCRA, if an insurance company raises a customer's rates because of a credit score, the insurance company is required to notify the individual. In 2007, the United States Supreme Court held that even the failure to notify new customers that they are paying higher insurance rates as a result of their credit scores is an adverse action that can be considered a willful violation of the FCRA. Safeco Insurance Co. of America v. Burr, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2201, 167 L.Ed.2d 1045 (2007).

CASE 44.2 Saunders v. Equifax Information Services, L.L.C.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Virginia, Richmond Division, 2007. 469 F.Supp.2d 343.

● Background and Facts Rex Saunders obtained an auto loan from Branch Banking & Trust Company of Virginia (BB & T). Contrary to its usual procedure, BB & T did not give Saunders a payment coupon book and rebuffed his attempts to make payments on the loan. In fact, BB & T told him that it had not extended a loan to him. A copy of the title for the vehicle indicated no loan. Eventually, however, BB & T discovered its mistake and demanded full payment, plus interest and penalties. When payment was not immediately forthcoming, BB & T decided that Saunders was in default; it then repossessed and sold the car. The lender forwarded adverse credit information about Saunders, with added derogatory details, to credit reporting agencies, without noting that Saunders disputed the information. Saunders filed a suit in a federal district court against BB & T and others, alleging chiefly violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA). On the claims against BB & T, a jury awarded Saunders $1,000 in statutory damages and $80,000 in punitive damages. BB & T asked the court to reduce the punitive award to $4,000. BB & T argued that the credit information was "factually accurate," the mistakes in administering Saunders's loan were not "willful," and the amount of the award was arbitrary.

* * * [T]he most important indiciu [indicator] of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award is the degree of reprehensibility [wrongfulness] of the defendant's conduct. * * * [P]unitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant's culpability [blameworthiness], after having paid compensatory damages, is so reprehensible as to warrant the imposition of further sanctions to achieve punishment or deterrence. * * *

* * * BB & T caused great financial and emotional strain to a consumer by: failing to properly "book" Saunders' loan in violation of BB & T's own internal operating procedures; repeatedly denying the existence of a contractual relationship with Saunders when such a relationship in fact existed; rebuffing Saunders when he repeatedly attempted to make proper payment on his loan and then demanding full payment of the entire loan, with interest and penalties, within a few days after BB & T finally discovered it had extended the loan; acquiring possession of the car and selling it thereafter at auction; and reporting derogatory information to the [credit reporting agencies] without first noting that Saunders disputed the information. * * * [I]t is difficult to contemplate a more egregious [blatant] set of circumstances in such a context than were present here.

* * * Any reduction by this Court of an award that was decided by a jury who were fully instructed regarding all relevant aspects would be purely arbitrary * * *. Even though the * * * concerns regarding the imprecise manner in which punitive damage awards are rendered must be noted, this Court concludes that it would, in effect, be depriving the Plaintiff of his * * * rights in reducing an award by a properly instructed jury which reached its decision based on sufficient evidence of misconduct and the economic ability (substantial net worth [of more than $3.2 billion]) of the offending Defendant to withstand such an award while forcing it to acknowledge the award's legitimate punitive and deterrent purpose. Only when a punitive damages award can be fairly categorized as grossly excessive in relation to the purposes of punishment and deterrence will the award enter the zone of arbitrariness * * *. The jury's $80,000 punitive damages award in this case enters no such zone of arbitrariness as it reasonably punishes BB & T for particularly egregious [flagrant] conduct that harmed the plaintiff, not for being an unsavory individual or business. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The court held that BB & T's actions were "willful" violations of the FCRA and that the punitive damages award "reasonably punishe[d] BB & T for particularly egregious conduct." Hence, Saunders was entitled to the $80,000 in punitive damages.

● The Ethical Dimension The jury awarded Saunders only $1,000 in statutory damages, but in the circumstances, this was the maximum allowed under the FCRA. What does the fact that the jury felt compelled to award the maximum allowable amount indicate about the ethics of BB & T's conduct?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Should the Internet make it easier or more difficult to ensure that the information provided to and by credit reporting agencies is accurate? Why?

Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act

In an effort to combat identity theft (discussed in Chapter 9), Congress passed the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act (FACT Act) of 2003.²⁹ The act established a national fraud alert system so that consumers who suspect that they have been or may be victimized by identity theft can place an alert on their credit files. The act also requires the major credit reporting agencies to provide consumers with free copies of their own credit reports every twelve months. Another provision requires account numbers on credit-card receipts to be shortened ("truncated") so that merchants, employees, or others who may have access to the receipts do not have the consumers' names and full credit-card numbers. The act further mandates that financial institutions work with the Federal Trade Commission to identify "red flag" indicators of identity theft and to develop rules for disposing of sensitive credit information.

The FACT Act gives consumers who have been victimized by identity theft some assistance in rebuilding their credit reputations. For example, credit reporting agencies must stop reporting allegedly fraudulent account information once the consumer establishes that identity theft has occurred. Business owners and creditors are required to provide consumers with copies of any records that can help the consumer prove that the particular account or transaction is fraudulent (records showing that an account was created by a fraudulent signature, for example). In addition, the act allows consumers to report the accounts affected by identity theft directly to creditors in order to help prevent the spread of erroneous credit information.

The Fair Debt Collection Practices Act

In 1977, Congress enacted the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA)³⁰ in an attempt to curb what were perceived to be abuses by collection agencies. The act applies only to specialized debt-collection agencies that regularly attempt to collect debts on behalf of someone else, usually for a percentage of the amount owed. Creditors attempting to collect debts are not covered by the act unless, by misrepresenting themselves, they cause debtors to believe they are collection agencies.

Requirements under the Act The act explicitly prohibits a collection agency from using any of the following tactics:

1. Contacting the debtor at the debtor's place of employment if the debtor's employer objects.

29. Pub. L. No. 108-159, 117 Stat. 1952 (December 4, 2003).

30. 15 U.S.C. Section 1692.

2. Contacting the debtor during inconvenient or unusual times (for example, calling the debtor at three o'clock in the morning) or at any time if the debtor is being represented by an attorney.
3. Contacting third parties other than the debtor's parents, spouse, or financial adviser about payment of a debt unless a court authorizes such action.
4. Using harassment or intimidation (for example, using abusive language or threatening violence) or employing false or misleading information (for example, posing as a police officer).
5. Communicating with the debtor at any time after receiving notice that the debtor is refusing to pay the debt, except to advise the debtor of further action to be taken by the collection agency.

The FDCPA also requires a collection agency to include a validation notice whenever it initially contacts a debtor for payment of a debt or within five days of that initial contact. The notice must state that the debtor has thirty days in which to dispute the debt and to request a written verification of the debt from the collection agency. The debtor's request for debt validation must be in writing.

Enforcement of the Act The enforcement of the FDCPA is primarily the responsibility of the Federal Trade Commission. The act provides that a debt collector who fails to comply with the act is liable for actual damages, plus additional damages not to exceed $1,000³¹ and attorneys' fees.

Cases brought under the FDCPA sometimes raise questions as to who qualifies as a debt collector or debt-collection agency subject to the act. For example, in the past courts were issuing conflicting opinions on whether attorneys who attempted to collect debts owed to their clients were subject to the FDCPA's provisions. In 1995, however, the United States Supreme Court resolved this issue when it held that an attorney who regularly tries to obtain payment of consumer debts through legal proceedings meets the FDCPA's definition of "debt collector."³²

Garnishment of Wages

Despite the increasing number of protections afforded debtors, creditors are not without means of securing payment on debts. One of these is the right to garnish a debtor's wages after the debt has gone unpaid for a prolonged period. Recall from Chapter 28 that in a garnishment process, a creditor directly attaches, or seizes, a portion of the debtor's assets (such as wages) that are in the possession of a third party (such as an employer).

State law governs the garnishment process, but the law varies among the states as to how easily garnishment can be obtained. Indeed, a few states, such as Texas, prohibit garnishment of wages except for child support and court-approved spousal maintenance. Constitutional due process and federal legislation under the TILA also provide certain protections against abuse.³³ In general, the debtor is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard. Moreover, wages cannot be garnished beyond 25 percent of the debtor's after-tax earnings, and the garnishment must leave the debtor with at least a specified minimum income.

Consumer Health and Safety

The laws discussed earlier regarding the labeling and packaging of products go a long way toward promoting consumer health and safety. There is a significant distinction, however, between regulating the information dispensed about a product and regulating the actual content of the product. The classic example is tobacco products. Producers of tobacco products are required to warn consumers about the hazards associated with the use of their products, but the sale of tobacco products has not been subjected to significant restrictions or banned outright despite the obvious dangers to health.³⁴ We now examine various laws that regulate the actual products made available to consumers.

The Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act

The first federal legislation regulating food and drugs was enacted in 1906 as the Pure Food and Drugs Act. That law, as amended in 1938, exists today as the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (FDCA).³⁵ The act protects consumers against adulterated and misbranded foods and drugs. As to foods, in its present form, the act establishes food standards, specifies safe levels of potentially hazardous food additives, and sets classifications of foods and food advertising. Most of these statutory requirements are monitored and enforced by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA).

The FDCA also charges the FDA with the responsibility of ensuring that drugs are safe before they are marketed to the public. Under an extensive set of procedures established by the FDA, drugs must be shown to be effective as well as safe, and the use of some food additives suspected of being carcinogenic is prohibited. A 1976 amendment to the FDCA³⁶ authorizes the FDA to regulate medical devices, such as pacemakers and other health devices and equipment, and to withdraw from the market any such device that is mislabeled.

The question in the following case was whether the U.S. Constitution provides terminally ill patients with a right of access to experimental drugs that have passed limited safety trials but have not been proved safe and effective.

C A S E 44.3 Abigail Alliance for Better Access to Developmental Drugs v. von Eschenbach

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 2007. 495 F.3d 695.

• Background and Facts The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and Congress have created programs to provide terminally ill patients with access to promising experimental drugs before the completion of the clinical-testing process—which can be lengthy. The Abigail Alliance for Better Access to Developmental Drugs (Alliance), an organization of terminally ill patients and their supporters, asked the FDA to expand this access. The FDA responded that, among other things, “a reasonably precise estimate of response rate” and “enough experience to detect serious adverse effects” are “critical” in determining when experimental drugs should be made available. Accordingly, “it does not serve patients well to make drugs too widely available before there is a reasonable assessment of such risks to guide patient decisions, and experience in managing them.” Accepting Alliance’s proposal “would upset the appropriate balance * * * by giving almost total weight to the goal of early availability and giving little recognition to the importance of marketing drugs with reasonable knowledge for patients and physicians of their likely clinical benefit and their toxicity.” Alliance filed a suit in a federal district court against FDA commissioner Andrew von Eschenbach and others, arguing that the Constitution provides terminally ill patients with a fundamental right of access to experimental drugs. The court ruled in the defendants’ favor. Alliance appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

* * * [The due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution] provides heightened protection against government interference with certain fundamental rights [by subjecting that interference to strict scrutiny] * * * .

* * * *

* * * [T]he Due Process Clause specially protects those fundamental rights * * * which are, objectively, deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Drug regulation in the United States began with the Colonies and the States * * * . In the early history of our Nation, we observe not a tradition of protecting a right of access to drugs, but rather governments responding to the risks of new compounds as they become aware of and able to address those risks.

* * * *

The current regime of federal drug regulation began to take shape with the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act [FDCA] of 1938. The Act required that drug manufacturers provide proof that their products were safe before they could be marketed. * * * *

CASE CONTINUES

* * * Congress amended the FDCA in 1962 to explicitly require that the FDA only approve drugs deemed effective for public use. Thus, the Alliance argues that, prior to 1962, patients were free to make their own decisions whether a drug might be effective. * * * Alliance's argument ignores our Nation's history of drug safety regulation * * *. Nor can the Alliance override current FDA regulations simply by insisting that drugs which have completed [some] testing are safe enough for terminally ill patients. Current law bars public access to drugs undergoing clinical testing on safety grounds. *The fact that a drug * * * is safe for limited clinical testing in a controlled and closely monitored environment after detailed scrutiny of each trial participant does not mean that a drug is safe for use beyond supervised trials.* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * [W]e conclude that the Alliance has not provided evidence of a right to procure and use experimental drugs that is deeply rooted in our Nation's history and traditions. * * *

Because the Alliance's claimed right is not fundamental, the Alliance's claim of a right of access to experimental drugs is subject only to rational basis scrutiny. The rational basis test requires that the Alliance prove that the government's restrictions bear no rational relationship to a legitimate state interest. * * * [Emphasis added.]

Applying the rational basis standard to the Alliance's complaint, we cannot say that the government's interest does not bear a rational relation to a legitimate state interest. * * * [F]or the terminally ill, as for anyone else, a drug is unsafe if its potential for inflicting death or physical injury is not offset by the possibility of therapeutic benefit.

* * * Thus, we must conclude that * * * the Government has a rational basis for ensuring that there is a scientifically and medically acceptable level of knowledge about the risks and benefits of such a drug.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit affirmed the lower court's decision, holding that terminally ill patients do not have a fundamental constitutional right of access to experimental drugs. Furthermore, "the FDA's policy of limiting access to investigational drugs is rationally related to the legitimate state interest of protecting patients, including the terminally ill, from potentially unsafe drugs with unknown therapeutic effects."

● The Global Dimension Should the court have ruled that as long as a drug has been approved for use in any country, terminally ill patients in the United States should be given access to it? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension In light of the analysis in this case, what option is left to those who believe that terminally ill patients—not the government—should make the decision about whether to accept the risk associated with experimental drugs?

The Consumer Product Safety Act

Consumer product-safety legislation began in 1953 with the passage of the Flammable Fabrics Act, which prohibits the sale of highly flammable clothing or materials. Over the next two decades, Congress enacted legislation regarding the design or composition of specific classes of products. Then, in 1972, Congress enacted the Consumer Product Safety Act,³⁷ creating the first comprehensive scheme of regulation over matters of consumer safety. The act also established the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC), which has far-reaching authority over consumer safety.

The CPSC's Authority The CPSC conducts research on the safety of individual consumer products and maintains a clearinghouse on the risks associated with various products. The Consumer Product Safety Act authorizes the CPSC to set standards for consumer products and to ban the manufacture and sale of any product that it deems to be potentially hazardous to consumers. The CPSC also has authority to remove from the market any products it believes to be imminently hazardous and to require manufacturers to report on any products already sold or intended for sale if the products have proved to be dangerous. The CPSC also has authority to administer other product-safety legislation, such as the Child Protection and Toy Safety Act of 1969³⁸ and the Federal Hazardous Substances Act of 1960.³⁹

37. 15 U.S.C. Sections 2051–2083.

The CPSC's authority is sufficiently broad to allow it to ban any product that it believes poses an "unreasonable risk" to consumers. This includes the authority to ban the importation of hazardous products into the United States. Some of the products that the CPSC has banned include various types of fireworks, cribs, and toys, as well as many products containing asbestos or vinyl chloride.

Notification Requirements The Consumer Product Safety Act requires the distributors of consumer products to notify the CPSC immediately if they receive information that a product "contains a defect which . . . creates a substantial risk to the public" or "an unreasonable risk of serious injury or death."

For example, Aroma Housewares Company had been distributing a particular model of juicer for just over a year when it began receiving letters from customers. They complained that during operation the juicer had suddenly exploded, sending pieces of glass and razor-sharp metal across the room. The company received twenty-three letters from angry consumers about the exploding juicer but waited more than six months before notifying the CPSC that the product posed a significant risk to the public. In a suit filed by the federal government, the court held that when a company first receives information regarding a threat, the company is required to report the problem within twenty-four hours to the CPSC. The court also found that even if the company had to investigate the allegations, it should not have taken more than ten days to verify the information and report the problem. The court therefore held that the company had violated the law and ordered it to pay damages.⁴⁰

REVIEWING Consumer Law

Leota Sage saw a local motorcycle dealer's newspaper advertisement for a MetroRider EZ electric scooter for $1,699. When she went to the dealership, however, she learned that the EZ model had been sold out. The salesperson told Sage that he still had the higher-end MetroRider FX model in stock for $2,199 and would offer her one for $1,999. Sage was disappointed but decided to purchase the FX model. When Sage said that she wished to purchase the scooter on credit, she was directed to the dealer's credit department. As she filled out the credit forms, the clerk told Sage, who is an African American, that she would need a cosigner to obtain a loan. Sage could not understand why she would need a cosigner and asked to speak to the store manager. The manager apologized, told her that the clerk was mistaken, and said that he would "speak to" the clerk about that. The manager completed Sage's credit application, and Sage then rode the scooter home. Seven months later, Sage received a letter from the manufacturer informing her that a flaw had been discovered in the scooter's braking system and that the model had been recalled. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Had the dealer engaged in deceptive advertising? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that Sage had ordered the scooter through the dealer's Web site but the dealer had been unable to deliver it by the date promised. What would the FTC have required the merchant to do in that situation?
3. Assuming that the clerk had required a cosigner based on Sage's race or gender, what act prohibits such credit discrimination?
4. What organization has the authority to ban the sale of scooters based on safety concerns?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

44-1. Andrew, a resident of California, received an advertising circular in the U.S. mail announcing a new line of regional cookbooks distributed by the Every-Kind Cookbook Co. Andrew didn't want any books and threw the circular away. Two days later, Andrew received in the mail an introductory cookbook entitled Lower Mongolian Regional Cookbook, as announced in the circular, on a "trial basis" from Every-Kind. Andrew was not interested but did not go to the trouble to return the cookbook. Every-Kind demanded payment of $20.95 for the Lower Mongolian Regional Cookbook. Discuss whether Andrew can be required to pay for the book.

44-2. Maria Ochoa receives two new credit cards on May 1. She had solicited one of them from Midtown Department Store, and the other arrived unsolicited from High-Flying Airlines. During the month of May, Ochoa makes numerous credit-card purchases from Midtown Department Store, but she does not use the High-Flying Airlines card. On May 31, a burglar breaks into Ochoa's home and steals both credit cards, along with other items. Ochoa notifies the Midtown Department Store of the theft on June 2, but she fails to notify High-Flying Airlines. Using the Midtown credit card, the burglar makes a $500 purchase on June 1 and a $200 purchase on June 3. The burglar then charges a vacation flight on the High-Flying Airlines card for $1,000 on June 5. Ochoa receives the bills for these charges and refuses to pay them. Discuss Ochoa's liability in these situations.

44-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

On June 28, a salesperson for Renowned Books called on the Gonchars at their home. After a very persuasive sales pitch by the agent, the Gonchars agreed in writing to purchase a twenty-volume set of historical encyclopedias from Renowned Books for a total of $299. A down payment of $35 was required, with the remainder of the cost to be paid in monthly payments over a one-year period. Two days later, the Gonchars, having second thoughts, contacted the book company and stated that they had decided to rescind the contract.

Renowned Books said this would be impossible. Has Renowned Books violated any consumer law by not allowing the Gonchars to rescind their contract? Explain.

44-4. Fair Debt Collection. CrossCheck, Inc., provides check-authorization services to retail merchants. When a customer presents a check, the merchant contacts CrossCheck, which estimates the probability that the check will clear the bank. If the check is within an acceptable statistical range, CrossCheck notifies the merchant. If the check is dishonored, the merchant sends it to CrossCheck, which pays it. CrossCheck then attempts to redeposit the check. If this fails, CrossCheck takes further steps to collect the amount. CrossCheck attempts to collect on more than two thousand checks per year and spends $2 million on these efforts, which involve about 7 percent of its employees and 6 percent of its total expenses. William Winterstein took his truck to C&P Auto Service Center, Inc., for a tune-up and paid for the service with a check. C&P contacted CrossCheck and, on its recommendation, accepted the check. When the check was dishonored, C&P mailed it to CrossCheck, which reimbursed C&P and sent a letter to Winterstein requesting payment. Winterstein filed a suit in a federal district court against CrossCheck, asserting that the letter violated the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. CrossCheck filed a motion for summary judgment. On what ground might the court grant the motion? Explain. [Winterstein v. CrossCheck, Inc., 149 F.Supp.2d 466 (N.D.Ill. 2001)]

44-5. Fair Credit Reporting Act. Source One Associates, Inc., is based in Poughquag, New York. Peter Easton, Source One's president, is responsible for its daily operations. Between 1995 and 1997, Source One received requests from persons in Massachusetts seeking financial information about individuals and businesses. To obtain this information, Easton first obtained the targeted individuals' credit reports through Equifax Consumer Information Services by claiming that the reports would be used only in connection with credit transactions involving the consumers. From the reports, Easton identified financial institutions at which the targeted individuals held accounts. He then called the institutions to learn the account balances by impersonating either officers of the institutions or the account holders. The information was then provided to Source One's customers for a fee. Easton did not know why the customers wanted the information. The state ("commonwealth") of Massachusetts filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against Source One and Easton, alleging, among other things, violations of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA). Did the defendants violate the FCRA? Explain. [Commonwealth v. Source One Associates, Inc., 436 Mass. 118, 763 N.E.2d 42 (2002)]

44-6. Deceptive Advertising. "Set Up & Ready to Make Money in Minutes Guaranteed!" the ads claimed. "The Internet Treasure Chest (ITC) will give you everything you need to start your own exciting Internet business including your own worldwide Web site all for the unbelievable price of only $59.95." The ITC "contains virtually everything you need to quickly and easily get your very own worldwide Internet business up, running, stocked with products, able to accept credit cards and ready to take orders almost immediately." What ITC's marketers—Damien Zamora and end70 Corp.—did not disclose were the significant additional costs required to operate the business: domain name registration fees, monthly Internet access and hosting charges, monthly fees to access the ITC product warehouse, and other "upgrades." The Federal Trade Commission filed a suit in a federal district court against end70 and Zamora, seeking an injunction and other relief. Are the defendants' claims "deceptive advertising"? If so, what might the court order the defendants to do to correct any misrepresentations? [Federal Trade Commission v. end70 Corp., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Tex. 2003)]

44-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

One of the products that McDonald's Corp. sells is the Happy Meal®, which consists of a McDonald's food entree, a small order of french fries, a small drink, and a toy. In the early 1990s, McDonald's began to aim its Happy Meal marketing at children aged one to three. In 1995, McDonald's began making nutritional information for its food products available in documents known as "McDonald's Nutrition Facts." Each document lists each food item that the restaurant serves and provides a nutritional breakdown, but the Happy Meal is not included. Marc Cohen filed a suit in an Illinois state court against McDonald's, alleging, among other things, that the defendant had violated a state law prohibiting consumer fraud and deceptive business practices by failing to adhere to the National Labeling and Education Act (NLEA) of 1990. The NLEA sets out different requirements for products specifically intended for children under the age of four—generally, the products cannot declare the percent of daily value of nutritional components. Would this requirement be readily understood by a consumer who is not familiar with nutritional standards? Why or why not? Should a state court impose such regulations? Explain. [Cohen v. McDonald's Corp., 347 Ill.App.3d 627, 808 N.E.2d 1, 283 Ill.Dec. 451 (1 Dist. 2004)]

44-8. Debt Collection. 55th Management Corp. in New York City owns residential property that it leases to various tenants. In June 2000, claiming that one of the tenants, Leslie Goldman, owed more than $13,000 in back rent, 55th retained Jeffrey Cohen, an attorney, to initiate nonpayment proceedings. Cohen filed a petition in a New York state court against Goldman, seeking recovery of the unpaid rent and at least $3,000 in attorneys' fees. After receiving notice of the petition, Goldman filed a suit in a federal district court against Cohen. Goldman contended that the notice of the petition constituted an initial contact that, under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA), required a validation notice. Because Cohen did not give Goldman a validation notice at the time, or within five days, of the notice of the petition, Goldman argued that Cohen was in violation of the FDCPA. Should the filing of a suit in a state court be considered "communication," requiring a debt collector to provide a validation notice under the FDCPA? Why or why not? [Goldman v. Cohen, 445 F.3d 152 (2d Cir. 2006)]

44-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

After graduating from law school—and serving time in prison for attempting to collect debts by posing as an FBI agent—Barry Sussman theorized that if a debt-collection business collected only debts that it owned as a result of buying checks written on accounts with insufficient funds (NSF checks), it would not be subject to the Federal Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA). Sussman formed Check Investors, Inc., to act on his theory. Check Investors bought more than 2.2 million NSF checks, with an estimated face value of about $348 million, for pennies on the dollar. Check Investors added a fee of $125 or $130 to the face amount of each check (which exceeds the legal limit in most states) and aggressively pursued its drawer to collect. The firm's employees were told to accuse drawers of being criminals and to threaten them with arrest and prosecution. The threats were false. Check Investors never took steps to initiate a prosecution. The employees contacted the drawers' family members and used "saturation phoning"—phoning a drawer numerous times in a short period. They used abusive language, referring to drawers as "deadbeats," "retards," "thieves," and "idiots." Between January 2000 and January 2003, Check Investors netted more than $10.2 million from its efforts. [Federal Trade Commission v. Check Investors, Inc., 502 F.3d 159 (3d Cir. 2007)]

CHAPTER 45

Environmental Law

Concerns over the degradation of the environment have increased over time in response to the environmental effects of population growth, urbanization, and industrialization. Environmental protection is not without a price, however. For many businesses, the costs of complying with environmental regulations are high, and for some they may seem too high. A constant tension exists between the desire to increase profits and productivity and the need to protect the environment. In this chapter, we discuss environmental law, which consists of all laws and regulations designed to protect and preserve our environmental resources.

Common Law Actions

Common law remedies against environmental pollution originated centuries ago in England. Those responsible for operations that created dirt, smoke, noxious odors, noise, or toxic substances were sometimes held liable under common law theories of nuisance or negligence. Today, injured individuals continue to rely on the common law to obtain damages and injunctions against business polluters.

Nuisance

Under the common law doctrine of nuisance, persons may be held liable if they use their property in a manner that unreasonably interferes with others' rights to use or enjoy their own property. Courts typically balance the equities between the harm caused by the pollution and the costs of stopping it. Courts have often denied injunctive relief on the ground that the hardships that would be imposed on the polluter and on the community are greater than the hardships suffered by the plaintiff. For example, a factory that causes neighboring landowners to suffer from smoke, soot, and vibrations may be left in operation if it is the core of the local economy. The injured parties may be awarded only monetary damages, which may include compensation for the decline in the value of their property caused by the factory's operation.

A property owner may be given relief from pollution if he or she can identify a distinct harm separate from that affecting the general public. This harm is referred to as a "private" nuisance. Under the common law, individuals were denied standing (access to the courts—see Chapter 2) unless they suffered a harm distinct from the harm suffered by the public at large. Some states still require this. For example, in one case a group of individuals who made their living by commercial fishing in a major river in New York filed a suit seeking damages and an injunction against a company that was polluting the river. The New York court found that the plaintiffs had standing because they were particularly harmed by the pollution in the river.¹ A public authority (such as a state's attorney general), however, can sue to abate a "public" nuisance.

Negligence and Strict Liability

An injured party may sue a business polluter in tort under the negligence and strict liability theories discussed in Chapters 6 and 7. The basis for a negligence action is a business's alleged failure to use reasonable care toward a party whose injury was foreseeable and was caused by the lack of reasonable care. For example, employees might sue an employer whose failure to use proper pollution controls contaminated the air, causing the employees to suffer respiratory illnesses. A developing area of tort law involves toxic torts—actions against toxic polluters.

1. Lee v. General Electric Co., 538 N.Y.S.2d 844, 145 A.D.2d 291 (1989).

Businesses that engage in ultrahazardous activities—such as the transportation of radioactive materials—are strictly liable for any injuries the activities cause. In a strict liability action, the injured party need not prove that the business failed to exercise reasonable care.

Federal, State, and Local Regulation

All levels of government in the United States regulate some aspect of the environment. In this section, we look at some of the ways in which the federal, state, and local governments control business activities and land use in the interests of environmental preservation and protection.

Federal Regulation

Congress has passed a number of statutes to control the impact of human activities on the environment. Exhibit 45-1 lists and summarizes the major federal environmental statutes discussed in this chapter. Some of these statutes were passed in an attempt to improve air and water quality. Others specifically regulate toxic chemicals, including pesticides, herbicides, and hazardous wastes.

Environmental Regulatory Agencies The primary federal agency regulating environmental law is the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), which was created in 1970 to coordinate federal environmental responsibilities. Other federal agencies with authority for regulating specific environmental matters include the Department of the Interior, the Department of Defense, the Department of Labor, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. These regulatory agencies—and all other agencies of the federal government—must take environmental factors into consideration when making significant decisions.

Most federal environmental laws provide that private parties can sue to enforce environmental regulations if government agencies fail to do so—or can sue to protest agency enforcement actions if they believe that these actions go too far. Typically, a threshold hurdle in such suits is meeting the requirements for standing to sue (see Chapter 2).

State and local regulatory agencies also play a significant role in carrying out federal environmental legislation. Typically, the federal government relies on state and local governments to implement federal environmental statutes and regulations such as those regulating air quality.

Environmental Impact Statements The National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) of 1969² requires that an environmental impact statement (EIS) be prepared for every major federal action that significantly affects the quality of the environment. An EIS must analyze (1) the impact on the environment that the action will have, (2) any adverse effects on the environment and alternative actions that might be taken, and (3) irreversible effects the action might generate.

An action qualifies as “major” if it involves a substantial commitment of resources (monetary or otherwise). An action is “federal” if a federal agency has the power to control it. Construction by a private developer of a ski resort on federal land, for example, may require an EIS. Building or operating a nuclear plant, which requires a federal permit, or constructing a dam as part of a federal project requires an EIS. If an agency decides that an EIS is unnecessary, it must issue a statement supporting this conclusion. EISs have become instruments for private individuals, consumer interest groups, businesses, and others to challenge federal agency actions on the basis that the actions improperly threaten the environment.

State and Local Regulation

Many states regulate the degree to which the environment may be polluted. Thus, for example, even when state zoning laws permit a business’s proposed development, the proposal may have to be altered to lessen the development’s impact on the environment. State laws may restrict a business’s discharge of chemicals into the air or water or regulate its disposal of toxic wastes. States may also regulate the disposal or recycling of other wastes, including glass, metal, and plastic containers and paper. Additionally, states may restrict the emissions from motor vehicles.

City, county, and other local governments oversee certain aspects of the environment. For instance, local zoning laws control some land use. These laws may be designed to inhibit or direct the growth of cities and suburbs or to protect the natural environment. In the interest of safeguarding the environment, such laws may prohibit certain land uses.

Other aspects of the environment may also be subject to local regulation. Methods of waste and garbage removal and disposal, for example, can have a substantial impact on a community. The appearance of buildings and other structures, including advertising signs and billboards, may affect traffic safety, property values, or local aesthetics. Noise generated by a business or its customers may be annoying, disruptive, or damaging to its neighbors. The location and condition of parks, streets, and other public uses of land subject to local control affect the environment and can also affect business.

Air Pollution

Federal involvement with air pollution goes back to the 1950s, when Congress authorized funds for air-pollution research. In 1963, the federal government passed the Clean Air Act,³ which focused on multistate

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Should the EPA Take the Threat of Global Warming into Account?

For some time, environmental groups have argued that Congress should take action to curb emissions of so-called greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide, which build up in the atmosphere and supposedly create a "greenhouse effect," leading to global warming. They wanted Congress to mandate that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) consider global warming effects when instituting regulations, particularly with respect to carbon dioxide emissions from automobiles.

If Congress Won't Act, Go to Court to Force the EPA to Act

In 1999, frustrated by Congress's apparent lack of concern about global warming, environmental groups went directly to the EPA and petitioned the agency to use its authority under the Clean Air Act to regulate greenhouse gases, including carbon dioxide emissions from motor vehicles. In 2003, however, the EPA denied their petition, stating, among other things, that the Clean Air Act did not authorize it to address global climate change or to regulate carbon dioxide emissions. As a result of the EPA's refusal to take action, the environmental groups and several states brought a lawsuit to force the EPA to act. At issue in the case was not only whether the EPA has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide under the Clean Air Act but also whether the plaintiffs had standing to bring their case at all.

The Supreme Court Agrees

In 2007, in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency,^a the United States Supreme Court issued what may turn out to be a landmark decision supporting the plaintiffs. As to whether the plaintiffs had standing to sue, recall from the discussion earlier in this chapter that ordinarily a plaintiff must have suffered a particularized harm that is distinct from that experienced by the public at large. In this case, Massachusetts asserted that it had standing because its coastline, including lands owned by the state, faced an imminent threat from rising sea levels caused by global warming. The Court agreed, declaring that "the harm associated with climate changes is serious and well recognized," including "severe and irreversible changes to natural ecosystems" and "a precipitate rise in sea levels." The EPA had argued that because global warming has widespread effects, an individual plaintiff could not show the particularized harm that standing requires, but the Court said that the fact that these effects are widely shared does not minimize their air pollution and provided assistance to the states. Various amendments, particularly in 1970, 1977, and 1990, strengthened the government's authority to regulate air quality. These laws provide the basis for issuing regulations to control pollution coming primarily from mobile sources (such as automobiles) and stationary sources (such as electric utilities and industrial plants).

Mobile Sources

Automobiles and other vehicles are referred to as mobile sources of pollution. The EPA has issued regulations specifying standards for mobile sources of pollution, as well as for service stations. The agency periodically updates these standards in light of new developments and data.

Motor Vehicles Regulations governing air pollution from automobiles and other mobile sources specify pollution standards and time schedules for meeting these standards. For example, the 1990 amendments to the Clean Air Act required automobile manufacturers to cut new automobiles' exhaust emissions of nitrogen oxide by 60 percent and emissions of other pollutants by 35 percent by 1998. Regulations that became effective beginning with 2004 model cars called for nitrogen oxide tailpipe emissions to be cut by nearly 10 percent by 2007. For the first time, sport-utility vehicles (SUVs) and light trucks were required to meet the same emission standards as automobiles. The amendments also required service stations to sell gasoline with a higher oxygen content in certain cities, and to sell even cleaner-burning gasoline in the most polluted urban areas.

When individuals or groups oppose regulations, they often file lawsuits in an attempt to prevent an agency from taking some regulatory action. As mentioned earlier, however, private parties also sometimes file lawsuits in an effort to compel an agency to take impact on Massachusetts. Hence, Massachusetts had standing to bring a lawsuit to force the EPA to take action to protect the state and its residents.

The Court also found that the Clean Air Act gives the EPA the authority to regulate carbon dioxide. The agency had contended that the statutory language did not include carbon dioxide, but the Court pointed out that the statute defines an air pollutant as “any physical, chemical, . . . substance which is emitted into or otherwise enters the ambient air”—a definition that would include all airborne compounds. Thus, the statute’s mandate that the EPA should regulate “any air pollutant” from cars that might “endanger public health or welfare” provides authority to regulate carbon dioxide.

But Others Are Critical

Although environmental groups hailed the decision, others were highly critical. Many observers questioned the Court’s ruling on standing. They pointed out that Massachusetts had presented no exhibits to support witnesses’ statements that Massachusetts would actually lose coastal land as a result of rising sea levels. Hence, there was no imminent harm—and thus no case or controversy, as required by Article III of the U.S. Constitution. To date, at least two federal courts have declined to extend the ruling to other subjects.^b

The Court’s interpretation of the Clean Air Act has also been controversial. Critics have pointed out that when Congress last amended the Clean Air Act in 1990, there were already major studies on global warming. Nevertheless, Congress did not include amendments that would have forced the EPA to set carbon dioxide emission standards. If Congress chose not to force the EPA to act, why should the Court do so? In his dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia also criticized the majority’s broad definition of “pollutant.” He pointed out that the dictionary defines “pollute” as “to make or render impure or unclean,” a definition that hardly applies to carbon dioxide, which, after all, is the principal product of human respiration.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Some argue that the requirement that plaintiffs have standing is one of the self-restraints on the power of the federal courts. Do you think that the Supreme Court’s decision in the Massachusetts case diluted the standards for standing? Why or why not? Will the Supreme Court’s new approach to standing increase or decrease the role of the courts in U.S. public life? Why?

b. See United States v. Genendo Pharmaceutical, N.V., 485 F.3d 958 (7th Cir. 2007); and American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 493 F.3d 644 (6th Cir. 2007).

action in an area in which it has failed to act. A group of private organizations and several states recently took such an action when they sued to require the EPA to adopt rules to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from automobiles under the Clean Air Act. For a discussion of the United States Supreme Court’s decision in this case, see this chapter’s Contemporary Legal Debates feature.

Updating Pollution-Control Standards As mentioned, the EPA attempts to update pollution-control standards when new scientific information becomes available. For example, studies conducted in the 1990s concluded that very small particles (2.5 microns, or millionths of a meter) of soot affect our health as significantly as larger particles. Based on this evidence, in 1997 the EPA issued new particulate standards for motor vehicle exhaust systems and other sources of pollution. The EPA also set a more rigorous standard for ozone (the basic ingredient of smog), which is formed when sunlight combines with pollutants from cars and other sources.

The EPA’s particulate standards and ozone standard were challenged in court by a number of business groups that claimed that the EPA had exceeded its authority under the Clean Air Act by issuing the stricter rules. Additionally, the groups claimed that the EPA had to take economic costs into account when developing new regulations. In 2000, however, the United States Supreme Court upheld the EPA’s authority under the Clean Air Act to issue the standards. The Court also held that the EPA did not have to take economic costs into account when creating new rules.⁴

In 2006, the EPA again reevaluated its particulate standards and found that more than two hundred counties were not meeting the standards set in 1997. The EPA issued new regulations for daily (twenty-four hour) exposure to particles of soot but did not change the annual particulate standards.⁵

Stationary Sources

The Clean Air Act also authorizes the EPA to establish air-quality standards for stationary sources (such as manufacturing plants) but recognizes that the primary responsibility for implementing these standards rests with state and local governments. The standards are aimed at controlling hazardous air pollutants—that is, those likely to cause death or serious irreversible or incapacitating illness such as cancer or neurological and reproductive damage. In all, 189 substances, including asbestos, benzene, beryllium, cadmium, and vinyl chloride, have been classified as hazardous. They are emitted from stationary sources by a variety of business activities, including smelting (melting ore to produce metal), dry cleaning, house painting, and commercial baking.

5. 40 C.F.R. Part 50.

The EPA sets primary and secondary levels of ambient standards—that is, the maximum levels of certain pollutants—and the states formulate plans to achieve those standards. Different standards apply depending on whether the sources of pollution are located in clean areas or polluted areas and whether they are already existing sources or major new sources. Major new sources include existing sources modified by a change in a method of operation that increases emissions. Performance standards for major sources require the use of the maximum achievable control technology, or MACT, to reduce emissions. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.⁶

The pollution-control schemes established under the Clean Air Act are known as New Source Performance Standards (NSPS) and Prevention of Significant Deterioration (PSD). The NSPS and PSD provisions' definitions of the term modification were at the center of the dispute in the following case.

EXTENDED CASE 45.1 Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corp.

Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * * *

* * * Section 111(a) of the [Clean Air Amendments of] 1970 * * * defined [modification] within the NSPS [New Source Performance Standards] scheme as “any physical change in, or change in the method of operation of, a stationary source which increases the amount of any air pollutant emitted by such source or which results in the emission of any air pollutant not previously emitted.”

EPA’s 1975 regulations implementing NSPS * * * [identified] “a modification within the meaning of [S]ection 111” * * * as a change that “increase[s] * * * the emission rate,” which “shall be expressed as [kilograms per hour] of any pollutant discharged into the atmosphere.”

* * * [T]he Clean Air Act Amendments of 1977 included the PSD [Prevention of Significant Deterioration] provisions, which * * * required a PSD permit before a “major emitting facility” could be “constructed” * * *. “The term ‘construction’ * * * includes the modification (as defined in [S]ection 111(a)) * * * .”

* * * * *

* * * EPA’s 1980 PSD regulations require a permit for a modification (with the same statutory definition) only when it is a major one and only when it would increase the actual annual emission of a pollutant above the actual average for the two prior years.

Duke replaced or redesigned 29 tube assemblies in order to extend the life of the units and allow them to run longer each day.

The United States filed this action [in a federal district court] in 2000, claiming, among other things, that Duke violated the PSD provisions by doing this work without permits. Environmental Defense [and other private organizations] filed a complaint charging similar violations.

* * * [T]he District Court [ruled that] a PSD “major modification” can occur “only if the project increases the hourly rate of emissions” [and issued a judgment in Duke’s favor] * * * .

* * * * *

[On the plaintiffs’ appeal, the U.S.] Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit affirmed * * * . “[I]dential statutory definitions of the term ‘modification’” in the NSPS and PSD provisions * * * “has affirmatively mandated that this term be interpreted identically” in the regulations * * * . [The plaintiffs appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

* * * * *

In applying the 1980 PSD regulations to Duke’s conduct, the Court of Appeals thought that, by defining the term “modification” identically in its NSPS and PSD provisions, the Act required EPA to conform its PSD interpretation of that definition to any such interpretation it reasonably adhered to under NSPS. But principles of statutory construction are not so rigid. * * * [M]ost words have different shades of meaning and consequently may be variously construed, not only when they occur in different statutes, but when used more than once in the same statute or even in the same section. Thus, the natural presumption that identical words used in different parts of the same act are intended to have the same meaning * * * readily yields whenever there is such variation in the connection in which the words are used as reasonably to warrant the conclusion that they were employed in different parts of the act with different intent. A given term in the same statute may take on distinct characters from association with distinct statutory objects calling for different implementation strategies. [Emphasis added.]

* * * * *

The Court of Appeals’s reasoning that the PSD regulations must conform to their NSPS counterparts led the court to read those PSD regulations in a way that seems to us too far a stretch

* * * .

* * * [T]he regulatory language simply cannot be squared with a regime under which “hourly rate of emissions” is dispositive [a controlling factor].

* * * * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. What would support an argument that the Court should have given the term modification a definition that would be common to both regulations?
2. Did the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit’s attempt to equate the NSPS and PSD regulations implicitly—without analysis or discussion—invalidate those regulations? Explain.

Violations of the Clean Air Act

For violations of emission limits under the Clean Air Act, the EPA can assess civil penalties of up to $25,000 per day. Additional fines of up to $5,000 per day can be assessed for other violations, such as failing to maintain the required records. To penalize those who find it more cost-effective to violate the act than to comply with it, the EPA is authorized to impose a penalty equal to the violator’s economic benefits from noncompliance. Persons who provide information about violators may be paid up to $10,000. Private citizens can also sue violators.

Those who knowingly violate the act may be subject to criminal penalties, including fines of up to $1 million and imprisonment for up to two years (for false statements or failure to report violations). Corporate officers are among those who may be subject to these penalties.

Water Pollution

Water pollution stems mostly from industrial, municipal, and agricultural sources. Pollutants entering streams, lakes, and oceans include organic wastes, heated water, sediments from soil runoff, nutrients (including fertilizers and human and animal wastes), and toxic chemicals and other hazardous substances. We look here at laws and regulations governing water pollution.

Navigable Waters

Federal regulations governing water pollution can be traced back to the Rivers and Harbors Appropriations Act of 1899.⁷ These regulations prohibited ships and manufacturers from discharging or depositing refuse in navigable waterways. Once limited to waters actually used for navigation, the term navigable waters is today interpreted to include intrastate lakes and streams used by interstate travelers and industries, as well as coastal and freshwater wetlands (wetlands will be defined shortly).

7. 33 U.S.C. Sections 401–418.

The Clean Water Act In 1948, Congress passed the Federal Water Pollution Control Act (FWPCA),⁸ but its regulatory system and enforcement powers proved to be inadequate. In 1972, amendments to the FWPCA—known as the Clean Water Act—established the following goals: (1) make waters safe for swimming, (2) protect fish and wildlife, and (3) eliminate the discharge of pollutants into the water. The act requires municipal and industrial polluters to apply for permits before discharging wastes into navigable waters. The Clean Water Act also set specific schedules, which were extended by amendment in 1977 and by the Water Quality Act of 1987.⁹ Under these schedules, the EPA establishes limits for discharges of various types of pollutants based on the technology available for controlling them.

Before a company can obtain a federal license to “discharge” into navigable waters, the affected state must certify that water-protection laws will not be violated. Can a river routed through a hydropower dam “discharge” into itself for purposes of the Clean Water Act, thus requiring the dam’s owner to obtain state approval? That was the question in the following case.

C A S E 45.2 S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection

www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

● Background and Facts S. D. Warren Company generates electricity for a paper mill by operating hydropower dams in the Presumpscot River, which runs for twenty-five miles through southern Maine. Each dam creates a pond, from which water funnels into a canal, through turbines, and back to the riverbed. Operating the dams requires a license from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC). Under the Clean Water Act, a license for an activity that causes a “discharge” into navigable waters requires the state in which the discharge occurs to certify that the discharge will not violate water-quality standards. To renew the licenses for the dams in 1999, Warren applied for certification from the Maine Department of Environmental Protection. The agency told Warren to maintain a minimum stream flow in the river and to allow passage for migratory fish and eels. Warren appealed to the state Board of Environmental Protection, which upheld the requirements. FERC licensed the dams subject to the conditions. Warren filed a suit in a Maine state court against the state agency, arguing that the dams do not result in discharges. The court ruled in the agency’s favor. Warren appealed to the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, the state’s highest court, which affirmed the lower court’s ruling. Warren appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT Justice SOUTER delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

*The dispute turns on the meaning of the word “discharge,” the key to the state certification requirement under [the Clean Water Act]. * * * [S]ince it is neither defined in the statute nor*

a term of art, we are left to construe it in accordance with its ordinary or natural meaning. [Emphasis added.]

When it applies to water, “discharge” commonly means a “flowing or issuing out,” [according to Webster’s New International Dictionary * * *, and this ordinary sense has consistently been the meaning intended when this Court has used the term in prior water cases. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [T]his Court has not been alone, for the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and FERC have each regularly read “discharge” as having its plain meaning and thus covering releases from hydroelectric dams. Warren is, of course, entirely correct in cautioning us that because neither the EPA nor FERC [Federal Energy Regulatory Commission] has formally settled the definition, or even set out agency reasoning, these expressions of agency understanding do not command deference from this Court. But even so, the administrative usage of “discharge” in this way confirms our understanding of the everyday sense of the term.

* * * *

Congress passed the Clean Water Act to “restore and maintain the chemical, physical, and biological integrity of the Nation’s waters,” the “national goal” being to achieve “water quality which provides for the protection and propagation of fish, shellfish, and wildlife and provides for recreation in and on the water.” To do this, the Act does not stop at controlling the “addition of pollutants,” but deals with “pollution” generally, which Congress defined to mean “the man-made or man-induced alteration of the chemical, physical, biological, and radiological integrity of water.”

The alteration of water quality as thus defined is a risk inherent in limiting river flow and releasing water through turbines. Warren itself admits that its dams “can cause changes in the movement, flow, and circulation of a river * * * caus[ing] a river to absorb less oxygen and to be less passable by boaters and fish.” And several [other parties who submitted briefs in this case] alert us to the chemical modification caused by the dams, with “immediate impact on aquatic organisms, which of course rely on dissolved oxygen in water to breathe.” Then there are the findings of the Maine Department of Environmental Protection that led to this appeal:

The record in this case demonstrates that Warren’s dams have caused long stretches of the natural river bed to be essentially dry and thus unavailable as habitat for indigenous populations of fish and other aquatic organisms; that the dams have blocked the passage of eels and sea-run fish to their natural spawning and nursery waters; that the dams have eliminated the opportunity for fishing in long stretches of river, and that the dams have prevented recreational access to and use of the river.

Changes in the river like these fall within a State’s legitimate legislative business, and the Clean Water Act provides for a system that respects the States’ concerns. [Emphasis added.]

State certifications under [the Clean Water Act] are essential in the scheme to preserve state authority to address the broad range of pollution * * * .

Reading [the Clean Water Act] to give “discharge” its common and ordinary meaning preserves the state authority apparently intended.

● Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the Maine Supreme Judicial Court. Under the Clean Water Act, an activity that may result in a “discharge” into navigable waters under a federal license requires state approval. Water flowing through a hydropower dam operated under a federal license constitutes such a “discharge.”

● What If the Facts Were Different? Would the result in this case have been different if the quality of the water flowing through the turbines of Warren’s dams improved before returning to the river? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension Should the Court have ruled differently if the discharge had been into international or foreign waters rather than into the waters of the United States? Explain.

Standards for Equipment Regulations, for the most part, specify that the best available control technology, or BACT, be installed. The EPA issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard; essentially, the guidelines require the most effective pollution-control equipment available. New sources must install BACT equipment before beginning operations. Existing sources are subject to timetables for the installation of BACT equipment and must immediately install equipment that utilizes the best practical control technology, or BPCT. The EPA also issues guidelines as to what equipment meets this standard.

Wetlands The Clean Water Act prohibits the filling or dredging of wetlands unless a permit is obtained from the Army Corps of Engineers. The EPA defines wetlands as “those areas that are inundated or saturated by surface or ground water at a frequency and duration sufficient to support, and that under normal circumstances do support, a prevalence of vegetation typically adapted for life in saturated soil conditions.” The EPA’s broad interpretation of what constitutes a wetland for purposes of regulation by the federal government has generated substantial controversy.

The Migratory Bird Rule. One of the most controversial regulations was the “migratory bird rule” issued by the Army Corps of Engineers. Under this rule, any bodies of water that could affect interstate commerce, including seasonal ponds or waters “used or suitable for use by migratory birds” that fly over state borders, were “navigable waters” subject to federal regulation under the Clean Water Act as wetlands. The rule was challenged in a case brought by a group of communities that wanted to build a landfill in a tract of land northwest of Chicago. The Army Corps of Engineers refused to grant a permit for the landfill on the ground that the shallow ponds on the property formed a habitat for migratory birds.

Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court held that the Army Corps of Engineers had exceeded its authority under the Clean Water Act. The Court stated that it was not prepared to hold that isolated and seasonable ponds, puddles, and “prairie potholes” become “navigable waters of the United States” simply because they serve as a habitat for migratory birds.¹⁰

Seasonal Bodies of Water. The United States Supreme Court revisited the issue of wetlands in 2006, again scaling back the reach of the Clean Water Act. Two disputes had arisen as to whether certain properties in Michigan could be developed by the owners or were protected as wetlands, and the Court consolidated the cases on appeal. One involved property deemed to be wetlands because it was near an unnamed ditch that flowed into the Sutherland-Oemig Drain, which ultimately connected to Lake St. Clair. The other involved acres of marshy land, some of which was adjacent to a creek that flowed into a river, which flowed into yet another river, eventually reaching Saginaw Bay. Although the lower courts had concluded that both properties were wetlands under the Clean Water Act, the Supreme Court reversed these decisions. The Court held that the act covers “only those wetlands with a continuous surface connection to bodies that are waters of the United States in their own right.” The Court further held that navigable waters under the act include only relatively permanent, standing or flowing bodies of water—not intermittent or temporary flows of water.¹¹

Violations of the Clean Water Act Under the Clean Water Act, violators are subject to a variety of civil and criminal penalties. Depending on the violation, civil penalties range from $10,000 to $25,000 per day, but not more than $25,000 per violation. Criminal penalties, which apply only if an act was intentional, range from a fine of $2,500 per day and imprisonment for up to one year to a fine of $1 million and fifteen years’ imprisonment. Injunctive relief and damages can also be imposed. The polluting party can be required to clean up the pollution or pay for the cost of the clean-up.

Drinking Water

Another statute governing water pollution is the Safe Drinking Water Act.¹² Passed in 1974, this act requires the EPA to set maximum levels for pollutants in public water systems. Operators of public water supply systems must come as close as possible to meeting the EPA’s standards by using the best available technology that is economically and technologically feasible. The EPA is particularly concerned about contamination from underground sources. Pesticides and wastes leaked from landfills or disposed of in underground injection wells are among the more than two hundred pollutants known to exist in groundwater used for drinking in at least thirty-four states. Many of these substances are associated with cancer and may cause damage to the central nervous system, liver, and kidneys.

12. 42 U.S.C. Sections 300f to 300j-25.

The act was amended in 1996 to give the EPA greater flexibility in setting regulatory standards governing drinking water. These amendments also imposed requirements on suppliers of drinking water. Each supplier must send to every household it supplies with water an annual statement describing the source of its water, the level of any contaminants contained in the water, and any possible health concerns associated with the contaminants.

Ocean Dumping

The Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act of 1972¹³ (known popularly as the Ocean Dumping Act) regulates the transportation and dumping of material (pollutants) into ocean waters. It prohibits entirely the ocean dumping of radiological, chemical, and biological warfare agents and high-level radioactive waste.

The act also established a permit program for transporting and dumping other materials, and designated certain areas as marine sanctuaries. Each violation of any provision or permit requirement in the Ocean Dumping Act may result in a civil penalty of up to $50,000. A knowing violation is a criminal offense that may result in a $50,000 fine, imprisonment for not more than a year, or both. A court may also grant an injunction to prevent an imminent or continuing violation.

Oil Pollution

In response to the worst oil spill in North American history—more than 10 million gallons of oil that leaked into Alaska's Prince William Sound from the Exxon Valdez supertanker—Congress passed the Oil Pollution Act of 1990.¹⁴ Under this act, any onshore or offshore oil facility, oil shipper, vessel owner, or vessel operator that discharges oil into navigable waters or onto an adjoining shore may be liable for clean-up costs, as well as damages. The act created an oil clean-up and economic compensation fund, and required oil tankers using U.S. ports to be double hulled by the year 2011 (to limit the severity of accidental spills).

Under the act, damage to natural resources, private property, and the local economy, including the increased cost of providing public services, is compensable. The penalties range from $2 million to $350 million, depending on the size of the vessel and on whether the oil spill came from a vessel or an offshore facility. The party held responsible for the clean-up costs can bring a civil suit for contribution from other potentially liable parties.

Toxic Chemicals

Originally, most environmental clean-up efforts were directed toward reducing smog and making water safe for fishing and swimming. Today, control of toxic chemicals used in agriculture and in industry has become increasingly important.

Pesticides and Herbicides

The Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) of 1947¹⁵ regulates pesticides and herbicides. Under FIFRA, pesticides and herbicides must be (1) registered before they can be sold, (2) certified and used only for approved applications, and (3) used in limited quantities when applied to food crops. The EPA can cancel or suspend registration of substances that are identified as harmful and may also inspect factories where the chemicals are made. Under 1996 amendments to FIFRA, there must be no more than a one-in-a-million risk to people of developing cancer from any kind of exposure to the substance, including eating food that contains pesticide residues.¹⁶

It is a violation of FIFRA to sell a pesticide or herbicide that is either unregistered or has had its registration canceled or suspended. It is also a violation to sell a pesticide or herbicide with a false or misleading label or to destroy or deface any labeling required under the act. For example, it is an offense to sell a substance that has a chemical strength different from the concentration declared on the label. Penalties for commercial dealers include imprisonment for up to one year and a fine up to $25,000 (producers can be fined up to $50,000). Farmers and other private users of pesticides or herbicides who violate the act are subject to a $1,000 fine and incarceration for up to thirty days.

Can a state regulate the sale and use of federally registered pesticides? Tort suits against pesticide manufacturers were common long before the enactment of FIFRA in 1947 and continued to be a feature of the legal landscape at the time FIFRA was amended. Until it heard the following case, however, the United States Supreme Court had never considered whether the statute preempts claims arising under state law.

www.findlaw.com/cascode/supreme.html^a

• Background and Facts The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) conditionally registered Strongarm, a new weed-killing pesticide, on March 8, 2000.^b Dow Agrosciences, LLC, immediately sold Strongarm to Texas peanut farmers, who normally plant their crops around May 1. The label stated, “Use of Strongarm is recommended in all areas where peanuts are grown.” When the farmers applied Strongarm to their fields, the pesticide damaged their crops while failing to control the growth of weeds. After unsuccessfully attempting to negotiate with Dow, the farmers announced their intent to sue Strongarm’s maker for violations of Texas state law. Dow filed a suit in a federal district court against the peanut farmers, asserting that FIFRA preempted their claims. The court issued a summary judgment in Dow’s favor. The farmers appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which affirmed the lower court’s judgment. The farmers appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Under FIFRA * * * , [a] pesticide is misbranded if its label contains a statement that is false or misleading in any particular, including a false or misleading statement concerning the efficacy of the pesticide. A pesticide is also misbranded if its label does not contain adequate instructions for use, or if its label omits necessary warnings or cautionary statements. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [Section] 136v provides:

(a) * * * A State may regulate the sale or use of any federally registered pesticide or device in the State, but only if and to the extent [that] the regulation does not permit any sale or use prohibited by [FIFRA].

(b) * * * Such State shall not impose or continue in effect any requirements for labeling or packaging in addition to or different from those required under [FIFRA]. * * *

* * * *

* * * Nothing in the text of FIFRA would prevent a State from making the violation of a federal labeling or packaging requirement a state offense, thereby imposing its own sanctions on pesticide manufacturers who violate federal law. The imposition of state sanctions for violating state rules that merely duplicate federal requirements is equally consistent with the text of [Section] 136v. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * For a particular state rule to be preempted, it must satisfy two conditions. First, it must be a requirement “for labeling or packaging”; rules governing the design of a product, for example, are not preempted. Second, it must impose a labeling or packaging requirement that is “in addition to or different from those required under [FIFRA].” A state regulation requiring the word “poison” to appear in red letters, for instance, would not be preempted if an EPA regulation imposed the same requirement.

* * * Rules that require manufacturers to design reasonably safe products, to use due care in conducting appropriate testing of their products, to market products free of manufacturing defects, and to honor their express warranties or other contractual commitments plainly do not qualify as requirements for “labeling or packaging.” None of these common-law rules requires that manufacturers label or package their products in any particular way. Thus, petitioners’ claims for defective design, defective manufacture, negligent testing, and breach of express warranty are not preempted.

Dow * * * argues that [this] “parallel requirements” reading of [Section] 136v(b) would “give juries in 50 States the authority to give content to FIFRA’s misbranding prohibition, establishing a crazy-quilt of anti-misbranding requirements * * *.” Conspicuously absent from the submissions by Dow * * * is any plausible alternative interpretation of “in addition to or different from” that would give that phrase meaning. Instead, they appear to favor reading those words out of the statute * * *. This amputated version of [Section] 136v(b) would no doubt have clearly and succinctly commanded the pre-emption of all state requirements concerning labeling. That Congress added the remainder of the provision is evidence of its intent to draw a distinction between state labeling requirements that are preempted and those that are not. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

In sum, under our interpretation, [Section] 136v(b) * * * preempts competing state labeling standards—imagine 50 different labeling regimes prescribing the color, font size, and wording of warnings—that would create significant inefficiencies for manufacturers. The provision also preempts any statutory or common-law rule that would impose a labeling requirement that diverges from those set out in FIFRA * * *. It does not, however, preempt any state rules that are fully consistent with federal requirements. [Emphasis added.]

• Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court vacated the lower court’s judgment. A state can regulate the sale and use of federally registered pesticides to the extent that it does not permit anything that FIFRA prohibits, but a state cannot impose any requirements for labeling or packaging in addition to or different from those that FIFRA requires. The Court remanded the case, however, for further proceedings subject to this standard, concerning certain state law claims “on which we have not received sufficient briefing.”

• What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that FIFRA required Strongarm’s label to include the word CAUTION, and the Texas peanut farmers filed their claims under a state regulation that required the label to use the word DANGER. Would the result have been different?

• The Legal Environment Dimension According to the Court’s interpretation, what is required for a state regulation or rule to be preempted under FIFRA? Why is this significant?

Toxic Substances

The first comprehensive law covering toxic substances was the Toxic Substances Control Act of 1976.¹⁷ The act was passed to regulate chemicals and chemical compounds that are known to be toxic—such as asbestos and polychlorinated biphenyls, popularly known as PCBs—and to institute investigation of any possible harmful effects from new chemical compounds. The regulations authorize the EPA to require that manufacturers, processors, and other entities planning to use chemicals first determine their effects on human health and the environment. The EPA can regulate substances that may pose an imminent hazard or an unreasonable risk of injury to health or the environment. The EPA may require special labeling, limit the use of a substance, set production quotas, or prohibit the use of a substance altogether.

17. 15 U.S.C. Sections 2601–2692.

Hazardous Wastes

Some industrial, agricultural, and household wastes pose more serious threats than others. If not properly disposed of, these toxic chemicals may present a substantial danger to human health and the environment. If released into the environment, they may contaminate public drinking water resources.

Resource Conservation and Recovery Act

In 1976, Congress passed the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA)¹⁸ in reaction to a growing concern about the effects of hazardous waste materials on the environment. The RCRA required the EPA to establish regulations to determine which forms of solid waste should be considered hazardous and to establish regulations to monitor and control hazardous waste disposal. The act also requires all producers of hazardous waste materials to label and package properly any hazardous waste to be transported. The RCRA was amended in 1984 and 1986 to decrease the use of land containment in the disposal of hazardous waste and to require smaller generators of hazardous waste to comply with the act.

Under the RCRA, a company may be assessed a civil penalty of up to $25,000 for each violation.¹⁹ The penalty is based on the seriousness of the violation, the probability of harm, and the extent to which the violation deviates from RCRA requirements. Criminal penalties include fines up to $50,000 for each day of violation, imprisonment for up to two years (in most instances), or both. Criminal fines and the time of imprisonment can be doubled for certain repeat offenders.

Superfund

In 1980, Congress passed the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability

Act (CERCLA),²⁰ commonly known as Superfund. The basic purpose of Superfund is to regulate the clean-up of disposal sites in which hazardous waste is leaking into the environment. A special federal fund was created for that purpose.

Superfund provides that when a release or a threatened release of hazardous chemicals from a site occurs, the EPA can clean up the site and recover the cost of the clean-up from the following persons: (1) the person who generated the wastes disposed of at the site, (2) the person who transported the wastes to the site, (3) the person who owned or operated the site at the time of the disposal, or (4) the current owner or operator. A person falling within one of these categories is referred to as a potentially responsible party (PRP).

Liability under Superfund is usually joint and several—that is, a PRP who generated only a fraction of the hazardous waste disposed of at the site may nevertheless be liable for all of the clean-up costs. CERCLA authorizes a party who has incurred clean-up costs to bring a “contribution action” against any other person who is liable or potentially liable for a percentage of the costs.

REVIEWING Environmental Law

In the late 1980s, residents of Lake Caliopa, Minnesota, began noticing an unusually high number of lung ailments among their population. A group of concerned local citizens pooled their resources and commissioned a study of the frequency of these health conditions per capita as compared to national averages. The study concluded that residents of Lake Caliopa experienced four to seven times the frequency of asthma, bronchitis, and emphysema as the population nationwide. During the study period, citizens began expressing concerns about the large volumes of smog emitted by the Cotton Design apparel manufacturing plant on the outskirts of town. The plant had opened its production facility two miles east of town beside the Tawakoni River in 1997 and employed seventy full-time workers by 2008.

Just downstream on the Tawakoni River, the city of Lake Caliopa operated a public water works facility, which supplied all city residents with water. In August 2008, the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency required Cotton Design to install new equipment to control air and water pollution. In May 2009, thirty citizens brought a class-action lawsuit in a Minnesota state court against Cotton Design for various respiratory ailments allegedly caused or compounded by smog from Cotton Design's factory. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Under the common law, what would each plaintiff be required to identify in order to be given relief by the court?

2. Are air-quality regulations typically overseen by federal, state, or local governments?
3. What standard for limiting emissions into the air does Cotton Design's pollution-control equipment have to meet?
4. What information must the city send to every household that the city supplies with water?

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

45-1. Some scientific knowledge indicates that there is no safe level of exposure to a cancer-causing agent. In theory, even one molecule of such a substance has the potential for causing cancer. Section 112 of the Clean Air Act requires that all cancer-causing substances be regulated to ensure a margin of safety. Some environmental groups have argued that all emissions of such substances must be eliminated to attain such a margin of safety. Total elimination would likely shut down many major U.S. industries. Should the Environmental Protection Agency totally forbid all emissions of cancer-causing chemicals? Discuss.

45-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Fruitade, Inc., is a processor of a soft drink called Freshen Up. Fruitade uses returnable bottles, which it cleans with a special acid to allow for further beverage processing. The acid is diluted with water and then allowed to pass into a navigable stream. Fruitade crushes its broken bottles and throws the crushed glass into the stream. Discuss fully any environmental laws that Fruitade has violated.

45-3. Moonbay is a home-building corporation that primarily develops retirement communities. Farmtex owns a number of feedlots in Sunny Valley. Moonbay purchased 20,000 acres of farmland in the same area and began building and selling homes on this acreage. In the meantime, Farmtex continued to expand its feedlot business, and eventually only 500 feet separated the two operations. Because of the odor and flies from the feedlots, Moonbay found it difficult to sell the homes in its development. Moonbay wants to enjoin (prevent) Farmtex from operating its feedlot in the vicinity of the retirement home development. Under what common law theory would Moonbay file this action? Has Farmtex violated any federal environmental laws? Discuss.

45-4. Clean Water Act. Attique Ahmad owned the Spin-N-Market, a convenience store and gas station. The gas pumps were fed by underground tanks, one of which had a leak at its top that allowed water to enter. Ahmad emptied the tank by pumping its contents into a storm drain and a sewer system. Through the storm drain, gasoline flowed into a creek, forcing the city to clean the water. Through the sewer system, gasoline flowed into a sewage treatment plant, forcing the city to evacuate the plant and two nearby schools. Ahmad was charged with discharging a pollutant without a permit, which is a criminal violation of the Clean Water Act. The act provides that a person who "knowingly violates" the act commits a felony. Ahmad claimed that he had believed he was discharging only water. Did Ahmad commit a felony? Why or why not? Discuss fully. [United States v. Ahmad, 101 F.3d 386 (5th Cir. 1996)]

45-5. Environmental Impact Statement. Greers Ferry Lake is in Arkansas, and its shoreline is under the management of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is part of the U.S. Department of Defense (DOD). The Corps's 2000 Shoreline Management Plan (SMP) rezoned numerous areas along the lake, authorized the Corps to issue permits for the construction of new boat docks in the rezoned areas, increased by 300 percent the area around habitable structures that could be cleared of vegetation, and instituted a Wildlife Enhancement Permit to allow limited modifications of the shoreline. In relation to the SMP's adoption, the Corps issued a Finding of No Significant Impact, which declared that no environmental impact statement (EIS) was necessary. The Corps issued thirty-two boat dock construction permits under the SMP before Save Greers Ferry Lake, Inc., filed a suit in a federal district court against the DOD, asking the court to, among other things, stop the Corps from acting under the SMP and order it to prepare an EIS. What are the requirements for an EIS? Is an EIS needed in this case? Explain. [Save Greers Ferry Lake, Inc. v. Department of Defense, 255 F.3d 498 (8th Cir. 2001)]

45-6. CERCLA. Beginning in 1926, Marietta Dyestuffs Co. operated an industrial facility in Marietta, Ohio, to make dyes and other chemicals. In 1944, Dyestuffs became part of American Home Products Corp. (AHP), which sold the Marietta facility to American Cyanamid Co. in 1946. In 1950, AHP sold the rest of the Dyestuffs assets and all of its stock to Goodrich Co., which immediately liquidated the acquired corporation. Goodrich continued to operate the dissolved corporation's business, however. Cyanamid continued to make chemicals at the Marietta facility, and in 1993, it created Cytec Industries, Inc., which expressly assumed all environmental liabilities associated with Cyanamid's ownership and operation of the facility. Cytec spent nearly $25 million on clean-up costs and filed a suit in a federal district court against Goodrich to recover, under CERCLA, a portion of the costs attributable to the clean-up of hazardous wastes that may have been discarded at the site between 1926 and 1946. Cytec filed a motion for summary judgment in its favor. Should the court grant Cytec's motion? Explain. [Cytec Industries, Inc. v. B. F. Goodrich Co., 196 F.Supp.2d 644 (S.D. Ohio 2002)]

45-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

William Gurley was the president and majority stockholder in Gurley Refining Co. (GRC). GRC bought used oil, treated it, and sold it. The refining process created a by-product residue of oily waste. GRC disposed of this waste by dumping it at, among other locations, a landfill in West Memphis, Arkansas. In February 1992, after detecting hazardous chemicals at the site, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) asked Gurley about his assets, the generators of the material disposed of at the landfill, site operations, and the structure of GRC. Gurley refused to respond, except to suggest that the EPA ask GRC. In October, the EPA placed the site on its clean-up list and again asked Gurley for information. When he still refused to respond, the EPA filed a suit in a federal district court against him, asking the court to impose a civil penalty. In February 1999, Gurley finally answered the EPA's questions. Under CERCLA, a court may impose a civil penalty "not to exceed $25,000 for each day of noncompliance against any person who unreasonably fails to comply" with an information request. Should the court assess a penalty in this case? Why or why not? [United States v. Gurley, 384 F.3d 316 (6th Cir. 2004)]

45-8. Clean Water Act. The Anacostia River, which flows through Washington, D.C., is one of the ten most polluted rivers in the country. For bodies of water such as the Anacostia, the Clean Water Act requires states (which, under the act, include the District of Columbia) to set a "total maximum daily load" (TMDL) for pollutants. A TMDL is to be set "at a level necessary to implement the applicable water-quality standards with seasonal variations." The Anacostia contains biochemical pollutants that consume oxygen, putting the river's aquatic life at risk for suffocation. In addition, the river is murky, stunting the growth of plants that rely on sunlight and impairing recreational use. The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) approved one TMDL limiting the annual discharge of oxygen-depleting pollutants and a second limiting the seasonal discharge of pollutants contributing to turbidity. Neither TMDL limited daily discharges. Friends of the Earth, Inc. (FoE), asked a federal district court to review the TMDLs. What is FoE's best argument in this dispute? What is the EPA's likely response? What should the court rule, and why? [Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 446 F.3d 140 (D.C. Cir. 2006)]

45-9. Environmental Impact Statement. The fourth largest crop in the United States is alfalfa, of which 5 percent is exported to Japan. RoundUp Ready alfalfa is genetically engineered to resist glyphosate, the active ingredient in the herbicide RoundUp. The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) regulates genetically engineered agricultural products through the Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service (APHIS). APHIS concluded that RoundUp Ready alfalfa does not have any harmful health effects on humans or livestock and deregulated it. Geertson Seed Farms and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Mike Johanns (the secretary of the USDA) and others, asserting that APHIS's decision required the preparation of an environmental impact statement (EIS). The plaintiffs argued, among other things, that the introduction of RoundUp Ready alfalfa might significantly decrease the availability of, or even eliminate, all nongenetically engineered varieties. The plaintiffs were concerned that the RoundUp Ready alfalfa might contaminate standard alfalfa because alfalfa is pollinated by bees, which can travel as far as two miles from a pollen source. If contamination occurred, farmers would not be able to market "contaminated" varieties as "organic," which would impact the sales of "organic" livestock and exports to Japan, which does not allow the import of glyphosate-tolerant alfalfa. Should an EIS be prepared in this case? Why or why not?

45-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In the Clean Air Act, Congress allowed California, which has particular problems with clean air, to adopt its own standard for emissions from cars and trucks, subject to the approval of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) according to certain criteria. Congress also allowed other states to adopt California's standard after the EPA's approval. In 2004, in an effort to address global warming, the California Air Resources Board amended the state's standard to attain "the maximum feasible and cost-effective reduction of GHG [greenhouse gas] emissions from motor vehicles." The regulation, which applies to new passenger vehicles and light-duty trucks for 2009 and later, imposes decreasing limits on emissions of carbon dioxide through 2016. While EPA approval was pending, Vermont and other states adopted similar standards. Green Mountain Chrysler Plymouth Dodge Jeep and other auto dealers, automakers, and associations of automakers filed a suit in a federal district court against George Crombie (secretary of the Vermont Agency of Natural Resources) and others, seeking relief from the state regulations. [Green Mountain Chrysler Plymouth Dodge Jeep v. Crombie, 508 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.Vt. 2007)]

- (a) Under the Environmental Policy and Conservation Act (EPCA) of 1975, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration sets fuel economy standards for new cars. The plaintiffs argued, among other things, that the EPCA, which prohibits states from adopting separate fuel economy standards, preempts Vermont's GHG regulation. Do the GHG rules equate to the fuel economy standards? Discuss.
- (b) Do Vermont's rules tread on the efforts of the federal government to address global warming internationally? Who should regulate GHG emissions? The federal government? The state governments? Both? Neither? Why?
- (c) The plaintiffs claimed that they would go bankrupt if they were forced to adhere to the state's GHG standards. Should they be granted relief on this basis? Does history support their claim? Explain.

CHAPTER 46

Antitrust Law

Today's antitrust laws are the direct descendants of common law actions intended to limit restraints on trade (agreements between firms that have the effect of reducing competition in the marketplace). Concern over monopolistic practices arose following the Civil War with the growth of large corporate enterprises and their attempts to reduce or eliminate competition. They did this by legally tying themselves together in a business trust, a type of business entity described in Chapter 37 on page 768. The participants in the most famous trust—the Standard Oil trust in the late 1800s—transferred their stock to a trustee and received trust certificates in exchange. The trustee then made decisions fixing prices, controlling production, and determining the control of exclusive geographic markets for all of the oil companies that were in the Standard Oil trust. Some argued that the trust wielded so much economic power that corporations outside the trust could not compete effectively.

Many states attempted to control such monopolistic behavior by enacting statutes outlawing the use of trusts. That is why all of the laws that regulate economic competition today are referred to as antitrust laws. At the national level, Congress recognized the problem in 1887 and passed the Interstate Commerce Act,¹ followed by the Sherman Antitrust Act² in 1890. In 1914, Congress passed the Clayton Act³ and the Federal Trade Commission Act⁴ to further curb anticompetitive or unfair business practices. Since their passage, the 1914 acts have been amended by Congress to broaden and strengthen their coverage, and they continue to be an important element in the legal environment in which businesses operate.

The Sherman Antitrust Act

The author of the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890, Senator John Sherman, was the brother of the famed Civil War general and a recognized financial authority. He had been concerned for years about what he saw as diminishing competition within U.S. industry and the emergence of monopolies. He told Congress that the Sherman Act “does not announce a new principle of law, but applies old and well-recognized principles of the common law.”⁵

The common law regarding trade regulation was not always consistent. Certainly, it was not very familiar to the members of Congress. The public concern over large business integrations and trusts was familiar, however, and in 1890 Congress passed “An Act to Protect Trade and Commerce against Unlawful Restraints and Monopolies”—more commonly referred to as the Sherman Antitrust Act, or simply the Sherman Act.

5. 21 Congressional Record 2456 (1890).

Major Provisions of the Sherman Act

Sections 1 and 2 contain the main provisions of the Sherman Act:

1: Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal [and is a felony punishable by fine and/or imprisonment].

2: Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a felony [and is similarly punishable].

Differences between Section 1 and Section 2

These two sections of the Sherman Act are quite different. Section 1 requires two or more persons, as a person cannot contract, combine, or conspire alone. Thus, the essence of the illegal activity is the act of joining together. Section 2 can apply either to one person or to two or more persons because it refers to “[e]very person.” Thus, unilateral conduct can result in a violation of Section 2.

The cases brought to the courts under Section 1 of the Sherman Act differ from those brought under Section 2. Section 1 cases are often concerned with finding an agreement (written or oral) that leads to a restraint of trade. Section 2 cases deal with the structure of a monopoly that exists in the marketplace. The term monopoly generally is used to describe a market in which there is a single seller or a very limited number of sellers. Whereas Section 1 focuses on agreements that are restrictive—that is, agreements that have a wrongful purpose—Section 2 looks at the so-called misuse of monopoly power in the marketplace.

Monopoly power exists when a firm has an extreme amount of market power—the power to affect the market price of its product. Both Section 1 and Section 2 seek to curtail firms’ market practices that result in undesired monopoly pricing and output behavior. For a case to be brought under Section 2, however, it must involve a market in which the “threshold” or “necessary” amount of monopoly power already exists.

Jurisdictional Requirements

The Sherman Act applies only to restraints that have a significant impact on interstate commerce. Courts have generally held that any activity that substantially affects interstate commerce falls within the scope of the Sherman Act. As will be discussed later in this chapter, the Sherman Act also extends to U.S. nationals abroad who are engaged in activities that have an effect on U.S. foreign commerce. State laws regulate local restraints on competition.

Section 1 of the Sherman Act

The underlying assumption of Section 1 of the Sherman Act is that society’s welfare is harmed if rival firms are permitted to join in an agreement that consolidates their market power or otherwise restrains competition. The types of trade restraints that Section 1 of the Sherman Act prohibits generally fall into two broad categories: horizontal restraints and vertical restraints, both of which will be discussed shortly. First, though, we look at the rules that the courts may apply when assessing the anticompetitive impact of alleged restraints on trade.

Per Se Violations versus the Rule of Reason

Some restraints are so blatantly and substantially anticompetitive that they are deemed per se violations—illegal per se (on their face, or inherently)—under Section 1. Other agreements, however, even though they result in enhanced market power, do not unreasonably restrain trade and are therefore lawful. Using what is called the rule of reason, the courts analyze anticompetitive agreements that allegedly violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act to determine whether they may, in fact, constitute reasonable restraints on trade.

The need for a rule-of-reason analysis of some agreements in restraint of trade is obvious—if the rule of reason had not been developed, virtually any business agreement could conceivably be held to violate the Sherman Act. Justice Louis Brandeis effectively phrased this sentiment in Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, a case decided in 1918:

Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition.⁶

When analyzing an alleged Section 1 violation under the rule of reason, a court will consider several factors. These factors include the purpose of the agreement, the parties’ power to implement the agreement to achieve that purpose, and the effect or potential effect of the agreement on competition. A court might also consider whether the parties could have relied on less restrictive means to achieve their purpose.

Horizontal Restraints

The term horizontal restraint is encountered frequently in antitrust law. A horizontal restraint is any agreement that in some way restrains competition between rival firms competing in the same market.

Price Fixing Any agreement among competitors to fix prices, or price-fixing agreement, constitutes a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Perhaps the definitive case regarding price-fixing agreements is still the 1940 case of *United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co.*⁷ In that case, a group of independent oil producers in Texas and Louisiana were caught between falling demand due to the Great Depression of the 1930s and increasing supply from newly discovered oil fields in the region. In response to these conditions, a group of the major refining companies agreed to buy “distress” gasoline (excess supplies) from the independents so as to dispose of it in an “orderly manner.” Although there was no explicit agreement as to price, it was clear that the purpose of the agreement was to limit the supply of gasoline on the market and thereby raise prices.

There may have been good reasons for the agreement. Nonetheless, the United States Supreme Court recognized the potentially adverse effects that such an agreement could have on open and free competition. The Court held that the reasonableness of a price-fixing agreement is never a defense; any agreement that restricts output or artificially fixes price is a per se violation of Section 1.

A case involving two pharmaceutical companies provides a modern illustration. The manufacturer of the prescription drug Cardizem CD, which can help prevent heart attacks, was about to lose its patent on the drug. Another company developed a generic version in anticipation of the patent expiring. After the two firms became involved in litigation over the patent, the first company agreed to pay the second company $40 million per year not to market the generic version until their dispute was resolved. This agreement was held to be a per se violation of the Sherman Act because it restrained competition between rival firms and delayed the entry of generic versions of Cardizem into the market.⁸

8. In re Cardizem CD Antitrust Litigation, 332 F.3d 896 (6th Cir. 2003).

Group Boycotts A group boycott is an agreement by two or more sellers to refuse to deal with (boycott) a particular person or firm. Traditionally, the courts have considered group boycotts to constitute per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act because they involve concerted action. To prove a violation of Section 1, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the boycott or joint refusal to deal was undertaken with the intention of eliminating competition or preventing entry into a given market. Although most boycotts are illegal, a few, such as group boycotts against a supplier for political reasons, may be protected under the First Amendment right to freedom of expression.

Horizontal Market Division It is a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act for competitors to divide up territories or customers. For example, manufacturers A, B, and C compete against one another in the states of Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa. They agree that A will sell products only in Kansas, B only in Nebraska, and C only in Iowa. This concerted action reduces costs and allows each of the three (assuming there is no other competition) to raise the price of the goods sold in its own state. The same violation would take place if A, B, and C agreed that A would sell only to institutional purchasers (such as school districts, universities, state agencies and departments, and cities) in the three states, B only to wholesalers, and C only to retailers.

Trade Associations Businesses in the same general industry or profession frequently organize trade associations to pursue common interests. A trade association may engage in various joint activities such as exchanging information, representing the members’ business interests before governmental bodies, conducting advertising campaigns, and setting regulatory standards to govern the industry or profession. Generally, the rule of reason is applied to many of these horizontal actions. If a court finds that a trade association practice or agreement that restrains trade is nonetheless sufficiently beneficial both to the association and to the public, it may deem the restraint reasonable.

Joint Ventures Joint ventures undertaken by competitors are also subject to antitrust laws. As discussed in Chapter 37, a joint venture is an undertaking by two or more individuals or firms for a specific purpose. If a joint venture does not involve price fixing or market divisions, the agreement will be analyzed under the rule of reason. Whether the venture will then be upheld under Section 1 depends on an overall assessment of the purposes of the venture, a strict analysis of the potential benefits relative to the likely harms, and, in some cases, an assessment of whether there are less restrictive alternatives for achieving the same goals.⁹

Vertical Restraints

A vertical restraint of trade results from an agreement between firms at different levels in the manufacturing and distribution process. In contrast to horizontal relationships, which occur at the same level of operation, vertical relationships encompass the entire chain of production: the purchase of inputs, basic manufacturing, distribution to wholesalers, and eventual sale of a product at the retail level. For some products, these distinct phases are carried on by different firms. In other instances, a single firm carries out two or more of the separate functional phases. Such enterprises are considered to be vertically integrated firms.

Even though firms operating at different functional levels are not in direct competition with one another, they are in competition with other firms. Thus, agreements between firms standing in a vertical relationship may affect competition. Some vertical restraints are per se violations of Section 1; others are judged under the rule of reason.

9. For a classic example of how courts judge joint ventures under the rule of reason, see United States v. Morgan, 118 F.Supp. 621 (S.D.N.Y. 1953).

Territorial or Customer Restrictions In arranging for the distribution of its products, a manufacturing firm often wishes to insulate dealers from direct competition with other dealers selling its products. To this end, the manufacturer may institute territorial restrictions or attempt to prohibit wholesalers or retailers from reselling the products to certain classes of buyers, such as competing retailers.

A firm may have legitimate reasons for imposing such territorial or customer restrictions. For example, a computer manufacturer may wish to prevent a dealer from reducing costs and undercutting rivals by offering computers without promotion or customer service, while relying on a nearby dealer to provide these services. In this situation, the cost-cutting dealer reaps the benefits (sales of the product) paid for by other dealers who undertake promotion and arrange for customer service. By not providing customer service, the cost-cutting dealer may also harm the manufacturer's reputation.

Territorial and customer restrictions are judged under a rule of reason. In United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co.,¹⁰ a case decided in 1967, a bicycle manufacturer, Schwinn, was assigning specific territories to its wholesale distributors and authorizing certain retail dealers only if they agreed to advertise Schwinn bikes and give them the same prominence as other brands. The United States Supreme Court held that these vertical territorial and customer restrictions were per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Ten years later, however, in the case that follows, the Supreme Court overturned the Schwinn decision.

CASE 46.1 Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc.

Supreme Court of the United States, 1977. 433 U.S. 36, 97 S.Ct. 2549, 53 L.Ed.2d 568.
www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

• Background and Facts GTE Sylvania, Inc., a manufacturer of television sets, adopted a franchise plan that limited the number of franchises granted in any given geographic area and that required each franchise to sell only Sylvania products from the location or locations at which it was franchised. Sylvania retained sole discretion to increase the number of retailers in an area, depending on the success or failure of existing retailers in developing their markets. Continental T.V., Inc., was a retailer under Sylvania's franchise plan. Shortly after proposing a new franchise that would compete with Continental, Sylvania terminated Continental's franchise, and a suit was brought in a federal district court for funds owed. Continental claimed that Sylvania's vertically restrictive franchise system violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act. The district court held for Continental, and Sylvania appealed. The appellate court reversed the trial court's decision. Continental appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Mr. Justice POWELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Vertical restrictions reduce intrabrand competition by limiting the number of sellers of a particular product competing for the business of a given group of buyers. * * *

Vertical restrictions promote interbrand competition by allowing the manufacturer to achieve certain efficiencies in the distribution of his products. * * * Established manufacturers can use them to induce retailers to engage in promotional activities or to provide service and repair facilities necessary to the efficient marketing of their products. * * * The availability and quality of such services affect a manufacturer's goodwill and the competitiveness of his product. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * When anticompetitive effects are shown to result from particular vertical restrictions, they can be adequately policed under the rule of reason * * * .

● Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court upheld the appellate court's reversal of the district court's decision. Sylvania's vertical system, which was not price restrictive, did not constitute a per se violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act.

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law The decision in this case generally is regarded as one of the most important antitrust cases since the 1940s. It marked a definite shift from rigid characterization of these kinds of vertical restraints as per se violations to a more flexible, economic analysis under the rule of reason. Today's courts follow the precedent laid down in this case and apply the rule of reason to territorial and customer restrictions.

● The E-Commerce Dimension How does the Internet benefit competition without encouraging violations of the antitrust laws?

Resale Price Maintenance Agreements

An agreement between a manufacturer and a distributor or retailer in which the manufacturer specifies what the retail prices of its products must be is known as a resale price maintenance agreement. Such agreements were once considered to be per se violations of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, but in 1997 the United States Supreme Court ruled that maximum resale price maintenance agreements should be judged under the rule of reason.¹¹ In these agreements, the manufacturer sets a maximum price that retailers and distributors can charge for its products.

The question before the Supreme Court in the following case was whether minimum resale price maintenance agreements should be treated as per se unlawful.

The rule of reason is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of [Section] 1 [of the Sherman Act]. * * *

*Resort to per se rules is confined to restraints * * * that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output. To justify a per se prohibition a restraint must have manifestly anticompetitive effects, and lack * * * any redeeming virtue.* [Emphasis added.]

As a consequence, the per se rule is appropriate only after courts have had considerable experience with the type of restraint at issue, and only if courts can predict with confidence that it would be invalidated in all or almost all instances under the rule of reason. * * *

The reasoning of the Court's more recent jurisprudence has rejected the rationales on which [the application of the per se rule to minimum resale price maintenance agreements] was based. * * * [These rationales were] based on formalistic legal doctrine rather than demonstrable economic effect. * * *

* * * [F]urthermore [the Court] treated vertical agreements a manufacturer makes with its distributors as analogous to a horizontal combination among competing distributors. * * * Our recent cases formulate antitrust principles in accordance with the appreciated differences in economic effect between vertical and horizontal agreements * * * .
* * * *

The justifications for vertical price restraints are similar to those for other vertical restraints. *Minimum resale price maintenance can stimulate interbrand competition * * * by reducing intra-brand competition * * * .* The promotion of interbrand competition is important because the primary purpose of the antitrust laws is to protect this type of competition. * * * Resale price maintenance also has the potential to give consumers more options so that they can choose among low-price, low-service brands; high-price, high-service brands; and brands that fall in between. [Emphasis added.]
* * * *

While vertical agreements setting minimum resale prices can have procompetitive justifications, they may have anticompetitive effects in other cases; and unlawful price fixing, designed solely to obtain monopoly profits, is an ever present temptation. * * *

Notwithstanding the risks of unlawful conduct, it cannot be stated with any degree of confidence that resale price maintenance always or almost always tends to restrict competition and decrease output. Vertical agreements establishing minimum resale prices can have either procompetitive or anticompetitive effects, depending upon the circumstances in which they are formed. * * * As the [per se] rule would proscribe a significant amount of procompetitive conduct, these agreements appear ill suited for per se condemnation.
* * * *

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

 QUESTIONS

1. Should the Court have applied the doctrine of stare decisis to hold that minimum resale price maintenance agreements are still subject to the per se rule? Why or why not?
2. What factors might the courts consider in applying the rule of reason to minimum resale price maintenance agreements?

Section 2 of the Sherman Act

Section 1 of the Sherman Act proscribes certain concerted, or joint, activities that restrain trade. In contrast, Section 2 condemns “every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize.” Thus, two distinct types of behavior are subject to sanction under Section 2: monopolization and attempts to monopolize. A tactic that may be involved in either offense is predatory pricing. Predatory pricing occurs when one firm (the predator) attempts to drive its competitors from the market by selling its product at prices substantially below the normal costs of production. Once the competitors are eliminated, the predator will raise its prices far above their competitive levels to recapture its losses and earn high profits.

Monopolization

The United States Supreme Court has defined monopolization as involving the following two elements: “(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of the power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.”¹² A violation of Section 2 requires that both of these elements—monopoly power and an intent to monopolize—be established.

Monopoly Power The Sherman Act does not define monopoly. In economic parlance, monopoly refers to control of a specific market by a single entity. It is well established in antitrust law, however, that a firm may be a monopolist even though it is not the sole seller in a market. Additionally, size alone does not determine whether a firm is a monopoly. For example, a “mom and pop” grocery located in an isolated desert town is a monopolist if it is the only grocery serving that particular market. Size in relation to the market is what matters because monopoly involves the power to affect prices and output.

Monopoly power may be proved by direct evidence that the firm used its power to control prices and restrict output.¹³ Usually, however, there is not enough evidence to show that the firm was intentionally controlling prices, so the plaintiff has to offer indirect, or circumstantial, evidence of monopoly power. To prove monopoly power indirectly, the plaintiff must show that the firm has a dominant share of the relevant market and that there are significant barriers for new competitors entering that market.

Relevant Market Before a court can determine whether a firm has a dominant market share, it must define the relevant market. The relevant market consists of two elements: (1) a relevant product market and (2) a relevant geographic market.

Relevant Product Market. The relevant product market includes all products that, although produced by different firms, have identical attributes, such as sugar. It also includes products that are reasonably interchangeable for the purpose for which they are produced. Products will be considered reasonably interchangeable if consumers treat them as acceptable substitutes.¹⁴

What should the relevant product market include? This is often the key issue in monopolization cases because the way the market is defined may determine whether a firm has monopoly power. For example, in 2007, the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) filed a Section 2 claim against Whole Foods Market, Inc., which owns a nationwide chain of natural and organic food stores. The FTC was seeking to prevent Whole Foods from merging with Wild Oats Markets, Inc., its main competitor in nationwide high-end organic food supermarkets.

The FTC argued that the relevant product market consisted of only “premium natural and organic supermarkets (PNOS)” rather than all supermarkets. By defining the product market narrowly, the degree of a firm’s market power is enhanced. A federal court disagreed with the FTC, however, and held that the relevant product market was all supermarkets, not just PNOS. Because the proposed merger would not create a monopoly or substantially lessen competition in all supermarkets, the FTC could not block the merger.¹⁵

Relevant Geographic Market. The second component of the relevant market is the geographic area in which the firm and its competitors sell the product or services. For products that are sold nationwide, the geographic boundaries of the market can encompass the entire United States. If a producer and its competitors sell in only a limited area (one in which customers have no access to other sources of the product), then the geographic market is limited to that area. A national firm may thus compete in several distinct areas and have monopoly power in one geographic area but not in another.

Consider one such example: Clear Channel Communications, Inc., owns numerous radio stations and promotes and books concert tours. Malinda Heerwagen, who had attended various rock concerts in Chicago, Illinois, filed a lawsuit against Clear Channel alleging violations of Section 2. Heerwagen claimed that the company had used anticompetitive practices to acquire and maintain monopoly power in a national ticket market for live rock concerts, causing audiences to pay inflated prices for the tickets. Heerwagen argued that because Clear Channel sold tickets nationwide, the geographic market was the entire United States. The court, however, ruled that even though Clear Channel sold tickets nationally, the relevant market for concert tickets was local. The court reasoned that “[a] purchaser of a concert ticket is hardly likely to look outside of her own area, even if the price for tickets has increased inside her region and decreased for the same tour in other places.”¹⁶

The Intent Requirement Monopoly power, in and of itself, does not constitute the offense of monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act. The offense also requires an intent to monopolize. A dominant market share may be the result of good business judgment or the development of a superior product. It may simply be the result of historical accident. In these situations, the acquisition of monopoly power is not an antitrust violation.

If, however, a firm possesses market power as a result of carrying out some purposeful act to acquire or maintain that power through anticompetitive means, then it is in violation of Section 2. In most monopolization cases, intent may be inferred from evidence that the firm had monopoly power and engaged in anticompetitive behavior.

When Navigator, the first popular graphical Internet browser, used Java technology that was able to run on a variety of platforms, Microsoft Corporation perceived a threat to its dominance in the operating-system market. Microsoft developed a competing browser, Internet Explorer, and then began to require computer makers that wanted to install Windows to also install Explorer and exclude Navigator. Microsoft also included codes in Windows that would cripple the operating system if Explorer was deleted and paid Internet service providers to distribute Explorer and exclude Navigator. Because of this pattern of exclusionary conduct, a court found that Microsoft was guilty of monopolization. The court reasoned that Microsoft’s pattern of conduct could be rational only if the firm knew that it possessed monopoly power.¹⁷

Refusals to Deal As discussed previously, joint refusals to deal (group boycotts) are subject to close scrutiny under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. A single manufacturer acting unilaterally, though, normally is free to deal, or not to deal, with whomever it wishes. In vertical arrangements, a manufacturer can refuse to deal with retailers or dealers that cut prices to levels substantially below the manufacturer’s suggested retail prices.¹⁸

Nevertheless, in some instances, a unilateral refusal to deal will violate antitrust laws. These instances involve offenses proscribed under Section 2 of the Sherman Act and occur only if (1) the firm refusing to deal has—or is likely to acquire—monopoly power and (2) the refusal is likely to have an anticompetitive effect on a particular market. For example, the owner of three of the four major downhill ski areas in Aspen, Colorado, refused to continue participating in a jointly offered six-day “all Aspen” lift ticket. The Supreme Court ruled that the owner’s refusal to cooperate with its smaller competitor was a violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act. Because the company owned three-fourths of the local ski areas, it had monopoly power, and thus its unilateral refusal had an anticompetitive effect on the market.¹⁹

Attempts to Monopolize

Section 2 also prohibits attempted monopolization of a market. Any action challenged as an attempt to monopolize must have been specifically intended to exclude competitors and garner monopoly power. The attempt must also have had a “dangerous” probability of success—only serious threats of monopolization are condemned as violations. The probability cannot be dangerous unless the alleged offender possesses some degree of market power.²⁰

As mentioned earlier, predatory pricing is a form of anticompetitive conduct that is commonly used by firms that are attempting to monopolize. In 2007, the United States Supreme Court ruled that predatory bidding, which is similar but involves the exercise of market power on the market’s buy, or input, side, should be analyzed under the same standards as predatory pricing.²¹ In predatory bidding, a firm deliberately bids up the prices of inputs to prevent its competitors from obtaining sufficient supplies to manufacture their products. To succeed in a predatory pricing (or predatory bidding) claim, a plaintiff must prove that the alleged predator has a “dangerous probability of recouping its investment in below-cost pricing” because low prices alone often stimulate competition. (Note that predatory pricing may also lead to claims of price discrimination, to be discussed shortly.)

The Clayton Act

In 1914, Congress enacted the Clayton Act. The Clayton Act was aimed at specific anticompetitive or monopolistic practices that the Sherman Act did not cover. The substantive provisions of the act deal with four distinct forms of business behavior, which are declared illegal but not criminal. For each of the four provisions, the act states that the behavior is illegal only if it tends to substantially lessen competition or to create monopoly power. The major offenses under the Clayton Act are set out in Sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of the act.

Price Discrimination

Section 2 of the Clayton Act prohibits price discrimination, which occurs when a seller charges different prices to competing buyers for identical goods or services. Congress strengthened this section by amending it with the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act in 1936. As amended, Section 2 prohibits direct and indirect price discrimination that cannot be justified by differences in production costs, transportation costs, or cost differences due to other reasons. In short, a seller is prohibited from reducing a price to one buyer below the price charged to that buyer’s competitor.

Required Elements To violate Section 2, the seller must be engaged in interstate commerce, the goods must be of like grade and quality, and goods must have been sold to two or more purchasers. In addition, the effect of the price discrimination must be to substantially lessen competition, to tend to create a monopoly, or to otherwise injure competition. Without proof of an actual injury resulting from the price discrimination, the plaintiff cannot recover damages.

Note that price discrimination claims can arise from discounts, offsets, rebates, or allowances given to one buyer over another. Moreover, giving favorable credit terms, delivery, or freight charges to only some buyers can also lead to allegations of price discrimination. For example, offering goods to different customers at the same price but including free delivery for certain buyers may violate Section 2 in some circumstances.

Defenses There are several statutory defenses to liability for price discrimination.

1. Cost justification. If the seller can justify the price reduction by demonstrating that a particular buyer’s purchases saved the seller costs in producing and selling the goods, the seller will not be liable for price discrimination.
2. Meeting the price of competition. If the seller charged the lower price in a good faith attempt to meet an equally low price of a competitor, the seller will not be liable for price discrimination. For example, Water Craft was a retail dealership of Mercury Marine outboard motors in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Mercury Marine also sold its motors to other dealers in the Baton Rouge area. When Water Craft discovered that Mercury was selling its outboard motors at a substantial discount to Water Craft’s largest competitor, it filed a price discrimination lawsuit against Mercury. In this situation, the court held that Mercury Marine had shown that the discounts given to Water Craft’s competitor were made in good faith to meet the low price charged by another manufacturer of marine motors.²²

3. Changing market conditions. A seller may lower its price on an item in response to changing conditions affecting the market for or the marketability of the goods concerned. Sellers are allowed to readjust their prices to meet the realities of the market without liability for price discrimination. Thus, if an advance in technology makes a particular product less marketable than it was previously, a seller can lower the product's price.

Exclusionary Practices

Under Section 3 of the Clayton Act, sellers or lessors cannot sell or lease goods “on the condition, agreement or understanding that the . . . purchaser or lessee thereof shall not use or deal in the goods . . . of a competitor or competitors of the seller.” In effect, this section prohibits two types of vertical agreements involving exclusionary practices—exclusive-dealing contracts and tying arrangements.

Exclusive-Dealing Contracts A contract under which a seller forbids a buyer to purchase products from the seller's competitors is called an exclusive-dealing contract. A seller is prohibited from making an exclusive-dealing contract under Section 3 if the effect of the contract is “to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.”

The United States Supreme Court's 1949 decision in the case of Standard Oil Co. of California v. United States provides a classic illustration of exclusive dealing.²³ In this case, the then-largest gasoline seller in the nation made exclusive-dealing contracts with independent stations in seven western states. The contracts involved 16 percent of all retail outlets, whose sales were approximately 7 percent of all retail sales in that market. The Court noted that the market was substantially concentrated because the seven largest gasoline suppliers all used exclusive-dealing contracts with their independent retailers and together controlled 65 percent of the market. Looking at market conditions after the arrangements were instituted, the Court found that market shares were extremely stable, and entry into the market was apparently restricted. Thus, the Court held that the Clayton Act had been violated because competition was “foreclosed in a substantial share” of the relevant market.

22. Water Craft Management, LLC v. Mercury Marine, 457 F.3d 484 (5th Cir. 2006).

23. 337 U.S. 293, 69 S.Ct. 1051, 93 L.Ed. 1371 (1949).

Note that since the Supreme Court's 1949 decision in the Standard Oil case, a number of subsequent decisions have called the holding in this case into doubt.²⁴ Today, it is clear that to violate antitrust law, the effect of an exclusive-dealing agreement (or a tying arrangement, discussed next) must qualitatively and substantially harm competition. To prevail, a plaintiff must present affirmative evidence that the performance of the agreement will foreclose competition and harm consumers.

Tying Arrangements In a tying arrangement, or tie-in sales agreement, a seller conditions the sale of a product (the tying product) on the buyer's agreement to purchase another product (the tied product) produced or distributed by the same seller. The legality of a tie-in agreement depends on many factors, particularly the purpose of the agreement and the agreement's likely effect on competition in the relevant markets (the market for the tying product and the market for the tied product).

In 1936, for example, the United States Supreme Court held that International Business Machines and Remington Rand had violated Section 3 of the Clayton Act by requiring the purchase of their own machine cards (the tied product) as a condition to the leasing of their tabulation machines (the tying product). Because only these two firms sold completely automated tabulation machines, the Court concluded that each possessed market power sufficient to “substantially lessen competition” through the tying arrangements.²⁵

Section 3 of the Clayton Act has been held to apply only to commodities, not to services. Tying arrangements, however, can also be considered agreements that restrain trade in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Thus, cases involving tying arrangements of services have been brought under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. Although earlier cases condemned tying arrangements as illegal per se, courts now evaluate tying agreements under the rule of reason.

When an arrangement ties patented and unpatented products, can the relevant market and the patent holder's power in that market be presumed without proof? That was the question in the following case.

• Background and Facts Illinois Tool Works, Inc., in Glenview, Illinois, owns Trident, Inc. The firms make printing systems that include three components: a patented inkjet printhead; a patented ink container that attaches to the printhead; and specially designed, but unpatented, ink. They sell the systems to original equipment manufacturers (OEMs) that incorporate the systems into printers that are sold to other companies to use in printing bar codes on packaging materials. As part of each deal, the OEMs agree to buy ink exclusively from Illinois and Trident and not to refill the patented containers with ink of any kind. Independent Ink, Inc., in Gardena, California, sells ink with the same chemical composition as Illinois and Trident's product at lower prices. Independent filed a suit in a federal district court against Illinois and Trident, alleging, among other things, that they were engaged in illegal tying in violation of the Sherman Act. Independent filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that because the defendants owned patents in their products, market power could be presumed. The court issued a summary judgment in the defendants' favor, holding that market power could not be presumed. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit reversed this judgment. Illinois and Trident appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT Justice STEVENS delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

American courts first encountered tying arrangements in the course of patent infringement litigation [in 1912]. * * *

In the years since [1912], four different rules of law have supported challenges to tying arrangements. They have been condemned as improper extensions of the patent monopoly under the patent misuse doctrine, as unfair methods of competition under [Section] 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, as contracts tending to create a monopoly under [Section] 3 of the Clayton Act, and as contracts in restraint of trade under [Section] 1 of the Sherman Act. In all of those instances, the justification for the challenge rested on either an assumption or a showing that the defendant's position of power in the market for the tying product was being used to restrain competition in the market for the tied product. * * * [T]he essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either [does] not want at all, or might [prefer] to purchase elsewhere on different terms.

Over the years, however, this Court's strong disapproval of tying arrangements has substantially diminished. Rather than relying on assumptions, in its more recent opinions the Court has required a showing of market power in the tying product. * * *

* * * *

* * * [T]he presumption that a patent confers market power arose outside the antitrust context as part of the patent misuse doctrine. * * *

Without any analysis of actual market conditions, [the] patent misuse [doctrine] assumed that, by tying the purchase of unpatented goods to the sale of [a] patented good, the patentee was restraining competition or securing a limited monopoly of an unpatented material. In other words, [the doctrine] presumed the requisite economic power over the tying product such that the patentee could extend its economic control to unpatented products.

* * * *

Although the patent misuse doctrine and our antitrust jurisprudence became intertwined in [a case decided in 1947], subsequent events initiated their untwining. * * *

* * * *

Shortly thereafter, Congress * * * excluded some conduct, such as a tying arrangement involving the sale of a patented product tied to an "essential" or "nonstaple" product that has no use *except as part of the patented product or method, from the scope of the patent misuse doctrine. Thus, * * * Congress began chipping away at the assumption in the patent misuse context from whence it came. [Emphasis added.]*

It is Congress' most recent narrowing of the patent misuse defense * * * that is directly relevant to this case. * * * [In 1988] Congress amended the [patent laws] to eliminate [the patent-equals-market-power] presumption in the patent misuse context. * * *

While the 1988 amendment does not expressly refer to the antitrust laws, it certainly invites a reappraisal of the per se rule * * *. [G]iven the fact that the patent misuse doctrine provided the basis for the market power presumption, it would be anomalous to preserve the presumption in antitrust after Congress has eliminated its foundation.

After considering the congressional judgment reflected in the 1988 amendment, we conclude that tying arrangements involving patented products should be evaluated under [such factors as those that apply in a rule-of-reason analysis] rather than under the per se rule * * *. While some such arrangements are still unlawful, such as those that are the product of a true monopoly or a marketwide conspiracy, that conclusion must be supported by proof of power in the relevant market rather than by a mere presumption thereof.

● Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court vacated the judgment of the lower court and remanded the case to the trial court to give Independent "a fair opportunity" to offer evidence of the relevant market and the defendants' power within it. The Supreme Court ruled that a plaintiff that alleges an illegal tying arrangement involving a patented product must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product. A company that holds a patent in a product does not automatically possess market power in that product for antitrust purposes.

● The Ethical Dimension What are the ethical values underpinning antitrust laws, and why are those laws applied to tying arrangements in particular?

● The Legal Environment Dimension In light of the factors that a court considers under the rule of reason, how might the court rule on remand in the Illinois case? Explain.

Mergers

Under Section 7 of the Clayton Act, a person or business organization cannot hold stock or assets in more than one business when "the effect . . . may be to substantially lessen competition." Section 7 is the statutory authority for preventing mergers that could result in monopoly power or a substantial lessening of competition in the marketplace. Section 7 applies to both horizontal and vertical mergers, as discussed in the following subsections.

A crucial consideration in most merger cases is market concentration. Determining market concentration involves allocating percentage market shares among the various companies in the relevant market. When a small number of companies share a large part of the market, the market is concentrated. For example, if the four largest grocery stores in Chicago accounted for 80 percent of all retail food sales, the market clearly would be concentrated in those four firms. Competition is not necessarily diminished solely as a result of market concentration, however, and other factors must be considered to determine if a merger violates Section 7. One factor of particular importance is whether the merger will make it more difficult for potential competitors to enter the relevant market.

Horizontal Mergers Mergers between firms that compete with each other in the same market are called horizontal mergers. If a horizontal merger creates an entity with a resulting significant market share, the merger may be presumed illegal. This is because of the United States Supreme Court's interpretation that Congress, in amending Section 7 of the Clayton Act in 1950, intended to prevent mergers that increase market concentration.²⁶ Three other factors that the courts also consider in analyzing the legality of a horizontal merger are the overall concentration of the relevant market, the relevant market's history of tending toward concentration, and whether the merger is apparently designed to establish market power or restrict competition.

The Federal Trade Commission and the U.S. Department of Justice have established guidelines indicating which mergers will be challenged. Under the guidelines, the first factor to be considered is the degree of concentration in the relevant market. Other factors to be considered include the ease of entry into the relevant market, economic efficiency, the financial condition of the merging firms, and the nature and price of the product or products involved. If a firm is a leading one—having at least a 35 percent share and twice that of the next leading firm—any merger with a firm having as little as a 1 percent share will be closely scrutinized.

Vertical Mergers A vertical merger occurs when a company at one stage of production acquires a company at a higher or lower stage of production. An example of a vertical merger is a company merging with one of its suppliers or retailers. Courts in the past have almost exclusively focused on “foreclosure” in assessing vertical mergers. Foreclosure occurs when competitors of the merging firms lose opportunities to either sell products to or buy products from the merging firms.

In one early case, for example, du Pont was challenged for acquiring a considerable amount of General Motors (GM) stock. The United States Supreme Court held that the transaction was illegal. The Court noted that the stock acquisition would enable du Pont to prevent other sellers of fabrics and finishes from selling to GM, which then accounted for 50 percent of all auto fabric and finishes purchases.²⁷
