

The College Freshmen's Google Books

OFWGKTA
The free library

DO NOT CLICK ME

Find us on Facebook

DO NOT CLICK ME

DO NOT CLICK ME

Sign up for our mailing list for more goodies

Be sure to make the grade—Utilize all the tools on the Web . . .

Visit the Companion Web Site for Business Law, Eleventh Edition at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

This text's Web site has a wealth of supporting material for students:

- Video clips from Business Law Digital Video Library tied to the in-text Video Questions
- A sample answer for each Case Problem with Sample Answer
- Interactive quizzes for every chapter
- Internet research exercises for every chapter
- Court case updates
- Links to Web sites discussed in the text's Law on the Web features
- Links to CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System
- Legal reference materials such as links to selected statutes
- And much more!

... and all the study and review tools in the Study Guide

The student Study Guide, prepared by the text author Roger LeRoy Miller and William Eric Hollowell, is a valuable study and review tool. It contains the following helpful chapter-by-chapter features:

- A brief chapter introduction and chapter outline
- True-false, fill-in-the-blank, and multiple-choice questions as well as short essay problems to help you test yourself and prepare for exams
- Issue spotters
- A separate appendix at the end of the Study Guide containing answers to all questions and issue spotters

If your bookstore does not carry this Study Guide (ISBN 0-324-40196-5), you can order it directly online by visiting the "bookstore" at this text's Companion Web site academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

BUSINESS LAW

Text and Cases

LEGAL, ETHICAL, GLOBAL,
AND E-COMMERCE ENVIRONMENTS

ELEVENTH EDITION

Kenneth W. Clarkson
University of Miami

Roger LeRoy Miller
Institute for University Studies
Arlington, Texas

Gaylord A. Jentz
Herbert D. Kelleher
Emeritus Professor in Business Law
University of Texas at Austin

Frank B. Cross
Herbert D. Kelleher
Centennial Professor in Business Law
University of Texas at Austin

Australia • Brazil • Japan • Korea • Mexico • Singapore • Spain • United Kingdom • United States

BUSINESS LAW, 11th Edition TEXT & CASES
Legal, Ethical, Global,
and E-Commerce Environments

Kenneth W. Clarkson

Roger LeRoy Miller

Gaylord A. Jentz

Frank B. Cross

Vice President and Editorial Director: Jack Calhoun

Editor-in-Chief: Rob Dewey

Acquisitions Editor: Vicky True

Senior Developmental Editor: Jan Lamar

Executive Marketing Manager: Lisa L. Lysne

Marketing Manager: Jennifer Garamy

Marketing Coordinator: Gretchen Wildauer

Associate Marketing Communications Manager: Jill Schleibaum

Production Manager: Bill Stryker

Technology Project Manager: Kristen Meere

Manufacturing Buyer: Kevin Kluck

Composer: Parkwood Composition
New Richmond, WI

Senior Art Director: Michelle Kunkler

Internal Designer: Bill Stryker

Cover Designer: Jen2Design, Cincinnati, OH

Website Coordinator: Brian Courter

© 2009, 2006 South-Western, Cengage Learning

ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. No part of this work covered by the copyright herein may be reproduced, transmitted, stored or used in any form or by any means graphic, electronic, or mechanical, including but not limited to photocopying, recording, scanning, digitizing, taping, Web distribution, information networks, or information storage and retrieval systems, except as permitted under Section 107 or 108 of the 1976 United States Copyright Act, without the prior written permission of the publisher.

For product information and technology assistance, contact us at Cengage Learning Academic Resource Center, 1-800-423-0563

For permission to use material from this text or product, submit all requests online at www.cengage.com/permissions

Further permissions questions can be emailed to permissionrequest@cengage.com

ExamView® and ExamView Pro® are registered trademarks of FSCreations, Inc. Windows is a registered trademark of the Microsoft Corporation used herein under license. Macintosh and Power Macintosh are registered trademarks of Apple Computer, Inc. used herein under license.

© 2009, 2006 Cengage Learning. All Rights Reserved.
Cengage Learning WebTutor™ is a trademark of Cengage Learning.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2008921490

Student's Edition:
ISBN-13: 978-0-324-65522-3
ISBN-10: 0-324-65522-3

Instructor's Edition:
ISBN-13: 978-0-324-65531-5
ISBN-10: 0-324-65531-2

South-Western Cengage Learning
5191 Natorp Blvd.
Mason, OH 45040
USA

Cengage Learning products are represented in Canada by Nelson Education, Ltd.

For your course and learning solutions, visit academic.cengage.com Purchase any of our products at your local college store or at our preferred online store www.ichapters.com

UNIT ONE	THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT OF BUSINESS	1
Chapter 1	Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning	2
Chapter 2	Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution	30
Chapter 3	Court Procedures	53
Chapter 4	Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business	77
Chapter 5	Ethics and Business Decision Making	99
UNIT TWO	TORTS AND CRIMES	121
Chapter 6	Intentional Torts	122
Chapter 7	Negligence and Strict Liability	144
Chapter 8	Intellectual Property and Internet Law	157
Chapter 9	Criminal Law and Cyber Crime	184
UNIT THREE	CONTRACTS AND E-CONTRACTS	215
Chapter 10	Nature and Terminology	216
Chapter 11	Agreement	232
Chapter 12	Consideration	250
Chapter 13	Capacity and Legality	265
Chapter 14	Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent	286
Chapter 15	The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement	303
Chapter 16	Third Party Rights	321
Chapter 17	Performance and Discharge	337
Chapter 18	Breach of Contract and Remedies	353
Chapter 19	E-Contracts and E-Signatures	370
UNIT FOUR	DOMESTIC AND INTERNATIONAL SALES AND LEASE CONTRACTS	391
Chapter 20	The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts	392
Chapter 21	Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest	421
Chapter 22	Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts	437
Chapter 23	Warranties and Product Liability	458
UNIT FIVE	NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS	485
Chapter 24	The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments	486
Chapter 25	Transferability and Holder in Due Course	504
Chapter 26	Liability, Defenses, and Discharge	523
Chapter 27	Checks and Banking in the Digital Age	544
UNIT SIX	CREDITORS' RIGHTS AND BANKRUPTCY	573
Chapter 28	Creditors' Rights and Remedies	574
Chapter 29	Secured Transactions	586
Chapter 30	Bankruptcy Law	611

UNIT SEVEN AGENCY AND EMPLOYMENT 637

Chapter 31	Agency Formation and Duties	638
Chapter 32	Liability to Third Parties and Termination	653
Chapter 33	Employment and Labor Law	673
Chapter 34	Employment Discrimination	696

UNIT EIGHT BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS 723

Chapter 35	Sole Proprietorships and Franchises	724
Chapter 36	Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships	737
Chapter 37	Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms	759
Chapter 38	CORPORATIONS—Formation and Financing	773
Chapter 39	CORPORATIONS—Directors, Officers, and Shareholders	796
Chapter 40	CORPORATIONS—Merger, Consolidation, and Termination	819
Chapter 41	CORPORATIONS—Securities Law and Corporate Governance	836
Chapter 42	Law for Small Businesses	862

UNIT NINE GOVERNMENT REGULATION 885

Chapter 43	Administrative Law	886
Chapter 44	Consumer Law	905
Chapter 45	Environmental Law	921
Chapter 46	Antitrust Law	938

UNIT TEN PROPERTY 959

Chapter 47	Personal Property and Bailments	960
Chapter 48	Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Relationships	980

UNIT ELEVEN SPECIAL TOPICS 1007

Chapter 49	Insurance	1008
Chapter 50	Wills and Trusts	1027
Chapter 51	Professional Liability and Accountability	1048
Chapter 52	International Law in a Global Economy	1068

APPENDICES

A	How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems	A-1
B	The Constitution of the United States	A-4
C	The Uniform Commercial Code	A-12
D	The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (Excerpts)	A-176
E	The Uniform Partnership Act (Excerpts)	A-180
F	The Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (Excerpts)	A-190
G	The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (Excerpts)	A-200
H	The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (Excerpts and Explanatory Comments)	A-210
I	Sample Answers for End-of-Chapter Questions with Sample Answer	A-218

GLOSSARY G-1TABLE OF CASES TC-1*INDEX I-1

The Legal Environment of Business 1

Chapter 1

Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning 2

- Schools of Jurisprudential Thought 2
- Business Activities and the Legal Environment 4
- Sources of American Law 6
- The Common Law Tradition 7
- The Common Law Today 13
- Classifications of Law 14
- How to Find Primary Sources of Law 15
- How to Read and Understand Case Law 21
- REVIEWING: INTRODUCTION TO LAW AND LEGAL REASONING 27
- TERMS AND CONCEPTS 27
- QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 28
- LAW ON THE WEB 29
- LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 29

Chapter 2

Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution 30

- The Judiciary's Role in American Government 30
- Basic Judicial Requirements 31
- CASE 2.1 Mastondrea v. Occidental Hotels Management S.A. 32
- The State and Federal Court Systems 37
- Alternative Dispute Resolution 41
- CASE 2.2 Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna 44
- EXTENDED CASE 2.3 Morrison v. Circuit City Stores, Inc. 46
- International Dispute Resolution 48
- REVIEWING: COURTS AND ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION 49
- TERMS AND CONCEPTS 49
- QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 50
- LAW ON THE WEB 52
- LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 52

Chapter 3

Court Procedures 53

- Procedural Rules 53
- Pretrial Procedures 55
- EXTENDED CASE 3.1 Cruz v. Fagor America, Inc. 58
- CASE 3.2 Computer Task Group, Inc. v. Brothby 62
- The Trial 66
- CASE 3.3 Novak v. Tucows, Inc. 68
- Posttrial Motions 70
- The Appeal 71
- Enforcing the Judgment 72
- REVIEWING: COURT PROCEDURES 73
- TERMS AND CONCEPTS 73
- QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 74
- SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: CRUZ V. FAGOR AMERICA, INC. 75
- LAW ON THE WEB 76
- LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 76

Chapter 4

Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business 77

- The Constitutional Powers of Government 77
- CASE 4.1 Granholm v. Heald 80
- Business and the Bill of Rights 83
- CASE 4.2 Bad Frog Brewery, Inc. v. New York State Liquor Authority 87
- EXTENDED CASE 4.3 Lott v. Levitt 88
- Due Process and Equal Protection 92
- Privacy Rights 94
- REVIEWING: CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY TO REGULATE BUSINESS 95
- TERMS AND CONCEPTS 95
- QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 96
- SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: LOTT V. LEVITT 97
- LAW ON THE WEB 98
- LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 98

Chapter 5

Ethics and Business Decision Making 99

- Business Ethics 99

EXTENDED CASE 5.1	Baum v. Blue Moon Ventures, LLC	101
Approaches to Ethical Reasoning 103
CASE 5.2	Fog Cutter Capital Group, Inc. v. Securities and Exchange Commission	104
How the Law Influences Business Ethics 106
CASE 5.3	Guin v. Brazos Higher Education Service Corp.	109
Making Ethical Business Decisions 110
Business Ethics on a Global Level 111
REVIEWING: ETHICS AND BUSINESS DECISION MAKING		113
TERMS AND CONCEPTS		113
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS		114
LAW ON THE WEB		116
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB		116
	FOCUS ON ETHICS: ETHICS AND THE LEGAL ENVIRONMENT OF BUSINESS	117

2 Torts and Crimes 121

Chapter 6 Intentional Torts 122

The Basis of Tort Law		122
Intentional Torts against Persons		123
CASE 6.1	Anderson v. Mergenhagen	128
Business Torts		131
Intentional Torts against Property		133
EXTENDED CASE 6.2	Register.com, Inc. v. Verio, Inc.	134
Cyber Torts		136
CASE 6.3	Fair Housing Council of San Fernando Valley v. Roommate.com, LLC	137
REVIEWING: INTENTIONAL TORTS		140
TERMS AND CONCEPTS		140
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS		141
LAW ON THE WEB		143
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB		143

Chapter 7 Negligence and Strict Liability 144

Negligence		144
CASE 7.1	Izquierdo v. Gyroscope, Inc.	145
CASE 7.2	Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co.	148
Defenses to Negligence		149
EXTENDED CASE 7.3	Sutton v. Eastern New York Youth Soccer Association, Inc.	150
Special Negligence Doctrines and Statutes		152

Strict Liability		153
REVIEWING: NEGLIGENCE AND STRICT LIABILITY		154
TERMS AND CONCEPTS		154
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS		155
SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: SUTTON V. EASTERN NEW YORK YOUTH SOCCER ASSOCIATION, INC.		156
LAW ON THE WEB		156
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB		156

Chapter 8 Intellectual Property and Internet Law 157

Trademarks and Related Property		157
CASE 8.1	The Coca-Cola Co. v. The Koke Co. of America	158
CASE 8.2	Menashe v. V Secret Catalogue, Inc.	161
Cyber Marks		164
Patents		167
EXTENDED CASE 8.3	KSR International Co. v. Teleflex Inc.	168
Copyrights		171
Copyrights in Digital Information		172
CASE 8.4	Sony BMG Music Entertainment v. Villarreal	176
Trade Secrets		178
International Protection for Intellectual Property		179
REVIEWING: INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY AND INTERNET LAW		180
TERMS AND CONCEPTS		180
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS		181
LAW ON THE WEB		183
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB		183

Chapter 9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime 184

Civil Law and Criminal Law		184
Classification of Crimes		185
Criminal Liability		186
Types of Crimes		188
CASE 9.1	United States v. Lyons	190
Defenses to Criminal Liability		193
Criminal Procedures		198
EXTENDED CASE 9.2	Fellers v. United States	198
CASE 9.3	Miranda v. Arizona	200
Cyber Crime		204
REVIEWING: CRIMINAL LAW AND CYBER CRIME		207
TERMS AND CONCEPTS		207
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS		208
LAW ON THE WEB		210
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB		210

FOCUS ON ETHICS: ETHICS AND TORTS AND CRIMES 211

Contracts and E-Contracts 215

Chapter 10

Nature and Terminology 216

An Overview of Contract Law 216

Elements of a Contract 217

Types of Contracts 218

CASE 10.1 Ardito v. City of Providence 219

CASE 10.2 Gary Porter Construction v. Fox Construction, Inc. 221

Quasi Contracts 224

Interpretation of Contracts 225

EXTENDED CASE 10.3 Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc. 226

REVIEWING: NATURE AND TERMINOLOGY 228

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 229

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 229

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: WAGNER V. COLUMBIA PICTURES INDUSTRIES, INC. 231

LAW ON THE WEB 231

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 231

Chapter 11

Agreement 232

Requirements of the Offer 232

CASE 11.1 Lucy v. Zehmer 233

CASE 11.2 Trell v. American Association of the Advancement of Science 235

EXTENDED CASE 11.3 Baer v. Chase 237

Termination of the Offer 239

Acceptance 242

Technology and Acceptance Rules 246

REVIEWING: AGREEMENT 246

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 246

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 247

LAW ON THE WEB 249

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 249

Chapter 12

Consideration 250

Elements of Consideration 250

CASE 12.1 Hamer v. Sidway 250

CASE 12.2 Barfield v. Commerce Bank, N.A. 252

Adequacy of Consideration 253

Agreements That Lack Consideration 254

EXTENDED CASE 12.3 Blackmon v. Iverson 255

Settlement of Claims 257

Exceptions to the Consideration Requirement 259

REVIEWING: CONSIDERATION 261

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 262

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 262

LAW ON THE WEB 264

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 264

Chapter 13

Capacity and Legality 265

Contractual Capacity 265

EXTENDED CASE 13.1 Yale Diagnostic Radiology v. Estate of Harun Fountain 267

Legality 271

CASE 13.2 Stultz v. Safety and Compliance Management, Inc. 274

CASE 13.3 Thibodeau v. Comcast Corp. 277

REVIEWING: CAPACITY AND LEGALITY 282

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 282

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 283

LAW ON THE WEB 285

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 285

Chapter 14

Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent 286

Mistakes 286

EXTENDED CASE 14.1 Roberts v. Century Contractors, Inc. 287

Fraudulent Misrepresentation 290

CASE 14.2 Vokes v. Arthur Murray, Inc. 290

Undue Influence 295

Duress 296

Adhesion Contracts and Unconscionability 296

CASE 14.3 Simpson v. MSA of Myrtle Beach, Inc. 297

REVIEWING: MISTAKES, FRAUD, AND VOLUNTARY CONSENT 299

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 300

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 300

LAW ON THE WEB 302

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 302

Chapter 15

The Statute of Frauds— Writing Requirement 303

The Origins of the Statute of Frauds 303

Contracts That Fall within the Statute of Frauds 303

EXTENDED CASE 15.1 Sawyer v. Mills 305

CASE 15.2 School-Link Technologies, Inc. v. Applied Resources, Inc. 309

Sufficiency of the Writing 310

The Parole Evidence Rule 312

CASE 15.3 Yocca v. Pittsburgh Steelers Sports, Inc. 313

The Statute of Frauds in the International Context 316

REVIEWING: THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS—WRITING REQUIREMENT 317TERMS AND CONCEPTS 318QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 318LAW ON THE WEB 320LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 320Chapter 16*Third Party Rights 321

Assignments and Delegations 321

CASE 16.1 Martha Graham School and Dance Foundation, Inc. v. Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc. 323

Third Party Beneficiaries 328

EXTENDED CASE 16.2 Midwestern Indemnity Co. v. Systems Builders, Inc. 329CASE 16.3 Revels v. Miss America Organization 331REVIEWING: THIRD PARTY RIGHTS 333TERMS AND CONCEPTS 333QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 334LAW ON THE WEB 336LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 336Chapter 17*Performance and Discharge 337

Conditions 337

Discharge by Performance 338

EXTENDED CASE 17.1 Jacob & Youngs v. Kent 339CASE 17.2 Shah v. Cover-It, Inc. 341

Discharge by Agreement 344

Discharge by Operation of Law 345

CASE 17.3 Facto v. Pantagis 347REVIEWING: PERFORMANCE AND DISCHARGE 349TERMS AND CONCEPTS 350QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 350LAW ON THE WEB 352LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 352Chapter 18*Breach of Contract and Remedies 353

Damages 353

CASE 18.1 Hadley v. Baxendale 355EXTENDED CASE 18.2 Hanson v. Boeder 357

Rescission and Restitution 359

Specific Performance 360

CASE 18.3 Stainbrook v. Low 360

Reformation 362

Recovery Based on Quasi Contract 362

Election of Remedies 363

Waiver of Breach 364

Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies 365

REVIEWING: BREACH OF CONTRACT AND REMEDIES 366TERMS AND CONCEPTS 366QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 366LAW ON THE WEB 369LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 369Chapter 19*E-Contracts and E-Signatures 370

Online Contract Formation 370

CASE 19.1 Feldman v. Google, Inc. 371CASE 19.2 Mortgage Plus, Inc. v. DocMagic, Inc. 374

E-Signatures 376

EXTENDED CASE 19.3 Amber Chemical, Inc. v. Reilly Industries, Inc. 378

The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act 381

REVIEWING: E-CONTRACTS AND E-SIGNATURES 383TERMS AND CONCEPTS 383QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 384LAW ON THE WEB 386LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 386FOCUS ON ETHICS: CONTRACT LAW AND THE APPLICATION OF ETHICS 387Domestic and International Sales and Lease Contracts 391*Chapter 20*The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts 392

The Uniform Commercial Code 392

The Scope of Article 2—The Sale of Goods 393

Contents

CASE 20.1 Hammer v. Thompson 396
 The Scope of Article 2A—Leases 398
 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts 398

CASE 20.2 Sun Coast Merchandise Corp. v. Myron Corp. 402

EXTENDED CASE 20.3 Jones v. Star Credit Corp. 408

Contracts for the International Sale of Goods 410

REVIEWING: THE FORMATION OF SALES AND LEASE CONTRACTS 413

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 413

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 414

LAW ON THE WEB 416

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 416

Appendix to Chapter 20: An Example of a Contract for the International Sale of Coffee 417

Chapter 21

Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest 421

Identification 421

When Title Passes 422

CASE 21.1 Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Co. v. Banc Auto, Inc. 423

CASE 21.2 Lindholm v. Brant 425

Risk of Loss 427

EXTENDED CASE 21.3 Spray-Tek, Inc. v. Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc. 428

Insurable Interest 433

REVIEWING: TITLE, RISK, AND INSURABLE INTEREST 434

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 434

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 434

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: SPRAY-TEK, INC. V. ROBBINS MOTOR TRANSPORTATION, INC. 436

LAW ON THE WEB 436

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 436

Chapter 22

Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts 437

Performance Obligations 437

Obligations of the Seller or Lessor 438

CASE 22.1 Maple Farms, Inc. v. City School District of Elmira 441

Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee 443

Anticipatory Repudiation 443

Remedies of the Seller or Lessor 445

Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee 447

CASE 22.2 Jauregui v. Bobb's Piano Sales & Service, Inc. 448

EXTENDED CASE 22.3 Fitl v. Strek 450

Additional Provisions Affecting Remedies 452

Dealing with International Contracts 452

REVIEWING: PERFORMANCE AND BREACH OF SALES AND LEASE CONTRACTS 454

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 455

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 455

LAW ON THE WEB 457

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 457

Chapter 23

Warranties and Product Liability 458

Types of Warranties 458

CASE 23.1 Shoop v. DaimlerChrysler Corp. 461

CASE 23.2 Webster v. Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc. 463

Overlapping Warranties 465

Warranty Disclaimers and Limitations on Liability 467

Product Liability 468

Strict Product Liability 469

EXTENDED CASE 23.3 Crosswhite v. Jumpking, Inc. 472

Defenses to Product Liability 475

REVIEWING: WARRANTIES AND PRODUCT LIABILITY 477

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 477

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 477

LAW ON THE WEB 480

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 480

FOCUS ON ETHICS: DOMESTIC AND INTERNATIONAL SALES AND LEASE CONTRACTS 481

Negotiable Instruments 485

Chapter 24

The Function and Creation of Negotiable Instruments 486

Articles 3 and 4 of the UCC 486

Types of Negotiable Instruments 487

Requirements for Negotiability 490

EXTENDED CASE 24.1 Gowin v. Granite Depot, LLC 494

CASE 24.2 Foundation Property Investments, LLC v. CTP, LLC 496

Factors Not Affecting Negotiability 500

REVIEWING: THE FUNCTION AND CREATION OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS 500
 TERMS AND CONCEPTS 501
 QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 501
 LAW ON THE WEB 503
 LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 503

Chapter 25 Transferability and Holder in Due Course 504

Negotiation 504
 Indorsements 505
 Miscellaneous Indorsement Problems 508
EXTENDED CASE 25.1 Hyatt Corp. v. Palm Beach National Bank 509

CASE 25.2 Graves v. Johnson 511
 Holder versus Holder in Due Course 512
 Requirements for HDC Status 513

CASE 25.3 Mid Wisconsin Bank v. Forsgard Trading, Inc. 514
 Holder through an HDC 518

REVIEWING: TRANSFERABILITY AND HOLDER IN DUE COURSE 519

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 520
 QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 520
 LAW ON THE WEB 522
 LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 522

Chapter 26 Liability, Defenses, and Discharge 523

Signature Liability 523
 Warranty Liability 530

CASE 26.1 Wachovia Bank, N.A. v. Foster Bancshares, Inc. 532

Defenses 533

EXTENDED CASE 26.2 Keesling v. T.E.K. Partners, LLC 535

Discharge 539

REVIEWING: LIABILITY, DEFENSES, AND DISCHARGE 540
 TERMS AND CONCEPTS 541
 QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 541
 LAW ON THE WEB 543
 LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 543

Chapter 27 Checks and Banking in the Digital Age 544

Checks 544
 The Bank-Customer Relationship 546
 Honoring Checks 546

CASE 27.1 Nesper v. Bank of America 549
 Accepting Deposits 554

CASE 27.2 Bank One, N.A. v. Dunn 557

EXTENDED CASE 27.3 NBT Bank, N.A. v. First National Community Bank 559

Electronic Fund Transfers 562
 E-Money and Online Banking 563

REVIEWING: CHECKS AND BANKING IN THE DIGITAL AGE 566

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 567
 QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 567
SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: NBT BANK, N.A. v. FIRST NATIONAL COMMUNITY BANK 568

LAW ON THE WEB 569
 LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 569

FOCUS ON ETHICS: NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS 570

Creditors' Rights and Bankruptcy 573

Chapter 28 Creditors' Rights and Remedies 574

Laws Assisting Creditors 574

CASE 28.1 Indiana Surgical Specialists v. Griffin 576

Suretyship and Guaranty 578

EXTENDED CASE 28.2 JSV, Inc. v. Hene Meat Co., Inc. 580

Protection for Debtors 582

REVIEWING: CREDITORS' RIGHTS AND REMEDIES 582

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 583
 QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 583
 LAW ON THE WEB 585

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 585

Chapter 29 Secured Transactions 586

The Terminology of Secured Transactions 586

Creating a Security Interest 587

Perfecting a Security Interest 588

EXTENDED CASE 29.1 Corona Fruits & Veggies, Inc. v. Frozsun Foods, Inc. 592

The Scope of a Security Interest 595

Priorities 597

CASE 29.2 Heartland Bank v. National City Bank 598

Rights and Duties of Debtors and Creditors 602

Default 602

 Contents

CASE 29.3 Layne v. Bank One, Kentucky, N.A. 604

REVIEWING: SECURED TRANSACTIONS 607

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 608

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 608

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: CORONA FRUITS & VEGGIES, INC. v. FROZUN FOODS, INC. 609

LAW ON THE WEB 610

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 610

Chapter 30 Bankruptcy Law 611

Bankruptcy Proceedings 611

Liquidation Proceedings 612

EXTENDED CASE 30.1 Hebbring v. U.S. Trustee 614

CASE 30.2 In re Mosley 621

Reorganizations 624

Bankruptcy Relief under Chapter 13 and Chapter 12 626

CASE 30.3 In re Buis 626

REVIEWING: BANKRUPTCY LAW 631

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 631

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 631

LAW ON THE WEB 634

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 634

FOCUS ON ETHICS: CREDITORS' RIGHTS AND BANKRUPTCY 635

Agency and Employment 637

Chapter 31 Agency Formation and Duties 638

Agency Relationships 638

CASE 31.1 Alberty-Vélez Corporación de Puerto Rico 640

Formation of the Agency Relationship 642

CASE 31.2 Motorsport Marketing, Inc. v. Wiedmaier, Inc. 643

Duties of Agents and Principals 645

EXTENDED CASE 31.3 Gossels v. Fleet National Bank 646

Rights and Remedies of Agents and Principals 648

REVIEWING: AGENCY FORMATION AND DUTIES 650

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 650

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 650

LAW ON THE WEB 652

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 652

Chapter 32 Liability to Third Parties and Termination 653

Scope of Agent's Authority 653

CASE 32.1 Ermoian v. Desert Hospital 655

Liability for Contracts 657

Liability for Torts and Crimes 659

CASE 32.2 In re Selheimer & Co. 660

EXTENDED CASE 32.3 Galvao v. G. R. Robert Construction Co. 664

Termination of an Agency 666

REVIEWING: LIABILITY TO THIRD PARTIES AND TERMINATION 669

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 669

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 669

LAW ON THE WEB 672

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 672

Chapter 33 Employment and Labor Law 673

Employment at Will 673

CASE 33.1 Wendeln v. The Beatrice Manor, Inc. 675

Wage and Hour Laws 676

CASE 33.2 Mims v. Starbucks Corp. 678

Labor Unions 681

Worker Health and Safety 683

Income Security, Pension, and Health Plans 685

Family and Medical Leave 687

EXTENDED CASE 33.3 Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs 688

Employee Privacy Rights 689

Employment-Related Immigration Laws 692

REVIEWING: EMPLOYMENT AND LABOR LAW 692

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 693

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 693

LAW ON THE WEB 695

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 695

Chapter 34 Employment Discrimination 696

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 696

CASE 34.1 Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp. 697

EXTENDED CASE 34.2 Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Railway Co. v. White 703

Discrimination Based on Age	705
CASE 34.3 Cash Distributing Co. v. Neely	707
Discrimination Based on Disability	710
Defenses to Employment Discrimination	712
Affirmative Action	713
State Laws Prohibiting Discrimination	715
REVIEWING: EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION	715
TERMS AND CONCEPTS	716
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS	716
SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: BURLINGTON NORTHERN AND SANTA FE RAILWAY Co. v. WHITE	718
LAW ON THE WEB	718
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB	719

FOCUS ON ETHICS: AGENCY AND EMPLOYMENT 720

Business Organizations 723

Chapter 35 Sole Proprietorships and Franchises 724

Sole Proprietorships	724
CASE 35.1 Garden City Boxing Club, Inc. v. Dominguez	725
Franchises	726
EXTENDED CASE 35.2 Kerl v. Dennis Rasmussen, Inc.	729
Franchise Termination	731
CASE 35.3 Chic Miller's Chevrolet, Inc. v. General Motors Corp.	731
REVIEWING: SOLE PROPRIETORSHIPS AND FRANCHISES	733
TERMS AND CONCEPTS	733
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS	734
LAW ON THE WEB	736
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB	736

Chapter 36 Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships 737

Basic Partnership Concepts	737
Partnership Formation	739
Partnership Operation	740
CASE 36.1 Moren v. Jax Restaurant	744
Dissociation of a Partner	746
CASE 36.2 Warnick v. Warnick	747
Partnership Termination	748
Limited Liability Partnerships	750

Limited Partnerships	751
EXTENDED CASE 36.3 In re Dissolution of Midnight Star Enterprises, L.P.	753

REVIEWING: PARTNERSHIPS AND LIMITED LIABILITY PARTNERSHIPS	755
TERMS AND CONCEPTS	756
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS	756
LAW ON THE WEB	758
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB	758

Chapter 37 Limited Liability Companies and Special Business Forms 759

Limited Liability Companies	759
CASE 37.1 McFarland v. Virginia Retirement Services of Chesterfield, L.L.C.	760
CASE 37.2 Kuhn v. Tumminelli	763
Management of an LLC	764
Dissociation and Dissolution of an LLC	765
Special Business Forms	765
EXTENDED CASE 37.3 SPW Associates, LLP v. Anderson	766

REVIEWING: LIMITED LIABILITY COMPANIES AND SPECIAL BUSINESS FORMS	768
TERMS AND CONCEPTS	769
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS	769
LAW ON THE WEB	772
LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB	772

Chapter 38 CORPORATIONS— Formation and Financing 773

The Nature and Classification of Corporations	773
CASE 38.1 Commonwealth v. Angelo Todesca Corp.	775
EXTENDED CASE 38.2 Salt Lake Tribune Publishing Co. v. AT&T Corp.	778
Corporate Formation	781
Defects in Formation and Corporate Status	785
Corporate Powers	786
Piercing the Corporate Veil	786
CASE 38.3 In re Aqua Clear Technologies, Inc.	787
Corporate Financing	789
REVIEWING: CORPORATIONS—FORMATION AND FINANCING	792
TERMS AND CONCEPTS	792
QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS	793

 Contents

LAW ON THE WEB 795

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 795

Chapter 39

CORPORATIONS—Directors, Officers, and Shareholders 796

Roles of Directors and Officers 796

EXTENDED CASE 39.1 Relational Investors, LLC v. Sovereign Bancorp, Inc. 797

Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers 801

CASE 39.2 Guth v. Loft, Inc. 803

The Role of Shareholders 805

Rights of Shareholders 809

Liability of Shareholders 812

CASE 39.3 Kaplan v. First Hartford Corp. 813

REVIEWING: CORPORATIONS—DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND SHAREHOLDERS 815

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 815

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 816

LAW ON THE WEB 818

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 818

Chapter 40

CORPORATIONS—Merger, Consolidation, and Termination 819

Merger and Consolidation 819

CASE 40.1 Rodriguez v. Tech Credit Union Corp. 820

Purchase of Assets 823

Purchase of Stock 824

Termination 827

EXTENDED CASE 40.2 Parent v. Amity Autoworld, Ltd. 827

CASE 40.3 Sartori v. S & S Trucking, Inc. 829

Major Business Forms Compared 830

REVIEWING: CORPORATIONS—MERGER, CONSOLIDATION, AND TERMINATION 833

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 833

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 833

LAW ON THE WEB 835

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 835

Chapter 41

CORPORATIONS—Securities Law and Corporate Governance 836

The Securities and Exchange Commission 836

The Securities Act of 1933 837

The Securities Exchange Act of 1934 845

CASE 41.1 SEC v. Texas Gulf Sulphur Co. 846

EXTENDED CASE 41.2 *Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc. v.
Dabit* 847

CASE 41.3 United States v. Berger 851

Corporate Governance 853

State Securities Laws 855

Online Securities Fraud 857

REVIEWING: CORPORATIONS—SECURITIES LAW AND CORPORATE GOVERNANCE 858

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 859

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 859

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: *MERRILL LYNCH, PIERCE, FENNER &
SMITH, INC. v. DOBIT* 860

LAW ON THE WEB 861

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 861

Chapter 42

Law for Small Business 862

The Importance of Legal Counsel 862

Selecting an Appropriate Business Form 863

The Limited Liability Company 866

EXTENDED CASE 42.1 *Mixon v. Iberia Surgical,
L.L.C.* 867

Creating the Business Entity 868

Intellectual Property 869

Raising Financial Capital 871

CASE 42.2 InfoSAGE, Inc. v. Mellon Ventures, L.P. 872

Buy-Sell Agreements and Key-Person Insurance 873

Contract Law and Small Businesses 874

CASE 42.3 *DBL Distributing, Inc. v. 1 Cache,
L.L.C.* 875

Employment Issues 876

REVIEWING: LAW FOR SMALL BUSINESS 878

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 878

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 879

LAW ON THE WEB 881

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 881

FOCUS ON ETHICS: BUSINESS ORGANIZATIONS 882

Government Regulation 885

Chapter 43

Administrative Law 886

The Practical Significance of Administrative Law 886

Agency Creation and Powers 887

The Administrative Procedure Act 888

EXTENDED CASE 43.1 Fox Television Stations, Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission 888

CASE 43.2 Hemp Industries Association v. Drug Enforcement Administration 892

Judicial Deference to Agency Decisions 894

CASE 43.3 United States v. Mead Corporation 895

Agency Enforcement and Adjudication 896

Limitations on Agency Powers 898

Public Accountability 900

REVIEWING: ADMINISTRATIVE LAW 901

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 901

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 902

LAW ON THE WEB 904

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 904

Chapter 44 Consumer Law 905

Deceptive Advertising 905

EXTENDED CASE 44.1 Federal Trade Commission v. Verity International, Ltd. 907

Labeling and Packaging Laws 909

Sales 909

Credit Protection 910

CASE 44.2 Saunders v. Equifax Information Services, L.L.C. 912

Consumer Health and Safety 914

CASE 44.3 Abigail Alliance for Better Access to Developmental Drugs v. von Eschenbach 915

REVIEWING: CONSUMER LAW 917

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 918

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 918

LAW ON THE WEB 920

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 920

Chapter 45 Environmental Law 921

Common Law Actions 921

Federal, State, and Local Regulation 922

Air Pollution 923

EXTENDED CASE 45.1 Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corp. 926

Water Pollution 928

CASE 45.2 S. D. Warren Co. v. Maine Board of Environmental Protection 928

Toxic Chemicals 931

CASE 45.3 Bates v. Dow Agrosciences, LLC 932

Hazardous Wastes 933

REVIEWING: ENVIRONMENTAL LAW 934

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 935

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 935

LAW ON THE WEB 937

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 937

Chapter 46 Antitrust Law 938

The Sherman Antitrust Act 938

Section 1 of the Sherman Act 939

CASE 46.1 Continental T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania, Inc. 941

EXTENDED CASE 46.2 Leegin Creative Leather Products, Inc. v. PSKS, Inc. 942

Section 2 of the Sherman Act 944

The Clayton Act 946

CASE 46.3 Illinois Tool Works, Inc. v. Independent Ink, Inc. 948

Enforcement of Antitrust Laws 950

Exemptions from Antitrust Law 951

U.S. Antitrust Laws in the Global Context 952

REVIEWING: ANTITRUST LAW 953

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 953

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 954

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: LEEGIN CREATIVE LEATHER PRODUCTS, INC. v. PSKS, INC. 955

LAW ON THE WEB 956

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 956

FOCUS ON ETHICS: GOVERNMENT REGULATION 957

Property 959

Chapter 47 Personal Property and Bailments 960

Personal Property versus Real Property 960

Fixtures 961

Acquiring Ownership of Personal Property 962

CASE 47.1 In re Estate of Piper 963

Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property 965

 Contents

EXTENDED CASE 47.2 United States v. One Hundred Sixty-Five Thousand Five Hundred Eighty Dollars ($165,580) in U.S. Currency 967

Bailments 969

Ordinary Bailments 970

Special Types of Bailments 973

CASE 47.3 Treiber & Straub, Inc. v. United Parcel Service, Inc. 974

REVIEWING: PERSONAL PROPERTY AND BAILMENTS 977

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 977

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 977

LAW ON THE WEB 979

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 979

Chapter 48

Real Property and Landlord-Tenant Relationships 980

The Nature of Real Property 980

Ownership and Other Interests in Real Property 981

CASE 48.1 Biglane v. Under the Hill Corp. 982

Transfer of Ownership 986

CASE 48.2 Whitehead v. Humphrey 989

CASE 48.3 Otwell v. Diversified Timber Services, Inc. 993

Limitations on the Rights of Property Owners 994

EXTENDED CASE 48.4 Kelo v. City of New London, Connecticut 995

Landlord-Tenant Relationships 997

REVIEWING: REAL PROPERTY AND LANDLORD-TENANT RELATIONSHIPS 1000

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 1000

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 1001

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: KELO V. CITY OF NEW LONDON, CONNECTICUT 1002

LAW ON THE WEB 1003

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 1003

FOCUS ON ETHICS: PROPERTY 1004

Special Topics 1007

Chapter 49

Insurance 1008

Insurance Terminology and Concepts 1008

EXTENDED CASE 49.1 Zurich American Insurance Co. v. AMB Industries, Inc. 1011

The Insurance Contract 1012

CASE 49.2 Cary v. United of Omaha Life Insurance Co. 1015

CASE 49.3 Woo v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co. 1017

Types of Insurance 1018

REVIEWING: INSURANCE 1023

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 1023

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 1023

LAW ON THE WEB 1026

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 1026

Chapter 50

Wills and Trusts 1027

Wills 1027

CASE 50.1 Shaw Family Archives, Ltd. v. CMG Worldwide, Inc. 1029

CASE 50.2 In re Estate of Pallister 1032

Intestacy Laws 1035

Trusts 1037

EXTENDED CASE 50.3 Cinquemani v. Lazio 1039

Other Estate-Planning Issues 1043

REVIEWING: WILLS AND TRUSTS 1044

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 1044

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 1045

LAW ON THE WEB 1047

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 1047

Chapter 51

Professional Liability and Accountability 1048

Potential Liability to Clients 1048

EXTENDED CASE 51.1 In re Disciplinary Proceedings Against Inglimo 1050

Potential Liability to Third Parties 1052

CASE 51.2 Reznor v. J. Artist Management, Inc. 1053

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 1055

Potential Liability of Accountants under Securities Laws 1058

Potential Criminal Liability of Accountants 1061

Confidentiality and Privilege 1062

REVIEWING: PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY AND ACCOUNTABILITY 1063

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 1064

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 1064

LAW ON THE WEB 1067

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 1067

Chapter 52International Law in a Global Economy 1068

International Law 1068

Doing Business Internationally 1071

Regulation of Specific Business Activities 1072

CASE 52.1 Fuji Photo Film Co. v. International Trade Commission 1073

U.S. Laws in a Global Context 1076

CASE 52.2 Carnero v. Boston Scientific Corp. 1076EXTENDED 52.3 Khulumani v. Barclay National Bank, Ltd. 1078

REVIEWING: INTERNATIONAL LAW IN A GLOBAL ECONOMY 1080

TERMS AND CONCEPTS 1080

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS 1080

SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS: KHULUMANI V. BARCLAY NATIONAL BANK, LTD. 1082

LAW ON THE WEB 1082

LEGAL RESEARCH EXERCISES ON THE WEB 1082

FOCUS ON ETHICS: SPECIAL TOPICS 1083*Appendices*Appendix A How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems A-1Appendix B The Constitution of the United States A-4Appendix C The Uniform Commercial Code A-12Appendix D The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (Excerpts) A-176Appendix E The Uniform Partnership Act (Excerpts) A-180Appendix F The Revised Uniform Limited Partnership Act (Excerpts) A-190Appendix G The Revised Model Business Corporation Act (Excerpts) A-200Appendix H The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 (Excerpts and Explanatory Comments) A-210Appendix I Sample Answers for End-of-Chapter Questions with Sample Answer A-218

Glossary G-1

Table of Cases TC-1

Index I-1

CONCEPT SUMMARIES

- | | | | |
|---|------------|---|-------------|
| 1.1 Schools of Jurisprudential Thought | 4 | 26.1 Signature Liability | 529 |
| 1.2 Sources of American Law | 8 | 26.2 Transfer Warranty Liability for Transferors Who Receive Consideration | 531 |
| 1.3 The Common Law Tradition | 13 | 27.1 Honoring Checks | 554 |
| 2.1 Jurisdiction | 36 | 28.1 Remedies Available to Creditors | 578 |
| 2.2 Types of Courts | 42 | 29.1 Creating and Perfecting a Security Interest | 596 |
| 3.1 Pretrial Procedures | 65 | 29.2 Remedies of the Secured Party on the Debtor's Default | 606 |
| 3.2 Trial Procedures | 70 | 30.1 Forms of Bankruptcy Relief Compared | 630 |
| 3.3 Posttrial Options | 72 | 31.1 Formation of the Agency Relationship | 645 |
| 6.1 Intentional Torts against Persons | 132 | 32.1 Authority of an Agent to Bind the Principal and a Third Party | 658 |
| 6.2 Intentional Torts against Property | 136 | 32.2 Termination of an Agency | 668 |
| 9.1 Types of Crimes | 194 | 38.1 Classification of Corporations | 781 |
| 10.1 Types of Contracts | 224 | 39.1 Roles of Directors and Officers | 801 |
| 11.1 Methods by Which an Offer Can Be Terminated | 242 | 39.2 Duties and Liabilities of Directors and Officers | 805 |
| 11.2 Effective Time of Acceptance | 245 | 39.3 Role of Shareholders | 813 |
| 12.1 Consideration | 257 | 40.1 Methods of Expanding Corporate Operations and Interests | 826 |
| 13.1 Contracts by Minors | 269 | 47.1 Acquisition of Personal Property | 966 |
| 13.2 Contracts by Intoxicated Persons | 270 | 47.2 Mislaid, Lost, and Abandoned Property | 968 |
| 13.3 Contracts by Mentally Incompetent Persons | 271 | 47.3 Rights and Duties of the Bailee and the Bailor | 976 |
| 14.1 Voluntary Consent | 299 | 48.1 Interests in Real Property | 987 |
| 16.1 Assignments and Delegations | 327 | 50.1 Wills | 1036 |
| 18.1 Equitable Remedies | 364 | 50.2 Trusts | 1041 |
| 20.1 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts | 411 | 51.1 Common Law Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals | 1056 |
| 21.1 Delivery without Movement of the Goods | 431 | 51.2 Statutory Liability of Accountants and Other Professionals | 1063 |
| 21.2 Risk of Loss When a Sales or Lease Contract is Breached | 433 | | |
| 22.1 Performance of Sales and Lease Contracts | 444 | | |
| 23.1 Types of Warranties | 466 | | |
| 24.1 Requirements for Negotiability | 499 | | |
| 25.1 Types of Indorsements and Their Effect | 509 | | |
| 25.2 Rules and Requirements for HDC Status | 518 | | |

EXHIBITS

- 1-1 Areas of the Law That May Affect Business Decision Making 5
- 1-2 Equitable Maxims 9
- 1-3 Procedural Differences between an Action at Law and an Action in Equity 10
- 1-4 West's National Reporter System—Regional/Federal 17
- 1-5 How to Read Citations 18
- 1-6 A Sample Court Case 24
- 2-1 The State and Federal Court Systems 37
- 2-2 Geographic Boundaries of the U.S. Courts of Appeals and U.S. District Courts
- 2-3 Basic Differences in the Traditional Forms of ADR 43
- 3-1 Stages in a Typical Lawsuit 54
- 3-2 A Typical Complaint 56
- 3-3 A Typical Summons 57
- 3-4 Pretrial Motions 61
- 4-1 Protections Guaranteed by the Bill of Rights 83
- 5-1 The Intersection of What Is Legal and What Is Ethical 107
- 8-1 Forms of Intellectual Property 160
- 8-2 Existing Generic Top Level Domain Names 165
- 9-1 Key Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law 185
- 9-2 Civil (Tort) Lawsuit and Criminal Prosecution for the Same Act 186
- 9-3 Major Procedural Steps in a Criminal Case 203
- 10-1 Classifications Based on Contract Formation 218
- 10-2 Enforceable, Voidable, Unenforceable, and Void Contracts 223
- 10-3 Rules of Contract Interpretation 225
- 13-1 Unconscionability 279
- 13-2 Contract Legality 281
- 14-1 Mistakes of Fact 287
- 15-1 The One-Year Rule 304
- 15-2 Collateral Promises 307
- 15-3 Contracts Subject to the Statute of Frauds 311
- 15-4 Parol Evidence Rule 317
- 16-1 Assignment Relationships 322
- 16-2 Delegation Relationships 326
- 16-3 Third Party Beneficiaries 331
- 17-1 Contract Discharge 349
- 18-1 Measurement of Damages—Breach of Construction Contracts 355
- 18-2 Remedies for Breach of Contract 363
- 19-1 A Click-On Agreement 373
- 19-2 The E-SIGN Act and the UETA 382
- 20-1 The 2003 Amendments to UCC Article 2: Selected Provisions 394
- 20-2 The Law Governing Contracts 395
- 20-3 Major Differences between Contract Law and Sales Law 407
- 21-1 Contract Terms—Definitions 428
- 22-1 A Letter-of-Credit Transaction 453
- 24-1 Basic Types of Negotiable Instruments 487
- 24-2 A Typical Time Draft 488
- 24-3 A Typical Trade Acceptance 489
- 24-4 A Typical Promissory Note 491
- 24-5 A Typical Small Certificate of Deposit 491
- 25-1 A Blank Indorsement 505
- 25-2 A Special Indorsement 505
- 25-3 A Qualified Indorsement 506
- 25-4 “For Deposit Only” and “For Collection Only” Indorsements 507
- 25-5 Trust (Agency) Indorsements 507
- 25-6 Converting an Order Instrument to a Bearer Instrument and Vice Versa 508
- 25-7 Taking for Value 514
- 26-1 Time for Proper Presentment 525
- 26-2 Defenses against Liability on Negotiable Instruments 534
- 27-1 A Cashier's Check 545
- 27-2 An American Express Traveler's Check 546

Contents

- 27-3 A Stop-Payment Order 548
- 27-4 A Poorly Filled-Out Check 553
- 27-5 The Traditional Check-Collection Process 556
- 28-1 Suretyship and Guaranty Parties 579
- 29-1 Secured Transactions—Concept and Terminology 587
- 29-2 Types of Collateral and Methods of Perfection 589
- 29-3 The Uniform Financing Statement 591
- 29-4 Priority of Claims to a Debtor's Collateral 601
- 30-1 Collection and Distribution of Property in Most Voluntary Bankruptcies 620
- 32-1 A Sample General Power of Attorney 654
- 36-1 Terms Commonly Included in a Partnership Agreement 740
- 36-2 A Comparison of General Partnerships and Limited Partnerships 752
- 38-1 Offshore Low-Tax Jurisdictions 774
- 38-2 Articles of Incorporation 783
- 38-3 Types of Corporate Bonds 789
- 38-4 How Do Stocks and Bonds Differ? 790
- 38-5 Types of Stocks 790
- 39-1 Directors' Management Responsibilities 797
- 39-2 Results of Cumulative Voting 809
- 40-1 Merger 819
- 40-2 Consolidation 821
- 40-3 The Terminology of Takeover Defenses 825
- 40-4 Major Forms of Business Compared 831
- 41-1 Basic Functions of the SEC 836
- 41-2 Exemptions under the 1933 Act 841
- 41-3 A Sample Restricted Stock Certificate 844
- 41-4 Comparison of Coverage, Application, and Liability under SEC Rule 10b-5 and Section 16(b) 850
- 41-5 Some Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 Relating to Corporate Accountability 856
- 42-1 Average Attorneys' Fees for Selected Small-Business Transactions 863
- 42-2 Venture Capital Issues 873
- 43-1 Costs of Regulation to Businesses 887
- 43-2 Executive Departments and Important Subagencies 891
- 43-3 Selected Independent Regulatory Agencies 892
- 43-4 The Process of Formal Administrative Adjudication 898
- 44-1 Selected Areas of Consumer Law Regulated by Statutes 905
- 45-1 Major Federal Environmental Statutes 923
- 47-1 Degree of Care Required of a Bailee 972
- 48-1 Steps Involved in the Sale of Real Estate 988
- 49-1 Insurance Classifications 1009
- 49-2 Insurance Contract Provisions and Clauses 1014
- 49-3 Typical Fire Insurance Policies 1020
- 50-1 Excerpts from the Will of Diana, Princess of Wales 1028
- 50-2 Per Stirpes Distribution 1037
- 50-3 Per Capita Distribution 1038
- 50-4 A Revocable Living Trust Arrangement 1039
- 51-1 Key Provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 Relating to Public Accounting Firms 1057
- 52-1 The Legal Systems of Selected Nations 1070

INSIGHT INTO THE GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

- Chapter 5 Breach of Trust Issues Hit Major German Corporations 112
- Chapter 19 International Use and Regulation of the Internet 380
- Chapter 24 The Negotiability of Checks in Other Nations 490
- Chapter 42 Moving Your Small Business Online: Seller Beware 865

INSIGHT INTO E-COMMERCE

Chapter 1 How the Internet Is Expanding Precedent 22

Chapter 8 Search Engines versus Copyright Owners 174

Chapter 41 Moving Company Information to the Internet 838

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Chapter 2 Implications of an Increasingly Private Justice System 38

Chapter 14 Internet Click Fraud 292

Chapter 51 An Auditor's Duty to Correct Certified Opinions 1060

EMERGING TRENDS IN BUSINESS LAW

Chapter 3 E-Discovery and Cost-Shifting 66

Chapter 9 Stand-Your-Ground Laws 196

Chapter 23 Removing Class-Action Lawsuits to the Federal Court 470

Chapter 27 Using Digital Cash Facilitates Money Laundering 564

Chapter 33 Paying Overtime in the Virtual Workforce 678

Chapter 34 New Issues in Online Privacy and Employment Discrimination 706

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Chapter 4 Does State Regulation of Internet Prescription Transactions Violate the Dormant Commerce Clause? 84

Chapter 6 Tort Reform 124

Chapter 12 Promissory Estoppel and Employment Contracts 260

Chapter 13 Are Online Fantasy Sports Gambling? 274

Chapter 15 Prenuptial Agreements and Advice of Counsel 312

Chapter 39 A Shareholder Access Rule 808

Chapter 45 Should the EPA Take the Threat of Global Warming into Account? 924

PREFACE TO THE INSTRUCTOR

The study of business law and, more generally, the legal environment of business has universal applicability. A student entering virtually any field of business must have at least a passing understanding of business law in order to function in the real world. Additionally, students preparing for a career in accounting, government and political science, economics, and even medicine can use much of the information they learn in a business law and legal environment course. In fact, every individual throughout his or her lifetime can benefit from a knowledge of contracts, real property law, landlord-tenant relationships, and other topics. Consequently, we have fashioned this text as a useful “tool for living” for all of your students (including those taking the CPA exam).

For the Eleventh Edition, we have spent a great deal of effort making this book more contemporary, exciting, and visually appealing than ever before to encourage your students to learn the law. We have also designed many new features and special pedagogical devices that focus on the legal, ethical, global, and e-commerce environments, while addressing core curriculum requirements.

What Is New in the Eleventh Edition

Instructors have come to rely on the coverage, accuracy, and applicability of Business Law. To make sure that our text engages your students’ interests, solidifies their understanding of the legal concepts presented, and provides the best teaching tools available, we now offer the following items either in the text or in conjunction with the text.

New Insight Features

For the Eleventh Edition, we have created three special new Insight features—Insight into E-Commerce, Insight into Ethics, and Insight into the Global Environment. These features, which appear in selected chapters, provide valuable insights into how the courts and the law are dealing with specific contemporary issues. Each of these features ends with a critical-thinking question that explores some cultural, environmental, political, social, or technological aspect of the issue.

1. Insight into E-Commerce—When the topic involves some new technology or how the Internet is affecting a particular area of law, we include an Insight into E-Commerce feature. For example, Chapter 1 contains an Insight into E-Commerce feature on How the Internet Is Expanding Precedent, Chapter 8 has a feature on Search Engines Versus Copyrights, and Chapter 41 includes a feature on Moving Company Information to the Internet.
2. Insight into Ethics—When the topic has ethical implications, we include an Insight into Ethics feature. For example, Chapter 2’s Insight into Ethics feature is entitled Implications of an Increasingly Private Justice System, Chapter 14’s feature addresses Internet Click Fraud, and Chapter 51’s feature covers An Auditor’s Duty to Correct Certified Opinions.
3. Insight into the Global Environment—Because business transactions today are increasingly global, we have also included a feature that discusses global implications or explains how foreign nations deal with a particular topic. For example, there is an Insight into the Global Environment feature in Chapter 5 titled Breach of Trust Issues Hit Major German Corporations, one in Chapter 19 on International Use and Regulation of the Internet, and one in Chapter 42 on Moving Your Small Business Online: Seller Beware.

Two Critical-Thinking Questions at the End of Every Case Presented in This Text

In every chapter of the Tenth Edition of West's Business Law, we included one longer case excerpt followed by two case-ending questions designed to guide students' analysis of the case and help build their legal reasoning skills. For the Eleventh Edition, we continue to offer one longer excerpt—now labeled an Extended Case—with two critical-thinking questions in every chapter. These extended cases may be used for case-briefing assignments and are also tied to the Special Case Analysis questions found in every unit of the text.

Because of the popularity of the case-ending questions, for this edition, we've also included two questions for all cases. In addition to the What If the Facts Were Different? questions and Impact of This Case on Today's Law sections that appeared in the Tenth Edition, we've devised an entirely new set of questions. These new Dimension questions focus on meeting aspects of your curriculum requirements, including:

- The Ethical Dimension
- The E-Commerce Dimension
- The Global Dimension
- The Legal Environment Dimension

Suggested answers to all questions following cases can be found in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text. (The full title of this manual is Answers to Questions and Case Problems and Alternate Problem Sets with Answers.)

Greater Emphasis on Critical Thinking and Legal Reasoning

Today's business leaders are often required to think "outside the box" when making business decisions. For this reason, we have added a number of critical-thinking elements for the Eleventh Edition that are designed to challenge students' understanding of the materials beyond simple retention. Your students' critical-thinking and legal reasoning skills will be increased as they work through the numerous pedagogical devices within the book. Almost every feature and every case presented in the text conclude with some type of critical-thinking question. These questions include For Critical Analysis, What If the Facts Were Different? and the Ethical, E-Commerce, Global, and Legal Environment Dimension questions discussed previously. They also include the new Special Case

Analysis questions and the questions in the Reviewing features, which are described next.

New Special Case Analysis Questions

Through the years, instructors have frequently requested that we teach their business law students how to analyze case law. We discuss the fundamental topic of how to read and understand case law in Chapter 1 and cover How to Brief Cases and Analyze Case Problems in Appendix A. For this edition, we have gone one step further: in selected chapters of the text, we provide a Special Case Analysis question that is based on the Extended Case excerpt in that chapter. The Special Case Analysis questions are part of the Questions and Case Problems that appear at the end of the chapter. We offer one of these special questions for every unit in the text to build students' analytical skills. The Special Case Analysis questions test students' ability to perform IRAC (Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion) case analysis. Students must identify the legal issue presented in the chapter's extended case, understand the rule of law, determine how the rule applies to the facts of the case, and describe the court's conclusion. Instructors can assign these questions as homework or can use them in class to elicit student participation and teach case analysis.

Reviewing Features in Every Chapter

For the Eleventh Edition of Business Law, we have included a new and improved feature at the end of every chapter that helps solidify students' understanding of the chapter materials. The feature appears just before the Terms and Concepts and is entitled Reviewing [chapter topic]. Each of these features presents a hypothetical scenario and then asks a series of questions that require students to identify the issues and apply the legal concepts discussed in the chapter. These features are designed to help students review the chapter topics in a simple and interesting way and see how the legal principles discussed in the chapter affect the world in which they live. An instructor can use these features as the basis for in-class discussion or encourage students to use them for self-study prior to completing homework assignments. Suggested answers to the questions posed in the Reviewing features can be found in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.

The Reviewing features are also tied to a new set of questions for each chapter in the Web-based CengageNOW system, to be discussed next. Students can read through the scenario in the text and then answer the four Applications and Analysis questions online. By using the CengageNOW system, students will receive instant feedback on their answers to these questions, and instructors will obtain automatically graded assignments that enable them to assess students' understanding of the materials.

Improved Content and Features on CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System

For those instructors who want their students to learn how to identify and apply the legal principles they study in this text, we have created new content and improved the features of our Web-based product for this edition. The system provides interactive, automatically graded assignments for every chapter and unit in this text. For each of the fifty-two chapters, we have devised different categories of multiple-choice questions that stress different aspects of learning the chapter materials. By using the optional CengageNOW system, students can complete the assignments from any location via the Internet and can receive instant feedback on why their answers to questions were incorrect or correct (if the instructor wishes to allow feedback). Instructors can customize the system to meet their own specifications and can track students' progress.

1. Chapter Review Questions—The first set of ten to fifteen questions reviews the basic concepts and principles discussed in the chapter. These questions often include questions based on the cases presented in the text.
2. Brief Hypotheticals—The next group of seven to ten questions emphasizes spotting the issue and identifying the rule of law that applies in the context of a short factual scenario.
3. Legal Reasoning—The third category includes five questions that require students to analyze the factual situation provided and apply the rules of law discussed in the chapter to arrive at an answer.
4. IRAC Case Analysis—The next set of four questions for each chapter requires students to perform all the basic elements of legal reasoning (identify the issue, determine the rule of law, apply the rule to the facts presented, and arrive at a conclusion). These questions are based on the Extended Case excerpts that appear in each chapter.

5. Application and Analysis—The final set of four questions for each chapter is new and is linked to the Reviewing features (discussed previously) that appear in every chapter of the text. The student is required to read through the hypothetical scenario, analyze the facts presented, identify the issues in dispute, and apply the rules discussed in the chapter to answer the questions.
6. Essay Questions—In addition to the multiple-choice questions available on CengageNOW, we now also provide essay questions that allow students to compose and submit essays online. Students' essays are automatically recorded to the gradebook, which permits instructors to quickly and easily evaluate the essays and record grades.
7. Video Questions—CengageNOW also now includes links to the Digital Video Library for Business Law so that students can access and view the video clips and answer questions related to the topics in the chapter.
8. Cumulative Questions for Each Unit—In addition to the questions relating to each chapter, the CengageNOW system provides a set of cumulative questions, entitled "Synthesizing Legal Concepts," for each of the eleven units in the text.
9. Additional Advantages of CengageNOW—Instructors can utilize the system to upload their course syllabi, create and customize homework assignments, keep track of their students' progress, communicate with their students about assignments and due dates, and create reports summarizing the data for an individual student or for the whole class.

Expanded Ethics Coverage and New Questions of Ethics in Every Chapter

For the Eleventh Edition of Business Law, we have significantly revised and updated the chapter on ethics and business decision making (Chapter 5). The chapter now presents a more practical, realistic, case-study approach to business ethics and the dilemmas facing businesspersons today. The emphasis on ethics is reiterated in materials throughout the text, particularly the Focus on Ethics features that conclude every unit, the Insight into Ethics features, and the pedagogy that accompanies selected cases and features. We also discuss corporate governance issues as appropriate within the ethics chapter, the corporations chapters, and the Focus on Ethics feature that concludes Unit Eight on business organizations.

For this edition, we have also added A Question of Ethics based on a case from 2006 or 2007 to every chapter of the text. These problems provide modern-day examples of the kinds of ethical issues faced by businesspersons and the ways courts typically resolve them.

More on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002

In a number of places in this text, we discuss the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 and the corporate scandals that led to the passage of that legislation. For example, Chapter 5 contains a section examining the requirements of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act relating to confidential reporting systems. In Chapter 41, we discuss this act in the context of securities law and present an exhibit (Exhibit 41–4) containing some of the key provisions of the act relating to corporate accountability with respect to securities transactions. Finally, in Chapter 51, we again look at provisions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act as they relate to public accounting firms and accounting practices.

Because the act is a topic of significant concern in today's business climate, we also include excerpts and explanatory comments on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 as Appendix H. Students and instructors alike will find it useful to have the provisions of the act immediately available for reference.

Business Law on the Web

For the Eleventh Edition of Business Law, we have redesigned and streamlined the text's Web site so that users can easily locate the resources they seek. When you visit our Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, you will find a broad array of teaching/learning resources, including the following:

- Relevant Web sites for all of the Emerging Trends features that are presented in this text.
- Sample answers to the Case Problem with Sample Answer, which appears in the Questions and Case Problems at the end of every chapter. This problem/answer set is designed to help your students learn how to answer case problems by acquainting them with model answers to selected problems. In addition, we offer the answers to the hypothetical Questions with Sample Answers on the Web site as well as in the text (Appendix I).
- Videos referenced in the new Video Questions (discussed shortly) that appear in selected chapters of this edition of Business Law.

- Internet exercises for every chapter in the text (at least two per chapter). These exercises have been refocused to provide more practical information to business law students on topics covered in the chapters and to acquaint students with the legal resources that are available online.
- Interactive quizzes for every chapter in this text.
- Glossary terms for every chapter in the text.
- Flashcards that provide students with an optional study tool to review the key terms in every chapter.
- PowerPoint slides that have been revised for this edition.
- Legal reference materials including a "Statutes" page that offers links to the full text of selected statutes referenced in the text, a Spanish glossary, and links to other important legal resources available for free on the Web.
- Law on the Web features that provide links to the URLs that appear at the end of every chapter in the text.
- Link to CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System with different types of questions related to every chapter in the text and one set of cumulative questions for each unit in the text.
- Link to our Digital Video Library that offers a compendium of more than sixty-five video scenarios and explanations.
- Online Legal Research Guide that offers complete yet brief guidance to using the Internet and evaluating information obtained from the Internet. As an online resource, it now includes hyperlinks to the Web sites discussed for click-through convenience.
- Court case updates that present summaries of new cases from various West legal publications, are continually updated, and are specifically keyed to chapters in this text.

A Comprehensive Digital Video Library

For this edition of Business Law, we have included special Video Questions at the end of selected chapters. Each of these questions directs students to the text's Web site (at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson) to view a video relevant to a topic covered in the chapter. This is followed by a series of questions based on the video. The questions are again repeated on the Web site, when the student accesses the video. An access code for the videos can be packaged with each new copy of this textbook for no additional charge. If Digital Video Library access did not come packaged with the textbook, students can purchase it online at academic.cengage.com/blaw/dvl.

These videos can be used for homework assignments, discussion starters, or classroom demonstrations and are useful for generating student interest. Some of the videos are clips from actual movies, such as The Jerk and Bowfinger. By watching a video and answering the questions, students will gain an understanding of how the legal concepts they have studied in the chapter apply to the real-life situation portrayed in the video. Suggested answers for all of the Video Questions are given in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text. The videos are part of our Digital Video Library, a compendium of more than sixty-five video scenarios and explanations.

Additional Special Features of This Text

We have included in Business Law, Eleventh Edition, a number of pedagogical devices and special features, including those discussed here.

Emerging Trends

Presented throughout this text are a number of features titled Emerging Trends. These features examine new developments in business law and the legal environment and their potential effect on businesspersons. Here are some examples of these features:

- E-Discovery and Cost-Shifting (Chapter 3).
- Stand-Your-Ground Laws (Chapter 9).
- Removing Class-Action Lawsuits to the Federal Courts (Chapter 23).
- New Issues in Online Privacy and Employment Discrimination (Chapter 34).

Contemporary Legal Debates

Contemporary Legal Debates features are also interspersed throughout this edition of Business Law. These features introduce the student to a controversial issue that is now being debated within the legal community. A Where Do You Stand? section concluding each feature asks the student to identify her or his position on the issue. Some examples of these features are:

- Tort Reform (Chapter 6).
- Are Online Fantasy Sports Gambling? (Chapter 13).
- A Shareholder Access Rule (Chapter 39).
- Should the EPA Take the Threat of Global Warming into Account? (Chapter 45).

Concept Summaries

Whenever key areas of the law need additional emphasis, we provide a Concept Summary. These summaries have always been a popular pedagogical tool in this text. There are now more than fifty of these summaries, many of which have been modified to achieve greater clarity.

Exhibits

When appropriate, we also illustrate important aspects of the law in graphic form in exhibits. In all, more than one hundred exhibits are featured in Business Law, Eleventh Edition. For this edition, we have added eight new exhibits, and we have modified existing exhibits to achieve better clarity. Some examples of the new exhibits are:

- Exhibit 2–3 Basic Differences in the Traditional Forms of ADR
- Exhibit 8–2 Existing Generic Top Level Domain Names
- Exhibit 26–2 Defenses against Liability on Negotiable Instruments
- Exhibit 38–1 Offshore Low-Tax Jurisdictions
- Exhibit 39–1 Directors' Management Responsibilities
- Exhibit 41–1 Basic Functions of the SEC

An Effective Case Format

For this edition, we have carefully selected recent cases that not only provide on-point illustrations of the legal principles discussed in the chapter but also are of high interest to students. In all, more than 70 percent of the cases in the Eleventh Edition are from 2006 or 2007.

As mentioned, for this edition we have included one Extended Case per chapter that is presented entirely in the court's language and does not include any paraphrased section on the case's background and facts or the decision and remedy. The remaining cases in each chapter appear in our usual Business

Law format, which now includes two case-ending questions for every case in this edition of the text. We also provide bracketed definitions for any terms in the opinion that might be difficult for students to understand. Cases may include one or more of the following sections, a few of which have already been described:

- Company Profiles—Certain cases include a profile describing the history of the company involved to give students an awareness of the context of the case before the court. Some profiles include the URL for the company's Web site.
- What If the Facts Were Different?—One case in each chapter concludes with this special section. The student is asked to decide whether a specified change in the facts of the case would alter its outcome. Suggested answers to these questions are included in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.
- The Ethical [E-Commerce, Global, or Legal Environment] Dimension—As discussed previously, these special new questions ask students to explore different aspects of the issues of the case and help instructors meet core curriculum requirements for business law. Suggested answers to these questions are included in both the Instructor's Manual and the Answers Manual that accompany this text.
- International Considerations—These sections let your students know how the particular issue before the court is treated in other countries.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law—Because many students are unclear about how some of the older cases presented in this text affect today's court rulings, we include a special section at the end of landmark and classic cases that clarifies the relevance of the particular case to modern law.

Two Test Banks Available

To provide instructors with even greater flexibility in teaching, we offer two separate test banks, each with a complete set of questions for every chapter of Business Law, Eleventh Edition. These two test banks have been significantly revised and many new questions added. Those instructors who would like to alternate the tests they give their students each semester can now do so without having to create additional testing materials. In addition, instructors who would like to pick and choose from the questions offered have twice as many options for questions in each category (true/false, multiple choice, essay).

Questions and Case Problems with Sample Answers

In response to those instructors who would like students to have sample answers available for some of the questions and case problems, we have included two questions with sample answers in each chapter. The Question with Sample Answer is a hypothetical question for which students can access a sample answer in Appendix I at the end of the text. Every chapter also has one Case Problem with Sample Answer that is based on an actual case and answered on the text's Web site (located at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson). Students can compare the answers provided to their own answers to determine whether they have done a good job of responding to the question and to learn what should be included when answering the end-of-chapter questions and case problems.

The Most Complete Supplements Package Available Today

This edition of Business Law is accompanied by a vast number of teaching and learning supplements. We have already mentioned the CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System and the supplemental resources available on the text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson. In addition, there are numerous other supplements, including those listed below, that make up the complete teaching/learning package for the Eleventh Edition. For further information on the Business Law teaching/learning package, contact your local sales representative or visit the Business Law Web site.

Printed Supplements

- Instructor's Manual—Includes case synopses, additional cases addressing the issue for selected cases, background information, teaching suggestions, and lecture enhancements, as well as suggested answers to all the case-ending and feature-ending questions, the questions in the Reviewing features at the end of each chapter, and additional materials on the Focus on Ethics sections at the end of each unit. (Also available on the Instructor's Resource CD, or IRCD.)

- Study Guide—Includes essay questions and sample CPA exam questions.
- Two comprehensive Test Banks—Test Bank 1 and Test Bank 2 each contain approximately 1,040 multiple-choice questions with answers, more than 1,040 true/false questions with answers, and two short essay questions per chapter (104 in each Test Bank). Additionally, there is one question for every Emerging Trends and Contemporary Legal Debates feature, and two multiple-choice questions for each Focus on Ethics section. (Also available on the IRCD.)
- Answers to Questions and Case Problems and Alternate Problem Sets with Answers—Provides answers to all the questions and case problems presented in the text, including the new Special Case Analysis questions, A Question of Ethics, and Video Questions, as well as suggested answers to all the case-ending questions, feature-ending questions, and the questions in the Reviewing features at the end of each chapter. (Also available on the IRCD.)
- Digital Video Library—Provides access to more than sixty-five videos, including the Drama of the Law videos and video clips from actual Hollywood movies. Access to our Digital Video Library is available in an optional package with each new text at no additional cost. If the Digital Video Library access did not come packaged with the textbook, your students can purchase it online at academic.cengage.com/blaw/dvl.
- Videos—Qualified adopters using this text have access to the entire library of videos in VHS format, a vast selection covering most business law issues. For more information about these videotapes, visit academic.cengage.com/blaw/vl.

Software, Video, and Multimedia Supplements

- Instructor's Resource CD-ROM (IRCD)—The IRCD includes the following supplements: Instructor's Manual, Answers Manual, Test Bank 1 and Test Bank 2, Case-Problem Cases, Case Printouts, Lecture Outline System, PowerPoint slides, ExamView, Instructor's Manual for the Drama of the Law video series, Handbook of Landmark Cases and Statutes in Business Law and the Legal Environment, Handbook on Critical Thinking and Writing in Business Law and the Legal Environment, and A Guide to Personal Law.
- ExamView Testing Software (also available on the IRCD).
- Lecture Outline System (also available on the IRCD).
- PowerPoint slides (also available on the IRCD).
- WebTutor—Feature chat, discussion groups, testing, student progress tracking, and business law course materials.
- Case-Problem Cases (available only on the IRCD).
- Transparencies (available only on the IRCD).
- Westlaw®—Ten free hours for qualified adopters.

For Users of the Tenth Edition

First of all, we want to thank you for helping make Business Law the best-selling business law text in America today. Second, we want to make you aware of the numerous additions and changes that we have made in this edition—many in response to comments from reviewers. For example, we have added more examples and incorporated the latest United States Supreme Court decisions throughout the text as appropriate. We have substantially revised and reorganized the business organizations unit (Unit Eight), particularly the chapters on corporations (Chapter 38 through 40), which have been changed to be more in line with the reality of modern corporate law. We have simplified and streamlined the chapter on securities law (Chapter 41), and we have revised and reorganized the property chapters (Chapters 47 and 48).

Significantly Revised Chapters

Every chapter of the Eleventh Edition has been revised as necessary to incorporate new developments in the law or to streamline the presentations. A number of new trends in business law are also addressed in the cases and special features of the Eleventh Edition. Other major changes and additions made for this edition include the following:

- Chapter 2 (Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution)—To provide greater clarity on important foundational issues, many parts of this chapter were reworked, including the discussions of personal jurisdiction, Internet jurisdiction, standing to sue, and appellate review. A chart was added to illustrate the differences among various methods of alternative dispute resolution, and we present a

- 2006 United States Supreme Court decision on arbitration clauses. In addition, the discussion of electronic filing systems and online dispute resolution was updated. An Insight into Ethics feature was added to discuss how the use of private judges is affecting the justice system.
- Chapter 3 (Court Procedures)—The section on electronic evidence and discovery issues has been updated to include the federal rules that took effect in 2006.
 - Chapter 4 (Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business)—The chapter has been thoroughly revised and updated to incorporate recent United States Supreme Court decisions, such as the case on Internet wine shipments and the dormant commerce clause. New examples have been added throughout, and the materials reworked to focus on business context. The chapter includes discussions of the USA Patriot Act's effect on constitutional rights and recent decisions on preemption, unprotected speech, freedom of religion, and privacy rights. A Contemporary Legal Debates feature addresses whether State Regulation of Internet Prescription Transactions Violates the Dormant Commerce Clause.
 - Chapter 5 (Ethics and Business Decision Making)—This chapter has been significantly revised and now includes a new section that provides step-by-step guidance on making ethical business decisions. Several new cases were added, and an Insight into the Global Environment feature addresses ethical issues faced by German corporations.
 - Chapter 6 (Intentional Torts)—A discussion of the compensatory and punitive damages available in tort actions was added, and a Contemporary Legal Debates feature addresses Tort Reform. Two cases from 2007 are included, one on the scope of an Internet service provider's immunity for online defamation and the other on invasion of privacy. New subsections discuss trends in appropriation (right of publicity) claims and abusive or frivolous litigation.
 - Chapter 8 (Intellectual Property and Internet Law)—The materials on intellectual property rights have been thoroughly revised and updated to reflect the most current laws and trends. Several recent United States Supreme Court cases are presented (the 2007 patent decision, KSR International Co. v. Teleflex, Inc., is the Extended Case, and the 2006 trademark decision in Menashe v. V Secret Catalogue, Inc. is also included). A subsection on counterfeit goods and a 2006 law addressing counterfeit goods has been added to the trademark section. The materials on domain names, cybersquatting, and licensing have been revamped. The section on patents was expanded and new examples were added. The discussion of file-sharing was updated, and a 2007 case is presented in which Sony Corporation brought a successful suit for copyright infringement against an individual who had downloaded eight songs. The chapter also includes updated information on international treaties protecting intellectual property and an Insight into E-Commerce feature on Search Engines versus Copyright Owners.
 - Chapter 9 (Criminal Law and Cyber Crime)—New materials on identity theft and criminal spamming laws were added, and the existing materials were streamlined to focus more on corporate criminal liability. An updated discussion of sentencing guidelines is included, and the discussion of defenses to criminal charges was revised. An Emerging Trends feature covers Stand-Your-Ground Laws (state laws allowing the use of deadly force in homes and vehicles to thwart violent crimes such as robbery, carjacking, and sexual assault).
 - Chapters 10 through 19 (the Contracts unit)—Throughout this unit, we have added more examples to clarify and enhance our already impressive contract law coverage. We have also included more up-to-date information and new features on topics likely to generate student interest, such as the Contemporary Legal Debates feature entitled Are Online Fantasy Sports Gambling? (in Chapter 13) and the feature on Internet Click Fraud (in Chapter 14). We have changed the titles of Chapters 14 and 15 to clearly describe the contents of each chapter in plain English (for example, the title "Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent" replaces the former title "Genuineness of Assent"). We have chosen cases, problems, and examples for this unit that garner student interest, such as the Mike Tyson example in Chapter 16, and have revised the text to improve clarity and reduce legalese.
 - Chapters 20 through 23 (the unit on Domestic and International Sales and Lease Contracts)—We have streamlined and simplified our coverage of the Uniform Commercial Code. We have added numerous new examples throughout the unit to increase student comprehension. Because no state has adopted the 2003 amendments to Articles 2 and 2A, we eliminated references to these amendments throughout the chapters.

- Chapters 24 through 27 (the unit on Negotiable Instruments)—We have updated this unit throughout to accommodate the reality of digital banking and funds transfers. In Chapter 24, we added an Insight into the Global Environment feature exploring the negotiability of checks in other nations. We added a new Concept Summary in Chapter 25 and replaced the Concept Summary on defenses in Chapter 26 with a more visually appealing exhibit on the same topic. In Chapter 27, we revised the materials to incorporate the Check-Clearing in the 21st Century Act (Check 21 Act) and included an Emerging Trends feature discussing how Using Digital Cash Facilities Money Laundering.
- Chapters 28 through 30 (the unit on Creditors' Rights and Bankruptcy)—This unit has been revised to be more up to date and comprehensible. Chapter 29 (Secured Transactions) was substantially reorganized to clarify the general rules of priority and the exceptions to those rules. The bankruptcy law chapter (Chapter 30) is based on law after the 2005 Reform Act and includes updated dollar amounts of various provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.
- Chapter 33 (Employment and Labor Law) and Chapter 34 (Employment Discrimination)—These two chapters covering employment law have been thoroughly updated to include discussions of legal issues facing employers today. Chapter 33 includes updated minimum wage figures and Social Security and Medicare percentages. It also discusses overtime rules and provides the most current information on unionization, strikes, and employment monitoring. Chapter 34 now includes the latest developments and United States Supreme Court decisions, such as a decision that applied Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to an employer with fewer than fifteen employees and another that set the standard of proof for retaliation claims. The text discussion of burden of proof in unintentional discrimination cases has been revised and clarified. A feature examines New Issues in Online Privacy and Employment Discrimination.
- Chapters 35 through 42 (the Business Organizations unit)—This unit has been substantially reorganized and updated to improve the flow and clarity, and provide more practical information and recent examples. In Chapter 35 (Sole Proprietorships and Franchises), we added a section on the Franchise Rule that includes the 2007 amendments to the rule. In Chapter 36 (Partnerships and Limited Liability Partnerships), we added several examples, reworked the section on fiduciary duties, and clarified the materials on dissociation. The most significant changes to the unit were made in the corporations chapters (Chapters 38 through 40). Chapter 38 now includes a more updated discussion of promotional activities, and the materials on incorporation procedures were completely revised to reflect current state laws. New sections were added on offshore low-tax jurisdictions, venture capital, and private equity financing. In Chapter 39, we added coverage of the landmark case Guth v. Loft (on the duty of loyalty), a new exhibit, and updated materials on Sarbanes-Oxley. We also added discussions of various committees of the board of directors, corporate sentencing guidelines, and proxies, including new e-proxy rules. The topic of shareholder voting concerning executive pay is discussed, and a Contemporary Legal Debates feature explores the possibility of a Shareholder Access Rule. Chapter 40 has been revised to include share exchanges, clarify successor liability, improve coverage of appraisal rights, and rework the material on tender offers. We include discussion of takeover defenses and directors' fiduciary duties. The chapter on securities law (Chapter 41) was revamped to make this difficult topic more understandable to students. The chapter now includes a new exhibit and overview of the functions of the Securities and Exchange Commission and a practical explanation of the Howey test. We also provide a simplified list of contents of a registration statements and an updated discussion of the registration process that clarifies current rules on a free writing prospectus. The final chapter in this unit (Chapter 42 on Law for Small Businesses) has also been considerably revised to address practical considerations, such as choosing to do business as a limited liability company, protecting trademarks, and avoiding liability. It also includes a feature on what businesspersons should consider before moving their small business online.

- Chapter 43 (Administrative Law)—This chapter has been reworked to focus on the practical significance of administrative law for businesspersons. A new section was added on the Administrative Procedures Act, and another section addresses how the courts give Chevron deference to agency rules. Informal agency actions are covered, and a new subsection discusses the exhaustion doctrine.

- Chapter 45 (Environmental Law)—The materials on air pollution and the subsection on wetlands have been updated. All of the cases in the chapter are from the United States Supreme Court, and a Contemporary Legal Debates feature discusses the 2007 Supreme Court decision in Massachusetts v. Environmental Protection Agency relating to global warming.
- Chapter 46 (Antitrust Law)—We added new examples and coverage of leading cases throughout the chapter, particularly in the discussions of price fixing, relevant product market, and relevant geographic market.

- Chapters 47 and 48 (the Property unit)—We reorganized and reworked the materials in the two property chapters as reviewers requested. Chapter 47 now begins with a section discussing the differences between personal and real property, and why the law makes this distinction. The materials on forms of property ownership (such as fee simple and joint tenancy) were moved from the personal property chapter (Chapter 47) to the real property chapter (48). The coverage of bailments was updated and simplified. Chapter 48 also includes more information on real estate sales contracts, including listing agreements, escrow agreements, marketable title, title searches, and title insurance.

Acknowledgments for Previous Editions

Since we began this project many years ago, a sizable number of business law professors and others have helped us in various phases of the undertaking. The following reviewers offered numerous constructive criticisms, comments, and suggestions during the preparation of all previous editions.

Jeffrey E. Allen

University of Miami

Judith Anshin

Sacramento City College

Thomas M. Apke

California State University, Fullerton

Raymond August

Washington State University

William Auslen

San Francisco City College

Mary B. Bader

Moorhead State University

Frank Bagan

County College of Morris

John J. Balek

Morton College, Illinois

Michael G. Barth

University of Phoenix

David L. Baumer

North Carolina State University

Barbara E. Behr

Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania

Robert B. Bennett, Jr.

Butler University

Heidi Boerstler

University of Colorado at Denver

Lawrence J. Bradley

University of Notre Dame

Doug Brown

Montana State University

Kristi K. Brown

University of Texas at Austin

William J. Burke

University of Massachusetts, Lowell

Kenneth Burns

University of Miami

Daniel R. Cahoy

Pennsylvania State University

Jeanne A. Calderon

New York University

Joseph E. Cantrell

DeAnza College, California

Donald Cantwell

University of Texas at Arlington

Robert Chatov

State University of New York, Buffalo

Robert J. Cox

Salt Lake Community College

Thomas Crane

University of Miami

Kenneth S. Culott

University of Texas at Austin

Larry R. Curtis

Iowa State University

Richard Dalebout

Brigham Young University

William H. Daughtrey, Jr.

Virginia Commonwealth University

Michele A. Dunkerley

University of Texas at Austin

O. E. Elmore

Texas A&M University

Robert J. Enders

California State Polytechnic University, Pomona

Michael Engber

Ball State University

David A. Escamilla

University of Texas at Austin

Frank S. Forbes

University of Nebraska at Omaha

Joe W. Fowler

Oklahoma State University

- Stanley G. Freeman
University of South Carolina
- Christ Gaetanos
State University of New York, Fredonia
- Chester S. Galloway
Auburn University
- Bob Garrett
American River College, California
- Gary L. Giese
University of Colorado at Denver
- Thomas Gossman
Western Michigan University
- Patrick O. Gudridge
University of Miami School of Law
- James M. Haine
University of Wisconsin, Stevens Point
- Gerard Halpern
University of Arkansas
- Christopher L. Hamilton
Golden West College, California
- JoAnn W. Hammer
University of Texas at Austin
- Charles Hartman
Wright State University, Ohio
- Richard A. Hausler
University of Miami School of Law
- Harry E. Hicks
Butler University, Indianapolis
- Janine S. Hiller
Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University
- Rebecca L. Hillyer
Chemeketa Community College
- E. Clayton Hipp, Jr.
Clemson University
- Anthony H. Holliday, Jr.
Howard University
- Telford Hollman
University of Northern Iowa
- June A. Horrigan
California State University, Sacramento
- John P. Huggard
North Carolina State University
- Terry Hutchins
*Pembroke State University,
North Carolina*
- Robert Jespersen
University of Houston
- Bryce J. Jones
Northeast Missouri State University
- Margaret Jones
Southwest Missouri State College
- Peter A. Karl III
SUNY Institute of Technology at Utica
- Jack E. Karns
East Carolina University
- Tamra Kempf
University of Miami
- Judith Kenney
University of Miami
- Barbara Kincaid
Southern Methodist University
- Carey Kirk
University of Northern Iowa
- Nancy P. Klintworth
University of Central Florida
- Kurtis P. Klumb
University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee
- Kathleen M. Knutson
College of St. Catherine, St. Paul, Minnesota
- M. Alan Lawson
Mt. San Antonio College
- Susan Liebeler
Loyola University
- Thomas E. Maher
California State University, Fullerton
- Sal Marchionna
Triton College, Illinois
- Gene A. Marsh
University of Alabama
- Karen Kay Matson
University of Texas at Austin
- Woodrow J. Maxwell
Hudson Valley Community College, New York
- Bruce E. May
University of South Dakota
- Gail McCracken
University of Michigan, Dearborn
- John W. McGee
Southwest Texas State University
- Cotton Meagher
University of Nevada at Las Vegas
- Roger E. Meiners
University of Texas at Arlington
- Gerald S. Meisel
Bergen Community College, New Jersey
- Richard Mills
Cypress College
- David Minars
City University of New York, Brooklyn
- Leo Moersen
The George Washington University
- Alan Moggio
Illinois Central College
- Violet E. Molnar
Riverside City College
- James E. Moon
Meyer, Johnson & Moon, Minneapolis
- Melinda Ann Mora
University of Texas at Austin
- Bob Morgan
Eastern Michigan University
- Joan Ann Mrava
Los Angeles Southwest College
- Dwight D. Murphey
Wichita State University
- Daniel E. Murray
University of Miami School of Law
- Paula C. Murray
University of Texas
- Gregory J. Naples
Marquette University
- George A. Nation III
Lehigh University

Caleb L. Nichols*Western Connecticut State UniversityJohn M. NorwoodUniversity of ArkansasMichael J. O'HaraUniversity of Nebraska at OmahaRick F. OrsingerCollege of DuPage, IllinoisDaniel J. O'SheaHillsborough Community CollegeThomas L. PalmerNorthern Arizona UniversityCharles M. PattenUniversity of Wisconsin, OshkoshPatricia PattisonTexas State University, San MarcosPeyton J. PaxsonUniversity of Texas at AustinRalph L. QuinonesUniversity of Wisconsin, OshkoshCarol D. RasnicVirginia Commonwealth UniversityMarvin H. RobertsonHarding UniversityGary K. SambolRutgers State UniversityRudy SandovalUniversity of Texas, San AntonioSidney S. SappingtonYork College of PennsylvaniaMartha SartorisNorth Hennepin Community CollegeBarbara P. SchellerTemple UniversityS. Alan SchlactKennesaw State University, GeorgiaLorne H. SeidmanUniversity of Nevada at Las VegasRoscoe B. ShainAustin Peay UniversityBennett D. ShulmanLansing Community College, MichiganS. Jay SklarTemple UniversityDana Blair SmithUniversity of Texas at AustinMichael SmydraOakland Community College—Royal OakArthur SouthwickUniversity of MichiganSylvia A. SpadeUniversity of Texas at AustinJohn A. SparksGrove City College, PennsylvaniaBrenda SteuerNorth Harris College, HoustonCraig StilwellMichigan State UniversityIrwin StotskyUniversity of Miami School of LawLarry StrateUniversity of Nevada at Las VegasRaymond Mason TaylorNorth Carolina State UniversityH. Allan TolbertCentral Texas CollegeJesse C. TrentadueUniversity of North DakotaEdwin TuckerUniversity of ConnecticutGary VictorEastern Michigan UniversityWilliam H. VolzWayne State UniversityDavid VynckeScott Community College, IowaWilliam H. WalkerIndiana University—Purdue University, Fort WayneDiana WalshCounty College of MorrisRobert J. WalterUniversity of Texas at El PasoGary WatsonCalifornia State University, Los AngelesJohn L. WeimerNicholls State University, LouisianaMarshall WilkersonUniversity of Texas at AustinArthur D. WolfeMichigan State UniversityElizabeth A. WolfeUniversity of Texas at AustinDaniel R. WrentmoreSanta Barbara City CollegeNorman Gregory YoungCalifornia State Polytechnic University, PomonaRonald C. YoungKalamazoo Valley Community College, Michigan*

We would also like to give credit to the following reviewers for their useful input during development of the CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System.

Nena Ellison*Florida Atlantic UniversityJacqueline HagerottFranklin UniversityMelanie MorrisRaritan Valley Community CollegeWilliam H. VolzWayne State University*

Acknowledgments for the Eleventh Edition

In preparing the Eleventh Edition of Business Law, we worked closely with the following reviewers, each of whom offered us valuable suggestions for how to improve the text:

Maria Kathleen Boss

California State University, Los Angeles

Rita Cain

University of Missouri– Kansas City

Jeanne A. Calderon

New York University

Nanette C. Clinch

San Jose State University

Larry R. Curtis

Iowa State University

Leslie E. Lenn

St. Edwards University

Barry S. Morinaka

Baker College–Michigan

S. Alan Schlact

Kennesaw State University, Georgia

Elisabeth Sperow

California Polytechnic University, San Luis Obispo

Charles R. B. Stowe

Sam Houston State University

Melanie Stallings Williams

California State University– Northridge

As in all past editions, we owe a debt of extreme gratitude to the numerous individuals who worked directly with us or at Cengage Learning. In particular, we wish to thank Rob Dewey for his helpful advice and guidance during all of the stages of this new edition. We extend our thanks to Jan Lamar, our longtime developmental editor, for her many useful suggestions and for her efforts in coordinating reviews and ensuring the timely and accurate publication of all supplemental materials. We are also indebted to Lisa Lysne for her support and excellent marketing advice, and to Brian Courter and Rob Ellington for their skills in managing the Web site.

Our production manager and designer, Bill Stryker, made sure that we came out with an error-free, visually attractive Eleventh Edition. We appreciate his efforts more than he can ever imagine. We are also indebted to the staff at Parkwood Composition, our compositor. Their ability to generate the pages for this text quickly and accurately made it possible for us to meet our ambitious printing schedule.

We especially wish to thank Katherine Marie Silsbee for her management of the entire project, as well as for the application of her superb research and editorial skills. We also wish to thank Lavina Leed Miller for her significant contributions to this project, and William Eric Hollowell, who co-authored the Instructor's Manual, the Study Guide, and the two Test Banks, for his excellent research efforts. We were fortunate enough to have the copyediting of Pat Lewis and the proofreading services of Lorretta Palagi and Beverly Peavler. We also thank Vickie Reiersen and Roxanna Lee for their proofreading and other assistance, which helped to ensure an error-free text. Finally, we thank Suzanne Jasin of K & M Consulting for her many special efforts on this project.

In addition, we would like to give special thanks to all of the individuals who were instrumental in developing and implementing the new CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System. These include Rob Dewey, Jan Lamar, Lisa Lysne, and Christine Wittmer at Cengage, and Katherine Marie Silsbee, Roger Meiners, Lavina Leed Miller, William Eric Hollowell, Kimberly Wallan, and Kristi Wiswell who helped develop the content for this unique Web-based product.

Through the years, we have enjoyed an ongoing correspondence with many of you who have found points on which you wish to comment. We continue to welcome all comments and promise to respond promptly. By incorporating your ideas, we can continue to write a business law text that is best for you and best for your students.

PREFACE TO THE STUDENT

Welcome to the world of business law and the legal environment. You are about to embark on the study of one of the most important topics you should master in today's changing world. A solid understanding of business law can, of course, help you if you are going into the world of business. If you decide on a career in accounting, economics, finance, political science, or history, understanding how the legal environment works is crucial. Moreover, in your role as a consumer, you will be faced with some legal issues throughout your lifetime—renting an apartment, buying a house, obtaining a mortgage, and leasing a car, to mention only a few. In your role as an employee (if you don't go into business for yourself), you will need to know what rights you have and what rights you don't have. Even when you contemplate marriage, you will be faced with legal issues.

What You Will Find in This Text

As you will see as you thumb through the pages in this text, we have tried to make your study of business law and the legal environment as efficient and enjoyable as possible. To this end, you will find the following aids:

1. Mastering Terminology—through key terms that are boldfaced, listed at the end of each chapter, and explained fully in the Glossary at the end of the book.
2. Understanding Concepts—through numerous Concept Summaries and exhibits.
3. Observing the Law in the Context of the Real World—through a Reviewing feature at the end of every chapter.
4. Seeing How Legal Issues Can Arise—through Video Questions based on Web-available short videos, many from actual Hollywood movies.
5. Figuring Out How the Law Is Evolving—through a feature called Emerging Trends.
6. Determining Today's Legal Controversies—through a feature called Contemporary Legal Debates.
7. Gaining Insights into How the Law Affects or Is Affected by Other Issues—through three new Insight features called Insight into E-Commerce, Insight into Ethics, and Insight into the Global Environment.

The above list, of course, is representative only. You will understand much more of what the law is about as you read through the court cases presented in this book, including extended case excerpts, which will give you a feel for how the courts really decide cases, in the courts' language.

Improving Your Ability to Perform Legal Reasoning and Analysis

Although business law may seem to be a mass of facts, your goal in taking this course should also be an increased ability to use legal reasoning and analysis to figure out how legal situations will be resolved. To this end, you will find the following key learning features to assist you in mastering legal reasoning and analysis:

- Finding and Analyzing Case Law—In Chapter 1, you will find a section with this title that explains:
 1. Legal citations.
 2. The standard elements of a case.
 3. The different types of opinions a court can issue.
 4. How to read and understand cases.
- Briefing a Case—In Appendix A, you will see how to brief and analyze case problems. This explanation teaches you how to break down the elements of a case and will improve your ability to answer the Case Problems in each chapter.

- Questions with Sample Answers—At the end of each chapter, there is one hypothetical factual scenario that presents a legal question for which you can access a sample answer in Appendix I (and also on the text's Web site). This allows you to practice and to see if you are answering the hypothetical problems correctly.
- Case Problems with Sample Answers—Each chapter has a series of chapter-ending Case Problems. You can find an answer to one problem in each chapter on this book's student companion Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson. You can easily compare your answer to the court's answer in the actual case.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law—Each landmark classic case concludes with a short section that explains the relevance of older case law to the way courts reason today.
- What If the Facts Were Different?—This section, found at the end of selected cases, encourages you to think about how the outcome of a case might be different if the facts were altered.
- The Ethical [E-Commerce, Global, or Legal Environment] Dimension—Every case in this text concludes with two critical-thinking questions, which may include What If the Facts Were Different? questions, as discussed above. For this edition, we've included several new possibilities—(The Ethical Dimension, The E-Commerce Dimension, The Global Dimension, and The Legal Environment Dimension.) These questions ask you to explore the law in a variety of contexts to help you meet the specific curriculum requirements for business law students.
- Legal reference materials including a “Statutes” page that offers links to the full text of selected statutes referenced in the text, a Spanish glossary, and links to other important legal resources available for free on the Web.
- Internet exercises for every chapter in the text (at least two per chapter) that introduce you to how to research the law online.
- Relevant Web sites for additional research for Emerging Trends features as well as links to the URLs listed in the Law on the Web section at the end of each chapter.
- Online Legal Research Guide that offers complete yet brief guidance to using the Internet and evaluating information obtained from the Internet. As an online resource, it now includes hyperlinks to the Web sites discussed for click-through convenience.
- Court case updates for follow-up research on topics covered in the text.
- Link to CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System with different types of questions related to every chapter in the text and one set of cumulative questions for each unit in the text. (Available on an instructor's request, see below.)

Interactive Assignments on the Web

Some of you may have instructors who provide assignments using our world-class interactive Web-based system, called CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System.

CengageNOW for Business Law: Interactive Assignment System allows you to improve your mastery of legal concepts and terminology, legal reasoning and analysis, and much more. Your instructor will give you further information if she or he decides to use this Web-based system.

Of course, whether or not you are using the CengageNOW system, you will wish to consider purchasing the Study Guide, which can help you get a better grade in your course (see the inside cover for details).

The law is all around you—and will be for the rest of your life. We hope that you begin your first course in business law and the legal environment with the same high degree of excitement that we, the authors, always have when we work on improving this text, now in its Eleventh Edition. Business Law has withstood the test of time—several million students before you have already used and benefited by it.

The Companion Student Web Site

As already mentioned, the companion student Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson provides you with short videos on various legal topics and with sample answers to one case problem per chapter. In addition, you will find the following:

- Interactive quizzes for every chapter.
- A glossary of terms for every chapter in the text.
- Flashcards that provide an optional study tool for reviewing the key terms in every chapter.
- Appendix A: How to Brief and Analyze Case Problems that will help you analyze cases. This useful appendix for the book is also provided on the Web site and can be downloaded.

Dedication

To John Meisenbach,

You are truly one of the world's good guys.
Thanks for your friendship and your professionalism.

R.L.M.

To my wife, Joann; my children, Kathy,
Gary, Lori, and Rory; and my grandchildren,
Erin, Megan, Eric, Emily, Michelle, Javier, Carmen, and Steve.

G.A.J.

To my parents and sisters.

F.B.C.

UNIT ONE

The Legal Environment of Business

CONTENTS

- 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning
- 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution
- 3 Court Procedures
- 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business
- 5 Ethics and Business Decision Making

CHAPTER 1

Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

One of the important functions of law in any society is to provide stability, predictability, and continuity so that people can be sure of how to order their affairs. If any society is to survive, its citizens must be able to determine what is legally right and legally wrong. They must know what sanctions will be imposed on them if they commit wrongful acts. If they suffer harm as a result of others' wrongful acts, they must know how they can seek redress. By setting forth the rights, obligations, and privileges of citizens, the law enables individuals to go about their business with confidence and a certain degree of predictability. The stability and predictability created by the law provide an essential framework for all civilized activities, including business activities.

What do we mean when we speak of "the law"? Although this term has had, and will continue to have, different definitions, they are all based on a general observation: at a minimum, law consists of enforceable rules governing relationships among individuals and between individuals and their society. These "enforceable rules" may consist of unwritten principles of behavior established by a nomadic tribe. They may be set forth in a law code, such as the Code of Hammurabi in ancient Babylon (c. 1780 B.C.E.) or the law code of one of today's European nations. They may consist of written laws and court decisions created by modern legislative and judicial bodies, as in the United States. Regardless of how such rules are created, they all have one thing in common: they establish rights, duties, and privileges that are consistent with the values and beliefs of their society or its ruling group.

Those who embark on a study of law will find that these broad statements leave unanswered some important questions concerning the nature of law. Part of the study of law, often referred to as jurisprudence, involves learning about different schools of jurisprudential thought and discovering how the approaches to law characteristic of each school can affect judicial decision making.

We open this introductory chapter with an examination of that topic. We then look at an important question for any student reading this text: How does the legal environment affect business decision making? We next describe the basic sources of American law, the common law tradition, and some general classifications of law. We conclude the chapter with sections offering practical guidance on several topics, including how to find the sources of law discussed in this chapter (and referred to throughout the text) and how to read and understand court opinions.

Schools of Jurisprudential Thought

You may think that legal philosophy is far removed from the practical study of business law and the legal environment. In fact, it is not. As you will learn in the chapters of this text, how judges apply the law to specific disputes, including disputes relating to the business world, depends in part on their philosophical approaches to law.

Clearly, judges are not free to decide cases solely on the basis of their personal philosophical views or on their opinions about the issues before the court. A judge's function is not to make the laws—that is the function of the legislative branch of government—but to interpret and apply them. From a practical point of view, however, the courts play a significant role in defining what the law is. This is because laws enacted by legislative bodies tend to be expressed in general terms. Judges thus have some flexibility in interpreting and applying the law. It is because of this flexibility that different courts can, and often do, arrive at different conclusions in cases that involve nearly identical issues, facts, and applicable laws. This flexibility also means that each judge's unique personality, legal philosophy, set of values, and intellectual attributes necessarily frame the judicial decision-making process to some extent.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

Over time several significant schools of legal, or jurisprudential, thought have evolved. We now look at some of them.

The Natural Law School

An age-old question about the nature of law has to do with the finality of a nation's laws, such as the laws of the United States at the present time. For example, what if a particular law is deemed to be a "bad" law by a substantial number of that nation's citizens? Must a citizen obey the law if it goes against his or her conscience to do so? Is there a higher or universal law to which individuals can appeal? One who adheres to the natural law tradition would answer these questions in the affirmative. Natural law denotes a system of moral and ethical principles that are inherent in human nature and that people can discover through the use of their natural intelligence, or reason.

The natural law tradition is one of the oldest and most significant schools of jurisprudence. It dates back to the days of the Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 B.C.E.), who distinguished between natural law and the laws governing a particular nation. According to Aristotle, natural law applies universally to all humankind.

The notion that people have "natural rights" stems from the natural law tradition. Those who claim that a specific foreign government is depriving certain citizens of their human rights implicitly are appealing to a higher law that has universal applicability. The question of the universality of basic human rights also comes into play in the context of international business operations. Should rights extended to workers in the United States, such as the right to be free of discrimination in the workplace, be extended to workers employed by a U.S. firm doing business in another country that does not provide for such rights? This question is rooted implicitly in a concept of universal rights that has its origins in the natural law tradition.

The Positivist School

In contrast, positive law, or national law (the written law of a given society at a particular point in time), applies only to the citizens of that nation or society. Those who adhere to the positivist school believe that there can be no higher law than a nation's positive law. According to the positivist school, there is no such thing as "natural rights." Rather, human rights exist solely because of laws. If the laws are not enforced, anarchy will result. Thus, whether a law is "bad" or "good" is irrelevant. The law is the law and must be obeyed until it is changed—in an orderly manner through a legitimate lawmaking process. A judge with positivist leanings probably would be more inclined to defer to an existing law than would a judge who adheres to the natural law tradition.

The Historical School

The historical school of legal thought emphasizes the evolutionary process of law by concentrating on the origin and history of the legal system. Thus, this school looks to the past to discover what the principles of contemporary law should be. The legal doctrines that have withstood the passage of time—those that have worked in the past—are deemed best suited for shaping present laws. Hence, law derives its legitimacy and authority from adhering to the standards that historical development has shown to be workable. Adherents of the historical school are more likely than those of other schools to strictly follow decisions made in past cases.

Legal Realism

In the 1920s and 1930s, a number of jurists and scholars, known as legal realists, rebelled against the historical approach to law. Legal realism is based on the idea that law is just one of many institutions in society and that it is shaped by social forces and needs. The law is a human enterprise, and judges should take social and economic realities into account when deciding cases. Legal realists also believe that the law can never be applied with total uniformity. Given that judges are human beings with unique personalities, value systems, and intellects, different judges will obviously bring different reasoning processes to the same case.

Legal realism strongly influenced the growth of what is sometimes called the sociological school of jurisprudence. This school views law as a tool for promoting justice in society. In the 1960s, for example, the justices of the United States Supreme Court played a leading role in the civil rights movement by upholding long-neglected laws calling for equal treatment for all Americans, including African Americans and other minorities. Generally, jurists who adhere to this philosophy of law are more likely to depart from past decisions than are those jurists who adhere to the other schools of legal thought. Concept Summary 1.1 reviews the schools of jurisprudential thought.

Business Activities and the Legal Environment

As those entering the world of business will learn, laws and government regulations affect virtually all business activities—from hiring and firing decisions to workplace safety, the manufacturing and marketing of products, business financing, and more. To make good business decisions, a basic knowledge of the laws and regulations governing these activities is beneficial—if not essential. Realize also that in today's world a knowledge of “black-letter” law is not enough. Businesspersons are also pressured to make ethical decisions. Thus, the study of business law necessarily involves an ethical dimension.

Many Different Laws May Affect a Single Business Transaction

As you will note, each chapter in this text covers a specific area of the law and shows how the legal rules in that area affect business activities. Though compartmentalizing the law in this fashion promotes conceptual clarity, it does not indicate the extent to which a number of different laws may apply to just one transaction.

Consider an example. Suppose that you are the president of NetSys, Inc., a company that creates and maintains computer network systems for its clients, including business firms. NetSys also markets software for customers who require an internal computer network. One day, Hernandez, an operations officer for Southwest Distribution Corporation (SDC), contacts you by e-mail about a possible contract concerning SDC's computer network. In deciding whether to enter

CONCEPT SUMMARY 1.1 Schools of Jurisprudential Thought

School of Thought	Description
THE NATURAL LAW SCHOOL	One of the oldest and most significant schools of legal thought. Those who believe in natural law hold that there is a universal law applicable to all human beings. This law is discoverable through reason and is of a higher order than positive (national) law.
THE POSITIVIST SCHOOL	A school of legal thought centered on the assumption that there is no law higher than the laws created by the government. Laws must be obeyed, even if they are unjust, to prevent anarchy.
THE HISTORICAL SCHOOL	A school of legal thought that stresses the evolutionary nature of law and that looks to doctrines that have withstood the passage of time for guidance in shaping present laws.
LEGAL REALISM	A school of legal thought, popular during the 1920s and 1930s, that left a lasting imprint on American jurisprudence. Legal realists generally advocated a less abstract and more realistic and pragmatic approach to the law, an approach that would take into account customary practices and the circumstances in which transactions take place. Legal realism strongly influenced the growth of the sociological school of jurisprudence, which views law as a tool for promoting social justice.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

into a contract with SDC, you should consider, among other things, the legal requirements for an enforceable contract. Are there different requirements for a contract for services and a contract for products? What are your options if SDC breaches (breaks, or fails to perform) the contract? The answers to these questions are part of contract law and sales law.

Other questions might concern payment under the contract. How can you guarantee that NetSys will be paid? For example, if payment is made with a check that is returned for insufficient funds, what are your options? Answers to these questions can be found in the laws that relate to negotiable instruments (such as checks) and creditors' rights. Also, a dispute may occur over the rights to NetSys's software, or there may be a question of liability if the software is defective. Questions may even be raised as to whether you and Hernandez had the authority to make the deal in the first place. A disagreement may arise from other circumstances, such as an accountant's evaluation of the contract. Resolutions of these questions may be found in areas of the law that relate to intellectual property, e-commerce, torts, product liability, agency, business organizations, or professional liability.

Finally, if any dispute cannot be resolved amicably, then the laws and the rules concerning courts and court procedures spell out the steps of a lawsuit. Exhibit 1-1 illustrates the various areas of law that may influence business decision making.

Ethics and Business Decision Making

Merely knowing the areas of law that may affect a business decision is not sufficient in today's business world. Businesspersons must also take ethics into account. As you will learn in Chapter 5, ethics is generally defined as the study of what constitutes right or wrong behavior. Today, business decision makers need to consider not just whether a decision is legal, but also whether it is ethical.

Throughout this text, you will learn about the relationship between the law and ethics, as well as about some of the types of ethical questions that often arise in the business context. For example, the unit-ending Focus on Ethics features in this text are devoted solely to the exploration of ethical questions pertaining to selected topics treated within the unit. We have also added several new features for this edition that stress

EXHIBIT 1-1 • Areas of the Law That May Affect Business Decision Making the importance of ethical considerations in today's business climate. These include the new Ethical Dimension questions that conclude many of the cases presented in this text and the Insight into Ethics features that appear in selected chapters. We have also included A Question of Ethics case problems at the ends of the chapters to introduce you to the ethical aspects of specific cases involving real-life situations. Additionally, Chapter 5 offers a detailed look at the importance of ethical considerations in business decision making.

Sources of American Law

There are numerous sources of American law. Primary sources of law, or sources that establish the law, include the following:

1. The U.S. Constitution and the constitutions of the various states.
2. Statutory law—including laws passed by Congress, state legislatures, or local governing bodies.
3. Regulations created by administrative agencies, such as the Food and Drug Administration.
4. Case law and common law doctrines.

We describe each of these important sources of law in the following pages.

Secondary sources of law are books and articles that summarize and clarify the primary sources of law. Examples include legal encyclopedias, treatises, articles in law reviews, and compilations of law, such as the Restatements of the Law (which will be discussed shortly). Courts often refer to secondary sources of law for guidance in interpreting and applying the primary sources of law discussed here.

Constitutional Law

The federal government and the states have separate written constitutions that set forth the general organization, powers, and limits of their respective governments. Constitutional law is the law as expressed in these constitutions.

According to Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. As such, it is the basis of all law in the United States. A law in violation of the Constitution, if challenged, will be declared unconstitutional and will not be enforced, no matter what its source. Because of its importance in the American legal system, we present the complete text of the U.S. Constitution in Appendix B.

The Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution reserves to the states all powers not granted to the federal government. Each state in the union has its own constitution. Unless it conflicts with the U.S. Constitution or a federal law, a state constitution is supreme within the state's borders.

Statutory Law

Laws enacted by legislative bodies at any level of government, such as the statutes passed by Congress or by state legislatures, make up the body of law generally referred to as statutory law. When a legislature passes a statute, that statute ultimately is included in the federal code of laws or the relevant state code of laws (these codes are discussed later in this chapter).

Statutory law also includes local ordinances—statutes (laws, rules, or orders) passed by municipal or county governing units to govern matters not covered by federal or state law. Ordinances commonly have to do with city or county land use (zoning ordinances), building and safety codes, and other matters affecting the local community.

A federal statute, of course, applies to all states. A state statute, in contrast, applies only within the state's borders. State laws thus may vary from state to state. No federal statute may violate the U.S. Constitution, and no state statute or local ordinance may violate the U.S. Constitution or the relevant state constitution.

Uniform Laws The differences among state laws were particularly notable in the 1800s, when conflicting state statutes frequently made trade and commerce among the states difficult. To counter these problems, in 1892 a group of legal scholars and lawyers formed the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) to draft uniform laws, or model laws, for the states to consider adopting. The NCCUSL still exists today and continues to issue uniform laws.

Each state has the option of adopting or rejecting a uniform law. Only if a state legislature adopts a uniform law does that law become part of the statutory law of that state. Note that a state legislature may adopt all or part of a uniform law as it is written, or the legislature may rewrite the law however the legislature wishes. Hence, even though many states may have adopted a uniform law, those states' laws may not be entirely "uniform."

The earliest uniform law, the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, was completed by 1896 and adopted in every state by the early 1920s (although not all states used exactly the same wording). Over the following decades, other acts were drawn up in a similar manner. In all, more than two hundred uniform acts have been issued by the NCCUSL since its inception. The most ambitious uniform act of all, however, was the Uniform Commercial Code.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

The Uniform Commercial Code The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which was created through the joint efforts of the NCCUSL and the American Law Institute,¹ was first issued in 1952. All fifty states,² the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands have adopted the UCC. It facilitates commerce among the states by providing a uniform, yet flexible, set of rules governing commercial transactions. The UCC assures businesspersons that their contracts, if validly entered into, normally will be enforced.

As you will read in later chapters, from time to time the NCCUSL revises the articles contained in the UCC and submits the revised versions to the states for adoption. During the 1990s, for example, four articles (Articles 3, 4, 5, and 9) were revised, and two new articles (Articles 2A and 4A) were added. Amendments to Article 1 were approved in 2001 and have now been adopted by a majority of the states. Because of its importance in the area of commercial law, we cite the UCC frequently in this text. We also present the UCC in Appendix C.

Administrative Law

Another important source of American law is administrative law, which consists of the rules, orders, and decisions of administrative agencies. An administrative agency is a federal, state, or local government agency established to perform a specific function. Administrative law and procedures, which will be examined in detail in Chapter 43, constitute a dominant element in the regulatory environment of business. Rules issued by various administrative agencies now affect virtually every aspect of a business's operations, including its capital structure and financing, its hiring and firing procedures, its relations with employees and unions, and the way it manufactures and markets its products.

1. This institute was formed in the 1920s and consists of practicing attorneys, legal scholars, and judges.

2. Louisiana has not adopted Articles 2 and 2A (covering contracts for the sale and lease of goods), however.

Federal Agencies At the national level, numerous executive agencies exist within the cabinet departments of the executive branch. The Food and Drug Administration, for example, is an agency within the Department of Health and Human Services. Executive agencies are subject to the authority of the president, who has the power to appoint and remove officers of federal agencies. There are also major independent regulatory agencies at the federal level, such as the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Federal Communications Commission. The president's power is less pronounced in regard to independent agencies, whose officers serve for fixed terms and cannot be removed without just cause.

State and Local Agencies There are administrative agencies at the state and local levels as well. Commonly, a state agency (such as a state pollution-control agency) is created as a parallel to a federal agency (such as the Environmental Protection Agency). Just as federal statutes take precedence over conflicting state statutes, so federal agency regulations take precedence over conflicting state regulations.

Case Law and Common Law Doctrines

The rules of law announced in court decisions constitute another basic source of American law. These rules of law include interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies. Today, this body of judge-made law is referred to as case law. Case law—the doctrines and principles announced in cases—governs all areas not covered by statutory law or administrative law and is part of our common law tradition. We look at the origins and characteristics of the common law tradition in some detail in the pages that follow. See Concept Summary 1.2 on the next page for a review of the sources of American law.

The Common Law Tradition

Because of our colonial heritage, much of American law is based on the English legal system, which originated in medieval England and continued to evolve in the following centuries. Knowledge of this system is necessary to understanding the American legal system today.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 1.2

Sources of American Law

Source	Description
CONSTITUTIONAL LAW	The law as expressed in the U.S. Constitution and the state constitutions. The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law of the land. State constitutions are supreme within state borders to the extent that they do not violate a clause of the U.S. Constitution or a federal law.
STATUTORY LAW	Laws (statutes and ordinances) created by federal, state, and local legislatures and governing bodies. None of these laws may violate the U.S. Constitution or the relevant state constitution. Uniform statutes, when adopted by a state, become statutory law in that state.
ADMINISTRATIVE LAW	The rules, orders, and decisions of federal, state, or local government administrative agencies.
CASE LAW AND COMMON LAW DOCTRINES	Judge-made law, including interpretations of constitutional provisions, of statutes enacted by legislatures, and of regulations created by administrative agencies.

Early English Courts

The origins of the English legal system—and thus the U.S. legal system as well—date back to 1066, when the Normans conquered England. William the Conqueror and his successors began the process of unifying the country under their rule. One of the means they used to do this was the establishment of the king's courts, or curiae regis. Before the Norman Conquest, disputes had been settled according to the local legal customs and traditions in various regions of the country. The king's courts sought to establish a uniform set of customs for the country as a whole. What evolved in these courts was the beginning of the common law—a body of general rules that applied throughout the entire English realm. Eventually, the common law tradition became part of the heritage of all nations that were once British colonies, including the United States.

Courts of Law and Remedies at Law The early English king's courts could grant only very limited kinds of remedies (the legal means to enforce a right or redress a wrong). If one person wronged another in some way, the king's courts could award as compensation one or more of the following: (1) land, (2) items of value, or (3) money. The courts that awarded this compensation became known as courts of law, and the three remedies were called remedies at law. (Today, the remedy at law normally takes the form of monetary damages—an amount given to a party whose legal interests have been injured.) Even though the system introduced uniformity in the settling of disputes, when a complaining party wanted a remedy other than economic compensation, the courts of law could do nothing, so “no remedy, no right.”

Courts of Equity and Remedies in Equity

Equity is a branch of law, founded on what might be described as notions of justice and fair dealing, that seeks to supply a remedy when no adequate remedy at law is available. When individuals could not obtain an adequate remedy in a court of law, they petitioned the king for relief. Most of these petitions were decided by an adviser to the king, called a chancellor, who had the power to grant new and unique remedies. Eventually, formal chancery courts, or courts of equity, were established.

The remedies granted by the equity courts became known as remedies in equity, or equitable remedies. These remedies include specific performance (ordering a party to perform an agreement as promised), an injunction (ordering a party to cease engaging in a specific activity or to undo some wrong or injury), and rescission (the cancellation of a contractual obligation). We discuss these and other equitable remedies in more detail at appropriate points in the chapters that follow, particularly in Chapter 18.

As a general rule, today's courts, like the early English courts, will not grant equitable remedies unless the remedy at law—monetary damages—is inadequate. For example, suppose that you form a contract (a legally binding agreement—see Chapter 10) to purchase a parcel of land that you think will be just perfect for your future home. Further suppose that the seller breaches this agreement. You could sue the seller for the return of any deposits or down payment you might have made on the land, but this is not the remedy you really seek. What you want is to have the court order the seller to go through with the contract. In other words, you want the court to grant the equitable remedy of specific performance because monetary damages are inadequate in this situation.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

Equitable Maxims In fashioning appropriate remedies, judges often were (and continue to be) guided by so-called equitable maxims—propositions or general statements of equitable rules. Exhibit 1–2 lists some important equitable maxims. The last maxim listed in that exhibit—“Equity aids the vigilant, not those who rest on their rights”—merits special attention. It has become known as the equitable doctrine of laches (a term derived from the Latin laxus, meaning “lax” or “negligent”), and it can be used as a defense. A defense is an argument raised by the defendant (the party being sued) indicating why the plaintiff (the suing party) should not obtain the remedy sought. (Note that in equity proceedings, the party bringing a lawsuit is called the petitioner, and the party being sued is referred to as the respondent.)

The doctrine of laches arose to encourage people to bring lawsuits while the evidence was fresh. What constitutes a reasonable time, of course, varies according to the circumstances of the case. Time periods for different types of cases are now usually fixed by statutes of limitations. After the time allowed under a statute of limitations has expired, no action (lawsuit) can be brought, no matter how strong the case was originally.

Legal and Equitable Remedies Today

The establishment of courts of equity in medieval England resulted in two distinct court systems: courts of law and courts of equity. The systems had different sets of judges and granted different types of remedies. During the nineteenth century, however, most states in the United States adopted rules of procedure that resulted in the combining of courts of law and equity. A party now may request both legal and equitable remedies in the same action, and the trial court judge may grant either or both forms of relief.

The distinction between legal and equitable remedies remains relevant to students of business law, however, because these remedies differ. To seek the proper remedy for a wrong, one must know what remedies are available. Additionally, certain vestiges of the procedures used when there were separate courts of law and equity still exist. For example, a party has the right to demand a jury trial in an action at law, but not in an action in equity. Exhibit 1–3 on page 10 summarizes the procedural differences (applicable in most states) between an action at law and an action in equity.

The Doctrine of Stare Decisis

One of the unique features of the common law is that it is judge-made law. The body of principles and doctrines that form the common law emerged over time as judges decided legal controversies.

EXHIBIT 1–2 • Equitable Maxims

1. Whoever seeks equity must do equity. (Anyone who wishes to be treated fairly must treat others fairly.)
2. Where there is equal equity, the law must prevail. (The law will determine the outcome of a controversy in which the merits of both sides are equal.)
3. One seeking the aid of an equity court must come to the court with clean hands. (Plaintiffs must have acted fairly and honestly.)
4. Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy. (Equitable relief will be awarded when there is a right to relief and there is no adequate remedy at law.)
5. Equity regards substance rather than form. (Equity is more concerned with fairness and justice than with legal technicalities.)
6. Equity aids the vigilant, not those who rest on their rights. (Equity will not help those who neglect their rights for an unreasonable period of time.)

EXHIBIT 1-3 • Procedural Differences between an Action at Law and an Action in Equity

Procedure	Action at Law	Action in Equity
Initiation of lawsuit	By filing a complaint	By filing a petition
Parties	Plaintiff and defendant	Petitioner and respondent
Decision	By jury or judge	By judge (no jury)
Result	Judgment	Decree
Remedy	Monetary damages	Injunction, specific performance, or rescission

Case Precedents and Case Reporters

When possible, judges attempted to be consistent and to base their decisions on the principles suggested by earlier cases. They sought to decide similar cases in a similar way and considered new cases with care because they knew that their decisions would make new law. Each interpretation became part of the law on the subject and served as a legal precedent—that is, a decision that furnished an example or authority for deciding subsequent cases involving similar legal principles or facts.

In the early years of the common law, there was no single place or publication where court opinions, or written decisions, could be found. By the early fourteenth century, portions of the most important decisions of each year were being gathered together and recorded in Year Books, which became useful references for lawyers and judges. In the sixteenth century, the Year Books were discontinued, and other forms of case publication became available. Today, cases are published, or “reported,” in volumes called reporters, or reports. We describe today’s case reporting system in detail later in this chapter.

Stare Decisis and the Common Law Tradition The practice of deciding new cases with reference to former decisions, or precedents, became a cornerstone of the English and American judicial systems. The practice formed a doctrine known as stare decisis³ (a Latin phrase meaning “to stand on decided cases”).

Under this doctrine, judges are obligated to follow the precedents established within their jurisdictions. The term jurisdiction refers to an area in which a court or courts have the power to apply the law—see Chapter 2. Once a court has set forth a principle of law as being applicable to a certain set of facts, that court and courts of lower rank (within the same jurisdiction) must adhere to that principle and apply it in future cases involving similar fact patterns. Thus, stare decisis has two aspects: first, that decisions made by a higher court are binding on lower courts; and second, that a court should not overturn its own precedents unless there is a compelling reason to do so.

The doctrine of stare decisis helps the courts to be more efficient because if other courts have carefully analyzed a similar case, their legal reasoning and opinions can serve as guides. Stare decisis also makes the law more stable and predictable. If the law on a given subject is well settled, someone bringing a case to court can usually rely on the court to make a decision based on what the law has been in the past.

A Typical Scenario To illustrate how the doctrine of stare decisis works, consider an example. Suppose that the lower state courts in Georgia have reached conflicting conclusions on whether drivers are liable for accidents they cause while merging into freeway traffic. Some courts have held drivers liable even though the drivers looked and did not see any oncoming traffic and even though witnesses (passengers in their cars) testified to that effect. To settle the law on this issue, the Georgia Supreme Court decides to review a case involving this fact pattern. The court rules that, in such a situation, the driver who is merging into traffic is liable for any accidents caused by the driver’s failure to yield to freeway traffic—even if the driver looked carefully and did not see an approaching vehicle.

The Georgia Supreme Court’s decision on this matter is a binding authority—a case precedent, statute, or other source of law that a court must follow when

3. Pronounced ster-ay dih-si-ses.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

deciding a case. In other words, the Georgia Supreme Court's decision will influence the outcome of all future cases on this issue brought before the Georgia state courts. Similarly, a decision on a given question by the United States Supreme Court (the nation's highest court), no matter how old, is binding on all courts.

Departures from Precedent Although courts are obligated to follow precedents, sometimes a court will depart from the rule of precedent if it decides that the precedent should no longer be followed. If a court decides that a ruling precedent is simply incorrect or that technological or social changes have rendered the precedent inapplicable, the court might rule contrary to the precedent. Cases that overturn precedent often receive a great deal of publicity.

Note that judges do have some flexibility in applying precedents. For example, a lower court may avoid applying a precedent set by a higher court in its jurisdiction by distinguishing the two cases based on their facts. When this happens, the lower court's ruling stands unless it is appealed to a higher court and that court overturns the decision.

When There Is No Precedent Occasionally, the courts must decide cases for which no precedents exist, called cases of first impression. For example, as you will read throughout this text, the extensive use of the Internet has presented many new and challenging issues for the courts to decide. In deciding cases of first impression, courts often look at persuasive authorities (precedents from other jurisdictions) for guidance. A court may also consider a number of factors, including legal principles and policies underlying previous court decisions or existing statutes, fairness, social values and customs, public policy (governmental policy based on widely held societal values), and data and concepts drawn from the social sciences. Which of these sources is chosen or receives the greatest emphasis depends on the nature of the case being considered and the particular judge or judges hearing the case.

Stare Decisis and Legal Reasoning

Legal reasoning is the reasoning process used by judges in deciding what law applies to a given dispute and then applying that law to the specific facts or circumstances of the case. Through the use of legal reasoning, judges harmonize their decisions with those that have been made before, as the doctrine of stare decisis requires.

Students of business law and the legal environment also engage in legal reasoning. For example, you may be asked to provide answers for some of the case problems that appear at the end of every chapter in this text. Each problem describes the facts of a particular dispute and the legal question at issue. If you are assigned a case problem, you will be asked to determine how a court would answer that question, and why. In other words, you will need to give legal reasons for whatever conclusion you reach.⁴ We look here at the basic steps involved in legal reasoning and then describe some forms of reasoning commonly used by the courts in making their decisions.

Basic Steps in Legal Reasoning At times, the legal arguments set forth in court opinions are relatively simple and brief. At other times, the arguments are complex and lengthy. Regardless of the length of a legal argument, however, the basic steps of the legal reasoning process remain the same. These steps, which you also can follow when analyzing cases and case problems, form what is commonly referred to as the IRAC method of legal reasoning. IRAC is an acronym formed from the first letters of the following words: Issue, Rule, Application, and Conclusion. To apply the IRAC method, you would ask the following questions:

1. What are the key facts and issues? For example, suppose that a plaintiff comes before the court claiming assault (a wrongful and intentional action in which one person makes another fearful of immediate physical harm—part of a class of actions called torts). The plaintiff claims that the defendant threatened her while she was sleeping. Although the plaintiff was unaware that she was being threatened, her roommate heard the defendant make the threat. The legal issue, or question, raised by these facts is whether the defendant's actions constitute the tort of assault, given that the plaintiff was not aware of those actions at the time they occurred.
2. What rules of law apply to the case? A rule of law may be a rule stated by the courts in previous decisions, a state or federal statute, or a state or federal administrative agency regulation. In our hypothetical case, the plaintiff alleges (claims) that the defendant committed a tort. Therefore, the applicable law is the common law of torts—specifically, tort law governing assault (see Chapter 6 for more detail on intentional torts). Case precedents involving similar facts and issues thus would be relevant. Often, more than one rule of law will be applicable to a case.

4. See Appendix A for further instructions on how to analyze case problems.

3. How do the rules of law apply to the particular facts and circumstances of this case? This step is often the most difficult because each case presents a unique set of facts, circumstances, and parties. Although cases may be similar, no two cases are ever identical in all respects. Normally, judges (and lawyers and law students) try to find cases on point—previously decided cases that are as similar as possible to the one under consideration. (Because of the difficulty—and importance—of this step in the legal reasoning process, we discuss it in more detail in the next subsection.)
4. What conclusion should be drawn? This step normally presents few problems. Usually, the conclusion is evident if the previous three steps have been followed carefully.

Forms of Legal Reasoning Judges use many types of reasoning when following the third step of the legal reasoning process—applying the law to the facts of a particular case. Three common forms of reasoning are deductive reasoning, linear reasoning, and reasoning by analogy.

Deductive Reasoning. Deductive reasoning is sometimes called sylogistic reasoning because it employs a sylogism—a logical relationship involving a major premise, a minor premise, and a conclusion. For example, consider the hypothetical case presented earlier, in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendant committed assault by threatening her while she was sleeping. The judge might point out that “under the common law of torts, an individual must be aware of a threat of danger for the threat to constitute assault” (major premise); “the plaintiff in this case was unaware of the threat at the time it occurred” (minor premise); and “therefore, the circumstances do not amount to an assault” (conclusion).

Linear Reasoning. A second important form of legal reasoning that is commonly employed might be thought of as “linear” reasoning because it proceeds from one point to another, with the final point being the conclusion. An analogy will help make this form of reasoning clear. Imagine a knotted rope, with each knot tying together separate pieces of rope to form a tightly knotted length. As a whole, the rope represents a linear progression of thought logically connecting various points, with the last point, or knot, representing the conclusion. For example, suppose that a tenant in an apartment building sues the landlord for damages for an injury resulting from an allegedly inadequately lit stairway. The court may engage in a reasoning process involving the following “pieces of rope”:

1. The landlord, who was on the premises the evening the injury occurred, testifies that none of the other nine tenants who used the stairway that night complained about the lights.
2. The fact that none of the tenants complained is the same as if they had said the lighting was sufficient.
3. That there were no complaints does not prove that the lighting was sufficient but does prove that the landlord had no reason to believe that it was not.
4. The landlord’s belief was reasonable because no one complained.
5. Therefore, the landlord acted reasonably and was not negligent with respect to the lighting in the stairway.

From this reasoning, the court concludes that the tenant is not entitled to compensation on the basis of the stairway’s allegedly insufficient lighting.

Reasoning by Analogy. Another important type of reasoning that judges use in deciding cases is reasoning by analogy. To reason by analogy is to compare the facts in the case at hand to the facts in other cases and, to the extent that the patterns are similar, to apply the same rule of law to the present case. To the extent that the facts are unique, or “distinguishable,” different rules may apply. For example, in case A, the court held that a driver who crossed a highway’s center line was negligent. Case B involves a driver who crosses the line to avoid hitting a child. In determining whether case A’s rule applies in case B, a judge would consider what the reasons were for the decision in A and whether B is sufficiently similar for those reasons to apply. If the judge holds that B’s driver is not liable, that judge must indicate why case A’s rule is not relevant to the facts presented in case B.

There Is No One “Right” Answer

Many persons believe that there is one “right” answer to every legal question. In most situations involving a legal controversy, however, there is no single correct result. Good arguments can often be made to support either side of a legal controversy. Quite often, a case does not involve a “good” person suing a “bad” person. In many cases, both parties have acted in good faith in some measure or in bad faith to some degree.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

Additionally, each judge has her or his own personal beliefs and philosophy, which shape, at least to some extent, the process of legal reasoning. This means that the outcome of a particular lawsuit before a court cannot be predicted with absolute certainty. In fact, in some cases, even though the weight of the law would seem to favor one party’s position, judges, through creative legal reasoning, have found ways to rule in favor of the other party in the interests of preventing injustice. Legal reasoning and other aspects of the common law tradition are reviewed in Concept Summary 1.3.

all areas not covered by statutory or administrative law. In a dispute concerning a particular employment practice, for example, if a statute regulates that practice, the statute will apply rather than the common law doctrine that applied prior to the enactment of the statute.

The Continuing Importance of the Common Law

Because the body of statutory law has expanded greatly since the beginning of this nation, thus narrowing the applicability of common law doctrines, it might seem that the common law has dwindled in importance. This is not true, however. For one thing, even in areas governed by statutory law, there is a significant interplay between statutory law and the common law. For example, many statutes essentially codify existing common law rules, and regulations issued by various administrative agencies usually are based, at least in part, on common law principles. Additionally, the courts, in interpreting statutory law, often rely on the

The Common Law Today

Today, the common law derived from judicial decisions continues to be applied throughout the United States. Common law doctrines and principles govern

CONCEPT SUMMARY 1.3 The Common Law Tradition

Aspect	Description
ORIGINS OF THE COMMON LAW	The American legal system is based on the common law tradition, which originated in medieval England. Following the conquest of England in 1066 by William the Conqueror, king’s courts were established throughout England, and the common law was developed in these courts.
LEGAL AND EQUITABLE REMEDIES	The distinction between remedies at law (money or items of value, such as land) and remedies in equity (including specific performance, injunction, and rescission of a contractual obligation) originated in the early English courts of law and courts of equity, respectively.
CASE PRECEDENTS AND THE DOCTRINE OF STARE DECISIS	In the king’s courts, judges attempted to make their decisions consistent with previous decisions, called precedents. This practice gave rise to the doctrine of stare decisis . This doctrine, which became a cornerstone of the common law tradition, obligates judges to abide by precedents established in their jurisdictions.
STARE DECISIS AND LEGAL REASONING	Legal reasoning refers to the reasoning process used by judges in applying the law to the facts and issues of specific cases. Legal reasoning involves becoming familiar with the key facts of a case, identifying the relevant legal rules, applying those rules to the facts, and drawing a conclusion. In applying the legal rules to the facts of a case, judges may use deductive reasoning, linear reasoning, or reasoning by analogy.

common law as a guide to what the legislators intended.

Furthermore, how the courts interpret a particular statute determines how that statute will be applied. If you wanted to learn about the coverage and applicability of a particular statute, for example, you would necessarily have to locate the statute and study it. You would also need to see how the courts in your jurisdiction have interpreted and applied the statute. In other words, you would have to learn what precedents have been established in your jurisdiction with respect to that statute. Often, the applicability of a newly enacted statute does not become clear until a body of case law develops to clarify how, when, and to whom the statute applies.

Restatements of the Law

The American Law Institute (ALI) has drafted and published compilations of the common law called Restatements of the Law, which generally summarize the common law rules followed by most states. There are Restatements of the Law in the areas of contracts, torts, agency, trusts, property, restitution, security, judgments, and conflict of laws. The Restatements, like other secondary sources of law, do not in themselves have the force of law, but they are an important source of legal analysis and opinion on which judges often rely in making their decisions.

Many of the Restatements are now in their second, third, or fourth editions. We refer to the Restatements frequently in subsequent chapters of this text, indicating in parentheses the edition to which we are referring. For example, we refer to the second edition of the Restatement of the Law of Contracts as simply the Restatement (Second) of Contracts.

Classifications of Law

The substantial body of the law may be broken down according to several classification systems. For example, one classification system divides law into substantive law and procedural law. Substantive law consists of all laws that define, describe, regulate, and create legal rights and obligations. Procedural law consists of all laws that delineate the methods of enforcing the rights established by substantive law. Other classification systems divide law into federal law and state law, private law (dealing with relationships between private entities) and public law (addressing the relationship between persons and their governments), and national law and international law. Here we look at still another classification system, which divides law into civil law and criminal law, as well as at what is meant by the term cyberlaw.

Civil Law and Criminal Law

Civil law spells out the rights and duties that exist between persons and between persons and their governments, as well as the relief available when a person's rights are violated. Typically, in a civil case, a private party sues another private party (although the government can also sue a party for a civil law violation) to make that other party comply with a duty or pay for the damage caused by failure to comply with a duty. Much of the law that we discuss in this text is civil law. Contract law, for example, covered in Chapters 10 through 19, is civil law. The whole body of tort law (see Chapters 6 and 7) is also civil law.

Criminal law, in contrast, is concerned with wrongs committed against the public as a whole. Criminal acts are defined and prohibited by local, state, or federal government statutes. Criminal defendants are thus prosecuted by public officials, such as a district attorney (D.A.), on behalf of the state, not by their victims or other private parties. (See Chapter 9 for a further discussion of the distinction between civil law and criminal law.)

Cyberlaw

As mentioned, the use of the Internet to conduct business transactions has led to new types of legal issues. In response, courts have had to adapt traditional laws to situations that are unique to our age. Additionally, legislatures have created laws to deal specifically with such issues. Frequently, people use the term cyberlaw to refer to the emerging body of law that governs transactions conducted via the Internet. Cyberlaw is not really a classification of law, nor is it a new type of law. Rather, it is an informal term used to describe traditional legal principles that have been modified and adapted to fit situations that are unique to the online world. Of course, in some areas new statutes have been enacted, at both the federal and state levels, to cover specific types of problems stemming from online communications. Throughout this book, you will read how the law in a given area is evolving to govern specific legal issues that arise in the online context.

How to Find Primary Sources of Law

This text includes numerous citations to primary sources of law—federal and state statutes, the U.S. Constitution and state constitutions, regulations issued by administrative agencies, and court cases. (A citation is a reference to a publication in which a legal authority—such as a statute or a court decision or other source—can be found.) In this section, we explain how you can use citations to find primary sources of law. Note that in addition to the primary sources being published in sets of books as described next, most federal and state laws and case decisions are also available online.

Finding Statutory and Administrative Law

When Congress passes laws, they are collected in a publication titled United States Statutes at Large. When state legislatures pass laws, they are collected in similar state publications. Most frequently, however, laws are referred to in their codified form—that is, the form in which they appear in the federal and state codes. In these codes, laws are compiled by subject.

United States Code The United States Code (U.S.C.) arranges all existing federal laws by broad subject. Each of the fifty subjects is given a title and a title number. For example, laws relating to commerce and trade are collected in Title 15, “Commerce and Trade.” Titles are subdivided by sections. A citation to the U.S.C. includes both title and section numbers. Thus, a reference to “15 U.S.C. Section 1” means that the statute can be found in Section 1 of Title 15. (“Section” may also be designated by the symbol §, and “Sections,” by §§.) In addition to the print publication of the U.S.C., the federal government also provides a searchable online database of the United States Code at www.gpoaccess.gov/uscode/index.html.

Commercial publications of federal laws and regulations are also available. For example, West Group publishes the United States Code Annotated (U.S.C.A.). The U.S.C.A. contains the official text of the U.S.C., plus notes (annotations) on court decisions that interpret and apply specific sections of the statutes. The U.S.C.A. also includes additional research aids, such as cross-references to related statutes, historical notes, and library references. A citation to the U.S.C.A. is similar to a citation to the U.S.C.: “15 U.S.C.A. Section 1.”

State Codes State codes follow the U.S.C. pattern of arranging law by subject. They may be called codes, revisions, compilations, consolidations, general statutes, or statutes, depending on the preferences of the states. In some codes, subjects are designated by number. In others, they are designated by name. For example, “13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101” means that the statute can be found in Title 13, Section 1101, of the Pennsylvania code. “California Commercial Code Section 1101” means that the statute can be found under the subject heading “Commercial Code” of the California code in Section 1101. Abbreviations are often used. For example, “13 Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes Section 1101” is abbreviated “13 Pa. C.S. § 1101,” and “California Commercial Code Section 1101” is abbreviated “Cal. Com. Code § 1101.”

Administrative Rules Rules and regulations adopted by federal administrative agencies are initially published in the Federal Register, a daily publication of the U.S. government. Later, they are incorporated into the Code of Federal Regulations (C.F.R.). Like the U.S.C., the C.F.R. is divided into fifty titles. Rules within each title are assigned section numbers. A full citation to the C.F.R. includes title and section numbers. For example, a reference to “17 C.F.R. Section 230.504” means that the rule can be found in Section 230.504 of Title 17.

Finding Case Law

Before discussing the case reporting system, we need to look briefly at the court system (which will be discussed in detail in Chapter 2). There are two types of courts in the United States, federal courts and state courts. Both the federal and state court systems consist of several levels, or tiers, of courts. Trial courts, in which evidence is presented and testimony given, are on the bottom tier (which also includes lower courts that handle specialized issues). Decisions from a trial court can be appealed to a higher court, which commonly is an intermediate court of appeals, or an appellate court. Decisions from these intermediate courts of appeals may be appealed to an even higher court, such as a state supreme court or the United States Supreme Court.

State Court Decisions Most state trial court decisions are not published in books (except in New York and a few other states, which publish selected trial court opinions). Decisions from state trial courts are typically filed in the office of the clerk of the court, where the decisions are available for public inspection. Written decisions of the appellate, or reviewing, courts, however, are published and distributed (both in print and via the Internet). As you will note, most of the state court cases presented in this book are from state appellate courts. The reported appellate decisions are published in volumes called reports or reporters, which are numbered consecutively. State appellate court decisions are found in the state reporters of that particular state. Official reports are volumes that are published by the state, whereas unofficial reports are privately published.

Regional Reporters. State court opinions appear in regional units of the National Reporter System, published by West Group. Most lawyers and libraries have the West reporters because they report cases more quickly, and are distributed more widely, than the state-published reporters. In fact, many states have eliminated their own reporters in favor of West's National Reporter System. The National Reporter System divides the states into the following geographic areas: Atlantic (A. or A.2d), North Eastern (N.E. or N.E.2d), North Western (N.W. or N.W.2d), Pacific (P., P.2d, or P.3d), South Eastern (S.E. or S.E.2d), South Western (S.W., S.W.2d, or S.W.3d), and Southern (So. or So.2d). (The 2d and 3d in the preceding abbreviations refer to Second Series and Third Series, respectively.) The states included in each of these regional divisions are indicated in Exhibit 1-4, which illustrates West's National Reporter System.

Case Citations. After appellate decisions have been published, they are normally referred to (cited) by the name of the case; the volume, name, and page number of the state's official reporter (if different from West's National Reporter System); the volume, name, and page number of the National Reporter; and the volume, name, and page number of any other selected reporter. (Citing a reporter by volume number, name, and page number, in that order, is common to all citations; often, as in this book, the year the decision was issued will be included in parentheses, just after the citations to reporters.) When more than one reporter is cited for the same case, each reference is called a parallel citation.

Note that some states have adopted a "public domain citation system" that uses a somewhat different format for the citation. For example, in Wisconsin, a Wisconsin Supreme Court decision might be designated "2008 WI 40," meaning that the case was decided in the year 2008 by the Wisconsin Supreme Court and was the fortieth decision issued by that court during that year. Parallel citations to the Wisconsin Reports and West's North Western Reporter are still included after the public domain citation.

Consider the following case citation: Borelli v. H and H Contracting, Inc., 100 Conn.App. 680, 919 A.2d 500 (2007). We see that the opinion in this case can be found in Volume 100 of the official Connecticut Appellate Reports, on page 680. The parallel citation is to Volume 919 of the Atlantic Reporter, Second Series, page 500. In presenting appellate opinions in this text, in addition to the reporter, we give the name of the court hearing the case and the year of the court's decision. Sample citations to state court decisions are explained in Exhibit 1-5 on pages 18-20.

Federal Court Decisions Federal district (trial) court decisions are published unofficially in West's Federal Supplement (F.Supp. or F.Supp.2d), and opinions from the circuit courts of appeals (reviewing courts) are reported unofficially in West's Federal Reporter (F., F.2d, or F.3d). Cases concerning federal bankruptcy law are published unofficially in West's Bankruptcy Reporter (Bankr. or B.R.).

The official edition of the United States Supreme Court decisions is the United States Reports (U.S.), which is published by the federal government. Unofficial editions of Supreme Court cases include West's Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.) and the Lawyers' Edition of the Supreme Court Reports (L.Ed. or L.Ed.2d). Sample citations for federal court decisions are also listed and explained in Exhibit 1-5.

Unpublished Opinions Many court opinions that are not yet published or that are not intended for publication can be accessed through Westlaw[®] (abbreviated in citations as "WL"), an online legal database maintained by West Group. When no citation to a published reporter is available for cases cited in this text, we give the WL citation (see Exhibit 1-5 for an example). Can a court consider unpublished decisions as persuasive precedent? See this chapter's Insight into E-Commerce feature on pages 22 and 23 for a discussion of this issue.

Old Case Law On a few occasions, this text cites opinions from old, classic cases dating to the nineteenth century or earlier; some of these are from the

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

EXHIBIT 1-4 • West's National Reporter System—Regional/Federal

Regional Reporters	Coverage Beginning	Coverage
Atlantic Reporter (A. or A.2d)	1885	Connecticut, Delaware, District of Columbia, Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont.
North Eastern Reporter (N.E. or N.E.2d)	1885	Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New York, and Ohio.
North Western Reporter (N.W. or N.W.2d)	1879	Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.
Pacific Reporter (P., P.2d, or P.3d)	1883	Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.
South Eastern Reporter (S.E. or S.E.2d)	1887	Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia.
South Western Reporter (S.W., S.W.2d, or S.W.3d)	1886	Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and Texas.
Southern Reporter (So. or So.2d)	1887	Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi.
Federal Reporters
Federal Reporter (F., F.2d, or F.3d)	1880	U.S. Circuit Courts from 1880 to 1912; U.S. Commerce Court from 1911 to 1913; U.S. District Courts from 1880 to 1932; U.S. Court of Claims (now called U.S. Court of Federal Claims) from 1929 to 1932 and since 1960; U.S. Courts of Appeals since 1891; U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals since 1929; U.S. Emergency Court of Appeals since 1943.
Federal Supplement (F.Supp. or F.Supp.2d)	1932	U.S. Court of Claims from 1932 to 1960; U.S. District Courts since 1932; U.S. Customs Court since 1956.
Federal Rules Decisions (F.R.D.)	1939	U.S. District Courts involving the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure since 1939 and Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure since 1946.
Supreme Court Reporter (S.Ct.)	1882	United States Supreme Court since the October term of 1882.
Bankruptcy Reporter (Bankr.)	1980	Bankruptcy decisions of U.S. Bankruptcy Courts, U.S. District Courts, U.S. Courts of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court.
Military Justice Reporter (M.J.)	1978	U.S. Court of Military Appeals and Courts of Military Review for the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Coast Guard.

NATIONAL REPORTER SYSTEM MAP

EXHIBIT 1-5 • How to Read Citations

STATE COURTS

273 Neb. 379, 730 N.W.2d 357 (2007)^a

N.W. is the abbreviation for West's publication of state court decisions rendered in the North Western Reporter of the National Reporter System. 2d indicates that this case was included in the Second Series of that reporter. The number 730 refers to the volume number of the reporter; the number 357 refers to the page in that volume on which this case begins.

Neb. is an abbreviation for Nebraska Reports, Nebraska's official reports of the decisions of its highest court, the Nebraska Supreme Court.

146 Cal.App.4th 565, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 908 (2007)

Cal.Rptr. is the abbreviation for West's unofficial reports—titled California Reporter—of the decisions of California courts.

8 N.Y.3d 422, 867 N.E.2d 381, 835 N.Y.S.2d 530 (2007)

N.Y.S. is the abbreviation for West's unofficial reports—titled New York Supplement—of the decisions of New York courts.

N.Y. is the abbreviation for New York Reports, New York's official reports of the decisions of its court of appeals. The New York Court of Appeals is the state's highest court, analogous to other states' supreme courts. In New York, a supreme court is a trial court.

284 Ga.App. 474, 644 S.E.2d 311 (2007)

Ga.App. is the abbreviation for Georgia Appeals Reports, Georgia's official reports of the decisions of its court of appeals.

FEDERAL COURTS

— U.S. —, 127 S.Ct. 1513, 167 L.Ed.2d 422 (2007)

L.Ed. is an abbreviation for Lawyers' Edition of the Supreme Court Reports, an unofficial edition of decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

S.Ct. is the abbreviation for West's unofficial reports—titled Supreme Court Reporter—of decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

U.S. is the abbreviation for United States Reports, the official edition of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

a. The case names have been deleted from these citations to emphasize the publications. It should be kept in mind, however, that the name of a case is as important as the specific page numbers in the volumes in which it is found. If a citation is incorrect, the correct citation may be found in a publication's index of case names. In addition to providing a check on errors in citations, the date of a case is important because the value of a recent case as an authority is likely to be greater than that of older cases.

EXHIBIT 1-5 • How to Read Citations—Continued

FEDERAL COURTS (Continued)
477 F.3d 908 (8th Cir. 2007)
	8th Cir. is an abbreviation denoting that this case was decided in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.
478 F.Supp.2d 496 (S.D.N.Y. 2007)
	S.D.N.Y. is an abbreviation indicating that the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York decided this case.
ENGLISH COURTS
9 Exch. 341, 156 Eng.Rep. 145 (1854)
	Eng.Rep. is an abbreviation for English Reports, Full Reprint , a series of reports containing selected decisions made in English courts between 1378 and 1865.
	Exch. is an abbreviation for English Exchequer Reports , which includes the original reports of cases decided in England's Court of Exchequer.
STATUTORY AND OTHER CITATIONS
18 U.S.C. Section 1961(1)(A)
	U.S.C. denotes United States Code , the codification of United States Statutes at Large . The number 18 refers to the statute's U.S.C. title number and 1961 to its section number within that title. The number 1 in parentheses refers to a subsection within the section, and the letter A in parentheses refers to a subdivision within the subsection.
UCC 2-206(1)(b)
	UCC is an abbreviation for Uniform Commercial Code . The first number 2 is a reference to an article of the UCC, and 206 to a section within that article. The number 1 in parentheses refers to a subsection within the section, and the letter b in parentheses to a subdivision within the subsection.
Restatement (Second) of Torts, Section 568
	Restatement (Second) of Torts refers to the second edition of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Torts . The number 568 refers to a specific section.
17 C.F.R. Section 230.505
	C.F.R. is an abbreviation for Code of Federal Regulations , a compilation of federal administrative regulations. The number 17 designates the regulation's title number, and 230.505 designates a specific section within that title.

EXHIBIT CONTINUES

EXHIBIT 1-5 • How to Read Citations—Continued

Westlaw® Citations^b

2007 WL 1660910

WL is an abbreviation for Westlaw. The number 2007 is the year of the document that can be found with this citation in the Westlaw database. The number 1660910 is a number assigned to a specific document. A higher number indicates that a document was added to the Westlaw database later in the year.

Uniform Resource Locators (URLs)

<http://www.westlaw.com>^c

The suffix com is the top level domain (TLD) for this Web site. The TLD com is an abbreviation for “commercial,” which usually means that a for-profit entity hosts (maintains or supports) this Web site.

westlaw is the host name—the part of the domain name selected by the organization that registered the name. In this case, West Group registered the name. This Internet site is the Westlaw database on the Web.

www is an abbreviation for “World Wide Web.” The Web is a system of Internet servers that support documents formatted in HTML (hypertext markup language). HTML supports links to text, graphics, and audio and video files.

<http://www.uscourts.gov>

This is “The Federal Judiciary Home Page.” The host is the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. The TLD gov is an abbreviation for “government.” This Web site includes information and links from, and about, the federal courts.

<http://www.law.cornell.edu/index.html>

This part of a URL points to a Web page or file at a specific location within the host’s domain. This page is a menu with links to documents within the domain and to other Internet resources.

This is the host name for a Web site that contains the Internet publications of the Legal Information Institute (LII), which is a part of Cornell Law School. The LII site includes a variety of legal materials and links to other legal resources on the Internet. The TLD edu is an abbreviation for “educational institution” (a school or a university).

<http://www.ipl.org/div/news>

This part of the Web site points to a static news page at this Web site, which provides links to online newspapers from around the world.

div is an abbreviation for “division,” which is the way that the Internet Public Library tags the content on its Web site as relating to a specific topic.

ipl is an abbreviation for “Internet Public Library,” which is an online service that provides reference resources and links to other information services on the Web. The IPL is supported chiefly by the School of Information at the University of Michigan. The TLD org is an abbreviation for “organization” (normally nonprofit).

b. Many court decisions that are not yet published or that are not intended for publication can be accessed through Westlaw[®], an online legal database.

c. The basic form for a URL is “service://hostname/path.” The Internet service for all of the URLs in this text is http (hypertext transfer protocol). Because most Web browsers add this prefix automatically when a user enters a host name or a hostname/path, we have omitted the http:// from the URLs listed in this text.

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

English courts. The citations to these cases may not conform to the descriptions given above because the reporters in which they were published were often known by the names of the persons who compiled the reporters and have since been replaced.

How to Read and Understand Case Law

The decisions made by the courts establish the boundaries of the law as it applies to virtually all business relationships. It thus is essential that businesspersons know how to read and understand case law. The cases that we present in this text have been condensed from the full text of the courts' opinions and are presented in a special format. In approximately two-thirds of the cases, we have summarized the background and facts, as well as the court's decision and remedy, in our own words and have included only selected portions of the court's opinion ("in the language of the court"). In the remaining one-third of the cases, we have provided a longer excerpt from the court's opinion without summarizing the background and facts or decision and remedy. For those who wish to review court cases as part of research projects or to gain additional legal information, the following sections will provide useful insights into how to read and understand case law.

Case Titles

The title of a case, such as Adams v. Jones, indicates the names of the parties to the lawsuit. The v. in the case title stands for versus, which means "against." In the trial court, Adams was the plaintiff—the person who filed the suit. Jones was the defendant. If the case is appealed, however, the appellate court will sometimes place the name of the party appealing the decision first, so the case may be called Jones v. Adams if Jones is appealing. Because some appellate courts retain the trial court order of names, it is often impossible to distinguish the plaintiff from the defendant in the title of a reported appellate court decision. You must carefully read the facts of each case to identify the parties. Otherwise, the discussion by the appellate court may be difficult to understand.

Terminology

The following terms, phrases, and abbreviations are frequently encountered in court opinions and legal publications. Because it is important to understand what is meant by these terms, phrases, and abbreviations, we define and discuss them here.

Parties to Lawsuits As mentioned previously, the party initiating a lawsuit is referred to as the plaintiff or petitioner, depending on the nature of the action, and the party against whom a lawsuit is brought is the defendant or respondent. Lawsuits frequently involve more than one plaintiff and/or defendant. When a case is appealed from the original court or jurisdiction to another court or jurisdiction, the party appealing the case is called the appellant. The appellee is the party against whom the appeal is taken. (In some appellate courts, the party appealing a case is referred to as the petitioner, and the party against whom the suit is brought or appealed is called the respondent.)

Judges and Justices The terms judge and justice are usually synonymous and represent two designations given to judges in various courts. All members of the United States Supreme Court, for example, are referred to as justices, and justice is the formal title often given to judges of appellate courts, although this is not always the case. In New York, a justice is a judge of the trial court (which is called the Supreme Court), and a member of the Court of Appeals (the state's highest court) is called a judge. The term justice is commonly abbreviated to J., and justices, to JJ. A Supreme Court case might refer to Justice Alito as Alito, J., or to Chief Justice Roberts as Roberts, C.J.

Decisions and Opinions Most decisions reached by reviewing, or appellate, courts are explained in written opinions. The opinion contains the court's reasons for its decision, the rules of law that apply, and the judgment.

Unanimous, Concurring, and Dissenting Opinions. When all judges or justices unanimously agree on an opinion, the opinion is written for the entire court and can be deemed a unanimous opinion. When there is not a unanimous opinion, a majority opinion is written; the majority opinion outlines the

INSIGHT INTO E-COMMERCE

How the Internet Is Expanding Precedent

The notion that courts should rely on precedents to decide the outcome of similar cases has long been a cornerstone of U.S. law. Nevertheless, the availability of “unpublished opinions” over the Internet is changing what the law considers to be precedent. An unpublished opinion is a decision made by an appellate court that is not intended for publication in a reporter (the bound books that contain court opinions).^a Courts traditionally have not considered unpublished opinions to be “precedent,” binding or persuasive, and attorneys were often not allowed to refer to these decisions in their arguments.

An Increasing Number of Decisions Are Not Published in Case Reporters but Are Available Online

The number of court decisions not published in printed books has risen dramatically in recent years. By some estimates, nearly 80 percent of the decisions of the federal appellate courts are a. Recently decided cases that are not yet published are also sometimes called unpublished opinions, but because these decisions will eventually be printed in reporters, we do not include them here.

unpublished. The number is equally high in some state court systems. California’s intermediate appellate courts, for example, publish only about 7 percent of their decisions.

Even though certain decisions are not intended for publication, they are posted (“published”) almost immediately on online legal databases, such as Westlaw and Lexis. With the proliferation of free legal databases and court Web sites, the general public also has almost instant access to the unpublished decisions of most courts. This situation has caused a substantial amount of debate over whether unpublished opinions should be given the same precedential effect as published opinions.

Should Unpublished Decisions Establish Precedent?

Prior to the Internet, one might have been able to justify not considering unpublished decisions to be precedent on the grounds of fairness. How could courts and lawyers be expected to consider the reasoning in unpublished decisions if they were not printed in the case reporters? Now that opinions are so readily available on the Web, however, this justification is no longer valid. Moreover, it now seems unfair not to consider these decisions as view supported by the majority of the judges or justices deciding the case. If a judge agrees, or concurs, with the majority’s decision, but for different reasons, that judge may write a concurring opinion. A dissenting opinion presents the views of one or more judges who disagree with the majority’s decision. The dissenting opinion is important because it may form the basis of the arguments used years later in overruling the precedential majority opinion.

Other Types of Opinions. Occasionally, a court issues a per curiam opinion. Per curiam is a Latin phrase meaning “of the court.” In per curiam opinions, there is no indication as to which judge or justice authored the opinion. This term may also be used for an announcement of a court’s disposition of a case that is not accompanied by a written opinion. Some of the cases presented in this text are en banc decisions. When an appellate court reviews a case en banc, which is a French term (derived from a Latin term) for “in the bench,” generally all of the judges “sitting on the bench” of that court review the case.

A Sample Court Case

To illustrate the elements in a court opinion, we present an annotated opinion in Exhibit 1–6 on pages 24–26. The opinion is from an actual case that the United States Supreme Court decided in 2007.

Background of the Case At a school-sanctioned and school-supervised event, a high school principal saw some of her students unfurl a banner conveying a message that she regarded as promoting illegal drug use. Consistent with school policy, which prohibited such messages at school events, the principal told the students to take down the banner. One student refused. The principal confiscated the banner and suspended the student. The student filed a suit in a federal district court against the principal and others, allegprecedent to some extent because they are so publicly accessible.

Another argument against allowing unpublished decisions to be precedent concerns the quality of the legal reasoning set forth in these decisions. Staff attorneys and law clerks frequently write unpublished opinions so that judges can spend more time on the opinions intended for publication. Consequently, some claim that allowing unpublished decisions to establish precedent could result in bad precedents because the reasoning may not be up to par. If the decision is regarded merely as persuasive precedent, however, then judges who disagree with the reasoning are free to reject the conclusion.

The United States Supreme Court Changes Federal Rules on Unpublished Opinions after 2007

In spite of objections from several hundred judges and lawyers, the United States Supreme Court made history in 2006 when it announced that it would allow lawyers to refer to (cite) unpublished decisions in all federal courts. The new rule, Rule 32.1 of the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure, states that federal courts may not prohibit or restrict the citation of federal judicial opinions that have been designated as “not for publication,” “non-precedential,” or “not precedent.” The rule applies only to federal courts and only to unpublished opinions issued after January 1, 2007. It does not specify the effect that a court must give to one of its unpublished opinions or to an unpublished opinion from another court. Basically, the rule simply makes all the federal courts follow a uniform rule that allows attorneys to cite—and judges to consider as persuasive precedent—unpublished decisions beginning in 2007.

The impact of this new rule remains to be seen. At present, the majority of states do not allow their state courts to consider the rulings in unpublished cases as persuasive precedent, and this rule does not affect the states. The Supreme Court’s decision, however, provides an example of how technology—the availability of unpublished opinions over the Internet—has affected the law.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

Now that the Supreme Court is allowing unpublished decisions to form persuasive precedent in federal courts, should state courts follow? Why or why not?

ing a violation of his rights under the U.S. Constitution. The court issued a judgment in the defendants’ favor. On the student’s appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed this judgment. The defendants appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Editorial Practice You will note that triple asterisks (* * ) and quadruple asterisks ( * * *) frequently appear in the opinion. The triple asterisks indicate that we have deleted a few words or sentences from the opinion for the sake of readability or brevity. Quadruple asterisks mean that an entire paragraph (or more) has been omitted. Additionally, when the opinion cites another case or legal source, the citation to the case or other source has been omitted to save space and to improve the flow of the text. These editorial practices are continued in the other court opinions presented in this book. In addition, whenever we present a court opinion that includes a term or phrase that may not be readily understandable, a bracketed definition or paraphrase has been added.

Briefing Cases Knowing how to read and understand court opinions and the legal reasoning used by the courts is an essential step in undertaking accurate legal research. A further step is “briefing,” or summarizing, the case. Legal researchers routinely brief cases by reducing the texts of the opinions to their essential elements. Generally, when you brief a case, you first summarize the background and facts of the case, as the authors have done for the cases presented within this text. You then indicate the issue (or issues) before the court. An important element in the case brief is, of course, the court’s decision on the issue and the legal reasoning used by the court in reaching that decision. Detailed instructions on how to brief a case are given in Appendix A, which also includes a briefed version of the sample court case presented in Exhibit 1–6.

EXHIBIT 1-6 • A Sample Court Case

This section contains the citation—the name of the case, the name of the court that heard the case, the year of the decision, and reporters in which the court’s opinion can be found.	MORSE v. FREDERICK Supreme Court of the United States, 2007. ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2618, 168 L.Ed.2d 290.
This line provides the name of the justice (or judge) who authored the Court’s opinion.	Chief Justice ROBERTS delivered the opinion of the Court. * * * *
The Court divides the opinion into four parts, headed by Roman numerals. The first part of the opinion summarizes the factual background of the case.	→ I On January 24, 2002, the Olympic Torch Relay passed through Juneau, Alaska, on its way to the winter games in Salt Lake City, Utah. The torchbearers were to proceed along a street in front of Juneau-Douglas High School (JDHS) while school was in session. * * * Deborah Morse, the school principal, decided to permit staff and students to participate in the Torch Relay as an approved social event or class trip. Students were allowed to leave class to observe the relay from either side of the street. Teachers and administrative officials monitored the students’ actions.
A federal trial court in which a lawsuit is initiated.	* * * As the torchbearers and camera crews passed by, [Joseph Frederick, a senior] and his friends unfurled a 14-foot banner bearing the phrase: “BONG HiTS 4 JESUS.” The large banner was easily readable by the students on the other side of the street. Principal Morse immediately crossed the street and demanded that the banner be taken down. Everyone but Frederick complied. Morse confiscated the banner and * * * suspended him for 10 days. * * * * * * [The] Juneau School District Board of Education upheld the suspension. * * * *
The First Amendment to the Constitution guarantees, among other freedoms, the right of free speech—to express one’s views without governmental restrictions. As this case illustrates, however, the right is not unlimited in all circumstances.	Frederick then filed suit [in a federal district court against Morse and others] * * * , alleging that the school board and Morse had violated his * * * rights [under the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution]. * * * The District Court granted summary judgment for the school board and Morse * * * .
A judgment that a court enters without beginning or continuing a trial. This judgment can be entered only if no facts are in dispute and the only question is how the law applies to the facts.

EXHIBIT 1-6 • A Sample Court Case—Continued

[On Frederick's appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed. [The defendants appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.]

* * * *

→ II

At the outset, we reject Frederick's argument that this is not a school speech case * * * . [W]e agree with the [Juneau] superintendent that Frederick cannot "stand in the midst of his fellow students, during school hours, at a school-sanctioned activity and claim he is not at school." * * *

→ III

The message on Frederick's banner is cryptic. * * *

Frederick himself claimed "that the words were just nonsense meant to attract television cameras." But Principal Morse thought the banner would be interpreted by those viewing it as promoting illegal drug use, and that interpretation is plainly a reasonable one.

* * * *

* * * At least two interpretations of the words on the banner demonstrate that the sign advocated the use of illegal drugs. First, the phrase could be interpreted as an imperative: "[Take] bong hits * * *"—a message equivalent * * * to "smoke marijuana" or "use an illegal drug." Alternatively, the phrase could be viewed as celebrating drug use—"bong hits [are a good thing]," or "[we take] bong hits" * * * .

* * * *

* * * Frederick's * * * explanation for the message * * * is a description of Frederick's motive for displaying the banner; it is not an interpretation of what the banner says. * * *

* * * *

→ IV

The question thus becomes whether a principal may, consistent with the First Amendment, restrict student speech at a school event, when that speech is reasonably viewed as promoting illegal drug use. * * *

* * * *

A federal court that hears appeals from the federal district courts located within its geographical boundaries.

The second major section of the opinion responds to the plaintiff's first argument.

The third major section of the opinion focuses on the interpretation of an important component of the facts in the case.

Having or seeming to have a hidden or ambiguous meaning.

To speak in favor, support, or recommend publicly.

An order or command to influence others' behavior.

The fourth major section of the opinion considers the chief issue in this case—whether a high school principal may curtail certain student speech at a school event. Here, the Court states the law and applies it to this issue.

EXHIBIT CONTINUES

EXHIBIT 1-6 • A Sample Court Case—Continued

To make known, manifest, or clear; to announce clearly an opinion or resolution.

Congress has declared that part of a school's job is educating students about the dangers of illegal drug use. It has provided billions of dollars to support state and local drug-prevention programs, and required that schools receiving federal funds under the Safe and Drug-Free Schools and Communities Act of 1994 certify that their drug prevention programs convey a clear and consistent message that * * * the illegal use of drugs is wrong and harmful.

To attest as being true or as represented.

To effect, bring about, or cause to come into being.

Thousands of school boards throughout the country—including JDHS—have adopted policies aimed at effectuating this message. Those school boards know that peer pressure is perhaps the single most important factor leading schoolchildren to take drugs, and that students are more likely to use drugs when the norms in school appear to tolerate such behavior. Student speech celebrating illegal drug use at a school event, in the presence of school administrators and teachers, thus poses a particular challenge for school officials working to protect those entrusted to their care from the dangers of drug abuse.

* * * *

School principals have a difficult job, and a vitally important one. When Frederick suddenly and unexpectedly unfurled his banner, Morse had to decide to act—or not act—on the spot. It was reasonable for her to conclude that the banner promoted illegal drug use—in violation of established school policy—and that failing to act would send a powerful message to the students in her charge, including Frederick, about how serious the school was about the dangers of illegal drug use. The First Amendment does not require schools to tolerate at school events student expression that contributes to those dangers.

In the final paragraph of this excerpt of the opinion, the Court states its decision and gives its order to send the case back to the lower court.

The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

REVIEWING Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

Suppose the California legislature passes a law that severely restricts carbon dioxide emissions from automobiles in that state. A group of automobile manufacturers files suit against the state of California to prevent the enforcement of the law. The automakers claim that a federal law already sets fuel economy standards nationwide and that fuel economy standards are essentially the same as carbon dioxide emission standards. According to the automobile manufacturers, it is unfair to allow California to impose more stringent regulations than those set by the federal law. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Who are the parties (the plaintiffs and the defendant) in this lawsuit?
2. Are the plaintiffs seeking a legal remedy or an equitable remedy? Why?
3. What is the primary source of the law that is at issue here?
4. Where would you look to find the relevant California and federal laws?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

administrative agency 7 administrative law 7 allege 11 analogy 12 appellant 21 appellee 21 binding authority 10 breach 5 case law 7 case on point 12 chancellor 8 citation 15 civil law 14 common law 8 constitutional law 6
 court of equity 8

court of law 8 criminal law 14
 cyberlaw 14
 damages 8 defendant 9 defense 9 equitable maxims 9 executive agency 7
 historical school 3 independent regulatory agency 7 jurisprudence 2 laches 9 law 2
 legal realism 3
 legal reasoning 11 natural law 3 opinion 21 ordinance 6 petitioner 9 plaintiff 9 positive law 3 positivist school 3 precedent 10 procedural law 14 public policy 11 remedy 8 remedy at law 8 remedy in equity 8 reporter 10 respondent 9 sociological school 4 stare decisis 10 statute of limitations 9

 statutory law 6
 substantive law 14 syllogism 12 uniform law 6

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

1-1. How does statutory law come into existence? How does it differ from the common law? If statutory law conflicts with the common law, which law will govern?

1-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

After World War II, which ended in 1945, an international tribunal of judges convened at Nuremberg, Germany. The judges convicted several Nazis of “crimes against humanity.” Assuming that the Nazi war criminals who were convicted had not disobeyed any law of their country and had merely been following their government’s (Hitler’s) orders, what law had they violated? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 1-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

1-3. Assume that you want to read the entire court opinion in the case of Menashe v. V Secret Catalogue, Inc., 409 F.Supp.2d 412 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). The case focuses on whether “SEXY LITTLE THINGS” is a suggestive or descriptive trademark and on which of the parties to the suit used the mark first in commerce. (Note that this case is presented in Chapter 8 of this text as Case 8.2.) Refer to the subsection entitled “Finding Case Law” in this chapter, and then explain specifically where you would find the court’s opinion.

1-4. This chapter discussed a number of sources of American law. Which source of law takes priority in the following situations, and why?

- A federal statute conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.
- A federal statute conflicts with a state constitutional provision.
- A state statute conflicts with the common law of that state.
- A state constitutional amendment conflicts with the U.S. Constitution.

1-5. In the text of this chapter, we stated that the doctrine of stare decisis “became a cornerstone of the English and American judicial systems.” What does stare decisis mean, and why has this doctrine been so fundamental to the development of our legal tradition?

1-6. What is the difference between a concurring opinion and a majority opinion? Between a concurring opinion and a dissenting opinion? Why do judges and justices write concurring and dissenting opinions, given that these opinions will not affect the outcome of the case at hand, which has already been decided by majority vote?

1-7. Courts can overturn precedents and thus change the common law. Should judges have the same authority to overrule statutory law? Explain.

1-8. “The judge’s role is not to make the law but to uphold and apply the law.” Do you agree or disagree with this statement? Discuss fully the reasons for your answer.

1-9. Assume that Arthur Rabe is suing Xavier Sanchez for breaching a contract in which Sanchez promised to sell Rabe a Van Gogh painting for $3 million.

- In this lawsuit, who is the plaintiff and who is the defendant?
- Suppose that Rabe wants Sanchez to perform the contract as promised. What remedy would Rabe seek from the court?
- Now suppose that Rabe wants to cancel the contract because Sanchez fraudulently misrepresented the painting as an original Van Gogh when in fact it is a copy. What remedy would Rabe seek?
- Will the remedy Rabe seeks in either situation be a remedy at law or a remedy in equity? What is the difference between legal and equitable remedies?
- Suppose that the trial court finds in Rabe’s favor and grants one of these remedies. Sanchez then appeals the decision to a higher court. On appeal, which party will be the appellant (or petitioner), and which party will be the appellee (or respondent)?

1-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

On July 5, 1884, Dudley, Stephens, and Brooks—“all able-bodied English seamen”—and a teenage English boy were cast adrift in a lifeboat following a storm at sea. They had no water with them in the boat, and all they had for sustenance were two one-pound tins of turnips. On July 24, Dudley proposed that one of the four in the lifeboat be sacrificed to save the others. Stephens agreed with Dudley, but Brooks refused to consent—and the boy was never asked for his opinion. On July 25, Dudley killed the boy, and the three men then fed on the boy’s body and blood. Four days later, a passing vessel rescued the men. They were taken to England and tried for the murder of the boy. If the men had not fed on the boy’s body, they would probably have died of starvation within the four-day period. The boy, who was in a much weaker condition, would likely have died before the rest. [Regina v. Dudley and Stephens, 14 Q.B.D. (Queen’s Bench Division, England) 273 (1884)]

- The basic question in this case is whether the survivors should be subject to penalties under English criminal law, given the men’s unusual circumstances. Were the defendants’ actions necessary but unethical? Explain your reasoning. What ethical issues might be involved here?
- Should judges ever have the power to look beyond the written “letter of the law” in making their decisions? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 1 Introduction to Law and Legal Reasoning

LAW ON THE WEB

Today, business law and legal environment professors and students can go online to access information on almost every topic covered in this text. A good point of departure for online legal research is the Web site for Business Law, Eleventh Edition, which can be found at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson. There you will find numerous materials relevant to this text and to business law generally, including links to various legal resources on the Web. Additionally, every chapter in this text ends with a Law on the Web feature that contains selected Web addresses.

You can access many of the sources of law discussed in Chapter 1 at the FindLaw Web site, which is probably the most comprehensive source of free legal information on the Internet. Go to www.findlaw.com

The Legal Information Institute (LII) at Cornell Law School, which offers extensive information about U.S. law, is also a good starting point for legal research. The URL for this site is

www.law.cornell.edu

The Library of Congress offers extensive links to state and federal government resources at www.loc.gov

The Virtual Law Library Index, created and maintained by the Indiana University School of Law, provides an index of legal sources categorized by subject at www.law.indiana.edu/v-lib/index.html#ibdoc

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select “Chapter 1” and click on “Internet Exercises.” There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about some of the important sources of law discussed in Chapter 1 and other useful legal sites on the Web.

- Internet Exercise 1-1: Legal Perspective
Internet Sources of Law
- Internet Exercise 1-2: Management Perspective
Online Assistance from Government Agencies
- Internet Exercise 1-3: Social Perspective
The Case of the Speluncean Explorers

CHAPTER 2

Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Today in the United States there are fifty-two court systems—one for each of the fifty states, one for the District of Columbia, and a federal system. Keep in mind that the federal courts are not superior to the state courts; they are simply an independent system of courts, which derives its authority from Article III, Section 2, of the U.S. Constitution. By the power given to it under Article I of the U.S. Constitution, Congress has extended the federal court system beyond the boundaries of the United States to U.S. territories such as Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.¹ As we shall see, the United States Supreme Court is the final controlling voice over all of these fifty-two systems, at least when questions of federal law are involved.

Every businessperson will likely face a lawsuit at some time in his or her career. Thus, anyone involved in business needs to have an understanding of the American court systems, as well as the various methods of dispute resolution that can be pursued outside the courts. In this chapter, after examining the judiciary's role in the American governmental system, we discuss some basic requirements that must be met before a party may bring a lawsuit before a particular court. We then look at the court systems of the United States in some detail. We conclude the chapter with an overview of some alternative methods of settling disputes, including online dispute resolution.

1. In Guam and the Virgin Islands, territorial courts serve as both federal courts and state courts; in Puerto Rico, they serve only as federal courts.

The Judiciary's Role in American Government

As you learned in Chapter 1, the body of American law includes the federal and state constitutions, statutes passed by legislative bodies, administrative law, and the case decisions and legal principles that form the common law. These laws would be meaningless, however, without the courts to interpret and apply them. This is the essential role of the judiciary—the courts—in the American governmental system: to interpret the laws and apply them to specific situations.

As the branch of government entrusted with interpreting the laws, the judiciary can decide, among other things, whether the laws or actions of the other two branches are constitutional. The process for making such a determination is known as judicial review. The power of judicial review enables the judicial branch to act as a check on the other two branches of government, in line with the system of checks and balances established by the U.S. Constitution.²

The power of judicial review is not mentioned in the Constitution (although many constitutional scholars conclude that the founders intended the judiciary to have this power). Rather, this power was explicitly established by the United States Supreme Court in 1803 by its decision in Marbury v. Madison,³ in which the Supreme Court stated, "It is emphatically the province and duty of the Judicial Department to say

2. In a broad sense, judicial review occurs whenever a court "reviews" a case or legal proceeding—as when an appellate court reviews a lower court's decision. When referring to the judiciary's role in American government, however, the term judicial review is used to indicate the power of the judiciary to decide whether the actions of the other two branches of government do or do not violate the U.S. Constitution.

3. 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

what the law is. . . . If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. . . . So if the law be in opposition to the Constitution . . . [t]he Court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is the very essence of judicial duty.” Since the Marbury v. Madison decision, the power of judicial review has remained unchallenged. Today, this power is exercised by both federal and state courts.

Basic Judicial Requirements

Before a lawsuit can be brought before a court, certain requirements must be met. These requirements relate to jurisdiction, venue, and standing to sue. We examine each of these important concepts here.

Jurisdiction

In Latin, juris means “law,” and diction means “to speak.” Thus, “the power to speak the law” is the literal meaning of the term jurisdiction. Before any court can hear a case, it must have jurisdiction over the person (or company) against whom the suit is brought (the defendant) or over the property involved in the suit. The court must also have jurisdiction over the subject matter of the dispute.

Jurisdiction over Persons or Property

Generally, a particular court can exercise in personam* jurisdiction (personal jurisdiction) over any person or business that resides in a certain geographic area. A state trial court, for example, normally has jurisdictional authority over residents (including businesses) of a particular area of the state, such as a county or district. A state’s highest court (often called the state supreme court)⁴ has jurisdictional authority over all residents within the state.

A court can also exercise jurisdiction over property that is located within its boundaries. This kind of jurisdiction is known as in rem* jurisdiction, or “jurisdiction over the thing.” For example, suppose that a dispute arises over the ownership of a boat in dry dock in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. The boat is owned by an Ohio resident, over whom a Florida court normally cannot exercise personal jurisdiction. The other party to the dispute is a resident of Nebraska. In this situation, a lawsuit concerning the boat could be brought in a Florida state court on the basis of the court’s in rem jurisdiction.

Long Arm Statutes. Under the authority of a state long arm statute, a court can exercise personal jurisdiction over certain out-of-state defendants based on activities that took place within the state. Before a court can exercise jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant under a long arm statute, though, it must be demonstrated that the defendant had sufficient contacts, or minimum contacts, with the state to justify the jurisdiction.⁵ Generally, this means that the defendant must have enough of a connection to the state for the judge to conclude that it is fair for the state to exercise power over the defendant. For example, if an out-of-state defendant caused an automobile accident or sold defective goods within the state, a court will usually find that minimum contacts exist to exercise jurisdiction over that defendant. Similarly, a state may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant who is sued for breaching a contract that was formed within the state.

Corporate Contacts. Because corporations are considered legal persons, courts use the same principles to determine whether it is fair to exercise jurisdiction over a corporation.⁶ A corporation normally is subject to personal jurisdiction in the state in which it is incorporated, has its principal office, and is doing business. Courts apply the minimum-contacts test to determine if they can exercise jurisdiction over out-of-state corporations.

The minimum-contacts requirement is usually met if the corporation advertises or sells its products within the state, or places its goods into the “stream of commerce” with the intent that the goods be sold in the state. For example, suppose that a business is incorporated under the laws of Maine but has a branch office and manufacturing plant in Georgia. The corporation also advertises and sells its products in Georgia. These activities would likely constitute sufficient contacts

4. As will be discussed shortly, a state’s highest court is often referred to as the state supreme court, but there are exceptions. For example, in New York the supreme court is a trial court.

5. The minimum-contacts standard was first established in International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 66 S.Ct. 154, 90 L.Ed. 95 (1945).

6. In the eyes of the law, corporations are “legal persons”—entities that can sue and be sued. See Chapter 38.

with the state of Georgia to allow a Georgia court to exercise jurisdiction over the corporation.

Some corporations, however, do not sell or advertise products or place any goods in the stream of commerce. Determining what constitutes minimum contacts in these situations can be more difficult, as the following case—involving a resort hotel in Mexico and a hotel guest from New Jersey—illustrates.

CASE 2.1 Mastondrea v. Occidental Hotels Management S.A.

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 2007. 391 N.J.Super. 261, 918 A.2d 27.
lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/search.shtml^a

• Background and Facts Libgo Travel, Inc., in Ramsey, New Jersey, with Allegro Resorts Management Corporation (ARMC), a marketing agency in Miami, Florida, placed an ad in the Newark Star Ledger, a newspaper in Newark, New Jersey, to tout vacation packages for accommodations at the Royal Hideaway Playacar, an all-inclusive resort hotel in Quintana Roo, Mexico. ARMC is part of Occidental Hotels Management, B.V., a Netherlands corporation that owns the hotel with Occidental Hoteles Management S.A., a Spanish company. In response to the ad, Amanda Mastondrea, a New Jersey resident, bought one of the packages through Liberty Travel, a chain of travel agencies in the eastern United States that Libgo owns and operates. On June 16, 2003, at the resort, Mastondrea slipped and fell on a wet staircase, breaking her ankle. She filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against the hotel, its owners, and others, alleging negligence. The defendants asked the court to dismiss the suit on the ground that it did not have personal jurisdiction over them. The court ruled in part that it had jurisdiction over the hotel. The hotel appealed this ruling to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT PAYNE, J.A.D. [Judge, Appellate Division]

* * * *

It is unquestionably true that the Hotel has no direct presence in New Jersey.* * * [T]he Hotel's operations are located in Quintana Roo, Mexico. The Hotel is not registered, licensed or otherwise authorized to do business in New Jersey. It has no registered agent in this state for service of process, and it pays no state taxes. The Hotel maintains no business address here, it has never owned property or maintained any bank accounts in this state, and it has no employees in New Jersey.

However,* * * "Tour Operator Agreements" between the Hotel and Libgo * * * provide that the Hotel will allot a specific number of rooms at its resort to Libgo at agreed-upon rates. Libgo, as "tour operator," is then authorized by the Hotel to book those rooms on behalf of Libgo's customers. Pursuant to the contract, Libgo is required to provide the Hotel with weekly sales reports listing the number of rooms booked by Libgo and the rates at which those rooms were booked. It must also confirm all reservations in a writing sent to the Hotel.

Courts have generally sustained the exercise of personal jurisdiction over a defendant who, as a party to a contract, has had some connection with the forum state [the state in which the lawsuit is filed] or who should have anticipated that his conduct would have significant effects in that state. Here, the Hotel entered into a contract with a New Jersey entity, Libgo, which agreed to solicit business for the Hotel and derived a profit from that solicitation through sales of vacation packages. Although Libgo's business extends beyond New Jersey and throughout much of the East Coast, at least part of its customer base resides in this state. Likewise, as a result of this contract, the Hotel purposefully and successfully sought vacationers from New Jersey, and it derived a profit from them. Therefore, the Hotel should have reasonably anticipated that its conduct would have significant effects in New Jersey. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

a. In the "SEARCH THE N.J. COURTS DECISIONS" section, type "Mastondrea" in the box, and click on "Search!" In the result, click on the case name to access the opinion. Rutgers University Law School in Camden, New Jersey, maintains this Web site.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

CASE 2.1 CONTINUED

* * * [A]dditional evidence of purposeful acts in New Jersey exists that fairly can be attributed to the Hotel and that are causally connected to plaintiff's decision to purchase the Hotel's vacation package * * * , [including] an ongoing, but undefined, relationship between the Hotel and * * * ARMC * * * . ARMC is a marketing organization that solicits business in the United States for the "Occidental Hotels & Resorts," a group of which the defendant Hotel is a part. ARMC does not have any direct contact with any of the potential customers of the various hotels that it promotes, and it does not itself sell travel or vacation packages. However, [ARMC] * * * works closely with Libgo in developing marketing strategies for the Occidental Hotels & Resorts in the New Jersey area pursuant to cooperative marketing agreements between ARMC and Libgo.

* * * * *

* * * [T]he defendant Hotel was featured, singly, [in 2003] in advertisements in the Newark Star Ledger on four occasions, including one in January * * * , prior to plaintiff's decision to book a vacation there.

We are satisfied * * * that * * * ARMC was operating [on behalf] of the Hotel when ARMC entered into cooperative marketing agreements with Libgo, and that ARMC's extensive contacts with Libgo in New Jersey regarding the marketing plan, together with the New Jersey fruits of that plan, can be attributed to the Hotel for jurisdictional purposes.

We are further persuaded that the targeted advertising conducted pursuant to the cooperative marketing agreement on behalf of the Hotel provided the minimum contacts necessary to support * * * jurisdiction in this case. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's ruling. The appellate court concluded that the hotel had contacts with New Jersey, consisting of a tour operator contract and marketing activities through ARMC and Libgo, during the relevant time period and that, in response to the marketing, Mastondrea booked a vacation at the hotel. "[T]his evidence was sufficient to support the assertion of . . . personal jurisdiction over the Hotel in this State."

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Mastondrea had not seen Libgo and Allegro's ad, but had bought a Royal Hideaway vacation package on the recommendation of a Liberty Travel agent, is it likely that the result in this case would have been different? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension What do the circumstances and the holding in this case suggest to a business firm that actively attempts to attract customers in a variety of jurisdictions?

Jurisdiction over Subject Matter Subject-matter jurisdiction refers to the limitations on the types of cases a court can hear. Certain courts are empowered to hear certain kinds of disputes.

General and Limited Jurisdiction. In both the federal and the state court systems, there are courts of general (unlimited) jurisdiction and courts of limited jurisdiction. A court of general jurisdiction can decide cases involving a broad array of issues. An example of a court of general jurisdiction is a state trial court or a federal district court. An example of a state court of limited jurisdiction is a probate court. Probate courts are state courts that handle only matters relating to the transfer of a person's assets and obligations after that person's death, including issues relating to the custody and guardianship of children. An example of a federal court of limited subject-matter jurisdiction is a bankruptcy court. Bankruptcy courts handle only bankruptcy proceedings, which are governed by federal bankruptcy law (discussed in Chapter 30).

A court's jurisdiction over subject matter is usually defined in the statute or constitution creating the court. In both the federal and the state court systems, a court's subject-matter jurisdiction can be limited not only by the subject of the lawsuit but also by the sum in controversy, whether the case is a felony (a more serious type of crime) or a misdemeanor (a less serious type of crime), or whether the proceeding is a trial or an appeal.

Original and Appellate Jurisdiction. A court's subject-matter jurisdiction is also frequently limited to hearing cases at a particular stage of the dispute. Courts in which lawsuits begin, trials take place, and evidence is presented are referred to as courts of original jurisdiction. Courts having original jurisdiction are courts of the first instance, or trial courts. In the federal court system, the district courts are trial courts. In the various state court systems, the trial courts are known by different names, as will be discussed shortly.

Courts having appellate jurisdiction act as reviewing courts, or appellate courts. In general, cases can be brought before appellate courts only on appeal from an order or a judgment of a trial court or other lower court. In other words, the distinction between courts of original jurisdiction and courts of appellate jurisdiction normally lies in whether the case is being heard for the first time.

Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts

Because the federal government is a government of limited powers, the jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited. Federal courts have subject-matter jurisdiction in two situations.

Federal Questions. Article III of the U.S. Constitution establishes the boundaries of federal judicial power. Section 2 of Article III states that “[t]he judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority.” In effect, this clause means that whenever a plaintiff’s cause of action is based, at least in part, on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law, a federal question arises. Any lawsuit involving a federal question comes under the judicial authority of the federal courts and can originate in a federal court. People who claim that their constitutional rights have been violated, for example, can begin their suits in a federal court. Note that in a case based on a federal question, a federal court will apply federal law.

Diversity of Citizenship. Federal district courts can also exercise original jurisdiction over cases involving diversity of citizenship. This term applies whenever a federal court has jurisdiction over a case that does not involve a question of federal law. The most common type of diversity jurisdiction has two requirements:⁷ (1) the plaintiff and defendant must be residents of different states, and (2) the dollar amount in controversy must exceed $75,000. For purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is a citizen of both the state in which it is incorporated and the state in which its principal place of business is located. A case involving diversity of citizenship can be filed in the appropriate federal district court. If the case starts in a state court, it can sometimes be transferred, or “removed,” to a federal court. A large percentage of the cases filed in federal courts each year are based on diversity of citizenship.

As noted, a federal court will apply federal law in cases involving federal questions. In a case based on diversity of citizenship, in contrast, a federal court will apply the relevant state law (which is often the law of the state in which the court sits).

Exclusive versus Concurrent Jurisdiction

When both federal and state courts have the power to hear a case, as is true in suits involving diversity of citizenship, concurrent jurisdiction exists. When cases can be tried only in federal courts or only in state courts, exclusive jurisdiction exists. Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction in cases involving federal crimes, bankruptcy, and most patent and copyright claims; in suits against the United States; and in some areas of admiralty law (law governing transportation on the seas and ocean waters). State courts also have exclusive jurisdiction over certain subjects—for example, divorce and adoption. When concurrent jurisdiction exists, a party may choose to bring a suit in either a federal court or a state court.

Jurisdiction in Cyberspace

The Internet’s capacity to bypass political and geographic boundaries undercuts the traditional basis on which courts assert personal jurisdiction. This basis includes a party’s contacts with a court’s geographic jurisdiction. As already discussed, for a court to compel a defendant to come before it, there must be at least minimum contacts—the presence of a salesperson within the state, for example. Are there sufficient minimum contacts if the only connection to a jurisdiction is an ad on a Web site originating from a remote location?

The “Sliding-Scale” Standard Gradually, the courts are developing a standard—called a “sliding-scale” standard—for determining when the exercise of personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state Internet-based defendant is proper. In developing this standard, the courts have identified three types of Internet

7. Diversity jurisdiction also exists in cases between (1) a foreign country and citizens of a state or of different states and (2) citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign country. These bases for diversity jurisdiction are less commonly used.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

business contacts: (1) substantial business conducted over the Internet (with contracts and sales, for example); (2) some interactivity through a Web site; and (3) passive advertising. Jurisdiction is proper for the first category, is improper for the third, and may or may not be appropriate for the second.⁸ An Internet communication is typically considered passive if people have to voluntarily access it to read the message and active if it is sent to specific individuals.

In certain situations, even a single contact can satisfy the minimum-contacts requirement. In one case, for example, a Texas resident, Connie Davis, sent an unsolicited e-mail message to numerous Mississippi residents advertising a pornographic Web site. Davis falsified the “from” header in the e-mail so that Internet Doorway appeared to be the sender. Internet Doorway filed a lawsuit against Davis in Mississippi, claiming that its reputation and goodwill in the community had been harmed. The federal court in Mississippi held that Davis’s single e-mail to Mississippi residents satisfied the minimum-contacts requirement for jurisdiction. The court concluded that Davis, by sending the e-mail solicitation, should reasonably have expected that she could be “haled into court in a distant jurisdiction to answer for the ramifications.”⁹

International Jurisdictional Issues

Because the Internet is international in scope, international jurisdictional issues have understandably come to the fore. The world’s courts seem to be developing a standard that echoes the requirement of “minimum contacts” applied by the U.S. courts. Most courts are indicating that minimum contacts—doing business within the jurisdiction, for example—are enough to exercise jurisdiction over a defendant. The effect of this standard is that a business firm may have to comply with the laws in any jurisdiction in which it actively targets customers for its products.

To understand some of the problems created by Internet commerce, consider a French court’s judgment against the U.S.-based Internet company Yahoo!, Inc. Yahoo operates an online auction site on which Nazi memorabilia have been offered for sale. In France, the display of any objects depicting symbols of Nazi ideology is illegal and leads to both criminal and civil liability. The International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism filed a suit in Paris against Yahoo for displaying Nazi memorabilia and offering them for sale via its Web site.

The French court asserted jurisdiction over Yahoo on the ground that the materials on the company’s U.S.-based servers could be viewed on a Web site accessible in France. The French court ordered Yahoo to eliminate all Internet access in France to the Nazi memorabilia offered for sale through its online auctions. Yahoo then took the case to a federal district court in the United States, claiming that the French court’s order violated the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Although the federal district court ruled in favor of Yahoo, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit reversed. According to the appellate court, U.S. courts lacked personal jurisdiction over the French groups involved.¹⁰ The Yahoo case represents the first time a U.S. court was asked to decide whether to honor a foreign judgment involving business conducted over the Internet. The federal appeals court’s ruling leaves open the possibility that Yahoo, and anyone else who posts anything on the Internet, could be held answerable to the laws of any country in which the message might be received. Concept Summary 2.1 on the next page reviews the various types of jurisdiction, including jurisdiction in cyberspace.

Venue

Jurisdiction has to do with whether a court has authority to hear a case involving specific persons, property, or subject matter. Venue¹¹ is concerned with the most appropriate location for a trial. For example, two state courts (or two federal courts) may have the authority to exercise jurisdiction over a case, but it may be more appropriate or convenient to hear the case in one court than in the other.

Basically, the concept of venue reflects the policy that a court trying a suit should be in the geographic neighborhood (usually the county) where the incident leading to the lawsuit occurred or where the parties involved in the lawsuit reside. Venue in a civil case typically is where the defendant resides, whereas venue in a criminal case is normally where the crime occurred. Pretrial publicity or other factors, though, may require a change of venue to another community, especially in criminal cases in which the defendant’s right to a fair and impartial jury has been impaired.

8. For a leading case on this issue, see Zippo Manufacturing Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 952 F.Supp. 1119 (W.D.Pa. 1997).

9. Internet Doorway, Inc. v. Parks, 138 F.Supp.2d 773 (S.D.Miss. 2001).

10. Yahoo! Inc. v. La Ligue Contre le Racisme et l’Antisemitisme, 379 F.3d 1120 (9th Cir.2004), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 126 S.Ct. 2332, 164 L.Ed.2d 841 (2006).

11. Pronounced ven-yoo.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 2.1

Jurisdiction

Type of Jurisdiction	Description
PERSONAL	Exists when a defendant is located within the territorial boundaries within which a court has the right and power to decide cases. Jurisdiction may be exercised over out-of-state defendants under state long arm statutes. Courts have jurisdiction over corporate defendants that do business within the state, as well as corporations that advertise, sell, or place goods into the stream of commerce in the state.
PROPERTY	Exists when the property that is subject to a lawsuit is located within the territorial boundaries within which a court has the right and power to decide cases.
SUBJECT MATTER	Limits the court's jurisdictional authority to particular types of cases. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Limited jurisdiction—Exists when a court is limited to a specific subject matter, such as probate or divorce. 2. General jurisdiction—Exists when a court can hear cases involving a broad array of issues.
ORIGINAL	Exists with courts that have the authority to hear a case for the first time (trial courts).
APPELLATE	Exists with courts of appeal and review. Generally, appellate courts do not have original jurisdiction.
FEDERAL	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Federal questions—When the plaintiff's cause of action is based at least in part on the U.S. Constitution, a treaty, or a federal law, a federal court can exercise jurisdiction. 2. Diversity of citizenship—In cases between citizens of different states when the amount in controversy exceeds $75,000 (or in cases between a foreign country and citizens of a state or of different states and in cases between citizens of a state and citizens or subjects of a foreign country), a federal court can exercise jurisdiction.
CONCURRENT	Exists when both federal and state courts have authority to hear the same case.
EXCLUSIVE	Exists when only state courts or only federal courts have authority to hear a case.
JURISDICTION IN CYBERSPACE	Because the Internet does not have physical boundaries, traditional jurisdictional concepts have been difficult to apply in cases involving activities conducted via the Web. Gradually, the courts are developing standards to use in determining when jurisdiction over a Web site owner or operator in another state is proper. A significant legal challenge with respect to cyberspace transactions has to do with resolving jurisdictional disputes in the international context.

Standing to Sue

In order to bring a lawsuit before a court, a party must have standing to sue, or a sufficient “stake” in a matter to justify seeking relief through the court system. In other words, to have standing, a party must have a legally protected and tangible interest at stake in the litigation. The party bringing the lawsuit must have suffered a harm or been threatened with a harm by the action about which she or he has complained. At times, a person can have standing to sue on behalf of another person. For example, suppose that a child suffers serious injuries as a result of a defectively manufactured toy. Because the child is a minor, another person, such as a parent or a legal guardian, can bring a lawsuit on the child's behalf.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Standing to sue also requires that the controversy at issue be a justiciable¹² controversy—a controversy that is real and substantial, as opposed to hypothetical or academic. For example, to entice DaimlerChrysler Corporation to build a $1.2 billion Jeep assembly plant in the area, the city of Toledo, Ohio, gave the company a ten-year local property tax exemption as well as a state franchise tax credit. Toledo taxpayers filed a lawsuit in state court, claiming that the tax breaks violated the commerce clause in the U.S. Constitution. The taxpayers alleged that the tax exemption and credit injured them because they would have to pay higher taxes to cover the shortfall in tax revenues. In 2006, the United States Supreme Court ruled that the taxpayers lacked standing to sue over the incentive program because their alleged injury was “conjectural or hypothetical”—that is, there was no justiciable controversy.¹³ exactly the same, the right-hand side of Exhibit 2-1 illustrates the basic organizational framework characteristic of the court systems in many states. The exhibit also shows how the federal court system is structured. We turn now to an examination of these court systems, beginning with the state courts. (See this chapter’s Insight into Ethics feature on pages 38–39 for a discussion of the impact that the use of private judges and out-of-court settlements is having on the nation’s court systems and our notions of justice.)

State Court Systems

Typically, a state court system includes several levels, or tiers, of courts. As indicated in Exhibit 2-1, state courts may include (1) local trial courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) state trial courts of general jurisdiction, (3) state courts of appeals (intermediate appellate courts), and (4) the state’s highest court (often called the state supreme court). Generally, any person who is a party to a lawsuit has the opportunity to plead the case before a trial court and then, if he or she loses, before at least one level of appellate court. Finally, if the case involves a federal statute or federal constitutional issue, the decision of a state supreme court on that issue may be further appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

The states use various methods to select judges for their courts. Usually, voters elect judges, but in some states judges are appointed. For example, in Iowa, the governor appoints judges, and then the general population decides whether to confirm their appointment

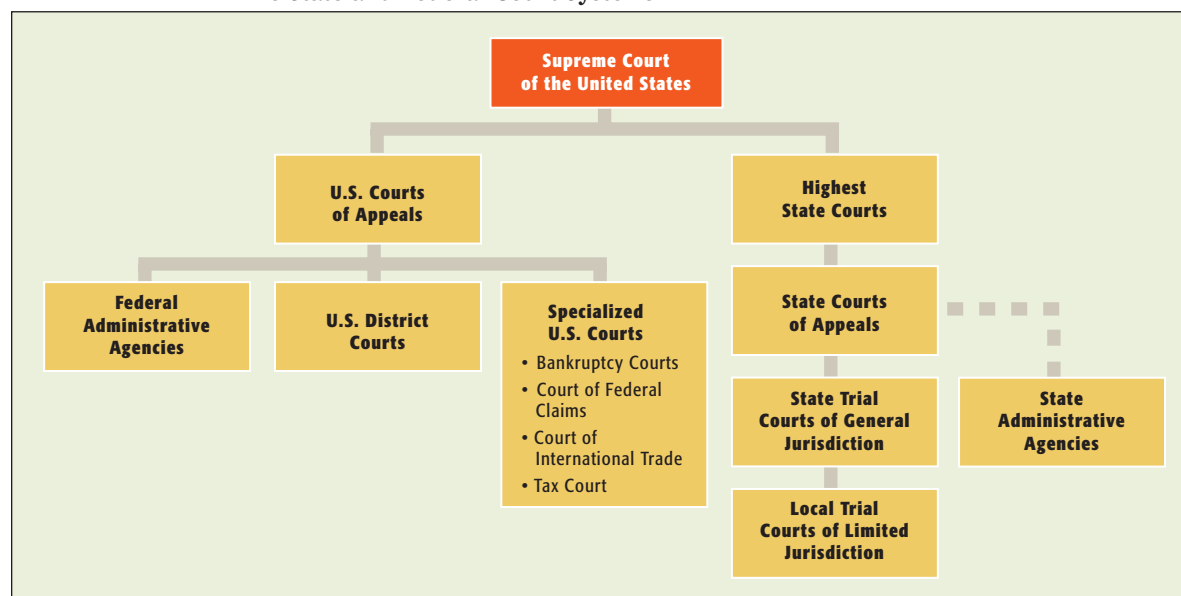

The State and Federal Court Systems

As mentioned earlier in this chapter, each state has its own court system. Additionally, there is a system of federal courts. Although no two state court systems are 12. Pronounced jus-tish-a-bul.

13. DaimlerChrysler v. Cuno, __ U.S. __, 126 S.Ct.1854, 164 L.Ed.2d 589 (2006).

EXHIBIT 2-1 • The State and Federal Court Systems

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Implications of an Increasingly Private Justice System

Downtown Houston boasts a relatively new courthouse with thirty-nine courtrooms, but more and more often, many of those courtrooms often stand empty. Has litigation in Texas slowed down? Indeed, it has not—the courtrooms are empty because fewer civil lawsuits are going to trial. A similar situation is occurring in the federal courts. In the northern district of Florida, for example, the four federal judges presided over only a dozen civil trials in 2007. In 1984, more than 12,000 civil trials were heard in our federal courts. Today, only about 3,500 federal civil trials take place annually. University of Wisconsin law professor Mark Galanter has labeled this trend the “vanishing trial.” Two developments in particular are contributing to the disappearance of civil trials—arbitration and private judges.

Arbitration Is One Cause

Since the 1980s, corporations have been eschewing the public court system and taking cases to arbitration instead. Every day millions of Americans sign arbitration agreements, often unknowingly committing themselves to allow private arbitrators to solve their disputes with employers and the corporations with which they do business, such as cell phone service providers.

This trend raises some troublesome ethical issues, however. For one thing, arbitration agreements may force consumers to travel long distances to participate in these private forums. Perhaps more disturbing is that the supposedly neutral arbitrators may actually be captive to the industries they serve. Arbitrators are paid handsomely and typically would like to serve again. Thus, they may be reluctant to rule against a company that is involved in a dispute. After all, the company may well need arbitrators to resolve a subsequent dispute, whereas the other party—a consumer or employee—is unlikely to need the arbitrators again.

Private Judges Are Another Cause

Another reason for the decline in the number of civil trials in our public courts is the growing use of private judges. A private judge, who is usually a retired judge, has the power to conduct trials and grant legal resolutions of disputes. Private judges increasingly are being used to resolve commercial disputes, as well as divorces and custody battles, for two reasons. One reason is that a case can be heard by a private judge much sooner than it would be heard in a public court. The other reason is that proceedings before a private judge can be kept secret.

in the next general election. The states usually specify the number of years that judges will serve. In contrast, as you will read shortly, judges in the federal court system are appointed by the president of the United States and, if they are confirmed by the Senate, hold office for life—unless they engage in blatantly illegal conduct.

Trial Courts Trial courts are exactly what their name implies—courts in which trials are held and testimony is taken. State trial courts have either general or limited jurisdiction. Trial courts that have general jurisdiction as to subject matter may be called county, district, superior, or circuit courts.¹⁴ State trial courts of general jurisdiction have jurisdiction over a wide variety of subjects, including both civil disputes and criminal prosecutions. In some states, trial courts of general jurisdiction may hear appeals from courts of limited jurisdiction.

14. The name in Ohio and Pennsylvania is Court of Common Pleas; the name in New York is Supreme Court, Trial Division.

Courts of limited jurisdiction as to subject matter are often called special inferior trial courts or minor judiciary courts. Small claims courts are inferior trial courts that hear only civil cases involving claims of less than a certain amount, such as $5,000 (the amount varies from state to state). Suits brought in small claims courts are generally conducted informally, and lawyers are not required (in a few states, lawyers are not even allowed). Decisions of small claims courts and municipal courts may sometimes be appealed to a state trial court of general jurisdiction.

Other courts of limited jurisdiction include domestic relations courts, which handle primarily divorce actions and child-custody disputes; local municipal courts, which mainly deal with traffic cases; and probate courts, as mentioned earlier.

Appellate, or Reviewing, Courts Every state has at least one court of appeals (appellate court, or reviewing court), which may be an intermediate appellate court or the state’s highest court. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate

In Ohio, for example, a state statute allows the parties to any civil action to have their dispute tried by a retired judge of their choosing who will make a decision in the matter.^a Recently, though, private judging came under criticism in that state because private judges were conducting jury trials in county courtrooms at taxpayers' expense. A public judge, Nancy Margaret Russo, refused to give up jurisdiction over one case on the ground that private judges are not authorized to conduct jury trials. The Ohio Supreme Court agreed. As the state's highest court noted, private judging raises significant public-policy issues that the legislature needs to consider.^b

One issue is that private judges charge relatively large fees. This means that litigants who are willing and able to pay the extra cost can have their case heard by a private judge long before they would be able to set a trial date in a regular court. Is it fair that those who cannot afford private judges should have to wait longer for justice? Similarly, is it ethical to allow parties to pay extra for secret proceedings before a private judge and thereby avoid the public scrutiny of a regular trial? Some even suggest that the use of private judges is leading to two different systems of justice.

a. See Ohio Revised Code Section 2701.10.

b. State ex rel. Russo v. McDonnell, 110 Ohio St.3d 144, 852 N.E.2d 145 (2006). (The term ex rel. is Latin for ex relatione. This phrase refers to an action brought on behalf of the state, by the attorney general, at the instigation of an individual who has a private interest in the matter.)

A Threat to the Common Law System?

The decline in the number of civil trials may also be leading to the erosion of this country's common law system. As discussed in Chapter 1, courts are obligated to consider precedents—the decisions rendered in previous cases with similar facts and issues—when deciding the outcome of a dispute. If fewer disputes go to trial because they are arbitrated or heard by a private judge, then they will never become part of the body of cases and appeals that form the case law on that subject. With fewer precedents on which to draw, individuals and businesses will have less information about what constitutes appropriate business behavior in today's world. Furthermore, private dispute resolution does not allow our case law to keep up with new issues related to areas such as biotechnology and the online world. Thus, the long-term effects of the decline of public justice could be a weakening of the common law itself.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO THE SOCIAL ENVIRONMENT

If wealthier individuals increasingly use private judges, how will our justice system be affected in the long run?

courts. Generally, courts of appeals do not conduct new trials, in which evidence is submitted to the court and witnesses are examined. Rather, an appellate court panel of three or more judges reviews the record of the case on appeal, which includes a transcript of the trial proceedings, and then determines whether the trial court committed an error.

Usually, appellate courts focus on questions of law, not questions of fact. A question of fact deals with what really happened in regard to the dispute being tried—such as whether a party actually burned a flag. A question of law concerns the application or interpretation of the law—such as whether flag-burning is a form of speech protected by the First Amendment to the Constitution. Only a judge, not a jury, can rule on questions of law. Appellate courts normally defer to the trial court's findings on questions of fact because the trial court judge and jury were in a better position to evaluate testimony—by directly observing witnesses' gestures, demeanor, and other nonverbal behavior during the trial. At the appellate level, the judges review the written transcript of the trial, which does not include these nonverbal elements. Thus, an appellate court will not tamper with a trial court's finding of fact unless it is clearly erroneous (contrary to the evidence presented at trial) or when there is no evidence to support the finding.

Highest State Courts The highest appellate court in a state is usually called the supreme court but may be designated by some other name. For example, in both New York and Maryland, the highest state court is called the Court of Appeals. In Maine and Massachusetts, the highest court is labeled the Supreme Judicial Court. In West Virginia, the highest state court is the Supreme Court of Appeals.

The decisions of each state's highest court on all questions of state law are final. Only when issues of federal law are involved can the United States Supreme Court overrule a decision made by a state's highest court. For example, suppose that a city ordinance prohibits citizens from engaging in door-to-door advocacy without first registering with the mayor's office and receiving a permit. Further suppose that a religious group sues the city, arguing that the law violates the freedoms of speech and religion guaranteed by the First Amendment. If the state supreme court upholds the law, the group could appeal the decision to the United States Supreme Court—because a constitutional (federal) issue is involved.

The Federal Court System

The federal court system is basically a three-tiered model consisting of (1) U.S. district courts (trial courts of general jurisdiction) and various courts of limited jurisdiction, (2) U.S. courts of appeals (intermediate courts of appeals), and (3) the United States Supreme Court.

Unlike state court judges, who are usually elected, federal court judges—including the justices of the Supreme Court—are appointed by the president of the United States, subject to confirmation by the U.S. Senate. Article III of the Constitution states that federal judges “hold their offices during good Behaviour.” In effect, this means that federal judges have lifetime appointments. Although they can be impeached (removed from office) for misconduct, this is rarely done. In the entire history of the United States, only seven federal judges have been removed from office through impeachment proceedings.

U.S. District Courts At the federal level, the equivalent of a state trial court of general jurisdiction is the district court. U.S. district courts have original jurisdiction in federal matters, and federal cases typically originate in district courts. There are other federal courts with original, but special (or limited), jurisdiction, such as the federal bankruptcy courts and others shown earlier in Exhibit 2-1.

There is at least one federal district court in every state. The number of judicial districts can vary over time, primarily owing to population changes and corresponding changes in caseloads. Currently, there are ninety-four federal judicial districts. Exhibit 2-2 shows the boundaries of the U.S. district courts, as well as the U.S. courts of appeals (discussed next).

U.S. Courts of Appeals In the federal court system, there are thirteen U.S. courts of appeals—referred to as U.S. circuit courts of appeals. Twelve of the federal courts of appeals (including the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit) hear appeals from the federal district courts located within their respective judicial circuits, or geographic boundaries (shown in Exhibit 2-2).¹⁵ The Court of Appeals for the Thirteenth Circuit, called the Federal Circuit, has national appellate jurisdiction over certain types of cases, such as those involving patent law and those in which the U.S. government is a defendant. The decisions of a circuit court of appeals are binding on all courts within the circuit court's jurisdiction and are final in most cases, but appeal to the United States Supreme Court is possible.

EXHIBIT 2-2 • Geographic Boundaries of the U.S. Courts of Appeals and U.S. District Courts

Source: Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

United States Supreme Court At the highest level in the three-tiered federal court system is the United States Supreme Court. According to the language of Article III of the U.S. Constitution, there is only one national Supreme Court. All other courts in the federal system are considered “inferior.” Congress is empowered to create other inferior courts as it deems necessary. The inferior courts that Congress has created include the second tier in our model—the U.S. circuit courts of appeals—as well as the district courts and the various federal courts of limited, or specialized, jurisdiction.

The United States Supreme Court consists of nine justices. Although the Supreme Court has original, or trial, jurisdiction in rare instances (set forth in Article III, Sections 1 and 2), most of its work is as an appeals court. The Supreme Court can review any case decided by any of the federal courts of appeals, and it also has appellate authority over cases involving federal questions that have been decided in the state courts. The Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the Constitution and federal law.

Appeals to the Supreme Court. To bring a case before the Supreme Court, a party requests the Court to issue a writ of certiorari.¹⁶ A writ of certiorari is an order issued by the Supreme Court to a lower court requiring the latter to send it the record of the case for review. The Court will not issue a writ unless at least four of the nine justices approve of it. This is called the rule of four. Whether the Court will issue a writ of certiorari is entirely within its discretion, and most petitions for writs are denied. (Thousands of cases are filed with the Supreme Court each year, yet it hears, on average, fewer than one hundred of these cases.¹⁷) A denial is not a decision on the merits of a case, nor does it indicate agreement with the lower court's opinion. Also, denial of the writ has no value as a precedent. Denial simply means that the lower court's decision remains the law in that jurisdiction.

Petitions Granted by the Court. Typically, the Court grants petitions in cases that raise important constitutional questions or when the lower courts have issued conflicting decisions on a significant issue. The justices, however, never explain their reasons for hearing certain cases and not others, so it is difficult to predict which type of case the Court might select. (See Concept Summary 2.2 on the following page to review the various types of courts in the federal and state court systems.)

Alternative Dispute Resolution

Litigation—the process of resolving a dispute through the court system—is expensive and time consuming. Litigating even the simplest complaint is costly, and because of the backlog of cases pending in many courts, several years may pass before a case is actually tried. For these and other reasons, more and more businesspersons are turning to alternative dispute resolution (ADR) as a means of settling their disputes.

The great advantage of ADR is its flexibility. Methods of ADR range from the parties sitting down together and attempting to work out their differences to multinational corporations agreeing to resolve a dispute through a formal hearing before a panel of experts. Normally, the parties themselves can control how the dispute will be settled, what procedures will be used, whether a neutral third party will be present or make a decision, and whether that decision will be legally binding or nonbinding. ADR also offers more privacy than court proceedings and allows disputes to be resolved relatively quickly.

15. Historically, judges were required to “ride the circuit” and hear appeals in different courts around the country, which is how the name “circuit court” came about.

16. Pronounced surshee-uh-rah-ree.

17. From the mid-1950s through the early 1990s, the Supreme Court reviewed more cases per year than it has since then. In the Court's 1982–1983 term, for example, the Court issued written opinions in 151 cases. In contrast, during the Court's 2006–2007 term, the Court issued written opinions in only 75 cases.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 2.2

Types of Courts

Court	Description
TRIAL COURTS	Trial courts are courts of original jurisdiction in which actions are initiated. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. State courts—Courts of general jurisdiction can hear any case that has not been specifically designated for another court; courts of limited jurisdiction include, among others, domestic relations courts, probate courts, municipal courts, and small claims courts. 2. Federal courts—The federal district court is the equivalent of the state trial court. Federal courts of limited jurisdiction include the bankruptcy courts and others shown in Exhibit 2-1 on page 37.
INTERMEDIATE APPELLATE COURTS	Courts of appeals are reviewing courts; generally, appellate courts do not have original jurisdiction. About three-fourths of the states have intermediate appellate courts; in the federal court system, the U.S. circuit courts of appeals are the intermediate appellate courts.
SUPREME COURT	The highest state court is that state's supreme court, although it may be called by some other name. Appeal from state supreme courts to the United States Supreme Court is possible only if a federal question is involved. The United States Supreme Court is the highest court in the federal court system and the final arbiter of the Constitution and federal law.

Today, more than 90 percent of civil lawsuits are settled before trial using some form of ADR. Indeed, most states either require or encourage parties to undertake ADR prior to trial. Many federal courts have instituted ADR programs as well. In the following pages, we examine the basic forms of ADR.

Negotiation

The simplest form of ADR is negotiation, a process in which the parties attempt to settle their dispute informally, with or without attorneys to represent them. Attorneys frequently advise their clients to negotiate a settlement voluntarily before they proceed to trial. In some courts, pretrial negotiation is mandatory before parties can proceed to trial. Parties may even try to negotiate a settlement during a trial or after the trial but before an appeal. Negotiation traditionally involves just the parties themselves and (typically) their attorneys. The attorneys, though, are advocates—they are obligated to put their clients' interests first.

Mediation

In mediation, a neutral third party acts as a mediator and works with both sides in the dispute to facilitate a resolution. The mediator normally talks with the parties separately as well as jointly, emphasizes points of agreement, and helps the parties to evaluate their options. Although the mediator may propose a solution (called a mediator's proposal), he or she does not make a decision resolving the matter. The mediator, who need not be a lawyer, usually charges a fee for his or her services (which can be split between the parties). States that require parties to undergo ADR before trial often offer mediation as one of the ADR options or (as in Florida) the only option.

One of the biggest advantages of mediation is that it is not as adversarial in nature as litigation. In mediation, the mediator takes an active role and attempts to bring the parties together so that they can come to a mutually satisfactory resolution. The mediation process tends to reduce the antagonism between the disputants, allowing them to resume their former relationship while minimizing hostility. For this reason, mediation is often the preferred form of ADR for disputes involving business partners, employers and employees, or other parties involved in long-term relationships.

Today, characteristics of mediation are being combined with those of arbitration (to be discussed next). In binding mediation, for example, the parties agree that if they cannot resolve the dispute, the mediator can make a legally binding decision on the issue. In mediation-arbitration, or “med-arb,” the parties first attempt to settle their dispute through mediation. If no settlement is reached, the dispute will be arbitrated.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Arbitration

A more formal method of ADR is arbitration, in which an arbitrator (a neutral third party or a panel of experts) hears a dispute and imposes a resolution on the parties. Arbitration differs from other forms of ADR in that the third party hearing the dispute makes a decision for the parties. Exhibit 2–3 outlines the basic differences among the three traditional forms of ADR. Usually, the parties in arbitration agree that the third party’s decision will be legally binding, although the parties can also agree to nonbinding arbitration. (Additionally, arbitration that is mandated by the courts often is not binding on the parties.) In non-binding arbitration, the parties can go forward with a lawsuit if they do not agree with the arbitrator’s decision.

The Arbitration Process In some respects, formal arbitration resembles a trial, although usually the procedural rules are much less restrictive than those governing litigation. In a typical arbitration, the parties present opening arguments and ask for specific remedies. Evidence is then presented, and witnesses may be called and examined by both sides. The arbitrator then renders a decision, called an award.

An arbitrator’s award is usually the final word on the matter. Although the parties may appeal an arbitrator’s decision, a court’s review of the decision will be much more restricted in scope than an appellate court’s review of a trial court’s decision. The general view is that because the parties were free to frame the issues and set the powers of the arbitrator at the outset, they cannot complain about the results. The award will be set aside only if the arbitrator’s conduct or “bad faith” substantially prejudiced the rights of one of the parties, if the award violates an established public policy, or if the arbitrator exceeded her or his powers (by arbitrating issues that the parties did not agree to submit to arbitration).

Arbitration Clauses and Statutes Virtually any commercial matter can be submitted to arbitration. Frequently, parties include an arbitration clause in a contract (a written agreement—see Chapter 10) specifying that any dispute arising under the contract will be resolved through arbitration rather than through the court system. Parties can also agree to arbitrate a dispute after it arises.

Most states have statutes (often based in part on the Uniform Arbitration Act of 1955) under which arbitration clauses will be enforced, and some state statutes compel arbitration of certain types of disputes, such as those involving public employees. At the federal level, the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), enacted in 1925, enforces arbitration clauses in contracts involving

EXHIBIT 2–3 • Basic Differences in the Traditional Forms of ADR

Type of ADR	Description	Neutral Third Party Present	Who Decides the Resolution
Negotiation	Parties meet informally with or without their attorneys and attempt to agree on a resolution.	No	The parties themselves reach a resolution.
Mediation	A neutral third party meets with the parties and emphasizes points of agreement to bring them toward resolution of their dispute.	Yes	The parties, but the mediator may suggest or propose a resolution.
Arbitration	The parties present their arguments and evidence before an arbitrator at a hearing, and the arbitrator renders a decision resolving the parties’ dispute.	Yes	The arbitrator imposes a resolution on the parties that may be either binding or nonbinding.

maritime activity and interstate commerce. Because of the breadth of the commerce clause (see Chapter 4), arbitration agreements involving transactions only slightly connected to the flow of interstate commerce may fall under the FAA.

The question in the following case was whether a court or an arbitrator should consider a claim that an entire contract, including its arbitration clause, is rendered void by the alleged illegality of a separate provision in the contract.

CASE 2.2 Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna

Supreme Court of the United States, 2006. 546 U.S. 440, 126 S.Ct. 1204, 163 L.Ed.2d 1038.

www.law.cornell.edu/supct/index.html^a

• Background and Facts Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc., cashes personal checks for consumers in Florida. Buckeye agrees to delay submitting a check for payment in exchange for a consumer's payment of a "finance charge." For each transaction, the consumer signs a "Deferred Deposit and Disclosure Agreement," which states, "By signing this Agreement, you agree that [i]f a dispute of any kind arises out of this Agreement * * * th[e]n either you or we or third-parties involved can choose to have that dispute resolved by binding arbitration." John Cardegna and others filed a suit in a Florida state court against Buckeye, alleging that the "finance charge" represented an illegally high interest rate in violation of Florida state laws, rendering the agreement "criminal on its face." Buckeye filed a motion to compel arbitration. The court denied the motion. On Buckeye's appeal, a state intermediate appellate court reversed this denial, but on the plaintiffs' appeal, the Florida Supreme Court reversed the lower appellate court's decision. Buckeye appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice SCALIA delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

* * * Section 2 [of the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA)] embodies the national policy favoring arbitration and places arbitration agreements on equal footing with all other contracts:

A written provision in * * * a contract * * * to settle by arbitration a controversy thereafter arising out of such contract * * * shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract.

* * * The crux of the [respondents'] complaint is that the contract as a whole (including its arbitration provision) is rendered invalid by the * * * finance charge.

* * * [Our holdings in previous cases] answer the question presented here by establishing three propositions. First, as a matter of substantive federal arbitration law, an arbitration provision is severable [capable of being legally separated] from the remainder of the contract. Second, unless the challenge is to the arbitration clause itself, the issue of the contract's validity is considered by the arbitrator in the first instance. Third, this arbitration law applies in state as well as federal courts. * * * Applying [those holdings] to this case, we conclude that because respondents challenge the Agreement, but not specifically its arbitration provisions, those provisions are enforceable apart from the remainder of the contract. The challenge should therefore be considered by an arbitrator, not a court. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Since, respondents argue, the only arbitration agreements to which [Section] 2 applies are those involving a "contract," and since an agreement void ab initio [from the beginning] under state law is not a "contract," there is no "written provision" in or "controversy arising out of" a "contract," to which [Section] 2 can apply. * * * We do not read "contract" so narrowly. The word

a. In the "Supreme Court Collection" menu at the top of the page, click on "Search." When that page opens, in the "Search for:" box, type "Buckeye Check," choose "All decisions" in the accompanying list, and click on "Search." In the result, scroll to the name of the case and click on the appropriate link to access the opinion.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

CASE 2.2 CONTINUED

appears four times in [Section] 2. Its last appearance is in the final clause, which allows a challenge to an arbitration provision “upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract.” There can be no doubt that “contract” as used this last time must include contracts that later prove to be void. Otherwise, the grounds for revocation would be limited to those that rendered a contract voidable—which would mean (implausibly) that an arbitration agreement could be challenged as voidable but not as void. Because the sentence’s final use of “contract” so obviously includes putative [alleged] contracts, we will not read the same word earlier in the same sentence to have a more narrow meaning.

- Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Florida Supreme Court and remanded the case for further proceedings. The United States Supreme Court ruled that a challenge to the validity of a contract as a whole, and not specifically to an arbitration clause contained in the contract, must be resolved by an arbitrator.

- The Ethical Dimension Does the holding in this case permit a court to enforce an arbitration agreement in a contract that the arbitrator later finds to be void? Is this fair? Why or why not?

- The Legal Environment Dimension As indicated in the parties’ arguments and the Court’s reasoning in this case, into what categories can contracts be classified with respect to their enforceability?

Arbitrability When a dispute arises as to whether the parties to a contract with an arbitration clause have agreed to submit a particular matter to arbitration, one party may file suit to compel arbitration. The court before which the suit is brought will not decide the basic controversy but must decide the issue of arbitrability—that is, whether the matter is one that must be resolved through arbitration. If the court finds that the subject matter in controversy is covered by the agreement to arbitrate, then a party may be compelled to arbitrate the dispute. Even when a claim involves a violation of a statute passed to protect a certain class of people, a court may determine that the parties must nonetheless abide by their agreement to arbitrate the dispute. Usually, a court will allow the claim to be arbitrated if the court, in interpreting the statute, can find no legislative intent to the contrary.

No party, however, will be ordered to submit a particular dispute to arbitration unless the court is convinced that the party has consented to do so.¹⁸ Additionally, the courts will not compel arbitration if it is clear that the prescribed arbitration rules and procedures are inherently unfair to one of the parties.¹⁹

Mandatory Arbitration in the Employment Context

A significant question in the last several years has concerned mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts. Many claim that employees’ rights are not sufficiently protected when they are forced, as a condition of being hired, to agree to arbitrate all disputes and thus waive their rights under statutes specifically designed to protect employees. The United States Supreme Court, however, has held that mandatory arbitration clauses in employment contracts are generally enforceable.²⁰

Compulsory arbitration agreements often spell out the rules for a mandatory proceeding. For example, an agreement may address in detail the amount and payment of filing fees and other expenses. Some courts have overturned provisions in employment-related agreements that require the parties to split the costs when an individual worker lacks the ability to pay. The court in the following case took this reasoning a step further.

18. See, for example, Wright v. Universal Maritime Service Corp., 525 U.S. 70, 119 S.Ct. 391, 142 L.Ed.2d 361 (1998).

19. Hooters of America, Inc. v. Phillips, 173 F.3d 933 (4th Cir. 1999).

20. For a landmark decision on this issue, see Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20, 111 S.Ct. 1647, 114 L.Ed.2d 26 (1991).

EXTENDED
CASE 2.3
Morrison v. Circuit City Stores, Inc.

 United States Court of Appeals, Sixth Circuit, 2003. 317 F.3d 646.
www.ca6.uscourts.gov/internet/index.htm^a KAREN NELSON MOORE, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * Plaintiff-Appellant Morrison, an African-American female with a bachelor's degree in engineering from the U.S. Air Force Academy and a master's degree in administration from Central Michigan University, submitted an application for a managerial position at a Circuit City store in Cincinnati, Ohio. As part of the application process, Morrison was required to sign a * * * "Dispute Resolution Agreement." This document contained an arbitration clause that required resolution of all disputes or controversies arising out of employment with Circuit City in an arbitral forum. * * * Circuit City would not consider any application for employment unless the arbitration agreement was signed * * * .

* * * *

Pursuant to [the agreement] each party is required to pay one-half of the costs of arbitration following the issuance of an arbitration award * * * . In addition, * * * if an employee is able to pay her share of the arbitration costs within [ninety days], her costs (not including attorney fees) are then limited to the greater of either five hundred dollars or three percent of her most recent annual compensation.

* * * *

* * * Morrison began her employment at Circuit City on or about December 1, 1995. Two years later, on December 12, 1997, she was terminated. Morrison alleges that her termination was the result of race and sex discrimination.^b She filed this lawsuit * * * in Ohio state court, alleging federal and state claims of race and sex discrimination * * * . Circuit City removed the case to federal court and then moved to compel arbitration and to dismiss Morrison's claims. The district court granted Circuit City's motion * * * .

* * * Morrison's appeal followed.

* * * *

We hold that potential litigants must be given an opportunity, prior to arbitration on the merits, to demonstrate that the potential costs of arbitration are great enough to deter them and similarly situated individuals from seeking to vindicate [assert] their federal statutory rights in the arbitral forum.

* * * Thus, in order to protect the statutory rights at issue, the reviewing court must look to more than just the interests and conduct of a particular plaintiff. * * * [A] court considering whether a cost-splitting provision is enforceable should consider similarly situated potential litigants, for whom costs will loom as a larger concern, because it is, in large part, their presence in the system that will deter discriminatory practices. [Emphasis added.]

For this reason, if the reviewing court finds that the cost-splitting provision would deter a substantial number of similarly situated potential litigants, it should refuse to enforce the cost-splitting provision in order to serve the underlying functions of the federal statute. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

This analysis will yield different results in different cases. It will find, in many cases, that high-level managerial employees and others with substantial means can afford the costs of arbitration, thus making cost-splitting provisions in such cases enforceable. In the case of other employees, however, this standard will render cost-splitting provisions unenforceable in many, if not most, cases.

* * * Circuit City argues that Morrison could have avoided having to pay half of the cost of the arbitration * * * if she could have arranged to pay the greater of $500 or 3 percent of her

a. This is a page within the Web site of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit. In the left-hand column, click on "Opinions Search." In the "Short Title contains" box, type "Morrison," and click "Submit Query." In the "Opinion" box corresponding to the name of the case, click on the number to access the opinion.

b. Employment discrimination will be discussed in detail in Chapter 34.

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

CASE 2.3 CONTINUED

annual salary (in this case, 3 percent of $54,060, or $1,622) within ninety days of the arbitrator's award. * * *

In the abstract, this sum may not appear prohibitive, but it must be considered from the vantage point of the potential litigant in a case such as this. Recently terminated, the potential litigant must continue to pay for housing, utilities, transportation, food, and the other necessities of life in contemporary society despite losing her primary, and most likely only, source of income. * * *

The provision reducing the (former) employee's exposure to the greater of $500 or three percent of her annual compensation presents a closer issue. However, a potential litigant considering arbitration would still have to arrange to pay three percent of her most recent salary, in this case, $1,622, within a three-month period, or risk incurring her full half of the costs * * *. Faced with this choice—which really boils down to risking one's scarce resources in the hopes of an uncertain benefit—it appears to us that a substantial number of similarly situated persons would be deterred from seeking to vindicate their statutory rights under these circumstances.^c

Based on this reasoning, we hold that Morrison has satisfied her burden in the present case in demonstrating that * * * the cost-splitting provision in the agreement was unenforceable with respect to her claims.

QUESTIONS

1. On what argument did Morrison base her appeal of the court's order to arbitrate her employment-discrimination claims?
2. Why did the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit hold in Morrison's case that the arbitration agreement's cost-splitting provision was unenforceable?

c. The court also concluded that the provision could be severed from the agreement, which meant that the rest of the agreement could be enforced. Because the arbitration in this case had already occurred, and Morrison had not been required to pay any share of the costs, the court affirmed the lower court's order compelling arbitration "on these different grounds."

Other Types of ADR

The three forms of ADR just discussed are the oldest and traditionally the most commonly used forms. As mentioned earlier, a variety of new types of ADR have emerged in recent years, including those described here.

1. In early neutral case evaluation, the parties select a neutral third party (generally an expert in the subject matter of the dispute) to evaluate their respective positions. The parties explain their positions to the case evaluator, and the case evaluator assesses the strengths and weaknesses of each party's claims.
2. In a mini-trial, each party's attorney briefly argues the party's case before the other and a panel of representatives from each side who have the authority to settle the dispute. Typically, a neutral third party (usually an expert in the area being disputed) acts as an adviser. If the parties fail to reach an agreement, the adviser renders an opinion as to how a court would likely decide the issue.
3. Numerous federal courts now hold summary jury trials (SJTs), in which the parties present their arguments and evidence and the jury renders a verdict. The jury's verdict is not binding, but it does act as a guide to both sides in reaching an agreement during the mandatory negotiations that immediately follow the trial.
4. Other alternatives being employed by the courts include summary procedures for commercial litigation and the appointment of special masters to assist judges in deciding complex issues.

Providers of ADR Services

Both government agencies and private organizations provide ADR services. A major provider of ADR services is the American Arbitration Association (AAA), which was founded in 1926 and now handles more than two hundred thousand claims each year in its numerous offices around the country. Cases brought before the AAA are heard by an expert or a panel of experts in the area relating to the dispute and are usually settled quickly. Generally, about half of the panel members are lawyers. To cover its costs, the AAA charges a fee, paid by the party filing the claim. In addition, each party to the dispute pays a specified amount for each hearing day, as well as a special additional fee in cases involving personal injuries or property loss.

Hundreds of for-profit firms around the country also provide dispute-resolution services. Typically, these firms hire retired judges to conduct arbitration hearings or otherwise assist parties in settling their disputes. The judges follow procedures similar to those of the federal courts and use similar rules. Usually, each party to the dispute pays a filing fee and a designated fee for a hearing session or conference.

Online Dispute Resolution

An increasing number of companies and organizations are offering dispute-resolution services using the Internet. The settlement of disputes in these online forums is known as online dispute resolution (ODR). The disputes resolved in these forums have most commonly involved disagreements over the rights to domain names (Web site addresses—see Chapter 8) or the quality of goods sold via the Internet, including goods sold through Internet auction sites.

At this time, ODR may be best for resolving small- to medium-sized business liability claims, which may not be worth the expense of litigation or traditional ADR methods. Rules being developed in online forums, however, may ultimately become a code of conduct for everyone who does business in cyberspace. Most online forums do not automatically apply the law of any specific jurisdiction. Instead, results are often based on general, more universal legal principles. As with offline methods of dispute resolution, any party may appeal to a court at any time.

International Dispute Resolution

Businesspersons who engage in international business transactions normally take special precautions to protect themselves in the event that a party with whom they are dealing in another country breaches an agreement. Often, parties to international contracts include special clauses in their contracts providing for how disputes arising under the contracts will be resolved.

Forum-Selection and Choice-of-Law Clauses

As you will read in Chapter 20, parties to international transactions often include forum-selection and choice-of-law clauses in their contracts. These clauses designate the jurisdiction (court or country) where any dispute arising under the contract will be litigated and the nation's law that will be applied. When an international contract does not include such clauses, any legal proceedings arising under the contract will be more complex and attended by much more uncertainty. For example, litigation may take place in two or more countries, with each country applying its own national law to the particular transactions.

Furthermore, even if a plaintiff wins a favorable judgment in a lawsuit litigated in the plaintiff's country, the defendant's country could refuse to enforce the court's judgment. As will be discussed in Chapter 52, for reasons of courtesy, the judgment may be enforced in the defendant's country, particularly if the defendant's country is the United States and the foreign court's decision is consistent with U.S. national law and policy. Other nations, however, may not be as accommodating as the United States, and the plaintiff may be left empty-handed.

Arbitration Clauses

Parties to international contracts also often include arbitration clauses in their contracts that require a neutral third party to decide any contract disputes. In international arbitration proceedings, the third party may be a neutral entity (such as the International Chamber of Commerce), a panel of individuals representing both parties' interests, or some other group or organization. The United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards²¹—which has been implemented in more than fifty countries, including the United States—assists in the enforcement of arbitration clauses, as do provisions in specific treaties among nations. The American Arbitration Association provides arbitration services for international as well as domestic disputes.

21. June 10, 1958, 21 U.S.T. 2517, T.I.A.S. No. 6997 (the "New York Convention").

REVIEWING Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

Stan Garner resides in Illinois and promotes boxing matches for SuperSports, Inc., an Illinois corporation. Garner created the concept of “Ages” promotion—a three-fight series of boxing matches pitting an older fighter (George Foreman) against a younger fighter, such as John Ruiz or Riddick Bowe. The concept included titles for each of the three fights (“Challenge of the Ages,” “Battle of the Ages,” and “Fight of the Ages”), as well as promotional epithets to characterize the two fighters (“the Foreman Factor”). Garner contacted George Foreman and his manager, who both reside in Texas, to sell the idea, and they arranged a meeting at Caesar’s Palace in Las Vegas, Nevada. At some point in the negotiations, Foreman’s manager signed a nondisclosure agreement prohibiting him from disclosing Garner’s promotional concepts unless the parties signed a contract. Nevertheless, after negotiations between Garner and Foreman fell through, Foreman used Garner’s “Battle of the Ages” concept to promote a subsequent fight. Garner filed a suit against Foreman and his manager in a federal district court located in Illinois, alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. On what basis might the federal district court in Illinois exercise jurisdiction in this case?
2. Does the federal district court have original or appellate jurisdiction?
3. Suppose that Garner had filed his action in an Illinois state court. Could an Illinois state court exercise personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Garner had filed his action in a Nevada state court. Would that court have personal jurisdiction over Foreman or his manager? Explain.

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

alternative dispute resolution (ADR) 41
 American Arbitration Association (AAA) 47 arbitration 43
 arbitration clause 43 award 43 bankruptcy court 33 concurrent jurisdiction 34 diversity of citizenship 34 early neutral case evaluation 47 exclusive jurisdiction 34 federal question 34 in personam jurisdiction 31 in rem jurisdiction 31 judicial review 30

 jurisdiction 31
 justiciable controversy 37 litigation 41 long arm statute 31 mediation 42
 mini-trial 47

negotiation 42
 online dispute resolution (ODR) 48 probate court 33 question of fact 39 question of law 39 rule of four 41 small claims court 38
 standing to sue 36
 summary jury trial (SJT) 47
 venue 35
 writ of certiorari 41

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

2-1. In an arbitration proceeding, the arbitrator need not be a judge or even a lawyer. How, then, can the arbitrator's decision have the force of law and be binding on the parties involved?

2-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

The defendant in a lawsuit is appealing the trial court's decision in favor of the plaintiff. On appeal, the defendant claims that the evidence presented at trial to support the plaintiff's claim was so scanty that no reasonable jury could have found for the plaintiff. Therefore, argues the defendant, the appellate court should reverse the trial court's decision. Will an appellate court ever reverse a trial court's findings with respect to questions of fact? Discuss fully.

- For a sample answer to Question 2-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

2-3. Appellate courts normally see only written transcripts of trial proceedings when they are reviewing cases. Today, in some states, videotapes are being used as the official trial reports. If the use of videotapes as official reports continues, will this alter the appellate process? Should it? Discuss fully.

2-4. Marya Callais, a citizen of Florida, was walking along a busy street in Tallahassee, Florida, when a large crate flew off a passing truck and hit her, causing numerous injuries. She experienced a great deal of pain and suffering, incurred significant medical expenses, and could not work for six months. She wants to sue the trucking firm for $300,000 in damages. The firm's headquarters are in Georgia, although the company does business in Florida. In what court might Callais bring suit—a Florida state court, a Georgia state court, or a federal court? What factors might influence her decision?

2-5. E-Jurisdiction. American Business Financial Services, Inc. (ABFI), a Pennsylvania firm, sells and services loans to businesses and consumers. First Union National Bank, with its principal place of business in North Carolina, provides banking services. Alan Boyer, an employee of First Union, lives in North Carolina and has never been to Pennsylvania. In the course of his employment, Boyer learned that the bank was going to extend a $150 million line of credit to ABFI. Boyer then attempted to manipulate the price of ABFI's stock for personal gain by sending disparaging e-mails to ABFI's independent auditors in Pennsylvania. Boyer also posted negative statements about ABFI and its management on a Yahoo bulletin board. ABFI filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Boyer, First Union, and others, alleging wrongful interference with a contractual relationship, among other things. Boyer filed a motion to dismiss the complaint for lack of personal jurisdiction. Could the court exercise jurisdiction over Boyer? Explain. [American Business

Financial Services, Inc. v. First Union National Bank, ___ A.2d ___ (Pa.Comm.Pl. 2002)]

2-6. Arbitration. Alexander Little worked for Auto Stiegler, Inc., an automobile dealership in Los Angeles County, California, eventually becoming the service manager. While employed, Little signed an arbitration agreement that required the submission of all employment-related disputes to arbitration. The agreement also provided that any award over $50,000 could be appealed to a second arbitrator. Little was later demoted and terminated. Alleging that these actions were in retaliation for investigating and reporting warranty fraud and thus were in violation of public policy, Little filed a suit in a California state court against Auto Stiegler. The defendant filed a motion with the court to compel arbitration. Little responded that the arbitration agreement should not be enforced because, among other things, the appeal provision was unfairly one sided. Is this provision enforceable? Should the court grant Auto Stiegler's motion? Why or why not? [Little v. Auto Stiegler, Inc., 29 Cal.4th 1064, 63 P.3d 979, 130 Cal.Rptr.2d 892 (2003)]

2-7. Jurisdiction. KaZaA BV was a company formed under the laws of the Netherlands. KaZaA distributed KaZaA Media Desktop (KMD) software, which enabled users to exchange digital media, including movies and music, via a peer-to-peer transfer network. KaZaA also operated the KaZaA.com Web site, through which it distributed the KMD software to millions of California residents and other users. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc., and other parties in the entertainment industries based in California filed a suit in a federal district court against KaZaA and others, alleging copyright infringement. KaZaA filed a counterclaim, but while legal action was pending, the firm passed its assets and its Web site to Sharman Networks, Ltd., a company organized under the laws of Vanuatu (an island republic east of Australia) and doing business principally in Australia. Sharman explicitly disclaimed the assumption of any of KaZaA's liabilities. When the plaintiffs added Sharman as a defendant, Sharman filed a motion to dismiss on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction. Would it be fair to subject Sharman to suit in this case? Explain. [Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc. v. Grokster, Ltd., 243 F.Supp.2d.1073 (C.D.Cal. 2003)]

2-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Michael and Karla Covington live in Jefferson County, Idaho. When they bought their home, a gravel pit was across the street. In 1995, the county converted the pit to a landfill. Under the county's operation, the landfill accepted major appliances, household garbage, spilled grain, grass clippings, straw, manure, animal carcasses, containers with hazardous content warnings, leaking car batteries, and waste oil, among other things. The deposits were often left uncovered, attracting insects and other scavengers and contaminating the groundwater. Fires broke out, including at least one started by an intruder who entered the property through an unlocked gate. The Covingtons complained to the state, which inspected the landfill, but no changes were made to address their concerns. Finally, the Covingtons filed a suit in a federal district court against the county and the state, charging violations of federal environmental laws. Those laws were designed to minimize the risks of injuries from fires, scavengers, groundwater contamination, and other pollution dangers. Did the Covingtons have standing to sue? What principles apply? Explain. [Covington v. Jefferson County, 358 F.3d 626 (9th Cir. 2004)]

CHAPTER 2 Courts and Alternative Dispute Resolution

- To view a sample answer for Problem 2-8, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 2," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

2-9. Jurisdiction. Xcentric Ventures, LLC, is an Arizona firm that operates the Web sites RipOffReport.com and BadBusinessBureau.com. Visitors to the sites can buy a copy of a book titled Do-It-Yourself Guide: How to Get Rip-Off Revenge. The price ($21.95) includes shipping to anywhere in the United States, including Illinois, to which thirteen copies have been shipped. The sites accept donations and feature postings by individuals who claim to have been "ripped off." Some visitors posted comments about George S. May International Co., a management consulting firm. The postings alleged fraud, larceny, possession of child pornography, and possession of controlled substances (illegal drugs). May filed a suit in a federal district court in Illinois against Xcentric and others, charging, among other things, "false descriptions and representations." The defendants filed a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction. What is the standard for exercising jurisdiction over a party whose only connection to a jurisdiction is over the Web? How would that standard apply in this case? Explain. [George S. May International Co. v. Xcentric Ventures, LLC, 409 F.Supp.2d 1052 (N.D.Ill. 2006)]

2-10. Jurisdiction. In 2001, Raul Leal, the owner and operator of Texas Labor Contractors in East Texas, contacted Poverty Point Produce, Inc., which operates a sweet potato farm in West Carroll Parish, Louisiana, and offered to provide field workers. Poverty Point accepted the offer. Jeffrey Brown, an owner of, and field manager for, the farm, told Leal the number of workers needed and gave him forms for them to fill out and sign. Leal placed an ad in a newspaper in Brownsville, Texas. Job applicants were directed to Leal's car dealership in Weslaco, Texas, where they were told the details of the work. Leal recruited, among others, Elias Moreno, who lives in the Rio Grande Valley in Texas, and transported Moreno and the others to Poverty Point's farm. At the farm, Leal's brother Jesse oversaw the work with instructions from Brown, lived with the workers in the on-site housing, and gave them their paychecks. When the job was done, the workers were returned to Texas. Moreno and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Poverty Point and others, alleging, in part, violations of Texas state law related to the work. Poverty Point filed a motion to dismiss the suit on the ground that the court did not have personal jurisdiction. All of the meetings between Poverty Point and the Leals occurred in Louisiana. All of the farmwork was done in Louisiana. Poverty Point has no offices, bank accounts, or phone listings in Texas. It does not advertise or solicit business in Texas. Despite these facts, can the court exercise personal jurisdiction? Explain. [Moreno v. Poverty Point Produce, Inc., 243 F.R.D. 275 (S.D.Tex. 2007)]

2-11. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Linden Research, Inc., operates a multiplayer role-playing game in the virtual world known as "Second Life" at secondlife.com. Participants create avatars to represent themselves on the site. In 2003, Second Life became the only virtual world to recognize participants' rights to buy, own, and sell digital content—virtual property, including "land." Linden's chief executive officer, Philip Rosedale, joined efforts to publicize this recognition and these rights in the real world media. Rosedale also created an avatar to tout the rights in Second Life town meetings. March Bragg, an experienced Pennsylvania attorney, was a Second Life participant whose avatar attended the meetings, after which Bragg began to invest in Second Life's virtual property. In April 2006, Bragg bought "Taessot," a parcel of virtual land. Linden decided that the purchase was improper, however, and took Taessot from Bragg. Linden also froze Bragg's account, effectively confiscating all of his virtual property and currency. Bragg filed a suit against Linden and Rosedale, claiming that the defendants acted unlawfully. [Bragg v. Linden Research, Inc., 487 F.Supp.2d 593 (E.D.Pa. 2007)]

- In the federal district court in Pennsylvania that was hearing the suit, Rosedale, who lives in California, filed a motion to dismiss the claim against him for lack of personal jurisdiction. On what basis could the court deny this motion and assert jurisdiction? Is it fair to require Rosedale to appear in a court in a distant location? Explain.
- To access Second Life, a participant must accept its "Terms of Service" (TOS) by clicking an "accept" button. Under the TOS, Linden has the right "at any time for any reason or no reason to suspend or terminate your Account," to refuse to return a participant's money, and to amend the terms at its discretion. The terms also stipulate that any dispute be resolved by binding arbitration in California. Is there anything unfair about the TOS? Should the court compel Bragg to arbitrate this dispute? Discuss.

2-12. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 2." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Jurisdiction in Cyberspace. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) What standard would a court apply to determine whether it has jurisdiction over the out-of-state computer firm in the video?
- (b) What factors is a court likely to consider in assessing whether sufficient contacts existed when the only connection to the jurisdiction is through a Web site?
- (c) How do you think the court would resolve the issue in this case?

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, as well as information about the Supreme Court and its justices, go to either

www.supremecourtus.gov or

www.oyez.org

The Web site for the federal courts offers information on the federal court system and links to all federal courts at www.uscourts.gov

The National Center for State Courts (NCSC) offers links to the Web pages of all state courts. Go to www.ncsonline.org

For information on alternative dispute resolution, go to the American Arbitration Association's Web site at www.adr.org

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 2" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

- Internet Exercise 2-1: Legal Perspective
Alternative Dispute Resolution
- Internet Exercise 2-2: Management Perspective
Resolve a Dispute Online
- Internet Exercise 2-3: Historical Perspective
The Judiciary's Role in American Government

CHAPTER 3

Court Procedures

American and English courts follow the adversarial system of justice. Although clients are allowed to represent themselves in court (called pro se representation),¹ most parties to lawsuits hire attorneys to represent them. Each lawyer acts as his or her client's advocate, presenting the client's version of the facts in such a way as to convince the judge (or the judge and jury, in a jury trial) that this version is correct.

1. This right was definitively established in Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 95 S.Ct. 2525, 45 L.Ed.2d 562 (1975).

Most of the judicial procedures that you will read about in the following pages are rooted in the adversarial framework of the American legal system. In this chapter, after a brief overview of judicial procedures, we illustrate the steps involved in a lawsuit with a hypothetical civil case (criminal procedures will be discussed in Chapter 9).

Procedural Rules

The parties to a lawsuit must comply with the procedural rules of the court in which the lawsuit is filed. Although most people, when considering the outcome of a case, think of matters of substantive law, procedural law can have a significant impact on one's ability to assert a legal claim. Procedural rules provide a framework for every dispute and specify what must be done at each stage of the litigation process. All civil trials held in federal district courts are governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP).² Each state also has rules of civil procedure that apply to all courts within that state. In addition, each court has its own local rules of procedure that supplement the federal or state rules.

2. The United States Supreme Court has authority to set forth these rules, as spelled out in 28 U.S.C. Sections 2071–2077. Generally, though, the federal judiciary appoints committees that make recommendations to the Supreme Court. The Court then publishes any proposed changes in the rules and allows for public comment before finalizing the rules.

Stages of Litigation

Broadly speaking, the litigation process has three phases: pretrial, trial, and posttrial. Each phase involves specific procedures, as discussed throughout this chapter. Although civil lawsuits may vary greatly in terms of complexity, cost, and detail, they typically progress through the specific stages charted in Exhibit 3–1 on the following page.

To illustrate the procedures involved in a civil lawsuit, we will use a simple hypothetical case. The case arose from an automobile accident, which occurred when a car driven by Antonio Carvello, a resident of New Jersey, collided with a car driven by Jill Kirby, a resident of New York. The accident took place at an intersection in New York City. Kirby suffered personal injuries, which caused her to incur medical and hospital expenses as well as lost wages for four months. In all, she calculated that the cost to her of the accident was $100,000.³ Carvello and Kirby have been unable to agree on a settlement, and Kirby now must decide whether to sue Carvello for the $100,000 compensation she feels she deserves.

3. In this example, we are ignoring damages for pain and suffering or for permanent disabilities. Often, plaintiffs in personal-injury cases seek such damages.

EXHIBIT 3-1 • Stages in a Typical Lawsuit

The First Step: Consulting with an Attorney

As mentioned, rules of procedure often affect the outcome of a dispute—a fact that highlights the importance of obtaining the advice of counsel. The first step taken by virtually anyone contemplating a lawsuit is to seek the guidance of a qualified attorney.⁴ In the hypothetical Kirby-Carvello case, assume that Kirby consults with a lawyer. The attorney will advise her regarding what she can expect in a lawsuit, her probability of success at trial, and the procedures that will be involved. If more than one court would have jurisdiction over the matter, the attorney will also discuss the advantages and disadvantages of filing in a particular court. Depending on the court hearing the case, the attorney will give Kirby an idea of how much time it will take to resolve the dispute through litigation and provide an estimate of the costs involved.

4. See Chapter 42 for a discussion of the importance of obtaining legal counsel and for guidelines on how to locate attorneys and retain their services.

The attorney will also inform Kirby of the legal fees that she will have to pay in an attempt to collect damages from the defendant, Carvello. Attorneys base their fees on such factors as the difficulty of a matter, the amount of time involved, the experience and skill of the attorney in the particular area of the law, and the cost of doing business. In the United States, legal fees range from $125 to $600 per hour or even higher (the average fee per hour is between $175 and $300). In addition, the client is also responsible for paying various expenses related to the case (called “out-of-pocket” costs), including court filing fees, travel expenses, and the cost of expert witnesses and investigators, for example.

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

Types of Attorneys’ Fees For a particular legal matter, an attorney may charge one type of fee or a combination of several types. Fixed fees may be charged for the performance of such services as drafting a simple will. Hourly fees may be computed for matters that will involve an indeterminate period of time. Any case brought to trial, for example, may involve an expenditure of time that cannot be precisely estimated in advance. Contingency fees are fixed as a percentage (usually between 25 and 40 percent) of a client’s recovery in certain types of lawsuits, such as a personal-injury lawsuit.⁵ If the lawsuit is unsuccessful, the attorney receives no fee, but the client will have to reimburse the attorney for any out-of-pocket costs incurred. Because Kirby’s claim involves a personal injury, her lawyer will likely take the case on a contingency-fee basis, but she may have to pay an amount up front to cover the court costs.

In some cases, the winning party may be able to recover at least some portion of her or his attorneys’ fees from the losing party. Many state and federal statutes provide for an award of attorneys’ fees in certain legal actions, such as probate matters (settling a person’s estate after death). In these situations, the judge sets the amount of the fee, which may be specified by statute or based on other factors, such as the fee customarily charged for similar services in the area. An attorney will advise the client as to whether she or he would be entitled to recover some or all of the attorneys’ fees in a case.

Settlement Considerations Once an attorney has been retained, the attorney is required to pursue a resolution of the matter on the client’s behalf. Nevertheless, the amount of energy an attorney will spend on a given case is also determined by how much time and funds the client wishes to devote to the process. If the client is willing to pay for a lengthy trial and one or more appeals, the attorney may pursue those actions. Often, however, once a client learns the substantial costs involved in litigation, he or she may decide to pursue a settlement of the claim. Attempts to settle the case may be ongoing throughout the litigation process.

Another important factor in deciding whether to pursue litigation is the defendant’s ability to pay the damages sought. Even if Kirby is awarded damages, it may be difficult to enforce the court’s judgment if, for example, the amount exceeds the limits of Carvello’s automobile insurance policy. (We will discuss the problems involved in enforcing a judgment later in this chapter.)

Pretrial Procedures

The pretrial litigation process involves the filing of the pleadings, the gathering of evidence (called discovery), and possibly other procedures, such as a pretrial conference and jury selection.

The Pleadings

The complaint and answer (and other legal documents discussed below), taken together, are known as the pleadings. The pleadings inform each party of the other’s claims and specify the issues (disputed questions) involved in the case. Because the rules of procedure vary depending on the jurisdiction of the court, the style and form of the pleadings may be different from those shown in this chapter.

The Plaintiff’s Complaint Kirby’s action against Carvello commences when her lawyer files a complaint⁶ with the clerk of the appropriate court. The complaint contains a statement alleging (1) the facts showing that the court has jurisdiction, (2) the facts establishing the plaintiff’s basis for relief, and (3) the remedy the plaintiff is seeking. Complaints can be lengthy or brief, depending on the complexity of the case and the rules of the jurisdiction.

Exhibit 3–2 on the next page illustrates how a complaint in the Kirby-Carvello case might appear. The complaint asserts facts indicating that the federal district court has jurisdiction because of diversity of citizenship. It then gives a brief statement of the facts of the accident and alleges that Carvello negligently drove his vehicle through a red light, striking Kirby’s

5. Note that attorneys may charge a contingency fee in only certain types of cases and are typically prohibited from entering into this type of fee arrangement in criminal cases, divorce cases, and cases involving the distribution of assets after death.

6. Sometimes, the document filed with the court is called a petition or a declaration instead of a complaint.

EXHIBIT 3-2 • A Typical Complaint

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK		CIVIL NO. 09-1047
JILL KIRBY Plaintiff, v. ANTONIO CARVELLO Defendant.		COMPLAINT

The plaintiff brings this cause of action against the defendant, alleging as follows:

1. This action is between the plaintiff, who is a resident of the State of New York, and the defendant, who is a resident of the State of New Jersey. There is diversity of citizenship between the parties.
2. The amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds the sum of $75,000.
3. On September 10th, 2008, the plaintiff, Jill Kirby, was exercising good driving habits and reasonable care in driving her car through the intersection of Boardwalk and Pennsylvania Avenue, New York City, New York, when the defendant, Antonio Carvello, negligently drove his vehicle through a red light at the intersection and collided with the plaintiff's vehicle.
4. As a result of the collision, the plaintiff suffered severe physical injury, which prevented her from working, and property damage to her car.

WHEREFORE, the plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for the sum of $100,000 plus interest at the maximum legal rate and the costs of this action.

By Joseph Roe
 Joseph Roe
 Attorney for Plaintiff
 100 Main Street
 New York, New York

1/2/09

car and causing serious personal injury and property damage. The complaint goes on to state that Kirby is seeking $100,000 in damages, although in some state civil actions the plaintiff need not specify the amount of damages sought.

Service of Process. Before the court can exercise jurisdiction over the defendant (Carvello)—in effect, before the lawsuit can begin—the court must have proof that the defendant was notified of the lawsuit.

Formally notifying the defendant of a lawsuit is called service of process. The plaintiff must deliver, or serve, a copy of the complaint and a summons (a notice requiring the defendant to appear in court and answer the complaint) to the defendant. The summons notifies Carvello that he must file an answer to the complaint within a specified time period (twenty days in the federal courts) or suffer a default judgment against him. A default judgment in Kirby's favor would mean that she would be awarded the damages alleged in her

EXHIBIT 3-3 • A Typical Summons

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK		CIVIL ACTION, FILE NO. 09-1047
JILL KIRBY Plaintiff, v. ANTONIO CARVELLO Defendant.		SUMMONS
To the above-named Defendant:
You are hereby summoned and required to serve upon Joseph Roe, plaintiff's attorney, whose address is 100 Main Street, New York, NY, an answer to the complaint which is herewith served upon you, within 20 days after service of this summons upon you, exclusive of the day of service. If you fail to do so, judgment by default will be taken against you for the relief demanded in the complaint.
C. H. Hynek <hr style="width: 100%;"/> CLERK		January 2, 2009 <hr style="width: 100%;"/> DATE complaint because Carvello failed to respond to the allegations. A typical summons is shown in Exhibit 3-3.
  <hr style="width: 100%;"/> BY DEPUTY CLERK

Method of Service. How service of process occurs depends on the rules of the court or jurisdiction in which the lawsuit is brought. Under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, anyone who is at least eighteen years of age and is not a party to the lawsuit can serve process in federal court cases. In state courts, the process server is often a county sheriff or an employee of an independent company that provides process service in the local area. Usually, the server hands the summons and complaint to the defendant personally or leaves it at the defendant's residence or place of business. In some states, process can be served by mail if the defendant consents (accepts service). When the defendant cannot be reached, special rules provide for alternative means of service, such as publishing a notice in the local newspaper. In some situations, such as when the parties are in other countries or no other alternative is available, courts have even allowed service of process via e-mail, provided that it is reasonably calculated to provide notice and an opportunity to respond.⁷

In cases involving corporate defendants, the summons and complaint may be served on an officer or on a registered agent (representative) of the corporation. The name of a corporation's registered agent can usually be obtained from the secretary of state's office in the state where the company incorporated its business (and, frequently, from the secretary of state's office in any state where the corporation does business).

Did the plaintiff in the following case effect proper service of the summons and the complaint on an out-of-state corporation?

⁷ See, for example, Rio Properties, Inc. v. Rio International Interlink, 284 F.3d 1007 (9th Cir. 2002).

EXTENDED
CASE 3.1
Cruz v. Fagor America, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Fourth District, Division 1, 2007. 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 862, 146 Cal.App.4th 488.

AARON, J. [Judge]

* * * *

[Alan] Cruz's parents purchased a pressure cooker from a vendor at the San Diego County Fair [in California] in the summer of 2001. On September 10, 2001, Cruz, who was 16 years old at the time, suffered burns on the left side of his torso and thigh when he attempted to take the lid off of the pressure cooker. Fagor [America, Inc.] is the American distributor of the pressure cooker.

On the date of the incident involving the pressure cooker, Cruz's parents sent an e-mail to Fagor to alert the company about what had occurred. * * *

On June 2, 2003, [Fagor] notified Cruz that it was denying liability. * * *

* * * *

Cruz filed a complaint [in a California state court] against Fagor on December 1, 2004, alleging causes of action for negligence and product liability. On December 14, 2004, Cruz, through his attorney, mailed the summons and complaint to Fagor by certified mail, return receipt requested. The envelope was addressed to "Patricio Barriga, Chairman of the Board, FAGOR AMERICA, INC., A Delaware Corporation, 1099 Wall Street, Lyndhurst, NJ 07071-3678."

The return receipt indicates that it was signed by an individual named Tina Hayes on December 22. Fagor did not file an answer. * * *

* * * *

A default judgment [a judgment entered against a defendant who fails to answer or respond to the plaintiff's complaint] in the amount of $259,114.50 was entered against Fagor on May 31, 2005.

Fagor did not make an appearance in the matter until November 29, 2005, when Fagor's attorneys * * * [filed] a motion to set aside the entry of default and default judgment. * * *

* * * *

* * * On February 1, the trial court granted the motion. Cruz [appealed to a state intermediate appellate court] on February 16.

* * * *

* * * [T]he trial court found that service was not effected because there was no proof that the summons and complaint (1) were served on Fagor's designated agent for service; (2) were delivered to the president or other officer, manager, or person authorized to receive service in accordance with [California Civil Procedure Code Section] 416.10; or (3) were served in accordance with [California] Corporations Code [S]ection 2110, which provides for service on a foreign corporation by hand delivery to an officer or designated agent for service of process.

* * * [But] the proofs of service demonstrate that Cruz served Fagor, an out-of-state corporation, in accordance with [California Civil Procedure Code Section] 415.40. Section 415.40 provides in pertinent part:

A summons may be served on a person outside this state in any manner provided by this article or by sending a copy of the summons and of the complaint to the person to be served by first-class mail, postage prepaid, requiring a return receipt. * * *

Because Fagor is a corporate entity, Cruz was also required to comply with the mandates of [S]ection 416.10. That section details how a plaintiff is to serve a summons on a corporate defendant and provides in relevant part:

A summons may be served on a corporation by delivering a copy of the summons and of the complaint: * * * To the president or other head of the corporation, a vice president, a secretary or assistant secretary, a treasurer or assistant treasurer, a general manager, or a person authorized by the corporation to receive service of process.

* * * *

A number of documents in the record establish that Cruz properly served Fagor with process pursuant to California's statutory requirements. The first is a Judicial Counsel of California proof of service form, completed and signed by Cruz's attorney, Harold Thompson. In that form, Thompson states that the summons and complaint were addressed and mailed to Patricio Barriga, the president of Fagor, at 1099 Wall Street, Lyndhurst, New Jersey 07071-3678, which is the address Fagor listed in 2003 with the New York State Department of State—Division of Corporations as its “service of process address.”

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

CASE 3.1 CONTINUED

* * * Thompson’s declaration was properly executed because it shows that Cruz addressed the summons and complaint to a person to be served, as listed under [S]ection 416.10. [Emphasis added.]

Cruz also submitted a signed return receipt to establish the fact of actual delivery. A return receipt attached to the proof of service form shows that the envelope was accepted at the Lyndhurst address. The receipt was signed by Hayes. * * *

* * * Cruz submitted the declaration of his attorney, Harold Thompson, in which Thompson states that he confirmed with a representative of the United States Postal Service in Lyndhurst, New Jersey, that Hayes regularly receives mail on behalf of Fagor at its Lyndhurst office. This is * * * sufficient to establish that an agent authorized to receive mail on the defendant’s behalf received the summons and complaint.

* * * By virtue of her authority to accept mail on Fagor’s behalf, Hayes’s notice of the action is imputed to Fagor and its officers. Barriga’s statement that he did not receive the summons and complaint does not establish that service of process was invalid. Barriga had constructive knowledge of the existence of the action, and of the summons and complaint, once an individual authorized to receive corporate mail acknowledged service. To hold otherwise would be to ignore the realities of corporate life, in which the duty to sign for mail received often resides with a designated mailroom employee, a receptionist, a secretary, or an assistant. A plaintiff who has provided evidence that a person authorized to receive mail on behalf of a corporation in fact received an item that was mailed to an officer of the corporation should not be held responsible for any failure on the part of the corporate defendant to effectively distribute that mail. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Cruz has * * * satisfied all of the elements necessary to establish effective service. * * *

The order of the trial court is reversed.

QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that Cruz had misaddressed the envelope but the summons had still reached Hayes and Cruz could prove it. Would this have been sufficient to establish valid service? Explain.
2. Should a plaintiff be required to serve a defendant with a summons and a copy of a complaint more than once? Why or why not?

Waiver of Formal Service of Process. In many instances, the defendant is already aware that a lawsuit is being filed and is willing to waive (give up) her or his right to be served personally. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) and many states’ rules allow defendants to waive formal service of process, provided that certain procedures are followed. Kirby’s attorney, for example, could mail to defendant Carvello a copy of the complaint, along with “Waiver of Service of Summons” forms for Carvello to sign. If Carvello signs and returns the forms within thirty days, formal service of process is waived. Moreover, under the FRCP, defendants who agree to waive formal service of process receive additional time to respond to the complaint (sixty days, instead of twenty days). Some states provide similar incentives to encourage defendants to waive formal service of process and thereby reduce associated costs and foster cooperation between the parties.

The Defendant’s Response Typically, the defendant’s response to the complaint takes the form of an answer. In an answer, the defendant either admits or denies each of the allegations in the plaintiff’s complaint and may also set forth defenses to those allegations. Under the federal rules, any allegations that are not denied by the defendant will be deemed by the court to have been admitted. If Carvello admits to all of Kirby's allegations in his answer, a judgment will be entered for Kirby. If Carvello denies Kirby's allegations, the matter will proceed further.

Affirmative Defenses. Carvello can also admit the truth of Kirby's complaint but raise new facts to show that he should not be held liable for Kirby's damages. This is called raising an affirmative defense. As will be discussed in subsequent chapters, defendants in both civil and criminal cases can raise affirmative defenses. For example, Carvello could assert Kirby's own negligence as a defense by alleging that Kirby was driving negligently at the time of the accident. In some states, a plaintiff's contributory negligence operates as a complete defense. In most states, however, the plaintiff's own negligence constitutes only a partial defense (see Chapter 7).

Counterclaims. Carvello could also deny Kirby's allegations and set forth his own claim that the accident occurred as a result of Kirby's negligence and that therefore she owes Carvello for damage to his car. This is appropriately called a counterclaim. If Carvello files a counterclaim, Kirby will have to submit an answer to the counterclaim.

Dismissals and Judgments before Trial

Many actions for which pleadings have been filed never come to trial. The parties may, for example, negotiate a settlement of the dispute at any stage of the litigation process. There are also numerous procedural avenues for disposing of a case without a trial. Many of them involve one or the other party's attempts to get the case dismissed through the use of various motions.

A motion is a procedural request submitted to the court by an attorney on behalf of her or his client. When one party files a motion with the court, that party must also send to, or serve on, the opposing party a notice of motion. The notice of motion informs the opposing party that the motion has been filed. Pretrial motions include the motion to dismiss, the motion for judgment on the pleadings, and the motion for summary judgment, as well as the other motions listed in Exhibit 3-4.

Motion to Dismiss Either party can file a motion to dismiss requesting the court to dismiss the case for the reasons stated in the motion, although normally it is the defendant who requests dismissal. A defendant could file a motion to dismiss if the plaintiff's complaint fails to state a claim for which relief (a remedy) can be granted. Such a motion asserts that even if the facts alleged in the complaint are true, they do not give rise to any legal claim against the defendant. For example, if the allegations in Kirby's complaint do not constitute negligence on Carvello's part, Carvello could move to dismiss the case for failure to state a claim. Defendant Carvello could also file a motion to dismiss on the grounds that he was not properly served, that the court lacked jurisdiction, or that the venue was improper.

If the judge grants the motion to dismiss, the plaintiff generally is given time to file an amended complaint. If the judge denies the motion, the suit will go forward, and the defendant must then file an answer. Note that if Carvello wishes to discontinue the suit because, for example, an out-of-court settlement has been reached, he can likewise move for dismissal. The court can also dismiss a case on its own motion.

Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings

At the close of the pleadings, either party may make a motion for judgment on the pleadings, which asks the court to decide the issue solely on the pleadings without proceeding to trial. The judge will grant the motion only when there is no dispute over the facts of the case and the sole issue to be resolved is a question of law. For example, in the Kirby-Carvello case, if Carvello had admitted to all of Kirby's allegations in his answer and had raised no affirmative defenses, Kirby could file a motion for judgment on the pleadings.

In deciding a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the judge may consider only the evidence contained in the pleadings. In contrast, in a motion for summary judgment, discussed next, the court may consider evidence outside the pleadings, such as sworn statements and other materials that would be admissible as evidence at trial.

Motion for Summary Judgment Either party can file a motion for summary judgment, which asks the court to grant a judgment in that party's favor without a trial. As with a motion for judgment on the pleadings, a court will grant a motion for summary judgment only if it determines that no facts are in dispute and the only question is how the law applies to the facts. A motion for summary judgment can be

EXHIBIT 3-4 • Pretrial Motions

MOTION TO DISMISS

A motion normally filed by the defendant in which the defendant asks the court to dismiss the case for a specified reason, such as improper service, lack of personal jurisdiction, or the plaintiff's failure to state a claim for which relief can be granted.

MOTION TO STRIKE

A motion filed by the defendant in which the defendant asks the court to strike (delete) from the complaint certain paragraphs contained in the complaint. Motions to strike help to clarify the underlying issues that form the basis for the complaint by removing paragraphs that are redundant or irrelevant to the action.

MOTION TO MAKE MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN

A motion filed by the defendant to compel the plaintiff to clarify the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action. The motion is filed when the defendant believes that the complaint is too vague or ambiguous for the defendant to respond to it in a meaningful way.

MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to enter a judgment in his or her favor based on information contained in the pleadings. A judgment on the pleadings will be made only if there are no facts in dispute and the only question is how the law applies to a set of undisputed facts.

MOTION TO COMPEL DISCOVERY

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to compel the other party to comply with a discovery request. If a party refuses to allow the opponent to inspect and copy certain documents, for example, the party requesting the documents may make a motion to compel production of those documents.

MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

A motion that may be filed by either party in which the party asks the court to enter judgment in his or her favor without a trial. Unlike a motion for judgment on the pleadings, a motion for summary judgment can be supported by evidence outside the pleadings, such as witnesses' affidavits, answers to interrogatories, and other evidence obtained prior to or during discovery.

made before or during a trial, but it will be granted only if, when the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to the other party, there clearly are no factual disputes in contention.

To support a motion for summary judgment, one party can submit evidence obtained at any point prior to trial that refutes the other party's factual claim. The evidence may consist of affidavits (sworn statements by parties or witnesses) or documents, such as a contract. Of course, the evidence must be admissible evidence—that is, evidence that the court would allow to be presented during the trial. As mentioned, the use of additional evidence is one feature that distinguishes the motion for summary judgment from the motion to dismiss and the motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Discovery

Before a trial begins, the parties can use a number of procedural devices to obtain information and gather evidence about the case. Kirby, for example, will want to know how fast Carvello was driving, whether he had been drinking or was under the influence of any medication, and whether he was wearing corrective lenses if he was required by law to do so while driving. The process of obtaining information from the opposing party or from witnesses prior to trial is known as discovery. Discovery includes gaining access to witnesses, documents, records, and other types of evidence. In federal courts, the parties are required to make initial disclosures of relevant evidence to the opposing party.

The FRCP and similar state rules set forth the guidelines for discovery activity. Generally, discovery is allowed regarding any matter that is relevant to the claim or defense of any party. Discovery rules also attempt to protect witnesses and parties from undue harassment, and to safeguard privileged or confidential material from being disclosed. Only information that is relevant to the case at hand—or likely to lead to the discovery of relevant information—is discoverable. If a discovery request involves privileged or confidential business information, a court can deny the request and can limit the scope of discovery in a number of ways. For example, a court can require the party to submit the materials to the judge in a sealed envelope so that the judge can decide if they should be disclosed to the opposing party.

Discovery prevents surprises at trial by giving both parties access to evidence that might otherwise be hidden. This allows the litigants to learn as much as they can about what to expect at a trial before they reach the courtroom. Discovery also serves to narrow the issues so that trial time is spent on the main questions in the case.

Depositions and Interrogatories Discovery can involve the use of depositions or interrogatories, or both. A deposition is sworn testimony by a party to the lawsuit or by any witness, recorded by an authorized court official. The person deposed gives testimony and answers questions asked by the attorneys from both sides. The questions and answers are recorded, sworn to, and signed. These answers, of course, will help the attorneys prepare their cases. Depositions also give attorneys the opportunity to evaluate how their witnesses will conduct themselves at trial. In addition, depositions can be employed in court to impeach (challenge the credibility of) a party or a witness who changes testimony at the trial. A deposition can also be used as testimony if the witness is not available at trial.

Interrogatories are written questions for which written answers are prepared and then signed under oath. The main difference between interrogatories and written depositions is that interrogatories are directed to a party to the lawsuit (the plaintiff or the defendant), not to a witness, and the party can prepare answers with the aid of an attorney. Whereas depositions are useful for eliciting candid responses from a party and answers not prepared in advance, interrogatories are designed to obtain accurate information about specific topics, such as, for example, how many contracts were signed and when. The scope of interrogatories is also broader because parties are obligated to answer questions, even if that means disclosing information from their records and files.

What can a court do when a party refuses to respond to a discovery request? The following case illustrates the options.

CASE 3.2 Computer Task Group, Inc. v. Brotby

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2004. 364 F.3d 1112.

- Background and Facts Computer Task Group, Inc. (CTG), hired William Brotby as an information technologies consultant in 1995. As a condition of the job, Brotby signed an agreement that restricted his ability to work for CTG's customers if he left CTG. Less than two years later, Brotby left CTG to work for Alyeska Pipeline Service Company, a CTG client with which Brotby had worked on a project. CTG filed a suit in a federal district court against Brotby, alleging a breach of the agreement that Brotby had signed when he joined the firm. During discovery, Brotby refused to respond fully to CTG's interrogatories. He gave contradictory answers, made frivolous objections, filed baseless motions with the court, and never disclosed all of the information that CTG sought. He made excuses and changed his story repeatedly, making it impossible for CTG to establish basic facts with any certainty. Brotby also refused to produce key documents. The court issued five separate orders compelling Brotby's cooperation and fined him twice. Finally, in 1999, CTG filed a motion to enter a default judgment against Brotby, based on his failure to cooperate. The court granted the motion. Brotby appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT PER CURIAM [By the whole court].

* * * *

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 37 permits the district court, in its discretion, to enter a default judgment against a party who fails to comply with an order compelling discovery. * * *

In deciding whether a sanction of dismissal or default for noncompliance with discovery is appropriate, the district court must weigh five factors: (1) the public's interest in expeditious

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

CASE 3.2 CONTINUED

[speedy] resolution of litigation; (2) the court's need to manage its docket [calendar]; (3) the risk of prejudice to the opposing party; (4) the public policy favoring disposition of cases on their merits; and (5) the availability of less drastic sanctions. Where a court order is violated, the first and second factors will favor sanctions and the fourth will cut against them. Therefore, whether terminating sanctions were appropriate in Brotby's case turns on the third and fifth factors.

* * * Brotby engaged in a consistent, intentional, and prejudicial practice of obstructing discovery by not complying * * * with repeated court orders and not heeding multiple court warnings. Brotby violated court orders * * * by failing to provide clear answers to interrogatories, giving contradictory responses, making frivolous objections, filing frivolous motions and failing to provide the information CTG sought. He also failed to pay one of the [fines]. * * * Brotby violated orders * * * by failing to produce important financial documents and throwing up a series of baseless smoke screens that took the form of repeated groundless objections and contradictory excuses, which were absurd and completely unbelievable. The excuses included blaming the loss of documents on an earthquake, on a dropped computer and on a residential move.

* * * [W]hatever Brotby actually produced was mostly incomplete or fabricated—and dribbled in only after a court order. In addition, Brotby changed his story numerous times with regard to his income from work done for Alyeska and the length of his contract with them, as well as the date of his resignation from CTG. These tactics unnecessarily delayed the litigation, burdened the court and prejudiced CTG. In the end, most of the documents CTG sought regarding the nature and extent of Brotby's work for Alyeska were never produced, despite court orders to do so

* * *

* * * Brotby's baseless two-year fight against each and every discovery request and court order has been conducted willfully and with the intent of preventing meaningful discovery from occurring. It has clogged the court's docket, protracted this litigation by years, and made it impossible for CTG to proceed to any imaginably fair trial.

We have held that failure to produce documents as ordered * * * is * * * sufficient prejudice. * * *

In deciding whether the district court adequately considered lesser sanctions, we consider whether the court (1) explicitly discussed the alternative of lesser sanctions and explained why it would be inappropriate; (2) implemented lesser sanctions before ordering the case dismissed; and (3) warned the offending party of the possibility of dismissal.

The [district court] judge appropriately considered the alternative of lesser sanctions. He ordered Brotby to comply with CTG's discovery requests five times * * *. The [judge] also imposed two lesser (monetary) sanctions against Brotby, but to no avail. * * * [I]t is appropriate to reject lesser sanctions where the court anticipates continued deceptive misconduct. Brotby had sufficient notice that continued refusal to cooperate would lead to [the entry of a default judgment against him]. The * * * judge warned him that he should "stop playing games" if he wanted to stay in the game. The two monetary sanctions, five orders compelling him to cooperate and repeated oral warnings were enough to put Brotby on notice that continued failure to cooperate in discovery would result in * * * default. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The appellate court held that "[i]n light of Brotby's egregious [blatant] record of discovery abuses" and his "abiding contempt and continuing disregard for [the court's] orders," the lower court properly exercised its discretion in entering a default judgment against him.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Brotby had not made frivolous objections and baseless motions but still had failed to comply with discovery requests. How might the court's ruling in this case have been different?

● The Legal Environment Dimension What does the result in this case suggest to parties in litigation who might be reluctant to respond truthfully to court requests?

Requests for Admissions One party can serve the other party with a written request for an admission of the truth of matters relating to the trial. Any fact admitted under such a request is conclusively established as true for the trial. For example, Kirby can ask Carvello to admit that his driver's license was suspended at the time of the accident. A request for admission shortens the trial because the parties will not have to spend time proving facts on which they already agree.

Requests for Documents, Objects, and Entry upon Land A party can gain access to documents and other items not in her or his possession in order to inspect and examine them. Carvello, for example, can gain permission to inspect and copy Kirby's car repair bills. Likewise, a party can gain "entry upon land" to inspect the premises.

Request for Examinations When the physical or mental condition of one party is in question, the opposing party can ask the court to order a physical or mental examination by an independent examiner. If the court agrees to make the order, the opposing party can obtain the results of the examination. Note that the court will make such an order only when the need for the information outweighs the right to privacy of the person to be examined.

Electronic Discovery Any relevant material, including information stored electronically, can be the object of a discovery request. The federal rules and most state rules (as well as court decisions) now specifically allow individuals to obtain discovery of electronic "data compilations." Electronic evidence, or e-evidence, consists of all computer-generated or electronically recorded information, such as e-mail, voice mail, spreadsheets, word-processing documents, and other data. E-evidence can reveal significant facts that are not discoverable by other means. For example, computers automatically record certain information about files—such as who created the file and when, and who accessed, modified, or transmitted it—on their hard drives. This information can only be obtained from the file in its electronic format—not from printed-out versions.

Amendments to the FRCP that took effect in December 2006 deal specifically with the preservation, retrieval, and production of electronic data. Although traditional means, such as interrogatories and depositions, are still used to find out whether e-evidence exists, a party must usually hire an expert to retrieve the evidence in its electronic format. The expert uses software to reconstruct e-mail exchanges to establish who knew what and when they knew it. The expert can even recover files from a computer that the user thought had been deleted. Reviewing backup copies of documents and e-mail can provide useful—and often quite damaging—information about how a particular matter progressed over several weeks or months.

Electronic discovery has significant advantages over paper discovery, but it is also time consuming and expensive. These costs are amplified when the parties involved in the lawsuit are large corporations with many offices and employees. Who should pay the costs associated with electronic discovery? For a discussion of how the courts are handling this issue, see this chapter's Emerging Trends feature on pages 66 and 67.

Pretrial Conference

After discovery has taken place and before the trial begins, the attorneys may meet with the trial judge in a pretrial conference, or hearing. Usually, the hearing consists of an informal discussion between the judge and the opposing attorneys after discovery has taken place. The purpose of the hearing is to explore the possibility of a settlement without trial and, if this is not possible, to identify the matters that are in dispute and to plan the course of the trial. In particular, the parties may attempt to establish ground rules to restrict the number of expert witnesses or discuss the admissibility or costs of certain types of evidence.

The Right to a Jury Trial

The Seventh Amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees the right to a jury trial for cases at law in federal courts when the amount in controversy exceeds $20. Most states have similar guarantees in their own constitutions (although the threshold dollar amount is higher than $20). The right to a trial by jury need not be exercised, and many cases are tried without a jury. In most states and in federal courts, one of the parties must request a jury, or the judge presumes the parties waive this right. If there is no jury, the judge determines the truth of the facts alleged in the case.

Jury Selection

Before a jury trial commences, a panel of jurors must be selected. Although some types of trials require twelve-person juries, most civil matters can be heard by six-person juries. The jury selection process is known as voir dire.⁸ During voir dire in most jurisdictions, attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant ask prospective jurors oral questions to determine whether a potential jury member is biased or has any connection with a party to the action or with a prospective witness. In some jurisdictions, the judge may do all or part of the questioning based on written questions submitted by counsel for the parties.

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

8. Pronounced vwahr deehr. These old French verbs mean “to speak the truth.” In legal language, the phrase refers to the process of questioning jurors to learn about their backgrounds, attitudes, and similar attributes.

During voir dire, a party may challenge a certain number of prospective jurors peremptorily—that is, ask that an individual not be sworn in as a juror without providing any reason. Alternatively, a party may challenge a prospective juror for cause—that is, provide a reason why an individual should not be sworn in as a juror. If the judge grants the challenge, the individual is asked to step down. A prospective juror, however, may not be excluded by the use of discriminatory challenges, such as those based on racial criteria or gender. (See Concept Summary 3.1 for a review of pretrial procedures.)

CONCEPT SUMMARY 3.1

Pretrial Procedures

Procedure	Description
PLEADINGS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The plaintiff's complaint—The plaintiff's statement of the cause of action and the parties involved, filed with the court by the plaintiff's attorney. After the filing, the defendant is notified of the suit through service of process. 2. The defendant's response—The defendant's response to the plaintiff's complaint may take the form of an answer, in which the defendant admits or denies the plaintiff's allegations. The defendant may raise an affirmative defense and/or assert a counterclaim.
PRETRIAL MOTIONS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Motion to dismiss—A motion requesting the judge to dismiss the case for reasons that are provided in the motion (such as failure to state a claim for which relief can be granted). 2. Motion for judgment on the pleadings—May be made by either party; will be granted only if no facts are in dispute and only questions of law are at issue. 3. Motion for summary judgment—May be made by either party; will be granted only if no facts are in dispute and only questions of law are at issue. Unlike the motion for judgment on the pleadings, the motion for summary judgment may be supported by evidence outside the pleadings, such as testimony and other evidence obtained during the discovery phase of litigation.
DISCOVERY	The process of gathering evidence concerning the case; involves (1) depositions (sworn testimony by either party or any witness); (2) interrogatories (in which parties to the action write answers to questions with the aid of their attorneys); and (3) requests for admissions, documents, examinations, or other information relating to the case. Discovery may also involve electronically recorded information, such as e-mail, voice mail, and other data.
PRETRIAL CONFERENCE	A pretrial hearing, at the request of either party or the court, to identify the matters in dispute after discovery has taken place and to explore the possibility of settling the dispute without a trial. If no settlement is possible, the parties plan the course of the trial.
JURY SELECTION	In a jury trial, the selection of members of the jury from a pool of prospective jurors. During a process known as voir dire , the attorneys for both sides may challenge prospective jurors either for cause or peremptorily (for no cause).

EMERGING TRENDS IN BUSINESS LAW

E-Discovery and Cost-Shifting

Before the computer age, discovery involved searching through paper records—physical evidence. Today, less than 0.5 percent of new information is created on paper. Instead of sending letters and memos, for example, people send e-mails—almost 600 billion of them annually in the United States. The all-inclusive nature of electronic information means that electronic discovery (e-discovery) now plays an important role in almost every business lawsuit.

Changes in the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

As e-discovery has become ubiquitous, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) have changed to encompass it. Amended Section 26(f) of the FRCP, for example, requires that the parties confer about “preserving discoverable information” and discuss “any issues relating to . . . discovery of electronically stored information, including the electronic forms in which it should be produced.”

The most recent amendment to Section 34(a) of the FRCP expressly permits one party to a lawsuit to request that the other produce “electronically stored information—including . . . data compilation stored in any medium from which information can be obtained.” The new rule has put in place a two-tiered process for discovery of electronically stored information. Relevant and nonprivileged information that is reasonably accessible is discoverable as a matter of right. Discovery of less accessible—and therefore more costly to obtain—electronic data may or may not be allowed by the court. The problem of the costs of e-discovery is discussed further below.

The Ameriwood Three-Step Process

The new federal rules were applied in Ameriwood Industries, Inc. v. Liberman, a major case involving e-discovery in which the court developed a three-step procedure for obtaining electronic data.^a In the first step, imaging, mirror images of a

a. 2007 WL 685623 (E.D.Mo. 2007).

party’s hard drives can be required. The second step involves recovering available word-processing documents, e-mails, PowerPoint presentations, spreadsheets, and other files. The final step is full disclosure in which a party sends the other party all responsive and nonprivileged documents and information obtained in the previous two steps.

Limitations on E-Discovery and Cost-Shifting

Complying with requests for electronically discoverable information can cost hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars, especially if a party is a large corporation with thousands of employees creating millions of electronic documents. Consequently, there is a trend toward limiting e-discovery. Under the FRCP, a court can limit electronic discovery (1) when it would be unreasonably cumulative or duplicative, (2) when the requesting party has already had ample opportunity during discovery to obtain the information, or (3) when the burden or expense outweighs the likely benefit.

The Trial

Various rules and procedures govern the trial phase of the litigation process. There are rules governing what kind of evidence will or will not be admitted during the trial, as well as specific procedures that the participants in the lawsuit must follow.

Opening Statements

At the beginning of the trial, both attorneys are allowed to make opening statements setting forth the facts that they expect to prove during the trial. The opening statement provides an opportunity for each lawyer to give a brief version of the facts and the supporting evidence that will be used during the trial. Then the plaintiff’s case is presented. In our hypothetical case, Kirby’s lawyer would introduce evidence (relevant documents, exhibits, and the testimony of witnesses) to support Kirby’s position.

Rules of Evidence

Whether evidence will be admitted in court is determined by the rules of evidence—a series of rules that have been created by the courts to ensure that any evidence presented during a trial is fair and reliable. The Federal Rules of Evidence govern the admissibility of evidence in federal courts.

Many courts are allowing responding parties to object to e-discovery requests on the ground that complying with the request would cause an undue financial burden. In a suit between E*Trade and Deutsche Bank, for example, the court denied E*Trade's request that the defendant produce its hard drives because doing so would create an undue burden.^b

In addition, sometimes when a court finds that producing the requested information would create an undue financial burden, the court orders the party to comply but shifts the cost to the requesting party (usually the plaintiff). A major case in this area involved Rowe Entertainment and the William Morris Agency. When the e-discovery costs were estimated to be as high as

b. *E*Trade Securities, LLC v. Deutsche Bank A.G.*, 230 F.R.D. 582 (D.Minn. 2005). This is a Federal Rules Decision not designated for publication in the Federal Supplement, citing Zubulake v. UBS Warburg, LLC, 2003 WL 21087884 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

$9 million, the court determined that cost-shifting was warranted.^c In deciding whether to order cost-shifting, courts increasingly take into account the amount in controversy and each party's ability to pay. Sometimes, a court may require the responding party to restore and produce representative documents from a small sample of the requested medium to verify the relevance of the data before the party incurs significant expenses.^d

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE BUSINESSPERSON

1. Whenever there is a "reasonable anticipation of litigation," all the relevant documents must be preserved. Preserving data can be a challenge, particularly for large corporations that have electronic data scattered across multiple networks, servers, desktops, laptops, handheld devices, and even home computers.

c. Rowe Entertainment, Inc., v. William Morris Agency, Inc., 2002 WL 975713 (S.D.N.Y. 2002).
d. See, for example, Quinby v. West LBAG, 2006 WL 2597900 (S.D.N.Y. 2006).

2. Even though an e-mail is deleted, it is not necessarily eliminated from one's hard drive, unless it is completely overwritten by new data. Thus, businesspersons should be aware that their hard drives can contain information they presumed no longer existed.

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. How might a large corporation protect itself from allegations that it intentionally failed to preserve electronic data?
2. Given the significant and often burdensome costs associated with electronic discovery, should courts consider cost-shifting in every case involving electronic discovery? Why or why not?

RELEVANT WEB SITES

To locate information on the Web concerning the issues discussed in this feature, go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 3," and click on "Emerging Trends."

Evidence Must Be Relevant to the Issues

Evidence will not be admitted in court unless it is relevant to the matter in question. Relevant evidence is evidence that tends to prove or disprove a fact in question or to establish the degree of probability of a fact or action. For example, evidence that a suspect's gun was in the home of another person when a victim was shot would be relevant—because it would tend to prove that the suspect did not shoot the victim.

Even relevant evidence may not be admitted in court if its reliability is questionable or if its probative (proving) value is substantially outweighed by other important considerations of the court. For example, a video or a photograph that shows in detail the severity of a victim's injuries would be relevant evidence, but the court might exclude this evidence on the ground that it would emotionally inflame the jurors.

Hearsay Evidence Not Admissible

Generally, hearsay is not admissible as evidence. Hearsay is defined as any testimony given in court about a statement made by someone else who was not under oath at the time of the statement. Literally, it is what someone heard someone else say. For example, if a witness in the Kirby-Carvello case testified in court concerning what he or she heard another observer say about the accident, that testimony would be hearsay, or secondhand knowledge. Admitting hearsay into evidence carries many risks because, even though it may be relevant, there is no way to test its reliability.

In the following case, the plaintiff's evidence consisted in part of printouts of Web pages purporting to indicate how the pages appeared at a prior point in time. The defendant challenged this evidence as hearsay.

CASE 3.3 Novak v. Tu cows, Inc.

United States District Court, Eastern District of New York, 2007. __ F.Supp.2d __.

• Background and Facts In 1997, Robert Novak registered the domain name petswarehouse.com and began selling pet supplies and livestock online. Within two years, the site had become one of the most popular sites for pet supplies in the United States. Novak obtained a trademark for the petswarehouse.com name and transferred its registration to Nitin Networks, Inc., which was owned by Tu cows, Inc., a Canadian firm. In an unrelated matter, John Benn obtained a judgment against Novak in an Alabama state court. Tu cows transferred the name to the court on its order on May 1, 2003. After a state intermediate appellate court reversed the judgment, the name was returned to Novak on October 1, 2004. Novak filed a suit in a federal district court against Tu cows and Nitin, arguing that the transfer of the name out of his control for seventeen months destroyed his pet-supply business. Novak alleged several violations of federal and state law, including trademark infringement and conversion. Tu cows responded with, among other things, a motion to strike some of Novak's exhibits.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT JOSEPH F. BIANCO, District Judge.

* * * *

Defendants contend that plaintiff's Exhibits B, J, K, O–R, U and V, which are printouts of Internet pages, constitute inadmissible hearsay and do not fall within any acknowledged exception to the hearsay rule. * * * [D]efendants [also] objected to Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, as well as to Plaintiff's Exhibits N–R. Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 is a printout from "RegisterSite.com," Nitin's Web site, as it purportedly appeared in 2003. According to plaintiff, he obtained the printout through a Web site called the Internet Archive, which provides access to a digital library of Internet sites. The Internet Archive operates a service called the "Wayback Machine," which purports to allow a user to obtain an archived Web page as it appeared at a particular moment in time. The other contested exhibits include: Exhibit B, an online summary of plaintiff's past and pending lawsuits, obtained via the Wayback Machine; Exhibit J, printouts of comments on a Web message board by [Evgeniy] Pirogov [a Tu cows employee]; Exhibit K, a news article from the Poughkeepsie Journal Web site featuring [Nitin] Agarwal [the chief executive officer and founder of Nitin]; Exhibit N, Novak's declaration regarding the authenticity of pages printed from the Wayback Machine; Exhibit O, pages printed from the Internet Archive Web site; Exhibit P, pages printed from the Wayback Machine Web site; Exhibits Q, R and U, all of which constitute pages printed from RegisterSite.com via the Wayback Machine; and Exhibit V, a news article from "The Register," a British Web site, regarding Tu cows. Where postings from Internet Web sites are not statements made by declarants testifying at trial and are offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, such postings generally constitute hearsay under [the Federal Rules of Evidence]. [Emphasis added.]

Furthermore, in this case, such documents have not been properly authenticated pursuant to [the Federal Rules of Evidence].^a While plaintiff's declaration purports to cure his inability to authenticate the documents printed from the Internet, he in fact lacks the personal knowledge required to set forth with any certainty that the documents obtained via third-party Web sites are, in fact, what he proclaims them to be. This problem is even more acute in the case of documents procured through the Wayback Machine. Plaintiff states that the Web pages archived within the Wayback Machine are based upon "data from third parties who compile the data by using software

a. In this context, authentication requires the introduction of sufficient evidence to show that these Web pages are what Novak claims they are.

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

CASE 3.3 CONTINUED

programs known as crawlers,” who then “donate” such data to the Internet Archive, which “preserves and provides access to it.” Based upon Novak’s assertions, it is clear that the information posted on the Wayback Machine is only as valid as the third-party donating the page decides to make it—the authorized owners and managers of the archived Web sites play no role in ensuring that the material posted in the Wayback Machine accurately represents what was posted on their official Web sites at the relevant time. As Novak proffers neither testimony nor sworn statements attesting to the authenticity of the contested Web page exhibits by any employee of the companies hosting the sites from which plaintiff printed the pages, such exhibits cannot be authenticated as required under the [Federal] Rules of Evidence. Therefore, in the absence of any authentication of plaintiff’s Internet printouts, combined with the lack of any assertion that such printouts fall under a viable exception to the hearsay rule, defendants’ motion to strike Exhibits B, J, K, N–R, U and V is granted.

● Decision and Remedy The court granted Tucows’s motion to strike Novak’s exhibits. Tucows also filed a motion to dismiss Novak’s suit altogether based on a clause in the parties’ domain name transfer agreement. The clause mandated the litigation of all related disputes in Ontario, Canada, according to Canadian law. The court determined that the clause was valid and reasonable, and granted Tucows’s motion to dismiss the suit.

● The Ethical Dimension Hearsay is literally what a witness says he or she heard another person say. What makes the admissibility of such evidence potentially unethical?

● The E-Commerce Dimension In this case, the plaintiff offered as evidence the printouts of Web pages that he claimed once appeared on others’ Web sites. What makes such evidence questionable until proved accurate?

Examination of Witnesses

Because Kirby is the plaintiff, she has the burden of proving that her allegations are true. Her attorney begins the presentation of Kirby’s case by calling the first witness for the plaintiff and examining, or questioning, the witness. (For both attorneys, the types of questions and the manner of asking them are governed by the rules of evidence.) This questioning is called direct examination. After Kirby’s attorney is finished, the witness is subject to cross-examination by Carvello’s attorney. Then Kirby’s attorney has another opportunity to question the witness in redirect examination, and Carvello’s attorney may follow the redirect examination with a recross-examination. When both attorneys have finished with the first witness, Kirby’s attorney calls the succeeding witnesses in the plaintiff’s case, each of whom is subject to examination by the attorneys in the manner just described.

Potential Motion and Judgment At the conclusion of the plaintiff’s case, the defendant’s attorney has the opportunity to ask the judge to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff has presented no evidence to support her or his claim. This is called a motion for a judgment as a matter of law (or a motion for a directed verdict in state courts). In considering the motion, the judge looks at the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and grants the motion only if there is insufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact. (Motions for directed verdicts at this stage of a trial are seldom granted.)

Defendant’s Evidence The defendant’s attorney then presents the evidence and witnesses for the defendant’s case. Witnesses are called and examined by the defendant’s attorney. The plaintiff’s attorney has the right to cross-examine them, and there may be a redirect examination and possibly a recross-examination. At the end of the defendant’s case, either attorney can move for a directed verdict, and the test again is whether the jury can, through any reasonable interpretation of the evidence, find for the party against whom the motion has been made. After the defendant’s attorney has finished introducing evidence, the plaintiff’s attorney can present a rebuttal, which includes additional evidence to refute the defendant’s case. The defendant’s attorney can, in turn, refute that evidence in a rejoinder.

Closing Arguments, Jury Instructions, and Verdict

After both sides have rested their cases, each attorney presents a closing argument. In the closing argument, each attorney summarizes the facts and evidence presented during the trial and indicates why the facts and evidence support his or her client's claim. In addition to generally urging a verdict in favor of the client, the closing arguments typically reveal the shortcomings of the points made by the opposing party during the trial.

Attorneys generally present closing arguments whether or not the trial was heard by a jury. If it was a jury trial, the judge then instructs the jury in the law that applies to the case (these instructions are often called charges), and the jury retires to the jury room to deliberate a verdict. In most civil cases, the standard of proof is a preponderance of the evidence.⁹ In other words, the plaintiff (Kirby in our hypothetical case) need only show that her factual claim is more likely to be true than the defendant's. (As you will read in Chapter 9, in a criminal trial the prosecution has a higher standard of proof to meet—it must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt.)

9. Note that some civil claims must be proved by "clear and convincing evidence," meaning that the evidence must show that the truth of the party's claim is highly probable. This standard is often applied in situations that present a particular danger of deception, such as allegations of fraud.

Once the jury has reached a decision, it issues a verdict in favor of one party; the verdict specifies the jury's factual findings. In some cases, the jury also decides on the amount of the award (the compensation to be paid to the prevailing party). After the announcement of the verdict, which marks the end of the trial itself, the jurors are dismissed. (See Concept Summary 3.2 for a review of trial procedures.)

Posttrial Motions

After the jury has rendered its verdict, either party may make a posttrial motion. The prevailing party usually requests that the court enter a judgment in accordance with the verdict. The nonprevailing party frequently files one of the motions discussed next.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 3.2 Trial Procedures

Procedure	Description
OPENING STATEMENTS	Each party's attorney is allowed to present an opening statement indicating what the attorney will attempt to prove during the course of the trial.
EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Plaintiff's introduction and direct examination of witnesses, cross-examination by defendant's attorney, possible redirect examination by plaintiff's attorney, and possible recross-examination by defendant's attorney. 2. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the defendant may make a motion for a directed verdict (or judgment as a matter of law), which, if granted by the court, will end the trial before the defendant presents witnesses. 3. Defendant's introduction and direct examination of witnesses, cross-examination by plaintiff's attorney, possible redirect examination by defendant's attorney, and possible recross-examination by plaintiff's attorney. 4. Possible rebuttal of defendant's argument by plaintiff's attorney, who presents more evidence. 5. Possible rejoinder by defendant's attorney to meet that evidence.
CLOSING ARGUMENTS, JURY INSTRUCTIONS, AND VERDICT	Each party's attorney argues in favor of a verdict for his or her client. The judge instructs (or charges) the jury as to how the law applies to the issue, and the jury retires to deliberate. When the jury renders its verdict, this brings the trial to an end.

Motion for a New Trial

At the end of the trial, a motion can be made to set aside an adverse verdict and any judgment and to hold a new trial. The motion for a new trial will be granted only if the judge is convinced, after looking at all the evidence, that the jury was in error, but does not feel it is appropriate to grant judgment for the other side. This will usually occur when the jury verdict is obviously the result of a misapplication of the law or a misunderstanding of the evidence presented at trial. A new trial can also be granted on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants during the trial (such as when an attorney has made prejudicial and inflammatory remarks), or error by the judge.

Motion for Judgment N.O.V.

If Kirby wins, and if Carvello's attorney has previously moved for a directed verdict, then Carvello's attorney can now make a motion for judgment *n.o.v.—from the Latin non obstante veredicto, meaning “notwithstanding the verdict.” (Federal courts use the term judgment as a matter of law instead of judgment n.o.v.) Such a motion will be granted only if the jury's verdict was unreasonable and erroneous. If the judge grants the motion, then the jury's verdict will be set aside, and a judgment will be entered in favor of the opposing party (Carvello). If the motion is denied, Carvello may then appeal the case. (Kirby may also appeal the case, even though she won at trial. She might appeal, for example, if she received a smaller monetary award than she had sought.)

The Appeal

Either party may appeal not only the jury's verdict but also the judge's ruling on any pretrial or posttrial motion. Many of the appellate court cases that appear in this text involve appeals of motions for summary judgment or other motions that were denied by trial court judges. Note that a party must have legitimate grounds to file an appeal (some legal error) and that few trial court decisions are reversed on appeal. Moreover, the expenses associated with an appeal can be considerable.¹⁰

10. See, for example, Phansalkar v. Andersen Weinroth & Co., 356 F3d 188 (2d Cir.2004).

Filing the Appeal

If Carvello decides to appeal the verdict in Kirby's favor, then his attorney must file a notice of appeal with the clerk of the trial court within a prescribed period of time. Carvello then becomes the appellant or petitioner. The clerk of the trial court sends to the reviewing court (usually an intermediate court of appeals) the record on appeal. The record contains all the pleadings, motions, and other documents filed with the court and a complete written transcript of the proceedings, including testimony, arguments, jury instructions, and judicial rulings.

Carvello's attorney will file an appellate brief with the reviewing court. The brief is a formal legal document outlining the facts and issues of the case, the judge's rulings or jury's findings that should be reversed or modified, the applicable law, and arguments on Carvello's behalf (citing applicable statutes and relevant cases as precedents). The attorney for the appellee (Kirby, in our hypothetical case) usually files an answering brief. Carvello's attorney can file a reply, although it is not required. The reviewing court then considers the case.

Appellate Review

As mentioned in Chapter 2, a court of appeals does not hear any evidence. Rather, it reviews the record for errors of law. Its decision concerning a case is based on the record on appeal and the briefs and arguments. The attorneys present oral arguments, after which the case is taken under advisement. The court then issues a written opinion. In general, appellate courts do not reverse findings of fact unless the findings are unsupported or contradicted by the evidence.

An appellate court has the following options after reviewing a case:

1. The court can affirm the trial court's decision.
2. The court can reverse the trial court's judgment if it concludes that the trial court erred or that the jury did not receive proper instructions.
3. The appellate court can remand (send back) the case to the trial court for further proceedings consistent with its opinion on the matter.
4. The court might also affirm or reverse a decision in part. For example, the court might affirm the jury's finding that Carvello was negligent but remand the case for further proceedings on another issue (such as the extent of Kirby's damages).
5. An appellate court can also modify a lower court's decision. If the appellate court decides that the jury awarded an excessive amount in damages, for example, the court might reduce the award to a more appropriate, or fairer, amount.

Higher Appellate Courts

If the reviewing court is an intermediate appellate court, the losing party may decide to appeal the decision to the state's highest court, usually called its supreme court. Although the losing party has a right to ask (petition) a higher court to review the case, the party does not have a right to have the case heard by the higher appellate court. Appellate courts normally have discretionary power and can accept or reject an appeal. As with the United States Supreme Court, getting a case heard in most state supreme courts is unlikely. If the petition is granted, new briefs must be filed before the state supreme court, and the attorneys may be allowed or requested to present oral arguments. Like the intermediate appellate courts, the supreme court can reverse or affirm the lower appellate court's decision or remand the case. At this point, the case typically has reached its end (unless a federal question is at issue and one of the parties has legitimate grounds to seek review by a federal appellate court). (Concept Summary 3.3 reviews the options that the parties may pursue after the trial.)

Enforcing the Judgment

The uncertainties of the litigation process are compounded by the lack of guarantees that any judgment will be enforceable. Even if the jury awards Kirby the full amount of damages requested ($100,000), for example, Carvello's auto insurance coverage might have lapsed, in which event the company would not pay any of the damages. Alternatively, Carvello's insurance policy might be limited to $50,000, meaning that Carvello personally would have to pay the remaining $50,000.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 3.3 Posttrial Options

Procedure	Description
POSTTRIAL MOTIONS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> Motion for a new trial—If the judge believes that the jury was in error but is not convinced that the losing party should have won, the motion normally will be granted. It can also be granted on the basis of newly discovered evidence, misconduct by the participants during the trial, or error by the judge. Motion for judgment n.o.v. (“notwithstanding the verdict”)—The party making the motion must have filed a motion for a directed verdict at the close of the presentation of evidence during the trial; the motion will be granted if the judge is convinced that the jury was in error.
APPEAL	Either party can appeal the trial court's judgment to an appropriate court of appeals. <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Filing the appeal—The appealing party must file a notice of appeal with the clerk of the trial court, who forwards the record on appeal to the appellate court. Attorneys file appellate briefs. Appellate review—The appellate court does not hear evidence but bases its opinion, which it issues in writing, on the record on appeal and the attorneys' briefs and oral arguments. The court may affirm or reverse all (or part) of the trial court's judgment and/or remand the case for further proceedings consistent with its opinion. Most decisions are affirmed on appeal. Further review—In some cases, further review may be sought from a higher appellate court, such as a state supreme court. If a federal question is involved, the case may ultimately be appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

Requesting Court Assistance in Collecting the Judgment

If the defendant does not have the funds available to pay the judgment, the plaintiff can go back to the court and request that the court issue a writ of execution. A writ of execution is an order directing the sheriff to seize and sell the defendant's nonexempt assets, or property (certain assets are exempted by law from creditors' actions). The proceeds of the sale would then be used to pay the damages owed, and any excess proceeds would be returned to the defendant. Alternatively, the nonexempt property itself could be transferred to the plaintiff in lieu of an outright payment. (Creditors' remedies, including those of judgment creditors, as well as exempt and nonexempt property, will be discussed in more detail in Chapter 28.)

Availability of Assets

The problem of collecting a judgment is less pronounced, of course, when a party is seeking to satisfy a judgment against a defendant with substantial assets that can be easily located, such as a major corporation. Usually, one of the factors considered by the plaintiff and his or her attorney before a lawsuit is initiated is whether the defendant has sufficient assets to cover the amount of damages sought. In addition, during the discovery process, attorneys routinely seek information about the location of the defendant's assets that might potentially be used to satisfy a judgment.

REVIEWING Court Procedures

Ronald Metzgar placed his fifteen-month-old son, Matthew, awake and healthy, in his playpen. Ronald left the room for five minutes and on his return found Matthew lifeless. A toy block had lodged in the boy's throat, causing him to choke to death. Ronald called 911, but efforts to revive Matthew were to no avail. There was no warning of a choking hazard on the box containing the block. Matthew's parents hired an attorney and sued Playskool, Inc., the manufacturer of the block, alleging that the manufacturer had been negligent in failing to warn of the block's hazard. Playskool filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that the danger of a young child choking on a small block was obvious. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that the attorney the Metzgars hired agreed to represent them on a contingency-fee basis. What does that mean?
2. How would the Metzgars' attorney likely have served process (the summons and complaint) on Playskool, Inc.?
3. Should Playskool's request for summary judgment be granted? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that the judge denied Playskool's motion and the case proceeded to trial. After hearing all the evidence, the jury found in favor of the defendant. What options do the plaintiffs have at this point if they are not satisfied with the verdict?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

affidavit 61

affirmative defense 60

answer 59

brief 71

closing argument 70 complaint 55

counterclaim 60

cross-examination 69

default judgment 56

deposition 62

direct examination 69

discovery 61

- e-evidence 64
- Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) 53
- hearsay 67
- interrogatories 62
- motion 60
- motion for a directed verdict 69
- motion for a judgment as a matter of law 69
- motion for a new trial 71
- motion for judgment n.o.v. 71
- motion for judgment on the pleadings 60
- motion for summary judgment 60
- motion to dismiss 60
- opening statement 66
- pleadings 55
- pretrial conference 64
- pretrial motion 60
- rebuttal 69
- rejoinder 69
- relevant evidence 67
- rules of evidence 66
- service of process 56
- summons 56
- verdict 70
- voir dire* 65
- writ of execution 73

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

3-1. Attorneys in personal-injury and other tort lawsuits (see Chapters 6 and 7) frequently charge clients on a contingency-fee basis; that is, a lawyer will agree to take on a client's case in return for, say, 30 percent of whatever damages are recovered. What are some of the social benefits and costs of the contingency-fee system? In your opinion, do the benefits of this system outweigh the costs?

3-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

When and for what purpose is each of the following motions made? Which of them would be appropriate if a defendant claimed that the only issue between the parties was a question of law and that the law was favorable to the defendant's position?

- (a) A motion for judgment on the pleadings.
- (b) A motion for a directed verdict.
- (c) A motion for summary judgment.
- (d) A motion for judgment n.o.v.

- For a sample answer to Question 3-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

3-3. In the past, the rules of discovery were very restrictive, and trials often turned on elements of surprise. For example, a plaintiff would not necessarily know until the trial what the defendant's defense was going to be. In the last several decades, however, new rules of discovery have substantially changed this situation. Now each attorney can access practically all of the evidence that the other side intends to present at trial, with the exception of certain information—namely, the opposing attorney's work product. Work product is not a clear concept. Basically, it includes all of the attorney's thoughts on the case. Can you see any reason why such information should not be made available to the opposing attorney? Discuss fully.

3-4. Washoe Medical Center, Inc., admitted Shirley Swisher for the treatment of a fractured pelvis. During her stay, Swisher suffered a fatal fall from her hospital bed. Gerald Parodi, the administrator of her estate, and others filed an action against Washoe seeking damages for the alleged lack of care in treating Swisher. During voir dire, when the plaintiffs' attorney returned a few minutes late from a break, the trial judge led the prospective jurors in a standing ovation. The judge joked with one of the prospective jurors, whom he had known in college, about his fitness to serve as a judge and personally endorsed another prospective juror's business. After the trial, the jury returned a verdict in favor of Washoe. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, but the judge denied the motion. The plaintiffs then appealed, arguing that the tone set by the judge during voir dire prejudiced their right to a fair trial. Should the appellate court agree? Why or why not?

3-5. Advance Technology Consultants, Inc. (ATC), contracted with RoadTrac, L.L.C., to provide software and client software systems for the products of global positioning satellite (GPS) technology being developed by RoadTrac. RoadTrac agreed to provide ATC with hardware with which ATC's software would interface. Problems soon arose, however. ATC claimed that RoadTrac's hardware was defective, making it difficult to develop the software. RoadTrac contended that its hardware was fully functional and that ATC had simply failed to provide supporting software. ATC told RoadTrac that it considered their contract terminated. RoadTrac filed a suit in a Georgia state court against ATC alleging breach of contract. During discovery, RoadTrac requested ATC's customer lists and marketing procedures. ATC objected to providing this information because RoadTrac and ATC had become competitors in the GPS industry. Should a party to a lawsuit have to hand over its confidential business secrets as part of a discovery request? Why or why not? What limitations might a court consider imposing before requiring ATC to produce this material?

3-6. Jury Selection. Ms. Thompson filed a suit in a federal district court against her employer, Alzheimer & Gray,

CHAPTER 3 Court Procedures

seeking damages for alleged racial discrimination in violation of federal law. During voir dire, the judge asked the prospective jurors whether “there is something about this kind of lawsuit for money damages that would start any of you leaning for or against a particular party?” Ms. Leiter, one of the prospective jurors, raised her hand and explained that she had “been an owner of a couple of businesses and am currently an owner of a business, and I feel that as an employer and owner of a business that will definitely sway my judgment in this case.” She explained, “I am constantly faced with people that want various benefits or different positions in the company or better contacts or, you know, a myriad of issues that employers face on a regular basis, and I have to decide whether or not that person should get them.” Asked by Thompson’s lawyer whether “you believe that people file lawsuits just because they don’t get something they want,” Leiter answered, “I believe there are some people that do.” In answer to another question, she said, “I think I bring a lot of background to this case, and I can’t say that it’s not going to cloud my judgment. I can try to be as fair as I can, as I do every day.” Explain the purpose of voir dire and how Leiter’s response should be treated in light of that purpose. [Thompson v. Alzheimer & Gray, 248 F.3d 621 (7th Cir. 2001)]

3-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

To establish a Web site, a person must have an Internet service provider or hosting company, register a domain name, and acquire domain name servicing. Pfizer, Inc., Pfizer Ireland Pharmaceuticals, and Warner-Lambert Co. (collectively, Pfizer) filed a suit in a federal district court against Domains By Proxy, Inc., and other persons alleged to be behind two Web sites—genericlipitors.com and econopetcare.com. Among the defendants were an individual and a company that, according to Pfizer, were located in a foreign country. Without investigating other means of serving these two defendants, Pfizer asked the court for permission to accomplish service of process via e-mail. Under what circumstances is service via e-mail proper? Would it be appropriate in this case? Explain. [Pfizer, Inc. v. Domains By Proxy, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Conn. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 3-7, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 3,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

3-8. Motion for Judgment N.O.V. Gerald Adams worked as a cook for Uno Restaurants, Inc., at Warwick Pizzeria Uno Restaurant & Bar in Warwick, Rhode Island. One night, shortly after Adams’s shift began, he noticed that the kitchen floor was saturated with a foul-smelling liquid coming from the drains and backing up water onto the floor. He complained of illness and went home, where he contacted the state health department. A department representative visited the restaurant and closed it for the night, leaving instructions to sanitize the kitchen and clear the drains. Two days later, in the restaurant, David Badot, the manager, shouted at Adams in the presence of other employees. When Adams shouted back, Badot fired Adams and had him arrested. Adams filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Uno, alleging that he had been unlawfully terminated for contacting the health department. A jury found in favor of Adams. Arguing that Adams had been fired for threatening Badot, Uno filed a motion for judgment n.o.v. (also known as a motion for judgment as a matter of law). What does a court weigh in considering whether to grant such a motion? Should the court grant the motion in this case? Why or why not? [Adams v. Uno Restaurants, Inc., 794 A.2d 489 (R.I. 2002)]

3-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Narnia Investments, Ltd., filed a suit in a Texas state court against several defendants, including Harvestons Securities, Inc., a securities dealer. (Securities are documents evidencing the ownership of a corporation, in the form of stock, or debts owed by it, in the form of bonds.) Harvestons is registered with the state of Texas and thus may be served with a summons and a copy of a complaint by serving the Texas Securities Commissioner. In this case, the return of service indicated that process was served on the commissioner “by delivering to JoAnn Kocerek defendant, in person, a true copy of this [summons] together with the accompanying copy(ies) of the [complaint].” Harvestons did not file an answer, and Narnia obtained a default judgment against the defendant for $365,000, plus attorneys’ fees and interest. Five months after this judgment, Harvestons filed a motion for a new trial, which the court denied. Harvestons appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, claiming that it had not been served in strict compliance with the rules governing service of process. [Harvestons Securities, Inc. v. Narnia Investments, Ltd., 218 S.W.3d 126, (Tex.App.—Houston [14 Dist.] 2007)]

- Harvestons* asserted that Narnia’s service was invalid in part because “the return of service states that process was delivered to ‘JoAnn Kocerek’” and did not show that she “had the authority to accept process on behalf of Harvestons or the Texas Securities Commissioner.” Should such a detail, if it is required, be strictly construed and applied? Should it apply in this case? Explain.
- Whose responsibility is it to see that service of process is accomplished properly? Was it accomplished properly in this case? Why or why not?

3-10. SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS

Go to Case 3.1, Cruz v. Fagor America, Inc., 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 862, 146 Cal.App.4th 488 (4 Dist. Div. 1 2007), on pages 58–59. Read the excerpt and answer the following questions.

- (a) Issue: On what preliminary step to litigation does the issue in this case focus?
- (b) Rule of Law: What are the chief requirements for fulfilling the pretrial procedure at the center of the dispute in this case?
- (c) Applying the Rule of Law: In applying the rule of law in this case, what did the court infer, and what did that inference imply for the defendant?
- (d) Conclusion: Did the court conclude that the plaintiff met all of the requirements for a favorable judgment in this case? If not, why not?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

If you are interested in learning more about the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (FRCP) and the Federal Rules of Evidence (FRE), you can access them via the Internet at the following Web site:

www.law.cornell.edu

Procedural rules for several of the state courts are also online and can be accessed via the courts' Web pages. You can find links to the Web pages for state courts at the Web site of the National Center for State Courts. Go to www.ncsconline.org/WC/CourtTopics/stateindex.asp

The American Bar Association maintains a gateway to information on legal topics, including the court systems and court procedures, at www.abalawinfo.org

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 3" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 3-1: Legal Perspective
Civil Procedure

Internet Exercise 3-2: Management Perspective
Small Claims Courts

Internet Exercise 3-3: Technological Perspective
Virtual Courtrooms

CHAPTER 4

Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

The U.S. Constitution is the supreme law in this country.¹ As mentioned in Chapter 1, neither Congress nor any state may pass a law that conflicts with the

1. See Appendix B for the full text of the U.S. Constitution.

Constitution. Laws that govern business have their origin in the lawmaking authority granted by this document.

In this chapter, we examine some basic constitutional concepts and clauses and their significance for businesspersons.

We then look at certain freedoms guaranteed by the first ten amendments to the Constitution—the Bill of Rights—and discuss how these freedoms affect business activities.

The Constitutional Powers of Government

Following the Revolutionary War, the states—through the Articles of Confederation—created a confederal form of government in which the states had the authority to govern themselves and the national government could exercise only limited powers. When problems arose because the nation was facing an economic crisis and state laws interfered with the free flow of commerce, a national convention was called, and the delegates drafted the U.S. Constitution. This document, after its ratification by the states in 1789, became the basis for an entirely new form of government.

A Federal Form of Government

The new government created by the Constitution reflected a series of compromises made by the convention delegates on various issues. Some delegates wanted sovereign power to remain with the states; others wanted the national government alone to exercise sovereign power. The end result was a compromise—a federal form of government in which the national government and the states share sovereign power.

The Constitution sets forth specific powers that can be exercised by the national government and provides that the national government has the implied power to undertake actions necessary to carry out its expressly designated powers (or enumerated powers). All other powers are expressly “reserved” to the states under the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution.

The Regulatory Powers of the States As part of their inherent sovereignty, state governments have the authority to regulate affairs within their borders. As mentioned, this authority stems, in part, from the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution, which reserves all powers not delegated to the national government to the states or to the people. State regulatory powers are often referred to as police powers. The term does not relate solely to criminal law enforcement but rather refers to the broad right of state governments to regulate private activities to protect or promote the public order, health, safety, morals, and general welfare. Fire and building codes, antidiscrimination laws, parking regulations, zoning restrictions, licensing requirements, and thousands of other state statutes covering virtually every aspect of life have been enacted pursuant to states’ police powers. Local governments, including cities, also exercise police powers.² Generally, state laws enacted pursuant to a state's police powers carry a strong presumption of validity.

Delineating State and National Powers

The broad language of the Constitution has left much room for debate over the specific nature and scope of the respective powers of the states and the national government. Generally, it has been the task of the courts to determine where the boundary line between state and national powers should lie—and that line shifts over time, moving first one way and then the other like a pendulum. During certain periods, the national government has met with little resistance from the courts when extending its regulatory authority over broad areas of social and economic life. During other periods, in contrast, the courts, and particularly the United States Supreme Court, have tended to interpret the Constitution in such a way as to curb the national government's regulatory powers.

Relations among the States

The Constitution also includes provisions concerning relations among the states in our federal system. Particularly important are the privileges and immunities clause and the full faith and credit clause.

The Privileges and Immunities Clause

Article IV, Section 2, of the Constitution provides that the "Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States." This clause is often referred to as the interstate privileges and immunities clause.³ It prevents a state from imposing unreasonable burdens on citizens of another state—particularly with regard to means of livelihood or doing business. When a citizen of one state engages in basic and essential activities in another state (the "foreign state"), the foreign state must have a substantial reason for treating the nonresident differently from its own residents. Basic activities include transferring property, seeking employment, or accessing the court system. The foreign state must also establish that its reason for the discrimination is

2. Local governments derive their authority to regulate their communities from the state because they are creatures of the state. In other words, they cannot come into existence unless authorized by the state to do so.

3. Interpretations of this clause commonly use the terms privilege and immunity synonymously. Generally, the terms refer to certain rights, benefits, or advantages enjoyed by individuals.

substantially related to the state's ultimate purpose in adopting the legislation or activity.⁴

In general, the idea is to prevent any state (including municipalities within the state) from discriminating against citizens of other states in favor of its own. The clause does not prohibit all discrimination. It applies only to discrimination for which the state cannot demonstrate a substantial reason significantly related to its objective. For example, giving hiring preferences to state or city residents has been found to violate the privileges and immunities clause.⁵ In contrast, requiring nonresidents to pay more for hunting licenses or tuition at state universities has been found not to violate the clause because the state articulated a substantial reason for the difference.⁶

The Full Faith and Credit Clause

Article IV, Section 1, of the Constitution provides that "Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judicial Proceedings of every other State." This clause, which is referred to as the full faith and credit clause, applies only to civil matters. It ensures that rights established under deeds, wills, contracts, and similar instruments in one state will be honored by other states. It also ensures that any judicial decision with respect to such property rights will be honored and enforced in all states.

The full faith and credit clause was originally included in the Articles of Confederation to promote mutual friendship among the people of the various states. In fact, it has contributed to the unity of American citizens because it protects their legal rights as they move about from state to state. It also protects the rights of those to whom they owe obligations, such as a person who is awarded monetary damages by a court. The ability to enforce such rights is extremely important for the conduct of business in a country with a very mobile citizenry.

4. This test was first announced in Supreme Court of New Hampshire v. Piper, 470 U.S. 274, 105 S.Ct. 1272, 84 L.Ed.2d 205 (1985). For another example, see Lee v. Miner, 369 F.Supp.2d 527 (D.Del. 2005).

5. United Building and Construction Trades Council of Camden County and Vicinity v. Mayor and Council of City of Camden, 465 U.S. 208, 104 S.Ct. 1020, 79 L.Ed.2d 249 (1984). See also Council of Insurance Agents %8F Brokers v. Viken, 408 F.Supp.2d 836 (D.S.Dak. 2005).

6. Baldwin v. Fish and Game Commission of Montana, 436 U.S. 371, 98 S.Ct. 1852, 56 L.Ed.2d 354 (1978); and Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 119 S.Ct. 1518, 143 L.Ed.2d 689 (1999).

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

The Separation of the National Government's Powers

To prevent the possibility that the national government might use its power arbitrarily, the Constitution provided for three branches of government. The legislative branch makes the laws, the executive branch enforces the laws, and the judicial branch interprets the laws. Each branch performs a separate function, and no branch may exercise the authority of another branch.

Additionally, a system of checks and balances allows each branch to limit the actions of the other two branches, thus preventing any one branch from exercising too much power. Some examples of these checks and balances include the following:

1. The legislative branch (Congress) can enact a law, but the executive branch (the president) has the constitutional authority to veto that law.
2. The executive branch is responsible for foreign affairs, but treaties with foreign governments require the advice and consent of the Senate.
3. Congress determines the jurisdiction of the federal courts and the president appoints federal judges, with the advice and consent of the Senate, but the judicial branch has the power to hold actions of the other two branches unconstitutional.⁷

The Commerce Clause

To prevent states from establishing laws and regulations that would interfere with trade and commerce among the states, the Constitution expressly delegated to the national government the power to regulate interstate commerce. Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution explicitly permits Congress “[t]o regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.” This clause, referred to as the commerce clause, has had a greater impact on business than any other provision in the Constitution. The commerce clause provides the basis for the national government’s extensive regulation of state and even local affairs.

One of the early questions raised by the commerce clause was whether the word among in the phrase “among the several States” meant between the states or between and within the states. For some time, the courts interpreted the commerce clause to apply only to commerce between the states (interstate commerce) and not commerce within the states (intrastate commerce). In 1824, however, the United States Supreme Court decided the landmark case of Gibbons v. Ogden.⁸ The Court ruled that commerce within the states could also be regulated by the national government as long as the commerce substantially affected commerce involving more than one state.

The Expansion of National Powers under the Commerce Clause

In Gibbons v. Ogden, the Supreme Court expanded the commerce clause to cover activities that “substantially affect interstate commerce.” As the nation grew and faced new kinds of problems, the commerce clause became a vehicle for the additional expansion of the national government’s regulatory powers. Even activities that seemed purely local in nature came under the regulatory reach of the national government if those activities were deemed to substantially affect interstate commerce.

In 1942, for example, the Supreme Court held that wheat production by an individual farmer intended wholly for consumption on his own farm was subject to federal regulation.⁹ In Heart of Atlanta Motel v. United States,¹⁰ a landmark case decided in 1964, the Supreme Court upheld the federal government’s authority to prohibit racial discrimination nationwide in public facilities, including local motels, based on its powers under the commerce clause. The Court noted that “if it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation that applies the squeeze.”

The Commerce Power Today

Today, the national government continues to rely on the commerce clause for its constitutional authority to regulate business activities in the United States. The breadth of the commerce clause permits the national government to legislate in areas in which Congress has not explicitly been granted power. In the last fifteen years, however, the Supreme Court has begun to curb somewhat the national government’s regulatory authority under the commerce clause. In 1995, the Court held—for the first time in sixty years—that Congress had exceeded its regulatory authority under the commerce clause. The Court struck down an act that banned the possession of guns within one thousand

7. As discussed in Chapter 2, the power of judicial review was established by the United States Supreme Court in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 2 L.Ed. 60 (1803).

8. 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 6 L.Ed. 23 (1824).

9. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 63 S.Ct. 82, 87 L.Ed. 122 (1942).

10. 379 U.S. 241, 85 S.Ct. 348, 13 L.Ed. 2d 258 (1964).

feet of any school because the act attempted to regulate an area that had “nothing to do with commerce.”¹¹ Subsequently, the Court invalidated key portions of two other federal acts on the ground that they exceeded Congress’s commerce clause authority.¹²

Medical Marijuana and the Commerce Clause

In one notable case, however, the Supreme Court did allow the federal government to regulate noncommercial activities taking place wholly within a state’s borders. Eleven states, including California, have adopted “medical marijuana” laws, which legalize marijuana for medical purposes. Marijuana possession, however, is illegal under the federal Controlled Substances Act (CSA).¹³ After the federal government seized the marijuana that two seriously ill California women were using on the advice of their physicians, the women filed a lawsuit. They argued that it was unconstitutional for the federal statute to prohibit them from using marijuana for medical purposes that were legal within the state. In 2003, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit agreed, reasoning that the marijuana in this situation would never enter the stream of commerce. In 2005, however, the United States Supreme Court held that Congress has the authority to prohibit the intrastate possession and non-commercial cultivation of marijuana as part of a larger regulatory scheme (the CSA).¹⁴ In other words, state laws that allow the use of medical marijuana do not insulate the users from federal prosecution.

11. The Court held the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 to be unconstitutional in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 115 S.Ct. 1624, 131 L.Ed.2d 626 (1995).

12. Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898, 117 S.Ct. 2365, 138 L.Ed.2d 914 (1997), involving the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act of 1993; and United States v. Morrison, 529 U.S. 598, 120 S.Ct. 1740, 146 L.Ed.2d 658 (2000), concerning the federal Violence Against Women Act of 1994.

13. 21 U.S.C. Sections 801 et seq.

14. Gonzales v. Raich, 545 U.S. 1, 125 S.Ct. 2195, 162 L.Ed.2d 1 (2005).

State Actions and the “Dormant” Commerce Clause

The United States Supreme Court has interpreted the commerce clause to mean that the national government has the exclusive authority to regulate commerce that substantially affects trade and commerce among the states. This express grant of authority to the national government, which is often referred to as the “positive” aspect of the commerce clause, implies a negative aspect—that the states do not have the authority to regulate interstate commerce. This negative aspect of the commerce clause is often referred to as the “dormant” (implied) commerce clause.

The dormant commerce clause comes into play when state regulations impinge on interstate commerce. In this situation, the courts weigh the state’s interest in regulating a certain matter against the burden that the state’s regulation places on interstate commerce. For example, the Supreme Court invalidated state regulations that, in the interest of promoting traffic safety, limited the length of trucks traveling on the state’s highways. The Court concluded that the regulations imposed a “substantial burden on interstate commerce” yet failed to “make more than the most speculative contribution to highway safety.”¹⁵ Because courts balance the interests involved, it is difficult to predict the outcome in a particular case. For a discussion of how state regulations pertaining to Internet prescriptions might violate the dormant commerce clause, see this chapter’s Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 84–85.

At one time, many states regulated the sale of alcoholic beverages, including wine, through a “three-tier” system. This system required separate licenses for producers, wholesalers, and retailers, subject to a complex set of overlapping regulations that effectively banned direct sales to many consumers from out-of-state wineries. In-state wineries, in contrast, could obtain a license for direct sales to consumers. Did these laws violate the dormant commerce clause? That was the question in the following case.

15. Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc. v. Rice, 434 U.S. 429, 98 S.Ct. 787, 54 L.Ed.2d 664 (1978).

CASE 4.1 Granholm v. Heald

Supreme Court of the United States, 2005. 544 U.S. 460, 125 S.Ct. 1885, 161 L.Ed.2d 796.

www.findlaw.com/casecode/supreme.html^a

- Background and Facts In 2005, consumer spending on direct wine shipments made up more than 3 percent of all wine sales. Because it was not economical for every wholesaler to carry every

a. In the “Browsing” section, click on “2005 Decisions.” In the result, click on the name of the case to access the opinion. FindLaw is part of West Group, the foremost provider of e-information and solutions to the U.S. legal market.

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

CASE 4.1 CONTINUED

winery's products, many small wineries relied on direct shipping to reach consumers. Domaine Alfred, a small winery in California, received requests for its wine from Michigan consumers but could not fill the orders because of that state's direct-shipment ban. The Swedenburg Estate Vineyard, a small winery in Virginia, was unable to fill orders from New York because of that state's laws. Domaine and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Michigan and others, contending that its laws violated the commerce clause. The court upheld the laws, but on appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit reversed this ruling. Swedenburg and others filed a suit in a different federal district court against New York and others, arguing that its laws violated the commerce clause. The court issued a judgment in the plaintiffs' favor, but on appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed this judgment. Both cases were appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

Time and again this Court has held that, in all but the narrowest circumstances, state laws violate the Commerce Clause if they mandate differential treatment of in-state and out-of-state economic interests that benefits the former and burdens the latter. This rule is essential to the foundations of the Union. The mere fact of nonresidence should not foreclose a producer in one State from access to markets in other States. States may not enact laws that burden out-of-state producers or shippers simply to give a competitive advantage to in-state businesses. This mandate reflects a central concern of the Framers that was an immediate reason for calling the Constitutional Convention: the conviction that in order to succeed, the new Union would have to avoid the tendencies toward economic Balkanization [fragmenting] that had plagued relations among the Colonies and later among the States under the Articles of Confederation. [Emphasis added.]

The rule prohibiting state discrimination against interstate commerce follows also from the principle that States should not be compelled to negotiate with each other regarding favored or disfavored status for their own citizens. States do not need, and may not attempt, to negotiate with other States regarding their mutual economic interests. Rivalries among the States are thus kept to a minimum, and a proliferation of trade zones is prevented.

Laws of the type at issue in the instant cases contradict these principles. They deprive citizens of their right to have access to the markets of other States on equal terms. * * * Allowing States to discriminate against out-of-state wine invites a multiplication of preferential trade areas destructive of the very purpose of the Commerce Clause.

* * * *

The discriminatory character of the Michigan system is obvious. Michigan allows in-state wineries to ship directly to consumers, subject only to a licensing requirement. Out-of-state wineries, whether licensed or not, face a complete ban on direct shipment. The differential treatment requires all out-of-state wine, but not all in-state wine, to pass through an in-state wholesaler and retailer before reaching consumers. These two extra layers of overhead increase the cost of out-of-state wines to Michigan consumers. The cost differential, and in some cases the inability to secure a wholesaler for small shipments, can effectively bar small wineries from the Michigan market.

The New York regulatory scheme differs from Michigan's in that it does not ban direct shipments altogether. Out-of-state wineries are instead required to establish a distribution operation in New York in order to gain the privilege of direct shipment. This, though, is just an indirect way of subjecting out-of-state wineries, but not local ones, to the three-tier system. * * *

The New York scheme grants in-state wineries access to the State's consumers on preferential terms. The suggestion of a limited exception for direct shipment from out-of-state wineries does nothing to eliminate the discriminatory nature of New York's regulations. In-state producers, with the applicable licenses, can ship directly to consumers from their wineries. Out-of-state wineries must open a branch office and warehouse in New York, additional steps that drive up the cost of their wine. For most wineries, the expense of establishing a bricks-and-mortar distribution operation in 1 State, let alone all 50, is prohibitive. It comes as no surprise that not a single out-of-state winery has availed itself of New York's direct-shipping privilege. We * * * [view] with particular suspicion state statutes requiring business operations to be performed in the home State that could more efficiently be performed elsewhere. New York's in-state presence requirement runs contrary to our admonition that States cannot require an out-of-state firm to become a resident in order to compete on equal terms.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 4.1 CONTINUED

● Decision and Remedy The United States Supreme Court concluded that "New York, like Michigan, discriminates against interstate commerce through its direct-shipping laws," which prohibit or severely restrict out-of-state wineries from shipping directly to state residents while allowing in-state wineries to do so. The Court affirmed the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, which invalidated the Michigan laws, and reversed the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which upheld the New York laws.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the states had only required the out-of-state wineries to obtain a special license that was readily available. How might this have affected the outcome of the case?

● The E-Commerce Dimension How might the issues related to the purchase of out-of-state wines have changed as a result of consumers' increased use of the Internet?

The Supremacy Clause and Federal Preemption

Article VI of the U.S. Constitution, commonly referred to as the supremacy clause, provides that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are "the supreme Law of the Land." When there is a direct conflict between a federal law and a state law, the state law is rendered invalid. Because some powers are concurrent (shared by the federal government and the states), however, it is necessary to determine which law governs in a particular circumstance.

Preemption of State Laws

Preemption occurs when Congress chooses to act exclusively in an area in which the federal government and the states have concurrent powers. A valid federal statute or regulation will take precedence over a conflicting state or local law or regulation on the same general subject. Often, it is not clear whether Congress, in passing a law, intended to preempt an entire subject area against state regulation, and it is left to the courts to determine whether Congress intended to exercise exclusive power over a given area. No single factor is decisive as to whether a court will find preemption. Generally, congressional intent to preempt will be found if a federal law regulating an activity is so pervasive, comprehensive, or detailed that the states have no room to regulate in that area. Also, when a federal statute creates an agency to enforce the law, matters that may come within the agency's jurisdiction will likely preempt state laws.

Preemption and State Regulation Aimed at Global Warming

A question of preemption was raised in 2006, when California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger signed into law the first state statute attempting to limit the amount of greenhouse-gas emissions from automobiles within the state.¹⁶ Under federal law, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is the agency that regulates and sets standards for air pollution and tailpipe emissions across the country (see Chapter 45). Normally, because EPA regulations are comprehensive and detailed, they preempt state statutes attempting to regulate the same topic. California is in a different position from other states, though, because it has been given special permission to regulate air pollution in the past. Nevertheless, the Bush administration and the EPA have opposed this most recent legislation and claim that it is preempted by the federal standards. Although Californians might want to enact more stringent standards for emissions

16. The law amends California Health and Safety Code Section 43018.5.

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

due to the number of vehicles operated within the state, it remains to be seen whether the courts will find that the legislation has been preempted. (We will discuss an important 2007 ruling from the United States Supreme Court on the topic of global warming in Chapter 45.)

The Taxing and Spending Powers

Article I, Section 8, provides that Congress has the “Power to lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts, and Excises.” Section 8 further requires uniformity in taxation among the states, and thus Congress may not tax some states while exempting others. Traditionally, if Congress attempted to regulate indirectly, by taxation, an area over which it had no authority, the courts would invalidate the tax. Today, however, if a tax measure is reasonable, it is generally held to be within the national taxing power. Moreover, the expansive interpretation of the commerce clause almost always provides a basis for sustaining a federal tax.

Article I, Section 8, also gives Congress its spending power—the power “to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States.” Congress can spend revenues not only to carry out its expressed powers but also to promote any objective it deems worthwhile, so long as it does not violate the Bill of Rights. The spending power necessarily involves policy choices, with which taxpayers may disagree.

Business and the Bill of Rights

The importance of a written declaration of the rights of individuals eventually caused the first Congress of the United States to submit twelve amendments to the U.S. Constitution to the states for approval. The first ten of these amendments, commonly known as the Bill of Rights, were adopted in 1791 and embody a series of protections for the individual against various types of interference by the federal government.¹⁷ The protections guaranteed by these ten amendments are summarized in Exhibit 4–1.¹⁸ Some of these constitutional protections apply to business entities as well. For example, corporations exist as separate legal entities, or legal persons, and enjoy many of the same rights and privileges as natural persons do.

17. Another of these proposed amendments was ratified 203 years later (in 1992) and became the Twenty-seventh Amendment to the Constitution. See Appendix B.

18. See the Constitution in Appendix B for the complete text of each amendment.

EXHIBIT 4–1 • Protections Guaranteed by the Bill of Rights

First Amendment: Guarantees the freedoms of religion, speech, and the press and the rights to assemble peaceably and to petition the government.

Second Amendment: States that the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

Third Amendment: Prohibits, in peacetime, the lodging of soldiers in any house without the owner's consent.

Fourth Amendment: Prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures of persons or property.

Fifth Amendment: Guarantees the rights to indictment by grand jury, to due process of law, and to fair payment when private property is taken for public use; prohibits compulsory self-incrimination and double jeopardy (being tried again for an alleged crime for which one has already stood trial).

Sixth Amendment: Guarantees the accused in a criminal case the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury and with counsel. The accused has the right to cross-examine witnesses against him or her and to solicit testimony from witnesses in his or her favor.

Seventh Amendment: Guarantees the right to a trial by jury in a civil case involving at least twenty dollars.^a Eighth Amendment: Prohibits excessive bail and fines, as well as cruel and unusual punishment.

Ninth Amendment: Establishes that the people have rights in addition to those specified in the Constitution.

Tenth Amendment: Establishes that those powers neither delegated to the federal government nor denied to the states are reserved to the states and to the people.

a. Twenty dollars was forty days' pay for the average person when the Bill of Rights was written.

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Does State Regulation of Internet Prescription Transactions Violate the Dormant Commerce Clause?

Every year, about 30 percent of American households purchase some prescription drugs online. As such transactions become more common, questions are being raised about who has the authority to regulate them. As explained in the text, under the Tenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the states have the authority to regulate activities affecting the safety and welfare of their citizens. In the late 1800s, the states used this authority to begin regulating the dispensing of prescription medicines—physicians were granted the exclusive right to prescribe drugs, and pharmacists were given the exclusive right to dispense them. The courts routinely upheld these state laws.^a All states have continued to use their police powers to regulate the licensing of pharmacists and physicians, as well as the prescribing and dispensing of drugs. But does this authority extend to out-of-state physicians and pharmacists who prescribe drugs and fill prescriptions via the Internet?

The States Attempt to Regulate Internet Prescriptions

About 40 percent of the states have attempted to regulate Internet prescription transactions by changing their licensing laws to require a “safe” consulting relationship between the prescribing physician and the pharmacist who dispenses the prescription drugs. Some states, for example, require an electronic diagnosis before a prescription can be filled—the patient completes an online questionnaire that is “approved” by a physician who then transmits the prescription to a pharmacist. Other states, however, specifically prohibit a physician from creating a prescription unless he or she has physical contact with the patient. Another approach is to try to regulate Internet pharmacies. In Nevada, for example, residents cannot obtain a prescription from an Internet pharmacy unless it is licensed and certified under the laws of that state.

Recently, the New York State Narcotic Bureau of Enforcement took an additional regulatory step and began investigating all companies in New Jersey and Mississippi that had supplied prescription medicines to New York residents via Internet transactions. None of the companies under investigation has offices in New York State. Furthermore, the authority to enforce regulations involving prescription drugs and their distributors generally belongs to the federal Food and Drug Administration.

Are the States Violating the Dormant Commerce Clause?

As explained in the text, the courts have held that the dormant commerce clause prohibits the states from regulating interstate commerce. Hence, the states may not institute regulations that impose an undue burden on interstate commerce. In the past, the courts have used the dormant commerce clause in a. See, for example, Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U.S. 114, 9 S.Ct. 231, 32 L.Ed. 623 (1889).

Limits on Both Federal and State Governmental Actions

As originally intended, the Bill of Rights limited only the powers of the national government. Over time, however, the United States Supreme Court “incorporated” most of these rights into the protections against state actions afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. That amendment, passed in 1868 after the Civil War, provides in part that “[n]o State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” Starting in 1925, the Supreme Court began to define various rights and liberties guaranteed in the U.S. Constitution as constituting “due process of law,” which was required of state governments under the Fourteenth Amendment. Today, most of the rights and liberties set forth in the Bill of Rights apply to state governments as well as the national government. In other words, neither the federal government nor state governments can deprive persons of those rights and liberties.

The rights secured by the Bill of Rights are not absolute. As you can see in Exhibit 4–1, many of the rights guaranteed by the first ten amendments are described in very general terms. For example, the Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures, but it does not define what constitutes an unreasonable search or seizure. Similarly, the Eighth Amendment prohibits excessive bail or fines, but no definition of excessive is contained in that amend-evaluating state regulations that affected out-of-state pharmacies involved in activities such as mail-order prescriptions.^b

Today, the question is whether state laws that attempt to regulate Internet prescription transactions, such as those described above, violate the dormant commerce clause. To date, no court has ruled directly on this issue, but there have been cases involving similar state efforts to regulate other out-of-state Internet activities. A number of courts have accepted the argument that under the dormant commerce clause, the federal government can assume full regulatory power over any firms conducting business over the Internet because they are engaged in interstate commerce.^c

Other courts, however, have taken the opposing view and found that state regulation of Internet activities does not always violate the dormant commerce clause. In one case, a court upheld a New York law that banned the sale of cigarettes to New York residents over the Internet on the ground that the state had an interest in protecting the health of its citizens.^d In another case, a Texas statute that prohibited automobile manufacturers from selling vehicles on their Web sites was upheld on similar grounds.^e

Whether the reasoning in these cases will be extended to cases involving Internet prescriptions remains to be seen. Some laws seem likely to be upheld. The Nevada law mentioned earlier that requires Internet pharmacies to be licensed in the state is an example. Because this law applies equally to in-state pharmacies and out-of-state Internet pharmacies, it is nondiscriminatory. In addition, the requirement that an Internet pharmacy obtain a license before doing business in the state would probably not be considered an undue burden on interstate commerce.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Clearly, there are two sides to this debate. Many states contend that they must regulate the provision of prescription drugs via the Internet in order to ensure the safety and well-being of their citizens. In some instances, however, the states may be imposing such regulations at the behest of traditional pharmacies, which do not like online competition. What is your stand on whether state regulation of Internet prescription drug transactions violates the dormant commerce clause of the Constitution? Realize that if you agree that it does, then you probably favor less state regulation. If you believe that it does not, then you probably favor more state regulation.

b. See, for example, Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association v. New Mexico Board of Pharmacy, 86 N.M. 571, 525 P.2d 931 (N.M.App. 1974); and State v. Rasmussen, 213 N.W.2d 661 (Iowa 1973).

c. See, for example, American Libraries Association v. Pataki, 969 F.Supp. 160 (S.D.N.Y. 1997).

d. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp. v. Pataki, 320 F.3d 200 (2d Cir. 2003).

e. Ford Motor Co. v. Texas Department of Transportation, 264 F.3d 493 (5th Cir. 2001).

ment. Ultimately, it is the United States Supreme Court, as the final interpreter of the Constitution, that defines our rights and determines their boundaries.

Freedom of Speech

A democratic form of government cannot survive unless people can freely voice their political opinions and criticize government actions or policies. Freedom of speech, particularly political speech, is thus a prized right, and traditionally the courts have protected this right to the fullest extent possible.

Symbolic speech—gestures, movements, articles of clothing, and other forms of expressive conduct—is also given substantial protection by the courts. For example, in 1989 the United States Supreme Court ruled that the burning of the American flag as part of a peaceful protest is a constitutionally protected form of expression.¹⁹ Similarly, participating in a hunger strike, holding signs at an antiwar protest, or wearing a black armband would be protected as symbolic speech.

Reasonable Restrictions Expression—oral, written, or symbolized by conduct—is subject to reasonable restrictions. A balance must be struck between a government's obligation to protect its citizens and those citizens' exercise of their rights.

19. Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 109 S.Ct. 2533, 105 L.Ed.2d 342 (1989).

Reasonableness is analyzed on a case-by-case basis. If a restriction imposed by the government is content neutral, then a court may allow it. To be content neutral, the restriction must be aimed at combating some societal problem, such as crime, and not be aimed at suppressing the expressive conduct or its message. For example, courts have often protected nude dancing as a form of symbolic expression but have also allowed content-neutral laws that ban all public nudity, not just erotic dancing.²⁰

The United States Supreme Court has also held that schools may restrict students' free speech rights at school events. In 2007, for example, the Court heard a case involving a high school student who had held up a banner saying "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" at an off-campus but school-sanctioned event. In a split decision, the majority of the Court ruled that school officials did not violate the student's free speech rights when they confiscated the banner and suspended the student for ten days. Because the banner could reasonably be interpreted as promoting the use of marijuana, and because the school had a written policy against illegal drugs, the majority concluded that the school's actions were justified. Several justices disagreed, however, noting that the majority's holding creates a special exception that will allow schools to censor any student speech that mentions drugs.²¹

Corporate Political Speech Political speech by corporations also falls within the protection of the First Amendment. For example, many years ago the United States Supreme Court ruled that a Massachusetts statute, which prohibited corporations from making political contributions or expenditures that individuals were permitted to make, was unconstitutional.²² Similarly, the Court has held that a law forbidding a corporation from placing inserts in its billing to express its views on controversial issues violates the First Amendment.²³ Although the Supreme Court has reversed this trend somewhat,²⁴ corporate political speech continues to be given significant protection under the First Amendment. For example, in 2003 and again in 2007 the Supreme Court struck down some portions of bipartisan campaign-finance reform laws as unconstitutional restraints on corporate political speech.²⁵

Commercial Speech The courts also give substantial protection to commercial speech, which consists of communications—primarily advertising and marketing—made by business firms that involve only their commercial interests. The protection given to commercial speech under the First Amendment is not as extensive as that afforded to noncommercial speech, however. A state may restrict certain kinds of advertising, for example, in the interest of preventing consumers from being misled by the advertising practices. States also have a legitimate interest in the beautification of roadsides, and this interest allows states to place restraints on billboard advertising. For example, in one Florida case, the court found that a law preventing a nude dancing establishment from billboard advertising was constitutionally permissible because it directly advanced a substantial government interest in highway beautification and safety.²⁶

Generally, a restriction on commercial speech will be considered valid as long as it meets three criteria: (1) it must seek to implement a substantial government interest, (2) it must directly advance that interest, and (3) it must go no further than necessary to accomplish its objective. At issue in the following case was whether a government agency had unconstitutionally restricted commercial speech when it prohibited the inclusion of a certain illustration on beer labels.

20. See, for example, Rameses, Inc. v. County of Orange, 481 F.Supp.2d 1305 (M.D.Fla. 2007) and City of Erie v. Pap's A.M., 529 U.S. 277, 120 S.Ct. 1382, 146 L.Ed.2d 265 (2000).

21. Morse v. Frederick, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2618, 168 L.Ed.2d 290 (2007). An excerpt of this case was presented as a sample in Exhibit 1–6 on pages 24–26.

22. First National Bank of Boston v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765, 98 S.Ct. 1407, 55 L.Ed.2d 707 (1978).

23. Consolidated Edison Co. v. Public Service Commission, 447 U.S. 530, 100 S.Ct. 2326, 65 L.Ed.2d 319 (1980).

24. See Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, 494 U.S. 652, 110 S.Ct. 1391, 108 L.Ed.2d 652 (1990), in which the Supreme Court upheld a state law prohibiting corporations from using general corporate funds for independent expenditures in state political campaigns.

25. McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, 540 U.S. 93, 124 S.Ct. 619, 157 L.Ed.2d 491 (2003); and Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc., ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 2652, 168 L.Ed.2d 329 (2007).

26. Café Erotica v. Florida Department of Transportation, 830 So.2d 181 (Fla.App. 1 Dist. 2002); review denied by Café Erotica/We Dare to Bare v. Florida Department of Transportation, 845 So.2d 888 (Fla. 2003).

C A S E 4.2 Bad Frog Brewery, Inc. v. New York State Liquor Authority

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 1998. 134 F.3d 87.
www.findlaw.com/casecode/index.html^a

● Background and Facts Bad Frog Brewery, Inc., makes and sells alcoholic beverages. Some of the beverages feature labels that display a drawing of a frog making the gesture generally known as “giving the finger.” Bad Frog’s authorized New York distributor, Renaissance Beer Company, applied to the New York State Liquor Authority (NYSLA) for brand label approval, as required by state law before the beer could be sold in New York. The NYSLA denied the application, in part, because “the label could appear in grocery and convenience stores, with obvious exposure on the shelf to children of tender age.” Bad Frog filed a suit in a federal district court against the NYSLA, asking for, among other things, an injunction against the denial of the application. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the NYSLA. Bad Frog appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

JON O. NEWMAN, Circuit Judge:

* * * *
 * * * [T]o support its asserted power to ban Bad Frog’s labels [NYSLA advances]
 * * * the State’s interest in “protecting children from vulgar and profane advertising” * * * .
 [This interest is] substantial * * * . States have a compelling interest in protecting the physical and psychological well-being of minors * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * NYSLA endeavors to advance the state interest in preventing exposure of children to vulgar displays by taking only the limited step of barring such displays from the labels of alcoholic beverages. In view of the wide currency of vulgar displays throughout contemporary society, including comic books targeted directly at children, barring such displays from labels for alcoholic beverages cannot realistically be expected to reduce children’s exposure to such displays to any significant degree. [Emphasis added.]

* * * If New York decides to make a substantial effort to insulate children from vulgar displays in some significant sphere of activity, at least with respect to materials likely to be seen by children, NYSLA’s label prohibition might well be found to make a justifiable contribution to the material advancement of such an effort, but its currently isolated response to the perceived problem, applicable only to labels on a product that children cannot purchase, does not suffice. * * * [A] state must demonstrate that its commercial speech limitation is part of a substantial effort to advance a valid state interest, not merely the removal of a few grains of offensive sand from a beach of vulgarity.

* * * Even if we were to assume that the state materially advances its asserted interest by shielding children from viewing the Bad Frog labels, it is plainly excessive to prohibit the labels from all use, including placement on bottles displayed in bars and taverns where parental supervision of children is to be expected. Moreover, to whatever extent NYSLA is concerned that children will be harmfully exposed to the Bad Frog labels when wandering without parental supervision around grocery and convenience stores where beer is sold, that concern could be less intrusively dealt with by placing restrictions on the permissible locations where the appellant’s products may be displayed within such stores.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the judgment of the district court and remanded the case for the entry of a judgment in favor of Bad Frog. The NYSLA’s ban on the use of the labels lacked a “reasonable fit” with the state’s interest in shielding minors from vulgarity, and the NYSLA did not adequately consider alternatives to the ban.

a. Under the heading “US Court of Appeals,” click on “2nd.” Enter “Bad Frog Brewery” in the “Party Name Search” box and click on “search.” On the resulting page, click on the case name to access the opinion.

CASE 4.2 CONTINUED

- What If the Facts Were Different? If Bad Frog had sought to use the offensive label to market toys instead of beer, would the court's ruling likely have been the same?
- The Legal Environment Dimension Whose interests are advanced by the banning of certain types of advertising?

Unprotected Speech The United States Supreme Court has made it clear that certain types of speech will not be protected under the First Amendment. Speech that violates criminal laws (threatening speech and pornography, for example) is not constitutionally protected. Other unprotected speech includes “fighting words” (speech that is likely to incite others to respond violently).

Speech that harms the good reputation of another, or defamatory speech (see Chapter 6), also is not protected under the First Amendment. To constitute defamation and thus have no First Amendment protection, the speech in question must be an assertion of fact and not merely an opinion. Unlike an opinion, a statement of purported fact can be verified and may require proof in a lawsuit claiming that the statement is defamatory. In the following case, the issue was whether a certain statement was an unprotected factual assertion.

EXTENDED Lott v. Levitt

CASE 4.3 United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, 2007. 469 F.Supp.2d 575.

RUBEN CASTILLO, United States District Court Judge.

In 2005, well-known economist Steven Levitt (“Levitt”) and journalist Stephen J. Dubner (“Dubner”) coauthored the best-selling book Freakonomics, which was published by * * * HarperCollins Publishers, Inc. (“HarperCollins”). This Court, like many other individuals, has completed a cover-to-cover reading of the book. In the book, Levitt and Dubner spend one paragraph discussing the theory for which fellow economist, * * * John R. Lott, Jr. (“Lott”), is known[:] * * * that laws permitting individuals to carry concealed weapons result in a statistically significant and provable reduction in serious crime rates. Lott filed the instant lawsuit against Levitt and [others] * * *. Lott claims [in part] that an email written by Levitt to another economist * * * constitutes defamation * * *. [Levitt filed a motion to dismiss this claim.]

Lott is discussed in the following single paragraph in Chapter 4 of Freakonomics, entitled “Where Have All the Criminals Gone?”:

* * * [T]here is an * * * argument—that we need more guns on the street, but in the hands of the right people * * *. The economist John R. Lott Jr. is the main champion of this idea. His calling card is the book More Guns, Less Crime, in which he argues that violent crime has decreased in areas where law-abiding citizens are allowed to carry concealed weapons. His theory might be surprising, but it is sensible. If a criminal thinks his potential victim may be armed, he may be deterred from committing the crime. Handgun opponents call Lott a pro-gun ideologue * * *. [T]here was the troubling allegation that Lott actually invented some of the survey data that support his more-guns/less-crime theory. Regardless of whether the data were faked, Lott’s admittedly intriguing hypothesis doesn’t seem to be true. When other scholars have tried to replicate his results, they found that right-to-carry laws simply don’t bring down crime.

On May 24 or May 25, 2005, John McCall (“McCall”), described by Lott as an economist residing in Texas, sent Levitt an email regarding the above passage, stating:

I * * * found the following citations—have not read any of them yet, but it appears they all replicate Lott’s research. [McCall referred to a “Special Issue” of The Journal of Law and Economics published in October 2001 that contained a collection of articles delivered at an academic conference co-sponsored by the Center for Law, Economics, and Public Policy at Yale Law School and the American Enterprise Institute, where Lott had recently been a resident scholar.] The Journal of Law and Economics is not chopped liver. * * *

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

CASE 4.3 CONTINUED

That same day, Levitt responded:

It was not a peer refereed edition of the Journal. For $15,000 he was able to buy an issue and put in only work that supported him. My best friend was the editor and was outraged the press let Lott do this. * * *

* * * *

A statement is considered defamatory if it tends to cause such harm to the reputation of another that it lowers that person in the eyes of the community or deters third persons from associating with that person. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Lott contends that the statements about him in * * * the email * * * imply that his results were falsified or that his theories lack merit, and thus impute a lack of ability and integrity in his profession as an economist, academic, and researcher. Indeed, a claim that an academic or economist falsified his results and could only publish his theories by buying an issue of a journal and avoiding peer review would surely impute a lack of ability and prejudice that person in his profession.

* * * *

* * * [T]he First Amendment protects statements that cannot be reasonably interpreted as stating actual facts. * * * [Emphasis added.]

The test for whether a statement is a factual assertion is whether the statement is precise, readily understood, and susceptible of being verified as true or false. This test * * * is a reasonableness standard; whether a reasonable reader would understand the defendant to be informing him of a fact or opinion. Language that is loose, figurative, or hyperbolic negates the impression that a statement is asserting actual facts. Accordingly, vague, unprovable statements and statements of opinion do not give rise to a defamation claim. If it is plain that the speaker is expressing a subjective view, an interpretation, a theory, conjecture, or surmise, rather than claiming to be in possession of objectively verifiable facts, the statement is not actionable. [Emphasis added.]

In this case, however, Levitt's email sounds as if he was in possession of objectively verifiable facts. * * * First, it would be unreasonable to interpret Levitt's unqualified statement that the Journal edition was not "peer refereed" as Levitt [argues that he was] merely giving his opinion on the "peers" chosen to review, or referee, the Special Issue. Indeed, the editor of the Journal might be able to verify the truth or falsity of whether the Special Issue was reviewed by peers. Furthermore, while Levitt argues that one person's "peer" in the academic realm may be another person's "hack," this distinction is not reasonable when discussing the review process at a top university's academic journal. Second, a reasonable reader would not interpret Levitt's assertion that "For $15,000 [Lott] was able to buy an issue and put in only work that supported him" as simply a statement of Levitt's opinion. Levitt's email appears to state objectively verifiable facts: that Lott paid $15,000 to control the content of the Special Issue. The editor of the Journal again might be the source to verify the truth or falsity of this statement. Third, the same editor could verify whether he was "outraged" by the acts described in the foregoing statements. Therefore, the defamatory statements in Levitt's email to McCall are objectively verifiable * * * .

* * * *

* * * In his email to McCall, * * * Levitt made a string of defamatory assertions about Lott's involvement in the publication of the Special Issue of the Journal that—no matter how rash or short-sighted Levitt was when he made them—cannot be reasonably interpreted as innocent or mere opinion.

* * * Levitt's motion to dismiss [this part of Lott's] Complaint is denied.

QUESTIONS

1. Did the statements about Lott in Freakonomics constitute unprotected speech? Explain.
2. Should the First Amendment protect all speech? Discuss.

Obscene Speech. The Supreme Court has also held that the First Amendment does not protect obscene speech. Establishing an objective definition of obscene speech has proved difficult, however, and the Court has grappled from time to time with this problem. In a 1973 case, Miller v. California,²⁷ the Supreme Court created a test for legal obscenity, including a set of requirements that must be met for material to be legally obscene. Under this test, material is obscene if (1) the average person finds that it violates contemporary community standards; (2) the work taken as a whole appeals to a prurient (arousing or obsessive) interest in sex; (3) the work shows patently offensive sexual conduct; and (4) the work lacks serious redeeming literary, artistic, political, or scientific merit.

Because community standards vary widely, the Miller test has had inconsistent applications, and obscenity remains a constitutionally unsettled issue. Numerous state and federal statutes make it a crime to disseminate obscene materials, and the Supreme Court has often upheld such laws, including laws prohibiting the sale and possession of child pornography.²⁸

Online Obscenity. A significant problem facing the courts and lawmakers today is how to control the dissemination of obscenity and child pornography via the Internet. Congress first attempted to protect minors from pornographic materials on the Internet by passing the Communications Decency Act (CDA) of 1996. The CDA declared it a crime to make available to minors online any “obscene or indecent” message that “depicts or describes, in terms patently offensive as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs.”²⁹ Civil rights groups challenged the act, and ultimately the Supreme Court ruled that portions of the act were unconstitutional. The Court held that the terms indecent and patently offensive covered large amounts of nonpornographic material with serious educational or other value.³⁰

Subsequent Attempts to Regulate Online Obscenity. Congress’s second attempt to protect children from online obscenity, the Child Online

Protection Act (COPA) of 1998,³¹ met with a similar fate. Although the COPA was more narrowly tailored than its predecessor, the CDA, it still used “contemporary community standards” to define which material was obscene and harmful to minors. Ultimately, in 2004 the Supreme Court concluded that it was likely that the COPA did violate the right to free speech and prevented enforcement of the act.³²

In 2000, Congress enacted the Children’s Internet Protection Act (CIPA),³³ which requires public schools and libraries to install filtering software to keep children from accessing adult content. Such software is designed to prevent persons from viewing certain Web sites based on a site’s Internet address or its meta tags, or key words. The CIPA was also challenged on constitutional grounds, but in 2003 the Supreme Court held that the act does not violate the First Amendment. The Court concluded that because libraries can disable the filters for any patrons who ask, the system is reasonably flexible and does not burden free speech to an unconstitutional extent.³⁴

Because of the difficulties of policing the Internet as well as the constitutional complexities of prohibiting online obscenity through legislation, it remains a continuing problem in the United States (and worldwide).

Freedom of Religion

The First Amendment states that the government may neither establish any religion nor prohibit the free exercise of religious practices. The first part of this constitutional provision, which is referred to as the establishment clause, has to do with the separation of church and state. The second part of the provision is known as the free exercise clause.

The Establishment Clause The establishment clause prohibits the government from establishing a state-sponsored religion, as well as from passing laws that promote (aid or endorse) religion or that show a preference for one religion over another. Establishment clause issues often involve such matters as the legality

27. 413 U.S. 15, 93 S.Ct. 2607, 37 L.Ed.2d 419 (1973).

28. For example, see Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 110 S.Ct. 1691, 109 L.Ed.2d 98 (1990).

29. 47 U.S.C. Section 223(a)(1)(B)(ii).

30. Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844, 117 S.Ct. 2329, 138 L.Ed.2d 874 (1997).

31. 47 U.S.C. Section 231.

32. American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft, 542 U.S. 646, 124 S.Ct. 2783, 159 L.Ed.2d 690 (2004). See also Ashcroft v. American Civil Liberties Union, 535 U.S. 564, 122 S.Ct. 1700, 152 L.Ed.2d 771 (2002); and American Civil Liberties Union v. Ashcroft, 322 F.3d 240 (3d Cir.2003).

33. 17 U.S.C. Sections 1701–1741.

34. United States v. American Library Association, 539 U.S. 194, 123 S.Ct. 2297, 156 L.Ed.2d 221 (2003).

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

of allowing or requiring school prayers, using state-issued school vouchers to pay for tuition at religious schools, teaching evolutionary versus creationist theory, and giving state and local government aid to religious organizations and schools.

Federal or state laws that do not promote or place a significant burden on religion are constitutional even if they have some impact on religion. “Sunday closing laws,” for example, make the performance of some commercial activities on Sunday illegal. These statutes, also known as “blue laws” (from the color of the paper on which an early Sunday law was written), have been upheld on the ground that it is a legitimate function of government to provide a day of rest to promote the health and welfare of workers. Even though closing laws admittedly make it easier for Christians to attend religious services, the courts have viewed this effect as an incidental, not a primary, purpose of Sunday closing laws.

The Free Exercise Clause The free exercise clause guarantees that no person can be compelled to do something that is contrary to his or her religious beliefs. For this reason, if a law or policy is contrary to a person’s religious beliefs, exemptions are often made to accommodate those beliefs.

When religious practices work against public policy and the public welfare, though, the government can act. For example, regardless of a child’s or parent’s religious beliefs, the government can require certain types of vaccinations in the interest of public welfare. The government’s interest must be sufficiently compelling, however. The United States Supreme Court ruled in 2006 that the government had failed to demonstrate a sufficiently compelling interest in barring a church from the sacramental use of an illegal controlled substance. (The church members used hoasca tea, which is brewed from plants native to the Amazon rain forest and contains a hallucinogenic drug, in the practice of a sincerely held religious belief.)³⁵

For business firms, an important issue involves the accommodation that businesses must make for the religious beliefs of their employees. Generally, if an employee’s religion prohibits her or him from working on a certain day of the week or at a certain type of job, the employer must make a reasonable attempt to accommodate these religious requirements. The only requirement is that the belief be religious in nature and sincerely held by the employee.³⁶ (See Chapter 34 for a further discussion of religious freedom in the employment context.)

Searches and Seizures

The Fourth Amendment protects the “right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects.” Before searching or seizing private property, law enforcement officers must usually obtain a search warrant—an order from a judge or other public official authorizing the search or seizure.

Search Warrants and Probable Cause To obtain a search warrant, law enforcement officers must convince a judge that they have reasonable grounds, or probable cause, to believe a search will reveal evidence of a specific illegality. To establish probable cause, the officers must have trustworthy evidence that would convince a reasonable person that the proposed search or seizure is more likely justified than not. Furthermore, the Fourth Amendment prohibits general warrants. It requires a particular description of whatever is to be searched or seized. General searches through a person’s belongings are impermissible. The search cannot extend beyond what is described in the warrant.

The requirement for a search warrant has several exceptions. One exception applies when the items sought are likely to be removed before a warrant can be obtained. For example, if a police officer has probable cause to believe that an automobile contains evidence of a crime and that the vehicle will likely be unavailable by the time a warrant is obtained, the officer can search the vehicle without a warrant.

Searches and Seizures in the Business

Context Constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and seizures is important to businesses and professionals. Equally important is the government’s interest in ensuring compliance with federal and state regulations, especially rules meant to protect the safety of employees and the public.

Generally, government inspectors do not have the right to enter business premises without a warrant, although the standard of probable cause is not the same as that required in nonbusiness contexts. The existence of a general and neutral enforcement plan will normally justify issuance of the warrant. Lawyers and accountants frequently possess the business records of their clients, and inspecting these documents while they are out of the hands of their true owners also requires a warrant.

35. Gonzales v. O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal, 546 U.S. 418, 126 S.Ct. 1211, 163 L.Ed.2d 1017 (2006).

36. Frazee v. Illinois Department of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829, 109 S.Ct. 1514, 103 L.Ed.2d 914 (1989).

A warrant is not required, however, for the seizure of spoiled or contaminated food. In addition, warrants are not required for searches of businesses in such highly regulated industries as liquor, guns, and strip mining. General manufacturing is not considered to be one of these highly regulated industries, however.

Border Searches of Computers Warrantless border searches have long been upheld by the courts as means to prevent persons from physically bringing drugs, contraband, and illegal aliens into the United States. In recent years, the courts have also started allowing border guards to search through the temporary files stored on laptop computers and to use the history of Web pages viewed as criminal evidence.

Consider, for example, a 2006 case involving Stuart Romm, a suspended lawyer from Massachusetts who traveled to British Columbia on business. A border agent asked to see Romm's laptop computer and briefly examined the Internet cache, or temporary folder showing the history of Web sites that Romm had visited. The border guards discovered that Romm had looked at some child pornography Web sites and detained him while a forensic computer specialist analyzed the hard drive. Analysis confirmed that Romm had viewed ten images of child pornography and then deleted (or at least attempted to delete) the images from his computer. Romm was convicted and sentenced to serve ten to fifteen years in prison. A federal appellate court upheld his conviction.³⁷ The holding in this case could be applied to any type of illegal material found on a laptop computer during a border search, including unauthorized images of copyrighted materials or confidential business data (see Chapter 8).

Self-Incrimination

The Fifth Amendment guarantees that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Thus, in any federal or state (because the due process clause extends the protection to state courts) proceeding, an accused person cannot be forced to give testimony that might subject him or her to any criminal prosecution.

37. United States v. Romm, 455 F.3d 990 (9th Cir. 2006).

The Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination extends only to natural persons. Therefore, neither corporations nor partnerships receive Fifth Amendment protection. When a partnership is required to produce business records, it must do so even if the information provided incriminates the individual partners of the firm. In contrast, sole proprietors and sole practitioners (those who fully own their businesses) cannot be compelled to produce their business records. These individuals have full protection against self-incrimination because they function in only one capacity; there is no separate business entity.

Due Process and Equal Protection

Other constitutional guarantees of great significance to Americans are mandated by the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Due Process

Both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments provide that no person shall be deprived "of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." The due process clause of these constitutional amendments has two aspects—procedural and substantive. Note that the due process clause applies to "legal persons" (that is, corporations), as well as to individuals.

Procedural Due Process Procedural due process requires that any government decision to take life, liberty, or property must be made equitably; that is, the government must give a person proper notice and an opportunity to be heard. Fair procedures must be used in determining whether a person will be subjected to punishment or have some burden imposed on her or him. Fair procedure has been interpreted as requiring that the person have at least an opportunity to object to a proposed action before an impartial, neutral decision maker (which need not be a judge). Thus, for example, if a driver's license is construed as a property interest, the state must provide some sort of opportunity for the driver to object before suspending or terminating the license.

Substantive Due Process Substantive due process protects an individual's life, liberty, or property against certain government actions regardless of the fairness of the procedures used to implement them. Substantive due process limits what the government may do in its legislative and executive capacities.³⁸ Legislation must be fair and reasonable in content and must further a legitimate governmental objective. Only when state conduct is arbitrary, or shocks the conscience, however, will it rise to the level of violating substantive due process.³⁹

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

If a law or other governmental action limits a fundamental right, the state must have a legitimate and compelling interest to justify its action. Fundamental rights include interstate travel, privacy, voting, marriage and family, and all First Amendment rights. Thus, a state must have substantial reason for taking any action that infringes on a person's free speech rights. In situations not involving fundamental rights, a law or action does not violate substantive due process if it rationally relates to any legitimate government purpose. Under this test, virtually any business regulation will be upheld as reasonable.

Equal Protection

Under the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The United States Supreme Court has interpreted the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to make the equal protection clause applicable to the federal government as well. Equal protection means that the government cannot enact laws that treat similarly situated individuals differently.

Both substantive due process and equal protection require review of the substance of the law or other governmental action rather than review of the procedures used. When a law or action limits the liberty of all persons to do something, it may violate substantive due process; when a law or action limits the liberty of some persons but not others, it may violate the equal protection clause. Thus, for example, if a law prohibits all advertising on the sides of trucks, it raises a substantive due process question; if it makes an exception to allow truck owners to advertise their own businesses, it raises an equal protection issue.

38. County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998).

39. See, for example, Breen v. Texas A&M University, 485 F.3d 325 (5th Cir. 2007); Hart v. City of Little Rock, 432 F.3d 801 (8th Cir. 2005); County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998); and United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739, 107 S.Ct. 2095, 95 L.Ed.2d 697 (1987).

In an equal protection inquiry, when a law or action distinguishes between or among individuals, the basis for the distinction, or classification, is examined. Depending on the classification, the courts apply different levels of scrutiny, or "tests," to determine whether the law or action violates the equal protection clause. The courts use one of three standards: strict scrutiny, intermediate scrutiny, or the "rational basis" test.

Strict Scrutiny The most difficult standard to meet is that of strict scrutiny. Under strict scrutiny, the classification must be necessary to promote a compelling state interest. Generally, few laws or actions survive strict-scrutiny analysis by the courts.

Strict scrutiny is applied when a law or action prohibits some persons from exercising a fundamental right or classifies individuals based on a suspect trait—such as race, national origin, or citizenship status. For example, to prevent violence caused by racial gangs in prisons, corrections officials in California segregated prisoners by race for up to sixty days after they entered (or transferred to) a correctional facility. A prisoner challenged that policy. Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court held that all racial classifications, because they are based on a suspect trait, must be analyzed under strict scrutiny.⁴⁰

Intermediate Scrutiny Another standard, that of intermediate scrutiny, is applied in cases involving discrimination based on gender or legitimacy. Laws using these classifications must be substantially related to important government objectives. For example, an important government objective is preventing illegitimate teenage pregnancies. Therefore, because males and females are not similarly situated in this regard—only females can become pregnant—a law that punishes men but not women for statutory rape will be upheld, even though it treats men and women unequally.

The state also has an important objective in establishing time limits (called statutes of limitation) for how long after an event a particular type of action can be brought. Such limits prevent persons from bringing fraudulent and stale (outdated) claims. Nevertheless, the limitation period must be substantially related to the important objective. Suppose that a state law requires illegitimate children to file a paternity action within six years of their birth in order to seek support from their biological fathers. This law will fail if legitimate children can seek support from their fathers at any time because distinguishing between support claims on the basis of legitimacy has no relation to the objective of preventing fraudulent or stale claims.

40. Johnson v. California, 543 U.S. 499, 125 S.Ct. 1141, 160 L.Ed.2d 949 (2005).

The “Rational Basis” Test In matters of economic or social welfare, a classification will be considered valid if there is any conceivable rational basis on which the classification might relate to a legitimate government interest. It is almost impossible for a law or action to fail the rational basis test. Thus, for example, a city ordinance that in effect prohibits all pushcart vendors, except a specific few, from operating in a particular area of the city will be upheld if the city provides a rational basis—such as reducing the traffic in the particular area—for the ordinance. In contrast, a law that provides unemployment benefits only to people over six feet tall would clearly fail the rational basis test because it could not further any legitimate government objective.

Privacy Rights

The U.S. Constitution does not explicitly mention a general right to privacy. In a 1928 Supreme Court case, Olmstead v. United States,⁴¹ Justice Louis Brandeis stated in his dissent that the right to privacy is “the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men.” The majority of the justices at that time did not agree, and it was not until the 1960s that a majority on the Supreme Court endorsed the view that the Constitution protects individual privacy rights. In a landmark 1965 case, Griswold v. Connecticut,⁴² the Supreme Court held that a constitutional right to privacy was implied by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments.

Federal Statutes Affecting Privacy Rights

In the last several decades, Congress has enacted a number of statutes that protect the privacy of individuals in various areas of concern. In the 1960s, Americans were sufficiently alarmed by the accumulation of personal information in government files that they pressured Congress to pass laws permitting individuals to access their files. Congress responded in 1966 with the Freedom of Information Act, which allows any person to request copies of any information on her or him contained in federal government files. In 1974, Congress passed the Privacy Act, which also gives persons the right to access such information. Since then, Congress has passed numerous other laws protecting individuals’ privacy rights with respect to financial transactions, electronic communications, and other activities in which personal information may be gathered and stored by organizations.

Medical Information Responding to the growing need to protect the privacy of individuals’ health records—particularly computerized records—Congress passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA) of 1996.⁴³ This act, which took effect on April 14, 2003, defines and limits the circumstances in which an individual’s “protected health information” may be used or disclosed.

The HIPAA requires health-care providers and health-care plans, including certain employers who sponsor health plans, to inform patients of their privacy rights and of how their personal medical information may be used. The act also states that a person’s medical records generally may not be used for purposes unrelated to health care—such as marketing, for example—or disclosed to others without the individual’s permission. Covered entities must formulate written privacy policies, designate privacy officials, limit access to computerized health data, physically secure medical records with lock and key, train employees and volunteers on their privacy policies, and sanction those who violate the policies. These protections are intended to assure individuals that their health information, including genetic information, will be properly protected and not used for purposes that the patient did not know about or authorize.

The Patriot Act In the wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, Congress passed legislation often referred to as the USA Patriot Act.⁴⁴ The Patriot Act has given government officials increased authority 43. The HIPAA was enacted as Pub. L. No. 104-191 (1996) and is codified in 29 U.S.C.A. Sections 1181 et seq.

44. Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001, also known as the USA Patriot Act, was enacted as Pub. L. No. 107-56 (2001) and extended in early 2006 by Pub. L. No. 109-173 (2006).

41. 277 U.S. 438, 48 S.Ct. 564, 72 L.Ed. 944 (1928).

42. 381 U.S. 479, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965).

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

to monitor Internet activities (such as e-mail and Web site visits) and to gain access to personal financial information and student information. Law enforcement officials can now track a person's telephone and e-mail communications to find out the identity of the other party or parties. The government must certify that the information likely to be obtained by such monitoring is relevant to an ongoing criminal investigation but does not need to provide proof of any wrongdoing to gain access to this information.⁴⁵ Privacy advocates argue that this law adversely affects the constitutional rights of all Americans, and it has been widely criticized in the media, fueling a public debate over how to secure privacy rights in an electronic age.

Other Laws Affecting Privacy

State constitutions and statutes also protect individuals' privacy rights, often to a significant degree. Privacy rights are also protected under tort law (see Chapter 6). Additionally, the Federal Trade Commission has played an active role in protecting the privacy rights of online consumers (see Chapter 44). The protection of employees' privacy rights, particularly with respect to electronic monitoring practices, is an area of growing concern (see Chapter 33).

45. See, for example, a case in which a federal appeals court upheld the government's warrantless monitoring of electronic communications. American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 493 F3d 644 (6th Cir. 2007).

REVIEWING Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

A state legislature enacted a statute that required any motorcycle operator or passenger on the state's highways to wear a protective helmet. Jim Alderman, a licensed motorcycle operator, sued the state to block enforcement of the law. Alderman asserted that the statute violated the equal protection clause because it placed requirements on motorcyclists that were not imposed on other motorists. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Why does this statute raise equal protection issues instead of substantive due process concerns?
2. What are the three levels of scrutiny that the courts use in determining whether a law violates the equal protection clause?
3. Which standard of scrutiny, or test, would apply to this situation? Why?
4. Applying this standard, or test, is the helmet statute constitutional? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

Bill of Rights 83

checks and balances 79

commerce clause 79

due process clause 92 equal protection clause 93 establishment clause 90

federal form of government 77

filtering software 90

free exercise clause 90 full faith and credit clause 78

meta tags 90

police powers 77

preemption 82

privileges and immunities clause 78 probable cause 91

search warrant 91

supremacy clause 82

symbolic speech 85

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

4-1. A Georgia state law requires the use of contoured rear-fender mudguards on trucks and trailers operating within Georgia state lines. The statute further makes it illegal for trucks and trailers to use straight mudguards. In approximately thirty-five other states, straight mudguards are legal. Moreover, in Florida, straight mudguards are explicitly required by law. There is some evidence suggesting that contoured mudguards might be a little safer than straight mudguards. Discuss whether this Georgia statute violates any constitutional provisions.

4-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Thomas worked in the nonmilitary operations of a large firm that produced both military and nonmilitary goods. When the company discontinued the production of nonmilitary goods, Thomas was transferred to a plant producing military equipment. Thomas left his job, claiming that it violated his religious principles to participate in the manufacture of goods to be used in destroying life. In effect, he argued, the transfer to the military equipment plant forced him to quit his job. He was denied unemployment compensation by the state because he had not been effectively “discharged” by the employer but had voluntarily terminated his employment. Did the state’s denial of unemployment benefits to Thomas violate the free exercise clause of the First Amendment? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 4-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

4-3. A business has a backlog of orders, and to meet its deadlines, management decides to run the firm seven days a week, eight hours a day. One of the employees, Abe Placer, refuses to work on Saturday on religious grounds. His refusal to work means that the firm may not meet its production deadlines and may therefore suffer a loss of future business. The firm fires Placer and replaces him with an employee who is willing to work seven days a week. Placer claims that by terminating his employment, his employer has violated his constitutional right to the free exercise of his religion. Do you agree? Why or why not?

4-4. The framers of the U.S. Constitution feared the twin evils of tyranny and anarchy. Discuss how specific provisions of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights reflect these fears and protect against both of these extremes.

4-5. Freedom of Speech. Henry Mishkoff is a Web designer whose firm does business as “Webfeats.” When Taubman Co. began building a mall called “The Shops at Willow Bend” near Mishkoff’s home, Mishkoff registered the domain name “shopsatwillowbend.com” and created a Web site with that address. The site featured information about the mall, a disclaimer indicating that Mishkoff’s site was unofficial, and a link to the mall’s official site. Taubman discovered Mishkoff’s site and filed a suit in a federal district court against him. Mishkoff then registered other various names, including “taubmansucks.com,” with links to a site documenting his battle with Taubman. (A Web name with a “sucks.com” moniker attached to it is known as a complaint name, and the process of registering and using such names is known as cybergripping.) Taubman asked the court to order Mishkoff to stop using all of these names. Should the court grant Taubman’s request? On what basis might the court protect Mishkoff’s use of the names? [Taubman Co. v. Webfeats, 319 F3d 770 (6th Cir.2003)]

4-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

To protect the privacy of individuals identified in information systems maintained by federal agencies, the Privacy Act of 1974 regulates the use of the information. The statute provides for a minimum award of $1,000 for “actual damages sustained” caused by “intentional or willful actions” to the “person entitled to recovery.” Buck Doe filed for certain disability benefits with an office of the U.S. Department of Labor (DOL). The application form asked for Doe’s Social Security number, which the DOL used to identify his claim on documents sent to groups of claimants, their employers, and the lawyers involved in their cases. This disclosed Doe’s Social Security number beyond the limits set by the Privacy Act. Doe filed a suit in a federal district court against the DOL, alleging that he was “torn . . . all to pieces” and “greatly concerned and worried” because of the disclosure of his Social Security number and its potentially “devastating” consequences. He did not offer any proof of actual injury, however. Should damages be awarded in such circumstances solely on the basis of the agency’s conduct, or should proof of some actual injury be required? Why? [Doe v. Chao, 540 U.S. 614, 124 S.Ct. 1204, 157 L.Ed.2d 1122 (2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 4-6, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 4,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

4-7. Due Process. In 1994, the Board of County Commissioners of Yellowstone County, Montana, created Zoning District 17 in a rural area of the county and a planning and zoning commission for the district. The commission adopted zoning regulations, which provided, among other things, that “dwelling units” could be built only through “on-site construction.” Later, county officials were unable to identify any health or safety concerns that were addressed by requiring on-site construction. There was no evidence that homes built off-site would negatively affect property values or cause harm to any other general welfare interest of the community. In December 1999, Francis and Anita Yurczyk bought two forty-acre tracts in District 17. The Yurczyks also bought a modular home and moved it onto the property the following spring. Within days, the county advised the Yurczyks that the home violated the on-site construction regulation and would have to be removed. The Yurczyks filed a suit in a Montana state court against the county, alleging, among other things, that the zoning regulation violated their due process rights. Does the Yurczyks' claim relate to procedural or substantive due process rights? What standard would the court apply to determine whether the regulation is constitutional? How should the court rule? Explain. [Yurczyk v. Yellowstone County, 2004 MT 3, 319 Mont. 169, 83 P.3d 266 (2004)]

CHAPTER 4 Constitutional Authority to Regulate Business

4-8. Supremacy Clause. The Federal Communications Act of 1934 grants the right to govern all interstate telecommunications to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) and the right to regulate all intrastate telecommunications to the states. The federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991, the Junk Fax Protection Act of 2005, and FCC rules permit a party to send unsolicited fax ads to recipients with whom the party has an "established business relationship" if those ads include an "opt-out" alternative. Section 17538.43 of California's Business and Professions Code (known as "SB 833") was enacted in 2005 to provide the citizens of California with greater protection than that afforded under federal law. SB 833 omits the "established business relationship" exception and requires a sender to obtain a recipient's express consent (an "opt-in" provision) before faxing an ad to that party into or out of California. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States filed a suit against Bill Lockyer, California's state attorney general, seeking to block the enforcement of SB 833. What principles support the plaintiff's position? How should the court resolve the issue? Explain. [Chamber of Commerce of the United States v. Lockyer, 463 F.3d 1076 (E.D.Cal. 2006)]

4-9. Freedom of Speech. For decades, New York City has had to deal with the vandalism and defacement of public property caused by unauthorized graffiti. Among other attempts to stop the damage, in December 2005 the city banned the sale of aerosol spray-paint cans and broad-tipped indelible markers to persons under twenty-one years of age and prohibited them from possessing such items on property other than their own. By May 1, 2006, five people—all under age twenty-one—had been cited for violations of these regulations, while 871 individuals had been arrested for actually making graffiti. Artists who wished to create graffiti on legal surfaces, such as canvas, wood, and clothing, included college student Lindsey Vincenty, who was studying visual arts. Unable to buy her supplies in the city or to carry them in the city if she bought them elsewhere, Vincenty and others filed a suit in a federal district court on behalf of themselves and other young artists against Michael Bloomberg, the city's mayor, and others. The plaintiffs claimed that, among other things, the new rules violated their right to freedom of speech. They asked the court to enjoin the enforcement of the rules. Should the court grant this request? Why or why not? [Vincenty v. Bloomberg, 476 F.3d 74 (2d Cir. 2007)]

4-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Aric Toll owns and manages the Balboa Island Village Inn, a restaurant and bar in Newport Beach, California. Anne Lemen owns the "Island Cottage," a residence across an alley from the Inn. Lemen often complained to the authorities about excessive noise and the behavior of the Inn's customers, whom she called "drunks" and "whores." Lemen referred to Theresa Toll, Aric's wife, as "Madam Whore." Lemen told the Inn's bartender Ewa Cook that Cook "worked for Satan," was "Satan's wife," and was "going to have Satan's children." She told the Inn's neighbors that it was "a whorehouse" with "prostitution going on inside" and that it sold illegal drugs, sold alcohol to minors, made "sex videos," was involved in child pornography, had "Mafia connections," encouraged "lesbian activity," and stayed open until 6:00 A.M. Lemen also voiced her complaints to potential customers, and the Inn's sales dropped more than 20 percent. The Inn filed a suit in a California state court against Lemen, asserting defamation and other claims. [Balboa Island Village Inn, Inc. v. Lemen, 40 Cal.4th 1141, 156 P.3d 339 (2007)]

- Are Lemen's statements about the Inn's owners, customers, and activities protected by the U.S. Constitution? Should such statements be protected? In whose favor should the court rule? Why?
- Did Lemen behave unethically in the circumstances of this case? Explain.

4-11. SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS

Go to Case 4.3, Lott v. Levitt, 469 F.Supp.2d 575 (N.D.Ill. 2007), on pages 88–89. Read the excerpt and answer the following questions.

- Issue: At the center of the dispute in this case was a distinction between which types of speech?
- Rule of Law: What difference does it make which type of speech a particular statement is?
- Applying the Rule of Law: How does a court determine which type of speech a certain statement comprises?
- Conclusion: In this case, how was the speech at issue classified and why? What effect did that decision have on the parties' suit?

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For an online version of the Constitution that provides hypertext links to amendments and other changes, as well as the history of the document, go to www.constitutioncenter.org

An ongoing debate in the United States is whether the national government exercises too much regulatory control over intrastate affairs. To find current articles on this topic, go to www.vote-smart.org/issues/FEDERALISM_STATES_RIGHTS

For discussions of current issues involving the rights and liberties contained in the Bill of Rights, go to the Web site of the American Civil Liberties Union at www.aclu.org

For a menu of selected constitutional law decisions by the United States Supreme Court, go to the Web site of Cornell Law School's Legal Information Institute at www.law.cornell.edu/supct/cases/conlaw.htm

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 4" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 4-1: Legal Perspective
Commercial Speech

Internet Exercise 4-2: Management Perspective
Privacy Rights in Cyberspace

CHAPTER 5

Ethics and Business Decision Making

All of the following businesspersons have been in the news recently:

- Dennis Kozlowski (former chairman and chief executive officer of Tyco International).
- Mark H. Swartz (former chief financial officer of Tyco International).
- Jeffrey Skilling (former chief executive officer of Enron Corporation).
- Bernard Ebbers (former chief executive officer of WorldCom).

What do these individuals have in common? They are all in prison, and some may stay there until they die. They were all convicted of various crimes ranging from overseeing revenue exaggeration in order to increase stock prices to personal use of millions of dollars of public company funds. Not only did they break the law, but they also clearly violated even the minimum ethical principles that a civil society expects to be followed. Other officers and directors of the companies mentioned in the above list cost shareholders billions of dollars. In the case of those companies that had to enter bankruptcy, such as Enron Corporation, tens of thousands of employees lost their jobs.

Acting ethically in a business context is not child's play; it can mean billions of dollars—up or down—for corporations, shareholders, and employees. In the wake of the recent scandals, Congress attempted to prevent similar unethical business behavior in the future by passing stricter legislation in the form of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, which will be explained in detail in Chapters 41 and 51. This act generally imposed more reporting requirements on corporations in an effort to deter unethical behavior and encourage accountability.

Business Ethics

As you might imagine, business ethics is derived from the concept of ethics. Ethics can be defined as the study of what constitutes right or wrong behavior. It is a branch of philosophy focusing on morality and the way moral principles are derived. Ethics has to do with the fairness, justness, rightness, or wrongness of an action.

What Is Business Ethics?

Business ethics focuses on what is right and wrong behavior in the business world. It has to do with how businesses apply moral and ethical principles to situations that arise in the workplace. Because business decision makers must often address more complex ethical issues in the workplace than they face in their personal lives, business ethics is more complicated than personal ethics.

Why Is Business Ethics Important?

For an answer to the question, why is business ethics so important? reread the list at the beginning of this chapter. All of the individuals who are sitting behind bars could have avoided their fates. Had they engaged in ethical decision making throughout their business careers, they would never have followed their different paths to criminal behavior. The corporations, shareholders, and employees who suffered because of those individuals' unethical and criminal behavior certainly paid a high price. Thus, an in-depth understanding of business ethics is important to the long-run viability of any corporation today. It is also important to the well-being of individual officers and directors and to the firm's employees. Finally, unethical corporate decision making can negatively affect suppliers, consumers, the community, and society as a whole.

At the end of every unit in this book, you will be exposed to a series of ethical issues in features called Focus on Ethics. In each of these unit-ending features, we expand on the concepts of business ethics that we present in this chapter.

Common Reasons Why Ethical Problems Occur

Not that many years ago, the popular painkiller Vioxx was recalled because its long-term use increased the risk of heart attack and stroke. Little by little, evidence surfaced that the drug's maker, Merck & Company, knew about these dangers yet allowed Vioxx to remain on the market. Merck's failure to recall the drug earlier could potentially have adversely affected the health of thousands of patients. Now Merck faces hundreds of lawsuits and years of litigation and millions of dollars in lawyers' fees and settlements. In addition, Merck has undergone investigations by both Congress and the U.S. Department of Justice. How did a major corporation manage to make so many missteps? The answer is simply that certain officers and employees of Merck felt that it was not necessary to reveal the results of studies that might have decreased sales of Vioxx.

In other words, the common thread among the ethical problems that occur in business is the desire to increase sales (or not lose them), thereby increasing profits and, for the corporation, increasing market value. In most situations, though, ethically wrong behavior by a corporation turns out to be costly to everyone concerned. Just ask the shareholders of Merck (and, of course, Enron, WorldCom, and Tyco).

Short-Run Profit Maximization Some people argue that a corporation's only goal should be profit maximization, which will be reflected in a higher market value. When all firms strictly adhere to the goal of profit maximization, resources tend to flow to where they are most highly valued by society. Ultimately, profit maximization, in theory, leads to the most efficient allocation of scarce resources.

Corporate executives and employees have to distinguish, though, between short-run and long-run profit maximization. In the short run, the employees of Merck & Company may have increased profits because of the continuing sales of Vioxx. In the long run, though, because of lawsuits, large settlements, and bad publicity, profits have suffered. Thus, business ethics is consistent only with long-run profit maximization.

Determining Society's Rules—The Role of Corporate Influence

Another possible cause of bad business ethics has to do with corporations' role in influencing the law. Corporations may use lobbyists to persuade government agencies not to institute new regulations that would increase the corporations' costs and reduce their profits. Once regulatory rules are promulgated, corporations may undertake actions to reduce their impact. One way to do this is to make it known that members of regulatory agencies will always have jobs waiting for them when they leave the agencies. This revolving door, as it is commonly called, has existed as long as there have been regulatory agencies at the state and federal levels of government.

The Importance of Ethical Leadership

Talking about ethical business decision making is meaningless if management does not set standards. Furthermore, managers must apply the same standards to themselves as they do to the employees of the company.

Attitude of Top Management One of the most important ways to create and maintain an ethical workplace is for top management to demonstrate its commitment to ethical decision making. A manager who is not totally committed to an ethical workplace rarely succeeds in creating one. Management's behavior, more than anything else, sets the ethical tone of a firm. Employees take their cues from management. For example, an employee who observes a manager cheating on her expense account quickly learns that such behavior is acceptable.

Managers who set unrealistic production or sales goals increase the probability that employees will act unethically. If a sales quota can be met only through high-pressure, unethical sales tactics, employees will try to act "in the best interest of the company" and will continue to behave unethically.

A manager who looks the other way when she or he knows about an employee's unethical behavior also sets an example—one indicating that ethical transgressions will be accepted. Managers have found that discharging even one employee for ethical reasons has a tremendous impact as a deterrent to unethical behavior in the workplace.

Behavior of Owners and Managers

Business owners and managers sometimes take more active roles in fostering unethical and illegal conduct. This may indicate to their co-owners, co-managers, employees, and others that unethical business behavior will be tolerated. The following case illustrates how business owners' misbehavior can have negative consequences for themselves and their business. Not only can a court sanction the business owners and managers, but it can also issue an injunction that prevents them from engaging in similar patterns of conduct in the future.

EXTENDED Case 5.1 Baum v. Blue Moon Ventures, LLC

United States Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, 2008. __ F.3d __.

DeMOSS, Circuit Judge:

* * * *

Douglas Baum purports to run an asset recovery business. He researches various unclaimed funds, tries to locate the rightful owner, and then gets paid either with a finder's fee or by taking an assignment [a right to payment of some or all of the funds]. * * * Douglas Baum acts in concert with his brother, Brian Baum, and his father, Sheldon Baum ("the Baums").

In September 2002, the Baums [became involved in] a federal district court case * * * by recruiting investors—through misrepresentation—to sue a receiver [a court-appointed person who oversees a business firm's affairs], the receiver's attorney, other investors, and those investors' attorneys. The district court * * * determined that the Baums' pleadings were "gratuitous, malicious attacks with legal propositions that were wholly disconnected from the facts of the defendants' behavior." The district court admonished the Baums for wrongfully interfering in the case, wrongfully holding themselves out to be attorneys licensed to practice in Texas, lying to the parties and the court, and for generally abusing the judicial system. The district court stated:

This case is an example of guerilla warfare through litigation. The Baums brought this suit to satisfy their illusion of hidden funds or to extort deals for their other clients. These claims were fraudulent. Once instituted, the Baums maintained them with singular ineptitude. When asked to explain their case—or anything else—Brian and Sheldon Baum did not tell the truth.

The Baums have wasted the time and money of the defendants and the scarce resources that the taxpayers entrust to the judiciary. They have flouted the authority of this court—an authority they invoked. They have no concept of the purpose and function of the courts. * * *

The district court sanctioned both Brian and Sheldon Baum to ten days in jail and ordered them to pay $100,000 in attorney's fees to the defendants. The court also issued a permanent * * * injunction against all three Baums [to prohibit them from filing claims related to the same case in Texas state courts without the permission of Judge Lynn Hughes, the district court judge].

* * * *

* * * [I]n June 2005, the Baums entered an appearance in another bankruptcy case [a proceeding to ensure equitable treatment to creditors competing for a debtor's assets]. * * * Danny Hilal owned and operated several limited liability companies, including Appellee, Blue Moon Ventures, L.L.C. Blue Moon's primary business was purchasing real property at foreclosure sales and leasing those properties to residential tenants. * * *

Sheldon Baum claimed to be a * * * creditor in the Hilal case, but he would not identify his claim. Brian Baum was again misleading the parties and the court as to being a licensed attorney in Texas, and Douglas Baum participated in the scheme by posting a fake notice [that the Internal Revenue Service might foreclose on Hilal's property to collect unpaid taxes].

* * * *

* * * [The bankruptcy court concluded that this was] a continuation of a pattern of conduct identified by [the district court that was] materially misleading to creditors and parties in interest in this case. * * * [The bankruptcy court forwarded a memo on the case to the district court that had imposed the sanctions on the Baums.]

* * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 5.1 CONTINUED

The [district] court conducted two three-hour hearings in which the Baums all testified, as well as counsel for the Appellees (collectively referred to as “Blue Moon”). The court concluded that the Baums had continued in their abusive * * * practices, and thus a modification of the * * * [i]njunction was necessary. [The court expanded the injunction to include the filing of any claim in any federal or state court or agency in Texas.]

Douglas refused to agree to any modification of the * * * [i]njunction on the grounds that it would impede his business. * * * Douglas Baum filed a timely notice of appeal [to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit].

* * * *

* * * Douglas Baum argues that the district court lacked jurisdiction to * * * modify the pre-filing injunction. We disagree.

A district court has jurisdiction to impose a pre-filing injunction to deter vexatious [intended to annoy], abusive, and harassing litigation. * * *

* * * *

* * * Federal courts have both the inherent power and the constitutional obligation to protect their jurisdiction from conduct [that] impairs their ability to carry out [their] functions. If such power did not exist, or if its exercise were somehow dependent upon the actions of another branch of government or upon the entitlement of a private party to injunctive relief, the independence and constitutional role of [the] courts would be endangered. Because the district court has jurisdiction to * * * impose a pre-filing injunction to deter vexatious filings, it also has jurisdiction to * * * modify an existing permanent injunction to accomplish the same goal. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Modification of an injunction is appropriate when the legal or factual circumstances justifying the injunction have changed.

Federal courts have the power to enjoin [prevent] plaintiffs from future filings when those plaintiffs consistently abuse the court system and harass their opponents. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The district court could consider Baum’s conduct in the state court proceedings in determining whether his conduct before the bankruptcy court was undertaken in bad faith or for an improper motive. Limiting the injunction to any particular defendants did not stop Baum from repeating his pattern of abusive litigation practices; therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in determining that a broader injunction is necessary to protect both the court and future parties. * * *

* * * *

* * * Baum argues that the district court abused its discretion in extending the injunction to prohibit Baum from filing any claims in state courts or agencies. * * *

* * * *

* * * [A] district court’s pre-filing injunction may extend to filings in lower federal courts within the circuit that the issuing court is located, * * * a district court’s pre-filing injunction may not extend to filings in any federal appellate court, and * * * a district court’s pre-filing injunction may not extend to filings in any state court. Based on the facts of this case, we find that the district court abused its discretion in extending the pre-filing injunction to filings in state courts, state agencies, and this Court. * * * [T]hose courts or agencies are capable of taking appropriate action on their own. We uphold those provisions of the pre-filing injunction that prevent Douglas Baum from filing claims in federal bankruptcy courts, federal district courts, and federal agencies in the state of Texas without the express written permission of Judge Hughes.

QUESTIONS

1. Would there be any way in which the Baums could have operated their business ethically? Explain.
2. Are there situations in which a business owner’s conduct would be more reprehensible than the Baums’ behavior in this case? Explain.

Approaches to Ethical Reasoning

Each individual, when faced with a particular ethical dilemma, engages in ethical reasoning—that is, a reasoning process in which the individual examines the situation at hand in light of his or her moral convictions or ethical standards. Businesspersons do likewise when making decisions with ethical implications.

How do business decision makers decide whether a given action is the “right” one for their firms? What ethical standards should be applied? Broadly speaking, ethical reasoning relating to business traditionally has been characterized by two fundamental approaches. One approach defines ethical behavior in terms of duty, which also implies certain rights. The other approach determines what is ethical in terms of the consequences, or outcome, of any given action. We examine each of these approaches here.

In addition to the two basic ethical approaches, a few theories have been developed that specifically address the social responsibility of corporations. Because these theories also influence today’s business decision makers, we conclude this section with a short discussion of the different views of corporate social responsibility.

Duty-Based Ethics

Duty-based ethical standards often are derived from revealed truths, such as religious precepts. They can also be derived through philosophical reasoning.

Religious Ethical Standards In the Judeo-Christian tradition, which is the dominant religious tradition in the United States, the Ten Commandments of the Old Testament establish fundamental rules for moral action. Other religions have their own sources of revealed truth. Religious rules generally are absolute with respect to the behavior of their adherents. For example, the commandment “Thou shalt not steal” is an absolute mandate for a person who believes that the Ten Commandments reflect revealed truth. Even a benevolent motive for stealing (such as Robin Hood’s) cannot justify the act because the act itself is inherently immoral and thus wrong.

Kantian Ethics Duty-based ethical standards may also be derived solely from philosophical reasoning. The German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), for example, identified some general guiding principles for moral behavior based on what he believed to be the fundamental nature of human beings. Kant believed that human beings are qualitatively different from other physical objects and are endowed with moral integrity and the capacity to reason and conduct their affairs rationally. Therefore, a person’s thoughts and actions should be respected. When human beings are treated merely as a means to an end, they are being treated as the equivalent of objects and are being denied their basic humanity.

A central theme in Kantian ethics is that individuals should evaluate their actions in light of the consequences that would follow if everyone in society acted in the same way. This categorical imperative can be applied to any action. For example, suppose that you are deciding whether to cheat on an examination. If you have adopted Kant’s categorical imperative, you will decide not to cheat because if everyone cheated, the examination (and the entire education system) would be meaningless.

The Principle of Rights Because a duty cannot exist without a corresponding right, duty-based ethical standards imply that human beings have basic rights. The principle that human beings have certain fundamental rights (to life, freedom, and the pursuit of happiness, for example) is deeply embedded in Western culture. As discussed in Chapter 1, the natural law tradition embraces the concept that certain actions (such as killing another person) are morally wrong because they are contrary to nature (the natural desire to continue living). Those who adhere to this principle of rights, or “rights theory,” believe that a key factor in determining whether a business decision is ethical is how that decision affects the rights of others. These others include the firm’s owners, its employees, the consumers of its products or services, its suppliers, the community in which it does business, and society as a whole.

A potential dilemma for those who support rights theory, however, is that they may disagree on which rights are most important. When considering all those affected by a business decision, for example, how much weight should be given to employees relative to shareholders, customers relative to the community, or employees relative to society as a whole?

In general, rights theorists believe that whichever right is stronger in a particular circumstance takes precedence. Suppose that a firm can either keep a plant open, saving the jobs of twelve workers, or shut the plant down and avoid contaminating a river with pollutants that would endanger the health of thousands of people. In this situation, a rights theorist can easily choose which group to favor. (Not all choices are so clear-cut, however.)

Outcome-Based Ethics: Utilitarianism

“The greatest good for the greatest number” is a paraphrase of the major premise of the utilitarian approach to ethics. Utilitarianism is a philosophical theory developed by Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832) and modified by John Stuart Mill (1806–1873)—both British philosophers. In contrast to duty-based ethics, utilitarianism is outcome oriented. It focuses on the consequences of an action, not on the nature of the action itself or on any set of preestablished moral values or religious beliefs.

Under a utilitarian model of ethics, an action is morally correct, or “right,” when, among the people it affects, it produces the greatest amount of good for the greatest number. When an action affects the majority adversely, it is morally wrong. Applying the utilitarian theory thus requires (1) a determination of which individuals will be affected by the action in question; (2) a cost-benefit analysis, which involves an assessment of the negative and positive effects of alternative actions on these individuals; and (3) a choice among alternative actions that will produce maximum societal utility (the greatest positive net benefits for the greatest number of individuals).

Corporate Social Responsibility

For many years, groups concerned with civil rights, employee safety and welfare, consumer protection, environmental preservation, and other causes have pressured corporate America to behave in a responsible manner with respect to these causes. Thus was born the concept of corporate social responsibility—the idea that those who run corporations can and should act ethically and be accountable to society for their actions. Just what constitutes corporate social responsibility has been debated for some time, however, and there are a number of different theories today.

Stakeholder Approach One view of corporate social responsibility stresses that corporations have a duty not just to shareholders, but also to other groups affected by corporate decisions (“stakeholders”). Under this approach, a corporation would consider the impact of its decision on the firm’s employees, customers, creditors, suppliers, and the community in which the corporation operates. The reasoning behind this “stakeholder view” is that in some circumstances, one or more of these other groups may have a greater stake in company decisions than the shareholders do. Although this may be true, it is often difficult to decide which group’s interests should receive greater weight if the interests conflict (see the discussion of conflicting rights on page 103).

Corporate Citizenship Another theory of social responsibility argues that corporations should behave as good citizens by promoting goals that society deems worthwhile and taking positive steps toward solving social problems. The idea is that because business controls so much of the wealth and power of this country, business in turn has a responsibility to society to use that wealth and power in socially beneficial ways. Under a corporate citizenship view, companies are judged on how much they donate to social causes, as well as how they conduct their operations with respect to employment discrimination, human rights, environmental concerns, and similar issues.

In the following case, a corporation’s board of directors did not seem to doubt the priority of the firm’s responsibilities. Focused solely on the profits delivered into the hands of the shareholders, the board failed to check the actions of the firm’s chief executive officer (CEO) and, in fact, appeared to condone the CEO’s misconduct. If the board had applied a different set of priorities, the shareholders might have been in a better financial position, however. A regulatory agency soon found the situation “troubling” and imposed a restriction on the firm. The board protested. The protest reminded the court of “the old saw about the child who murders his parents and then asks for mercy because he is an orphan.”

CASE 5.2 Fog Cutter Capital Group, Inc. v. Securities and Exchange Commission

United States Court of Appeals, District of Columbia Circuit, 2007. 474 F.3d 822.

- Background and Facts The National Association of Securities Dealers (NASD) operates the Nasdaq, an electronic securities exchange, on which Fog Cutter Capital Group was listed.^a Andrew

a. Securities (stocks and bonds) can be bought and sold through national exchanges. Whether a security is listed on an exchange is subject to the discretion of the organization that operates it. The Securities and Exchange Commission oversees the securities exchanges.

CASE 5.2 CONTINUED

Wiederhorn had founded Fog Cutter in 1997 to manage a restaurant chain and make other investments. With family members, Wiederhorn controlled more than 50 percent of Fog Cutter's stock. The firm agreed that if Wiederhorn was terminated "for cause," he was entitled only to his salary through the date of termination. If terminated "without cause," he would be owed three times his $350,000 annual salary, three times his largest annual bonus from the previous three years, and any unpaid salary and bonus. "Cause" included the conviction of a felony. In 2001, Wiederhorn became the target of an investigation into the collapse of Capital Consultants, LLC. Fog Cutter then redefined "cause" in his termination agreement to cover only a felony involving Fog Cutter. In June 2004, Wiederhorn agreed to plead guilty to two felonies, serve eighteen months in prison, pay a $25,000 fine, and pay $2 million to Capital Consultants. The day before he entered his plea, Fog Cutter agreed that while he was in prison, he would keep his title, responsibilities, salary, bonuses, and other benefits. It also agreed to a $2 million "leave of absence payment." In July, the NASD delisted Fog Cutter from the Nasdaq. Fog Cutter appealed this decision to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), which dismissed the appeal. Fog Cutter petitioned the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit for review.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
RANDOLPH, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Fog Cutter's main complaint is that the Commission failed to take into account the company's sound business reasons for acting as it did. The decision to enter into the leave-of-absence agreement was, Fog Cutter argues, in the best interest of its shareholders. The company tells us that Wiederhorn's continuing commitment to the company and his return to an active role in the company after his incarceration were essential to preserving Fog Cutter's core business units.

* * * *

* * * Fog Cutter made a deal with Wiederhorn that cost the company $4.75 million in a year in which it reported a $3.93 million net loss. We know as well that Fog Cutter handed Wiederhorn a $2 million bonus right before he went off to prison, a bonus stemming directly from the consequences of Wiederhorn's criminal activity.

* * * *

Here there was ample evidence supporting the NASD's grounds for taking action against Fog Cutter: Wiederhorn's guilty plea, the leave-of-absence deal and its cost to the company, the Board's determination that Wiederhorn should retain his positions with Fog Cutter, and the concern that Wiederhorn would continue to exert influence on company affairs even while he was in prison. The decision was in accordance with NASD rules giving the organization broad discretion to determine whether the public interest requires delisting securities in light of events at a company. That rule is obviously consistent with the [law], and NASD's decision did not burden competition. [Emphasis added.]

Fog Cutter claims that it had to pay Wiederhorn and retain him because if it fired him in light of his guilty plea, it would have owed him $6 million. This scarcely speaks well for the company's case. The potential obligation is a result of an amendment the Board granted Wiederhorn in 2003 while he was under investigation. * * * Before the amendment to Wiederhorn's employment agreement in 2003, termination "for cause" included the conviction of any felony other than a traffic offense. In the 2003 amendment, the relevant provision allowed the Board to terminate Wiederhorn "for cause" upon conviction of a felony involving Fog Cutter. The Board had known about the investigation of Wiederhorn in connection with Capital Consultants for more than two years when it agreed to this amendment.

Fog Cutter thinks NASD's action was "unfair." But it was the company that bowed to Wiederhorn's demand for an amendment to his employment agreement, knowing full well that it was dramatically increasing the cost of firing him. Now it argues that terminating Wiederhorn would have been too expensive. One is reminded of the old saw about the child who murders his parents and then asks for mercy because he is an orphan. The makeup of Fog Cutter's Board was virtually unchanged between the time it amended the employment agreement and entered into the leave-of-absence agreement. It was, to say the least, not arbitrary or capricious for the Commission to find that Wiederhorn exercised thorough control over the Board, and to find this troubling. We agree that the Board provided little or no check on Wiederhorn's conduct, and that the Board's actions only aggravated the concerns Wiederhorn's conviction and imprisonment raised.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 5.2 CONTINUED

That Fog Cutter did not itself violate the [law] and that it disclosed the relevant events does not demonstrate any error in the delisting decision. The NASD's rules state that it may apply criteria more stringent than the minimum [legal] standards for listing. Fog Cutter's disclosure of its arrangements with Wiederhorn did not change the nature of those arrangements, which is what led the NASD to find that the company's actions were contrary to the public interest and a threat to public confidence in the Nasdaq exchange.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit denied Fog Cutter's petition for review of the SEC's decision. The NASD was concerned with "the integrity and the public's perception of the Nasdaq exchange" in light of Wiederhorn's legal troubles and the Fog Cutter board's acquiescence to his demands. The SEC "amply supported these concerns and was well within its authority to dismiss Fog Cutter's" appeal.

● The Ethical Dimension Should more consideration have been given to the fact that Fog Cutter was not convicted of a violation of the law? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension What does the decision in this case suggest to foreign investors who may be considering investments in securities listed on U.S. exchanges?

Creating Ethical Codes of Conduct

One of the most effective ways to set a tone of ethical behavior within an organization is to create an ethical code of conduct. A well-written code of ethics explicitly states a company's ethical priorities and demonstrates the company's commitment to ethical behavior. The code should set forth guidelines for ethical conduct, establish procedures that employees can follow if they have questions or complaints, and inform employees why these ethics policies are important to the company. A well-written code might also provide appropriate examples to clarify what the company considers to be acceptable and unacceptable conduct.

Providing Ethics Training to Employees

For an ethical code to be effective, its provisions must be clearly communicated to employees. Most large companies have implemented ethics training programs in which management discusses with employees on a face-to-face basis the firm's policies and the importance of ethical conduct. Some firms hold periodic ethics seminars during which employees can openly discuss any ethical problems that they may be experiencing and learn how the firm's ethical policies apply to those specific problems. Smaller firms should also offer some form of ethics training to employees, because this is one factor that courts will consider if the firm is later accused of an ethics violation.

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act and Web-Based Reporting Systems

The Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002¹ requires that companies set up confidential systems so that employees and others can "raise red flags" about suspected illegal or unethical auditing and accounting practices. The act required publicly traded companies to have such systems in place by April 2003.

Some companies have created online reporting systems to accomplish this goal. In one such system, employees can click on an icon on their computers that anonymously links them with Ethicspoint, an organization based in Vancouver, Washington. Through Ethicspoint, employees can report suspicious accounting practices, sexual harassment, and other possibly unethical behavior. Ethicspoint, in turn, alerts management personnel or the audit committee at the designated company to the potential problem. Those who have used the system say that it is less inhibiting than calling a company's toll-free number.

How the Law Influences Business Ethics

Although business ethics and the law are closely related, they are not always identical. Here we examine some situations in which what is legal and what is ethical may not be the same.

1. Public Company Accounting Reform and Investor Protection Act (Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002), Pub. L. No. 107-204, 116 Stat. 745 (July 30, 2002). This act, which became effective on August 29, 2002, will be discussed in Chapters 41 and 51.

The Moral Minimum

Compliance with the law is normally regarded as the moral minimum—the minimum acceptable standard for ethical business behavior. In many corporate scandals, had most of the businesspersons involved simply followed the law, they would not have gotten into trouble. Note, though, that in the interest of preserving personal freedom, as well as for practical reasons, the law does not—and cannot—codify all ethical requirements. As they make business decisions, businesspersons must remember that just because an action is legal does not necessarily make it ethical. Look at Exhibit 5-1. Here, you see that there is an intersection between what is ethical and what is legal. Businesspersons should attempt to operate in the area where what is legal and what is ethical intersect.

Excessive Executive Pay As just mentioned, business behavior that is legal may still be unethical. Consider executive pay. There is no law that specifies what public corporations can pay their officers. Consequently, “executive-pay scandals” do not have to do with executives breaking the law. Rather, such scandals have to do with the ethical underpinnings of executive-pay scales that can exceed millions of dollars. Such high pay for executives may appear unethical when their companies are not making very high profits (or are even suffering losses) and their share prices are falling.

Even this subject, though, does not lend itself to a black-and-white ethical analysis. As with many other things, there is a market for executives that operates according to supply and demand. Sometimes, corporate boards decide to offer executives very large compensation packages in order either to entice them to come to work for the company or to keep them from leaving for another corporation. There is no simple formula for determining the ethical level of compensation for a given executive in a given company. If a law were passed that limited executive compensation to, say, twenty times the salary of the lowest-paid worker in the company, there would be fewer individuals willing to undergo the stress and long hours associated with running major companies.

EXHIBIT 5-1 • The Intersection of What Is Legal and What Is Ethical

Determining the Legality of a Given Action

It may seem that determining the legality of a given action should be simple. Either something is legal or it is not. In fact, one of the major challenges businesspersons face is that the legality of a particular action is not always clear. In part, this is because there are so many laws regulating business that it is increasingly possible to violate one of them without realizing it. The law also contains numerous “gray areas,” making it difficult to predict with certainty how a court will apply a given law to a particular action.

Determining whether a planned action is legal thus requires that decision makers keep abreast of the law. Normally, large business firms have attorneys on their staffs to assist them in making key decisions. Small firms must also seek legal advice before making important business decisions because the consequences of just one violation of a regulatory rule may be costly.

Ignorance of the law will not excuse a business owner or manager from liability for violating a statute or regulation. In one case, for example, the court imposed criminal fines, as well as imprisonment, on a company’s supervisory employee for violating a federal environmental act—even though the employee was completely unaware of what was required under the provisions of that act.²

The Law Cannot Control All Business Behavior

Congress, the regulatory agencies, and state and local governments do not have perfect knowledge. Often they only discover the negative impact of corporate activities after the fact. The same can be true of corporate executives. They do not always know the full impact of their actions. When asbestos was used for insulation, for example, the corporations that supplied it did not know that it was capable of causing a rare type of cancer.

At other times, though, the law is not ambiguous. Nevertheless, it may still be unable to control business behavior—at least initially.

Breaking the Law—Backdating Stock Options

Stock options are a device that potentially rewards hard work. Publicly held corporations offer

2. United States v. Hanousek, 176 F.3d 1116 (9th Cir. 1999).

stock options to employees at the current price of the company's stock on the day that the options are granted. If at a later time the market price of the stock has gone up, an employee can exercise the stock options and reap the difference between the price of the options and the current market price.

In 2006, and 2007, it was revealed that a number of large corporations had backdated stock options. If stock options are granted and the price of the company's stock subsequently falls or does not rise very much, the value of the stock options is essentially zero. One way around this problem is to go back and change the date on which the stock options were granted to the employee. In other words, the date of the stock options is simply moved back to a day when the stock had a lower price than it has currently, thereby making the options valuable again.

For example, Apple, Inc., awarded its founder and chief executive, Steve Jobs, 7.5 million options in December 2001. According to the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC), those options were subsequently backdated to October 19 of that year. The SEC further alleged that Apple's general counsel, Nancy Heinen, signed fictitious minutes stating that the board of directors had met and approved the grant on October 19. In actuality, the meeting never occurred.

As it turns out, backdated option grants are not illegal if companies follow accounting and SEC disclosure rules. As of the spring of 2007, 252 public companies had disclosed that they had undertaken internal investigations to discover if backdating had occurred without following proper procedures. The backdating scandal is another example of unethical behavior resulting in long-run profit reduction. The companies involved face more than 125 shareholder lawsuits and as many SEC investigations, plus fifty-eight Department of Justice investigations and even six criminal cases.

Misleading Regulators—The Case of OxyContin In 1996, the pharmaceutical company Purdue Pharma, LP, started marketing a “wonder” narcotic painkiller called OxyContin. This powerful, long-lasting drug provides pain relief for twelve hours. Just a few years after its introduction, Purdue Pharma's annual sales of the drug reached $1 billion.

The company's executives initially contended that OxyContin, because of its time-release formulation, posed no risk for serious abuse or addiction. Quickly, though, experienced drug abusers and even teenagers discovered that chewing on an OxyContin tablet or crushing one and snorting the powder produced a powerful high, comparable to that of heroin. By 2000, large parts of the United States were experiencing increases in addiction and crime related to OxyContin.

In reality, the company and three of its executives had fraudulently marketed OxyContin for over six years as a drug unlikely to lead to abuse. Internal company documents showed that even before OxyContin was marketed, executives recognized that if physicians knew that the drug could be abused and become addictive, they would be less likely to prescribe it. Consequently, the company simply kept the information secret.

On May 10, 2007, Purdue Pharma and three former executives pleaded guilty to criminal charges that they had misled regulators, patients, and physicians about OxyContin's risks of addiction. Purdue Pharma agreed to pay $600 million in fines and other payments. The three ex-executives agreed to pay $34.5 million in fines. Once again, company executives engaged in unethical reasoning because they wanted to maximize profits in the short run, rather than engaging in behavior that would lead to profit maximization in the long run.

“Gray Areas” in the Law

In many situations, business firms can predict with a fair amount of certainty whether a given action is legal. For instance, firing an employee solely because of that person's race or gender clearly violates federal laws prohibiting employment discrimination. In some situations, though, the legality of a particular action may be less clear.

For example, suppose that a firm decides to launch a new advertising campaign. How far can the firm go in making claims for its products or services? Federal and state laws prohibit firms from engaging in “deceptive advertising.” At the federal level, the test for deceptive advertising normally used by the Federal Trade Commission is whether an advertising claim would deceive a “reasonable consumer.”³ At what point, though, would a reasonable consumer be deceived by a particular ad?

In addition, many rules of law require a court to determine what is “foreseeable” or “reasonable” in a particular situation. Because a business has no way of predicting how a specific court will decide these issues, decision makers need to proceed with caution and evaluate an action and its consequences from an ethical perspective. The same problem often occurs in cases involving the Internet because it is often unclear how a court will apply existing laws in the context of cyberspace. Generally, if a company can demonstrate that it acted in good faith and responsibly in the circumstances, it has a better chance of successfully defending its action in court or before an administrative law judge.

3. See Chapter 44 for a discussion of the Federal Trade Commission's role in regulating deceptive trade practices, including misleading advertising.

The following case shows that businesses and their customers have different expectations with respect to the standard of care regarding the handling of personal information. The case also illustrates that the legal standards in this area may be inconsistent and vague.

C A S E 5.3 Guin v. Brazos Higher Education Service Corp.

United States District Court, District of Minnesota, 2006. __ F.Supp.2d __.

- Background and Facts Brazos Higher Education Service Corporation, which is based in Waco, Texas, makes and services student loans. Brazos issued a laptop computer to its employee John Wright, who worked from an office in his home in Silver Spring, Maryland, analyzing loan information. Wright used the laptop to store borrowers' personal information. In September 2004, Wright's home was burglarized and the laptop was stolen. Based on Federal Trade Commission (FTC) guidelines and California state law (which requires notice to all resident borrowers), Brazos sent a letter to all of its 550,000 customers. The letter stated that "some personal information associated with your student loan, including your name, address, Social Security number and loan balance, may have been inappropriately accessed by [a] third party." The letter urged borrowers to place "a free 90-day security alert" on their credit bureau files and review FTC consumer assistance materials. Brazos set up a call center to answer further questions and track any reports of identity theft. Stacy Guin, a Brazos customer, filed a suit in a federal district court against Brazos, alleging negligence. Brazos filed a motion for summary judgment.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT KYLE, J. [Judge]

* * * * *

* * * [N]egligence [is] the failure to exercise due or reasonable care. In order to prevail on a claim for negligence, a plaintiff must prove [among other things] the existence of a duty of care [and] a breach of that duty * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * * *

Guin argues that the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act (the "GLB Act") establishes a statutory-based duty for Brazos to protect the security and confidentiality of customers' nonpublic personal information. * * * Brazos concedes that the GLB Act applies to these circumstances and establishes a duty of care. The GLB Act was created "to protect against unauthorized access to or use of such records which could result in substantial harm or inconvenience to any customer [of a financial institution]." Under the GLB Act, a financial institution must comply with several objectives, including:

Develop, implement, and maintain a comprehensive written information security program that is written in one or more readily accessible parts and contains administrative, technical, and physical safeguards that are appropriate to your size and complexity, the nature and scope of your activities, and the sensitivity of any customer information at issue * * * .

Guin argues that Brazos breached the duty imposed by the GLB Act by (1) "providing Wright with [personal information] that he did not need for the task at hand," (2) "permitting Wright to continue keeping [personal information] in an unattended, insecure personal residence," and (3) "allowing Wright to keep [personal information] on his laptop unencrypted." * * *

The Court concludes that Guin has not presented sufficient evidence from which a fact finder could determine that Brazos failed to comply with the GLB Act. In September 2004, when Wright's home was burglarized and the laptop was stolen, Brazos had written security policies, current risk assessment reports, and proper safeguards for its customers' personal information as required by the GLB Act. Brazos authorized Wright to have access to customers' personal information because Wright needed the information to analyze loan portfolios * * *. Thus, his access to the personal information was within "the nature and scope of [Brazos's] activities." Furthermore, the GLB Act does not prohibit someone from working with sensitive data on a laptop computer in a home office. Despite Guin's persistent argument that any nonpublic personal information stored on a laptop computer should be encrypted, the GLB Act does not contain any such requirement. Accordingly, Guin has not presented any evidence showing that Brazos violated the GLB Act requirements.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 5.3 CONTINUED

● Decision and Remedy The court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment and dismissed the case. Brazos may have owed Guin a duty of care under the GLB Act, but neither Brazos nor Wright breached that duty. Wright had followed Brazos's written security procedures, which was all that the GLB Act required.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Wright had not been a financial analyst and his duties for Brazos had not included reviewing confidential loan data. How might the opinion of the court have been different?

● The Ethical Dimension Do businesses have an ethical duty to use enhanced security measures to protect confidential customer information? Why or why not? Does the fact that Brazos allowed its employees to store customers' unencrypted personal information on a laptop outside the office violate any ethical duty?

Making Ethical Business Decisions

As Dean Krehmeyer, executive director of the Business Roundtable's Institute for Corporate Ethics, once said, "Evidence strongly suggests being ethical—doing the right thing—pays." Instilling ethical business decision making into the fabric of a business organization is no small task, even if ethics "pays." The job is to get people to understand that they have to think more broadly about how their decisions will affect employees, shareholders, customers, and even the community. Great companies, such as Enron and the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, were brought down by the unethical behavior of a few. A two-hundred-year-old British investment banking firm, Barings Bank, was destroyed by the actions of one employee and a few of his friends. Clearly, ensuring that all employees get on the ethical business decision-making "bandwagon" is crucial in today's fast-paced world.

The George S. May International Company has provided six basic guidelines to help corporate employees judge their actions. Each employee—no matter what his or her level in the organization—should evaluate his or her actions using the following six guidelines:

1. The law. Is the action you are considering legal? If you do not know the laws governing the action, then find out. Ignorance of the law is no excuse.
2. Rules and procedures. Are you following the internal rules and procedures that have already been laid out by your company? They have been developed to avoid problems. Is what you are planning to do consistent with your company's policies and procedures? If not, stop.
3. Values. Laws and internal company policies reinforce society's values. You might wish to ask yourself whether you are attempting to find a loophole in the law or in your company's policies. Next, you have to ask yourself whether you are following the "spirit" of the law as well as the letter of the law or the internal policy.
4. Conscience. If you have any feeling of guilt, let your conscience be your guide. Alternatively, ask yourself whether you would be happy to be interviewed by a national news magazine about the actions you are going to take.
5. Promises. Every business organization is based on trust. Your customers believe that your company will do what it is supposed to do. The same is true for your suppliers and employees. Will your actions live up to the commitments you have made to others, both inside the business and outside?

6. Heroes. We all have heroes who are role models for us. Is what you are planning on doing an action that your hero would take? If not, how would your hero act? That is how you should be acting.

Business Ethics on a Global Level

Given the various cultures and religions throughout the world, conflicts in ethics frequently arise between foreign and U.S. businesspersons. For example, in certain countries the consumption of alcohol and specific foods is forbidden for religious reasons. Under such circumstances, it would be thoughtless and imprudent for a U.S. businessperson to invite a local business contact out for a drink.

The role played by women in other countries may also present some difficult ethical problems for firms doing business internationally. Equal employment opportunity is a fundamental public policy in the United States, and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits discrimination against women in the employment context (see Chapter 34). Some other countries, however, offer little protection for women against gender discrimination in the workplace, including sexual harassment.

We look here at how the employment practices that affect workers in other countries, particularly developing countries, have created some especially difficult ethical problems for U.S. sellers of goods manufactured in foreign nations. We also examine some of the ethical ramifications of laws prohibiting bribery and the expansion of ethics programs in the global community.

Monitoring the Employment Practices of Foreign Suppliers

Many U.S. businesses now contract with companies in developing nations to produce goods, such as shoes and clothing, because the wage rates in those nations are significantly lower than those in the United States. Yet what if a foreign company hires women and children at below-minimum-wage rates, for example, or requires its employees to work long hours in a workplace full of health hazards? What if the company's supervisors routinely engage in workplace conduct that is offensive to women?

Given today's global communications network, few companies can assume that their actions in other nations will go unnoticed by "corporate watch" groups that discover and publicize unethical corporate behavior. As a result, U.S. businesses today usually take steps to avoid such adverse publicity—either by refusing to deal with certain suppliers or by arranging to monitor their suppliers' workplaces to make sure that the employees are not being mistreated.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

Another ethical problem in international business dealings has to do with the legitimacy of certain side payments to government officials. In the United States, the majority of contracts are formed within the private sector. In many foreign countries, however, government officials make the decisions on most major construction and manufacturing contracts because of extensive government regulation and control over trade and industry. Side payments to government officials in exchange for favorable business contracts are not unusual in such countries, nor are they considered to be unethical. In the past, U.S. corporations doing business in these nations largely followed the dictum, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do."

In the 1970s, however, the U.S. press uncovered a number of business scandals involving large side payments by U.S. corporations to foreign representatives for the purpose of securing advantageous international trade contracts. In response to this unethical behavior, in 1977 Congress passed the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (FCPA), which prohibits U.S. businesspersons from bribing foreign officials to secure beneficial contracts. (For a discussion of how a German corporation ran afoul of Germany's anti-bribery laws, see this chapter's Insight into the Global Environment feature on the next page.)

Prohibition against the Bribery of Foreign Officials

The first part of the FCPA applies to all U.S. companies and their directors, officers, shareholders, employees, and agents. This part prohibits the bribery of most officials of foreign governments if the purpose of the payment is to get the official to act in his or her official capacity to provide business opportunities.

The FCPA does not prohibit payment of substantial sums to minor officials whose duties are ministerial. These payments are often referred to as "grease," or facilitating payments. They are meant to accelerate the performance of administrative services that might otherwise be carried out at a slow pace. Thus, for example,

INSIGHT INTO THE GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

Breach of Trust Issues Hit Major German Corporations

Whether you call it immoral, unethical, illegal, or a breach of trust, bribery by any name is wrong. In recent years, officers and managing directors at several major German corporations have been investigated, arrested, and fined for bribery. One German firm that has faced numerous charges is Siemens, a venerable corporation that was founded in 1847. Siemens built the first long-distance telegraph line in Europe from Berlin to Frankfurt in 1849. Today, the company, which its almost 500,000 workers like to call the House of Siemens, has operations in communications, radar, traffic control, and cell phones.

Corruption Charges Are Not New

When global competition intensified in the 1980s and 1990s, Siemens began to face fierce competition from multinational giants such as General Electric. To maintain the company's cash flow and sales dominance, some of Siemens managers started bribing potential clients—usually government agencies—to generate new business. In the early 1990s, the German government investigated Siemens's activities and convicted nine of the company's managers on bribery charges. The judge in the case wondered why the managers kept referring to the company as the "House of Siemens"—a name that, in the judge's view, implies "that the firm rises above the muck of ordinary business; it conveys a sense of moral exemption and entitlement." Of course, part of Siemens's problem may have been the somewhat ambiguous approach to bribery taken by German law. Bribes paid to foreign officials were tax deductible in Germany until 1999.

Unethical Actions Continue

Apparently, Siemens did not learn its lesson, for complaints about its behavior continued. In the early 2000s, Swiss authorities began an investigation that continued for a year and a half. The allegations of corruption did not trouble Heinrich von Pierer, Siemens's chair, however, or spur him to look into his managers' behavior. Instead, he stated simply, "I'm aware that our organization is hard to understand for outsiders. The job of board members is primarily strategic. Going over the books is the responsibility of others."

Several years later, the company finally disclosed that about $600 million in "suspicious transactions" (read "bribes") had been discovered.

By 2007, von Pierer had resigned, and the chief executive officer decided not to ask for a new contract. In the meantime, a German court had convicted two former Siemens executives of bribery and fined the company about $50 million.

Once again, ambiguities in German law entered the case. One former Siemens executive told the court that he did indeed authorize millions of dollars of bribes to win contracts from an Italian electric company. He insisted, though, that he did not break any laws and that the payments were not illegal because German law only forbids payments to "civil servants." The executive contended that the payments he made to the Italian company's managers were made to representatives of a private-sector company, not to "civil servants." German prosecutors had to admit that the legal definition of what constitutes a civil servant allows room for interpretation.

Bribing the Union

Siemens executives may not have restricted their activities to bribing "civil servants" or private-sector managers. One Siemens executive, Johannes Feldmayer, has been arrested on a special type of bribery charge. He has been accused of bribing the head of a workers' organization, a type of independent labor union. Apparently, Siemens wanted a counterweight to IG Metall, the most powerful German union, and Feldmayer allegedly oversaw the transfer of some $45 million to the independent union to facilitate this. Earlier, another major German corporation, Volkswagen (VW), faced similar charges of making illegal payments to the head of its workers council. Peter Harz, formerly VW's head of labor relations, pleaded guilty to the charges and paid a fine of about $750,000.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO CULTURE

Clearly, the corporate culture at Siemens, at least in the last few decades, did not distinguish among actions that were both ethical and legal, actions that were unethical but perhaps legal, and actions that were both unethical and illegal. What could top management at that company have done to instill a different corporate culture that would have resulted in a different outcome?

if a firm makes a payment to a minor official to speed up an import licensing process, the firm has not violated the FCPA. Generally, the act, as amended, permits payments to foreign officials if such payments are lawful within the foreign country. The act also does not prohibit payments to private foreign companies or other third parties unless the U.S. firm knows that the payments will be passed on to a foreign government in violation of the FCPA.

Accounting Requirements In the past, bribes were often concealed in corporate financial records. Thus, the second part of the FCPA is directed toward accountants. All companies must keep detailed records that “accurately and fairly” reflect their financial activities. In addition, all companies must have accounting systems that provide “reasonable assurance” that all transactions entered into by the companies are accounted for and legal. These requirements assist in detecting illegal bribes. The FCPA further prohibits any person from making false statements to accountants or false entries in any record or account.

Penalties for Violations In 1988, the FCPA was amended to provide that business firms that violate the act may be fined up to $2 million. Individual officers or directors who violate the FCPA may be fined up to $100,000 (the fine cannot be paid by the company) and may be imprisoned for up to five years.

REVIEWING Ethics and Business Decision Making

Isabel Arnett was promoted to chief executive officer (CEO) of Tamik, Inc., a pharmaceutical company that manufactures a vaccine called Kafluk, which supposedly provides some defense against bird flu. The company began marketing Kafluk throughout Asia. After numerous media reports that bird flu could soon become a worldwide epidemic, the demand for Kafluk increased, sales soared, and Tamik earned record profits. Tamik's CEO, Arnett, then began receiving disturbing reports from Southeast Asia that in some patients, Kafluk had caused psychiatric disturbances, including severe hallucinations, and heart and lung problems. Arnett was informed that six children in Japan had committed suicide by jumping out of windows after receiving the vaccine. To cover up the story and prevent negative publicity, Arnett instructed Tamik's partners in Asia to offer cash to the Japanese families whose children had died in exchange for their silence. Arnett also refused to authorize additional research within the company to study the potential side effects of Kafluk. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. This scenario illustrates one of the main reasons why ethical problems occur in business. What is that reason?
2. Would a person who adheres to the principle of rights consider it ethical for Arnett not to disclose potential safety concerns and to refuse to perform additional research on Kafluk? Why or why not?
3. If Kafluk prevented fifty Asian people who were infected with bird flu from dying, would Arnett's conduct in this situation be ethical under a utilitarian model of ethics? Why or why not?
4. Did Tamik or Arnett violate the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in this scenario? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

business ethics 99
categorical imperative 103

corporate social responsibility 104
cost-benefit analysis 104 ethical reasoning 103 ethics 99

moral minimum 107 principle of rights 103
utilitarianism 104

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

5-1. Some business ethicists maintain that whereas personal ethics has to do with “right” or “wrong” behavior, business ethics is concerned with “appropriate” behavior. In other words, ethical behavior in business has less to do with moral principles than with what society deems to be appropriate behavior in the business context. Do you agree with this distinction? Do personal and business ethics ever overlap? Should personal ethics play any role in business ethical decision making?

5-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

If a firm engages in “ethical” behavior solely for the purpose of gaining profits from the goodwill it generates, the “ethical” behavior is essentially a means toward a self-serving end (profits and the accumulation of wealth). In this situation, is the firm acting unethically in any way? Should motive or conduct carry greater weight on the ethical scales in this situation?

- For a sample answer to Question 5-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

5-3. Susan Whitehead serves on the city planning commission. The city is planning to build a new subway system, and Susan’s brother-in-law, Jerry, who owns the Custom Transportation Co., has submitted the lowest bid for the system. Susan knows that Jerry could complete the job for the estimated amount, but she also knows that once Jerry finishes this job, he will probably sell his company and retire. Susan is concerned that Custom Transportation’s subsequent management might not be as easy to work with if revisions need to be made on the subway system after its completion. She is torn as to whether she should tell the city about the potential changes in Custom Transportation’s management. If the city knew about the instability of Custom Transportation, it might prefer to give the contract to one of Jerry’s competitors, whose bid was only slightly higher than Jerry’s. Does Susan have an ethical obligation to disclose the information about Jerry to the city planning commission? How would you apply duty-based ethical standards to this question? What might be the outcome of a utilitarian analysis? Discuss fully.

5-4. Assume that you are a high-level manager for a shoe manufacturer. You know that your firm could increase its profit margin by producing shoes in Indonesia, where you could hire women for $40 a month to assemble them. You also know, however, that human rights advocates recently accused a competing shoe manufacturer of engaging in exploitative labor practices because the manufacturer sold shoes made by Indonesian women working for similarly low wages. You personally do not believe that paying $40 a month to Indonesian women is unethical because you know that in their impoverished country, $40 a month is a better-than-average wage rate. Assuming that the decision is yours to make, should you have the shoes manufactured in Indonesia and make higher profits for your company? Or should you avoid the risk of negative publicity and the consequences of that publicity for the firm’s reputation and subsequent profits? Are there other alternatives? Discuss fully.

5-5. Shokun Steel Co. owns many steel plants. One of its plants is much older than the others. Equipment at the old plant is outdated and inefficient, and the costs of production at that plant are now twice as high as at any of Shokun’s other plants. Shokun cannot increase the price of its steel because of competition, both domestic and international. The plant employs more than a thousand workers; it is located in Twin Firs, Pennsylvania, which has a population of about forty-five thousand. Shokun is contemplating whether to close the plant. What factors should the firm consider in making its decision? Will the firm violate any ethical duties if it closes the plant? Analyze these questions from the two basic perspectives on ethical reasoning discussed in this chapter.

5-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Eden Electrical, Ltd., owned twenty-five appliance stores throughout Israel, at least some of which sold refrigerators made by Amana Co. Eden bought the appliances from Amana’s Israeli distributor, Pan El A/Yesh Shem, which approached Eden about taking over the distributorship. Eden representatives met with Amana executives. The executives made assurances about Amana’s good faith, its hope of having a long-term business relationship with Eden, and its willingness to have Eden become its exclusive distributor in Israel. Eden signed a distributorship agreement and paid Amana $2.4 million. Amana failed to deliver this amount in inventory to Eden, continued selling refrigerators to other entities for the Israeli market, and represented to others that it was still looking for a long-term distributor. Less than three months after signing the agreement with Eden, Amana terminated it, without explanation. Eden filed a suit in a federal district court against Amana, alleging fraud. The court awarded Eden $12.1 million in damages. Is this amount warranted? Why or why not? How does this case illustrate why business ethics is important? [Eden Electrical, Ltd. v. Amana Co., 370 F.3d 824 (8th Cir. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 5-6, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 5,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

5-7. Ethical Conduct. Richard Fraser was an “exclusive career insurance agent” under a contract with Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co. Fraser leased computer hardware and software from Nationwide for his business. During a dispute between Nationwide and the Nationwide Insurance Independent Contractors Association, an organization representing Fraser and other exclusive career agents, Fraser prepared a letter to Nationwide's competitors asking whether they were interested in acquiring the represented agents' policyholders. Nationwide obtained a copy of the letter and searched its electronic file server for e-mail indicating that the letter had been sent. It found a stored e-mail that Fraser had sent to a co-worker indicating that the letter had been sent to at least one competitor. The e-mail was retrieved from the co-worker's file of already received and discarded messages stored on the server. When Nationwide canceled its contract with Fraser, he filed a suit in a federal district court against the firm, alleging, among other things, violations of various federal laws that prohibit the interception of electronic communications during transmission. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? Did Nationwide act ethically in retrieving the e-mail? Explain. [Fraser v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., 352 F.3d 107 (3d Cir.2004)]

5-8. Ethical Conduct. Unable to pay more than $1.2 billion in debt, Big Rivers Electric Corp. filed a petition to declare bankruptcy in a federal bankruptcy court in September 1996. Big Rivers' creditors included Bank of New York (BONY), Chase Manhattan Bank, Mapco Equities, and others. The court appointed J. Baxter Schilling to work as a "disinterested" (neutral) party with Big Rivers and the creditors to resolve their disputes and set an hourly fee as Schilling's compensation. Schilling told Chase, BONY, and Mapco that he wanted them to pay him an additional percentage fee based on the "success" he attained in finding "new value" to pay Big Rivers' debts. Without such a deal, he told them, he would not perform his mediation duties. Chase agreed; the others disputed the deal, but no one told the court. In October 1998, Schilling asked the court for nearly $4.5 million in compensation, including the hourly fees, which totaled about $531,000, and the percentage fees. Big Rivers and others asked the court to deny Schilling any fees on the basis that he had improperly negotiated "secret side agreements." How did Schilling violate his duties as a "disinterested" party? Should he be denied compensation? Why or why not? [In re Big Rivers Electric Corp., 355 F.3d 415 (6th Cir.2004)]

5-9. Ethical Conduct. Ernest Price suffered from sickle-cell anemia. In 1997, Price asked Dr. Ann Houston, his physician, to prescribe OxyContin, a strong narcotic, for the pain. Over the next several years, Price saw at least ten different physicians at ten different clinics in two cities, and used seven pharmacies in three cities, to obtain and fill simultaneous prescriptions for OxyContin. In March 2001, when Houston learned of these activities, she refused to write more prescriptions for Price. As other physicians became aware of Price's actions, they also stopped writing his prescriptions. Price filed a suit in a Mississippi state court against Purdue Pharma Co. and other producers and distributors of OxyContin, as well as his physicians and the pharmacies that had filled the prescriptions. Price alleged negligence, among other things, claiming that OxyContin's addictive nature caused him injury and that this was the defendants' fault. The defendants argued that Price's claim should be dismissed because it arose from his own wrongdoing. Who should be held legally liable? Should any of the parties be considered ethically responsible? Why or why not? [Price v. Purdue Pharma Co., 920 So.2d 479 (Miss. 2006)]

5-10. Ethical Leadership. In 1999, Andrew Fastow, chief financial officer of Enron Corp., asked Merrill Lynch, an investment firm, to participate in a bogus sale of three barges so that Enron could record earnings of $12.5 million from the sale. Through a third entity, Fastow bought the barges back within six months and paid Merrill for its participation. Five Merrill employees were convicted of conspiracy to commit wire fraud, in part, on an "honest services" theory. Under this theory, an employee deprives his or her employer of "honest services" when the employee promotes his or her own interests, rather than the interests of the employer. Four of the employees appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, arguing that this charge did not apply to the conduct in which they engaged. The court agreed, reasoning that the barge deal was conducted to benefit Enron, not to enrich the Merrill employees at Enron's expense. Meanwhile, Kevin Howard, chief financial officer of Enron Broadband Services (EBS), engaged in "Project Braveheart," which enabled EBS to show earnings of $111 million in 2000 and 2001. Braveheart involved the sale of an interest in the future revenue of a video-on-demand venture to nCube, a small technology firm, which was paid for its help when EBS bought the interest back. Howard was convicted of wire fraud, in part, on the "honest services" theory. He filed a motion to vacate his conviction on the same basis that the Merrill employees had argued. Did Howard act unethically? Explain. Should the court grant his motion? Discuss. [United States v. Howard, 471 F.Supp.2d 772 (S.D.Tex. 2007)]

5-11. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Steven Soderbergh is the Academy Award-winning director of Erin Brockovich, Traffic, and many other films. CleanFlicks, LLC, filed a suit in a federal district court against Soderbergh, fifteen other directors, and the Directors Guild of America. The plaintiff asked the court to rule that it had the right to sell DVDs of the defendants' films altered without the defendants' consent to delete scenes of "sex, nudity, profanity and gory violence." CleanFlicks sold or rented the edited DVDs under the slogan "It's About Choice" to consumers, sometimes indirectly through retailers. It would not sell to retailers that made unauthorized copies of the edited films. The defendants, with DreamWorks LLC and seven other movie studios that own the copyrights to the films, filed a counterclaim against CleanFlicks and others engaged in the same business, alleging copyright infringement. Those filing the counterclaim asked the court to enjoin CleanFlicks and the others from making and marketing altered versions of the films. [CleanFlicks of Colorado, LLC v. Soderbergh, 433 F.Supp.2d 1236 (D.Colo. 2006)]

- (a) Movie studios often edit their films to conform to content and other standards and sell the edited versions to network television and other commercial buyers. In this case, however, the studios objected when CleanFlicks edited the films and sold the altered versions directly to consumers. Similarly, CleanFlicks made unauthorized copies of the studios' DVDs to edit the films, but objected to others' making unauthorized copies of the altered versions. Is there anything unethical about these apparently contradictory positions? Why or why not?

- (b) CleanFlicks and its competitors asserted, among other things, that they were making "fair use" of the studios' copyrighted works. They argued that by their actions "they are criticizing the objectionable content commonly found in current movies and that they are providing more socially acceptable alternatives to enable families to view the films together, without exposing children to the presumed harmful effects emanating from the objectionable content." If you were the judge, how would you view this argument? Is a court the appropriate forum for making determinations of public or social policy? Explain.

5-12. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 5." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Ethics: Business Ethics an Oxymoron? Then answer the following questions.

- (a) According to the instructor in the video, what is the primary reason that businesses act ethically?
- (b) Which of the two approaches to ethical reasoning that were discussed in the chapter seems to have had more influence on the instructor in the discussion of how business activities are related to societies? Explain your answer.
- (c) The instructor asserts that "[i]n the end, it is the unethical behavior that becomes costly, and conversely ethical behavior creates its own competitive advantage." Do you agree with this statement? Why or why not?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

West's Legal Studies in Business offers an in-depth "Inside Look" at the Enron debacle at insidelook.westbuslaw.com

You can find articles on issues relating to shareholders and corporate accountability at the Corporate Governance Web site. Go to www.corpgov.net

For an example of an online group that focuses on corporate activities from the perspective of corporate social responsibility, go to www.corpwatch.org

Global Exchange offers information on global business activities, including some of the ethical issues stemming from those activities, at www.globalexchange.org

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 5" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercises 5-1: Legal Perspective
Ethics in Business

Internet Exercises 5-2: Management Perspective
Environmental Self-Audits

Ethics and the Legal Environment of Business

In Chapter 5, we examined the importance of ethical standards in the business context. We also offered suggestions on how business decision makers can create an ethical workplace. Certainly, it is not wrong for a businessperson to try to increase his or her firm's profits. But there are limits, both ethical and legal, to how far businesspersons can go. In preparing for a career in business, you will find that a background in business ethics and a commitment to ethical behavior are just as important as a knowledge of the specific laws that are covered in this text. Of course, no textbook can give an answer to each and every ethical question that arises in the business environment. Nor can it anticipate the types of ethical questions that will arise in the future, as technology and globalization continue to transform the workplace and business relationships.

The most we can do is examine the types of ethical issues that businesspersons have faced in the past and that they are facing today. In the Focus on Ethics sections in this book, we provide examples of specific ethical issues that have arisen in various areas of business activity.

In this initial Focus on Ethics feature, we look first at the relationship between business ethics and business law. We then examine various obstacles to ethical behavior in the business context. We conclude the feature by exploring the parameters of corporate social responsibility through a discussion of whether corporations have an ethical duty to the community or society at large.

Business Ethics and Business Law

Business ethics and business law are closely intertwined because ultimately the law rests on social beliefs about right and wrong behavior in the business world. Thus, businesspersons, by complying with the law, are acting ethically. Mere legal compliance (the "moral minimum" in terms of business ethics), however, is often not enough. This is because the law does not—and cannot—provide the answers for all ethical questions.

In the business world, numerous actions may be unethical but not necessarily illegal. Consider an example. Suppose that a pharmaceutical company is banned from marketing a particular drug in the United States because of the drug's possible adverse side effects. Yet no law prohibits the company from selling the drug in foreign markets—even though some consumers in those markets may suffer serious health problems as a result of using the drug. At issue here is not whether it would be legal to market the drug in other countries but whether it would be ethical to do so. In other words, the law has its limits—it cannot make all ethical decisions for us. Rather, the law assumes that those in business will behave ethically in their day-to-day dealings. If they do not, the courts will not come to their assistance.

Obstacles to Ethical Business Behavior

People sometimes behave unethically in the business context, just as they do in their private lives. Some businesspersons knowingly engage in unethical behavior because they think that they can "get away with it"—that no one will ever learn of their unethical actions. Examples of this kind of unethical behavior include padding expense accounts, casting doubts on the integrity of a rival co-worker to gain a job promotion, and stealing company supplies or equipment. Obviously, these acts are unethical, and some of them are illegal as well. In some situations, however, businesspersons who would choose to act ethically may be deterred from doing so because of situational circumstances or external pressures.

Ethics and the Corporate Environment Individuals in their personal lives normally are free to decide ethical issues as they wish and to follow through on those decisions. In the business world, and particularly in the corporate environment, rarely is such a decision made by one person. If you are an officer or a manager of a large company, for example, you will find that the decision as to what is right or wrong for the company is not totally yours to make. Your input may weigh in the decision, but ultimately a corporate decision is a collective undertaking.

Additionally, collective decision making, because it places emphasis on consensus and unity of opinion, tends to hinder individual ethical assertiveness. For example, suppose that a director has ethical concerns about a planned corporate venture that promises to be highly profitable. If the other directors have no such misgivings, the director who does may be swayed by the others' enthusiasm for the project and downplay her or his own criticisms.

Furthermore, just as no one person makes a collective decision, so no one person (normally) is held accountable for the decision. The corporate enterprise thus tends to shield corporate personnel from both individual exposure to the consequences of their decisions (such as direct experience with someone who suffers harm from a corporate product) and personal accountability for those decisions.

Ethics and Management Much unethical business behavior occurs simply because management does not always make clear what ethical standards and behaviors are expected of the firm's employees. Although most firms now issue ethical policies or codes of conduct, these policies and codes are not always effective in creating an ethical workplace. At times, this is because the firm's ethical policies are not communicated clearly to employees or do not bear on the real ethical issues confronting decision makers. Additionally, particularly in a large corporation, unethical behavior in one corporate department may simply escape the attention of the officers in control of the corporation or those responsible for implementing and monitoring the company's ethics program.

Unethical behavior may also occur when corporate management, by its own conduct, indicates that ethical considerations take a back seat. If management makes no attempt to deter unethical behavior—through reprimands or employment terminations, for example—it will be obvious to employees that management is not all that serious about ethics. Likewise, if a company gives promotions or salary increases to those who clearly use unethical tactics to increase the firm's profits, then employees who do not resort to such tactics will be at a disadvantage. An employee in this situation may decide that because "everyone else does it," he or she might as well do it, too.

Of course, an even stronger encouragement to unethical behavior occurs when employers engage in blatantly unethical or illegal conduct and expect their employees to do so as well. An employee in this situation faces two options, neither of which is satisfactory: participate in the conduct or "blow the whistle" on (inform authorities of) the employer's actions—and, of course, risk being fired. (See Chapter 33 for a more detailed discussion of this ethical dilemma and its consequences for employees.)

Corporate Social Responsibility

As discussed in Chapter 5, just what constitutes corporate social responsibility has been debated for some time. In particular, questions arise concerning a corporation's ethical obligations to its community and to society as a whole.

A Corporation's Duty to the Community In some circumstances, the community in which a business enterprise is located is greatly affected by corporate decisions and therefore may be considered a stakeholder. Assume, for example, that a company employs two thousand workers at one of its plants. If the company decides that it would be profitable to close the plant, the employees—and the community—would suffer as a result. To be considered ethical in that situation (and, in some circumstances, to comply with laws governing plant shutdowns), a corporation must take both employees' needs and community needs into consideration when making such a decision.

Another ethical question sometimes arises when a firm moves into a community. Does the company have an obligation to evaluate first how its presence will affect that community (even though the community is not a stakeholder yet)? This question has surfaced in regard to the expansion of Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., into smaller communities. Generally, most people in such communities welcome the lower prices and wider array of goods that Wal-Mart offers relative to other, smaller stores in the area. A vocal minority of people in some communities, however, claim that smaller stores often find it impossible to compete with Wal-Mart's prices and thus are forced to go out of business. Many of these smaller stores have existed for years and, according to Wal-Mart's critics, enhance the quality of community life. These critics claim that it is unethical of Wal-Mart to disregard a town's interest in the quality and character of its community life.

In addition to expanding, Wal-Mart has been consolidating some of its smaller stores into large "superstores." As it consolidates, Wal-Mart is closing stores in some of the very towns in which it drove its smaller competitors out of business. This development raises yet another ethical question: Does a store such as Wal-Mart have an obligation to continue operations in a community once it has driven its competitors out of business?

A Corporation's Duty to Society Perhaps the most disputed area of corporate social responsibility is the nature of a corporation's duty to society at large. Those who contend that corporations should first and foremost attend to the goal of profit maximization would argue that it is by generating profits that a firm can best contribute to society. Society benefits by profit-making activities because profits can only be realized when a firm markets products or services that are desired by society. These products and services enhance the standard of living, and the profits accumulated by successful business firms generate national wealth. Our laws and court decisions promoting trade and commerce reflect the public policy that the fruits of commerce (wealth) are desirable and good. Because our society values wealth as an ethical goal, corporations, by contributing to that wealth, automatically are acting ethically.

Those arguing for profit maximization as a corporate goal also point out that it would be inappropriate to use the power of the corporate business world to further society's goals by promoting social causes. Determinations as to what exactly is in society's best interest involve questions that are essentially political, and therefore the public, through the political process, should have a say in making those determinations. Thus, the legislature—not the corporate boardroom—is the appropriate forum for such decisions.

Critics of the profit-maximization view believe that corporations should become actively engaged in seeking and furthering solutions to social problems. Because so much of the wealth and power of this country is controlled by business, business in turn has a responsibility to society to use that wealth and power in socially beneficial ways. Corporations should therefore promote human rights, strive for equal treatment of minorities and women in the workplace, take steps to preserve the environment, and generally not profit from activities that society has deemed unethical. The critics also point out that it is ethically irresponsible to leave decisions concerning social welfare up to the government, because many social needs are not being met sufficiently through the political process.

It Pays to Be Ethical

Most corporations today have learned that it pays to be ethically responsible—even if this means less profit in the short run (and it often does). Today's corporations are subject to more intensive scrutiny—by both government agencies and the public—than corporations of the past. “Corporate watch” groups monitor the activities of U.S. corporations, including activities conducted in foreign countries. Through the Internet, complaints about a corporation's practices can easily be disseminated to a worldwide audience. Similarly, dissatisfied customers and employees can voice their complaints about corporate policies, products, or services in Internet chat rooms and other online forums. Thus, if a corporation fails to conduct its operations ethically or to respond quickly to an ethical crisis, its goodwill and reputation (and future profits) will likely suffer as a result.

There are other reasons as well for a corporation to behave ethically. For example, companies that demonstrate a commitment to ethical behavior—by implementing ethical programs, complying with environmental regulations, and promptly investigating product complaints, for example—often receive more lenient treatment from government agencies and the courts. Additionally, investors may shy away from a corporation's stock if the corporation is perceived to be socially irresponsible. Finally, unethical (and/or illegal) corporate behavior may result in government action, such as new laws imposing further requirements on corporate entities.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. What might be some other deterrents to ethical behavior in the business context, besides those discussed in this Focus on Ethics feature?
2. Can you think of a situation in which a business firm may be acting ethically but not in a socially responsible manner? Explain.
3. Why are consumers and the public generally more concerned with ethical and socially responsible business behavior today than they were, say, fifty years ago?
4. Suppose that an automobile manufacturing company has to choose between two alternatives: contributing $1 million annually to the United Way or reinvesting the $1 million in the company. In terms of ethics and social responsibility, which is the better choice?
5. Have Internet chat rooms and online forums affected corporate decision makers' willingness to consider the community and public interest when making choices? Are corporate decision makers more apt to make ethical choices in the cyber age? Explain.

UNIT TWO

Torts and Crimes

CONTENTS

- 6 Intentional Torts
- 7 Negligence and Strict Liability
- 8 Intellectual Property and Internet Law
- 9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

CHAPTER 6

Intentional Torts

Part of doing business today—and, indeed, part of everyday life—is the risk of being involved in a lawsuit. The list of circumstances in which businesspersons can be sued is long and varied. A customer who is injured by a security guard at a business establishment, for example, may attempt to sue the business owner, claiming that the security guard's conduct was wrongful. Any time that one party's allegedly wrongful conduct causes injury to another, an action may arise under the law of torts (the word tort is French for “wrong”). Through tort law, society compensates those who have suffered injuries as a result of the wrongful conduct of others.

Many of the lawsuits brought by or against business firms are based on the tort theories discussed in this chapter, which covers intentional torts, and the next chapter, which discusses unintentional torts. Intentional torts arise from intentional acts, whereas unintentional torts often result from carelessness (as when an employee at a store knocks over a display case, injuring a customer). In addition, this chapter discusses how tort law applies to wrongful actions in the online environment. Tort theories also come into play in the context of product liability (liability for defective products), which will be discussed in detail in Chapter 23.

The Basis of Tort Law

Two notions serve as the basis of all torts: wrongs and compensation. Tort law is designed to compensate those who have suffered a loss or injury due to another person's wrongful act. In a tort action, one person or group brings a lawsuit against another person or group to obtain compensation (monetary damages) or other relief for the harm suffered.

The Purpose of Tort Law

The basic purpose of tort law is to provide remedies for the invasion of various protected interests. Society recognizes an interest in personal physical safety, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause physical injury or that interfere with physical security and freedom of movement. Society recognizes an interest in protecting property, and tort law provides remedies for acts that cause destruction or damage to property. Society also recognizes an interest in protecting certain intangible interests, such as personal privacy, family relations, reputation, and dignity, and tort law provides remedies for violation of these interests.

Damages Available in Tort Actions

Because the purpose of tort law is to compensate the injured party for the damage suffered, you need to have an understanding of the types of damages that plaintiffs seek in tort actions. The high cost to society of sizable damages awards in tort cases has fueled the tort reform movement, which is discussed in this chapter's Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 124 and 125.

Compensatory Damages Compensatory damages are intended to compensate or reimburse a plaintiff for actual losses—to make the plaintiff whole and put her or him in the same position that she or he would have been had the tort not occurred. Compensatory damages awards are often broken down into special damages and general damages. Special damages compensate the plaintiff for quantifiable monetary losses, such as medical expenses, lost wages and benefits (now and in the future), extra costs, the loss of irreplaceable items, and the costs of repairing or replacing damaged property. General damages compensate individuals (not companies) for the nonmonetary aspects of the harm suffered, such as pain and suffering. A court might award general damages for physical or emotional pain and suffering, loss of companionship, loss of consortium (losing the emotional and physical benefits of a spousal relationship), disfigurement, loss of reputation, or loss or impairment of mental or physical capacity.

CHAPTER 6 Intentional Torts

Punitive Damages Occasionally, the courts may also award punitive damages in tort cases to punish the wrongdoer and deter others from similar wrongdoing. Punitive damages are appropriate only when the defendant's conduct was particularly egregious or reprehensible. Usually, this means that punitive damages are available mainly in intentional tort actions and only rarely in negligence lawsuits (negligence actions will be discussed in Chapter 7). They may be awarded, however, in suits involving gross negligence, which can be defined as an intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences of such a failure for the life or property of another.

Courts exercise great restraint in granting punitive damages to plaintiffs in tort actions because punitive damages are subject to the limitations imposed by the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution (discussed in Chapter 2). In State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell,¹ the United States Supreme Court held that to the extent an award of punitive damages is grossly excessive, it furthers no legitimate purpose and violates due process requirements. Although this case dealt with intentional torts (fraud and intentional infliction of emotional distress), the Court's holding applies equally to punitive damages awards in gross negligence cases (as well as to product liability cases, which will be discussed in Chapter 23).

Intentional Torts against Persons

An intentional tort, as the term implies, requires intent. The tortfeasor (the one committing the tort) must intend to commit an act, the consequences of which interfere with the personal or business interests of another in a way not permitted by law. An evil or harmful motive is not required—in fact, the actor may even have a beneficial motive for committing what turns out to be a tortious act. In tort law, intent means only that the actor intended the consequences of his or her act or knew with substantial certainty that specific consequences would result from the act. The law generally assumes that individuals intend the normal consequences of their actions. Thus, forcefully pushing another—even if done in jest and without any evil motive—is an intentional tort (if injury results), because the object of a strong push can ordinarily be expected to be abruptly displaced.

Intentional torts against persons include assault and battery, false imprisonment, infliction of emotional distress, defamation, invasion of privacy, appropriation, fraudulent misrepresentation, and torts related to misuse of litigation. We discuss these torts in the following subsections.

Assault and Battery

Any intentional, unexcused act that creates in another person a reasonable apprehension of immediate harmful or offensive contact is an assault. Note that apprehension is not the same as fear. If a contact is such that a reasonable person would want to avoid it, and if there is a reasonable basis for believing that the contact will occur, then the plaintiff suffers apprehension whether or not she or he is afraid. The interest protected by tort law concerning assault is the freedom from having to expect harmful or offensive contact. The arousal of apprehension is enough to justify compensation.

The completion of the act that caused the apprehension, if it results in harm to the plaintiff, is a battery, which is defined as an unexcused and harmful or offensive physical contact intentionally performed. For example, Ivan threatens Jean with a gun, then shoots her. The pointing of the gun at Jean is an assault; the firing of the gun (if the bullet hits Jean) is a battery. The interest protected by tort law concerning battery is the right to personal security and safety. The contact can be harmful, or it can be merely offensive (such as an unwelcome kiss). Physical injury need not occur. The contact can involve any part of the body or anything attached to it—for example, a hat or other item of clothing, a purse, or a chair or an automobile in which one is sitting. Whether the contact is offensive is

1. 538 U.S. 408, 123 S.Ct. 1513, 155 L.Ed.2d 585 (2003).

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Tort Reform

The question of whether our tort law system is in need of reform has aroused heated debate. While some argue that the current system imposes excessive costs on society, others contend that the system protects consumers from unsafe products and practices.

“End the Tort Tax and Frivolous Lawsuits,” Say the Critics

Critics of the current tort law system contend that it encourages too many frivolous lawsuits, which clog the courts, and is unnecessarily costly. In particular, they say, damages awards are often excessive and bear little relationship to the actual damage suffered. Such large awards encourage plaintiffs to bring frivolous suits, hoping that they will “hit the jackpot.” Trial lawyers, in turn, are eager to bring the suits because they are paid on a contingency-fee basis, meaning that they receive a percentage of the damages awarded.

The result, in the critics’ view, is a system that disproportionately rewards a few lucky plaintiffs while imposing enormous costs on business and society as a whole. They refer to the economic burden that the tort system imposes on society as the “tort tax.” According to one recent study, more than $300 billion per year is expended on tort litigation, including plaintiffs’ and defendants’ attorneys’ fees, damages awards, and other costs. Most of the costs are from class-action lawsuits involving product liability or medical malpractice.^a (A class action is a lawsuit in which a single person or a small group of people represents the interests of a larger group.) Although even the critics would not contend that the tort tax encompasses the entire $300 billion, they believe that it includes a sizable portion of that amount. Furthermore, they say, the tax appears in other ways. Because physicians, hospitals, and pharmaceutical companies are worried about medical malpractice suits, they have changed their behavior. Physicians, for example, engage in defensive medicine by ordering more tests than necessary. PricewaterhouseCoopers has calculated that the practice of defensive medicine increases health-care costs by more than $100 billion per year.

a. Lawrence J. McQuillan, Hovannes Abramyan, and Anthony P. Archie, Jackpot Justice: The True Cost of America’s Tort System (San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute, 2007).

To solve the problems they perceive, critics want to reduce both the number of tort cases brought each year and the amount of damages awards. They advocate the following tort reform measures: (1) limit the amount of punitive damages that can be awarded; (2) limit the amount of general noneconomic damages that can be awarded (for example, for pain and suffering); (3) limit the amount that attorneys can collect in contingency fees; and (4) to discourage the filing of meritless suits, require the losing party to pay both the plaintiff’s and the defendant’s expenses.

“The Current System Promotes Fairness and Safety,” Say Their Opponents

Others are not so sure that the current system needs such drastic reform. They say that the prospect of tort lawsuits encourages companies to produce safer products and deters them from putting dangerous products on the market. In the health-care industry, determined by the reasonable person standard.² The contact can be made by the defendant or by some force the defendant sets in motion—for example, a rock thrown, food poisoned, or a stick swung.

Compensation If the plaintiff shows that there was contact, and the jury (or judge, if there is no jury) agrees that the contact was offensive, then the plaintiff

2. The reasonable person standard is an “objective” test of how a reasonable person would have acted under the same circumstances. See the subsection entitled “The Duty of Care and Its Breach” in Chapter 7.

has a right to compensation. There is no need to establish that the defendant acted out of malice. The underlying motive does not matter, only the intent to bring about the harmful or offensive contact to the plaintiff. In fact, proving a motive is never necessary. A plaintiff may be compensated for the emotional harm or loss of reputation resulting from a battery, as well as for physical harm.

Defenses to Assault and Battery A defendant who is sued for assault, battery, or both can raise any of the following legally recognized defenses:

the potential for medical malpractice suits has led to safer and more effective medical practices.

Imposing limits on the amount of punitive and general noneconomic damages would be unfair, say the system's defenders, and would reduce efficiency in our legal and economic system. After all, corporations conduct cost-benefit analyses when they decide how much safety to build into their products. Any limitation on potential damages would mean that corporations would have less incentive to build safer products. Indeed, Professor Stephen Teret of the Johns Hopkins University School of Public Health says that tort litigation is an important tool for preventing injuries because it forces manufacturers to opt for more safety in their products rather than less.^b Limiting contingency fees would also be unfair, say those in favor of the current system, because low-income consumers who have been injured could not afford to pay an attorney to take a case on an hourly fee basis—and an attorney would not expend the time needed to pursue a case without the prospect of a large reward in the form of a contingency fee.

Tort Reform in Reality

While the debate continues, the federal government and a number of states have begun to take some steps toward tort reform. At the federal level, the Class Action Fairness Act of 2005 (CAFA)^c shifted jurisdiction over large interstate tort and product liability class-action lawsuits from the state courts to the federal courts. The intent was to prevent plaintiffs' attorneys from shopping around for a state court that might be predisposed to be sympathetic to their clients' cause and to award large damages in class-action suits.

At the state level, more than twenty states have placed caps ranging from $250,000 to $750,000 on noneconomic damages, especially in medical malpractice suits. More than thirty states have limited punitive damages, with some imposing outright bans.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Large damages awards in tort litigation have to be paid by someone. If the defendant is insured, then insurance companies foot the bill. Ultimately, though, high insurance rates are passed on to consumers of goods and services in the United States. Consequently, tort reform that reduces the size and number of damages awards ultimately will mean lower costs of goods and services to consumers. The downside of these lower costs, though, might be higher risks of medical malpractice and dangerous products. Do you believe that this trade-off is real? Why or why not?

b. "Litigation Is an Important Tool for Injury and Gun Violence Prevention," Johns Hopkins University Center for Gun Policy and Research, July 15, 2006.

c. 28 U.S.C.A. Sections 1711–1715, 1453.

1. Consent. When a person consents to the act that is allegedly tortious, there may be a complete or partial defense to liability.
2. Self-defense. An individual who is defending her or his life or physical well-being can claim self-defense. In a situation of either real or apparent danger, a person may normally use whatever force is reasonably necessary to prevent harmful contact (see Chapter 9 for a more detailed discussion of self-defense).
3. Defense of others. An individual can act in a reasonable manner to protect others who are in real or apparent danger.
4. Defense of property. Reasonable force may be used in attempting to remove intruders from one's home, although force that is likely to cause death or great bodily injury normally cannot be used just to protect property.

False Imprisonment

False imprisonment is defined as the intentional confinement or restraint of another person's activities without justification. It involves interference with the freedom to move without restriction. The confinement can be accomplished through the use of physical barriers, physical restraint, or threats of physical force. Moral pressure does not constitute false imprisonment. Furthermore, it is essential that the person being restrained not agree to the restraint.

Businesspersons often face suits for false imprisonment after they have attempted to confine a suspected shoplifter for questioning. Under the laws of most states, merchants may detain persons suspected of shoplifting and hold them for the police. Although laws vary from state to state, normally only a merchant's security personnel—not salesclerks or other employees—have the right to detain suspects. Reasonable or probable cause must exist to believe that the person being detained has committed a theft. Additionally, most states require that any detention be conducted in a reasonable manner and for only a reasonable length of time. Tackling a customer suspected of theft in the parking lot would be considered unreasonable in many jurisdictions.

Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress

The tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress can be defined as an intentional act that amounts to extreme and outrageous conduct resulting in severe emotional distress to another. To be actionable (capable of serving as the ground for a lawsuit), the act must be extreme and outrageous to the point that it exceeds the bounds of decency accepted by society. For example, a prankster telephones a pregnant woman and says that her husband and two sons have just been killed in a horrible accident (although they have not). As a result, the woman suffers intense mental pain and has a miscarriage. In that situation, the woman would be able to sue for intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Courts in most jurisdictions are wary of emotional distress claims and confine them to situations involving truly outrageous behavior. Acts that cause indignity or annoyance alone usually are not sufficient. Many times, however, repeated annoyances (such as those experienced by a person who is being stalked), coupled with threats, are enough.

Note that when the outrageous conduct consists of speech about a public figure, the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech also limits emotional distress claims. For example, Hustler magazine once printed a fake advertisement that showed a picture of Reverend Jerry Falwell and described him as having lost his virginity to his mother in an outhouse while he was drunk. Falwell sued the magazine for intentional infliction of emotional distress and won, but the United States Supreme Court overturned the decision. The Court held that creators of parodies of public figures are protected under the First Amendment from intentional infliction of emotional distress claims. (The Court used the same standards that apply to public figures in defamation lawsuits, discussed next.)³

Defamation

As discussed in Chapter 4, the freedom of speech guaranteed by the First Amendment is not absolute. In interpreting the First Amendment, the courts must balance the vital guarantee of free speech against other pervasive and strong social interests, including society's interest in preventing and redressing attacks on reputation.

Defamation of character involves wrongfully hurting a person's good reputation. The law imposes a general duty on all persons to refrain from making false, defamatory statements of fact about others. Breaching this duty in writing or other permanent form (such as an electronic recording) involves the tort of libel. Breaching this duty orally involves the tort of slander. The tort of defamation also arises when a false statement of fact is made about a person's product, business, or legal ownership rights.

Note that generally only false statements that represent something as a fact (such as "Vladik cheats on his taxes") constitute defamation. Expressions of personal opinion (such as "Vladik is a jerk") are protected by the First Amendment and normally cannot lead to tort liability.

The Publication Requirement The basis of the tort of defamation is the publication of a statement or statements that hold an individual up to contempt, ridicule, or hatred. Publication here means that the defamatory statements are communicated (either intentionally or accidentally) to persons other than the defamed party. If Thompson writes Andrews a private letter falsely accusing him of embezzling funds, the action does not constitute libel. If Peters falsely states that Gordon is dishonest and incompetent when no one else is around, the action does not constitute slander. In neither case was the message communicated to a third party.

3. Hustler Magazine, Inc. v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46, 108 S.Ct. 876, 99 L.Ed.2d 41 (1988). For another example of how the courts protect parody, see Busch v. Viacom International, Inc., 477 F.Supp.2d 764 (N.D.Tex. 2007), involving a fake endorsement of televangelist Pat Robertson's diet shake.

The courts have generally held that even dictating a letter to a secretary constitutes publication, although the publication may be privileged (a concept that will be explained shortly). Moreover, if a third party overhears defamatory statements by chance, the courts usually hold that this also constitutes publication. Defamatory statements made via the Internet are actionable as well. Note also that any individual who repeats or republishes defamatory statements normally is liable even if that person reveals the source of the statements.

Damages for Libel Once a defendant's liability for libel is established, general damages are presumed as a matter of law. General damages are designed to compensate the plaintiff for nonspecific harms such as disgrace or dishonor in the eyes of the community, humiliation, injured reputation, and emotional distress—harms that are difficult to measure. In other words, to recover damages in a libel case, the plaintiff need not prove that he or she was actually injured in any way as a result of the libelous statement.

Damages for Slander In contrast to cases alleging libel, in a case alleging slander, the plaintiff must prove special damages to establish the defendant's liability. The plaintiff must show that the slanderous statement caused her or him to suffer actual economic or monetary losses. Unless this initial hurdle of proving special damages is overcome, a plaintiff alleging slander normally cannot go forward with the suit and recover any damages. This requirement is imposed in slander cases because oral statements have a temporary quality. In contrast, a libelous (written) statement has the quality of permanence, can be circulated widely, and usually results from some degree of deliberation on the part of the author.

Exceptions to the burden of proving special damages in cases alleging slander are made for certain types of slanderous statements. If a false statement constitutes "slander per se," no proof of special damages is required for it to be actionable. In most states, the following four types of utterances are considered to be slander per se:

1. A statement that another has a loathsome disease (historically, leprosy and sexually transmitted diseases, but now also including allegations of mental illness).
2. A statement that another has committed improprieties while engaging in a profession or trade.
3. A statement that another has committed or has been imprisoned for a serious crime.
4. A statement that a person (usually only an unmarried person and sometimes only a woman) is unchaste or has engaged in serious sexual misconduct.

Defenses to Defamation Truth is normally an absolute defense against a defamation charge. In other words, if a defendant in a defamation case can prove that the allegedly defamatory statements of fact were true, normally no tort has been committed. Other defenses to defamation may exist if the speech is privileged or concerns a public figure. Note that the majority of defamation actions are filed in state courts, and state laws differ somewhat in the defenses they allow, such as privilege (discussed next).

Privileged Speech. In some circumstances, a person will not be liable for defamatory statements because she or he enjoys a privilege, or immunity. With respect to defamation, privileged communications are of two types: absolute and qualified.⁴ Only in judicial proceedings and certain government proceedings is an absolute privilege granted. For example, statements made by attorneys and judges in the courtroom during a trial are absolutely privileged. So are statements made by government officials during legislative debate, even if the legislators make such statements maliciously—that is, knowing them to be untrue. An absolute privilege is granted in these situations because judicial and government personnel deal with matters that are so much in the public interest that the parties involved should be able to speak out fully and freely and without restriction.

In other situations, a person will not be liable for defamatory statements because he or she has a qualified, or conditional, privilege. An employer's statements in written evaluations of employees are an example of a qualified privilege. Generally, if the statements are made in good faith and the publication is limited to those who have a legitimate interest in the communication, the statements fall within the area of qualified privilege. The concept of conditional privilege rests

4. Note that the term privileged communication in this context is not the same as privileged communication between a professional, such as an attorney, and his or her client. The latter type of privilege will be discussed in Chapter 51, in the context of the liability of professionals.

on the common law assumption that in some situations, the right to know or speak is equal in importance to the right not to be defamed. If a communication is conditionally privileged, to recover damages, the plaintiff must show that the privilege was abused.

Public Figures. Public officials who exercise substantial governmental power and any persons in the public limelight are considered public figures. In general, public figures are considered “fair game,” and false and defamatory statements about them that are published in the press will not constitute defamation unless the statements are made with actual malice. To be made with actual malice, a statement must be made with either knowledge of its falsity or a reckless disregard of the truth.⁵

Statements made about public figures, especially when they are communicated via a public medium, are usually related to matters of general public interest; they refer to people who substantially affect all of us. Furthermore, public figures generally have some access to a public medium for answering disparaging falsehoods about themselves; private individuals do not. For these reasons, public figures have a greater burden of proof in defamation cases (they must prove actual malice) than do private individuals.

Invasion of Privacy

A person has a right to solitude and freedom from prying public eyes—in other words, to privacy. As mentioned in Chapter 4, the courts have held that certain amendments to the U.S. Constitution imply a right to privacy. Some state constitutions explicitly provide for privacy rights, as do a number of federal and state statutes. Tort law also safeguards these rights through the tort of invasion of privacy. Four acts qualify as invasions of privacy:

5. New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). As mentioned earlier, the First Amendment protects the creator of a parody from liability for defamation of a public figure.

1. Appropriation of identity. Under the common law, using a person’s name, picture, or other likeness for commercial purposes without permission is a tortious invasion of privacy. Most states today have also enacted statutes prohibiting appropriation (discussed further in the next subsection).
2. Intrusion into an individual’s affairs or seclusion. For example, invading someone’s home or searching someone’s personal computer without authorization is an invasion of privacy. This tort has been held to extend to eavesdropping by wiretap, unauthorized scanning of a bank account, compulsory blood testing, and window peeping.
3. False light. The publication of information that places a person in a false light is another category of invasion of privacy. This could be a story attributing to someone ideas not held or actions not taken by that person. (The publication of such a story could involve the tort of defamation as well.)
4. Public disclosure of private facts. This type of invasion of privacy occurs when a person publicly discloses private facts about an individual that an ordinary person would find objectionable or embarrassing. A newspaper account of a private citizen’s sex life or financial affairs could be an actionable invasion of privacy, even if the information revealed is true, because it is not of public concern.

The following case included an allegation of an intrusion into an individual’s affairs or seclusion.

CASE 6.1 Anderson v. Mergenhagen

Court of Appeals of Georgia, 2007. 283 Ga.App. 546, 642 S.E.2d 105.

• Background and Facts After Dick and Karyn Anderson’s marriage collapsed and they divorced, Karyn harassed Dick’s new wife, Maureen, until Maureen obtained a warrant for Karyn’s arrest. According to Maureen, Karyn’s new boyfriend, Paul Mergenhagen, then began following Maureen. On more than a dozen occasions between mid-2003 and mid-2005, Paul took photos of, and made obscene gestures to, Maureen as she was driving in her car or walking with her children. Frightened and upset, Maureen called the police several times. Paul admitted that he had followed Maureen at least four times and had taken at least forty photos of her car. The security guard at the entrance to the Andersons’ subdivision corroborated Maureen’s account that Paul often lay in wait for her and that she was “visibly shaken and upset, almost to the point of tears,” at least once. Maureen filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Paul, alleging, among other things, invasion of privacy. The court issued a summary judgment in Paul’s favor on this charge. Maureen appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE 6.1 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
BARNES, Chief Judge.

* * * *

* * * The right of privacy, or the right of the individual to be let alone, is a personal right * * *. It is the complement of the right to the immunity of one's person. The individual has always been entitled to be protected in the exclusive use and enjoyment of that which is his own. The common law regarded his person and property as inviolate, and he has the absolute right to be let alone. The principle is fundamental, and essential in organized society, that every one, in exercising a personal right and in the use of his property, shall respect the rights and properties of others. * * * The right of privacy is embraced within the absolute rights of personal security and personal liberty, "to be let alone," to live a life of seclusion or to be free of unwarranted interference by the public about matters [with] which the public is not necessarily concerned, or to be protected from any wrongful intrusion into an individual's private life which would outrage or cause mental suffering, shame or humiliation to a person of ordinary sensibilities. [Emphasis added.]

With regard to the tort of intrusion upon seclusion or solitude, which is the claim made here, * * * the "unreasonable intrusion" aspect involves a prying or intrusion, which would be offensive or objectionable to a reasonable person, into a person's private concerns. * * *

* * * *

* * * Traditionally, watching or observing a person in a public place is not an intrusion upon one's privacy. However, Georgia courts have held that surveillance of an individual on public thoroughfares, where such surveillance aims to frighten or torment a person, is an unreasonable intrusion upon a person's privacy.

In cases holding that public surveillance did not establish a privacy violation, we have found that the surveillance was reasonable in light of the situation. For example, reasonable surveillance of a residence from a public road to investigate a husband's disability claim constituted no intrusion upon his wife's seclusion or solitude, or into her private affairs. The surveillance of the husband at his house and on public roads also did not establish a privacy violation. Reasonable surveillance is recognized as a common method to obtain evidence to defend a lawsuit. It is only when such is conducted in a vicious or malicious manner not reasonably limited and designated to obtain information needed for the defense of a lawsuit or deliberately calculated to frighten or torment the plaintiff, that the courts will not countenance it. * * *

In this case, [Maureen] Anderson alleges that her privacy was violated when [Paul] Mergenhausen followed her repeatedly in the car and took numerous photographs of her and her car. While * * * a driver may have no cause of action for mere observation or even for having her photograph taken, a relatively harmless activity can become tortious with repetition * * *. [R]epeatedly following a woman, who was pregnant for part of that time and was frequently alone or with her small children, photographing her at least 40 times, repeatedly causing her to become frightened and upset, to flee to her home, and to call the police seeking help, creates a jury question as to whether the defendant's actions amounted to a course of hounding the plaintiff that intruded upon her privacy.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court reversed the grant of summary judgment to Paul on Maureen's invasion of privacy claim. The court remanded the case for trial on the issue of whether the defendant followed and photographed the plaintiff so frequently as to amount to an intrusion into her privacy.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Dick and Karyn had two children and Dick had been awarded custody of them. If Paul had been watching Maureen to determine her fitness to care for the children, would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension To succeed on a claim of intrusion into an individual's affairs or seclusion, should a plaintiff have to prove a physical intrusion? Why or why not?

Appropriation

The use of another person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic, without permission and for the benefit of the user, constitutes the tort of appropriation (sometimes referred to as the right of publicity). Under the law, normally an individual's right to privacy includes the right to the exclusive use of his or her identity. For example, in one early case, Vanna White, the hostess of the popular Wheel of Fortune game show, brought a case against Samsung Electronics America, Inc. Without permission, Samsung had included in an advertisement a robotic image dressed in a wig, gown, and jewelry, in a setting that resembled the Wheel of Fortune set, in a stance for which White is famous. The court ruled in White's favor, holding that the tort of appropriation does not require the use of a celebrity's name or actual likeness. The court stated that Samsung's robot ad left "little doubt" as to the identity of the celebrity that the ad was meant to depict.⁶

Degree of Likeness In recent cases, courts have reached different conclusions as to the degree of likeness that is required to impose liability for the tort of appropriation. In one case, a former professional hockey player, Anthony "Tony" Twist, who had a reputation for fighting, sued the publishers of the comic book Spawn, which included an evil character named Anthony Tony Twist Twistelli. The Missouri Supreme Court held that the use of Tony Twist's name alone was sufficient proof of likeness to support a misappropriation claim.⁷ Ultimately, the hockey player was awarded $15 million in damages.⁸

In California, in contrast, Keirin Kirby, the lead singer in a 1990s funk band called Deee-Lite, lost her appropriation claim against the makers of the video game Space Channel 5. Although the video game's character "Ulala" had some of Kirby's distinctive traits—hot pink hair, short skirt, platform shoes, and dance moves—there were not enough similarities, according to the state appellate court, to constitute misappropriation.⁹

6. White v. Samsung Electronics America, Inc., 971 F.2d 1395 (9th Cir. 1992).

7. Doe v. TCI Cablevision, 110 S.W.3d 363 (Mo. 2003).

8. The amount of damages was appealed and subsequently affirmed. See Doe v. McFarlane, 207 S.W.3d 52 (Mo. App. 2006).

9. Kirby v. Sega of America, Inc., 144 Cal. App. 4th 47, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 607 (2006).

Right of Publicity as a Property Right As mentioned, the common law tort of appropriation in many states has become known as the right of publicity.¹⁰ Rather than being aimed at protecting a person's right to be left alone (privacy), this right aims to protect an individual's pecuniary (financial) interest in the commercial exploitation of his or her identity. In other words, it gives public figures, celebrities, and entertainers a right to sue anyone who uses their images for commercial benefit without their permission. Cases involving the right of publicity generally turn on whether the use was commercial. For instance, if a television news program reports on a celebrity and shows an image of the person, the use likely would not be classified as commercial; in contrast, including the celebrity's image on a poster without his or her permission would be a commercial use.

Because the right of publicity is similar to a property right, most states have concluded that the right is inheritable and survives the death of the person who held the right. Normally, though, the person must provide for the passage of the right to another in her or his will. In 2007, for example, a court held that because Marilyn Monroe's will did not specifically state a desire to pass the right to publicity to her heirs, the beneficiaries under her will did not have a right to prevent a company from marketing T-shirts and other merchandise using Monroe's name, picture, and likeness.¹¹

Fraudulent Misrepresentation

A misrepresentation leads another to believe in a condition that is different from the condition that actually exists. This is often accomplished through a false or an incorrect statement. Although persons sometimes make misrepresentations accidentally because they are unaware of the existing facts, the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation, or fraud, involves intentional deceit for personal gain. The tort includes several elements:

1. A misrepresentation of material facts or conditions with knowledge that they are false or with reckless disregard for the truth.
2. An intent to induce another party to rely on the misrepresentation.
3. A justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation by the deceived party.

10. See, for example, California Civil Code Sections 3344 and 3344.1.

11. Shaw Family Archives, Ltd. v. CMG Worldwide, Inc., 486 F. Supp. 2d 309 (S.D.N.Y. 2007), presented as Case 50.1.

4. Damages suffered as a result of that reliance.
5. A causal connection between the misrepresentation and the injury suffered.

For fraud to occur, more than mere puffery, or seller's talk, must be involved. Fraud exists only when a person represents as a fact something he or she knows is untrue. For example, it is fraud to claim that the roof of a building does not leak when one knows that it does. Facts are objectively ascertainable, whereas seller's talk—such as “I am the best accountant in town”—is not, because the speaker is representing a subjective view.

Normally, the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation occurs only when there is reliance on a statement of fact. Sometimes, however, reliance on a statement of opinion may involve the tort of fraudulent misrepresentation if the individual making the statement of opinion has superior knowledge of the subject matter. For example, when a lawyer makes a statement of opinion about the law in a state in which the lawyer is licensed to practice, a court would construe reliance on such a statement to be equivalent to reliance on a statement of fact.

Abusive or Frivolous Litigation

Persons or businesses generally have a right to sue when they have been injured. In recent years, however, an increasing number of meritless lawsuits have been filed—sometimes simply to harass the defendant. Defending oneself in any legal proceeding can be costly, time consuming, and emotionally draining. Tort law recognizes that people have a right not to be sued without a legally just and proper reason. It therefore protects individuals from the misuse of litigation. Torts related to abusive litigation include malicious prosecution and abuse of process.

If the party that initiated a lawsuit did so out of malice and without probable cause (a legitimate legal reason), and ended up losing that suit, the party can be sued for malicious prosecution. In some states, the plaintiff (who was the defendant in the first proceeding) must also prove injury other than the normal costs of litigation, such as lost profits. Abuse of process can apply to any person using a legal process against another in an improper manner or to accomplish a purpose for which the process was not designed. The key difference between the torts of abuse of process and malicious prosecution is the level of proof. Abuse of process does not require the plaintiff to prove malice or show that the defendant (who was previously the plaintiff) lost in a prior legal proceeding.¹² Abuse of process is also not limited to prior litigation. It can be based on the wrongful use of subpoenas, court orders to attach or seize real property, or other types of formal legal process. Concept Summary 6.1 on the next page reviews intentional torts against persons.

Business Torts

Most torts can occur in any context, but a few torts, referred to as business torts, apply only to wrongful interferences with the business rights of others. Business torts generally fall into two categories—interference with a contractual relationship and interference with a business relationship.

Wrongful Interference with a Contractual Relationship

The body of tort law relating to wrongful interference with a contractual relationship has increased greatly in recent years. A landmark case in this area involved an opera singer, Joanna Wagner, who was under contract to sing for a man named Lumley for a specified period of years. A man named Gye, who knew of this contract, nonetheless “enticed” Wagner to refuse to carry out the agreement, and Wagner began to sing for Gye. Gye’s action constituted a tort because it interfered with the contractual relationship between Wagner and Lumley. (Of course, Wagner’s refusal to carry out the agreement also entitled Lumley to sue Wagner for breach of contract.)¹³

Three elements are necessary for wrongful interference with a contractual relationship to occur:

1. A valid, enforceable contract must exist between two parties.
2. A third party must know that this contract exists.
3. This third party must intentionally induce a party to the contract to breach the contract.

In principle, any lawful contract can be the basis for an action of this type. The contract could be between a firm and its employees or a firm and its customers. Sometimes, a competitor of a firm draws away one of the firm’s key employees. Only if the original employer

12. Bernhard-Thomas Building Systems, LLC v. Duncan, 918 A.2d 889 (Conn.App. 2007); and Hewitt v. Rice, 154 P.3d 408 (Colo. 2007).

13. Lumley v. Gye, 118 Eng.Rep. 749 (1853).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 6.1

Intentional Torts against Persons

Name of Tort	Description
ASSAULT AND BATTERY	Any unexcused and intentional act that causes another person to be apprehensive of immediate harm is an assault. An assault resulting in physical contact is battery.
FALSE IMPRISONMENT	An intentional confinement or restraint of another person's movement without justification.
INTENTIONAL INFLICTION OF EMOTIONAL DISTRESS	An intentional act that amounts to extreme and outrageous conduct resulting in severe emotional distress to another.
DEFAMATION (LIBEL OR SLANDER)	A false statement of fact, not made under privilege, that is communicated to a third person and that causes damage to a person's reputation. For public figures, the plaintiff must also prove that the statement was made with actual malice.
INVASION OF PRIVACY	Publishing or otherwise making known or using information relating to a person's private life and affairs, with which the public has no legitimate concern, without that person's permission or approval.
APPROPRIATION	The use of another person's name, likeness, or other identifying characteristic without permission and for the benefit of the user.
FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION (FRAUD)	A false representation made by one party, through misstatement of facts or through conduct, with the intention of deceiving another and on which the other reasonably relies to his or her detriment.
ABUSIVE LITIGATION	The filing of a lawsuit without legitimate grounds and with malice or the use of a legal process in an improper manner.

can show that the competitor knew of the contract's existence, and intentionally induced the breach, can damages be recovered from the competitor.

Wrongful Interference with a Business Relationship

Businesspersons devise countless schemes to attract customers, but they are prohibited from unreasonably interfering with another's business in their attempts to gain a greater share of the market. There is a difference between competitive practices and predatory behavior—actions undertaken with the intention of unlawfully driving competitors completely out of the market.

Attempting to attract customers in general is a legitimate business practice, whereas specifically targeting the customers of a competitor is more likely to be predatory. For example, the mall contains two athletic shoe stores: Joe's and Sprint. Joe's cannot station an employee at the entrance of Sprint to divert customers to Joe's and tell them that Joe's will beat Sprint's prices. Doing this would constitute the tort of wrongful interference with a business relationship because it would interfere with a prospective (economic) advantage; such behavior is commonly considered to be an unfair trade practice. If this type of activity were permitted, Joe's would reap the benefits of Sprint's advertising.

Although state laws vary on wrongful interference with a business relationship, generally a plaintiff must prove that the defendant used predatory methods to intentionally harm an established business relationship or prospective economic advantage. The plaintiff must also prove that the defendant's interference caused the plaintiff to suffer economic harm.

Defenses to Wrongful Interference

A person will not be liable for the tort of wrongful interference with a contractual or business relationship if it can be shown that the interference was justified, or permissible. Bona fide competitive behavior is a permissible interference even if it results in the breaking of a contract.

For example, if Jerrod's Meats advertises so effectively that it induces Sam's Restaurant to break its contract with Burke's Meat Company, Burke's Meat Company will be unable to recover against Jerrod's Meats on a wrongful interference theory. After all, the public policy that favors free competition in advertising outweighs any possible instability that such competitive activity might cause in contractual relations. Although luring customers away from a competitor through aggressive marketing and advertising strategies obviously interferes with the competitor's relationship with its customers, courts typically allow such activities in the spirit of competition.

Intentional Torts against Property

Intentional torts against property include trespass to land, trespass to personal property, conversion, and disparagement of property. These torts are wrongful actions that interfere with individuals' legally recognized rights with regard to their land or personal property. The law distinguishes real property from personal property (see Chapter 47). Real property is land and things permanently attached to the land. Personal property consists of all other items, which are basically movable. Thus, a house and lot are real property, whereas the furniture inside a house is personal property. Cash and securities are also personal property.

Trespass to Land

The tort of trespass to land occurs any time a person, without permission, enters onto, above, or below the surface of land that is owned by another; causes anything to enter onto the land; or remains on the land or permits anything to remain on it. Actual harm to the land is not an essential element of this tort because the tort is designed to protect the right of an owner to exclusive possession. Common types of trespass to land include walking or driving on another's land; shooting a gun over another's land; throwing rocks at or spraying water on a building that belongs to someone else; building a dam across a river, thereby causing water to back up on someone else's land; and constructing one's building so that it extends onto an adjoining landowner's property.

Trespass Criteria, Rights, and Duties

Before a person can be a trespasser, the real property owner (or other person in actual and exclusive possession of the property, such as a person who is leasing the property) must establish that person as a trespasser. For example, "posted" trespass signs expressly establish as a trespasser a person who ignores these signs and enters onto the property. Any person who enters onto another's property to commit an illegal act (such as a thief entering a lumberyard at night to steal lumber) is established impliedly as a trespasser, without posted signs.

At common law, a trespasser is liable for damages caused to the property and generally cannot hold the owner liable for injuries that the trespasser sustains on the premises. This common law rule is being abandoned in many jurisdictions, however, in favor of a "reasonable duty" rule that varies depending on the status of the parties. For example, a landowner may have a duty to post a notice that the property is patrolled by guard dogs. Also, under the "attractive nuisance" doctrine, a landowner may be held liable for injuries sustained by young children on the landowner's property if the children were attracted to the premises by some object, such as a swimming pool or an abandoned building. Finally, an owner can remove a trespasser from the premises—or detain a trespasser on the premises for a reasonable time—through the use of reasonable force without being liable for assault, battery, or false imprisonment.

Defenses against Trespass to Land

Trespass to land involves wrongful interference with another person's real property rights. If it can be shown that the trespass was warranted, however, as when a trespasser enters to assist someone in danger, a defense exists. Another defense exists when the trespasser can show that he or she had a license to come onto the land. A licensee is one who is invited (or allowed to enter) onto the property of another for the licensee's benefit. A person who enters another's property to read an electric meter, for example, is a licensee. When you purchase a ticket to attend a movie or sporting event, you are licensed to go onto the property of another to view that movie or event. Note that licenses to enter onto another's property are revocable by the property owner. If a property owner asks a meter reader to leave and the meter reader refuses to do so, the meter reader at that point becomes a trespasser.

Trespass to Personal Property

Whenever any individual, without consent, takes or harms the personal property of another or otherwise interferes with the lawful owner's possession and enjoyment of personal property, trespass to personal property occurs. This tort may also be called trespass to chattels or trespass to personalty. In this context, harm means not only destruction of the property, but also anything that diminishes its value, condition, or quality. Trespass to personal property involves intentional meddling with a possessory interest (an interest arising from possession), including barring an owner's access to personal property. If Kelly takes Ryan's business law book as a practical joke and hides it so that Ryan is unable to find it for several days prior to the final examination, Kelly has engaged in a trespass to personal property.

If it can be shown that trespass to personal property was warranted, then a complete defense exists. Most states, for example, allow automobile repair shops to hold a customer's car (under what is called an artisan's lien, discussed in Chapter 28) when the customer refuses to pay for repairs already completed. Trespass to personal property was one of the allegations in the following case.

EXTENDED CASE 6.2 Register.com, Inc. v. Verio, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 2004. 356 F.3d 393.

LEVAL, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

* * * [Register.com, Inc.] is one of over fifty companies serving as registrars for the issuance of domain names on the World Wide Web. As a registrar, Register issues domain names to persons and entities preparing to establish Web sites on the Internet. Web sites are identified and accessed by reference to their domain names.

Register was appointed a registrar of domain names by the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, known by the acronym "ICANN." ICANN * * * administer[s] the Internet domain name system. To become a registrar of domain names, Register was required to enter into a standard form agreement with ICANN * * * .

Applicants to register a domain name submit to the registrar contact information, including at a minimum, the applicant's name, postal address, telephone number, and electronic mail address. The ICANN Agreement, referring to this registrant contact information under the rubric "WHOIS information," requires the registrar * * * to preserve it, update it daily, and provide for free public access to it through the Internet * * * .

* * * [T]he ICANN Agreement requires the registrar to permit use of its WHOIS data "for any lawful purposes except to * * * support the transmission of mass unsolicited, commercial advertising or solicitations via e-mail (spam) * * * ."

* * * *

* * * An entity making a WHOIS query through Register's Internet site * * * would receive a reply furnishing the requested WHOIS information, captioned by a legend devised by Register, which stated,

By submitting a WHOIS query, you agree that you will use this data only for lawful purposes and that under no circumstances will you use this data to * * * support the transmission of mass unsolicited, commercial advertising or solicitation via e-mail. * * * .

* * * *

The defendant [Verio, Inc.] * * * is engaged in the business of selling a variety of Web site design, development and operation services. * * * To facilitate its pursuit of customers, Verio undertook to obtain daily updates of the WHOIS information relating to newly registered domain names. To achieve this, Verio devised an automated software program, or robot, which each day would submit multiple successive WHOIS queries * * * . Upon acquiring the WHOIS information of new registrants, Verio would send them marketing solicitations by e-mail, telemarketing and direct mail. * * * .

* * * *

Register wrote to Verio demanding that it cease * * * . Verio * * * refused * * * .

Register brought this suit [in a federal district court] on August 3, 2000 * * * . Register asserted, among other claims, that Verio was * * * trespassing on Register's chattels [personal property] in a manner likely to harm Register's computer systems by the use of Verio's automated robot software programs. On December 8, 2000, the district court entered a preliminary injunction. The injunction barred Verio from * * * [a]ccessing Register.com's computers and computer networks * * * by software programs performing multiple, automated, successive queries * * * .

CHAPTER 6 Intentional Torts

CASE 6.2 CONTINUED

* * * * *

Verio * * * attacks the grant of the preliminary injunction against its accessing Register's computers by automated software programs performing multiple successive queries. This prong of the injunction was premised on Register's claim of trespass to chattels. Verio contends the ruling was in error because Register failed to establish that Verio's conduct resulted in harm to Register's servers and because Verio's robot access to the WHOIS database through Register was "not unauthorized." We believe the district court's findings were within the range of its permissible discretion.

*A trespass to a chattel may be committed by intentionally * * * using or intermeddling with a chattel in the possession of another, where the chattel is impaired as to its condition, quality, or value.* [Emphasis added.]

The district court found that Verio's use of search robots, consisting of software programs performing multiple automated successive queries, consumed a significant portion of the capacity of Register's computer systems. While Verio's robots alone would not incapacitate Register's systems, the court found that if Verio were permitted to continue to access Register's computers through such robots, it was "highly probable" that other Internet service providers would devise similar programs to access Register's data, and that the system would be overtaxed and would crash. We cannot say these findings were unreasonable.

Nor is there merit to Verio's contention that it cannot be engaged in trespass when Register had never instructed it not to use its robot programs. As the district court noted, Register's complaint sufficiently advised Verio that its use of robots was not authorized and, according to Register's contentions, would cause harm to Register's systems.

* * * * *

The ruling of the district court is hereby AFFIRMED * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. Why should the use of a robot, or "bot," to initiate "multiple successive queries" have a different legal effect than typing and submitting queries manually?
2. Are there any circumstances under which the use of a bot to initiate "multiple successive queries" could be justified against claims of trespass to personal property?

Conversion

Whenever a person wrongfully possesses or uses the personal property of another as if the property belonged to her or him, the tort of conversion occurs. Any act that deprives an owner of personal property of the use of that property without that owner's permission and without just cause can be conversion. Often, when conversion occurs, a trespass to personal property also occurs because the original taking of the personal property from the owner was a trespass, and wrongfully retaining it is conversion. Conversion requires a more serious interference with the personal property than trespass, in terms of the duration and extensiveness of use.

Conversion is the civil side of crimes related to theft, but it is not limited to theft. Even when the rightful owner consented to the initial taking of the property so there was no theft or trespass, a failure to return the personal property may still be conversion. For example, Chen borrows Marik's iPod to use while traveling home from school for the holidays. When Chen returns to school, Marik asks for his iPod back, but Chen says that he gave it to his little brother for Christmas. In this situation, Marik can sue Chen for conversion, and Chen will have to either return the iPod or pay damages equal to its value.

Similarly, even if a person mistakenly believed that she or he was entitled to the goods, a tort of conversion may still have occurred. In other words, good intentions are not a defense against conversion; in fact, conversion can be an entirely innocent act. Someone who buys stolen goods, for example, has committed the tort of conversion even if he or she did not know the goods were stolen. Note that even the taking of electronic records and data may form the basis of a common law conversion claim.¹⁴ So can the wrongful taking of a domain name or the misappropriation of a net loss that harms a company.¹⁵ Thus, the personal property need not be tangible (physical) property.

Disparagement of Property

Disparagement of property occurs when economically injurious falsehoods are made about another's product or property rather than about another's reputation (as in the tort of defamation). Disparagement of property is a general term for torts that can be more specifically referred to as slander of quality or slander of title.

Slander of Quality Publishing false information about another's product, alleging it is not what its seller claims, constitutes the tort of slander of quality, or trade libel. The plaintiff must prove that actual damages proximately resulted from the slander of quality. In other words, the plaintiff must show not only that a third person refrained from dealing with the plaintiff because of the improper publication but also that the plaintiff suffered damages because the third person refrained from dealing with him or her. The economic calculation of such damages—they are, after all, conjectural—is often extremely difficult.

An improper publication may be both a slander of quality and a defamation of character. For example, a statement that disparages the quality of a product may also, by implication, disparage the character of a person who would sell such a product.

Slander of Title When a publication falsely denies or casts doubt on another's legal ownership of property, resulting in financial loss to the property's owner, the tort of slander of title occurs. Usually, this is an intentional tort in which someone knowingly publishes an untrue statement about another's ownership of certain property with the intent of discouraging a third person from dealing with the person slandered. For example, it would be difficult for a car dealer to attract customers after competitors published a notice that the dealer's stock consisted of stolen autos. See Concept Summary 6.2 for a review of intentional torts against property.

14. See Thyroff v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., 8 N.Y.3d 283, 864 N.E.2d 1272 (2007).

15. See Kremen v. Cohen, 325 F.3d 1035 (9th Cir. 2003); and Fremont Indemnity Co. v. Fremont General Corp., 148 Cal.App.4th 97, 55 Cal.Rptr.3d 621 (2d Dist. 2007).

Cyber Torts

Torts can also be committed in the online environment. Torts committed via the Internet are often called cyber torts. Over the years, the courts have had to

CONCEPT SUMMARY 6.2 Intentional Torts against Property

Name of Tort	Description
TRESPASS TO LAND	The invasion of another's real property without consent or privilege. Specific rights and duties apply once a person is expressly or impliedly established as a trespasser.
TRESPASS TO PERSONAL PROPERTY	The intentional interference with an owner's right to use, possess, or enjoy his or her personal property without the owner's consent.
CONVERSION	The wrongful possession or use of another person's personal property without just cause.
DISPARAGEMENT OF PROPERTY	Any economically injurious falsehood that is made about another's product or property; an inclusive term for the torts of slander of quality and slander of title .

decide how to apply traditional tort law to torts committed in cyberspace. Consider, for example, issues of proof. How can it be proved that an online defamatory remark was “published” (which requires that a third party see or hear it)? How can the identity of the person who made the remark be discovered? Can an Internet service provider (ISP), such as America Online, Inc. (AOL), be forced to reveal the source of an anonymous comment? We explore some of these questions in this section, as well as some legal issues that have arisen with respect to bulk e-mail advertising.

Defamation Online

Recall from the discussion of defamation earlier in this chapter that one who repeats or otherwise republishes a defamatory statement is subject to liability as if he or she had originally published it. Thus, publishers generally can be held liable for defamatory contents in the books and periodicals that they publish. Now consider online message forums. These forums allow anyone—customers, employees, or crackpots—to complain about a business firm’s personnel, policies, practices, or products. Regardless of whether the complaint is justified and whether it is true, it might have an impact on the firm’s business. One of the early questions in the online legal arena was whether the providers of such forums could be held liable, as publishers, for defamatory statements made in those forums.

Immunity of Internet Service Providers

Newspapers, magazines, and television and radio stations may be held liable for defamatory remarks that they disseminate, even if those remarks are prepared or created by others. Prior to the passage of the Communications Decency Act (CDA) of 1996, the courts grappled on several occasions with the question of whether ISPs should be regarded as publishers and thus be held liable for defamatory messages made by users of their services. The CDA resolved the issue by stating that “[n]o provider or user of an interactive computer service shall be treated as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by another information content provider.”¹⁶ In other words, Internet publishers are treated differently from publishers in print, television, and radio, and are not liable for publishing defamatory statements, provided that the material came from a third party.

In a leading case on this issue, decided the year after the CDA was enacted, America Online, Inc. (AOL), now part of Time Warner, Inc.), was not held liable even though it failed to promptly remove defamatory messages of which it had been made aware. In upholding a district court’s ruling in AOL’s favor, a federal appellate court stated that the CDA “plainly immunizes computer service providers like AOL from liability for information that originates with third parties.” The court explained that the purpose of the statute is “to maintain the robust nature of Internet communication and, accordingly, to keep government interference in the medium to a minimum.”¹⁷ The courts have reached similar conclusions in subsequent cases, extending the CDA’s immunity to Web message boards, online auction houses, Internet dating services, and any business that provides e-mail and Web browsing services.¹⁸

In the following case, the court considered the scope of immunity that could be accorded to an online roommate-matching service under the CDA.

16. 47 U.S.C. Section 230.

17. Zeran v. America Online, Inc., 129 F.3d 327 (4th Cir. 1997); cert. denied, 524 U.S. 937, 118 S.Ct. 2341, 141 L.Ed.2d 712 (1998).

18. See Universal Communications Systems, Inc. v. Lycos, Inc., 478 F.3d 413 (1st Cir. 2007); Barrett v. Rosenthal, 40 Cal.4th 33, 51 Cal.Rptr.3d 55 (2006); Delfino v. Agilent Technologies, Inc., 145 Cal.App. 4th 790, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 376 (N.D. Cal. 2006); Noah v. AOL Time Warner, Inc., 261 F.Supp.2d 532 (E.D. Va. 2003); and Carafano v. Metrosplash.com, Inc., 339 F.3d 1119 (9th Cir. 2003).

CASE 6.3 Fair Housing Council of San Fernando Valley v. Roommate.com, LLC

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2007. 489 F.3d 921.

- Background and Facts Roommate.com, LLC, operates an online roommate-matching Web site at www.roommates.com. The site helps individuals find roommates based on their descriptions of themselves and their roommate preferences. Roommates.com has approximately 150,000 active listings and receives about a million user views per day. To become members of Roommate, users respond to a series of online questions, choosing from answers in drop-down and select-a-box menus. Users disclose information about themselves and their roommate preferences based on age, gender, and other characteristics, as well as on whether children will live in the household. Members can create personal profiles, search lists of compatible roommates, and send “roommail” messages to other members. Roommate also e-mails newsletters to members seeking housing, listing compatible members who have places to rent. The Fair Housing Councils of San Fernando Valley and San Diego, California, filed a suit in a federal district court against Roommate, claiming that the defendant violated the Fair Housing Act (FHA) by asking for and distributing the information in its member profiles. The court held that the Communications Decency Act (CDA) barred this claim and dismissed it. The councils appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 6.3 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
KOZINSKI, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

The touchstone of [the CDA] is that providers of interactive computer services are immune from liability for content created by third parties. *The immunity applies to a defendant who is the “provider * * * of an interactive computer service” and is being sued “as the publisher or speaker of any information provided by” someone else.* Reviewing courts have treated [this] immunity as quite robust. [Emphasis added.]

The Councils do not dispute that Roommate is a provider of an interactive computer service. As such, Roommate is immune so long as it merely publishes information provided by its members. However, Roommate is not immune for publishing materials as to which it is an “information content provider.” [Under the CDA, a] content provider is “any person or entity that is responsible, in whole or in part, for the creation or development of information provided through the Internet.” In other words, if Roommate passively publishes information provided by others, the CDA protects it from liability that would otherwise attach under state or federal law as a result of such publication. But if it is responsible, in whole or in part, for creating or developing the information, it becomes a content provider and is not entitled to CDA immunity. * * *

* * * *

* * * Roommate is “responsible” for [the] questionnaires [that it requires users to fill out to register with the service] because it “creat[ed] or develop[ed]” the forms and answer choices. As a result, Roommate is a content provider of these questionnaires and does not qualify for CDA immunity for their publication.

* * * *

We now turn to the more difficult question of whether the CDA exempts Roommate from liability for publishing and distributing its members’ profiles, which it generates from their answers to the form questionnaires.

* * * *

* * * Roommate does more than merely publish information it solicits from its members. Roommate also channels the information based on members’ answers to various questions, as well as the answers of other members. Thus, Roommate allows members to search only the profiles of members with compatible preferences. For example, a female room-seeker who is living with a child can only search profiles of room-providers who have indicated they are willing to live with women and children. Roommate also sends room-seekers e-mail notifications that exclude listings incompatible with their profiles. Thus, Roommate will not notify our female about room-providers who say they will not live with women or children.

While Roommate provides a useful service, its search mechanism and e-mail notifications mean that it is neither a passive pass-through of information provided by others nor merely a facilitator of expression by individuals. By categorizing, channeling and limiting the distribution of users’ profiles, Roommate provides an additional layer of information that it is responsible at least in part for creating or developing.

• Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit concluded that the CDA does not immunize Roommate for all of the content on its Web site and in its e-mail newsletters. The appellate court reversed the lower court’s summary judgment and remanded the case for “a determination of whether [Roommate’s] non-immune publication and distribution of information violates the FHA [Fair Housing Act].”

CASE 6.3 CONTINUED

● The Ethical Dimension Do Internet service providers (ISPs) have an ethical duty to advise their users if the information that the users provide for distribution through the ISPs might violate the law? Explain.

● The E-Commerce Dimension Should the courts continue to regard the CDA's grant of immunity to ISPs as "quite robust"? Why or why not?

Piercing the Veil of Anonymity A threshold barrier to anyone who seeks to bring an action for online defamation is discovering the identity of the person who posted the defamatory message online. ISPs can disclose personal information about their customers only when ordered to do so by a court. Consequently, businesses and individuals often resort to filing lawsuits against "John Does" (John Doe is a fictitious name that is used when the name of the particular person is not known). Then, using the authority of the courts, they attempt to obtain from the ISPs the identities of the persons responsible for the messages. This strategy has worked in some cases,¹⁹ but not in others.²⁰ Courts typically are reluctant to deter those who would potentially post messages on the Internet from exercising their First Amendment right to speak anonymously. After all, speaking anonymously is part of the nature of the Internet and helps to make it a useful forum for public discussion.

Spam

Bulk, unsolicited e-mail ("junk" e-mail) sent to all of the users on a particular e-mailing list or all of the members of a newsgroup is often called spam.²¹ Typically, spam consists of product ads. Spam can waste user time and network bandwidth (the amount of data that can be transmitted within a certain time). It also imposes a burden on an ISP's equipment as well as on an e-mail recipient's computer system.²² Because of the problems associated with spam, the majority of states now have laws regulating its transmission. In 2003, the U.S. Congress also enacted a law to regulate the use of spam, although the volume of spam has actually increased since the law was enacted.

Statutory Regulation of Spam In an attempt to combat spam, thirty-six states have enacted laws that prohibit or regulate its use. Many state laws regulating spam require the senders of e-mail ads to instruct the recipients on how they can "opt out" of further e-mail ads from the same sources. For instance, in some states an unsolicited e-mail ad must include a toll-free phone number or return e-mail address through which the recipient can contact the sender to request that no more ads be e-mailed. The most stringent state law is California's antispam law, which went into effect on January 1, 2004. That law follows the "opt-in" model favored by consumer groups and antispam advocates. In other words, the law prohibits any person or business from sending e-mail ads to or from any e-mail address in California unless the recipient has expressly agreed to receive e-mails from the sender. An exemption is made for e-mail sent to consumers with whom the advertiser has a "preexisting or current business relationship."

The Federal CAN-SPAM Act In 2003, Congress enacted the Controlling the Assault of Non-Solicited Pornography and Marketing (CAN-SPAM) Act, which took effect on January 1, 2004. The legislation applies to any "commercial electronic mail messages" that are sent to promote a commercial product or service. Significantly, the statute preempts state antispam laws except for those provisions in state laws that prohibit false and deceptive e-mailing practices.

Generally, the act permits the use of unsolicited commercial e-mail but prohibits certain types of spamming activities, including the use of a false return address and the use of false, misleading, or deceptive information when sending e-mail. The statute also prohibits the use of "dictionary attacks"—sending messages to randomly generated e-mail addresses—and the "harvesting" of e-mail addresses

19. Does v. Hvide, 770 So.2d 1237 (Fla.App.3d 2000).

20. See, for example, Doe v. Cahill, 884 A.2d 451 (Del.Super.2005); and Dendrite International, Inc. v. Doe No. 3, 342 N.J.Super. 134, 775 A.2d 756 (2001).

21. The term spam is said to come from a Monty Python song with the lyrics, "Spam spam spam spam, spam spam spam spam, lovely spam, wonderful spam." Like these lyrics, spam online is often considered to be a repetition of worthless text.

22. For an early case in which a court found that spam constituted a trespass to personal property because of the burden on the ISP's equipment, see CompuServe, Inc. v. Cyber Promotions, Inc., 962 F.Supp. 1015 (S.D. Ohio 1997).

from Web sites through the use of specialized software. Notwithstanding the requirements of the federal act, the reality is that the problem of spam is difficult to address because much of it is funneled through foreign servers.

REVIEWING Intentional Torts

Two sisters, Darla and Irene, are partners in an import business located in a small town in Rhode Island. Irene is married to a well-known real estate developer and is campaigning to be the mayor of their town. Darla is in her mid-thirties and has never been married. Both sisters travel to other countries to purchase the goods they sell at their retail store. Irene buys Indonesian goods, and Darla buys goods from Africa. After a tsunami (tidal wave) destroys many of the cities in Indonesia to which Irene usually travels, she phones one of her contacts there and asks him to procure some items and ship them to her. He informs her that it will be impossible to buy these items now because the townspeople are being evacuated due to a water shortage. Irene is angry and tells the man that if he cannot purchase the goods, he should just take them without paying for them after the town has been evacuated. Darla overhears her sister's instructions and is outraged. They have a falling-out, and Darla decides that she no longer wishes to be in business with her sister. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that Darla tells several of her friends about Irene's instructing the man to take goods without paying for them after the tsunami disaster. Under which intentional tort theory discussed in this chapter might Irene attempt to sue Darla? Would Irene's suit be successful? Why or why not?
2. Now suppose that Irene wins the election and becomes the city's mayor. Darla then writes a letter to the editor of the local newspaper disclosing Irene's misconduct. What intentional tort might Irene accuse Darla of committing? What defenses could Darla assert?
3. If Irene accepts goods shipped from Indonesia that were wrongfully obtained, has she committed an intentional tort against property? Explain.
4. Suppose now that Irene, who is angry with her sister for disclosing her business improprieties, writes a letter to the editor falsely accusing Darla of having sexual relations with her neighbor's thirteen-year-old son. For what intentional tort or torts could Darla sue Irene in this situation?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

actionable 126

actual malice 128

appropriation 130

assault 123

battery 123

business tort 131

compensatory damages 122

conversion 135

cyber tort 136

defamation 126

disparagement of property 136

fraudulent misrepresentation 130

intentional tort 123 libel 126 privilege 127

puffery 131

punitive damages 123

slander 126

slander of quality 136

slander of title 136

spam 139

tort 122

tortfeasor 123

trade libel 136

trespass to land 133

trespass to personal property 134

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

6-1. Richard is an employee of the Dun Construction Corp. While delivering materials to a construction site, he carelessly backs Dun's truck into a passenger vehicle driven by Green. This is Richard's second accident in six months. When the company owner, Dun, learns of this latest accident, a heated discussion ensues, and Dun fires Richard. Dun is so angry that he immediately writes a letter to the union of which Richard is a member and to all other construction companies in the community, stating that Richard is the "worst driver in the city" and that "anyone who hires him is asking for legal liability." Richard files a suit against Dun, alleging libel on the basis of the statements made in the letters. Discuss the results.

6-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Lothar owns a bakery. He has been trying to obtain a long-term contract with the owner of Martha's Tea Salons for some time. Lothar starts a local advertising campaign on radio and television and in the newspaper. This advertising campaign is so persuasive that Martha decides to break the contract she has had with Harley's Bakery so that she can patronize Lothar's bakery. Is Lothar liable to Harley's Bakery for the tort of wrongful interference with a contractual relationship? Is Martha liable for this tort?

- For a sample answer to Question 6-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

6-3. Gerrit is a former employee of ABC Auto Repair Co. He enters ABC's repair shop, claiming that the company owes him $800 in back wages. Gerrit argues with ABC's general manager, Steward, and Steward orders him off the property. Gerrit refuses to leave, and Steward tells two mechanics to throw him off the property. Gerrit runs to his truck, but on the way, he grabs some tools valued at $800; then he drives away. Gerrit refuses to return the tools.

- Discuss whether Gerrit has committed any torts.
- If the mechanics had thrown Gerrit off the property, would ABC be guilty of assault and battery? Explain.

6-4. Bombardier Capital, Inc., provides financing to boat and recreational vehicle dealers. Bombardier's credit policy requires dealers to forward immediately to Bombardier the proceeds of boat sales. When Howard Mulcahey, Bombardier's vice president of sales and marketing, learned that dealers were not complying with this policy, he told Frank Chandler, Bombardier's credit director, of his concern. Before Chandler could obtain the proceeds, Mulcahey falsely told Jacques Gingras, Bombardier's president, that Chandler was, among other things, trying to hide the problem. On the basis of Mulcahey's statements, Gingras fired Chandler and put Mulcahey in charge of the credit department. Under what business tort theory discussed in this chapter might Chandler recover damages from Mulcahey? Explain.

6-5. Trespass to Property. America Online, Inc. (AOL), provides services to its customers or members, including the transmission of e-mail to and from other members and across the Internet. To become a member, a person must agree not to use AOL's computers to send bulk, unsolicited, commercial e-mail (spam). AOL uses filters to block spam, but bulk e-mailers sometimes use other software to thwart the filters. National Health Care Discount, Inc. (NHCD), sells discount optical and dental service plans. To generate leads for NHCD's products, sales representatives, who included AOL members, sent more than 300 million pieces of spam through AOL's computer system. Each item cost AOL an estimated $0.00078 in equipment expenses. Some of the spam used false headers and other methods to hide the source. After receiving more than 150,000 complaints from its members, AOL asked NHCD to stop. When the spam continued, AOL filed a suit in a federal district court against NHCD, alleging, in part, trespass to chattels—an unlawful interference with another's rights to possess personal property. AOL asked the court for a summary judgment on this claim. Did the spamming constitute trespass to chattels? Explain. [America Online, Inc. v. National Health Care Discount, Inc., 121 F.Supp.2d 1255 (N.D. Iowa 2000)]

6-6. Intentional Torts against Property. In 1994, Gary Kremen registered the domain name "sex.com" with Network Solutions, Inc., to the name of Kremen's business, Online Classifieds. Later, Stephen Cohen sent Network Solutions a letter that he claimed to have received from Online Classifieds. It stated that "we have no objections to your use of the domain name sex.com and this letter shall serve as our authorization to the Internet registrar to transfer sex.com to your corporation." Without contacting Kremen, Network Solutions transferred the name to Cohen, who subsequently turned sex.com into a lucrative business. Kremen filed a suit in a federal district court against Cohen and others, seeking the name and Cohen's profits. The court ordered Cohen to return the name to Kremen and pay $65 million in damages. Cohen ignored the order and disappeared. Against what other parties might Kremen attempt to obtain relief? Under which theory of intentional torts against property might Kremen be able to file an action? What is the likely result, and why? [Kremen v. Cohen, 337 F.3d 1024 (9th Cir. 2003)]

6-7. Invasion of Privacy. During the spring and summer of 1999, Edward and Geneva Irvine received numerous "hang-up" phone calls, including three calls in the middle of the night. With the help of their local phone company, the Irvines learned that many of the calls were from the telemarketing department of the Akron Beacon Journal in Akron, Ohio. The Beacon's sales force was equipped with an automatic dialing machine. During business hours, the dialer was used to maximize productivity by calling multiple phone numbers at once and connecting a call to a sales representative only after it was answered. After business hours, the Beacon programmed its dialer to dial a list of disconnected numbers to determine whether they had been reconnected. If the dialer detected a ring, it recorded the information and dropped the call. If the automated dialing system crashed, which it did frequently, it redialed the entire list. The Irvines filed a suit in an Ohio state court against the Beacon and others, alleging, among other things, an invasion of privacy. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Irvine v. Akron Beacon Journal, 147 Ohio App.3d 428, 770 N.E.2d 1105 (9 Dist. 2002)]

6-8. Defamation. Lydia Hagberg went to her bank, California Federal Bank, FSB, to cash a check made out to her by Smith Barney (SB), an investment services firm. Nolene Showalter, a bank employee, suspected that the check was counterfeit. Showalter called SB and was told that the check was not valid. As she phoned the police, Gary Wood, a bank security officer, contacted SB again and was informed that its earlier statement was “erroneous” and that the check was valid. Meanwhile, a police officer arrived, drew Hagberg away from the teller’s window, spread her legs, patted her down, and handcuffed her. The officer searched her purse, asked her whether she had any weapons or stolen property and whether she was driving a stolen vehicle, and arrested her. Hagberg filed a suit in a California state court against the bank and others, alleging, among other things, slander. Should the absolute privilege for communications made in judicial or other official proceedings apply to statements made when a citizen contacts the police to report suspected criminal activity? Why or why not? [Hagberg v. California Federal Bank, FSB, 32 Cal.4th 350, 81 P.3d 244, 7 Cal.Rptr.3d 803 (2004)]

6-9. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Between 1996 and 1998, Donna Swanson received several anonymous, handwritten letters that, among other things, accused her husband, Alan, of infidelity. In 1998, John Grisham, Jr., the author of The Firm and many other best-selling novels, received an anonymous letter that appeared to have been written by the same person. Grisham and the Swansons suspected Katherine Almy, who soon filed a suit in a Virginia state court against them, alleging, among other things, intentional infliction of emotional distress. According to Almy, Grisham intended to have her “really, really, suffer” for writing the letters, and the three devised a scheme to falsely accuse her. They gave David Liebman, a handwriting analyst, samples of Almy’s handwriting. These included copies of confidential documents from her children’s files at St. Anne’s–Belfield School in Charlottesville, Virginia, where Alan taught and Grisham served on the board of directors. In Almy’s view, Grisham influenced Liebman to report that Almy might have written the letters and misrepresented this report as conclusive, which led the police to confront Almy. She claimed that she then suffered severe emotional distress and depression, causing “a complete disintegration of virtually every aspect of her life” and requiring her “to undergo extensive therapy.” In response, the defendants asked the court to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. Should the court grant this request? Explain. [Almy v. Grisham, 273 Va. 68, 639 S.E.2d 182 (2007)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 6–9, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 6,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

6-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

White Plains Coat & Apron Co. is a New York–based linen rental business. Cintas Corp. is a nationwide business that rents similar products. White Plains had five-year exclusive contracts with some of its customers. As a result of Cintas’s soliciting of business, dozens of White Plains’ customers breached their contracts and entered into rental agreements with Cintas. White Plains demanded that Cintas stop its solicitation of White Plains customers. Cintas refused. White Plains filed a suit in a federal district court against Cintas, alleging wrongful interference with existing contracts. Cintas argued that it had no knowledge of any contracts with White Plains and had not induced any breach. The court dismissed the suit, ruling that Cintas had a legitimate interest as a competitor to solicit business and make a profit. White Plains appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. [White Plains Coat & Apron Co. v. Cintas Corp., 8 N.Y.3d 422, 867 N.E.2d 381 (2007)]

- What are the two important policy interests at odds in wrongful interference cases? When there is an existing contract, which of these interests should be accorded priority?
- The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit asked the New York Court of Appeals to answer a question: Is a general interest in soliciting business for profit a sufficient defense to a claim of wrongful interference with a contractual relationship? What do you think? Why?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

You can find cases and articles on torts, including business torts, in the tort law library at the Internet Law Library's Web site. Go to www.lawguru.com/ilawlib

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 6" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 6-1: Legal Perspective
Online Defamation

Internet Exercise 6-2: Management Perspective
Legal and Illegal Uses of Spam

CHAPTER 7

Negligence and Strict Liability

The intentional torts discussed in Chapter 6 all involve acts that the tortfeasor (the one committing the tort) intended to commit. In this chapter, we examine the tort of negligence, which involves acts that depart from a reasonable standard of care and therefore create an unreasonable risk of harm to others. Negligence suits are probably the most prevalent type of lawsuits brought against businesses today. It is therefore essential that businesspersons understand their potential liability for negligent acts. In the concluding pages of this chapter, we also look at another basis for liability in tort—strict liability. Under this tort doctrine, liability does not depend on the actor's negligence or intent to harm, but on the breach of an absolute duty to make something safe.

Negligence

In contrast to intentional torts, in torts involving negligence, the tortfeasor neither wishes to bring about the consequences of the act nor believes that they will occur. The actor's conduct merely creates a risk of such consequences. If no risk is created, there is no negligence. Moreover, the risk must be foreseeable; that is, it must be such that a reasonable person engaging in the same activity would anticipate the risk and guard against it. In determining what is reasonable conduct, courts consider the nature of the possible harm. Creating a very slight risk of a dangerous explosion might be unreasonable, whereas creating a distinct possibility of someone's burning his or her fingers on a stove might be reasonable.

Many of the actions discussed in the chapter on intentional torts constitute negligence if the element of intent is missing (or cannot be proved). Suppose that Juarez walks up to Natsuyo and intentionally shoves her. Natsuyo falls and breaks her arm as a result. In this situation, Juarez has committed an intentional tort (battery). If Juarez carelessly bumps into Natsuyo, however, and she falls and breaks her arm as a result, Juarez's action constitutes negligence. In either situation, Juarez has committed a tort.

To succeed in a negligence action, the plaintiff must prove each of the following:

1. That the defendant owed a duty of care to the plaintiff.
2. That the defendant breached that duty.
3. That the plaintiff suffered a legally recognizable injury.
4. That the defendant's breach caused the plaintiff's injury.

We discuss here each of these four elements of negligence.

The Duty of Care and Its Breach

Central to the tort of negligence is the concept of a duty of care. This concept arises from the notion that if we are to live in society with other people, some actions can be tolerated and some cannot, and some actions are reasonable and some are not. The basic principle underlying the duty of care is that people are free to act as they please so long as their actions do not infringe on the interests of others.

When someone fails to comply with the duty to exercise reasonable care, a potentially tortious act may have been committed. Failure to live up to a standard of care may be an act (setting fire to a building) or an omission (neglecting to put out a campfire). It may be a careless act or a carefully performed but nevertheless dangerous act that results in injury. Courts consider the nature of the act (whether it is outrageous or commonplace), the manner in which the act is performed (heedlessly versus cautiously), and the nature of the injury (whether it is serious or slight) in determining whether the duty of care has been breached.

The Reasonable Person Standard Tort law measures duty by the reasonable person standard. In determining whether a duty of care has been breached, for example, the courts ask how a reasonable person would have acted in the same circumstances. The reasonable person standard is said to be (though in an absolute sense it cannot be) objective. It is not necessarily how a particular person would act. It is society's judgment of how an ordinarily prudent person should act. If the so-called reasonable person existed, he or she would be careful, conscientious, even tempered, and honest. That individuals are required to exercise a reasonable standard of care in their activities is a pervasive concept in business law, and many of the issues discussed in subsequent chapters of this text have to do with this duty.

In negligence cases, the degree of care to be exercised varies, depending on the defendant's occupation or profession, her or his relationship with the plaintiff, and other factors. Generally, whether an action constitutes a breach of the duty of care is determined on a case-by-case basis. The outcome depends on how the judge (or jury, if it is a jury trial) decides a reasonable person in the position of the defendant would act in the particular circumstances of the case. In the following subsections, we examine the degree of care typically expected of landowners and professionals.

Duty of Landowners Landowners are expected to exercise reasonable care to protect individuals coming onto their property from harm. In some jurisdictions, landowners may even have a duty to protect trespassers against certain risks. Landowners who rent or lease premises to tenants are expected to exercise reasonable care to ensure that the tenants and their guests are not harmed in common areas, such as stairways, entryways, and laundry rooms (see Chapter 48).

Duty to Warn Business Invitees of Risks. Retailers and other firms that explicitly or implicitly invite persons to come onto their premises are usually charged with a duty to exercise reasonable care to protect these business invitees. For example, if you entered a supermarket, slipped on a wet floor, and sustained injuries as a result, the owner of the supermarket would be liable for damages if, when you slipped, there was no sign warning that the floor was wet. A court would hold that the business owner was negligent because the owner failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care in protecting the store's customers against foreseeable risks about which the owner knew or should have known. That a patron might slip on the wet floor and be injured as a result was a foreseeable risk, and the owner should have taken care to avoid this risk or warn the customer of it.¹

Obvious Risks Provide an Exception. Some risks, of course, are so obvious that an owner need not warn of them. For example, a business owner does not need to warn customers to open a door before attempting to walk through it. Other risks, however, even though they may seem obvious to a business owner, may not be so in the eyes of another, such as a child. For example, a hardware store owner may not think it is necessary to warn customers that, if climbed, a stepladder leaning against the back wall of the store could fall down and harm them. It is possible, though, that a child could tip the ladder over while climbing it and be hurt as a result.

The issue in the following case was whether the obviousness of the existence of wet napkins on the floor of a nightclub obviated the owner's duty to its customers to maintain the premises in a safe condition.

1. A business owner can warn of a risk in a number of ways; for example, to warn of a hole in the business's parking lot, the owner could place a sign, traffic cone, sawhorse, board, or the like near the hole.

CASE 7.1 Izquierdo v. Gyroscope, Inc.

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Fourth District, 2007. 946 So.2d 115.

- Background and Facts Giorgio's Grill in Hollywood, Florida, is a restaurant that becomes a nightclub after hours. At those times, traditionally, as Giorgio's manager knew, the wait staff and customers threw paper napkins into the air as the music played. The napkins landed on the floor, but no one picked them up. If they became too deep, customers pushed them to the side. Because drinks were occasionally spilled, sometimes the napkins were wet. One night, Jane Izquierdo went to Giorgio's to meet a friend. She had been to the club five or six times and knew of the napkin-throwing tradition. She had one drink and went to the restroom. On her return, she slipped and fell, breaking her leg. After surgery, she relied on a wheelchair for three months and continued to suffer pain. She filed a suit in a Florida state court against Gyroscope, Inc., the owner of Giorgio's, alleging negligence. A jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and Izquierdo filed a motion for a new trial, which the court denied. She appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 7.1 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
WARNER, J. [Judge]

* * * *

We conclude that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion for new trial as the verdict finding no negligence on the part of the defendant is contrary to the undisputed evidence in the case. The testimony regarding negligence from both Izquierdo and her fiancé was not conflicting nor was it impeached [contradicted]. More importantly, the manager of the restaurant admitted that permitting the wet napkins to remain on the floor was a hazardous condition. Although the defendant argued * * * that Izquierdo did not know how she fell, the circumstantial evidence included her testimony that she slipped, went down on a wet floor, and found napkins on her shoes. The inference that the wet napkins on the floor caused her fall clearly was the only reasonable inference which could be drawn from the facts presented. The defendant offered no contrary interpretation consistent with the facts proved.

We are further persuaded that the evidence of the defendant's negligence was clear and obvious by a reading of [Florida Statutes Section] 768.0710(1), which provides:

The person or entity in possession or control of business premises owes a duty of reasonable care to maintain the premises in a reasonably safe condition for the safety of business invitees on the premises, which includes reasonable efforts to keep the premises free from transitory foreign objects or substances that might foreseeably give rise to loss, injury, or damage.

* * * [T]he existence of a foreign substance on the floor of business premises that causes a customer to fall and be injured is not a safe condition * * * .[A] business owner owes a duty to its invitees to make reasonable efforts to keep transitory foreign substances off the floor, which would include napkins. Failure to do so would be negligence. [Emphasis added.]

Further, although Giorgio's claimed that the napkin-throwing was known by Izquierdo and the existence of napkins on the floor was obvious, this would merely discharge the landowner's duty to warn. It does not discharge the landowner's duty to maintain the premises in a reasonably safe condition. * * *

* * * *

* * * [T]he record in the present case shows at least some negligence on the part of the defendant, even though a jury could find that Izquierdo was negligent herself. The jury's verdict finding no negligence on the defendant's part is contrary to the manifest [obvious] weight of the evidence, and the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court reversed the lower court's decision, concluding that "the trial court abused its discretion" in denying Izquierdo's motion. The appellate court remanded the case for a new trial.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Should the result in this case have been different if, in all the years that the napkin-throwing tradition existed, no one had ever fallen on the napkins before Izquierdo? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Does a plaintiff's knowledge of a dangerous condition erase a defendant's potential liability for negligently permitting the dangerous condition to exist? Explain.

Duty of Professionals If an individual has knowledge or skill superior to that of an ordinary person, the individual's conduct must be consistent with that status. Professionals—including physicians, dentists, architects, engineers, accountants, and lawyers, among others—are required to have a standard minimum level of special knowledge and ability. Therefore, in determining what constitutes reasonable care in the case of professionals, the court takes their training and expertise into account. In other words, an accountant cannot defend against a lawsuit for negligence by stating, “But I was not familiar with that general principle of accounting.”

If a professional violates his or her duty of care toward a client, the client may bring a suit against the professional, alleging malpractice, which is essentially professional negligence. For example, a patient might sue a physician for medical malpractice. A client might sue an attorney for legal malpractice. The liability of professionals will be examined in further detail in Chapter 51.

No Duty to Rescue Although the law requires individuals to act reasonably and responsibly in their relations with one another, if a person fails to come to the aid of a stranger in peril, that person will not be considered negligent under tort law. For example, assume that you are walking down a city street and see a pedestrian about to step directly in front of an oncoming bus. You realize that the person has not seen the bus and is unaware of the danger. Do you have a legal duty to warn that individual? No. Although most people would probably concede that, in this situation, the observer has an ethical duty to warn the other, tort law does not impose a general duty to rescue others in peril. Duties may be imposed in regard to certain types of peril, however. For example, most states require a motorist involved in an automobile accident to stop and render aid. Failure to do so is both a tort and a crime.

The Injury Requirement and Damages

To recover damages (receive compensation), the plaintiff in a tort lawsuit must prove that she or he suffered a legally recognizable injury. In other words, the plaintiff must have suffered some loss, harm, wrong, or invasion of a protected interest. This is true in lawsuits for intentional torts as well as lawsuits for negligence. Essentially, the purpose of tort law is to compensate for legally recognized harms and injuries resulting from wrongful acts. If no harm or injury results from a given negligent action, there is nothing to compensate—and no tort exists.

For example, if you carelessly bump into a passerby, who stumbles and falls as a result, you may be liable in tort if the passerby is injured in the fall. If the person is unharmed, however, there normally can be no suit for damages because no injury was suffered. Although the passerby might be angry and suffer emotional distress, few courts recognize negligently inflicted emotional distress as a tort unless it results in some physical disturbance or dysfunction.

Compensatory damages are the norm in negligence cases. Occasionally, though, a court will award punitive damages if the defendant's conduct was grossly negligent, meaning that the defendant intentionally failed to perform a duty with reckless disregard of the consequences to others.

Causation

Another element necessary to the tort of negligence—and intentional torts as well—is causation. If a person breaches a duty of care and someone suffers injury, the wrongful activity must have caused the harm for a tort to have been committed.

Causation in Fact and Proximate Cause

In deciding whether the requirement of causation is met, the court must address two questions:

1. Is there causation in fact? Did the injury occur because of the defendant's act, or would it have occurred anyway? If an injury would not have occurred without the defendant's act, then there is causation in fact. Causation in fact can usually be determined by use of the but for test: “but for” the wrongful act, the injury would not have occurred. This test determines whether there was an actual cause-and-effect relationship between the act and the injury suffered. In theory, causation in fact is limitless. One could claim, for example, that “but for” the creation of the world, a particular injury would not have occurred. Thus, as a practical matter, the law has to establish limits, and it does so through the concept of proximate cause.
2. Was the act the proximate, or legal, cause of the injury? Proximate cause, or legal cause, exists when the connection between an act and an injury is strong enough to justify imposing liability. Consider an example. Ackerman carelessly leaves a campfire burning. The fire not only burns down the forest but also sets off an explosion in a nearby chemical plant that spills chemicals into a river, killing all the fish for a hundred miles downstream and ruining the economy of a tourist resort. Should Ackerman be liable to the resort owners? To the tourists whose vacations were ruined? These are questions of proximate cause that a court must decide.

Both questions must be answered in the affirmative for liability in tort to arise. If a defendant's action constitutes causation in fact but a court decides that the action is not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, the causation requirement has not been met—and the defendant normally will not be liable to the plaintiff.

Foreseeability Questions of proximate cause are linked to the concept of foreseeability because it would be unfair to impose liability on a defendant unless the defendant's actions created a foreseeable risk of injury. Probably the most cited case on the concept of foreseeability and proximate cause is the Palsgraf case. The question before the court was as follows: Does the defendant's duty of care extend only to those who may be injured as a result of a foreseeable risk, or does it extend also to persons whose injuries could not reasonably be foreseen?

CASE 7.2 Palsgraf v. Long Island Railroad Co.

Court of Appeals of New York, 1928. 248 N.Y. 339, 162 N.E. 99.

• Background and Facts The plaintiff, Helen Palsgraf, was waiting for a train on a station platform. A man carrying a package was rushing to catch a train that was moving away from a platform across the tracks from Palsgraf. As the man attempted to jump aboard the moving train, he seemed unsteady and about to fall. A railroad guard on the car reached forward to grab him, and another guard on the platform pushed him from behind to help him board the train. In the process, the man's package, which (unknown to the railroad guards) contained fireworks, fell on the railroad tracks and exploded. There was nothing about the package to indicate its contents. The repercussions of the explosion caused scales at the other end of the train platform to fall on Palsgraf, causing injuries for which she sued the railroad company. At the trial, the jury found that the railroad guards had been negligent in their conduct. The railroad company appealed. The appellate court affirmed the trial court's judgment, and the railroad company appealed to New York's highest state court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT CARDOZO, C.J. [Chief Justice]

* * * *

The conduct of the defendant's guard, if a wrong in its relation to the holder of the package, was not a wrong in its relation to the plaintiff, standing far away. Relatively to her it was not negligence at all. * * *

* * * *

* * * What the plaintiff must show is "a wrong" to herself; i.e., a violation of her own right, and not merely a wrong to someone else[.] * * * The risk reasonably to be perceived defines the duty to be obeyed[.] * * * Here, by concession, there was nothing in the situation to suggest to the most cautious mind that the parcel wrapped in newspaper would spread wreckage through the station. If the guard had thrown it down knowingly and willfully, he would not have threatened the plaintiff's safety, so far as appearances could warn him. His conduct would not have involved, even then, an unreasonable probability of invasion of her bodily security. Liability can be no greater where the act is inadvertent. [Emphasis added.]

* * * One who seeks redress at law does not make out a cause of action by showing without more that there has been damage to his person. If the harm was not willful, he must show that the act as to him had possibilities of danger so many and apparent as to entitle him to be protected against the doing of it though the harm was unintended. * * * The victim does not sue * * * to vindicate an interest invaded in the person of another. * * * He sues for breach of a duty owing to himself.

CHAPTER 7 Negligence and Strict Liability

CASE 7.2 CONTINUED

* * * [To rule otherwise] would entail liability for any and all consequences, however novel or extraordinary.

● Decision and Remedy Palsgraf's complaint was dismissed. The railroad had not been negligent toward her because injury to her was not foreseeable. Had the owner of the fireworks been harmed, and had he filed suit, there could well have been a different result.

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law The Palsgraf case established foreseeability as the test for proximate cause. Today, the courts continue to apply this test in determining proximate cause—and thus tort liability for injuries. Generally, if the victim of a harm or the consequences of a harm done are unforeseeable, there is no proximate cause.

● International Considerations Differing Standards of Proximate Cause The concept of proximate cause is common among nations around the globe, but its application differs from country to country. French law uses the phrase "adequate cause." An event breaks the chain of adequate cause if the event is both unforeseeable and irresistible. England has a "nearest cause" rule that attributes liability based on which event was nearest in time and space. Mexico bases proximate cause on the foreseeability of the harm but does not require that an event be reasonably foreseeable.

● The Global Dimension What would be the advantages and disadvantages of a universal principle of proximate cause applied everywhere by all courts in all relevant cases? Discuss.

Defenses to Negligence

The basic defenses to liability in negligence cases are (1) assumption of risk, (2) superseding cause, and (3) contributory and comparative negligence. Additionally, defendants often defend against negligence claims by asserting that the plaintiffs failed to prove the existence of one or more of the required elements for negligence.

Assumption of Risk

A plaintiff who voluntarily enters into a risky situation, knowing the risk involved, will not be allowed to recover. This is the defense of assumption of risk. The requirements of this defense are (1) knowledge of the risk and (2) voluntary assumption of the risk. This defense is frequently asserted when the plaintiff is injured during recreational activities that involve known risk, such as skiing and parachuting.

The risk can be assumed by express agreement, or the assumption of risk can be implied by the plaintiff's knowledge of the risk and subsequent conduct. For example, a driver entering an automobile race knows there is a risk of being injured or killed in a crash. The driver has assumed the risk of injury. Of course, the plaintiff does not assume a risk different from or greater than the risk normally carried by the activity. In our example, the race driver assumes the risk of being injured in the race but not the risk that the banking in the curves of the racetrack will give way during the race because of a construction defect.

Risks are not deemed to be assumed in situations involving emergencies. Neither are they assumed when a statute protects a class of people from harm and a member of the class is injured by the harm. For example, courts have generally held that an employee cannot assume the risk of an employer's violation of safety statutes passed for the benefit of employees.

In the following case, a ball kicked by a player practicing on a nearby field injured a man who was attending his son's soccer tournament. The question before the court was whether a bystander who was not watching a soccer match at the time of injury had nevertheless assumed the risk of being struck by a wayward ball.

EXTENDED Sutton v. Eastern New York Youth Soccer Association, Inc.
C A S E 7.3

 New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, Third Department, 2004.
 8 A.D.3d 855, 779 N.Y.S.2d 149.

SPAIN, J. [Justice]

* * * *

While attending a soccer tournament in which his son was a participant, plaintiff D. James Sutton (hereinafter plaintiff) was struck by a soccer ball kicked by a 16-year-old boy practicing on one of the soccer fields between games. Thereafter, plaintiff and his wife * * * commenced this personal injury action [in a New York state court] against organizations and teams sponsoring and/or participating in the tournament, as well as the boy who kicked the ball, seeking to recover damages for injuries he sustained to his knee as a result of the accident. [The] Court granted summary judgment to all defendants, finding that plaintiff had assumed the risk of being struck by a soccer ball, and dismissed the complaint. * * *

According to plaintiff, May 30, 1999 was a sunny, exceedingly hot day and his son, a member of defendant Latham Circle Soccer Club, was participating in a Highland Soccer Club Tournament at Maalyck Park in the Town of Glenville, Schenectady County [in New York]. Plaintiff attended as a spectator and had just finished watching his son's second game of the day from one of the sidelines when he walked to the end of the field to a tent which had been erected by his son's team some 30 to 40 yards behind the goal line in order to provide shade for the players while they were not engaged on the field. While walking past the field, plaintiff noticed six or seven players from defendant Guilderland Soccer Club on the field "hacking around" and warming up for the next game. Once under the tent, plaintiff was in the process of removing a sandwich from his son's cooler when he was struck in the chest and knocked off his feet by a soccer ball kicked from the field by a Guilderland player, defendant Ian Goss.

The first argument raised on appeal is that plaintiff was not a voluntary spectator of the soccer match at the point in time when he was injured; accordingly, plaintiffs argue, he cannot be found to have assumed the risk of injury. In support of this contention, plaintiffs point to the fact that a game was not in progress on the field and that, when injured, he was standing some 30 to 40 yards away from the field of play. We are unpersuaded. The doctrine of assumption of risk can apply not only to participants of sporting events, but to spectators and bystanders who are not actively engaged in watching the event at the time of their injury. Indeed, the spectator at a sporting event, no less than the participant, accepts the dangers that inhere in it so far as they are obvious and necessary, just as a fencer accepts the risk of a thrust by his antagonist or a spectator at a ball game the * * * chance of contact with the ball * * *. The timorous [nervous] may stay at home. Here, plaintiff admitted that he was at the tournament as a spectator and was aware that players were practicing on the field when he walked past them. Furthermore, although plaintiff's son's team had just finished a game, the tournament involved hundreds of players with teams playing at various times on at least five fields and plaintiff had been at the tournament all morning, surrounded by this activity. Under these circumstances, we find that plaintiff's presence at the tournament rendered him a voluntary spectator to the soccer play in progress throughout the day. [Emphasis added.]

Next, plaintiffs contend that the placement of the tent behind the goal line of one of the soccer fields enhanced the risk to spectators at the game, thereby undermining the argument that plaintiff assumed the risk of getting struck by a ball. Plaintiffs rely on evidence * * * that spectators at soccer games should, for their safety, observe the game from the sidelines and that standing behind the goal line increases the chance of being struck by a kicked ball. This Court has not previously had occasion to address directly the duty of care owed to spectators at a soccer match. Existing jurisprudence surrounding the duty owed to spectators at a baseball game, though not controlling given the differences in the games of baseball and soccer, is nonetheless helpful to our analysis.

* * * Taking into consideration the independence of spectators who might want to watch a [baseball] game from an unprotected vantage point, and recognizing that even after the exercise of reasonable care, some risk of being struck by a ball will continue to exist, * * * the proprietor of a ball park need only provide screening for the area of the field behind home plate where the danger of being struck by a ball is the greatest. * * * [T]he municipal owner of a baseball park which has provided adequate space for spectators to view the game from behind the backstop [does] not owe a duty to install screens or netting above a fence running along the first baseline to protect spectators walking in the area between the fence and bathrooms against the risk of being struck by foul balls. * * *

CHAPTER 7 Negligence and Strict Liability

CASE 7.3 CONTINUED

Unlike baseball parks, outdoor soccer fields typically have no protective screening or fencing for spectators, presumably because the ball is larger and moves slower, enabling the spectator who observes a ball coming his or her way to avoid being struck. Indeed, plaintiffs do not suggest that, in the exercise of reasonable care, defendants had a duty to provide any protective measures along the sidelines. Instead, plaintiffs assert that defendants unreasonably enhanced the risk of injury to plaintiff by essentially inviting him to stand at the end of the field through their placement of the team tent. Although we agree that a factual question has been presented as to whether the risk of being struck by a soccer ball is enhanced when a spectator is standing behind the goal line, we find that question immaterial to the disposition of this action. There is no suggestion that there was not adequate room for the spectators to remain along the sidelines; in fact, plaintiff was seated along the sidelines prior to moving to the tent to get a sandwich. Accordingly, just as the owner of a baseball park is not responsible for the spectator who leaves his or her seat and walks through a potentially more hazardous zone to reach a bathroom or concession stand, thereby assuming the open and obvious risk of being hit by a ball, defendants here cannot be held responsible for the risk assumed by plaintiff when he, aware that players were active on the field, left the sidelines and stood in the tent positioned in the arguably more dangerous zone behind the goal line. [Emphasis added.]

We also reject plaintiffs' contention that the risk of being struck while some 40 yards away from a field upon which no formal game was in progress was not open and obvious. In the context of a sporting event, where the risks are fully comprehended or perfectly obvious, a participant will be deemed to have consented to such risk. As discussed, plaintiff had been in attendance for hours at a tournament where soccer games were almost continuously in progress and had actual knowledge that players were kicking the ball around on the field when he opted to move to the tent behind the goal line. Further, he was familiar with the game of soccer having admittedly been a frequent spectator of the game for over 14 years. Under these circumstances, we hold that plaintiff should have appreciated the risk of being hit by an errant [stray] soccer ball when he opted to enter the tent in the area behind the goal. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

ORDERED that the order is affirmed * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. What is the basis underlying the defense of assumption of risk, and how does that basis support the court's decision in the Sutton case?
2. Had the plaintiffs prevailed, how might the sites for soccer matches be different today?

Superseding Cause

An unforeseeable intervening event may break the causal connection between a wrongful act and an injury to another. If so, the intervening event acts as a superseding cause—that is, it relieves a defendant of liability for injuries caused by the intervening event. For example, suppose that Derrick, while riding his bicycle, negligently hits Julie, who is walking on the sidewalk. As a result of the impact, Julie falls and fractures her hip. While she is waiting for help to arrive, a small aircraft crashes nearby and explodes, and some of the fiery debris hits her, causing her to sustain severe burns. Derrick will be liable for the damages caused by Julie's fractured hip, but normally he will not be liable for the injuries caused by the plane crash—because the risk of a plane crashing nearby and injuring Julie was not foreseeable.

Contributory and Comparative Negligence

All individuals are expected to exercise a reasonable degree of care in looking out for themselves. In the past, under the common law doctrine of contributory negligence, a plaintiff who was also negligent (failed to exercise a reasonable degree of care) could not recover anything from the defendant. Under this rule, no matter how insignificant the plaintiff's negligence was relative to the defendant's negligence, the plaintiff would be precluded from recovering any damages. Today, only a few jurisdictions still hold to this doctrine.

In the majority of states, the doctrine of contributory negligence has been replaced by a comparative negligence standard. The comparative negligence standard enables both the plaintiff's and the defendant's negligence to be computed and the liability for damages distributed accordingly. Some jurisdictions have adopted a "pure" form of comparative negligence that allows the plaintiff to recover damages even if her or his fault is greater than that of the defendant. Many states' comparative negligence statutes, however, contain a "50 percent" rule, under which the plaintiff recovers nothing if she or he was more than 50 percent at fault. Under this rule, a plaintiff who is 35 percent at fault could recover 65 percent of his or her damages, but a plaintiff who is 65 percent (over 50 percent) at fault could recover nothing.

Special Negligence Doctrines and Statutes

A number of special doctrines and statutes relating to negligence are also important. We examine a few of them here.

Res Ipsa Loquitur

Generally, in lawsuits involving negligence, the plaintiff has the burden of proving that the defendant was negligent. In certain situations, however, the courts may presume that negligence has occurred, in which case the burden of proof rests on the defendant—that is, the defendant must prove that he or she was not negligent. The presumption of the defendant's negligence is known as the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur,² which translates as "the facts speak for themselves."

This doctrine is applied only when the event creating the damage or injury is one that ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence. For example, suppose that a person undergoes abdominal surgery and following the surgery has nerve damage in her spine near the area of the operation. In this situation, the person can sue the surgeon under a theory of res ipsa loquitur, because the injury would not have occurred in the absence of the surgeon's negligence.³ For the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to apply, the event must have been within the defendant's power to control, and it must not have been due to any voluntary action or contribution on the part of the plaintiff.

Negligence Per Se

Certain conduct, whether it consists of an action or a failure to act, may be treated as negligence per se ("in or of itself"). Negligence per se may occur if an individual violates a statute or an ordinance providing for a criminal penalty and that violation causes another to be injured. The injured person must prove (1) that the statute clearly sets out what standard of conduct is expected, when and where it is expected, and of whom it is expected; (2) that he or she is in the class intended to be protected by the statute; and (3) that the statute was designed to prevent the type of injury that he or she suffered. The standard of conduct required by the statute is the duty that the defendant owes to the plaintiff, and a violation of the statute is the breach of that duty.

For example, a statute provides that anyone who operates a motor vehicle on a public highway and fails to give full time and attention to the operation of that vehicle is guilty of inattentive driving. After an accident involving two motor vehicles, one of the drivers is cited for and later found guilty of violating the inattentive driver statute. If the other driver was injured and subsequently files a lawsuit, a court could consider the violation of the statute to constitute negligence per se. The statute set forth a standard of attentive driving specifically to protect the safety of the traveling public.⁴

"Danger Invites Rescue" Doctrine

Under the "danger invites rescue" doctrine, a person who is injured while going to someone else's rescue can sue the person who caused the dangerous situation. The original wrongdoer is liable not only for the injuries to the person who was placed in danger, but also for injuries to an individual attempting a rescue. The idea is that the rescuer should not be held liable for any damages because he or she did not cause the

3. See, for example, Gubbins v. Hurson, 885 A.2d 269 (D.C. 2005).

4. See, for example, Wright v. Moore, 931 A.2d 405 (Del.Supr. 2007).

2. Pronounced rihz ihp-suh low-kwuh-duhr.

danger and because danger invites rescue. For example, Ludlam, while driving down a street, fails to see a stop sign because he is trying to end a squabble between his two young children in the car's backseat. Salter, on the curb near the stop sign, realizes that Ludlam is about to hit a pedestrian walking across the street at the intersection. Salter runs into the street to push the pedestrian out of the way, and Ludlam's vehicle hits Salter instead. Ludlam will be liable for Salter's injury as the rescuer, as well as for any injuries the other pedestrian (or any bystanders) may have sustained.

Special Negligence Statutes

A number of states have enacted statutes prescribing duties and responsibilities in certain circumstances. For example, most states now have what are called Good Samaritan statutes.⁵ Under these statutes, persons who are aided voluntarily by others cannot turn around and sue the "Good Samaritans" for negligence. These laws were passed largely to protect physicians and other medical personnel who volunteer their services for free in emergency situations to those in need, such as individuals hurt in car accidents.⁶

Many states have also passed dram shop acts,⁷ under which a tavern owner or bartender may be held liable for injuries caused by a person who became intoxicated while drinking at the bar or who was already intoxicated when served by the bartender. Some states' statutes also impose liability on social hosts (persons hosting parties) for injuries caused by guests who became intoxicated at the hosts' homes. Under these statutes, it is unnecessary to prove that the tavern owner, bartender, or social host was negligent. Sometimes, the definition of a "social host" is broadly fashioned. For example, in a New York case, the court held that the father of a minor who hosted a "bring-your-own-keg" party could be held liable for injuries caused by an intoxicated guest.⁸

5. These laws derive their name from the Good Samaritan story in the Bible. In the story, a traveler who had been robbed and beaten lay along the roadside, ignored by those passing by. Eventually, a man from the region of Samaria (the "Good Samaritan") stopped to render assistance to the injured person.

6. See, for example, the discussions of various state statutes in Chamley v. Khokha, 730 N.W.2d 864 (N.D. 2007), and Mueller v. McMillian Warner Insurance Co., 2006 WI 54, 290 Wis.2d 571, 714 N.W.2d 183 (2006).

7. Historically, a dram was a small unit of liquid, and spirits were sold in drams. Thus, a dram shop was a place where liquor was sold in drams.

8. Rust v. Reyer, 91 N.Y.2d 355, 693 N.E.2d 1074, 670 N.Y.S.2d 822 (1998).

Strict Liability

Another category of torts is called strict liability, or liability without fault. Intentional torts and torts of negligence involve acts that depart from a reasonable standard of care and cause injuries. Under the doctrine of strict liability, a person who engages in certain activities can be held responsible for any harm that results to others even if the person used the utmost care.

Development of Strict Liability

The modern concept of strict liability traces its origins, in part, to the 1868 English case of Rylands v. Fletcher.⁹ In the coal-mining area of Lancashire, England, the Rylands, who were mill owners, had constructed a reservoir on their land. Water from the reservoir broke through a filled-in shaft of an abandoned coal mine nearby and flooded the connecting passageways in an active coal mine owned by Fletcher. Fletcher sued the Rylands, and the court held that the defendants (the Rylands) were liable, even though the circumstances did not fit within existing tort liability theories. The court held that a "person who for his own purposes brings on his land and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes ... is prima facie [on initial examination] answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape."

British courts liberally applied the doctrine that emerged from the Rylands v. Fletcher case. Initially, few U.S. courts accepted this doctrine, presumably because the courts were worried about its effect on the expansion of American business. Today, however, the doctrine of strict liability is the norm rather than the exception.

Abnormally Dangerous Activities

Strict liability for damages proximately caused by an abnormally dangerous, or ultrahazardous, activity is one application of strict liability. Courts apply the doctrine of strict liability in these situations because of the extreme risk of the activity. Abnormally dangerous activities are those that involve a high risk of serious harm to persons or property that cannot be completely guarded against by the exercise of reasonable care—activities such as blasting or storing explosives. Even if blasting with dynamite is performed with all reasonable care, there is still a risk of injury. Balancing that risk against the potential for harm, it seems reasonable to ask the person engaged in the activity to pay for injuries caused by that activity. Although there is no fault, there is still responsibility because of the dangerous nature of the undertaking.

9. 3 L.R.-E & I App. [Law Reports, English & Irish Appeal Cases] (H.L. [House of Lords] 1868).

Other Applications of Strict Liability

Persons who keep wild animals are strictly liable for any harm inflicted by the animals. The basis for applying strict liability is that wild animals, should they escape from confinement, pose a serious risk of harm to persons in the vicinity. An owner of domestic animals (such as dogs, cats, cows, or sheep) may be strictly liable for harm caused by those animals if the owner knew, or should have known, that the animals were dangerous or had a propensity to harm others.

A significant application of strict liability is in the area of product liability—liability of manufacturers and sellers for harmful or defective products. Liability here is a matter of social policy and is based on two factors: (1) the manufacturing company can better bear the cost of injury because it can spread the cost throughout society by increasing prices of goods and services, and (2) the manufacturing company is making a profit from its activities and therefore should bear the cost of injury as an operating expense. We will discuss product liability in greater detail in Chapter 23. Strict liability is also applied in certain types of bailments (a bailment exists when goods are transferred temporarily into the care of another—see Chapter 47).

REVIEWING Negligence and Strict Liability

Alaina Sweeney went to Ragged Mountain Ski Resort in New Hampshire with a friend. Alaina went snow tubing down a snow-tube run designed exclusively for snow tubers. There were no Ragged Mountain employees present in the snow-tube area to instruct Alaina on the proper use of a snow tube. On her fourth run down the trail, Alaina crossed over the center line between snow-tube lanes, collided with another snow tuber, and was injured. Alaina filed a negligence action against Ragged Mountain seeking compensation for the injuries that she sustained. Two years earlier, the New Hampshire state legislature had enacted a statute that prohibited a person who participates in the sport of skiing from suing a ski-area operator for injuries caused by the risks inherent in skiing. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What defense will Ragged Mountain probably assert?
2. The central question in this case is whether the state statute establishing that skiers assume the risks inherent in the sport bars Alaina's suit. What would your decision be on this issue? Why?
3. Suppose that the court concludes that the statute applies only to skiing and does not apply to snow tubing. Will Alaina's lawsuit be successful? Explain.
4. Now suppose that the jury concludes that Alaina was partly at fault for the accident. Under what theory might her damages be reduced in proportion to the degree to which her actions contributed to the accident and her resulting injuries?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

assumption of risk 149 business invitee 145 causation in fact 147

comparative negligence 152 contributory negligence 151 dram shop act 153 duty of care 144
Good Samaritan statute 153 malpractice 147

negligence 144
negligence per se 152
proximate cause 147 reasonable person standard 145
res ipsa loquitur 152
strict liability 153

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

7-1. Shannon's physician gives her some pain medication and tells her not to drive after she takes it, as the medication induces drowsiness. In spite of the doctor's warning, Shannon decides to drive to the store while on the medication. Owing to her lack of alertness, she fails to stop at a traffic light and crashes into another vehicle, causing a passenger in that vehicle to be injured. Is Shannon liable for the tort of negligence? Explain fully.

7-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Ruth carelessly parks her car on a steep hill, leaving the car in neutral and failing to engage the parking brake. The car rolls down the hill and knocks down an electric line. The sparks from the broken line ignite a grass fire. The fire spreads until it reaches a barn one mile away. The barn houses dynamite, and the burning barn explodes, causing part of the roof to fall on and injure Jim, a passing motorist. Which element of negligence is of the greatest concern here? What legal doctrine resolves this issue? Will Jim be able to recover damages from Ruth?

- For a sample answer to Question 7-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

7-3. Danny and Marion Klein were injured when part of a fireworks display went astray and exploded near them. They sued Pyrodyne Corp., the pyrotechnic company that was hired to set up and discharge the fireworks, alleging, among other things, that the company should be strictly liable for damages caused by the fireworks display. Will the court agree with the Kleins? What factors will the court consider in making its decision? Discuss fully.

7-4. Negligence Per Se. A North Carolina Department of Transportation regulation prohibits the placement of telephone booths within public rights-of-way. Despite this regulation, GTE South, Inc., placed a booth in the right-of-way near the intersection of Hillsborough and Sparger Roads in Durham County. A pedestrian, Laura Baldwin, was using the booth when an accident at the intersection caused a dump truck to cross the right-of-way and smash into the booth. Was Baldwin within the class of persons protected by the regulation? If so, did GTE's placement of the booth constitute negligence per se? Explain.

7-5. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

New Hampshire International Speedway, Inc., owned the New Hampshire International Speedway, a racetrack next to Route 106 in Loudon, New Hampshire. In August 1998, on the weekend before the Winston Cup race, Speedway opened part of its parking facility to recreational vehicles (RVs). Speedway voluntarily positioned its employee Frederick Neergaard at the entrance to the parking area as a security guard and to direct traffic. Leslie Wheeler, who was planning to attend the race, drove an RV south on Route 106 toward Speedway. Meanwhile, Dennis Carignan was also driving south on Route 106 on a motorcycle, on which Mary Carignan was a passenger. As Wheeler approached the parking area, he saw Neergaard signaling him to turn left, which he began to do. At the same time, Carignan attempted to pass the RV on its left side, and the two vehicles collided. Mary sustained an injury to her right knee, lacerations on her ankle, and a broken hip. She sued Speedway and others for negligence. Which element of negligence is at the center of this dispute? How is a court likely to rule in this case, and why? [Carignan v. New Hampshire International Speedway, Inc., 858 A.2d 536 (N.H. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 7-5, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 7," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

7-6. Negligence. In July 2004, Emellie Anderson hired Kenneth Whitten, a licensed building contractor, to construct a two-story addition to her home. The bottom floor was to be a garage and the second floor a home office. In August, the parties signed a second contract under which Whitten agreed to rebuild a deck and railing attached to the house and to further improve the office. A later inspection revealed gaps in the siding on the new garage, nails protruding from incomplete framing, improper support for a stairway to the office, and gaps in its plywood flooring. One post supporting the deck was cracked; another was too short. Concrete had not been poured underneath the old posts. A section of railing was missing, and what was installed was warped, with gaps at the joints. Anderson filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Whitten, alleging that his work was "substandard, not to code, unsafe and not done in a [workmanlike] manner." Anderson claimed that she would have to pay someone else to repair all of the work. Does Whitten's "work" satisfy the requirements for a claim grounded in negligence? Should Anderson's complaint be dismissed, or should she be awarded damages? Explain. [Anderson v. Whitten, 100 Conn.App. 730, 918 A.2d 1056 (2007)]

7-7. Defenses to Negligence. Neal Peterson's entire family skied, and Peterson started skiing at the age of two. In 2000, at the age of eleven, Peterson was in his fourth year as a member of a ski race team. After a race one morning in February, Peterson continued to practice his skills through the afternoon. Coming down a slope very fast, at a point at which his skis were not touching the ground, Peterson collided with David Donahue. Donahue, a forty-three-year-old advanced skier, was skating (skiing slowly) across the slope toward the parking lot. Peterson and Donahue knew that falls or collisions and accidents and injuries were possible with skiing. Donahue saw Peterson "split seconds" before the impact, which knocked Donahue out of his skis and down the slope ten or twelve feet. When Donahue saw Peterson lying motionless nearby, he immediately sought help. To recover for his injuries, Peterson filed a suit in a Minnesota state court against Donahue, alleging negligence. Based on these facts, which defense to a claim of negligence is Donahue most likely to assert? How is the court likely to apply that defense and rule on Peterson's claim? Why? [Peterson ex rel. Peterson v. Donahue, 733 N.W.2d 790 (Minn.App.2007)]

7-8. SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS

Go to Case 7.3, Sutton v. Eastern New York Youth Soccer Association, Inc., 8 A.D.3d 855, 779 N.Y.S.2d 149 (3 Dept. 2004), on pages 150–151. Read the excerpt and answer the following questions.

- Issue: The focus in this case was the application of the doctrine of assumption of risk to whom and in what circumstances?
- Rule of Law: What are the requirements for an injured person to be held liable for his or her injury under the doctrine of assumption of risk?
- Applying the Rule of Law: How did the court evaluate the facts in this case to assess liability under the doctrine of assumption of risk?
- Conclusion: Among the parties involved in this case, who was held liable for the plaintiff's injury and why?

7-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Donald and Gloria Bowden hosted a late afternoon cookout at their home in South Carolina, inviting mostly business acquaintances. Justin Parks, who was nineteen years old, attended the party. Alcoholic beverages were available to all of the guests, even those who, like Parks, were not minors but were underage. Parks consumed alcohol at the party and left with other guests. One of these guests detained Parks at the guest's home to give Parks time to "sober up." Parks then drove himself from this guest's home and was killed in a one-car accident. At the time of his death, he had a blood alcohol content of 0.291 percent, which exceeded the state's limit for driving a motor vehicle. Linda Marcum, Parks's mother, filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against the Bowdens and others, alleging that they were negligent. [Marcum v. Bowden, 372 S.C. 452, 643 S.E.2d 85 (2007)]

- Considering the principles discussed in this chapter, what are arguments in favor of, and opposed to, holding social hosts liable in this situation? Explain.
- The states vary widely in assessing liability and imposing sanctions in the circumstances described in this problem. Broadly, in other words, justice is not equal for parents and other social hosts who serve alcoholic beverages to underage individuals. Why?

7-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, and select "Chapter 7." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Jaws. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, the mayor (Murray Hamilton) and a few other men try to persuade Chief Brody (Roy Scheider) not to close the town's beaches. If Brody keeps the beaches open and a swimmer is injured or killed because he failed to warn swimmers about the potential shark danger, has Brody committed the tort of negligence? Explain.
- Can Chief Brody be held liable for any injuries or deaths to swimmers under the doctrine of strict liability? Why or why not?
- Suppose that Chief Brody goes against the mayor's instructions and warns townspeople to stay off the beach. Nevertheless, several swimmers do not heed his warning and are injured as a result. What defense or defenses could Brody raise under these circumstances if he is sued for negligence?

LAW ON THE WEB

You can find cases and articles on torts, including business torts, in the tort law library at the Internet Law Library's Web site. Go to www.lawguru.com/ilawlib

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 7" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 7-1: Legal Perspective
Negligence and the Titanic

Internet Exercise 7-2: Management Perspective
The Duty to Warn

CHAPTER 8

Intellectual Property and Internet Law

Most people think of wealth in terms of houses, land, cars, stocks, and bonds. Wealth, however, also includes intellectual property, which consists of the products that result from intellectual, creative processes. Although it is an abstract term for an abstract concept, intellectual property is nonetheless wholly familiar to virtually everyone. Trademarks, service marks, copyrights, and patents are all forms of intellectual property. The book you are reading is copyrighted. The software you use, the movies you see, and the music you listen to are all forms of intellectual property. Exhibit 8-1 on page 160 offers a comprehensive summary of these forms of intellectual property, as well as intellectual property that consists of trade secrets. In this chapter, we examine each of these forms in some detail.

Intellectual property has taken on increasing significance globally as well as in the United States. Today, the value of the world's intellectual property probably exceeds the value of physical property, such as machines and houses. For many U.S. companies, ownership rights in intangible intellectual property are more important to their prosperity than are their tangible assets. As you will read in this chapter, a pressing issue for businesspersons today is how to protect these valuable rights in the online world.

The need to protect creative works was voiced by the framers of the U.S. Constitution over two hundred years ago: Article I, Section 8, of the U.S. Constitution authorized Congress "[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries." Laws protecting patents, trademarks, and copyrights are explicitly designed to protect and reward inventive and artistic creativity. Although intellectual property law limits the economic freedom of some individuals, it does so to protect the freedom of others to enjoy the fruits of their labors—in the form of profits.

Trademarks and Related Property

A trademark is a distinctive mark, motto, device, or implement that a manufacturer stamps, prints, or otherwise affixes to the goods it produces so that they can be identified on the market and their origins made known. In other words, a trademark is a source indicator. At common law, the person who used a symbol or mark to identify a business or product was protected in the use of that trademark. Clearly, by using another's trademark, a business could lead consumers to believe that its goods were made by the other business. The law seeks to avoid this kind of confusion. In this section, we examine various aspects of the law governing trademarks.

In the following classic case concerning Coca-Cola, the defendants argued that the Coca-Cola trademark was entitled to no protection under the law because the term did not accurately represent the product.

CASE 8.1 The Coca-Cola Co. v. The Koke Co. of America

Supreme Court of the United States, 1920. 254 U.S. 143, 41 S.Ct. 113, 65 L.Ed. 189.
www.findlaw.com/cascode/supreme.html^a - Company Profile John Pemberton, an Atlanta pharmacist, invented a caramel-colored, carbonated soft drink in 1886. His bookkeeper, Frank Robinson, named the beverage Coca-Cola after two of the ingredients, coca leaves and kola nuts. Asa Candler bought the Coca-Cola Company (www.cocacolacompany.com) in 1891, and within seven years, he made the soft drink available in all of the United States, as well as in parts of Canada and Mexico. Candler continued to sell Coke aggressively and to open up new markets, reaching Europe before 1910. In doing so, however, he attracted numerous competitors, some of which tried to capitalize directly on the Coke name.

- Background and Facts The Coca-Cola Company sought to enjoin (prevent) the Koke Company of America and other beverage companies from, among other things, using the word Koke for their products. The Koke Company of America and other beverage companies contended that the Coca-Cola trademark was a fraudulent representation and that Coca-Cola was therefore not entitled to any help from the courts. The Koke Company and the other defendants alleged that the Coca-Cola Company, by its use of the Coca-Cola name, represented that the beverage contained cocaine (from coca leaves), which it no longer did. The trial court granted the injunction against the Koke Company, but the appellate court reversed the lower court's ruling. Coca-Cola then appealed to the United States Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Mr. Justice HOLMES delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

* * * Before 1900 the beginning of [Coca-Cola's] good will was more or less helped by the presence of cocaine, a drug that, like alcohol or caffeine or opium, may be described as a deadly poison or as a valuable [pharmaceutical item, depending on the speaker's purposes]. The amount seems to have been very small,^b but it may have been enough to begin a bad habit and after the Food and Drug Act of June 30, 1906, if not earlier, long before this suit was brought, it was eliminated from the plaintiff's compound. * * *

* * * Since 1900 the sales have increased at a very great rate corresponding to a like increase in advertising. The name now characterizes a beverage to be had at almost any soda fountain. It means a single thing coming from a single source, and well known to the community. It hardly would be too much to say that the drink characterizes the name as much as the name the drink. In other words Coca-Cola probably means to most persons the plaintiff's familiar product to be had everywhere rather than a compound of particular substances. * * * [B]efore this suit was brought the plaintiff had advertised to the public that it must not expect and would not find cocaine, and had eliminated everything tending to suggest cocaine effects except the name and the picture of [coca] leaves and nuts, which probably conveyed little or nothing to most who saw it. It appears to us that it would be going too far to deny the plaintiff relief against a palpable [readily evident] fraud because possibly here and there an ignorant person might call for the drink with the hope for incipient cocaine intoxication. The plaintiff's position must be judged by the facts as they were when the suit was begun, not by the facts of a different condition and an earlier time. [Emphasis added.]

- Decision and Remedy The district court's injunction was allowed to stand. The competing beverage companies were enjoined from calling their products Koke.

a. This is the "U.S. Supreme Court Opinions" page within the Web site of the "FindLaw Internet Legal Resources" database. This page provides several options for accessing an opinion. Because you know the citation for this case, you can go to the "Citation Search" box, type in the appropriate volume and page numbers for the United States Reports ("254" and "143," respectively, for the Coca-Cola case), and click on "get it."

b. In reality, until 1903 the amount of active cocaine in each bottle of Coke was equivalent to one "line" of cocaine.

CASE 8.1 CONTINUED

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law In this early case, the United States Supreme Court made it clear that trademarks and trade names (and nicknames for those marks and names, such as the nickname "Coke" for "Coca-Cola") that are in common use receive protection under the common law. This holding is significant historically because it is the predecessor to the federal statute later passed to protect trademark rights—the Lanham Act of 1946, to be discussed next. In many ways, this act represented a codification of common law principles governing trademarks.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Coca-Cola had been trying to make the public believe that its product contained cocaine. Would the result in this case likely have been different? Why?

Statutory Protection of Trademarks

Statutory protection of trademarks and related property is provided at the federal level by the Lanham Act of 1946.¹ The Lanham Act was enacted, in part, to protect manufacturers from losing business to rival companies that used confusingly similar trademarks. The Lanham Act incorporates the common law of trademarks and provides remedies for owners of trademarks who wish to enforce their claims in federal court. Many states also have trademark statutes.

Trademark Dilution In 1995, Congress amended the Lanham Act by passing the Federal Trademark Dilution Act,² which extended the protection available to trademark owners by allowing them to bring a suit in federal court for trademark dilution. Until the passage of this amendment, federal trademark law prohibited only the unauthorized use of the same mark on competing—or on noncompeting but “related”—goods or services when such use would likely confuse consumers as to the origin of those goods and services. Trademark dilution laws protect “distinctive” or “famous” trademarks (such as Jergens, McDonald’s, Dell, and Apple) from certain unauthorized uses even when the use is on noncompeting goods or is unlikely to confuse. More than half of the states have also enacted trademark dilution laws.

Use of a Similar Mark May Constitute Trademark Dilution A famous mark may be diluted not only by the use of an identical mark but also by the use of a similar mark. In 2003, however, the United States Supreme Court ruled that to constitute dilution, the similar mark must reduce the value of the famous mark or lessen its ability to identify goods and services. Therefore, lingerie maker Victoria’s Secret could not establish a dilution claim against a small adult store named “Victor’s Little Secret” because there was not enough evidence that Victoria’s Secret’s mark would be diminished in value.³

A similar mark is more likely to lessen the value of a famous mark when the companies using the marks provide related goods or compete against each other in the same market. For example, a woman was operating a coffee shop under the name “Sambuck’s Coffeehouse” in Astoria, Oregon, even though she knew that “Starbucks” is one of the largest coffee chains in the nation. When Starbucks Corporation filed a dilution lawsuit, the federal court ruled that use of the “Sambuck’s” mark constituted trademark dilution because it created confusion for consumers. Not only was there a “high degree” of similarity between the marks, but also both companies provided coffee-related services and marketed their services through “stand-alone” retail stores. Therefore, the use of the similar mark (Sambuck’s) reduced the value of the famous mark (Starbucks).⁴

Trademark Registration

Trademarks may be registered with the state or with the federal government. To register for protection under federal trademark law, a person must file an application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office in Washington, D.C. Under current law, a mark can be registered (1) if it is currently in commerce or (2) if the applicant intends to put it into commerce within six months.

In special circumstances, the six-month period can be extended by thirty months, giving the applicant a total of three years from the date of notice of trademark

1. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1051–1128.

2. 15 U.S.C. Section 1125.

3. Moseley v. V Secret Catalogue, Inc., 537 U.S. 418, 123 S.Ct. 1115, 155 L.Ed.2d 1 (2003).

4. Starbucks Corp. v. Lundberg, 2005 WL 3183858 (D.Or. 2005).

EXHIBIT 8-1 • Forms of Intellectual Property

	Definition	How Acquired	Duration	Remedy for Infringement
Patent	A grant from the government that gives an inventor exclusive rights to an invention.	By filing a patent application with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office and receiving its approval.	Twenty years from the date of the application; for design patents, fourteen years.	Monetary damages, including royalties and lost profits, plus attorneys' fees. Damages may be tripled for intentional infringements.
Copyright	The right of an author or originator of a literary or artistic work, or other production that falls within a specified category, to have the exclusive use of that work for a given period of time.	Automatic (once the work or creation is put in tangible form). Only the expression of an idea (and not the idea itself) can be protected by copyright.	For authors: the life of the author plus 70 years. For publishers: 95 years after the date of publication or 120 years after creation.	Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed or statutory damages under the Copyright Act, plus costs and attorneys' fees in either situation.
Trademark (service mark and trade dress)	Any distinctive word, name, symbol, or device (image or appearance), or combination thereof, that an entity uses to distinguish its goods or services from those of others. The owner has the exclusive right to use that mark or trade dress.	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. At common law, ownership created by use of the mark. 2. Registration with the appropriate federal or state office gives notice and is permitted if the mark is currently in use or will be within the next six months. 	Unlimited, as long as it is in use. To continue notice by registration, the owner must renew by filing between the fifth and sixth years, and thereafter, every ten years.	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Injunction prohibiting the future use of the mark. 2. Actual damages plus profits received by the party who infringed (can be increased under the Lanham Act). 3. Destruction of articles that infringed. 4. Plus costs and attorneys' fees.
Trade secret	Any information that a business possesses and that gives the business an advantage over competitors (including formulas, lists, patterns, plans, processes, and programs).	Through the originality and development of the information and processes that constitute the business secret and are unknown to others.	Unlimited, so long as not revealed to others. Once revealed to others, it is no longer a trade secret.	Monetary damages for misappropriation (the Uniform Trade Secrets Act also permits punitive damages if willful), plus costs and attorneys' fees.

approval to make use of the mark and file the required use statement. Registration is postponed until the mark is actually used. Nonetheless, during this waiting period, any applicant can legally protect his or her trademark against a third party who previously has neither used the mark nor filed an application for it. Registration is renewable between the fifth and sixth years after the initial registration and every ten years thereafter (every twenty years for those trademarks registered before 1990).

Trademark Infringement

Registration of a trademark with the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office gives notice on a nationwide basis that the trademark belongs exclusively to the registrant. The registrant is also allowed to use the symbol ® to indicate that the mark has been registered. Whenever that trademark is copied to a substantial degree or used in its entirety by another, intentionally or unintentionally, the trademark has been infringed (used without authorization). When a trademark has been infringed, the owner of the mark has a cause of action against the infringer. To sue for trademark infringement, a person need not have registered the trademark, but registration does furnish proof of the date of inception of the trademark's use.

A central objective of the Lanham Act is to reduce the likelihood that consumers will be confused by similar marks. For that reason, only those trademarks that are deemed sufficiently distinctive from all competing trademarks will be protected.

Distinctiveness of Mark

A trademark must be sufficiently distinct to enable consumers to identify the manufacturer of the goods easily and to distinguish between those goods and competing products.

Strong Marks Fanciful, arbitrary, or suggestive trademarks are generally considered to be the most distinctive (strongest) trademarks. Marks that are fanciful, arbitrary, or suggestive are protected as inherently distinctive without demonstrating secondary meaning. These marks receive automatic protection because they serve to identify a particular product's source, as opposed to describing the product itself.

Fanciful trademarks include invented words, such as "Xerox" for one manufacturer's copiers and "Kodak" for another company's photographic products. Arbitrary trademarks are those that use common words in an uncommon way that is nondescriptive, such as "English Leather" used as a name for an after-shave lotion (and not for leather processed in England). Suggestive trademarks imply something about a product without describing the product directly. For example, the trademark "Dairy Queen" suggests an association between the products and milk, but it does not directly describe ice cream.

Secondary Meaning Descriptive terms, geographic terms, and personal names are not inherently distinctive and do not receive protection under the law until they acquire a secondary meaning. A secondary meaning may arise when customers begin to associate a specific term or phrase (such as London Fog) with specific trademarked items (coats with "London Fog" labels). Whether a secondary meaning becomes attached to a term or name usually depends on how extensively the product is advertised, the market for the product, the number of sales, and other factors.

Once a secondary meaning is attached to a term or name, a trademark is considered distinctive and is protected. The United States Supreme Court has held that even a color can qualify for trademark protection, once customers associate that color with the product.⁵ In 2006, a federal court held that trademark law protects the particular color schemes used by the sports teams of four state universities, including Ohio State University and Louisiana State University.⁶ At issue in the following case was whether a certain mark was suggestive or descriptive.

5. Qualitex Co. v. Jacobson Products Co., 514 U.S. 159, 115 S.Ct. 1300, 131 L.Ed.2d 248 (1995).

6. Board of Supervisors of Louisiana State University v. Smack Apparel Co., 438 F.Supp.2d 653 (E.D.La.2006).

CASE 8.2 Menashe v. V Secret Catalogue, Inc.

United States District Court, Southern District of New York, 2006. 409 F.Supp.2d 412.

- Background and Facts In autumn 2002, Victoria's Secret Stores, Inc., and its affiliated companies, including V Secret Catalogue, Inc., began to develop a panty collection to be named "SEXY LITTLE THINGS." In spring 2004, Ronit Menashe, a publicist, and Audrey Quock, a fashion model and actress, began to plan a line of women's underwear also called "SEXY LITTLE THINGS." Menashe and Quock designed their line, negotiated for its manufacture, registered the domain name www.sexylittlethings.com, and filed an intent-to-use (ITU) application with the U.S. Patent and

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 8.2 CONTINUED

Trademark Office (USPTO). In July, Victoria's Secret's collection appeared in its stores in Ohio, Michigan, and California, and, in less than three months, was prominently displayed in all its stores, in its catalogues, and on its Web site. By mid-November, more than 13 million units of the line had been sold, accounting for 4 percent of the company's sales for the year. When the firm applied to register "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" with the USPTO, it learned of Menashe and Quock's ITU application. The firm warned the pair that their use of the phrase constituted trademark infringement. Menashe and Quock filed a suit in a federal district court against V Secret Catalogue and others, asking the court to, among other things, declare "non-infringement of the trademark."

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
BAER, District Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiffs claim that Victoria's Secret has no right of priority in the Mark because "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" for lingerie is a descriptive term that had not attained secondary meaning by the time Plaintiffs filed their ITU application. Consequently, Plaintiffs assert that they have priority based on * * * their ITU application on September 13, 2004. Victoria's Secret counters that the Mark is suggestive and thus qualifies for trademark protection without proof of secondary meaning. Therefore, Victoria's Secret has priority by virtue of its bona fide use of the Mark in commerce beginning July 28, 2004.

* * * *

To merit trademark protection, a mark must be capable of distinguishing the products it marks from those of others. * * * A descriptive term * * * conveys an immediate idea of the ingredients, qualities or characteristics of the goods. In contrast, a suggestive term requires imagination, thought and perception to reach a conclusion as to the nature of the goods. Suggestive marks are automatically protected because they are inherently distinctive, i.e., their intrinsic nature serves to identify a particular source of a product. Descriptive marks are not inherently distinctive and may only be protected on a showing of secondary meaning, i.e., that the purchasing public associates the mark with a particular source. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [T]o distinguish suggestive from descriptive marks [a court considers] whether the purchaser must use some imagination to connect the mark to some characteristic of the product * * * and * * * whether the proposed use would deprive competitors of a way to describe their goods.

* * * I find "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" to be suggestive. First, while the term describes the erotically stimulating quality of the trademarked lingerie, it also calls to mind the phrase "sexy little thing" popularly used to refer to attractive lithe young women. Hence, the Mark prompts the purchaser to mentally associate the lingerie with its targeted twenty- to thirty-year-old consumers. Courts have classified marks that both describe the product and evoke other associations as inherently distinctive. * * * [Also] it is hard to believe that Victoria's Secret's use of the Mark will deprive competitors of ways to describe their lingerie products. Indeed, Victoria's Secret's own descriptions of its lingerie in its catalogues and Web site illustrate that there are numerous ways to describe provocative underwear. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * Victoria's Secret used "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" as a trademark in commerce beginning on July 28, 2004. Commencing on that date, the prominent use of the Mark in four stores * * * satisfies the "use in commerce" requirement * * *. Similarly, Victoria's Secret's prominent use of the Mark in its catalogues beginning on September 4, 2004, and on its Web site beginning on or about September 9, 2004, together with pictures and descriptions of the goods meets the * * * test * * *. I find that because Victoria's Secret made bona fide trademark use of "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" in commerce before Plaintiffs filed their ITU application, and has continued to use that Mark in commerce, Victoria's Secret has acquired priority in the Mark.

• Decision and Remedy The court ruled that Menashe and Quock were not entitled to a judgment of "non-infringement" and dismissed their complaint. The court concluded that "SEXY LITTLE THINGS" was a suggestive mark and that Victoria's Secret had used it in commerce before the plaintiffs filed their ITU application. For this reason, Victoria's Secret had "priority in the Mark."

CASE 8.2 CONTINUED

- The E-Commerce Dimension Under the reasoning of the court in this case, would the use of a purported trademark solely on a Web site satisfy the “use in commerce” requirement? Explain.
- The Legal Environment Dimension Why is it important to allow a trademark’s assertive owners—in this case, the ITU applicants Menashe and Quock—to preemptively defend against the use of the mark by another party?

Generic Terms Generic terms that refer to an entire class of products, such as bicycle and computer, receive no protection, even if they acquire secondary meanings. A particularly thorny problem arises when a trademark acquires generic use. For example, aspirin and thermos were originally the names of trademarked products, but today the words are used generically. Other examples are escalator, trampoline, raisin bran, dry ice, lanolin, linoleum, nylon, and corn flakes.

Note that a generic term will not be protected under trademark law even if the term has acquired a secondary meaning. In one case, for example, America Online, Inc. (AOL), sued AT&T Corporation, claiming that AT&T’s use of “You Have Mail” on its WorldNet Service infringed AOL’s trademark rights in the same phrase. The court ruled, however, that because each of the three words in the phrase was a generic term, the phrase as a whole was generic. Although the phrase had become widely associated with AOL’s e-mail notification service, and thus might have acquired a secondary meaning, this issue was of no significance in the case. The court stated that it would not consider whether the mark had acquired any secondary meaning because “generic marks with secondary meaning are still not entitled to protection.”⁷

Trade Dress

The term trade dress refers to the image and overall appearance of a product. Trade dress is a broad concept and can include either all or part of the total image or overall impression created by a product or its packaging. For example, the distinctive decor, menu, layout, and style of service of a particular restaurant may be regarded as trade dress. Trade dress can also include the layout and appearance of a catalogue, the use of a lighthouse as part of the design of a golf hole, the fish shape of a cracker, or the G-shaped design of a Gucci watch.

Basically, trade dress is subject to the same protection as trademarks. In cases involving trade dress infringement, as in trademark infringement cases, a major consideration is whether consumers are likely to be confused by the allegedly infringing use.

Service, Certification, and Collective Marks

A service mark is essentially a trademark that is used to distinguish the services (rather than the products) of one person or company from those of another. For example, each airline has a particular mark or symbol associated with its name. Titles and character names used in radio and television are frequently registered as service marks.

Other marks protected by law include certification marks and collective marks. A certification mark is used by one or more persons, other than the owner, to certify the region, materials, mode of manufacture, quality, or other characteristic of specific goods or services. When used by members of a cooperative, association, or other organization, it is referred to as a collective mark. Examples of certification marks are the phrases “Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval” and “UL Tested.” Collective marks appear at the ends of motion picture credits to indicate the various associations and organizations that participated in the making of the films. The union marks found on the tags of certain products are also collective marks.

Counterfeit Goods

Counterfeit goods copy or otherwise imitate trademarked goods but are not genuine. The importation of goods that bear a counterfeit (fake) trademark poses a growing problem for U.S. businesses, consumers, and law enforcement. In addition to having negative financial effects on legitimate businesses, sales of certain counterfeit goods, such as pharmaceuticals and nutritional supplements, can present serious public health risks. It is estimated that nearly 7 percent of the goods imported into the United States from abroad are counterfeit.

7. America Online, Inc. v. AT&T Corp., 243 F3d 812 (4th Cir. 2001).

Stop Counterfeiting in Manufactured Goods Act In 2006, Congress enacted the Stop Counterfeiting in Manufactured Goods Act⁸ (SCMGA) to combat the growing problem of counterfeit goods. The act makes it a crime to intentionally traffic in or attempt to traffic in counterfeit goods or services, or to knowingly use a counterfeit mark on or in connection with goods or services. Prior to this act, the law did not prohibit the creation or shipment of counterfeit labels that were not attached to any product.⁹ Therefore, counterfeiters would make labels and packaging bearing another's trademark, ship the labels to another location, and then affix them to an inferior product to deceive buyers. The SCMGA has closed this loophole by making it a crime to knowingly traffic in or attempt to traffic in counterfeit labels, stickers, packaging, and the like, regardless of whether the item is attached to any goods.

Penalties for Counterfeiting Persons found guilty of violating the SCMGA may be fined up to $2 million or imprisoned for up to ten years (or more if they are repeat offenders). If a court finds that the statute was violated, it must order the defendant to forfeit the counterfeit products (which are then destroyed), as well as any property used in the commission of the crime. The defendant must also pay restitution to the trademark holder or victim in an amount equal to the victim's actual loss. For example, in one case the defendant pleaded guilty to conspiring with others to import cigarette-rolling papers from Mexico that were falsely marked as "Zig-Zags" and sell them in the United States. The court sentenced the defendant to prison and ordered him to pay $566,267 in restitution. On appeal, the court affirmed the prison sentence but reversed the restitution because the amount exceeded the amount of actual loss suffered by the legitimate sellers of Zig-Zag rolling papers.¹⁰

Trade Names

Trademarks apply to products. The term trade name is used to indicate part or all of a business's name, whether the business is a sole proprietorship, a partnership, or a corporation. Generally, a trade name is directly related to a business and its goodwill. A trade name may be protected as a trademark if the trade name is also the name of the company's trademarked product—for example, Coca-Cola. Unless also used as a trademark or service mark, a trade name cannot be registered with the federal government. Trade names are protected under the common law, but only if they are unusual or fancifully used. The word Safeway, for example, was sufficiently fanciful to obtain protection as a trade name for a grocery chain.¹¹

Cyber Marks

In cyberspace, trademarks are sometimes referred to as cyber marks. We turn now to a discussion of various trademark issues that are unique to cyberspace, such as domain names and cybersquatting, and how new laws and the courts are addressing these issues.

Domain Names

Conflicts over rights to domain names first emerged as e-commerce expanded on a worldwide scale and have reemerged in the last ten years. By using the same, or a similar, domain name, parties have attempted to profit from the goodwill of a competitor, sell pornography, offer for sale another party's domain name, and otherwise infringe on others' trademarks. A domain name is the core part of an Internet address—for example, "westlaw.com." It includes at least two parts. Every domain name ends with a generic top level domain (TLD), which is the part of the name to the right of the period. The TLD typically indicates the type of entity that operates the site. For example, com is an abbreviation for commercial, and edu is short for education. Although originally there were only six possible TLDs, several more generic TLDs are now available, some of which are not restricted to a particular type of entity (see Exhibit 8-2 for a list of generic TLDs and their uses).

The second level domain (SLD), which is the part of the name to the left of the period, is chosen by the business entity or individual registering the domain name. Competition among firms with similar names and products for SLDs has caused numerous disputes over domain name rights. The Internet Corporation for 8. Pub.L.No.109-181 (2006), which amended 18 U.S.C. Sections 2318-2320.

9. See, for example, United States v. Giles, 213 F3d 1247 (10th Cir. 2000).

10. For a case discussing the appropriate measure of restitution, see United States v. Beydoun, 469 F3d 102 (5th Cir.2006).

11. Safeway Stores v. Suburban Foods, 130 F.Supp. 249 (E.D.Va. 1955).

EXHIBIT 8-2 • Existing Generic Top Level Domain Names

.aero	Reserved for members of the air-transportation industry.
.asia	Restricted to the Pan-Asia and Asia Pacific community.
.biz	For businesses.
.cat	Reserved for the Catalan linguistic and cultural community.
.com	Originally intended for commercial organizations, but is now unrestricted in the United States.
.coop	Restricted to cooperative associations.
.edu	For postsecondary educational establishments.
.gov	Reserved for government agencies in the United States.
.info	For informational sites, but is unrestricted.
.int	Reserved for international organizations established by treaty.
.jobs	Reserved for human resource managers.
.mil	For the U.S. military.
.mobi	Reserved for consumers and providers of mobile products and services.
.museum	Reserved for museums.
.name	Reserved for individuals and families.
.net	Originally intended for network infrastructures, but is now unrestricted.
.org	Originally intended for noncommercial organizations, but is now unrestricted.
.pro	Restricted to certain credentialed professionals.
.tel	For business services involving connections between a telephone network and the Internet.
.travel	Reserved for the travel industry.

Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), a nonprofit corporation, oversees the distribution of domain names. ICANN also facilitates the settlement of domain name disputes and operates an online arbitration system. In recent years, however, ICANN has been criticized for failing to keep up with the sheer volume of complaints involving domain names and accusations of cybersquatting. Cybersquatting occurs when a person registers a domain name that is the same as, or confusingly similar to, the trademark of another and then offers to sell the domain name back to the trademark owner.

Anticybersquatting Legislation

During the 1990s, cybersquatting led to so much litigation that Congress passed the Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act of 1999¹² (ACPA), which amended the Lanham Act—the federal law protecting trademarks discussed earlier. The ACPA makes it illegal for a person to “register, traffic in, or use” a domain name (1) if the name is identical or confusingly similar to the trademark of another and (2) if the one registering, trafficking in, or using the domain name has a “bad faith intent” to profit from that trademark.

The act does not define what constitutes bad faith. Instead, it lists several factors that courts can consider in deciding whether bad faith exists. For example, courts focus on the trademark rights of the other person and whether the alleged cybersquatter intended to divert consumers in a way that could harm the goodwill represented by the trademark. Courts also consider whether the alleged cybersquatter offered to transfer or sell the domain name to the trademark owner, or intended to use the domain name to offer goods and services.

The Ongoing Problem of Cybersquatting

The ACPA was intended to stamp out cybersquatting, but it continues to present a problem for businesses today, largely because, as mentioned, more TLDs are available and many more companies are registering domain names. Indeed, domain name registrars have proliferated. These companies charge a fee to businesses and individuals to register new names and to renew annual registrations (often through automated software). Many of these companies also buy and sell expired domain names. Although all domain name registrars are supposed to relay information about these transactions to ICANN and the other companies that keep a master list of domain names, this does not always occur. The speed at which domain names change hands and the difficulty in tracking mass automated registrations have created an environment where cybersquatting can flourish.

12. 15 U.S.C. Section 1129.

Cybersquatters have also developed new tactics, such as typosquatting, or registering a name that is a misspelling of a popular brand, such as hotmai.com or myspac.com. Because many Internet users are not perfect typists, Web pages using these misspelled names get a lot of traffic. More traffic generally means increased profit (advertisers often pay Web sites based on the number of unique visits, or hits), which in turn provides incentive for more cybersquatters. Also, if the misspelling is significant, the trademark owner may have difficulty proving that the name is identical or confusingly similar to the trademark of another, as the ACPA requires.

Cybersquatting is costly for businesses, which must attempt to register all variations of a name to protect their domain name rights from would-be cybersquatters. Large corporations may have to register thousands of domain names across the globe just to protect their basic brands and trademarks.

Applicability of the ACPA and Sanctions under the Act The ACPA applies to all domain name registrations. Successful plaintiffs in suits brought under the act can collect actual damages and profits, or they can elect to receive statutory damages ranging from $1,000 to $100,000.

Although some companies have been successful suing under the ACPA, there are roadblocks to succeeding in such lawsuits. Some domain name registrars offer privacy services that hide the true owners of Web sites, making it difficult for trademark owners to identify cybersquatters. Thus, before a trademark owner can bring a suit, he or she has to ask the court for a subpoena to discover the identity of the owner of the infringing Web site. Because of the high costs of court proceedings, discovery, and even arbitration, many disputes over cybersquatting are settled out of court. Some companies have found that simply purchasing the domain name from the cybersquatter is the least expensive solution.

Meta Tags

Search engines compile their results by looking through a Web site's key-word field. Meta tags, or key words, may be inserted into this field to increase the likelihood that a site will be included in search engine results, even though the site may have nothing to do with the inserted words. Using this same technique, one site may appropriate the key words of other sites with more frequent hits so that the appropriating site will appear in the same search engine results as the more popular sites. Using another's trademark in a meta tag without the owner's permission, however, normally constitutes trademark infringement.

Some uses of another's trademark as a meta tag may be permissible if the use is reasonably necessary and does not suggest that the owner authorized or sponsored the use. For example, Terri Welles, a former model who had been "Playmate of the Year" in Playboy magazine, established a Web site that used the terms Playboy and Playmate as meta tags. Playboy Enterprises, Inc. (PEI), which publishes Playboy, filed a suit seeking to prevent Welles from using these meta tags. The court determined that Welles's use of PEI's meta tags to direct users to her Web site was permissible because it did not suggest sponsorship and there were no descriptive substitutes for the terms Playboy and Playmate.¹³

Dilution in the Online World

As discussed earlier, trademark dilution occurs when a trademark is used, without authorization, in a way that diminishes the distinctive quality of the mark. Unlike trademark infringement, a claim of dilution does not require proof that consumers are likely to be confused by a connection between the unauthorized use and the mark. For this reason, the products involved need not be similar. In the first case alleging dilution on the Web, a court precluded the use of "candyland.com" as the URL for an adult site. The successful lawsuit was brought by the company that manufactures the "Candyland" children's game and owns the "Candyland" mark.¹⁴

Licensing

One way to make use of another's trademark or other form of intellectual property, while avoiding litigation, is to obtain a license to do so. A license in this context is essentially an agreement, or contract, permitting the use of a trademark, copyright, patent, or trade secret for certain purposes. The party that owns the intellectual property rights and issues the license is the licensor, and the party obtaining the license is the licensee. A licensor might, for example, allow the licensee to use the trademark as part of its company name, or as part of its domain name, but not otherwise use the mark on any products or services. Often, selling a license to an infringer is an inexpensive solution to the problem, at least when compared with the costs associated with litigation.

13. Playboy Enterprises, Inc. v. Welles, 279 F.3d 796 (9th Cir.2002). See also Rhino Sports, Inc. v. Sport Court, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Ariz. 2007).

14. Hasbro, Inc. v. Internet Entertainment Group, Ltd., 1996 WL 84853 (W.D.Wash. 1996).

Note, however, that under modern law a licensor of trademarks has a duty to maintain some form of control over the nature and quality of goods or services sold under the mark. If the license does not include any provisions to protect the quality of goods or services provided under the trademark, then the courts may conclude that the licensor has abandoned the trademark and lost her or his trademark rights.¹⁵ To avoid such problems, licensing agreements normally include detailed provisions that protect the trademark owners' rights.

Patents

A patent is a grant from the government that gives an inventor the right to exclude others from making, using, and selling an invention for a period of twenty years from the date of filing the application for a patent. Patents for designs, as opposed to inventions, are given for a fourteen-year period. The applicant must demonstrate to the satisfaction of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office that the invention, discovery, process, or design is novel, useful, and not obvious in light of current technology.

In contrast to patent law in many other countries, in the United States the first person to invent a product or process gets the patent rights rather than the first person to file for a patent on that product or process. Because it can be difficult to prove who invented an item first, however, the first person to file an application is often deemed the first to invent (unless the inventor has detailed prior research notes or other evidence). An inventor can publish the invention or offer it for sale prior to filing a patent application but must apply for a patent within one year of doing so or forfeit the patent rights. The period of patent protection begins on the date the patent application is filed, rather than when the patent is issued, which may sometimes be years later. After the patent period ends (either fourteen or twenty years later), the product or process enters the public domain, and anyone can make, sell, or use the invention without paying the patent holder.

15. This is referred to as a naked license, and a trademark owner who fails to exercise adequate control over the mark is estopped, or prevented, from asserting his or her rights. See, for example, Barcamerica International USA Trust v. Tyfield Importers, Inc., 289 F.3d 589 (9th Cir. 2002); and Exxon Corp. v. Oxxford Clothes, Inc., 109 F.3d 1070 (5th Cir. 1997).

Searchable Patent Databases

A significant development relating to patents is the availability online of the world's patent databases. The Web site of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (see the Law on the Web section at the end of this chapter for its URL) provides searchable databases covering U.S. patents granted since 1976. The Web site of the European Patent Office (its URL is also in the Law on the Web section) provides online access to 50 million patent documents in more than seventy nations through a searchable network of databases. Businesses use these searchable databases in many ways. Because patents are valuable assets, businesses may need to perform patent searches to list or inventory their assets. Patent searches may also be conducted to study trends and patterns in a specific technology or to gather information about competitors in the industry. In addition, a business might search patent databases to develop a business strategy in a particular market or to evaluate a job applicant's contributions to a technology. Although online databases are accessible to anyone, businesspersons might consider hiring a specialist to perform advanced patent searches.

What Is Patentable?

Under federal law, "[w]hoever invents or discovers any new and useful process, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, may obtain a patent therefor, subject to the conditions and requirements of this title."¹⁶ Thus, to be patentable, the item must be novel and not obvious.

In sum, almost anything is patentable, except (1) the laws of nature,¹⁷ (2) natural phenomena, and 16. 35 U.S.C. 101.

17. Note that in 2006, several justices of the United States Supreme Court indicated that they believed a process to diagnose vitamin deficiencies should not be patentable, because allowing a patent would improperly give a monopoly over a scientific relationship, or law of nature. Nevertheless, the majority of the Supreme Court allowed the patent to stand. Laboratory Corporation of America Holdings v. Metabolite Laboratories, Inc., 548 U.S. 124, 126 S.Ct. 2921, 165 L.Ed.2d 399 (2006).

(3) abstract ideas (including algorithms¹⁸). Even artistic methods, certain works of art, and the structure of storylines are patentable, provided that they are novel and not obvious. Plants that are reproduced asexually (by means other than from seed), such as hybrid or genetically engineered plants, are patentable in the United States, as are genetically engineered (or cloned) microorganisms and animals.

18. An algorithm is a step-by-step procedure, formula, or set of instructions for accomplishing a specific task—such as the set of rules used by a search engine to rank the listings contained within its index in response to a particular query.

In the following case, the focus was on the application of the test for proving whether a patent claim is “obvious.”

EXTENDED CASE 8.3 KSR International Co. v. Teleflex Inc.

Supreme Court of the United States, 2007. ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 1727, 167 L.Ed.2d 705.

Justice KENNEDY delivered the opinion of the Court.

Teleflex Incorporated * * * sued KSR International Company [in a federal district court] for patent infringement. The patent at issue is entitled “Adjustable Pedal Assembly With Electronic Throttle Control.” The patentee is Steven J. Engelgau, and the patent is referred to as “the Engelgau patent.” Teleflex holds the exclusive license to the patent.

Claim 4 of the Engelgau patent describes a mechanism for combining an electronic sensor with an adjustable automobile pedal so the pedal’s position can be transmitted to a computer that controls the throttle in the vehicle’s engine. [KSR designed a pedal assembly for General Motors Corporation (GMC) to use in its Chevrolet and GMC light trucks.] When Teleflex accused KSR of infringing the Engelgau patent * * *, KSR countered that claim 4 was invalid * * * because its subject matter was obvious.

* * * *

Seeking to resolve the question of obviousness with * * * uniformity and consistency, [the courts have] employed an approach referred to by the parties as the “teaching, suggestion, or motivation” test (TSM test), under which a patent claim is only proved obvious if some motivation or suggestion to combine the prior art teachings can be found in the prior art, the nature of the problem, or the knowledge of a person having ordinary skill in the art. KSR challenges that test, or at least its application in this case. * * *

* * * *

* * * Important for this case are two adjustable pedals disclosed in [other patents]. The Asano patent reveals a support structure that houses the pedal so that even when the pedal location is adjusted relative to the driver, one of the pedal’s pivot points stays fixed. * * * The Redding patent reveals a different, sliding mechanism where both the pedal and the pivot point are adjusted.

[Also important for this case are two] patents involving electronic pedal sensors for computer-controlled throttles. These inventions * * * taught that it was preferable to detect the pedal’s position in the pedal assembly, not in the engine. The [Smith] patent disclosed a pedal with an electronic sensor on a pivot point in the pedal assembly. * * *

* * * *

* * * The [Rixon patent] discloses an adjustable pedal assembly with an electronic sensor for detecting the pedal’s position. * * *

* * * *

The District Court granted summary judgment in KSR’s favor. * * *

* * * *

* * * [T]he court compared the teachings of the prior art [T] to the claims of Engelgau. It found “little difference.” [The] Asano [patent] taught everything contained in claim 4 except the use of a sensor to detect the pedal’s position and transmit it to the computer controlling the throttle. That additional aspect was revealed in sources such as * * * sensors [previously] used by Chevrolet.

* * * The District Court [also] held KSR had satisfied the [TSM] test. It reasoned (1) the state of the industry would lead inevitably to combinations of electronic sensors and adjustable pedals, (2) Rixon provided the basis for these developments, and (3) Smith taught a solution to the wire chafing problems in Rixon, namely locating the sensor on the fixed structure of the pedal. * * *

CHAPTER 8 Intellectual Property and Internet Law

CASE 8.3 CONTINUED

* * * *

* * * [The U.S.] Court of Appeals [for the Federal Circuit] reversed. It ruled the District Court had not been strict enough in applying the [TSM] test, having failed to make “finding[s] as to the specific understanding or principle within the knowledge of a skilled artisan that would have motivated one with no knowledge of [the] invention * * * to attach an electronic control to the support bracket of the Asano assembly” * * *

Here, the Court of Appeals found, the Asano pedal was designed to solve the “constant ratio problem”—that is, to ensure that the force required to depress the pedal is the same no matter how the pedal is adjusted—whereas Engelgau sought to provide a simpler, smaller, cheaper adjustable electronic pedal. As for Rixon, the court explained, that pedal suffered from the problem of wire chafing but was not designed to solve it. In the court’s view Rixon did not teach anything helpful to Engelgau’s purpose. Smith, in turn, did not relate to adjustable pedals and did not “necessarily go to the issue of motivation to attach the electronic control on the support bracket of the pedal assembly” * * *

* * * *

We begin by rejecting the rigid approach of the Court of Appeals. Throughout this Court’s engagement with the question of obviousness, our cases have set forth an expansive and flexible approach inconsistent with the way the Court of Appeals applied its TSM test here. * * *

* * * *For over a half century, the Court has held that a patent for a combination which only unites old elements with no change in their respective functions * * * obviously withdraws what is already known into the field of its monopoly and diminishes the resources available to skillful [persons].* * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [I]f a technique has been used to improve one device, and a person of ordinary skill in the art would recognize that it would improve similar devices in the same way, using the technique is obvious unless its actual application is beyond his or her skill. * * *

* * * *

The first error of the Court of Appeals in this case was to * * * [hold] that courts and patent examiners should look only to the problem the patentee was trying to solve. * * *

The second error of the Court of Appeals lay in its assumption that a person of ordinary skill attempting to solve a problem will be led only to those elements of prior art designed to solve the same problem. * * *

* * * *

When we apply the standards we have explained to the instant facts, claim 4 must be found obvious. * * * [W]e see little difference between the teachings of Asano and Smith and the adjustable electronic pedal disclosed in claim 4 of the Engelgau patent. A person having ordinary skill in the art could have combined Asano with a pedal position sensor in a fashion encompassed by claim 4, and would have seen the benefits of doing so.

* * * *

* * * The judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

QUESTIONS

1. If a person of ordinary skill can implement a predictable variation of another’s patented invention, does the Court’s opinion indicate that the item is likely not to be patentable?
2. Based on the Court’s reasoning, what other factors should be considered when determining the obviousness of a patent?

Patents for Software At one time, it was difficult for developers and manufacturers of software to obtain patent protection because many software products simply automate procedures that can be performed manually. In other words, it was thought that computer programs did not meet the “novel” and “not obvious” requirements previously mentioned. Also, the basis for software is often a mathematical equation or formula, which is not patentable. In 1981, however, the United States Supreme Court held that it is possible to obtain a patent for a process that incorporates a computer program—providing, of course, that the process itself is patentable.¹⁹ Subsequently, many patents have been issued for software-related inventions.

Patents for Business Processes In 1998, in a landmark case, State Street Bank & Trust Co. v. Signature Financial Group, Inc.,²⁰ the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit ruled that business processes were patentable. After this decision, numerous technology firms applied for business process patents. Walker Digital applied for a business process patent for its “Dutch auction” system, which allowed consumers to make offers for airline tickets on the Internet and led to the creation of Priceline.com. Amazon.com obtained a business process patent for its “one-click” ordering system, a method of processing credit-card orders securely. Indeed, since the State Street decision, the number of Internet-related patents issued by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has increased dramatically.

Patent Infringement

If a firm makes, uses, or sells another’s patented design, product, or process without the patent owner’s permission, the tort of patent infringement occurs. Patent infringement may arise even though the patent owner has not put the patented product into commerce. Patent infringement may also occur even though not all features or parts of a product are identical to those used in the patented invention, provided that the features are equivalent. (With respect to a patented process, however, all steps or their equivalent must be copied for infringement to exist.)

Note that, as a general rule, under U.S. law no patent infringement occurs when a patented product is made and sold in another country. In 2007, this issue came before the United States Supreme Court in a patent infringement case that AT&T Corporation had brought against Microsoft Corporation. AT&T holds a patent on a device used to digitally encode, compress, and process recorded speech. Microsoft’s Windows operating system, as Microsoft admitted, incorporated software code that infringed on AT&T’s patent. The only question before the Supreme Court was whether Microsoft’s liability extended to computers made in another country. The Court held that it did not. Microsoft was liable only for infringement in the United States and not for the Windows-based computers sold in foreign locations. The Court reasoned that Microsoft had not “supplied” the software for the computers but had only electronically transmitted a master copy, which the foreign manufacturers then copied and loaded onto the computers.²¹

Remedies for Patent Infringement

If a patent is infringed, the patent holder may sue for relief in federal court. The patent holder can seek an injunction against the infringer and can also request damages for royalties and lost profits. In some cases, the court may grant the winning party reimbursement for attorneys’ fees and costs. If the court determines that the infringement was willful, the court can triple the amount of damages awarded (treble damages).

In the past, permanent injunctions were routinely granted to prevent future infringement. In 2006, however, the United States Supreme Court ruled that patent holders are not automatically entitled to a permanent injunction against future infringing activities—the courts have discretion to decide whether equity requires it. According to the Supreme Court, a patent holder must prove that it has suffered irreparable injury and that the public interest would not be diserved by a permanent injunction.²²

This decision gives courts discretion to decide what is equitable in the circumstances and allows them to consider what is in the public interest rather than just the interests of the parties. For example, in the first case applying this rule, a court found that although Microsoft had infringed on the patent of a small software company, the latter was not entitled to an injunction. According to the court, the small company was not irreparably harmed and could be adequately compensated by damages. Also, the public might suffer negative effects from an injunction because the infringement involved part of Microsoft’s widely used Office suite software.²³

19. Diamond v. Diehr, 450 U.S. 175, 101 S.Ct. 1048, 67 L.Ed.2d 155 (1981).

20. 149 F.3d 1368 (Fed.Cir.1998).

21. Microsoft Corp. v. AT&T Corp., ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 1746, 167 L.Ed.2d 737 (2007).

22. eBay, Inc. v. MercExchange, LLC, 547 U.S. 388, 126 S.Ct. 1837, 164 L.Ed.2d 641 (2006).

23. ZA Technologies, Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., 434 F.Supp.2d 437 (E.D.Tex. 2006).

Copyrights

A copyright is an intangible property right granted by federal statute to the author or originator of a literary or artistic production of a specified type. Today, copyrights are governed by the Copyright Act of 1976,²⁴ as amended. Works created after January 1, 1978, are automatically given statutory copyright protection for the life of the author plus 70 years. For copyrights owned by publishing houses, the copyright expires 95 years from the date of publication or 120 years from the date of creation, whichever is first. For works by more than one author, the copyright expires 70 years after the death of the last surviving author.

These time periods reflect the extensions of the length of copyright protection enacted by Congress in the Copyright Term Extension Act of 1998.²⁵ Critics challenged this act as overstepping the bounds of Congress's power and violating the constitutional requirement that copyrights endure for only a limited time. In 2003, however, the United States Supreme Court upheld the act in Eldred v. Ashcroft.²⁶ This holding obviously favored copyright holders by preventing copyrighted works from the 1920s and 1930s from losing protection and falling into the public domain for an additional two decades.

Copyrights can be registered with the U.S. Copyright Office in Washington, D.C. A copyright owner no longer needs to place the symbol © or the term Copr. or Copyright on the work to have the work protected against infringement. Chances are that if somebody created it, somebody owns it.

What Is Protected Expression?

Works that are copyrightable include books, records, films, artworks, architectural plans, menus, music videos, product packaging, and computer software. To be protected, a work must be “fixed in a durable medium” from which it can be perceived, reproduced, or communicated. Protection is automatic. Registration is not required.

To obtain protection under the Copyright Act, a work must be original and fall into one of the following categories:

1. Literary works (including newspaper and magazine articles, computer and training manuals, catalogues, brochures, and print advertisements).
2. Musical works and accompanying words (including advertising jingles).
3. Dramatic works and accompanying music.
4. Pantomimes and choreographic works (including ballets and other forms of dance).
5. Pictorial, graphic, and sculptural works (including cartoons, maps, posters, statues, and even stuffed animals).
6. Motion pictures and other audiovisual works (including multimedia works).
7. Sound recordings.
8. Architectural works.

Section 102 Exclusions Section 102 of the Copyright Act specifically excludes copyright protection for any “idea, procedure, process, system, method of operation, concept, principle, or discovery, regardless of the form in which it is described, explained, illustrated, or embodied.” Note that it is not possible to copyright an idea. The underlying ideas embodied in a work may be freely used by others. What is copyrightable is the particular way in which an idea is expressed. Whenever an idea and an expression are inseparable, the expression cannot be copyrighted. Generally, anything that is not an original expression will not qualify for copyright protection. Facts widely known to the public are not copyrightable. Page numbers are not copyrightable because they follow a sequence known to everyone. Mathematical calculations are not copyrightable.

Compilations of Facts Unlike ideas, compilations of facts are copyrightable. Under Section 103 of the Copyright Act a compilation is “a work formed by the collection and assembling of preexisting materials or data that are selected, coordinated, or arranged in such a way that the resulting work as a whole constitutes an original work of authorship.” The key requirement in the copyrightability of a compilation is originality. If the facts are selected, coordinated, or arranged in an original way, they can qualify for copyright protection. Therefore, the white pages of a telephone directory do not qualify for copyright protection because the facts (names, addresses, and telephone numbers) are listed in alphabetical order rather than being selected, coordinated, or arranged in an original way.²⁷ The Yellow Pages of a telephone directory, in contrast, can qualify

24. 17 U.S.C. Sections 101 et seq.

25. 17 U.S.C. Section 302.

26. 537 U.S. 186, 123 S.Ct. 769, 154 L.Ed.2d 683 (2003).

27. Feist Publications, Inc. v. Rural Telephone Service Co., 499 U.S. 340, 111 S.Ct. 1282, 113 L.Ed.2d 358 (1991).

for copyright protection.²⁸ Similarly, a compilation of information about yachts listed for sale may qualify for copyright protection.²⁹

Copyright Infringement

Whenever the form or expression of an idea is copied, an infringement of copyright has occurred. The reproduction does not have to be exactly the same as the original, nor does it have to reproduce the original in its entirety. If a substantial part of the original is reproduced, the copyright has been infringed.

Damages for Copyright Infringement

Those who infringe copyrights may be liable for damages or criminal penalties. These range from actual damages or statutory damages, imposed at the court's discretion, to criminal proceedings for willful violations. Actual damages are based on the harm caused to the copyright holder by the infringement, while statutory damages, not to exceed $150,000, are provided for under the Copyright Act. Criminal proceedings may result in fines and/or imprisonment.

The “Fair Use” Exception An exception to liability for copyright infringement is made under the “fair use” doctrine. In certain circumstances, a person or organization can reproduce copyrighted material without paying royalties (fees paid to the copyright holder for the privilege of reproducing the copyrighted material). Section 107 of the Copyright Act provides as follows:

[T]he fair use of a copyrighted work, including such use by reproduction in copies or phonorecords or by any other means specified by [Section 106 of the Copyright Act], for purposes such as criticism, comment, news reporting, teaching (including multiple copies for classroom use), scholarship, or research, is not an infringement of copyright. In determining whether the use made of a work in any particular case is a fair use the factors to be considered shall include—

- (1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes;
- (2) the nature of the copyrighted work;
- (3) the amount and substantiality of the portion used in relation to the copyrighted work as a whole; and
- (4) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

28. Bellsouth Advertising & Publishing Corp. v. Donnelley Information Publishing, Inc., 999 F.2d 1436 (11th Cir. 1993).

29. BUC International Corp. v. International Yacht Council, Ltd., 489 F.3d 1129 (11th Cir. 2007).

Because these guidelines are very broad, the courts determine whether a particular use is fair on a case-by-case basis. Thus, anyone reproducing copyrighted material may still be committing a violation. In determining whether a use is fair, courts have often considered the fourth factor to be the most important.

Copyright Protection for Software

In 1980, Congress passed the Computer Software Copyright Act, which amended the Copyright Act of 1976 to include computer programs in the list of creative works protected by federal copyright law.³⁰ The 1980 statute, which classifies computer programs as “literary works,” defines a computer program as a “set of statements or instructions to be used directly or indirectly in a computer in order to bring about a certain result.”

The unique nature of computer programs, however, has created problems for the courts in applying and interpreting the 1980 act. Generally, the courts have held that copyright protection extends not only to those parts of a computer program that can be read by humans, such as the “high-level” language of a source code, but also to the binary-language object code, which is readable only by the computer.³¹ Additionally, such elements as the overall structure, sequence, and organization of a program have been deemed copyrightable, but generally not the “look and feel” of computer programs.³² The “look and feel” of computer programs refers to their general appearance, command structure, video images, menus, windows, and other screen displays.

Copyrights in Digital Information

Copyright law is probably the most important form of intellectual property protection on the Internet. This is because much of the material on the Internet consists of works of authorship (including multimedia presentations, software, and database information), which are 30. Pub. L. No. 96-517 (1980), amending 17 U.S.C. Sections 101, 117.

31. See Stern Electronics, Inc. v. Kaufman, 669 F.2d 852 (2d Cir. 1982); and Apple Computer, Inc. v. Franklin Computer Corp., 714 F.2d 1240 (3d Cir. 1983).

32. Whelan Associates, Inc. v. Jaslow Dental Laboratory, Inc., 797 F.2d 1222 (3d Cir. 1986).

the traditional focus of copyright law. Copyright law is also important because the nature of the Internet requires that data be “copied” to be transferred online. Traditionally, many of the controversies arising in this area of the law have involved copies.

The Copyright Act of 1976

When Congress drafted the principal U.S. law governing copyrights, the Copyright Act of 1976, cyberspace did not exist for most of us. At that time, the primary threat to copyright owners was from persons making unauthorized tangible copies of works. Because of the nature of cyberspace, however, one of the early controversies was determining at what point an intangible, electronic “copy” of a work has been made. The courts have held that loading a file or program into a computer’s random access memory, or RAM, constitutes the making of a “copy” for purposes of copyright law.³³ RAM is a portion of a computer’s memory into which a file, for example, is loaded so that it can be accessed. Thus, a copyright is infringed when a party downloads software into RAM without owning the software or otherwise having a right to download it.³⁴ Today, technology has vastly increased the potential for copyright infringement. For a discussion of whether search engines that use thumbnail images of copyrighted materials are liable for infringement, see this chapter’s Insight into E-Commerce feature on pages 174 and 175.

Further Developments in Copyright Law

In the last fifteen years, Congress has enacted legislation designed specifically to protect copyright holders in a digital age. Particularly significant are the No Electronic Theft Act of 1997³⁵ and the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998.³⁶

The No Electronic Theft Act Prior to 1997, criminal penalties could be imposed under copyright law only if unauthorized copies were exchanged for financial gain. Yet much piracy of copyrighted materials was “altruistic” in nature; that is, unauthorized copies were made and distributed not for financial gain but simply for reasons of generosity—to share the copies with others. To combat altruistic piracy and for other reasons, Congress passed the No Electronic Theft (NET) Act of 1997.

NET extended criminal liability for the piracy of copyrighted materials to persons who exchange unauthorized copies of copyrighted works, such as software, even though they realize no profit from the exchange. The act also altered the traditional “fair use” doctrine by imposing penalties on those who make unauthorized electronic copies of books, magazines, movies, or music for personal use. The criminal penalties for violating the act are relatively severe; they include fines as high as $250,000 and incarceration for up to five years.

The Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998

The passage of the Digital Millennium Copyright Act (DMCA) of 1998 gave significant protection to owners of copyrights in digital information.³⁷ Among other things, the act established civil and criminal penalties for anyone who circumvents (bypasses, or gets around—by using a special decryption program, for example) encryption software or other technological antipiracy protection. Also prohibited are the manufacture, import, sale, and distribution of devices or services for circumvention.

The DMCA provides for exceptions to fit the needs of libraries, scientists, universities, and others. In general, the law does not restrict the “fair use” of circumvention methods for educational and other noncommercial purposes. For example, circumvention is allowed to test computer security, to conduct encryption research, to protect personal privacy, and to enable parents to monitor their children’s use of the Internet. The exceptions are to be reconsidered every three years.

The DMCA also limits the liability of Internet service providers (ISPs). Under the act, an ISP is not liable for any copyright infringement by its customer unless the ISP is aware of the subscriber’s violation. An ISP may be held liable only if it fails to take action to shut the subscriber down after learning of the violation. A copyright holder must act promptly, however, by pursuing a claim in court, or the subscriber has the right to be restored to online access.

33. MAI Systems Corp. v. Peak Computer, Inc., 991 F.2d 511 (9th Cir.1993).

34. DSC Communications Corp. v. Pulse Communications, Inc., 170 F.3d 1354 (Fed.Cir.1999).

35. Pub.L. No. 105-147 (1997). Codified at 17 U.S.C. Sections 101, 506; 18 U.S.C. Sections 2311, 2319, 2319A, 2320; and 28 U.S.C. Sections 994 and 1498.

36. 17 U.S.C. Sections 512, 1201–1205, 1301–1332; and 28 U.S.C. Section 4001.

37. This act implemented the World Intellectual Property Organization Copyright Treaty of 1996, which will be discussed later in this chapter.

INSIGHT INTO E-COMMERCE

Search Engines versus Copyright Owners

Since their humble beginnings more than a decade ago, search engines have become ubiquitous in the e-commerce world. Every day millions of consumers use search engines to locate various products on the Web. A major legal question arises, however, when the results of a search include copyrighted intellectual property, such as books, downloadable software, movies and other videos, and images. Can the owner of the search engine that returned these results be held liable for copyright infringement?

The Betamax Doctrine

The basic rule that has governed issues relating to the application of new technology for uses that might include copyright infringement was set out more than two decades ago by the United States Supreme Court in the landmark case Sony Corporation of America v. Universal City Studios.^a The case involved the then new technology of the videocassette recorder (VCR), which was available in two formats—VHS and Betamax. Owners of copyrighted television programs, concerned that VCR owners were using the equipment to copy TV programs, brought a suit against a VCR manufacturer, claiming that it was liable for its customers' copyright infringement. The Supreme Court, however, in what became known as the Betamax doctrine, held that the manufacturer was not liable for creating a technology that certain customers might use for copyright infringing purposes, as long as that technology was capable of substantial noninfringing uses. Legal scholars believe that the Betamax doctrine has allowed for the development of many other technologies that are capable of both infringing and noninfringing uses—including CD-ROM burners, DVRs, TiVo, Apple's iPod, and even the personal computer.

As discussed later in the text, twenty years after the Sony case, organizations and companies in the music and film industry brought a copyright infringement suit against Grokster, Morpheus, and KaZaA, the makers of file-sharing software that allowed millions of individuals to copy copyrighted music. In that case, the Supreme Court did find that there was ample evidence that the software makers had taken steps to promote copyright infringement, but significantly the Court did not overturn the Betamax doctrine. The Court did not specify what steps are necessary to impose liability on the provider of a technology, however.^b

Does Providing Thumbnail Images Violate Copyright Law?

Just as VCRs and file-sharing technology raised new issues of copyright infringement, so does today's search engine technology. In response to a search a. 464 U.S. 417, 104 S.Ct. 774, 78 L.Ed.2d 574 (1984).

b. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc. v. Grokster, Ltd., 545 U.S. 913, 125 S.Ct. 2764, 162 L.Ed.2d 781 (2005).

MP3 and File-Sharing Technology

Soon after the Internet became popular, a few enterprising programmers created software to compress large data files, particularly those associated with music. The reduced file sizes make transmitting music over the Internet feasible. The most widely known compression and decompression system is MP3, which enables music fans to download songs or entire CDs onto their computers or onto portable listening devices, such as Rio or iPod. The MP3 system also made it possible for music fans to access other music fans' files by engaging in file-sharing via the Internet.

Peer-to-Peer (P2P) Networking File-sharing via the Internet is accomplished through what is called peer-to-peer (P2P) networking. The concept is simple. Rather than going through a central Web server, P2P uses numerous personal computers (PCs) that are connected to the Internet. Files stored on one PC can be accessed by others who are members of the same network. Sometimes this is called a distributed network because parts of the network are distributed all over the country or the world. File-sharing offers an unlimited number of uses for distributed networks. For example, thousands of researchers allow their home computers' computing power to be simultaneously accessed through file-sharing software so that very large mathematical problems can be solved quickly. Additionally, persons scattered throughout the country or the world can work together on the same project by using file-sharing programs.

Sharing Stored Music Files When file-sharing is used to download others' stored music files, copy-request, numerous search engines show thumbnail images of books, album covers, and copyrighted photographs. Arriba Soft Corporation (now ditto.com), for example, operated a search engine that displayed its results in the form of thumbnail pictures. It obtained its database of photographs by copying images from other Web sites. When professional photographer Leslie Kelly discovered that his copyrighted photographs were part of Arriba's database, he brought a suit for copyright infringement. Arriba prevailed, as the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that its thumbnails were a fair use under the Copyright Act.^c

A recent innovation enables search engines to search specifically for images. Google Image Search, for example, stores thumbnail images of its search results on Google's servers. The thumbnail images are reduced, lower-resolution versions of full-size images stored on third party computers. In 2005, Perfect 10, a men's magazine that features high-resolution photographs of topless and nude women, brought a suit to enjoin Google from caching and displaying its photographs as thumbnails. Perfect 10 argued that because Google "created the audience" for its sites and indexes, Google should be liable for whatever infringements occurred on those sites. The magazine also contended that Google had directly infringed Perfect 10's copyrights by in-line linking and framing images published on other sites. (The case was combined with a similar suit brought against Amazon.com for its A9 search engine.) Once again,

c. Kelly v. Arriba Soft Corporation, 336 F.3d 811 (9th Cir. 2003).

however, as in its Arriba decision, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the thumbnails constituted a fair use. Pointing out the public benefit that search engines provide, the court said that until Perfect 10 gave Google specific URLs for infringing images, Google had no duty to act and could not be held liable. The court further held that Google could not "supervise or control" the third party Web sites linked to its search results.^d In sum, the court refused to hold the creators of image search technology liable for users' infringement because the technology is capable of both infringing and noninfringing uses—just as the Betamax doctrine protected VCR manufacturers from liability for user's infringement.

CRITICAL THINKING INSIGHT INTO TECHNOLOGY

What has changed in the world of technology since the Betamax doctrine was enunciated? Does the fact that more and more intellectual property is being digitized and made available online alter the reasoning underlying the Betamax doctrine?

d. Perfect 10, Inc. v. Amazon.com, Inc., 487 F.3d 701 (9th Cir. 2007).

right issues arise. Recording artists and their labels stand to lose large amounts of royalties and revenues if relatively few CDs are purchased and then made available on distributed networks, from which everyone can get them for free. The issue of file-sharing infringement has been the subject of an ongoing debate for some time.

For example, in the highly publicized case of A&M Records, Inc. v. Napster, Inc.,³⁸ several firms in the recording industry sued Napster, Inc., the owner of the then popular Napster Web site. The Napster site provided registered users with free software that enabled them to transfer exact copies of the contents of MP3 files from one computer to another via the Internet. Napster also maintained centralized search indices so that users could locate specific titles or artists' recordings on the computers of other members. The firms argued that Napster should be liable for contributory and vicarious³⁹ (indirect) copyright infringement because it assisted others in obtaining copies of copyrighted music without the copyright owners' permission. The federal district court agreed, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit affirmed, holding Napster liable for violating copyright laws. The court reasoned that Napster was liable for its users' infringement because the technology that Napster had used was centralized and gave it “the ability to locate infringing material listed on its search indices and the right to terminate users’ access to the system.”

38. 239 F.3d 1004 (9th Cir. 2001).

39. Vicarious (indirect) liability exists when one person is subject to liability for another's actions. A common example occurs in the employment context, when an employer is held vicariously liable by third parties for torts committed by employees in the course of their employment.

After the Napster decision, the recording industry filed and won numerous lawsuits against companies that distribute online file-sharing software. The courts held these companies liable based on two theories: contributory infringement, which applies if the company had reason to know about a user’s infringement and failed to stop it, and vicarious liability, which exists if the company was able to control the users’ activities and stood to benefit financially from their infringement.

The Evolution of File-Sharing Technologies In the wake of the Napster decision, other companies developed new technologies that allow P2P network users to share stored music files, without paying a fee, more quickly and efficiently than ever. Software such as Morpheus, KaZaA, and LimeWire, for example, provides users with an interface that is similar to a Web browser.⁴⁰ Companies need not locate songs for users on other members’ computers. Instead, the software automatically annotates files with descriptive information so that the music can easily be categorized and cross-referenced (by artist and title, for instance). When a user performs a search, the software is able to locate a list of peers that have the file available for downloading. Also, to expedite the P2P transfer, the software distributes the download task over the entire list of peers simultaneously. By downloading even one file, the user becomes a point of distribution for that file, which is then automatically shared with others on the network.

Because the file-sharing software was decentralized and did not use search indices, the companies had no ability to supervise or control which music (or other media files) their users exchanged. In addition, it was difficult for courts to apply the traditional doctrines of contributory and vicarious liability to these new technologies.

The Supreme Court’s Grokster Decision

In 2005, the United States Supreme Court expanded the liability of file-sharing companies in its decision in *Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Inc. v. Grokster, Ltd.*⁴¹ In that case, organizations in the music and film industry (the plaintiffs) sued several companies that distribute file-sharing software used in P2P networks, including Grokster, Ltd., and StreamCast Networks, Inc. (the defendants). The plaintiffs claimed that the defendants were contributorily and vicariously liable for the infringement of their end users. The Supreme Court held that “one who distributes a device [software] with the object of promoting its use to infringe the copyright, as shown by clear expression or other affirmative steps taken to foster infringement, is liable for the resulting acts of infringement by third parties.”

Although the Supreme Court did not specify what kind of affirmative steps are necessary to establish liability, it did note that there was ample evidence that the defendants had acted with the intent to cause copyright violations. (Grokster, Ltd., later settled this dispute out of court and stopped distributing its software.) Essentially, this means that file-sharing companies that have taken affirmative steps to promote copyright infringement can be held secondarily liable for millions of infringing acts that their users commit daily. Because the Court did not define exactly what is necessary to impose liability, however, a substantial amount of legal uncertainty remains concerning this issue. Although some file-sharing companies have been shut down, illegal file-sharing—and lawsuits against file-sharing companies and the individuals who use them—has continued in the years since this decision.

In the following case, six recording companies filed a suit against an individual user, charging her with copyright infringement for downloading eight songs without the owners’ consent.

40. Note that in 2005, KaZaA entered a settlement agreement with four major music companies that had alleged copyright infringement. KaZaA agreed to offer only legitimate, fee-based music downloads in the future.

41. 545 U.S. 913, 125 S.Ct. 2764, 162 L.Ed.2d 781 (2005).

CASE 8.4 Sony BMG Music Entertainment v. Villarreal

United States District Court, Middle District of Georgia, Macon Division, 2007.
__ F.Supp.2d __.

- Background and Facts Sony BMG Music Entertainment, UMG Recordings, Inc., Warner Bros. Records, Inc., Virgin Records America, Inc., Capitol Records, Inc., and BMG Music are the copyright owners or licensees of rights to certain sound recordings. In September 2006, these companies filed a suit in a federal district court against Sharon Villarreal, alleging copyright infringement. The plaintiffs complained that Villarreal “has, without the permission or consent of Plaintiffs, used (and continues to use) an online media distribution system to download Plaintiffs’ copyrighted recordings, to distribute the copyrighted recordings to the public, and/or to make the copyrighted recordings available for distribution to others.” The plaintiffs claimed that Villarreal had downloaded and distributed, or made available for distribution, eight of their recordings, including “Goodbye Earl” by the Dixie Chicks, “I Got a Girl” by Lou Bega, “A Long December” by the Counting Crows, “Black Balloon” by the Goo Goo Dolls, “Like a Virgin” by Madonna, “Steal My Kisses” by Ben Harper, “Another Brick in the Wall, Pt. 2” by Pink Floyd, and “I Might Get Over You” by Kenny Chesney. Villarreal was notified of the complaint but did not respond. The plaintiffs asked the court to enter a default judgment in their favor, to award damages and costs, and to issue an injunction against Villarreal.

CASE 8.4 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
C. ASHLEY ROYAL, United States District Judge.

* * * *

* * * A defendant’s default does not itself warrant the court entering a default judgment. Rather, there must be a sufficient basis in the pleadings for the judgment entered * * *. The defendant is not held to admit facts that are not well-pleaded or to admit conclusions of law. Simply put, a default should not be treated as an absolute confession of the defendant of his liability and of the plaintiff’s right to recover. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * Plaintiffs plainly allege that Defendant has, without the permission or consent of Plaintiffs, used an online media distribution system to download Plaintiffs’ copyrighted recordings, to distribute the copyrighted recordings to the public, and/or to make the copyrighted recordings available for distribution to others. These allegations do state a claim for copyright infringement.

And, of course, by her default in this case, Defendant has admitted these allegations as true. This Court therefore finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated claims for relief under the Copyright Act and that, by defaulting, Defendant has admitted her liability for such violations. * * *

* * * Relief shall be granted as follows:

* * * *

* * * The damages provision of the Copyright Act * * * provides that statutory damages may be recovered for “all infringements involved in the action, with respect to any one work, for which any one infringer is liable individually * * * in a sum not less than $750 or more than $30,000 as the court considers just.” Thus, * * * the copyright owner * * * is entitled to recover, at least, $750 for each act of infringement. * * * [T]o affix the measure of damages, the Court need only sum the number of separate, individual works which were the subject of a defendant’s infringing activities.

* * * Plaintiffs show that eight (8) of their copyrighted recordings were downloaded and distributed (or made available for distribution) by Defendant. * * * Applying the statutory formula for calculating damages in this case, this Court will simply multiply the minimum $750.00 statutory penalty by eight (8), the number of works infringed upon. Having done so, this Court agrees that an award of compensatory damages in the amount of $6,000.00 is appropriate.

* * * *

* * * [T]he Copyright Act [also] provide[s] that a district court may, in its discretion, allow a copyright owner to recover full costs. * * * Plaintiffs have incurred costs in this case in the amount of $490.00. Having considered the matter, this Court agrees that an award of $490.00 in costs is reasonable.

* * * *

Finally, Plaintiffs move this Court for entry of a permanent injunction barring Defendant from directly or indirectly infringing on Plaintiffs’ copyrights, whether now in existence or later created. Plaintiffs further request that the Court require Defendant to destroy all copies of Plaintiffs’ copyrighted recordings that Defendant has downloaded or has transferred onto any physical medium or device in Defendant’s possession, custody, or control. Again, the Copyright Act provides for such relief to be granted. * * *

* * * Here, having considered the copyright infringements at issue, this Court finds that Defendant’s past and current conduct has and will, unless enjoined, cause Plaintiffs irreparable injury that cannot be fully compensated or measured in money. Moreover, in light of Defendant's admitted infringement in this case, the need to protect Plaintiffs' copyrighted works, and the public interest in upholding copyright protection, the Court further finds that an injunction barring Defendant from infringing upon all of Plaintiffs' copyrighted recordings, and not just those eight recordings listed herein, is appropriate. For the same reasons, and because Plaintiffs will continually create new works, which may be vulnerable to similar infringement and would require future litigation, the Court finds that the injunction entered in this case should likewise cover works created in the future. [Emphasis added.]

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 8.4 CONTINUED

- Decision and Remedy "Having considered Plaintiffs' well-pleaded allegations in this case, the Court does find a sufficient basis in the Complaint for a judgment to be entered in Plaintiffs' favor for violations of the Copyright Act." The court also ruled that the copyright owners and licensees were entitled to the relief that they sought—damages of $750 for each of the eight infringed works, $490 for the costs of filing the suit, and an injunction to order the destruction of all copies of the infringed works and to bar Villarreal's future infringement.
- The Legal Environment Dimension What interest does the public have in upholding copyright law and granting the sort of relief that was awarded in this case? Explain.
- The E-Commerce Dimension When rights such as those in this case become more valuable as a result of new technology, should the law be changed to redistribute the economic benefit of those rights? Why or why not?

Trade Secrets

The law of trade secrets protects some business processes and information that are not, or cannot be, patented, copyrighted, or trademarked against appropriation by competitors. Trade secrets include customer lists, plans, research and development, pricing information, marketing methods, production techniques, and generally anything that makes an individual company unique and that would have value to a competitor.

Unlike copyright and trademark protection, protection of trade secrets extends both to ideas and to their expression. (For this reason, and because a trade secret involves no registration or filing requirements, trade secret protection may be well suited for software.) Of course, the secret formula, method, or other information must be disclosed to some persons, particularly to key employees. Businesses generally attempt to protect their trade secrets by having all employees who use the process or information agree in their contracts, or in confidentiality agreements, never to divulge it.

State and Federal Law on Trade Secrets

Under Section 757 of the Restatement of Torts, "One who discloses or uses another's trade secret, without a privilege to do so, is liable to the other if (1) he [or she] discovered the secret by improper means, or (2) his [or her] disclosure or use constitutes a breach of confidence reposed in him [or her] by the other in disclosing the secret to him [or her]." The theft of confidential business data by industrial espionage, as when a business taps into a competitor's computer, is a theft of trade secrets without any contractual violation and is actionable in itself.

Until thirty years ago, virtually all law with respect to trade secrets was common law. In an effort to reduce the unpredictability of the common law in this area, a model act, the Uniform Trade Secrets Act, was presented to the states for adoption in 1979. Parts of the act have been adopted in more than thirty states. Typically, a state that has adopted parts of the act has adopted only those parts that encompass its own existing common law. Additionally, in 1996 Congress passed the Economic Espionage Act,⁴² which made the theft of trade secrets a federal crime. We will examine the provisions and significance of this act in Chapter 9, in the context of crimes related to business.

Trade Secrets in Cyberspace

New computer technology is undercutting a business firm's ability to protect its confidential information, including trade secrets.⁴³ For example, a dishonest

42. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1831–1839.

43. Note that in at least one case, a court has held that customers' e-mail addresses may constitute trade secrets. See TNT Motorsports, Inc. v. Hennessey Motorsports, Inc., 965 S.W.2d 18 (Tex.App.—Hous. [1 Dist.] 1998); rehearing overruled (1998); petition dismissed (1998).

employee could e-mail trade secrets in a company's computer to a competitor or a future employer. If e-mail is not an option, the employee might walk out with the information on a flash pen drive.

International Protection for Intellectual Property

For many years, the United States has been a party to various international agreements relating to intellectual property rights. For example, the Paris Convention of 1883, to which about 170 countries are signatory, allows parties in one country to file for patent and trademark protection in any of the other member countries. Other international agreements in this area include the Berne Convention, the TRIPS agreement, and the Madrid Protocol.

The Berne Convention

Under the Berne Convention (an international copyright agreement) of 1886, as amended, if an American writes a book, every country that has signed the convention must recognize the American author's copyright in the book. Also, if a citizen of a country that has not signed the convention first publishes a book in one of the 170 countries that have signed, all other countries that have signed the convention must recognize that author's copyright. Copyright notice is not needed to gain protection under the Berne Convention for works published after March 1, 1989.

The laws of many countries, as well as international laws, are being updated to reflect changes in technology and the expansion of the Internet. Copyright holders and other owners of intellectual property generally agree that changes in the law are needed to stop the increasing international piracy of their property. The World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) Copyright Treaty of 1996, a special agreement under the Berne Convention, attempts to update international law governing copyright protection to include more safeguards against copyright infringement via the Internet. The United States signed the WIPO treaty in 1996 and implemented its terms in the Digital Millennium Copyright Act of 1998, which was discussed earlier in this chapter.

The Berne Convention and other international agreements have given some protection to intellectual property on a global level. Another significant worldwide agreement to increase such protection is the Trade-Related Aspects of Intellectual Property Rights agreement—or, more simply, the TRIPS agreement.

The TRIPS Agreement

Representatives from more than one hundred nations signed the TRIPS agreement in 1994. It was one of several documents that were annexed to the agreement that created the World Trade Organization, or WTO, in 1995. The TRIPS agreement established, for the first time, standards for the international protection of intellectual property rights, including patents, trademarks, and copyrights for movies, computer programs, books, and music. The TRIPS agreement provides that each member country must include in its domestic laws broad intellectual property rights and effective remedies (including civil and criminal penalties) for violations of those rights.

Members Cannot Discriminate against Foreign Intellectual Property Owners

Generally, the TRIPS agreement forbids member nations from discriminating against foreign owners of intellectual property rights (in the administration, regulation, or adjudication of such rights). In other words, a member nation cannot give its own nationals (citizens) favorable treatment without offering the same treatment to nationals of all member countries. For instance, if a U.S. software manufacturer brings a suit for the infringement of intellectual property rights under a member nation's national laws, the U.S. manufacturer is entitled to receive the same treatment as a domestic manufacturer. Each member nation must also ensure that legal procedures are available for parties who wish to bring actions for infringement of intellectual property rights. Additionally, a related document established a mechanism for settling disputes among member nations.

Covers All Types of Intellectual Property

Particular provisions of the TRIPS agreement relate to patent, trademark, and copyright protection for intellectual property. The agreement specifically provides copyright protection for computer programs by stating that compilations of data, databases, and other materials are "intellectual creations" and are to be protected as copyrightable works. Other provisions relate to trade secrets and the rental of computer programs and cinematographic works.

The Madrid Protocol

In the past, one of the difficulties in protecting U.S. trademarks internationally was the time and expense involved in applying for trademark registration in foreign countries. The filing fees and procedures for trademark registration vary significantly among individual countries. The Madrid Protocol, which President George W. Bush signed into law in 2003, may help to resolve these problems. The Madrid Protocol is an international treaty that has been signed by seventy-three countries. Under its provisions, a U.S. company wishing to register its trademark abroad can submit a single application and designate other member countries in which the U.S. company would like to register its mark. The treaty is designed to reduce the costs of international trademark protection by more than 60 percent, according to proponents.

Although the Madrid Protocol may simplify and reduce the cost of trademark registration in foreign countries, it remains to be seen whether it will provide significant benefits to trademark owners. Even assuming that the registration process will be easier, there is still the issue of whether member countries will enforce the law and protect the mark.

REVIEWING Intellectual Property and Internet Law

Two computer science majors, Trent and Xavier, have an idea for a new video game, which they propose to call "Hallowed." They form a business and begin developing their idea. Several months later, Trent and Xavier run into a problem with their design and consult with a friend, Brad, who is an expert in designing computer source codes. After the software is completed but before Hallowed is marketed, a video game called "Halo 2" is released for both the Xbox and Game Cube systems. Halo 2 uses source codes similar to those of Hallowed and imitates Hallowed's overall look and feel, although not all the features are alike. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would the name "Hallowed" receive protection as a trademark or as trade dress?
2. If Trent and Xavier had obtained a business process patent on Hallowed, would the release of Halo 2 infringe on their patent? Why or why not?
3. Based only on the facts described above, could Trent and Xavier sue the makers of Halo 2 for copyright infringement? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that Trent and Xavier discover that Brad took the idea of Hallowed and sold it to the company that produced Halo 2. Which type of intellectual property issue does this raise?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

certification mark 163 collective mark 163

copyright 171

cyber mark 164

cybersquatting 165 dilution 159

distributed network 174 domain name 164

intellectual property 157

meta tag 166

patent 167

peer-to-peer (P2P) networking 174

service mark 163

trade dress 163

trade name 164

trade secret 178

trademark 157

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

8-1. Professor Wise is teaching a summer seminar in business torts at State University. Several times during the course, he makes copies of relevant sections from business law texts and distributes them to his students. Wise does not realize that the daughter of one of the textbook authors is a member of his seminar. She tells her father about Wise's copying activities, which have taken place without her father's or his publisher's permission. Her father sues Wise for copyright infringement. Wise claims protection under the fair use doctrine. Who will prevail? Explain.

8-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In which of the following situations would a court likely hold Ursula liable for copyright infringement?

- Ursula goes to the library and photocopies ten pages from a scholarly journal relating to a topic on which she is writing a term paper.
- Ursula makes blouses, dresses, and other clothes and sells them in her small shop. She advertises some of the outfits as Guest items, hoping that customers might mistakenly assume that they were made by Guess, the well-known clothing manufacturer.
- Ursula teaches Latin American history at a small university. She has a VCR and frequently tapes television programs relating to Latin America. She then takes the videos to her classroom so that her students can watch them.

- For a sample answer to Question 8-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

8-3. Domain Name Disputes. In 1999, Steve and Pierce Thumann and their father, Fred, created Spider Webs, Ltd., a partnership, to, according to Steve, “develop Internet address names.” Spider Webs registered nearly two thousand Internet domain names at an average cost of $70 each, including the names of cities, the names of buildings, names related to a business or trade (such as air-conditioning or plumbing), and the names of famous companies. It offered many of the names for sale on its Web site and through eBay.com. Spider Webs registered the domain name “ERNESTANDJULIOGALLO.COM” in Spider Webs’ name. E. & J. Gallo Winery filed a suit against Spider Webs, alleging, in part, violations of the Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act (ACPA). Gallo asked the court for, among other things, statutory damages. Gallo also sought to have the domain name at issue transferred to Gallo. During the suit, Spider Webs published anticorporate articles and negative opinions about Gallo, as well as discussions of the suit and of the risks associated with alcohol use, at the URL ERNESTANDJULIOGALLO.COM. Should the court rule in

Gallo's favor? Why or why not? [E. & J. Gallo Winery v. Spider Webs, Ltd., 129 FSupp.2d 1033 (S.D.Tex. 2001)]

8-4. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Gateway, Inc., sells computers, computer products, computer peripherals, and computer accessories throughout the world. By 1988, Gateway had begun its first national advertising campaign using black-and-white cows and black-and-white cow spots. By 1991, black-and-white cows and spots had become Gateway's symbol. The next year, Gateway registered a black-and-white cow-spots design in association with computers and computer peripherals as its trademark. Companion Products, Inc. (CPI), sells stuffed animals trademarked as “Stretch Pets.” Stretch Pets have an animal's head and an elastic body that can wrap around the edges of computer monitors, computer cases, or televisions. CPI produces sixteen Stretch Pets, including a polar bear, a moose, several dogs, and a penguin. One of CPI's top-selling products is a black-and-white cow that CPI identifies as “Cody Cow,” which was first sold in 1999. Gateway filed a suit in a federal district court against CPI, alleging trade dress infringement and related claims. What is trade dress? What is the major factor in cases involving trade dress infringement? Does that factor exist in this case? Explain. [Gateway, Inc. v. Companion Products, Inc., 384 F3d 503 (8th Cir. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 8-4, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 8,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

8-5. Patent Infringement. As a cattle rancher in Nebraska, Gerald Gohl used handheld searchlights to find and help calving animals (animals giving birth) in harsh blizzard conditions. Gohl thought that it would be more helpful to have a portable searchlight mounted on the outside of a vehicle and remotely controlled. He and Al Gebhardt developed and patented practical applications of this idea—the Golight and the wireless, remote-controlled Radio Ray, which could rotate 360 degrees—and formed Golight, Inc., to make and market these products. In 1997, Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., began selling a portable, wireless, remote-controlled searchlight that was identical to the Radio Ray except for a stop piece that prevented the light from rotating more than 351 degrees. Golight sent Wal-Mart a letter claiming that its device infringed Golight's patent. Wal-Mart sold its remaining inventory of the devices and stopped carrying the product. Golight filed a suit in a federal district court against Wal-Mart, alleging patent infringement. How should the court rule? Explain. [Golight, Inc. v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 355 F3d 1327 (Fed.Cir. 2004)]

8-6. Copyright Infringement. Bridgeport Music, Inc., is in the business of publishing music and exploiting musical composition copyrights. Westbound Records, Inc., is in the business of recording and distributing sound recordings. Bridgeport and Westbound own the composition and recording copyrights to “Get Off Your Ass and Jam” by George Clinton, Jr., and the Funkadelics. The recording “Get Off” opens with a three-note solo guitar riff that lasts four seconds. The rap song “100 Miles and Runnin’” contains a two-second sample from the guitar solo, at a lower pitch, looped and extended to sixteen beats, in five places in the song, with each looped segment lasting about seven seconds. “100 Miles” was included in the sound track of the movie I Got the Hook Up, which was distributed by No Limit Films. Bridgeport, Westbound, and others filed a suit in a federal district court against No Limit and others, alleging copyright infringement. Does a musician commit copyright infringement when he or she copies any part—even as little as two seconds—of a copyrighted sound recording without the permission of the copyright’s owner? If so, how can an artist legally incorporate a riff from another’s work in his or her own recording? Discuss. [Bridgeport Music, Inc. v. Dimension Films, 410 F.3d 792 (6th Cir. 2005)]

8-7. Trade Secrets. Briefing.com offers Internet-based analyses of investment opportunities to investors. Richard Green is the company’s president. One of Briefing.com’s competitors is StreetAccount, LLC (limited liability company), whose owners include Gregory Jones and Cynthia Dietzmann. Jones worked for Briefing.com for six years until he quit in March 2003 and was a member of its board of directors until April 2003. Dietzmann worked for Briefing.com for seven years until she quit in March 2003. As Briefing.com employees, Jones and Dietzmann had access to confidential business data. For instance, Dietzmann developed a list of contacts through which Briefing.com obtained market information to display online. When Dietzmann quit, however, she did not return all of the contact information to the company. Briefing.com and Green filed a suit in a federal district court against Jones, Dietzmann, and StreetAccount, alleging that they appropriated these data and other “trade secrets” to form a competing business. What are trade secrets? Why are they protected? Under what circumstances is a party liable at common law for their appropriation? How should these principles apply in this case? [Briefing.com v. Jones, 2006 WY 16, 126 P.3d 928 (2006)]

8-8. Trademarks. In 1969, Jack Masquelier, a professor of pharmacology, discovered a chemical antioxidant made from the bark of a French pine tree. The substance supposedly assists in nutritional distribution and blood circulation. Horphag Research, Ltd., began to sell the product under the name Pycnogenol, which Horphag registered as a trademark in 1993. Pycnogenol became one of the fifteen best-selling herbal supplements in the United States. In 1999, through the Web site healthierlife.com, Larry Garcia began to sell Masquelier’s Original OPCs, a supplement derived from grape pits. Claiming that this product was the “true Pycnogenol,” Garcia used the mark as a meta tag and a generic term, attributing the results of research on Horphag’s product to Masquelier’s and altering quotations from scientific literature to substitute the name of Masquelier’s product for Horphag’s. Customers who purchased Garcia’s product contacted Horphag about it, only to learn that they had not bought Horphag’s product. Others called Horphag to ask whether Garcia “was selling . . . real Pycnogenol.” Horphag filed a suit in a federal district court against Garcia, alleging, among other things, that he was diluting Horphag’s mark. What is trademark dilution? Did it occur here? Explain. [Horphag Research, Ltd. v. Garcia, 475 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 2007)]

8-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Custom Copies, Inc., in Gainesville, Florida, is a copy shop that, on request, reproduces and distributes, for profit, material published and owned by others. One of the copy shop’s primary activities is the preparation and sale of coursepacks, which contain compilations of readings for college courses. For a particular coursepack, a teacher selects the readings and delivers a syllabus to the copy shop, which obtains the materials from a library, copies them, and then binds and sells the copies. Blackwell Publishing, Inc., in Malden, Massachusetts, publishes books and journals in medicine and other fields and owns the copyrights to these publications. Blackwell and others filed a suit in a federal district court against Custom Copies, alleging copyright infringement for its “routine and systematic reproduction of materials from plaintiffs’ publications, without seeking permission,” to compile coursepacks for classes at the University of Florida. The plaintiffs asked the court to issue an injunction and award them damages, as well the profit from the infringement. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss the complaint. [Blackwell Publishing, Inc. v. Custom Copies, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Fla. 2006)]

- Custom Copies argued in part that it did not “distribute” the coursepacks. Does a copy shop violate copyright law if it only copies materials for coursepacks? Does the copying fall under the “fair use” exception? Should the court grant the defendant’s motion? Why or why not?
- What is the potential impact of creating and selling copies of a book or journal without the permission of, and the payment of royalties or a fee to, the copyright owner? Explain.

8-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select “Chapter 8.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled The Jerk. Then answer the following questions.

CHAPTER 8 Intellectual Property and Internet Law

- (a) In the video, Navin (Steve Martin) creates a special handle for Mr. Fox's (Bill Macy's) glasses. Can Navin obtain a patent or a copyright protecting his invention? Explain your answer.
- (b) Suppose that after Navin legally protects his idea, Fox steals it and decides to develop it for himself, without Navin's permission. Has Fox committed infringement? If so, what kind—trademark, patent, or copyright?
- (c) Suppose that after Navin legally protects his idea, he realizes he doesn't have the funds to mass-produce the glasses' special handle. Navin therefore agrees to allow Fox to manufacture the product. Has Navin granted Fox a license? Explain.
- (d) Assume that Navin is able to manufacture his invention. What might Navin do to ensure that his product is identifiable and can be distinguished from other products on the market?

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

An excellent overview of the laws governing various forms of intellectual property is available at FindLaw's Web site. Go to profs.lp.findlaw.com

You can find answers to frequently asked questions (FAQs) about patents, trademarks, and copyrights—and links to registration forms, statutes, international patent and trademark offices, and numerous other resources—at the Web site of the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. Go to www.uspto.gov

To perform patent searches and to access information on the patenting process, go to www.bustpatents.com

You can also access the European Patent Office's Web site at www.epo.org

For information on copyrights, go to the U.S. Copyright Office at www.copyright.gov

You can find extensive information on copyright law—including United States Supreme Court decisions in this area and the texts of the Berne Convention and other international treaties on copyright issues—at the Web site of the Legal Information Institute at Cornell University's School of Law. Go to www.law.cornell.edu/wex/index.php/Copyright

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 8" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 8-1: Legal Perspective
Unwarranted Legal Threats

Internet Exercise 8-2: Management Perspective
Protecting Intellectual Property across Borders

Internet Exercise 8-3: Technological Perspective
File-Sharing

CHAPTER 9

Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

The law imposes various sanctions in attempting to ensure that individuals engaging in business in our society can compete and flourish. These sanctions include those imposed by civil law, such as damages for various types of tortious conduct (discussed in Chapters 6 and 7); damages for breach of contract (to be discussed in Chapter 18); and the equitable remedies discussed in Chapters 1 and 18. Additional sanctions are imposed under criminal law. Indeed, many statutes regulating business provide for criminal as well as civil penalties. Therefore, criminal law joins civil law as an important element in the legal environment of business.

In this chapter, after explaining some essential differences between criminal law and civil law, we look at how crimes are classified and at the elements that must be present for criminal liability to exist. We then examine the various categories of crimes, the defenses that can be raised to avoid criminal liability, and the rules of criminal procedure. We conclude the chapter with a discussion of crimes that occur in cyberspace, which are often referred to as cyber crime.

Generally, cyber crime refers more to the way in which particular crimes are committed than to a new category of crimes.

Civil Law and Criminal Law

Recall from Chapter 1 that civil law pertains to the duties that exist between persons or between persons and their governments. Criminal law, in contrast, has to do with crime. A crime can be defined as a wrong against society proclaimed in a statute and punishable by a fine and/or imprisonment—or, in some cases, death. As mentioned in Chapter 1, because crimes are offenses against society as a whole, they are prosecuted by a public official, such as a district attorney (D.A.) or an attorney general (A.G.), not by the victims. Once a crime has been reported, the D.A. typically has the discretion to decide whether to file criminal charges and also determines to what extent to pursue the prosecution or carry out additional investigation.

Major Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law

Because the state has extensive resources at its disposal when prosecuting criminal cases, there are numerous procedural safeguards to protect the rights of defendants. We look here at one of these safeguards—the higher burden of proof that applies in a criminal case—as well as the harsher sanctions for criminal acts compared with civil wrongs. Exhibit 9–1 summarizes these and other key differences between civil law and criminal law.

Burden of Proof In a civil case, the plaintiff usually must prove his or her case by a preponderance of the evidence. Under this standard, the plaintiff must convince the court that based on the evidence presented by both parties, it is more likely than not that the plaintiff's allegation is true.

In a criminal case, in contrast, the state must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury views the evidence in the case as reasonably permitting either a guilty or a not guilty verdict, then the jury's verdict must be not guilty. In other words, the government (prosecutor) must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant has committed every essential element of the offense with which she or he is charged. If the jurors are not convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, they must find the defendant not guilty. Note also that in a criminal

EXHIBIT 9-1 • Key Differences between Civil Law and Criminal Law

Issue	Civil Law	Criminal Law
Party who brings suit	Person who suffered harm	The state
Wrongful act	Causing harm to a person or to a person's property	Violating a statute that prohibits some type of activity
Burden of proof	Preponderance of the evidence	Beyond a reasonable doubt
Verdict	Three-fourths majority (typically)	Unanimous
Remedy	Damages to compensate for the harm or a decree to achieve an equitable result	Punishment (fine, imprisonment, or death)

case, the jury's verdict normally must be unanimous—agreed to by all members of the jury—to convict the defendant. (In a civil trial by jury, in contrast, typically only three-fourths of the jurors need to agree.)

Criminal Sanctions The sanctions imposed on criminal wrongdoers are also harsher than those that are applied in civil cases. Remember from Chapters 6 and 7 that the purpose of tort law is to enable a person harmed by the wrongful act of another to obtain compensation from the wrongdoer, rather than to punish the wrongdoer. In contrast, criminal sanctions are designed to punish those who commit crimes and to deter others from committing similar acts in the future. Criminal sanctions include fines as well as the much harsher penalty of the loss of one's liberty by incarceration in a jail or prison. Most criminal sanctions also involve probation and sometimes require performance of community service, completion of an educational or treatment program, or payment of restitution. The harshest criminal sanction is, of course, the death penalty.

Civil Liability for Criminal Acts

Some torts, such as assault and battery, provide a basis for a criminal prosecution as well as a civil action in tort. For example, suppose that Jonas is walking down the street, minding his own business, when a person attacks him. In the ensuing struggle, the attacker stabs Jonas several times, seriously injuring him. A police officer restrains and arrests the wrongdoer. In this situation, the attacker may be subject both to criminal prosecution by the state and to a tort lawsuit brought by Jonas to obtain compensation for his injuries. Exhibit 9-2 on the next page illustrates how the same wrongful act can result in both a civil (tort) action and a criminal action against the wrongdoer.

Classification of Crimes

Depending on their degree of seriousness, crimes are classified as felonies or misdemeanors.

Felonies

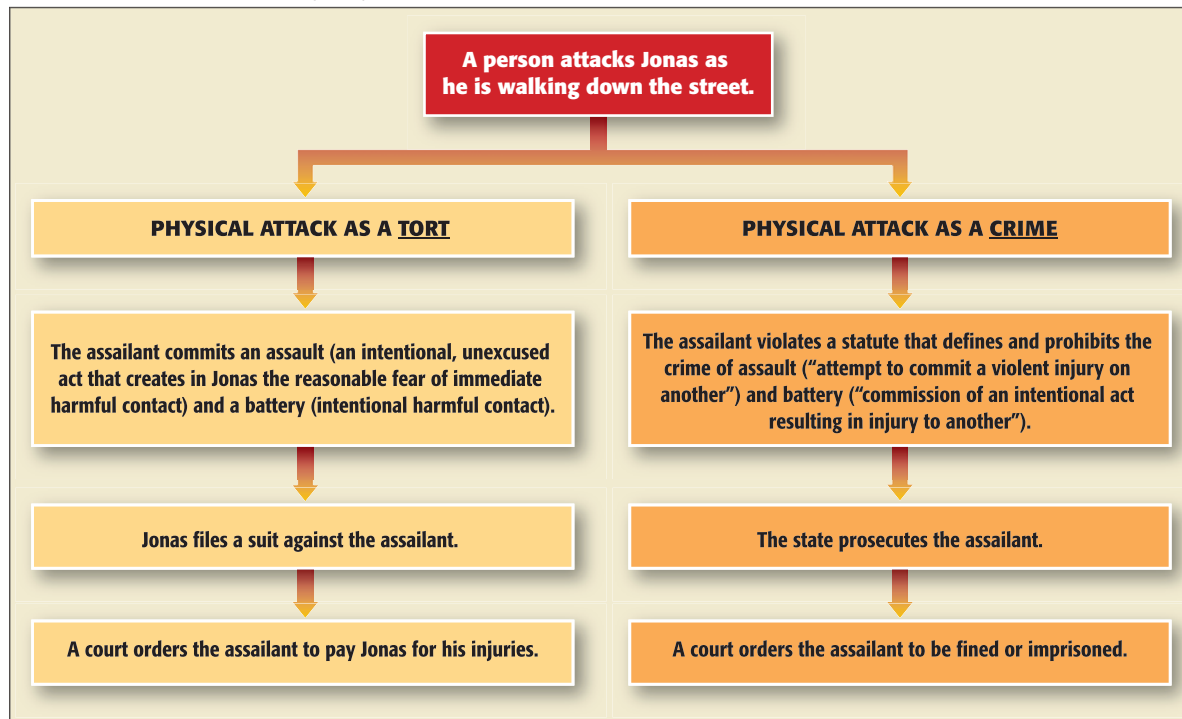

Felonies are serious crimes punishable by death or by imprisonment in a federal or state penitentiary for one year or longer.¹ The Model Penal Code² provides for four degrees of felony:

1. Capital offenses, for which the maximum penalty is death.
2. First degree felonies, punishable by a maximum penalty of life imprisonment.
3. Second degree felonies, punishable by a maximum of ten years' imprisonment.
4. Third degree felonies, punishable by up to five years' imprisonment.

Although criminal laws vary from state to state, some general rules apply when grading crimes by

1. Some states, such as North Carolina, consider felonies to be punishable by incarceration for at least two years.
2. The American Law Institute issued the Official Draft of the Model Penal Code in 1962. The Model Penal Code contains four parts: (1) general provisions, (2) definitions of special crimes, (3) provisions concerning treatment and corrections, and (4) provisions on the organization of corrections. The Model Penal Code is not a uniform code, however. Because of our federal structure of government, each state has developed its own set of laws governing criminal acts. Thus, types of crimes and prescribed punishments may differ from one jurisdiction to another.

EXHIBIT 9-2 • Civil (Tort) Lawsuit and Criminal Prosecution for the Same Act degree. For example, most jurisdictions punish a burglary that involves a forced entry into a home at night more harshly than a burglary that takes place during the day and involves a nonresidential building or structure. A homicide—the taking of another’s life—is classified according to the degree of intent involved.

For example, first degree murder requires that the homicide be premeditated and deliberate, as opposed to a spontaneous act of violence. When no premeditation or deliberation is present but the offender acts with malice aforethought (that is, with wanton disregard for the consequences of his or her actions for the victim), the homicide is classified as second degree murder. A homicide that is committed without malice toward the victim is known as manslaughter. Voluntary manslaughter occurs when the intent to kill may be present, as in a crime committed in the heat of passion, but malice is lacking. A homicide is classified as involuntary manslaughter when it results from an act of negligence (such as when a drunk driver causes the death of another person) and there is no intent to kill.

Misdemeanors and Petty Offenses

Under federal law as well as under the law of most states, any crime that is not a felony is considered a misdemeanor. Misdemeanors are less serious crimes punishable by a fine or by incarceration for up to one year. Disorderly conduct and trespass are common misdemeanors. In most jurisdictions, petty offenses are considered to be a subset of misdemeanors. Petty offenses are minor violations, such as disturbing the peace and violations of building codes. Even for petty offenses, however, a guilty party can be put in jail for a few days, fined, or both, depending on state law.

Whether a crime is a felony or a misdemeanor can determine in which court the case is tried and, in some states, whether the defendant has a right to a jury trial. Many states have several classes of misdemeanors. For example, in Illinois, misdemeanors are either Class A (confinement for up to a year), Class B (not more than six months), or Class C (not more than thirty days).

Criminal Liability

Two elements must exist for a person to be convicted of a crime: (1) the performance of a prohibited act and (2) a specified state of mind, or intent, on the part of the actor. Additionally, to establish criminal liability, there must be a concurrence between the act and the intent. In other words, these two elements must occur together.

For example, suppose that a woman intends to kill her husband by poisoning him. On the day she plans to do so, she is driving her husband home from work and swerves to avoid hitting a cat crossing the road. As a result, the car crashes into a tree, killing her husband. Even though she had planned to murder her husband, the woman would not be guilty of murder in this situation because the two elements did not occur together. The woman had not intended to kill her husband by driving the car into a tree.

The Criminal Act

Every criminal statute prohibits certain behavior. Most crimes require an act of commission—that is, a person must do something in order to be accused of a crime. In criminal law, a prohibited act is referred to as the actus reus,³ or guilty act. In some instances, an act of omission can be a crime, but only when a person has a legal duty to perform the omitted act, such as filing a tax return. For example, in 2005 the federal government criminally prosecuted a former winner of the reality TV show Survivor for failing to report more than $1 million in winnings.

The guilty act requirement is based on one of the premises of criminal law—that a person should be punished for harm done to society. For a crime to exist, the guilty act must cause some harm to a person or to property. Thinking about killing someone or about stealing a car may be morally wrong, but the thoughts do no harm until they are translated into action. Of course, a person can be punished for attempting murder or robbery, but normally only if substantial steps toward the criminal objective have been taken.

State of Mind

A wrongful mental state (mens rea)⁴ is also typically required to establish criminal liability. The required mental state, or intent, is indicated in the applicable statute or law. Murder, for example, involves the guilty act of killing another human being, and the guilty mental state is the desire, or intent, to take another's life. For theft, the guilty act is the taking of another person's property, and the mental state involves both the awareness that the property belongs to another and the desire to deprive the owner of it.

A guilty mental state can be attributed to acts of negligence or recklessness as well. Criminal negligence involves the mental state in which the defendant deviates from the standard of care that a reasonable person would use under the same circumstances. The defendant is accused of taking an unjustified, substantial, and foreseeable risk that resulted in harm. Under the Model Penal Code, a defendant is negligent even if she or he was not actually aware of the risk but should have been aware of it.⁵ A defendant is criminally reckless if he or she consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk.

Corporate Criminal Liability

As will be discussed in Chapter 38, a corporation is a legal entity created under the laws of a state. At one time, it was thought that a corporation could not incur criminal liability because, although a corporation is a legal person, it can act only through its agents (corporate directors, officers, and employees). Therefore, the corporate entity itself could not “intend” to commit a crime. Over time, this view has changed. Obviously, corporations cannot be imprisoned, but they can be fined or denied certain legal privileges (such as a license).

Liability of the Corporate Entity Today, corporations are normally liable for the crimes committed by their agents and employees within the course and scope of their employment.⁶ For such criminal liability to be imposed, the prosecutor normally must show that the corporation could have prevented the act or that there was authorized consent to, or knowledge of, the act by persons in supervisory positions within the corporation. In addition, corporations can be criminally liable for failing to perform specific duties imposed by law (such as duties under environmental laws or securities laws).

Liability of Corporate Officers and Directors Corporate directors and officers are personally liable for the crimes they commit, regardless of whether the crimes were committed for their private benefit or on the corporation's behalf. Additionally, corporate directors and officers may be held liable for the actions of employees under their supervision. Under the responsible corporate officer doctrine, a court may impose criminal liability on a corporate officer regardless of whether he or she participated in, directed, or even knew about a given criminal violation.

3. Pronounced ak-tuhs ray-uhs.

4. Pronounced mehns ray-uh.

5. Model Penal Code Section 2.02(2)(d).

6. See Model Penal Code Section 2.07.

Types of Crimes

Numerous actions are designated as criminal. Federal, state, and local laws provide for the classification and punishment of hundreds of thousands of different criminal acts. Generally, though, criminal acts can be grouped into five broad categories: violent crime (crimes against persons), property crime, public order crime, white-collar crime, and organized crime. Cyber crime—which consists of crimes committed in cyberspace with the use of computers—is, as mentioned earlier in this chapter, less a category of crime than a new way to commit crime. We will examine cyber crime later in this chapter.

Violent Crime

Certain crimes are called violent crimes, or crimes against persons, because they cause others to suffer harm or death. Murder is a violent crime. So is sexual assault, or rape. Assault and battery, which were discussed in Chapter 6 in the context of tort law, are also classified as violent crimes. Robbery—defined as the taking of money, personal property, or any other article of value from a person by means of force or fear—is also a violent crime. Typically, states have more severe penalties for aggravated robbery—robbery with the use of a deadly weapon.

Each of these violent crimes is further classified by degree, depending on the circumstances surrounding the criminal act. These circumstances include the intent of the person committing the crime, whether a weapon was used, and (for crimes other than murder) the level of pain and suffering experienced by the victim.

Property Crime

The most common type of criminal activity is property crime, or those crimes in which the goal of the offender is some form of economic gain or the damaging of property. Robbery is a form of property crime, as well as a violent crime, because the offender seeks to gain the property of another. We look here at a number of other crimes that fall within the general category of property crime.

Burglary Traditionally, burglary was defined as breaking and entering the dwelling of another at night with the intent to commit a felony. Originally, the definition was aimed at protecting an individual's home and its occupants. Most state statutes have eliminated some of the requirements found in the common law definition. The time of day at which the breaking and entering occurs, for example, is usually immaterial. State statutes frequently omit the element of breaking, and some states do not require that the building be a dwelling. When a deadly weapon is used in a burglary, the perpetrator can be charged with aggravated burglary and punished more severely.

Larceny Under the common law, the crime of larceny involved the unlawful taking and carrying away of someone else's personal property with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of possession. Put simply, larceny is stealing or theft. Whereas robbery involves force or fear, larceny does not. Therefore, picking pockets is larceny, not robbery. Similarly, taking company products and supplies home for personal use, if one is not authorized to do so, is larceny. (Note that a person who commits larceny generally can also be sued under tort law because the act of taking possession of another's property involves a trespass to personal property.)

Most states have expanded the definition of property that is subject to larceny statutes. Stealing computer programs may constitute larceny even though the "property" consists of magnetic impulses. Stealing computer time may also be considered larceny. So, too, may the theft of natural gas or Internet and television cable service. Trade secrets can be subject to larceny statutes.

The common law distinguishes between grand and petit larceny depending on the value of the property taken. Many states have abolished this distinction, but in those that have not, grand larceny (or theft of an item worth above a certain amount) is a felony and petit larceny is a misdemeanor.

Arson The willful and malicious burning of a building (and, in some states, personal property) owned by another is the crime of arson. At common law, arson applied only to burning down another person's house. The law was designed to protect human life. Today, arson statutes have been extended to cover the destruction of any building, regardless of ownership, by fire or explosion.

Every state has a special statute that covers the act of burning a building for the purpose of collecting insurance. If Shaw owns an insured apartment building that is falling apart and sets fire to it himself or pays someone else to do so, he is guilty not only of arson but also of defrauding the insurer, which is an attempted larceny. Of course, the insurer need not pay the claim when insurance fraud is proved.

Receiving Stolen Goods It is a crime to receive stolen goods. The recipient of such goods need not know the true identity of the owner or the thief. All that is necessary is that the recipient knows or should know that the goods are stolen, which implies an intent to deprive the owner of those goods.

Forgery The fraudulent making or altering of any writing (including electronic records) in a way that changes the legal rights and liabilities of another is forgery. If, without authorization, Severson signs Bennett's name to the back of a check made out to Bennett, Severson is committing forgery. Forgery also includes changing trademarks, falsifying public records, counterfeiting, and altering a legal document.

Obtaining Goods by False Pretenses It is a criminal act to obtain goods by false pretenses, such as buying groceries with a check knowing that one has insufficient funds to cover it. Using another's credit-card number to obtain goods is another example of obtaining goods by false pretenses. Statutes dealing with such illegal activities vary widely from state to state.

Public Order Crime

Historically, societies have always outlawed activities that are considered contrary to public values and morals. Today, the most common public order crimes include public drunkenness, prostitution, gambling, and illegal drug use. These crimes are sometimes referred to as victimless crimes because they normally harm only the offender. From a broader perspective, however, they are deemed detrimental to society as a whole because they may create an environment that gives rise to property and violent crimes.

White-Collar Crime

Crimes occurring in the business context are popularly referred to as white-collar crimes. Although there is no official definition of white-collar crime, the term is commonly used to mean an illegal act or series of acts committed by an individual or business entity using some nonviolent means to obtain a personal or business advantage. Usually, this kind of crime takes place in the course of a legitimate business occupation. Corporate crimes fall into this category. Certain property crimes, such as larceny and forgery, may also be white-collar crimes if they occur within the business context. The crimes discussed next normally occur only in the business environment.

Embezzlement When a person entrusted with another person's property or funds fraudulently appropriates that property or those funds, embezzlement occurs. Typically, embezzlement is carried out by an employee who steals funds. Banks are particularly prone to this problem, but embezzlement can occur in any firm. In a number of businesses, corporate officers or accountants have fraudulently converted funds for their own benefit and then "jimmied" the books to cover up their crime. Embezzlement is not larceny because the wrongdoer does not physically take the property from the possession of another, and it is not robbery because no force or fear is used.

It does not matter whether the accused takes the funds from the victim or from a third person. If the financial officer of a large corporation pockets a certain number of checks from third parties that were given to her to deposit into the corporate account, she is embezzling. Frequently, an embezzler takes a relatively small amount at one time but does so repeatedly over a long period. This might be done by underreporting income or deposits and embezzling the remaining amount, for example, or by creating fictitious persons or accounts and writing checks to them from the corporate account.

Practically speaking, an embezzler who returns what has been taken may not be prosecuted because the owner is unwilling to take the time to make a complaint, cooperate with the state's investigative efforts, and appear in court. Also, the owner may not want the crime to become public knowledge. Nevertheless, the intent to return the embezzled property is not a defense to the crime of embezzlement.

Mail and Wire Fraud One of the most potent weapons against white-collar criminals is the Mail Fraud Act of 1990.⁷ Under this act, it is a federal crime to use the mails to defraud the public. Illegal use of the mails must involve (1) mailing or causing someone else to mail a writing—something written, printed, or photocopied—for the purpose of executing a scheme to defraud and (2) contemplating or organizing a scheme to defraud by false pretenses. If, for example, Johnson advertises by mail the sale of a cure for cancer that he knows to be fraudulent because it has no medical validity, he can be prosecuted for fraudulent use of the mails.

7. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1341–1342.

Federal law also makes it a crime (wire fraud) to use wire, radio, or television transmissions to defraud.⁸

8. 18 U.S.C. Section 1343.

Violators may be fined up to $1,000, imprisoned for up to twenty years, or both. If the violation affects a financial institution, the violator may be fined up to $1 million, imprisoned for up to thirty years, or both.

The following case involved charges of mail fraud stemming from the use of telemarketing to solicit funds that were misrepresented as going to support charities. The question for the court was whether the prosecution could offer proof of the telemarketers' commission rate when no one had lied about it.

CASE 9.1 United States v. Lyons

United States Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, 2007. 472 F.3d 1055.

● Background and Facts In 1994, in California, Gabriel Sanchez formed the First Church of Life (FCL), which had no congregation, services, or place of worship. Timothy Lyons, Sanchez's friend, formed a fund-raising company called North American Acquisitions (NAA). Through FCL, Sanchez and Lyons set up six charities—AIDS Research Association, Children's Assistance Foundation, Cops and Sheriffs of America, Handicapped Youth Services, U.S. Firefighters, and U.S. Veterans League. NAA hired telemarketers to solicit donations on the charities' behalf. Over time, more than $6 million was raised, of which less than $5,000 was actually spent on charitable causes. The telemarketers kept 80 percent of the donated funds as commissions, and NAA took 10 percent. Most of the rest of the funds went to Sanchez, who spent it on himself. In 2002, Lyons and Sanchez were charged in a federal district court with mail fraud and other crimes. Throughout the trial, the prosecution referred to the high commissions paid to the telemarketers. The defendants were convicted, and each was sentenced to fifteen years in prison. They asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit to overturn their convictions, asserting that the prosecution had used the high cost of fund-raising as evidence of fraud even though the defendants had not lied about the cost.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

McKEOWN, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Rare is the person who relishes getting calls from those great patrons of the telephone, telemarketers. Yet many charities, especially small, obscure or unpopular ones, could not fund their operations without telemarketers. Some professional telemarketers take the lion's share of solicited donations, sometimes requiring and receiving commission rates of up to 85%. Most donors would probably be shocked or surprised to learn that most of their contributions were going to for-profit telemarketers instead of charitable activities. *But * * * under the First Amendment, the bare failure to disclose these high costs to donors cannot, by itself, support a fraud conviction. Evidence of high fundraising costs may, nonetheless, support a fraud prosecution when nondisclosure is accompanied by intentionally misleading statements designed to deceive the listener.* [Emphasis added.]

* * * Timothy Lyons and Gabriel Sanchez challenge their convictions for mail fraud and money laundering on the basis that they never lied, and never asked the telemarketers in their employ to lie, about the fact that around 80% of donations to their charities were earmarked for telemarketing commissions.

Lyons and Sanchez did, however, misrepresent to donors how they spent contributions net of telemarketer commissions. Their undoing was not that the commissions were large but that their charitable web was a scam. Donors were told their contributions went to specific charitable activities when, in reality, almost no money did. * * *

CHAPTER 9 Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

CASE 9.1 CONTINUED

* * * *
 * * * [A] rule in criminal prosecutions for fraud involving telemarketing [is that] the bare failure to disclose the high cost of fundraising directly to potential donors does not suffice to establish fraud. That is, the mere fact that a telemarketer keeps 85% of contributions it solicits cannot be the basis of a fraud conviction, and neither can the fact that a telemarketer fails to volunteer this information to would-be donors. * * *

* * * [But] when nondisclosure is accompanied by intentionally misleading statements designed to deceive the listener, the high cost of fundraising may be introduced as evidence of fraud in a criminal case. * * * [T]he State may vigorously enforce its antifraud laws to prohibit professional fundraisers from obtaining money on false pretenses or by making false statements. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Lyons and Sanchez urge that unless the government could show that they lied to donors about how much the telemarketers would receive, the government was barred from introducing evidence of the high commissions paid to telemarketers.

* * * *
 * * * [T]he government both alleged in its indictment and offered evidence at trial of specific misrepresentations and omissions [that Lyons and Sanchez] made regarding the use of donated funds. Specifically, the government's evidence underscored the fact that virtually none of the money that ended up in the bank accounts of the six FCL charities went to any charitable activities at all, let alone the specific charitable activities mentioned in the telemarketers' calls or promotional pamphlets. * * *

* * * [A] dmission of evidence regarding the fundraising costs was essential to understanding the overall scheme and the shell game of the multiple charities. The government did not violate Lyons' or Sanchez's * * * rights by introducing evidence that third-party telemarketers received 80% of funds donated to the various FCL charities because the government had also shown that Lyons and Sanchez, through their respective organizations, had made fraudulent misrepresentations regarding disposition of the charitable funds.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit upheld the convictions. Evidence of the commissions paid to the telemarketers could be introduced even though no one lied to the would-be donors about the commissions. The defendants' "undoing was not that the commissions were large but that their charitable web was a scam."

● The Ethical Dimension It may have been legal in this case, but was it ethical for the prosecution to repeatedly emphasize the size of the telemarketers' commissions? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension In what circumstance would the prosecution be prevented from introducing evidence of high fund-raising costs? Why?

Bribery The crime of bribery involves offering to give something of value to a person in an attempt to influence that person, who is usually, but not always, a public official, to act in a way that serves a private interest. Three types of bribery are considered crimes: bribery of public officials, commercial bribery, and bribery of foreign officials. As an element of the crime of bribery, intent must be present and proved. The bribe itself can be anything the recipient considers to be valuable. Realize that the crime of bribery occurs when the bribe is offered—it is not required that the bribe be accepted. Accepting a bribe is a separate crime.

Commercial bribery involves corrupt dealings between private persons or businesses. Typically, people make commercial bribes to obtain proprietary information, cover up an inferior product, or secure new business. Industrial espionage sometimes involves commercial bribes. For example, a person in one firm may offer an employee in a competing firm some type of payoff in exchange for trade secrets or pricing schedules. So-called kickbacks, or payoffs for special favors or services, are a form of commercial bribery in some situations.

Bribing foreign officials to obtain favorable business contracts is a crime. This crime was discussed in detail in Chapter 5, along with the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act of 1977, which was passed to curb the use of bribery by U.S. businesspersons in securing foreign contracts.

Bankruptcy Fraud Federal bankruptcy law (see Chapter 30) allows individuals and businesses to be relieved of oppressive debt through bankruptcy proceedings. Numerous white-collar crimes may be committed during the many phases of a bankruptcy action. A creditor, for example, may file a false claim against the debtor, which is a crime. Also, a debtor may fraudulently transfer assets to favored parties before or after the petition for bankruptcy is filed. For instance, a company-owned automobile may be “sold” at a bargain price to a trusted friend or relative. Closely related to the crime of fraudulent transfer of property is the crime of fraudulent concealment of property, such as the hiding of gold coins.

Insider Trading An individual who obtains “inside information” about the plans of a publicly listed corporation can often make stock-trading profits by purchasing or selling corporate securities based on this information. Insider trading is a violation of securities law and will be considered more fully in Chapter 41. Basically, securities law prohibits a person who possesses inside information and has a duty not to disclose it to outsiders from trading on that information. He or she may not profit from the purchase or sale of securities based on inside information until the information is made available to the public.

The Theft of Trade Secrets As discussed in Chapter 8, trade secrets constitute a form of intellectual property that for many businesses can be extremely valuable. The Economic Espionage Act of 1996⁹ makes the theft of trade secrets a federal crime. The act also makes it a federal crime to buy or possess another person’s trade secrets, knowing that the trade secrets were stolen or otherwise acquired without the owner’s authorization.

Violations of the act can result in steep penalties. The act provides that an individual who violates the act can be imprisoned for up to ten years and fined up to $500,000. If a corporation or other organization violates the act, it can be fined up to $5 million. Additionally, the law provides that any property acquired as a result of the violation, such as airplanes and automobiles, and any property used in the commission of the violation, such as computers and other electronic devices, is subject to criminal forfeiture—meaning that the government can take the property. A theft of trade secrets conducted via the Internet, for example, could result in the forfeiture of every computer or other device used to commit or facilitate the violation as well as any assets gained.

Organized Crime

White-collar crime takes place within the confines of the legitimate business world. Organized crime, in contrast, operates illegitimately by, among other things, providing illegal goods and services. Traditionally, the preferred markets for organized crime have been gambling, prostitution, illegal narcotics, and loan sharking (lending funds at higher-than-legal interest rates), along with more recent ventures into counterfeiting and credit-card scams.

Money Laundering The profits from organized crime and illegal activities amount to billions of dollars a year, particularly the profits from illegal drug transactions and, to a lesser extent, from racketeering, prostitution, and gambling. Under federal law, banks, savings and loan associations, and other financial institutions are required to report currency transactions involving more than $10,000. Consequently, those who engage in illegal activities face difficulties in depositing their cash profits from illegal transactions.

As an alternative to storing cash from illegal transactions in a safe-deposit box, wrongdoers and racketeers have invented ways to launder “dirty” money to make it “clean.” This money laundering is done through legitimate businesses. For example, suppose that Harris, a successful drug dealer, becomes a partner with a restaurateur. Little by little, the restaurant shows increasing profits. As a partner in the restaurant, Harris is able to report the “profits” of the restaurant as legitimate income on which he pays federal and state taxes. He can then spend those funds without worrying that his lifestyle may exceed the level possible with his reported income.

RICO In 1970, in an effort to curb the entry of organized crime into the legitimate business world, Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) as part of the Organized Crime Control Act.¹⁰ The statute makes it a federal crime to (1) use income obtained from racketeering activity to purchase any interest in an enterprise, (2) acquire or maintain an interest in an enterprise through racketeering activity, (3) conduct or participate in the affairs of an enterprise through racketeering activity, or (4) conspire to do any of the preceding activities.

9. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1831–1839.

10. 18 U.S.C. Sections 1961–1968.

The broad language of RICO has allowed it to be applied in cases that have little or nothing to do with organized crime. In fact, today the statute is used to attack white-collar crimes more often than organized crime. In addition, RICO creates civil as well as criminal liability.

Criminal Provisions RICO incorporates by reference twenty-six separate types of federal crimes and nine types of state felonies—including many business-related crimes, such as bribery, embezzlement, forgery, mail and wire fraud, and securities fraud.¹¹ For purposes of RICO, a “pattern of racketeering activity” requires a person to commit at least two of these offenses. Any individual who is found guilty is subject to a fine of up to $25,000 per violation, imprisonment for up to twenty years, or both. Additionally, the statute provides that those who violate RICO may be required to forfeit (give up) any assets, in the form of property or cash, that were acquired as a result of the illegal activity or that were “involved in” or an “instrumentality of” the activity.

Civil Liability In the event of a RICO violation, the government can seek civil penalties, including the divestiture of a defendant’s interest in a business (called forfeiture) or the dissolution of the business. Moreover, in some cases, the statute allows private individuals to sue violators and potentially recover three times their actual losses (treble damages), plus attorneys’ fees, for business injuries caused by a violation of the statute. This is perhaps the most controversial aspect of RICO and one that continues to cause debate in the nation’s federal courts.

The prospect of receiving treble damages in civil RICO lawsuits has given plaintiffs financial incentive to pursue businesses and employers for violations. For example, Mohawk Industries, Inc., one of the largest carpeting manufacturers in the United States, was sued by a group of its employees for RICO violations. The employees claimed Mohawk conspired with recruiting agencies to hire and harbor illegal immigrants in an effort to keep labor costs low. The employees argued that Mohawk’s pattern of illegal hiring expanded Mohawk’s hourly workforce and resulted in lower wages for the plaintiffs. Mohawk filed a motion to dismiss, arguing that its conduct had not violated RICO. In 2006, however, a federal appellate court ruled that the plaintiffs had presented sufficient evidence of racketeering activity and remanded the case for a trial.¹² (See Concept Summary 9.1 on page 194 for a review of the different types of crimes.)

Defenses to Criminal Liability

In certain circumstances, the law may allow a person to be excused from criminal liability because she or he lacks the required mental state. Criminal defendants may also be relieved of criminal liability if they can show that their criminal actions were justified, given the circumstances. Among the most important defenses to criminal liability are infancy, intoxication, insanity, mistake, consent, duress, justifiable use of force, necessity, entrapment, and the statute of limitations. Additionally, in some cases defendants are given immunity from prosecution and thus are relieved, at least in part, of criminal liability for their actions. We look next at each of these defenses.

Note that procedural violations (such as obtaining evidence without a valid search warrant) may also operate as defenses. Evidence obtained in violation of a defendant’s constitutional rights may not be admitted in court. If the evidence is suppressed, then there may be no basis for prosecuting the defendant.

Infancy

The term infant, as used in the law, refers to any person who has not yet reached the age of majority (see Chapter 13). At common law, children under the age of seven could not commit a crime, and it was presumed that children between the ages of seven and fourteen were incapable of committing crimes because of their

11. See 18 U.S.C. Section 1961(1)(A). The crimes listed in this section include murder, kidnapping, gambling, arson, robbery, bribery, extortion, money laundering, securities fraud, counterfeiting, dealing in obscene matter, dealing in controlled substances (illegal drugs), and a number of others.

12. Williams v. Mohawk Industries, Inc., 465 F.3d 1277 (11th Cir. 2006); cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 127 S.Ct. 1381, 167 L.Ed.2d 174 (2007). For another example, see Trollinger v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 2007 WL 1574275 (E.D.Tenn. 2007).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 9.1

Types of Crimes

Crime Category	Definition and Examples
VIOLENT CRIME	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Definition—Crime that causes others to suffer harm or death. 2. Examples—Murder, assault and battery, sexual assault (rape), and robbery.
PROPERTY CRIME	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Definition—Crime in which the goal of the offender is some form of economic gain or the damaging of property; the most common form of crime. 2. Examples—Burglary, larceny, arson, receiving stolen goods, forgery, and obtaining goods by false pretenses.
PUBLIC ORDER CRIME	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Definition—Crime that is contrary to public values and morals. 2. Examples—Public drunkenness, prostitution, gambling, and illegal drug use.
WHITE-COLLAR CRIME	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Definition—An illegal act or series of acts committed by an individual or business entity using some nonviolent means to obtain a personal or business advantage; usually committed in the course of a legitimate occupation. 2. Examples—Embezzlement, mail and wire fraud, bribery, bankruptcy fraud, insider trading, and the theft of trade secrets.
ORGANIZED CRIME	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Definition—A form of crime conducted by groups operating illegitimately to satisfy the public's demand for illegal goods and services (such as gambling and illegal narcotics). 2. Money laundering—The establishment of legitimate enterprises through which “dirty” money (obtained through criminal activities, such as illegal drug trafficking) can be “laundered” (made to appear to be legitimate income). 3. RICO—The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) of 1970 makes it a federal crime to (a) use income obtained from racketeering activity to purchase any interest in an enterprise, (b) acquire or maintain an interest in an enterprise through racketeering activity, (c) conduct or participate in the affairs of an enterprise through racketeering activity, or (d) conspire to do any of the preceding activities. RICO provides for both civil and criminal liability.

incapacity to appreciate right and wrong. Today, most state courts no longer presume that children are incapable of criminal conduct, but may evaluate the particular child's state of mind. In all states, certain courts handle cases involving children who allegedly have violated the law. Courts that handle juvenile cases may also have jurisdiction over additional matters. In most states, a child may be treated as an adult and tried in a regular court if she or he is above a certain age (usually fourteen) and is charged with a felony, such as rape or murder.

Intoxication

The law recognizes two types of intoxication, whether from drugs or from alcohol: involuntary and voluntary. Involuntary intoxication occurs when a person either is physically forced to ingest or inject an intoxicating substance or is unaware that such a substance contains drugs or alcohol. Involuntary intoxication is a defense to a crime if its effect was to make a person incapable of understanding that the act committed was wrong or incapable of obeying the law. Voluntary intoxication is rarely a defense, but it may be effective in cases in which the defendant was so extremely intoxicated as to negate the state of mind that a crime requires.

Insanity

Just as a child may be incapable of the state of mind required to commit a crime, so also may a person who suffers from a mental illness. Thus, insanity may be a defense to a criminal charge. The courts have had difdifficulty deciding what the test for legal insanity should be, however, and psychiatrists as well as lawyers are critical of the tests used. Almost all federal courts and some states use the relatively liberal standard set forth in the Model Penal Code:

A person is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of such conduct as a result of mental disease or defect he or she lacks substantial capacity either to appreciate the wrongfulness of his [or her] conduct or to conform his [or her] conduct to the requirements of the law.

Some states use the M'Naghten test,¹³ under which a criminal defendant is not responsible if, at the time of the offense, he or she did not know the nature and quality of the act or did not know that the act was wrong. Other states use the irresistible-impulse test. A person operating under an irresistible impulse may know an act is wrong but cannot refrain from doing it. Under any of these tests, proving insanity is extremely difficult. For this reason, the insanity defense is rarely used and usually is not successful.

Mistake

Everyone has heard the saying “Ignorance of the law is no excuse.” Ordinarily, ignorance of the law or a mistaken idea about what the law requires is not a valid defense. In some states, however, that rule has been modified. People who claim that they honestly did not know that they were breaking a law may have a valid defense if (1) the law was not published or reasonably made known to the public or (2) the people relied on an official statement of the law that was erroneous.

A mistake of fact, as opposed to a mistake of law, operates as a defense if it negates the mental state necessary to commit a crime. If, for example, Oliver Wheaton mistakenly walks off with Julie Tyson’s briefcase because he thinks it is his, there is no theft. Theft requires knowledge that the property belongs to another. (If Wheaton’s act causes Tyson to incur damages, however, Wheaton may be subject to liability for trespass to personal property or conversion, torts that were discussed in Chapter 6.)

Consent

What if a victim consents to a crime or even encourages the person intending a criminal act to commit it? Consent is not a defense to most crimes. The law forbids murder, prostitution, and drug use whether the victim consents or not. Consent may serve as a defense, however, in certain situations when it negates an element of the alleged criminal offense. Because crimes against property, such as burglary and larceny, usually require that the defendant intended to take someone else’s property, the fact that the owner gave the defendant permission to take it will operate as a defense. Consent or forgiveness given after a crime has been committed is never a defense, although it can affect the likelihood of prosecution.

Duress

Duress exists when the wrongful threat of one person induces another person to perform an act that he or she would not otherwise have performed. In such a situation, duress is said to negate the mental state necessary to commit a crime because the defendant was forced or compelled to commit the act. Duress can be used as a defense to most crimes except murder.

Duress excuses a crime only when another’s unlawful threat of serious bodily injury or death reasonably causes the defendant to do a criminal act. In addition, there must have been no opportunity for the defendant to escape or avoid the threatened danger.¹⁴ Essentially, to successfully assert duress as a defense, the defendant must reasonably believe in the immediate danger, and the jury (or judge) must conclude that the defendant’s belief was reasonable.

Justifiable Use of Force

Probably the best-known defense to criminal liability is self-defense. Other situations, however, also justify the use of force: the defense of one’s dwelling, the defense of other property, and the prevention of a crime. In all of these situations, it is important to distinguish between deadly and nondeadly force. Deadly force is likely to result in death or serious bodily harm. Nondeadly force is force that reasonably appears necessary to prevent the imminent use of criminal force.

Generally speaking, people can use the amount of nondeadly force that seems necessary to protect themselves, their dwellings, or other property, or to prevent the commission of a crime. Deadly force can be used in self-defense only when the defender reasonably believes that imminent death or grievous bodily harm will otherwise result and has no other means of escaping or avoiding the situation. Deadly force normally 13. A rule derived from M'Naghten's Case, 8 Eng.Rep. 718 (1843).

14. See, for example, State v. Heinemann, 282 Conn.281, 920 A.2d 278 (2007).

EMERGING TRENDS IN BUSINESS LAW

Stand-Your-Ground Laws

Traditionally, the justifiable use of force, or self-defense, doctrine required prosecutors to distinguish between deadly and nondeadly force. In general, state laws have allowed individuals to use the amount of nondeadly force that is necessary to protect themselves, their dwellings, or other property, or to prevent the commission of a crime.

The Duty-to-Retreat Doctrine

In the past, most states allowed deadly force to be used in self-defense only if the individual reasonably believed that imminent death or bodily harm would otherwise result. Additionally, the attacker had to be using unlawful force, and the defender had to have no other possible response or alternative way out of the life-threatening situation.^a Today, many states, particularly in the Northeast, still have “duty-to-retreat” laws on a. State v. Sandoval, 342 Or. 506, 156 P.3d 60 (2007).

their statute books. Under these laws, when a person’s home is invaded or an assailant approaches, the person is required to retreat unless her or his life is in danger. Juries have sometimes been reluctant to apply the duty-to-retreat doctrine, however. In a famous case in the 1980s, Bernard Goetz shot and injured four young men who asked him for money while he was riding the subway in New York City. The jury found that Goetz had reasonably believed that he was in danger of being physically attacked.^b

Stand-Your-Ground Legislation on the Increase

Whereas the duty-to-retreat doctrine attempts to reduce the likelihood that deadly—or even nondeadly—force will be used in defense of one’s person or home, today several states are taking a very different approach and expanding the occasions when deadly force can be used in self-defense. Because such laws allow or even encourage the defender to stay and use force, they are known as “stand-your-ground” laws.

b. People v. Goetz, 506 N.Y.S.2d 18, 497 N.E.2d 41 (1986). See also People v. Douglas, 29 A.D.3d 47, 809 N.Y.S.2d 36 (2006); and State v. Augustin, 101 Haw. 127, 63 P.3d 1097 (2002).

On October 1, 2005, for example, Florida enacted a statute that allows the use of deadly force to prevent the commission of a “forcible felony,” including not only murder but also such crimes as robbery, carjacking, and sexual battery.^c The law applies to both homes and vehicles. Under this statute, Floridians may use deadly force without having to prove that they feared for their safety. In other words, a Florida resident now has the right to shoot an intruder in his or her home or a would-be carjacker even if there is no physical threat to the owner’s safety. The law prohibits the arrest, detention, or prosecution of

c. Florida Statutes Section 776.012.

can be used to defend a dwelling only if the unlawful entry is violent and the person believes deadly force is necessary to prevent imminent death or great bodily harm. In some jurisdictions, however, deadly force can also be used if the person believes it is necessary to prevent the commission of a felony in the dwelling. Many states are expanding the situations in which the use of deadly force can be justified—see this chapter’s Emerging Trends feature for a discussion of this trend.

Necessity

Sometimes, criminal defendants can be relieved of liability by showing that a criminal act was necessary to prevent an even greater harm. According to the Model Penal Code, the defense of necessity is justifiable if “the harm or evil sought to be avoided by such conduct is greater than that sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense charged.”¹⁵ For example, in 15. Model Penal Code Section 3.02.

one case a convicted felon was threatened by an acquaintance with a gun. The felon grabbed the gun and fled the scene, but subsequently he was arrested under a statute that prohibits convicted felons from possessing firearms. In this situation, the necessity defense succeeded because the defendant’s crime avoided a “greater evil.”¹⁶

Entrapment

Entrapment is a defense designed to prevent police officers or other government agents from enticing persons to commit crimes in order to later prosecute them for criminal acts. In the typical entrapment case, an undercover agent suggests that a crime be committed and somehow pressures or induces an individual to commit it. The agent then arrests the individual for the crime. For entrapment to be considered a defense, both the suggestion and the inducement must take individuals covered by the law and also prohibits civil suits against them.

16. United States v. Paoello, 951 F.2d 537 (3d Cir. 1991).

Since the Florida statute was enacted, Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Washington, and Wyoming have passed or are considering passing similar laws. Utah already had a “stand-your-ground” law.^d Louisiana’s statute, which mimics the Florida statute, was passed after Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans. In Louisiana, there is now a presumption of innocence for anyone who uses deadly force when threatened with violence in his or her home, car, or place of business.

Although the media sometimes describe stand-your-ground laws as “new,” these statutes are actually based on a centuries-old precedent.

d. Utah Code Ann. 76-2-402 and 76-2-407.

The laws are a throwback to the “castle” doctrine, which was derived from English common law in the 1700s, when a person’s home was considered to be his or her castle.^e

IMPLICATIONS FOR THE BUSINESSPERSON

1. States that have enacted stand-your-ground laws often include places of business as well as homes and vehicles. Consequently, businesspersons in those states can be less concerned about the duty-to-retreat doctrine.
2. Presumably, business liability insurance will eventually be less costly in stand-your-ground states.

FOR CRITICAL ANALYSIS

1. Those who oppose stand-your-ground laws argue that they encourage vigilantism and preemptive shootings. Do you agree? Explain.

e. One reference to the castle doctrine can be found in William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, Book 4, Chapter 16.

2. “A person’s home is his or her castle.” Does this traditional saying justify the use of deadly force against an intruder under all circumstances? Why or why not?

RELEVANT WEB SITES

To locate information on the Web concerning the issues discussed in this feature, go to this text’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 9,” and click on “Emerging Trends.”

place. The defense is not intended to prevent law enforcement agents from setting a trap for an unwary criminal; rather, the intent is to prevent them from pushing the individual into it. The crucial issue is whether the person who committed a crime was predisposed to commit the illegal act or did so because the agent induced it.

Statute of Limitations

With some exceptions, such as the crime of murder, statutes of limitations apply to crimes just as they do to civil wrongs. In other words, the state must initiate criminal prosecution within a certain number of years. If a criminal action is brought after the statutory time period has expired, the accused person can raise the statute of limitations as a defense. The running of the time period in a statute of limitations may be tolled—that is, suspended or stopped temporarily—if the defendant is a minor or is not in the jurisdiction. When the defendant reaches the age of majority or returns to the jurisdiction, the statute revives—that is, its time period begins to run or to run again.

Immunity

At times, the state may wish to obtain information from a person accused of a crime. Accused persons are understandably reluctant to give information if it will be used to prosecute them, and they cannot be forced to do so. The privilege against self-incrimination is guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which reads, in part, “nor shall [any person] be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” In cases in which the state wishes to obtain information from a person accused of a crime, the state can grant immunity from prosecution or agree to prosecute for a less serious offense in exchange for the information. Once immunity is given, the person now has an absolute privilege against self-incrimination and therefore can no longer refuse to testify on Fifth Amendment grounds.

Often, a grant of immunity from prosecution for a serious crime is part of the plea bargaining between the defending and prosecuting attorneys. The defendant may be convicted of a lesser offense, while the state uses the defendant's testimony to prosecute accomplices for serious crimes carrying heavy penalties.

Criminal Procedures

Criminal law brings the force of the state, with all of its resources, to bear against the individual. Criminal procedures are designed to protect the constitutional rights of individuals and to prevent the arbitrary use of power on the part of the government.

The U.S. Constitution provides specific safeguards for those accused of crimes. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that most of these safeguards apply not only in federal court but also in state courts by virtue of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. These protections include the following:

1. The Fourth Amendment protection from unreasonable searches and seizures.
2. The Fourth Amendment requirement that no warrant for a search or an arrest be issued without probable cause.
3. The Fifth Amendment requirement that no one be deprived of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law."
4. The Fifth Amendment prohibition against double jeopardy (trying someone twice for the same criminal offense).¹⁷

17. The prohibition against double jeopardy means that once a criminal defendant is found not guilty of a particular crime, the government may not reindict the person and retry him or her for the same crime. The prohibition does not preclude a civil suit's being brought against the same person by the crime victim to recover damages. For example, a person found not guilty of assault and battery in a criminal case may be sued by the victim

5. The Fifth Amendment requirement that no person be required to be a witness against (incriminate) himself or herself.
6. The Sixth Amendment guarantees of a speedy trial, a trial by jury, a public trial, the right to confront witnesses, and the right to a lawyer at various stages in some proceedings.
7. The Eighth Amendment prohibitions against excessive bail and fines and cruel and unusual punishment.

The Exclusionary Rule

Under what is known as the exclusionary rule, all evidence obtained in violation of the constitutional rights spelled out in the Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Amendments generally is not admissible at trial. All evidence derived from the illegally obtained evidence is known as the "fruit of the poisonous tree," and such evidence normally must also be excluded from the trial proceedings. For example, if a confession is obtained after an illegal arrest, the arrest is the "poisonous tree," and the confession, if "tainted" by the arrest, is the "fruit."

As you will read shortly, under the Miranda rule, suspects must be advised of certain constitutional rights when they are arrested. For example, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is one of the rights of which a suspect must be advised when she or he is arrested. In many cases, a statement that a criminal suspect makes in the absence of counsel is not admissible at trial unless the suspect has knowingly and voluntarily waived this right. In the following case, the United States Supreme Court considered at what point a suspect's right to counsel is triggered during criminal proceedings.

in a civil tort case for damages. Additionally, a state's prosecution of a crime will not prevent a separate federal prosecution of the same crime, and vice versa. For example, a defendant found not guilty of violating a state law can be tried in federal court for the same act, if the act is also defined as a crime under federal law.

EXTENDED CASE 9.2 Fellers v. United States

Supreme Court of the United States, 2004. 540 U.S. 519, 124 S.Ct. 1019, 157 L.Ed.2d 1016.

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

* * * *

On February 24, 2000, after a grand jury indicted petitioner [John J. Fellers] for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine, Lincoln Police Sergeant Michael Garnett and Lancaster County Deputy Sheriff Jeff Bliemeister went to petitioner's home in Lincoln, Nebraska, to arrest him. The officers knocked on petitioner's door and, when petitioner answered, identified themselves and asked if they could come in. Petitioner invited the officers into his living room.

CASE 9.2 CONTINUED

The officers advised petitioner they had come to discuss his involvement in methamphetamine distribution. They informed petitioner that they had a federal warrant for his arrest and that a grand jury had indicted him for conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine. The officers told petitioner that the indictment referred to his involvement with certain individuals, four of whom they named. Petitioner then told the officers that he knew the four people and had used methamphetamine during his association with them.

After spending about 15 minutes in petitioner's home, the officers transported petitioner to the Lancaster County jail. There, the officers advised petitioner for the first time of his [right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment]. Petitioner and the two officers signed a * * * waiver form, and petitioner then reiterated the inculpatory [incriminating] statements he had made earlier, admitted to having associated with other individuals implicated in the charged conspiracy, and admitted to having loaned money to one of them even though he suspected that she was involved in drug transactions.

Before trial, petitioner moved to suppress the inculpatory statements he made at his home and at the county jail. * * *

The District Court suppressed the "unwarned" statements petitioner made at his house but admitted petitioner's jailhouse statements * * *, concluding petitioner had knowingly and voluntarily waived his * * * rights before making the statements.

Following a jury trial at which petitioner's jailhouse statements were admitted into evidence, petitioner was convicted of conspiring to possess with intent to distribute methamphetamine. Petitioner appealed, arguing that his jailhouse statements should have been suppressed as fruits of the statements obtained at his home in violation of the Sixth Amendment. The [U.S.] Court of Appeals [for the Eighth Circuit] affirmed. * * * [T]he Court of Appeals stated: " * * * [T]he officers did not interrogate [the petitioner] at his home." * * * [Fellers appealed to the United States Supreme Court.]

* * *

*The Sixth Amendment right to counsel is triggered at or after the time that judicial proceedings have been initiated * * * whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment. We have held that an accused is denied the basic protections of the Sixth Amendment when there is used against him at his trial evidence of his own incriminating words, which federal agents * * * deliberately elicited from him after he had been indicted and in the absence of his counsel. [Emphasis added.]*

We have consistently applied the deliberate-elicitation standard in * * * Sixth Amendment cases * * *. [Emphasis added.]

The Court of Appeals erred in holding that the absence of an "interrogation" foreclosed petitioner's claim that the jailhouse statements should have been suppressed as fruits of the statements taken from petitioner [Fellers] at his home. First, there is no question that the officers in this case deliberately elicited information from petitioner. Indeed, the officers, upon arriving at petitioner's house, informed him that their purpose in coming was to discuss his involvement in the distribution of methamphetamine and his association with certain charged co-conspirators. Because the ensuing discussion took place after petitioner had been indicted, outside the presence of counsel, and in the absence of any waiver of petitioner's Sixth Amendment rights, the Court of Appeals erred in holding that the officers' actions did not violate the Sixth Amendment standards * * * .

Second, because of its erroneous determination that petitioner was not questioned in violation of Sixth Amendment standards, the Court of Appeals improperly conducted its "fruits" analysis * * *. Specifically, it * * * [held] that the admissibility of the jailhouse statements turns solely on whether the statements were knowingly and voluntarily made. The Court of Appeals did not reach the question whether the Sixth Amendment requires suppression of petitioner's jailhouse statements on the ground that they were the fruits of previous questioning conducted in violation of the Sixth Amendment deliberate-elicitation standard. We have not had occasion to decide whether [such statements should be excluded from trial] when a suspect makes incriminating statements after a knowing and voluntary waiver of his right to counsel notwithstanding earlier police questioning in violation of Sixth Amendment standards. We therefore remand to the Court of Appeals to address this issue in the first instance.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 9.2 CONTINUED

Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

 QUESTIONS

1. Why did Fellers argue on appeal that his “jailhouse statements” should have been excluded from his trial?
2. Should Fellers’s “jailhouse statements” have been excluded from his trial? Why or why not?

Purpose of the Exclusionary Rule The purpose of the exclusionary rule is to deter police from conducting warrantless searches and from engaging in other misconduct. The rule is sometimes criticized because it can lead to injustice. Many a defendant has “gotten off on a technicality” because law enforcement personnel failed to observe procedural requirements based on the above-mentioned constitutional amendments. Even though a defendant may be obviously guilty, if the evidence of that guilt was obtained improperly (without a valid search warrant, for example), it cannot be used against the defendant in court.

Exceptions to the Exclusionary Rule Over the last several decades, the United States Supreme Court has diminished the scope of the exclusionary rule by creating some exceptions to its applicability. For example, if illegally obtained evidence would have been discovered “inevitably” and obtained by the police using lawful means, the evidence will be admissible at trial.¹⁸ The Court has also created a “good faith” exception to the exclusionary rule.¹⁹ Under this exception, if the police officer who used a technically incorrect search warrant form to obtain evidence was acting in good faith, the evidence will be admissible. Additionally, the courts can exercise a certain amount of discretion in determining whether evidence has been obtained improperly—a possibility that somewhat balances the scales.

18. Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431, 104 S.Ct. 2501, 81 L.Ed.2d 377 (1984).

19. Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981, 104 S.Ct. 3424, 82 L.Ed.2d 737 (1984).

The Miranda Rule

In regard to criminal procedure, one of the questions many courts faced in the 1950s and 1960s was not whether suspects had constitutional rights—that was not in doubt—but how and when those rights could be exercised. Could the right to be silent (under the Fifth Amendment’s prohibition against self-incrimination) be exercised during pretrial interrogation proceedings or only during the trial? Were confessions obtained from suspects admissible in court if the suspects had not been advised of their right to remain silent and other constitutional rights?

To clarify these issues, the United States Supreme Court issued a landmark decision in 1966 in Miranda v. Arizona, which we present here. Today, the procedural rights required by the Court in this case are familiar to virtually every American.

CASE 9.3 Miranda v. Arizona

Supreme Court of the United States, 1966. 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694.

- Background and Facts On March 13, 1963, Ernesto Miranda was arrested at his home for the kidnapping and rape of an eighteen-year-old woman. Miranda was taken to a Phoenix, Arizona, police station and questioned by two officers. Two hours later, the officers emerged from the interrogation room with a written confession signed by Miranda. A paragraph at the top of the confession stated that the confession had been made voluntarily, without threats or promises of immunity, and “with full knowledge of my legal rights, understanding any statement I make may be used against me." Miranda was at no time advised that he had a right to remain silent and a right to have a lawyer present. The confession was admitted into evidence at the trial, and Miranda was convicted and sentenced to prison for twenty to thirty years. Miranda appealed the decision, claiming that he had not been informed of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court of Arizona held that Miranda's constitutional rights had not been violated and affirmed his conviction. The Miranda case was subsequently reviewed by the United States Supreme Court.

CASE 9.3 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Mr. Chief Justice WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

The cases before us raise questions which go to the roots of our concepts of American criminal jurisprudence; the restraints society must observe consistent with the Federal Constitution in prosecuting individuals for crime. * * *

* * * *

At the outset, if a person in custody is to be subjected to interrogation, he must first be informed in clear and unequivocal terms that he has the right to remain silent. * * *

* * * *

The warning of the right to remain silent must be accompanied by the explanation that anything said can and will be used against the individual in court. This warning is needed in order to make him aware not only of the privilege, but also of the consequences of forgoing it. * * * [Emphasis added.]

The circumstances surrounding in-custody interrogation can operate very quickly to overbear the will of one merely made aware of his privilege by his interrogators. Therefore the right to have counsel present at the interrogation is indispensable to the protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege under the system we delineate today.

* * * *

In order fully to apprise a person interrogated of the extent of his rights under this system then, it is necessary to warn him not only that he has the right to consult with an attorney, but also that if he is indigent [without funds] a lawyer will be appointed to represent him. * * * The warning of a right to counsel would be hollow if not couched in terms that would convey to the indigent—the person most often subjected to interrogation—the knowledge that he too has a right to have counsel present.

● Decision and Remedy The Supreme Court held that Miranda could not be convicted of the crime on the basis of his confession because his confession was inadmissible as evidence. For any statement made by a defendant to be admissible, the defendant must be informed of certain constitutional rights prior to police interrogation. If the accused waives his or her rights to remain silent and to have counsel present, the government must demonstrate that the waiver was made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently.

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law Police officers routinely advise suspects of their "Miranda rights" on arrest. When Ernesto Miranda himself was later murdered, the suspected murderer was "read his Miranda rights." Despite significant criticisms and later attempts to overrule the Miranda decision through legislation, the requirements stated in this case continue to provide the benchmark by which criminal procedures are judged today.

● International Considerations The Right to Remain Silent in Great Britain The right to remain silent has long been a legal hallmark in Great Britain as well as in the United States. In 1994, however, the British Parliament passed an act that provides that a criminal defendant's silence may be interpreted as evidence of the defendant's guilt. British police officers are now required, when making an arrest, to inform the suspect, "You do not have to say anything. But if you do not mention now something which you later use in your defense, the court may decide that your failure to mention it now strengthens the case against you. A record will be made of everything you say, and it may be given in evidence if you are brought to trial."

Congress's Response to the Miranda Ruling

The Supreme Court's Miranda decision was controversial, and two years later Congress attempted to overrule it by enacting Section 3501 of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968.²⁰ Essentially, Section 3501 reinstated the rule that had been in effect for 180 years before Miranda—namely, that statements by defendants can be used against them as long as the statements are made voluntarily. The U.S. Department of Justice immediately refused to enforce Section 3501, however. Although the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit attempted to enforce the provision in 1999, the United States Supreme Court reversed its decision in 2000. The Supreme Court held that the Miranda rights enunciated by the Court in the 1966 case were constitutionally based and thus could not be overruled by a legislative act.²¹

Exceptions to the Miranda Rule As part of a continuing attempt to balance the rights of accused persons against the rights of society, the Supreme Court has made a number of exceptions to the Miranda ruling. For example, the Court has recognized a “public safety” exception, holding that certain statements—such as statements concerning the location of a weapon—are admissible even if the defendant was not given Miranda warnings.²² The Court has also clarified that, in certain circumstances, a defendant's confession need not be excluded as evidence even if the police failed to inform the defendant of his or her Miranda rights.²³ If other, legally obtained evidence admitted at trial is strong enough to justify the conviction without the confession, then the fact that the confession was obtained illegally can, in effect, be ignored.²⁴

The Supreme Court has also ruled that a suspect must unequivocally and assertively request to exercise her or his right to counsel in order to stop police questioning. Saying, “Maybe I should talk to a lawyer” during an interrogation after being taken into custody is not enough. The Court held that police officers are not required to decipher the suspect's intentions in such situations.²⁵

Criminal Process

As mentioned earlier in this chapter, a criminal prosecution differs significantly from a civil case in several respects. These differences reflect the desire to safeguard the rights of the individual against the state. Exhibit 9–3 summarizes the major steps in processing a criminal case. We now discuss three phases of the criminal process—arrest, indictment or information, and trial—in more detail.

Arrest Before a warrant for arrest can be issued, there must be probable cause for believing that the individual in question has committed a crime. As discussed in Chapter 4, probable cause can be defined as a substantial likelihood that the person has committed or is about to commit a crime. Note that probable cause involves a likelihood, not just a possibility. Arrests can be made without a warrant if there is no time to get one, but the action of the arresting officer is still judged by the standard of probable cause.

Indictment or Information Individuals must be formally charged with having committed specific crimes before they can be brought to trial. If issued by a grand jury, such a charge is called an indictment.²⁶ A grand jury does not determine the guilt or innocence of an accused party; rather, its function is to hear the state's evidence and to determine whether a reasonable basis (probable cause) exists for believing that a crime has been committed and that a trial ought to be held.

Usually, grand juries are called in cases involving serious crimes, such as murder. For lesser crimes, an individual may be formally charged with a crime by an information, or criminal complaint. An information will be issued by a government prosecutor if the prosecutor determines that there is sufficient evidence to justify bringing the individual to trial.

Trial At a criminal trial, the accused person does not have to prove anything; the entire burden of proof is on 20. 42 U.S.C. Section 3789d.

21. Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428, 120 S.Ct. 2326, 147 L.Ed.2d 405 (2000).

22. New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649, 104 S.Ct. 2626, 81 L.Ed.2d 550 (1984).

23. Moran v. Burbine, 475 U.S. 412, 106 S.Ct. 1135, 89 L.Ed.2d 410 (1986).

24. Arizona v. Fulminante, 499 U.S. 279, 111 S.Ct. 1246, 113 L.Ed.2d 302 (1991).

25. Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452, 114 S.Ct. 2350, 129 L.Ed.2d 362 (1994).

26. Pronounced in-dye-ment.

EXHIBIT 9-3 • Major Procedural Steps in a Criminal Case

the prosecutor (the state). As discussed at the beginning of this chapter, the burden of proof is higher in a criminal case than in a civil case. The prosecution must show that, based on all the evidence, the defendant's guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt. If there is reasonable doubt as to whether a criminal defendant did, in fact, commit the crime with which she or he has been charged, then the verdict must be "not guilty." Note that giving a verdict of "not guilty" is not the same as stating that the defendant is innocent; it merely means that not enough evidence was properly presented to the court to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

Courts have complex rules about what types of evidence may be presented and how the evidence may be brought out in criminal cases, especially in jury trials. These rules are designed to ensure that evidence presented at trials is relevant, reliable, and not prejudicial toward the defendant.

Federal Sentencing Guidelines

In 1984, Congress passed the Sentencing Reform Act. This act created the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which was charged with the task of standardizing sentences for federal crimes. The commission's guidelines, which became effective in 1987, established a range of possible penalties for each federal crime and required the judge to select a sentence from within that range. In other words, the guidelines originally established a mandatory system because judges were not allowed to deviate from the specified sentencing range. Some federal judges felt uneasy about imposing the long prison sentences required by the guidelines on certain criminal defendants, particularly first-time offenders and those convicted in illegal substances cases involving small quantities of drugs.²⁷

Shift Away from Mandatory Sentencing

In 2005, the Supreme Court held that certain provisions of the federal sentencing guidelines were unconstitutional.²⁸ The case involved Freddie Booker, who was arrested with 92.5 grams of crack cocaine in his possession. Booker admitted to police that he had sold an additional 566 grams of crack cocaine, but he was never charged with, or tried for, possessing this additional quantity. Nevertheless, under the federal sentencing guidelines the judge was required to sentence Booker to twenty-two years in prison. Ultimately, the Supreme Court ruled that this sentence was unconstitutional because a jury did not find beyond a reasonable doubt that Booker had possessed the additional 566 grams of crack.

Essentially, the Supreme Court's ruling changed the federal sentencing guidelines from mandatory to advisory. Depending on the circumstances of the case, a federal trial judge may now depart from the guidelines if she or he believes that it is reasonable to do so.

Increased Penalties for Certain Criminal Violations

It is important for businesspersons to understand that the sentencing guidelines still exist and provide for enhanced punishment for certain types of crimes. The U.S. Sentencing Commission recommends stiff sentences for many white-collar crimes, including mail and wire fraud, commercial bribery and kickbacks, and money laundering. Enhanced penalties are also suggested for violations of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act (discussed in Chapter 5).²⁹

In addition, the commission recommends increased penalties for criminal violations of employment laws (see Chapters 33 and 34), securities laws (see Chapter 41), and antitrust laws (see Chapter 46). The guidelines set forth a number of factors that judges should take into consideration when imposing a sentence for a specified crime. These factors include the defendant company's history of past violations, management's cooperation with federal investigators, and the extent to which the firm has undertaken specific programs and procedures to prevent criminal activities by its employees.

Cyber Crime

Some years ago, the American Bar Association defined computer crime as any act that is directed against computers and computer parts, that uses computers as instruments of crime, or that involves computers and constitutes abuse. Today, because much of the crime committed with the use of computers occurs in cyberspace, many computer crimes fall under the broad label of cyber crime. Here we look at several types of 27. See, for example, United States v. Angelos, 347 F.Supp.2d 1227 (D.Utah 2004).

28. United States v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220, 125 S.Ct. 738, 160 L.Ed.2d 621 (2005).

29. As required by the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, the U.S. Sentencing Commission revised its guidelines in 2003 to impose stiffer penalties for corporate securities fraud—see Chapter 41.

activity that constitute cyber crimes against persons or property. Other cyber crimes will be discussed in later chapters as they relate to particular topics, such as banking or consumer law.

Cyber Theft

In cyberspace, thieves are not subject to the physical limitations of the “real” world. A thief can steal data stored in a networked computer with Internet access from anywhere on the globe. Only the speed of the connection and the thief’s computer equipment limit the quantity of data that can be stolen.

Financial Crimes Computer networks also provide opportunities for employees to commit crimes that can involve serious economic losses. For example, employees of a company’s accounting department can transfer funds among accounts with little effort and often with less risk than would be involved in transactions evidenced by paperwork.

Generally, the dependence of businesses on computer operations has left firms vulnerable to sabotage, fraud, embezzlement, and the theft of proprietary data, such as trade secrets or other intellectual property. As noted in Chapter 8, the piracy of intellectual property via the Internet is one of the most serious legal challenges facing lawmakers and the courts today.

Identity Theft A form of cyber theft that has become particularly troublesome in recent years is identity theft. Identity theft occurs when the wrongdoer steals a form of identification—such as a name, date of birth, and Social Security number—and uses the information to access the victim’s financial resources. This crime existed to a certain extent before the widespread use of the Internet. Thieves would “steal” calling-card numbers by watching people using public telephones, or they would rifle through garbage to find bank account or credit-card numbers. The identity thieves would then use the calling-card or credit-card numbers or would withdraw funds from the victims’ accounts. The Internet, however, has turned identity theft into perhaps the fastest-growing financial crime in the United States. The Internet provides those who steal information offline with an easy medium for using items such as stolen credit-card numbers while remaining protected by anonymity.

Three federal statutes deal specifically with identity theft. The Identity Theft and Assumption Deterrence Act of 1998³⁰ made identity theft a federal crime and directed the U.S. Sentencing Commission to incorporate the crime into its sentencing guidelines. The Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003³¹ gives victims of identity theft certain rights in working with creditors and credit bureaus to remove negative information from their credit reports. This act will be discussed in detail in Chapter 44 in the context of consumer law. The Identity Theft Penalty Enhancement Act of 2004³² authorized more severe penalties in aggravated cases in which the identity theft was committed in connection with the thief’s employment or with other serious crimes (such as terrorism or firearms or immigration offenses).

Hacking

Persons who use one computer to break into another are sometimes referred to as hackers. Hackers who break into computers without authorization often commit cyber theft. Sometimes, however, their principal aim is to prove how smart they are by gaining access to others’ password-protected computers and causing random data errors or making toll telephone calls for free.³³

Cyberterrorism Hackers who, rather than trying to gain attention, strive to remain undetected so that they can exploit computers for a serious impact are called cyberterrorists. Just as “real” terrorists destroyed the World Trade Center towers and a portion of the Pentagon on September 11, 2001, cyberterrorists might explode “logic bombs” to shut down central computers. Such activities obviously can pose a danger to national security.

The Threat to Business Activities Any business may be targeted by cyberterrorists as well as hackers. The goals of a hacking operation might include a wholesale theft of data, such as a merchant’s customer files, or the monitoring of a computer to discover a business firm’s plans and transactions. A cyberterrorist might also want to insert false codes or data. For example, the processing control system of a food manufacturer could be changed to alter the

30. 18 U.S.C. Section 1028.

31. 15 U.S.C. Sections 1681 et seq.

32. 18 U.S.C. Section 1028A.

33. The total cost of crime on the Internet is estimated to be several billion dollars annually, but two-thirds of that total is said to consist of unpaid-for toll calls.

levels of ingredients so that consumers of the food would become ill.

A cyberterrorist attack on a major financial institution, such as the New York Stock Exchange or a large bank, could leave securities or money markets in flux and seriously affect the daily lives of millions of citizens. Similarly, any prolonged disruption of computer, cable, satellite, or telecommunications systems due to the actions of expert hackers would have serious repercussions on business operations—and national security—on a global level. Computer viruses are another tool that can be used by cyberterrorists to cripple communications networks.

Spam

As discussed in Chapter 6, spamming has become a major problem for businesses. A few states, such as Maryland and Virginia, have passed laws that make spamming a crime.³⁴ Under the Virginia statute, it is a crime against property to use a computer or computer network “with the intent to falsify or forge electronic mail transmission information or other routing information in any manner.” Attempting to send spam to more than 2,500 recipients in a twenty-four-hour period is a felony. The Virginia law also includes provisions authorizing the forfeiture of assets obtained through an illegal spamming operation. The Maryland law is similar in that it prohibits spamming that falsely identifies the sender, the routing information, or the subject. Under the Maryland law, however, the number of spam messages required to convict a person of the offense is much lower. Sending only ten illegal messages in twenty-four hours violates the statute, and the more spam sent, the more severe the punishment will be, up to a maximum of ten years in prison and a $25,000 fine.

In 2006, a Virginia appellate court upheld the first felony conviction for criminal spamming in the United States against Jeremy Jaynes, who until his arrest was the eighth most prolific spammer in the world. Jaynes, a resident of North Carolina, had sent more than ten thousand junk messages a day using sixteen Internet connections and a number of aliases (such as Gaven Stubberfield). Because he had sent some of the messages through servers in Virginia, the court found that Virginia had jurisdiction over Jaynes. He was convicted of three counts of felony spamming and sentenced to nine years in prison.

Prosecuting Cyber Crime

The “location” of cyber crime (cyberspace) has raised new issues in the investigation of crimes and the prosecution of offenders. A threshold issue is, of course, jurisdiction. A person who commits an act against a business in California, where the act is a cyber crime, might never have set foot in California but might instead reside in New York, or even in Canada, where the act may not be a crime. If the crime was committed via e-mail, the question arises as to whether the e-mail would constitute sufficient “minimum contacts” (see Chapter 2) for the victim’s state to exercise jurisdiction over the perpetrator.

Identifying the wrongdoer can also be difficult. Cyber criminals do not leave physical traces, such as fingerprints or DNA samples, as evidence of their crimes. Even electronic “footprints” can be hard to find and follow. For example, e-mail may be sent through a remailer, an online service that guarantees that a message cannot be traced to its source.

For these reasons, laws written to protect physical property often are difficult to apply in cyberspace. Nonetheless, governments at both the state and the federal level have taken significant steps toward controlling cyber crime, both by applying existing criminal statutes and by enacting new laws that specifically address wrongs committed in cyberspace.

The Computer Fraud and Abuse Act

Perhaps the most significant federal statute specifically addressing cyber crime is the Counterfeit Access Device and Computer Fraud and Abuse Act of 1984 (commonly known as the Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, or CFAA).³⁵ Among other things, this act provides that a person who accesses a computer online, without authority, to obtain classified, restricted, or protected data (or attempts to do so) is subject to criminal prosecution. Such data could include financial and credit records, medical records, legal files, military and national security files, and other confidential information in government or private computers. The crime has two elements: accessing a computer without authority and taking the data.

34. See, for example, Maryland Code, Criminal Law, Section 3-805.1, and Virginia Code Ann. Sections 18.2–152.3:1.

35. 18 U.S.C. Section 1030.

This theft is a felony if it is committed for a commercial purpose or for private financial gain, or if the value of the stolen data (or computer time) exceeds $5,000. Penalties include fines and imprisonment for up to twenty years. A victim of computer theft can also bring a civil suit against the violator to obtain damages, an injunction, and other relief.

REVIEWING Criminal Law and Cyber Crime

Edward Hanousek worked for Pacific & Arctic Railway and Navigation Company (P&A) as a roadmaster of the White Pass & Yukon Railroad in Alaska. Hanousek was responsible “for every detail of the safe and efficient maintenance and construction of track, structures and marine facilities of the entire railroad,” including special projects. One project was a rock quarry, known as “6-mile,” above the Skagway River. Next to the quarry, and just beneath the surface, ran a high-pressure oil pipeline owned by Pacific & Arctic Pipeline, Inc., P&A’s sister company. When the quarry’s backhoe operator punctured the pipeline, an estimated 1,000 to 5,000 gallons of oil were discharged into the river. Hanousek was charged with negligently discharging a harmful quantity of oil into a navigable water of the United States in violation of the criminal provisions of the Clean Water Act (CWA). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Hanousek have the required mental state (mens rea) to be convicted of a crime? Why or why not?
2. Which theory discussed in the chapter would enable a court to hold Hanousek criminally liable for violating the statute regardless of whether he participated in, directed, or even knew about the specific violation?
3. Could the quarry’s backhoe operator who punctured the pipeline also be charged with a crime in this situation? Explain.
4. Suppose that at trial, Hanousek argued that he could not be convicted because he was not aware of the requirements of the CWA. Would this defense be successful? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

actus reus 187

arson 188

beyond a reasonable doubt 184 burglary 188

computer crime 204

consent 195

crime 184

cyber crime 204

cyberterrorist 205

double jeopardy 198

duress 195

embezzlement 189

entrapment 196

exclusionary rule 198

felony 185

forgery 189

grand jury 202

hacker 205

identity theft 205 indictment 202

information 202

larceny 188

mens rea 187

misdemeanor 186

money laundering 192

necessity 196

petty offense 186

plea bargaining 198 robbery 188

self-defense 195

white-collar crime 189

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

9-1. The following situations are similar (in all of them, Juanita's laptop computer is stolen), yet three different crimes are described. Identify the three crimes, noting the differences among them.

- While passing Juanita's house one night, Sarah sees a laptop computer left unattended on Juanita's lawn. Sarah takes the laptop, carries it home, and tells everyone she owns it.
- While passing Juanita's house one night, Sarah sees Juanita outside with a laptop computer. Holding Juanita at gunpoint, Sarah forces her to give up the computer. Then Sarah runs away with it.
- While passing Juanita's house one night, Sarah sees a laptop computer on a desk inside. Sarah breaks the front-door lock, enters, and leaves with the computer.

9-2. Which, if any, of the following crimes necessarily involves illegal activity on the part of more than one person?

- Bribery.
- Forgery.
- Embezzlement.
- Larceny.
- Receiving stolen property.

9-3. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Armington, while robbing a drugstore, shot and seriously injured a drugstore clerk, Jennings. Subsequently, in a criminal trial, Armington was convicted of armed robbery and assault and battery. Jennings later brought a civil tort suit against Armington for damages. Armington contended that he could not be tried again for the same crime, as that would constitute double jeopardy, which is prohibited by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. Is Armington correct? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 9-3, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

9-4. Rafael stops Laura on a busy street and offers to sell her an expensive wristwatch for a fraction of its value. After some questioning by Laura, Rafael admits that the watch is stolen property, although he says he was not the thief. Laura pays for and receives the wristwatch. Has Laura committed any crime? Has Rafael? Explain.

9-5. Theft of Trade Secrets. Four Pillars Enterprise Co. is a Taiwanese company owned by Pin Yen Yang. Avery Dennison, Inc., a U.S. corporation, is one of Four Pillars' chief competitors in the manufacture of adhesives. In 1989, Victor Lee, an Avery employee, met Yang and Yang's daughter Hwei Chen. They agreed to pay Lee $25,000 a year to serve as a consultant to Four Pillars. Over the next eight years, Lee supplied the Yangs with confidential Avery reports, including information that Four Pillars used to make a new adhesive that had been developed by Avery. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) confronted Lee, and he agreed to cooperate in an operation to catch the Yangs. When Lee next met the Yangs, he showed them documents provided by the FBI. The documents bore "confidential" stamps, and Lee said that they were Avery's confidential property. The FBI arrested the Yangs with the documents in their possession. The Yangs and Four Pillars were charged with, among other crimes, the attempted theft of trade secrets. The defendants argued in part that it was impossible for them to have committed this crime because the documents were not actually trade secrets. Should the court acquit them? Why or why not? [United States v. Yang, 281 F.3d 534 (6th Cir. 2002)]

9-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

The Sixth Amendment secures to a defendant who faces possible imprisonment the right to counsel at all critical stages of the criminal process, including the arraignment and the trial. In 1996, Felipe Tovar, a twenty-one-year-old college student, was arrested in Ames, Iowa, for operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of alcohol (OWI). Tovar was informed of his right to apply for court-appointed counsel and waived it. At his arraignment, he pleaded guilty. Six weeks later, he appeared for sentencing, again waived his right to counsel, and was sentenced to two days' imprisonment. In 1998, Tovar was convicted of OWI again, and in 2000, he was charged with OWI for a third time. In Iowa, a third OWI offense is a felony. Tovar asked the court not to use his first OWI conviction to enhance the third OWI charge. He argued that his 1996 waiver of counsel was not "intelligent" because the court did not make him aware of "the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation." What determines whether a person's choice in any situation is "intelligent"? What should determine whether a defendant's waiver of counsel is "intelligent" at critical stages of a criminal proceeding? [Iowa v. Tovar, 541 U.S. 77, 124 S.Ct. 1379, 158 L.Ed.2d 209 (2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 9-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 9," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

9-7. Larceny. In February 2001, a homeowner hired Jimmy Smith, a contractor claiming to employ a crew of thirty workers, to build a garage. The homeowner paid Smith $7,950 and agreed to make additional payments as needed to complete the project, up to $15,900. Smith promised to start the next day and finish within eight weeks. Nearly a month passed with no work, while Smith lied to the homeowner that materials were on "back order.” During a second month, footings were created for the foundation, and a subcontractor poured the concrete slab, but Smith did not return the homeowner’s phone calls. After eight weeks, the homeowner confronted Smith, who promised to complete the job, worked on the site that day until lunch, and never returned. Three months later, the homeowner again confronted Smith, who promised to “pay [him] off” later that day but did not do so. In March 2002, the state of Georgia filed criminal charges against Smith. While his trial was pending, he promised to pay the homeowner “next week” but again failed to refund any of the funds paid. The value of the labor performed before Smith abandoned the project was between $800 and $1,000, the value of the materials was $367, and the subcontractor was paid $2,270. Did Smith commit larceny? Explain. [Smith v. State of Georgia, 592 S.E.2d 871 (Ga.App.2004)]

9-8. Trial. Robert Michels met Allison Formal through an online dating Web site in 2002. Michels represented himself as the retired chief executive officer of a large company that he had sold for millions of dollars. In January 2003, Michels proposed that he and Formal create a limited liability company (a special form of business organization discussed in Chapter 37)—Formal Properties Trust, LLC—to “channel their investments in real estate.” Formal agreed to contribute $100,000 to the company and wrote two $50,000 checks to “Michels and Associates, LLC.” Six months later, Michels told Formal that their LLC had been formed in Delaware. Later, Formal asked Michels about her investments. He responded evasively, and she demanded that an independent accountant review the firm’s records. Michels refused. Formal contacted the police. Michels was charged in a Virginia state court with obtaining money by false pretenses. The Delaware secretary of state verified, in two certified documents, that “Formal Properties Trust, L.L.C.” and “Michels and Associates, L.L.C.” did not exist in Delaware. Did the admission of the Delaware secretary of state’s certified documents at Michels’s trial violate his rights under the Sixth Amendment? Why or why not? [Michels v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 47 Va.App. 461, 624 S.E.2d 675 (2006)]

9-9. White-Collar Crime. Helm Instruction Co. in Maumee, Ohio, makes custom electrical control systems. Helm hired Patrick Walsh in September 1998 to work as comptroller. Walsh soon developed a close relationship with Richard Wilhelm, Helm’s president, who granted Walsh’s request to hire Shari Price as Walsh’s assistant. Wilhelm was not aware that Walsh and Price were engaged in an extramarital affair. Over the next five years, Walsh and Price spent more than $200,000 of Helm’s money on themselves. Among other things, Walsh drew unauthorized checks on Helm’s accounts to pay his personal credit cards and issued to Price and himself unauthorized salary increases, overtime payments, and tuition reimbursement payments, altering Helm’s records to hide the payments. After an investigation, Helm officials confronted Walsh. He denied the affair with Price, claimed that his unauthorized use of Helm’s funds was an “interest-free loan,” and argued that it was less of a burden on the company to pay his credit cards than to give him the salary increases to which he felt he was entitled. Did Walsh commit a crime? If so, what crime did he commit? Discuss. [State v. Walsh, ___ Ohio App.3d ___, ___ N.E.2d ___ (6 Dist.2007)]

9-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

A troublesome issue concerning the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is the extent to which law enforcement officers may use trickery during an interrogation to induce a suspect to incriminate himself or herself. For example, in one case two officers questioned Charles McFarland, who was incarcerated in a state prison, about his connection to a handgun that had been used to shoot two other officers. McFarland was advised of his rights but was not asked whether he was willing to waive those rights. Instead, to induce McFarland to speak, the officers deceived him into believing that “[n]obody is going to give you charges.” McFarland made incriminating admissions and was indicted for possessing a handgun as a convicted felon. [United States v. McFarland, 424 F.Supp.2d 427 (N.D.N.Y.2006)]

- Review Case 9.3, Miranda v. Arizona, on pages 200 and 201 in this chapter. Should McFarland’s statements be suppressed—that is, not be treated as admissible evidence at trial—because he was not asked whether he was willing to waive his rights prior to making his self-incriminating statements? Does Miranda apply to McFarland’s situation?
- Do you think that it is fair for the police to resort to trickery and deception to bring those who have committed crimes to justice? Why or why not? What rights or public policies must be balanced in deciding this issue?

9-11. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select “Chapter 9.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled Casino. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, a casino manager, Ace (Robert DeNiro), discusses how politicians “won their ‘comp life’ when they got elected.” “Comps” are the free gifts that casinos give to high-stakes gamblers to keep their business. If an elected official accepts comps, is he or she committing a crime? If so, what type of crime? Explain your answers.
- Assume that Ace committed a crime by giving politicians comps. Can the casino, Tangiers Corp., be held liable for that crime? Why or why not? How could a court punish the corporation?

- (c) Suppose that the Federal Bureau of Investigation wants to search the premises of Tangiers for evidence of criminal activity. If casino management refuses to consent to the search, what constitutional safeguards and criminal procedures, if any, protect Tangiers?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

The Bureau of Justice Statistics in the U.S. Department of Justice offers an impressive collection of statistics on crime at the following Web site:

ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs

For summaries of famous criminal cases and documents relating to these trials, go to Court TV's Web site at www.courttv.com/sitemap/index.html

Many state criminal codes are now online. To find your state's code, go to the following home page and select "States" under the link to "Cases & Codes":

www.findlaw.com

You can learn about some of the constitutional questions raised by various criminal laws and procedures by going to the Web site of the American Civil Liberties Union at

www.aclu.org

The following Web site, which is maintained by the U.S. Department of Justice, offers information ranging from the various types of cyber crime to a description of how computers and the Internet are being used to prosecute cyber crime:

www.cybercrime.gov

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 9" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

- Internet Exercise 9-1: Legal Perspective
Revisiting Miranda
- Internet Exercise 9-2: Management Perspective
Hackers
- Internet Exercise 9-3: International Perspective
Fighting Cyber Crime Worldwide

Ethics and Torts and Crimes

Ethical and legal concepts are often closely intertwined. This is because the common law, as it evolved in England and then in America, reflects society's values and customs. This connection between law and ethics is clearly evident in the area of tort law, which provides remedies for harms caused by actions that society has deemed wrongful. Criminal law is also rooted in common law concepts of right and wrong behavior, although common law concepts governing criminal acts are now expressed in, or replaced by, federal, state, and local criminal statutes. The number of torts and crimes has continued to expand as new ways to commit wrongs have been discovered.

The laws governing torts, crimes, and intellectual property—the areas of law covered in this unit—constitute an important part of the legal environment of business. In each of these areas, new legal (and ethical) challenges have emerged as a result of developments in technology. Today, we are witnessing some of the challenges posed by the use of new communications networks, particularly the Internet. In this Focus on Ethics feature, we look at the ethical dimensions of selected topics discussed in the preceding chapters, including some issues that are unique to the cyber age.

Privacy Rights in an Online World

Privacy rights are protected under constitutional law, tort law, and various federal and state statutes. How to protect privacy rights in the online world, though, has been a recurring problem over the past ten years. One difficulty is that individuals today often are not even aware that information about their personal lives and preferences is being collected by Internet companies and other online users. Nor do they know how that information will be used. "Cookies" installed in computers may allow users' Web movements to be tracked. Google now offers a Gmail service that automatically scans and saves information about its users. Persons who purchase goods from online merchants or auctions inevitably must reveal some personal information, often including their credit-card numbers.

The Increased Value of Personal Information

One of the major concerns of consumers in recent years has been the increasing value of personal information for online marketers, who are willing to pay a high price to those who collect and sell them such information. Because of these concerns—and the possibility of lawsuits based on privacy laws—businesses marketing goods online need to exercise care. Today, many online businesses create and post on their Web sites a privacy policy disclosing how any information obtained from their customers will be used.

The Duty of Care and Personal Information

Selling data can bolster a company's profits, which may satisfy the firm's duty to its owners, but when the information is personal, its sale may violate an ethical or legal duty. In what circumstances might a party who sells information about someone else have a duty to that other party with respect to the sale of the information?

The courts have found that private investigators owe a duty not to disclose private information about a person without a legitimate reason. In one case, for example, a man contacted an Internet-based investigation and information service and requested information about Amy Boyer. The man provided his name, address, and phone number and paid the fee online using his credit card. In return, the company provided him with Boyer's home address, birth date, Social Security number, and work address. The man then drove to Boyer's workplace and fatally shot her. The police subsequently discovered that the man maintained a Web site where he referred to stalking and killing Boyer. Boyer's mother filed a suit against the online information service for disclosing her daughter's private information without investigating the reason for the request. The state supreme court found that because the threats of stalking and identity theft were sufficiently foreseeable, the company had a duty to exercise reasonable care in disclosing a third person's personal information to a client.¹

In another case, a man hired a licensed private investigator to follow his ex-girlfriend. The woman complained to the police that the investigator was stalking her, and criminal charges were filed against the investigator. The court concluded that the private detective had a duty to exercise reasonable care in disclosing the woman's personal information to the client (her former boyfriend). Because the private detective refused to testify as

1. Remsburg v. Docusearch, Inc., 149 N.H. 148, 816 A.2d 1001 (2003).

(Continued)

to why he was hired to follow the woman, the court found that the investigator's conduct was not for a legitimate purpose.²

Privacy Rights in the Workplace

Another area of concern today is the extent to which employees' privacy rights should be protected in the workplace. Traditionally, employees have been afforded a certain "zone of privacy" in the workplace. For example, the courts have concluded that employees have a reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to personal items contained in their desks or in their lockers. Should this zone of privacy extend to personal e-mail sent via the employer's computer system? This question and others relating to employee privacy rights in today's cyber age will be discussed in greater detail in Chapter 33, in the context of employment law.

Should Civil Liberties Be Sacrificed to Control Crime and Terrorist Activities in the Cyber Age?

In an era when criminal conspirators and terrorists use the Internet to communicate and even to recruit new members, an issue that has come to the forefront is whether it is possible to control many types of crime and terrorist activities without sacrificing some civil liberties. Governments in certain countries, such as Russia, have succeeded in controlling online criminal communications to some extent by monitoring the e-mail and other electronic transmissions of users of specific Internet service providers. In the United States, however, any government attempt to monitor Internet use to detect criminal conspiracies or terrorist activities does not sit well with the American people. The traditional attitude has been that civil liberties must be safeguarded to the greatest extent feasible.

After the terrorist attacks in September 2001, Congress enacted legislation—including the USA Patriot Act mentioned in Chapter 4—that gave law enforcement personnel more authority to conduct electronic surveillance, such as monitoring Web sites and e-mail exchanges. For a time, it seemed that the terrorist attacks might have made Americans more willing to trade off some of their civil liberties for greater national security. Today, though, many complain that this legislation has gone too far in curbing traditional civil liberties guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. As terrorists find more ways of using the Internet for their purposes, determining the degree to which individuals should sacrifice personal freedoms in exchange for greater protection will likely become even more difficult.

2. Miller v. Blackden, 154 N.H. 448, 913 A.2d 742 (2006).

Global Companies and Censorship Issues—Google China

Doing business on a global level can sometimes involve serious ethical challenges. Consider the ethical firestorm that erupted when Google, Inc., decided to market "Google China." This version of Google's widely used search engine was especially tailored to the Chinese government's censorship requirements. To date, the Chinese government has maintained strict control over the flow of information in that country. The government's goal is to stop the flow of what it considers to be "harmful information." Web sites that offer pornography, criticism of the government, or information on sensitive topics, such as the Tiananmen Square massacre in 1989, are censored—that is, they cannot be accessed by Web users. Government agencies enforce the censorship and encourage citizens to inform on one another. Thousands of Web sites are shut down each year, and the sites' operators are subject to potential imprisonment.

Google's code of conduct opens with the company's informal motto: "Don't be evil." Yet critics question whether Google is following this motto. Human rights groups have come out strongly against Google's decision, maintaining that the company is seeking profits in a lucrative marketplace at the expense of assisting the Chinese Communist Party in suppressing free speech. In February 2006, Tom Lantos, the only Holocaust survivor serving in Congress, stated that the "sickening collaboration" of Google and three other Web companies (Cisco Systems, Microsoft Corporation, and Yahoo!, Inc.) with the Chinese government was "decapitating the voice of dissidents" in that nation.³

Google's Response

Google defends its actions by pointing out that its Chinese search engine at least lets users know which sites are being censored. Google China includes the links to censored sites, but when a user tries to access a link, the program states that it is not accessible. Google claims that its approach is essentially the “lesser of two evils”: if U.S. companies did not cooperate with the Chinese government, Chinese residents would have less user-friendly Internet access. Moreover, Google asserts that providing Internet access, even if censored, is a step toward more open access in the future because technology is, in itself, a revolutionary force.

3. As quoted in Tom Ziller, Jr., "Web Firms Questioned on Dealings in China," The New York Times, February 16, 2006.

The Chinese Government’s Defense

The Chinese government insists that in restricting access to certain Web sites, it is merely following the lead of other national governments, which also impose controls on information access. As an example, it cites France, which bans access to any Web sites selling or portraying Nazi paraphernalia. The United States itself prohibits the dissemination of certain types of materials, such as child pornography, over the Internet. Furthermore, the U.S. government monitors Web sites and e-mail communications to protect against terrorist threats. How, ask Chinese officials, can other nations point their fingers at China for engaging in a common international practice?

Do Gun Makers Have a Duty to Warn?

One of the issues facing today’s courts is how tort law principles apply to harms caused by guns. Across the nation, many plaintiffs have filed negligence actions against gun manufacturers, claiming that gun makers have a duty to warn users of their products of the dangers associated with gun use. Would it be fair to impose such a requirement on gun manufacturers? Some say no, because such dangers are “open and obvious.” (Recall from Chapter 7 that, generally, there is no duty to warn of open and obvious dangers.) Others contend that warnings could prevent numerous gun accidents.

State courts addressing this issue have generally ruled that manufacturers have no duty to warn users of the obvious risks associated with gun use. For example, New York’s highest court has held that a gun manufacturer’s duty of care does not extend to those who are injured by the illegal use of handguns.⁴ Some courts, however, have held that gun makers whose marketing or sales practices cause a large influx of guns into the illegal secondary market could be liable under a public nuisance theory.⁵

4. Hamilton v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp., 96 N.Y.2d 222, 750 N.E.2d 1055, 727 N.Y.S.2d 7 (2001).

Trademark Protection versus Free Speech Rights

Another legal issue involving questions of fairness pits the rights of trademark owners against the right to free speech. The issue—so-called cybergripping—is unique to the cyber age. Cybergrippers are individuals who complain in cyberspace about corporate products, services, or activities. For a trademark owner, the issue becomes particularly thorny when cybergripping sites add the word sucks or stinks or some other disparaging term to the trademark owner’s domain name. These sites, sometimes referred to collectively as “sucks” sites, are established solely for the purpose of criticizing the products or services sold by the trademark owner.

A number of companies have sued the owners of such sites for trademark infringement in the hope that a court or an arbitrating panel will order the site owner to cease using the domain name. To date, however, companies have had little success pursuing this alternative. In one case, for example, Bally Total Fitness Holding Corporation sued Andrew Faber, who had established a “Bally sucks” site for the purpose of criticizing Bally’s health clubs and business practices. Bally claimed that Faber had infringed on its trademark. The court did not agree, holding that the “speech”—consumer commentary—on Faber’s Web site was protected by the First Amendment. In short, Bally could not look to trademark law for a remedy against cyber critics.⁶

The courts have been reluctant to hold that the use of a business’s domain name in a “sucks” site infringes on the trademark owner’s rights. After all, one of the primary reasons trademarks are protected under U.S. law is to prevent customers from becoming confused about the origin of the goods for sale—and a cybergripping site certainly does not create such confusion. Furthermore, U.S. courts give extensive protection to free speech

5. City of New York v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp., 401 F.Supp.2d 244 (E.D.N.Y. 2005); City of New York v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp., 315 F.Supp.2d 256 (E.D.N.Y. 2004); Johnson v. Bryco Arms, 304 F.Supp.2d 383 (E.D.N.Y. 2004); City of Gary ex rel. King v. Smith & Wesson Corp., 801 N.E.2d 1222 (Ind. 2003); and Ileto v. Glock, Inc., 349 F.3d 1191 (9th Cir. 2003).

6. Bally Total Fitness Holding Corp. v. Faber, 29 F.Supp.2d 1161 (C.D.Cal. 1998).

rights, including the right to express opinions about companies and their products.⁷ Nevertheless, when a site's domain name is confusingly similar to a competitor's trade name and the site is used to disparage that competitor, a court may allow a lawsuit for infringement or for cybersquatting.⁸

Trade Secrets versus Free Speech Rights

Another ongoing issue with ethical dimensions is the point at which free speech rights come into conflict with the right of copyright holders to protect their property by using encryption technology. This issue came before the California Supreme Court in the case of DVD Copy Control Association v. Bunner.⁹ Trade associations in the movie industry (the plaintiffs) sued an Internet Web site operator (the defendant) who had posted the code of a computer program that cracked technology used to encrypt DVDs. This posed a significant threat to the plaintiffs because, by using the code-cracking software, users would be able to duplicate the copyrighted movies stored on the DVDs.

In their suit, the plaintiffs claimed that the defendant had misappropriated trade secrets. The defendant argued that software programs designed to break encryption programs were a form of constitutionally protected speech. When the case reached the California Supreme Court, the court held that although the First Amendment applies to computer code, computer code is not a form of "pure speech" and the courts can therefore protect it to a lesser extent. The court reinstated the trial court's order that enjoined (prevented) the defendant from continuing to post the code.

7. Many businesses have concluded that although they cannot control what people say about them, they can make it more difficult for it to be said. Today, businesses commonly register such insulting domain names before the cybergraspers themselves can register them.

8. See, for example, Sunlight Saunas, Inc. v. Sundance Sauna, Inc., 427 F.Supp.2d 1032 (D.Kan. 2006).

9. 31 Cal.4th 864, 75 P.3d 1, 4 Cal.Rptr.3d 69 (2003). But see also O'Grady v. Superior Court, 139 Cal.App.4th 1423, 44 Cal.Rptr.3d 72 (2006), in which a state appellate court distinguished the situation from the Bunner case and held that Apple Computer could prevent an online publisher from disclosing confidential information about the company's impending product.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Some observers maintain that privacy rights are quickly becoming a thing of the past. In your opinion, is it possible to protect privacy rights in today's online world?
2. Many argue that the federal government should not be allowed to monitor the Internet activities and e-mail exchanges of its citizens without obtaining a warrant. Yet others maintain that in some situations, when time is of the essence, such monitoring may be necessary to keep Americans safe from terrorism. Where should the line be drawn between justifiable and unjustifiable governmental interference with American citizens' civil liberties?
3. Do companies, such as Google, that do business on a global level have an ethical duty to foreign citizens not to suppress free speech, or is it acceptable to censor the information that they provide in other nations at the request of a foreign government?
4. In your opinion, should gun manufacturers have a duty to warn gun users of the dangers of using guns? Would such a warning be effective in preventing gun-related accidents?
5. Generally, do you believe that the law has struck a fair balance between the rights of intellectual property owners and the rights of the public?

UNIT THREE

Contracts and E-Contracts

CONTENTS

- 10 Nature and Terminology
- 11 Agreement
- 12 Consideration
- 13 Capacity and Legality
- 14 Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent
- 15 The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement
- 16 Third Party Rights
- 17 Performance and Discharge
- 18 Breach of Contract and Remedies
- 19 E-Contracts and E-Signatures

CHAPTER 10

Nature and Terminology

The noted legal scholar Roscoe Pound once said that “[t]he social order rests upon the stability and predictability of conduct, of which keeping promises is a large item.”¹ Contract law deals with, among other things, the formation and keeping of promises. A promise is a person’s assurance that the person will or will not do something.

Like other types of law, contract law reflects our social values,

1. R. Pound, Jurisprudence, Vol. 3 (St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co., 1959), p. 162.

interests, and expectations at a given point in time. It shows, for example, to what extent our society allows people to make promises or commitments that are legally binding. It distinguishes between promises that create only moral obligations (such as a promise to take a friend to lunch) and promises that are legally binding (such as a promise to pay for merchandise purchased). Contract law also demonstrates which excuses our society accepts for breaking certain types of promises. In addition, it indicates which promises are considered to be contrary to public policy—against the interests of society as a whole—and therefore legally invalid. When the person making a promise is a child or is mentally incompetent, for example, a question will arise as to whether the promise should be enforced. Resolving such questions is the essence of contract law.

An Overview of Contract Law

Before we look at the numerous rules that courts use to determine whether a particular promise will be enforced, it is necessary to understand some fundamental concepts of contract law. In this section, we describe the sources and general function of contract law. We also provide the definition of a contract and introduce the objective theory of contracts.

Sources of Contract Law

The common law governs all contracts except when it has been modified or replaced by statutory law, such as the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC),² or by administrative agency regulations. Contracts relating to services, real estate, employment, and insurance, for example, generally are governed by the common law of contracts.

2. See Chapters 1 and 20 for further discussions of the significance and coverage of the UCC. The UCC is presented in Appendix C at the end of this book.

Contracts for the sale and lease of goods, however, are governed by the UCC—to the extent that the UCC has modified general contract law. The relationship between general contract law and the law governing sales and leases of goods will be explored in detail in Chapter 20. In the discussion of general contract law that follows, we indicate in footnotes the areas in which the UCC has significantly altered common law contract principles.

The Function of Contract Law

The law encourages competent parties to form contracts for lawful objectives. Indeed, no aspect of modern life is entirely free of contractual relationships. Even ordinary consumers in their daily activities acquire rights and obligations based on contract law. You acquire rights and obligations, for example, when you purchase a DVD or when you borrow funds to buy a house. Contract law is designed to provide stability and predictability, as well as certainty, for both buyers and sellers in the marketplace.

Contract law deals with, among other things, the formation and enforcement of agreements between parties (in Latin, pacta sunt servanda—“agreements shall be kept”). By supplying procedures for enforcing private contractual agreements, contract law provides an essential condition for the existence of a market economy. Without a legal framework of reasonably assured expectations within which to make long-run plans, businesspersons would be able to rely only on the good faith of others. Duty and good faith are usually sufficient to obtain compliance with a promise, but when price changes or adverse economic factors make compliance costly, these elements may not be enough. Contract law is necessary to ensure compliance with a promise or to entitle the innocent party to some form of relief.

Definition of a Contract

A contract is “a promise or a set of promises for the breach of which the law gives a remedy, or the performance of which the law in some way recognizes as a duty.”³ Put simply, a contract is a legally binding agreement between two or more parties who agree to perform or to refrain from performing some act now or in the future. Generally, contract disputes arise when there is a promise of future performance. If the contractual promise is not fulfilled, the party who made it is subject to the sanctions of a court (see Chapter 18). That party may be required to pay damages for failing to perform the contractual promise; in limited instances, the party may be required to perform the promised act.

The Objective Theory of Contracts

In determining whether a contract has been formed, the element of intent is of prime importance. In contract law, intent is determined by what is called the

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 1. The Restatement of the Law of Contracts is a nonstatutory, authoritative exposition of the common law of contracts compiled by the American Law Institute in 1932. The Restatement, which is now in its second edition (a third edition is being drafted), will be referred to throughout the following chapters on contract law.

objective theory of contracts, not by the personal or subjective intent, or belief, of a party. The theory is that a party’s intention to enter into a legally binding agreement, or contract, is judged by outward, objective facts as interpreted by a reasonable person, rather than by the party’s own secret, subjective intentions. Objective facts include (1) what the party said when entering into the contract, (2) how the party acted or appeared (intent may be manifested by conduct as well as by oral or written words), and (3) the circumstances surrounding the transaction. We will look further at the objective theory of contracts in Chapter 11, in the context of contract formation.

Elements of a Contract

The many topics that will be discussed in the following chapters on contract law require an understanding of the basic elements of a valid contract and the way in which a contract is created. The topics to be covered in this unit on contracts also require an understanding of the types of circumstances in which even legally valid contracts will not be enforced.

Requirements of a Valid Contract

The following list briefly describes the four requirements that must be met before a valid contract exists. If any of these elements is lacking, no contract will have been formed. (Each requirement will be explained more fully in subsequent chapters.)

1. Agreement. An agreement to form a contract includes an offer and an acceptance. One party must offer to enter into a legal agreement, and another party must accept the terms of the offer.
2. Consideration. Any promises made by the parties to the contract must be supported by legally sufficient and bargained-for consideration (something of value received or promised, such as money, to convince a person to make a deal).
3. Contractual capacity. Both parties entering into the contract must have the contractual capacity to do so; the law must recognize them as possessing characteristics that qualify them as competent parties.
4. Legality. The contract’s purpose must be to accomplish some goal that is legal and not against public policy.

Defenses to the Enforceability of a Contract

Even if all of the above-listed requirements are satisfied, a contract may be unenforceable if the following requirements are not met. These requirements typically are raised as defenses to the enforceability of an otherwise valid contract.

1. Genuineness of assent. The apparent consent of both parties must be genuine. For example, if a contract was formed as a result of fraud, undue influence, mistake, or duress, the contract may not be enforceable.
2. Form. The contract must be in whatever form the law requires; for example, some contracts must be in writing to be enforceable.

Types of Contracts

There are many types of contracts. In this section, you will learn that contracts can be categorized based on legal distinctions as to formation, performance, and enforceability.

Contract Formation

As you can see in Exhibit 10-1, three classifications, or categories, of contracts are based on how and when a contract is formed. We explain each of these types of contracts in the following subsections.

Bilateral versus Unilateral Contracts

Every contract involves at least two parties. The offeror is the party making the offer. The offeree is the party to whom the offer is made. Whether the contract is classified as bilateral or unilateral depends on what the offeree must do to accept the offer and bind the offeror to a contract.

Bilateral Contracts. If the offeree can accept simply by promising to perform, the contract is a bilateral contract. Hence, a bilateral contract is a “promise for a promise.” No performance, such as payment of funds or delivery of goods, need take place for a bilateral contract to be formed. The contract comes into existence at the moment the promises are exchanged.

For example, Javier offers to buy Ann’s digital camcorder for $200. Javier tells Ann that he will give her the funds for the camcorder next Friday, when he gets paid. Ann accepts Javier’s offer and promises to give him the camcorder when he pays her on Friday. Javier and Ann have formed a bilateral contract.

Unilateral Contracts. If the offer is phrased so that the offeree can accept the offer only by completing the contract performance, the contract is a unilateral contract. Hence, a unilateral contract is a “promise for an act.”⁴ In other words, the time of contract formation in a unilateral contract is not the moment when promises are exchanged but the moment when the contract is performed. A classic example of a unilateral contract is as follows: O’Malley says to Parker, “If you carry this package across the Brooklyn Bridge, I’ll give you $20.”

4. Clearly, a contract cannot be “one sided,” because, by definition, an agreement implies the existence of two or more parties. Therefore, the phrase unilateral contract, if read literally, is a contradiction in terms. As traditionally used in contract law, however, the phrase refers to the kind of contract that results when only one promise is being made (the promise made by the offeror in return for the offeree’s performance).

EXHIBIT 10-1 • Classifications Based on Contract Formation

Only on Parker's complete crossing with the package does she fully accept O'Malley's offer to pay $20. If she chooses not to undertake the walk, there are no legal consequences.

Contests, lotteries, and other competitions involving prizes are examples of offers to form unilateral contracts. If a person complies with the rules of the contest—such as by submitting the right lottery number at the right place and time—a unilateral contract is formed, binding the organization offering the prize to a contract to perform as promised in the offer.

Can a school's, or an employer's, letter of tentative acceptance to a prospective student, or a possible employee, qualify as a unilateral contract? That was the issue in the following case.

C A S E 10.1 Ardito v. City of Providence

United States District Court, District of Rhode Island, 2003. 263 F.Supp.2d 358.

- Background and Facts In 2001, the city of Providence, Rhode Island, decided to begin hiring police officers to fill vacancies in its police department. Because only individuals who had graduated from the Providence Police Academy were eligible, the city also decided to conduct two training sessions, the "60th and 61st Police Academies." To be admitted, an applicant had to pass a series of tests and be deemed qualified by members of the department after an interview. The applicants judged most qualified were sent a letter informing them that they had been selected to attend the academy if they successfully completed a medical checkup and a psychological examination. The letter for the applicants to the 61st Academy, dated October 15, stated that it was "a conditional offer of employment." Meanwhile, a new chief of police, Dean Esserman, decided to revise the selection process, which caused some of those who had received the letter to be rejected. Derek Ardito and thirteen other newly rejected applicants—who had all completed the examinations—filed a suit in a federal district court against the city, seeking a halt to the 61st Academy unless they were allowed to attend. They alleged that, among other things, the city was in breach of contract.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT ERNEST C. TORRES, Chief District Judge.

* * * *

* * * [T]he October 15 letter * * * is a classic example of an offer to enter into a unilateral contract. The October 15 letter expressly stated that it was a "conditional offer of employment" and the message that it conveyed was that the recipient would be admitted into the 61st Academy if he or she successfully completed the medical and psychological examinations, requirements that the city could not lawfully impose unless it was making a conditional offer of employment. [Emphasis added.]

Moreover, the terms of that offer were perfectly consistent with what applicants had been told when they appeared [for their interviews]. At that time, [Police Major Dennis] Simoneau informed them that, if they "passed" the [interviews], they would be offered a place in the academy provided that they also passed medical and psychological examinations.

The October 15 letter also was in marked contrast to notices sent to applicants by the city at earlier stages of the selection process. Those notices merely informed applicants that they had completed a step in the process and remained eligible to be considered for admission into the academy. Unlike the October 15 letter, the prior notices did not purport to extend a "conditional offer" of admission.

The plaintiffs accepted the city's offer of admission into the academy by satisfying the specified conditions. Each of the plaintiffs submitted to and passed lengthy and intrusive medical and psychological examinations. In addition, many of the plaintiffs, in reliance on the City's offer, jeopardized their standing with their existing employers by notifying the employers of their anticipated departure, and some plaintiffs passed up opportunities for other employment.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 10.1 CONTINUED

* * * *

The city argues that there is no contract between the parties because the plaintiffs have no legally enforceable right to employment. The city correctly points out that, even if the plaintiffs graduate from the Academy and there are existing vacancies in the department, they would be required to serve a one-year probationary period during which they could be terminated without cause * * *. That argument misses the point. The contract that the plaintiffs seek to enforce is not a contract that they will be appointed as permanent Providence police officers; rather, it is a contract that they would be admitted to the Academy if they passed the medical and psychological examinations.

● Decision and Remedy The court issued an injunction to prohibit the city from conducting the 61st Police Academy unless the plaintiffs were included. The October 15 letter was a unilateral offer that the plaintiffs had accepted by passing the required medical and psychological examinations.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the October 15 letter had used the phrase “potential offer of employment” instead of using the word “conditional.” Would the court in this case still have considered the letter to be a unilateral contract? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Why did the court order the city to stop the 61st Police Academy unless the plaintiffs were included?

A Problem with Unilateral Contracts. A problem arises in unilateral contracts when the promisor (the one making the promise) attempts to revoke (cancel) the offer after the promisee (the one to whom the promise was made) has begun performance but before the act has been completed. The promisee can accept the offer only on full performance, and under traditional contract principles, an offer may be revoked at any time before the offer is accepted. The present-day view, however, is that an offer to form a unilateral contract becomes irrevocable—cannot be revoked—once performance has begun. Thus, even though the offer has not yet been accepted, the offeror is prohibited from revoking it for a reasonable time period.

For instance, in the earlier example involving the Brooklyn Bridge, suppose that Parker is walking across the bridge and has only three yards to go when O'Malley calls out to her, “I revoke my offer.” Under traditional contract law, O'Malley's revocation would terminate the offer. Under the modern view of unilateral contracts, however, O'Malley will not be able to revoke his offer because Parker has undertaken performance and walked all but three yards of the bridge. In these circumstances, Parker can finish crossing the bridge and bind O'Malley to the contract.

Formal versus Informal Contracts Another classification system divides contracts into formal contracts and informal contracts. Formal contracts are contracts that require a special form or method of creation (formation) to be enforceable. Contracts under seal are a type of formal contract that involves a formalized writing with a special seal attached.⁵ In the past, the seals were often made of wax and impressed on the paper document. Today, the significance of the seal in contract law has lessened, though standard-form contracts still sometimes include a place for a seal next to the signature lines. Letters of credit, which are frequently used in international sales contracts, are another type of formal contract. As will be discussed in Chapter 22, letters of credit are agreements to pay contingent on the purchaser's receipt of invoices and bills of lading (documents evidencing receipt of, and title to, goods shipped).

Informal contracts (also called simple contracts) include all other contracts. No special form is required (except for certain types of contracts that must be in writing), as the contracts are usually based on their substance rather than their form. Typically, businesspersons put their contracts in writing to ensure that there is some proof of a contract's existence should problems arise.

5. The contract under seal has been almost entirely abolished under such provisions as UCC 2-203 (Section 2-203 of the Uniform Commercial Code). In sales of real estate, however, it is still common to use a seal (or an acceptable substitute).

Express versus Implied-in-Fact Contracts

Contracts may also be categorized as express or implied by the conduct of the parties. We look here at the differences between these two types of contracts.

Express Contracts. In an express contract, the terms of the agreement are fully and explicitly stated in words, oral or written. A signed lease for an apartment or a house is an express written contract. If a classmate calls you on the phone and agrees to buy your textbook from last semester for $45, an express oral contract has been made.

Implied-in-Fact Contracts. A contract that is implied from the conduct of the parties is called an implied-in-fact contract or an implied contract. This type of contract differs from an express contract in that the conduct of the parties, rather than their words, creates and defines the terms of the contract. (Note that a contract may be a mixture of an express contract and an implied-in-fact contract. In other words, a contract may contain some express terms, while others are implied.)

Requirements for Implied-in-Fact Contracts. For an implied-in-fact contract to arise, certain requirements must be met. Normally, if the following conditions exist, a court will hold that an implied contract was formed:

1. The plaintiff furnished some service or property.
2. The plaintiff expected to be paid for that service or property, and the defendant knew or should have known that payment was expected.
3. The defendant had a chance to reject the services or property and did not.

For example, suppose that you need an accountant to complete your tax return this year. You look through the Yellow Pages and find an accountant with an office in your neighborhood. You drop by the firm's office, explain your problem to an accountant, and learn what fees will be charged. The next day you return and give her administrative assistant all the necessary information and documents, such as canceled checks and W-2 forms. You then walk out the door without saying anything expressly to the accountant. In this situation, you have entered into an implied-in-fact contract to pay the accountant the usual and reasonable fees for her services. The contract is implied by your conduct and by hers. She expects to be paid for completing your tax return, and by bringing in the records she will need to do the work, you have implied an intent to pay her.

Disputes often arise between construction contractors and subcontractors. In the following case, the question was whether the subcontractor could receive extra compensation for work that was not listed in the parties' express contract based on the existence of an implied-in-fact contract.

C A S E 10.2 Gary Porter Construction v. Fox Construction, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Utah, 2004. 2004 UT App. 354, 101 P.3d 371.

www.utcourts.gov/opinions^a

- Background and Facts The University of Utah contracted with Fox Construction, Inc., to build a women's gymnastics training facility on the university's campus. Fox subcontracted with Gary Porter Construction to do excavation and soil placement work, according to specific sections of the project's plans (the "Included Sections"), for $146,740. Later, Fox asked Porter to do additional work that had not been included in the subcontract (the "Excluded Sections"). Porter did all of the work, but Fox refused to pay more than the amount of the subcontract, claiming that the added work had been mistakenly excluded from it. Porter filed a suit in a Utah state court against Fox, alleging, among other things, breach of an implied-in-fact contract. The court granted Porter's motion for summary judgment. Fox appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

a. In the "Court of Appeals" section, in the "By Date" row, click on "2004." In the list that opens, scroll to the name of the case and click on it to access the opinion. The Utah State Courts, through their Administrative Office of the Courts, maintain this Web site.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 10.2 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
BILLINGS, Presiding Judge.

* * * *

Porter argues that Fox owes additional compensation for work it did under the Excluded Sections based upon a contract implied in fact. To succeed on this claim, Porter must show that (1) Fox requested Porter to perform the work under the Excluded Sections, (2) Porter expected additional compensation from Fox for the work, and (3) Fox knew or should have known that Porter expected additional compensation. The facts provided by Porter satisfy all of these elements and are not properly controverted [opposed] by Fox.

In its [motion for summary judgment] Porter set forth the following facts * * * : (1) Jeff Wood, Fox's project manager, drafted the subcontract which contains only the Included Sections; (2) Fox repeatedly asked Porter to perform work outside the subcontract under the Excluded Sections; (3) Porter performed all work identified in the subcontract as well as the requested work under the Excluded Sections; (4) for months, Fox reviewed and paid * * * bills from Porter which identified the work performed, the costs of the work, and the specific section under which the work was done; (5) at times, Fox acknowledged that Porter was performing work outside the subcontract; and (6) the total cost of the work performed by Porter was $296,750.00, and the amount Fox paid Porter was $135,441.62, leaving a balance of $161,309.08.

The additional facts submitted by Fox do not create a material dispute regarding any of the three elements required for Porter's implied-in-fact contract claim. Fox does not dispute that it requested Porter to perform work under the Excluded Sections; and Fox provides no facts to dispute Porter's claim that Porter expected additional compensation for the work under the Excluded Sections. However, Fox does attempt to dispute the third element [in the first paragraph above]—whether Fox knew or should have known that Porter expected additional compensation.

* * * *

* * * [Floyd Cox, Fox's vice president, testified] that one Excluded Section, "section 2300, had been left out of the subcontract"; and Wood [testified] "that there was a section of specifications that was left out of the subcontract by mistake." Neither statement creates a material dispute over whether the Excluded Sections are part of the subcontract because they do not explain how the mistakes occurred despite ordinary diligence on the part of Fox. Also, because Fox presents no evidence that Porter should have known about Fox's mistake either when it entered into the subcontract or after performing, billing for, and being paid for work under the Excluded Sections, as a matter of law, Fox should have known that Porter expected additional compensation for its work under the Excluded Provisions. [Emphasis added.]

The facts set forth [by Fox] do not create a material dispute regarding whether (1) Fox requested Porter to perform the work under the Excluded Sections, (2) Porter expected additional compensation from Fox for the work, and (3) Fox knew or should have known that Porter expected additional compensation. Also, Fox does not dispute the amounts provided by Porter regarding the value of the work for which it was uncompensated. Therefore, the trial court did not err when it granted Porter's motion for summary judgment against Fox for $161,309.08.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the lower court's summary judgment in favor of Porter. The appellate court concluded that Porter had met all of the requirements for establishing an implied-in-fact contract: Porter provided its services at Fox's request, expecting to be paid, which Fox knew or should have known.

● The Ethical Dimension Should a court accept without proof a party's assertion that something was or was not done "by mistake"? Explain.

● The E-Commerce Dimension Would the outcome of this case have been different if the parties had communicated via an e-mail system that limited the size of the documents that they could transmit to each other? Why or why not?

Contract Performance

Contracts are also classified according to the degree to which they have been performed. A contract that has been fully performed on both sides is called an executed contract. A contract that has not been fully performed by the parties is called an executory contract. If one party has fully performed but the other has not, the contract is said to be executed on the one side and executory on the other, but the contract is still classified as executory.

For example, assume that you agree to buy ten tons of coal from the Northern Coal Company. Further assume that Northern has delivered the coal to your steel mill, where it is now being burned. At this point, the contract is executed on the part of Northern and executory on your part. After you pay Northern for the coal, the contract will be executed on both sides.

Contract Enforceability

A valid contract has the elements necessary to entitle at least one of the parties to enforce it in court. Those elements, as mentioned earlier, consist of (1) an agreement consisting of an offer and an acceptance of that offer, (2) supported by legally sufficient consideration, (3) made by parties who have the legal capacity to enter into the contract, and (4) made for a legal purpose. As you can see in Exhibit 10-2, valid contracts may be enforceable, voidable, or unenforceable. Additionally, a contract may be referred to as a void contract. We look next at the meaning of the terms voidable, unenforceable, and void in relation to contract enforceability.

Voidable Contracts A voidable contract is a valid contract but one that can be avoided at the option of one or both of the parties. The party having the option can elect either to avoid any duty to perform or to ratify (make valid) the contract. If the contract is avoided, both parties are released from it. If it is ratified, both parties must fully perform their respective legal obligations.

As you will read in Chapter 13, contracts made by minors, insane persons, and intoxicated persons may be voidable. For example, contracts made by minors generally are voidable at the option of the minor (with certain exceptions). Additionally, contracts entered into under fraudulent conditions are voidable at the option of the defrauded party. Contracts entered into under legally defined duress or undue influence are also voidable (see Chapter 14).

Unenforceable Contracts An unenforceable contract is one that cannot be enforced because of certain legal defenses against it. It is not unenforceable because a party failed to satisfy a legal requirement of the contract; rather, it is a valid contract rendered unenforceable by some statute or law. For example, certain contracts must be in writing (see Chapter 15), and if they are not, they will not be enforceable except in certain exceptional circumstances.

EXHIBIT 10-2 • Enforceable, Voidable, Unenforceable, and Void Contracts

Void Contracts A void contract is no contract at all. The terms void and contract are contradictory. A void contract produces no legal obligations on any of the parties. For example, a contract can be void because one of the parties was adjudged by a court to be legally insane (and thus lacked the legal capacity to enter into a contract—see Chapter 13) or because the purpose of the contract was illegal. To review the various types of contracts, see Concept Summary 10.1.

Quasi Contracts

Quasi contracts, or contracts implied in law, are not actual contracts. Express contracts and implied-in-fact contracts are actual contracts formed by the words or actions of the parties. Quasi contracts, in contrast, are fictional contracts created by courts and imposed on parties in the interests of fairness and justice. Quasi contracts are therefore equitable, rather than contractual, in nature.

Usually, quasi contracts are imposed to avoid the unjust enrichment of one party at the expense of another. The doctrine of unjust enrichment is based on the theory that individuals should not be allowed to profit or enrich themselves inequitably at the expense of others. When the court imposes a quasi contract, a plaintiff may recover in quantum meruit,⁶ a Latin phrase meaning “as much as he or she deserves.” Quantum meruit essentially describes the extent of compensation owed under a contract implied in law.

For example, suppose that a vacationing physician is driving down the highway and finds Potter lying unconscious on the side of the road. The physician renders medical aid that saves Potter’s life. Although the injured, unconscious Potter did not solicit the medical aid and was not aware that the aid had been rendered, Potter received a valuable benefit, and the requirements for a quasi contract were fulfilled. In such a situation, the law will impose a quasi contract,

6. Pronounced kwahn-tuhm mehr-oo-wit.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 10.1 Types of Contracts

Aspect	Definition
FORMATION	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Bilateral—A promise for a promise. 2. Unilateral—A promise for an act (acceptance is the completed performance of the act). 3. Formal—Requires a special form for creation. 4. Informal—Requires no special form for creation. 5. Express—Formed by words (oral, written, or a combination). 6. Implied in fact—Formed by the conduct of the parties.
PERFORMANCE	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Executed—A fully performed contract. 2. Executory—A contract not fully performed.
ENFORCEABILITY	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Valid—The contract has the necessary contractual elements: agreement (offer and acceptance), consideration, legal capacity of the parties, and legal purpose. 2. Voidable—One party has the option of avoiding or enforcing the contractual obligation. 3. Unenforceable—A contract exists, but it cannot be enforced because of a legal defense. 4. Void—No contract exists, or there is a contract without legal obligations.

and Potter normally will have to pay the physician for the reasonable value of the medical services rendered.

Limitations on Quasi-contractual Recovery

Although quasi contracts exist to prevent unjust enrichment, the party obtaining the enrichment is not held liable in some situations. Basically, a party who has conferred a benefit on someone else unnecessarily or as a result of misconduct or negligence cannot invoke the principle of quasi contract. The enrichment in those situations will not be considered “unjust.”

For example, suppose that you take your car to the local car wash and ask to have it run through the washer and to have the gas tank filled. While it is being washed, you go to a nearby shopping center for two hours. In the meantime, one of the workers at the car wash has mistaken your car for the one that he is supposed to hand wax. When you come back, you are presented with a bill for a full tank of gas, a wash job, and a hand wax. Clearly, a benefit has been conferred on you. But this benefit has been conferred because of a mistake by the car wash employee. You have not been unjustly enriched under these circumstances. People normally cannot be forced to pay for benefits “thrust” on them.

When an Actual Contract Exists

The doctrine of quasi contract generally cannot be used when there is an actual contract that covers the matter in controversy. For example, Bateman contracts with Cameron to deliver a furnace to a building owned by Jones. Bateman delivers the furnace, but Cameron never pays Bateman. Jones has been unjustly enriched in this situation, to be sure. Bateman, however, cannot recover from Jones in quasi contract because Bateman had an actual contract with Cameron. Bateman already has a remedy—he can sue for breach of contract to recover the price of the furnace from Cameron. The court does not need to impose a quasi contract in this situation to achieve justice.

Interpretation of Contracts

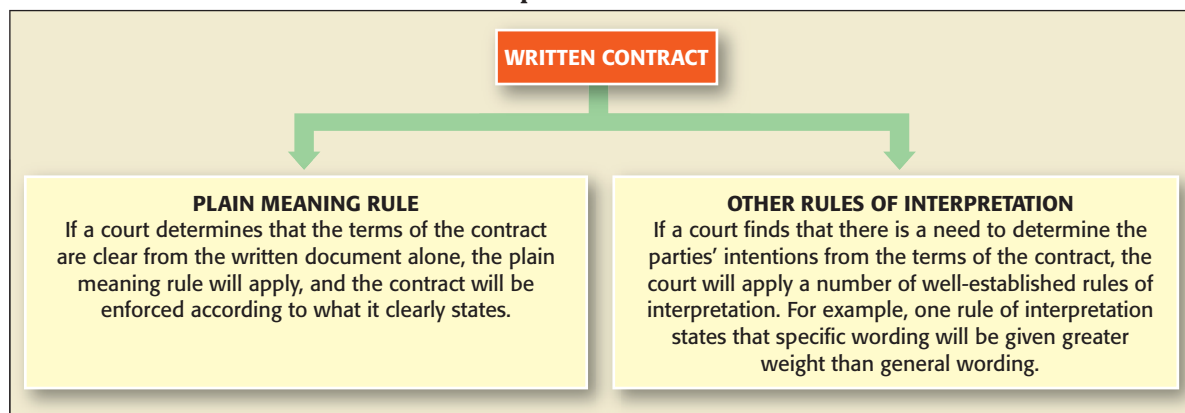

Sometimes, parties agree that a contract has been formed but disagree on its meaning or legal effect. One reason this may happen is that one of the parties is not familiar with the legal terminology used in the contract. To an extent, plain language laws (enacted by the federal government and a majority of the states) have helped to avoid this difficulty. Sometimes, though, a dispute may arise over the meaning of a contract simply because the rights or obligations under the contract are not expressed clearly—no matter how “plain” the language used.

In this section, we look at some common law rules of contract interpretation. These rules, which have evolved over time, provide the courts with guidelines for deciding disputes over how contract terms or provisions should be interpreted. Exhibit 10-3 provides a brief graphic summary of how these rules are applied.

The Plain Meaning Rule

When a contract’s writing is clear and unequivocal, a court will enforce it according to its obvious terms. The meaning of the terms must be determined from the face of the instrument—from the written document alone. This is sometimes referred to as the plain meaning rule.

EXHIBIT 10-3 • Rules of Contract Interpretation

Under this rule, if a contract's words appear to be clear and unambiguous, a court cannot consider extrinsic evidence—that is, any evidence not contained in the document itself. If a contract's terms are unclear or ambiguous, however, extrinsic evidence may be admissible to clarify the meaning of the contract. The admissibility of such evidence can significantly affect the court's interpretation of ambiguous contractual provisions and thus the outcome of litigation. The following case illustrates these points.

EXTENDED
CASE 10.3

Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc.

California Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 7, 2007.
146 Cal.App.4th 586, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 898.

JOHNSON, Acting P.J. [Presiding Judge]

* * * *

Robert Wagner and Natalie Wood (the “Wagners”) entered into an agreement with Spelling-Goldberg Productions (SGP) “relating to ‘Charlie’s Angels’ (herein called the ‘series’).” The contract entitled the Wagners to 50 percent of the net profits SGP received as consideration “for the right to exhibit photoplays of the series and from the exploitation of all ancillary, music and subsidiary rights in connection therewith.” SGP subsequently sold its rights and obligations with respect to the “Charlie’s Angels” series to defendant Columbia Pictures [Industries, Inc.] Thirteen years later Columbia contracted to obtain the motion picture rights to the series from * * * the show’s writers, Ivan Goff and Ben Roberts. In 2000 and 2003 Columbia produced and distributed two “Charlie’s Angels” films based on the TV series.

Wagner contends the “subsidiary rights” provision in the agreement with SGP entitles him * * * to 50 percent of the net profits from the two “Charlie’s Angels” films. * * *

Wagner brought this action [in a California state court] against Columbia for breach of contract * * *. Columbia answered and moved for summary [judgment] * * *. [T]he trial court granted that motion * * *. [Wagner appealed this judgment to a state intermediate appellate court.]

* * * *

Wagner introduced evidence of the history of the negotiations underlying the “Charlie’s Angels” contract in support of his [contention].

This history begins with a contract the Wagners entered into with SGP to star in a television movie-of-the-week, “Love Song.” As compensation for Wagner and Wood acting in “Love Song,” SGP agreed to pay them a fixed amount plus one-half the net profits * * *.

* * * *

In the * * * “Love Song” contract net profits were not limited to monies received “for the right to exhibit the Photoplay.” Instead they were defined as the net of “all monies received by Producer as consideration for the right to exhibit the Photoplay, and exploitation of all ancillary, music and subsidiary rights in connection therewith.”

* * * *

Wagner’s argument is simple and straightforward. The net profits provision in the “Love Song” agreement was intended to give the Wagners a one-half share in the net profits received by SGP “from all sources” without limitation as to source or time. * * * The “Charlie’s Angels” agreement was based on the “Love Song” agreement and defines net profits in identical language. Therefore, the “Charlie’s Angels” agreement should also be interpreted as providing the Wagners with a 50 percent share in SGP’s income “from all sources” without limitation as to source or time. Since Columbia admits it stands in SGP’s shoes with respect to SGP’s obligations under the “Charlie’s Angels” agreement, Columbia is obligated to pay Wagner * * * 50 percent of the net profits derived from the “Charlie’s Angels” movies.

* * * *

The problem with Wagner’s extrinsic evidence is that it does not explain the [“Charlie’s Angels”] contract language, it contradicts it. Under the parol evidence rule,^a extrinsic evidence is not admis-

a. As will be discussed in Chapter 15, the parol evidence rule prohibits the parties from introducing in court evidence of an oral agreement that contradicts the written terms of a contract.

CASE 10.3 CONTINUED

*sible to contradict express terms in a written contract or to explain what the agreement was. The agreement is the writing itself. Parol evidence cannot be admitted to show intention independent of an unambiguous written instrument. * *  [Emphasis added.]

Even if the Wagners and SGP intended the Wagners would share in the net profits “from any and all sources” they did not say so in their contract. What they said in their contract was the Wagners would share in “all monies actually received by Producer, as consideration for the right to exhibit photoplays of the series, and from the exploitation of all ancillary, music and subsidiary rights in connection therewith.” For a right to be “subsidiary” or “ancillary,” meaning supplementary or subordinate, there must be a primary right to which it relates. The only primary right mentioned in the contract is “the right to exhibit photoplays of the series.” Thus the Wagners were entitled to share in the profits from the exploitation of the movie rights to “Charlie’s Angels” if those rights were exploited by Columbia as ancillary or subsidiary rights of its primary “right to exhibit photoplays of the series” but not if those rights were acquired by Columbia independently from its right to exhibit photoplays.

* * * *

To understand how the producer of a television series acquires the motion picture rights in the series it is necessary to understand the * * * Writers Guild of America Minimum Basic Agreement (MBA).^b

* * * *

The contract between Goff and Roberts and SGP * * * stated: “The parties acknowledge that this agreement is subject to all of the terms and provisions of the applicable [MBA] * * * .”

Article 16B of the MBA entitled “Separation of Rights” provided * * * : “[Producer] shall own the exclusive film television rights in the literary material * * * . Writer shall retain all other rights * * * including but not limited to * * * theatrical motion picture * * * rights.”

* * * *

Despite the provision in the MBA conferring the motion picture rights in a teleplay on the writers of the teleplay the producer retained a “limited interest in such rights.” As relevant here, this “limited interest” consisted of the right of first refusal should the writer decide to offer the movie rights for sale within five years from the date the writer delivered the teleplay to the producer. After the five-year period expired the producer could still purchase the movie rights but it had to do so on the open market and in competition with any other producer who wanted to purchase those rights.

Consequently, if Columbia had produced “Charlie’s Angels” movies based on motion picture rights * * * SGP had acquired from Goff and Roberts under SGP’s right of first refusal Columbia could be said to have “exploited” an ancillary or subsidiary right, i.e., movie-making, in connection with “the right to exhibit photoplays of the series,” and the Wagners would be entitled to a share of the movies’ profits.

However, * * * there is no evidence SGP ever acquired the motion picture rights to “Charlie’s Angels” by exercising its right of first refusal or in any other way connected to its right to exhibit photoplays of the series.

* * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. How might the result in this case have been different if the court had admitted the Wagners’ evidence of the “Love Song” contract?
2. Under what circumstance would the Wagners’ evidence of the “Love Song” contract have been irrelevant and yet they would still have been entitled to a share of the profits from the “Charlie’s Angels” movies?

b. The Writers Guild of America is an association of screen and television writers that negotiates industrywide agreements with motion picture and television producers.

Other Rules of Interpretation

Generally, a court will interpret the language to give effect to the parties' intent as expressed in their contract. This is the primary purpose of the rules of interpretation—to determine the parties' intent from the language used in their agreement and to give effect to that intent. A court normally will not make or remake a contract, nor will it interpret the language according to what the parties claim their intent was when they made it. The courts use the following rules in interpreting contractual terms:

1. Insofar as possible, a reasonable, lawful, and effective meaning will be given to all of a contract's terms.
2. A contract will be interpreted as a whole; individual, specific clauses will be considered subordinate to the contract's general intent. All writings that are a part of the same transaction will be interpreted together.
3. Terms that were the subject of separate negotiation will be given greater consideration than standardized terms and terms that were not negotiated separately.
4. A word will be given its ordinary, commonly accepted meaning, and a technical word or term will be given its technical meaning, unless the parties clearly intended something else.⁷
5. Specific and exact wording will be given greater consideration than general language.
6. Written or typewritten terms will prevail over preprinted ones.
7. Because a contract should be drafted in clear and unambiguous language, a party who uses ambiguous expressions is held to be responsible for the ambiguities. Thus, when the language has more than one meaning, it will be interpreted against the party who drafted the contract.
8. Evidence of trade usage, prior dealing, and course of performance may be admitted to clarify the meaning of an ambiguously worded contract (these terms will be defined and discussed in Chapter 20). When considering custom and usage, a court will look at what is common to the particular business or industry and to the locale where the contract was made or is to be performed.

7. See, for example, Citizens Communications Co. v. Trustmark Insurance, 303 F.Supp.2d 197 (2004).

REVIEWING Nature and Terminology

Grant Borman, who was engaged in a construction project, leased a crane from Allied Equipment and hired Crosstown Trucking Company to deliver the crane to the construction site. Crosstown, while the crane was in its possession and without permission from either Borman or Allied Equipment, used the crane to install a transformer for a utility company, which paid Crosstown for the job. Crosstown then delivered the crane to Borman's construction site at the appointed time of delivery. When Allied Equipment learned of the unauthorized use of the crane by Crosstown, it sued Crosstown for damages, seeking to recover the rental value of Crosstown's use of the crane. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. What are the four requirements of a valid contract?
2. Did Crosstown have a valid contract with Borman concerning the use of the crane? If so, was it a bilateral or a unilateral contract? Explain.
3. What are the requirements of an implied-in-fact contract? Can Allied Equipment obtain damages from Crosstown based on an implied-in-fact contract? Why or why not?
4. Should a court impose a quasi contract on the parties in this situation to allow Allied to recover damages from Crosstown? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

bilateral contract 218 contract 217 executed contract 223 executory contract 223 express contract 221

formal contract 220 implied-in-fact contract 221 informal contract 220 objective theory of contracts 217 offeree 218
offeror 218 promise 216 promisee 220

promisor 220
quantum meruit 224 quasi contract 224
unenforceable contract 223 unilateral contract 218 valid contract 223 void contract 224
voidable contract 223

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

10-1. Suppose that Everett McCleskey, a local businessperson, is a good friend of Al Miller, the owner of a local candy store. Every day on his lunch hour, McCleskey goes into Miller's candy store and spends about five minutes looking at the candy. After examining Miller's candy and talking with Miller, McCleskey usually buys one or two candy bars. One afternoon, McCleskey goes into Miller's candy shop, looks at the candy, and picks up a $1 candy bar. Seeing that Miller is very busy, he waves the candy bar at Miller without saying a word and walks out. Is there a contract? If so, classify it within the categories presented in this chapter.

10-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Janine was hospitalized with severe abdominal pain and placed in an intensive care unit. Her doctor told the hospital personnel to order around-the-clock nursing care for Janine. At the hospital's request, a nursing services firm, Nursing Services Unlimited, provided two weeks of in-hospital care and, after Janine was sent home, an additional two weeks of at-home care. During the at-home period of care, Janine was fully aware that she was receiving the benefit of the nursing services. Nursing Services later billed Janine $4,000 for the nursing care, but Janine refused to pay on the ground that she had never contracted for the services, either orally or in writing. In view of the fact that no express contract was ever formed, can Nursing Services recover the $4,000 from Janine? If so, under what legal theory? Discuss.

- For a sample answer to Question 10-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

10-3. Burger Baby restaurants engaged Air Advertising to fly an advertisement above the Connecticut beaches. The advertisement offered $1,000 to any person who could swim from the Connecticut beaches to Long Island across Long Island Sound in less than a day. At 10:00 A.M. on Saturday, October 10, Air Advertising's pilot flew a sign above the Connecticut beaches that read: "Swim across the Sound and Burger Baby pays $1,000." On seeing the sign, Davison dived in. About four hours later, when he was about halfway across the Sound, Air Advertising flew another sign over the Sound that read: "Burger Baby revokes." Davison completed the swim in another six hours. Is there a contract between Davison and Burger Baby? Can Davison recover anything?

10-4. Bilateral versus Unilateral Contracts. D.L. Peoples Group (D.L.) placed an ad in a Missouri newspaper to recruit admissions representatives, who were hired to recruit Missouri residents to attend D.L.'s college in Florida. Donald Hawley responded to the ad, his interviewer recommended him for the job, and he signed, in Missouri, an "Admissions Representative Agreement," which was mailed to D.L.'s president, who signed it in his office in Florida. The agreement provided, in part, that Hawley would devote exclusive time and effort to the business in his assigned territory in Missouri and that D.L. would pay Hawley a commission if he successfully recruited students for the school. While attempting to make one of his first calls on his new job, Hawley was accidentally shot and killed. On the basis of his death, a claim was filed in Florida for workers' compensation. (Under Florida law, when an accident occurs outside Florida, workers' compensation benefits are payable only if the employment contract was made in Florida.) Was this admissions representative agreement a bilateral or a unilateral contract? What are the consequences of the distinction in this case? Explain. [D.L. Peoples Group, Inc. v. Hawley, 804 So.2d 561 (Fla.App. 1 Dist. 2002)]

10-5. Interpretation of Contracts. East Mill Associates (EMA) was developing residential "units" in East Brunswick, New Jersey, within the service area of the East Brunswick Sewerage Authority (EBSA). The sewer system required an upgrade to the Ryder's Lane Pumping Station to accommodate the new units. EMA agreed to pay "fifty-five percent (55%) of the total cost" of the upgrade. At the time, the estimated cost to EMA was $150,000 to $200,000. Impediments to the project arose, however, substantially increasing the cost. Among other things, the pumping station had to be moved to accommodate a widened road nearby. The upgrade was delayed for almost three years. When it was completed, EBSA asked EMA for $340,022.12, which represented 55 percent of the total cost. EMA did not pay. EBSA filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against EMA for breach of contract. What rule should the court apply to interpret the parties' contract? How should that rule be applied? Why? [East Brunswick Sewerage Authority v. East Mill Associates, Inc., 365 N.J. Super. 120, 838 A.2d 494 (A.D. 2004)]

10-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In December 2000, Nextel South Corp., a communications firm, contacted R. A. Clark Consulting, Ltd., an executive search company, about finding an employment manager for Nextel's call center in Atlanta, Georgia. Over the next six months, Clark screened, evaluated, and interviewed more than three hundred candidates. Clark provided Nextel with more than fifteen candidate summaries, including one for Dan Sax. Nextel hired Sax for the position at an annual salary of $75,000. Sax started work on June 25, 2001, took two weeks' vacation, and quit on July 31 in the middle of a project. Clark spent the next six weeks looking for a replacement, until Nextel asked Clark to stop. Clark billed Nextel for its services, but Nextel refused to pay, asserting, among other things, that the parties had not signed an agreement. Nextel's typical agreement specified payment to an employment agency of 20 percent of an employee's annual salary. Clark filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Nextel to recover in quantum meruit. What is quantum meruit? What should Clark have to show to recover on this basis? Should the court rule in Clark's favor? Explain. [Nextel South Corp. v. R. A. Clark Consulting, Ltd., 266 Ga. App. 85, 596 S.E.2d 416 (2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 10-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 10," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

10-7. Contract Enforceability. California's Subdivision Map Act (SMA) prohibits the sale of real property until a map of its subdivision is filed with, and approved by, the appropriate state agency. In November 2004, Black Hills Investments, Inc., entered into two contracts with Albertson's, Inc., to buy two parcels of property in a shopping center development. Each contract required that "all governmental approvals relating to any lot split [or] subdivision" be obtained before the sale but permitted Albertson's to waive this condition. Black Hills made a $133,000 deposit on the purchase. A few weeks later, before the sales were complete, Albertson's filed with a local state agency a map that subdivided the shopping center into four parcels, including the two that Black Hills had agreed to buy. In January 2005, Black Hills objected to concessions that Albertson's had made to a buyer of one of the other parcels, told Albertson's that it was terminating its deal, and asked for a return of its deposit. Albertson's refused. Black Hills filed a suit in a California state court against Albertson's, arguing that the contracts were void. Are these contracts valid, voidable, unenforceable, or void? Explain. [Black Hills Investments, Inc. v. Albertson's, Inc., 146 Cal. App. 4th 883, 53 Cal. Rptr. 3d 263 (4 Dist. 2007)]

10-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

*International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) hired Niels Jensen in 2000 as a software sales representative. In 2001, IBM presented a new "Software Sales Incentive Plan" (SIP) at a conference for its sales employees. A brochure given to the attendees stated, "[T]here are no caps to your earnings; the more you sell, * * * the more earnings for you." The brochure outlined how the plan worked and referred the employees to the "Sales Incentives" section of IBM's corporate intranet for more details. Jensen was given a "quota letter" that said he would be paid $75,000 as a base salary and, if he attained his quota, an additional $75,000 as incentive pay. In September, Jensen closed a deal with the U.S. Department of the Treasury's Internal Revenue Service that was worth over $24 million to IBM. Relying on the SIP brochure, Jensen estimated his commission to be $2.6 million. IBM paid him less than $500,000, however. Jensen filed a suit in a federal district court against IBM, contending that the SIP brochure and quota letter constituted a unilateral offer that became a binding contract when Jensen closed the sale. In view of these facts, consider the following questions. [Jensen v. International Business Machines Corp., 454 F.3d 382 (4th Cir. 2006)]*

- Would it be fair to the employer in this case to hold that the SIP brochure and the quota letter created a unilateral contract if IBM did not intend to create such a contract? Would it be fair to the employee to hold that no contract was created? Explain.
- The "Sales Incentives" section of IBM's intranet included a clause providing that "[m]anagement will decide if an adjustment to the payment is appropriate" when an employee closes a large transaction. Jensen's quota letter stated, "[The SIP] program does not constitute a promise by IBM to make any distributions under it. IBM reserves the right to adjust the program terms or to cancel or otherwise modify the program at any time." How do these statements affect your answers to the above questions? From an ethical perspective, would it be fair to hold that a contract exists despite these statements?

10-9. SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS

Go to Case 10.3, Wagner v. Columbia Pictures Industries, Inc., 146 Cal.App.4th 586, 52 Cal.Rptr.3d 898 (2 Dist.2007), on pages 226–227. Read the excerpt and answer the following questions.

- Issue: The dispute between the parties to this case centered on which contract and asked what question?
- Rule of Law: What rule concerning the interpretation of a contract and the admission of evidence did the court apply in this case?
- Applying the Rule of Law: How did the intent of the contracting parties and the language in their contract affect the application of the rule of law?
- Conclusion: Did the court resolve the dispute in the plaintiff's favor? Why or why not?

10-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 10." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Bowfinger. Then answer the following questions.

- In the video, Renfro (Robert Downey, Jr.) says to Bowfinger (Steve Martin), "You bring me this script and Kit Ramsey and you've got yourself a 'go' picture." Assume for the purposes of this question that their agreement is a contract. Is the contract bilateral or unilateral? Is it express or implied? Is it formal or informal? Is it executed or executory? Explain your answers.
- What criteria would a court rely on to interpret the terms of the contract?
- Recall from the video that the contract between Bowfinger and the producer was oral. Suppose that a statute requires contracts of this type to be in writing. In that situation, would the contract be void, voidable, or unenforceable? Explain.

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

The 'Lectric Law Library provides information about contract law, including a definition of a contract and the elements required for a contract. Go to lectlaw.com/def/c123.htm

Scroll down to the "Other Assorted Items" section and click on "Contracts."

You can keep abreast of recent and planned revisions of the Restatements of the Law, including the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, by accessing the American Law Institute's Web site at www.ali.org

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 10" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 10-1: Legal Perspective
Contracts and Contract Provisions

Internet Exercise 10-2: Management Perspective
Implied Employment Contracts

Internet Exercise 10-3: Historical Perspective
Contracts in Ancient Mesopotamia

CHAPTER 11

Agreement

An essential element for contract formation is agreement—the parties must agree on the terms of the contract and manifest to each other their mutual assent (agreement) to the same bargain. Ordinarily, agreement is evidenced by two events: an offer and an acceptance. One party offers a certain bargain to another party, who then accepts that bargain. The agreement does not necessarily have to be in writing. Both parties, however, must manifest their assent to the same bargain. Once an agreement is reached, if the other elements of a contract are present (consideration, capacity, and legality—discussed in subsequent chapters), a valid contract is formed, generally creating enforceable rights and duties between the parties.

Note that not all agreements are contracts. John and Kevin may agree to play golf on a certain day, but a court would not hold that their agreement is an enforceable contract. A contractual agreement arises only when the terms of the agreement impose legally enforceable obligations on the parties.

In today's world, contracts are frequently formed via the Internet. For a discussion of online offers and acceptances, see Chapter 19, which is devoted entirely to the subject of electronic contracts, or e-contracts.

Requirements of the Offer

As mentioned in Chapter 10, the parties to a contract are the offeror, the one who makes an offer or proposal to another party, and the offeree, the one to whom the offer or proposal is made. An offer is a promise or commitment to do or refrain from doing some specified thing in the future. Under the common law, three elements are necessary for an offer to be effective:

1. The offeror must have a serious intention to become bound by the offer.
2. The terms of the offer must be reasonably certain, or definite, so that the parties and the court can ascertain the terms of the contract.
3. The offer must be communicated to the offeree.

Once an effective offer has been made, the offeree has the power to accept the offer. If the offeree accepts, an agreement is formed (and thus a contract arises, if other essential elements are present). The requirements for traditional offers apply to online offers as well, as you will read in Chapter 19.

Intention

The first requirement for an effective offer is a serious intent on the part of the offeror. Serious intent is not determined by the subjective intentions, beliefs, and assumptions of the offeror. As discussed in Chapter 10, courts generally adhere to the objective theory of contracts in determining whether a contract has been formed. Under this theory, a party's words and conduct are held to mean whatever a reasonable person in the offeree's position would think they meant. The court will give words their usual meanings even if "it were proved by twenty bishops that [the] party . . . intended something else."¹

1. Judge Learned Hand in Hotchkiss v. National City Bank of New York, 200 F.287 (2d Cir. 1911), aff'd 231 U.S. 50, 34 S.Ct. 20, 58 L.Ed. 115 (1913).

Offers made in obvious anger, jest, or undue excitement do not meet the intent test because a reasonable person would realize that a serious offer was not being made. Because these offers are not effective, an offeree's acceptance does not create an agreement. For example, suppose that you and three classmates ride to school each day in Davina's new automobile, which has a market value of $20,000. One cold morning, the four of you get into the car, but Davina cannot get the car started. She yells in anger, "I'll sell this car to anyone for $500!" You drop $500 in her lap. Given these facts, a reasonable person, taking into consideration Davina's frustration and the obvious difference in worth between the market value of the car and the proposed purchase price, would declare that her offer was not made with serious intent and that you did not have an agreement.

The concept of intention can be further clarified through an examination of the types of expressions and statements that are not offers. We look at these expressions and statements in the subsections that follow. In the classic case of Lucy v. Zehmer, presented here, the court considered whether an offer made "after a few drinks" met the serious-intent requirement.

CASE 11.1 Lucy v. Zehmer

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, 1954. 196 Va. 493, 84 S.E.2d 516.

- Background and Facts W. O. Lucy and J. C. Lucy, the plaintiffs, filed a suit against A. H. Zehmer and Ida Zehmer, the defendants, to compel the Zehmers to transfer title of their property, known as the Ferguson Farm, to the Lucys for $50,000, as the Zehmers had allegedly agreed to do. Lucy had known Zehmer for fifteen or twenty years and for the last eight years or so had been anxious to buy the Ferguson Farm from Zehmer. One night, Lucy stopped in to visit the Zehmers in the combination restaurant, filling station, and motor court they operated. While there, Lucy tried to buy the Ferguson Farm once again. This time he tried a new approach. According to the trial court transcript, Lucy said to Zehmer, "I bet you wouldn't take $50,000 for that place." Zehmer replied, "Yes, I would too; you wouldn't give fifty." Throughout the evening, the conversation returned to the sale of the Ferguson Farm for $50,000. At the same time, the parties continued to drink whiskey and engage in light conversation. Eventually, Lucy enticed Zehmer to write up an agreement to the effect that the Zehmers would sell the Ferguson Farm to Lucy for $50,000 complete. Later, Lucy sued Zehmer to compel him to go through with the sale. Zehmer argued that he had been drunk and that the offer had been made in jest and hence was unenforceable. The trial court agreed with Zehmer, and Lucy appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

BUCHANAN, J. [Justice] delivered the opinion of the court.

* * * *

In his testimony, Zehmer claimed that he "was high as a Georgia pine," and that the transaction "was just a bunch of two doggoned drunks bluffing to see who could talk the biggest and say the most." That claim is inconsistent with his attempt to testify in great detail as to what was said and what was done. * * *

* * * *

The appearance of the contract, the fact that it was under discussion for forty minutes or more before it was signed; Lucy's objection to the first draft because it was written in the singular, and he wanted Mrs. Zehmer to sign it also; the rewriting to meet that objection and the signing by Mrs. Zehmer; the discussion of what was to be included in the sale, the provision for the examination of the title, the completeness of the instrument that was executed, the taking possession of it by Lucy with no request or suggestion by either of the defendants that he give it back, are facts which furnish persuasive evidence that the execution of the contract was a serious business transaction rather than a casual, jesting matter as defendants now contend.

* * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 11.1 CONTINUED

In the field of contracts, as generally elsewhere, [w]e must look to the outward expression of a person as manifesting his intention rather than to his secret and unexpressed intention. The law imputes to a person an intention corresponding to the reasonable meaning of his words and acts. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Whether the writing signed by the defendants and now sought to be enforced by the complainants was the result of a serious offer by Lucy and a serious acceptance by the defendants, or was a serious offer by Lucy and an acceptance in secret jest by the defendants, in either event it constituted a binding contract of sale between the parties.

● Decision and Remedy The Supreme Court of Virginia determined that the writing was an enforceable contract and reversed the ruling of the lower court. The Zehmers were required by court order to follow through with the sale of the Ferguson Farm to the Lucys.

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law This is a classic case in contract law because it illustrates so clearly the objective theory of contracts with respect to determining whether a serious offer was intended. Today, the courts continue to apply the objective theory of contracts and routinely cite Lucy v. Zehmer as a significant precedent in this area.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the day after Lucy signed the purchase agreement for the farm, he decided that he didn't want it after all, and Zehmer sued Lucy to perform the contract. Would this change in the facts alter the court's decision that Lucy and Zehmer had created an enforceable contract? Why or why not?

Expressions of Opinion An expression of opinion is not an offer. It does not indicate an intention to enter into a binding agreement. Consider an example. Hawkins took his son to McGee, a physician, and asked McGee to operate on the son's hand. McGee said that the boy would be in the hospital three or four days and that the hand would probably heal a few days later. The son's hand did not heal for a month, but the father did not win a suit for breach of contract. The court held that McGee had not made an offer to heal the son's hand in a few days. He had merely expressed an opinion as to when the hand would heal.²

Statements of Future Intent A statement of an intention to do something in the future is not an offer. If Arif says, "I plan to sell my stock in Novation, Inc., for $150 per share," a contract is not created if John "accepts" and tenders the $150 per share for the stock. Arif has merely expressed his intention to enter into a future contract for the sale of the stock. If John accepts and tenders the $150 per share, no contract is formed because a reasonable person would conclude that Arif was only thinking about selling his stock, not promising to sell it.

2. Hawkins v. McGee, 84 N.H. 114, 146 A. 641 (1929).

Preliminary Negotiations A request or invitation to negotiate is not an offer. It only expresses a willingness to discuss the possibility of entering into a contract. Statements such as "Will you sell Blythe Estate?" or "I wouldn't sell my car for less than $5,000" are examples. A reasonable person in the offeree's position would not conclude that these statements indicated an intention to enter into a binding obligation. Likewise, when the government or private firms require construction work, they invite contractors to submit bids. The invitation to submit bids is not an offer, and a contractor does not bind the government or private firm by submitting a bid. (The bids that the contractors submit are offers, however, and the government or private firm can bind the contractor by accepting the bid.)

Agreements to Agree Traditionally, agreements to agree—that is, agreements to agree to the material terms of a contract at some future date—were not considered to be binding contracts. The modern view, however, is that agreements to agree may be enforceable agreements (contracts) if it is clear that the parties intended to be bound by the agreements. In other words, under the modern view the emphasis is on the parties' intent rather than on form.

For example, after a person was injured and nearly drowned on a water ride at Six Flags Amusement Park, Six Flags, Inc., filed a lawsuit against the manufacturer that designed the particular ride. The defendant manufacturer claimed that there was no binding contract between the parties, only preliminary negotiations that were never formalized into a construction contract. The court, however, held that a faxed document specifying the details of the water ride, along with the parties' subsequent actions (beginning construction and handwriting notes on the fax), was sufficient to show an intent to be bound. Because of the court's finding, the manufacturer was required to provide insurance for the water ride at Six Flags, and its insurer was required to defend Six Flags in the personal-injury lawsuit that arose out of the incident.³

Increasingly, the courts are holding that a preliminary agreement constitutes a binding contract if the parties have agreed on all essential terms and no disputed issues remain to be resolved.⁴ In contrast, if the parties agree on certain major terms but leave other terms open for further negotiation, a preliminary agreement is binding only in the sense that the parties have committed themselves to negotiate the undecided terms in good faith in an effort to reach a final agreement.⁵

3. Six Flags, Inc. v. Steadfast Insurance Co., 474 F.Supp.2d 201 (D.Mass.2007).

4. See, for example, Tractebel Energy Marketing, Inc. v. AEP Power Marketing, Inc., 487 F.3d 89 (2d Cir.2007); and Florine On Call, Ltd. v. Fluorogas Limited, No. 01-CV-186 (W.D.Tex.2002), contract issue affirmed on appeal at 380 F.3d 849 (5th Cir.2004). A significant precedent in this area is Texaco, Inc. v. Pennzoil Co., 729 S.W.2d 768 (Tex.App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1987, writ ref'd n.r.e.). (Generally, a complete Texas Court of Appeals citation includes the writ-of-error history showing the Texas Supreme Court's disposition of the case. In this case, writ ref'd n.r.e. is an abbreviation for "writ refused, no reversible error," which means that Texas's highest court refused to grant the appellant's request to review the case, because the court did not think there was any reversible error.)

5. See, for example, MBH, Inc. v. John Otte Oil & Propane, Inc., 727 N.W.2d 238 (Neb.App.2007); and Barrand v. Whataburger, Inc., 214 S.W.3d 122 (Tex.App.—Corpus Christi 2006).

Advertisements In general, advertisements—including representations made in mail-order catalogues, price lists, and circulars—are treated not as offers to contract but as invitations to negotiate. Suppose that Loeser advertises a used paving machine. The ad is mailed to hundreds of firms and reads, "Used Loeser Construction Co. paving machine. Builds curbs and finishes cement work all in one process. Price: $42,350." If Star Paving calls Loeser and says, "We accept your offer," no contract is formed. Any reasonable person would conclude that Loeser was not promising to sell the paving machine but rather was soliciting offers to buy it. If such an ad were held to constitute a legal offer, and fifty people accepted the offer, there would be no way for Loeser to perform all fifty of the resulting contracts. He would have to breach forty-nine contracts. Obviously, the law seeks to avoid such unfairness.

Price lists are another form of invitation to negotiate or trade. A seller's price list is not an offer to sell at that price; it merely invites the buyer to offer to buy at that price. In fact, the seller usually puts "prices subject to change" on the price list. Only in rare circumstances will a price quotation be construed as an offer.⁶

Although most advertisements and the like are treated as invitations to negotiate, this does not mean that an advertisement can never be an offer. On some occasions, courts have construed advertisements to be offers because the ads contained definite terms that invited acceptance (such as an ad offering a reward for the return of a lost dog).⁷

The plaintiff in the following case argued that an ad on a Web site constituted an offer, which he accepted.

6. See, for example, Nordyne, Inc. v. International Controls & Measurements Corp., 262 F.3d 843 (8th Cir.2001).

7. The classic example is Lefkowitz v. Great Minneapolis Surplus Store, Inc., 251 Minn. 188, 86 N.W.2d 689 (1957).

CASE 11.2 Trell v. American Association of the Advancement of Science

United States District Court, Western District of New York, 2007. ___ F.Supp.2d ___.

- Background and Facts The American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) maintains Science NOW, a daily Internet news service, and publishes Science, a scholarly journal. An ad on the Science NOW Web site asks for "news tips" and states that each tip will be investigated for its suitability as an item for Science NOW or an article for Science. In response to the ad, Erik Trell, a professor and physician, submitted a manuscript in which he claimed to have solved a famous mathematical problem, popularly known as Beal's Conjecture. AAAS decided that Trell's manuscript contained neither news nor a solution to Beal's Conjecture and declined to publish it. Trell filed a suit in a federal district court against AAAS and others, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. Trell asserted, in part, that the Science NOW ad was an offer, which he accepted with his submission of a manuscript. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss this claim.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 11.2 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

JOHN T. ELFVIN, * * * D.J. [District Judge]

* * * *

* * * Resolution of this issue requires consideration of principles of contract law that are not limited to the law of any one state * * * [and] implicate questions of contract law deeply ingrained in the common law of England and the States of the Union. It is upon these principles that the Court will examine this issue.

With respect to the formation of a contract, the Court finds that the relevant facts are contained in paragraphs 26 through 28 of [Trell's] Amended Complaint. In those paragraphs, plaintiff alleges that "AAAS provides a daily news service, Science NOW, as one of its Web products," that "[i]n one of its Internet [advertisements] for [news] tips," Science NOW indicated that "its news team would investigate any tip submitted that was suitable for an item in Science NOW, and that the same might even lead to a story in the print version of defendant AAAS's Science magazine" and that in response to this advertisement, "[p]laintiff submitted his manuscript to defendant Science NOW, entitled 'Reproving Fermat's Last Theorem: also confirming Beal's and related conjectures.'"

Having reviewed the Amended Complaint, the Court finds that, upon the facts as alleged in the Amended Complaint, this claim must be dismissed because no contract was formed. Quite simply, the Court finds that the advertisement for "news tips" on the Science NOW Web site cannot be construed as an offer * * *. Statements that urge members of the general public to take some action in response thereto, as is clearly depicted in the Amended Complaint herein, are commonly characterized as advertisements. Advertisements are not offers—they invite offers. Likewise, responses to advertisements are not acceptances—they are offers. At best, it was Trell's submission of the manuscript that was the offer, which Trell clearly admits defendants declined to accept. This is the controlling law. The Court finds no distinction requiring a different analysis or result merely because the advertisement was soliciting ideas (i.e., "news tips") rather than goods, or because it was communicated over the Internet as opposed to through television, radio or newspaper advertisement. [Emphasis added.]

There is a very narrow and limited exception to this rule, but it is rarely applied and only in exceptional circumstances where the advertisement clearly communicates an offer that is definite, explicit and leaves nothing open for negotiation. There is nothing alleged in the Amended Complaint which could reasonably be construed to apply this exception.

● Decision and Remedy The court granted the defendants' motion and dismissed the plaintiff's complaint. Science NOW's ad for "news tips" was not an offer, but an invitation for offers.

● The Ethical Dimension Besides breach of contract, Trell charged the defendants with fraud, misappropriation of property, breach of fiduciary duty, unfair competition, conversion, and conspiracy with intent to defraud. What might have been Trell's motivation for all of these charges? Is this a reasonable basis for a lawsuit? Discuss.

● The E-Commerce Dimension Should the court have made an exception to the rule applied in this case because the ad was posted on the Internet? Why or why not?

Auctions In an auction, a seller "offers" goods for sale through an auctioneer, but this is not an offer to form a contract. Rather, it is an invitation asking bidders to submit offers. In the context of an auction, a bidder is the offeror, and the auctioneer is the offeree. The offer is accepted when the auctioneer strikes the hammer. Before the fall of the hammer, a bidder may revoke (take back) her or his bid, or the auctioneer may reject that bid or all bids. Typically, an auctioneer will reject a bid that is below the price the seller is willing to accept.

When the auctioneer accepts a higher bid, he or she rejects all previous bids. Because rejection terminates an offer (as will be discussed later), those bids represent offers that have been terminated. Thus, if the highest bidder withdraws his or her bid before the hammer falls, none of the previous bids is reinstated. If the bid is not withdrawn or rejected, the contract is formed when the auctioneer announces, “Going once, going twice, sold!” (or something similar) and lets the hammer fall.

Traditionally, auctions have been referred to as either “with reserve” or “without reserve.” In an auction with reserve, the seller (through the auctioneer) may withdraw the goods at any time before the auctioneer closes the sale by announcement or by the fall of the hammer. All auctions are assumed to be auctions with reserve unless the terms of the auction are explicitly stated to be without reserve. In an auction without reserve, the goods cannot be withdrawn by the seller and must be sold to the highest bidder. In auctions with reserve, the seller may reserve the right to confirm or reject the sale even after “the hammer has fallen.” In this situation, the seller is obligated to notify those attending the auction that sales of goods made during the auction are not final until confirmed by the seller.⁸

Definiteness of Terms

The second requirement for an effective offer involves the definiteness of its terms. An offer must have terms that are reasonably definite so that, if it is accepted and a contract formed, a court can determine if a breach has occurred and can provide an appropriate remedy. The specific terms required depend, of course, on the type of contract. Generally, a contract must include the following terms, either expressed in the contract or capable of being reasonably inferred from it:

1. The identification of the parties.
2. The identification of the object or subject matter of the contract (also the quantity, when appropriate), including the work to be performed, with specific identification of such items as goods, services, and land.
3. The consideration to be paid.
4. The time of payment, delivery, or performance.

An offer may invite an acceptance to be worded in such specific terms that the contract is made definite. For example, suppose that Marcus Business Machines contacts your corporation and offers to sell “from one to ten MacCool copying machines for $1,600 each; state number desired in acceptance.” Your corporation agrees to buy two copiers. Because the quantity is specified in the acceptance, the terms are definite, and the contract is enforceable.

Courts sometimes are willing to supply a missing term in a contract when the parties have clearly manifested an intent to form a contract. If, in contrast, the parties have attempted to deal with a particular term of the contract but their expression of intent is too vague or uncertain to be given any precise meaning, the court will not supply a “reasonable” term because to do so might conflict with the intent of the parties. In other words, the court will not rewrite the contract.⁹ The following case illustrates this point.

8. These rules apply under both the common law of contracts and the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)—see UCC 2–328.

9. See Chapter 20 and UCC 2–204. Article 2 of the UCC specifies different rules relating to the definiteness of terms used in a contract for the sale of goods. In essence, Article 2 modifies general contract law by requiring less specificity.

EXTENDED CASE 11.3 Baer v. Chase

United States Court of Appeals, Third Circuit, 2004. 392 F.3d 609.

GREENBERG, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

[David] Chase, who originally was from New Jersey, but relocated to Los Angeles in 1971, is the creator, producer, writer and director of The Sopranos. Chase has numerous credits for other television productions as well. * * * Chase had worked on a number of projects involving organized crime activities based in New Jersey, including a script for “a mob boss in therapy,” a concept that, in part, would become the basis for The Sopranos.

In 1995, Chase was producing and directing a Rockford Files “movie-of-the-week” when he met Joseph Urbanczyk who was working on the set as a camera operator and temporary director of photography. * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 11.3 CONTINUED

[Through Urbanczyk, Chase met Robert] Baer, * * * a New Jersey attorney [who] recently had left his employment in the Union County Prosecutor's Office in Elizabeth, New Jersey, where he had worked for the previous six years.

* * * *

Chase, Urbanczyk and Baer met for lunch on June 20, 1995 * * * , with Baer describing his experience as a prosecutor. Baer also pitched the idea to shoot "a film or television shows about the New Jersey Mafia." At that time Baer was unaware of Chase's previous work involving mob activity premised in New Jersey. At the lunch there was no reference to any payment that Chase might make to Baer for the latter's services * * * .

In October 1995, Chase visited New Jersey for three days. During this "research visit" Baer arranged meetings for Chase with Detective Thomas Koczur, Detective Robert A. Jones, and Tony Spirito who provided Chase with information, material and personal stories about their experiences with organized crime. * * * Baer does not dispute that virtually all of the ideas and locations that he "contributed" to Chase existed in the public record.

After returning to Los Angeles, Chase sent Baer a copy of a draft of a Sopranos screenplay that he had written, which was dated December 20, 1995. Baer asserts that after he read it he called Chase and made various comments with regard to it. Baer claims that the two spoke at least four times during the following year and that he sent a letter to Chase dated February 10, 1997, discussing The Sopranos script. * * *

* * * *

Baer asserts that he and Chase orally agreed on three separate occasions that if the show became a success, Chase would "take care of" Baer, and "remunerate Baer in a manner commensurate to the true value of his services." * * *

Baer claims that on each of these occasions the parties had the same conversation in which Chase offered to pay Baer, stating "you help me; I pay you." Baer always rejected Chase's offer, reasoning that Chase would be unable to pay him "for the true value of the services Baer was rendering." Each time Baer rejected Chase's offer he did so with a counteroffer, "that I would perform the services while assuming the risk that if the show failed Chase would owe me nothing. If, however, the show succeeded he would remunerate me in a manner commensurate to the true value of my services." Baer acknowledges that this counteroffer * * * always was oral and did not include any fixed term of duration or price. * * * In fact, Chase has not paid Baer for his services.

On or about May 15, 2002, Baer filed a * * * complaint against Chase in [a federal] district court * * * [claiming among other things] * * * breach of implied contract. Eventually Chase brought a motion for summary judgment * * * . Chase claimed that the alleged contract * * * [was] too vague, ambiguous and lacking in essential terms to be enforced * * * .

The district court granted Chase's motion * * * .

* * * *

Baer predicates [bases] his contract claim on this appeal on an implied-in-fact contract * * * . The issue with respect to the implied-in-fact contract claim concerns whether Chase and Baer entered into an enforceable contract for services Baer rendered that aided in the creation and production of The Sopranos. * * *

* * * *

* * * [A] contract arises from offer and acceptance, and must be sufficiently definite so that the performance to be rendered by each party can be ascertained with reasonable certainty. Therefore parties create an enforceable contract when they agree on its essential terms and manifest an intent that the terms bind them. If parties to an agreement do not agree on one or more essential terms of the purported agreement, courts generally hold it to be unenforceable. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [The] law deems the price term, [that is,] the amount of compensation, an essential term of any contract. An agreement lacking definiteness of price, however, is not unenforceable if the parties specify a practicable method by which they can determine the amount. However, in the absence of an agreement as to the manner or method of determining compensation the purported agreement is invalid. Additionally, the duration of the contract is deemed an essential term and therefore any agreement must be sufficiently definitive to allow a court to determine the agreed upon length of the contractual relationship. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

CASE 11.3 CONTINUED

The * * * question with respect to Baer's contract claim, therefore, is whether his contract is enforceable in light of the traditional requirement of definitiveness * * *. A contract may be expressed in writing, or orally, or in acts, or partly in one of these ways and partly in others. There is a point, however, at which interpretation becomes alteration. In this case, even when all of the parties' verbal and non-verbal actions are aggregated and viewed most favorably to Baer, we cannot find a contract that is distinct and definitive enough to be enforceable.

Nothing in the record indicates that the parties agreed on how, how much, where, or for what period Chase would compensate Baer. The parties did not discuss who would determine the "true value" of Baer's services, when the "true value" would be calculated, or what variables would go into such a calculation. There was no discussion or agreement as to the meaning of "success" of The Sopranos. There was no discussion [of] how "profits" were to be defined. There was no contemplation of dates of commencement or termination of the contract. And again, nothing in Baer's or Chase's conduct, or the surrounding circumstances of the relationship, sheds light on, or answers, any of these questions. The district court was correct in its description of the contract between the parties: "The contract as articulated by the Plaintiff lacks essential terms, and is vague, indefinite and uncertain; no version of the alleged agreement contains sufficiently precise terms to constitute an enforceable contract." We therefore will affirm the district court's rejection of Baer's claim to recover under a theory of implied-in-fact contract.

QUESTIONS

1. Why must the terms of a contract be "sufficiently definite" before a court will enforce the contract?
2. What might a court consider when looking for a "sufficiently definite meaning" to make a contract term enforceable?

Communication

A third requirement for an effective offer is communication—the offer must be communicated to the offeree. Ordinarily, one cannot agree to a bargain without knowing that it exists. Suppose that Estrich advertises a reward for the return of his lost dog. Hoban, not knowing of the reward, finds the dog and returns it to Estrich. Hoban cannot recover the reward because she did not know it had been offered.¹⁰

Termination of the Offer

The communication of an effective offer to an offeree gives the offeree the power to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation (a contract) by an accepance. This power of acceptance, however, does not continue forever. It can be terminated either by action of the parties or by operation of law.

Termination by Action of the Parties

An offer can be terminated by action of the parties in any of three ways: by revocation, by rejection, or by counteroffer.

Revocation of the Offer by the Offeror

The offeror's act of withdrawing (revoking) an offer is known as revocation. Unless an offer is irrevocable (discussed shortly), the offeror usually can revoke the offer (even if he or she has promised to keep it open) as long as the revocation is communicated to the offeree before the offeree accepts. Revocation may be accomplished by express repudiation of the offer (for example, with a statement such as "I withdraw my previous offer of October 17") or by performance of acts that are inconsistent with the existence of the offer and are made known to the offeree (for example, selling the offered property to another person in the presence of the offeree).

10. A few states allow recovery of the reward, but not on contract principles. Because Estrich wanted his dog to be returned and Hoban returned it, these few states would allow Hoban to recover on the basis that it would be unfair to deny her the reward just because she did not know it had been offered.

In most states, a revocation becomes effective when the offeree or the offeree's agent (a person acting on behalf of the offeree) actually receives it. Therefore, if a letter revoking an offer is mailed on April 1 and arrives on April 3, the revocation becomes effective on April 3.

An offer made to the general public can be revoked in the same manner that the offer was originally communicated. Suppose that a department store offers a $10,000 reward to anyone providing information leading to the apprehension of the persons who burglarized the store's downtown branch. The offer is published in three local papers and four papers in neighboring communities. To revoke the offer, the store must publish the revocation in all seven of the papers in which it published the offer. The revocation is then accessible to the general public, even if some particular offeree does not know about it.

Irrevocable Offers Although most offers are revocable, some can be made irrevocable—that is, they cannot be revoked, or canceled. An option contract involves one type of irrevocable offer. Increasingly, courts also refuse to allow an offeror to revoke an offer when the offeree has changed position because of justifiable reliance on the offer. (In some circumstances, “firm offers” made by merchants may also be considered irrevocable—see the discussion of the “merchant's firm offer” in Chapter 20.)

Option Contract. An option contract is created when an offeror promises to hold an offer open for a specified period of time in return for a payment (consideration) given by the offeree. An option contract takes away the offeror's power to revoke the offer for the period of time specified in the option. If no time is specified, then a reasonable period of time is implied. For example, suppose that you are in the business of writing movie scripts. Your agent contacts the head of development at New Line Cinema and offers to sell New Line your latest movie script. New Line likes your script and agrees to pay you $25,000 for a six-month option. In this situation, you (through your agent) are the offeror, and New Line is the offeree. You cannot revoke your offer to sell New Line your script for the next six months. If after six months no contract has been formed, however, New Line loses the $25,000, and you are free to sell the script to another movie studio.

Real Estate Option Contracts. Option contracts are also frequently used in conjunction with the sale or lease of real estate. For example, you might agree with a landowner to lease a home and include in the lease contract a clause stating that you will pay $9,000 for an option to purchase the home within a specified period of time. If you decide not to purchase the home after the specified period has lapsed, you forfeit the $9,000, and the landlord is free to sell the property to another buyer.

Additionally, contracts to lease business premises often include options to renew the leases at certain intervals, such as after five years. Typically, a lease contract containing a renewal option requires notification—that is, the person leasing the premises must notify the property owner of his or her intention to exercise the renewal option within a certain number of days or months before the current lease expires.

Detrimental Reliance and Promissory Estoppel.

When the offeree justifiably relies on an offer to her or his detriment, the court may hold that this detrimental reliance makes the offer irrevocable. For example, assume that Sue Fox has rented commercial property from Luis Rivera for the past thirty-three years under a series of five-year leases. As their seventh lease nears its end, Fox tells Rivera that she is going to look at other, less expensive properties as possible sites for her business. Wanting Fox to remain a tenant, Rivera promises to reduce the rent in their next lease. In reliance on the promise, Fox continues to occupy and do business on Rivera's property and does not look at other sites. When they sit down to negotiate a new lease, however, Rivera says he has changed his mind and will increase the rent. Can he effectively revoke his promise?

Normally, he cannot, because Fox has been relying on his promise to reduce the rent. Had the promise not been made, she would have relocated her business. This is a case of detrimental reliance on a promise, which therefore cannot be revoked. In this situation, the doctrine of promissory estoppel comes into play. To estop means to bar, impede, or preclude someone from doing something. Thus, promissory estoppel means that the promisor (the offeror) is barred from revoking the offer, in this situation because the offeree has already changed her actions in reliance on the offer. We look again at the doctrine of promissory estoppel in Chapter 12 in the context of consideration.

Detrimental Reliance and Partial Performance.

Detrimental reliance can also occur when an offeree partially performs in response to an offer to form a unilateral contract. As discussed in Chapter 10, an offer to form a unilateral contract invites acceptance only by full performance; merely promising to perform does not constitute acceptance. Injustice can result if an offeree expends time and funds in partial performance, only to have the offeror revoke the offer before performance can be completed. Many courts will not allow the offeror to revoke the offer after the offeree has performed some substantial part of his or her duties.¹¹ In effect, partial performance renders the offer irrevocable, giving the original offeree reasonable time to complete performance. Of course, once the performance is complete, a unilateral contract exists.

Rejection of the Offer by the Offeree If the offeree rejects the offer, the offer is terminated. Any subsequent attempt by the offeree to accept will be construed as a new offer, giving the original offeror (now the offeree) the power of acceptance. A rejection is ordinarily accomplished by words or conduct indicating an intent not to accept the offer. As with a revocation, a rejection of an offer is effective only when it is actually received by the offeror or the offeror's agent.

Note that merely inquiring about an offer does not constitute rejection. Suppose that a friend offers to buy your PlayStation 3 for $300, and you respond, "Is that your best offer?" or "Will you pay me $375 for it?" A reasonable person would conclude that you did not reject the offer but merely made an inquiry for further consideration of the offer. You can still accept and bind your friend to the $300 purchase price. When the offeree merely inquires as to the firmness of the offer, there is no reason to presume that he or she intends to reject it.

Counteroffer by the Offeree A counteroffer is a rejection of the original offer and the simultaneous making of a new offer. Suppose that Burke offers to sell his home to Lang for $270,000. Lang responds, "Your price is too high. I'll offer to purchase your house for $250,000." Lang's response is called a counteroffer because it rejects Burke's offer to sell at $270,000 and creates a new offer by Lang to purchase the home at a price of $250,000.

At common law, the mirror image rule requires the offeree's acceptance to match the offeror's offer exactly—to mirror the offer. Any change in, or addition to, the terms of the original offer automatically terminates that offer and substitutes the counteroffer. The counteroffer, of course, need not be accepted; but if the original offeror does accept the terms of the counteroffer, a valid contract is created.¹²

Termination by Operation of Law

The power of the offeree to transform the offer into a binding, legal obligation can be terminated by operation of law through the occurrence of any of the following events:

1. Lapse of time.
2. Destruction of the specific subject matter of the offer.
3. Death or incompetence of the offeror or the offeree.
4. Supervening illegality of the proposed contract.

Lapse of Time An offer terminates automatically by law when the period of time specified in the offer has passed. For example, suppose that Alejandro offers to sell his camper to Kelly if she accepts within twenty days. Kelly must accept within the twenty-day period or the offer will lapse (terminate). The time period specified in an offer normally begins to run when the offer is actually received by the offeree, not when it is formed or sent. If the offer states that it will be left open until a particular date, then the offer will terminate at midnight on that day. When the offer is delayed (through the misdelivery of mail, for example), the period begins to run from the date the offeree would have received the offer, but only if the offeree knows or should know that the offer is delayed.¹³

If the offer does not specify a time for acceptance, the offer terminates at the end of a reasonable period of time. What constitutes a reasonable period of time depends on the subject matter of the contract, business and market conditions, and other relevant circumstances. An offer to sell farm produce, for example, will terminate sooner than an offer to sell farm equipment because farm produce is perishable and subject to greater fluctuations in market value.

Destruction of the Subject Matter An offer is automatically terminated if the specific subject

11. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 45.

12. The mirror image rule has been greatly modified in regard to sales contracts. Section 2-207 of the UCC provides that a contract is formed if the offeree makes a definite expression of acceptance (such as signing the form in the appropriate location), even though the terms of the acceptance modify or add to the terms of the original offer (see Chapter 20).

13. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 49.

matter of the offer is destroyed before the offer is accepted.¹⁴ If Johnson offers to sell his prize greyhound to Rizzo, for example, but the dog dies before Rizzo can accept, the offer is automatically terminated. Johnson does not have to tell Rizzo that the animal has died for the offer to terminate.

Death or Incompetence of the Offeror or Offeree An offeree's power of acceptance is terminated when the offeror or offeree dies or is deprived of legal capacity to enter into the proposed contract. A revocable offer is personal to both parties and cannot pass to the heirs, guardian, or estate of either. Furthermore, this rule applies whether or not the other party had notice of the death or incompetence. If the offer is irrevocable, however, the death of the offeror or offeree does not terminate the offer.¹⁵

14. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 36.

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 48. If the offer is such that it can be accepted by the performance of a series of acts, and those acts began before the offeror died, the offeree's power of acceptance is not terminated.

Supervening Illegality of the Proposed Contract A statute or court decision that makes an offer illegal automatically terminates the offer.¹⁶ For example, Lee offers to lend Kim $10,000 at an annual interest rate of 12 percent. Before Kim can accept the offer, a law is enacted that prohibits interest rates higher than 10 percent. Lee's offer is automatically terminated. (If the statute is enacted after Kim accepts the offer, a valid contract is formed, but the contract may still be unenforceable—see Chapter 13.) Concept Summary 11.1 provides a review of the ways in which an offer can be terminated.

Acceptance

Acceptance is a voluntary act by the offeree that shows assent (agreement) to the terms of an offer. The offeree's act may consist of words or conduct. The

16. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 36.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 11.1 Methods by Which an Offer Can Be Terminated

BY ACTION OF THE PARTIES

1. Revocation—Unless the offer is irrevocable, it can be revoked at any time before acceptance without liability. Revocation is not effective until received by the offeree or the offeree's agent. Some offers, such as a merchant's firm offer and option contracts, are irrevocable. Also, in some situations, an offeree's detrimental reliance and/or partial performance will cause a court to rule that the offeror cannot revoke the offer.
2. Rejection—Accomplished by words or actions that demonstrate a clear intent not to accept the offer; not effective until received by the offeror or the offeror's agent.
3. Counteroffer—A rejection of the original offer and the making of a new offer.

BY OPERATION OF LAW

1. Lapse of time—The offer terminates (a) at the end of the time period specified in the offer or (b) if no time period is stated in the offer, at the end of a reasonable time period.
2. Destruction of the subject matter—When the specific subject matter of the offer is destroyed before the offer is accepted, the offer automatically terminates.
3. Death or incompetence of the offeror or offeree—If the offeror or offeree dies or becomes incompetent, this terminates the offer (unless the offer is irrevocable).
4. Supervening illegality—When a statute or court decision makes the proposed contract illegal, the offer automatically terminates.

acceptance must be unequivocal and must be communicated to the offeror.

Unequivocal Acceptance

To exercise the power of acceptance effectively, the offeree must accept unequivocally. This is the mirror image rule previously discussed. If the acceptance is subject to new conditions or if the terms of the acceptance change the original offer, the acceptance may be deemed a counteroffer that implicitly rejects the original offer.

An acceptance may be unequivocal even though the offeree expresses dissatisfaction with the contract. For example, “I accept the offer, but I wish I could have gotten a better price” is an effective acceptance. So, too, is “I accept, but can you shave the price?” In contrast, the statement “I accept the offer but only if I can pay on ninety days’ credit” is not an unequivocal acceptance and operates as a counteroffer, rejecting the original offer.

Certain terms, when added to an acceptance, will not qualify the acceptance sufficiently to constitute rejection of the offer. Suppose that in response to an offer to sell a piano, the offeree replies, “I accept; please send a written contract.” The offeree is requesting a written contract but is not making it a condition for acceptance. Therefore, the acceptance is effective without the written contract. If the offeree replies, “I accept if you send a written contract,” however, the acceptance is expressly conditioned on the request for a writing, and the statement is not an acceptance but a counteroffer. (Notice how important each word is!)¹⁷

Silence as Acceptance

Ordinarily, silence cannot constitute acceptance, even if the offeror states, “By your silence and inaction, you will be deemed to have accepted this offer.” This general rule applies because an offeree should not be obligated to act affirmatively to reject an offer when no consideration has passed to the offeree to impose such a duty.

In some instances, however, the offeree does have a duty to speak. In these situations, her or his silence or inaction will operate as an acceptance. For example, silence may be an acceptance when an offeree takes the benefit of offered services even though he or she had an opportunity to reject them and knew that they were offered with the expectation of compensation. Suppose that Sayre watches while a stranger rakes his leaves, even though the stranger has not been asked to rake the yard. Sayre knows the stranger expects to be paid and does nothing to stop her. Here, his silence constitutes an acceptance, and an implied-in-fact contract is created (see Chapter 10). He is bound to pay a reasonable value for the stranger’s work.

Silence can also operate as acceptance when the offeree has had prior dealings with the offeror. Suppose that a business routinely receives shipments from a certain supplier and always notifies that supplier when defective goods are rejected. In this situation, silence regarding a shipment will constitute acceptance.

Communication of Acceptance

Whether the offeror must be notified of the acceptance depends on the nature of the contract. In a bilateral contract, communication of acceptance is necessary because acceptance is in the form of a promise (not performance) and the contract is formed when the promise is made (rather than when the act is performed). The offeree must communicate the acceptance to the offeror. Communication of acceptance is not necessary, however, if the offer dispenses with the requirement. Additionally, if the offer can be accepted by silence, no communication is necessary.

Because a unilateral contract calls for the full performance of some act, acceptance is usually evident, and notification is therefore unnecessary. Nevertheless, exceptions do exist, such as when the offeror requests notice of acceptance or has no way of determining whether the requested act has been performed. In addition, sometimes the law requires notice of acceptance, and thus notice is necessary.¹⁸

Mode and Timeliness of Acceptance

Acceptance in bilateral contracts must be timely. The general rule is that acceptance in a bilateral contract is timely if it is made before the offer is terminated.

18. Under UCC 2–206(1)(b), an order or other offer to buy goods for prompt shipment may be treated as an offer contemplating either a bilateral or a unilateral contract and may be accepted by either a promise to ship (bilateral contract) or actual shipment (unilateral contract). If the offer is accepted by actual shipment of the goods, the buyer must be notified of the acceptance within a reasonable period of time, or the buyer may treat the offer as having lapsed before acceptance [UCC 2–206(2)]. See also Chapter 20.

17. As noted in footnote 12, in regard to sales contracts, the UCC provides that an acceptance may still be valid even if some terms are added. The new terms are simply treated as proposed additions to the contract.

Problems may arise, though, when the parties involved are not dealing face to face. In such situations, the offeree should use an authorized mode of communication.

Acceptance takes effect, thus completing formation of the contract, at the time the offeree sends or delivers the communication via the mode expressly or impliedly authorized by the offeror. This is the so-called mailbox rule, which the majority of courts follow. Under this rule, if the authorized mode of communication is the mail, then an acceptance becomes valid when it is dispatched (placed in the control of the U.S. Postal Service)—not when it is received by the offeror.

The mailbox rule was created to prevent the confusion that arises when an offeror sends a letter of revocation but, before it arrives, the offeree sends a letter of acceptance. Thus, whereas a revocation becomes effective only when it is received by the offeree, an acceptance becomes effective on dispatch (when sent, even if it is never received), provided that an authorized means of communication is used.

The mailbox rule does not apply to instantaneous forms of communication, such as when the parties are dealing face to face, by telephone, or by fax. There is still some uncertainty in the courts as to whether e-mail should be considered an instantaneous form of communication to which the mailbox rule does not apply. If the parties have agreed to conduct transactions electronically and if the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (to be discussed in Chapter 19) applies, then e-mail is considered sent when it either leaves control of the sender or is received by the recipient. This rule takes the place of the mailbox rule when the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act applies but essentially allows an e-mail acceptance to become effective when sent (as it would if sent by U.S. mail).

Authorized Means of Acceptance A means of communicating acceptance can be expressly authorized—that is, expressly stipulated in the offer—or impliedly authorized by the facts and circumstances surrounding the situation or by law.¹⁹ An acceptance sent by means not expressly or impliedly authorized normally is not effective until it is received by the offeror.

19. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 30, provides that an offer invites acceptance “by any medium reasonable in the circumstances,” unless the offer is specific about the means of acceptance. Under Section 65, a medium is reasonable if it is one used by the offeror or one customary in similar transactions, unless the offeree knows of circumstances that would argue against the reasonableness of a particular medium (the need for speed because of rapid price changes, for example).

When an offeror specifies how acceptance should be made (for example, by overnight delivery), express authorization is said to exist, and the contract is not formed unless the offeree uses that specified mode of acceptance. Moreover, both offeror and offeree are bound in contract the moment this means of acceptance is employed. For example, Shaylee & Perkins, a Massachusetts firm, offers to sell a container of antique furniture to Leaham’s Antiques in Colorado. The offer states that Leaham’s must accept the offer via FedEx overnight delivery. The acceptance is effective (and a binding contract is formed) the moment that Leaham’s gives the overnight envelope containing the acceptance to the FedEx driver.

When the Preferred Means of Acceptance Is Not Indicated. Most offerors do not expressly specify the means by which the offeree is to accept. When the offeror does not specify expressly that the offeree is to accept by a certain means, or that the acceptance will be effective only when received, acceptance of an offer may be made by any medium that is reasonable under the circumstances.²⁰

Whether a mode of acceptance is reasonable depends on what would reasonably be expected by parties in the position of the contracting parties. Courts look at prevailing business usages and other surrounding circumstances such as the method of communication the parties have used in the past and the means that were used to convey the offer. The offeror’s choice of a particular means in making the offer implies that the offeree is authorized to use the same or a faster means for acceptance. Suppose that two parties have been negotiating a deal via fax and then the offeror sends a formal contract offer by priority mail without specifying the means of acceptance. In that situation, the offeree’s acceptance by priority mail or by fax is impliedly authorized.

When the Authorized Means of Acceptance Is Not Used. An acceptance sent by means not expressly or impliedly authorized normally is not effective until it is received by the offeror. For example, suppose that Frank Cochran is interested in buying a house from Ray Nunez. Cochran faxes an offer to Nunez that clearly specifies acceptance by fax. Nunez has to be out of town for a few days, however, and doesn’t 20. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 30. This is also the rule under UCC 2-206(1)(a).

have access to a fax machine. Therefore, Nunez sends his acceptance to Cochran via FedEx instead of by fax. In this situation, the acceptance is not effective (and no contract is formed) until Cochran receives the FedEx delivery. The use of an alternative method does not render the acceptance ineffective if the substituted method performs the same function or serves the same purpose as the authorized method.²¹

Exceptions The following are three basic exceptions to the rule that a contract is formed when an acceptance is sent by authorized means:

1. If the offeree's acceptance is not properly dispatched, in most states it will not be effective until it is received by the offeror. For example, if an e-mailed acceptance lists the recipient's e-mail address incorrectly, or if the acceptance is faxed to the wrong telephone number, it will not be effective until received by the offeror. If U.S. mail is the authorized means for acceptance, the offeree's letter must be properly addressed and have the correct postage. Nonetheless, if the acceptance is timely sent and timely received, despite the offeree's carelessness in sending it, it may still be considered to have been effective on dispatch.²²
2. If the offer stipulates when acceptance will be effective, then the offer will not be effective until the time specified. The offeror has the power to control the offer and can stipulate both the means by which the offer is accepted and the precise time that an acceptance will be effective. For example, an offer might state that acceptance will not be effective until it is received by the offeror, or it might make acceptance effective twenty-four hours after being shipped via DHL delivery.
3. Sometimes, an offeree sends a rejection first, then later changes his or her mind and sends an acceptance. Obviously, this chain of events could cause confusion and even detriment to the offeror, depending on whether the rejection or the acceptance arrived first. In such situations, the law cancels the rule of acceptance on dispatch, and the first communication received by the offeror determines whether a contract is formed. If the rejection arrives first, there is no contract.²³

For a review of the effective time of acceptance, see Concept Summary 11.2.

21. See, for example, Osprey, L.L.C. v. Kelly Moore Paint Co., 984 P.2d 194 (Okla. 1999).

22. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 67.

23. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 40.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 11.2

Effective Time of Acceptance

Acceptance

BY AUTHORIZED MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

Time Effective

Effective at the time communication is sent (deposited in a mailbox or delivered to a courier service) via the mode expressly or impliedly authorized by the offeror (mailbox rule).

Exceptions:

1. If the acceptance is not properly dispatched, it will not be effective until received by the offeror.
2. If the offeror specifically conditioned the offer on receipt of acceptance, it will not be effective until received by the offeror.
3. If acceptance is sent after rejection, whichever is received first is given effect.

BY UNAUTHORIZED MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

Effective on receipt of acceptance by the offeror (if timely received, it is considered to have been effective on dispatch).

Technology and Acceptance Rules

Clearly, some of the traditional rules governing acceptance do not seem to apply to an age in which acceptances are commonly delivered via e-mail, fax, or other delivery system, such as FedEx or DHL. For example, when accepting an online offer, the mailbox rule does not apply to online acceptances, which typically are communicated instantaneously to the offeror. Nonetheless, the traditional rules—and the principles that underlie those rules—provide a basis for understanding what constitutes a valid acceptance in today's online environment. This is because, as in other areas of the law, much of the law governing online offers and acceptances has been adapted from traditional law to a new context.

Although online offers are not significantly different from traditional offers contained in paper documents, online acceptances have posed some unusual problems for the court. These problems, as well as other aspects of e-contracting, will be discussed in detail in Chapter 19.

REVIEWING Agreement

Shane Durbin wanted to have a recording studio custom-built in his home. He sent invitations to a number of local contractors to submit bids on the project. Rory Amstel submitted the lowest bid, which was $20,000 less than any of the other bids Durbin received. Durbin called Amstel to ascertain the type and quality of the materials that were included in the bid and to find out if he could substitute a superior brand of acoustic tiles for the same bid price. Amstel said he would have to check into the price difference. The parties also discussed a possible start date for construction. Two weeks later, Durbin changed his mind and decided not to go forward with his plan to build a recording studio. Amstel filed a suit against Durbin for breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Amstel's bid meet the requirements of an offer? Explain.
2. Was there an acceptance of the offer? Why or why not?
3. Suppose that the court determines that the parties did not reach an agreement. Further suppose that Amstel, in anticipation of building Durbin's studio, had purchased materials and refused other jobs so that he would have time in his schedule for Durbin's project. Under what theory discussed in the chapter might Amstel attempt to recover these costs?
4. How is an offer terminated? Assuming that Durbin did not inform Amstel that he was rejecting the offer, was the offer terminated at any time described here? Explain.

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

acceptance 242
agreement 232

counteroffer 241
estop 240
mailbox rule 244 mirror image rule 241 mutual assent 232

offer 232
option contract 240
promissory estoppel 240
revocation 239

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

11-1. Ball writes to Sullivan and inquires how much Sullivan is asking for a specific forty-acre tract of land Sullivan owns. In a letter received by Ball, Sullivan states, "I will not take less than $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Ball immediately sends Sullivan a telegram stating, "I accept your offer for $60,000 for the forty-acre tract as specified." Discuss whether Ball can hold Sullivan to a contract for the sale of the land.

11-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Schmidt, operating a sole proprietorship, has a large piece of used farm equipment for sale. He offers to sell the equipment to Barry for $10,000. Discuss the legal effects of the following events on the offer:

- Schmidt dies prior to Barry's acceptance, and at the time he accepts, Barry is unaware of Schmidt's death.
- The night before Barry accepts, fire destroys the equipment.
- Barry pays $100 for a thirty-day option to purchase the equipment. During this period, Schmidt dies, and later Barry accepts the offer, knowing of Schmidt's death.
- Barry pays $100 for a thirty-day option to purchase the equipment. During this period, Barry dies, and Barry's estate accepts Schmidt's offer within the stipulated time period.

• For a sample answer to Question 11-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

11-3. Perez sees an advertisement in the newspaper indicating that the ABC Corp. is offering for sale a two-volume set of books, How to Make Repairs around the House, for $39.95. All Perez has to do is send in a card requesting delivery of the books for a thirty-day trial period. If he does not ship the books back within thirty days of delivery, ABC will bill him for $39.95. Discuss whether Perez and ABC have a contract under either of the following circumstances:

- Perez sends in the card and receives the books in the U.S. mail. He uses the books to make repairs and fails to return them within thirty days.
- Perez does not send in the card, but ABC sends him the books anyway through the U.S. mail. Perez uses the books and fails to return them within thirty days.

11-4. On Thursday, Dennis mailed a letter to Tanya's office offering to sell his car to her for $3,000. On Saturday, having changed his mind, Dennis sent a fax to Tanya's office revoking his offer. Tanya did not go to her office over the weekend and thus did not learn about the revocation until Monday morning, just a few minutes after she had mailed a letter of acceptance to Dennis. When Tanya demanded that Dennis sell his car to her as promised, Dennis claimed that no contract existed because he had revoked his offer prior to Tanya's acceptance. Is Dennis correct? Explain.

11-5. Definiteness of Terms. Southwick Homes, Ltd., develops and markets residential subdivisions. William McLinden and Ronald Coco are the primary owners of Southwick Homes. Coco is also the president of Mutual Development Co. Whiteco Industries, Inc., wanted to develop lots and sell homes in Schullien Woods, a subdivision in Crown Point, Indiana. In September 1996, Whiteco sent McLinden a letter enlisting Southwick Homes to be the project manager for developing and marketing the finished lots (lots where roads had been built and on which utility installation and connections to water and sewer lines were complete); the letter set out the roles and expectations of each of the parties, including the terms of payment. In October 1997, Whiteco sent Coco a letter naming Mutual Development the developer and general contractor for the houses to be built on the finished lots. A few months later, Coco told McLinden that he would not share in the profits from the construction of the houses. McLinden and others filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Coco and others, claiming, in part, a breach of fiduciary duty. The defendants responded that the letter to McLinden lacked such essential terms as to render it unenforceable. What terms must an agreement include to be an enforceable contract? Did the letter sent to McLinden include these terms? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain. [McLinden v. Coco, 765 N.E.2d 606 (Ind.App. 2002)]

11-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

The Pittsburgh Board of Public Education in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, as required by state law, keeps lists of eligible teachers in order of their rank or standing. According to an "Eligibility List" form made available to applicants, no one may be hired to teach whose name is not within the top 10 percent of the names on the list. In 1996, Anna Reed was in the top 10 percent. She was not hired that year, although four other applicants who placed lower on the list—and not within the top 10 percent—were hired. In 1997 and 1998, Reed was again in the top 10 percent, but she was not hired until 1999. Reed filed a suit in a federal district court against the board and others. She argued, in part, that the state's requirement that the board keep a list constituted an offer, which she accepted by participating in the process to be placed on that list. She claimed that the board breached this contract by hiring applicants who ranked lower than she did. The case was transferred to a Pennsylvania state court. What are the requirements of an offer? Do the circumstances in this case meet those requirements? Why or why not? [Reed v. Pittsburgh Board of Public Education, 862 A.2d 131 (Pa.Cmwlt. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 11-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 11," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

11-7. Intention. Music that is distributed on compact discs and similar media generates income in the form of "mechanical" royalties. Music that is publicly performed, such as when a song is played on a radio, included in a movie or commercial, or sampled in another song, produces "performance" royalties. Each of these types of royalties is divided between the songwriter and the song's publisher. Vincent Cusano is a musician and songwriter who performed under the name "Vinnie Vincent" as a guitarist with the group KISS in the early 1980s. Cusano co-wrote three songs entitled "Killer," "I Love It Loud," and "I Still Love You" that KISS recorded and released in 1982 on an album titled Creatures of the Night. Cusano left KISS in 1984. Eight years later, Cusano sold to Horipro Entertainment Group "one hundred (100%) percent undivided interest" of his rights in the songs "other than Songwriter's share of performance income." Later, Cusano filed a suit in a federal district court against Horipro, claiming, among other things, that he never intended to sell the writer's share of the mechanical royalties. Horipro filed a motion for summary judgment. Should the court grant the motion? Explain. [Cusano v. Horipro Entertainment Group, 301 F.Supp.2d 272 (S.D.N.Y. 2004)]

11-8. Agreement. In 2000, David and Sandra Harless leased 2.3 acres of real property at 2801 River Road S.E. in Winnabow, North Carolina, to their son-in-law and daughter, Tony and Jeanie Connor. The Connors planned to operate a "general store/variety store" on the premises. They agreed to lease the property for sixty months with an option to renew for an additional sixty months. The lease included an option to buy the property for "fair market value at the time of such purchase (based on at least two appraisals)." In March 2003, Tony told David that the Connors wanted to buy the property. In May, Tony gave David an appraisal that estimated the property's value at $140,000. In July, the Connors presented a second appraisal that determined the value to be $160,000. The Connors offered $150,000. The Harlesses replied that "under no circumstances would they ever agree to sell their old store building and approximately 2.5 acres to their daughter . . . and their son-in-law." The Connors filed a suit in a North Carolina state court against the Harlesses, alleging breach of contract. Did these parties have a contract to sell the property? If so, what were its terms? If not, why not? [Connor v. Harless, 176 N.C.App. 402, 626 S.E.2d 755 (2006)]

11-9. Offer. In August 2000, in California, Terry Reigelsperger sought treatment for pain in his lower back from chiropractor James Siller. Reigelsperger felt better after the treatment and did not intend to return for more, although he did not mention this to Siller.

Before leaving the office, Reigelsperger signed an "informed consent" form that read, in part, "I intend this consent form to cover the entire course of treatment for my present condition and for any future condition(s) for which I seek treatment." He also signed an agreement that required the parties to submit to arbitration "any dispute as to medical malpractice. . . . This agreement is intended to bind the patient and the health care provider . . . who now or in the future treat[s] the patient." Two years later, Reigelsperger sought treatment from Siller for a different condition relating to his cervical spine and shoulder. Claiming malpractice with respect to the second treatment, Reigelsperger filed a suit in a California state court against Siller. Siller asked the court to order the dispute to be submitted to arbitration. Did Reigelsperger's lack of intent to return to Siller after his first treatment affect the enforceability of the arbitration agreement and consent form? Why or why not? [Reigelsperger v. Siller, 40 Cal.4th 574, 150 P.3d 764, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 887 (2007)]

11-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 1980, Kenneth McMillan and his associate in a dental practice obtained life insurance policies that designated each the beneficiary of the other. They set up automatic withdrawals from their bank accounts to pay the premiums. Later, Laurence Hibbard joined the practice, which was renamed Bentley, McMillan and Hibbard, P.C. (professional corporation), or BMH. When the three terminated their business relationship in 2003, McMillan sold his BMH stock to Hibbard. But Hibbard did not pay, and McMillan obtained a judgment against him for $52,972.74. When Hibbard still did not pay, McMillan offered him a choice. In lieu of paying the judgment, Hibbard could take over the premiums on Bentley's insurance policy or "cash" it in. Either way, the policy's proceeds would be used to pay off loans against the policy—which McMillan had arranged—and Hibbard would accept responsibility for any unpaid amount. Hibbard signed the agreement but did not make a choice between the two options. McMillan filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Hibbard, seeking reimbursement for the premiums paid since their agreement. [Hibbard v. McMillan, 284 Ga.App. 753, 645 S.E.2d 356 (2007)]

- McMillan asked the court to award him attorneys' fees because Hibbard had been "stubbornly litigious," forcing McMillan to litigate to enforce their agreement. Should the court grant this request? Are there any circumstances in which Hibbard's failure to choose between McMillan's options would be justified? Explain.
- Generally, parties are entitled to contract on their own terms without the courts' intervention. Under the principles discussed in this chapter, what are some of the limits to this freedom? Do any of these limits apply to the agreement between McMillan and Hibbard? Why or why not?

11-11. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 11." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Offer and Acceptance. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) On the video, Vinny indicates that he can't sell his car to Oscar for four thousand dollars and then says, "maybe five . . ." Discuss whether Vinny has made an offer or a counteroffer.
- (b) Oscar then says to Vinny, "Okay, I'll take it. But you gotta let me pay you four thousand now and the other thousand in two weeks." According to the chapter, do Oscar and Vinny have an agreement? Why or why not?
- (c) When Maria later says to Vinny, "I'll take it," has she accepted an offer? Why or why not?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

To learn what kinds of clauses are included in typical contracts for certain goods and services, you can explore the collection of contract forms made available by FindLaw at forms.lp.findlaw.com

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 11" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 11-1: Legal Perspective
Contract Terms

Internet Exercise 11-2: Management Perspective
Sample Contracts

Internet Exercise 11-3: Ethical Perspective Offers and Advertisements

CHAPTER 12

Consideration

The fact that a promise has been made does not mean the promise can or will be enforced. Under Roman law, a promise was not enforceable without some sort of causa—that is, a reason for making the promise that was also deemed to be a sufficient reason for enforcing it. Under the common law, a primary basis for the enforcement of promises is consideration. Consideration is usually defined as the value (such as cash) given in return for a promise (such as the promise to sell a stamp collection on receipt of payment) or in return for a performance.

Elements of Consideration

Often, consideration is broken down into two parts: (1) something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for the promise; and (2) usually, there must be a bargained-for exchange.

Legal Value

The “something of legally sufficient value” may consist of (1) a promise to do something that one has no prior legal duty to do, (2) the performance of an action that one is otherwise not obligated to undertake, or (3) the refraining from an action that one has a legal right to undertake (called a forbearance). Consideration in bilateral contracts normally consists of a promise in return for a promise, as explained in Chapter 10. For example, suppose that in a contract for the sale of goods, the seller promises to ship specific goods to the buyer, and the buyer promises to pay for those goods when they are received. Each of these promises constitutes consideration for the contract.

In contrast, unilateral contracts involve a promise in return for a performance. Suppose that Anita says to her neighbor, “When you finish painting the garage, I will pay you $100.” Anita’s neighbor paints the garage. The act of painting the garage is the consideration that creates Anita’s contractual obligation to pay her neighbor $100.

What if, in return for a promise to pay, a person refrains from pursuing harmful habits (a forbearance), such as the use of tobacco and alcohol? Does such forbearance constitute legally sufficient consideration? This was the issue before the court in the following case, which is one of the classics in contract law with respect to consideration.

CASE 12.1 Hamer v. Sidway

Court of Appeals of New York, Second Division, 1891. 124 N.Y. 538, 27 N.E. 256.

- Background and Facts William E. Story, Sr., was the uncle of William E. Story II. In the presence of family members and guests invited to a family gathering, the elder Story promised to pay his nephew $5,000 ($72,000 in today's dollars) if he would refrain from drinking, using tobacco, swearing, and playing cards or billiards for money until he reached the age of twenty-one. (Note that in 1869, when this contract was formed, it was legal in New York to drink and play cards for money prior to the age of twenty-one.) The nephew agreed and fully performed his part of the bargain. When he reached the age of twenty-one, he wrote and told his uncle that he had kept his part of the agreement and was therefore entitled to $5,000. The uncle replied that he was pleased with his nephew's performance, writing, "I have no doubt but you have, for which you shall have five thousand dollars, as I promised you. I had the money in the bank the day you was twenty-one years old that I intend for you, and you shall have the money certain. . . . P.S. You can consider this money on interest." The nephew received his uncle's letter and thereafter consented that the money should remain with his uncle according to the terms and conditions of the letter. The uncle died about twelve years later without having paid his nephew any part of the $5,000 and interest. The executor of the uncle's estate (Sidway, the defendant in this action) claimed that there had been no valid consideration for the promise and therefore refused to pay the $5,000 (plus interest) to Hamer, a third party to whom the nephew had transferred his rights in the note. The court reviewed the case to determine whether the nephew had given valid consideration under the law.

CHAPTER 12 Consideration

CASE 12.1 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
PARKER, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * *

* * * Courts will not ask whether the thing which forms the consideration does in fact benefit the promisee or a third party, or is of any substantial value to any one. It is enough that something is promised, done, forbore, or suffered by the party to whom the promise is made as consideration for the promise made to him. In general a waiver of any legal right at the request of another party is a sufficient consideration for a promise. Any damage, or suspension, or forbearance of a right will be sufficient to sustain a promise. * * * Now, applying this rule to the facts before us, the promisee used tobacco, occasionally drank liquor, and he had a legal right to do so. That right he abandoned for a period of years upon the strength of the promise of the testator [his uncle] that for such forbearance he would give him $5,000. We need not speculate on the effort which may have been required to give up the use of those stimulants. It is sufficient that he restricted his lawful freedom of action within certain prescribed limits upon the faith of his uncle's agreement * * *. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy The court ruled that the nephew had provided legally sufficient consideration by giving up smoking, drinking, swearing, and playing cards or billiards for money until he reached the age of twenty-one and was therefore entitled to the money.

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law Although this case was decided more than a century ago, the principles enunciated in the case remain applicable to contracts formed today, including online contracts. For a contract to be valid and binding, consideration must be given, and that consideration must be something of legally sufficient value.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If the nephew had not had a legal right to engage in the behavior that he agreed to forgo, would the result in this case have been different? Explain.

Bargained-for Exchange

The second element of consideration is that it must provide the basis for the bargain struck between the contracting parties. The promise given by the promisor (offeror) must induce the promisee (offeree) to offer a return promise, a performance, or a forbearance, and the promisee's promise, performance, or forbearance must induce the promisor to make the promise.

This element of bargained-for exchange distinguishes contracts from gifts. For example, suppose that Paloma says to her son, "In consideration of the fact that you are not as wealthy as your brothers, I will pay you $5,000." The fact that the word consideration is used does not, by itself, mean that consideration has been given. Indeed, this is not an enforceable promise because the son does not have to do anything in order to receive the promised $5,000.¹ The son need not give Paloma something of legal value in return for her promise, and the promised $5,000 does not involve a bargained-for exchange. Rather, Paloma has simply stated her motive for giving her son a gift.

1. See Fink v. Cox, 18 Johns. 145, 9 Am. Dec. 191 (N.Y. 1820).

Does asking a bank for change for a $50 or $100 bill initiate a bargained-for exchange? The bank in the following case argued that obtaining change is not a contractual transaction because there is no consideration.

CASE 12.2 Barfield v. Commerce Bank, N.A.^a United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit, 2007. 484 F.3d 1276.

www.kscourts.org/ca10^b

• Background and Facts Chris Barfield, an African American man, entered a branch of Commerce Bank, N.A., in Wichita, Kansas, and requested change for a $50 bill. He was refused change on the ground that he did not have an account with the bank. The next day, Chris Barfield's father, James Barfield, asked a white friend, John Polson, to make the same request at the bank. The teller gave Polson change without asking whether he had an account. A few minutes later, James Barfield entered the bank, asked for change for a $100 bill, and was told that he could not be given change unless he was an account holder. The Barfields filed a suit in a federal district court against Commerce Bank, alleging discrimination on the basis of race in the impairment of their ability to contract. The court granted the bank's motion to dismiss the suit for failure to state a claim. The Barfields appealed this ruling to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

McCONNELL, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

Originally enacted in the wake of the Civil War, [42 U.S.C.] Section 1981(a) states:

All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts * * * as is enjoyed by white citizens * * * .

As part of the Civil Rights Act of 1991, Congress added part b to the statute: "For purposes of this section, the term 'make and enforce contracts' includes the making, performance, modification, and termination of contracts, and the enjoyment of all benefits, privileges, terms, and conditions of the contractual relationship." The purpose of part b was to expand the statute to encompass all phases and incidents of the contractual relationship.

* * * *

All courts to have addressed the issue have held that a customer's offer to do business in a retail setting qualifies as a phase and incident of the contractual relationship * * * . [W]hen a merchant denies service or outright refuses to engage in business with a consumer attempting to contract with the merchant, that is a violation of Section 1981.

The question, then, is whether the Barfields' proposal to exchange money at a bank is a contract offer in the same way as an offer to purchase doughnuts or apple juice. The claim made by the appellees [Commerce Bank], and accepted by the district court, is that the Barfields' proposed exchange was not a contract because it involved no consideration: "The bank would not have received any benefit or incurred a detriment if it had agreed to change the Barfields' bills." That reasoning, however, departs in several significant ways from our understanding of contract law.

* * * A contract must be supported by consideration in order to be enforceable. Consideration is defined as some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility, given, suffered, or undertaken by the other. A promise is without consideration when the promise is given by one party to another without anything being bargained for and given in exchange for it. [Emphasis added.]

In the most straightforward sense, the transaction proposed by the Barfields was a contract of exchange: they would give up something of value (a large-denomination bill) in exchange for something they valued more (smaller-denomination bills). It is hard to see why this is not a con-

a. N.A. is an abbreviation for National Association.

b. In the first paragraph, click on "plaintiff/defendant case name." In the result, scroll through the list to the name of the case and click on it to access the opinion. Washburn University School of Law Library in Topeka, Kansas, maintains this Web site.

CASE 12.2 CONTINUED

tract. If two boys exchange marbles, their transaction is a contract, even if it is hard for outsiders to fathom why either preferred the one or the other. Consideration does not need to have a quantifiable financial value * * * . [Emphasis added.]

The Bank, however, argues that the proposed exchange was not a contract because it received no remuneration for performing the service of bill exchange. In other words, rather than view the transaction as an exchange of one thing for another, the Bank urges us to treat the transaction as a gratuitous service provided by the Bank, for no consideration. We cannot regard the Bank's provision of bill exchange services as "gratuitous" in any legal sense. Profit-making establishments often offer to engage in transactions with no immediate gain, or even at a loss, as a means of inducing customers to engage in other transactions that are more lucrative; such offers may nonetheless be contractual, and they do not lack consideration. If, as is alleged in the complaint, the Bank effectively extends bill exchange services to persons of one race and not the other, that is sufficient to come within the ambit [realm] of Section 1981.

- Decision and Remedy The court reversed the lower court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' complaint and remanded the case "for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion." There is consideration in an exchange of paper money as there can be in any other bargained-for exchange.

- The Ethical Dimension In most circumstances, parties are free to make whatever promises they wish, but only those promises made with consideration will be enforced as contracts. What is the purpose of this requirement?

- The Legal Environment Dimension The courts generally do not weigh the sufficiency of consideration according to the comparative economic value of what is exchanged. Should they? Why or why not?

Adequacy of Consideration

Legal sufficiency of consideration involves the requirement that consideration be something of legally sufficient value in the eyes of the law. Adequacy of consideration involves "how much" consideration is given. Essentially, adequacy of consideration concerns the fairness of the bargain.

Courts Typically Will Not Consider Adequacy

On the surface, when the items exchanged are of unequal value, fairness would appear to be an issue. In general, however, a court will not question the adequacy of consideration based solely on the comparative value of the things exchanged. In other words, the determination of whether consideration exists does not depend on a comparison of the values of the things exchanged. Something need not be of direct economic or financial value to be considered legally sufficient consideration. In many situations, the exchange of promises and potential benefits is deemed sufficient as consideration.

Under the doctrine of freedom of contract, courts leave it up to the parties to decide what something is worth, and the parties are normally free to make bad bargains. If people could sue merely because they had entered into an unwise contract, the courts would be overloaded with frivolous suits.

Evidence of Grossly Inadequate Consideration

When there is a gross disparity in the amount or value of the consideration exchanged, the inadequate consideration may raise a red flag for a court to look more closely at the bargain. This is because shockingly inadequate consideration can indicate that fraud, duress, or undue influence was involved or that the element of bargained-for exchange was lacking.

Judges are uneasy about enforcing unequal bargains, and it is the courts' task to police contracts and make sure that there was not some defect in a contract's formation that negates mutual assent. If an elderly person sells her Mercedes-Benz convertible to her neighbor for $5,000 even though it is worth well over $50,000, the disparity in value may indicate that the sale involved undue influence or fraud. When the consideration is grossly inadequate, a court may also declare the contract unenforceable because it is unconscionable,² which generally means that the contract is so one sided under the circumstances as to be clearly unfair.³ (Unconscionability will be discussed further in Chapter 13.)

Agreements That Lack Consideration

Sometimes, one of the parties (or both parties) to an agreement may think that consideration has been exchanged when in fact it has not. Here, we look at some situations in which the parties' promises or actions do not qualify as contractual consideration.

Preexisting Duty

Under most circumstances, a promise to do what one already has a legal duty to do does not constitute legally sufficient consideration.⁴ The preexisting legal duty may be imposed by law or may arise out of a previous contract. A sheriff, for example, cannot collect a reward for providing information leading to the capture of a criminal if the sheriff already has a legal duty to capture the criminal.

Likewise, if a party is already bound by contract to perform a certain duty, that duty cannot serve as consideration for a second contract.⁵ For example, suppose that Bauman-Bache, Inc., begins construction on a seven-story office building and after three months demands an extra $75,000 on its contract. If the extra $75,000 is not paid, the contractor will stop working. The owner of the land, having no one else to complete the construction, agrees to pay the extra $75,000. The agreement is unenforceable because it is not supported by legally sufficient consideration; Bauman-Bache was bound by a preexisting contract to complete the building.

Unforeseen Difficulties The rule regarding preexisting duty is meant to prevent extortion and the so-called holdup game. What happens, though, when an honest contractor who has contracted with a landowner to construct a building runs into extraordinary difficulties that were totally unforeseen at the time the contract was formed? In the interests of fairness and equity, the courts sometimes allow exceptions to the preexisting duty rule. In the example just mentioned, if the landowner agrees to pay extra compensation to the contractor for overcoming unforeseen difficulties, the court may refrain from applying the preexisting duty rule and enforce the agreement. When the "unforeseen difficulties" that give rise to a contract modification involve the types of risks ordinarily assumed in business, however, the courts will usually assert the preexisting duty rule.⁶

Rescission and New Contract The law recognizes that two parties can mutually agree to rescind, or cancel, their contract, at least to the extent that it is executory (still to be carried out). Rescission⁷ is the unmaking of a contract so as to return the parties to the positions they occupied before the contract was made. Sometimes, parties rescind a contract and make a new contract at the same time. When this occurs, it is often difficult to determine whether there was consideration for the new contract, or whether the parties had a preexisting duty under the previous contract. If a court finds there was a preexisting duty, then the new contract will be invalid because there was no consideration.

Past Consideration

Promises made in return for actions or events that have already taken place are unenforceable. These promises lack consideration in that the element of bargained-for exchange is missing. In short, you can bargain for something to take place now or in the future but not for something that has already taken place. Therefore, past consideration is no consideration.

Suppose, for example, that Elsie, a real estate agent, does her friend Judy a favor by selling Judy's house and not charging any commission. Later, Judy says to Elsie, "In return for your generous act, I will pay you $3,000." This promise is made in return for past consideration and is thus unenforceable; in effect, Judy is stating her intention to give Elsie a gift.

Is a party's suggestion that a professional athlete use a certain nickname for marketing products sufficient consideration for the athlete's later promise to pay the party a portion of the profits? That was the question in the following case.

2. Pronounced un-kon-shun-uh-bul.

3. See, for example, Rissett v. W.B. Doner & Co., 293 F3d 164 (4th Cir.2002).

4. See Foakes v. Beer, 9 App.Cas. 605 (1884); and Coburn v. Whatmusic Holdings, Ltd., 2003 WL 22073940 (Chan. Div.).

5. See, for example, Braude & Margulies, P.C. v. Fireman's Fund Insurance Co., 468 FSupp.2d 190 (D.D.C.2007).

6. Note that under Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), an agreement modifying a contract needs no consideration to be binding. See UCC 2-209(1).

7. Pronounced reh-sih-zhen.

EXTENDED
CASE 12.3
Blackmon v. Iverson

United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, 2003. 324 F.Supp.2d 602.

McLAUGHLIN, District Judge.

* * * *

* * * [Jamil] Blackmon met [Allen] Iverson and his family in 1987. At that time, Mr. Iverson was a young high school student who showed tremendous promise as an athlete. * * * At various times in their friendship, Mr. Blackmon provided Mr. Iverson and his family with financial support * * * and provided other support to Mr. Iverson * * * .

In July of 1994, Mr. Blackmon suggested that Mr. Iverson use “The Answer” as a nickname in the summer league basketball tournaments in which Mr. Iverson would be playing. Mr. Blackmon told Mr. Iverson that Mr. Iverson would be “The Answer” to all of the National Basketball Association’s (“NBA’s”) woes. Mr. Blackmon and Mr. Iverson also discussed the fact that the nickname “The Answer” had immediate applications as a label, brand name, or other type of marketing slogan for use in connection with clothing, sports apparel, and sneakers. The parties also discussed using “The Answer” as a logo.

Later that evening, Mr. Iverson promised to give Mr. Blackmon twenty-five percent of all proceeds [from] the merchandising of products sold in connection with the term “The Answer.” * * *

Mr. Blackmon thereafter began to invest significant time, money, and effort in the refinement of the concept of “The Answer.” * * *

* * * *

In 1996, just prior to the NBA draft, during which Mr. Iverson was drafted by the Philadelphia 76ers, Mr. Iverson advised Mr. Blackmon that Mr. Iverson intended to use the phrase “The Answer” in connection with a contract with Reebok for merchandising of athletic shoes and sports apparel. * * *

* * * *

Many months later, Reebok began manufacturing, marketing, and selling a line of athletic sportswear and sneakers using and incorporating “The Answer” slogan and logo. * * *

* * * *

* * * [D]uring the 1997–1998 season, Mr. Iverson persuaded Mr. Blackmon to relocate to Philadelphia * * * .

* * * *

Reebok has continued to sell products bearing “The Answer” slogan and Mr. Iverson has continued to receive profits from the sale of products bearing “The Answer” slogan. Despite repeated requests and demands from Mr. Blackmon, Mr. Iverson has never compensated Mr. Blackmon * * * [with] proceeds from the merchandising of [these] products * * * .

[Blackmon filed a suit in a federal district court against Iverson, alleging, among other things, breach of contract.] * * * [T]he plaintiff conceded that his graphics were not incorporated into any of Reebok’s products * * * .

* * * *

The plaintiff claims that he entered into an express contract with the defendant pursuant to which he was to receive twenty-five percent of the proceeds that the defendant received from marketing products with “The Answer” on them. The defendant [filed a motion to dismiss] * * * .

* * * *

Under [the] law, a plaintiff must present clear and precise evidence of an agreement in which both parties manifested an intent to be bound, for which both parties gave consideration, and which contains sufficiently definite terms. [Emphasis added.]

Consideration confers a benefit upon the promisor or causes a detriment to the promisee and must be an act, forbearance, or return promise bargained for and given in exchange for the original promise. Under [the] law, past consideration is insufficient to support a subsequent promise. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The plaintiff has argued that, in exchange for the defendant’s promise to pay the twenty-five percent, the plaintiff gave three things as consideration: (1) the plaintiff’s idea to use “The Answer” as a nickname to sell athletic apparel; (2) the plaintiff's assistance to and relationship with the defendant and his family; and (3) the plaintiff's move to Philadelphia.

CASE 12.3 CONTINUED

According to the facts alleged by the plaintiff, he made the suggestion that the defendant use "The Answer" as a nickname and for product merchandising one evening in 1994. This was before the defendant first promised to pay; according to the plaintiff, the promise to pay was made later that evening. The disclosure of the idea also occurred before the defendant told the plaintiff that he was going to use the idea in connection with the Reebok contract in 1996, and before the sales of goods bearing "The Answer" actually began in 1997.

Regardless of whether the contract was formed in 1994, 1996, or 1997, the disclosure of "The Answer" idea had already occurred and was, therefore, past consideration insufficient to create a binding contract.

* * * *

According to the complaint, the plaintiff's relationship and support for the defendant, * * * began in 1987, seven years before the first alleged promise to pay was made. There is no allegation that the plaintiff began engaging in this conduct because of any promise by the defendant, or that the plaintiff continued his gratuitous conduct in 1994, 1996, or 1997 in exchange for the promise to pay. These actions are not valid consideration.

The plaintiff also alleged at oral argument that his move to Philadelphia during the 1997–1998 season was consideration for the promise to pay. If the parties reached a mutual agreement in 1994, the plaintiff has not properly alleged that the move was consideration * * * .

Nor is there any allegation that the move was part of the terms of any contract created in 1996 or 1997. The complaint states only that the defendant "persuaded" him to move to Philadelphia to "begin seeking the profits from his ideas." Even when the complaint is construed broadly, there is no allegation that the move was required in exchange for any promise by the defendant to pay. In the absence of valid consideration, the plaintiff has no claim for breach of an express contract.

* * * *

* * * IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the [defendant's] motion is GRANTED and the plaintiff's * * * complaint is DISMISSED * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. What might Blackmon have done to secure payment for Iverson's use of "The Answer" as a nickname before that use became valuable?
2. Suppose that only five minutes had elapsed between Blackmon's suggestion that Iverson use "The Answer" as a marketing slogan and Iverson's promise to give Blackmon a part of the proceeds. Would the ruling in this case have been any different? Why or why not?

Illusory Promises

If the terms of the contract express such uncertainty of performance that the promisor has not definitely promised to do anything, the promise is said to be illusory—without consideration and unenforceable. A promise is illusory when it fails to bind the promisor. For example, suppose that a corporate president says to her employees, "All of you have worked hard, and if profits continue to remain high, a 10 percent bonus at the end of the year will be given—if management thinks it is warranted." The employees continue to work hard, and profits remain high, but no bonus is given. This is an illusory promise, or no promise at all, because performance depends solely on the discretion of the president (the management). There is no bargained-for consideration, only a declaration that management may or may not do something in the future. The president is not obligated (incurs no detriment) now or later.

Option-to-Cancel Clauses Option-to-cancel clauses in term contracts sometimes present problems in regard to consideration. When the promisor has the option to cancel the contract before performance has begun, then the promise is illusory. For example, suppose that Abe contracts to hire Chris for one year at $5,000 per month, reserving the right to cancel the contract at any time. On close examination of these words, you can see that Abe has not actually agreed to hire Chris, as Abe could cancel without liability before Chris started performance. This contract is therefore illusory. But if Abe had instead reserved the right to cancel the contract at any time after Chris has begun performance by giving Chris thirty days' notice, the promise would not be illusory. Abe, by saying that he will give Chris thirty days' notice, is relinquishing the opportunity (legal right) to hire someone else instead of Chris for a thirty-day period. If Chris works for one month, at the end of which Abe gives him thirty days' notice, Chris has an enforceable claim for $10,000 in salary.⁸

Requirements Contracts and Output Contracts Problems with consideration may also arise in other types of contracts because of uncertainty of performance.⁹ Uncertain performance is characteristic of requirements and output contracts, for example. In a requirements contract, a buyer and a seller agree that the buyer will purchase from the seller all of the goods of a designated type that the buyer needs, or requires. In an output contract, the buyer and seller agree that the buyer will purchase from the seller all of what the seller produces, or the seller's output. These types of contracts will be discussed further in Chapter 20. Concept Summary 12.1 provides a convenient summary of the main aspects of consideration.

Settlement of Claims

Businesspersons or others can settle legal claims in several ways, and it is important to understand the nature of consideration given in these kinds of settlement agreements, or contracts. In an accord and satisfaction, which is a common means of settling a claim, a debtor

8. For another example, see Vanegas v. American Energy Services, 224 S.W.3d 544 (Tex.App.—Eastland 2007).

9. See, for example, Johnson Controls, Inc. v. TRW Vehicle Safety Systems, 491 F.Supp.2d 707 (E.D.Mich. 2007).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 12.1 Consideration

ELEMENTS OF CONSIDERATION

Consideration is the value given in exchange for a promise. A contract cannot be formed without sufficient consideration. Consideration is often broken down into two elements:

1. Legal value—Something of legally sufficient value must be given in exchange for a promise. This may consist of a promise, a performance, or a forbearance.
2. Bargained-for exchange—There must be a bargained-for exchange.

ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION

Adequacy of consideration relates to how much consideration is given and whether a fair bargain was reached. Courts will inquire into the adequacy of consideration (if the consideration is legally sufficient) only when fraud, undue influence, duress, or the lack of a bargained-for exchange may be involved.

AGREEMENTS THAT LACK CONSIDERATION

Consideration is lacking in the following situations:

1. Preexisting duty—Consideration is not legally sufficient if one is either by law or by contract under a preexisting duty to perform the action being offered as consideration for a new contract.
2. Past consideration—Actions or events that have already taken place do not constitute legally sufficient consideration.
3. Illusory promises—When the nature or extent of performance is too uncertain, the promise is rendered illusory and unenforceable.

offers to pay a lesser amount than the creditor purports to be owed. Other methods that are commonly used to settle claims include a release and a covenant not to sue.

Accord and Satisfaction

The concept of accord and satisfaction involves a debtor's offer of payment and a creditor's acceptance of a lesser amount than the creditor originally claimed was owed. The accord is the agreement under which one of the parties undertakes to give or perform—and the other to accept, in satisfaction of a claim—something other than that on which the parties originally agreed. Satisfaction takes place when the accord is executed. A basic rule is that there can be no satisfaction unless there is first an accord. For accord and satisfaction to occur, the amount of the debt must be in dispute.

Liquidated Debts If a debt is liquidated, accord and satisfaction cannot take place. A liquidated debt is one whose amount has been ascertained, fixed, agreed on, settled, or exactly determined. For example, if Kwan signs an installment loan contract with her banker in which she agrees to pay a specified rate of interest on a specified amount of borrowed funds at monthly intervals for two years, that is a liquidated debt. The total obligation is precisely known to both parties, and reasonable persons cannot dispute the amount owed.

Suppose that Kwan has missed her last two payments on the loan and the creditor demands that she pay the overdue debt. Kwan makes a partial payment and states that she believes this payment is all she should have to pay and that the debt will be satisfied if the creditor accepts the payment. In the majority of states, acceptance of a lesser sum than the entire amount of a liquidated debt is not satisfaction, and the balance of the debt is still legally owed. The rationale for this rule is that the debtor has not given any consideration to satisfy the obligation of paying the balance to the creditor—because the debtor has a preexisting legal obligation to pay the entire debt.

Unliquidated Debts An unliquidated debt is the opposite of a liquidated debt. Here, reasonable persons may differ over the amount owed. It is not settled, fixed, agreed on, ascertained, or determined, and thus acceptance of the payment of a lesser amount operates as satisfaction, or discharge, of the debt. For example, Devereaux goes to the dentist's office and the dentist tells him that he needs three special types of gold inlays. The price is not discussed, and there is no standard fee for this type of procedure. Devereaux has the work done and leaves the office. At the end of the month, the dentist sends him a bill for $3,000.

Devereaux, believing that this amount grossly exceeds what a reasonable person would believe the debt owed should be, sends a check for $2,000. On the back of the check he writes, "payment in full for three gold inlays." The dentist cashes the check. Because the situation involves an unliquidated debt—the amount has not been agreed on—the payment accepted by the dentist normally will eradicate the debt. One argument to support this rule is that the parties give up a legal right to contest the amount in dispute, and thus consideration is given.

Release

A release is a contract in which one party forfeits the right to pursue a legal claim against the other party. It bars any further recovery beyond the terms stated in the release. For example, your car is damaged in an automobile accident caused by Donovan's negligence. Donovan offers to give you $1,000 if you will release him from further liability resulting from the accident. You believe that this amount will cover your damages, so you agree and sign the release. Later, you discover that it will cost $1,500 to repair your car. Can you collect the balance from Donovan?

The answer is normally no; you are limited to the $1,000 specified in the release because the release represents a valid contract. You and Donovan both agreed to the bargain, and sufficient consideration was present. The consideration was the legal detriment you suffered (by releasing Donovan from liability, you forfeited your right to sue to recover damages in exchange for $1,000).

Clearly, you are better off if you know the extent of your injuries or damages before signing a release. Releases will generally be binding if they are (1) given in good faith, (2) stated in a signed writing (which is required in many states), and (3) accompanied by consideration.¹⁰

Covenant Not to Sue

A covenant not to sue is an agreement to substitute a contractual obligation for some other type of legal action based on a valid claim. Unlike a release, a

10. Under the UCC, a written, signed waiver or renunciation by an aggrieved party discharges any further liability for a breach, even without consideration.

covenant not to sue does not always bar further recovery. Suppose (continuing the earlier example) that you agree with Donovan not to sue for damages in a tort action if he will pay for the damage to your car. If Donovan fails to pay, you can bring an action against him for breach of contract.

Exceptions to the Consideration Requirement

There are some exceptions to the rule that only promises supported by consideration are enforceable. The following types of promises may be enforced despite the lack of consideration:

1. Promises that induce detrimental reliance, under the doctrine of promissory estoppel.
2. Promises to pay debts that are barred by a statute of limitations.
3. Promises to make charitable contributions.

Promissory Estoppel

As discussed in Chapter 11, under the doctrine of promissory estoppel (also called detrimental reliance), a person who has reasonably and substantially relied on the promise of another may be able to obtain some measure of recovery. This doctrine is applied in a wide variety of contexts in which a promise is otherwise unenforceable, such as when a promise is not supported by consideration. Under this doctrine, a court may enforce an otherwise unenforceable promise to avoid the injustice that would otherwise result.

Requirements to State a Claim for Promissory Estoppel For the doctrine to be applied, the following elements are required:

1. There must be a clear and definite promise.
2. The promisor should have expected that the promisee would rely on the promise.
3. The promisee reasonably relied on the promise by acting or refraining from some act.
4. The promisee's reliance was definite and resulted in substantial detriment.
5. Enforcement of the promise is necessary to avoid injustice.

If these requirements are met, a promise may be enforced even though it is not supported by consideration.¹¹ In essence, the promisor will be estopped (prevented) from asserting the lack of consideration as a defense.

11. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 90.

Application of the Doctrine Promissory estoppel was originally applied to situations involving gifts (I promise to pay you $150 a week so that you will not have to work) and donations to charities (I promise to contribute $50,000 a year toward the orphanage). Later, courts began to apply the doctrine to avoid inequity or hardship in other situations, including business transactions.

For example, suppose that the Air Force has opened the bidding process for construction of a new building at Elmendorf Air Force Base in Anchorage, Alaska. A general contractor, Vern Hickel, anxious to get the job, contacts eight different subcontractors to find the lowest price on electrical work. Bussell, an electrical subcontractor, tells Hickel that he will do the electrical portion of the project for $477,498. Hickel reasonably relies on this amount when he submits his primary bid for the entire project to the Air Force and wins the contract. After the bidding is over, Bussell realizes that he made a mistake and refuses to perform the electrical work for Hickel for $477,498. Hickel has to hire another subcontractor at a substantially higher cost to complete the electrical work.

Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, Hickel can sue Bussell for the cost difference because he detrimentally relied on Bussell's bid even though there was no consideration for Bussell's promise to do the work for $477,498.¹² (See this chapter's Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 260–261 for a discussion of promissory estoppel and promises of employment.)

Promises to Pay Debts Barred by a Statute of Limitations

Statutes of limitations in all states require a creditor to sue within a specified period to recover a debt. If the creditor fails to sue in time, recovery of the debt is barred by the statute of limitations. A debtor who promises to pay a previous debt even though recovery is barred by the statute of limitations makes an enforceable promise. The promise needs no consideration. (Some states, however, require that it be in writing.) In effect, the promise extends the limitations period, and the creditor can sue to recover the entire debt or at least the amount promised. The promise can be 12. See Alaska Bussell Electric Co. v. Vern Hickel Construction Co., 688 P.2d 576 (1984); also see Commerce Bancorp, Inc. v. BK International Insurance Brokers, Ltd., 490 F.Supp.2d 556 (D.N.J. 2007).

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Promissory Estoppel and Employment Contracts

Today, approximately 85 percent of American workers have the legal status of “employees at will.” Under this common law employment doctrine, which applies in all states except Montana, an employer may fire an employee for any reason or no reason. The at-will doctrine, however, does not apply to any employee who has an employment contract or who falls under the protection of a state or federal statute—which is, of course, a large number of employees. Even when an employee is subject to the employment-at-will doctrine, the courts sometimes make exceptions to the doctrine based on tort theory or contract principles or on the ground that a termination violates an established public policy (see Chapter 33).

These exceptions to the at-will doctrine, however, apply only when a current employee’s employment is terminated. Should they also apply when a company fails to hire a job candidate after promising to do so? For example, suppose that a job candidate, relying on a company’s offer of employment, quits his or her existing job, moves to another city, and rents or buys housing in the new location. Then the company decides not to hire the candidate after all. Given the candidate’s detrimental reliance on the company’s job offer, should the company be prevented from revoking its offer under the doctrine of promissory estoppel? This question has come before a number of courts. As yet, however, the courts have not reached a consensus on the issue. Some jurisdictions allow the doctrine of promissory estoppel to be applied, but others do not.

Promissory Estoppel Should Not Be Applied

Many jurisdictions believe that reliance on a prospective employer’s promise of at-will employment is unreasonable as a matter of law. Courts in these jurisdictions reason that a job applicant should know that, even if she or he is hired, the employer could terminate the employment at any time for any reason without liability. According to these courts, it would be contrary to reason to allow someone who has not yet begun work to recover damages under a theory of promissory estoppel, given that the same person’s job could be terminated without liability one day after beginning work.

Consider a case example. Arlie Thompson had worked for nine years at a hospital as a technician assistant when she was laid off. A year later, the same hospital offered her a clerical position, which she accepted. She was measured for a new uniform, given a security badge, and provided with the password for the computer system. Thompson, who was then working at another job, quit the other position in reliance on the hospital’s job offer. Shortly thereafter, the hospital asked her to take a test. When she failed the test, the hospital refused to hire her. Thompson filed a suit claiming that the doctrine of promissory estoppel should prevent the hospital from revoking its offer. The court, however, held that the hospital’s promise of employment was not sufficiently “clear and definite” for that doctrine to be applied.^a

a. Thompson v. Bridgeport Hospital, 2001 WL 823130 (Conn.Super. 2001). See also Lower v. Electronic Data Systems Corp., 494 F.Supp.2d 770 (S.D. Ohio 2007); and Rice v. NN, Inc., Ball & Roller Division, 210 S.W.3d 536 (Tenn.Ct.App. 2006).

implied if the debtor acknowledges the barred debt by making a partial payment.

Charitable Subscriptions

Subscriptions to religious, educational, and charitable institutions are promises to make gifts. Traditionally, these promises were unenforceable because they are not supported by legally sufficient consideration. A gift, after all, is the opposite of bargained-for consideration. The modern view, however, is to make exceptions to the general rule by applying the doctrine of promissory estoppel.

For example, suppose that a church solicits and receives pledges (commitments to contribute funds) from church members to erect a new church building. On the basis of these pledges, the church purchases land, hires architects, and makes other contracts that change its position. Because of the church’s detrimental reliance, a court may enforce the pledges under the theory of promissory estoppel. Alternatively, a court may find consideration in the fact that each promise was made in reliance on the other promises of support or that the trustees, by accepting the subscriptions, impliedly promised to complete the proposed undertaking.

Promissory Estoppel Should Be Applied

A number of other jurisdictions, however, have held that a person can recover damages incurred as a result of resigning from a former job in reliance on an offer of at-will employment. These jurisdictions have determined that when a prospective employer knows or should know that a promise of employment will induce the future employee to leave his or her current job, the employer should be responsible for the prospective employee's damages. After all, without the offer from the prospective employer, the prospective employee would have continued to work in his or her prior position.

This approach is reflected in a case from 2007 involving Thomas Frey. In 1999, Frey was working for a firm at which he had substantial benefits and would have been entitled to stock options. Then Andrew Taitz of Workhorse Custom Chassis, LLC, offered Frey a position, promising him a large bonus if the company's earnings exceeded $39.1 million by the end of 2002. In reliance on that promise, Frey left his job and took the position at Workhorse.

By the end of 2002, projections indicated that Workhorse's earnings would exceed the required level. Frey therefore believed that he was entitled to the bonus when he left the company in January 2003. In the spring of 2003, Frey asked for his bonus, but Taitz responded that because Frey no longer worked for the company, he was not entitled to the bonus. Frey filed a lawsuit against Workhorse, claiming, among other things, that he was entitled to damages under the doctrine of promissory estoppel because he had left a lucrative and secure position to take the job at Workhorse.

Although Workhorse claimed at the trial that its 2002 earnings were only around $37.6 million, the audited financial statements it presented had been completed ten months late and were subject to a 5 percent margin of error. Workhorse also admitted that many employees would have received substantial bonuses if the earnings had exceeded $39.1 million. A jury found Frey's argument convincing and awarded him $648,220. Workhorse moved for a judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial, but the court ruled that Frey had presented enough evidence to support the jury's verdict.^b

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Some jurisdictions maintain that it is irrational to apply the doctrine of promissory estoppel to a promise of at-will employment, given that the employee could be fired after working for only one day on the job. Other jurisdictions conclude that the doctrine should apply because the employer should reasonably expect a job candidate in this situation to act in reliance on the promise. Does one of these two arguments have greater merit than the other? What is your position on this issue?

b. Frey v. Workhorse Custom Chassis, LLC, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (S.D.Ind. 2007). For a case allowing a job candidate to recover damages from a prospective employer, see Goff-Hamel v. Obstetricians & Gynecologists, P.C., 256 Neb. 19, 588 N.W.2d 798 (1999).

REVIEWING Consideration

John operates a motorcycle repair shop from his home but finds that his business is limited by the small size of his garage. Driving by a neighbor's property, he notices a for-sale sign on a large, metal-sided garage. John contacts the neighbor and offers to buy the building, hoping that it can be dismantled and moved to his own property. The neighbor accepts John's payment and makes a generous offer in return: if John will help him dismantle the garage, which will take a substantial amount of time, he will help John reassemble it after it has been transported to John's property. They agree to have the entire job completed within two weeks. John spends every day for a week working with his neighbor to disassemble the building. In his rush to acquire a larger workspace, he turns down several lucrative repair jobs. Once the disassembled building has been moved to John's property, however, the neighbor refuses to help John reassemble it as he originally promised. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

REVIEWING CONTINUES

REVIEWING Consideration, Continued

1. Are the basic elements of consideration present in the neighbor's promise to help John reassemble the garage? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that the neighbor starts to help John but then realizes that, because of the layout of John's property, putting the building back together will take much more work than dismantling it took. Under which principle discussed in the chapter might the neighbor be allowed to ask for additional compensation?
3. What if John's neighbor made his promise to help reassemble the garage at the time he and John were moving it to John's property, saying, "Since you helped me take it down, I will help you put it back up." Would John be able to enforce this promise? Why or why not?
4. Under what doctrine discussed in the chapter might John seek to recover the profits he lost when he declined to do repair work for one week?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

accord and satisfaction 258

consideration 250

covenant not to sue 258

forbearance 250

past consideration 254

release 258

rescission 254

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

12-1. Tabor is a buyer of file cabinets manufactured by Martin. Martin's contract with Tabor calls for delivery of fifty file cabinets at $40 per cabinet in five equal installments. After delivery of two installments (twenty cabinets), Martin informs Tabor that because of inflation, Martin is losing money and will promise to deliver the remaining thirty cabinets only if Tabor will pay $50 per cabinet. Tabor agrees in writing to do so. Discuss whether Martin can legally collect the additional $100 on delivery to Tabor of the next installment of ten cabinets.

12-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Bernstein owns a lot and wants to build a house according to a particular set of plans and specifications. She solicits bids from building contractors and receives three bids: one from Carlton for $160,000, one from Friend for $158,000, and one from Shade for $153,000. She accepts Shade's bid. One month after beginning construction of the house, Shade contacts Bernstein and informs her that because of inflation and a recent price hike for materials, he will not finish the house unless Bernstein agrees to pay an extra $13,000. Bernstein reluctantly agrees to pay the additional sum. After the house is finished, however, Bernstein refuses to pay the extra $13,000. Discuss whether Bernstein is legally required to pay this additional amount.

- For a sample answer to Question 12-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

12-3. Daniel, a recent college graduate, is on his way home for the Christmas holidays from his new job. He gets caught in a snowstorm and is taken in by an elderly couple, who provide him with food and shelter. After the snowplows have cleared the road, Daniel proceeds home. Daniel's father, Fred, is most appreciative of the elderly couple's action and in a letter promises to pay them $500. The elderly couple, in need of funds, accept Fred's offer. Then, because of a dispute between Daniel and Fred, Fred refuses to pay the elderly couple the $500. Discuss whether the couple can hold Fred liable in contract for the services rendered to Daniel.

CHAPTER 12 Consideration

12-4. Costello hired Sagan to drive his racing car in a race. Sagan's friend Gideon promised to pay Sagan $3,000 if she won the race. Sagan won the race, but Gideon refused to pay the $3,000. Gideon contended that no legally binding contract had been formed because he had received no consideration from Sagan in exchange for his promise to pay the $3,000. Sagan sued Gideon for breach of contract, arguing that winning the race was the consideration given in exchange for Gideon's promise to pay the $3,000. What rule of law discussed in this chapter supports Gideon's claim?

12-5. Accord and Satisfaction. E. S. Herrick Co. grows and sells blueberries. Maine Wild Blueberry Co. agreed to buy all of Herrick's 1990 crop under a contract that left the price unliquidated. Herrick delivered the berries, but a dispute arose over the price. Maine Wild sent Herrick a check with a letter stating that the check was the "final settlement." Herrick cashed the check but filed a suit in a Maine state court against Maine Wild, on the ground of breach of contract, alleging that the buyer owed more. What will the court likely decide in this case? Why? [E. S. Herrick Co. v. Maine Wild Blueberry Co., 670 A.2d 944 (Me. 1996)]

12-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

As a child, Martha Carr once visited her mother's 108-acre tract of unimproved land in Richland County, South Carolina. In 1968, Betty and Raymond Campbell leased the land. Carr, a resident of New York, was diagnosed as having schizophrenia and depression in 1986, was hospitalized five or six times, and subsequently took prescription drugs for the illnesses. In 1996, Carr inherited the Richland property and, two years later, contacted the Campbells about selling the land. Carr asked Betty about the value of the land, and Betty said that the county tax assessor had determined that the land's agricultural value was $54,000. The Campbells knew at the time that the county had assessed the total property value at $103,700 for tax purposes. A real estate appraiser found that the real market value of the property was $162,000. On August 6, Carr signed a contract to sell the land to the Campbells for $54,000. Believing the price to be unfair, however, Carr did not deliver the deed. The Campbells filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against Carr, seeking specific performance of the contract. At trial, an expert real estate appraiser testified that the real market value of the property was $162,000 at the time of the contract. Under what circumstances will a court examine the adequacy of consideration? Are those circumstances present in this case? Should the court enforce the contract between Carr and the Campbells? Explain. [Campbell v. Carr, 361 S.C. 258, 603 S.E.2d 625 (S.C.App. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 12-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 12," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

12-7. Preexisting Duty. New England Rock Services, Inc., agreed to work as a subcontractor on a sewer project on which Empire Paving, Inc., was the general contractor. For drilling and blasting a certain amount of rock, Rock Services was to be paid $29 per cubic yard or on a time-and-materials basis, whichever was less. From the beginning, Rock Services encountered problems. The primary obstacle was a heavy concentration of water, which, according to the custom in the industry, Empire should have controlled but did not. Rock Services was compelled to use more costly and time-consuming methods than anticipated, and it was unable to complete the work on time. The subcontractor asked Empire to pay for the rest of the project on a time-and-materials basis. Empire signed a modification of the original agreement. On completion of the work, Empire refused to pay Rock Services the balance due under the modification. Rock Services filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Empire. Empire claimed that the modification lacked consideration and was thus not valid and enforceable. Is Empire right? Why or why not? [New England Rock Services, Inc. v. Empire Paving, Inc., 53 Conn.App. 771, 731 A.2d 784 (1999)]

12-8. Consideration. In 1995, Helikon Furniture Co. appointed Tom Gaede as an independent sales agent for the sale of its products in parts of Texas. The parties signed a one-year contract that specified, among other things, the commissions that Gaede would receive. Over a year later, although the parties had not signed a new contract, Gaede was still representing Helikon when it was acquired by a third party. Helikon's new management allowed Gaede to continue to perform for the same commissions and sent him a letter stating that it would make no changes in its sales representatives "for at least the next year." Three months later, in December 1997, the new managers sent Gaede a letter proposing new terms for a contract. Gaede continued to sell Helikon products until May 1997, when he received a letter effectively reducing the amount of his commissions. Gaede filed a suit in a Texas state court against Helikon, alleging breach of contract. Helikon argued, in part, that there was no contract because there was no consideration. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [Gaede v. SK Investments, Inc., 38 S.W.3d 753 (Tex.App.—Houston [14 Dist.] 2001)]

12-9. Settlement of Claims. Shoreline Towers Condominium Owners Association in Gulf Shores, Alabama, authorized Resort Development, Inc. (RDI), to manage Shoreline's property. On Shoreline's behalf, RDI obtained a property insurance policy from Zurich American Insurance Co. In October 1995, Hurricane Opal struck Gulf Shores. RDI filed claims with Zurich regarding damage to Shoreline's property. Zurich determined that the cost of the damage was $334,901. Zurich then subtracted an applicable $40,000 deductible and sent checks to RDI totaling $294,901. RDI disputed the amount. Zurich eventually agreed to issue a check for an additional $86,000 in return for RDI's signing a "Release of All Claims." Later, contending that the deductible had been incorrectly applied and that this was a breach of contract, among other things, Shoreline filed a suit against Zurich in a federal district court. How, if at all, should the agreement reached by RDI and Zurich affect Shoreline's claim? Explain. [Shoreline Towers Condominium Owners Association, Inc. v. Zurich American Insurance Co., 196 F.Supp.2d 1210 (S.D.Ala. 2002)]

12-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

John Sasson and Emily Springer met in January 2002. John worked for the U.S. Army as an engineer. Emily was an attorney with a law firm. Six months later, John bought a townhouse in Randolph, New Jersey, and asked Emily to live with him. She agreed but retained the ownership of her home in Monmouth Beach. John paid the mortgage and the other expenses on the townhouse. He urged Emily to quit her job and work from "our house." In May 2003, Emily took John's advice and started her own law practice. In December, John made her the beneficiary of his $150,000 individual retirement account

(IRA) and said that he would give her his 2002 BMW M3 car before the end of the next year. He proposed to her in September 2004, giving her a diamond engagement ring and promising to "take care of her" for the rest of her life. Less than a month later, John was critically injured by an accidental blow to his head during a basketball game and died. On behalf of John's estate, which was valued at $1.1 million, his brother Steven filed a complaint in a New Jersey state court to have Emily evicted from the townhouse. Given these facts, consider the following questions. [In re Estate of Sasson, 387 N.J.Super. 459, 904 A.2d 769 (App.Div. 2006)]

- Based on John's promise to "take care of her" for the rest of her life, Emily claimed that she was entitled to the townhouse, the BMW, and an additional portion of John's estate. Under what circumstances would such a promise constitute a valid, enforceable contract? Does John's promise meet these requirements? Why or why not?
- Whether or not John's promise is legally binding, is there an ethical basis on which it should be enforced? Is there an ethical basis for not enforcing it? Are there any circumstances under which a promise of support should be—or should not be—enforced? Discuss.

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

A good way to learn more about how the courts decide whether consideration was present or lacking is to look at relevant case law. To find recent cases on contract law, access Cornell University's School of Law site at www.law.cornell.edu/wex/index.php/Contracts

The New Hampshire Consumer's Sourcebook provides information on contract law, including consideration, from a consumer's perspective. You can access this site at www.doj.nh.gov/consumer/sourcebook

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 12" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

- Internet Exercise 12-1: Legal Perspective
Legal Value of Consideration
- Internet Exercise 12-2: Management Perspective
Promissory Estoppel
- Internet Exercise 12-3: International Perspective
Contract Consideration in Canada

CHAPTER 13

Capacity and Legality

In addition to agreement and consideration, for a contract to be deemed valid the parties to the contract must have contractual capacity—the legal ability to enter into a contractual relationship. Courts generally presume the existence of contractual capacity, but in some situations, such as those involving mentally incompetent persons or minors, capacity is lacking or may be questionable. Similarly, contracts calling for the performance of an illegal act are illegal and thus void—they are not contracts at all. In this chapter, we examine contractual capacity and some aspects of illegal bargains.

Realize that capacity and legality are not inherently related other than that they are both contract requirements. We treat these topics in one chapter merely for convenience and reasons of space.

Contractual Capacity

Historically, the law has given special protection to those who bargain with the inexperience of youth or those who lack the degree of mental competence required by law. A person who has been determined by a court to be mentally incompetent, for example, cannot form a legally binding contract with another party. In other situations, a party may have the capacity to enter into a valid contract but also have the right to avoid liability under it. For example, minors—or infants, as they are commonly referred to in legal terminology—usually are not legally bound by contracts. In this section, we look at the effect of youth, intoxication, and mental incompetence on contractual capacity.

Minors

Today, in virtually all states, the age of majority (when a person is no longer a minor) for contractual purposes is eighteen years.¹ In addition, some states provide for the termination of minority on marriage. Minority status may also be terminated by a minor's emancipation, which occurs when a child's parent or legal guardian relinquishes the legal right to exercise control over the child. Normally, minors who leave home to support themselves are considered emancipated. Several jurisdictions permit minors to petition a court for emancipation themselves. For business purposes, a minor may petition a court to be treated as an adult.

1. The age of majority may still be twenty-one for other purposes, such as the purchase and consumption of alcohol.

The general rule is that a minor can enter into any contract that an adult can, provided that the contract is not one prohibited by law for minors (for example, the sale of tobacco or alcoholic beverages). A contract entered into by a minor, however, is voidable at the option of that minor, subject to certain exceptions. To exercise the option to avoid a contract, a minor need only manifest an intention not to be bound by it. The minor "avoids" the contract by disaffirming it.

A Minor's Right to Disaffirm The legal avoidance, or setting aside, of a contractual obligation is referred to as disaffirmance. To disaffirm, a minor must express his or her intent, through words or conduct, not to be bound to the contract. The minor must disaffirm the entire contract, not merely a portion of it.

For example, the minor cannot decide to keep part of the goods purchased under a contract and return the remaining goods.

A contract can ordinarily be disaffirmed at any time during minority² or for a reasonable period after reaching majority. What constitutes a “reasonable” time may vary. Two months would probably be considered reasonable, but except in unusual circumstances, a court may not find it reasonable to wait a year or more after coming of age to disaffirm. If an individual fails to disaffirm an executed contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, a court will likely hold that the contract has been ratified (ratification will be discussed shortly).

Note that an adult who enters into a contract with a minor cannot avoid his or her contractual duties on the ground that the minor can do so. Unless the minor exercises the option to disaffirm the contract, the adult party normally is bound by it.

A Minor’s Obligations on Disaffirmance

Although all states’ laws permit minors to disaffirm contracts (with certain exceptions), states differ on the extent of a minor’s obligations on disaffirmance.

Majority Rule. Courts in a majority of states hold that the minor need only return the goods (or other consideration) subject to the contract, provided the goods are in the minor’s possession or control. For example, suppose that Jim Garrison, a seventeen-year-old, purchases a computer from Radio Shack. While transporting the computer to his home, Garrison negligently drops it, breaking the plastic casing. The next day, he returns the computer to Radio Shack and disaffirms the contract. Under the majority view, this return fulfills Garrison’s duty even though the computer is now damaged. Garrison is entitled to receive a refund of the purchase price (if paid in cash) or to be relieved of any further obligations under a credit agreement.

Minority Rule. An increasing number of states, either by statute or by court decision, place an additional duty on the minor—the duty to restore the adult party to the position that she or he held before the contract was made. Consider an example. Sixteen-year-old Joseph Dodson bought a pickup truck for $4,900 from a used-car dealer. Although the truck developed mechanical problems nine months later, Dodson continued to drive it until the engine blew up and the truck stopped running. Then Dodson disaffirmed the contract and attempted to return the truck to the dealer for a full refund of the purchase price. When the dealer refused to accept the pickup or refund the money, Dodson filed a lawsuit. Ultimately, the Tennessee Supreme Court allowed Dodson to disaffirm the contract but required him to compensate the seller for the depreciated value—not the purchase price—of the pickup.³ This case illustrates the trend among today’s courts to hold a minor responsible for damage, ordinary wear and tear, and depreciation of goods that the minor used prior to disaffirmance.

Exceptions to a Minor’s Right to Disaffirm

State courts and legislatures have carved out several exceptions to the minor’s right to disaffirm. Some contracts cannot be avoided simply as a matter of law, on the ground of public policy. For example, marriage contracts and contracts to enlist in the armed services fall into this category. Other contracts may not be disaffirmed for other reasons, including those discussed here.

Misrepresentation of Age. Suppose that a minor tells a seller that she is twenty-one years old when she is really seventeen. Ordinarily, the minor can disaffirm the contract even though she has misrepresented her age. In many jurisdictions, however, a minor who has misrepresented his or her age can be bound by a contract, at least under certain circumstances. First, several states have enacted statutes for precisely this purpose. In these states, misrepresentation of age is enough to prohibit disaffirmance. Other statutes prohibit disaffirmance by a minor who has engaged in business as an adult. Second, some courts refuse to allow minors to disaffirm executed (fully performed) contracts unless they can return the consideration received. The combination of the minors’ misrepresentation and their unjust enrichment has persuaded these courts to estop (prevent) minors from asserting contractual incapacity.

Contracts for Necessaries. A minor who enters into a contract for necessaries may disaffirm the contract but remains liable for the reasonable value of the goods. Necessaries are items that fulfill basic needs, such as food, clothing, shelter, and medical services, at a level of value required to maintain the minor’s standard of living or financial and social status. Thus, what will be considered a necessary for one person may be a luxury for another. Additionally, what is considered a necessary depends on whether the minor is under the care or control of his or her parents, who are required by law to provide necessities for the minor. If a minor's parents provide him or her with shelter, for example, then a contract to lease shelter (such as an apartment) normally will not be classified as a contract for necessities.

2. In some states, however, a minor who enters into a contract for the sale of land cannot disaffirm the contract until she or he reaches the age of majority.

3. Dodson v. Shrader, 824 S.W.2d 545 (Tenn.Sup.Ct. 1992) is a seminal case on this subject. See also Restatement (Third) of Restitution, Sections 16 and 33 (2004).

Generally, then, for a contract to qualify as a contract for necessities, (1) the item contracted for must be necessary for the minor's subsistence, (2) the value of the necessary item must be up to a level required to maintain the minor's standard of living or financial and social status, and (3) the minor must not be under the care of a parent or guardian who is required to supply this item. Unless these three criteria are met, the minor can disaffirm the contract without being liable for the reasonable value of the goods used.

The issue in the following case was whether, under the doctrine of necessities, a medical service provider could collect from a minor the cost of emergency services rendered to the minor when his mother did not pay.

EXTENDED Yale Diagnostic Radiology v. Estate of Harun Fountain

CASE 13.1 Supreme Court of Connecticut, 2004. 267 Conn. 351, 838 A.2d 179.

BORDEN, J. [Justice]

The sole issue in this appeal is whether a medical service provider that has provided emergency medical services to a minor may collect for those services from the minor when the minor's parents refuse or are unable to make payment. The defendants, the estate of Harun Fountain, an unemancipated minor, and Vernetta Turner-Tucker (Tucker) * * * claim that the [appellate] court improperly determined that they are liable to the plaintiff [Yale Diagnostic Radiology] for payment of Fountain's medical expenses. * * *

* * * In March, 1996, Fountain was shot in the back of the head at point-blank range by a playmate. As a result of his injuries, including the loss of his right eye, Fountain required extensive lifesaving medical services from a variety of medical services providers, including the plaintiff. The expense of the services rendered by the plaintiff to Fountain totaled $17,694. The plaintiff billed Tucker, who was Fountain's mother, but the bill went unpaid and, in 1999, the plaintiff obtained a collection judgment against her. In January, 2001, however, all of Tucker's debts were discharged pursuant to an order of [a federal bankruptcy court]. Among the discharged debts was the judgment in favor of the plaintiff against Tucker.

During the time between the rendering of medical services and the bankruptcy filing, Tucker * * * initiated a tort action against the boy who had shot him. Among the damages claimed were substantial sums of money expended on medical care and treatment * * *. A settlement was reached, and funds were placed in the estate established on Fountain's behalf * * *.

Following the discharge of Tucker's debts, the plaintiff [filed a motion with the state trial court] for payment of the $17,694 from the estate. The [court] denied the motion, reasoning that * * * parents are liable for medical services rendered to their minor children, and that a parent's refusal or inability to pay for those services does not render the minor child liable. The * * * court further ruled that minor children are incapable of entering into a legally binding contract or consenting, in the absence of parental consent, to medical treatment. The * * * court held, therefore, that the plaintiff was barred from seeking payment from the estate.

The plaintiff appealed the decision * * * [to the state intermediate appellate court, which held that] minors are liable for payment for their necessities, even though the provider of those necessities relies on the parents' credit for payment when the injured child lives with his parents * * *. The [appellate] court reasoned that, although parents are primarily liable, * * * for their child's medical bills, the parents' failure to pay renders the minor secondarily liable. Additionally, the [appellate] court relied on the fact that Fountain had obtained money damages, based in part on the medical services rendered to him by the plaintiff. This appeal followed.

The defendants claim that the [appellate] court improperly determined that a minor may be liable for payment for emergency medical services rendered to him. They further claim that the [appellate] court, in reaching its decision, improperly considered the fact that Fountain had received a settlement, based in part on his medical expenses. * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 13.1 CONTINUED

Connecticut has long recognized the common-law rule that a minor child's contracts are voidable. Under this rule, a minor may, upon reaching majority, choose either to ratify or to avoid contractual obligations entered into during his minority. The traditional reasoning behind this rule is based on the well established common-law principles that the law should protect children from the detrimental consequences of their youthful and improvident acts, and that children should be able to emerge into adulthood unencumbered by [free of] financial obligations incurred during the course of their minority. The rule is further supported by a policy of protecting children from unscrupulous individuals seeking to profit from their youth and inexperience. [Emphasis added.]

The rule that a minor's contracts are voidable, however, is not absolute. An exception to this rule, eponymously [by name] known as the doctrine of necessities, is that a minor may not avoid a contract for goods or services necessary for his health and sustenance. Such contracts are binding even if entered into during minority, and a minor, upon reaching majority, may not, as a matter of law, disaffirm them. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

We have not heretofore articulated the particular legal theory underlying the doctrine of necessities. We therefore take this occasion to do so, and we conclude that the most apt theory is that of an implied in law contract, also sometimes referred to as a quasi-contract. * * *

In distinction to an implied in fact contract, a quasi or implied in law contract is not a contract, but an obligation which the law creates out of the circumstances present, even though a party did not assume the obligation. * * * It is based on equitable principles to operate whenever justice requires compensation to be made * * *. With no other test than what, under a given set of circumstances, is just or unjust, equitable or inequitable, conscionable or unconscionable, it becomes necessary * * * to examine the circumstances and the conduct of the parties and apply this standard. [Emphasis added.]

Thus, when a medical service provider renders necessary medical care to an injured minor, two contracts arise: the primary contract between the provider and the minor's parents; and an implied in law contract between the provider and the minor himself. The primary contract between the provider and the parents is based on the parents' duty to pay for their children's necessary expenses * * *. Such contracts, where not express, may be implied in fact and generally arise both from the parties' conduct and their reasonable expectations. The primacy of this contract means that the provider of necessities must make all reasonable efforts to collect from the parents before resorting to the secondary, implied in law contract with the minor.

The secondary implied in law contract between the medical services provider and the minor arises from equitable considerations, including the law's disfavor of unjust enrichment. Therefore, where necessary medical services are rendered to a minor whose parents do not pay for them, equity and justice demand that a secondary implied in law contract arise between the medical services provider and the minor who has received the benefits of those services. These principles compel the conclusion that, in the circumstances of the present case, the [defendant is] liable to the plaintiff, under the common-law doctrine of necessities, for the services rendered by the plaintiff to Fountain.

* * * *

The judgment is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. What might have happened in future cases if the court had held that there was no implied-in-law contract between Fountain and Yale Diagnostic Radiology?
2. How does the result in this case encourage payment on contracts for necessities?

Insurance and Loans. Traditionally, insurance has not been viewed as a necessary, so minors can ordinarily disaffirm their insurance contracts and recover all premiums paid. Some jurisdictions, though, prohibit the right to disaffirm insurance contracts—for example, when minors contract for life insurance on their own lives. Financial loans are seldom considered to be necessities.

Ratification In contract law, ratification is the act of accepting and giving legal force to an obligation that previously was not enforceable. A minor who has reached the age of majority can ratify a contract expressly or impliedly. Express ratification takes place when the individual, on reaching the age of majority, states orally or in writing that he or she intends to be bound by the contract. Implied ratification takes place when the minor, on reaching the age of majority, indicates an intent to abide by the contract.

For example, suppose that Lin enters a contract to sell her laptop to Arturo, a minor. If, on reaching the age of majority, Arturo writes a letter to Lin stating that he still agrees to buy the laptop, he has expressly ratified the contract. If, instead, Arturo takes possession of the laptop as a minor and continues to use it well after reaching the age of majority, he has impliedly ratified the contract.

If a minor fails to disaffirm a contract within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority, then the court must determine whether the conduct constitutes ratification or disaffirmance. Generally, a contract that is executed (fully performed by both parties) is presumed to be ratified. A contract that is still executory (not yet fully performed by both parties) normally is considered to be disaffirmed.

Parents' Liability As a general rule, parents are not liable for contracts made by minor children acting on their own. This is why businesses ordinarily require parents to cosign any contract made with a minor. The parents then become personally obligated under the contract even if their child avoids liability.

Normally, minors are personally liable for their own torts. The parents of the minor can also be held liable in certain situations. In some states, parents may be liable if they failed to exercise proper parental control over the minor child when they knew or should have known that this lack of control posed an unreasonable risk of harm to others. Suppose that parents allow their eleven-year-old child to drive a car on public roads. If the child drives negligently and causes someone else to be injured, the parents may be held liable for the minor's tort (negligence). Other states have enacted statutes that impose liability on parents for certain tortious acts, such as those that are willful or grossly negligent, that their children commit. Concept Summary 13.1 reviews the rules relating to contracts by minors.

Intoxication

Intoxication is a condition in which a person's normal capacity to act or think is inhibited by alcohol or some other drug.⁴ A contract entered into by an intoxicated person can be either voidable or valid (and thus enforceable). If the person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack mental capacity, then the contract may be voidable even if the intoxication was purely voluntary. For the contract to be voidable, however, the person must prove that the intoxication impaired her or his reason

4. Note that if an alcoholic makes a contract while sober, there is no lack of capacity. See Wright v. Fisher, 32 N.W.605 (Mich. 1887).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 13.1 Contracts by Minors

Concept	Description
GENERAL RULE	Contracts entered into by minors are voidable at the option of the minor.
RULES OF DISAFFIRMANCE	A minor may disaffirm the contract at any time while still a minor and within a reasonable time after reaching the age of majority. Most states do not require restitution.
EXCEPTIONS TO BASIC RULES OF DISAFFIRMANCE	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Necessaries—Minors remain liable for the reasonable value of the necessities (goods and services). 2. Ratification—After reaching the age of majority, a person can ratify a contract that he or she formed as a minor, becoming fully liable thereon. 3. Fraud or misrepresentation—In many jurisdictions, misrepresentation of age prohibits the right of disaffirmance.

and judgment so severely that she or he did not comprehend the legal consequences of entering into the contract.

If, despite intoxication, the person understood the legal consequences of the agreement, the contract will be enforceable. The fact that the terms of the contract are foolish or obviously favor the other party does not make the contract voidable (unless the other party fraudulently induced the person to become intoxicated).

As a practical matter, courts rarely permit contracts to be avoided on the ground of intoxication because it is difficult to determine whether a party was sufficiently intoxicated to lack contractual capacity. Many courts prefer to look at objective indications of agreement when dealing with intoxicated parties.⁵

Disaffirmance If a contract is voidable because of a person's intoxication, that person has the option of disaffirming it while intoxicated and for a reasonable time after becoming sober—the same option available to a minor. To avoid the contract in most states, the person claiming intoxication must be able to return all consideration received—except in contracts involving necessities. Contracts for necessities are voidable, but the intoxicated person is liable in quasi contract for the reasonable value of the consideration received.

5. See, for example, Case 11.1 (Lucy v. Zehmer) in Chapter 11.

Ratification An intoxicated person, after becoming sober, may ratify a contract expressly or impliedly, just as a minor may do on reaching majority. Implied ratification occurs when a person enters into a contract while intoxicated and fails to disaffirm the contract within a reasonable time after becoming sober. Acts or conduct inconsistent with an intent to disaffirm—such as the continued use of property purchased under a voidable contract—will also ratify the contract. See Concept Summary 13.2 for a review of the rules relating to contracts by intoxicated persons.

Mental Incompetence

Contracts made by mentally incompetent persons can be void, voidable, or valid. We look here at the circumstances that determine which of these classifications apply:

When the Contract Will Be Void If a court has previously determined that a person is mentally incompetent and has appointed a guardian to represent the individual, any contract made by the mentally incompetent person is void—no contract exists. Only the guardian can enter into binding legal obligations on the incompetent person's behalf.

When the Contract Will Be Voidable If a court has not previously judged a person to be mentally incompetent but in fact the person was incompetent at the time the contract was formed, the contract

CONCEPT SUMMARY 13.2 Contracts by Intoxicated Persons

Concept	Description
GENERAL RULES	If a person was sufficiently intoxicated to lack the mental capacity to comprehend the legal consequences of entering into the contract, the contract may be voidable at the option of the intoxicated person. If, despite intoxication, the person understood these legal consequences, the contract will be enforceable.
DISAFFIRMANCE	An intoxicated person may disaffirm the contract at any time while intoxicated and for a reasonable time after becoming sober but must make full restitution. Contracts for necessities are voidable, but the intoxicated person is liable for the reasonable value of the goods or services.
RATIFICATION	After becoming sober, a person can ratify a contract that she or he formed while intoxicated, becoming fully liable thereon.

may be voidable. A contract is voidable if the person did not know he or she was entering into the contract or lacked the mental capacity to comprehend its nature, purpose, and consequences. Only the mentally incompetent person has the option to avoid the contract, not the other party. The contract may then be disaffirmed or ratified (if the person regains mental competence). Like intoxicated persons, mentally incompetent persons must return any consideration and pay for the reasonable value of any necessities they receive.

For example, Milo, who had not been previously declared incompetent by a judge, agrees to sell twenty lots in a prime residential neighborhood to Anastof. At the time of entering the contract, Milo is mentally incompetent and is confused over which lots he is selling and how much they are worth. As a result, he contracts to sell the properties for substantially less than their market value. If the court finds that Milo was unable to understand the nature and consequences of the contract, Milo can avoid the sale, provided that he returns any consideration he received.

When the Contract Will Be Valid A contract entered into by a mentally incompetent person (whom a court has not previously declared incompetent) may also be valid if the person had capacity at the time the contract was formed. A person may be able to understand the nature and effect of entering into a certain contract yet simultaneously lack capacity to engage in other activities. If so, the contract will be valid because the person does not lack contractual capacity.⁶ Similarly, an otherwise mentally incompetent person may have a lucid interval—a temporary restoration of sufficient intelligence, judgment, and will—during which she or he will be considered to have full legal capacity. See Concept Summary 13.3 for a review of the rules relating to contracts entered into by mentally incompetent persons.

Legality

For a contract to be valid and enforceable, it must be formed for a legal purpose. A contract to do something that is prohibited by federal or state statutory law is illegal and, as such, void from the outset and thus unenforceable. Also, a contract that calls for a tortious act or an action contrary to public policy is illegal and unenforceable. It is important to note that a contract or a clause in a contract may be illegal even in the absence of a specific statute prohibiting the action promised by the contract.

Contracts Contrary to Statute

Statutes often prescribe the terms of contracts. We now examine several ways in which contracts may be contrary to statute and thus illegal.

6. Modern courts no longer require a person to be completely irrational to disaffirm contracts on the basis of mental incompetence. A contract may be voidable if, by reason of a mental illness or defect, an individual was unable to act reasonably with respect to the transaction and the other party had reason to know of the condition.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 13.3 Contracts by Mentally Incompetent Persons

VOID	If a court has declared a person to be mentally incompetent and appointed a legal guardian, any contract made by that person is void from the outset.
VOIDABLE	If a court has not declared a person mentally incompetent, but that person lacked the capacity to comprehend the subject matter, nature, and consequences of the agreement, then the contract is voidable at that person's option.
VALID	If a court has not declared a person mentally incompetent and that person was able to understand the nature and effect of the contract at the time it was formed, then the contract is valid and enforceable.

Contracts to Commit a Crime Any contract to commit a crime is a contract in violation of a statute. Thus, a contract to sell an illegal drug (the sale of which is prohibited by statute) is not enforceable, and a contract to provide inside information regarding the sale of securities is unenforceable (violations of securities laws will be discussed in Chapter 41). Should the object or performance of the contract be rendered illegal by statute after the contract has been entered into, the contract is considered to be discharged by law. (See the discussion of impossibility or impracticability of performance in Chapter 17.)

Usury Virtually every state has a statute that sets the maximum rate of interest that can be charged for different types of transactions, including ordinary loans. A lender who makes a loan at an interest rate above the lawful maximum commits usury. The maximum rate of interest varies from state to state, as do the consequences for lenders who make usurious loans. Some states allow the lender to recover only the principal of a loan along with interest up to the legal maximum. In effect, the lender is denied recovery of the excess interest. In other states, the lender can recover the principal amount of the loan but no interest.

Although usury statutes place a ceiling on allowable rates of interest, exceptions have been made to facilitate business transactions. For example, many states exempt corporate loans from the usury laws, and nearly all states allow higher interest rate loans for borrowers who could not otherwise obtain funds.

Gambling All states have statutes that regulate gambling—defined as any scheme that involves a distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid a valuable consideration for the opportunity (chance) to receive the property. Gambling is the creation of risk for the purpose of assuming it. Traditionally, state statutes have deemed gambling contracts to be illegal and thus void.

In several states, however, including Louisiana, Michigan, Nevada, and New Jersey, casino gambling is lawful. In other states, certain forms of gambling are legal. California, for example, has not defined draw poker as a crime, although criminal statutes prohibit numerous other types of gambling games. A number of states allow gambling at horse races, and the majority of the states have legalized state-operated lotteries, as well as lotteries (such as bingo) conducted for charitable purposes. Many states also allow gambling on Indian reservations.

Sometimes, it is difficult to distinguish a gambling contract from the risk sharing inherent in almost all contracts. In one case, five co-workers each received a free lottery ticket from a customer and agreed to split the winnings if one of the tickets turned out to be the winning one. At first glance, this may seem entirely legal. The court, however, noted that the oral contract in this case “was an exchange of promises to share winnings from the parties’ individually owned lottery tickets upon the happening of the uncertain event” that one of the tickets would win. Consequently, concluded the court, the agreement at issue was “founded on a gambling consideration” and therefore was void.⁷

Online Gambling A significant issue today is how gambling laws can be applied in the Internet context. Because state laws pertaining to gambling differ, online gambling raises a number of unique issues. For example, if a state does not allow casino gambling or offtrack betting, what can the state government do if its residents place bets online? Also, where does the actual act of gambling occur? For example, suppose that a resident of New York places bets via the Internet at a gambling site located in Antigua. Is the actual act of “gambling” taking place in New York or in Antigua? According to a New York court in one case, “if the person engaged in gambling is located in New York, then New York is the location where the gambling occurred.”⁸ Other states’ courts may take a different view, however.

Another issue is whether entering contracts that involve gambling on sports teams that do not really exist—fantasy sports—is a form of gambling. For a discussion of this issue, see this chapter’s Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 274–275.

Sabbath (Sunday) Laws Statutes referred to as Sabbath (Sunday) laws prohibit the formation or performance of certain contracts on a Sunday. These statutes, which date back to colonial times, are often called blue laws. Blue laws get their name from the blue paper on which New Haven, Connecticut, printed its town ordinance in 1781 that prohibited work and required businesses to close on Sunday. According to a few state and local laws, all contracts entered into on a Sunday are illegal. Laws in other states or municipalities prohibit only the sale of certain types of merchandise, such as alcoholic beverages, on a Sunday.

7. Dickerson v. Deno, 770 So.2d 63 (Ala.2000).

8. United States v. Cohen, 260 F.3d 68 (2d Cir.2001).

In most states with such statutes, contracts that were entered into on a Sunday can be ratified during a weekday. Also, if a contract that was entered into on a Sunday has been fully performed (executed), normally it cannot be rescinded (canceled). When the date of performance of a contract ends on Sunday, the general view is that the contract is performable on the next business day, and therefore it is not illegal. Many states do not enforce Sunday laws, and some state courts have held these laws to be unconstitutional because they interfere with the freedom of religion.

Licensing Statutes All states require that members of certain professions or occupations obtain licenses allowing them to practice. Physicians, lawyers, real estate brokers, architects, electricians, and stockbrokers are but a few of the people who must be licensed. Some licenses are obtained only after extensive schooling and examinations, which indicate to the public that a special skill has been acquired. Others require only that the particular person be of good moral character and pay a fee.

Generally, business licenses provide a means of regulating and taxing certain enterprises and protecting the public against actions that could threaten the general welfare. For example, in nearly all states, a stockbroker must be licensed and must file a bond with the state to protect the public from fraudulent stock transactions. Similarly, a plumber must be licensed and bonded to protect the public against incompetent plumbers and to protect the public health. Only persons or businesses possessing the qualifications and complying with the conditions required by statute are entitled to licenses.

When a person enters into a contract with an unlicensed individual, the contract may still be enforceable, depending on the nature of the licensing statute. Some states expressly provide that the lack of a license in certain occupations bars the enforcement of work-related contracts. If the statute does not expressly declare this, one must look to the underlying purpose of the licensing requirements for a particular occupation. If the purpose is to protect the public from unauthorized practitioners, a contract involving an unlicensed individual normally is illegal and unenforceable. If the underlying purpose of the statute is to raise government revenues, however, a contract entered into with an unlicensed practitioner generally is enforceable—although the unlicensed person is usually fined.

Contracts Contrary to Public Policy

Although contracts involve private parties, some are not enforceable because of the negative impact they would have on society. Examples include a contract to commit an immoral act, such as selling a child, and a contract that prohibits marriage. We look here at certain types of business contracts that are often said to be contrary to public policy.

Contracts in Restraint of Trade Contracts in restraint of trade (anticompetitive agreements) usually adversely affect the public policy that favors competition in the economy. Typically, such contracts also violate one or more federal or state statutes.⁹ An exception is recognized when the restraint is reasonable and is contained in an ancillary (secondary, or subordinate) clause in a contract. Many such exceptions involve a type of restraint called a covenant not to compete, or a restrictive covenant.

Covenants Not to Compete and the Sale of an Ongoing Business. Covenants (promises) not to compete are often contained as ancillary clauses in contracts concerning the sale of an ongoing business. A covenant not to compete is created when a seller agrees not to open a new store in a certain geographic area surrounding the existing store. Such agreements enable the seller to sell, and the purchaser to buy, the goodwill and reputation of an ongoing business. If, for example, a well-known merchant sells her store and opens a competing business a block away, many customers will likely do business at the merchant's new store. This, in turn, renders less valuable the good name and reputation purchased for a price by the new owner of the old store. If a covenant not to compete is not ancillary to a sales agreement, however, it is void, because it unreasonably restrains trade and is contrary to public policy.

Covenants Not to Compete in Employment Contracts. Agreements not to compete (sometimes referred to as noncompete agreements) can also be contained in employment contracts. People in middle- or upper-level management positions commonly agree not to work for competitors or not to start competing businesses for a specified period of time after termination of employment. Such agreements are legal in most states so long as the specified 9. Federal statutes include the Sherman Antitrust Act, the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act (see Chapter 46).

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Are Online Fantasy Sports Gambling?

As many as 20 million adults in the United States play some form of fantasy sports via the Internet. A fantasy sport is a game in which participants, often called owners, build teams composed of real-life players from different real-life teams. A fantasy team then competes against the fantasy teams belonging to other "owners." At the end of each week, the statistical performances of all the real-life players are translated into points, and the points of all the players on an owner's fantasy team are totaled. Although a wide variety of fantasy games are available, most participants play fantasy football. On many fantasy sports sites, participants pay a fee in order to play and use the site's facilities, such as statistical tracking and message boards; at the end of the season, prizes ranging from T-shirts to flat-screen televisions are awarded to the winners.

In other instances, the participants in fantasy sports gamble directly on the outcome. In a fantasy football league, for example, each participant-owner adds a given amount to the pot and then "drafts" his or her fantasy team from actual National Football League players. At the end of the football season, each owner's points are totaled, and the owner with the most points wins the pot.

Congress Weighs In

As online gambling has expanded, Congress has attempted to regulate it. In late 2006, a federal law went into effect that makes it illegal for credit-card companies and banks to engage in transactions with Internet gambling companies.^a Although the law does not prohibit individuals from placing online bets, in effect it makes it almost impossible for them to do so by preventing them from obtaining financing for online gambling. At first glance, the legislation appears comprehensive, but it specifically exempts Internet wagers on horse racing, state lotteries, and fantasy sports. Hence, one could argue that Congress has determined that fantasy sports do not constitute a prohibited Internet gambling activity.

Testing the Gambling Aspect in Court

Thus far, the courts have had the opportunity to rule only on whether the pay-to-play fantasy sports sites that charge an entrance fee and offer prizes to the winners are running gambling operations. Charles Humphrey brought a lawsuit against Viacom, ESPN, The Sporting News, and other hosts of such fantasy sports sites under a New Jersey statute that allows the recovery of gambling losses. Humphrey claimed that the fantasy sports leagues were games of chance, not games of skill, because events beyond the participants' control could determine the period of time (of restraint) is not excessive in duration and the geographic restriction is reasonable. What constitutes a reasonable time period may be shorter in the online environment than in conventional employment contracts because the restrictions apply worldwide.

a. Security and Accountability for Every Port Act, Public L. No. 109-347, Sections 5361-5367, ___ Stat. ___ (2006). (A version of the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act of 2006 was incorporated into this statute as Title VIII.)

To be reasonable, a restriction on competition must protect a legitimate business interest and must not be any greater than necessary to protect that interest.¹⁰ In the following case, the court had to decide whether it was reasonable for an employer's noncompete agreement to restrict a former employee from competing "in any area of business" in which the employer was engaged.

10. See, for example, Gould & Lamb, LLC v. D'Alusio, 949 So.2d 1212 (Fla.App. 2007). See also Moore v. Midwest Distribution, Inc., 76 Ark.App. 397, 65 S.W.3d 490 (2002).

CASE 13.2 Stultz v. Safety and Compliance Management, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Georgia, 2007. 285 Ga.App. 799, 648 S.E.2d 129.

- Background and Facts Safety and Compliance Management, Inc. (S & C), in Rossville, Georgia, provides alcohol- and drug-testing services in multiple states. In February 2002, S & C hired Angela Burgess. Her job duties included providing customer service, ensuring that specimens were prop-outcome—for example, a star quarterback might be injured. He also pointed out that in the offline world, federal law prohibits any games of chance, such as sweepstakes or drawings, that require entrants to submit consideration in order to play. Consideration has been defined as the purchase of a product or the payment of money. For these reasons, he argued, the entrance fees constituted gambling losses that could be recovered.

The federal district court that heard the case ruled against Humphrey, mostly on procedural grounds, but the court did conclude that as a matter of law the entrance fees did not constitute “bets” or “wagers” because the fees are paid unconditionally, the prizes offered are for a fixed amount and certain to be awarded, and the defendants do not compete for the prizes.^b The court also observed that if a combination of entrance fees and prizes constituted gambling, a host of contests ranging from golf tournaments to track meets to spelling bees and beauty contests would be gambling operations—a conclusion that the court deemed “patently absurd.”^c Note, however, that the case involved only pay-to-play sites. The court did not have to address the question of whether fantasy sports sites that enable participants to contribute to a pot in the hopes of winning it at the end of the season constitute gambling sites.

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Determining what is and what is not gambling does not always lend itself to an easy answer. If you buy a mutual fund that consists of a broad array of stocks and your purpose is to enhance your standard of living during your retirement, no one considers that gambling. In contrast, if you are a day trader—buying and selling stocks during a one-day period—you are clearly “betting” that the stocks you buy in the morning and then sell in the evening will have gone up in value. Should day trading be deemed gambling and therefore illegal? Where do you draw the line between what is and what is not gambling in our society?

b. Humphrey v. Viacom, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.N.J. 2007).

c. In reaching this conclusion, the federal district court cited portions of an Arizona Supreme Court ruling, State v. American Holiday Association, Inc., 151 Ariz. 312, 727 P.2d 807 (1986).

CASE 13.2 CONTINUED

erly retrieved from clients and transported to the testing lab, contacting clients, and managing the office. Burgess signed a covenant not to compete “in any area of business conducted by Safety and Compliance Management . . . for a two-year period . . . beginning at the termination of employment.” In May 2004, Burgess quit her job to work at Rossville Medical Center (RMC) as a medical assistant. RMC provides medical services, including occupational medicine, medical physicals, and workers’ compensation injury treatment. RMC also offers alcohol- and drug-testing services. Burgess’s duties included setting patient appointments, taking patient medical histories, checking vital signs, performing urinalysis testing, administering injections, conducting alcohol breath tests, and collecting specimens for drug testing. S & C filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Burgess and others (including a defendant named Stultz), alleging, among other things, that she had violated the noncompete agreement. The court issued a summary judgment in S & C’s favor. Burgess appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT BERNES, Judge.

* * * *

Restrictive covenants that are ancillary to an employment contract are subject to strict scrutiny and will be voided by Georgia courts if they impose an unreasonable restraint on trade. Whether the restraint imposed by the employment contract is reasonable is a question of law for determination by the court, which considers the nature and extent of the trade or business, the situation of the parties, and all the other circumstances. A three-element test of duration, territorial coverage, and scope of activity has evolved as a helpful tool in examining the reasonableness of the particular factual setting to which it is applied. * * * [Emphasis added.]

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 13.2 CONTINUED

* * * Burgess contends that the trial court erred in concluding that the non-competition agreement was reasonable as to the scope of the activity prohibited. * * *

The non-competition agreement provides that Burgess “will not compete * * * in any area of business conducted by [S & C].” Although the next sentence of the agreement provides some particularity by referring to the solicitation of existing accounts, the agreement, when read as a whole, plainly is intended to prevent any type of competing activity whatsoever, with the reference to solicitation merely being illustrative of one type of activity that is prohibited. * * * Thus, when properly construed, the non-competition agreement prohibits, without qualification, Burgess from competing in any area of business conducted by S & C.

Such a prohibition clearly is unreasonable * * *. A non-competition covenant which prohibits an employee from working for a competitor in any capacity, that is, a covenant which fails to specify with particularity the activities which the employee is prohibited from performing, is too broad and indefinite to be enforceable. And, Georgia courts have interpreted contractual language similar to that found in the present case as essentially prohibiting an employee from working for a competitor in any capacity whatsoever. * * * In light of this case law, we conclude that the non-competition agreement imposes a greater limitation upon Burgess than is necessary for the protection of S & C and therefore is unenforceable. [Emphasis added.]

It is true, as S & C maintains, that there are factual circumstances where an otherwise questionable restrictive covenant that prohibits working for a competitor will be upheld as reasonable. More specifically, a suspect restriction upon the scope of activity may nevertheless be upheld when the underlying facts reflect that the contracting party was the very heart and soul of the business whose departure effectively brought the business to a standstill. Moreover, the “heart and soul” exception is applicable only where the restrictive covenant otherwise applies to a very restricted territory and for a short period of time.

S & C, however, has failed to allege or present evidence showing that Burgess was the heart and soul of its alcohol and drug testing business. Although Burgess was a major player in S & C’s business, she was, when all is said and done, an employee. Her departure may have hurt S & C; but it did not bring the business to a halt. It cannot be said, therefore, that Burgess was the heart and soul of the business.

● Decision and Remedy The court reversed the judgment of the lower court. The state intermediate appellate court concluded that the covenant not to compete that Burgess signed “is unreasonable as to the scope of the activity prohibited” because “it is overly broad and indefinite.” Thus, the covenant was not enforceable.

● The Ethical Dimension To determine the enforceability of a covenant not to compete, the courts balance the rights of an employer against those of a former employee. What are these rights? How did S & C’s covenant not to compete tip the balance in the employer’s favor?

● The Global Dimension Should an employer be permitted to restrict a former employee from engaging in a competing business on a global level? Why or why not?

Enforcement Problems. The laws governing the enforceability of covenants not to compete vary significantly from state to state. In some states, such as Texas, such a covenant will not be enforced unless the employee has received some benefit in return for signing the noncompete agreement. This is true even if the covenant is reasonable as to time and area. If the employee receives no benefit, the covenant will be deemed void. California prohibits the enforcement of covenants not to compete altogether.

If a covenant is found to be unreasonable in time or geographic area, courts in some jurisdictions may convert the terms into reasonable ones and then enforce the reformed covenant. A court normally will engage in this kind of rewriting of the terms only in rare situations, however, when it is necessary to prevent undue burdens or hardships.

Unconscionable Contracts or Clauses

Ordinarily, a court does not look at the fairness or equity of a contract. For example, the courts generally do not inquire into the adequacy of consideration (as discussed in Chapter 12). Persons are assumed to be reasonably intelligent, and the courts will not come to their aid just because they have made an unwise or foolish bargain. In certain circumstances, however, bargains are so oppressive that the courts relieve innocent parties of part or all of their duties. Such bargains are deemed unconscionable because they are so unscrupulous or grossly unfair as to be “void of conscience.”¹¹ A contract can be unconscionable on either procedural or substantive grounds, as discussed in the following subsections and illustrated graphically in Exhibit 13-1 on page 279.

Procedural Unconscionability. Procedural unconscionability has to do with how a term becomes part of a contract and involves factors that make it difficult for a party to know or understand the contract terms—for example, inconspicuous print, unintelligible language (“legalese”), or the lack of an opportunity to read the contract or to ask questions about its meaning. Procedural unconscionability may also occur when there is such disparity in bargaining power between the two parties that the weaker party’s consent is not voluntary. Contracts entered into because of one party’s vastly superior bargaining power may be deemed unconscionable. These situations often involve an adhesion contract, which is a contract written exclusively by one party (the dominant party, usually the seller or creditor) and presented to the other (the adhering party, usually the buyer or borrower) on a take-it-or-leave-it basis.¹² In other words, the adhering party has no opportunity to negotiate the terms of the contract. Standard-form contracts are often adhesion contracts.

In the following case, the question was whether a standard-form contract clause that mandated individual arbitration of any dispute and precluded class action¹³ was unconscionable.

11. The Uniform Commercial Code incorporated the concept of unconscionability in Sections 2-302 and 2A-108. These provisions, which apply to contracts for the sale or lease of goods, will be discussed in Chapter 20.

12. For a classic case involving an adhesion contract, see Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc., 32 N.J. 358, 161 A.2d 69 (1960).

13. A class action is a lawsuit in which one or more individuals with similar legal claims join together in a group to sue as a class without every member of the group needing to appear in court.

CASE 13.3 Thibodeau v. Comcast Corp.

Superior Court of Pennsylvania, 2006. 2006 PA Super 346, 912 A.2d 874.

- Company Profile Comcast Corporation (www.comcast.com) was founded in 1963 as a single-system cable television operation. Today, Comcast is the largest provider of cable services in the United States and one of the leading providers of entertainment and communications products and services in the world. Comcast offers interactive digital services, including Internet service, Web entertainment and information sites, and IP-enabled phone service. Comcast also provides digital cable services, high-definition television, and video on demand. Comcast is involved in the development, management, and operation of broadband cable networks and in the delivery of programming content, such as E! Entertainment Television and Comcast SportsNet.

- Background and Facts Comcast Corporation provides cable-television services. Its corporate headquarters are in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Philip Thibodeau was a Comcast subscriber in Massachusetts. As part of his subscription for extended basic cable service, Thibodeau rented two converter boxes and two remote controls, which he thought were needed to receive the broadcasts. At the time, Comcast did not tell its customers that nonpremium programming could be viewed without the boxes and that the remotes were wholly unnecessary. In 2002, Comcast mailed Thibodeau and others a new “customer agreement” that mandated the individual arbitration of all disputes and precluded class action. On behalf of Comcast’s basic-service customers, Thibodeau filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Comcast and others, asserting that the customers were being improperly billed for unnecessary converter boxes and remote controls. The defendants sought to dismiss the complaint and compel arbitration under the “customer agreement.” The court denied this request. Comcast appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 13.3 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
Opinion by MUSMANNO, J. [Judge]

* * * *

In this case, the trial court applied general principles of Pennsylvania contract law, applicable to all contracts, when it concluded that the arbitration provision at issue was unconscionable and unenforceable. * * *

Pennsylvania law concerning the enforceability of arbitration agreements is in accordance with Federal law, requiring that arbitration agreements be enforced as written * * *. However, where the arbitration clause is contained in an adhesion contract and unfairly favors the drafting party, such clauses are unconscionable and must be deemed unenforceable. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Contracts of adhesion are standardized form contracts presented to consumers without negotiation or any option for modification. * * * [A] contract of adhesion is one prepared by one party, to be signed by the party in a weaker position, usually a consumer, who has little choice about the terms. The Comcast customer agreement received by the plaintiff and all other class members are clearly contracts of adhesion. They were sent without any opportunity for customers to negotiate and even without any requirement of assent * * *.

There is nothing per se wrong with a contract of adhesion. Not every contract of adhesion contains unconscionable provisions. A contract of adhesion is only unconscionable if it unreasonably favors the drafter. * * * In determining whether a clause is unconscionable, the court should consider whether, in light of the general commercial background and the commercial needs of a particular trade, the clause is so one-sided that it is unconscionable under the circumstances. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Class actions are * * * of great public importance. Class action lawsuits are * * * the essential vehicle by which consumers may vindicate their lawful rights. The average consumer, having limited financial resources and time, cannot individually present minor claims in court * * *.

* * * *

It is only the class action vehicle which makes small consumer litigation possible. Consumers joining together as a class pool their resources, share the costs and efforts of litigation and make redress possible. Should the law require consumers to litigate or arbitrate individually, defendant corporations are effectively immunized from redress of grievances.

The Comcast customer agreement attempts to preclude all class action * * * and attempts to mandate that all customers arbitrate all claims as individuals. The Comcast customer agreement is a contract of adhesion unilaterally imposed on all consumers. Consumers including Mr. Thibodeau are subject to every term without choice. * * * Mr. Thibodeau was forced to accept every word of all 10 pages of the mass-delivered Comcast customer agreement or have no cable television service * * *.

Mr. Thibodeau and his class members are claiming minimal damages. * * * Mr. Thibodeau and each of his class members allege they were unlawfully overcharged $9.60 per month. * * * No individual will expend the time, fees, costs and/or other expenses necessary for individual litigation or individual arbitration for this small potential recovery. If the mandatory individual arbitration and preclusion of class action provisions are valid, Comcast is immunized from * * * any minor consumer claims. It is clearly contrary to public policy to immunize large corporations from liability by allowing them to preclude all class action.

● Decision and Remedy The court upheld the lower court’s denial of the defendant’s request to compel individual arbitration. The state intermediate appellate court held that the preclusion of all

CHAPTER 13 Capacity and Legality

CASE 13.3 CONTINUED class action in the “customer agreement” was “unconscionable and unenforceable.” The court reasoned that the relatively high cost for an individual to obtain a minor recovery would otherwise effectively “immunize [the] corporations from liability.”

● What If the Facts Were Different? If the “customer agreement” had precluded only class litigation and mandated class arbitration, would the court have considered the provision unconscionable? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Forums for arbitration and other methods of alternative dispute resolution (ADR) are available online. Should the reduced cost and other factors favoring online ADR be considered in determining the unconscionability of provisions such as the clause at issue in this case?

Substantive Unconscionability. Substantive unconscionability characterizes those contracts, or portions of contracts, that are oppressive or overly harsh. Courts generally focus on provisions that deprive one party of the benefits of the agreement or leave that party without a remedy for nonperformance by the other. For example, suppose that a person with little income and with only a fourth-grade education agrees to purchase a refrigerator for $4,000 and signs a two-year installment contract. The same type of refrigerator usually sells for $900 on the market. Some courts have held this type of contract to be unconscionable because the contract terms are so oppressive as to “shock the conscience” of the court.¹⁴

Substantive unconscionability can arise in a wide variety of business contexts. For example, a contract clause that gives the business entity free access to the courts but requires the other party to arbitrate any dispute with the firm may be unconscionable.¹⁵ Similarly, 14. See, for example, Jones v. Star Credit Corp., 59 Misc.2d 189, 298 N.Y.S.2d 264 (1969). This case will be presented in Chapter 20 as Case 20.3.

15. See, for example, Wisconsin Auto Loans, Inc. v. Jones, 290 Wis.2d 514, 714 N.W.2d 155 (2006).

EXHIBIT 13-1 • Unconscionability

an arbitration clause in a credit-card agreement that prevents credit cardholders from obtaining relief for abusive debt-collection practices under consumer law may be unconscionable.¹⁶ Contracts drafted by insurance companies and cell phone providers have been struck down as substantively unconscionable when they included provisions that were overly harsh or one sided.¹⁷

Exculpatory Clauses Closely related to the concept of unconscionability are exculpatory clauses—clauses that release a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury no matter who is at fault. Indeed, courts sometimes refuse to enforce such clauses on the ground that they are unconscionable. Suppose, for example, that an employer requires its employees to sign a contract containing a provision that shields the employer from liability for any injuries to those employees. In that situation, a court would usually hold the exculpatory clause to be contrary to public policy.¹⁸ Exculpatory clauses found in rental agreements for commercial property are frequently held to be contrary to public policy, and such clauses are almost always unenforceable in residential property leases.

Although courts view exculpatory clauses with disfavor, they do enforce such clauses when they do not contravene public policy, are not ambiguous, and do not claim to protect parties from liability for intentional misconduct. Businesses such as health clubs, racetracks, amusement parks, skiing facilities, horse- rental operations, golf-cart concessions, and skydiving organizations frequently use exculpatory clauses to limit their liability for patrons' injuries. Because these services are not essential, the firms offering them are sometimes considered to have no relative advantage in bargaining strength, and anyone contracting for their services is considered to do so voluntarily.

Discriminatory Contracts Contracts in which a party promises to discriminate on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, gender, age, or disability are contrary to both statute and public policy. They are also unenforceable.¹⁹ For example, if a property owner promises in a contract not to sell the property to a member of a particular race, the contract is unenforceable. The public policy underlying these prohibitions is very strong, and the courts are quick to invalidate discriminatory contracts. Exhibit 13–2 illustrates the types of contracts that may be illegal because they are contrary to statute or public policy.

Effect of Illegality

In general, an illegal contract is void—that is, the contract is deemed never to have existed, and the courts will not aid either party. In most illegal contracts, both parties are considered to be *in pari delicto*²⁰ (equally at fault). In such cases, the contract is void. If the contract is executory, neither party can enforce it. If it has been executed, there can be neither contractual nor quasi-contractual recovery.

That one wrongdoer who is a party to an illegal contract is unjustly enriched at the expense of the other is of no concern to the law—except under certain special circumstances that will be discussed below. The major justification for this hands-off attitude is that it is improper to place the machinery of justice at the disposal of a plaintiff who has broken the law by entering into an illegal bargain. Another justification is the hoped-for deterrent effect of this general hands-off rule. A plaintiff who suffers loss because of an illegal bargain should presumably be deterred from entering into similar illegal bargains.

Exceptions to the General Rule There are some exceptions to the general rule that neither party to an illegal bargain can sue for breach and that neither party can recover for performance rendered.

Justifiable Ignorance of the Facts. When one of the parties is relatively innocent, that party can often recover any benefits conferred in a partially executed contract. In this situation, the courts will not enforce the contract but will allow the parties to return to their original positions. An innocent party who has fully performed under the contract may sometimes enforce the 16. See, for example, Coady v. Cross County Bank, 2007 WI App 26, 299 Wis.2d 420, 729 N.W.2d 732 (2007).

17. See, for example, Gatton v. T-Mobile USA, Inc., 152 Cal.App.4th 571, 61 Cal.Rptr.3d 344 (2007); Kinkel v. Cingular Wireless LLC, 223 Ill.2d 1, 857 N.E.2d 250, 306 Ill.Dec. 157 (2006); and Aul v. Golden Rule Insurance Co., 737 N.W.2d 24 (Wis.App.2007).

18. For a case with similar facts, see Little Rock & Fort Smith Railway Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 460, 3 S.W. 808 (1887). Today, this type of exculpatory clause may also be illegal on the basis of a violation of a state workers' compensation law.

19. The major federal statute prohibiting discrimination is the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. Sections 2000e–2000e-17. For a discussion of this act and other acts prohibiting discrimination in the employment context, see Chapter 34.

20. Pronounced in pah-ree deh-lick-tow.

EXHIBIT 13-2 • Contract Legality contract against the guilty party. For example, a trucking company contracts with Gillespie to carry goods to a specific destination for a normal fee of $5,000. The trucker delivers the goods and later finds out that the contents of the shipped crates were illegal. Although the law specifies that the shipment, use, and sale of the goods were illegal, the trucker, being an innocent party, can still legally collect the $5,000 from Gillespie.

Members of Protected Classes. When a statute is clearly designed to protect a certain class of people, a member of that class can enforce a contract in violation of the statute even though the other party cannot. For example, flight attendants and pilots are subject to a federal statute that prohibits them from flying more than a certain number of hours every month. If an attendant or a pilot exceeds the maximum, the airline must nonetheless pay for those extra hours of service.

State statutes often regulate the sale of insurance. If an insurance company violates a statute when selling insurance, the purchaser can nevertheless enforce the policy and recover from the insurer.

Withdrawal from an Illegal Agreement. If an agreement has been only partly carried out and the illegal portion of the bargain has not yet been performed, the party rendering performance can withdraw from the contract and recover the performance or its value. For example, Sam and Jim decide to wager (illegally) on the outcome of a boxing match. Each deposits money with a stakeholder, who agrees to pay the winner of the bet. At this point, each party has performed part of the agreement, but the illegal element of the agreement will not occur until the funds are paid to the winner. Before such payment occurs, either party is entitled to withdraw from the bargain by giving notice of repudiation to the stakeholder.

Contract Illegal through Fraud, Duress, or Undue Influence. Often, one party to an illegal contract is more at fault than the other. When a party has been induced to enter into an illegal bargain by fraud, duress, or undue influence on the part of the other party to the agreement, that party will be allowed to recover for the performance or its value.

Severable, or Divisible, Contracts A contract that is severable, or divisible, consists of distinct parts that can be performed separately, with separate consideration provided for each part. In contrast, a contract is indivisible when the parties intend that complete performance by each party will be essential, even if the contract contains a number of seemingly separate provisions.

If a contract is divisible into legal and illegal portions, a court may enforce the legal portion but not the illegal one, so long as the illegal portion does not affect the essence of the bargain.²¹ This approach is consistent with the courts' basic policy of enforcing the legal intentions of the contracting parties whenever possible. For example, suppose that Cole signs an employment contract that includes an overly broad and thus illegal covenant not to compete. In that situation, the court might allow the employment contract to be enforceable but reform the unreasonably broad covenant by converting its terms into reasonable ones. Alternatively, the court could declare the covenant illegal (and thus void) and enforce the remaining employment terms.

21. The United States Supreme Court has held that under the Federal Arbitration Act, arbitration clauses are severable from the underlying contract. See Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 U.S. 440, 126 S.Ct. 1204, 163 L.Ed.2d 1038 (2006), which was presented as Case 2.2 in Chapter 2.

REVIEWING Capacity and Legality

Renee Beaver started racing go-karts competitively in 1997, when she was fourteen. Many of the races required her to sign an exculpatory clause to participate, which she or her parents regularly signed. In 2000, she participated in the annual Elkhart Grand Prix, a series of races in Elkhart, Indiana. During the event in which she drove, a piece of foam padding used as a course barrier was torn from its base and ended up on the track. A portion of the padding struck Beaver in the head, and another portion was thrown into oncoming traffic, causing a multikart collision during which she sustained severe injuries. Beaver filed an action against the race organizers for negligence. The organizers could not locate the exculpatory clause that Beaver was supposed to have signed. Race organizers argued that she must have signed one to enter the race, but even if she had not signed one, her actions showed her intent to be bound by its terms. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did Beaver have the contractual capacity to enter a contract with an exculpatory clause? Why or why not?
2. Assuming that Beaver did, in fact, sign the exculpatory clause, did she later disaffirm or ratify the contract? Explain.
3. Now assume that Beaver had stated that she was eighteen years old at the time that she signed the exculpatory clause. How might this affect Beaver's ability to disaffirm or ratify the contract?
4. If Beaver did not actually sign the exculpatory clause, could a court conclude that she impliedly accepted its terms by participating in the race? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

adhesion contract 277

age of majority 265

blue laws 272

contractual capacity 265

covenant not to compete 273

disaffirmance 265 emancipation 265

exculpatory clause 280

in pari delicto 280

necessaries 266

ratification 269

unconscionable 277

usury 272

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

13-1. After Kira had had several drinks one night, she sold Charlotte a diamond necklace worth thousands of dollars for just $100. The next day, Kira offered the $100 to Charlotte and requested the return of her necklace. Charlotte refused to accept the $100 or return the necklace, claiming that there was a valid contract of sale. Kira explained that she had been intoxicated at the time the bargain was made and thus the contract was voidable at her option. Was Kira correct? Explain.

13-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

A famous New York City hotel, Hotel Lux, is noted for its food as well as its luxury accommodations. Hotel Lux contracts with a famous chef, Chef Perlee, to become its head chef at $6,000 per month. The contract states that should Perlee leave the employment of Hotel Lux for any reason, he will not work as a chef for any hotel or restaurant in New York, New Jersey, or Pennsylvania for a period of one year. During the first six months of the contract, Hotel Lux heavily advertises Perlee as its head chef, and business at the hotel is excellent. Then a dispute arises between the hotel management and Perlee, and Perlee terminates his employment. One month later, he is hired by a famous New Jersey restaurant just across the New York state line. Hotel Lux learns of Perlee's employment through a large advertisement in a New York City newspaper. It seeks to enjoin (prevent) Perlee from working in that restaurant as a chef for one year. Discuss how successful Hotel Lux will be in its action.

- For a sample answer to Question 13-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

13-3. Joanne is a seventy-five-year-old widow who survives on her husband's small pension. Joanne has become increasingly forgetful, and her family worries that she may have Alzheimer's disease (a brain disorder that seriously affects a person's ability to carry out daily activities). No physician has diagnosed her, however, and no court has ruled on Joanne's legal competence. One day while she is out shopping, Joanne stops by a store that is having a sale on pianos and enters into a fifteen-year installment contract to buy a grand piano. When the piano arrives the next day, Joanne seems confused and repeatedly asks the delivery person why a piano is being delivered. Joanne claims that she does not recall buying a piano. Explain whether this contract is void, voidable, or valid. Can Joanne avoid her contractual obligation to buy the piano? If so, how?

13-4. Covenants Not to Compete. In 1993, Mutual Service Casualty Insurance Co. and its affiliates (collectively, MSI) hired Thomas Brass as an insurance agent. Three years later, Brass entered into a career agent's contract with

MSI. This contract contained provisions regarding Brass's activities after termination. These provisions stated that, for a period of not less than one year, Brass could not solicit any MSI customers to "lapse, cancel, or replace" any insurance contract in force with MSI in an effort to take that business to a competitor. If he did, MSI could at any time refuse to pay the commissions that it otherwise owed him. The contract also restricted Brass from working for American National Insurance Co. for three years after termination. In 1998, Brass quit MSI and immediately went to work for American National, soliciting MSI customers. MSI filed a suit in a Wisconsin state court against Brass, claiming that he had violated the noncompete terms of his MSI contract. Should the court enforce the covenant not to compete? Why or why not? [Mutual Service Casualty Insurance Co. v. Brass, 2001 WI App 92, 242 Wis.2d 733, 625 N.W.2d 648 (2001)]

13-5. Unconscionability. Frank Rodziewicz was driving a Volvo tractor-trailer on Interstate 90 in Lake County, Indiana, when he struck a concrete barrier. His tractor-trailer became stuck on the barrier, and the Indiana State Police contacted Waffco Heavy Duty Towing, Inc., to assist in the recovery of the truck. Before beginning work, Waffco told Rodziewicz that it would cost $275 to tow the truck. There was no discussion of labor or any other costs. Rodziewicz told Waffco to take the truck to a local Volvo dealership. Within a few minutes, Waffco pulled the truck off the barrier and towed it to Waffco's nearby towing yard. Rodziewicz was soon notified that, in addition to the $275 towing fee, he would have to pay $4,070 in labor costs and that Waffco would not release the truck until payment was made. Rodziewicz paid the total amount. Disputing the labor charge, however, he filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Waffco, alleging, in part, breach of contract. Was the towing contract unconscionable? Would it make a difference if the parties had discussed the labor charge before the tow? Explain. [Rodziewicz v. Waffco Heavy Duty Towing, Inc., 763 N.E.2d 491 (Ind.App. 2002)]

13-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Millennium Club, Inc., operates a tavern in South Bend, Indiana. In January 2003, Pamela Avila and other minors gained admission by misrepresenting themselves to be at least twenty-one years old. According to the club's representatives, the minors used false driver's licenses, "fraudulent transfer of a stamp used to gain admission by another patron or other means of false identification." To gain access, the minors also signed affidavits falsely attesting to the fact that they were aged twenty-one or older. When the state filed criminal charges against the club, the club filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Avila and more than two hundred others, charging that they had misrepresented their ages and seeking damages of $3,000 each. The minors filed a motion to dismiss the complaint. Should the court grant the motion? What are the competing policy interests in this case? If the club was not careful in checking minors' identification, should it be allowed to recover? If the club reasonably relied on the minors' representations, should the minors be allowed to avoid liability? Discuss. [Millennium Club, Inc. v. Avila, 809 N.E.2d 906 (Ind.App. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 13-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 13," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

13-7. Covenant Not to Compete. Gary Forsee was an executive officer with responsibility for the U.S. operations of BellSouth Corp., a company providing global telecommunications services. Under a covenant not to compete, Forsee agreed that for a period of eighteen months after termination from employment, he would not "provide services . . . in competition with [BellSouth] . . . to any person or entity which provides products or services identical or similar to products and services provided by [BellSouth] . . . within the territory." Territory was defined to include the geographic area in which Forsee provided services to BellSouth. The services included "management, strategic planning, business planning, administration, or other participation in or providing advice with respect to the communications services business." Forsee announced his intent to resign and accept a position as chief executive officer of Sprint Corp., a competitor of BellSouth. BellSouth filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Forsee, claiming, in part, that his acceptance of employment with Sprint would violate the covenant not to compete. Is the covenant legal? Should it be enforced? Why or why not? [BellSouth Corp. v. Forsee, 265 Ga.App. 589, 595 S.E.2d 99 (2004)]

13-8. Licensing Statutes. Under California law, a contract to manage a professional boxer must be in writing, and the manager must be licensed by the State Athletic Commission. Marco Antonio Barrera is a professional boxer and two-time world champion. In May 2003, José Castillo, who was not licensed by the state, orally agreed to assume Barrera's management. He "understood" that he would be paid in accord with the "practice in the professional boxing industry, but in no case less than ten percent (10%) of the gross revenue" that Barrera generated as a boxer and through endorsements. Among other accomplishments, Castillo negotiated an exclusive promotion contract for Barrera with Golden Boy Promotions, Inc., which is owned and operated by Oscar De La Hoya. Castillo also helped Barrera settle three lawsuits and resolve unrelated tax problems so that Barrera could continue boxing. Castillo did not train Barrera, pick his opponents, or arrange his fights, however. When Barrera abruptly stopped communicating with Castillo, Castillo filed a suit in a California state court against Barrera and others, alleging breach of contract. Under what circumstances is a contract with an unlicensed practitioner enforceable? Is the alleged contract in this case enforceable? Why or why not? [Castillo v. Barrera, 146 Cal.App.4th 1317, 53 Cal.Rptr.3d 494 (2 Dist. 2007)]

13-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Dow AgroSciences, LLC (DAS), makes and sells agricultural seed products. In 2000, Timothy Glenn, a DAS sales manager, signed a covenant not to compete. He agreed that for two years from the date of his termination, he would not "engage in or contribute my knowledge to any work or activity involving an area of technology or business that is then competitive with a technology or business with respect to which I had access to Confidential Information during the five years immediately prior to such termination." Working with DAS business, operations, and research and development personnel, and being a member of high-level teams, Glenn had access to confidential DAS information, including agreements with DAS's business partners, marketing plans, litigation details, product secrets, new product development, future plans, and pricing strategies. In 2006, Glenn resigned to work for Pioneer Hi-Bred International, Inc., a DAS competitor. DAS filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Glenn, asking that he be enjoined from accepting any "position that would call on him to use confidential DAS information." [Glenn v. Dow AgroSciences, LLC, 861 N.E.2d 1 (Ind.App. 2007)]

- Generally, what interests are served by enforcing covenants not to compete? What interests are served by refusing to enforce them?
- What argument could be made in support of reforming (and then enforcing) illegal covenants not to compete? What argument could be made against this practice?
- How should the court rule in this case? Why?

13-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 13." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled The Money Pit. Then answer the following questions.

- Assume that a valid contract exists between Walter (Tom Hanks) and the plumber. Recall from the video that the plumber had at least two drinks before agreeing to take on the plumbing job. If the plumber was intoxicated, is the contract voidable? Why or why not?
- Suppose that state law requires plumbers in Walter's state to have a plumber's license and that this plumber does not have a license. Would the contract be enforceable? Why or why not?

CHAPTER 13 Capacity and Legality

(c) In the video, the plumber suggests that Walter has been “turned down by every other plumber in the valley.” Although the plumber does not even look at the house’s plumbing, he agrees to do the repairs if

Walter gives him a check for $5,000 right away “before he changes his mind.” If Walter later seeks to void the contract because it is contrary to public policy, what should he argue?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text’s Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For a table that includes links to every state’s statutory provisions governing the emancipation of minors, go to www.law.cornell.edu/topics/Table_Emanicipation.htm

For more information on restrictive covenants in employment contracts, you can access an article written by attorneys at Loose Brown & Associates, P.C., at www.loosebrown.com/articles/art009.pdf

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select “Chapter 13” and click on “Internet Exercises.” There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 13–1: Legal Perspective
Covenants Not to Compete

Internet Exercise 13–2: Management Perspective
Minors and the Law

Internet Exercise 13–3: Social Perspective
Online Gambling

CHAPTER 14

Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

An otherwise valid contract may still be unenforceable if the parties have not genuinely agreed to its terms. As mentioned in Chapter 10, lack of genuineness of assent, or voluntary consent, can be used as a defense to the contract's enforceability. Voluntary consent may be lacking because of a mistake, misrepresentation, undue influence, or duress—in other words, because there is no true “meeting of the minds.” Generally, a party who demonstrates that he or she did not truly agree to the terms of a contract can choose either to carry out the contract or to rescind (cancel) it and thus avoid the entire transaction. In this chapter, we examine the kinds of factors that may indicate a lack of voluntary consent.

Mistakes

We all make mistakes, so it is not surprising that mistakes are made when contracts are formed. In certain circumstances, contract law allows a contract to be avoided on the basis of mistake. It is important to distinguish between mistakes of fact and mistakes of value or quality. Only a mistake of fact may allow a contract to be avoided.

Mistakes of Fact

Mistakes of fact occur in two forms—bilateral and unilateral. A bilateral, or mutual, mistake is made by both of the contracting parties. A unilateral mistake is made by only one of the parties. We look next at these two types of mistakes and illustrate them graphically in Exhibit 14–1.

Bilateral (Mutual) Mistakes of Fact A bilateral, or mutual, mistake occurs when both parties are mistaken as to an existing material fact—that is, a fact important to the subject matter of the contract. It is a “mutual misunderstanding concerning a basic assumption on which the contract was made.”¹ When a bilateral mistake occurs, normally the contract is voidable by the adversely affected party and can be rescinded, or canceled. For example, Gilbert contracts to sell Magellan three tracts of undeveloped land for $6 million on the basis of a surveyor's report showing the layout and acreage. After agreeing to the price, the parties discover that the surveyor made an error and that the tracts actually contain 10 percent more acreage than reported. In this situation, Gilbert can seek rescission (cancellation) of the contract based on mutual mistake. The same result—rescission—would occur if both parties had mistakenly believed that the tracts of land were adjoining but they were not.²

A word or term in a contract may be subject to more than one reasonable interpretation. If the parties to the contract attach materially different meanings to the term, a court may allow the contract to be rescinded because there has been no true “meeting of the minds.”³ The classic example is Raffles v. Wichelhaus,⁴ a case decided by an English court in 1864. Wichelhaus agreed to buy a shipment of Surat

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 152.

2. See, for example, Rawson v. UMLIC VP, L.L.C., 933 So.2d 1206 (Fla.App. 2006).

3. The only way for a court to find out the meaning that each party attached to the contract term is to allow the parties to introduce parol evidence, which is basically oral testimony about the terms of their agreement. Parol evidence will be discussed in Chapter 15.

4. 159 Eng.Rep. 375 (1864).

EXHIBIT 14-1 • Mistakes of Fact cotton from Raffles, “to arrive ‘Peerless’ from Bombay.” There were two ships named Peerless sailing from Bombay, India, however. Wichelhaus was referring to the Peerless that sailed in October; Raffles meant a different Peerless that sailed in December. When Raffles tried to deliver the goods in December, Wichelhaus refused to accept them, and a lawsuit followed. The court held in favor of Wichelhaus, concluding that a mutual mistake had been made because the parties had attached materially different meanings to an essential term of the contract.

In the following case, an injured worker sought to set aside a settlement agreement entered into with his employer, arguing that a physician’s mistaken diagnosis of the worker’s injury was a mutual mistake of fact on which the agreement was based.

EXTENDED Roberts v. Century Contractors, Inc.
C A S E 14.1 Court of Appeals of North Carolina, 2004. 592 S.E.2d 215.

LEVINSON, Judge.

Plaintiff (Bobby Roberts) suffered a compensable injury by accident on 28 July 1993 when he was struck by a pipe while working for Century Contractors, Incorporated, causing trauma to his neck and back. Defendants admitted liability, and plaintiff sought treatment for his injuries with Dr. James Markworth of Southeastern Orthopaedic Clinic. Dr. Markworth diagnosed plaintiff as having some narrowing of the cervical spinal canal and some degeneration of multiple levels of the cervical disks, with bulging of some of the discs. Dr. Markworth performed an anterior cervical discectomy infusion * * * with bone grafts * * * .

* * * Dr. Markworth subsequently indicated that plaintiff was at maximum medical improvement [MMI] and stopped treating plaintiff. A physician’s assistant at Southeastern Orthopaedic Clinic continued to treat plaintiff. Because he was still experiencing pain, plaintiff issued a request for a second medical opinion on 3 April 1998.

On 2 June 1998, plaintiff saw Dr. Allen Friedman for a second medical opinion. Dr. Friedman noted that there was a question [about one of the grafts] and that x-rays needed to be repeated to be sure that the fusion was stable. Dr. Friedman indicated his concern to plaintiff that current x-rays needed to be obtained to be certain as to whether the fusion was solid.

The parties attended a mediation on 13 May 1998. The negotiation resulted in a settlement amount of $125,000 and payment of related medical expenses. Following his visit to Dr. Friedman, plaintiff executed the settlement agreement that had been negotiated on 13 May 1998. The settlement agreement contained a waiver of any right to make further claims in regard to plaintiff’s injury.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 14.1 CONTINUED

The settlement agreement was approved by the North Carolina Industrial Commission [the state administrative agency empowered to rule on workers' compensation claims] on 25 June 1998.

Plaintiff subsequently filed a claim for Workers' Compensation, seeking compensation and medical benefits for the same injuries which were addressed in the settlement agreement. Plaintiff alleged that the Commission should set aside the settlement agreement * * * due to mutual mistake of fact. In support of this allegation, plaintiff offered Dr. Markworth's deposition testimony that his office's diagnosis of maximum medical improvement was a mistake.

The * * * Commission found that the parties had mistakenly relied on Dr. Markworth's diagnosis of maximum medical improvement and that this fact was material to the settlement agreement. The * * * Commission set aside the agreement and awarded plaintiff compensation and medical benefits in an Opinion and Award filed on 18 September 2002. * * *

Defendants appeal [to a North Carolina state intermediate appellate court], contending * * * the * * * Opinion and Award must be reversed because the * * * Commission erred in setting aside the parties' mediated settlement agreement on the basis of mutual mistake of fact * * *.

* * *

* * * Compromise settlement agreements, including mediated settlement agreements in Workers' Compensation cases, are governed by general principles of contract law.

It is a well-settled principle of contract law that a valid contract exists only where there has been a meeting of the minds as to all essential terms of the agreement. Therefore, where a mistake is common to both parties and concerns a material past or presently existing fact, such that there is no meeting of the minds, a contract may be avoided. [Emphasis added.]

To afford relief, the mistake must be of a certain nature. The fact about which the parties are mistaken must be an existing or past fact. The mistaken fact must also be material * * *. It must be as to a fact which enters into and forms the basis of the contract, or in other words, it must be of the essence of the agreement—the sine qua non—or, as is sometimes said, the efficient cause of the agreement, and must be such that it animates and controls the conduct of the parties.

Additionally, relief from a contract due to mistake of fact will be had only where both parties to an agreement are mistaken. Thus, as a general rule relief will be denied where the party against whom it is sought was ignorant that the other party was acting under a mistake and the former's conduct in no way contributed thereto. Likewise, a party who assumed the risk of a mistaken fact cannot avoid a contract. [Emphasis added.]

A party bears the risk of a mistake when

- (a) the risk is allocated to him by agreement of the parties, or
- (b) he is aware, at the time the contract is made that he has only limited knowledge with respect to the facts to which the mistake relates but treats his limited knowledge as sufficient, or
- (c) the risk is allocated to him by the court on the ground that it is reasonable in the circumstances to do so.

* * *

* * * The x-rays [examined by Dr. Friedman] after Dr. Markworth or Southern Orthopaedic Clinic had last treated plaintiff [Roberts], indicated Dr. Markworth's diagnosis of maximum medical improvement * * * was a mistake. Dr. Markworth testified * * * that advising plaintiff that he was at maximum medical improvement at that time was a mistake.

* * *

* * * [T]he finding of maximum medical improvement and the impairment rating given by Dr. Markworth were material to the settlement of this claim and * * * both parties relied on this information in entering into settlement negotiations.

* * *

* * * [T]he parties believed that plaintiff had reached maximum medical improvement and, further, * * * they materially relied upon this fact in reaching a settlement. Defendants' essential argument on appeal is that because plaintiff either knew that there was a possibility that [he had not reached MMI] or was negligent in not declining to sign the settlement agreement, mutual mistake is a legal impossibility in this case. As the facts * * * support a contrary conclusion, we do not agree.

* * * The plaintiff testified that he based his decision to sign the settlement agreement on Dr. Markworth's diagnosis and that he would not have settled his case if Dr. Friedman had told him that [he had not reached MMI]. Thus, there is competent record evidence to support the * * * findings that the parties were mistaken as to whether plaintiff had reached maximum medical improvement and that this mistaken fact was material. * * *

CHAPTER 14 Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

CASE 14.1 CONTINUED

* * * *

* * * We affirm the * * * Award filed 18 September 2002.

QUESTIONS

1. Why did the court in this case consider Dr. Markworth's misdiagnosis a bilateral mistake rather than a unilateral mistake?
2. Why are situations such as the one presented in this case often sources of litigation appealed to the states' highest courts?

Unilateral Mistakes of Fact A unilateral mistake occurs when only one of the contracting parties is mistaken about a material fact. Generally, a unilateral mistake does not afford the mistaken party any right to relief from the contract. Normally, the contract is enforceable. For example, DeVinck intends to sell his motor home for $32,500. When he learns that Benson is interested in buying a used motor home, DeVinck faxes Benson an offer to sell the vehicle to him. When typing the fax, however, DeVinck mistakenly keys in the price of $23,500. Benson immediately sends DeVinck a fax accepting DeVinck's offer. Even though DeVinck intended to sell his motor home for $32,500, his unilateral mistake falls on him. He is bound in contract to sell the motor home to Benson for $23,500.

There are at least two exceptions to this general rule.⁵ First, if the other party to the contract knows or should have known that a mistake of fact was made, the contract may not be enforceable. In the above example, if Benson knew that DeVinck intended to sell his motor home for $32,500, then DeVinck's unilateral mistake (stating $23,500 in his offer) can render the resulting contract unenforceable.

The second exception arises when a unilateral mistake of fact was due to a mathematical mistake in addition, subtraction, division, or multiplication and was made inadvertently and without gross (extreme) negligence. The clerical error must be readily provable, though. For example, suppose that in preparing a bid a contractor itemized the estimated cost of each portion of the project, but made a mistake in addition when totaling the estimated costs, resulting in a total significantly lower than the correct total. Because the clerical error can be easily ascertained, a court may allow any contract resulting from the bid to be rescinded. Alternatively, a court may reform the contract to reflect the accurate total.

Mistakes of Value

If a mistake concerns the future market value or quality of the object of the contract, the mistake is one of value, and the contract normally is enforceable. Mistakes of value can be bilateral or unilateral; but either way, they do not serve as a basis for avoiding a contract. For example, suppose that Hari buys a violin from Bev for $250. Although the violin is very old, neither party believes that it is extremely valuable. Later, however, an antiques dealer informs the parties that the violin is rare and worth thousands of dollars. Although both parties were mistaken, the mistake is not a mistake of fact that warrants contract rescission. This would be true even if, at the time of contracting, only Bev believed the violin was not particularly valuable (a unilateral mistake) and Hari thought it was rare and worth more than $250.

The reason that mistakes of value or quality have no legal significance is that value is variable. Depending on the time, place, and other circumstances, the same item may be worth considerably different amounts. When parties form a contract, their agreement establishes the value of the object of their transaction—for the moment. Each party is considered to have assumed the risk that the value will change in the future or prove to be different from what he or she thought. Without this rule, almost any party who did not receive what she or he considered a fair bargain could argue mistake.

5. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 153, liberalizes the general rule to take into account the modern trend of allowing avoidance even though only one party has been mistaken.

Fraudulent Misrepresentation

Although fraud is a tort (see Chapter 6), it also affects the authenticity of the innocent party's consent to the contract. When an innocent party is fraudulently induced to enter into a contract, the contract normally can be avoided because that party has not voluntarily consented to its terms.⁶ Ordinarily, the innocent party can either rescind (cancel) the contract and be restored to her or his original position or enforce the contract and seek damages for any injuries resulting from the fraud.

Generally, fraudulent misrepresentation refers only to misrepresentation that is consciously false and is intended to mislead another. The person making the fraudulent misrepresentation knows or believes that the assertion is false or knows that she or he does not have a basis (stated or implied) for the assertion.⁷ Typically, fraudulent misrepresentation consists of the following elements:

1. A misrepresentation of a material fact must occur.
2. There must be an intent to deceive.
3. The innocent party must justifiably rely on the misrepresentation.

With its anonymity and rapidly changing technology, the online world is a hospitable environment for fraudulent misrepresentation. In 2006, for example, users of an online dating service sued Yahoo!, Inc., for fraudulent misrepresentation in connection with personal ads posted online. The plaintiffs claimed that Yahoo was deliberately creating false profiles and sending them to subscribers as “potential new matches.” Although Yahoo insisted that it was immune from such suits under the Communications Decency Act of 1996 (see the in-depth discussion in Chapter 6), the court held that the company was not entitled to immunity because Yahoo itself had provided the content.⁸ Another source of fraudulent misrepresentation

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 163 and 164.

7. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 162.

8. Anthony v. Yahoo!, Inc., 421 F.Supp.2d 1257 (N.D.Cal. 2006).

on the Web is “click fraud,” the topic of this chapter's Insight into Ethics feature on pages 292 and 293.

Misrepresentation Has Occurred

The first element of proving fraud is to show that misrepresentation of a material fact has occurred. This misrepresentation can occur by words or actions. For example, the statement “This sculpture was created by Michelangelo” is a misrepresentation of fact if another artist sculpted the statue. Similarly, suppose that Swan tells the owner of an art gallery that she is interested in buying only paintings by a particular artist. The owner immediately leads Swan over to six individual paintings. Here, the gallery owner, without saying a word, has represented by his conduct that the six paintings are works of that artist. If Swan buys one of the paintings and it turns out to have been painted by another artist, she can sue the gallery owner for fraud. The identity of the artist would be a material fact in the formation of either contract.

Statements of opinion and representations of future facts (predictions) are generally not subject to claims of fraud. Every person is expected to exercise care and judgment when entering into contracts, and the law will not come to the aid of one who simply makes an unwise bargain. Statements such as “This land will be worth twice as much next year” or “This car will last for years and years” are statements of opinion, not fact. Contracting parties should recognize them as such and not rely on them. An opinion is usually subject to contrary or conflicting views; a fact is objective and verifiable. Thus, a seller of goods is allowed to use puffery to sell his or her wares without liability for fraud.

In certain cases, however, particularly when a naïve purchaser relies on a so-called expert's opinion, the innocent party may be entitled to rescission or reformation. (Reformation is an equitable remedy granted by a court in which the terms of a contract are altered to reflect the true intentions of the parties—see Chapter 18.) The issue in the following case was whether the statements made by instructors at a dance school to one of the school's students qualified as statements of opinion or statements of fact.

CASE 14.2 Vokes v. Arthur Murray, Inc.

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Second District, 1968. 212 So.2d 906.

- Company Profile Arthur Murray, founder of Arthur Murray, Inc. (www.arthurmurray.com), began teaching people how to dance in 1919. At the time, social dancing was becoming increasingly popular among young people, in part because so many adults were shocked by the new “jazz dancing.”

CHAPTER 14 Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

CASE 14.2 CONTINUED

Across America, young people wanted to learn the new steps—the turkey trot, the fox-trot, the kangaroo dip, the chicken scratch, the bunny hug, the grizzly bear, and others. By the 1930s, Murray's instructors were giving lessons on cruise ships, in tourist hotels, and to the employees of New York stores during the employees' lunch breaks. In 1937, Murray founded the Arthur Murray Studios, a chain of franchised dance schools. During the 1950s, Murray sponsored a television show—The Arthur Murray Party—to attract students to the schools. Murray retired in 1964, estimating that he had taught more than 20 million people how to dance.

● Background and Facts Audrey E. Vokes, a widow without family, wished to become “an accomplished dancer” and to find “a new interest in life.” In 1961, she was invited to attend a “dance party” at J. P. Davenport’s “School of Dancing,” an Arthur Murray, Inc., franchise. Vokes went to the school and received elaborate praise from her instructor for her grace, poise, and potential as “an excellent dancer.” The instructor sold her eight half-hour dance lessons for $14.50 each, to be utilized within one calendar month. Subsequently, over a period of less than sixteen months, Vokes bought a total of fourteen dance courses, which amounted to 2,302 hours of dancing lessons at Davenport’s school, for a total cash outlay of $31,090.45 (in 2008, this would amount to nearly $140,000). When it became clear to Vokes that she did not, in fact, have the potential to be an excellent dancer, she filed a suit against the school, alleging fraudulent misrepresentation. When the trial court dismissed her complaint, she appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
PIERCE, Judge.

* * * *

[The dance contracts] were procured by defendant Davenport and Arthur Murray, Inc., by false representations to her that she was improving in her dancing ability, that she had excellent potential, that she was responding to instructions in dancing grace, and that they were developing her into a beautiful dancer, whereas in truth and in fact she did not develop in her dancing ability, she had no “dance aptitude,” and in fact had difficulty in “hearing the musical beat.”

* * *

* * * *

It is true that generally a misrepresentation, to be actionable, must be one of fact rather than of opinion. * * * A statement of a party having * * * superior knowledge may be regarded as a statement of fact although it would be considered as opinion if the parties were dealing on equal terms.

It could be reasonably supposed here that defendants had superior knowledge as to whether plaintiff had “dance potential” and as to whether she was noticeably improving in the art of terpsichore [dancing]. And it would be a reasonable inference from the undenied averments [assertions] of the complaint that the flowery eulogiums [praises] heaped upon her by defendants * * * proceeded as much or more from the urge to “ring the cash register” as from any honest or realistic appraisal of her dancing prowess or a factual representation of her progress.

* * * *

* * * [W]hat is plainly injurious to good faith ought to be considered as a fraud sufficient to impeach a contract, and * * * an improvident [unwise] agreement may be avoided because of surprise, or mistake, want of freedom, undue influence, the suggestion of falsehood, or the suppression of truth. [Emphasis added.]

● Decision and Remedy Vokes’s complaint was reinstated, and the case was returned to the trial court to allow Vokes to prove her case.

● Impact of This Case on Today’s Law This case has become a classic in contract law because it clearly illustrates an important principle. The general rule—that a misrepresentation must be one of fact rather than one of opinion to be actionable—does not apply in certain situations, such as when one party misrepresents something about which he or she possesses superior knowledge (Vokes’s dancing ability, in this case).

● The Ethical Dimension If one of Vokes’s fellow students, rather than her instructor, had praised her ability and encouraged her to buy more lessons, should the result in this case have been different? Explain.

INSIGHT INTO ETHICS

Internet Click Fraud

For many of the Internet's best-known companies, including Google and Yahoo, advertising is the main source of their revenues. Every user of the Internet encounters a multitude of advertisements that invite the user to "click" on the ad to get further information about the product or service. What every user may not know, however, is that the companies selling such ads charge fees based on the number of clicks. Thus, the more clicks, the higher the advertising revenues of the company selling the advertising space. Meanwhile, Web advertisers, who buy space for their ads on sites such as those run by Google and Yahoo, want to pay only for valid clicks—those done by humans with a real interest in the product.

Enter Click Fraud

This system of charging for advertising based on the number of clicks has given rise to many allegations of click fraud, which occurs "when someone clicks on a search advertisement with an ill intent and with no intention of doing business with the advertiser. [Click fraud involves] purposeful clicks on an advertisement for some kind of improper purpose."^a The exact dimensions of click fraud are unknown, but some commentators think it could amount to as much as $1 billion per year. Fraud-detection specialist Fair Isaac Corporation believes that 10 to 15 percent of advertising traffic on the Internet is "pathological," indicating a high probability of click fraud.

There are several different types of click fraud. For example, suppose that Company A and Company B are direct competitors. Company A directs its employees to click repetitively on Company B's online ads in an attempt to run up the advertising fees that Company B will have to pay. In another type of click fraud, the owners of the sites running the ads simply use Internet robots to click on the ads so as to increase the revenues that they receive from running the advertising. Of course, Company A, in the previous example, could also use robots to click on Company B's ads.

Whether it is generated by humans or robots, click fraud is unethical and, at a minimum, violates ^a Click Defense, Inc. v. Google, Inc., No. 5:05-CV-02579-RMW (N.D. Cal. complaint filed June 24, 2005). This case was subsequently settled.

Misrepresentation by Concealment Misrepresentation can also take place when a party takes specific action to conceal a fact that is material to the contract.⁹ Suppose, for example, that Rakas contracts to buy a new car from Bustamonte, a dealer in new automobiles. The car has been used as a demonstration model for prospective customers to test-drive, but Bustamonte has turned back the odometer. Rakas cannot tell from the odometer reading that the car has been driven nearly one thousand miles, and Bustamonte does not tell Rakas the distance the car has actually been driven. Bustamonte's concealment constitutes misrepresentation by conduct.

As another example, suppose that Cummings contracts to purchase a racehorse from Garner. The horse is blind in one eye, but when Garner shows the horse, he skillfully conceals this fact by keeping the horse's head turned so that Cummings does not see the defect. The concealment constitutes fraud.

9. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 160.

Misrepresentation of Law Misrepresentation of law ordinarily does not entitle a party to relief from a contract. For example, Camara has a parcel of property that she is trying to sell to Pye. Camara knows that a local ordinance prohibits building anything higher than three stories on the property. Nonetheless, she tells Pye, "You can build a condominium fifty stories high if you want to." Pye buys the land and later discovers that Camara's statement was false. Normally, Pye cannot avoid the contract because at common law people are assumed to know state and local ordinances. Additionally, a layperson should not rely on a statement made by a nonlawyer about a point of law.

Exceptions to this rule occur, however, when the misrepresenting party is in a profession that is known to require greater knowledge of the law than the average citizen possesses. The courts are recognizing an increasing number of such professions. For example, the courts recognize that clients expect their real estate brokers to know the law governing real estate sales and land use. If Camara, in the preceding example, had been a lawyer or a real estate broker, her misrepresentation of the area's zoning status would probably have constituted fraud.

the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which requires honesty and the observance of reasonable standards of fair dealing between contracting parties (see Chapter 22). Additionally, when Web site owners purposefully inflate the number of clicks so that they can charge more for advertising, they can be sued for, among other things, unjust enrichment.

Indeed, in the past few years, both Google and Yahoo have been the defendants in click fraud suits, several of which have been settled for amounts reaching tens of millions of dollars.^b Google now uses filtering software so that it does not count repetitive clicks that presumably come from Internet robots.

Click Fraud's Close Cousin—Lead Fraud

Closely related to click fraud is lead fraud. "Leads" in this context are simply the names of individuals who have expressed an interest in purchasing a certain product, such as insurance. NetQuote, for

b. See, for example, Checkmate Strategic Group, Inc. v. Yahoo!, Inc., No. 2:05-CV-04588-CAS-FMO (C.D.Cal. preliminary settlement approved June 28, 2006); Bradley v. Google, Inc., 2006 WL3798134 (N.D.Cal. 2006, voluntarily dismissed after a settlement in 2007); and Lane's Gifts and Collectibles, LLC v. Yahoo! Inc., No. CV-2005-52-1 (Ark.Cir.Ct. complaint filed February 17, 2005).

example, is a lead-generating site for insurance companies. Users can submit requests on NetQuote's Web page, and NetQuote then sells these "qualified" leads to insurance companies. NetQuote now has brought a fraud claim against MostChoice, a competitor, charging that MostChoice had an employee submit hundreds of fraudulent requests through the NetQuote system.^c NetQuote maintains that when it submitted these leads to its insurance company clients, the conversion rate—the percentage of leads that actually purchase insurance—dropped dramatically, thereby reducing the value of the leads to the insurance companies.

CRITICAL THINKING INSIGHT INTO TECHNOLOGY

"As long as each click on an ad link on the Web triggers a commission that has to be paid, we will be facing a financial formula that gives rise to unethical behavior." Do you think that technology will some day be able to distinguish between bone fide clicks by truly interested parties and bogus clicks? Why or why not?

c. NetQuote, Inc. v. Byrd, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (D.Colo. 2007). This case has not yet been fully resolved.

Misrepresentation by Silence Ordinarily, neither party to a contract has a duty to come forward and disclose facts. Therefore, a contract cannot be set aside because certain pertinent information is not volunteered. For example, suppose that you are selling a car that has been in an accident and has been repaired. You do not need to volunteer this information to a potential buyer. If, however, the purchaser asks you if the car has had extensive bodywork and you lie, you have committed a fraudulent misrepresentation.

Exceptions. Exceptions to the general rule do exist. Generally, if the seller knows of a serious potential problem that could not reasonably be suspected by the buyer, the seller may have a duty to speak. For example, if a city fails to disclose to bidders subsoil conditions that will cause great expense in constructing a sewer system, the city is guilty of fraud. Normally, the seller must disclose only "latent" defects—that is, defects that could not readily be discovered. Thus, termites in a house may not be a latent defect because a buyer could normally discover their presence through a termite inspection.

When the parties are in a fiduciary relationship (one of trust, such as the relationship between business partners or between attorneys and their clients—see Chapter 31), there is a duty to disclose material facts; failure to do so may constitute fraud.¹⁰ Statutes provide still other exceptions to the general rule of nondisclosure. The Truth-in-Lending Act, for example, requires disclosure of certain facts in financial transactions (see Chapter 44).

Duty to Prospective Employees. A duty to disclose information may also arise in an employment context when the employer either misrepresents or conceals information from a prospective employee during the hiring process. Courts have held employers liable for fraudulent misrepresentation about a company's financial health during hiring interviews. In one case, for example, applicants for jobs at the El-Jay Division asked about El-Jay's future. The employer represented during interviews that business was growing, that sales were up, and that the future looked promising. In reality, company management had already planned to close the El-Jay facility. In the subsequent trial, the court stated that the employer could be held liable for either failing to disclose material facts or making representations that were misleading because they were in the nature of “half-truth.”¹¹

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 161 and 173.

In another case, the employer was found liable for fraud because it failed to disclose a potential takeover of the company. Representatives from a brokerage firm approached Philip McConkey, a former New York Giants professional football player, and offered him a position with their company. Because McConkey had heard rumors that the firm was going to be acquired by another firm, he asked about a possible takeover. He was assured on several occasions that the company was absolutely not going to be sold to another firm. When it was sold a few months later, McConkey was fired. He filed a lawsuit and won a substantial damages award based on the company’s fraudulent misrepresentation.¹²

Intent to Deceive

The second element of fraud is knowledge on the part of the misrepresenting party that facts have been falsely represented. This element, normally called scienter,¹³ or “guilty knowledge,” signifies that there was an intent to deceive. Scienter clearly exists if a party knows a fact is not as stated. Scienter also exists if a party makes a statement that he or she believes is not true or makes a statement recklessly, without regard to whether it is true or false. Finally, this element is met if a party says or implies that a statement is made on some basis, such as personal knowledge or personal investigation, when it is not.

For example, assume that Meese, a securities broker, offers to sell BIM stock to Packer. Meese assures Packer that BIM shares are blue-chip securities—that is, they are stable, entail limited risk, and yield a good return on investment over time. In fact, Meese knows nothing about the quality of BIM stock and does not believe that what he is saying is true. Meese’s statement is thus a misrepresentation. If Packer is induced by Meese’s intentional misrepresentation of a material fact to enter into a contract to buy the stock, normally he can avoid his obligations under the contract.

Innocent Misrepresentation If a person makes a statement that she or he believes to be true but that actually misrepresents material facts, the person is guilty only of an innocent misrepresentation, not of fraud. When an innocent misrepresentation occurs, the aggrieved party can rescind the contract but usually cannot seek damages. For example, Parris tells Roberta that a tract of land contains 250 acres. Parris is mistaken—the tract contains only 215 acres—but Parris had no knowledge of the mistake. Roberta relies on the statement and contracts to buy the land. Even though the misrepresentation is innocent, Roberta can avoid the contract if the misrepresentation is material.

Negligent Misrepresentation Sometimes, a party will make a misrepresentation through carelessness, believing the statement is true. If a person fails to exercise reasonable care in uncovering or disclosing the facts or does not use the skill and competence that her or his business or profession requires, it could constitute negligent misrepresentation. For example, an operator of a weight scale certifies the weight of Sneed’s commodity, even though the scale’s accuracy has not been checked in more than a year.

In virtually all states, such negligent misrepresentation is equal to scienter, or knowingly making a misrepresentation. In effect, negligent misrepresentation is treated as fraudulent misrepresentation, even though the misrepresentation was not purposeful. In negligent misrepresentation, culpable ignorance of the truth supplies the intention to mislead, even if the defendant can claim, “I didn’t know.”

Reliance on the Misrepresentation

The third element of fraud is reasonably justifiable reliance on the misrepresentation of fact. The deceived party must have a justifiable reason for relying on the misrepresentation, and the misrepresentation must be an important factor (but not necessarily the sole factor) in inducing that party to enter into the contract. For example, suppose that to rent a car, an eighteen-year-old misrepresents his age and presents a false driver’s license listing his age as twenty-two. In that situation, the car-rental agency would be justified in rely-

11. Meade v. Cedarapids, Inc., 164 F3d 1218 (9th Cir. 1999).

12. McConkey v. Aon Corp., 354 N.J.Super. 25, 804 A.2d 572 (2002). Note that a number of subsequent cases have disputed this court’s calculation of damages in situations involving fraudulent misrepresentation. See, for example, Goldstein v. Miles, 859 A.2d 313 (Md.App. 2004); and Horton v. Ross University School of Medicine, 2006 WL 1128705 (D.N.J. 2006).

13. Pronounced sy-en-ter.

ing on this misrepresentation (provided that the proof of identity was not clearly false).¹⁴

Reliance is not justified if the innocent party knows the true facts or relies on obviously extravagant statements. If a used-car dealer tells you, “This old Cadillac will get fifty miles to the gallon,” you normally will not be justified in relying on the statement. Or suppose that Kovich, a bank director, induces Mallory, a co-director, to sign a guaranty that the bank’s assets will satisfy its liabilities, stating, “We have plenty of assets to satisfy our creditors.” If Mallory knows the true facts, he will not be justified in relying on Kovich’s statement. If, however, Mallory does not know the true facts and has no way of discovering them, he may be justified in relying on Kovich’s statement.

The same rule applies to defects in property sold. If the defects are of the kind that would be obvious on inspection, the buyer cannot justifiably rely on the seller’s representations. If the defects are hidden or latent (that is, not apparent on the surface), the buyer is justified in relying on the seller’s statements.

Injury to the Innocent Party

Most courts do not require a showing of injury when the action is to rescind (cancel) the contract. These courts hold that because rescission returns the parties to the positions they held before the contract was made, a showing of injury to the innocent party is unnecessary.

For a person to recover damages caused by fraud, proof of an injury is universally required. The measure of damages is ordinarily equal to the property’s value had it been delivered as represented, less the actual price paid for the property. Additionally, because fraud actions necessarily involve wrongful conduct, courts may also award punitive damages, or exemplary damages.¹⁵ As discussed in Chapter 6, punitive damages are damages intended to punish the defendant and are granted to a plaintiff over and above the proved, actual compensation for the loss. Because of the potential for punitive damages, which normally are not available in contract actions, plaintiffs prefer to include a claim for fraudulent misrepresentation in their contract disputes.

14. See, for example, Fogel v. Enterprise Leasing Co. of Chicago, 353 Ill.App.3d 165, 817 N.E.2d 1135, 288 Ill.Dec. 485 (2004).

15. See, for example, McIver v. Bondy’s Ford, Inc., 963 So.2d 136 (Ala.App. 2007); and Alexander v. Meduna, 47 P.3d 206 (Wyo. 2002).

Undue Influence

Undue influence arises from special kinds of relationships in which one party can greatly influence another party, thus overcoming that party’s free will. A contract entered into under excessive or undue influence lacks voluntary consent and is therefore voidable.¹⁶

How Undue Influence May Occur

As mentioned, undue influence arises from relationships in which one party may dominate another party, thus unfairly influencing him or her. Minors and elderly people, for example, are often under the influence of guardians (persons who are legally responsible for another). If a guardian induces a young or elderly ward (the person whom the guardian looks after) to enter into a contract that benefits the guardian, undue influence may have been exerted. Undue influence can arise from a number of confidential or fiduciary relationships: attorney-client, physician-patient, guardian-ward, parent-child, husband-wife, or trustee-beneficiary.

The essential feature of undue influence is that the party being taken advantage of does not, in reality, exercise free will in entering into a contract. Just because a person is elderly or suffers from some physical or mental impairment, however, does not mean that she or he was the victim of undue influence—there must be clear and convincing evidence that the person did not act out of her or his free will.¹⁷ Similarly, the existence of a confidential relationship alone is insufficient to prove undue influence.¹⁸

To determine whether undue influence has been exerted, a court must ask, “To what extent was the transaction induced by domination of the mind or emotions of the person in question?” It follows, then, that the mental state of the person in question will often demonstrate to what extent the persuasion from the outside influence was “unfair.”

The Presumption of Undue Influence

When the principal in a confidential relationship benefits from that relationship, a presumption of undue influence arises. In a relationship of trust and confidence,

16. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 177.

17. See, for example, Bailey v. Turnbow, 273 Va. 262, 639 S.E.2d 291 (2007); and Hooten v. Jensen, 94 Ark.App. 130, 227 S.W. 3d 431 (2006).

18. See, for example, Landers v. Sgouros, 224 S.W.3d 651 (Mo.App. 2007); and Ware v. Ware, 161 P.3d 1188 (Alaska 2007).

such as that between an attorney and a client, the dominant party (the attorney) must exercise the utmost good faith in dealing with the other party. When a contract enriches the dominant party, the court will often presume that the contract was made under undue influence. For example, if a guardian enters into a contract on behalf of the ward that financially benefits the guardian and the ward challenges the contract, a presumption arises that the guardian has taken advantage of the ward. To rebut (refute) this presumption successfully, the guardian has to show that full disclosure was made to the ward, that consideration was adequate, and that the ward received, if available, independent and competent advice before completing the transaction. Unless the presumption can be rebutted, the contract will be rescinded (canceled).

Duress

Agreement to the terms of a contract is not voluntary if one of the parties is forced into the agreement. Recall from Chapter 9 that forcing a party to do something, including entering into a contract, through fear created by threats is legally defined as duress. In addition, blackmail or extortion to induce consent to a contract constitutes duress. Duress is both a defense to the enforcement of a contract and a ground for the rescission of a contract.

The Threatened Act Must Be Wrongful or Illegal

Generally, for duress to occur the threatened act must be wrongful or illegal. Threatening to exercise a legal right, such as the right to sue someone, ordinarily is not illegal and usually does not constitute duress. For example, suppose that Joan injures Olin in an auto accident. The police are not called. Joan has no automobile insurance, but she has substantial assets. Olin wants to settle the potential claim out of court for $3,000, but Joan refuses. After much arguing, Olin loses his patience and says, "If you don't pay me $3,000 right now, I'm going to sue you for $35,000." Joan is frightened and gives Olin a check for $3,000. Later in the day, Joan stops payment on the check, and Olin later sues her for the $3,000. Although Joan argues that she was the victim of duress, the threat of a civil suit normally is not considered duress. Therefore, a court would not allow Joan to use duress as a defense to the enforcement of her settlement agreement with Olin.

Economic Duress

Economic need is generally not sufficient to constitute duress, even when one party exacts a very high price for an item that the other party needs. If the party exacting the price also creates the need, however, economic duress may be found.

For example, suppose that the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) assesses a large tax and penalty against Weller. Weller retains Eyman, the accountant who prepared the tax returns on which the assessment was based, to challenge the assessment. Two days before the deadline for filing a reply with the IRS, Eyman declines to represent Weller unless he signs a very high contingency-fee agreement for the services. This agreement would be unenforceable. Although Eyman has threatened only to withdraw his services, something that he is legally entitled to do, he is responsible for delaying the withdrawal until the last days before the deadline. Because it would be impossible at that late date to obtain adequate representation elsewhere, Weller would be forced either to sign the contract or to lose his right to challenge the IRS assessment.

Adhesion Contracts and Unconscionability

Questions concerning genuineness of assent may arise when the terms of a contract are dictated by a party with overwhelming bargaining power and the signer must agree to those terms or go without the commodity or service in question. As explained in Chapter 13, such contracts, which are written exclusively by one party and presented to the other party on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, are often referred to as adhesion contracts. These contracts often use standard forms, which give the adhering party no opportunity to negotiate the contract terms.

Standard-Form Contracts

Standard-form contracts often contain fine-print provisions that shift a risk naturally borne by one party to the other. A variety of businesses use such contracts. Life insurance policies, residential leases, loan agreements, and employment agency contracts are often standard-form contracts. To avoid enforcement of the contract or of a particular clause, the aggrieved party must show that the parties had substantially unequal bargaining positions and that enforcement would be manifestly unfair or oppressive. If the required showing is made, the contract or particular term is deemed unconscionable and is not enforced.

Adhesion contracts are standard in the retail automobile industry. The following case arose out of an arbitration clause in such a contract between an auto dealership and its customer.

C A S E 14.3 Simpson v. MSA of Myrtle Beach, Inc.

Supreme Court of South Carolina, 2007. 373 S.C. 14, 644 S.E.2d 663.

www.findlaw.com/11stategov/sc/scca.html^a - Background and Facts MSA of Myrtle Beach, Inc., in South Carolina does business as Addy's Harbor Dodge (Addy), a car dealership. Sherry Simpson signed a contract with Addy to trade in her 2001 Toyota 4Runner for a new 2004 Dodge Caravan. Directly above the signature line on the first page of the contract, a signee was instructed in bold type to "SEE ADDITIONAL TERMS AND CONDITIONS ON OPPOSITE PAGE." The additional terms and conditions contained an arbitration clause, which provided, among other things, that "[i]n no event shall the arbitrator be authorized to award punitive, exemplary, double, or treble damages (or any other damages which are punitive in nature or effect) against either party." Six months later, Simpson filed a suit in a South Carolina state court against Addy, claiming that the dealer had misrepresented the trade-in value of her vehicle, artificially increased the purchase price, and failed to provide all rebates promised, in violation of state statutes. Addy filed a motion to compel arbitration. Simpson responded that the arbitration clause was unconscionable and unenforceable. The court denied Addy's motion. Addy appealed to the South Carolina Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Chief Justice TOAL:

* * * *

* * * In South Carolina, unconscionability is defined as the absence of meaningful choice on the part of one party due to one-sided contract provisions, together with terms that are so oppressive that no reasonable person would make them and no fair and honest person would accept them. * * *

*In analyzing claims of unconscionability in the context of arbitration agreements, * * * courts * * * focus generally on whether the arbitration clause is geared towards achieving an unbiased decision by a neutral decision-maker.* It is under this general rubric that we determine whether a contract provision is unconscionable due to both an absence of meaningful choice and oppressive, one-sided terms. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Absence of meaningful choice on the part of one party generally speaks to the fundamental fairness of the bargaining process in the contract at issue. In determining whether a contract was tainted by an absence of meaningful choice, courts should take into account the nature of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff; whether the plaintiff is a substantial business concern; the relative disparity in the parties' bargaining power; the parties' relative sophistication; whether there is an element of surprise in the inclusion of the challenged clause; and the conspicuousness of the clause.

* * * *

* * * [W]e * * * acknowledge Simpson's claim that she did not possess the business judgment necessary to make her aware of the implications of the arbitration agreement, and that she did not have a lawyer present to provide any assistance in the matter. Similarly, we note Simpson's allegation that the contract was "hastily" presented for her signature.

a. In the "2007" section, click on "March." In the result, click on the number next to the name of the case to access the opinion.

CASE 14.3 CONTINUED

* * * [W]e also find it necessary to consider the otherwise inconspicuous nature of the arbitration clause in light of its consequences. The loss of the right to a jury trial is an obvious result of arbitration. However, this particular arbitration clause also required Simpson to forgo certain remedies that were otherwise required by statute. While certain phrases within other provisions of the additional terms and conditions were printed in all capital letters, the arbitration clause in its entirety was written in * * * small print, and embedded in paragraph ten (10) of sixteen (16) total paragraphs included on the page. Although this Court acknowledges that parties are always free to contract away their rights, we cannot, under the circumstances, ignore the inconspicuous nature of a provision, which was drafted by the superior party, and which functioned to contract away certain significant rights and remedies otherwise available to Simpson by law. Furthermore, * * * the present transaction may be distinguished from [a transaction] where both parties were sophisticated business interests in an arms-length negotiation.

Accordingly, we find that when considered as a whole and in the context of an adhesion contract for a vehicle trade-in, the circumstances reveal that Simpson had no meaningful choice in agreeing to arbitrate claims with Addy.

* * * * *

The general rule is that courts will not enforce a contract which is violative of public policy, statutory law, or provisions of the Constitution. In our opinion, this rule has two applications in the present case. First, this arbitration clause violates statutory law because it prevents Simpson from receiving the mandatory statutory remedies to which she may be entitled * * *. Second, unconditionally permitting the weaker party to waive these statutory remedies pursuant to an adhesion contract runs contrary to the underlying statutes' very purposes of punishing acts that adversely affect the public interest. Therefore, under the general rule, this provision in the arbitration clause is unenforceable. [Emphasis added.]

Accordingly, we find the provision prohibiting double and treble damages to be oppressive, one-sided, and not geared toward achieving an unbiased decision by a neutral decision-maker. In conjunction with Simpson's lack of meaningful choice in agreeing to arbitrate, this provision is an unconscionable waiver of statutory rights, and therefore, unenforceable.

● Decision and Remedy The court affirmed the lower court's denial of Addy's motion to compel arbitration. The state supreme court found the arbitration clause to be unconscionable and unenforceable. Simpson had no meaningful choice in agreeing to arbitrate, and the terms limiting her remedies were oppressive and one sided.

● The Ethical Dimension Could the court have severed the unconscionable portions of the arbitration clause and otherwise allowed arbitration to proceed? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension The dealer's contract also provided that Addy did not have to submit to arbitration any claims it might have against Simpson for "monies owed" and that these claims "shall not be stayed pending the outcome of arbitration." Is this provision unconscionable? Discuss.

Unconscionability and the Courts

Technically, unconscionability under Section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) applies only to contracts for the sale of goods. Many courts, however, have broadened the concept and applied it in other situations.

Although unconscionability was discussed in Chapter 13, it is important to note here that the UCC gives courts a great degree of discretion to invalidate or strike down a contract or clause as being unconscionable. As a result, some states have not adopted Section 2-302 of the UCC. In those states, the legislature and the courts prefer to rely on traditional notions of fraud, undue influence, and duress. (See Concept Summary 14.1 for a review of all of the factors that may indicate a lack of voluntary consent.)

CONCEPT SUMMARY 14.1

Voluntary Consent

Problems of Assent	Rule
MISTAKES	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Unilateral—Generally, the mistaken party is bound by the contract, unless the other party knows or should have known of the mistake, or in some states, the mistake is an inadvertent mathematical error in addition, subtraction, and the like that is committed without gross negligence. 2. Bilateral (mutual)—If both parties are mistaken about a material fact, such as the identity of the subject matter, either party can avoid the contract. If the mistake relates to the value or quality of the subject matter, either party can enforce the contract.
FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION	Three elements are necessary to establish fraudulent misrepresentation: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. A misrepresentation of a material fact has occurred. 2. There has been an intent to deceive. 3. The innocent party has justifiably relied on the misrepresentation.
UNDUE INFLUENCE/DURESS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Undue influence—Arises from special relationships, such as fiduciary relationships, in which one party's free will has been overcome by the undue influence of another. Usually, the contract is voidable. 2. Duress—Defined as forcing a party to enter into a contract under fear of threat—for example, the threat of violence or economic pressure. The party forced to enter into the contract can rescind the contract.
ADHESION CONTRACTS AND UNCONSCIONABILITY	Concerns one-sided bargains in which one party has substantially superior bargaining power and can dictate the terms of a contract. Unconscionability typically occurs as a result of the following: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Standard-form contracts in which a fine-print provision purports to shift a risk normally borne by one party to the other (for example, a liability disclaimer). 2. Take-it-or-leave-it adhesion contracts in which the buyer has no choice but to agree to the seller's dictated terms if the buyer is to procure certain goods or services.

REVIEWING Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

Chelene had been a caregiver for Marta's eighty-year-old mother, Janis, for nine years. Shortly before Janis passed away, Chelene convinced her to buy Chelene's house for Marta. The elderly woman died before the papers were signed, however. Four months later, Marta used her inheritance to buy Chelene's house without having it inspected. The house was built in the 1950s, and Chelene said it was in "perfect condition." Nevertheless, one year after the purchase, the basement started leaking. Marta had the paneling removed from the basement walls and discovered that the walls were bowed inward and cracked. Marta then had a civil engineer inspect the basement walls, and he found that the cracks had been caulked and painted over before the paneling was installed. He concluded that the “wall failure” had existed “for at least thirty years” and that the basement walls were “structurally unsound.” Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

REVIEWING Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent, Continued

1. Can Marta obtain rescission of the contract based on undue influence? If the sale to Janis had been completed before her death, could Janis have obtained rescission based on undue influence? Explain.
2. Can Marta sue Chelene for fraudulent misrepresentation? Why or why not? What element(s) might be lacking?
3. Now assume that Chelene knew that the basement walls were cracked and bowed and that she had hired someone to install paneling prior to offering to sell the house. Did she have a duty to disclose this defect to Marta? Could a court find that Chelene’s silence in this situation constituted misrepresentation? Explain.
4. If Chelene knew about the problem with the walls but did not know that the house was structurally unsound, could she be liable for negligent misrepresentation? Why or why not?
5. Can Marta avoid the contract on the ground that both parties made a mistake about the condition of the house? Explain.

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

innocent misrepresentation 294 scienter 294 negligent misrepresentation 294

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

14-1. Juan is an elderly man who lives with his nephew, Samuel. Juan is totally dependent on Samuel’s support. Samuel tells Juan that unless he transfers a tract of land he owns to Samuel for a price 35 percent below its market value, Samuel will no longer support and take care of him. Juan enters into the contract. Discuss fully whether Juan can set aside this contract.

14-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Grano owns a forty-room motel on Highway 100. Tanner is interested in purchasing the motel. During the course of negotiations, Grano tells Tanner that the motel netted $30,000 during the previous year and that it will net at least $45,000 the next year. The motel books, which Grano turns over to Tanner before the purchase, clearly show that Grano’s motel netted only $15,000 the previous year. Also, Grano fails to tell Tanner that a bypass to Highway 100 is being planned that will redirect most traffic away from the front of the motel. Tanner purchases the motel. During the first year under Tanner’s operation, the motel nets only $18,000. At this time, Tanner learns of the previous low profitability of the motel and the planned bypass. Tanner wants his money back from Grano. Discuss fully Tanner’s probable success in getting his money back.

- For a sample answer to Question 14-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

14-3. Discuss whether either of the following contracts will be unenforceable on the ground that voluntary consent is lacking:

- (a) Simmons finds a stone in his pasture that he believes to be quartz. Jenson, who also believes that the stone is quartz, contracts to purchase it for $10. Just before delivery, the stone is discovered to be a diamond worth $1,000.

CHAPTER 14 Mistakes, Fraud, and Voluntary Consent

- (b) Jacoby's barn is burned to the ground. He accuses Goldman's son of arson and threatens to have the prosecutor bring a criminal action unless Goldman agrees to pay him $5,000. Goldman agrees to pay.

14-4. Lund offered to sell Steck his car and told Steck that the car had been driven only 25,000 miles and had never been in an accident. Steck hired Carvallo, a mechanic, to appraise the condition of the car, and Carvallo said that the car probably had at least 50,000 miles on it and most likely had been in an accident. In spite of this information, Steck still thought the car would be a good buy for the price, so he purchased it. Later, when the car developed numerous mechanical problems, Steck sought to rescind the contract on the basis of Lund's fraudulent misrepresentation of the auto's condition. Will Steck be able to rescind his contract? Explain.

14-5. Fraudulent Misrepresentation. In 1987, United Parcel Service Co. and United Parcel Service of America, Inc. (together known as UPS), decided to change the parcel delivery business from relying on contract carriers to establishing its own airline. During the transition, which took sixteen months, UPS hired 811 pilots. At the time, UPS expressed a desire to hire pilots who remained throughout that period with its contract carriers, which included Orion Air. A UPS representative met with more than fifty Orion pilots and made promises of future employment. John Rickert, a captain with Orion, was one of the pilots. Orion ceased operation after the UPS transition, and UPS did not hire Rickert, who obtained employment about six months later as a second officer with American Airlines, but at a lower salary. Rickert filed a suit in a Kentucky state court against UPS, claiming, in part, fraud based on the promises made by the UPS representative. UPS filed a motion for a directed verdict. What are the elements for a cause of action based on fraudulent misrepresentation? In whose favor should the court rule in this case, and why? [United Parcel Service, Inc. v. Rickert, 996 S.W.2d 464 (Ky. 1999)]

14-6. Negligent Misrepresentation. Cleveland Chiropractic College (CCC) promised prospective students that CCC would provide clinical training and experience—a critical part of a chiropractic education and a requirement for graduation and obtaining a license to practice. Specifically, CCC expressly promised that it would provide an ample variety of patients. CCC knew, however, that it did not have the ability to provide sufficient patients, as evidenced by its report to the Council on Chiropractic Education, an accreditation body through which chiropractic colleges monitor and certify themselves. In that report, CCC said that patient recruitment was the “joint responsibility” of the college and the student. During the 1990s, most of the “patients” that students saw were healthy persons whom the students recruited to be stand-in patients. After graduating and obtaining licenses to practice, Michael Troknya and nineteen others filed a suit in a federal district court against CCC, alleging, among other things, negligent misrepresentation. What are the elements of this cause of action? Are they satisfied in this case? Why or why not? [Troknya v. Cleveland Chiropractic Clinic, 280 F.3d 1200 (8th Cir. 2002)]

14-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

The law firm of Traystman, Coric and Keramidas represented Andrew Daigle in a divorce in Norwich, Connecticut. Scott McGowan, an attorney with the firm, handled the two-day trial. After the first day of the trial, McGowan told Daigle to sign a promissory note in the amount of $26,973, which represented the amount that Daigle then owed to the firm, or McGowan would withdraw from the case, and Daigle would be forced to get another attorney or to continue the trial by himself. Daigle said that he wanted another attorney, Martin Rutchik, to see the note. McGowan urged Daigle to sign it and assured him that a copy would be sent to Rutchik. Feeling that he had no other choice, Daigle signed the note. When he did not pay, the law firm filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against him. Daigle asserted that the note was unenforceable because he had signed it under duress. What are the requirements for the use of duress as a defense to a contract? Are the requirements met here? What might the law firm argue in response to Daigle's assertion? Explain. [Traystman, Coric and Keramidas v. Daigle, 84 Conn.App. 843, 855 A.2d 996 (2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 14-7, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 14,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

14-8. Fraudulent Misrepresentation. According to the student handbook at Cleveland Chiropractic College (CCC) in Missouri, academic misconduct includes “selling . . . any copy of any material intended to be used as an instrument of academic evaluation in advance of its initial administration.” Leonard Verni was enrolled at CCC in Dr. Aleksandr Makarov's dermatology class. Before the first examination, Verni was reported to be selling copies of the test. CCC investigated and concluded that Verni had committed academic misconduct. He was dismissed from CCC, which informed him of his right to an appeal. According to the handbook, at the hearing on appeal a student could have an attorney or other adviser, present witnesses' testimony and other evidence, and “question any testimony . . . against him/her.” At his hearing, however, Verni did not bring his attorney, present evidence on his behalf, or question any adverse witnesses. When the dismissal was upheld, Verni filed a suit in a Missouri state court against CCC and others, claiming, in part, fraudulent misrepresentation. Verni argued that because he “relied” on the handbook's “representation” that CCC would follow its appeal procedure, he was unable to properly refute the charges against him. Can Verni succeed with this argument? Explain. [Verni v. Cleveland Chiropractic College, 212 S.W.3d 150 (Mo.2007)]

14-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

On behalf of BRJM, LLC, Nicolas Kepple offered Howard Engelsen $210,000 for a parcel of land known as lot five on the north side of Barnes Road in Stonington, Connecticut. Engelsen's company, Output Systems, Inc., owned the land. Engelsen had the lot surveyed and obtained an appraisal. The appraiser valued the property at $277,000, after determining that it was 3.0 acres and thus could not be subdivided because it did not meet the town's minimum legal requirement of 3.7 acres for subdivision. Engelsen responded to Kepple's offer with a counteroffer of $230,000, which Kepple accepted. On May 3, 2002, the parties signed a contract. When Engelsen refused to go through with the deal, BRJM filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Output, seeking specific performance and other relief. The defendant asserted the defense of mutual mistake on at least two grounds. [BRJM, LLC v. Output Systems, Inc., 100 Conn.App. 143, 917 A.2d 605 (2007)]

- (a) In the counteroffer, Engelsen asked Kepple to remove from their contract a clause requiring written confirmation of the availability of a "free split," which meant that the property could be subdivided without the town's prior approval. Kepple agreed. After signing the contract, Kepple learned that the property was not entitled to a free split. Would this circumstance qualify as a mistake on which the defendant could avoid the contract? Why or why not?

- (b) After signing the contract, Engelsen obtained a second appraisal that established the size of lot five as 3.71 acres, which meant that it could be subdivided, and valued the property at $490,000. Can the defendant avoid the contract on the basis of a mistake in the first appraisal? Explain.

14-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 14." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Mistake. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) What kind of mistake is involved in the dispute shown in the video (mutual or unilateral, mistake of fact or mistake of value)?
- (b) According to the chapter, in what two situations would the supermarket be able to rescind a contract to sell peppers to Melnick at the incorrectly advertised price?
- (c) Does it matter if the price that was advertised was a reasonable price for the peppers? Why or why not?

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For a discussion of fraudulent misrepresentation, go to the Web site of attorney Owen Katz at www.katzlawoffice.com/misrep.html

For a collection of leading cases on contract law, including cases involving topics covered in this chapter, go to www.lectlaw.com/files/lws49.htm

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 14" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 14-1: Legal Perspective
Negligent Misrepresentation and Scienter

Internet Exercise 14-2: Management Perspective
Fraudulent Misrepresentation

Internet Exercise 14-3: Economic Perspective
Economic Duress

CHAPTER 15

The Statute of Frauds— Writing Requirement

As discussed in Chapter 14, a contract that is otherwise valid may still be unenforceable if the parties have not voluntarily consented to its terms. An otherwise valid contract may also be unenforceable for another reason—because it is not in the proper form. For example, certain types of contracts are required to be in writing or evidenced by a memorandum, note, or electronic record. The writing requirement does not mean that an agreement must be a formal written contract. All that is necessary is some written proof that a contract exists, such as an e-mail exchange evidencing the agreement. Under what is called the Statute of Frauds, certain agreements are required by law to be in writing. If there is no written evidence of the contract, it may not be enforceable.

In this chapter, we examine the kinds of contracts that require a writing under the Statute of Frauds and some exceptions to the writing requirement. We also discuss the parol evidence rule, which courts follow when determining whether evidence that is extraneous, or external, to written contracts may be admissible at trial. Though not inherently related to the Statute of Frauds, the parol evidence rule has general application in contract law. We cover these topics within one chapter primarily for reasons of convenience and space.

The Origins of the Statute of Frauds

At early common law, parties to a contract were not allowed to testify. This led to the practice of hiring third party witnesses. As early as the seventeenth century, the English recognized the many problems presented by this practice and enacted a statute to help deal with it. The statute, passed by the English Parliament in 1677, was known as “An Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries.” The act established that certain types of contracts, to be enforceable, had to be evidenced by a writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement was sought.

Today, every state has a statute, modeled after the English act, that stipulates what types of contracts must be in writing or evidenced by a writing. Although the statutes vary slightly from state to state, all states require certain types of contracts to be in writing or evidenced by a written (or electronic) memorandum signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought, unless certain exceptions apply. (These exceptions will be discussed later in this chapter.) In this text, we refer to these statutes collectively as the Statute of Frauds. The actual name of the Statute of Frauds is misleading because it neither applies to fraud nor invalidates any type of contract. Rather, it denies enforceability to certain contracts that do not comply with its requirements.

Contracts That Fall within the Statute of Frauds

The following types of contracts are said to fall “within” or “under” the Statute of Frauds and therefore are required to be in writing or evidenced by a written memorandum or record:

1. Contracts involving interests in land.
2. Contracts that cannot by their terms be performed within one year from the day after the date of formation.

3. Collateral, or secondary, contracts, such as promises to answer for the debt or duty of another and promises by the administrator or executor of an estate to pay a debt of the estate personally—that is, out of her or his own pocket.
4. Promises made in consideration of marriage.
5. Under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more.¹

Contracts Involving Interests in Land

A contract calling for the sale of land is not enforceable unless it is in writing or evidenced by a written memorandum. Land is real property and includes all physical objects that are permanently attached to the soil, such as buildings, fences, trees, and the soil itself (see Chapter 47). The Statute of Frauds operates as a defense to the enforcement of an oral contract for the sale of land. For example, if Sam contracts orally to sell Blackacre to Betty but later decides not to sell, under most circumstances Betty cannot enforce the contract.

The Statute of Frauds also requires written evidence of contracts for the transfer of other interests in land. For example, mortgage agreements and leases (see Chapter 48) normally must be written, although most state laws provide for the enforcement of short-term oral leases. Similarly, an agreement that includes an option to purchase real property must be in writing for the option to be enforced.²

The One-Year Rule

A contract that cannot, by its own terms, be performed within one year from the day after the contract is formed must be in writing to be enforceable.³ Suppose that Superior University forms a contract with Kimi San stating that San will teach three courses in history during the coming academic year (September 15 through June 15). If the contract is formed in March, it must be in writing to be enforceable—because it cannot be performed within one year. If the contract is not formed until July, however, it will not have to be in writing to be enforceable—because it can be performed within one year.

The test for determining whether an oral contract is enforceable under the one-year rule of the Statute of Frauds is whether performance is possible within one year from the day after the date of contract formation—not whether the agreement is likely to be performed within one year. When performance of a contract is objectively impossible during the one-year period, the oral contract will be unenforceable. Exhibit 15–1 illustrates graphically the application of the one-year rule.

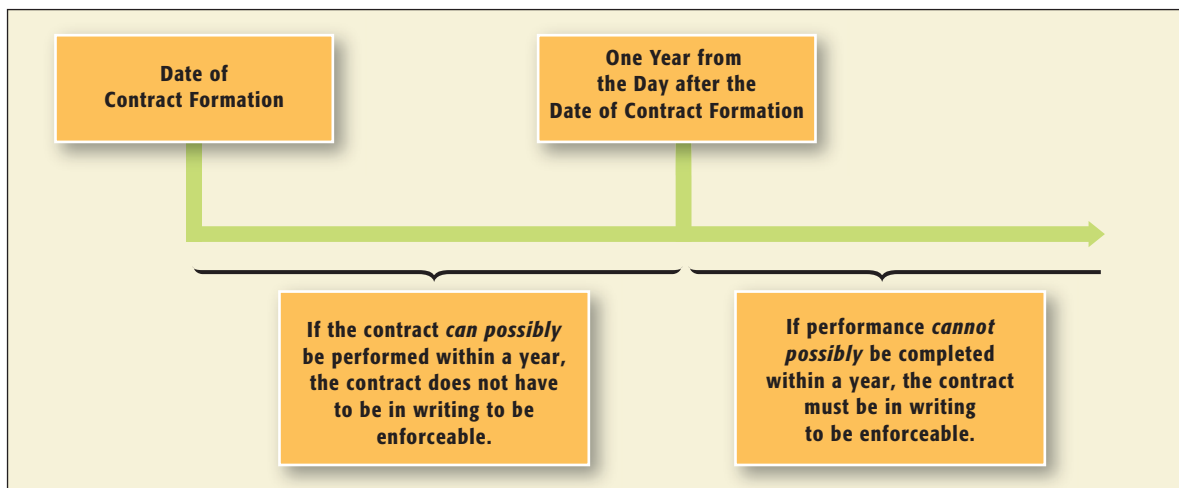

1. Although in 2003 it was proposed that this amount be changed from $500 to $5,000, no state has yet adopted this higher dollar threshold (see Chapter 20).

2. See, for example, Michel v. Bush, 146 Ohio App.3d 208, 765 N.E.2d 911 (2001); and Stickney v. Tullis-Vermillion, 165 Ohio App.3d 480, 847 N.E.2d 29 (2006).

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 130.

EXHIBIT 15–1 • The One-Year Rule

Under the Statute of Frauds, contracts that by their terms are impossible to perform within one year from the day after the date of contract formation must be in writing to be enforceable. Put another way, if it is at all possible to perform an oral contract within one year from the day after the contract is made, the contract will fall outside the Statute of Frauds and be enforceable.

CHAPTER 15 The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement

For example, suppose that Bankers Life orally contracts to lend $40,000 to Janet Lawrence “as long as Lawrence and Associates operates its financial consulting firm in Omaha, Nebraska.” The contract does not fall within the Statute of Frauds—no writing is required—because Lawrence and Associates could go out of business in one year or less. In this event, the contract would be fully performed within one year.⁴ Similarly, an oral contract for lifetime employment does not fall within the Statute of Frauds. Because an employee who is hired “for life” can die within a year, the courts reason that the contract can be performed within one year.⁵

In the following case, an employee argued that her employer’s oral promise to pay her a certain amount as a bonus in installments over 107 months was removed from the Statute of Frauds because the total sum could have been paid within one year.

4. See Warner v. Texas & Pacific Railroad Co., 164 U.S.418, 17 S.Ct. 147, 41 L.Ed. 495 (1896).

5. See, for example, Gavengno v. TLT Construction Corp., 67 Mass.App.Ct. 1102, 851 N.E.2d 1133 (2006); Czapla v. Commerz Futures, LLC, 114 F.Supp.2d 715 (N.D.Ill. 2000); and Doherty v. Doherty Insurance Agency, Inc., 878 F.2d 546 (1st Cir. 1989).

EXTENDED CASE 15.1 Sawyer v. Mills

Court of Appeals of Kentucky, 2007. __ S.W.3d __.

WINE, Judge.

* * * *

[Barbara] Sawyer was employed as a paralegal in [Melbourne Mills, Jr.’s] law firm. * * * [Since 1994] Mills had promised to reward her for her assistance in instituting class action lawsuits. However, the parties never specified any amount the bonus might be or when the bonus would be forwarded to Sawyer other than when “the ship comes in.” * * *

After the Fen-Phen [class action was resolved and Mills’s firm got a substantial] settlement, Sawyer, her husband Steve Sawyer (“Steve”), and Mills all met together on June 25, 2001. Sawyer and Steve secretly recorded the conversation. * * * [T]he tape recording confirms that she and Steve initially asked Mills for a One Million Dollar ($1,000,000.00) lump sum bonus, which Mills quickly rejected. But following much encouragement from Steve and Sawyer, Mills did agree to pay Sawyer a bonus of One Million Dollars ($1,000,000.00) plus the cost of a new luxury car which all agreed would be another Sixty-Five Thousand Dollars ($65,000.00). The full amount was to be paid in monthly installments, on the first of each month, until paid in full. The tape recording and Sawyer’s testimony both confirm the parties’ dollar amount and the agreed payment plan. * * * [T]he bonus was to be paid in monthly installments of Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000.00).

During the June 25, 2001 recorded conversation with Sawyer and Steve, Mills also agreed to sign a writing verifying the parties’ agreed-to terms of the bonus. * * * Sawyer’s attorney, Mark Moseley, drafted an agreement per the parties’ request, but Mills never signed. * * *

[Mills paid Sawyer $65,000 in amounts ranging from $10,000 to $15,000 between the June 25 conversation and February 2002, plus a single payment of $100,000 in October 2001. After the payments stopped, Sawyer filed a suit in a Kentucky state court against Mills, claiming that he had reneged on his promise to pay the bonus.]

Mills filed a motion for summary judgment prior to trial, arguing that Sawyer’s claims were barred by the statute of frauds. In an order entered on December 1, 2005, the trial court conceded that Sawyer’s claims would seem to run afoul of the statute. After reflection, the trial court denied the motion and allowed Sawyer to present her full evidence at trial before a jury. The jury found that Mills had entered into an oral contract for the bonus, and returned a verdict in favor of Sawyer in the amount of Nine Hundred Thousand Dollars ($900,000.00). Thereafter, Mills filed a motion for [a judgment notwithstanding the verdict (JNOV)], again arguing that any agreement between him and Sawyer is barred by the statute of frauds. The trial court agreed and granted the motion.

* * * *

On appeal [to a state intermediate appellate court], Sawyer argues that enforcement of the agreement between her and Mills was not barred by the statute of frauds. As codified in [Kentucky

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 15.1 CONTINUED

Revised Statutes (KRS) 371.010, the statute of frauds provides that *no action shall be brought to charge any person “[u]pon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof * * * unless the promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, or ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof, be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his authorized agent.”* Because he never signed the written contract, Mills contends that Sawyer cannot recover on his oral representations.

* * * *

Sawyer * * * argues that the statute of frauds was not applicable because the agreement was capable of being performed within one year. As outlined above, the parties’ agreement was clearly that Mills would pay Sawyer Ten Thousand Dollars ($10,000.00) a month for a period of one hundred and seven (107) months. The tape recording of the parties’ conversation on June 25 and the testimony of Sawyer, Steve and their attorney Moseley and his draft agreement all confirm these contemplations by the parties. Thus, it is safe to conclude that, pursuant to the undisputed testimony at trial from Sawyer, Steve, attorney Moseley, and the draft agreement, Mills never agreed to pay the lump sum bonus amount or make any kind of pre-payments towards the bonus. While Sawyer concedes that the parties did not contemplate performance in less than one year, she contends that the agreement did not preclude such performance either. Thus, she contends that the agreement does not violate the statute of frauds.

* * * *

* * * [G]enerally, if a contract could be performed within a year from the time it was made, the statute of frauds does not apply, even if its performance might have extended beyond that point. However, * * * when it is contemplated by the parties that the contract is not to be performed within the year, regardless of whether it was possible of performance within that time, the contract comes within the inhibition of KRS 371.010(7). * * * [I]n this case Sawyer and Mills clearly anticipated that the bonus would be paid over a series of one hundred and seven (107) months from the making of the agreement on June 25, 2001. As this period is more than one year, the statute of frauds applies to bar enforcement of the agreement.

* * * *

After considering the evidence in a light most favorable to Sawyer * * * , we are persuaded that the evidence supports the finding of the trial court that the JNOV was appropriate in this case. Undisputed testimony from Sawyer, Steve and attorney Moseley and his draft agreement of the parties’ June 25 conversation, coupled with the tape recording of that conversation, all confirm that the parties agreed the bonus would be paid in monthly installments over one hundred and seven (107) months. The tape recording clearly shows that Mills never intended to pay Sawyer the bonus as a lump sum and Sawyer is recorded agreeing to the monthly payments. The parties never contemplated that the bonus would be paid within one year. * * * As such, the statute of frauds bars Sawyer’s claim against Mills as she produced no writing signed by Mills agreeing to the oral promise to pay her the bonus.

Accordingly, the order of the [lower] Court granting the JNOV is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Would an oral agreement between Sawyer and Mills to begin the bonus’s installment payments on a certain date—July 1, 2001, for example—and complete them no later than fifteen months from that date have been outside the one-year rule of the Statute of Frauds?
2. Sawyer contended that the writing requirement of the Statute of Frauds was met through the combination of the recording of the parties’ conversation on June 25 and the checks Mills signed to Sawyer totaling $165,000. Obviously, the court did not agree. Why not?

Collateral Promises

A collateral promise, or secondary promise, is one that is ancillary (subsidiary) to a principal transaction or primary contractual relationship. In other words, a collateral promise is one made by a third party to assume the debts or obligations of a primary party to a contract if that party does not perform. Any collateral promise of this nature falls under the Statute of Frauds and therefore must be in writing to be enforceable. To understand this concept, it is important to distinguish between primary and secondary promises and obligations.

Primary versus Secondary Obligations

As a general rule, a contract in which a party assumes a primary obligation does not need to be in writing to be enforceable. Suppose that Bancroft forms an oral contract with Harmony's Floral Boutique to send his mother a dozen roses for Mother's Day. Bancroft's oral contract with Harmony's provides that he will pay for the roses when he receives the bill for the flowers. Bancroft is a direct party to this contract and has incurred a primary obligation under the contract. Because he is a party to the contract and has a primary obligation to Harmony's, this contract does not fall under the Statute of Frauds and does not have to be in writing to be enforceable. If Bancroft fails to pay the florist and the florist sues him for payment, Bancroft cannot raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

In contrast, a contract in which a party assumes a secondary obligation does have to be in writing to be enforceable. For example, now suppose that Bancroft's mother borrows $10,000 from the International Trust Company on a promissory note payable six months later. Bancroft promises the bank officer handling the loan that he will pay the $10,000 only if his mother does not pay the loan on time. Bancroft, in this situation, becomes what is known as a guarantor on the loan—that is, he is guaranteeing to the bank that he will pay back the loan if his mother fails to do so—and has incurred a secondary obligation. This kind of collateral promise, in which the guarantor states that he or she will become responsible only if the primary party does not perform, must be in writing to be enforceable. Exhibit 15-2 illustrates the concept of a collateral promise. (We will return to the concept of guaranty and the distinction between primary and secondary obligations in Chapter 28, in the context of creditors' rights.)

An Exception—The “Main Purpose” Rule

An oral promise to answer for the debt of another is covered by the Statute of Frauds unless the guarantor's main purpose in incurring a secondary obligation is to secure a personal benefit. This type of contract need not be in writing.⁶ The assumption is that a court can infer from the circumstances of a particular case whether the “leading objective” of the promisor was to secure a personal benefit and thus, in effect, to answer for her or his own debt.

Consider an example. Braswell contracts with Custom Manufacturing Company to have some machines custom-made for Braswell's factory. She promises Newform Supply, Custom's supplier, that if Newform continues to deliver the materials to Custom for the production of the custom-made machines, she will guarantee payment. This promise need not be in writing, even though the effect may be to pay the debt of another. This is because Braswell's main purpose in forming the contract is to secure a benefit for herself.

Another typical application of the main purpose rule occurs when one creditor guarantees a debtor's debt to another creditor to prevent litigation. This allows the debtor to remain in business long enough to generate profits sufficient to pay both creditors.

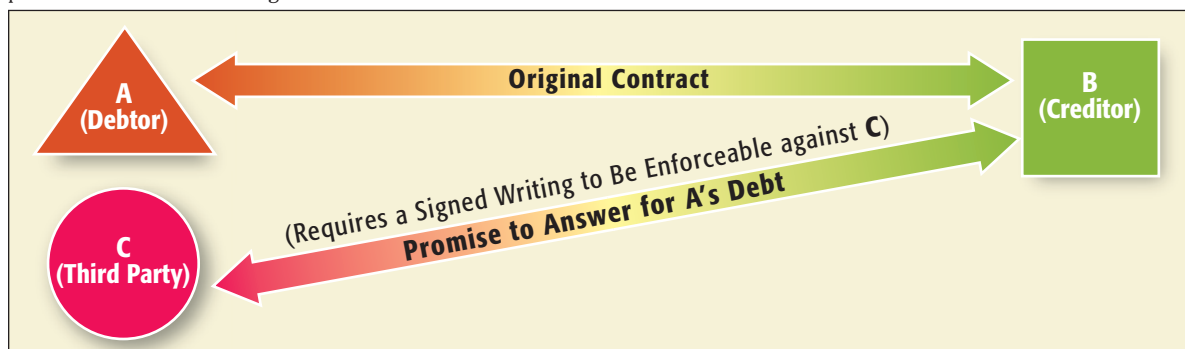

Promises Made in Consideration of Marriage

A unilateral promise to make a monetary payment or to give property in consideration of a promise to marry must be in writing. If Baumann promises to pay Villard

6. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 116.

EXHIBIT 15-2 • Collateral Promises

A collateral (secondary) promise is one made by a third party (C, in this exhibit) to a creditor (B, in this exhibit) to pay the debt of another (A, in this exhibit), who is primarily obligated to pay the debt. Under the Statute of Frauds, collateral promises must be in writing to be enforceable.

$10,000 if Villard promises to marry Baumann's daughter, the promise must be in writing. The same rule applies to prenuptial agreements—agreements made before marriage that define each partner's ownership rights in the other partner's property. A couple might make such an agreement if, for example, a prospective wife wishes to limit the amount her prospective husband can obtain if the marriage ends in divorce. Prenuptial agreements must be in writing to be enforceable.⁷

Consideration Generally Required Generally, courts tend to give more credence to prenuptial agreements that are accompanied by consideration. For example, assume that Maureen, who has few assets, and Kaiser, who has a net worth of $300 million, plan to marry. Kaiser has several children, and he wants them to receive most of his wealth on his death. The couple form a prenuptial agreement in which Kaiser promises to give Maureen $100,000 a year for the rest of her life should they divorce. Kaiser offers to give Maureen $500,000 if she consents to the agreement. If Maureen consents to the agreement and accepts the $500,000, very likely a court will hold this to be a valid prenuptial agreement should it ever be contested.

Courts have used the same reasoning to require adequate consideration in postnuptial agreements (agreements entered into after the marriage that define each spouse's rights). For example, suppose that one year after a couple married, they entered into an agreement concerning the division of marital assets in the event of divorce. The husband, a medical student, agreed to give the wife one-half of his future earnings if he instigated a divorce. The wife, in turn, promised not to return to her dental career, which she had given up when they married, and not to leave the marriage. Is the agreement enforceable? According to many states' courts, the answer is no. Because the wife in this situation had already given up her career to stay at home and tend to the household, this promise was based on past consideration, which is no consideration. Also, because the parties were not having marital difficulties at the time, she was not giving up anything by promising to stay in the marriage.⁸

7. To add certainty to the enforceability of prenuptial agreements, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws issued the Uniform Prenuptial Agreements Act (UPAA) in 1983. The act provides that a prenuptial agreement must be in writing to be enforceable and that the agreement becomes effective when the parties marry.

8. See, for example, Bratton v. Bratton, 136 S.W.3d 595 (Tenn. 2004).

Must be Voluntarily Entered In some circumstances, a prenuptial agreement will not be enforceable even if it is in writing. For example, an agreement is not enforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought proves that he or she did not sign the agreement voluntarily. (For a further discussion of this topic, see this chapter's Contemporary Legal Debates feature on pages 312 and 313.)

Contracts for the Sale of Goods

The Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) includes Statute of Frauds provisions that require written evidence of a contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more (see Chapter 20). A writing that will satisfy the UCC requirement need only state the quantity term; other terms agreed on can be omitted or even stated imprecisely in the writing, as long as they adequately reflect both parties' intentions. A written memorandum or series of communications evidencing a contract will suffice. The contract will not be enforceable, however, for any quantity greater than that set forth in the writing. In addition, the writing must have been signed by the person to be charged—that is, by the person who refuses to perform or the one being sued. Beyond these two requirements, the writing normally need not designate the buyer or the seller, the terms of payment, or the price. Requirements of the Statute of Frauds under the UCC will be discussed in more detail in Chapter 20.

Exceptions to the Applicability of the Statute of Frauds

Exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds are made in certain circumstances. We look here at these exceptions.

Partial Performance In cases involving contracts relating to the transfer of interests in land, a court may grant specific performance (performance of the contract according to its precise terms) of an oral contract that has been partially performed. For instance, when the purchaser has paid part of the price, taken possession of the property, and made permanent improvements to it, the parties clearly cannot be returned to the positions they occupied before the contract was formed. Whether a court will enforce an oral contract pertaining to land due to partial performance is usually determined by the degree of injury that would otherwise result. The party seeking performance must have reasonably relied on the contract

(and on the other party's continuing agreement) and so changed her or his position that injustice can be avoided only by specific enforcement.⁹

Under the UCC, an oral contract for the sale of goods is enforceable to the extent that a seller accepts payment or a buyer accepts delivery of the goods (see Chapter 20 for a fuller discussion of this exception).¹⁰

The existence and extent of a contract to supply computer kiosks for use in school cafeterias were in dispute in the following case.

9. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 129.

10. UCC 2-201(3)(c).

C A S E 15.2 School-Link Technologies, Inc. v. Applied Resources, Inc.

United States District Court, District of Kansas, 2007. 471 F.Supp.2d 1101.

● Background and Facts Applied Resources, Inc. (ARI), makes computer hardware for point-of-sale systems—kiosks consisting of computers encased in chassis on which card readers or other payment devices are mounted. School-Link Technologies, Inc. (SLT), sells food-service technology to schools. In August 2003, the New York City Department of Education (NYCDOE) asked SLT to propose a cafeteria payment system that included kiosks. SLT asked ARI to participate in a pilot project, orally promising ARI that it would be the exclusive supplier of as many as 1,500 kiosks if the NYCDOE awarded the contract to SLT. ARI agreed. SLT intended to cut ARI out of the deal, however, and told the NYCDOE that SLT would be making its own kiosks. Meanwhile, SLT paid ARI in advance for a certain number of goods but insisted on onerous terms for a written contract to which ARI would not agree. ARI suspended production of the prepaid items and refused to refund more than $55,000 that SLT had paid. SLT filed a suit in a federal district court against ARI. ARI responded with, among other things, a counterclaim for breach of contract, asserting that SLT failed to use ARI as an exclusive supplier as promised. ARI sought the expenses it incurred for the pilot project and the amount of profit that it would have realized on the entire deal. SLT filed a motion for summary judgment on this claim.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

JOHN W. LUNGSTRUM, United States District Judge.

* * * *

SLT raises several arguments as to why it is entitled to summary judgment on ARI's breach of * * * contract claim. SLT relies, first, on the statute of frauds. Contracts for the sale of goods over $500 generally must be in writing and must be signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. Because the NYCDOE contract undisputedly involved the sale of goods in excess of $500, the parties' oral contract that ARI would be the exclusive supplier of kiosks for the project is not enforceable in the absence of an applicable exception to this general rule.

ARI contends that the statute of frauds does not apply with respect to goods which have been received and accepted * * *. *[Under] one of the exceptions to the statute of frauds * * * a contract which would otherwise be unenforceable for lack of a writing but which is valid in other respects is enforceable * * * with respect to goods for which payment has been made and accepted or which have been received and accepted.* This exception allows partial performance to serve as a substitute for the required writing, but only for goods which have been received and accepted or for which payment has been made and accepted. Here, the goods which arguably fall within that definition are those supplied by ARI for the pilot project with the NYCDOE because those goods were received and accepted by SLT. Consequently, SLT's motion for summary judgment based on the statute of frauds is denied with respect to those goods.

SLT's motion based on the statute of frauds is granted, however, with respect to ARI's claim that it was to be the exclusive supplier for 1,500 kiosks for the NYCDOE project. * * * The non-pilot program kiosks do not fall within the ambit [realm] of [the partial performance exception to the Statute of Frauds] because those goods were not received and accepted, nor was payment made and accepted for them. ARI has not directed the court's attention to any other evidence which demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact with respect to any other statute of frauds exception.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 15.2 CONTINUED Accordingly, the court's analysis of ARI's breach of oral contract claim is narrowed to the goods ARI supplied for SLT's pilot project with the NYCDOE, as the remaining aspect of that claim is barred by the statute of frauds.

• Decision and Remedy The court denied SLT's motion for summary judgment on ARI's counterclaim for breach of contract "with respect to goods which SLT already received and accepted, [that is,] the goods for the pilot program with the NYCDOE." Under the partial performance exception to the Statute of Frauds, an oral contract for a sale of goods that would otherwise be unenforceable for the lack of a writing is enforceable to the extent that the seller delivers the goods and the buyer accepts them.

• The Ethical Dimension Are there additional theories on which ARI's request for relief could be based in this case? What common thread underlies these theories?

• The Legal Environment Dimension Could ARI have successfully asserted a claim against SLT based on fraudulent misrepresentation? Explain.

Admissions In some states, if a party against whom enforcement of an oral contract is sought "admits" in pleadings, testimony, or otherwise in court that a contract for sale was made, the contract will be enforceable.¹¹ A contract subject to the UCC will be enforceable, but only to the extent of the quantity admitted.¹² Thus, if the president of Ashley Corporation admits under oath that an oral agreement was made with Com Best to buy certain business equipment for $10,000, the agreement will be enforceable, but only to the extent it is admitted.

Promissory Estoppel In some states, an oral contract that would otherwise be unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds may be enforced under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, based on detrimental reliance. Recall from Chapter 12 that if a promisor makes a promise on which the promisee justifiably relies to his or her detriment, a court may estop (prevent) the promisor from denying that a contract exists. Section 139 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts provides that in these circumstances, an oral promise can be enforceable notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds if the reliance was foreseeable to the person making the promise and if injustice can be avoided only by enforcing the promise. (Note the similarities between this exception and the doctrine of partial performance discussed above: both require reasonable reliance and operate to estop a party from claiming that no contract exists.)

11. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 133.

12. UCC 2-201(3)(b).

Special Exceptions under the UCC Special exceptions to the applicability of the Statute of Frauds apply to sales contracts. Oral contracts for customized goods may be enforced in certain circumstances. Another exception has to do with oral contracts between merchants that have been confirmed in a written memorandum. These exceptions and those mentioned above will be examined in greater detail in Chapter 20, when we discuss the UCC provisions regarding the Statute of Frauds. Exhibit 15-3 graphically summarizes the types of contracts that fall under the Statute of Frauds and the various exceptions that apply.

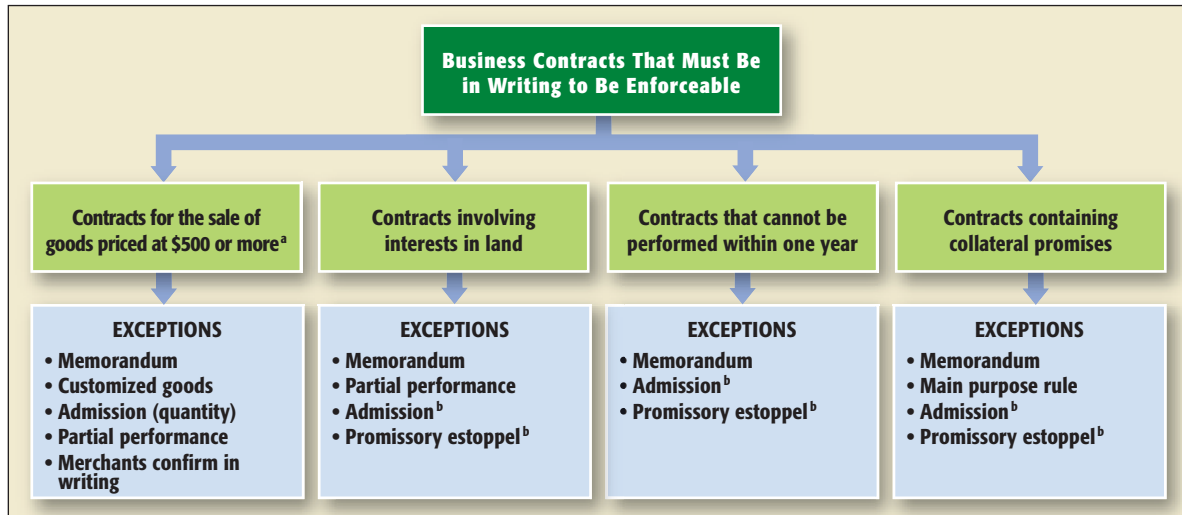

Sufficiency of the Writing

The Statute of Frauds and the UCC require either a written contract or a memorandum (written evidence of the oral contract) signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought, unless there is a legally recognized exception. The signature need not be placed at the end of the document but can be anywhere in the writing. It can be an initial rather than the full name. Indeed, it can even be some form of electronic signature, such as a person's name keyed in at the bottom of an e-mail message.¹³ (For a discussion of electronic signatures, see Chapter 19.)

13. See, for example, Rosenfeld v. Zerneck, 4 Misc.3d 193, 776 N.Y.S.2d 458 (N.Y.Sup. 2004); and Lamle v. Mattel, Inc., 394 F.3d 1355 (Fed.Cir.2005).

EXHIBIT 15-3 • Contracts Subject to the Statute of Frauds

a. Under a 2003 amendment to the UCC that has not been adopted by any state, a contract for a sale of goods must involve goods priced at $5,000 or more to be subject to the writing requirement of the Statute of Frauds (see Chapter 20). This amendment also exempts contracts for the sale of goods from the one-year rule.

b. Some states follow Section 133 (on admissions) and Section 139 (on promissory estoppel) of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts.

What Constitutes a Writing?

A writing can consist of any order confirmation, invoice, sales slip, check, fax, or e-mail—or such items in combination. The written contract need not consist of a single document to constitute an enforceable contract. One document may incorporate another document by expressly referring to it. Several documents may form a single contract if they are physically attached, such as by staple, paper clip, or glue. Several documents may form a single contract even if they are only placed in the same envelope.

For example, suppose that Simpson orally agrees to sell some land next to a shopping mall to Terro Properties. Simpson gives Terro an unsigned memo that contains a legal description of the property, and Terro gives Simpson an unsigned first draft of their contract. Simpson sends Terro a signed letter that refers to the memo and to the first and final drafts of the contract. Terro sends Simpson an unsigned copy of the final draft of the contract with a signed check stapled to it. Together, the documents can constitute a writing sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds and bind both parties to the terms of the contract as evidenced by the writings.

What Must Be Contained in the Writing?

A memorandum or note evidencing the oral contract need only contain the essential terms of the contract, not every term. There must, of course, also be some indication that the parties voluntarily agreed to the terms. A faxed memo of the terms of an agreement could be sufficient if it shows that there was a meeting of the minds and that the faxed terms were not just part of the preliminary negotiations.¹⁴

As mentioned earlier, under the UCC, a writing evidencing a contract for the sale of goods need only state the quantity and be signed by the party to be charged. Under most state Statute of Frauds provisions, the writing must also name the parties and identify the subject matter, the consideration, and the essential terms with reasonable certainty. In addition, contracts for the sale of land often are required to state the price and describe the property with sufficient clarity to allow them to be determined without reference to outside sources.

Note that because only the party against whom enforcement is sought must have signed the writing, a contract may be enforceable by one of its parties but not by the other. For example, suppose that Rock orally agrees to buy Betty Devlin's lake house and lot for $150,000. Devlin writes Rock a letter confirming the sale by identifying the parties and the essential terms of the sales contract—price, method of payment, and legal address—and signs the letter. Devlin has made a written memorandum of the oral land contract.

14. See, for example, Coca-Cola Co. v. Babyback's International, Inc., 841 N.E.2d 557 (Ind.App.2006).

CONTEMPORARY LEGAL DEBATES

Prenuptial Agreements and Advice of Counsel

The drafting and signing of prenuptial agreements are often at odds with the very concept of marriage. After all, the parties purport to be in love with each other and desirous of sharing all aspects of their lives. Under these circumstances, the thought of involving lawyers in the negotiation of a prenuptial agreement seems inappropriate. Nonetheless, prenuptial agreements are drafted and entered into every day. Cases occasionally come before the courts in which a party to a prenuptial agreement claims that the agreement should not be enforced because he or she was not advised to consult his or her own attorney before signing the agreement.

Some Jurisdictions Require Independent Counsel

In a growing number of jurisdictions, courts regard the advice of independent counsel as a significant factor in determining whether a party signed a prenuptial agreement voluntarily. In other words, if a prospective spouse did not have the advice of her or his own attorney before signing the agreement, that could indicate that the agreement was not signed voluntarily. In one case, for example, a woman challenged the enforceability of a prenuptial agreement on the ground that her husband's lawyer, who was hired to draft the agreement, did not advise her to have it reviewed by her own attorney. The Supreme Court of North Dakota held that the agreement could in fact be unenforceable for this reason.^a In a subsequent case involving similar facts, the Supreme Court of North Dakota reiterated that "adequate legal representation will often be the best evidence that a spouse signed the agreement knowledgeably and voluntarily."^b

Many courts have been particularly suspicious of prenuptial agreements involving a waiver by the future wife of all spousal support in the event of marriage and divorce. The reasoning has been that any prenuptial support waiver might undermine the permanency of the marital relationship, which would be contrary to public policy.

Other Jurisdictions Do Not Require Independent Counsel

Other jurisdictions take a different approach. For example, in a highly publicized case involving baseball player Barry Bonds, the California Supreme Court held that a prenuptial agreement was enforceable even though Bonds's wife was not advised to obtain independent counsel before signing it. The wife, who was Swedish and had little knowledge of English, later stated that she had not understood that by signing the agreement, she would forfeit any right to the earnings and property

a. Estate of Lutz, 563 N.W.2d 90 (N.Dak. 1997).

b. See Binek v. Binek, 673 N.W.2d 594 (N.Dak. 2004).

Because she signed the letter, she normally can be held to the oral contract by Rock. Devlin cannot enforce the contract against Rock, however, because he has not signed or entered into a written contract or memorandum and can assert the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

The Parol Evidence Rule

Sometimes, a written contract does not include—or contradicts—an oral understanding reached by the parties before or at the time of contracting. For example, suppose that Laura is about to lease an apartment. As she is signing the lease, she asks the landlord whether cats are allowed in the building. The landlord says that they are and that Laura can keep her cat in the apartment. The lease that Laura actually signs, however, contains a provision prohibiting pets. Later, a dispute arises between Laura and the landlord over whether the landlord agreed that Laura could have a cat in the apartment. Will Laura be able to introduce evidence at trial to show that, at the time the written contract was formed, the landlord orally agreed that she could have a cat, or will the written contract absolutely control?

In determining the outcome of contract disputes such as the one between Laura and her landlord, the courts look to a common law rule governing the admissibility in court of oral evidence, or parol evidence. Under the parol evidence rule, if a court finds that the parties intended their written contract to be a complete and final statement of their agree-acquisitions of the parties during their marriage. The court, however, held that the agreement was enforceable. The court concluded that the evidence indicated that the wife had consented to the terms of the agreement.^c

In another case, just days before the wedding, a man drove his future wife to his attorney's office and asked her to sign a prenuptial agreement as a precondition of their marriage. The agreement provided that each spouse waived his or her rights to the other spouse's property. The attorney advised the woman to obtain independent counsel and gave her an opportunity to review the document before signing it, but she did neither. After her husband's death, she claimed that the agreement was invalid because she had not signed it voluntarily. She stated that she had been very embarrassed by the scene in the attorney's office when she signed the agreement and had just wanted to "get it over with." Nonetheless, the court held that the agreement was valid. The court declared that while the husband's actions were "certainly not laudatory" and could be "fairly characterized as surprise tactics," they did not negate the "voluntary nature of the execution."^d c. In re Marriage of Bonds, 24 Cal.4th 1, 5 P.3d 815, 99 Cal.Rptr.2d 252 (2000).

d. In re Estate of Ingmand, 2001 WL 855406 (Iowa App. 2001).

In a more recent case, the Connecticut Supreme Court rejected a trial court's conclusion that the ex-wife had had insufficient time to digest and understand the disclosure on the day she signed the agreement. The appellate court ruled that "it is the party's responsibility to delay the signing of an agreement that is not understood."^e

WHERE DO YOU STAND?

Some observers argue that enforcing prenuptial agreements when both parties did not have the advice of independent counsel unduly burdens the financially weaker party to the marriage, customarily the woman. Others contend that allowing financially successful future spouses to protect their assets encourages more marriages to take place.

Clearly, the courts are divided on the issue of whether prenuptial agreements should be upheld despite the lack of independent counsel by both parties. Should the advice of independent counsel be a requirement for a valid prenuptial agreement? What is your position on this issue?

e. Friezo v. Friezo, 281 Conn. 166, 914 A.2d 533 (2007).

ment, then it will not allow either party to present parol evidence (testimony or other evidence of communications between the parties that are not contained in the contract itself).¹⁵

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 213.

Did a football team's agreement with its fans to sell "stadium builder licenses" (SBLs) for seats represent the parties' entire contract, or could an SBL brochure vary the agreement? That was the question in the following case.

C A S E 15.3 Yocca v. Pittsburgh Steelers Sports, Inc.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 2004. 578 Pa. 479, 854 A.2d 425.

- Company Profile Pittsburgh Steelers Sports, Inc., is the operating company for the National Football League's (NFL's) Pittsburgh Steelers (www.steelers.com). Art Rooney founded the company, which his family still owns. The team began in 1933 as the Pittsburgh Pirates, named after the baseball team. One of the star players in the early years was Byron "Whizzer" White, who led the NFL in rushing in 1938. White became a justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1962. Renamed in a contest sponsored by the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette in 1940, the Steelers had winning seasons only eight times in its first forty years. In the 1970s and 1980, the Steelers won the Super Bowl four times, adding a fifth title in 2006. Groundbreaking for a new stadium took place in 1999.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 15.3 CONTINUED

● Background and Facts In October 1998, Pittsburgh Steelers Sports, Inc., and others (collectively, the Steelers) sent Ronald Yocca a brochure that advertised a new stadium to be built for the Pittsburgh Steelers football team. The brochure publicized the opportunity to buy stadium builder licenses (SBLs), which grant the right to buy annual season tickets to the games. Prices varied depending on the seats' locations, which were indicated by small diagrams. Yocca applied for an SBL, listing his seating preferences. The Steelers sent him a letter notifying him of the section in which his seat was located. A diagram included with the letter detailed the parameters of the section, but it differed from the brochure's diagrams. The Steelers also sent Yocca documents setting out the terms of the SBL and requiring his signature. These documents included a clause that read, "This Agreement contains the entire agreement of the parties." Yocca signed the documents, and the Steelers told him the specific location of his seat. When he arrived at the stadium, however, the seat was not where he expected it to be. Yocca and other SBL buyers filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against the Steelers, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. The court ordered the dismissal of the complaint. The plaintiffs appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, which reversed this order. The defendants appealed to the state supreme court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
Justice NIGRO.

* * * *

* * * Where the parties, without any fraud or mistake, have deliberately put their engagements in writing, the law declares the writing to be not only the best, but the only, evidence of their agreement. All preliminary negotiations, conversations and verbal agreements are merged in and superseded by the subsequent written contract * * * and its terms and agreements cannot be added to nor subtracted from by parol evidence. Therefore, for the parol evidence rule to apply, there must be a writing that represents the entire contract between the parties. To determine whether or not a writing is the parties' entire contract, the writing must be looked at and if it appears to be a contract complete within itself, couched [implied] in such terms as import a complete legal obligation without any uncertainty as to the object or extent of the parties' engagement, it is conclusively presumed that the writing represents the whole engagement of the parties * * * . An integration^a clause [a provision stating that all of the terms of the parties' agreement are included in the written contract] * * * is also a clear sign that the writing is meant to be just that and thereby expresses all of the parties' negotiations, conversations, and agreements made prior to its execution. [Emphasis added.]

Once a writing is determined to be the parties' entire contract, the parol evidence rule applies and evidence of any previous oral or written negotiations or agreements involving the same subject matter as the contract is almost always inadmissible to explain or vary the terms of the contract. One exception to this general rule is that parol evidence may be introduced to vary a writing meant to be the parties' entire contract where a party avers [asserts] that a term was omitted from the contract because of fraud, accident, or mistake. In addition, where a term in the parties' contract is ambiguous, parol evidence is admissible to explain or clarify or resolve the ambiguity, irrespective of whether the ambiguity is created by the language of the instrument or by extrinsic or collateral circumstances. [Emphasis added.]

In the instant case [the case before the court], we cannot agree with the [appellate court] that the SBL Brochure represented the terms of the parties' contract concerning the sale of SBLs. Contrary to the [appellate court's] understanding, the SBL Brochure did not represent a promise by the Steelers to sell SBLs to Appellees. Rather, the Brochure was merely an offer by the Steelers to sell Appellees the right to be assigned an unspecified seat in an unspecified section of the new stadium and the right to receive a contract to buy an SBL for that later-assigned seat. Moreover, by sending in their applications * * * , Appellees simply secured their right to be considered for

a. Integrated contracts will be discussed later in this chapter.

assigned seats and the opportunity to receive a subsequent offer to purchase SBLs for those seats. In this respect, the SBL Brochure was similar to an option contract in that it merely gave Appellees the option to possibly accept an offer for SBLs at some later date.

On the other hand, the SBL Agreement clearly represented the parties' contract concerning the sale of SBLs. Unlike the SBL Brochure, the SBL Agreement reflected a promise by the Steelers to actually sell Appellees a specific number of SBL seats in a specified section. Furthermore, the SBL Agreement detailed all of the terms and conditions of that sale, i.e., the precise number of seats to be sold to the named Licensee, the exact section in which those seats were located (including a visual depiction of that location), the total amounts due for each SBL, the dates those amounts were due, and all of the rights and duties associated with owning an SBL, including the Licensee's right to transfer the SBL. Most importantly, the SBL Agreement explicitly stated that it represented the parties' entire contract regarding the sale of SBLs. Accordingly, we find that the SBL Agreement represented the parties' entire contract with respect to the sale of SBLs and that the parol evidence rule bars the admission of any evidence of previous oral or written negotiations or agreements entered into between the parties concerning the sale of the SBLs, such as the SBL Brochure, to explain or vary those terms expressed in the SBL Agreement.

● Decision and Remedy The Pennsylvania Supreme Court reversed the lower court's judgment. The state supreme court held that the SBL documents constituted the parties' entire contract and under the parol evidence rule could not be supplemented by previous negotiations or agreements. Because the plaintiffs based their complaint on the claim that the defendants violated the terms of the brochure, and the court held that the brochure was not part of the contract, the complaint was properly dismissed.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the Steelers had not sent Yocca a diagram with the letter notifying him of his seat's section and that the SBL documents had not included an integration clause. Would the result have been different?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Could Yocca and the other plaintiffs have plausibly argued that the terms of the SBL brochure must have been integrated within the SBL agreement because those terms were needed to define and describe the section assignments to which the agreement referred? Explain.

Exceptions to the Parol Evidence Rule

Because of the rigidity of the parol evidence rule, the courts have created the following exceptions:

1. Contracts subsequently modified. Evidence of any subsequent modification (oral or written) of a written contract can be introduced into court. Keep in mind that the oral modifications may not be enforceable if they come under the Statute of Frauds—for example, if they increase the price of the goods for sale to $500 or more or increase the term for performance to more than one year. Also, oral modifications will not be enforceable if the original contract provides that any modification must be in writing.¹⁶
2. Voidable or void contracts. Oral evidence can be introduced in all cases to show that the contract was voidable or void (for example, induced by mistake, fraud, or misrepresentation). The reason is simple: if deception led one of the parties to agree to the terms of a written contract, oral evidence attesting to the fraud should not be excluded. Courts frown on bad faith and are quick to allow such evidence when it establishes fraud.
3. Contracts containing ambiguous terms. When the terms of a written contract are ambiguous and require interpretation, evidence is admissible to show the meaning of the terms.
4. Incomplete contracts. When the written contract is incomplete in that it lacks one or more of the essential terms, the courts allow evidence to “fill in the gaps.”
5. Prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade. Under the UCC, evidence can be introduced to explain or supplement a written contract by showing a prior dealing, course of performance, or usage of trade.¹⁷ These terms will be discussed in further detail in Chapter 20, in the context of sales contracts. Here, it is sufficient to say that when buyers and sellers deal with each other over extended periods of time, certain customary practices develop. These practices are often overlooked in the writing of the contract, so courts allow the introduction of evidence to show how the parties have acted in the past. Usage of trade—practices and customs generally followed in a particular industry—can also shed light on the meaning of certain contract provisions, and thus evidence of trade usage may be admissible.

16. UCC 2-209(2), (3).

6. Contracts subject to an orally agreed-on condition precedent. As you will read in Chapter 17, sometimes the parties agree that a condition must be fulfilled before a party is required to perform the contract. This is called a condition precedent. If the parties have orally agreed on a condition precedent and the condition does not conflict with the terms of a written agreement, then a court may allow parol evidence to prove the oral condition. The parol evidence rule does not apply here because the existence of the entire written contract is subject to an orally agreed-on condition. Proof of the condition does not alter or modify the written terms but affects the enforceability of the written contract.

For example, suppose that a city leases property for an airport from a helicopter business and the lease is renewable every five years. During the second five-year lease, a dispute arises, and the parties go to mediation. They enter into a settlement memorandum under which they agree to amend the lease agreement subject to the approval of the city council. The city amends the lease, but the business refuses to sign it, contending that the council has not given its approval. In this situation, the council's approval is a condition precedent to the formation of the settlement memorandum contract. Therefore, the parol evidence rule does not apply, and oral evidence is admissible to show that no agreement exists as to the terms of the settlement.¹⁸

7. Contracts with an obvious or gross clerical (or typographic) error that clearly would not represent the agreement of the parties. Parol evidence is admissible to correct an obvious typographic error.

Suppose that Bazza agrees to lease 1,000 square feet of office space from Stone Enterprises at the current monthly rate of $3 per square foot. The signed written lease provides for a monthly lease payment of $300 rather than the $3,000 agreed to by the parties. Because the error is obvious, Stone Enterprises would be allowed to admit parol evidence to correct the mistake.

Integrated Contracts

The key in determining whether evidence will be allowed basically depends on whether the written contract is intended to be a complete and final statement of the terms of the agreement. If it is so intended, it is referred to as an integrated contract, and extraneous evidence (evidence derived from sources outside the contract itself) is excluded.

An integrated contract can be either completely or partially integrated. If it contains all of the terms of the parties' agreement, then it is completely integrated. If it contains only some of the terms that the parties agreed on and not others, it is partially integrated. If the contract is only partially integrated, evidence of consistent additional terms is admissible to supplement the written agreement.¹⁹ Note that for both complete and partially integrated contracts, courts exclude any evidence that contradicts the writing and allow parol evidence only to add to the terms of a partially integrated contract. Exhibit 15-4 illustrates the relationship between integrated contracts and the parol evidence rule.

The Statute of Frauds in the International Context

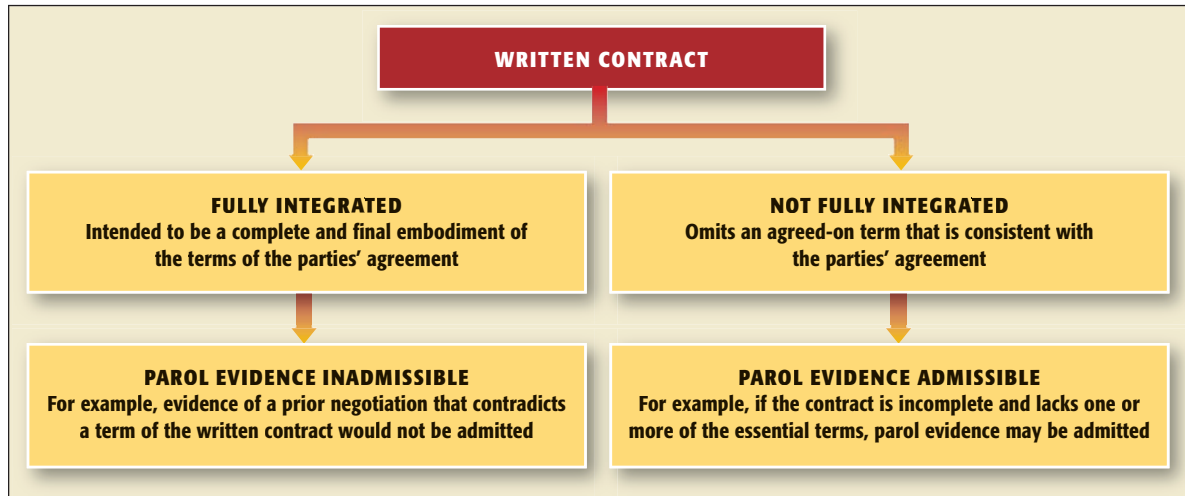

As you will read in Chapter 20, the Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) provides rules that govern international sales contracts between citizens of countries that have ratified the convention (agreement). Article 11 of the CISG does not incorporate any Statute of Frauds provisions. Rather, it states that a "contract for sale need not be concluded in or evidenced by writing and is not subject to any other requirements as to form."

17. UCC 1-205, 2-202.

18. Castroville Airport, Inc. v. City of Castroville, 974 S.W.2d 207 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 1998).

19. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 216; and UCC 2-202.

EXHIBIT 15-4 • Parol Evidence Rule

Article 11 accords with the legal customs of most nations, which no longer require contracts to meet certain formal or writing requirements to be enforceable. Ironically, even England, the nation that created the original Statute of Frauds in 1677, has repealed all of it except the provisions relating to collateral promises and to transfers of interests in land. Many other countries that once had such statutes have also repealed all or parts of them. Some countries, such as France, have never required certain types of contracts to be in writing.

REVIEWING The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement

Charter Golf, Inc., manufactures and sells golf apparel and supplies. Ken Odin had worked as a Charter sales representative for six months when he was offered a position with a competing firm. Charter's president, Jerry Montieth, offered Odin a 10 percent commission "for the rest of his life" if Ken would turn down the offer and stay on with Charter. He also promised that Odin would not be fired unless he was dishonest. Odin turned down the competitor's offer and stayed with Charter. Three years later, Charter fired Odin for no reason. Odin sued, alleging breach of contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a court likely decide that Odin's employment contract falls within the Statute of Frauds? Why or why not?
2. Assume that the court does find that the contract falls within the Statute of Frauds and that the state in which the court sits recognizes every exception to the Statute of Frauds discussed in the chapter. What exception provides Odin with the best chance of enforcing the oral contract in this situation?
3. Now suppose that Montieth had taken out a pencil, written "10 percent for life" on the back of a register receipt, and handed it to Odin. Would this satisfy the Statute of Frauds? Why or why not?
4. Assume that Odin had signed a written employment contract at the time he was hired to work for Charter, but it was not completely integrated. Would a court allow Odin to present parol evidence of Montieth's subsequent promises?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

integrated contract 316
parol evidence rule 312

prenuptial agreement 308
Statute of Frauds 303

collateral promise 306

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

15-1. On May 1, by telephone, Yu offers to hire Benson to perform personal services. On May 5, Benson returns Yu's call and accepts the offer. Discuss fully whether this contract falls under the Statute of Frauds in the following circumstances:

- The contract calls for Benson to be employed for one year, with the right to begin performance immediately.
- The contract calls for Benson to be employed for nine months, with performance of services to begin on September 1.
- The contract calls for Benson to submit a written research report, with a deadline of two years for submission.

15-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Mallory promises a local hardware store that she will pay for a lawn mower that her brother is purchasing on credit if the brother fails to pay the debt. Must this promise be in writing to be enforceable? Why or why not?

- For a sample answer to Question 15-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

15-3. On January 1, Damon, for consideration, orally promised to pay Gary $300 a month for as long as Gary lived, with the payments to be made on the first day of every month. Damon made the payments regularly for nine months and then made no further payments. Gary claimed that Damon had breached the oral contract and sued Damon for damages. Damon contended that the contract was unenforceable because, under the Statute of Frauds, contracts that cannot be performed within one year must be in writing. Discuss whether Damon will succeed in this defense.

15-4. Jeremy took his mother on a special holiday to Mountain Air Resort. Jeremy was a frequent patron of the resort and was well known by its manager. The resort required each of its patrons to make a large deposit to ensure payment of the room rental. Jeremy asked the manager to waive the requirement for his mother and told the manager that if his mother for any reason failed to pay the resort for her stay there, he would cover the bill. Relying on Jeremy's promise, the manager waived the deposit requirement for Jeremy's mother. After she returned home from her holiday, Jeremy's mother refused to pay the resort bill. The resort manager tried to collect the sum from Jeremy, but Jeremy also refused to pay, stating that his promise was not enforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Is Jeremy correct? Explain.

15-5. Oral Contracts. Robert Pinto, doing business as Pinto Associates, hired Richard MacDonald as an independent contractor in March 1992. The parties orally agreed on the terms of employment, including payment to MacDonald of a share of the company's income, but they did not put anything in writing. In March 1995, MacDonald quit. Pinto then told MacDonald that he was entitled to $9,602.17—25 percent of the difference between the accounts receivable and the accounts payable as of MacDonald's last day. MacDonald disagreed and demanded more than $83,500—25 percent of the revenue from all invoices, less the cost of materials and outside processing, for each of the years that he worked for Pinto. Pinto refused. MacDonald filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Pinto, alleging breach of contract. In Pinto's response and at the trial, he testified that the parties had an oral contract under which MacDonald was entitled to 25 percent of the difference between accounts receivable and payable as of the date of MacDonald's termination. Did the parties have an enforceable contract? What should the court rule, and why? [MacDonald v. Pinto, 62 Conn.App.317, 771 A.2d 156 (2001)]

15-6. Interests in Land. Sierra Bravo, Inc., and Shelby's, Inc., entered into a written "Waste Disposal Agreement" under which Shelby's allowed Sierra to deposit on Shelby's land waste products, deleterious (harmful) materials, and debris removed by Sierra in the construction of a highway. Later, Shelby's asked Sierra why it had not constructed a waterway and a building pad suitable for a commercial building on the property, as they had orally agreed. Sierra denied any such agreement. Shelby's filed a suit in a Missouri state court against Sierra, alleging breach of contract. Sierra contended that any oral agreement was unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Sierra argued that because the right to remove minerals from land is considered a contract for the sale of an interest in land to which the Statute of Frauds applies, the Statute of Frauds should apply to the right to deposit soil on another person's property. How should the court rule, and why? [Shelby's, Inc. v. Sierra Bravo, Inc., 68 S.W.3d 604 (Mo.App. S.D. 2002)]

CHAPTER 15 The Statute of Frauds—Writing Requirement

15-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Novell, Inc., owned the source code for DR DOS, a computer operating system that Microsoft Corp. targeted with allegedly anticompetitive practices in the early 1990s. Novell worried that if it filed a suit, Microsoft would retaliate with further alleged unfair practices. Consequently, Novell sold DR DOS to Canopy Group, Inc., a Utah corporation. The purposes of the sale were to obligate Canopy to bring an action against Microsoft and to allow Novell to share in the recovery without revealing its role. Novell and Canopy signed two documents—a contract of sale, obligating Canopy to pay $400,000 for rights to the source code, and a temporary license, obligating Canopy to pay at least $600,000 in royalties, which included a percentage of any recovery from the suit. Canopy settled the dispute with Microsoft, deducted its expenses, and paid Novell the remainder of what was due. Novell filed a suit in a Utah state court against Canopy, alleging breach of contract for Canopy's deduction of expenses. Canopy responded that it could show that the parties had an oral agreement on this point. On what basis might the court refuse to consider this evidence? Is that the appropriate course in this case? Explain. [Novell, Inc. v. Canopy Group, Inc., 2004 UT App 162, 92 P.3d 768 (2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 15-7, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 15," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

15-8. The Parol Evidence Rule. Carlin Krieg owned a dairy farm in St. Joe, Indiana, that was appraised at $154,000 in December 1997. In August 1999, Krieg told Donald Hieber that he intended to sell the farm for $106,000. Hieber offered to buy it. Krieg also told Hieber that he wanted to retain a "right of residency" for life in the farm. In October, Krieg and Hieber executed a purchase agreement that provided Krieg "shall transfer full and complete possession" of the farm "subject to [his] right of residency." The agreement also contained an integration clause that stated "there are no conditions, representations, warranties or agreements not stated in this instrument." In November 2000, the house was burned in a fire, rendering it uninhabitable. Hieber filed an insurance claim for the damage and received the proceeds, but he did not fix the house. Krieg filed a suit in an Indiana state court against Hieber, alleging breach of contract. Is there any basis on which the court can consider evidence regarding the parties' negotiations prior to their agreement for the sale of the farm? Explain. [Krieg v. Hieber, 802 N.E.2d 938 (Ind.App. 2004)]

15-9. Contract for a Sale of Goods. Milton Blankenship agreed in writing to buy 15 acres of Ella Mae Henry's junkyard property for $15,000 per acre with a ten-year option to buy the remaining 28.32 acres. Blankenship orally agreed to (1) begin operating a car skeleton processing plant within six to fifteen months; (2) buy as many car skeletons generated by the yard as Clifford Henry wanted to sell him, at a certain premium over the market price; and (3) allow all junk vehicles on the property to remain until they were processed at the new plant. Blankenship never operated such a plant, never bought any vehicles from the yard, and demanded that all vehicles be removed from the property. To obtain the remaining 28.32 acres, Blankenship filed a suit in a Georgia state court against Henry, who responded with a counterclaim for breach of contract. Under oath during discovery, Henry testified that their oral agreement allowed him to sell "as many of the car skeletons generated by the Henry junkyard" as he wished, and Blankenship testified that he had agreed to buy as many skeletons as Henry was willing to sell. Does the Statute of Frauds undercut or support Henry's counterclaim? Explain. [Henry v. Blankenship, 284 Ga.App. 578, 644 S.E.2d 419 (2007)]

15-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

William Williams is an attorney in Birmingham, Alabama. In 1997, Robert Shelborne asked Williams to represent him in a deal in London, England, from which Shelborne expected to receive $31 million. Shelborne agreed to pay Williams a fee of $1 million. Their overseas contact was Robert Tundy, who said that he was with the "Presidency" in London. Tundy said that a tax of $100,010 would have to be paid for Shelborne to receive the $31 million. Shelborne asked James Parker, a former co-worker, to lend him $50,000. Shelborne signed a note agreeing to pay Parker $100,000 within seventy-two hours. Parker, Shelborne, and Williams wired the $50,000 to an account at Chase Manhattan Bank. They never heard from Tundy again. No $31 million was transferred to Shelborne, who soon disappeared. Williams then learned that no "Presidency" existed in London. Whenever Parker asked Williams about the note, Williams assured him that he would be paid. On Parker's behalf, Williams filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Shelborne, seeking the amount due on the note and damages. The court entered a judgment against the defendant for $200,000, but there were no assets from which to collect it. [Parker v. Williams, ___ So.2d ___ (Ala. 2007)]

- (a) Parker filed a suit in an Alabama state court against Williams, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. Parker offered as evidence a tape recording of a phone conversation in which Williams guaranteed Shelborne's loan. Is the court likely to rule in Parker's favor on the contract claim? Why or why not?

- (b) In response to Parker's suit, Williams filed a counterclaim, seeking unpaid attorneys' fees relating to the suit that Williams filed against Shelborne on Parker's behalf. The court ruled against Williams on this claim. He appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court but failed to supply a transcript of the trial on his counterclaim, as it was his duty to do. Is the appellate court likely to rule in his favor? Why or why not?
- (c) The sham deal at the center of this case is known to law enforcement authorities as advance fee fraud, commonly referred to as a "419 scam." Induced by a promise of a transfer of funds from an overpaid contract or some other suspect source, a victim may be asked to pay a tax or other fee first. Among the parties attracted by the 419 scam in this case, who, if anyone, behaved ethically? Discuss.

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

The online version of UCC Section 2-201 on the Statute of Frauds includes links to definitions of certain terms used in the section. To access this site, go to www.law.cornell.edu/ucc/2/2-201.html

To read a summary of cases concerning whether the exchange of e-mails satisfies the writing requirements of the Statute of Frauds, go to www.internetlibrary.com/topics/statute_frauds.cfm

Wikipedia provides an interesting discussion of the history and current applicability of the Statute of Frauds, both internationally and in the United States, at en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Statute_of_frauds

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 15" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 15-1: Legal Perspective
Promissory Estoppel and the Statute of Frauds

Internet Exercise 15-2: Management Perspective
"Get It in Writing"

Internet Exercise 15-3: Historical Perspective
The English Act for the Prevention of Frauds and Perjuries

CHAPTER 16

Third Party Rights

Once it has been determined that a valid and legally enforceable contract exists, attention can turn to the rights and duties of the parties to the contract. A contract is a private agreement between the parties who have entered into it, and traditionally these parties alone have rights and liabilities under the contract. This principle is referred to as privity of contract.

A third party—one who is not a direct party to a particular contract—normally does not have rights under that contract.

There are exceptions to the rule of privity of contract. For example, privity of contract between a seller and a buyer is no longer a requirement to recover damages under product liability laws (see Chapter 23). In this chapter, we look at two other exceptions. One exception allows a party to a contract to transfer the rights or duties arising from the contract to another person through an assignment (of rights) or a delegation (of duties). The other exception involves a third party beneficiary contract—a contract in which the parties to the contract intend that the contract benefit a third party.

Assignments and Delegations

In a bilateral contract, the two parties have corresponding rights and duties. One party has a right to require the other to perform some task, and the other has a duty to perform it. The transfer of contractual rights to a third party is known as an assignment. The transfer of contractual duties to a third party is known as a delegation. An assignment or a delegation occurs after the original contract was made.

Assignments

Assignments are important because they are involved in many types of business financing. Banks, for example, frequently assign their rights to receive payments under their loan contracts to other firms, which pay for those rights. If you obtain a loan from your local bank to purchase a car, you may later receive in the mail a notice from your bank stating that it has transferred (assigned) its rights to receive payments on the loan to another firm and that, when the time comes to repay your loan, you must make the payments to that other firm.

Financial institutions that make mortgage loans (loans to enable prospective home buyers to purchase land or a home) often assign their rights to collect the mortgage payments to a third party, such as GMAC Mortgage Corporation. Following the assignment, the home buyers are notified that they must make future payments not to the bank that loaned them the funds but to the third party. Millions of dollars change hands daily in the business world in the form of assignments of rights in contracts. If it were not possible to transfer (assign) contractual rights, many businesses could not continue to operate.

Terminology In an assignment, the party assigning the rights to a third party is known as the assignor, and the party receiving the rights is the assignee. Other traditional terms used to describe the parties in assignment relationships are obligee (the person to whom a duty, or obligation, is owed) and obligor (the person who is obligated to perform the duty).

The Effect of an Assignment When rights under a contract are assigned unconditionally, the rights of the assignor are extinguished.¹ The third party (the assignee) has a right to demand performance from the other original party to the contract. The assignee takes only those rights that the assignor originally had, however.

For example, suppose that Brower is obligated by contract to pay Horton $1,000. In this situation, Brower is the obligor because she owes an obligation, or duty, to Horton. Horton is the obligee, the one to whom the obligation, or duty, is owed. Now suppose that Horton assigns his right to receive the $1,000 to Kuhn. Horton is the assignor, and Kuhn is the assignee. Kuhn now becomes the obligee because Brower owes Kuhn the $1,000. Here, a valid assignment of a debt exists. Kuhn (the assignee-obligee) is entitled to enforce payment in court if Brower (the obligor) does not pay him the $1,000. These concepts are illustrated in Exhibit 16-1.

Rights Assigned Are Subject to the Same Defenses The assignee's rights are subject to the defenses that the obligor has against the assignor. For example, assume that in the preceding scenario, Brower owed Horton the $1,000 under a contract in which Brower agreed to buy Horton's MacBook laptop. Brower, in deciding to purchase the laptop, relied on Horton's fraudulent misrepresentation that the computer had a 160 gigabyte hard drive. When Brower discovers that the computer has only an 80 gigabyte hard drive, she tells Horton that she is going to return the laptop to him and cancel the contract. Even though Horton has assigned his "right" to receive the $1,000 to Kuhn, Brower need not pay Kuhn the $1,000—Brower can raise the defense of Horton's fraudulent misrepresentation to avoid payment.

Form of the Assignment In general, an assignment can take any form, oral or written. Naturally, it is more difficult to prove that an oral assignment occurred, so it is practical to put all assignments in writing. Of course, assignments covered by the Statute of Frauds must be in writing to be enforceable. For example, an assignment of an interest in land must be in writing to be enforceable. In addition, most states require contracts for the assignment of wages to be in writing.²

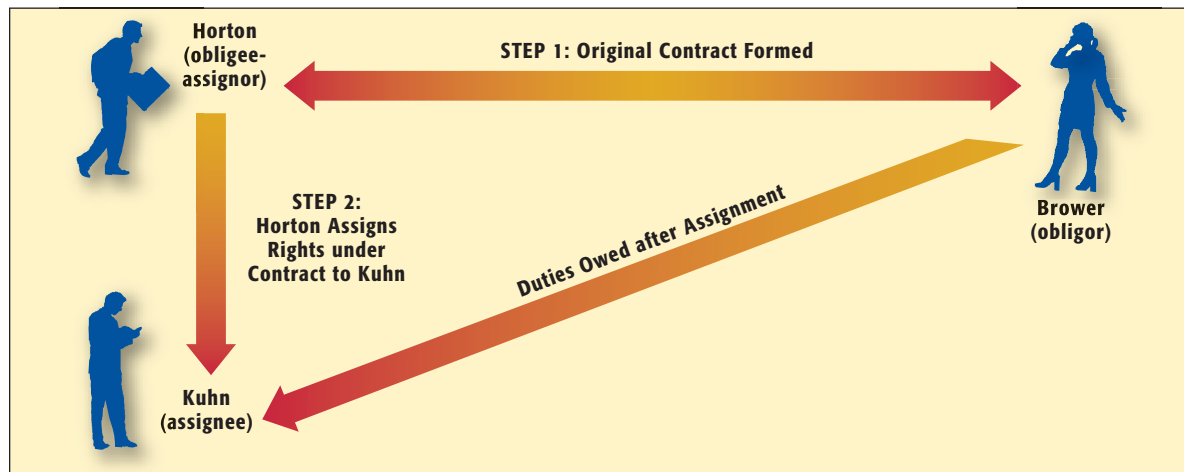

The circumstances in the following case illustrate some of the problems that can arise with oral assignments. The case also stands for the principle that an

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 317.

2. See, for example, California Labor Code Section 300. There are other assignments that must be in writing as well.

EXHIBIT 16-1 • Assignment Relationships

In the assignment relationship illustrated here, Horton assigns his rights under a contract that he made with Brower to a third party, Kuhn. Horton thus becomes the assignor and Kuhn the assignee of the contractual rights. Brower, the obligor (the party owing performance under the contract), now owes performance to Kuhn instead of Horton. Horton's original contract rights are extinguished after assignment.

assignment, like any contract, must have consideration—in this case, a dance center's assumption of a choreographer's legal and financial duties associated with her choreography.

C A S E 16.1 Martha Graham School and Dance Foundation, Inc. v. Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc.

United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, 2004. 380 F.3d 624.

• Background and Facts Martha Graham's career as a dancer, dance instructor, and choreographer began in the first third of the twentieth century. In the 1920s, she started a dance company and a dance school and choreographed works on commission. In the 1940s, she funded the Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc. (the Center). She sold her school to the Martha Graham School of Contemporary Dance, Inc. (the School), in 1956. By 1980, the Center encompassed the School. In 1989, two years before her death, Graham executed a will in which she gave Ronald Protas, the Center's general director, "any rights or interests" in "dance works, musical scores [and] scenery sets." After her death, Protas asserted ownership of all of Graham's dances and related property. In 1999, the Center's board removed Protas and, due to financial problems, suspended operations. Meanwhile, Protas founded the Martha Graham School and Dance Foundation, Inc., and began licensing Graham's dances. When the School reopened in 2001, Protas and his foundation filed a suit in a federal district court against the Center and others to enjoin their use of, among other things, seventy of the dances. The Center responded, in part, that Graham had assigned the dances to it. The court ruled that twenty-one of the dances had been assigned to the Center. The plaintiffs appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

JON O. NEWMAN, Circuit Judge.

* * * *

The Appellants contend that the District Court erred in finding that Graham assigned to the Center 21 dances, * * * which were created before 1956, unpublished at the time of assignment, and not commissioned. We disagree.

* * * *

Although there is no document memorializing Graham's assignment of copyright in her pre-1956 dances to the Center, the District Court was entitled to find that Graham assigned to the Center, orally or in writing, her copyrights in her noncommissioned pre-1956 dances that were not published at the time she assigned them.

The District Court relied on several items of evidence to reach its conclusion. For example, Jeannette Roosevelt, former President of the Center's board of directors, testified that Graham had given the dances to the Center prior to 1965 or 1966, when she joined the board. There was additional evidence that the Center acted as the owner of the dances by entering into contracts with third parties, and that Graham was aware of this and did not object. Other evidence showed that the Center received royalties for the dances and treated them as its assets. However, the only evidence that Graham had assigned the entire group of her pre-1956 dances (noncommissioned and unpublished) to the Center are two letters from Lee Leatherman, the Center's Executive Administrator at that time, written in 1968 and 1971. These letters indicated that "[r]ecently Miss Graham assigned performing rights to all of her works to the Martha Graham Center of Contemporary Dance, Inc.," and that "Martha has assigned all rights to all of her works to the Martha Graham Center, Inc." The Appellants contend that these letters are hearsay^a and were impermissibly considered.

These two letters, both in existence 20 years or more at the time they were offered as evidence, were authenticated * * *. There was no reason to suspect their authenticity. Moreover, Linda

a. Hearsay is testimony given in court about a statement made by someone else, as was discussed in Chapter 3.

CASE 16.1 CONTINUED

Hodes, a witness with relevant knowledge, testified that the letters were what they purported to be. The letters were therefore exceptions to the hearsay rule [under which the letters would otherwise be inadmissible]. The District Court did not err in admitting and relying on these letters. [Emphasis added.]

Under New York law, an assignment * * * may be made without writing or delivery of any written statement of the claim assigned, * * * provided only that the assignment is founded on a valid consideration between the parties. The District Court was entitled to find that Graham received consideration for the assignment of her pre-1956 dances. Graham benefited from the Center's assumption of the legal and financial duties associated with her choreography; assigning to the Center the copyrights in her dances gave her what she wished—freedom from the responsibilities of copyright registration and renewal, licensing, collection of royalties, and archival tasks. [Emphasis added.]

The District Court was entitled to find that Graham assigned her pre-1956 dances * * * to the Center sometime between 1957 and the mid-1960s.

● Decision and Remedy The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the lower court's judgment on this issue, "commend[ing] the District Court for its careful rulings on the many issues in this complicated case." The appellate court held that Graham had received consideration for her assignment of certain dances and that, although the assignment had been oral, it had been reliably proved by written testimony.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that Graham had not benefited from the Center's assumption of the duties associated with her choreography. Would the alleged assignment have been valid? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension If Graham's dances had existed as part of a database available only over the Internet, would the principles applied in this case, and the way in which they were applied, have been different? Why or why not?

Rights That Cannot Be Assigned As a general rule, all rights can be assigned. Exceptions are made, however, under certain circumstances. Some of these exceptions are described next.

When a Statute Expressly Prohibits Assignment.

When a statute expressly prohibits assignment of a particular right, that right cannot be assigned. For example, suppose that Quincy is an employee of Specialty Computer, Inc. Specialty Computer is an employer under workers' compensation statutes in this state, and thus Quincy is a covered employee. Quincy is injured on the job and begins to collect monthly workers' compensation checks (see Chapter 33 for a discussion of workers' compensation laws). In need of a loan, Quincy borrows from Draper, assigning to Draper all of her future workers' compensation benefits. A state statute prohibits the assignment of future workers' compensation benefits, however, and thus such rights cannot be assigned.

When a Contract Is Personal in Nature. When a contract is for personal services, the rights under the contract normally cannot be assigned unless all that remains is a monetary payment.³ For example, suppose that Brower signs a contract to be a tutor for Horton's children. Horton then attempts to assign to Kuhn his right to Brower's services. Kuhn cannot enforce the contract against Brower. Kuhn's children may be more difficult to tutor than Horton's; thus, if Horton could assign his rights to Brower's services to Kuhn, it would change the nature of Brower's obligation. Because personal services are unique to the person rendering them, rights to receive personal services are likewise unique and cannot be assigned.

When an Assignment Will Significantly Change the Risk or Duties of the Obligor.

A right cannot be assigned if the assignment will significantly increase or alter the risks to or the duties of the obligor (the party owing performance under the contract).⁴

3. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 317 and 318.

4. Section 2-210(2) of the Uniform Commercial Code.

For example, assume that Horton has a hotel, and to insure it, he takes out a policy with Southeast Insurance. The policy insures against fire, theft, floods, and vandalism. Horton attempts to assign the insurance policy to Kuhn, who also owns a hotel. The assignment is ineffective because it substantially alters Southeast Insurance's duty of performance. An insurance company evaluates the particular risk of a certain party and tailors its policy to fit that risk. If the policy is assigned to a third party, the insurance risk is materially altered because the insurance company may have no information on the third party. Therefore, the assignment will not operate to give Kuhn any rights against Southeast Insurance.

When the Contract Prohibits Assignment. When a contract specifically stipulates that a right cannot be assigned, then ordinarily the right cannot be assigned. Whether an antiassignment clause is effective depends, in part, on how it is phrased. A contract that states that any assignment is void effectively prohibits any assignment. Note that restraints on the power to assign operate only against the parties themselves. They do not prohibit an assignment by operation of law, such as an assignment pursuant to bankruptcy or death.

The general rule that a contract can prohibit assignment has several exceptions.

1. A contract cannot prevent an assignment of the right to receive monetary payments. This exception exists to encourage the free flow of funds and credit in modern business settings.
2. The assignment of rights in real estate often cannot be prohibited because such a prohibition is contrary to public policy in most states. Prohibitions of this kind are called restraints against alienation (transfer of land ownership).
3. The assignment of negotiable instruments (see Chapter 24) cannot be prohibited.
4. In a contract for the sale of goods, the right to receive damages for breach of contract or payment of an account owed may be assigned even though the sales contract prohibits such an assignment.⁵

Notice of Assignment Once a valid assignment of rights has been made, the assignee (the third party to whom the rights have been assigned) should notify the obligor (the one owing performance) of the assignment. For instance, in the previously discussed example, when Horton assigns to Kuhn his right to receive the $1,000 from Brower, Kuhn should notify Brower, the obligor, of the assignment. Giving notice is not legally necessary to establish the validity of the assignment: an assignment is effective immediately, whether or not notice is given. Two major problems arise, however, when notice of the assignment is not given to the obligor.

1. If the assignor assigns the same right to two different persons, the question arises as to which one has priority—that is, which one has the right to the performance by the obligor. Although the rule most often observed in the United States is that the first assignment in time is the first in right, some states follow the English rule, which basically gives priority to the first assignee who gives notice.
2. Until the obligor has notice of an assignment, the obligor can discharge his or her obligation by performance to the assignor (the obligee), and performance by the obligor to the assignor (obligee) constitutes a discharge to the assignee. Once the obligor receives proper notice, however, only performance to the assignee can discharge the obligor's obligations. In the Horton-Brower-Kuhn example, assume that Brower, the obligor, is not notified of Horton's assignment of his rights to Kuhn. Brower subsequently pays Horton the $1,000. Although the assignment was valid, Brower's payment to Horton discharges the debt. Kuhn's failure to give notice to Brower of the assignment has caused Kuhn to lose the right to collect the cash from Brower. If, however, Kuhn had given Brower notice of the assignment, Brower's payment to Horton would not have discharged the debt, and Kuhn would have had a legal right to require payment from Brower.

Delegations

Just as a party can transfer rights through an assignment, a party can also transfer duties. Duties are not assigned, however; they are delegated. Normally, a delegation of duties does not relieve the party making the delegation (the delegator) of the obligation to perform in the event that the party to whom the duty has been delegated (the delegatee) fails to perform. No special form is required to create a valid delegation of duties. As long as the delegator expresses an intention to make the delegation, it is effective; the delegator need not even use the word delegate. Exhibit 16-2 on the next page illustrates delegation relationships.

5. UCC 2-210(2).

EXHIBIT 16-2 • Delegation Relationships

In the delegation relationship illustrated here, Brower delegates her duties under a contract that she made with Horton to a third party, Kuhn. Brower thus becomes the delegator and Kuhn the delegatee of the contractual duties. Kuhn now owes performance of the contractual duties to Horton. Note that a delegation of duties normally does not relieve the delegator (Brower) of liability if the delegatee (Kuhn) fails to perform the contractual duties.

Duties That Cannot Be Delegated As a general rule, any duty can be delegated. There are, however, some exceptions to this rule. Delegation is prohibited in the circumstances discussed next.

When the Duties Are Personal in Nature. When special trust has been placed in the obligor or when performance depends on the personal skill or talents of the obligor (the person contractually obligated to perform), contractual duties cannot be delegated. For example, suppose that Horton, who is impressed with Brower's ability to perform veterinary surgery, contracts with Brower to have Brower perform surgery on Horton's prize-winning stallion in July. Brower later decides that she would rather spend the summer at the beach, so she delegates her duties under the contract to Kuhn, who is also a competent veterinary surgeon. The delegation is not effective without Horton's consent, no matter how competent Kuhn is, because the contract is for personal performance.

In contrast, nonpersonal duties may be delegated. Assume that Brower contracts with Horton to pick up and deliver heavy construction machinery to Horton's property. Brower delegates this duty to Kuhn, who is in the business of delivering heavy machinery. This delegation is effective because the performance required is of a routine and nonpersonal nature.

When Performance by a Third Party Will Vary Materially from That Expected by the Obligee.

When performance by a third party will vary materially from that expected by the obligee (the one to whom performance is owed) under the contract, contractual duties cannot be delegated. For example, suppose that Alex Payton is a wealthy philanthropist who recently established a charitable foundation. Payton has known Brent Murdoch for twenty years and knows that Murdoch shares his beliefs on many humanitarian issues. He contracts with Murdoch to be in charge of allocating funds among various charitable causes. Six months later, Murdoch is experiencing health problems and delegates his duties to Drew Cole. Payton does not approve of Cole as a replacement. In this situation, Payton can claim the delegation was not effective because it materially altered his expectations under the contract. Payton had reasonable expectations about the types of charities to which Murdoch would give the foundation's funds, and substituting Cole's performance materially changes those expectations.

When the Contract Prohibits Delegation. When the contract expressly prohibits delegation by including an antidelegation clause, the duties cannot be delegated. R.W. Stern contracts with Jan Pearson, a certified public accountant, to perform its annual audits for the next five years. If the contract prohibits delegation, then Pearson cannot delegate her duty to perform the audit to another accountant at the same firm. In some situations, however, when the duties are completely impersonal in nature, courts have held that the duties can be delegated notwithstanding an anti-delegation clause.

Effect of a Delegation If a delegation of duties is enforceable, the obligee (the one to whom performance is owed) must accept performance from the delegatee (the one to whom the duties have been delegated). Consider again the example in which Brower delegates to Kuhn the duty to pick up and deliver heavy construction machinery to Horton's property. In that situation, Horton (the obligee) must accept performance from Kuhn (the delegatee) because the delegation was effective. The obligee can legally refuse performance from the delegatee only if the duty is one that cannot be delegated.

As noted, a valid delegation of duties does not relieve the delegator of obligations under the contract.⁶ Thus, in the above example, if Kuhn (the delegatee) fails to perform, Brower (the delegator) is still liable to Horton (the obligee). The obligee can also hold the delegatee liable if the delegatee made a promise of performance that will directly benefit the obligee. In this situation, there is an "assumption of duty" on the part of the delegatee, and breach of this duty makes the delegatee liable to the obligee. For example, if Kuhn (the delegatee) promises Brower (the delegator), in a contract, to pick up and deliver the construction equipment to Horton's property but fails to do so, Horton (the obligee) can sue Brower, Kuhn, or both. Although there are many exceptions, the general rule today is that the obligee can sue both the delegatee and the delegator. Concept Summary 16.1 outlines the basic principles of the laws governing assignments and delegations.

6. See, for example, Mehul's Investment Corp. v. ABC Advisors, Inc., 130 F.Supp.2d 700 (D.Md. 2001).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 16.1 Assignments and Delegations

WHICH RIGHTS CAN BE ASSIGNED, AND WHICH DUTIES CAN BE DELEGATED?

- All rights can be assigned unless:
1. A statute expressly prohibits assignment.
 2. The contract is for personal services.
 3. The assignment will materially alter the obligor's risk or duties.
 4. The contract prohibits assignment.

- All duties can be delegated unless:
1. Performance depends on the obligor's personal skills or talents.
 2. Special trust has been placed in the obligor.
 3. Performance by a third party will materially vary from that expected by the obligee.
 4. The contract prohibits delegation.

WHAT IF THE CONTRACT PROHIBITS ASSIGNMENT OR DELEGATION?

- No rights can be assigned except:
1. Rights to receive funds.
 2. Ownership rights in real estate.
 3. Rights to negotiable instruments.
 4. Rights to sales contract payments or damages for breach of a sales contract.

Generally, no duties can be delegated.

WHAT IS THE EFFECT ON THE ORIGINAL PARTY'S RIGHTS?

On a valid assignment, effective immediately, the original party (assignor) no longer has any rights under the contract.

On a valid delegation, if the delegatee fails to perform, the original party (delegator) is liable to the obligee (who may also hold the delegatee liable).

Assignment of “All Rights”

When a contract provides for an “assignment of all rights,” this wording may create both an assignment of rights and a delegation of duties.⁷ Therefore, when general words are used (for example, “I assign the contract” or “I assign all my rights under the contract”), the contract normally is construed as implying both an assignment of the assignor’s rights and a delegation of any duties of performance owed by the assignor under the contract being assigned. Thus, the assignor remains liable if the assignee fails to perform the contractual obligations.

Third Party Beneficiaries

Another exception to the doctrine of privity of contract arises when the original parties to the contract intend at the time of contracting that the contract performance directly benefit a third person. In this situation, the third person becomes a third party beneficiary of the contract. As an intended beneficiary of the contract, the third party has legal rights and can sue the promisor directly for breach of the contract.

Who, though, is the promisor? In a bilateral contract, both parties to the contract are promisors because they both make promises that can be enforced. To determine the identity of the promisor in a third party beneficiary contract, the court will ask which party made the promise that benefits the third party—that person is the promisor. Allowing a third party to sue the promisor directly in effect circumvents the “middle person” (the promisee) and thus reduces the burden on the courts. Otherwise, the third party would sue the promisee, who would then sue the promisor.

Types of Intended Beneficiaries

At one time, third party beneficiaries had no legal rights in contracts. Over time, however, the concept developed that a third party for whose benefit a contract was formed (an intended beneficiary) could sue the promisor to have the contract enforced. In a classic case decided in 1859, Lawrence v. Fox,⁸ the court permitted a third party beneficiary to bring suit directly against a promisor. This case established the rule that a creditor beneficiary can sue the promisor directly. A creditor beneficiary is one who benefits from a contract in which one party (the promisor) promises another party (the promisee) to pay a debt that the promisee owes to a third party (the creditor beneficiary). As an intended beneficiary, the creditor beneficiary can sue the promisor directly to enforce the contract and obtain payment on the debt.

7. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 328; UCC 2-210(3), (4).

8. 20 N.Y.268 (1859).

Another type of intended beneficiary is a donee beneficiary. When a contract is made for the express purpose of giving a gift to a third party, the third party (the donee beneficiary) can sue the promisor directly to enforce the promise.⁹ The most common donee beneficiary contract is a life insurance contract. For example, Akins (the promisee) pays premiums to Standard Life, a life insurance company, and Standard Life (the promisor) promises to pay a certain amount on Akins’s death to anyone Akins designates as a beneficiary. The designated beneficiary is a donee beneficiary under the life insurance policy and can enforce the promise made by the insurance company to pay her or him on Akins’s death.

As the law concerning third party beneficiaries evolved, numerous cases arose in which the third party beneficiary did not fit readily into either the creditor beneficiary or the donee beneficiary category. Thus, the modern view, and the one adopted by the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, does not draw such clear lines between the types of intended beneficiaries. Today, courts frequently distinguish only between intended beneficiaries (who can sue to enforce contracts made for their benefit) and incidental beneficiaries (who cannot sue, as will be discussed shortly).

The Vesting of an Intended Beneficiary’s Rights

An intended third party beneficiary cannot enforce a contract against the original parties until the rights of the third party have vested, which means the rights have taken effect and cannot be taken away. Until these rights have vested, the original parties to the contract—the promisor and the promisee—can modify or rescind the contract without the consent of the third party.

When do the rights of third parties vest? The majority of courts hold that the rights vest when any of the following occurs:

1. The third party materially changes his or her position in justifiable reliance on the promise.

9. Seaver v. Ransom, 224 N.Y.233, 120 N.E. 639 (1918).

2. The third party brings a lawsuit on the promise.
3. The third party demonstrates her or his consent to the promise at the request of the promisor or promisee.¹⁰

If the contract expressly reserves to the contracting parties the right to cancel, rescind, or modify the contract, the rights of the third party beneficiary are subject to any changes that result. If the original contract reserves the right to revoke the promise or change the beneficiary, the vesting of the third party's rights does not terminate that power.¹¹ For example, in most life insurance contracts, the policyholder reserves the right to change the designated beneficiary.

Intended versus Incidental Beneficiaries

The benefit that an incidental beneficiary receives from a contract between two parties is unintentional. Because the benefit is unintentional, an incidental beneficiary cannot sue to enforce the contract.

Determining Whether a Third Party Is an Intended or an Incidental Beneficiary

In determining whether a third party beneficiary is an intended or an incidental beneficiary, the courts focus on the intent, as expressed in the contract language and implied by the surrounding circumstances. No single test is available to embrace all possible situations in which a third party is an intended beneficiary. One factor that courts consider is whether a reasonable person in the position of the beneficiary would believe that the promisee intended to confer on the beneficiary the right to enforce the contract. The courts also look at other factors. For example, if performance is to be rendered directly to the third party or the contract expressly designates the third party as a beneficiary, this strongly indicates that the third party is an intended beneficiary. Exhibit 16-3 on page 331 graphically illustrates the distinction between intended beneficiaries and incidental beneficiaries.

In the following case, a subcontractor claimed to be an intended beneficiary of the general contractor's contractual promise to obtain property insurance after the construction of an addition to a building was completed. The case illustrates how resolving the issue of whether a beneficiary is intended or incidental can have serious consequences for the beneficiary's liability.

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 311.

11. Defenses against third party beneficiaries are given in the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 309.

EXTENDED CASE 16.2 Midwestern Indemnity Co. v. Systems Builders, Inc.

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2004. 801 N.E.2d 661.

SHARPBACK, Judge.

This appeal arises out of a contract for the construction of an addition to an industrial building and the collapse of that addition due to an accumulation of snow on its roof. The plaintiff and appellant is Midwestern Indemnity Company ("Midwestern"), which brought suit [in place] of Louise Litwick and Action Steel, Inc. ("Action Steel"), to recover the amount it paid to its insureds for damage to their property incurred by the collapse of the addition. The defendant and appellee is Varco-Pruden Building ("Varco-Pruden"), a subcontractor of Systems Builders, Inc. ("Systems Builders"), the general contractor for the construction of the building addition. Varco-Pruden designed and erected the addition. * * *

* * * Litwick, in her capacity as the owner of Action Steel, entered into a contract with Systems Builders for the construction of an addition to a commercial building. Systems Builders was the general contractor and agreed to erect a building designed and manufactured by Varco-Pruden. * * *

The construction of the building addition was completed in the summer of 1995. On January 16, 1996, a snowstorm hit the Indianapolis area and a portion of the addition collapsed. Action Steel was insured by Midwestern under a policy issued after completion of the construction. Midwestern paid $1,391,818.90 to Action Steel for the loss. * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 16.2 CONTINUED

On January 16, 1998, Midwestern [which, because it paid for the loss, stood in the place of] Action Steel, filed an amended complaint for damages to recover what it had paid. The complaint asserted * * * claims against Varco-Pruden * * * .

Varco-Pruden filed [a motion] for summary judgment [arguing in part that it was a third party beneficiary of the waiver clause in the contract between Action Steel and Systems Builders].

* * *
* * * *
The trial court granted Varco-Pruden's * * * motion * * * .
* * * *

Here, the construction contract includes language indicating that if Action Steel obtained property insurance after project completion it would waive its rights against contractors and subcontractors. Specifically, * * * Section 11.3.5 of the construction contract discusses the acquisition of property insurance after project completion and provides that "if after final payment property insurance is to be provided on the completed Project through a policy or policies other than those insuring the Project during the construction period, the Owner shall waive all rights in accordance with the terms of Subparagraph 11.3.7 [the waiver clause]." Further, Section 11.3.1 addresses the extent of property insurance and provides that "[t]his insurance shall include interests of the Owner, the Contractor, Subcontractors and Sub-subcontractors in the Work." Varco-Pruden, as the designer, manufacturer, and supplier of the pre-engineered building system used in the construction of the building addition, was a subcontractor within the meaning of Section 11.3.1 of the construction contract. Moreover, Section 11.3.7 * * * provides that "[t]he Owner and Contractor waive all rights against (1) each other and any of their subcontractors, sub-subcontractors, agents and employees." * * *

* * * A person or entity who is not a party to a contract may directly enforce that contract as a third party beneficiary if: (1) the parties intend to benefit a third party; (2) the contract imposes a duty on one of the parties in favor of the third party; and (3) the performance of the terms of the contract renders a direct benefit to the third party. [Emphasis added.]

Varco-Pruden argues that it has satisfied the first element, which requires that the parties intended to benefit a third party. The plain reading of the construction contract indicates that Action Steel intended to benefit Varco-Pruden. * * * Accordingly, the first element is satisfied because when Action Steel purchased property insurance after the project was completed, it intended that subcontractors, such as Varco-Pruden, would benefit from the waiver * * * clause.

Varco-Pruden also argues that it has satisfied the second element, which requires that the contract impose a duty upon one of the parties in favor of the third party. Here, * * * Section 11.3.5 of the construction contract provides that if Action Steel purchased property insurance after project completion, it agreed to waive its right * * * with respect to subcontractors such as Varco-Pruden. Accordingly, the second element is satisfied because the construction contract imposed a duty upon Action Steel in favor of Varco-Pruden.

Finally, Varco-Pruden argues that it has satisfied the final element, which requires that the performance of the terms of the contract render a direct benefit to a third party. Again, the construction contract provides that if Action Steel purchased property insurance after project completion it would waive its right * * * with regard to subcontractors, thereby requiring that it render a direct benefit to those subcontractors, namely Varco-Pruden. Varco-Pruden has satisfied all three elements of the third party beneficiary test. Thus, Varco-Pruden is a third party beneficiary and can enforce the waiver * * * clause contained within the construction contract.

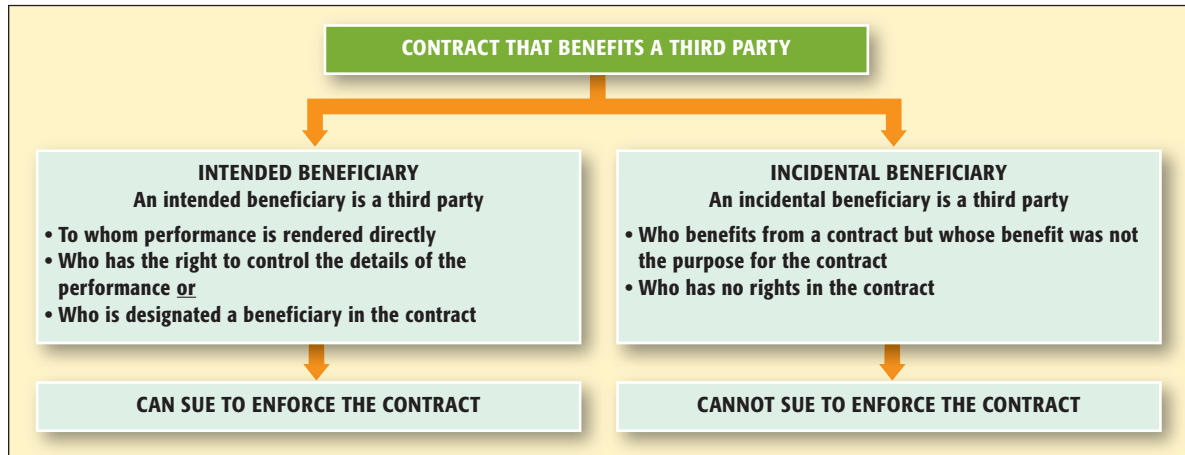

* * * *

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgment of the trial court granting Varco-Pruden's [motion] for summary judgment.

QUESTIONS

1. For what reasons did the state intermediate appellate court uphold the lower court's summary judgment?
2. If the collapse of the building had been due to the negligence of a subcontractor, how might that party argue successfully against recovery?

EXHIBIT 16-3 • Third Party Beneficiaries

Examples of Incidental Third Party Beneficiaries The benefit that an incidental beneficiary receives from a contract between two parties is unintentional, which is why he or she cannot enforce a contract. Any beneficiary who is not deemed an intended beneficiary is considered incidental.

For example, in one case, spectators at a Mike Tyson boxing match in which Tyson was disqualified for biting his opponent's ear sued Tyson and the fight's promoters for a refund on the basis of breach of contract. The spectators claimed that they had standing to sue the defendants as third party beneficiaries of the contract between Tyson and the fight's promoters. The court, however, held that the spectators did not have standing to sue because they were not in contractual privity with any of the defendants. Furthermore, any benefits they received from the contract were incident-tal to the contract. The court noted that the spectators got what they paid for: "the right to view whatever event transpired."¹²

In the following case, a national beauty pageant organization and one of its state affiliates agreed that the national organization would accept the winner of the state contest as a competitor in the national pageant. When the state winner was asked to resign her title, she filed a suit to enforce the agreement to have herself declared a contestant in the national pageant. The national organization argued that she was an incidental, not an intended, beneficiary of the agreement.

12. Castillo v. Tyson, 268 A.D.2d 336, 701 N.Y.S.2d 423 (Sup.Ct.App.Div. 2000). See also Bowers v. Federation Internationale de l'Automobile, 489 F.3d 316 (7th Cir. 2007).

CASE 16.3 Revels v. Miss America Organization

Court of Appeals of North Carolina, 2007. __ N.C. __, 641 S.E.2d 721.

www.aoc.state.nc.us/www/public/html/opinions.htm^a • Company Profile In 1921, businesses in Atlantic City, New Jersey, sponsored a "Miss America" contest as a publicity stunt to extend the summer tourist season. The stunt soon evolved into an event with contestants from each state vying every September for the title of Miss America. More than 12,000 women participate each year in the local and state events that culminate in the selection of the 52 national finalists. To succeed requires commitment, hard work, and talent. In 1945, the nonprofit Miss America Organization (MAO) offered its first scholarship. Today, MAO is the largest provider of scholarships to young women in the world, awarding more than $45 million in cash and tuition assistance annually.

a. In the "Court of Appeals Opinions" section, click on "2007." In the result, scroll to the "20 March 2007" section and click on the name of the case to access the opinion. The North Carolina Administrative Office of the Courts maintains this Web site.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 16.3 CONTINUED

● Background and Facts Miss North Carolina Pageant Organization, Inc. (MNCPO), is a franchisee of Miss America Organization (MAO). Under the “Miss America Organization Official Franchise Agreement,” MNCPO conducts a public contest (the “State Finals”) to select Miss North Carolina and to prepare Miss North Carolina for participation in the Miss America pageant (the “National Finals”).^b In return, MAO “accept[s] the winner of the State Finals . . . as a contestant in the National Finals.” On June 22, 2002, MNCPO designated Rebekah Revels “Miss North Carolina 2002.” On July 19, MAO received an anonymous e-mail (which was later determined to have been sent by Revels’s ex-boyfriend), implying that she had formerly cohabited with a “male non-relative” and that nude photos of her existed. Revels confirmed the existence of the photos. On July 22, MAO and MNCPO asked Revels to resign as Miss North Carolina and told her that if she refused, she would be excluded from competing in the National Finals. On July 23, she resigned. She then filed a suit in a North Carolina state court against MAO, MNCPO, and others, asserting, among other things, breach of contract. The court issued a summary judgment in MAO’s favor. Revels appealed this judgment to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
McCULLOUGH, Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiff contends on appeal that there was sufficient evidence that she is a third-party beneficiary under the franchise agreement between MAO and MNCPO to establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact [and thus for her claim to proceed to trial].

In order to assert rights as a third-party beneficiary under the franchise agreement, plaintiff must show she was an intended beneficiary of the contract. This Court has held that in order to establish a claim as a third-party beneficiary, plaintiff must show: (1) that a contract exists between two persons or entities; (2) that the contract is valid and enforceable; and (3) that the contract was executed for the direct, and not incidental, benefit of the third party. A person is a direct beneficiary of the contract if the contracting parties intended to confer a legally enforceable benefit on that person. It is not enough that the contract, in fact, benefits the third party, if, when the contract was made, the contracting parties did not intend it to benefit the third party directly. In determining the intent of the contracting parties, the court should consider the circumstances surrounding the transaction as well as the actual language of the contract. When a third person seeks enforcement of a contract made between other parties, the contract must be construed strictly against the party seeking enforcement. [Emphasis added.]

There was insufficient evidence before the trial court to support a conclusion that plaintiff was an intended beneficiary under the franchise agreement. Plaintiff was not designated as a beneficiary under the franchise agreement and there is absolutely no evidence that the franchise agreement was executed for her direct benefit. The franchise agreement does provide that MAO will accept the winner of the North Carolina pageant as a contestant in the national finals. However, this evidence is insufficient to establish a showing of intent on the parties to make plaintiff an intended beneficiary. Further, the evidence adduced tended to show that the primary intent of the franchise agreement was to ensure uniformity among all franchisees and it provided the incidental benefit of allowing the winner of MNCPO’s contest to compete in the national finals.

● Decision and Remedy The court affirmed the lower court’s judgment in favor of MAO. Revels was an incidental beneficiary of the agreement between MAO and MNCPO. That the agreement provided that MAO would accept the winner of the State Finals as a contestant in the National Finals did not establish that the two organizations intended to make the winner a direct beneficiary of the agreement. Revels was thus an incidental beneficiary and could not maintain an action against MAO based on the agreement.

● The Global Dimension If the agreement between MAO and MNCPO had involved a third party—an international pageant organization—would this have been a basis for concluding that Revels was a third party intended beneficiary? Why or why not?

b. A franchise is an arrangement by which the owner of a trademark, or other intellectual property, licenses the use of the mark to another party under specific conditions.

CASE 16.3 CONTINUED • The E-Commerce Dimension How might Revels's third party status with respect to the agreement between MAO and MNCPO have been affected if the contracting parties had conducted their business online? Explain.

REVIEWING Third Party Rights

Myrtle Jackson owns several commercial buildings that she leases to businesses, one of which is a restaurant. The lease states that tenants are responsible for securing all necessary insurance policies but the landlord is obligated to keep the buildings in good repair. The owner of the restaurant, Joe McCall, tells his restaurant manager to purchase insurance, but the manager never does so. Jackson tells her son-in-law, Rob Dunn, to perform any necessary maintenance for the buildings. Dunn knows that the ceiling in the restaurant needs repair but fails to do anything about it. One day a customer, Ian Faught, is dining in the restaurant when a chunk of the ceiling falls on his head and fractures his skull. Faught files suit against the restaurant and discovers that there is no insurance policy in effect. Faught then files suit against Jackson, arguing that he is an intended third party beneficiary of the lease provision requiring insurance and thus can sue Jackson for failing to enforce the lease (which requires the restaurant to carry insurance). Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Can Jackson delegate her duty to maintain the buildings to Dunn? Why or why not?
2. Who can be held liable for Dunn's failure to fix the ceiling, Jackson or Dunn?
3. Was Faught an intended third party beneficiary of the lease between Jackson and McCall? Why or why not?
4. Suppose that Jackson tells Dan Stryker, a local builder to whom she owes $50,000, that he can collect the rents from the buildings' tenants until the debt is satisfied. Is this a valid assignment? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

alienation 325 assignee 321 assignment 321

assignor 321
delegatee 325 delegation 321 delegator 325
incidental beneficiary 329 intended beneficiary 328

obligee 321 obligor 321
privity of contract 321 third party beneficiary 328

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

16-1. Alexander has been accepted as a freshman at a college two hundred miles from his home for the fall semester. Alexander's wealthy uncle, Michael, decides to give Alexander a car for Christmas. In November, Michael makes a contract with Jackson Auto Sales to purchase a new car for $18,000 to be delivered to Alexander just before the Christmas holidays, in mid-December. The title to the car is to be in Alexander's name. Michael pays the full purchase price, calls Alexander and tells him about the gift, and takes off for a six-month vacation in Europe. Is Alexander an intended third party beneficiary of the contract between Michael and Jackson Auto Sales? Suppose that Jackson Auto Sales never delivers the car to Alexander. Does Alexander have the right to sue Jackson Auto Sales for breaching its contract with Michael? Explain.

16-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Five years ago, Hensley purchased a house. At that time, being unable to pay the full purchase price, she borrowed funds from Thrift Savings and Loan, which in turn took a mortgage at 6.5 interest on the house. The mortgage contract did not prohibit the assignment of the mortgage. Then Hensley secured a new job in another city and sold the house to Sylvia. The purchase price included payment to Hensley of the value of her equity and the assumption of the mortgage debt still owed to Thrift. At the time the contract between Hensley and Sylvia was made, Thrift did not know about or consent to the sale. On the basis of these facts, if Sylvia defaults in making the house payments to Thrift, what are Thrift's rights? Discuss.

- For a sample answer to Question 16-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

16-3. Marsala, a college student, signs a one-year lease agreement that runs from September 1 to August 31. The lease agreement specifies that the lease cannot be assigned without the landlord's consent. In late May, Marsala decides not to go to summer school and assigns the balance of the lease (three months) to a close friend, Fred. The landlord objects to the assignment and denies Fred access to the apartment. Marsala claims that Fred is financially sound and should be allowed the full rights and privileges of an assignee. Discuss fully who is correct, the landlord or Marsala.

16-4. Inez has a specific set of plans to build a sailboat. The plans are detailed, and any boatbuilder can construct the boat. Inez secures bids, and the low bid is made by the Whale of a Boat Corp. Inez contracts with Whale to build the boat for $4,000. Whale then receives unexpected business from elsewhere. To meet the delivery date in the contract with Inez, Whale delegates its obligation to build the boat, without Inez's consent, to Quick Brothers, a reputable boatbuilder. When the boat is ready for delivery, Inez learns of the delegation and refuses to accept delivery, even though the boat is built to her specifications. Discuss fully whether Inez is obligated to accept and pay for the boat. Would your answer be any different if Inez had not had a specific set of plans but had instead contracted with Whale to design and build a sailboat for $4,000? Explain.

16-5. Notice of Assignment. As the building services manager for Fulton County, Georgia, Steve Fullard oversaw custodial services. Fullard determined which services to contract for, received the bids, and recommended the selection of a vendor. After the selection of Total Quality Maintenance of Georgia (TQM) on a particular contract, Fullard supervised TQM's performance and received and processed its invoices. Later, TQM assigned its unpaid invoices to American Factors of Nashville, Inc., which forwarded copies to Fullard with a statement rubber-stamped on each invoice. The statement began with the word "NOTICE" and the name, address, and phone number of American Factors. It also said, "Remittance to other than American Factors of Nashville, Inc., does not constitute payment of this Invoice." Included with each invoice was a certification by TQM's president that the invoice had been assigned to American Factors. Nevertheless, the county paid TQM on these invoices, and American Factors filed a suit in a Georgia state court against the county, claiming that it still owed American Factors. Did the county have sufficient notice of TQM's assignment? Can the county be required to pay the same invoice twice? Why or why not? [Fulton County v. American Factors of Nashville, Inc., 551 S.E.2d 781 (Ga.App.2001)]

16-6. Third Party Beneficiary. Acciai Speciali Terni USA, Inc. (AST), hired a carrier to ship steel sheets and coils from Italy to the United States on the M/V Berane. The ship's receipt for the goods included a forum-selection clause, which stated that any dispute would be "decided in the country where the carrier has his principal place of business." The receipt also contained a "Himalaya" clause, which extended "every right, exemption from liability, defense and immunity" that the carrier enjoyed to those acting on the carrier's behalf. Transcom Terminals, Ltd., was the U.S. stevedore—that is, Transcom off-loaded the vessel and stored the cargo for eventual delivery to AST. Finding the cargo damaged, AST filed a suit in a federal district court against Transcom and others, charging, among other things, negligence in the off-loading. Transcom filed a motion to dismiss on the basis of the forum-selection clause. Transcom argued that it was an intended third party beneficiary of this provision through the Himalaya clause. Is Transcom correct? What should the court rule? Explain. [Acciai Speciali Terni USA, Inc. v. M/V Berane, 181 F.Supp.2d 458 (D.Md. 2002)]

CHAPTER 16 Third Party Rights

16-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

The National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) regulates intercollegiate amateur athletics among the more than 1,200 colleges and universities with whom it contracts. Among other things, the NCAA maintains rules of eligibility for student participation in intercollegiate athletic events. Jeremy Bloom, a high school football and track star, was recruited to play football at the University of Colorado (CU). Before enrolling, he competed in Olympic and professional World Cup skiing events, becoming the World Cup champion in freestyle moguls. During the Olympics, Bloom appeared on MTV and was offered other paid entertainment opportunities, including a chance to host a show on Nickelodeon. Bloom was also paid to endorse certain ski equipment and contracted to model clothing for Tommy Hilfiger. On Bloom's behalf, CU asked the NCAA to waive its rules restricting student-athlete endorsement and media activities. The NCAA refused, and Bloom quit the activities to play football for CU. He filed a suit in a Colorado state court against the NCAA, however, asserting breach of contract on the ground that its rules permitted these activities if they were needed to support a professional athletic career. The NCAA responded that Bloom did not have standing to pursue this claim. What contract has allegedly been breached in this case? Is Bloom a party to this contract? If not, is he a third party beneficiary of it, and if so, is his status intended or incidental? Explain. [Bloom v. National Collegiate Athletic Association, 93 P.3d 621 (Colo.App. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 16-7, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 16," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

16-8. Third Party Beneficiary. National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc. (NASCAR), sanctions stock car races. NASCAR and Sprint Nextel Corp. agreed that Sprint would become the Official Series Sponsor of the NASCAR NEXTEL Cup Series in 2004. The agreement granted sponsorship exclusivity to Sprint and contained a list of "Competitors" who were barred from sponsoring Series events. Excepted were existing sponsorships: in "Driver and Car Owner Agreements" between NASCAR and the cars' owners, NASCAR promised to "preserve and protect" those sponsorships, which could continue and be renewed at the owner's option despite Sprint's exclusivity. RCR Team #31, LLC, owns the #31 Car in the Series. Cingular Wireless, LLC (a Sprint competitor), had been #31 Car's primary sponsor since 2001. In 2007, Cingular changed its name to AT&T Mobility, LLC, and proposed a new paint scheme for the #31 Car that called for the Cingular logo to remain on the hood while the AT&T logo would be added on the rear quarter panel. NASCAR rejected the proposal. AT&T filed a suit in a federal district court against NASCAR, claiming, in part, that NASCAR was in breach of its "Driver and Car Owner Agreement" with RCR. Can AT&T maintain an action against NASCAR based on this agreement? Explain. [AT&T Mobility, LLC v. National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing, Inc., 494 F.3d 1356 (11th Cir. 2007)]

16-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 1984, James Grigg's mother was killed in a car accident. Royal Insurance Co. of America agreed to pay Grigg a number of monthly payments and two lump-sum payments of $50,000 due May 1, 1995, and May 1, 2005. Royal contracted with Safeco Life Insurance Co. to make the payments. In 1997, Grigg assigned the 2005 payment of $50,000 to Howard Foley for $10,000. Neither Grigg nor Foley notified Safeco or Royal. Four years later, Grigg offered to sell Settlement Capital Corp. (SCC) his interest in the 2005 payment. On SCC's request, an Idaho state court approved the transfer. Foley later notified Safeco of his interest in the payment, and in 2005, the court approved an arrangement by which Foley and SCC would share the $50,000. Shortly before the 2005 payment was made, however, it was revealed that Grigg had also tried to sell his interest to Canco Credit Union, whose manager, Timothy Johnson, paid Grigg for it. Later, Johnson assigned the interest to Robert Chris, who used it as collateral for a loan from Canco. Foley filed a suit in an Idaho state court against Grigg, asking the court to determine who, among these parties, was entitled to the 2005 payment. [Foley v. Grigg, 144 Idaho 530, 164 P.3d 180 (2007)]

- If the court applies the rule most often observed in the United States, who is likely to be awarded the $50,000? If the court applies the English rule, who will have priority to the payment?
- Regardless of the legal principles to be applied, is there a violation of ethics in these circumstances? Explain.

16-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 16." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Third Party Beneficiaries. Then answer the following questions.

- Discuss whether a valid contract was formed when Oscar and Vinny bet on the outcome of a football game. Would Vinny be able to enforce the contract in court?
- Is the Fresh Air Fund an incidental or intended beneficiary? Why?
- Can Maria sue to enforce Vinny's promise to donate Oscar's winnings to the Fresh Air Fund?

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

You can find a summary of the law governing assignments, as well as "SmartAgreement" forms that you can use for various types of contracts, including assignments, at www.smartagreements.com

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 16" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 16-1: Legal Perspective
New York's Leading Decisions

Internet Exercise 16-2: Management Perspective
Professional Liability to Third Parties

CHAPTER 17

Performance and Discharge

Just as rules are necessary to determine when a legally enforceable contract exists, so also are they required to determine when one of the parties can justifiably say, "I have fully performed, so I am now discharged from my obligations under this contract." The legal environment of business requires the identification of some point at which the parties can reasonably know that their duties are at an end.

The most common way to discharge, or terminate, one's contractual duties is by the performance of those duties. For example, a buyer and seller have a contract for the sale of a 2009 Lexus for $39,000. This contract will be discharged by performance when the buyer pays $39,000 to the seller and the seller transfers possession of the Lexus to the buyer.

The duty to perform under a contract may be conditioned on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of a certain event, or the duty may be absolute. In the first part of this chapter, we look at conditions of performance and the degree of performance required. We then examine some other ways in which a contract can be discharged, including discharge by agreement of the parties and discharge by operation of law.

Conditions

In most contracts, promises of performance are not expressly conditioned or qualified. Instead, they are absolute promises. They must be performed, or the parties promising the acts will be in breach of contract. In some situations, however, performance is contingent on the occurrence or nonoccurrence of a certain event. A condition is a possible future event, the occurrence or nonoccurrence of which will trigger the performance of a legal obligation or terminate an existing obligation under a contract.¹ If this condition is not satisfied, the obligations of the parties are discharged. Suppose that Alfonso offers to purchase a painting from Jerome only if an independent appraisal indicates that it is worth at least $10,000. Jerome accepts Alfonso's offer. Their obligations (promises) are conditioned on the outcome of the appraisal. Should the condition not be satisfied (for example, if the appraiser deems the value of the painting to be only $5,000), the parties' obligations to each other are discharged and cannot be enforced.

Three types of conditions can be present in contracts: conditions precedent, conditions subsequent, and concurrent conditions. Conditions are also classified as express or implied.

Conditions Precedent

A condition that must be fulfilled before a party's performance can be required is called a condition precedent. The condition precedes the absolute duty to perform, as in the Jerome-Alfonso example just discussed. Real estate contracts frequently are conditioned on the buyer's ability to obtain financing. For example, Fisher promises to buy Calvin's house if Salvation Bank approves Fisher's mortgage application.

1. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 224, defines a condition as "an event, not certain to occur, which must occur, unless its nonoccurrence is excused, before performance under a contract becomes due."

The Fisher-Calvin contract is therefore subject to a condition precedent—the bank’s approval of Fisher’s mortgage application. If the bank does not approve the application, the contract will fail because the condition precedent was not met. Insurance contracts frequently specify that certain conditions, such as passing a physical examination, must be met before the insurance company will be obligated to perform under the contract.

Conditions Subsequent

When a condition operates to terminate a party’s absolute promise to perform, it is called a condition subsequent. The condition follows, or is subsequent to, the arising of an absolute duty to perform. If the condition occurs, the party’s duty to perform is discharged. For example, imagine that a law firm hires Koker, a recent law school graduate and newly licensed attorney. Their contract provides that the firm’s obligation to continue employing Koker is discharged if Koker fails to maintain her license to practice law. This is a condition subsequent because a failure to maintain the license would discharge a duty that has already arisen.

Generally, conditions precedent are common; conditions subsequent are rare. The Restatement (Second) of Contracts does not use the terms condition subsequent and condition precedent but refers to both simply as conditions.²

Concurrent Conditions

When each party’s performance is conditioned on the other party’s performance or tender of performance (offer to perform), there are concurrent conditions. Concurrent conditions occur only when the contract calls for the parties to perform their respective duties simultaneously. For example, if a buyer promises to pay for goods when the seller delivers them, each party’s promise to perform is mutually dependent. The buyer’s duty to pay for the goods does not become absolute until the seller either delivers or tenders the goods. Likewise, the seller’s duty to deliver the goods does not become absolute until the buyer tenders or actually makes payment. Therefore, neither can recover from the other for breach without first tendering performance.

2. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 224.

Express and Implied-in-Fact Conditions

Conditions can also be classified as express or implied in fact. Express conditions are provided for by the parties’ agreement. Although no particular words are necessary, express conditions are normally prefaced by the words if, provided, after, or when.

Conditions implied in fact are similar to express conditions in that they are understood to be part of the agreement, but they are not found in the express language of the agreement. Courts may imply conditions from the purpose of the contract or from the intent of the parties. Conditions are often implied when they are necessarily inherent in the actual performance of the contract.

For example, suppose that a clause in an automobile insurance policy states that, if involved in an accident, the insured must cooperate with the insurance company in the investigation, settlement, or defense of any claim or lawsuit. Alejandro Alvarado signs the contract and is later involved in an accident from which a negligence lawsuit against him arises. Alvarado knows that the insurance company is representing him in the suit; yet he fails to cooperate in his defense and does not appear in court on the date of the trial. The court enters a judgment against him, which prejudices the rights of the insurance company. In this situation, a court could find that the cooperation clause is a condition precedent to coverage under the policy because it was inherent in the actual performance of the contract. If so, because Alvarado did not cooperate with the insurer, he will not be covered under the policy, and the insurance company will not be liable for the damages awarded.³

Discharge by Performance

The great majority of contracts are discharged by performance. The contract comes to an end when both parties fulfill their respective duties by performing the acts they have promised. Performance can also be accomplished by tender. Tender is an unconditional offer to perform by a person who is ready, willing, and able to do so. Therefore, a seller who places goods at the disposal of a buyer has tendered delivery and can demand payment. A buyer who offers to pay for goods has tendered payment and can demand delivery of the goods. Once performance has been tendered, the party making the tender has done everything possible to carry out the terms of the contract. If the other party then refuses to perform, the party making the tender can sue for breach of contract.

3. Progressive County Mutual Insurance Co. v. Trevino, 202 S.W.3d 811 (Tex.App.—San Antonio 2006).

Types of Performance

There are two basic types of performance—complete performance and substantial performance. A contract may stipulate that performance must meet the personal satisfaction of either the contracting party or a third party. Such a provision must be considered in determining whether the performance rendered satisfies the contract.

Complete Performance When a party performs exactly as agreed, there is no question as to whether the contract has been performed. When a party's performance is perfect, it is said to be complete.

Normally, conditions expressly stated in a contract must be fully satisfied for complete performance to take place. For example, most construction contracts require the builder to meet certain specifications. If the specifications are conditions, complete performance is required to avoid material breach (material breach will be discussed shortly). If the conditions are met, the other party to the contract must then fulfill her or his obligation to pay the builder. If the specifications are not conditions and if the builder, without the other party's permission, fails to comply with the specifications, performance is not complete. What effect does such a failure have on the other party's obligation to pay? The answer is part of the doctrine of substantial performance.

Substantial Performance A party who in good faith performs substantially all of the terms of a contract can enforce the contract against the other party under the doctrine of substantial performance. Note that good faith is required. Intentionally failing to comply with the terms is a breach of the contract.

Confers Most of the Benefits Promised. Generally, to qualify as substantial, the performance must not vary greatly from the performance promised in the contract, and it must create substantially the same benefits as those promised in the contract. If the omission, variance, or defect in performance is unimportant and can easily be compensated for by awarding damages, a court is likely to hold that the contract has been substantially performed.

Courts decide whether the performance was substantial on a case-by-case basis, examining all of the facts of the particular situation. For example, in a construction contract, a court would look at the intended purpose of the structure and the expense required to bring the structure into complete compliance with the contract. Thus, the exact point at which performance is considered substantial varies.

Entitles the Other Party to Damages. Because substantial performance is not perfect, the other party is entitled to damages to compensate for the failure to comply with the contract. The measure of the damages is the cost to bring the object of the contract into compliance with its terms, if that cost is reasonable under the circumstances. If the cost is unreasonable, the measure of damages is the difference in value between the performance that was rendered and the performance that would have been rendered if the contract had been performed completely.

The following classic case emphasizes that there is no exact formula for deciding when a contract has been substantially performed.

EXTENDED CASE 17.1 Jacob & Youngs v. Kent

Court of Appeals of New York, 1921. 230 N.Y. 239, 129 N.E. 889.

CARDOZO, J. [Judge]

The plaintiff built a country residence for the defendant at a cost of upwards of $77,000, and now sues to recover a balance of $3,483.46, remaining unpaid. The work of construction ceased in June, 1914, and the defendant then began to occupy the dwelling. There was no complaint of defective performance until March, 1915. One of the specifications for the plumbing work provides that—

All wrought-iron pipe must be well galvanized, lap welded pipe of the grade known as "standard pipe" of Reading manufacture.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 17.1 CONTINUED

The defendant learned in March, 1915, that some of the pipe, instead of being made in Reading, was the product of other factories. The plaintiff was accordingly directed by the architect to do the work anew. The plumbing was then encased within the walls except in a few places where it had to be exposed. Obedience to the order meant more than the substitution of other pipe. It meant the demolition at great expense of substantial parts of the completed structure. The plaintiff left the work untouched, and asked for a certificate that the final payment was due. Refusal of the certificate was followed by this suit [in a New York state court].

The evidence sustains a finding that the omission of the prescribed brand of pipe was neither fraudulent nor willful. It was the result of the oversight and inattention of the plaintiff's subcontractor. Reading pipe is distinguished from Cohoes pipe and other brands only by the name of the manufacturer stamped upon it at intervals of between six and seven feet. Even the defendant's architect, though he inspected the pipe upon arrival, failed to notice the discrepancy. The plaintiff tried to show that the brands installed, though made by other manufacturers, were the same in quality, in appearance, in market value, and in cost as the brand stated in the contract—that they were, indeed, the same thing, though manufactured in another place. The evidence was excluded, and a verdict directed for the defendant. The [state intermediate appellate court] reversed, and granted a new trial.

We think the evidence, if admitted, would have supplied some basis for the inference that the defect was insignificant in its relation to the project. The courts never say that one who makes a contract fills the measure of his duty by less than full performance. They do say, however, that an omission, both trivial and innocent, will sometimes be atoned for by allowance of the resulting damage, and will not always be the breach of a condition * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * Where the line is to be drawn between the important and the trivial cannot be settled by a formula. In the nature of the case precise boundaries are impossible. The same omission may take on one aspect or another according to its setting. Substitution of equivalents may not have the same significance in fields of art on the one side and in those of mere utility on the other. Nowhere will change be tolerated, however, if it is so dominant or pervasive as in any real or substantial measure to frustrate the purpose of the contract. There is no general license to install whatever, in the builder's judgment, may be regarded as "just as good." The question is one of degree, to be answered, if there is doubt, by the triers of the facts, and, if the inferences are certain, by the judges of the law. We must weigh the purpose to be served, the desire to be gratified, the excuse for deviation from the letter, the cruelty of enforced adherence. Then only can we tell whether literal fulfillment is to be implied by law as a condition. * * * [Emphasis added.]

In the circumstances of this case, we think the measure of the allowance is not the cost of replacement, which would be great, but the difference in value, which would be either nominal or nothing. Some of the exposed sections might perhaps have been replaced at moderate expense. The defendant did not limit his demand to them, but treated the plumbing as a unit to be corrected from cellar to roof. In point of fact, the plaintiff never reached the stage at which evidence of the extent of the allowance became necessary. The trial court had excluded evidence that the defect was unsubstantial, and in view of that ruling there was no occasion for the plaintiff to go farther with an offer of proof. We think, however, that the offer, if it had been made, would not of necessity have been defective because directed to difference in value. It is true that in most cases the cost of replacement is the measure. The owner is entitled to the money which will permit him to complete, unless the cost of completion is grossly and unfairly out of proportion to the good to be attained. When that is true, the measure is the difference in value. * * * The rule that gives a remedy in cases of substantial performance with compensation for defects of trivial or inappreciable importance has been developed by the courts as an instrument of justice. The measure of the allowance must be shaped to the same end.

The order should be affirmed, and judgment absolute directed in favor of the plaintiff upon the stipulation, with costs in all courts.

QUESTIONS

1. The New York Court of Appeals found that Jacob & Youngs had substantially performed the contract. To what, if any, remedy was Kent entitled?

CASE 17.1 CONTINUED

2. A requirement of substantial performance is good faith. Do you think that Jacob & Youngs substantially performed all of the terms of the contract in good faith? Why or why not?

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law At the time of the Jacob & Youngs case, some courts did not apply the doctrine of substantial performance to disputes involving breaches of contract. This landmark decision contributed to a developing trend toward equity and fairness in those circumstances. Today, an unintentional and trivial omission or deviation from the terms of a contract will not prevent its enforcement but will permit an adjustment in the value of its performance.

Performance to the Satisfaction of Another Contracts often state that completed work must personally satisfy one of the parties or a third person. The question then is whether this satisfaction becomes a condition precedent, requiring actual personal satisfaction or approval for discharge, or whether the test of satisfaction is an absolute promise requiring such performance as would satisfy a reasonable person (substantial performance).

When the subject matter of the contract is personal, a contract to be performed to the satisfaction of one of the parties is conditioned, and performance must actually satisfy that party. For example, contracts for portraits, works of art, and tailoring are considered personal. Therefore, only the personal satisfaction of the party fulfills the condition—unless a court finds the party is expressing dissatisfaction only to avoid payment or otherwise is not acting in good faith.

Most other contracts need to be performed only to the satisfaction of a reasonable person unless they expressly state otherwise. When such contracts require performance to the satisfaction of a third party (for example, “to the satisfaction of Robert Ames, the supervising engineer”), the courts are divided. A majority of courts require the work to be satisfactory to a reasonable person, but some courts hold that the personal satisfaction of the third party designated in the contract (Robert Ames, in this example) must be met.

Again, the personal judgment must be made honestly, or the condition will be excused.

Material Breach of Contract

A breach of contract is the nonperformance of a contractual duty. The breach is material when performance is not at least substantial.⁴ If there is a material breach, then the nonbreaching party is excused from the performance of contractual duties and can sue for damages resulting from the breach. If the breach is minor (not material), the nonbreaching party's duty to perform can sometimes be suspended until the breach has been remedied, but the duty to perform is not entirely excused. Once the minor breach has been cured, the nonbreaching party must resume performance of the contractual obligations undertaken.

Any breach entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for damages, but only a material breach discharges the nonbreaching party from the contract. The policy underlying these rules allows contracts to go forward when only minor problems occur but allows them to be terminated if major difficulties arise.

Under what circumstances is an employer excused from further performance under a contract with an employee? That was the question in the following case.

4. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 241.

CASE 17.2 Shah v. Cover-It, Inc.

Appellate Court of Connecticut, 2004. 86 Conn.App. 71, 859 A.2d 959.

● Background and Facts In November 1997, Cover-It, Inc., hired Khalid Shah to work as its structural engineering manager. Shah agreed to work a flexible schedule of thirty-five hours per week. In exchange, he would receive an annual salary of $70,000 for five years, a 2 percent commission on the sales of products that he designed, three weeks of paid vacation after one year, a company car, time off to attend to prior professional obligations, and certain other benefits. Either party could terminate the contract with ninety days' written notice, but if Cover-It terminated it, Shah would receive monthly payments for the rest of the five-year term.^a In June 1998, Shah went on vacation and did not return until September. In mid-October, Brian Goldwitz, Cover-It's owner and president, terminated Shah's contract. Shah filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Cover-It and others. The court determined that Shah had breached the contract and rendered a judgment in the defendants' favor. Shah appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 17.2 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
SCHALLER, J. [Judge]

* * * *

On appeal, the plaintiff claims that the court improperly found that he had breached the contract or, in the alternative, that any breach was not material. Specifically, the plaintiff argues that the court failed to identify an express term or condition that was breached and instead merely found that certain acts, considered together, demonstrated a material breach prior to the termination of his employment. Therefore, according to the plaintiff, the defendants were not relieved of their obligations, under the terms of the contract, to pay his full salary for ninety days and to pay his post-termination salary pursuant to the schedule set forth in the contract. * * *

* * * *

It is a general rule of contract law that a total breach of the contract by one party relieves the injured party of any further duty to perform further obligations under the contract. [Emphasis added.]

* * * Section 241 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts provides:

In determining whether a failure to render or to offer performance is material, the following circumstances are significant: (a) the extent to which the injured party will be deprived of the benefit which he reasonably expected; (b) the extent to which the injured party can be adequately compensated for the part of that benefit of which he will be deprived; (c) the extent to which the party failing to perform or to offer to perform will suffer forfeiture; (d) the likelihood that the party failing to perform or to offer to perform will cure his failure, taking account of all the circumstances including any reasonable assurances; [and] (e) the extent to which the behavior of the party failing to perform or to offer to perform comports with standards of good faith and fair dealing.

The standards of materiality are to be applied in the light of the facts of each case in such a way as to further the purpose of securing for each party his expectation of an exchange of performances. Section 241 therefore states circumstances, not rules, which are to be considered in determining whether a particular failure is material. [Emphasis added.]

In the present case, the court found that the plaintiff took a ten-week vacation, which exceeded the time authorized. After the plaintiff returned, he reported for work only two or three days per week and spent long periods of time visiting Internet Web sites that were unrelated to his professional duties. Additionally, after being instructed by [Cover-It's] human resources manager to document his attendance by use of a time clock, the plaintiff refused and simply marked his time sheets with a "P" for present. Last, the court found that when Goldwitz asked when certain designs would be completed, the plaintiff responded that he was not sure and that he would take his time in completing them. When reviewing those findings in light of the factors set forth in [Section] 241 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, we conclude that the court's finding of a material breach was not clearly erroneous.

It is clear from the court's findings that the plaintiff failed to perform under the obligations of the employment contract. * * * One cannot recover upon a contract unless he has fully performed his own obligation under it, has tendered performance or has some legal excuse for not performing. As a result of the material breach by the plaintiff, the defendants were excused from further performance under the contract, and were relieved of the obligation to pay the plaintiff his full salary for ninety days and to pay his post-termination salary pursuant to the schedule set forth in the contract.

a. The contract provided that for up to two years of service, Shah would be paid $20,000 per year; for three years of service, $30,000 per year; and for four years of service, $40,000 per year.

CASE 17.2 CONTINUED

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The appellate court held that Shah had materially breached his contract with Cover-It and that this breach excused Cover-It from further performance of its contractual duties, including any obligation to continue paying Shah's salary.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that during his ten-week absence Shah was fulfilling prior professional obligations and that on his return he met Cover-It's hours and timekeeping requirements. Further suppose that Shah responded to Goldwitz's questions about his projects with reasonable estimates. Would the outcome of the case have been different? Why or why not?

● The E-Commerce Dimension If Shah had worked for Cover-It from his home by telecommuting over the Internet and other employees were therefore not aware of his conduct, would he have been in breach of his contract? Explain.

Anticipatory Repudiation

Before either party to a contract has a duty to perform, one of the parties may refuse to carry out his or her contractual obligations. This is called anticipatory repudiation⁵ of the contract. When anticipatory repudiation occurs, it is treated as a material breach of contract, and the nonbreaching party is permitted to bring an action for damages immediately, even though the scheduled time for performance under the contract may still be in the future. Until the nonbreaching party treats an early repudiation as a breach, however, the repudiating party can retract her or his anticipatory repudiation by proper notice and restore the parties to their original obligations.⁶

Rationale for Treating Repudiation as Breach An anticipatory repudiation is treated as a present, material breach for two reasons. First, the nonbreaching party should not be required to remain ready and willing to perform when the other party has already repudiated the contract. Second, the nonbreaching party should have the opportunity to seek a similar contract elsewhere and may have a duty to do so to minimize his or her loss.⁷

Anticipatory Repudiation and Market Prices Quite often, anticipatory repudiation occurs

when performance of the contract would be extremely unfavorable to one of the parties because of a sharp fluctuation in market prices. For example, Martin Corporation contracts to manufacture and sell ten thousand personal computers to ComAge, a retailer of computer equipment that has five hundred outlet stores. Delivery is to be made six months from the date of the contract. The contract price is based on Martin's present costs of purchasing inventory parts from others. One month later, three inventory suppliers raise their prices to Martin.

Based on these higher prices, Martin stands to lose $500,000 if it sells the computers to ComAge at the contract price. Martin immediately writes to ComAge, stating that it cannot deliver the ten thousand computers at the contract price. Martin's letter is an anticipatory repudiation of the contract. ComAge has the option of treating the repudiation as a material breach of contract and proceeding immediately to pursue remedies, even though the actual contract delivery date is still five months away.

Time for Performance

If no time for performance is stated in the contract, a reasonable time is implied.⁸ If a specific time is stated, the parties must usually perform by that time. Unless time is expressly stated to be vital, however, a delay in performance will not destroy the performing party's right to payment.⁹ When time is expressly stated to be "of the essence" or vital, the parties normally must perform within the stated time period because the time element becomes a condition.

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 253; Section 2-610 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

6. See UCC 2-611.

7. The doctrine of anticipatory repudiation first arose in the landmark case of Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 Ellis and Blackburn Reports 678 (1853), when an English court recognized the delay and expense inherent in a rule requiring a nonbreaching party to wait until the time of performance before suing on an anticipatory repudiation.

8. See UCC 2-204.

9. See, for example, Manganaro Corp. v. Hitt Contracting, Inc., 193 F.Supp.2d 88 (D.D.C. 2002).

Discharge by Agreement

Any contract can be discharged by agreement of the parties. The agreement can be contained in the original contract, or the parties can form a new contract for the express purpose of discharging the original contract.

Discharge by Rescission

As mentioned in previous chapters, rescission is the process by which a contract is canceled or terminated and the parties are returned to the positions they occupied prior to forming it. For mutual rescission to take place, the parties must make another agreement that also satisfies the legal requirements for a contract. There must be an offer, an acceptance, and consideration. Ordinarily, if the parties agree to rescind the original contract, their promises not to perform the acts stipulated in the original contract will be legal consideration for the second contract (the rescission).

Agreements to rescind most executory contracts (in which neither party has performed) are enforceable, even if the agreement is made orally and even if the original agreement was in writing. Agreements to rescind contracts involving transfers of realty, however, must be evidenced by a writing. An exception applies under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) to agreements rescinding a contract for the sale of goods, regardless of price, when the contract requires a written rescission.¹⁰

When one party has fully performed, an agreement to cancel the original contract normally will not be enforceable. Because the performing party has received no consideration for the promise to call off the original bargain, additional consideration is necessary to support a rescission contract.

Discharge by Novation

A contractual obligation may also be discharged through novation. A novation occurs when both of the parties to a contract agree to substitute a third party for one of the original parties. The requirements of a novation are as follows:

1. A previous valid obligation.
2. An agreement by all the parties to a new contract.

10. UCC 2-209(2), (4).

3. The extinguishing of the old obligation (discharge of the prior party).
4. A new contract that is valid.

For example, suppose that Union Corporation contracts to sell its pharmaceutical division to British Pharmaceuticals, Ltd. Before the transfer is completed, Union, British Pharmaceuticals, and a third company, Otis Chemicals, execute a new agreement to transfer all of British Pharmaceuticals' rights and duties in the transaction to Otis Chemicals. As long as the new contract is supported by consideration, the novation will discharge the original contract (between Union and British Pharmaceuticals) and replace it with the new contract (between Union and Otis Chemicals).

A novation expressly or impliedly revokes and discharges a prior contract.¹¹ The parties involved may expressly state in the new contract that the old contract is now discharged. If the parties do not expressly discharge the old contract, it will be impliedly discharged if the new contract's terms are inconsistent with the old contract's terms.

Discharge by Substituted Agreement

A compromise, or settlement agreement, that arises out of a genuine dispute over the obligations under an existing contract will be recognized at law. Such an agreement will be substituted as a new contract, and it will either expressly or impliedly revoke and discharge the obligations under any prior contract. In contrast to a novation, a substituted agreement does not involve a third party. Rather, the two original parties to the contract form a different agreement to substitute for the original one.

Discharge by Accord and Satisfaction

For a contract to be discharged by accord and satisfaction, the parties must agree to accept performance that is different from the performance originally promised. As discussed in Chapter 12, an accord is a contract to perform some act to satisfy an existing contractual duty that is not yet discharged.¹² A

11. It is this immediate discharge of the prior contract that distinguishes a novation from both an accord and satisfaction, discussed in a later subsection, and an assignment of all rights, discussed in Chapter 16. In an assignment of all rights, the original party to the contract (the assignor) remains liable under the original contract if the assignee fails to perform the contractual obligations. In contrast, in a novation, the original party's obligations are completely discharged.

12. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 281.

satisfaction is the performance of the accord agreement. An accord and its satisfaction discharge the original contractual obligation.

Once the accord has been made, the original obligation is merely suspended. The obligor (the one owing the obligation) can discharge the obligation by performing either the obligation agreed to in the accord or the original obligation. If the obligor refuses to perform the accord, the obligee (the one to whom performance is owed) can bring action on the original obligation or seek a decree compelling specific performance on the accord.

For example, suppose that Frazer has a judgment against Ling for $8,000. Later, both parties agree that the judgment can be satisfied by Ling's transfer of his automobile to Frazer. This agreement to accept the auto in lieu of $8,000 in cash is the accord. If Ling transfers the car to Frazer, the accord is fully performed, and the debt is discharged. If Ling refuses to transfer the car, the accord is breached. Because the original obligation is merely suspended, Frazer can sue Ling to enforce the original judgment for $8,000 in cash or bring an action for breach of the accord.

Discharge by Operation of Law

Under certain circumstances, contractual duties may be discharged by operation of law. These circumstances include material alteration of the contract, the running of the statute of limitations, bankruptcy, and the impossibility or impracticability of performance.

Alteration of the Contract

To discourage parties from altering written contracts, the law operates to allow an innocent party to be discharged when the other party has materially altered a written contract without consent. For example, contract terms such as quantity or price might be changed without the knowledge or consent of all parties. If so, the party who was not involved in the alteration can treat the contract as discharged or terminated.¹³

13. The contract is voidable, and the innocent party can also treat the contract as in effect, either on the original terms or on the terms as altered. For example, a buyer who discovers that a seller altered the quantity of goods in a sales contract from 100 to 1,000 by secretly inserting a zero can purchase either 100 or 1,000 of the items.

Statutes of Limitations

As mentioned earlier in this text, statutes of limitations restrict the period during which a party can sue on a particular cause of action. After the applicable limitations period has passed, a suit can no longer be brought. For example, the limitations period for bringing suits for breach of oral contracts is usually two to three years; for written contracts, four to five years; and for recovery of amounts awarded in judgments, ten to twenty years, depending on state law. Lawsuits for breach of a contract for the sale of goods generally must be brought within four years after the cause of action has accrued.¹⁴ By their original agreement, the parties can reduce this four-year period to not less than one year, but they cannot agree to extend it.

Bankruptcy

A proceeding in bankruptcy attempts to allocate the assets the debtor owns to the creditors in a fair and equitable fashion. Once the assets have been allocated, the debtor receives a discharge in bankruptcy. A discharge in bankruptcy will ordinarily bar enforcement of most of the debtor's contracts by the creditors. Partial payment of a debt after discharge in bankruptcy will not revive the debt. (Bankruptcy will be discussed in detail in Chapter 30.)

Impossibility or Impracticability of Performance

After a contract has been made, supervening events (such as a fire) may make performance impossible in an objective sense. This is known as impossibility of performance and can discharge a contract.¹⁵ Performance may also become so difficult or costly due to some unforeseen event that a court will consider it commercially unfeasible, or impracticable.

Objective Impossibility of Performance

Objective impossibility ("It can't be done") must be distinguished from subjective impossibility ("I'm sorry,

14. Section 2-725 of the UCC contains this four-year limitation period. A cause of action in sales contracts generally accrues when the breach occurs, regardless of the aggrieved party's lack of knowledge of the breach. A breach of warranty normally occurs when the seller delivers the goods to the buyer.

15. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 261.

I simply can't do it"). For example, subjective impossibility occurs when a party cannot deliver goods on time because of freight car shortages or cannot make payment on time because the bank is closed. In effect, in each of these situations the party is saying, "It is impossible for me to perform," not "It is impossible for anyone to perform." Accordingly, such excuses do not discharge a contract, and the nonperforming party is normally held in breach of contract.

Note that to justify not performing the contract, the supervening event must have been unforeseeable at the time of the contract. Parties are supposed to consider foreseeable events, such as floods in a flood zone, at the time of contracting and allocate those risks accordingly through insurance and other means. Three basic types of situations, however, may qualify as grounds for the discharge of contractual obligations based on impossibility of performance.¹⁶

1. When one of the parties to a personal contract dies or becomes incapacitated prior to performance. For example, Fred, a famous dancer, contracts with Ethereal Dancing Guild to play a leading role in its new ballet. Before the ballet can be performed, Fred becomes ill and dies. His personal performance was essential to the completion of the contract. Thus, his death discharges the contract and his estate's liability for his nonperformance.
2. When the specific subject matter of the contract is destroyed. For example, A-1 Farm Equipment agrees to sell Gudgel the green tractor on its lot and promises to have it ready for Gudgel to pick up on Saturday. On Friday night, however, a truck veers off the nearby highway and smashes into the tractor, destroying it beyond repair. Because the contract was for this specific tractor, A-1's performance is rendered impossible owing to the accident.
3. When a change in law renders performance illegal. For example, a contract to build an apartment building becomes impossible to perform when the zoning laws are changed to prohibit the construction of residential rental property at the planned location. A contract to paint a bridge using lead paint becomes impossible when the government passes new regulations forbidding the use of lead paint on bridges.¹⁷

Temporary Impossibility An occurrence or event that makes performance temporarily impossible operates to suspend performance until the impossibility ceases. Then, ordinarily, the parties must perform the contract as originally planned. If, however, the lapse of time and the change in circumstances surrounding the contract make it substantially more burdensome for the parties to perform the promised acts, the contract is discharged.

The leading case on the subject, Autry v. Republic Productions,¹⁸ involved an actor (Gene Autry) who was drafted into the army in 1942. Being drafted rendered the actor's contract temporarily impossible to perform, and it was suspended until the end of the war. When the actor got out of the army, the purchasing power of the dollar had so diminished that performance of the contract would have been substantially burdensome to him. Therefore, the contract was discharged.

Commercial Impracticability When a supervening event does not render performance objectively impossible, but does make it much more difficult or expensive to perform, the courts may excuse the parties' obligations under the contract. For someone to invoke the doctrine of commercial impracticability successfully, however, the anticipated performance must become significantly more difficult or costly than originally contemplated at the time the contract was formed.¹⁹

The added burden of performing not only must be extreme but also must not have been known by the parties when the contract was made. In one case, for example, the court allowed a party to rescind a contract for the sale of land because of a potential problem with contaminated groundwater under the land. The court found that "the potential for substantial and unbargained-for" liability made contract performance economically impracticable. Interestingly, the court in that case also noted that the possibility of "environmental degradation with consequences extending well beyond the parties' land sale" was just as important to its decision as the economic considerations.²⁰

The contract dispute in the following case arose out of the cancellation of a wedding reception due to a power failure. Is a power failure sufficient to invoke the doctrine of commercial impracticability?

16. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Sections 262–266; UCC 2–615.

17. M. J. Paquet, Inc. v. New Jersey Department of Transportation, 171 N.J. 378, 794 A.2d 141 (2002).

18. 30 Cal.2d 144, 180 P.2d 888 (1947).

19. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 264.

20. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 305 Mont. 513, 29 P.3d 1011 (2001).

C A S E 17.3 Facto v. Pantagis

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 2007. 390 N.J.Super. 227, 915 A.2d 59.
lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/search.shtm^a

• Background and Facts Leo and Elizabeth Facto contracted with Snuffy Pantagis Enterprises, Inc., for the use of Pantagis Renaissance, a banquet hall in Scotch Plains, New Jersey, for a wedding reception in August 2002. The Factos paid the $10,578 price in advance. The contract excused Pantagis from performance “if it is prevented from doing so by an act of God (for example, flood, power failure, etc.), or other unforeseen events or circumstances.” Soon after the reception began, there was a power failure. The lights and the air-conditioning shut off. The band hired for the reception refused to play without electricity to power their instruments, and the lack of lighting prevented the photographer and videographer from taking pictures. The temperature was in the 90s, the humidity was high, and the guests quickly became uncomfortable. Three hours later, after a fight between a guest and a Pantagis employee, the emergency lights began to fade, and the police evacuated the hall. The Factos filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Pantagis, alleging breach of contract, among other things. The Factos sought to recover their prepayment, plus amounts paid to the band, the photographer, and the videographer. The court concluded that Pantagis did not breach the contract and dismissed the complaint. The Factos appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

SKILLMAN, P. J.A.D. [Presiding Judge, Appellate Division]

* * * *

Even if a contract does not expressly provide that a party will be relieved of the duty to perform if an unforeseen condition arises that makes performance impracticable, a court may relieve him of that duty if performance has unexpectedly become impracticable as a result of a supervening event. *In deciding whether a party should be relieved of the duty to perform a contract, a court must determine whether the existence of a specific thing is necessary for the performance of a duty and its * * * destruction or * * * deterioration * * * makes performance impracticable.* * * * [A] power failure is the kind of unexpected occurrence that may relieve a party of the duty to perform if the availability of electricity is essential for satisfactory performance. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The * * * Pantagis Renaissance contract provided: “Snuffy’s will be excused from performance under this contract if it is prevented from doing so by an act of God (e.g., flood, power failure, etc.), or other unforeseen events or circumstances.” Thus, the contract specifically identified a “power failure” as one of the circumstances that would excuse the Pantagis Renaissance’s performance. We do not attribute any significance to the fact the * * * clause refers to a power failure as an example of an “act of God.” This term has been construed to refer not just to natural events such as storms but to comprehend all misfortunes and accidents arising from inevitable necessity which human prudence could not foresee or prevent. Furthermore, the * * * clause in the Pantagis Renaissance contract excuses performance not only for “acts of God” but also “other unforeseen events or circumstances.” Consequently, even if a power failure caused by circumstances other than a natural event were not considered to be an “act of God,” it still would constitute an unforeseen event or circumstance that would excuse performance. [Emphasis added.]

The fact that a power failure is not absolutely unforeseeable during the hot summer months does not preclude relief from the obligation to perform. * * * [A]bsolute unforeseeability of a condition is not a prerequisite to the defense of impracticability. The party seeking to be relieved of the duty to perform only needs to show that the destruction, or * * * deterioration of a specific thing necessary for the performance of the contract makes performance impracticable. In this case, the Pantagis Renaissance sought to eliminate any possible doubt that the availability of electricity was a specific thing necessary for the wedding reception by specifically referring to a “power failure” as an example of an “act of God” that would excuse performance. [Emphasis added.]

a. In the “Search by party name” section, select the “Appellate Division,” type “Pantagis” in the “First Name:” box, and click on “Submit Form.” In the result, click on the “click here to get this case” link to access the opinion. The Rutgers University School of Law in Camden, New Jersey, maintains this Web site.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 17.3 CONTINUED

It is also clear that the Pantagis Renaissance was “prevented from” substantial performance of the contract. The power failure began less than forty-five minutes after the start of the reception and continued until after it was scheduled to end. The lack of electricity prevented the band from playing, impeded the taking of pictures by the photographer and videographer and made it difficult for guests to see inside the banquet hall. Most significantly, the shutdown of the air conditioning system made it unbearably hot shortly after the power failure began. It is also undisputed that the power failure was an area-wide event that was beyond the Pantagis Renaissance’s control. These are precisely the kind of circumstances under which the parties agreed * * * [in their contract] that the Pantagis Renaissance would be excused from performance. * * *

* * * Where one party to a contract is excused from performance as a result of an unforeseen event that makes performance impracticable, the other party is also generally excused from performance. * * *

* * * Therefore, the power failure that relieved the Pantagis Renaissance of the obligation to furnish plaintiffs with a wedding reception also relieved plaintiffs of the obligation to pay the contract price for the reception.

Nevertheless, since the Pantagis Renaissance partially performed the contract by starting the reception before the power failure, it is entitled * * * to recover the value of the services it provided to plaintiffs.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court agreed that the power failure relieved Pantagis of its contractual obligation, but held that Pantagis’s inability to perform also relieved the Factos of their obligation. The court reversed the dismissal and remanded the case for an award to the Factos of the amount of their prepayment less the value of the services they received.

● The Ethical Dimension Should Pantagis have offered to reschedule the reception? Would this have absolved Pantagis of the obligation to refund the Factos’ prepayment? Explain.

● The Legal Environment Dimension Does a power failure always constitute the kind of unexpected occurrence that relieves a party of the duty to perform a contract? In what circumstances might a power failure have no effect on a contract? (Hint: Is electricity always necessary for the performance of a contract?)

Frustration of Purpose A theory closely allied with the doctrine of commercial impracticability is the doctrine of frustration of purpose. In principle, a contract will be discharged if supervening circumstances make it impossible to attain the purpose both parties had in mind when making the contract. As with commercial impracticability and impossibility, the supervening event must not have been reasonably foreseeable at the time of the contracting. In contrast to impracticability, which usually involves an event that increases the cost or difficulty of performance, frustration of purpose typically involves an event that decreases the value of what a party receives under the contract.

Because many problems are foreseeable by contracting parties and value is subjective, courts rarely excuse contract performance on this basis. For example, in one case, New Beginnings was searching for a new location for its drug rehabilitation center. After receiving preliminary approval for the use of a particular building from the city zoning official, New Beginnings signed a three-year lease on the property. Then opposition from the community developed, and the city denied New Beginnings a permit to use the property for a rehab center. New Beginnings appealed the decision and eventually received a permit from the city, but by then the state was threatening to rescind all state contracts with New Beginnings if it moved into that location. Because New Beginnings would lose its funding if it actually moved onto the property, the value of the leased building was practically worthless. Nevertheless, the court refused to excuse New

EXHIBIT 17-1 • Contract Discharge

Beginnings from the lease contract on the ground of frustration of purpose because the situation was reasonably foreseeable.²¹

See Exhibit 17-1 for a summary of the ways in which a contract may be discharged.

21. Adbar, L.C. v. New Beginnings C-Star, 103 S.W.3d 799 (Mo.App. 2003).

REVIEWING Performance and Discharge

Val's Foods signs a contract to buy 1,500 pounds of basil from Sun Farms, a small organic herb grower, as long as an independent organization inspects the crop and certifies that it contains no pesticide or herbicide residue. Val's has a contract with several restaurant chains to supply pesto and intends to use Sun Farms' basil in the pesto to fulfill these contracts. While Sun Farms is preparing to harvest the basil, an unexpected hailstorm destroys half the crop. Sun Farms attempts to purchase additional basil from other farms, but it is late in the season and the price is twice the normal market price. Sun Farms is too small to absorb this cost and immediately notifies Val's that it will not fulfill the contract. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Suppose that the basil does not pass the chemical-residue inspection. Which concept discussed in the chapter might allow Val's to refuse to perform the contract in this situation?
2. Under which legal theory or theories might Sun Farms claim that its obligation under the contract has been discharged by operation of law? Discuss fully.
3. Suppose that Sun Farms contacts every basil grower in the country and buys the last remaining chemical-free basil anywhere. Nevertheless, Sun Farms is able to ship only 1,475 pounds to Val's. Would this fulfill Sun Farms' obligations to Val's? Why or why not?
4. Now suppose that Sun Farms sells its operations to Happy Valley Farms. As a part of the sale, all three parties agree that Happy Valley will provide the basil as stated under the original contract. What is this type of agreement called?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

anticipatory repudiation 343
breach of contract 341 commercial impracticability 346

concurrent conditions 338 condition 337 condition precedent 337 condition subsequent 338 discharge 337
discharge in bankruptcy 345 frustration of purpose 348 impossibility of performance 345 mutual rescission 344 novation 344 performance 337 tender 338

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

17-1. The Caplans own a real estate lot, and they contract with Faithful Construction, Inc., to build a house on it for $360,000. The specifications list “all plumbing bowls and fixtures . . . to be Crane brand.” The Caplans leave on vacation, and during their absence Faithful is unable to buy and install Crane plumbing fixtures. Instead, Faithful installs Kohler brand fixtures, an equivalent in the industry. On completion of the building contract, the Caplans inspect the work, discover the substitution, and refuse to accept the house, claiming Faithful has breached the conditions set forth in the specifications. Discuss fully the Caplans’ claim.

17-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Junior owes creditor Iba $1,000, which is due and payable on June 1. Junior has been in a car accident, has missed a great deal of work, and consequently will not have the funds on June 1. Junior’s father, Fred, offers to pay Iba $1,100 in four equal installments if Iba will discharge Junior from any further liability on the debt. Iba accepts. Is this transaction a novation or an accord and satisfaction? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 17-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

17-3. ABC Clothiers, Inc., has a contract with Taylor & Sons, a retailer, to deliver one thousand summer suits to Taylor’s place of business on or before May 1. On April 1, Taylor senior receives a letter from ABC informing him that ABC will not be able to make the delivery as scheduled. Taylor is very upset, as he had planned a big ad campaign. He wants to file a suit against ABC immediately (on April 2). Taylor’s son Tom tells his father that filing a lawsuit is not proper until ABC actually fails to deliver the suits on May 1. Discuss fully who is correct, Taylor or Tom.

17-4. In the following situations, certain events take place after the contracts are formed. Discuss which of these contracts are discharged because the events render the contracts impossible to perform.

- Jimenez, a famous singer, contracts to perform in your nightclub. He dies prior to performance.
- Raglione contracts to sell you her land. Just before title is to be transferred, she dies.
- Oppenheim contracts to sell you one thousand bushels of apples from her orchard in the state of Washington. Because of a severe frost, she is unable to deliver the apples.
- Maxwell contracts to lease a service station for ten years. His principal income is from the sale of gasoline. Because of an oil embargo by foreign oil-producing nations, gasoline is rationed, cutting sharply into Maxwell’s gasoline sales. He cannot make his lease payments.

17-5. Heublein, Inc., makes wines and distilled spirits. Tarrant Distributors, Inc., agreed to distribute Heublein brands. When problems arose, the parties entered mediation. Under a settlement agreement, Heublein agreed to pay Tarrant the amount of its “net loss” as determined by Coopers & Lybrand, an accounting firm, according to a specified formula. The parties agreed that Coopers & Lybrand’s calculation would be “final and binding.” Heublein disagreed with Coopers & Lybrand’s calculation, however, and refused to pay. The parties asked a court to rule on the dispute. Heublein argued that the settlement agreement included an implied condition precedent that Coopers & Lybrand would correctly apply the specified formula before Heublein would be obligated to pay. Tarrant pointed to the clause stating that the calculation would be “final and binding.” With whom will the court agree, and why?

17-6. Performance. In May 1996, O’Brien-Shiepe Funeral Home, Inc., in Hempstead, New York, hired Teramo & Co. to build an addition to O’Brien’s funeral home. The parties’ contract did not specify a date for the completion of the work. The city of Hempstead issued a building permit for the project on June 14, and Teramo began work about two weeks later. There was some delay in construction because O'Brien asked that no construction be done during funeral services, but by the end of March 1997, the work was substantially complete. The city of Hempstead issued a "Certificate of Completion" on April 15. During the construction, O'Brien made periodic payments to Teramo, but there was a balance due of $17,950, which O'Brien did not pay. To recover this amount, Teramo filed a suit in a New York state court against O'Brien. O'Brien filed a counterclaim to recover lost profits for business allegedly lost due to the time Teramo took to build the addition and for $6,180 spent to correct problems caused by poor craftsmanship. Which, if any, party is entitled to an award in this case? Explain. [Teramo & Co. v. O'Brien-Shiepe Funeral Home, Inc., 725 N.Y.S.2d 87 (A.D. 2 Dept. 2001)]

17-7. Substantial Performance. Adolf and Ida Krueger contracted with Pisani Construction, Inc., to erect a metal building as an addition to an existing structure. The two structures were to share a common wall, and the frames and panel heights of the new building were to match those of the existing structure. Shortly before completion of the project, however, it was apparent that the roofline of the new building was approximately three inches higher than that of the existing structure. Pisani modified the ridge caps of the buildings to blend the rooflines. The discrepancy had other consequences, however, including misalignment of the gutters and windows of the two buildings, which resulted in an icing problem in the winter. The Kruegers occupied the new structure but refused to make the last payment under the contract. Pisani filed a suit in a Connecticut state court to collect. Did Pisani substantially perform its obligations? Should the Kruegers be ordered to pay? Why or why not? [Pisani Construction, Inc. v. Krueger, 68 Conn.App. 361, 791 A.2d 634 (2002)]

17-8. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Train operators and other railroad personnel use signaling systems to ensure safe train travel. Reading Blue Mountain & Northern Railroad Co. (RBMN) and Norfolk Southern Railway Co. entered into a contract for the maintenance of a signaling system that serviced a stretch of track near Jim Thorpe, Pennsylvania. The system included a series of poles, similar to telephone poles, suspending wires above the tracks. The contract provided that "the intent of the parties is to maintain the existing . . . facilities" and split the cost equally. In December 2002, a severe storm severed the wires and destroyed most of the poles. RBMN and Norfolk discussed replacing the old system, which they agreed was antiquated, inefficient, dangerous to rebuild, and expensive, but they could not agree on an alternative. Norfolk installed an entirely new system and filed a suit in a federal district court against RBMN to recover half of the cost. RBMN filed a motion for summary judgment, asserting, in part, the doctrine of frustration of purpose. What is this doctrine? Does it apply in this case? How should the court rule on RBMN's motion? Explain. [Norfolk Southern Railway Co. v. Reading Blue Mountain & Northern Railroad Co., 364 F.Supp.2d 270 (M.D.Pa. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 17-8, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 17," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

17-9. Material Breach. Kermit Johnson formed FB&I Building Products, Inc., in Watertown, South Dakota, to sell building materials. In December 1998, FB&I contracted with Superior Truss & Components in Minneota, Minnesota, "to exclusively sell Superior's open-faced wall panels, floor panels, roof trusses and other miscellaneous products." In March 2000, FB&I agreed to exclusively sell Component Manufacturing Co.'s building products in Colorado. Two months later, Superior learned of FB&I's deal with Component and terminated its contract with FB&I. That contract provided that on cancellation, "FB&I will be entitled to retain the customers that they continue to sell and service with Superior products." Superior refused to honor this provision. Between the cancellation of FB&I's contract and 2004, Superior made $2,327,528 in sales to FB&I customers without paying a commission. FB&I filed a suit in a South Dakota state court against Superior, alleging, in part, breach of contract and seeking the unpaid commissions. Superior insisted that FB&I had materially breached their contract, excusing Superior from performing. In whose favor should the court rule and why? [FB&I Building Products, Inc. v. Superior Truss & Components, a Division of Banks Lumber, Inc., 2007 SD 13, 727 N.W.2d 474 (2007)]

17-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

King County, Washington, hired Frank Coluccio Construction Co. (FCCC) to act as general contractor for a public works project involving the construction of a small utility tunnel under the Duwamish Waterway. FCCC hired Donald B. Murphy Contractors, Inc. (DBM), as a subcontractor. DBM was responsible for constructing an access shaft at the eastern end of the tunnel. Problems arose during construction, including a "blow-in" of the access shaft that caused it to fill with water, soil, and debris. FCCC and DBM incurred substantial expenses from the repairs and delays. Under the project contract, King County was supposed to buy an insurance policy to "insure against physical loss or damage by perils included under an 'All-Risk' Builder's Risk policy." Any claim under this policy was to be filed through the insured. King County, which had general property damage insurance, did not obtain an all-risk builder's risk policy. For the losses attributable to the blow-in, FCCC and DBM submitted builder's risk claims, which the county denied. FCCC filed a suit in a Washington state court against King County, alleging, among other claims, breach of contract. [Frank Coluccio Construction Co. v. King County, 136 Wash.App. 751, 150 P.3d 1147 (Div. 1 2007)]

- (a) King County's property damage policy specifically excluded, at the county's request, coverage of tunnels. The county drafted its contract with FCCC to require the all-risk builder's risk policy and authorize itself to "sponsor" claims. When FCCC and DBM filed their claims, the county secretly colluded with its property damage insurer to deny payment. What do these facts indicate about the county's ethics and legal liability in this situation?
- (b) Could DBM, as a third party to the contract between King County and FCCC, maintain an action on the contract against King County? Discuss.
- (c) All-risk insurance is a promise to pay on the "fortuitous" happening of a loss or damage from any cause except those that are specifically excluded. Payment usually is not made on a loss that, at the time the insurance was obtained, the claimant subjectively knew would occur. If a loss results from faulty workmanship on the part of a contractor, should the obligation to pay under an all-risk policy be discharged? Explain.

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For a summary of how contracts may be discharged and other principles of contract law, go to www.rnoon.com/law_for_laymen/contracts/performance.html

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 17" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 17-1: Legal Perspective
Anticipatory Repudiation

Internet Exercise 17-2: Management Perspective
Commercial Impracticability

CHAPTER 18

Breach of Contract and Remedies

When one party breaches a contract, the other party—the nonbreaching party—can choose one or more of several remedies. A remedy is the relief provided for an innocent party when the other party has breached the contract. It is the means employed to enforce a right or to redress an injury.

The most common remedies available to a nonbreaching party include damages, rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation. As discussed in Chapter 1, a distinction is made between remedies at law and remedies in equity. Today, the remedy at law is normally monetary damages, which are discussed in the first part of this chapter. Equitable remedies include rescission and restitution, specific performance, and reformation, all of which will be examined later in the chapter. Usually, a court will not award an equitable remedy unless the remedy at law is inadequate. Special legal doctrines and concepts relating to remedies will be discussed in the final pages of this chapter.

Damages

A breach of contract entitles the nonbreaching party to sue for monetary damages. As discussed in Chapter 6, damages are designed to compensate a party for harm suffered as a result of another's wrongful act. In the context of contract law, damages compensate the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain. Often, courts say that innocent parties are to be placed in the position they would have occupied had the contract been fully performed.¹

Realize at the outset, though, that collecting damages through a court judgment requires litigation, which can be expensive and time consuming. Also keep in mind that court judgments are often difficult to enforce, particularly if the breaching party does not have sufficient assets to pay the damages awarded (as discussed in Chapter 3). For these reasons, the majority of actions for damages (or other remedies) are settled by the parties before trial.

Types of Damages

There are basically four broad categories of damages:

1. Compensatory (to cover direct losses and costs).
2. Consequential (to cover indirect and foreseeable losses).
3. Punitive (to punish and deter wrongdoing).
4. Nominal (to recognize wrongdoing when no monetary loss is shown).

Compensatory and punitive damages were discussed in Chapter 6 in the context of tort law. Here, we look at these types of damages, as well as consequential and nominal damages, in the context of contract law.

Compensatory Damages Damages compensating the nonbreaching party for the loss of the bargain are known as compensatory damages. These damages compensate the injured party only for damages actually sustained and proved to have arisen directly from the loss of the bargain caused by the breach of contract. They simply replace what was lost because of the wrong or damage and, for this reason, are often said to “make the person whole.”

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 347; Section 1-106(1) of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).

The standard measure of compensatory damages is the difference between the value of the breaching party’s promised performance under the contract and the value of her or his actual performance. This amount is reduced by any loss that the injured party has avoided, however.

To illustrate: Wilcox contracts to perform certain services exclusively for Hernandez during the month of March for $4,000. Hernandez cancels the contract and is in breach. Wilcox is able to find another job during the month of March but can earn only $3,000. He can sue Hernandez for breach and recover $1,000 as compensatory damages. Wilcox can also recover from Hernandez the amount that he spent to find the other job. Expenses that are caused directly by a breach of contract—such as those incurred to obtain performance from another source—are known as incidental damages.

The measurement of compensatory damages varies by type of contract. Certain types of contracts deserve special mention. They are contracts for the sale of goods, land contracts, and construction contracts.

Sale of Goods. In a contract for the sale of goods, the usual measure of compensatory damages is an amount equal to the difference between the contract price and the market price.² For example, suppose that Chrylon Corporation contracts to buy ten model UTS network servers from an XEXO Corporation dealer for $8,000 each. The dealer, however, fails to deliver the ten servers to Chrylon. The market price of the servers at the time the buyer learns of the breach is $8,150. Therefore, Chrylon’s measure of damages is $1,500 ($10 \times \150) plus any incidental damages (expenses) caused by the breach. In a situation in which the buyer breaches and the seller has not yet produced the goods, compensatory damages normally equal lost profits on the sale, not the difference between the contract price and the market price.

2. In other words, the amount is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place at which the goods were to be delivered or tendered. See UCC 2-708 and 2-713.

Sale of Land. Ordinarily, because each parcel of land is unique, the remedy for a seller’s breach of a contract for a sale of real estate is specific performance—that is, the buyer is awarded the parcel of property for which she or he bargained (specific performance is discussed more fully later in this chapter). When this remedy is unavailable (for example, when the seller has sold the property to someone else), or when the buyer has breached, the measure of damages is ordinarily the same as in contracts for the sale of goods—that is, the difference between the contract price and the market price of the land. The majority of states follow this rule.

A minority of states follow a different rule when the seller breaches the contract and the breach is not deliberate.³ When the breach was not willful, these states limit the prospective buyer’s damages to a refund of any down payment made plus any expenses incurred (such as fees for title searches, attorneys, and escrows). This rule effectively returns purchasers to the positions they occupied prior to the sale, rather than giving them the benefit of the bargain.

Construction Contracts. The measure of damages in a building or construction contract varies depending on which party breaches and when the breach occurs. The owner can breach at three different stages of the construction:

1. Before performance has begun.
2. During performance.
3. After performance has been completed.

If the owner breaches before performance has begun, the contractor can recover only the profits that would have been made on the contract (that is, the total contract price less the cost of materials and labor). If the owner breaches during performance, the contractor can recover the profits plus the costs incurred in partially constructing the building. If the owner breaches after the construction has been completed, the contractor can recover the entire contract price, plus interest.

When the construction contractor breaches the contract either by failing to undertake construction or by stopping work partway through the project, the mea-

3. “Deliberate” breaches include the seller’s failure to convey the land because the market price has gone up. “Nondeliberate” breaches include the seller’s failure to convey the land because of a problem with the title, such as the discovery of an unknown easement that gives another a right of use over the property (see Chapter 48).

EXHIBIT 18-1 • Measurement of Damages—Breach of Construction Contracts

Party in Breach	Time of Breach	Measurement of Damage
Owner	Before construction has begun	Profits (contract price less cost of materials and labor)
Owner	During construction	Profits, plus costs incurred up to time of breach
Owner	After construction is completed	Contract price, plus interest
Contractor	Before construction has begun	Cost above contract price to complete work
Contractor	Before construction is completed	Generally, all costs incurred by owner to complete work sure of damages is the cost of completion, which includes reasonable compensation for any delay in performance. If the contractor finishes late, the measure of damages is the loss of use. These rules concerning the measurement of damages in breached construction contracts are summarized in Exhibit 18-1.

Construction Contracts and Economic Waste. If the contractor substantially performs, a court may use the cost-of-completion formula, but only if requiring completion will not entail unreasonable economic waste. Economic waste occurs when the cost of repairing or completing the performance as required by the contract greatly outweighs the benefit to the owner. For example, suppose that a contractor discovers that it will cost $20,000 to move a large coral rock eleven inches as specified in the contract. Because changing the rock's position will alter the appearance of the project only a trifle, a court would likely conclude that full completion would involve economic waste. Thus, the contractor will not be required to pay the full $20,000 to complete performance.

Consequential Damages Foreseeable damages that result from a party's breach of contract are called consequential damages, or special damages. They differ from compensatory damages in that they are caused by special circumstances beyond the contract itself. They flow from the consequences, or results, of a breach.

For example, when a seller fails to deliver goods, knowing that the buyer is planning to use or resell those goods immediately, consequential damages are awarded for the loss of profits from the planned resale. (The buyer will also recover compensatory damages for the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods.)

To recover consequential damages, the breaching party must know (or have reason to know) that special circumstances will cause the nonbreaching party to suffer an additional loss. This rule was enunciated in the classic case of Hadley v. Baxendale, which is presented next. In reading this decision, it is helpful to understand that in the mid-1800s in England large flour mills customarily kept more than one crankshaft on hand in the event that the main crankshaft broke and had to be repaired. Also, in those days it was common knowledge that flour mills did indeed have spare crankshafts. It is against this background that the parties in the case presented here argued their respective positions on whether the damages resulting from the loss of profits while the crankshaft was repaired were reasonably foreseeable.

CASE 18.1 Hadley v. Baxendale

Court of Exchequer, 1854. 156 Eng.Rep. 145.

- Background and Facts The Hadleys (the plaintiffs) ran a flour mill in Gloucester. The crankshaft attached to the steam engine in the mill broke, causing the mill to shut down. The shaft had to be sent to a foundry located in Greenwich so that the new shaft could be made to fit the other parts of the engine. Baxendale, the defendant, was a common carrier that transported the shaft from Gloucester to

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 18.1 CONTINUED

Greenwich. The freight charges were collected in advance, and Baxendale promised to deliver the shaft the following day. It was not delivered for a number of days, however. As a consequence, the mill was closed for several days. The Hadleys sued to recover the profits lost during that time. Baxendale contended that the loss of profits was “too remote” to be recoverable. The court held for the plaintiffs, and the jury was allowed to take into consideration the lost profits. The defendant appealed.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
ALDERSON, B.

* * * *

* * * Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. * * * Now, in the present case, if we are to apply the principles above laid down, we find that the only circumstances here communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants at the time the contract was made, were, that the article to be carried was the broken shaft of a mill, and that the plaintiffs were the millers of that mill. * * * [S]pecial circumstances were here never communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants. It follows, therefore, that the loss of profits here cannot reasonably be considered such a consequence of the breach of contract as could have been fairly and reasonably contemplated by both the parties when they made this contract. [Emphasis added.]

- Decision and Remedy The Court of Exchequer ordered a new trial. According to the court, to collect consequential damages, the plaintiffs would have to have given express notice of the special circumstances that caused the loss of profits.
- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This case established the rule that when damages are awarded, compensation is given only for those injuries that the defendant could reasonably have foreseen as a probable result of the usual course of events following a breach. Today, the rule enunciated by the court in this case still applies. To recover consequential damages, the plaintiff must show that the defendant had reason to know or foresee that a particular loss or injury would occur.
- The E-Commerce Dimension If a Web merchant loses business due to a computer system's failure that can be attributed to malfunctioning software, can the merchant recover the lost profits from the software maker? Explain.

Punitive Damages Punitive, or exemplary, damages generally are not recoverable in contract law, even for an intentional breach of contract. Because punitive damages are designed to punish a wrongdoer and set an example to deter similar conduct in the future, they have no legitimate place in contract law. A contract is simply a civil relationship between the parties, so breaching a contract is not a crime; nor does it necessarily harm society (as torts do). Thus, a court will not award punitive damages but will compensate one party for the loss of the bargain—no more and no less.

In a few situations, however, when a person's actions constitute both a breach of contract and a tort, punitive damages may be available. For example, some parties, such as an engineer and her client, may establish by contract a certain reasonable standard or duty of care. Failure to live up to that standard is a breach of contract, and the act itself may constitute negligence. Similarly, some intentional torts, such as fraud, may be tied to a breach of the terms of a contract and enable the injured party to seek punitive damages. Additionally, when an insurance company exhibits bad faith in failing to settle a claim on behalf of the insured party, courts may award punitive damages. Overall, though, punitive damages are almost never available in contract disputes.

Nominal Damages When no actual damage or financial loss results from a breach of contract and only a technical injury is involved, the court may award nominal damages to the innocent party. Awards of nominal damages are often small, such as one dollar, but they do establish that the defendant acted wrongfully. Most lawsuits for nominal damages are brought as a matter of principle under the theory that a breach has occurred and some damages must be imposed regardless of actual loss.

For example, suppose that Jackson contracts to buy potatoes from Stanley at fifty cents a pound. Stanley breaches the contract and does not deliver the potatoes. In the meantime, the price of potatoes has fallen. Jackson is able to buy them in the open market at half the price he contracted for with Stanley. He is clearly better off because of Stanley's breach. Thus, because Jackson sustained only a technical injury and suffered no monetary loss, he is likely to be awarded only nominal damages if he brings a suit for breach of contract.

Mitigation of Damages

In most situations, when a breach of contract occurs, the innocent injured party is held to a duty to mitigate, or reduce, the damages that he or she suffers. Under this doctrine of mitigation of damages, the duty owed depends on the nature of the contract.

For example, some states require a landlord to use reasonable means to find a new tenant if a tenant abandons the premises and fails to pay rent. If an acceptable tenant becomes available, the landlord is required to lease the premises to this tenant to mitigate the damages recoverable from the former tenant. The former tenant is still liable for the difference between the amount of the rent under the original lease and the rent received from the new tenant. If the landlord has not taken the reasonable steps necessary to find a new tenant, a court will likely reduce any award made by the amount of rent the landlord could have received had such reasonable means been used.

In the majority of states, a person whose employment has been wrongfully terminated owes a duty to mitigate the damages suffered because of the employer's breach of the employment contract. In other words, a wrongfully terminated employee has a duty to take a similar job if one is available. If the employee fails to do this, the damages awarded will be equivalent to the person's salary less the income he or she would have received in a similar job obtained by reasonable means. The employer has the burden of proving that such a job existed and that the employee could have been hired. Normally, the employee is under no duty to take a job of a different type and rank, however.

Whether a tenant farmer acceptably attempted to mitigate his damages on his landlord's breach of their lease was at issue in the following case.

EXTENDED CASE 18.2

Hanson v. Boeder

Supreme Court of North Dakota, 2007. 2007 ND 20, 727 N.W.2d 280.
www.ndcourts.com/court/opinions.htm^a

MARING, Justice.

* * * *

In 1998, [Paul] Hanson signed a five-year lease to farm approximately 1,350 tillable acres of [Douglas] Boeder's farmland in Steele County [North Dakota] for $50 per acre beginning with the 1999 crop year. The lease also allowed Hanson use of grain bins with a capacity of 93,000 bushels and two machine sheds located on the property. The lease addressed * * * the requirement that Hanson farm the land in a good and farmerlike manner:

* * * *

[Hanson] agrees to farm the land in a good and farmerlike manner and also agrees to leave the land tilled in the same manner as when he received it.

a. Click on the "By ND citation" link. In the result, click on "2007" and then the name of the case to access the opinion. The North Dakota Supreme Court maintains this Web site.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 18.2 CONTINUED

Hanson was required to pay cash rent of $67,515 per year, with half due on April 1st, and the balance due on November 1st. In 2003, Boeder and Hanson renewed the lease for another five-year period ending in 2008.

During the leases, Boeder and Hanson disagreed about Hanson's farming practices, but in 2004 and 2005 their disagreements escalated. On August 2, 2005, Boeder told Hanson he had enough of Hanson's farming practices, the lease was over, and he had leased the land to someone else. Boeder also told Hanson not to do the fall tillage because the new tenant wanted to do the work himself.

Hanson sued Boeder [in a North Dakota state court], alleging Boeder intended to breach the contract by leasing the land to a third party. Hanson * * * requested all damages caused by Boeder's breach of the lease. * * * During this time, Hanson continued to farm the land and completed the 2005 fall tillage * * * .

After a February 2006 bench trial [a trial before a judge or judges only], the * * * court found Boeder's statement to Hanson that the lease was over and he had found a new tenant constituted an anticipatory repudiation of the lease. The court * * * [found that] Boeder's repudiation was not justified because Hanson had farmed the land in a "good and farmerlike manner," and had not breached the lease. The court awarded Hanson $315,194.26 in damages and costs for lost profits, lost use of the grain bins and machine sheds, and the value of the fall tillage. [Boeder appealed to the North Dakota Supreme Court.]

* * * *

Boeder argues the [lower] court misapplied the law by failing to apply the doctrine of avoidable consequences [mitigation] to reduce Hanson's damages. He claims Hanson did not mitigate his damages because Hanson had an opportunity to continue farming the Boeder land, which would have substantially reduced his damages, and chose not to.

* * * *

* * * For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except when otherwise expressly provided by the laws of this state, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby or which in the ordinary course of things would be likely to result therefrom. No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract if they are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin. [Emphasis added.]

A person injured by the wrongful acts of another has a duty to mitigate or minimize the damages and must protect himself if he can do so with reasonable exertion or at trifling expense, and can recover from the delinquent party only such damages as he could not, with reasonable effort, have avoided. The duty to mitigate damages is sometimes referred to as the doctrine of avoidable consequences. [Emphasis added.]

The [lower] court found that Hanson tried to mitigate his damages by looking for other farmland to rent, but was unsuccessful. The court also found that Hanson was farming 4,000 acres including the land he leased from Boeder, but had the manpower and equipment to farm up to 5,000 acres. The court concluded that even if Hanson was able to find other farmland to rent, it would not have been replacement land but land to expand his farming operation, and therefore it would not have reduced his damages.

The evidence presented at trial supports the court's findings. Hanson testified that he was not aware of any farmland available for rent and he ran advertisements in the local newspapers looking for farmland to rent. He also testified that during the course of the lease, he was farming a total of 4,000 acres but he had the ability to farm 5,000 acres, and he was always looking for more land to rent to expand his farming operation.

Boeder agrees that Hanson attempted to find other farmland to rent and admits he did not present any evidence to rebut Hanson's claim that he was unable to find any other land available to rent. * * *

* * * *

* * * We * * * conclude the [lower] court did not misapply the law in finding Hanson attempted to mitigate his damages. The evidence supports the court's findings on lost profits, and we are not left with a definite and firm conviction the court made a mistake in awarding Hanson damages for lost profits.

* * * *

We affirm the judgment.

CASE 18.2 CONTINUED

QUESTIONS

1. During the trial, Boeder tried to retract his repudiation of the lease to allow Hanson to continue farming for the rest of the lease term. Should the court have considered this an acceptable substitute to mitigate Hanson's damages? Why or why not?
2. Hanson initially asked the lower court to enforce the contract and requested damages only in the alternative—that is, only if specific performance was not available (pleading in the alternative is discussed later in this chapter). Could the court have awarded Hanson specific performance of the lease in this case? Should that relief have been granted? Explain.

Liquidated Damages Provisions

A liquidated damages provision in a contract specifies that a certain dollar amount is to be paid in the event of a future default or breach of contract. (Liquidated means determined, settled, or fixed.) For example, a provision requiring a construction contractor to pay $300 for every day he or she is late in completing the project is a liquidated damages provision. Liquidated damages provisions are frequently used in construction contracts because it is difficult to estimate the amount of damages that would be caused by a delay in completion. They are also common in contracts for the sale of goods.⁴

Liquidated damages differ from penalties. A penalty specifies a certain amount to be paid in the event of a default or breach of contract and is designed to penalize the breaching party. Liquidated damages provisions normally are enforceable. In contrast, if a court finds that a provision calls for a penalty, the agreement as to the amount will not be enforced, and recovery will be limited to actual damages. To determine if a particular provision is for liquidated damages or for a penalty, the court asks two questions:

1. When the contract was entered into, was it apparent that damages would be difficult to estimate in the event of a breach?
2. Was the amount set as damages a reasonable estimate and not excessive?⁵

If the answers to both questions are yes, the provision normally will be enforced. If either answer is no, the provision normally will not be enforced. For example, in a case involving a sophisticated business contract to lease computer equipment, the court held that a liquidated damages provision that valued computer equipment at more than four times its market value was a reasonable estimate. According to the court, the amount of actual damages was difficult to ascertain at the time the contract was formed because of the “speculative nature of the value of computers at termination of lease schedules.”⁶

Rescission and Restitution

As discussed in Chapter 17, rescission is essentially an action to undo, or terminate, a contract—to return the contracting parties to the positions they occupied prior to the transaction.⁷ When fraud, a mistake, duress, undue influence, misrepresentation, or lack of capacity to contract is present, unilateral rescission is available. Rescission may also be available by statute.⁸ The failure of one party to perform entitles the other party to rescind the contract. The rescinding party must give prompt notice to the breaching party.

Restitution

Generally, to rescind a contract, both parties must make restitution to each other by returning goods, property, or funds previously conveyed.⁹ If the physical

4. Section 2-718(1) of the UCC specifically authorizes the use of liquidated damages provisions.

5. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 356(1).

6. Winthrop Resources Corp. v. Eaton Hydraulics, Inc., 361 F.3d 465 (8th Cir. 2004).

7. The rescission discussed here is unilateral rescission, in which only one party wants to undo the contract. In mutual rescission, both parties agree to undo the contract (see Chapter 17). Mutual rescission discharges the contract; unilateral rescission is generally available as a remedy for breach of contract.

8. The Federal Trade Commission and many states have rules or statutes allowing consumers to unilaterally rescind contracts made at home with door-to-door salespersons. Rescission is allowed within three days for any reason or for no reason at all. See, for example, California Civil Code Section 1689.5.

9. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 370.

property or goods can be returned, they must be. If the goods or property have been consumed, restitution must be made in an equivalent dollar amount.

Essentially, restitution involves the plaintiff's recapture of a benefit conferred on the defendant through which the defendant has been unjustly enriched. For example, Katie pays $10,000 to Bob in return for Bob's promise to design a house for her. The next day, Bob calls Katie and tells her that he has taken a position with a large architectural firm in another state and cannot design the house. Katie decides to hire another architect that afternoon. Katie can obtain restitution of the $10,000.

Restitution Is Not Limited to Rescission Cases

Restitution may be appropriate when a contract is rescinded, but the right to restitution is not limited to rescission cases. Because an award of restitution basically gives back or returns something to its rightful owner, this remedy may be sought in actions for breach of contract, tort actions, and other types of actions. For example, restitution can be obtained when funds or property has been transferred by mistake or because of fraud or incapacity. Restitution may also be available in situations involving embezzlement, conversion, theft, copyright infringement, or misconduct by a party in a confidential or other special relationship.

in the contract. It also avoids some of the problems inherent in a suit for damages. First, the nonbreaching party need not worry about collecting the judgment (see Chapter 3 for a discussion of the difficulties of enforcing court judgments). Second, the nonbreaching party need not look around for another contract. Third, the actual performance may be more valuable than the monetary damages.

Normally, however, specific performance will not be granted unless the party's legal remedy (monetary damages) is inadequate.¹⁰ For this reason, contracts for the sale of goods rarely qualify for specific performance. The legal remedy—monetary damages—is ordinarily adequate in such situations because substantially identical goods can be bought or sold in the market. Only if the goods are unique will a court grant specific performance. For example, paintings, sculptures, or rare books or coins are so unique that monetary damages will not enable a buyer to obtain substantially identical substitutes in the market.

Sale of Land

A court may grant specific performance to a buyer in an action for a breach of contract involving the sale of land. In this situation, the legal remedy of monetary damages may not compensate the buyer adequately because every parcel of land is unique: the same land in the same location obviously cannot be obtained elsewhere. Only when specific performance is unavailable (for example, when the seller has sold the property to someone else) will monetary damages be awarded instead.

Is specific performance warranted when one of the parties has substantially—but not fully—performed under the contract? That was the question in the following case.

10. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 359.

Specific Performance

The equitable remedy of specific performance calls for the performance of the act promised in the contract. This remedy is often attractive to a nonbreaching party because it provides the exact bargain promised

CASE 18.3 Stainbrook v. Low

Court of Appeals of Indiana, 2006. 842 N.E.2d 386.

- Background and Facts In April 2004, Howard Stainbrook agreed to sell to Trent Low forty acres of land in Jennings County, Indiana, for $45,000. Thirty-two of the acres were wooded and eight were tillable. Under the agreement, Low was to pay for a survey of the property and other costs, including a tax payment due in November. Low gave Stainbrook a check for $1,000 to show his intent to fulfill the contract. They agreed to close the deal on May 11, and Low made financial arrangements to meet his obligations. On May 8, a tractor rolled over on Stainbrook, and he died. Howard's son David became the executor of Stainbrook's estate. David asked Low to withdraw his offer to buy the forty acres. Low refused and filed a suit against David in an Indiana state court, seeking to enforce the contract. The court ordered specific performance. David appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, arguing, among other things, that his father's contract with Low was "ambiguous and inequitable."

CASE 18.3 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
VAIDIK, Judge.

* * * *

The Estate [David] * * * contends that Low failed to preserve the remedy of specific performance here because he failed to perform sufficiently under the Agreement. * * * [T]he Estate argues that "[i]n order to be entitled to specific performance, the claimant has the burden to prove full and complete performance on their part of the contract." Low * * * argues that specific performance was appropriate because he either substantially performed his obligations under the Agreement or offered to do so, and this, rather than full and complete performance, is all that is required to preserve a claim for specific performance.

We agree with Low. Because Low offered to perform his obligations under the Agreement, specific performance was a proper remedy. * * * [T]he Estate argues that Low is not entitled to the remedy of specific performance because he did not pay the November 2004 property taxes. Low, however, * * * offered to make the tax payment and the Estate refused his offer. * * *

The Estate also contends * * * that specific performance was inappropriate because Low failed to tender the purchase price listed in the Agreement and arrange for a survey of the land before the closing date. * * * [T]he Estate's argument assumes that a party may not be granted specific performance unless that party has fully and completely performed under the terms of the contract. *On the contrary, * * * specific performance is an appropriate remedy to a party who has substantially performed under the terms of the contract.* Regarding Low's payment of the purchase price, we note that Low * * * had obtained financing before the closing date, and there is nothing * * * to indicate that he was not prepared to meet his financial obligations at that time. Further, * * * shortly after Stainbrook's death, the Executor of the Estate requested that Low withdraw his offer, and Low declined to do so, indicating that he was prepared to go forward. Regarding Low's failure to order a land survey, the Estate presents no evidence to suggest that this matter, particularly in isolation, reaches the level of failure to perform under the Agreement, and we decline to sanction such a rule. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

The Estate finally argues that the trial court should not have awarded specific performance here because the Agreement between Low and Stainbrook was unfair. * * * [S]ince Low was twenty-two years old and Stainbrook was eighty-nine at the time of contract, and because the combined estimates of property and timber values was as high as $121,000.00 and Low and Stainbrook had agreed to a $45,000.00 purchase price, the Estate argues that the trial court should have found the contract to be unfair or unconscionable and to have found that Low would be unjustly enriched by its execution. * * *

* * * [T]he Estate stipulated at trial that Stainbrook was competent at the time of contract, and evidence was presented that Stainbrook consulted a lawyer regarding the Agreement and that he insisted upon several handwritten changes to the contract that benefited his own interests. We find no support for the Estate's contention that Stainbrook was anything less than a party entirely capable of entering into this Agreement, nor for its contention that the Agreement was unfair.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court held that specific performance was an appropriate remedy in this case and affirmed the lower court's order. The appellate court explained that a contracting party's substantial performance is sufficient to support a court's order for specific performance. Here, "Low both offered to perform and substantially performed his contractual obligations."

● The Ethical Dimension Should a party who seeks specific performance of a contract be required to prove that he or she has performed, substantially performed, or offered to perform his or her contract obligations? Why or why not?

● The Global Dimension Suppose that Stainbrook and Low had been citizens and residents of other countries. Would the location of the land that was the subject of their contract have been sufficient to support the Indiana state court's jurisdiction and award in this case? Discuss.

Contracts for Personal Services

Personal-service contracts require one party to work personally for another party. Courts normally refuse to grant specific performance of personal-service contracts because to order a party to perform personal services against his or her will amounts to a type of involuntary servitude.¹¹

Moreover, the courts do not want to have to monitor a service contract if supervision would be difficult—as it would be if the contract required the exercise of personal judgment or talent. For example, if you contracted with a brain surgeon to perform brain surgery on you and the surgeon refused to perform, the court would not compel (and you certainly would not want) the surgeon to perform under those circumstances. A court cannot assure meaningful performance in such a situation.¹² If a contract is not deemed personal, the remedy at law of monetary damages may be adequate if substantially identical service (for example, lawn mowing) is available from other persons.

Reformation

Reformation is an equitable remedy used when the parties have imperfectly expressed their agreement in writing. Reformation allows a court to rewrite the contract to reflect the parties' true intentions.

When Fraud or Mutual Mistake Is Present

Courts order reformation most often when fraud or mutual mistake (for example, a clerical error) is present. Typically, a party seeks reformation so that some other remedy may then be pursued. For example, if Keshan contracts to buy a certain parcel of land from Malboa but their contract mistakenly refers to a parcel of land different from the one being sold, the contract does not reflect the parties' intentions. Accordingly, a court can reform the contract so that it conforms to the parties' intentions and accurately refers to the par-

11. Involuntary servitude, or slavery, is contrary to the public policy expressed in the Thirteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. A court can, however, enter an order (injunction) prohibiting a person who breached a personal-service contract from engaging in similar contracts for a period of time in the future.

12. Similarly, courts often refuse to order specific performance of construction contracts because courts are not set up to operate as construction supervisors or engineers.

cel of land being sold. Keshan can then, if necessary, show that Malboa has breached the contract as reformed. She can at that time request an order for specific performance.

Oral Contracts and Covenants Not to Compete

Courts also frequently reform contracts in two other situations. The first involves two parties who have made a binding oral contract. They further agree to put the oral contract in writing, but in doing so, they make an error in stating the terms. Normally, a court will allow into evidence the correct terms of the oral contract, thereby reforming the written contract.

The second situation occurs when the parties have executed a written covenant not to compete (discussed in Chapter 13). If the covenant is for a valid and legitimate purpose (such as the sale of a business) but the area or time restraints of the covenant are unreasonable, some courts will reform the restraints by making them reasonable and will enforce the entire contract as reformed. Other courts, however, will throw out the entire restrictive covenant as illegal.

Exhibit 18-2 graphically summarizes the remedies, including reformation, that are available to the non-breaching party.

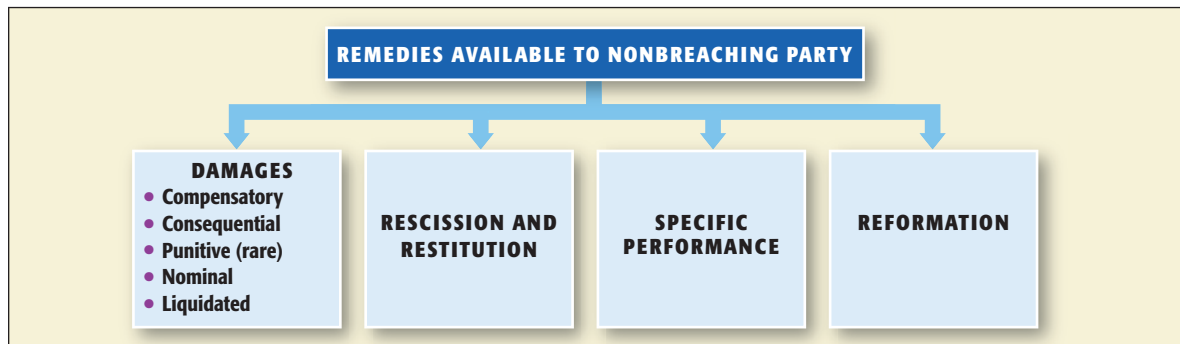

Recovery Based on Quasi Contract

Recall from Chapter 10 that quasi contract is not a true contract but rather a fictional contract that is imposed on the parties to prevent unjust enrichment. Hence, quasi contract provides a basis for relief when no enforceable contract exists. The legal obligation arises because the law considers that the party accepting the benefits has made an implied promise to pay for them. Generally, when one party has conferred a benefit on another party, justice requires the party receiving the benefit to pay the reasonable value for it. The party conferring the benefit can recover in quantum meruit, which means "as much as he or she deserves" (see Chapter 10).

When Quasi Contracts Are Used

In addition to being used when there is no actual contract or agreement between the parties, quasi contract may be available when the parties have a contract, but it is unenforceable for some reason. Quasi-contractual recovery is often granted when one party has partially performed under a contract that is unenforceable. It provides an alternative to suing for damages and allows the party to recover the reasonable value of the partial performance, measured in some cases according to the benefit received and in others according to the detriment suffered.

EXHIBIT 18-2 • Remedies for Breach of Contract

For example, suppose that Watson contracts to build two oil derricks for Energy Industries. The derricks are to be built over a period of three years, but the parties do not make a written contract. The Statute of Frauds will thus bar the enforcement of the contract.¹³ After Watson completes one derrick, Energy Industries informs him that it will not pay for the derrick. Watson can sue Energy Industries under the theory of quasi contract.

The Requirements of Quasi Contract

To recover under the theory of quasi contract, the party seeking recovery must show the following:

1. The party has conferred a benefit on the other party.
2. The party conferred the benefit with the reasonable expectation of being paid.
3. The party did not act as a volunteer in conferring the benefit.
4. The party receiving the benefit would be unjustly enriched by retaining the benefit without paying for it.

In the example just given, Watson can sue in quasi contract because all of the conditions for quasi-contractual recovery have been fulfilled. Watson conferred a benefit on Energy Industries with the reasonable expectation of being paid. The derrick conferred an obvious benefit on Energy Industries. Allowing Energy Industries to retain the derrick without paying Watson would enrich the company unjustly. Therefore, Watson should be able to recover in quantum meruit the reasonable value of the oil derrick, which is ordinarily equal to its fair market value. (Concept Summary 18.1 on the following page reviews all of the equitable remedies, including quasi contract, that may be available in the event that a contract is breached.)

Election of Remedies

In many cases, a nonbreaching party has several remedies available. When the remedies are inconsistent with one another, the common law of contracts requires the party to choose which remedy to pursue. This is called election of remedies.

The Purpose of the Doctrine

The purpose of the doctrine of election of remedies is to prevent double recovery. Suppose, for example, that McCarthy agrees in writing to sell his land to Tally. Then McCarthy changes his mind and repudiates the contract. Tally can sue for compensatory damages or for specific performance. If Tally could seek compensatory damages in addition to specific performance, she would recover twice for the same breach of contract. The doctrine of election of remedies requires Tally to choose the remedy she wants, and it eliminates any possibility of double recovery. In other words, the election doctrine represents the legal embodiment of the adage “You can’t have your cake and eat it, too.”

13. Contracts that by their terms cannot be performed within one year must be in writing to be enforceable (see Chapter 15).

CONCEPT SUMMARY 18.1

Equitable Remedies

Remedy	Description
RESCISSION AND RESTITUTION	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Rescission—A remedy whereby a contract is canceled and the parties are restored to the original positions that they occupied prior to the transaction. 2. Restitution—When a contract is rescinded, both parties must make restitution to each other by returning the goods, property, or funds previously conveyed.
SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE	An equitable remedy calling for the performance of the act promised in the contract. Only available when monetary damages would be inadequate—such as in contracts for the sale of land or unique goods—and never available in personal-service contracts.
REFORMATION	An equitable remedy allowing a contract to be “reformed,” or rewritten, to reflect the parties’ true intentions. Available when an agreement is imperfectly expressed in writing, such as when a mutual mistake has occurred.
RECOVERY BASED ON QUASI CONTRACT	An equitable theory under which a party who confers a benefit on another with the reasonable expectation of being paid can seek a court order for the fair market value of the benefit conferred.

The doctrine has often been applied in a rigid and technical manner, leading to some harsh results. For example, suppose that Beacham is fraudulently induced to buy a parcel of land for $150,000. He spends an additional $10,000 moving onto the land and then discovers the fraud. Instead of suing for damages, Beacham sues to rescind the contract. The court allows Beacham to recover the purchase price of $150,000 in restitution, but not the additional $10,000 in moving expenses (because the seller did not receive this payment, he or she will not be required to return it). So Beacham suffers a net loss of $10,000 on the transaction. If Beacham had elected to sue for damages instead of seeking the remedy of rescission and restitution, he could have recovered the $10,000 as well as the $150,000.

The UCC's Rejection of the Doctrine

Because of the many problems associated with the doctrine of election of remedies, the UCC expressly rejects it.¹⁴ As will be discussed in Chapter 22, remedies under the UCC are not exclusive but are cumulative in nature and include all the available remedies for breach of contract.

¹⁴. See UCC 2-703 and 2-711.

Pleading in the Alternative

Although the nonbreaching party must ultimately elect which remedy to pursue, modern court procedures do allow plaintiffs to plead their cases “in the alternative” (pleadings were discussed in Chapter 3). In other words, when the plaintiff originally files a lawsuit, he or she can ask the court to order either rescission (and restitution) or damages, for example. Then, as the case progresses to trial, the party can elect the remedy that is most beneficial or appropriate, or the judge can order one remedy and not another. This process still prevents double recovery because the party can be awarded only one of the remedies that was requested.

Waiver of Breach

Under certain circumstances, a nonbreaching party may be willing to accept a defective performance of the contract. This knowing relinquishment of a legal right (that is, the right to require satisfactory and full performance) is called a waiver.

Consequences of a Waiver of Breach

When a waiver of a breach of contract occurs, the party waiving the breach cannot take any later action on it. In effect, the waiver erases the past breach; the contract continues as if the breach had never occurred. Of course, the waiver of breach of contract extends only to the matter waived and not to the whole contract.

Reasons for Waiving a Breach

Businesspersons often waive breaches of contract to get whatever benefit is still possible out of the contract. For example, a seller contracts with a buyer to deliver to the buyer ten thousand tons of coal on or before November 1. The contract calls for the buyer to pay by November 10 for coal delivered. Because of a coal miners' strike, coal is hard to find. The seller breaches the contract by not tendering delivery until November 5. The buyer will likely choose to waive the seller's breach, accept delivery of the coal, and pay as contracted.

Waiver of Breach and Subsequent Breaches

Ordinarily, the waiver by a contracting party will not operate to waive subsequent, additional, or future breaches of contract. This is always true when the subsequent breaches are unrelated to the first breach. For example, an owner who waives the right to sue for late completion of a stage of construction does not waive the right to sue for failure to comply with engineering specifications on the same job. A waiver will be extended to subsequent defective performance, however, if a reasonable person would conclude that similar defective performance in the future will be acceptable. Therefore, a pattern of conduct that waives a number of successive breaches will operate as a continued waiver. To change this result, the nonbreaching party should give notice to the breaching party that full performance will be required in the future.

The party who has rendered defective or less-than-full performance remains liable for the damages caused by the breach of contract. In effect, the waiver operates to keep the contract going. The waiver prevents the nonbreaching party from calling the contract to an end or rescinding the contract. The contract continues, but the nonbreaching party can recover damages caused by the defective or less-than-full performance.

Contract Provisions Limiting Remedies

A contract may include provisions stating that no damages can be recovered for certain types of breaches or that damages will be limited to a maximum amount. The contract may also provide that the only remedy for breach is replacement, repair, or refund of the purchase price. Provisions stating that no damages can be recovered are called exculpatory clauses (see Chapter 13). Provisions that affect the availability of certain remedies are called limitation-of-liability clauses.

The UCC Allows Sales Contracts to Limit Remedies

The UCC provides that in a contract for the sale of goods, remedies can be limited. We will examine the UCC provisions on limited remedies in Chapter 22, in the context of the remedies available on the breach of a contract for the sale or lease of goods.¹⁵

Enforceability of Limitation-of-Liability Clauses

Whether a limitation-of-liability clause in a contract will be enforced depends on the type of breach that is excused by the provision. For example, a provision excluding liability for fraudulent or intentional injury will not be enforced. Likewise, a clause excluding liability for illegal acts or violations of law will not be enforced.

A clause excluding liability for negligence may be enforced in certain situations, however. When an exculpatory clause for negligence is contained in a contract made between parties who have roughly equal bargaining positions, the clause usually will be enforced.¹⁶

15. See UCC 2-719(1).

16. See, for example, Asch Webhosting, Inc. v. Adelpia Business Solutions, Investment, LLC, __ F.Supp.2d __ (D.N.J. 2007); and Lucier v. Williams, 366 N.J.Super. 485, 841 A.2d 907 (2004).

REVIEWING Breach of Contract and Remedies

Kyle Bruno enters a contract with X Entertainment to be a stuntman in a movie. Bruno is widely known as the best motorcycle stuntman in the business, and the movie to be produced, Xtreme Riders, has numerous scenes involving high-speed freestyle street-bike stunts. Filming is set to begin August 1 and end by December 1 so that the film can be released the following summer. Both parties to the contract have stipulated that the filming must end on time to capture the profits from the summer movie market. The contract states that Bruno will be paid 10 percent of the net proceeds from the movie for his stunts. The contract also includes a liquidated damages provision, which specifies that if Bruno breaches the contract, he will owe X Entertainment $1 million. In addition, the contract includes a limitation-of-liability clause stating that if Bruno is injured during filming, X Entertainment's liability is limited to nominal damages. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. One day, while Bruno is preparing for a difficult stunt, he gets into an argument with the director and refuses to perform any stunts at all. Can X Entertainment seek specific performance of the contract? Why or why not?
2. Suppose that while performing a high-speed wheelie on a motorcycle, Bruno is injured by the intentionally reckless act of an X Entertainment employee. Will a court be likely to enforce the limitation-of-liability clause? Why or why not?
3. What factors would a court consider to determine whether the $1 million liquidated damages provision constitutes valid damages or is a penalty?
4. Suppose that the contract had no liquidated damages provision (or the court refused to enforce it) and X Entertainment breached the contract. The breach caused the release of the film to be delayed until the fall. Could Bruno seek consequential (special) damages for lost profits from the summer movie market in that situation? Explain.

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

consequential damages 355

incidental damages 354

liquidated damages 359

mitigation of damages 357

nominal damages 357 penalty 359

reformation 362

restitution 359

specific performance 360

waiver 365

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

18-1. Cohen contracts to sell his house and lot to Windsor for $100,000. The terms of the contract call for Windsor to pay 10 percent of the purchase price as a deposit toward the purchase price, or a down payment. The terms further stipulate that if the buyer breaches the contract, Cohen will retain the deposit as liquidated damages. Windsor pays the deposit, but because her expected financing of the $90,000 balance falls through, she breaches the contract. Two weeks later Cohen sells the house and lot to Ballard for $105,000. Windsor demands her $10,000 back, but Cohen refuses, claiming that Windsor's breach and the contract terms entitle him to keep the deposit. Discuss who is correct.

18-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

In which of the following situations would specific performance be an appropriate remedy? Discuss fully.

- (a) Thompson contracts to sell her house and lot to Cousteau. Then, on finding another buyer willing to pay a higher purchase price, she refuses to deed the property to Cousteau.
- (b) Amy contracts to sing and dance in Fred's nightclub for one month, beginning May 1. She then refuses to perform.
- (c) Hoffman contracts to purchase a rare coin owned by Erikson, who is breaking up his coin collection. At the last minute, Erikson decides to keep his coin collection intact and refuses to deliver the coin to Hoffman.
- (d) ABC Corp. has three shareholders: Panozzo, who owns 48 percent of the stock; Chang, who owns another 48 percent; and Ryan, who owns 4 percent. Ryan contracts to sell her 4 percent to Chang. Later, Ryan refuses to transfer the shares to Chang.

- For a sample answer to Question 18-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

18-3. Ken owns and operates a famous candy store and makes most of the candy sold in the store. Business is particularly heavy during the Christmas season. Ken contracts with Sweet, Inc., to purchase ten thousand pounds of sugar to be delivered on or before November 15. Ken has informed Sweet that this particular order is to be used for the Christmas season business. Because of problems at the refinery, the sugar is not tendered to Ken until December 10, at which time Ken refuses it as being too late. Ken has been unable to purchase the quantity of sugar needed to meet his Christmas orders and has had to turn down numerous regular customers, some of whom have indicated that they will purchase candy elsewhere in the future. The sugar Ken has been able to purchase has cost him 10 cents per pound above the price contracted for with Sweet. Ken sues Sweet for breach of contract, claiming as damages the higher price paid for sugar from others, lost profits from this year's lost Christmas sales, future lost profits from customers who have indicated that they will discontinue doing business with him, and punitive damages for failure to meet the contracted delivery date. Sweet claims Ken is limited to compensatory damages only. Discuss who is correct, and why.

18-4. Mitigation of Damages. William West, an engineer, worked for Bechtel Corp., an organization of about 150 engineering and construction companies, which is headquartered in San Francisco, California, and operates worldwide. Except for a two-month period in 1985, Bechtel employed West on long-term assignments or short-term projects for thirty years. In October 1997, West was offered a position on a project with Saudi Arabian Bechtel Co. (SABCO), which West understood would be for two years. In November, however, West was terminated for what he believed was his "age and lack of display of energy." After his return to California, West received numerous offers from Bechtel for work that suited his abilities and met his salary expectations, but he did not accept any of them and did not look for other work. Three months later, he filed a suit in a California state court against Bechtel, alleging, in part, breach of contract and seeking the salary he would have earned during two years with SABCO. Bechtel responded, in part, that, even if there had been a breach, West had failed to mitigate his damages. Is Bechtel correct? Discuss. [West v. Bechtel Corp., 96 Cal.App.4th 966, 117 Cal.Rptr.2d 647 (1 Dist. 2002)]

18-5. Liquidated Damages versus Penalties. Every homeowner in the Putnam County, Indiana, subdivision of Stardust Hills must be a member of the Stardust Hills Owners Association, Inc., and must pay annual dues of $200 for the maintenance of common areas and other community services. Under the association's rules, dues paid more than ten days late "shall bear a delinquent fee at a rate of $2.00 per day." Phyllis Gaddis owned a Stardust Hills lot on which she failed to pay the dues. Late fees began to accrue. Nearly two months later, the association filed a suit in an Indiana state court to collect the unpaid dues and the late fees. Gaddis argued in response that the delinquent fee was an unenforceable penalty. What questions should be considered in determining the status of this fee? Should the association's rule regarding assessment of the fee be enforced? Explain. [Gaddis v. Stardust Hills Owners Association, Inc., 804 N.E.2d 231 (Ind.App. 2004)]

18-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Tyna Ek met Russell Peterson in Seattle, Washington. Peterson persuaded Ek to buy a boat that he had once owned, the O'Hana Kai, which was in Juneau, Alaska. Ek paid $43,000 for the boat, and in January 2000, the parties entered into a contract. In the contract, Peterson agreed to make the vessel seaworthy so that within one month it could be transported to Seattle, where he would pay its moorage costs. He would also renovate the boat at his own expense in return for a portion of the profit on its resale in 2001. At the time of the resale, Ek would recover her costs, after which she would reimburse Peterson for his expenses. Ek loaned Peterson her cell phone so that they could communicate while he prepared the vessel for the trip to Seattle. In March, Peterson, who was still in Alaska, borrowed $4,000 from Ek. Two months later, Ek began to receive unanticipated, unauthorized bills for vessel parts and moorage, the use of her phone, and charges on her credit card. She went to Juneau to take possession of the boat. Peterson moved it to Petersburg, Alaska, where he registered it under a false name, and then to Taku Harbor, where the police seized it. Ek filed a suit in an Alaska state court against Peterson, alleging breach of contract and seeking damages. If the court finds in Ek's favor, what should her damages include? Discuss. [Peterson v. Ek, 93 P3d 458 (Alaska 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 18-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 18," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

18-7. Waiver of Breach. In May 1998, RDP Royal Palm Hotel, L.P., contracted with Clark Construction Group, Inc., to build the Royal Palms Crowne Plaza Resort in Miami Beach, Florida. The deadline for "substantial completion" was February 28, 2000, but RDP could ask for changes, and the date would be adjusted accordingly. During construction, Clark faced many setbacks, including a buried seawall, contaminated soil, the unforeseen deterioration of the existing hotel, and RDP's issue of hundreds of change orders. Clark requested extensions of the deadline, and RDP agreed, but the parties never specified a date. After the original deadline passed, RDP continued to issue change orders, Clark continued to perform, and RDP accepted the work. In March 2002, when the resort was substantially complete, RDP stopped paying Clark. Clark stopped working. RDP hired another contractor to finish the resort, which opened in May. RDP filed a suit in a federal district court against Clark, alleging, among other things, breach of contract for the two-year delay in the resort's completion. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? Discuss. [RDP Royal Palm Hotel, L.P. v. Clark Construction Group, Inc., ___ F3d ___ (11th Cir. 2006)]

18-8. Remedies. On July 7, 2000, Frances Morelli agreed to sell to Judith Bucklin a house at 126 Lakedell Drive in Warwick, Rhode Island, for $77,000. Bucklin made a deposit on the house. The closing at which the parties would exchange the deed for the price was scheduled for September 1. The agreement did not state that "time is of the essence," but it did provide, in "Paragraph 10," that "[i]f Seller is unable to [convey good, clear, insurable, and marketable title], Buyer shall have the option to: (a) accept such title as Seller is able to convey without abatement or reduction of the Purchase Price, or (b) cancel this Agreement and receive a return of all Deposits." An examination of the public records revealed that the house did not have marketable title. Wishing to be flexible, Bucklin offered Morelli time to resolve the problem, and the closing did not occur as scheduled. Morelli decided "the deal is over" and offered to return the deposit. Bucklin refused and, in mid-October, decided to exercise her option under Paragraph 10(a). She notified Morelli, who did not respond. Bucklin filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Morelli. In whose favor should the court rule? Should damages be awarded? If not, what is the appropriate remedy? Why? [Bucklin v. Morelli, 912 A.2d 931 (R.I. 2007)]

18-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 2004, Tamara Cohen, a real estate broker, began showing property in Manhattan to Steven Galistinos, who represented comedian Jerry Seinfeld and his wife, Jessica. According to Cohen, she told Galistinos that her commission would be 5 or 6 percent, and he agreed. According to Galistinos, there was no such agreement. Cohen spoke with Maximillan Sanchez, another broker, about a townhouse owned by Ray and Harriet Mayeri. According to Cohen, Sanchez said that the commission would be 6 percent, which they agreed to split equally. Sanchez later acknowledged that they agreed to split the fee, but claimed that they did not discuss a specific amount. On a Friday in February 2005, Cohen showed the townhouse to Jessica. According to Cohen, she told Jessica that the commission would be 6 percent, with the Seinfelds paying half, and Jessica agreed. According to Jessica, there was no such conversation. Later that day, Galistinos asked Cohen to arrange for the Seinfelds to see the premises again. Cohen told Galistinos that her religious beliefs prevented her from showing property on Friday evenings or Saturdays before sundown. She suggested the following Monday or Tuesday, but Galistinos said that Jerry would not be available and asked her to contact Carolyn Liebling, Jerry's business manager. Cohen left Liebling a message. Over the weekend, the Seinfelds toured the building on their own and agreed to buy the property for $3.95 million. Despite repeated attempts, they were unable to contact Cohen. [Cohen v. Seinfeld, 15 Misc.3d 1118(A), 839 N.Y.S.2d 432 (Sup. 2007)]

- The contract between the Seinfelds and the Mayeris stated that the sellers would pay Sanchez's fee and the "buyers will pay buyer's real estate broker's fees." The Mayeris paid Sanchez $118,500, which is 3 percent of $3.95 million. The Seinfelds refused to pay Cohen. She filed a suit in a New York state court against them, asserting, among other things, breach of contract. Should the court order the Seinfelds to pay Cohen? If so, is she entitled to a full commission even though she was not available to show the townhouse when the Seinfelds wanted to see it? Explain.
- What obligation do parties involved in business deals owe to each other with respect to their religious beliefs? How might the situation in this case have been avoided?

18-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 18." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Midnight Run. Then answer the following questions.

CHAPTER 18 Breach of Contract and Remedies

- (a) In the video, Eddie (Joe Pantoliano) and Jack (Robert De Niro) negotiate a contract for Jack to find the Duke, a mob accountant who embezzled funds, and bring him back for trial. Assume that the contract is valid. If Jack breaches the contract by failing to bring in the Duke, what kinds of remedies, if any, can Eddie seek? Explain your answer.
- (b) Would the equitable remedy of specific performance be available to either Jack or Eddie in the event of a breach? Why or why not?
- (c) Now assume that the contract between Eddie and Jack is unenforceable. Nevertheless, Jack performs his side of the bargain (brings in the Duke). Does Jack have any legal recourse in this situation? Why or why not?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

For a summary of how contracts may be breached and other information on contract law, go to Lawyers.com's Web page at contracts.lawyers.com

The following sites offer information on contract law, including breach of contract and remedies:

www.nolo.com

www.law.cornell.edu/wex/index.php/Contracts

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 18" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 18-1: Legal Perspective
Contract Damages and Contract Theory

Internet Exercise 18-2: Management Perspective
The Duty to Mitigate

CHAPTER 19

E-Contracts and E-Signatures

The basic principles of contract law that were covered in previous chapters evolved over an extended period of time. Certainly, they were formed long before cyberspace and electronic contracting became realities. Therefore, new legal theories, new adaptations of existing laws, and new laws are needed to govern e-contracts, or contracts entered into electronically. To date, however, most courts have adapted traditional contract law principles and, when applicable, provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) to cases involving e-contract disputes. Although an e-contract has the same basic requirements to be valid—agreement, consideration, capacity, and legality—certain aspects of forming e-contracts are unique, such as the method by which the offer and acceptance are communicated.

In the first part of this chapter, we look at how traditional laws are being applied to contracts formed online. We then examine some new laws that have been enacted to apply in situations that are not readily encompassed by the traditional laws governing contracts. For example, traditional laws governing signature and writing requirements are not easily adapted to contracts formed in the online environment. Thus, new laws have been created to address these issues.

Online Contract Formation

Today, numerous contracts are being formed online. Although these contracts are being generated through a new medium, the age-old problems attending contract formation still exist. Disputes concerning contracts formed online continue to center around contract terms and whether the parties voluntarily assented to those terms.

Note that online contracts may be formed not only for the sale of goods and services but also for the purpose of licensing. The “sale” of software generally involves a license, or a right to use the software, rather than the passage of title (ownership rights) from the seller to the buyer. For example, Galynn wants to obtain software that will allow her to work on spreadsheets on her BlackBerry. She goes online and purchases GridMagic. During the transaction, she has to click on several on-screen “I agree” boxes to indicate that she understands that she is purchasing only the right to use the software and will not obtain any ownership rights. After she agrees to these terms (the licensing agreement), she can download the software to her BlackBerry. Although in this chapter we typically refer to the offeror and offeree as a seller and a buyer, in many transactions these parties would be more accurately described as a licensor and a licensee.

Online Offers

Sellers doing business via the Internet can protect themselves against contract disputes and legal liability by creating offers that clearly spell out the terms that will govern their transactions if the offers are accepted. Significant terms should be conspicuous and easy to view.

Displaying the Offer The seller’s Web site should include a hypertext link to a page containing the full contract so that potential buyers are made aware of the terms to which they are assenting. The contract generally must be displayed online in a readable format such as a twelve-point typeface. For example, suppose that Netquip sells a variety of heavy equipment, such as trucks and trailers, online at its Web site. Netquip must include its full pricing schedule on the Web site with explanations of all complex provisions. In addition, the terms of the sale (such as any warranties and Netquip's refund policy) must be fully disclosed.

Is an online contract enforceable if the offeror requires an offeree to scroll down or print the contract to read its terms, which are otherwise readily accessible and clear? That was the question in the following case.

C A S E 19.1 Feldman v. Google, Inc.

United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania, 2007. 513 F.Supp.2d 229.

● Company Profile In the mid-1990s, Larry Page and Sergey Brin, Stanford University graduate students in computer science, began work on an Internet search engine called "BackRub." Renamed "Google" after the mathematical term for a 1 followed by 100 zeros, the engine was made available in 1998. In less than a year, the service was acquiring major clients, receiving achievement awards, being included on many "Top Web Site" lists, and handling millions of queries per day. By 2000, Google had become the world's largest search engine. According to Google, Inc.'s Web site at www.google.com, its mission is to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful. The company's revenue derives from keyword-targeted advertising.

● Background and Facts In Google, Inc.'s AdWords program, when an Internet user searches on www.google.com using key words that an advertiser has identified, an ad appears. If the user clicks on it, Google charges the advertiser. Google requires an advertiser to agree to certain terms before placing an ad. These terms—set out in a preamble and seven paragraphs—are displayed online in a window with a scroll bar. A link to a printer-friendly version of the terms is at the top of the window. At the bottom of the page, viewable without scrolling, are the words, "Yes, I agree to the above terms and conditions," and a box on which an advertiser must click to proceed. Among the terms, a forum-selection clause provides that any dispute over the program is to be "adjudicated in Santa Clara County, California." Lawrence Feldman, a lawyer, participated in the program by selecting key words, including "Vioxx," "Bextra," and "Celebrex," to trigger a showing of his ad to potential clients. In a subsequent suit between Feldman and Google in a federal district court in Pennsylvania, Feldman claimed that at least 20 percent of the clicks for which he was charged $100,000 between January 2003 and January 2006 were fraudulent.^a Feldman filed a motion for summary judgment. Google asked the court to transfer the case to a court in Santa Clara County, California.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT GILES, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The type of contract at issue here is commonly referred to as a "clickwrap" agreement. A clickwrap agreement appears on an Internet web page and requires that a user consent to any terms or conditions by clicking on a dialog box on the screen in order to proceed with the Internet transaction. Even though they are electronic, clickwrap agreements are considered to be writings because they are printable and storable. [Emphasis added.]

To determine whether a clickwrap agreement is enforceable, courts presented with the issue apply traditional principles of contract law and focus on whether the plaintiffs had reasonable notice of and manifested assent to the clickwrap agreement. Absent a showing of fraud, failure to read an enforceable clickwrap agreement, as with any binding contract, will not excuse compliance with its terms. [Emphasis added.]

a. Feldman was alleging that click fraud had taken place. Click fraud occurs when someone, such as a competitor or a prankster with no interest in an advertiser's goods or services, clicks repeatedly on an ad, driving up the ad's cost to the advertiser without generating a sale. For more on click fraud, see the Insight into Ethics feature on pages 292 and 293.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 19.1 CONTINUED

* * * * *
 Plaintiff [Feldman] claims he did not have notice or knowledge of the forum selection clause, and therefore that there was no “meeting of the minds” required for contract formation. * * *

* * * * *
 * * * In order to activate an AdWords account, the user had to visit a Web page which displayed the Agreement in a scrollable text box. * * * [T]he user did not have to scroll down to a submerged screen or click on a series of hyperlinks to view the Agreement. Instead, text of the AdWords Agreement was immediately visible to the user, as was a prominent admonition in bold-face to read the terms and conditions carefully, and with instruction to indicate assent if the user agreed to the terms.

That the user would have to scroll through the text box of the Agreement to read it in its entirety does not defeat notice because there was sufficient notice of the Agreement itself and clicking “Yes” constituted assent to all of the terms. The preamble, which was immediately visible, also made clear that assent to the terms was binding. The Agreement was presented in readable 12-point font. It was only seven paragraphs long—not so long so as to render scrolling down to view all of the terms inconvenient or impossible. A printer-friendly, full-screen version was made readily available. The user had ample time to review the document.

* * * [T]he user * * * had to take affirmative action and click the “Yes, I agree to the above terms and conditions” button in order to proceed to the next step. Clicking “Continue” without clicking the “Yes” button would have returned the user to the same Web page. If the user did not agree to all of the terms, he could not have activated his account, placed ads, or incurred charges.

* * * * *
 A reasonably prudent Internet user would have known of the existence of terms in the AdWords Agreement. Plaintiff had to have had reasonable notice of the terms. By clicking on “Yes, I agree to the above terms and conditions” button, Plaintiff indicated assent to the terms.

● Decision and Remedy The court held that “the requirements of an express contract for reasonable notice of terms and mutual assent are satisfied.” Feldman and Google were bound to the terms. The court denied Feldman’s motion for summary judgment and granted Google’s motion to transfer the case.

● The Ethical Dimension With respect to click fraud, which was the heart of Feldman’s claim in this case, what circumstances might suggest unethical behavior by Google?

● The E-Commerce Dimension Under what different facts might the court have held that the plaintiff did not have reasonable notice of the terms of the agreement and thus did not assent to them?

Provisions to Include An important rule to keep in mind is that the offeror controls the offer and thus the resulting contract. Therefore, the seller should anticipate the terms that he or she wants to include in a contract and provide for them in the offer. At a minimum, an online offer should include the following provisions:

1. A clause that clearly indicates what constitutes the buyer’s agreement to the terms of the offer, such as a box containing the words “I accept” that the buyer can click on to indicate acceptance. (Mechanisms for accepting online offers are discussed in detail later in the chapter.)
2. A provision specifying how payment for the goods and of any applicable taxes must be made.
3. A statement of the seller’s refund and return policies.
4. Disclaimers of liability for certain uses of the goods. For example, an online seller of business forms may add a disclaimer that the seller does not accept responsibility for the buyer’s reliance on the forms rather than on an attorney’s advice.
5. A provision specifying the remedies available to the buyer if the goods are found to be defective or if the contract is otherwise breached. Any limitation of remedies should be clearly spelled out.
6. A statement indicating how the seller will use the information gathered about the buyer.

7. Provisions relating to dispute settlement, such as an arbitration clause or a forum-selection clause (discussed next).

Dispute-Settlement Provisions Online offers frequently include provisions relating to dispute settlement. An arbitration clause might be included, indicating that any dispute arising under the contract will be arbitrated in a specified forum. Many online contracts also contain a forum-selection clause, which indicates the forum, or place (such as the court or jurisdiction), for the resolution of any dispute arising under the contract. These clauses can help online sellers avoid having to appear in court in many distant jurisdictions when customers are dissatisfied with their purchases.

Suppose that a California buyer purchases defective goods sold online by a company located in New York. Unable to obtain a refund or adequate replacement goods from the seller, the California buyer files a suit against the seller in a California state court. If the New York seller meets the “minimum-contacts” requirement (discussed in Chapter 2) for the California court to exercise jurisdiction over the dispute, the New York seller will need to travel to California—or at least hire an attorney in California—to defend against the lawsuit. Forum-selection clauses in online contracts offer a way for sellers to avoid this problem. Forum-selection clauses are also routinely included in contracts for the international sale of goods (see Chapter 20).

Online Acceptances

The Restatement (Second) of Contracts—a compilation of common law contract principles—states that parties may agree to a contract “by written or spoken words or by other action or by failure to act.”¹ Similarly, Section 2–204 of the UCC states that any contract for the sale of goods “may be made in any manner sufficient to show agreement, including conduct by both parties which recognizes the existence of such a contract.”

Click-On Agreements The courts have used these provisions to conclude that a binding contract can be created by conduct, including the act of clicking on a box indicating “I accept” or “I agree” to accept an online offer. When an online buyer indicates his or her assent to be bound by the terms of the offer by clicking on some on-screen prompt, a click-on agreement (sometimes referred to as a click-on license or click-wrap agreement) is formed. Exhibit 19–1 shows a portion of a click-on agreement that accompanies a package of software made and marketed by Microsoft.

1. Restatement (Second) of Contracts, Section 19.

EXHIBIT 19–1 • A Click-On Agreement

This exhibit illustrates an online offer to form a contract. To accept the offer, the user simply scrolls down the page and clicks on the “Accept” box.

Generally, the law does not require that all of the parties to a contract must actually have read all of its terms for the contract to be effective. Clicking on a button or box that states “I agree” to certain terms can be enough. The terms may be contained on a Web site through which the buyer is obtaining goods or services, or they may appear on a computer screen when software is loaded from a CD-ROM or DVD or downloaded from the Internet.

In the following case, the court considered the enforceability of a click-wrap software licensing agreement that included a forum-selection clause.

C A S E 19.2 Mortgage Plus, Inc. v. DocMagic, Inc.

United States District Court, District of Kansas, 2004. __ F.Supp.2d __.

• Background and Facts In 1997, Mortgage Plus, Inc., a mortgage lender in Kansas, asked DocMagic, Inc., a California firm, for software to prepare and manage loan documents and for document preparation services. DocMagic sent Mortgage Plus a CD-ROM containing the software, which had to be loaded onto a computer. Before it could be installed, however, a window displayed a “Software License and User Agreement” on the screen. The agreement asked, “Do you accept all terms of the preceding License Agreement? If you choose No, Setup will close.” A click on a “Yes” button was needed to continue. The agreement also included a clause designating California as the venue for the resolution of any disputes. To prepare loan documents, the software asked for certain information, which it used to create a worksheet. The worksheet was e-mailed to DocMagic, which completed the documents and returned them via e-mail. Over the next six years, Mortgage Plus borrowers filed claims against the firm, alleging that the firm had made mistakes that cost the borrowers $150,000 to resolve. Mortgage Plus filed a suit in a federal district court against DocMagic, alleging that its software failed to produce documents that met certain legal requirements. The defendant filed a motion to transfer the suit to a federal court in California based on the clause in the click-on agreement.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT WAXSE, Magistrate J. [Judge]

* * * *

Mortgage Plus argues the purported license agreement is invalid, as it improperly attempts to supplement and/or modify the terms of the parties’ original contractual agreement. In support of this argument, Mortgage Plus maintains that prior to the subject license agreement, Mortgage Plus and DocMagic negotiated and entered into a contract whereby Mortgage Plus agreed to pay specific amounts to DocMagic in exchange for document preparation services. Mortgage Plus submits that when DocMagic shipped the software necessary to utilize these services, the parties entered into a binding contract and that neither during these negotiations nor in the resulting agreement did the parties discuss a venue where a potential dispute between the parties would have to be filed and resolved.

* * * *

* * * Mortgage Plus argues it is not bound by the Software Licensing Agreement because the license was not an “agreed-to” modification of the original agreement between the parties. The Court is not persuaded by this argument.

First, Mortgage Plus has failed to present evidence to establish existence of the phantom “original contract,” including but not limited to the date the contract was formed, the terms and conditions of the contract (other than pricing) or documents memorializing the agreement. The Court cannot find the software licensing agreement improperly altered the terms and conditions of the original contractual agreement when there is no evidence that an original contractual agreement ever existed.

* * * *

Mortgage Plus next contends that even in the absence of an original agreement, it simply was not aware of and never accepted any version of the Software Licensing Agreement. In support of its contention, Mortgage Plus states * * * a click-wrap agreement consisting of a window entitled “Software Licensing Agreement” appearing prior to installation of software cannot be construed as a legally binding contract * * * .

CASE 19.2 CONTINUED

* * * *

A license is a form of contract and is objectionable on grounds applicable to contracts in general. By the terms of the license here, installation and use of the software with the license attached constituted acceptance of the license terms. The license was “bundled” with the DocMagic software, meaning that the software required users to accept the terms by clicking through a series of screens before they could access and subsequently install the software. This type of license is known as a “click-wrap” license agreement. Such agreements are common on Web sites that sell or distribute software programs. The term “click-wrap” agreement is borrowed from the idea of “shrink-wrap agreements,” which are generally license agreements placed inside the cellophane “shrink-wrap” of computer software boxes that, by their terms, become effective once the “shrink-wrap” is opened. Courts have found both types of licenses valid and enforceable. * * * [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

* * * [I]t is undisputed between the parties in this case [that Mortgage Plus had to affirmatively click the “Yes” button in assenting to the Software Licensing Agreement as a prerequisite to installing the DocMagic software. It further is undisputed that the software would not be installed if Mortgage Plus did not accept the terms and conditions of the Software Licensing Agreement. Plaintiff had a choice as to whether to download the software and utilize the related services; thus, under the specific facts presented here, installation and use of the software with the attached license constituted an affirmative acceptance of the license terms by Mortgage Plus and the licensing agreement became effective upon this affirmative assent. The Court finds the click-wrap agreement here is a valid contract.

● Decision and Remedy The court concluded that the software licensing agreement was a valid contract because a user had to agree to its terms before the software could be installed and used. The forum-selection clause was thus enforceable, and the court ordered the suit to be transferred to a federal district court in California.

● What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the individual who clicked on the “Yes” button and installed the software was not authorized to do so. Would the result have been different?

● The E-Commerce Dimension If DocMagic had e-mailed the forum-selection clause to Mortgage Plus and Mortgage Plus had not responded, could the “silence” be construed as an acceptance of the clause? Explain your answer.

Shrink-Wrap Agreements In many ways, click-on agreements are the Internet equivalents of shrink-wrap agreements (or shrink-wrap licenses, as they are sometimes called). A shrink-wrap agreement is an agreement whose terms are expressed inside a box in which the goods are packaged. (The term shrink-wrap refers to the plastic that covers the box.) Usually, the party who opens the box is told that she or he agrees to the terms by keeping whatever is in the box.

Similarly, when the purchaser opens a software package, he or she agrees to abide by the terms of the limited license agreement. For example, suppose that Garcia orders a new computer from a national company, which ships the computer to Garcia. Along with the computer, the box contains an agreement setting forth the terms of the sale, including what remedies are available. The document also states that Garcia’s retention of the computer for longer than thirty days will be construed as an acceptance of the terms.

In most instances, a shrink-wrap agreement is not between a retailer and a buyer, but between the manufacturer of the hardware or software and the ultimate buyer-user of the product. The terms generally concern warranties, remedies, and other issues associated with the use of the product.

Shrink-Wrap Agreements—Enforceable Contract Terms. In many cases, the courts have treated the terms of shrink-wrap agreements as just as enforceable as the terms of other contracts. These courts reason that by including the terms with the product, the seller proposes a contract that the buyer can accept by using the product after having an opportunity to read the terms. Thus, a buyer’s failure to object to terms contained within a shrink-wrapped software package (or an online offer) may constitute an acceptance of the terms by conduct.² Additionally, it seems practical from a business's point of view to enclose a full statement of the legal terms of a sale with the product rather than to read the statement over the phone, for example, when a buyer calls in an order for the product.

Shrink-Wrap Terms That May Not Be Enforced.

Nevertheless, the courts have not enforced all of the terms included in shrink-wrap agreements. One important consideration is whether the parties form their contract before or after the seller communicates the terms of the shrink-wrap agreement to the buyer. If a court finds that the buyer learned of the shrink-wrap terms after the parties entered into a contract, the court may conclude that those terms were proposals for additional terms and were not part of the contract unless the buyer expressly agreed to them.³

Browse-Wrap Terms Like the terms of a click-on agreement, browse-wrap terms can occur in a transaction conducted over the Internet. Unlike a click-on agreement, however, browse-wrap terms do not require an Internet user to assent to the terms before, say, downloading or using certain software. In other words, a person can install the software without clicking "I agree" to the terms of a license. Offerors of browse-wrap terms generally assert that the terms are binding without the user's active consent.

Critics contend that browse-wrap terms are not enforceable because they do not satisfy the basic elements of contract formation. It has been suggested that to form a valid contract online, a user must at least be presented with the terms before indicating agreement.⁴ With respect to a browse-wrap term, this would require that a user navigate past it and agree to it before being able to obtain whatever is being granted.

For example, Netscape Communications Corporation provided free downloadable software called "SmartDownload" on its Web site to those who indicated, by clicking on a designated box, that they wished to obtain it. On the Web site's download page was a reference to a license agreement that was visible only by scrolling to the next screen. In other words, the user did not have to agree to the terms of the license before downloading the software. One of the terms in the license required all disputes to be submitted to arbitration in California. When a group of users filed a lawsuit against Netscape in New York, however, the court held that the arbitration clause in the browse-wrap license agreement was unenforceable because users were not required to indicate their assent to the agreement.⁵

E-Signatures

In many instances, a contract cannot be enforced unless it is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. In the days when many people could not write, documents were signed with an "X." Then handwritten signatures became common, followed by typed signatures, printed signatures, and, most recently, digital signatures that are transmitted electronically. Throughout the evolution of signature technology, the question of what constitutes a valid signature has arisen frequently, and with good reason—without some consensus on what constitutes a valid signature, little business or legal work could be accomplished. In this section, we look at how electronic signatures, or e-signatures, can be created and verified on e-contracts, as well as how the parties can enter into agreements that prevent disputes concerning e-signatures.

E-Signature Technologies

Today, numerous technologies allow electronic documents to be signed. An e-signature has been defined as "an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record."⁶ Thus, e-signatures include encrypted digital

2. For a leading case on this issue, see ProCD, Inc. v. Zeidenberg, 86 F.3d 1447 (7th Cir. 1996).

3. See, for example, Klocek v. Gateway, Inc., 104 F.Supp.2d 1332 (D.Kans. 2000).

4. American Bar Association Committee on the Law of Cyberspace, "Click-Through Agreements: Strategies for Avoiding Disputes on the Validity of Assent" (document presented at the annual American Bar Association meeting in August 2001).

5. Specht v. Netscape Communications Corp., 306 F.3d 17 (2d Cir. 2002).

6. This definition is from the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act, which will be discussed later in this chapter.

signatures, names (intended as signatures) at the ends of e-mail messages, and “clicks” on a Web page if the click includes the identification of the person. Various forms of e-signatures have been—or are now being—developed, but most e-signatures used today fall into one of two categories, digitized handwritten signatures and public-key infrastructure–based digital signatures.

Digitized Handwritten Signatures A digitized signature is a graphical image of a handwritten signature that is often created using a digital pen and pad, such as an ePad, and special software. For security reasons, the strokes of a person’s signature can be measured by software to authenticate the person signing (this is referred to as signature dynamics).

Examples of digitized signatures are abundant. When United Parcel Service (UPS) delivers a package to your office, for example, the delivery person asks you to sign a digital pad to verify receipt. Similarly, when you pick up a prescription, some pharmacies ask you to sign an electronic pad to confirm that the pharmacist has informed you of the potential side effects of the prescribed medications.

Public-Key Infrastructure Digital Signatures In a public-key infrastructure (such as an asymmetric cryptosystem), two mathematically linked but different keys are generated—a private signing key and a public validation key. A digital signature is created when the signer uses the private key to create a unique mark on an electronic document. With the appropriate software, the recipient of the document can use the public key to verify the identity of the signer. A cybernotary—a legally recognized certification authority—issues the key pair, identifies the owner of the keys, and certifies the validity of the public key. The cybernotary also serves as a repository for public keys.

State Laws Governing E-Signatures

Most states have laws governing e-signatures. The problem is that state e-signature laws are not uniform. Some states—California is a notable example—prohibit many types of documents from being signed with e-signatures, whereas other states are more permissive. Additionally, some states recognize only digital signatures as valid, while others permit other types of e-signatures.

In an attempt to create more uniformity among the states, in 1999 the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the American Law Institute promulgated the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA). To date, the UETA has been adopted, at least in part, by forty-eight states. Among other things, the UETA declares that a signature may not be denied legal effect or enforceability solely because it is in electronic form.⁷ (The provisions of the UETA will be discussed in more detail shortly.)

Federal Law on E-Signatures and E-Documents

In 2000, Congress enacted the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-SIGN Act),⁸ which provides that no contract, record, or signature may be “denied legal effect” solely because it is in electronic form. In other words, under this law, an electronic signature is as valid as a signature on paper, and an e-document can be as enforceable as a paper one.

For an e-signature to be enforceable, the contracting parties must have agreed to use electronic signatures. For an electronic document to be valid, it must be in a form that can be retained and accurately reproduced.

The E-SIGN Act does not apply to all types of documents, however. Contracts and documents that are exempt include court papers, divorce decrees, evictions, foreclosures, health-insurance terminations, prenuptial agreements, and wills. Also, the only agreements governed by the UCC that fall under this law are those covered by Articles 2 and 2A and UCC 1–107 and 1–206. Despite these limitations, the E-SIGN Act significantly expanded the possibilities for contracting online. For a discussion of e-signature laws and e-commerce issues worldwide, see this chapter’s Insight into the Global Environment feature on page 380.

In the case that follows, the court applied a variety of contract principles to determine the legal effect of an exchange of e-mails, plus a phone call.

7. Many states have also included a similar provision in their versions of the UCC.

8. 15 U.S.C. Sections 7001 et seq.

EXTENDED Amber Chemical, Inc. v. Reilly Industries, Inc.
C A S E 19.3 United States District Court, Eastern District of California, 2007. __ F.Supp.2d __.

OLIVER W. WANGER, United States District Judge.

* * * *

Amber [Chemical, Inc.] is a wholesale commodity chemical company that specializes in selling chemical inputs to oil field service companies, but has recently expanded to also distribute chemicals to agricultural businesses.

* * * In the fall of each year, Reilly [Industries, Inc.] would provide Amber with firm prices for potassium chloride for the following year. Amber then agreed to purchase a minimum annual quantity of potassium chloride from Reilly at that agreed upon price * * *. Amber [then] placed periodic orders, depending on its needs during any given time period. Amber submitted purchase orders for the purchase of each shipment of potassium chloride. Once Reilly received a purchase order from Amber, Reilly then processed that order and shipped the product.

* * * *

Reilly contends that its relationship with Amber ended in March 2004, when Reilly sold its potassium chloride business to another vendor. Amber maintains that during the fall of 2003, through a series of e-mails between Reilly employee Brett Wilhelm and Amber employee Bob Brister, an agreement was reached whereby Reilly would sell Amber potassium chloride throughout 2004 at a fixed price of $122.50 per ton, so long as the volume of potassium chloride purchased by Amber from Reilly met or exceeded the volume it purchased from Reilly in 2003. * * *

At some point, either during or following this exchange of e-mails, Wilhelm called Brister to confirm the quantity of potassium chloride Amber intended to purchase from Reilly in 2004. Brister orally confirmed that Amber would purchase at least as much or more potassium chloride from Reilly as it had in 2003. * * *

It is undisputed that, throughout the early part of 2004, up until March 15, 2004, the date on which Reilly cut off shipments to Amber, Amber bought all of its requirements for potassium chloride from Reilly, and that these purchases were in excess of the quantities it bought in 2003. [Amber brought this suit against Reilly in federal district court, alleging breach of contract. Reilly filed a motion for summary judgment, claiming that the parties did not have a written contract, as the Statute of Frauds required. Amber responded by asserting the doctrine of promissory estoppel.]

* * * *

The statute of frauds covers contracts for the sale of goods over $500. * * * Potassium chloride is * * * a “good” for purposes of the statute of frauds. It is undisputed that [the] alleged contract, if formed, was for more than $500 worth of potassium chloride. * * *

* * * *

Here, the statute of frauds is not satisfied because the e-mails do not sufficiently indicate that a contract with respect thereto has been made between the parties or offered by the signer to the other party. Generally, an offer is the manifestation of willingness to enter into a bargain, so made as to justify another person in understanding that his assent to that bargain is invited and will conclude it. * * * A manifestation of willingness to enter into a bargain is not an offer if the person to whom it is addressed knows or has reason to know that the person making it does not intend to conclude a bargain until he has made a further manifestation of assent. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

[Wilhelm’s] e-mail did not constitute an offer because it merely invited the parties to “work out a contract” that would be reduced to writing, and evidenced only a willingness to “discuss this proposal.” Wilhelm did not “intend to conclude a bargain until he [had] made a further manifestation of assent.” As such, this e-mail it is no more than an invitation to negotiate.

* * * Since Wilhelm’s prior e-mail did not constitute an offer, it did not create the power in Brister to accept. Nor does Brister’s reply purport to actually be an acceptance. Rather, Brister indicates that Reilly should “work the contract up.” This language evidences an understanding that no contract yet existed and that Amber intended that any contract be reduced to writing. No written contract was ever prepared.

* * * *

CASE 19.3 CONTINUED

Amber asserts that Reilly should be estopped from disclaiming the existence of a contract because Reilly made an oral promise to Amber upon which Amber relied to its detriment.

* * * *

The threshold question is whether any oral agreement was reached between the parties prior to Amber's detrimental reliance. To be binding for purposes of promissory estoppel, the promise must be clear and unambiguous. [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

Here, Bob Brister testified that the e-mails exchanged in September 2003 and a contemporaneous phone conversation between Mr. Brister (of Amber) and Mr. Wilhelm (of Reilly) resulted in a two-way promise, pursuant to which Reilly promised to provide Amber a firm price for 2004, in exchange for Amber's commitment not only to purchase its requirements from Reilly but to purchase at least as much potassium chloride as it had in 2003. * * * [This] evidence indicates that an oral requirements contract was formed.

* * * *

The second requirement to establish promissory estoppel is that the party asserting estoppel must have suffered unconscionable injury * * * . [Emphasis added.]

The undisputed evidence arguably supports a finding of unconscionable injury. Mr. Wilhelm testified that he knew that Amber intended to, and in fact did, rely on the firm price for product offered by Reilly for 2004 by entering into contracts to supply Amber's own customers. Mr. Wilhelm, of Reilly, also testified that he knew that if Amber was unable to meet its commitments to its customer, both as to supply and price, it would be a "very big problem" for Amber. Finally, it is undisputed that Amber suffered financial damages as a result of the alleged breach, because Amber purchased potassium chloride from other sources at unfavorable prices.

* * * *

In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, an oral requirements contract was formed * * * and unconscionable injury occurred. Defendant's motion for summary judgment is DENIED * * * .

QUESTIONS

1. Under the UCC, a contract for a sale of goods must normally state a quantity so that a court will have a basis for determining a remedy. Here, Amber's alleged oral contract did not include a specific quantity. On what basis, then, could the court in this case determine a remedy?
2. Reilly included with each shipment a standard invoice stating that it constituted the parties' entire agreement and that its "Standard Terms" could be modified only in a writing signed by the parties. This, Reilly asserted, made those terms "a complete expression of the parties' agreement." Should the court agree with Reilly and apply the parol evidence rule? If so, what would be its effect? If not, why not?

Partnering Agreements

One way that online sellers and buyers can prevent disputes over signatures, as well as disputes over the terms and conditions of their e-contracts, is to form partnering agreements. In a partnering agreement, a seller and a buyer who frequently do business with each other agree in advance on the terms and conditions that will apply to all transactions subsequently conducted electronically. The partnering agreement can also establish special access and identification codes to be used by the parties when transacting business electronically.

A partnering agreement reduces the likelihood that disputes will arise under the contract because the buyer and the seller have agreed in advance to the terms and conditions that will accompany each sale. Furthermore, if a dispute does arise, a court or

INSIGHT INTO THE GLOBAL ENVIRONMENT

International Use and Regulation of the Internet

Today, most e-commerce conducted on a worldwide basis involves buyers, sellers, and enablers from the United States. Not surprisingly, then, U.S. law is often used to resolve legal issues related to global e-commerce. The preeminence of U.S. law in this area is likely to be challenged in the future, however, as Internet use continues to expand around the globe. Already, several international organizations have created their own codes of conduct, rules, and regulations for global Internet transactions. We examine a selection of them here.

A United Nations Convention

An important step toward creating international rules for Internet transactions was taken in 2005, when the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communications in International Contracts was completed. This convention will go into effect as soon as enough countries ratify it, which may have happened by the time you read this. A major goal of the convention is to improve commercial certainty by determining an Internet user's location for legal purposes. The convention also establishes standards for creating functional equivalence between electronic communications and paper documents. Like the E-SIGN Act discussed in the text, the convention provides that e-signatures should be treated as the equivalent of signatures on paper documents. The drafters also attempted to codify the proper use of automated message systems for contract formation.

Choice of Court

Another recent treaty that will help to foster international trade is the Convention on the Choice of Court Agreements, completed by the Hague Conference on Private International Law on June 30, 2005. Although this convention does not specifically address e-commerce and applies only to business-to-business transactions, not business-to-consumer transactions, it will provide more certainty regarding jurisdiction and recognition of judgments by other nations' courts. Such matters are important to both offline and online transactions, so the convention should enhance e-commerce as well.

The Choice of Court Convention was designed to promote international trade and investment by providing more certainty in resolving international contract disputes. It governs business agreements that designate a single court, or the courts of a single country, to be the forum for resolving disputes. One of its goals is to offer parties entering into international trade contracts a balanced choice between litigation and arbitration when selecting a method of settling disputes. In this sense, the convention is similar to the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards of 1958, commonly referred to as the New York Arbitration Convention (see Chapter 2 for further discussion of this convention).

Fighting International Cyber Crime

Unfortunately, cyber crime has expanded along with the Internet, but steps are beginning to be taken to combat cyber crime on an international basis. At the beginning of this decade, the Council of Europe created the Cyber-Crime Convention, which has been signed by thirty nations including the United States. This treaty provides mechanisms for international cooperation in the battle against Internet-related crime. It prohibits the unauthorized access of an Internet computer system, the unauthorized interception of Internet data, Internet fraud and forgery, and copyright infringement through the use of the Internet.

CRITICAL THINKING

INSIGHT INTO POLITICS

There are about two hundred sovereign nations in the world today, but only thirty have signed the Cyber-Crime Convention. Why do you think so many nations' governments have been reluctant to be bound by the convention?

arbitration forum will be able to refer to the partnering agreement when determining the parties' intent with respect to subsequent contracts. Of course, even with a partnering agreement, fraud remains a possibility. If an unauthorized person uses a purchaser's designated access number and identification code, it may be some time before the problem is discovered.⁹

9. See, for example, AET, Inc. v. C5 Communications, LLC, ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (S.D.Tex. 2007).

The Uniform Electronic Transactions Act

As noted earlier, the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA) was promulgated in 1999. It represented one of the first comprehensive efforts to create uniform laws pertaining to e-commerce.

The primary purpose of the UETA is to remove barriers to e-commerce by giving the same legal effect to electronic records and signatures as is given to paper documents and signatures. As mentioned earlier, the UETA broadly defines an e-signature as “an electronic sound, symbol, or process attached to or logically associated with a record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record.”¹⁰ A record is “information that is inscribed on a tangible medium or that is stored in an electronic or other medium and is retrievable in perceivable [visual] form.”¹¹

The Scope and Applicability of the UETA

The UETA does not create new rules for electronic contracts but rather establishes that records, signatures, and contracts may not be denied enforceability solely due to their electronic form. The UETA does not apply to all writings and signatures but only to electronic records and electronic signatures relating to a transaction. A transaction is defined as an interaction between two or more people relating to business, commercial, or governmental activities.¹²

The act specifically does not apply to wills or testamentary trusts (see Chapter 50) or to transactions governed by the UCC (other than those covered in Articles 2 and 2A).¹³ In addition, the provisions of the UETA allow the states to exclude its application to other areas of law.

As described earlier, Congress passed the E-SIGN Act in 2000, a year after the UETA was presented to the states for adoption. Thus, a significant issue is whether and to what extent the federal E-SIGN Act preempts the UETA as adopted by the states.

The Federal E-SIGN Act and the UETA

The E-SIGN Act refers explicitly to the UETA and provides that if a state has enacted the uniform version of the UETA, it is not preempted by the E-SIGN Act.¹⁴ In other words, if the state has enacted the UETA without modification, state law will govern. The problem is that many states have enacted nonuniform (modified) versions of the UETA, largely for the purpose of excluding other areas of state law from the UETA's terms. The E-SIGN Act specifies that those exclusions will be preempted to the extent that they are inconsistent with the E-SIGN Act's provisions.

The E-SIGN Act, however, explicitly allows the states to enact alternative procedures or requirements for the use or acceptance of electronic records or electronic signatures. Generally, however, the procedures or requirements must be consistent with the provisions of the E-SIGN Act, and the state must not give greater legal status or effect to one specific type of technology. Additionally, if a state enacted alternative procedures or requirements after the E-SIGN Act was adopted, the state law must specifically refer to the E-SIGN Act. The relationship between the UETA and the E-SIGN Act is illustrated in Exhibit 19-2 on the following page.

Highlights of the UETA

We look next at selected provisions of the UETA. Our discussion is, of course, based on the act's uniform provisions. Keep in mind that the states that have enacted the UETA may have adopted slightly different versions.

The Parties Must Agree to Conduct Transactions Electronically

The UETA will not apply to a transaction unless each of the parties has previously agreed to conduct transactions by electronic means. The agreement need not be explicit, however, and it may be implied by the conduct of the parties and the surrounding circumstances.¹⁵ In the comments that accompany the UETA, the drafters stated that it may be reasonable to infer that a person who gives out a business card with an e-mail address on it has consented to transact business electronically.¹⁶ The party's agreement may also be inferred from a letter or other writing, as well as from some verbal communication. Nothing in the UETA requires that the agreement to conduct transactions electronically be made electronically.

Note, however, that some courts have required that the parties' agreement to conduct transactions electronically be clear and unambiguous. For example, in one Louisiana case, the fact that the parties had negotiated the terms of previous contracts via e-mail

10. UETA 102(8).

11. UETA 102(15).

12. UETA 2(12) and 3.

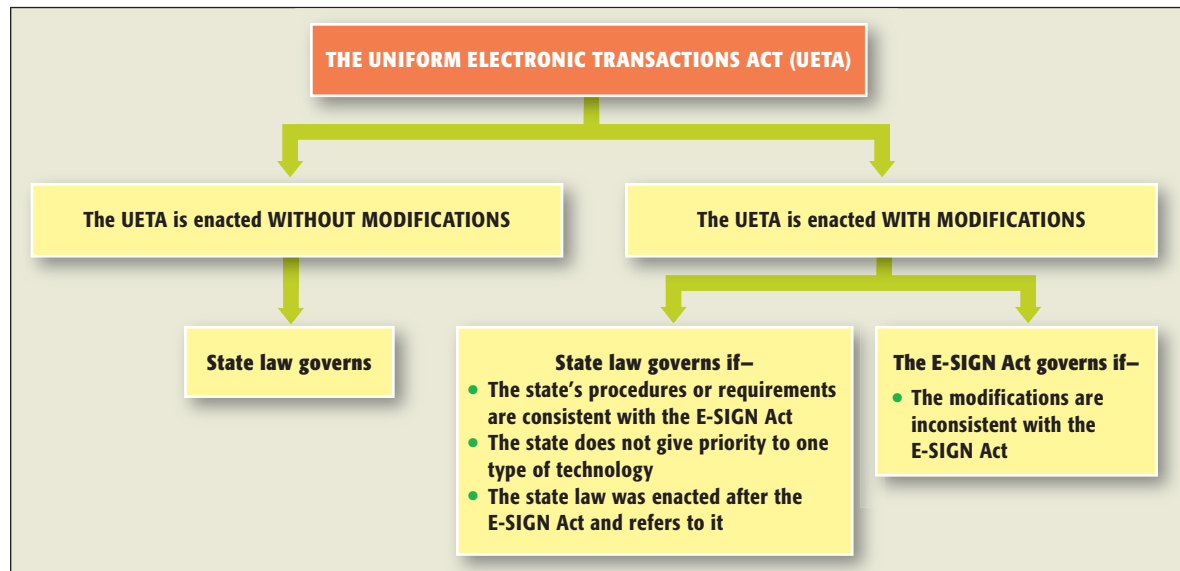

13. UETA 3(b).

14. 15 U.S.C. Section 7002(2)(A)(i).

15. UETA 5(b).

16. UETA 5, Comment 4B.

EXHIBIT 19-2 • The E-SIGN Act and the UETA was not sufficient evidence (by itself) to show that the parties had agreed to transact business electronically.¹⁷

A person who has previously agreed to an electronic transaction can withdraw his or her consent and refuse to conduct further business electronically. Additionally, the act expressly gives parties the power to vary the UETA's provisions by contract. In other words, parties can opt out of some or all of the terms of the UETA. If the parties do not opt out of the terms of the UETA, however, the UETA will govern their electronic transactions.

Attribution In the context of electronic transactions, the term attribution refers to the procedures that may be used to ensure that the person sending an electronic record is the same person whose e-signature accompanies the record. Under the UETA, if an electronic record or signature was the act of a particular person, the record or signature may be attributed to that person. If a person types her or his name at the bottom of an e-mail purchase order, that name will qualify as a “signature” and be attributed to the person whose name appears. Just as in paper contracts, one may use any relevant evidence to prove that the record or signature is or is not the act of the person.¹⁸

Note that even if an individual's name does not appear on a record (a voice-mail message, for example), the UETA states that the effect of the record is to be determined from the context and surrounding circumstances. In other words, a record may have legal effect even if no one has signed it. For instance, a fax that contains a letterhead identifying the sender may, depending on the circumstances, be attributed to that sender.

Notarization If existing state law requires a document to be notarized, the UETA provides that this requirement is satisfied by the electronic signature of a notary public or other person authorized to verify signatures. For example, if a person intends to accept an offer to purchase real estate via e-mail, the requirement is satisfied if a notary public is present to verify the person's identity and affix an electronic signature to the e-mail acceptance.

The Effect of Errors Section 10 of the UETA encourages, but does not require, the use of security procedures (such as encryption) to verify changes to electronic documents and to correct errors. If the parties have agreed to a security procedure and one party fails to detect an error because of not following the procedure, the other party can legally avoid the effect of the change or error. If the parties have not agreed to use a security procedure, then other state laws (including contract law governing mistakes—see Chapter 14) will determine the effect of the error on the parties' agreement.

To avoid the effect of errors, a party must promptly notify the other party of the error and of her or his intent not to be bound by the error. In addition, the party must take reasonable steps to return any benefit

17. See, for example, EPCO Carbon dioxide Products, Inc. v. Bank One, N.A., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (W.D.La.2007).

18. UETA 9.

or consideration received. Parties cannot avoid a transaction from which they have benefited.

Timing Section 15 of the UETA sets forth provisions relating to the sending and receiving of electronic records. These provisions apply unless the parties agree to different terms. Under Section 15, an electronic record is considered sent when it is properly directed to the intended recipient in a form readable by the recipient's computer system. Once the electronic record leaves the control of the sender or comes under the control of the recipient, the UETA deems it to have been sent. An electronic record is considered received when it enters the recipient's processing system in a readable form—even if no individual is aware of its receipt.

Additionally, the UETA provides that, unless otherwise agreed, an electronic record is to be sent from or received at the party's principal place of business. If a party has no place of business, the provision then authorizes the place of sending or receipt to be the party's residence. If a party has multiple places of business, the record should be sent from or received at the location that has the closest relationship to the underlying transaction.

REVIEWING E-Contracts and E-Signatures

Ted and Betty Hyatt live in California, a state that has extensive statutory protection for consumers. The Hyatts decided to buy a computer so that they could use e-mail to stay in touch with their grandchildren, who live in another state. Over the phone, they ordered a computer from CompuEdge, Inc. When the box arrived, it was sealed with a brightly colored sticker warning that the terms enclosed within the box would govern the sale unless the customer returned the computer within thirty days. Among those terms was a clause that required any disputes to be resolved in a Tennessee state court. The Hyatts then signed up for Internet service through CyberTool, an Internet service provider. They downloaded CyberTool's software and clicked on the "quick install" box that allowed them to bypass CyberTool's "Terms of Service" page. It was possible to read this page by scrolling to the next screen, but the Hyatts did not realize this. The terms included a clause that stated that all disputes were to be submitted to a Virginia state court. As soon as the Hyatts attempted to e-mail their grandchildren, they experienced problems using CyberTool's e-mail service, which continually stated that the network was busy. They also were unable to receive the photos sent by their grandchildren. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did the Hyatts accept the list of contract terms included in the computer box? Why or why not? What is the name used for this type of e-contract?
2. What type of agreement did the Hyatts form with CyberTool?
3. Suppose that the Hyatts experienced trouble with the computer's components after they had used the computer for two months. What factors will a court consider in deciding whether to enforce the forum-selection clause? Would a court be likely to enforce the clause in this contract? Why or why not?
4. Are the Hyatts bound by the contract terms specified on CyberTool's "Terms of Service" page that they did not read? Which of the required elements for contract formation might the Hyatts' claim lack? How might a court rule on this issue?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

browse-wrap terms 376
click-on agreement 373

cybernotary 377
e-contract 370
e-signature 376 forum-selection clause 373

partnering agreement 379 record 381
shrink-wrap agreement 375

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

19-1. Paul is a financial analyst for King Investments, Inc., a brokerage firm. He uses the Internet to investigate the background and activities of companies that might be good investments for King's customers. While visiting the Web site of Business Research, Inc., Paul sees on his screen a message that reads, "Welcome to businessresearch.com. By visiting our site, you have been entered as a subscriber to our e-publication, Companies Unlimited. This publication will be sent to you daily at a cost of $7.50 per week. An invoice will be included with Companies Unlimited every four weeks. You may cancel your subscription at any time." Has Paul entered into an enforceable contract to pay for Companies Unlimited? Why or why not?

19-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Anne is a reporter for Daily Business Journal, a print publication consulted by investors and other businesspersons. She often uses the Internet to conduct research for the articles that she writes for the publication. While visiting the Web site of Cyberspace Investments Corp., Anne reads a pop-up window that states, "Our business newsletter, E-Commerce Weekly, is available at a one-year subscription rate of $5 per issue. To subscribe, enter your e-mail address below and click 'SUBSCRIBE.' By subscribing, you agree to the terms of the subscriber's agreement. To read this agreement, click 'AGREEMENT.'" Anne enters her e-mail address, but does not click on "AGREEMENT" to read the terms. Has Anne entered into an enforceable contract to pay for E-Commerce Weekly? Explain.

- For a sample answer to Question 19-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

19-3. Bob, a sales representative for Central Computer Co., occasionally uses the Internet to obtain information about his customers and to look for new sales leads. While visiting the Web site of Marketing World, Inc., Bob is presented with an on-screen message that offers, "To improve your ability to make deals, read our monthly online magazine, Sales Genius, available at a subscription rate of $15 a month. To subscribe, fill in your name, company name, and e-mail address below, and click 'YES!' By clicking 'YES!' you agree to the terms of the subscription contract. To read this contract, click 'TERMS.'" Among those terms is a clause that allows Marketing World to charge interest for subscription bills not paid within a certain time. The terms also prohibit subscribers from copying or distributing part or all of Sales Genius in any form. Bob subscribes without reading the terms. Marketing World later files a suit against Bob based on his failure to pay for his subscription. Should the court hold that Bob is obligated to pay interest on the amount? Explain.

19-4. Browse-Wrap Terms. Ticketmaster Corp. operates a Web site that allows customers to buy tickets to concerts, ball games, and other events. On the site's home page are instructions and an index to internal pages (one page per event). Each event page provides basic information (a short description of the event, with the date, time, place, and price) and a description of how to order tickets over the Internet, by telephone, by mail, or in person. The home page contains—if a customer scrolls to the bottom—"terms and conditions" that proscribe, among other things, linking to Ticketmaster's internal pages. A customer need not view these terms to go to an event page. Tickets.Com, Inc., operates a Web site that also publicizes special events. Tickets.Com's site includes links to Ticketmaster's internal events pages. These links bypass Ticketmaster's home page. Ticketmaster filed a suit in a federal district court against Tickets.Com, alleging, in part, breach of contract on the ground that Tickets.Com's linking violated Ticketmaster's terms and conditions. Tickets.Com filed a motion to dismiss. Was Tickets.Com bound by the terms and conditions posted on Ticketmaster's home page? Why or why not? How should the court rule on the motion? [Ticketmaster Corp. v. Tickets.Com, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (C.D.Cal. 2000)]

19-5. Shrink-Wrap Agreements. 1-A Equipment Co. signed a sales order to lease Accware 10 User NT software, which is made and marketed by ICode, Inc. Just above the signature line, the order stated: "Thank you for your order. No returns or refunds will be issued for software license and/or services. All sales are final. Please read the End User License and Service Agreement." The software was delivered in a sealed envelope inside a box. On the outside of the envelope, an "End User Agreement" provided, in part, "BY OPENING THIS PACKAGING, CLICKING YOUR ACCEPTANCE OF THE AGREEMENT DURING DOWNLOAD OR INSTALLATION OF THIS PRODUCT, OR BY USING ANY PART OF THIS PRODUCT, YOU AGREE TO BE LEGALLY BOUND BY THE TERMS OF THE AGREEMENT. . . . This agreement will be governed by the laws in force in the Commonwealth of Virginia . . . and exclusive venue for any litigation shall be in Virginia." Later, dissatisfied with the software, 1-A filed a suit in a Massachusetts state court against ICode, alleging breach of contract and misrepresentation. ICode asked the court to dismiss the case on the basis of the "End User Agreement." Is the agreement enforceable? Should the court dismiss the suit? Why or why not? [1-A Equipment Co. v. ICode, Inc., ___ N.E.2d ___ (Mass. Dist. 2000)]

19-6. Click-On Agreements. America Online, Inc. (AOL), provided e-mail service to Walter Hughes and other members under a click-on agreement titled "Terms of Service." This agreement consisted of three parts: a "Member Agreement," "Community Guidelines," and a "Privacy Policy." The Member Agreement included a forum-selection clause that read, "You expressly agree that exclusive jurisdiction for any claim or dispute with AOL or relating in any way to your membership or your use of AOL resides in the courts of Virginia.” When Officer Thomas McMenamon of the Methuen, Massachusetts, Police Department received threatening e-mail sent from an AOL account, he requested and obtained from AOL Hughes’s name and other personal information. Hughes filed a suit in a federal district court against AOL, which filed a motion to dismiss on the basis of the forum-selection clause. Considering that the clause was a click-on provision, is it enforceable? Explain. [Hughes v. McMenamon, 204 F.Supp.2d 178 (D.Mass. 2002)]

19-7. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Stewart Lamle invented “Farook,” a board game similar to “Tic Tac Toe.” In May 1996, Lamle began negotiating with Mattel, Inc., to license Farook for distribution outside the United States. On June 11, 1997, the parties met and agreed on many terms, including a three-year duration, the geographic scope of the agreement, a schedule for payment, and a royalty percentage. On June 26, Mike Bucher, a Mattel employee, sent Lamle an e-mail titled “Farook Deal” that repeated these terms and added that they “ha[ve] been agreed [to] . . . by . . . Mattel subject to contract. . . . Best regards Mike Bucher.” Lamle faxed Mattel a more formal draft of the terms, but Mattel did not sign it. Mattel displayed Farook at its Pre-Toy Fair in August. After the fair, Mattel sent Lamle a fax saying that it no longer wished to license his game. Lamle filed a suit in a federal district court against Mattel, asserting, in part, breach of contract. One of the issues was whether the parties had entered into a contract. Could Bucher’s name on the June 26 e-mail be considered a valid signature under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act (UETA)? Could it be considered a valid signature outside the UETA? Why or why not? [Lamle v. Mattel, Inc., 394 F.3d 1355 (Fed.Cir. 2005)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 19-7, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 19,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

19-8. Shrink-Wrap Agreements and Browse-Wrap Terms.

Mary DeFontes bought a computer and a service contract from Dell Computers Corp. DeFontes was charged $950.51, of which $13.51 was identified on the invoice as “tax.” This amount was paid to the state of Rhode Island. DeFontes and other Dell customers filed a suit in a Rhode Island state court against Dell, claiming that Dell was overcharging its customers by collecting a tax on service contracts and transportation costs. Dell asked the court to order DeFontes to submit the dispute to arbitration. Dell cited its “Terms and Conditions Agreement,” which provided, in part, that by accepting delivery of Dell’s products or services, a customer agrees to submit any dispute to arbitration. Customers can view this agreement through an inconspicuous link at the bottom of Dell’s Web site, and Dell encloses a copy with each order when it is shipped. Dell argued that DeFontes accepted these terms by failing to return her purchase within thirty days, although the agreement did not state this. Is DeFontes bound to the “Terms and Conditions Agreement”? Should the court grant Dell’s request? Why or why not? [DeFontes v. Dell Computers Corp., ___ A.2d ___ (R.I. 2004)]

19-9. Online Acceptances. Internet Archive (IA) is devoted to preserving a record of resources on the Internet for future generations. IA uses the “Wayback Machine” to automatically browse Web sites and reproduce their contents in an archive. IA does not ask the owners’ permission before copying their material but will remove it on request. Suzanne Shell, a resident of Colorado, owns www.profane-justice.org, which is dedicated to providing information to individuals accused of child abuse or neglect. The site warns, “IF YOU COPY OR DISTRIBUTE ANYTHING ON THIS SITE YOU ARE ENTERING INTO A CONTRACT.” The terms, which can be accessed only by clicking on a link, include, among other charges, a fee of $5,000 for each page copied “in advance of printing.” Neither the warning nor the terms require a user to indicate assent. When Shell discovered that the Wayback Machine had copied the contents of her site—approximately eighty-seven times between May 1999 and October 2004—she asked IA to remove the copies from its archive and pay her $100,000. IA removed the copies and filed a suit in a federal district court against Shell, who responded, in part, with a counterclaim for breach of contract. IA filed a motion to dismiss this claim. Did IA contract with Shell? Explain. [Internet Archive v. Shell, 505 F.Supp.2d 755 (D.Colo. 2007)]

19-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

In 2000 and 2001, Dewayne Hubbert, Elden Craft, Chris Grout, and Rhonda Byington bought computers from Dell Corp. through its Web site. Before buying, Hubbert and the others configured their own computers. To make a purchase, each buyer completed forms on five Web pages. On each page, Dell’s “Terms and Conditions of Sale” were accessible by clicking on a blue hyperlink. A statement on three of the pages read, “All sales are subject to Dell’s Term[s] and Conditions of Sale,” but a buyer was not required to click an assent to the terms to complete a purchase. The terms were also printed on the backs of the invoices and on separate documents contained in the shipping boxes with the computers. Among those terms was a “Binding Arbitration” clause. The computers contained Pentium 4 microprocessors, which Dell advertised as the fastest, most powerful Intel Pentium processor available. In 2002, Hubbert and the others filed a suit in an Illinois state court against Dell, alleging that this marketing was false, misleading, and deceptive. The plaintiffs claimed that the Pentium 4 microprocessor was slower and less powerful, and provided less performance, than either a Pentium III or an AMD Athlon, and at a greater cost. Dell asked the court to compel arbitration. [Hubbert v. Dell Corp., 359 Ill.App.3d 976, 835 N.E.2d 113, 296 Ill.Dec. 258 (5 Dist. 2005)]

- (a) Should the court enforce the arbitration clause in this case? If you were the judge, how would you rule on this issue?
- (b) In your opinion, do shrink-wrap, click-on, and browse-wrap terms impose too great a burden on purchasers? Why or why not?
- (c) An ongoing complaint about shrink-wrap, click-on and browse-wrap terms is that sellers (often large corporations) draft them and buyers (typically individual consumers) do not read them. Should purchasers be bound in contract by terms that they have not even read? Why or why not?
- (a) According to the instructor in the video, what is the key factor in determining whether a particular term in an online agreement is enforceable?
- (b) Suppose that you click on “I accept” in order to download software from the Internet. You do not read the terms of the agreement before accepting it, even though you know that such agreements often contain forum-selection and arbitration clauses. The software later causes irreparable harm to your computer system, and you want to sue. When you go to the Web site and view the agreement, however, you discover that a choice-of-law clause in the contract specifies that the law of Nigeria controls. Is this term enforceable? Is it a term that should be reasonably expected in an online contract?
- (c) Does it matter what the term actually says if it is a type of term that one could reasonably expect to be in the contract? What arguments can be made for and against enforcing a choice-of-law clause in an online contract?

19-11. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select “Chapter 19.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled E-Contracts: Agreeing Online. Then answer the following questions.

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

You can access the UCC, including Article 2, at the Web site of Cornell University Law School. Go to www.law.cornell.edu/ucc/ucc.table.html

The Web site of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws provides the draft and final versions of the UETA, lists the states that have adopted it, and offers information on why states should adopt it, at

www.nccusl.org

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select “Chapter 19” and click on “Internet Exercises.” There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 19-1: Legal Perspective
E-Contract Formation

Internet Exercise 19-2: Management Perspective
E-Signatures

Contract Law and the Application of Ethics

Generally, as you read in Chapter 5, a responsible business manager will evaluate a business transaction on the basis of three criteria—legality, profitability, and ethics. But what does acting ethically mean in the area of contracts? If an individual with whom you enter into a contract fails to look after her or his own interests, is that your fault? Should you be doing something about it? If the contract happens to be to your advantage and to the other party's detriment, do you have a responsibility to correct the situation?

For example, suppose that your neighbor puts a "For sale" sign on her car, offering to sell it for $6,000. You learn that she is moving to another state and needs the extra cash to help finance the move. You know that she could easily get $10,000 for the car, and you are considering purchasing it and then reselling it at a profit. But you also discover that your neighbor is completely unaware that she has priced the car significantly below its Blue Book value. Are you ethically obligated to tell her that she is essentially giving away $4,000 if she sells you the car for only $6,000?

This kind of situation, transplanted into the world of commercial transactions, raises an obvious question: At what point should the sophisticated businessperson cease looking after his or her own economic welfare and become "his brother's keeper," so to speak?

Freedom of Contract and Freedom from Contract

The answer to the question just raised is not simple. On the one hand, a common ethical assumption in our society is that individuals should be held responsible for the consequences of their own actions, including their contractual promises. This principle is expressed in the legal concept of freedom of contract. On the other hand, another common assumption in our society is that individuals should not harm one another by their actions. This is the basis of both tort law and criminal law.

In the area of contract law, ethical behavior often involves balancing these principles. In the above example, if you purchased the car and your neighbor later learned its true value and sued you for the difference, very likely no court of law would find that the contract should be rescinded. At times, however, courts will hold that the principle of freedom of contract should give way to the principle of freedom from contract, a doctrine based on the assumption that people should not be harmed by the actions of others. We look next at some examples of situations in which parties to contracts may be excused from performance under their contracts to prevent injustice.

Impossibility of Performance The doctrine of impossibility of performance is based to some extent on the ethical question of whether one party should suffer economic loss when it is impossible to perform a contract. The rule that one is "bound by his or her contracts" is not followed when performance becomes impossible. This doctrine, however, is applied only when the parties themselves did not consciously assume the risk of the events that rendered performance impossible. Furthermore, this doctrine rests on the assumption that the party claiming the defense of impossibility has acted ethically.

A contract is discharged, for example, if it calls for the delivery of a particular car and, through no fault of either party, this car is stolen and completely demolished in an accident. Yet the doctrine would not excuse performance if the party agreeing to sell the car caused its destruction by her or his negligence.

Before the late nineteenth century, courts were reluctant to discharge a contract even when performance was literally impossible. Just as society's ethics changes with the passage of time, however, the law also changes to reflect society's new perceptions of ethical behavior.¹ Today, courts are much more willing to discharge a contract when its performance has become literally impossible. Holding a party in breach of contract, when performance has become impossible through no fault of that party, no longer coincides with society's notions of fairness.

Unconscionability The doctrine of unconscionability is a good example of how the law attempts to enforce ethical behavior. Under this doctrine, a contract may be deemed to be so unfair to one party as to be unenforceable—even though that

1. A leading English case in which the court held that a defendant was discharged from the duty to perform due to impossibility of performance is Taylor v. Caldwell, 122 Eng.Rep. 309 (K.B. [King's Bench] 1863).

(Continued)

party voluntarily agreed to the contract's terms. Unconscionable action, like unethical action, defies precise definition. Information about the particular facts and specific circumstances surrounding the contract is essential. For example, a court might find that a contract made with a marginally literate consumer was unfair and unenforceable but might uphold the same contract made with a major business firm.

Section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code, which incorporates the common law concept of unconscionability, similarly does not define the concept with any precision. Rather, it leaves it to the courts to determine when a contract is so one sided and unfair to one party as to be unconscionable and thus unenforceable.

Usually, courts will do all that they can to save contracts rather than render them unenforceable. Only in extreme situations, as when a contract or clause is so one sided as to "shock the conscience" of the court, will a court hold a contract or contractual clause unconscionable.

Exculpatory Clauses In some situations, courts have also refused to enforce exculpatory clauses on the ground that they are unconscionable or contrary to public policy. An exculpatory clause attempts to excuse a party from liability in the event of monetary or physical injury, no matter who is at fault. In some situations, such clauses are upheld. For example, a health club can require its members to sign a clause releasing the club from any liability for injuries the members might incur while using the club's equipment and facilities. The law permits parties to assume, by express agreement, the risks inherent in certain activities. In such situations, exculpatory clauses make it possible for a firm's owner to stay in business—by shifting some of the liability risks from the business to the customer.

Nonetheless, some jurisdictions take a dubious view of exculpatory clauses, particularly when the agreement is between parties with unequal bargaining power, such as a landlord and a tenant or an employer and an employee. An exculpatory clause that attempts to exempt an employer from all liability for negligence toward its employees frequently is held to be against public policy and thus void.² The courts reason that disparity in bargaining power and economic necessity force the employee to accept the employer's terms.

2. See, for example, City of Santa Barbara v. Superior Court, 62 Cal.Rptr.3d 527, 161 P.3d 1095 (2007); and Health Net of California, Inc. v. Department of Health Services, 113 Cal.App.4th 224, 6 Cal.Rptr.3d 235 (2003).

Covenants Not to Compete

In today's complicated, technological business world, knowledge learned on the job, including trade secrets, has become a valuable commodity. To prevent this knowledge from falling into the hands of competitors, more and more employers are requiring their employees to sign covenants not to compete. The increasing number of lawsuits over noncompete clauses in employment contracts has caused many courts to reconsider the reasonableness of these covenants.

Should Courts Reform Unreasonable Noncompete Covenants? In a number of jurisdictions, if a court finds that a restraint in a noncompete covenant is not reasonable in light of the circumstances, it will reform the unreasonable provision and then enforce it. For example, a court might rewrite an unreasonable restriction by reducing the time period during which a former employee cannot compete from three years to one year, and then enforce the reformed agreement.³

Other jurisdictions are not so "employer friendly" and refuse to enforce unreasonable covenants. As one observer noted, the farther west you go from the Mississippi River, the harder it is to enforce a covenant not to compete. Under California law, covenants not to compete are illegal, and other western states tend to regard such covenants with suspicion. For example, the Washington Supreme Court has refused to reform noncompete covenants that are unreasonable and lacking in consideration.⁴ Courts in Arizona and Texas have reached similar conclusions.⁵

Some commentators argue that when the courts modify and then enforce unreasonable covenants, this only encourages employers to continue to create unreasonable covenants—for two reasons: (1) most noncompete covenants are never

3. See, for example, Estee Lauder Companies, Inc. v. Batra, 430 F.Supp.2d 158 (S.D.N.Y. 2006); National Café Services, Ltd. v. Podaras, 148 S.W.3d 194 (Tex.App.—Waco 2004); Pathfinder Communications Corp. v. Macy, 795 N.E.2d 1103 (Ind.App. 2003); and Health Care Enterprises, Inc. v. Levy, 715 So.2d 341 (Fla.App.4th 1998).

4. See, for example, Labriola v. Pollard Group, Inc., 152 Wash.2d 828, 100 P.3d 791 (2004).

5. Hardy v. Mann Frankfort Stein & Lipp Advisors, Inc. ___ S.W.3d ___ (Tex.App.—Houston [1 Dist.] 2007); and Varsity Gold, Inc. v. Porzio, 202 Ariz. 355, 45 P.3d 352 (2002).

challenged in court, and (2) if a covenant is contested, the worst that can happen is that the court will modify, and then enforce, the covenant.

Do Noncompete Covenants Stifle Innovation?

One of the reasons that the courts usually look closely at covenants not to compete and evaluate them on a case-by-case basis is the strong public policy favoring competition in this country. Even so, claim some scholars, covenants not to compete, regardless of their “reasonability,” may stifle competition and innovation.

Consider, for example, the argument put forth by Ronald Gilson, a Stanford University professor of law and business. He contends that California’s prohibition on covenants not to compete may help to explain why technological innovation and economic growth have skyrocketed in California’s Silicon Valley, while technological development along Massachusetts’s Route 128 has languished. According to Gilson, “The different legal rules governing postemployment covenants not to compete in California and Massachusetts help explain the difference in employee job mobility and therefore the knowledge transfer that [is] a critical factor in explaining the differential performance of Silicon Valley and Route 128.”⁶ For this and for other reasons, some scholars contend that covenants not to compete may not survive the cyber age.⁷ Certainly, such covenants present new types of challenges for the courts in deciding what restrictions are reasonable in the context of the Internet.⁸

Oral Contracts and Promissory Estoppel

Oral contracts are made every day. Many—if not most—of them are carried out, and no problems arise. Occasionally, however, oral contracts are not performed, and one party decides to sue the other. Sometimes, to prevent injustice, the courts will enforce oral contracts under the theory of promissory estoppel if detrimental reliance can be shown. The court may even use this theory to remove a contract from the Statute of Frauds—that is, render the oral contract enforceable.

6. Ronald J. Gilson, “The Legal Infrastructure of High Technology Industrial Districts: Silicon Valley, Route 128, and Covenants Not to Compete,” 575 New York University Law Review 579 (June 1999).

7. See, for example, Robert C. Welsh, Larry C. Drapkin, and Samantha C. Grant, “Are Noncompete Clauses Kaput?” The National Law Journal, August 14, 2000, pp. B13–B14.

8. For an example of a dispute in the Internet context, see EarthWeb v. Schlack, 71 F.Supp.2d 299 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

In addition, ethical standards certainly underlie the doctrine of promissory estoppel, under which a person who has reasonably relied on the promise of another to his or her detriment can often obtain some measure of recovery. Essentially, promissory estoppel allows a variety of promises to be enforced even though they lack what is formally regarded as consideration.

An oral promise made by an insurance agent to a business owner, for example, may be binding if the owner relies on that promise to her or his detriment. Employees who rely to their detriment on an employer’s promise may be able to recover under the doctrine of promissory estoppel. A contractor who, when bidding for a job, relies on a subcontractor’s promise to perform certain construction work at a certain price may be able to recover, on the basis of promissory estoppel, any damages sustained because of the subcontractor’s failure to perform. These are but a few of the many examples in which the courts, in the interests of fairness and justice, have estopped a promisor from denying that a contract existed.

Oral Contracts and the Statute of Frauds

As you learned in Chapter 15, the Statute of Frauds was originally enacted in England in 1677. The act was intended to prevent harm to innocent parties by requiring written evidence of agreements concerning important transactions.

Until the Statute of Frauds was passed, the English courts had enforced oral contracts on the strength of oral testimony by witnesses. Under these conditions, it was not too difficult to evade justice by procuring “convincing” witnesses to support the claim that a contract had been created and then breached. The possibility of fraud in such actions was enhanced by the fact that seventeenth-century English courts did not allow oral testimony to be given by the parties to a lawsuit—or by any parties with an interest in the litigation, such as husbands or wives. Defense against actions for breach of contract was thus limited to written evidence or the testimony of third parties.

Detrimental Reliance Under the Statute of Frauds, if a contract is oral when it is required to be in writing, it will not, as a rule, be enforced by the courts. An exception to this rule is made if a party has reasonably relied, to his or her detriment, on the oral contract. Enforcing an oral contract on the basis of a party's reliance arguably undercuts the essence of the Statute of Frauds. The reason that such an exception is made is to prevent the statute—which was created to prevent injustice—from being used to promote injustice. Nevertheless, this use of the doctrine is controversial—as is the Statute of Frauds itself.

(Continued)

Criticisms of the Statute of Frauds Since its inception more than three hundred years ago, the statute has been criticized by some because, although it was created to protect the innocent, it can also be used as a technical defense by a party breaching a genuine, mutually agreed-on oral contract—if the contract falls within the Statute of Frauds. For this reason, some legal scholars believe the act has caused more injustice than it has prevented. Thus, exceptions are sometimes made—such as under the doctrine of promissory estoppel—to prevent unfairness and inequity. Generally, the courts are slow to apply the statute if doing so will result in obvious injustice. In some instances, this has required a good deal of inventiveness on the part of the courts.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that you contract to purchase steel at a fixed price per ton. Before the contract is performed, a lengthy steelworkers' strike causes the price of steel to triple from the price specified in the contract. If you demand that the supplier fulfill the contract, the supplier will go out of business. What are your ethical obligations in this situation? What are your legal rights?
2. Many countries have no Statute of Frauds, and even England, the country that created the original act, has repealed it. Should the United States do likewise? What are some of the costs and benefits to society of the Statute of Frauds?
3. In determining whether an exculpatory clause should be enforced, why does it matter whether the contract containing the clause involves essential services (such as transportation) or nonessential services (such as skiing or other leisure-time activities)?
4. Employers often include covenants not to compete in employment contracts to protect their trade secrets. What effect, if any, will the growth in e-commerce have on the reasonability of covenants not to compete?

UNIT FOUR

Domestic and International Sales and Lease Contracts

CONTENTS

- 20 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts
- 21 Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest
- 22 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts
- 23 Warranties and Product Liability

CHAPTER 20

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

When we turn to contracts for the sale and lease of goods, we move away from common law principles and into the area of statutory law. State statutory law governing sales and lease transactions is based on the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), which, as mentioned in Chapter 1, has been adopted as law by all of the states.¹

The UCC is widely viewed as one of the most important legal developments in the United States.

1. Louisiana has not adopted Articles 2 and 2A, however.

We open this chapter with a discussion of the UCC's historical significance as a legal landmark. We then look at the scope of the UCC's Article 2 (on sales) and Article 2A (on leases) as a background to the topic of this chapter, which is the formation of contracts for the sale and lease of goods. The goal of the UCC is to simplify and streamline commercial transactions, allowing parties to form contracts without observing the same degree of formality used in forming other types of contracts.

Today, businesses often engage in sales and lease transactions on a global scale. Because international sales transactions are increasingly commonplace, we conclude the chapter with an examination of the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG), which governs international sales contracts. The CISG is a model uniform law that applies only when a nation has adopted it, just as the UCC applies only to the extent it has been adopted by a state.

The Uniform Commercial Code

In the early years of this nation, sales law varied from state to state, and this lack of uniformity complicated the formation of multistate sales contracts. The problems became especially troublesome in the late nineteenth century as multistate contracts became the norm. For this reason, numerous attempts were made to produce a uniform body of laws relating to commercial transactions. The National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) drafted two uniform ("model") acts that were widely adopted by the states: the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law (1896) and the Uniform Sales Act (1906). Several other proposed uniform acts followed, although most were not as widely adopted.

In the 1940s, the NCCUSL recognized the need to integrate the half dozen or so uniform acts covering commercial transactions into a single, comprehensive body of statutory law. The NCCUSL developed the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) to serve that purpose. First issued in 1949, the UCC facilitates commercial transactions by making the laws governing sales and lease contracts clearer, simpler, and more readily applicable to the numerous difficulties that can arise during such transactions.

Comprehensive Coverage of the UCC

The UCC is the single most comprehensive codification of the broad spectrum of laws involved in a total commercial transaction. The UCC views the entire "commercial transaction for the sale of and payment for goods" as a single legal occurrence having numerous facets.

You can gain an idea of the UCC's comprehensiveness by looking at the titles of the articles of the UCC in Appendix C. As you will note, Article 1, titled "General Provisions," sets forth definitions and general principles applicable to commercial transactions, including an obligation to perform in "good faith" all contracts falling under the UCC [UCC 1–203]. Article 1 thus provides the basic groundwork for the remaining articles, each of which focuses on a particular aspect of commercial transactions.

A Single, Integrated Framework for Commercial Transactions

The UCC attempts to provide a consistent and integrated framework of rules to deal with all the phases ordinarily arising in a commercial sales transaction from start to finish. A simple example will illustrate how several articles of the UCC can apply to a single commercial transaction. Suppose that a consumer—a person who purchases goods primarily for personal or household use—buys a stainless steel, bottom-freezer refrigerator from an appliance store. The consumer agrees to pay for the refrigerator on an installment plan.

Because the transaction involves a contract for the sale of goods, Article 2 will apply. If the consumer gives a check as the down payment on the purchase price, it will be negotiated and ultimately passed through one or more banks for collection. This process is the subject matter of Article 3, Negotiable Instruments, and Article 4, Bank Deposits and Collections. If the appliance store extends credit to the consumer through an installment plan, it may retain a lien (a legal right or interest) on the refrigerator (the collateral, which is the property pledged as security against a debt). If so, then Article 9, Secured Transactions, will be applicable (secured transactions will be discussed in detail in Chapter 29).

Suppose, in addition, that the appliance company must obtain the refrigerator from the manufacturer's warehouse before shipping it by common carrier to the consumer. The storage and shipment of goods are the subject matter of Article 7, Documents of Title. To pay the manufacturer, which is located in another state, for the refrigerator supplied, the appliance company may use a letter of credit—the subject matter of Article 5.

Periodic Revisions of the UCC

Various articles and sections of the UCC are periodically revised or supplemented to clarify certain rules or to establish new rules when changes in business customs have rendered the existing UCC provisions inapplicable. For example, because of the increasing importance of leases of goods in the commercial context, Article 2A, governing leases, was added to the UCC. To clarify the rights of parties to commercial fund transfers, particularly electronic fund transfers, Article 4A was issued.

Articles 3 and 4, covering negotiable instruments and banking, underwent a significant revision in the 1990s, as did Articles 5, 8, and 9. Because of other changes in business practices and in the law, the NCCUSL has recommended the repeal of Article 6 (on bulk transfers) and has offered a revised Article 6 to those states that prefer not to repeal it. Article 1 was revised in 2001, and the NCCUSL approved amendments to Articles 3 and 4 in 2002. In 2003, the NCCUSL approved amendments to Articles 2 and 2A, and to Article 7, in an attempt to update the UCC to accommodate electronic commerce and electronic documents of title. Although the majority of the states have adopted the 2003 amendments to Article 7, no state has enacted the 2003 amendments to Articles 2 and 2A.² Nevertheless, you need to be aware of potential changes in the law. Exhibit 20–1 on the next page summarizes the most significant modifications that would occur if a state adopted the amendments to Article 2.

The Scope of Article 2— The Sale of Goods

Article 2 of the UCC (as adopted by state statutes) governs sales contracts, or contracts for the sale of goods. To facilitate commercial transactions, Article 2 modifies some of the common law contract requirements that were discussed in the previous chapters. To the extent that it has not been modified by the UCC, however, the common law of contracts also applies to sales contracts. For example, the common law requirements for a valid contract—agreement (offer and acceptance), consideration, capacity, and legality—that were summarized in Chapter 10 and discussed at length in Chapters 11 through 13 are also applicable to sales contracts. Thus, you should reexamine these common law principles when studying the law of sales.

In general, the rule is that whenever a conflict arises between a common law contract rule and the state statutory law based on the UCC, the UCC controls. In other words, when a UCC provision addresses a certain issue, the UCC rule governs; when the UCC is silent, the common law governs. The relationship between general contract law and the law governing sales of goods is illustrated in Exhibit 20–2.

2. Because no state has adopted the 2003 amendments to Articles 2 and 2A, we base our discussion of sales and lease contracts in this text on the law prior to the 2003 amendments.

EXHIBIT 20-1 • The 2003 Amendments to UCC Article 2: Selected Provisions*

GENERAL CHANGES

- Electronic contracting—The 2003 amendments reflect the rise of electronic contracting (for example, the word record is substituted for the word writing) and the provisions of the federal law governing e-signatures (see Chapter 19).
- New protections for buyers—There would be some new protections for buyers, and some provisions would be applicable only to buyers who qualify as consumers. For example, specific language would be required to disclaim implied warranties (discussed in Chapter 23).
- Remedies—The amendments in UCC 2-703 and 2-711 give a complete list of the remedies available to buyers and sellers, respectively, on a breach of contract (see Chapter 22).

SOME IMPORTANT SPECIFIC CHANGES

- Shipping and delivery terms—The amendments would completely eliminate UCC 2-319 through 2-324, which deal with shipping and delivery terms (F.O.B., C.I.F., and others listed in Chapter 21 in Exhibit 21-1 on page 428). Additionally, risk of loss relating to goods to be delivered without movement (discussed in Chapter 22) would now pass on the buyer's receipt of the goods regardless of the seller's status as a merchant or nonmerchant.
- New sections on express warranties—With respect to new goods only, two new sections would extend to remote purchasers any express warranties made by a seller or lessor in an advertisement or in a record accompanying goods.
- Remedial promises—Added to the sections on express warranties would be a seller's obligation to honor a "remedial promise"—defined as a promise to repair, replace, or refund all or part of the price on the happening of a specified event.
- Seller's right to cure—This right would be extended (except in consumer contracts) to allow sellers, in some circumstances, to cure even after the time for performance has expired (the right to cure is discussed in Chapter 22).
- Contract formation—Under the 2003 amendments, the terms of the contract, subject to the parol evidence rule, are (1) the terms that appear in the records of both parties, (2) the terms to which both parties agree, and (3) the terms supplied or incorporated under UCC Article 2. (The existing rules governing contract terms when an acceptance states additional terms are discussed later in this chapter.)

MISCELLANEOUS CHANGES

- Statute of Frauds—The Statute of Frauds threshold amount would increase from $500 to $5,000, and the one-year rule would be repealed for contracts for the sale of goods [UCC 2-201].
- Assignment and delegation—Rules governing assignment and delegation [UCC 2-210] would be modified to conform to the revised Article 9, which deals with secured transactions (discussed in Chapter 29).
- Buyer's acceptance of nonconforming goods—When a buyer has accepted nonconforming goods [UCC 2-607(3)], the failure of the buyer to notify the seller of the breach would no longer operate as a bar to further recovery. Failure to give timely notice would prevent a remedy "only to the extent that the seller is prejudiced by the failure" (discussed in Chapters 22 and 23).
- Consequential damages—A seller would be able to recover consequential damages resulting from a buyer's breach under UCC 2-710. Under existing law, the seller is limited to incidental damages (see Chapter 22).
- Statute of limitations—The statute of limitations [UCC 2-725] would be modified to, among other things, clarify when a breach or cause of action accrues and to provide added protection for consumers (the statute of limitations is discussed in Chapter 23).

*This exhibit lists only selected changes made by the 2003 amendments. As of this writing, the amendments have not been adopted by any state.

In regard to Article 2, you should keep two things in mind. First, Article 2 deals with the sale of goods; it does not deal with real property (real estate), services, or intangible property such as stocks and bonds. Thus, if the subject matter of a dispute is goods, the UCC governs. If it is real estate or services, the common law applies. Second, in some situations, the rules may vary quite a bit, depending on whether the buyer or the seller is a merchant. We look now at how the UCC defines a sale, goods, and merchant status.

What Is a Sale?

The UCC defines a sale as "the passing of title [evidence of ownership rights] from the seller to the buyer for a price" [UCC 2-106(1)]. The price may be payable in cash or in other goods or services.

What Are Goods?

To be characterized as a good, an item of property must be tangible, and it must be movable. Tangible property has physical existence—it can be touched or seen. Intangible property—such as corporate stocks and bonds, patents and copyrights, and ordinary contract rights—has only conceptual existence and thus does not come under Article 2. A movable item can be carried from place to place. Hence, real estate is excluded from Article 2.

Two areas in particular give rise to disputes over whether the object of a contract is goods and thus

EXHIBIT 20-2 • The Law Governing Contracts

This exhibit graphically illustrates the relationship between general contract law and statutory law (UCC Article 2 and 2A) governing contracts for the sale and lease of goods. Sales contracts are not governed exclusively by Article 2 of the UCC but are also governed by general contract law whenever it is relevant and has not been modified by the UCC.

whether Article 2 is applicable. One problem concerns goods associated with real estate, such as crops or timber, and the other concerns contracts involving a combination of goods and services.

Goods Associated with Real Estate Goods associated with real estate often fall within the scope of Article 2. Section 2-107 provides the following rules:

1. A contract for the sale of minerals or the like (including oil and gas) or a structure (such as a building) is a contract for the sale of goods if severance, or separation, is to be made by the seller. If the buyer is to sever (separate) the minerals or structures from the land, the contract is considered to be a sale of real estate governed by the principles of real property law, not the UCC.
2. A sale of growing crops (such as potatoes, carrots, wheat, and the like) or timber to be cut is a contract for the sale of goods regardless of who severs them.
3. Other “things attached” to real property but capable of severance without material harm to the land are considered to be goods regardless of who severs them.³ Examples of “things attached” that are severable without harm to realty are a window air conditioner in a house and tables and stools in a restaurant. Thus, a sale of these items would be con-

3. The UCC avoids the term fixtures here because of the numerous definitions of the word. A fixture is anything so firmly or permanently attached to land or to a building as to become a part of it. Once personal property becomes a fixture, real estate law governs. See Chapter 47.

sidered a sale of goods. The test is whether removal will cause substantial harm to the real property to which the item is attached.

Goods and Services Combined In cases involving contracts in which goods and services are combined, courts have reached different results. For example, is providing blood to a patient during an operation a “sale of goods” or the “performance of a medical service”? Some courts say it is a good; others say it is a service. Because the UCC does not provide the answers to such questions, the courts generally use the predominant-factor test to determine whether a contract is primarily for the sale of goods or for the sale of services.⁴ This determination is important because if a court decides that a mixed contract is primarily a goods contract, any dispute, even a dispute over the service portion, will be decided under the UCC. Likewise, any dispute over a predominantly services contract will not be decided using the UCC, even if the dispute involves the goods portion of the contract.

For example, an Indiana company contracts to purchase customized software from Dharma Systems. The contract states that half of the purchase price is for Dharma Systems’ professional services and the other

4. UCC 2-314(1) does stipulate that serving food or drinks is a “sale of goods” for purposes of the implied warranty of merchantability, as will be discussed in Chapter 23. The UCC also specifies that selling unborn animals or rare coins qualifies as a “sale of goods.”

half is for the goods (the software). If the court determines that the contract is predominantly for the software, rather than the services to customize the software, the court will hold that the transaction falls under Article 2.⁵ Conversely, if the court finds that the services are predominant, it will hold that the transaction is not governed by the UCC. If the transaction is not covered by the UCC, then UCC provisions, including those relating to implied warranties, will not apply.

Who Is a Merchant?

Article 2 governs the sale of goods in general. It applies to sales transactions between all buyers and sellers. In a limited number of instances, though, the UCC presumes that special business standards ought to be imposed because of merchants' relatively high degree of commercial expertise.⁶ Such standards do not apply to the casual or inexperienced seller or buyer ("consumer"). Section 2-104 sets forth three ways in which merchant status can arise:

1. A merchant is a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract. Thus, a retailer, a wholesaler, or a manufacturer is a merchant of the goods sold in the particular business. A merchant for one type of goods is not necessarily a merchant for another type. For example, a sporting goods retailer is a merchant when selling tennis rackets but not when selling a used computer.

2. A merchant is a person who, by occupation, holds himself or herself out as having knowledge and skill unique to the practices or goods involved in the transaction. This broad definition may include banks or universities as merchants.
3. A person who employs a merchant as a broker, agent, or other intermediary has the status of merchant in that transaction. Hence, if a "gentleman farmer" who ordinarily does not run the farm hires a broker to purchase or sell livestock, the farmer is considered a merchant in the transaction.

In summary, a person is a merchant when she or he, acting in a mercantile capacity, possesses or uses an expertise specifically related to the goods being sold. This basic distinction is not always clear-cut. For example, state courts appear to be split on whether farmers should be considered merchants.⁷ In some states, farmers are considered merchants because they sell products or livestock on a regular basis. In other states, courts have held that the drafters of the UCC did not intend to include farmers as merchants.

In the following case, the court was asked to determine whether a cattle "order buyer" was a merchant when there was a lapse of time between his transactions.

5. See Micro Data Base Systems, Inc. v. Dharma Systems, Inc., 148 F.3d 649 (7th Cir. 1998).

6. The provisions that apply only to merchants deal principally with the Statute of Frauds, firm offers, confirmatory memoranda, warranties, and contract modification. These special rules reflect expedient business practices commonly known to merchants in the commercial setting. They will be discussed later in this chapter.

7. See the court's discussion of this issue in R. F. Cunningham & Co. v. Driscoll, 7 Misc.3d 234, 790 N.Y.S.2d 368 (2005).

CASE 20.1 Hammer v. Thompson

Court of Appeals of Kansas, 2006. 35 Kan.App.2d 165, 129 P.3d 609.

www.kscourts.org/kscases^a - Background and Facts In spring 2002, near Richmond, Kansas, Steve Hammer and Ron Howe placed 150 breeding heifers with Kevin Thompson for grazing. Thompson sold the cattle to Roger Morris, who was doing business as Morris Cattle Company and Auction Service, for $131,750. Morris sold the cattle through Farm Bureau Management Corporation, doing business as BIC Cattle, to Nick Hunt. Hunt, in business as Clan Farms, Inc., sold the cattle to IBP Foods, Inc. (now known as Tyson Fresh Meats). Hammer and Howe filed a suit in a Kansas state court against Morris and the others, alleging conversion (see Chapter 6). Morris admitted that he bought the cattle but argued that the claim against him was barred because he was a "buyer in the ordinary course of business" from Thompson, who was a. In the body of the text, in the third line, click on the "Court of Appeals" link. On the page that opens, scroll to the name of the case and click on it to access the opinion. The Kansas courts, the Washburn University School of Law Library, and the University of Kansas School of Law Library maintain this Web site.

CASE 20.1 CONTINUED a merchant under Article 2.^b Morris filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court granted. Hammer and Howe appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
BRAZIL, J. [Judge]

* * * *

The parties indicate that Thompson was involved in order buying cattle. Thompson described order buying as acting as the middleman between the purchaser and the seller. “I buy the cattle for the man that’s purchasing them and try to help the man that’s selling them get rid of them or sell them.” [Emphasis added.]

* * * *

To support their argument that Thompson was not a merchant, Hammer and Howe argue that Thompson had no intention of being an order buyer of cattle * * *. Hammer and Howe contend there is no evidence that Thompson was running an order buying business in May 2002 when he sold the Hammer/Howe cattle * * *. Hammer and Howe assert that Thompson’s documented sales were in the months of October and November 2002, after the May 2002 sale of Hammer and Howe’s cattle to Morris.

Morris argues that Thompson was a merchant, pointing to the following facts: Thompson began an order buying business while working at Greeley Farms [in Kansas] and Hammer sold Thompson 300 head of cattle earlier in the summer. Thompson held himself out as a person with specialized knowledge of pasturing cattle, Thompson had documented purchases and sales of cattle as early as March 2001 and had bought or sold cattle as an order buyer in at least 60 different transactions.

* * * *

* * * Between March 15, 2001, and December 20, 2001, there were 25 transactions where Thompson was the buyer and 6 where Thompson was the seller. Additionally, Thompson confirmed * * * his cattle sales and purchases for calendar year 2002. Between October 9, 2002, and November 21, 2002, Thompson was involved in at least one sale and at least 15 purchases as shown by his name listed on the invoices. There were additional invoices * * * where Thompson purchased cattle from Morris in 19 transactions between May 15, 2002, and August 18, 2002.

In the sale at issue, Thompson sold the cattle to Morris on May 18, 2002. There is a lapse in time between December 2001 and May 2002 where there are no records to support that Thompson was involved in order buying cattle. This is consistent with Thompson’s testimony that his initial intention was to [engage in a different business] when he moved to Richmond but that he began order buying because he did not have any income. * * * [T]he undisputed facts in the record support a finding that as a matter of law, Thompson was a merchant * * * .

* * * *

The court did not err in finding that Thompson was a merchant.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court upheld the finding of the lower court that Thompson was a merchant. The appellate court ruled, however, that Morris had not shown he was a “buyer in the ordinary course of business,” which was an essential element of his defense. The court reversed the summary judgment in Morris’s favor and remanded the case to the lower court for a determination on this issue.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If neither Thompson nor Morris had any experience in the business of cattle trading, how might the result in this case have been different?

● The Global Dimension Suppose that the transactions in which Thompson acted as an order-buyer had occurred in other countries. Would the court have still ruled that Thompson was a merchant? Why or why not?

b. Under UCC 2–403, entrusting goods to a merchant who deals in goods of the kind gives the merchant the power to transfer all rights to a buyer in the ordinary course of business (a person who, in good faith and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of a third party, buys in ordinary course from the merchant).

The Scope of Article 2A—Leases

In the past few decades, leases of personal property (goods) have become increasingly common. Consumers and business firms lease automobiles, industrial equipment, items for use in the home (such as floor polishers), and many other types of goods. Article 2A of the UCC was created to fill the need for uniform guidelines in this area. Article 2A covers any transaction that creates a lease of goods or a sublease of goods [UCC 2A-102, 2A-103(k)]. Article 2A is essentially a repetition of Article 2, except that it applies to leases of goods rather than sales of goods and thus varies to reflect differences between sales and lease transactions. (Note that Article 2A is not concerned with leases of real property, such as land or buildings. The laws governing these types of transactions will be examined in Chapter 48.)

Definition of a Lease Agreement

Article 2A defines a lease agreement as a lessor and lessee's bargain with respect to the lease of goods, as found in their language and as implied by other circumstances [UCC 2A-103(k)]. A lessor is one who transfers the right to the possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A-103(p)]. A lessee is one who acquires the right to the possession and use of goods under a lease [UCC 2A-103(o)]. In other words, the lessee is the party who is leasing the goods from the lessor. Article 2A applies to all types of leases of goods. Special rules apply to certain types of leases, however, including consumer leases and finance leases.

Consumer Leases

A consumer lease involves three elements: (1) a lessor who regularly engages in the business of leasing or selling; (2) a lessee (except an organization) who leases the goods "primarily for a personal, family, or household purpose"; and (3) total lease payments that are less than $25,000 [UCC 2A-103(1)(e)]. In the interest of providing special protection for consumers, certain provisions of Article 2A apply only to consumer leases. For example, one provision states that a consumer may recover attorneys' fees if a court determines that a term in a consumer lease contract is unconscionable [UCC 2A-108(4)(a)].

Finance Leases

A finance lease involves a lessor, a lessee, and a supplier. The lessor buys or leases goods from a supplier and leases or subleases them to the lessee [UCC 2A-103(g)]. Typically, in a finance lease, the lessor is simply financing the transaction. For example, suppose that Marlin Corporation wants to lease a crane for use in its construction business. Marlin's bank agrees to purchase the equipment from Jennco, Inc., and lease the equipment to Marlin. In this situation, the bank is the lessor-financer, Marlin is the lessee, and Jennco is the supplier.

Article 2A, unlike ordinary contract law, makes the lessee's obligations under a finance lease irrevocable and independent from the financier's obligations [UCC 2A-407]. In other words, the lessee must perform and continue to make lease payments even if the leased equipment turns out to be defective. The lessee must look almost entirely to the supplier for any recovery.

For example, American Transit Insurance Company (ATIC) arranged to lease telephone equipment through a finance lease. Siemens Credit Corporation obtained the equipment from the manufacturer and then leased the equipment to ATIC for a five-year term at $2,314 per month. When the equipment turned out to be defective, ATIC stopped making the lease payments. Siemens then sued ATIC for the lease payments due. ATIC alleged, among other things, that requiring it to make payments on defective equipment was unconscionable. According to the court, though, the lease clearly qualified as a finance lease under Article 2A, and thus ATIC was obligated to make all payments due under the lease regardless of the condition or performance of the leased equipment. The court stated that ATIC's claims could be brought only against the manufacturer, not against the lessor (Siemens).⁸

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

In regard to the formation of sales and lease contracts, the UCC modifies the common law in several ways. We look here at how Articles 2 and 2A of the UCC modify common law contract rules. Remember, though, that

8. Siemens Credit Corp. v. American Transit Insurance Co., 2001 WL 40775 (S.D.N.Y.2001).

CHAPTER 20 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

parties to sales contracts are free to establish whatever terms they wish. The UCC comes into play when the parties fail to provide in their contract for a contingency that later gives rise to a dispute. The UCC makes this very clear time and again by its use of such phrases as “unless the parties otherwise agree” and “absent a contrary agreement by the parties.”

Offer

In general contract law, the moment a definite offer is met by an unqualified acceptance, a binding contract is formed. In commercial sales transactions, the verbal exchanges, correspondence, and actions of the parties may not reveal exactly when a binding contractual obligation arises. The UCC states that an agreement sufficient to constitute a contract can exist even if the moment of its making is undetermined [UCC 2-204(2), 2A-204(2)].

Open Terms According to general contract law, an offer must be definite enough for the parties (and the courts) to ascertain its essential terms when it is accepted. In contrast, the UCC states that a sales or lease contract will not fail for indefiniteness even if one or more terms are left open as long as (1) the parties intended to make a contract and (2) there is a reasonably certain basis for the court to grant an appropriate remedy [UCC 2-204(3), 2A-204(3)].

For example, suppose that Mike agrees to lease from CompuQuik a highly specialized computer work station. Mike and one of CompuQuik’s sales representatives sign a lease agreement that leaves some of the details blank, to be “worked out” the following week, when the leasing manager will be back from her vacation. In the meantime, CompuQuik obtains the necessary equipment from one of its suppliers and spends several days modifying the equipment to suit Mike’s needs. When the leasing manager returns, she calls Mike and tells him that his work station is ready. Mike says he is no longer interested in the work station, as he has arranged to lease the same equipment for a lower price from another firm. CompuQuik sues Mike to recover its costs in obtaining and modifying the equipment, and one of the issues before the court is whether the parties had an enforceable contract. The court will likely hold that they did, based on their intent and conduct, despite the blanks in their written agreement.

Relative to the common law of contracts, the UCC has radically lessened the requirement of definiteness of terms. Keep in mind, though, that if too many terms are left open, a court may find that the parties did not intend to form a contract.

Open Price Term. If the parties have not agreed on a price, the court will determine a “reasonable price at the time for delivery” [UCC 2-305(1)]. If either the buyer or the seller is to determine the price, the price is to be fixed in good faith [UCC 2-305(2)]. Under the UCC, good faith means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2-103(1)(b)]. The concepts of good faith and commercial reasonableness permeate the UCC. (The obligations of good faith and commercial reasonableness in sales and lease contracts will be discussed in detail in Chapter 22.)

Sometimes, the price fails to be fixed through the fault of one of the parties. In that situation, the other party can treat the contract as canceled or fix a reasonable price. For example, Perez and Merrick enter into a contract for the sale of goods and agree that Perez will fix the price. Perez refuses to specify the price. Merrick can either treat the contract as canceled or set a reasonable price [UCC 2-305(3)].

Open Payment Term. When the parties do not specify payment terms, payment is due at the time and place at which the buyer is to receive the goods [UCC 2-310(a)]. The buyer can tender payment using any commercially normal or acceptable means, such as a check or credit card. If the seller demands payment in cash, however, the buyer must be given a reasonable time to obtain it [UCC 2-511(2)]. This is especially important when the contract states a definite and final time for performance.

Open Delivery Term. When no delivery terms are specified, the buyer normally takes delivery at the seller’s place of business [UCC 2-308(a)]. If the seller has no place of business, the seller’s residence is used. When goods are located in some other place and both parties know it, delivery is made there. If the time for shipment or delivery is not clearly specified in the sales contract, then the court will infer a “reasonable” time for performance [UCC 2-309(1)].

Duration of an Ongoing Contract. A single contract might specify successive performances but not indicate how long the parties are required to deal with each other. In this situation, either party may terminate the ongoing contractual relationship. Nevertheless, principles of good faith and sound commercial practice call for reasonable notification before termination so as to give the other party sufficient time to seek a substitute arrangement [UCC 2-309(2), (3)].

Options and Cooperation with Regard to Performance. When specific shipping arrangements have not been made but the contract contemplates shipment of the goods, the seller has the right to make these arrangements in good faith, using commercial reasonableness in the situation [UCC 2-311].

When terms relating to an assortment of goods are omitted from a sales contract, the buyer can specify the assortment. For example, Harley and Babcock contract for the sale of one thousand pens. The pens come in a variety of colors, but the contract is silent as to which colors are ordered. Babcock, the buyer, has the right to take whatever colors he wishes. Babcock, however, must exercise good faith and commercial reasonableness in making the selection [UCC 2-311].

Open Quantity Term. Normally, if the parties do not specify a quantity, a court will have no basis for determining a remedy. This is because there is almost no way to determine objectively what is a reasonable quantity of goods for someone to purchase (whereas a court can objectively determine a reasonable price for particular goods by looking at the market). The UCC recognizes two exceptions in requirements and output contracts [UCC 2-306(1)].

In a requirements contract, the buyer agrees to purchase and the seller agrees to sell all or up to a stated amount of what the buyer needs or requires. There is implicit consideration in a requirements contract because the buyer gives up the right to buy from any other seller, and this forfeited right creates a legal detriment. Requirements contracts are common in the business world and are normally enforceable. If, however, the buyer promises to purchase only if he or she wishes to do so, or if the buyer reserves the right to buy the goods from someone other than the seller, the promise is illusory (without consideration) and unenforceable by either party.⁹

In an output contract, the seller agrees to sell and the buyer agrees to buy all or up to a stated amount of what the seller produces. Again, because the seller essentially forfeits the right to sell goods to another buyer, there is implicit consideration in an output contract.

The UCC imposes a good faith limitation on requirements and output contracts. The quantity under such contracts is the amount of requirements or the amount of output that occurs during a normal production period. The actual quantity purchased or sold cannot be unreasonably disproportionate to normal or comparable prior requirements or output [UCC 2-306].

Merchant's Firm Offer Under regular contract principles, an offer can be revoked at any time before acceptance. The major common law exception is an option contract (discussed in Chapter 11), in which the offeree pays consideration for the offeror's irrevocable promise to keep the offer open for a stated period. The UCC creates a second exception, which applies only to firm offers for the sale or lease of goods made by a merchant (regardless of whether or not the offeree is a merchant).

When a Merchant's Firm Offer Arises. A firm offer arises when a merchant-offeror gives assurances in a signed writing that the offer will remain open. The merchant's firm offer is irrevocable without the necessity of consideration¹⁰ for the stated period or, if no definite period is stated, a reasonable period (neither to exceed three months) [UCC 2-205, 2A-205].

To illustrate: Osaka, a used-car dealer, writes a letter to Bennett on January 1 stating, "I have a used 2007 Suzuki on the lot that I'll sell you for $20,500 any time between now and January 31." By January 18, Osaka has heard nothing from Bennett, so he sells the Suzuki to another person. On January 23, Bennett tenders $20,500 to Osaka and asks for the car. When Osaka tells him the car has already been sold, Bennett claims that Osaka has breached a valid contract. Bennett is right. Osaka is a merchant of used cars and assured Bennett in a signed writing that he would keep his offer open until the end of January. Thus, Bennett's acceptance on January 23 created a contract, which Osaka breached.

The Offer Must Be in Writing and Signed by the Offeror. It is necessary that the offer be both written and signed by the offeror.¹¹ When a firm offer is contained in a form contract prepared by the offeree, the

10. If the offeree pays consideration, then an option contract (not a merchant's firm offer) is formed.

11. Signed includes any symbol executed or adopted by a party with a present intention to authenticate a writing [UCC 1-201(37)]. A complete signature is not required.

9. See, for example, In re Anchor Glass Container Corp., 345 Bankr. 765 (M.D.Fla. 2006).

offeror must also sign a separate assurance of the firm offer. This requirement ensures that the offeror will be made aware of the offer. For instance, an offeree might respond to an initial offer by sending its own form contract containing a clause stating that the offer will remain open for three months. If the firm offer is buried amid copious language in one of the pages of the offeree's form contract, the offeror may inadvertently sign the contract without realizing that it contains a firm offer. This would defeat the purpose of the rule—which is to give effect to a merchant's deliberate intent to be bound to a firm offer.

Acceptance

Under the UCC, acceptance of an offer to buy, sell, or lease goods generally may be made in any reasonable manner and by any reasonable means. We examine the UCC's provisions governing acceptance in detail in the subsections that follow.

Methods of Acceptance The general common law rule is that an offeror can specify, or authorize, a particular means of acceptance, making that means the only one effective for contract formation. Under the common law, if the offer is accepted by an improper means of communication, normally it is considered a counteroffer rather than an acceptance. (For a review of the requirements relating to the mode and timeliness of acceptance, see Chapter 11.) Only when the offeror does not specify an authorized means of acceptance will courts applying general contract law consider whether the acceptance was by reasonable means. The UCC, in contrast, gives effect to all acceptances communicated by reasonable means.

Any Reasonable Means. When the offeror does not specify a means of acceptance, the UCC provides that acceptance can be made by any means of communication that is reasonable under the circumstances [UCC 2-206(1), 2A-206(1)]. This is also the basic rule under the common law of contracts (see Chapter 11).

For example, suppose that Anodyne Corporation writes a letter to Bethlehem Industries offering to lease $5,000 worth of goods. The offer states that Anodyne will keep the offer open for only ten days from the date of the letter. Before the ten days have lapsed, Bethlehem sends Anodyne an acceptance by fax. The fax is misdirected by someone at Anodyne's offices and does not reach the right person at Anodyne until after the ten-day deadline has passed. Has a valid contract been formed? The answer is probably yes, because acceptance by fax appears to be a commercially reasonable mode of acceptance under the circumstances. Acceptance would be effective on Bethlehem's transmission of the fax, which occurred before the offer lapsed.

Promise to Ship or Prompt Shipment. The UCC permits an offeree to accept an offer to buy goods "either by a prompt promise to ship or by the prompt or current shipment of conforming or nonconforming goods" [UCC 2-206(1)(b)]. Conforming goods are goods that accord with the contract's terms; nonconforming goods do not. The seller's prompt shipment of nonconforming goods constitutes both an acceptance (a contract) and a breach of that contract. This rule does not apply if the seller seasonably (within a reasonable amount of time) notifies the buyer that the nonconforming shipment is offered only as an accommodation, or as a favor. The notice of accommodation must clearly indicate to the buyer that the shipment does not constitute an acceptance and that therefore no contract has been formed.

For example, suppose that Barrymore orders one thousand black fans from Stroh. Stroh ships one thousand blue fans to Barrymore, notifying Barrymore that these are sent as an accommodation because Stroh has only blue fans in stock. The shipment of blue fans is not an acceptance but a counteroffer, and a contract will be formed only if Barrymore accepts the blue fans. If, however, Stroh ships one thousand blue fans instead of black without notifying Barrymore that the goods are being shipped as an accommodation, Stroh's shipment acts as both an acceptance of Barrymore's offer and a breach of the resulting contract. Barrymore may sue Stroh for any appropriate damages.

Communication of Acceptance Under the common law, because a unilateral offer invites acceptance by performance, the offeree need not notify the offeror of performance unless the offeror would not otherwise know about it. In other words, beginning the requested performance is an implied acceptance. The UCC is more stringent than the common law in this regard. Under the UCC, if the offeror is not notified within a reasonable time that the offeree has accepted the contract by beginning performance, then the offeror can treat the offer as having lapsed before acceptance [UCC 2-206(2), 2A-206(2)].

Additional Terms Under the common law, if Alderman makes an offer to Beale, and Beale in turn accepts but adds some slight modification, there is no contract. Recall from Chapter 11 that the so-called mirror image rule requires that the terms of the acceptance exactly match those of the offer. The UCC dispenses with the mirror image rule. Generally, the UCC takes the position that if the offeree's response indicates a definite acceptance of the offer, a contract is formed, even if the acceptance includes terms additional to or different from those contained in the offer [UCC 2-207(1)]. What happens to these additional terms? The answer to this question depends, in part, on whether the parties are nonmerchants or merchants.

Rules When One Party or Both Parties Are Nonmerchants. If one (or both) of the parties is a nonmerchant, the contract is formed according to the terms of the original offer and not according to the additional terms of the acceptance [UCC 2-207(2)]. For example, suppose that Tolsen offers in writing to sell his laptop computer and printer to Valdez for $1,500. Valdez e-mails a reply to Tolsen, stating, "I accept your offer to purchase your laptop and printer for $1,500. I would like a box of laser printer paper and two extra toner cartridges to be included in the purchase price." Valdez has given Tolsen a definite expression of acceptance (creating a contract), even though the acceptance also suggests an added term for the offer. Because Tolsen is not a merchant, the additional term is merely a proposal (suggestion), and Tolsen is not legally obligated to comply with that term.

Rules When Both Parties Are Merchants. The drafters of the UCC created a special rule for merchants that is designed to avoid the "battle of the forms," which occurs when two merchants exchange standard forms containing different contract terms. Under UCC 2-207(2), in contracts between merchants, the additional terms automatically become part of the contract unless:

1. The original offer expressly limited acceptance to its terms,
2. The new or changed terms materially alter the contract, or
3. The offeror objects to the new or changed terms within a reasonable period of time.

What constitutes a material alteration of the contract is usually a question of fact that only a court can decide. Generally, if the modification involves no unreasonable element of surprise or hardship for the offeror, a court is likely to hold that the modification did not materially alter the contract.

Courts frequently consider the parties' prior dealings when determining whether the alteration is material. For example, suppose that Woolf has ordered meat from Tupman sixty-four times over a two-year period. Each time, Woolf placed the order over the phone, and Tupman mailed first a confirmation form, and then an invoice, to Woolf. Tupman's confirmation form and invoice have always included an arbitration clause. If Woolf places another order and fails to pay for the meat, the court will likely hold that the additional term—the arbitration provision—did not materially alter the contract because Woolf should not have been surprised by the term. The result might be different, however, if the parties had dealt with each other only on two prior occasions, and the arbitration clause was not in the confirmation form but was included only on the back of a faxed invoice.¹²

In the following case, the court explains the "revolutionary change in contract law" caused by the UCC's principles on additional terms.

12. See, for example, Sibcoimtrex, Inc. v. American Foods Group, Inc., 241 F.Supp.2d 104 (D.Mass.2003).

CASE 20.2 Sun Coast Merchandise Corp. v. Myron Corp.

Superior Court of New Jersey, Appellate Division, 2007. 393 N.J.Super. 55, 922 A.2d 782.

lawlibrary.rutgers.edu/search.shtml^a

• Background and Facts Sun Coast Merchandise Corporation, a California firm, designs and sells products that businesses distribute as promotional items. Myron Corporation, a New Jersey firm, asked Sun about a flip-top calculator on which Myron could engrave the names of its customers. In December 2000, Myron began to submit purchase orders for about 400,000 of what the parties referred

a. In the "SEARCH THE N.J. COURTS DECISIONS" section, type "Sun Coast" in the box, and click on "Search!" In the result, click on the case name to access the opinion.

CASE 20.2 CONTINUED

to as “Version I” calculators. In April 2001, Sun redesigned the flip-top. Over the next few weeks, the parties discussed terms for the making and shipping of 4 million of the “Version II” calculators before the Christmas season. By May 27, Myron had faxed four orders with specific delivery dates. Two days later, Sun announced a delayed schedule and asked Myron to submit revised orders. Unwilling to agree to the new dates, Myron did not honor this request. The parties attempted to negotiate the issue but were unsuccessful. Finally, Sun filed a suit in a New Jersey state court against Myron, claiming, among other things, breach of contract. The court entered a judgment in Sun’s favor. On appeal to a state intermediate appellate court, Myron argued, among other things, that the judge’s instruction to the jury regarding Sun’s claim was inadequate.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
FISHER, J.A.D. [Judge, Appellate Division]

* * * *

The era when a valid, binding contract could only come into existence when a party’s acceptance mirrored the other party’s offer ended with the adoption of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). The UCC altered the common law approach, finding it to be inconsistent with the modern realities of commerce. * * * Article 2 of the UCC radically altered sales law and expanded our conception of a contract. The heart of this revolutionary change in contract law can be found in [New Jersey Statutes Annotated (N.J.S.A.)] 12A:2-207(1) [New Jersey’s version of UCC 2-207(1)], which declares that “[a] definite and seasonable expression of acceptance or a written confirmation which is sent within a reasonable time operates as an acceptance even though it states terms additional to or different from those offered or agreed upon, unless acceptance is expressly made conditional on assent to the additional or different terms.” No longer are communicating parties left to debate whether an acceptance perfectly meets the terms of an offer, but instead the existence of a binding contract may be based on words or conduct, which need not mirror an offer, so long as they reveal the parties’ intention to be bound. * * * [Emphasis added.]

Considering that the UCC permits the formation of a contract by way of conduct that reveals the parties’ understanding that a contract exists, and notwithstanding the suggestion of additional or even non-conforming terms, the complex of communications between [Sun and Myron] demonstrates that neither can the formation of a contract be confirmed or foreclosed without a resolution of the existing factual disputes and the weighing of the significance of the parties’ convoluted communications. * * *

* * * *

In short, it is conceivable—and the jury could find—that the parties’ inability to agree on certain terms reveals the lack of an intent to be bound; in other words, that their communications constituted mere negotiations that never ripened into a contract. By the same token, the jury could find that a contract was formed despite a failure or an inability to agree on all terms. N.J.S.A. 12A:2-207(2) provides that an acceptance coupled with the proposal of new or different terms does not necessarily preclude the formation of a contract. In such a circumstance, the new or different terms proposed by the offeree [could] become part of the contract. * * * [Emphasis added.]

All these questions required that the factfinder analyze the meaning and significance of the parties’ communications based upon the legal framework provided by the UCC. * * *

* * * *

* * * [T]he trial judge correctly determined that the [contentions about] contract formation * * * raised fact questions to be decided by the jury * * *

* * * *

In describing for the jury what it takes for the parties to form a binding contract, the judge stated:

A proposal to accept an offer on any different terms is not an acceptance of the original offer. If any new or different terms are proposed in response to the offer, the response is not an acceptance, but rather a counteroffer. A counteroffer is a new offer by the party making that proposal. The new offer must in turn be agreed to by the party who made the original offer for there to be an acceptance.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 20.2 CONTINUED

As we have already explained, the UCC does not require that a party's response mirror an offer to result in a binding contract. The offeree may propose additional or different terms without necessarily having the response viewed as a non-binding counteroffer. Instead, an offeree's proposal of additional or conflicting terms may be found to constitute an acceptance, and the other or different terms viewed as mere proposals to modify the contract thus formed.

The judge's misstatement in this regard was hardly harmless * * *. In describing when the law recognizes that a contract was formed, the judge provided the jury with erroneous instructions that struck directly at the heart of the case.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court concluded that the judge's instruction to the jury with respect to the question of whether Sun and Myron had formed a contract was "fundamentally flawed" and "provided insufficient guidance for the jury's resolution of the issues." On this basis, the court reversed the lower court's judgment and remanded the case for a new trial.

● The Ethical Dimension How does the UCC's obligation of good faith relate to the application of the principles concerning additional terms?

● The Legal Environment Dimension Applying the correct principles to the facts in this case, how would you have decided the issue? Explain.

Conditioned on Offeror's Assent. Regardless of merchant status, the UCC provides that the offeree's expression cannot be construed as an acceptance if it contains additional or different terms that are expressly conditioned on the offeror's assent to those terms [UCC 2-207(1)]. For example, suppose that Philips offers to sell Hundert 650 pounds of turkey thighs at a specified price and with specified delivery terms. Hundert responds, "I accept your offer for 650 pounds of turkey thighs on the condition that you agree to give me ninety days to pay for them." Hundert's response will be construed not as an acceptance but as a counteroffer, which Philips may or may not accept.

Additional Terms May Be Stricken. The UCC provides yet another option for dealing with conflicting terms in the parties' writings. Section 2-207(3) states that conduct by both parties that recognizes the existence of a contract is sufficient to establish a contract for sale even though the writings of the parties do not otherwise establish a contract. In this situation, "the terms of the particular contract will consist of those terms on which the writings of the parties agree, together with any supplementary terms incorporated under any other provisions of this Act." In a dispute over contract terms, this provision allows a court simply to strike from the contract those terms on which the parties do not agree.

For example, suppose that SMT Marketing orders goods over the phone from Brigg Sales, Inc., which ships the goods with an acknowledgment form (confirming the order) to SMT. SMT accepts and pays for the goods. The parties' writings do not establish a contract, but there is no question that a contract exists. If a dispute arises over the terms, such as the extent of any warranties, UCC 2-207(3) provides the governing rule.

As noted previously, the fact that a merchant's acceptance frequently contains additional terms or even terms that conflict with those of the offer is often referred to as the "battle of the forms." Although the UCC tries to eliminate this battle, the problem of differing contract terms still arises in commercial settings, particularly when contracts are based on the merchants' standard forms, such as order forms and confirmation forms.

Consideration

The common law rule that a contract requires consideration also applies to sales and lease contracts. Unlike the common law, however, the UCC does not require a contract modification to be supported by new consideration. The UCC states that an agreement modifying a contract for the sale or lease of goods "needs no consideration to be binding" [UCC 2-209(1), 2A-208(1)].

Modifications Must Be Made in Good Faith

Of course, any contract modification must be made in good faith [UCC 1-203]. For example, suppose that Allied agrees to lease certain goods to Louise for a stated price. Subsequently, a sudden shift in the market makes it difficult for Allied to lease the items to Louise at the given price without suffering a loss. Allied tells Louise of the situation, and she agrees to pay an additional sum for leasing the goods. Later, Louise reconsiders and refuses to pay more than the original price. Under the UCC, Louise's promise to modify the contract needs no consideration to be binding. Hence, Louise is bound by the modified contract.

CHAPTER 20 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

In this example, a shift in the market is a good faith reason for contract modification. What if there really was no shift in the market, however, and Allied knew that Louise needed the goods immediately but refused to deliver them unless Louise agreed to pay an additional amount? This sort of extortion of a modification without a legitimate commercial reason would violate the duty of good faith, and Allied would not be permitted to enforce the higher price.

When Modification Does Require a Writing

In some situations, an agreement to modify a sales or lease contract without consideration must be in writing to be enforceable. For example, if the contract itself prohibits any changes to the contract unless they are in a signed writing, only those changes agreed to in a signed writing are enforceable. If a consumer (non-merchant buyer) is dealing with a merchant and the merchant supplies the form that contains the prohibition against oral modification, the consumer must sign a separate acknowledgment of the clause [UCC 2-209(2), 2A-208(2)].

Also, under Article 2, any modification that brings a sales contract under the Statute of Frauds must usually be in writing to be enforceable. Thus, if an oral contract for the sale of goods priced at $400 is modified so that the goods are priced at $600, the modification must be in writing to be enforceable [UCC 2-209(3)]. (This is because the UCC's Statute of Frauds provision, as you will read shortly, requires a written record of sales contracts for goods priced at $500 or more.) Nevertheless, if the buyer accepts delivery of the goods after the oral modification, he or she is bound to the $600 price [UCC 2-201(3)(c)]. (Unlike Article 2, Article 2A does not say whether a lease as modified needs to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.)

The Statute of Frauds

As discussed in Chapter 15, the Statute of Frauds requires that certain types of contracts, to be enforceable, must be in writing or be evidenced by a written memorandum or record. The UCC contains Statute of Frauds provisions covering sales and lease contracts. Under these provisions, sales contracts for goods priced at $500 or more and lease contracts requiring total payments of $1,000 or more must be in writing to be enforceable [UCC 2-201(1), 2A-201(1)]. (Note that these low threshold amounts may eventually be raised.)

Sufficiency of the Writing The UCC has greatly relaxed the requirements for the sufficiency of a writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. A writing or a memorandum will be sufficient as long as it indicates that the parties intended to form a contract and as long as it is signed by the party (or agent of the party) against whom enforcement is sought. The contract normally will not be enforceable beyond the quantity of goods shown in the writing, however. All other terms can be proved in court by oral testimony. For leases, the writing must reasonably identify and describe the goods leased and the lease term.

Special Rules for Contracts between Merchants

Once again, the UCC provides a special rule for merchants.¹³ Merchants can satisfy the requirements of a writing for the Statute of Frauds if, after the parties have agreed orally, one of the merchants sends a signed written confirmation to the other merchant. The communication must indicate the terms of the agreement, and the merchant receiving the confirmation must have reason to know of its contents. Unless the merchant who receives the confirmation gives written notice of objection to its contents within ten days after receipt, the writing is sufficient against the receiving merchant, even though she or he has not signed anything [UCC 2-201(2)].

For example, suppose that Alfonso is a merchant-buyer in Cleveland. He contracts over the telephone to purchase $6,000 worth of spare aircraft parts from Goldstein, a merchant-seller in New York City. Two days later, Goldstein sends a written confirmation detailing the terms of the oral contract, and Alfonso subsequently receives it. If Alfonso does not give Goldstein written notice of objection to the contents of the written confirmation within ten days of receipt, Alfonso cannot raise the Statute of Frauds as a defense against the enforcement of the oral contract.

13. Note that this rule applies only to sales (under Article 2); there is no corresponding rule that applies to leases (under Article 2A). According to the comments accompanying UCC 2A-201 (Article 2A's Statute of Frauds), the "between merchants" provision was not included because "the number of such transactions involving leases, as opposed to sales, was thought to be modest."

Note that the written confirmation need not be a traditional paper document with a handwritten signature. Courts have held that an e-mail confirming the order and including the company's typed name was sufficient to satisfy the UCC's Statute of Frauds.¹⁴

Exceptions The UCC defines three exceptions to the writing requirements of the Statute of Frauds. An oral contract for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more or the lease of goods involving total payments of $1,000 or more will be enforceable despite the absence of a writing in the circumstances described next [UCC 2-201(3), 2A-201(4)].

Specially Manufactured Goods. An oral contract is enforceable if (1) it is for goods that are specially manufactured for a particular buyer or specially manufactured or obtained for a particular lessee, (2) these goods are not suitable for resale or lease to others in the ordinary course of the seller's or lessor's business, and (3) the seller or lessor has substantially started to manufacture the goods or has made commitments for the manufacture or procurement of the goods. In these situations, once the seller or lessor has taken action, the buyer or lessee cannot repudiate the agreement claiming the Statute of Frauds as a defense.

For example, suppose that Womach orders custom-made draperies for her new boutique. The price is $9,000, and the contract is oral. When the merchant-seller manufactures the draperies and tenders delivery to Womach, she refuses to pay for them even though the job has been completed on time. Womach claims that she is not liable because the contract was oral. Clearly, if the unique style and color of the draperies make it improbable that the seller can find another buyer, Womach is liable to the seller. Note that the seller must have made a substantial beginning in manufacturing the specialized item prior to the buyer's repudiation. (Here, the manufacture was completed.) Of course, the court must still be convinced by evidence of the terms of the oral contract.

Admissions. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if the party against whom enforcement is sought admits in pleadings, testimony, or other court proceedings that a sales or lease contract was made. In this situation, the contract will be enforceable even though it was oral, but enforceability will be limited to the quantity of goods admitted.

For example, suppose that Lane and Salazar negotiate an agreement over the telephone. During the negotiations, Lane requests a delivery price for five hundred gallons of gasoline and a separate price for seven hundred gallons of gasoline. Salazar replies that the price would be the same, $3.10 per gallon. Lane orally orders five hundred gallons. Salazar honestly believes that Lane ordered seven hundred gallons and tenders that amount. Lane refuses the shipment of seven hundred gallons, and Salazar sues for breach. In his pleadings and testimony, Lane admits that an oral contract was made, but only for five hundred gallons. Because Lane admits the existence of the oral contract, Lane cannot plead the Statute of Frauds as a defense. The contract is enforceable, however, only to the extent of the quantity admitted (five hundred gallons).

Partial Performance. An oral contract for the sale or lease of goods is enforceable if payment has been made and accepted or goods have been received and accepted. This is the "partial performance" exception. The oral contract will be enforced at least to the extent that performance actually took place.

For example, suppose that Allan orally contracts to lease Wolfgang ten thousand chairs at $5 each to be used during a one-day rock concert. Before delivery, Wolfgang sends Allan a check for $25,000, which Allan cashes. Later, when Allan attempts to deliver the chairs, Wolfgang refuses delivery, claiming the Statute of Frauds as a defense, and demands the return of his $25,000. Under the UCC's partial performance rule, Allan can enforce the oral contract by tender of delivery of five thousand chairs for the $25,000 accepted. Similarly, if Wolfgang had made no payment but had accepted the delivery of five thousand chairs from Allan, the oral contract would have been enforceable against Wolfgang for $25,000 (the lease payment due for the five thousand chairs delivered).

The exceptions just discussed and other ways in which sales law differs from general contract law are summarized in Exhibit 20-3.

Parol Evidence

If the parties intended the terms as set forth in the contract as a complete and final expression of their agreement, then the terms of the contract cannot be contradicted by evidence of any prior agreements or 14. See, for example, Bazak International Corp. v. Tarrant Apparel Group, 378 F.Supp.2d 377 (S.D.N.Y. 2005); Lachira v. Sutton, 2007 WL 1346913 (D.Conn. 2007); and Great White Bear, LLC v. Mervyns, LLC, 2007 WL 1295747 (S.D.N.Y. 2007).

EXHIBIT 20-3 • Major Differences between Contract Law and Sales Law

	Contract Law	Sales Law
Contract Terms	Contract must contain all material terms.	Open terms are acceptable if parties intended to form a contract, but contract is not enforceable beyond quantity term.
Acceptance	Mirror image rule applies. If additional terms are added in acceptance, counteroffer is created.	Additional terms will not negate acceptance unless acceptance is expressly conditioned on assent to the additional terms.
Contract Modification	Modification requires consideration.	Modification does not require consideration.
Irrevocable Offers	Option contracts (with consideration).	Merchants' firm offers (without consideration).
Statute of Frauds Requirements	All material terms must be included in the writing.	Writing is required only for sale of goods of $500 or more, but contract is not enforceable beyond quantity specified. Merchants can satisfy the writing requirement by a confirmatory memorandum evidencing their agreement. Exceptions: 1. Specially manufactured goods. 2. Admissions by party against whom enforcement is sought. 3. Partial performance.

contemporaneous oral agreements. As discussed in Chapter 15, this principle of law is known as the parol evidence rule. The terms of a contract may, however, be explained or supplemented by consistent additional terms or by course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance [UCC 2-202, 2A-202].

Ambiguous Terms If the court finds an ambiguity in a writing that is supposed to be a final expression of the agreement between the parties, it may accept evidence of consistent additional terms to clarify or remove the ambiguity. The court will not, however, accept evidence of contradictory terms. This is also the rule under the common law of contracts.

Course of Dealing and Usage of Trade

Under the UCC, the meaning of any agreement, evidenced by the language of the parties and by their actions, must be interpreted in light of commercial practices and other surrounding circumstances. In interpreting a commercial agreement, the court will assume that the course of prior dealing between the parties and the general usage of trade were taken into account when the agreement was phrased.

A course of dealing is a sequence of previous actions and communications between the parties to a particular transaction that establishes a common basis for their understanding [UCC 1-205(1)]. A course of dealing is restricted to the sequence of conduct between the parties in their transactions previous to the agreement.

Usage of trade is defined as any practice or method of dealing having such regularity of observance in a place, vocation, or trade as to justify an expectation that it will be observed with respect to the transaction in question [UCC 1-205(2)]. The express terms of an agreement and an applicable course of dealing or usage of trade will be construed to be consistent with each other whenever reasonable. When such a construction is unreasonable, however, the express terms in the agreement will prevail [UCC 1-205(4)].

Course of Performance The conduct that occurs under the terms of a particular agreement is called a course of performance. Presumably, the parties themselves know best what they meant by their words, and the course of performance actually undertaken under their agreement is the best indication of what they meant [UCC 2-208(1), 2A-207(1)].

For example, suppose that Janson's Lumber Company contracts with Barrymore to sell Barrymore a specified number of two-by-fours. The lumber in fact does not measure 2 inches by 4 inches but rather 1 $\frac{1}{8}$ inches by 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches. Janson's agrees to deliver the lumber in five deliveries, and Barrymore, without objection, accepts the lumber in the first three deliveries. On the fourth delivery, however, Barrymore objects that the two-by-fours do not measure 2 inches by 4 inches.

The course of performance in this transaction—that is, the fact that Barrymore accepted three deliveries without objection under the agreement—is relevant in determining that here a “two-by-four” actually means a “1 $\frac{1}{8}$ -by-3 $\frac{3}{4}$.” Janson's can also prove that two-by-fours need not be exactly 2 inches by 4 inches by applying usage of trade, course of dealing, or both. Janson's can, for example, show that in previous transactions, Barrymore took 1 $\frac{1}{8}$ -inch-by-3 $\frac{3}{4}$ -inch lumber without objection. In addition, Janson's can show that in the trade, two-by-fours are commonly 1 $\frac{1}{8}$ inches by 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches.

Rules of Construction The UCC provides rules of construction for interpreting contracts. Express terms, course of performance, course of dealing, and usage of trade are to be construed together when they do not contradict one another. When such a construction is unreasonable, however, the following order of priority controls: (1) express terms, (2) course of performance, (3) course of dealing, and (4) usage of trade [UCC 1-205(4), 2-208(2), 2A-207(2)].

Unconscionability

As discussed in Chapters 13 and 14, an unconscionable contract is one that is so unfair and one-sided that it would be unreasonable to enforce it. The UCC allows a court to evaluate a contract or any clause in a contract, and if the court deems it to have been unconscionable at the time it was made, the court can do any of the following [UCC 2-302, 2A-108]:

1. Refuse to enforce the contract.
2. Enforce the remainder of the contract without the unconscionable part.
3. Limit the application of the unconscionable term to avoid an unconscionable result.

The following landmark case illustrates an early application of the UCC's unconscionability provisions.

EXTENDED CASE 20.3 Jones v. Star Credit Corp.

Supreme Court of New York, Nassau County, 1969. 59 Misc.2d 189, 298 N.Y.S.2d 264.

SOL M. WACHTLER, Justice.

On August 31, 1965 the plaintiffs, who are welfare recipients, agreed to purchase a home freezer unit for $900 as the result of a visit from a salesman representing Your Shop At Home Service, Inc. With the addition of the time credit charges, credit life insurance, credit property insurance, and sales tax, the purchase price totaled $1,234.80. Thus far the plaintiffs have paid $619.88 toward their purchase. The defendant claims that with various added credit charges paid for an extension of time there is a balance of $819.81 still due from the plaintiffs. The uncontroverted proof at the trial established that the freezer unit, when purchased, had a maximum retail value of approximately $300. The question is whether this transaction and the resulting contract could be considered unconscionable within the meaning of section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code * * *.

* * * * *

There was a time when the shield of caveat emptor [“let the buyer beware”] would protect the most unscrupulous in the marketplace—a time when the law, in granting parties unbridled latitude to make their own contracts, allowed exploitive and callous practices which shocked the conscience of both legislative bodies and the courts.

* * * * *

CHAPTER 20 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

CASE 20.3 CONTINUED

The law is beginning to fight back against those who once took advantage of the poor and illiterate without risk of either exposure or interference. * * *

Section 2-302 of the Uniform Commercial Code enacts the moral sense of the community into the law of commercial transactions. It authorizes the court to find, as a matter of law, that a contract or a clause of a contract was “unconscionable at the time it was made,” and upon so finding the court may refuse to enforce the contract, excise the objectionable clause or limit the application of the clause to avoid an unconscionable result. The principle * * * is one of the prevention of oppression and unfair surprise. It permits a court to accomplish directly what heretofore was often accomplished by construction of language, manipulations of fluid rules of contract law and determinations based upon a presumed public policy.

Fraud, in the instant case, is not present; nor is it necessary under the statute. The question which presents itself is whether or not, under the circumstances of this case, the sale of a freezer unit having a retail value of $300 for $900 ($1,439.69 including credit charges and $18 sales tax) is unconscionable as a matter of law. The court believes it is.

Concededly, deciding [this case] is substantially easier than explaining it. No doubt, the mathematical disparity between $300, which presumably includes a reasonable profit margin, and $900, which is exorbitant on its face, carries the greatest weight. Credit charges alone exceed by more than $100 the retail value of the freezer. These alone may be sufficient to sustain the decision. Yet, a caveat [warning] is warranted lest we reduce the import of Section 2-302 solely to a mathematical ratio formula. It may, at times, be that; yet it may also be much more. The very limited financial resources of the purchaser, known to the sellers at the time of the sale, is entitled to weight in the balance. Indeed, the value disparity itself leads inevitably to the felt conclusion that knowing advantage was taken of the plaintiffs. In addition, the meaningfulness of choice essential to the making of a contract can be negated by a gross inequality of bargaining power. [Emphasis added.]

There is no question about the necessity and even the desirability of installment sales and the extension of credit. Indeed, there are many, including welfare recipients, who would be deprived of even the most basic conveniences without the use of these devices. Similarly, the retail merchant selling on installment or extending credit is expected to establish a pricing factor which will afford a degree of protection commensurate with the risk of selling to those who might be default prone. However, neither of these accepted premises can clothe the sale of this freezer with respectability.

Having already [been] paid more than $600 toward the purchase of this $300 freezer unit, it is apparent that the defendant has already been amply compensated. In accordance with the statute, the application of the payment provision should be limited to amounts already paid by the plaintiffs and the contract be reformed and amended by changing the payments called for therein to equal the amount of payment actually so paid by the plaintiffs.

QUESTIONS

1. Why would the seller's knowledge of the buyers' limited resources support a finding of unconscionability? Explain.
2. Why didn't the court rule that the Joneses, as adults, had made a decision of their own free will and therefore were bound by the terms of the contract, regardless of the difference between the freezer's contract price and its retail value?

● Impact of This Case on Today's Law This early case illustrates the approach that many courts take today when deciding whether a sales contract is unconscionable—an approach that focuses on “excessive” price and unequal bargaining power. Most of the litigants who have used UCC 2-302 successfully could demonstrate both an absence of meaningful choice and that the contract terms were unreasonably favorable to the other party.

Concept Summary 20.1 reviews the concepts and rules related to the formation of sales and lease contracts that we have discussed in this chapter.

Contracts for the International Sale of Goods

International sales contracts between firms or individuals located in different countries may be governed by the 1980 United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). The CISG governs international contracts only if the countries of the parties to the contract have ratified the CISG and if the parties have not agreed that some other law will govern their contract. As of 2008, the CISG had been adopted by seventy countries, including the United States, Canada, Mexico, some Central and South American countries, and most European nations. That means that the CISG is the uniform international sales law of countries that account for more than two-thirds of all global trade.

Applicability of the CISG

Essentially, the CISG is to international sales contracts what Article 2 of the UCC is to domestic sales contracts. As discussed in this chapter, in domestic transactions the UCC applies when the parties to a contract for a sale of goods have failed to specify in writing some important term concerning price, delivery, or the like. Similarly, whenever the parties to international transactions have failed to specify in writing the precise terms of a contract, the CISG will be applied. Unlike the UCC, the CISG does not apply to consumer sales, and neither the UCC nor the CISG applies to contracts for services.

Businesspersons must take special care when drafting international sales contracts to avoid problems caused by distance, including language differences and differences in national laws. The appendix following this chapter (pages 417–420) shows an actual international sales contract used by Starbucks Coffee Company. The contract illustrates many of the special terms and clauses that are typically contained in international contracts for the sale of goods. Annotations in the appendix explain the meaning and significance of specific clauses in the contract. (See Chapter 52 for a discussion of other laws that frame global business transactions.)

A Comparison of CISG and UCC Provisions

The provisions of the CISG, although similar for the most part to those of the UCC, differ from them in some respects. In the event that the CISG and the UCC are in conflict, the CISG applies (because it is a treaty of the national government and therefore is supreme—see the discussion of the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution in Chapter 4).

The major differences between the CISG and the UCC in regard to contract formation concern the mirror image rule, irrevocable offers, the Statute of Frauds, and the time of contract formation. We discuss these differences in the subsections that follow. CISG provisions relating to risk of loss, performance, remedies, and warranties will be discussed in the following chapters as those topics are examined.

The Mirror Image Rule Under the UCC, a definite expression of acceptance that contains additional terms can still result in the formation of a contract, unless the additional terms are conditioned on the assent of the offeror. In other words, the UCC does away with the mirror image rule in domestic sales contracts.

Article 19 of the CISG provides that a contract can be formed even though the acceptance contains additional terms, unless the additional terms materially alter the contract. Under the CISG, however, the definition of a “material alteration” includes virtually any change in the terms. If an additional term relates to payment, quality, quantity, price, time and place of delivery, extent of one party’s liability to the other, or the settlement of disputes, the CISG considers the added term a material alteration. In effect, then, the CISG requires that the terms of the acceptance mirror those of the offer.

Therefore, as a practical matter, businesspersons undertaking international sales transactions should not use the sale or purchase forms that they customarily use for transactions within the United States. Instead, they should draft specific forms to suit the needs of the particular transactions.

Irrevocable Offers UCC 2–205 provides that a merchant’s firm offer is irrevocable, even without consideration, if the merchant gives assurances in a signed writing. In contrast, under the CISG, an offer can become irrevocable without a signed writing. Article 16(2) of the CISG provides that an offer will be irrevocable if the offeror simply states orally that the

CONCEPT SUMMARY 20.1

The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

Concept	Description
OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Offer— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Not all terms have to be included for a contract to be formed. b. The price does not have to be included for a contract to be formed. c. Particulars of performance can be left open. d. An offer by a merchant in a signed writing with assurances that the offer will not be withdrawn is irrevocable without consideration (for up to three months). 2. Acceptance— <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. Acceptance may be made by any reasonable means of communication; it is effective when dispatched. b. The acceptance of a unilateral offer can be made by a promise to ship or by the shipment of conforming or nonconforming goods. c. Acceptance by performance requires notice within a reasonable time; otherwise, the offer can be treated as lapsed. d. A definite expression of acceptance creates a contract even if the terms of the acceptance modify the terms of the offer.
CONSIDERATION	A modification of a contract for the sale of goods does not require consideration.
REQUIREMENTS UNDER THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. All contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more must be in writing. A writing is sufficient as long as it indicates a contract between the parties and is signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. A contract is not enforceable beyond the quantity shown in the writing. 2. When written confirmation of an oral contract between merchants is not objected to in writing by the receiver within ten days, the oral contract is enforceable. 3. Exceptions to the requirement of a writing exist in the following situations: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. When the oral contract is for specially manufactured or obtained goods not suitable for resale or lease to others and the seller or lessor has made commitments for the manufacture or procurement of the goods. b. If the defendant admits in pleadings, testimony, or other court proceedings that an oral contract for the sale or lease of goods was made, then the contract will be enforceable to the extent of the quantity of goods admitted. c. The oral agreement will be enforceable to the extent that payment has been received and accepted or to the extent that goods have been received and accepted.
PAROL EVIDENCE RULE	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The terms of a clearly and completely worded written contract cannot be contradicted by evidence of prior agreements or contemporaneous oral agreements. 2. Evidence is admissible to clarify the terms of a writing in the following situations: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> a. If the contract terms are ambiguous. b. If evidence of course of dealing, usage of trade, or course of performance is necessary to learn or to clarify the intentions of the parties to the contract.

offer is irrevocable or if the offeree reasonably relies on the offer as being irrevocable. In both of these situations, the offer will be irrevocable even without a writing and without consideration.

The Statute of Frauds As mentioned previously, the UCC's Statute of Frauds provision [UCC 2-201] requires that contracts for the sale of goods priced at $500 or more be evidenced by a written record signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought. Article 11 of the CISG, however, states that a contract of sale "need not be concluded in or evidenced by writing and is not subject to any other requirements as to form. It may be proved by any means, including witnesses." Article 11 of the CISG accords with the legal customs of most nations, which no longer require contracts to meet certain formal or writing requirements to be enforceable.

Time of Contract Formation Under the common law of contracts, an acceptance is effective on dispatch, so a contract is created when the acceptance is transmitted. The UCC does not alter this so-called mailbox rule. Under the CISG, in contrast, a contract is created not at the time the acceptance is transmitted but only on its receipt by the offeror. (The offer becomes irrevocable, however, when the acceptance is sent.) Article 18(2) states that an acceptance by return promise "becomes effective at the moment the indication of assent reaches the offeror." Under Article 18(3), the offeree may also bind the offeror by performance even without giving any notice to the offeror. The acceptance becomes effective "at the moment the act is performed." Thus, the rule is that it is the offeree's reliance, rather than the communication of acceptance to the offeror, that creates the contract.

Special Provisions in International Contracts

Language and legal differences among nations can create special problems for parties to international contracts when disputes arise. It is possible to avoid these problems by including in a contract special provisions relating to choice of language, choice of forum, choice of law, and the types of events that may excuse the parties from performance.

Choice of Language A deal struck between a U.S. company and a company in another country frequently involves two languages. One party may not understand complex contractual terms that are written in the other party's language. Translating the terms poses its own problems, as typically many phrases are not readily translatable into another language. To make sure that no disputes arise out of this language problem, an international sales contract should have a choice-of-language clause designating the official language by which the contract will be interpreted in the event of disagreement. The clause might also specify that the agreement is to be translated into, say, Spanish; that the translation is to be ratified by both parties; and that the foreign company can rely on the translation. If arbitration is anticipated, an additional clause must be added to indicate the official language that will be used at the arbitration proceeding.

Choice of Forum As discussed in Chapter 19, a forum-selection clause designates the forum (place, or court) in which any disputes that arise under the contract will be litigated. Including a forum-selection clause in an international contract is especially important because when several countries are involved, litigation may be sought in courts in different nations. There are no universally accepted rules regarding the jurisdiction of a particular court over subject matter or parties to a dispute, although the adoption of the 2005 Choice of Court Convention (discussed in Chapter 19's Insight into the Global Environment feature on page 380) should help resolve certain issues. A forum-selection clause should indicate the specific court that will have jurisdiction. The forum does not necessarily have to be within the geographic boundaries of either party's nation.

Under certain circumstances, a forum-selection clause will not be valid. Specifically, if the clause denies one party an effective remedy, is the product of fraud or unconscionable conduct, causes substantial inconvenience to one of the parties to the contract, or violates public policy, the clause will not be enforced.

Choice of Law A contractual provision designating the applicable law, called a choice-of-law clause, is typically included in every international contract. At common law (and in European civil law systems—see Chapter 52), parties are allowed to choose the law that will govern their contractual relationship, provided that the law chosen is the law of a jurisdiction that has a substantial relationship to the parties and to the business transaction.

Under UCC 1-105, parties may choose the law that will govern the contract as long as the choice is “reasonable.” Article 6 of the CISG, however, imposes no limitation on the parties in their choice of what law will govern the contract, and the 1986 Hague Convention on the Law Applicable to Contracts for the International Sale of Goods—often referred to as the Choice-of-Law Convention—allows unlimited autonomy in the choice of law. Whenever a choice of law is not specified in a contract, the Hague Convention indicates that the law of the country where the seller’s place of business is located will govern.

Force Majeure Clause Every contract, and particularly those involving international transactions, should have a force majeure clause. The meaning of the French term force majeure is “impossible or irresistible force”—sometimes loosely defined as “an act of God.” Force majeure clauses commonly stipulate that in addition to acts of God, a number of other eventualities (such as governmental orders or regulations, embargoes, or extreme shortages of materials) may excuse a party from liability for nonperformance.

REVIEWING The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

Guy Holcomb owns and operates Oasis Goodtime Emporium, an adult entertainment establishment. Holcomb wanted to create an adult Internet system for Oasis that would offer customers adult theme videos and “live” chat room programs using performers at the club. On May 10, Holcomb signed a work order authorizing Thomas Consulting Group (TCG) “to deliver a working prototype of a customer chat system, demonstrating the integration of live video and chatting in a Web browser.” In exchange for creating the prototype, Holcomb agreed to pay TCG $64,697. On May 20, Holcomb signed an additional work order in the amount of $12,943 for TCG to install a customized firewall system. The work orders stated that Holcomb would make monthly installment payments to CCG, and both parties expected the work would be finished by September. Due to unforeseen problems largely attributable to system configuration and software incompatibility, completion of the project required more time than anticipated. By the end of the summer, the Web site was still not ready, and Holcomb had fallen behind in his payments to TCG. TCG was threatening to cease work and file a suit for breach of contract unless the bill was paid. Rather than make further payments, Holcomb wanted to abandon the Web site project. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Would a court be likely to decide that the transaction between Holcomb and TCG was covered by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)? Why or why not?
2. Would a court be likely to consider Holcomb a merchant under the UCC? Why or why not?
3. Did the parties have a valid contract under the UCC? Were any terms left open in the contract? If so, which terms? How would a court deal with open terms?
4. Suppose that Holcomb and TCG meet in October in an attempt to resolve their problems. At that time, the parties reach an oral agreement that TCG will continue to work without demanding full payment of the past due amounts and Holcomb will pay TCG $5,000 per week. Assuming the contract falls under the UCC, is the oral agreement enforceable? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

choice-of-language clause 412 choice-of-law clause 412 course of dealing 407 course of performance 408 firm offer 400 force majeure clause 413 lease agreement 398 lessee 398 lessor 398 merchant 396 output contract 400 predominant-factor test 395 requirements contract 400 sale 394 sales contract 393 seasonably 401

 tangible property 394 usage of trade 407

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

20-1. Strike offers to sell Bailey one thousand shirts for a stated price. The offer declares that shipment will be made by the Dependable Truck Line. Bailey replies, "I accept your offer for one thousand shirts at the price quoted. Delivery to be by Yellow Express Truck Line." Both Strike and Bailey are merchants. Three weeks later, Strike ships the shirts by the Dependable Truck Line, and Bailey refuses shipment. Strike sues for breach of contract. Bailey claims (a) that there never was a contract because the reply, which included a modification of carriers, did not constitute an acceptance and (b) that even if there had been a contract, Strike would have been in breach owing to having shipped the shirts by Dependable, contrary to the contract terms. Discuss fully Bailey's claims.

20-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Flint, a retail seller of television sets, orders one hundred Color-X sets from manufacturer Martin. The order specifies the price and that the television sets are to be shipped by Hummingbird Express on or before October 30. Martin receives the order on October 5. On October 8, Martin writes Flint a letter indicating that the order was received and that the sets will be shipped as directed, at the specified price. Flint receives this letter on October 10. On October 28, Martin, in preparing the shipment, discovers it has only ninety Color-X sets in stock. Martin ships the ninety Color-X sets and ten television sets of a different model, stating clearly on the invoice that the ten are being shipped only as an accommodation. Flint claims Martin is in breach of contract. Martin claims that the shipment was not an acceptance and therefore no contract was formed. Explain who is correct, and why.

- For a sample answer to Question 20-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

20-3. Shane has a requirements contract with Sky that obligates Sky to supply Shane with all the gasoline Shane needs for his delivery trucks for one year at $2.30 per gallon. A clause inserted in small print in the contract by Shane, and not noticed by Sky, states, "The buyer reserves the right to reject any shipment for any reason without liability." For six months, Shane orders and Sky delivers under the contract without any controversy. Then, because of a war in the Middle East, the price of gasoline to Sky increases substantially. Sky contacts Shane and tells Shane he cannot possibly fulfill the requirements contract unless Shane agrees to pay $2.50 per gallon. Shane, in need of the gasoline, agrees in writing to modify the contract. Later that month, Shane learns he can buy gasoline at $2.40 per gallon from Collins. Shane refuses delivery of his most recent order from Sky, claiming (a) that the contract allows him to do so without liability, and (b) that he is required to pay only $2.30 per gallon if he accepts the delivery. Discuss fully Shane's contentions.

20-4. Goods Associated with Real Estate. Heatway Radiant Floors and Snowmelting Corp. sells parts for underground radiant heating systems. These systems circulate warm fluid under indoor flooring as an alternative to conventional heating systems or under driveways and sidewalks to melt snow and ice. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co. made and sold a hose, Entran II, that Heatway used in its radiant systems. Between 1989 and 1993, 25 million feet of Entran II was made by Goodyear and installed by Heatway. In 1992, homeowners began complaining about hardening of the hose and leaks in the systems. Linda Loughridge and other homeowners filed a suit in a federal district court against Goodyear and Heatway, alleging a variety of contract breaches under Colorado's version of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Goodyear filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing, in part, that because Entran II was used in the construction of underground systems that were covered by flooring or cement, the hose was not a "good" and thus the UCC did not apply. Should the court agree with this interpretation of the scope of Article 2? Explain. [Loughridge v. Goodyear Tire and Rubber Co., 192 F.Supp.2d 1175 (D.Colo.2002)]

20-5. Statute of Frauds. Quality Pork International is a Nebraska firm that makes and sells custom pork products. Rupari Food Services, Inc., buys and sells food products from and to retail operations and food brokers. In November 1999, Midwest Brokerage arranged an oral contract between Quality and Rupari, under which Quality would ship three orders to Star Food Processing, Inc., and Rupari would pay for the products. Quality shipped the goods to Star and sent invoices to Rupari. In turn, Rupari billed Star for all three orders but paid Quality only for the first two (for $43,736.84 and $47,467.80, respectively), not for the third. Quality filed a suit in a Nebraska state court against Rupari, alleging breach of contract, to recover $44,051.98, the cost of the third order. Rupari argued that because the parties did not have a written agreement, as required by Section 2-201 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), there was no enforceable contract. What are the exceptions to the UCC's writing requirement? Do any of those exceptions apply here? Explain. [Quality Pork International v. Rupari Food Services, Inc., 267 Neb. 474, 675 N.W.2d 642 (2004)]

20-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Propulsion Technologies, Inc., a Louisiana firm doing business as PowerTech Marine Propellers, markets small steel boat propellers that are made by a unique tooling method. Attwood Corp., a Michigan firm, operated a foundry (a place where metal is cast) in Mexico. In 1996, Attwood offered to produce castings of the propellers. Attwood promised to maintain quality, warrant the castings against defects, and obtain insurance to cover liability. In January 1997, the parties signed a letter that expressed these and other terms—Attwood was to be paid per casting, and twelve months' notice was required to terminate the deal—but the letter did not state a quantity. PowerTech provided the tooling. Attwood produced rough castings, which PowerTech refined by checking each propeller's pitch; machining its interior; grinding, balancing, and polishing the propeller; and adding serial numbers and a rubber clutch. In October, Attwood told PowerTech that the foundry was closing. PowerTech filed a suit in a federal district court against Attwood, alleging, among other things, breach of contract. One of the issues was whether their deal was subject to Article 2 of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). What type of transactions does Article 2 cover? Does the arrangement between PowerTech and Attwood qualify? Explain. [Propulsion Technologies, Inc. v. Attwood Corp., 369 F3d 896 (5th Cir. 2004)]

CHAPTER 20 The Formation of Sales and Lease Contracts

- To view a sample answer for Problem 20-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 20," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

20-7. Offer. In 1998, Johnson Controls, Inc. (JCI), began buying auto parts from Q.C. Onics Ventures, LP. For each part, JCI would inform Onics of its need and ask the price. Onics would analyze the specifications, contact its suppliers, and respond with a formal quotation. A quote listed a part's number and description, the price per unit, and an estimate of units available for a given year. A quote did not state payment terms, an acceptance date, timing of performance, warranties, or quantities. JCI would select a supplier and issue a purchase order for a part. The purchase order required the seller to supply all of JCI's requirements for the part but gave the buyer the right to end the deal at any time. Using this procedure, JCI issued hundreds of purchase orders. In July 2001, JCI terminated its relationship with Onics and began buying parts through another supplier. Onics filed a suit in a federal district court against Johnson, alleging breach of contract. Which documents—the price quotations or the purchase orders—constituted offers? Which were acceptances? What effect would the answers to these questions have on the result in this case? Explain. [Q.C. Onics Ventures, LP v. Johnson Controls, Inc., ___ F.Supp.2d ___ (N.D.Ind. 2006)]

20-8. Parol Evidence. Clear Lakes Trout Co. operates a fish hatchery in Idaho. Rodney and Carla Griffith are trout growers. Clear Lakes agreed to sell "small trout" to the Griffiths, who agreed to sell the trout back when they had grown to "market size." At the time, in the trade "market size" referred to fish approximating one-pound live weight. The parties did business without a written agreement until September 1998 when they executed a contract with a six-year duration. The contract did not define "market size." All went well until September 11, 2001, after which there was a demand for larger fish. Clear Lakes began taking deliveries later and in smaller loads, leaving the Griffiths with overcrowded ponds and other problems. In 2003, the Griffiths refused to accept more fish and filed a suit in an Idaho state court against Clear Lakes, alleging breach of contract. Clear Lakes argued that there was no contract because the parties had different interpretations of "market size." Clear Lakes claimed that "market size" varied according to whatever its customers demanded. The Griffiths asserted that the term referred to fish of about one-pound live weight. Is outside evidence admissible to explain the terms of a contract? Are there any exceptions that could apply in this case? If so, what is the likely result? Explain. [Griffith v. Clear Lakes Trout Co., 143 Idaho 733, 152 P.3d 604 (2007)]

20-9. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Daniel Fox owned Fox and Lamberth Enterprises, Inc., a kitchen and bath remodeling business, in Dayton, Ohio. Fox leased a building from Carl and Bellulah Hussong. Craftsmen Home Improvement, Inc., also remodeled baths and kitchens. When Fox planned to close his business, Craftsmen expressed an interest in buying his showroom assets. Fox set a price of $50,000. Craftsmen's owners agreed and gave Fox a list of the desired items and "A Bill of Sale" that set the terms for payment. The parties did not discuss Fox's arrangement with the Hussongs, but Craftsmen expected to negotiate a new lease and extensively modified the premises, including removing some of the displays to its own showroom. When the Hussongs and Craftsmen could not agree on new terms, Craftsmen told Fox that the deal was off. [Fox & Lamberth Enterprises, Inc. v. Craftsmen Home Improvement, Inc., ___ Ohio App.3d ___, ___ N.E.2d ___ (2 Dist. 2006)]

- In Fox's suit in an Ohio state court for breach of contract, Craftsmen raised the Statute of Frauds as a defense. What are the requirements of the Statute of Frauds? Did the deal between Fox and Craftsmen meet these requirements? Did it fall under one of the exceptions? Explain.
- Craftsmen also claimed that the "predominant factor" of its agreement with Fox was a lease for the Hussongs' building. What is the predominant-factor test? Does it apply here? In any event, is it fair to hold a party to a contract to buy a business's assets when the buyer cannot negotiate a favorable lease of the premises on which the assets are located? Discuss.

20-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 20." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Sales and Lease Contracts: Price as a Term. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) Is Anna correct in assuming that a contract can exist even though the sales price for the computer equipment was not specified? Explain.
- (b) According to the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), what conditions must be satisfied in order for a contract to be formed when certain terms are left open? What terms (in addition to price) can be left open?
- (c) Are the e-mail messages that Anna refers to sufficient proof of the contract?
- (d) Would parol evidence be admissible?

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

To view the text of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)—and keep up to date on its various revisions—go to the Web site of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL) at

www.nccusl.org

Cornell University's Legal Information Institute also offers online access to the UCC, as well as to UCC articles as enacted by particular states and proposed revisions to articles, at www.law.cornell.edu/ucc/index.htm

The Pace University School of Law's Institute of International Commercial Law maintains a Web site that contains the full text of the CISG, as well as relevant cases and discussions of the law. Go to cisgw3.law.pace.edu/cisg/text/treaty.html

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 20" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 20-1: Legal Perspective
Is It a Contract?

Internet Exercise 20-2: Management Perspective
A Checklist for Sales Contracts

APPENDIX TO CHAPTER 20

An Example of a Contract for the International Sale of Coffee

1 OVERLAND COFFEE IMPORT CONTRACT OF THE
2 GREEN COFFEE ASSOCIATION OF
NEW YORK CITY, INC.*

Contract Seller's No.: 504617
Buyer's No.: P9264
Date: 10/11/08

SOLD BY: XYZ Co.
TO: Starbucks

3 QUANTITY: Five Hundred (500) ^{Bags} Tons of Mexican coffee weighing about 152.117 lbs. per bag.

4 PACKAGING: Coffee must be packed in clean sound bags of uniform size made of sisal, henequen, jute, burlap, or similar woven material, without inner lining or outer covering of any material properly sewn by hand and/or machine.
Bulk shipments are allowed if agreed by mutual consent of Buyer and Seller.

5 DESCRIPTION: High grown Mexican Altura

PRICE: At Ten/$10.00 dollars U.S. Currency, per lb. net, (U.S. Funds)
Upon delivery in Bonded Public Warehouse at Laredo, TX (City and State)

6 PAYMENT: Cash against warehouse receipts

ARRIVAL: Bill and tender to DATE when all import requirements and governmental regulations have been satisfied, and coffee delivered or discharged (as per contract terms). Seller is obliged to give the Buyer two (2) calendar days free time in Bonded Public Warehouse following but not including date of tender.
7 During December via truck
(Period) (Method of Transportation) from Mexico for arrival at Laredo, TX, USA (Country of Exportation) (Country of Importation)

ADVICE OF ARRIVAL: Partial shipments permitted.
Advice of arrival with warehouse name and location, together with the quantity, description, marks and place of entry, must be transmitted directly, or through Seller's Agent/Broker, to the Buyer or his Agent/Broker. Advice will be given as soon as known but not later than the fifth business day following arrival at the named warehouse. Such advice may be given verbally with written confirmation to be sent the same day.

8 WEIGHTS: (1) DELIVERED WEIGHTS: Coffee covered by this contract is to be weighed at location named in tender. Actual tare to be allowed.
(2) SHIPPING WEIGHTS: Coffee covered by this contract is sold on shipping weights. Any loss in weight exceeding 1/2 percent at location named in tender is for account of Seller at contract price.
(3) Coffee is to be weighed within fifteen (15) calendar days after tender. Weighing expenses, if any, for account of Seller (Seller or Buyer)

9 MARKINGS: Bags to be branded in English with the name of Country of Origin and otherwise to comply with laws and regulations of the Country of Importation, in effect at the time of entry, governing marking of import merchandise. Any expense incurred by failure to comply with these regulations to be borne by Exporter/Seller.

10 RULINGS: The "Rulings on Coffee Contracts" of the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., in effect on the date this contract is made, is incorporated for all purposes as a part of this agreement, and together herewith, constitute the entire contract. No variation or addition hereto shall be valid unless signed by the parties to the contract.
Seller guarantees that the terms printed on the reverse hereof, which by reference are made a part hereof, are identical with the terms as printed in By-Laws and Rules of the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., heretofore adopted.
Exceptions to this guarantee are:
ACCEPTED: XYZ Co. COMMISSION TO BE PAID BY: Seller

11 BY DM Seller Agent
Starbucks Buyer

12 BY [Signature] Buyer
Agent ABC Brokerage Broker(s)

13 When this contract is executed by a person acting for another, such person hereby represents that he is fully authorized to commit his principal.

* Reprinted with permission of The Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc.

(Continued)

- 1 This is a contract for a sale of coffee to be imported internationally. If the parties have their principal places of business located in different countries, the contract may be subject to the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG). If the parties' principal places of business are located in the United States, the contract may be subject to the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC).
- 2 Quantity is one of the most important terms to include in a contract. Without it, a court may not be able to enforce the contract. See Chapter 20.
- 3 Weight per unit (bag) can be exactly stated or approximately stated. If it is not so stated, usage of trade in international contracts determines standards of weight.
- 4 Packaging requirements can be conditions for acceptance and payment. Bulk shipments are not permitted without the consent of the buyer.
- 5 A description of the coffee and the "Markings" constitute express warranties. Warranties in contracts for domestic sales of goods are discussed generally in Chapter 23. International contracts rely more heavily on descriptions and models or samples.
- 6 Under the UCC, parties may enter into a valid contract even though the price is not set. Under the CISG, a contract must provide for an exact determination of the price.
- 7 The terms of payment may take one of two forms: credit or cash. Credit terms can be complicated. A cash term can be simple, and payment can be made by any means acceptable in the ordinary course of business (for example, a personal check or a letter of credit). If the seller insists on actual cash, the buyer must be given a reasonable time to get it. See Chapter 22.
- 8 Tender means the seller has placed goods that conform to the contract at the buyer's disposition. What constitutes a valid tender is explained in Chapter 22. This contract requires that the coffee meet all import regulations and that it be ready for pickup by the buyer at a "Bonded Public Warehouse." (A bonded warehouse is a place in which goods can be stored without paying taxes until the goods are removed.)
- 9 The delivery date is significant because, if it is not met, the buyer may hold the seller in breach of the contract. Under this contract, the seller can be given a "period" within which to deliver the goods, instead of a specific day, which could otherwise present problems. The seller is also given some time to rectify goods that do not pass inspection (see the "Guarantee" clause on page two of the contract). For a discussion of the remedies of the buyer and seller, see Chapter 22.
- 10 As part of a proper tender, the seller (or its agent) must inform the buyer (or its agent) when the goods have arrived at their destination. The responsibilities of agents are set out in Chapters 31 and 32.
- 11 In some contracts, delivered and shipped weights can be important. During shipping, some loss can be attributed to the type of goods (spoilage of fresh produce, for example) or to the transportation itself. A seller and buyer can agree on the extent to which either of them will bear such losses. See Chapter 47 for a discussion of the liability of common carriers for loss during shipment.
- 12 Documents are often incorporated in a contract by reference, because including them word for word can make a contract difficult to read. If the document is later revised, the entire contract might have to be reworked. Documents that are typically incorporated by reference include detailed payment and delivery terms, special provisions, and sets of rules, codes, and standards.
- 13 In international sales transactions, and for domestic deals involving certain products, brokers are used to form the contracts. When so used, the brokers are entitled to a commission. See Chapter 31.

TERMS AND CONDITIONS

- 14 ARBITRATION: All controversies relating to, in connection with, or arising out of this contract, its modification, making or the authority or obligations of the signatories hereto, and whether involving the principals, agents, brokers, or others who actually subscribe hereto, shall be settled by arbitration in accordance with the "Rules of Arbitration" of the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., as they exist at the time of the arbitration (including provisions as to payment of fees and expenses). Arbitration is the sole remedy hereunder, and it shall be held in accordance with the law of New York State, and judgment of any award may be entered in the courts of that State, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. All notices or judicial service in reference to arbitration or enforcement shall be deemed given if transmitted as required by the aforesaid rules.
- 15 GUARANTEE: (a) If all or any of the coffee is refused admission into the country of importation by reason of any violation of governmental laws or acts, which violation existed at the time the coffee arrived at Bonded-Public Warehouse, seller is required, as to the amount not admitted and as soon as possible, to deliver replacement coffee in conformity to all terms and conditions of this contract, excepting only the Arrival terms, but not later than thirty (30) days after the date of the violation notice. Any payment made and expenses incurred for any coffee denied entry shall be refunded within ten (10) calendar days of denial of entry, and payment shall be made for the replacement delivery in accordance with the terms of this contract. Consequently, if Buyer removes the coffee from the Bonded Public Warehouse, Seller's responsibility as to such portion hereunder ceases.
(b) Contracts containing the overstamp "No Pass-No Sale" on the face of the contract shall be interpreted to mean: If any or all of the coffee is not admitted into the country of Importation in its original condition by reason of failure to meet requirements of the government's laws or Acts, the contract shall be deemed null and void as to that portion of the coffee which is not admitted in its original condition. Any payment made and expenses incurred for any coffee denied entry shall be refunded within ten (10) calendar days of denial of entry.
- 16 CONTINGENCY: This contract is not contingent upon any other contract.
- 17 CLAIMS: Coffee shall be considered accepted as to quality unless within fifteen (15) calendar days after delivery at Bonded Public Warehouse or within fifteen (15) calendar days after all Government clearances have been received, whichever is later, either:
(a) Claims are settled by the parties hereto, or,
(b) Arbitration proceedings have been filed by one of the parties in accordance with the provisions hereof.
(c) If neither (a) nor (b) has been done in the stated period or if any portion of the coffee has been removed from the Bonded Public Warehouse before representative sealed samples have been drawn by the Green Coffee Association of New York City, Inc., in accordance with its rules, Seller's responsibility for quality claims ceases for that portion so removed.
(d) Any question of quality submitted to arbitration shall be a matter of allowance only, unless otherwise provided in the contract.
- 18 DELIVERY: (a) No more than three (3) chops may be tendered for each lot of 250 bags.
(b) Each chop of coffee tendered is to be uniform in grade and appearance. All expense necessary to make coffee uniform shall be for account of seller.
(c) Notice of arrival and/or sampling order constitutes a tender, and must be given not later than the fifth business day following arrival at Bonded Public Warehouse stated on the contract.
- 19 INSURANCE: Seller is responsible for any loss or damage, or both, until Delivery and Discharge of coffee at the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.

All Insurance Risks, costs and responsibility are for Seller's Account until Delivery and Discharge of coffee at the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.

Buyer's insurance responsibility begins from the day of importation or from the day of tender, whichever is later.
- 20 FREIGHT: Seller to provide and pay for all transportation and related expenses to the Bonded Public Warehouse in the Country of Importation.
- 21 EXPORT DUTIES/TAXES: Exporter is to pay all Export taxes, duties or other fees or charges, if any, levied because of exportation.
- 21 IMPORT DUTIES/TAXES: Any Duty or Tax whatsoever, imposed by the government or any authority of the Country of Importation, shall be borne by the Importer/Buyer.
- 22 INSOLVENCY OR FINANCIAL FAILURE OF BUYER OR SELLER: If, at any time before the contract is fully executed, either party hereto shall meet with creditors because of inability generally to make payment of obligations when due, or shall suspend such payments, fail to meet his general trade obligations in the regular course of business, shall file a petition in bankruptcy or, for an arrangement, shall become insolvent, or commit an act of bankruptcy, then the other party may at his option, expressed in writing, declare the aforesaid to constitute a breach and default of this contract, and may, in addition to other remedies, decline to deliver further or make payment or may sell or purchase for the defaulter's account, and may collect damage for any injury or loss, or shall account for the profit, if any, occasioned by such sale or purchase.

This clause is subject to the provisions of (11 USC 365 (e) 1) if invoked.
- 23 BREACH OR DEFAULT OF CONTRACT: In the event either party hereto fails to perform, or breaches or repudiates this agreement, the other party shall subject to the specific provisions of this contract be entitled to the remedies and relief provided for by the Uniform Commercial Code of the State of New York. The computation and ascertainment of damages, or the determination of any other dispute as to relief, shall be made by the arbitrators in accordance with the Arbitration Clause herein.

Consequential damages shall not, however, be allowed.

(Continued)

- 14 Arbitration is the settling of a dispute by submitting it to a disinterested party (other than a court) that renders a decision. The procedures and costs can be provided for in an arbitration clause or incorporated through other documents. To enforce an award rendered in an arbitration, the winning party can “enter” (submit) the award in a court “of competent jurisdiction.” For a general discussion of arbitration and other forms of dispute resolution (other than courts), see Chapter 2.
- 15 When goods are imported internationally, they must meet certain import requirements before being released to the buyer. Because of this, buyers frequently want a guaranty clause that covers the goods not admitted into the country and that either requires the seller to replace the goods within a stated time or allows the contract for those goods not admitted to be void. See Chapter 17.
- 16 In the “Claims” clause, the parties agree that the buyer has a certain time within which to reject the goods. The right to reject is a right by law and does not need to be stated in a contract. If the buyer does not exercise the right within the time specified in the contract, the goods will be considered accepted. See Chapter 22.
- 17 Many international contracts include definitions of terms so that the parties understand what they mean. Some terms are used in a particular industry in a specific way. Here, the word chop refers to a unit of like-grade coffee bean. The buyer has a right to inspect (“sample”) the coffee. If the coffee does not conform to the contract, the seller must correct the nonconformity. See Chapter 22.
- 18 The “Delivery,” “Insurance,” and “Freight” clauses, with the “Arrival” clause on page one of the contract, indicate that this is a destination contract. The seller has the obligation to deliver the goods to the destination, not simply deliver them into the hands of a carrier. Under this contract, the destination is a “Bonded Public Warehouse” in a specific location. The seller bears the risk of loss until the goods are delivered at their destination. Typically, the seller will have bought insurance to cover the risk. See Chapter 21 for a discussion of delivery terms and the risk of loss and Chapter 49 for a general discussion of insurance.
- 19 Delivery terms are commonly placed in all sales contracts. Such terms determine who pays freight and other costs and, in the absence of an agreement specifying otherwise, who bears the risk of loss. International contracts may use these delivery terms or they may use INCOTERMS, which are published by the International Chamber of Commerce. For example, the INCOTERM DDP (delivered duty paid) requires the seller to arrange shipment, obtain and pay for import or export permits, and get the goods through customs to a named destination.
- 20 Exported and imported goods are subject to duties, taxes, and other charges imposed by the governments of the countries involved. International contracts spell out who is responsible for these charges.
- 21 This clause protects a party if the other party should become financially unable to fulfill the obligations under the contract. Thus, if the seller cannot afford to deliver, or the buyer cannot afford to pay, for the stated reasons, the other party can consider the contract breached. This right is subject to “11 USC 365(e)(1),” which refers to a specific provision of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code dealing with executory contracts. Bankruptcy provisions are covered in Chapter 30.
- 22 In the “Breach or Default of Contract” clause, the parties agreed that the remedies under this contract are the remedies (except for consequential damages) provided by the UCC, as in effect in the state of New York. The amount and “ascertainment” of damages, as well as other disputes about relief, are to be determined by arbitration. Breach of contract and contractual remedies in general are explained in Chapter 22. Arbitration is discussed in Chapter 2.
- 23 Three clauses frequently included in international contracts (see Chapter 20) are omitted here. There is no choice-of-language clause designating the official language to be used in interpreting the contract terms. There is no choice-of-forum clause designating the place in which disputes will be litigated, except for arbitration (law of New York State). Finally, there is no force majeure clause relieving the sellers or buyers from nonperformance due to events beyond their control.

CHAPTER 21

Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest

Before the creation of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), title—the right of ownership—was the central concept in sales law, controlling all issues of rights and remedies of the parties to a sales contract. There were numerous problems with this concept, however. For example, it was frequently difficult to determine when title actually passed from the seller to the buyer, and therefore it was also difficult to predict which party a court would decide had title at the time of a loss. Because of such problems, the UCC divorced the question of title as completely as possible from the question of the rights and obligations of buyers, sellers, and third parties (such as subsequent purchasers, creditors, or the tax collector).

In some situations, title is still relevant under the UCC, and the UCC has special rules for locating title. These rules will be discussed in the sections that follow. In most situations, however, the UCC has replaced the concept of title with three other concepts: (1) identification, (2) risk of loss, and (3) insurable interest.

In lease contracts, of course, the lessor-owner of the goods retains title. Hence, the UCC's provisions relating to passage of title do not apply to leased goods. Other concepts discussed in this chapter, though, including identification, risk of loss, and insurable interest, relate to lease contracts as well as to sales contracts.

Identification

Before any interest in specific goods can pass from the seller or lessor to the buyer or lessee, the goods must be (1) in existence and (2) identified as the specific goods designated in the contract. Identification takes place when specific goods are designated as the subject matter of a sales or lease contract. Title and risk of loss cannot pass to the buyer from the seller unless the goods are identified to the contract [UCC 2-105(2)]. (As mentioned, title to leased goods remains with the lessor—or, if the owner is a third party, with that party.) Identification is significant because it gives the buyer or lessee the right to insure (or to have an insurable interest in) the goods and the right to recover from third parties who damage the goods.

Once the goods are in existence, the parties can agree in their contract on when identification will take place. If they do not so specify, the UCC will determine when identification takes place [UCC 2-501(1), 2A-217].

Existing Goods

If the contract calls for the sale or lease of specific and ascertained goods that are already in existence, identification takes place at the time the contract is made. For example, you contract to purchase or lease a fleet of five cars by the vehicle identification numbers of the cars.

Future Goods

If a sale or lease involves unborn animals to be born within twelve months after contracting, identification takes place when the animals are conceived. If a sale involves crops that are to be harvested within twelve months (or the next harvest season occurring after contracting, whichever is longer), identification takes place when the crops are planted; otherwise, identification takes place when the crops begin to grow. In a sale or lease of any other future goods, identification occurs when the goods are shipped, marked, or otherwise designated by the seller or lessor as the goods to which the contract refers.

Goods That Are Part of a Larger Mass

Goods that are part of a larger mass are identified when the goods are marked, shipped, or somehow designated by the seller or lessor as the particular goods to pass under the contract. Suppose that a buyer orders 1,000 cases of beans from a 10,000-case lot. Until the seller separates the 1,000 cases of beans from the 10,000-case lot, title and risk of loss remain with the seller.

A common exception to this rule deals with fungible goods. Fungible goods are goods that are alike naturally, by agreement, or by trade usage. Typical examples are specific grades or types of wheat, oil, and wine, usually stored in large containers. If the owners of these goods hold title as tenants in common (owners having shares undivided from the entire mass jointly owned—see Chapter 47), a seller-owner can pass title and risk of loss to the buyer without actually separating the goods. The buyer replaces the seller as an owner in common [UCC 2-105(4)].

For example, Anselm, Braudel, and Carpenter are farmers. They deposit, respectively, 5,000 bushels, 3,000 bushels, and 2,000 bushels of grain of the same grade and quality in a grain elevator. The three become owners in common, with Anselm owning 50 percent of the 10,000 bushels, Braudel 30 percent, and Carpenter 20 percent. Anselm could contract to sell her 5,000 bushels of grain to Treyton and, because the goods are fungible, pass title and risk of loss to Treyton without physically separating the 5,000 bushels. Treyton now becomes an owner in common with Braudel and Carpenter.

When Title Passes

Once goods exist and are identified, the provisions of UCC 2-401 apply to the passage of title. Unless the parties explicitly agree,¹ title passes to the buyer at the time and the place the seller performs the physical

1. In many sections of the UCC, the phrase “unless otherwise explicitly agreed” appears, meaning that any explicit agreement between the buyer and the seller determines the rights, duties, and liabilities of the parties, including when title passes.

delivery of the goods [UCC 2-401(2)]. For example, if a person is buying cattle at a livestock auction, title will pass when the cattle are physically delivered to him or her (unless, of course, the parties agree otherwise).²

Shipment and Destination Contracts

In the absence of an agreement, delivery arrangements can determine when title passes from the seller to the buyer. In a shipment contract, the seller is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier, such as a trucking company. Under a shipment contract, the seller is required only to deliver the goods into the hands of a carrier, and title passes to the buyer at the time and place of shipment [UCC 2-401(2)(a)]. Generally, all contracts are assumed to be shipment contracts if nothing to the contrary is stated in the contract.

In a destination contract, the seller is required to deliver the goods to a particular destination, usually directly to the buyer, but sometimes to another party designated by the buyer. Title passes to the buyer when the goods are tendered at that destination [UCC 2-401(2)(b)]. (As you will read in Chapter 22, tender of delivery occurs when the seller places or holds conforming goods at the buyer’s disposal—with any necessary notice—enabling the buyer to take possession [UCC 2A-503(1)].)

Delivery without Movement of the Goods

When a sales contract does not call for the seller to ship or deliver the goods (when the buyer is to pick up the goods), the passage of title depends on whether the seller must deliver a document of title, such as a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt, to the buyer. A *bill of lading*³ is a receipt for goods that is signed by a carrier and serves as a contract for the transportation of the goods. A warehouse receipt is a receipt issued by a warehouse for goods stored in a warehouse.

When a document of title is required, title passes to the buyer when and where the document is delivered. Thus, if the goods are stored in a warehouse, title passes to the buyer when the appropriate documents are delivered to the buyer. The goods never move. In fact, the buyer can choose to leave the goods at the same warehouse for a period of time, and the buyer’s title to those goods will be unaffected.

2. See, for example, In re Stewart, 274 Bankr. 503 (2002).

3. The term bill of lading has been used by international carriers for many years and is derived from bill, which historically referred to a schedule of costs for services, and the verb to lade, which means to load cargo onto a ship or other form of transportation.

When no document of title is required, and delivery is made without moving the goods, title passes at the time and place the sales contract is made, if the goods have already been identified. If the goods have not been identified, title does not pass until identification occurs. For example, suppose that Juan sells lumber to Bodan. They agree that Bodan will pick up the lumber at the yard. If the lumber has been identified (segregated, marked, or in any other way distinguished from all other lumber), title passes to Bodan when the contract is signed. If the lumber is still in large storage bins at the mill, title does not pass to Bodan until the particular pieces of lumber to be sold under this contract are identified [UCC 2-401(3)].

Sales or Leases by Nonowners

Problems occur when persons who acquire goods with imperfect titles attempt to sell or lease them. Sections 2-402 and 2-403 of the UCC deal with the rights of two parties who lay claim to the same goods sold with imperfect titles. Generally, a buyer acquires at least whatever title the seller has to the goods sold.

These same UCC sections also protect lessees. Obviously, a lessee does not acquire whatever title the lessor has to the goods; rather, the lessee acquires a right to possess and use the goods—that is, a leasehold interest. A lessee acquires whatever leasehold interest the lessor has or has the power to transfer, subject to the lease contract [UCC 2A-303, 2A-304, 2A-305].

Void Title A buyer may unknowingly purchase goods from a seller who is not the owner of the goods. If the seller is a thief, the seller's title is void—legally, no title exists. Thus, the buyer acquires no title, and the real owner can reclaim the goods from the buyer. If the goods were leased instead, the same result would occur because the lessor would have no leasehold interest to transfer.

For example, if Jin steals goods owned by Maren, Jin has a void title to those goods. If Jin sells the goods to Shidra, Maren can reclaim them from Shidra even though Shidra acted in good faith and honestly was not aware that the goods were stolen. (Note that Shidra may file a tort claim against Jin under these circumstances, but here we are only discussing the title to goods.) Article 2A contains similar provisions for leases.

Voidable Title A seller has a voidable title if the goods that he or she is selling were obtained by fraud, paid for with a check that is later dishonored, purchased from a minor, or purchased on credit when the seller was insolvent. (Under the UCC, a person is insolvent when that person ceases to pay “his [or her] debts in the ordinary course of business or cannot pay his [or her] debts as they become due or is insolvent within the meaning of federal bankruptcy law” [UCC 1-201(23)].)

Good Faith Purchasers. In contrast to a seller with void title, a seller with voidable title has the power to transfer good title to a good faith purchaser for value. A good faith purchaser is one who buys without knowledge of circumstances that would make a person of ordinary prudence inquire about the validity of the seller's title to the goods. One who purchases for value gives legally sufficient consideration (value) for the goods purchased. The real owner normally cannot recover goods from a good faith purchaser for value [UCC 2-403(1)].⁴ If the buyer of the goods is not a good faith purchaser for value, then the actual owner of the goods can reclaim them from the buyer (or from the seller, if the goods are still in the seller's possession).

The dispute in the following case arose from the transfer of a car without its document of title to a third party who never suspected that the seller would turn out to be a thief.

4. The real owner could, of course, sue the person who initially obtained voidable title to the goods.

CASE 21.1 Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Co. v. Banc Auto, Inc.

Pennsylvania Superior Court, 2006. 897 A.2d 1247.

• Background and Facts In July 2001, Euro Motorcars, an auto dealership in Bethesda, Maryland, agreed to sell a used 2000 Mercedes-Benz S430 for $56,500 to Patrick Figueroa, whose job was to buy and sell cars among dealers. The parties understood that Euro would turn over a document of title to the Mercedes when the price was paid. Banc Auto, Inc., a dealer in Manheim, Pennsylvania, agreed to buy the car from Figueroa for $56,500 plus a percentage of Banc's profit in reselling the vehicle. Banc issued a check to Figueroa. Figueroa cashed the check. Figueroa did not pay Euro, however, and consequently Euro refused to deliver the document of title. Figueroa was convicted of stealing the check and paid Banc $10,000 in restitution. Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Company, Banc's insurer, filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Banc and Euro, asking the court to determine Empire's obligation to its insured. The court ordered the Mercedes to be sold and awarded Banc the $40,000 in proceeds. Euro appealed to a state intermediate appellate court, asserting that Banc was not entitled to the funds because Euro still possessed the document of title.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 21.1 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT*Opinion by KLEIN, J. [Judge]:

* * * *

* * * In order to possess voidable title, one must obtain goods through the assent of the original owner, but not necessarily acquire good title. Void title, on the other hand, derives from a situation where the goods were not obtained through the assent of the original owner. In common application, this means if goods are stolen and resold, no good title can be transferred because the thief has never had proper title to the goods and so cannot pass good title to another. However, if the goods are obtained through the consent of the original owner, even though that original owner may have been fraudulently induced to part with the goods, title is merely voidable and a buyer in good faith may still obtain title to the goods. [Emphasis added.]

Euro's claim here is essentially that it still held legal ownership of the car because it still held title to the car, never having transferred that title to either Figueroa or any other entity. * * *

* * * Euro [cites] the general proposition that to own, and therefore have the ability to dispose of, an automobile, a person must have title to the automobile. * * * We have no argument with the general proposition put forth by Euro; certainly title to [a] vehicle eventually must be transferred to the new owner. Rather, it is in the application of the general principle to the specific facts of this matter where Euro runs afoul.

* * * While the [Uniform Commercial] Code does not specifically alter the notion that title is an important factor in determining ownership, it did alter notions of how and when title passes from seller to purchaser.

Regarding the power to transfer, 13 [Pennsylvania Consolidated Statutes (Pa.C.S.) Section] 2403 [Pennsylvania's version of UCC 2-403] states, in relevant part:

(a) A purchaser of goods acquires all title which his transferor had or had power to transfer except that a purchaser of a limited interest, acquires rights only to the extent of the interest purchased. A person with voidable title has power to transfer a good title to a good faith purchaser for value. When goods have been delivered under a transaction of purchase the purchaser has such power even though:

- (1) the transferor was deceived as to the identity of the purchaser;
- (2) the delivery was in exchange for a check which is later dishonored; or
- (4) the delivery was procured through fraud punishable as larcenous under the criminal law.

(b) Any entrusting of possession of goods to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind gives him the power to transfer all rights of the entruster to a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

The Code further describes the passing of title in [S]ection 2401(2):

Unless otherwise explicitly agreed title passes to the buyer at the time and place at which the seller completes his performance with reference to the physical delivery of the goods, * * * even though a document of title is to be delivered at a different time and place * * * .

Reading these sections of the Code together, it is apparent that Euro transferred, at a minimum, voidable title to Figueroa when it delivered the Mercedes to him pursuant to their sales agreement. The fact that Euro claims to have been deceived as to the ultimate purchaser is immaterial, as is any contention that Figueroa obtained the car through a fraud which was punishable under the criminal law. Once Euro voluntarily delivered the car to Figueroa, Figueroa obtained the title, despite not having any document of title, and was free to dispose of the car to a buyer in good faith. Thus, Euro's argument that it was still the legal owner of the car fails.

* * * *

* * * [A] bona fide purchaser [is] one who buys something for value without notice of another's claim and without actual or constructive notice of any defect in title. * * * [G]enerally, a bona fide purchaser's rights to the property are not affected by the transferor's fraud against a third

CASE 21.1 CONTINUED party. There is no evidence that Banc Auto ever acted in any way other than honestly concerning this transaction, nor is there any evidence to show that Banc should have been in any way suspicious of this transaction as opposed to the myriad of other similar transactions [among these parties]. [Emphasis added.]

- Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court held that Euro had transferred voidable title to the Mercedes to Figueroa when Euro gave the car to him. Thus, Euro's possession of the document of title had no effect on Banc's award. The court affirmed the lower court's ruling in Banc's favor.

- The Ethical Dimension Given that Euro Motorcars had had prior dealings with Figueroa on a number of occasions and did not suspect that Figueroa would commit theft, was the result in this case fair? Why or why not?

- The E-Commerce Dimension If automobile title documents were available online, would that have helped Euro to avoid loss in this situation? What problems might the online availability of title documents lead to?

Voidable Title and Leases. The same rules apply in situations involving leases. A lessor with voidable title has the power to transfer a valid leasehold interest to a good faith lessee for value. The real owner cannot recover the goods, except as permitted by the terms of the lease. The real owner can, however, receive all proceeds arising from the lease, as well as a transfer of all rights, title, and interest as the lessor under the lease, including the lessor's interest in the return of the goods when the lease expires [UCC 2A-305(1)].

The Entrustment Rule According to UCC 2-403(2), entrusting goods to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind gives the merchant the power to transfer all rights to a buyer in the ordinary course of business. This is known as the entrustment rule. A buyer in the ordinary course of business is a person who—in good faith and without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another party—buys goods in the ordinary course from a merchant (other than a pawnbroker) in the business of selling goods of that kind [UCC 1-201(9)].

In Sales Contracts. The entrustment rule basically allows innocent buyers to obtain title to goods purchased from merchants even if the merchants do not have good title. Consider an example. Jan leaves her watch with a jeweler to be repaired. The jeweler sells both new and used watches. The jeweler sells Jan's watch to Kim, a customer who does not know that the jeweler has no right to sell it. Kim, as a good faith buyer, gets good title against Jan's claim of ownership.⁵

Note, however, that Kim obtains only those rights held by the person entrusting the goods (here, Jan). Suppose instead that in this example, Jan had stolen the watch from Greg and then left it with the jeweler to be repaired. The jeweler then sold it to Kim. Kim would obtain good title against Jan, who entrusted the watch to the jeweler, but not against Greg (the real owner), who neither entrusted the watch to Jan nor authorized Jan to entrust it.

Red Elvis, an artwork by Andy Warhol, was at the center of the dispute over title in the following case.

5. Jan, of course, can sue the jeweler for the tort of conversion (or trespass to personal property) to obtain damages equivalent to the cash value of the watch (see Chapter 6).

CASE 21.2 Lindholm v. Brant

Supreme Court of Connecticut, 2007. 283 Conn. 65, 925 A.2d 1048.

- Background and Facts In 1987, Kerstin Lindholm of Greenwich, Connecticut, bought a silkscreen by Andy Warhol titled Red Elvis from Anders Malmberg, a Swedish art dealer, for $300,000. In 1998, Lindholm loaned Red Elvis to the Guggenheim Museum in New York City for an exhibition to tour Europe. Peter Brant, who was on the museum's board of trustees and also a Greenwich resident, believed that Lindholm was the owner. Stellan Holm, a Swedish art dealer who had bought and sold

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 21.2 CONTINUED other Warhol works with Brant, told him, however, that Malmberg had bought it and would sell it for $2.9 million. Malmberg refused Brant's request to provide a copy of an invoice between Lindholm and himself on the ground that such documents normally and customarily are not disclosed in art deals. To determine whether Malmberg had good title, Brant hired an attorney to search the Art Loss Register (an international database of stolen and missing artworks) and other sources. No problems were found, but Brant was cautioned that this provided only "minimal assurances." Brant's attorney drafted a formal contract, which conditioned payment on the delivery of Red Elvis to a warehouse in Denmark. The exchange took place in April 2000.^a Lindholm filed a suit in a Connecticut state court against Brant, alleging conversion, among other things. The court issued a judgment in Brant's favor. Lindholm appealed to the Connecticut Supreme Court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

SULLIVAN, J. [Justice]

* * * *

* * * "A person buys goods in the ordinary course if the sale to the person comports with the usual or customary practices in the kind of business in which the seller is engaged or with the seller's own usual or customary practices * * * [according to Connecticut General Statutes Annotated Section 42a-1-201(9), Connecticut's version of UCC 1-201(9)]. A person buys goods in good faith if there is "honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" in the conduct or transaction concerned [under Section 42a-1-201(20)]. [Emphasis added.]

We are required, therefore, to determine whether the defendant followed the usual or customary practices and observed reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the art industry in his dealings with Malmberg. * * * [T]he defendant presented expert testimony that the vast majority of art transactions, in which the buyer has no reason for concern about the seller's ability to convey good title, are "completed on a handshake and an exchange of an invoice." It is not customary for sophisticated buyers and sellers to obtain a signed invoice from the original seller to the dealer prior to a transaction, nor is it an ordinary or customary practice to request the underlying invoice or corroborating information as to a dealer's authority to convey title. Moreover, it is not customary to approach the owner of an artwork if the owner regularly worked with a particular art dealer because any inquiries about an art transaction customarily are presented to the art dealer rather than directly to the [owner]. It is customary to rely upon representations made by respected dealers regarding their authority to sell works of art. A dealer customarily is not required to present an invoice establishing when and from whom he bought the artwork or the conditions of the purchase. [Emphasis added.]

We are compelled to conclude, however, that the sale from Malmberg to the defendant was unlike the vast majority of art transactions. * * * [U]nder such circumstances, a handshake and an exchange of invoice is not sufficient to confer status as a buyer in the ordinary course. * * *

* * * *

* * * [A] merchant buyer has a heightened duty of inquiry when a reasonable merchant would have doubts or questions regarding the seller's authority to sell. * * * In the present case, the defendant had concerns about Malmberg's ability to convey good title to Red Elvis because he believed that Lindholm might have had a claim to the painting. The defendant also was concerned that Malmberg had not yet acquired title to the painting * * * .

Because of his concern that Lindholm might make a claim to Red Elvis, the defendant took the extraordinary step of hiring counsel to conduct an investigation and to negotiate a formal contract of sale on his behalf. * * * [S]uch searches typically are not conducted during the course of a normal art transaction and, therefore, provided the defendant with at least some assurance that Lindholm had no claims to the painting.

Moreover, * * * both Malmberg and Holm had reputations as honest, reliable, and trustworthy art dealers. * * * The defendant had little reason to doubt Malmberg's claim that he was the

a. Unaware of this deal, Lindholm accepted a Japanese buyer's offer of $4.6 million for Red Elvis. The funds were wired to Malmberg, who kept them. Lindholm filed a criminal complaint against Malmberg in Sweden. In 2003, a Swedish court convicted Malmberg of "gross fraud embezzlement." The court awarded Lindholm $4.6 million and other relief.

CASE 21.2 CONTINUED

owner of Red Elvis, and any doubts that he did have reasonably were allayed [dispelled] by relying on Holm's assurances that Malmberg had bought the painting from the plaintiff * * * .

The defendant's concerns were further allayed when Malmberg delivered Red Elvis to a * * * warehouse in Denmark, the delivery location the parties had agreed to in the contract of sale. At the time of the sale, the painting was on loan to the Guggenheim, whose policy it was to release a painting on loan only to the true owner, or to someone the true owner had authorized to take possession. * * * We conclude that these steps were sufficient to conform to reasonable commercial standards for the sale of artwork under the circumstances and, therefore, that the defendant had status as a buyer in the ordinary course of business.

● Decision and Remedy The Connecticut Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. The state supreme court concluded, "on the basis of all the circumstances surrounding this sale," that Brant was a buyer in the ordinary course of business and, therefore, took all rights to Red Elvis under UCC 2-403(2).

● The Ethical Dimension How did the "usual and customary" methods of dealing in the art business help Malmberg deceive the other parties in this case? What additional steps might those parties have taken to thwart this deceit?

● The Global Dimension Considering the international locales in this case, why was Lindholm able to bring an action against Brant in Connecticut?

In Lease Contracts. Article 2A provides a similar rule for leased goods. If a lessor entrusts goods to a lessee-merchant who deals in goods of that kind, and the merchant transfers the goods to a buyer or sublessee in the ordinary course of business, the buyer or sublessee acquires all of the rights that the lessor had in the goods [UCC 2A-305(2)].⁶

Risk of Loss

Under the UCC, risk of loss does not necessarily pass with title. When risk of loss passes from a seller or lessor to a buyer or lessee is generally determined by the contract between the parties. Sometimes, the contract states expressly when the risk of loss passes. At other times, it does not, and a court must interpret the existing terms to ascertain whether the risk has passed. When no provision in the contract indicates when risk passes, the UCC provides special rules, based on delivery terms, to guide the courts.

6. This rule is consistent with the common law of bailments (see Chapter 47). For an illustration of the entrustment rule in lease contracts, see Bank One, N.A. v. Americani, 271 Ga.App. 483, 610 S.E.2d 103 (2005). (The initials N.A. stand for National Association.)

Delivery with Movement of the Goods

When the agreement does not specify when risk passes, the following rules apply in situations involving movement of the goods (so-called carrier cases).

Contract Terms Specific delivery terms in the contract can help determine when risk of loss passes to the buyer. These terms relate generally to the determination of which party will bear the costs of delivery, as well as which party will bear the risk of loss. The terms that have traditionally been used in contracts are listed and defined in Exhibit 21-1 on the next page. Unless the parties agree otherwise, these terms will determine which party will pay the costs of delivering the goods and who will bear the risk of loss.

Shipment Contracts In a shipment contract, if the seller or lessor is required or authorized to ship goods by carrier (but is not required to deliver them to a particular destination), risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are duly delivered to the carrier [UCC 2-509(1)(a), 2A-219(2)(a)].

For example, a seller in Texas sells five hundred cases of grapefruit to a buyer in New York, F.O.B. Houston (free on board in Houston, which means that the buyer pays the transportation charges from Houston—see Exhibit 21-1). The contract authorizes

EXHIBIT 21-1 • Contract Terms—Definitions

The contract terms listed and defined in this exhibit help to determine which party will bear the costs of delivery and when risk of loss will pass from the seller to the buyer.

F.O.B. (free on board)—Indicates that the selling price of goods includes transportation costs to the specific F.O.B. place named in the contract. The seller pays the expenses and carries the risk of loss to the F.O.B. place named [UCC 2-319(1)]. If the named place is the place from which the goods are shipped (for example, the seller's city or place of business), the contract is a shipment contract. If the named place is the place to which the goods are to be shipped (for example, the buyer's city or place of business), the contract is a destination contract.

F.A.S. (free alongside)—Requires that the seller, at his or her own expense and risk, deliver the goods alongside the carrier before risk passes to the buyer [UCC 2-319(2)].

C.I.F. or C.&F. (cost, insurance, and freight or just cost and freight)—Requires, among other things, that the seller “put the goods in possession of a carrier” before risk passes to the buyer [UCC 2-320(2)]. (These are basically pricing terms, and the contracts remain shipment contracts, not destination contracts.)

Delivery ex-ship (delivery from the carrying vessel)—Means that risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until the goods are properly unloaded from the ship or other carrier [UCC 2-322].

shipment by carrier; it does not require that the seller tender the grapefruit in New York. Risk passes to the buyer when conforming goods are properly placed in the possession of the carrier. If the goods are damaged in transit, the loss is the buyer's. (Actually, buyers have recourse against carriers, subject to certain limitations, and they may insure the goods from the time the goods leave the seller.)

The following case illustrates how the application of a contract's delivery term can affect a buyer's recovery for goods damaged in transit.

EXTENDED
CASE 21.3

Spray-Tek, Inc. v. Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc.
United States District Court, Western District of Wisconsin, 2006. 426 F.Supp.2d 875.

SHABAZ, District Judge.

* * * *

Plaintiff Spray-Tek, Inc. is engaged in the business of commercial dehydration of food flavor, pharmaceutical and soft chemical products. In 2003 plaintiff entered into a contract with Niro, Inc. (hereinafter Niro) in which Niro was to design and manufacture a fourteen-foot diameter cone-bottom drying chamber (hereinafter drying chamber) for plaintiff. Pursuant to the terms of the contract Niro was also responsible for shipping the drying chamber from its facility in Hudson, Wisconsin to plaintiff's facility in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The contract stated in relevant part:

* * * *

For one (1) Niro-Bowen * * * drying chamber, * * * F.O.B. points of manufacture in the U.S.A. * * *
Price * * * $1,161,500.00

* * * *

IX. RISKS OF LOSS. The Purchaser shall bear the risk of loss of or damage to the equipment and parts after delivery of the equipment and parts to the job site or to the shipping point if delivery F.O.B. shipping point is specified.

On October 14, 2004 Niro's representative Mr. David Thoen contacted defendant Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc. to obtain an estimate for transporting the drying chamber to plaintiff. Mr. Thoen spoke with Mr. Robert Kauffman, Jr. who serves as defendant's Southwest Regional Terminal Manager. * * * Mr. Kauffman prepared and sent an estimate to Niro. * * *

CASE 21.3 CONTINUED

Mr. Thoen signed the estimate and faxed it back to defendant * * * .

On October 18, 2004 defendant arrived at Niro's facility in Hudson, Wisconsin and the drying chamber was loaded onto its trailer. Niro prepared a Bill of Lading * * * .

* * * *

On or about October 28, 2004 the drying chamber was damaged while it was in transit * * * in Baltimore, Maryland. Accordingly, the drying chamber never arrived at plaintiff's facility in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. The drying chamber was damaged when it struck an overpass and became dislodged from defendant's vehicle. It was inspected and declared a total loss. Accordingly, Niro manufactured a replacement drying chamber for plaintiff and invoiced it $233,100.00 in replacement costs. * * *

* * * *

[Spray-Tek filed a suit in a federal district court against Robbins under a federal statute known as the Carmack Amendment to recover the replacement cost and other expenses.] The Carmack Amendment * * * states in relevant part:

A carrier providing transportation or service * * * shall issue a receipt or bill of lading for property it receives for transportation under this part. That carrier * * * [is] liable to the person entitled to recover under the receipt or bill of lading. * * *

The purpose of the Carmack Amendment is to establish uniform federal guidelines designed in part to remove the uncertainty surrounding a carrier's liability when damage occurs to a shipper's interstate shipment.

Under the Carmack Amendment plaintiff bears the burden of establishing a prima facie case which requires it to demonstrate: (1) delivery to the carrier in good condition; (2) arrival in damaged condition; and (3) the amount of damages. * * * The excepted causes [relieving a carrier of liability] are: (1) acts of God; (2) the public enemy; (3) acts of the shipper himself; (4) public authority; or (5) the inherent vice or nature of the goods. * * *

Defendant concedes that it received the drying chamber in good condition. Accordingly, plaintiff's first element of its prima facie case [legally sufficient case] is established. * * *

* * * *

It is undisputed that the drying chamber was damaged when it struck an overpass and became dislodged from defendant's vehicle. Additionally, it is undisputed that after the accident the drying chamber was inspected and declared a total loss. * * *

An * * * argument defendant asserts concerning plaintiff's second element of its prima facie case is that plaintiff cannot demonstrate it owned the drying chamber during transport. However, the contract plaintiff entered into with Niro establishes that it was the owner of the drying chamber when it was damaged. The contract provided that the terms of sale were "F.O.B. points of manufacture in the U.S.A." According to * * * David Brand who serves as plaintiff's vice-president and general manager "F.O.B. points of manufacture" means that the drying chamber became plaintiff's property once it was "placed on board the delivery truck at its point of manufacture in Hudson, Wisconsin."

Mr. Brand's assertion * * * is reinforced by the provision in the contract concerning risks of loss. * * * [T]he "F.O.B. points of manufacture" language * * * demonstrates that plaintiff bore the risk of loss once the drying chamber departed from Niro's Hudson, Wisconsin facility. * * * Accordingly, plaintiff established the second element of its prima facie case.

Finally, defendant asserts plaintiff cannot meet its burden of establishing the third element of its prima facie case because it failed to demonstrate what "it is obligated to pay for the dryer." However, * * * Niro invoiced plaintiff $233,100.00 for the replacement dryer. Accordingly, plaintiff established the third element of its prima facie case because its amount of damages is $233,100.00.

Plaintiff met its burden of establishing a prima facie case under the Carmack Amendment. * * * Defendant concedes it failed to produce any evidence establishing that damage to the shipment was due to one of the excepted causes. Accordingly, plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment on the issue of defendant's liability under the Carmack Amendment.

* * * *

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 21.3 CONTINUED

* * * [T]here remains a genuine issue of material fact concerning the issue of whether defendant provided Niro with a reasonable opportunity to choose between two different levels of liability.* * *

* * * *

* * * The October 14, 2004 estimate does not contain a term or condition limiting defendant's liability. However, the Bill of Lading limits defendant's liability * * *. Accordingly, when the two documents are viewed together as a whole the Court concludes the contract is ambiguous and its interpretation must be reserved for the fact finder [at trial].

QUESTIONS

1. Would the result have been different if the contract between Spray-Tek and Niro had specified "F.O.B. Bethlehem, Pennsylvania"? Explain.
2. One of the elements required to establish a carrier's liability is to show that the goods arrived in damaged condition. Should Robbins Motor Transportation have been absolved of liability in this case on the ground that the drying chamber never arrived at its final destination? Why or why not?

Destination Contracts In a destination contract, the risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee when the goods are tendered to the buyer or lessee at the specified destination [UCC 2-509(1)(b), 2A-219(2)(b)]. In the preceding example involving cases of grapefruit, if the contract had been a destination contract, F.O.B. New York (see Exhibit 21-1 on page 428), risk of loss during transit to New York would have been the seller's. Risk of loss would not have passed to the buyer until the carrier tendered the goods to the buyer in New York.

Whether a contract is a shipment contract or a destination contract can have significant consequences for the parties. When an agreement is ambiguous as to whether it is a shipment or a destination contract, courts will presume that it is a shipment contract. The parties must use clear and explicit language to overcome this presumption and create a destination contract.

Delivery without Movement of the Goods

In many contracts, the seller or lessor is not required to ship or deliver the goods to a particular destination. Frequently, the buyer or lessee is to pick up the goods from the seller or lessor, or the goods are to be held by a bailee. A bailment is a temporary delivery of personal property, without passage of title, into the care of another, called a bailee. Under the UCC, a bailee is a party who—by a bill of lading, warehouse receipt, or other document of title—acknowledges possession of goods and/or contracts to deliver them. A warehousing company, for example, or a trucking company that normally issues documents of title for the goods it receives is a bailee.⁷

Goods Held by the Seller If the goods are held by the seller, a document of title usually is not used. If the seller is not a merchant, the risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer on tender of delivery [UCC 2-509(3)]. If the seller is a merchant, risk of loss to goods held by the seller passes to the buyer when the buyer actually takes physical possession of the goods [UCC 2-509(3)]. For example, Henry Ganno purchases lumber at a lumberyard, and an employee at the lumberyard loads it onto Ganno's truck with a forklift. Once the truck is loaded, the risk of loss passes to Ganno because he has taken physical possession of the goods. In the event that Ganno suffers a loss driving away from the lumberyard, he—not the lumberyard—will bear the burden of that loss.⁸

In respect to leases, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on the lessee's receipt of the goods if the lessor—or supplier, in a finance lease (see Chapter 20)—is a merchant. Otherwise, the risk passes to the lessee on tender of delivery [UCC 2A-219(c)]. For example, Erikson Crane leases a helicopter from Jervis, Ltd., which is in the business of renting aircraft. While Erikson's pilot is on the way to Idaho to pick up the particular helicopter, the helicopter is damaged during an unexpected storm. In this situation, Jevis is a merchant-lessor, so it would bear the risk of loss to the leased helicopter until Erikson took possession of the helicopter.

7. See Chapter 47 for a detailed discussion of the law of bailments.

8. Ganno v. Lanoga Corp., 119 Wash.App.310, 80 P.3d 180 (2003).

Goods Held by a Bailee When a bailee is holding goods that are to be delivered under a contract without being moved, the goods are usually represented by a negotiable or nonnegotiable document of title (a bill of lading or a warehouse receipt).⁹ Risk of loss passes to the buyer when (1) the buyer receives a negotiable document of title for the goods, (2) the bailee acknowledges the buyer's right to possess the goods, or (3) the buyer receives a nonnegotiable document of title or a writing (record) directing the bailee to hand over the goods and the buyer has had a reasonable time to present the document to the bailee and demand the goods. Obviously, if the bailee refuses to honor the document, the risk of loss remains with the seller [UCC 2-503(4)(b), 2-509(2)].

9. A negotiable document of title actually stands for the goods it covers, so any transfer of the goods requires the surrender of the document. In contrast, a nonnegotiable document of title merely serves as evidence of the goods' existence.

With respect to leases, if goods held by a bailee are to be delivered without being moved, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on acknowledgment by the bailee of the lessee's right to possession of the goods [UCC 2A-219(2)(b)]. (Concept Summary 21.1 reviews the rules for when title and risk of loss pass to the buyer or lessee when the seller or lessor is not required to ship or deliver the goods.)

Conditional Sales

Buyers and sellers can form sales contracts that are conditioned either on the buyer's approval of the goods or on the buyer's resale of the goods. Under such contracts, the buyer is in possession of the goods, and disputes sometimes arise as to which party should bear the loss if, for example, the goods are damaged or stolen.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 21.1 Delivery without Movement of the Goods

Concept	Description
GOODS NOT REPRESENTED BY A DOCUMENT OF TITLE	Unless otherwise agreed, if the goods are not represented by a document of title, title and risk pass as follows: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> Title passes on the formation of the contract [UCC 2-401(3)(b)]. Risk of loss passes to the buyer or lessee: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> If the seller or lessor is a merchant, risk passes on the buyer's or lessee's receipt of the goods. If the seller or lessor is a nonmerchant, risk passes to the buyer or lessee on the seller's or lessor's tender of delivery of the goods [UCC 2-509(3), 2A-219(c)].
GOODS REPRESENTED BY A DOCUMENT OF TITLE	Unless otherwise agreed, if the goods are represented by a document of title, title and risk pass to the buyer when: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> The buyer receives a negotiable document of title for the goods, or The bailee acknowledges the buyer's right to possess the goods, or The buyer receives a nonnegotiable document of title or a writing (record) directing the bailee to hand over the goods and the buyer has had a reasonable time to present the document to the bailee and demand the goods [UCC 2-503(4)(b), 2-509(2)].
LEASED GOODS HELD BY A BAILEE	If leased goods held by a bailee are to be delivered without being moved, the risk of loss passes to the lessee on acknowledgment by the bailee of the lessee's right to possession of the goods [UCC 2A-219(2)(b)].

Sale or Return A sale or return is a type of contract by which the buyer (usually a merchant) purchases goods primarily for resale, but has the right to return part or all of the goods (undo the sale) in lieu of payment if the goods fail to be resold. Basically, a sale or return is a sale of goods in the present, which may be undone at the buyer's option within a specified time period. When the buyer receives possession at the time of the sale, title and risk of loss pass to the buyer. Title and risk of loss remain with the buyer until the buyer returns the goods to the seller within the time period specified. If the buyer fails to return the goods within this time period, the sale is finalized. The return of the goods is made at the buyer's risk and expense. Goods held under a sale-or-return contract are subject to the claims of the buyer's creditors while they are in the buyer's possession.

The UCC treats a consignment as a sale or return. Under a consignment, the owner of goods (the consignor) delivers them to another (the consignee) to be sold or kept. If the consignee sells the goods, the consignee must pay the consignor for them. If the consignee does not sell or keep the goods, they may simply be returned to the consignor. While the goods are in the possession of the consignee, the consignee holds title to them, and creditors of the consignee will prevail over the consignor in any action to repossess the goods [UCC 2-326(3)].

Sale on Approval When a seller offers to sell goods to a buyer and sends the goods to the buyer on a trial basis, a sale on approval is made. Essentially, the seller in such contracts delivers the goods primarily so that the prospective buyer (usually not a merchant) can use the goods and be convinced of their appearance or performance. The term sale here is misleading, however, because only an offer to sell has been made, along with a bailment created by the buyer's possession.

Therefore, title and risk of loss (from causes beyond the buyer's control) remain with the seller until the buyer accepts (approves) the offer. Acceptance can be made expressly, by any act inconsistent with the trial purpose or the seller's ownership, or by the buyer's election not to return the goods within the trial period. If the buyer does not wish to accept, the buyer may notify the seller of that fact within the trial period, and the return is made at the seller's expense and risk [UCC 2-327(1)]. Goods held on approval are not subject to the claims of the buyer's creditors until acceptance.

Risk of Loss When a Sales or Lease Contract Is Breached

A sales or lease contract can be breached in many ways, and the transfer of risk operates differently depending on which party breaches. Generally, the party in breach bears the risk of loss.

When the Seller or Lessor Breaches If the goods are so nonconforming that the buyer has the right to reject them, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer until the defects are cured (that is, until the goods are repaired, replaced, or discounted in price by the seller—see Chapter 22) or until the buyer accepts the goods in spite of their defects (thus waiving the right to reject). For example, suppose that a buyer orders blue file cabinets from a seller, F.O.B. seller's plant. The seller ships black file cabinets instead. The black cabinets (nonconforming goods) are damaged in transit. The risk of loss falls on the seller. Had the seller shipped blue cabinets (conforming goods) instead, the risk would have fallen on the buyer [UCC 2-510(1)].

If a buyer accepts a shipment of goods and later discovers a defect, acceptance can be revoked. The revocation allows the buyer to pass the risk of loss back to the seller, at least to the extent that the buyer's insurance does not cover the loss [UCC 2-510(2)].

In regard to leases, Article 2A states a similar rule. If the tender or delivery of goods is so nonconforming that the lessee has the right to reject them, the risk of loss remains with the lessor (or the supplier) until cure or acceptance [UCC 2A-220(1)(a)]. If the lessee, after acceptance, rightfully revokes her or his acceptance of the goods, the risk of loss passes back to the lessor or supplier to the extent that the lessee's insurance does not cover the loss [UCC 2A-220(1)(b)].

When the Buyer or Lessee Breaches The general rule is that when a buyer or lessee breaches a contract, the risk of loss immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee. This rule has three important limitations [UCC 2-510(3), 2A-220(2)]:

1. The seller or lessor must already have identified the contract goods.
2. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach.
3. The buyer or lessee is liable only to the extent of any deficiency in the seller's or lessor's insurance coverage.

(See Concept Summary 21.2 for a summary of the rules on who bears the risk of loss when a contract is breached.)

Insurable Interest

Parties to sales and lease contracts often obtain insurance coverage to protect against damage, loss, or destruction of goods. Any party purchasing insurance, however, must have a sufficient interest in the insured item to obtain a valid policy. Insurance laws—not the UCC—determine sufficiency. The UCC is helpful, however, because it contains certain rules regarding insurable interests in goods.

Insurable Interest of the Buyer or Lessee

A buyer or lessee has an insurable interest in identified goods. The moment the contract goods are identified by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee has a special property interest that allows the buyer or lessee to obtain necessary insurance coverage for those goods even before the risk of loss has passed [UCC 2-501(1), 2A-218(1)]. Identification can be made at any time and in any manner agreed to by the parties. If the parties do not explicitly agree on identification, then the UCC provisions apply.

For example, in March a farmer sells a cotton crop that she hopes to harvest in October. If the contract does not specify otherwise, the buyer acquires an insurable interest in the crop when it is planted because the goods (the cotton crop) are identified to the sales contract. The rule stated in UCC 2-501(1)(c) is that the buyer obtains an insurable interest in crops when the crops are planted or otherwise become growing crops, provided that the crops will “be harvested within twelve months or the next normal harvest season after contracting, whichever is longer.”

Insurable Interest of the Seller or Lessor

A seller has an insurable interest in goods as long as he or she retains title to the goods. Even after title passes to a buyer, a seller who has a security interest in the goods (a right to secure payment—see Chapter 29) still has an insurable interest and can insure the goods [UCC 2-501(2)]. Thus, both the buyer and the seller can have an insurable interest in identical goods at the same time. Of course, the buyer or seller must sustain an actual loss to have the right to recover from an insurance company. In regard to leases, the lessor retains an insurable interest in leased goods unless the lessee exercises an option to buy, in which event the risk of loss passes to the lessee [UCC 2A-218(3)].

CONCEPT SUMMARY 21.2

Risk of Loss When a Sales or Lease Contract Is Breached

Concept	Description
WHEN THE SELLER OR LESSOR BREACHES THE CONTRACT	If the seller or lessor breaches by tendering nonconforming goods that the buyer or lessee has a right to reject, the risk of loss does not pass to the buyer or lessee until the defects are cured or the buyer accepts the goods (thus waiving the right to reject) [UCC 2-510(1), 2A-220(1)].
WHEN THE BUYER OR LESSEE BREACHES THE CONTRACT	If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the risk of loss to identified goods immediately shifts to the buyer or lessee. Limitations to this rule are as follows [UCC 2-510(3), 2A-220(2)]: <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The seller or lessor must already have identified the contract goods. 2. The buyer or lessee bears the risk for only a commercially reasonable time after the seller or lessor has learned of the breach. 3. The buyer or lessee is liable only to the extent of any deficiency in the seller's or lessor's insurance coverage.

REVIEWING Title, Risk, and Insurable Interest

In December, Mendoza agreed to buy the broccoli grown on one hundred acres of Willow Glen's one-thousand-acre broccoli farm. The sales contract specified F.O.B. Willow Glen's field by Falcon Trucking. The broccoli was to be planted in February and harvested in March of the following year. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. At what point is a crop of broccoli identified to the contract under the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC)? Explain. Why is identification significant?
2. When does title to the broccoli pass from Willow Glen to Mendoza under the terms of this contract? Why?
3. Suppose that while in transit, Falcon's truck overturns and spills the entire load. Who bears the loss, Mendoza or Willow Glen?
4. Suppose that instead of buying fresh broccoli, Mendoza had contracted with Willow Glen to purchase one thousand cases of frozen broccoli from Willow Glen's processing plant. The highest grade of broccoli is packaged under the "FreshBest" label, and everything else is packaged under the "FamilyPac" label. Further suppose that although the contract specified that Mendoza was to receive FreshBest broccoli, Falcon Trucking delivered FamilyPac broccoli to Mendoza. If Mendoza refuses to accept the broccoli, who bears the loss?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

consignment 432 destination contract 422 document of title 422

entrustment 425

fungible goods 422

good faith purchaser 423

identification 421

insolvent 423

insurable interest 433

sale on approval 432

sale or return 432

shipment contract 422

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

21-1. Mackey orders from Pride one thousand cases of Greenie brand peas from lot A at list price to be shipped F.O.B. Pride's city via Fast Freight Lines. Pride receives the order and immediately sends Mackey an acceptance of the order with a promise to ship promptly. Pride later separates the one thousand cases of Greenie peas and prints Mackey's name and address on each case. The peas are placed on Pride's dock, and Fast Freight is notified to pick up the shipment. The night before the pickup by Fast Freight, through no fault of Pride's, a fire destroys the one thousand cases of peas. Pride claims that title passed to Mackey at the time the contract was made and that risk of loss passed to Mackey when the goods were marked with Mackey's name and address. Discuss Pride's contentions.

21-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

On May 1, Sikora goes into Carson's retail clothing store to purchase a suit. Sikora finds a suit he likes for $190 and buys it. The suit needs alterations. Sikora is to pick up the altered suit at Carson's store on May 10. Consider the following separate sets of circumstances:

- (a) One of Carson's major creditors obtains a judgment on the debt Carson owes and has the court issue a writ of execution (a court order to seize a debtor's property to satisfy a debt) to collect on that judgment all clothing in Carson's possession. Discuss Sikora's rights in the suit under these circumstances.
- (b) On May 9, through no fault of Carson's, the store burns down, and all contents are a total loss. Between Carson and Sikora, who suffers the loss of the suit destroyed by the fire? Explain.
 - For a sample answer to Question 21-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

21-3. Zeke, who sells lawn mowers, tells Stasio, a regular customer, about a special promotional campaign. On receipt of a $50 down payment, Zeke will sell Stasio a new Universal lawn mower for $200, even though it normally sells for $350. Zeke further tells Stasio that if Stasio does not like the performance of the lawn mower, he can return it within thirty days, and Zeke will refund the $50 down payment. Stasio pays the $50 and takes the mower. On the tenth day, the lawn mower is stolen through no fault of Stasio's. Stasio calls Zeke and demands the return of his $50. Zeke claims that Stasio should suffer the risk of loss and that he still owes Zeke the remainder of the purchase price, $150. Discuss who is correct, Stasio or Zeke.

21-4. Risk of Loss. H.S.A. II, Inc., made parts for motor vehicles. Under an agreement with Ford Motor Co., Ford provided steel to H.S.A. to make Ford parts. Ford's purchase orders for the parts contained the term "FOB Carrier Supplier's [Plant]." GMAC Business Credit, L.L.C., loaned money to H.S.A. under terms that guaranteed payment would be made—if the funds were not otherwise available—from H.S.A.'s inventory, raw materials, and finished goods. H.S.A. filed for bankruptcy on February 2, 2000, and ceased operations on June 20, when it had in its plant more than $1 million in finished goods for Ford. Ford sent six trucks to H.S.A. to pick up the goods. GMAC halted the removal. The parties asked the bankruptcy court to determine whose interest had priority. GMAC contended, among other things, that Ford did not have an interest in the goods because there had not yet been a sale. Ford responded that under its purchase orders, title and risk of loss transferred on completion of the parts. In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [In re H.S.A. II, Inc., 271 Bankr. 534 (E.D.Mich. 2002)]

21-5. Conditional Sales. Corvette Collection of Boston, Inc. (CCB), was a used-Corvette dealership located (despite its name) in Pompano Beach, Florida. In addition to selling used Corvettes, CCB serviced Corvettes and sold Corvette parts. CCB owned some of its inventory and held the rest on consignment, although there were no signs indicating the consignments. In November 2001, CCB filed a petition for bankruptcy in a federal district court. At the time, CCB possessed six Corvettes that were consigned by Chester Finley and The Corvette Experience, Inc. (TCE), neither of which had a security interest in the goods. Robert Furr, on CCB's behalf, asked the court to declare that CCB held the goods under a contract for a sale or return. Finley and TCE asserted that the goods were held under a contract for a sale on approval. What difference does it make? Under what circumstances would the court rule in favor of Finley and TCE? How should the court rule under the facts as stated? Why? [In re Corvette Collection of Boston, Inc., 294 Bankr. 409 (S.D.Fla. 2003)]

21-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

William Bisby gave an all-terrain vehicle (ATV) to Del City Cycle in Enid, Oklahoma, to sell on his behalf. Joseph Maddox bought the ATV but paid for it with a check written on a closed checking account. The bank refused to honor the check. Before Del City or Bisby could reclaim the ATV, however, Maddox sold it to Aaron Jordan, who sold it to Shannon Skaggs. In November 2003, the Enid Police Department seized the ATV from Skaggs. Bisby filed a suit in an Oklahoma state court against the state and Skaggs, claiming that he was the owner of the ATV and asking the court to return it to him. Skaggs objected. Is there a distinction between the ownership interests of a party who steals an item and those of a party who acquires the item with a check that is not paid? What was the status of Skaggs's title, if any, to the ATV? Among the many parties involved in this case, which one should the court rule is the owner of "good" title to the ATV? Why? [State v. Skaggs, 140 P.3d 576 (Okla.Civ.App.Div. 3 2006)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 21-6, go to this book's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select "Chapter 21," and click on "Case Problem with Sample Answer."

21-7. Shipment and Destination Contracts. In 2003, Karen Pearson and Steve and Tara Carlson agreed to buy a 2004 Dynasty recreational vehicle (RV) from DeMartini's RV Sales in Grass Valley, California. On September 29, Pearson, the Carlsons, and DeMartini's signed a contract providing that "seller agrees to deliver the vehicle to you on the date this contract is signed." The buyers made a payment of $145,000 on the total price of $356,416 the next day, when they also signed a form acknowledging that the RV had been inspected and accepted. They agreed to return later to have the RV transported out of state for delivery (to avoid paying state sales tax on the purchase). On October 7, Steve Carlson returned to DeMartini's to ride with the seller's driver to Nevada to consummate the out-of-state delivery. When the RV developed problems, Pearson and the Carlsons filed a suit in a federal district court against the RV's manufacturer, Monaco Coach Corp., alleging, in part, breach of warranty under state law. The applicable statute is expressly limited to goods sold in California. Monaco argued that this RV had been sold in Nevada. How does the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) define a sale? What does the UCC provide with respect to the passage of title? How do these provisions apply here? Discuss. [Carlson v. Monaco Coach Corp., 486 F.Supp.2d 1127 (E.D.Cal. 2007)]

21-8. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Kenneth West agreed to sell his car, a 1975 Corvette, to a man representing himself as Robert Wilson. In exchange for a cashier's check, West signed over the Corvette's title to Wilson and gave him the car. Ten days later, when West learned that the cashier's check was a forgery, he filed a stolen vehicle report with the police. The police could not immediately locate Wilson or the Corvette, however, and the case grew cold. Nearly two and a half years later, the police found the Corvette in the possession of Tammy Roberts, who also had the certificate of title. She said that she had bought the car from her brother, who had obtained it through an ad in the newspaper. West filed a suit in a Colorado state court against Roberts to reclaim the car. The court applied Colorado Revised Statutes Section 4-2-403 (Colorado's version of UCC 2-403) to determine the vehicle's rightful owner. [West v. Roberts, 143 P.3d 1037 (Colo. 2006)]

- (a) Under UCC 2-403, what title, if any, to the Corvette did "Wilson" acquire? What was the status of Roberts's title, if any, assuming that she bought the car without knowledge of circumstances that would make a person of ordinary prudence inquire about the validity of the seller's title? In whose favor should the court rule? Explain.
- (b) If the original owner of a vehicle relinquishes it due to fraud, should he or she be allowed to recover the vehicle from a good faith purchaser? If not, which party or parties might the original owner sue for recovery? What is the ethical principle underlying your answer to these questions? Discuss.
- (b) Rule of Law: What rule of law did the court apply to interpret this provision?
- (c) Applying the Rule of Law: How did the court apply this rule to interpret the provision at the center of this case?
- (d) Conclusion: Did the court resolve the dispute between these parties with respect to determining who suffered the loss and how much that loss was? Explain.

21-9. SPECIAL CASE ANALYSIS

Go to Case 21.3, Spray-Tek, Inc. v. Robbins Motor Transportation, Inc., 426 F.Supp.2d 875 (W.D.Wis. 2006), on pages 428–430. Read the excerpt and answer the following questions.

- (a) Issue: What contract provision was at the heart of the dispute between the parties to this case, and why?

21-10. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select "Chapter 21." Click on "Video Questions" and view the video titled Risk of Loss. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) Does Oscar have a right to refuse the shipment because the lettuce is wilted? Why or why not? What type of contract is involved in this video?
- (b) Does Oscar have a right to refuse the shipment because the lettuce is not organic butter crunch lettuce? Why or why not?
- (c) Assume that you are in Oscar's position—that is, you are buying produce for a supermarket. What different approaches might you take to avoid having to pay for a delivery of wilted produce?

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

To find information on the UCC, including the UCC provisions discussed in this chapter, refer to the Web sites listed in the Law on the Web feature in Chapter 20.

For more information on shipment and destination contracts and a list of related commercial law Web links, go to www.legalmatch.com/law-library/article/merchandise-risk-of-loss.html

For an overview of bills of lading, access the following Web site:

www.law.cornell.edu/ucc/7/overview.html

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select "Chapter 21" and click on "Internet Exercises." There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 21-1: Legal Perspective
The Entrustment Rule

Internet Exercise 21-2: Management Perspective
Passage of Title

CHAPTER 22

Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

The performance that is required of the parties under a sales or lease contract consists of the duties and obligations each party has under the terms of the contract. The basic obligation of the seller or lessor is to transfer and deliver the goods as stated in the contract, and the basic duty of the buyer or lessee is to accept and pay for the goods.

Keep in mind that “duties and obligations” under the terms of the contract include those specified by the agreement, by custom, and by the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC). Thus, parties to a sales or lease contract may be bound not only by terms they expressly agreed on, but also by terms implied by custom, such as a customary method of weighing or measuring particular goods. In addition, the UCC sometimes imposes terms on parties to a sales contract, such as the requirement that a seller find a substitute carrier to deliver goods to the buyer if the agreed-on carrier becomes unavailable. In this chapter, we examine the performance obligations of the parties under a sales or lease contract.

Sometimes, circumstances make it difficult for a person to carry out the promised performance, leading to a breach of the contract. When a breach occurs, the aggrieved party looks for remedies—which we examine in the second half of the chapter. The UCC provides a range of possible remedies, from retaining the goods to requiring the breaching party’s performance under the contract. Generally, these remedies are designed to put the aggrieved party “in as good a position as if the other party had fully performed.” Note that in contrast to the common law of contracts, remedies under the UCC are cumulative in nature. In other words, an innocent party to a breached sales or lease contract is not limited to one exclusive remedy.

Performance Obligations

As discussed in previous chapters, the obligations of good faith and commercial reasonableness underlie every sales and lease contract.

The UCC’s Good Faith Provision

The UCC’s good faith provision, which can never be disclaimed, reads as follows: “Every contract or duty within this Act imposes an obligation of good faith in its performance or enforcement” [UCC 1–203]. Good faith means honesty in fact. For a merchant, it means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade [UCC 2–103(1)(b)]. In other words, merchants are held to a higher standard of performance or duty than are nonmerchants.

Good Faith and Contract Performance

The principle of good faith applies to both parties and provides a framework for the entire agreement. If a sales contract leaves open some particulars of performance, for instance, the parties must exercise good faith and commercial reasonableness when later specifying the details. The Focus on Ethics feature on pages 481 and 482 explores the ethical implications of the UCC’s good faith standard.

In performing a sales or lease contract, the basic obligation of the seller or lessor is to transfer and deliver conforming goods. The basic obligation of the buyer or lessee is to accept and pay for conforming goods in accordance with the contract [UCC

2-301, 2A-516(1)]. Overall performance of a sales or lease contract is controlled by the agreement between the parties. When the contract is unclear and disputes arise, the courts look to the UCC and impose standards of good faith and commercial reasonableness.

Obligations of the Seller or Lessor

As stated, the basic duty of the seller or lessor is to deliver the goods called for under the contract to the buyer or lessee.

Tender of Delivery

Goods that conform to the contract description in every way are called conforming goods. To fulfill the contract, the seller or lessor must either deliver or tender delivery of conforming goods to the buyer or lessee. Tender of delivery occurs when the seller or lessor makes conforming goods available to the buyer or lessee and gives the buyer or lessee whatever notification is reasonably necessary to enable the buyer or lessee to take delivery [UCC 2-503(1), 2A-508(1)].

Tender must occur at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner. For example, a seller cannot call the buyer at 2:00 A.M. and say, “The goods are ready. I’ll give you twenty minutes to get them.” Unless the parties have agreed otherwise, the goods must be tendered for delivery at a reasonable hour and kept available for a reasonable period of time to enable the buyer to take possession of them [UCC 2-503(1)(a)].

Normally, all goods called for by a contract must be tendered in a single delivery—unless the parties have agreed that the goods may be delivered in several lots or installments (to be discussed shortly) [UCC 2-307, 2-612, 2A-510]. Hence, an order for 1,000 shirts cannot be delivered two shirts at a time. If, however, the parties agree that the shirts will be delivered in four orders of 250 each as they are produced (for summer, fall, winter, and spring stock), then tender of delivery may occur in this manner.

Place of Delivery

The buyer and seller (or lessor and lessee) may agree that the goods will be delivered to a particular destination where the buyer or lessee will take possession. If the contract does not designate the place of delivery, then the goods must be made available to the buyer at the seller’s place of business or, if the seller has none, at the seller’s residence [UCC 2-308]. If, at the time of contracting, the parties know that the goods identified to the contract are located somewhere other than the seller’s business, then the location of the goods is the place for their delivery [UCC 2-308].

For example, Li Wan and Boyd both live in San Francisco. In San Francisco, Li Wan contracts to sell Boyd five used trucks, which both parties know are located in a Chicago warehouse. If nothing more is specified in the contract, the place of delivery for the trucks is Chicago. Li Wan may tender delivery either by giving Boyd a negotiable or nonnegotiable document of title or by obtaining the bailee’s (warehouse’s) acknowledgment that the buyer is entitled to possession.¹

Delivery via Carrier

In many instances, attendant circumstances or delivery terms in the contract (such as F.O.B. or F.A.S. terms, shown in Exhibit 21-1 on page 428) make it apparent that the parties intend that a carrier be used to move the goods. In contracts involving a carrier, a seller can complete performance of the obligation to deliver the goods in two ways—through a shipment contract or through a destination contract.

Shipment Contracts Recall from Chapter 21 that a shipment contract requires or authorizes the seller to ship goods by a carrier. The contract does not require the seller to deliver the goods at a particular destination [UCC 2-319, 2-509]. Unless otherwise agreed, the seller must do the following:

1. Place the goods into the hands of the carrier.
2. Make a contract for their transportation that is reasonable according to the nature of the goods and their value. (For example, certain types of goods need refrigeration in transit.)

1. If the seller delivers a nonnegotiable document of title or merely instructs the bailee in a writing (record) to release the goods to the buyer without the bailee’s acknowledgment of the buyer’s rights, this is also a sufficient tender, unless the buyer objects [UCC 2-503(4)]. Risk of loss, however, does not pass until the buyer has had a reasonable amount of time in which to present the document or the instructions. See Chapter 21.

3. Obtain and promptly deliver or tender to the buyer any documents necessary to enable the buyer to obtain possession of the goods from the carrier.
4. Promptly notify the buyer that shipment has been made [UCC 2-504].

If the seller does not make a reasonable contract for transportation or fails to notify the buyer of the shipment, the buyer can reject the goods, but only if a material loss of the goods or a significant delay results. Suppose that a contract involves the shipment of fresh fruit, such as strawberries, but the seller does not arrange for refrigerated transportation. In this situation, if the fruit spoils during transport, a material loss would likely result. (Of course, the parties are free to make agreements that alter the UCC's rules and allow the buyer to reject goods for other reasons.)

Destination Contracts In a destination contract, the seller agrees to deliver conforming goods to the buyer at a particular destination. The goods must be tendered at a reasonable hour and held at the buyer's disposal for a reasonable length of time. The seller must also give the buyer appropriate notice. In addition, the seller must provide the buyer with any documents of title necessary to enable the buyer to obtain delivery from the carrier. Sellers often do this by tendering the documents through ordinary banking channels [UCC 2-503].

The Perfect Tender Rule

As previously noted, the seller or lessor has an obligation to ship or tender conforming goods, which the buyer or lessee is then obligated to accept and pay for according to the terms of the contract [UCC 2-507]. Under the common law, the seller was obligated to deliver goods that conformed with the terms of the contract in every detail. This was called the perfect tender rule. The UCC preserves the perfect tender doctrine by stating that if goods or tender of delivery fails in any respect to conform to the contract, the buyer or lessee has the right to accept the goods, reject the entire shipment, or accept part and reject part [UCC 2-601, 2A-509].

For example, a lessor contracts to lease fifty Comclear monitors to be delivered at the lessee's place of business on or before October 1. On September 28, the lessor discovers that it has only thirty Comclear monitors in inventory but will have another twenty Comclear monitors within the next two weeks. The lessor tenders delivery of the thirty Comclear monitors on October 1, with the promise that the other monitors will be delivered within two weeks. Because the lessor has failed to make a perfect tender of fifty Comclear monitors, the lessee has the right to reject the entire shipment and hold the lessor in breach.

Exceptions to the Perfect Tender Rule

Because of the rigidity of the perfect tender rule, several exceptions to the rule have been created, some of which we discuss here.

Agreement of the Parties Exceptions to the perfect tender rule may be established by agreement. If the parties have agreed, for example, that defective goods or parts will not be rejected if the seller or lessor is able to repair or replace them within a reasonable period of time, the perfect tender rule does not apply.

Cure The UCC does not specifically define the term cure, but it refers to the right of the seller or lessor to repair, adjust, or replace defective or nonconforming goods [UCC 2-508, 2A-513]. When any delivery is rejected because of nonconforming goods and the time for performance has not yet expired, the seller or lessor can attempt to "cure" the defect within the contract time for performance [UCC 2-508(1), 2A-513(1)]. To do so, the seller or lessor must seasonably (timely) notify the buyer or lessee of the intention to cure.

Reasonable Grounds Required When Time for Performance Has Expired. Once the time for performance under the contract has expired, the seller or lessor can still exercise the right to cure if he or she has reasonable grounds to believe that the nonconforming tender will be acceptable to the buyer or lessee [UCC 2-508(2), 2A-513(2)]. For example, if in the past a buyer frequently accepted a particular substitute for a good when the good ordered was not available, the seller has reasonable grounds to believe the buyer will again accept the substitute. Even if the buyer rejects the substitute good on a particular occasion, the seller nonetheless had reasonable grounds to believe that the substitute would be acceptable. A seller or lessor will sometimes tender nonconforming goods with some type of price allowance, which can serve as the "reasonable grounds" to believe that the buyer or lessee will accept the nonconforming tender.

A Restriction on the Buyer's or Lessee's Right of Rejection. The right to cure substantially restricts the right of the buyer or lessee to reject goods. For example, if a lessee refuses a tender of goods as nonconforming but does not disclose the nature of the defect to the lessor, the lessee cannot later assert the defect as a defense if the defect is one that the lessor could have cured. Generally, buyers and lessees must act in good faith and state specific reasons for refusing to accept goods [UCC 2-605, 2A-514].

Substitution of Carriers When an agreed-on manner of delivery (such as the use of a particular carrier to transport the goods) becomes impracticable or unavailable through no fault of either party, but a commercially reasonable substitute is available, this substitute performance is sufficient tender to the buyer and must be used [UCC 2-614(1)]. For example, a sales contract calls for the delivery of a large piece of machinery to be shipped by ABC Truck Lines on or before June 1. The contract terms clearly state the importance of the delivery date. The employees of ABC Truck Lines go on strike. The seller must make a reasonable substitute tender, perhaps by another trucking firm or by rail, if it is available. Note that the seller normally is responsible for any additional shipping costs, unless contrary arrangements have been made in the sales contract.

Installment Contracts An installment contract is a single contract that requires or authorizes delivery in two or more separate lots to be accepted and paid for separately. With an installment contract, a buyer or lessee can reject an installment only if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the installment and cannot be cured [UCC 2-307, 2-612(2), 2A-510(1)]. If the buyer or lessee fails to notify the seller or lessor of the rejection, however, and subsequently accepts a nonconforming installment, the contract is reinstated [UCC 2-612(3), 2A-510(2)].

The entire installment contract is breached only when one or more nonconforming installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract. The UCC strictly limits rejection to cases of substantial nonconformity. Suppose that an installment contract involves parts of a machine. The first part is necessary for the operation of the machine, but when it is delivered, it is irreparably defective. The failure of this first installment will be a breach of the whole contract because the machine will not operate without the first part. The situation would likely be different, however, if the contract had called for twenty carloads of plywood and only 9 percent of one of the carloads of plywood had deviated from the thickness specifications in the contract.

The point to remember is that the UCC significantly alters the right of the buyer or lessee to reject the entire contract if the contract requires delivery to be made in several installments. The UCC strictly limits rejection to cases of substantial nonconformity (unless the parties agree that breach of an installment constitutes a breach of the entire contract).

Commercial Impracticability As stated in Chapter 17, occurrences unforeseen by either party when a contract was made may make performance commercially impracticable. When this occurs, the perfect tender rule no longer applies. According to UCC 2-615(a) and 2A-405(a), a delay in delivery or nondelivery in whole or in part is not a breach if performance has been made impracticable “by the occurrence of a contingency the nonoccurrence of which was a basic assumption on which the contract was made.” The seller or lessor must, however, notify the buyer or lessee as soon as practicable that there will be a delay or nondelivery.

Foreseeable versus Unforeseeable Contingencies.

The doctrine of commercial impracticability does not extend to problems that could have been foreseen. An increase in cost resulting from inflation, for instance, does not in and of itself excuse performance, as this kind of risk is ordinarily assumed by a seller or lessor conducting business. The unforeseen contingency must be one that would have been impossible to contemplate in a given business situation [UCC 2-615, 2A-405].

For example, an oil company that receives its oil from the Middle East has a contract to supply a buyer with 100,000 barrels of oil. Because of an oil embargo by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), the seller cannot secure oil from the Middle East or any other source to meet the terms of the contract. This situation comes fully under the commercial impracticability exception to the perfect tender doctrine.

Can unanticipated increases in a seller's costs that make performance “impracticable” constitute a valid defense to performance on the basis of commercial impracticability? The court dealt with this question in the following case.

C A S E 22.1 Maple Farms, Inc. v. City School District of Elmira

Supreme Court of New York, 1974. 76 Misc.2d 1080, 352 N.Y.S.2d 784.

- Background and Facts On June 15, 1973, Maple Farms, Inc., formed an agreement with the city school district of Elmira, New York, to supply the school district with milk for the 1973–1974 school year. The agreement was in the form of a requirements contract, under which Maple Farms would sell to the school district all the milk the district required at a fixed price—which was the June market price of milk. By December 1973, the price of raw milk had increased by 23 percent over the price specified in the contract. This meant that if the terms of the contract were fulfilled, Maple Farms would lose $7,350. Because it had similar contracts with other school districts, Maple Farms stood to lose a great deal if it was held to the price stated in the contracts. When the school district would not agree to release Maple Farms from its contract, Maple Farms brought an action in a New York state court for a declaratory judgment (a determination of the parties' rights under a contract). Maple Farms contended that the substantial increase in the price of raw milk was an event not contemplated by the parties when the contract was formed and that, given the increased price, performance of the contract was commercially impracticable.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT CHARLES B. SWARTWOOD, Justice.

* * * *

* * * [The doctrine of commercial impracticability requires that] a contingency—something unexpected—must have occurred. Second, the risk of the unexpected occurrence must not have been allocated either by agreement or by custom. * * *

* * * [H]ere we find that the contingency causing the increase of the price of raw milk was not totally unexpected. The price from the low point in the year 1972 to the price on the date of the award of the contract in June 1973 had risen nearly 10%. And any businessman should have been aware of the general inflation in this country during the previous years * * * . [Emphasis added.]

* * * Here the very purpose of the contract was to guard against fluctuation of price of half pints of milk as a basis for the school budget. Surely had the price of raw milk fallen substantially, the defendant could not be excused from performance. We can reasonably assume that the plaintiff had to be aware of escalating inflation. It is chargeable with knowledge of the substantial increase of the price of raw milk from the previous year's low. * * * It nevertheless entered into this agreement with that knowledge. It did not provide in the contract any exculpatory clause to excuse it from performance in the event of a substantial rise in the price of raw milk. On these facts the risk of a substantial or abnormal increase in the price of raw milk can be allocated to the plaintiff.

- Decision and Remedy The New York trial court ruled that inflation and fluctuating prices did not render performance impracticable in this case and granted summary judgment in favor of the school district.

- Impact of This Case on Today's Law This case is a classic illustration of the UCC's commercial impracticability doctrine as courts still apply it today. Under this doctrine, increased cost alone does not excuse performance unless the rise in cost is due to some unforeseen contingency that alters the essential nature of the performance.

- What If the Facts Were Different? Suppose that the court had ruled in the plaintiff's favor. How might that ruling have affected the plaintiff's contracts with other parties?

Partial Performance. Sometimes, the unforeseen event only partially affects the capacity of the seller or lessor to perform. When the seller or lessor can partially fulfill the contract but cannot tender total performance, the seller or lessor is required to allocate in a fair and reasonable manner any remaining production and deliveries among its regular customers and those to whom it is contractually obligated to deliver the goods [UCC 2-615(b), 2A-405(b)]. The buyer or lessee must receive notice of the allocation and has the right to accept or reject it [UCC 2-615(c), 2A-405(c)].

For example, a Florida orange grower, Best Citrus, Inc., contracts to sell this season's production to a number of customers, including Martin's grocery chain. Martin's contracts to purchase two thousand crates of oranges. Best Citrus has sprayed some of its orange groves with a chemical called Karmoxin. The U.S. Department of Agriculture discovers that persons who eat products sprayed with Karmoxin may develop cancer and issues an order prohibiting the sale of these products. Best Citrus picks all the oranges not sprayed with Karmoxin, but the quantity is insufficient to meet all the contracted-for deliveries. In this situation, Best Citrus is required to allocate its production, so it notifies Martin's that it cannot deliver the full quantity agreed on in the contract and specifies the amount it will be able to deliver under the circumstances. Martin's can either accept or reject the allocation, but Best Citrus has no further contractual liability.

Destruction of Identified Goods Sometimes, an unexpected event, such as a fire, totally destroys goods through no fault of either party and before risk passes to the buyer or lessee. In such a situation, if the goods were identified at the time the contract was formed, the parties are excused from performance [UCC 2-613, 2A-221]. If the goods are only partially destroyed, however, the buyer or lessee can inspect them and either treat the contract as void or accept the damaged goods with a reduction in the contract price.

Consider an example. Atlas Sporting Equipment agrees to lease to River Bicycles sixty bicycles of a particular model that has been discontinued. No other bicycles of that model are available. River specifies that it needs the bicycles to rent to tourists. Before Atlas can deliver the bicycles, they are destroyed by a fire. In this situation, Atlas is not liable to River for failing to deliver the bicycles. Through no fault of either party, the goods were destroyed before the risk of loss passed to the lessee. The loss was total, so the contract is avoided. Clearly, Atlas has no obligation to tender the bicycles, and River has no obligation to pay for them.

Assurance and Cooperation Two other exceptions to the perfect tender doctrine apply equally to both parties to sales and lease contracts: the right of assurance and the duty of cooperation.

The Right of Assurance. The UCC provides that if one of the parties to a contract has "reasonable grounds" to believe that the other party will not perform as contracted, she or he may in writing "demand adequate assurance of due performance" from the other party. Until such assurance is received, she or he may "suspend" further performance without liability. What constitutes "reasonable grounds" is determined by commercial standards. If such assurances are not forthcoming within a reasonable time (not to exceed thirty days), the failure to respond may be treated as a repudiation of the contract [UCC 2-609, 2A-401].

For example, two companies that make road-surfacing materials, Koch Materials and Shore Slurry Seal, Inc., enter into a contract. Koch obtains a license to use Novachip, a special material made by Shore, and Shore agrees to buy all of its asphalt from Koch for the next seven years. A few years into the contract term, Shore notifies Koch that it is planning to sell its assets to Asphalt Paving Systems, Inc. Koch demands assurances that Asphalt Paving will continue the deal, but Shore refuses to provide assurances. In this situation, Koch can treat Shore's failure to give assurances as a repudiation and file suit against Shore for breach of contract.²

The Duty of Cooperation. Sometimes, the performance of one party depends on the cooperation of the other. The UCC provides that when such cooperation is not forthcoming, the other party can suspend his or her own performance without liability and hold the uncooperative party in breach or proceed to perform the contract in any reasonable manner [UCC 2-311(3)(b)].

For example, Amati is required by contract to deliver twelve hundred model Z washing machines to locations in the state of California to be specified later by Farrell. Deliveries are to be made on or before October 1. Amati has repeatedly requested the delivery locations, but Farrell has not responded. The twelve hundred model Z machines are ready for shipment on October 1, but Farrell still refuses to give Amati the delivery locations. Amati does not ship on October 1. Can Amati be held liable? The answer is no. Amati is excused for any resulting delay of performance because of Farrell's failure to cooperate.

2. Koch Materials Co. v. Shore Slurry Seal, Inc., 205 F.Supp.2d 324 (D.N.J.2002).

Obligations of the Buyer or Lessee

The main obligation of the buyer or lessee under a sales or lease contract is to pay for the goods tendered in accordance with the contract. Once the seller or lessor has adequately tendered delivery, the buyer or lessee is obligated to accept the goods and pay for them according to the terms of the contract.

Payment

In the absence of any specific agreements, the buyer or lessee must make payment at the time and place the goods are received [UCC 2-310(a), 2A-516(1)]. When a sale is made on credit, the buyer is obliged to pay according to the specified credit terms (for example, 60, 90, or 120 days), not when the goods are received. The credit period usually begins on the date of shipment [UCC 2-310(d)].

Payment can be made by any means agreed on between the parties—cash or any other method generally acceptable in the commercial world. If the seller demands cash when the buyer offers a check, credit card, or the like, the seller must permit the buyer reasonable time to obtain legal tender [UCC 2-511].

Right of Inspection

Unless the parties otherwise agree, or for C.O.D. (collect on delivery) transactions, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before making payment. This right allows the buyer or lessee to verify that the goods tendered or delivered conform to the contract. If the goods are not as ordered, the buyer or lessee has no duty to pay. An opportunity for inspection is therefore a condition precedent to the right of the seller or lessor to enforce payment [UCC 2-513(1), 2A-515(1)].

Inspection can take place at any reasonable place and time and in any reasonable manner. Generally, what is reasonable is determined by custom of the trade, past practices of the parties, and the like. The buyer bears the costs of inspecting the goods but can recover the costs from the seller if the goods do not conform and are rejected [UCC 2-513(2)].

Acceptance

A buyer or lessee manifests acceptance of the delivered goods by doing any of the following:

1. When the buyer or lessee has had a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods and indicates to the seller or lessor that the goods either are conforming or that he or she will retain them in spite of their nonconformity, the buyer or lessee has accepted [UCC 2-606(1)(a), 2A-515(1)(a)].

2. If the buyer or lessee has had a reasonable opportunity to inspect the goods and has failed to reject them within a reasonable period of time, then acceptance is presumed [UCC 2-602(1), 2-606(1)(b), 2A-515(1)(b)].
3. In sales contracts, if the buyer performs any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership, then the buyer will be deemed to have accepted the goods. For example, any use or resale of the goods—except for the limited purpose of testing or inspecting the goods—generally constitutes an acceptance [UCC 2-606(1)(c)].

Partial Acceptance

If some of the goods delivered do not conform to the contract and the seller or lessor has failed to cure, the buyer or lessee can make a partial acceptance [UCC 2-601(c), 2A-509(1)]. The same is true if the nonconformity was not reasonably discoverable before acceptance. (In the latter situation, the buyer or lessee may be able to revoke the acceptance, as will be discussed later in this chapter.)

A buyer or lessee cannot accept less than a single commercial unit, however. The UCC defines a commercial unit as a unit of goods that, by commercial usage, is viewed as a “single whole” for purposes of sale and that cannot be divided without materially impairing the character of the unit, its market value, or its use [UCC 2-105(6), 2A-103(1)(c)]. A commercial unit can be a single article (such as a machine), a set of articles (such as a suite of furniture), a quantity (such as a bale, a gross, or a carload), or any other unit treated in the trade as a single whole. (See Concept Summary 22.1 on the next page for a review of the obligations of both parties to a sales or lease contract.)

Anticipatory Repudiation

What if, before the time for contract performance, one party clearly communicates to the other the intention not to perform? Such an action is a breach of the contract by anticipatory repudiation.³

3. Refer back to Chapter 17 for a discussion of the common law origins and application of the doctrine of anticipatory repudiation.

CONCEPT SUMMARY 22.1

Performance of Sales and Lease Contracts

Concept	Description
OBLIGATIONS OF THE SELLER OR LESSOR	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The seller or lessor must tender conforming goods to the buyer or lessee at a reasonable hour and in a reasonable manner. Under the perfect tender doctrine, the seller or lessor must tender goods that conform exactly to the terms of the contract [UCC 2-503(1), 2A-508(1)]. 2. If the seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods and the buyer or lessee rejects them, the seller or lessor may cure (repair or replace the goods) within the contract time for performance [UCC 2-508(1), 2A-513(1)]. Even if the time for performance under the contract has expired, the seller or lessor has a reasonable time to substitute conforming goods without liability if the seller or lessor has reasonable grounds to believe the nonconforming tender will be acceptable to the buyer or lessee [UCC 2-508(2), 2A-513(2)]. 3. If the agreed-on means of delivery becomes impracticable or unavailable, the seller must substitute an alternative means (such as a different carrier) if a reasonable one is available [UCC 2-614(1)]. 4. If a seller or lessor tenders nonconforming goods in any one installment under an installment contract, the buyer or lessee may reject the installment only if the nonconformity substantially impairs its value and cannot be cured. The entire installment contract is breached only when one or more installments substantially impair the value of the whole contract [UCC 2-612, 2A-510]. 5. When performance becomes commercially impracticable owing to circumstances unforeseen when the contract was formed, the perfect tender rule no longer applies [UCC 2-615, 2A-405].
OBLIGATIONS OF THE BUYER OR LESSEE	<ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. On tender of delivery by the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee must pay for the goods at the time and place the goods are received, unless the sale is made on credit. Payment can be made by any method generally acceptable in the commercial world, but the seller can demand cash [UCC 2-310, 2-511]. 2. Unless otherwise agreed or in C.O.D. shipments, the buyer or lessee has an absolute right to inspect the goods before acceptance [UCC 2-513(1), 2A-515(1)]. 3. The buyer or lessee can manifest acceptance of delivered goods in words or by conduct, such as by failing to reject the goods after having had a reasonable opportunity to inspect them. A buyer will be deemed to have accepted goods if he or she performs any act inconsistent with the seller's ownership [UCC 2-606(1), 2A-515(1)].

Suspension of Performance Obligations

When anticipatory repudiation occurs, the nonbreaching party has a choice of two responses: (1) treat the repudiation as a final breach by pursuing a remedy or (2) wait to see if the repudiating party will decide to honor the contract despite the avowed intention to renege [UCC 2-610, 2A-402]. In either situation, the nonbreaching party may suspend performance.

A Repudiation May Be Retracted

The UCC permits the breaching party to “retract” his or her repudiation (subject to some limitations). This can be done by any method that clearly indicates the party's intent to perform. Once retraction is made, the rights of the repudiating party under the contract are reinstated. There can be no retraction, however, if since the time of the repudiation the other party has canceled or materially changed position or otherwise indicated that the repudiation is final [UCC 2-611, 2A-403].

For example, Cora, who owns a small inn, purchases a suite of furniture from Horton's Furniture Warehouse on April 1. The contract states that "delivery must be made on or before May 1." On April 10, Horton informs Cora that he cannot make delivery until May 10 and asks her to consent to the modified delivery date. In this situation, Cora has the option of either treating Horton's notice of late delivery as a final breach of contract and pursuing a remedy or agreeing to the later delivery date. Suppose that Cora does neither for two weeks. On April 24, Horton informs Cora that he will be able to deliver the furniture by May 1 after all. In effect, Horton has retracted his repudiation, reinstating the rights and obligations of the parties under the original contract. Note that if Cora had indicated after Horton's repudiation that she was canceling the contract, Horton would not have been able to retract his repudiation.

Remedies of the Seller or Lessor

Numerous remedies are available under the UCC to a seller or lessor when the buyer or lessee is in breach. Generally, the remedies available to the seller or lessor depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach. The most pertinent considerations are which party has possession of the goods, whether the goods are in transit, and whether the buyer or lessee has rejected or accepted the goods.

When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Seller or Lessor

Under the UCC, if the buyer or lessee breaches the contract before the goods have been delivered to her or him, the seller or lessor has the right to pursue the following remedies:

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Resell the goods and sue to recover damages.
3. Sue to recover the purchase price or lease payments due.
4. Sue to recover damages for the buyer's nonacceptance.

The Right to Cancel the Contract If the buyer or lessee breaches the contract, the seller or lessor can choose to simply cancel the contract [UCC 2-703(f), 2A-523(1)(a)]. The seller or lessor must notify the buyer or lessee of the cancellation, and at that point all remaining obligations of the seller or lessor are discharged. The buyer or lessee is not discharged from all remaining obligations, however; he or she is in breach, and the seller or lessor can pursue remedies available under the UCC for breach.

The Right to Withhold Delivery In general, sellers and lessors can withhold delivery or discontinue performance of their obligations under sales or lease contracts when the buyers or lessees are in breach. This is true whether a buyer or lessee has wrongfully rejected or revoked acceptance of contract goods (which will be discussed later in this chapter), failed to make a payment, or repudiated the contract [UCC 2-703(a), 2A-523(1)(c)]. The seller or lessor can also refuse to deliver the goods to a buyer or lessee who is insolvent (unable to pay debts as they become due) unless the buyer or lessee pays in cash [UCC 2-702(1), 2A-525(1)].

The Right to Resell or Dispose of the Goods When a buyer or lessee breaches or repudiates the contract while the seller or lessor is in possession of the goods, the seller or lessor can resell or dispose of the goods. The seller or lessor can retain any profits made as a result of the sale and can hold the buyer or lessee liable for any loss [UCC 2-703(d), 2-706(1), 2A-523(1)(e), 2A-527(1)].

The seller must give the original buyer reasonable notice of the resale, unless the goods are perishable or will rapidly decline in value [UCC 2-706(2), (3)]. A good faith purchaser in a resale takes the goods free of any of the rights of the original buyer, even if the seller fails to comply with this requirement [UCC 2-706(5)]. The UCC encourages the resale of the goods because although the buyer is liable for any deficiency, the seller is not accountable to the buyer for any profits made on the resale [UCC 2-706(6)].

Unfinished Goods. When the goods contracted for are unfinished at the time of the breach, the seller or lessor can do one of two things: (1) cease manufacturing the goods and resell them for scrap or salvage value or (2) complete the manufacture and resell or dispose of the goods, holding the buyer or lessee liable for any deficiency. In choosing between these two alternatives, the seller or lessor must exercise reasonable commercial judgment in order to mitigate the loss and obtain maximum value from the unfinished goods [UCC 2-704(2), 2A-524(2)]. Any resale of the goods must be made in good faith and in a commercially reasonable manner.

Measure of Damages. In sales transactions, the seller can recover any deficiency between the resale price and the contract price, along with incidental damages, defined as those costs to the seller resulting from the breach [UCC 2-706(1), 2-710]. The resale can be private or public, and the goods can be sold as a unit or in parcels.

In lease transactions, the lessor may lease the goods to another party and recover from the original lessee, as damages, any unpaid lease payments up to the beginning date of the lease term under the new lease. The lessor can also recover any deficiency between the lease payments due under the original lease contract and those under the new lease contract, along with incidental damages [UCC 2A-527(2)].

The Right to Recover the Purchase Price or Lease Payments Due Under the UCC, an unpaid seller or lessor can bring an action to recover the purchase price or the payments due under the lease contract, plus incidental damages [UCC 2-709(1), 2A-529(1)]. If a seller or lessor is unable to resell or dispose of the goods and sues for the contract price or lease payments due, the goods must be held for the buyer or lessee. The seller or lessor can resell the goods at any time prior to collecting the judgment from the buyer or lessee, but the net proceeds from the sale must be credited to the buyer or lessee. This illustrates the duty to mitigate damages.

Suppose that Southern Realty contracts with Gem Point, Inc., to purchase one thousand pens with Southern Realty's name inscribed on them. Gem Point tenders delivery of the pens, but Southern Realty wrongfully refuses to accept them. In this situation, Gem Point can bring an action for the purchase price because it delivered conforming goods, and Southern Realty refused to accept or pay for the goods. Gem Point obviously cannot resell the pens inscribed with the buyer's business name, so this situation falls under UCC 2-709. Gem Point is required to hold onto the pens for Southern Realty, but can resell them (in the event that it can find a buyer) at any time prior to collecting the judgment from Southern Realty.

The Right to Recover Damages for the Buyer's Nonacceptance If a buyer or lessee repudiates a contract or wrongfully refuses to accept the goods, a seller or lessor can maintain an action to recover the damages sustained. Ordinarily, the amount of damages equals the difference between the contract price or lease payments and the market price or lease payments at the time and place of tender of the goods, plus incidental damages [UCC 2-708(1), 2A-528(1)]. When the ordinary measure of damages is inadequate to put the seller or lessor in as good a position as the buyer's or lessee's performance would have, the UCC provides an alternative. In that situation, the proper measure of damages is the lost profits of the seller or lessor, including a reasonable allowance for overhead and other expenses [UCC 2-708(2), 2A-528(2)].

When the Goods Are in Transit

When the seller or lessor has delivered the goods to a carrier or a bailee but the buyer or lessee has not yet received them, the goods are said to be in transit. If, while the goods are in transit, the seller or lessor learns that the buyer or lessee is insolvent, the seller or lessor can stop the carrier or bailee from delivering the goods, regardless of the quantity of goods shipped. If the buyer or lessee is in breach but is not insolvent, the seller or lessor can stop the goods in transit only if the quantity shipped is at least a carload, a truckload, a planeload, or a larger shipment [UCC 2-705(1), 2A-526(1)].

To stop delivery, the seller or lessor must timely notify the carrier or other bailee that the goods are to be returned or held for the seller or lessor. If the carrier has sufficient time to stop delivery, the goods must be held and delivered according to the instructions of the seller or lessor, who is liable to the carrier for any additional costs incurred [UCC 2-705(3), 2A-526(3)].

The seller or lessor has the right to stop delivery of the goods under UCC 2-705(2) and 2A-526(2) until the time when:

1. The buyer or lessee receives the goods.
2. The carrier or the bailee acknowledges the rights of the buyer or lessee in the goods (by reshipping or holding the goods for the buyer or lessee, for example).
3. A negotiable document of title covering the goods has been properly transferred to the buyer in a sales transaction, giving the buyer ownership rights in the goods [UCC 2-705(2)].

Once the seller or lessor reclaims the goods in transit, she or he can pursue the remedies allowed to sellers and lessors when the goods are in their possession.

When the Goods Are in the Possession of the Buyer or Lessee

When the buyer or lessee has breached a sales or lease contract and the goods are in his or her possession, the seller or lessor can sue to recover the purchase price of the goods or the lease payments due, plus incidental damages [UCC 2-709(1), 2A-529(1)]. In some situations, a seller may also have a right to reclaim the goods from the buyer. For example, in a sales contract, if the buyer has received the goods on credit and the seller discovers that the buyer is insolvent, the seller can demand return of the goods [UCC 2-702(2)]. Ordinarily, the demand must be made within ten days of the buyer's receipt of the goods.⁴ The seller's right to reclaim the goods is subject to the rights of a good faith purchaser or other subsequent buyer in the ordinary course of business who purchases the goods from the buyer before the seller reclaims them.

In regard to lease contracts, if the lessee is in default (fails to make payments that are due, for example) the lessor may reclaim the leased goods that are in the lessee's possession [UCC 2A-525(2)].

Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee

When the seller or lessor breaches the contract, the buyer or lessee has numerous remedies available under the UCC. Like the remedies available to sellers and lessors, the remedies available to buyers and lessees depend on the circumstances existing at the time of the breach.

When the Seller or Lessor Refuses to Deliver the Goods

If the seller or lessor refuses to deliver the goods to the buyer or lessee, the basic remedies available to the buyer or lessee include the right to:

1. Cancel (rescind) the contract.
2. Recover goods that have been paid for if the seller or lessor is insolvent.

4. The seller can demand and reclaim the goods at any time, though, if the buyer misrepresented his or her solvency in writing within three months prior to the delivery of the goods.

3. Sue to obtain specific performance if the goods are unique or damages are an inadequate remedy.
4. Buy other goods (obtain cover) and recover damages from seller.
5. Sue to obtain identified goods held by a third party (replevy goods).
6. Sue to recover damages.

The Right to Cancel the Contract When a seller or lessor fails to make proper delivery or repudiates the contract, the buyer or lessee can cancel, or rescind, the contract. The buyer or lessee is relieved of any further obligations under the contract but retains all rights to other remedies against the seller or lessor [UCC 2-711(1), 2A-508(1)(a)]. (The right to cancel the contract is also available to a buyer or lessee who has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance, as will be discussed shortly.)

The Right to Recover the Goods If a buyer or lessee has made a partial or full payment for goods that remain in the possession of the seller or lessor, the buyer or lessee can recover the goods if the seller or lessor becomes insolvent within ten days after receiving the first payment and if the goods are identified to the contract. To exercise this right, the buyer or lessee must tender to the seller or lessor any unpaid balance of the purchase price or lease payments [UCC 2-502, 2A-522].

The Right to Obtain Specific Performance

A buyer or lessee can obtain specific performance if the goods are unique or the remedy at law (monetary damages) is inadequate [UCC 2-716(1), 2A-521(1)]. Ordinarily, an award of damages is sufficient to place a buyer or lessee in the position she or he would have occupied if the seller or lessor had fully performed. When the contract is for the purchase of a particular work of art or a similarly unique item, however, damages may not be sufficient. Under these circumstances, equity requires that the seller or lessor perform exactly by delivering the particular goods identified to the contract (the remedy of specific performance).

The Right of Cover In certain situations, buyers and lessees can protect themselves by obtaining cover—that is, by buying or leasing substitute goods for those that were due under the contract. This option is available when the seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods. (Cover is also available when a buyer or lessee has rightfully rejected goods or revoked acceptance, to be discussed shortly.)

In obtaining cover, the buyer or lessee must act in good faith and without unreasonable delay [UCC 2-712, 2A-518]. After purchasing or leasing substitute goods, the buyer or lessee can recover from the seller or lessor the difference between the cost of cover and the contract price (or lease payments), plus incidental and consequential damages, less the expenses (such as delivery costs) that were saved as a result of the breach [UCC 2-712, 2-715, 2A-518]. Consequential damages are any losses suffered by the buyer or lessee that the seller or lessor had reason to know about at the time of contract formation. Consequential damages can also include any injury to the buyer's or lessee's person or property proximately resulting from the contract's breach [UCC 2-715(2), 2A-520(2)].

Buyers and lessees are not required to cover, and failure to do so will not bar them from using any other remedies available under the UCC. A buyer or lessee who fails to cover, however, risks not being able to collect consequential damages that could have been avoided had he or she purchased or leased substitute goods.

The Right to Replevy Goods Buyers and lessees also have the right to replevy goods. Replevin⁵ is an action to recover identified goods in the hands of a party who is unlawfully withholding them. At common law, replevin refers to a legal proceeding to recover specific personal property that has been unlawfully taken. Under the UCC, a buyer or lessee can replevy goods identified to the contract if the seller or lessor has repudiated or breached the contract. To maintain an action to replevy goods, buyers and lessees must usually show that they were unable to cover for the goods after making a reasonable effort [UCC 2-716(3), 2A-521(3)].

The Right to Recover Damages If a seller or lessor repudiates the contract or fails to deliver the goods, the buyer or lessee can sue for damages. The measure of recovery is the difference between the contract price (or lease payments) and the market price of the goods (or lease payments that could be obtained for the goods) at the time the buyer (or lessee) learned of the breach. The market price or market lease payments are determined at the place where the seller or lessor was supposed to deliver the goods. The buyer or lessee can also recover incidental and consequential damages less the expenses that were saved as a result of the breach [UCC 2-713, 2A-519].

5. Pronounced ruh-pleh-vun, derived from the Old French word plevir, meaning "to pledge."

Consider an example. Schilling orders 10,000 bushels of wheat from Valdone for $5.00 per bushel, with delivery due on June 14 and payment due on June 20. Valdone does not deliver on June 14. On June 14, the market price of wheat is $5.50 per bushel. Schilling chooses to do without the wheat. He sues Valdone for damages for nondelivery. Schilling can recover $$0.50 \times 10,000$, or $5,000, plus any expenses the breach has caused him. The measure of damages is the market price on the day Schilling was to have received delivery less the contract price. (Any expenses Schilling saved by the breach would be deducted from the damages.)

When the Seller or Lessor Delivers Nonconforming Goods

When the seller or lessor delivers nonconforming goods, the buyer or lessee has several remedies available under the UCC.

The Right to Reject the Goods If either the goods or the tender of the goods by the seller or lessor fails to conform to the contract in any respect, the buyer or lessee can reject all of the goods or any commercial unit of the goods [UCC 2-601, 2A-509]. If the buyer or lessee rejects the goods, she or he may then obtain cover or cancel the contract, and may seek damages just as if the seller or lessor had refused to deliver the goods (see the earlier discussion of these remedies).

In the following case, the buyer of a piano that was represented to be new rejected the instrument on its delivery in an "unacceptable" condition and brought an action against the seller, seeking damages.

CASE 22.2 Jauregui v. Bobb's Piano Sales & Service, Inc.

District Court of Appeal of Florida, Third District, 2006. 922 So.2d 303.

• Background and Facts In November 2001, Jorge Jauregui contracted to buy a Kawai RX5 piano (Serial No. 2392719a) for $24,282 from Bobb's Piano Sales and Service, Inc., in Miami, Florida.

CHAPTER 22 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

CASE 22.2 CONTINUED

The piano was represented to be in new condition and to qualify for the manufacturer's "new piano" warranty. Bobb's did not mention that the piano had been in storage for almost a year and had been moved at least six times. The piano was delivered with "unacceptable damage," according to Jauregui, who videotaped its condition. He sent a letter of complaint to the state department of consumer services, identifying at least four "necessary repairs." He then filed a suit in a Florida state court against Bobb's, claiming breach of contract. Bobb's admitted that the piano needed repair. The court concluded that Bobb's was in breach of the parties' contract and that specific performance was not possible, but ruled that Jauregui "takes nothing in damages." Jauregui appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT
SCHWARTZ, Senior Judge.

* * * *

* * * [T]he judgment on review was erroneous as a matter of law. It is based on the rationale that because, even in its defective condition, the piano was worth as much or more than plaintiff actually paid, no actionable damages had been sustained for breach of the contract for purchase and sale. It is the law, however, * * * that, in a case such as this one, the purchaser of non-conforming goods like the offending piano retains the option to claim either the difference in value or, as plaintiff clearly did in this case, in effect, to cancel the deal and get his money back. This principle is based on the common sense idea that the purchaser is entitled to receive what he wanted to buy and pay for and that the seller is not free to supply any non-conforming item she wishes just so long as the deviant goods are worth just as much. * * * [Emphasis added.]

Accordingly, the judgment under review is reversed and the cause remanded with directions and for further proceedings consistent herewith * * * .

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court agreed with the lower court's conclusion that the defendant had breached the parties' contract but disagreed with the ruling that the plaintiff should not obtain damages. The appellate court awarded Jauregui the contract price with interest and other amounts. The court also ordered Bobb's to remove the piano.

● What If the Facts Were Different? If Bobb's had delivered the piano in new condition and Jauregui had refused to pay for it only out of "buyer's remorse," how might the outcome in this case have been different?

● The Legal Environment Dimension What might a buyer who prevails in a dispute such as the one in this case be awarded in addition to the contract price with interest?

Timeliness and Reason for Rejection Required.

The buyer or lessee must reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time after delivery or tender of delivery and must seasonably (timely) notify the seller or lessor [UCC 2-602(1), 2A-509(2)]. If the buyer or lessee fails to reject the goods within a reasonable amount of time, acceptance will be presumed. The buyer or lessee must also designate defects that are ascertainable by reasonable inspection. Failure to do so precludes the buyer or lessee from using such defects to justify rejection or to establish breach when the seller or lessor could have cured the defects if they had been disclosed seasonably [UCC 2-605, 2A-514].

Duties of Merchant Buyers and Lessees When Goods Are Rejected. Suppose that a merchant buyer or lessee rightfully rejects goods and the seller or lessor has no agent or business at the place of rejection. What should the buyer or lessee do in that situation? Under the UCC, the merchant buyer or lessee has a good faith obligation to follow any reasonable instructions received from the seller or lessor with respect to the goods [UCC 2-603, 2A-511]. The buyer or lessee is entitled to be reimbursed for the care and cost entailed in following the instructions. The same requirements hold if the buyer or lessee rightfully revokes her or his acceptance of the goods at some later time [UCC 2-608(3), 2A-517(5)]. (Revocation of acceptance will be discussed shortly.)

If no instructions are forthcoming and the goods are perishable or threaten to decline in value quickly, the buyer or lessee can resell the goods in good faith, taking appropriate reimbursement and a selling commission (not to exceed 10 percent of the gross proceeds) from the proceeds [UCC 2-603(1), (2); 2A-511(1)]. If the goods are not perishable, the buyer or lessee may store them for the seller or lessor or reship them to the seller or lessor [UCC 2-604, 2A-512].

Revocation of Acceptance Acceptance of the goods precludes the buyer or lessee from exercising the right of rejection, but it does not necessarily prevent the buyer or lessee from pursuing other remedies. In certain circumstances, a buyer or lessee is permitted to revoke his or her acceptance of the goods.

Acceptance of a lot or a commercial unit can be revoked if the nonconformity substantially impairs the value of the lot or unit and if one of the following factors is present:

1. Acceptance was predicated on the reasonable assumption that the nonconformity would be cured, and it has not been cured within a reasonable period of time [UCC 2-608(1)(a), 2A-517(1)(a)].
2. The buyer or lessee did not discover the nonconformity before acceptance, either because it was difficult to discover before acceptance or because assurances made by the seller or lessor that the goods were conforming kept the buyer or lessee from inspecting the goods [UCC 2-608(1)(b), 2A-517(1)(b)].

Revocation of acceptance is not effective until notice is given to the seller or lessor. Notice must occur within a reasonable time after the buyer or lessee either discovers or should have discovered the grounds for revocation. Additionally, revocation must occur before the goods have undergone any substantial change (such as spoilage) not caused by their own defects [UCC 2-608(2), 2A-517(4)]. Once acceptance is revoked, the buyer or lessee can pursue remedies, just as if the goods had been rejected.

The Right to Recover Damages for Accepted Goods

A buyer or lessee who has accepted nonconforming goods may also keep the goods and recover for any loss “resulting in the ordinary course of events . . . as determined in any manner which is reasonable” [UCC 2-714(1), 2A-519(3)]. The buyer or lessee, however, must notify the seller or lessor of the breach within a reasonable time after the defect was or should have been discovered. Failure to give notice of the defects (breach) to the seller or lessor bars the buyer or lessee from pursuing any remedy [UCC 2-607(3), 2A-516(3)]. In addition, the parties to a sales or lease contract can insert a provision requiring the buyer or lessee to give notice of any defects in the goods within a prescribed period.

When the goods delivered are not as warranted, the measure of damages equals the difference between the value of the goods as accepted and their value if they had been delivered as warranted, unless special circumstances show proximately caused damages of a different amount [UCC 2-714(2), 2A-519(4)]. The buyer or lessee is also entitled to incidental and consequential damages when appropriate [UCC 2-714(3), 2A-519]. The UCC further permits the buyer or lessee, with proper notice to the seller or lessor, to deduct all or any part of the damages from the price or lease payments still due under the contract [UCC 2-717, 2A-516(1)].

Is two years after a sale of goods a reasonable time period in which to discover a defect in those goods and notify the seller or lessor of a breach? That was the question in the following case.

EXTENDED Fitl v. Strek

CASE 22.3 Supreme Court of Nebraska, 2005. 269 Neb. 51, 690 N.W.2d 605.

WRIGHT, J. [Judge]

* * * *

In September 1995, [James] Fitl attended a sports card show in San Francisco, California, where [Mark Strek, doing business as Star Cards] was an exhibitor. Fitl subsequently purchased from Strek a 1952 Mickey Mantle Topps baseball card for $17,750. According to Fitl, Strek represented that the card was in near mint condition. After Strek delivered the card to Fitl in Omaha, Nebraska, Fitl placed it in a safe-deposit box.

In May 1997, Fitl sent the baseball card to Professional Sports Authenticators (PSA), a grading service for sports cards that is located in Newport Beach, California. PSA reported to Fitl that the baseball card was ungradable because it had been discolored and doctored.

CASE 22.3 CONTINUED

On May 29, 1997, Fitl wrote to Strek * * *. Strek replied that Fitl should have initiated a return of the baseball card in a timely fashion so that Strek could have confronted his source and remedied the situation. Strek asserted that a typical grace period for the unconditional return of a card was from 7 days to 1 month.

* * * *

* * * Fitl sued Strek [in a Nebraska state court, which entered a judgment for Fitl. Strek appealed to the Nebraska Supreme Court.] * * *

* * * *

Strek claims that the [trial] court erred in determining that notification of the defective condition of the baseball card 2 years after the date of purchase was timely pursuant to [UCC] 2-607(3)(a).

* * * The [trial] court found that Fitl had notified Strek within a reasonable time after discovery of the breach. Therefore, our review is whether the [trial] court's finding as to the reasonableness of the notice was clearly erroneous.

Section 2-607(3)(a) states: "Where a tender has been accepted * * * the buyer must within a reasonable time after he discovers or should have discovered any breach notify the seller of breach or be barred from any remedy." [Under UCC 1-204(2)] "[w]hat is a reasonable time for taking any action depends on the nature, purpose and circumstances of such action." [Emphasis added.]

The notice requirement set forth in Section 2-607(3)(a) serves three purposes. * * *

* * * The most important one is to enable the seller to make efforts to cure the breach by making adjustments or replacements in order to minimize the buyer's damages and the seller's liability. A second policy is to provide the seller a reasonable opportunity to learn the facts so that he may adequately prepare for negotiation and defend himself in a suit. A third policy * * * is the same as the policy behind statutes of limitation: to provide a seller with a terminal point in time for liability.

* * * [A] party is justified in relying upon a representation made to the party as a positive statement of fact when an investigation would be required to ascertain its falsity. In order for Fitl to have determined that the baseball card had been altered, he would have been required to conduct an investigation. We find that he was not required to do so. Once Fitl learned that the baseball card had been altered, he gave notice to Strek. [Emphasis added.]

* * * [O]ne of the most important policies behind the notice requirement * * * is to allow the seller to cure the breach by making adjustments or replacements to minimize the buyer's damages and the seller's liability. However, even if Fitl had learned immediately upon taking possession of the baseball card that it was not authentic and had notified Strek at that time, there is no evidence that Strek could have made any adjustment or taken any action that would have minimized his liability. In its altered condition, the baseball card was worthless.

* * * Earlier notification would not have helped Strek prepare for negotiation or defend himself in a suit because the damage to Fitl could not be repaired. Thus, the policies behind the notice requirement, to allow the seller to correct a defect, to prepare for negotiation and litigation, and to protect against stale claims at a time beyond which an investigation can be completed, were not unfairly prejudiced by the lack of an earlier notice to Strek. Any problem Strek may have had with the party from whom he obtained the baseball card was a separate matter from his transaction with Fitl, and an investigation into the source of the altered card would not have minimized Fitl's damages.

* * * *

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

QUESTIONS

1. Suppose that Fitl and Strek had included in their deal a clause requiring Fitl to give notice of any defect in the card within "7 days to 1 month" of its receipt. Would the result have been different? Why or why not?
2. What might a buyer who prevails in a dispute such as the one in this case be awarded?

Additional Provisions Affecting Remedies

The parties to a sales or lease contract can vary their respective rights and obligations by contractual agreement. For example, a seller and buyer can expressly provide for remedies in addition to those provided in the UCC. They can also specify remedies in lieu of those provided in the UCC, or they can change the measure of damages. As under the common law of contracts, they may also include clauses in their contracts providing for liquidated damages in the event of a breach or a delay in performance (see Chapter 18).

Additionally, a seller can stipulate that the buyer's only remedy on the seller's breach will be repair or replacement of the item, or the seller can limit the buyer's remedy to return of the goods and refund of the purchase price. In sales and lease contracts, an agreed-on remedy is in addition to those provided in the UCC unless the parties expressly agree that the remedy is exclusive of all others [UCC 2-719(1), 2A-503(1)]. State "lemon-law" statutes also provide additional remedies to buyers of automobiles.

Exclusive Remedies

If the parties state that a remedy is exclusive, then it is the sole remedy. For example, suppose that Standard Tool Company agrees to sell a pipe-cutting machine to United Pipe & Tubing Corporation. The contract limits United's remedy exclusively to repair or replacement of any defective parts. Thus, repair or replacement of defective parts is the buyer's only remedy under this contract.

When circumstances cause an exclusive remedy to fail in its essential purpose, however, it is no longer exclusive, and the buyer or lessee may pursue other remedies available under the UCC [UCC 2-719(2), 2A-503(2)]. In the example just given, suppose that Standard Tool Company was unable to repair a defective part, and no replacement parts were available. In this situation, because the exclusive remedy failed in its essential purpose, the buyer could pursue other remedies available under the UCC.

Consequential Damages

As discussed in Chapter 18, consequential damages are special damages that compensate for indirect losses (such as lost profits) resulting from a breach of contract that were reasonably foreseeable. Under the UCC, parties to a contract can limit or exclude consequential damages, provided the limitation is not unconscionable. When the buyer or lessee is a consumer, any limitation of consequential damages for personal injuries resulting from consumer goods is prima facie (presumptively) unconscionable. The limitation of consequential damages is not necessarily unconscionable when the loss is commercial in nature—for example, lost profits and property damage [UCC 2-719(3), 2A-503(3)].

Lemon Laws

Purchasers of defective automobiles—called "lemons"—may have remedies in addition to those offered by the UCC. All of the states and the District of Columbia have enacted lemon laws. Basically, lemon laws provide that if an automobile under warranty possesses a defect that significantly affects the vehicle's value or use, and the defect has not been remedied by the seller within a specified number of opportunities (usually three or four), the buyer is entitled to a new car, replacement of defective parts, or return of all consideration paid.

In most states, lemon laws require an aggrieved new-car owner to notify the dealer or manufacturer of the problem and to provide the dealer or manufacturer with an opportunity to solve it. If the problem remains, the owner must then submit complaints to the arbitration program specified in the manufacturer's warranty before taking the case to court. Decisions by arbitration panels are binding on the manufacturer (that is, cannot be appealed by the manufacturer to the courts) but usually are not binding on the purchaser. All arbitration boards must meet state and/or federal standards of impartiality, and some states have established mandatory government-sponsored arbitration programs for lemon-law disputes.

Dealing with International Contracts

Because buyers and sellers (or lessees and lessors) engaged in international business transactions may be separated by thousands of miles, special precautions are often taken to ensure performance under international contracts. Sellers and lessors want to avoid delivering goods for which they might not be paid. Buyers and lessees desire the assurance that sellers and lessors will not be paid until there is evidence that the goods have been shipped. Thus, letters of credit are frequently used to facilitate international business transactions.

Letter-of-Credit Transactions

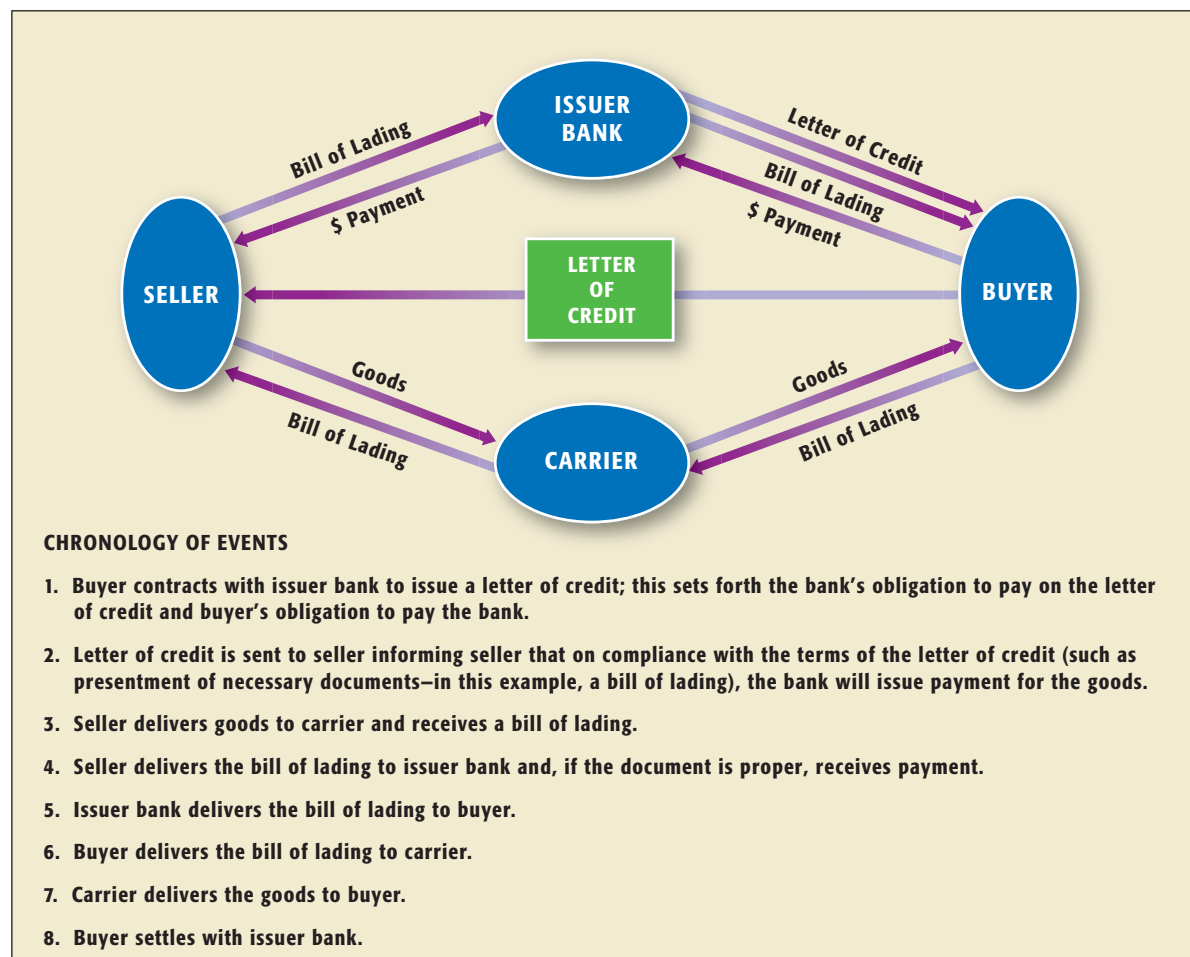

In a simple letter-of-credit transaction, the issuer (a bank) agrees to issue a letter of credit and to ascertain whether the beneficiary (seller or lessor) performs certain acts. In return, the account party (buyer or lessee) promises to reimburse the issuer for the amount paid to the beneficiary. The transaction may also involve an advising bank that transmits information and a paying bank that expedites payment under the letter of credit. See Exhibit 22-1 for an illustration of a letter-of-credit transaction.

Under a letter of credit, the issuer is bound to pay the beneficiary (seller or lessor) when the beneficiary has complied with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit. The beneficiary looks to the issuer, not to the account party (buyer or lessee), when it presents the documents required by the letter of credit. Typically, the letter of credit will require that the beneficiary deliver a bill of lading to prove that shipment has been made. Letters of credit assure beneficiaries (sellers or lessors) of payment while at the same time assuring account parties (buyers or lessees) that payment will not be made until the beneficiaries have complied with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit.

The basic principle behind letters of credit is that payment is made against the documents presented by the beneficiary and not against the facts that the documents purport to reflect. Thus, in a letter-of-credit transaction, the issuer (bank) does not police the underlying contract; the letter of credit is independent of the underlying contract between the buyer and the seller. Eliminating the need for the bank (issuer) to inquire into whether actual conditions have been satisfied greatly reduces the costs of letters of credit.

EXHIBIT 22-1 • A Letter-of-Credit Transaction

Remedies for Breach of International Sales Contracts

The United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG) provides international sellers and buyers with remedies very similar to those available under the UCC. Article 74 of the CISG provides for money damages, including foreseeable consequential damages, on a contract's breach. As under the UCC, the measure of damages is normally the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods.

Under Article 49, the buyer is permitted to avoid obligations under the contract if the seller breaches the contract or fails to deliver the goods during the time specified in the contract or later agreed on by the parties. Similarly, under Article 64, the seller can avoid obligations under the contract if the buyer breaches the contract, fails to accept delivery of the goods, or fails to pay for the goods.

The CISG also allows for specific performance as a remedy under Article 28, which provides that "one party is entitled to require performance of any obligation by the other party." This statement is then qualified, however. Article 28 goes on to state that a court may grant specific performance as a remedy only if it would do so "under its own law in respect of similar contracts of sale not governed by this Convention." As already discussed, in the United States the equitable remedy of specific performance will normally be granted only if no adequate remedy at law (money damages) is available and the goods are unique in nature. In other countries, however, such as Germany, specific performance is a commonly granted remedy for breach of contract.

REVIEWING Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

GFI, Inc., a Hong Kong company, makes audio decoder chips, one of the essential components used in the manufacture of MP3 players. Egan Electronics contracts with GFI to buy 10,000 chips on an installment contract, with 2,500 chips to be shipped every three months, F.O.B. Hong Kong, via Air Express. At the time for the first delivery, GFI delivers only 2,400 chips but explains to Egan that although the shipment is less than 5 percent short, the chips are of a higher quality than those specified in the contract and are worth 5 percent more than the contract price. Egan accepts the shipment and pays GFI the contract price. At the time for the second shipment, GFI makes a shipment identical to the first. Egan again accepts and pays for the chips. At the time for the third shipment, GFI ships 2,400 of the same chips, but this time GFI sends them via Hong Kong Air instead of Air Express. While in transit, the chips are destroyed. When it is time for the fourth shipment, GFI again sends 2,400 chips, but this time Egan rejects the chips without explanation. Using the information presented in the chapter, answer the following questions.

1. Did GFI have a legitimate reason to expect that Egan would accept the fourth shipment? Why or why not?
2. Did the substitution of carriers in the third shipment constitute a breach of the contract by GFI? Explain.
3. Suppose that the silicon used for the chips becomes unavailable for a period of time. Consequently, GFI cannot manufacture enough chips to fulfill the contract but does ship as many as it can to Egan. Under what doctrine might a court release GFI from further performance of the contract?
4. Under the UCC, does Egan have a right to reject the fourth shipment? Why or why not?

TERMS AND CONCEPTS

conforming goods 438 cover 447

cure 439 installment contract 440 letter of credit 453 perfect tender rule 439

replevin 448
tender of delivery 438

QUESTIONS AND CASE PROBLEMS

22-1. Ames contracts to ship to Curley one hundred model Z television sets. The terms of delivery are F.O.B. Ames's city, by Green Truck Lines, with delivery on or before April 30. On April 15, Ames discovers that because of an error in inventory control, all model Z sets have been sold, and the stock has not been replenished. Ames has model X, a similar but slightly more expensive unit, in stock. On April 16, Ames ships one hundred model X sets, with notice that Curley will be charged the model Z price. Curley (in a proper manner) rejects the model X sets when they are tendered on April 18. Ames does not wish to be held in breach of contract, even though he has tendered non-conforming goods. Discuss Ames's options.

22-2. QUESTION WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Topken has contracted to sell Lorwin five hundred washing machines of a certain model at list price. Topken is to ship the goods on or before December 1. Topken produces one thousand washing machines of this model but has not yet prepared Lorwin's shipment. On November 1, Lorwin repudiates the contract. Discuss the remedies available to Topken.

- For a sample answer to Question 22-2, go to Appendix I at the end of this text.

22-3. Lehor collects antique cars. He contracts to purchase spare parts for a 1938 engine from Beem. These parts are not made anymore and are scarce. To obtain the contract with Beem, Lehor agrees to pay 50 percent of the purchase price in advance. On May 1, Lehor sends the payment, which is received on May 2. On May 3, Beem, having found another buyer willing to pay substantially more for the parts, informs Lehor that he will not deliver as contracted. That same day, Lehor learns that Beem is insolvent. Discuss fully any possible remedies available to Lehor to enable him to take possession of these parts.

22-4. Remedies of the Buyer or Lessee. Mississippi Chemical Corp. (MCC) produces ammonia at its fertilizer plant in Yazoo City, Mississippi. The production of ammonia involves the compression of gas in special equipment called a compressor train. In 1989, MCC bought from Dresser-Rand Co. a specially designed train that included a "high-case compressor" and a "low-case compressor." The contract expressly guaranteed that the train would be free from defects and would conform to certain technical specifications, but it did not work as promised. When the high-case compressor broke in 1990, MCC wrote to Dresser, "This letter constitutes notice by MCC that [Dresser] is in breach" of the contract. The same defects caused the low-case compressor to break in 1993 and 1996. In 1997, MCC filed a suit in a federal district court against Dresser, asserting a number of claims based on the contract. Dresser argued, in part, that it had never received written notice of the defects in the low-case compressor and thus was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Was there sufficient notice to Dresser for MCC to recover for damages caused by defects in the train? Discuss. [Mississippi Chemical Corp. v. Dresser-Rand Co., 287 F.3d 359 (5th Cir.2002)]

22-5. Acceptance. In April 1996, Excalibur Oil Group, Inc., applied for credit and opened an account with Standard Distributors, Inc., to obtain snack foods and other items for Excalibur's convenience stores. For three months, Standard delivered the goods and Excalibur paid the invoices. In July, Standard was dissolved and its assets were distributed to J. F. Walker Co. Walker continued to deliver the goods to Excalibur, which continued to pay the invoices until November, when the firm began to experience financial difficulties. By January 1997, Excalibur owed Walker $54,241.77. Walker then dealt with Excalibur solely on a collect-on-delivery basis until Excalibur's stores closed in 1998. Walker filed a suit in a Pennsylvania state court against Excalibur and its owner to recover amounts due on the unpaid invoices. To successfully plead its case, Walker had to show that there was a contract between the parties. One question was whether Excalibur had manifested acceptance of the goods delivered by Walker. How does a buyer manifest acceptance? Was there an acceptance in this case? In whose favor should the court rule, and why? [J. F. Walker Co. v. Excalibur Oil Group, Inc., 792 A.2d 1269 (Pa. Super. 2002)]

22-6. CASE PROBLEM WITH SAMPLE ANSWER

Eaton Corp. bought four air-conditioning units from Trane Co., an operating division of American Standard, Inc., in 1998. The contract stated in part, “NEITHER PARTY SHALL BE LIABLE FOR . . . CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES.” Trane was responsible for servicing the units. During the last ten days of March 2003, Trane’s employees serviced and inspected the units, changed the filters and belts, and made a materials list for repairs. On April 3, a fire occurred at Eaton’s facility, extensively damaging the units and the facility, although no one was hurt. Alleging that the fire started in the electric motor of one of the units, and that Trane’s faulty servicing of the units caused the fire, Eaton filed a suit in a federal district court against Trane. Eaton asserted a breach of contract, among other claims, seeking consequential damages. Trane filed a motion for summary judgment, based on the limitation-of-remedies clause. What are consequential damages? Can these be limited in some circumstances? Is the clause valid in this case? Explain. [Eaton Corp. v. Trane Carolina Plains, 350 F.Supp.2d 699 (D.S.C. 2004)]

- To view a sample answer for Problem 22-6, go to this book’s Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, select “Chapter 22,” and click on “Case Problem with Sample Answer.”

22-7. Perfect Tender. Advanced Polymer Sciences, Inc. (APS), based in Ohio, makes polymers and resins for use as protective coatings in industrial applications. APS also owns the technology for equipment used to make certain composite fibers. SAVA gumarska in kemijska industrija d.d. (SAVA), based in Slovenia, makes rubber goods. In 1999, SAVA and APS contracted to form SAVA Advanced Polymers proizvodno podjetje d.o.o. (SAVA AP) to make and distribute APS products in Eastern Europe. Their contract provided for, among other things, the alteration of a facility to make the products using specially made equipment to be sold by APS to SAVA. Disputes arose between the parties, and in August 2000, SAVA stopped work on the new facility. APS then notified SAVA that it was stopping the manufacture of the equipment and “insist[ed] on knowing what is SAVA’s intention towards this venture.” In October, SAVA told APS that it was canceling their contract. In subsequent litigation, SAVA claimed that APS had repudiated the contract when it stopped making the equipment. What might APS assert in its defense? How should the court rule? Explain. [SAVA gumarska in kemijska industrija d.d. v. Advanced Polymer Sciences, Inc., 128 S.W.3d 304 (Tex.App.—Dallas 2004)]

22-8. Remedies of the Buyer. L.V.R.V., Inc., sells recreational vehicles (RVs) in Las Vegas, Nevada, as Wheeler’s Las Vegas RV. In September 1997, Wheeler’s sold a Santara RV made by Coachmen Recreational Vehicle Co. to Arthur and Roswitha Waddell. The Waddells hoped to spend two or three years driving around the country, but almost immediately—and repeatedly—they experienced problems with the RV. Its entry door popped open. Its cooling and heating systems did not work properly. Its batteries did not maintain a charge. Most significantly, its engine overheated when ascending a moderate grade. The Waddells took the RV to Wheeler’s service department for repairs. Over the next year and a half, the RV spent more than seven months at Wheeler’s. In March 1999, the Waddells filed a complaint in a Nevada state court against the dealer to revoke their acceptance of the RV. What are the requirements for a buyer’s revocation of acceptance? Were the requirements met in this case? In whose favor should the court rule? Why? [Waddell v. L.V.R.V., Inc., 122 Nev. 15, 125 P.3d 1160 (2006)]

22-9. Additional Provisions Affecting Remedies. Nomo Agroindustrial Sa De CV is a farm company based in Mexico that grows tomatoes, cucumbers, and other vegetables to sell in the United States. In the early 2000s, Nomo had problems when its tomato plants contracted a disease: tomato spotted wilt virus (TSWV). To obtain a crop that was resistant to TSWV, Nomo contacted Enza Zaden North America, Inc., an international corporation that manufactures seeds. Enza’s brochures advertised—and Enza told Nomo—that its Caiman variety was resistant to TSWV. Based on these assurances, Nomo bought Caiman seeds. The invoice, which Nomo’s representative signed, limited any damages to the purchase price of the seeds. The plants germinated from the Caiman seeds contracted TSWV, destroying Nomo’s entire tomato crop. Nomo filed a suit in a federal district court against Enza, seeking to recover for the loss. Enza argued, in part, that any damages were limited to the price of the seeds. Can parties agree to limit their remedies under the UCC? If so, what are Nomo’s best arguments against the enforcement of the limitations clause in Enza’s invoice? What should the court rule on this issue? Why? [Nomo Agroindustrial Sa De CV v. Enza Zaden North America, Inc., 492 F.Supp.2d 1175 (D.Ariz. 2007)]

22-10. A QUESTION OF ETHICS

Scotwood Industries, Inc., sells calcium chloride flake for use in ice melt products. Between July and September 2004, Scotwood delivered thirty-seven shipments of flake to Frank Miller & Sons, Inc. After each delivery, Scotwood billed Miller, which paid thirty-five of the invoices and processed 30 to 50 percent of the flake. In August, Miller began complaining about the quality. Scotwood assured Miller that it would remedy the situation. Finally, in October, Miller told Scotwood, “[T]his is totally unacceptable. We are willing to discuss Scotwood picking up the material.” Miller claimed that the flake was substantially defective because it was chunked. Calcium chloride maintains its purity for up to five years but chunks if it is exposed to and absorbs moisture, making it unusable. In response to Scotwood’s suit to collect payment on the unpaid invoices, Miller filed a counterclaim in a federal district court for breach of contract, seeking to recover

CHAPTER 22 Performance and Breach of Sales and Lease Contracts

based on revocation of acceptance, among other things. [Scotwood Industries, Inc. v. Frank Miller & Sons, Inc., 435 F.Supp.2d 1160 (D.Kan. 2006)]

- (a) What is revocation of acceptance? How does a buyer effectively exercise this option? Do the facts in this case support this theory as a ground for Miller to recover damages? Why or why not?
- (b) Is there an ethical basis for allowing a buyer to revoke acceptance of goods and recover damages? If so, is there an ethical limit to this right? Discuss.

“Chapter 22.” Click on “Video Questions” and view the video titled International: Letter of Credit. Then answer the following questions.

- (a) Do banks always require the same documents to be presented in letter-of-credit transactions? If not, who dictates what documents will be required in the letter of credit?
- (b) At what point does the seller receive payment in a letter-of-credit transaction?
- (c) What assurances does a letter of credit provide to the buyer and the seller involved in the transaction?

22-11. VIDEO QUESTION

Go to this text's Web site at academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson and select

LAW ON THE WEB

For updated links to resources available on the Web, as well as a variety of other materials, visit this text's Web site at

academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson

To find information on the UCC, including the UCC provisions discussed in this chapter, refer to the Web sites listed in the Law on the Web section in Chapter 20.

For access to materials and articles concerning the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (CISG), go to the Institute of International Commercial Law's Web site at www.cisg.law.pace.edu/cisg/text/cisgint.html

Legal Research Exercises on the Web

Go to academic.cengage.com/blaw/clarkson, the Web site that accompanies this text. Select “Chapter 22” and click on “Internet Exercises.” There you will find the following Internet research exercises that you can perform to learn more about the topics covered in this chapter.

Internet Exercise 22-1: Legal Perspective
International Performance Requirements

Internet Exercise 22-2: Social Perspective
Lemon Laws

Internet Exercise 22-3: Management Perspective
The Right to Reject Goods

CHAPTER 23

Warranties and Product Liability

Warranty is an age-old concept. In sales and lease law, a warranty is an assurance by one party of the existence of a fact on which the other party can rely. Article 2 (on sales) and Article 2A (on leases) of the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) designate several types of warranties that can arise in a sales or lease contract. These warranties include warranties of title, express warranties, and implied warranties. We examine each of these types of warranties in this chapter.

Because a warranty imposes a duty on the seller or lessor, a breach of warranty is a breach of the seller's or lessor's promise.

Assuming that the parties have not agreed to limit or modify the remedies available, if the seller or lessor breaches a warranty, the buyer or lessee can sue to recover damages from the seller or lessor. Under some circumstances, a breach of warranty can allow the buyer or lessee to rescind (cancel) the agreement.¹

Breach of warranty actions are a subset of product liability claims. Product liability encompasses the contract theory of warranty, as well as the tort theories of negligence, misrepresentation, and strict liability (discussed in Chapters 6 and 7). Manufacturers and sellers of goods can be held liable for products that are defective or unreasonably dangerous. Goods can be defective in a number of ways, including manufacturing defects, design defects, and inadequate warnings. We examine product liability in the second part of the chapter. Because warranty law protects buyers, some of whom are consumers, warranty law is also part of the broad body of consumer protection law that will be discussed in Chapter 44.

1. Rescission restores the parties to the positions they were in before the contract was made.

Types of Warranties

Most goods are covered by some type of warranty designed to protect buyers. Articles 2 and 2A of the UCC designate several types of warranties that can arise in a sales or lease contract, including warranties of title, express warranties, and implied warranties. We discuss these types of warranties in the following subsections, as well as a federal statute that is designed to prevent deception and make warranties more understandable.

Warranties of Title

Title warranty arises automatically in most sales contracts. The UCC imposes the three types of warranties of title discussed here [UCC 2-312, 2A-211].

Good Title In most sales, sellers warrant that they have good and valid title to the goods sold and that the transfer of the title is rightful [UCC 2-312(1)(a)]. Suppose that Alexis steals goods from Camden and sells them to Ona, who does not know that they are stolen. If Camden discovers that Ona has the goods, then he has the right to reclaim them from Ona. When Alexis sold Ona the goods, Alexis automatically warranted to Ona that the title conveyed was valid and that its transfer was rightful. Because a thief has no title to stolen goods, Alexis breached the warranty of title imposed by UCC 2-312(1)(a) and became liable to the buyer for appropriate damages. (See Chapter 21 on pages 423–427 for a detailed discussion of sales by nonowners.)

No Liens A second warranty of title protects buyers who are unaware of any encumbrances (claims, charges, or liabilities—usually called *liens*²) against goods at the time the contract is made [UCC 2-312(1)(b)]. This warranty protects buyers who, for example, unknowingly purchase goods that are subject to a creditor's security interest (a security interest in this context is an interest in the goods that secures payment or performance of an obligation—see Chapter 29). If a creditor legally repossesses the goods from a buyer who had no actual knowledge of the security interest, the buyer can recover from the seller for breach of warranty. (A buyer who has actual knowledge of a security interest has no recourse against a seller.)

Consider an example. Henderson buys a used boat from Loring for cash. A month later, Barish proves that she has a valid security interest in the boat and that Loring, who has missed five payments, is in default. Barish then repossesses the boat from Henderson. Henderson demands his cash back from Loring. Under Section 2-312(1)(b), Henderson has legal grounds to recover from Loring because the seller of goods warrants that the goods are delivered free from any security interest or other lien of which the buyer has no knowledge.

Article 2A affords similar protection for lessees. Section 2A-211(1) provides that during the term of the lease, no claim of any third party will interfere with the lessee's enjoyment of the leasehold interest.

No Infringements A merchant-seller is also deemed to warrant that the goods delivered are free from any copyright, trademark, or patent claims of a third person³ [UCC 2-312(3), 2A-211(2)]. If this warranty is breached and the buyer is sued by the party holding copyright, trademark, or patent rights in the goods, the buyer must notify the seller of the litigation within a reasonable time to enable the seller to decide whether to defend the lawsuit. If the seller states in a writing (or record) that she or he has decided to defend and agrees to bear all expenses, then the buyer must turn over control of the litigation to the seller; otherwise, the buyer is barred from any remedy against the seller for liability established by the litigation [UCC 2-607(3)(b), 2-607(5)(b)].

2. Pronounced leens. Liens will be discussed in detail in Chapter 28.

3. Recall from Chapter 20 that a merchant is defined in UCC 2-104(1) as a person who deals in goods of the kind involved in the sales contract or who, by occupation, presents himself or herself as having knowledge or skill peculiar to the goods involved in the transaction.

In situations that involve leases rather than sales, Article 2A provides for the same notice of infringement litigation [UCC 2A-516(3)(b), 2A-516(4)(b)]. There is an exception for leases to individual consumers for personal, family, or household purposes. A consumer who fails to notify the lessor within a reasonable time does not lose his or her remedy against the lessor for whatever liability is established in the litigation [UCC 2A-516(3)(b)].

Disclaimer of Title Warranty In an ordinary sales transaction, the title warranty can be disclaimed or modified only by specific language in a contract. For example, sellers may assert that they are transferring only such rights, title, and interest as they have in the goods. In a lease transaction, the disclaimer must “be specific, be by a writing, and be conspicuous” [UCC 2A-214(4)].⁴

In certain situations, the circumstances surrounding the sale are sufficient to indicate clearly to a buyer that no assurances as to title are being made. The classic example is a sheriff's sale; in this situation, buyers know that the goods have been seized to satisfy debts and that the sheriff cannot guarantee title [UCC 2-312(2)].

Express Warranties

A seller or lessor can create an express warranty by making representations concerning the quality, condition, description, or performance potential of the goods. Under UCC 2-313 and 2A-210, express warranties arise when a seller or lessor indicates any of the following:

1. That the goods conform to any affirmation (declaration) of fact or promise that the seller or lessor makes to the buyer or lessee about the goods. Such affirmations or promises are usually made during the bargaining process. Statements such as “these drill bits will easily penetrate stainless steel—and without dulling” are express warranties.
2. That the goods conform to any description of them. For example, a label that reads “Crate contains one

4. Note that although the 2003 amendments to Articles 2 and 2A have not been adopted in any state, some states, such as Connecticut, have passed legislation that expressly allows warranty disclaimers via electronic record. See Connecticut Statutes Section 42a-2A-214. Even in states that have not passed such legislation, electronic records are likely to satisfy the writing requirement for disclaimers (under the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act, discussed in Chapter 19).

150-horsepower diesel engine” or a contract that calls for the delivery of a “wool coat” creates an express warranty that the content of the goods sold conforms to the description.

3. That the goods conform to any sample or model of the goods shown to the buyer or lessee.

Express warranties can be found in a seller’s or lessor’s advertisement, brochure, or promotional materials, in addition to being made orally or in an express warranty provision in a sales or lease contract.

Basis of the Bargain To create an express warranty, a seller or lessor does not have to use formal words such as warrant or guarantee. It is only necessary that a reasonable buyer or lessee would regard the representation as being part of the basis of the bargain [UCC 2–313(2), 2A–210(2)]. Just what constitutes the basis of the bargain is hard to say. The UCC does not define the concept, and it is a question of fact in each case whether a representation was made at such a time and in such a way that it induced the buyer or lessee to enter into the contract. Therefore, if an express warranty is not intended, the marketing agent or salesperson should not promise too much.

Statements of Opinion and Value Only statements of fact create express warranties. A seller or lessor who makes a statement merely relating to the value or worth of the goods, or states an opinion about or recommends the goods, is not creating an express warranty [UCC 2–313(2), 2A–210(2)].

For example, suppose that a seller claims that “this is the best used car to come along in years; it has four new tires and a 250-horsepower engine just rebuilt this year.” The seller has made several affirmations of fact that can create a warranty: the automobile has an engine; it has a 250-horsepower engine; the engine was rebuilt this year; there are four tires on the automobile; and the tires are new. The seller’s opinion that the vehicle is “the best used car to come along in years,” however, is known as “puffing” and creates no warranty. (Puffing is an expression of opinion by a seller or lessor that is not made as a representation of fact.) A statement relating to the value of the goods, such as “it’s worth a fortune” or “anywhere else you’d pay $10,000 for it,” usually does not create a warranty.

An Exception for Statements of Opinion by Experts. Although an ordinary seller or lessor can give an opinion that is not a warranty, if the seller or lessor is an expert and gives an opinion as an expert to a layperson, then a warranty may be created. For example, Saul is an art dealer and an expert in eighteenth-century paintings. If Saul states to Lauren, a purchaser, that in his opinion a particular painting is a Rembrandt, Saul has warranted the accuracy of his opinion.

Puffery versus Express Warranties. It is not always easy to determine what constitutes an express warranty and what constitutes puffing. The reasonableness of the buyer’s or lessee’s reliance appears to be the controlling criterion in many cases. For example, a salesperson’s statements that a ladder will “never break” and will “last a lifetime” are so clearly improbable that no reasonable buyer should rely on them. Additionally, the context in which a statement is made may be relevant in determining the reasonableness of a buyer’s or lessee’s reliance. A reasonable person is more likely to rely on a written statement made in an advertisement than on a statement made orally by a salesperson.

For example, in one case a tobacco farmer had read an ad stating that Chlor-O-Pic was a chemical fumigant that would suppress black shank disease, a fungal disease that destroys tobacco crops. The ad specifically indicated how much of the product should be applied per acre and stated that, if applied as directed, Chlor-O-Pic would give “season-long control with application in fall, winter, or spring.” The farmer bought eight thousand pounds of Chlor-O-Pic and applied it as directed to 143 acres of his tobacco crop. Nonetheless, the crop developed black shank disease, resulting in an estimated loss of three thousand pounds of tobacco per acre. When the farmer sued the manufacturer of Chlor-O-Pic, he argued that he had purchased the product in reliance on what he assumed to be a “strong promise” of “season-long control.” In this case, the jury agreed with the farmer. The manufacturer had indeed made a strong promise—one that created an express warranty.⁵

Implied Warranties

An implied warranty is one that the law derives by inference from the nature of the transaction or the relative situations or circumstances of the parties. Under the UCC, merchants impliedly warrant that the goods they sell or lease are merchantable and, in certain circumstances, fit for a particular purpose. In addition, an implied warranty may arise from a course of dealing or usage of trade. We examine these three types of implied warranties in the following subsections.

5. Triple E, Inc. v. Hendrix & Dail, Inc., 344 S.C. 186, 543 S.E.2d 245 (2001). See also Nomo Agroindustrial Sa De CV v. Enza Zaden North America, Inc., 492 F.Supp.2d 1175 (D.Ariz. 2007).

Implied Warranty of Merchantability Every sale or lease of goods made by a merchant who deals in goods of the kind sold or leased automatically gives rise to an implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2-314, 2A-212]. Thus, a merchant who is in the business of selling ski equipment makes an implied warranty of merchantability every time he sells a pair of skis. A neighbor selling her skis at a garage sale does not (because she is not in the business of selling goods of this type).

Merchantable Goods. To be merchantable, goods must be “reasonably fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used.” They must be of at least average, fair, or medium-grade quality. The quality must be comparable to quality that will pass without objection in the trade or market for goods of the same description. To be merchantable, the goods must also be adequately packaged and labeled, and they must conform to the promises or affirmations of fact made on the container or label, if any.

The warranty of merchantability may be breached even though the merchant did not know or could not have discovered that a product was defective (not merchantable). For example, suppose that Christianson contracts to purchase a log home package from Milde, a log home dealer. The dealer provides the logs and other materials and constructs the home. Immediately after Christianson moves into the house, she finds that the exterior walls leak when it rains, staining and discoloring the interior walls, due to a defective waterproofing product used on the logs. Even though Milde did not know that the waterproofing product was defective, he can be held liable because the waterproofing product was not reasonably fit for its ordinary purpose (making the house waterproof).

Of course, merchants are not absolute insurers against all accidents arising in connection with the goods. For example, a bar of soap is not unmerchantable merely because a user could slip and fall by stepping on it.

If the buyer of a product that requires a significant number of repairs sells the item before filing a complaint against its manufacturer, is the sale evidence of the good’s merchantability? That was the question in the following case.

C A S E 23.1 Shoop v. DaimlerChrysler Corp.

Appellate Court of Illinois, First District, Fourth Division, 2007.
371 Ill.App.3d 1058, 864 N.E.2d 785, 309 Ill.Dec. 544.

● Company Profile In 1920, Walter Chrysler, the head of manufacturing operations for General Motors Corporation (GMC), was dissatisfied with its management and quit. He took over Maxwell Motor Company and renamed it Chrysler Corporation. For most of its history, Chrysler’s vehicles have been the third best selling of the “Big 3” U.S. automakers—GMC, Ford Motor Company, and Chrysler. In 1998, Germany’s Mercedes-Benz maker Daimler-Benz AG bought Chrysler and created DaimlerChrysler AG. The new entity proved less successful than its investors hoped, and in 2007, Chrysler was sold to Cerberus Capital Management, which renamed it Chrysler, LLC (www.chrysler.com). Its vehicles are made and sold under the Chrysler, Dodge, Jeep, and Mopar brands.

● Background and Facts In April 2002, Darrell Shoop bought a 2002 Dodge Dakota truck for $28,000 from Dempsey Dodge in Chicago, Illinois. DaimlerChrysler Corporation had manufactured the Dakota. Problems with the truck arose almost immediately. Defects in the engine, suspension, steering, transmission, and other components required repairs twelve times within the first eighteen months, including at least five times for the same defect, which remained uncorrected. In May 2005, after having driven the Dakota 39,000 miles, Shoop accepted $16,500 for the trade-in value of the truck as part of a purchase of a new vehicle. At the time, a comparable vehicle in average condition would have had an average trade-in value of $14,425 and an average retail value of $17,225. Shoop filed a suit in an Illinois state court against DaimlerChrysler, alleging, among other things, a breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. DaimlerChrysler countered, in part, that Shoop’s sale of the Dakota was evidence of its merchantability. The court issued a summary judgment in DaimlerChrysler's favor. Shoop appealed to a state intermediate appellate court.

CASE CONTINUES

CASE 23.1 CONTINUED

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

Justice MURPHY delivered the opinion of the court:

* * * *

Under [S]ection 2-314(c)(2) of the UCC, a product breaches the implied warranty of merchantability if it is not fit for the ordinary purposes for which such goods are used. With regard to automobiles, fitness for the ordinary purpose of driving implies that the vehicle should be in a safe condition and substantially free from defects. Breach of an implied warranty of merchantability may also occur where the warrantor has unsuccessfully attempted to repair or replace defective parts. Whether an implied warranty has been breached is a question of fact. [Emphasis added.]

Defendant contends that the Dakota was fit for the ordinary purpose of driving because plaintiff drove it daily for more than three years after purchase and traded it in for its fair market value. * * * [A] prima facie case [legally sufficient case] that a product was defective and that the defect existed when it left the manufacturer's control is made by proof that in the absence of abnormal use or reasonable secondary causes the product failed to perform in the manner reasonably to be expected in light of its nature and intended function. [In a previous case, the] court found that the only defect of any consequence, a jerking transmission, was remedied, and the plaintiff failed to exclude the buildup of moisture or other materials as a reasonable cause of the problem. Here, however, plaintiff's complaint specifically eliminated any abnormal uses and secondary causes as the source of the defects in the vehicle.

In [a different case], the court rejected the defendant's argument that the implied warranty of merchantability was not breached when the plaintiff drove the vehicle for almost 100,000 miles because the testimony established that the plaintiff had the vehicle serviced no less than six times. In addition, in [another case], the court held that the jury could have concluded that a defective paint job on a new car rendered it unmerchantable as a new car, and in [a fourth case] a question of fact existed as to whether the plaintiff's car was in a safe condition and substantially free of defects when an expert testified that poor gas mileage was consistent with a number of defects.

The amended complaint alleged that plaintiff began experiencing problems with the Dakota's engine, suspension and steering, transmission, and other components of the truck soon after he took possession. Plaintiff was required to take the truck to a Chrysler dealership 12 times within 18 months for repairs, and he alleged that defendant was unable to cure the defects after a reasonable number of attempts. When [Shoop's witness Thomas] Walters test drove the Dakota, he experienced a loping or jerking sensation when he braked at very low speeds. Furthermore, at highway speeds, a steering wheel shimmy with additional vibration was also present when he braked. He also noticed an intermittent single pop noise from the front suspension when he turned left into plaintiff's driveway. Therefore, a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether defendant breached the implied warranty of merchantability.

● Decision and Remedy The state intermediate appellate court concluded that "a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether [DaimlerChrysler] breached the implied warranty of merchantability." The court reversed the lower court's summary judgment and remanded the case for trial.

● The Ethical Dimension Should Shoop's trade-in of the Dakota preclude his recovery in this case? Why or why not?

● The Legal Environment Dimension If Shoop is allowed to recover damages for breach of warranty, what should be the measure of those damages?

Merchantable Food. The UCC treats the serving of food or drink to be consumed on or off the premises as a sale of goods subject to the implied warranty of merchantability [UCC 2-314(1)]. "Merchantable" food is food that is fit to eat on the basis of consumer expectations. For example, the courts assume that consumers should reasonably expect to find on occasion bones in fish fillets, cherry pits in cherry pie, a nutshell in a package of shelled nuts, and the like—because such substances are natural to the ingredients or the finished food product. In contrast, consumers would not reasonably expect to find an inchworm in a can of peas or a piece of glass in a soft drink—because these substances are not natural to the food product. In the following classic case, the court had to determine whether one should reasonably expect to find a fish bone in fish chowder.

C A S E 23.2 Webster v. Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1964. 347 Mass. 421, 198 N.E.2d 309.

- Background and Facts Blue Ship Tea Room, Inc., was located in Boston in an old building overlooking the ocean. Webster, who had been born and raised in New England, went to the restaurant and ordered fish chowder. The chowder was milky in color. After three or four spoonfuls, she felt something lodged in her throat. As a result, she underwent two esophagoscopies; in the second esophagoscopy, a fish bone was found and removed. Webster filed a suit against the restaurant in a Massachusetts state court for breach of the implied warranty of merchantability. The jury rendered a verdict for Webster, and the restaurant appealed to the state's highest court.

IN THE LANGUAGE OF THE COURT

REARDON, Justice.

[The plaintiff] ordered a cup of fish chowder. Presently, there was set before her "a small bowl of fish chowder." * * * After 3 or 4 [spoonfuls] she was aware that something had lodged in her throat because she "couldn't swallow and couldn't clear her throat by gulping and she could feel it." This misadventure led to two esophagoscopies [procedures in which a telescope-like instrument is used to look into the throat] at the Massachusetts General Hospital, in the second of which, on April 27, 1959, a fish bone was found and removed. The sequence of events produced injury to the plaintiff which was not insubstantial.

We must decide whether a fish bone lurking in a fish chowder, about the ingredients of which there is no other complaint, constitutes a breach of implied warranty under applicable provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code * * *. As the judge put it in his charge [jury instruction], "Was the fish chowder fit to be eaten and wholesome? * * * [N]obody is claiming that the fish itself wasn't wholesome. * * * But the bone of contention here—I don't mean that for a pun—but was this fish bone a foreign substance that made the fish chowder unwholesome or not fit to be eaten?"

* * * *

