The cathedral of Turku (Latin Aboa; Swedish Åbo) was consecrated on June 17, 1300. The celebrations were continued on the following day, when the relics of Saint Henry were transferred to the cathedral. Finland was no more a mission field, but an organized diocese, led by the first Finnish-born bishop. The majority of the clergy was educated in the cathedral school of Turku. At this time the first Finns are found in the records of the University of Paris.

The medieval bishops of Turku were, with a few exceptions, members of the Finnish aristocracy and had studied in foreign universities. Most of them were masters of arts from the University of Paris. The bishop had a castle and an armed retinue. He represented the Finns in the Royal Council of Sweden and was assisted by the Cathedral Chapter, which by the end of the Middle Ages contained twelve canons. They elected the bishop, usually one of themselves; took care of the services in the cathedral; and governed the diocese. Most canons had studied abroad. The names of 164 Finns have been found in the records of medieval universities. The Chapter of Turku in most cases covered the costs.

The medieval Church took care of everything that had to do with high culture. The Cathedral school in Turku was not the leading one in Europe, but its curriculum was the same as elsewhere. A young man having learned his Latin there adapted himself without difficulty to the company of masters and students in Paris, Prague, and Leipzig. Nearly all literature used in Finland belonged to the clergy. Most of the extant medieval manuscripts were philosophical, juridical, and theological texts brought back to Finland by the students. The first book for Finland, Missale Aboense, was printed by the order of the Bishop of Turku in Lübeck in 1488.

By the end of the Middle Ages, eighty stone churches had been erected, many of them decorated with frescoes. The Dominicans founded a convent in Turku in 1249 and in Viborg in 1398. The Franciscans did not arrive until the fifteenth century. The monastery of St. Bridget of Sweden, founded in Naantali (Swedish Nådendal) near Turku in 1462, became an important center of spiritual life.

The basic Christian texts were no doubt already translated into Finnish during the mission period. In the late Middle Ages priests were obliged to read the Lord's Prayer, Ten Commandments, Ave Maria, and Apostles' Creed in Finnish from the pulpit every Sunday. They had to have these texts written, although none of them have been preserved.

At the end of the Middle Ages there were some one hundred parishes in Finland. Near Turku the distance between the churches could be only a couple of kilometers. In northern and eastern Finland children were baptized only when they were able to ski to the church.

The Finns during this period were brought up to live with the Church and its sacraments. Donations and wills speak for a devout religiosity. Pilgrimages were made to Vadstena to the grave of St. Bridget, to Santiago de Compostella, to Rome, and to the Holy Land.

The Reformation

The REFORMATION in Sweden was a typical Fürsten-reformation, or Reformation by the Princes, initiated and led by the new king, the powerful and unscrupulous Gustavu Vasa (reigned 1523–1560). He was not very interested in theological issues but saw clearly the political advantages of the new Lutheran teaching, even though it had been declared a heresy. The religious turbulence in GERMANY gave him a pretext to confiscate the property of the church and to crush its political power. The ties to the Holy See were broken by 1523; after that the highest ecclesiastical authority was the king. He wanted to avoid abrupt changes in church ceremonies, which might give cause for opposition and rebellion. This is why the transformation of doctrine, liturgy, church life, and organization was smooth and slow. Importantly, the episcopal structure of the church was left intact.

The king had no interest in culture, which suffered along with the financial position of the church. The young University of Uppsala was closed and the schools fell into decay. On the other hand, the Reformation brought the translation of the New Testament (1526) and the entire BIBLE (1541), as well as several liturgical books, into Swedish. Because most Finns could not understand Swedish, important texts had to be translated into Finnish. Thus the Reformation gave Finns their written language. The Finnish reformer MICHAEL AGRICOLA is also the father of Finnish literature and the Finnish written language.

Lutheran Orthodoxy

Sweden accepted the AUGSBURG CONFESSION in 1593. The Lutheran Church was the state church. During the age of confessionalism, Sweden was one of the great powers in Europe. During the Thirty Years War the Finns joined the Protestant cause.

In the seventeenth century Sweden expanded its territory to the south and east. In the area conquered from RUSSIA, Ingermanland and Kexholms län, Lutheran ministers tried to convert the Finnish-speaking Greek Orthodox population to Lutheranism, although the religion proved to be stronger than the common language; thousands of Greek Orthodox fled over the border to Russia.

Finland got her own university in 1640. The first hundred years of Academia Aboensis left no mark on the history of learning and science, although the university offered better opportunities for the education of the clergy. The bishop of Turku was the vicechancellor of the university, and the three professors of theology were members of the Cathedral Chapter. A printing press was founded in Turku in 1642.

During the period of Lutheran Orthodoxy, the church had a cultural monopoly similar to that of the Middle Ages. The church preached loyalty to the sovereign, instilled a strong sense of Christian morality in the people, and taught the Finns to read. To know the main articles of the CATECHISM by heart was a precondition for confirmation and thus also for marriage. In western parts of the country most people had that kind of literacy at the end of seventeenth century. Devotional literature (e.g., JOHANN ARNDT) was translated into Finnish and printed.

The Age of Pietism and the Enlightenment

During the eighteenth century the Finnish Church was known for Lutheran Orthodoxy, PIETISM, and ENLIGHTENMENT. Johannes Gezelius the Younger, who became bishop of Turku in 1690, visited as a student the eminent pietist PHILIPP JACOB SPENER in Frankfurt and translated his Pia Desideria into Swedish. The manuscript was, however, left unprinted. Pietism made its appearance in Sweden and in Turku first in radical form, prompting the bishops to oppose it. In 1726 the Diet of Estates issued the so-called Conventicle Placard, which prohibited devotional meetings led by laymen, a hallmark of Pietism. It remained in force in Finland until 1870.

Measures against Pietism were of no use. A popular ecstatic REVIVAL broke out in the Turku region. At first the revival manifested itself in ecstatic physical phenomena, including shaking and crying. The pastors, however, managed to keep the revival movement within the old and staple church Christianity.

The eighteenth century in Sweden was the age of the Nordic Enlightenment, a golden era of learning in the natural sciences and economics. In fact, most of the bishops of Turku at that time were natural scientists, two of them having been students of Carl von Linné. Practical church life centered on the vicar as a paternal leader in his parish; people went to him for advice in secular matters as well. His duty was to seek the welfare of the people. Useful unknown plants, above all the potato, first appeared in the vegetable gardens of parsonages. New cultivation techniques, such as ditching marshlands, also began to spread from parsonages.

In the Russian Empire

In 1809 Finland became a Grand Duchy in the Russian Empire. Czar Alexander I promised to respect the constitution and the laws of the previous Swedish rule—the constitution secured the supreme power of the monarch. The czar was the head of the Greek Orthodox Church of Russia, but he pledged to maintain the Lutheran faith in Finland. The union of throne and altar continued in force, even though the throne had moved from Stockholm to St. Petersburg. The bishop of Turku, who had proved his loyalty to the new ruler, was rewarded with a title of archbishop at the time of the Reformation celebrations in 1817.

The church was loyal to the czar. The bishops (a third diocese for northern Finland was established in 1850) kept the Pietist revival movements under close surveillance. These movements emerged at the beginning of the nineteenth century and remained typical for the religious life in Finland. At first they were opposed by both the state and the leading clergy who feared that they would cause political unrest.

Czar Alexander II succeeded to the imperial throne in 1855 and agreed to liberal reforms in Finland. A new Ecclesiastical Law of 1869 was drafted by Frans Ludvig Schauman, professor of practical theology. This law applied not to all citizens but only to the members of the Lutheran Church. The principle of the confessional (Lutheran) character of the state was dropped. Because it was politically impossible to grant religious freedom to the Greek Orthodox, who belonged to the Church of Russia, religious freedom was not established. In 1889 Lutherans were allowed to leave their church and to join other Protestant churches, which in practice meant BAPTISTS and METHODISTS.

The Ecclesiastical Law established a SYNOD as a legislative body. It consisted of clergy and laymen, the latter being in the majority. The synod was given the power to enact and change the Ecclesiastical Law. Bills needed the approval of the Diet and the sovereign, but they did not have the right to change the proposals; so the Finnish Church reached greater independence from the state than its sister churches in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.

The Church in Independent Finland

Finland became independent in 1917. In the following year a civil war broke out between “the reds” and “the whites,” and it ended with the victory of the “white” Finland. It was also a war of classes, and the clergy had taken sides with the whites. This guaranteed a strong position for the church in the 1920s and 1930s, but the connection with the working class remained cold. Information on the position of the church in the Soviet Union made the clergy even more suspicious.

A law dealing with religious freedom was promulgated in 1923, although it never caused the much feared mass exodus from the church; in 1923 less than 20,000 people left the church. Afterward the figure sank to a couple of thousand annually. Religious freedom thus secured the position of the church; it remained a people’s church, even though membership was voluntary.

The ecumenical movement reached Finland at the end of the nineteenth century through Christian student and youth movements. Finns were represented in the Life and Work Conference in Stockholm in 1925, but unofficially. Gustaf Johansson, the conservative archbishop of Turku until 1930, did not endorse the “worldly” movement, but after his retirement the situation changed. The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland was one of the founding members of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and has carried on doctrinal dialogues with other churches, such as the Russian Orthodox Church. The dialogue with the Anglican Church was initiated in the 1930s, and the Porvoo Communion was agreed upon between 1989 and 1992.

The Winter War (1939–1940) against the Soviet Union united the Finnish people and healed the wounds of the civil war. The war—felt to be fought for “home, religion and fatherland”—strengthened the position of the church. Military chaplains saw that the soldiers were more religious than they had thought. On the other hand, the service activity of the church in a crisis removed old prejudices.

In the insecure post-World War II atmosphere the church came to be seen as protector of the national identity. In 1946 the Social Democratic party removed from its program the traditional goal of separating state and church and ending religious education in school. The church assumed new tasks such as family counseling. Social work expanded rapidly, as did youth work.

In the 1960s the Finnish church was branded undemocratic and conservative, but since the collapse of COMMUNISM at the end of the twentieth century a new interest in religion has been apparent. The old revival movements have become stronger. The interest of MASS MEDIA in religious life has increased. Churches still have their say in Finnish society. For example, when issues such as human dignity and HUMAN RIGHTS, the moral values of the nation, or development of the environment are discussed, the churches of Finland do participate vigorously with their own contributions and solutions.

At the beginning of the new millennium Finland was still de facto a country of one confession. Eightyfive percent of the population belongs to the Evangelical Lutheran Church. It is a state church, although the remaining bonds between state and church are very loose and the church would like to be called a people’s church rather than a state church. Church attendance is low as in other Scandinavian countries. Approximately 10 percent of church members attend a church service at least once a month. Ninety percent of babies are baptized, and 92 percent of the fifteen-year-old age group attend confirmation classes. Both numbers are higher than the membership figures of the church.

In the aftermath of the Russian Revolution and Finnish Independence (1917) the ties of the Finnish Orthodox Church with the patriarchate of Moscow were cut, and in 1923 the Finnish Orthodox Church received autonomous status under the patriarchate of Constantinople. During the Second World War some 70 percent of its members had to leave their homes. The period after the war was a period of vigorous rebuilding, with the state building churches, vicarages, and cemeteries. The Finnish Orthodox Church has about fifty thousand members.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Helsinki was established in 1955. It consists of seven parishes, with about eight thousand members, the majority of them living in Helsinki and the other major cities of southern Finland. The majority of priests and nuns come from the NETHERLANDS and POLAND.

Anglo-American Christianity spread to Finland during the nineteenth century, and Baptists, Methodists, the SALVATION ARMY, and SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST churches were established in the country. Their membership remains less than 1 percent of the total population. Pentecostal communities have approximately fifty thousand members.

References and Further Reading

- Heininen, Simo, and Markku Heikkiä. Kirchengeschichte Finnlands. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002.
- Heino, Harri. "Religion and Churches in Finland." Finfo 10 (1998). [Published by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, Helsinki.]
- The Churches in Finland*. Helsinki: The Office for Foreign Relations, The Evangelical Church of Finland, 1996. <http://www.evl.fi/>

SIMO HEININEN

FINLEY, ROBERT (1772–1817)

American clergy. Finley was born in 1772, graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1787, and began a teaching career. Five years later he decided to enter the ministry and returned to his alma mater to study theology under JOHN WITHERSPOON. Finley pastored a New Jersey congregation for almost twenty-two years while also fostering his interests in pedagogy. He ran a school for boys and influenced school curricula to include biblical instruction. Finley also saw SLAVERY as a problem of educational methodology. Subsequently he became involved in issues of race.

In 1816 Finley traveled to Washington, D.C. to promote his plan: Thoughts on the Colonization of Free Blacks. He proposed to address the status of free blacks by forming an organization that would transport them to an African colony. Colonization as an idea had been considered for more than thirty years before and others participated alongside Finley for the cause. Finley's activities, however, led public opinion on the matter and attracted the attention of influential government leaders.

After the AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY was approved with Finley as a coordinator, he returned to New Jersey and endured ridicule for his cause. Returning to his interest in education, Finley resigned from his pastorate in 1817 and accepted a position as the president of the University of Georgia. Falling ill of a fever, he died the same year.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Finley, Robert. Thoughts on the Colonization of Free Blacks. Washington, D.C.: 1816.

Secondary Sources:

Brown, Isaac V. Memoir of the Reverend Robert Finley. New Brunswick, NJ: Terhune and Leston, 1819.

Egerton, Douglas R. "'Its Origin is not a little Curious': A New Look at the American Colonization Society." Journal of the Early Republic 5 no. 4 (1985): 463–480.

HOWELL WILLIAMS

FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON (1792–1875)

American revivalist. Finney was a prominent figure of the Second Great Awakening who scholars consider to be the “father of modern revivalism.” Born in Warren, Connecticut, in 1792, Finney’s family migrated west-ward to upstate New York and settled first in Oneida and later in Jefferson County. After a brief law career, he experienced CONVERSION in 1821 and soon dedicated his time to studying theology with Presbyterian minister George W. Gale in Adams, NY. The Presbytery of St. Lawrence licensed him in 1823.

Finney brought the atmosphere of the rural CAMP MEETING revivals to the growing urban population. He delivered his message using a PREACHING style called “new measures” that blended his theological and legal training. He sparked REVIVALS throughout western New York in the 1820s. Abandoning conventional Sunday sermons, Finney preached on consecutive nights in a community for several weeks. His insistence on the human agency of conversions eventually led him away from PRESBYTERIANISM to CONGREGATIONALISM.

Finney settled in New York City in 1832, where he preached at the Second Free Presbyterian Church, and later the Congregationalist Broadway Tabernacle from 1834 to 1837. He accepted a position on the faculty at Oberlin College, Ohio in 1835, where he moved permanently in 1837. Finney served as President of Oberlin from 1851 to 1866. He died in Oberlin on August 16, 1875.

Finney’s urban EVANGELISM profoundly shaped the Protestant experience in the UNITED STATES. His theology is outlined in his Lectures on Revivals (1835) and Lectures on Systematic Theology (1847). Several books of his sermons were published posthumously.

References and Further Reading

- Cross, Whitney R. The Burned-Over District: The Social and Intellectual History of Enthusiastic Religion in Western New York, 1800–1850. New York: Harper and Row, 1965.
- Hambrick-Stowe, Charles. Charles G. Finney and the Spirit of American Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996.
- Weddle, David L. The Law as Gospel: Revival and Reform in the Theology of Charles G. Finney. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1985.

LEE L. WILLIS, III

FIRST AMENDMENT

See Bill of Rights

FISHER, GEOFFREY FRANCIS (1887–1972)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Fisher was born in Nuneaton in the county of Warwickshire, ENGLAND, in 1887. Educated at Oxford, he was ordained as a priest in 1913. He was a headmaster at Repton School in Derby County from 1914 to 1932. Upon retirement from that post, he was named bishop of Chester. He became bishop of London in 1939, a position he maintained through World War II.

Fisher was appointed the CHURCH OF ENGLAND'S ninety-ninth archbishop of Canterbury in 1945, a position he was to hold until his retirement in 1961. A strong advocate of ECUMENISM, Fisher was the chairperson of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES founding assembly in Amsterdam in 1948. He served as that organization's first president from 1948 to 1954.

In 1959, during a five week tour of INDIA, JAPAN, and KOREA, Fisher conducted the first official visit ever paid by an archbishop of Canterbury to Asian dioceses of the Anglican Communion. The following year, he traveled to the Vatican to meet with Pope John XXIII, becoming the first archbishop of Canterbury to visit the Pope since 1397. That same year he visited the Orthodox patriarchs of Jerusalem and Constantinople (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN).

In 1961 Fisher was made baron of Lambeth, and he retired to the seaside county of Dorset. He died in 1972.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Fisher, Geoffrey Francis. The Archbishop Speaks: Addresses and Speeches by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Most Reverend Geoffrey Francis Fisher. London: Evans Brothers, 1958.

———. Touching on Christian Truth: The Kingdom of God, the Christian Church and the World. Oxford, UK: A.R. Mowbray, 1971.

Secondary Source:

Carpenter, Edward. Archbishop Fisher: His Life and Times. Norwich, UK: Canterbury Press, 1991.

HELEN FARLEY

FISK, WILBUR (1792–1839)

American Methodist minister and educator. Born in Vermont August 31, 1792, the son of a farmer, Fisk was educated at the University of Vermont and Brown University, graduating in 1815. After attending a CAMP MEETING and having a spiritual experience that led him to a PREACHING ministry, he was ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1822, serving in circuits in Vermont and Massachusetts. However, ill health affected his ministry and he declined offers of election as bishop. In 1826 he was appointed principal of Wilbraham Wesleyan Academy, one of a growing number of Methodist schools whose cause he championed. His ministry thereafter was dedicated to the support of education and tract societies in the work of mission.

In 1831 Fisk became the first president of a chartered Methodist (Wesleyan) University at Middle-town, Connecticut where he served until his death in 1839. He viewed his institution as a place where “morality and religion” were to be taught, not through proselytism but by Christian example in teaching through a broad liberal education. He was, through his pattern of life and conversation, the means of the CONVERSION of many students. He initiated a wave of development of theological education in METHODISM, with his dictum that “a cultivated church will have a cultivated ministry.” His dying words were: “Education must go hand in hand with religion or the world will never be converted.”

As one of American Methodism’s first theologians he was a keen controversialist, writing Calvinistic Controversy in defense of ARMINIANISM in 1835. He was a fierce advocate of TEMPERANCE. In the SLAVERY debate he upset fellow Methodists by not aligning with abolitionists, favoring colonization instead, and was subject to much criticism in the North East Conference. His work became more widely known after a visit to Europe in 1835. He died February 22, 1839 after a short illness.

References and Further Reading

Prentice, George. Wilbur Fisk. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1890.

TIM MACQUIBAN

FLACIUS, MATTHIAS ILLYRICUS (1520–1575)

Lutheran theologian. Born to an Istrian Italo-Croatian family, drawn into evangelical-humanistic circles in Venice as a youth, Flacius's spiritual crisis brought him to study at Basel, Tübingen, and Wittenberg. MARTIN LUTHER'S counsel gave him peace. Recognition of his theological aptitude won him Wittenberg's professorship of Hebrew (1544). When colleagues, led by PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, supported the compromising position of the so-called Leipzig Interim in 1549, Flacius resigned in protest against what he considered a betrayal of the gospel and Luther. He quickly became the intellectual leader of the "GNESIO-LUTHERANS" gathered in Magdeburg, the center of resistance to imperial, electoral Saxon church policy and "Philippist" theology, particularly on issues of public confession of faith in relation to ADIAPHORA, good works in the Christian life, and the freedom of the will.

Called to the University of Jena (1557), he fell into controversy with his colleague Viktorin Strigel on freedom of the will and with Duke Johann Friedrich the Middler on princely power in church affairs. Dismissed from his professorship, he joined NIKOLAUS GALLUS in Regensburg (1562–1566), aided Lutherans in Antwerp (1566–1567), and lived as a private scholar in Strasbourg and Frankfurt/Main. His oft-reprinted Clavis sacrae scriptura (1567) laid the foundations for Protestant hermeneutics; his New Testament Glossa (1570) incorporated Lutheran insights into the form of medieval biblical commentary. His Catalogus testium veritatis (1556) gathered patristic evidence against the papacy, modeling use of historical materials for polemical purposes. His leadership shaped the Magdeburg Centuries, the church history composed by Johannes Wigand and Matthaeus Judex (1559–1574). His radical interpretation of Luther's THEOLOGY, especially his definition of original SIN as the essence or substance of sinners, alienated him from most, even in his own circle.

See also Gallus, Nikolaus; Gnesio-Lutherans; Luther, Martin; Melanchthon, Philipp

References and Further Reading

Olson, Oliver K. Matthias Flacius and the Survival of Luther's Reform. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz, 2002.

Preger, Wilhelm. Matthias Flacius Illyricus und seine Zeit. 2 vols. Munich, Germany: Blaesing, 1859, 1861.

ROBERT KOLB

FONTAINEBLEAU, EDICT OF

Issued by French King Louis XIV on October 17, 1685, the Edict of Fontainebleau revoked the Edict of Nantes. It declared CALVINISM illegal in FRANCE and led to the HUGUENOT exodus from France.

In 1598, King Henry IV issued the Edict of Nantes out of political necessity. It brought an end to nearly three decades of religiously motivated civil and political strife, when it became obvious that Calvinism was not strong enough to become the authorized religion in France. The Edict of Nantes created an uneasy truce; it did not, however, settle any major issues. By the mid-seventeenth century (largely because of the Revolution and CIVIL WAR in ENGLAND), Calvinism had become identified with Republicanism. For Louis XIV, the Calvinists represented a religious and political threat to his absolutist ideals and a religious threat to his Catholic Church.

The Edict of Fontainebleau is comprised of only twelve articles. Article 1 formally revoked the Edict of Nantes and ordered the destruction of all R.P.R. (Religion prétendue réformée—"The Allegedly Reformed," as they were called by Catholics) churches. Articles 2 and 3 forbade Reformed worship either in private or in public by commoners or the nobility. Articles 4, 5, and 6 dealt with Reformed CLERGY. Those not accepting the Catholic faith were given fifteen days to leave the country. To make CONVERSION to Catholicism more appealing, clergy were granted generous benefits, and the transition from pastor to attorney was made easier. Articles 7 and 8 dealt with children and required Catholic BAPTISM and the closing of Protestant schools. Article 9 allowed for the repatriation of R.P.R. émigrés during a fourmonth clemency. After that, their property was to be confiscated. Article 10 provided for severe punishment for Calvinists attempting to leave France. Article 11 concerned relapsed Catholics. Article 12, finally, allowed Calvinists "freedom of conscience." The king seemed unwilling to force Calvinists to practice Catholicism.

Despite the threat of punishment, Huguenots fled France by the tens of thousands. They migrated to the United Provinces, GERMANY (notably Prussia), Great Britain, SWITZERLAND, and the American Colonies.

References and Further Reading

Golden, R., ed. The Huguenot Connection: the Edict of Nantes, its Revocation, and Early French Migration to South Carolina. Dordrecht: M.Nijhoff, 1988.

Labrousse, Elisabeth. Une Foi, Une Loi, Un Roi? Geneva, Switzerland: Labor et Fides, 1985.

DAVID WHITFORD

FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR (1848–1921)

British theologian. Forsyth was one of the most influential British Protestant theologians of the early twentieth century. A gifted pastor and educator, he was also a prodigious theological scholar who published some twenty-five books, several hundred articles, and a number of other lesser works (although he resisted the temptation to write a formal, systematic theology), which contributed to the religious debates of his own time. It was only after his death, however, especially after two World Wars had wreaked devastation in Europe, that his THEOLOGY achieved both popular and critical acclaim.

Theological Foundations

Of Scottish birth and ancestry, Forsyth studied classical literature and moral philosophy in his native country before traveling to GERMANY to sit at the feet of the great Protestant theologian ALBRECHT RITSCHL. Although raised within the liberal tradition of Ritschl and GEORG W.F. HEGEL, Forsyth's theology came into its own only as he began to distance himself imperceptibly from the LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM of his youth, then very much in the ascendancy. The catalyst that initiated this important transformation in his religious thinking was never made entirely clear, although it appears to have centered on two primary convictions. First, Forsyth came to believe that his own sinfulness had rendered futile any effort to know God and to advance God's kingdom on earth. Second, he concluded that the serious business of "real life" had not been well served by the principal tenets of liberal Protestantism: liberalism, he remarked, was "too sentimental"; it "interpreted the heavenly Fatherhood by the earthly," instead of the other way around; its "ethic was more altruistic than evangelical, more of effort than of faith"; and it "canonized freedom instead of an authority that makes free." Liberalism was, he concluded, "a spent movement" (The Examiner, November 5, 1905:462). In its place, Forsyth embraced an early form of NEO-ORTHODOXY. Although this new theological position has proved difficult to pin down, it could be described as being biblical, positive, and evangelical in nature, although it did not entirely abandon an emphasis on the rational and relational.

The consequence of this spiritual transformation was significant. At a time when evangelical theology had become unfashionable, Forsyth encouraged the church to recover the good news of God's grace, forgiveness, and new life. God offers the world this free gift, Forsyth contended, and it is here—not in the despair of liberalism—that the heart of the Christian life, and of all reality, is found. In advancing these doctrines, Forsyth (as has often been observed) anticipated much of what later emerged in the important work of scholars such as KARL BARTH and C.H.Dodd.

Writings

Forsyth's theology was advanced in numerous books, articles, and lectures. These concentrated principally on three areas: the work and person of Christ, the church and SACRAMENTS, PRAYER and mission. His most influential writings included Positive Preaching and the Modern Mind (1907), in which he commends PREACHING as an act of WORSHIP—a divine/human encounter—that is shared by both preacher and congregation; The Person and Place of Jesus Christ (1909), a stirring account of the mystery of the Incarnation and perhaps Forsyth's most influential publication; The Work of Christ (1910), a confident proclamation of the place of the Cross at the center of all human reality; The Principle of Authority (1913), a major work outlining Forsyth's philosophy of religion and his epistemology; The Justification of God (1916), an attempt to advance a credible theodicy in the midst of the horrors of the First World War; and The Church and the Sacraments (1917), an illustration of the author's growing appreciation for the efficacy of the sacraments of BAPTISM and holy communion.

Biographical

Forsyth was born of modest means at Aberdeen, SCOTLAND on May 12, 1848, the eldest of five children. After graduating from the University of Aberdeen (M.A., 1869) he pursued further studies in theology at the University of Göttingen and at New College, London. In 1876 he was ordained into the Congregational ministry, serving as pastor to five English churches in succession: Shipley, Yorkshire (1876–1880); St. Thomas' Square, Hackney, London (1880–1885); Cheetam Hill, Manchester (1885–1889); Clarendon Park, Leicester (1888–1894); and Emmanuel Church, Cambridge (1894–1901). In 1877 he married Minna Magness (d. 1894), by whom he had one daughter, Jessie; in 1898 he married Bertha Ison. In 1901 he was appointed principal of New College. Four years later he was elected chair of the Congregational Union of ENGLAND and WALES. He made two voyages to the UNITED STATES, in 1899 to address the Congregational assembly being held in Boston, and in 1907 to deliver the LYMAN BEECHER lectures at Yale. In 1910 he became dean of the faculty of theology of the University of London.

By nature Forsyth was practical, compassionate, and energetic, although his health was never robust. He was quick witted, a gifted conversationalist, and (not surprising, given his Celtic origins) deeply passionate and poetic. In many ways he remained something of a populist, disinclined to become involved in the more speculative forms of theology. This may help to explain why he never attained the level of academic fame achieved by less able colleagues. Exhausted by the demands of office, as well as by the moral failure associated with the First World War, Forsyth died on November 11, 1921—Armistice Day.

References and Further Reading

- Bradley, W.L. P.T.Forsyth, The Man and His Work. London: Independent Press, 1952.
- Brown, Robert McAfee. P.T.Forsyth: Prophet for Today. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1952.
- Hart, Trevor, ed. Justice The True and Only Mercy: Essays on the Life and Theology of Peter Taylor Forsyth. Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1995.
- Hunter, A.M. P.T.Forsyth. London: Westminster Press, 1974.
- McCurdy, Leslie. Attributes and Atonement: The Holy Love of God in the Theology of P.T.Forsyth. Carlisle, Cumbria, UK: Paternoster, 1999.
- Miller, Donald G., Brown Barr, and Robert S. Paul. P.T. Forsyth: The Man, The Preachers' Theologian, Prophet for the 20th Century. Pittsburgh, PA: Pickwick Press, 1981.
- Pitt, Clifford S. Church, Ministry and Sacraments. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1983.
- Rogers, John H. The Theology of P.T.Forsyth. London: Independent Press, 1965.

GRAYSON CARTER

FOSDICK, HARRY EMERSON (1878–1969)

American preacher. Fostdick was born in Buffalo, New York, on May 24, 1878 and raised in a pious Baptist family. He had a CONVERSION experience at age seven and decided on a life of Christian service. An excellent student, Fostdick graduated at the top of his class in both high school and college. During his years at Colgate University, he experienced his first serious illness, a depression that challenged his FAITH. The illness returned in his first year at Union Theological Seminary in New York City. He left school, turning first to his fiancée and then to his family. He tried to take his own life, but his father interrupted him, and then found him help. Fostdick entered a sanitarium and then took a trip to ENGLAND. He returned to Union in the fall of 1902, recovered, and with a renewed enthusiasm for the ministry, graduated summa cum laude in 1904. The dark night of his soul led him to a lifelong commitment to pastoral counseling for others facing similar circumstances. The year that he graduated from seminary he married Florence Allen Whitney, who became his lifelong partner and support in ministry.

Fostdick's first pastorate, First Baptist Church in Montclair, New Jersey, set the pattern for his life. He worked hard at his PREACHING, preparing and honing his sermons, and the church grew under his leadership. He believed that preaching and pastoral counseling were closely related and said on occasion that preaching was pastoral counseling on a group scale. He found time to accept a part-time appointment at Union Theological Seminary as a lecturer, to preach at colleges around the nation, to become involved in civic affairs, and to teach in a variety of BIBLE conferences. He published several books, including The Manhood of the Master (1913) and The Meaning of Prayer (1915). The sermons and books were very popular and fixed him in the minds of many in his generation as a leading apologist for the Christian faith.

In 1915 Fostdick left his Montclair pulpit to become the Morris Jesup Professor of Practical Theology at Union Theological Seminary. He was an early advocate of America's entry into World War I and wrote a book in support of the war, titled The Challenge of the Present Crisis. When the UNITED STATES entered the war, he took a leave from Union and went to Europe for a six-month tour of duty as preacher and chaplain under the auspices of the YMCA (see YMCA/ YWCA). His experiences on the front lines and the disillusionment of the postwar era turned him away from war and toward PACIFISM. He later said that his book on the war was the only one he regretted writing. He remained a firm pacifist, even after Pearl Harbor and throughout World War II.

Fosdick made a very important decision in 1918, when he agreed to become the Preaching Minister at First Presbyterian Church in New York City. The placement of a liberal Baptist in one of the most prominent Presbyterian pulpits in the nation brought serious objections from conservative Presbyterians across the land. He became involved in the growing fundamentalist-modernist debate in Protestant life, a debate that raged most vigorously in the two major denominations in his life, the BAPTISTS and the Presbyterians (see PRESBYTERIANISM). In 1922 he preached what became his most famous sermon, "Shall the Fundamentalists Win?" This sermon became a national benchmark of the theological debate, in part because John D. Rockefeller, Jr., arranged to mail a copy to every ordained Protestant minister in America. Two books he wrote in this period added fuel to the theological fire: Christianity and Progress (1922) and The Modern Use of the Bible (1924). As the debate heated up, the leadership of "Old First" refused to ask him to resign. His status eventually became an issue for the General Assembly of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U.S.A. which invited him to join the Presbyterian Church on condition that he adhere to the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH.

Faced with many conflicting choices, Fosdick decided to resign from First Presbyterian Church and accept a call to be pastor of Park Avenue Baptist Church in New York City. The congregation, with the support of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., soon moved to a new site on Morningside Heights. The grand gothicstyle Riverside Church opened in 1931, and with Fosdick in the pulpit became one of the major centers of Protestant worship. He preached at Riverside and taught at nearby Union Theological Seminary until his retirement from both places in 1946.

At Park Avenue and Riverside, Fosdick assumed a wide variety of leadership roles in Protestant life. Crowds lined up waiting to get into church to hear him preach, typically filling the cavernous sanctuary of Riverside. In 1927 he launched the "National Vespers Hour," a radio ministry, and quickly became the leading radio preacher in the nation. He continued to write extensively, including A Guide to Understanding the Bible (1938). His hymns include the popular "God of Grace and God of Glory" (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). His work in pastoral counseling led him to the study and use of psychological insights in his work and to the publication of On Being a Real Person (1943). A SOCIAL GOSPEL advocate throughout his ministry, he sustained his interest in racial and economic justice issues during his Riverside years and supported the birth-control movement. His voice on these issues was an important one even though he rarely took prophetic positions. He was alert to winds of theological change in the 1930s and announced in an important sermon in 1935 that "The Church Must Go Beyond Modernism." He led an active life in retirement, during which he published his autobiography, The Living of These Days (1956).

Fosdick died on October 5, 1969. He is known as one of the most prominent leaders of liberal Protestantism in America in the first half of the twentieth century and arguably the best-known American preacher and pastor of his generation.

See also Fundamentalism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Modernism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Archival collections are: The Fosdick Collection at Union Theological Seminary, New York; Fosdick papers at the Riverside Church, New York; and substantial Fosdick materials in the Rockefeller Family and Associates Archives.

Fosdick, Harry Emerson. The Meaning of Prayer. New York; London: Association Press, 1915.

———. Riverside Sermons. New York: Harper, 1958.

———. Dear Dr. Brown: Letters to a Person Perplexed About Religion. New York: Harper, 1961.

Secondary Source:

Miller, Robert Moats. Harry Emerson Fosdick: Preacher, Pastor, Prophet. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1985.

JOHN PIPER

FOX, GEORGE (1624–1691)

Founder of the quaker movement. Englishman George Fox was born in Fenny Drayton in Leicestershire in July 1624 into a religious family, the son of a successful weaver, Christopher Fox, and his wife Mary, née Lago. A serious and taciturn youth, Fox was intended for the ministry but was instead apprenticed to a shoemaker. When he was about nineteen years old, the hypocritical heavy drinking of his puritan associates initiated in him a protracted spiritual crisis. In September 1643, seemingly unaware of the turmoil of CIVIL WAR that had broken out in the previous August, he began an extended journey in the Midlands and south of England in pursuit of spiritual illumination, but instead experienced acute despair. He sought, in vain, guidance from various ministers of religion, spent time in London in the midst of the English capital's intense religious ferment of the 1640s, and paid two visits to his family in Leicestershire (where an unsuccessful attempt was made to recruit him for military service in the civil war).

Fox continued to look, to no avail, for rescue out of his spiritual dilemmas at the hands of leading godly ministers, but from 1646 on, underwent a set of revelations that slowly began to set him on the road to recovery, although he remained, at that stage, still prone to acute dejection. Included in these insights was a perception that true ministry was not restricted to university-educated clerics and that God did not dwell in churches but in the hearts of the faithful. What he called the "openings" of scripture helped to rescue him from what he termed his condition as a "man of sorrows." Still essentially solitary, from early in 1647 he began a further tour in the Midlands in search of peace of mind, and his depressions began to alternate with exaltations. In the end he found the relief he sought, not in guidance from religious experts, but from a personal encounter with Christ as his savior and guide. Thus Fox acquired what he called a "pure fire" and sense of discernment of truth, giving him deep insights into the creation and the perfectability of humanity. He next felt called to share with others his own newly found son-ship with God and to draw them away from what he saw as the human-centered artifices of the religion of his day.

Early in 1649 his challenge to existing religious systems became overt when, in Nottingham, he vehemently denounced parish worship and faced the first in a series of arrests and imprisonments that punctuated the rest of his career. After a brief incarceration in Nottingham, Fox underwent a year-long jail sentence in Derby until his release in autumn 1651. His missionary range was now about to be extended into the north, into Yorkshire and, eventually, in 1652, to the Westmorland hills, where his encounters with spiritual aspirants known as Seekers brought Fox together with men and women who probably formed incipient Quakerism as much as Fox did. Also in 1652, Fox stopped at the godly gentry home at Swarthmoor in north Lancashire, west of the Westmorland hills, and made a large-scale conversion amidst this religious family, including the wife of the squire, Margaret Fell, whom, after her husband's death, Fox was to marry in 1669.

In 1653 he faced his third major imprisonment, in Carlisle in Cumberland. In the following years the Quaker movement grew at a rapid rate, though Fox was faced with a challenge to his leadership of the movement from the charismatic James Nayler (1617–1660). A further challenge, to the survival of the Quaker movement as a whole, came with the restoration in 1660 of the monarchy and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, accompanied by repressive legislation against dissidents such as the Quakers. A sufferer along with his movement, Fox underwent imprisonment from 1663 to 1666, but also in the 1660s, with Margaret Fell, built the Quaker organization into a resilient defensive structure of pyramidal regional and national meetings. Fox also played a vital role in the missionary spread of the Quaker movement, conducting an extended itinerancy throughout ENGLAND, but also launched out to IRELAND, the West Indies, America, and the NETHERLANDS. George Fox died in Gracechurch Street, London on January 13, 1691. While recognition must be accorded to Fox's originality and rejection of the religious conventions of his age, particular interpretative emphasis in this article is on his place within the Protestant tradition.

Fox and English Protestantism

In the first place we should recognize the classic English Protestant features of Fox's antecedents and background. His Protestant credentials were, indeed, impeccable. As he proudly tells us in his Autobiography, his mother was "an upright woman...and of the stock of the martyrs." The latter phrase indicates that Fox could lay claim to descent either from England's Protestants executed by Queen Mary in the mid-1550s or that he was descended from England's pre-Reformation Lollards (their founder, John Wyclif [c. 1329–1384], lived in Fox's native Leicestershire). However, his mother's devout Protestant influence on Fox was more than merely a matter of ancestry. As Fox's Quaker eulogist, WILLIAM PENN (1644–1718), recalled, she fostered his religious development, bringing to bear Stuart PURITANISM'S sensitivity to the state of individuals' psyches: she, Penn recalled, "taking notice of his singular temper and the gravity, wisdom, and piety that very early shined through him, refusing childish and vain sports and company when very young, was tender and indulgent over him...."

Thus the ardent Protestant Mary Fox played the kind of religious influencing role toward her son that the pious Susanna Wesley performed toward her sons, the founders of METHODISM, JOHN (1703–1791) and CHARLES (1707–1788) WESLEY. However, young Fox was also exposed to the pious Protestant mentoring of his godly father Christopher Fox, known to his neighbors, sardonically or not, as "Righteous Christer." If the influence of a godly, indeed explicitly puritan, home background were not enough to expose the growing George Fox to the moral, spiritual, and doctrinal strains of English Protestantism, then the teaching he heard as an adolescent in his Fenny Drayton parish church was indubitably of the Reformation. In the late 1630s and early 1640s Fenny Drayton parish was in the safe Protestant hands of Nathaniel Stephens (1606/7–1678), a Calvinist minister with whom young Fox was wont to discuss theology. Though Fox was later to reject Stephens and his teaching, this minister's markedly Protestant outlook provided one of the several forms of Protestantism's impress upon him.

It was the coalescence of such impressions that induced Fox to face, in an anguished, experiential way, those issues of salvation and damnation that also haunted MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546), JOHN BUNYAN (1628–1688), and John Wesley. Like his predecessor, Luther, and his contemporary, Bunyan, Fox knew despair, the key word for his condition, which he used three times in one short paragraph of his Journal, a work that rings with the anguished authenticity of the other great English Protestant spiritual classics of the seventeenth century. In 1646 Fox was beginning to find his way out of the maze of his despondency with a variant of the central Protestant doctrine of justification by faith: "...if all were believers, then they...passed from death to life..." However, the focus of this formula was the christocentricity of the Protestant Reformation, "relying," as Fox wrote, "wholly on the lord Jesus Christ." Indeed, Fox's Protestant interpretation of Christ's sole saving role was summed up in his realization that all men and women "are concluded under sin and shut up in unbelief, as I had been—that Jesus Christ might have the pre-eminence—who enlightens and gives grace and faith and power.... by Jesus, the opener of the door with his heavenly key, the entrance was given.... all was done, and to be done, in and by Christ....all was done by Christ the life, and my belief was in him." Thus Fox echoed Luther's evangelical centering on Christ crucified as the sole medium of our redemption: as Luther wrote in his commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, "...I openly teach and confess, that no man can obtain the favour of God, righteousness and salvation, but by Christ alone...."

Fox and the Reformation

Fox's christology was, like Luther's, concentrated on the redeeming work of Jesus Christ on the Cross. Fox derived a theology of the cross from the Reformation, whose influences were so pervasive in the England in which Fox grew to maturity. Calvin's impress was even heavier in that profoundly Protestant religious culture, so it should in no way surprise us to hear Fox echoing, and also building on, the thinking of the Genevan reformer. This is particularly the case in the way that Calvin, in the Institutes, unfolded Christ's roles as prophet, priest, and king. Christ's all-sufficiency in these "offices"—for example, as prophet where "Outside Christ there is nothing worth knowing"—could be taken to mean that either a teaching authority, or papal or episcopal rule, or sacerdotal ministry or sacrificial rite (the Mass) claimed by a church such as that of Rome were negated by Christ's prophetic, kingly, and priestly offices. When Fox took up analysis of these functions of Christ, he both accepted them and added to them, providing no fewer than eleven such offices, including that of bishop, but in such a way as to follow and build on Calvin in the latter's affirming of Christ as the sole and sufficient ruler of, and provider for, His church.

If Calvin drew attention to Christ's priesthood, Luther is forever associated with insight into the universal priesthood of faith. The concept was set out in his 1520 work, The Address to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation Concerning the Amelioration of the Christian Estate: "...our baptism consecrates us all without exception, and makes us all priests.... All [Christians] have spiritual status, and are truly priests...." In his Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (a work better known in England than some of Luther's other writings, thanks to a translated edition of 1575), Luther extended the inclusive, or universalist, implications of the priesthood of all believers to take in the equal status of all under and in Christ: "...in Christ...there is no difference of persons...but all are one. For there is but one body, one spirit, one hope of vocation for all...." The difference between Luther and Fox in this regard is that while Luther tended to pass over the implications for women of this egalitarian doctrine of the church, Fox lovingly expatiated on a church order like that of his SOCIETY OF FRIENDS in which women shared equality of status. Indeed, he drew on a string of holy women of the New Testament, and especially on Mary Magdalene, who announced the Lord's resurrection, to establish that "If male and female have received the testimony of Jesus, they have received the spirit of prophecy." Fox thereby extended the Reformation principle of the priesthood of all believers along a line of logical sequence to female equality fully and explicitly articulate.

This, though, was less a derivation from Luther himself than the working out of the source common to both Luther and Fox, Paul. Luther, who grounded his Reformation theology in Paul, and above all in a doctrine of redemption he found in the Epistle to the Romans, was, predictably, generous in his acknowledgments of his indebtedness to "the apostle." Because the commentary on Galatians is an exegesis of a Pauline epistle, it is not surprising that Luther's reliance on Paul is evident in his citation of him in favor of the elimination, in Christ, of status distinctions. However, in the Address to the Christian Nobility, Luther also adduced Paul in favor of the abrogation of differentiations of race, rank, and gender, using such phrases as "This is St. Paul's meaning.... This is supported by Romans 12 and I Corinthians 12...." The only remaining piece that needs to be put in place is Fox's Luther-like dependence on Paul's authority. In The Woman Learning in Silence, for example, first published in 1656 and forming the classic statement of Quaker gender egalitarianism in the church, Fox freely cites "the apostle" in favor of his views.

Fox's reliance on Paul should be seen as placing him quite firmly within a broad Protestant tradition, but ought also to be viewed as part of a strongly Protestant appreciation of the authority of Scripture as a whole. Luther's reverence for the Bible is well known; he was, as he said, "captive to the word of God" and in 1519, for example, he wrote, "We must let Scripture have the chief place and be its own truest, simplest and clearest interpreter...." What, though, might surprise those who believe that Fox and the Quakers put scripture on a par with other, and more immediate, forms of revelation is that Fox also recognized the uniqueness and inerrancy of the Bible, as he wrote in The True Christians Distinguished (1689):

The holy scriptures of truth are the truest history that is on the earth of the creation of God; of what God has done himself; and what God has done by his prophets and holy men and women; what God has done by Christ his son.... So the scripture of truth is the best book of truth upon the earth to be read, believed, fulfilled and practised.

There are other senses in which Fox can be identified with the Protestant traditions of the European and English Reformations: for example, as his Journal records, he was conventionally and narrowly antiCatholic. It may well be, though, that Fox, born in the reign that gave the English the Authorized Version of the scripture, was at his most Protestant in his deference to the Bible—as his recent biographer Larry Ingle writes, “a true heir of the Protestant Reformation” (Ingle 1994: p. XX).

References and Further Reading

- Barbour, Hugh. The Quakers in Puritan England. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1964.
- Braithwaite, William Charles. The Beginnings of Quakerism. Second, Revised (Henry J.Cadbury) Edition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.
- Davies, Horton. Worship and Theology in England from Andrewes to Baxter and Fox, 1603–1690. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Ingle, H.Larry. First Among Friends: George Fox and the Creation of Quakerism. New York, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Mullett, Michael, ed. New Light on George Fox 1624–1691. York: The Ebor Press, n.d. (1993).
- Ross, Hugh McGregor, ed. George Fox Speaks for Himself. York: The Ebor Press, 1991.

MICHAEL A.MULLETT

FOXÉ, JOHN (1517–1587)

English preacher and writer. John Foxe compiled the Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Times, an extraordinarily influential ecclesiastical history that has been known from the beginning as The Book of Martyrs. Martyrologies in this encyclopedic collection identify medieval heretics such as Jan Hus and John Wyclif and sixteenth-century Protestants with the “true” church of Christ under attack by the ANTICHRIST, whom Foxe identifies with the pope and the Church of Rome.

Foxe was born in Boston, Lincolnshire, in 1517. Little is known concerning his parentage. As a student at Oxford University, he received B.A. and M.A. degrees. He resigned his fellowship at Magdalen College in line with Protestant rejection of the vow of CELIBACY required of permanent fellows, who entered into religious orders. In 1547 he married Agnes Randall, who bore his many children. After moving to London during the same year, Foxe entered into service of the Duchess of Richmond and tutored the children of her late brother, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey. During the zealously Protestant regime of Edward VI (1547–1553), Foxe published Latin treatises on religious and social issues, and translated tracts by MARTIN LUTHER and other German Protestants.

Foxe’s ordination as DEACON in 1550 initiated his career as a Protestant preacher. At about this time, he began the historical research that occupied the rest of his life. At the accession of Queen Mary I (1553–1558), a militant Catholic, Foxe emigrated from ENGLAND to Strasbourg, FRANCE, where he published the first installment of his history of the martyrs, Commentarii Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum (1554). It focused on late medieval figures, notably John Wyclif, the Lollard martyrs, and Jan Hus, whom Foxe regarded as proto-Protestants. He soon moved to Frankfurt, GERMANY, where he participated in liturgical controversy, and then to Basel, SWITZERLAND, where he worked as a proofreader employed by the printer Joannes Oporinus.

Persecution during the reign of Mary I resulted in the death of more than 300 Protestants. Foxe collected gruesome manuscript records concerning HERESY interrogations, torture, and eyewitness accounts concerning the comportment and last words spoken by Martyrs as they were burnt alive (see MARTYRS AND MARTYROLOGIES). Edmund Grindal, an English exile who later became archbishop of Canterbury, helped gather these martyrologic documents and urged Foxe to compile them in chronicle form. As the martyrologist engaged in this research, he completed Christus Triumphans (1556), an “apocalyptic comedy” that embeds persecution and suffering within the transcendent framework of providential history that Foxe derived from the Book of Revelation.

The death of Mary I and accession of Elizabeth I (1558–1603) enabled Foxe to return to England. Before leaving Basel, he published Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum (1559), a sequel to his Commentarii that extends his account of religious persecution from late medieval times through the reign of Mary I. After Edmund Grindal ordained Foxe as a priest in 1560, Foxe received patronage from the bishops of Salisbury and Norwich, JOHN JEWEL and John Parkhurst. His failure to rise high in the church hierarchy may be due to his adherence to the first wave of Puritan protest during the 1560s.

In 1563, John Day, the Protestant master printer, published the first edition of THE ACTS AND MONUMENTS. Foxe compiled it as a Protestant alternative to medieval legends of SAINTS, whose accounts of miracles, cures, and magical feats occupied an important place in Roman Catholic devotion. Basing the text on his two previous Latin chronicles in addition to a great variety of manuscript and printed sources, Foxe collaborated with Day in the production of the best-illustrated English book of its age. It is notable for woodcut portrayals of the “true” sainthood of scores of Protestant martyrs.

In collaboration with Day, Foxe oversaw expansion of this massive ecclesiastical history to more than three million words in three revised editions published between 1570 and 1583. This collection of fervid stories supported re-establishment of Protestant theological DOCTRINE under Queen Elizabeth and stirred up intense hostility against the regime of Mary I, the papacy, and the Church of Rome. The book became widely known when chained copies of the 1570 edition were placed in English cathedrals under order from the Convocation. Five more unabridged editions were published by the end of the seventeenth century. These editions contained an extraordinary array of genres (e.g., martyrologies, poems, letters, and tracts). These folio editions constitute the most physically imposing and complex English books of their time.

Foxe engaged in other projects, including collaboration with Day on an edition of writings by three renowned reformers: The Whole Works of William Tyndale, John Frith, and Doctor Robert Barnes (1573). Until his death in London, he labored on a commentary on Revelation that was published posthumously as Eicasmī seu Meditationes in Sacram Apocalypsin (1587).

Roman Catholic readers attacked the truthfulness of The Book of Martyrs soon after its initial appearance. Although Foxe’s handling of documents is generally accurate, he altered sources and selected partisan narratives to which he attached inflammatory comments. Controversy concerning Foxe’s trustworthiness underwent renewal during preparation of a nineteenth-century edition of Foxe’s text. During the late twentieth century, William Haller’s influential thesis that this book praises England as an “elect nation” has undergone qualification by Richard Bauckham and others, who have demonstrated that Haller suppressed the broadly European scope of Foxe’s history of Christianity.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Foxe, John. Facsimile of John Foxe's "Book of Martyrs," 1583: Actes and Monuments of Matters Most Special and Memorable. Edited by David G. Newcombe with Michael Pidd. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press for the British Academy, 2000.

Secondary Sources:

Bauckham, Richard. Tudor Apocalypse. Appleford, UK: Sutton Courtenay Press, 1978.

Haller, William. The Elect Nation: The Meaning and Relevance of Foxe's "Book of Martyrs." New York: Harper & Row, 1963.

Highley, Christopher, and John N. King, eds. John Foxe and His World. St. Aldershot, Hants, UK: Ashgate, 2002.

King, John. Tudor Royal Iconography: Literature and Art in an Age of Religious Crisis. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.

Loades, David, ed. John Foxe and the English Reformation. Aldershot, Hants, UK: Scolar Press, 1997.

——, ed. John Foxe: An Historical Perspective. Aldershot, Hants, UK: Ashgate, 1999.

JOHN N. KING

FRANCE

The French Protestant community is small but disproportionately influential in national life. This has been true for the greater part of its history. Largely a Calvinist constituency, France's Protestant population includes a Lutheran element (especially in eastern France) and a number of minority churches. Questions of liberty and toleration are of considerable importance to all these groups—unsurprisingly, given the centuries of persecution endured by French Protestants in the early modern period. Indirectly, if not directly, these experiences still resonate at the turn of the millennium.

Facts and Figures

Accurate estimates of the total Protestant population in France are difficult in that they necessarily depend on a clear definition of the term "Protestant." Most commentators agree on a figure of one million or approximately 2 percent of the French population. Looser definitions of the term or differently worded questions in a public opinion survey will sometimes attract a larger response. In 1980 for example, 4.5 percent of French people declared themselves to be "close to Protestantism"; clearly this group included many who rarely, if ever, set foot in a Protestant place of worship and some who continued to be members of the Catholic Church.

Protestants in France are split into three groups. The largest (460,000) constitutes the Reformed community—a group lying squarely in the Calvinist tradition (JOHN CALVIN, 1509–1564, was born and educated in France). A smaller but still sizeable group (280,000) is composed of Lutherans, a community found largely in eastern France. The final section (210,000) is made up of a variety of smaller, mostly evangelical groups, many of which owe their existence to waves of evangelism that took place in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The great majority of French Protestants are affiliated with the Fédération Protestante de France—the exceptions can be found among the smaller congregations that resist membership for both doctrinal and ecclesiological reasons.

A second organizational divide reflects the particular status of all churches (not only Protestant ones) in the Alsace-Moselle region. These départements found themselves in Germany rather than France at the time of the separation of church and state (1905). For this reason, the Napoleonic concordat rather than Republican legislation provides the framework for ecclesiastical administration. Protestant pastors (like their Catholic counterparts) are paid by the state, and courses of religious education (Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish) continue in the school system. The University of Strasbourg incorporates both a Catholic and a Protestant theology faculty; the possibility of a Muslim equivalent is currently under review. None of these features are present in metropolitan France.

The geographical distribution of Protestants in France is uneven. Apart from the community in Paris, the majority of the Reformed constituency can be found in a semicircle south of the Massif central, with concentrations in the Ardèche, the Gard and up to a point in the départements of the southwest. As the rural exodus continues, the principal centers of Reformed Protestantism (outside Paris) can be found in Marseilles, Nimes, and Montpellier, though important traces of the rural community in the Gard can still be seen, epitomized in the Musée du Désert area. The Lutheran community is found in eastern France, where the links with their German counterparts have been and still are most easily effected.

The economic and social composition of the French Protestant community is equally skewed. It contains disproportionate numbers of professionals, from both the business and the service sector, notably teachers. The rural population (from the Cévennes, for example) is rapidly diminishing given the movement of the population as a whole away from rural areas. There has never been a sizeable urban working class among French Protestants, except in pockets in the east.

Historical Perspective

Long years of persecution provide the dominant theme in the history of French Protestantism. From 1523 (the date of the first burning in this history of martyrdom and reprisal), the Protestants of France were in a position of self-defense. It is important to remember, in this respect, the considerable threat they posed to a unitary state; at the end of the sixteenth century, approximately one-third of the French population were Huguenots. Had the balance of history moved in a slightly different direction, the religious map of Europe would look very different indeed, but this did not happen. France remained a Catholic country that eventually came to terms with the Protestant minority within its boundaries. The struggle, however, continued for centuries.

The persecution was not always equally intense. The first wave came to an end in 1598 with the passing of the Edict of Nantes. This edict was well ahead of its time in accepting the principle of two religions within one state, but contained basic contradictions that became increasingly evident. It was essentially a pragmatic solution to particular circumstance and despite all its claims to be perpetual and irrevocable, it was unlikely to endure in the changing circumstance of the seventeenth century. It is true that French Protestantism enjoyed one of its brief periods of respite under Louis XIII and in the first part of Louis XIV's reign, but this did not last. Through the second part of the seventeenth century, Louis took an increasingly harsh view of those of his realm who were not of the Catholic faith. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) was but the culmination of a series of measures, the passing of which implied, with increasing clarity, that a Protestant, by his or her very being, was in contradiction with the king. In 1685 all pretenses were dropped; the Edict of Revocation had the intention of destroying the supposedly reformed church (Eglise Prétendue Réformée) and of liquidating those who professed its faith.

Those who could do so, fled, dramatically reducing the size of the Protestant community in France; those who remained simply endured. How they did so (there are countless examples of courage and heroism) constitutes the most significant feature in the collective memory of French Protestantism. It continues to resonate some three hundred years later.

The situation gradually eased in the course of the eighteenth century, leading eventually to the Edict of Toleration in 1787. It was, however, the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the Napoleonic legislation of 1802 that gave the Protestant community its legal existence in a definitive sense. With this in mind, it is hardly surprising that the Protestants became increasingly, if not unanimously, committed to the Republican ideal through the course of the nineteenth century. This should not be seen as a simple or automatic endorsement; rather it came about as each reminder of a conservative alliance between throne and altar (and there were several in the nineteenth century) led to uncomfortable circumstances for the Protestants. The exception in this respect was the Orleanist monarchy (1830–1848); the death of the Duc d'Orléans in an accident in 1842 was as much a disaster for the Protestant community as it was for anyone in France.

The Third Republic offered Protestants a unique opportunity. Not only were they tolerated, they found themselves in a position to contribute positively to the Republican legislation on (a) church and state, and (b) the creation of a Republican school system. The latter, in fact, precedes the former. All three of French politician Jules Ferry's (1832–1893) advisers at this crucial moment in the history of French education were Protestant pastors (Ferdinand Buisson, Felix Pécaut, and Jules Steeg). Such people represented a midway position in the public debates of the period: neither clerical nor anticlerical, they were well placed to make a lasting contribution to the new school system. Their influence far outweighed the numerical significance of the Protestant population at the time. One result of this situation is the commitment of the vast majority of French Protestants not only to the state school system (disproportionate numbers of Protestants become teachers), but to the principle of laïcité (the absence of religion in the public sphere) itself.

A final defining moment can be found in World War II. Protestants fought alongside other French people to defend the honor of their country. In this sense, old antagonisms began to diminish (those, for example, between Catholic and Protestant or between clerical and anticlerical), but for some Protestants, not least those in the Cévennes, far more deep-seated reflexes were activated as they resisted the threat from outside. Résistez had become the rallying cry of the persecuted HUGUENOTS in the early eighteenth century, and the Cévennes terrain, which once protected the Camisards (so-called because of their distinctive clothing) in their struggles against Louis XIV, now protected the Maquisards in their resistance to the Germans.

Postwar Debates

Jean Baubérot and Jean-Paul Willaime, two distinguished commentators on French Protestantism, describe the Protestant community in three ways: as a Christian denomination, as a religious minority, and as a religion laïque. In this sense Protestantism continues to situate itself as the “crossroads” of both political and philosophical life in France. The debates that follow—ecumenism, tolerance, and laïcité—pick up the nuances of each of the three descriptions.

Relationships with other Christians, and more especially with the Catholic Church, have evolved in the postwar period. Cemented in a very practical way as a result of the war, they gradually acquired institutional embodiment. Initially this took the form of movements such as the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity and a range of common endeavors in the field of social responsibility. In the 1960s a huge step forward occurred following the Second Vatican Council which, among a whole range of revolutionary decisions, legitimated ecumenical contacts from the Catholic side. The papacy of John XXIV was clearly pivotal in this process.

There is, however, another side to this debate—the very marked mismatch in France in the size of the two constituencies. In a very real sense a total commitment to ecumenism on the part of the Protestant minority is a risky business in that they, rather than the Catholics, are likely to lose their identity if things are pushed to their logical conclusion. The issue of intermarriage illustrates this perfectly. Three-quarters of young Protestants marry out of their faith, raising real issues for the future. A rather different question is raised by more recent ecclesiastical events (a notably more conservative pope on the one hand and both the ordination of women and the relative growth of the evangelical churches on the other). Clearly the progress toward ecumenism can never be taken for granted; the movement ebbs and flows depending considerably on particular and changing circumstances.

The second description—that of a religious minority—raises wider issues than ecumenism, for it involves a new set of circumstances in postwar France. Questions of religious liberty now concern entirely different religious constituencies, notably the growing Muslim population (considerably larger than the Protestant community) and a whole series of sects and new religious movements. The question of Judaism has also acquired new resonance in view of the postwar influx of Sephardic Jews from North Africa, with the result that France now houses the largest Jewish community in western Europe.

What is the attitude of the French Protestant population to this changing situation? Unsurprisingly, given their past, Protestants are vigilant with regard to religious liberty, defending the right of the religious minority to exist within a society shaped not only by a Catholic past, but more recently by a strongly secular state. Both church and state in France run the risk of monopolistic tendencies, and both have some difficulty in coming to terms with a multifaith society in which religious communities aspire to a public as well as private existence. The affaire du foulard illustrates this point dramatically: should Muslim girls be allowed to wear their foulard (or Muslim scarf) in a state school or does the foulard count as a religious symbol, proscribed by law from the school system? The debate divided French society through the 1990s and beyond. It is a debate in which the Protestant community is torn between its desire to defend the liberty of religion while upholding the principles of laïcité. An inevitable question follows: Are the two aspirations compatible?

The answer becomes clearer in a more developed understanding of laïcité and its applications to the political sphere, the third theme introduced by Baubérot and Willaime. We have already seen that historical circumstance drove French Protestants toward the Republican ideal and to the philosophy that supported it. It seems, however, that laïcité does not work as well in an increasingly multifaith society, which is obliged to accommodate religious minorities with very different aspirations. Here there are two schools of thought. The first defends a traditional view of laïcité, notable for its anti-Catholicism, but turning very readily into antireligion per se. Such a view is vehemently opposed to the wearing of the foulard in the state school and sees the Muslim scarf as a threat to the system. The second approach takes a rather different view, suggesting that the notion of the state or the school as a neutral space should evolve as circumstances alter, permitting a genuine dialogue between those of different faiths. In this situation, the wearing of the foulard is rather differently constructed and is no longer a threat to the system. It is interesting that Jean Baubérot, a distinguished spokesman for the Protestant community in France, should be at the forefront of the debates about laïcité.

The Future

Recent commemorations of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1985 and of the edict itself in 1998 have permitted both the Protestant community and France as a whole to reflect on the contribution that Protestantism has made to French society, notably in the field of religious liberty. This is readily acknowledged, almost to the point of admitting that France as a whole has, to some extent, been Protestantized—the core values of Protestantism have in many ways become that of the French. But if this is the case, how is it possible for French Protestants to maintain a distinct identity? The question is crucial though not specific to Protestantism; it concerns the fate of minorities more generally. It can be summarized as follows: if assimilation is as complete as possible, what then does it mean to be a Protestant (or indeed a Jew) in France at the turn of the millennium? The answer is unclear.

See also Calvin; Calvinist; Lutheran.

References and Further Reading

- Baubérot, Jean. Le Retour des Huguenots La vitalité protestante XIXe-XXe siècle. Paris-Genève: Cerf-Labor et Fides, 1985.
- . Le Protestantisme doit-il mourir? La différence protestante dans une France pluriculturelle. Paris: Seuil, 1988.
- . “La Laïcité française et ses mutations.” Social Compass 45 (1998): 175–187.

Baubérot, Jean, and Jean-Paul Willaime. Le Protestantisme. Paris: MA Editions, 1987.

Encrevé, André. Les protestants en France de 1800 à nos jours. Paris: Stock, 1985.

———. Histoire des Protestants en France. Toulouse: Privat, 1977.

GRACE DAVIE

FRANCK, SEBASTIAN (1499–1542)

Spiritualist theologian. A radical spiritualist Protestant, Franck joined the Protestant movement in 1525 and became a minister in a village near Nuremberg. He left his post in 1529 because he found that the REFORMATION brought no visible moral improvement. Both Strasbourg (1532) and Ulm (1539) expelled him at the insistence of their CLERGY. He finally settled in Basel, where he died.

In the face of dogmatic claims by all the churches and sects, Franck disavowed all DOCTRINE, and emphasized the experience of the Inner Word. Franck was one of the most consistent defenders of religious TOLERATION in the Reformation. He felt that the orthodox churches had proven themselves unchristian persecutors, whereas heretics had often been the true followers of Christ (see ORTHODOXY; HERESY). In his letter to Johannes Campanus (1531), Franck dismissed the church and the SACRAMENTS as toys that had been given to immature Christians in the early centuries, but that were no longer needed. In his Paradoxa (1534) he argued that God had made the BIBLE obscure so that believers would turn inward to the divine spark found in all men. Although he respected the Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) and his fellow spiritualist CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD, who had also lived at Strasbourg and Ulm, he rejected the exclusivity of the Anabaptists, and the “dogmatism” of Schwenckfeld. He gathered no following, although his works influenced later thinkers (e.g., Dirk Volcksherts Coornhert and VALENTIN WEIGEL), and many of his teachings would become staples in the modern world.

See also Spiritualism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Müller, Jan-Dirk, ed. Sebastian Franck (1499–1542). Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz, 1993.

Secondary Sources:

Ozment, Steven E. Mysticism and Dissent: Religious Ideology and Social Protest in the Sixteenth Century. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1973.

Weigelt, Horst. Sebastian Franck und die lutherische Reformation. Güterloh, Germany: G.Mohn, 1972.

Williams, George H. Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1957.
R.EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

FRANCKE, AUGUST HERMANN (1663–1727)

German Pietist. Francke was born in Lübeck on March 22, 1663, son of a distinguished jurist. The early death of his father placed the responsibility for the large family into the hands of his mother. Francke received his early education from tutors and attended the universities of Erfurt and Kiel. In 1684 he moved to Leipzig, where he was the tutor of a student of THEOLOGY and received, in 1685, the degree of magister artium, which authorized him to teach at the university. The following year he founded together with a friend what they called the collegium philobiblicum, the “society of the friends of the Bible,” which had the purpose of studying the BIBLE. In March of 1687 he moved to Lüneburg. There, while meditating on John 20:31, he experienced a CONVERSION, which he saw as a new life.

In the spring of 1689 he resumed his teaching at Leipzig. His classes, together with his collegium philobiblicum, gained attention and a circle of like-minded souls. At the same time the faculty was aghast and prohibited further teaching in August of 1689. In March of the following year Francke received a call to be DEACON at the Augustinian Church in Erfurt. Although he had strong supporters, his Pietist disposition still raised questions about his Lutheran ORTHODOXY, and he had to undergo a public scrutiny of his belief (see PIETISM). Even though his appointment was confirmed, in the end his antagonists carried the day. Erfurt, although a Lutheran town, was legally under the jurisdiction of the (Catholic) archbishop of Mainz, who was solicited by Francke’s opponents to move against him. Toward the end of September 1691 he was expelled from Erfurt. The Brandenburg Elector Fredrick III appointed him in December of 1691 professor of Hebrew and Greek at the new university at HALLE, and seven years later, professor of theology there.

At Easter time 1695 Francke had founded a school for the poor with hardly any means at his disposal. He found a theology student as teacher. Similarly Francke began an orphanage without adequate funds. Additional institutions followed, including a high school for the sons of the nobility. The financial needs of these institutions—soon to be called the “Franckian Foundations”—were met both by a steady flow of gifts but also by some revenue-producing activities, such as a bookstore and pharmacy, not to mention governmental privileges. When Francke died in 1727, over 2,000 pupils were receiving instruction, together with 250 students and a teaching corps of some 167 teachers, including eight female teachers. Francke also called attention to the missionary mandate of Christianity, sending missionaries to INDIA and North America, such as HENRY MELCHIOR MÜHLENBERG.

Francke pointedly noted that it was not the goal of education to further lives of prominence or affluence. The goal was to train the young in the love and fear of God. Religion thus occupied an important role in the curriculum, generally some three hours each day, with the average length of instruction initially ten hours daily. Pedagogically, the pupils were disciplined with the notion that they were commanded to follow the pious men and women in the Bible and make the study of CATECHISM and Bible central in their lives.

Francke's significance, in addition to the impressive institutions in Halle, which still exist today, was to have demonstrated that the Pietist orientation was not to be confused with ecstatic and irresponsible religion. Rather, the religion of the heart, which the Pietists embraced, was also socially responsible.

See also Spener, Philip Jakob

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Francke, August Hermann. Schriften und Predigten. Berlin/ New York: W.de Gruyter, 1981ff.
Raabe, Paul. August Hermann Francke 1663–1727: Bibliographie seiner Schriften. Tübingen, Germany: Verlag der Franckeschen Stiftungen Halle im Max Niemeyer Verlag, 2001.

Secondary Sources:

Brown, Dale W. The Problem of Subjectivism in Pietism: A Redefinition with Special Reference to the Theology of Philipp Jakob Spener and August Hermann Francke. Evanston, IL: 1962.
Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern Univ., 1962.
Sattler, Gary R. God's Glory, Neighbor's Good: a Brief Introduction to the Life and Writings of August Hermann Francke. Chicago, IL: Covenant Press, 1982.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

FREE CHURCH

“Free Church” is a generic term (originally British) for Christian denominations that rejected the control of the established national church (i.e., CHURCH OF ENGLAND, CHURCH OF SCOTLAND) in regulatory structures, DOCTRINE, WORSHIP, discipline, and ministry. The concept was later extended to North European lands and to North American churches with traditions derived from or sympathetic with those European Free Churches.

The earlier term in England was “Separatists,” (partly as a term of disapproval of persons detached from the majority community, partly as a positive assertion of the right of each congregation to separate existence), later “Protestant Dissenters” (i.e., dissenting from the English Act of Uniformity, 1662). This term was replaced by “Nonconformists.” In the nineteenth century, a more positive term and ethos were chosen. The original groups denoted were Congregationalists, Baptists, and Presbyterians; the Methodist denominations were added as their separation from the Church of England widened and they made common cause with the existing Dissenters in campaigns for TOLERATION, educational freedom, and representation in other areas of public life (e.g., hospital and prison CHAPLAINCY, government advisory boards). Quakers and Unitarians were, for many political purposes, accepted as allies. By the beginning of the twentieth century, the generic term “Free Church” became current and representation on the political front (e.g., education, hospital and military chaplaincy) was carried out through the Free Church Federal Council. This Council also collaborated with the Church of England in addressing or responding to the British Government on MARRIAGE law reform and similar issues. The range of British Free Churches was extended by the emergence of the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN (or “Christian Brethren”), the SALVATION ARMY, and the Pentecostal denominations (see PENTECOSTALISM).

On the European continent, dissenting minority groups had emerged in the Middle Ages. Hussites survived in some areas, for example, as the Czech Brethren and the (Socinian) Polish Brethren. During the REFORMATION, Anabaptist (see ANABAPTISM) and specifically MENNONITE and, later, German Baptist (Alexander Mack) congregations were established. MENNONITES helped to mentor and encourage the first English BAPTISTS in exile in the Low Countries. The nineteenth century saw “Free” versions of the established national Protestant churches (and of the larger nonestablished churches in America) come into existence, largely in protest against the established churches’ perceived compromise with secular trends in society, ETHICS, CULTURE, and philosophy. Included in this tradition were the Free Church of Scotland, Free Church of England, Old Lutherans, Free Lutherans, Free Methodists, and Gereformeerde Kerk/Christian Reformed Church). These denominations, together with Continental branches of the British and American Protestant churches, have come to be classified first as “sects” (the concept made popular by ERNST TROELTSCH in his study of the social doctrines of the various Christian groupings) and later as “Free Churches” (Freikirchen), especially by Roman Catholic ecumenists, both as a matter of courtesy and also on ecclesiological grounds, because the Second Vatican Council had committed the Roman Church to admitting that Protestant churches are “ecclesial” in character (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM).

In the UNITED STATES, the First Amendment to the Constitution makes all churches, Protestant or otherwise, free churches in the sense that none of them is governed by civic legislation in its constitution, doctrine, membership, or manner of worship. The ideal of “a free church in a free state” is in principle realized for all. The “Free Church” category has come to designate the churches of Anabaptist or “radical Reformation” derivation and of other traditions generated in America that place emphasis on the local congregation as self-existent and autonomous, on freedom from imposed creeds or liturgies, and on discipleship as personal choice. These include the Christian Church (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) and the EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH. Polity centers on voluntary association of congregations at various levels.

The classic Free Church concern is for the purity of the church as Christ’s bride. Being a Christian is an issue of individual responsibility, even if heritagebaptism is accepted, but belonging to the church is not an option, because Christ’s disciples are essentially mutually responsible and interdependent.

The belief among the Free Churches is that the church is not created by the secular realm, nor can it be governed by it. The church is distinct from society in general, and must, if necessary, “come out” and be separate. The Old Testament principles of Israel’s holiness are the basis for this. In Britain, however, social witness became significant. In the United States, the public perception is that the older Free Churches (e.g., the AMISH) will abstain from such public debate, except for a consistent lived witness to PACIFISM and studied avoidance of confrontation with groups such as the KU KLUX KLAN. More modern independent and fundamentalist groups will take an overtly right-wing political stance on such matters as war and peace and public welfare (see FUNDAMENTALISM).

Free Churches, as Free Churches in the American sense, cannot be assumed to have a common THEOLOGY. Some are Trinitarian, some are Unitarian, and others avoid insistence on choice in the issue. Some have a particular concern for ESCHATOLOGY, with DIS-PENSATIONALISM and RESTORATIONISM held as important tenets.

See also Congregationalism; Dissent; Friends, Society of; Lutheranism; Methodism; Nonconformity; Presbyterianism; Unitarian-Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

- Dale, R.W. Manual of Congregational Principles (1884), 11th ed. London: Congregational Union of England and Wales, 1920.
- Jordan, Edward Kenneth Henry. Free Church Unity. History of the Free Church Council Movement 1876–1946. London: Lutterworth Press, 1956.
- Klingberg, Frank J. A Free Church in a Free State: America 's Unique Contribution. Indianapolis, IN: National Foundation Press, 1947.
- Littell, Franklin Hamlin. The Free Church. Boston, MA: Starr King Press, 1957.
- Micklem, Nathaniel. Congregationalism and the Church Catholic. London: Independent Press, 1943.
- Payne, Ernest A. The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England. London: SCM Press, 1944.
- Redeker, Calvin Wall. The Free Church and Seductive Culture. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1970.
- Rouner, A. The Free Church Today: New Life for the Whole Church. New York: Association Press, 1968.
- Torbet, Robert G. Ecumenism: Free Church Dilemma. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1968.
- Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church Through the Ages. Translated from the Swedish by Virgil A. Olson. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1954.
- Williams, D.H., ed. The Free Church and the Early Church: Bridging the Historical and Theological Divide. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2002.

DAVID H. TRIPP

FREE CHURCH FEDERAL COUNCIL

The Free Church Federal Council became the Free Churches' Council in 2002. More recently it voted itself out of existence to enter a "collaborative partnership" with Churches Together in England. The Free Church Council of Wales has partnered with Cytun, Churches Together in Wales.

These developments are the culmination of over a century of church unity efforts in ENGLAND and WALES by the free churches. The FREE CHURCH movement is worldwide and traces its roots to the New Testament. It resisted organizational form beyond denominations until the nineteenth century. In the established church context of England these churches and their members were known as dissenters or nonconformists. The form of this unity has been the federation of a variety of independent churches and religious groups for work of mutual interest, including EVANGELISM and social reform efforts.

The initial meeting of representatives of several of the free churches took place in Manchester in 1892, and formally organized as the National Free Church Council in 1896. The first key leaders were Hugh Price Hughes, Charles Berry, and Alexander Mackennal. The Organizing Secretary from 1895 to 1910 was Thomas Law. The initial goals of the organization included affirming Jesus Christ as the sole AUTHORITY in the associated churches and taking the Gospel to the people in the large towns. Individuals involved came from many of the free churches, and initially represented themselves and not their denominations. These included BAPTISTS, Wesleyans, Free Methodists, Primitive Methodists, Calvinistic Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and members of the Free Church of England. Persons from other free groups soon joined. The National Council consisted of individuals and representatives of the local Church Councils and Federations. In 1899 The National Council published the Free Church Catechism. In 1919 another federal union emerged called the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches. This brought together official representatives of the various denominations. The leader of this effort was J.H.Shakespeare of the Baptist Union.

These two church unity groups ran on more or less parallel lines espousing unity in action among free churches until they united in 1940 to become the Free Church Federal Council. The Council had a moderator, chosen for one year, and an annual congress. The Council worked through local church councils in cities and towns scattered over England and Wales, and through the several denominational members. It worked to do things together that no one group could do alone. It followed the form and function of the similar group in the United States, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America.

See also Congregationalism; Denomination; Dissent; Nonconformity; Presbyterianism; Primitive Methodist Church; Wesleyan Church

References and Further Reading

Jordan, E.K. H. Free Church Unity: History of the Free Church Council Movement, 1896–1941.

London: Lutterworth Press, 1956.

Munson, James. The Nonconformists: In Search of a Lost Culture. London: SPCK, 1991.

Westin, Gunner. The Free Church Through the Ages. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1958.

JOHN PIPER

FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA

The Free Methodist Church of America was organized in 1860 after a number of clergy, foremost among them Benjamin Titus Roberts (1823–1893), were defrocked by the Western New York Methodist Episcopal Church. These clergy and sympathetic laypersons joined with a similar group of disenfranchised Methodists from Missouri and Illinois led by John Wesley Redfield (1810–1863). They elected Roberts as their leader at Pekin, New York, in August 1860. Sensitive to populist issues, equal representation was given to CLERGY and LAITY in denominational governance.

Free Methodists sought to live and teach primitive Methodist values and THEOLOGY. The key term was “freedom.” The Free Methodists promoted freedom from SIN (SANCTIFICATION), freedom from SLAVERY, freedom from pew rents, and freedom from what they saw as the manipulation of secret societies (lodges, etc.). Roberts promoted the right of WOMEN to preach, a right removed by the church over Roberts’ protests in 1896 and not restored until the 1970s. Roberts was also involved in labor organization efforts, maintained a farm and founded Chili Seminary, which eventually became Roberts Wesleyan University. He was an ardent abolitionist and promoted civil rights for African-Americans (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). The Free Methodist Church has never managed to develop strength in the Old South.

An aggressive mission program developed. Extensive efforts were made in SOUTH AFRICA, Central Africa, JAPAN, BRAZIL (especially by Japanese immigrants) and CHINA, with fewer resources committed to other places. In Burundi, Mozambique, and Japan, the missions were soon depending on local leadership and funds. In other areas, especially AFRICA, growth was hampered because of firm mission control. The greatest growth in Africa came with the merger with the churches created by the Congo Evangelistic Society (British Pentecostal) in the 1970s. From 1960, some Free Methodist mission leaders attempted to encourage independence of mission areas by establishing a series of national conferences, each with its own ecclesiastical structure.

The contemporary Free Methodist Church has about 74,000 members in the UNITED STATES and about 360,000 outside of the United States. The denomination has been active in education and supports Central Christian College (McPherson, Kansas), Greenville College (Greenville, Illinois), Roberts Wesleyan University (Rochester, New York), Seattle Pacific University (Seattle, Washington), and Spring Arbor University (Spring Arbor, Michigan).

See also Methodism; Missions; Primitive Methodist Church

References and Further Reading

Hogue, William T. A History of the Free Methodist Church. 2 vols. Chicago, IL: Free Methodist Publishing House, 1918.

Marston, Leslie R. From Age to Age A Living Witness. Winona Lake, IN: Light and Life Press, 1960.

McKenna, David L. A Future with a History: The Wesleyan Witness of the Free Methodist Church 1860–1995. Indianapolis, IN: Light and Life Communications, 1997.

DAVID BUNDY

FREE WILL BAPTISTS

Free Will Baptist denominations have about 300,000 members in several different organizations. The term “free will” reflects the explicitly Arminian heritage of this tradition, as opposed to the modified CALVINISM or the mixed Calvinist-Arminian heritage of other larger Baptist bodies in America and Europe. The modern Free Will Baptist movement, today centered in the American South but not located exclusively there, is the product of two streams of Baptist life that flowed together in the twentieth century. These two streams had independent, unrelated origins: one northern and one southern, both with roots in the 1700s. Over the next two centuries, both movements faced a series of schisms, crises, and ecumenical mergers that defined and shaped them, while at the same time lowering overall membership.

Both the northern and southern wings of the Free Will Baptist movement stand in the tradition of the GENERAL BAPTISTS, the first group of modern BAPTISTS to emerge, when JOHN SMYTH and Thomas Helwys in 1609 led a group of English Separatist exiles in Holland. Smyth’s interest in creating a congregation whose visible membership was identical to the invisible and universal church of true SAINTS ultimately led him to reject the ancient practice of infant BAPTISM and replace it with adult baptism. This view on baptism, however, was just one of several distinctive views held by these English exiles. Others included a commitment to religious liberty, the elimination of state intrusion into private religious matters, a radical understanding of the priesthood of the believer that emphasized individual conscience, and the use of the BIBLE as the final standard for DOCTRINE and practice. Eventually, by the middle of the 1600s, these Baptists moved beyond discussion of the proper candidate for baptism to discussion of the proper mode of baptism. As a result, Baptists embraced baptism by immersion, a practice used by some Christians in the first few centuries, but long abandoned by the 1600s.

Two years after Smyth and Helwys formed their Baptist congregation in Holland, Smyth applied for membership in a Mennonite congregation, taking the majority of his Baptists with him (see MENNONITES). Helwys led a minority group back to ENGLAND, forming a congregation that then spread the new movement throughout the country. These Baptists were firmly Arminian in their theology, which set them off from the mainstream of Puritan thought (see ARMINIANISM; PURITANISM). Eventually, they became known as General Baptists because of their belief that Jesus died for all humanity, not merely the elect. General Baptists believed that ATONEMENT was general rather than particular in its scope.

About a generation later, in the 1630s, a second type of Baptist movement emerged, with no connection to the General Baptists formed by Smyth and Helwys. Calvinistic in THEOLOGY, these Baptists became known as Particular Baptists. The groups were similar in their explicitly Baptist beliefs. Both emphasized the priesthood of the believer in a radical and exaggerated sense, the sole and final AUTHORITY of the Bible in matters of doctrine, and adult baptism. The Particular Baptists differed from General Baptists in their understanding of Calvinist theology. Particular Baptists represented a separate group with separate origins, not a schism from the slightly older Arminian movement. The two groups continued in England over the next 200 years with little conflict or contact. By the end of the 1800s, Calvinism and Arminianism had ceased to be relevant points of discussion for most British Baptists, and the two groups merged.

Both Particular and General Baptists settled in North America beginning in the 1600s and founded churches in New England, the Middle Colonies, and the South. Many of these congregations were mixed, with members from both General and Particular backgrounds. Other congregations were exclusively General or Particular, but the Particular movement proved dominant. Mixed congregations eventually became Particular Baptists in identity, and Particular Baptists and their ideological descendents formed the regional and national organizations that represented most Baptists in the UNITED STATES. However, General Baptists did plant some congregations in the South, especially in North Carolina. Modern Free Will Baptists stand in the tradition of these General Baptists, although there may be more of a nexus than a direct, historical link.

The New England Branch of Free Will Baptists

New England Free Will Baptists grew out of the leadership of Benjamin Randall (1749–1808). Born in New Hampshire, Randall was reared in a pious Congregationalist home. From an early age, he had an interest in religion and the cultivation of personal piety. The conversionist zeal of the Great Awakening, however, proved distasteful to him, at least initially (see AWAKENINGS). He was especially critical of GEORGE WHITEFIELD'S dramatic and emotional form of PREACHING, a new direction in homiletics. Despite his ridicule of Whitefield, Randall started to have the classic doubts about the state of his soul that formed the content of colonial CONVERSION narratives. When he heard that Whitefield had died shortly after leaving New Hampshire, Randall became despondent and had his own dramatic conversion experience.

Randall first identified with the CONGREGATIONALISM of his youth, but his church's disinterest in applying discipline to other members disappointed him (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). He formed a prayer group of like-minded church members who hoped to bring revivalist zeal into the congregation. Instead, he brought reproach from the pastor, and Randall left the congregation. Randall's criticism of the church coincided with another development, his interest in the subject of baptism. It was during this same time that Randall, with no clear external influence, came to the conclusion that the only proper baptism was the immersion of adult converts. After some thought and conversation, Randall was baptized by immersion and joined a Calvinistic Baptist church in Maine.

Over the next several years, Randall preached in Baptist churches in New Hampshire and Maine. Although he was firmly Arminian in his theology from the time of his conversion, he had no clashes with the dominant Calvinism of the area's Baptist Churches. He simply preached on other themes, such as conversion and the importance of morally upstanding behavior. However, some leaders in the churches eventually pressed Randall about his failure to preach on the theme of ELECTION. Randall admitted that he never preached on the issue because he did not believe in it, and, as a result, his ordination ceased to be recognized by the area's Baptists. In turn, a group of Randall's supporters ordained him and started a new congregation on April 5, 1780, based on exclusively Arminian principles. This congregation marks the beginning of the Free Will Baptist movement in New England.

Randall and his supporters started numerous Free Will Baptist churches and recruited many new clergymen throughout New England. As the movement grew at the local level, the need for organizational life above the local congregation grew. Randall worked to create a series of local organizations called monthly meetings, as well as a regional quarterly meeting. Eventually, an organization called the yearly meeting was formed that could rightfully be called the Free Will Baptist Church. Like many denominational titles, though, Free Will Baptist came to be the title of the group only after it had been in existence for about twenty years.

Randall and his Free Will associates had a connectional understanding of Baptist identity, rather than a hyperlocal understanding. The yearly meeting, also known as the Free Will Baptist Connexion, was the church, and the local congregations were extensions. For these early Free Will Baptists, the local congregation derived its authority from its membership in the parent body. By the time Randall died in 1808, the Free Will Baptist movement had spread throughout New England and was strong both at the local level and at the institutional level. The movement continued to flourish after his death, benefiting both from strong internal leadership and the external influences of the Second Great Awakening. The denomination-building spirit of the first half of the 1800s was not lost on the Free Will Baptists of New England. This group formed home and foreign mission societies, created a publication society, and founded an education society, as well as numerous colleges, including Hillsdale, Bates, and Colby.

ECUMENISM shaped much of Baptist identity in the twentieth century, including that of the Free Wills. Just as British Particular and General Baptists no longer found Calvinism and Arminianism strong enough points of identity to prevent merger, many Free Will Baptists and leaders in the larger, historically Calvinist Northern Baptist movement worked for a merger. In 1911, the Free Will Baptist Connexion of New England merged into the larger Northern Baptist Convention. About half of the congregations declined to participate in the merger, choosing to retain an explicitly Free Will identity. These Free Will Baptists developed stronger relations with the Free Will Baptists of the South, creating the National Association of Free Will Baptists in 1935.

Southern Free Will Baptists

While the northern branch of the Free Will Baptist movement developed largely through the work of one man without any strong connections to any other Baptist movement, the southern branch has a more complex origin that remains the subject of some debate among historians. The debate centers on the connections of the southern Free Will denomination, which formed in a mature institutional sense around 1829, to the earlier General Baptist movement. Free Will Baptist historians understand their movement to be the direct heir of General Baptist life in America. General Baptists, after a period of decline due to the proselytizing of Particular Baptists, emerged with renewed energy under the name Free Will.

Other historians contend that the two movements have no direct links. While the two groups have a similar Arminian theology, these historians contend that the similarity is one of correlation, not causation. The General Baptist movement totally died out. The Free Will Baptists of the 1820s constitute a totally separate movement with no connection to the Generals. Free Will Baptists, however, contend that after a massive numbers of General Baptists affiliated with the more dominant Calvinistic Baptists, a small remnant of churches and leaders worked to rebuild the Arminian Baptist movement. The movement never died out, according to their narrative. Instead, General Baptists survived, but survived very lean years in the late 1700s, which accounts for the paucity of documentary evidence left by the group. Eventually, General Baptists once again became vital and took the name Free Will.

A leading founder of North Carolina General Baptist life was Paul Palmer. Palmer was born in Maryland, baptized in Delaware, and ordained a minister in Connecticut. Around 1720, he arrived in North Carolina, finding General Baptists already there, but without a church. Palmer gathered these Baptists together and organized the first Baptist Church in that state. An itinerant rather than a pastor, Palmer's preaching resulted in the formation of other General Baptist Churches in the state (see ITINERANCY). Palmer was firmly Arminian in doctrine, and he found eager listeners among the English immigrants to the coastal regions of North Carolina. There is no clear date for his birth or death, but the absence of his name from records at a certain point indicates that he died no later than 1750.

One of the converts of Paul Palmer was Joseph Parker. Parker formed a General Baptist Church at Meherrin, North Carolina, that quickly became an important center of Arminian expansion. Parker also saw the population of North Carolina increase, and with that increase, he saw Calvinistic Baptists start to grow in the area. Beginning in the 1750s, Calvinistic and revivalist Separate Baptists not only started new congregations in North Carolina, they worked to convert General Baptists to their views. These efforts to gain new adherents to the Separate movement from among the Generals succeeded from the vantage point of the Calvinists. By the end of the 1700s, most General Baptist congregations had either totally identified with the Calvinist Baptist movement or they had atrophied. This targeting of the General Baptists was directed by leaders associated with the Philadelphia Baptist Association, the dominant Baptist organization of that period and the closest to a national organization that Baptists had. After the departure of large numbers of Generals for the ranks of the Calvinist Baptists, a small group of leaders such as Parker worked to keep the General movement alive.

The Free Will Baptist movement in the South grew out of the disarray among General Baptists in the second half of the eighteenth century. The debate centers on the nature of that growth. It may be that the General Baptist movement totally died. In that case, the Free Will Baptist movement is the ideological heir to the General Baptists, and it emerged to fill the vacuum left by the demise of these earlier Arminians. On the other hand, it may be that the Free Will Baptist movement in North Carolina represents an institutional development that occurred after General Baptists recovered from the decimation of their ranks. The documentary evidence is slim for making a firm conclusion either way. It is certain that there is no clear documentary link between the Generals and the Free Wills. It is also certain that Free Will Baptist is not a term used widely by General Baptists. However, there are scattered references to some General Baptists as Free Will Baptists in the late 1700s. The fact that the Free Will Baptist movement emerges at the time the General Baptist movement may have been “dying out” suggests that Free Will Baptist was simply a new term for an old movement.

Free Will Baptist churches grew strong in North Carolina from the 1830s through the rest of the century. This growth came despite numerous threats to the movement’s vitality. Free Will Baptists had their ranks challenged in the antebellum years by the Restorationist movements of both Thomas and Alexander Campbell (see CAMPBELL FAMILY) and the Disciples movement (see DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). Large numbers of Free Will Baptists left for traditions associated with RESTORATIONISM. However, the Free Will Baptists regrouped and gained a clearer sense of their identity. As North Carolina Free Will Baptists migrated to other parts of the South, they carried their Arminian Baptist identity with them, forming a counternarrative of Baptist identity that challenged the total hegemony of the more Calvinist SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. In 1845, the year that the Southern Baptist Convention was formed, the North Carolina General Conference of Original Free Will Baptists was formed. This organization served as the parent body of Free Will Baptist life in the South. The Conference was divided into associations that supervised subregions.

A National Denomination and a Schism

Northern and Southern Free Will Baptists made some attempts to connect their fellowships, although nothing permanent occurred until 1935. The impetus behind uniting the groups came in the merger of Northern Free Will Baptists into the Northern Baptist Convention in 1911. Many Free Will Baptists felt that their movement would be totally eliminated without a strong national DENOMINATION to nurture their Arminian heritage. Southern-heritage Free Will Baptists began working with those Northern Free Will Baptists who remained outside the Northern Baptist Convention. After a series of mergers and cooperative ventures between the two groups, the National Association of Free Will Baptists (NAFWB) was formed in 1935. For the first time, Free Will Baptists had a national denominational infrastructure that paralleled the organizations of other denominations.

As has been the case with other Baptist organizations, the local churches and regional movements created the national denomination rather than vice versa. Free Will Baptists had been present in America since the 1700s. The formation of the NAFWB brought together numerous different streams of Free Will Baptist life, united in their common Arminianism and in their desire to preserve the Free Will Baptist name. However, the national denomination had identity and POLITY issues that would eventually result in the departure of the historically significant North Carolina Conference.

The leadership of the NAFWB was heavily influenced by the twentieth-century FUNDAMENTALISM Movement, especially the separatist brand associated with Bob Jones University in Greenville, South Carolina. The young denomination opened the Free Will Baptist Bible College in 1938, largely modeled after Bob Jones University. Seven years later, North Carolina Free Will Baptists founded Mount Olive College, basing it on the classic liberal arts model of other small denominational colleges. Although not deliberately in competition with the Free Will Baptist Bible College, the two institutions symbolize two different approaches to Free Will identity, one separatist and one ecumenical.

With North Carolina Free Will Baptists moving in a different direction regarding HIGHER EDUCATION, it should come as no surprise that North Carolina would have other conflicts with the national body. These conflicts centered on the autonomy of the local congregation. Many classic Free Will Baptist bodies deemphasized the total autonomy of the local congregation. Local congregations were accountable in some sense to the parent denomination, a characteristic that Free Will Baptists shared with the General Baptists of an earlier era. In 1960, several members of a North Carolina congregation raised questions about the doctrinal ideas of their pastor and apparently the majority of the church members. The pastor stressed the concept of eternal security of the believer, an idea alien to historic Free Will thought. Those members with concerns brought their issues to the North Carolina Conference. The Conference ruled in favor of the minority, claiming that local congregations are subordinate to the parent denomination. The issue was eventually taken before the civil courts, which sided with the North Carolina Conference. However, the national denomination sided with the local congregation and stressed the issue of absolute congregational autonomy. The tension between NAFWB and North Carolina became permanent and North Carolina leaders withdrew from the national organization in 1962. Their North Carolina-based denomination, with its own college and publishing house, remains a strong, although small, representative of the Free Will Baptist identity.

Today, there are three main denominational bodies in the Free Will Baptist tradition. The NAFWB, based in Nashville, Tennessee, has more than 200,000 members and approximately 2,500 congregations. This group has a standard Free Will Arminian Baptist theology. Wedded to their Arminianism is an embrace of some Reformed developments of the late 1800s, namely BIBLICAL inerrancy. The General Conference of Original Freewill Baptists, based in North Carolina, has a much smaller membership, although the denomination is strong and growing. This group connects its Arminian Baptist identity with mainline Protestantism, seeing itself as one branch or denomination of the larger Church. Finally, there is a smaller Pentecostal Free Will Baptist Church.

This movement grew out of the Holiness and then Pentecostal work of G.B. Cashwell, who brought Pentecostal theology to the Free Will Baptists in the vicinity of Dunn, North Carolina.

See also Baptists, United States

References and Further Reading

Davidson, William F. The Free Will Baptists in America, 1727–1984. Nashville, TN: Randall House, 1985.

Dodd, Damon C. The Free Will Baptist Story. Nashville, TN: Executive Department of the National Association of Free Will Baptists, 1956.

Million, G.W. A History of Free Will Baptists. Nashville, TN: Board of Publication and Literature, National Association of Free Will Baptists, 1958.

Pelt, Michael R. A History of Original Free Will Baptists. Mount Olive, NC: Mount Olive College Press, 1996.

MERRILL M.HAWKINS, JR.

FREEDOM, LIBERTY

See Bill of Rights; Dissent; Toleration

FREEDOM OF RELIGION

See Bill of Rights; Toleration

FREEMAN, THOMAS BIRCH (1809– 1890)

Methodist missionary. The son of an African father and English mother, Freeman was born December 8, 1809 in Winchester, ENGLAND. He was accepted as a missionary by the Wesleyan Methodists in 1837 and ordained for work in West Africa. Before he left, he married for the first time. His wife died within two months of his arrival at Cape Coast, but he remained in West Africa for fifty-two years, with only two periods on furlough.

Adapting his PREACHING to local customs and practices he exercised a pioneering role in the development of METHODISM on the Gold Coast, appealing to Europeans and Africans alike. He recruited native Africans to ministries as well as attracting successive waves of European missionaries through the publication of his journals Of various visits to the Kingdoms of Ashanti, Yoruiba and Dahomi to promote the objects of the Wesleyan Missionary Society (1843), although half of them died within a year of arrival. His mission to the Ashanti captured the imagination of monarch and people in Britain who sent gifts and raised money to support his work. His opposition to the slave trade made the task of mission difficult, as did tribal wars and colonial policies.

Despite Freeman's success in raising funds for the mission, the Committee in London questioned his financial competence, leading to his resignation as general superintendent. After a number of years working for the colonial government as an administrator in the Accra district, he spent the last fifteen years of his life as a circuit minister, during which time the jubilee of the Gold Coast Mission was celebrated (1885). He died in August 1890, revered as the Father of West African Methodism.

See also Africa; Methodism; Missionary Organizations; Missions; Slavery; Slavery, Abolition of; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

Birtwistle, Allen. Thomas Birch Freeman: West African Pioneer. London: Cargate Press, 1950.

TIM MACQUIBAN

FREEMASONRY

Freemasonry is a worldwide fraternal order of men encouraging morality, charity, and fellowship through secret rituals and meetings open only to members. Although it has undergone many changes since its founding in the early eighteenth century, including a substantial decline in the late twentieth century, the fraternity still boasts some six million “brothers.” Masonry’s religious connections have been an important part of its appeal, but these ties have also aroused persistent opposition.

The Founding of the Fraternity

The origins of Freemasonry are unclear. Medieval stone masons sometimes met in “lodges” attached to specific building sites and sponsored legendary histories tracing the craft to the creation of Solomon’s Temple and before, a lineage appropriated by the later fraternal order. Seventeenth-century craft groups in London and Scotland accepted non-builders into their ranks, but the modern fraternity (what early brothers called “speculative” Masonry to distinguish it from “operative” builders) began in London during the years surrounding 1717. By the end of the 1720s, the new order had developed most of its distinctive forms: a three-degree system of rituals performed within local lodges supervised by national (or regional) grand lodges; charitable aid to Masons and others; the metaphorical use of building tools to represent moral truths; and a membership policy that accepted men of good character regardless of occupation, political loyalties, and even, within certain limits (most notably belief in a supreme Creator), religious belief. Intellectually, Masonry joined together hopes of secret wisdom (seen in boasts about the fraternity’s ancient origins) with early ENLIGHTENMENT ideals of order, balance, and mathematical regularity (symbolized by geometry and building), and a stress on unity among men of different backgrounds and beliefs. This ideal of brotherhood drew upon the contemporary critique of sectarian divisions by LATITUDINARIAN theologians.

The new fraternity spread quickly. By 1738, continental lodges had become so popular that a papal encyclical condemned the fraternity as a threat to social unity and true religion. Despite this religious opposition (and continuing official distrust), French Freemasonry continued to attract substantial support among the upper reaches of society. Mid-century French women even created their own Masonic organizations (the fraternity elsewhere still remains almost universally restricted to males). In both FRANCE and Germanic countries, Freemasonry also became identified with the Enlightenment, attracting such brothers as French jurist Charles Montesquieu (1689–1755), French poet Voltaire (1694–1778), Austrian composer Wolfgang Mozart (1756–1791), and JOHANN WOLFGANG GOETHE (1749–1832). When the FRENCH REVOLUTION broke out near the end of the century, a popular theory attributed it to lodges that had been corrupted by the Illuminati, an anti-Jesuit order that had briefly flourished in Bavaria (and that has continued to attract speculation from conspiracy theorists).

European sailors and merchants also spread Masonry into other parts of the world. A lodge met in Calcutta by 1729, although Indian lodges did not accept Hindus or Sikhs until the middle of the nineteenth century. English-speaking Masonry still uses the Bible within its rituals as “the volume of the sacred law” (as well as a key source of language and ritual stories), but the fraternity allows use of other sacred scriptures in non-Christian areas.

Lodges also spread into America, with the first Masonic groups meeting there in the 1730s. Masonic brothers divided on the American Revolution, but a number of the most important leaders were members, including Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) and George Washington (1732–1799). Post-Revolutionary Masonry gained extraordinary popularity, spreading into nearly every American locality in the years after 1790. Brothers were often called upon to dedicate public buildings (including the United States Capitol, whose cornerstone was laid by President Washington himself in 1792). Post-Revolutionary brothers also increasingly identified their order with Christianity. In the “higher degree” bodies developed in this period to expand on the original three degrees, Masons developed rituals that were often based upon Biblical stories and themes. Some enthusiastic brothers began to claim that the fraternity not only served divine purposes, but even had divine origin.

This broad enthusiasm, however, did not last. The 1826 kidnapping (and possibly murder) of William Morgan, an upstate New York brother who threatened to publish the fraternity’s rituals, by zealous brothers set off a substantial movement against Masonry. Drawing upon the emerging ideals of EVANGELICALISM and democracy, opponents argued that Masonry’s social exclusivity, broad religious inclusiveness, and use of Biblical material threatened Christianity and republican government. Helping to develop organizational methods of agitation and organization later used by abolitionism and other antebellum reform movements (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF), the anti-Masonic movement sponsored newspapers and even a political party that fielded a presidential candidate in 1832 and 1836. The attack was largely successful, virtually destroying Masonry in the northern United States. The fraternity began to revive only in the 1840s.

The Age of Fraternalism and After

Masonry in America and elsewhere became even more popular in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Masonic forms and ideas inspired and provided models for a host of new fraternal societies, including labor unions, mutual insurance companies, college fraternities, and ethnic organizations. Even American Catholics, attempting to blunt the appeal of Masonry and similar institutions crossing religious lines, established their own fraternal organization, the Knights of Columbus (1882). The language of brotherhood popularized by Freemasonry and its imitators became a key tenet of liberal Protestantism. Despite this growing competition, Masonry remained the largest and most prestigious of all fraternal orders. A variety of associated Masonic organizations took root in these years, including the newly popular Scottish Rite, Knights Templar, and Royal Arch bodies established before the CIVIL WAR (all initiating third-degree brothers into “higher degrees”), the new Order of the Eastern Star, Rainbow Girls, and DeMolay (for, respectively, women, girls, and boys related to Masons), and the Shrine (stressing organized charity and social enjoyment).

The twentieth century posed a variety of significant challenges to the fraternity. The Great Depression slowed Masonic growth. In both GERMANY and France, Nazis persecuted Masons as representatives of cosmopolitan universalism. More problematic for the fraternity in the long run was a substantial decline in membership during the last half of the twentieth century. Although American Masonry grew in the 1940s and 1950s, it thereafter fell from a high point of 4 million members to around 2.5 million. Only the relatively small African American “Prince Hall” branch of the fraternity, established before white Masonry began to accept African Americans in the 1960s, continues to thrive (members have included musician Duke Ellington [1899–1974], Supreme Court justice Thurgood Marshall [1908–1993], and civil rights leader Jesse Jackson [1941–]).

Even during its years of growth and expansion, Masonry continued to be dogged by opposition. The British fraternity has periodically aroused public fears that loyalty to the brotherhood subverts loyalty to the larger society. The Roman Catholic Church remains officially opposed to its members joining the fraternity, although local clergy have often been more accepting. American Fundamentalists (see FUNDAMENTALISM) often reject the fraternity as well. Most religious attacks, besides rather implausible complaints that Masonic rituals encourage Satanic worship, center on the dangers and compromises presumed necessary within an organization that professes religious purposes yet encourages a strong sense of brotherhood among men of different religious beliefs. Masons have usually countered by noting the fraternity’s encouragement of charity, morality, and friendship.

See also Fundamentalism; Slavery, Abolition of.

References and Further Reading

- Bullock, Steven C. Revolutionary Brotherhood: Freemasonry and the Transformation of the American Social Order. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Clawson, Mary Ann. Constructing Brotherhood: Class, Gender, and Fraternalism. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.
- DeHoyos, Art, and S. Brent Morris. Is It True What They Say About Freemasonry? The Methods of Anti-Masons. 2nd ed., rev. Washington, D.C.: Masonic Information Center, 1997.
members.aol.com/adehoyos/chapl.htm (October 2000).
- Dumenil, Lynn. Freemasonry and American Culture, 1880–1930. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.
- Gould, Robert Freke. Gould's History of Freemasonry Throughout the World. Edited by Dudley Wright. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1936.
- Hamill, John. The Craft: A History of English Freemasonry. Leighton Buzzard, Bedfordshire: Crucible, 1986.
- Jacob, Margaret C. Living the Enlightenment: Freemasonry and Politics in Eighteenth-Century Europe. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

STEVEN C.BULLOCK

FRENCH REVOLUTION

French Protestants in the late eighteenth century numbered approximately 700,000, or about 2 percent of the French population. The Calvinists lived mainly in the Midi, and the 200,000 Lutherans were centered on the Rhine frontier in Alsace. Before 1787, only the latter were legally protected thanks to the 1648 Treaty of Westphalia, leaving members of the religion pré-tendu réformée (to use the derogatory official designation) vulnerable to sporadic persecution into the 1760s. Spurred on by a cause célèbre like the Calas case, enlightened opinion was, by that date, ready to end the related fictions that France was a uniconfessional state and that the HUGUENOTS were disloyal opponents of the Bourbon monarchy. Careful lobbying of Louis XVI's ministers like Malesherbes, Necker, and Breteuil by able pastors like Rabaut de Saint-Etienne eventually elicited the "Edict Concerning Those Who Do Not Profess the Catholic Religion" in November 1787. Members of the Reformed Churches could marry before a royal judge or a curé (acting only as a civil officer), register the births of their children, and die knowing they could bequeath their estates to fellow Protestants. It was a limited measure that affirmed the monopoly of the Catholic Church in public WORSHIP and left Protestants still ineligible to hold public office. Notwithstanding its limitations, the Edict inspired most Protestant congregations to heighten their local profiles.

As FRANCE prepared for the meeting of the Estates General in 1789, Protestant laymen made the case for further concessions in the Cahiers or list of proposals for constitutional change that they, like other communities, were required to produce. Fifteen Protestant deputies were elected to the Estates General, determined to achieve full citizenship. The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (August 1789) established the general principle of religious liberty, and then a decree of Christmas Eve 1789 abolished the last legal inequalities between Protestants and Catholics. These concessions made Huguenots across France initially most sympathetic to the Revolution, as now they were no longer "foreigners in their own homeland." Protestants took up offices, joined the revolutionary clubs, bought Catholic Church land when it came on the market, and worshipped freely.

Interconfessional tensions increased in the winter of 1789–1790, especially so in Nîmes, a center of the silk industry second only to Lyon and home to a prosperous and ambitious Protestant community. Protestants dominated the officer corps of the town's National Guard and used it as an instrument to achieve post-Revolutionary supremacy in local politics. Worried Catholics in the new département of the Gard began to see the whole Revolution as a Protestant plot, and riots erupted in both Montauban and Nîmes in the spring of 1790. The so-called bagarre, or brawl, of Nîmes left about 20 Protestants and 300 Catholics dead in four days of street fighting. It was one of the worst outbreaks of violence in the first part of the French Revolution. Protestants in the Gard tended to be pro-Revolutionary because of the political and social benefits that the Revolution had conferred on them, and sectarian violence only began to diminish once members of the Reformed faith felt that their new legal status was beyond doubt. Lutherans were less enthusiastic than their Reformed brethren; the Revolution had brought them little and threatened to deprive them of much.

Protestants tended to support the Republic established in 1792 and became associated with the Girondin faction in the National Convention (to which nine Protestants were elected). When the latter were proscribed after the Jacobin coup of June 1793, the Reformed Church once again faced an uncertain future. Forty-seven of its leaders were executed for their part in the Federalist revolt in the Gard, while ordinary members faced the closure of their temples (or their conversion into “Temples of Reason”) as part of the state’s policy of de-Christianization. These constraints were not always unacceptable. Thus at La Rochelle there is evidence of bourgeois Protestant involvement in the drive against all public expressions of Christian practice. Pastors came under the same pressure as Catholic priests to make public renunciation of their ministry and their faith, and a majority did so. It has been calculated that of some 106 pastors in the synods of Languedoc (about 69 percent) abandoned their pastoral functions during the de-Christianization movement of 1793–1794, with at most one in five pastors attempting to keep some form of ministry going. Ex-pastors often enlisted in the service of the Republic, most famously Jeanbon Saint-André, who was given responsibility on the Committee of Public Safety for the Navy. Those who stayed in their posts had to resume old habits by going back underground, knowing that they risked imprisonment if discovered. With the collapse of the synodal and consistorial structures of the Reformed Church, the LAITY were left to their own devices. Most were not prepared to give up their faith. They may have paid lipservice to the Republican cults but, as at La Rochelle, went on clandestinely with their worship and conducted MARRIAGES and BAPTISMS.

Freedom of worship was not officially restored until the law of 3 ventôse Year III (February 21, 1795), when CHURCH AND STATE were formally separated. It was a mixed blessing for the leaderless Protestants when politicians tried to stand back from religious contestation. The way was effectively cleared for a fresh surge of sectarian killings, as Catholic murder gangs hunted down hundreds of Calvinists in the Gard and Lozère during the “white terror.” The recovery of a religious life after 1795 was difficult. In Alsace, pastors were able to restart church life quite promptly in 1795, but in Montbéliard, Uzès, the Vivarais, and the Agennais, organization required much attention; worship resumed in 1798 in La Rochelle, in 1801 in Marseille, and not before 1805 in Toulouse. Services often had to be conducted without a pastor, for, excluding Alsace, there were only 120 pastors active in 1799, at least one-third fewer than in 1789. Another consequence of the Revolution was a diminution of middle-class supporters, traditionally the fundraisers and willing members of the consistories, and the loss of revenue that resulted. After the Revolution, the two-thirds of the Protestant population who lived in the countryside kept the faith of their forefathers alive.

Relations between French Protestants and the state were finally and favorably regularized under the Napoleonic Concordat. Under that agreement and separate Organic Articles of April 1802, the 480,000 Calvinists and 200,000 Lutherans received better terms than those granted to the Catholics. The agreements gave them an unprecedented degree of official recognition, with Protestant churches established on a parallel basis to the Catholics, including provision for regularizing the formation of consistories (intended to ensure dominance by the social elite) and salaried pastors from 1804. But there was also continuing watchfulness by the new prefects in the provinces; Protestant synods could gather only with the express permission of the government. The new arrangement enabled Protestant groups to take up their worshipping and communal life again, and relations with the Catholic majority were seldom a problem thereafter, except in one or two areas like the Gard, the scene of renewed bloodletting during the Restoration of 1814–1815 in a second wave of the white terror.

See also Calvinism; Consistory; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Geoffrey. The Huguenots and French Opinion 1685–1787. The Enlightenment Debate on Toleration. Waterloo, Ontario, Canada: Published for the Canadian Corp. for Studies in Religion by Wilfrid Lauride, University Press, 1991.
- Bien, David D. The Calas Affair. Persecution, Toleration, and Heresy in Eighteenth-Century Toulouse. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1960.
- Dedieu, Joseph. Histoire Politique des Protestants Français (1715–1794). 2 vols. Paris: J.Gabalda, 1925.
- Hood, James N. "Revival and Mutation of Old Rivalries in Revolutionary France." Past and Present 82 (1979): 82–115.
- . "Protestant-Catholic Relations and the Roots of the First Popular Counterrevolutionary Movement in France." Journal of Modern History 43 (1971): 245–75.
- Lewis, G. The Second Vendée: The Continuity of Counter-Revolution in the Department of the Gard 1789–1815. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Ligou, Daniel. "Les Protestants Français a la veille de la Revolution." In La France Pré-Révolutionnaire. Edited by Pierre Léon Féral. Paris: Publisud, 1991, 125–135.
- Mours, Samuel, and Daniel Robert. Le Protestantisme en France du XVIIIe siècle a nos jours (1685–1970). Paris: Librairie Protestante, 1972.
- Poland, Burdette C. French Protestantism and the French Revolution. A Study in Church and State, Thought and Religion, 1685–1815. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1957.
- Woodbridge, J.D. "The Reformed Pastors of Languedoc Face the Movement of Dechristianization (1793–1794)." Secularisation: Problèmes d'Histoire du Christianisme 13 (1984): 77–89.

NIGEL ASTON

FRIENDS GENERAL CONFERENCE

The largest organization in North America of liberal Quakers belonging to the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers), the Friends General Conference (FGC) was founded in 1900 at Chautauqua, New York. The Conference was a merger of the First-Day School Conference, Friends Union for Philanthropic Labor, Friends Religious Conference, Friends Educational Conference, and Young Friends Associations. Seven Quaker yearly meetings with a combined membership of about 17,000—Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, Genesee, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—participated in the FGC from its beginning.

In accordance with long-standing liberal Quaker traditions, volunteers ran the FGC until 1904, when Henry Morse Wilbur was hired as secretary of the Advancement Committee, dedicated to encouraging the spread of Quaker beliefs and principles. In 1914, J. Barnard Walton became the new advancement secretary, serving until 1951. Walton's indefatigable travels helped to build the FGC and halt the decline of liberal Quaker membership. Jane Rushmore, hired in 1907, built up the FGC's religious education program.

The FGC's best-known program was its week-long summer gatherings, held annually or biennially, with an attendance of 1,500 to 3,000 people. From 1916 to 1968, these conferences were held almost exclusively in Cape May, New Jersey, in even-numbered years. They were held mostly for purposes of education and spiritual renewal. In the mid-to late-twentieth century, the FGC expanded as liberal Quakers from Baltimore to New York healed old schisms with Orthodox Quakers and as many new yearly meetings, often with most members in college towns, joined up, extending the geographical range from Maine and Eastern Canada to Minnesota and from Florida to Texas (but not the West Coast, except Alaska and Western Canada). In 2000, FGC yearly meetings had approximately 32,945 members.

See also Friends, Society of; Society of Friends in North America

References and Further Reading

Birchard, Bruce. "Nurturing Vital Quaker Meetings and SpiritFilled Friends." Friends Journal 46 no. 5 (2000): 6–10.

Haines, Deborah. "Friends General Conference: A Brief Historical Overview." Quaker History 89 no. 2 (2000): 1–16.

STEPHEN W. ANGELL

FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE FOR CONSULTATION

The Friends World Committee for Consultation (FWCC) is the most broadly representative organization of the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers) worldwide, embracing all branches of Friends. Arising from a proposal at a 1937 conference in Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, it was founded in 1938 at Doorn, the NETHERLANDS. Its first chairman was Carl Heath, an English peace activist. Before World War II, the FWCC's membership was limited mainly to European and American Quakers, but in the postwar era membership expanded to include churches from AFRICA, Asia, AUSTRALIA, and LATIN AMERICA.

The FWCC's most valuable contribution has been the facilitation of Quaker intervisitation. Douglas Steere, philosopher and writer on spirituality from Haverford College, traveled extensively on behalf of the FWCC, especially during the 1960s. Steere was a Quaker observer at the Vatican II Council and a speaker at a Christian-Buddhist dialogue in JAPAN, one among many ecumenical activities in which the FWCC has participated. The FWCC is a chief sponsor of Quaker United Nations Offices in New York and Geneva, SWITZERLAND.

A variety of peacemaking and civil liberties efforts in the UNITED STATES and worldwide have been held under FWCC auspices. In 1967, in response to an FWCC Conference calling for "an all-out attack on want," the FWCC formed the "Right Sharing of the World's Resources" (RSWR), which called for the gift of 1 percent of all Quakers' income to the poor. The RSWR has since become independent of the FWCC. The FWCC's major gatherings are triennial; it has met every three years since 1952. As of 2002, yearly meetings with a membership of 255, 246, about three-quarters of the worldwide total Quaker membership of 338, 219, were affiliated with the FWCC.

See also American Friends Service Committee; Friends, Society of; Society of Friends in North America

References and Further Reading

Hadley, Herbert. Quakers World Wide. London: Friends World Committee for Consultation, 1991.
STEPHEN W.ANGELL

FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF

There is a certain polarization in the identity of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, founded by GEORGE Fox (1626–1691) and others in the middle of the seventeenth century. On the one hand, Quakerism was formed by the Protestant legacy of the REFORMATION; there was, in Fox and also in such a major articulator of Quaker thought as Robert Barclay (1648–1690), a strong proclivity toward Protestant doctrines—of humanity’s sinfulness and the certainty of human damnation were it not for the supreme efficacy of Christ’s saving DEATH, and of the AUTHORITY of Scripture as God’s revelation supplying divine truth in place of what in human beings would otherwise be immutable ignorance. In that kind of formulation, humankind’s sole help lay in agencies outside humanity itself; the redemption won by Christ in an action in time past entirely free of positive human involvement, with the Scripture standing apart from men and women as an outside light. To set against that line of thought, an anthropologically more optimistic Quaker approach stressed a capacity for goodness within the human person and an access to the revelation of truth from wellsprings deep within the minds and spirits of women and men: the “inner light.” In this article attention will be given to the Quaker ambivalence over what may be simplified as “externalist” and “internalist” tendencies in Quaker religious thought. Here the focus is on the influences of Protestantism, emphasizing the elements of Quaker religious thought that belong within the camp of the Protestant Reformation.

Indeed, the Protestant features of the Society of Friends have sometimes been obscured in a traditional Quaker historiography that saw it as representing a radical breakaway from the conventional English Protestantism of the seventeenth century. Especially in a school of Quaker historical writing that emerged in the nineteenth century, the Quaker founder George Fox and the early Friends were seen as having mounted a sharp reaction away from, and a repudiation of, the most pronounced forms of Calvinist Protestantism in mid-seventeenth-century England, those of PRESBYTERIANISM, Independents, and BAPTISTS, the principal Puritan groupings of the age of the English CIVIL WARS and revolution. Thus in his pioneering survey of mid-seventeenth-century English religious radicalism, The Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth (1876), the Quaker historian Robert Barclay quoted the Victorian religious thinker C.H. SPURGEON to the effect that “the Puritans, who had been like the spring buds and blossoms, were getting into the sere and yellow leaf, and the Independents, and Baptists, and other sects, who were at times thoroughly and even remarkably spiritual, were growing worldly, political and vain glorious” (Barclay 1876:191). The truth was, Barclay himself argued, that Fox and the first Quakers undertook nothing less than the reformation of the English Reformation, whereas the early Quakers’ own historiography of their origins used the kind of vocabulary that had earlier been used by writers such as JOHN FOXE to contrast the corruptions of pre-Reformation Catholicism with the light of the gospel shed by godly change under HENRY VIII, Edward VI, and ELIZABETH I. As a contemporaneous account of the hostility that the Friends faced from the mainstream churches in the national establishment of religion in ENGLAND in the Puritan ascendancy of the 1650s put it, “the Baptists sued us for the very tythe eggs. It can hardly be declared the cruel havoc and spoyle the Presbyterians made. Their priests made poor people come up two hundred miles...”—to be exploited. The early Friends, then, in their own self-perception, stood not for a linear continuity with Reformation Protestantism, but rather for a rejection of Protestantism’s own corruptions and represented the authentic reformation.

George Fox

Fox himself drew the clearest line between the new reformation he claimed to represent and the existing Protestant TRADITION forged in Tudor and Stuart England. In the first place, Fox depicted the self-acclaimed “godly” religion established in the post-Civil War England (into which he erupted as an evangelist from about 1652 onward) as a system of featherbedding clerical self-interest and self-indulgence. The CLERGY of the mainstream branches of established PURITANISM were “hireling teachers” or “priests,” dismissively labeled as such to ensure that they were firmly counted in with the old Catholic clerical estate whose supremacy, Fox implied, had hardly been lessened in a post-Reformation England, where the very parish churches still used for worship had been erected “in ye darke time of popery.” However, beyond the moral criticism of an ecclesiastical reformist denouncing the practical shortcoming of an established church, Fox took issue on a more fundamental level with what he portrayed as the false doctrines of England’s supposedly Protestant establishment of religion in the 1650s. In particular, he attacked what he saw as contemporaneous Protestantism’s obsession with humanity’s sinfulness: Fox told Protestant ministers that they “preach up sin...It was all their workes to plead for itt...they came to plead for sin & imperfections....” And indeed it was true that the Protestant preachers of Fox’s day, such as JOHN BUNYAN (1628–1688), did make much of SIN, and linked it to their equal stress on the necessity and indispensability of redemption from its effects by Christ’s sole saving power, a “Protestant” insistence that Fox fully shared. For Fox lacked the sense of intrinsic human sinlessness per se commonly attributed to English ultra-radical groups, such as the Ranters of the 1650s. Instead, he manifested a strongly Protestant conviction that “Hee hath Taken away my sinne (viz: Christ my saviour)...” (Fox 1911:56,2).

No doubt, aspects of early Quaker spirituality, including the conviction of identity with Christ as expressed in the Quaker James Nayler’s (1617–1660) ride into Bristol in 1656 in imitation of Jesus’s Palm Sunday entry into Jerusalem, fostered the contemporaneous perception on the part of more orthodox Protestants that the Quakers' CHRISTOLOGY was only interiorist, replacing the historic and salvific Jesus with an elusive spiritual and internal Christ-spirit present in the devout man or woman. Fox determinedly repulsed such an attitude, in a strong affirmation of the actuality of the saving Jesus who died and rose in historical time. Thus the Reformation's, and above all, MARTIN LUTHER'S understanding of the ATONEMENT as a defined and redemptive historical event—in the terms of the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, on whose LITURGY Fox was reared, “one oblation once offered,” “a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice...”—was strongly reaffirmed in 1650 when Fox declared his faith that Christ “did suffer without ye gates at Jerusalem...there outwardely...” What is particularly interesting is that Fox chose to use a language of externality—“without ye gates,” “there outwardely”—that was designed to emphasize the once-accomplished action of the crucified Christ, who came “to purchase & sanctifie & redeeme” “with his bloode,” a vocabulary almost uncannily similar to that used by the self-appointed defender of Protestantism Bunyan in an encounter he conducted in 1656 with the Quaker spokesman Edward Burroughs. On that occasion, Bunyan tried to fault Burroughs as a traitor to the Reformation pillars of Christ's historically achieved redemption once won for us, outside of us. Yet at the beginning of that same decade of the 1650s, Fox himself nailed the nascent Quaker movement firmly to the Protestant mast of acceptance of Christ's primary role as savior of mankind.

In that singularly disputatious decade of the 1650s, a debate that Fox held with a Jesuit in 1658 offered further proof of his embrasure within the English Protestant mainstream, with its vivid current of antipopery. Fox's debating articles for this encounter began with the motion “whether or noe ye church of Rome was not degenerated from ye Churh [sic] in ye primitive times from there life & doctrine & ye power & spiritt that they was in....” “He went on to demand “what scriptures Catholics had for setting uppe cloysters for Nunns & Monasteryes & Abbeys for men: and for all there severall orders. And what scripture had they for praying by beades & to Images: & for making Crosses & forbidding of meates & marriages & for putting people to death for religion.”

The features of Catholicism to which Fox there took issue—MONASTICISM, religious orders, the use of the rosary and veneration of images, compulsory fasting and CELIBACY, religious persecution—informed the common agenda of well-established English Protestant objections to popery, which was habitually depicted as a system both of superstition (as in, e.g., Andrew Marvell's 1677 An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England) and of unwarranted affronts to Christian liberty. Fox's hapless Jesuit antagonist went on to try to defend the practices of his church with reference to the DOCTRINE of its extra-Scriptural traditions, a source of authority whose authenticity was affirmed by the sixteenth-century Catholic Council of Trent. Fox, though, like any staunch Protestant in the lineage of Luther, riposted by taking his stand on the authority of Scripture alone; when the Jesuit father claimed, in defense of the customs of the Catholic Church, support from allusions in 2 Thessalonians:3 to what Paul had vouchsafed to that church in the form of “the tradition that we passed on to you,” Fox “bid him reade yt scripture againe: & there hee might see howe hee perverted ye Apostles words....”

The more general controversy over Scripture next focused on its proof texts for opposed understandings of the Eucharist. Here Fox insisted on an outright rejection of the Catholic Church's Eucharistic doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, according to which the elements of bread and wine in holy communion (LORD'S SUPPER) were totally transformed into the very essence of the body and blood of Christ. Fox, adopting a somewhat coarse-grained and materialistically minded skepticism concerning the Catholic formula, proceeded to a rather far-fetched offer of a wager with the "pope & some of his cardinals & Jesuites" according to which, if the bread and wine of the Eucharist underwent no decay, Fox and his people would promptly become Catholic converts—with a viceversa clause built into the bet. The tone of the caustic little satire is unmistakably Anglo-Protestant, articulating an evolved national CULTURE of contempt for Catholicism—displayed in, for example, the elaborate anti-popish displays conducted during the campaign in 1679–1681 for the exclusion from the throne of the Catholic James Duke of York. Thus the Quaker founder Fox showed himself to be both formed by and powerfully expressive of his country's entrenched Protestant anti-Catholic culture.

William Penn and Robert Barclay

The strongly etched Protestantism of the early Quaker mainstream was affirmed by one of the movement's best-known early leaders, WILLIAM PENN (1644–1718). It is true that in 1668 Penn, in his Sandy Foundations Shaken undermined some of the chief buttresses of Protestantism, including PREDESTINATION and the traditional "forensic" understanding of the Atonement according to which Christ was cast to become man so that, human and divine, he alone could redeem humanity. Even so, it was also Penn who stated, twenty years after that seemingly un-Protestant work of 1668, that he "loved the protestant religion above his life." In the intervening years between 1668 and 1688, English and Welsh Quakerism, sharing in the fullest measure the persecution heaped on the dissenting Protestant groups after the Restoration of Anglican monarchy in 1660, in fact itself underwent a continuing alignment of its doctrines to the Protestant center.

The chief architect of this process was the Scot Robert Barclay (1648–1690), the author of a series of works on Quaker dogmatics, the best known of which is An Apology for the True Christian Divinity (1676), described as "one of the most impressive theological writings of the seventeenth century." Before his CONVERSION to Quakerism, Barclay received his early education at Scots College, Paris, a Catholic seminary of which his uncle was principal. Indeed, he later recalled that in his schooling he had been "defiled by the pollutions of popery," but was thereby perhaps led more positively into appreciative approaches to writings of the great medieval Catholic writers, Tauler, St. Bernard, Bonaventure, and Thomas a Kempis. However, in his Apology, Barclay was at pains to reveal the distinctiveness of the Quaker way and its pursuit of truths central to the Christian message from which both Catholicism and Protestantism were aberrant. His most dramatic severance of his Quakerism from the Protestant core undoubtedly lay in his description of the Reformation doctrine of reprobation—the predestined consigning of sinners to their damnation—as "horrible and blasphemous." Even so, in his attempt to steer a midway course between the churches of the Reformation and of the Counter-Reformation, we find Barclay leaning his tiller closer to Wittenberg and Geneva than to Rome and Paris.

A focal issue—the pillar, indeed, in the midst of the doctrinal battlefield between Reformation and antiReformation—on which we might test that last statement is that of JUSTIFICATION, the process by which men and women are accounted acceptable in God’s sight. For Barclay, the Catholic understanding of justification was fundamentally erroneous (“vitiating”), so that “Luther did not without great Ground oppose himself to them in this Matter.” This was because, in Barclay’s view, the Catholic sense of the works by which sinners were justified amounted in fact to a parcel of financial deals, bulls, pardons, and indulgences, the accoutrements of “the Pope’s Doctrine of Merits, the most beneficial of all his Revenue.” As Barclay in his great work progressively distanced himself from Catholicism as an apparatus of delusive external works that did not in fact justify sinners, he proceeded to repudiate with considerable force the centerpiece of Catholic worship, the Mass, in which “they pretend to offer Christ daily to the Father...so that a Man for Money can procure Christ thus to be offered for him when he pleases...” (Barclay 1765:165, 167).

If the Catholics trusted too much for their justification in bogus meritorious routines, then the Protestants, Barclay continued, invested too much confidence in FAITH alone to justify. But it was at just this point that, instead a holding a balancing line between the theories of SALVATION (soteriology) of the Catholic and Protestant Churches, Barclay showed his own real affinity with the apprehension of justification that descended down from Luther and JOHN CALVIN to the evolving Protestantism of the later seventeenth century. We can appreciate the full extent of the Protestantism of one of Quakerism’s greatest doctrinal formulators in phrases of his that could be taken as textbook layouts of what Reformation soteriology amounts to: “Justification springs of, and from the Love of God:

Neither can we procure Remission of Sins or Justification by any Act of our own, so as to merit it, or draw it as a Debt from God due unto us; but we acknowledge all to be of and from his Love, which is the original and fundamental Cause of our Acceptance.... God manifested this Love towards us, in the sending of his beloved Son the Lord Jesus Christ into the World, who gave himself for us an Offering and a Sacrifice to God.... Neither do we think that Remission of Sins is to be expected, sought, or obtained any other Way, or by any Works or Sacrifice whatsoever.... So then Christ by his Death and Sufferings hath reconciled us to God, even while we are Enemies....

We can readily trace the lines of those formulas back to Calvin, for although the phrases may be in different order and variant language, the same meaning is unmistakable: Christ’s sole and sufficient redeeming action as commissioned by the Father out of God’s own love, bringing reconciliation where there had been enmity, and our own lack both of need and capacity to strive to achieve our own justification. As Calvin wrote:

All that we have hitherto said of Christ leads to this one result, that condemned, dead, and lost in ourselves, we must in him seek righteousness, deliverance, life, and salvation.... The office of Redeemer was assigned him in order that he might be our Saviour.... God...as our enemy until he was reconciled to us by Christ.... [Therefore], we must fix our eyes and minds on Christ alone, as it is to him alone that our sins, which necessarily provoked the wrath of God, are not imputed to us. Hence that imputation of righteousness without works..., the righteousness found in Christ alone being accepted as if it were ours. (Calvin 1875:1, 434–436, 457).

A point of difference might appear to have arisen over Barclay's authentically Quaker appreciation of opportunities for SANCTIFICATION in what has been termed the "transforming power of the Cross." Seen in that light, the Atonement was more than a forensic process of apportioning to sinful men and women, who remained no more than "justified sinner," the imputed fruits of Christ's redeeming action. The second stage, as it were, of redemptive action saw the operation of "this pure and perfect Redemption in ourselves, purifying, cleansing, and redeeming us from the Power of Corruption, and bringing us into Unity, Favour, and Friendship with God." Could Calvin's soteriological analysis accommodate such a sense of progress and transformation? Indeed it could—for in his devotional classic, originally part of the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION and known as the Golden Booklet of the True Christian Life, Calvin traced the route of perfection:

The Lord has adopted us to be his children on this condition that we reveal an imitation of Christ who is the mediator of our adoption.... Perfection must be the final mark at which we aim, and the goal for which we strive.... Let us steadily exert ourselves to reach a higher degree of holiness till we shall finally arrive at a perfection of goodness which we seek and pursue as long as we live.... (Calvin 1981:15, 18–19).

Barclay's Quaker-Protestant understanding of a justification that led on to sanctification was, to say the least, to be accommodated within a Protestant schema that led back to Calvin and that ran through a line that led via the greatest expositor of Reformed doctrine in England, WILLIAM PERKINS (1558–1602), who devised a graph that included the stages of effectual calling, justification, sanctification, glorification, and life eternal. The Quaker Robert Barclay ought to be viewed within that English Protestant lineage.

Quietism

A subsequent Quaker spiritual development, quietism, was viewed by the great historian of the Friends, RUFUS M. JONES, as having been bequeathed to the movement as a legacy of mystical and contemplative devotion by Barclay. The eighteenth-century quietist phase of Quaker history, marked as it was by tendencies toward "habit and custom" rather than the pristine "freshness and surprise...creative insight and discovery...fluidity and mobility” of the first Friends, arose, Jones wrote, especially from Barclay’s sense of the essential oppositeness of divine and human illumination. In other words, quietism sprang out of “the absolute despair of human nature which Protestant theology...had greatly intensified.” Quietist thought, then, insisted on the negation of all that was indigenously human in the makeup of men and women and its replacement by divine inspirations. On the basis of those divine leadings, however, people might be set free for lives not of contemplative inaction, but rather of intense activity.

Indeed, the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries—Jones’s classic “quietist” period—also formed a golden age of Quaker activism in the world, especially the world of social reform and ameliorism. The great prison reformer ELIZABETH FRY (1780–1845) typified those urges, and Quaker radical statesman John Bright (1811–1889) was born and raised within the period of the ascendancy of quietist spirituality among Friends. Whereas English Quakers of that period focused on attempts to create a kind of Christian humanitarianism, their American co-religionists were exercised by the moral stigma of SLAVERY in their own country. JOHN WOOLMAN (c. 1720–1772) was the eighteenth-century American patron saint of the Quaker witness against slavery’s inhumanity, although we seem at first hearing to listen to the voice of the ENLIGHTENMENT when we read Woolman’s announcement that “all nations are of one blood” and “of a general brotherhood.” But the real inspiration for Woolman’s humane UNIVERSALISM was not so much secular enlightened liberalism as the Scriptures, and specifically the witness of Genesis 3:20 to the common ancestry of humankind. Indeed, in his Quaker-Protestant voice, Woolman used Scripture as the chief seal of his authority (“Holy Writ”), with citations from Paul and, liberally, from the Old Testament. Woolman, too, was no less “Protestant” in his doctrine of the Fall and of redemption won “thro the wonderful love of God, in Christ Jesus our Lord,” a redemptive action that had the capacity to restore humanity to the “primitive harmony” that prevailed before sin sowed discord on earth (Woolman 1776:256, 270).

Even so, the Quaker-quietist preoccupation with personal holiness produced in the eighteenth century a revulsion away from the central doctrines of the Protestant Reformation of salvation won for humankind vicariously through the merits of Christ crucified, benefits transferred to the credit of the justified sinner. Jones calls this traditional Protestant approach, which took its rise directly from Luther and Calvin, “forensic,” meaning that it envisaged a legal transaction in which the Father, taking note of the penalty paid by Christ on the cross to take away sins, attributed the fruits of that expiating action to the account of (selected) human sinners, clearing their accounts of sin and guilt and requiring no investment from them into the salvific process, because the Son’s work was in itself all-sufficient for atonement. In Woolman himself we encounter an appreciation, which Barclay himself had pioneered, of the participation of suffering saints in the entirety of the work of redemption. Woolman’s fellow American Quaker Job Scott was a powerful spokesman of a reaction away from the forensic schema that formed the bedrock of Reformation soteriology. Indeed, we seem to hear in Scott’s teaching an echo of pre-Reformation emphases, found above all in Thomas a Kempis’s (1379–1471) The Imitation of Christ, which portrays Christ as an exemplar and model quintessentially to be followed as the template of our own strenuous achievement of holiness. Of course, as discussed earlier, the second pillar of the Reformation, Calvin, stressed sanctification in the persons of the elect, but Luther had challenged and reversed the Kempian concern with merit and the pursuit of perfection when he declared, in his lectures on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, that:

Wherefore Paul saith...that Christ first began and not we. 'He, even he (saith Paul) loved me and gave himself for me.' As if he said: He found in me no good will nor right understanding; but this good Lord had mercy upon me. He saw me to be nothing else but wicked, going astray, contemning God and flying from him more and more; yea, rebelling against God, taken, led, and carried away captive to the devil (Luther 1956:176).

But Scott was closer to Kempis than he was to Luther when he postulated, not as with Luther, the sinner, that were it not for Christ, moving in inexorable alienation away from God, but instead a movement, in Kempis's pattern, of discipleship, of imitation, and of following within Christ's footsteps to a personal cross of suffering on which sainthood was to be achieved:

And do not the obedience, suffering and death of Christ, as plainly point out to us the necessity of a life of obedience, self-denial, and death unto sin, as even outward circumcision pointed out the circumcision of the heart? And is it not on the very ground of this necessity of a real self-denial, and death to sin, that Christ insists upon it, that whoever will be his disciple, must first deny himself, take up his daily (mark daily) cross and follow him? Follow him! What is that? Why it is to take his Holy Spirit for our leader and guide into all truth; to take him for our pattern and example; and to follow him, wheresoever he leadeth us, in the way of regeneration, self-denial, the loss of our life, and death unto all sin (Jones 1921:78).

Thus the Lutheran soteriologic scheme, according to which sinners, on the account of Christ's saving death, are quite passively considered just in God's audit, seems in Scott to be supplanted by a sharp sense of the would-be saint's actively following in a route of seeking perfection by active, earnest, and self-denying endeavor, Christ being the exemplar and stencil-plate. Even so, Scott's rooting in quietism induced in him an appreciation, which returns us to an essentially Protestant outlook, that nothing good in humanity could subsist and activate without being, as Scott put it, "moved" and "initiated" divinely, for works and even prayers arising from the natural "creature" would not "get the blessing," and to "utter a request to God rightly always requires His divine, living, immediate assistance."

Evangelicalism

If the authentic legacy of the Reformation and Protestantism's insistence that anything that is of worth in human hearts and souls is of God is so far advanced in the Quaker quietist Scott, his DENOMINATION was about to undergo a fundamental realignment to the reawakening of Protestantism and its doctrines, especially those of salvation, known as the Evangelical revival and taking its rise from the missionary work of the Methodist founder, JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791). Partly as a result of personal contacts with Methodists, the Quaker minister Mary Dudley (1750–1823) brought into her PREACHING and writing a firm and vibrant emotional reaffirmation of the principles of the Reformation that Wesley himself had imparted to the widespread Evangelical movement that fed new currents of spirituality both inside and apart from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND between the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (see EVANGELICALISM). Dudley's watchwords were absolutely resonant of the whole Evangelical movement within the Protestant churches in that period: "the original fall and degeneracy of man" rectified by God's "stupendous plan of redemption." Dudley also saw herself as entrusted with the correction of errors in the Quakerism of her day—rationalism on the one hand and confidence in the efficacy of good works to save—which had obscured the message of the scriptures:

Preach Christ crucified...be not afraid to preach the cross of Christ and to proclaim not only what he would do within us by His Spirit, but also what he hath done without [outside of] us, the all-atoning sacrifice which should never be lost sight of.

In such words, Mary Dudley restated ProtestantQuaker principles that can be traced back to Fox and his insistence that Christ "did suffer without ye gates at Jerusalem there outwardly." The central affirmation—whatever the importance in Quaker spirituality of an appreciation of a light and, indeed, of a spirit, of Christ within the believer—was of an objective historical saving action taking place in history and external to our more individual experiences. The difference in the Evangelical period was to an extent one of tone, for whereas Reformation and post-Reformation thought on the issues of salvation and GRACE revolved around the legal and forensic issues with which Luther had to grapple, by the late eighteenth century it may have been the emotional and individualist emphases of the Romantic movement that found their way as influences into Evangelical Quaker discourse, such as that of the Quaker preacher Thomas Shillitoe (1754—1836):

I feel I have nothing to depend upon, but the mercies of God in Christ Jesus. I do not rely for salvation upon any merits of my own; all my own works are as filthy rags... my faith is in the merits of Jesus Christ and in the offering he made for us. I trust my past sins are all forgiven me... that they have been washed away by the blood of Christ, who died for my sins.

At the height of the Evangelical ascendancy within Quakerism, in works such as the Principles of Religion (1805), Henry Tuke (1755–1814) summarized its positions on such topics as the infallibility of Scripture, the degeneracy of humankind after the Fall, and the absolute indispensability of the Atonement to rectify the terrible consequences of the sin of Adam and Eve. Even so, Evangelical voices did not command the entire Quaker repertoire in the nineteenth century. The American Quaker preacher Elias Hicks (1748–1830) took his stand on the distinctive and venerable Quaker tradition of the inner light and proclaimed an interiorist view that accepted Christ as redeemer—as was the case, of course, in the classic Reformation Christian formulation—but in the shape rather of an inner force: “...no other Saviour but such an one who takes His residence in the very centre of the soul of man can possibly bring salvation to man.” Hicks’s interiority traced the dividing line between his in many ways traditional or conservative Quakerism and the neo-Protestant teachings of the Evangelicals. His insistence on “a portion of God,” or even an “inward God,” “the uncreated Word,” “Christ,” within the believer removed the necessity of a salvation that came from any force apart from the self. Scripture, too, that Evangelical and Protestant touchstone and inerrant reservoir of objective revealed truth, was sidelined in Hicks’s scheme as being an external source, an “out ward instrumental help” “to lead the minds of the children of men home to this divine inward principle manifested in their own hearts and minds.” The formal “Great Separation” of 1827–1828 between Evangelical and “Hicksite” Friends in North America, a Quaker schism unhealed to the present day, dramatically exposed the tension between the two strands, Protestant and Evangelical versus interiorist and spiritual, that have formed the Quaker identity since the inception of the Society of Friends.

See also American Friends Service Committee; Calvinism; Individualism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Romanticism; Society of Friends in North America

References and Further Reading

- Barclay, Robert (the elder). An Apology for the True Christian Divinity, being an Explanantion and Vindication of the Principles and Doctrines of the people called Quakers. 8th ed. Birmingham, UK: John Baskerville, 1765.
- Barclay, Robert (the younger). The Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1876.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Translated by Henry Beveridge. 2 vols. Edinburgh, UK: T & T. Clark, 1875.
- . Golden Booklet of the True Christian Life. Translated by Henry J. van Andel. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1952.
- Fox, George. The Journal of George Fox. Edited by Norman Penney. 2 vols. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1911.
- Ingle, H.Larry. First Among Friends: George Fox and the Creation of Quakerism. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Ingle, H.Larry. Quakers in Conflict: The Hicksite Reformation. Knoxville, TN: University of Tennessee Press, 1986.
- Jones, Rufus M. The Later Periods of Quakerism. 2 vols. London: Macmillan, 1921.
- Luther, Martin. A Commentary on St. Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians. Translated by anonymous, 1575. London: James Clarke, 1953.

MICHAEL A.A.MULLETT

FRONTIER RELIGION

The perception of a religion distinctive to the North American frontier originated in the early twentieth century with the application of Frederick Jackson Turner's "Frontier Thesis" to camp meeting revivalism. These outdoor evangelical events were often huge, spanning several days, with participants camping on site. One result was the appearance of chaos and pandemonium. The most notorious characteristic of CAMP MEETINGS was the seemingly inexplicable bodily expressions of spiritual feeling, particularly the "jerks," which appeared to fit well into Turner's contention that the wilderness environment produced a unique American CULTURE. Camp meeting revivalism, which first appeared in Kentucky in 1800, lent credence to this interpretation. The primitive environment seemed to produce wild expressions of religious feeling. As recent historians have demonstrated, however, the camp meeting format descended from main streams of American Protestant THEOLOGY. The idea of environmental causes has also been abandoned. Despite camp meeting revivalism's origins in the new nation's western region, most appeared in more densely populated neighborhoods, under the direction of ordained ministers, where religious congregations had existed for several years. Moreover, the format quickly spread to urban areas of the east because of its evangelical power. Although the impression of a religiously starved, unrestrained, and ignorant pioneer population persists, it is outdated by more than two decades of scholarship.

Large outdoor evangelical events were not new anywhere in America, but the Kentucky innovation of camping on the meeting grounds greatly intensified religious appeals for spiritual rebirth. Participants coexisted, for a few days at least, in a total environment marked by interdenominational cooperation and New Testament principles, removed from normal daily cares and social distinctions. The Methodists, led by FRANCIS ASBURY, were more comfortable than most other American denominations with emotionally charged spiritual expressions and immediately embraced the new evangelical format. Camp meeting revivalism quickly spread and fueled the new denomination's growth.

The impact in frontier regions was compounded by the decentralized structure of early American METHODISM. Bishop Asbury immediately perceived the camp meeting's potential. He also responded promptly to the expansion of western settlement through a system of itinerant ministers assigned to preaching circuits. The itinerant CIRCUIT RIDERS were able to bring group WORSHIP to the farthest reaches of settlement, where local populations were not yet able to support a permanent ministry. Nearly all white Americans were at least nominally Christian, and although the pious could read Scripture and engage in private PRAYER in the absence of institutionalized religion, the Methodist circuit riders often offered the first opportunity for group worship. Many westerners descended from other denominations, but group worship, however infrequent the circuit rider's visits, and the BAPTISM of children as Christians, lured many families away from their former denominations.

Those denominations that required an educated ministry, such as the Presbyterians, struggled to keep up with the rapid settlement expansion. One response was the formation of a missionary corps of young men. For example, the Connecticut Missionary Society, organized in 1798, sent a regular stream of Congregational ministers to the New Englanders who settled Ohio's Western Reserve. In frontier regions settled by adherents of multiple denominations, the result was often a confusing, although not to say un-Christianlike, interdenominational rivalry. An unattractive aspect of American Christianity, interdenominational competition has yet to be studied in detail. It was no doubt strongest in frontier regions where the availability of affordable land brought believers from different denominations into closer geographical proximity than was usually the case in the seaboard states.

The other target of "home missionary" work on the frontier was the Native American population. Efforts to convert Native Americans to Christianity originated with the beginnings of European settlement. The most significant missionary work during the eighteenth century was by German missionaries John Heckewelder of the MORAVIAN CHURCH and David Zeisberger of the United Brethren in western Pennsylvania and the Ohio Valley. However, CONVERSION to Christianity proceeded slowly and offered little protection from attack. In particular, the infamous massacre of nearly 100 Delaware believers (mostly women and children) at the Moravian settlement known as Gnadenhütten in 1782 deterred efforts of similar scale. After several wars of conquest in the early years of the republic, religious outreach to the scattered groups of Indian survivors received fresh attention. But the efforts to Christianize Indians met with general resentment or indifference, not only because missionaries demanded a rejection of native religious beliefs, but also because they nearly always required also the adoption of European cultural practices. Christian Indians were expected to abandon traditional GENDER roles, folkways, and systems of justice. A few Americans, such as Methodist James B. Finley and Baptist Isaac McCoy, made Indian MISSIONS a central part of their ministerial career, but many others participated in short evangelical tours. Most found the work arduous and unrewarding, and accepted the first acceptable pulpit offered by Euro-American pioneers.

The ample and affordable land on the frontier also provided a rare opportunity for the members of small denominations and communal societies to settle in close geographical proximity with one another. The most prominent example is that of the Latter Day Saints (Mormons), not only in Utah, but also earlier in Missouri and Illinois. The lower price of frontier land also facilitated the survival of other communal groups, for example, the AMANA COLONY in Iowa and the Swedish Bishop Hill colony in Illinois. In a similar fashion, the availability of frontier land enabled numerous ethnic minorities, such as German Lutherans, to establish geographic enclaves strong enough to support independent congregations and schools, significantly reducing pressure to adopt the English language and assimilate.

Thus, the tendency of the twentieth century was to frame the concept of frontier religion within the narrow confines of extremely chaotic and emotional camp meetings. Scholars have shown that such meetings were not limited to newly settled areas, yet the frontier did exert an effect on American religion, aspects of which remain evident today.

See also Ethnicity; Evangelical United Brethren Church; Evangelicalism; Methodism; Mormonism; Presbyterianism; Revivals

References and Further Reading

Boles, John. The Great Revival, 1797–1805: The Origins of the Southern Evangelical Mind. Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 1972.

Hansen, Klaus J. Mormonism and the American Experience. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1981.

Johnson, Charles. The Frontier Camp Meeting. Dallas, TX: Southern Methodist University Press, 1955.

Olmstead, Earl P. Blackcoats Among the Delaware: David Zeisberger on the Ohio Frontier. Kent, OH: Kent State University Press, 1991.

Sweet, William Warren. Religion on the American Frontier. 4 vols. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1936–1946.

ELLEN ESLINGER

FRY, ELIZABETH GURNEY (1780–1845)

English Quaker. Although born into a wealthy family, Fry devoted her life to working on behalf of those whom society considered as outcasts—especially prisoners. After her marriage she began to visit London’s Newgate prison. Her particular focus was female prisoners, whom the authorities considered incorrigible and who were treated accordingly. In contrast she saw the possibility of rehabilitation and consequently formed an association of Quaker volunteers who ministered to them in a variety of ways, religious and otherwise. These included beginning a school for the women’s children who were confined with their mothers, as well as for the WOMEN themselves, most of whom were illiterate. Encountering many prisoners—both male and female—condemned to death, Fry also became a vocal opponent of the death penalty, which could be mandated for offenses as minor as shoplifting. In addition she worked to reduce the suffering of women sentenced to be transported as indentured servants to AUSTRALIA, providing for their needs during the journey. With her brother, Joseph John Gurney, she traveled to the north of ENGLAND to view jails there and in SCOTLAND, establishing women’s associations in each of the towns for the visiting of prisoners. He subsequently described their trip in “Notes on a Visit made to some of the Prisons in the North of England, in company with Elizabeth Fry”(1819).

Before the age of forty, Fry’s reputation as a reformer—not only on behalf of prisoners, but also of the mentally ill—had spread even to RUSSIA. Hearing of her work, an Englishman in charge of the new asylum in St. Petersburg wrote to her for advice. She responded with various recommendations, the core of which focused on treating the patients with kindness and a degree of humanity not hitherto shown them. Again, it was the dignity of the individual that concerned her, whether prisoner or mental patient. The two daughters who edited her Memoirs point out that for her, “justice and humanity claim conjointly to be heard.” She demonstrated this twin focus in her life as an advocate.

See also Capital Punishment; Friends, Society of

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Fry, Katherine, and Rachel Elizabeth Cresswell, eds. Memoir of the Life of Elizabeth Fry With Extracts From Her Journal and Letters. Montclair, NJ: Patterson Smith, 1974.

Secondary Source:

Rose, June. Elizabeth Fry. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1980.

GEORGE ANDERSON

FULL GOSPEL BUSINESS MEN'S FELLOWSHIP

The Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International (FGBMFI) is a Christian laymen's organization founded in 1951 in Los Angeles by Demos Shakarian, an Armenian-American, millionaire dairy farmer, and Pentecostal. The Fellowship began as a Pentecostal parachurch organization (see PENTECOSTALISM), with membership open to all Christian men regardless of ecclesiastical and theological background. To protect its identity as a lay organization, the FGBMFI denies official leadership roles to CLERGY and other full-time Gospel workers. "Full Gospel" reflects the Fellowship's adherence to orthodox Christianity and Pentecostal doctrine and refers to the belief that the entire New Testament should be accepted as valid for contemporary Christians, including references to (orthodox Christianity plus Pentecostal doctrine) refers to the preaching of the entire New Testament, including FAITH HEALING, speaking in tongues, and deliverance from demonic forces. "Business Men" include chief executive officers, entrepreneurs, professionals, politically connected men, military officers, farmers, white-collar employees, and some laborers. The Fellowship encourages men to get back into church life, in order to address what is seen as the predominance of females (or feminization) in many churches. WOMEN are not allowed to join the organization. FGBMFI meetings, usually held in the nonecclesiastical atmosphere of restaurants or hotels, consist of nonsectarian gatherings in which men share the powerful and positive way God works in their lives. Meetings include time for personal testimonies as well as an invitation to men to turn their lives over to Christ.

By adopting modern business techniques of organization and communication, the FGBMFI spread its activities throughout the world, opening approximately 6,000 chapters in over 132 countries by the end of the twentieth century. After the death of Demos Shakarian in 1993, Richard Shakarian, his son, became the new international president. Aligning with the CHRISTIAN RIGHT, the FGBMFI membership promotes conservative economics and politics. The Fellowship uses the Internet to propagate its message and to advertise local, national, and international activities. The FGBMFI seeks to transcend denominational, racial, and cultural barriers. According to the Fellowship's official website, the FGBMFI represents a "vast global movement of laymen being used mightily by God to bring in this last great harvest [untold masses of men filled with the Holy Spirit] through the outpouring of God's Holy Spirit before the return of our Lord Jesus Christ” (www.fgbmfi.org). This sense of prophetic mission provides the Fellowship with a strong foundation to reach men throughout the world.

History

The Shakarian story and FGBMFI development are rooted in prophecy. As told by Demos Shakarian (1913–1993), in the nineteenth century the Shakarian family lived in the Armenian city of Kara Kala when they and other Armenians were directed by prophecy to relocate to the western United States to escape terrible danger from Turkish foes. In the new land, the Shakarians would prosper under God’s blessing and God would cause their “seed to be a blessing to the nations.” In 1905 the Shakarian family arrived in Los Angeles, where they maintained connections to Armenian Pentecostal church life. Isaac Shakarian, the son, married Zarouhi Yessayian and they named their first child Demos, born in 1913. At age thirteen Demos spoke in tongues at a church service when he was “baptized in the Holy Spirit.” In 1932 Demos married Rose Gabrielian, and their first child, Richard, was born two years later. The Shakarian business became the largest dairy in California and, by the 1940s, the largest private dairy in the world, according to Shakarian. In 1937 Demos received a personal prophecy from his friend Milton Hansen that God had chosen him to “speak of holy matters with heads of state around the world.”

Shakarian met and became close friends with British healing evangelist Dr. Charles Price, who preached the “Full Gospel.” Price’s preaching, healing efforts, and prophecy influenced Shakarian and his vision of a layman’s revival. In the early 1940s Shakarian was president of a chapter of the Christian Business Men’s Committee (CBMC), an organization of Evangelical laymen (see EVANGELICALISM). It struck Shakarian that during religious meetings women often far outnumbered men. Accustomed to Armenian men being the prime movers in the church, he found it confusing that American men had given up the highest calling of all. Shakarian also realized that many of the businessmen he came in contact with never spoke about God. He organized religious tent meetings that reached beyond the inward-looking Armenian community. One notable event was a major Pentecostal youth rally, in 1948, that overflowed the Hollywood Bowl with over 21,000 in attendance.

In the wake of the Los Angeles Pentecostal evangelistic meetings (see REVIVALS) held by ORAL GRANVILLE ROBERTS, in 1951, Shakarian launched the first meeting of the Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship, a Pentecostal version of the CBMC. Held at Clifton’s Cafeteria, in Los Angeles, the event attracted only eighteen men along with Roberts, Shakarian, and Shakarian’s wife Rose. The Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship of America elected Shakarian as president and named key officers, including a banker, an automobile salesman, a building contractor, and an accountant. The Fellowship ministry challenged the stereotype that Pentecostalism was largely confined to the working class and the economically deprived. Vice President Lee Braxton, for example, piloted his own plane throughout the nation to promote Fellowship growth. Shakarian and the other Fellowship officers worked without salaries. Meetings took place in luxury hotels and ballrooms. “International” replaced “of America” in the official charter recognized by the State of California in January 1953. The FGBMFI doctrinal statement required members to believe in the Trinity, an infallible BIBLE, SANCTIFICATION by the blood of Christ, divine healing, and “the baptism in the Holy Ghost accompanied by the initial physical sign of speaking in other tongues as the Spirit gives utterances.”

Development

At the first meeting, Roberts spoke of the expected emergence of 1,000 chapters, but there were still no additional chapters one year later. A disappointed Shakarian persisted in promoting the Fellowship, traveling and spending thousands of dollars of his own money. With the creation of the magazine the Full Gospel Business Men's Voice (Thomas R. Nickel offered his print shop and editorial services) and the radio program Breakfast-Broadcast, from Clifton's Cafeteria, the growth of the FGBMFI improved. By the summer of 1953 there were nine chapters throughout the United States. A typical chapter meeting consisted of choruses, prayers, and announcements, followed by testimonies, prayers for the sick, presentation of prophecies, glossolalia, calls for salvation, and an evening banquet. Although a Los Angeles office coordinated Fellowship activities, Shakarian opposed too much focus on centralization. Since 1953, annual international conventions (larger-scale replicas of chapter meetings) take place in major American cities. Throughout the 1950s the crusades of healing evangelists Tommy Hicks, Oral Roberts, and William Branham resulted in the creation of many of the early Fellowship chapters. Each chapter seeks to encourage laymen to be personal witnesses for Jesus, bring healing to those in need, and promote fellowship and unity among Christian churches.

FGBMFI leaders maintain that the driving force of the movement is the Holy Spirit. In 1955, Johannesburg, SOUTH AFRICA was the site of the first overseas chapter. A Fellowship chapter in Toronto, CANADA developed the following year. Healing evangelists, such as Tommy Hicks, promoted the FGBMFI at crusades outside the United States. Accepting an invitation from President François Duvalier to hold meetings in Haiti, the Fellowship demonstrated its willingness to reach out to any part of the world, even nations ruled by dictators. By 1961 eighteen nations were represented at the first European convention in Zurich, SWITZERLAND. To spread its influence, the Fellowship began organizing “airlifts,” in which FGBMFI members personally finance a visit to a country for the purpose of sharing the Gospel. The Fellowship's 1965 London “airlift” and convention led to the establishment of chapters in many parts of the country. Airlifts occurred even in war-torn destinations such as Vietnam. Such Fellowship endeavors helped spread Pentecostalism into many nations. The Charismatic Movement of the 1960s extended to mainline Protestant churches and other denominations throughout the world. Beginning in 1963, a series of Fellowship booklets promoted neo-Pentecostal renewal (mainly with testimonies from Voice magazine) in Baptist, Episcopalian, and Methodist denominations. By the late 1960s the Fellowship was one of the few Protestant-dominated organizations attracting Catholic members. The Vatican awarded Demos Shakarian a special award in 1974 for the role the FGBMFT played in the Catholic Charismatic Movement.

In 1975 Shakarian reported that after twenty-four years in existence the Fellowship had a total number of 1,650 chapters in fifty-two countries and that the monthly circulation of Voice magazine was 800,000. The magazine was translated into seven languages. He also claimed that 4,000,000 people viewed the “Good News,” a weekly half-hour television series in its fourth year, carried by 150 television stations, including outlets in Canada, Bermuda, AUSTRALIA, and JAPAN. The Fellowship’s radio program operated in twenty-one languages throughout Europe, South America, and Asia. Corresponding to its impressive growth, the Fellowship completed new international headquarters in Costa Mesa in 1980, at a cost of $5,000,000. Oral Roberts gave the keynote speech, demonstrating his continual and influential role in the development of the Fellowship. The mixture of emphases on faith and prosperity continued at Fellowship activities. Leaders included executives who made the Fortune 500 list of American corporate business giants. The FGBMFI has been characterized as “a society of Spirit-filled capitalists trying to make good in the business world.” Faith teachers such as Kenneth Copeland and Kenneth Hagin received support from the FGBMFI, which welcomed their focus on teaching “positive confession” in Christian’s right to expect for healing and prosperity, even in the midst of criticism of the “name it and claim it” Gospel.

The Fellowship encountered division among the leadership after Demos Shakarian experienced a massive stroke in 1984. Several leaders requested that Shakarian retire and become Chairman of the Board, but he refused. The charge surfaced that Shakarian was guilty of “irregularities” in reporting travel expenses, and, as a result of the power struggle, U.S. membership dropped significantly. In 1987 the Fellowship voted seven “rebellious” members of the board of directors out of office and Shakarian regained complete control. Outside the United States, the FGBMFI continued to grow and in the late 1980s there were 2,646 chapters worldwide. When Demos Shakarian died in 1993, his son Richard assumed the role of president. Utilizing the Internet, the FGBMFI provides potential members with an abundance of local and global information. Issues of the Voice magazine, for example, can be downloaded.

Prospects for the Future

The early FGBMFI leaders came from several churches: the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, the Pentecostal Holiness Church, the CHURCH OF GOD, the INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, and the PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD. In the early stage, many Pentecostal clergy leaders distrusted the FGBMFI. Traditional Pentecostal ministers opposed the open ecumenical fellowship and they feared that Shakarian sought the creation of a new denomination or organization that diverted money from churches. From its beginning, however, the Fellowship represented a ministry that was not dependent on clergy leaders. The FGBMFI adopted interdenominationalism, preferring that people remain in their own churches. When it became clear that the Fellowship viewed itself as a service rather than a substitute to churches, Pentecostal church opposition diminished.

Animosity between mainstream Evangelicalism and Pentecostalism was intense. Non-Pentecostal believers took exception to the term Full Gospel, which implied that many denominations failed to preach the Gospel in its fullness. For Evangelicals, glossolalia (speaking in tongues) and healing could not be central and indispensable facets of the Christian experience. Still, the Fellowship offered a bridge between classical Pentecostals and Christians from the historic denominations who had received the baptism of the Spirit. The FGBMFI continues to play an important role in the growth of the charismatic movement and the breaking down of barriers between Pentecostal and non-Pentecostal Christians. The FGBMFI did not claim to seek theological precision; simple testimonies of men facing and overcoming the trials and tribulations of life remain a major component of Fellowship success. Attractive to many Christians is a strong experiential theme that a living God carries out biblical promises to those seeking reassurance.

From its origins, the FGBMFI has also sought to attract men of color and of varied ethnicity. In the 1950s the FGBMFI moved the site of its Atlanta convention to Denver when the selected hotel made arrangements to segregate black businessmen into nearby accommodations. Shakarian's position broke down barriers among African Americans who viewed the Fellowship as the exclusive domain of white men (African Americans, however, still participate in small numbers). The Fellowship's global impact suggests a praiseworthy record on the issue of race relations.

The outreach of the Fellowship continues to be dynamic and varied, including a prison ministry initiated by Andrew Kaminski, an American businessman sent to prison for tax evasion. On the eve of the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, the Australian FGBMFI started an athletic club that would allow them access to the Olympic village to witness to the athletes. Small groups called "fire teams" present testimony of God's love and minister in the power of the Holy Spirit. In recognition of the supportive role that women provide FGBMFI members, Vangie Shakarian (wife of President Richard Sharkarian) organized ways for women to become better involved within the Fellowship. Women hold prayer meetings and speak at many FGBMFI conventions and meetings.

As the Fellowship pursues a greater global impact, it appears to pay scant attention to globalization issues relating to the unequal distribution of wealth. Members share the dream that prosperity will come to those who follow the Lord in the fullness of the Holy Spirit. Successful Fellowship members see themselves as spiritual and social models for the world's poor people. A persistent notion is that by serving the Lord in the power of the Holy Spirit, working hard, and living honestly, anyone can realize the American dream of prosperity. The Fellowship is also unapologetic about its alliances with conservative politicians, such as Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, Pat Robertson, and other American and world leaders. Throughout the world, conservative politicians and wealthy men continue to champion the growth of the Fellowship. By means of its strong economic and organizational base and its fervor to share the good news of the Gospel, the FGBMFI shows signs of continuing success as a worldwide recruiting arm for charismatic renewal.

References and Further Reading

- Fotherby, Val. The Awakening Giant: The Miraculous Story of the Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International. London: Marshall Pickering, 2000.
- Harrell, David Edwin, Jr. All Things are Possible: The Healing and Charismatic Revivals in Modern America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1975.
- Poloma, Margaret. The Charismatic Movement: Is There a New Pentecost? Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1982.
- Quebedeaux, Richard. The New Charismatics II. San Francisco: Harper & Row Publishers, 1983.
- Sharkarian, Demos. The Happiest People on Earth: The Longawaited Personal Story of Demos Shakarian as told to John and Elizabeth Sherrill. Old Tappan, NJ: Chosen Books, 1975.
- Synan, Vinson. Under His Banner. Costa Mesa, CA: Gift Productions, 1992.

ERIC R.CROUSE

FULLER, MARGARET (1810–1850)

American spiritual writer. Fuller was born in Cambridgeport, Massachusetts on May 23, 1810. She grew up in an intellectual household of Puritan ancestry, and at age twenty-one began to have mystical visions that led her to a new form of spirituality. Her visions challenged the masculinity of God and the gendered boundaries of religion.

Fuller questioned how the public sphere became “masculine” and why WOMEN were relegated to the private, spiritual sphere. She believed that separation into gendered spheres was a separation of God’s true essence, which challenged prevailing GENDER norms. Her spirituality proposed that each gender could transcend its divided self and supported divine intuition. Her Woman in the Nineteenth Century focused on liberation from gendered categories for both men and women. In this work, Fuller also identified two elements that live within women: “Minerva,” the seat of intellect, and the “Muse,” the feminine side representing intuition and religious activity.

Fuller equated women with religion and domesticity, but she did achieve her purpose of not limiting the choice of other roles within religious traditions or in society. As an editor, a literary critic, a Transcendentalist, a journalist, and a foreign correspondent during the Roman Revolution (1848) in ITALY, she demonstrated her beliefs. Unfortunately, Fuller died prematurely in 1850 in a shipwreck while returning from Italy to New York.

See also Emerson, Ralph Waldo; Puritanism; Transcendentalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Fuller, S. Margaret. Woman in the Nineteenth Century: An Authoritative Text, Backgrounds, and Criticism. Edited by Larry J. Reynolds. New York: W.W.Norton, 1997.

Secondary Sources:

Fleischmann, Fritz, ed. Margaret Fuller’s Cultural Critique: Her Age and Legacy. New York: Peter Lange, 2000.

Von Mehren, Joan. Minerva and the Muse: The Life of Margaret Fuller. Amherst, MA: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994.

KELLY J.BAKER

FUNDAMENTALISM

Fundamentalism emerged as a recognizable movement in American Protestantism in the World War I era. It shares some features of other twentieth-century fundamentalisms around the globe, but it arose in response to circumstances within Western Christianity and American culture. Fundamentalists construct their identity and worldview around a sacred text—the BIBLE. They regard the Bible as divinely inspired and thus beyond the reach of human criticism. Their insistence that the Bible provides a detailed map for all of life means that American fundamentalists see particular social and cultural patterns as part of the created order. God intended men, women, and children to stand in particular relationships to one another and to God, and the state has no right to interfere, especially in the interaction between parent and child. Fundamentalists root their strict moral code in their reading of Scripture.

Fundamentalism arose within American Protestantism as a response to profound social and intellectual changes that became widely evident after the CIVIL WAR. For several generations before Charles Darwin, scientists (especially geologists) had challenged the Genesis creation account, but Darwin's Origin of Species (1859) and Descent of Man (1871) became the symbols of the mounting conviction that modern SCI-ENCE was incompatible with traditional Christianity (see DARWINISM). Darwin's evolutionary theory challenged his generation to reformulate basic assumptions of Western culture. His observations and conclusions challenged deeply embedded beliefs and implied a developmental spiral with profound implications for ways of understanding society.

Among Darwin's respondents was Princeton's outspoken Charles Hodge. While some ridiculed Darwin or sought a mediating position, Hodge insisted that Darwin's work was incompatible with ORTHODOXY. In What Is Darwinism? (1874), Hodge stated bluntly that evolutionary theory could not coexist with the orthodox view of God as omnipotent Creator. Pulpiters and popular orators and authors took sides and enlisted the public in the controversy. For decades, debates about creationism between people with local name recognition filled auditoriums around the country.

Modern science did not present the only contemporary challenge to traditional Christianity. At about the same time, the work of German and British biblical scholars, animated by a modern view of history, recast the way in which they approached the sacred text from which American evangelicals took their cues. Some of this new biblical scholarship predated the Civil War, but its impact on American Christianity was felt most urgently in the second half of the nineteenth century. The work of such German scholars as Wilhelm Vatke, DAVID STRAUSS, and FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR reflected on the history of Israel, the life of Jesus, and the rise of Christianity using the same interpretive devices for the sacred that historians used for the secular. Such scholarship excluded the miraculous and providential motifs that had long dominated the Christian view of history. Vatke argued that the Pentateuch was written late in Israel's history; Strauss believed that early Christian Messianic expectations had unintentionally constructed the Christ of the Gospels; Baur applied rigorous historical criteria to the study of the origins of Christianity and to the dating of New Testament writings. Each challenged cherished convictions, but their particular challenges were less important in the long run than the method that they embraced.

German biblical scholars submitted the biblical text to the same rigorous scrutiny they applied to other ancient documents. In 1878, Julius Wellhausen challenged Mosaic authorship of the Books of the Law, and soon a torrent of criticism questioned other longcherished Protestant assumptions. For devotees of the new method, the Bible yielded its place as the inerrant Word of God to a developmental view of history. Furthermore, historical theology gained respect as a discipline in its own right. Its emphasis on the scientific study of DOCTRINE within the context of Christian history seemed to some to erode the AUTHORITY of Scripture.

The scholarship produced by advocates of the new method agitated in American SEMINARIES, where it resulted in the well-publicized HERESY trials of several esteemed faculty and CLERGY. The intellectual challenge to orthodoxy was enormous, and a variety of responses followed. Many Congregationalists and the institutions they controlled—like Andover Seminary—embraced the implications of the new scholarship. The historic Methodist preoccupation with religious experience rather than with dogma made it easy for many of them, especially in the North, to do the same (see METHODISM; METHODISM IN NORTH AMERICA). Liberals, as advocates of the new scholarship were known, counted in their ranks significant numbers of Episcopal clergy as well as some BAPTISTS, Presbyterians (see PRESBYTERIANISM) and DISCIPLES OF CHRIST. Seminary graduates from schools affiliated with all of these denominations, especially in the Northeast, soon brought the practical implications of the new theology to America's pews. The University of Chicago Divinity School, invigorated by John D. Rockefeller's money, gathered a faculty of influential advocates of the modern approach to theology. Religious liberalism manifested different qualities in different places (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Those who fearlessly advocated the accommodation of faith to CULTURE came to be known as modernists (see MODERNISM). The University of Chicago's SHAILER MATHEWS articulated their convictions. Others emphasized social concerns similar to those that motivated the famous Baptist Social Gospeler WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH. William Newton Clarke's Christ-entered emphasis in the Outline of Christian Theology (1898), perhaps the era's most influential systematic theology, represented yet another "take" on liberalism. The movement's popular voice was CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON'S magazine The Christian Century. Novelist Harold Frederic's The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896) explored the implications of progressive theology in the life of a young minister.

EVANGELICALISM, still largely based in America's traditional denominations, faced the implications of this intellectual challenge at a moment also defined by rapid INDUSTRIALIZATION and urbanization. Immigration patterns also shifted with the arrival of large numbers of southern and eastern European Jews and Catholics, exacerbating other bewildering social changes. These influences combined to encourage evangelicals to strike out in new directions to confront new conditions. They worked within and around denominations to accomplish this. Many Baptists and Presbyterians resisted progressive ideas. Some Methodists did, too, especially those who understood the Wesleyan tradition through the lens of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT.

Besides writing and preaching about the “old-time religion,” such people cooperated in a wide range of voluntary associations (see VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES), publications, and new institutions designed to enable them to reach the urban masses with their message. Nondenominational urban congregations with free pews were a favored venue for urging conversionist Bible-centered Christianity. Evangelist DWIGHT L. MOODY sponsored such a congregation in Chicago; one-time Presbyterian Albert B. Simpson opened a Gospel Tabernacle in Manhattan; and the Church of the Open Door served inner-city Los Angeles. To provide rudimentary training for would-be preachers, missionaries, and lay workers, prominent men and women helped facilitate Bible institutes. Moody explained that institutes existed to train “gap men” to bridge the gap between an educated clergy and the urban masses (see BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTES). They offered classes in the English Bible and the use of music in evangelism and sent their students out for daily practice on urban streets.

With his reliance on the evangelical message in its most basic form, Moody rallied many who were deeply concerned by the contemporary erosion of traditional Christian faith. Although Moody, a layman with little formal education, did not directly confront the new ideas himself, he convened and made flourish clusters of people who did. They gathered at Moody’s Chicago Training Institute (later MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE) or, most often, during the summer conference season in Moody’s boyhood hometown of Northfield, Massachusetts. During the 1890s, Cyrus Ingersoll Scofield, a lawyer turned Congregationalist minister, occasionally joined the group. Scofield brought to Northfield study notes that addressed biblical themes in unusual detail. He developed them for personal use as well as for a correspondence Bible course that he offered out of his Dallas church. Moody and others encouraged their publication, and in 1909 the first SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE appeared. Keyed to the Authorized Version, the notes set out a view of history marked by seven successive dispensations that corresponded roughly with the succession of divine covenants (see DISPENSATIONALISM). Scofield assumed the unity of the biblical text as well as its inerrancy (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY).

Scofield’s Bible became a best seller. Its copious notes with their explanations of how God interacted with humanity in each dispensation governed fundamentalist views of the modern world for decades. People carried the Scofield Bible to CAMP MEETINGS, prophecy conferences, REVIVALS, youth meetings, and SUNDAY SCHOOLS, and it became an indispensable fundamentalist handbook. Its notes presented the novel view that the church was a parenthesis in God’s plan and might be withdrawn (“raptured”) at any time (see RAPTURE). Christ’s physical return was always imminent. Moody and his most influential cohorts had claimed that their apprehension of the imminence of the second coming had transformed their lives, spurring them to personal preparedness (a disciplined spirituality) and aggressive EVANGELISM. Scofield now collected, systematized and popularized ideas that British PLYMOUTH BRETHREN and American evangelicals had bandied about for years. For Moody, the “blessed hope” of New Testament promise was the instantaneous surprising departure of the church from the earth, setting the stage for a period of divine judgment known as the Tribulation (see TRIBULATIONISM). (In the 1990s, Tim La Haye and Tim Jenkins built their successful “Left Behind” series around this bit of Scofield’s teaching.) Scofield’s views promptly became the “stuff” of fundamentalist novels, a genre that modeled fundamentalist THEOLOGY paired with a wholesome lifestyle. The most successful of these came from the pen of Grace Livingston Hill. The author of more than 100 books that sold hundreds of thousands of copies, the Presbyterian Hill used fiction to insist on the practical benefits of careful attention to the Bible read through Scofield’s notes. She also urged the traditional American evangelical moral code and insisted on the centrality of CONVERSION.

While not all American evangelicals agreed that the church was a parenthesis, masses of the faithful nurtured the “blessed hope.” Their popular literature affirmed it, their Bible institutes typically taught Dispensationalism and their prophecy conferences attracted ever-increasing numbers to hear some of the era’s most adept preachers urge them to read the signs of the times in current events and to be ready for the rapture.

As a core of American evangelicals rallied to what they regarded as the essentials of Christian faith, they worked through churches and agencies dedicated to upholding the verbal inspiration of Scripture, the exclusivity of the Gospel message, EVANGELISM, and an empowered LAITY. They cooperated in faith Missions as an alternative to denominational mission boards. Faith missions, targeting specific needs or areas, depended on the direct prayers and support of the faithful to accomplish evangelism. The most famous of the early faith missions was undoubtedly the CHINA INLAND MISSION (CIM), brainchild of the Englishman J. HUDSON TAYLOR. With offices in CANADA and the UNITED STATES, the CIM, under the direction of its long-time North American leader, Henry Frost, enlisted hundreds of young American men and women to go to inland China without salary to spread the gospel.

Tract societies and publishing houses bent the latest technologies to the conservative evangelical cause. At about the same time that the Scofield Bible first appeared, a group of evangelicals concerned about the drift of Protestantism from its moorings pulled together twelve small volumes of essays making the case for the points that conservatives held dear. Edited by people such as Southern Baptist pastor Amzi Clarence Dixon (brother of Thomas Dixon of “Birth of a Nation” fame); educator, pastor, and evangelist REUBEN A. TORREY; and the prominent Jewish convert Louis Meyer, the books were funded by a generous grant from Los Angeles laymen Lyman and Milton Stewart. The Stewarts envisioned a series that addressed current critical issues, and they intended their funds to ensure that the religious leadership of the English-speaking world received copies. The series, known as The Fundamentals, appeared between 1910 and 1913. An estimated three million copies circulated before the outbreak of World War I.

The series helped give the mounting movement its enduring name. Other declarations offered lists of basic beliefs. The most famous of these, the “Five Points of Fundamentalism,” were part of a formulation developed by the Northern Presbyterian Church during the 1890s and decreed formally in 1910. In that year, the denomination identified Five Points as “essential and necessary” doctrines of the church: (1) the original autograph of Scripture as inspired and without error, (2) the virgin birth, (3) the “satisfaction” theory of the ATONEMENT, (4) the physical resurrection, and (5) the miracles of Jesus. The Presbyterian Church demanded that its seminary professors use inerrancy as a starting point for biblical and theological scholarship. During the 1890s, Charles Briggs of Union Seminary (New York) and Preserved Smith of Lane Seminary (Cincinnati) were dismissed for heresy, and Union Seminary’s church historian, A.C. McGiffert, resigned from the Presbyterian ministry, each in part a victim of the clash between modern scholarly method and affirmations that attempted to capture the historic essence of evangelicalism. (Presbyterians were quick to point out that these were “extra-creedal.”)

The most famous public moment in the history of American fundamentalism occurred in July 1925 in Dayton, Tennessee when WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN and Clarence Darrow faced each other in a courtroom showdown on evolution. Tennessee law—like that of several other southern states—forbade the teaching of evolution. In both the North and the South, influential pastors and members of such groups as statewide anti-evolution leagues, the Bible Crusaders of America, the Defenders of the Christian Faith, and the World’s Christian Fundamentals Association (established in 1919 to promote cooperative national strategies to combat threats like the teaching of evolution) bent their efforts toward keeping creationism in school textbooks. A three-time Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State, Bryan had earned a reputation as an orator. Darrow was the country’s most visible attorney, famous for his reasoning, his oratory, and the cases he had defended. The nation hung on newspaper reports of the spectacle that the Scopes trial became. Darrow seemed to handily make a fool of Bryan, though Bryan technically won the case. Reporters, none more ably than the Baltimore Sun’s H.L. Mencken, ridiculed fundamentalism as narrow obscurantism. A long list of national spectacles lingers in the collective American memory of the 1920s, but none was more damaging to the public image of fundamentalism than the Scopes trial.

If the public turned to other spectacles, members of American Protestant denominations did not. The struggle for control seemed ever more intense. Polity and the extent of early liberal inroads spared Congregationalists (see CONGREGATIONALISM) and Northern Methodists the bitter infighting that beset Presbyterians and Baptists. Conservatives held the upper hand in the Northern Presbyterian Church, but the Auburn Affirmation of 1924, with more than 1,200 signatures, condemned the famous Five Points of 1910 as well as the biblical literalism that undergirded them. During the 1920s, controversy swirled around HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK, a professor at New York’s liberal Union Theological Seminary and regular guest preacher at New York City’s First Presbyterian Church. One of the country’s best-known preachers, in 1922 the Baptist Fosdick preached a plea for reconciliation that publicist Ivy Lee retitled and transformed into a liberal battle cry: “Shall the Fundamentalists Win?” Fosdick ultimately resigned the Presbyterian pulpit and moved to the new Riverside Church. Built by John D. Rockefeller specifically for Fosdick, Riverside stood along the Hudson River across Broadway from Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary, where Fosdick intended to influence the best minds of the next generation. Meanwhile, Southern Baptist John Roach Straton also held forth in New York at Calvary Baptist Church, attacking Fosdick and making his sanctuary an influential center in the national struggle for the soul of American Protestantism.

Denominational controversies inevitably involved seminaries. Perhaps the most famous case unfolded at the Presbyterians' Princeton Theological Seminary. In Christianity and Liberalism (1923), Princeton New Testament professor JOHN GRESHAM MACHEN insisted that liberalism was not Christianity. Rumbblings of dissent troubled the seminary through the 1920s and led in 1929 to the withdrawal of conservatives and the founding of Westminster Seminary in Philadelphia. Author Pearl Buck became a focus of conservative discontent with Presbyterian foreign MISSIONS, and conservatives established an independent foreign missions board. When the denomination barred the Independent Board of Missions, conservatives formed a new Presbyterian denomination (that itself divided in 1937 over premillennialism), known after 1939 as the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

In 1920 many Baptist fundamentalists in the north-east associated in the National Federation of Fundamentalists of the Northern Baptists. William Bell Riley, Minneapolis Baptist pastor and Bible institute founder, and Texas Baptists J.Frank Norris and T.T. Shields led a BAPTIST BIBLE UNION that assaulted liberalism and evolution. Their inability to agree led in a few years to the disintegration of the Union. In 1928 Norris created the World Fundamentalist Baptist Missionary Fellowship, complete with Bible institute, mission board, and periodical, The Fundamentalist. A split in 1950 gave rise to the Baptist Bible Fellowship International. Meanwhile, conservative secessions from the Northern Baptist Convention led to the founding of new denominations, including the General Association of Regular Baptists (1932) (see GENERAL BAPTISTS) and the CONSERVATIVE BAPTIST ASSOCIATION (1947).

As important as the emergence of new denominations were the clusters of independent congregations—Gospel tabernacles, Bible churches, freestanding Congregationalist or Baptist churches—that served a constituency disenchanted with liberalism in the pulpit. Their support for such congregations and for publications, Bible institutes, radio broadcasts, and mission agencies helped organize fundamentalists into a web of overlapping networks that made them a powerful grassroots influence. Even denominations that did not endure splits were not immune to powerful fundamentalist voices. For example, Southern Methodists like L.W.Munhall and Los Angeles's fiery “fighting Bob” Shuler rallied the fundamentalist faithful from many settings.

Such popular voices encouraged the faithful to hold fast to the truths at stake in denominational battles. Since the death of D.L.Moody in 1899, a long list of evangelists had taken up his mantle. Nationally, the most famous was BILLY SUNDAY, a converted professional baseball player whose vigorous PREACHING style captivated audiences across the land. His evangelistic party included several who greatly enhanced his influence—his wife, Helen, Bible teacher Virginia Asher, and songster Homer Rodeheaver. When Sunday died in 1935, The Christian Century declared the end of an era and opined that the fundamentalist movement he represented would disappear as well. The liberal Protestant elite failed to notice what was happening on the ground.

Evangelicals had seized on the possibilities of radio and were using it to build a popular constituency unimaginable only a few years earlier. Evangelist Paul Rader used his Chicago Tabernacle as the base for all-day broadcasting over the city's powerful WBJT (Where Jesus Blesses Thousands)/WBBM. Charles and Grace Fuller's “Old-Fashioned Revival,” with its upbeat music, stirring homey sermons, and Grace “Honey” Fuller's motherly reading of listeners' letters, emanated from the Long Beach (California)

Auditorium, and became a fixture among conservatives of many denominations. Missouri Synod Lutherans offered "The Lutheran Hour" with the popular Walter Meier, a program that drew a wide non-Lutheran audience (see LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD).

If national and local radio broadcasting revealed growing fundamentalist strength, the increasing number of Bible institutes training laity and clergy refuted liberal hopes of fundamentalist retreat. Nearly 100 new Bible institutes were organized between 1930 and 1950, and their graduates became a fundamentalist army of sorts, working at home and abroad. If they did not directly engage theological issues in ways that demanded national attention, they manifested the enduring appeal of their message.

Fundamentalism was never monolithic, and during the 1940s, some basic rifts became apparent. Three representative clusters of issues reveal some of the inner tensions: (1) engaging the academy, (2) separatism, and (3) PENTECOSTALISM.

During the 1940s, a new generation of conservatives determined to reform fundamentalism by reappropriating the evangelical label and reengaging the academy. Protestantism in general had clearly lost its dominance in defining America's moral life, but men like CARL F.H.HENRY and Harold John Ockenga believed that they had something positive to offer. The fundamentalist label seemed worn and linked to old controversies. A group of young evangelicals eschewed it in favor of a focus on the positive affirmations the tradition held for contemporary concerns. They pursued advanced education, gaining credentials that prepared them to teach and write in dialogue with the scholarly issues of the day. Known as neoevangelicals, in the World War II era these men assumed evangelical leadership roles as teachers, pastors, editors (especially of Christianity Today), and theologians. Their determination led to the creation of Fuller Seminary in Pasadena, California. Named for radio evangelist Charles E.Fuller, Fuller Seminary came to represent the promise of serious new evangelical scholarship and the intentions of these reformist fundamentalists.

From the 1930s, separation loomed as a potentially divisive issue for fundamentalists. In the absence of a single cohesive organizing mechanism, interrelated fundamentalist networks often centered in charismatic personalities. A few of these became powerful voices for separation not only from worldliness, but also from churches and agencies affiliated with liberal denominations. Among the most outspoken were Carl MacIntyre, John R. Rice, and Bob Jones. When neoevangelicals reclaimed the evangelical name and sponsored a NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS (NAE), the separatist agenda became a national issue. The NAE welcomed denominations, independent congregations, and congregations affiliated with denominations that held membership in such ecumenical agencies as the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. Separatists objected to such mixing of fundamentalist truth and liberal Protestant error. The debate in the NAE's United Evangelical Action was long and bitter. In the end, the separatists abandoned the NAE's efforts to keep their networks free from the taint of association with error.

While separatism was perhaps the primary dividing point between these neoevangelicals and old-line fundamentalists, the same people split along similar lines over accepting Pentecostals as evangelicals. Although some Pentecostals had long indicated their affinities for fundamentalism, fundamentalist associations had not warmed to cooperation with Pentecostals. For one thing, the notes to the Scofield Bible held that spiritual gifts had ceased with the apostles, and dispensationalists tended to frown on any who advocated the contemporary centrality of spiritual gifts. The organizers of the NAE indicated their willingness to see the larger picture. On the Five Points or the topics of The Fundamentals, Pentecostals and evangelicals found themselves in essential agreement. On their part, separatists tended to be as wary of perceived errors among conservatives as of liberal heresies. Pentecostals became partners in the NAE, but they never won acknowledgment as fundamentalists.

After World War II, differentiating fundamentalists from evangelicals became a thorny task. Some self-professed new evangelicals manifested decidedly fundamentalist predilections, while others abandoned dispensationalism, moved from the legalism and prescription long central to fundamentalism, and advocated responsible Christian freedom. Historian George Marsden once quipped that a fundamentalist might be described as “an evangelical who is angry about something.” A generation later, some suggest that the differences within this family of conservative Protestants are as much sociological as theological: Fundamentalist networks offer specific do’s and don’ts for all of life, whereas evangelicals exercise choice in a context framed by scriptural injunctions. Another way of sorting might be to regard all fundamentalists as evangelicals, but not all evangelicals as fundamentalists. Bible institutes, colleges, broadcasts, camps, and periodicals still nurture the networks that make fundamentalism a vigorous grassroots movement, and its political voice in the New CHRISTIAN RIGHT renews its public prominence. Social issues—especially those dealing with sexual ethics (see SEXUALITY) and public education—rally the faithful to invoke noisily the movement’s highly selective rendering of American history as well as the claims of Scripture.

The case of BILLY GRAHAM offers an example of the differentiation between evangelicals and fundamentalists. By most renderings, Graham, the product of a Southern Baptist home, a fundamentalist Bible college, and Wheaton College, a conservative, undergraduate institution, drew his early support from a mix of fundamentalists and new evangelicals. He used YOUTH FOR CHRIST, a fundamentalist youth movement, as his base for building a team and gaining experience as an evangelist. For eight years, his crusades heartened conservative Christians to hope for a national revival. Then in 1957 Graham launched a crusade at Madison Square Garden. He welcomed ministers of many denominations, liberal and conservative, to the platform and commended his converts to their pastoral care. Livid fundamentalist separatists accused Graham of betraying the Gospel, while many neo-evangelicals supported his stance. The quarrel was not about the Five Points or the doctrines of The Fundamentals’, rather, it centered on notions of separation and purity that fundamentalists had added to the doctrinal views that first animated their movement.

Fundamentalism retains strong grassroots appeal. In some of its power bases, the Scofield Bible and dispensationalism have yielded to other views of history and other readings of Scripture. In others, the Authorized Version amplified with Scofield’s notes remains the only accepted text. The Bible Colleges and institutes serve large constituencies of fundamentalist youth who eschew a liberal arts education in favor of hands-on training for evangelistic outreach. One of the first remains the best known of the institutes, Chicago’s Moody Bible Institute. Dallas Theological Seminary, long a bastion of fundamentalist education, JERRY FALWELL’S Liberty University in Lynchburg, Virginia, and Bob Jones University in Greenville, South Carolina are among the best known of hundreds of schools that serve the constituency and mobilize tens of thousands of alumni to faithfulness to the cause. Radio preachers, publications, denominations, churches, camps, missions agencies, and political organizations—many with offices in Colorado Springs—channel fundamentalist outreach, and some, like Focus on the Family or Campus Crusade for Christ, straddle the hazy borderline with evangelicalism and appeal to all but the most vehement fundamentalists. Best-selling authors like Hal Lindsay (The Late Great Planet Earth) and Tim LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins (the Left Behind series) demonstrate continued broad cultural fascination with the vivid fundamentalist picture of the end-times. The perceived lack of moral compass in American life raises the movement's appeal among those who yearn for absolute standards of right and wrong.

See also Creation Science

References and Further Reading

- Balmer, Randall. Mine Eyes Have Seen the Glory: A Journey Into the Evangelical Subculture in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Bendroth, Margaret. Fundamentalism and Gender. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Brereton, Virginia. Training God's Army: The American Bible School, 1880–1940. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Carpenter, Joel A. Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Marsden, George M. Fundamentalism and American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- . Reforming Fundamentalism: Fuller Seminary and the New Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1987.
- . Understanding Evangelicalism and Fundamentalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991.
- Sandeen, Ernest R. The Roots of Fundamentalism. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1970.

EDITH L. BLUMHOFER

FUNERARY RITES

As is the case for much of Protestant worship, REFORMATION era funerary rites were formed in reaction to what the reformers considered to be serious defects and abuses in the WORSHIP of the medieval church. Protestant responses to the burial practices of the Roman church ranged from attempts to purify and simplify these rites to an outright rejection of all burial ceremony altogether. It would be many generations before Protestant churches created their own distinctive and full funerary rites, but by the mid-twentieth century, most Protestant groups had produced fully developed funeral rites that were well grounded theologically, as witnesses to the resurrection, and expressions of pastoral care to the bereaved. Most recently, the Protestant tendencies toward freedom from institutional constraint and the importance of the individual have combined with certain trends in CULTURE to result in the increase of highly personalized, improvised, free-form memorial services instead of the set official burial liturgies of the churches.

Medieval Roman Burial Rites

To assess the depth and character of early Protestant reactions to medieval practices, it is important to understand how the Roman church actually ritualized the burial of the dead. Unfortunately, most of our knowledge of these rites comes from monastic sources, and, although it is assumed that the burials of ordinary Christians were somewhat similar, there were surely many local variations and departures from the monastic norms.

The typical pattern appears to be as follows: When someone died, bells were rung to notify the community that a death had occurred. At the home of the deceased, the body was washed and shrouded in preparation for burial, sometimes accompanied by the chanting of psalms. The body, covered by a pall, was then carried in procession to the church, where the Office of the Dead, consisting of prayers, psalms, and scripture, was said. After this, the requiem, or funeral, mass proper was observed, followed by prayers and chants for absolution. The body was incensed and sprinkled with holy water and then taken in solemn procession to the grave (either in the churchyard or under the church), where the sign of the cross was administered and the body buried. On the eve of the Reformation, the overall mood of these rites was somber, focusing greatly on SIN, judgment, purgatory, and interceding on behalf of the soul after death.

Martin Luther and Early Lutheran Rites

Although MARTIN LUTHER produced manuals for BAPTISM and MARRIAGE, he did not do the same for funerals, but he did make his theological objections to the Roman burial practices clear. He saw the death of a Christian not in fearful ways but as “a deep, strong, and sweet sleep” and the coffin as “nothing but paradise.” Therefore, he composed a number of confident and hopeful burial Hymns to replace the “dirges and doleful songs” of the Roman ritual (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). Luther spoke out against such “popish abominations” as vigils, requiem masses, purgatory, the desperate prayers begging for the deceased to be spared the judgment, and “all other hocus-pocus on behalf of the dead.”

Because Luther himself created no authoritative burial rite, a number of funeral orders sprang up in the various areas of Lutheran influence (see LUTHERANISM). However, all of these reflect in their own way Luther’s desire for simplicity and hopefulness, and express his conviction that funerals should be conducted “with proper decorum in order to honor and praise that joyous article of our faith, namely, the resurrection of the dead.” A typical early Lutheran burial order began with a procession, sometimes led by a cross-bearer, from the home of the deceased directly to the grave. Along the way, the worshipers would sing psalms (Psalms 90 and 130 were often included) and hymns, including the “Media Vita” (“In the midst of life we are in death,” an eleventh-century text that was well-known in GERMANY and formed the basis of Luther’s hymn Mitten wir im Leben sind). The burial itself probably took place in silence and was often followed by a brief service at the grave, in the church, or at the home of the deceased consisting of Scripture, hymns, prayers, and sometimes a sermon.

Early Reformed Practices

The early Reformed tradition stands on the more extreme end of the reaction to the medieval Roman burial rites, even to the point that many of its adherents were buried with no ceremony whatsoever. JOHN CALVIN himself seems to have allowed at least the minimum ceremony of a fitting sermon preached at graveside, but the laws of sixteenth-century Geneva were completely indifferent to any ordered funeral practice, being content essentially to warn against unbiblical superstition and to leave the rest to family discretion.

In the early decades after the Reformation, a sparse pattern of burial without ceremony, sometimes followed by a brief sermon on the resurrection, seems to have established itself as the norm among the Reformed churches. As time went on, however, this minimalist approach became more and more difficult to maintain in the face of pastoral needs at the time of death. Gradually here and there among the Reformed communities, some ritual was added to the unadorned act of placing the body in the ground, such as the minister saying words of committal, and the sermons began to display more comfort for the bereaved. These accommodations were never without controversy, however, and the command of the Puritan-influenced Westminster Directory of Public Worship (1645) to “let the dead body, upon the day of burial, be... immediately interred, without any ceremony” reflects the tendency of the Reformed groups to avoid what they regarded as the pomp and superstition of funeral rituals altogether. It was not until the nineteenth century that anything like complete funeral orders were followed in the Reformed churches.

Early Anglicans, Wesley, and the Methodist Movement

If the Reformed tradition expresses the most drastic rejection of the medieval funerary rites, the most conserving Protestant response to those ceremonies can be seen in the Anglican tradition. Archbishop THOMAS CRANMER, whose liturgical genius lay behind the 1549 BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, simplified the Roman rites and made them more hopeful, but left much of the Catholic pattern in place, including an optional office of the dead and a eucharistic service observed either before or after burial. Although there were still prayers of petition for the departed (a practice condemned by the Lutheran and Reformed traditions), the theological center of gravity had clearly shifted from fear to hope, from pleading for the soul of the departed to the idea of eternal rest in Christ.

The 1549 Book of Common Prayer came under criticism from continental reformers, however. MARTIN BUCER, for example, had complained, “since scripture nowhere teaches us by word or example to pray for the departed... I wish that this commendation of the dead and prayer for them be omitted.” The 1552 revision of the Book of Common Prayer showed the effects of these and other criticisms and included a burial service that is much-abbreviated, eliminates the observance of the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER), and omits the prayers and commendations on behalf of the departed. Subsequent editions of the Book of Common Prayer move back and forth between the conservatism of the 1549 version and the more austere tendencies of the 1552 revision.

Among the Methodists, JOHN WESLEY’S 1784 The Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America With Other Occasional Services included a burial service that closely followed the then-current (1662) Anglican Book of Common Prayer. But perhaps what most set the early Methodists apart was the unofficial but widespread practice of singing, as the body was carried to the grave, joyful hymns with confident evangelical expressions, such as “Rejoice for a brother deceased, our loss is his infinite gain.”

As for the service itself, Wesley shortened the Book of Common Prayer ritual, and he omitted both the service of committal and the prayer specifically giving thanks to God that “it hath pleased Thee to deliver this our brother out of the miseries of this sinful world.” These changes were mainly in keeping with Puritan objections to the Book of Common Prayer, but they were also in accord with Wesley’s own desire for an emphasis on the gospel and for simplicity. Wesley’s own last will and testament called for his body to be carried to the grave by “six poor men” (who would be paid for the service from his estate) and stated that “I particularly desire there may be no horse, no coach, no escutcheon, no pomp, except the tears of them that loved me.... “In the nineteenth century, some of the passages Wesley omitted from the Book of Common Prayer were restored to the Methodist burial service, including the committal. But the language of the committal was altered to provide an emphasis on the general hope of resurrection rather than on any knowledge of the fate of the deceased (see METHODISM).

Free Church and Anabaptist Churches

The churches of the left wing of the Reformation shared with other Protestants a general suspicion of Roman burial ceremonies and doctrines. With no official liturgies in place, the free churches generally developed funeral practices along the lines of local custom, basically preferring simple observances involving scripture and prayer, at graveside or in the church. CLERGY were sometimes present, but often free church burials were conducted by family members, friends, or other lay persons. Beginning in the nineteenth century, service manuals and other published funeral resources for FREE CHURCH and independent clergy use were developed, such as Gould and Shakespeare’s A Manual for Free Church Ministers (1905), but these had, of course, no authoritative status.

Contemporary Developments and Issues

Because the first Protestant burial liturgies were reactions to what the reformers considered to be Roman abuses, these services tended to be theological and ritual overcorrections. Many of the initial Protestant services showed little tolerance for any positive reference to the life of the deceased, for any expression of deep grief or any theological emphasis but cheerful hope, and for any local custom that might hint at superstition. What was gained in theological purity, however, was often lost in pastoral compassion. Thus the subsequent development of Protestant funeral liturgies has generally been marked by more rounded services that are increasingly open to the human aspects of grief and loss, more supportive of the need to remember the life of the person who has died, and more adaptable to a wide range of local customs and conventions.

In the mid-twentieth century, most Protestant groups, influenced both by a THEOLOGY of divine compassion and an increasing awareness of the psychology of grief, produced funeral liturgies that were similar enough in form and substance to constitute something of a consensus. These services were generally two-part ceremonies: the funeral proper, with an emphasis on the proclamation of the resurrection, followed by a graveside committal service, in which the deceased was bid farewell and entrusted to God. These services were characterized by brevity, by an emphasis on the hope and thanksgiving for the life of the deceased, by the encouragement to include a funeral sermon, and by sufficient choices in prayers and Scripture readings to make these rites adaptable to various situations (such as the death of a child) and many levels of grief. Most of these twentieth-century revisions attempted to reclaim, at least as an option for the service, the early church custom of observing the Eucharist on the occasion of death, but this practice did not receive wide acceptance.

In the late twentieth century, however, several factors and forces converged to place these consensus Protestant funeral rites under stress. First, the bonds connecting people to the institutional church were loosened, and the kind of innovation and personalization frequently at work in marriage ceremonies began to take hold in death rituals as well. Many Protestants feel quite free to depart from the set liturgies and to create highly individualized and customized funerary rites.

Second, psychological and therapeutic ideas about grief, which earlier had enhanced traditional Christian views of death and loss by adding pastoral care themes to the funeral liturgy, now began gradually to rival those theological views. Thus, the purpose of funerals tended to shift away from an emphasis on hope for the deceased toward a concentration on the "grief work" of the mourner, away from a clear emphasis on the larger theological meanings of death toward more focus on the biography of the deceased and the meaning of loss for the living.

Moreover, a strong consumerist critique of the cost of funerals, a sharp worldwide rise in the rate of cremation, a desire for less melancholy and more celebrative ceremonies, a decreased interest in the symbolism of the physical body of the deceased, and, to some extent, an attempt to turn the focus away from death and toward the hope of the resurrection have combined to encourage the practice of memorial services instead of funerals. Memorial services, in which the body of the deceased is absent, typically are held some days or weeks after the death and feature some elements of the older funeral pattern (e.g., Scripture, prayers, and hymns), but they also often include several eulogies or remembrances of the deceased. Because of the mobility and fragmentation of contemporary society, the village structure implied in older funeral liturgies no longer pervades. Thus, attendance at funerals and memorial services today is declining (except in the case of the death of a celebrity or someone of unusual recognition), and, consequently, they tend to be smaller gatherings of family and friends rather than community-wide events.

See also Death and Dying

References and Further Reading

- Enright, D.J., ed. The Oxford Book of Death. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Rowell, Geoffrey. The Liturgy of Christian Burial: An Introductory Survey of the Historical Development of Christian Burial Rites. London: SPCK, 1977.
- Rutherford, Richard. The Death of a Christian: The Order of Christian Funerals. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990.
- Tucker, Karen Westerfield. "Till Death Us Do Part": The Rites of Marriage and Burial Prepared by John Wesley and Their Development in the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1784–1939. Ann Arbor, MI: University Microfilms, 1993.
- White, James F. Introduction to Christian Worship. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 2000.

THOMAS G.LONG

G

GALLICAN CONFESSION

The Gallican Confession is the earliest comprehensive statement of belief for the Reformed Churches of FRANCE. Delegates to the first National Synod, meeting secretly at Paris, adopted the text in May 1559. The seventh National Synod, held at La Rochelle in 1571, meticulously reexamined and confirmed the various articles. Accordingly, the declaration is also known as the Confession of Faith of La Rochelle. Subsequent gatherings of the national SYNOD reviewed and made minor modifications into the seventeenth century. Although the CONFESSION appears to have fallen into disuse after the 1650s, it was not officially superseded until 1872.

The Gallican Confession's forty articles, preceded by an eloquent preamble, were likely based on a Genevan model or a confession drawn up in 1557 for presentation to King Henry II. The structure, at once simple and elegant, follows a classic pattern. The first eight articles outline the Reformed understanding of God and enumerate the canonical books of Scripture from which this knowledge flows. Three subsequent articles discuss human nature and original SIN. Articles 12–19 treat SALVATION through Christ. The next five take up the divine gift of FAITH and the promise of regeneration. A series of fifteen articles then discusses in turn the DOCTRINE of the CHURCH, ecclesiastical organization, and the SACRAMENTS. The final two articles touch on the temporal magistrates, civil laws, and their relationship to divine AUTHORITY.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Calvin, John. "The French Confession of Faith" (French text with English translation). In The Creeds of Christendom, 6th ed., edited by Philip Schaff, vol. 3, 356–382. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1990.

Secondary Sources:

Pannier, Jacques. Les origines de la Confession de foi et de la Discipline des Églises réformées de France. Paris: F. Alcan, 1936.

Stauffer, Richard. "Briève histoire de la Confession de La Rochelle," Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme Français 117 (1971): 355–366.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

GALLUS, NIKOLAUS (1516–1570)

German lutheran theologian. Gallus, born Nikolaus Hahn, was the eldest son of the mayor of Köthen. Like many affected by Humanism, he Latinized his name to Gallus. In 1530 he enrolled at the University of Wittenberg. There he studied under Justus Jonas, Jacob Schenck, MARTIN LUTHER, and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON. He earned his master's degree in THEOLOGY in 1537. After a brief leave he returned to Wittenberg and in 1540 earned his Studium. He then assumed a teaching position in Mansfeld. In 1543, with the help of Luther and Melanchthon, he received a ministerial appointment in Regensburg. After the defeat of Protestant forces in the Schmalkaldic War in 1548 and the implementation of the AUGSBURG INTERIM, Gallus left Regensburg over his unwillingness to accept the Interim. He first traveled to Wittenberg, but quickly moved on to Magdeburg.

Magdeburg was a well-fortified city that did not fall in the War of Schmalkald and thus became a Mecca for those who still hoped to fight against the Interim. The Interim reinstated many of the liturgical practices abandoned by the Protestants. To make this acceptable, Melanchthon put forward an interpretation of DOCTRINE where such practices were considered adiaphoristic; that is, they were considered “(theologically) indifferent things.” (see ADIAPHORA) From Magdeburg Gallus and such reformers as NIKOLAUS VON AMSDORF, MATTHIAS FLACIUS, and others issued a large number of pamphlets against the Interim. These pamphlets can be grouped in three major categories: (1) those that attacked the Interim, (2) those that defended the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, and (3) those that called for armed resistance to the Interim. Of those pamphlets, broadsheets, and apologies, the most complete and most influential was the Confession, Instruction, and Warning of the Pastors and Preachers of the Christian Church in Magdeburg, published in April of 1550 and written by Gallus.

The Confession is divided into seven chapters, grouped into three sections. The first section (chapters 1–7) recapitulates the main doctrinal loci of the Augsburg Confession. Section two discusses resistance theory, and section three warns of judgment against those who oppose Magdeburg. Over half of the document is devoted to the discussion of armed resistance to tyranny. The Confession is important because of its synthesis of earlier theories of resistance, its innovative interpretation of Romans 13, and its influence on later resistance theories. The Confession synthesized early sixteenth-century theories of NATURAL LAW and positive law theories into a unified theory of resistance by lesser magistrates. Gallus's unique reading of Paul's admonition to obey AUTHORITY in Romans 13 argued that only those authorities that are a terror to evildoers are in fact ordained by God. If authorities terrorize the good they betray themselves as agents of the DEVIL. Finally the Confession had international fame and influence. Its influence can be seen in the theories of resistance developed by Calvinists (such as THEODORE BEZA and JOHN KNOX) later in the sixteenth century.

In 1553 Gallus returned to Regensburg. During the 1550s and 1560s he was involved in every major intra-Lutheran controversy, including the Adiaphorist Controversy mentioned above, but also the controversies concerning free will, the Council of Trent, ANDREAS OSIANDER, CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD, and Georg Major. Gallus died in 1570.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Gallus, Nikolaus. Bekentnis Unterricht und Vermanung der Pfarrherrn und Prediger der Christlichen Kirchen zu Magdeburgk. Magdeburg: 1550.
———. Ein Disputation uber Mitteldingen. Magdeburg: 1550.
———. Das Regensburger Bekenntnis. Regensburg: 1560.
———. *Protestation concionaturvm aliquot Avgvstanae Confessionis, aduersus conuentum Tridentinum...*n.p., 1563.

Secondary Sources:

- Kolb, Robert. "The German Lutheran Reaction to the Third Period of the Council of Trent." Lutherjahrbuch 51 (1984): 63–95.
Olson, Oliver. "Theology of Revolution: Magdeburg, 1550–1551." Sixteenth Century Journal 3 (1972): 66–79.
Voit, Hartmut. Nikolaus Gallus. Ein Beitrag zur Reformationgeschichte der nachlutherischen Zeit. Einzelarbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte Bayerns 54. Neustadt a. d. Aisch, 1977.
Whitford, David. Tyranny and Resistance. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 2001.

DAVID WHITFORD

GARRISON, WINFRED (1874–1969)

American church historian and educator. Garrison was born in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1874 and died in Houston, Texas, in 1969. An active member of the Christian Church/DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, he was a prominent historian, receiving his Ph.D. in church history from the University of Chicago in 1897. His publications include over twenty books, most on Christianity in the UNITED STATES.

In 1898 Garrison became an instructor at the Disciples Divinity School, University of Chicago. From 1899 to 1906, Garrison was the president of Butler College. Moving to New Mexico for health reasons, he became president of New Mexico State University. In 1921 Garrison returned to the Disciples Divinity School to become associate professor, from which he retired in 1943. At the age of 81, Garrison helped establish the department of philosophy and religion at the University of Houston.

Multitalented, Garrison was an accomplished violinist, sculptor, linguist, educational administrator, and author. A founding member of the Disciples of Christ Historical Society, Garrison served on that board in various capacities for twenty-eight years. He was also on the editorial board of The Christian Century for over thirty years.

Garrison's particular interests were Protestantism, Christian unity, and the development of Christianity in the United States. He noted that Christianity in early America often took on the frontier characteristics of equality, independence, and INDIVIDUALISM (see FRONTIER RELIGION). He maintained that the unity that American Christianity and Protestant denominationalism sought in the new world would be found only by allowing for differences of opinion while uniting on a singular belief in Christ.

See also American Society of Church History; Higher Education; Seminaries

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Garrison, Winfred E. The March of Faith: The Story of Religion in America Since 1865. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1933.

———. Heritage and Destiny: An American Religious Movement Looks Ahead. St. Louis, MO: Bethany Press, 1961.

Secondary Source:

Disciples of Christ Historical Society. "Garrison Memorial Issue." Discipliana 29 no. 3 (1969).

DAVID L.LITTLE

GENDER

Cultural and theological assumptions about gender have played an important role in shaping Protestant thought and practice. Although Protestantism has no single body of teaching or rule of practice about gender roles, changing attitudes about masculinity and femininity have significantly affected Protestant conceptions of church leadership and norms of marriage and family life. Many scholars also find gender identity central to the often unstated dynamics of religious “feminization” within church bodies. The gendered nature of religious experience has also shaped Protestant spirituality, particularly within sectarian movements, where nontraditional gender usages may help symbolize a group’s divergence from the Protestant mainstream.

Gender as a Category of Analysis

Gender refers to the many possible social meanings attached to male and female sexual difference. Though these biological givens do not change much over time, ideas about their larger meaning may vary widely, for as scholars argue, gender is a cultural product constructed from the texts, rules, or traditions of a particular time and place. Gender constructions pose ideals of masculine and feminine behavior and appearance, and they influence practices around marriage, sexuality, and child-rearing.

Gender is also a “useful category of historical analysis” (Scott 1988) because, as postmodernist scholars argue, it provides important clues about power relationships within a given society. Conflicts over gender roles, and the use of gendered language, may often point toward larger anxieties about the social order, particularly during times of rapid change. Scholars disagree over the degree to which gender categories are imposed upon or created by persons and groups, though most would agree that such constructions are not rigidly deterministic, but allow room for various forms of individual “negotiation.”

Analysis of gender in Protestant history, and in a wide variety of other subject areas, owes much to women’s history, but the two are not the same. Gender studies built on women’s studies, an area of study that emerged in the 1960s and 1970s, itself an outgrowth of second-wave feminism. The initial purpose of women’s studies was compensatory, as a way of making up for the dearth of historical, scientific, and psychological information about women, but the explosion of scholarship on women led to more interpretive questions about gender roles, including new ones about men and masculinity. Attention to gender as an interpretive category has opened new forms of cultural analysis and invited attention to various meanings attached to marriage, sexuality, and parenthood. Gender studies also, of course, raised a host of unanswered questions about masculinity as a specific realm of experience that has changed over time and across cultures.

Sources of Protestant Tradition

In the absence of any received tradition, Protestant assumptions about gender have arisen within the boundaries of certain scriptural norms, and they have both reflected and reinforced prevailing cultural ideas about male and female differences. One influential model of gender in Western thought, for example, is based in Aristotelian biology and on an interpretation of Genesis 1:26–27, that “man” was created in God’s image. According to this view, humanity is primarily male and women are derivative, defective beings, forever imperfect because they do not possess the original imprint of the divine. A corollary of this androcentric monism or single-sex model, influenced by Greek psychology and the writings of Augustine, located the divine image in human rationality. Thus masculinity became identified with the capacity for rational thought, and femininity with the realm of emotion and intuition. The view of women as fundamentally flawed and subrational has contributed to the recurring identification within Christian thought of the woman Eve as the primary sinner, and her feminine weakness the means by which humanity was inflicted with original sin.

Another influential set of assumptions about gender, most often associated with nineteenth-century romanticism, viewed men and women as entirely different beings, neither in any sense derivative of the other. Although both sexes were said to reflect different aspects of the divine—men were still identified with objective rationality and women with emotional expressiveness—this model built on a strong identity between femininity and religion. Men were less adept in spiritual matters, it was assumed, because they lacked the requisite feeling, while women were seen as inherently, intuitively suited for religious work.

Protestant assumptions about gender have also been influenced by an array of feminist critiques. In the west, the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT introduced the principle (though not necessarily the practice) of gender neutrality before the law. This egalitarian model of feminism has greatly affected debates about women’s ordination and ecclesiastical representation, especially since the rise of second-wave feminism in the 1960s. As Christianity’s center of balance has shifted over the course of the twentieth century from the West to AFRICA, Asia, and LATIN AMERICA, Protestant theologizing about gender has also been challenged by new generations of feminist thinkers, including Latina mujerista and African American womanist writers.

Conceptions of Leadership

Protestant assumptions about gender have often formed within the context of debates about women's ecclesiastical roles, arguments in which the range of Protestant theological and social diversity are clearly evident. The common argument against female priests, that they cannot represent Christ because they do not share his male embodiedness, primarily applies to Protestant denominations with a more episcopal structure, where leadership draws from a direct line of succession from Christ and his apostles. However, most other Protestant bodies, especially those with a more congregational basis of government, have struggled to articulate the meaning of gender as a basis for ecclesiastical practice. The issue has forced them to weigh the relative importance of two Protestant principles, biblical warrant and individual freedom—a difficult theological maneuver at best.

On the one hand, Protestant groups are constrained by their understanding of biblical norms. The New Testament, and the Pauline letters in particular, contain scattered but directed passages about feminine submission to masculine authority, including some strictures against women assuming positions of religious leadership. For some Protestants, including many conservative evangelicals, the discussion has ended here: an individual's gender determines eligibility for church office.

This approach has come up against the biblical principle of spiritual equality (Galatians 3:28), however, as well as the historic Protestant emphasis on lay participation. Among pentecostal groups especially, the central importance of the Holy Spirit in calling and equipping individuals for various tasks has, at times, facilitated more equal access to church leadership. Not surprisingly perhaps, women have often been some of the earliest leaders of new spiritual movements, for example, the prophetic church movement in Africa.

As a result of these often countervailing pressures, Protestant practice has assumed an often confusing variety of forms, but the categories are durable. In fact, many of the deliberations among Protestant bodies about the ordination of homosexual persons have resembled previous debates about women in church office. The debate also raises difficult questions about the nature of gender itself and the degree to which an individual's identity is biologically determined or socially constructed. Queries about the origins of gender identity draw on a raft of scientific knowledge—embryological, genetic, and psychological research; yet the even larger question, whether an individual's sexual identity should disqualify him or her for church office, remains an open question within the broadening scope of Protestant belief and practice.

Religion and Domesticity

The REFORMATION, particularly its affirmation of Christian family life, played a major role in shaping modern Western Protestant understandings of gender. The emerging view of marriage as a covenanted relationship built on a principle of spiritual equality, continued to require female submission, but within a framework of responsible male leadership and sexual continence.

To be sure, the Reformers' critique of medieval Catholicism eradicated a pantheon of female saints and mystics, and removed Mary from her intercessory role. The closing of monastic orders also eliminated one major source of women's institutional power within the church; Protestant women would have few formal roles consonant with those of nuns or abbesses, or many powerful, positive models of female spirituality. Religious leadership in the Protestant Reformation was routinely denied to women, as the spiritually "weaker vessel."

Yet the Reformers also introduced some significant new requirements for men as husbands and fathers. Although MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) and JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) did not regard marriage as a sacrament, they held a high regard for the family as a school of religious formation and as a foundation of community life. Fathers especially had a responsibility to catechize their wives and children, and to rule responsibly. The rejection of clerical celibacy affirmed sexuality within marriage and led to increasing appreciation of its spiritual dimensions. Thus, in contrast to medieval acceptance of male incontinence as a necessity of nature, Luther taught that men had the power and the responsibility to control their sexual impulses because fatherhood required the ability to moderate one's personal desires.

The emphasis on the spiritual dimensions of marriage, evident most clearly among English Puritans, also introduced the possibility of a more egalitarian understanding of gender differences. Although the assumption of women's inferiority prevailed, the Puritan stress on inward piety could allow women and men to see each other as Christian companions within the bounds of a divinely sanctioned relationship. The result was an often paradoxical Protestant view of men and women as spiritual equals within a strict social hierarchy.

In the nineteenth century Christian domesticity was a central part of the message of Western missionaries. Women missionaries especially argued that to be Christian was, at least in part, to adopt Western domestic norms. Many missionaries thus challenged a variety of other cultural practices—polygamy, child marriages, and female circumcision—as fundamentally "unchristian," arguing (a bit ahistorically) that only Western-style Protestantism could elevate women to a position of true dignity and power. But in Africa, for example, the subsequent drive to eliminate polygamy introduced new economic and social hardships on the wives and children suddenly ejected from plural marriages.

Still, for women in patriarchal societies, religion can provide a hedge against male power. Church allegiance, especially for example, in Latin American pentecostal groups that forbid alcohol, tobacco, and sexual license, may bring about what one study has called a "reform of machismo" (Brusco 1995), restraining mostly male behaviors and authorizing women to enforce Christian standards of morality.

Feminization and Masculinization

Protestant beliefs and behaviors surrounding gender have often reflected the numerical reality that church membership has been predominantly female. Where churches follow a more open, voluntary structure, women have supported them in strong numbers, at least in part because this openness has allowed significant opportunities for leadership and personal expression, often unavailable elsewhere in society. In the nineteenth century, gender ideology encouraged women to identify with the cause of organized religion on the basis of their presumed spiritual affinity for such work.

Some critics have viewed feminization in a negative light. The tendency to identify religion as “women’s work,” they suggest, has contributed to its cultural irrelevance in the modern era. Religious feminization has been associated with the rise of sentimental piety, as well as the emergence of a more humanitarian liberal theology out of a presumably “masculine” rationalistic Calvinism. Pressures around feminization have also contributed to resistance against women in church leadership roles, based on the worry that female predominance there would remove any remaining incentives for men to support organized religion.

Churches have perceived feminization as problematic most often during times of anxiety about low levels of male membership. The problem has increased with the growing social bifurcation, especially in the secularizing West, between what has been perceived as the public (masculine) sphere of business and government, and the private (feminine) sphere of home and church. Movements within Protestantism, such as the “muscular Christianity” of the Victorians, and interdenominational “men’s movements” like the Promise Keepers in the late twentieth century, have attempted to redress the imbalance by promoting forms of worship and exhortation aimed directly at men.

Many scholars have also analyzed the role of gender in the emergence of fundamentalist movements, for these often include an aggressively masculine and/or antifeminist message. One of the similarities between Protestant fundamentalism and other non-Western forms is the common conviction that modern religious decline is related to family breakdown and, in particular, female independence from domestic constraints. Religious conservatives often emphasize the necessity of shoring up the traditional family, and restraining women’s public role, as a key to moral and spiritual revival.

Gender and Religious Experience

Evidence from Protestant history suggests that men and women may experience religion differently, and often in ways that subvert culturally accepted norms of gender. Nineteenth-century women’s evangelical conversion narratives, for example, emphasize sin and unworthiness more than men’s do, but they also show women finding new assertiveness as the result of the spiritual encounter. Puritan men who invoked feminine biblical images—like the church as the “bride of Christ”—could access a realm of religious feeling otherwise denied them.

Not surprisingly perhaps, variant or radical forms of Protestantism have often experimented with gender roles. The radical Anabaptists in sixteenth-century Münster, for example, declared a new age of liberation and introduced polygamy—at least partly to deal with an overabundance of women and a relatively small number of men in their millennial society. The LatterDay Saints have made church-sanctioned marriage a central part of their eschatology, emphasizing its eternally binding, redemptive power.

Many leaders of new sects have been women who challenged prevailing gender ideologies. Mother ANN LEE (1736–1784) founder of the SHAKERS, a radical eighteenth-century sect, envisioned God as both male and female. Many Shakers believed that just as the male Christ had inaugurated one Christian era, a female redeemer (Mother Ann) would begin the next one. Christian Science, a movement founded by a woman, Mary Baker Eddy (1821–1910), and over-whelmingly female in membership, rejected the assumption that the god of the Bible was male, and posited instead a nonmaterial “mother/father” god.

It is fitting then that so much fundamental debate in churches has involved gender issues. Protestantism has been shaped by a range of passionate arguments about the gender of God, maleness and eligibility for church office, and the use of gendered language in worship and in biblical translations. All of these point to the deep resonance of these elusive human categories within the history of Protestantism and in its future.

References and Further Reading

- Brusco, Elizabeth. The Reformation of Machismo: Evangelical Conversion and Gender in Colombia. Austin, TX: University of Texas Press, 1995.
- Fabella, Virginia, and Son Ai Lee Park, eds. We Dare to Dream: Doing Theology as Asian Women. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1990.
- Hawley, John S., ed. Fundamentalism and Gender. New York: Oxford, 1994.
- Oduyoye, Mercy, and Msimbi R.A.Kanyoro, eds. The Will to Arise: Women, Tradition and the Church in Africa. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1992.
- Ozment, Steven. When Fathers Ruled: Family Life in Reformation Europe. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
- Scott, Joan. Gender and the Politics of History. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- Swanson, R.N., ed. Gender and Christian Religion. Woodbridge, Suffolk, U.K.: Boydell Press, 1998.
- Tavard, George. Women in Christian Tradition. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1973.

MARGARET BENDROTH

GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCHES

The General Association of Regular Baptist Churches (GARBC) is a fundamentalist group of churches that broke from the Northern Baptist Convention (see AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES) in 1932 to form its own Association. It continues today as a Baptist denomination with more than 1,500 churches with a combined membership of 220,000-plus persons with various affiliated mission agencies, educational institutions, and other programs (see BAPTISTS).

Background

Beginning about 1919, when the Fundamentalist-Modernist (see MODERNISM) controversy was raging, Baptist leaders J.C.Massee and W.B.Riley called fundamentalists within the Northern Baptist Convention to meet each year before the Convention's annual meeting to press their cause. In 1920 Massee was elected president of the newly founded Fundamentalist Fellowship (in Buffalo, New York). Among other things, the Fellowship hoped to get the Northern Baptist Convention to adopt a confessional statement (similar to the New Hampshire Confession). In 1922 this effort failed, with the Convention voting instead that the New Testament was its only rule of faith. This led to the formation in 1923 (in Kansas City, Missouri) of the BAPTIST BIBLE UNION, a group comprising Northern Baptists (led by W.B.Riley), southern fundamentalists (led by J.F.Norris), and Canadian fundamentalists (led by T.T.Shields). In 1932, at the Union's last annual meeting (at the Belden Avenue Baptist Church in Chicago), the GARBC was formed by a group of thirty-four men from eight states.

Early History

At the May 1932 meeting in Chicago, Howard C. Fulton, pastor of the Belden Avenue Baptist Church, addressed the group on “What Regular Old Fashioned Baptists Stand For.” Twenty-two churches were represented and elected Harry G. Hamilton, from Buffalo, president of the new GARBC. The aim was to have an association (not a convention) of churches that would be separate from the Northern Baptist Convention. The GARBC adopted the New Hampshire Confession of Faith (1833) with a premillennial revision to the statement in 1934 in Gary, Indiana (see CONFESSIOIN).

By 1933, the GARBC had begun publishing The Bulletin (which became The Baptist Bulletin in 1934). In 1933 Robert T. Ketcham (1889–1978; born in Nelson, Pennsylvania) was elected vice president of the GARBC in 1933 and president in 1934, a post that he held until 1938. Ketcham was the single most influential person in the GARBC’s development. He served as the organization’s national representative (1948–1960), editor of The Baptist Bulletin (1948–1955), and national consultant (1960–1966). In 1934 the Council of Fourteen was established to carry out the directives of the annual meetings; this became the Council of Eighteen in 1972. The Council meets twice a year; its members are elected by delegates from GARBC churches at the annual meetings.

Developments

Early in its history the GARBC developed relationships with various mission agencies and educational institutions. By design, these agencies and institutions are not organizationally connected with the GARBC, but rather are approved (and listed) by the GARBC. Among the earliest approved mission agencies was the General Council of Cooperating Baptist Missions of North America (founded in 1920, with the name changed to Baptist Mid-Missions in 1953). The first schools approved were the Los Angeles Baptist Theological Seminary, founded in 1927, and the Baptist Bible Seminary in Johnson City, New York.

Currently, the GARBC has twelve approved mission agencies, among which the two best-known for international work are the Association of Baptists for World Evangelism (founded in 1927 as the Association of Baptists for Evangelism in the Orient; the current name was adopted in 1939; headquartered in Harrisburg, Pennsylvania) and the Baptist Mid-Missions (founded in 1920, headquartered in Cleveland, Ohio). There are nine educational institutions approved by the GARBC: Baptist Bible College and Seminary (Clarks Summit, Pennsylvania); Cedarville University (Cedarville, Ohio), Faith Baptist Bible College and Theological Seminary (Ankeny, Iowa), Northwest Baptist Seminary (Tacoma, Washington), Shasta Bible College (Redding, California), Spurgeon Baptist Bible College (Mulberry, Florida), Temple Baptist Seminary and Tennessee Temple University (Chattanooga, Tennessee), and Western Baptist College (Salem, Oregon). Five compassion ministries (most of which are related to work with children) are approved by the GARBC. In 1950 the Regular Baptist Press was established to meet the GARBC's publication needs. Its offices are located in Schaumburg, Illinois.

The national offices of the GARBC were originally located in Chicago. In 1965 the GARBC moved to Des Plaines, Illinois in 1965 and to Schaumburg, Illinois (the current location) in 1976. A new International Ministry Resource Center for the GARBC and the Regular Baptist Press was under construction in 2003. The highest position in the GARBC national office is called the National Representative. The first National Representative was appointed in 1944 (Heber O. Van Gilder, 1944–1948). Robert T. Ketcham was the National Representative from 1948 to 1960. Since then some of the National Representatives have been Paul R. Jackson (1903–1969), Joseph M. Stowell (born 1911) and Paul N. Tassell. In 2003 the National Representative was John Greening.

The GARBC reached 100 churches by 1938, 500 by 1949, and 1,000 by 1962, and has more than 1,500 churches today. The churches are located primarily in the North from New York westward and throughout the Midwest, and in Washington, California, and Florida. The churches also group themselves in various state and regional associations for local work and fellowship purposes.

Distinctives

The GARBC's primary distinctives are their Baptist, fundamentalist, separatist, and premillennialist identities. The church stresses Baptist distinctives in ways similar to all Baptist groups and is strongly committed to the proclamation of the Gospel. The GARBC emphasizes separation from worldliness and ecclesiastical apostasy, defined in part as theological liberalism and compromising accommodation (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). They understand the BIBLE to be inerrant (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY). The creation accounts are understood as literal and historical, and any form of theistic evolution is rejected. As an aspect of their premillennialism, they believe that at the second advent of Christ the SALVATION of Israel as a nation will occur in the Holy Land.

See also Baptist Family of Churches; Baptist Missions; Baptists, United States; Fundamentalism; Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

- Delnay, R. "A History of the Baptist Bible Union." Ph.D. dissertation, Dallas Theological Seminary, 1963.
- Dollar, George W. A History of Fundamentalism in America. Greenville, SC: Bob Jones University Press, 1973.
- Hopewell, William J. The Missionary Emphasis of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches. Chicago, IL: Regular Baptist Press, 1963.

- Hull, Merle H. What a Fellowship! The First Fifty Years of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches. Schaumburg, IL: Regular Baptist Press, 1981.
- Murdoch, J.Murray. Portrait of Obedience: The Biography of Robert T.Ketcham. Schaumburg, IL: Regular Baptist Press, 1979.
- Odell, Calvin. The General Association of Regular Baptist Churches and Its Attendant Movement. Salem, OR: Western Baptist Bible College Press, 1975.
- Stowell, Joseph M. Background and History of the General Association of Regular Baptist Churches. 3rd ed. Hayward, CA: J.F.May, 1949.

DAVID M.SCHOLER

GENERAL BAPTISTS

General Baptists emerged as the earliest group of the new Baptist faith in ENGLAND in the 1610s, and in the UNITED STATES beginning in the 1650s. They were marked by their more expansive, less Calvinistic views (in comparison with other BAPTISTS) on ATONEMENT and ELECTION. As they expressed it in their CONFESSION of 1678, “God’s love is manifest to all mankind, in that he is not willing, as himself hath sworn, and abundantly declared in his work, that man kind should perish eternally, but would have all to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth. And Christ died for all men, and there is a sufficiency in his death and merits for the sins of the whole world...so that if any do perish, it’s not for want of the means of grace manifested by Christ to them” (Baker 1974:18). General Baptists believed that God’s offer of SALVATION was open to all, not just to a predestined elect (see PREDESTINATION; ELECTION). This stood in contrast to the insistence on “particular” atonement espoused by the Particular (and later the Separate) Baptists. But nearly all early Baptists agreed on other fundamental doctrines and practices, including BAPTISM of adult believers by immersion, religious liberty, the primacy of Scripture over all other religious AUTHORITY, and CONGREGATIONALISM in church government.

Early English General Baptists

Baptists in England and the United States emerged as a separatist movement within seventeenth-century English Protestantism. The early Baptists were divided into two groups, each with its own separate origin and history: the Particular Baptists and the General Baptists. As separatists from the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the early General Baptists argued that true Christians must break completely from the Church of England and all forms of Christianity that partook at all of popery, and organize themselves into small bands of believers (congregations) led by elders and DEACONS (see CLERGY). A Cambridge graduate named JOHN SMYTH, who had sought asylum in Holland because of persecution, rebaptized himself in 1609, signifying his belief that baptism should be restricted to believers only. Smyth and a group of thirty-six others formed what is generally thought of as the first Baptist church after the publication of Smyth’s views on baptism in 1609. One of those members, Thomas Helwys, then split with Smyth, returned to London in the early 1610s, and established a Baptist church there. In 1612, Helwys published (and was jailed for) a short, controversial pamphlet on religious liberty, arguing that “The King hath no power over the immortal soul of his subjects” (Brackney 1988:191).

Despite persecution, the General Baptists grew from five churches and 150 members in 1626 to about forty congregations in 1644. They created the General Assembly of General Baptists in 1654 and subscribed to a confession of faith in 1678. Their church government was relatively centralized in comparison to other groups, because they gave considerable authority to their general assemblies to act so as to “preserve unity” and “prevent heresy,” and with “lawful power to hear, and determine, as also to excommunicate” individuals and congregations that were not in accordance with the confession (Baker 1974:19). In the eighteenth century, the English General Baptists fell into disarray and largely died out. Most members joined up with other Protestant dissenters (such as the Quakers, or Friends), evolved into Unitarians or began attending congregations of other more successful Baptist groups (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF; DISSENT; NON-CONFORMITY).

General Baptists in the United States

General Baptists appeared in Rhode Island in the 1650s. In the United States the General Baptists retained their greatest strength in Rhode Island and other nearby regions through the eighteenth century, although some appeared in the South in the late seventeenth century. Over time, most General Baptist churches eventually merged into other Baptist groups, such as the Particular and then the Separate Baptists.

Under the influence of the Great Awakening “New Light” preaching (see AWAKENINGS), many General Baptist members began to accept more Calvinistic doctrines of limited atonement, whereas others moved in an opposite direction and merged with the growing movement of “FREE WILL BAPTISTS.” As a result, the General Baptists exercised relatively little influence in England or the United States after the mid-eighteenth century. In the United States, the Separates and Regular Baptists merged to form the dominant mainstream of Baptist life by the late eighteenth century.

Later Developments Among General Baptists

Small pockets of General Baptist sentiment survived, attracting those who believed in more general views on humankind atonement than the largely Calvinistic limited atonement, mainstream Baptist tradition. Later generations of General Baptists split over a number of issues. Some joined the Free Will Baptists. Others began describing themselves as the “Six-Principle” Baptists, adding to the normal run of Baptist beliefs the idea that the laying on of hands was one of the gospel ordinances that Christians were commanded to obey. They took their principles from Hebrews 6:1–3, verses that outlined their six principles: repentance from sins, faith toward God, baptism by immersion, laying on of hands, resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment.

In 1824, Benoni Stinson, a young Regular Baptist minister in Kentucky, grew dissatisfied with the harsh CALVINISM that he encountered among Baptist associations in his state. Failing to change its THEOLOGY, Stinson formed a new congregation that came to be called General Baptists. It held to the historic General Baptist view on the universal offer of salvation, and insisted on three ordinances: baptism, the LORD'S SUPPER, and WASHING OF FEET. Eventually, many of the "Stinsonites" merged with the Free Will Baptists, but a remnant of General Baptists originated by Stinson survives today and supports a small denominational establishment.

See also Americans United for the Separation of Church and State; Feet, Washing of; UnitarianUniversalist Association

References and Further Reading

Baker, Robert. The Southern Baptist Convention and Its People, 1607–1972. Nashville, TN: Broadman Press, 1974.

Brackney, William. The Baptists. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1988.

Laslie, T.A.H. History of the General Baptists. Cedar Bluffs, IA, 1938.

Knight, Richard. History of the General or Six Principle Baptists, in Europe and America. Providence, RI: Smith and Parmenter, 1827. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1980.

PAUL HARVEY

GENEVA BIBLE

The Geneva Bible was a translation made by exiles to Geneva during the reign of the Catholic queen of England, Mary Tudor (r. 1553–1558). Set in Roman type, with twenty-six engravings and five maps, each book was introduced by a preface and divided into verses. It became the most popular English Bible among Protestants in the British Isles and the New World because of comments in the margins, common in Renaissance books. These served as an interpretive device that placed it squarely in the Protestant camp, identifying the pope as ANTICHRIST. Read in Scottish churches, it also came to the New World with Pilgrims on the Mayflower (1620).

In 1555 JOHN CALVIN had welcomed Marian exiles to Geneva during an intense period of BIBLE publication in this Protestant printing center. Although the exact identity of William Whittingham's team of translators is uncertain, Anthony Gilby and Christopher Goodman participated. After the accession of ELIZABETH I (r. 1558–1603) to the English throne, Whittingham stayed in Geneva until May 1560, seeing the Bible through the press of Rowland Hall.

Frequently reprinted, after 1576, some editions substituted marginal notes revised by Laurence Tomson, based on notes by THEODORE BEZA (1519–1605) and Camerarius. From the late 1590s some Geneva Bibles substituted anti-Catholic notes by Franciscus Junius (1545–1602) on the Book of Revelation.

In 1604 James I (r. 1603–1625) claimed the Geneva Bible's notes allowed disobedience to kings. He ordered a new translation without marginal notes (1611). In 1616 printing the Geneva Bible in ENGLAND was forbidden, and it was imported from Amsterdam. This barrier was lifted after 1640. New marginal notes proved too expensive for the printing industry. A separate volume of annotations and commentary was published instead, enabling the King James Version of the Bible, itself influenced by the Geneva Bible (whose last known edition was 1644), to supersede it in popularity. Modern facsimile editions have allowed work on the enormous impact of the Bible and its marginalia.

See also Bible, King James Version; Bible Translation; Pilgrim Fathers

References and Further Reading

- Betteridge, Maurice. "The Bitter Notes: The Geneva Bible and Its Annotations." Sixteenth Century Journal 14 (1983): 41–62.
- The Geneva Bible: A Facsimile of the 1560 Edition with an Introduction by Lloyd E. Berry.* Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969.
- Lampros, Dean George. "A New Set of Spectacles: The Assembly's Annotations, 1645–1657." Renaissance and Reformation. New Series 19 (1995): 33–46.
- Sheppard, Gerald T., ed. The Geneva Bible (The Annotated New Testament, 1602 Edition). Pilgrim Classic Commentaries, vol. 1: The Geneva Bible. New York: The Pilgrim Press, 1989. [A clear facsimile of the Geneva Bible with marginal notes by Laurence Tomson and Franciscus Junius.]

JEANNINE E. OLSON

GENEVA CATECHISM

The 1542 Catechism of the Church of Geneva was JOHN CALVIN'S second original contribution to sixteenth-century catechetical literature. His first CATECHISM, published in 1537 during his first stay in Geneva, was a short summary of his THEOLOGY with many similarities to the developing INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. Like the first catechetical efforts of other Reformers (MARTIN LUTHER, JOHANNES BRENZ, MARTIN BUCER), this work proved too complex for catechetical use, and furthermore its author was forced out of Geneva in the following year. When invited to return in 1541, therefore, Calvin demanded thorough religious and moral reforms as a condition. One aspect of these reforms was intensive religious instruction. For this purpose Calvin wrote the Geneva Catechism in November of 1541. It was published in French the next year, and in Latin in 1545.

The sixteenth century saw intense catechetical activity among both Catholics and Protestants. This literature drew on fifteenth-century precedents and embodied a renewed concern for well-informed lay piety. Also influential was Desiderius Erasmus's 1533 Explanation of the Creed. Among evangelical catechisms, Luther's German Catechism of 1529 and his subsequent (and more effective) Shorter Catechism were particularly important. In southern GERMANY the free imperial city of Strasbourg produced a large number of catechisms throughout the 1520s and 1530s, two of them written by Bucer, the most important Strasbourg theologian, in 1534 and 1537, respectively. Calvin lived in Strasbourg during his exile from Geneva, 1537–1541. While there he translated into French the section of Bucer's 1537 catechism intended for young children, demonstrating his respect for Bucer as a catechist, although his 1542 catechism shows more debt to Bucer's 1534 Short Scriptural Explanation.

Sixteenth-century catechisms, like their medieval predecessors, consisted of an explanation of the Creed, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the SACRAMENTS. Luther deviated from his predecessors by placing the Commandments before the Creed. This expressed his belief that the Law functioned primarily to convict us of our sinfulness and drive us to faith in Christ (the "second use" of the Law). This order was followed by many evangelical catechisms, including Calvin's 1537 attempt. The earlier editions of the Institutes (up to 1559) also began with the Law as a means of self-knowledge leading to faith in Christ. In southern Germany, however, it was more common to follow the medieval order, and Bucer's 1534 catechism did so. The 1542 Geneva Catechism, written after Calvin's stay in Strasbourg, also began with the Creed.

Theologically, placing the summary of the Law after the Creed expressed a focus on the Law as a guide to the Christian life (the so-called third use), which would become typical of “Reformed” Protestantism. However, Calvin’s continued use of the “Lutheran” order in the 1539 and 1543 versions of the Institutes should make us cautious about reading too much into this.

Calvin’s second catechism, unlike his first, adopted the question-and-answer format typical of the genre. Calvin expands this format into a dialogue, in which the minister might pose objections or make follow-up comments. Pedagogically this method may have made children feel as if they were taking a more active part in the learning process. Even though they were in fact reciting rote responses, the minister’s questions would encourage them to think more carefully about exactly why they were giving those particular answers.

The minister’s objections also led to the condemnation of erroneous positions. Calvin’s catechism is free from direct polemic, but occasionally the minister makes what appears to be a logical inference from what the child has just said, only to be corrected. For instance, after the child asserts that works done in faith are pleasing to God, the minister suggests that it follows that such works merit God’s love. This meets with a categorical “No.” The minister then objects, “You are not intending to say however that the good works of the faithful are useless?” And later, “But can we believe in order to be justified, without doing good works?” After the child has answered these questions correctly, the minister finally confirms the orthodox position: “Faith then...is the root from which [good works] are produced.” To which the child responds, “It is so.” This rigorous interrogation matches objections made by Catholics and would have been good preparation for the defense of Protestant beliefs in real debate. It also allows Calvin to address controversial issues without directly attacking his opponents.

The catechism is a summary of the Christian faith intended for pastoral purposes. It lacks the polemic of the Institutes and also does not engage in detailed exegetical or historical discussion. It focuses on issues of direct pastoral importance—the minister repeatedly asks such questions as, “Do you derive any benefit from this?” (Qu. 41, CR 34:21) Thus, PREDESTINATION is affirmed but not discussed in detail, and more theoretical questions such as the role of the natural knowledge of God are omitted entirely. On the other hand, Calvin’s discussion of the sacraments here is arguably clearer and more convincing than the rather involved treatment in the 1559 Institutes. Calvin seems much more comfortable explaining how the believer is to regard the sacraments as means of grace (his primary focus here) than attempting to clarify his position among the swirling sixteenth-century controversies on the subject.

Other noteworthy points include Calvin’s explicit affirmation of the Trinity in traditional language, in contrast to the 1537 catechism’s attempt to avoid non-biblical terminology. Christ’s saving work is presented primarily as a victory over death and a liberation from Satan’s tyranny, although it is also a satisfaction of God’s justice. Calvin defines the church primarily as “the company of those whom God has chosen to save” (Qu. 100, CR 34:41), but he links the forgiveness of sins to membership in the church as “the community of the faithful” (Qu. 105, CR 34:42) explicitly threatening schismatics with damnation.

Although much briefer and to the point than the Institutes, the catechism is a remarkably detailed presentation of Christian DOCTRINE (especially when compared to its chief counterpart among the Lutherans, the Shorter Catechism). Calvin's stylistic virtues of clarity and confidence are particularly in evidence. The Latin version differs little from the French, although it occasionally adds additional comments and is not a slavishly literal translation.

The 1542 Catechism was supreme among Reformed catechetical literature until the composition of the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM in 1563, which borrowed a good deal from it (including its creative use of the question-and-answer format). It continued, however, to be among the three principal catechisms of the Reformed tradition, and is regarded to this day as one of the major Reformed confessional statements.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Calvin, John. "The Geneva Catechism." Corpus Reformatorum 34 (Calvini Opera 6): 1–160. Halle: C.A.Schwetschke, 1834ff.

Thomas, Torrance, ed. John Calvin, Tracts and Treatises, vol. 2. Translated by Henry Beveridge. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1958.

—, ed. The School of Faith: The Catechisms of the Reformed Church. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1959.

A translation of the Latin text can also be found at the following website:

http://www.reformed.org/documents/calvin/%20geneva_catachism/geneva_catachism.html

A translation of the French text is available on several websites, including http://www.kinderkreations.com/%20calvin'%20s_catechism.htm

The 1537 Catechism is found in Ioannis Calvini Opera Omnia, Series 3, Scripta Ecclesiastica, vol. 2, Instructio et confessio de foi dont on use en l'Église de Genève/Catechismus seu christianae religionis institutio ecclesiae genevensis, edited by Annette Zillenbiller. Geneva: Droz, 2002. English translation (from 1538 Latin text) by Ford Lewis Battles, in John Hesselink, ed., Calvin's First Catechism: A Commentary. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1997.

Secondary Source:

Barth, Karl. The Faith of the Church: A Commentary on the Apostles' Creed According to Calvin's Catechism. London: Fontana Books, 1965.

EDWIN TAIT

GEORGE, DAVID (1742–1810)

African American churchman. Founder of pioneering black Baptist churches in the American South, Nova Scotia, and West Africa, George was born into SLAVERY in Virginia in 1742. He later fled to South Carolina, where he founded the first black Baptist church at Silver Bluff in 1773. The congregation grew to more than thirty slaves and free blacks under George's direction and was visited by notable black itinerants such as George Liele.

After siding with British Loyalists during the American War of Independence, George was evacuated to Nova Scotia in 1783 along with three thousand other African Americans. At Shelburne he founded one of the first Baptist churches in Nova Scotia; he also itinerated, baptized, and organized seven other Baptist churches in black and white communities throughout the province. Well known for his passionate preaching, George became a target of mob violence in 1784 when disbanded white soldiers rioted against free blacks. In 1792 he helped organize the emigration of 1,200 blacks to SIERRA LEONE, where he continued his work as a Baptist preacher, church organizer, and political advocate. George delivered his life narrative to the Baptist ministers John Rippon and Samuel Pearce during a visit to ENGLAND in 1793; Rippon published this account in the 1793 edition of The Annual Baptist Register. George died in Sierra Leone in 1810.

See also Africa; African American Protestantism; American Baptist Churches; Baptists, United States; Sierra Leone

References and Further Reading

“An Account of the Life of Mr. David George, from Sierra Leone in Africa” (1793). In Face Zion Forward: First Writers of the Black Atlantic, 1785–1798, edited by Joanna Brooks and John Saillant. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2002.

Gordon, Grant. From Slavery to Freedom: The Life of David George, Pioneer Black Baptist Minister. Hantsport, Nova Scotia: Lancelot, 1992.

JOANNA BROOKS

GERHARDT, PAUL (1607–1676)

Lutheran hymn writer. Gerhardt was born near Wittenberg on March 12, 1607. Orphaned early in his youth, he attended boarding schools and in 1628 began the study of THEOLOGY at the University of Wittenberg, then the citadel of Lutheran ORTHODOXY. The next years of Gerhardt's life are enigmatic. In 1643 he was in Berlin and eight years later, he was appointed Pastor in the small town of Mittenwalde near Berlin. In 1655 he married Anna Maria Berthold, the youngest daughter of a legal counsel in Berlin in whose house he had stayed as a guest for some time. In 1657 he was appointed DEACON at the parish of St. Nikolaus in Berlin.

Gerhardt's mature years fell into the time of the intense controversy between Lutheran and Reformed (Calvinist) theologians especially in Prussia. The Prussian elector sought to stem the vehement controversy by ordering the omission of the Formula of Concord, with its decided anti-Reformed orientation, in the ordination vows of candidates for the ministry, and furthermore prohibited Prussian theology students from attending the University of Wittenberg. Gerhardt, who sided with the Lutherans, served as theological expert at an important colloquy between Lutherans and Reformed in 1662–1663, indicating his desire to resolve the disagreements. By the same token he refused to subscribe to a government-imposed statement that would have demanded complete silence in all controversial theological issues. Accordingly he was removed from his office in February 1666.

A flood of petitions to the Prussian elector effected his reinstatement, without giving him, however, the authorization to preach. The Berlin city council addressed a new petition to the elector, asking that Gerhardt be allowed to preach. The elector's failure to respond to this new petition prompted Gerhardt to resign his position in February 1667. In October of the following year he was elected archdeacon of Luebben in the Niederlausitz, where he died on May 27, 1676.

Gerhardt's significance in that turbulent age lay in his voluminous contribution to German Lutheran hymnody. The 1653 Lutheran hymnal, published in Berlin (Praxis Pietatis Melicd), included some eighty of his hymns, a significant number of which are still found in the current German Lutheran hymnal, an indication, surely, of his abiding significance. Although his popularity has been mainly in the German language culture, a number of his hymns, such as O, Sacred Head Now Wounded, have been translated into English.

See also Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Cranach-Sichert, Eberhard von, ed. Paul Gerhardt. Dichtungen und Schriften. Zug: Verlag der Obelisk, 1957.

Ebeling, Johann Georg. Pauli Gerhardi geistliche Andachten (1667). Selections Instrumentalstimmen zu den Geistlichen Andachten. Bern: Francke Verlag, 1975.

Hewitt, Theodore B. Paul Gerhardt as a hymn writer and his influence on English hymnody. St. Louis: Concordia Pub. House, 1976.

Secondary Sources:

Axmacher, Elke. Johann Arndt und Paul Gerhardt: Studien zur Theologie, Frömmigkeit und geistlichen Dichtung des 17. Jahrhunderts. Tübingen: Francke, 2001.

Grosse, Sven. Gott und das Leid in den Liedern Paul Gerhardts. Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte; Bd. 83. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

GERMAN CHRISTIANS

The German Christians (Deutsche Christen) were a group of clergy and laypeople in GERMANY in the 1930s and 1940s who sought to synthesize National Socialism (Nazism) and Christianity. They aimed to purge Christianity of everything they deemed Jewish and to transform the German Protestant church into an association based on “blood.” Most of the approximately 600,000 members were Protestant, although a few Catholics were involved. By mid-1933, six months after Hitler became chancellor, German Christians had acquired key posts in the Protestant establishment—in national church governing bodies and university faculties of theology, as regional bishops, and on local church councils. Many kept those positions until 1945 and beyond.

Birth of the German Christians

Three impulses converged to form the German Christian movement. In 1932, a group of politicians and pastors met to discuss how to win the Protestant churches of Germany to the Nazi cause. They initially named themselves Protestant National Socialists but decided on German Christians instead. Meanwhile, in Thuringia, Siegfried Leffler and Julius Leutheuser, two young pastors and war veterans, had been preaching religious renewal along Nazi lines since the 1920s. They also called themselves German Christians. The two groups began to cooperate. A third initiative came from the Protestant, folkish associations that emerged after World War I. Dedicated to reviving church life through emphasizing German culture, ANTI-SEMITISM, and nationalism, some of those organizations merged with the German Christian movement.

Instead of breaking with the established Protestant churches, the German Christians tried to take over from within. Their efforts sparked a fight for control known as the Church Struggle. The German Christians’s main rival was the CONFESSING CHURCH, another movement within official Protestantism. Most Protestants remained neutral. The German Christians also had opposition outside the church from neopagans who considered even nazified Christianity “too Jewish.” Although clergymen were their main spokesmen, the German Christians represented a cross-section of German society:

women and men, old and young, teachers, dentists, railroad workers, house-wives, and farmers.

Ideology

The German Christians aimed to create a “people’s church” that would embrace all “true” Germans and provide a spiritual homeland for the Aryans of the Third Reich. Calling themselves “Stormtroopers of Christ,” they attacked every aspect of Christianity that was related to JUDAISM. They rejected the Old Testament, revised the New Testament, expunged words like “Hallelujah” and “Hosanna” from hymns, and denied that Jesus was a Jew. Because the German Christians considered Jewishness racial, they refused to accept conversions from Judaism to Christianity as valid.

Certain ideas about gender helped the German Christians reconcile Nazism and Christianity. According to German Christians, only a hard, manly church devoid of qualities they considered feminine—like compassion—could fight racial impurity. Moreover, they argued, just as Christian faith did not eradicate physical differences between male and female, it did not negate the supposedly biological fact of race.

Growth and Expansion Tactics

The German Christians promoted their views through mass rallies; in newspapers, flyers, and scholarly works; and from the pulpit. Lay members spread the word in schools and at local pubs. The German Christians did more than talk: they disrupted meetings of the Confessing Church, barricaded church buildings, and assaulted and harassed non-Aryans, that is, converts from Judaism to Christianity and their families.

German Christian ideas remained fairly constant, but the movement changed over time. During the first year (1932 to late 1933) the German Christians enjoyed open Nazi support. They swept the Protestant church elections in 1933 and dominated the process that unified Germany’s regional Protestant churches into a national Protestant Church. A German Christian, the naval chaplain Ludwig Müller, became Protestant Reich bishop.

Fall of the German Christians

Success was short-lived. Worried that the German Christians caused dissension, Nazi leaders withdrew their support. Tensions surrounding the movement exploded at a rally in November 1933. Before an audience of 20,000 in the Berlin Sports Palace, the speaker, a high school religion teacher named Reinhold Krause, attacked the Old Testament, the concept of sin, and the symbol of the cross as unacceptable signs of Jewish influence. Krause's speech sparked a wave of departures from German Christian ranks by members who wanted to retain traditional Christianity.

For the next two years the movement was in shambles. The national group splintered, but the names of the new factions—Reich Movement of German Christians; The Church Movement of German Christians; The German Christians, National Church Union—indicate that core ideas persisted. By late 1935 the German Christians were reorganizing, and by September 1939, when German troops invaded Poland, almost all the camps had reestablished ties.

War fulfilled many of the German Christians' aims. They had demanded an aggressive Christianity; now they had the nation at arms. They demanded exclusion of non-Aryans and Jewish influences from German religious life; that goal was realized by default through the deportation and murder of people defined as Jews. But the war also brought setbacks. Even the German Christians experienced hostility from Nazi authorities who resented Christianity in any form.

When Hitler's regime collapsed in 1945, the German Christian movement lost all credibility. Former members now had to justify their involvement to Allied occupation authorities, denazification boards, and even themselves. Many pointed to their ideal of the "people's church" to try to prove they had only wanted religious renewal. They rarely mentioned the anti-Semitism that had pervaded their program. In response to Allied pressure, some German Christian pastors were ousted, but within a few years almost all were back in the pulpit. Lay members easily reentered the Protestant mainstream. Some scholars dismiss the German Christians because they constituted a small part of the population—around 1 percent. In the context of the Nazi system, however, the movement was significant. Through their quest for a "racially pure," anti-Jewish church, the German Christians echoed and endorsed the crimes of Nazi Germany.

References and Further Reading

- Bergen, Doris L. Twisted Cross: The German Christian Movement in the Third Reich. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Conway, John S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches, 1933–45. New York: Basic Books, 1968.
- Ericksen, Robert P. Theologians Under Hitler: Gerhard Kittel, Paul Althaus and Emanuel Hirsch. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1985.
- , and Susannah Heschel, eds. Betrayal: German Churches and the Holocaust. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1999.
- Scholder, Klaus. The Churches and the Third Reich. Vol. 1: Preliminary History and the Time of Illusions, 1928–1934. Vol. 2: The Year of Disillusionment: 1934. Translated by John Bowden. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1987–1988.

DORIS L. BERGEN

GERMAN GROUPS IN AMERICA

The appearance of German groups in America had a modest beginning in 1683, with the arrival of a small Mennonite congregation in Germantown, Pennsylvania. Soon others arrived in that colony, drawn by the “Holy Experiment” of the Quaker colonial proprietor, William Penn (1644–1718). The early immigrants included a preponderance of religious mystics (like Johann Kelpius, 1673–1708) and sectarians (including the German Baptist Brethren or Dunkers; Schwenkfelders; the “Community of True Inspiration,” whose members later formed the Amana colonies in Iowa; and others), who were characterized by radical Pietist beliefs. In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, German radical Pietists like Conrad Beissel (1691–1768) and George Rapp (1757–1847) founded perfectionistic communities driven by eschatological fervor, such as the Ephrata Cloister (Pennsylvania) and New Harmony (Indiana), respectively. Moravians also migrated to colonial North Carolina and Pennsylvania, where their leader, Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF (1700–1760) unsuccessfully attempted to form a unitive movement of Pennsylvania German sects called “The Congregation of God in the Spirit” (1742). In addition, numerous Hessian mercenary soldiers employed by the British during the Revolutionary War remained in this land and contributed to the cultural life of the new nation.

German immigration to the American middle colonies in the eighteenth century was surpassed in the period from 1820 to 1925, when almost six million Germans arrived in the United States, representing the largest nationality group among all American immigrants of that era. Religious freedom linked with a quest for new economic opportunity was a major factor for earlier German immigrants, who coalesced in three kinds of religious groups, the “plain Dutch,” the “church Dutch,” and the “bush meeting Dutch.” (In this usage, “Dutch” is an American colloquialism for “Deutsch,” as distinct from immigrants from Holland.)

The Plain Dutch

The “plain Dutch,” noted for their conservative garb, included those who identified with the believers’ church, or historic peace church tradition. They include some twenty organized Anabaptist church bodies, which take their name from their opponents' reference to their practice of "rebaptizing" their converts in denunciation of infant baptism. They are concerned with restoring a primitive New Testament pattern of church life, based on discipleship and the separation of church and state. They are chiefly represented in America by a variety of MENNONITE church bodies, derived from the name of their Dutch Anabaptist leader, MENNO SIMONS (c. 1496–1561). Those Mennonites who moved to colonial Pennsylvania, as well as Maryland and the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, were of Swiss and South German Anabaptist orientation. Mennonites who migrated to the American Plains states and southern Manitoba in the late nineteenth century were of Russian-German origin. Groups that emerged from the former immigration include the "Old" Mennonites and the Old Order Amish, who based their beliefs on the decision (c. 1693) of a Swiss Mennonite named Jacob Ammann to reject the new spirit of PIETISM by adopting a traditionalist view of dress and economic and social life for his adherents. By contrast, the River Brethren (1788), later known as the BRETHREN IN CHRIST, integrated Pietist themes of personal rebirth with an Anabaptist form of church life. Mennonites of Russian-German origin largely became concentrated in the Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonite Churches. Like Quakers, Mennonites have initiated valuable humanitarian service projects as part of their nonviolent witness to the world. Total membership in North American Mennonite bodies was 340,000 in 1984.

The Church Dutch

The "church Dutch" represent the adherents of the official state churches, including Lutherans, German Reformed, and Roman Catholics. Persons of German descent represent the majority of the two largest Lutheran church bodies in America, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (5.5 million members at its formation in 1988) and the LUTHERAN CHURCH, MIS-SOURI SYNOD (2.7 million members). The lineage of the former body reaches back to the organizational work of HENRY M.MUHLENBERG (1711–1787) a product of the Halle (GERMANY) center of Lutheran Pietism, who arrived in Pennsylvania in 1742. In the nineteenth century, German Lutherans polarized between supporters of SAMUEL S.SCHMUCKER (1799–1873) of Gettysburg Seminary (Pennsylvania), who led the effort to "Americanize" Lutherans, and CARL F.W.WALTHER (1811–1887), an immigrant who reacted against German Lutheran rationalism and shaped a distinctly confessional "church" consciousness among Saxons in Missouri. His work soon spread to other states. SYNODS that grew from Schmucker's work were fully involved in the National and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The Missouri Synod, becoming the largest German Protestant denomination in America, maintained German-language services through the era of the First World War, and has continued to provide the most extensive parochial school system in America outside Catholicism. Prior to the twentieth century, German Lutherans tended to maintain an identity distinct from Lutherans of Scandinavian and Baltic origin.

Also numbered among the “church Dutch” were the German Reformed, who arrived in the middle colonies in the colonial era and were initially organized by John Philip Boehm (1683–1749) and then by Michael Schlatter (1718–1790). The latter organized a “coetus” under the jurisdiction of the Synod of Amsterdam. German Reformed had their home in the German Palatinate, and were devoted to an irenic statement of Reformed theology, the HEIDELBERG CAT-ECHISM (1563). Given this irenic bent, German Reformed in America joined with “unionist” Prussian immigrants, known as the Evangelical Synod of North America, to form the Evangelical and Reformed Church in 1934. The latter body became a part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST in 1957. Finally, there were the German Catholics, who, along with Irish immigrants, formed the majority of the ten million Roman Catholic immigrants who arrived from Europe in the century following 1820. German Catholic dioceses, especially in the Great Lakes and the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys, formed another bulwark of German cultural heritage, and often resisted the pace of their church’s Americanization.

The Bush-Meeting Dutch

A third religious grouping of German Americans has been called the “bush-meeting Dutch,” which describes their propensity for open-air revival or camp meeting services and emotional, Pietistic religious expression centered on the centrality of the experience of the “new birth” (der Wiedergeburt). Their early leadership was provided by the unionist efforts of a Pietist missionary of the German Reformed Church, Philip William Otterbein (1726–1813) and a “converted” Mennonite leader, Martin Boehm (1725–1813), who laid the foundations for the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (1800). The latter, as well as the Evangelical Association that was founded by a Lutheran lay preacher, Jacob Albright (1759–1808), grew rapidly in the nineteenth century by adapting revivalistic preaching and Methodist patterns of organization to reach German immigrants, among others. The Evangelicals also conducted extensive mission work to their German “Fatherland,” establishing a major free church group there in the mid-nineteenth century. These two German-American revival denominations united to form the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH (1946), which was later joined with the Methodist Church to form the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH (1968).

After the abortive liberal revolutions in Germany in 1830 and 1848, significant numbers of intellectual and political activist Germans immigrated to the UNITED STATES. Many were of Jewish heritage. Large numbers of Yiddish-speaking German Jews settled in New York City. The scores of learned editors of Germanlanguage newspapers in North America increasingly molded German-Americans into a self-conscious political block that was against slavery and Republican in sentiment. German cultural centers, called Turnverein, were established in cities and towns across mid-America. Another wave of German intelligentsia arrived during the oppression of the Hitler era in the 1930s and 1940s, including such notables as scientists Albert Einstein and Wernher von Braun.

The broad mix of religious and ideological groups that has comprised German-American culture reached its height of national influence in the era before the First World War, when (in 1910) 27.5 percent of all American citizens were of German birth or had at least one German-born parent.

References and Further Reading

- Ahlstrom, S.E. A Religious History of the American People. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Behney, J.B., and P.Eller. History of the Evangelical United Brethren Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1979.
- Dolan, J.P. The American Catholic Experience. South Bend, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1985.
- Fackre, Gabriel, and Michael Root. Affirmations and Admonitions: Lutheran Decisions and Dialogue with Reformed, Episcopal, and Roman Catholic Churches. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998.
- MacMaster, R.K. Land, Piety, Peoplehood, The Establishment of Mennonite Communities in America, 1683–1790. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1985.
- Ripley, Lavern. Of German Ways. Minneapolis, MN: Dillon, 1970; reprint ed. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1980.
- Stoeffler, J.E. Continental Pietism and Early American Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1976.

J.STEVEN O'MALLEY

GERMANY

The Federal Republic of Germany has 356, 945 square kilometers and 80 million people. Formally, roughly 42 percent are registered as Catholics, 40 percent as Protestants, and about 8 percent are Muslims. Protestant, in this context, means overwhelmingly Lutheran, for which the German word “evangelisch” is customarily a synonym. A distinctive feature of Protestantism is its territorial delimitation and the influence of particular doctrinal traditions. This goes back to the time of the REFORMATION when the Protestant princes reformed the church in their territories. Protestantism has had a deep impact on cultural, economic, and political developments in society, leading German Christians to reflect on subjects such as guilt and confession, forgiveness and reconciliation, and the church’s commitment to the ongoing challenges of our time.

Development of Protestantism

In 1517, Martin Luther’s Ninety-five Theses, at first written in Latin and meant for discussion in the faculty of Wittenberg, voiced the demand for a radical renewal of the Catholic Church and became the spark that set the fire. This document, although merely theological, spread like a freedom charter. MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) together with highly gifted scholars such as PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, JOHANNES BUGHENHAGEN, JOHANNES BRENZ, and MARTIN BUCER inspired the movement of church renewal. The Swiss reformers HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) and JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) of Geneva worked somewhat independently from the developments in Germany. The biblical message of JUSTIFICATION by GRACE alone brought these men into conflict with the pope and his curia. In 1521 Luther was excommunicated but stood courageously in front of the emperor Charles V at the Diet of Worms and appealed to his conscience’s commitment to the Word of God alone. The religious controversy was resolved in German lands with the Peace of Augsburg (1555), which provided for religious peace on a territorial basis: the territorial rulers had the authority to decide the religious orientation of their territories.

This formally separated Germany into Catholic and Lutheran territories. CALVINISM was not recognized in the Peace of Augsburg but nonetheless demonstrated striking vitality toward the end of the century, with a number of territorial rulers converting to Calvinism. This ecclesiastical bifurcation began to entail cultural ramifications so that North Germany (mainly Lutheran and Calvinist) developed differently from the South.

Theologically the churches undertook to demonstrate their particular theological emphases in almost scholastic fashion. All churches took correct DOCTRINE to be the essence of the Christian religion, leading to the label of ORTHODOXY for that period.

In the late seventeenth century, following confessional orthodoxy, a new movement of personal piety arose. The Reformation stress on personal SALVATION was restated in terms of the personal experience of faith. PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER, JOHANN ALBRECHT BENGEL, and many others emphasized the practical side of piety. The term "Pietists," initially a term of mockery, soon became the universally used label.

Extensive BIBLE study and gatherings with PRAYER, hymns, and an individual way of life became characteristic of PIETISM. After 1700 AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE in HALLE and later count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF in HERRNHUT with his community of Moravians began sending missionaries overseas. Pietism was a movement similar to that of JOHN WESLEY'S in ENGLAND, but unlike Wesley's METHODISM it did not result in a separate church. In the nineteenth century the notion of mission to people overseas was stimulated by the establishment of several missionary societies, but only after the German acquisition of overseas colonies in 1885 did the issue of MISSIONS receive general attention. In the early nineteenth century several attempts were made to overcome the fatal divisions of the Reformation era. Effectively a third Protestant church came into being in addition to the Reformed and Lutheran: the Church of the PRUSSIAN UNION.

The Germany of roughly its current boundaries came into being in 1871. Before that it was divided into more than thirty larger and smaller states, virtually autonomous so that they even waged war against each other. The sovereign determined the confession of his subjects, so that quite often some villages were Protestant whereas over the border of the small state the villagers were Catholic. This confessional "mosaic" is recognizable in the confessional map of Germany until today. In 1918, with the end of World War I, a 400-year-old relationship of "throne and altar" ended, and the churches plunged into a severe crisis. In a time of poverty they had to establish synods and councils and organize their finances. Twenty-eight territorial churches formed a federation in 1922. It lasted eleven years until the Nazis dissolved it and, as they claimed, established a National Church (Reichskirche). During the period of oppression during the "Third Reich" (1933–1945), a renewed understanding of Christian service and mandate developed in the so-called CONFESSING CHURCH.

After the defeat in World War II Germany was divided into two separate states. Under the subjection of the Soviet Union, Eastern Germany, including East Berlin, became the German Democratic Republic (GDR). West Germany constituted the Federal Republic of Germany (FRG). When Protestant church leaders met in Stuttgart in 1945, they adopted a declaration of guilt for the Nazi regime, asking the neighboring Christians and churches for forgiveness. In 1948, a time of growing tension between the two political systems of East and West, the federation of churches known as the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKD) was founded, consisting of the regional churches of both East and West. The churches in both states retained a special bilateral relationship across the inner German border. However, so as not to be relegated to a religious ghetto or to be confined to WORSHIP and private religious needs, the churches in the GDR accepted the permanence of the GDR and its social system and attempted to add their own contributions to society. In 1969 they ended their membership in the EKD and established the Federation of the Evangelical Churches—Bund Evangelischer Kirchen (BEK)—in the German Democratic Republic. The special relationship between the church federation in the East and the EKD in the West, however, continued in joint statements of both churches and took shape in a wide-reaching network of partner relationships between parishes in East and West.

The autonomy of the BEK resulted in a new definition of the goals of church politics, reducing confrontation and seeking cooperation where it appeared possible to both CHURCH AND STATE. However, the fundamental conflict to which committed Christian students and workers were subjected in the educational system of the GDR was never settled. The GDR Ministry of State Security (Stasi), in its effort to control the population, penetrated every organization to gain collaborators and the church was not excluded. After German unification, discerning between cooperation and resistance was difficult. With the extraordinary events set in motion by the rise to power of Mikhail Gorbachev in the Soviet Union, the influence of the Soviet Union on East Germany waned, and the East German people overthrew the Communist government in late 1989 in a peaceful revolution.

When the GDR was established in 1949, under the leadership of the Socialist Unity Party (SED), more than 90 percent of the population were members of the Protestant (Lutheran and Prussian Union) Church. In the 1980s, after half a century of the socialist reorganization of society, only 30 to 40 percent of the population belonged to a Christian church, even fewer in the cities.

Cultural, Economic, and Political Impacts

According to Luther's principle of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, all Christians should be able to read the Bible. Endowed with the ability to find the adequate language, after twelve years' work Luther completed the translation of the entire Bible in 1534 (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). Through this translation he contributed significantly to the emergence of a unified written German language. The disposition of Protestantism to cultivate literacy and to spread regard for the vernacular served to remove the linguistic dominance of Latin of medieval Christendom and to encourage the rise of national boundaries based on languages. It is therefore possible to speak of Protestantism's contribution to the rise of present German society.

All reformers were extremely busy writing essays, counseling letters, and comments on theological and public issues of the day. Neither Luther nor his associates were organizers but rather scholars and educators. The publication of the Bible in German, however, was a signal to many Christians to rely directly on the message of the Word of God and to take responsibility for the life of the church. The real reform of the church, its service, and structure was implemented by town councils or rulers, not by bishops (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). Thus, the responsibility of the LAITY in Protestantism was recognized early. In addition the dialogue with the spirit of the age, particularly in social and scholarly fields, was taken seriously from the beginnings of Protestantism. PAUL TILLICH, for one, argued that “the Protestant principle” of prophetic criticism is to be included in any authentic expression of church life and that it is a genuine value in the secular world.

Sociologist MAX WEBER held that the Protestant ethic—that is, the value attached to hard work, thrift, and efficiency—was an important factor in the economic success of Protestant groups not only in the Reformed parts of Germany but also in the early stages of European capitalism. Worldly success came to be interpreted as a sign of an individual’s ELECTION or eternal SALVATION and was therefore vigorously pursued. The emphasis of Calvinism on the religious duty to make fruitful use of the God-given resources at each individual’s disposal, and its orderliness and systemization of ways of life were also regarded by Weber as economically significant aspects of the Protestant ethic. Although Weber’s thesis was widely accepted, it has been subject to criticism for its monocausal explanation of the rise of capitalism. It has been expanded in favor of multicausal explanations, the argument being that political and social pressures, together with the spirit of INDIVIDUALISM with its ethic of self-help and frugality, were more significant factors (Tawney 1926).

The break from Rome during the period of the Reformation brought a new alliance of “throne and altar” in Protestant territories, a close relation of church and state: the sovereigns assumed leadership, appointed the administrators of the church of their territories, and controlled all important issues. This alliance proved to be a great hindrance when democratic ideas began to spread in the nineteenth century and Protestant pastors condemned this movement as dangerous and atheistic.

In the Federal Republic of Germany, according to its constitution, the relationship between church and state is governed by the principle that there are certain limits on the powers of the state. The constitution does not, therefore, seek to secure all-inclusive authority for the state, but limits its purpose to the maintenance of the common good, of which freedom and social justice are the main aspects. The churches are by their very nature independent of the state and do not derive any authority from it. The state recognizes them as institutions with the right of self-determination. They therefore claim autonomy in carrying out their spiritual and religious mission. State and church are obliged to strive for meaningful cooperation. Schools of theology are integral parts of state universities; schools give religious instruction on behalf of the church; and in the social services area the churches play a large role, shared alike by Catholics and Protestants.

The churches are authorized to collect a “church tax.” The legal foundation for the church tax system is found in Article 140 of the German constitution. The church tax is levied as a surcharge on the income tax and amounts to 8 or 9 percent of income tax paid, depending on the state. This church tax is administered and collected by the revenue office and transferred to the churches.

Contemporary Organizational Structures

After decades of separation, the regional Protestant churches in East and West Germany were reunited organizationally in 1991. The eight churches of the Federation of Evangelical Churches (BEK) in the territory of the former German Democratic Republic again became part of the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKD). The synods of the EKD of the West created the legal conditions for restoring the organizational unity, and then the synods of the BEK of the East agreed to the unification of all regional churches under the umbrella of the EKD some weeks later. This procedure made it possible for a new EKD Synod to constitute itself in Coburg on June 28–30, 1991, as the representative body of the twenty-four regional churches, which have a total membership of some thirty million in over 18,100 congregations. The churches of East Germany brought what they endured and experienced during forty years of socialist rule and the twenty years of the Federation of Evangelical Churches. Member churches retain their own character, which applies even more to local congregations.

It is the Council of Christian Churches—Arbeitsgemeinschaft Christlicher Kirchen (ACK)—that aims to promote the unity of the churches in national, regional, and local alliances in Germany. In 1948, before the founding of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Protestant churches and the Old Catholic Church joined together to form the Council of Christian Churches. In 1974 the Roman Catholic Church, through association of the German dioceses and the Greek Orthodox Metropolitan of Germany, joined the ACK. Because of the division of Germany beginning in 1963, the representatives from the eastern part of Germany met separately and founded an organization of Christian churches in the GDR. In 1991 both areas in Germany united in ACK under a new revised constitution. The constitution was also signed by the following churches: Baptist Union, United Methodist Church, Association of Mennonite congregations in Germany, European Continental Province of the Moravian Church, the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch in Germany, the Christian Reformed Church in Germany, the Salvation Army in Germany, and Russian Orthodox Church in Germany. Other churches take part with guest status or as observers. Among other things ACK strives for the promotion of theological dialogue, counseling and arbitration, safeguarding of ecumenical responsibilities, and the representation of common concerns on political issues.

Continuing Challenges

Diaconal Work

The Diakonisches Werk of the EKD is an umbrella organization of a great number of initiatives undertaken in the field of church social services. The members represent some 29,000 independent institutions of different size and legal status with about 300,000 full and part-time employees. Integrated in social legislation, the Diakonisches Werk coordinates and represents, for example, activities in preschools, care of the sick and disabled, immigrants, care of the homeless, former prisoners, and the poor. The main office coordinates and represents the planning and funding for many different tasks that also include aid in disasters and assistance known as “Brot für die Welt” (Bread for the World). In a time of challenge through outbursts of hatred, the German churches have taken a stand on behalf of thousands of refugees from African and Asian countries. Synodical meetings have expressed their concern and have called for Christian love and hospitality for those who have come applying for asylum.

Mission

In the early 1970s German Protestant churches structurally involved themselves in mission work by founding regional associations of mission (“Missionswerke”). The “Missionswerke” accepted the challenge presented by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) to act against social injustices such as racism and economic exploitation, and to work for justice, peace, and the preservation of creation. To promote mutual ecumenical encounters, German churches invite ecumenical workers to assume pastoral work in traditional parishes or to join those who inform congregations about new developments in the field of mission and ECUMENISM. An increasing number of congregations or church districts have set up direct links with overseas partners. The regional associations of mission have established new international structures where different churches share their multiple needs and possibilities. This means no more “one-way traffic” and not only “two-way traffic” but a multilaterally committed Christian community.

Church Membership

Undoubtedly many formal church members have become discouraged in their faith, and the young generation’s indifference toward Christianity is on the increase. Secularization and the attractions of modern life have contributed to a measurable decrease in personal belief and church membership. On the other hand, the German Evangelical “KIRCHENTAG (Church Rally),” founded in 1949 as a lay movement and held every second year, attracts more than one hundred thousand people and is particularly fascinating to the younger generation.

New Spirituality

Particularly in the western part of Germany people are expecting less and less from the church, and a free market of vague spirituality and esoteric counseling is flourishing. Reincarnation therapists, astrologers, religious healers, and other representatives of esoteric religion offer their services. More and more people feel the need of some kind of religious experience. Pentecostal and charismatic groups find it easier than the established churches to meet the challenge (see PENTECOSTALISM). Experts of the regional churches and the Protestant Center on Questions of Weltanschauung—

Evangelisches Zentrum für Weltaanschauung (EZW)—offer orientation and warning, where necessary. However, it seems that the desire for more spirituality also indicates shortcomings of the churches. The questions about dealing with one's own soul, healing the sick (see FAITH HEALING), looking after the dying (see DEATH AND DYING), meditation, and spiritual experience are not dealt with often enough and sometimes disappear behind social and political involvement. There is, however, a growing readiness within the churches to search for new forms of Christian spirituality and to revive forgotten resources of the Christian faith.

Ecology

After pastors and congregations in the 1960s had already given attention to certain environmental problems, the 1970s brought the ecological question to the agenda of many church synods. Initially, it was the discussion about the use of nuclear energy for the production of electricity that led to a passionate debate on the chances of survival of a lifestyle based on a permanent rise of electrical demand. But how to reduce the consumption of energy and to manage the regeneration of power sources? How to avoid enormous mountains of garbage, and how to develop a healthier relationship with nature and the environment? Projects of ecological analysis were initiated and the awareness increased that belief in God as Creator of the World leads Christians to adopt a responsible attitude toward the gifts of creation.

Women

The long tradition of Protestant women's religious orders, the mother-houses of DEACONESSES and sisterhoods, goes back to the middle of the nineteenth century, when Christian unmarried women used the chance of being trained to do social work in the communities. However, because social change does not stop at church portals, the number of those seeking admittance to such orders has become very small. However, WOMEN are still the foundation of the church as active believers and volunteers. In every regional church the Women's Service is autonomous and the umbrella organization on EKD-level covers a wide scope of activities of more than forty women's unions and associations. Women were very much engaged in the Peace and Antipartheid Movements and through the World Day of Prayer ecumenical contacts and personal relationships develop beyond geographical, social, and cultural boundaries. Although women were allowed to study theology in the 1920s—and it was not until the end of the 1960s that the first women were ordained and called to serve as pastors—today 40 percent of theological students are women and their numbers increase steadily in congregations. Women no longer allow themselves to be put off with subordinate functions, but assume leadership roles in the church. In 1992 Maria Jepsen from Hamburg became the first Lutheran woman bishop. The discussion about equality of women gained momentum with the women's movements in the 1970s and found a strong backing at the Women's Forum of the "Kirchentag." FEMINIST THEOLOGY—quite often a stumbling block and a cause of offense—has become an important source of renewal from within the church.

Interreligious Encounter

To live side by side with people of different faiths is still a new experience for many Germans. Although there have been smaller communities of Buddhists, Hindus, or Bahais for many years, it was in particular the recruitment of hundreds of thousands of foreign workers since the 1960s, mainly from Turkey, Morocco, Tunisia, and Yugoslavia, that made Germans feel the need of interreligious encounter. Today about 80 percent of the six million Muslims in Germany are of Turkish origin. This has confronted Germans forcefully with another religion, although prejudices and ignorance can be overcome by conversation and familiarity. From time to time congregations hold interreligious prayer services for justice and peace, sometimes as a prelude to an intercultural week. Jews, Hindus, Buddhists, Muslims, Alevis, and others gather with Christians to read from their Holy Scriptures and pray in their own languages. It is a cause for hope that in Germany, too, people of different faiths overcome existing prejudices and barriers and join together.

See also Barmen Declaration; German Christians; Lutheranism; Lutheranism, Germany; Missions, German; Worms, Diet of

References and Further Reading

- Moltmann, J., ed. Religion der Freiheit. Protestantismus in der Moderne. Munich: Christian Kaiser, 1990.
- Nowak, Kurt. Geschichte des Christentums in Deutschland (History of Christianity in Germany). Munich: C.H.Beck, 1995.
- Tawney, R.H. Religion and the Rise of Capitalism. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1926.
- Tillich, Paul. "Der Protestantismus als Kritik und Gestaltung." In Gesammelte Werke vol. 7. Stuttgart: 1962.
- Troeltsch, Ernst. Protestantism and Progress: A Historical Study of the Relation of Protestantism to the Modern World. Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock Publishers, 1999.
- Weber, Max. The Protestant Ethic and the "Spirit" of Capitalism and Other Writings. Translated by Peter Baehr and Gordon C.Wells. New York: Penguin Twentieth-Century Classics, 2002.

DIETER BECKER

GHANA

The first of the modern African states, achieving independence in 1957, Ghana's boundaries are those of the former British territory of the Gold Coast. The latter grew incrementally from a small coastal area at the beginning of the nineteenth century to a considerable enclave early in the twentieth century, the last significant accession being part of the former German colony of Togo after World War I. There are many ethnic groups and many languages, with the Akan (in several subdivisions) in the central and southern part of the country being the most numerous.

Christianity first appeared with the Portuguese, who built a trading post and sought the conversion of local rulers. When the Dutch superseded the Portuguese in the seventeenth century, the Protestant presence began. Although the Dutch trading company declared the extension of the Reformed faith to be one of its aims, both the will and the means were often lacking. Other European powers—Denmark, Britain, Brandenburg-Prussia—set up their trading stations. Most of these “forts” or “factories” had a chaplain, and sometimes this post was held by a local. Thus the Dutch fort had the Africans J.C. Protten and Jacobus Capitein (the latter with a doctorate from Leiden) and the English Philip Quaque (1741–1816), taken to England for education as a boy, and returning to Africa ordained. Long afterward a memorial tablet commemorating Quaque's long ministry at Cape Coast impressed and inspired SAMUEL ADJAI CROWTHER.

Regular mission work began with the arrival of the BASEL MISSION, first to the Danish and later to the British sphere, which gradually absorbed the other powers. Missionary mortality was high, and the missionary Andreas Riis moved to the state of Akuapem, on a mountain ridge where health risks were less but where the king was insistent that God had given different ways of life to black people and white. The Basel Mission accepted the challenge to show that there were black people who followed the Christian way by bringing in Jamaican Christians who long remained pillars of the evangelistic, pastoral, and agricultural work of the mission. Akropong, the Akuapem capital, was the base for a particularly fine translation of the Scriptures into Twi, later revised by C.A. Akrofi.

Meanwhile, British Wesleyans arrived, following the discovery by a Methodist ship captain of a Bible reading and prayer group meeting among Africans in the British sector. The Methodists suffered numerous fatalities, until the arrival of the enterprising THOMAS BIRCH FREEMAN, himself of mixed blood. Freeman extended the mission and made the long journey to Kumasi to open negotiations with the powerful ruler of Ashanti. For a long time the Anglican presence was restricted to colonial locations, whereas the North German (or Bremen) Mission began work among the Ewe in the eastern sector. It was to lead to the emergence of the Evangelical Presbyterian Church.

The period of World War I brought several charismatic figures. Prophet WILLIAM WADÉ HARRIS himself came to Western Ghana. A mulatto clerk called John Swatson established a whole chain of churches and presented them to an astonished Anglican bishop. Above all the illiterate independent preacher KWAME SAMPSON OPPONG brought many thousands into the Methodist pastoral care in long-resistant Ashanti. The other main development of the World War I years was the deportation or internment of the Basel missionaries as enemy aliens and their replacement by a far smaller group from the United Free Church of Scotland. Although institutional work suffered, the development probably hastened the formation of an autonomous Presbyterian Church of Ghana. AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES, such as the Musama Disco Cristo Church, arose with new readings of scripture on issues such as healing. Another major church that came into being was the Church of Pentecost, which combined features of a Western Pentecostal church with those of an African prophet-healing church. It numbered among its members the remarkable poetsinger Afua Kuma, a traditional midwife who adapted the idiom of traditional praise songs to the praise of Christ. Like other West African countries, Ghana has been deeply influenced in recent years by the charismatic movement, which has both affected the main Protestant (and Roman Catholic) churches as well as produced countless new churches and deliverance ministries. Ghana provided the forum for the first church-state clashes among the new African states.

See also: Methodism, Global; Missions; Pentecostalism; Presbyterianism; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

- Baeta, C.G. Prophetism in Ghana. London: SCM, 1964.
- Bartels, F.L. The Roots of Ghana Methodism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965.
- Bediako, Kwame. Christianity in Africa: The Renewal of a Non-Western Religion. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1995.
- Debrunner, Hans. History of Christianity in Ghana. Accra: Waterville Press, 1967.
- Pobee, John. Kwame Nkrumah and the Church in Ghana. Accra: Asempa Press, 1982.
- Smith, Noel. History of the Presbyterian Church in Ghana. Accra: Ghana Universities Press, 1965.
- ANDREW F. WALLS

GIDEONS INTERNATIONAL

A voluntary organization known for placing copies of the BIBLE in hotels, hospitals, prisons, and senior citizen homes among other institutions, the Gideons is also the oldest Christian business and professional men's association in the United States. The idea of the organization was first formed in a meeting in the Central Hotel in Boscobel, Wisconsin, in September of 1898. Traveling businessmen John Nicholson and Samuel Hill were strangers who found themselves sharing a room because the hotel was completely booked. Nicholson (1859–1956), a native of Buffalo, New York, worked for papermakers Bradner Smith & Co. in Chicago. Hill (1867–1936) was born in Hardwick, Vermont, and worked for H.M.Hooker Co. of Chicago, in wholesale paint and glass. They discovered they shared a common Christian faith (both were converted in their teens). They talked to early in the morning about forming an association that would help Christian businessmen remain faithful to Christ during their travels and encourage them to share their faith with other businessmen.

The idea took no concrete shape until the following year, when in July 1899 Nicholson and Hill formed the Gideons with W.J.Knights (1853–1940)—a native of New York who represented wholesale grocer John S.Gould & Co. of Chicago. The group's name was taken from the Old Testament story in Judges 7, in which Gideon led a band of Israelites to victory over the Midianites. Surrounding the Midian camp from cliffs above in the middle of the night, they blew trumpets, broke pitchers, waved torches, and shouted "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" whereupon the frightened Midianites fled. The three men likewise wanted to do whatever it was that God wanted them to do, to hold up their torches just where they stood (wherever their business took them) and speak up for God.

The little group elected Hill as president, Knights as vice-president, and Nicholson as secretary-treasurer, and soon a logo was created that incorporated a two-handed pitcher with a flame protruding from the top, placed in a circle, which represented a trumpet. This became a lapel pin that Gideon members wore on the road to identify one another. It is also the logo found on Gideon Bibles.

By the Gideons' first annual convention in 1900, 600 members had been enrolled, and local "camps" (or chapters) began to be formed, the first in Chicago, in September 1900. The organization grew rapidly (over 1,600 members by 1901, and double that two years later), a magazine was started (The Gideori), and by 1905 the first full-time staff member was hired at the national headquarters (in Chicago, now in Nashville, Tennessee).

According to the 1901 bylaws, “The object of the Gideons shall be to recognize the Christian traveling men of the world with cordial fellowship; to encourage one another in the Master’s work; to improve every opportunity for the betterment of the lives of our fellow travelers, business men and others, with whom we may come in contact; scattering seeds all along the pathway for Christ.” This says nothing about distributing Bibles. Instead, early on there was a strong emphasis on personal EVANGELISM and an expectation that members would speak in public forums on behalf of their FAITH. Some new members balked at this and left when some leaders insisted such practices were part of being a “real Christian.”

Bible distribution was first conceived in 1903 when Gideon Fred Woodcock, treasurer of the Chicago camp, visited the British Isles. There he discovered that a Christian Association for Christian Travelers, which had existed for some thirty years, placed books “for wholesome reading” (including the Bible) in the hotels their members frequented. Woodcock took the idea back to the UNITED STATES. Because of financial difficulties the organization was not able to act on the idea until 1908, where at the annual convention the Gideons pledged themselves to placing Bibles in every hotel in the country. The first shipment of twentyfive hotel Bibles was sent to Superior Hotel in Iron Mountain (now Superior), Montana, in November of that year.

At first the Gideon’s contracted with the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY to furnish Bibles, but when the demand became too great, the organization switched to the publishing house of Thomas Nelson and Sons of New York. Since 1936 the National Bible Press has been the major printer of Gideon Bibles. In the early years there was some debate over the translation to be distributed: the American Standard Version was preferred at first, but slowly the King James Version took precedence (see BIBLE, KING JAMES VERSION). In 1974 the New International Version was also approved for use in Gideon Bibles, although today the New King James Version is the alternate to the King James.

Gideons expanded their Bible distribution program to hospitals (1916) and to public schools in 1941 (“except where forbidden by law”), to members of the armed services in 1941 (distributing only New Testaments and Psalms editions), and to prisons in 1957.

Independent Gideons organizations were founded in CANADA in 1911 and SWEDEN in 1919 (both eventually amalgamated with what has become Gideons International). With the formation of the Gideon International Extension Committee in 1947 the work expanded rapidly overseas, beginning in 1949 with the establishment of Gideons in the British Isles, with dozens more international ministries added during the following decade.

Gideon literature is replete with stories of individuals who come across a Gideon Bible and whose lives are subsequently changed. One example: An executive in radio explained how his excessive drinking had destroyed his family and led him to the edge of a nervous breakdown; “the future held no promise,” he wrote. When he entered his hotel room he spotted a Gideon Bible: “In a distracted way, I picked it up and started to read. Old familiar words I had learned as a child, when I knelt before an altar covered by the checkered gingham apron of her whom we called Mother, words of life, quick and powerful, leaped out from those pages, and found their way into my troubled heart.” Other testimonies speak of the mere sight of a Gideon Bible bringing attacks of conscience upon men about to commit adultery, forgery, and so on.

Today Gideons has 150,000 members in 176 countries and distributes more than 59 million Bibles annually. It is financed by contributions from churches and individuals, conceiving of itself “as an extended missionary arm of the church” whose “sole purpose is to win men, women, boys and girls to a saving knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ through association, personal testimony, and distributing the Bible in the human traffic lanes and streams of everyday life.”

See also American Bible Society; Bible Translation

References and Further Reading

Moore, A.B.T. A Brand from the Burning. Minneapolis, MN: Lund Press, Inc.

Palmer, Kenyon A. Kenyon Palmer's Scrapbook: Compilation of Christian Experiences in His Work with the Gideons. Chicago, IL: Gideons International, 1952.

Thompson, Phyllis. The Gideons: The Story of the Gideons International in the British Isles. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1984.

Westburg, Paul A. They Stood Every Man in His Place: A 60-Year History of Gideons International, 1899–1959. Chicago, IL: Gideons International, 1959. <http://www.gideons.org/>

MARK GALLI

GLADDEN, WASHINGTON (1836–1918)

American theologian. Washington Gladden was one of the leading preachers in American CONGREGATIONALISM, serving the First Congregational Church of Columbus, Ohio, from 1882 to 1918. He published more than 50 books, many of them sermon collections. Although he is best known today as a pioneer of the Protestant SOCIAL GOSPEL, he was just as important in his own time as a popularizer of LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM, helping a generation of evangelically minded Protestants deal with the challenges of modern biblical criticism and the reconciliation of SCIENCE and FAITH.

Career

Born February 11, 1836, in Pottsgrove, Pennsylvania, Gladden was raised by an uncle in Owego, New York, after his father died in 1841. He attended Williams College from 1856 to 1859. His career reflected his belief in the twin power of pulpit and pen. Brief service to Congregational parishes in Brooklyn and the Bronx, New York, preceded important Congregational pulpits at North Adams, Massachusetts (1866–1871), Springfield, Massachusetts (1875–1882), and Columbus, Ohio (1882–1918). His desire to discern the social forces at work in society also produced an interest in journalism, and he wrote significant articles for the Springfield Republican, the Independent (a national religious weekly), and the Century (an important periodical).

Gladden helped organize American Congregationalism, serving as moderator of the Congregational Association of Ohio and as moderator of the National Council of Congregational Churches (1904–1907). He supported ECUMENISM and the formation of the Federal Council of Churches, serving on its Commission on the Church and Social Service. In 1905, he created a national stir in the churches by calling on the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS, in which he had been active, to repudiate a $1,000,000 gift from John D. Rockefeller as “tainted money.”

In addition, Gladden was a cofounder with Richard Ely and others of the American Economic Association in 1885, an organization dedicated to overturning the dominant laissez-faire philosophy of economics and government in America. He also helped create the American Institute of Christian Sociology at Chautauqua, New York, in 1893.

During World War I, Gladden condemned the militarism and uncritical patriotism that led to war and the failure of the churches to promote a culture of peace, but he eventually supported Wilson's decision to enter the war and entertained hopes for a new social order that would follow. Gladden died in Columbus, Ohio, on July 2, 1918.

Gladden's Social Gospel Theology

Washington Gladden believed that Christians were obliged to make religion “a regenerating force in human society,” by which he meant a spiritual force transforming human relationships and social institutions in accord with the “law of love.” His social gospel was rooted in his liberal THEOLOGY. As a seriously minded religious youth, the fatherless Gladden failed to achieve the sort of personal CONVERSION experience that was believed necessary for reconciliation with God. Failing to find such solace, he eventually concluded that simply trusting in God's enduring presence, love, and “friendship”—or “fatherhood,” as he later termed it—was the true essence of the Christian life. Inspired by the antislavery movement (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF) sweeping through New York State, young Gladden quickly equated friendship with God with solidarity, or “brotherhood,” with all human beings suffering degradation. The goal of a Christian life is not primarily to win personal happiness in heaven, he wrote, but “to realize the KINGDOM OF GOD in this world.”

His viewpoint became embedded in American Protestant spirituality through his famous hymn “O Master, Let Me Walk with Thee.” Here it is Jesus who walks the “lowly paths of service” ahead of his disciples, summoning them to sweeten and strengthen their faith in work “that triumphs over wrong.” For Gladden, Christ is a creative and liberating spiritual force working out his will in history and society. The churches should aim not at promoting themselves or the nation, but rather at inspiring disciples who can discern the reconciling ministry of Jesus and participate in its actualization, what the social gospel as a whole called the Kingdom of God. He articulated a new model for the Christian pastor and LAITY in which they became a “working church,” embracing service to all areas of human life and culture (see PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS). Although he came from rural America, Gladden embraced the modern city as a place of human potential and a sacred laboratory for an emerging Christian social order.

Gladden was particularly important in helping to change Protestant attitudes toward the labor movement and industrial democracy. By 1886, he was moving away from simple “good will” as a solution to industrial strife and calling for labor to organize in response to the increasing concentration of power by employers. By 1911 he was advocating industrial democracy and active government intervention to protect the rights of labor. He supported the cooperative movement and municipal ownership of key public utilities, even serving a term on the Columbus city council.

Gladden's Liberal Theology

Like some other famous preachers of the time, such as Henry Ward Beecher and Phillips Brooks, Gladden was important for popularizing the liberal theology being developed by theologians and biblical scholars at major Protestant SEMINARIES. He openly rejected the traditional doctrines of original sin and substitutionary ATONEMENT of Christ. Profoundly influenced by the thinking of HORACE BUSHNELL and FREDERICK WILLIAM ROBERTSON, he regarded all language as necessarily metaphorical, thus rejecting doctrinal orthodoxies and BIBLICAL INERRANCY. Adopting the notion of "progressive revelation," he believed that biblical history only gradually reveals the divine nature, displaying it most paradigmatically in Jesus' ministry of service to the world rather than in a set of doctrinal assertions (see MODERNISM).

During the last two decades of his life, Gladden sought to help ordinary Christians harmonize their religious beliefs with advances in scientific knowledge. In a series of sermons and books, he suggested that the evolutionary model of science and the work on religious experience by such scholars as WILLIAM JAMES provide new grounds for faith. Human religious awareness may have evolved in response to real divine forces at work in the universe. The work of creation is not finished; at the heart of the universe is a Christlike moral pull (or divine Logos) drawing the world toward a loving and reconciling end. In his autobiography, Gladden concluded that ...the work of creation is not yet finished, and never will be. The work of creation is a continuous process.... And the Spirit in whose image our spirits are fashioned, and with whom we are made for fellowship, is here, all the while.... He is near us, in the pulsations of our hearts, in the movements of our minds, living and working in us and manifesting Himself in every natural force, in every law of life. (Recollections 1909:426–427).

See also Christology; Cultural Protestantism; Higher Criticism; Hymns and Hymnals; Kingsley, Charles; Maurice, Frederick Denison; Revivals; Sheldon, Charles; Socialism, Christian

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Gladden, Washington. Applied Christianity: Moral Aspects of Social Questions. Boston, MA: Houghton, Mifflin, 1886.
- . Who Wrote the Bible? A Book for the People. Boston, MA: Houghton, Mifflin, 1891.
- . The Christian Pastor and the Working Church. Edinburgh, UK: T. & T. Clark, 1898.
- . Social Salvation. Boston, MA: Houghton, Mifflin, 1902.
- . Recollections. Boston, MA: Houghton, Mifflin, 1909.
- . Present Day Theology. Columbus, OH: McClelland & Co., 1913.

Secondary Sources:

Dorn, Jacob H. Washington Gladden: Prophet of the Social Gospel. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1967.

Knudten, Richard D. The Systematic Thought of Washington Gladden. New York: Humanities Press, 1968.

WILLIAM M.KING

GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART (1809–1898)

English politician. Gladstone was born in Liverpool, England, on December 29, 1809, the son of John Gladstone, a city merchant of Scottish Presbyterian ancestry. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church Oxford and elected to Parliament in 1832, serving for more than 60 years, with four terms as Liberal Prime Minister (1868–1874, 1880–1885, 1886, and 1892–1894). His was “a political outlook that was conditioned by the Christian Faith” (Bebbington 1993:xii). He died at Hawarden on May 19, 1898.

Gladstone became a High Churchman devoted to the defense of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, resisting the movement from ANGLICANISM to Roman Catholicism. In 1838 he wrote The State in Its Relations with the Church, stressing his desire for a national church that encouraged religious unity. He combined a Protestant emphasis on the open BIBLE and a Catholic emphasis on the doctrine of the CHURCH and the AUTHORITY of bishops (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). His anti-Catholicism led him to resign from the government in 1845 over the Maynooth Grant. He later disowned his friend Henry Manning, who became a cardinal. In 1874 he wrote The Vatican Decrees against infallibility and other Roman Catholic doctrines, yet he opposed the Public Worship Regulation Bill in defense of the rights of Anglo-Catholic Ritualists (see ANGLO CATHOLICISM) and self-regulation by the church. His adherence to his church did not prevent dialogue with dissenters, who became a significant support for the Liberal Party (see DISSENT, NONCONFORMITY). His attendance at the Metropolitan Tabernacle in 1882 to hear CHARLES SPURGEON preach brought much criticism.

Gladstone regularly partook of communion and observed the fasts of the church. His view of religion and society was molded by his belief that “community is the very essence of the Church of Christ,” a repudiation of earlier EVANGELICALISM that stressed the more individualistic social ethics.

References and Further Reading

Bebbington, David W. William Ewart Gladstone: Faith and Politics in Victorian Britain. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmanns, 1993.

TIM MACQUIBAN

GLORIOUS REVOLUTION

The Glorious Revolution is the name commonly given to the 1688–1689 displacement of the Catholic king of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, James II (1633–1701), by his Protestant son-in-law, William III (1650–1702).

Events

The revolution was sparked by James's desire to remove legal impediments on English Catholics. Initially he hoped to do this through parliament, but the legislature he called in 1685 refused to repeal laws banning Catholic worship or the test acts that prevented anyone but CHURCH OF ENGLAND communicants from holding public office. This left James having to use his prerogative to pursue his objectives. Between 1686 and 1688 he claimed a royal power to evade the test legislation and to issue "declarations of indulgence" permitting a wide freedom of conscience (see TOLERATION).

Early reaction among the Protestant English was muted. Although most saw the king as advancing an authoritarian view of kingship and an objectionable religion, many comforted themselves that he was aging. His daughter and heir, Mary (married to William, prince of Orange and stadtholder of most of the United Provinces of the NETHERLANDS), was a staunch Protestant, who most thought would reverse James's policies. In the summer of 1688, however, James's wife, Mary, gave birth to a son. Faced with the prospect of a perpetual Catholic dynasty, leading figures began to plot with William to help him invade. William, who wished to control England and bring it to war against his archenemy, Louis XIV of FRANCE, set sail from Holland in October. A widely circulated manifesto asked for English support.

William landed at Torbay on November 5. Over the next month, preplanned risings took place in support in the north of England, and leading conspirators in James's army defected. All this destroyed the king's morale. His army advanced to Salisbury Plain to oppose William, but James then ordered it to retreat, and amid every sign of nervous breakdown, he fled London on the night of December 11. Although apprehended in his first escape, he reached the safety of France by Christmas.

William's path to the throne was now clear. A provisional government, consisting of all peers in London, invited the prince to assume temporary executive power. In response he organized a "convention" (a body to be constituted in the same way as a parliament but without a king) to decide the future of the realm. When this group met (January 22, 1689), many of its members objected to replacing James with a foreign Dutchman, but it soon became clear that other solutions would not work. James had become generally unacceptable; a proposal for a regency was defeated; and suggestions that William's wife become queen became untenable when the prince threatened to leave England rather than accept this arrangement. Everybody knew William's withdrawal would produce political chaos, so the convention offered him the throne on February 13. The only two restraints on William were a novel joint monarchy in which Mary joined her husband as reigning monarch and a "Declaration of Rights," which negated James's claims about the prerogative.

In Scotland the pattern of events was similar. Order broke down when James fled; William called a convention that offered him and his wife the throne. In IRELAND William's authority was at first frustrated by the majority Catholic population who rose in support of James. However, victories at Derry (1689), the Boyne (1690), and Aughrim (1691) secured the western realm for the new regime and placed the minority Irish Protestants in an ascendancy that would complicate Irish history henceforth.

The Revolution and Protestantism

At first glance, the Glorious Revolution looks like an assertion of the antipopish Protestantism, which had dominated seventeenth-century Britain. It certainly was that. A Catholic king had been removed, and acceptance of William meant joining his crusade against Louis XIV. This was not a purely religious war, given that William had Catholic allies in Spain and Austria, but it was nevertheless a fight against the leading enemy of Protestantism, and arguably pre served the reformed faith in Europe. Beyond this basic interpretation, however, the relation between revolution and faith was complex. The events of 1688 saw a weakening, because some arguments against James came to rest on appeals for greater tolerance of Catholics, but also a final realization of British Protestantism.

As William and his British supporters opposed the old king, they stressed the difference between his intransigent faith and the nonpersecuting religion of the Protestants. Thus the Orange manifesto took its stand on James's violation of English and Scots law, not his religion. Spokesmen such as the prince's chaplain, Gilbert Burnet, warned that lynching Romanists would make Protestants worse than their rivals. This rhetoric tempered anti-Catholic excess, and, when combined with the new king's highly tolerant attitudes to all confessions, eased religious tensions.

Against this, the revolution strengthened links between Britishness and Protestantism by defining the nation's faith in the clearest manner yet. First, the English convention resolved that kingship "of this protestant realm" was incompatible with Catholicism. When incorporated into the later BILL OF RIGHTS (1689), this resolution barred Catholics from the throne and declared that any monarch who converted once crowned would be treated as if naturally dead. Although often overlooked, this provision was one of the revolution's most radical acts, reversing the relationship between sovereignty and national religion. Hitherto, England, WALES, and Ireland had been Protestant because their kings had made them so. Now kings must be reformed Christians because their nations were.

A second strengthening of British Protestantism came through the toleration act of April 1689. Passed through the Westminster parliament to ease the political divisions of Protestantism, this did not repeal the test acts, but it did grant freedom to worship outside the establishment under certain conditions (see DIS-SENT; NONCONFORMITY). Its effect was to define England as a Protestant nation still more clearly. The prime condition for religious freedom was agreement with the established church's doctrinal, as opposed to ecclesiological, articles. Because these mapped out the main tenets of orthodox trinitarian Protestantism, it widened the boundaries of acceptable worship from the established denomination to a broader reformed Christianity. When coupled with the fact that Scotland had abolished its English-style church at the revolution, and replaced it with a presbyterian kirk (see PRESBYTERIANISM), the toleration act ensured that the Britain born in the 1707 union would become a Protestant, not simply an Anglican, entity (see ANGLICANISM).

References and Further Reading

Claydon, Tony. William III. Harlow: Longman, 2002.

Israel, Jonathan, ed. The Anglo-Dutch Moment. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

Jones, J.R. The Revolution of 1688 in England. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1984.

Pincus, Steven. "To Protect English Liberties." In Protestantism and National Identity, edited by Tony Claydon and Ian McBride. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.

TONY CLAYDON

GNESIO-LUTHERANS

Although the term “Gnesio-Lutherans” may be comparatively recent, it refers to a party within the later Lutheran REFORMATION emerging in the aftermath of the Schmalkald War. Originally called “Flacians” by their opponents, the Gnesio-Lutherans became a loosely affiliated, colorful band of controversialists led by NICKOLAUS VON AMSDORF and MATTHIAS FLACIUS (Illyricus). In a series of conflicts that erupted along a theological fault line in the Lutheran reform opened by PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, they developed an influential theory of political resistance and set the stage for a restoration of MARTIN LUTHER’S influence in the Lutheran Formula of Concord.

Origins

Finally making good on a threat first leveled in the DIET OF WORMS in 1521, the Holy Roman Emperor Charles V went to war against the political-military alliance supporting the Lutheran Reformation in 1547. Assembled in the Schmalkald League, the Lutherans had had the superior forces but had been weakened by several factors, among them the death of Luther in 1546. Charles made quick work of the League’s divided armies, but his own alliance was not stable enough to impose an end to the Lutheran reform. Temporizing, Charles sought compromise in the AUGSBURG INTERIM of 1548. When that failed, Duke Moritz of Saxony, who gained the reunification of Ducal and Electoral Saxony as a reward for his military support of the emperor, proposed a further compromise. Although never officially adopted by the empire, it has been termed the “Leipzig Interim.” Eventually, Charles was forced to withdraw entirely, conceding terms initially in the Peace of Passau of 1552 and, finally, the Peace of Augsburg of 1555.

In late medieval-early modern European life, liturgics—the rituals of the Western mass and associated practices—were a fundamental expression of religious and therefore also political unity. Recognizing its religious importance, in 1526 Luther published his German Mass, using traditional Catholic forms but revising them on the basis of his understanding of the biblical doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH alone. The critical turn was from sacrifice to sacrament, from the mass as a meritorious act of the CHURCH for God to the LORD'S SUPPER as God's act distributing the gifts of Christ's death and resurrection to the faithful. On this basis, Luther was particularly critical of such standard medieval practices as the canon of the mass or eucharistic prayer; the reservation of the host, in which the bread used in the mass was reserved on the altar; Corpus Christi processions, in which the bread was carried through the community in a sacred vessel; and communion in one kind only, in which the priests alone received the wine of the mass.

Understanding his vocation as a call to preserve the religious as well as the political unity of the empire in its place in Europe, Charles V was particularly concerned about the Lutheran revisions. In preparation for the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, originally called to restore unity, the emperor demanded an account of the liturgical variances and accompanying practices. In the negotiations that followed the diet, such matters of religious practice became the fundamental issues. Thus, after the Schmalkald War, Charles immediately sought to roll back the Lutheran revisions. In the Augsburg Interim, he allowed two concessions that had been on the table at Augsburg: the marriage of CLERGY (see CLERGY, MARRIAGE OF) and communion in both kinds.

Philipp Melanchthon, who had agreed to such terms at Augsburg, had in the meantime come under considerable criticism for his conciliatory efforts. But with Luther's death, he had taken religious leadership in the Lutheran reform and urged support for Charles V's policies. His yielding appears to have been more principled than opportunistic—Melanchthon had his own particular concerns for religious and political unity. His critics, however, rejected the distinction. In his own defense, Melanchthon appealed to the liturgical concept of ADIAPHORA. An adiaphoron is a practice of the church not mandated biblically that thus might be treated as a matter of choice. Supporting Charles's imposed liturgical renewal and working with Duke Moritz, Melanchthon argued that he was conceding only in adiaphora, sometimes erroneously termed "matters of indifference."

In fact, however, there were some other issues involved. One was a matter of leadership. Throughout the Reformation, Melanchthon had had difficulties maintaining authority. He was alternatively yielding and harsh, a combination that raised questions about his predictability and trustworthiness. Another issue was theological. In the later 1520s, Melanchthon began a series of revisions of the teachings he had shared with Luther. In the years following 1536 and 1541, these modifications manifested themselves in substantial variations on such critical theological matters as the nature of Christ's presence in the sacrament, the bondage of the will, the nature of CONVERSION, and related issues. In the view of critics, the Leipzig Interim, though it never gained legal status, appeared to consolidate Melanchthon's experimentation.

Matthias Flacius, a Croatian drawn to the Lutheran Reformation, arrived in Wittenberg in 1547. He was to become known as a biblical scholar and church historian, author of the Clavis Scriptorum and the Magdeburg Centuries. But in his days in Wittenberg, he was Melanchthon's secretary, working with him in the faculty. That service ended when Flacius published some compromising letters in which Melanchthon privately deplored the conciliations that he had been publicly supporting.

Forced out of Wittenberg in the ensuing controversy, Flacius fled to temporary safety in Magdeburg, a city still successfully resisting Charles V. There he joined forces with Nickolaus von Amsdorf, a longtime friend of Luther's who had become the reforming bishop in that city, and Nikolaus Gallus, a pastor. Together, with Flacius in the lead, they attacked Melanchthon and his arguments. The defining issue, as summarized in the Formula of Concord that officially settled the matter, concerned “ceremonies of ecclesiastical practices that are neither commanded nor forbidden in God’s Word but that were introduced in the churches for the sake of good order or decorum” (BOOK OF CONCORD). Mounting a range of objections to Melanchthon’s appeal, Flacius argued that in a time of persecution, when political and military force are used to mandate adiaphora, such practices lose their optional character and so must be resisted.

Eventually, in the mid-1550s, Melanchthon and Flacius settled that issue. But in the intervening years, controversy had erupted around a whole series of other issues, exacerbating hostilities. Altogether, although there were also side matters, six controversies were engaged: after the adiaphorist, the synergistic, concerning the role of the will in conversion; the majoristic, on the relationship of faith and good works; the antinomian, another round on a perennial debate in the Lutheran reform concerning the role of the law in the life of faith; the crypto-Calvinist, on the nature of Christ’s presence in the sacrament; and the Osiandrian, named for ANDREAS OSIANDER of Nuremberg, who proposed an alternative to Melanchthon’s understanding of justification by faith.

The various theologians involved in these conflicts, which generally featured generous use of invective and caricature, fell into two parties. The Philippists, so called polemically by their opponents, included Melanchthon’s more loyal students, associated with him at the University of Wittenberg. The “Flacians,” “Gnesio-,” or “true Lutherans,” equally polemical labels, were dispersed from Magdeburg by a military reversal in 1551. But they were never as concentrated geographically. Some of the more notable theologians included in the party were Johann Wigand, who returned to Magdeburg briefly before setting off for other points; Tileman Hesshus, who served for a time in Heidelberg; Joachim Westphal of Hamburg; Anton Otto from Nordhausen; and Andreas Poach of Erfurt. The Gnesio-Lutheran theologians had strong support from pastors in Braunschweig, Hamburg, Lubeck, and Luneberg. Like some of his companions, Flacius became an itinerant, finding it difficult to hold a position because of his own polemical excesses, particularly in the synergist controversy, and his outspoken views of political AUTHORITY. He also won the enmity of some of the other Gnesio-Lutherans, such as Otto and Poach.

Contributions

One of the factors in the inflammatory rhetoric of the conflict between the Gnesio-Lutherans and their Philippist opponents may be their very closeness theologically. Generally, the issues that divided them were as much cultural as they were matters of faith: The Gnesio-Lutherans sought to reclaim Luther’s apocalyptically driven, relationally oriented conclusions in matters of SIN and GRACE; the Philippists were more cautious, stressing the continuity of biblical faith with other ancient literature, the unity of CHURCH AND STATE, and the integrity of personal striving in the achievement of new life in Christ. Where they differed in emphasis, however, the two parties generally shared a common theological method that they had both learned from Melancthon. There were exceptions, however, such as von Amsdorf, Otto, and Poach, who reflected more direct appropriation of Luther's way of thinking.

For all of their contentions, the Gnesio-Lutherans left a significant legacy. The doctrine of political resistance that they developed in Magdeburg completed a process of development in Luther's own thought. It left its impression in Article X of the Formula of Concord and, as a more developed doctrine, in CALVINISM. The Gnesio-Lutherans also played a significant part in the Formula of Concord's attempts to restore the LUTHERANISM of the earlier Reformation.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Confessio et Apologia Pastorum & reliquorum ministrorum Ecclesiae Magdeburgensis.
Magdeburg, 1550.

Flacius Illyricus, Matthias. Catalogus testium veritatis: Qui ante nostram aetatem reclamantur Papae. Basel, 1556.

Secondary Sources:

Brecht, Martin, and Reinhard Schwarz, eds. Bekenntnis und Einheit der Kirche: Studien zum Konkordienbuch. Stuttgart, Germany: Calwer Verlag, 1980.

Haikola, Lauri. Gesetz und Evangelium bei Matthias Flacius Illyricus: Eine Untersuchung zur Lutherischen Theologie vor der Konkordienformel. Lund: C.W.K.Gleerup, 1952.

Kolb, Robert. Nikolaus von Amsdorf (1483–1565): Popular Polemics in the Preservation of Luther's Legacy. Nieuwkoop, Netherlands: B.de Graaf, 1978.

Olson, Oliver. Matthias Flacius Illyricus and the Survival of Luther's Reform. Wiesbaden, Germany: Harrassowitz, 2002.

Preus, Robert D. The Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism: A Study of Theological Prolegomena. Vol. 2, God and His Creation. Saint Louis, MO: Concordia, 1972.

Schoenberger, Cynthia Grant. "The Confession of Magdeburg and the Lutheran Doctrine of Resistance." Ph.D. dissertation, Columbia University, 1972.

JAMES ARNE NESTINGEN

GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG VON (1749–1832)

German writer. Goethe was born on August 28, 1749, in Frankfurt am Main, GERMANY, and died on March 3, 1832, in Weimar. He was brought up with tutors under the supervision of his father, Johann Caspar Goethe (1710–1782). In 1765 he began studying law in Leipzig but in 1768 broke off his studies and returned to Frankfurt because of illness. He spent time with Susanna Katharina von Klettenberg (1723–1774) and frequented her Pietist circle.

In 1771 he finished his studies in Strasbourg; there he met JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON HERDER. From 1771 to 1775 he prepared for a law career in Frankfurt and in 1772 did practical training at the supreme court in Wetzlar. From April to October 1775 he was engaged to Anna Elisabeth (Lili) Schönemann (1758–1817). At the invitation of Duke (later, in 1814, Grand Duke) Karl August (1757–1828), Goethe resettled in Weimar, Saxony. His career as a civil servant in Weimar included being privy councilor for legation, royal tutor, counsel of state, minister, true privy councilor, and minister of state. Between 1786 and 1788 he made his first tour of ITALY. After 1788 he enjoyed the lifelong companionship of Christiane Vulpius (1765–1816), whom he married in 1806. In 1788 he was freed from official duties. In 1789 his son August von Goethe was born (died 1830). From 1791 to 1817 he was director of the royal theater of Weimar. In 1792–1793 he took part in a military campaign against FRANCE. In 1794 his friendship with JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH VON SCHILLER began. In 1801 he made the acquaintance of GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL (1770–1831) and in 1808 met with Napoleon (1769–1821) in Erfurt. In 1812 he visited Ludwig van Beethoven (1770–1827).

Career

Goethe is considered the most important poet in the German language. His literary career spans six decades, from 1770 to 1830, during which time the world was transformed forever by events such as the American and FRENCH REVOLUTIONS. By 1770 his early works had already changed the concept of poetry, creating an autonomous art form that served no longer to illustrate something beyond itself, such as a philosophical or theological idea—as did the literature of the ENLIGHTENMENT—but based what truth it contained in personal experiences and perceptions. His most important works include the countless poems now referred to as poems of personal experience, inspired by love—first for Friederike Brion (1752–1813) and later for other women—and also by nature’s beauty; the dramas Die Mitschuldigen (1768–1769), Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand (1773), Clavigo (1774), Stella (1776/1816), Iphigenie auf Tauris (1779/1781), Egmont (1788), Faust (1808/ 1832), Torquato Tasso (1790), Die Natürliche Tochter (1803); the narratives Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774), Reineke Fuchs (1794), Unterhaltungen deutscher Ausgewanderten (1795), Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (1795–1796), Herrmann und Dorothea (1797), Die Wahlverwandtschaften (1809), Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre oder die Entsagenden (1821/ 1829), Novelle (1828); the biographical writings Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit (1811/1833), Sankt Rochus-Fest zu Bingen (1817), Belagerung von Mainz (1822), Campagne in Frankreich 1792 (1822), Italiänische Reise (1829); many works on natural sciences, including Die Metamorphose der Pflanzen: Elegie (1799–1800) and Zur Farbenlehre (1810); and reviews, theoretical writings on art, and more than twenty thousand letters.

Religion and Philosophy

Goethe grew up within the orthodox Lutheran environment of Frankfurt am Main (see ORTHODOXY), was spiritually very close to his mother, Katharina Elisabeth (née Textor, 1731–1808), and was schooled early in life in the ancient languages in order to study THEOLOGY. However, in Strasbourg he grew estranged from the Pietist circle (see PIETISM) he had been frequenting on recommendations made to him in Frankfurt. The only contact that lasted was with JOHANN HEINRICH JUNG-STILLING. His last known taking of the Sacrament took place on August 26, 1770. In an anonymously published letter, Brief des Pastors zu an den Pastor zu (Letter of the Pastor of to the Pastor of), he confesses a belief in a religion of loving understanding that assumes an individual’s unmediated relationship to God in a Protestant sense but seeks this outside of all sacrament and churchly ritual. He also opposed any dogmatic or orthodox definition of belief and championed enlightened tolerance, because “God and love are synonymous” (WA, I, 37, p. 156). Over the years his fundamental rejection of all abstract systematizing would grow ever more pronounced.

In Leiden des jungen Werthers (Sorrows of Young Werther) he goes a step further toward secularization by suggestively placing his protagonist in the role of Christ. Werther sacrifices himself for the happiness of his friends and takes as his final meal bread and wine, the food of the Last Supper. In Faust, Goethe uses biblical figures and motifs to enrich and enliven his poetry but not to demonstrate theological or religious truths. Fixed and certain convictions meant nothing to him, only the continual renewal of thought. In West-östlichen Divan (1819/1827) he wrote: “Und solang du das nicht hast,/Dieses: Stirb und werde! /Bist du nur ein trüber Gast /Auf der dunklen Erde” (WA I,

6, p. 28)—a secularized version of Matthew 10:39 (also Mark 8:34, Luke 17:33, John 12:25, and I Corinthians 15:36).

The popular belief that Goethe was a pantheist requires some clarification. Indeed an explanation of his religious beliefs must be based in part on his writings in the natural sciences. There he repeatedly states that only in the observation of nature can one perceive the divine. In, for example, a letter to Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi (1743–1819) dated January 6, 1813, he also qualifies his pantheism:

I cannot, with the manifold directions of my being, have enough with only a single way of thinking; as poet and artist I am a polytheist; a pantheist, however, as a scientist, and none more crucial than the other. If I need a god for my person, as a moral being, so it is provided. The heavenly and the earthly things are a realm of such expanse that only the organs of all creatures taken together are able to comprehend it. (WA IV, 23, p. 226)

This passage reveals Goethe's great tolerance and even sympathy for Roman Catholicism—in 1814 he dedicates a holy picture to the Saint Rochus chapel in Bingen, Germany. This tolerant stance becomes the pedagogical landscape depicted in his late work Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre, where his teachings of deep respect and reverence are explained and qualified. There is reverence “for that which is above us,” “for that which is below us,” and “for that which is equal to us,” and from these comes the greatest of all, reverence for oneself.

See also Literature, German

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Goethes Werke. Weimar: Hermann Böhlau Nachfolger, 1887–1912. (Weimar edition, abbreviated WA.)

Secondary Sources:

Boyle, Nicholas. Goethe: The Poet and the Age. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991—.

Williams, John R. The Life of Goethe: A Critical Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.

ULRICH KARTHAUS

GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH (1887–1967)

German theologian. Gogarten was born in Dortmund, GERMANY, January 13, 1887, and died October 16, 1967, in Göttingen. He studied art history, German literature, and psychology in Munich and theology in Jena, Berlin, and Heidelberg. He was pastor in Stelzendorf, Thuringia (1917–1925), and Dorndorf near Jena (1925–1931) while serving as lecturer in theology at the university of Jena. He was awarded an honorary doctorate in THEOLOGY by the University of Giessen in 1924. From 1931 to 1935 he was professor of theology at Breslau from 1931 to 1935, and from then until his retirement in 1955 professor at Göttingen.

In 1922 he founded, together with KARL BARTH and Eduard Thurneysen, the journal Zwischen den Zeiten. Hitler's Third Reich and the ascendancy of the German Christian movement caused the founders to part company over Gogarten's seeming acceptance of the GERMAN CHRISTIANS' identification of God's law with the people's law. Gogarten himself was not part of the German Christian movement.

His work manifests influences of ERNST TROELTSCH, Johann Gottlieb Fichte, and Martin Heidegger as well as the personalism of Martin Buber, Ferdinand Ebner (1882–1931), and Eberhard Grisebach (1880–1945). The strongest influence, nonetheless, was MARTIN LUTHER and his understanding of the nature of the gospel. Neo-Lutherans, especially the church historian KARL HOLL, were significant interlocutors in his reflections on the relation between faith and history. For Gogarten history is the encounter of the "I and Thou" even as revelation is the personal calling of the "I" by the "Thou." The subject of revelation, and of FAITH, is Jesus Christ, the historical event of the personal unity of God and humanity. Christ is the "Thou" of God calling the "I" into responsibility toward the "Thou" of other humans and of the world. This conceptualization allowed Gogarten to develop his understanding of true worldliness: it alone enables authentic responsibility to God and humans and the natural world. That such worldliness, or secularization, is the gift of the gospel is Gogarten's enduring contribution to Protestant theology.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Gogarten, Friedrich. Demythologizing and History. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1955.
———. The Reality of Faith. The Problem of Subjectivism in Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1959.
———. Christ the Crisis. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1970.
———. Despair and Hope for Our Time. Philadelphia, PA: Pilgrim Press, 1970.

Secondary Source:

- Shiner, Larry E. Secularization of History: An Introduction to the Theology of Friedrich Gogarten. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1966.

MARTIN RUMSCHEIDT

GOMAR, FRANZ (1563–1641)

Dutch theologian. Gomar was born January 30, 1563, in Bruges, Flanders, and died January 11, 1641, in Groningen, Friesland. He studied in Strasbourg under Johannes Sturm; in Neustadt, Rheinpfalz, under Zacharius Ursinus, Franz Junius, and Girolamo Zanchi; and in Oxford, Cambridge (Master of Arts in philosophy, 1584), and Heidelberg, where he obtained a Ph.D. in theology in 1594. After serving as minister of the Flemish community in Frankfurt am Main from 1586 to 1593, he was appointed professor of theology in Leiden in 1594.

In 1604 Gomar became involved in increasingly acrimonious disputes with his colleague JACOBUS ARMINIUS on the issue of PREDESTINATION, a conflict that intensified as Gomar disputed with the followers of Arminius after the latter died in 1609. Unsolved dogmatic issues, the problem of church discipline, and the question of the role of the Church in the State all led to conflict within the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands. Gomar taught strict supralapsarian predestination and also vehemently defended the authority of Presbyterians and SYNODS. He was a strong opponent of Arminius, whom he accused of Pelagian and Jesuit tendencies. As the Gomarians demanded that the conflict be settled by a national synod, the heads of state were drawn into the debate. Several conferences between followers of Arminius and supporters of Gomar (known since 1611 as REMONSTRANTS and counter-Remonstrants) came to nothing. After the appointment of Conrad Vorstius as Arminius's successor, Gomar resigned from his position as professor in Leiden in 1611, and in the same year himself became a minister and professor in Middelburg, Zeeland. In 1615 he took up a position in Saumur in France, and in 1618 became professor in Groningen. From 1618 to 1619 he was an influential figure in the Dordrecht Synod, where he was responsible for the condemnation of the Remonstrants, without, however, being able to impose strict supralapsarianism. Gomar edited a translation of the Old Testament ("Statenvertaling") and established a center of Reformed orthodoxy in Groningen, where he expounded New Testament and dogmatics. He was also known as "the hammer of the Arminians." A pugnacious, controversial, and yet peace-loving teacher, Gomar was a seminal influence on many students over several decades and an important thinker in an Europe seared by the Thirty Years' War.

See also Arminianism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Opera theologia omnia. 3 vols. Amsterdam: Ianssonius, 1644 (Second edition, 1664).

Secondary Sources:

Belzen, J.V. Vroom, Vurig en Vreedzaam: Het leven van Franciscus Gomarus. Houten: Den Hertog, 1996.

Itterzon, G.P.A. Franciscus Gomarus. The Hague: 1930 (reprinted Groningen, 1979).

Sell, A.P.F. The Great Debate: Calvinism, Arminianism and Salvation. Eugene, OR: Wipf and Stock, 1982.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

GOMARIANS

In the seventeenth century, Reformed orthodox theology experienced its peak in the NETHERLANDS. The resolutions of the Synod of Dort of 1618–1619, in which almost all larger Reformed churches with the exception of the HUGUENOTS took part, condemned ARMINIANISM and adopted the Calvinist teaching of PREDESTINATION defended by FRANZ GOMAR (Franciscus Gomarus), without, however, adopting the supralapsarianism—the teaching that God’s PREDESTINATION had occurred before the Fall—which he defended. After the defeat of the followers of Arminius, Gomar became one of the greatest theological authorities in the Netherlands, and his work was fundamental for Dutch ORTHODOXY. In their Synopsius purioris Theologiae (1625) Johannes Polyander, Andreas Rivetus, Antonius Thysius, and Antonius Walaeus, theologians of Leiden, sought to summarize all the orthodox material influenced by Gomar on the basis of the CANONS OF DORT. However, the structuring of federal theology, inter alia by JOHANNES COCCEJUS, meant that the teaching of predestination defended by the followers of Gomar began to be replaced by the concept of “Heilsgeschichte,” an interpretation of history stressing God’s saving GRACE. The orthodoxy influenced by Gomar was already on its way out during his lifetime. Gisbert Voetius, Gomar’s most influential student, had an impact in that he integrated puritanical influences into the THEOLOGY of Gomar and called—analogously to puritanical demands—for further reformation (see PURITANISM).

Leading this “Nadere Reformatie,” Voetius’s theology, decisively influenced by Gomar, formed an at once critical and controversial counterpoint within the church and society of the Netherlands. On the basis of the resolutions of the Synod of Dort, the reform movement led by Voetius entered into fierce debates not only with state authorities about the autonomy of the church, as in the so-called five-chapter dispute of the 1650s and 1660s in Utrecht; the criticism was also directed against theological adversaries: in the so-called Sabbath dispute equally sharp attacks were lodged against Coccejus and his “federal theology” based on “heilsgeschichte” as against the “new” philosophy of René Descartes or the chiliastic sermons of Jean de Labadie with his insistence on the separation of the devout from the world (see CHILASM). Finally the Voetius reform movement inveighed, in the end without success, against the traditional customs and celebrations with their alleged tendency to “profane” Sundays.

References and Further Reading

- Asselt, Wilhelm J.v. De scholastieke Voetius: een luisteroefening aan de hand van Voetius' Disputationes selectae. Zoetermeer, The Netherlands: Boekencentrum, 1995.
- Berg, Johannes v.d. "Die Frömmigkeitsbestrebungen in den Niederlanden." In Geschichte des Pietismus: Der Pietismus vom siebzehnten bis zum frühen achtzehnten Jahrhundert, Göttingen, edited by Martin Brecht, vol. 1, 57–112 [particularly 78–88]. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1993.
- Duker, Arnoldus C. Gisbertus Voetius, vols. 1–3 and index. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J. Brill, 1897–1915.
- Lieburg, Frederik A.v. "De Nadere Reformatie in Utrecht ten tijde van Voetius, Rotterdam 1989." In Protestantische Theologie der Neuzeit, edited by Jan Rohls, vol. 1, 78–88. Tübingen, Germany: Mohr, 1997.
- Ruler, Johannes A.v. The Crisis of Causality. Voetius and Descartes on God, Nature and Change. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1995.
- Sell, A.P.F. The Great Debate: Calvinism, Arminianism and Salvation. Worthing, UK: HE Walter Ltd., 1982.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

GOODSPEED, EDGAR JOHNSON (1871–1962)

New Testament scholar. Goodspeed, eminent Greek scholar, specialist in New Testament and early Christian literature, and America's leading translator of the Scriptures, was a tireless proponent for the use of modern language versions of the BIBLE in public worship. As a graduate student at the University of Chicago (Ph.D., 1898), Goodspeed developed a keen interest in manuscript study and the collection and deciphering of Greek papyri. His familiarity with them enabled him to refute current theories of the Aramaic origins of the New Testament and demonstrate that it was written in colloquial Greek. The New Testament, he believed, should therefore be translated into everyday English.

Other Americans since Andrews Norton (1855) had published translations of the New Testament in contemporary idiom, and three modern language versions (Moffatt, Weymouth, and the Twentieth Century) enjoyed wide circulation, but these were intended for private reading. Goodspeed intended his for public use. He thus challenged the entrenched position of the King James Version in American Protestant churches.

The New Testament: An American Translation (1923) offered a novel presentation. Goodspeed, an accomplished essayist, used modern paragraphing and kept verse numbers unobtrusive to facilitate narrative flow.

An unfortunate press release of a sample translation of the Lord's Prayer (taken from Luke instead of the familiar Matthean version) aroused a torrent of protest on editorial pages across the nation. Goodspeed became the target of critics with little knowledge of the history of the English Bible, who challenged his scholarly credentials and accused him of "monkeying with the Bible." These attacks cemented Goodspeed's commitment to Bible education among the general public. He became a popular platform speaker and produced numerous books for nonspecialists, including The Story of the Bible (1936), How Came the Bible? (1940), and How to Read the Bible (1946).

Goodspeed taught at the University of Chicago (1902–1937) and published more than sixty books. He is best known for his theory that the publication of Acts provided the stimulus for gathering the Pauline letters and the writing of Ephesians (by Onesimus) as an encyclical to head this collection.

See also Bible Translation; Bible, King James Version

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Goodspeed, Edgar Johnson. As I Remember. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.

Secondary Sources:

Cook, James.I. Edgar Johnson Goodspeed: Articulate Scholar. Chico, CA: Scholar's Press, 1981.

Orlinsky, Harry, and Robert G.Bratcher. A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1991.

ROBERT LEE CARTER

GORDON, ADONIRAM JUDSON (1836–1895)

American theologian. Gordon was born on April 19, 1836, in New Hampton, New Hampshire. As a Baptist minister, he embraced historic premillennialism early in his pastoral ministry. Four different influences, like four separate tributaries, flowed into his concern with the doctrine of premillennialism: moderate CALVINISM, the phenomenon of revivalism and MISSIONS, the development of personal piety, and the Higher Life ministry of the Holy Spirit. Eventually these influences merged to make the picture more complete, showing the dominance of premillennialism in his life. Every aspect of his ministry—missionary endeavors; defense of WOMEN’S ministry; his relationship with his wife, Maria Hale Gordon; his broad associations with other evangelical leaders; social ministry; the founding of the Boston Missionary Training School in 1889 (now two separate institutions, Gordon College and Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary); and the publication of a monthly journal, The Watchword—were subsumed under this theme.

Gordon was educated from 1853 to 1856 at the New London Literary and Scientific Institution (now ColbySawyer College, New London, New Hampshire). From 1856 to 1860 he attended Brown University (Providence, Rhode Island). He received his theological training at Newton Theological Institution (Newton, Massachusetts), graduating in 1863. He then served as pastor of the Baptist Church in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts (from 1863 to 1869), and for 25 years (1869–1895) at Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston.

Gordon’s ministry was expansive. Among those with whom he worked were evangelist DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY and Presbyterian missions advocate and fellow premillennialist, ARTHUR TAPPAN PIERSON. Gordon led a prosperous congregation, served on his denomination’s mission board, edited hymn books, authored hymns, and wrote several books, in addition to editing a monthly premillenarian journal, The Watchword, for seventeen years. His most widely recognized hymn is the tune to “My Jesus, I Love Thee.”

Gordon died from complications of pneumonia on February 2, 1895, in Boston at the age of 58.

See also Higher Life Movement; Millenarians and Millennialism; Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Gordon, A.J. In Christ. 1872.

———. Congregational Worship. 1874. Boston, MA: Young & Bartlett.

———. The Watchword. 1878–1895. Boston, MA: Gould.

———. Two-Fold Life. 1882. New York, NY: Fleming H. Revell.

———. The Ministry of Healing. New York: Revell, 1883.

———. Ecce Venit. New York: Revell, 1889.

———. The Holy Spirit in Missions. 1893. New York, NY: Fleming H. Revell.

———. The Ministry of the Spirit. Philadelphia, PA: American Baptist Publication Society, 1894.

Secondary Source:

Gibson, Scott M.A.J. Gordon: American Premillennialist. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001.

SCOTT M.GIBSON

GRACE

“Amazing grace, how sweet the sound, That saved a wretch like me! I once was lost, but now am found, Was blind, but now I see. / ’Twas grace that taught my heart to fear, And grace my fears relieved; How precious did that grace appear The hour I first believed!”

This hymn, written by the British theologian John Newton in 1779, continues to be popular in the English-speaking Protestant world. It illustrates two characteristic features of the Christian understanding of grace, especially in Protestantism. Grace marks God’s saving and—in a certain sense—also God’s judging action on the human being who is blinded because he or she is helplessly self-centered and lost in an obsession with self-interest. God’s grace absolves and endows the sinner with the perception of God’s passionate will and God’s faithfulness. The abundance of life that is created and promised by God is surprising, because no one who is blind can expect an unseen reality. It amazes because God’s grace is overwhelming: it liberates in such a way that any resistance would be absurd. Through grace, human beings encounter the living God. Grace teaches the due fear of God’s judgment and at the same time relieves one from the fear of God’s wrath. God establishes an asymmetrical relationship with human beings through grace. Grace arises from the inexhaustible justice of God—no human being deserves it and can claim it. It is the unmerited favor of God and divine inspiring, regenerating strength. God’s free grace corresponds to the surprised and incessant joy of those who are showered with this incomprehensible gift. It precedes all that we can expect from ourselves, for us, for others, and for the world.

Grace is derived from the Latin gratia. Its theological meaning had been developed especially by the Apostle Paul based on the Greek charis. In Hebrew, it corresponds to “goodness,” “kindness,” and “steadfast love,” often in conjunction with “faithfulness” (e.g., Genesis 24:27). It is prominent in the narratives, in wisdom literature, and above all in prayers. God’s benevolence surpasses God’s wrath; it surpasses the time-space of human alienation from God’s will: “For his anger is but for a moment; his favor is for a lifetime” (Psalms 30:5). Wrath passes, grace stands. It is as if the sun breaks through the clouds after it had been concealed temporarily. This can be misunderstood. One might think grace was the inmost nature of God, which was intermittently interrupted by other expressions and impulses. Yet God’s grace is not an emotion, not even a basic mood that might be interrupted by others’ feelings. God’s grace emanates from God’s unchanging purposes; it acts determinedly and is not a temporary cheerful state of mind or a good temper. God’s “steadfast love endures forever” (Psalms 100:5). The pious can rely on it, and the unfaithful will never escape it. The appropriate answer to God's grace is human obedience toward God's commandments, which are signs of God's faithfulness.

Paul argued that God's grace realizes its abundance in the weakness of afflicted people who experience that they have nothing to offer to God nor to summon up against God (II Corinthians 12:8). Jews and Gentiles perceive God's grace by JUSTIFICATION, "by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Romans 3:24), "by faith apart from works prescribed by the law" (Romans 3:28). Grace constitutes a space of living in communion with Jesus Christ. To cut oneself off from Christ means to fall away from grace (Galatians 5:4). Grace (charis) embodies itself in particular gifts (charismata), such as prophecy, ministry, and exhortation (I Corinthians 12:4–11). Paul explained that the only appropriate answer to God's grace is faith, trust in God's promises, and consent to God's will. FAITH is an indication of God's gift. It points to God and God's SALVATION as we find it in Jesus Christ. It refers us to God's sovereign initiative in reconciling the world with God (II Corinthians 5:18). God never purely reacts. God's action reveals his steadfast love and enduring faithfulness.

The early fathers emphasized that human beings can only be receptive for God's grace, yet grace inspires and forms the human being as a whole. Augustine stressed the notion of prevenient Grace (gratia praeveniens): God's mercy is prior to all human expectation and understanding. Experienced in PRAYER, it is irresistible. Thomas Aquinas stated that grace does not contradict NATURE. According to Aquinas, God's creation cannot be totally corrupted by human SIN; grace heals the incomplete natural notion of God: "Grace does not destroy nature, but perfects it" (Summa theologiae, I, q. 1, a. 8, ad 2). MARTIN LUTHER rediscovered the biblical usage: Grace is not an attribute or a mood of God, but God's action out of loving-kindness. In this way Luther not only corrected the traditional doctrine of grace, but also radically revised it by establishing it as the primary rule of all theological understanding. God's grace is His saving action, realized as the justification of the sinner who remains dependent on God's grace all the time. Human beings are saved through grace alone (sola gratia) only by faith (sola fide); both correspond to God's presence in Jesus Christ (solus Christus). The reformer opposed an understanding of grace that had been and to some extent still is popular in the Roman Catholic praxis of penitence: God's grace is God's aid for the appropriate life; it is like a drive belt that actuates human conduct of life according to God's intention. In the twentieth century, DIETRICH BONHOEFFER criticized "cheap grace" as the mere acceptance of God's reconciling work that avoids true discipleship obedient to God's will communicated by Jesus Christ. KARL BARTH argued against the teachings of EMIL BRUNNER that grace is revelation that alone makes possible every true notion of God, of God's will and of God's action. Therefore, there can be no "natural" recognition of God.

North American Protestantism has been marked by two contrasting perceptions of grace in relation to sin, God's healing and encouraging power, and the task of sanctification. On the one hand is the continuing, if diminished, influence of JONATHAN EDWARDS, with the Calvinist notion of irresistible divine grace toward the elect and the picture of "sinners in the hands of an angry God." On the other hand, METHODISM has mediated JOHN WESLEY'S view of the universal availability of prevenient grace, and his notion of the "cooperation" of the believer toward "perfection": "God works, therefore you can work; God works, therefore you must work" (sermon "On Working Out Our Own Salvation”). All this demonstrates that grace remains a very complex and multifaceted topic of Christian theology and piety.

See also Theology

References and Further Reading

- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich. Discipleship. Dietrich Bonhoeffer Works, vol. 4. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 2000.
- Bradshaw, Timothy, ed. Grace and Truth in the Secular Age. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998.
- Brunner, Emil, Karl Barth. Natural Theology: Comprising "Nature and Grace" by Emil Brunner and the Reply "No!" by Karl Barth. London: Centenary Press, 1946.
- Cobb, John B. Grace and Responsibility: A Wesleyan Theology for Today. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1995.
- Gerrish, Brian A. Grace and Gratitude: The Eucharistic Theology of John Calvin. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1993.
- Hanson, Bradley. A Graceful Life: Lutheran Spirituality for Today. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1999.
- McGrath, Gavin J. Grace and Duty in Puritan Spirituality. Bramcote, UK: Grove Books, 1991.
- Sproul, Robert C. Grace Unknown: The Heart of Reformed Theology. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1997.

GERHARD SAUTER

GRAHAM, BILLY (1918-)

American evangelist. Born William Franklin Graham Jr. on November 7, 1918, on a farm outside Charlotte, North Carolina, to William Franklin and Morrow Coffey Graham, Billy Graham became the most famous and successful evangelist of the twentieth century. He preached in person to more than eighty million people in more than eighty countries and reached countless other millions via radio, television, films, books, magazines, and newspaper columns.

Life

Graham attended Bob Jones College for one semester; the Florida Bible Institute, where he began PREACHING and changed his denominational affiliation from Associate Reformed Presbyterian to Southern Baptist; and Wheaton College, where he met and married Ruth Bell, the daughter of a medical missionary to CHINA, and undertook his first and only stint as a local pastor. In 1945 he became the field representative of a dynamic evangelistic movement known as YOUTH FOR CHRIST International. In this role, he toured the UNITED STATES and much of Great Britain and Europe, teaching local church leaders how to organize youth rallies and forging friendships with scores of Christian leaders who would later join his organization or provide critical assistance to his crusades when he visited their cities throughout the world.

The New Evangelicalism

The exposure and stature Graham gained through Youth for Christ and nationally publicized early crusades in Los Angeles, Boston, Washington, and other major cities between 1949 and 1952 enabled him to become a key leader in a young movement that called itself “the New Evangelicalism.” The term signified a form of conservative Christianity that consciously separated itself from traditional FUNDAMENTALISM by its tendency to be tolerant of minor theological differences among essentially like-minded believers, a conviction that evangelical faith could and should be set forth and defended in an intellectually rigorous manner rather than simply asserted dogmatically, and a more positive attitude toward social reform than Fundamentalists had held since the end of World War I. Stunningly successful months-long revivals in London (1954) and New York (1957); triumphant tours of the Continent (1954, 1955), the Far East (1956), AUSTRALIA (1959), and AFRICA (1960); the founding of the magazine, Christianity Today (1956); the launching of nationwide television broadcasts on ABC (1957), and a public friendship with President Dwight Eisenhower and Vice President Richard Nixon firmly established Billy Graham as the acknowledged standard-bearer for evangelical Christianity.

As Graham came to recognize the extent of his influence, he determined not only to help EVANGELICALISM become more dynamic and self-confident, but also to shape the fundamental direction of contemporary Christianity. That determination manifested itself significantly in several major international conferences sponsored or largely underwritten by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA). In particular, the 1966 World Congress on Evangelism in Berlin, attended by 1,200 evangelical leaders from 104 nations, and the 1974 the International Congress on World Evangelization in Lausanne, Switzerland, attended by 2,400 delegates from 150 countries, helped evangelicals see themselves as a worldwide Christian force, alongside Vatican II and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Subsequently, BGEA-sponsored conferences in Amsterdam in 1983, 1986, and 2000 provided more than 22,000 on-the-job itinerant evangelists from 185 countries with encouragement and instruction, not only in theology and spiritual development, but also in such mundane matters as sermon preparation, advertising and fund-raising, and effective use of films and videotapes. Smaller gatherings throughout the world afforded similar training to additional thousands of evangelists.

Graham and Politics

Graham's preaching during the early years of his ministry was filled with political themes, and he eagerly sought ties with political leaders, who often reciprocated, viewing him as a valuable political ally. When Lyndon Johnson became president after John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963, Graham provided valuable support and legitimation for Johnson's causes—the War on Poverty, the Civil Rights Act, the war in Vietnam—and drew sharp disapproval from those who felt he had compromised his ability to speak with a prophetic voice. This line of criticism intensified after Nixon won the White House in 1968. An openly enthusiastic supporter, Graham remained staunchly loyal to the beleaguered president until the revelations surrounding Watergate finally forced some recognition of his old friend's darker side. Deeply stung, Graham drew back from overt political involvement, rarely visiting the White House during the Ford and Carter administrations. When the movement known as the Religious Right surfaced in the late 1970s, Graham declined to participate in it, warning his brethren to “be wary of exercising political influence” lest they lose their spiritual impact. He returned to Washington more frequently and more publicly during the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and George Bush, with whom he had been friends since the 1950s, but his contribution appears to have involved symbolic legitimation rather than strategic counsel, a course continued by his appearance and prayer at Bill Clinton’s two inaugurations.

Because of the staunch anticommunism of his early preaching, few developments in Graham’s ministry proved more surprising than his success in penetrating the Iron Curtain. Beginning in 1978, virtually every Soviet-controlled country progressively gave him privileges that no other churchman, including the most prominent and politically docile native religious leaders, had ever received. These efforts culminated in state-broadcast services in packed stadiums in Budapest (1989) and Moscow (1992). Graham used these visits to preach, to encourage Christian believers, and to explain to Communist leaders that their restriction of religious freedom was counterproductive, hampering diplomatic relations with America.

World Impact

Graham’s hundreds of crusades have had an immense, if ultimately immeasurable, impact on local churches, on American and world Christianity, and on millions of individual lives. To extend the reach of the crusades, the BGEA has used radio, television, film, and other mass media more efficiently and effectively than any other evangelistic ministry. Crusade services have long been transmitted live to numerous other venues, beginning with landline telephone relays in the 1954 London Crusade and culminating in the 1995 “Global Mission,” when the famed evangelist’s distinctive voice and familiar message soared upward from his pulpit in Puerto Rico to a network of thirty satellites that broad-cast to receiving dishes in more than 165 countries.

In recognition of his achievements, Graham has received, among many accolades and prizes, both the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1983) and the Congressional Gold Medal (1996) the highest honors these two branches of government can bestow upon a civilian.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Billy Graham Evangelical Association, BillyGraham.org. <http://billygraham.org/> (2002).

Graham, Billy. Just As I Am: The Autobiography of Billy Graham. San Francisco, CA: Harper-Collins, 1997.

Secondary Sources:

Frady, Marshall. Billy Graham: Parable of American Righteousness. Boston: Little, Brown, 1979.

Martin, William. A Prophet with Honor: The Billy Graham Story. New York: William Morrow, 1991.

———. "Fifty Years with Billy." Christianity Today. (November 13, 1995):20–29.

WILLIAM MARTIN

GREAT AWAKENINGS

See Awakenings

GREBEL, CONRAD (c. 1498–1526)

Anabaptist leader. Grebel was born in Zurich c. 1498. His father, Jacob von Grebel, was a prominent member of the Zurich city council and a prosperous entrepreneur. Grebel's student years in Vienna and Basel, beset by lack of direction and family conflict, ended without a degree. His marriage to a woman below his station caused a rupture with his family. There were two sons and a daughter.

Early in 1522, Grebel experienced a religious CONVERSION under the impact of the evangelical preaching of the reformer HULDRYCH ZWINGLI. Grebel's passionate paean to Zwingli's preaching of the gospel was appended to Zwingli's Apologeticus Archeteles that year. Grebel's fervent partisanship made him into a ringleader of a group of young lay supporters.

Grebel was in every respect a Zwinglian. His commitment to Zwingli's sola scriptura and to the competence of the Christian congregation to decide questions of faith drove him and several others to agitate for the BAPTISM of adult believers as the scriptural way of safeguarding the competence of the Christian congregation. This presupposed the abandonment of baptizing infants, which Zwingli, for socioreligious reasons, would not do. In the resulting conflict neither Zwingli nor his disciples could yield, and on January 21, 1525, a parting occurred when Grebel and his companions baptized one another. They did not perceive this act as schismatic nor as abandoning Zwingli's reform program for Zurich.

ANDREAS KARLSTADT may have influenced their view of baptism, whereas THOMAS MÜNTZER certainly influenced them on the importance of personal FAITH. Because of their defiant act of baptizing, which Zwingli and the Zurich city council saw as "rebaptism," they were decried as schismatics, arrested, and imprisoned. Grebel bitterly complained about his mentor's betrayal of thorough reform. Escaping from prison, he worked as a fugitive to gain support for his vision but died, perhaps from the plague, in May 1526. He is now considered to be the proto-Anabaptist. The Anabaptist movement, of which he is a progenitor, has survived to the present in the MENNONITE Churches.

See also Anabaptism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Harder, L., ed. The Sources of Swiss Anabaptism. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1985.

Secondary Sources:

Bender, Harold S. Konrad Grebel. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1950.

Goertz, Hans-J. Konrad Grebel. Hamburg, Germany: Mennonischer Geschichtsverein, 1998.

WALTER KLAASSEN

GRUNDTVIG, NICOLAJ FREDERICK SEVERIN (1783–1872)

Danish church reformer. Son of a pastor, Nicolaj Grundtvig was born in Udby, DENMARK, on September 8, 1783. After studying in Copenhagen he served as a private tutor and then as history teacher. From the beginning of his career, Grundtvig was embroiled in controversy. His trial sermon in Copenhagen in 1810 had the rather provocative title “Why Has the Word of God Disappeared from His House?” and, not surprisingly, it prompted the Copenhagen clergy to file a complaint against him. A year later Grundtvig experienced a CONVERSION, which entailed his commitment to affirm the traditional Lutheran THEOLOGY against ENLIGHTENMENT change. Between 1811, the year of his ordination, and 1826 he served various parishes. The publication of his polemic Kirkens Genmæle (The Church’s Reply) in 1826, directed against an eminent liberal theologian, led to a civil suit against him and prompted his resignation from the ministry, the imposition of a fine, and censorship of his publications.

In 1832 Grundtvig began to preach weekly in Christianshavn and it was there that his concern for reform and renewal triggered an increasing number of devotees and followers. The acceptance of the position of chaplain in a Copenhagen hospital gave him the authorization to preside over the LORD’S SUPPER. Here Grundtvig’s reform movement had its beginnings. It significantly influenced the Danish Lutheran church in a variety of ways for decades. Grundtvig’s some 1,400 hymns enriched Danish and even Anglophone hymnody. His movement advocated freedom for the CLERGY from liturgical and theological restrictions. His understanding of the Christian faith was that it was joyous. Grundtvig also focused his attention on education, establishing folk schools, a kind of continuing education venture, which focused on practical subjects.

Late in his life his contributions to both the Danish church and to the country—Grundtvig was a firm believer in the harmony of church and society—were recognized by his appointment, in 1861, as bishop of the (entire) Danish church. Grundtvig died in Copenhagen on September 2, 1872.

See also Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Christensen, Georg, and Hal Koch, eds. Vaerker I Undvalig. 10 vols. Copenhagen: 1940–1949.
- Grundtvig, N.F.S. Selected Writings. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1976.
- . A Grundtvig Anthology: Selections from the Writings of Nicolai Frederik Severin Grundtvig, 1783–1872. Cambridge, UK: J. Clarke; Viby, Denmark: Centrum, 1984.
- . What Constitutes Authentic Christianity? Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, ca. 1985.
- . Tradition and Renewal: Grundtvig 's Vision of Man and People, Education and the Church, in Relation to World Issues Today. Copenhagen, Denmark: Det Danske Selskab, 1983.

Secondary Sources:

- Allchin, A.M. N.F.S. Grundtvig: An Introduction to His Life and Work. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1997.
- , ed. Heritage and Prophecy: Grundtvig and the English-speaking World. Aarhus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1993.
- Knudsen, Johannes. "One Hundred Years Later. The Grundtvigian Heritage." Lutheran Quarterly 25 (1973): 71ff.
- Lindhardt, Poul Georg. Grundtvig. London: SPCK, 1964.
- Skarsten, Trygve R. "Rise and Fall of Grundtvigianism in Norway." Lutheran Quarterly 17 (1965): 122ff.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS (1594–1632)

Swedish monarch. The king of SWEDEN from 1611 until his death in 1632, Gustavus Adolphus was known as the “Lion of the North: Savior of Protestants” during the Thirty Years’ War because he checked the power of Hapsburgs and ensured the survival of Protestantism in Europe. He died at the Battle of Lützen, although his army won the battle.

Born on December 9, 1594, in Stockholm, Sweden, Gustavus Adolphus was the son of Charles IX of the Vasa dynasty, and Kristina of Holstein-Gottorp. He was married to the daughter of the elector of Brandenburg-Prussia, Maria Eleanora. He was also known as Gustav II Adolf in Swedish. A deeply religious Lutheran, Gustavus Adolphus received a classical education in law and history as well as THEOLOGY. During his reign he founded the city of Gothenburg and was the founder of the University of Dorpat in Tartu, Estonia, which then belonged to the kingdom of Sweden.

War in Northern Europe

From his father Charles IX, Gustavus Adolphus inherited a war with DENMARK, which controlled both sides of the entrance to the Baltic Sea. Sweden and Denmark signed the peace treaty of Knäred in 1613, whereby Denmark gained Elvsborg in pledge for a large sum of Swedish silver coins to be paid within six years. Denmark’s King Christian IV did not expect to lose the pledged territory, underestimating the determination of Gustavus Adolphus, who ensured that Sweden paid what was due within two years.

Sweden was also involved in a conflict with RUSSIA. A peace treaty signed at Stolbova in 1617 ensured Sweden gained Ingermanland and the province of Kexholm, depriving Russia of its coast towards the Baltic Sea. Though these engagements were strategically vital for the security of Sweden, Gustavus Adolphus was anxious to come to the aid of Protestant forces in Europe. Sweden’s resources were tied up in a long-standing war with neighboring, Catholic POLAND, effectively preventing them from joining the Protestant cause. With the help of diplomats from Catholic FRANCE, ENGLAND, and Brandenburg, Adolphus freed himself from the war against Poland with the Treaty of Altmark signed in September 1629. By the end of this year, Gustavus Adolphus controlled much of the east Baltic coast, effectively dominating Baltic trade.

The Thirty Years' War

Gustavus Adolphus is most remembered for his defense of the Protestant lands in GERMANY. As long as the Protestants of northern Germany were secure, Adolphus felt that Sweden was safe from the onslaught of Papism: "As one wave follows another in the sea, so the Papal deluge is approaching our shores." To this end, he proposed the creation of two Protestant leagues in Germany, one charged with military affairs and the other with civil administration, to keep the Catholic powers, particularly Ferdinand II of Spain, at bay.

French cardinal and statesman Duc de Richelieu desired an alliance with Gustavus Adolphus to form an effective foil to the Hapsburg power in Europe. Further, he sought to bolster his strength with the help of Maximilian of Bavaria and the Catholic league. Both Gustavus Adolphus and Richelieu were pragmatists. Although they held opposite views on religion, they both recognized their mutual need to form a realistic opposition to Ferdinand II. Richelieu surmised that Ferdinand's army would be more intent on limiting the damage inflicted by the forces of Adolphus than on posing a threat at the French border. Sweden also pledged to protect the trade interests of France, while not interfering with Saxony and Bavaria.

Gustavus Adolphus landed with an army of 13,000 men in Peenemünde in Pomerania in 1630. With the aid of the Protestant Saxon army, he engaged the Catholic field marshal Tserclaes Tilly in the battle of Breitenfeld, defeating his forces in 1631. The Swedes triumphed because of the superior flexibility of their army formations. Further, because Sweden was a relatively poor country that could not afford all the metal for heavy artillery, the cannons of the Swedes were smaller and very mobile. Gustavus Adolphus turned a potential weakness into an advantage. An astute scholar of military tactics, he also had stressed attack above defense, and considered mobility to be of paramount importance.

In 1632, Adolphus signed a treaty of alliance with Richelieu at Bärwalde, which provided a subsidy to the Swedes of 400,000 riksdaler per year until 1636, and again engaged the forces of Tilly at the Battle of Lech. The Swedish army was victorious, and Tilly sustained a fatal wound. Gustavus Adolphus and the Swedish army advanced as far south as Munich in Bavaria. The Bavarians, most of whom were Catholics, feared that Gustavus Adolphus would compel them to become Protestants, but the king believed that faith should be a matter of conscience.

Ferdinand II feared that Gustavus Adolphus would invade Vienna and appealed to Albrecht Wallenstein, Duke of Friedland, to defeat the Swedes. Wallenstein moved north to interrupt the supply routes of the Swedish army. Gustavus Adolphus followed Wallenstein, and on November 6, 1632, the armies met at Lützen. Though the Swedes won, Gustavus Adolphus was killed in the battle, misled by poor eyesight and dense fog to charge into an enemy formation. His achievements had limited the Hapsburg power and ensured the survival of Protestantism in Europe.

After the death of Gustavus Adolphus, the Swedish Riksdag of the Estates decided that he would be known as Gustavus Adolphus the Great (Gustav Adolf den Store).

See also Lutheranism, Scandinavia

References and Further Reading

Ahnlund, Nils. Gustav Adolf the Great. Westport, CT: Greenport Press, 1983.

Fletcher, C.R.L. Gustavus Adolphus and the Thirty Years' War. New York: Capricorn Books, 1963.

Garstein, Oskar. Rome and the Counter-Reformation in Scandinavia, Vol. 4, The Age of Gustavus Adolphus and Queen Christina, 1622–1654. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1992.

Roberts, Michael. Gustavus Adolphus: A History of Sweden, Vol. 2, 1626–1632. London: Longmans, Green, 1953.

Trueman, C. "Gustavus Adolphus and Sweden." The Thirty Years War.

http://www.historylearningsite.co.uk/gustavus_%20adolphus.htm (May 21, 2003).

HELEN FARLEY

H

HALLE

Located on the Saale river in Sachsen-Anhalt, GERMANY, Halle achieved prominence in European Protestantism through the establishment of a progressive university and August Hermann Francke's Pietist orphanage in the 1690s, making Halle a center of both the ENLIGHTENMENT and PIETISM in early eighteenthcentury Prussia. After 1740, Pietist influences waned, and the university became the leading voice of theological rationalism under SIEGMUND JAKOB BAUMGARTEN and JOHANN SALOMO SEMLER.

Lutheran Links

With the rise of the Protestant movement in the early 1520s, both MARTIN LUTHER and THOMAS MÜNTZER quickly won adherents in Halle. Although the city had become a favorite residence of Albrecht, the archbishop of Magdeburg, it also had a Hanseatic tradition of independence from episcopal authority. Albrecht aggressively countered the new movement in the city by reinvigorating Catholic piety and expelling Protestant dissenters, although over the next two decades he was unable to stem the support for the new reforms among the townspeople (see DISSENT). He withdrew from the city in 1541 and opened the way for the establishment of the REFORMATION. Justus Jonas, one of Luther's closest associates, came from Wittenberg to lead the institutional reforms. After the Interim in 1548, the archbishop sought to reimpose Catholicism, but the Peace of Augsburg (1555) secured the establishment of Protestantism in Halle.

After 1555 Lutherans consolidated their gains in Halle, although, as in many other Lutheran cities, conflicts over Philippism (see PHILIPP MELANCHTHON) and crypto-CALVINISM marked the second-half of the sixteenth century. The Thirty Years' War left Halle and its economy in shambles, and Halle's influence on Protestantism in Germany was minimal for much of the seventeenth century. After the death of the last administrator of the archbishopric in 1680, the territory fell to the elector of Brandenburg. Under control of the Reformed Hohenzollerns, Halle's fortunes would change considerably and the city would play an important role in the confessional politics of an expansionist Brandenburg-Prussia and shape eighteenthcentury German Protestantism.

Elector Friedrich III established a new university in Halle in the early 1690s. The jurist CHRISTIAN THOMASius, who had been driven from the University of Leipzig for his support of the Pietist cause, became the first professor at the new academy in 1690. Many of Thomasius's students followed him from Leipzig to Halle. Under Thomasius and his colleagues the law faculty at Halle would become the leading representative of Enlightenment jurisprudence in Germany. Friedrich also wanted to establish a theology faculty in Halle that could provide candidates for clerical office in his territories. He became a protector of Pietist interests, and his appointments to the new theology faculty were all ardent Pietists. Joachim Justus Breithaupt became first professor of theology in 1691. The next year, his friend and former colleague in Erfurt, A.H.Francke, was appointed pastor in nearby Glaucha and professor in the philosophical faculty. The university received its official charter in 1694 and quickly became a center of both Pietism and the early Enlightenment in Germany.

Closely related to the university was the orphanage founded by Francke in 1695. Unlike older models Francke's orphanage was organized as an educational institution devoted to the cultivation of piety and ability. It drew students far beyond the city of Halle. By the time of Francke's death in 1727 the schools of the Francke Foundations, as the orphanage and its institutions were known, had more than 2,200 students and employed more than 160 teachers. Francke had further established a pedagogical institute for training teachers, the first of its kind in central Europe, and he made the Foundations a center for missionary activity. Although Francke initially funded the operations through donations, he was increasingly able to support his work through the profits of a printing house and the production of pharmaceuticals. The successes of the foundations—shrewdly publicized by Francke—established an international and much emulated reputation for the institutions' work.

Alliance Against Traditionalism

In the early decades, the Pietist and Enlightenment parties in Halle saw themselves as allies against the forces of traditionalism—whether legal or theological—and advocates of a new model of education that was practically oriented, emphasized instruction in German and Latin, and was opposed to the older disputational paradigm. There were, however, underlying conflicts between Pietist biblicism and the enlightened rationalism in Halle. The alliance faltered in 1723 when Francke orchestrated the expulsion of the rationalist CHRISTIAN WOLFF from the university. The death of Friedrich Wilhelm I in 1740, however, marked the end of the Pietist phase in Halle. That same year Wolff triumphantly returned to Halle. The Foundations continued under Francke's son, Gottfried August, but the university, including the faculty of theology, moved toward rationalism.

The career of Baumgarten (1706–1757) marks an important transition in the period between Pietism and Rationalism in the theology faculty at Halle. A product of Halle Pietism, Baumgarten nevertheless integrated elements of Wolffian rationalism into his theology and aimed to provide a scientific (wissenschaftlich) basis for theology. Semler built on Baumgarten's work and became a pioneer in the use of the historical critical method. Semler rejected Francke's emphasis on the simultaneous cultivation of piety and learning and instead encouraged the inclusion of secular disciplines into theological training. Under Semler, Halle became the leading university of theological rationalism and NEOLOGY in Germany.

The establishment of the University of Berlin in 1810 severely weakened Halle's central position in Prussian higher education. The influence of rationalism continued, but FRIEDRICH AUGUST GOTTFREU THOLUCK took the theological faculty in a more conservative direction after his arrival in 1826. During his long tenure as professor of theology, Tholuck sought to combine his revival-oriented piety with academic theological inquiry, and under his influence Halle became a center of biblical theology, a tradition carried on by his student Martin Kähler (1835–1912).

During the 1930s conflicts over National Socialism and the CONFESSING CHURCH divided the theological faculty at Halle. In 1946 the Francke Foundations were dissolved and its schools secularized. After the reunification of Germany, the Foundations were revived in 1992. With its rich libraries and archives, Halle is today a major center for the study of Pietism and the Enlightenment.

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Gunnar, and Hans-Hermann Hartwich, eds. MartinLuther-Universität: von der Grundung bis zur Neugestaltung nach zwei Diktaturen. Opladen, Germany: Leske & Budrich, 1994.
- Francke, August Hermann. Pietas Hallensis: or, an Abstract of the Marvellous Footsteps of Divine Providence. London, 1707.
- Holloran, John Robert. "Professors of Enlightenment at the University of Halle 1690–1730." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Virginia, 2000.
- Schmitt, Hanno. "On the Importance of Halle in the Eighteenth Century for the History of Education." Paedogica historica 32 (1996): 85–100.

JONATHAN N.STROM

HAMANN, JOHANN GEORG (1730–1788)

German theologian. Hamann was born in Königsberg (now Kaliningrad) (East-Prussia) on August 27, 1730, and worked there as a translator and customs officer. The decisive turning point in his life came in 1758 in London through an intense study of and meditation on the BIBLE. He died June 21, 1788, in Münster, Westphalia.

The task of being a witness to the Gospel, to which Hamann was called in London, did not lead him, a life-long stutterer, into a public church office. Instead, he was a servant of the divine word as a publicist and writer, with his reviews in the “Königsbergsche Gelehrte und Politische Zeitungen” and with his succinct small leaflets (“Fliegende Blätter”). These were meant to disseminate the Gospel, as it was summarized by MARTIN LUTHER in his small catechism, throughout society, and in doing this Hamann caused offense. Hamann was aware of his mixed dialectic relationship to his readers; his writings were full of both riddles and candor. He was a writer in a dialectic of concealment and publicity, determined by the mystery of the Messiah and his parables, as told in Mark (Mark 4:11ff.), as well as in Pauline and Johannine theology.

Hamann’s aim was to be “Philologus crucis,” a philologist of the cross. The cross was the source of strength for his critical philology, with which he criticized the philosophers HERMANN REIMARUS (1694–1768) and G.E.Lessing (1729–1781), Moses Mendelssohn, Frederick the Great, and last but not least, by his “Metakritik über den Purismus der Vernunft,” IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804). In particular contradiction to his contemporaries, Hamann wrote about the responsible perception of one’s fellow creatures (especially in the “Aesthetica in nuce”; 1762). He also wrote concerning reason and language, time and history, sexuality and marriage, as well as politics.

Hamann’s importance for literary studies, philosophy, and theology cannot be overstated. This becomes especially clear in the doctrine of God of this extraordinarily informal “Father of the Church”: For Hamann, God is, in his speaking work and working speaking, “author” and “poet”—“God a writer!” As such, God writes the book of nature and history, and in doing so God also writes each individual’s life history. Through its “ride to hell of self-knowledge,” each individual human is understood and interpreted by God; God himself is the best interpreter of God’s words and their last critic, their judge.

Hamann, no irrationalist, but a radical Enlightenment thinker, sees God as the one who addresses him, together with all creatures, through fellow creatures. Therefore, thinking and reason constitute language. With the help of the theology and philosophy that are inherent in the translation of such language effective in the act of translation, Hamann attempts to answer the problem of Being. With respect to his ontological hermeneutics, Hamann is superior to Kant and G. W.F. Hegel (1770–1831). Hamann sees God, in contrast to Kant, not as a limited concept, and not, as Hegel does, as a smooth and unhindered mediation.

Hamann turns away sharply from the dogmatism of reason proposed by the representatives of natural religion and their speculative theology. Instead he welcomes the scepticism of Hume's Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779), and shares Kant's "sceptical tactic." However, he does not follow him on his critical way, which itself becomes dogmatic in its assertion of the "purity" of reason because Kant fears skepticism (by the assertion of the "purity" of reason). Kant, in Hamann's view, does not put an end to the affair of interplay between dogmatism and scepticism, but perpetuates it.

Whereas the puristic tendency of Kant's transcendental question, which abstracts from all particulars, leads to the idea of a limit, Hamann's metacritique resists this limit with a center having its core situated in the events of the crucifixion and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This center, laid down in the title of Hamann's leaflet "Golgatha und Scheblimini!," determines Hamann's life, to the last detail of his reading and writing. The mutual participation of the specific features of the divine and human nature in the person of Jesus Christ ("communicatio idiomatum") is the "main key to all human knowledge." God shows humanity and humiliation not only in the cross, but also as creator. God shows it also as the Holy Spirit, who "is the writer of stupid and humanly silly, yes even sinful human stories." With this theology of condescension, Hamann succeeds in thinking God, in leaving behind the alternative of Idealism and Materialism, by integrating the true elements of both in the medium of the word, and following Luther in a very impressive way.

See also Kant, Immanuel; Luther, Martin; Reimarus, Hermann

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Bayer, Oswald, and Bernd Weißenborn, eds. Johann Georg Hamann, Londoner Schriften. Hist.-krit. Munich: Verlag C. H. Beck, 1993.
- Nadler, Josef, ed. Johann Georg Hamann, Sämtliche Werke. 6 vols. Vienna: Herder Verlag, 1949–1957.
- Seils, Martin, ed. Johann Georg Hamann, Eine Auswahl aus seinen Schriften. Wuppertal: R. Brockhaus-Verlag, 1987.
- Zieseimer, Walter, and Arthur Henkel, eds. Johann Georg Hamann, Briefwechsel. 7 vols. Wiesbaden and Frankfurt am Main: Insel-Verlag, 1955–1979.

Secondary Sources:

Bayer, Oswald. Vernunft ist Sprache. Hamanns Metakritik Kants. Stuttgart-Bad Cannstadt: Frommann-Holzboog, 2002.

———. "Johann Georg Hamann als radikaler Aufklärer." Zeitgenosse im Widerspruch. Munich: Aufklärer, 1988.

Jørgensen, Sven-Aage. Johann Georg Hamann. Stuttgart: Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1976.

OSWALD BAYER

HANDEL, GEORGE FRIDERIC (1685–1759)

Composer. Born in HALLE, Germany, February 23, 1685, Handel visited leading German musical centers, including Berlin and Leipzig, at an early age. In 1702 he enrolled at Halle University and was quickly appointed organist of the Halle Domkirche (cathedral). The following year he joined the Hamburg opera orchestra, soon becoming harpsichordist-conductor and composing four operas. For most of 1706 to 1710 he lived in Italy, staying in Rome, Florence, Naples, and Venice. On returning to GERMANY he accepted the post of Kapellmeister (conductor) to the Elector of Hanover, assured that he could take immediate leave to visit Düsseldorf and ENGLAND. After a year in England he returned to Hanover, but by October 1712 he was once more in England. Aside from travel to the continent to see his family, restore his health, or recruit singers, he spent the rest of his life there, leasing a house in Brook Street, Mayfair, from 1723 and taking British citizenship in 1727. His only extended sojourn outside England was a season in Dublin (1741–1742) when he first performed Messiah. His other major works were first performed in London. Handel died April 14, 1759, in London and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Career

The trajectory of Handel's career from Halle to England shows a progression through contemporary opportunities to learn, practice, and gain prestige. He could have become an esteemed German provincial church organist and composer like JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH, but he had a strong ambition to be free to compose and direct—especially opera—as he wanted, with first-rate performers, on a world stage. He diplomatically declined most offers of contractual obligations and salaried posts, while showing (in his early career especially) a remarkable flair for gaining rapid access to influential figures and attracting patronage without ties. He spoke and wrote four languages, composed settings in six, rapidly assimilated local styles, and accommodated local tastes. He composed in every genre of his time, pushed out the boundaries of existing genres, and introduced new ones, notably English oratorio, English unacted secular drama, and the organ concerto.

Religion and politics, inextricably connected in Handel's time, coincided throughout his own life, and later in his work. His father had served as a field surgeon in the Thirty Years' War, during which Halle was twice besieged and the Domkirche organist's free lodging was badly damaged. During Handel's childhood Huguenot and Calvinist refugees were allowed to settle in Halle (see HUGUENOTS; CALVINISM), and Jews were readmitted in 1692 (see JUDAISM). On his mother's side Handel came from a family of Lutheran pastors (see LUTHERANISM), but the Domkirche had a predominantly Calvinist congregation, which affected the terms of his employment there. Visiting Italy entailed moving between supporters of different sides in the War of Spanish Succession, as well as working in a Catholic society, but as the world center of largescale, high-quality music it was the obvious next move after the staging post of the free City of Hamburg.

Nothing surviving from his earlier years anticipates the reach of Handel's sacred compositions for Rome, notably the scintillating Dixit Dominus for soloists, chorus, and orchestra. In Italy he wrote liturgical settings and sacred motets and cantatas, and his first oratorios: Il trionfo del Tempo e del Disinganno, a moral allegory to a text by his admirer Cardinal Pamphili (reworked in 1737 and 1757); and, for Marquis Ruspoli, the intensely dramatic La Resurrezione, one of his three works concerning the life of Christ. He was fêted for his virtuoso keyboard playing, richly housed in the palazzi of cardinals, and immediately accepted as a composer for the Roman Catholic church. However, he chose not to develop a career as such, or to stay in Rome, and left Italy after achieving international operatic success.

According to John Mainwaring, offers of employment were made to him, along with persuasions to convert, both of which he declined, being "resolved to die a member of that communion in which he was born and bred." According to John Hawkins he found the level of religious toleration available in Britain personally attractive and "would frequently declare the pleasure he felt in setting the Scriptures." In later life Handel was a devout attendant of his local church, St. George's Hanover Square (naturalization required Anglican conformity). In his music he expressed a sense of his Lutheran origins most clearly in his Funeral Anthem for Queen Caroline (1737), formerly the Hanoverian Electoral Princess: it draws on two chorales and the work of several composers from their shared tradition.

Political circumstances complicated Handel's career in England. His celebration of Queen Anne as peacemaker, and his Te Deum and Jubilate for British celebrations of the Peace of Utrecht, resulted in the termination of his employment with the Elector of Hanover, to whom the peace was anathema, but who was the future King of England. The Jacobite Rebellion of 1715, besides interrupting musical life, was a reminder of the threat to the Hanoverian regime and the Protestant succession in Britain, and may have prompted Handel's otherwise unexplained setting of the Passion text by B.H.Brockes (a work partly copied out by J.S.Bach) for performance in Germany. He was often identified by the London nobility and gentry—on whose favor the furtherance of his career depended—as the servant of the widely resented foreign monarchy. The unprecedentedly grand music he wrote for state ceremonials, notably the Coronation Anthems (1727), conspicuously allied him with the crown, from which he received three pensions. His almost cult status was attested by the erection of his statue in Vauxhall pleasure gardens in 1738, an unheard of tribute for any musician, let alone a living one. Such dominance of the cultural scene was resented as social presumption by the upper classes, and his public performances were periodically snubbed.

From the moment of his arrival, efforts by English authors to make Handel the fountainhead of a secure tradition of English opera failed. He chose to make his name in Italian opera, but in-fighting between generations of the royal family, who were major patrons, made an always financially risky enterprise even less sustainable. The Royal Academy (Italian) opera company began ambitiously in 1719 with Handel as one of its principal composers, but dissolved in 1728; thereafter he mounted productions increasingly as his own manager. The Opera of the Nobility, begun in 1733 by the opposition party around Frederick Prince of Wales, took away most of his leading singers, but itself ran aground. Handel wrote his last opera in 1740. His subsequent refusal to write for the Earl of Middlesex's opera company again damaged his popularity. The outbreak of the 1745 Jacobite Rebellion, however, unified national feeling behind the Hanoverians in defense of Protestantism and liberty against Catholic FRANCE, and the enthusiastic response to Handel's religious-nationalist oratorios of the late 1740s set a pattern of esteem that lasted the rest of his life. He died an affluent and honored citizen of his adopted country.

Works

Despite Handel's prominence as a composer of forty-two Italian operas, his London public was probably more familiar with his music—both his compositions and his dazzling improvisations on the organ—for the Anglican church (see ANGLICANISM). Early in his English career he accepted the hospitality of James Brydges (Earl of Carnarvon, later Duke of Chandos), who was building a princely mansion at Cannons, near London, and for whom he wrote a grand Te Deum and the eleven anthems that became known as the Chandos Anthems. His works for state religious occasions, besides those already mentioned, include the Dettingen Anthem and Te Deum, the Anthem for the Peace of Aix la Chapelle, and royal wedding anthems. He provided an anthem for the Foundling Hospital, a newly established charity for abandoned children, of which he became a governor. He also wrote five anthems for the Chapel Royal. Many of his church compositions were frequently heard on festive and charitable occasions. As poems in their praise testify, their scale and impact satisfied the contemporary appetite for the religious sublime, and Handel reused some of them in his oratorios.

Cannons was the only private house in Britain with a substantial musical establishment, and there Handelian oratorio began. At the home of his previous English host, the Earl of Burlington, Handel had encountered leading poets of the day—John Gay, Alexander Pope, and John Arbuthnot—and from that “club of composers” emerged his enchanting masque Acis and Galatea, probably first performed at Cannons in 1718. During the same period, also for Cannons, and with some of the same collaborators, he wrote his first biblical oratorio, Esther. “Unauthorized” public performances of both works in 1732 prompted Handel to mount his own newly enlarged versions, and so, unpremeditatedly, he introduced oratorio in English to the British public. For most of the next decade his seasons combined English oratorio and Italian opera, until in 1741 he turned to oratorio alone. “Oratorio” is now loosely used to describe all the English works that he originally performed in the theater, and to include secular works ranging from quasi-operas and masques on mythological stories (e.g., Semele; The Choice of Hercules) to odes (Alexander’s Feast; L’Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato). Handel’s seventeen religious oratorios are mostly based on the Old Testament or Apocrypha; only Messiah draws on the New Testament and liturgical texts outside the psalms, and only Theodora has a story set in Christian times.

The 1718 Esther set the pattern in being a newly written text dramatizing the biblical and apocryphal narratives, employing the recitative-and-aria style of Italian opera, and making full use of a chorus. The dramatization involved embroidering or inventing incidents—usually suggested by the source material—and selecting and paraphrasing Scripture. Sometimes there was an intermediary source between the BIBLE and the libretto, usually a work of literary distinction; in the case of Esther, it was Racine’s neoclassical choric drama. The anthems inserted into the 1732 Esther represent the other and less frequent strain of libretto composition, using actual scriptural text. Only Messiah and Israel in Egypt consist entirely of texts taken from the Bible with only minor verbal adjustment, but here too the librettist shaped the works, by selection, juxtaposition, and sequencing of the biblical verses.

Italian opera (and Italian oratorio) lacked a chorus, and the chorus of English oratorio gave Handel the opportunity to write grand, varied, and dramatic music, and afforded his audience the awe-inspiring sensations that signaled the highest art. Handel did not, so far as we know, write or choose the subjects of any of his English librettos. Their authors were able and cultivated people. Several were deliberately contributing to the making of high art, and two at least were writing in the cause of the Protestant religion: Charles Jennens (Saul, Messiah, Belshazzar, and possibly Israel in Egypt) and the Rev. Thomas Morell (Judas Maccabaeus, Alexander Balus, Theodora, Jephtha).

Of the librettists of the religious oratorios whose identities are known, two—James Miller (Joseph and his Brethren) and Morell—were CHURCH OF ENGLAND ministers; one, Jennens, was a devout nonjuring Anglican; and one, Samuel Humphreys (the 1732 Esther, Deborah, and Athalia), compiled a massive biblical commentary from standard Anglican exegeses. The oratorios are further rooted in Anglicanism through their “cathedral” musical style (which made them anathema to the Methodist JOHN WESLEY), their assertion of the church-state bond reinforced by the reuse of anthems for state occasions, and their textual analogy of national Protestant defiance of European Catholic autocracies. Yet they also appealed to nonconformists (see NON-CONFORMITY), on account of their lack of doctrinal insistence and their depiction of an elect, embattled, minority religious community succeeding over corrupt, hedonistic apostates and heathens. Their celebration of hard-won freedom of religion and nationhood was congenial to Englishmen—and later Americans—of any persuasion. They also incorporate the views of England's leading ENLIGHTENMENT philosopher, the third earl of Shaftesbury, through their criticism and improvement of Old Testament ethics and personalities, and their dramatization of the principles of "sensibility." The conflict between enlightenment and religious fervor would have been familiar to Handel from his youth. It reached a head at Halle University during his year there (1702–1703) in the clash between the philosopher Christian Thomasius and the Pietist August Hermann Francke (see PIETISM). Handel's oratorios are remarkable in accommodating both views.

During the nineteenth century the oratorios were regarded principally as sacred works. In the twentieth century they were celebrated as dramas of individuals and nations, and as showing a pantheist and humanist Handel overriding the sectarianism of his librettists and his times. More recently, exploration has focused on the richness of their response to the ideas of their day. Besides making copious reference to current political life and theory—both government and opposition—they reflect diverse, but connected, religious and aesthetic concerns.

Handelian oratorio responded to the artistic reform movement calling for uplifting, instructive, national art, and (in music) English word settings; to the taste for sentimental drama; to the desire for a national religious epic and the use of Greek tragedy as a model for music dramas; to the enthusiasm for the Bible as literature, for the religious sublime, and for biblical paraphrase; and, above all, to the rallying of ORTHODOXY against freethinking. The period of Handel's oratorio composition (1732–1752) was also the period of the major English defense against DEISM, and the oratorios, with their insistence on providentialism, on the truth of prophecy and miracles, on the integrity of Scripture, and the dependency of the New Testament on the Old, and prominently utilizing the common antideist armory of evidence, were major—and uniquely lasting—contributions to that defense. The outstanding instance, an oratorio unlike any of his others but firmly rooted in antideist literature, is Messiah, a deliberate affirmation by Jennens of the Christian creed and its universal authority, and a paean to the propagation of the gospel.

More generally, through the accessibility and emotive power of Handel's music, and through their LATITUDINARIANISM and avoidance of dogmatism (even in Messiah), the oratorios fulfilled the widespread contemporary call to make the truths of religion movingly convincing and thus revitalize religious feeling and reform behavior. In this respect English oratorio was a Protestant annexation of its Catholic original, and can be seen as a form of "counter-COUNTER-REFORMATION." Through oratorio the Roman church used music as an inducement to worship and conversion. Handel's English oratorios lay claim to the oratorians' form of religious expressiveness and stamp it with Protestantism by taking as their sources not the New Testament or hagiography, but the Old Testament and Apocrypha, invoking and capitalizing on the time-honored parallel between the religious-political dispensation of the ancient Israelites and that of Protestant Britain (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). The rebuttal of Catholicism is clearest in the one Christian drama, Theodora, which reflects contemporary English admiration for the purity of the early church (not, as is sometimes anachronistically supposed, the influence of METHODISM). It presents a voluntary religious community whose elite is defined by spiritual excellence, instead of a religious structure heavy with doctrines, hierarchy, and priesthood; it identifies Christianity with freedom of thought and belief, rather than prescribed belief and practice; it celebrates religious observance that is private and spontaneous, not public and ritualized; and it opposes fresh, pure, individual belief to tradition, authority, and world domination.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

[Mainwaring, John.] Memoirs of the Life of the Late George Frederic Handel. London, 1760.
Facsimile Buren: Frits Knupf, 1975.

Secondary Sources:

Burrows, Donald. Handel. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Burrows, Donald, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Handel. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Dean, Winton. Handel's Dramatic Oratorios and Masques. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

Hawkins, John. A General History of the Science and Practice of Music, 2 vols. London, 1776.
Repr. London: J. Alfred Novello, 1853.

Hicks, Anthony. "Handel, George Frideric." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 2nd ed, edited by Stanley Sadie and John Tyrrell. London: Macmillan, 2001.

Smith, Ruth. Handel's Oratorios and Eighteenth-Century Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

———. "The Meaning of the Libretto of Handel's Judas Maccabaeus" Music & Letters (1998): 50–71.

RUTH SMITH

HARKNESS, GEORGIA (1891–1974)

American theologian. Harkness was the first professional woman theologian in the UNITED STATES and the first female theologian to teach in Protestant seminaries in the United States. Born April 21, 1891, and raised in the tiny upstate New York village of Harkness, named after her grandfather, she was the second daughter and youngest of four children of J. Warren and Lillie (Merrill) Harkness. Her parents took her in their arms to the Harkness Methodist Episcopal Church when she was three weeks old, beginning her lifelong commitment to the church as a loyal critic from within.

After attending the one-room elementary school, which served as the family's church on Sundays, Harkness graduated from nearby Keeseville High School and received her A.B. from Cornell University in 1912. She was deeply influenced by the Student Volunteer Movement in college and took its pledge to become a foreign missionary. Feeling needed at home, she instead taught for a short time at high schools in Schuylersville and Scotia, New York. Unsatisfied with this career direction, Harkness entered the newly formed Boston University School of Religious Education to pursue an alternative calling to be a director of religious education. By the time she received her two master's degrees (and A.M.) in 1920, she decided that her calling was to teach in higher education and she remained at Boston University to gain a doctorate in philosophy.

Harkness began her teaching career as assistant professor of religious education in 1922 at Elmira College, one of the country's earliest women's colleges, teaching philosophy there until 1937. She moved to Mt. Holyoke College in Holyoke, Massachusetts, for two years. In 1939 Harkness accepted the invitation from Garrett Biblical Institute in Evanston, Illinois to become one of the first professors of applied theology in a United States seminary, although she had hoped to be named to the professorship in systematic theology. After eleven years Harkness moved to the Pacific School of Religion in 1960, remaining there until retirement in 1961.

Professor of applied theology rightly described Georgia Harkness, a social prophet within the Methodist and Protestant churches beginning with her early years at Elmira College. She became a pacifist in 1924 after visiting war-torn Europe following World War I and spoke out against any use of nuclear weaponry throughout her lifetime (see PACIFISM). She gained international attention at the Oxford Conference of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1938 when she described the churches as one of the main bastions of male dominance in society. Having received local ordination in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1938 Harkness was credited with doing more than anyone else to bring full ordination and conference membership to women in her denomination in 1956. In 1948 she called on the Methodist Church to eliminate the Central Jurisdiction, made up of black congregations, before joining with the Evangelical United Brethren to form the United Methodist Church in that year. The Central Jurisdiction was abolished the following year, and the United Methodist Church became an integrated denomination.

One hour before his death in 1937, her father told his daughter that he hoped she would write more about Jesus Christ. This led her to rethink her own spiritual and professional commitments. Harkness moved from an early emphasis and rather arid writings on philosophical idealism to become an evangelical liberal, combining the personal evangelical emphasis of her childhood with her liberal commitment to social justice as an adult. She gained scholarly distinction as a theologian of the laity, interpreting theological issues in understandable language. Over her lifetime she preached and lectured through the world. Her thirty-eight books and countless articles on THEOLOGY, spiritual life, ministry of the LAITY, and ETHICS, drawn from Biblical interpretation, are written in both narrative and poetic form. She also wrote over 200 hymns, including "Hope of the World," which opened the second assembly of the World Council of Churches in 1954 in Evanston, Illinois.

Throughout her lifetime, Harkness used pen, pulpit, and platform to hold the churches responsible for the social implications of Christianity. A prefeminist and lone female voice, she challenged and worked together with such giants among male theologians of her day as KARL BARTH, REINHOLD NIEBUHR, and PAUL TILLICH. Her words to the church sound more like the liberation theologians of the twenty-first century than of a woman scholar of the mid-twentieth century.

The United Library at Garrett Evangelical Theological Seminary holds the Georgia Harkness major manuscript collection, consisting of her autobiographical essay, written for the Pacific Coast Theological Group in the 1950s, letters to and from Harkness, manuscript and printed copies of sermons, essays, speeches, poems, and hymns, as well as published clippings and course syllabi. A further invaluable source is over two hundred letters exchanged between Harkness and Edgar Sheffield Brightman over a twenty-five-year period in the Department of Special Collections at the Library at Boston University.

Of the thirty-eight books that she wrote, Understanding the Christian Faith (1947), Gospel and Our World (1949), The Faith by Which the Church Lives (1940), Toward Understanding the Bible (1954), and Women in Church and Society (1971) are representative of her mature emphasis on applied theology, the ministry of the laity, and social ethics. The Dark Night of the Soul (1945) is a pastoral care approach growing out of her recovery from depression. Her books on spiritual growth include Prayer and the Common Life (1948) and Mysticism (1973), and representative of her devotional books, some written in poetry, are Grace Abounding (1969), Through Christ Our Lord (1950), Be Still and Know (1953), and Holy Flame (1935). Characteristic of her earlier books, written from the prospect of philosophical idealism, are Conflicts in Religious Thought (1929) and The Recovery of Ideals (1937). Harkness contributed countless articles for The Christian Century, including the only one by a woman in the series on "How My Mind Has Changed" (March 15, 1939), Zion's Herald, and The Christian Advocate.

Harkness died in retirement in Claremont, California, survived by her companion of many years, the musician Verna Miller. She was buried in Harkness, New York. Garrett Evangelical Theological Seminary honored her pioneering role by establishing the Georgia Harkness Chair to be held by a woman in theological studies.

See also Ethics; Feminist Theology; Liberation Theology; Methodist Episcopal Church Conference; Theology, Twentieth-Century, North American

References and Further Reading

- Carpenter, Dianne Evelyn. "Georgia Harkness's Distinctive Personalistic Synthesis." Ph.D. dissertation, Boston University, 1988.
- Gilbert, Paula. "Choice of the Greater Good: The Christian Witness of Georgia Harkness Arising from the Interplay of Spiritual Life and Theological Perspective." Ph.D. dissertation, Duke University, 1984.
- Keller, Rosemary. For Such a Time as This: The Life, Work, and Thought of Georgia Harkness. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1992.
- Keller, Rosemary, ed. "Georgia Harkness Theologian of the People." In Spirituality and Social Responsibility: Vocational Vision of Women in the United Methodist Tradition. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1993.
- Scott, Martha. "Georgia Harkness: Social Activist and/or Mystic." In Women in New Worlds, vol. I. Edited by Rosemary and Thomas Keller. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1981.
- . "The Theology and Social Thought of Georgia Harkness." Ph.D. dissertation, Northwestern University, 1984.

ROSEMARY KELLER

HARNACK, ADOLF VON (1851–1930)

German theologian and historian. Harnack was born a Baltic German in Dorpat (Livonia) on May 7, 1851, son of the professor of theology, Theodosius Harnack, who was considered one of the leading Lutheran scholars of his time. Through his active participation in the Church of Livonia, Theodosius Harnack moved away from PIETISM and developed into a consciously Lutheran churchman.

Having grown up in conservative confessional surroundings, Adolf began studying evangelical theology in Dorpat in 1869. However, serious tensions quickly arose between him and his father as Adolf was influenced by the church historian Moritz von Engelhard and sought to apply the historical-critical method rigorously to the history of dogma. Beginning with the winter semester of 1872 Harnack studied at the University of Leipzig, a bastion of conservative confessional LUTHERANISM at the time, obtaining his doctorate in 1873 with a dissertation entitled Zur Quellenkritik der Geschichte des Gnosticismus and qualifying as a university lecturer in 1874 with his postdoctoral thesis De Apellis monarchica. Both works examined the problems of gnosticism and its sources. At the young age of twenty-three Harnack became a lecturer in Leipzig and already at twenty-five associate professor at the Leipzig faculty. During the period in Leipzig Harnack broke his ties to conservative confessional Lutheranism. His reading of the works of ALBRECHT RITSCHL caused him to distance himself still further from traditional Lutheran theology.

An extremely popular academic teacher with the students in Leipzig, Harnack soon gathered around him a group of talented scholars who were to gain a significant influence in the fields of theology and church policy. Among them were MARTIN RADE, Friedrich Loofs, William Wrede, and Emil Schürer. Together with Schürer he established the Theologische Literaturzeitung (Theological Literary Journal), which still exists today. Within a few years this became one of the most influential theological review journals. Because of denominational reservations, he declined the offer of a position in Breslau, but in 1879 Harnack accepted a professorship at Giessen in Hesse, which appeared unproblematic because it was not dominated by conservative New Lutheran thinking. In Giessen he began working on his three-volume Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte (Handbook of the History of Dogma), the first volume of which was published in 1886 and earned him a name in the theological world.

In this study Harnack remained true to his rigorous historical-critical approach: he rejected the idea that dogma existed in the early church as historically comprehensible.

Rather, it was the hellenization of the original Gospel, a disastrous turn from the point of view of the development of piety. Harnack used the original Gospel of Jesus as a criterion for the assessment and portrayal of the history of dogma, which he maintained had been used by conservative historical study as an instrument to strengthen its own position and objectives. Harnack opposed this diagnosed misuse of the history of dogma by the conservatives with his own historical message. He maintained that the historiography of dogma amounted to more than either the description of a cultural history or the history of the development of dogmas. Its objective could be correctly established only if the history of dogma were interpreted as a history of institutions. Striving in this way to demonstrate the historical relativity of dogmas, he sought to open up new paths to faith beyond theological arbitrariness. Historical-critical historiography of dogma seeks in this way to provide clear orientation and thus to strengthen human faith beyond manipulated dogmas by seeking to capture the deep inner substance of Christianity.

In 1866, the year of publication of the first volume of his History of Dogma, Harnack was appointed to a professorship in Marburg, and in 1888 moved to Berlin. By then his History of Dogma was widely read, but met with hefty criticism from conservative circles. Conservative theological and church circles sought to prevent his Berlin appointment. However, a public and at times polemical controversy, in the course of which the governing council of the Prussian Evangelical Church denied its consent to Harnack's appointment, did not prevent his being called to Berlin. Nevertheless, from then on Harnack's relationship to the official church authorities remained strained. He was not appointed to church examination committees, nor elected a member of a church synod. The advocates of "positive," that is, traditional Christianity saw in Harnack an influential opponent who was weakening the fundamental confessional principles and making space for a theological subjectivism. Harnack found himself the target of attacks, which intensified into the so-called Apostolicum dispute, a controversy over the continued viability of the Apostles Creed. A direct consequence of this controversy was the establishment of a "positive" professorship at Berlin for the correction of Harnack. It was occupied by Adolf Schlatter (1852–1938), and it allowed Harnack's pursuit of scholarly, organizational, and political tasks unencumbered by ecclesiastical concerns.

Harnack rapidly became one of the most controversial, but at the same time one of the most influential, Berlin professors. He was supported and encouraged by the Prussian minister of education and cultural affairs Friedrich Althoff and by the liberal historian Theodor Mommsen. In 1890, Harnack was appointed to the Preußische Akademie der Wissenschaften. After assuming numerous responsibilities in the academy and the university, he took up the position of director of the Prussian State Library in 1905. In 1911 he became the first president of the KaiserWilhelm-Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Wissenschaften, now the Max Planck Society. Additionally, Harnack grew to be a close advisor of Emperor Wilhelm II on aspects of church policy. Harnack cofounded the Evangelisch-Sozialen Kongress, which saw its task in dealing with the social question from the perspective of Protestantism, and from 1903 to 1912 was its president.

Thus before the outbreak of World War I Harnack was highly regarded as a theologian and scientific organizer not only in GERMANY but also abroad. At the beginning of the war, Harnack supported the political objectives of Germany. Like the majority of German intellectuals he was initially convinced that the war had been forced on the Empire and constituted a legitimate form of self-defense. Harnack therefore supported the emperor in an advisory capacity and brought his excellent reputation to bear journalistically for the German war aims. However, as the war continued, he began as early as 1915 to join the pacifists in calling for rapprochement and peace as well as campaigning for wide-reaching democratic reforms within German politics. In addition Harnack made intensive use of his foreign contacts to bring about if not a pro-German, at least a neutral, friendly attitude among the American public. Harnack considered the all-out submarine warfare initiated by the German command to be political stupidity, and saw the resulting entry of the United States into the war as a personal failure.

After the German defeat and the revolution in 1918–1919 Harnack supported the new democratic parliamentary republic. Unlike many of his colleagues, however, he did not join any particular party but rather continued to see his task in serving science by acting, in his capacity as a scholar, as advisor to the political institutions and creating scientific political committees. He played an active role in establishing the Notgemeinschaft der Deutschen Wissenschaft (Emergency Association of German Science) after the war.

The political and theological development of the Weimar Republic was a source of great concern for Harnack. His declaration of belief in the republic met with hefty criticism within conservative church circles. In the elections for German president in 1925 Harnack openly supported the Catholic Wilhelm Marx from the Catholic-influenced Center party, who was competing against the war hero Otto von Hindenburg for the position of president. Harnack's analysis of the general political situation in the Weimar Republic and the situation in terms of church policy led him to pessimistic conclusions in the latter years of his life. Harnack saw German Protestantism to be in danger of being taken over by politically reactionary forces. He saw the new theological generation, which had been shaped to a great extent by experiences of war, as characterized by an ahistorical, anticultural basic position. Harnack reproached KARL BARTH in a 1923 correspondence with him, arguing that if detached from cultural points of reference Barth's theological writings on revelation could lead only to a fatal selfisolation. According to Harnack the ahistorical views propagated by Barth formed the core of an irrational critique of culture, which threatened the basic values of a Christian humanist culture.

The liberal cultural theologian also regarded the theological program of the "New Lutherans" such as Emanuel Hirsch and FRIEDRICH GOGARTEN as a matter for great concern. In his opinion their concepts could lead only to a confessionalism, which had long been outgrown. Harnack was equally skeptical of the close interlinking of the historical theological approaches of young conservative theologians with political rights. He saw this as sowing a seed from which nothing good could grow for church policy.

Harnack died on June 10, 1930, in Heidelberg while on a business trip as president of the KaiserWilhelm-Gesellschaft. His ashes were buried in Berlin. The last speaker who, on behalf of the students, addressed those gathered on the occasion of the funeral service was DIETRICH BONHOEFFER. Bonhoeffer's words on the responsibilities of men and women in the modern world are linked not least to the work of Harnack.

Harnack was the last German-speaking theologian who exercised great authority from a theological point of view and at the same time was socially influential, politically significant, and important as a scientific organizer. Despite this, during his lifetime as a theologian Harnack remained a church historian whose name is still associated with a progressive understanding of the history of dogma. Harnack's basic theory was that a method of interpretation consisting of unprejudiced historical criticism should be used to determine the original Gospel of Jesus, undistorted by church dogma. He believed that, despite the insights of the “Religionsgeschichtliche Schule” (“History of Religions School”), no research could be carried out into the life of Jesus—the message of Jesus could be extracted by means of careful historical study. However, any critical work on dogmas was conditional on having an accurate edition of the relevant source texts. Thus in 1891 the Kirchenväterkommision (Committee on the Church Fathers) was formed at the proposal of Harnack and Theodor Mommsen (1817–1903), which assumed the task of editing old church literature from before 325 and publishing this in fifty volumes. By 1924 Texte und Untersuchungen published by Harnack already ran to forty-five volumes and thus had provided essential working materials for “Patristicism.”

The Gospel of Jesus, the contents of which Harnack summarized using the key terms “faith in God,” “love of humans,” and “trust in the Kingdom of God” in his most well-known work Das Wesen des Christentums (What is Christianity) published in 1900, was, he maintained, the most pure form of human religiousness. Harnack believed these three concepts to be mutually dependent, together forming the “Wesen des Christentums” (this translates literally as the “essence of Christianity”) and therefore to be of the utmost cultural significance. Harnack allowed that Protestantism was the most mature form of Christianity because by resorting to the biblical fundamentals this had relaxed the connection to old confessional statements. He maintained that Protestantism recognized the individuality of Christians and made this a principle of church institutions.

The reception of Harnack’s work has basically never been interrupted. However, his theology is of questionable relevance within the theological debate today. Although his studies had a decisive influence in the content-related disputes into the 1930s, this influence was broken by “dialectic theology.” However, to understand the marked break in the reception of Harnack’s work we need to look at more than the theological level alone. The political lack of clarity of so-called cultural Protestantism that Harnack personified with regard to German National Socialism discredited cultural Protestantism as a whole and at the same time had a serious impact on the reception of Harnack’s work after 1945.

After 1945 discussions on Harnack within Protestantism were restricted to small circles of specialists. In Germany, but also in the UNITED STATES and ENGLAND, it was Harnack’s Wesen des Christentums in particular that was discussed (Niebuhr, Glick, Sykes). In the United States Harnack’s approach was usually assessed negatively despite his influence in the first half of the twentieth century having been considerable, because of his promotion of patristic thinking.

In German-speaking research Harnack’s work became a focus of greater attention on the occasion of his 150th birthday jubilee in May 2001. In this context the question raised again of the relationship between “Protestantism and culture” is motivated by the basic position of apologetics of scientific theology in relation to a society that seems to have an ever-decreasing requirement for this theology. The existential crisis of institutions that through this are also threatened with the loss of their link to society is a further reason for the fresh interest in Harnack and his work. Whether there will really be a heightened new reception of the work of Adolf von Harnack remains to be seen.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Harnack, Adolf. Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr, 1931.
- . Entstehung und Entwicklung der Kirchenverfassung und des Kirchenrechts. Leipzig: 1910; reprint Darmstadt: 1980.
- . Die Mission und die Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten. Wiesbaden, Germany: VMA-Verlag, 1924.
- . Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius. Leipzig: J.C.Hinrichs, 1893–1904.
- . Marcion. Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott. Leipzig: J.C. Hinrichs, 1924; reprint Darmstadt, Germany, 1960.
- . Das Wesen des Christentums. [Lecture, 1900]. Güter-sloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1977.
- . Protokollbuch der Kirchenväter-Kommission der Preußischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 1897–1928. Edited by Christoph Marksches. Berlin/New York: Walter de Gruyter, 2000.
- . Reden und Aufsätze. Edited by Ulrich Volp. Mandelbachtal-Cambride: Edition Cicero, 2001.
- . Harnack, Adolf von. The Apostles' Creed. London, A. and C. Black, 1901.
- . Essays on the Social Gospel. London, Williams & Norgate; New York, G.P. Putnam's, 1907.
- . History of Dogma, 7 vols. London, Williams & Norgate, 1896–99.
- . History of Dogma. New York, Dover Publications, 1961.
- . The Mission and Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries, London, Williams and Norgate; New York, G.P. Putnam's sons, 1908.
- . What is Christianity? Lectures delivered in the University of Berlin during the winter-term 1899–1900, New York, G.P. Putnam's sons; London, Williams and Norgate, 1901.
- . Thoughts on the Present Position of Protestantism, London, A. & C. Black, 1899.

Secondary Sources:

- Glick, G. Wayne. The Reality of Christianity. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- Hübner, Thomas. Adolf von Harnacks Vorlesungen über das Wesen des Christentums. Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1994.
- Kantzenbach, Friedrich Wilhelm. "Adolf von Harnack." In Theologische Realenzyklopädie (TRE), edited by Gerhard Krause, vol. 33, 450–458. Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1985.
- . "Adolf von Harnack—Das Wesen des Christentums." In Programme der Theologie. Munich, 1978.
- Kinzig, Wolfram. "Harnack heute. Neuere Forschungen zu seiner Biographie und dem 'Wesen des Christentums.'" Theologische Literaturzeitung 126 (2001): 473–500.
- Niebuhr, H.Richard. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper & Row, 1951.
- Pauck, Wilhelm. Two Historical Theologians. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Sykes, Stephen. The Identity of Christianity. Theologians and the Essence of Christianity from Schleiermacher to Barth. London: SPCK, 1984.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

HARRIS, WILLIAM WADÉ (c. 1860–1929)

African churchman. Harris was born at Half Graway, Liberia, circa 1860, and died at Harper, Liberia on June 23, 1929. He belonged to the Grebo people of LIBERIA. Brought up by a Methodist uncle, Harris became a catechist and teacher for the Episcopal Church. In 1910, while in prison for sedition, he had a vision in which Gabriel called him to fulfill all the commands of Matthew 28:19. On his release, he preached and baptized in his home area. In 1913, following the death of his wife, he set off “into all the world.”

With two female companions, Harris walked the whole breadth of the Ivory Coast (then a French colony) where missions, almost all Catholic, were new, and then into the western Gold Coast. The women sang praises to God, drawing a crowd; Harris, after explaining his mission to the chief, preached, and baptized those who responded. His message centered on repentance, turning to God, complete abandonment of other divinities and all traditional cult objects or fetishes, and on SALVATION through Christ, who was returning as judge. The PREACHING was reinforced by healings (see FAITH HEALING), demonstrations of spiritual power, and triumphant confrontations with traditional priests (and occasionally with colonial officials and Catholic priests, if these tried to obstruct his work). A huge movement to Christianity resulted. In the 18 months before the French deported him to Liberia, Harris baptized an estimated 100,000 people in the Ivory Coast, and perhaps 10,000 (including JOSEPH CASELEY-HAYFORD) in the Gold Coast. He formed worshiping congregations, appointed leaders, offered rudimentary teaching based on the Ten Commandments, left Bibles, and urged his hearers to accept teaching from missions as this became available.

In the 1920s Harris agreed that the British Methodist mission should assume care of the Ivory Coast congregations, but he seems to have regretted this later, being increasingly disillusioned with mission teaching and practice on MARRIAGE and on money. He consecrated John Ahui as his representative. Independent eglises Harristes still flourish.

Harris died in Harper, Liberia on June 23, 1929, but he is the seminal figure for all forms of Ivory Coast Christianity. He was also the first and most remarkable of the African charismatic figures who, independently of the missions, led mass movements toward Christianity in the period from about 1913 to 1935.

See also Africa; African Instituted Churches; Colonialism; Missionary Organizations; Missions

References and Further Reading

Haliburton, G.M. The Prophet Harris. London: Longman, 1971.

Shank, David A. Prophet Harris, the "Black Elijah" of West Africa. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1994.

Walker, Sheila S. The Religious Revolution in the Ivory Coast. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1983.

ANDREW F.WALLS

HARTSHORNE, CHARLES (1897–2000)

American philosopher and theologian. Hartshorne was born on June 5, 1897 in Kittanning, Pennsylvania, the son of an Episcopalian minister. He attended Haverford College between 1915 and 1917 before serving as a medical orderly in the United States military. Returning to academia to complete his A.B., A.M., and Ph.D. at Harvard University by 1923, Hartshorne went on to accept a Sheldon Travelling Fellowship to Germany, where he attended lectures by Martin Heidegger and Edmund Husserl. He returned to Harvard between 1925 and 1928, as an instructor and Research Fellow, assisting Alfred North Whitehead for one semester and also, with Paul Weiss, editing the collected papers of Charles Sanders Peirce. The works of Whitehead and Peirce were to have far-reaching influences on Hartshorne's own philosophical thought, leading to his consequential conception of God as subject to the processes of time and change. In 1928, Hartshorne accepted a post at the Department of Philosophy of the University of Chicago where, in due time, he received a joint position in the Divinity School. He remained teaching at Chicago until 1955, then moved to professorships at Emory University (1955–1962) and the University of Texas at Austin (1962–1976). He died on October 9, 2000.

Hartshorne was a prominent advocate for what came to be known as process philosophy. His written works include: Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism (1941), The Divine Relativity: A Social Conception of God (1948), and Aquinas to Whitehead: Seven Centuries of Metaphysics of Religion (1976). Identifying his own thought as principally philosophy rather than theology, Hartshorne argued against the classical theistic understanding of God as omnipotent, omniscient, and immutable. Instead, he maintained that God's perfection consists precisely in the ability to respond to change. A defender of Anselm's famous ontological argument, in a period when the rationality of theism had become vilified within the academy, Hartshorne sought to demonstrate that the so-called philosophical "proofs" for the existence of God—the ontological, teleological, and cosmological arguments—jointly reinforce the claims of one another.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Aquinas to Whitehead: Seven Centuries of Metaphysics of Religion. The Aquinas Lecture, 1976. Milwaukee: Marquette University Publications, 1976.

The Divine Relativity: A Social Conception of God. The Terry Lectures, 1947. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1948.

Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism. Chicago: Willett, Clark & Company, 1941. Reprint, Hamden, CT: Archon Books, 1964.

Secondary Sources:

Cobb, John and Franklin Gamwell, eds. Existence and Actuality: Conversations with Charles Hartshorne. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

Hahn, Lewis, ed. The Philosophy of Charles Hartshorne. LaSalle, IL: Open Court, 1991.

KATHRYN BEVIS

HASTINGS, LADY SELINA (1707–1791)

English evangelical leader. Born August 24, 1707, the second daughter of Earl Ferris, she married Theophilus Hastings, ninth earl of Huntingdon in 1728 and bore him four children. Through the influence of her sisters Betty and Margaret she became acquainted with the work of the Methodists in the first wave of religious revival in England and was converted in 1739. By 1748 she had transferred her attention to GEORGE WHITEFIELD'S Calvinistic variety of METHODISM rather than the ARMINIANISM of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, although she retained their friendship. She helped a number of men receive ordination and employed them as her chaplains until the church authorities refused to allow this spirit of independence. She had particular links with Thomas Haweis and her cousin, Walter Shirley, notable evangelical clergymen, and was a friend of Toplady and Dodderidge. She built some chapels and acquired others in what became known as the "Lady Huntingdon's Connexion," by 1791 in an association numbering twentythree districts and over sixty chapels, located in fashionable spa towns and cathedral cities such as Brighton, Bath, Chichester, and Worcester.

The doctrinal basis of the association was the Fifteen Articles, a selection of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. In 1768, after the expulsion of evangelical students from Oxford, she opened a College at Trefeca, WALES, as an academy for preachers. John Fletcher was its first president, but he resigned in 1771 over the renewed debate between Calvinists and Arminians, as did Joseph Benson. On the death of George Whitefield she took over responsibility for the Bethesda Orphan House in Georgia but this burnt down. Lady Selina died June 17, 1791 at her home in Spa Fields, London and was buried at Donington Park.

See also Calvinism; Evangelicalism

References and Further Reading

Welch, Edwin. Spiritual Pilgrim. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1995.

TIM MACQUIBAN

HAUGE, HANS NIELSEN (1771–1824)

Norwegian lay preacher. Hauge was born into a farmer family in the agrarian community of Rolvsøy in what was then the kingdom of DENMARK and NORWAY. In 1796, as he walked in the fields, he experienced a special calling from God to preach and to urge his fellow countrymen to conversion and a different lifestyle. This sparked the first thorough revival movement in Norway, called Haugianism, which dominated religious life of the country during the first half of the nineteenth century. Hauge, firmly rooted in the country's Lutheran tradition, emphasized a personally experienced salvation and a puritan way of life stressing the importance of inner-worldly vocational work. His followers were, to a great extent, industrious people who took part in the modernization of the Norwegian economy. Hauge himself was arrested in 1804 as preaching gatherings were prohibited by law for those who were not ordained. In 1809 he was temporarily released in order to assist in alleviating the country's serious economic problems following the Napoleonic wars. In 1813 he was finally sentenced to pay a fine of 1,000 riksdaler for ignoring the prohibition on lay preaching. Hauge continued to urge people to remain within the Lutheran state church and to pay respect to the clergy. His own activity, however, gradually changed into maintaining his religious network and caring for his economic activities.

Haugianism came to lay a foundation for Norwegian religious life both in Norway and among Norwegian emigrants in North America, its importance being of both a religious and an economic nature. A Lutheran-formed and serious-minded religious outlook combined with a puritan lifestyle characterized his followers. Toward the second half of the century, Haugianism was increasingly contested by more evangelically oriented revival movements, but Hauge's influence is still the most important single contribution to Norwegian religious life after the REFORMATION.

References and Further Reading:

- Kullerud, Dag. Hans Nielsen Hauge: Mannen som vekket Norge. Oslo: Forum Aschehoug. 1996.
- Shaw, Joseph M. Pulpit Under the Sky: A Life of Hans Nielsen Hauge. Reprint, Minneapolis: Greenwood Press, 1955.

JON P. KNUDSEN

HAYFORD, JOSEPH EPHRAIM CASELY (1866–1930)

African writer. Born to the family of a Ghanaian Methodist minister on September 28, 1866, Casely Hayford became a successful writer, journalist, politician, and lawyer. His greatest contribution to Protestantism was his positive appraisal of the life and ministry of the West African prophet WILLIAM WADÉ HARRIS, one of the leaders in the AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES movement.

As a lawyer Casely Hayford worked with Aborigines Rights Protection Society against the Lands Bill of 1897, to preserve the African land tenure system. As a politician Casely Hayford served as a member of the Legislative Council from 1916 until 1930. He was the moving force behind the founding of the National Congress of British West Africa, and the Gold Coast Youth Conference, precursors to Ghana's political parties.

As a journalist he wrote articles arguing racial equality and the need for representation of Africans at the highest levels of administration of their affairs. His novel Ethiopia Unbound (1911) was one of the first texts of modern fiction produced in English in West Africa. A vigorous defense of black people, the work was also critical of Christianity as a mainly white religion.

As an educational reformer, he helped establish Achimota College in 1927, which was a precursor to the establishment of the University College of the Gold Coast in 1961.

With his interest in the life of Wadé Harris, Casely Hayford was a pioneer scholar in African Independence. His controversial portrayal of Harris as a legitimate prophet was one of the earliest triumphs of the African Christian Independence movement.

Casely Hayford died August 11, 1930.

See also Africa

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Hayford Casely, J.E. Ethiopia Unbound. London: Cass Library of African Studies, 1974.

———. West African Leadership: Public Speeches Delivered by J.E. Casely Hayford. London: Arthur Stockwell, 1949.

———. William Waddy Harris: The West African Reformer, the Man and His Message. United West Africa, 1915; London, C.M. Phillips, 1915.

Secondary Sources:

Kimble, David. A Political History of Ghana, 1850–1928. London: Oxford University Press, 1963.

Sampson, Magnus J. Gold Coast Men of Affairs. London: Dawsons of Pall Mall, 1937.

CASELY B. ESSAMUAH

HEAVEN AND HELL

At the outset of the Protestant REFORMATION, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530) affirmed biblical and traditional views of heaven and hell; since then views have varied dramatically among denominations, congregations, and even individuals. Views now range in a spectrum from a physical, “literal heaven” to no heaven at all. As for hell, beliefs are even more spongy, with a definite tendency, except among evangelicals, to ignore it.

Overview

The Bible affirms the reality of both heaven and hell. The Lord’s Prayer itself addresses a “Father in heaven” and prays that his will be done “on earth as it is in heaven.” The New Testament can scarcely be understood without reference to the kingdom of God as a radical change from our present lives. The range of interpretations of biblical passages is vast. At one extreme they are taken as physical statements about physical reality; at the other they are dismissed as superstitious errors on the part of Jesus and the biblical writers; in between, a huge variety of metaphorical interpretations exist. In Protestantism in the West during the past three centuries the tendency has been in the direction of the extremes; many non-Western societies, however, offer a rich and vivid sense of heaven. This article can mention only some of the deepest questions and a few alternatives.

What Are Heaven and Hell?

Are heaven and hell the “afterlife” or “eternal life”? That is, do we live on in time after the end of our earthly lives, or are our whole lives subsumed in God’s eternity? What is it in us that lives eternally? Do we become one with God as a raindrop does with the sea, or does our essence live on, or our personality, or our body? Usually it is believed that the soul or character lives on, but the Bible and tradition give no precise idea of what the Greek pneuma, soul or spirit means, and Paul speaks of a soma pneumatikon (soul-body or spiritual body). Two quite different strands run through Protestantism: the immortality of the soul (which derives from Greek philosophy) and the biblical idea of bodily resurrection. The apostle Paul declared that there was no point in a Christianity that did not affirm the physical resurrection.

The kingdom of God (basileia tou theou) is a main theme of the New Testament. It is clear that Christ is our ruler: a basileus, emperor had connotations of majesty and power almost inconceivable in the twenty-first century. Sometimes the kingdom seems to be among us now or “in our hands”; sometimes on this earth now or at the end of time, sometimes in some more divine state of existence such as “heaven.” The New Testament envisions a radical change that will soon occur at the end of time or last days (ta eschata) and will radically transform the world. Christ’s first coming was incarnate as Jesus born of Mary, and Christ will come a second time to complete the transformation of the cosmos. The world may come to an end with the last judgment and the final destruction of evil at that time; after the judgment, time may disappear, or Christ may reign a thousand years before finally eliminating all space and time. The Last Judgment is often contrasted with the personal judgment that each person faces at the end of life, but almost all Protestants believe that the last merely confirms the personal judgment: God does not change his mind in the meantime. But then where is the soul between the time of our personal death and the general resurrection at the end of time? Protestants have all eschewed the Catholic idea of purgatory, so that opinion varies from the soul’s being in some sort of interim state before rejoining its body to a view that at our death we are lifted from time into eternity, the moment of our death being also the moment of our resurrection. Some, particularly nineteenth-century pietists, believed that the souls are with us as our companions.

Both time and space are problematic: where are heaven and hell? Early Protestant views were in line with previous Christian ones that the earth was a sphere at the center of the cosmos, with hell inside of it, and heaven beyond all the spheres of moon, sun, and stars. Such views became untenable and unnecessary with the discoveries of modern astronomy, since which most educated Protestants believe that heaven (and hell) are not “out there” anywhere in the physical cosmos but in another mode of being entirely, sometimes within us, sometimes in another spiritual dimension.

What does heaven mean? Is it a radical change and transformation to something far beyond our experience? Are we made perfect by union with God, by our fulfillment as individuals, or as the perfection of community? Does it mean that we are absorbed into God, or that we encounter him intensely face to face, or that we are fulfilled to our utmost perfection as individuals? If it is the last, how old will we be, and in what state of mind or body? Will we feel ourselves “individuals” at all, recognizing our families and friends as our own? Will we be so bound to one another in love that heaven is more a realization of community than of self? If the point of life is to love God and neighbor, is heaven the fulfillment of that love to the point that differences dissolve in a more perfect union? If heaven is a community, on what level do we feel that community—our families and friends, our congregation, our geographical community, the whole earth, or the whole cosmos? Is everyone equal in heaven or are some closer to God, some deeper in love, than others? John Calvin made it clear that whatever differences in earthly station and authority exist between us, they will not exist in heaven, where the only ruler is Christ.

Does perfection in heaven mean stasis or a dynamic motion to ever more perfect perfection? Will we be in an eternal state of unchanging glory or will we continue to know more, feel more, love more, even serve more? Sixteenth-century reformers tended to see heaven as an eternal moment of praise and adoration of God; many nineteenth-century pietists believed that if salvation was achieved through good works, then surely good works (service to God and others) must continue in the other life.

Going to Heaven or Hell

How does one go to heaven or hell? Better put, how does one come to be in the state of soul and character that is heaven or hell? Does this occur by complete predestination, where God eternally determines which persons are in which state, by human free will to choose, or by God's foreknowledge that our free choice sometimes chooses hell? In complete predestination, God damns to eternal hell those whom he does not choose to save; in other views, damnation is our own free choice to live in an evil state. Is divine grace the source of our salvation, as the original reformers insisted, or are works the source, as nineteenth- and twentieth-century pietists believed? The pietists placed an unusually strong emphasis on the reward and punishment aspect of the afterlife: if you choose to do good works, you will be saved. A quite different position among sixteenth-century radicals, and recently gaining great popularity among liberal Protestants, is universalism, the theology that everyone is saved and everything is purified and redeemed at the end. Very rare, however, has been any view that you can change your mind after you die; rather, this is the life that God gives us and in this life we eternally form our character.

Biblical descriptions of heaven are lavish with music, gems, gold, light, brilliance; descriptions of hell describe fire, sulfur, torture, and darkness. Some Protestants, perhaps not realizing that in thinking about heaven and hell we are limited by human imagination and words in trying to understand what is beyond all our capacities to know, take these descriptions as physical truth. From the beginning of Christianity, all sorts of details (woods, fountains, dancing, and so on) have been added, particularly by groups such as the Latter-Day Saints, whose heaven is extremely physical. The physicality of heaven derives not only from the specific biblical descriptions but also from the biblical doctrine of resurrection. We rise in our bodies (however transcended); that concept has continually raised questions of food and sex, as well as other bodily functions. More abstractly inclined Protestants are content with the idea that heaven is essentially the full presence of everyone and everything transfused by God and without defect, while hell is the state of absence of all these qualities. In most views, heaven is a place that is dynamic rather than static, so that it must have some sort of real metaphorical time, for metaphor does not mean distance from reality.

References and Further Reading:

Bernstein, Alan. The Formation of Hell. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993.

McDannell, Colleen, and Bernhard Lang. Heaven: A History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1988.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. A History of Heaven. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1997.

Zaleski, Carol, and Philip Zaleski, The Book of Heaven. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

JEFFREY BURTON RUSSELL

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH (1770–1831)

German philosopher. Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel was born on August 27, 1770, in Stuttgart, Germany. His father was an administrative official in the Württemberg ducal bureaucracy. Hegel attended the Protestant seminary (Stift) at Tübingen for five years beginning in 1788, most likely with plans to enter either the clergy or the civil service. On graduation from Tübingen he worked as a private tutor in Bern (1793–1796) and Frankfurt (1797–1800). His father died in 1799, leaving Hegel an inheritance that allowed him to pursue what had in the meantime become his chief interest, philosophy. In 1801 he secured a teaching position at Jena and taught there until 1806. FRIEDRICH W.J.VON SCHELLING (1775–1854) was teaching there as well and the two collaborated on the Kritisches Journal der Philosophie (Critical Journal of Philosophy) until Schelling departed Jena in 1803. In 1801 Hegel published a book on the difference between Johann G.Fichte and Schelling. As a result of their collaboration on the Critical Journal and the 1801 book Hegel was publicly regarded as a disciple of Schelling; however, in 1807 Hegel published Phänomenologie des Geistes (Phenomenology of Spirit), which marked an intellectual and personal break with Schelling and set Hegel on the path of becoming one of the premier philosophers of Germany.

In late 1806 Hegel lost his position at Jena when the university was shut down in the wake of the Battle of Jena. From 1807 until 1808 he supported himself by editing a newspaper in Bamberg. From 1808 until 1816 he was rector of and professor at a gymnasium (i.e., school) in Nuremberg. While at Nuremberg he published the Science of Logic (volume one in 1811–1812; volume two in 1816). He married in 1811. From 1816 until 1818 he was a professor at Heidelberg. There he published, in 1817, Enzyklopädie der Philosophischen Wissenschaften (Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences in Outline), his “system.” From 1818 until his death, on November 14, 1831 (from cholera), he was a professor in the philosophical faculty in Berlin. During his Berlin years Hegel published only one new book, Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts (Outlines of the Philosophy of Right 1821). However, he also prepared second and third editions of the Encyclopedia (1827 and 1830) and at the time of his death was nearly finished with a second edition of the Wissenschaft der Logik (Science of Logic). After his death, his lectures on the philosophy of history, history of philosophy, philosophy of religion, and philosophy of art were published by his followers.

Hegel in Context

To grasp Hegel's relation to and importance for Protestant thought, it is necessary to see him in his intellectual and political context. Hegel's era was a time of heightened theological tension. In the previous generation Christian theology had been shaken to its roots by the combination of historical criticism of the BIBLE and creeds and by rationalism. In addition the 1780s witnessed the so-called pantheism controversy, when Friedrich H. Jacobi published his account of conversations he had had with GOTTHOLD E. LESSING. In this account he revealed Lessing's sympathies with Benedict Spinoza, who was commonly thought to have been a pantheist. Lessing's declaration seemed to be an endorsement of this pantheism. A decade later Johann Fichte was forced to resign his professorship at Jena because of accusations that his philosophy supported atheism. In Hegel's day most theological responses to these issues took one of three forms. First, there was a resurgence of confessional ORTHODOXY, buttressed by the support of a militant and doctrinally conservative PIETISM and emphasizing a traditional conception of the supernatural. Leading representatives included FRIEDRICH A. G. THOLUCK and Ernst W. Hengstenberg. Second, there was an accommodation to the deistic critique of Christianity (see DEISM). This resulted in a rationalistic and reductionistic form of theology in which the supernatural was largely if not totally eliminated. Julius A. L. Wegscheider and Karl G. Bretschneider represented this option. Third, there was an attempt to rethink theology in the light of romantic impulses. In practice this meant reinterpreting doctrines as verbal expressions of a noncognitive intuition of God. FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER was the outstanding representative of this tendency. The theological tensions were exacerbated by related political issues. Hegel's adult life spanned a revolutionary era, from the beginnings of the French revolution in 1789 to the European-wide uprisings in 1830. For the most part, these revolutionary movements aimed at introducing liberal-democratic reforms, which Hegel supported. Between these revolutions stood the reactionary Congress of Vienna (1815) that, upon the final defeat of Napoleon, restored to power the feudal aristocracies that had been dethroned as a result of Napoleonic reforms. The result of this political ferment in the Germany of Hegel's day was an increasingly conservative political climate that sought to return to the union of CHURCH AND STATE that characterized the prerevolutionary era. The effect was a renewed emphasis on orthodox theology and on the suppression of politically dangerous ideas. These trends meant trouble for Hegel in particular because he supported and was supported by the liberal reformers of politics, church, and education who increasingly found themselves out of step with the aristocratic power structure (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM).

Although Hegel proposed a philosophical resolution to the theological problems of the day, he believed that his philosophy was nonetheless grounded in the central tenets of Lutheran theology. This conviction is illustrated by an event in 1826. In the course of a lecture, Hegel made some disparaging remarks about the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER). Called to account by the educational authorities Hegel responded in a letter that justified his views on the basis of their faithfulness to Lutheran theology. Further, he declared his pride in having been baptized and raised a Lutheran and professed his intent to remain one. That Hegel's remarks were not merely defensive posturing to avoid trouble can be seen from his affirmative remarks about LUTHERANISM and, more generally, Protestantism in his lectures on the philosophy of history and the history of philosophy.

However, in spite of his professed loyalty to and admiration of the Lutheran tradition, Hegel did not present his philosophy as simply a restatement of that tradition's theology. On the contrary, the relation between theology and Hegel's philosophy is complex and subtle. On the one hand he believed that Christian DOCTRINE is based on revelation and contains the truth about God. The content of theology and philosophy is the same, that is, the truth. On the other hand, he held that there are grave problems with the usual exposition of these doctrines, which conveys the true content of religion in a highly unsuitable and misleading form. The key to grasping Hegel's view is to understand the distinction he made between conceptual thinking (begreifen) and imaginative thinking (vorstellen) in theology.

Imaginative thinking is the typical form in which theological doctrine presents its subject matter. Although it is a genuine form of thought, in it we think by means of images drawn from sensation. For example, the doctrine of the Trinity employs the familial relation between father and son. In this case, the eternal divine life is portrayed with images drawn from daily experience. However, these images are wholly inadequate to the task of knowing the truth. The only possibility for obtaining knowledge, he believed, was to give doctrine a scientific form attained through pure conceptual thinking, that is, through philosophy.

Hegelian Dialectics

To understand why only conceptual thinking provides the adequate form for truth, it is necessary to come terms with Hegel's view of dialectics. Hegel was convinced that actuality is marked by movement that embraces unity and diversity. Organic life, for instance, is a process whereby a seed becomes a plant. There is a dialectical relation between the seed and the plant because although they are in an important sense distinct, there is also an important sense in which they are one. The oneness consists in the fact that seed and plant are two steps in a movement that encompasses them both. In our ordinary thinking we distinguish the seed from the plant as two things; that is, we focus on the distinction between the two. However, we miss the underlying movement (seed to plant) that is their unity and, if we think dialectically (i.e., conceptually), then we grasp the unity as well as the distinctions (seed, plant as well as the movement of seed to plant). Conceptual thinking is therefore itself a dialectical movement. In conceptual thinking we think according to the pattern of actuality. In it, the form of our thinking is identical with the form of actual being. In ordinary understanding and imaginative thinking, however, the form of our thinking does not match the form of actuality and therefore is inadequate to the truth.

What is true of organic life is true of all actualities, including God. (Hegel typically wrote of absolute spirit and not God. God is not identical to absolute spirit in Hegel's philosophy; however, for the sake of exposition, "God" will be used.) The eternal divine life is a dialectical movement. The doctrine of the Trinity, with its affirmation of relations of origin among Father, Son, and Spirit, is a theological statement of that dialectical movement. Accordingly, the doctrine of the Trinity possesses the truth about God. Unfortunately theologians employ imaginative thinking and not conceptual thinking when they expound the doctrine. Just as, in the case of seed and plant, ordinary understanding puts the emphasis on distinctions and misses the movement that is the unity, so in the case of the Trinity theologians normally emphasize the distinctions of the Trinitarian persons (insofar as they regard them as individually existent personal beings) and miss the dialectical and unifying movement that encompasses the persons. So, although the doctrine of the Trinity contains the truth about God, its theological exposition has always been wholly inadequate. An adequate form for this doctrine requires conceptual thinking. Only this form of thinking is identical with the dialectical character of the divine life and can be said to state the truth in a scientific form.

Hegel's views about conceptual thinking help explain his irritation with the theological tendencies of his day. Although sympathetic with the rational approach of the ENLIGHTENMENT, Hegel scorned the proclivity of rationalistic theologians to reject doctrines such as the Trinity because of their supposedly irrational character. In doing so, Hegel charged, they were emptying religion of all content and thus forsaking the truth. They could do so only because the reasoning they employed was not conceptual thinking but in-stead merely ordinary understanding. Hegel was likewise dismayed by Schleiermacher (who lectured in the theological faculty at Berlin and with whom Hegel carried on a running public controversy) and the pietistic theologians. By emphasizing feeling and intuition and making them the source of theology, they too had emptied religion of content. In addition they gave the cause of science a bad name by deprecating human reason. Not surprisingly Hegel believed that he was rescuing the truth of religion from the depredations of contemporary theologians. As he once stated, not only was philosophy in his day orthodox—only philosophy (i.e., his philosophy) was orthodox.

Responses to Hegel

Hegel's estimate of his own orthodoxy was not universally shared. In particular his tenure in Berlin was marked by charges of pantheism and atheism. The basis of these charges was Hegel's understanding of God's relation to the universe. Hegel understood this relation dialectically. Just as seed and plant are best thought of, not as distinct things, but instead as two aspects of a larger movement, so God and the universe are not distinct entities but are dialectically related. The universe is, in some sense, an aspect of the divine life. God attains actuality through the world-process. Although Hegel was clear that God is not simply identical with the world, the qualified and dialectical identity he affirmed was still too much for conservative theologians.

However, not all theologians were opposed to Hegel. There were two influential theologians in particular who converted to Hegel's views and formed an important part of the Hegelian school of the 1820s and 1830s: PHILIPP MARHEINEKE (1780–1846, professor in Berlin) and Carl Daub (1765–1836, professor in Heidelberg). It was Marheineke who, after Hegel's death, produced the first edition of Hegel's lectures on the philosophy of religion in an attempt to fix Hegel's meaning and settle differences in interpretation. Unfortunately, in the judgment of his peers Marheineke's editorial procedures were deficient; however, a revised edition by BRUNO BAUER also did not settle the disputes. Daub, Marheineke, and, initially, Bauer emphasized the side of Hegel's philosophy that affirmed the identity of content between theology and philosophy. In other words, they were, within the confines of Hegel's school, conservative. A radical application of Hegel's thought to theology emerged after Hegel's death when DAVID F. STRAUSS (1808–1874), LUDWIG FEUERBACH (1804–1872), and others began emphasizing the inadequacy of theology's imaginative thinking. It was the atheistic conclusions of this group that induced the Prussian government to call Schelling to Berlin in 1841 to combat the pernicious effects of Hegel's philosophy. At length it was not Schelling's lectures that diminished the influence of Hegel's philosophy but rather shifting philosophical tendencies as in the next generation Germany experienced the rise of scientific materialism and a revival of interest in IMMANUEL KANT'S philosophy. Nonetheless vestiges of Hegel's philosophy can be seen in the work of such contemporary Protestant theologians as JÜRGEN MOLTMANN and WOLFHART PANNENBERG.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. The Difference between Fichte 's and Schelling 's System of Philosophy. Translated by H.S. Harris and Walter Cerf. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1977.
- . Encyclopedia of the Philosophical Sciences in Outline, and Critical Writings. Edited by Ernst Behler. New York: Continuum, 1990
- . Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion. Introduction and The Concept of Religion, vol. 1; Determinate Religion, vol. 2; The Consummate Religion, vol. 3. Edited by Peter C. Hodgson and translated by R.F. Brown, et al. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1984.
- . Phenomenology of Spirit. Translated by A.V. Miller. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1977.
- . Philosophy of History. New York: Dover, 1956.
- . Hegel, the Letters. Translated by Clark Butler and Christiane Seiler. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1984.
- . Hegel's Philosophy of Right. Translated by T.M. Knox. London: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- . Hegel's Science of Logic. Translated by W.H. Johnston and L.G. Struthers. London: G. Allen & Unwin Ltd., 1951.

Secondary Sources:

- Dickey, Laurence. "Hegel on Religion and Philosophy." In The Cambridge Companion to Hegel. Edited by Frederick C. Beiser. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Hodgson, Peter C. "Hegel's Christology: Shifting Nuances in the Berlin Lectures." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 53 no. 1 (1985): 23–40.

Jaeschke, Walter. Reason in Religion: The Foundations of Hegel's Philosophy of Religion.

Translated by Michael Steward and Peter C.Hodgson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

Merklinger, Philip M. Philosophy, Theology, and Hegel's Berlin Philosophy of Religion, 1821–1827. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993.

Steppelevich, Lawrence S. "Hegel and Roman Catholicism." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 60 (1992): 673–691.

SAMUEL M.POWELL

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM OF 1563

Efforts to introduce the REFORMATION into the Palatinate began late, and their success depended on the cogency of a catechetical document that could avoid the controversies that had embroiled various parties in the early decades of the Reformation. In a region in which Lutheran and Reformed claimed a sympathetic presence, a CATECHISM appealing to both loyalties promised to be the most effective. For a number of reasons, there were far fewer catechisms than confessions in the sixteenth century (see CONFESSIO). They were meant for the LAITY and their rudimentary question-and-answer style provided little room for detailed discussion of semantic or doctrinal points. At the same time the simplicity and clarity demanded by the genre guaranteed that the successful catechism would gain broad acceptance indeed.

The Heidelberg Catechism was the work of a committee that included the Wittenberg graduate Zacharius Ursinus (1534–1583), JOHN CALVIN'S protégé Caspar Olevian (1536–1587), and members of the THEOLOGY faculty at Heidelberg. They sought to combine the best parts of a number of current catechetical texts, including Calvin's own 1545 GENEVA CATECHISM, a possible model despite the desire of the Palatine prince Frederick III for an instructional manual on biblical foundations that was visibly independent of Genevan influence. The Catechism accomplished several goals: in its simplicity it made the essentials of evangelical faith accessible to all, and it did this with a collage of biblical terms that instilled much of the sacred text into the youthful mind of the reader.

In 129 questions spread out over a cycle of a year of Sundays, divided into three sections on human misery, redemption, and thankfulness, the Catechism offers a succinct summary of evangelical FAITH. Intended for the theologically unsophisticated layperson, it presupposes little knowledge of the BIBLE or of the dogmatic TRADITION. Instead it appeals to the believer's awareness of original SIN; a sense of hopelessness before a righteous deity; and a divinely granted zeal to live a life of holiness, here termed thankfulness. Hence from the first question onward, Jesus Christ is termed a savior and redeemer of a radically sinful humanity, an agent of the Father's redemptive will, whose ATONEMENT for humanity is made certain for the regenerate by the work of the Holy Spirit.

The first part of the Catechism, "On human misery," identifies revealed law as the means to recognize one's sinfulness; the command to love God and neighbor reveals the total extent of original sin. The rudimentary level of discussion called for a simplicity that suggests a more radical stance on many of the positions being articulated than one finds in contemporary confessions. The answers to questions about human sinfulness, for example, state with unequivocal clarity that humanity fell into a state of “hating” God and neighbor (q. 5), not simply being disinclined or impeded in loving them, as lengthier or subtler expositions of faith during these years tended to hold.

The second section, concerning human redemption, similarly presents its affirmations phrased with a sometimes disarming simplicity. Continuity between the faith of the Old Covenant or Testament and the New is underscored in a number of ways. The promise of redemption that constitutes the gospel, for example, is described as having been revealed in Eden and preserved by the patriarchs and prophets, then finally and fully revealed in Jesus Christ.

In addition to filtering a great deal of scriptural language, the Catechism also adopts the terminology of classic creedal statements, ensuring the catechumen’s familiarity with part of the ancient tradition. The Nicene Creed in fact provides many of the questions of the second part of the Catechism; many of the questions ask for explanations of individual clauses of the Creed. In keeping with its intention of inclusiveness, the Catechism underscores the communion in Christ of the members of the church. It is Christ who gathers and preserves the members of the true church (q. 54), those who are justified solely by their faith in him (q. 60).

Under the third rubric, thankfulness, the Catechism provides precepts for the life of the regenerate Christian. In keeping with the Reformed doctrine of the role of Law in a life of SANCTIFICATION—that the justified Christian returns to the Law as a guide for a life—this final section is organized around the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, and the Lord’s Prayer, the answers serving as a running commentary to those texts.

The rhetorical simplicity of the Catechism leaves unexplained certain points of DOCTRINE. Regarding the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER), for example, the bread and wine are not said to be transformed into the body and blood of Christ, although they are called that in the customary use of sacramental language (q. 78). Given the intensity of controversies over the Eucharist during these years, such a facile explanation was sure to arouse, rather than quell, discord over the meaning of the terms “body” and “blood.” Several departures from contemporary Reformed symbolic documents are notable indications of the Catechism’s eclecticism, inclusiveness, or both. The doctrine of PREDESTINATION, also already a topic of intense dispute, is absent; in its place is an affirmation of God’s providential care for all creatures (q. 27).

Regardless of its conciliatory intentions, publication of the Catechism brought a flurry of controversy, especially from theologians like the Lutherans Tilemann Heshusius (1527–1559) and MATTHIAS FLACIUS (1520–1575) who saw “ungodliness” and “idolatry” in the use of ALTARS, baptismal fonts, crucifixes, and the like. They urged superintendents to monitor devotional life at the parish level to prevent the restoration of such deviations. It was partially in defense of his work that Ursinus composed a massive Commentary to the Catechism, which explained in great detail the positions stated succinctly in the original document. The clarifications of Reformed doctrine in the Commentary defined some of the enduring divisions between the Lutheran and Reformed confessions.

See also Calvinism; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

Cochrane, Arthur C, ed. Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1966.

Ursinus, Zacharias. The Commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism. Translated by G.W. Willard. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1956.

Visser, Derk. Zacharias Ursinus. New York: United Church Press, 1983.

RALPH KEEN

HELVETIC CONFESSION

The Second Helvetic Confession (1562) was in one sense the successor to the 1536 document, known as the First Helvetic Confession (sometimes also called the Second Confession of Basel), prepared at Basel under the aegis of HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575) and others. In more important ways, however, it stands with the Reformed confessional enterprise of the 1560s as another effort to consolidate doctrines in dispute and protect the church from internal strife and political threat. The dangers were all too real in the wake of religious wars, the proceedings of the stillsitting Council of Trent, and divisions within LUTHERANISM that threatened to undermine a branch of the REFORMATION that many Swiss Evangelicals still looked to as a model.

Anticipating the end of his active career as a Reformer in Zurich, Bullinger in 1561 began to prepare a "brief exposition" of the faith as a theological last will. The resulting CONFESSION was anything but brief, but it was clear and comprehensive, the mature work of an influential theologian's studies and pastoral experience. It would in time be embraced by churches in the Swiss cantons and beyond; and it earned endorsement in SCOTLAND, Holland, POLAND, Bohemia, and HUNGARY.

Affirming the necessity and sufficiency of scripture as DOCTRINE, and stating that the word of God is the preached word, the Confession acknowledges the guidance of the ancient Fathers in biblical interpretation, while dismissing from the church any purely human traditions, such as the use of images and the hierarchical ordering of clerical ranks. Thus the four christological creeds of the fourth and fifth centuries are accepted as valid confessions of faith, as are "all similar" symbolic documents, their truth being in their faith rather than the AUTHORITY of the assemblies that promulgated them. Ministers are called to the common service, as equals, to the work of PREACHING the word of God, administering the SACRAMENTS, and ensuring order within the church by means of suitable discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE).

The Confession's doctrine of God preserves traces of Bullinger's predecessor, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, whose Platonist affinities are found, for example, in the definition of God. Without abandoning the more anthropomorphic definitions grounded in biblical depictions of divine activity, the deity of the Second Helvetic Confession is a self-sufficient, eternal and infinite, necessarily (but inexplicably) existing highest good, manifested in three eternally distinct Persons, differentiated by their properties. Predictably, however, the THEOLOGY of the Confession is predominantly shaped by the exegetical tradition and centered on the doctrines of SIN and GRACE. The human condition being one of sin, in which persons freely choose evil, reconciliation through Christ is the only path to God.

As with evangelical confessions generally, the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION is the core teaching here. In chapter 15 of the Confession, faith in Christ is the sole source of righteousness; it is given rather than earned; and it does not imply any sharing in Christ's own righteousness. The believer experiences CONVERSION, and in so doing understands that both conversion and absolution are divine gifts (ch. 14). The regenerate believer remains in a state of sin, but the freedom and temptation to do evil have been weakened, and the experience of grace replaces the condemnation of the law. Despite the insistence on righteousness being only imputed or reckoned, rather than granted or actually bestowed, the regenerate Christian's FAITH is an active one, and the believer is driven to works of piety and charity. Since the beginning of the Reformation opponents had read "faith alone" to mean that mere assent was sufficient for SALVATION. Bullinger takes pains to correct that impression.

The CHURCH, in the words of the Confession, is a truly catholic (or universal) communion of the faithful, although there may be members of a given congregation who are not part of this invisible church. Condemning the claim to "catholicity" of the Roman church, the Confession holds that the universality of the true church is not measured in tangible extent and numbers. Rather the body of true believers may at times be so marginal as to escape notice, and judgment, by the larger population of the unregenerate who may falsely imagine themselves the true church. In the light of continuing controversies and condemnations, identifying the Reformed churches as a minority threatened with persecution helped to brand their opponents as among the reprobate.

Few doctrines were more intractable to mediating efforts than that of the Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER), but here Bullinger's conciliatory stance is most evident. Holding, in common with other evangelical confessions, that sacraments consist of a divine word of promise and an outward sign intended to seal and strengthen it, the Confession recognizes only the dominically instituted rites of BAPTISM and Eucharist as sacraments, and denies that they can be made holy by a priestly consecration or are able to communicate holiness to the recipient. Steering a course between the Real Presence of the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches and the sacramentarianism of Zwingli and others, the Confession holds that the body and blood of Christ are consumed in the Eucharist, but in a spiritual rather than a physical manner. The eating of the bread and drinking of the wine are necessary parts of the rite, but the material elements are mere signs of the spiritual realities that make the Eucharist a sacrament.

The language of COVENANT plays a significant role in the Confession, in part to link the church to the people of the Old Testament. Although two peoples are acknowledged, they are described as being united within a single Messianic fellowship (ch. 17). Likewise, the Confession holds that the sacraments were given to both peoples, insofar as both received a word of promise and external signs to seal the promise, but that the signs of the ancient sacraments were replaced by baptism and the Eucharist. In emphasizing the continuity of the covenantal relationship with God, the Confession contributed to the federal theology of later decades and centuries.

See also Counter-Reformation

References and Further Reading

Cochrane, Arthur C, ed. Reformed Confessions of the 16th Century. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1966.

Koch, Ernst. Die Theologie der Confessio Helvetica Posterior. Neukirchen, Germany: Neukirchener Verlag, 1968.

RALPH KEEN

HENRY VIII (1491–1547)

English king. The second son of Henry VII (1457–1509) and Elizabeth of York, Henry ascended the English throne on his father's death in 1509, his elder brother Arthur having predeceased them in 1502. Physically imposing and intellectually gifted, Henry devoted his early years as king to war, hunting, and the life of the court. He read and spoke several languages, including Latin, and was an able singer and dancer. Although he left the minutiae of government to his ministers (especially Cardinal Wolsey [1475–1530] in the 1510s and 1520s; and THOMAS CROMWELL [1599–1658] in the 1530s), he was always in control. He was initially devoted to his first wife, Catherine of Aragon (1485–1536), but her sad sequence of ill-fated pregnancies (which left only one surviving child, a daughter, Mary Tudor, born in 1516), took its toll on his affections, though for a king he was but moderately unfaithful. Fiscal exhaustion after a decade of intermittent and largely fruitless war with FRANCE (1512–1524), combined with concern for the security of the dynasty in the absence of a male heir, put the succession and domestic policy at the head of his agenda from 1527 until 1540. With the succession secured by the birth of a son, Edward, to his third wife, Jane Seymour (1509–1537), in 1537, he was able to relive his youthful pursuit of glory in the 1540s with invasions of both SCOTLAND and France. There were no further children from his subsequent marriages, in which he experienced disappointment with Anne of Cleves (1515–1557) and betrayal with Catherine Howard (1520–1542), before finding contentment in old age with Catherine Parr (1512–1548).

Henry VIII and Protestantism

Henry VIII was no Protestant—a word that was barely entering the English language when he died in 1547, and was, in any case, hardly applicable to him. Zealous, if conventional, in his piety (he often heard several masses a day, especially when not hunting), he always took an educated interest in theology. Preachers of the highest caliber were summoned to his court, and throughout his life he enjoyed theological discussion with scholars such as John Colet (1466–1519), Thomas More (1478–1535), and HUGH LATIMER (1485–1555). His theological awareness led him to challenge MARTIN

LUTHER'S (1483–1546) Babylonian Captivity of the Church with a refutation, the Assertio Septem Sacramentorum (Assertion of the Seven Sacraments) published in 1521. Henry was thus one of Luther's earliest opponents, and he mobilized the scholars of England in the same cause, with John Fisher (1469–1535) and Thomas More the best known of those who wrote against the early Protestants at his behest. Henry's book (not entirely his unaided work, with Thomas More generally mentioned) was stylishly written, but held few surprises. It barely even touched on justification by faith alone, concentrating instead on the eucharist and the sacrifice of the mass, which always remained close to his heart. Luther's vitriolic reply left Henry with an abiding hatred of the German Reformer.

Although REFORMATION doctrines made some headway in ENGLAND in the early 1520s, mostly through the circulation of Latin works in educated circles, it was not until William Tyndale (1495–1536) published an English New Testament in 1525 that combating Protestantism at home became a pressing concern for Henry's government. Concern was heightened by the discovery of a suspected Protestant, Robert Barnes, at Cambridge University, and Henry appointed John Fisher to preach at his recantation in February 1526. Tyndale's first edition was mostly intercepted and burned (only two copies survive), but aided by sympathizers among the wealthy London merchants, he went on publishing and distributing his New Testament and began producing pamphlets advocating Protestant ideas. Henry's bishops began to find Protestants in their dioceses (scholars and clerics at first, but from about 1530 layfolk also), and Thomas More famously wrote against the new doctrines in English. When Henry appointed him Lord Chancellor in 1529, government action against Protestants intensified. Thomas More was personally involved in prosecutions, and in 1530 helped Henry and his bishops draft proclamations banning a growing list of dissident publications. Tudor justice was harsh, and the first of many Protestants to be executed in England under Henry was Thomas Hitton, burned at Maidstone in 1530 (the penalty of burning was already in force for the native heresy of Lollardy).

The fortunes of English Protestantism changed in the 1530s because of the king's need to separate from his first wife and remarry in the hope of begetting a male heir. Because ITALY was dominated by Emperor Charles V, Catherine of Aragon's nephew, it was impossible for Pope Clement VII (1478–1534) to grant the annulment of the marriage sought by Henry. In the early 1530s Henry began to consider unilateral action. He bullied the English clergy into supporting him, forcing them first to recognize him as their supreme head (which they grudgingly admitted in 1531 "as far as the law of Christ allows") and then to concede him a veto over ecclesiastical legislation (1532). This move led to the resignation of Thomas More, which took some of the edge off the English persecution of Protestants (although the bishop of London, John Stokesley, carried on the fight). What gradually improved conditions for Protestantism in England was the influence on the king of three people at the heart of "the king's great matter": Anne Boleyn (1504–1536), whom he married around January 1533; Thomas Cromwell, who emerged as the king's leading adviser in these years and masterminded the separation; and THOMAS CRANMER (1489–1556), who in 1532 was recalled from Nuremberg (where he had been ambassador to Charles V) to be the new arch bishop of Canterbury, and who actually granted the "divorce" in April 1533. All three were, to varying degrees, interested in what at the time was often called the "new learning."

The break with Rome, which sealed Henry's separation from Catherine and remarriage, was enacted in a series of laws, most importantly the Act of Supremacy (1534), which recognized Henry in unqualified terms as the "Supreme Head on Earth under Christ of the Church of England." This change was implemented through an unprecedented program, of preaching and propaganda, which opened the door to Protestant influence. Even during the campaign for the divorce, Henry's government had canvassed support from English Protestant scholars who had fled abroad, such as Tyndale and Barnes. Now, the most enthusiastic preachers and writers against the papacy were precisely those who were attracted to evangelical doctrine: men such as Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Shaxton (chaplains to Anne Boleyn), Thomas Swynnerton, and Thomas Garrett. Shaxton and Latimer soon became bishops, and it is noteworthy that during Anne's three years as queen, all but one of the nine men made bishops were identifiably evangelical in their sympathies. Despite Anne's fall in 1536, Cromwell and Cranmer continued to nudge Henry in a Protestant direction. Cromwell certainly saw the potential of the Protestant Reformation for consolidating the royal supremacy. Lutheran themes of political obedience, first introduced to an English public by William Tyndale, were taken over wholesale by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. In 1535 and 1536 there was talk of PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560) coming to England, and from then until 1538 the English government carried on negotiations for a political and theological alliance with the Schmalkaldic League.

Although Henry's hatred for Luther was undiminished, conditions for evangelicals improved. The stringent heresy laws were relaxed in 1534, and for some years no moderate evangelical Protestants were burned in England. Most importantly, official policy against permitting the Bible in English was gradually reversed. Cranmer was lobbying Henry VIII for this as early as 1534. Miles Coverdale's (1487–1569) first complete English Bible, printed abroad in 1535, was dedicated to Henry in real hope. In 1536 the first royal injunctions for the Church of England instructed parishes to obtain an English Bible, a message endorsed by the second injunctions of 1538. By this time an officially sanctioned version was in print, and 1539 saw the publication of Henry VIII's "Great Bible," with a programmatic Holbein woodcut on the titlepage depicting the king handing down God's word to his grateful people. Cromwell was given a monopoly license to enable him to control the Bible business, and during his ascendancy Protestant books were, for the first time, printed in England. Indeed, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION was translated and printed in 1536 with a dedication to Cromwell himself. The translator, Richard Taverner, made his way in royal service under Cromwell's patronage and a few years later dedicated to Henry a translation of the strongly evangelical Commonplaces of Erasmus Sarcerius. Cromwell and Cranmer protected and promoted evangelical preachers, and evangelical notes were even sounded in official statements on doctrine such as the Ten Articles of 1536 and the Bishops' Book of 1537.

While the boundaries of heresy had been shifted, they had not been torn down. Henry's deep devotion to the Blessed Sacrament meant that native Lollardy and the more radical teaching of the Sacramentarians (disciples of HULDRUCH ZWINGLI [1484–1531] and later JOHN CALVIN [1509–1564] who denied the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the eucharistic host) remained anathema. Even more disturbing were the teachings of the Anabaptists, who began to appear in England after the collapse of the kingdom of Munster in 1534. A dozen Dutch men and women were burned in various towns in 1535. In 1538, action against Anabaptists was intensified. Henry issued a proclamation ordering them to leave the country on pain of death, and set up a commission including both conservatives and evangelicals to search them out. At much the same time he became more concerned with the Sacramentarians. His proclamation against the Anabaptists was promulgated on the very day he presided at the show-trial of John Lambert. Lambert robustly defended his denial of the real presence (which broadly followed the teachings of Zwingli and John Frith), although under the circumstances he was doomed before he started. Henry himself argued against Lambert and, having urged him in vain to recant, personally pronounced the death sentence.

The Lambert case heralded a chill in the climate for English Protestants. Theological negotiations with the Schmalkaldic League, despite hopeful early signs, had foundered on Henry VIII's intransigence over, for example, the sacrifice of the mass and clerical celibacy. As a potential Catholic crusade seemed to loom in 1538, Henry responded by emphasizing the more conservative aspects of his religious settlement. These moves culminated in the Act of Six Articles (1539), which enshrined specific aspects of Catholicism in English law and laid down death by burning for those who denied TRANSUBSTANTIATION. As a result, although persecution was aimed chiefly against Sacramentarians and Anabaptists, moderate evangelicals had less room for maneuvering in the 1540s than in the 1530s. Many fled the country, and Protestant books once more had to be printed abroad. The King's Book of 1543 was more conservative in tone than its predecessor, the Bishops' Book; restrictions were placed on the reading of the English Bible; and censorship of Protestant literature was renewed.

Henry's personal religious beliefs after 1535 are somewhat enigmatic. Both Catholics and Protestants felt it worth dedicating books to him, and Cranmer tells us how the king dealt with these gifts. He rarely read them himself, but passed them to scholarly clerics around the court for comment, carefully soliciting views from representatives of both the (traditional) "old learning" and the (evangelical) "new learning." This self-conscious balancing of old and new in theology was typical of Henry's later years. It can be seen, for example, in his establishment of the six preachers in Canterbury Cathedral, where he chose three men of the old learning to balance three of the new; and more grimly in 1540 when, in a gesture of ecumenical intolerance, he despatched three Protestants to the stake for heresy, literally, side-by-side with three Catholics to the scaffold for treason. This idiosyncratic aspect of Henry's mature religious views and practices is best summed up in his will. Notoriously, this requested the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary and all the saints, and provided for thousands of masses for his soul. It is less well known that its preamble was rich in the themes of evangelical theology.

Although the last years of Henry's reign are often described as a period of conservative reaction, not all Protestants found conditions intolerable. Sacramentarians and Anabaptists remained vulnerable to burning, but few evangelicals met this fate. There was a conservative attempt to turn the king against Cranmer by revealing how far he was promoting Protestantism in Kent, but it backfired. Meanwhile, Henry's last marriage, to Catherine Parr, brought him once more under the influence of a moderate evangelical, and he entrusted the education of Edward and Elizabeth to Cambridge scholars (such as John Cheke [1514–1557]) who stood at the evangelical end of the spectrum of permitted beliefs. Evangelicals were ensconced at Henry's court and held office in his church. If the religious temper of the country as a whole was far from Protestant, the damage he had inflicted upon traditional Catholicism had at least opened a door to further change. Henry VIII was no Protestant himself, but his reign was the reason that Protestantism was in other people.

References and Further Reading

- Fraenkel, P., ed. Henry VIII, Assertio Septem Sacramentorum. Münster: Aschendorff, 1992.
- MacCulloch, D., ed. The Reign of Henry VIII: Politics, Policy and Piety. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1995.
- . Thomas Cranmer: A Life, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1996.
- Rex, Richard. Henry VIII and the English Reformation. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1993.
- . “The English Campaign Against Luther in the 1520s,” Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series, 39 (1989): 85–106.
- Scarisbrick, J.J. Henry VIII. London: Ayre and Spottiswoode, 1968.

RICHARD REX

HENRY, CARL F.H. (1913–)

Theologian, professor, editor, and writer. Henry is widely recognized as one of the outstanding leaders and intellectual spokesman for American evangelical Christianity of the twentieth century (see EVANGELICALISM). Born of German immigrant parents in New York City on January 22, 1913, and raised in Central Islip, Long Island, Henry overcame the religious indifference of his upbringing with an experience of a personal CONVERSION in 1933. This event led to his affiliation with a Baptist congregation (see BAPTISTS), the end of his brief newspaper career, and his decision to attend Wheaton College in Illinois. Earning two degrees (A.B. and M.A.) from that institution, he continued his studies at Northern Baptist Theological Seminary (B.D. and Th.D.) and Boston University (Ph.D.). His published dissertation, Personal Idealism and Strong's Theology (1951), showed him to be an astute critic of the turn-of-the-century Baptist theologian, Augustus Hopkins Strong.

Henry's academic career began with a teaching stint (1942–1947) at his alma mater, Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, before being invited to be part of the founding faculty at Fuller Theological Seminary in Pasadena, California. As professor of theology and philosophy at Fuller from 1947 to 1956, Henry was a pivotal part of an institution intended to engage critical modern theological scholarship while also reforming the fundamentalist aberrations of conservative Protestantism. To those ends, a flurry of writings from Henry streamed forth: The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (1947), Remaking the Modern Mind (1948), Giving a Reason for Our Hope (1949), The Protestant Dilemma (1949), Fifty Years of Protestant Theology (1950), The Drift of Western Thought (1951), and Glimpses of a Sacred Land (1953). In these varied works, Henry's concern for the rational articulation and defense of the Christian faith became evident, but also apparent (especially in The Uneasy Conscience) was his clarion call to awaken evangelical social consciences and overcome their separatist tendencies.

Having established himself in the evangelical world, Henry was invited by BILLY GRAHAM and Nelson Bell to give editorial leadership to the newly founded Christianity Today, intended to be something of an evangelical counterpart to the more mainline Protestant Christian Century. Consistent with his vision for an evangelical faith that was intellectually credible and in touch with the national pulse, Henry moved to Washington, D.C. to launch the new periodical. During his twelve-year tenure (1956–1968) at the magazine, Henry succeeded in making Christianity Today a major voice of American evangelicalism and, in the process, also surpassed the Christian Century in paid subscriptions.

Henry resigned as editor of Christianity Today in 1968—as he later put it in his own autobiography, Confessions of a Theologian (1986), “an involuntary termination after twelve years of sacrificial labor”—after disagreements with the executive committee of the magazine and especially its politically conservative benefactor, J.Howard Pew. After a year of research and study at Cambridge University, Henry became professor-at-large at Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, where he taught from 1969 to 1974. In 1974 he became lecturer-at-large for WORLD VISION, an evangelical social agency that helped provide an international speaking ministry. At that time Henry also began to serve as visiting professor of theology at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School in Deerfield, Illinois, and the World Journalism Institute.

Assenting Christian Truth

Henry’s early interest in ETHICS as demonstrated in The Uneasy Conscience was continued in additional publications in this field. Christian Personal Ethics (1957), Aspects of Christian Social Ethics (1964), and serving as editor-in-chief of Baker’s Dictionary of Christian Ethics all testify to his passion for evangelicals to make their social witness consistent with their piety.

Preeminently, though, these years were devoted to the writing of his six-volume magnum opus, God, Revelation and Authority (1976–1983). Convinced that “in every church epoch it is the fate of the Bible that decides the fate of Christianity,” Henry’s labor of love is single-minded in its defense of biblical authority and its response to all would-be detractors. For Henry, Scripture is no mere witness to divine revelation, it is itself God’s epistemic Word, a divine self-disclosure of truth given in propositional form, secured by the plenary verbal inspiration of the original (inerrant) texts, and entirely fitting for a God who “speaks” as well as “shows.” Thus, Henry contends that anything less than a full biblical inerrancy—that the superintendence of the Spirit in inspiring the original texts protected the human authors from error in all that they teach, be it theology and ethics or science and history—severely jeopardizes the foundations of the church’s faith and leaves it precariously poised above the slippery slopes of a relativistic quagmire.

Both Henry’s defenders and his critics acknowledge that his best work lies primarily in the areas of philosophy of religion and theological method. In following his mentor Gordon Clark in asserting that truth applies only to propositions, Henry’s work presents the case for revelational theism or evangelical rationalism as a cognitive disclosure of God’s will and purposes. Postmodern thinkers question, however, whether cognitive truth is the only or even primary kind of truth that Scripture intends to convey (see POSTMODERNITY). Thus, from their vantage point Henry’s theological methodology betrays an indebtedness to ENLIGHTENMENT thinking that is yet to be acknowledged.

Nonetheless, Henry’s influence in contemporary theological debates across the spectrum of Protestant camps remains formidable. His insistence on propositional revelation and the universal truth claims of Christianity in opposition to tendencies to reduce FAITH to language of subjective experience command a hearing. Although all evangelical Protestants do not march to his beat, it is indisputable that Henry was a creative force in shaping the “new evangelicalism” that emerged from northern fundamentalism after World War II and that his spirit still broods over the movement today.

References and Further Reading

Cerillo, Augustus, Jr. and Murray W. Dempster. “Carl F.H. Henry’s Early Apologetic for an Evangelical Social Ethic, 1942–1956.” Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 34 (1991): 365–379.

Hunsinger, George. “What Can Evangelicals and Postliberals Learn from Each Other? The Carl Henry/Hans Frei Exchange Reconsidered.” Pro Ecclesia 5 (1996): 161–182.

Patterson, Bob E. “Carl F.H. Henry.” In Makers of the Modern Theological Mind. Waco, TX: Word, 1983.

STEVEN R.POINTER

HERBERT, GEORGE (1593–1633)

English cleric, poet, and younger brother of free thinker EDWARD LORD HERBERT of Cherbury. George Herbert was born April 3, 1593, in Montgomeryshire, ENGLAND. He died March 1, 1633, at Bemerton, Wiltshire, England, and was buried in the parish church in which he served as rector. Herbert was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge, receiving B.A. (1613) and M.A. (1616) degrees. Drawn to the study of theology and service to the church after completing his university studies, he held several posts at Cambridge, including University Orator after 1620, and served in Parliament (1624), before finally receiving ordination as deacon in 1624. While still a DEACON, he was appointed a canon of Lincoln Cathedral and prebend of Leighton Bromswold, Huntingdonshire in 1626. Herbert was finally ordained to the priesthood in 1630, after which he received an appointment as rector of the parish churches at Fugglestone and Bemerton in Wiltshire, serving there until his death three years later. Herbert is best known for two posthumously published works, a collection of religious poetry, The Temple (1633), and a study of pastoral care, A Priest to the Temple, or the Country Parson (1652). Both works give evidence of Herbert's concern for maintaining high standards of Christian conduct and for grounding the Christian experience in the corporate life of the CHURCH. In the Christian Parson, Herbert laid out the rules that guided his ministry at Bemerton and Fugglestone in an idealized portrait of pastoral life. For Herbert, the priest's primary calling was to be a teacher, whose goal, whether through PREACHING, catechizing, or personal example, was to form parishioners into a community defined by obedience to God's will.

See also Literature

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Herbert, George. The English Works of George Herbert, Newly arranged and annotated and considered in relation to his life. Boston & New York: Houghton, Mifflin and Co., 1905.
- . The Works of George Herbert. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1945.

———. Select Hymns Taken out of Mr. Herbert's Temple, 1967. Los Angeles: William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, 1962.

Secondary Sources:

Charles, Amy M. A Life of George Herbert. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977.

Wall, John N. Jr., ed. George Herbert: The Country Parson, The Temple. (Preface by A.M. Allchin.) New York: Paulist Press, 1981.

R.D.CORNWALL

HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (1744–1803)

German philosopher. Born August 25, 1744, at Mohrungen (Morag, Poland), Herder is one of the most prominent and prolific German theologians, philosophers, and literary critics of the ENLIGHTENMENT. His major contributions to the history of Protestant thought lie in the fields of biblical interpretation, philosophy of religion, and universal history. Herder's theology centers on the diversity of human responses to the world as divinely created, and on processes of education through which human beings move toward their destiny, that is, true humanity. Herder understood the notion of humanity as a dynamic equivalent to the biblical notion of the image of God. Herder died December 18, 1803, in Weimar, Germany.

For Herder the Old Testament provides prime examples of poetic expressions of religious insight and inspires a concept of an original revelation that resounded in particular religious and philosophical traditions ever since the primeval age. The essential significance of the New Testament is seen in its presentation of Jesus as an authoritative teacher and a unique model of true humanity, and Herder is critical of any more sophisticated CHRISTOLOGY. As an exegete Herder advocates an approach to individual biblical texts irrespective of later innerbiblical or—Jewish or Christian—doctrinal developments. Following Robert Lowth, he shows considerable originality as a reader of the BIBLE who aims at a theological appreciation of the texts as religious documents from a specific culture in antiquity. Despite his emphasis on the diachronic as well as synchronic plurality of human ways of speaking about God, Herder does not take a relativist view but makes Genesis 1–3 and the figure of Jesus the standard of faith.

Herder's work is of little interest for a theology in which the notion of humanity is dismissed in favor of a doctrine of SIN and JUSTIFICATION, but it retains its value for a theology that engages with the concept of natural religion.

In the Lutheran church in GERMANY, Herder was a senior clergyman serving as the court preacher at Bückeberg (1771–1776) and at Weimar (1776–1803). As a student at the university of Königsberg (1762–1764) he had met with traditional doctrine and apologetics, represented by T.C.Lilienthal at the theological faculty, as well as with the challenge of contemporary critical philosophy, based on the work of writers like ISAAC NEWTON, Shaftesbury, DAVID HUME, and JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU, and represented by IMMANUEL KANT at the philosophical faculty. In his writings of 1770–

1774 he distanced himself from an orthodox notion of revelation (On the Origin of Language), but also from a moralist strand of Enlightenment theology as represented in the work of Johann Joachimspalding in Berlin (To Preachers: Fifteen Provincial Letters). Encouraged by JOHANN GEORG HAMANN, he concentrated on an exegetical study of Genesis 1–3, which he wrote in an intriguing style at the peak of the German Storm and Stress (Sturm und Drang) movement (Oldest Document of the Human Race). Building on these seminal works he published a series of influential books during his Weimar years (Letters concerning the Study of Theology, 1780–1781; The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1782–1783 [English translation 1833]; Ideas for the philosophy of the history of humankind, 1784–1791 [English translation 1801]; Christian Writings [mainly on New Testament interpretation], 1794–1798).

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Adler, H., and E.A. Menze, eds. Johann Gottfried Herder: On World History: An Anthology. Armonk, NY and London: M.E. Sharpe, 1997.
- Bunge, M., ed. "Johann Gottfried Herder: Against Pure Reason." In Writings on Religion, Language, and History. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.
- Gaier, U., et al., eds. Werke. vol. 10 (in 11 vols.) with commentary. Frankfurt: Deutscher Klassiker Verlag, 1985–2000.
- Menze, E.A., and K.Menges, eds. Johann Gottfried Herder: Selected Early Works 1764–1767. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992.
- Suphan, B., et al., eds. Sämmtliche Werke. 33 vols. 1877–1913; reprinted Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms Verlag, 1967/

Secondary Sources:

- Baird, W. History of New Testament Research I: From Deism to Tübingen. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992.
- Berlin, I. "Herder and the Enlightenment." In Vico and Herder: Two Studies in the History of Ideas. New York: Viking, 1976.
- Byrne, P. Natural Religion and the Nature of Religion: The Legacy of Deism. London and New York: Routledge, 1989.
- Clark, R.T. Herder: His Life and Thought. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1955.
- Frei, H. The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974.
- Koepke, W. Johann Gottfried Herder. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1987.
- Menges, Karl, et al. Herder Yearbook. Publications of the International Herder Society. Columbia, SC: Camden House, 1992.
- Mueller-Vollmer, K., ed. Herder Today. Berlin and New York: Walter de Gruyter, 1990.

CHRISTOPH BULTMANN

HERESY

The word derives from the Greek hairesis, meaning choice, and was in the Jewish context initially used to denote those who departed from the Rabbinic tradition. It was used by Jews for the Christians, who in turn promptly used the term (see I. Cor. 11:18–19; Gal. 5:20; 2 Pet. 2:1) for those who deviated from the true (Christian) religion.

During the first two centuries of the Christian experience there was tremendous pluralism (much like the modern and postmodern periods) among Christians in their dynamic search for an appropriate response to the God revealed in Jesus the Christ. Heresy often preceded ORTHODOXY. In the fourth and fifth centuries, trinitarian, christological, and anthropological discussions in the ecumenical councils resulted in orthodoxy as an established formula (as seen in the Nicene and Chalcedonian creeds, for example). However, these adopted creedal standards required interpretation by someone or some entity to determine when they had been violated. Catholic Canon Law defined heresy as the “pertinacious” denial or calling into doubt of one of the truths necessary to Christian belief. Majority vote, power politics, and authoritarianism then became key ingredients in the definition of heresy and heretics.

From Arianism to Catharism and Waldensianism, the ancient and medieval countryside was dotted with renewal, dissenting, schismatic, and heretical movements as judged by the long arm of Roman Catholic orthodoxy. The “search and destroy” history of the medieval inquisition is seen repeatedly. The pages of Western religious history are stained with the blood of the heretics within these “heretical” movements.

Sixteenth-century western Europe was ripe in a number of ways for a major challenge to this kind of “closed orthodoxy” and abusive papal authority. Probably the greatest heretic in western religious history was MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) himself, the father of the Protestant movement. This observation raises another important point—the contextuality of heresy—for Luther considered himself to be far more orthodox in relation to the essence of the Christian faith than the church authorities who condemned him. Even in this most graphic of heretical movements, however, the inherent law of the institution again acted as a powerful braking element, and did not part with certain sociological forms such as retaining a formal state relationship. All the “magisterial” reformers believed in one church in one state. Luther, however, had opened Pandora’s pluralistic box with the principles of the priesthood of every believer and sola scriptura (scripture is the sole authority). Christians could now interpret scripture for themselves rather than always relying on authority figures.

Luther dramatically blazed the trail for the modern and postmodern periods in his openness to the judging and renewing activity of the living God in regard to the pilgrimage of the church. Although he affirmed: "It is not the end, but the way. It is not all glistening and shining, but it is all being swept," Luther did not anticipate the kind of "sweepers" who would emerge. Just as the "free church" tradition (free from the state) would later be renewed by its own individual heretics, its own tradition was a heretical form of renewal for the established church tradition. Magisterial reformers were challenged by "radical" reformers who, for the most part, agreed upon the necessity of separating the reformed church from the authority of the temporal realm. They were more concerned with a people in covenant rather than a corpus christianum, and at times were more interested in the restoration of ancient Christianity than the reformation of medieval Christianity. They were opposed, as heretical movements, by both Roman Catholics and magisterial reformers. This heresy was often labeled as "sedition" and a crime against the state. Authority and majority vote continued to spell out their own definitions of heresy as creeds and scripture were interpreted.

The pluralism that Protestantism brought to the religious scene blurred the meaning of heresy. Hundreds of creeds and confessions were written in numerous Protestant circles and always interpreted within a particular context by authority figures. There was even variety within denominational families, especially in the United States, where principles of the separation of church and state and religious liberty nurtured even more pluralism. For example, by the twentieth century BAPTISTS alone expressed themselves in over fifty different groups. Even the ecumenical age with its briefer confessions and emphasis on unity did not solve the complexity of the meaning of heresy in Protestant circles. An accused heretic and his or her heresy in one denomination might only be considered a conservative and orthodox church-person in another. False simplifications of heresy by some evangelicals, especially fundamentalists, blurred the issue even more. The last decade of the twentieth century witnessed an active interest in heresy and heretics on both doctrinal and moral grounds. Heresy issues emerged in numerous denominational circles (for example, the militant fundamentalists and their political takeover of the Southern Baptist Convention resulted in a plethora of informal heresy trials), and a climate of hyperintolerance in doctrinal and moral issues resulted. Politics, jealousies, power struggles, anti-intellectualism, limits of knowing, grudges, personal animosities, and confusion of ethics with doctrine have all played roles in the decisions made concerning heresy in contemporary Protestant circles.

There is no universally accepted definition of heresy in the modern Protestant world, for there exists multifaceted pluralism and sometimes narrow contextualism. Austrian theologian Karl Rahner (1904–1984) suggested that hardening "the form in which the truth of the gospel is expressed is then itself nothing but the dangerous symptom of an indifference to this truth." If he is correct, perhaps we have returned to the first two centuries of Christian history when there were no doctrinal parameters as Christians struggled to express themselves on matters of ultimate concern. The British Congregationalist P.T. FORSYTH (1848–1921) once said that a "live heresy is better than a dead orthodoxy.” Put another way, there is no heresy in a dead religion. In this case, once again, heresy precedes orthodoxy as the wheel continues to turn.

References and Further Reading

- Christie-Murray, David. A History of Heresy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Hultgren, Arland J., and Steven A.Haggmark, eds. The Earliest Christian Heretics. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1996.
- Lambert, Malcolm. Medieval Heresy. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1977.
- Nigg, Walter. The Heretics. New York: Alfred A.Knopf, 1962.
- Rahner, Karl. On Heresy. New York: Herder and Herder, 1964.
- Shriver, George H., ed. American Religious Heretics. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 1966.
- , ed. Dictionary of Heresy Trials in American Christianity. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1997.
- Wakefield, Walter L., and Austin P.Evans, eds. Heresies of the High Middle Ages. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969.

GEORGE H.SHRIVER

HERRNHUT

Herrnhut, near Dresden in Saxony (central GERMANY), was one of the most important religious communities in Europe in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. A center of German PIETISM, Herrnhut developed a distinctive social and religious life that was almost monastic in its discipline. Members of the community voluntarily gave up much of their autonomy in order to pursue the religious goals of the community. The cultivation of a relationship to their Savior led to an elaborate and joyful liturgical life that focused on the atonement. This Moravian piety was spread through the publication of hymnals and liturgy books.

Herrnhut also established numerous boarding schools, such as the one attended by FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1843), and sent out hundreds of tutors, teachers, and lay religious leaders who established Pietist cell groups throughout the Baltic, NETHERLANDS, and Scandinavia. Herrnhut remained the headquarters of the MORAVIAN CHURCH'S Unity Board and Board of World Missions until the disruptions of two world wars. The Moravians were so closely associated with Herrnhut that they were commonly called Herrnhuters.

Herrnhut was founded on the estate of Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF in Saxony in 1722 by a Czech émigré named Christian David (1690–1722). David had been converted during a Pietist revival, and he urged several Czech Protestant families to leave Catholic Moravia and Bohemia and seek refuge under Zinzendorf's protection. They named their new village Herrnhut, "under the Lord's protection." The refugees hoped to restore the old Hussite church known as the Unitas Fratrum, which had been virtually destroyed during the Thirty Years War. Zinzendorf already had plans to develop a Pietist complex similar to HALLE on his estate. As Herrnhut developed, both goals were pursued in a creative synthesis. Soon Herrnhut was attracting not only Moravians but also mystics, seekers, and various separatists. By 1727 there were about 300 residents, most of whom were members of the Lutheran and Reformed churches.

Dissent quickly developed because of diverse church traditions and theological perspectives. In order to establish principles for their life together, Zinzendorf drew up a covenant, called the Brotherly Agreement, which firmly established Herrnhut as an exclusive religious community within the Lutheran parish of Berthlesdorf. This agreement, among diverse Protestant factions, marks a milestone in the history of ECUMENISM. The Brotherly Agreement also allowed the Moravians to revive vestiges of the Unitas Fratrum without violating the Treaty of Westphalia. Soon after the signing of the Brotherly Agreement, Herrnhut began training and sending out missionaries to non-Christian peoples (see Moravian Church).

Philipp Jakob Spener's (1635–1705) idea of the ecclesiola in ecclesia (little churches in the church) took a distinctive form in Herrnhut as the residents built a new Christian social order. The basic unit of their society was not the private family but the “choir” or religious group. By 1740 virtually every person in Herrnhut was a member of a particular choir (e.g., boys, girls, single men, single women, married men, married women, widowers, and widows). The choirs worshiped together, usually ate together, and provided mutual support and admonition. The single men and single women also established communal housekeeping and lived in large choir houses.

Theologically, the choirs were based on the conviction that the incarnation of Christ had already blessed all stages of human life. Devotions in the choirs related Jesus's experience as a child, adolescent, and adult to the life of the believer. The choirs also provided a way for the church to subordinate individual desires for the common mission. Young persons were raised in the awareness that at any time they might be asked to go into the mission fields or accept a teaching or preaching post. Even earthly marriage was brought under the control of the church at Herrnhut. Marriages were arranged according to the needs of the community, and for many years the final decision was submitted to the lot. The choir system and arranging of marriages continued until early in the nineteenth century.

In addition to the choir system, Herrnhut created an efficient social service system. Diaconal ministers were responsible for the care of orphans, the sick, and elderly. Zinzendorf and other nobles established institutions such as an apothecary, orphanage, and publishing house. Economic life was included in the overall Herrnhut system as the community took charge of apprentice training, the regulation of trade, and creation of new industries. Competition was discouraged in favor of cooperative enterprises, and labor was seen as an integral part of spiritual development. This intentional approach to economics was applied in all Moravian communities and furthered the mission enterprise. Moravians preferred to send artisans and craftsmen to the mission field rather than pastors because they could follow Paul's model of being a “tent-maker” evangelist. Herrnhut's products were prized throughout Europe, particularly after Abraham Düringer took charge of the economy and established his industries in the 1750s.

In 1736 the Saxon government examined Herrnhut in order to decide whether to disband the community on the grounds of religious and social irregularities. Because of its hardworking, law-abiding, and quiet lifestyle, Herrnhut was allowed to continue to exist under its own religious and social laws; however, Zinzendorf himself was exiled. This threat of expulsion encouraged the Moravians to found other religious centers in Europe and America. The most famous were Herrnhag, near Frankfort, Lamb's Hill in ENGLAND, New Herrnhut in St. Thomas, and Bethlehem in Pennsylvania. All of the Moravian communities were modeled on Herrnhut. Herrnhut's fame attracted many visitors, the most famous of whom was JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791), who was favorably impressed in 1738.

Several Moravian practices and observances were begun in Herrnhut during its early years. Among them were the love feast (or agape meal), the unbroken prayer watch, the singing service, the easter sunrise service, and the Daily Texts (losungen). The Daily Texts continue to be chosen in Herrnhut and remain one of the most widely used devotional guides in the world, especially in Germany.

After Zinzendorf's death in 1760, the governing board of the church resided in Herrnhut, but in the mid-nineteenth century the American and British provinces were granted a measure of independence from German control. Herrnhut continues to serve as the headquarters for the Moravians in Europe and houses the extensive archives of the worldwide Moravian Church.

References and Further Reading

Gollin, Gillian Lindt. Between Two Worlds: A Study of Changing Communities. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.

Nelson, James. "Herrnhut: Friedrich Schleiermacher's Spiritual Home." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Chicago, 1963.

Sommer, Elisabeth. Serving Two Masters. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 2000.

Uttendorfer, Otto. Alt-Herrnhut. 2 vols. Herrnhut: Missionsbuchhandlung Verlag, 1925.

CRAIG D.ATWOOD

HICKS, EDWARD (1780–1849)

American "Primitive" painter. Hicks was born April 4, 1780, in Attleborough, Pennsylvania, and died August 23, 1849, in Newtown, Pennsylvania. By profession Hicks was a decorative painter. By commitment and avocation he was a passionate Quaker, widely known for his preaching. He was deeply, often contentiously, involved in Quaker politics, admonished on occasion for the intensity of his public statements. He was widely admired for his presentation of Quaker principles, particularly that of obedience to the Inner Light rather than external authority.

Hicks came reluctantly to easel painting, reconciling himself to it only as an instrument of ministry. The charm of the "primitive" conceals a strong and original intelligence. He painted landscapes with Quaker farms, illustrating in their orderliness, simplicity of forms, and purity of tone, the Quaker way of life. The fruitful, serene, and orderly landscape exemplified the peace of God.

He is best known for his paintings of The Peaceable Kingdom (Isaiah 11:6–9). The landscapes are more natural but equally peaceful. Most contain in the background a scene of WILLIAM PENN concluding a peace treaty with the Indians, a human act fulfilling the intent of the pictures. The surface is taken up with the animals and the child or children. These deserve to be studied together because they are exegeses of the text. The distinctive personalities of the animals exemplify types of people, according to the doctrine of the humors. Inside the overarching peace there are various tensions in the presentation of the animals; God's peace is not a simple thing, being the reconciliation of powerful psychic and dramatic forces.

See also Friends, Society of

References and Further Reading

- Mather, Eleanor Price, and Dorothy Canning Miller. Edward Hicks: His Peaceable Kingdoms and Other Paintings. New Brunswick, NJ: Associated University Presses, 1983.
- Weekley, Carolyn J. The Kingdoms of Edward Hicks. Williamsburg, VA: The Rockefeller Folk Art Foundation, 1999.

JOHN W.DIXON JR.

HIGHER CRITICISM

The term Higher Criticism was first used by pupils of Christian Gottlob Heyne (1729–1812; professor and librarian at Göttingen, 1763–1812) to distinguish two branches of the philological criticism of ancient texts (mainly Greek and Latin but also biblical). Johann Gottfried Eichhorn (1752–1827), who studied under Heyne and succeeded Johann David Michaelis (1717–1791) as professor of philosophy in Göttingen from 1788 to his death, asserted in the preface to the second edition of his Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1790) that Higher Criticism was not a new term to any pure humanist.

The distinction between Higher and Lower Criticism was based on the ancient classical distinction between Great Philology and Little Philology as reported by Dionysius the Thracian, whose grammar remained influential into the eighteenth century. Eichhorn used the terms Great and Little Criticism in the paragraph on the Higher Criticism and its little sister, Lower Criticism, in volume 5 of his Repertorium (1779). The term “Higher” was meant to indicate that this criticism was nobler and more important than textual criticism. Friedrich August Wolf in his Göttingen lectures on philology of the winter semester of 1798–1799 referred to the term as current but repudiated the assumption that Lower Criticism was any less demanding. Eichhorn in his article of 1779 on Moses’ reports of the Flood argued that Higher Criticism showed that Moses either used or himself combined two ancient sources that sometimes intertwined and sometimes ran parallel. Eichhorn argued that Lower Criticism could work better when able to assume the results of Higher Criticism. Eichhorn later extended his source criticism of the Pentateuch and discovered that Jean Astruc (1684–1766), son of a Protestant pastor who converted to Catholicism on the revocation of the EDICT OF NANTES and devoted himself to the education of his sons, had in 1753 anticipated his original analysis. Eichhorn argued that Isaiah 40ff. was later than Isaiah 1–39.

Although FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER used the terms in his Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums, he said that higher and lower so intermingled that they could not be separated. The term was used in Germany to characterize rationalistic criticism. Eichhorn was a rationalist, although the leading British and American higher critics argued that their criticism advanced true religion.

British and American Higher Criticism

From about 1857 onward, and particularly in the 1880s and 1890s, Higher Criticism was more talked about in the United Kingdom and America than it had ever been in continental Europe because Higher Criticism was the bone of contention in four famous actions for HERESY.

Samuel Davidson (1806–1898), an Irish Presbyterian who taught biblical interpretation at Belfast College (1834–1841), before leaving the Presbyterian ministry and being appointed professor at Lancashire Independent College, Manchester, in 1842, was compelled to resign in 1857 on denying the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. He became a Unitarian. In 1862 he published An Introduction to the Old Testament: Critical, Historical, and Theological to supersede the earlier book that had forced his resignation. He reminded any who thought he had been occasionally too free “that there is a time to utter the conclusions of the higher criticism; that superstition should not enslave the mind for ever.”

JOHN WILLIAM COLENSO (1814–1883), bishop of Natal in South Africa, was deposed by the bishop of Cape Town in 1863 for challenging the traditional authorship and accuracy of the books from Genesis to II Kings. He argued that they were edited by a Deuteronomistic editor. The Privy Council upheld his appeal on the grounds that Cape Town had no jurisdiction. He was excommunicated in 1866, but retained the cathedral and endowments of the see. All this brought Higher Criticism to public notice.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON SMITH (1846–1894), professor at the Free Church College in Aberdeen, was eventually dismissed from his post in 1881 over articles on the BIBLE (1875) and Hebrew language and literature (1880) in the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. He had argued in the British Quarterly Review (April 1870) that “the fundamental principle of the higher criticism lies in the conception of the organic unity of all history...an ancient writing which is no frigid product of the school, but is instinct with true life, must be the product of the age which contained the conditions of life it unconsciously reflects.” Deuteronomy put into the mouth of Moses “the highest and most spiritual view of the law...to expound and develop Mosaic principles in relation to new needs.”

Charles Augustus Briggs (1841–1913), professor at Union Theological Seminary, New York, was condemned by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1891 for denying that Moses wrote the Pentateuch and that Isaiah wrote Isaiah 40ff. He was ordained an Episcopal priest in 1899. He wrote The Higher Criticism of the Hexateuch (1893).

The term Higher Criticism was little used after World War I. Robert M. Price revived it by founding The Journal of Higher Criticism (1994) with an effigy of FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR on the cover justly, although Baur himself spoke of historical criticism). Less controversy has surrounded the higher criticism of the New Testament. Eichhorn’s solution of the Synoptic Problem has been largely accepted, except for his view that the original documents were in Aramaic. W. Robertson Smith’s statement that John’s Gospel was “an unhistorical product of abstract reflection” was already current. Paul’s epistles have largely escaped analysis into sources, the only question being which were genuine and which not. E. Earle Ellis (1927–) has argued that Paul and his assistants used five types of preformed traditions in compiling the letters. Higher Criticism as traditionally understood is not dead.

See also Baur, Ferdinand Christian; Bible; Colenso, John William; Heresy; Nantes, Edict of; Schleiermacher, Friedrich; Smith, W.Robertson

References and Further Reading

Osgood, Howard. "The History and Definition of Higher Criticism." The Bibliotheca Sacra 49 no. 196 (1892): 529–545.

Reid, George J. "Biblical Criticism (Higher)." The Catholic Encyclopedia. 1908.

<http://www.newadvent.org/cathen/%2004491c.htm>

Zenos, Andrew C. Elements of the Higher Criticism. New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1895.

J.C.O'NEILL

HIGHER EDUCATION

Protestantism brought changes to higher education both by what it accomplished in itself, and by what it accomplished through those who reacted against it. Realizing there are many nuances and definitions of Protestantism—or indeed, Protestantisms—this article uses Protestantism in a broad definition, encompassing the later developments from the original Protestant and Reformed usage. As such, this article addresses higher education, particularly university education, as it was influenced by early and later developments of Protestantism. It looks at the introduction of Protestant universities in Europe, Asia, the UNITED STATES, and AFRICA and notes some of the effects these universities have had within their respective countries.

Universities are of medieval origin. Some of the first universities, defined as institutions with organized faculty and community of students, were found in Bologna, Cambridge, Oxford, and Paris in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. These began as gatherings around well known teachers. Often developing from cathedral schools, the universities were tied to the Catholic Church of the time. Only universities could bestow degrees, and their charter to do so had to be granted by a universal ruler, either the pope or emperor.

Universities became important centers of learning and culture with a common worldview, which reflected the current ideas of Christendom. The privilege of a doctor was to teach without further examination at any university in which his services should be rendered. Degree holders had their educational attainments recognized equally throughout the Christian Empire. In this way the education received at universities both reflected and perpetuated a common unity of knowledge throughout an extended Christendom.

Protestantism and Higher Education in Europe

The first Protestant leaders were often university educated, and many of them were university professors and educators as well. MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) was professor of biblical literature at the University of Wittenburg in Saxony when he posted his ninety-five theses on the Wittenburg church door. PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560) also taught at the University of Wittenburg and helped make it one of the most influential centers of Protestant theology in GERMANY. Protestant THEOLOGY sought to give precedence to biblical languages and the original text of the BIBLE over and against Catholic philosophically oriented scholasticism and Thomism.

Most German universities were Lutheran in theology. The first Protestant university to be established in Germany was the University of Marburg (f. 1527). It was also the first German university to have a charter granted by a princely ruler (PHILIP OF HESSE) rather than by papal authority. Other Protestant universities founded during this time were Königsberg (now Kaliningrad, f. 1544), Jena (f. 1558), and Helmstedt (f. 1575).

JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) moved to Geneva in 1536 and among other activities established the Geneva Academy in 1559 to train reformed ministers. Initially focused on the preparation of church leaders, the academy attracted students from throughout Europe. The GENEVA BIBLE was prepared and published by this institution, further enhancing its reputation. The academy would later become the nucleus of the University of Geneva. Calvin had a great interest in higher education, and as a result Protestant Calvinist universities were established internationally afterward in many cities including Leiden (1575), Edinburgh (1582), Amsterdam (1632), and Utrecht (1636).

In ENGLAND the universities of Oxford and Cambridge became centers for Protestant teaching. Because of this, many Catholic educators and students left, finding a more congenial atmosphere elsewhere. Yet Oxford and Cambridge vacillated between Protestantism and Catholicism in the early years according to the religion of the reigning monarch. Whatever the prevailing views, Protestant or Catholic, religious conformity was expected and enforced. Professors and students alike were made to swear their allegiance to confessional statements of ORTHODOXY subscribed to by each institution. Occasionally opposition brought death. In 1555 and 1556 three Cambridge University-educated Protestant leaders, THOMAS CRANMER (1489–1556), HUGH LATIMER (1485–1555), and NICOLAS RIDLEY (c. 1500–1555), were burned at Oxford during the brief reign of the Catholic queen, Mary Tudor (1516–1558). The result of this action was a strong development of REFORMATION Doctrine over and against Catholicism with the ascension of the Protestant queen ELIZABETH I (r. 1558–1603). In this way Catholicism left its mark on the Protestant theology of Oxford as it defined itself for the future.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY played an important part in English Protestant politics. THOMAS CROMWELL (c. 1485–1540), chief minister to HENRY VIII, was also the chancellor of Cambridge for five years and emphasized the study of Greek, Hebrew, and biblical divinity there. Politics and Protestant theology were firmly entwined at Cambridge. William Cecil (1520–1598) also attended Cambridge and was Elizabeth's first minister from 1559 to 1598. The archbishops of Canterbury during this time, MATTHEW PARKER (1504–1575), Edmund Grindal (1519–1583), and JOHN WHITGIFT (1530–1604), were all from Cambridge as was Thomas Cranmer years before.

The effect of Protestantism on higher education was to immediately alter the relationship of the university to the Catholic Church. The nature of theology often became polemic toward Catholicism and Thomism, or at least oriented toward a self-sufficient biblical authority removed from TRADITION and a human representative of deity. Catholic monks and scholars who taught at universities or were students there left for safer haven. By removing the universal authority of the pope, Protestantism may have paved the way for, or contributed to, an existential INDIVIDUALISM centuries later that acknowledged no central defining authority. Ultimately this individualism often led to a separation from the deeply religious identity that initiated the original institution.

Protestantism and Higher Education in Asia

The influence of Protestantism, although centuries later than in Europe, inspired many efforts of higher education in Asia. From a religious point of view important aspects of this education were CONVERSION and to prepare leaders for local ministries. An important aspect of many of these universities was the introduction of the education of WOMEN.

In China, Yenching University, later to develop into Beijing University, was founded in 1919 under Methodist influence. This university was a conglomeration of other educational institutions and afterward continued to expand into the arts and sciences. Yet much of the origins for the present-day Beijing University had their foundations in Protestantism. Other Protestant institutions of higher education include Fukien Christian University (1915); Ginling College, a Christian women's college (1915); Shantung Christian University (1902); University of Nanking (1910); and St. John's University (1879). These are only a few of the universities that began under Protestant influence.

In KOREA, once known as the Hermit Kingdom, higher education flourished under Protestant influence. Atypical in Asia, Korea has over 40 percent of the population claiming Christianity as their religion. Yonsei University, Korea's oldest Protestant university, was founded in 1885 under Presbyterian influence. It has grown to a student population of 30,000 and is influential as a multidisciplinary university. Ewha Women's University, which attained university status in 1945 but traces its roots to Ewha Girls' School that began in 1866, started under Methodist influence. Other institutions of higher education have proliferated as well, with many being started by Protestant groups.

In INDIA, Serampore College was founded in 1818 with WILLIAM CAREY as one of the leaders in beginning this institution. Although begun by those involved in the English Baptist Missionary Society (see BAPTIST MISSIONS), this institution was open to all persons regardless of their caste or creed. As either faculty or students, the college had Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Lutherans, Methodists, Presbyterians, and members of other denominations as well. Eventually this college became a part of the University of Calcutta. Protestantism founded other colleges, and by 1910 there were forty-six Protestant Christian colleges in the Indian territory of India, Burma, and Ceylon. Many of these institutions also had a significant positive influence on the role of women in the Indian society.

Protestantism and Higher Education in the United States

The first universities established in the United States began under Protestant auspices, although by this time Protestantism had developed well beyond Lutheran and Calvinistic beginnings. Harvard (1636) is the oldest university and was initiated under Congregationalist influence. William and Mary (1693) began under the influence of the Episcopal church. Yale (1701) was also established to serve the Congregationalists. The College of New Jersey (1746), which became Princeton, was America's fourth oldest university, established by the Presbyterian and Reformed churches. Rhode Island (1764), which later became Brown University, was established by the Baptists. The Charity School (1740), which became the University of Pennsylvania, and King's (1754), which later became Columbia University, were established by the Episcopalians. Queens (1766), which later became Rutgers, was established by the Presbyterian and Reformed churches. These early universities along with many others had strong ties to their respective founding churches. At the same time these institutions were neither ministerial training institutions nor exclusively for students from the founding Protestant denomination.

Protestant higher education had a favorable beginning in the United States. Denominations could start their college the way they believed best, without centuries of tradition to throw off. In this setting every major Protestant religious group sought to begin its own college or university. These institutions, although initially small, helped further galvanize religious sentiment. Each institution can claim educated national and international leaders. Yet as colleges grew and expanded their courses over time, they tended to lose contact with their initial affiliated religious heritage. Eventually little trace could be discerned of the distinctive founding heritage for the majority of the early American Protestant educational institutions. There has been renewed scholarly interest in this consistent cycle.

Protestantism and Higher Education in Africa

Protestant higher education was late in coming to Africa. Education was initially through mission schools. These schools served to teach literacy and serve as agents for conversion, and were the first Protestant educational institutions. As well, they prepared future leaders for serving in administrative and governmental capacities in the individual African countries. In 1827 the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, an Anglican missionary group founded with the original purpose of returning and advancing the cause of freed slaves, established Fourah Bay College to train Africans as educators, church leaders, and leaders in society. Located near Freetown in SIERRA LEONE, Fourah Bay is the oldest institution of higher education in West Africa. SAMUEL A. CROWTHER (ca. 1806–1891), a freed African slave who became an Anglican bishop and later did extensive and successful mission work in Nigeria, was in the first class of this new institution. Fourah Bay College exerted widespread influence in the areas of MISSIONS, leadership, and higher education throughout West Africa and was affiliated with the University of Durham in England in 1876. With this move, African students could earn British degrees without leaving Africa. Eventually Fourah Bay College became a part of the University of Sierra Leone.

There are numerous reasons for the late appearance of Protestant institutions of higher education in Africa. Protestantism came with the trading companies and colonizing powers, which were not influential until the nineteenth century. Although missionaries came before and without the oversight of these capital and colonizing ventures, eventually the two often advanced in close relationship to one another. Because of this, many Africans saw Protestantism and education as a tool of control. Also for the colonizers, higher education was sometimes seen as a hindrance to their rule. Britain ruled by a policy of indirect rule, working through already established local leaders. Higher education had the potential to upset this arrangement by placing power in the hands of younger, though more educated, individuals. As well, both FRANCE and Britain as colonizing powers deliberately excluded Christian missionary efforts and therefore Protestant higher education from Muslim controlled areas. Recognition and utilization of Muslim traditional leaders in positions of colonial government and military leadership by colonizing powers enhanced the reputation of Islam and served to further the Muslim cause. Education was seen by these local Islamic leaders as tools of Western domination, and therefore avoided.

Conclusion

Higher education was influential in the spread of Protestantism internationally as well as locally. Because universities were an established institution throughout Europe, they developed and facilitated the Protestant message throughout Western civilization first. As the influence of the Western world eventually expanded into Asia and Africa it took along these institutions of universal knowledge.

As time went on, Protestant forces found and often centered in colleges and universities became more tolerant. Initially holders of both Catholicism and variations on the theme of Protestantism were often forced to flee universities that were Protestant strongholds and find a more congenial home elsewhere. Eventually antagonism faded and it was not unusual to find Catholics at Protestant universities and vice versa. Tolerance further developed until it became the norm to find believers of any religion enrolled in Protestant higher education (see TOLERATION).

One of the oft-repeated patterns of Protestant higher education has been a drift in educational purpose away from the originating ideal and religious motif. As decades or centuries pass by, the religious dimension in particular is separated from the university and pushed into the background. Eventually religious roots are ignored or denied. The continuing challenges for the relationship of Protestantism to higher education are to uphold a distinctive identity while sustaining a broad spirit of tolerance, to encourage independent thought and inquiry while preserving an effective reliance on Protestant religious roots, and to maintain a vigorous academic debate regarding Protestant spirituality and the central place of the Bible in Protestantism.

See also Colonialism

References and Further Reading

- Bays, Daniel H., ed. Christianity in China: From the Eighteenth Century to the Present. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Bediako, Kwame. Christianity in Africa: The Renewal of a Non-Western Religion. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1995.
- Benne, Robert. Quality with Soul: How Six Premier Colleges and Universities Keep Faith with Their Religious Traditions. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 2001.
- Burtchaell, James Tunstead. The Dying of the Light: The Disengagement of Colleges and Universities from Their Christian Churches. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1998.
- Cherry, Conrad. Hurrying toward Zion: Universities, Divinity Schools, and American Protestantism. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Flynt, Wayne, and Gerald W. Berkley. Taking Christianity to China. Tuscaloosa: The University of Alabama Press, 1997.
- Hughes, Richard, and William B. Andrian, eds. Models of Christian Higher Education: Strategies for Survival in the Twenty-first Century. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1997.
- Marsden, George. The Soul of the American University: From Protestant Establishment to Established Unbelief. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- , and Bradley J. Longfield, eds. The Secularization of the Academy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Schaff, Philip. Germany: Its Universities, Theology, and Religion. New York: Sheldon, Blakeman and Company, 1857.
- Sloan, Douglas. Faith and Knowledge: Mainline Protestantism and American Higher Education. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1994.
- Sundkler, Bengt, and Christopher Steed. A History of the Church in Africa. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

DAVID L. LITTLE

HIGHER LIFE MOVEMENT

Higher Christian Life was the name of a mid-nineteenth-century movement in Anglo-American Protestantism that stressed the possibility of a “higher” (or sometimes “deeper”) Christian experience than most enjoyed. Considering most Christians complacent about their spiritual state, “higher life” advocates insisted on the availability of a quality of piety, embraced in an act of faith, that brought one into constant, conscious fellowship with Christ and enabled the believer to live in a state of holiness and consecration. Those who identified with this movement often manifested more enthusiasm for religious experience than for theology. A principal text that helped shape their identity came from the pen of William Boardman, a peripatetic Presbyterian who published The Higher Christian Life in 1858. Boardman’s views had affinities for Methodist holiness teaching, and he moved in nondenominational circles that brought him into contact with prominent holiness leaders.

The principal features of the higher Christian life—rest, joy, peace, spiritual power—resembled those of holiness piety, but Boardman articulated a path to these blessings in this life that avoided much holiness jargon. He hoped to appeal more broadly to Christians whose social standing or religious predilections made them wary of Methodism. Influenced as well by evangelist CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY’S teaching on a second crisis experience as normative for the converted, advocates of the higher Christian life penetrated denominational boundaries with their message. Although the practical differences among holiness and higher life advocates were often minor, their distinct approaches and methods had enormous importance for their self-understanding. The ideal of knowing Christ in a personal, intimate, growing relationship that envisioned Christ as king of the believer’s life suggested a perspective that valued otherworldliness over engagement in this world’s concerns. It turned piety inward and judged harshly the alleged carnality of contemporary Christianity.

The higher Christian life was “higher” only in the sense that its advocates deemed the contemporary church deficient. They insisted that this higher Christian life was, in God’s scheme, the blueprint for ordinary Christian living. In the 1870s Boardman teamed with a Quaker couple, Robert Pearsall and HANNAH WHITALL SMITH, who shared his interests in this spirituality. Their efforts in England gave rise to the KESWICK MOVEMENT. From Smith’s pen came The Christian’s Secret of the Happy Life, the classic, enduring statement of the simple piety that was the goal of the higher Christian life.

See also Holiness Movement

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Boardman, W.E. The Higher Christian Life. Boston: H.Hoyt, 1858.

Smith, Hannah W. The Christian 's Secret of a Happy Life. Chicago: F.H. Revell, 1875.

Secondary Source:

Blumhofer, Edith L. Restoring the Faith. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

EDITH L.BLUMHOFER

HOBBS, THOMAS (1588–1679)

English philosopher. Hobbes was born just outside of Malmesbury, Wiltshire, England on April 5, 1588, prematurely and “a twin with fear,” as he said, both because of the impending invasion of the Spanish Armada and his lifelong timidity. His book Leviathan is widely considered the greatest work of political philosophy in English. He died at Hardwick Hall in Derbyshire on December 3, 1679. Reputed by many to be an atheist, Hobbes’s long and prosperous life caused his enemies consternation. According to another view, Hobbes was, as he represented himself as being, a loyal member of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The opposition to him was attributed in large part to a variety of factors including his demythologizing attitude toward the BIBLE, his unsuccessful attempt to reconcile Christianity with modern science, and his defense after the English CIVIL WAR of absolute sovereignty and of the civil sovereign’s authority over the Church. This is not to mention his acerbic wit.

Hobbes attended Magdalen Hall, Oxford, from about 1602 until 1608, when he received his B.A. He then entered the service of William Cavendish as tutor to his son William, the future second earl of Devonshire. He served one or another branch of the Cavendish family for more than a half century. He toured the Continent with William in 1614. One result may have been his authorship of the essays that appeared in the anonymous Horae Subsecivae. The essay “Of Rome” reports the viewing of numerous Roman Catholic relics, including a piece of the Cross, a vial of Jesus’s blood, and “one of the thorns, which was in derision set upon our Savior’s head.” Although not accepting all the miraculous stories, the author implies that he thinks that some of them are true. He ends his essay with advice for members of the Church of England visiting Rome. Except for his translation of Thucydides History of the Peloponnesian War (1629), Hobbes’s intellectual life was undistinguished until the 1630s.

Science and Christianity

Most of Hobbes’s time in the 1630s was devoted to the study of modern science, especially with a group associated with William Cavendish, later the duke of Newcastle. However, he probably visited the circle of Protestant intellectuals at Great Tew, Oxfordshire, where the main topics of conversation were the Bible and the foundations of Christianity, topics that Hobbes later wrote about extensively. One of Great Tew's leading members, WILLIAM CHILLINGWORTH, wrote in The Religion of Protestants, "The Bible is the only true religion of Protestants," and Hobbes represented himself as sympathetic with that view.

Hobbes's political views dramatically altered his life in the 1640s. A decidedly nonstalwart royalist, he anticipated the Civil War and fled to FRANCE in late 1640. He feared for his life because of the views he expressed in The Elements of Law, Natural and Politic, which circulated around the end of the Short Parliament (1640). In Paris he became a member of Marin Mersenne's circle, whose members focused on mathematics, science, and the problem of reconciling modern science and Christianity. One of them, his friend Pierre Gassendi, tried to hitch Epicurus to Roman Catholicism, and another, Thomas White, tried the same thing with a refurbished Aristotle. Hobbes's answer to the problem, which was made explicit in Leviathan, was to expound on a point made by Chillingworth, JOHN DONNE, and others. Christianity contains doctrines above reason but nothing contrary to reason. Hobbes separated faith and reason, and the realm of religion from the realm of science. Faith is trust in a person and yields belief. Reason is the calculation of consequences from propositions and yields science. When people become citizens of a state, they put their faith in their sovereign. Hobbes is content to let the sovereign define the content of faith; hence his easy acceptance of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

In 1642 his book De Cive was published in France. Its last part, "Of Religion," defends views that were broadly acceptable to English royalists. He argued that God rules over humans by nature and over the Israelites by the old covenant. At the Second Coming, Christ will rule over all people by the new covenant. The only belief needed to attain heaven is that Jesus is the Christ or Messiah. All the other Christian truths follow from that one. Most of his critics, Catholic and Protestant alike, wanted a stronger statement about dogma. Nevertheless, De Cive made Hobbes's reputation as a Christian political theorist. A second, expanded edition of De Cive was published in 1647, and a translation of it, Philosophical Rudiments Concerning Government and Society, was published in London in 1651.

Free Will

In 1645, Hobbes debated fellow exile bishop John Bramhall on the topics of free will and PREDESTINATION in front of William Cavendish, then marquis of Newcastle. At Newcastle's request, Hobbes wrote out his view in Of Liberty and Necessity; Bramhall wrote his A True Defence of Liberty in reply. Neither work was intended for publication. However, Hobbes's work was published in 1654 without his knowledge. Bramhall's book was published the next year, and Hobbes replied to Bramhall in The Questions Concerning Liberty, Necessity and Chance (1656).

The will, according to Hobbes, is the last desire a person has before acting. Because that desire is itself caused by some preceding event either inside or outside the person, according to natural laws, there is no such thing as a free will. Indeed, according to Hobbes, the phrase “free will” is incoherent, because only substances can be free or not. So a person is free when the cause of the person’s action comes from within, in contrast with having the action caused by a violent external cause like a wind blowing a person across a field.

Bramhall, like other defenders of free will, thought that Hobbes’s view undermined a necessary condition for responsibility. There can be no praise or blame, and hence no justified assignment of people to heaven or hell (see HEAVEN AND HELL), unless their actions are truly their own. So free will must exist. Bramhall in effect was defending ARMINIANISM. In contrast, Hobbes aligned himself with MARTIN LUTHER’S view. More generally, Hobbes’s view is Calvinistic (see CALVINISM). Because God is the cause of all things, God is the ultimate cause of all human actions also, including the sinful ones. However, God is not culpable because a person is culpable only when he or she breaks a law. Because God by his sovereignty is subject to no law, God breaks no law. As for praise or blame, praise belongs to those who keep the law, blame belongs to those who break the law.

Leviathan and Religion

After the institution of the Commonwealth in 1649, Hobbes decided to return to England. His magnum opus Leviathan was published in 1651, to a stormy reception. Many objected to views presented in the first two parts of the book: his argument that the natural condition of human life was “solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short,” his claim that what is naturally good is whatever a person desires, and his belief that SALVATION in this world comes from the establishment of an absolute sovereign. Even more objectionable were the third and fourth parts of the book, “Of a Christian Commonwealth” and “Of the Kingdom of Darkness.” He was the first major author to argue in print that Moses was not the author of the entire Pentateuch. Also, he implied that God was material and that spirits are nothing but the imaginings of a fevered or demented brain. He undercut belief in revelation by saying that the sentence, “God appeared to me in a dream” means the same as “I dreamed that God appeared to me.” He undercut belief in prophets by adducing biblical evidence that showed that prophets are often wrong, sometimes deceived by other prophets, and sometimes lie, as God asserts in the book of Jeremiah. At best, true prophets can be identified only after their predictions come true, that is, after it is too late for people to derive any benefit from them. He undercut belief in miracles by observing that only people ignorant of natural science can witness them, and held, as many members of the Church of England did, that miracles were no longer important because they ended with the death of the last apostle. Not even his attack on Roman Catholicism, which described the papacy as “nothing other than the ghost of the Roman empire, sitting crowned upon the grave thereof,” pleased most Protestants because his criticisms could be understood as applying also to presbyterian and episcopal CLERGY (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

Although Hobbes's positions are arguably consistent with Christianity, his contemporaries, like most current scholars, thought that they proved he was intent on surreptitiously undermining Christianity. However, there is no consensus about whether Hobbes himself was an atheist, an agnostic, or a deist (see DEISM).

Some of Hobbes's views are Calvinist. He professes that God predestines humans for reward or punishment, that Jesus died only for the elect, and, as indicated above, that God, being the cause of all things, is the cause of sin. Like negative theologians Hobbes asserted that God is so great as to be incomprehensible. The proof is straightforward. Everything that humans know begins with sensation and is finite. God cannot be sensed and is infinite. The apparently descriptive language that Christians use about God is not literally true, but honorific. God is said to be simple, motionless, merciful, and all-seeing because to say such things honors God. God should be honored, not described, because God should be an object of worship, not science.

Hobbes did endorse a form of the First Cause argument for the existence of God. Every event in the world has a cause that is itself caused by something earlier, although it would be impossible for this chain of causes to extend infinitely because then the movement of nothing would be explained. Therefore, there must be a first cause, whom people call God. (The weak point in this argument is that by Hobbes's philosophy, every cause has a cause and hence God himself should need a cause.)

During the 1650s and 1660s Hobbes devoted most of his time to advancing his scientific and mathematical views, including various unsuccessful proofs that a circle can be squared. However, he defended his religious views in several notable works, especially Mr Hobbes Considered in his Loyalty, Religion, Reputation and Manners (1662) and An Historical Narration Concerning Heresy and the Punishment Thereof (1680). (The latter may have been a response to a failed attempt in 1666 to have him tried for HERESY.) Hobbes deflated heresy by describing the word's early use: any opinion. Christianity itself was originally a heresy, and it was only when it acquired political power that the church used the word as a term of abuse. English monarchs rarely used the charge of heresy to physically punish laypersons, the Catholic Queen Mary I being the notable or notorious exception. ELIZABETH I reversed Mary's policies. Heresy is also discussed in similar terms in an appendix to the Latin version of Leviathan (1668).

Hobbes continued fighting for his views into the 1670s when he was well into his eighties. In the 1670s he produced notable, if flawed, translations of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey. He died in late 1679 at the age of 91; he is buried inside the church of St. John the Baptist, Hault Hucknall, Derbyshire.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Hobbes, Thomas. Leviathan. Edited by A.P. Martinich. Peterborough, Ontario: Broadview Press, 2002.

———. "The Questions Concerning Liberty, Necessity, and Change." In The English Works of Thomas Hobbes, edited by William Molesworth, vol. 5. London: John Bohn, 1840.

Secondary Sources:

Curley, Edwin. "Calvin and Hobbes, or, Hobbes as an Orthodox Theologian." Journal of the History of Philosophy 34 no. 2 (1996): 257–271.

Manenschijn, Gerrit. "Jesus is the Christ": The Political Theology of Leviathan" Journal of Religious Ethics 25 no. 1 (1997): 35–64.

Martinich, A.P. The Two Gods of Leviathan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

———. Hobbes: A Biography. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Tuck, Richard. "The Christian Atheism of Thomas Hobbes." In Atheism from the Reformation to the Enlightenment, edited by Michael Hunter and David Wootton. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Wright, George. "Hobbes' 1668 Latin Appendix to Leviathan." Interpretation 35 (1991): 323–413.

P.MARTINIC

HOFMANN, MELCHIOR (1495?–1543)

Anabaptist leader. Melchior Hofmann was an Anabaptist leader noted for visionary and eschatological ideas. A Swabian, in the 1520s he preached Lutheran reform in the Baltics, Sweden, and Schleswig-Holstein, but this opposition to MARTIN LUTHER'S (1483–1546) view of the Eucharist, his radical ideas, and his claim of direct revelations from God created conflict with the authorities and Lutheran preachers. His 1526 Exposition of the Twelfth Chapter of Daniel predicted the end of the world in 1533. He moved to Strassburg in 1529, where he linked up with other visionaries and joined the Anabaptists. Some said he was the prophet Elijah. His Exposition of the Secret Revelation of John predicted the appointment of 144,000 apostolic messengers and named Strassburg as the site of Jesus's return and the expected spiritual Jerusalem. Arrested in 1530, he escaped and moved to East Frisia with some 300 followers, where he organized an Anabaptist congregation in Emden. Alternating between Holland and Strassburg, he continued his apocalyptic preaching but was rearrested in 1533. The Strassburg authorities, suspecting him of sedition, put him in prison, where he died in 1543. Hofmann published over twenty-five writings, including his important book on BAPTISM, The Ordinance of God (1530), and a book on Romans. Melchiorite ideas contributed to revolutionary Anabaptism at Münster, even though Hofmann would probably have opposed that undertaking.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Hofmann, Melchior, "The Ordinance of God." Translated by George Huntston Williams. In Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers: Documents Illustrative of the Radical Reformation. Edited by George Huntston Williams and Angel M. Mergal. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1957. 182–203.

Secondary Source:

Deppermann, Klaus, Melchior Hoffman [sic]: Social Unrest and Apocalyptic Visions in the Age of Reformation. Translated by Malcolm Wren. Edited by Benjamin Drewery. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1987.

ROLLIN S.ARMOUR SR.

HOGG, JAMES (1770–1835)

Scottish romantic poet and novelist. A shepherd born near Selkirk, SCOTLAND, Hogg received little formal education, but taught himself and displayed considerable skill at versifying the pastoral scenes and stories of Lowland Scotland. Discovered early in his career by Sir Walter Scott, the “Ettrick Shepherd” moved to Edinburgh, where he interacted with the major figures of British ROMANTICISM. After five years, he returned to a dual career in rural Scotland, supporting himself financially through writing while unsuccessfully farming until his death.

Hogg’s most famous work, a psychological thriller, The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner (1824), adeptly combined murder mystery with theological critique, using typically Romantic literary devices to produce a sardonic portrait of Calvinistic ANTINOMIANISM prevalent in rural Scotland. The novel depicts the ill-fated joining of Robert Wringhim Colwan with the DEVIL, who uses his protégé’s theological views to drive him to murder and insanity. His namesake and guardian, the Rev. Robert Wringhim, raises him to believe that Robert’s eternal SALVATION is irrevocably secure, while simultaneously asserting the reprobation of his older brother and father. Rapt in this knowledge, the young man meets with a mysterious BIBLE-toting (but never-praying) stranger, who agrees perfectly with all his views of PREDESTINATION and ultimately convinces him to smite the nonelect (see ELECTION). Caught between the theological rationale of the devil and purported devotion to God, Robert descends into madness and suffers the judgment that he so readily pronounces on others. Although some have read the novel as a blanket condemnation of religious dedication, Hogg remained a sincere Christian, whose writings criticized religious hypocrisy while championing the devotional piety and theological discernment of the common layperson.

See also Calvinism; Literature

References and Further Reading

Jenkins, Michael. "The Devil's Theology: Theological Reflections on James Hogg's The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner." Evangelical Quarterly 62 no. 2 (1990): 157–174.

Smith, Nelson C. James Hogg. Boston, MA: Twayne Publishers, 1980.

STEPHEN R.BERRY

HOLIDAYS AND FESTIVALS

Early Protestants took great pains to differentiate holy day from holiday, typically by insisting on the sacred nature (hallowed by God) of the former and the profanity (hallowed by men) of the latter. This distinction was not salient before the sixteenth century. Indicating a day or period when ordinary occupations are suspended, often but not always for festive purposes, holiday as a concept is a product of the Protestant REFORMATION. Over the course of several centuries, Protestant holidays took shape such that they partially resembled the festivals that had accompanied the many holy days of the Catholic Church (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). Closely associated with holiday, but distinct in meaning and function, festival has a long history in the Western world; the word is derived from the Latin festum (“public joy, merriment, revelry”) and feria (“abstinence from work in honor of the gods”). Although continuing to be a forceful concept for Catholic peoples, festival barely registers as a religious concept in regions dominated by Protestantism.

Early Protestant reformers succeeded in their attempts to rationalize holidays and festivals: both the numbers and duration of holidays have severely attenuated between the sixteenth and twentieth centuries. However, indulgence, wastefulness, and materialism reemerged with a vengeance, threatening to crowd out the liturgical and religious messages of Christmas and Easter, essentially the only holidays that survived the reformation of the calendar. On the other hand, Protestantism suffuses civic holidays that commemorate the nation-state and its people’s sacrifices. Theological debates within Protestantism over holidays and festivals have received little scholarly attention; the study of the history of holidays themselves, however, is a cottage industry. This essay focuses on three moments in that history that intersect with major developments in Protestantism. It first addresses calendar reform between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries; then turns to the ascent of the modern Christmas and Easter in the nineteenth century; and closes with the prominent place of civic holidays as keystones to the civil religions of modern nation-states in the twentieth century.

The Reform of the Calendar

In the wake of the Protestant Reformation, the same theological and moral objections to popular CULTURE that animated a range of Europeans also fed efforts to reform and reshape the religious calendars of Protestant countries. The numerous saints' days bequeathed by Roman Catholicism and the christological structure of the liturgical year (layered as it was over pre-Christian rites and festivals) each contained numerous pagan elements. Furthermore, the intermingling of profane practices with sacred observances was anathema to many Protestants. From a moral perspective, the popular culture to which the reigning calendar gave shape allowed for far too much debauchery, idleness, and neglect of work. As MARTIN LUTHER observed, "With our present abuses of drinking, gambling, idling, and all manner of sin, we vex God more on holy days than on others." He further decried the many days of work lost and the excessive spending engendered by a calendar rich with holy days, festivals, and feasts. Whereas Luther was far more moderate than many other Protestant reformers, his theological and moral critique of holy days became standard within the varieties of Protestant justifications for the reform of the calendar.

It was in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century ENGLAND that an enduring divide within Protestantism concerning the calendar, and holidays, emerged. This divide can easily be summed up in the shorthand juxtaposition of Anglican against Puritan (see ANGLICANISM, PURITANISM). In 1536 Henry VIII limited the number of holy days, largely in the attempt to introduce a regular rhythm of work. Some feasts were kept as high holy days, including those of the Apostles, the Blessed Virgin, the Nativity, and Easter day; others were demoted to days to be kept holy; and others were banished altogether. The Parliament of Edward VI in 1552 restored some of the holy days that had been eliminated, such that twenty-seven holy days, in addition to fifty-two Sundays, were set aside from work for PRAYER and WORSHIP. Several years later the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER featured the holy days in red letters, thus the term "red letter day" came to connote holiday. Because Protestant theology insisted that SAINTS could not intercede on behalf of supplicants, the few saints' days that remained in the calendar, such as the feasts of St. George, St. John the Baptist, and St. Michael the Archangel, were occasions to honor the saints, rather than to pray to them.

Still, for Puritans and other reform-minded Protestants these Anglican alterations to the calendar were hardly sufficient because they perpetuated both Roman and pagan beliefs and rituals. In the 1570s successful attacks on the observance of Christmas and other holy days in SCOTLAND fed the zeal of reformers. They maintained that scriptural sanction for the observance of holy days was limited solely to Sabbaths. In 1640 nonconformists (including Puritans) who gained the upper hand in England abolished observance of Christmas and all the saints' days (see NON-CONFORMITY). At the same time, across the Atlantic Protestant reformers of various stripes (Puritans, BAPTISTS, Presbyterians, and Quakers) succeeded in establishing a calendar devoid of all holy days but the Sabbath (see PRESBYTERIANISM; FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). With the Restoration in 1660, Charles II revived the Anglican ecclesiastical calendar with its moderate round of holy days.

Although more research needs to be done, it seems clear that it was during the last quarter of the seventeenth century that theologians differentiated holy days from holidays, with some proclaiming the necessity, and indeed the beauty, of each, and others declaiming holidays as perversions and blasphemy. The Edwardian calendar, with slight alterations under ELIZABETH I, stayed in place through the eighteenth century. Over the decades the popular observance of saints' days and holidays (which had continued despite official injunctions) diminished in frequency and intensity, although ministers like COTTON MATHER could still be found decrying the "Mad Mirth, long Eating, hard Drinking, lewd Gaming, rude Reveling" of the Christmas season. By the nineteenth century, middle-class Protestants rarely celebrated holidays; deeply religious though they were, it was the Sabbath that provided the rhythm for their year. As one contemporary observed: "The red-letter days, now become, to all intents and purposes, dead-letter days."

Modern Holidays: Festivals of Consumption

Consumer capitalism, which began to take shape in the eighteenth century and was ascendant by the nineteenth, played the most significant role in reviving the two holidays—Christmas and Easter—that now demarcate the Protestant calendar. Although the wild and wanton celebration of the nativity waned in Protestant circles during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the public festivities (above all, wassailing) and private customs (e.g., gift-giving) that accompanied New Year's did not. In seeking to transform the celebration of New Year's into a religious occasion for the renewal of Christian commitment, evangelical Protestants unwittingly rediscovered Christmas during the first half of the nineteenth century (see EVANGELICALISM). Christmas suited their purposes far better than did New Year's eve, in that it more easily fit into a Christian, domestic, and commercial framework. In terms of Christianity, Christmas provided the opportunity to revisit the birth of Christ, which was becoming more and more important in Protestant circles because of the rise of a liberal theology that in stressing the goodness of mankind was highly Christocentric (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). In the nineteenth century, a period when private domesticity gained powerful ideological force, Christmas became the preeminent moment for enshrining the FAMILY, and thereby constricting unruly public behavior. Above all, as a network for retailing and marketing spread, whetting the desires and appetites of Anglo-American, British, and Continental Protestants, Christmas became a sanctioned moment for indulgence, primarily in the form of gift-giving and feasting. At first it was the domestic and commercial aspects of Christmas that took hold of the LAITY'S imagination; in the late decades of the nineteenth century Protestant clergy introduced Christmas sermons, decorations, pageants, and HYMNS, which met the laity's expectations for consecration of the nativity of Christ.

With the exception of Anglicans and Lutherans (see LUTHERANISM), most Protestants did not celebrate Easter until the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Here again, consumer capitalism was responsible for transforming an austere and somber moment in the Christian cycle into an exuberant rite of spring. As creating beautiful church interiors assumed more and more importance among a range of Protestant denominations, holiday decorations were granted special importance in that they glorified God and uplifted Christians. One proponent of floral decorations at Easter explained: "The joy of our hearts at the Resurrection of our Saviour—the seal of the completion of His work on earth—must surely be even greater than on the festival of His birth. The festival, coming as it does in early spring, is best commemorated by the use of as many flowers as possible." The emphasis on church décor inevitably led to the "Easter parade" of hats and dresses, obtained in the marketplace along with confections, novelties, and cards made specifically for Easter. The Easter egg, an ancient symbol of fecundity, returned as a commodity, as did rabbits and chicks. Although Easter has never taken on the massive commercial powers of Christmas, it was again the admixture of domesticity, Christianity, and commerce that recast the liturgical moment as a holiday for Protestants in the late nineteenth century.

Although it is clear in hindsight that the commercialization of Christmas and Easter resuscitated the holidays for Protestants, theological and social critiques of the market-orientation of each celebration have been standard fare for more than a century. However, as the leading religious historian of American holidays, Leigh Eric Schmidt, has explained "a common feature of festivity is to overindulge, to eat, drink, or spend to excess, lavishly to use up resources otherwise diligently saved. The surfeit of gifts and spending associated especially with Christmas, but also with other holidays, gives expression to a kind of festal excess that is often fundamental to celebrations." It is then the admixture of commerce and Christianity that has allowed Christmas and Easter to flourish in a calendar that Protestants have otherwise purged of festivity.

National Holidays and Civil Religion

Just as the modern Christmas and Easter resulted from the interweaving of Christian and capitalist imperatives, a potent mix of Protestantism and patriotism has given shape to civic holidays that celebrate the modern nation-state. As the historian David Cressy has shown, the calendar of early modern England was "an important tool for declaring and disseminating a distinctively Protestant national culture." To the Protestant calendar were added national, secular holidays, such as royal accession day and Gunpowder Plot day: on these days the convening of religious services, the ringing of church bells, and the offering of prayers marked the festivities. Similar nationalist rites and cycles characterize the calendars of most nation states, regardless of their religious orientation. Nevertheless, Protestantism has energized the emergence of what sociologist Robert Bellah identified in 1967 as Civil Religion, that is a distinct set of religious symbols and practices that serves to solidify the political legitimacy of nation-states.

Nowhere has civil religion flourished more vigorously than in the United States. The Declaration of Independence, the Constitution, and the BILL OF RIGHTS are scripture for the civil religion of the United States; by the same token, the Fourth of July and Thanksgiving are the high holy days for this religion, with Memorial and Veterans Days playing minor, though important, roles. Founding Father John Adams predicted that Independence Day “will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games and sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other.” Throughout the nineteenth and into the twentieth century, religious and political oratory on the Fourth of July has focused on the nation and its people’s divine mission and blessings. Thanksgiving Day, originating in the American CIVIL WAR, was according to one chronicler “originally regarded with almost the same reverence as was shown for Sunday. Religious services were held in the churches and after the services the families gathered around the table.” Today spectator sports join religious services, political oratory, and festive dinners. Although CHURCH AND STATE are separate in the United States, the material and rhetorical symbols constituting its civic holidays make it clear that it is a Protestant God’s country. Were it not for the reform of the calendar accomplished by a variety of Protestants animated by a variety of theological convictions, there would be no room for the civil religion, let alone the civic holidays, which with Christmas and Easter provide contemporary rhythms of work, rest, consumption, festivity, and thanksgiving.

See also Sabbatarianism

References and Further Reading

- Bellah, Robert, and Phillip E. Hammond. Varieties of Civil Religion. New York: Harper & Row, 1980.
- Burke, Peter. Popular Culture in Early Modern Europe. New York: Harper & Row, 1978.
- Cox, Harvey. The Feast of Fools: A Theological Essay on Festivity and Fantasy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1969.
- Cressy, David. Bonfires and Bells: National Memory and the Protestant Calendar in Elizabethan and Stuart England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.
- Dennis, Matthew. Red, White, and Blue Letter Days: An American Calendar. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Hall, David D. Worlds of Wonder, Days of Judgement: Popular Religious Belief in Early New England. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989.
- Hill, Christopher. Society and Puritanism in Pre-Revolutionary England. New York: Schocken Books, 1964.
- McCrosen, Alexis. Holy Day, Holiday: The American Sunday. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2000.
- Pleck, Elizabeth. Celebrating the Family: Ethnicity, Consumer Culture, and Family Rituals. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Schmidt, Leigh Eric. Consumer Rites: The Buying and Selling of American Holidays. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.

ALEXIS MCCROSSEN

HOLINESS CHURCHES

See Holiness Movement

HOLINESS MOVEMENT

The Holiness Movement is a predominantly North American Protestant religious movement arising in the nineteenth century. It was characterized by an emphasis on the Wesleyan doctrine of SANCTIFICATION and focused on the postconversion experience of “entire sanctification.” The Holiness Movement was centered in a deeply emotional and experiential FAITH, with the result that quasi-Methodist sects were formed.

History

In the mid-nineteenth century, members of the Methodist Church, then the largest church body in the United States, became dissatisfied with the declining moral standards of their church. The Methodists’ DocTRINE of “Christian perfection” was believed to have been abandoned for spiritual and moral complacency. A distinct movement came into being, which sought to address these issues.

The Holiness Movement was officially founded in the “National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Christian Holiness,” which met in Vineland, New Jersey, in July of 1867 (see CAMP MEETINGS). Large crowds attended the meetings, where thousands claimed to have received the “second blessing” of sanctification. The “first blessing” was CONVERSION itself. The Association, which later became known as the National Holiness Association, reported to have over 200 full-time “holiness evangelists.”

The Methodist lay preacher and advocate of women’s ordination, PHOEBE PALMER, was a catalyst for the Holiness Movement (see WOMEN; WOMEN CLERGY). Palmer, later known as “the Mother of the Holiness Movement,” taught that perfection in love eliminated all sinful desires. She held “Tuesday Meetings for the Promotion of Holiness.” These were prayer meetings, beginning in 1839, that were influential in the spreading of the Holiness Movement. The Movement spread through house meetings similar to Palmer’s, sparking a larger revival. Characteristic of the Holiness Movement was its support as one of the first churches to accept women to ministry.

The revivalist CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY subscribed to the Holiness Movement's teachings. He and his colleagues at Oberlin College, Ohio, formed the Oberlin Perfectionism branch of the Movement. Advocates of the Holiness Movement included William Boardman, author of Higher Christian Life (1858); James Caughey, author of Methodism in Earnest (1850); and Asa Mahan, author of Guide to Christian Perfection (1839) and second president of Oberlin College. In America the journal Guide to Christian Perfection (1839–1845), later the Guide to Holiness (1846–1901), was founded by Timothy Merritt and edited by Phoebe Palmer. The journal's distinctive devotion to Holiness doctrine had the effect of bringing this doctrine to other denominations in North America and across the Atlantic to ENGLAND.

The Holiness Movement found an audience in Europe in the 1870s where the HIGHER LIFE movement held conventions during the time of the Second Great Awakening. The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life (1875), by HANNAH WHITALL SMITH, was inspired by her personal experience with the holiness camp meetings. Her book increased the popularity of the Movement especially in England. There the KESWICK MOVEMENT originated from the Holiness Movement's teaching on sanctification, although taking a more expansive view of divine GRACE.

Theology and Issues

The Holiness Movement taught a modified form of JOHN WESLEY'S Arminian doctrine of grace, which emphasized a cooperation of the human and divine will in the granting of Christian perfection. The postconversion event of "entire sanctification" incorporated several aspects. Foremost, the experience resulted in a divine cleansing from the tendency to commit willful SIN. This became an unreserved consecration and surrender to the will of God. A divine enablement was given to the believer, which was an unconditional love for God and neighbor. This experience is commonly referred to as "entire sanctification," "holiness," the "second blessing," "the blessing," the "baptism with (or of) the Holy Spirit," "Christian perfection," or "full salvation." The divine enablement often coincided with the experience of avoiding worldly behavior, such as immodest dress, card playing, gambling, drinking, and association with secret societies.

Sectarian tensions had begun to form between supporters of the Holiness Movement and the Methodist bishops in the last decades of the nineteenth century (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). The "stay-inners" and the "come-outers" typified two divisions of the Methodist Church. Some, such as H.C.Morrison, later president of Asbury College and Theological Seminary in Kentucky, was a "stay-inner" who remained with the Southern Methodist Church. However, others left the Methodist church as early as 1843. The once exuberant and revivalistic Holiness Movement was waning by 1900, with the newly forming Pentecostal Movement on the rise (see REVIVALS; PENTECOSTALISM).

The Holiness Movement was reported to have several doctrinal eccentricities. The Divine Church (1883), written by John P.Brook, represented the radical ECCLESIOLOGY of the Movement. Brook was one of the more theologically astute of the “come outers,” who argued that all human organizations of Christianity were “The Church of Sect.” Instead of his Methodist Episcopal Church being governed by episcopal oversight, Brook believed that Christ was to be the sole Ruler of the church.

Many within the Holiness Movement sought after the phenomenon of the “baptism of fire.” This sect of the Movement was led by Benjamin Irwin and originated in Iowa, in 1895. Irwin’s followers were characterized by their receiving a miraculous visitation of the Spirit after the “second blessing.” Those who received “the baptism of fire” would scream, shout, or fall into trances. The conservative teachers of the Holiness Movement rejected this splinter group, regarding the “second blessing” and the “baptism of fire” as one and the same.

Some twenty-three Holiness denominations arose between 1893 and 1900. Current denominations, formed in the period of the Holiness Movement, are the CHURCH OF GOD (1881), the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE (1908), and other denominations using “Holiness” as part of their names. The Church of the Nazarene is the largest of the Holiness churches, which has a strong presence in North America and the United Kingdom.

See also Arminianism; Awakenings; Methodism, England; Methodism, North America; Orthodoxy; Sectarianism; Wesley, John; Wesleyan Holiness Movement

References and Further Reading

- Dieter, Melvin Easterday. The 19th-Century Holiness Movement. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1998.
- Harper, Albert F., gen. ed. Great Holiness Classics. 6 vols. Kansas City, MO: Beacon Hill Press, 1984–1994.
- Jones, Charles Edwin. A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1974.
- . Perfectionist Persuasion: The Holiness Movement and American Methodism, 1867–1936. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 2002.
- Kostlevy, William C., and Gari-Anne Patzward, eds. Historical Dictionary of the Holiness Movement. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2001.
- Smith, Hannah Whitall. The Christian’s Secret of a Happy Life. Ulrichsville, OH: Barbour Publishing, 2002.

CHRISTOPHER M. COOK

HOLL, KARL (1866–1926)

German church historian. An influential church historian and a founding figure of modern studies on MARTIN LUTHER, Karl Holl was born on June 15, 1866, in Tübingen and died on June 23, 1926, in Berlin. He grew up in a religiously and politically liberal family. After studying THEOLOGY and philosophy in Tübingen (1884–1888), where he and many of his contemporaries were influenced by the theology of ALBRECHT RITSCHL, Holl experienced a religious crisis. From his study of original sources, he came to acknowledge that the truth of biblical revelation presumed by Ritschl was not unambiguously clear. A solution came in 1894 when ADOLF VON HARNACK secured him a position in Berlin as a scholarly collaborator with the commission of church fathers for the Prussian Academy of Sciences. Holl qualified to teach at a university in 1896, and in 1900 received a position in Tübingen as professor of church history. In 1906 he returned to Berlin as a professor. His scholarly work stood for years in the shadow of his famous colleague Harnack.

Faculty members praised Holl as an extraordinary scholar of the church fathers. In his countless works on the early church and on other periods of church history through his day, he brilliantly combined subtle philological criticism, sharp-minded analysis, and crucial philosophical-theological research of original sources. Holl made a broad impact on church history with the publication of his book on Luther in 1921. It appeared at the same time as the second edition of KARL BARTH'S commentary on the letter to the Romans and supported the turn away from liberal theology in German Protestantism. With the systematic examination of Luther's early works, Holl produced a new understanding of the reformer's theology that was far more extensive than previous versions. The nine essays in this volume focused on Luther's doctrine of JUSTIFICATION as well as his hermeneutics, ECCLESIOLOGY, ETHICS, and theory of the state.

Although Holl argued in strict historical terms, he was convinced that Luther's thought held direct relevance to the present. Thus he felt obliged to address contemporary issues, especially during World War I and the period after 1918. Unlike his colleagues, Holl did not distort Luther as a nationalist figure. He also valued JOHN CALVIN, although he considered Luther's theology superior. During World War I, Holl joined the right-wing German Fatherland Party, which militated against the peace accord ratified by the German parliament and for a continuation of the war. Holl had a very reserved relationship to the Weimar Republic. He hoped that Luther's religiously realized moral idealism would lead to Germany's spiritual renewal. In 1933, many of Holl's students, among them Erich Vogelsang, Hermann Wolfgang Beyer, Hanns Rück-ert, Heinrich Bornkamm, Helmuth Kittel, and especially Emanuel Hirsch—thought that they could interpret and find this notion of renewal in the emergence of German nationalism. Such political-theological definitions sharpened the contrast between advocates of dialectical theology and advocates of the "Luther Renaissance."

See also Neo-orthodoxy

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Holl, Karl. Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte, vols. 13. Tübingen, Germany: 1921 and 1928.

Secondary Source:

"Johannes Wallmann, Karl Holl, und seine Schule." Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 4 (1978): 1–33.

MARTIN GRESCHAT

HOLOCAUST

The term “Holocaust,” from the Greek for “a burned offering,” has been used since the 1960s to refer to the murder of approximately 6,000,000 European Jews by Nazi Germans and their collaborators during World War II (1939–1945). Since the 1970s, the Hebrew word “Shoah” (catastrophe) has entered common usage as a synonym.

Hatred of Jews was the center of Nazi ideology. Hitler and his associates preached what the scholar Saul Friedländer calls “redemptive anti-Semitism”: the belief that Jews were the root of all evil, and Germany could be saved from collapse only by destruction of Jews and Jewish influence. Religious prejudices were just one element in Nazi ANTI-SEMITISM, with its pseudoscientific notions of “blood” and “race” and its paranoia about international conspiracies, but for many Christians in GERMANY and throughout Europe, old habits of Christian anti-Judaism helped normalize the new strain of hatred.

Debate continues over whether the label “Holocaust” includes persecuted groups other than Jews. Jews were the main target of Nazi genocide; against the Jews National Socialist Germany mobilized all of its resources: bureaucratic, military, legal, scientific, intellectual, and religious. But the Nazi German state also initiated systematic mass killing of people deemed handicapped and European Gypsies (Roma). These programs shared with the genocide of the Jews personnel, methods of killing, and goals of so-called racial purification. In these cases—Jews, Gypsies, and the handicapped—the perpetrators sought out children for killing, an indication that the intention was total annihilation.

National Socialist Germany also persecuted, incarcerated, and killed Communists, homosexual men, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and African-Germans, as well as many Polish gentiles and Soviet prisoners of war. Often members of these groups shared the torments heaped on Jews, Gypsies, and the handicapped. These cases are not usually included under the term “Holocaust,” however; they were either less massive in scope and less total in intention than the Jewish genocide—for example, Jehovah’s Witnesses, of whom about an estimated 2,000 were killed in German camps—or, as with the three million Soviet POWs killed or left to die of hunger and disease, those targeted did not include children.

It is difficult to determine when the Holocaust began, because a series of steps culminated in the slaughters Nazi jargon labeled the “final solution” to the “Jewish problem.” In January 1933, Adolf Hitler was appointed chancellor of Germany. Within months his regime introduced measures to crush Communists, exclude Jews from public life, and sterilize supposed bearers of hereditary diseases. Hitler also began preparing for war in search of Lebensraum—living space in eastern Europe for the allegedly superior “Aryan race.”

Only 37 percent of Germans ever voted for Hitler’s National Socialist German Workers’ Party, and in 1933 many Germans had misgivings. However, Hitler proved masterful at engineering foreign policy successes and organizing shows of public support that generated enthusiasm. Moreover, key elites—Protestant church leaders and many top Catholics, conservatives, university professors, and civil servants— welcomed the new regime. They applauded its hard line against “godless Bolshevism” and praised its pledge to honor “blood and soil” and break the supposed stranglehold on cultural life of Jews, “degenerates,” homosexuals, and liberals. Many Protestants hoped that the Nazi revolution would spark a revival of public Christianity and restore their church to what they believed was its rightful place at the center of German life. In March 1933, the Nazi government opened the first concentration camp at Dachau, near Munich.

By 1935, Nazi legislation defined “Jews,” and by contrast “Aryans,” a necessary step toward isolating, expropriating, and murdering Jews in the German Reich and the areas that it controlled. Although Nazi ideologues insisted that Jewishness was racial, their legal definition relied on religious distinctions. Germans with three or four grandparents of the Jewish faith counted as “non-Aryans,” that is, “Jews,” regardless of their own or their parents’ affiliations and beliefs. The laws also created categories for mischlinge, Germans of “mixed blood.” Both Christian German churches, Roman Catholic and Protestant (Evangelisch), cooperated by providing the baptismal certificates on which proof of “Aryan blood” depended.

The November 1938 pogrom, which came to be known as Kristallnacht, was the first widespread, violent public attack on Jews and Jewish property in the Third Reich, which by late 1938 included Austria and part of Czechoslovakia. Groups of Nazi thugs—stormtroopers, Hitler Youth, party elites—torched synagogues, smashed windows of Jewish shops, plundered Jewish homes, and assaulted Jewish women and men. Other Germans joined in the looting; some looked on or grumbled about disruption of public order. Some 20,000 Jewish men were incarcerated in concentration camps. In the wake of the pogrom, many Jews fled Germany. Between 1933 and 1939, the Jewish population of Germany dropped from around 500,000 (about 1 percent of the population), to between 200,000 and 300,000. Many sought refuge elsewhere in Europe—FRANCE, POLAND, the NETHERLANDS—where they fell into German hands again during the war.

It was not Jews, but rather people deemed handicapped who became targets of the first program of mass killing. Beginning in 1939 with an initiative to murder children, the euphemistically named “euthanasia” or T-4 Program involved doctors, nurses, bureaucrats, and social workers, as well as administrators of mental hospitals, many of them church-run, in the slaughter of 70,000 to 80,000 Germans considered “lives unworthy of living.” Despite efforts at secrecy, information leaked out. Public protest peaked in 1941 when private citizens and prominent churchmen—

Protestants as well as Catholics—denounced the murders. Although Hitler announced a halt, killings continued under cover.

In September 1939, Germany invaded Poland. The Holocaust was inextricably linked to the war. National Socialist goals of racial purification and spatial expansion made WAR not only necessary but desirable in the minds of Hitler and Nazi “true believers.” War delivered into German hands the large Jewish populations of eastern Europe—

Poland, Ukraine, ROMANIA, HUNGARY, and elsewhere—as well as the Jews of the west: France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. War hardened the perpetrators and numbed onlookers.

With the war, Nazi persecution expanded and accelerated. Ghettoization of Jews in Poland began in 1939; by June 1941, with Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union, Nazi perpetrators began implementing total annihilation. Mobile killing squads, the Einsatzgruppen, accompanied regular German military into Soviet territory with orders to shoot high-ranking Communists and Jews. In killing fields and death pits, from southern Ukraine to Lithuania, the Einsatzgruppen shot more than one million Jews. They also murdered Gypsies and patients from mental hospitals. By late 1941, the killers sought more efficient methods and had begun experimenting with poison gases used in the T-4 Program. By 1942, the Nazi killing centers of Belzec, Chelmno, Treblinka, Sobibor, Majdanek, and Auschwitz-Birkenau were in full operation. The Nazis did not restrict attacks to religious Jews; they also targeted secular Jews and Christians who had converted from JUDAISM, as well as children and in some cases grandchildren of converts.

In 1944 and 1945, as Allied forces closed in, SS leader Heinrich Himmler ordered the killing centers evacuated and the remaining inmates killed or relocated to German-held territories. Death tolls on the resulting “death marches” were high; “liberation” came too late for many. Those Jews who survived found themselves without homes, families, or communities. As they struggled to begin new lives—in the displaced-person camps of Germany, in Palestine and later Israel, in the UNITED STATES, CANADA, AUSTRALIA, SOUTH AFRICA, and LATIN AMERICA—some tried to put the past behind them. Others vowed to remember.

The decentralized nature of Protestantism makes it almost impossible to draw comprehensive conclusions about its relationship to the Holocaust. On the one hand, examples of institutional failure are easy to find. Inside Germany, the pro-Nazi GERMAN CHRISTIAN movement (Glaubensbewegung “Deutsche Christen”) openly endorsed anti-Jewish measures. Its members controlled the governing bodies of most of Germany's regional Protestant churches and used their positions to attack Jews, Judaism, and so-called “non-Aryan Christians.” They also promoted efforts to purge all aspects of Judaism from Christianity. Even the CONFESSING CHURCH did little to protect the few “non-Aryan” pastors in its midst. Some North American Protestant Churches, particularly those with organizational or ethnic ties to Germany, propagated a positive view of National Socialism, at least until the United States entered the war.

On the other hand, however, institutional Protestantism also fostered heroism. Some Protestant groups in North America worked hard to learn about conditions in Europe and to lobby their governments to accept refugees. French HUGUENOTS in the villages surrounding Le Chambon-sur-Lignon, led by their pastor Andre Trocme and his wife Magda, saved the lives of many Jews. They were inspired at least in part by their Protestant faith and love of Scripture. In occupied DENMARK, an overwhelmingly Protestant country, church leaders publicly decried Nazi anti-Semitism and encouraged participation in rescues. Danes mobilized to protect their 8,000 Jewish fellow citizens, and almost every Danish Jew survived.

How have Protestants dealt with the complex legacy of the Holocaust? The answer depends on which Protestants and where. In North America, many Protestants, although fascinated with the hero DIETRICH BONHOEFFER, tend to think of the Holocaust as irrelevant to their faith. In Germany, in contrast, the relationship between the Protestant Churches, their adherents, and Nazi crimes has been the subject of intense debates since late 1945, when German Protestant leaders, under pressure from the world ecumenical community, issued the Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt. The declaration never explicitly mentions Jews or any specific crimes of Nazi Germany or the Protestant churches, but it does ask forgiveness “for not witnessing more courageously, for not praying more faithfully, for not believing more joyously, and for not loving more ardently.”

In the half-century since World War II, Jewish-Christian dialogue has moved beyond the tentative contrition of the Stuttgart Declaration. For example, the 1997 Apology of the French Catholic bishops begged forgiveness from the Jews of France for teaching contempt for Jews. Protestants and Catholics alike have benefited from Jewish thinkers who articulated some of the burning issues connected with the Shoah. Does the Holocaust demand that humanity adopt a relentless position of questioning toward God? Does it call for rejection of ideas of “covenant” and “chosen people?” Is the Holocaust a challenge to affirm Judaism so as not to hand Hitler a “posthumous victory,” as Emil Fackenheim argues? Is it, as Emmanuel Levinas writes, about “loving the Torah more than God,” experiencing the force of a God who hides his face through the intermediary of a teaching, the Torah? Protestant theologians, such as Franklin Littell, have posed these and other questions, although most of the discussion they generate—like that among their Catholic counterparts—still focuses on Christians as bystanders rather than perpetrators in the Holocaust.

References and Further Reading

- Berenbaum, Michael, and Abraham J. Peck, eds. The Holocaust and History: The Known, the Unknown, the Disputed and the Reexamined. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1998.
- Bergen, Doris L. War and Genocide: A Concise History of the Holocaust. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.
- Ericksen, Robert P., and Susannah Heschel, eds. Betrayal: German Churches and the Holocaust. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1999.
- Friedländer, Saul. Nazi Germany and the Jews, Vol. 1, The Years of Persecution. New York: Harper Collins, 1997.
- Hilberg, Raul. The Destruction of the European Jews. 3 vols. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1961; rev. ed., New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985.
- Wistrich, Robert. Hitler and the Holocaust. New York: Modern Library, 2001.
- Yahil, Leni. The Holocaust: The Fate of European Jewry. Translated by Ina Friedman and Haya Galai. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

DORIS L. BERGEN

HOLY COMMUNION

See Lord's Supper

HOMESCHOOLING

Homeschooling represents an increasingly viable option for educating children in a family context, reflecting traditional and contemporary ideals about child development, parental responsibility, and social identity. For the greater part of human history, most children were educated at home, by relatives, in the subjects deemed most important by their families: subsistence skills and crafts, household accounting, and faith. Since the industrial revolution, most governments have taken charge of childhood education.

In the late nineteenth century in the UNITED STATES, many Roman Catholic families turned to parochial schools for the educational and faithful formation of their children, whereas most Protestants found public schools matched their denominational and ideological identity. As the twenty-first century progresses, however, a number of Protestants are finding that public education does not meet their parenting and pedagogical priorities. Homeschooling allows Protestant families to combine an appreciation of INDIVIDUALISM with a reconstruction of community; homeschooling can accommodate particular learning aptitudes and personalized instruction, while providing the time and opportunity for socializing and combining resources with other like-minded families. Homeschooling represents an alternative to institutionalized educational practices and a return to more particularized formation.

Protestant homeschooling families tailor their home education to fit their identity and their priorities. Many use homeschooling to counter the popular secularization and evolutionism (see DARWINISM) with curricula that feature CREATION SCIENCE, EVANGELICALISM, and FUNDAMENTALISM. Others highlight ties between CHURCH AND STATE (through curricula that emphasize God's work through democracy and capitalism) or resist such ties (by underscoring Christian identity over nation-state citizenship). Still others specialize in performing arts, academics, sports, or BIBLE, depending on their talents, interests, and convictions, while distancing themselves from unwanted indoctrination. In these ways, Protestant homeschooling enables families to reclaim the primary responsibility for childhood education, restore Christian formation to a prominent role in their children's lives, and reconstruct the social settings for learning and growing.

Homeschooling allows Protestant families to determine the context, content, and style of their children's education. Approaches range from the radically unstructured unschooling to the reproduction of a particular school setting in the home, and everything in between. Some families designate one stay-at-home parent as primary educator; some split the educational activities more evenly; some single parents juggle work and education responsibilities, with or without the help of extended families and other community members. Families may assemble learning materials on their own or select from an extensive market of curricula designed for homeschooling. Homeschooling support groups all over the world offer families chances to team teach, share expertises, and exchange ideas.

Laws about government supervision of home-schooling families vary among countries, states, and provinces. In general, homeschooling families are responsible for providing their children with an education comparable to that provided by the government. The evaluation of homeschooled children's learning process ranges from standardized testing to certified individualized assessment to parental discernment. Most colleges and universities welcome applications from students who have been homeschooled through elementary and high school; homeschoolers generally adapt well to college settings.

See also Education, Overview

References and Further Reading

- Holt, John Caldwell. Learning All the Time: How Small Children Begin to Read, Write, Count, and Investigate the World Without Being Taught. Cambridge, MA: Perseus Books, 1990.
- Saba, Laura, and Julie Gattis. The McGraw-Hill Homeschooling Companion. New York: McGraw-Hill Trade, 2002.
- Zeise, Ann. Regional and World Wide Homeschooling: A-Z.
<http://www.gomilpitas.com/homeschooling/regional/%20Region.htm> (April 15, 2003).

MARGARET B.ADAM

HOMILETICS

See Preaching

HOMOSEXUALITY

Homosexuality was barely a topic of discussion within any Christian tradition between the origins of Protestantism in the sixteenth century and the middle of the twentieth century. The presumption of nearly all churches was that homosexuality was a perversion of God's created order. By the end of the twentieth century, however, the debate over homosexuality had become (and remains) one of the most divisive and disputed issues confronting most Protestant denominations. Debates over homosexuality have become a touchstone for fundamental disagreements over the interpretation and application of Scripture, the roles and functions of TRADITION, reason, and experience, and very different understandings of Christian identity and GENDER formation. Traditional presumptions about homosexuality have been challenged on all of these fronts, and although nearly all Protestant denominations remain officially opposed to homosexual expression, there has been significant movement by many in the Protestant traditions toward acceptance of gay and lesbian Christians in the church. This acceptance reflects developments in larger European and American society at the end of the twentieth century.

Debate over Scripture

The BIBLE serves as the springboard for virtually all discussion about homosexuality. Traditional interpretations of scripture have appealed to the creation story in Genesis 1–2, the story of Sodom and Gomorrah in Genesis 19:1–9 (see also parallel stories in Judges 19 and Ezekiel 16:46–56), the prohibitions in Leviticus 18:22 and 20:13, and the Pauline statements in Romans 1:26–27, I Corinthians 6:9, and I Timothy 1:10 as all pointing to divine condemnation of homosexual expression. From this perspective of biblical interpretation Protestant churches have viewed homosexuality as a sinful violation of God's created natural order. With a growing emphasis, however, on both ancient and modern contextual readings of the biblical accounts, these traditional interpretations have been increasingly challenged. Those advocating full inclusion of gay and lesbian people in the church have argued, for example, that the story of Sodom and Gomorrah has to do with sexual violence and rape rather than homosexuality. Similarly, the prohibitions from Leviticus must be seen within the literary and historical context of the whole Holiness Code (Leviticus 17–26), which contains a number of other prohibitions that have traditionally not been followed. Many interpreters of Paul's letters have called attention to Paul's Greco-Roman cultural context, in which pederasty and slave prostitution appear to have been the primary models of homoerotic expression in view.

Matters get more complicated by debates over the appropriate translation of biblical terms from the original Hebrew and Greek languages. In I Corinthians 6:9, for example, the Greek term arsenokoitai (literally “men who go to bed”) has been variously translated as “sexual perverts” (RSV), “homosexual offenders” (NIV), and “sodomites” (NRSV). Given that the term “homosexual” was not coined until the nineteenth century, scholars have increasingly agreed on the need to avoid anachronistic translations and interpretations of the Bible that read contemporary terms and conceptions back into the biblical texts. Beyond debates over biblical texts directly addressing same-sex relations, advocates of more traditional biblical interpretations have contended that scripture endorses heterosexual MARRIAGE as normative, whereas others have questioned whether this is a norm that necessarily excludes gay and lesbian unions.

Debate over Tradition, Reason, and Experience

Taking its lead from the plain sense of scripture, Protestant tradition in the late twentieth century was extremely cautious in changing its approach toward homosexuality. Conscious of the task of being a church semper reformans (always reforming), the leadership of most Protestant denominations took seriously the call by many to reconsider its traditional teachings on homosexuality. In the UNITED STATES, for example, the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A., the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH in America, and the EPISCOPAL CHURCH all engaged in multiyear studies of how to respond to the presence of gay and lesbian Christians in their congregations and in their church leadership. Such deliberations led to deep divisions in each of these denominations, as year after year some church leaders called for the church to change with the times and be more inclusive of gay and lesbian Christians, whereas others called just as strongly for the church to take a firm stand against endorsing any form of homosexual expression, especially by ordained clergy.

Those seeking inclusion of gay and lesbian Christians in the church have emphasized sexual orientation as a natural God-given predisposition that individuals discover as they mature. Those seeking to uphold traditional sanctions against homosexuality have emphasized centuries of church teachings against same-sex practices and, although not seeing homosexual orientation itself as a matter of personal SIN, have argued that such an orientation is a distortion of God's creative purposes. From this perspective homosexual persons can be welcomed into the church but are called to abstain from same-sex relations. Most Protestant churches in recent years have issued official pronouncements ruling against the ordination of non-celibate homosexual Christians, as well as against the blessing or recognition of same-sex unions. Still, significant and vocal movements within the various Protestant denominations have continued to call for full acceptance of openly gay and lesbian clergy and for recognition of gay/lesbian unions and committed relationships. The United Church of Christ and the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA have not prohibited the ordination of gay/lesbian clergy. In 2003, the Episcopal Diocese of New Hampshire elected as its bishop a priest who was in a long-term homosexual relationship. The national General Convention of the Episcopal Church subsequently confirmed the election.

Protestant churches have also sought to incorporate into their reasoning about homosexuality some of the more significant findings from the psychological and biological sciences, although these findings continue to be the subject of tremendous debate. In particular, churches have paid attention to the 1973 decision of the American Psychiatric Association to stop treating homosexuality as a pathology or disordered condition in need of treatment. Some controversial biological research has also suggested various genetic factors contributing to homosexual orientation. These developments have encouraged many to rethink the NATURAL LAW tradition and the degrees to which the formation of gender identity is a function of essential sexual identity and/or of changing social constructions. The significant debate that has ensued in the church has basically been between two camps. On the one hand the majority position advocates that heterosexual marriage has always been God's intended and exclusive norm for the expression of human sexuality (emphasizing the unitive and procreative functions of sex in marriage). On the other hand the minority position advocates that changing notions of gender roles are crucial in shaping all sexual identities, ancient and modern, and that there have always been various notions of sexual identity attributed to divine sanction: polygamy, CELIBACY, eunuchs, levirate, and monogamous marriages, for instance. Although homosexuality has been increasingly accepted as a normal and natural way to live in American and European societies at large, more traditional Protestant churches have called into question both the psychological and physical health of homosexual expression. A number of parachurch and controversial change ministries have arisen that seek to heal people of their homosexuality.

Perhaps the most important and difficult component to factor into Protestant attitudes toward homosexuality involves the ways people have experienced the presence of gay and lesbian Christians in the various denominations. The "coming out" of many prominent Protestant church leaders as gay/lesbian/ bisexual persons has forced churches to respond to the tension created by their effective ministries in light of traditional church teaching against homosexuality. The personal witness of successful and capable gay/lesbian Christian leaders has been a powerful presence that has convinced many to push churches to be more accepting of these leaders in particular and to encourage the larger society to be more accepting of homosexual persons in general. At the same time the traditional Protestant rejection of homosexuality has led many gay and lesbian Christians to leave the church completely or to find local congregations that have publicly embraced an inclusive attitude toward homosexual persons. The rejection of gay/lesbian Christians in several Protestant denominations also led to the formation of the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, a denomination dedicated to the full inclusion of gay/lesbian/bisexual/transgendered Christians. In sum Protestant churches have often been of two minds in their approach to homosexuality. On the one hand many denominations have passed binding resolutions ruling against the ordination of noncelibate gay/lesbian Christians and against same-sex unions. On the other hand most denominations have also passed resolutions calling on elected government officials to pass legislation that makes discrimination against homosexual people illegal.

Changing Views of Homosexuality

A significant factor in twentieth century debates over homosexuality in Protestant (and Catholic) churches can be traced in changing views about homosexuality in the larger society. Three general overlapping stages can be seen in popular attitudes toward homosexuality. At the beginning of the twentieth century homosexuality was viewed as a perversion of God's natural order and was punishable as a crime against God and society. As the century progressed and as general attitudes toward appropriate sexual behavior became more relaxed, a more accepting attitude began to develop toward homosexuality. The language associating homosexuality with "perversion" started to be seen as harsh and judgmental. In the latter half of the twentieth century the language of "sexual preference" began to be employed. This term still suggested personal choice in the realm of sexual activity, but same-sex "sexual preference" increasingly came to be seen as a relatively benign departure from societal norms. Toward the end of the twentieth century, in addition to the language of "sexual preference," the term "sexual orientation" gained prominence, which suggested that an individual had no real choice about gender identity and sexual attraction, and that such identity was more of a given. Because homosexuals were not personally responsible for choosing their sexuality, a movement developed that encouraged healthy and self-affirming homosexuals not to be ashamed of their identity, but to accept their homosexuality as a natural predisposition and orientation. This acceptance led, in the last decades of the twentieth century, to "gay pride" and to a sense of belonging to a gay community seeking and gaining acceptance from the larger society. Such acceptance has led to the tacit nonenforcement of most laws against homosexuality, to the decriminalization of many older laws against homosexual behavior, to the recognition of same-sex domestic partners by many businesses and some states, and to the wide depiction of gay and lesbian people as normal individuals through the vehicle of popular entertainment. These developments and changes in societal attitudes toward homosexuality have had a significant effect on most Protestant traditions, with the result that at the beginning of the twenty-first century many churches are more open than ever toward gay and lesbian Christians, while at the same time most official denominational pronouncements have ruled against the full inclusion of noncelibate gay and lesbian couples. This tension has led to serious debate in the churches about whether Protestant churches are behind the times and failing to follow the lead of God's reforming Spirit by including gay/lesbian Christians, or whether churches are most faithful in holding firm against recognizing any homosexual relationship as legitimate.

The Roman Catholic Church has also faced significant debate and discussion about homosexuality, although on somewhat different terms than those of the Protestant tradition. First, whereas Protestant churches have spent a great deal of energy addressing the issue of whether to allow the ordination of noncelibate gays/lesbians, this has not really been an issue for the Roman Catholic church because all priests are by definition celibate, be they homosexual or heterosexual. In the Protestant tradition clergy are typically married, and this automatically raises the question of how gay or lesbian couples serve as models for Christian marriage, which has traditionally been envisioned in heterosexual terms. Second, in the Roman Catholic tradition the role of procreation in marriage has been central, although the unitive function of sexuality has also gained in importance. This has meant that, because homosexual unions cannot by themselves procreate children, homosexual unions cannot receive the blessing of the church. By contrast in the Protestant tradition the unitive function of sexuality has typically held slightly greater importance than procreation (hence the common use of birth control in the Protestant tradition and not in official Roman Catholic teaching). Thus critics of homosexual relationships have raised questions about the biological complementarity of same-sex couples. Those advocating the appropriateness of blessing same-sex relationships in the church argue that it is wrong to define sexual complementarity in exclusively heterosexual terms.

See also Sexuality

References and Further Reading

- Abelove, H., M.A. Barale, and D.Halperin, eds. The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader. New York: Routledge, 1993.
- Brawley, Robert L., ed. Biblical Ethics and Homosexuality: Listening to Scripture. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1996.
- Comstock, Gary D., and Susan E.Henking, eds. Que(e)rying Religion: A Critical Anthology. New York: Continuum, 1997.
- Hartman, Keith. Congregations in Conflict: The Battle over Homosexuality. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1996.
- Melton, J.G., ed. The Churches Speak on Homosexuality: Official Statements from Religious Bodies and Ecumenical Organizations. Detroit, MI: Gale Research Inc., 1991.
- Nelson, James B., and Sandra P.Longfellow, eds. Sexuality and the Sacred: Sources for Theological Reflection. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1994.
- Schmidt, Thomas E. Straight and Narrow? Compassion and Clarity in the Homosexuality Debate. Downers Grove, IL: Intervarsity Press, 1995.
- Siker, Jeffrey S., ed. Homosexuality in the Church: Both Sides of the Debate. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1994.

JEFFREY S.SIKER

HOOKER, RICHARD (1554–1600)

Church of England theologian. Richard Hooker is considered a theorist of the Elizabethan settlement and a major contributor to the theology of the early CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Hooker took his B.A. and M.A. at Oxford in 1574 and 1577, respectively, before becoming a fellow of Corpus Christi College in 1579. His first sermon came at St. Paul's Cross in London in 1581 on the topic of soteriology (SALVATION). Hooker argued that, although God wished all humans to be saved, the process depended on the correct response from believers. Meant as an anti-Calvinist statement (see CALVINISM), Hooker delayed drawing the conclusions this view demanded until near the end of his life, just before the Arminians put forward views almost identical to Hooker's (see ARMINIANISM). In 1585 Hooker became master of the Temple Church in London, the church attended by members of the Inns of Court, the training institutions for common lawyers. At nearly the same time and with the backing of Archbishop of Canterbury JOHN WHITGIFT (?-1604), he engaged in a major polemic with the Presbyterian Walter Travers. His marriage in 1588 to Joan Churchman brought him a large dowry from her merchant tailor father, a fortuitous event in that Hooker displayed little ambition for higher office and spent the rest of his life on his writing and his priestly duties.

Building on the earlier work of JOHN JEWEL (1522–1571), his first patron, and Whitgift, Hooker's eight volumes Of the Lawes of Ecclesiastical Politie (published between 1593 and 1662) took the new Protestant establishment back to first principles of divine and NATURAL LAW. The first four books of this work supported that establishment almost as soon as they appeared and provided a compelling argument for conformity. Gradually Hooker's work acquired more and more authority, until by the nineteenth century it was almost considered the foundational text of the Anglican church (see ANGLICANISM), and a comprehensive and coherent explication of it. In the last quarter of the twentieth century, scholars pointed out inconsistencies and contradictions in Hooker's writing, but these criticisms were largely overturned in favor of the coherence and unity of all eight books, although it has been generally admitted that Hooker wrote originally as a polemicist. (For just one of many references to current events, see VII. 18.7.) This realization has led to the further rejection as anachronistic of the notion that Hooker's work could have theorized an Anglican middle way. Historians of the late twentieth century agree that there was already a very broad theological consensus in an English national church and that it overlapped to a marked degree with the magisterial reformers on the continent, as did Hooker's work.

In 1593 John Windet, Hooker's cousin, published the first four books of the Lawes, perhaps because no other publisher was interested. The work had little commercial appeal, earning Hooker only £30. Until his death at his church of Bishopsbourne in 1600, Hooker worked on the rest of his volumes, but lived to see only the publication of book V by Windet in 1597. The remaining three books presented numerous textual and publication problems, but Hooker's friend John Spenser saved what now remains of them, although not in Hooker's autograph. James Ussher saw to the publication of books VI and VIII in 1648, but VII did not appear until 1662.

A Lawful Universe

Hooker made his purpose and his audience explicit in the preface to the Lawes, lending support to the interpretation that he designed the entire work as a unit and wrote it sequentially. He named Calvinists, Familists, and ANABAPTISTS as his target (later adding all separatists), but not Catholics. Claiming that he wanted ecumenical understanding, Hooker tried to reduce controversial points to first principles that could be broadly accepted. Hooker set out from an Aristotelian framework to argue that the universe was entirely governed by law according to a system of causes ordained by God. All law was therefore divine. Despite the weakness of human reason by comparison with the divine, humans could nonetheless attempt to discern these causes and thus know the universe's structure. They could be assured that God never broke God's own law. They could also be assured that the universe was strictly hierarchical, as was its mirror in civil society. Hooker used these basic principles to ground both civil and ecclesiastical governments.

How to resolve disputes and prevent them from destroying civil order was Hooker's initial problem. Instead of relying on coercion, Hooker turned to divine providence. Humans, who began as an almost Lockean "book, wherein nothing is," could gain virtue through education. The key point was learning how to deal with things in different, morally neutral actions that became good or evil through the combined force of knowledge and will. The will was free, but its right action depended on reason, which in turn depended on law. Humans had discovered law by natural reason and decided together to be eternally bound by its precepts. Positive law was made by the community and only by it, but once such law existed, the members of the community had to obey. The best manner of life was "to study which way our willing obedience both unto God and man may be yielded even to the utmost of that which is due" [III.9.3].

Like his humanist predecessors, with whom Hooker had much in common, his view of civil society was heavily indebted to Cicero and to Roman law. Unlike some of the humanists, Hooker also had a thorough familiarity with medieval canon law and sacramental practice, which he often put to good use, as for example when he adapted the doctrine of circumstances to his idea of church polity. Like most medieval thinkers and many of the humanists, Hooker borrowed most from Aristotle, especially the principle that any legitimate government demanded the consent of the governed. The way Hooker applied that principle, however, left the governed with very little recourse. The fact that “corporations are immortal,” for example, meant that laws made hundreds of years earlier remained in force. Although insisting that kings required consent to their rule, Hooker gave subjects no protections against tyranny. The basis of Hooker’s notion of political obligation was St. Paul’s commonly cited letter to the Romans 13:1–5, which stated that subjects were obligated in conscience to obey civil AUTHORITY. Because Hooker also said almost at the outset that “my whole endeavor is to resolve the conscience” [Preface], making of his book an enormous manual of casuistry, it becomes clear that believers had little room for legitimate resistance to the established order. This led to a nearly complete “chieftly” or “principality” of church government inherent in the English crown. Although Hooker regularly criticized bishops for failing to take advice from their clergy and opined that the prince also needed counsel, he laid down no institutional machinery for providing it. The limits of his notion of consent emerge from his attacks on the presbyterians for playing to the crowd. In practice, consent meant little.

Curiously, despite his deemphasis of law’s coercive power, Hooker stoutly maintained that it needed “a constraining power,” to be supplied by human officeholders, above all the bishops. Ultimately, Hooker appealed to what became an almost distinctively “Anglican” concept of the mean, which he argued was “prelacy, the temperature of excesses” [VII.18.12]. Hooker strongly supported the bishops, including their dignity and their economic power, labeling them “receivers of God’s rents” and bitterly criticizing expropriation of ecclesiastical property. Bishops deserved “a state of wealth proportionable” to the “great jurisdiction” they exercised, at least at the present when power demanded wealth [VII.24.18].

A Liberal Conservative

Hooker combined liberal-sounding views in the abstract with their use in much more coercive fashion. Similarly, he swayed back and forth between institutionalized forms of power and vaguer, almost transcendent, notions of who exercised it. Both these oscillations arose from his primary concern with the community, not with humans nor their institutions. Such distinctions were of no importance, provided only that a proper Christian church had correct belief. As long as it did, there was no difference between the body politic and the mystical body of the church, both of which coalesced, after all, in the church’s external political form. Hooker’s emphasis on collectivity led him to reject PREDESTINATION and the gathered church Calvinists often deduced from it, and to offer in their place a strongly sacramental way of salvation, embracing all members of the visible church. Against the “Puritans” Hooker argued that no human society, not even the church as a political body, could lose its right to legislate, as it would if a permanent model of church government were really to be found in the New Testament (see PURITANISM). (He further criticized them by claiming that scripture provided only one kind of law, not the only source through which humans learned God’s intentions.) Hooker put some of his own most cherished principles under pressure in defense of the community: TRADITION, for example, was not immune to its will and reason. Hooker’s stress on finding the most comprehensive form of Christianity, the largest possible community, led him to invoke the authority of general councils through which all Christian nations could be united. As he put it in book I, humans would find it easier to put into effect Christ's "heavenly precepts...concerning peace and unity, if we did all concur in desire to have the use of ancient councils again renewed" [I.10.15].

No doubt one reason that Hooker's work proved so appealing was its eclecticism of both substance and approach. Thus, although Hooker drew heavily on the medieval Schoolmen for content, he used his humanist education when constructing arguments based on them. Instead of deploying the favored medieval device of the syllogism, he used the more rhetorically appealing enthymeme, a syllogism with one premise (usually the minor) left out. Hooker's work, despite its solid philosophical grounding, is at least as important for its rhetoric. Like some of his Henrician predecessors, perhaps especially Thomas Starkey (whose work Hooker could not have known), Hooker played with language, especially at critical moments, above all when discussing key terms for political society. Book VIII's treatment of sovereignty and related ideas brusquely turned its back on the kind of precision that Jean Bodin and other contemporaries had taken much care over. It may not be an accident that many critics have thought this the most "constitutional" part of Hooker's work, just as Starkey was for long regarded as the first modern liberal (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). In fact, both were confronted with the same problem—how to resolve the competing claims of community and ruler—and both solutions were distinctively time-bound. Hooker, whatever his long-term appeal, was also very much a man of his century in his selection of sources, stretching from the recently rediscovered Cyprian (a third-century father with a markedly ecumenical appeal in the sixteenth century, largely because of his notion of the papal office) to Hermes Trismegistus, then thought to be the source of a theology more ancient than Moses's and the patron of magicians, but really a mythical figure.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Hill, W. Speed, gen. ed. The Folger Library Edition of the Works of Richard Hooker. 7 vols. Cambridge, MA and Tempe, AZ: Harvard University Press and Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1977–1998.
 —, ed. Studies in Richard Hooker: Essays Preliminary to an Edition of his Works. Cleveland: Case Western Reserve University Press, 1972.

Secondary Sources:

- Allen, J.W. A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century. London: Unwin, 1928.
 Archer, Stanley. Richard Hooker. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
 Kirby, W.J.Torrance. Richard Hooker's Doctrine of the Royal Supremacy. Leiden: Brill, 1990.
 Lake, Peter. Anglicans and Puritans? Presbyterianism and English Conformist Thought from Whitgift to Hooker. London: Allen and Unwin, 1988.
 McGrade, A.S. "The Coherence of Hooker's Polity: The Books on Power." Journal of the History of Ideas 24 (1963): 163–182.

Walton, Izaak. The Life of Mr. Richard Hooker. In The Works of that Learned and Judicious Divine Mr. Richard Hooker, edited by John Keble. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1888.

THOMAS F.MAYER

HOOKER, THOMAS (1586–1647)

English-American Puritan. Hooker was born in Markworth, Leicestershire, England, in July 1586. He matriculated at Queens College, Cambridge, in 1604 but soon transferred to Emmanuel College, a hotbed of PURITANISM, where he first took baccalaureate and masters degrees, then served as fellow and catechist. He was silenced for NONCONFORMITY in 1629, and fled to the NETHERLANDS two years later, returning secretly in 1633 to ship out for the recently settled American colony of Massachusetts Bay, where he became first pastor of the congregation at Newtown (later Cambridge). Following a series of territorial, theological, and personal disputes, he led a migration to Connecticut in 1636, founding the church at Hartford, where he died on July 7, 1647.

Hooker gained transatlantic renown as an analyst of the CONVERSION experience, particularly the “preparatory” stages before GRACE, anatomized most thoroughly in his work The Application of Redemption (1656). Valued for his political advice and skills, he influenced Connecticut’s legal and constitutional structure, urging its founders to dissociate freemanship from church membership (unlike Massachusetts), and he twice moderated intercolonial synods, most notably the 1637 meeting that facilitated ANNE HUTCHINSON’S banishment. One of three New Englanddivines invited to attend the WESTMINSTER AsSEMBLY, he declined to serve, but attempted to influence its deliberations literarily in such works as A Survey of the Summe of Church Discipline (1648), which advocated a congregational over presbyterian polity, and The Covenant of Grace Opened (1649), which defended infant BAPTISM. Preacher, polemicist, civic leader, and, most of all, an acute pastoral psychologist, Hooker contributed as much as any firstgeneration American Puritan to constructing the culture of Reformed Protestantism that became known as “the New England Way.”

See also Conversion; Hutchinson, Anne; Nonconformity

References and Further Reading

Bush, Sargent, Jr. Thomas Hooker: Spiritual Adventure in Two Worlds. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1980.

Shuffelton, Frank. Thomas Hooker, 1586–1647. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1977.

CHARLES L. COHEN

HOPKINS, SAMUEL (1721–1803)

Congregational minister, theologian, and abolitionist. Hopkins was born in 1721 in Waterbury, Connecticut, graduated from Yale College in 1741, and then studied at JONATHAN EDWARDS'S (1703–1758) “school for the prophets” in Northampton, Massachusetts. He pastored in Housatonic (later named Great Barrington), Massachusetts from 1743 to 1769, and at the First Congregational Church of Newport, Rhode Island from 1770 until the year of his death, 1803.

Hopkins was arguably the greatest student of Jonathan Edwards and the most significant theologian of late eighteenth-century New England. Along with Joseph Bellamy (1718–1760), he was a leading expositor of the New Divinity, the first indigenous school of American CALVINISM, and the initial and most significant stage of the New England Theology—the most enduring intellectual tradition in United States history. The term “new divinity” was originally a label of scorn devised by Old Calvinist ministers who complained that Hopkin’s theology represented a radical departure from traditional Reformed doctrine. The movement was also variously called Hopkinsianism or Hopkintonianism, although proponents of it preferred the names Consistent Calvinism or Edwardseanism. It attracted many of the most talented thinkers of Yale College and became a powerful force in New England CONGREGATIONALISM well into the nineteenth century.

Theology

Drawing upon the religious thought of Edwards—especially his Freedom of the Will (1754), Original Sin (1758), and True Virtue (1765)—Hopkins reshaped Reformed theology to address the challenges of ENLIGHTENMENT thinking, to demonstrate the rationality and moral accountability of Calvinist doctrine, and to combat the dual threats of ARMINIANISM and antinomianism. In so doing he creatively appropriated key Enlightenment concepts to make Calvinism more responsive to the intellectual and social changes of eighteenth-century culture. This is most notably seen in his effort to construct an apologetic that demonstrated the consistency of Reformed dogma with divine benevolence and to explore the meaning and implications of benevolence for Christian living.

Hopkins rejected those principles that compromised traditional Reformed tenets of divine sovereignty, original sin, irresistible grace, human depravity, eternal punishment, and the necessity of supernatural revelation. His forceful and provocative restatement of Calvinist concepts—pushing them to their logical limits—gave his theology the distinctive qualities for which it is known. First, in order to reconcile divine providence and benevolence with a Reformed understanding of sin, he argued that God willfully permitted and superintended sin to produce the best possible universe. Second, in combating Arminian tendencies surrounding the practice of preparation for grace, Hopkins alleged that unrepentant “awakened” sinners who used the means of grace (i.e., church attendance, Bible study, prayer) committed greater evil than “unawakened” sinners who neglected those means. Such awakened sinners aggravated their guilt by resisting the gospel message. Third, in an attempt to eliminate selfish motives for seeking salvation, he developed the extreme, hypothetical position that the truly regenerate would so submit to God’s will that they would be willing to be damned if God’s glory required it. Finally, in advancing his theory of holiness as “disinterested benevolence” to being in general, he was so intent on curtailing the influence of British benevolist moral philosophy in New England—and its sanctioning of natural self-love as a basis for virtue—that he seemingly left little room for a genuinely Christian self-love. He typically used selflove as a synonym for selfishness—a condition that inflicts all unregenerate love—in order to set it apart from a proper regard for self that is consistent with regenerate or true virtue.

Hopkins’s lifelong theological work was summarized in his eleven hundred page System of Doctrines (1793), the most significant eighteenth-century American systematic theology. The System codified New Divinity teachings and became the basis for the theological training of future Edwardsean clergy. Written at a time when deism in America was reaching its heyday, and when doctrinal system building was being discredited by Enlightenment empiricists, Hopkins defended the place of scriptural, systematic divinity among the sciences. Here he articulated two doctrines that were hallmarks of the New Divinity: a governmental theory of ATONEMENT and a constitutional view of original sin that connected human sin to Adam not by means of a theory of imputation but by means of a divine constitution.

Slavery and Social Reform

Hopkins’s doctrine of disinterested benevolence, with its call to radical, self-denying Christian service, provided a morally rigorous basis for social reform and evangelism that inspired evangelical social activists, religious reformers, and missionaries of the early nineteenth century. In his own life, the implications of his teaching were most clearly seen in his opposition to SLAVERY. From the slave-trading port of Newport, Hopkins became one of New England’s earliest and most outspoken abolitionists (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). Convinced that slavery and the slave trade were America’s greatest sins, opposition to them was for him a litmus test of the ethical purity of the American Revolution. He was one of the few colonial leaders who consistently applied the libertarian rhetoric of the revolution to all of America's inhabitants. He also attempted to establish a mission colony of ex-slaves back in AFRICA in order to spread Christianity and promote the coming millennium (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM)—hoping that some greater good might arise out of the injustice of slavery.

See also Slavery, Abolition of; Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources

Hopkins, Samuel. The Works of Samuel Hopkins, D.D. 3 vols. Boston: Doctrinal Tract and Book Society, 1852.

Secondary Sources

Breitenbach, William. "The Consistent Calvinism of the New Divinity Movement." William and Mary Quarterly 41 (1984): 241–264.

———. "Unregenerate Doings: Selflessness in New Divinity Theology." American Quarterly 34 (winter): 479–502.

Conforti, Joseph A. Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement: Calvinism, the Congregational Ministry, and Reform in New England Between the Great Awakenings. Grand Rapids, MI: Christian University Press, 1981.

Guelzo, Allen C. Edwards on the Will: A Century of American Theological Debate. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1989.

Jauhiainen, Peter D. "An Enlightenment Calvinist: Samuel Hopkins and the Pursuit of Benevolence." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Iowa, 1997.

West, Stephen, ed. Sketches of the Life of the Late, Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D.D. Hartford, 1805.

PETER D. JAUHAINEN

HOUSE CHURCHES, BRITISH

During the late 1960s and 1970s in Britain, groups of evangelical Protestants began abandoning their churches to gather in houses; the term “house church” derives from this.

Their theological roots lie in the nineteenth-century Brethren movement and Catholic Apostolic Church, and in twentieth-century classical PENTECOSTALISM. Like earlier Pentecostals, adherents saw being “born again” as essential for entering the Christian community, and practiced believers’ baptism in water and “of the Holy Spirit,” this latter experience issuing in charismata (“spiritual gifts”) such as speaking in TONGUES, a feature they share with the charismatic movement, with which they are often linked.

Three distinctives set them apart from their Pentecostal forerunners. First, they believed denominations should not exist and must be replaced by the church or “kingdom.” The second distinctive is ECCLESIOLOGY. They aimed to “restore the church” to what they perceived as the New Testament pattern for church life, leading Andrew Walker (1985) to name them “Restorationists.” Their emphasis on and literal interpretation of the BIBLE share similarities with FUNDAMENTALISM. In their leadership structure men known as apostles, around whom church groups gathered, had responsibility for overseeing networks of churches, which were in turn led by elders. Third is the (often criticized) doctrine of discipleship or “shepherding,” in which Christians submitted themselves to leaders’ guidance and AUTHORITY.

From the mid-1970s two principal groupings emerged. Walker (1985) calls these R1 (the more conservative group including leaders Bryn Jones, Tony Morton, and Terry Virgo) and R2 (the more liberal group including the leader Gerald Coates). About a dozen networks developed during a period of rapid growth through the 1970s and early 1980s. From the late 1980s growth slowed and fragmentation increased. “R2” churches became more open and ecumenical, adopting the title “new churches,” whereas “R1” churches kept their original emphases. “New church” quickly also became an umbrella term for the whole house church movement. Most congregations now worship in public buildings rather than houses, but their emphasis on the local church as an extended family remains.

British “new church” membership stands at 120,000–140,000; attendance is double this. The largest network is Terry Virgo’s New Frontiers International, with 300 congregations worldwide, the majority in Britain.

See also House Churches, Asia; Restorationism

References and Further Reading

Walker, Andrew. Restoring the Kingdom: The Radical Christianity of the House Church Movement. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1985.

———. “Crossing the Restorationist Rubicon: From House Church to New Church.” In Fundamentalism, Church and Society, edited by Martyn Percy and Ian Jones. London: SPCK, 2002.

KRISTIN J.AUNE

HOUSE CHURCHES, INTERNATIONAL

For three centuries after Christ, Christians met for fellowship and worship in private homes. The earliest known church building was found in Dura-Europos, dated to the mid-third century. It was apparently a typical house that was renovated for the meeting of Christians. At some point it ceased being used as a home and was dedicated entirely to church functions. After the introduction of the basilica in Constantinople, the church building became the primary meeting place for Christians. Nonetheless homes were often used for meetings such as the Cluny “cells” in Viking-dominated Gaul or JOHN WESLEY’S mid-week class meetings in eighteenth-century Anglican ENGLAND. These were exceptions to the rule; church ARCHITECTURE has been a central feature of Christianity since late antiquity.

An unexpected development for Christianity came in the mid-twentieth century with the meteoric rise of the house church movement to over 100 million participants worldwide by 2000. This was caused indirectly by massive religious oppression, especially under Communist authorities, and, most significantly, in CHINA. Although prayer and worship meetings were common long before 1949, the Communist authority’s attempts to curb or control religious practice made houses the only viable meeting place for many Chinese Christians. Nonetheless house meetings were highly dangerous and groups had to remain very small to avoid detection. Independent churches from the beginning met in homes, emphasizing personal EVANGELISM. Witness Lee’s Local Church, which typified these churches, would find its congregations shouting in unison “Denominationalism is a sin.”

These churches were better prepared for the brutality of the Cultural Revolution and remained quietly active from 1950 to 1980. After 1980, often in opposition to government-approved churches, the house churches, most led by poor farmers from Henan, began to grow rapidly and organize themselves. One unique feature of these churches is a pyramid structure where house churches at the grass roots level are unaware of similar churches in the same network. Western observers have consistently underestimated their numerical strength because their contact is limited to the lower levels of the pyramid. By the year 2000 the dozen largest of these movements, together with 300 smaller networks, numbered in excess of one million house churches. The leaders of the larger networks have met in recent years for fellowship and strategy. Paradoxically, rapprochement between these movements and government-related churches, in Protestant, Independent, and Catholic contexts, has been steadily growing.

Another significant house church movement is found among African churches, whether they are Protestant, Anglican, Catholic, or Independent. In these cases either church buildings were never built or the locus of weekly fellowship is found primarily in homes.

Partly because of the success of house churches in China and AFRICA, Christians on all continents have adopted and adapted many of its features into traditional models. The cell church model, a parallel development, is one of the more successful. In many cases there are few discernible differences between these two movements. Other countries with significant house or cell churches include BRAZIL, Cambodia, INDIA, INDONESIA, the PHILIPPINES, Singapore, South KOREA, and more modestly the UNITED STATES. The future of the house church movement in Asia and around the world appears to be bright as new movements continue to spring up and existing ones grow and mature.

See also House Churches; Wesley, John

References and Further Reading

- Castillo, M.Q. The Church in Thy House. Manila, The Philippines: Alliance Publishing, 1982.
- Simson, W. Houses That Change the World: the Return of the House Churches. Carlisle, UK: OM Publishing, 2001.
- White, L.M. "House Church." In Ferguson, Everett. Encyclopedia of Early Christianity, 439–440. New York: Garland. 1990.
- Yun, Brother, with P.Hattaway. The Heavenly Man: the Remarkable True Story of Chinese Christian Brother Yun. London: Monarch Books, 2002.

TODD M.JOHNSON

HROMÁZDKA, JOSEF LUKL (1889–1969)

Czech theologian. The most influential representative of Czech Protestantism in the twentieth century, Hromádka was born in Hodslavice, northern Moravia on June 8, 1889. As a Lutheran, he studied THEOLOGY in Vienna, Basel, Heidelberg, and Aberdeen. Affected by the tragedy of World War I, he gave up his original allegiance to the study of CULTURAL PROTESTANTISM and rediscovered the biblical message as the source of his theological orientation. As a pastor and professor of the United Church of Czech Brethren (since 1918), he struggled for a new orientation of Czech Protestantism in the newly founded Czechoslovak republic.

Hromádka identified himself with the new state and tried to enrich its democratic climate by making a genuine Protestant contribution. Philosophically, he was close to the democratic vision of T.G.Masaryk. Socially, he endorsed the socialist ideas in the tradition of the Czech Reformation (Hussites and Czech Brethren) as well as those of Swiss religious socialism (LEONHARD RAGAZ). Theologically, he moved in the direction of the dialectical theology of KARL BARTH, who became his personal friend. Thus in many respects, Hromádka was recognized as the “voice” of Czech Protestantism both in his country and ecumenically. Without compromising, he mobilized the resistance of his church and his state to the threats of fascist ideology.

After the German occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1939, Hromádka had to leave his country. He found refuge in the UNITED STATES, where he became an influential teacher at the Princeton Theological Seminary. After World War II, he returned to his home country, which in 1948 had become a communist nation. Hromádka tried to find place for his church under difficult conditions, avoiding the false alternative of an opportunistic cooperation with, or a rigid opposition against, the new system. Although often disappointed, he kept hoping that the oppressive totalitarian structure might be eventually changed in the spirit of true socialism. Thus he became one of the protagonists of a Christian-Marxist dialogue. The sovereign “yes” of the Gospel is valid even in the Christian approach to atheists. In this sense, Hromádka worked at home and in the international ecumenical movement. He was one of the “founding fathers” of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and served as vicepresident of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF THE REFORMED CHURCHES. Because of his socialist positions, he was often attacked. But even a justified criticism of some of his one-sided theses should not overlook his basic theological integrity and his prophetic call for the churches to search for an unbiased witness even in adverse conditions.

Hromádka died on December 26, 1969 in Prague.

See also Neo-orthodoxy; Socialism, Christian

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Hromádka, Josef L. Doom and Resurrection. Richmond, VA: Madrus Louse, 1944.

———. Gospel for Atheists. Geneva, Switzerland: 1965.

———. Thoughts of a Czech Pastor. London: SCM Press, 1970.

———. Looking History in The Face. Madras, India: 1982. Hromádka, Josef Lukl. The Church and Theology in Today's Troubled Times. Prague: Ecumenical Council of Churches in Czechoslovakia, 1956.

———. Theology Between Yesterday and Tomorrow. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1957.

———. Challenges of Remembering. Prague, Czechoslovakia: Christian Peace Conference (International), 1998.

Luknic, Arnold. Ecumenical Theology of Josef Lukl Hromádka 1911–1939. . Diss. Aquinas Institute of Theology, 1983.

Opocenský, Milan. From the Reformation to Tomorrow. Geneva, Switzerland: World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 1999.

JAN MILIC LOCHMAN

HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR (1480–1528)

Anabaptist reformer. Hubmaier, a student of John Eck, received a doctorate in THEOLOGY at the University of Ingolstadt. An effective administrator and preacher, he became prorector of the University of Ingolstadt in 1515 and then pastor and chaplain at the Regensburg cathedral. In 1521 he was appointed priest in the town of Waldshut, which although on the Swiss border was in Austrian-Habsburg territory.

By 1522 Hubmaier began to study MARTIN LUTHER'S writings and, with a group of friends, the Pauline epistles. In the midst of these studies, he received—and accepted—a call to return to the Regensburg cathedral. Within a year, however, he was back in Waldshut where he came increasingly under the influence of the reformer HULDRYCH ZWINGLI at a time when the latter and his close followers were beginning to grapple with the issue of BAPTISM. Probably through the Zurich group Hubmaier was led to Erasmus's paraphrases on Matthew and Acts where the prince of humanists presented his unique interpretation of Christ's Great Commission (Matthew 28:19–20), an interpretation with powerful implications for the interpretation of baptism. It was a time, Hubmaier asserted, in which even Zwingli agreed that “children should not be baptized before they [were] instructed in the faith.”

Hubmaier attended the Second Zurich Disputation on October 26–28, 1523, where the Catholic Mass and images were discussed. When, at the close of the disputation, Zwingli turned the implementation of reforms over to “my lords” of the town council, Hubmaier, along with other more radical followers of Zwingli, began to criticize the reformer.

Upon his return to Waldshut in the fall of 1523 Hubmaier began to implement his own reforms. He delivered his Eighteen Articles on the Christian faith, abolished the laws on fasting and CELIBACY, and married—all with the tacit approval of the town council. However, Waldshut was not autonomous, as were the Free Imperial Cities; its overlord was Charles V's brother, Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, an ardent Catholic. Therefore, some time between the end of October and December 11, 1523, the Austrian government in Innsbruck wrote a letter to the Waldshut authorities demanding, on the basis of the Nuremberg Imperial Edict of March 6, 1523, that Hubmaier reverse his reforms.

Nuremberg Edict

This Nuremberg Edict was the product of the “public policy” of Frederick the Wise vis-à-vis Luther’s reformation. It crystallized around ANDREAS RUDOLF KARLSTADT’S celebration of an evangelical mass on Christmas day 1521. Frederick, although he had gone to great lengths to protect Luther’s right to preach the “holy Gospel,” was adamantly opposed to introducing any innovations into the Catholic Church service until they were approved by Christendom. He therefore opposed Karlstadt’s innovations. When the Imperial Governing Council, on January 20, 1522, mandated the undoing of those innovations, Frederick prevailed on Luther himself to rescind the reforms. This policy eventually came to be embedded in the Nuremberg Imperial Edict, and like Frederick’s policy, the edict essentially mandated two seemingly contradictory things. First, no innovations were to be introduced into the Church’s liturgy, ritual, and so forth until a Christian Council could have resolved the problem of Luther’s teachings, given that the latter could lead to unrest or revolt in the realm. Second, only the “holy Gospel” should be preached, although it should be preached according to the “interpretation of those teachers approved by the Christian Church.” Who were the teachers approved by the Christian Church? The Church Fathers or the Scholastics? Humanists and Protestants chose the former; Catholics, the latter. There was, therefore, an immediate division of opinion on this matter, although it was the first stipulation that caused the real problem: if one began to preach “only the holy Gospel,” might one—in the process—discover the Mass to be “an abomination in the sight of God”? Moreover, if one did, would one have to continue to celebrate it Sunday after Sunday? Protestants used the edict to justify preaching of the “holy Gospel” whereas Catholics used it to attack Protestant “innovations.”

The Innsbruck government, therefore, in its late 1523 letter to the Waldshut authorities argued that Hubmaier was preaching a “heretical” version of the holy Gospel and introducing innovations clearly condemned by the Nuremberg Edict of 1523. The Waldshut town council, in its response of December 11, 1523 to this letter, referred specifically to the Nuremberg Edict, saying it had been read from the pulpits of their churches by two priests from Constance. They thus knew what it said and argued that they, as well as Hubmaier, were being obedient to it. The council defended Hubmaier’s preaching, saying that it was Hubmaier’s intention, as he had said from the pulpit after the promulgation of the edict, to preach the “pure and clear Gospel from here on out, which he has done according to our understanding. We even invited the dean and priests to see if he preached anything but the clear and pure Word of God.” If the Austrian authorities wished, the mayor and council continued, they could act in compliance with the edict and send several of the bishop of Constance’s theologians to check on Hubmaier’s ORTHODOXY. If these authorities could prove Hubmaier’s interpretation of the Scriptures wrong, Hubmaier would surely change his interpretation. To do this on the basis of Scripture alone was difficult, as Catholics had learned by this time, and so the Innsbruck government did nothing. In virtually every debate in the Reformation between the contending parties, if it was based on the BIBLE, the Catholics lost. Clearly, the two conflicting interpretations of the edict confronted one another in Waldshut. In the end, however, it was military might that carried the day, not biblical scholarship.

Issues of Baptism

By September 1, 1524, Austrian pressure forced Hubmaier out of Waldshut, so he went to Schaffhausen. There he wrote his pamphlet On the Burning of Her-etics, a ringing defense of religious liberty. His presence in the city caused problems, however, so he returned to Waldshut. Officially, Hubmaier still belonged to Zwingli's party, but on January 17, 1525, Zwingli and his followers met in a last attempt to resolve their dispute over baptism. Although the Zurich council declared Zwingli the official winner of the debate, the radicals refused to acknowledge either the decision or the persuasiveness of the reformer's arguments. On January 21 these followers proceeded to baptize one another upon their confession of faith, introducing "adult" or "believer's baptism" to the world of the sixteenth century.

At this point Hubmaier began to discourage parents from having their infant children baptized; but he still baptized children of parents who were weak in their new faith and wished their children baptized. On February 2, 1525, he published his Public Declaration, offering to prove—in public disputation—that infant baptism was without biblical foundation. With broad popular support, he also began to abolish the Mass, and on Easter 1525 was himself baptized upon his faith by Wilhelm Reublin.

Zwingli responded to these events in two ways. First, he enlisted the Zurich town council in his fight against the radicals; and, second, he began to write against them publicly. His first attack was entitled Concerning Baptism, Rebaptism and Infant Baptism. Hubmaier, now his most articulate opponent, replied with his Concerning the Christian Baptism of Believers, the best defense of believer's baptism written in the sixteenth century.

In Waldshut Hubmaier baptized large numbers of believers, so large some scholars have spoken of ANABAPTISM in WALDSHUT as a mass movement. However, with the defeat of the peasants in the great Peasant War of 1524–1525, in the summer of 1525—an event that Hubmaier was involved in, although as yet that involvement was not public—the Innsbruck government could impose its "Catholic interpretation" of the Nuremberg Edict of the German chief (1524) on Waldshut. On December 5, 1525, Hubmaier fled the city and sought sanctuary in Zurich; but Zwingli was now his enemy. Although the Zurich authorities refused to turn Hubmaier over to the Austrian government, they had him imprisoned after he "lost" a debate with Zwingli and forced him to recant his views. He did so on April 15, but under great qualms of conscience. The recantation did him no good with either Zwingli or the town council, however.

Hubmaier managed to escape Zurich, wandered about for a time, spent some time in Augsburg where he baptized Hans Denck, and, in the summer of 1526 arrived in Nikolsburg in Moravia. Here, under Leonhard von Liechtenstein, Hubmaier and the Anabaptists found sanctuary for a time. The Anabaptist congregation in Nikolsburg grew rapidly under Liechtenstein's protection, and with the arrival of the printer Froschauer, originally from Zurich, Hubmaier could publish his increasingly prolific writings. In late 1526, however, after the Battle of Mohacz, Moravia came into the hands of Ferdinand of Austria, Hubmaier's old nemesis. Because Nikolsburg was becoming such an Anabaptist sanctuary and Hubmaier such a powerfully attractive personality, it was only a matter of time before the Catholic Austrian government would seek to capture Hubmaier and destroy the movement. In August 1527 Ferdinand cited the counts of Liechtenstein to appear before him and demanded the capture of Hubmaier. Four weeks later Hubmaier was in custody and taken to Vienna.

At the heart of the accusations against Hubmaier was his activity in Waldshut; thus, the Nuremberg Edict formed the legal basis for Ferdinand's execution of Hubmaier. Before that happened, however, Hubmaier was allowed to meet and discuss his plight with an old classmate, Johann Fabri, now a high official of the bishop of Constance. The meeting took place in late 1527 and lasted three days. The first day they discussed the Bible and infant baptism; the second day, they discussed the SACRAMENTS in general—the MASS, intercession of the SAINTS, and purgatory. On the last day, they discussed FAITH, good works, Christian liberty, free will, the worship of Mary, and a few other matters. At the close, Hubmaier presented a confession of his faith, called An Account of [His] Faith, which dealt with twenty-seven articles so worded that any Christian could subscribe to them. In matters of baptism and the Mass, the "two most important articles," Hubmaier was willing to await the decision of the future church council mandated by the Nuremberg Edict. However, the Austrian authorities wanted more, and they wanted it now, demanding an unconditional recantation. This Hubmaier could not give them; and so on March 10, 1528 he was burned at the stake.

Significance

Balthasar Hubmaier was one of the most important literary spokespersons for Anabaptism. His tracts on believer's baptism have never been surpassed. At the same time, he saw the reformation of the church from a context much larger than that of most of his Anabaptist brothers. He read widely, quoted Erasmus's interpretation of the Great Commission from his paraphrases, discussed the issue with him, and knew the arguments of all the contending parties. He was also the person who originated the argument that Anabaptists should not be persecuted by the Catholic Church because the latter itself regarded initiation into a monastery as a second baptism. As Luther himself observed, it was the Catholic Church that was the real "rebaptizer."

In 1527 Hubmaier addressed the issue of the church ban, arguing that nothing would ever be right in the church until proper church discipline would be exercised. The tract was a frontal attack on the emerging Protestant state churches. In the same year he wrote a tract defending "the freedom of the will." Borrowing arguments from Erasmus, Hubmaier insisted that man's spirit had remained good in spite of the fall, but that it was—at the moment—under the control of the flesh. Since Adam's fall, he argued, the flesh was useless although the spirit was willing to do good. The human soul was therefore caught between the warring factions. Once the soul had been healed by Christ, it could be freed and could once again obey the Spirit.

Hubmaier also wrote on communion (see LORD'S SUPPER), stressing that the bread and the cup were a memorial of Christ's broken body and shed blood. However, unlike most of the early Swiss Brethren, or Anabaptists, he was not a Staebler (nonresistant) and was not totally opposed to the use of the sword (see PACIFISM). He saw a legitimate role for the use of the sword by the government, and he argued that the authorities had the right to demand obedience from their subjects in this regard. This more positive approach to government and its use of the sword has won him the approval of Baptist historians who nearly universally regard Hubmaier as the ideal Anabaptist. Although a powerful spokesperson, Hubmaier is therefore not entirely typical of early Swiss Anabaptism. At the same time, his attempts at theological compromise in Zurich and later in Vienna during his captivities have detracted from his legacy. However, he strongly opposed some of the influences coming from Saxony and Thuringia, especially the eschatological violence of Hans Hut.

The case of Hubmaier and Waldshut, and later Hubmaier and Nikolsburg, raise some interesting issues for early South German/Swiss Anabaptism because both centers present us with instances in which Anabaptists cooperated with the local political authorities. Are these cases of “Magisterial Anabaptism”? Indeed, for a brief period of time Hubmaier’s movement constituted the “official” church in both regions. Could Anabaptism, even while practicing believer’s baptism, become a “territorial church”? The argument has been made that even the Swiss Brethren, before their final break with Zwingli, sought to convince the latter that their form of Christianity would find great support among the people of Zurich. To what extent, then, did the fact that Zwingli and the Zurich authorities refused to go along with them, and forced them into an oppositional minority group determine their view of the church? It is clear that Luther as well as Zwingli—before they gained the support of the political authorities in their regions—defined the true church in terms of the “congregation of believers.” Yet when they gained political favor and support, they accommodated themselves to the inherited territorial church structure. Could Anabaptism do the same, as the case of Hubmaier seems to indicate? Whatever the case, Hubmaier’s Anabaptist experiment in Waldshut and Liechtenstein does raise some intriguing questions.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Westin, Gunnar, and Torsten Bergsten, eds. Balthasar Hubmaier: Schriften. Gütersloh, Germany: G.Mohn, 1962.

Secondary Sources:

Bergsten, Torsten. Balthasar Hubmaier: Seine Stellung zu Reformation und Täufern 1521–1528. Kassel, Germany: Oncken, 1961.

Estep, W.R. Jr., and Torsten Bergsten. Balthasar Hubmaier: Anabaptist Theologian and Martyr. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1978.

Loserth, Joseph. Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertäufer in Mähren. Brünn, 1893.

———. Die Stadt Waldshut und die vorderösterreichische Regierung 1523–1526. Vienna, 1891.

Sachsse, C.D. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe. Aalen, Germany: Scientia Verlag, 1914.

Schreiber, J.H. Balthasar Hubmaier. Stifter der Wiedertäufer auf dem Schwarzwalde. (vol. 1).

Taschenbuch für Geschichte und Altertum in Süddeutschland. (vol. 2), 1838 and 1839.

Vedder, Henry C. Balthasar Hubmaier, the Leader of the Anabaptists. New York: AMS Press, 1971.

Windhorst, Christoph. Täuferisches Taufverständnis: Balthasar Hubmaiers Lehre zwischen traditioneller und reformatorischer Theologie. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill, 1976.

ABRAHAM FRIESEN

HUDDLESTON, TREVOR (1913–1998)

English bishop. Huddleston was born in Bedford, ENGLAND, on June 15, 1913. Educated at Oxford, he participated in the Christian Socialist Movement and the ECCLESIOLOGY of the OXFORD MOVEMENT. It was from these beginnings that a pattern was formed whereby fresh exposures in his life would intertwine with, and build on, his verbal and written output; onto the Catholic brick would be placed a socialist brick, an antiracial brick, an anticlass brick, a multifaith brick, and so on. His work was his life.

Huddleston was ordained in 1941 and, attracted by their active missionary focus, became a monk at the Anglican Community of the Resurrection, Mirfield, Yorkshire. He was appointed to the township of Sophiatown, near Johannesburg, SOUTH AFRICA, with a people he loved, and he became involved in setting up community cultural projects. In his work, Huddleston influenced many future political leaders of South Africa. Archbishop DESMOND TUTU tells of being inspired to his religious vocation when Huddleston doffed his hat on meeting Tutu's mother, an unheard of action by a white man to a black lady.

After witnessing government abuses in the detainment and relocation of townfolk and the threatened takeover of the local school through the Bantu Education Act, Huddleston became one of the leading figures in the campaign to end apartheid, arguing that such a system could be neither reformed nor collaborated with. In recognition of his work for oppressed South Africans, Huddleston was awarded the title "Isitwalandwe" by the Congress of the People.

In 1956 Huddleston was controversially withdrawn from South Africa just as his book Naught for Your Comfort, an international best-seller highlighting the abuses of apartheid on the black populous, was published. Back in England, he helped found the AntiApartheid Movement and was among the first to advocate economic sanctions and a sports and cultural boycott of South Africa.

In 1960 Huddleston returned to Africa as bishop of Masasi, Tanzania, and worked closely with President Julius Nyerere on the development of national independence. He was later appointed to a bishopric in London, then Mauritius, and finally as archbishop of the Indian Ocean. On retirement, he worked tirelessly as president of the Anti-Apartheid Movement.

Although acknowledged by many who did not share his Anglo-Catholic churchmanship for attempting to create an effective Christian witness in the face of injustice and oppression, Huddleston was criticized for expounding a political gospel message that distracted from the evangelical mission to proclaim a message of saving souls. He was also criticized for his advocacy of socially focused interfaith acts of worship.

Huddleston responded by saying that SIN is never just a personal matter, but has social consequences, and the CHURCH, as salt to the earth, has a responsibility to address these. This came out of an incarnational THEOLOGY, recognizing the image of God in each person as being the basis for fellowship. Alongside this was a conviction that God is concerned not with SALVATION of the soul, but rather with reaching the whole person and in breaking the oppressive bondage of social sin. The Gospel must be culturally relevant, and salvation is a social process shown both through BAPTISM as a point of incorporation into a community and through sharing communion as a sacrament of fraternity.

Huddleston died in Oxford, England, on April 20, 1998. A leading figure in the Anti-Apartheid Movement throughout the second half of the twentieth century, he is best known as a prophetic missionary bishop who highlighted social and racial injustices and as an advocate for a multifaith dialogue.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Socialism, Christian

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Huddleston, Trevor. Naught for Your Comfort. London: Collins, 1956.

———. God's World. London: Fount, 1988.

Secondary Source:

Denniston, Robin. Trevor Huddleston: A Life. London: Pan/ Macmillan, 2000.

JAMES CHAPMAN

HUGUENOTS

Although the origins and meaning of the word remain obscure and the subject of continuing debate, Huguenot was the designation frequently attached to members of the French Reformed Church from the mid-sixteenth century through the end of the eighteenth. During the initial decades of the REFORMATION in FRANCE, the term tended to be used in connection with Protestant political and military efforts—the Huguenot party or the Huguenot military forces, for instance. Eventually, the expression enjoyed extensive application, a practice that was reinforced with the proscription of Protestantism in France toward the end of the seventeenth century. The immense Huguenot diaspora after the revocation of the EDICT OF NANTES in 1685 meant the spread of French Protestant refugees throughout Europe and the wider Atlantic world. These immigrants jealously guarded their Huguenot identity and, even today, their descendants maintain Huguenot societies from Europe and the British Isles to North America and South Africa.

Initial Persecution and Warfare

Protestant ideas circulated in France soon after MARTIN LUTHER issued his stirring call for the reform of Latin Christianity in the late-1510s. By the 1540s and 1550s the Calvinist or Reformed tradition (see CALVINISM) had come to dominate French Protestantism. At the same time harsh persecution by the crown and Catholic Church prompted many early followers to seek refuge in Geneva, whose reform the Frenchman JOHN CALVIN had guided. The city and its church served, in turn, as a springboard for the spread of Calvin's theological views and ecclesiastical polity. Significantly, a number of these French Protestant émigrés trained for the ministry at Geneva. They and others eventually returned to their native France and organized Reformed churches. Beginning in the mid-1550s, Calvinist churches took root at Paris and other important cities, and by 1559 Reformed pastors and elders secretly gathered at Paris in the first national SYNOD.

The growth of the Huguenot churches provoked strong Catholic and monarchical reaction, and in 1562 religious warfare erupted. The strife shattered France for nearly four decades and subsided only with King Henry IV's proclamation of the Edict of Nantes in 1598. Organized and reasonably well-financed armies vied on the battlefield in a series of eight civilreligious wars. Even after 1598, fierce if less widespread conflict erupted on several occasions during the second and third decades of the seventeenth century. Cardinal Richelieu's siege and destruction of La Rochelle in 1628 and the Peace of Alès the following year finally broke Huguenot military power and effectively ended the movement's political influence.

Beyond the clash of rival confessional armies, the assassination of individual political leaders and less premeditated, more spontaneous outbreaks of collective violence—murderous riots and brutal massacres—accentuated the bitterness of these religious wars. A series of clashes during the spring and summer of 1562 was the prelude to wider conflict. In March soldiers loyal to the ultra-Catholic duc de Guise massacred Huguenot worshipers at the eastern French town of Vassy. Over the next several months, Protestants and Catholics fought acrimonious street battles for control of urban areas everywhere in the realm. Thereafter, the disturbances only worsened. The Protestants of Nîmes in southern France massacred some one hundred Catholics, mostly priests and prominent laymen, in September 1567. The most famous and horrifying episode was the Saint Bartholomew's Day massacre of August 1572. When Huguenot nobles gathered at Paris to celebrate the marriage of their young leader Henry of Navarre to the king's sister, the king and queen mother seized the opportunity to eliminate their political rivals. Fanatical Parisian Catholics quickly transformed the affair into a religious bloodbath. Over the course of three days they shot, stabbed, and drowned thousands of Huguenots. Eventually, the carnage spread to other major French cities.

The deadly violence finally came to an end with the Edict of Nantes of 1598. It created an intelligible and logical structure in which Catholics and Protestants could live together without violence and bloodshed. The arrangement permitted the exercise of the Reformed religion, but under restricted circumstances. Huguenots received guarantees of their civil and political rights, including the ability to defend many cities in which they lived and worshiped. The Reformed faithful were assured access to public and royal offices as well as admission to educational institutions. Protestants also feared religiously prejudiced Catholic judges, and in those regions where the Huguenots were especially numerous, the Edict created special bipartisan law courts, the so-called chambres de l'Édit. Equal numbers of Protestant and Catholic judges staffed the tribunals, which were competent to adjudicate any civil or criminal case in which at least one of the litigants was Protestant.

In the decades after the Edict of Nantes, a significant cultural flowering occurred within the Huguenot community. French Protestants established a series of institutions for higher learning; they offered seminary and to some extent university training. Other members of the Huguenot elite gathered regularly in provincial literary and scientific academies to debate political and religious questions, evaluate their own attempts at history and literature, and review the latest discoveries in science. At Paris they participated in salon society and wrote elegant poetry. Huguenot architects even designed important public buildings, including the Luxembourg Palace.

Demographic Realities and Organizational Structures

Despite these substantial, sustained efforts and encouraging initial successes in the religious sphere and wider cultural domain, the Protestant movement in France never advanced beyond the status of a permanent if vigorous religious minority. The Reformation clearly attracted a sizable following among the nobility and urban bourgeoisie. Many artisans and even persons from the rural agricultural world were drawn to Protestantism as well. Yet the protracted strife over the second half of the sixteenth century took its toll. Estimates of the Huguenot population vary widely. The ranks of French Protestants initially swelled to ten percent of the population, roughly 1.8 million in the decade between 1560 and 1570. During the same period there were perhaps 1,400 Reformed churches in France. More important, among the politically influential nobles, Huguenot strength may have been close to fifty percent. This early, rapid growth likely peaked on the eve of the Saint Bartholomew's Massacre of 1572. Thereafter, the numbers declined precipitously. By the end of the sixteenth century Huguenots were roughly seven to eight percent of the total population, accounting for about 1.2 million persons. Over the course of the seventeenth century, the Huguenot numerical strength waned further. The situation likely stemmed from gradual absorption into the Catholic majority through intermarriage and the monarchy's relentless pressure for conversion. When Louis XIV finally revoked the Edict of Nantes in October 1685, French Reformed society totaled 800,000 to one million persons.

The Huguenot presence was heavily concentrated in the western and southern portions of the kingdom. Protestants lived on the Atlantic coast at La Rochelle and were spread across the provinces of Normandy and Poitou. To the south, Reformed communities at towns such as Castres and Montauban, Montpellier and Nîmes became legendary. In addition, a dense network of Protestant villages permeated the rural mountainous region of the Cévennes. In many ways the Cévennes were and continue to be the southern backbone of French Protestantism. Roughly four-fifths of all Huguenots lived in the west and south. Here they established the churches and consistories, which, in turn, formed the basis for an extensive and uniform national ecclesiastical system.

Everywhere in France, the Huguenots organized their churches according to an energetic ecclesiastical POLITY developed by Calvin and his associates. The structure centered on the local church and its CONSISTORY, all the while maintaining an elaborate system of colloquies and synods from the regional to the national level. The consistory was a supervisory body whose members—pastors, lay elders, and lay deacons in the French Reformed churches—met regularly, usually once a week, to plan and direct the religious life of the entire congregation. These officials had primary responsibility for ecclesiastical administration, poor relief, and morals control.

The profound religious changes associated with the Reformation meant a reform of both belief and of behavior. The centerpiece in the latter effort—a reform of lifestyle—was a profound moral and social disciplining of the community (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). The Huguenots created elaborate mechanisms for the maintenance of moral order and supervision of the faithful. The pastors and elders energetically sought to encourage virtue and suppress vice. They offered guidance and religious edification with frequent sermon services and CATECHISM lessons. At the same time these church authorities seated in the consistory worked arduously to identify SIN and impose penitential discipline through a graduated system of shaming techniques that included censure and admonition, private and public repentance ceremonies, and excommunication. In short, the church and its officials sought to mold proper Christian behavior and cement confessional identity.

In the political sphere, the Huguenots never enjoyed sustained support from the French monarchy or its governing officials. At best, they aspired to harmonious alliances with local secular authorities in the towns and regions, which they dominated. Accordingly, the Protestant faithful, their churches and the associated ecclesiastical institutions had a strained and ambivalent relationship with the political powers. They were, at best, grudgingly tolerated and, more often than not, actively oppressed. The continual strain and strife inevitably shaped, restricted, and blunted the ambitious Reformed effort to revive the pristine splendor of early Christianity.

The Great Struggle

The choices that Huguenots faced in 1685 when the crown abrogated the Edict of Nantes were few and unpleasant: they could abandon their Protestant faith, pretend to convert, go into exile, or actively resist. Some Protestants were, of course, celebrated in their defiance. They took refuge in the mountains and forests, or the anonymity of large cities; many among them were eventually arrested and punished. For most people, however, overt resistance and the prospect of prison, the galleys, or execution held little appeal. The vast majority of Huguenots had been coerced into abjuring already on the eve of the Revocation. Hence, Louis XIV and his advisors could offer the fiction that the Edict of Nantes was no longer needed. Yet these conversions were hardly sincere. At the same time, a fifth or more—150,000 to 200,000—of all French Protestants went into exile to the Swiss cantons, various German principalities, the NETHERLANDS, the British Isles, and eventually to North America, SOUTH AFRICA, Scandinavia, and RUSSIA. They, of course, carried their religion and culture with them. At the same time the departure of so many members of the social and intellectual elite, people who had traditionally led the Huguenot community, had a stunning effect on the faithful who remained in France. French Protestantism became less structured, and those who rose to positions of leadership tended to be less educated, as well as rustic, proletarian, and feminine.

Soon after the Revocation, Huguenots began to assemble clandestinely and illicitly in the desert or wilderness, a strong biblical image that underscored their determination. Rural artisans and others of lesser social and economic status dominated the earliest assemblies. Women also assumed a stronger, more conspicuous presence than they had previously enjoyed. They conducted religious services in secluded woods and private homes, directing the assembled faithful as they prayed, reading passages from Holy Writ, and singing psalms. Many women suffered long and painful incarceration. Those caught attending illegal religious assemblies or engaging in other dissenting and insubordinate acts were placed in Catholic hospitals and nunneries. Women whose offenses royal authorities judged particularly egregious went to prison. Some remained there half-forgotten for years. The most celebrated among these courageous female resisters were the several dozen who were imprisoned for decades in the Tour de Constance at AiguesMortes. Marie Durand, for example, was confined at the age of fifteen and passed thirty-eight years in the tower prison before her release. Others died without the slightest expectation of discharge. Finally a number of young women and eventually young men became prophetesses and prophets. They protested the oppression of Protestants in a less confrontational yet unconventional and highly effective manner.

Prophesying was likely the most startling development associated with the Revocation and the disappearance of an educated pastorate and established ecclesiastical structures. The movement began in February 1688 when an illiterate teenage shepherdess from the rural Dauphiné began to sing psalms and preach in her sleep. Although previously unable to converse in anything other than the local dialect, she offered sermons in “perfect French” during her trancelike state. Other young women and men soon followed suit, giving voice to their apocalyptic inspiration and spiritual visions. In a series of illicit prophesying assemblies, they shook violently, wept, and cried out for repentance. Although explanations vary, these prophetesses and prophets appear to have taken psychological refuge in acting out biblical texts, thereby expressing their anguish over the disaster that had befallen their religious community.

The prophesying movement spread across southern France and eventually turned violent as the more zealous adherents sought to wreak God’s retribution on their Catholic oppressors. The murderous, protracted revolt of the Camisards—so designated for the white shirts that the insurgents often wore—began with the assassination of the abbé du Chaila, a much detested Catholic clergyman and royal agent in the Cévennes. When, in July 1702, he arrested a group of seven adolescent Protestants, three girls and four boys, who were fleeing to Switzerland, reaction was swift and furious. The prophet Abraham Mazel gathered fifty or more followers and liberated the young prisoners. In the melee, the abbé and three of his companions were killed. The act touched raw, exposed nerves on both sides of the bitter confessional struggle. Some Protestants turned to similar acts of vengeance, such as murdering priests and burning churches. Others waged better-organized, more lasting, and initially successful guerrilla warfare. Royal troops responded predictably with further repression and reprisals. The war dragged on for eight years and led to the death of numerous Protestants as well as Catholics.

Although the active persecution of Huguenots slowly eased, the restoration of civil status occurred only with the Edict of the Toleration in 1787 and the beginnings of the French Revolution two years later. Not surprisingly, the long ordeal of the desert has become the heroic age, eclipsing even the violent struggle of the sixteenth century. For modern descendants within and outside of France, the anguish of the eighteenth century, together with the great diaspora, defines the meaning of Huguenot, emphasizing religious perseverance and communal solidarity.

References and Further Reading

- Benedict, Philip. The Huguenot Population of France, 1600–1685: The Demographic Fate and Customs of a Religious Minority. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1991.
- Garrison, Janine. Protestants du Midi, 1559–1598. Toulouse, France: Privat, 1980.
- Holt, Mack P. The French Wars of Religion, 1562–1629. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Mentzer, Raymond. Blood and Belief: Family Survival and Confessional Identity among the Provincial Huguenot Nobility. West Lafayette, IN: Purdue University Press, 1994.
- , and Andrew Spicer, eds. Society and Culture in the Huguenot World, 1559–1685. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Prestwich, Menna, ed. International Calvinism, 1541–1715. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1985.
- Van Ruymbeke, Bertrand, and Randy Sparks, eds. Memory and Identity: Minority Survival among the Huguenots in France and the Atlantic Diaspora. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 2003.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

HUMAN RIGHTS

The contemporary concern with human rights did not originate, as commonly supposed, with the emerging secular modernity of nineteenth-century Western society. Rather, the issue of rights and the wider consideration of the advancement of democratic institutions can be said to have largely been assisted by the REFORMATION or at least certain forms of Protestantism. This was most apparent with LUTHERANISM and English PURITANISM, which both pulled in the same direction with respect to the rights of the lay individual that was enshrined in the notion of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. Here, much was typified by the work of eminent seventeenth-century Protestant theologians such as PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER and AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE who taught that the Christian LAITY not only possessed the right to offer God the unmediated petition of PRAYER but should enjoy the liberty of interpreting scriptures as seen fit. However, the concern of the early Protestants with individual rights was not one that advocated a stringent moral or legalistic framework. Indeed, in the seventeenth century, largely as a reaction to Roman Catholicism, there was a broad refusal of ANTINOMIANISM—the rejection of an abstract moral law.

Structurally the developing correlation between Protestantism and human rights came, paradoxically, with the emergence of the secular society that it indirectly engendered. The key was the differentiation of religious and civic institutions. At a broad comparative level the advancement of issues relating to rudimentary human rights was historically observable in the developing Protestant countries (or at least those with sizable Protestant majorities). Religious pluralism and TOLERATION were strongly associated both with the stability of pluralistic democratic regimes and the struggle against religious monopoly. Protestantism, through its increasing fragmentation, added to the growing acceptance of pluralism, albeit fostering a tolerance in a narrow religious sense. In Catholic and Orthodox nations, by way of comparison, the characteristic symbiosis appears to have been absent and was, to a large degree, connected with the enduring relationship between church and state and the continuing ecclesiastical monopoly of the former (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN; CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM).

The link between early Protestantism and the concern with rights marked the congruency of political and religious revolutions. Evidence of this was the enactment of the Bill of Rights in ENGLAND (1689) and the ascendancy of Parliament over the monarch as a result of the so-called Revolution of the Saints. In the case of northwest Europe, the issue of human rights was also in the context of nation-building shortly after the Reformation. This was even more the case in the UNITED STATES in the eighteenth century where the Puritan communities were also driven by the cause of religious freedoms—a call for liberty that ultimately became intertwined with the advocacy of political liberties and the Rights of Man as espoused by Thomas Paine and others. Indeed, it was in the United States where the religious culture of DISSENT became universalized and eulogized. Although the American constitution has the built-in guarantee of religious expression, and civil liberties generally, the constitution itself is discernibly in the form of a COVENANT comparable to those of God with man in biblical times.

The subsequent development of the relationship between Protestantism and human rights over the last two centuries, however, has not proved to be a straightforward one. Indeed, what has become a controversial area has frequently divided the Protestant constituency. Certainly, it has been the case that Protestant contingents developed their own sectional interests, which proved to have ramifications for how rights were interpreted. Frequently the issue of rights became linked to political moralizing at best or, at the worst, personal or collective expediency. This was certainly evident during the American CIVIL WAR. For Protestants in the North, the antislavery cause was accompanied by the conviction that victory would usher in a reign of religious righteousness. In contrast the matter of rights in the South was to some extent directly or indirectly related to the issue of slaveholding within Protestant churches (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

Sectional interests apart, Protestant attitudes over the last two centuries have largely been determined by theological persuasion, where liberal and conservative impulses and biblical interpretation have proved to have significant influence on orientations toward the secular world and broader civil issues. The area of rights was contested in England during the eighteenth century by conservative Protestant bishops who denounced the liberal politician's stress on the "natural rights" philosophy as a SIN because it suggested rebellion and undermined the security of CHURCH AND STATE. From the middle of the nineteenth century the emphasis on rights was perceived by conservative Protestants as reflecting the despicable development of modernity (see MODERNISM). This was part of a wider critique of INDIVIDUALISM and of the spirit of Arminian theology, which was held as placing too much emphasis on the private interpretation of scripture (see ARMINIANISM). For many conservative Protestants, the prevailing view at the beginning of the twentieth century was that democracy and all that it entailed, like SCIENCE and technology, was an evil of the modern world. An extension of rights, alongside the SOCIAL GOSPEL, came to be understood as part of the increasing influence of liberal theology (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Progressive reform was judged as Satan's way of lulling the world from God's impending wrath. Evident here was the influence of a prevailing gloomy premillenarianism that, at its extremist dispensationist pole, brought a cultural pessimism that bordered on world-rejection.

In contrast to these developments, there was also a sense in which Protestant EVANGELICALISM endorsed a human rights agenda on its own account. This can be traced back to the eighteenth-century Calvinist vision of an all-embracing Christian CULTURE. Typified by CHARLES FINNEY, the idea was for reform through political institutions and social action. This vision was later to be commonly proclaimed by Arminian Protestantism in conjunction with social reform and reformist parties. An example of this was the link between nineteenth-century METHODISM and the emergence of the Labour Party in Britain. The emphasis here, however, was primarily on social and political rights, given that Protestant reformism did not breed a militant secularism or extreme Left-wing ideology.

Since the 1960s liberal Protestants have advanced the cause of human rights, which have continued to be extended and transformed. Many liberals allied themselves to the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT and translated the concern with rights into pressure-group politics. Some Baptist churches, for example, advanced the cause of black people in the United States. Moreover, since the second half of the twentieth century the gradual revival of human rights issues can also be seen as a response to the weakening position of Christianity in Western culture. The key concern has been in being relevant to the modern world and to sharing in its spirit of progress. This has proved to also be a vision within liberal churches with the distinct agenda of rights including the call for WOMEN and gay clergy (see WOMEN CLERGY; HOMOSEXUALITY). Although conservative Protestants may lament such developments, their forays into such social issues as ABORTION and religious education reverberate with the discourse of "human rights" so perceived. In turn this indicates the cultural preoccupation with the ever-extending field of rights in Western societies and the need for Protestants of different theological persuasions to engage with the secular world on its terms.

See also Clergy; Dispensationalism; Ethics; Millenarians and Millennialism; Secularization

STEPHEN HUNT

HUME, DAVID (1711–1776)

Scottish philosopher. Hume is widely regarded as the founder of the modern philosophy of religion. A religious skeptic and an astute critic of both natural and revealed religion, he attacked the cosmological and design arguments for the existence of God, undermined the force of miracles as evidence for revelation, and sought to uncover natural causes of religious belief. Deeply concerned about the negative ethical and social effects of religious belief, he held that morality could be detached from religion and understood in purely naturalistic terms.

Biography

Hume was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, into a family with links to the staunchly Calvinist Evangelical faction within the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. As a youth, Hume examined himself according to the catalog of vices provided by The Whole Duty of Man, a popular devotional work, but became a religious skeptic after reading the rationalist works of JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704) and Samuel Clarke. After an unremarkable career at the University of Edinburgh, followed by a stint as a clerk, Hume turned to philosophy, publishing his first work in 1739. In 1744 he pursued a chair in moral philosophy at Edinburgh, but when both that chair and a chair at Glasgow went to others he recognized that his religious views precluded any academic appointment. Hume did succeed in winning a post in 1752 as librarian to the Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh, but he was dogged by controversy, and the General Assembly initiated excommunication proceedings against him in 1756. Although liberal clergy derailed these proceedings, Hume felt unwelcome in Scotland and spent several years abroad. Paris received Hume with open arms in 1763, but Hume considered the atheism of Holbach and his associates yet another form of unwarranted dogmatism. Dying of cancer in his native Edinburgh, Hume impressed the Scottish biographer James Boswell (1740–1795) with his cheerful equanimity in the face of death.

The Treatise

Hume's Treatise of Human Nature (1739–40) revealed the metaphysical skepticism implicit in Locke's empiricism, while suggesting that the common affairs of life could continue undisturbed. The Treatise did not overtly discuss theological matters, but in reducing the soul to a bundle of perceptions and thus questioning its unity, Hume challenged philosophical arguments for the immortality of the soul. Further, in arguing that statements about causality are simply statements of observed regularities, Hume undermined the cosmological argument to God as First Cause. In suggesting that moral arguments, which derive prescriptive ought-statements from descriptive is-statements, involve an unwarranted logical leap, Hume discredited natural law theory, which drew normative conclusions about God's will for humanity from observations of the salient features of human nature. Hume's discussion of the virtues and vices in Book III of the Treatise made no appeals to divine laws or to divine design of human nature. In Hume's naturalistic ethics, a virtue is a character trait that is pleasurable or useful to the virtuous person or those affected by him or her. Our capacity to care about the welfare of others is explained by sympathy, and requires no reference to God's benevolent design of human nature.

The essay "Of Miracles" is thought to have been withheld from the Treatise in order to avoid offending Bishop JOSEPH BUTLER (1692–1752), whose approval Hume courted, but Hume included it in his next work, the more popular Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748). Hume argued that evidence for a miracle could never outweigh our accumulated experience of the regularities of nature, and thus it would always be more reasonable to deny than to accept the occurrence of a miracle.

The Dialogues

Hume's Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, which he began writing in 1751 but published only posthumously, is modeled after Cicero's dialogue De Natura Deorum. In this work, the skeptic Philo, who is generally recognized as Hume's spokesman, undermines the centerpiece of natural theology by showing that the design argument can lead at most to the conclusion that "the cause or causes of order in the universe probably bear some remote analogy to human intelligence" (Hume 1993:129). Those, like the character Cleanthes, who champion this argument as justifying a robust theism, have failed to proportion the inferred cause to the observed effect, and have illegitimately extended the ideas of cause and effect to the origin of the universe, beyond the realm of experience. When the orthodox Demea argues that we are led to God not by speculative reason, but by our sense of misery and dependence on God, Philo argues that the evil and suffering in the world imply rather that the deity lacks any recognizable moral attributes and is indifferent to human affairs.

The Natural History

Hume was not content solely to reveal weaknesses in arguments for religious belief; he also sought, notably in The Natural History of Religion (1757), to show that religious belief has purely natural causes. Far from emerging out of careful reasoning, as deists argued, or revelation, as the orthodox claimed, Hume suggested that religion had its origins in the fear of unknown causes. Polytheism, not philosophical theism, was the first form of religious belief. Theism emerged naturally out of polytheism, because believers hoped by flattery to achieve greater control over the gods, and thus elevated one god to absolute power. Theists are incapable of sustaining a conception of God that is adequate to their claims of divine infinity and perfection; in fact, they entertain contradictory conceptions of God as loving benefactor and as arbitrary tyrant, as utterly simple yet possessing changing thoughts and passions. Self-deception and zeal emerge to protect beliefs that cannot be defended by rational means, and theism is thus typified by intolerance.

See also Calvinism; Deism

References and Further Reading:

Primary Sources:

Hume, David. Principal Writings on Religion. Edited by J.C. A. Gaskin. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993.

Secondary Sources:

Gaskin, J.C. A. Hume's Philosophy of Religion. 2nd ed. London: Macmillan, 1988.

Herdt, Jennifer A. Religion and Faction in Hume's Moral Philosophy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Yandell, Keith. E. Hume's "Inexplicable Mystery": His Views on Religion. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.

JENNIFER A.HERDT

HUNGARY

At the turn of the sixteenth century, Protestantism dominated Hungarian society, but then gradually lost ground in the face of the Catholic COUNTER-REFORMATION. Hungarian Protestantism was profoundly affected by the politics of central Europe, but the region's largest Protestant community survived the impact of Catholic persecution, revolts, and revolutions, the breakup of the Hungarian state, and a period of Communist rule.

The Hungarian Reformation

REFORMATION ideas spread to Hungary in the middle decades of the sixteenth century, during a period of profound political instability in central Europe. In 1526 the Ottoman army under Sultan Suleiman I "the magnificent" (approximately 1494–1566) had won a crushing victory at Mohács over the Hungarian king, Louis II. The Ottomans were later able to push even further north, and by the 1540s had established control over much of central and southern Hungary. The remaining areas of the Hungarian kingdom were divided into two. Royal Hungary, ruled by Habsburg kings, stretched from the Adriatic coast up to the mountains of modern Slovakia. The eastern part of the Hungarian kingdom, including Transylvania, was ruled by elected princes.

This catastrophic collapse of the Hungarian kingdom discredited the spiritual power of the Catholic Church and disrupted existing church structures. As ideas about reforming religion spread from the west, they were quickly accepted by many nobles and in towns. The Habsburg court encouraged the diet to pass antireform laws, but these had little impact. From the 1540s Lutheran ideas received support in the German-speaking towns of Transylvania and Upper Hungary, where a version of the AUGSBURG CONFESSION was adopted in 1544. The influence of Swiss reformers then gained ground among Hungarian speakers from the late 1550s. Although a sense of linguistic and ethnic community may have made some contribution to the outcome of the Hungarian Reformation, the role of the socially privileged elite of nobles and urban magistrates was generally decisive in the reception or rejection of different forms of Protestantism. In eastern Hungary the Reformed or Calvinist Church (see CALVINISM) dominated the confessional landscape toward the end of the sixteenth century. The magnates, gentry, and market towns of counties beyond the river Tisza mostly adhered to a Calvinist confession drawn up by Peter Méliusz Juhász at Debrecen in 1567, and Reformed clergy also recognized the Second HELVETIC CONFESSION.

In the Transylvanian principality the Lutheran, Reformed, and Antitrinitarian (see ANTITRINITARIANISM) churches were all granted legal status in the 1560s (see also ROMANIA). The remarkably tolerant resolutions of the 1568 Transylvanian diet at Turda (Torda) devolved to clergy the task of preaching the word of God “according to their understanding of it.” On the whole the German-speaking community in Transylvania remained in the Lutheran Church (see LUTHERANISM). The Reformed Church in Transylvania was dominated by Hungarian speakers, as was the anti-Trinitarian or Unitarian Church, which emerged after debates in the 1560s between Hungarian clergy about the doctrine of the Trinity.

Although Protestants in the Transylvanian principality gained constitutional recognition, Protestant clergy in Royal Hungary remained entirely reliant on powerful noble families to protect them. Freedom for Protestants to worship was granted only to the small number of royal free towns. Despite this, around three-quarters of people living in Hungary and Transylvania were attending services in Lutheran or Reformed churches by the 1570s. The Habsburg court and Catholic hierarchy attempted to undermine this growth of Protestantism (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM). Attempts by Rudolf II to close down the Lutheran church in Košice (Kassa) in 1604 provided one of the sparks of Protestant rebellion against the progress of Counter-Reformation. A Reformed noble, István Bocskai, led his forces to victory over Habsburg armies in eastern Hungary, and was elected as Transylvanian prince. The terms of the 1606 Peace of Vienna, confirmed by the diet in 1608, extended freedom of religion to nobles, towns, and military garrisons in Royal Hungary, and the rights of the Lutheran and Reformed churches were guaranteed.

However, Habsburg kings continued to work together with the Catholic hierarchy and the Jesuits during the early decades of the seventeenth century to reconvert prominent Hungarian nobles and to curtail Protestant freedoms. The Habsburgs’ ability to promote Catholicism was checked by the need to retain the support of the nobles for defense against the Ottomans, and by the interventions of a series of Reformed Transylvanian princes. Prince György I Rákóczi’s entry into the Thirty Years War against the Habsburgs led to compromise between Ferdinand III and the decreasing number of Protestant nobles at the diet of 1646–1647. Some Protestant church buildings that had been taken over by Catholics were returned, and the religious freedoms agreed in 1608 were confirmed. However, Protestants in Royal Hungary soon faced new persecution as churches were again seized by Catholics and Protestant ministers were expelled from their parishes. Protestants living in Ottoman Hungary were in some ways in a more favorable position than those in Royal Hungary by the late 1650s. Although there were restrictions against renovating church buildings in Ottoman Hungary, there were many Protestant congregations and some active schools.

The Protestant Churches

The Lutheran and Reformed churches adopted a hierarchical form of government, with superintendents charged to lead church provinces and archdeacons in charge of regions within each province. The key issue that brought division between those in Hungary who favored church reform was understanding of the sacraments, and especially the Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER). Reformed clergy could not agree with Lutherans that Christ was "really present" in the sacrament, and their confession argued that the Eucharist was merely a sign and pledge of salvation by faith. Protestant churches in western Hungary remained united until the beginning of the seventeenth century, but then this issue also saw them divide into distinct Reformed and Lutheran churches. Despite Calvinist opposition to religious imagery, there were almost no incidences of ICONOCLASM in Hungary during the Reformation.

Protestant ideas spread through preaching and printed literature. Protestants recognized the importance of improving the standards of the clergy, and made efforts to develop their education in local colleges. Because Hungary did not have a university, many Protestant student ministers were sent abroad to foreign universities from the late sixteenth century, particularly to Wittenberg and Heidelberg. Hundreds of Reformed students later traveled to study in the Dutch Republic and ENGLAND from the early seventeenth century. Protestants also developed printing presses in many towns. The first complete translation of the BIBLE into Hungarian was available from 1590 thanks to the work of Gáspár Károlyi, minister at Vizsoly in northeastern Hungary. Other printed books were produced by Protestants from the late sixteenth century, including CATECHISMS, creeds, statements of DOCTRINE, sermons, schoolbooks, and HYMNALS. The HEIDELBERG CATECHISM was translated into Hungarian by Dávid Huszár in 1577, and in 1607 Albert Szenczi Molnár rendered the psalms into Hungarian verses to the settings of the Genevan Psalter.

In the early seventeenth century Reformed clergy were inspired by contact with western Calvinist centers to produce practical theological literature for their congregations. Prominent figures such as János Tolnai Dali and Pál Medgyesi returned home from the Dutch Republic and England to attempt to improve popular piety and moral discipline. These so-called Puritans (see PURITANISM) also supported the development of Presbyteries (see PRESBYTERIANISM) to enforce higher standards of morality. Although the formation of presbyteries received some support in western and northeastern Hungary, the traditional form of church government by a clergy hierarchy was upheld by a national synod at Satu Mare (Szatmár) in 1646. At the beginning of the eighteenth century PIETISM gained support among Lutheran clergy, also aiming to encourage moral discipline and spiritual renewal.

From Counter-Reformation to Toleration

In Royal Hungary, Protestants faced growing Catholic persecution, which culminated in the 1670s when Protestant clergy faced trial on charges of treason. Some clergy converted, others resigned from the ministry, and those who stood firm were imprisoned and then forced to march to Italy, where they were sold as galley slaves to the Spanish. This incident became well known in the western Protestant world, and the Dutch admiral Michael de Ruyter eventually liberated twenty-three Protestant ministers off Naples in 1676.

Toward the end of the seventeenth century, Habsburg success in battle against the Ottomans extended their control over more territory, and by the early eighteenth century most Protestants in western and southern Hungary lacked access to a place of worship or a minister to conduct services. Contact with western Protestants was also hindered by the state authorities. Commissions were appointed to look into Protestant grievances, but the restrictions continued. Some relief for Protestants came with the decree of TOLERATION issued by Joseph II in 1781. The Catholic Church retained its privileged status, but all Protestant communities of at least 100 families were permitted to build a church, even if the law at first prevented these buildings from having a tower, bell, or entrance onto a main street. Protestants were also allowed access to public offices, could become members of guilds, and were no longer compelled to attend Catholic services. However, in mixed marriages, marriage law required that if the father was Catholic then all children must be brought up as Catholics; if the father was Protestant then only his sons could become Protestants.

Protestantism in the Nineteenth Century

Lutherans and Calvinists were granted basic freedoms of religious practice at the end of the eighteenth century, but the continuing inequalities that Protestants faced formed part of the agenda of Hungarian national reform in the nineteenth century. Indeed, Protestant communities, which had always been among those least supportive of Habsburg rule in Hungary, became central to Hungarian Nationalist movements (see NATIONALISM). During the 1848 revolution, legal equality was declared between four accepted churches: Catholic, Lutheran, Calvinist, and Unitarian. Protestant support for the revolution was enthusiastic, and the Transdanubian Reformed Church province even called on its ministers to take part in the fighting. In April 1849 Hungarian independence was declared at the Reformed college chapel in Debrecen, announced by the Lutheran Lajos Kossuth.

After the 1848 revolution was crushed, the Protestant churches faced renewed persecution. Religious freedoms were established again only after the 1867 Compromise with Austria. In 1881 the Reformed Church could hold its first national synod at Debrecen, the Hungarian Calvinist "Rome." This synod was able to lay down the foundations of a national church, with a synod to meet every tenth year to decide on church laws and a council that represented the church between these synods. The late nineteenth century saw increased educational activity from all the Protestant churches, and concern for domestic mission from the 1880s in the face of declining church membership.

In 1895 a law accepting the free practice of religion was passed by the Hungarian parliament. This law declared that the practice of civil and political rights was entirely independent from religious faith. The full benefit of these laws was offered to the traditional religious groups: Catholic, Calvinist, Lutheran, Unitarian, Jewish, and Orthodox (see JUDAISM; ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). These churches, synagogues, and their schools could receive state subsidies, their clergy were offered a minimum salary, and their religious teachers were given a state salary. A second category of religions, which included a Baptist Church that had emerged in the nineteenth century, was recognized. BAPTISTS also enjoyed full legal freedoms, but could not claim state subsidies. Finally, smaller tolerated denominations were allowed to function under rights of free association. These laws remained in place up to the end of the SECOND WORLD WAR.

Protestantism in the Twentieth Century

By 1910 the Reformed Church had recovered in numbers, thanks to considerable efforts at home mission and the relaxation of laws against Protestant churches. There were over two and a half million Reformed Church members before the FIRST WORLD WAR, served by over 2,000 clergy and over 3,000 teachers. The Protestant churches, and the rest of Hungarian society, faced the trauma of defeat in the FIRST WORLD WAR and then the reduction of Hungarian territory by over two-thirds in the 1920 Trianon peace treaty. One-third of ethnic Hungarians found themselves outside the borders of Hungary. The states that gained Hungarian territory, especially Romania, Yugoslavia, and Czechoslovakia, all had many new Protestant subjects.

Within the territory of the new Hungarian state, a 1920 census revealed that 21 percent of the population were Reformed (approximately 900,000), with a further 6 percent Lutheran. The desire to recover territory lost under the Trianon treaty bred an intolerant nationalism in the interwar period. None of the Christian churches had a distinguished record in challenging the rise of fascism and ANTI-SEMITISM in Hungarian society. Reformed superintendent László Ravasz even supported a 1938 law that legalized the expropriation of Jewish property.

After defeat as Germany's ally in the SECOND WORLD WAR, the postwar Communist regime limited the role of all churches in public life. In 1947 the privileges offered by the state to the churches were revoked. In 1948 the Protestant churches agreed to a formal separation from the state. The last census to measure religious affiliation in 1949 found that 70 percent of the population were Catholic, 22 percent Calvinist, and 5 percent Lutheran. Among the smaller religious groups, Baptists were measured at 0.2 percent (approximately 20,000), and Unitarians at 0.1 percent. In 1951 the Church Affairs Office was established to organize policy toward all Christian churches, and the churches from that point became increasingly subordinated to the state (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). The 1956 revolution brought religious instruction back into schools for several months, but this effort to break free from the Communist bloc was quickly overwhelmed by Soviet intervention.

By the time Communist rule softened in the years of “goulash-communism,” the numbers of active Protestants had decreased considerably, especially in Budapest and in other large towns. Only 18 percent of the population were Calvinist by this time, with 4 percent Lutheran, and almost 10 percent declared themselves outside any denomination. From the downfall of the Communists in 1989, laws have been passed establishing freedom of conscience and religious activity. The state surrendered its monopoly on education, the Church Affairs Office was closed, and some appropriated church property was returned by the state. The Reformed Church has developed its seminaries in Budapest, Debrecen, and Sárospatak, and all the Protestant churches have produced new religious books and undertaken some missionary work, especially among students. The historic Protestant churches face many challenges to establish their role in a post-Communist society, including competition from some new Christian movements.

References and Further Reading

- Bucsay, Mihály. Der Protestantismus in Ungarn, 1521–1978. Ungarns Reformationskirchen in Geschichte und Gegenwart. I. Im Zeitalter der Reformation, Gegenreformation und katholischen Reform. Vienna: Böhlau, 1977.
- Evans, Robert. “Calvinism in East Central Europe: Hungary and Her Neighbours.” In International Calvinism, 1541–1715. Edited by Menna Prestwich. Oxford: Clarendon, 1985.
- Makkai, László. “The Hungarian Puritans and the English Revolution.” Acta Historica 5 (1958): 13–45.
- Murdock, Graeme. Calvinism on the Frontier, 1600–1660. International Calvinism and the Reformed Church in Hungary and Transylvania. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000.
- Révész, Imre, ed. History of the Hungarian Reformed Church. Translated by George Knight. Washington, DC: Hungarian Federation of America, 1956.
- Unghváry, Alexander. The Hungarian Protestant Reformation in the Sixteenth Century under the Ottoman Impact. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.

GRAEME MURDOCK

HUTCHINSON, ANNE (1591–1643)

American lay theologian. Called the “American Jesabel” by JOHN WINTHROP (1638–1707), governor of the Massachusetts Bay colony, Anne Hutchinson is one of the most notorious heretics in the history of American Protestantism (Hall 1968:310). Immigrating to Boston in 1634 with her large family, Hutchinson quickly assumed a position of religious authority within the community. The meetings that she held at her house to review the previous week’s sermon grew to an unprecedented size and attracted both women and men. When she began at these meetings to denounce all the colony’s ministers, except JOHN COTTON (1585–1652), for preaching a covenant of works, the ensuing controversy divided the colony into two opposing factions. In November 1637, after a very bold and articulate defense of her theological positions, the general court banished Hutchinson from the colony; in March 1638 she was excommunicated by the Boston Church. Moving first to Rhode Island and then to the New York frontier, she and several family members were killed in 1643 in an Indian raid.

Because the Massachusetts Bay ministers preached that sanctification, or good works, was evidence of JUSTIFICATION, Hutchinson accused them of legalism. Because she denied the necessity of works and maintained that assurance of salvation came through an immediate witness of the Spirit, they accused her of ANTINOMIANISM. In addition to this theological disagreement, historians have perceived in the controversy a class conflict, for the supporters of Hutchinson were disproportionately drawn from Boston’s rising merchant class. Historians have also explored the role of gender in the controversy. Acting to suppress not only a rival interpretation of the relation between faith and works but also the possibility of women’s religious leadership, the bay ministers established a link between heresy and female power that would persist in the religious imagination of Protestant America for generations.

References and Further Reading

Battis, Emery. Saints and Sectaries: Anne Hutchinson and the Antinomian Controversy in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1962.

Hall, David D., ed. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1968.

Lang, Amy Schrager. Prophetic Woman: Anne Hutchinson and the Problem of Dissent in the Literature of New England. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987.

AVA CHAMBERLAIN

HUTTERITES

The Hutterites (also known as the Hutterian Brethren) were a group of Germanic religious dissenters that coalesced around the charismatic leadership of JAKOB HUTTER (after whom they were named), developing into a distinctive church around 1530 in Moravia (Slovakia). Committed to basic Anabaptist Practice and faith (see ANABAPTISM), they developed a unique attachment to a communitarian life (Gütergemein-schaft) in which all personal and family possessions were shared. Today the Hutterites number around 30,000, scattered among some 300 colonies (farming communities) mainly in western Canada and the mid-west and western United States. They have substantially maintained the faith and practice of their fore bears, making them the longest lived family-oriented communitarian movement in history.

History

During much of the sixteenth century, nobles in and around the region of Moravia were independent enough to allow a measure of religious freedom in their territories. The promise of religious tolerance drew thousands of dissenters to the area, most of whom were Anabaptists. Austrian Tirol (homeland of Jakob Hutter) also provided hundreds of pilgrims who made their way to what they often described as the “Promised Land” in Moravia.

Backed by a large contingent of Tirolian Anabaptists, Hutter was able to forge from various groups a united movement that became the Hutterites. Although Hutter was captured on a return visit to Tirol and executed at Innsbruck in 1536, the Hutterite church maintained its cohesion and commitment to their faith and practice. During the first half of the sixteenth century, the church endured periods of severe persecution at the hands of the Hapsburg Kings of Austria, at times being forced to take refuge in caves. However, by the mid-1550s the nobles again were able to resist the king’s repeated order to rid the land of dissenters (see DISSENT). In exchange for the economic benefits brought to their land by the industrious dissenters, the nobles allowed them to practice religion as they chose. The Hutterites referred to this time (1550s-1620) as the “Golden Years.”

Numbering as many as 20,000 scattered among some 100 colonies, they prospered enormously. Although they did not mix with the national population, living largely in their separated communitarian colonies, their numbers consistently increased because of an active mission outreach to Germanic lands in central Europe. In small and large groups, Anabaptists emigrated to Moravia, often bringing with them orphaned children whom local authorities had abandoned. They were organized under a single bishop over the entire church, with both a spiritual leader (Diener des Wortes, Servant of the Word or Preacher) and a leader responsible for temporal affairs (Diener der Notdurft, Servant of Temporal Concerns or Colony Manager) for each colony. Agriculture was an integral part of the Hutterite economy, although their main economic contribution was small industry. A broad range of crafts, including iron and copper works, carpentry, mill works, wagon building, leather works, wine production, farm management, and, perhaps the most important, their highly sought after ceramic works, made them almost indispensable for the local economy and its tax base. (Religious freedom included for a time allowance for the Hutterites to pay taxes and/or provide public service in lieu of military service and to exclude taxes directly related to military causes.) The communitarian economy allowed them to underprice competition, which often incited considerable resentment among the populace, which along with the religious dissent created a continually volatile existence. Nonetheless, under the direction of gifted and capable leaders, such as Peter Walpot and Peter Riedemann, both their economic stability and spiritual commitment were effectively maintained during this period.

At the outbreak of the Thirty Years War (1618–1638), circumstances changed abruptly. The Hapsburg dynasty again achieved the upper hand over the nobles and were able finally to rid their lands of the “Anabaptist menace.” The expulsion from Moravia was catastrophic for the Hutterites. Not only did they lose about half their number, but they were forced to leave their well-established economic base for the much less politically stable and economically depressed Hungarian lands. They also entered a no-man’s-land situation in which they were caught between the rival claimants of the Hapsburgs, local nobles, and Ottoman Turks, each of whom periodically sent troops into the area to support their respective claims. This, along with renegade marauding bands, wreaked havoc among the Hutterite settlements. At times entire colonies were exterminated. The end of the Thirty Years War brought no reprieve; in fact, the sociopolitical instability increased throughout the remainder of the seventeenth century.

In spite of the dire circumstances, the Hutterites experienced one of their greatest leaders, Andreas Ehrenpreis, often referred to as the movement’s second founder. Many within the church began to feel that the stringent organizational structures required by community of goods were no longer tenable under such difficult economic circumstances, and many began to leave the church to live as independent families in the nearby communities. Under his direction monumental efforts were undertaken to stem the tide of spiritual and temporal disintegration. Although the church had over the years produced numerous ordinances defining and directing the various crafts and requirements of craft foremen, as well as those for the spiritual leaders, they began to proliferate during the Ehrenpreis era. New and revised ordinances were written to enforce a greater allegiance to the concept and practice of community of goods, which under Ehrenpreis received an even greater emphasis than it had in the past. For him, it became the ultimate expression of Christian faith and practice.

Ehrenpreis's efforts were heroic but abortive. Soon after his death in 1662, the church decided to temporarily abandon community of goods, and soon thereafter most began to assimilate into the local culture. A remnant of nineteen people, however, remained loyal to the faith in Transylvania (central, northwestern Romania) and were later (1756) joined by a few Lutherans who were converted to their faith. A small group of sixty-seven faithful fled the Hapsburg suppression in this area and emigrated to Walachia (southern Romania) in 1767 and later to Russia in 1770 because of the promise of religious freedom. For the next century the Hutterites settled in Ukraine, where community of goods was sporadically practiced, although most families continued to maintain the spiritual and historical heritage of the movement. In 1870 the Czar declared universal military conscription, undermining the initial invitation of nobles for the Hutterites to live on their lands as pacifists (see PACIFISM). With a few exceptions, the church as a whole decided to emigrate to the United States, which they began to do in 1874. They settled in South Dakota because it reminded them so much of the Russian Steppes that had been their home for over a century.

In spite of their historical heritage and theological homogeneity, soon after the immigration long-standing differences resulted in a division into three distinct groups, Lehrer-Leut, Darius-Leut, and Schmiede-Leut. All three groups practiced community of goods, but carefully maintained differences that would not be easily discernible to outsiders. As a result of a very high birth rate, the church grew phenomenally from some 400 in the 1870s to nearly 30,000 in 100 years. Their economic prosperity was equally remarkable.

However, during WORLD WAR I a number of their young men submitted to the draft but nevertheless refused to bear arms, for which many suffered considerable hardships. In fact, two of their young men were so severely mistreated in a military camp that they died. Because of this, with the exception of one colony, the entire church moved to Canada, where they were granted exemption from military service. Since that time, the U.S. government has granted them conscientious objector status (see CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION) and many have returned and have spread throughout the north-central and western United States, where they continue to prosper.

Doctrine and Writings

Of all Anabaptist groups, the Hutterites were by far the most prolific in producing literature, including theological treatises, letters, HYMNS, and sermons. Their literature reflects a literalist interpretation of the BIBLE with an understanding that both FAITH and behavior contribute to SALVATION, in which the individual Christian is intimately bound to the life of the church. Their primary objective was to restore the New Testament church, which they felt the Roman Catholic Church had distorted through its traditions and the Protestant churches had not fully reformed. One of their first major works was the "Great Article Book" (Die Fünf Artikel des Grössten Streitens Zwischen Uns und der Welt, "Five Articles Concerning the Great Struggle Between Us and the World"), which contained the five primary principles of the Hutterite faith: a rejection of infant

BAPTISM for adult baptism, a rejection of the Catholic view of the reality of the elements of the LORD'S SUPPER in favor of a symbolic understanding, the necessity of community of goods as an expression of true Christian devotion (Gelassenheit), pacifism, and allowance for the DI-VORCE of a nonbelieving spouse (although remarriage after such a divorce was not allowed). One copy included, as a fifth point, the rejection of oath-taking. It is most likely that Peter Walpot composed the book around 1547.

Another work of great significance was the Great History Book (Geschichts-Buch und kurzer Durchgang vom Anfang der Welt, "History Book and brief Overview from the Beginning of the World") now translated as the Chronicle I (Chronicle II is a translation of the Klein-Gechichtsbuch, "Short History Book," in process). As was common to history books of the era, it began with creation but quickly came to the account of the rise of Ana baptism, and then concentrated on Hutterite history from 1528 to 1665. It also includes a condensed version of the "Great Article Book" and a number of letters by prominent leaders. Chronicle II continues the account of the Hutterite church from 1665 to 1947, including a number of interesting documents, diaries, and treatises.

The major theological work of the early Hutterites was the treatise written by Peter Riedemann called Confession of Faith (Rechenschaft Unserer Religion, Lehr und Glaubens). It includes the five principles but elaborates in greater detail many of the other ideas and practices of the Hutterite faith, systematically arranged.

The Hutterite church was a careful collector and preserver of its own literature, which it used extensively to maintain the faith but also put to use in more practical ways. In the larger church colonies boarding schools were set up that provided elementary EDUCATION in reading, writing, and arithmetic for both boys and girls before they were apprenticed to a craft around the age of 12. This was one of the most advanced elementary educational systems in Europe at the time. The numerous missionary letters, treatises, hymns, and later sermons served as the educational material used to teach reading and writing in the schools. There were hundreds of letters to and from missionaries and other church leaders that were shared among the colonies and archived to be made available for various purposes.

As noted, during the Ehrenpreis era both temporal and spiritual ordinances proliferated. In addition, a new genre of literature began to appear: the sermon. There are over 500 sermons from this period that are yet extant. In fact, these very sermons are the source of all preaching among the Hutterites today. Each Sunday, the preacher chooses selections from these sermons to read to the church. Only on the rarest of occasions will a preacher write a new sermon. Ehrenpreis also edited a number of collections of hymns, which together with the sermons make up the contemporary liturgy of the Hutterite church.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

The Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren, 1525–1665, vol. I. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1987.

Riedemann, Peter. Confession of Faith. Suffolk, England: Hodder and Stoughton with The Plough Publishing House, 1950.

Zieglschmid, A.J. F., ed. Das Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüdern. Philadelphia: The Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation, 1947. (Will appear again as The Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren, 1665–1947, vol. II, in process.)

Secondary Sources:

Dyck, C.J., et al., eds. The Mennonite Encyclopedia. 5 vols. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1990.

Gross, Leonard. The Golden Years of the Hutterites. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1980.

Harrison, Wes. Andreas Ehrenpreis and Hutterite Faith and Practice. Kitchener, ON: Pandora Press, 1997.

Hostetler, John A. Hutterite Society. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974.

WES HARRISON

HUTTER, JAKOB (c. 1500–1536)

Anabaptist leader, founder of Hutterites (Hutterian Brethren). Born around 1500 in Moos, a hamlet in South Tyrol, Hutter became a hatmaker by trade and received a rudimentary education. As early as 1527 Anabaptist teachings began to infiltrate Tyrol, an area already given to ideas of religious and social reform. Around 1528 or 1529 Hutter converted to ANABAPTISM and quickly became a recognized leader in the region. In 1529 he made the first of several trips to Moravia to investigate reports that “God had gathered a people in his name to live as one heart, mind, and soul, each caring faithfully for the other” (Chronicle 1987:84). Throughout the sixteenth century a few Moravian nobles were occasionally able to maintain religious freedom on their lands. These circumstances drew thousands of religious dissidents from all over Europe, most of whom were Anabaptists. Hutter united with a group in Austerlitz, being particularly attracted to their practice of community of goods (sharing all possessions as community property). This tenet of faith would become the cornerstone of the movement to which Hutter emphatically dedicated himself and his teaching. From 1531 to 1533 the church was severely plagued with controversies over leadership. Although Hutter was active during this time as a missionary in Tyrol, he was also indirectly involved with the leadership question. In 1533 he returned to Moravia for the fourth time and soon established himself as the sole leader of the group, called HUTTERITES or Hutterian Brethren, which now numbered about 1,000, including some 300 children. Hutter proved to be an indefatigable and resourceful leader, providing the practical and inspirational direction necessary to keep together such a large group.

The determination of the Hapsburg King Ferdinand I to rid all his lands of the Anabaptist “heresy” eventually caused Hutter to return to Tyrol. Having recently married, Hutter and his wife Katherine continued the same mission activity he had participated in before. Unfortunately, by this time his practices were too well known by the authorities, and he and his wife were soon arrested. Hutter was interrogated incessantly, tortured severely, and finally burned at the stake in Innsbruck in late February or early March 1536. His wife gave birth to a child while in prison, but later escaped. However, she was recaptured two years later and executed. Nothing further is known about the child.

Only eight letters from Hutter are extant. They are filled with pastoral expressions of concern and exhortations to remain faithful despite the ever-present threatening forces of evil. One letter was addressed to a local noble in Moravia as an apology of the movement as harmless people who desired to live their faith in love to all people and as a charge to the nobles themselves to repent and join the true faith.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

The Chronicle of the Hutterian Brethren, 1525–1665, vol. I. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1987.

Secondary Sources:

Fischer, Hans, G. Jakob Hutter: Leben, Frömmigkeit, Briefe. Newton, KS: Mennonite Publication Office, 1956.

Gross, Leonard. "Jakob Hutter: A Christian Communist." In Profiles of Radical Reformers, edited by Hans-Jürgen Goertz. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1982. 158–167.

Hutter, Jacob. Brotherly Faithfulness: Epistles from a Time of Persecution. Translated by the Hutterian Society of Brothers. Rifton, NY: Plough Publishing House, 1979.

Packull, Werner O. Hutterite Beginnings. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995.

WES HARRISON

HYMNS AND HYMNALS

Pre-Reformation Traditions

Vernacular religious song was not the invention of the REFORMATION era. There was a long European history of such songs, including English carols, Dutch geestelijke liederen, Italian lauda spirituales, and German leisen. MARTIN LUTHER knew of and utilized the para-liturgical German leisen that were closely associated with the LITURGY and the festivals of the church year (see HOLIDAYS AND FESTIVALS). Examples include the fifteenth-century Wir glauben all an einen Gott, based on the Nicene Creed, the fourteenth-century Gelobet seist du, Jesu Christ (Christmas Day), the twelfth-century Christ ist erstanden (Easter Day), textually and musically related to the Easter sequence Victimæ paschali laudes and the thirteenth-century Nun bitten wir den Heiligen Geist (Feast of Pentecost), all of which, with others, Luther revised and expanded. But whereas previous generations had sung these leisen extraliturally, after mass on the respective festivals, Luther directed that the new evangelical hymns—whether reworkings of older material or newly created—should be sung intraliturally, that is, within the reformed mass by the congregation at large.

Luther's liturgical use of vernacular hymnody had been anticipated by the Bohemian Brethren, the followers of reformer Jan Hus (c. 1372–1415), who had sung Czech hymns in worship during the final decades of the fifteenth century. Germanspeaking Brethren translated many of these Czech hymns into their own language, issuing them in a hymnal published in Prague as early as 1501. Other collections of German versions of Czech hymns were Ein New Gesengbuchlen (Jungbunzlau, 1531), edited by Michael Weisse, and Ein Gesangbuch der Brüder inn Behemen und Werherrn (Nuremberg, 1544), edited by Johann Horn; hymns from both collections were utilized by Lutherans in Wittenberg and elsewhere.

The Latin hymns of the daily office were also influential in the development of Lutheran hymnody. Manuscript and printed Hymnaria, although designed for use by CLERGY and choirs, nevertheless provided a model for later Lutheran collections of vernacular congregational hymns, because many of these German hymns, like the earlier Latin office hymns, were intended to be sung during the primary seasons of the church year. But the Latin hymns themselves continued to be sung in Lutheran worship, especially in those churches that maintained a choir made up of pupils from the local Latin school.

Lutheran Tradition

The theological imperative for congregational hymnody came from Luther's understanding of the DoCTRINE of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, which stood in contradistinction to the particular priesthood of Catholicism. Although it took five years after the 1517 debate concerning indulgences for Luther to make the connection between doctrine and practice, once he had linked the two he saw that unison congregational song was a powerful demonstration of the doctrine of universal priesthood, because every member of the congregation was involved in the activity. But Luther was also aware of the practice of the early CHURCH. In the Formula missae of 1523, he wrote: "I also wish that we had as many songs as possible in the vernacular which the people could sing during mass, immediately after the gradual and also after the Sanctus and Agnus Dei. For who doubts that originally all the people sang these which now only the choir sings?"

Before the end of 1523, the year that the Formula missae was published, Luther and his colleagues began creating a basic corpus of congregational song for Reformation WORSHIP, both ecclesiastical and domestic. They revised and reworked old German leisen; translated Latin office hymns into the vernacular, and modified, where necessary, their associated plainsong melodies; created contrafacta, either by rewriting preexisting religious folksongs or by supplying folk melodies with new "evangelical" texts; and wrote newly created hymns, both texts and tunes. These "new" hymns were first published on broadsides, but, beginning with the so-called Achtliederbuch (a small hymnal of just eight hymns published in Nuremberg in 1524), an extraordinary number of hymnals—at least 500—were published, with and without music, in German-speaking lands over the next quarter of a century.

Even before he and his colleagues had really begun to assemble a basic corpus of vernacular congregational song, Luther saw the primary function of such singing in liturgical terms. In the Formula missae, following the passage cited above, he wrote: "Poets are wanting among us, or not yet known, who could compose evangelical and spiritual songs, as Paul calls them (Col. 3:16), worthy to be used in the church of God (after the Gradual and also after the Sanctus and Agnus Dei, etc.)." Sufficient progress had been made over the ensuing two years so that when Luther drew up his vernacular liturgy in 1525—the Deutsche Messe, published in Wittenberg early in 1526—there was a sufficient number of hymns available in Wittenberg for congregational use. Thus Luther was not only able to refer to hymns, but also to include some texts, with tunes, within the document. The traditional structure of the mass was retained, but, as in the Formula missae, the content was theologically reinterpreted. The five parts of the traditional ordinary were retained, except that in the Deutsche Messe Luther developed the principle that the congregation could sing them in hymnic forms. Over the course of time, a complete sequence of "ordinary" hymns became customary: Kyrie, Gott Vater in ewigkeit (Kyrie), Allein Gott in der Höh sei Ehr (Gloria), Wir glauben all an einen Gott (Credo), Jesaja dem Propheten das geschah (Sanctus), Christe, du Lamm Gottes, or O Lamm Gottes, unschuldig (Agnus Dei).

The new congregational hymns were to be not only liturgical, but also biblical. In the initial months when Luther and his colleagues were writing their earliest hymns, the reformer created a new genre that was to have enormous significance for hymnic congregational participation in Reformation churches: the psalm-hymn, or metrical psalm, that is, the biblical psalm in the vernacular rendered into a strophic and rhymed form. Near the end of 1523, Luther wrote thus to a colleague Georg Spalatin:

Following the example of the prophets and fathers of the church, I intend to make vernacular psalms for the people, that is, spiritual songs so that the Word of God even by means of song may live among the people. Everywhere we are looking for poets. Now since you are so skillful and eloquent in German, I would like to ask you to work with us in this and to turn a psalm into a hymn as in the enclosed example of my work (Psalm 130: Aus tiefer Not schrei ich zu dir). But I would like you to avoid new-fangled, fancied words and to use expressions simple and common enough for the people to understand yet pure and fitting. The meaning should also be clear and as close as possible to the psalm. Irrespective of the exact wording, one must freely render the sense by suitable words.

Luther wrote no less than five metrical psalms during this earliest period of writing (1523–1524): Ach Gott, vom Himmel sieh darein (Psalm 12), Es spricht der Unweisen Mund wohl (Psalm 14), Es wollt uns Gott genädig sein (Psalm 67), Wär Gott nicht mit uns diese Zeit (Psalm 124), and Aus tiefer Not schrei ich zu dir (Psalm 130)—all in the same meter. He wrote Wohl dem, der in Gottes Furcht steht (Psalm 128) and Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott (Psalm 46) later, in 1525 and 1528–1529, respectively.

Other Lutherans followed Luther's example and wrote metrical psalms, thus establishing the genre that was to become almost universal in the churches of the Reformation, especially those that were Reformed in their THEOLOGY.

Evangelical Tradition

The Reformation in Strassburg, the leading city of Alsace, situated on the borders between FRANCE and GERMANY, although influenced by Wittenberg Lutheranism, nevertheless charted a somewhat independent course with regard to theological and ecclesiastical reforms. These reforms were certainly “evangelical,” but not consistently Lutheran and not yet Reformed, in the sense of later CALVINISM. During the first period of hymn writing by Luther and his colleagues, 1523–1525, these German Lutheran hymns, especially the metrical psalms, were republished in Strassburg soon after their first appearance in Wittenberg. But there were two significant differences. First, the Wittenberg hymns were given new “Strassburg” tunes, composed or edited by Mathias Greiter and Wolfgang Dachstein, cantor and organist, respectively, of Strassburg cathedral. Second, additional congregational songs written by various Strassburgers were added to those of the Wittenbergers. Congregational singing was taken seriously in the city and area of Strassburg. In his 1543 CATECHISM, MARTIN BUCER, the leading reformer of the city and surrounding area, included a whole section on the importance of participation in the Kirchengesang (congregational hymnody), which he saw as second in importance only to participation in corporate PRAYER in the worship assembly.

The contents of the Strasbourg hymnals published in the 1520s and 1530s demonstrate a growing marked preference for metrical psalms, a fact that was to have far-reaching consequences not only for the later hymnals and psalters published in Strassburg, but also for the development of Genevan psalters. This later Calvinist psalmody had its genesis in the metrical psalmody of Strassburg. In 1537, JOHN CALVIN was called by Bucer to minister to the relatively small group of French-speaking protestants in Strassburg. It was here that Calvin encountered German metrical psalms and was stimulated to create French metrical psalms to be sung to the same melodies used by the German congregations in Strassburg. These were published as Aulcuns pseaulmes et cantiques (Strasbourg, 1539), the first fruit of what was to become the French Genevan Psalter.

Reformed Traditions

The character of the Swiss Reformed churches was shaped in large measure by the two primary languages of the Cantons: German and French. The churches of the German-speaking Cantons were focused on HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (and later HEINRICH BULLINGER) in Zurich; those of the French-speaking Cantons, on Calvin in Geneva. Each language-group developed specific theological emphases, patterns of worship, and different conclusions with regard to the practice of congregational song.

Zwinglian

Probably the most musically gifted of the sixteenth-century reformers, Zwingli paradoxically excluded music from the churches in Zurich. A principal reason for this action was Zwingli's theological understanding of the nature of worship. He saw outward observances as of little value when compared to the inner spiritual life, which he regarded as the essence of Christianity. Outward rites and gestures with ceremonial music, such as in the Roman mass, obscured the essence of true worship. Although he did accept the principle of corporate speech, as opposed to corporate song, for the public worship of the churches of Zurich, introduction of this practice was disallowed by the Zurich magistracy. However, Zwingli's exclusion of corporate song and other music from public worship has been misunderstood as a prohibition of all music from all worship. On the contrary, music was important in his own devotional life, and Zwingli is known to have written both words and music for at least three religious songs: the Pestlied, a metrical version of Psalm 69, and the Kappeler Lied. He also believed that music had important secular functions, especially in EDUCATION, and made provisions for the study of music in his reformed curricula for the schools attached to the Zurich churches. Although he gave a role to music in the secular sphere, and also in the realm of private devotion, he nevertheless excluded the possibility of music in public worship. Hymnody was therefore not generally admitted into the worship of those churches that were among the first to adopt Zwinglian theology and practice. In the churches of Zurich, all music was excluded from worship for the remainder of the century, Zwingli's nonmusical ecclesiastical agenda being continued by his successor, Bullinger. Thus in 1561, when drafting the Second HELVETIC CONFESSION (not published until 1566), Bullinger included the following somewhat defensive statement: "If there are churches which have a true and proper sermon (orationem=service of worship) but no singing, they ought not to be condemned. For all the churches do not have the advantage of singing." The reason for his defensiveness on the issue was the growing influence of Genevan psalmody, which caused the churches following the Zurich model to become exceptions rather than the rule in Reformed SWITZERLAND.

Calvinist

Calvin's 1539 Strassburg collection of congregational songs included nineteen metrical psalms, six of which were written by Calvin himself and the remainder of which were written by Clement Marot, poet to the French court, whose psalm versions had not hitherto appeared in print. Calvin returned to Geneva in 1541, and a year later issued his Genevan liturgy, La Forme des prieres et chantz ecclesiastiques (Geneva, 1542), which also included an expanded version of his Strassburg psalter containing more metrical psalms by Marot. Calvin's goal was to produce the complete biblical psalter rendered into rhyme and meter, the principle being to render accurately the substance of the biblical text in vernacular verse. Marot continued to work with Calvin on the project; indeed, the French poet not only wrote more metrical psalms, but also produced other versifications that replaced Calvin's earlier examples. After Marot's death in 1544, Calvin turned to THEODORE BEZA to continue the work on a complete French metrical psalter. Within a few years, eighty-three psalms had been completed, and the important and influential edition of the French psalter could be published: Pseaumes octante trois de David (Geneva, 1551), for which Louis Bourgeois was the musical editor. The objective of a complete psalter was eventually realized in Les Pseaumes mis en rime, par Clement Marot, & Theodore Beza (Geneva, 1562). This contained all 150 psalms, written in 110 different meters, with 125 tunes edited by Claude Goudimel. It is difficult to overestimate the influence of these Genevan psalters, because virtually every European language group emulated them in one way or another by producing other vernacular collections of metrical psalms in the following century. Significant psalters following the French Genevan model were produced in English, Dutch, German, various East European languages, and even Russian in the early eighteenth century.

Anglican

The general European religious environment influenced the rise and development of English metrical psalmody. In ENGLAND, during the reign of HENRY VIII, Lutheran hymns and psalms were translated into English in the mid-1530s by MILES COVERDALE, who published them as Goostly psalmes and spirituall songes (London, 1535). Fifteen of the forty-one texts were metrical psalms, a foretaste of what was to come later. Coverdale's collection was ordered to be burnt, because its contents were "too Lutheran." Thus the promising beginning that the Goostly psalmes represented never matured, although one of its translations was later used, almost verbatim, by THOMAS CRANMER in drawing up the burial service for the 1549 Book of Common Prayer, and at least two of the melodies were later refashioned into English metrical psalm tunes.

Henry VIII's death in 1547 brought a new era of vernacular psalmody. Thomas Sternhold, a personal courtier to both Henry VIII and his successor Edward VI, wrote poetic versions of the psalms that were reported to have circulated in manuscript and at the English Court. Early in the reign of Edward VI, when the Reformation ideals were openly pursued, nineteen of Sternhold's metrical psalms were published as Certayne Psalmes chosen out of the Psalter of David, and Drawen into Englishe metre by Thomas Sternhold grome of ye Kynges Maiesties Roobes (London, 1547). Sternhold continued work on-writing metrical psalms, with the intention of completing the psalter, but died soon after his psalms first appeared in print. After his death, an expanded edition of his psalms was edited by John Hopkins: Al such psalmes of David as T. Sternhold didde in his life time draw into English metre, Newly emprinted (London, 1549). An additional eighteen versions by Sternhold were included, and Hopkins contributed a further seven, making a total of forty-four metrical psalms. This small collection proved to be popular, and at least ten reprints, dated between 1550 and 1554, are extant, implying that they were widely sung, at least in London, during the reign of Edward VI.

During the Marian years, 1553–1558, when the English church reverted to Catholicism and the Roman mass, Sternhold's psalter was expanded in various English Protestant exile congregations in Germany and Switzerland. In Strassburg, the Sternhold and Hopkins metrical psalms were augmented by English translations of Luther's Vater unser im Himmelreich and Erhalt uns, Herr, bei deinem Wort. In Wesel, a new edition of Sternhold and Hopkins was printed by Hugh Singleton, Psalmes of David in Metre (Wesel, 1555), an expanded edition that, in addition to the basic corpus of forty-four Sternhold and Hopkins metrical psalms, included seven psalm versions by William Whittingham, who had been in Frankfurt before moving to Geneva. The Wesel English psalter also included a number of metrical canticles: five anonymous, one by Whittingham, the Strassburg translation of Luther's "Lord's Prayer" hymn, and five by William Samuel, one of the two assistant ministers of the English exile congregation in Wesel. In Frankfurt, a split occurred within the exile congregation, with one party favoring Prayer Book worship and the other demanding a form more akin to the French liturgy of Calvin in Geneva. Ultimately the Prayer Book party remained in Frankfurt, while the others, including Whittingham and (later) JOHN KNOX, migrated to Geneva. Soon after arriving in the city, Whittingham published (in February 1556) the Calvinistic liturgy that had been drafted in Frankfurt. It included a modified and expanded version of the Sternhold and Hopkins psalter with its own title page: One and fiftie Psalmes of David In Englishe metre, whereof 37 were made by Thomas Sternholde: and the rest by others. Conferred with the hebrewes, and in certeyn places corrected as the sens of the Prophete required (Geneva, 1556). The revisions were made in accordance with Calvinist ideals, with the biblical text of the psalm primary and poetry secondary. Rhyme and meter were acceptable, but poetic paraphrase was not. The versions of Sternhold and Hopkins thus had to be “conferred with the Hebrew” and corrected accordingly. At least three later editions of the AngloGenevan psalter were issued between 1558 and 1560, with additional psalms by Whittingham, Pullain, and Kethe. The no longer extant 1559 edition was probably the first to include Kethe’s version of Psalm 100, “All people that on earth do dwell,” the oldest metrical psalm (and also the oldest congregational song) in the English-speaking world that has been sung continuously since its first appearance.

Following the death of Mary in 1558, her half-sister ELIZABETH I succeeded to the English throne, and the Reformation in England began again. English exiles abroad were now free to return. Among other things, they brought with them their experience of continental hymn and psalm singing, as well as the psalters they had used in their exile congregations. Thus a complex pattern of psalter publication was embarked on in London between 1559 and 1562. The basic corpus of metrical psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins, in their revised Genevan versions, were supplemented by more psalms by Sternhold, discovered after his death, and more contributed by Hopkins (who had survived the Marian years), and a number of other Elizabethan writers. Various metrical hymns and canticles that originated in Strassburg, Wesel, Frankfurt, and Geneva were also incorporated at the beginning and the end of the evolving English psalter.

In September 1562, the first complete English metrical psalter was published: The Whole Book of Psalmes, collected into Englysh metre by T.Sternhold I.Hopkins & others: conferred with the Ebrue, with apt Notes to synge them withal (London, 1562). Apart from one or two adjustments made over the following year or so, the English metrical psalter was now complete. It then ran through an extremely numerous sequence of editions, being reprinted again and again, in some years several times, throughout the next three centuries. Indeed, the Sternhold and Hopkins psalter, or, as it was later known, the Old Version, remained in print well into the nineteenth century in England. It proved to be the foundation stone on which the English tradition of metrical psalmody and hymnody was built.

Puritan, Presbyterian, and Independent

In SCOTLAND, under the leadership of John Knox, a Marian exile in both Frankfurt and Geneva, the Reformation developed in a Genevan direction. The Anglo-Genevan liturgy of 1556 was reprinted with only minor revisions in Edinburgh in 1564, and the complete metrical psalter issued with it was basically the eighty-seven psalms from the last revision of the AngloGenevan psalter of 1560, with the remainder taken from the English psalter of 1562: The C.L.psalmes of David in English metre (Edinburgh, 1564). The greater number of psalms from the Anglo-Genevan psalters made the Scottish psalter closer to the FrancoGenevan tradition, especially with regard to tunes, than its English counterpart.

The more extreme Puritans found Elizabethan England too unsympathetic to their views. After the Dutch Calvinist Reformation at the end of the 1570s, many cities of the NETHERLANDS were more amenable, especially Middleburg, Leiden, and Amsterdam. In Middleburg by the end of the sixteenth century, a number of imprints of both the English and Scottish psalters were produced for these exile congregations. In the early seventeenth century, a new metrical psalter was produced for English-speaking Separatists abroad by Henry Ainsworth: The Book of Psalmes, Englished in both Prose and Metre (Amsterdam, 1612). Ainsworth's aim was to produce metrical versions that were more faithful to the biblical psalms than The Whole Book of Psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins, and written in as many of the meters of Calvin's psalter as possible, so that more of the rugged Genevan psalm tunes could be sung by English Puritans and Separatists. Some of the English Separatists in the Netherlands, together with others from England (later known collectively as "the PILGRIM FATHERS"), sailed to the New World on the Mayflower, arriving in the New World in December 1620. The psalms they took with them were those of the metrical psalter of Henry Ainsworth. Thus congregational song in English-speaking North America at this time was metrical psalmody, either the psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins, preferred by Anglicans and some Puritans (later known as Independents, and later still as Congregationalists), or the psalms of Ainsworth, the psalter of the Separatists.

In the congregations of the Bay Company, the psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins were considered to be inaccurate renderings of the biblical texts, and the psalms of Ainsworth, with their many different meters, too difficult to sing. Thus the so-called "Bay Psalm Book" was created, the first book of any kind to be published in British North America: The Whole Book of Psalms Faithfully Translated into English Metre (Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1640). The key words on the title page, "Faithfully Translated," the equivalent of "conferred with the Hebrew" on the title page of Sternhold and Hopkins, expressed the Calvinistic concern for literal accuracy, and was expounded in the final paragraph of the preface to the Bay Psalm Book:

If therefore the verses are not always so smooth and elegant as some may desire or expect; let them consider that God's Altar needs not our polishings: Ex.20. For we have respected rather a plain translation, than to smooth our verses with the sweetness of any paraphrase, and so have attended conscience rather than elegance, fidelity rather than poetry, in translating the Hebrew words into English language, and David's poetry into English metre; that so we may sing in Sion the Lord's songs of praise according to his own will; until he take us from hence, and wipe away all our tears, & bid us enter into our Master's joy to sing eternal Alleluias.

Over the following century, the Bay Psalm Book was revised, reprinted, and widely used not only in New England, but also in England and Scotland, where it was reprinted a number of times.

Radical Traditions

The Anabaptists of the sixteenth century (see ANABAPTISM), the representatives of the so-called Radical Reformation, were the forerunners of the later Baptist tradition (see BAPTISTS) and included such groups as MENNONITES, HUTTERITES, and Swiss Brethren. The Anabaptists were persecuted and treated with suspicion by Catholics and Protestants alike. Some of their members were summarily executed in particularly barbarous ways. To honor the memory of these Anabaptist saints, narrative songs recounting their sufferings and faith were written and sung by their coreligionists. The earliest song that Luther is known to have written was in the nature of one of these martyr songs. In July 1523, he received the news that two young friars from the Augustinian monastery in Antwerp had been burnt at the stake in Brussels as “Lutherans.” In response and in the narrative style of popular folk songs, Luther wrote a “new song,” Ein neues Lied wir heben an. In it the martyrdom of the two men is described and their faith and witness commended. There may be a connection between Luther’s martyr song and such songs of the Anabaptists, because they postdate Luther’s; at the very least, they share many common features with the then-current narrative ballad. A number of Dutch martyr songs were written by David Joris and his followers between 1529 and 1536 to celebrate the lives and deaths of executed Anabaptists. These were later collected together and issued by Joris as Een Geestelijck Liedt-Boecxken, perhaps published around 1540 or at some later date. The Swiss Brethren produced a hymnal in 1564, Etliche schöne Christliche Gesang, which was later incorporated into the Aussbund of 1583, the principal hymnal of the Anabaptist tradition, especially the Mennonites. It is still in use, textually unchanged, in some American Mennonite communities today.

Later Movements and Influences: Metrical Psalmody Renewed

At the end of the seventeenth century, three important factors led to a renewal of the singing of metrical psalms: the metrical psalms of the Poet Laureate Nathan Tate and Nicholas Brady (chaplain to King William III), the change to “regular singing,” and the radical psalms of ISAAC WATTS. These developments had far-reaching consequences in Britain and British America.

In England in the latter part of the seventeenth century, there was growing dissatisfaction with the poetic limitations of the metrical psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins. The Stationers Company of London not only held the copyright to the Old Version, they also had an effective veto on any other version of the psalms. To circumvent the Stationers Company, Brady and Tate applied for, and were granted, Royal permission to publish A New Version of the Psalms of David in English Metre, fitted for Publick Use (London, 1696). Their choice of “New Version” meant that the psalter of Sternhold and Hopkins would thereafter be referred to as the Old Version. But before the New Version could be established in public worship, its authors withdrew it in response to considerable criticism. Over the next two years, Tate and Brady reworked their psalms, substantially revising some of them, and reissued them in 1698. But even some of these revisions were criticized, so the authors undertook one final revision before the definitive edition was published later that same year, 1698.

The first church at which these new psalms were sung was St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, in January 1699. Eventually the New Version of Tate and Brady became acceptable to many CHURCH OF ENGLAND congregations, but it never completely displaced the Old Version. By and large, in rural England the psalms of the Old Version continued to be the main form of congregational psalmody in the worship of the churches, in some places until fairly late in the nineteenth century, but in urban England the New Version was generally the preferred psalter. Although Tate and Brady accepted the Calvinist principle of rendering the biblical psalms in strophic verse, they were also concerned with doing so with a greater sense of poetry.

The bishop of London commended the New Version for use in the churches served by his clergy. Because his episcopal oversight extended beyond the boundaries of the diocese of London to include all Anglican churches of the British colonies, this commendation had far-reaching consequences. In particular, it was a major factor in the extensive use of Tate and Brady texts within and beyond ANGLICANISM in British North America throughout the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

Hard on the heels of these poetic concerns came a far-reaching musical revolution. Until this time, the performance practice of psalmody was “lining out,” that is, the congregation singing line by line, repeating them after the clerk or cantor. But this kind of call-and-response singing did not make too much sense when every line of every psalm was effectively sung twice, and where members of the congregation had to suspend their understanding while waiting for the next line that was essential to the meaning of the line they had just sung. Thus, at the beginning of the eighteenth century there was a movement to displace “usual singing” (lining-out, singing line by line) by “regular singing” (stanza by stanza). With regular singing came two far-reaching developments. First was the production of new tune books that introduced new tunes, therefore expanding the basic repertoire of the old psalm tunes. Second was the rise of the singing master, who not only sold the new tune books but also created parish singing schools to teach the new way of singing, that is, by reading the notes in the tune book rather than echoing the lining out of the parish clerk. This development was to have far-reaching consequences on hymnic development in the eighteenth century, especially Methodist hymnody.

The singing school tradition had a longer life in America, influencing the emergence of New England composers such as William Billings, Lewis Edson, and many others, in the early national period of the United States of America, and continuing well into the nineteenth century.

ISAAC WATTS was brought up as a Dissenter or Independent, a denominational affiliation that became known as CONGREGATIONALISM, and he later became an ordained minister (see DISSENT; NONCONFORMITY). Early in life he had begun to write metrical psalms and paraphrases in the attempt to improve on what he was called on to sing on Sunday. Eventually these congregational songs were published. The first edition of Hymns and Spiritual Songs (London, 1707) included a number of metrical psalms, but these were withdrawn from later editions because by this time Watts was working on a metrical psalter, which was eventually issued as The Psalms of David

Imitated in the Language of the New Testament, And Applied to the Christian State and Worship (London, 1719). “Imitated in the Language of the New Testament” contrasted with “conferred with the Hebrew” of the title page of the Old Version, and represented a significant hermeneutical and theological shift. The authors of both the Old and New Versions strived to put the substance of the Hebrew psalms as accurately as possible into English verse. In contrast, Watts specifically interpreted these Old Testament songs by incorporating the substance of New Testament teaching into them. In his preface to The Psalms of David Imitated he explained his purpose and method:

I have not been so curious and exact in striving every where to express the antient [sic] Sense and Meaning of David, but have rather exprest myself as I may suppose David would have done, had he lived in the days of Christianity. And by this means perhaps I have sometimes hit upon the true intent of the Spirit of God in those Verses farther and clearer than David himself could ever discover, as St. Peter encourages me to hope. 1 Pet. 1: 11, 12.... In all places I have kept my grand Design in view, and that is to teach my Author to speak like a Christian.

Watts had been anticipated by Luther, who had introduced New Testament teaching into his psalm versions (such as Psalm 46, Ein feste Burg), but in the English-speaking world, this new hermeneutic was revolutionary. Although many voices were raised against “Watts Whims,” their perceptive poetry made it impossible to ignore them. Over time, they were not only widely accepted, but also frequently imitated.

The revolution that Watts brought about was his insistence that Christian congregational song cannot be confined to the Old Testament psalms, but must embrace the totality of Scripture. In doing so he laid the foundation on which later English hymnody would be built. At the same time he exposed weaknesses in the old metrical psalm tradition. The success of Watts’s psalms and hymns eventually brought about the disintegration of the almost monolithic tradition of English metrical psalmody, which, though it continued for a few generations, was almost finally stifled by the increasing volume of hymn and hymnal production of the nineteenth century. Watts’ success was in his use of an almost exclusively monosyllabic language to create epigrammatic opening lines and lofty thoughts in connected stanzas. He contributed numerous “classic” hymns to English hymnody, among them “I’ll praise my Maker while I’ve breath,” “Jesus shall reign where’er the sun,” “Nature with open volume stands,” “Our God, our help in ages past,” and “When I survey the wondrous cross.”

The hymns and psalms of Watts were widely sung by American Congregationalists and Presbyterians, among others, throughout the eighteenth century, a practice that continued after the American Revolution with the texts suitably revised (together with additional psalms and hymns) by Joel Barlow, TIMOTHY DWIGHT, and others.

Pietism and the Evangelical Revival

German PIETISM, which flourished at the end of the seventeenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries, grew out of the combined influences of English Puritan devotional writings and the effects of the devastation of the Thirty Years War during the first half of the seventeenth century. The Practice of Piety by Lewis Bayly, published in the early 1600s, was widely read not only in English, but also in several other European languages, including German. Its spirituality caught the spirit of the era, especially in Germany, where the effects of warfare, famine, and disease created a subjective religious response, as can be seen in the poetry of Martin Opitz and the hymnody of Martin Rinckart (Nun danket alle Gott), Johann Heerman (Herzliebster Jesu), Tobias Clausnitzer (Liebster Jesu, wir sind hier), and especially Paul Gerhardt (Befiehl du deine Wege, Nun ruhen alle wälder, and O Haupt voll Blut ["O Sacred Head"]). The new hymns were set to new melodies that were lighter and more expressive than the older chorale tunes, which had become slow and ponderous by this time. Many of the new tunes were written by Johann Crüger and Johann Georg Ebeling, successively organists of the Nikolaikirche, Berlin, where PAUL GERHARDT was the pastor.

These subjective hymn texts and freer hymn tunes became the model for the hymn-writers and composers of later Lutheran Pietism, when its existence was formalized following the publication of PHILIPP SPENER'S Pia Desideria (1675). Under the leadership of Spener's successor AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE, the movement called for a continuation of what they saw as Luther's incomplete Reformation. All remnants of Roman Catholic theology and liturgy were to be eliminated from public worship, and private worship was to be exemplified by personal devotion built on fervent prayer and intensive BIBLE study. Further, the only music of public worship should be the newer type of hymns, with their subjective texts and livelier tunes, that these Pietists were already singing in their private worship. The Pietist hymnal was Johann Anastasius Freylinghausen's Neues Geistreiches Gesangbuch, first published in HALLE in 1704. It was reprinted numerous times, reaching its nineteenth edition by 1759; a second part issued in 1714 went through four editions by 1733; and the two parts, composed of some 1,600 hymns, were issued in one volume in 1741 and reprinted in 1771. This collection not only became the hymnal of German Lutheran Pietism, but also became a primary resource for the MORAVIAN CHURCH as reconstituted by Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF in 1722 and for METHODISM under JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY.

John Wesley encountered Moravian hymn-singing on board the ship Simmonds on his way to Georgia in October 1735 to February 1736. He translated some of these German hymns sung by the Moravian missionaries, and they were subsequently included in his Collection of Psalms and Hymns (Charleston, 1737). After their experiences of CONVERSION (or assurance) in London in May 1738, the two brothers created and directed the continuing intensification of hymn singing in the emerging Methodist movement. Charles began writing what would prove to be an astonishing output of hymn texts in a variety of poetic forms, meters, and images. In common with the embryonic Moravian communities in England, the Methodists in the 1740s are reported to have sung the "swift German" tunes of the Freylinghausen type.

Beginning in 1738, the Wesleys issued many different collections of hymns, composed almost exclusively of texts by Charles, culminating in A Collection of Hymns for the People Called Methodists (London, 1780), which provided the basic anthology of hymns for later Methodism. Through these publications, the English-speaking world was introduced to a whole range of hymnody that has become part of the basic corpus of English hymns. Among these hymns are “Christ Whose Glory Fills the Skies,” “Hark! The Herald Angels Sing,” “Hail the Day That Sees Him Rise,” “Love Divine, All Loves Excelling,” “O for a Thousand Tongues to Sing,” “Rejoice the Lord Is King,” and “Ye Servants of God.” Such hymns were taken over in many other hymnals of the later eighteenth century, among the most influential being GEORGE WHITEFIELD’S A Collection of Hymns for Social Worship, more particularly design’d for the use of the Tabernacle Congregation in London (London, 1753); Martin Madan’s A Collection of Psalms and Hymns, Extracted from Various Authors (the Lock Hospital hymn book) (London, 1760); Augustus Toplady’s Psalms and Hymns for Public and Private Worship (London, 1776); and A Select Collection of Hymns to be universally sung in all the Countess of Huntingdon’s Chapels (“Collected by her Ladyship”) (London, 1780). Another influential collection was Olney Hymns (London, 1779), which contained only the hymns of John Newton and William Cowper and disseminated such hymns as “Amazing Grace,” “How Sweet the Name of Jesus Sounds,” “O for a Closer Walk With God,” and “God Moves in a Mysterious Way.” This remarkable hymnodic output of the Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth century laid the foundation for the developments of the following century, which were equally as remarkable but in different ways.

Nineteenth-Century Movements

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, several different influences and movements contributed to the ongoing development of hymnody in the churches that had their origins in the Reformations of the sixteenth century. First, there was the consolidation of the evangelical movement in CAMP MEETING revivalism that was the outgrowth of the Scottish Presbyterian practice of annual eucharistic celebrations. At these noneucharistic camp meetings, a new style of hymnody was developed. The evangelical hymns of the eighteenth century, especially those of Watts and Wesley, were extended by repetitive refrains added to the end of each stanza and/or to the end of each line within a stanza. A lighter musical style that could be picked up quickly at first hearing, was created for these expanded hymn-texts. Over time, a significant sequence of camp meeting hymnals was published. Ultimately the camp meeting hymn style would be incorporated into the later SUNDAY SCHOOL hymnals and eventually evolve into the gospel hymn.

Second, particularly in the southern states of America, folk hymns that had hitherto been transmitted orally began to appear in tune books, many of them in shape-notes, in the early decades of the century. Among them was The Sacred Harp, first published in 1844, which created a singing tradition that continues today. Although HENRY WARD BEECHER included some of these tunes in his Plymouth Collection (New York, 1855), it was not until the twentieth century that these tunes entered into mainline denominational hymnals.

Third, from the second decade of the century, Lowell Mason undertook to reform congregational hymnody in the UNITED STATES. He was concerned that most congregations did not sing very much; the congregation tended to be replaced by the choirs of singing schools who sang fusing tunes in rural churches and by paid quartets of singers in urban churches. Mason saw that a musical reform was necessary if congregations were to be encouraged to sing. They needed simple and straightforward tunes, but not the light and sometimes extravagant tunes that had been generated by the evangelical REVIVALS of the previous century. Hymn tunes had to be “good” music, so he borrowed the philosophy and practice of William Gardiner, who had published Sacred Melodies from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven: Adapted to the Best English Poets (2 vols., London, 1812–1815). Music from the “best” contemporary (or near contemporary) composers was adapted into hymn tunes. Gardiner was not the first to make such adaptations—some eighteenth-century tune books had included adapted versions of arias and choruses from the oratorios of Handel and Haydn—but he was the first to exploit the technique as a matter of principle. Mason, however, out-Gardinered Gardiner by producing an extremely large number of adapted tunes in a dazzling sequence of tune books. Beginning with The Boston Handel and Haydn Society Collection of Church Music (Boston, 1822), and ending with Carmina Sacra Enlarged: The American Tune Book (Boston, 1869), he issued some forty different collections of church music, mostly devoted to congregational hymnody, that were reprinted and revised numerous times. These tune books encouraged others, notably Thomas Hastings and William Bradbury, to produce other collections. They were also quarried by later hymnal editors, and a significant number of Mason’s tunes are still found in contemporary American hymnals.

Fourth, there was the discovery that, contrary to popular belief, hymns, as opposed to metrical psalms, were not illegal in the worship of the Church of England. A famous ecclesiastical court case was brought by the members of St. Paul’s Church, Sheffield, against their incumbent, Thomas Cotterill, who had produced an anthology of congregational song in which hymns outnumbered 150 metrical psalms by more than two to one. It was shown that the Church of England had never concluded that metrical psalms were the only legitimate congregational songs for Anglican worship. The aftermath of the court case was that, at the request of the archbishop of York, Cotterill produced a new edition of his hymnal in which the hymns approximately equaled the number of metrical psalms: A Selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Use of Saint Paul’s Church in Sheffield (London, 1820). Included at the beginning of the small volume was a commendation written by the archbishop of York. The result of the court case, the archbishop’s commendation of the collection, and the fact that the publisher also made available editions with a generic title page that omitted reference to St. Paul’s Sheffield, ensured a wide dissemination of the Selection and encouraged the production of similar volumes. Many such locally produced hymnals appeared over the next generation.

Fifth, there was the OXFORD MOVEMENT, which was to exert an all-pervasive influence on the patterns and content of worship far beyond the boundaries of England or Anglicanism. This was essentially a reform movement with the aim of revitalizing the Church of England by examining its spiritual nature and historical roots, a movement that moved increasingly toward Catholic doctrine and practice. The principal leaders were JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, JOHN KEBLE, R.H. Froude, and EDWARD B. PUSEY, who together, from 1834, edited and wrote Tracts for the Times; hence the other name for the movement, Tractarianism. Many of the tracts were liturgical, and some specifically drew attention to Latin hymnody. Thus Newman's Tract 75, On the Roman Breviary as Embodying the Substance of the Devotional Services of the Church Catholic (1836), included fourteen Latin hymns in translation. Newman later published an anthology of Latin hymns from the Roman and Paris breviaries as Hymni ecclesiae (Oxford, 1838). The ideal of the Tractarians was for the English church to adopt, in translation, the Latin hymns of the liturgy from which the Book of Common Prayer was substantially created. Edward Caswall published Lyra Catholica (London, 1849), a collection of translations from the Roman missal and breviary, and John Mason Neale, with Thomas Helmore, produced The Hymnal Noted (London, 1851–1856), a comprehensive hymnal of translated Latin hymns, with plainsong notation, to be used in conjunction with the English Prayer Book services. Neale also published further translations of Latin hymnody and others from Greek sources, together with a few original hymns. Although the ideal of singing only translated Latin hymns in the English church was never realized, these translations were widely used, and a good many of them remain in current hymnals.

The Tractarian Movement also indirectly led to other translations. There were those who reacted to the Tractarian idealization of late medieval Catholicism and looked to European Protestantism instead. German Protestantism was in the public eye: Queen Victoria was married to Albert of Saxe-Coburg; Mendelssohn, whose music made significant use of the German chorale, was frequently in the United Kingdom; and there was a growing awareness of the music of J.S. Bach, who was seen as the quintessential Protestant composer. For those out of sympathy with the Catholic emphases of the Oxford Movement, the German Protestant chorale became a viable prospect. Thus Frances Elizabeth Cox published translations of German hymns in Hymns from the German (London, 1841; revised and enlarged in 1864), and Arthur Tozer Russell's translations appeared in two collections: Hymns for Public Worship and Private Devotion (London, 1848), published for the London German Hospital, and Psalms and Hymns, Partly Original, Partly Selected, for the Use of the Church of England (London, 1851). But the most significant translator of German hymns was Catherine Winkworth, who, between 1855 and 1869, published almost 400 translations of German hymns. Her first collection was issued as Lyra Germanica (London, 1855), and a second series followed in 1858. Five years later she collaborated with two musicians to produce The Chorale Book for England (London, 1863), and her last collection containing translations was The Christian Singers of Germany (London, 1869). Some of her translations have become classic English hymns in their own right, among them "Comfort, Comfort ye my People," "Praise to the Lord, the Almighty," and "Now Thank We all our God." Catherine Winkworth's translations of German hymns have been used more extensively in American hymnals than in their British counterparts, especially those produced by Lutheran bodies in the final quarter of the nineteenth century, when many congregations were beginning to move from German to English as the language for worship.

The most important hymnological outcome of the Oxford Movement was the creation of Hymns Ancient & Modern, the cooperative product of a number of Tractarian clergy. The editorial committee was chaired by Sir Henry W. Baker; John Keble and John Mason Neale were appointed advisers; and William Henry Monk, organist and director of music at King's College, London, oversaw the music. After a number of trial compilations were given restricted circulation in 1859–1860, the words-only edition of Hymns Ancient & Modern for Use in the Service of the Church was published in time to be used on Advent Sunday 1860, with the full music edition appearing the following year. Between 1861 and 1868, when a Supplement was issued, four and a half million copies of the basic edition were sold. The original edition with its supplement also crossed the Atlantic, being reprinted at least fourteen times in New York and Philadelphia between 1866 and 1888. In 1869, it was decided that a revised and enlarged edition of the hymnal was needed. Theologically and ecclesiastically, the revision was much broader in scope than the original Tractarian hymnal had been, and it incorporated more of contemporary writing, thus proportionately reducing the influence of translated Latin hymnody. Similarly, the presence of John Stainer on the music committee ensured that the predominant style became the somewhat self-indulgent, chromatic four-part harmony, with a propensity for seventh chords, that has come to be recognized as “the Victorian hymn tune.” The revised and expanded edition was issued in 1875. A supplement was added in 1889, which further broadened the total content of the hymnal. Hymns Ancient & Modern thus quickly became the most important and influential collection of the nineteenth century. It was used extensively by hymnal editors throughout the English-speaking world and was the primary model for the many denominational hymnals published on both sides of the Atlantic in the final quarter of the nineteenth century, and continued to exert a marked influence on twentieth-century hymnals.

Sixth, there was the phenomenon of gospel hymnody. As indicated earlier, gospel hymnody developed from the camp meeting style as it evolved through the Sunday School movement. Between 1840 and 1870, an astonishing sequence of Sunday School hymnals was published. Among the most influential were those of William Bradbury, notably The Golden Chain (1861) and The Golden Shower (1862), which were frequently reprinted. The gospel hymn finally emerged as an identifiable genre during the final quarter of the century with the evangelistic enterprises of organizations such as the YMCA (see YMCA, YWCA) and of such individuals as DWIGHT L. MOODY. Although primarily an American phenomenon, gospel hymnody nevertheless had an important early British dimension. IRA SANKEY first published his gospel hymns Sacred Songs and Solos (London, 1873), a sixteen-page pamphlet, for use during Moody's revivalist meetings in Great Britain. The basic collection was expanded and continued to be available in Britain at the same time as its American counterpart, Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs (New York, 1875), an amalgam of Sankey's pieces in the genre and those of P.P. Bliss that had been published in Gospel Songs (Cincinnati, 1874). There were many imitators and numerous collections were published. The genre is probably best epitomized in the gospel hymns of the prolific FANNY CROSBY.

Twentieth-Century Developments

The Reformation churches in the twentieth century have continued the development of inherited hymnodic traditions in many and varied ways—as well as pursuing new directions, such as the notable expansion from the narrow confines of monoculturism into the broader concerns of multiculturalism, the exploration of GENDER, and linguistic issues, and so forth—but space precludes a thorough investigation. Nevertheless, some of the major influences can be charted, at least in outline.

The first half of the century, devastated by two World Wars and disoriented first by the Wall Street crash and then the Great Depression, created a conservative mindset. The hymnody of the period was therefore characterized primarily by a conservation of the familiar. New hymnals were produced, but their orientation was a backward-looking continuation of the major strands of nineteenth-century traditions. That is not to say that new hymns were not being written and published, but these “twentieth-century” hymns were generally written in the older styles. There were exceptions, such as HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK’S “God of grace and God of glory,” but few gained entry into the regular hymnals until after the 1950s and 1960s. The themes of the hymns that were written during the first half of the century reflected various concerns of the age. In the aftermath of World War I, peace themes were prominent; the deprivations of the post-Depression years fostered the SOCIAL GosPEL of LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM reflected in many of the hymns of the period; the beginnings of the ecumenical movement that would eventually lead to the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES gave rise to hymns that expressed the fundamental unity of faith of worldwide Christianity (see ECUMENISM); and after the testing of the hydrogen bomb in the late 1940s, it became painfully clear that humanity had the expertise to destroy itself. Hymn writers such as Albert Bayly expressed a new perspective on the need for the human race to depend on the providence of God.

The iconoclastic 1960s proved to be a watershed with regard to the creation of new hymnody. The last three decades of the twentieth century saw an unprecedented period of hymn writing in a variety of textual and musical styles, and an almost bewildering sequence of hymnal publication. On the one hand, there has been the British hymn explosion, whose leading writers and composers have been Fred Pratt Green, Fred Kaan, Brian Wren, Erik Routley, and Peter Cutts, among many others, and the American hymnal explosion, in which every major denominational grouping has already produced its own hymnals or has plans to do so. The former has already been described and analyzed, but the latter has yet to receive the attention it deserves.

One of the most (some would say the most) significant ecumenical developments of the twentieth century has been the liturgical movement. The Catholic Church played a leading role in this movement, which proved to be of catalytic importance with regard to its own reformation of worship initiated by the Second Vatican Council. But these reforms have had an impact on the older Reformation churches as well. For example, the introduction of the three-year lectionary outside Catholicism has materially effected a greater biblicism among those traditions that prided themselves on their biblicity! That is because the wider spread of the lectionary revealed whole areas that had not been covered hitherto in “Protestant” hymnody, especially in the English-speaking world, and this has stimulated hymn writing on these neglected biblical themes. But not only has much of contemporary hymnody become more biblical, it has also become more “liturgical” in its usage. Thus as Catholicism has been embracing the “Protestant” hymn in its worship, many Reformation churches have been singing their hymns within a “Catholic” liturgical structure. The latter part of the twentieth century brought a reinforcement of the insights of Tractarian Anglicans, Genevan Calvinists, and Wittenberg Lutherans, who all, one way or another, saw congregational song not as incidental to worship but rather as part of its liturgical substance.

See also Anglican Chant; Music

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Frank, ed. Representative Verse of Charles Wesley. London: Epworth, 1962.
- Barr, Cyrilla. The Monophonic Lauda and the Lay Religious Confraternities of Tuscany and Umbria in the Late Middle Ages. Kalamazoo, MI: Medieval Institute, 1988.
- The Bay Psalm Book: A Facsimile Reprint of the First Edition 1640*. Edited by Zoltán Haraszti. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1956.
- Benson, Louis F. The English Hymn: Its Development and Use in Worship (1915). Richmond, VA: Knox, 1962.
- Brumm, James. "The Mysterious American Odyssey of Hymns A & M." The Hymn Society of Great Britain and Ireland Bulletin 12 no. 2 (1988): 24–26.
- Bucer, Martin. Martin Bucers Katechismen aus den Jahren 1534, 1537, 1543. Edited by Robert Stupperich. (Martin Bucers Deutsche Schriften, Bd. 6/3). Gütersloh, Germany: Mohn, 1987.
- Clarke, W.K. Lowther. A Hundred Years of Hymns Ancient and Modern. London: Clowes, 1960.
- Diehl, Patrick S. The Medieval European Religious Lyric: An Ars Poetica. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1985.
- Drain, Susan. The Anglican Church in Nineteenth Century Britain: Hymns Ancient and Modern (1860–1875). Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1989.
- Dunstan, Alan. The Hymn Explosion. Croydon, UK: Royal School of Church Music, 1981.
- Farr, David. "Protestant Hymn-Singing in the United States, 1916–1943: Affirming an Ecumenical Heritage." In The Hymnal 1982 Companion, edited by R.F. Glover. New York: The Church Hymnal Corporation, 1991. 505–554.
- Fraser, Ian. "Beginnings at Dunblane," Duty and Delight: Routley Remembered. Edited by Robin A. Leaver and James H. Litton. Carol Stream, IL: Hope, 1985. 171–190.
- Foote, Henry W. Three Centuries of American Hymnody. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1940; reprint, with additions (n.p.): Archon, 1968.
- Fornançon, Siegrfried. "Johann Crüger und der Genfer Psalter." Jahrbuch für Liturgik und Hymnologie 1 (1955): 115–120.
- Garside, Charles. Zwingli and the Arts. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1966; reprint, New York: Da Capo, 1981.
- Greene, Richard. Early English Carols, rev. ed. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1977.
- Honders, A. Casper. "The Reformers on Church Music." In Pulpit, Table, and Song: Essays in Celebration of Howard G. Hageman. Edited by Heather Elkins and Edward C. Zaragoza, Lanham, MD: Scarecrow, 1996. 46–52.
- Jenny, Markus. Zwinglis Stellung zur Musik im Gottesdienst. Zurich, Switzerland: Zwingli Verlag, 1966.
- . "The Hymns of Zwingli and Luther: A Comparison." In Cantors at the Crossroads: Essays on Church Music in Honor of Walter E. Buszin. Edited by Johannes Riedel, 45–63. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1967.
- . Luther, Zwingli, Calvin in ihren Liedern. Zurich, Switzerland: Theologischer Verlag, 1983.
- Keyte, Hugh, and Andrew Parrott. The New Oxford Book of Carols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

- Knuttel, J.A. N. Het Geestelijk Lied in de Nederlanden voor de Kerkhervorming. Rotterdam, The Netherlands: Brusse, 1906; reprint, Groningen. The Netherlands: Bouma, 1974.
- Leaver, Robin A. "Isaac Watts's Hermeneutical Principles and the Decline of Metrical Psalmody." Churchman 92 (1978): 56–60.
- . Catherine Winkworth: the Influence of Her Translations on English Hymnody. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1978.
- . "British Hymnody, 1900–1950." In The Hymnal 1982 Companion. Edited by R.F. Glover. New York: Church Hymnal Corp., 1991. 474–504.
- . "British Hymnody Since 1950." In The Hymnal 1982 Companion. Edited by R.F. Glover. New York: Church Hymnal Corp., 1991. 555–599.
- . "Renewal in Hymnody." Lutheran Quarterly 6 (1992): 359–383.
- . "Charles Wesley and Anglicanism." In Charles Wesley: Poet and Theologian. Edited by S.T. Kimbrough. Nashville, TN: Kingswood, 1992. 157–175, 241–243.
- . "Are Hymns Theological by Design or Default?" New Mercersburg Review 18 (Autumn 1995): 12–33.
- . "Lampe's Tunes." Hymns on the Great Festivals and Other Occasions: Hymn Texts by Charles Wesley and Samuel Wesley, Jr., Music by John Frederick Lampe, facsimile (1746) with introduction by Carleton R. Young, Frank Baker, Robin A. Leaver, and S.T. Kimbrough, Jr. Madison, NJ: Charles Wesley Society, 1996. 31–44.
- Luff, Alan. "The Hymn Explosion after 25 Years." The Hymn 46 (April 1995): 6–15.
- Luther, Martin. Luther's Works: American Edition. Edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and Helmut T. Lehmann. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1955; reprint, Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1986.
- . Martin Luther Deutsche Messe 1526 (Facsimile). Edited by Johannes Wolf. Kassel, Germany: Bärenreiter, 1934.
- McCart, Thomas K. The Matter and Manner of Praise: The Controversial Evolution of Hymnody in the Church of England, 1760–1840. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow, 1998.
- McMullen, Dianne Marie. "The Geistreiches Gesangbuch of Johann Anastasius Freylinghausen (1670–1739): A German Pietist Hymnal." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Michigan, 1987.
- Patrick, Miller. Four Centuries of Scottish Psalmody. London: Oxford University Press, 1949.
- Pemberton, Carol A. Lowell Mason: His Life and Work. Ann Arbor, MI: UMI Research Press, 1985.
- Pidoux, Pierre. Le Psautier Huguenot du XVIe Siècle. 2 vols. Basel, Switzerland: Bärenreiter, 1962.
- Pratt, Waldo Seldon. The Music of the French Psalter of 1562: A Historical Survey and Analysis. New York: Columbia University Press, 1939; reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1966.
- Rattenbury, J. Ernest. The Eucharistic Hymns of John and Charles Wesley. London: Epworth, 1948.
- Reimann, Hannes. Die Einführung des Kirchengesangs in der Zürcher Kirche nach der Reformation. Zurich, Switzerland: Zwingli Verlag, 1959.
- Riedel, Johannes. "Leisen Formulae: Their Polyphonic Settings in the Renaissance and Reformation." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Southern California, 1953.
- Schmidt, Leigh Eric. Holy Fairs: Scotland and the Making of American Revivalism. 2nd ed. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2001.
- Schulz-Widmer, Russell. "Hymnody in the United States Since 1950." In The Hymnal 1982 Companion. Edited by R.F. Glover. New York: Church Hymnal Corp., 1991. 600–630.
- Stackhouse, Rochelle A. The Language of the Psalms in Worship: American Revisions of Watts' Psalter. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow, 1997.
- Stevens, John. Words and Music in the Middle Ages: Song, Narrative, Dance, and Drama, 1050–1350. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Temperley, Nicholas. "Middleburg Psalms." Studies in Bibliography: Papers of the Bibliographical Society of the University of Virginia, 30 (1977): 162–170.
- . The Music of the English Parish Church, 2 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979–1983.

- , ed. The Hymn Tune Index: A Census of English Language Hymn Tunes in Printed Sources from 1535 to 1820. 4 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon, 1998.
- Thompson, Bard, ed. Liturgies of the Western Church. Cleveland, OH: World Books, 1961; reprint, Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1981.
- Wasson, D. Dewitt. Hymntune Index and Related Hymn Materials. 3 vols. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow, 1998.
- Watson, J.R. The English Hymn: A Critical and Historical Study. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Wolkan, Rudolf. Die Lieder der Wiedertäufer: Ein Beitrag zur Deutschen und Niederländischen Literatur- und Kirchengeschichte. Berlin, Germany: Behr, 1903; reprint, Nieuwkoop: de Graaf, 1965.
- Woolf, Rosemary. English Religious Lyric in the Middle Ages. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1968.

ROBIN A.LEAVER

ICELAND

Iceland is a partly ice-covered (e.g., Vatnajökull, 8,400 square kilometers) volcanic island—astride the Mid-Atlantic Ridge, with over fifty active vents—of 102,973 square kilometers (or 39,699 square miles, compared to the state of Pennsylvania at 46, 058 square miles, and Ireland, 32,589 square miles) between NORWAY and Greenland, just south of the Arctic Circle. Less than one tenth of the island is habitable. Until recently agriculture was largely pastoral (with some fishing) and sensitive to weather, so that famine was not uncommon.

Iceland was settled by the Norse—with some Celts—after 870. The Alþing, the parliament of an aristocratic republic without an executive branch, was established in 930. In 1000 (or 999) the Alþing adopted Christianity as the national religion. In the early period, churches were proprietary: political leaders often functioned also as priests. Increasing disorder among very powerful families led to the acceptance of the rule of the king of Norway from 1262 to 1264. In the thirteenth century Icelanders produced one of the major bodies of medieval European vernacular literature, the Icelandic sagas. The Gregorian Reform, struggling for “libertas ecclesiae,” and canon law were also introduced, by St. Eorlákr, thus breaking the identity of political and spiritual leadership. There were two dioceses until 1796: the southern, at Skálholt, and the northern, at Hólar. Both sees, some monasteries, and some important farms (such as Oddi) had schools. A deteriorating climate (“the little Ice Age”), the virtual end of Icelandic shipping, and the transfer of power to Copenhagen contributed significantly to the isolation of Iceland in the fifteenth century. In that age Iceland was vulnerable to pirate raids, British fishing vessels, volcanoes, and pack ice.

The REFORMATION arrived in DENMARK, after a tentative generation, by right of Christian III’s victory in the civil war concluded in 1536. The new ways were introduced to Norway and Iceland by decree, the two countries redefined as provinces of Denmark. The Reformation in Iceland was therefore a “revolution from above” (Vilborg Auður Ísleifsdóttir). Until the end of the eighteenth century people lived in small groups on thousands of farms. The usual means of disseminating reformed ideas—towns, literate merchant classes, book fairs—did not exist. Nor did the usual audience: there was no pre-Reformation preparation, movement, or agitation; there were no heretics in the later Middle Ages, no active disenchantment with the church. Some visiting merchants may have brought ideas (in German), but among Icelanders only a small group of clerks in the offices of the bishop of Skálholt (some of whom had studied abroad) including Gizurr Einarsson and Oddr Gotthálfsson seemed interested in the Reformation. When the king sent his Church Ordinance to Iceland (probably 1538) it was ignored or rejected by the bishops and CLERGY (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). In 1539 local authorities seized and dismantled the monastery of Viðey. Attempts to suppress more monasteries and to interfere at Skálholt led to the killing of the entire Danish administration—in fact only a few people. Skálholt's bishop Ögmundur Pálsson retired in 1540. He and the king sponsored as his successor his evangelical clerk Gizurr Einarsson, a choice Ögmundur came to regret and attempted to reverse. Gizurr appealed to the military authorities who restored Danish power in 1541. The Reformation was then installed in the southern diocese, which accepted the Ordinance. Gizurr worked hard to implement the new THEOLOGY and LITURGY, but without radical revolution. He encouraged the translation, printing, and use by priests of the Scriptures and evangelical books (see BIBLE TRANSLATION).

Jón Arason, bishop of Hólar, rejected the Ordinance in 1540. The government left him alone for some years. After Gizurr's death in 1548, however, Jón moved to reverse events at Skálholt, securing his own appointment as administrator of the see and the election of a candidate with good papal credentials. Supporters of Gizurr elected their own candidate, approved by the Crown, whom Jón kidnapped and held prisoner at Hólar. In 1549 he secured control of Skál-holt, although he overreached himself and was taken prisoner. He and his two sons were beheaded at Skál-holt on November 7, 1550. Revenge killings followed, by Jón's family and supporters, but the dispatch of two warships and troops ended all resistance to the Crown. The northern diocese accepted the Ordinance in 1552.

Monasteries were suppressed, the land taken by the Crown (see MONASTICISM). The bishops kept much of the land and part of the tithes, but lost other power (such as fines). The ecclesiastical transformation was complete in only fifteen years, yet many usages from pre-Reformation days continued, so that building a community of faith as the reformers understood it remained a challenge. The Scandinavian languages were passing through the same sort of revolution as that which created modern English; Icelandic did not. Danish books—such as were used in Norway—did not serve an evangelical church in Iceland. The first press in Iceland was not set up until mid-century; it later came into the possession of Þorláks-son, bishop of Hólar from 1571 to 1627. Therefore the first Icelandic translation of the New Testament, that of Oddr Gottshálfsson, was published in Denmark in 1540. Later, however, bishop Guðbrandr oversaw the printing of the complete translation of the BIBLE in 1584, and many pamphlets, translations of Hymn books, and other pious works (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The Bible helped stabilize the Icelandic language. The two sees continued their schools, now the only ones in the country. They also continued the tradition of scholarship, the study not only of Scripture but also of the history of Iceland, of the church, and of early Norse literature. Scholars such as Angrímr Jónsson, bishop Finnur Jónsson, Árni Magnús-son, and bishop Brynjólfur Sveinsson (who saved Codex regius) worked in the schools or were commissioned to write by the bishops. The church also undertook the task of extending literacy, so that all Icelanders could read Scripture.

The witchcraft hysteria came slowly to Iceland and was inspired from abroad. In the years between 1625 and 1685 at least 120 were tried and twenty-five executed, including two women.

A most moving voice of Lutheran Iceland is that of the poet Hallgrímur Pétursson (for whom the new and very large church in Reykjavík, Hallgrímskirka, is named), whose Passíusálmur (Hymns of the Passion) are still deeply cherished and widely read.

In 1796 the two sees and their schools were combined in a new see in Reykjavik. Their property was absorbed by the Crown, which undertook to pay the costs. In 1874 a new constitution was established by Christian IX. Following from that came autonomy of local congregations in many important matters, freedom of association and religious freedom for nonmembers of the state church. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries there has been a growth of such groups as the Lutheran Free Church and spiritualists.

Iceland became independent in 1944. The population continues, at least formally, to be over 90 percent Evangelical Lutheran.

See also Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

Einarsson, Stefán. A History of Icelandic Literature. New York: Johns Hopkins Press for the American-Scandinavian Foundation 1957.

Hood, John C.F. The Icelandic Church Saga. London: SPCK, 1946.

Hugason, Hjalti, ed. Kristni á Íslandi. Reykjavík: Albing: 2000.

Karlsson, Gunnar. The History of Iceland. Minneapolis, MN: University of Minnesota Press 2000.

RICHARD LUMAN

ICONOCLASM

Protestant Christianity is iconoclastic in two senses, the abstract and the concrete. An “iconoclast” [Gk. eikon=image+klastes=breaker] is someone who destroys images, especially those that carry special meaning to a specific culture. An iconoclast, in the widest sense of the term, is someone who identifies certain objects, institutions, or ideas as “false” and calls for their removal. Iconoclasts do not actually need to destroy images; someone who attacks images verbally can be called iconoclastic. This type of abstract iconoclasm that challenges cherished beliefs and institutions verbally is always broadly understood, and applied beyond religion. An iconoclast can also be someone who actually attacks physical images and sacred objects. Literal iconoclasm is understood less broadly, as religiously motivated, but is usually taken to mean the destruction of all holy objects, not just images. In the case of REFORMATION iconoclasm, altars, relics, chalices, consecrated hosts, holy water fonts, vestments, missals, lamps, windows, and organs could also be attacked as idolatrous.

Since the sixteenth century, all Protestants have been iconoclasts in the abstract sense, insofar as they reject many of the truth claims of the Roman Catholic Church, along with many of its rituals and symbols. However, not all Protestants have been iconoclasts in the literal sense. On the contrary, the question of whether the symbols of Catholicism should be destroyed became one of the most divisive issues separating the various major traditions of the Protestant Reformation.

From the very start of the Reformation, Protestants disagreed about iconoclasm. Although there are no hard and fast lines that can be drawn among the different Protestant traditions that emerged in the sixteenth century, and there are always plenty of exceptions to be found to any rule, the Lutherans normally objected to the wholesale destruction of images, and even allowed biblically focused art in their churches. The Anglicans also adopted an ambivalent attitude toward images and their place in the life and worship of the Church of England. The Reformed, for the most part, became the most vehement iconoclasts, and much of this article focuses on them. The Radicals tended to oppose religious imagery on biblical grounds, but they varied in their attitude toward iconoclasm. At one end of the Radical spectrum, pacifists such as the Swiss Brethren and the MENNONITES shied away from all violent acts, including the breaking of images. At the other end of the spectrum, militant revolutionaries, such as those who took over Münster in 1534, destroyed images along with anything else they deemed ungodly.

Perceptions of the significance of iconoclasm for the history of Protestantism vary widely. For some in the Reformed tradition, the iconoclastic heritage of the Reformation is very significant; for others in the Protestant tradition, it is just a blip on the screen, or worse, an embarrassment. For Catholics the subject has always been significant, although not always well understood. It is important to keep in mind that, although Protestants were at odds with one another when it came to their attitudes toward religious imagery and iconoclasm, Catholics in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries tended to think that iconoclasm was one of the chief distinguishing features of Protestantism. In fact, for many early modern Catholics, iconoclasm and Protestantism were inseparable.

History

Protestant iconoclasm began in earnest with ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON KARLSTADT (c. 1480–1541), a colleague of MARTIN LUTHER (1484–1546) at the University of Wittenberg. Karlstadt agreed with Luther on many theological issues, but differed with him on the interpretation of the two key biblical passages that prohibit the use of religious imagery in worship (Exodus 20:4–6; Leviticus 5:8–10). Karlstadt was the first of the Protestant Reformers to argue that the prohibition of images was one of the Ten Commandments, and could not be ignored: “I say to you that God has forbidden images with no less diligence than killing, stealing, adultery, and the like” (Abthung, p. 22).

Luther never agreed with this position. To him, the command against images was no more valid for Christians than circumcision and the dietary laws of the Covenant of Moses. In March 1522 Luther forced Karlstadt to leave Wittenberg, largely because of their disagreement over this issue. This difference of opinion points clearly to a hermeneutical rift within the Protestant tradition, one that would evolve into a major watershed between Lutherans and most other Protestants. Although Luther and Karlstadt both agreed on the primacy of the BIBLE as the ultimate authority, and pressed for reforms in accordance with it, neither man could accept the other’s interpretation of the meaning of the commandment against images. This was no small disagreement. Although Karlstadt would vanish into relative obscurity, his position would be championed by HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, JOHN CALVIN, and other Reformed Protestants, and the rift among the opponents of Roman Catholicism on this issue would become deep and long. In the Small Catechism Luther does not mention the prohibition of images at all in his listing of the Ten Commandments. In the Catechism of the Church of Geneva, however, the Second Commandment reads: “you shall have no graven images...nor bow down, nor serve them.”

Reformed Protestants would make the rejection of images one of their central principles, along with a highly spiritualized interpretation of all symbols and sacraments. Consequently, the destruction of images and sacred objects became one of the earmarks of this tradition, as it spread throughout Switzerland at first, in the 1520s, and later, throughout Europe. In France, the Netherlands, Germany, and the British Isles, the iconoclastic legacy of the Reformed tradition would cause widespread damage and, in some places, erase much of the artistic heritage of medieval Catholicism.

Discerning the relation between the ideology of iconoclasm and other factors that might have led to it—social, political, and economic—remains a difficult task, and a challenge for historians. It is always tempting to try to isolate grievances that might have led to iconoclasm, and also to distinguish some of these as a leading cause for the destruction of an entire symbolic code, but in the long run, it is unwise to avoid complexity when dealing with this subject. As the Protestant Reformation gained ground in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, there were perhaps as many reasons for iconoclasm as there were iconoclasts, and as many different types of iconoclasm as there were communities affected by it. Because symbols function on multiple levels of meaning, so do the actions taken against them.

Generally, Reformation iconoclasm can be divided into two major types, legal and illegal. Throughout Catholic Europe, the destruction of sacred objects was prohibited by law, and was punishable as blasphemy or sacrilege. Destroying images and holy objects, therefore, required challenging the law. Iconoclasm could be effected lawfully, after a local or national government had withdrawn its protection from sacred objects. Sometimes this destruction was orderly, such as in Zurich, in 1524; but it could also be disorderly, as in Bern in 1528; or it could be a combination of order and disorder, as in Scotland in 1559 and France in 1561–1562. Iconoclasm could also be an illegal act and a form of rebellion. Unlawful iconoclasm aimed not only to destroy specific objects, but also to call into question the legality of these objects. In many ways iconoclasm was a revolutionary tactic, employed at the local and national levels, as Reformed Protestantism made inroads into Catholic communities.

Theology

“Idolatry” is a relative, highly charged term that presupposes a definition of what is true and false in religion because idols are never universally recognized as such: rather, they are often identified as the deities of “the other.” Protestant iconoclasm was firmly rooted in the ancient condemnation of heathen idolatry found in the Hebrew Bible. In the sixteenth century, however, the definition of idolatry was applied to Christian rather than pagan worship, and extended beyond the veneration of images, or the worship of any physical object, to any form of devotion that was judged to be incorrect.

The way in which “idolatry” was defined by the leaders of the Protestant Reformation, therefore, depended on their exegesis of the Bible and on the theology of worship they developed from their interpretation of the sacred text. All in all, the Reformation critique of “idolatry,” and the iconoclasm produced by it, depended on four interrelated principles.

1. Biblicism. First of all, iconoclastic theology was firmly rooted in the principle of sola scriptura. A literal interpretation of the biblical texts that prohibit images can lead directly to an iconoclastic theology. However, iconoclasm was not derived so simply and purely from biblical injunctions. Protestant biblicism was also strengthened by a sense of primitivism, or the notion that the early Christian past provided a true model for the reformation of Church and society. It was not just the prohibition of visual symbols in Exodus and Leviticus that convinced iconoclastic reformers of the need to wipe out Catholic symbols and rituals, but also the fact that, as they saw it, there was no evidence for the existence of much of medieval worship in the early Apostolic Church.

Of course, agreeing on sola scriptura did not necessarily lead to any agreement on how to interpret sacred texts. The biblical injunctions against images are a prime example of this hermeneutical rift among the Reformers. An interpretative framework had to be in place first for Reformed Protestants to arrive at the conclusion that the Bible prohibited images to Christians as well as Jews.

2. Metaphysics. The prohibition of images was interpreted as valid and reasonable by the Reformed because of certain key assumptions they accepted about the relationship between the natural and supernatural realms. The guiding principle of iconoclastic metaphysics—and therefore also of iconoclastic hermeneutics—is the incompatibility of spirit and matter. The iconoclastic theology of the Reformed was summarized in the adage finitum non est capax infiniti: the finite cannot convey (or contain) the infinite. This was a principle that Reformed Protestants applied to all ritual and symbols, and it was the very marrow of iconoclastic theology. This principle, in turn, was derived from three interrelated components.

- God as radically transcendent. The Reformed tradition assumed that the supernatural realm was radically “other.” All things divine, therefore, were above and beyond the natural and created order. Zwingli argued that the things of earth were “carnal,” and that they were “enmity against God.” He also argued that matter and spirit were as incapable of mixing as fire and water. John Calvin would expand on these arguments, and press further for an understanding of the spiritual and the material as antithetical poles. In Calvin’s words: “whatever holds down and confines the senses to the earth is contrary to the covenant of God; in which, inviting us to himself, he permits us to think of nothing but what is spiritual” (CO, vol. 24, p. 387).
- Matter as inferior to spirit. Reformed metaphysics proposed that since matter is incapable of bringing humans to the divine realm, there can be no physical relation between image and prototype, symbol and reality. Even worse, as the Reformed saw it, worship offered to any material object has a negative value. This notion of an inversion was turned into a practical equation by Zwingli, who went as far as to say: “the more you give to the material, the more you take away from the spiritual.” (ZW, vol. 8, pp. 194–195.) For these reasons, the Reformed denied the validity of the distinction between “veneration” (dulia) and “worship” (latrid) made by Catholics—the very distinction upon which much of the symbolic structure of Catholicism rested.
- Teleology. For iconoclasts, the commandment against images needed to be obeyed not only because it was the will of God, but also because it was reasonable. As the iconoclastic theology of the Reformed saw it, the very meaning of human existence was perverted by the “falsehood” of Roman Catholic rituals and symbols. This understanding of the nature and purpose of human existence rested on the assumption that the proper end of human life is to know God and to glorify him by worship and obedience. Idolatry, therefore, not only subverts the meaning of human existence by making it impossible for individuals to reach their proper end; it also threatens the well-being of society as a whole.

3. Anthropology. Reformed iconoclastic theology was based also on the central Protestant belief in the total corruption of human nature. In Reformed theology, the cause for idolatry is not found in the material world itself, but in human beings. John Calvin would argue: “Every one of us is, even from his mother’s womb, a master craftsman of idols” (CO, vol. 24, p. 423). This understanding of the nature of idolatry is what made it impossible for the Reformed to regard any religious image as harmless: as they saw it, if given the opportunity, every human being will be naturally compelled to worship idolatrously.
4. The social dimension. Iconoclastic theology also had a social component. In the first place, images and symbols were attacked as dangerous because idolatry was believed to incite the wrath of God. Reformed theology tended to view the presence of idolatry in any community as pollution, and spoke of iconoclasm as cleansing. The GENEVA CATECHISM of 1545, for instance, devotes extensive attention to the divine punishments attached to the second commandment, particularly to the threat of having God’s punishments extend to the third and fourth generations in an idolatrous, polluted society. Second, iconoclastic theology also argued that the material resources “wasted” on idols were an affront to Christian charity. As the Reformed iconoclasts saw it, the wealth poured into the creation of Catholic symbols should be redistributed to the poor and needy. Third, opposition to Catholic “idolatry” was also based on animosity toward the educational system they represented. The medieval church had long argued that images were the libri pauperum, or books of the poor and illiterate. Protestant iconoclasts rejected this argument because it rested on the unscriptural assumption that images could teach anything. They also rejected it because, as they saw it, images served to promote and sustain a spiritual caste system: images were another way in which the Catholic clergy kept the laity under their thumb.

The Meaning of Iconoclasm

No single factor can fully explain the development of iconoclasm in the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Iconoclastic theology is very complex, and so are the reasons for its appearance and acceptance. Moreover, iconoclasm itself is ultimately an act, or event, not just an idea. Although derived from ideology, iconoclasm does not necessarily depend on it totally. Protestant iconoclasm aimed not only to destroy the physical “idols” of Catholicism, but to abolish a complex symbolic system, and to remove the clerics who upheld it. Reformation iconoclasm was thus revolutionary on two fronts. First, it was a theological upheaval and a redefinition of the sacred. Reformation iconoclasts denied certain relations between body and soul, or heaven and earth, and redefined the meaning of symbol and ritual. Reformation iconoclasm was also revolutionary in a functional sense because it was an act of violence against the symbolic code of medieval Christianity and its guardians, the Roman Catholic clergy. The young men who led the iconoclastic riot that turned Geneva into a Reformed city knew this, for they referred to the images they destroyed as “the gods of the priests.”

Iconoclasm is always an expression of discontent. In the case of the Protestant Reformation, iconoclasm was a forceful protest against the medieval past. It was a means of proving the “falseness” of Roman Catholicism, and of desacralizing its symbolic structure. In a positive sense, iconoclasm was also a means of affirming change and of calling for a thorough reform of religion and society.

See also Bible; Calvin, John; Geneva Catechism; Karlstadt, Andreas Bodenstein von; Luther, Martin; Mennonites; Reformation; Zwingli, Huldrych

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Baum, W., E. Cunitz, and E. Reuss, eds. [CO]: Johannes Calvini Opera Quae Supersunt Omnia, Corpus Reformatorum. Brunswick, 1863–1880.
- Egli, E., and G. Finsler, eds. [ZW]: Huldreich Zwinglis Sämtliche Werke, Corpus Reformatorum. Berlin: C.A. Schwetschke und Sohn, 1905–1990.
- Lietzmann, Hans, ed. [Abthung]: Karlstadt, Andreas Bodenstein von, Von Abthung der Bylder und das Keyn Bedtler unter Christen Seyn Sollen (1522). Bonn: A. Marcus and E. Weber, 1911.

Secondary Sources:

- Aston, Margaret. England's Iconoclasts. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1988.
- Christensen, Carl. Art and the Reformation in Germany. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980.
- Crew, Phyllis Mack. Calvinist Preaching and Iconoclasm in the Netherlands, 1544–1569. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1978.
- Davis, Natalie Zemon. “The Rites of Violence: Religious Riot in Sixteenth Century France.” Past and Present 59 (1973): 51–91.
- Eire, Carlos M.N. War Against the Idols: The Reformation of Worship from Erasmus to Calvin. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Freedberg, David. Iconoclasm and Painting in the Revolt of the Netherlands. New York: Garland, 1988.
- Garside, Charles. Zwingli and the Arts. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1966.
- Michalski, Sergiuz. The Reformation and the Visual Arts. New York/London: Routledge, 1993.
- Philips, John. The Reformation of Images: Destruction of Art in England 1535–1660. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Wandel, Lee Palmer. Voracious Idols, Violent Hands: Iconoclasm in Reformation Zurich, Strasbourg and Basel. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

CARLOS M.N.EIRE

ICONOGRAPHY

Two dominant meanings lay claim to the term “iconography.” Among ART historians, the word designates a method of deciphering the meaning of an image by identifying patterns in the use of subject matter. Like the nomenclature designating many fields of inquiry, iconography refers both to a particular subject and to the method of studying that subject. Thus, just as “philosophy” is the study of ideas or thought as well as the particular set of ideas of one school of philosophical investigation, so iconography can refer both to the procedure for analyzing subject matter as well as the motifs of a particular image. Scholars will, therefore, examine a given image’s iconography by using the iconographical method to determine what the image’s subject matter may signify.

The other widely recognized significance of “iconography” is the ancient practice of painting Byzantine icons, or, more literally, of “icon writing.” Byzantine icons exhibit highly organized patterns or visual formulae that have been passed down over the centuries and carefully observed by icon painters. Accordingly, both senses of iconography apply to the study and creation of icons. This essay, however, focuses on the art historical use of the term because it is of greatest significance in the history of Protestantism. Part I examines the significance of iconography as an element in visual communication and the study of images. Part II considers prevalent examples of iconography in the history of European and American Protestantism.

I. Iconography as Art Historical Method

As a form of communication, images rely on patterns or visual formulae whose meanings are conventional, which means that they draw their meaning in large part from what amounts to a visual lexicon. In many instances, these lexicons actually exist in the form of emblem and pattern books. More commonly, however, iconographical traditions consist of conventional subjects handed down over time. According to one textbook definition,

Iconography is that branch of the study of art, which investigates works of art according to their conceptual contents. It seeks to examine ideas brought to expression in artistic products according to their subject matter, origin, and gradual evolution, and therefore to lead to the accurate comprehension of the language of images. [Künstle 1928:5]

Iconographical analysis proceeds by comparing a given image with its precedents to determine by virtue of consistency and variation what the image means. Meaning, by this procedure, is a function of adherence to or deviation from a tradition of signification. For example, beginning with the REFORMATION, Protestants in Northern Europe found the portrayal of Jesus blessing the children (Mark 10:16) a very appealing subject, and probably invented the iconographical theme (Christensen; Hofmann, 241). During the nineteenth century in the UNITED STATES the motif continued to enjoy wide appeal in popular prints. This appeal was likely attributable to the rise of a THEOLOGY and practice of domestic nurture, according to which mother shaped the formation of the child's soul while the absent pater familias worked outside the home. Mother and Jesus were often likened to one another in the illustrations of Christian instructional books and tracts. In the biblical text and in previous iconography the disciples were frequently shown attempting to free Christ from the attention of the children, only to suffer his rebuke. During the nineteenth century in the United States, however, portrayals of Christ blessing the children sometimes eliminated the disciples altogether, thereby paralleling the absence of the father from domestic scenes of maternal nature. The home was the sovereign sphere of the Christian mother, an ideal visualized in the popular iconography of Christian nurture.

The study of iconography has taken two directions among scholars since the eighteenth century: the classifiers and the contextualists. The first are those who assemble vast catalogues of visual motifs in the attempt to facilitate the identification of images. Such scholarship tends toward a scientific taxonomy, stressing description, rigorous classification, and exhaustive attempts at a comprehensive collection of variations. The knowledge produced by this method is indispensable in determining the significance of an image. However, historians interested in examining the broader relations of images to their historical epochs may prefer to use iconographical knowledge as a basis for further study, which consists of the contextualization of a motif in its historical moment. In addition to a taxonomy of the image, then, these scholars wish to understand the participation of images in the intellectual and imaginative life of an age.

In an enormously influential essay of 1939, art historian Erwin Panofsky distinguished these two analyses of images as different, but interdependent forms of study: iconography and iconology (Panofsky). Whereas iconography compares a motif with its predecessors and carefully describes its variation from as well as its continuity with this tradition, iconology seeks to explain why the differences and continuity occurred when and where they did. If iconography asks where a visual motif came from and what it shares with motifs that came before it, iconology seeks to discern the world of ideas and cultural values manifest in images. Iconology considers the relationship between an image and its cultural and intellectual milieu; iconography attends to the connection between an image and images similar to it in the past and at present. W.J.T. Mitchell succinctly summarized Panofsky's distinction of iconology and iconography as the difference between interpreting “the total symbolic horizon of an image [and] the cataloguing of particular symbolic motifs” (Mitchell, 2). Whereas iconography describes an image by delineating its debt to and difference from a visual tradition, iconology interprets an image by discerning its relationship to a cultural repository of ideas. Influenced by his countryman and one-time colleague at the University of Hamburg, German philosopher Ernst Cassirer, Panofsky maintained that art was a symptom of CULTURE, a visual manifestation of underlying principles or “symbolic forms” that are also expressed in LITERATURE, ARCHITECTURE, philosophy, religion, and SCIENCE. The aim of iconology is to discover and interpret cultural artifacts as symbolic expressions of a culture’s underlying forms (Holly). The assumption is that art bears the same “mental habits,” as Panofsky put it, evident in other cultural expressions. According to Panofsky, the iconologist is one whose final object of explanation is the set of cultural structures that inform an image. Panofsky wished to explain a worldview, what amounted to the mind of a culture as it become apprehensible in individual works of art.

Throughout the twentieth century, iconology focused on the intellectual content and philosophical implications of artistic subject matter. As an art historical practice, therefore, iconology has tended to pursue the interpretation of an image’s conceptual signification, relying on the textual determination of an image’s meaning. Indeed, images were regarded as a kind of “language” that spoke an intellectual content. Thus, iconology regards art as a form of cultural thought, although some scholars found wanting in this approach the social analysis of art, that is, scrutiny of the ideological and other social functions of imagery. At present, scholars interested in the social nature of seeing have foregrounded the social and political operations of art and non-art imagery. This need not displace iconological study, as some studies have clearly demonstrated (Miller), but consideration of the social function of images attends more to visual practice, popular reception, and popular culture than traditional iconology has undertaken, since the primary assumption of iconology is that works of art are manifestations of thought rather than of social order and identity.

II. Protestant Iconography

To understand Protestant iconography and its interpretive potential for the scholar, it is instructive to reflect on certain conditions and features common to many Protestant uses of the image. Although it has sometimes been assumed that Protestantism led to a decline in the visual arts or even a proscription of imagery, the fact is that Protestant artists in Europe, North America, and around the world have made robust use of images, although often not in the same sacred spaces as Roman Catholic or Orthodox traditions (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Even though the use of images in LITURGY and formal WORSHIP, located in the sanctuaries of church interiors, characterized visual piety in the Eastern and Western rites, Protestants have historically used images in the area of the pulpit and ALTAR rather sparingly. More common is the appearance of images in instructional spaces such as modern SUNDAY SCHOOL rooms, parochial school rooms, and in public halls, where the devout gather for meals, meetings, and fellowship, although the most common location for sacred imagery among Protestants is the home.

A second important aspect of Protestant visual piety is teaching. Protestants have widely affirmed the ability of images to help teach and admonish principles of the faith as prescribed by scripture, creed, or sectarian theology. As a result, Protestant iconography has almost always operated with close ties to texts. Even though JOHN CALVIN objected that images were unable to teach anything about the Gospel, in practice Calvinist Protestants have availed themselves of the moral and instructional value of pictures and buildings (Calvin, 90–103; Finney). One thinks of the rich iconography of seventeenth-century Dutch painting and print culture, in which silent exhortations to pure living seek viewers of still life imagery and genre scenes, and where the compelling moral example of Jesus is visualized by Rembrandt in etchings as well as dramatic paintings.

MARTIN LUTHER explicitly endorsed the didactic role of images, even calling in one sermon on wealthy burgers to cover the sides of their houses with paintings of stories from the Hebrew Bible for the sake of public instruction (Luther, 99). Luther happily included woodcut illustrations in his German editions of the BIBLE (as did many translations produced in ENGLAND from HENRY VIII to James I) and both Catholic and Lutheran parties made avid use of visual propaganda to ridicule their opposition in the attempt to influence public opinion for or against the cause of the Reformation (Scribner; Pettegree). In colonial New England, primers and almanacs were illustrated with religious imagery, inculcating a textual as well as a cultural literacy of Protestantism. Primers were the most important educational text in addition to the Bible during the eighteenth century in North America. In the nineteenth century the mass production of print, including illustrated print, exploded in the UNITED STATES and Europe. Among the leaders in the United States of the new print culture were zealous Protestants who believed that a literate populace was the safeguard of republican government as well as of Protestant hegemony. Illustrated school books, children's newspapers, primers, tracts, almanacs, and Protestant classics such as JOHN BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS poured from Protestant presses and were widely circulated at very inexpensive prices (Morgan 1999). This print culture relied on an established range of iconography to serve its distinctly Protestant aims (see PUBLISHING MEDIA).

Linking images to texts may have appealed to Protestants because it helped clarify an image's meaning, ensuring its legibility, narrowing the act of signification from such open-ended processes as suggestion and allusion to a neater, more controlled semiotic operation. Images and words can be used to reinforce one another such that the image delivers a message that is primarily textual, preexisting the image and merely using it as a means of conveyance. Protestants have often accompanied illustrations with inscriptions, quotations, names, captions, or even longer passages of text to harness the image and prescribe its meaning-making. Protestant images often are organized in narrative suites, linked to a Bible passage, or are highly allegorical or emblematic, carefully encoded with an antecedent content that is first, and properly, textual. In fact, Protestantism is so far from being aniconic that it must be said that the highly textual nature of Protestant visual piety conforms quite naturally to the textuality of iconography as a system of visual communication. As many scholarly studies have shown, accordingly, there is no dearth of Protestant visual practice and iconography.

This strong reliance on the text derives from the AUTHORITY of the Bible as the revealed Word of God, which Protestants have traditionally regarded as the unrivaled authority in religious life, available to each believer for close study and devotional reflection. The deity, according to Protestants, chose to reveal itself in words. Words are, therefore, the principal, among some Protestants, even unparalleled avenue for coming to know God and receive God's message of SALVATION. Even though in practice words can be as fractious, as unstable, and as tendentious as images, they lend themselves to a religious practice that stresses the acquisition of discursive knowledge as the basis for redemption. The Protestant must know who God is, what the divine message for humankind is, and how one should respond to it to be saved. Protestant salvation consists fundamentally in knowing the right thing.

The stress laid on the proper contents of knowledge among Protestants shaped a highly dogmatic approach to all aspects of teaching in the early Reformation. This is evident in early Protestant art in GERMANY. Lucas Cranach the Elder, his studio, and his son produced several detailed altar paintings, which amount to elaborate visual compendia of Lutheran DOCTRINE. Often called "Law and Gospel," the central principle of Lutheran theology and homiletics, these pictorial programs compile central events in the scriptures that form a history of salvation from Adam to the resurrection of Jesus. If the didactic scenes were not enough, captions often identify the figures and indicate their theological significance (Schiller; Christensen; Hofmann).

CONVERSION or regeneration was not merely a rational process of acquiring the right information. Protestants have always regarded conversion as involving the entire, embodied human being, often summed up metaphorically as the "heart." The heart was the seat of the will, and therefore important in the Augustinian and Pauline anthropologies of both Luther and Calvin. In the Calvinist or Reformed tradition of Protestantism (see CALVINISM), regeneration was understood to be a protracted process of conviction, contrition, and conversion, a gradual operation in which individuals submit themselves to the work of the Spirit of God. Puritan preacher John Flavel (1627–1691) characterized the entire process of call and redemption as "Christ Knocking at the Door of Sinners' Hearts," the title of a set of his sermons published in 1689. According to Flavel, who based his discussion on Revelation 3:20, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," the soul was "a magnificent structure" with "such stately rooms as thy understanding, will, conscience, and affections" (Flavel, 8). Staunchly affirming the Calvinist notion of human depravity and divine sovereignty, Flavel insisted that the will was unable "by its own power [to] open itself to receive Christ by faith" (Flavel, 55–56). God must convict the conscience, bend the human will to Christ, and remove the many natural barriers barring the soul from GRACE.

In seventeenth-century Germany the image of Christ knocking at the door of the heart was eroticized by a mystical tradition leading toward PIETISM. Lutheran poet and hymn writer Johann Franck (1618–1677) wrote the hymn "Soul, Adorn Thyself with Gladness" in 1649, which urges the soul to prepare itself for the lover who comes calling:

Hasten as a bride to meet Him
 And with loving rev'rence greet Him;
 For with words of life immortal
 Now He knocketh at thy portal.
 Haste to ope the gates before Him,
 Saying, while thou dost adore Him,
 Suffer, Lord, that I receive Thee,
 And I never more will leave Thee.

[Lutheran Hymnal, 305]

Regarded as a lover, the ravisher of the human heart, Christ knocks to court the soul, which is able to open the door. The relationship is not one of enmity and judgment, but longing and intimacy.

The motif acquired different meanings during the nineteenth century, when it was visualized in paintings, drawings, and prints that circulated throughout Europe, Britain, and the United States. In his vastly popular “The Light of the World” (1851–1853), British painter William Holman Hunt (1827–1910) created what eventually became a Protestant icon of Jesus. His picture, although criticized at first for its departure from precedent (Bennett, 31–34) seems to combine the erotic lover of the soul with the Puritan notion of human resistance to the knocking Savior, at least if one compares the image with what Hunt said about it years afterward. His notes read like a laundry list of carefully encoded symbols that evince the Prot estant penchant for fastening images to texts, and recall the Puritan mix of divine goodness and humandepravity adumbrated by John Flavel:

The closed door was the obstinately shut mind, the weeds the cumber of daily neglect, the accumulated hindrances of sloth; the orchard the garden of delectable fruit for the dainty feast of the soul. The music of the still small voice was the summons to the sluggard to awaken and become a zealous labourer under the Divine Master; the bat flitting about only in darkness was a natural symbol of ignorance; the kingly and priestly dress of Christ, the sign of His reign over the body and the soul, to them whom could give their allegiance to Him and acknowledge God’s overrule.
 [quoted in Landow, 34]

The shift toward modern EVANGELICALISM, with its intensely “personal relationship” grounded in an individual calling from Jesus, is evident in the way Hunt turned Christ toward the viewer to create not only a representation of Christ’s summons at the heart of a third party, but a direct appeal to those who look upon Hunt’s picture. Flavel had taught that the “Behold” of Revelation 3:20 signified a “term of notification or public record, wherein Christ takes witnesses of the most gracious offer,” public testament that will be reviewed on the Day of Judgment when each soul stands before God (Flavel, 11). Flavel construed the relationship of the soul to Christ in juridical terms, as part of a larger accounting the soul will have to make one day before the Great Judge. Hunt, by contrast, visualized the “Behold” as the savior’s inviting presentation of himself in the quintessential moment of evangelical “witness,” as if to endorse the modern practice of colportage and door-to-door EVANGELISM used by British and American evangelicals since the early nineteenth century.

The legacy of Flavel was not lost on nineteenth-century EVANGELICALISM. In 1826 the American Tract Society issued the Rev. John Scudder’s hard-edged sermon to youth, “Knocking at the Door,” in which the missionary feared that Christ’s knocking had not yet affected the heart of the “young friend” to whom he directed his remarks. Scudder used the motif of Revelation 3:10 with the full fury of the revivalist preacher, thrusting the reader toward conversion by means of an unmitigated appeal to terror. “Today! he is knocking, perhaps for the last time. If you reject him, I shall not wonder if he abandons you.... I shall not wonder if this day a seal is put in heaven to your everlasting damnation” (Scudder, 16; emphasis in original).

However, this was not the spirit recognized in Hunt’s picture and celebrated by those who admired it. Hunt’s image influenced several hymns, including some compiled by IRA SANKEY in his Sacred Songs and Solos, and the hymn by HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, “Knocking, Knocking, Ever Knocking” (1867; Maas, 78). Inspired by an image of Christ knocking at the door of the soul by German Nazarene painter, Philipp Veit, Hunt’s image, in turn, compelled numerous imitations (Vaughan, 225), perhaps the most widely reproduced of which during the twentieth century was Warner Sallman’s Christ at Heart’s Door, 1942 (Morgan 1996). A member of the pietistic Swedish Evangelical Covenant Church in Chicago, and someone who experienced a revivalist awakening as a teenager, Sallman intended with his picture to foster evangelical conversion at the personal behest of Jesus. His image, however, endorsed an Arminian view of human agency in conversion (see ARMINIANISM). Notes published with the picture pointed out that the door on which Christ knocked bore no handle or knob whereby the savior might open the door. “The door has no latch for it can be opened only from within, and the soul itself is the key” (Series of Interpretations). This had also been DWIGHT L. MOODY’S reading of Revelation 3:20. In the margin of his Bible the popular Chicago-based revivalist wrote: “The latch of the door is on the inside” (Moody 1895, 188). Flavel had identified “free-grace” as the “golden key” to the door of the soul (Flavel, 52), but the Arminian disposition of modern Pietism had come to think differently of the soul’s agency. Responsibility for the act of free acceptance lay with the soul itself, which possessed both the free will to reject the divine offer and the capacity to cast aside the barrier that Flavel had considered impervious to any but the Holy Spirit.

As if responding to a criticism of Hunt’s picture by Moody, who considered the lantern held by Christ in the British picture to be insultingly superfluous in that Christ himself is “the Sun of Righteousness” (Moody 1899, 149), Sallman eliminated the lantern and portrayed an incandescent Jesus projecting a heart-shaped radiance on the door and stone facade of the soul’s benighted dwelling. Once again, Moody might have prompted him in the matter (Sallman enrolled as a young man at the MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE). In a sermon, Moody instructed his listeners: “if you want the love of God in your hearts, all you have to do is open the door and let it shine in. It will shine in as the sun shines in a dark room. Let him have full possession of your hearts” (quoted in Gaustad, 192). The legibility of the motif of Christ at the door of the heart was clearly paramount for both Hunt and Sallman given that Hunt combined (and Sallman preserved) multiple biblical references to anchor the image with semantic redundancy. In addition to Revelation 3:20, Hunt had identified several biblical texts as inspirational for his picture: Romans 13:12, “the night is far gone, the day is near,” accounts for the nocturnal lighting; Psalm 119:105 registers in the lantern: “Your word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path.” And the title of the painting comes from John 8:12, “I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness but will have the light of life” (Parris, 117). The hortatory, evangelical implication is even clearer in the remainder of Romans 13:12: “Let us then lay aside the works of darkness and put on the armor of light.” Among conservative Protestants, hermeneutical ambivalence is no virtue. The most cherished Protestant image is often the most legible one.

Sallman’s devout admirers prized his images for their legibility. He retained the nocturnal setting and emblematic details (thistles and thorny vines blocking entrance to the heart) from Hunt’s conception, but the soft and luminous Jesus faces the soul he would save. Jesus inclines toward the door as if to whisper tender words through the tiny screen in front of him. The very words might be the intimate exchange cherished between the soul and the lover-savior in the 1912 hymn, “In the Garden:”

I come to the garden alone
 While the dew is still on the roses;
 And the voice I hear,
 Falling on my ear
 The Son of God discloses.
 And He walks with me,
 And He talks with me,
 And He tells me I am His own,
 And the joy we share as we tarry there
 None other has ever known. [Miles, 187]

The eros of this private union softens the Calvinist theology of depravity, lending humanity a humble, but real part to play in the regeneration of the soul.

Repugnant as it is to orthodox Calvinists, the Arminian claim for free will brought with it a recognition of the potential of the sanctified life, that is, life after conversion. Whereas the classical Reformed tradition situated the devout in an anguished uncertainty about their eternal welfare, which remained hidden behind the cloak of PREDESTINATION, other Protestant traditions stressed both the importance of personal decision in regeneration as well as the work of the Holy Spirit in the role of SANCTIFICATION in everyday life after conversion. The ongoing presence of God in comfort, encouragement, PRAYER, and guidance found important and widespread visual expression in such images by Sallman as The Lord is My Shepherd (1943), Christ in Gethsemane (1941), and Christ Our Pilot (1950), in the work of other artists who produced such images as Praying Hands (after a drawing by Albrecht Dürer) or Eric Enstrom's much admired Grace of 1918, showing an aged man at prayer over his meal, or in any one of a dozen versions of Guardian Angels or Christ Blessing Children. Mottoes had been a standard part of Christian homes in the nine teenth century, typically familiar Bible verses or gnostic admonitions to live the godly life or preserve domestic bliss. Protestants often speak of these kinds of images and objects as reminding them of their commitments or the moment of their decision to follow Christ. They also regard such iconography as a kind of advertisement to and subtle influence over family members, friends, coworkers, and visitors to their homes.

Until the late nineteenth century in the United States, Protestants eschewed an existential relation with images. Images were forms of information—from the early doctrinal programs of Lutheran altar painting and print illustration to the American nineteenth- and twentieth-century millennialist charts and diagrams inspired by WILLIAM MILLER'S 1843 lithograph illustrating in a visual and numerical logic the second return of Jesus enciphered in the prophetic books of Daniel and Revelation (Numbers and Butler; Morgan 1999). Several changes late in the century, however, led to a shift in Protestant thought about images. Modern reproductive technology such as half-tone engraving and offset lithography made possible the inexpensive distribution of imagery. Clergy and educators realized that pictures could exert an affective influence on viewers and that the fine arts could contribute effectively to religious instruction and the nurture of children.

In a popular visual culture of celebrity and fame, Jesus emerged as teacher, hero, and contested historical figure whose likeness became a visual register of the needs and theological dispositions of diverse groups. His iconography among Protestants borrowed extensively from traditional Catholic fine art. By the end of the nineteenth century, however, Protestant artists and viewers had settled on a very familiar physiognomy that was corroborated (more or less) both by the history of Christian art since the later Middle Ages and by a fascinating literary document in circulation since the fourteenth century. A letter purporting to be written by a contemporary of Jesus, Publius Lentulus, offers a brief description of the face of Christ in terms that Protestants easily recognized: high forehead, shoulder-length hair parted in the center, large eyes, a beard, and a solemn facial expression (Morgan 1999). The features of the face grew so familiar that they served as iconographical motifs in themselves. The image became a visual portrayal of the text that described the face of Christ. Currier & Ives and other popular lithography firms produced versions of the letter and its visual counterpart. In the twentieth century Warner Sallman produced what was very likely the most widely recognized version of the face. By Sallman's lifetime, Protestants were able to see in this face the very likeness of the historical Jesus, responding to it in a way that recalls Catholic response to the Veil of Veronica or the Shroud of Turin (Morgan 1996). Among Protestants who embraced what may be called a "CHRISTOLOGY of friendship," a view of Christ as the believer's intimate and closest companion, Sallman's "portrait" amounted to nothing less than a snapshot, a Protestant icon, of the incarnate Lord.

Sallman's image of Jesus appealed not only to evangelical and mainline American Protestants, but, although for different reasons, to groups as various as American Catholics, MENNONITES, Mormons, and Copts. Moreover, this enormously reproduced picture of Christ, put into global circulation by Protestant missionaries, also appealed to Christians around the world. The broad appeal of the same image suggests the inadequacy of iconography as a method for determining the significance of an image, unless we take the unlikely view that this picture meant the same thing to very different groups. In fact, viewers tend to appropriate the image as well as the artist to themselves. Catholics made Sallman a Catholic artist; Protestants regarded him and his picture as manifestly Lutheran, Methodist, or Baptist, as the case may be. Some viewers saw Sallman's Jesus as gentle and comforting; others as a masculine affirmation of their need for a "manly" savior. Consequently, iconographical investigation must be supplemented by the study of reception because the meaning attributed to an image is not limited to whatever may be encoded in the image's motifs. The cultural "text" that one viewer reads in an image is not the same as the text another sees in the same picture. Inasmuch as this extra interpretation helps to discern the world of ideas and values that inform the image, the study of images pursues the iconological knowledge that Erwin Panofsky envisioned as the higher end to which iconography can make a fundamental contribution.

References and Further Reading

- Bennett, Mary. William Holman Hunt. Exhibition catalogue. Liverpool, UK: Walker Art Gallery, 1969.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Translated by Henry Beveridge. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1962.
- Christensen, Carl C. Art and the Reformation in Germany. Athens: Ohio State University Press, 1979.
- Finney, Paul Corby, ed. Seeing Beyond the Word: Visual Arts and the Calvinist Tradition. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Flavel, John. Christ Knocking at the Door of Sinners' Hearts. Rev. edition. New York: American Tract Society, 188-.
- Hofmann, Werner, ed. Luther und die Folgen für die Kunst. Exhibition catalogue. Munich, Germany: Prestel-Verlag, 1983.
- Holly, Michael Ann. Panofsky and the Foundations of Art History. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Künstle, Karl. Ikongraphie der Christlichen Kunst, vol. 1. Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany: Herder & Co., 1928.
- Landow, George P. William Holman Hunt and Typological Symbolism. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1979.
- Luther, Martin. Against the Heavenly Prophets in the Matter of Images and Sacraments [1525] In Luther's Works, vol. 40. Philadelphia, PA: Muehlenberg Press, 1958.
- Maas, Jeremy. Holman Hunt and The Light of the World. Aldershot, UK: Wildwood House, 1987.
- Miller, David C., ed. American Iconology: New Approaches to Nineteenth-Century Art and Literature. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Mitchell, W.J.T. Iconology: Image, Text, Ideology. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Moody, Dwight L. Fifty Sermons and Evangelistic Talks. Cleveland and New York: F.M.Barton, 1899.

- Morgan, David, ed. Icons of American Protestantism: The Art of Warner Sallman. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996.
- . Protestants and Pictures: Religion, Visual Culture, and the Age of American Mass Production. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
- Numbers, Ronald L., and Jonathan M. Butler, eds. The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Panofsky, Erwin. "Iconography and Iconology: An Introduction to the Study of Renaissance Art." [1939] Revised and reprinted in Meaning in the Visual Arts. Garden City, NY: Doubleday Anchor, 1955.
- Parris, Leslie, ed. The Pre-Raphaelites. Exhibition catalogue. London: Tate Gallery Publications, 1994.
- Schiller, Gertrud. Iconography of Christian Art. Translated by Janet Seligman. 2 vols. Greenwich, CT: New York Graphic Society, 1971–1972.
- Scribner, R.W. For the Sake of Simple Folk: Popular Propaganda for the German Reformation. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1994.
- Scudder, Rev. J., "Knocking at the Door: An Appeal to Youth," No. 31 [1826], in Publications of the American Tract Society, vol. 1. New York: American Tract Society, 1849.
- A Series of Interpretations of the Sallman Religious Masterpieces*. Indianapolis, IN: Kriebel & Bates [ca. 1955].
- Vaughan, William. German Romanticism and English Art. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1979.

DAVID MORGAN

INCULTURATION

Inculturation is a term emerging in (principally) post-Vatican II Catholic theology to denote the process by which local cultures and their values function in the proclamation and reformulation of the Christian message and in its embodiment in life. It presupposes an “incarnational” understanding of the Church in which Christ “takes flesh” in local cultures so that they become as appropriate a vehicle for the manifestation of Christ as was the culture of first-century Jewish Palestine. Inculturation theology was informed by the generally positive value accorded to local cultures in such encyclical documents as Lumen Gentium. It superseded terms such as “adaptation” and “indigenization,” which emphasized the agency of missionaries. Inculturation theology responds to the accusation that Christianity in Africa or Asia is a foreign implant, while recognizing that foreignness has too often been a feature of its church life.

Contemporary Protestant mission theology also struggles with problems of the interaction of gospel and culture, without developing any single interpretive concept or agreed terminology. (“Contextualization” has been a popular term in some quarters, again often with reference to missionary method rather than to the church’s experience.) Some social scientists have suggested “enculturation” as a neutral, nontheological term to indicate a process of exchange between elements of the Christian tradition and elements of local culture. The debates reflect the modern recognition of culture as constituting a coherent realm, not merely the agglomeration of “customs” recognized in earlier times. It also reflects a general acknowledgment that the positions reached by Western Christianity as a result of its own processes of cultural interaction are not necessarily normative for the rest of the world. The term “inculturation” is already used with a range of meaning, and there are signs that it is coming into general use to denote the Christian interaction with local culture or Christian embodiment within it. Accordingly it seems appropriate to use the term, if perhaps anachronistically, in considering approaches to the issues of cultural interaction in Protestant mission history.

Issues of culture have arisen recurrently in the history of Protestant missions, and indeed in all cross-cultural diffusions of the Christian faith. Protestants were not well placed to learn from Catholic missions, either in LATIN AMERICA, where Christianity in European form was imposed by force, or in CHINA, INDIA, JAPAN, or Vietnam, where circumstances required that missionaries find a niche within an alien society, and where some, notably Jesuits, achieved a deep level of identification with local cultures and churches arose that could not be readily dismissed as foreign institutions. Old controversies over soteriology and popular images such as that of Jesuits as dissembling deceivers long diverted Protestants from weighing the experience of Catholic missions and into denouncing them. Early Protestant MISSIONS were influenced by the Pietist movement in Germany, by English PURITANISM in North America, and by the evangelical revival everywhere. All of these were movements of social criticism, developing a radical Christian lifestyle and rejecting many of the regular lifestyles associated with the nominally Christian societies in which these movements originated. On the one hand, this tended to predispose them to still harsher views of non-Christian societies, as being under the dominion of Satan; on the other, it preserved them from blatantly racial exaltation of their own societies. In common with their contemporaries, they also tended to hold a unitary and somewhat static view of civilization, identified with the intellectual, literary, artistic, and technological inheritance of the West since the Roman Empire, suffused with Christian teaching. Many Protestants believed the spread of this civilization to be a necessary precursor of any successful evangelization of the non-Christian world. Evangelicals and Pietists, although agreeing that Christianity and civilization were inseparable, for the most part saw civilization as a fruit of the Gospel rather than its harbinger.

As a rule, early Protestant missionary views of non-Western cultures tended to be severe. There were exceptions; DAVID LIVINGSTONE, for instance, seems to have been accepting from an early stage of African ways of life, finding their analogues among his own recent ancestors in the Scottish Highlands. It is not uncommon, however, to find missionaries whose first reactions were of dismay or even revulsion, coming to very different assessments as their acquaintance with the society and its people deepened. Without in any way diluting their sense of that society's need of Christ, they found not only admirable features within the culture, but sometimes also evidence of pre-Christian divine activity. These discoveries often emerge with deeper knowledge of language and traditions. This came more readily where there were written scriptures to be studied, and so generally sooner in India and China than in nonliterate societies. Protestant thought was undoubtedly partly shaped by theological and other intellectual currents in the West, and missionary activity helped to shape new social sciences such as anthropology. However, far more important in developing thought about cultural issues was the experience of living in other societies, and especially the experience of the development of churches there. A great variety of issues and approaches might be identified; here it must suffice to refer to five particularly influential models.

1. Civilization Models

The widespread views of civilization mentioned above took on special significance for missions in the light of the SLAVERY question. Until the nineteenth century, the Africans best known to Western Christians were those who had been brought to slavery in the Americas. Most of those in Britain, and many of those in America who supported missions, were strongly opposed to slavery. Slavery raised questions about the constitution of the African race. Evangelicals insisted on the unity of all humanity in nature and in grace. The implication followed that Africans, far from being fit only for menial service, must, as recipients of God's salvation, be capable of the highest human attainments, those reflected in "civilization"—that is, Western civilization. Early missions among Africans, both in Africa and the Americas, stressed the growth of (Western) civilization as evidence of the power of the Gospel. The communities where this was most obvious—in the CARIBBEAN, in SIERRA LEONE, and among the Khoi (Hottentots) in SOUTH AFRICA—represented broken or uprooted peoples whose immediate connection with their land, their kin, and their past had been broken, and whose new identity was being formed with Christian and Western materials. The success of such civilization models challenged racist assumptions about African inferiority; Africans were clearly capable of all the attainments of the West, but it concealed the issue of the value of African culture in and of itself. In India the Scottish missionary Alexander Duff (1806–1878) set out to provide an entire Christian worldview that would include the whole encyclopedia of scientific knowledge and displace the Hindu system among India's intellectual leaders. He saw a brief period of success, where a number of young Brahmins, already disaffected with the old ways, responded; this movement declined, however, as other ways appeared of combining traditional ideas with Western scientific knowledge and social reform. Civilization models declined as the importance of the slavery issue declined, and evangelical thinking turned away from social to more directly "spiritual" issues; as acquaintance with African communities and their languages developed; and as confidence in the excellence and sufficiency of Western civilization waned.

2. National Church Models

By the middle of the nineteenth century mission leaders such as RUFUS ANDERSON and Henry Venn were urging the establishment of self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating churches as the object of missionary endeavor, and recognizing that these were likely to deviate in some respects from the patterns of the churches of America and Europe. Indeed Venn invoked the Reformation doctrine of national churches: there could be national churches in India or Yorubaland that reflected the national peculiarities of their countries as the national Protestant churches of England, Scotland, Germany, and Scandinavia reflected theirs. A corollary was that missionaries should not stay as pastors of churches once they were established. In practice the situation was more complex. Some Anglican missionaries, among them bishop JOHN WILLIAM COLENSO in Natal, worked with the idea of the church influencing the whole organism of society, as notionally in England, rather than, like other missions, seeking to call out a church from its society. Traditional institutions, even (in a strictly delimited form) polygamy might be tolerated if not absolutely incompatible with Christian teaching. A number of German missionaries, inspired by the Volkskirche idea, worked for the conversion of the society as an organic whole. Bruno Guttmann, for instance, immersed himself in the community life of the Chagga of Tanzania, seeking not so much individual conversions as consensual response to the Gospel in clans and age-sets. In this way a national leadership of the church and a Christian leadership of the community developed together. The experiment had started in a German colony; by the time Tanzania was advancing toward independence, there were complaints that this comprehensive but essentially conservative approach to traditional culture had left the community disadvantaged in such matters as secondary schools that other missions retained, often as a remnant of the civilization model. Christian Keysser and Georg Vicedom developed parallel approaches in Papua New Guinea. The French Protestant Maurice Leenhardt (1878–1954) found the structure of a national church already in place in New Caledonia and removed imported features to give it space to develop.

3. Fulfillment and Restorationist Models

These developed in India and China and other areas where ancient civilizations with developed literary traditions were still visible. Missions often took the view that these were now irrelevant to the great mass of the people who were largely unaffected by them; however, there were important elements in Protestant missions that saw them as vital determinants of Christian work. The Scot William Miller (1838–1923) realized that Duff’s dream of the displacement of Hinduism was impossible. What Christian education should now attempt was to awaken dormant tendencies already in Hinduism, so that the Christian message, so readily shrugged off as foreign, could be heard by Hindu intellectuals. K.M.Banerjea (see INDIAN THEOLOGY), converted through Duff, found an “Aryan witness” to Christ in the Vedas, the ancient Hindu scriptures that Duff had scorned. J.N.Farquhar (1861–1929), faced with the rising national movement and growing resentment at British rule, threw himself into the study of the religious literature of India, making it readily available, producing comprehensive guides to it that are still in use, and arguing that Christ is the fulfillment of its highest aspirations. In China JAMES LEGGE (1815–1897) devoted his life to the study and translation of the Chinese classics and argued that the ancient religion of China was monotheistic, a sort of primal revelation. Such approaches looked to Indian and Chinese appropriations of Christianity that would affirm the best glories of the past and move to a Christian future that would retain continuity with that past.

4. Modernizing Models

These models have been most noticeable in Japan and China. In Japan Protestant missionaries were welcomed for a time as agents of the Western education and technology that were needed for national advance. Groups of young Western-educated young men, often samurai, converted at Sapporo and elsewhere, leading to an expectation, not justified by the event, that Japan would turn to the religion as well as the technology of the West. In fact some Japanese Christians, such as Uchimura Kanzo (1861–1930), set up a critique of the West and its lack of spiritual sensitivity, and propounded a Japanese version of Christianity. In China Timothy Richard (1845–1919), beginning as an evangelistic missionary, found himself deeply involved in famine relief, and from there moved to consider the structural causes of famine in China. These were all removable by the application of modern methods, and use of those methods would derive from a true doctrine of God and creation. Much of his later career was concerned with propagating these ideas through literature and other means, with a view to a converted and regenerated China, although always with deep respect for Chinese culture, history, and societal structures, and with an increasingly sharp critique of Western imperialism and militarism. Other missionaries linked Christian mission in China to modernization, especially in the period after the fall of the empire when Western values seemed to be attractive to rulers of China. Later developments led to the rejection of missions as part of a foreign imperialist enterprise, and thereafter to a major expansion of Christianity through Chinese agency.

5. Hospitality Models

The Norwegian Lutheran missionary K.L.Reichelt (1877–1952) realized that ordinary mission methods in China made no impression on Buddhist monks, although many of these were clearly sincere seekers after truth and often burdened by a sense of sin. He developed a meeting point, later formalized as a brotherhood, where Christians and Buddhists might pray and study the scriptures in an environment that was not threatening but welcoming. Although he remained at heart a pietistic Lutheran, he was accused by some of syncretism and by others of Romanism. His Tao Fong Shan Centre (eventually located, through the exigencies of war, in Hong Kong) is one of many examples of mission endeavors aimed at providing hospitality to people of faith in terms of a local culture.

These and other models adopted by Protestant missions indicate that issues of inculturation were arising, although variously described and very differently addressed, throughout the days of the Protestant missionary movement. The great international missionary conferences, from the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910 to the International Missionary Council meeting at Tambaram in 1938, concentrated on issues raised by other faiths, rather than the cultures shaped by those faiths, which continued to shape the corporate minds of the churches for whose emergence missions had been the catalyst. Culture came to the center of discussion after World War II, following closer consideration of the nature of the church and in the wake of decolonization, the emergence of new nations, and a revival of confidence in the cultures of Africa and Asia.

The inculturation process was by then well established in many newer Protestant churches, and it has been the process in these churches, rather than particular policies of missions, that has determined the present situation. There have been reconstitutive models for the appropriations of Christianity, as in the cases of Sierra Leone and the Caribbean already considered. The sense of Christian identity here, and the adoption of Western cultural models, was always clear; what was less clear was that African elements were also incorporated into the reconstituted identity to all. There were interactive models of appropriation in many parts of Africa, where the central institutions of a community were gradually brought into a mutually accepting relationship with Christian teaching, sometimes with reserved areas of autonomy where the power of ancestral consciousness was particularly strong. There have also been reinterpetive models, seen perhaps most clearly in many AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES, but not only there, where aspects and institutions of African life are reinterpreted and given new significance in the light of the Bible. The huge presence of the charismatic movement in Africa has given impetus to this process by the relationships it is forging between African worldviews and Biblical teaching. In none of these models of appropriation does it make sense to distinguish between “Christian” and “African” elements—they are fully integrated.

Meanwhile, new Asian theologies of culture are appearing. It is noticeable that, although missionary models of cultural interaction in India concentrated on the Brahminical Hindu tradition, the fact that the great majority of Indian Christians are Dalits, with their history of oppression, or Tribals with a non-Indic identity, is producing quite new interpretations of the relationship between past tradition and Christian identity (see Indian Theology and TRIBAL MOVEMENTS, INDIA). Ultimately most inculturation questions are about a satisfactory definition of the relations between local or national and Christian identity.

See also: Missionary Organizations; Pietism

References and Further Reading

- Bediako, Kwame. Theology and Identity: The Impact of Culture upon Christian Thought. Oxford: Regnum, 1992.
- . Christianity in Africa: The Renewal of a Non-Western Religion. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1995.
- Bevans, Stephen B. Models of Contextual Theology. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1992, 2002.
- Walls, Andrew F. The Cross-Cultural Movement in Christian History. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2002.

ANDREW F.WALLS

INDEPENDENT FUNDAMENTALIST CHURCHES

This organization is one of the oldest and largest fundamentalist associations in the UNITED STATES that emerged out of the interdenominational BIBLE conferences of the early twentieth century as a protest against the liberalism and MODERNISM in the larger Protestant denominations. Its formal beginnings can be traced to the formation of the American Conference of Undenominational Churches in 1923. This group joined a number of Congregational churches in 1930 to form the Independent Fundamentalist Churches of America (IFCA). While maintaining a strong stance on ecclesial separatism from denominations and religious apostasy, and critical of the neo-evangelical NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS, the IFCA left the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC) in 1952 because the latter was too extreme in its separatism. The IFCA could not abide by the strict ACCC position on separation from other conservatives, including the more moderate National Association of Evangelicals, who did hold to a strict separatist position.

The association renamed itself IFCA International in 1996 in recognition of its global mission and diverse constituency, and to place less emphasis on FUNDAMENTALISM and its exclusionary position out of concern that “independent” and “fundamental” might be misunderstood. Churches, lay people, and ministers can become members of the association, which has its headquarters in Grandville, Michigan.

Consistent with the fundamentalist movement’s insistence on unwavering doctrinal fundamentals and purity, the IFCA International demands adherence to verbal plenary inerrancy of the Bible, total depravity of humans, the virgin birth and full deity of Christ, the sacrificial ATONEMENT, the CHURCH as the local and independent gathering of believers apart from denominational systems, and premillennial dispensational EsCHATOLOGY. The organization affirms the two ordinances of the LORD’S SUPPER and Believer’s BAPTISM and is strictly congregational in governance, informal in WORSHIP, and advocates expository PREACHING and the literal interpretation of the Bible.

See also Biblical Inerrancy; Congregationalism; Denomination; Dispensationalism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

Melton, J.Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. New York: Triumph Books, 1991.

Van Plew, Wright. "A Time to Stand Firm: A Brief History of the IFCA International."

<http://www.ifca.org/voice/00May-Jun/vanplew.htm> (5 May 2003).

TIMOTHY E.FULOP

INDIA

Before European Colonial Presence in India (until 1498)

The general assumption that the history of Christianity in India is as old as Christianity itself refers to its early beginnings in South India. Among the St. Thomas (or) Syrian Christians in South India, there is strong oral tradition that emphasizes the ministry of the Apostle Thomas, one of the twelve apostles of Jesus Christ (Matthew 10:3, Mark 3:18; John 11:16, 15:5, 20:25, 29), in South India. Accordingly, following the ancient trade route between South India and the Middle East, St. Thomas is believed to have reached Kudungalur (i.e., Cranganore) on the southwest Coast of the modern Kerala State. After an eventful ministry that succeeded in establishing a few local churches with Indian converts, he is said to have moved to Mylapore, currently a suburb of the city of Chennai (Madras). The same tradition points out that Indian religious leaders, who did not like the ministry of St. Thomas, killed him. Early European travelers (e.g., Pantanus in the second century, Marco Polo in 1288), Church Fathers (e.g., Ambrose, fourth century), and the apocryphal book entitled Acts of Thomas (early third century) make several allusions either to the tomb (supposedly) of St. Thomas on St. Thomas Mount in Chennai or to the Christian population in southern India. Historically convincing contemporaneous evidences of the life and ministry of St. Thomas the Apostle, however, are yet to be found.

Other traditions link the beginning of Christianity in India either with the Apostle Bartholomew (Matthew 10:3; Mark 3:8; Luke 6:14) in the region of Thana, near the city of Mumbai (earlier, Bombay), or to immigrations of Syriac-speaking Christians from Persia. According to the Jacobite Mar Thoma IV (1721) there were two migrations of Christians from Persia to Kerala: in 345 a certain Thomas of Cana led about four hundred families; in 823–825 Mar Sabriso brought another group of immigrants; both groups were welcome and were socially integrated into the prevailing culture. In the course of time they attained high social rank and political power. They owned large pieces of land, traded spices with business people from many parts of the world, and led a simple, but dignified life. From the fourth century onward, the Christians in India accepted the ecclesiastical authority of the Persian Church and used the Syriac liturgy. They were oriental Christians in India, belonging to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the patriarch of Antioch. Because of this Persian connection, they had Syriac liturgy, theology, and church administration, until the sixteenth century. Their metropolitan, the chief ecclesiastical head, appointed a Persian bishop to take care of the spiritual affairs of the Indian church and an Indian archdeacon to look after the civil life of the Christians. In consultation with the archdeacon, the bishop would ordain Katanars, the local pastors.

All the religious and political tensions, splits, and theologies of the patriarchate in Antioch influenced the Indian church directly or indirectly. The Indian Christians got integrated into the prevailing cultural and social context in India; by faith they were Christian, although by ecclesiastical affiliation they were Syrian. They made use of a flagstaff and a wooden gong. They went on processions, undertook pilgrimages, and observed days of fasting and feasting. They administered Qurbana (i.e., Eucharist) in two elements. Their priests were married. Despite their achievements, this community was inward looking. Lack of pastoral care and dependency on non-Indian bishops were bound to weaken this community.

During European Colonial Presence in India (1498–1947)

The Portuguese naval officer, Vasco da Gama (1469–1524) reached Calicut in 1498 and forced the Indian ruler of Calicut (1502) to sign a trade treaty. This event marked the beginning of a long presence of several European powers in India. With regard to church relations Vasco da Gama's arrival in India had far-reaching consequences: in 1494, Pope Alexander entrusted Portugal with the ecclesiastical jurisdiction over all countries in the Eastern hemisphere. Vasco da Gama's contemporary, Cabral, brought Franciscan missionaries to the city of Cochin in 1500. Franciscan missionaries strengthened their centers and began to expand their influence. In 1514 Pope Leo confirmed the Padroado missionaries the right to select, appoint, and maintain bishops and to build churches. After Goa, the Portuguese capital city in India, was established in 1510 and raised to an archdiocese covering all territories between India and China. By 1534, more European missionaries arrived in India: Dominicans (1503), Jesuits (1542), and Augustinians (1572). When the Portuguese met the St. Thomas Christians and discovered their involvement in the spice trade, they entered into a trade agreement with them. However, they soon found that the faith expressions and practices of St. Thomas Christians differed greatly from the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, especially after the anti-Protestant Council of Trent (1545–1563). In their efforts to counter Protestants in Europe and to gain new adherents in non-European countries, the Portuguese political authorities and the Padroado missionaries desired to establish the faith and practice of the Roman Catholic Church over that of the St. Thomas Christians in India. With the help of the Jesuit Francis Roz, Dom Alexis de Menezis, the archbishop of Goa, called for a synod at Diamper (i.e., Udayamperur, June 20–27, 1599). While he arranged for subjugating the St. Thomas Christians to Roman Catholicism, he opposed the unhealthy (Brahminical) practice of untouchability and the discrimination against women among the Christians. However, the St. Thomas Christians did not tolerate the imposition of the Latin rite; they wanted to have their Syrian tradition and liturgy in Syriac. On January 3, 1653, most of them gathered at a church in the place of Mattancherry. They touched a rope tied to the cross of the church and vowed (i.e., Coonon Cross Oath) not to continue their relationship with the Roman Catholic Church any longer. This historical event marked the beginning of the major ecclesiastical split in India—those who rejected the Latin rite were known as the New Party, which later became the Jacobite Church. A small number of Christians, known as the Old Party, continued to be Roman Catholics. The representatives of the New Party not only ordained their archdeacon Thomas as Mar Thoma I, but also approached the Syrian Orthodox patriarchate of Antioch for help. Consequently St. Gregorius Abdul’Galeel, the Syrian metropolitan of Jerusalem, came to Kerala in 1665 and revived the Syriac tradition. During the seventeenth century Christians in Kerala had to encounter rival church leaders, traditions, and further splits.

During the years 1542–1773 (until the Suppression) the Jesuit missionaries toiled not only on the coastal regions, but also in the main cities of South India. Some Jesuits from the College of St. Paul’s in Goa accepted the invitation of the Mughal Emperor Akbar (1556–1605), the proponent of Din-i-Ilahi, and went to his court (1580–1583) to demonstrate the Christian message in word and deed. Although this type of mission work among the aristocrats lasted almost two centuries, it did not result in many conversions, although it influenced the Mughal art, literature, and history. The Jesuit mission to the common people had more success. The Italian Jesuit Roberto de Nobili (1577–1656), founder of the Madurai Mission, may perhaps be the greatest missionary of this time. From his arrival in the cultural city of Madurai in 1606 he learned the dominant South Indian languages (Tamil, Telugu, and Sanskrit), became well acquainted with the major literature of these languages, and studied the cultural specialties of the South Indians. In his attempt to study the worldviews and behavior patterns of the South Indians he tried to separate religion from social custom. He created many phrases to communicate the Christian message, and he managed to lead people of different caste groups to worship in one church building and to receive the sacraments from his own hand. He removed the derogatory name of Christians as Paranghis (i.e., a synonym for drinking wine, eating beef, and leading a morally loose life). His own contemporary, the Portuguese Jesuit John de Brito (1647–1693), preached the Christian message in and around the city of Madurai and adjacent kingdoms. The works of the Jesuit missionaries and two Dutch East India Company chaplains (Philip Baldaeus and Abraham Roger) in the seventeenth century need to be mentioned. They preached the Christian message and took the thought patterns of Indians seriously. Roman Catholic missionaries belonging to the Propaganda Fide (established in 1622) complicated the missionary work of the Protestant missionaries in India.

In the meantime the traders of East India Companies from ENGLAND (1600–1874), NETHERLANDS (1602–1798), DENMARK (1616–1845), and FRANCE (1664–1769) began to make inroads on the Portuguese sea power. Although in England there was a close link between state and church, the British colonial authorities in India were careful not to allow any Protestant missionary work in their territories in India. Because of the peculiar domestic and national situation, Frederick IV, king of Denmark (1699–1730), established a cross-cultural mission to Tranquebar, a small Danish colony (1619–1845) on the east coast of South India. At the recommendation of his counselors, in 1705, he sent two German Pietists, B. Ziegenbalg (1682–1719) and H. Pluetschau (1677–1746) to Tranquebar. Ziegenbalg learned the Tamil language, studied Tamil literature, and translated the New Testament and a few other works of German Pietists into Tamil, organized a church based on several South Indian social principles, educated less-privileged people to attain economic self-sufficiency, and prepared Indian Christians to shoulder responsibilities for their own church. Among his successors the linguist Benjamin Schultze (1689–1760), the Bible translator Johann Philip Fabricius (1711–1791), and the missionarydiplomat Christian Frederick Schwartz (1726–1798) were some leading figures whose multifaceted contributions to Indian society are remembered gratefully.

In 1758 John Zecharias Kiernander (d. 1799) reached Calcutta and pioneered Protestant mission work. He established schools and founded the Old Church. The Baptist missionary WILLIAM CAREY (1761–1834), who reached Calcutta in 1793, had to first work in an indigo factory for seven years before he was allowed to settle down in Serampore, a Danish colony (1755–1845) near Calcutta. His contributions to Protestant Christianity in India and Indian society are fondly remembered. Because of the change of the British public mind toward Christian missions, the works of C.F.Schwartz, Carey, and Charles Grant, an influential director of the English East India Company, a “pious clause” was inserted in 1813; in the following year the first Anglican bishopric was established in Calcutta. Few chaplains (e.g., Claudius Buchanan, 1766–1815) and residents of the East India Company (Sir Thomas Munro, 1761–1827) and bishops (e.g., Reginold Heber, 1783–1826) showed much interest in missionary work in India. After the reports of Buchanan and Munro on St. Thomas Christians, the CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY sent its missionaries to Kerala in 1815 to start a “Mission of Help.” Their efforts to translate the Syriac Bible and liturgy into Malayalam, the local vernacular language, had farreaching consequences and led to the separation of a reform group (1836) under the leadership of Abraham Malpan from other Syrian Christians. After the charter of the East India Company was revised in 1833 explicit provisions were made to allow Christian mission agencies from Europe, North America, and other countries to work in India (see MISSIONS; MISSION ORGANIZATIONS). Lutheran, Baptist, Anglican, Congregationalists, Methodists, and other denominations established their branches in India. In some places, mostly because of the efforts of Indian Christians, a large number of people came into the Christian church.

This sudden increase demanded new mission approaches. Despite some rivalries (e.g., regarding geographical territories of mission work and the types of missionary works), there were many meetings between different mission agencies (e.g., in Madras in 1900 with preceding conferences in the cities of Allahabad, Bombay, etc.). These meetings emphasized the need for united mission enterprise. V.S.Azariah (1874–1945) played an important role in establishing the Indian Missionary Society (1903) and the National Missionary Society (1905). His address at the Edinburgh Missionary conference of 1910 (see WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE) pointed out the need for Western missionaries to consider non-Western Christian leaders as their friends and partners. Two years later Azariah was ordained as the first Indian bishop. HENDRIK KRAEMER’S book, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, created much controversy at the International Missionary Conference held at Tambaram in 1938. Indian Christian leaders, both clergy and laity, reacted severely to Kraemer’s view that the faith of the non-Christian people did not possess (salvific) truth. The members of the Rethinking Group (A.J.Appasamy [1891–1975], V.Chakkarai [1880–1958], and P.Chenciah [1886–1956]) tried to express in Indian categories their understanding of Christian faith. In the context of rising Indian nationalism, Western and non-Western Church leaders in India realized the need for a united Christian witness. The National Christian Council of India was established in 1914 to represent all non-Roman Catholic churches in India. In 1927 all the Lutheran Churches in India established the Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches. Anglican, Congregational, and Presbyterian churches found ways of uniting; representatives of these traditions inaugurated the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA (CSI) in September 1947 in Madras. The merger of these various traditions is considered to be “the second great miracle after Pentecost.”

After European Colonial Presence in India (1947–)

In 1947 India attained political freedom from British imperialism. Indian Christian leaders felt the need for authentic Indian expression of Christian faith, theology, education, pastoral training, and church architecture. The Ashram Movement gained popularity: in 1930 the Sat Tal Christian Ashram was founded in the place of Nainital by Stanley E. Jones. Soon other Christian ashrams (Christkula Ashram in Tiruppattur, Saccidananda Ashram in Santivanam) were established in parts of India. Ashrams became a place for Christians and non-Christians to transform personal and social life, “agree to disagree,” but to unite for love, service, and often East-West dialogue. Independent India offered an opportunity for renewed Christian social activity. P.D. Devanandan (1901–1962) and M.M. Thomas (1916–1996) showed how the Christian message could help in building the nation, especially in the context of poverty and religious pluralism. After the publication of the Niyogi Committee Report on Christian Missionary Activities (1956) and the passage of the Freedom of Religion bills by the governments of Madhya Pradesh, Orissa, and Arunachal Pradesh (1968–1971), it became increasingly clear that the Indian “secular democracy” would not welcome non-Indian missionaries. Hence, Indian Christian leaders began their own missionary movements.

Today the Friends Missionary Prayer Band (FMPB) and Indian Evangelical Mission are two large indigenous mission agencies sending Indian missionaries from south and northeastern India to other parts of India. It is known that through the holistic work of FMPB, the Maltos, a people group in the State of Bihar and once on the verge of extinction, have now experienced a great transformation. In 1970 the Church of North India (CNI) was founded as a united and uniting church to witness to the words and deeds of Jesus Christ. Currently the CSI and CNI are trying to establish one church in India. Many decades of theological and secular education made available to the marginalized groups of Indian Christians have begun to yield results: at present the Dalits (“those who are broken”) claim their rightful share in formulating Indian Christian theology, administering church properties, and undertaking church leadership. Although the caste is addressed as a social and religious evil, effective functional alternatives have yet to be found. The Indian church has also slowly realized the need for the participation of women in the religious and secular life of Christians. However, the Indian church is involved in works for justice, social peace, and preservation of creation. The social, educational, vocational, medical relief, and other humanitarian services rendered by Christians in India have not resulted in large numbers of conversions to Christianity, but function as “salt and light” by providing all interested people an alternative lifestyle. Some Indian Christian leaders have made significant contributions to the worldwide Church, its ecumenical partnership, and discussions on pluralism and dialogue. Indian Christian immigrant workers in the UNITED STATES, AUSTRALIA, and Western Europe significantly influence the life of churches in the West. The long history and experience of the church in India provides much opportunity for mutual learning and enrichment.

See also Indian Theology

References and Further Reading

- Downs, Frederick S. History of Christianity in India: Northeast India in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, vol. 5, pt. 5. Bangalore, India: CHAI, 1992.
- Grafe, Hugald. History of Christianity in India: Tamilnadu in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, vol. 4, pt. 2. Bangalore, India: CHAI, 1990.
- Hamby, E.R. History of Christianity in India: Eighteenth Century, vol. 3. Bangalore, India: CHAI, 1997.
- Indian Church History Review. Bulletin of the Church History Association of India. Bangalore, India: 1967-.
- Kuriakose, M.K., compiler. History of Christianity in India: Source Materials. Delhi, India: ISPCK, 1982.
- Mundadan, Mathias. History of Christianity in India: From the Beginning up to the Middle of the Sixteenth Century (up to 1542), vol. 1. Bangalore, India: CHAI, 1984.
- Neill, Stephen. A History of Christianity in India: the Beginnings to AD 1707. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- . A History of Christianity in India, 1707–1858. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Thekkedath, Joseph. History of Christianity in India: From the Middle of the Sixteenth to the End of the Seventeenth Century (1542–1700), vol. 2. Bangalore, India: CHAI, 1982.

P.DANIEL JEYARAJ

INDIAN THEOLOGY

Protestantism first arrived in INDIA when the Tranquebar mission began work in 1706 among Tamil-speaking people. The considerable literature that survives from the church that resulted from this work is only now beginning to be catalogued and studied.

In the early nineteenth century the Baptist missionaries in Serampore, Bengal provided a spark that lit the fire of Indian Protestant theology. The first flames came from Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833), although he never became a Christian. Roy came from a Bengali Brahmin family. Study of Persian and Arabic led him to a deep appreciation for Islam and monotheism, and a desire to purge all religions of idolatry and superstition. He devoted his life to the abolition of sati, or widow immolation, and other social reforms. Roy's reformation of Hinduism was as much indebted to rationalists and Unitarians in the West as to Muslims and Trinitarian Christians in India (see UNITARIANUNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION). He settled in Calcutta in 1815, publishing Vedantic Hindu texts and agitating for social and religious reform. His view of Hinduism was that the original scriptures, the Vedas, had been corrupted by later writings, specifically the Puranas.

In 1820 Roy published a collection of extracts from the four gospels, especially Jesus' sermons and parables, The Precepts of Jesus the Guide to Peace and Happiness. This quickly led to a literary debate with the Baptist Joshua Marshman, who objected to a piecemeal approach to the New Testament. For Roy, Jesus was a great teacher and "messenger" of God who imparted teachings that were "more conducive to moral principles and more adapted for the use of rational beings" than any other. Claims about Christ's divinity were later additions by the church, as was the idea of Christ's DEATH as atoning sacrifice. The DoCTRINE of the Trinity was not only unnecessary to SALVATION, it was irrational and a reversion to the polytheistic trends in religion that Roy was fighting. The simple plan of salvation was to follow the precepts of Jesus. In 1828 Roy established a religious association of reformed Hinduism. However, Roy also expressed a vision of Christ and of Christianity that made sense within the Hindu world, while at the same time radically challenging that world. His legacy is not merely that of an outsider to the CHURCH; a number of Bengali Christians came to FAITH in Christ through their study of Roy's Precepts of Jesus.

Ram Mohan Roy died in ENGLAND in 1833. In terms of Indian Protestant THEOLOGY his most interesting successor was Keshub Chander Sen (1838–1884) who joined the Brahmo Samaj at the age of nineteen. Although Roy had been highly rationalistic and regarded mystical spirituality with suspicion, Sen was a man of spiritual fervor and passion, open to bhakti, loving, ecstatic devotion to a particular god. Roy had rejected the idea of divine incarnation, believing that it compromised monotheism; Sen embraced the ideas of incarnation and avatar (temporary manifestation of the divine in human form). Sen was never baptized, but from his early years in the Brahmo Samaj, was an enthusiast for the life of Christ, and Christ increasingly became the center of his life and the focus of his thinking.

Sen, departing from the rationalistic unitarianism of Roy, also embraced the concept of God as Trinity. The trinity was conceived as Sat, Cit, Ananda, or Truth/ Being, Wisdom, and Bliss, a classical Hindu description of Brahman (God) corresponding in Sen's thought to Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In a series of lectures, notably Jesus Christ: Europe and Asia (1866) and India Asks, Who is Christ? (1879), Sen developed his idea of Christ. Christ, who said "I and my Father are one," was divine humanity through kenosis: he was a human being who emptied himself, who utterly abandoned his self, so that Divinity filled the void. This union of Christ with the Father was not an ontological but a mystical one, and Jesus sought to extend to others that spiritual oneness with the Father: "As thou, Father, art in me, that they may also be one in us." The self-sacrifice on the cross is also exemplary for all humanity. Christ calls all to be filled with Christ. Later in life Sen moved closer to Christian ORTHODOXY in his understanding of Jesus, seeing his death as an atoning medium that brings God and humanity together, and using the language of sacrifice and substitution to describe Jesus' death.

Sen, although utterly devoted to Jesus Christ, was never attracted to the Christian church in India, which he believed was too Westernized. He led the Brahmo Samaj to establish the "Church of the New Dispensation," a new Christ-centered eclectic religion. Jesus corrected and fulfilled Hinduism, and indeed fulfilled the best in each faith. Christ was hidden in the Hindu religion, and was present in all that is good in every philosophy.

Ram Mohan Roy and Keshub Chander Sen were developing understandings of Jesus and the Christian God within the Indian religious context. A critique came from certain Indian Christian thinkers. The works of Krishna Mohan Banerjea (1813–1885), Lal Behari Day (1824–1829), and Nehemiah Goreh (1825–1895) form the core of this Protestant theological response, and the work of Goreh can be taken as illustrative. He was born Nilakantha Shastri Goreh into a Brahmin family from Maharashtra, but grew up in Benares. A missionary introduced him to the BIBLE. Goreh's grappling with the Bible eventually led to his conversion and BAPTISM in the Anglican Church in 1848, at which time he took the name Nehemiah. He had already gained a reputation as a Sanskrit scholar and exponent of traditional Hinduism. He continued in deep study of scriptures and religion, with periods of doubt and conflict. He was ordained into the Anglican priesthood in 1870.

In 1860 Goreh published A Rational Refutation of the Hindu Philosophical Systems, an apologetic work in dialogue with Hindu scholars. Goreh undertakes to prove that Hinduism is not coherent within itself. At the same time he puts forward Christian beliefs and doctrines as a rationally acceptable alternative. For example, the theory of creation underlying the advaita theological tradition in Hinduism ultimately denies the reality of creation, while at the same time it posits that creation is one with Brahman, who is real. In place of this self-contradictory doctrine of Creator and creation Goreh turns to the Christian doctrine of a Creator God who makes creation ex nihilo. Goreh goes on to argue the irrationality of Hindu views on SIN, the human condition, and salvation, and the congruence of the Christian views of these matters. Goreh, who lived simply in Indian style, refusing even clerical dress, came to the conclusion that orthodox Hindus were prepared by their religion and philosophy to receive the gospel as no other people save the Jews had been. The Hindu belief in avatar was a preparation for the incarnation. Christ is a fulfillment of the longings of Hinduism.

A few Protestant missionaries seriously engaged Hindu thought in theological terms. The Scot, John Nicol Farquhar (1861–1929) arrived in India in 1891 to teach in Calcutta. After a decade he was able to devote himself to personal EVANGELISM and scholarly research and writing, his works including a theology of religion entitled The Crown of Hinduism (1913). Here Farquhar worked out a fulfillment theory of religions, first suggested by Keshub Chander Sen. Farquhar built his work on evolutionary assumptions, arguing that all social institutions can be placed on an ascending scale of value and effectiveness. The crown of all religions on this evolutionary scale is Jesus Christ. In him, Farquhar argued, all people can find the answers to all their religious questions, including human and social questions, which are given unsatisfactory or no answers in non-Christian religions. Farquhar's fulfillment theory fell out of favor after a couple of decades, but was picked up by Indian Roman Catholic theologians after the Second Vatican Council (1961–1965).

One of Farquhar's most prominent critics was another Scottish missionary, Alfred George Hogg (1875–1954), teacher and then principal of Madras Christian College from 1902 to 1939. Hogg argued that Christ fulfills, not Hinduism but the need of which India had begun to be conscious. Christ may bring a Hindu to realizations of new needs, which Christ manifestly fulfills. Hogg proposed that rather than being unfulfilled or incomplete, Hinduism presented to the people of India a well-integrated and complete system of belief. Christ made people aware that there were possibilities and potentials beyond their present system of belief, and Christ alone was the hope for fulfilling these. In Karma and Redemption (1909), Hogg argues that the doctrine of karma fits wonderfully into a system in which there is no other purpose in life than expiation. There is no possibility of true morality in the doctrine of karma because every good and every evil act must inexorably be worked out in the life of the soul; karma operates within a judicial system but without a judge. Mercy and even love are therefore not possible in this system; everything that happens to a person is a result of previous deeds. Christ and Christianity, on the other hand, propose a moral universe, governed by a moral God, where forgiveness, mercy, and love are not only possible, but demanded. Christ offers to the Hindu a new point of reference. Hogg was the outstanding missionary theologian in India during the first half of the twentieth century, who in his efforts to relate Christianity to Hinduism left behind a generation of students and admirers, both Hindu and Christian.

The missionary who had built up Madras Christian College, where Hogg served, was another Scot, William Miller (1838–1923). His influence underlay the work of a trio of outstanding South Indian Protestant theologians of the early twentieth century. Vengal Chakkarai (1880–1958), a lawyer, evangelist, and ardent nationalist, converted to Christianity in his twenties, and in 1927 published Jesus the Avatar. For Chakkarai, Jesus, who through kenosis became the Christ, is still today the avatar. However, unlike Hindu avatars, the incarnation of Jesus is not temporary and static but permanent and dynamic. Moreover, the Spirit is identified with the risen, living Christ at work in the world today. Chakkarai also insisted that knowledge of God begins with a personal experience of Christ, and he formulated a doctrine of the “Christhood of God.” Because an experience of Christ was crucial for a true knowledge of God, the immanence of Christ (and God) was important in Chakkarai’s thought.

Chakkarai’s brother-in-law, Pandipeddi Chenchiah (1886–1959), another lawyer and the chief judge of Pudukkottai State, converted as a small boy from Hinduism along with his father, but retained his Hindu cultural heritage. He wanted Indian Christianity to shed its foreignness and focus on “the raw fact of Christ,” who is the “True Man,” the “New Man.” Becoming one with Christ makes believers “new creatures” and the beginning of the “new creation.” Chenchiah stressed the need to experience Christ, but a Christ who was permanently human, not an incarnation of God that has returned to God—in fact, not an avatar as Chakkarai argued. Christ as the New Man is the bridge between humanity and divinity, something absolutely novel. Believers are to become “Christ” themselves, as Sen had said. Chenchiah thus emphasized the resurrection and Pentecost: the Christian life is a “yoga [way of achieving union with God] of the Spirit,” the Holy Spirit being mahasakti (new cosmic energy), which abides on earth. Chenchiah argued that the Hindu sastras (scriptures) held an equivalent place in preparing India for the Gospel to that of the Old Testament for the early Christians.

Bishop Aiyadurai Jesudasan Appasamy (1891–1975) was brought up in a Christian home. As a bishop his attitude toward the church as institution was more positive than that of many Indian theologians, who saw it as inherently Western. Appasamy was immersed in the bhakti tradition, which seeks union with a personal God through intense personal devotion. In 1928 he published Christianity as Bhakti Marga, and in 1931 What is Moksa? These works expound John’s gospel in conjunction with Hindu Tamil bhakti poets.

Appasamy envisioned the Christian life as one of intense devotion to Christ, with the goal of moksa (salvation—in Hindu theology, salvation from the cycle of karma and samsara) and union with God, not absorption into the divine but loving personal union with Christ who said, “Abide in me.” The union of the believer with Christ models the union of Christ with God, which Appasamy interpreted as one where the Son perfectly conforms to the Father’s will. He argued (against the Chalcedonian formula as well as against Hindu advaita philosophy) that the union between Father, Son, and believer is not metaphysical but moral. Christian bhakti—which includes an ethical dimension of love toward neighbor—is the way to Christian moksa. A life devoted to the deep love of God, conforming to the will of Jesus, leads to eternal life. Appasamy conceived of the Logos as present or immanent in the world, both in creation and in humanity; the Logos is antaryamin (indweller). Jesus is Logos and also avatar; he is avatar not as theophany (as in the classical Hindu understanding) but as incarnation. Jesus breaks the bondage of the fear of karma for those who believe in him. In developing his Christcentered and God-centered theology of bhakti, Appasamy interpreted Christian dogma in the light of John’s gospel and the philosophy of Ramanuja.

The year 1947 was pivotal for India: the country gained its independence from the British Empire. Paul David Devanandan (1901–1962) saw that Christianity in postindependence India had to deal with a new factor, the secular state. Devanandan was born in Madras, the son of an ordained minister. Returning to India after study at Yale, he taught at United Theological College in Bangalore before becoming director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society. Devanandan's pioneering work consisted in showing his Hindu friends how they could reform Hinduism from within to adapt to the new context produced by the secular state, and how some of their religious and philosophical struggles could be resolved only by Christ. For Devanandan, Christian theology was a product of dialogue with Hindus, and its evangelistic purpose was to change Hindu thinking about religion as it had been traditionally understood.

Devanandan sought to redefine some Hindu understandings according to Christian thinking. One was the understanding of the personality of God. In the most profound Hindu teachings, God is devoid of personality—Brahman is ultimately nirguna or without qualities. Yet Christianity believes in a personal God, and Devanandan proposed that the ancient Hindu concept of purusa (person) be used to rethink how God, for the Hindu, may be both personal and yet Ultimate Truth. Hindu understanding about creation might also be transformed. In classical advaita thought, creation is one with the Creator. Devanandan, in dialogue with Hindus and borrowing from Chenchiah, stressed that the Creator is not only differentiated from creation, but God is purposively moving to new creation because humanity's sin has marred the old creation. Talk of a new creation would help Hindus to participate in the difficult but exciting task of building a new India as a secular state. Other areas where Devanandan sought transformation through dialogue with Hindus were history, maya, and human community. He sought to redefine not only the Hindu worldview but also the terms in which Christian doctrine is expressed.

P.D.Devanandan's successor as director of the Christian Institute was Madathiparampil Mammen (M. M.) Thomas (1916–1996). M.M.Thomas, like so many Indian Protestant theologians, was a layman. He continued and developed Devanandan's emphasis on dialogue, which he believed should take place on three levels: how each religion can contribute to the general welfare of society and humanity; dialogue that grapples with the central theological issues of each faith; and dialogue between persons about their personal faith commitments. Thomas's interest was in the first type of dialogue. In The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance (1969) Thomas shows how the Christian faith, since the time of Ram Mohan Roy, has introduced new elements in India that have resulted in fundamental changes in the core of Hindu society and thought. This insight of Thomas's signals his interest in a theology that, like that of Devanandan, would inspire people to positive action in the building up of the new India.

Thomas admires Hindu reformers such as Ram Mohan Roy and Mahatma Gandhi, but finds their refusal to embrace Christian beliefs a hindrance to providing the proper answers to modern India's most pressing problems. The church, he argued, needs to participate in secular history for the purpose of increasing human dignity and developing human personality. These goals are not devoid of theological content because the secret of true humanism is found in the divine humanity of Jesus Christ: "the Gospel of Jesus Christ and his New Creation," as Thomas says, echoing Chenchiah. Thomas called for Christians to engage in nation building without in any way abandoning their distinctive Christian witness.

The work of interreligious dialogue was brought to a more global stage by Stanley Samartha (1920–2001) of Karnataka. Samartha was a pastor and educator before becoming the first director (1970–1981) of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES Subunit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies. His theological contributions were related to the task of interreligious dialogue.

In the mid-1980s nothing less than a theological revolution began in Indian Protestant theology when Dalit Theology pushed aside two centuries of Christian thought expressed by means of the philosophy and religion of classical brahminical Hinduism. The term dalit, meaning “oppressed” or “crushed,” refers to the large numbers of Indians known as “outcaste” or “untouchable” or “harijan.” Because the majority of Indian Protestants come from dalit groups, Dalit Theology is first of all theological reflection based on the experience of most Indian Christians, and because dalits have been, and continue to be, oppressed by members of Hindu castes who draw on classical brahminical Hinduism for their self-understanding and their understanding of the socioreligious order, Dalit Theology is a challenge to the legitimacy of doing theology in terms of brahminical religion and philosophy. Dalit Theology has looked mostly to LIBERATION THEOLOGY to provide the hermeneutical lenses through which to undertake a theology of the oppressed in India. Thus the immediate future direction of Indian Protestant theology is far from settled. It is certainly not outside the realm of possibility that Dalit Theology and traditional Indian Christian theology will engage in fruitful future dialogue. Indeed it is difficult to see how Protestant theology in India can neglect either the experience of the majority of its church members or the religious and cultural milieu in which it finds itself, because the two are inextricably linked in India and the Indian church.

See also Conversion; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Mass Movements (India); Missions; Tribal Movements (India)

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Gerald H. Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions. New York: Macmillan, 1998.
- , et al. Mission Legacies. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1994.
- Boyd, Robin H.S. An Introduction to Indian Christian Theology. Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1975.
- Jeyaraj, P.Daniel. “The Influence of the Protestant Reformation on India.” Princeton Seminary Bulletin XXIII no. 3 (2002): 267–291.
- Lossky, Nicholas, et al. Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, 2d edition. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC, 2002.
- Sunquist, Scott W. ,and Dale Irvin. A Dictionary of Asian Christianity. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 2001.
- Thangaraj, M.Thomas. The Crucified Guru: An Experiment in Cross-Cultural Christology. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1994.
- Thomas, M.M. The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance. London: SCM, 1969.
- Webster, John C.B. A History of the Dalit Christians in India. San Francisco: Mellen Research University Press, 1992.

ARUN W.JONES

INDIVIDUALISM

The first religious individuals are the renunciants bred by rejection of the world at the core of every salvation religion, according to MAX WEBER (1946). Renouncing the world represented within the framework of cosmological dualism crystallizes an other-worldly true self in constitutive relationship to God or cosmological equivalents of divinity in nonbiblical traditions such as the Buddhist Dharma. This enables the individual to transcend social membership embodied in kinship and political and economic institutions to live in but not of the world by congregating in distinctly religious communities of worship such as the Jewish synagogue, Christian church, and Buddhist sangha.

The ethos of the Christian Gospel calls for sanctifying the self for God through renouncing everything that disturbs communion with God and exercising everything that binds the self with God's will, as ERNST TROELTSCH (1960:999) summarizes it. It also demands a neighborly love that overcomes in God all the conflict and subordination of human law and social order, while it unites souls in a deep spirit of mutual understanding and self-sacrificing love made in the image of God and proclaimed by Jesus in the message of the KINGDOM OF GOD to come. This is an ideal that requires a new world order to be fully realized. It cannot be realized within this world without compromise, thought Troeltsch, so the history of the Christian ethos and its institutionalization becomes the constantly renewed search for this compromise, and fresh opposition to it.

Ecclesiastical Protestantism collapses the corporatist Catholic hierarchy of an ascent from NATURE to GRACE into the Lutheran ethic of the calling in the world of everyday work and householding God gives each individual. It gives rise to the activist sharpening of Christian calling in the this-worldly ASCETICISM of a Calvinist "Protestant Ethic" to order the holy community rationally and restore it within the life of the world. Ascetic Protestantism draws Christian sects away from radical opposition to the world in their efforts to live out the ideal of the Sermon on the Mount, and it resists the ANTINOMIANISM of modern mysticism in its celebration of individuals as free spirits in a purely inward communion with God and one another.

A peculiarly Protestant individualism stems from this soteriological shift away from a hierarchical structuring of both this world and the next. It revises cosmological dualism by bringing the two worlds into more direct confrontation through making SALVATION more immediate and open to all persons, less mediated by SACRAMENTS, special ascetic and devotional practices, and priestly or monastic roles. Protestant reformers reemphasize the radical separation between divine and human. Yet they proclaim the world as the theater of God's glory and will, in which selves justified by FAITH instead of specifically salvific acts serve God in every walk of life. Conceiving the capacity of faith as a gift already received from God unifies human identity within individuals in relation to God and encourages their autonomous action in the world to do God's will. It also makes it necessary, notes Robert Bellah (1970:37), to "accept the ambiguity of human ethical life and the fact that salvation comes in spite of sin, not in its absolute absence." More autonomous selves more engaged in the world to work out their salvation nonetheless rely on strict doctrinal ORTHODOXY, ethical rigorism, and tightly binding though voluntaristic religious groups to sustain their identity as faithful Protestants. By replacing clergy-laity distinctions between two levels of religious perfection with the division between elect and reprobates, Calvinist Anglo-Protestantism in particular helps fuel the historic movement from hereditary kingship and feudal aristocracy to more democratic forms of self-revising, self-governing political order. These are based on more contractual and voluntary modes of association among persons seen as individuals in their roles as both citizens and church members within a PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. Because it so centrally shaped the moral character and convictions of Americans as democratic citizens, Alexis de Tocqueville concluded that religion should be considered as "the first of their political institutions." He also defined the danger of an individualism cut loose from its religious moorings, with all persons free to find their beliefs within themselves and to turn their feelings in on themselves. Once democracy breaks the hierarchical chain of reciprocal duties and virtues forged by traditionally fixed social stations and frees each link as an equal, then "Each man is forever thrown back on himself alone, and there is danger that he may be shut up in the solitude of his own heart" (1966:292, 506–508).

At its best, modern religious individualism draws from Protestant THEOLOGY since FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER an emphasis on the need for all doctrinal beliefs to receive personal reinterpretation, and all religious liberties to lead to both deeper self-understanding and greater social responsibility for the shared fate of humankind. The search for personal meaning and social relevance at the heart of the modern quest for salvation after HEAVEN, especially among the more educated, has led spiritual seekers to explore forms of ritual practice, artistic expression, therapeutic care, and social action well beyond the boundaries of traditional religious institutions. More open and flexible patterns of membership have in turn made for more permeable boundaries and fluid types of organization in most of the major Protestant denominations, and spurred conflicts within them over orthodox belief and faithful discipleship as well as church growth and decline across generations.

Recent works of moral and social inquiry in America probe the dangers of a this-worldly individualism severed from constitutive relationship to God and self-centered in utilitarian or expressive cultural terms. From this standpoint comes radical reconstrual of JAMES MADISON'S deist remonstrance (see DEISM), for example, that the sovereignty of individual conscience and conviction requires free exercise of religion precisely to honor its divine Creator and the lawful order of nature and nature's God because "It is the duty of every man to render to the Creator such homage and such only as he believes to be acceptable to him" (1971:299). Freedom of conscience to worship God and follow reason comes to be contested and recast as freedom of choice to pursue one's own interests and express one's own feelings.

Modern forms of utilitarian and expressive individualism, respectively attuned to the institutional arrangement of economic and bureaucratic life today and to lifestyle leisure, have long coexisted with religious and civic ideals of the dignity, indeed the sacredness, of the individual, defined by moral duties, virtues, and practical relationships within the traditions of biblical religion and classical republicanism in American CULTURE. The question posed by Habits of the Heart (1985:143, 243) and related cultural critics is whether an individualism centered on the self as a nexus of interests and feelings, and counted as a client-citizen of the welfare state, can actually sustain a public or a private life coherently. If not, they ask, can civic and religious forms of individualism be critically reworked through communities of shared moral practice and argument? Can we rebalance the moral ecology of private life and public institutions by renewing genuine individuality in relation to a larger social whole and cultural conversation? This challenge invites the Protestant denominations to pursue their own ongoing reformation in ways that balance the religious individualism inherited from Christian sects as ingathered elects composed of come-outers, and illuminated by the inward communion of modern mystics and spiritual seekers, with the social realism of the church as the Pauline Body of Christ, the fundamental sacrament that precedes and nurtures every faithful individual in redemptive relationship to God.

See also Calvinism; Denomination; Lutheranism; Sectarianism; Secularization

References and Further Reading

- Bellah, Robert N. "Religious Evolution." In Beyond Belief. New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
- , Richard Madsen, William M. Sullivan, Ann Swidler, and Steven M. Tipton. Habits of the Heart. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.
- Dumont, Louis. "A Modified View of Our Origins: The Christian Beginnings of Modern Individualism." Religion 12 (1982): 1–27.
- Madison, James. "Memorial and Remonstrance." [1785] In The Papers of James Madison. Edited by William T. Hutchinson and William M. E. Rachal, vol. 7, 298–304. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971.
- Tocqueville, Alexis de. Democracy in America. [1835]. Translated by George Lawrence. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Troeltsch, Ernst, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches. [1911]. Translated by Olive Wyon. New York: Harper & Row, 1960.
- Weber, Max. "Religious Rejections of the World and Their Directions." [1915]. In From Max Weber, edited by Hans H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills. New York: Oxford University Press, 1946.
- Z. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. [1904–1905]. Translated by Talcott Parsons. New York: Scribners, 1958.

STEVEN M. TIPTON

INDONESIA

History and Politics

Indonesia consists of five main islands and a number of island groups, totaling 800,000 square miles, in southeast Asia. The population of approximately 220 million is unevenly distributed between Western Indonesia, which includes Sumatra, Java, and Bali (85 percent), and the rest of the country. There are about 300 ethnic groups, with about 250 different languages. The Malay language, originally spoken by the coastal people of East Sumatra and Malaya who embraced Islam in an early stage and subsequently lingua franca in the whole Archipelago, has been adopted and developed as the official language of Indonesia. There are five religions recognized by the State: Islam, Protestant and Catholic Christianity, Hinduism, and Buddhism, constituting 87 percent, 7 percent, 3 percent, 2 percent, and less than 1 percent, respectively, of the population. Especially in Java, mystical groups (kebatinan) rooted in traditional Javanese CULTURE, are influential.

Hinduism and Buddhism came from INDIA in the first centuries B.C. and flourished in a number of kingdoms on Java and Sumatra, producing monuments such as Borobudur and Prambanan. Contacts with CHINA were much more transitory. Islam entered Indonesia about 1300 A.D. from the north and spread to most islands in a gradual process continuing until today. Only Bali and Southeast Indonesia including Irian, and the interior of Sumatra, Kalimantan, and Sulawesi remained outside the sphere of Islam.

While this process was under way, Europeans, opening a direct route to the famous Spice Islands, found their way to Indonesia. In 1511 came the Catholic Portuguese. The Protestant Dutch arrived in 1596 and pushed their Portuguese rivals out of the Archipel. In the next three centuries the whole of Indonesia gradually came under Dutch rule, not without fierce resistance in many regions. In 1942 the country was occupied by the Japanese. After the capitulation of JAPAN independence was proclaimed (August 17, 1945).

The Republic of Indonesia is founded on the Pancasila, the Five Principles, which include the belief in God, humanity, national unity, consultative democracy, and social justice. So the Republic claims to be neither a Muslim state nor a secular state. Western INDIVIDUALISM was rejected as well as Marxism. However, the Pancasila state was threatened from two sides. Communists tried to conquer the state, first through an armed insurgency, then through political mass organizations. After a coup in 1965 the Army took over and eliminated COMMUNISM both politically and physically, establishing the military dictatorship of General Soeharto (1967–1998), which claimed to be founded on the Pancasila. On the other side, extreme Muslims attempted to establish a Muslim state in West Java and South Sulawesi, and the Muslim political parties tried to strengthen the influence of Islam in a legal way. In the 1955 elections these parties got 45 percent of the vote. In the first free elections after the downfall of Soeharto (1999), after two decades of intensive Islamization, their share of the vote was still the same.

Until the 1980s, Christians occupied important posts in the successive cabinets, in the bureaucracy and in the armed forces. The Muslims, however, were making up for their disadvantage in the fields of education, economics, and politics, the effects making themselves felt in the 1990s.

Protestant Christianity

Possibly from the seventh century onward, Christian merchants from Persia and India came to Indonesia, but they left only very faint traces. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century, the Portuguese and Spanish brought Roman Catholicism to the Eastern part of the Indonesian archipelago. This effort was hampered by the subordination of the mission to trade interests. After the Dutch took over, Catholic populations were Protestantized. Only in East Timor and Flores could the Portuguese maintain themselves and their religion.

The Dutch East India Company (VOC, 1602–1799) forbade Roman Catholicism in its territories. Missionary activities were restricted to regions where they served its interests, that is, mainly to Eastern Indonesia. Even there, they were concentrated mainly in areas that were vital to the VOC, like Ambon and the surrounding islands. Even though Java was the Company's power base, there was never a mission among the Muslim Javanese and Sundanese inhabiting the island. The church could do little to improve this situation because it depended completely on the Company for the transport and salaries of its personnel. This dependency also prevented it from becoming an indigenous church. The New Testament was available in Malay in 1668, the complete BIBLE only in 1733. The Church was led by Dutch ministers. Indonesians could only serve as unordained teacher-preachers without AUTHORITY to administer the SACRAMENTS. Church life had to conform entirely to patterns prevailing in the NETHERLANDS. In some centers Indonesians could be appointed members of the church council. At the end of the eighteenth century there were 55,000 Protestant Christians and a smaller number of Roman Catholics.

In 1799 the Dutch State took over all assets of the bankrupt VOC. Freedom of religion was proclaimed. As a consequence Catholic priests could again enter the country (1808). The existing Protestant congregations were organized into the Protestant Church in the Netherlands Indies. This church had no mission work of its own because it was financed by the state, which professed to be neutral in religious matters. However, the way was now open to missionaries from the newly formed Protestant missionary bodies (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). Between 1811 and 1850, a number of British and American Missionaries worked in Java, Sumatra, and West Kalimantan. In the same decades the Dutch Protestant MISSIONS reached out to the neglected Christians in the outer regions, such as North Sulawesi in the Sangir archipelago, which had never been served by resident ministers or Protestant missionaries. At the same time, by the efforts of a number of lay people, Europeans and Eurasians, the Christian faith first put roots among the Javanese.

In the meantime, as a result of theological conflicts, in Holland a number of new missionary bodies came into being. These started work in New Guinea (Irian, 1855), North Sumatra (1857), the North Moluccas (Halmahera, 1866), Central Sulawesi (1892), and South Sulawesi (1852/1913/1930). Southern Central Java and Sumba became the mission field of the Calvinist Gereformeerde Kerken. In 1836 the German Rheinische Mission (RMG) started mission work among the Dayak in South Borneo, and in 1861 the first RMG missionaries arrived in North Sumatra. After World War I the BASEL MISSION took over work in Kalimantan from the RMG. These missions stressed the use of tribal languages instead of Malay, and (especially after 1890) endeavored to conserve indigenous culture and social structures, to the point of incorporating them into the incipient church. In the twentieth century several Anglo-Saxon missions entered the Netherlands Indies: SALVATION ARMY (1894), SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS (1900), CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE (1930). The Pentecostal movement was brought in from Europe and America about 1920 and first took root among Eurasians (see PENTECOSTALISM). Usually these missions refused to cooperate with the existing missions and churches, and founded churches of their own. In the same period the Protestant Church started missionary work in the South Moluccas and Timor. For these Anglo-Saxon mission bodies and for the Protestant Church, Malay was the vehicle of their mission work; they were not interested in conserving indigenous language and culture.

Among the Protestant pioneers and church founders were Joseph Kam (Ambon 1815–1833), the landowner C.L.Coolen (East Java 1827–1873), L.I. Nommensen (North Sumatra 1862–1918), A.C.Kruyt (Central Sulawesi 1892–1932), and R.A.Jaffray (South Sulawesi 1930–1945).

In colonial times missionary work was accompanied by the conviction that Western civilization and Western models of Christianity, and even Western humans, were superior. As a consequence, the congregations were kept under close supervision and church independence was postponed until a long nurturing process would have resulted in sufficient Christian maturity. Throughout the nineteenth century no Indonesians were ordained minister or priest except by the RMG in North Sumatra (first 1885). In the Protestant missions, and even more so in the Protestant Church, a functional hierarchy existed in which invariably Europeans held the top positions. Almost without exception Indonesian mission personnel worked as local teacher-preachers, with only a basic education. They served as the (essential) link between the “white” church government and the indigenous church members.

This is not to say that Indonesians did just receive the Gospel in a passive way. Those who became Christians did so by their own will, consciously, and for their own reasons, which mostly were not those expected and often assumed by the missionaries. Moreover in all mission fields Indonesians played a decisive role in bringing their fellow-countrymen to the faith. Especially in the first stage of church founding, these native preachers often had no formal tie with the mission. In North Sumatra there were the Batak chief Pontas Lumbantobing (ca. 1830–1900) and Solomon Pakianathan (1881–1961, Methodist); in Java, Paulus Tosari (1813–1882), Tunggul Wulung (ca. 1803–1885), and Sadrach (1840–1924).

In the twentieth century things gradually changed. Between 1878 and 1886 theological seminaries had been founded in North Sumatra, Java, North Sulawesi, and Ambon. In 1934 a theological academy was established in Jakarta. A number of Indonesians were ordained and some of these worked on an equal footing with Europeans. A number of churches in North Sumatra, Java, North Sulawesi, and the Moluccas became independent. The Dutch HENDRICK KRAEMER (1922–1936 in Indonesia) was instrumental in bringing about this development. However, European influence remained very strong even in the independent churches, the general idea being that character, moral soundness, and organizational abilities of the Indonesian Christians still had to be brought up to European levels. In the meantime the number of Christians grew steadily; in 1941 there were about 1.7 million Protestants and 600,000 Catholics in a population of 60 million.

In 1942 Indonesia was occupied by Japan. In the confusion of the transition period there were bouts of persecution by fanatical Muslims in some areas. By the Japanese, Christianity was tolerated and to a certain point protected, even if among the Dutch-oriented Ambonese scores of congregation leaders were killed. However, the Japanese tried consistently to make the churches into channels for their war propaganda and confiscated almost all mission schools and hospitals. The churches were forced to join regional councils of churches (Kiristokyo Rengokai), which included mainline Protestants, Catholics, and other Protestant groups. Japanese CLERGY were sent to Indonesia and, within the narrow margins allowed them, succeeded in providing protection and practical assistance to the churches.

Because nearly all foreign missionaries were interned, the war proved that Indonesian Christianity was able to govern itself. Moreover the declaration of national independence in 1945 caused a quick progress in church independence. Most Protestant churches that had not been independent before the war became so between 1946 and 1949. After the war of independence theological education grew quantitatively and qualitatively. Christian universities sprang up in Pematangsiantar, Jakarta, Salatiga, and elsewhere. During the next decades leading Indonesian theologians were J.L. Ch. Abineno, P.D. Latuihamallo, and S.A. E. Nababan. The laymen T.S. G. Mulia and T.B. Simatupang were instrumental in founding and leading the Indonesian Council of Churches. In politics J. Leimena and A.M. Tambunan can be mentioned. The status of the missionaries changed from that of guardians to fraternal workers. The school system founded by the missions before 1942 could in part be maintained; the Protestant daily Sinar Harapan became one of the leading newspapers in the country; the Badan Penerbit Kristen was the leading Protestant publishing house.

After World War II the growth of the church accelerated, especially in tribal societies, but, in the aftermath of the 1965 coup d'état, also in Muslim Java. In 1952 the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION sent to Indonesia a number of its missionaries expelled from China (1952). At the same time an evangelical movement emerged (see EVANGELICALISM), stimulated from GERMANY and America. Leading figures were Petrus Octavianus and Chris Marantika. In Batu(Malang, East Java) the Indonesian Missionary Fellowship (IMF) founded the influential Indonesian Bible Institute (1959). The movement spread among the traditional churches, where it often was a divisive element. As a result it gave birth to a number of new churches and Christian organizations.

The percentage of Christians (including Roman Catholics) is highest in thinly populated Eastern Indonesia, especially in the provinces of Irian (85 percent), NTT (75 percent), and North Sulawesi (55 percent). Between 25 and 50 percent is Christian in the Moluccas, North Sumatra, and West Kalimantan; 10 to 25 percent in Central Sulawesi, Central and East Kalimantan, and in the capital city of Jakarta; 5 to 10 percent in the Autonomous Region of Yogyakarta (Central Java) and South Sulawesi; 3 to 5 percent in Central and East Java and Southeast Sulawesi; 1 to 3 percent in Sumatra outside North Sumatra and South Kalimantan; under 1 percent in West Java, Bali, and West Nusatenggara. Of the total of Christians more than 25 percent are living in Java (mostly ethnic Javanese), more than 20 percent in North Sumatra (mostly Batak), less than 10 percent in Kalimantan (mostly Dayak), more than 10 percent in Sulawesi (mostly Minahasans and Torajans), and 30 percent in the rest of Eastern Indonesia.

Present Situation

Originally Christianity was planted by the Dutch Reformed Church. The RMG, which had a mixed Reformed-Lutheran background, brought a Lutheran strain to North Sumatra; the Dutch MENNONITES founded churches in Central Java and the Methodists in Sumatra (see METHODISM). In 1950, churches of these denominations founded the Council of Churches in Indonesia [Dewan (since 1984: Persekutuan) Gereja-Gereja di Indonesia, DGI/PGI]; in 2003 the PGI includes 80 affiliated churches totaling about 13.5 million members, of whom more than 3.5 million are in the BATAK PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN CHURCH, the largest Protestant Church in Southeast Asia.

The Indonesian BAPTISTS (about 150,000 baptized members) are in part affiliated with the Indonesian Baptist Alliance (Gabungan Gereja Baptis Indonesia, GGBI). Most churches issuing from Christian and Missionary Alliance (C&MA) mission work have united in the Gereja Kemah Injil Indonesia, whose six member churches total about 500,000 members, more than half of which are in Irian Jaya. In 1979 the Indonesian Pentecostal Council (Dewan Pentakosta Indonesia, DPI) was founded. Tentatively the combined membership of the DPI member churches can be put at 1.5–2 million, of whom relatively many are of Chinese descent. Adventists (numbering about 200,000) and a number of independent bodies do not belong to any national church council. It should be noted that the lines between the denominations are not rigid. Among the PGI members now are churches of Baptist, C&MA, and pentecostal stock. The Indonesian Evangelical Fellowship (Persekutuan Injili Indonesia, PII), founded in 1971 by churches and organizations sprung from the evangelical movement, also counts many C&MA and pentecostal churches among its members. In 2003 according to a conservative estimate, the total membership of the Protestant churches in Indonesia is 16 million (Catholics 6 million). The extreme fragmentation of Indonesian Protestantism (about 500 church bodies) must be attributed, apart from the vastness of the country and its ethnic variety, to the multitude of Western denominations that have felt compelled to enter the country and proclaim their variety of the Gospel.

After 1970 a theological reorientation in DGI/PGI circles and the increasing influence of American evangelicalism caused a growing antithesis between “evangelicals” and “ecumenicals,” which makes itself felt in evangelization, literature work, theological education, even if the Indonesian cultural and religious context does not seem to warrant such an American-style antithesis. Relations between Protestants and Catholics, which were strained until the 1960s, have improved. Generally the churches more or less follow Western liturgical, confessional, and theological patterns. In contrast with AFRICA, there are hardly any churches or groups consciously incorporating pre-Christian religious elements into Christian WORSHIP and practice. Also, there are hardly any theologians using Indonesian religious concepts in formulating an Indonesian Christian THEOLOGY. However, on a personal level a magical-mythical vision of reality may strongly influence the way church members perceive and express the faith.

After 1945 Christians earned their legitimate place as members of the nation by participating in the war of independence against the Dutch (1945–1949). Nevertheless their relation to the state is still determined by their minority position. The churches, of whatever denomination, tend to conform to the government policy of the moment. The Council of Churches in Indonesia even made Soekarno’s “revolution” a theological issue in the early 1960s and did the same with Soeharto’s “development” in the 1970s. In 1984–1985 all churches (in fact all religious organizations) had to insert a formula recognizing the Pancasila as sole foundation for the life of the nation into their church order or statutes. For daily matters the churches communicate with the government through the Ministry of Religion (Departemen Agama), which has departments for each of the five recognized religions; the minister is always a Muslim.

After the downfall of the Soeharto regime in 1998 the churches were no longer used as they regained their freedom of movement, but then the relation to Islam, always uneasy, became an acute problem. Islam has long considered Christianity the “religion of the Dutch,” and Muslim fears that the process of Westernization would bring Christianization in its trail were fueled by the numbers of Muslim youth in Christian schools converting to Christianity in the 1970s and early 1980s. Christians suspect Muslims of striving for an Islamic state and do not appreciate that they have to take a step back now that Muslims are making good their advantage in education, economics, and politics. In a minority situation Christians have problems in getting permission for church building; where they are a majority, the Muslim presence may be felt to be gratuitous. With the exception of converted Muslim theologians, very few Christians have a good knowledge of Islam and dialogue has hardly been practiced (Th. Sumartana). In its closing years the Soeharto regime tried to woo the Muslim majority: pupils in the state schools were no longer allowed to follow religious education according to the religious affiliation of their parents, and mixed marriages were rendered practically impossible; in this way important channels for Christianization were cut off. From 1996 onward Muslim extremist groups were left a free hand in attacking churches if it suited the regime. In 1999 open war broke out between Christians and Muslims in the Moluccas and in Central Sulawesi; here and in the cities of Java hundreds of church buildings as well as several mosques were destroyed. However, Indonesian Islam is not a homogeneous solid mass. Traditional Islam, organized in the Nahdatul-Ulama (NU) under the leadership of Abdur-rahman Wahid (president of the Republic 1999–2002) accepts the Pancasila State and favors religious tolerance, whereas reformist Islam advocates Islamization of the state. Mixed groups like Dian/Interfidei, Institute for Interreligious Dialogue, are trying to build mutual understanding.

See also Asia; Asian Theology; Batak Protestant Christian Church; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism; Education

References and Further Reading

- Aritonang, Jan S. Mission Schools in Batakland (Indonesia) 1861–1940. Leiden/New York/Cologne: Brill, 1994.
- Boland, B.J. The Struggle of Islam in Modern Indonesia. The Hague, The Netherlands: Nijhoff, 1971.
- Boxer, C.R. The Dutch Seaborne Empire 1600–1800. London: Hutchinson, 1977.
- Cooley, Frank L. The Growing Seed. The Christian Church in Indonesia. Jakarta, Indonesia: BPK Gunung Mulia, 1981.
- End, Th. van den. Ragi Carita. Sejarah Gereja-Gereja di Indonesia (A History of the Churches in Indonesia). 2 vols. Jakarta, Indonesia: Badan Penerbit Kristen, I, ⁷1999, II, ³2000.
- . “Indonesia.” In The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations, edited by Jean-Jacques Bauswein and Lukas Vischer, 220–270. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1999.
- Hoekema, H.A. Denken in dynamisch evenwicht. De wordings-geschiedenis van de nationale protestantse theologie in Indonesië (ca. 1860–1960) [The Genesis of a National Protestant Theology in Indonesia (ca. 1860–1960)]. Ph.D. Dissertation, Leiden University, 1994 (bibliography).
- Latuihamallo, P.D. “State, Religion and Ideologies in Indonesia.” In Religion, State and Ideologies in East Asia, edited by M.M. Thomas and M. Abel. Madras, India: Christian Literature Society, 1975.
- Makoto, Hara. “Christianity in Indonesia under Japanese Military Rule.” Japanese Religions 22 no. 2 (1997): 97–106.
- Sumartana, Th. Mission at the Crossroads. Indigenous Churches, European Missionaries, Islamic Association and Socio-Religious Change in Java 1812–1936. Jakarta, Indonesia: BPK, 1993.
- Wawer, Wendelin. Muslimen und Christen in der Republik Indonesia. Wiesbaden, Germany: Steiner-Verlag, 1974.

TH. VAN DEN END

INDUSTRIALIZATION

The Industrial Revolution began in ENGLAND around 1780 with the mechanization of cotton spinning in Lancashire. From there, mechanization spread to other parts of the British textile industry, then to other British industries, then to other parts of the world—with immense economic, social, political, and religious consequences. In the 1830s Belgium and some regions of France WERE experiencing their own Industrial Revolution. GERMANY and the UNITED STATES followed soon after, and by the late nineteenth century southern and eastern Europe and Scandinavia were also industrializing. Since World War II there has been major industrial growth in Asia and LATIN AMERICA, whereas in Europe and North America the period since the 1970s has seen the decline of manufacturing and a large rise of employment in service-related enterprises.

The patterns of change in nineteenth-century Britain have been repeated in numerous countries since. There was a big shift of population from the countryside to cities and industrial regions, leading eventually to rural depopulation, and a sharp drop in the numbers working on the land. Landed wealth declined, whereas industrial and commercial wealth brought political as well as economic power. Cities like Manchester, Birmingham, and Glasgow grew rapidly under the leadership of a new aristocracy of factory owners and merchants. These cities were socially segregated, and in the crowded and often unhealthy factory districts there was a concentrated working-class population, with its own organizations, including trade unions and political parties. Industrialization also tended to mean increasing religious pluralism. In the nineteenth century Catholic and Jewish immigrants flooded into Protestant cities like London, New York, or Berlin. Since World War II Muslims, Hindus, and Sikhs, as well as Christians of many unfamiliar kinds, responded to the demand for cheap labor, or sometimes the business opportunities, in industrialized Europe and North America. Classical sociology claimed that this great mixing of populations bred a sophisticated relativism. If this has happened, it has been a very long term process. At least in the short run, the mixing of populations of different backgrounds has more often strengthened ethnic and religious identities (see ETHNICITY). In nineteenth-century cities, Catholics and Protestants, Christians, and Jews, were frequently in conflict, sometimes violent. In the later twentieth century the large migration to European cities of Muslims from Turkey, North Africa, and south Asia led to similar tensions, although hostility to Islam was often justified in secularist or racist, rather than Christian, terms.

In the long term, industrialization revolutionized standards of living, lifestyles, and often mentalities. Britain again offers a model of how this happened. Whereas the first generation of industrial entrepreneurs were often devout and relatively austere, their children and grandchildren wanted to live the lives of gentlemen. The later nineteenth century saw many large employers moving out of the cities to country estates and a life increasingly dominated by leisure. Those who had been brought up as Dissenters (see DISSENT) were moving to the CHURCH OF ENGLAND or sometimes to agnosticism. For the mass of the people the benefits of industrial wealth and the possibilities of increasing leisure came more slowly. Not until the later nineteenth century were the better-off sections of the working class beginning to enjoy cycling, going to professional soccer and cricket matches and music halls, and making day trips to the seaside. In the 1920s and 1930s cinema and radio surpassed all older forms of leisure, although only in the 1950s and 1960s did former luxuries, such as televisions, cars, and foreign holidays become a possibility for the mass of the population. A new age of affluence had dawned, and with growing leisure opportunities a mental revolution was completed that had been developing slowly over several decades. One symbol of this revolution was the demise of the set-apart Sunday, which had been gradually eroded since the 1890s, but which survived into the 1960s before collapsing in the face of growing demands for leisure. Partly at stake was individual freedom and the repudiation of any attempt to regulate the moral standards of the community. Partly it was about the rejection of all forms of puritanism and the embrace of hedonistic values. In the relatively impoverished society of the later nineteenth century, churches offering low-cost facilities were major players in the field of leisure; by the later twentieth century commercial interests predominated.

Religion, like every other area of life, felt the effects of these dramatic changes, and in some countries Protestants played a prominent part in helping to bring them about. The following discussion looks at ways in which Protestants may have contributed to the Industrial Revolution, some of its consequences for them, and some of their responses to its consequences.

In looking at the contribution of Protestantism to industrialization, one must inevitably start with the “Weber Thesis.” Max Weber’s famous essay, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, first published in 1904–1905, was prompted by figures showing that in southern Germany, where the majority of the population were Catholics, Protestants were more likely than Catholics to be successful in business. He cited evidence that this was also true in other countries, and that these Protestant businessmen were especially numerous in the Calvinist churches and in various smaller denominations, such as METHODISM and The SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Quakers). He traced this back partly to the Protestant concept of “calling,” according to which every “secular” occupation is a vocation, through which one can serve God; partly to the disciplined lifestyle promoted by these religious groups. He linked the latter to their anxiety as to whether they were saved, and the consequent drive to live in a consistent way that would show that the GRACE of God was working through them. The combined effect of these factors was a tendency to sanctify work. This contributed to the early stages of capitalist development both because of the importance of capital accumulation and because of the need to break with “traditional” working habits. Later, when capitalist industry had become well established, religious motivation was no longer necessary, although inherited wealth usually was, so the majority of successful businessmen were descendants of the successful businessmen of earlier generations, whose religion did contribute to their success. The Weber Thesis has been endlessly debated, and there is still no consensus. It seems that he is right in identifying a connection between Protestantism, especially in its sectarian forms, and early industrial entrepreneurship, but that he failed to find a fully convincing explanation. In predominantly Catholic states such as France or Bavaria, Protestants were heavily overrepresented among early industrialists. In mainly Protestant countries, such as England, some Nonconformist denominations, such as the Quakers, were also overrepresented (see NONCONFORMITY). Many other religious and ethnic minorities have distinguished themselves in business. However, some specific aspects of eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Protestantism, especially in sectarian forms, may also be relevant, including high levels of literacy, skills acquired through lay office in the congregation, the ascetic lifestyle mentioned by Weber, and the role of nationwide sectarian networks. There is less evidence that Protestantism contributed directly to industrialization in Latin America or KOREA. The massive growth of PENTECOSTALISM since the 1950s has taken place mainly toward the lower end of the social hierarchy among such groups as small farmers, artisans, and service workers. Protestants have tended to improve their situation in a modest way, but most of them have started so low in the occupational hierarchy that major entrepreneurial success has seldom been possible.

The qualities and skills that favored success in business could also equip sectarian Protestants for leading roles in labor organization. In Britain the period from the 1840s to the 1920s saw a strong sectarian, especially Methodist presence in the trade unions, and when the modern Labour Party emerged in the early twentieth century, it was said to “owe more to Methodism than to Marx.” This claim has been almost as hotly debated as the Weber Thesis. However oversimplified it may be, though, it contains an important truth, that Dissenting Protestants of all kinds were heavily overrepresented among the early leaders of the modern British working-class movement. This was especially true of the miners, for long the largest occupational group in Britain, and it is appropriate that the most revered figure in British labor history, Keir Hardie, was both a miner and a member of a small Scottish Dissenting sect, the Evangelical Union. Protestants were also prominent in the American labor movement in the nineteenth century. The popular critique of capitalism drew heavily on the BIBLE, and especially the Prophets.

Early industrialization disrupted existing patterns of life, sometimes with devastating consequences. Migrants to new industrial districts were attracted by the hope of higher wages, but they could also face the loss of family support, harsh factory discipline, and frequent periods of unemployment. They might find it difficult to maintain traditional religious observances, whether because of Sunday work or because of a lack of churches and priests. Established churches, whether Catholic or Protestant, were usually slow to adapt to the rapid movements of population, and many of them never entirely recovered from the losses suffered during early industrialization. Sectarian churches, with their flexible organization, often adapted more readily. In many parts of northern England the Methodists took the place of the Church of England as the main form of organized religion in the later eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. Lay preachers could take the place of ordained ministers, and small unpretentious chapels, or even private houses, could be used for worship. Baptist, Congregational, and Calvinistic Methodist chapels sprang up all along the mining and iron-working valleys of South Wales. In SWEDEN, too, free churches flourished in new industrial settlements, whereas Lutheran congregations dwindled. Something similar happened when Latin American countries, such as BRAZIL and Chile, began to industrialize in the twentieth century. In mining and factory districts many workers turned away from the Catholic Church, which seemed too much linked with TRADITION and old social hierarchies. For some of them Socialism or COMMUNISM became a secular faith, although others found their SALVATION in pentecostalism. Since the 1960s one of the areas of fastest economic growth in the world has been East Asia. Here too, most notably in South Korea, rapid social change and the consequent weakening of traditional social structures and religious patterns have been conducive to the growth of Protestantism. By 1980 it was estimated that 20 percent of the South Korean population were Protestants, including not only members of the longestablished Presbyterian (see PRESBYTERIANISM) and Methodist churches, but also the newer pentecostals.

By no means did all Protestants welcome the growth of mechanized industry. In Europe the CLERGY of the established churches were often rooted in the countryside and accustomed to a regime of rural paternalism. They were especially critical of Sunday labor, although they often presented a more generalized critique of the relentless pursuit of profit and the neglect of the workforce by early factory owners. Political or religious differences might play a role here. For instance, Conservative clergy were especially alert to the failings of Liberal factory owners. However, these early doubts often changed to more favorable evaluations—both in Europe, and especially in the United States. In the “Gilded Age,” after the Union victory in the CIVIL WAR, many American preachers presented industrialists in a heroic light. Business success was seen as the logical consequence of faith in God and the practice of Protestant virtues. The famous Brooklyn preacher HENRY WARD BEECHER contrasted Europe and its hereditary elites and massive social inequalities with the free American Republic, and declared that “The general truth will stand that no man in this land suffers from poverty unless it be more than his fault—unless it be his sin.”

In the early and mid-Victorian years similar ideas were also common in Britain. The years around 1850 saw the emergence of a new breed of industrial paternalists—men who had survived the stormy years of the early 1840s when many of their rivals had suffered shipwreck, and who now felt secure enough to offer a capitalism with a human face. Many of them had close connections with a church, whether Anglican or Dissenting. Some of their wealth was poured into building churches and paying the minister’s salary, and the ministers were naturally grateful. The paternalism of these years tended to be two-edged: the churches, schools, houses with gardens, and sports fields went hand in hand with firm discipline and sometimes with the absence of what were seen as less desirable facilities such as pubs. Both in Britain and in the United States successful businessmen rose to positions of prominence within many Protestant denominations. Their business skills were valued, and their gifts of money were essential for the success of many denominational projects. A typical figure was Sir Robert Perks, the railway magnate and Liberal MP, who was one of the most powerful figures in British Methodism at the start of the twentieth century.

By this time, the influence of the “Christian businessman” was beginning to decline, as family firms were being absorbed into large corporations, run by professional managers. In the twentieth century the lay leaders of the British churches were increasingly drawn from the professions, rather than business. Meanwhile, many Protestant preachers had become less sure of the benefits of industrial capitalism. The Christian Socialists, with their schemes for worker cooperatives, appeared in England as early as 1848, although the movement was short-lived (see SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN). By the 1880s and 1890s unease was much more widespread. Christian Socialism had revived in Britain. The SOCIAL GOSPEL had emerged in the United States. In Germany, the Evangelical Social Congress, founded in 1890, acted as a focal point for a diverse band of Protestant critics of the existing social order, ranging from the Liberal Max Weber to the Social Democrat Paul Göhre to the anti-Semite Adolf Stoecker (see ANTI-SEMITISM). What all had in common was a recognition of the dangers inherent in the unfettered power of many great industrialists and of the need for the state to take a more active role in improving working-class living and working conditions.

These debates continue to the present day. In 1983 the main churches in AUSTRALIA published a report, Changing Australia, that criticized current trends toward privatization and deregulation, and that, although less specific about the alternatives, favored a more socialist approach. The Church of England's famous report of 1985, Faith in the City, focusing especially on the needs of impoverished "Urban Priority Areas," reached similar conclusions and provoked a furious counterattack by ministers of the free-market Thatcher government, who accused it of "Marxism." Meanwhile the "Prosperity Gospel" preached by many of the pentecostal churches both in the United States and in AFRICA returned to the mid-Victorian view according to which poverty is a SIN and the successful businessman is to be regarded as a model Christian. Indeed, according to this Gospel, economic success is the inevitable result of faithful adherence to biblical principles.

References and Further Reading

- Gutman, Herbert. Work, Culture and Society in Industrializing America. New York: Vintage Books, 1977.
- Jeremy, David. Christians and Capitalists. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1990.
- Lehmann, Hartmut, and Guenther Roth, eds. Weber's Protestant Ethic: Origins, Evidence, Contexts. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- May, Henry F. The Protestant Churches and Industrial America. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1949.
- McLeod, Hugh, ed. European Religion in the Age of Great Cities 1830–1930. London: Routledge, 1994.
- Moore, Robert. Pit-men, Preachers and Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974.
- Roberts, Richard H., ed. Religion and the Transformations of Capitalism: Comparative Approaches. London: Routledge, 1995.
- Rostow, W.W. The World Economy. London: Palgrave Macmillan, 1978.
- Smith, Mark. Religion in Industrial Society: Oldham and Saddleworth 1740–1865. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1994.

HUGH MCLEOD

INFANT BAPTISM

See Baptism

INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION

The Institutes of the Christian Religion is the classic sixteenth-century exposition of Reformed theology. JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) built on the work of such REFORMATION pioneers as HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and MARTIN LUTHER, whose work was often topical and polemical. Calvin had a systematic cast of mind, and his Institutes presented the theological insights of the Reformation as an organized whole. The work was first published in 1536. The author revised and expanded it until 1559.

Early Editions

The Institutes was Calvin's first major theological work. The Latin 1536 edition was essentially an introduction to, and a defense of, the Protestant faith. Its heart was an exposition of traditional catechetical texts: The first three chapters explained the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer. The next two sections treated the controversial topic of the sacraments: The fourth chapter dealt with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, the two sacraments Protestants affirmed; the fifth chapter demoted the five remaining Roman Catholic sacraments. The sixth and final chapter dealt with the outworking of the Protestant faith in life, under the headings of Christian freedom, ecclesiastical power, and civil government.

The purpose of the work shifted with Calvin's first revision in 1539: rather than an initial instruction in the faith, it was now presented as a theological textbook. He expressed the intention of writing biblical commentaries, and instructed that the two parts of his work should be read together. The Institutes would present summaries of biblical teachings, allowing him to avoid digression in his commentaries. The number of chapters was expanded to seventeen, and the discussion was amplified by scriptural, Patristic, classical, and contemporary references. Substantial new material was added on such themes as the knowledge of God and the knowledge of humanity, repentance, JUSTIFICATION, the similarities and differences between the Testaments, PREDESTINATION, providence, and the Christian life. In 1543 a third edition with twenty-one chapters was published.

Later Editions

Calvin declared himself satisfied with the restructured edition of 1559, with its eighty chapters divided into four books. This included much new material, especially engagement with his theological opponents.

The first book treats “The Knowledge of God the Creator.” This includes discussion of the sin that prevents one from knowing God through creation, our consequent need for the BIBLE to find knowledge of God, the danger of idolatry, the Triune nature of God, the image of God in humanity, and God’s providential care for creation.

The second book is on “The Knowledge of God the Redeemer in Christ, First Disclosed to the Fathers Under the Law, and Then to Us in the Gospel.” Here he includes discussion of sin and its consequent damage to human free will, the COVENANT of God with humanity in the Old and New Testaments, the person of Christ, and the work of Christ.

Although the second book is specifically on the knowledge of the Redeemer, the third and fourth books considered implications of this knowledge. The third book is “The Way in Which We Receive the Grace of Christ: What Benefits Come to Us from It, and What Effects Follow.” This includes the working of the Holy Spirit, the Christian life, justification, PRAYER, and the doctrine of election.

The fourth book is “The External Means or Aids by Which God Invites Us Into the Society of Christ and Holds Us Therein.” The focus of this book is primarily the Church in its polity, its powers, its discipline, and its sacraments. He concludes with a chapter on civil government.

Other Latin editions with minor changes were published in 1545, 1550, 1553, and 1554. Translations came quickly, putting the Institutes into the hands of the less learned public. In 1541 Calvin published his own translation of the work into French. Further French translations followed the expansion of the Latin text, in 1545 and 1560. Sixteenth-century editions were published in Spanish, Italian, Dutch, German, and English. In the seventeenth century Czech, Hungarian, and possibly Arabic translations were published.

Place in Protestant Belief

There have long been more opinions on Calvin’s Institutes than readers of it. In theological education it has not always been prominent, even among Reformed Christians. It was early displaced in America by the work of FRANCIS TURRETINI. In the nineteenth and early twentieth century discussion of Calvin’s Institutes was present in the Princeton Theology and MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY. KARL BARTH and EMIL BRUNNER both drew on Calvin's Institutes in their dispute over natural theology. By the late twentieth century the book was again used in introductory theology courses in some seminaries. The Institutes remains a subject of significant scholarly work, and its voice is still heard in many theological discussions.

Many nonreaders of Calvin believe that his text is dominated by the doctrine of double predestination. Scholars are aware that the doctrine of the knowledge of God shapes the work more prominently, that he presents predestination as a biblical teaching that provides assurance to troubled believers, and that methodologically his driving concern was to discern and present the clear, consistent teaching of the Bible as a whole.

See also Barth, Karl; Bible; Brunner, Emil; Calvin, John; Covenant; Justification; Luther, Martin; Mercersburg Theology; Prayer; Predestination; Reformation; Turretini, Francis; Zwingli, Huldrych

References for Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Calvin, John. Calvin: Institutes of the Christian Religion [1559]. The Library of Christian Classics, vols. XX-XXI. Edited by John T. McNeill, translated by Ford Lewis Battles. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960.

———. Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1536 Edition. Translated by Ford Lewis Battles. Rev. ed. Grand Rapids, MI: The H.H. Meeter Center for Calvin Studies, and William B. Eerdmans, 1986.

Secondary Sources:

Dowey, Edward A., Jr. The Knowledge of God in Calvin's Theology. Expanded Ed. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1994.

Ganoczy, Alexandre. The Young Calvin. Translated by David Foxgrover and Wade Provo. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1987.

Niesel, Wilhelm. The Theology of Calvin. Translated by Harold Knight. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1956.

Wendel, François. Calvin: Origins and Development of His Religious Thought. Translated by Philip Mairet. New York: Harper and Row, 1963. Reprint, Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1997.

GARY NEAL HANSEN

INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT

The Interchurch World Movement of North America (IWM) was a grandiose but short-lived (1919–1921) attempt by mainline Protestant missionary leaders to create a unified and aggressive interdenominational missionary agency. It hoped to mobilize all of Protestant America in rebuilding the postwar world according to “Christian” social principles. Despite the prominence and ebullience of its organizers, the IWM collapsed in surprising fashion due to financial indebtedness and declining support.

History

Organized in February 1919, the IWM adopted the motto “the giving of the whole gospel to the whole world by the whole church.” In fact, it represented about 30 American Protestant denominations and perhaps 25 percent of all Americans. Still, it saw itself as the “unofficial” American religious establishment, strategically allying top Protestant, business, and governmental leaders in “Christianizing” the globe.

A media-driven national fundraising campaign was launched in spring 1920, seeking $176 million for denominational agencies and $40 million for the IWM, which was to come from “friendly citizens,” identified as unchurched industrial and financial philanthropists with Protestant sympathies. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., a member of the IWM Executive Committee, pledged $5 million to get the campaign off the ground. A building was rented in New York City for a staff of more than 2,600 employees.

The Collapse and the Steel Strike Report

Initial public enthusiasm and national media attention could not keep the IWM from facing financial failure in summer 1920 and disbanding in April 1921. Although denominational giving went well, pledges from the “friendly citizens”—which the IWM needed to cover its own operational expenses—did not. By the summer of 1920, the IWM leaders faced an $8 million debt and public embarrassment.

Growing postwar isolationism played a role in the IWM's collapse, but vague objectives and reckless financing were probably more fatal factors. A contributing factor may have been conservative distrust of social liberalism within the IWM. In October 1919, the IWM Department of Industrial Relations launched a detailed investigation of the U.S. Steel strike (1919–1920) and labor conditions in the steel industry. Its report, written by Methodist Bishop and SOCIAL GosPEL advocate Francis J. McConnell, documented unjust working conditions and unfair labor practices, including company use of agents provocateur during the strike. The IWM deliberately postponed approving and publishing the controversial report until after the financial campaign, but the investigation itself likely caused potential donors fearful of postwar radicalism to withhold support.

These events revealed the fissures existing in modern American Protestant life and the increasing secularity and pluralism of society. They left the Federal Council of Churches, formed in 1908, as the leading agency of Protestant cooperative efforts in America.

See also Church World Service; Cultural Protestantism; Gladden, Washington; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Missions; Missionary Organizations; Mott, John Raleigh; National Council of Churches; Rauschenbusch, Walter

References and Further Reading

Ernst, Eldon. Moment of Truth for Protestant America: Interchurch Campaigns Following World War I. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1974.

Interchurch World Movement. Report of the Steel Strike of 1919. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Howe, 1920.

WILLIAM M. KING

INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL

This Pentecostal denomination was established by AIMEE SEMPLE MCPHERSON and incorporated in Los Angeles in 1927. Its headquarters church, Angelus Temple, opened as the centerpiece of McPherson's scheme for interdenominational worldwide evangelism on January 1, 1923, and the denomination commemorates this date as its anniversary.

A Canadian Salvationist, McPherson's first husband, Robert Semple, was an Irish immigrant who had recently embraced PENTECOSTALISM. Members of this religious movement thought that the end of the world was imminent. Its members prayed for an experience they called the baptism with the Holy Spirit and believed that this baptism would be manifested by speech in unknown Tongues (see TONGUES, SPEAKING IN). They expected tongues and other New Testament spiritual gifts (I Corinthians 12 and 14) to be part of their corporate worship, and they set out to announce to the world a message that had three primary components: (1) the imminent return of Christ; (2) the urgency of global EVANGELISM; and (3) the presence of Christ to do in the end times what he had done in New Testament days—especially heal the sick, meet every need, empower for service and bestow the Holy Spirit.

These convictions animated the Semples' choice to become missionaries, and in 1910 they left for Hong Kong. Widowed soon after their arrival, Aimee returned to the United States later that year. After a second marriage (to Harold McPherson) in 1912 she again began evangelizing in 1915, traveling up and down the east coast in ever larger tents to accommodate her growing public. In 1918 she moved to Los Angeles, without her husband from whom she had separated amicably. She traveled from there in evangelistic endeavors that filled huge municipal auditoriums, preaching to an adoring public that seemed to begrudge her nothing.

Her desire to have her own place led to the construction of Angelus Temple as well as to the initiation of a number of related efforts that enlisted partners and built her national constituency. In 1924 a radio tower was built atop the Temple, and McPherson began broadcasting on KFSG—Kall Foursquare Gospel. By then she had launched a Bible training school that came to be known as the Lighthouse of Foursquare Evangelism (LIFE), a children's church some 1,000 strong led by her own children, Roberta and Rolf, and the rudiments of a social program that responded to local disasters and pressing social needs. Angelus Temple became famous as well for McPherson's illustrated sermons, lavish dramatic presentations that routinely packed the house. In sensation crazed Los Angeles, McPherson was indisputably a sensation. She took her cues from the creativity of the SALVATION ARMY and from her neighbors in nearby Hollywood and manifested unflinching resourcefulness in front of crowds, although her business instincts proved less dependable.

As McPherson's endeavors multiplied, it became necessary to organize and incorporate them. She oversaw the formation of an evangelistic association, which she envisioned as an interdenominational agency intent on spreading the gospel around the world. As her efforts grew she did not allow her early Pentecostal associations to alienate her from others intent on Revival (see REVIVALS) and evangelism.

Until her death in 1944 McPherson—with her son and successor, Rolf—dominated the church's small board of directors (rounded out by Aimee's mother and daughter until their separate nasty departures). Her poor health and the church's complicated financial state in the 1930s curtailed her U.S. outreach beyond Los Angeles. With the coming of World War II, she took to the streets to sell war bonds and appeared more often in her pulpit. When she died in September 1944 her son, Rolf, replaced her as the president of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel. He served until 1988.

With the passing of its founder the ICFG adopted a polity that diminished family control. The denomination is governed by a president (elected to a four-year term), a board of directors, a Foursquare cabinet, and an executive council. The board of directors frames the philosophy of the corporation. The denomination is divided into nine districts (in 2001 it announced aggressive plans to establish a significant number of new districts), and the cabinet includes the district supervisors and representatives chosen by the ministers of each district. The executive council includes the cabinet and other local superintendents, and determines the agenda for the annual spring denominational business meetings.

The denomination has grown significantly since McPherson's death. It includes over 1,800 congregations in the United States where it numbers nearly 270,000 members. The first Foursquare Church abroad opened in the PHILIPPINES in 1927. Others followed quickly. Worldwide, Foursquare churches claim over 3.5 million attendees and estimate a constituency nearing 5 million. The missionary efforts of the Foursquare Church have been particularly successful in parts of LATIN AMERICA and in the Philippines. From small beginnings, missionary outreach has expanded to include 127 countries and nearly 50,000 pastors, teachers, and other workers. The ICFG holds membership in the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS.

In general the agencies that McPherson established have remained central to the work of the ICFG. Her Bible school became LIFE Pacific College and moved from its longtime home in Echo Park, Los Angeles to suburban San Dimas. The denomination also operates LIFE Bible College East in Christiansburg, Virginia, and Pacific Life Bible College in Surrey, British Columbia. The inner-city building that McPherson constructed for her first training school is now known as Angelus Bible Institute and serves a Hispanic constituency. Thirteen other certified Bible institutes, schools of ministry, and church-run educational efforts supplement the opportunities for practical ministerial training. The best known of these is undoubtedly King's College and Seminary, the schools founded by the best-known ICFG leader, Jack Hayford, long-time pastor of The Church on the Way in Van Nuys, California, and prolific author, conference speaker, and broadcaster.

References and Further Reading

Blumhofer, Edith L. Aimee Semple McPherson, Everybody's Sister. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1994.

Cox, Raymond L. The Foursquare Gospel. 1969.

EDITH L. BLUMHOFER

INTERNATIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH

The International Pentecostal Holiness Church (IPHC) is one of several denominations that had their origins in the nineteenth-century WESLEYAN/HOLINESS revival who, although retaining the revival's emphasis on Christian Perfection as a second work of grace subsequent to the believer's JUSTIFICATION, also came to expect a third work of grace, a personal BAPTISM with the Holy Ghost evidenced by speaking in other Tongues.

Two groups of churches born of the holiness revival contributed to its organization. The first was a group of congregations associated with the North Carolina Holiness Association founded in 1897 under the leadership of Abner Blackman Crumpler, a Methodist Episcopal Church South minister. Although his conference acquitted him of charges related to his holiness evangelism brought against him in 1899, Crumpler nevertheless left the Methodists. A year later, at Fayetteville, North Carolina, he held the first convention of what generally were called the Pentecostal Holiness Churches (PHC). From 1901 until 1909 the new denomination was known as the Holiness Church. In 1908 the denomination, influenced by the AZUSA STREET PENTECOSTAL REVIVAL of 1906 through the Pentecostal preaching of Gaston B. Cashwell, officially adopted the belief that the baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire accompanied by speaking in other tongues (see TONGUES, SPEAKING IN) as its initial evidence was promised to every "fully cleansed believer" as the third work of grace subsequent to his or her justification and SANCTIFICATION. The church claims to have been the first body to officially adopt such a statement of faith. Consequently, Crumpler left the denomination. The word "Pentecostal" was restored to the name the following year.

Churches organized through the ministry of holiness evangelist Benjamin H. Irwin constituted the second group. It was the older and larger of the two with its origins in the Iowa holiness association. Irwin's movement, teaching that a "baptism of fire" followed the experience of entire sanctification, quickly attracted a significant following in the Carolinas and Georgia. In 1898 Irwin's converts among ministers from the holiness associations of the area joined him to form a national Fire-Baptized Holiness Association at Anderson, South Carolina in 1898. By 1902, after Irwin had left the movement under suspicions of moral turpitude, the association's churches led by Joseph Hillary King became the Fire-Baptized Holiness Church. In 1911 it joined with the Pentecostal Holiness Church, both groups adopting the latter's name for the new Pentecostal denomination.

The Tabernacle Pentecostal Holiness Churches affiliated with Holmes Bible College in Greenville, South Carolina joined the new denomination in 1915. Three years before the union, the Fire-Baptized Holiness church had released twenty-seven black churches with 925 members to form their own Fire-Baptized convention under W.E.Fuller. Shortly after the merger the few black congregations that remained in the merged body were dropped from the conference rolls. After the 1970s the IPHC established agreements of affiliation with several of the continuing black churches that had their roots in the denomination.

The cardinal doctrines of the church include: justification by FAITH, entire sanctification, the Baptism in the Holy Ghost evidenced by speaking in tongues, divine healing, and the imminent premillennial second coming of Christ. Traditionally the church has considered these beliefs to constitute basic Pentecostalism. Subsequently it consistently resisted any efforts within the newly developing Pentecostal revival that it felt threatened the integrity of its Pentecostal confession and experience. This was most evident in its efforts to refute the "finished work" teaching espoused by some early Pentecostals that led to their rejection of the revival's traditional Wesleyan THEOLOGY and the eventual formation of a theologically more Reformed-oriented ASSEMBLIES OF GOD denomination in 1914. In 1921 a dissident group left the church to organize the Congregational Holiness Church. They opposed the PHC's strong stand against the use of any human means and medicines in conjunction with its reliance on divine healing.

A quadrennial general conference representative of the regional district conferences of local churches is the denomination's highest governing body, establishing the denomination's doctrines and polity. A superintending bishop elected by the general conference serves as the chief executive officer. The IPHC is a member of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS and the Pentecostal and Charismatic Fellowship of North America and was an active participant in their formation. Its educational department supports Advantage College (Sacramento, California), Emmanuel College (Franklin Springs, Georgia), Southwestern Christian University (Oklahoma City, Oklahoma), and affiliates with Holmes Bible College (Greenville, South Carolina). Its North American membership is over 200,000 and historically centered in the American south. Since 1960, through its overseas mission stations in seventy nations, it has developed into a world fellowship with almost two million adherents. The current denominational offices are based in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

The church has fostered and shaped many ministries that have significantly influenced evangelical Protestantism. The most prominent of these is the healing and educational ministry of ORAL GANVILLE ROBERTS, the founder of Oral Roberts University. Another prominent member, church historian Vincent Synan, is a leading figure in a movement that has sought to encourage dialog between the traditional Pentecostal denominations and contemporary charismatic PENTECOSTALISM as well as between traditional Pentecostalism and traditional Wesleyan/Holiness groups.

See also Holiness Movement

References and Further Reading

Jones, Charles Edward. Black Holiness: A Guide to the Study of Black Participation in Wesleyan Perfectionist and Glossolalic Pentecostal Movements. ATLA Bibliography Series, no. 18. Metuchen, NJ and London: The American Theological Library Association and the Scarecrow Press, 1987.

Synan, Harold Vinson. The Old-Time Power: A Centennial History of the International Pentecostal Church. Franklin Springs, GA: Advocate Press, 1998.

MELVIN E. DIETER

INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP

InterVarsity Christian Fellowship (IVCF) is an evangelical Protestant interdenominational campus ministry in North America. Founded in 1928, IVCF advocates a broadly evangelical Protestant theology and emphasizes personal piety, Bible study, apologetics, EVANGELISM, and foreign MISSIONS. Involving an estimated 34,000 students and faculty in 1999–2000, the organization sponsors a variety of ministries, ranging from prayer meetings to foreign missions, on more than 560 college and university campuses in the United States.

History

IVCF traces its roots back to England when the Cambridge Inter-Collegiate Christian Union formed as a result of the merger of several different conservative Protestant student organizations at Cambridge University in 1877. Soon evangelical unions spread to other colleges and universities. In 1919 various college unions in Britain held the first Inter-Varsity Convention. In 1928 Inter-Varsity Fellowship of Evangelical Unions was established as a national organization and launched a ministry in Canada. In 1934 C.Stacey Woods, an Australian and Wheaton College graduate, became the general secretary of IVCF in Canada. Woods helped establish an IVCF chapter at the University of Michigan in 1939, and two years later helped organize an independent American branch of IVCF. In the aftermath of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy of the 1920s-1930s (see FUNDAMENTALISM), theologically conservative students often withdrew from campus ministries, such as the YMCA, because they had taken on a more liberal theological orientation (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM). Consequently, IVCF found a natural audience among conservative students. Since the emergence of the neoevangelical movement in the late 1940s (see EVANGELICALISM), which criticized fundamentalism for its anti-intellectualism, divisiveness, and lack of a social conscience, IVCF has experienced exponential growth. In 1941–1942 IVCF reported chapters on 46 different campuses, ten full-time staff members, and an operating budget of $18,000. In 1970–1971 IYCF had 394 undergraduate chapters, 232 staff members, and a budget of more than two and a half million dollars. In 1999–2000 IVCF reported having more than 700 affiliate chapters, more than 1,000 staff members, and a budget of over 45 million dollars.

Theological Orientation

Attempting to steer a middle course between fundamentalism and liberal Protestantism, IVCF advocates a broadly evangelical Protestant theology (see EVANGELICALISM [theology]), which attempts to attract students from fundamentalist and mainline Protestant church backgrounds. IVCF's Statement of Faith, which every staff member, trustee, and student leader is required to sign, reflects this orientation. The statement affirms five doctrines: the divine inspiration, trustworthiness, and authority of the BIBLE; the deity of Jesus Christ; the necessity and efficacy of the substitutionary ATONEMENT and bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ for the redemption of the world; the presence and power of the Holy Spirit in the lives of Christians; and the expectation of the personal return of Jesus Christ. IVCF is interdenominational in character. IVCF draws financial support from individuals and local churches. IVCF's board of trustees represents a wide range of Protestant traditions, including Assemblies of God, Methodist Church, and PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (USA). Both men and women have been involved in the leadership of IVCF. In 1948 IVCF's trustees passed a resolution denouncing racial segregation and instituting a nonsegregational basis for all IVCF activities.

Various Campus Ministries

One unique feature of IVCF undergraduate ministry is the fact that it is student-led. Paid staff workers serve as advisors to student leaders. In addition to undergraduate chapters, IYCF sponsors a number of specialized ministries, including groups devoted specifically to nursing students, graduate students, faculty members, fraternity and sorority members, and international students. In 1976 IVCF initiated a ministry to seminary students, the Theological Students Fellowship (TSF). In 1985 TSF folded because of a lack of support.

Urbana Missions Convention

From its inception, InterVarsity has encouraged student involvement in foreign missions. IVCF's first missions conference, held in Toronto in 1946, attracted 576 students from 151 colleges. Since 1948 this missions conference has been held almost triennially at the University of Illinois. The 2000 Urbana Missions Convention attracted more than 19,000 students as well as more than 240 mission agencies. The Urbana conference has attracted some of the most popular evangelical speakers, such as John Stott and BILLY GRAHAM, in the trans-Atlantic Protestant world.

In addition to the Urbana Missions Convention, IVCF sponsors a number of missions enterprises. IVCF coordinates urban mission projects to various American cities in which students work with urban churches during spring break or for an entire summer. In 2001 IVCF organized such projects in nearly 30 major American cities. IVCF also arranges student involvement in summer-long foreign missions projects through a number of different agencies.

Other IVCF Organizations

In 1947 IVCF launched a publishing program from Havertown, Pennsylvania, InterVarsity Press (IVP), to print and distribute Bible study guides and other books. In 1960 IVP moved to Chicago; in 1966 to Downers Grove, Illinois; and in 1995, to Westmont, California. IVP has enjoyed tremendous growth. In 1952 IVP sold an estimated 178,000 books and booklets. In 2000 IVP employed 65 people, offered an estimated 700 titles, and sold over 2 million works, including an increasing number of academic works by conservative theologians and biblical scholars. IVCF began publishing a monthly periodical, HIS Magazine, in 1941, which has been succeeded by Student Leadership Journal. Both IVP and the Urbana missions conference have served as key conduits in the influence of post-World War II English Evangelicalism's influence on conservative American Protestantism.

InterVarsity also operates four major conference centers where it holds weekend spiritual retreats, week-long student leadership development sessions, and a number of pastor seminars and family camps. In 1970 IVCF launched a multimedia communications division, TWENTYONEHUNDRED Productions. InterVarsity's national offices moved from Chicago to Madison, Wisconsin in 1969.

See also Atonement; Bible; Colleges; Evangelicalism; Evangelical Revival; Evangelism; Fundamentalism; Graham, Billy; Liberal Protestantism; Missionary Organizations; Missions; National Association of Evangelicals; Presbyterian Church; Universities; World Missionary Conferences; Youth for Christ

References and Further Reading

Howard, David M. Student Power in World Evangelism. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1970.

Hunt, Keith, and Gladys Hunt. For Christ and the University: The Story of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship of the U.S.A., 1940–1990. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1991.

Johnson, Douglas. Contending for the Faith. Leicester, England: Inter-Varsity Press, 1979.

Shelley, Bruce L. "The Rise of Evangelical Youth Movements." Fides et Historia 18 (1986): 47–63.

Woods, C. Stacey. The Growth of a Work of God. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1978.

P.C.KEMENY

IONA COMMUNITY

Founded in 1938 by Sir George F. MacLeod on the island of Iona, Scotland, The Iona Community originally had a two-fold purpose: (1) to unite unemployed workers with pastors in rebuilding the venerable Iona Abbey; and (2) to create an extended community of members committed to a discipline of prayer and social action. Because the rebuilding project was arduous, membership was at first limited to men. It was later expanded to include women and extended also to other Protestant and Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox believers. In 2002 there were 240 full members of the community, supported by more than 1,500 associate members and a like number of committed friends.

A small residential staff at the Abbey hosts thousands of retreatants during the year, but most members are scattered in many different locations. Its self-monitored discipline requires stated times of prayer and BIBLE study, work, sharing a percentage of income, social action, frequent local meetings, and three plenary meetings plus one week at Iona each year.

Iona is famed in Christian history as the site where the Celtic monk Columba (521–597), with twelve companions, landed in CE 563 to begin the conversion of Scotland. After the sixteenth-century REFORMATION, the Abbey was abandoned; its reconstruction was completed in 1965.

George F. MacLeod (1895–1991) was noted for his staunch pacifism, eloquent preaching, and engagement in controversial issues. Among his best-known books are We Shall Rebuild (1945) and Only One Way Left (1956), both often reissued. In 1956 he was appointed a chaplain to the queen, in 1957 elected moderator of the General Assembly of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, and in 1989 was awarded the prestigious Templeton Prize in religion.

The Iona Community is a leading example of church renewal in the post-World War II era. Its current activities include Wild Goose Publications, The Coracle (a bimonthly periodical), well-attended youth camps, and liturgical reform.

See also Bible; Church of Scotland; Reformation

References and Further Reading

Bloesch, Donald G. Centers of Christian Renewal. Philadelphia/Boston: United Church Press, 1964.

Morton, T.Ralph. The Household of Faith. Glasgow: Iona Community, 1951.

———. The Iona Community Story. Glasgow: Iona Community, 1955.

Website: <http://www.ionacommunity.org.uk/>

DONALD F.DURNBAUGH

IRELAND

The island of Ireland received Protestantism through two routes. From England, in the mid-sixteenth century, came the ANGLICANISM of HENRY VIII. The English settlers of the mid-eastern strip of Ireland (known as the Pale of Dublin) received it through the Irish Parliament's Act of Supremacy (1537), establishing the king as head of both church and state. In 1560 the Church of Ireland was established on the Anglican model, but developed permanently the CALVINIST PROTESTANT features promoted by ELIZABETH I rather than the ANGLO-CATHOLIC ones of her father Henry. Church of Ireland membership never extended much beyond English settlers and their descendants. The native Irish and some English settlers resisted attempts to impose Reformation, sometimes through war (1579–1583, 1595–1603).

From SCOTLAND came Calvinist PRESBYTERIANISM as interpreted by JOHN KNOX and others in the Scottish Confession (1560). In 1603 the Scottish king, James VI, became James I of England and Ireland. Although Anglican himself, he made it possible for Scottish migrants to settle in Ireland's northern province of Ulster, despite bringing with them their Presbyterian tradition.

Shortly after, English Protestant settlers began to arrive (1610) as part of James's plantation scheme. The English moved to the south and west, whereas the Scots stayed in the north and east, near to their Scottish homeland. At first the Scots and their ministers were integrated into the Church of Ireland, developing a strong presence during the Puritan English Republic under OLIVER CROMWELL (1649–1660). In response to a Catholic rebellion he finally crushed (1641–1650), Cromwell secured a more comprehensive Protestant plantation throughout Ireland. At the same time he disestablished the Church of Ireland and banished the bishops. With the collapse of the Republic the monarchy was restored (1660). The bishops then returned to a reestablished church and proceeded to expel Presbyterians from it. Presbyterians, some of whom were already organized into presbyteries, then developed their organization sufficiently to set up the Presbyterian Synod of Ulster (1690).

The forces of King William of Orange extinguished any further Catholic threat to Protestants by crushing the last Catholic rebellion (1689–1691). Ireland's Protestant aristocracy and farmers then prospered. Owning seven-eighths of all farming land, they were the backbone of the Church of Ireland. Beneath them in the social order were Presbyterians, who lived mainly in the north of the country and, below them, the much larger Catholic population. All Protestants together made up twenty percent of Ireland's population, a proportion that has remained relatively constant up to recent times.

The American War of Independence (1776) and the French Revolution (1789) inspired "new light" or liberal Presbyterians to lead and participate in the Republican rebellion of the United Irishmen (1798). However, poor organization saw Irish Republicans pitted against Royalists in some areas and Irish Catholics against Anglo-Irish Protestants in others, and helped lead to the failure of the rising. Its sectarian violence also alienated Protestants from the movement. From here on, Protestants would remain mainly supportive of the English Crown as their protector. The Orange societies, established in the 1790s to defend Church of Ireland interests, would reemerge as a powerful religious political force in the late nineteenth century, dedicated to the Protestant dominance of at least part of Ireland and to the continuance of political union with Britain.

The nineteenth century began with the closure of Ireland's (Protestant) Parliament. Then Anglo-Irish hegemony collapsed altogether with the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland (1869) and the return of land to the mainly Catholic peasantry (1881–1903). The period also saw the rise of Irish nationalism, which nearly all Protestants opposed. The decisive national moment came in 1885, when it became clear that the British Liberals intended to establish a parliament for Ireland that would put the majority Catholic Irish in control. At this point Protestants settled their internal disputes and set up the Unionist Party, dedicated to maintain the union of Ireland with Britain. A compromise was secured in 1920 with the partition of Ireland. Northern Ireland (six of the nine counties of Ulster) remained in the United Kingdom, whereas the rest of Ireland achieved full independence (1922). From then on until the mid-1970s, the southern (Republican) state remained predominantly Catholic, and Northern Ireland a Protestant state for a Protestant people, but with its aggrieved Catholic minority subjected to significant institutionalized discrimination.

In recent times the number of Protestants living in the southern state has declined from ten percent (1911 Census) of the population to three percent (1991 Census), or to 104,000 out of 3.5 million. In Northern Ireland the number of Protestants has decreased from sixty percent (1951 Census) to forty-six percent of its 1.6 million population (1991 Census). Compared with the other parts of the United Kingdom, Protestants in Northern Ireland retain high levels of regular church attendance (forty-five to fifty-two percent for the main churches; Northern Ireland Attitudes Survey 1992–1993), while at the same time keeping alive the tradition of cross-denominational Gospel Halls.

Protestantism has strong traditional and anti-Catholic features as well as weaker, though significant, ECUMENICAL ones. The Church of Ireland retains its position on the Protestant-Calvinist wing of Anglicanism. The Presbyterian Church in Ireland remains controlled by its more conservative people rather than its more liberal clergy. The leadership of the small METHODIST CHURCH is conservative, yet, like the two larger churches, retains benign relationships with Roman Catholics. In all three, however, probably a majority still experiences strong anti-Catholic feelings and fundamentalist tendencies. These are even more prominent in the smaller churches and sects that make up twenty percent of all northern Protestants, such as BAPTISTS, Elim Pentecostals (who originated in Northern Ireland), Christian Brethren, the Free Presbyterians of the Rev. Ian Paisley, and some independent congregations. A modified COVENANT politics is still alive, and is arguably a factor in the street politics and marching of the Orange Orders.

Ecumenical features of Protestantism are limited to a minority that often combines their commitment to reconciliation with an equally firm one to evangelicalism. They have played significant roles in the development of the peace process in Northern Ireland from the very beginning of the Troubles (1968–1998), seeking ceasefires between paramilitaries, and setting up or participating in interchurch communities (such as Corrymeela, Columbanus, and Rostrevor), where opponents have met to share experiences and prayer. A number have participated in the Inter-Church Group on Faith and Politics and in the work of ECONI (Evangelical Contribution on Northern Ireland). Integrated Catholic-Protestant schools have also emerged, most of them now supported by the state. Protestants from overseas have also contributed, notably Mennonites from the United States, and an interchurch graduate and adult education school, the Irish School of Ecumenics, has survived and developed mainly on the basis of Protestant donations from abroad as well as from within Ireland.

See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; Baptists; Calvinist Protestant; Covenant; Cromwell, Oliver; Elizabeth I; Ecumenicalism; Henry VIII; Knox, John; Methodist Church; Presbyterianism; Scotland

References and Further Reading

- Acheson, A. A History of the Church of Ireland, 1691–1996. Dublin: Columba Press/APCK, 1997.
- Cooke, D. Persecuting Zeal: A Portrait of Ian Paisley. Cork: Brandon Press, 1996.
- Holmes, F. The Presbyterian Church in Ireland: A Popular History. Dublin: Columba Press, 2000.
- McCaughey, T.P. Memory and Redemption: Church, Politics and Prophetic Theology in Ireland. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1993.
- Richardson, N., ed. A Tapestry of Beliefs: Christian Traditions in Northern Ireland. Belfast: Blackstaff Press, 1998.
- Tanner, M. Ireland's Holy Wars: The Struggle for a Nation's Soul, 1500–2000. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Website: <http://cain.ulst.ac.uk/ni/religion.htm>

JOHN FULTON

IRVING, EDWARD (1792–1834)

Presbyterian minister and founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church. Born in Annan, SCOTLAND on August 4, 1792 Irving studied mathematics at the University of Edinburgh and taught school at Haddington and briefly at Kirkcaldy before returning to Edinburgh to study theology in 1815. Four years later he accepted a call to assist THOMAS CHALMERS at St. John's in Glasgow. After his ordination in 1822 he was sent to Caledonian chapel in Hatton Garden, a shabby district of London. His magnetic personality and brilliant oratory soon attracted visitors, including George Canning, England's foremost statesman. Canning introduced Irving to members of parliament as "the most eloquent preacher I have ever heard." Thereafter, the 500-seat chapel could not accommodate the crowds. Plans were laid to build a larger church on Regent Square in a more fashionable part of the city.

Irving's fall from grace was as dramatic as his ascendancy. By the time the new church was built in 1827, he was charged with HERESY. He argued that in the Incarnation, Christ had taken on Adam's fallen nature. He was found guilty and expelled from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in 1832. Eight hundred members followed him to form what would become the first congregation of the Catholic Apostolic Church, popularly known as the Irvinites.

In the midst of his trial Irving had become interested in ESCHATOLOGY. Convinced of Christ's imminent return, Irving proclaimed that the gift of Tongues was about to be restored to the church (see TONGUES, SPEAKING IN). With it would come the restoration of the apostolic office. Several members of his church soon received this gift, although Irving did not; three who had were named apostles. Irving was recognized as an "angel," an inferior position in the emerging new church, thereby effectively removing him from power. He died two years later on December 7, 1834 in Scotland, a broken man.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Irving, Edward. Collected Writings of Edward Irving. 5 vols. London: Alexander Strahan, 1864–1865.

Secondary Sources:

Dallimore, Arnold. Forerunner of the Charismatic Movement: The Life of Edward Irving. Chicago: Moody Press, 1983.

Flegg, Columba Graham. “Gathered Under Apostles”: A Study of the Catholic Apostolic Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1992.

D.WILLIAM FAUPEL

ITALY

Historiography

The assumption that “Italians are Catholic” has deeply affected the way that historians have written about Protestantism in Italy. Ronald Keith Delph, for instance, notes Delio Cantimori’s tendency to explain the failure of Italian humanists to “go protestant” in terms of their personal Catholic piety, whereas Salvatore Caponetto notes the tendency of Italian historians to write the Valdesi (Waldensians), and thus a large part of the porous Franco-Italian borderlands, out of Italian history. Defining what “Italian” means and what content was appropriate to “Italian history” thus guided a significant proportion of postwar religious history, in the same way (as Giorgio Spini has shown) that Protestantism elsewhere was entangled in the German and Swiss national myths. This attitude to Italian Protestantism changed slowly through the 1970s and 1980s, with an increasing maturity of the Italian nationalist project leading to the rediscovery of a wider religious history.

Waldensian Origins

Typical was the attitude to the Waldensians. The “Valdesi,” fleeing a purge of heretics in FRANCE, entered the high valleys of northwestern Italy in the fourteenth century, and survived a number of attempts at extermination and suppression until after the movement identified itself with Calvinist Protestantism at the “Sinodo d’Angrogna” at Chanforan (1532). This has often been treated by historians as a Piedmontese sideshow, a view that (as Caponetto shows) is retreating in the face of mounting evidence of widespread (if often not very deep) Reformational influence in Italy. The Waldensians were not only important to Italian Protestantism because they were early (and so were to provide a continuing touchstone of identity for Italian Protestants), but because they would provide an important geographical conduit for Protestant ideas coming down from the north, and for admirers of MARTIN LUTHER fleeing the Inquisition toward Geneva. Their determined missionary push (led by Bonello and Pascale, members of John Calvin's Venerable Company) after Chanforan was halted only by the execution of their leaders (1560) and the massacre of thousands of "ultramontane" peasantry in Calabria (1561) and mass assimilation in Puglia seemingly wiped out Waldensian influence in the south. Through the period of effective inquisitorial repression (1542-ca. 1800) the Waldensians created a "second front" for the House of Savoy (so contributing to the survival of Geneva), and in the longer run, provided the inevitable experience of living reluctantly in a multireligious state that the Savoyards would take into the combined Italian monarchy in 1861. Internationally, Waldensian resistance (and experience of events such as the "Holy Massacre" of the Valtellina in 1569) also provided important "martyrological" elements, "the Israel of the Alps," for the identity of anti-Catholic elements of Protestantism. OLIVER CROMWELL intervened to stop Catholic repression in 1655, leading to the "Patents of Grace" restoring the status quo introduced by the Treaty of Cavour (1561). After a gritty, bloody guerrilla war the Valdesi were saved by entry of Vittorio Amedeo II into the (largely Protestant) League of Augsburg formed to restrain Louis XIV's French imperialism. Protestant churches would send support and agitate for international representation of their case until after World War II when the Italian Republic was reestablished as a secular, religiously tolerant state.

Catholic and Counter-Reformation

The "other reformation" in Italy increasingly coming to light relates to the infiltration of Lutheran ideals and international thought into a putative stronghold of the Counter-Reformation that, because of Italy's fractured political, economic, and cultural life, proved almost impossible to isolate from modernizing trends. Renaissance commercial expansion created business and cultural networks for Italians all over Europe, networks that provided for the movement of Protestant ideas back into Italy, and places of refuge for those with the intellectual or financial capital to move their operations out from under the gaze of the Holy Office. The flood of humanist reforming publications into Italy was fostered by the presence of sympathizers in the church (such as the "spirituali" behind the Consilium de emendanda ecclesia, 1537, which included such leaders of the Catholic Reform movement as Reginald Pole, Gasparo Contarini, Gregorio Cortese, Giacompo Sadoleto, and Federigo Fregoso), the court (particularly through the della Rovere connections of the Gonzaga family, the patronage of Vittoria Colonna, and the influence of Juan de Valdes), scholarship (Marcantonio Flaminio, for instance, or the influence of LUTHERANISM in the Florentine Academy, and the cosmopolitan student base at the University of Padua), and the arts (of which Michelangelo's Sistine Chapel conceptualization is perhaps the best documented, but not the only, example—see for instance Jacopo Pontormo). Until their comprehensive defeat at the Council of Trent, following the collapse of discussions at Regensburg, this network of reforming, often Augustinian or Erasmian, and warmly spiritual people, provided an elite readership and protection for "Lutherans" in Italy. As Pole wrote in the 1530s, "Heretics be not in all things heretics. Wherefore I will not so abhor their heresy that for the hate thereof I will fly from the truth" (Fenlon 1972:37), a sentiment he supported by providing in his see of Viterbo a temporary refuge from the persecution outside. Books and tracts by Luther, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, and the reformers filtered into the country, hand to hand, under wine bottles, wrapped in deceptive covers or anonymously under pseudonyms. Translations, paraphrases, and the rise of a vernacular press helped in the dissimulation, forcing the church to respond edition by edition and to devote enormous energies in pursuit of authors and readers—just possession of a BIBLE or works promulgating JUSTIFICATION by FAITH alone (such as the widely influential Beneficio di Cristo by Benedetto Fontanini, ca. 1543) was enough to spark prosecution. In this way Protestant THEOLOGY spread among the educated classes—merchants, nobility, and especially higher artisans—particularly where, in places such as Venice or Lucca, traditions of local political independence and suspicion of papal territorial claims blunted inquisition. In other areas, such as Sicily, divisions between (largely Spanish) rulers on the one hand and merchants and professionals on the other, provided cracks through which reforming ideas could work.

The very successes of the REFORMATION in northern Europe, however, mobilized the Habsburg coalition dominating the South, resulting directly in the Council of Trent, and the rise of a rigidly Counter-reformational pope in the Theatine, Pietro Caraffa (Paul IV). He set about cleaning house with a vengeance ("the pope seems to be intending to fill his prisons with cardinals and bishops on behalf of the Inquisition," wrote Pietro Carnesecchi) (Caponetto 1998:308), breaking the resistance of secular authorities and turning the Holy Office into an effective arm of government supervision. This sort of reactionary, communally based oppression would remain a key conditioning element for Italian religious life until the 1960s, uniting church and local magistracy in a culture of suspicion and control, particularly in the poorer south. The ultimate effectiveness of this mechanism of control depended on relationships between state and church on the governmental level, however, and so periods of close control (under the Spanish, in Naples, for instance, or under Austrian control, and later, under the concordat with the Fascist regime) varied with periods of greater liberty of religious expression (in Savoy, for instance, under d'Azeglio, or during the period after unification when the pope became known internationally as the "prisoner in the Vatican"). Book burnings, the Index, and tridentine medievalism contributed to the rising belief (held in large parts of the British Empire, for instance) that Catholicism was unsuited to modernizing, industrial societies marked by religious pluralism, a concept given scholarly respectability in MAX WEBER'S work on Protestantism and the Spirit of Capitalism. It was a conception that would make Italian Protestants ever open to international links and influences, and dubious of Catholic intentions.

Italian Protestant internationalism found its first bases in the networks of emigrés and exiles that developed from the commercial cities of Italy, in particular from Lucca and Venice. Through Celio Curione, Pietro Martire Vermigli, and Aonio Paleario, Lucca's infiltration by Erasmian thought through its widespread mercantile interests turned gradually into widespread Protestantism, particularly through the Arnolfini family and among the Augustinians at San Frediano. Having shared Tuscany's turmoil with regard to Savonarola and French invasion, Lucca was unusual in producing a coherent stream of emigrants as repression of CLERGY intensified into a systematic rooting out of nicodemist (those who outwardly conformed to Catholicism) influence. Paleario was arraigned by the Inquisition, which he called “a dagger poised against learning and the freedom of conscience.” Vermigli fled in 1542, along with the most famous Italian preacher of the day, Bernardino “Ochino” Tommasini. They were followed by an extraordinary efflux of leading laymen—the Arnolfini, Burlamacchi, Calandrini, Diodati, Micheli, Minutoli, and Turretini families, among others—who followed their commercial ties through France, Germany, Holland, and ENGLAND, before settling in and coming to play a central role in the life of Geneva and Basel. They—particularly those involved in the famed “Gran Bottega”—did well, intermarried, and their children went on to have an extraordinary impact on reformed Protestant theology and life, including defense of the rights of HUGUENOTS (Fabrizio Burlamacchi), BIBLE TRANSLATION and leadership of the Venerable Company (Giovanni Diodati), theology, and formation of the Formula Consensus (Francesco Turretini). Their wealth and “tough faith” played a significant role in allowing the survival of the “perfect school of Christ” that JOHN KNOX found in visiting John Calvin’s Geneva. In other places they joined seamlessly with the Huguenot exile, contributing pastors and leaders to such leading congregations as the French church in Threadneedle Street, London.

International Protestantism

This base in Geneva, with longstanding interests in the Waldensians, provided a base for the expansionary religious societies in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, first from Britain and then from the UNITED STATES. The BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY, as Spini has noted, saw Italy in strategic terms, and undertook to supply the Valdesi with texts in their native French. A Waldensian Bible Society was founded about 1814, the first fruits of the BFBS’s long-term commitment to Italian tract and Bible distribution. Literary EVANGELISM was backed up by the missionary societies, seeing English Methodists working in Italy from 1859, and American Methodists from 1872 (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). The two groups joined in 1946 and merged with the Valdesi in 1946 to form the Waldensian Evangelical Church (constituting, at the time of union, some 30,000 members in Italy, and 15,000 in South America). The Methodist stream (which Bouchard estimated at about 6,000 members in thirty-six churches at the beginning of the 1990s), although it produced some dynamic individuals, was thus to be more important in terms of its ecumenical contribution than in numbers of conversions.

As Giorgio Spini has noted there are very few international Protestant movements that have not produced at least marginal offspring in Italy. From 1887 the SALVATION ARMY (about forty officers, and 2,000 adherents) began operations in Rome, although its uniformed presence and British origins attracted more attention than it perhaps wanted, suffering extensively under Catholic and Fascist regimes. English BAPTISTS began MISSIONS in 1863 and were particularly successful in the Central Southern part of Italy, where they are now organized under the UCEBI (Unione cristiana evangelica battista d’Italia). In 1992 Bouchard estimated some 10,000 members and adherents, among whom the largest influence is now their connection to American Baptists, particularly the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. The swing to America is particularly evident from the 1870s, in part because of the rise of circular Italian migration and labor patterns embracing the United States as the prime option. American groups such as the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS have thus done well in Italy—presenting a total population of some 20,000 in the early 1990s, a phenomenon matched or exceeded by such groups as the Mormons (see MORMONISM) and JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

This internationalism, intrinsic to Protestantism from the 1790s, but intensified in Italy by Catholic host culture hostility often expressed through various levels of official repression, regularly made Protestants the object of suspicion. In times of hypernationalism they were considered fifth-columnists, whereas for the Catholic hierarchy they were a dagger poised at the heart of the carefully constructed social compact the popes had been building at least since the thirteenth century, or (as the forgery of the Donation of Constantine indicated) even earlier. From the sixteenth century Protestants were paralleled in Catholic and public sources with illuminism, FREEMASONRY, libertarianism, secularists, indifferentism, and every other enemy that threatened the Catholic compact. This became something of a self-fulfilling prophecy, given that Protestants did indeed pursue their hunger for religious freedom into support of Jacobin, Napoleonic, and later, Risorgimento forces. Spini, for instance, notes the persistent legend among Protestants that immediately behind the Republican bersaglieri as they burst into Rome on September 20, 1870, “came a colporteur, Luigi Ciari, with a Bible wagon pulled by a large dog who answered to the name of Pio Nono [Pius IX]” (Spini 1998:341). Political freedom inside a secular state held out the promise of religious freedom, a fact that Catholic functionaries well knew. As P.Cavalli, SJ. wrote in the review Civiltà Cattolica (April 3, 1948): “Protestants proceed from the law of liberty, Catholics from the law of truth. In the case of conflict between these two principles, truth must have supremacy, as even Protestants cannot deny.... Now, the Catholic Church, convicted of her divine prerogatives, of being the One True Church, must retain for herself alone the right of liberty, because this alone falls within the competency of the truth, and never in that of error.” The self-referential nature of majority Italian Catholicism made it, locally, and under its concordat with Mussolini's Fascist regime (1929–1945), institutionally, oppressive. The constancy of this element in Italian CULTURE has seen Italian Protestant leaders at the head of campaigns against official and unofficial religious bigotry. For this reason, Italian Protestants of all persuasions have been highly active both politically and socially, in the defense of minority rights, and the construction of orphanages, charitable institutions, schools, and the like. As Bouchard notes, this has meant that the divisions between fundamentalists (see FUNDAMENTALISM) and SOCIAL GOSPEL followers have been more muted in Italy—first, because these Protestant factions are not in contention with one another for control of the public culture, and second, because all Protestant denominations need to maintain elements of both tough biblical faith and social presence.

Twentieth-Century Pentecostalism

This has been as true of pentecostals in Italy as it has of other Protestant groups. Although it is true that (as per Stretti) “the origins of Italian Pentecostalism lie in the United States,” it is also clear from oral testimony that the same sort of scattered indigenous experience of pentecostal phenomena seen in INDIA, the United States, AUSTRALIA, and AFRICA before 1900 was also seen in Italy. Giuseppe Beretta, for instance, was converted among Baptists in Sicily in 1900, and reported being told to keep quiet about his own experiences lest he be considered demon-possessed. There was greater freedom in the diaspora. In 1890 the Chiesa Evangelica Valdese, for instance, sent Filippo Grill to Chicago to care for Italian Waldensians and the growing number of Italians gathering in Methodist and Presbyterian churches, who were prepared to convert to Protestantism once outside the restraints of their home towns. Leaders of these small groups were swept up into the AZUSA STREET REVIVAL movement from 1907, with the return of William Seymour to Chicago. These rapidly spread the message of the baptism through Italian communities throughout the world, Pietro Ottolini and Giacomo Lombardi returning to Italy to evangelize and establish communities in Liguria, Rome, and the South; Luigi Francescon, on the other hand, went on mission to South America, where he established a movement that today numbers in the millions. They were supported by less-structured returns by people from the diaspora, spreading small holiness pentecostal communities in many small towns, particularly in the South. These survived under considerable pressure, despite prohibition under fascism, and consistent oppression from the local priest or “maresciallo.”

After World War II the Christian churches of North America, into which many of the diaspora congregations had gathered, was effectively trumped by the superior international bargaining power of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and so the mainline Italian pentecostal church developed as the “Assemblee di Dio in Italia” (ADI). Although effectively founded in 1928, therefore, the national convention of 1947 is widely seen as a “second founding” of the ADI in Italy. This development reflected the ambivalence that early Italian pentecostals had with regard to formal organization, and their literalistic readings of the Scriptures. Early and regular divisions occurred over issues of organization, the consumption of blood, the wearing of veils, and consumerism, for instance. The EVANGELISM of other pentecostal and Protestant movements such as the British-based Elim churches or American Four-square (see INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOUR-SQUARE GOSPEL) also provided options for individuals dissatisfied with ADFs organized holiness emphases, as did groups such as Jehovah’s Witnesses. The tight local congregationalism of the movement, however, ensured survival and postwar growth inside a fellowship closely linked through interpersonal relationships. This has raised fundamental questions over ADI’s relationship to other Protestant works. It did not, for instance, join the Federation of Italian Protestant Churches, formed in 1967, or the Federation of Evangelical Pentecostal Churches, emerging from intercommunal ministerial conferences held since 1983, to ecumenical initiatives and to the charismatic movement. The growth of numerous independent charismatic churches in Italy through the 1980s has relativized ADI’s dominance in the field, leaving it with about half the total number of Italian pentecostal adherents. In 1999, symbolic of its institutional position as the largest of the Italian Protestant groupings (with around 950 centers constituting some 150,000 members and adherents), the ADI came to an “agreement” with the Republic “actuating” the religious liberty law of October 1988. With an independent charismatic church movement growing rapidly, the ADI has tended to retreat from engagement, out of the fear that “charismatic” churches represent less biblical, more “Catholic” options. Therefore, it tends to run parallel to rather than in leadership of Italian Protestantism, leaving it with the challenge of cultural isolation and decreasing relevance in an Italian culture that is more dynamic than at any time in the nation’s history.

Conclusion

Protestantism continues to grow in Italy, although institutionalization has proceeded rapidly in traditional denominations and in those groups that have been encapsulated by the Catholic presumptions of the culture. There is little evidence of “protestantization” as seen in other cultures (e.g., JAPAN) coming into modernity, although the creation of an “open religious market” is obviously advantageous to Italian Protestant churches. The sort of oppression, economic misery, and mass migration that created the background for Italian Protestantism over the past four centuries has retreated rapidly in the face of economic growth and European Community membership. This leaves new challenges of self-definition for Italian Protestants in the twenty-first century.

References and Further Reading

- Bouchard, Giorgio. I valdesi e l'Italia: prospettive d'una vocazione. Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1988.
- Cantimori, Delio. Eretici italiani del Cinquecento: ricerche storiche, rev. edition. Firenze, Italy: G.C.Sansoni editore nuova, 1978.
- Caponetto, Salvatore. The Protestant Reformation in Sixteenth-century Italy. Translated by Anne C.Tedeschi and John Tedeschi. Kirksville, MO: Thomas Jefferson University Press, 1998.
- Delph, Ronald K. Italian Humanism in the Early Reformation. Agostino Stevco (1497–1548). Ph.D. Diss Michigan, 1987.
- Firpo, Luigi. Scritti sulla Riforma in Italia. Napoli, Italy: Prismi, 1996.
- Menchi, Silvana Seidel. “Le Traduzioni Italiane di Lutero nella Prima Metà Del Cinquecento.” Rinascimento 2 no. 17–8 (1977/8): 31–109.
- Rochat, Giorgio. Regime fascista e chiese evangeliche: direttive e articolazioni del controllo e della repressione. Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1990.
- Spini, Giorgio. Risorgimento e protestanti, rev. edition. Milano, Italy: Il Saggiatore, 1989.
- . Studi sull' evangelismo italiano tra Otto e Novecento. Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1994.
- Stretti, Eugenio. Il Movimento Pentecostale: Le Assemblee di Dio in Italia, Presentazione di Francesco Toppi. Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1998.

Tourn, Giorgio. I valdesi: la singolare vicenda di un popolochiesa (1170–1976). Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1977.

———. Italiani e protestantesimo: un incontro impossibile? Torino, Italy: Claudiana, 1997.

MARK HUTCHINSON

ITINERACY

The term “itineracy” in Methodist usage (in its traditional and unique spelling) denotes the body of traveling preachers that “itinerate” under the supervision of a bishop who appoints them to serve particular places (or “charges”) and regulates their movement at various time intervals. If Conference is the body of Methodist preachers related to each other in time and space, itineracy is the skeleton that connects the pastors to church communities and animates the entire Methodist body. Some commentators have employed the image of itineracy as a “wheel moving within a wheel” to depict the machinelike nature of how Methodist preachers are deployed for the maintenance of existing churches, and the missional establishment of new churches.

As with many structures of ministry and POLITY in METHODISM, itineracy is rooted in Methodist origins as a missionary renewal movement within ANGLICANISM. Itineracy began with JOHN WESLEY’S own field PREACHING (from 1738 to 1791), intended to serve the growing desire of common people outside of the boundaries of the Anglican church to hear the Methodist message of assured and total CONVERSION. Moreover Wesley came to believe that other preachers who joined him in responding to this evangelical revival should be willing to itinerate not simply where they wanted to go, or even where there was need—but should rather go where they could do the most good. Over time Wesley gathered around him “traveling preachers,” or “helpers,” laypersons fully committed to the Methodist mission and Wesley’s discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). These preachers covenanted to submit to Wesley’s direction wherever and whenever they were needed, to serve “The United Societies of the People Called Methodist.” Over time these appointments took shape in “circuits.” Wesley felt that moving preachers frequently through these circuits kept the societies stimulated, and helped match the gifts of preachers to the needs of maturing Christians. Moreover itineracy was especially aimed to promote Methodist preaching deeper into Britian, “to spread scriptural holiness and reform the nation, especially the churches.” Wesley recaptured the sense of the wandering preachers in early and medieval church history—indeed calling this wandering essential to find the “wanderers from God.”

Historical Developments of the Itineracy in America

From the 1760s Methodist LAITY immigrated to the American colonies, and societies grew informally. Lay preachers converted under Wesley—such as Robert Strawbridge, Thomas Webb, and Philip Embury—began itinerating in America to establish and nurture Methodist societies. Once these societies successfully entreated Wesley to send full-time lay preachers from the British circuits from 1769, Wesley appointed superintendents to extend his AUTHORITY into America. This promoted regular iteration between the various centers of emerging American Methodism in Maryland, New York, and Philadelphia. The itinerant system became crucial to the missionary success of the movement in America, particularly because the continent's immense size required great movements of preachers across frontiers to establish connected Methodist societies.

With the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, Methodism in America became an independent church with a small cadre of ordained pastors, and no longer simply a connection of societies loosely related to Anglicanism as in Britain. FRANCIS ASBURY emerged as an important figure, who through force of his example and exhortation wove together a network of itinerant preachers (ordained and lay) across the entire Eastern seaboard. He was the first Protestant bishop to cross the Alleghenies. Although he made his endless Episcopal rounds, he faithfully met his preachers in conferences to keep order and movement among his largely young, single, and preferably celibate preaching corps. From the time of his arrival in America in 1771, Asbury insisted on stimulating his colleagues to move out from the cities. He led by example, traveling up to 270,000 miles in his ministry of forty-five years. For Asbury and the early Methodists a call to preach was a call to travel, without promise of even shelter for the night, much less a furnished parsonage in a church or "station charge." Yet a promise was made then as now: if accepted by the conference as a member, and if a pastor accepted Episcopal appointments and accountability, then a guarantee of a place to preach was offered. Both bishops Asbury and THOMAS COKE extolled the value of itineracy as reconstituting the primitive and apostolic plan of ministry.

The cost of itineracy was substantial. It successfully connected preachers with people in the far-flung communities and knit together both church and society, although attrition was high. Many preachers left the itineracy or "located," because of fatigued bodies, family stress, and the loss of earning potential during the prime of their lives. The system worked best with single preachers. Asbury regarded MARRIAGE as the prime enemy of the Methodist itinerant mission, and complained often that the DEVIL and Marriage were getting his preachers. After Asbury's death in 1816, and because of the growing wealth of Methodists, cultural and financial support increased for pastors to settle down and serve full time "station" pastorates. During the era of the CAMP MEETING (roughly 1803–1850) and the second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS), ever larger groups of Methodists and other evangelical Protestants gathered for large REVIVALS in central geographic areas. The emergence of these camp meetings meant that riding large circuits was no longer as critical to reach new converts. These factors combined so that Methodist iteration shifted in the first half of the nineteenth century toward pastors serving longer appointments in station churches, rather than the continual movement through circuits across a wide geographic area.

Examples of average lengths of itineration are instructive. When Asbury arrived in 1771, the Philadelphia and New York appointments were exchanged quarterly. During the 1770s until 1790s, preachers received new circuits on average of every six months. Asbury preferred no more than one-year appointments while he lived. Yet from 1794 to 1804, many pastors remained up to two years in a circuit, and apparently even Asbury could not prevent it. In 1804 it was stipulated that no preacher was to remain in the same appointment more than two years. This rule of thumb generally prevailed, but in the 1830s, with the growth of wealth among Methodist laity, bishops were often pressed (usually unsuccessfully) for longer appointments. The General Conference of 1844 granted that the bishop should not continue a preacher in the same appointment “more than two years in six, nor in the same city more than four years in succession.” Preferences for repeat appointments were apparently forming, and in 1856 these stricter limits were repealed. Once the southern branch (Methodist Episcopal Church South [MECS]) was established in 1845 they carried the two-year limit with them—except for New Orleans where it was felt that two years was a minimum to build up resistance to yellow fever. With an increased number of larger station churches, along with the increase of appointments to the growing national general agencies requiring specialized skills and longer tenures, pressure came to raise the overall limit for appointments in the MEC in 1864 to three years. An experiment with five-year limits was adopted in 1888, only to be repealed in 1900. On the Southern side after the CIVIL WAR, longer tenure was thought necessary for the rebuilding of the church. In 1866 a move was made to abolish limits in the MECS, but a compromise was reached with the adoption of a mandated move at four years. This four-year limit continued in southern appointments until the reunion with the MEC in 1939 formed the Methodist Church. The newly reunited Methodist Church carried no limits on itinerant appointments. Commentators have noted a direct historical relationship between the growing institutional wealth of METHODISM and the lengthening of itinerant appointments.

Disagreements among pastors with their bishops about appointments have occurred from the very beginning of Methodist history. In 1771 Asbury admonished his colleagues Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmore to leave the comforts of New York and Philadelphia to preach in the country. They complied somewhat reluctantly. Asbury was also at the center over disagreements concerning his absolute authority to make appointments. A schism on the matter developed at the first duly constituted General Conference in 1792, when Thomas O’Kelly and others walked out and formed The Republican Methodist Church. They did so on the view that preachers in a democratic country should have the right of appeal in an appointment, lest the movement smack of “popery.” Pressures toward more participation in the appointment process have thus been an important part of the American Methodist story.

The trend toward more participation in appointments has resulted in a type of localization of preachers and the marginalization of episcopal authority (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). Signs of this could be seen as early as 1830 in the major schism forming the Methodist Protestant Church, which abolished bishops and sought democratic accountability in appointmentmaking through conference-elected superintendents. Larger, richer, and more powerful congregations emerged in the late nineteenth century, which could subvert the itineration process and directly “call” their own pastors. Throughout the twentieth century, Methodist itineration has been slowly modified through increased layers of consultation between district superintendents, congregations, laity, and pastors. Itineracy has thus clearly changed with America.

Present Challenges for Itineracy

As society has become increasingly mobile, and local churches tend to lose their experienced lay leaders more frequently, there is a perceived need for more continuity in pastoral leadership. Moreover, as the administration of larger churches becomes more complex, there is a corresponding requirement for more specialized leadership. In this sense the very success of the itinerant system as an organized missional form has set up tensions within it. Along with increasing numbers of WOMEN and two-clergy couples, bishops are responding to these trends and opting in favor of longer pastoral tenures with more local consultation. Appointments made through this consultation process are indeed often more sensitive to the needs of pastors and local congregations. Yet this has limited episcopal and conference authority in some cases to appoint as Wesley did—to go not where gifts and graces of pastors are needed, but where these gifts are needed most. The consultation process has localized the ministry of Methodist pastors to a degree, and modified the itinerant system away from a missional form toward the maintenance of existing congregations.

Indeed, Methodism in its earliest period was characterized by an itineracy committed to a mission “from center to circumference,” with the only reward a new circuit and new work in the frontier. Today itineracy often appears organized to support the consolidation of congregations existing for over a century, while delivering pastors on a career track from the margins to the larger congregations existing in the city centers of America. Although the itinerant system is under stress in an age of INDIVIDUALISM, consumer choice, and employment rights, the matching of preachers to congregations is still critical. Itineracy provides a less invasive and regularized possibility to move preachers when their work is done or gifts no longer match a congregation. For those committed to it, itineracy can create stronger, more flexible, and less insular churches in the long run. However, the system requires a very high level of commitment, cooperation, and trust in the process between preachers, their families, and their churches. Bishops and superintendents must also remain flexible in their approach to appointments and concede some power to local constituencies. For itineracy to continue playing a missional role in American Methodism all parties must continue to communicate in transparent ways concerning what is at stake in their appointment consultation decisions. If mutual accountability and a missional flexibility can be maintained, then the United Methodist itineracy can continue to animate vital congregations connected in this national and international Protestant church.

See also Circuit Rider; Methodism, North America; Women Clergy

References and Further Reading

- Dunlap, E.Dale. "The United Methodist System of Itinerant Ministry." In Perspectives on American Methodism. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 415–430.
- Heitzenrater, Richard P. "Connectionalism and Itinerancy: Wesleyan Principles and Practice." In Connectionalism: Ecclesiology, Mission, and Identity, United Methodism and American Culture, edited by Russell E.Richey, Dennis M. Campbell, and William B.Lawrence. vol. 1. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1997.
- Richey, Russell E. "Itineracy in Early Methodism." In Send Me? The Itineracy in Crisis, edited by Donald E.Messer. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1991.
- , and Kenneth E.Rowe, eds. Methodist History: A Bicentennial Historical Consultation. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1985.
- Wigger, John H. "Fighting Bees: Methodist Itinerants and the Dynamics of Methodist Growth, 1770–1820." In Methodism and the Shaping of American Culture, edited by Nathan O.Hatch and John H.Wigger. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, An Imprint of Abingdon Press, 2001.

W.HARRISON DANIEL

J

JABAVU, DAVIDSON DON TENGO (1895–1959)

South African educator and writer. Davidson D.T. Jabavu was the son of John Tengo Jabavu (1859–1921), one of the most eloquent representatives of the educated African elite in SOUTH AFRICA in his generation. A Mfengu Methodist, John Tengo was South Africa's first black newspaper editor, and his paper Imva Zabontsundu reflected the outlook of those seeking African political, educational, and economic advance within a multiracial South Africa. He could irritate white opinion; the paper was closed for a time after it attacked British policy in the Anglo-Boer War in the matters of the concentration camps for Boer families and the treatment of Africans. At that time J.T.Jabavu left the Wesleyan Methodist Church in protest at its acceptance of such wartime excesses, and joined the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

Davidson Jabavu was thus born into the African elite, and in Cape Colony in 1895, where, unlike the rest of South Africa, many of the African elite had the right to vote. The theoretical equality of "civilized men of all races" did not, however, translate into equality of opportunity; and Jabavu, after his education at the Lovedale Institution of the Scottish mission, found he could progress no further in South Africa. He therefore attended the Colwyn Bay Institution in WALES, and thereafter the Universities of London and (for teacher training) Birmingham. He also took some time in the UNITED STATES before returning to South Africa as the first African staff member of the Fort Hare Native College. He assisted the academic transformation of the college as it attained its later status as a university college. His own status rose to that of professor of Latin and Bantu languages, and head of the department of African studies.

As mission thinking developed and the missionary movement became more international in outlook, especially after the formation of the International Missionary Council, Jabavu was identified as an articulate spokesman of African Christianity. There had been no such spokesman at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE at Edinburgh in 1910; but Jabavu was active at the Le Zoute Conference of 1926, which redefined the Christian mission in AFRICA, with EDUCATION as one of the major aspects of mission policy. He was also present at the meeting of the International Missionary Council itself in Jerusalem in 1928. He also made an impact, notably on the powerful Thomson Samkange, at the Southern Rhodesia Native Missionary Conference in 1931.

By this time Jabavu was a national figure for his defense of African rights. Having formed associations of farmers and teachers and a Cape Voters' Association, all representative bodies of “civilized” Africans, he founded the All African National Convention. This body, established in 1935, arose to counter moves to prevent Africans from owning land (and thus, in the Cape, gaining the vote) or selling their labor freely. For a time the Convention united a broad spectrum in opposition to the erosion of African rights, but with the rise of the Nationalists and their triumph in 1948, it faded and was eventually disbanded. The ideal of “the equality of civilized men of all races” was irrelevant in an age of apartheid. Apartheid left no room in which to exercise Jabavu’s brand of multiracial constitutional politics and African advance by means of education on a European pattern. Black opposition was now radicalized, and his form of moderate Social Christianity had little appeal. Jabavu, disillusioned with politics, concentrated thereafter on his academic work at Fort Hare, leaving to a new generation of African leaders—such as Z.K.MATTHEWS and ALBERT LUTHULI, people nurtured like himself on mission education and imbued like him with Christian social ideas—to cope with the new situation. White domination was now underpinned by an ideology claiming a Christian and Reformed inspiration, and this posed challenges of a new kind.

Jabavu’s works on the changing political situation include The Black Problem (1921) and The Segregation Fallacy and Other Papers (1928). His principal academic treatise was The Influence of English on Bantu Literature (1943). He also wrote extensively in Xhosa.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Jabavu, D.D.T. The Life of John Tengo Jabavu. Lovedale, South Africa: Lovedale Institution Press, 1933.

Secondary Sources:

Elphick, R., and R.Davenport, eds. Christianity in South Africa: A Political, Social and Cultural History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997.

Higgs, Catherine. The Ghosts of Equality: The Public Lives of DDT Jabavu of South Africa. Athens: University of Ohio Press, 1997.

Smith, E.W. The Christian Mission in Africa. London: International Missionary Council, 1926.

ANDREW F.WALLS

JACKSON, SHELDON (1834–1909)

American clergyman. Born on May 18, 1834, in Minaville, New York, Jackson was an itinerant missionary who is said to have traveled more than a million miles.

After graduating from Princeton Theological Seminary in 1858, Jackson taught Native American boys in Oklahoma, served as an army chaplain, and led a church in Minnesota, but he longed for a grander assignment. In 1869 he convinced his denomination to appoint him superintendent over a vast territory stretching from Iowa to Utah. Still restless, in 1877 he seized on a letter from an army private stationed in Alaska, who detailed that territory's degradation and begged for "a shepherd who may reclaim a mighty flock from the error of their ways." Jackson dove in, establishing churches and schools and using his connections to powerful fellow Presbyterians, including President Grover Cleveland, to fight corruption in Alaska's fledgling government.

Jackson attracted criticism for neglecting some areas of his ministry, notably the lower Rockies and work with whites, to focus on native Alaskans. He also found himself in the middle of an emerging church-state debate as disgruntled Alaskan officials questioned his dual role as missionary and, from 1885, educational agent for the federal government. Embattled, Jackson lost influence, but his legacy persists through such edifices as Sheldon Jackson College in Sitka, Alaska. A friend once said of Jackson that he could not resist "running ahead of the crowd, climbing a hill, scaling a mountain, following a valley, opening a schoolhouse...constantly searching out the land." Jackson died May 2, 1909, in Asheville, North Carolina.

See also Church and State, Overview; Missions, North American; Native Americans; Chaplaincy

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Jackson, Sheldon. Alaska, and Missions on the North Pacific Coast. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1880.

Secondary Source:

Bender, Norman J. Winning the West for Christ. Albuquerque, NM: University of New Mexico Press, 1996.

ELESHA COFFMAN

JAMES, WILLIAM (1842–1910)

American psychologist and philosopher. James was born January 11, 1842, in New York City, the first child of Mary Robertson Walsh and Henry James, Sr., and elder brother of novelist Henry James and diarist Alice James. James's father, a Presbyterian, studied for two years at Princeton Theological Seminary (1835–1837). Frustrated with orthodox CALVINISM and the church, and funded by his modest inheritance, Henry Sr. embarked on an eclectic career as a writer and lecturer of minor repute on religious and social subjects, influenced by EMANUEL SWEDENBORG and Charles Fourier.

Due to his father's liberal conception of individual development, William received an uncommon education at home and, during adolescence, in various European schools. After exploring a vocation as a painter, he enrolled at the Lawrence Scientific School at Harvard, studying chemistry, then comparative anatomy and physiology, then medicine; his sole earned degree of M.D. was conferred in 1869, though he never practiced. James began lecturing on physiology at Harvard in 1873, and spent his career there. He offered the first course in psychology proper in the United States in 1876, and set up one of the first two experimental psychology laboratories in America. In 1880 he was formally appointed in philosophy. He continued to teach in both fields until his retirement in 1907.

Works and Interests

James's intellectual contributions were manifold, spanning psychology, moral philosophy, religion, epistemology, and metaphysics, in addition to addressing public issues of his day such as anti-imperialism. He also had an enduring, if skeptical, interest in parapsychology. His writings exhibit an exceptional style—enlivened by image and metaphor—that is unparalleled; he is still one of America's leading persons of letters. The Principles of Psychology (1890) became an immediate classic for its comprehensive, engaging presentation of the then-new field, as well as its introduction of "the stream of consciousness." The Will to Believe and Other Essays in Philosophy (1897) established James in moral and religious philosophy with its title essay, although the book is much wider in scope. The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902) was and remains James's most widely read text, focusing on first-person accounts of religion and their fruits, effectively launching (albeit inadvertently) the study of mysticism and contributing to the psychology of religion. James's innovations in metaphysics are forwarded within the posthumously published Essays in Radical Empiricism (ed. Perry, 1912), which date from 1904–1905 and delineate his notion of “pure experience.” Pragmatism (1907) popularized the theories of meaning and truth known by that name, as well as developed James's philosophy of religion, which is further advanced in A Pluralistic Universe (1909), a defense of “radical empiricism” against rationalism. The Meaning of Truth (1909), James's last completed essay collection, revisits pragmatic epistemology.

Trained as a man of science in a scientific age and committed to empiricism, James nonetheless continuously broached religious topics; indeed he is noteworthy for arguing that philosophies and worldviews must be judged by their ability, among other criteria, to account for and accommodate human beings' religious concerns. Not a member of any particular religious community, James saw himself as developing out of the tradition of liberal New England Protestantism (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). His own perspectives on religion, although routinely unorthodox, resonate with this lineage: he asserts the primacy of the will among other human faculties and emphasizes conduct and action in his psychology; he attends to individual experience, and contends that defensible knowledge comes by attention to fruits, not roots; he presumes the importance of understanding CONVERSION for getting to the bottom of what is distinctively religious; he understands God (or the divine) as sharing personality (the possession of interests) with us; and he justifies holding some beliefs ahead of evidence for them, within certain constraints.

This “will to believe” (or “right to believe”) doctrine is one of his most celebrated and enduring ideas. Focusing on cases demanding decision or action in which the stakes are momentous and the opportunity unrepeatable, James defends the value and rationality of logically noncontradictory belief as well as the potential efficacy of such belief in determining future facts. The “faith ladder” of reasoning that James constructs from this becomes crucial in his justifications of religious hypotheses and philosophical viewpoints, and responsive to human needs.

James's views on religion and the divine were not static through his career. His work from the 1880s through 1900 assumes a dualistic theism, specifying God as an independent “deep power” that shares in some intimate sense the better of our interests, and that may make for righteousness. From a moral perspective, the supposition of God enhances the claims we make on ourselves, opening out the infinite perspective and ensuring both the maintenance of our ideals and a maximal appeal to our moral energies. Varieties proves transitional for James's theism, interrogating the apparently active effects of the divine on individuals, and moving toward metaphysical questions. Working from empirical evidence, James seeks to assess the value of religious experience for humans and the potential for verifying the content of religious claims. His conclusions are stronger on the former than the latter, although he does suggest that evidence supports the plausibility of basic religious claims concerning the divine. In Varieties James extends his earlier assumption of supernaturalism, but specifies it as “piecemeal,” meaning that God's power and scope may be finite. This supports James's meliorism, the view that our voluntary efforts may be critical to the making of righteousness in conjunction with those of the divine. James also characterizes the divine as a “wider self through which saving experiences come,” rather than the radically transcendent being of traditional theism, opening the door to both a real pluralism with regard to God(s) and a nonreductive psychodynamic account of religious experience through subliminal consciousness. After 1903 James modified his position further in connection with his developing radically empiricist metaphysics, referring to God no longer as a supernatural but rather a “superhuman” power. In his later works he emphasized the sociality and collaborative character of divine-human relations as understood from an empirical perspective, and developed his notion of experience into a panpsychical conception of all reality—natural, human, and divine. This later position, although not logically coercive for belief, is nonetheless presented as compelling because of its compatibility with commonsense religious belief and its consistency with the plural demands of our theoretical, moral, aesthetic, and practical rationalities.

References and Further Reading

- Lambert, David C. William James and the Metaphysics of Experience. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Levinson, Henry Samuel. The Religious Investigations of William James. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1981.
- Perry, Ralph Barton. The Thought and Character of William James. 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Co., 1935.
- Putnam, Ruth Anna, ed. The Cambridge Companion to William James. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Simon, Linda. Genuine Reality: A Life of William James. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1998.

DAVID C.LAMBERTH

JAPAN

Protestant Beginnings

Japan's first experience with Christianity took place during the so-called Christian century that extended from the middle of the sixteenth century to just before the middle of the seventeenth. During these years Portuguese and Spanish Catholic missionaries raised a Christian community of nearly half a million people in a CULTURE that was already technically advanced and literate. However, for political reasons, the Tokugawa shogunate, which ruled Japan from 1603 to 1868, eradicated Christianity. In the late 1630s the shogunate felt so threatened by Christianity that it adopted a policy of national seclusion, which closed Japan to almost all foreign contact. Only a small underground sect, the Kakure Kirishitan (hidden Christians) in the Nagasaki region, was able to preserve their religion in secret. During the Tokugawa era, anti-Christian thought became both ingrained and broad based because attacks on Christianity were backed up by the prestige of Japanese TRADITION, by traditional thought that was intimately connected with established religion, and through the use of arguments for the defense of the fatherland and of Japanese religion. Various anti-Christian arguments with strong xenophobic undertones or spy conspiracy theories were put forward to justify its prohibition. These would resurface after 1859 in the face of the new Christian challenge brought by Protestant missionaries.

During the early nineteenth century Protestant missionaries had accompanied Western trade expansion into the Pacific and East Asia. In 1837 missionaries were on board the Morrison during its unsuccessful attempt to open American trade relations with Japan. In 1846 Bernard Bettelheim started missionary work at Naha, Okinawa. In 1853 the arrival of the United States squadron under Commodore Matthew C.Perry in Uruga Bay rendered useless the Japanese policy of national seclusion. However, it was not until the 1858 Harris Treaty, which opened commercial relations between the UNITED STATES and Japan and also allowed religious establishments, that the possibility of missionary residence in the treaty ports appeared. In 1859 the first resident American Protestant missionaries landed, including the Episcopalian Channing M.Williams; the Dutch Reformed missionaries, Guido F. Verbeck and R.S.Brown; the Presbyterian medical doctor, James C.Hepburn; and the Baptist Jonathan Goble, all of whom were destined to become famous. Prohibited from propagating the Gospel to the Japanese, these first missionaries devoted their energies to language study, translation of the Gospels (see BIBLE TRANSLATION), and to the teaching of English in government schools, or, in the case of Hepburn, medical work. The opening of the American CIVIL WAR in 1861 retarded the growth of the missionary movement. Indeed before 1870 there were only some fifteen Protestant missionaries in Japan.

Understandably, during the 1860s very few Japanese became Protestant converts. Some like the Japanese Sam Patch, a shipwrecked sailor, or Nijima Jō, the founder of what became Dōshisha University in Kyoto, who had illegally left Japan to study overseas, were introduced to Christianity outside of Japan. In Japan itself converts were mostly Japanese language teachers, missionary servants, or young pupils at schools where missionaries taught. Among missionary achievements, there was the 1867 publication of Hepburn's superlative English-Japanese dictionary, and the opening of the first coeducational school in Japan by Mrs. Clara Hepburn.

Meiji Protestantism 1868–1912

The downfall of the Tokugawa shogunate with the 1868 Meiji Restoration brought no change in policy toward Christianity. The new Meiji government was loath to give ground to the Western powers on the issue of religious TOLERATION. It stood firm during its first major diplomatic crisis with the Western powers over its persecution of the Urakami Christians near Nagasaki in 1868–1869. In 1872 the Yokohama Band, the name given to the first major group of converts, formed the first Protestant church in Japan, the nondenominational Yokohama Kirisuto Kōkai, with James Ballagh, a Reformed missionary, as its pastor. Among its members were such famous Christians as Uemura Masahisa, Ibuka Kajinosuke, and Honda Yōi-chi. The Yokohama Band would play a crucial role in the spread of Protestantism by working as language teachers, evangelists, and helpers to missionaries. Later, many became ordained ministers.

Government attitudes toward religion were important to future Protestant growth. From 1868 onwards the government saw the importance of using autochthonous quasi-religious rituals and ceremonies to reinforce its power and control, and in helping to legitimize the modernization of the Japanese monarchy through linking the present with the mythical past. In 1873, at the instigation of the Iwakura Embassy, then visiting North America and Europe, the proscription edicts against Christianity were removed from public view. This was interpreted by Western missionaries as allowing the open propagation of the Gospel among Japanese, and led to a wide range of European and North American societies sending missionaries to Japan (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). Nevertheless, Christianity still remained officially banned, and the government lent support to Buddhist sects to counter its spread. In the late 1870s Christianity faced new evolutionary arguments imported from the West in addition to the traditional ones available to the opponents of Christianity (see DARWINISM). In the late 1880s Buddhist scholars began to attack Christianity on the grounds that Buddhist theology was superior to Christian THEOLOGY. In the 1889 Meiji Constitution religious freedom was constitutionally guaranteed, although its meaning still had to be defined. This was especially true in terms of church-state relations at the governmental and bureaucratic levels, but also applied to issues surrounding the relationship between Japanese NATIONALISM and patriotism and Christian faith at the personal level. To the government, religious freedom came to mean that the role of religion in society was to serve the interests of the state, and it was prepared to act to ensure that religious freedom did not compromise those interests, particularly in education.

During the 1870s the Protestant movement experienced considerable growth. Convert bands coalesced around missionaries or Western lay Christians teaching in new schools of Western Studies in the treaty ports, and also in provincial towns and cities. Protestant bands were formed in Shizuoka, Hirosaki, Niigata, Osaka, Kumamoto, and Sapporo, as well as in the Tokyo area in Tsukiji, Shiba, and Koishikawa. These Christian bands developed along skeins of contact, friendship, family relations, and, in rural areas, family influence and economic power. The Kumamoto Band was particularly important because many future leaders of the Kumiai Kyōkai (Congregational Church) were members, including Kozaki Hiromichi, Ebina Danjō, and Yokoi Tokio. Uchimura Kanzo, the founder of the Non-Church Movement (Mukyōdai) was a member of the Sapporo Band, as was Nitobe Inazō, the author and educationalist. A large percentage of the early converts were ex-samurai attracted to Protestantism through the educational work of missionaries and the influence of leading intellectuals and educators like Nakamura Masanao, the translator of John Stuart Mill's On Liberty, and Tsuda Sen, an agricultural expert. Personal loyalty to an outstanding leader, Japanese or missionary, provided a common pattern in Christian CONVERSION.

There was an assumption among early Protestants that Christianity was the basis of Western civilization and that Japan must become a Christian nation if it wished to be successful in adopting Western technology. Yamaji Aizan, an early historian of Meiji Protestantism, argued that samurai on the losing side in the Restoration turned to Christianity in an effort to regain lost status. However, conversion was not restricted to ex-Tokugawa samurai, and many converts, particularly in rural areas, were not samurai. Although Christian ideas were introduced into Japan through Chinese-language sources as well as through English-language and Western studies, the desire to acquire new knowledge to equip themselves better to changing times was common to most converts regardless of class.

The student population in the major cities became a prime target of missionary efforts and great emphasis was placed on educational work. During the 1870s and 1880s the mission school forerunners of Dōshisha University (Congregational) in Kyoto, and, in Tokyo, Aoyama Gakuin University (Methodist), Meiji Gakuin University (Presbyterian/Reformed), and Rikkyō University (Anglican) were established as missionaries strove to cater to the great demand for Western knowledge. During the same years schools for girls were founded, including the Ferris Joshi Gakkō (Reformed) in Yokohama and the Tōyō Eiwa Jo Gakkō (Methodist) in Tokyo. Mission schools for girls made a vital contribution to the development of women's education. A vast network of Christian schools grew through the early twentieth century, reaching an important milestone with the postwar foundation of the International Christian University in Tokyo.

During the Meiji period Protestantism also exerted a significant influence on emerging popular movements for social and political change. Protestants were active in the Popular Rights Movement of the 1880s, and a decade later Christians were among the leaders of the first major environmental protest over the pollution caused by the Ashio Copper Mine. Others like Tokutomi Sohō were active in journalism, and Tokutomi Roka and Arishima Takeo were important literary figures. A number of the first leaders of the Japanese socialist and labor movements were Protestants or influenced by Christianity.

Protestant Developments (1912–1931)

The Achilles' heel of Japanese Christians was the doubt that was cast in the minds of non-Christian Japanese about their loyalty to Japan and even their Japaneseness after they became Christians. The desire of Christians to prove themselves as loyal was expressed in broad support for Japanese imperialism and overseas expansion. After the Sino-Japanese War of 1894, Japanese missionary work began in Taiwan, KOREA, Manchuria, Singapore, and North America. By 1912 the desire for an independent Christianity in Japan was developing toward the creation of a Japanese Christianity (Nipponteki Kirisutokyō) distinct from that Christianity propagated by Western missionaries. There was also a strong desire among Protestants for Christianity to be recognized along with Shinto and Buddhism as one of the three major religions of Japan.

During the 1910s and early 1920s Protestants, like Suzuki Bunji, played an important role in the embryonic trade union movement. Yoshino Sakuzō, a Tokyo Imperial University professor, was one of the leading opinion makers in the political movement for democracy and universal suffrage. Protestant influence was also evident in the early development of both rural and urban movements, including the initial organization of the tenant-farmer association and also in the Zenkoku Suiheisha, an organization for the outcaste class. However, these activities met with considerable hostility from church leaders who did not wish Christianity to be seen as opposing the status quo. As a result, many Christian political and social activists either abandoned their Christian beliefs or moderated their political and social views. Missionaries also made important pioneering contributions to the development of social welfare work in the Tokyo slums, in the care of lepers, in opening schools for the blind and sanatoria for tuberculosis victims, and in prison work.

In 1922 the ecumenical movement in Japan reached a milestone with the formation of the National Christian Council (NCC) (see ECUMENISM). The NCC included most Protestant denominations, Christian schools, and social institutions. Although its actual power over individual denominations was limited to moral persuasion, the NCC did play an important role in coordinating the cooperative endeavors of the Protestant movement, including church union. It did much to help in supervising relief measures for Christian churches after the 1923 Great Kantō Earthquake, and, at the international level, presented reasoned Christian protests against the United States Congress's 1924 Anti-Immigration Bill. Increasingly the NCC also assumed the duty of representing the Protestant movement in its dealings with the government. Furthermore, it was deeply involved in supporting evangelistic initiatives. The most significant was the Kingdom of God movement begun in 1929. During the first half of the 1930s this movement's impact on the direction of the evangelistic efforts of both Japanese Christians and Western missionaries cannot be overestimated. Under the leadership of KAGAWA TOYOHICO it was the largest interdenominational evangelistic endeavor in Japanese Christian history, and had the support of all the major Protestant groups and the missionary movement. The connection between this united evangelistic effort and the growing movement toward church union in the early 1930s also needs to be stressed. By the early 1930s the Protestant movement had some 300,000 adherents.

The Dark Age (1931–1945)

The years from 1931 to 1945 were a dark age in Japanese religious history, reminiscent of the witch hunts of medieval Europe. Religious groups were callously persecuted, especially new religions like Ōmo-tokyō, but also some Christian groups including the Holiness Church, PLYMOUTH BRETHERN, the SEVENTHDAY ADVENTISTS, the SALVATION ARMY, and the Nihon Seikōkai (the Japanese Anglican Church) because the authorities thought they held heterodox ideas or were too closely identified with foreign countries. During the early 1930s the Shrine Question—that is, the participation of Christians in state-sponsored Shinto ceremonies—emerged as a major problem for Christians because it touched the sensitive topic of their loyalty, patriotism, and attitude toward the emperor, as well as the issue of freedom of religion and the national Shinto system. To maintain the façade of freedom of religion, the government proclaimed that the ceremonies at state Shinto shrines were exercises in civil religion and beyond the control of religious sects. Protestants in Japan accepted this view, but those in Korea or Taiwan did not—with tragic consequences. The impact of the Shrine Question was particularly felt in Christian schools, which were already being forced to get rid of their foreign teachers and connections. During the late 1930s the nature of Japanese Christianity, under pressure from ultranationalism and emperor-centered militarism (tennōsei), changed to be a new nationalistic religion not only distinct from Western Christianity but also increasingly devoid of Western influences.

After the opening of the Sino-Japanese War in 1937, the government pressed for the union of religious groups, including Protestant denominations, to enhance its control. The Religious Organizations Law came into effect in early 1940. By late 1940 it was evident that the government intended to combine all Protestant denominations into a single church. During this time virtually all Western missionaries decided to withdraw from Japan. In December 1941 the union Protestant Church, the Nihon Kirisutokyōdan (the United Church of Christ in Japan), received government recognition. Among the major Protestant denominations, only a rump of the Nihon Seikōkai chose to stay outside the union church, and lost its standing as a religious organization. Although church union took place only because of government pressure, it is also true that the government was able to exploit the genuine desire of many Protestant leaders for Protestant union. Government demands for church union and for Christian participation in the national spiritual mobilization in support of Japan's war effort resonated with long-held Christian hopes not only for church union but also for leadership of the Protestant movement in East Asia. For the most part Christian leaders were both willing, even enthusiastic, to throw their support behind the war effort because they were all sincere nationalists. During the Pacific War all Protestants suffered great hardships, and some were persecuted and imprisoned, but Christianity survived.

Postwar Protestantism

A new era in Japanese Christian history opened with the end of World War II in East Asia in 1945 and the beginning of the Allied occupation of Japan. The surrender of Japan brought about an end to tennosei and opened the way for a broader range of beliefs and practices under a new postwar constitution that guaranteed complete religious freedom. The occupation years between 1945 and 1951 saw a Christian boom and rapid growth. Although the Nihon Kirisutokyōdan remained the largest Protestant denomination, a number of Protestant groups left the union church to reform their own churches, including the Nihon Seikōkai and various Reformed and Presbyterian groups. Despite the plethora of Protestant denominations, the Protestant movement still faced great challenges. Some of these related to the internal character of the church rather than external conditions. During the 1950s and 1960s the question of the church's wartime responsibilities created internal tensions. Likewise the Western image of the Protestant church and its continued reliance on Western Christian help caused the church to be prone to swings in Japanese public opinion about the United States. In the 1970s and 1980s the identification with the Western approach to spirituality meant that the Protestant movement was not in a position to capitalize on the new religiosity among Japanese seen in the popularity of new religions. Although Japanese Protestants have played an important role in campaigns against the renationalization of the Yasukuni Shrine, against the censorship of textbooks, and for world peace, the church has difficulties in attracting young people. At the millennium, although Christian-founded universities play an important role in Japanese higher education, the number of Christians among their faculties has steadily declined and some denominations suffer from a shortage of candidates for the ministry.

References and Further Reading

- Breen, John, and Mark Williams, eds. Japan and Christianity: Impacts and Responses. London: Macmillan Press, 1995.
- Dohi, Akio. Nihon Purotesutanto Kirisutokyōshi (A History of Protestant Christianity in Japan). Tokyo: Shinkyō Shuppansha, 1982.
- Dōshisha Daigaku Jinbun Kagaku Kenkyūjo. Nihon no Purotesutanto shokyōkai no kenkyū (Studies on Various Japanese Protestant Churches). Tokyo: Kyōbunkan, 1997.
- Drummond, Richard Henry. A History of Christianity in Japan. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1971.

- Ion, A.Hamish. The Cross and the Rising Sun: The British Protestant Missionary Movement in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan, 1931–1945. Waterloo, Canada: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1993.
- . The Cross in the Dark Valley: The Canadian Protestant Missionary Movement in the Japanese Empire, 1931–1945. Waterloo, Canada: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1999.
- Ohama, Tetsuya. Meiji Kirisutokyō kyōkaishi no kenkyū (Studies in the History of Meiji Christianity). Tokyo: Yoshikawa Kōbunkan, 1979.
- Powles, Cyril Hamilton. Victorian Missionaries in Meiji Japan: The Shiba Sect 1873–1900. Toronto, Canada: University of Toronto/York University Joint Center on Modern East Asia, 1987.
- Saba, Wataru, ed. Uemura Masahisa to sono jidai (The Life and Times of Uemura Masahisa). 8 vols. Tokyo: Kyōbunkan, 1937–1941.
- Sumiya, Mikio. Nihon no shakai shisō: kindai to Kirisutokyō (Social Thought in Japan: Modernization and Christianity). Tokyo: Tokyo Daigaku Shuppankai, 1968.
- Yamaji, Aizan. Essays on the Modern Japanese Church: Christianity in Meiji Japan. Translated by Graham Squires with introductory essays by Graham Squires and A.Hamish Ion. Ann Arbor: Center for Japanese Studies, University of Michigan, 1999.

A.HAMISH ION

JEFFERSON, THOMAS (1743–1826)

Third president of the United States and eminent figure of the American ENLIGHTENMENT. Jefferson defended “pure” religion, but often attacked the major institutional manifestations of Protestantism in America. He especially targeted those churches that allied themselves with the power of the state, particularly the ANGLICANISM of his homeland of Virginia and the CONGREGATIONALISM of New England. In the first instance he moved in the earliest days of the American Revolution to disestablish the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and to enlist Virginians in a struggle for complete religious liberty. In the latter instance, he had less direct impact on the New England establishment, though his enmity toward it never weakened. By helping to destroy the Federalist Party, he removed the power base of a politicized Congregationalism.

Jefferson and Religious Liberty

Jefferson is readily and correctly identified as a passionate promoter of religious liberty. With his younger colleague, JAMES MADISON (1749–1812), he did all that he could to see that Virginia cleansed itself of all lingering taints of an alliance between church and state. In fighting a war against ENGLAND, few would defend the notion of continued official support for the Church of England. To some, however, this did not mean an abrupt, and perhaps even brutal, severing of all ties between the civil and the ecclesiastical orders. Patrick Henry, for example, thought it made good sense to establish Christianity in general, while conceding that one could not show any special favoritism to England’s national church. To Madison and Jefferson, however, this compromise represented a betrayal of the spirit of liberty for which the patriots had fought from 1776 to 1783. To maintain any kind of religious establishment would, in Madison’s words, warn the refugee “to seek some other haven,” for America would no longer be an asylum “to the persecuted and oppressed of every nation and religion.”

Though Jefferson had composed a bill for establishing religious freedom in Virginia as early as 1777, it took a reluctant legislature almost a decade to declare “that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever.” On the contrary, “all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion.” When at last the bill became law in 1786, Jefferson took great satisfaction that his own state housed “the first legislature who has had the courage to declare that the reason of man may be trusted with the formation of his own opinions.” In Paris, at the time his bill passed, Jefferson like a proud father saw it translated into French and Italian and “sent to most of the courts of Europe.” England in particular, but much of Europe in general, thought that the newly independent states would soon collapse into anarchy, but this Statute for Establishing Religious Freedom was the best evidence, Jefferson asserted, that America was moving steadily toward greater enlightenment, not giving way to lawlessness and chaos.

Jefferson saw Virginia’s bold step as a giant one, but insufficient by itself, for the new nation as a whole had to adopt a similar stance. When Madison happily wrote to Jefferson in Paris at the end of 1787 that delegates in Philadelphia had drawn up an impressive constitution, Jefferson replied with compliments, but immediately asked about the guarantees for religious liberty and other civil freedoms. The result of his widely shared concern was, of course, a Bill of Rights: the first ten amendments to the Constitution adopted in 1791. The very first of those specified that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” As president, Jefferson in 1802 put his own powerful spin on those words by declaring in a public letter that Congress had thus erected “a wall of separation between church and state.”

In his two terms as president, as well as in the nearly two decades of his retirement, Jefferson continued to worry about any and all religion allied with or seeking to exercise political power. He worried about the Congregational clergy who had gotten a “smell of union between church and state,” and when, in 1818, Connecticut finally broke its ties with the church, Jefferson immediately wrote to John Adams of his delight that “this den of the priesthood is at length broken up, and that a protestant popedom is no longer to disgrace the American history and character.” When later he founded the first “truly modern” university, the University of Virginia, he set up every safeguard to keep sectarian influences out of his school. By the 1820s it was the Presbyterians, not the Anglicans (now identified as Episcopalians), who sought to frustrate his plans. In so doing, they won Jefferson’s harsh condemnation as “the most intolerant of all sects, the most tyrannical, and ambitious.” Such strong language could suggest to many that Jefferson was not only against religious power, but that he was against religion itself.

Jefferson and “Pure” Religion

This, however, was clearly not the case. Jefferson condemned dogmatism and what he called scholastic subtleties. He found Platonism or Neoplatonism the enemy of the simple religion of Jesus, and of CALVINISM he wrote that it “has introduced into the Christian religion more new absurdities than its leader had purged it of old ones.” Priests and preachers took refuge in mysteries and miracles, avoiding the “weightier matters of the law” such as good works and simple charity. The gospel that Jesus proclaimed, Jefferson argued, was simple enough for any peasant to understand, but professional theologians were determined to make it difficult and obscure, as they spread darkness rather than light. “The metaphysical insanities of Athanasius, of Loyola, and of Calvin,” Jefferson concluded, “are to my understanding mere relapses into polytheism, differing from paganism only by being more unintelligible.”

But was it not possible to rescue the pure religion of Jesus? Inspired by scientist and educator Joseph Priestley (1733–1804) and others, Jefferson gave much energy and much thought to doing just that. In writing “The Philosophy of Jesus,” in providing an outline of a revised “Christian system,” and in compiling what came to be called the “Jefferson Bible,” the nation’s third president saw his time as ripe for completing the Reformation begun in the sixteenth century. Jefferson believed that reason and religion must be allies, not enemies, and that by rejecting mysteries and irrational dogmas it was possible—in the age of Enlightenment—to recapture a purified Christianity: “the most sublime and benevolent code of morals which has ever been offered to mankind.”

See also Church and State, Overview; Deism; Enlightenment; First Amendment; Priestly, Joseph.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Jefferson, Thomas. Writings. Edited by Merrill D. Peterson. New York: Library of America, 1984.

Secondary Sources:

Adams, Dickinson W., ed. Jefferson’s Extracts from the Gospels. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1983.

Gaustad, Edwin S. Sworn on the Altar of God: A Religious Biography of Thomas Jefferson. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996.

Peterson, Merrill D., and Robert C. Vaughan. The Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom: Its Evolution and Consequences in American History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.

EDWIN S. GAUSTAD

JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES

Jehovah's Witnesses began in the last quarter of the nineteenth century as a small Adventist sect (see SECTARIANISM) of Bible students under the leadership of CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL. They adopted the name "Jehovah's Witnesses" in 1931 to emphasize their distinctive beliefs that the proper translation of the personal name of God in Hebrew Scriptures is "Jehovah" (Exodus 3:15) and that the correct name for believers is "witnesses" (Isaiah 43:10; Acts 1:8). Dedicated to the fervent proclamation of the belief that Jesus Christ will soon return to defeat Satan, the adversary of God's righteous rule, in the battle of Har-magedon and establish the millennial paradise on earth, Jehovah's Witnesses have grown to an active membership of nearly six million in 234 countries. Like other sectarian movements in American Protestantism, such as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (MORMONS) and CHRISTIAN SCIENCE, the Jehovah's Witnesses regard their community and its teachings as the restoration of true Christianity from the apostasy of all other churches. Jehovah's Witnesses claim neither a new revelation nor an inspired founder, but insist that they derive their THEOLOGY and practices solely from a literal interpretation of the BIBLE and that they strictly follow the example of the first-century apostles. In imitation of their zeal, Jehovah's Witnesses devote themselves to distributing literature, conducting Bible classes, attending frequent congregational meetings, and closely regulating their personal and family lives by a rigorous moral code. Jehovah's Witnesses acknowledge the theocratic authority of the Governing Body and the administrative offices of the Watchtower Society.

Jehovah's Witnesses have gained adherents across the globe; over eighty percent live outside the United States, with concentrations in LATIN AMERICA and AFRICA. Many people are attracted by the vision of the KINGDOM OF GOD as paradise on earth, harmoniously integrating all ethnic groups in a perfect social order, free from prejudice and injustice, where war is unknown, lost loved ones are reunited with their families, and every individual experiences supreme happiness.

Origins

The nineteenth century in America was marked by religious enthusiasm, including waves of revivalism, proliferation of utopian groups, and the rise of Adventism (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM). Despite the failed prophecy of WILLIAM MILLER (founder of the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH) that the world would end in 1844, interpretations of biblical ESCHATOLOGY, especially in the books of Daniel and Revelation, remained popular among American Christians. The detailed chronologies inspired by the DIS-PENSATIONALISM of JOHN NELSON DARBY (British founder of the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN), and the elaborate calculations of the Adventists, heightened expectations that the study of biblical prophecy would disclose the future by deciphering the code of divine revelation. Among those excited by that prospect was Russell.

Russell was born into the middle-class home of a clothing store owner in Allegheny, Pennsylvania, in 1852 and raised in the tradition of PRESBYTERIANISM. However, as a teenager he became dissatisfied—like others alert to the spiritual possibilities of self-reliance—with the Calvinist doctrines of original sin, eternal hell, and double PREDESTINATION. He happened into the evening service of an Adventist Church and became newly convinced of the divine inspiration of the Bible. Despite the distractions of the family business from his formal education, Russell began his own earnest study of the Scriptures, assisted by several Adventist associates. From George Storrs, editor of Bible Examiner, Russell accepted the doctrine that the soul dies with the body and that immortality is a divine gift for faithful believers only. The unrighteous faced not eternal punishment, but annihilation. Russell learned from Nelson H. Barbour, editor of the Adventist periodical Herald of the Morning, that the invisible “presence” of Christ had already occurred in 1874, inaugurating a forty-year “harvest” of true Christians. The return of Christ, then, was a spiritual event intended not to destroy the inhabitants of earth but to bless them. Russell defended this interpretation in a pamphlet, entitled The Object and Manner of Our Lord’s Return, published in 1877. Russell never adopted the SABBATARIANISM of the Adventists, however, and soon broke with Barbour over the latter’s rejection of the substitutionary value of Christ’s death, a point Russell regarded as central to the vindication of God’s justice in the ATONEMENT.

In 1879 Russell began publishing his own monthly journal, Zion’s Watch Tower and Herald of Christ’s Presence. By 1880 Russell felt the need to draw groups of his readers into classes for study and fellowship. He regarded these small congregations as the beginning of the gathering of the true “body of Christ,” whose responsibility was to fulfill the role of the “faithful and discreet slave” who supplies spiritual food to the rest of the household of faith, according to Jesus’s parable in Matthew 24:45–47. In 1881 he declared that the “faithful and discreet slave” represented the collective ministry of those anointed by God’s “holy spirit” to share in messianic authority. In 1884 Russell formed Zion’s Watch Tower Tract Society to unify the scattered congregations of Bible students. They held their first convention in Allegheny in 1891.

Russell traveled constantly, wrote voluminously, and lectured with tireless energy. His was a dramatic presence, tall, with flowing beard, and histrionic gestures. His followers admired his dedication and modesty and gave him the honorific title “Pastor.” Russell’s central passion was “publishing” his ideas in every possible form: itinerant preaching; teaching classes; contributing to newspapers and magazines (in 1913 Russell’s sermons reached fifteen million readers); and writing a small library of books, periodicals, and tracts over a period of thirty-seven years. He encouraged his students to serve as colporteurs, going door to door with literature, at one time even accompanied by phonographs or dioramas. One popular production, “Photo-Drama of Creation,” using motion pictures and slides synchronized with sound, had been shown to over nine million viewers in North America, Europe, and Australia by the end of 1914.

In 1886 Russell began an ambitious series of books titled Millennial Dawn, with the first volume called The Divine Plan of the Ages. He was convinced that he had discerned God’s intention in history through the study of prophetic Scriptures. The key was his calculation that the “seven times” of Daniel 4:16 referred to the period of foreign domination over Israel (Luke 21:24), begun in 607 B.C. and destined to end in A.D. 1914 with the coming of the kingdom. When World War I began, some “Russellites” were certain they would be taken immediately into heaven. By the end of 1915, however, Russell explained that the defeat of the Ottoman Empire signaled only the beginning of the end. He taught that the return of Christ would not occur suddenly, but would extend over “a period of presence, as was the first advent.” He translated the Greek term parousia as “presence,” rather than “coming,” and explained the arrival of the kingdom as a gradual “dawning.” In the meanwhile Christ was calling those chosen to reign with him in heaven, including Russell and the Bible students, as “spiritual Israel.”

In 1909 Russell moved the headquarters of his publishing operations to Brooklyn, New York, and named the complex “Bethel,” or house of God. Not long after, Maria Ackley Russell served him with divorce papers, ending a long period of contention over her role in the organization. To this day women do not hold governing positions nor serve as elders in local congregations. Russell died in Texas on October 31, 1916, returning from a speaking tour.

Organization

Russell’s successor as president of the Watch Tower Tract and Bible Society was Joseph Franklin Rutherford (1869–1942). Born on a farm in Missouri, Rutherford worked his way through college and after serving two years as an apprentice received his license to practice law at age twenty-three. He later served occasionally on the circuit court and was thus known as “Judge.” Rutherford had provided legal counsel to Russell in the purchase of land for Bethel and was a member of the board of directors of the Watch Tower Society. Like Russell, Rutherford was physically imposing and a charismatic speaker. His disposition, however, was far less irenic and his style of management highly centralized. Rutherford and seven other directors were imprisoned under the Sedition Act of 1918 for their polemical writing against participation in the war. After nine months they won release on appeal, but many Bible students became targets of persecution, and the organization was in disarray. Rutherford took the opportunity to challenge the election of several directors, whom he replaced by his own supporters. He introduced a monthly “service sheet” to record in detail the evangelistic activities of members, increased the construction of Kingdom Halls, and began publishing a new monthly magazine called The Golden Age (later, Awake!). In 1919 he introduced the enthusiastic slogan, “Millions Now Living Will Never Die!”

Rutherford wrote extensively, beginning with Harp of God in 1921. He abandoned Russell’s Zionism, as well as his prophetic speculations based on the Great Pyramid. In his own attempts to interpret prophecy Rutherford identified “Babylon the Great” of Revelation 17 with the League of Nations (abetted by the Vatican), foretold the return of biblical patriarchs (and built a mansion for their residence in San Diego, called Beth Sarim, where he resided in comparative luxury from 1930 until his death), and set the date 1925, and later 1940, for the coming of the kingdom. At the annual convention of 1931 Rutherford declared that henceforth “we desire to be known as and called by the name, to wit, Jehovah’s witnesses.” Since then, the use of “Jehovah” as the personal name of God has become a major point of DOCTRINE. In 1935 Rutherford declared that most of the growing body of Jehovah’s Witnesses belonged to that “great crowd, which no man was able to number, out of all nations and tribes and peoples” (Revelation 7:9), who would not ascend to heaven, but live in the earthly paradise. Between the world wars Rutherford led the Witnesses through a series of court battles over freedom of speech and press, right of assembly, and distribution of literature. His death from colon cancer marked a major transition from charismatic to institutional authority.

Expansion

Nathan Homer Knorr (1905–1977) became the third president of the Watch Tower Society in 1942. Born in Pennsylvania, Knorr joined a congregation of Bible students as a teenager, was baptized at age eighteen, and promptly moved to Brooklyn to work in the Bethel headquarters, where he rose through the ranks to a place on the board of directors. Knorr’s long presidency was marked by increased organizational growth, more sophisticated promotional methods, and greater uniformity in the programs of local congregations, including training in public speaking through Theocratic Ministry Schools. Known as “Brother,” Knorr was more modest than his predecessors and in 1943 he established a policy of anonymous publications. In 1960 the Watchtower Society published the New World Translation of the Holy Scriptures. This version reflects the doctrinal vocabulary of the Watchtower Society and was largely the work of Frederick W. Franz.

In the postwar years Knorr traveled extensively, rebuilding branch organizations in Europe and establishing others in Asia, Latin America, the Middle East, and the Pacific islands. During the social tumult of the 1960s the Watch Tower Society intensified its defense of the divine inspiration of the Bible and tightened its discipline over sexual behavior (see SEXUALITY). As a result many young people were “disfellowshipped,” expelled from their congregations, and cut off from all contact with other Jehovah’s Witnesses, including members of their own family. This severe punishment was justified by reference to I Corinthians 5:9–11. At the same time, male workers at Bethel were allowed to marry, reversing earlier views of marriage and children as distractions from kingdom work (following I Corinthians 7:32–34). In 1971 the board of directors of the Watch Tower Society reorganized into a Governing Body on the model of the original apostles, composed of eleven men, plus the president, all of whom belonged to the “anointed class.” The Governing Body issued binding directives, held all legal authority over the vast holdings of the Watch Tower Society, approved all publications, and was the final arbiter of doctrinal and behavioral questions. The Governing Body delegated many administrative duties to committees whose members it appointed. Knorr extended the apostolic model in 1972 by restoring to local Kingdom Halls the authority to elect their own ruling body of male elders. Near the end of his tenure Knorr, like his predecessors, became involved in controversy over failed prophecy. Beginning in 1966 many Jehovah’s Witnesses began to speculate that the 6,000 years of human history (based on biblical genealogies from Adam) would end in 1975. Despite official cautions about the tentativeness of the date, many disappointed members later defected. Knorr died of a brain tumor in 1977.

Consolidation and Reorganization

Frederick W. Franz (1893–1992) became the fourth president of the Watchtower Society at age eightythree. Born in Kentucky, Franz attended classes in biblical Greek at the University of Cincinnati. After studying Russell’s writings, he left school to work as a colporteur and joined the Bethel family in 1920. Under Franz’s leadership the Watchtower Society re-sponded to the decline in membership after 1975 with a flurry of publications, including a revised reference edition of the New World Translation (1984), a new commentary on the Book of Revelation (1988), and a two-volume Bible encyclopedia (1991). By 1992 the Society had 800 translators rendering the Bible into scores of languages. Franz also strengthened local programs of education and developed the Ministerial Training School to train single male missionaries. The ranks of pioneers nearly tripled and the number of congregations grew to, 70,000, many in Kingdom Halls that were constructed in a few days by special teams of builders. However, his tenure was not without controversy. The emphasis on greater dedication required stricter discipline, more weekly meetings for study and training, and more rigorous application of standards for disfellowshipping (resulting in the expulsion of his own nephew). Franz died at the age of ninety-nine.

Milton G. Henschel (1920–) became the fifth president of the Watchtower Society at the end of 1992. He served as secretary to Knorr, accompanying him on his travels, and rose to the presidency after decades of service at Bethel. His administration completed the transition from strong individual authority to corporate bureaucracy. Henschel belongs to the aging cohort of Jehovah’s Witnesses who believed that they would not all die until Christ returned to take them to heaven to rule with him over paradise on earth. Ironically it was during his tenure that the Watchtower Society abandoned this belief. In 1995 The Watchtower revised its interpretation of Jesus’s promise that “this generation will not pass away until all these things have taken place” (Matthew 24:34) to mean that there will always be those who oppose the truth until the kingdom arrives. Claiming a “progressive” understanding of revelation, drawn from Proverbs 4:18, the Watchtower Society declared that Jehovah’s Witnesses are no longer to regard the generation of 1914 as “a rule for measuring time.”

The institutional effects of this change were momentous. Members of the Governing Body, including the directors of the Watch Tower Society, are chosen exclusively from the “anointed class,” whose membership Rutherford announced closed in 1935. (Some younger members had been recognized as “anointed” since then, but only as replacements for unspecified original members who had fallen away from the faith.) Thus the pool of available leaders was dwindling. In October 2000 the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society of Pennsylvania, the parent corporation of about 100 Watchtower organizations, announced that its president and board of directors would henceforth be totally separate from the Governing Body and that its powers and assets would be divided among several corporations with their own presidents. All the members of the Governing Body resigned from the board. Milton Henschel was replaced as president by Don A. Adams, and all administrative positions were also filled by younger “brothers of the other sheep.” The Governing Body no longer has legal authority, nor will it be subject to legal action, but will continue to offer spiritual guidance.

Jehovah’s Witnesses worldwide remain organized into over thirty zones, which are in turn divided into branches; branches into districts; and districts into circuits, each composed of twenty congregations. A circuit overseer visits each of his congregations twice a year to guide the local body of male elders. When membership in a Kingdom Hall reaches 200, another congregation is formed. The 1999 Yearbook reported 89,985 congregations.

Teachings

Jehovah’s Witnesses derive their religious teachings from a literal interpretation of the Bible, except where a figurative meaning is obviously intended (e.g., “four corners of the earth”). Thus, they reject doctrines formulated by the early councils of the Christian church under the influence of Greek philosophy, such as the Trinity. For Jehovah’s Witnesses there is only one supreme “God of gods” (Psalm 136:2), who revealed his sacred name YHWH to Moses (Exodus 3:14). Whereas translators have substituted God and Lord for the divine name, Jehovah’s Witnesses insist it is properly rendered in English as “Jehovah” (Psalm 83:18, KJV). Jehovah created the entire world in six “days” (each lasting 7,000 years) as recorded in Genesis 1–2, with no process of evolution. God created all things through the agency of Jesus in his preexistent form as the Word of God, called “Logos” in John 1 and “Wisdom” in Proverbs 8. As Jehovah’s “master workman,” he is chief among the “sons of God” (Job 1:6) and is known in Hebrew Scriptures as Michael the archangel. Although Jesus is not equal to Jehovah, he was “with” God in the beginning and is properly called “a god” (John 1:1, NWT). Jesus is not eternal, but he was the “firstborn of all creation” (Colossians 1:15). Jehovah’s Witnesses pray to God in the name of Jesus, but deny that the Bible identifies him as a “person” within a triune Godhead (see ANTITRINITARIANISM). They understand “holy spirit” as Jehovah’s “active force” in the world.

Among the heavenly beings serving Jehovah was one called Lucifer. But he rebelled against God and became Satan, the “adversary” of divine government. The DEVIL deceived Eve and Adam in the Garden of Eden into also defying God’s sovereignty. Jehovah created the first human couple perfect, but through their free act of disobedience they and all their progeny became subject to sin, sickness, and death. Satan continues throughout history to attack God’s rule not only by tempting individuals with selfish desires, but also by deceiving humanity through his control of false religions, unjust economic systems, and idolatrous NATIONALISM. Jehovah’s Witnesses separate themselves from the “world system” by rejecting all political activities (including voting), influences of popular culture, social associations with non-Witnesses, and alliances with other religious organizations. They are outspoken in criticism of the Roman Catholic Church and the United Nations as precursors of the one-world government controlled by the ANTICHRIST in the last days.

To rescue humans from sin and death, Jehovah transferred the life of Jesus to the womb of the VIRGIN MARY to be born as the perfect human, the “second Adam.” At his baptism Jesus was anointed by the holy spirit as Messiah. By remaining sinless throughout his life, Jesus could serve as the perfect sacrifice required to ransom humanity from the power of Satan, thus vindicating the authority of Jehovah’s rule over the earth. Christ’s obedience bought back what Adam’s disobedience had forfeited: the opportunity to live eternally in paradise on earth. According to Watchtower teaching, Jesus was executed on a single piece of timber, a “torture stake,” rather than a cross. God raised Jesus from the dead in a “spiritual body” and made him a “life-giving spirit” (I Corinthians 15:44–45; I Peter 3:18) with authority to rule over all other creatures as head of the messianic kingdom (Philippians 2:9–11). An “anointed class” of 144,000 believers, foreseen in Revelation 14, will assist Christ in his rule. They will not be resurrected, but will dwell in heaven as “spirit beings.” They are the subjects of the “new covenant” Jesus announced at his last meal on the eve of his death. They are also called the “little flock,” the “faithful and discreet slave,” the “bride of Christ,” and “a royal priesthood.” They are called by divine election, confirmed by inner conviction, and since 1918 have ascended to heaven as spirit beings upon death. From there they will administer divine government over the paradise on earth, ruling the “great crowd” of those who joined the faith after 1935. The present role of the “great crowd” is to assist the “anointed remnant” in bearing witness to Jehovah’s kingdom.

Although Christ’s rule began when he cast Satan out of heaven in 1914, his government will be established on earth only after a catastrophic battle with cosmic forces of evil at Har-magedon in the near future. Then Jesus will separate all people on earth into loyal “sheep” and rebellious “goats” (Matthew 25:31–34). The faithful will enter millennial paradise, a thousand years of peace and harmony in a restored earth. The reprobate will be immediately annihilated. Then the dead who did not have the chance to hear the gospel during their lives will be resurrected to join the “great crowd.” At the end of the millennium Satan will be released briefly to test all those on earth. Those who prove loyal to Jehovah will be rewarded with eternal life. Those who succumb to Satan’s temptation will suffer “the second death” (Revelation 20:14–15). Jehovah’s Witnesses believe that only those who persevere will be saved in the end. They do not teach that one is eternally secure after an initial confession of faith (as do most evangelical Christians), but that one must continue to “exercise faith” through works of service to the kingdom.

Worship

Jehovah’s Witnesses meet several times a week in simple buildings with spare furnishings called “Kingdom Halls.” Services consist mainly of study of materials produced by the Watchtower Society, and of training in techniques of promoting their teachings in local neighborhoods. Worship also involves singing of hymns, written in a distinctive doctrinal vocabulary. Active members exercise their faith by devoting eight to ten hours a week in door-to-door witnessing. Those who spend considerably more time are designated “pioneers.” To supply them with literature the Watchtower Society invests heavily in the most advanced communications technology, from offset presses to phototypesetting computer software. Jehovah’s Witnesses distribute annually millions of copies of The Watchtower, translated into 130 languages, and of Awake! in 80 versions. Although Jehovah’s Witnesses have not used television, the Watchtower Society has recently launched an official site on the World Wide Web.

Jehovah’s Witnesses observe the two SACRAMENTS recognized by other Protestants: water BAPTISM and the LORD’S SUPPER. They baptize by immersion only those candidates who have completed lengthy preparatory study. Baptisms often occur at large conventions as a public sign of dedication to the work of proclaiming the kingdom. Jehovah’s Witnesses observe the “Lord’s Evening Meal” once a year, on Passover eve (14 Nisan on the Jewish calendar), in which only members of the “anointed class” partake of the “emblems” of bread and wine. In 1999 only 8,755 of this “heavenly class” survived. As the number of partakers dwindles, however, the Watchtower Society records a growing number of observers. The significance of the ritual today is to identify those who attend but do not participate as those with the “earthly hope” of paradise.

Practices

Jehovah’s Witnesses share with Christian FUNDAMENTALISM a restrictive sexual morality, condemning as “fornication” any instance of premarital sex, adultery, and HOMOSEXUALITY. ABORTION and some forms of birth control are forbidden. They abstain from tobacco and drugs, but follow the Bible in allowing limited use of alcohol. Gambling is deplored as an expression of greed. Magic, divination, and spiritualism are deceptions of Satan in which demons impersonate the dead and can even possess the living. Jehovah’s Witnesses do not celebrate Christmas or Easter because both involve pre-Christian customs. Neither do they acknowledge individual birthdays because the only examples of such celebrations in the Bible are by pagan rulers. Because Jesus died on a “torture stake” Jehovah’s Witnesses do not use the cross in their worship; it is a symbol they associate with “ancient false religions.”

Jehovah’s Witnesses are well known for their refusal to pledge allegiance to national governments, for which dissent they have been imprisoned in many countries, including the United States during both world wars (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). In Nazi GERMANY Jehovah’s Witnesses were among the non-Jewish groups consigned to concentration camps. They do not practice PACIFISM, but maintain a neutral stance toward the state. Because all worldly governments are under the power of Satan, they refuse to participate in patriotic demonstrations or military service. In 1943 the Supreme Court, in the case of Barnette v. West Virginia, upheld the civil right of Jehovah’s Witness children not to salute the flag in schoolroom exercises.

Perhaps the most controversial of Watchtower Society policies is the prohibition of intravenous blood transfusion, first promulgated in 1945. Since then, Jehovah’s Witnesses have interpreted the apostolic command to “abstain...from blood” (Acts 15:20) as unconditional because any means of taking blood into the body violates the principle that the “life (soul) is in the blood” (Genesis 9:4; Leviticus 17:11). In 1961 The Watchtower announced that any member who accepted a blood transfusion would face disfellowshipping. Not even transfusions of one’s own blood are allowed because storage would violate biblical directions for disposing of blood (Deuteronomy 12:16). Kidney dialysis is permitted as long as the blood circulates continuously through the filtering apparatus and returns to the patient’s body. Since 1978 hemophiliacs have been allowed to choose treatment with blood components.

Future Challenges

Jehovah’s Witnesses have entered a new stage of their history by renouncing attempts to set specific dates for the coming kingdom and modifying their theocratic organization. It remains to be seen whether these moves will silence the recurrent criticisms of the Watchtower Society for issuing “false prophecies” and for exerting absolute control over its members. To date, there has been no organized internal feminist dissent from the patriarchal patterns of domestic life and congregational authority. Those who voice disagreement with the Watchtower interpretation of biblical teaching about the role of women find themselves in danger of being “disfellowshipped.” The challenge facing contemporary Jehovah’s Witnesses is how to retain apocalyptic fervor, moral discipline, and exclusionary group loyalty under the pressures on younger families to accommodate to prevailing cultural standards as the promise of the kingdom is extended into an indeterminate future.

References and Further Reading

- Bergman, Jerry. Jehovah's Witnesses: A Comprehensive and Selectively Annotated Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Publishing Group, 1999.
- Conkin, Paul K. "Apocalyptic Christianity: Adventists and Jehovah's Witnesses." In American Originals: Homemade Varieties of Christianity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Curry, Melvin D. Jehovah's Witnesses: The Millenarianism World of the Watch Tower. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.
- Franz, Raymond. Crisis of Conscience: The Struggle Between Loyalty to God and Loyalty to One's Religion. Atlanta, GA: Commentary Press, 1983.
- Harrison, Barbara Grizzuti. Visions of Glory: A History and a Memory of Jehovah's Witnesses. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1978.
- "Jehovah's Witnesses: Watchtower Society Official Web Site." <http://www.watchtower.org/> (accessed January 15, 2000).
- . Jehovah's Witnesses: Proclaimers of God's Kingdom. Brooklyn, NY: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, 1993.
- . Knowledge That Leads to Everlasting Life. Brooklyn, NY: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, 1995.
- . Revelation—Its Grand Climax at Hand! Brooklyn, NY: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, 1988.
- . You Can Live Forever in Paradise on Earth. Brooklyn, NY: Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, 1982.
- Penton, M. James. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985.
- Reed, David A. Blood on the Altar: Confessions of a Jehovah's Witness Minister. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1996.
- Stafford, Greg. Jehovah's Witnesses Defended: An Answer to Scholars and Critics. Huntington Beach, CA: Elihu Books, 2000.

DAVID L. WEDDLE

JEREMIAD

Jeremiads are Protestant sermons that generally emphasize the vengeful nature of divine justice, specifically enumerate the local or immediate transgressions warranting the deity's deserved wrath, reprovably point to present indications of divine disfavor, and direly forecast looming future judgments unless the offenders reform. The term derives from the name of the Old Testament exilic prophet Jeremiah, who grieved over the destruction of Jerusalem and the desolation of Judah.

The related jeremiad themes of divine displeasure and ensuing adversity inform several European Protestant works, including Thomas Vincent's God's Terrible Voice in the City (1667). However, as a developed rhetorical form narrowly focused on a single community of believers, the jeremiad prominently emerges in Puritan New England during the 1660s and 1670s (see PURITANISM). Typical is The Day of Trouble is Near (1674), INCREASE MATHER'S aptly titled rebuke of his fellow Puritans as idolatrous New Israelites hazardously worshiping material prosperity instead of God. Whether colonial Puritan piety had actually diminished or was only clerically perceived to be declining during the 1670s is open to debate. Also unresolved is the issue of whether the colonial jeremiad pessimistically prophesies doom at the hands of a frowning deity or optimistically reaffirms a Puritan identity that God never abandons. In the former view, jeremiads reflect a static world view in which God either supports or rejects; in the latter view, jeremiads subtly accommodate history by endorsing an ongoing process of divine censure followed by divine favor. Either way, this form of sermon exhibits a clerical desire to affirm TRADITION, including ministerial AUTHORITY, during an uneasy time of social, political, and economic change.

References and Further Reading

Bercovitch, Sacvan. The American Jeremiad. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1978.
 Miller, Perry. The New England Mind: From Colony to Province. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1953.

WILLIAM J. SCHEICK

JESUS MOVEMENT

The Jesus Movement (JM) is a term developed by popular media in the 1960s and 1970s to refer to a movement among some relatively well-educated and affluent young people, originally mainly within the UNITED STATES, who were embracing a communal lifestyle based on variants of Christian Protestant THEOLOGY. Sometimes the terms “Jesus People,” or the more derogatory “Jesus Freaks,” have been employed by those referring to this phenomenon. Considerable attention was paid to early Jesus Movement groups, as debate swirled over whether they were “truly Christian.” Their well-publicized lifestyle that included long hair and very casual dress contributed to this debate, as did their exuberant efforts to share their beliefs and values.

The Movement gained considerable momentum and attention for about three decades, and also spread to other countries, becoming worldwide by virtue of actions by a few of the JM groups, particularly the Children of God (COG), which at one time had outposts in close to 200 countries. Some estimates by scholars suggest several hundred thousand participants at one time or another in the JM. However, the Movement lost momentum in the 1990s, and is survived now by a few of the better known Movement groups such as Jesus People USA, centered in Chicago, and The Family (formerly known as the Children of God). Many remnants of Jesus Movement groups also flowed into pentecostal-oriented nontraditional churches, such as Calvary Chapel, from which Shiloh, one of the larger Movement groups in the late 1960s, had come.

One major theological and cultural variation developed within the Movement involved linking experientialism with FUNDAMENTALISM, as young people embraced selected beliefs associated with fundamentalist Protestantism, while also engaging in such activities as glossolalia, or speaking in TONGUES (the COG were an exception; members did not practice glossolalia). Most participants in JM groups had histories of heavy experiential involvement with drugs, alcohol, tobacco, and premarital sex, but participation in the JM groups often led to significant changes in behavior, with “getting high on Jesus” seeming to serve as something of a substitute for previous activities. Thus some scholars have written about the Jesus Movement as serving a “half-way house” function for many participants who had become disaffected from normal society and were involved in experimental lifestyles of one kind or another. Participation in the Movement helped many of these young people return to more conventional society, even if that was not their original intent when joining a specific JM group.

Recruitment and Resocialization

Most Jesus Movement groups gained new members by street proselytizing, seeking converts among young people who were moving around society, having cut their ties with families and left their normal “social locations.” When large numbers of young people were adrift, especially during the Vietnam War era, such recruitment methods worked well. Outreach operated out of JM group communal houses located close to major transportation arteries and places where young people congregated, particularly in west coast urban centers in America. Some JM groups grew rapidly, especially if they established communal centers where converts could garner food, shelter, and friendship, along with the Jesus message. Later, as the “target population” of young people lessened, recruitment dropped off and other ways to attract new members were sought. This included holding “Jesus rock” concerts, opening “Christian coffee houses,” witnessing on college campuses, and developing promotional activities based on distribution of tape recordings of BIBLE studies or Jesus rock music. None of these methods was particularly successful, although they did on occasion attract considerable attention to a given JM group.

Resocialization took many forms, but tended, especially among communal JM groups, to involve efforts at total immersion of new recruits in the subculture of the group. Other JM groups were more casual at training new members, but often may have typically sent new converts on missions to gain more recruits or to establish an outpost far from friends and family, accompanied only by a group of fellow believers. The resulting isolation had an indirect insulating effect that would encourage the new convert to absorb the group’s CULTURE relatively quickly.

Growth and Outreach Activities Lead to Controversy

Most of the early recruits were single young people (indeed, most were males). This basic demographic fact contributed greatly to the early history of most JM groups being characterized by considerable geographic mobility. Members, few of whom were burdened with familial considerations, could be sent by group leaders to far-away places to engage in mission activities or in establishing a new communal outpost. Or an entire group could pick up and move, or decide to “live on the road,” as did the COG for a number of years. This much-publicized group drove their caravan of buses across America for a time, camping when they wanted to engage in street proselytizing or shame some traditional churches for being too materialistic. The COG then left America and went to dozens of other countries, eventually establishing a presence in a large number of them. Other JM groups, even if less attention-seeking, were nonetheless also quite mobile, expending considerable effort and resources at “spreading the Word” in America and elsewhere.

Thus literally thousands of energetic young people became involved in missionizing and proselytizing activities around the United States and eventually in dozens of other countries, leaving the impression of a large and very active movement developing first among America's youth and spreading around the globe. This impression was fostered by major coverage by mass print and electronic media of the time, as America, during a time of considerable turmoil over the Vietnam War and race issues, initially celebrated the apparent "return to that old-time religion" by many young people. It seemed to many that participation of young people in JM groups was preferable to being involved with "sex, drugs, rock and roll" and the antiwar movement.

Later the mass media as well as the general public and policy makers soured on most Jesus Movement groups' efforts at recruitment, as some unsavory actions (such as the COG's "flirty fishing," which for a time used sex as a recruiting tool) were revealed, and as it became clear that most JM groups were "high demand" religions that expected participants to "forsake all" to "follow Jesus" and do the bidding of group leaders intent on converting others or developing the size and influence of their particular groups. Accusations of "brainwashing" and "mind control" were made against some JM groups, as some family members of recruits and others sought to exert control over the groups and to limit their ability to recruit new members. Such accusations were refuted by scholars studying JM groups and related "New Religions," although such claims persisted and led to much difficulty for some JM groups. Indeed, the first "deprogramming" ever recorded (the first of many thousands, in the United States but also in other countries) involved a member of the COG, the most controversial of the JM groups.

Families, Children, and Change

Although the first generation of participants in JM groups was predominantly single males, as time passed more females were attracted, facilitating the eventual establishment of families. This led in turn to the arrival of children, sometimes in very large numbers in JM groups that did not generally practice birth control, such as the COG and Shiloh, the two largest such groups. Recent membership figures on, for instance, The Family (formerly the COG) demonstrate the size of this "problem" that led to changes in JM groups that lasted more than one generation. As of about 2001, The Family had approximately 10,000 members worldwide, with well over half of them being children.

The presence of families, and especially large numbers of children, had a "domesticating" effect on JM groups. The mobility of the groups was stymied, causing them to become much more sedentary, and leading to some consolidation as mission activities in other countries were curtailed somewhat. Divisions of labor were established within the groups that had some members doing missionizing and traveling, whereas others stayed home to care for the children and find ways to support the growing families, as well as other activities of the group. Huge amounts of resources were needed to sustain such large families, and the attention of group members and leaders had to be focused on this matter.

The presence of many children also led to major controversies with public officials over care and schooling of the children. Some JM groups insisted on HOMESCHOOLING their children, claiming that to send them to public schools would have a corrupting influence on them. Also, alternative schools were established in some groups, such as Shiloh, for a time, which became a drain on group resources and also allowed more governmental intervention. Child custody battles erupted in some groups, brought on by one parent deciding to leave the group and wanting to take custody of his or her children. Some JM groups, especially the COG, were accused of child sex abuse, accusations deriving from the rather libertine lifestyle led for a time by adult members of the group. These accusations led in the 1980s and early 1990s to large numbers of children being temporarily removed from Family homes in several different countries, including FRANCE, Spain, Argentina, and AUSTRALIA. In all instances the children were eventually returned; however, and in one major case in Australia, the government had to pay damages for the actions taken to gain control over the children.

In some groups the increase in familial responsibilities led eventually to a major shift of focus from one of outreach and recruitment to one focused internally, as the groups tried to support the new family-oriented culture and lifestyle that had developed. Instead of spending most time and resources sending out recruitment teams, ways had to be found to work for funds, or otherwise gather the resources needed for group sustenance and survival in a situation that involved many more “nonrevenue” members requiring support by those whose activities could generate revenue.

Many different methods of group support were tried, as most JM groups experimented with methods of raising money or engaging in activities that would help furnish needed material goods for the group. Street solicitation for money was one method tried by some groups, but this was by no means the most prevalent. The COG used this method, distributing their voluminous literature (the infamous “Mo Letters”) and asking for money in exchange, a method called “litnessing.” They also engaged in scavenging activities that sought out discarded fruits and vegetables from local markets, as well as other ways of maintaining the group that depended on the largesse of others. Shiloh used little direct solicitation, but instead relied on work teams in agricultural and construction industries for much of their support, as well as donations from members and their parents, and contributions from governmental agencies (i.e., federal surplus food programs). Shiloh and other groups also sold music tapes and put on concerts occasionally as others experimented with other ways to support themselves.

The Movement Dissipates

The Jesus Movement still exists in one sense because a few of the groups that began as part of the movement continue to function and even thrive, even if changed somewhat by the material concerns just discussed. However, the high point of the Movement occurred in the 1970s and early 1980s when there were JM groups operating in many different cities in America, in rural areas, in a number of other countries. From that point, however, the Movement lost momentum, caused by the lack of availability of ready recruits, shifting societal contexts, and internal problems deriving in large part from the maturing of the membership and the establishment of families by many of the participants. Thus the energy that had developed within the Movement groups was dissipated, and former members went many different directions. Many of them flowed into nontraditional Protestant evangelical and pentecostal groups. Some remained a part of one of the groups that did not die out completely, and many just left the JM groups and reentered a more conventional lifestyle.

References and Further Reading

- DeSabatino, David. The Jesus People Movement: An Annotated Bibliography and General Resource. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Ellwood, Robert. One Way: The Jesus Movement and Its Meaning. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1973.
- Enroth, Ronald, Edward Ericson, and C.B.Peters. The Jesus People: Old Time Religion in an Age of Aquarius. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1972.
- Richardson, James T., and Rex Davis. "Experiential Fundamentalism." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 51 (1983):397–425.
- , Mary Harder, and Robert Simmonds. Organized Miracles: A Study of a Contemporary, Youth, Communal Fundamentalist Organization. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 1979.
- Stewart, David T., and James T.Richardson. "Mundane Materialism: How Tax Policies and Other Governmental Regulation Affected Beliefs and Practices of Jesus Movement Organizations." Journal of the American Academy of Religion 67 (1999):825–847.
- Taslimi, Cheryl R., Ralph W.Hood, and P.J.Watson. "Assessment of Former Members of Shiloh: The Adjective Check List 17 Years Later." Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 30 (1991):306–311.

JAMES T.RICHARDSON

JESUS, LIVES OF

Introduction

Understood in their broadest sense, the “lives of Jesus” are narratives constructed from the actions and words of Jesus of Nazareth. From this perspective the “lives” are not new, but date to the canonical gospels produced by early Christian communities. However, close readings of the gospels reveal that they are not objective histories, but documents carefully shaped by theological and confessional concerns. Although the gospels offer a portrait that explicates the meaning of Jesus as the Christ, they do not question that he is the Christ. It is this element that distinguishes modern lives of Jesus from the gospel accounts. That is to say, modern lives seek to understand, on grounds other than belief or theological conviction, what about the teaching, life, or internal makeup of Jesus suggested to his followers that he was indeed the Christ. In their more technical sense they are usually identified with the “Quest for the Historical Jesus,” a rubric derived from the English title to ALBERT SCHWEITZER’S monumental history of the nineteenth-century lives of Jesus, The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress From Reimarus to Wrede (1910).

Considering the remarkable breadth and forms that “lives of Jesus” have taken and the fact that their authors cover a wide span of religious commitments, one cannot suggest that they are uniquely Protestant in either form or content. Nevertheless, there are certain trajectories that the lives have taken that show the influence of Protestant thought and inclinations. In particular one can note three of these influences. First, the focus on discovering the Jesus hidden among or by creedal statements follows from a fundamental Protestant tenet assigning prominence to scripture in matters of THEOLOGY and FAITH. Second, the lives shift the locus of AUTHORITY from ecclesial structures to personal forms of encounter. That is to say, many of the writers expect that the discovered Jesus confronts the individual directly, either through the power of his recovered teaching (e.g., RUDOLF BULTMANN) or his force as moral exemplar (e.g., Ernst Renan). Finally, the insistence that statements concerning the uniqueness or continuing importance of Jesus be demonstrated rather than simply claimed are an instance of the Protestant commitment to expressing religious claims in forms that are accessible to both ecclesial and secular publics. Thus, although the lives are not specifically Protestant works, they are clearly connected to Protestantism's philosophical foundations and religious commitments.

Distilled to their essence, the lives of Jesus are attempts to answer two questions, "Who was Jesus?" and "Why is he significant?" The two questions are deceptively simple to frame, but, on closer inspection, they are deeply ambiguous and vexing. Behind them lie other difficult questions such as: What did Jesus actually say and do? How did he understand his relationship to God and to his contemporaries? What was the relationship of his self-understanding to that of his followers? These questions are not simple, and how one answers them dictates the shape and sense of the "life" one wishes to compose.

Three characteristics of the "lives" are typical. First, they are written from a historical rather than confessional stance. Second, they presume a distinction between the person of Jesus and the portraits of him found in the canonical gospels. Third, because of this distinction, the lives supply both a portrait of who Jesus of Nazareth was and reasons why he continues to hold significance. In this regard, "lives of Jesus" are simultaneously historical and hermeneutical endeavors, presenting both events of the past and distinctive interpretations of their current meaningfulness.

History of the Lives

The "lives" have their own peculiar history, and in some fashion they are as hard to classify as the object of their inquiry. It is best to differentiate them on the bases by which their authors establish the significance of Jesus. Usually this has been by one of four methods: reconstructing historical evidence, analyzing Jesus' self-consciousness, identifying philosophical or ideological ideals embodied in his life and teaching, or asserting his cultural significance. However, for heuristic purposes they can be divided into four periods: the Initial Quest (1750–1910), the period often referred to as "No Quest" (1910–1953), the New Quest (1953–1979), and what has been termed the "Third Quest," which began around 1980 and continues into the present.

The Initial Quest

The first modern "lives" were products of the ENLIGHTENMENT critique of external authority, the REFORMATION DOCTRINE of sola scriptura, and a reexamination of the relationship of human reason to divine revelation that is indebted to Deist philosophy (see DEISM). When these philosophical and cultural shifts were coupled to the already recognized fact that the gospel accounts offered conflicting reports of the time and motivation for Jesus' actions and teaching, the appearance of the "lives" became inevitable.

The initial quest had two goals: to rediscover the actual Jesus hidden under layers of dogmatic belief, and to reinterpret that Jesus for contemporary audiences. The authors of these lives believed that for the power of Jesus' teachings and actions to be unleashed and so transform modern society, they had to be liberated from the shackles of church dogma, particularly the belief that Jesus was both divine and human. HERMANN SAMUEL REIMARUS is often cited as the author of the first critical life of Jesus. Because deist interpreters such as THOMAS CHUBB had already produced critical works on Jesus, this is incorrect. Nevertheless, Reimarus added scholarly precision to the previous efforts and made evident their explosive nature. Reimarus wrote a manifesto "Apology, or Defense for the Reasonableness of Reverence for God" that ranged from the necessity of reason in matters of faith to the impossibility of accepting biblical accounts as historically true. Between 1774 and 1778 Reimarus's son-in-law GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM LESSING published seven portions of the work under the title, the Wolfenbüttel Fragments. In the seventh fragment, "The Aims of Jesus and His Disciples," Reimarus argued that Jesus never claimed divine status, never intended to inaugurate a new religion, and did not desire to be worshipped. Rather he sought to bring about deliverance from the Roman occupation of Palestine. Thus, the disciples had corrupted Jesus' teaching, and to understand the true Jesus one must disclaim all doctrines of divinity.

Three important features for future lives were established by Reimarus's work. First, explaining the relationship of Jesus' teaching to later presentations by his disciples becomes a matter of historical and theological significance. Second, Jesus must be understood within the context of JUDAISM, which though itself ambiguous, is critical for an accurate life of Jesus. Third, a proper understanding of the KINGDOM OF GOD is crucial in any life of Jesus.

Reimarus wrote to expose the erroneous beliefs and doctrines of the Christian faith. Not a few scholars sought to refute such notions by employing the same historical means Reimarus used. However, the methods were employed to show that Jesus' initial followers did not corrupt his message, but maintained continuity with his teaching and purpose. The life written by Heinrich Paulus, The Life of Jesus as the Foundation of a purely Historical Account of Early Christianity (1828), is a good example. Paulus's life of Jesus typifies rationalist approaches to the life of Jesus. Paulus allowed that God could act within human history or the natural order, but that God's actions must follow the inherent laws of NATURE and human existence. Paulus also argued that the reported "miracles" actually happened, but that the term miracle was a misnomer used by gospel writers, because they did not know or understand the secondary historical or natural causes for the strange things they had witnessed. Hence, healings or nature miracles could be properly comprehended when a rational explanation could be offered. In his life of Jesus, Paulus sought to provide plausible understandings of the miracles and thus distill from them their true meaning.

The core of Paulus's work is devoted to explanations of the miracles, to discern from those stories the truths they sought to communicate about Jesus and his message. An example of his procedure can be seen in his treatment of Jesus' command that the sea become still. Paulus suggests that when Jesus is reported to have calmed the sea (Mark 4:35-41), the boat in which he was traveling was blocked from the wind at exactly the moment when he yelled his command to the sea. The disciples missed the coincidence and attributed to Jesus the power to command the elements of nature. This is repeated for most of the miracle stories in the gospels. Oddly, Paulus does not suggest that Jesus ever attempted to correct these misperceptions or sought to provide explanations for the supposed miracles. Instead he seemed to have encouraged the misunderstandings. Paulus's explanations may have succeeded in saving the veracity of the disciples' accounts, but in doing so, Paulus inadvertently suggested that Jesus was perpetrating fraud and deception. Ironically, the miracles are saved at the expense of their performer.

Paulus's arguments and explanations, along with those of every other rationalist, were refuted completely by the powerful life of Jesus composed by DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1845). Strauss's life of Jesus is the colossus of nineteenth-century lives, and remains one of the most important ever written. Translated by GEORGE ELIOT, the life is a monumental work of over 1,400 pages, the majority of which are devoted to demonstrating the inadequate and incoherent nature of previous explanations of the gospel materials. With an unrelenting and clear argumentation, Strauss exposes the philosophical difficulties in maintaining traditional dogmatic explanations of the reports. However, the efforts of the rationalists come in for even more criticism. Strauss repeatedly demonstrates that the rationalist explanations strain credulity even more than those of the supernaturalists. By the end of his analysis it is hard to conceive how anyone thought of these explanations as reasonable or rational.

In place of these explanations Strauss maintained that the gospels were mythological reinterpretations of traditions about Jesus derived from the Old Testament stories or actual events in Jesus' life. Following a Hegelian understanding of metaphysics and history, Strauss argued that the goal of the myths was to demonstrate that in Jesus the absolute meeting of the finite and the infinite occurred. Strauss did not believe that this had happened in the individual person of Jesus, but that "Jesus" as an icon represented the fact that all of humanity could participate in such an experience. Thus, Jesus was only unique by the fact that he was the first human to represent the possibility of the final union of Spirit and humanity, not by his actual nature.

Strauss's analysis was met with a firestorm of protest and challenge; to the present day his mythical recasting of the gospel material is continually challenged. Nevertheless his critique of the rationalist and the supernaturalist approaches to the gospels has never been answered adequately, and remains a desideratum for contemporary interpreters of the gospel materials.

Ernest Renan, who used his travels through Palestine and Syria to fill in the gaps of the gospel narratives, produced a countervailing life. His book The Life of Jesus was immensely popular throughout Europe. Appearing in 1863, it sold over 66,000 copies in six months. Renan's sketch is only a semblance of history. In fact, it is a romantic novel, with the gentle loving Jesus as its hero. Only after his rejection by religious authorities does Jesus become a revolutionary. Renan's depiction was complete down to the demeanor of the mule that Jesus rode, including the length of his eyebrows. Its popularity attests to the power of LITERATURE, but it has little of historical interest or accuracy.

A significant breakthrough in the "lives" occurs with the work of Johannes Weiss, whose Preaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom of God appeared in 1892. Although only sixty-seven pages, it sounds a critical note in the production of the lives by demonstrating that the Kingdom of God was not an internal spiritual disposition, a set of ethical demands, or a compendium of universal truths, as suggested by the liberal and romantic lives, but a term used by Jesus to express his belief that the public earthly reign of God was imminent (see APOCALYPTICISM).

Schweitzer's portrait, presented in the last section of his history of the quest, builds on Weiss's understanding, and he too insists that Jesus was committed to an imminent eschatological expectation. Indeed, it is the extreme nature of the ESCHATOLOGY that elevates Jesus to cultural significance beyond his own. Schweitzer does not transform Jesus' eschatological PREACHING into modern-day spirituality or morality, but emphasizes its alien nature. Precisely because of his foreignness, he stands as a challenge to the morality of his own day and continues to stand as an indictment of every moral system since that time. However, it is not the content of Jesus' preaching that commends him, nor his mistaken Messianic self-consciousness. Rather it is the courage and commitment that he displayed in his self-sacrifice. Schweitzer posits that Jesus' initial belief in the coming Messianic trials did not materialize. As a result Jesus concluded that he alone could inaugurate the coming of the kingdom, forcing its inception by his sacrificial death. As Schweitzer describes it, Jesus therefore "lays hold of the wheel of the world to set it moving on that last revolution which is to bring all ordinary history to a close. It refuses to turn, and he throws himself upon it. Then it does turn; and crushes him. Instead of bringing in the eschatological conditions, he has destroyed them. The wheel rolls onward, and the mangled body of the one immeasurably great Man, who was strong enough to think of himself as the spiritual leader of mankind and to bend history to his purpose, is hanging upon it still. That is his victory and his reign" (Schweitzer 1910:370–371).

Repercussions of the Initial Quest

Strauss's investigation showed the futility of the rationalizing approach to the miraculous in the gospel materials while also demonstrating the force of the mythic language. Schweitzer's chronicle of the nineteenth-century lives was devastating, demonstrating that the "lives" were too often transpositions of their author's values onto the person of Jesus. They revealed, therefore, not what was distinctive about Jesus, but what the interpreter and his/her CULTURE understood to be of eminent value. When one coupled it with William Wrede's demonstration that the gospel of Mark could not be used as a historical framework for a portrait of Jesus, the façade of historical neutrality was demolished. Moreover, by following Weiss, Schweitzer had demonstrated that any understanding of the kingdom of God that ignored the kingdom's radically eschatological nature was in error. A historical understanding of the kingdom of God could not be reduced to an ethical ideal or to a set of timeless truths, but was a proclamation that the reign of God was about to occur on earth in a public manner.

As neutral histories, the initial lives must be considered as failures for three reasons. First, their imaginative substitutions for the gospels' integrative frameworks were deeply flawed. Second, the authors impressed upon Jesus a character that was the epitome of nineteenth-century reason and ETHICS, but bore little resemblance to that of an itinerant Palestinian teacher. Third, the writers substituted ethical and philosophical interpretations of the Kingdom of God for Jesus' eschatological preaching about the imminent in-breaking of God's reign.

The Period of No Quest

The failings of the initial lives and the challenges of Strauss, Weiss, and Wrede brought the lives to a standstill. The difficulties in discerning and arranging the sifted gospel material while avoiding the pitfalls of modernizing Jesus made the task almost impossible. From this point lives of Jesus focused on the nature of Jesus' teaching and on reinterpretations of his eschatological message. In 1926 Rudolf Bultmann published Jesus [Eng. trans. Jesus and The Word (1934)]. In this work he assembled the core of Jesus' teachings and concluded that Jesus presented his hearers with a radical call to relinquish self-reliance and accept that they were completely dependent on God's benevolence for their existence.

Bultmann sought to explicate the fundamental preaching of the early CHURCH in terms that would communicate with contemporary audiences by exposing the mythic form of this preaching and translating it into a form that would be meaningful in modern settings. His mode of "remything"—called demythologization—expressed the essential nature of the gospel in existential terms.

Bultmann did not actually compose a life of Jesus because he believed neither that one could or should be written. In the introduction to his work he makes this clear:

This book lacks all the phraseology which speaks of Jesus as great man, genius or hero; he appears neither as inspired nor as inspiring, his sayings are not called profound, nor his faith mighty, nor his nature child-like. There is also no consideration of the eternal values of his message, of his discovery of the infinite depths of the human soul or the like (Bultmann, 1934:8).

Here is a dismissal of every solution proposed by the initial quest, replaced by attention "limited to what he purposed, and hence to what in his purpose as a part of history makes a present demand on us" (Bultmann, 8).

Bultmann maintained that his interpretation of Jesus' message demonstrated a link between the preaching of Jesus and the preaching about Jesus because just as Jesus had presented the crisis of God's immediate call, so too, his followers created the same moment of existential crisis in their claim that the crucified Jesus was indeed God's Christ. Bultmann's interpretation also allowed for another conception of Jesus' eschatological message about the end of the world's structures. According to Bultmann, this was actually a mythical expression of Jesus' existential challenge clothed in the conceptual garb of first-century Judaism, that is, the eschatological preaching was a mythic profession of the radical contingency of human existence. Once this was recognized a modern listener could comprehend the nature of Jesus' claims, and being confronted by them, experience the demands of faith.

The New Quest

Bultmann's dicta held sway for approximately three decades. Then, in 1953, a former Bultmann student, Ernst Käsemann, delivered a lecture questioning his claim that significant historical evidence for a life of Jesus could not be found. Käsemann maintained that not only could coherence between Jesus' message and that of the early church be established, but that coherency extended to the behavior of Jesus as well. Käsemann's essay, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," argued that if the message of Jesus could point to the message of Easter, then one could use the message of Easter to discern elements in Jesus' life that were historically feasible. He thus called for a reexamination of the historical Jesus, initiating a New Quest.

The quest, which includes the work of Gerhard Ebeling and Ernst Fuchs, follows Bultmann in recasting the nature of historical inquiry as existential inquiry, but departs from him in arguing for its theological necessity. It also expands his understanding of valid historical data by delineating three criteria for authenticating sayings and actions of Jesus. A minimum historical base would be created if one accepted only those sayings or actions that were dissimilar to those found in Judaism and were distinct from the desires and needs of the early church. One could add to this base by accepting other teachings that were consistent with the first group and, finally, by considering materials that had multiple attestation.

Only one New Quester, Gunter Bornkamm, wrote a life of Jesus. Bornkamm's Jesus of Nazareth (1960) provides a minimalist sketch that follows many of Bultmann's analyses and his understanding of Jesus' primary message. The work expands Bultmann's data by incorporating actions of Jesus that produce the same call to decision that could be experienced in his preaching, such as Jesus' eating with outcasts and his healing of sinners.

Two problems plagued the New Quest. First, the complexity of its philosophical conceptions of language and history led more to debate than historical inquiry. Second, the criteria for discerning authenticity were circular and sometimes in tension with one another. As a result the Quest remained more a form of methodological and theological protest than a source of more "lives."

The Third Quest

In the last twenty years, lives of Jesus have begun to appear with such regularity that this period has been referred to as a Third Quest. Although it shares many traits with its progenitors (and often some of their failings as well), three characteristics distinguish this quest from its predecessors. First, it employs not only historical means of investigation, but methods gathered from sociology, anthropology, archeology, and literary criticism. Second, there is a concerted effort to situate Jesus more accurately in his cultural context, both Hellenic and Jewish. By means of multiple analyses of the social culture in which Jesus lived, writers are attempting to construct better understandings of the social, political, and economic factors that affected his teaching and activity. Third, the recent quest expands the materials considered as reliable sources for information about Jesus. In addition to the archeological and sociological data that are used, many lives also make use of the Gospel of Thomas and apocryphal gospels such as the gospel of Peter, and they place a significant emphasis on "Q" (the hypothetical source for material shared by Matthew and Luke, but not found in Mark).

The newest quest tends to take three paths. One traces lines of consistency between Jesus and the gospel accounts; another suggests that these do not occur; and a third relies on defining moments in Jesus' life and teaching to locate his social significance. The first group is typified by the work of N.T.Wright, A.E.Harvey, E.P.Sanders, and J.Meier. The second group is often identified with the Jesus Seminar, a collection of biblical scholars coordinated by Robert Funk who meet regularly to determine and isolate the authentic sayings of Jesus. Members of the seminar stress the noneschatological nature of Jesus' preaching, focus on his mission, and suggest that Jesus is better understood as an ancient Cynic or sage philosopher than as an itinerant eschatological prophet. Representative works include those of Marcus Borg and John Dominic Crossan.

Members of the third group include third-world interpreters, feminist scholars, and African American critics who maintain that many of the distinctive features of Jesus' preaching and actions, particularly as they reflected preference for the poor and the marginalized of society, were eliminated or diminished as the church became more a part of mainstream culture. The work of authors like Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, Leonardo Boff, and Miguez Bonino are indicative of the approaches taken. Members of this group understand their work as a form of recovering Jesus' true message. In this regard they bear resemblance to the first quest, except for them Jesus must be freed from the confines of social conformity and not dogmatic creedal claims. The incisive nature of these lives attests to their importance in bringing to light significant aspects of Jesus' claims and actions.

It is clear that the lives of the third quest are as varied as those of the first. In fact, it may be misleading to refer to this most recent activity as a coherent or cooperative venture. In many ways there are similarities to the previous quests; both historical and interpretive issues are addressed, the challenge to find the Jesus underneath the traditional epithets is still present, and a recognition that the conceptions of truth that are regnant in the culture require response is also at the forefront.

Conclusion

This history of the lives shows a constant ebb and flow in their production and their significance. Sometimes there appears to be a premium on creating new investigations. At others there is almost complete silence. This oscillation is a function of two factors: one internal to the search itself, the other of the audiences the lives address. The historical data from which lives of Jesus are created is always incomplete. There are simply too many gaps in our knowledge of Jesus, his contemporaries, and his earliest followers to remedy this. Moreover, it is unlikely that this situation will be changed either by recourse to other sources from antiquity or to more appeals to sociological and anthropological studies of Judaism or Roman culture. Further, because they seek to answer both historical and interpretive questions, as the significant values that are dominant in the culture shift, so too will the portraits of Jesus expand or contract to meet them. Finally, as long as Jesus remains a cultural icon as well as the fundamental figure of Christianity, lives of Jesus will continue to appear in the culture's media, be they critical histories, films, novels, plays, or musicals. To the degree that the authors of these new and different lives attend to strengths and weakness of their predecessors, they will succeed as interesting reinterpretations. To the degree that they fail to do this, they will fall prey to the same fate as those they seek to replace.

See also Bible and Literature; Bible Translation; Christology; Theology, Twentieth Century

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Charlotte. The Human Christ: The Search for the Historical Jesus. New York: Free Press, 1998.
- Bornkamm, Gunther. Jesus of Nazareth. Translated by Irene McLuskey and Fraser McLuskey with James Robinson. New York: Harper and Bros., 1960.
- Bultmann, Rudolf. Jesus and the Word. Translated by Louise Pettibone Smith and Erminie Huntress Lantero. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1934.
- Crossan, John Dominic. The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant. San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1991.
- Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schüssler. Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation. New York: Continuum, 2000.
- Herzog, William R., II. Jesus, Justice, and the Reign of God. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 2000.
- Johnson, Luke Timothy. The Real Jesus: The Misguided Quest for the Historical Jesus and the Truth of the Traditional Gospels. San Francisco: Harper Collins, 1996.
- Keck, Leander. Who is Jesus: History in Perfect Tense. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2001.
- Meier, John P. A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus. 3 vols. Anchor Bible Reference Library. New York: Doubleday, 1991–2001.
- Renan, Ernst. The Life of Jesus. Modern Library. New York: Random House, 1927.
- Sanders, E.P. The Historical Figure of Jesus. London: Allen Lane/Penguin Books, 1993.
- Schweitzer, Albert. The Quest of the Historical Jesus. Translated by W.Montgomery. New York: Macmillan, 1956.
- Strauss, David Friedrich. The Life of Jesus Critically Examined. Lives of Jesus Series. Translated by George Eliot. Reprint. Introduction by Peter C.Hodgson. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1972.
- Telford, William R. "Major Trends and Interpretive Issues in the Study of Jesus." In Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research, edited by B. Chilton and C.A.Evans, 33–74. New Testament Tools and Studies 19. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1994.
- Wright, N.T. Jesus and The Victory of God: Christian Origins and the Question of God. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1996.

S.J.KRAFTCHICK

JEWEL, JOHN (1522–1571)

English theologian. John Jewel was born in the parish of Berimber, Devonshire, England, on May 24, 1522, and died at Monkton Farleigh, Wiltshire, on September 23, 1571. He studied at Merton College, Oxford, and received his B.A. from Corpus Christi College in 1540. On the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, he lost his fellowship at Corpus Christi College and was forced to flee from ENGLAND. He was a Marian exile at Frankfurt in March 1555, but then joined Peter Martyr Vermigli at Strasbourg soon thereafter; the next year he followed him to Zurich. When Mary died in 1558, he returned to England. Jewel served as bishop of Salisbury from January 21, 1560, until his death.

Jewel was chosen to lead the literary offensive against the Roman Catholics who met at the Council of Trent (1545–1563), and to define the position of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND against Roman Catholic criticism. The Roman Catholic critics saw in Protestantism the multiplication of sects and gross immorality resulting from the Protestants' lawlessness and irreligion because of their doctrine of JUSTIFICATION OF GRACE by FAITH and their repudiation of the DOCTRINE of papal AUTHORITY. Protestants and members of the Church of England were seen as immoral, heretical, divisive, and schismatic. Jewel was commissioned to respond to these accusations, and in 1562 he published his Apologia pro Ecclesia Anglicana, which was the first systematic statement of the Church of England against the Church of Rome. It was translated into English as An Apology of the Church of England.

The Apology had a twofold purpose: to present the truth about and refute the rumors against the Church of England, and to show the errors of the papacy that prevented the English Church from joining the Council of Trent. He defended the Church of England as the true church, and insisted that the English Reformation was the restoration of the true church in England after Roman medieval abuses. He denounced transubstantiation, purgatory, the CELIBACY of CLERGY, and the worship of SAINTS and images as "trifles, follies and baubles." Using scripture and the first four ecumenical councils, Jewel defended the two sacraments of BAPTISM and Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER), communion with both the bread and wine, and the threefold orders of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. He insisted that the practices and beliefs of the Church of England were older and thus better than later Roman Catholic innovations.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Clergy, Marriage of; Deaconess, Deacon

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Ayre, John, ed. The Works of John Jewel. 4 vols. Cambridge, UK: Parker Society, 1845–1850.

Booby, John E., ed. An Apology of the Church of England by John Jewel. New York: Church Publishing, 2002.

Secondary Sources:

Booby, John E. John Jewel as Apologist of the Church of England. London: SPCK, 1963.

Southgate, Wyndham Mason. John Jewel and the Problem of Doctrinal Authority. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1962.

DONALD S.ARMENROUT

JEWS FOR JESUS

The term “Jews for Jesus” has been used since the early 1970s to designate Jewish believers in Jesus, Jews who have embraced the Christian faith yet retained their identity as Jews. The group that has formally carried the name “Jews for Jesus” originated in 1970 in San Francisco under the leadership of Moishe Rosen, a missionary of the American Board of Mission to the Jews. The organization aimed to evangelize Jews who were influenced by the counterculture, adapting its evangelization messages and manners to the style of the new generation. Members of the group wore jeans and T-shirts, grew their hair, and embraced the musical trends of the day. Jews for Jesus also gave expression to the new emphasis in American CULTURE on ETHNICITY and the searching for roots. It advocated the idea that Jews did not have to give up on their identity as Jews, but rather could rediscover themselves as Jews at the same time that they embraced Jesus as their savior. The organization has used Jewish names, symbols, and expressions in its missionary literature. It also has emphasized its support for the State of Israel and has called its musical band “The Liberated Wailing Wall.” Starting out as a local group in the San Francisco Bay area, Jews for Jesus has grown to become one of the largest missions in the nation, with branches outside America as well.

In its THEOLOGY and style, Jews for Jesus has become part of a larger movement of Jewish Christians that came about in the 1970s and 1980s. Often calling themselves messianic Jews, or Jewish believers in Jesus, such communities have promoted the idea that Jews who embrace Christianity should not assimilate into the general Christian culture or join regular churches, but instead should create their own communities and retain their Jewish heritage. Jewish-Christian congregations differ as to the amount of Jewish TRADITION they choose to retain. The more “traditionalist” communities have introduced Arks and Torah scrolls into their assemblies, their members wear yarmulkes during services, and they celebrate Jewish holidays such as Chanukah and Purim. All Jewish-Christian congregations celebrate Passover, and most have chosen to conduct their prayer meetings on Friday nights or Saturday mornings. The notion that they have transcended the historical boundaries between JUDAISM and Christianity, overcoming old, seemingly irreconcilable differences and injuries to amalgamate the Christian faith with Jewish ethnicity, has served as a source of energy and a sense of mission for the movement’s members. By the early 2000s, there were about 300 congregations in America, as well as dozens more in Israel and throughout the Jewish world, and the movement is growing.

Jews for Jesus, and the movement of Jewish believers in Jesus in general, have advocated the faith and values of the conservative evangelical segment of Christianity. As such, they point to a great adaptability by evangelical Christianity in its relation to the cultural choices of the baby boom generation. They also reflect the growing appreciation of this segment of Christianity for Jews as the object of biblical prophecies and as a nation destined to regain its old status as the Chosen People.

See also Evangelicalism; Evangelism; Jesus Movement; Philo-Semitism

References and Further Reading

Ariel, Yaakov. Evangelizing the Chosen People: Missions to the Jews in America 1880–2000.

Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Feher, Shoshanah. Passing Over Easter. Walnut Creek, CA: Altamira Press, 1998.

Harris-Shapiro, Carol. Messianic Judaism: A Rabbi's Journey Through Religious Change in America. Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 1999.

Lipson, Juliene G. Jews for Jesus: An Anthropological Study. New York: AMS Press, 1990.

Pruter, Karl. Jewish Christians in the United States: A Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1987.

Rausch, David A. Messianic Judaism: Its History, Theology and Polity. New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1982.

Rosen, Moishe, and William Proctor. Jews for Jesus. Old Tappan, NJ: Fleming H. Revell, 1974.

YAAKOV ARIEL

JOHNSON, JAMES (c. 1839–1917)

African missionary. Johnson was born in the SIERRA LEONE colony, a settlement founded in the late eighteenth century as a Christian experiment and a haven for recaptured African slaves. By the time he was old enough to go to school, the colony was largely Christian thanks to the energetic efforts of evangelical missionary agencies like the Church Mission Society (CMS). Educated by the CMS and ordained in the Anglican Church, Johnson's illustrious career spanned the best part of six decades and included extended service in both Sierra Leone and Nigeria.

Throughout his career Johnson combined an effective pastoral ministry with extensive missionary labor. A penchant for crusading piety earned him the sobriquet "Holy Johnson." Remarkably influential in church and society, he had a seat on the Lagos Legislative Council from 1886 to 1894 and was made assistant bishop of Western Equatorial Africa in 1900.

Intrepid, energetic, visionary, and given to dogmatism, Johnson emerged as the prophet of the late nineteenth-century African Church movement. He decried the "foreignness" and foreign control of the emerging African church, and proclaimed the ideal of an autonomous "nondenominational" African church that was accommodated in all respects to the African heritage. Arguably ahead of his time, he remains a complex individual who advocated African names but never changed his own, and who remained unwaveringly loyal to the Anglican church even when his militant advocacy for independent African churches inspired an African independent church movement.

He is best remembered as one of the most significant transitional leaders in late nineteenth-century West Africa who embodied the tensions and dilemmas inherent in the "mission-to-church" process. Ultimately the ideals and ideology that he championed were destined—albeit in modified forms—to shape the future of African Christianity and set the stage for a new epoch in the history of Protestantism.

See also African Theology; Anglicanism; Missions

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Johnson, James. A Brief History of my Life. London: Unpublished reports, 1908.

Secondary Sources:

Ayandele, E.A. Holy Johnson: Pioneer of African Nationalism, 1836–1917. London: Frank Cass & Co. Ltd., 1970.

Hanciles, Jehu J. Euthanasia of a Mission: African Church Autonomy in the Colonial Context. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 2002.

Sanneh, L. West African Christianity: The Religious Impact. New York: Orbis Books, 1983.

JEHU J.HANCILES

JOHNSON, SAMUEL (1709–1784)

English scholar and literary critic. Born in Lichfield, ENGLAND in 1709, Samuel Johnson was a lay member of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, writer, poet, literary critic, and theological and ethical commentator on church and society. Johnson's career was desultory and often disappointing. His Oxford education (Pembroke College) was interrupted by ill health, and his M.A. came to him only after the appearance of his best-known work, his Dictionary of the English Language (1755). His doctorate was an honorary Doctorate of Laws, conferred first by Trinity College, Dublin, and then by Oxford. He published much about Shakespeare, and on the works of other English poets (Lives of the English Poets, 1779–1781). His Rambler (1749–1752) and Idler (1758–1760) commented sharply on contemporary irreligion and superficiality. He saw a key to the religious state of the nation, in its weakness and possible rejuvenation, in the observance of the Lord's Day.

A staunch Protestant, Johnson insisted that the Roman Church had an underlying piety: "...there is no idolatry in the mass; they believe God to be there, and they adore him" (Boswell's Life, 1769). He encouraged a high regard for the English church and for its LITURGY. He persuaded his colleague and biographer James Boswell in The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides that "a form of prayer for publick worship is in general most decent and edifying. Solennia verba have a kind of prescriptive sanctity, and make a deeper impression on the mind than extemporaneous effusions, in which, as we know not what they are to be, we cannot readily acquiesce."

Johnson is best understood through his prayers in his Prayers and Meditations, published posthumously, as he had wished, in 1785. He fasted in Holy Week, and renewed his baptismal COVENANT at every Easter. He perceived the central issue of religion and all life as redemption (Rambler, No. 110): "Where there is no hope, there can be no endeavour. A constant and unfailing obedience is above the reach of terrestrial diligence; and therefore the progress of life could only have been the natural descent of negligent despair from crime to crime, had not the universal persuasion of forgiveness, to be obtained by proper means of reconciliation, recalled those to the paths of virtue whom their passions had solicited aside; and animated to new attempts, and firmer perseverance, those whom difficulty had discouraged, or negligence surprised."

Johnson died in London in 1784.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Johnson, Samuel. Prayers and Meditations. Edited by Elton Trueblood as Doctor Johnson 's Prayers. New York: Harper, 1947.

———. The Yale Edition of the Works of Samuel Johnson. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1958.

Secondary Sources:

Boswell, James: The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson (1785). London and New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, n.d.

———. The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. (1791). Edited by Edward Malone. London: Griffin, Bohn, 1862.

Strachey, Lytton. "Johnson, Samuel," in Dictionary of National Biography, Vol. X, 919–935. London: Oxford University Press, 1921.

DAVID H. TRIPP

JONES, RUFUS MATTHEW (1863–1947)

Quaker philosopher. Rufus Jones was a proponent of the mystical life and the leading voice in Quakerism for the first half of the twentieth century (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). Reared on a farm in South China, Maine, Jones taught philosophy for many years at Harverford College in Pennsylvania. He shared the liberal, pro-gressive, optimistic spirit of his age, but was no mere rationalist. A contemporary of EVELYN UNDERHILL and Dean Inge, he lived in an era of revived interest in mysticism. The ideas of RALPH WALDO EMERSON and WILLIAM JAMES had a powerful influence on his thinking.

Jones was both a scholar of mysticism and an experienced mystic, and wrote of the spiritual life with a vividness that was contagious. He was especially attracted to the fourteenth-century mystics Eckhart and Tauler, although the mysticism that he promoted for his own day differed. He distinguished negative from affirmative mystics. The former stressed withdrawal from the physical world perceived by sense and studied by reason, searching for God through ASCETICISM, and annihilation of the self, striving for the fleeting moment of ecstasy, the loss of individuality in the endless ocean of divinity. Affirmation mystics, however, valued the natural world as the place where divinity revealed itself. Union with God heightened rather than destroyed personality, driving the mystic back into the world for service. No longer reserved for the few, the mystical life was within the reach of all who could trust their intuition of the nearness of the God who dwelt within them.

Jones himself was a person of service, a founder and longtime chairperson of the AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE, whose relief efforts in Europe after the two major wars of the twentieth century earned the agency the Nobel Peace Prize in 1947. The generation of Rufus Jones brought about a renaissance in Quakerism in study and practice. Jones reinterpreted Quaker history, portraying Quakers as heirs to the medieval continental mystics. Focusing on Quakers' inner experience, rather than on DOCTRINE, he labored to heal the nineteenth-century divisions among the Friends. He yearned to bring more than just Quakers into dialogue and was an active ecumenist. Through his gifts as a much-traveled orator and a writer of more than fifty books, he exerted a greater influence on other Protestants than any previous Friend.

See also Ecumenism; Emerson, Ralph Waldo; James, William; Society of Friends in North America

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Fosdick, Harry Emerson. Rufus Jones Speaks to Our Time. New York: Macmillan, 1951.

Walters, Kerry. Rufus Jones: Essential Writings. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2001.

Secondary Sources:

Hinshaw, David. Rufus Jones: Master Quaker. New York: Putnam, 1951.

Vining, Elizabeth Gray. Friend of Life: The Biography of Rufus M. Jones. Philadelphia, PA: Lippincott, 1958.

MICHAEL BIRKEL

JOWETT, BENJAMIN (1817–1893)

Anglican cleric and biblical scholar. Jowett was born April 15, 1817 at Camberwell, ENGLAND and died October 1, 1893 at Balliol College, Oxford. Educated at Balliol he spent the remainder of his career at the college and university, where he served as a tutor and later master of the college, as well as vice-chancellor of the university. Ordained in 1845, Jowett was, by nineteenth-century Anglican standards, a theological liberal with affinities for JOHN LOCKE, GEORG W.F. HEGEL, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, and FERDINAND C. BAUER. A noted Greek scholar, he served as Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford and produced translations of Aristotle and Plato. As a biblical scholar he wrote important commentaries on Paul's letters to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans (1855), basing his commentaries on the German philologist Karl Lachmann's recently published Greek text. This text was based in part on the oldest known Greek texts, instead of the textus receptus that provided the basis for the authoritative King James Version of the BIBLE.

His essay "On the Interpretation of Scripture" appeared in the controversial, and by British standards, liberal Essays and Reviews (1860). In the essay he argued that readers of Scripture should read it as they would any other book. Yet, in spite of arguing for a scientific approach to Scripture, he made little use of historical critical methodologies. Instead he focused on literary and philological issues, approaching the text more as a classical scholar would approach Aristotle or Plato, seeking to discover the plain sense of the original authors. Still, he helped pave the way for later critical scholars, including B.F. Westcott and F.A. Hort. As a churchman Jowett worked to create a tolerant and comprehensive CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and as an educator he argued for allowance of divergent viewpoints and the admission of Protestant nonconformists to the universities.

See also Bible, King James, Version; Broad Church; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Nonconformity; Toleration

References and Further Reading

Barr, James. "Jowett and the 'Original Meaning' of Scripture." Religious Studies (1982):433–437.
Hinchliff, Peter. Benjamin Jowett and the Christian Religion. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987.

R.D.CORNWALL

JUDAISM

For centuries the Christian Church joined governmental authority in restricting the legal and social standing of Jews and condemning Judaism. According to church teaching, Jews, since they had rejected Jesus as Messiah, were condemned to God's wrath, even as their suffering and plight since the destruction of the Second Temple were indication of divine rejection. Even though the REFORMATION placed many of the doctrines of the medieval church under scrutiny, this did not include the TRADITION of Christian hostility toward the Jews. Initially a number of Jewish scholars welcomed the Reformation, suggesting that the Reformation heralded the coming of the Messiah: some were encouraged by MARTIN LUTHER'S tract "That Jesus Christ Was Born a Jew." Yet the subsequent writings of Luther and the other reformers concerning Jesus and Judaism hardly differed from traditional perspectives.

While the reformers' widespread disavowal of traditional affirmation and tenets might have entailed a new understanding of Judaism and Jews, there were nonetheless some reformers who adopted a more sympathetic attitude, even though they shared their coreligionists' contempt for Judaism and the Jewish nation. Justus Jonas, a companion of Luther, for example, stressed the missionary dimension of Luther's views. In his opinion Christians have a duty to lead Jews to Christ. Another Lutheran, ANDREAS OSI-ANDER, the reformer of Nuremberg and pastor at the Church of St. Lorenz in Nuremberg, produced a work that refuted the traditional blood-libel charge. In his view it was ludicrous to believe that Jews should murder children and then use their blood for ritual purposes. Jewish law, he pointed out, specifies that Jews are forbidden to kill any human being, and to make the use of blood from animals, much less a human child. No Jew, he noted, had ever made such a claim about other Jews. The origins of this charge were no doubt attributable to the unsubstantiated claims of those whose children had died of neglect or unknown causes.

Other reformers emphasized the total depravity of humankind. In their view gentiles and Jews stood guilty before God. Thus it would be a mistake to insist that the Jews were particularly villainous. JOHN CALVIN, the Genevan reformer, for example, argued that when Scripture spoke of the Jews and their sinfulness, the Jews were seen as a symbol of all humanity. When Jesus spoke of the hypocrisy of Jews in building the sepulchers for the prophets they themselves had killed, Calvin noted that there was a contemporary parallel: "The world, in general, while not daring to scorn God utterly or at least rise up against Him to His face, devises a means of worshipping God's shadow in place of God:

just so it plays a game over the prophets.” Even though Christians might erect statues of Peter and other SAINTS, their treatment of the faithful in their own day illustrates how they would react if Peter were among them.

Unlike Luther, who believed that God’s special covenantal relationship with the Jews had come to an end, Calvin maintained that God often had to judge Israel. However, this does not mean that God’s COVENANT with the Jews has been broken. Commenting on Matthew 27:25 (“his blood be on us and on our children”), Calvin stated that even though God had avenged the death of Jesus with fearful means, he had left a remnant so that the covenant would not be destroyed: “God in their very treachery displays the constancy of his faith, and to show that his covenant was not struck with Abraham to no effect. He rescues those he freely elected from the general destruction. Thus his truth ever arises superior to all obstacles of human incredulity.”

During this period it was believed among the reformers that there would be a large-scale conversion of the Jewish people. Calvin’s successor at Geneva, THEODORE BEZA, revived Luther’s view that Christian churches were largely responsible for the current unbelief among the Jews: “Those who today call themselves Christians...are very certainly punished and will be in the future, because, solely under the guidance of wickedness and perversity, they have mistreated in every way these people, so holy in their forefathers, actually hardening them further (against Christianity) by settling before their eyes the example of an odious idolatry. As for myself, I gladly pray every day for the Jews.”

Beza went on to acknowledge the justice of divine anger against the Jewish people, but he pleaded that Christ would remember his covenants: “Grant that we (gentiles),” he prayed, “may advance in thy grace, so that we may not be for them (Jews) instruments of thy divine wrath, but that we may rather become capable, through the knowledge of thy words and the example of a holy life, of bringing them back into the true way by virtue of thy Holy Spirit, so that all nations and all peoples together may glorify thee for eternity.”

The early reformers thus reformulated previous Christian teaching about Jews. The traditional consensus that Jews exerted a pernicious influence on Christian society was restated. Some theologians, such as Osiander, Calvin, and Beza, despaired of the Jews’ refusal to accept Christ, yet basing themselves on Scripture they anticipated the eventual conversion of the Jewish people. Despite this shift in attitude among a number of Christian thinkers, anti-Jewish agitation that had inaugurated a series of expulsions from the latter half of the fifteenth century continued in intensity. Senior clergy as well as secular rulers were involved in frequent attacks on the Jewish population, and expulsions continued to the latter part of the sixteenth century.

There were, however, some Protestant figures who adopted a more positive appraisal of Judaism. The Huguenot scholar Joseph Justus Scaliger, who served as professor at the University of Leiden from 1593, for example, argued that it was only possible to establish the true text and meaning of Scripture by gaining an understanding of rabbinic sources. Jews, he maintained, should be permitted to return to western Europe not simply because of their economic importance, but because of their learning. In his view, Christians would be able to bring Jews to Christ if they understood Talmudic and post-biblical literature.

The seventeenth century brought a lively interest in Jewish learning among certain reformed circles. It was believed that the church’s future and the imminence of the Second Coming was bound up with the CONVERSION of the Jews. Some suggested that the conversion of the Jews would not be an event toward the end of the age, but rather foreshadowed a time of blessing for the CHURCH on earth. Such a notion arose out of intense BIBLE study, particularly in connection with the Book of Revelation, which was seen as offering a detailed account of church history from Pentecost to the Day of Judgment.

The Cambridge scholar Joseph Mede held that the future millennium would be inaugurated or shortly followed by the return of the Jews to Christ in their ancient land. In his view, the Jews would be converted in a supernatural manner. Other scholars believed that Revelation 13–19 contained a divine promise of the overthrow of the enemies of the Gospel, interpreted as both the papacy and the Turks. This would be preliminary to a period of latter-day glory for the church, which would see the conversion of the Jews as part of the movement of the Spirit of God. Through this process earthly kingdoms would submit to the gospel so that they could be said to have become “the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ.”

Even among reformers critical of millenarianism, there was a widespread belief in the conversion of the Jews. Hence Robert Baillie, one of the Scottish commissioners to the Westminster Assembly, contended on the basis of Romans 11 that the Jews would eventually turn to Christ. In the NETHERLANDS Protestant theologians followed a similar line. In the marginal notes on Romans 11 the reformed translators of the 1637 Dutch version of the Bible argued that the “whole of Israel” in this epistle implies the fullness of the people of Israel “according to the flesh.” Thus, they maintained that the Jewish nation would eventually acknowledge Christ as Lord.

By the middle of the seventeenth century, as England was suffering from CIVIL WAR, it was suggested this tragedy was the result of God’s judgment for previous cruelty and indifference toward the Jewish people. Those who pleaded for Jewish readmission contended that if Jews were allowed back into Britain, they would hear some of the best gospel preaching on earth. This, they went on, would bring about their conversion to Christ, leading to a golden age for the church. To these religious arguments were added economic and political concerns. As part of this campaign OLIVER CROMWELL invited Menasseh ben Israel, an Amsterdam scholar and rabbi, to ENGLAND to argue the case for the Jews to be readmitted to England. This visit, however, stirred up considerable opposition from numerous critics such as the pamphleteer Willam Prynne and other Puritans who were skeptical about the mass conversion of the Jews (see PURITANISM). In their view the reference to Israel in Romans 11:25f. referred to the whole New Testament church of both gentiles and Jews. Other Puritans adopted a more welcoming attitude. Edward Elton, for example, remarked that Christians ought “not to hate the Jews (as many do) only because they are Jews, which name among many is so odious that they think they cannot call a man worse than to call him a Jew; but, beloved, this ought not to be so, for we are bound to love and to honour the Jews, as being the ancient people of God, to wish them well, and to be in earnest in prayer for their conversion.”

Such sentiments were not widely shared; throughout Europe Jews were viewed with contempt and hostility. These attitudes reached a climax with the publication of Entdecktes Judenthum (Judaism Unmasked) in 1711 by Johann Andreas Eisenmenger who served as professor of oriental languages at Königsberg. In his view, the best way to defend Christianity against the Jewish threat was to rehearse the traditional medieval charges against the Jews. This work illustrated that despite the changing attitudes brought about by the Reformation, deep-seated Judeophobia persisted in the early modern period.

Undeterred by such an attack, the Jewish community believed it could curtail the distribution of Eisenmenger's treatise. Enlisting the support of the court Jew, Samson Wertheimer, as well as various German princes, they gained the support of the emperor Leopold. Although the book was eventually published after Eisenmenger's death by permission of the king of Prussia, the emperors retained their ban on the book because it was perceived as prejudicial to the public and to the Christian religion. The early modern period thus witnessed the continuation of the long tradition of Christian ANTI-SEMITISM alongside a growing awareness of the need to improve the position of Jewry. Voices were raised on different sides of this debate by leading figures of the Reformation. Yet even those Reformers who encouraged their coreligionists to adopt a more positive attitude toward the Jewish community shared many of the prejudices of previous ages.

The ENLIGHTENMENT, however, brought about a dramatic alteration in the condition of the Jews; nonetheless, a number of Christian writers continued to attack Jewry on rationalist grounds. In FRANCE, Protestants influenced by the Enlightenment sought to ameliorate the condition of the Jews, yet even they were unable to free themselves from Christian assumptions about Jewish guilt for killing Christ. During this period a number of major thinkers of the age sought to encourage Judeophobia. To escape from such denigration, enlightened Jews disassociated from Judaism and a number sought to gain social acceptance by banding together as a new Jewish-Christian sect.

By the end of the eighteenth century, the spirit of the Enlightenment encouraged Christian Europe to improve the condition of Jewish existence. With the establishment of the Napoleonic era, Jewish life dramatically changed. In France the summoning of the Great Sanhedrin heralded Jewish emancipation. In such a climate Jewish reformers attempted to adapt Jewish WORSHIP to modern conditions. Reform temples appeared throughout GERMANY, yet ironically many Jews influenced by the Romantic movement were indifferent to such alterations to Jewish practice. Instead of providing a basis for the improvement of Judaism, the Reform movement undermined traditional Judaism and intensified Christian antipathy to the Jewish faith.

In the nineteenth century a number of Jewish apologists endeavoured to ameliorate the condition of the Jewish population. In England the Tory Prime Minister advocated Jewish emancipation; such activity provoked a hostile response from various critics who denigrated Judaism in terms reminiscent of previous centuries. In France the Dreyfus Affair stimulated anti-Jewish feelings and revived the medieval Christian charge of ritual murder, giving rise to widespread anti-Jewish sentiment. At this time the Christian legend of the Wandering Jew, who was destined to roam the earth for having rejected Christ became a major theme of French literature. French Judeophobia was further intensified by the writings of socialists. Similarly, in Germany advocates of racism as well as philosophers vilified the Jewish people and their traditions.

During the second half of the nineteenth century, the Jewish community suffered further outbreaks of hostility. In Germany various racist publications attacked Jews, and the researches of Christian biblical scholars undermined the traditional belief that the Torah was given by God to Moses on Mount Sinai. Similar attitudes were expressed in France by a variety of Christian writers. At the end of the century the Dreyfus Affair in France raised fundamental questions about the viability of Jewish life in the diaspora. In the years leading up to World War I, Jews were viewed as scapegoats for the problems that beset German society. After World War I, economic problems related to war reparations and widespread unemployment led to the rise of Hitler and Nazism with its government-imposed anti-Semitic policies.

Following World War II, the devastation of Europe in general and the displacement of what remained of the Jewish population increased the desire among Jews to establish the state of Israel, which occurred in 1948. While many Christians favored this development, some evangelical Protestants and fundamentalists have strongly supported Israel owing to their millennialist beliefs in “end time” prophesy, the imminent return of Christ, and the importance of the conversion of the Jews in this view.

In modern times, ways are being sought to transcend the legacy of anti-Semitism. Various Protestant groups have issued decrees denouncing anti-Semitism and encouraging positive Jewish-Christian encounters in a broad ecumenical spirit. Pioneering Christian scholars have attempted to understand the Jewishness of Jesus—modern CHRISTOLOGY, they believe, should be purged of any anti-Jewish bias. God’s enduring covenant with the Jewish people has been emphasized, and various theories have been propounded to illustrate that Jesus’ death and resurrection do not replace God’s revelation on Mt. Sinai. In this context the traditional idea of Christian mission has been replaced by the notion of Christian witness. No longer do most Christians feel compelled to convert the Jewish people; rather, Judaism is affirmed as a valid religious tradition with its own spiritual integrity. These are signs of hope as Jews and Protestants stand together at the beginning of a new millennium.

See also Holocaust; Millenarians & Millennialism; Philo-Semitism

References and Further Reading

- Cohn-Sherbok, Dan. Anti-Semitism: A History. Stroud: Sutton, 2001.
- . The Crucified Jew: Twenty Centuries of Christian Anti-Semitism. London: Harper Collins Religious, 1992.
- Flannery, Edward. The Anguish of the Jews. New York: Paulist Press, 1985.
- Grosser, Paul. Anti-Semitism: Cause and Effects. New York: 1983.
- Grosser, Paul and Edwin Halperin. Anti-Semitism: The Causes and Effects of a Prejudice. Secaucus, NJ: Citadel Press, 1976.
- Keith, Graham. Hatred Without a Cause. London: Paternoster, 1997.
- Lindemann, Albert. Anti-Semitism before the Holocaust. New York: Longman, 2000.
- Littell, Franklin. Crucifixion of the Jews. New York: Harper and Row, 1975.
- Litvinoff, B. The Burning Bush: Antisemitism and World History. New York: Dutton, 1988.
- Nichols, William. Christian Antisemitism: A History of Hate. Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 1993.
- Parkes, James. Antisemitism. London: Vallentine, Mitchell, 1963.
- Poliakov, Leon. History of Anti-Semitism. Vol. 1. 4 vols. London: Elek Books, 1965–1985.

DAN COHN-SHERBOK

JUDSON FAMILY

Adoniram Judson was one of the first American foreign missionaries and remains one of the most famous in mission, and especially Baptist, history. Judson was born in Malden, Massachusetts, and graduated from Brown University (1807) and from the first class of Andover Seminary (1810). He was one of the founders of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS (ABCFM) in 1810, under whose auspices he and others sailed for India on February 19, 1812. He married Ann ("Nancy") Hasseltine (1789–1826) on February 5, 1812, and the two were commissioned on February 6, 1812. En route to INDIA, they became convinced of believer's BAPTISM by immersion and were baptized on September 6, 1812 by WILLIAM CAREY in Calcutta. The Judsons left the ABCFM, had to leave India, and then went to Burma (Myanmar). In 1814 the Baptist General Convention for Foreign Missions was established in the UNITED STATES to support them.

The Judsons won converts to Christianity and engaged in translation work. Adoniram produced a major Burmese dictionary (2nd ed., 1849) and a Burmese translation of the Bible (1834). Ann bore two children who died in infancy; in 1826 Ann died and was buried in Burma. Her heroism expressed through letters and publications made her one of the most famous female missionaries in American history. Both the nineteenth and twentieth centuries saw a veritable flood of hagiographic literature on Ann Judson.

In 1834 Adoniram married Sarah Hall Boardman (1803–1845), the widow of George Dana Boardman, and also a missionary in Burma. Sarah was also a translator. She bore seven children with Adoniram, five of whom outlived both parents (Abby Ann became a Spiritualist in 1890, and Edward did pastoral work in New Jersey and New York City, where he established the Judson Memorial Baptist Church). When Sarah became ill in Burma, the Judsons sailed back to the United States. Sarah died en route and was buried on St. Helena.

In the United States for less than a year, Adoniram met and married in 1846 Emily Chubbock (1817–1854), who was a popular romance author under the pseudonym Fanny Forester. They returned to Burma. Adoniram became ill in 1850 and went to sea for his health, where he died and was buried. Emily bore two children, one of whom died in infancy; the other (Emily) lived to 1911. Emily returned to the United States in 1851 and prepared the materials for Francis Wayland's (he was president of Brown University) biography of Adoniram (1853). Emily died the next year.

See also American Baptist Church; Baptists; Baptist Missions, Missions; Bible Translation; Spiritualism

References and Further Reading

Anderson, Courtney. To the Golden Shore: The Life of Adoniram Judson. Boston: Little, Brown, 1956; reprint, Valley Forge, PA: Judson, 1987.

Brumberg, Joan Jacobs. Mission for Life: The Story of Adoniram Judson. New York: Free Press/London: Collier Macmillan, 1980.

James, Sharon. My Heart in His Hands: Ann Judson of Burma: A Life with Selections from her Memoir and Letters. Durham, UK: Evangelical Press, 1998.

Robert, Dana. American Women in Mission: A Social History of Their Thought and Practice. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1997.

Wayland, Francis. A Memoir of the Life and Labors of the Rev. Adoniram Judson, D.D. 2 vols. Boston: Phillips, Sampson, and Company, 1853.

DAVID M.SCHOLER

JUNGIANISM

Jungianism is the term given to theories of the Swiss psychiatrist Carl Gustav Jung and his system of depth psychology, which he called “analytical psychology.” It is similar to Freudianism, Sigmund Freud’s theory of psychoanalysis. In a pejorative sense, the terms refer to overly zealous followers who subscribe to a set of teachings that have become hypostatized into the equivalent of a religion. In a more benign, sociological sense, such terms can also mean the final stage of a movement that has become a recognized social institution.

It is not surprising that the constructs of depth psychology should have taken on a religious meaning, for analogies between Freud and Jung and the Old and New Testaments abound in the history of depth psychology. While Freud identified with his Jewishness, he maintained that he was an atheist and that psychoanalysis was a science and not a religion. However, his comments on religion, while pejorative, refer almost exclusively to images from the Old Testament. Jung, meanwhile, ranged throughout the Old and New Testament—his Answer to Job, for instance—but he was primarily engulfed in the Imago Christi of the New Testament, the Virgin Mary, and the aesthetic and moral struggle against evil as it was waged in the Gospels. Jung even embarked on a quest later in his life to analyze and unite the symbolism of the Catholic and Protestant faiths. He was also knowledgeable about the symbolism of different world religions and the iconography of preliterate cultures. Thus, analytical psychology was much more visionary, metaphorical, and cross-cultural than Freud’s system.

One reduced the symbolism of other cultures to fit the theory of psychoanalysis. The goal of Freud and his followers was to convert others not to Judaism, but rather to the analytic way of thinking. They did this chiefly by addressing the great problems of modernity—alienation, material attachment and loss, the importance of delayed gratification, and the threat of instantaneous annihilation. Jung’s analytical psychology, on the other hand, included the myth of the resurrection of Jesus, but now transmuted into a secularized psychology of transcendence. In this process, individuation was initiated by a confrontation between consciousness and the unconscious, leading to an expansion of consciousness. The end product was the integration of the opposites by means of the transcendent function, a condition that Jung considered a state of spiritual maturity. Jung was more interested in a shift of the center of personality from the ego to the self. For him, the outward details of a life were always preempted by the vicissitudes of inner spiritual transformation.

The religious analogy is made a little more complicated, however, by historical comparisons between theories of depth psychology and certain traditions of religious mysticism. In Jung's personal life, the religious influences appeared to have come from transformative visions experienced at an early age, growing up in a Protestant household where his father had been a minister stationed in an asylum for psychiatric patients, and other influences, such as an early exposure to Asian religions and other family members' involvement with the occult. This was to prove problematic for later interpreters, as we now have a growing corpus of works on Jung and Christianity, Jung and SPIRITUALISM, Jung and Shamanism, and Jung and Asian thought, all trying to understand Jung's connection to religion, organized or not.

The most scathing (and also, unfortunately, now the most well-known) exegesis on Jungianism has been the faulty scholarship of the clinical psychologist Richard Noll. In The Jung Cult (1994), Noll asserted that Jung was a Gnostic sun worshipper, his depth psychology was self-consciously launched as a religion, and his followers were the new acolytes of a worldwide spiritual movement whose purpose was to displace Christianity. Noll followed this erroneously conceived academic study with a widely circulated trade book titled Aryan Christ: The Secret Life of Carl Jung (1997). In it, he further maintained that Jung was not only a Gnostic sun-worshipper out to destroy the institutions of Christianity, but also a Nazi. Thus, Jung's followers were automatically also Nazi sympathizers.

The Jung historian Sonu Shamdasani was able to correct Noll's distorted and sensationalist interpretation by publishing Cult Fictions: c.g. Jung and the Founding of Analytical Psychology (1998). Nevertheless, the damage had been done. Noll's work was widely discussed in the public press, more so in the UNITED STATES than abroad, while Shamdasani's work, even though awarded the prestigious Gradiva Award of the psychoanalysts, had only a small circulation, mainly in ENGLAND.

It is of some historical note that the early Jungians in the United States were primarily women, while most of the key Freudians were men. Beatrice Hinkle, Kristine Mann, Constance Long, and Eleanor Bertine were among the early women physicians who formed the core of the first New York group. Francis Wickes and Christiana Morgan were other well-known early figures. Other Americans who spent long periods with Jung included Carol Baumann and Jane Cabot Reid. Today, according to the Jungians themselves, there are generally considered to be three centers of Jungian thought: the so-called Zurich school, which follows the writings of Jung's students, such as Marie von Franz; the object relations school of Melanie Klein in England, and the Archetypal Psychology of James Hillman in the United States. At the same time, Jung has had an influence in liberal religious circles, particularly in the work of such writers as Arnold Toynbee, Victor White, PAUL TILLICH, and Ann Ulanov.

Finally, Jungians may take some comfort in the fact that even as general interest in psychoanalysis has declined, the spread of Jung's ideas has increased. Jung's ideas have remained alive in the enclaves beyond science, particularly in religious circles, within the psychotherapeutic counter-culture, and also in popular movements such as those associated today with WOMEN'S spirituality. Jung's cross-cultural emphasis on world religions must be counted as part of this influence, as was the tremendous impetus of Joseph Campbell's views on world mythology, originally grounded in Jungian ideas. Campbell suggests that any new depth psychology of the future may look more Jungian than Freudian, even though both the names of Freud and Jung will probably not be associated directly with such developments. Meanwhile, as the secularization of the religious impulse continues, Protestant denominations may either have to assimilate such new depth psychologies or else get left behind as outdated cultural institutions no longer able to speak to the breadth and depth of contemporary experience.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Jung, C.G. Erinnerungen, Träume, Gedanken (Memories, Dreams, Reflections). Recorded and edited by Aniela Jaffé. Translated from the German by Richard and Clara Winston. New York: Pantheon Books, 1963.
- . Psychology and Religion. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press/London: Oxford University Press, 1938.

Secondary Sources:

- Clarke, J.J. Jung and Eastern Thought: A Dialogue With the Orient. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Charet, F.X. Spiritualism and the Foundations of C.G.Jung's Psychology. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1993.
- Clift, Wallace B. Jung and Christianity: The Challenge of Reconciliation. New York: Crossroad, 1982.
- Gunn, R.J. Journeys into Emptiness: Dogen, Merton, Jung, and the Quest for Transformation. New York: Paulist Press, 2000.
- Miller, David L., ed. Jung and the Interpretation of the Bible. New York: Continuum, 1995.
- Noel, Daniel C. The Soul of Shamanism: Western Fantasies, Imaginal Realities. New York: Continuum, 1997.
- Noll, Richard. The Jung Cult: Origins of a Charismatic Movement. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.
- . The Aryan Christ: The Secret Life of Carl Jung. New York: Random House, 1997.
- Shamdasani, Sonu. Cult Fictions: C.G. Jung and the Founding of Analytical Psychology. New York: Routledge, 1998.
- Taylor, Eugene. Shadow Culture Psychology and Spirituality in America. Washington, DC: Counterpoint, 1999.

EUGENE TAYLOR

JUNG-STILLING, JOHANN HEINRICH (1740–1817)

German author. Jung, called Stilling, one of the “Stillen im Lande” (of Psalm 35:20), had many occupations, but above all he was a religious author and is seen as the “Patriarch der Erweckung” (patriarch of the awakening movement).

He was born in pietistic family tradition in a small village of Siegerland (Western Germany) and tried many occupations (tailor, teacher, clerk, in various locations) until he studied medicine at Strasbourg (where he befriended JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE, who was studying law there). Between 1772 and 1778 he was a physician specializing in surgical ophthalmology in Elberfeld, and he continued his medical work for the remainder of his life, successfully treating many thousands of blind people. Between 1778 and 1803 he was a professor of political economy at Kaiserslautern, Heidelberg, and Marburg. He spent the final years of his life (1803–1806 at Heidelberg, 1806–1817 at Karlsruhe, where he died) without professional responsibilities, sponsored by the grand duke of Baden. He wrote religious books, engaged in extensive correspondence (he wrote about 25,000 letters during his life), and served as spiritual advisor to the grand duke.

Jung turned to religious writing in 1794–1795 and became known all over Europe through his religious novel Das Heimweh (Homesickness, 5 vols., 1794–1796, many translations) and several religious periodicals, especially Der Graue Mann (1795–1816, published in German in newspaper installments in North America, probably in Germantown, Pennsylvania). As a result, he became a central figure for nearly all religious groups of his times such as the Deutsche Christentumsgesellschaft with its center in Basel and the Herrnhuter Brüdergemeine/MORAVIAN CHURCH as well as many individuals belonging to the awakened people in GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, and other countries. Indicating and interpreting the signs of the time, he called for a return, in opposition to the ideas of the ENLIGHTENMENT, to the original Christian faith, based on Scripture and on Jesus Christ, and to penitence before the last judgment. His opponents saw him as a mystic dreamer.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Benrath, G.A., ed. Johann Heinrich Jung-Stilling: Lebensgeschichte. Darmstadt, Germany: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1976, 1984, 1992.
- Güthling, W. Jung-Stilling, Verzeichnis der selbständigen Schriften. 1962.
- Sam, M.M., ed. Das Heimweh. Dornach, Switzerland: Verlag am Goetheanum, 1994.
- Sämtliche Schriften*. 13 vols. and supplement (without the economic works), 1835–1838. Reprint Hildesheim, Germany, 1979 (in 8 vols.).
- Schwinge, G., ed. Jung stilling Briefs. Göttingen, Germany, 2002.

Secondary Sources:

- Geiger, M. "Aufklärung und Erweckung." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Basel, 1956.
- Hahn, O.W. "Jung-Stilling zwischen Pietismus und Aufklärung." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Mainz, 1988.
- . J.H. Jung-Stilling. 1990. Selig sind, die das heimweh haben, Second edition. Gießen: Brunnen-Verlag, 1998.
- Lück, Wolfgang. "Jung-Stilling, Arzt-Kameralist-Schriftsteller zwischen Aufklärung und Erweckung." Marburg, 1992.
- Propach, G. "Jung-Stilling als Arzt." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Cologne, 1982.
- Schwinge, G. "Jung-Stilling als Erbauungsschriftsteller der Erweckung." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Mainz, 1993.
- Stecher, G. "Jung-Stilling als Schriftsteller, 1913." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Berlin, 1911. Reprinted 1967.
- Vinke, R. "Jung-Stilling und die Aufklärung." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Mainz, 1986/87.
- GERHARD SCHWINGE

JURIEU, PIERRE (1637–1713)

French clergy. Jurieu was born in Mer near Orléans and became a leading French Reformed pastor and publicist during the reign of Louis XIV. He was Pierre du Moulin's grandson, Andre Rivet's great nephew, and was nephew to Pierre and Louis du Moulin. The latter taught him that the church owes its independence from secular AUTHORITY to popular sovereignty. Later Jurieu embraced Grotius's NATURAL LAW philosophy, but whether his writings furthered secularism, republicanism, and constitutional liberalism is a matter of disagreement among twentieth-century scholars. Some view Jurieu as antimodern, opposed to INDIVIDUALISM, only reluctantly relinquishing the strong attachments most HUGUENOTS had to ABSOLUTISM (G.Dodge, Q.Skinner, H.Kretzer). Others see him as a contributor to liberal political thought (F. Baumer, F. Knetsch, D. Spini). Jurieu disapproved of TOLERATION of SOCINIANISM or any secularism harmful to Christian ORTHODOXY.

Educated at Saumur, Jurieu succeeded his father as pastor at Mer. From 1674 he taught Hebrew and THEOLOGY at the Academy of Sedan until its suppression (1681). A refugee in Rotterdam, he taught theology at its Walloon academy (1681), exchanging polemics with Catholic historians (Bossuet, Maimbourg, Fénelon), the Jansenist Arnauld, and moderate Calvinists (Saurin, Bayle, Basnage, Jaquelot).

Admired by many, Jurieu was criticized for confessional rigidity and for prophesying Huguenot repatriation and Catholicism's demise (1689). These failing, he predicted their occurrence in the new century. Despite ridicule Jurieu pursued his political visions, promoting the Brandenburg alliance with the House of Orange. Disillusioned when the Peace of Ryswick (1697) failed to repatriate the Huguenots, he provided a sense of purpose and hope to exiles of the Huguenot diaspora.

See also: Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

References and Further Reading

Dodge, Guy Howard. The Political Theory of the Huguenots of the Dispersion. New York: Columbia University Press, 1947.

Kretzer, Hartmut. Calvinismus und französische Monarchie im 17. Jahrhundert. Berlin, Germany: Duncker & Humblot, 1975.

Spini, Debora. Diritti di Dio, Diritti dei Popoli. Turin, Italy: Claudiana Editrice, 1997.

BARBARA SHER TINSLEY

JUSTIFICATION

The doctrine of justification is one of the hallmark teachings of historic Protestantism. It emerged as one of the principal doctrinal differences between the Roman and REFORMATION churches—although by no means was it the only theological difference. Its significance for Protestantism is evident in MARTIN LUTHER’S insistence that this was the articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae (the article by which the church stands or falls) and likewise in JOHN CALVIN’S description as the “main hinge on which religion turns.” At the most basic level this distinctive Protestant DoCTRINE deals with the fundamental question of how a sinful human being can enter into a right and proper relationship with a God who is absolutely holy and righteous. The term “justification” is derived directly from the BIBLE (Romans 3–5), although the theological understanding of the biblical term has developed considerably over time. “Justification” is one of several terms in the New Testament, such as “salvation” or “redemption,” that deal with the soteriological question of how sinners enter into a right relationship with the righteous and holy God. In the course of the sixteenth century, this doctrine came to be one of the defining beliefs of historic Protestantism. Indeed, this question lay at the heart of the theological-pastoral concerns of the Augustinian hermit, Martin Luther.

The Protestant Understanding

If one is to gain an understanding of what Luther and other Protestants meant by justification, then one must consider the theological context of the later Middle Ages. Luther’s belief that all humanity possesses a will enslaved by SIN meant (or “led him to conclude”) that the sinner was unable to exercise genuine saving FAITH, against which Luther reacted. Like most others, Luther underwent considerable development in his understanding of justification. As a young Augustinian hermit, Luther was initiated into the via moderna, a school of thought in which the righteousness of God is manifested in the fact that God rewards the individual who does facere quod in se est (“to do what you are able to”) and punishes those who do not. The righteous God as expressed in the via moderna was an utterly scrupulous and impartial judge. According to this understanding, the individual, not God, must take the initial step (no matter how paltry) in the process of justification by recognizing his/her own spiritual weakness and then turn with humility to God asking for GRACE. In accord with God's COVENANT with humanity, God treats this humility as fulfilling the pre-requisite necessary for justification. In response God bestows justifying grace upon the individual, enabling the performance of meritorious works, thus permitting a relationship with the righteous God. In this particular scheme justification had to do with making the individual inwardly righteous, thus entitling entrance into a relationship with the righteous and holy God. This understanding derives principally from Augustine, who misunderstood the term iustificare to mean "to make righteous." Augustine's misreading of the term became normative for the medieval church.

If Luther did eventually diverge from Augustine's definition of justification, he still drank deeply from Augustine's conception of the priority of grace in SALVATION. As early as 1515, while lecturing on Romans, Luther came to see that the individual, because of sinfulness, could not initiate this process of justification. Furthermore—again under the influence of Augustine—Luther concluded that the whole idea of facere quod in se est was in reality a Pelagian HERESY. By rejecting the notion that the individual has the inherent ability to initiate the process of justification, Luther moved inexorably to challenge the soteriological framework of the via moderna.

Although Luther's rethinking on justification probably began around 1515, it did not reach its definitive shape until 1518–1519. He came to understand that the righteousness of God (iustitia Dei) does not refer to a divine attribute but to a divine act of grace toward the hapless sinner. As he developed his understanding, distinctive features emerged. Perhaps his most distinctive idea was the concept of iustitia Christi aliena (the alien righteousness of Christ). Luther argued that justification is not based on one's own righteousness but on a righteousness that is alien or extrinsic to the sinner. He insisted that, because of the Fall, individuals have no righteousness in themselves and therefore, if one is to be justified, it must be based entirely on an external righteousness, by which he meant the perfect righteousness of Christ. This perfect righteousness of Christ belongs to the Christian (in an external not internal sense) because of his/her union with Christ. There is for Luther a "wonderful exchange" that takes place in this union between the Christian and Christ: individual sins are exchanged for the righteousness of Christ. It is notable that Luther does not initially employ the language of imputation, although it is clearly subsumed in the wonderful exchange.

One of the most characteristic features of Luther's view of justification is his understanding of the nature and place of faith. His belief that all humanity possesses a will enslaved by sin meant (or "led him to conclude") that the sinner was unable to exercise genuine saving faith. If there is to be true faith, it must come as a gift from God. Authentic faith is not mere assent (assensus) to the historic teaching of Christianity, but a grasping faith (fides apprehensiva) that takes hold of Christ and his righteousness. Thus Christ is not only the object of the individual's faith, Christ is also present in true faith. For Luther this grasping faith is not viewed as a human work and as such cannot be considered as the cause of justification; rather, faith is understood as the instrument by which one is justified. Above all, Luther's assertion that justification is by faith alone (sola fide) and the notion of the alien righteousness of Christ underscore one of the key concerns for Luther—justification has everything to do with God’s grace and nothing to do with human merit.

Many fail to appreciate that Luther envisioned justification as both an event and a process. What later Protestants were inclined to separate, Luther kept together, at least initially. He was quite clear that there is a moment when the sinner is actually justified by faith, that is, when the alien righteousness of Christ has been transferred to him, although this is only the beginning of a process in which the Christian makes moral progress until the final resurrection, when he will possess a perfect righteousness created in him by the Holy Spirit. Especially in his early writings, justification is often conceived as a healing process in which God regards the sinner as totally righteous in anticipation of the perfect righteousness to come at the final consummation. At points, the relationship between justification and SANCTIFICATION is so closely drawn that Luther does not hesitate to use the rubric of justification to include the process of sanctification as well as the event of justification.

What is almost certainly the most misunderstood aspect of Luther’s doctrine is his concept of simul iustus et peccator (simultaneously righteous and a sinner). This concept points to the obvious tension between the imputed alien righteousness of Christ and the present reality of the sinful nature in the Christian life. Because of Luther’s belief that the Christian is not made righteous in the present life, but only in the final resurrection, he acknowledged an eschatological tension between the present sinful reality and the future promise of righteousness. By this phrase he does not mean that Christians are partly sinful and partly righteous in this life; rather that they are totally sinful in themselves and totally righteous in Christ through the gift of faith. This paradoxical language caused many Catholics and Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) to conclude that Luther’s conception of justification was bewildering at best and antinomian at worst.

In response to such accusations Luther replied that the justification of sinners in no way permitted a devaluation of good works in the life of the Christian. Good works, Luther insisted, were a necessary consequence but not a cause of justification. Such necessary good works, however, could not in themselves produce assurance for the Christian. The many years of struggle with Anfechtungen (spiritual anxiety) proved to Luther that if assurance is grounded in demonstrable human works, then full assurance will always be undermined by the unrelenting quest to determine whether one’s good works were adequate and whether they issued from genuinely virtuous intentions. Luther’s doctrine of original sin prevented any such assurance of salvation or justification if grounded on one’s deeds. True assurance could and should be found only in the faithfulness of God to his promises of mercy.

In the 1530s Luther’s close friend and colleague at the University of Wittenberg, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, made a fundamental refinement to Luther’s doctrine (initially in his Apology, 1530), which then became normative for both Lutheran and Reformed branches of Protestantism. Instead of viewing justification as “healing” as Luther earlier had maintained, Melancthon recast justification in a legal or forensic framework. Whereas Augustine and the medieval church taught that the sinner is made righteous in justification, Melancthon taught he is declared or pronounced righteous on the basis of the imputed righteousness of Christ. Melancthon drew a sharp distinction between justification (the event of being declared righteous) and sanctification (the process of being made righteous). This refinement of Luther’s doctrine represents a further break from the teaching of the church up to this point. This forensic conception of justification was taken up by virtually all subsequent Protestant reformers and came to represent a standard difference between Catholics and Protestants.

The Reformed branch of Protestantism embraced substantially the same doctrine as Luther and Melancthon, but construed it differently and maintained a different emphasis. Calvin's view, which gained ascendancy in the later sixteenth-century Reformation, was formulated in the 1540s and 1550s. Calvin revived Luther's emphasis on the believer's union with Christ through faith as the means by which that union is achieved. This union has a twofold effect that Calvin called "double grace." The first effect of the believer's union with Christ leads directly to forensic justification. Through the imputed righteousness of Christ, the believer is declared to be righteous in the sight of God. However, there is a second simultaneous effect of this union with Christ, that is, that on account of the union with Christ—and not on account of his justification—the believer begins the process of being made like Christ through sanctification (or as he sometimes calls it, regeneration). Calvin seems to have undergone some development on this matter early in his Protestant career, but by 1540 the main lines of his distinctive configuration were in place. Instead of giving priority to either sanctification or justification, Calvin turned his attention to their common source, union with Christ, which granted them equal standing, distinct, but not separate. It has not escaped the notice of scholars that Calvin treats sanctification before justification in the 1559 edition of the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION. This is not significant except to show that Calvin's real interest was the believer's union with Christ, and that justification and sanctification are merely two consequences of that signal event. For Calvin, where there is justification there also will be sanctification.

One of the important historiographical insights garnered from a historical analysis is the fact that the Protestant doctrine of justification was not static, but went through a process of theological development. To be sure, Luther set the course that others would follow, although a proper understanding of this period must recognize that Luther's initial insights provoked decades of Protestant refinement from both Lutheran and Reformed theologians. It also provoked one of the more interesting ecumenical attempts at reconciliation between Protestants and Catholics at the Colloquy of Regensburg in 1541 (see REGENSBURG COLLOQUY). Protestants, led by Melancthon, and Catholics, led by Gaspero Cardinal Contarini, actually reached agreement on a doctrine of "double justification," affirming two formal causes of justification—the external righteousness of Christ and the internal righteousness of the Christian. In the final analysis both Luther and the pope rejected this theological compromise and from that point on genuine dialogue ceased until the twentieth century. In the later years of the Reformation the theological trend in Lutheranism was to emphasize forensic justification, with the result that sanctification was often neglected. The Lutheran reformer ANDREAS OSIANDER rejected forensic imputation in favor of an "essential" justifying righteousness, which galvanized Lutheran opposition and significantly reinforced the forensic emphasis of the doctrine of justification.

Although the Reformed Church did not give the same prominence to the doctrine as did the Lutherans, the same general trajectory is evident also in the Reformed branch. The earliest Reformed conceptions of justification tended to place great emphasis on the close proximity of sanctification and justification, which for some meant that sanctification was constitutive of justification. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, MARTIN BUCER, HEINRICH BULLINGER, Peter Martyr Vermigli, and JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS all envisaged a close relationship between sanctification and justification. However, the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION did not follow this theological accent. The Westminster divines tended to be more linear in their soteriology, derived no doubt from their understanding of the ordo salutis (order of salvation). The effect of these later developments within the Reformed tradition was a tendency to drive a wedge between justification and sanctification to make a clear distinction between imputed and inherent righteousness. The main reason for the trend toward forensic justification lies in the fact that the Council of Trent obliged Protestants to define their own theology more distinctively. Just as Trent defined its doctrine over against Luther and early Protestants, so also later Protestants defined their doctrine over against Trent.

The Council of Trent

The Council of Trent was summoned in 1545 to formulate a comprehensive response to Luther. One of the more vital issues was the doctrine of justification. The sixth session of Trent reached its definitive conclusions regarding justification on January 13, 1547. Against Luther, Trent strongly defended Augustine's view that justification is the process of renewal that brings about a change in both the outer status and the inner nature of the sinner. For the theologians at Trent justification was not only "forgiveness of sins" but also "regeneration and sanctification" through the voluntary reception of grace. They strenuously argued that sinners were justified on the basis of an internal righteousness graciously infused or imparted to the sinner by God. Perhaps the key to understanding the reaction of Trent is their fear that Luther's view of justification would lead inevitably to ANTINOMIANISM. When Luther insisted that justification was by faith alone, Catholics understood him to say that one could be justified without any need for obedience, good works, or spiritual renewal. To these theologians, Luther's concept of justification undermined all morality. By the final session at Trent the doctrinal battle lines had been drawn.

The English Church

During the seventeenth century orthodox Protestants on the continent remained more or less in harmony with their sixteenth-century forebears when it came to the doctrine of justification. The Anglican Church was generally in accord with the Protestants on the continent, although some peculiar developments of its own were evidenced (see ANGLICANISM). The early English reformers seem to have been somewhat confused in their understanding of Luther's doctrine of justification. There was a decided tendency to embrace an Augustinian understanding of justification as making one righteous, but following Luther, insisting this was by faith alone. After the return of the Marian exiles there was a renewed doctrinal conformity with the Reformed theologians on the continent. RICHARD HOOKER, one of the preeminent Anglicans, asserted the imputation of Christ's righteousness, that faith was not a work of man but a gift from God and distinguished (but did not separate) justification and sanctification. Seventeenth-century Puritans for the most part followed this trend, although some Puritans, such as RICHARD BAXTER, diverged from the mainstream by identifying faith as the formal cause of justification instead of the righteousness of Christ. Later Caroline divines departed substantially from Hooker and PURITANISM, favoring a concept of justification that spoke of inherent righteousness as the basis for justification, of faith as a human work, and a blurring of the distinction between justification and sanctification. With the restoration of Charles II, the Puritan view of justification was increasingly neglected.

In the eighteenth century, JOHN WESLEY developed his own brand of ANGLICANISM with distinctive implications for his doctrine of justification. In the early years of his ministry, Wesley adhered to typical late seventeenth-century Anglican theology of justification. At its core was his conviction that God does not declare righteous anyone who is not doing all they can to be righteous. For Wesley it was not faith alone, but faith and works that lead to righteousness. After his dismal missionary adventure in Georgia (1736–1738), however, his conception of justification underwent change. Wesley moved away from the Anglican version of justification, although he did not embrace a typical Lutheran or Reformed view without modification. Within his broad overarching concept of universal ATONEMENT and his self-described Arminian view of salvation (see ARMINIANISM), he recognized that justification was not about being made righteous, but a legal declaration made by God for the sake of Christ. Although he rejected the idea of the imputation of Christ's righteousness to the believer, he maintained that justification concerns forgiveness and acceptance. Some have argued that Wesley identified imputation with antinomianism and thus rejected the idea. Wesley discarded the notion that one must first attain holiness before justification is granted, but he was careful to preserve his understanding of a prevenient grace given to all, thus enabling all to respond to the gospel call if they will.

With regard to the doctrine of justification, Wesley's main distinction centered on his idea of Christian perfection. For Wesley regeneration was especially significant because it endowed the believer with extraordinary spiritual power to love, trust, and hope. In place of the traditional Protestant idea of progressive sanctification toward holiness, he substituted growth in holiness. Having rejected the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believer, he looked to the believer (in the power of the Holy Spirit) to advance in the righteousness already acquired in regeneration. Thus personal righteousness is about realization rather than progression. Full sanctification or Christian perfection, as Wesley termed it, is at the completion of regeneration and constitutes the final condition for salvation and entrance into the presence of God. Christian perfection comes by faith and occurs at some point (usually at the end of life) in the process of sanctification. Of course, with his Arminian convictions, this state of justification and the attainment of Christian perfection could be forfeited through a lack of faith.

Nineteenth-century England saw the emergence of the OXFORD MOVEMENT. In 1837 JOHN HENRY NEWMAN gave a series of lectures in the university church of St.

Mary the Virgin, Oxford, on the topic of justification. These lectures were published the following year as Lectures on Justification and represented his effort to articulate his understanding of the true Anglican position. In these lectures Newman attempted to steer a middle course between what he judged to be the doctrinal distortions of the classical Protestantism (especially the Lutheran tradition) and Catholicism. Newman argued that the essence of justification, which consisted in the presence of the Triune God within the soul of the believer, invariably brings certain spiritual consequences. These consequences entail both being declared righteous and being made righteous. For Newman justification and sanctification are bestowed simultaneously with the indwelling of God in the soul of the believer. Justification is therefore notionally distinct but not separate from sanctification, given that both derive from the same indwelling presence of God in the soul of the believer. Based on his understanding of the effectual power of God's word, what God declares about the sinner is necessarily brought into reality. Those who are declared righteous are actually made righteous. In sum, justification involves both a declaration of Christ's righteousness (through imputation) as well as being made righteous. Although Newman was at pains to critique the Protestant view, his understanding of justification appears to bear an uncanny resemblance to the view of Calvin.

Newman's understanding of the role of faith in justification is intriguing. As an Anglican he accepted the official declaration (article 11) that "we are justified by faith only," although he elaborates on the instrumental role of faith in justification. Faith is the sole internal instrument of justification, but he adds that the SACRAMENTS also serve as an external instrument of justification. In Newman's words, "justification comes through the sacraments; is received by faith; consists in God's inward presence and lives in obedience."

The Enlightenment

In the aftermath of the wars of religion in the seventeenth century, the European continent underwent a theological paradigm shift. No longer was the CHURCH or the BIBLE a sufficient guide to truth. Instead, ENLIGHTENMENT thinkers looked beyond scripture and orthodox theology to a new and more rational basis for spiritual direction. As a general rule the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century did not devote a great deal of attention specifically to the doctrine of justification. Yet it did undermine the orthodox understanding inasmuch as it ignored or simply rejected one of the indispensable presuppositions of justification—the doctrine of original sin. Historically, one of the pillars of the Protestant orthodox conception of justification, whether Lutheran or Reformed (or even Catholic), was the fundamental presupposition that every person enters this world alienated from God because of original sin. However, the exaltation of human reason and moral optimism so characteristic of the Enlightenment could not abide any doctrine of justification based on original sin, for such a doctrine violated both their tenets of rationality and morality. English thinkers such as JOHN TOLAND and JOHN LOCKE had little room for an orthodox understanding of original sin and thus little interest in the doctrine of justification. English Deists (see DEISM) preferred a purely moralist conception in which divine pardon depends on an independent act of repentance, undoubtedly inspired by the moral example and teaching of Christ.

In GERMANY the Aufklärung (Enlightenment) followed the same general trend as the English Deists. Some early advocates formally retained the forensic notion of justification, but God's legal declaration of pardon, they argued, was based on an inherent righteousness within the individual. Later advocates of the German Aufklärung rejected completely any semblance to the orthodox Protestant understanding of justification. Christ's death, far from atoning for sin, serves as the supreme example and inspiration for humanity to emulate the outstanding moral character of Christ. Presupposed in this moralistic view is the autonomy of the individual, who is regarded as possessing all that is needed for justification. By the end of the eighteenth century the orthodox foundations of the Protestant doctrine of justification had been undermined by the rationalism and moralism of the Enlightenment.

Developments in Modernity

FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER reacted against the rationalistic and moralistic conceptions of justification espoused by the Enlightenment thinkers and moved in an entirely new direction. According to Schleiermacher, all Christian doctrine, including justification, was viewed as nothing more than individual consciousness of Christian religious feelings (Gefühl). Indeed, justification was not viewed as the objective pardon of sinners by God, but was instead the subjective consciousness of God (not knowledge of God) that is elevated and stimulated through the mediation by the supreme God-consciousness of Christ. Thus salvation is not an objective rescue from the consequences of sin, but a subjective alignment or attunement with the unknowable God through Christ's personal example of God-consciousness mediated through the Christian community. A number of key elements of the orthodox concept of justification are missing in Schleiermacher. Christ is not necessarily the only or unique mediator, and the orthodox conception of original sin is rejected as illogical. Justification or redemption thus became a radically anthropocentric conception, not only of religion, but of all its doctrines including justification. Schleiermacher's understanding of soteriology, although subjected to serious criticism, fundamentally reoriented the theological landscape.

One of the most significant theological developments in the mid-nineteenth century was the decline of Hegelianism. This prompted ALBRECHT RITSCHL to reformulate the doctrine of justification without the Hegelian interpretative framework and led to the recovery of the objective aspect of justification that had been lost in the Aufklärung. In 1870 he published his most famous work, Christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung (The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation). In this pioneering work he sought to break from the moralistic concepts of justification that came to dominate European thought of the early nineteenth century and to restore the objective dimension of the doctrine. In his effort to establish the objectivity of justification he particularly stressed the synthetic judgment of God in justification—that is, he affirmed that justification is a creative act of the divine will in which the declaration of the righteousness of the sinner effects rather than endorses the righteousness of man. He thus eliminated any claim by the morally renewed man to be justified on that account.

Although restoring the objective dimension of justification, Ritschl nevertheless modified three critical aspects of the historic Protestant view of justification—the forensic nature of justification, the doctrine of original sin, and the function of Christ in justification. First, Ritschl argues that justification should be conceived as extrajudicial; that is, just as the ruler may relax the law for the greater public good, so Ritschl argues that God pardons the sinner for the greater good of the KINGDOM OF GOD. Second, he rejects the Augustinian doctrine of original sin as a rationalistically constructed doctrine that fails to account for the link between Adam and humanity as well as for the different degrees of sin among individuals. Finally the role of Christ seems to be reduced to a symbolic extension of God’s grace without any essential connection with that grace. Christ is therefore viewed as the one who reveals the real situation between God and man, rather than the one who by God-self established a new relationship between God and man. Ritschl, despite restoring the objective nature of justification, nevertheless reverted to a subjective understanding of the role of Christ and therefore exhibits a tendency to marginalize his death.

It should be noted that for Ritschl all Christian doctrine is not about facts but about value judgments, that is to say, doctrines are not so much about scientifically verifiable propositions but rather about the impact of God in a person’s life and the moral value of that impact for the highest good. The essence of Christianity and the focal point for the doctrine of justification concerns building the kingdom of God in meaningful and practical ways from a motive of love. This kingdom of God is not a metaphysical spiritual entity, but a religion of world transformation through ethical actions. Ritschl’s conception of justification, which combined the objective conception of the doctrine with a subjective influence of Christ, is generally representative of theologies of justification in the period from 1880 to the beginning of World War I.

Karl Barth

Generally considered the greatest theologian of the twentieth century, KARL BARTH’S view of justification warrants consideration, not because he fully developed a new understanding of the doctrine but because his theological outlook has important implications for this doctrine. In general Barth’s theology may be described as an extended reflection on the fact that God has spoken to humanity (Deus dixit) in Christ, thus overcoming the epistemological chasm separating them. Christianity therefore is not so much about justification by faith alone as about God revealing himself to the individual. As such, soteriological considerations are secondary to his focus on revelation. Indeed, it has been argued that Barth has placed the divine revelation to sinful humanity at precisely the point where Luther placed the divine justification of sinful humanity.

Second, Barth's conception of gemina praedestinatio (double predestination) has significant implications for his doctrine of justification. Instead of grounding predestination in the eternal will of God whereby some are elected to eternal salvation and some to eternal damnation, as the reformers did, Barth made Jesus the ultimate focal point of his understanding of double predestination. Christ, according to Barth, represents the ELECTION of all humanity and at the same time the reprobation of all. That is to say, in Christ all are elect and will share in eternal life, but Christ is also reprobated for all. Although Barth was reluctant to admit a doctrine of apokatastasis (universal salvation), this seems to be the logical trajectory of his doctrine of double predestination. Inevitably his doctrine of justification seems to relativize sin and divine judgment, which in turn diminishes any historic understanding of justification.

Ecumenical Theology

One of the most important developments within Protestantism since the Second World War has been the rise of the ecumenical movement, with its willingness to revisit past theological divisions with a view to overcoming them if at all possible. The new openness between Roman Catholic and Protestant churches may be partly explained by the progressive attitudes adopted by the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) and the early work of the Swiss Catholic theologian Hans Küng. In his major study, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, he compared the view of the Protestant theologian Karl Barth with the Council of Trent and argued that there was a fundamental theological agreement. There were many dissenting voices, both Catholic and Protestant, centering on Küng's Thomistic interpretation of the theology of Trent and a selective understanding of Barth's ideas. Perhaps the most trenchant criticism to emerge was Küng's failure to take into consideration the historical context of the Council of Trent. Despite such criticisms Küng's book encouraged ecumenical discussions between Catholics and Protestants. It is no exaggeration to say that Küng inaugurated a new era of positive ecumenical discussions of a doctrine that had been viewed as an insuperable obstacle between Catholics and Protestants. In the later third of the twentieth century a significant number of dialogues took place, of which we will look at just three of the most important: the dialogue between Roman Catholics and their Protestant counterparts, Lutherans, Anglicans, and evangelicals.

In 1972 the Joint Study Commission of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity published the document now generally known as the "Malta Report," which laid the foundation for ecumenical discussions. These discussions bore fruit in 1983 with the publication of a document entitled Justification by Faith. This document undertook an analysis of the historical development of the doctrine as well as an assessment of the nature and significance of the controverted issues between Roman Catholics and Lutherans. Six areas of "convergence" were recognized in this document: the forensic nature of justification, sinfulness of the justified, sufficiency of faith, concepts of merit and satisfaction, and criteria of authenticity. The framers of this document noted that, despite differing theological perspectives, similar concerns and foundational beliefs could be deciphered. The participants distinguished between misunderstandings and genuine disagreements. The document tried to resolve misunderstandings by identifying the common beliefs regarding original sin, the recognition that final salvation rests entirely in God's free gift of grace, that the ground of justification can only be God's grace, and that those who are justified will necessarily be renewed by the Holy Spirit and enabled to perform good works.

The document also recognized genuine areas of disagreement. Most important, both groups accepted the fact that there is a fundamental difference between a doctrine of justification based on the external righteousness of Christ and the intrinsic righteousness of the individual. The participants, however, explained these genuine disagreements as complementary rather than contradictory. That is to say, that although they fully recognized the difference between forensic justification and justification based on inherent righteousness, they nevertheless argued that these are essentially different ways of conceptualizing the same theological insight. On the crucial question of the formal cause of justification, the participants asserted that both answers are legitimate but different ways of conceptualizing the ultimate foundation of one's justification. One of the fundamental issues not considered by the participants is how the doctrine of justification was regarded as unacceptable by Trent in the sixteenth century but is now regarded as legitimate.

Further discussions between the Lutheran World Federation and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity achieved a "consensus on basic truths of the doctrine of justification." The crucial paragraph of the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification reads: "Together we confess: By grace alone, in faith in Christ's saving work and not because of any merit on our part, we are accepted by God and receive the Holy Spirit, who renews our hearts while equipping and calling us to good works." Despite extensive protest from Lutheran theologians that the document papered over continuing major differences, it was signed by representatives of the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church at Augsburg on October 31, 1999. Thus the doctrine of justification in itself is no longer a dividing point of theology between Lutherans and Catholics. It will be up to the Lutheran churches in the various countries to accept the statement.

The matter of justification was also discussed between the Church of England and the Roman Catholic theologians, the results of which were published under the title Salvation and the Church (1987). This ecumenical discussion stressed the points of agreement between the two communions: the first movements that lead to justification are God's working; that justification is an unmerited gift of God; that justification necessarily leads to good works; and that justification involves the communal life of the church rather than a solitary individual life of faith. Participants conceded the forensic nature of justification, but argued that this image must be complemented by other images. Some critics have argued that this joint commission "marginalized" the underlying disagreements, especially concerning the formal cause of justification, for the sake of ecumenicity.

What is perhaps one of the more surprising developments at the end of the twentieth century is the dialogue between Catholics and evangelicals. In 1997 a distinguished group of high-ranking Roman Catholics and prominent evangelical Protestants issued a statement called The Gift of Salvation that focused on the doctrine of justification. Neither the document itself nor any of the participants officially represented their respective communions; rather the document was intended as a “good faith effort” of individual evangelicals and Catholics to speak to the issue of justification. Signatories intended this as a collaborative effort of individuals who speak from, but not for, their ecclesial constituencies. Remarkably the two groups reached agreement on “what the Reformation traditions have meant by justification by faith alone (sola fide).” Many other interrelated issues such as the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER), BAPTISM, and Marian devotion were not addressed in this document. Discussions continue into the third millennium. Although many theological disagreements remain between Catholics and Protestants, the centuries have softened the rancor over justification, so that now, Lutherans, Anglicans, and some evangelicals are willing to dialog about the historical doctrine that was for the Protestant reformers the standard by which the church stands or falls.

See also: Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Dialogue, Inter-Confessional; Ecumenism

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, H. George, T. Austin Murphy, and Joseph A. Burgess, eds. Justification by Faith: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VII. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1985.
- Balthasar, Hans Urs von. The Theology of Karl Barth. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1971.
- Barth, Karl. Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1959.
- Boisset, J. “Justification et sanctification chez Calvin.” In Calvinus Theologus: Die Referate des congrès Européen de recherches Calviniennes. Edited by W.H. Neuser, 131–148. Neukirchen, Germany: Neukirchen Verlag, 1976.
- Greschat, Martin. Melanchthon neben Luther: Studien zur Gestalt der Rechtfertigungslehre zwischen 1528 und 1537. Witten, Germany: Luther-Verlag, 1965.
- Hefner, Joseph. Die Entstehungsgeschichte des Trienter Konzils: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Reformationszeitalters. Paderborn, Germany: Ferdinand Schöningh, 1909.
- James, Frank A. “Dei Iustificatione: The Evolution of Peter Martyr Vermigli’s Doctrine of Justification.” Ph.D. dissertation, Westminster Theological Seminary, 2000.
- Jedin, Hubert. A History of the Council of Trent. 2 vols. Translated by Ernest Graf. St. Louis, MO: Herder Book Company, 1957. 1966.
- Knox, D.B. The Doctrine of Faith in the Reign of Henry VIII. London: James Clarke, 1961.
- Küng, Hans. Rechtfertigung: Die Lehre Karl Barths und eine katholische Besinnung. Einsiedeln: Johannes Verlag, 1957.
- McGrath, Alister E. Luther’s Theology of the Cross: Martin Luther’s Theological Breakthrough. Reprint. Oxford: Blackwell, 1990.
- . Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Newman, John Henry. Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification. 3rd ed. London: Livingtons, 1874.
- Ritschl, Albrecht. The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1871.

- Rupp, E.Gordon. The Righteousness of God: Luther Studies. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1953.
- Stephens, W.P. The Theology of Huldrych Zwingli. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Vignaux, Paul. Justification et predestination au XIVe siècle: Duns Scot, Pierre d'Auriose, Guillaume d'Occam, Grégoire de Rimini. Paris, 1934.
- Yarnold, Edward, "Duplex Iustitia: The Sixteenth Century and the Twentieth." In Christian Authority, edited by Gillian R. Evans, 204–223. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

FRANK A.JAMES III

K

KAGAWA, TOYOHICO (1888–1960)

Japanese social reformer and evangelist. In the 1930s Toyohiko Kagawa was the most widely recognized Japanese Protestant in the Western world. Hailed by the U.S. press as “Japan’s Gandhi,” “Japan’s Schweitzer,” or “the St. Francis of Japan” because of his reputation for PACIFISM and selfless service to JAPAN’S poor, translations of his theological and economic writings were brought out by major publishers. He addressed over a million people in the United States and Europe on speaking tours in which he stressed his belief that the gospel demanded social and economic reform. Brotherhood Economics is the most concise expression of his vision of a world economy based on cooperative rather than capitalist enterprises. Especially admired by liberal Protestants, Kagawa delivered the Rochester Theological Seminary’s Rauschenbusch Lectures in 1936. A biography published in 1932 by the Protestant missionary William Axling was crucial in establishing the reputation that led Kagawa to such venues.

Kagawa was born in 1888 in Kobe, Japan. As a teenager he was introduced to Christianity by Southern Presbyterian missionaries, Drs. Charles Logan and Harry W. Myers. “It is not the Bible alone which has taught me what Christianity means, but the love of these two homes,” he later said. This concern with concretely following the gospel was dramatically expressed when, at age twenty-one, he took up residence in the slums of Kobe, preaching in the streets and turning his new quarters into a homeless shelter. Beginning with this intimate work with the poor, he went on to found schools, hospitals, orphanages, and cooperatives. His first major book, A Study of the Psychology of the Poor (Hinmin shinri no kenkyu) (1915), drew on his slum experience. He later used the royalties from a best-selling autobiographical novel, Crossing the Death Line (Shisen o koete) (1920) and other writings to fund his social programs. Extending his social concerns into the political realm, he also became a union leader and founding member of Japan’s socialist party.

On the eve of World War II Kagawa collaborated with the U.S. missionary E. Stanley Jones and other Protestant leaders in efforts to avert war that included international prayer vigils and lobbying government officials. After World War II his efforts centered on cooperatives and world peace. He died in 1960.

See also Liberal Protestants and Liberalism; Rauschenbusch, Walter; Schweitzer, Albert; Social Gospel

References and Further Reading

Axling, William. Kagawa. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1932.

Bamba, Nobuya, and John F. Howes. Pacifism in Japan: The Christian and Socialist Tradition. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1978.

Bikle, George B. Jr. The New Jerusalem: Aspects of Utopianism in the Thought of Kagawa Toyohiko. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1976.

Schildgen, Robert. Toyohiko Kagawa: Apostle of Love and Social Justice. Berkeley, CA: Centenary Books, 1988.

ROBERT SCHILDGEN

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724–1804)

German philosopher. One of the major figures in Western philosophy, Immanuel Kant was born into the modest home of a Prussian harness-maker in the Pietist stronghold of Königsberg (now Kaliningrad, RUSSIA). Notoriously, he lived his entire life in and around his hometown. Kant's close relationship with his devout mother served as his introduction to the Pietist emphasis on morality over doctrine and on the sincerity of inner personal conviction over appeals to external religious AUTHORITY, (see PIETISM). He never abandoned the basic features of this religious outlook. After his education at the university in Königsberg and a period as a private tutor, Kant assumed teaching duties at the university and remained there his entire career. A lifelong bachelor, Kant became a central figure in the ENLIGHTENMENT and was well known for the lively conversation and convivial atmosphere associated with mid-day meals he hosted in his home. His popularity and liveliness as a lecturer contrasted sharply with a writing style that Kant himself once characterized as "dry, obscure, opposed to all ordinary notions, and, moreover, long-winded."

For good reason Kant is sometimes referred to as the "philosopher of Protestantism." In a series of three great Critiques and associated writings on ETHICS and religion Kant attempted to secure the philosophical foundations of Newtonian SCIENCE while also emphasizing the centrality of human freedom in our understanding of the moral and religious life. His resulting legacy resides in several broad themes that have shaped modern Protestant thought in profound and lasting ways: an embargo against the claims of speculative metaphysics and natural THEOLOGY; an emphasis on the priority of the "inner" meaning of Christian FAITH, which, for Kant himself, meant its "moral" meaning; and a commitment to reconciling the potentially competing demands of biblical faith and the modern scientific outlook. Kant is thus the prototype of the "mediating" or "accommodationist" religious thinker who insists on an underlying fit or compatibility between religious faith and modern secular consciousness. The progressive, intellectually alert believer need not fear that faith will come into conflict with modern standards of intelligibility. Consequently, Kant is perhaps more accurately thought of as the "philosopher of liberal Protestantism" because his legacy is clearly evident in the traditionally liberal effort to disclose moments of continuity, compatibility, or overlap between Christian faith and natural states of human consciousness.

For two decades beginning in 1755 Kant wrote on a range of topics characteristic of the era's interest in science, natural theology, and logic, although it was only with the publication of the Critique of Pure Reason in 1781 (2d edition, 1787) that the so-called critical standpoint for which Kant is famous fully emerged. Against the background of interminable philosophical debates concerning the basic claims of metaphysics and natural theology, Kant insisted on an examination (or “critique”) of reason’s own powers as a necessary task before the demonstration of metaphysical claims, including claims about the existence of God. This reorientation of philosophical perspective—which Kant compared to Copernicus’s proposal to shift our perspective on the heavens by 180 degrees—resulted in a much more active conception of the knowing mind. From Kant’s new critical standpoint the knowing subject of experience shapes the object known, rather than the other way around. The radical nature of this point of departure is clearly evident in Kant’s claim that even space, time, substance, and causality are properties of the knowing mind’s rulelike activity, rather than features of the external world. The general lesson here—that what we know is fundamentally shaped by who we are—has deeply influenced subsequent Western thought, even as the details of Kantian philosophy have been called into serious question.

Kant’s critical standpoint had austere epistemological implications, given that valid knowledge claims were now limited to experience, or to the conditions of the possibility of experience. Kant eagerly displayed the subversive implications of this position by stigmatizing traditional speculative metaphysics as “dogmatic” rather than “critical,” by which he meant that metaphysics manufactured illusory knowledge claims out of the play of mere concepts. Such a result naturally suggests that metaphysics—including that part of it demonstrating the existence of God, freedom, and immortality—is no longer a useful partner for theology. In a famous section of the Critique, Kant himself dismantled the traditional proofs for the existence of God, thereby vividly spelling out the negative consequences for natural theology of the critical standpoint.

From the start, however, Kant indicated his intention to deny the pretensions of theoretical knowledge “in order to make room for faith.” With the publication of his Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals in 1785 followed by the Critique of Practical Reason in 1788, Kant made it clear that by “faith” he meant moral faith, grounded in practical, as opposed to theoretical, reason—that is, reason in its capacity to “prescribe” the world that “ought to be” rather than reason in its capacity simply to “describe” the world that “is.” Moral faith is what is necessarily entailed by one’s taking seriously an incorrigible sense of moral obligation that is a sheer “fact of reason” for any rational being. Just as Kant had taken for granted the validity of Newtonian physics, he took as given this fundamental sense of moral obligation, or duty. In turn, this sense of duty entails an awareness of freedom, given that (in a rational universe) one must be free to act if obligated to do so. Kant’s powerful vision of the a priori character of the sense of duty and the associated consciousness of freedom form the foundation of his religious philosophy.

In what is perhaps the key feature of his religious thought Kant demonstrated the necessity of moving from this incorrigible awareness of freedom to the “postulation” of the immortality of the soul and, ultimately, of God’s existence. At one point defining a “postulate” as a “necessary hypothesis,” Kant insisted that, as a postulate of practical reason, the existence of God enjoys a far greater degree of rational certainty than the older, traditional proofs could ever provide because the postulation process finds its point of departure in an incorrigible awareness of oneself as a free and morally obligated being.

The transition from this awareness to the postulates is effected in the Critique of Practical Reason's so-called moral argument, which is subsequently reaffirmed in the Critique of Judgment (1790). The argument is sustained by a teleological conception of reason itself, revealing “needs” and “interests” of reason requiring satisfaction. Chief among these interests is Kant’s concept of the “highest good,” which results when reason reflects on the total product of virtue. Kant defined the highest good as the proportioning of virtue and happiness—indeed, virtue itself is defined as “worthiness to be happy.” For Kant, immortality and God follow ineluctably from reflection on the highest good, insofar as reason has an irrepressible “interest” in the perfection of virtue (which clearly does not occur in this life) and in the rewarding of virtue with happiness (which requires a moral judge). In short, immortality and God must be postulated, for otherwise the incorrigible experience of moral obligation simply spins free in a metaphysical abyss—with no purchase on reality—suggesting the utter futility of moral earnestness. Precisely by making God’s reality as real and “close” to one as one’s sense of oneself as a being under moral obligation, Kant thus believed he had secured moral theism from the philosophical quarrels of the day.

Running through this argumentation as a powerful, subterranean current is Kant’s deep commitment to the notion that the universe is a reasonable place and that moral striving, however imperfect in this life, is ultimately redeemed. Kant thus deployed a set of arguments designed to rescue moral theism from the cold wasteland of merely theoretical reason. Kant’s first Critique may have secured Newtonian physics from philosophical doubts raised by DAVID HUME, but it provided no metaphysical comforts. Only with the shift to reason in its practical aspect—the shift, as Kant put it in a famous remark, from the “starry heavens above” to the “moral law within”—does human life regain its stature and intrinsic integrity. This implicitly dualistic perspective was reinforced by a further dualism enabling Kant to accommodate the competing tendencies of a deterministic Newtonian science and his emphasis on freedom. Here, Kant drew on a distinction between the world as it appears to us and the world as it is in itself—the world as “phenomenon” and as “noumenon”—which was a natural outcome of his initial emphasis on the active role played by the knowing mind in the fashioning of our experience of the world. The twin dichotomies of theoretical/practical and phenomenal/noumenal thereby underwrite the characteristically Kantian turn “inward,” to the private world of moral experience, as the true locus of the religious life. Faith is consequently freed from any dependency on the outer, public world of historical events in general and of putatively miraculous events in particular. Fatefully, Kant thus fashioned a safe and invulnerable space for faith on the very eve of a century that would witness the full force of historical criticism of scripture as well as the increasing momentum of the natural sciences.

After the completion of his three Critiques in 1790, Kant demonstrated that his constructive, creative thinking about the religious life had hardly drawn to a close. In the provocatively titled Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793) Kant surprised his followers by proposing an account of “radical evil” that seemed to betray the very spirit of the Enlightenment by locating the source of moral evil in the will rather than in ignorance. Underwritten by an overtly Pauline appeal to a natural—but not necessitated—“bent” or propensity toward evil, Kant’s theory of radical evil evidently called into question humanity’s ability to save itself from its self-made problem. In short he appeared to be undercutting his own emphasis on freedom by proposing a theory suspiciously reminiscent of the one doctrine against which most of the proponents of “Enlightenment” had firmly positioned themselves: the doctrine of original SIN. In his own effort at a resolution of the problem, Kant offered striking yet ultimately elusive remarks concerning our possible need for “grace” and “supernatural cooperation” in the recovery from radical evil. He emphasized that, at most, we can have only the rational “hope” that such divine aid will be forthcoming—only religious “fanatics” and “enthusiasts” claim to have sure knowledge of God’s intentions and acts. However, in his related emphasis on doing our moral best to deserve or merit this potential divine assistance, Kant clearly courted an account of JUSTIFICATION far more Catholic than Protestant in nature.

Also in the Religion Kant devised an account of the moral value of the historical side of religion. The historical side—embodied in revelation, scripture, priesthood, and CHURCH—serves as the “vehicle” for pure moral faith. Such visible, tangible features satisfy a natural human demand for something “sensibly tenable” in the religious life, implying—among other things—an emergent Kantian theory of religious symbolism. Throughout, Kant emphasized that the historical aspect is a matter of complete indifference and, indeed, the source of needless stale quarrels if not viewed through the lens of moral concerns. His eagerness to avoid improper emphasis on the historical aspect is immediately evident in his rhetorical question: “I raise the question whether morality should be expounded according to the BIBLE or whether the Bible should not rather be expounded according to morality.” With this principle Kant helped to define modern biblical hermeneutics in terms of the principle that what is “written” is different from what is “meant,” and that the former should be judged in light of the latter. The text becomes meaningful only in the light of wider canons of intelligibility that are brought to the text.

Not surprisingly Kant’s moral emphasis would yield a CHRISTOLOGY based on the insight that Jesus is the personification of a moral disposition totally wellpleasing to God. As matters of sheer theoretical interest, the historical details of Jesus’s life are of no religious significance. The significance of Jesus resides instead in a moral essence that is, in fact, immediate to all rational beings in the form of an “archetype,” that is, the “archetype of the moral disposition in all its purity.” In effect Jesus is the embodiment of what all persons might ideally be. Even so, Kant attempted to steer away from the suggestion that we should “imitate” Jesus, given that sheer imitation potentially compromises the full exercise of freedom. Instead we should allow the example of Jesus to animate the moral archetype that dwells in our own reason and assume full responsibility for our moral destiny. Despite a provocative remark suggesting that Jesus breaks the “power” of radical evil to “hold” us against our will, Kant did not associate a traditional doctrine of ATONEMENT with Jesus because such a doctrine would too obviously undercut Kant’s prior emphasis on personal autonomy and, therefore, responsibility. Here, Kant’s tendencies were clearly Pelagian.

During the nineteenth century, Kant’s influence was readily evident in the several varieties of liberal Protestant theology that attempted to satisfy the intellectual and cognitive challenges of the day while also emphasizing the moral core of the Christian message, typically focused in christology. For such influential figures as ALBRECHT RITSCHL in GERMANY or H.T. Mansel in Britain, the Kantian suspicion of metaphysics, combined with a heightened sense of “value” in human experience, provided fresh ways of understanding faith and revelation while simultaneously offering a welcome detour around the cognitive problems posed to Christian faith by an increasingly secular CULTURE. The explicitly moral element in Kant’s thinking would be maintained by the liberal Protestant effort to improve the world, based on a progressively immanent understanding of the KINGDOM OF GOD. Kant’s own sketch of an “ethical commonwealth” in the Religion, with its suggestion of moral progress based on a deepened sense of community, found strong echoes in the liberal emphasis on the “fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man” characteristic of ADOLF VON HARNACK and numerous others. One could even argue that the typically Kantian combination of moral earnestness and the priority of “practice” continues even today in numerous varieties Of LIBERATION THEOLOGY.

Finally for all Protestant thinkers eager to avoid associating faith with a sacrifice of the intellect, Kantian epistemology offered welcome strategies of compartmentalization. Neither revelation nor faith was based on theoretical claims, on metaphysics, or on appeals to “external” evidence. Instead revelation and faith were themselves viewed as a kind of valuing lodged in a privileged zone of interiority and, thereby, self-validating and not open to external criticism. Consequently the critical fires of historical criticism or Darwinian science could burn freely, without any threat to faith. Indeed the Kantian strategy of compartmentalization, warding off the negative implications of historical criticism, remained implicit even among those who explicitly repudiated the “moral” emphasis of Kant’s liberal tradition, such as the generation of neo-orthodox theologians of the post-World War I era. Despite its sustained polemic against Protestant liberalism, NEO-ORTHODOXY relied heavily on Kantian epistemology in such matters as the distinction between the “Jesus of history” and the “Christ of faith,” thereby carrying forward the strongly Kantian element in the earlier work of M.Kähler and W. Hermann. It is indeed an open question whether influential conceptions of faith as a kind of “self-understanding” (RUDOLF BULTMANN) or “the state of being ultimately concerned” (PAUL TILLICH) are simply existentialist variations on Kantian moral awareness. Likewise, recent developments associated with “postliberal” theology have raised serious questions about the very idea of “mediation” between faith and natural forms of human consciousness, bringing Kant’s legacy back into the theological discussion in fresh ways.

See also Higher Criticism; Jesus, Lives of; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Kant, Immanuel. Critique of Judgment. Translated by James Creed Meredith. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1952.

———. Critique of Practical Reason. Translated by Mary Gregor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

———. Critique of Pure Reason. Translated by Norman Kemp Smith. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1965.

———. Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals. Translated by Mary Gregor. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

———. Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone. Translated by Theodore M. Greene and Hoyt H. Hudson. New York: Harper Torchbooks, 1960.

Secondary Sources:

Barth, Karl. Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl. Translated by Brian Cozens. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1969.

Despland, Michel. Kant on History and Religion. Montreal, Canada, and London: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1973.

Fackenheim, Emil L. "Immanuel Kant." In Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West, edited by Ninian Smart, John Clayton, Patrick Sherry, and Steven T. Katz. vol. I. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Michalson, Gordon E. Jr. Kant and the Problem of God. Oxford, UK: Blackwell Publishers, 1999.

Reardon, Bernard. Kant as Philosophical Theologian. London: Macmillan Press, 1988.

Rossi, Philip J., and Michael Wreen, eds. Kant's Philosophy of Religion Reconsidered.

Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1991.

Wood, Allen W. Kant's Moral Religion. Ithaca, NY and London: Cornell University Press, 1970.

Yovel, Yirmiah. Kant and the Problem of History. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1980.

GORDON E. MICHALSON JR.

KARLSTADT, ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN VON (ALSO CARLSTADT) (1486–1541)

German theologian. Karlstadt was one of the important and prolific early German reformers—he had over 85 publications with some 200 reprints—who is difficult to situate wholly into a theological tradition. Trained in scholasticism, but with strong mystical and humanistic interests, Karlstadt sided with MARTIN LUTHER early on, although his later views were more in line with those of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and HEINRICH BULLINGER. Even though he articulated many of the anticipated traditional theological emphases of the Anabaptist tradition (see ANABAPTISM), he himself cannot be counted an Anabaptist. (Among other reasons, he lacked a strong statement on believers' BAPTISM and never fully developed the notion of a believers' CHURCH.) Probably he is best regarded as a forerunner of PIETISM because his preoccupation with the “inner experience” of the divine in the believer’s “yieldedness” (Gelassenheit) to Christ was further developed by that tradition, particularly Gottfried Arnold and the HALLE Pietists.

Born in Karlstadt am Main, Andreas Bodenstein attended the University of Erfurt (1499–1503), the University of Cologne (1503–1505), and the new university at Wittenberg where he received his master’s degree in 1505 and his doctorate in THEOLOGY in 1510. (Perhaps because Luther received his own doctorate under Karlstadt in 1512, scholars until recently thought he was older than Luther, placing his birth in 1480 or 1481, or even 1477.) While teaching in the arts faculty at Wittenberg before the conferral of his doctorate, Karlstadt advocated a Thomism tempered by Scotism. From 1510 Karlstadt taught at Wittenberg, traveling to ITALY in 1515–1516 where he received a doctorate in civil and canon law, a degree that seemingly guaranteed quick ecclesiastical advancement. However, like Luther, Karlstadt returned to Wittenberg disappointed by the secularization of the city. Soon afterward he adopted Luther’s Augustinianism, claiming with Luther that the human will is wholly incapable of willing the good and is therefore completely passive with respect to divine GRACE.

Karlstadt and Luther stood together at the 1519 Leipzig debate against Johann Eck of Ingolstadt, the prominent defender of the Roman church. Karlstadt argued the proper relationship between faith and works, while Luther called into question the absolute authority of the pope and councils of the church. Returning to Wittenberg, Karlstadt devoted himself to the study of the BIBLE and to his writing, producing a number of important tracts, including De canonicis scripturis in which he practiced early biblical criticism, arguing for the full canonicity of the Old and New Testaments (including, to Luther's displeasure, the Book of James). Assuming the leadership of the "Wittenberg Movement" during Luther's stay on the Wartburg in 1521–1522, Karlstadt quickly pressed for ecclesiastical reforms: celebration of the Mass in the vernacular, abandonment of VESTMENTS, communion of the LAITY in both kinds (bread and wine), abolition of private masses, elimination of monastic vows, the MARRIAGE of priests (he himself married Anna von Mochau in January of 1522), and the radical purging of worship images. (Karlstadt argued that reliance on such images could harm "weak consciences.") Luther's disagreement with these reforms prompted his return from the Wartburg to Wittenberg, where his Invocavit Sermons delineated a slower approach to actual reform.

From Luther's perspective, Karlstadt had erred in his insistence that change of external practices must precede an inner change on the part of the faithful and that WORSHIP should be purely "spiritual," without such external embellishments as clerical vestments. Elector Frederick the Wise supported Luther's stance and curtailed Karlstadt's preaching activities at Wittenberg. Karlstadt resigned his academic post in 1523 and went to minister to the congregation of Orlamünde. There he renounced his academic titles as unbiblical, abandoned the use of the organ and images in worship, rejected infant baptism, argued against the real presence of Christ in the LORD'S SUPPER, and established a nonhierarchical model of Christian community emphasizing the laity. In 1524 he was expelled from Saxony and with his family wandered from place to place, spending time in Rothenburg, Holstein, and Zurich, among other places. He may well have been involved in the revolutionary turbulence of 1524–1525. His widening chasm with Luther, and his uncompromising rejection of infant baptism and Christ's real presence in the Lord's Supper caused Karlstadt considerable difficulties over the next years. Finally, after serving as an archdeacon at Zurich for four years, Karlstadt became a professor of Hebrew at Basel in 1534, gradually modifying some of his earlier radical positions, for example, his opposition to infant baptism and the value of university education. He died from the plague in Basel on Christmas Eve in 1541.

Crucial in Karlstadt's theology is the influence of German mysticism. Karlstadt advocated that the believer must "let go" (Gelasseri) of attachments to temporal things, and must "be yielded to" (Gelasseri) the promise of God. The believer's Gelassenheit itself becomes the temple of God, for in detaching from the flesh of the world, the believer is filled with the spirit of Christ Himself. In his 1535 inaugural disputation at Basel, Karlstadt identified the mystic's divine spark of the soul with the imago dei. Whereas JUSTIFICATION effects a regeneration of this image, SANCTIFICATION outwardly displays that image through the transformation of the believer in his/her "yieldedness" (Gelassenheit). Karlstadt worked within the medieval understanding of the flesh/spirit distinction, claiming that GRACE empowers a fulfillment of the law. Although Karlstadt was polemicized by Luther and subsequent Lutheran theologians (and although Karlstadt was sometimes too aggressive and less than careful in his own polemics), it is difficult not to be moved by the intensity with which he described the Christian life of faith, mortification, repentance, love, and freedom.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Karlstadt, Andreas Rudolf Bodenstein von. The Essential Carlstadt: Fifteen Tracts. Edited and translated by Edward J. Furcha. Waterloo, Ontario, Canada: Herald Press, 1995.
- . Karlstadts Schriften aus den Jahren 1523–25. 2 vols. Edited by Erich Hertzsch. Halle, Germany: Niemeyer 1956–1957.

Secondary Sources:

- Barge, Hermann. Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt. Leipzig, Germany: Friedrich Brandstetter 1905.
- Bubenheimer, Ulrich. Gelassenheit und Ablösung: Eine psychohistorische Studie über Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt und seinen Konflikt mit Martin Luther. Karlstadt, Germany: Volkshochschule Karlstadt 1981.
- Hasse, Hans-Peter. Karlstadt und Tauler: Untersuchungen zur Kreuzestheologie. Gütersloh, Germany: Mohn, 1993.
- Pater, Calvin. Karlstadt as the Father of the Baptist Movements: The Emergence of Lay Protestantism. Toronto, Canada: University of Toronto Press, 1984.
- Sider, Ronald. Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt. The Development of His Thought 1517–1525. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1974.
- Zorzin, Alejandro. Karlstadt als Flugschriftenautor. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1990.

DENNIS BIELFELDT

KEBLE, JOHN (1792–1866)

English theologian. On July 14, 1833, John Keble gave a sermon on “national apostasy” that is generally credited with galvanizing the Tractarian, or OXFORD MOVEMENT in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Already a member of a group of like-minded Oxford University fellows, Keble joined their combination of protest against the Church of England’s alignment with the state to their conviction that the church’s apostolic ministry and WORSHIP must be recovered.

Keble was born April 25, 1792, in Gloucestershire, the son of a Church of England cleric. He was elected a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford in 1811 after receiving honors in undergraduate studies. After ordination in the church he served in various parishes, in the process becoming noted for writing hymns and poetry. He returned to Oxford in 1831 as professor of poetry and soon became associated with JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, Froude, EDWARD PUSEY, and the other Tractarians. Summarized in his pivotal sermon, and in the eight tracts that he authored, his theological view centered on the necessity that the Church of England emphasize its distinctive marks of identity that were threatened by Erastianism, the superiority of the state over the church. For Keble the CHURCH must be led by its bishops and priests, and its pastoral ministry must emphasize the necessity of CONFESSION and absolution, as well as the sacraments of BAPTISM and the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER). To be a true Christian, he emphasized, one must be in communion with the church, and the church must be consistent with its apostolic heritage. Keble did not follow Newman and some of the other leading Tractarians into the Catholic Church. Instead he married Charlotte Clarke in 1835 and in 1836 became a highly regarded parish priest at Hursley, where he served for thirty years while continuing as a spiritual advisor and writer. He edited the words of the sixteenth century theologian RICHARD HOOKER. Over two dozen collections of his sermons were also published. Keble died at Bournemouth on March 29, 1866.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy; Clergy; Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

- Battiscombe, Georgina. John Keble: A Study in Limitations. New York: Knopf, 1963.
- Chadwick, Owen. The Spirit of the Oxford Movement. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.
- Griffin, John R. John Keble, Saint of Anglicanism. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987.
- Henery, Charles R., ed. A Speaking Life: The Legacy of John Keble. Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse, 1995.

WILLIAM SACHS

KECKERMANN, BARTHOLOMEW (c.1572–1609)

German philosopher and Calvinist theologian. Keckermann was born in Gdansk to a merchant family, and he attended school there between 1587 and 1590. As a recipient of a grant from the city council of his home town he went to GERMANY. He studied at Wittenberg, Leipzig, and Heidelberg, where he received his master's degree in 1595. In Heidelberg he taught philosophy, rhetoric, and Hebrew. In 1600 he was appointed to the chair of Hebrew at the university. Because of pressures from the Gdansk City Council, he turned down the offer of the chair in philosophy, and in 1602 he returned to Gdansk, where he took the position as co-rector of the Gymnasium (the high school) a position which he resigned after a short period of time. He obtained the chair of philosophy, which he occupied until his early death on July 25, 1609.

Broadly educated, particularly hard working, with international renown as an outstanding teacher, Keckermann had encyclopedic ambitions. His works included the whole range of contemporary knowledge. At the same time he sought to ground knowledge on a solid basis, which he found in Aristotelian logic. This explains why the methodological problems played such a key role in his works (for example, in his Systema Logicae of 1600 and his Praecognita logicae of 1603).

Keckermann's philosophy represents an attempt to link two traditions: the humanist tradition (PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, Jakob Sturm, Peter Ramus) and the neo-Averroistic tradition found in Padova, in particular the philosopher Giacomo Zabarelli who highly influenced Keckermann. Hence his work has an eclectic character but also a dogmatic flavor, stemming from Keckerman's teaching experience. As teacher he exposed his deep knowledge to his students—fairly but as ex cathedra monologue. On the other hand, didactic values accounted for the popularity of Keckermann's works in many European Protestant schools in the first half of the seventeenth century.

References and Further Reading

- Facca, Danilo. "Walczaca logika B.Keckermanna" ("Militant" Logic of B.Keckermann). Archiwum Historii Filozofii i Mysli Społecznej 45 (2000): 5–23.
- Freedman, Joseph S. "The Career and Writings of Bartholomaeus Keckermann (d. 1609)." Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 143 (1997): 305–364.
- Van Zuylen, W.H. Bartholomaeus Keckermann. Sein Leben und Werk. Leipzig, Germany: Robert Noske, 1934.
- Vasoli, Cesare. "Logica ed 'encyclopedia' nella cultura tedesca del tardo Cinquecento e del primo Seicento: Bartholomaeus Keckermann." In Atti del Convegno internazionale di Storia della Logica. 97–116. Bologna, Italy: 1983.

LECH SZCZUCKI

KENYA

See Africa

KEPLER, JOHANNES (1571–1630)

Astronomer. Kepler was born in the Swabian imperial city of Weil der Stadt. His family moved to the Lutheran duchy of Württemberg, where his scholastic talents won him a ducal scholarship to prepare him for the ministry. In 1589 he began to study at the University of Tübingen. At that time PHILIPP MELANCHTHON'S (1497–1560) belief that mathematics and astronomy aided one's knowledge of the divine led to an emphasis on these subjects. Kepler studied them at Tübingen with Michael Maestlin, who taught him to accept the Copernican over the Ptolemaic system.

In 1594 Kepler was sent to Graz to fill a vacancy in mathematics. There he wrote his first book, The Secret of the Universe. Its main thesis suggested a relationship between the distances between the six planets in the Copernican system and the five regular solids, but it also set forth many of the issues that were to occupy him throughout his career. The book brought him to the attention of Tycho Brahe, and Kepler joined him in Prague in 1600. This gave Kepler access to the best observational data available, and he used them to come up with his laws of planetary motion, the first two of which—the elliptical orbits of the planets and the relationship between their velocity and distance from the sun—were published in his New Astronomy in 1609. While in Prague he also did important work on elucidating the process of vision.

The overthrow of Kepler's patron, Emperor Rudolf II, in 1611 led him to seek a new position. He was refused a post at Tübingen, possibly because he rejected the Lutheran interpretation of the Eucharist in favor of the Reformed, and ended up in Linz, where he was denied communion because of his beliefs. There he formulated his third law, showing the relationship between the mean distance from the sun and the period times of any two planets, which he published in Harmony of the World. He also published important work on mathematics. His superior planetary tables led to the study of his work in the years after his death in 1630.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Kepler, Johannes. Gesammelte Werke. Edited by Max Caspar, et al. Munich: C.H.Beck, 1937–.
- . The Secret of the Universe. Translated by A.M. Duncan. New York: Abaris, 1981.
- . New Astronomy. Translated by William H. Donahue. Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- . The Harmony of the World. Translated by E.J. Aiton, et al. Philadelphia, PA: American Philosophical Society, 1997.

Secondary Source:

- Caspar, Max. Kepler. Translated and edited by C. Doris Hellman. Rev. ed. by Owen Gingerich. New York: Dover Books, 1993.

SHEILA J. RABIN

KERK, GEREFORMEERDE

See Dutch Reformed Church

KESWICK MOVEMENT

Animated by a trans-Atlantic Protestant fascination for a “higher” Christian life, the Keswick Movement takes its name from the site of its annual convention in ENGLAND’S picturesque Lake District.

The movement traces its beginnings to the determination of two American couples to promulgate abroad a particular conception of the Christian life. William and Mary Boardman, Presbyterians who spent years yearning for spiritual empowerment, believed they found it in what they termed the “higher” Christian life. William’s book, The Higher Christian Life (1858; republished in London in 1860), outlined his conviction that most Protestants failed to realize the potential of the Christian experience he found described in scripture. In a simple response of FAITH to Christ’s words, Boardman believed he had been empowered to live in more intense, conscious, momentby-moment dependency on Christ. The “higher” Christian life could be reduced to the simple appropriation of Christ as All. Boardman’s efforts helped extend so-called full salvation teaching within some Reformed settings. He carried his message to Britain’s Mildmay Convention in 1869. Between 1873 and 1875 he worked occasionally in England with Robert and Hannah Smith.

Finding Allies

The Smiths had come to similar conclusions by a different route. Well-to-do members of the Society of Friends from the southern tip of New Jersey, they embraced the systematic BIBLE study method associated with the PLYMOUTH BRETHERN and came into contact with proponents of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT. Both influences set them apart from their Quaker cohorts (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) and inclined them toward a particular spirituality. Gifted speakers and writers, they began in the 1860s giving their testimonies about practical holiness wherever they could gain an audience. Robert Smith took as his theme the phrase “Jesus saves me now,” emphasizing the conscious, ever-present, sin-cleansing work of Christ in the soul. As long as one kept “under the blood,” one was free from SIN. HANNAH WHITTALL SMITH summarized her views as The Christian’s Secret of a Happy Life (1875), a book that quickly became a Protestant classic. Her secret was essentially the same as Boardman's message: Christian happiness came in letting go, in relying on the perfect moment-by-moment cleansing blood applied to the soul. "The rest of faith" followed abandonment of one's self to God. Stop trying, the Smiths urged, and start trusting Christ for all.

The Boardmans and the Smiths belonged to loose networks of people who pursued practical holiness and who saw in that pursuit the key to churchwide revival. They challenged Christians to experience in the present the spiritual truths they claimed to know and on which they staked their eternal hopes. Discernible progress in the Christian life was available for the asking. One would never be sinless, but one could know freedom from the inward struggle with sin by following clear advice:

Let in the Overcomer, and He will conquer thee; Thy broken spirit taken in sweet captivity Shall glory in His triumph and share his victory.

Mission to England

In 1873, the Boardmans and the Smiths arrived in England eager to penetrate the CHURCH OF ENGLAND with their message. They discovered a convergence of indigenous influences that had prepared the way—reinvigorated WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT teaching; Quaker piety; Plymouth Brethren emphases on faith and scripture; Anglican EVANGELICALISM, especially as expressed in the spiritual aspirations of the annual Mildmay Conventions. Evangelists DWIGHT MOODY and IRA SANKEY were also in England 1873–1875, benefiting from the same impulses in their proclamation of their revival message. The people they attracted stood in the tradition of ROMANTICISM, with its emphases on love and purity. In his pathbreaking Evangelicalism in Modern Britain, historian David Bebbington notes that this movement found a place in "the most far-reaching cultural shift of the century."

The Smiths found receptive audiences wherever they went. They presided over a large Oxford Convention for the Promotion of Holiness in 1874. Smith then toured the Continent, finding remarkable resonance with his message in Berlin. He returned to a convention at Brighton that drew over 8,000 participants and more than 200 pastors from the Continent. Hannah Smith offered Bible readings that filled the largest venues. She was billed as a "chief speaker." For ten days, one journalist reported, the crowds "waited upon God" for the purpose of discerning "His will as to the possibilities of Christian holiness" for "quickenings of spiritual life in the Churches."

Later in 1875 Canon Harford-Battersby welcomed to his parish church in Keswick a much smaller group of people intent on holiness. This became the first Keswick Convention, and it initiated an annual tradition. It also unleashed a storm of opposition from Calvinists (see CALVINISM) troubled by the perceived popularity of instantaneous SANCTIFICATION. Over the next few years, Keswick proponents took heed and clarified their differences with those who urged a crisis experience of holiness. They concluded, rather, that freedom from sin—"the rest of faith"—became reality as the consecrated believer yielded moment by moment to the Holy Spirit who counteracted sin.

The Smiths' theme—by now set to music and sung by their followers in several European languages—“Jesus saves me now” meant just that.

Varied Audience

The first generation of Keswick leaders were Anglicans (see ANGLICANISM), although the audience and the convention preachers always represented a broader constituency. Frequent visitors from the Continent and the United States augmented the numbers and gave an international flavor. The Convention released The Keswick Week, a record of the activities and addresses of the annual conventions. By the 1890s speakers identified with the movement (known as Keswick missionaries) brought Keswick's version of practical holiness to other parts of the world in winter speaking tours. The Convention grew to include missionary appeals and to feature firsthand reports of Christian expansion abroad. Keswick recruited “Holy Ghost” missionaries—men and women convinced of the reality of full salvation here and now. (The first Keswick missionary was the Irishwoman Aimee Carmichael, who went to INDIA in 1893.) Annual conventions in other parts of the world soon worked to bring Keswick's particular emphasis into the movement.

A hymnal, Hymns of Consecration and Faith, soon collected songs that nurtured the Convention's particular forms of piety (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). Frances Ridley Havergal proved particularly adept at giving hymnic form to Keswick yearnings. Compilers found other women's hymns especially appropriate, too—the prolific American FANNY CROSBY, Charlotte Elliott, and Jean Sophia Pigott. They wrote of consecration, submission, and surrender, and contributed to a refashioning of devotional practice. Collections of Keswick addresses and books by popular Keswick speakers such as the South African Andrew Murray, Baptist F.B.Meyer, G.Campbell Morgan, J.Hudson Taylor, and Handley Moule extended the audience.

During the first decade of the twentieth century, both the Welsh Revival and PENTECOSTALISM challenged the Keswick Convention to consider boundaries for its teaching. The emotion that characterized the Welsh Revival of 1904 and 1905 threatened to disrupt the decorum that had become a hallmark of Keswick. For a few years from 1907, devotees of the emerging Pentecostal movement brought their understanding of the baptism with the Holy Spirit to Keswick. Convention regulars embraced the same language with different expectations. Pentecostalism introduced tongues speaking as uniform evidence of Spirit baptism; Keswick proponents found evidence of the Spirit's empowering presence in holiness of heart and life. The convention moved into the 1910s having successfully excluded ecstatic behavior and utterance.

Once established, the Keswick Convention featured well-known interdenominational and international speakers, a popular program of Bible readings, and well-attended missionary rallies. Its roots in the broad trans-Atlantic late nineteenth-century pursuit of holiness meant that the preaching of Frenchman Theodor Monod, Andrew Murray, F.B.Meyer, or Anglican Evan Hopkins was equally well received. The Keswick Convention became the hub of an international interdenominational network bound by an earnest conviction about the centrality of practical holiness in the Christian life. Featuring

Christ-centered piety centered in “death to self” by the “counteraction” of the Holy Spirit’s reign within the soul (rather than by eradication of sin or struggle with sin), the core Keswick message is perhaps captured best in the lines of favorite Keswick hymns:

The victory has been purchased on Calvary’s cross for me;
Sin shall not have dominion: the Son hath made me free!
The temple has been yielded and purified of sin;
Let thy Shekinah glory now flash forth from within Let all the earth keep silence, the body henceforth be Thy silent docile servant moved only as by Thee.
Jesus, I am resting, resting in the joy of what Thou art;
I am finding out the greatness of Thy loving heart.
Hidden in the hollow of His blessed hand,
Never foe can follow; never traitor stand.
Not a surge of worry; not a shade of care;
Not a blast of hurry; touch the Spirit there.

Many of the early American supporters of Keswick were protofundamentalists (see FUNDAMENTALISM), and throughout the twentieth century, American conservative Protestants have been featured on Keswick programs. Smaller American Keswicks, meanwhile, feature similar teaching venues. From the formative years when Hannah Smith offered Bible readings that rivaled her husband’s PREACHING in popularity, WOMEN have occasionally found public voice at Keswick, although typically featured speakers have been men. The best-known woman speaker early in the twentieth century was Jessie Penn-Lewis, a prolific author, editor, and interpreter of the Welsh Revival.

Keswick teaching appeals across Protestant denominations because its focus is more on the quality of Christian life than on theological precision. It has influenced Protestantism in broad but often unrecognized ways, especially through the books of its proponents (staples on evangelicals’ bookshelves) and through its hymns (favorites in many collections). Wheaton College Archives and Special Collections, Wheaton, Illinois owns a substantial research collection of Keswick materials.

See also Higher Life Movement; Methodism Movement

References and Further Reading

- Barabas, Steven. So Great Salvation. London: Marshall, Morgan & Scott, 1952.
- Pollock, John. The Keswick Story. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1964.
- Stevenson, Herbert F. Keswick's Authentic Voice. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1959.
- . Keswick's Triumphant Voice. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1963.

EDITH BLUMHOFER

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN AABYE

(1813–1855)

Danish theologian. Kierkegaard, whose surname in old Danish means “churchyard,” with all the familiar connotations of a graveyard, was born in Copenhagen in 1813. He was the youngest of seven children born to Michael Pederson Kierkegaard and his second wife Anne Sørensdatter Lund. Michael Kierkegaard (1756–1838) was born into an impecunious family in rural Jutland. As a young man, an uncle brought him into the dry goods business in Copenhagen. In a short while he owned his own store. He invested in real estate and stocks and soon was so well off that his children would never have to worry about making a living. On one level, Kierkegaard led a very privileged life, but on another it was psychological hardscrabble. His father was a difficult taskmaster who, Kierkegaard said, prepared him well for the life of faith but ruined his chances for worldly happiness.

The Early Years

Before Søren Kierkegaard was twenty-one, his mother, four of his siblings, and a number of in-laws had died. Kierkegaard’s father confided that the endless treks to the graveyard were divine punishment for the fact that as a very poor shepherd boy on the heaths of Denmark he had cursed God. Kierkegaard’s father told his remaining two sons that as punishment for his boyhood transgression he would live to bury all of his children. In both his melancholy and his peculiar understanding of faith, Kierkegaard’s father made a deep impression upon his famous son’s life and works.

In 1830 Kierkegaard entered the University of Copenhagen. At the behest of his father he matriculated in theology, but studied widely in the liberal arts. Many scholars regard Kierkegaard as having been in rebellion against his father during his early years at the university; however, in 1837 he reconciled with the patriarch, who died the following year. At the time of his father’s death, Kierkegaard had been studying at the university for eight years, but despite his father’s goading he had still failed to take his exams. Explaining that he could no longer argue with a dead man, he began to apply himself. In 1840 Kierkegaard finished and defended his dissertation, “On the Concept of Irony: With Constant Reference to Socrates.”

At the epicenter of Kierkegaard’s life was his forlorn relationship with Regine Olsen. In 1837 Kierkegaard fell in love with Regine. Three years later they became engaged. Almost immediately after the engagement, Kierkegaard began to have second thoughts. A little more than one year later he broke it off. Confiding in his diaries, Kierkegaard offered a number of reasons for this break, which was so brutal as to nearly sap Regine’s will to live. For one, he wanted to protect her from the terrible melancholy that afflicted the entire Kierkegaard family. For another, he did not feel that he could answer his calling to be a religious writer and a husband at the same time. Either way, she remained the wife of his soul and like his father, Regine is never far below the surface of Kierkegaard’s thought.

Two weeks after ending his engagement Kierkegaard left for Berlin, where, along with Karl Marx (1818–1883), he attended the lectures of the German philosopher Friedrich Schelling. There, in the crucible of the break with Regine, Kierkegaard came into his genius and his muse. In but a few months, in which he was also taking classes, Kierkegaard wrote the lyrical but sprawling Either/Or which, stylistically speaking, is one of the most peculiar philosophical tracts ever written. He also wrote his Two Upbuilding Discourses. Kierkegaard soon became disenchanted with Schelling, returned to Denmark, and began a period of astounding literary productivity. Over the next three years he penned Fear and Trembling, The Concept of Anxiety, the sharply chiseled Philosophical Fragments, the immense and somewhat uneven Stages on Life’s Way, and a shelf of edifying discourses. In 1844 Kierkegaard resolved that after one more book he would lay down his pen and take a pastorate in a rural church. His finale was to be the keystone of his philosophical writings, the Concluding Unscientific Postscript. However, soon after the publication of this book Kierkegaard was drawn into a fray with the popular left-leaning Danish weekly the Corsair. Nearly everyone read the Corsair and many feared turning up in one of its political cartoons. Kierkegaard appeared in many of them and became something of a negative media star in Denmark. The battle with the Corsair, which ended in the editors resigning and in Kierkegaard having to resign himself to living a more private life, made it clear to Kierkegaard that he should continue with his authorship.

Published Works

In 1849 Kierkegaard published what may well be the most profound study of Christian psychology ever written, The Sickness unto Death. Between 1851 and 1855 came the black hole in Kierkegaard’s life. While writing a torrent of journal entries he published nothing, but in 1855 he launched a frontal assault on the Danish State Church. At the funeral of the Danish prelate and Kierkegaard family pastor, Bishop J.P. Mynster, the priest and theologian H.L.Martensen delivered a eulogy in which he described Mynster as “a witness to the Truth.” Throughout his authorship, Kierkegaard had argued that the likes of Mynster and Martensen had let the criterion for being a Christian slip so low that people no longer had a useful barometer of what it meant to have faith. Bishop Mynster enjoyed great power and led an opulent lifestyle. For Kierkegaard being a witness to the truth would entail existentially mirroring the truth by imitating the person of Jesus Christ. As far as Kierkegaard was concerned, Mynster did not take a single step along this road and so Kierkegaard found the very idea of one of the leaders of the church calling Mynster “a witness to the Truth” woefully misleading. With Martensen’s hyperbolic encomium, Kierkegaard came to the end of his rope. Starting his own journal, The Instant, Kierkegaard attacked Martensen and the church establishment of which he was such an integral part. Kierkegaard was so angry that he stopped attending services, commenting that he would no longer participate in a process that “made a fool of God.” Throughout the period of the attack, Kierkegaard was fast becoming gravely ill. On September 25, 1855, Kierkegaard delivered his final fusillade in The Instant. A week later he fell unconscious on the street. On November 11, at the age of forty-two, he died of causes still uncertain. There was a minor riot at Kierkegaard’s internment at Assistance Cemetary in Copenhagen. During the last few months of his life, Kierkegaard not only refused the sacraments, he refused to see members of the clergy as well, including his celebrated brother, Pastor Peter Christian Kierkegaard. After Dean Tryde, a member of the clergy, performed the committal, Kierkegaard’s nephew Henrik Lund vigorously protested that having a clergyman at the head of the grave was contrary to all of Kierkegaard’s wishes. Lund’s lengthy graveyard comments received some applause and there were a few tense moments before the large crowd dispersed.

Kierkegaard wrote the bulk of his most celebrated works and certainly his most philosophical books under pseudonyms. There is much debate among Kierkegaard scholars about his reasons for taking this tack. While the use of pseudonyms was common in Denmark at this time, Kierkegaard offered a variety of explanations for his use of pen names. For one, he claimed that he wanted to present his readers with various life possibilities or perspectives quite different from his own. Once again, Kierkegaard held that he did not live in the same categories as expressed in some of his works, for example, The Sickness unto Death, and therefore could not pretend as though the positions taken in such books were his own. For still another reason, Kierkegaard wanted to deflect his reader’s interest away from his personality. Whatever the explanation, he took his noms de plume seriously, and in his journals and his non-pseudonymously written From the Point of View of My Work as an Author, he insisted that the opinions expressed in the pseudonymous works not be treated as though they were his own.

Conflict with Other Philosophers

Kierkegaard struggled both mightily and brilliantly against the ENLIGHTENMENT notion that faith was sub-servient to reason. His main antagonists were philosopher GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL (1770–1831) and the Danish Hegelians who, on Kierkegaard’s reading, would have us believe that faith was, in effect, a simplified version of philosophy to be consumed by the simple folk who could not understand the likes of German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) and Hegel. While he was not an irrationalist, Kierkegaard argued, for the most part obliquely, that faith is beyond reason in the sense that reason cannot decide the question of faith. More than that, Johannes Climacus (pseudonymous author of Philosophical Fragments and The Concluding Unscientific Postscript) describes the object of faith as an absolute absurdity. The claim that, relative to his creation, God is an absurdity, has been the source of much debate among interpreters of Kierkegaard. Whereas some maintain that for Kierkegaard the object of faith is a logical contradiction (for instance, the eternal come into time, the immortal to die), others such as Stephen Evans contend that Kierkegaard, who upholds the law of noncontradiction against Hegel, did not believe that faith requires the willingness and ability to believe in self-contradictory propositions or nonsense.

According to Kierkegaard's most philosophical persona, Johannes Climacus, reason must either step aside before the object of faith or take offense. Taking up on Jesus's oft stated, "Do not take offense in me," Kierkegaard believed that the possibilities of faith and offense were inextricably tied to one another, so that when the thorn of the possibility of offense was removed, so was the possibility of faith. On Kierkegaard's reading, the rationalized and so volatilized idea of God peddled by Enlightenment theology removed just this possibility.

In his masterwork Fear and Trembling, Kierkegaard tries to restore both the difficulty and the primitivity of faith. He centered this book on the Genesis story of Abraham and Isaac, and in so doing strove to remind his reader that reason and revelation or faith may well conflict. Once more, now as in Kierkegaard's time, many believe that being faithful amounts to nothing more or less than being moral; that is, they believe that faith is somehow reducible to ethics. However, in Fear and Trembling Kierkegaard astutely notes that speaking solely from an ethical point of view, Abraham, the father of faith, was guilty of murder. Thus, we have Kierkegaard's strange apology in which he insists, albeit indirectly, that revelation is beyond reason and that the content of faith cannot be reduced to moral duties or a recipe of rules for the good life.

While he does not follow Schleiermacher in reducing faith to a feeling, Kierkegaard places great emphasis on the importance of passion. A critic of the epoch, Kierkegaard chides his age for its excess of reflection and lack of passion and decisiveness. Kierkegaard was nicknamed "Enten/eller" (Either/Or) and with good reason, as he tried to press people into deciding for or against God, rather than imagining that they could be born into the fold and at the same time act in no markedly different way from atheists. Kierkegaard stressed the significance of the will to the point where some Kierkegaard scholars have charged him with being a volitionalist, that is, someone who holds the untenable psychological thesis that we can will to believe whatever we wish to believe. Other Kierkegaard scholars have countered that far from being a volitionalist, Kierkegaard believed that faith is the result of sheer grace. Still other Kierkegaard scholars, such as Jamie Ferreira and Steven Emmanuel, have developed a compromise position, holding that for Kierkegaard faith involves both the will and grace.

Then what, according to Kierkegaard, is faith? The Concluding Unscientific Postscript teaches that faith is a clinging with the highest passion to an objective uncertainty. In Kierkegaard's more direct communiques, that objective uncertainty is marked as the person of Jesus of Nazareth. As already stated, Kierkegaard was a virulent critic of the Danish State Church and of the notion that one could, as it were, be born into the faith. In his Fear and Trembling, Kierkegaard admonished that a fire sale was in progress with regard to faith. That is the criterion, for what it means to believe had been so diminished that many people wrongly believed themselves to be Christians. Kierkegaard looked to Socrates as a kind of secular saint and, like the gadfly of Athens, Kierkegaard wrote as though he were the gadfly of Christendom. While Socrates relieved many of his interlocutors of the idea that they had knowledge, Kierkegaard strove to extricate his readers from a false sense of their own faith. In myriad different ways, Kierkegaard taught that there is no believing in Christ without seeking to imitate his suffering, humiliation, hope, and love.

In his seminal Works of Love, Kierkegaard argues that there is only one form of love, love of God. Unless they are grounded in love of God, all other forms of preferential love (friendship and erotic love), are best understood as manifestations of improper self-love. In this book, Kierkegaard unpacks the New Testament, and comes to the conclusion that hard as it may be for the worldly individual to understand, and contrary as it may seem to the Kantian perspective to which Kierkegaard was otherwise sympathetic, love is best understood as an obligation that commands action. And yet, the author of this same book teaches that there is fundamentally only one action that we can perform to help our neighbors and that is to help them love God.

Kierkegaard is often called the father of existentialism. He had enormous impact on the philosophers Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–1980), Miguel Unamuno y Jugo (1864–1936), Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), and Karl Jaspers (1883–1969). Kierkegaard was also much revered by genial analytic philosopher, Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951). Indeed, Wittgenstein's writings on ethics and religion owe much to the Danish philosopher. Kierkegaard also helped shape the thinking of the grand masters of twentieth-century theology, KARL BARTH (1886–1968), RUDOLF BULTMANN (1884–1976), PAUL JOHANNES TILLICH (1886–1965), and REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971). Finally, due to his views on authorship, concretely manifest in his pseudonymous writings, postmodern thinkers have found an ally in Kierkegaard.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Kierkegaard, Søren. Kierkegaard's Writings. Edited and translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna Hong, Henrik Rosenmeier, Reidar Thomte, Juila Watkin et al. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1978.

Secondary Sources:

Emmanuel, Steven. Kierkegaard and the Concept of Revelation. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1996.

Evans, C. Stephen. Passionate Reason: Making Sense of Kierkegaard's Philosophical Fragments. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1980.

Ferreira, M. Jamie. Transforming Vision: Imagination and Will in Kierkegaardian Faith. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991.

Ferguson, Harvie. Melancholy and the Critique of Modernity: Søren Kierkegaard's Religious Psychology. London and New York: Routledge, 1995.

- Green, Ronald. Kierkegaard and Kant: The Hidden Debt. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Gouwens, David. Kierkegaard as a Religious Thinker. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Hannay, Alastair. Kierkegaard: The Arguments of the Philosophers. Edited by Ted Honderich. London and New York: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982. Rev. ed.: New York: Routledge, 1991.
- Hannay, A., and Marino, G. The Cambridge Companion to Kierkegaard. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Kirmmse, Bruce. Kierkegaard in Golden Age Denmark. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. From Luther to Kierkegaard. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1950.

GORDON MARINO

KILHAM, HANNAH (1774–1832)

English educator. Hannah Spurr was born in Sheffield, England, on August 12, 1774, to a family well established in trade although not affluent (her father being a master cutler), which provided her a good education. She became known as an educator, philanthropist, and pioneer of African linguistics. Brought up an Anglican, she joined the Methodists in 1794, and in 1798 married Alexander Kilham, leader of the Methodist New Connexion, the first major division in METHODISM after JOHN WESLEY'S death. Kilham died the same year, leaving his wife with an unborn child (who died in infancy) and a stepdaughter (who was to be her biographer).

Disillusioned with Methodism, especially the gap between the professed sentiments of the hymns and the lives of those who sang them, Hannah joined the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS in 1803. She was active in charitable schemes for the poor in ENGLAND and IRELAND, and notably in BIBLE SOCIETIES, the antislavery cause, and EDUCATION among the poor. These interests combined to turn her interests toward AFRICA.

In 1820 she began the study of the Wolof and Mandinka languages, guided by two redeemed slaves from the Gambia area of West Africa. She produced Scripture passages and reading materials in the languages. In 1823, although nearing fifty, she organized and led a party, which included the language informants, on an agricultural and educational mission to Gambia. She also visited SIERRA LEONE, where she found that, although crowds of Africans drawn from many parts of the continent and rescued from slave ships were in school, they were all being taught in English, not in their vernaculars. She revisited Sierra Leone in 1827–1828, and for a longer time from 1830, when she set up a school in the liberated African village of Charlotte and developed her ideas of language study and vernacular teaching. Her assistant for Yoruba study was almost certainly SAMUEL CROWTHER. She was in the process of visiting LIBERIA when she died at sea on March 31, 1832.

Hannah Kilham's activities in Africa were carried out amid her many concerns elsewhere, particularly famine relief in Ireland. Indeed, it is possible that she had too many concerns for any one of them to be brought to completion. She was an advocate and pioneer of MISSIONS, albeit of a clearly defined character, in a denomination that had at the time somewhat distanced itself from the missionary movement—and in a period when female initiatives of the kind were virtually unknown. She was a pioneer in the study of African languages, at a time when this was a field outside the competence of the learned world. She envisaged an institute in London where the main languages of Africa could be studied, with two native speakers of each language operating in a purpose-built (and specially heated) building. In her work for African vernacular education, she was far ahead of her time.

See also Bible Translation; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Billers, Sarah. Memoir of Hannah Kilham. London: Darton and Harvey, 1837.

Dickson, Mora. The Powerful Bond. London: Dobson, 1980.

Greenwood, J.Ormerod. "Hannah Kilham's Plan." Sierra Leone Bulletin of Religion 4 (1962): 9–22, 61–71.

Hair, P.E.H. "Hannah Kilham and African Languages." Journal of the Friends' Historical Society 49 (1960): 165–168.

ANDREW F.WALLS

KIMBANGU, SIMON (1889–1951)

African religious leader. Founder of the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth Through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu, Kimbangu was born in 1889 in the village of Nkamba in the lower Congo region of AFRICA. His early life and religious activities are shrouded in much myth and legend. As a young boy, Kimbangu came under the influence of the English Baptist Missionary Society missionaries, was baptized in 1915 along with his wife, MarieMivilu, and received his schooling at the Baptist mission school in nearby Wathen (although he was rejected for religious leadership).

When an epidemic broke out in Nkamba in 1918, Kimbangu reputedly received a calling to heal the sick through a voice from Christ, who told him that he, rather than Western missionaries, was chosen to convert his fellow Africans. Frightened, Kimbangu fled to Kinshasa (then Leopoldville) to work at an oil refinery for three years before returning to Nkamba in 1921. Again, Kimbangu received the call to heal, but this time he began a ministry that lasted from March until September and attracted many followers to Nkamba, which became known as the “New Jerusalem.” Alarmed that this mass movement might translate into political protest against Belgian colonial rule, the authorities ordered Kimbangu’s arrest on June 6, 1921, but he eluded arrest until voluntarily surrendering on September 12. Kimbangu was given the death sentence, which was commuted to life imprisonment by King Albert, and he lived out his life in the prison at Lubumbashi until his death on October 12, 1951.

Under the leadership of his son, Kuntima Diangienda, the Kimbanguist movement, with its emphasis on absolute dependence on God, divine healing and charismatic phenomena, and the rejection of polygamy, traditional magic, and fetishes, evolved into an indigenous church, the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth Through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu. This church was accepted into the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1969 and today counts upward of 5 million members.

See also African Instituted Churches; Baptist Missions; Faith Healing

References and Further Reading

Martin, Marie-Louise. Kimbangu: An African Prophet and His Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1976.

MacGaffey, Wyatt. Modern Kongo Prophets: Religion in a Plural Society. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1983.

TIMOTHY E.FULOP

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929–1968)

American churchman and civil rights leader. Martin Luther King Jr. was born on January 15, 1929, in Atlanta, Georgia, into a middle class black Baptist family with CLERGY on both his father's and mother's side. After skipping two grades in public school King entered Morehouse College in Atlanta at age fifteen. His call to the ministry led him to Crozer Theological Seminary in Chester, Pennsylvania (now Colgate Rochester Crozer Divinity School in Rochester, New York), from which in 1951 he graduated at the head of his class. His graduate education continued at Boston University where he received his Ph.D. in systematic theology in 1955 with a dissertation on the notion of God in the work of PAUL TILLICH and Henry Nelson Weiman.

After receiving several offers from academic institutions, King decided to return to his native South and became pastor of Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. Then in 1960 he became copastor with his father at Ebenezer Baptist Church in Atlanta. He held this position as well as indispensable leadership in the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT until his assassination in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968. He was buried in Atlanta near Ebenezer Baptist Church, survived by his wife, Coretta Scott King, and four children.

King authored five books and scores of articles and delivered thousands of speeches and sermons in the UNITED STATES and abroad. In 1964 he became the youngest person to receive the Nobel Prize for peace. He is primarily known as a civil rights activist who, through nonviolent means, sought to correct social injustice.

Philosophy of Nonviolence

King's understanding of nonviolence was based on the Christian teaching of love found in the Sermon on the Mount and on Mahatma Gandhi's method of Ahimsa (noninjury). The spirit and content of nonviolence were from Jesus; the path and method were from Gandhi. This philosophy can be summed up in the following way: nonviolence was always the unvarying principle; noncooperation and civil disobedience were the two main strategies; various tactics would be used from picketing, boycotting, demonstrating, parading without a permit, conducting sit-ins, and refusing to obey certain local discriminatory laws.

An account of King's pilgrimage to nonviolence is found in chapter 6 of his first book, Stride Toward Freedom. There, King outlines the bases of nonviolence. (1) Nonviolence is not a method for the weak or for cowards. It is not passive nonresistance to evil, but active nonviolent resistance to evil, often in the face of great odds. (2) Nonviolence does not seek to defeat or humiliate opponents, but to win them over by way of friendship and understanding. This is done to create the Beloved Community. (3) Nonviolence as a method of attack is directed against forces of evil and systemic injustice, rather than against persons doing evil. (4) Nonviolence is predicated on the willingness to accept suffering without retaliation. "Unearned suffering is redemptive." (5) Nonviolence avoids external physical violence but also internal spiritual violence. (6) Nonviolent protest is based on the belief that the universe is on the side of justice. "The moral arc of the universe is long, but it bends toward justice." King's leadership for civil rights in campaigns from Montgomery to Memphis saw the practice of these principles evolve with integrity and effectiveness.

Montgomery, Alabama: Segregated Public Transportation (December 1955-December 1956)

The catalyst for this campaign was Rosa Parks's refusal to stand for a white man who wanted her seat in a bus on December 1, 1955. Soon a bus boycott, under the inspiration of King, was organized with the help of E.D.Nixon, a local black labor leader, and the Woman's Political Council. For a year, black workers carpooled, walked to work, and otherwise avoided the buses. Their success was achieved near the end of 1956. The Montgomery Improvement Association was formed to coordinate the various tactics of the boycott, a form of noncooperation. Soon after the Montgomery campaign, in 1957, King, along with other young black clergy, formed the Southern Christian Leadership Conference to provide a new vision for the South and, in their words, to "save the soul of America." That organization exists today.

Birmingham, Alabama: Public Transportation (1963)

Selma, Alabama: Voting Rights (1965)

King faced these issues in Birmingham: (1) the desegregation of lunch counters, rest rooms, fitting rooms, and drinking fountains; (2) hiring and promoting of black workers on a nondiscriminatory basis; (3) the dropping of all charges against jailed demonstrators and (4) the creation of a biracial committee for implementing a timetable to realize these goals. In Birmingham he ratcheted up the strategy of nonviolence from noncooperation to nonviolent direct action by way of several forms of civil disobedience. They ranged from picketing to marching to large-scale voluntary jailing, especially on the part of young people. Here demonstrators also met the most resistance from Eugene “Bull” Conner, the Commissioner of Public Safety, who ordered the use of electric cattle prods, police dogs, billy clubs, and fire hoses against them. In addition, there were bombings and burnings of homes and motels. The televised images of these events tapped the conscience of the United States and sufficient pressure was brought to bear on both houses of Congress by black and white citizens alike that within a year the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was passed. It was also during this campaign that King served an eightday jail sentence and during his imprisonment on April 16, 1963, wrote his famous Letter from Birmingham Jail, one of the significant Christian documents of the twentieth century.

The Selma campaign was waged to ensure voting rights for black citizens, the majority population of Dallas County. In employing the same nonviolent direct action used in Birmingham, local black people and many northern whites met again with physical danger from local white citizens, led by Sheriff Jim Clark and the KU KLUX KLAN (KKK). This was particularly evidenced by events surrounding “Bloody Sunday,” March 7, 1965, one of the defining moments in the Civil Rights Movement. About 600 marchers, led by John Lewis, planned the fifty-mile walk from Selma to Montgomery. They had to cross the Edmund Pettus Bridge as they left Selma and were met there with police on horses who beat and trampled the marchers. Several days later King led a successful march to Montgomery. The success of the Selma campaign led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The March on Washington, D.C. (1963)

Soon after the Birmingham campaign, the March on Washington was organized, culminating at the Lincoln Memorial for August 28, 1963. It was the occasion for King’s famous “I Have a Dream” speech in which he clarified his vision of the Beloved Community. The ideals expressed in the speech of human dignity, the worth of human personality, racial integration, and a society ruled by the law of love were based on the Western religious ideals of the Messianic Era and the KINGDOM OF GOD as well as on the political ideals of the nation’s founding documents, primarily the Declaration of Independence, which describe the American ideal of a “holy commonwealth.”

King's Opposition to the Vietnam War

His public stand against the U.S. policy in Vietnam in the spring of 1967 found King arguing the interconnection of what he called the three basic evils in America—racism, poverty, and WAR. He saw a disproportionate number of black soldiers and national resources being expended in what he perceived to be an unjust war. This was one of King's most controversial statements and he was criticized by black and white leaders alike for "mixing peace and civil rights." King's response was "justice is indivisible" and "I have worked too long and hard now against segregated public accommodations to end up segregating my moral concern."

The Poor Peoples' Campaign, Washington, D.C. (1968)

In his Christmas Eve sermon at Ebenezer Baptist Church in 1967, King revealed sorrowfully that his "dream" had turned into a "nightmare." To illustrate this he cited certain class issues as increased black poverty, white backlash, his rejection in the Chicago suburbs, and the urban riots in northern cities. This new content, centering on economic concerns of housing, education, health, and jobs, including all of America's poor—African American, Latino, Native American, and Appalachian whites—called for new tactics. As a result King's method of nonviolence as an agent for social change moved from noncooperation in Montgomery to nonviolent direct action in Birmingham and Selma (all three campaigns having to do with civil rights) to massive civil disobedience, nonviolent sabotage, and in King's words the need "to dislocate the functioning of a city [Washington, D.C.] without destroying it." The primary concern at this time was democratic socialism or class. King felt in 1968 that this tactic was more necessary, effective, and radical than the sit-ins, boycotts, and demonstrations of previous civil rights' days. The success of the Poor Peoples' Campaign was seriously compromised by King's assassination in Memphis, Tennessee, on April 4, 1968, where he was advocating a higher standard of living for garbage workers.

King as a Broker of Twentieth-Century Protestant Thought

Although King was a social activist, he was also a Christian thinker who unified major strands of liberal Protestant theology to undergird, philosophically, his campaigns for social justice. The central themes of liberalism he encountered at Crozer and Boston, such as emphasis on religious experience, the humanity of Jesus, a strong ethical orientation, confidence in human reason and in the goodness of human beings, the dynamism of history, and a respect for other points of view, easily found their place in King's mind and heart because he had heard much of this, in one form or another, from the black church and from President Benjamin Mays and Professor George Kelsey at Morehouse (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). His most influential teacher at Crozer, George Washington Davis, introduced King to evangelical liberals such as William Adams Brown, to the SOCIAL GOSPEL of WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH, and the Personalist philosophy of Edgar Sheffield Brightman, whose thought he would examine in depth at Boston. Because of his liberal belief in the capacity for human goodness, King was open to nonviolence as a method of social change practiced by Gandhi, who was also introduced to him by Davis. King was receptive as well to the lectures and writings of such pacifists as Mordecai Johnson and A.J. Muste, although the practical significance of these ideas would not be realized by King until the Montgomery bus boycott. King's liberal leaning, especially his interest in nonviolence, were challenged by his reading of the Christian realist, REINHOLD NIEBUHR, rigorously taught by Professor Kenneth Smith at Crozer. It was this liberal theology, validated by the prayers, sermons, spirituals, and devotion to God of the black church, that fueled King's desire to resist injustice.

The Beloved Community

This was a theme in liberal Protestantism from JOSIAH ROYCE (1913) to Walter Rauschenbusch (1917) to Lynn Harold Hough (1941). King began talking about the Beloved Community in his sermons in 1955–1956 and it was mentioned or implied in almost all his major addresses for the rest of his life. This ideal human society was the vision that fundamentally motivated his life and thought.

King's "brokering" of theology was most clearly seen in his understanding of this community. The social gospel provided a theological framework with which to articulate it. Nonviolence provided the means to establish it. Personalism provided the philosophical base for supporting the personal nature of the community, and Niebuhr's realism served to qualify King's optimism about its possible realization in history. King's dream for this community was one where "all barriers that divide and alienate humanity, whether racial, economic, or psychological" would be removed. This ideal was not limited to America. Toward the end of his life King's vision became global; he often spoke of "the world house," a world where "we must transcend our races, our tribe, our class, and our nation."

King showed how the Christian gospel of love could be used to transform a racist and unjust society into one well on the way to racial harmony and social justice.

See also Kingdom of God

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- King, Martin Luther, Jr. Stride Toward Freedom: The Montgomery Story. New York: Harper and Row, 1958.
- . Strength to Love. New York: Harper and Row, 1963.
- . Why We Can't Wait. New York: Harper and Row, 1963.
- . Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community? New York: Harper and Row, 1967.
- . The Trumpet of Conscience. New York: Harper and Row, 1968.

Secondary Sources:

- Baldwin, Lewis V. To Make the Wounded Whole: The Cultural Legacy of Martin Luther King, Jr. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1992.
- Erskine, Noel Leo. King Among the Theologians. Cleveland, OH: The Pilgrim Press, 1994.
- Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morrow, 1986.
- Smith, Kenneth, L., and Ira G. Zepp, Jr. Search for the Beloved Community: The Thinking of Martin Luther King, Jr. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1974.
- Watley, William D. Roots of Resistance: The Nonviolent Ethic of Martin Luther King, Jr. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1985.

IRA G. ZEPP JR.

KINGDOM OF GOD

For much of Protestantism, the Kingdom of God is the central symbol of God's activity in the world. Often depicted in historical terms, the Kingdom represents God's influence on the social and political order. Although some Protestant theologians and leaders describe the Kingdom as present, most combine the emphasis on the present with an eschatological dimension. A few restrict the term to the future. In which case, the Kingdom of God may be identified with the millennial reign (Revelation 20:2). CHILIASM, millennialism, and millenarianism describe theological interpretations of this prediction (see MILLENARIANS and MILLENNIALISM). While these terms are often interchangeable, many contemporary scholars reserve chiliasm and millenarianism for theologies that predict a catastrophic break in history, followed by an earthly golden age. Some reserve the full and final conception of the Kingdom for a "new creation" that will transcend and transfigure current conceptions of time and space.

Biblical Background

Protestants derive their understanding of the Kingdom of God from the BIBLE. For centuries, Protestants read Scripture as a synthetic whole, and therefore their Kingdom doctrine systematized teachings from both the Old and New Testaments. Since about 1800, however, many Protestants have adopted a critically analytic approach that understands biblical concepts in their historical context and then insists on the need to restate ancient truths in modern form.

In the New Testament, the word "Kingdom" appears primarily in Mark, Matthew, and Luke. Mark and Luke use the "kingdom of God," while Matthew uses the "kingdom of heaven." The history of the Kingdom sayings is obscure. The earliest communities reinterpreted the sayings of Jesus in the light of their own situation. Later, unknown editors collected these sayings and between A.D. 65 and 110 the Gospel authors combined them with a narrative of Jesus' life. Nonetheless, a rough outline of the development of the Kingdom tradition is possible. Jesus drew heavily on the various Isaiah traditions. He believed that Isaiah's promise of a God who will comfort the poor and the maimed was fulfilled in God's ministry, but God's rule had not yet reached its full extent. The parables of the wheat and the tares, the mustard seed, and the leaven contrast the Kingdom's humble beginnings with its glorious future. The disciples are, hence, to pray that God's Kingdom will come on earth "as in heaven." At some point, this earlier tradition was reinterpreted apocalyptically. Those with "eyes to see and ears to hear" understand the signs of the times as certainly as sailors see the signs of changing weather. God's act will be soon. It is uncertain how much of the apocalyptic outlook goes back to Jesus himself.

Although the Kingdom figures prominently in the synoptic gospels, the term is almost absent from the Fourth Gospel and Paul's letters. There are only seven references to the Kingdom in the letters attributed to Paul, and five of those passages (I Corinthians 4:20; I Corinthians 6:9; I Corinthians 15:50 and Galatians 5:21) contrast the righteousness of the Kingdom with the unrighteousness of the church. John's two references (John 3:3 and 3:5) associate the Kingdom with the mysterious movements of the Spirit.

Early Christianity

Many early Christians shared the Revelation hope for a millennium between A.D. 100 and 300. Saint Irenaeus (c.120-c.200) and Tertullian (died c.225) continued the chiliastic tradition, stressing the importance of God's earthly Kingdom. At a time when believers suffered social rejection and occasional martyrdom, the millennial hope helped them to retain their faith. In contrast, many Gnostic Christians interpreted the historical assertions of the Bible, including the millennium, as symbols of heavenly or cosmic realities.

Belief in an earthly millennium faded around the year 200. Many bishops repudiated millennial teachings when they excommunicated the Montanists, a millenarian sect that practiced ecstatic prophecy. Contemporaneously, Clement (died c.215) and Origen (c.185-c.254), two Alexandrine theologians, applied Greek philosophic and scientific methods to Christian teaching. For those who followed their lead, the Kingdom was spiritual: the believer's present obedience to God as the moral ruler. Millennial peace and justice were symbols of the concord of the heavenly realm.

The Imperial Church

The Emperor Constantine (c.288-c.337) and his successors, with the exception of Julian, made the Christian Church first the favored and then the exclusive religion of Rome. This turned matters of faith into matters of state, and tended to identify God's rule with the government. For the church historian Eusebius (c.263-c.340), Constantine's government was the climax of Christian history. In his Life of Constantine, Eusebius depicted the emperor as a new David, anointed by God. In effect, Christ exercised his rule on earth through the godly ruler.

In the Eastern Roman Empire, this theology promoted an exaltation of the emperor's person. In the West, the situation was more complicated because rulers often had to share power with ecclesiastical officials. Nonetheless, the royal theology thrived. Bishops crowned kings, anointed them with holy oils, and said prayers for their families at mass. In term, kings represented God's power on earth.

The identification of the earthly kingdom with God's reign has rarely monopolized Christian thinking. Augustine of Hippo (354–430) began his episcopate believing that God was Rome's protector and Christianity, the highest expression of Roman culture. The barbarian invasions of the West and, finally, of his own North Africa, however, led him to rethink this identification. In his City of God, Augustine argued that the city of God and the city of man coexisted together. The human city was ruled by pride, avarice, and other vices, and, hence, could never be the Kingdom, although it was necessary for human righteousness. The visible church was not the Kingdom either. Like the earthly city, the church was a mixed multitude of wheat and tares. Only in heaven would God rule directly. John's millennium, Augustine believed, was a symbol of the church and did not refer to an earthly reign of Christ.

Monastic movements represented another approach to the kingdom. Through such practices as prayer, fasting, voluntary poverty, and solitude, the monks attempted to make their communities obedient to Christ. Each monastery was, in effect, an outpost of the Kingdom of Christ.

Abbot Joachim of Fiore (1132–1202) taught that world history passed through three ages or reigns: the Kingdom of the Father, the Kingdom of the Son, and the Kingdom of the Spirit. The advent of this last kingdom, Joachim believed, was near. Later, Joachim's teachings were popular among the followers of Francis of Assisi (c.1182–1226). Francis established his order of brothers around the ideal of absolute poverty: they were to own nothing and to beg their meals. Although the order became less radical as time passed, a minority insisted on the literal fulfillment of Francis's example. These "Spirituals" believed that Francis had inaugurated Joachim's Kingdom of the Spirit and that they were the first fruits of God's millennial reign. Although the Spiritual Franciscans were suppressed, their ideas inspired many medieval millennial movements, some of whom advocated violent revolution.

The Reformation

The fifteenth-century invention of moveable type revolutionized learning by providing readers and professional scholars with uniform, easily readable texts. Printed book production made Europe a common market in ideas, with new works spreading across the continent rapidly. Simultaneously, Europeans launched a program of trade, exploration, and discovery. New routes to India were discovered, and Christopher Columbus accidentally landed in the Americas. Exploration in turn transformed everyday life as new products and foods, such as coffee (Arabia), sugar (India, later Americas), spices (Asia), chocolate (Americas), and tobacco (Americas) were introduced. To many, such changes were signs that God was about to begin the millennium. Spanish missionaries, for instance, gathered NATIVE AMERICANS into self-sustaining communities that they believed were signs of God's New Age.

MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) followed Augustine in his doctrine of the Kingdom. In both his Large and Small Catechisms, Luther interpreted the petition "Thy Kingdom (Reich) Come" as the Christian's response to God's will. To pray for the Kingdom is, thus, to become obedient to revelation and its demands. Like Augustine, Luther distinguished between the two kingdoms, using his understanding of law and gospel to interpret the relation of CHURCH AND STATE. Man's Reich must use legislation and the sword to affect its will. In contrast, God's Reich directly rules the hearts of believers. Both kingdoms are, of course, ultimately rooted in God, and Luther speaks of the earthly kingdom as God's left hand and the heavenly kingdom as God's right.

Without intending it, Luther inspired millenarian speculations. Although he questioned Revelation's canonicity, Luther frequently identified papal Rome with the whore who sat on seven hills. Further, editions of Luther's Bible translation often featured woodcuts depicting the pope as Antichrist, being thrown from heaven. Such pictures spoke louder than words. When ordinary people read Luther's Bible, their eyes moved from the image of the pope's damnation to the text's prophecy of a coming millennial reign; the conclusion that the fall of Rome was a step toward the Kingdom was natural, almost inevitable.

By 1524, interest in establishing the millennial Kingdom had become common. The German peasants, who had long suffered injustice, carefully read the Bible and derived from it, as well as from an assessment of traditional law, a list of demands for social change. THOMAS MÜNTZER (1489–1525) and other preachers gave their demands an explicitly millennial interpretation that identified the peasants' cause with the Kingdom. Partially in reaction, Luther supported the opponents of the peasants, claiming that the princes were doing God's will in putting down the rebellion. Luther's extreme royal theology went in a different direction than his more balanced two kingdoms theology.

The South German and Swiss Reformers made the Kingdom a central part of their theology. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) believed that the Bible contained blueprints for society, and, hence, governments ought to adopt its teaching. At about the same time, the sectarian Anabaptists turned explicitly to the New Testament for their Kingdom teaching (see ANABAPTISM). Although the Anabaptists were not a unified movement, most taught that faith was a voluntary matter, a point reinforced by their insistence on believer's baptism. In addition, they hoped their churches might be holy commonwealths that renounced war, the oath, and economic injustice.

Radical Anabaptists, inspired by MELCHIOR HOFMANN'S (c.1500–1543) millennial speculations, attempted to establish a millennial Kingdom in Münster. Besieged by an imperial army, their commune practiced polygamy and the community of goods. Although the princes defeated the Münster rebels, as they earlier defeated the peasants, the Anabaptist hope for a new Kingdom did not vanish.

Although Geneva's JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) shared Zwingli's Old Testament passion, Calvin, a humanist and lawyer, understood that laws reflected cultural as well as divine mandates. Calvin knew that biblical injunctions could not replace the civil code, but he believed that disciplined people living in a well-regulated state were a social approximation of the Gospel. Under his leadership, Geneva was characterized by a practical utopianism. MARTIN BUCER (1491–1551), an older contemporary of Calvin, used similar ideas in his De regno christi (1557), the first systematic Protestant study of the Kingdom of God.

Early Modern Protestantism

Although Johann Andreae's (1586–1654) Christianopolis (1619), which depicted an ideal society based on biblical materials, was an important exception, Calvin and Luther's understanding of the Kingdom dominated most Continental theology. In contrast, English Protestantism developed another approach to the Kingdom rooted in that country's history. John Wycliff (1330–1384) taught a simple biblicism that became commonplace, and the English people long believed themselves God's New Israel. Further, the English Reformation made England Protestant, then Catholic, then Protestant again. Whatever the archbishop said at the coronation, religious change fatally wounded the belief that the king was the viceregent of God. Each reign created martyrs whose deaths witnessed to God's direct power over conscience. In addition, ENGLAND was Europe's trader, and its ships carried books and ideas as well as cargo. Numerous refugees and foreign scholars taught in its universities.

English interest in the Kingdom and in the millennium developed rapidly after the ascension of ELIZABETH I (1533–1603). Elizabeth was a master of the new media of print, and her court writers depicted her as a new Deborah called to save Protestantism. The queen was blessed by shrewdness and luck. The defeat of the Spanish Armada, for instance, resulted from her careful, secretive building of the Royal Navy, Francis Drake's genius, and a massive storm. Although her ministers harried them, gagged their leaders, and prohibited their gatherings, Elizabeth was unable to silence the Puritans who believed that her church was not sufficiently reformed (see PURITANISM). If anything, persecution whetted their appetite for millenarianism. By 1600, English presses were churning out studies of the Revelation, including Thomas Brightman's Apocalypsis apocalypseos (1609, 1611) and Joseph Mede's Clavis apocalyptica (1627). Bishop James Ussher's (1581–1656) chronology, the Annales veritas et novi testamentum (1650), provided dates valuable to anyone calculating Christ's return.

James I (1566–1625) and Charles I (1600–1649) intensified Elizabeth's anti-Puritan measures. In the 1640s, when open war between Parliament and the Crown erupted, many English people believed that the Kingdom of God was at hand. These popular speculations were particularly strong in OLIVER CROMWELL'S (d. 1658) New Model army where the Fifth Monarchy Men, named after Daniel's prophecy, had a large following. Many Puritan leaders were also millennialists. Cromwell, for example, advocated the readmission of the Jews because he believed that their conversion was a precursor to the Second Coming.

Those Puritans who went to America were fascinated by the Kingdom and the millennium. Both JOHN COTTON (1585–1652) and INCREASE MATHER (1639–1723) studied Revelation carefully, searching for evidence of fulfilled prophecies. The conversion of the heathens, one of the signs, seemed at hand in the Indian missions, and only a few prophecies remained to be fulfilled before the Kingdom arrived. Moving to a new land and establishing their own holy commonwealths reinforced these Puritan hopes.

Although Sir ISAAC NEWTON (1642–1727) spent his later years studying the various millennial prophecies, both English and American millennialism receded after the restoration of Charles II. Soured on enthusiasm by the excesses of the Revolution, JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704) and others identified religion with reason and morality. The appropriate eschatology was a belief in rewards and punishments after death and, perhaps, continuing confidence in England's special place in history.

Some late seventeenth-century interpreters offered a more rational view of the millennial tradition. Hugo Grotius (1583–1645), Daniel Whitby (d. 1726), and Moses Lowman (d. 1752) argued that the biblical description of millennium was symbolic. The spread of the Gospel would usher in an indefinite period of peace, justice, and economic plenty. While the millennium's approach could be charted through the usual prophetic signs, such as the fall of the papal Antichrist, the Kingdom would come through human action, not direct divine intervention. Christ's Second Coming would follow on the millennium.

This "postmillennial" theology supported the Christian activism of eighteenth-century pietists (see PIETISM). In Germany, August Hermann Francke (1663–1727), supported by the Prussian ruling family, launched a major assault on Germany's spiritual ills. Francke sought to reform theological education, making it more biblically centered, established an orphanage, began a girls school, created a bible society, and sent the first Protestant missionaries to India. AngloAmerican evangelicals lacked such rich fiscal resources. Although evangelist GEORGE WHITEFIELD (1714–1770) dreamed of establishing an American HALLE in Georgia, he was unable to raise the needed funds. His friend, theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758), advocated midweek prayer meetings for missions to hasten the millennium, and JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791) was a dynamo of Kingdom righteousness. He warred with alcoholism and slavery, carried out an active ministry to the poor and imprisoned, collected for charity, and, in doing so, managed to create a new denomination.

After Napoleon's fall, post-millennialism entered its classical age. Protestant missionary activity, secured by the Royal Navy and protected by the British Empire, carried Christianity to Asia and to AFRICA. Other Protestants joined the British in this missionary effort. Many American denominations, such as the Baptists and Congregationalists, formed their national denominations to support the cause. MISSIONS to the homeland also flourished. Johann Hinrich Wichern (1808–1881), a German pastor, established the Inner Mission to coordinate a number of Christian initiatives, and the Deaconess movement established the first school for nurses at Kaiserswerth. Traveling evangelists dotted the American west with churches. On the darker side, postmillennial theology contributed to modern NATIONALISM. Each Protestant nation saw itself as essential to the final triumph of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and often confused its own political goals with the divine plan.

Modern Protestantism

By 1800, many thoughtful observers believed that the modern world posed unique theological and ethical issues. Even those who opposed the newer directions of thought—and many did—found that they had to consider the implications of the new science for theology, but the issues were only primarily intellectual. Science, new techniques of manufacturing and communication, and a rising standard of living offered new economic and social possibilities. At the same time, these developments made such ancient evils as war and poverty more terrible.

Philosopher IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804) helped to define the modern period by investigating the limits of rational discourse. Although Kant did not accept religion's truth claims, he believed that religion provided symbols that enabled individuals and communities to live moral lives. In effect, "Christ," "forgiveness," and "atonement," reconciled the demands of moral law and actual human behavior. Kant used the phrase "philosophical chiasm" to refer to his belief that the Kingdom of God symbolized the hope for a world of truth and justice.

Theologian FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), a founder of the University of Berlin, resolved to reconcile the thought of the ENLIGHTENMENT and the Christian faith. To do this, he shifted the theological center from God to the historical Jesus. As Schleiermacher understood Jesus, Jesus had a perfect consciousness of God that others might share through him. In so doing, believers became incorporated into God's Kingdom of Righteousness, which Christ's influence created and sustained.

Schleiermacher wrote just as the historical approach to the New Testament was becoming accepted. FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR (1792–1860) of Tübingen was an early representative of these new studies. His developmental approach to the New Testament stressed the ways in which the earliest churches had reinterpreted faith as the church moved from Palestine to Rome. In Baur's view, much of the New Testament was late in its composition, and he doubted the attributed authorship of many New Testament books. DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS (1808–1874), a follower of G.F.W. HEGEL (1770–1831), carried Baur's argument one step further. According to Strauss, the earliest churches gradually replaced Jesus with a mythological portrait that made Christ a divine man. The meaning of the Kingdom thus varied with the location of a particular passage in this longer development.

Theologian ALBRECHT RITSCHL (1822–1889) used the new historical studies in creating his theology. According to Ritschl, the Kingdom of God was the core of the teachings of the historical Jesus, and, hence, should be the heart of present-day faith. By accepting Jesus's proclamation, Ritschl maintained, believers were placed in a new relationship to God that incorporated them into God's Kingdom. Through acts of love and obedience, the Christian brought the world into a new relationship with God, which in turn further advanced God's reign. After 1880, Ritschl's students occupied the important theological chairs in Germany, and representatives of his position were also found in Anglo-American theological schools.

Ritschl's Kingdom theology appealed to Christian activists who wanted to build a new society. In the United States, for instance, the Baptist WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH (1861–1918) saw the Kingdom as humanity organized according to the will of God.

Others joined him in advocating this SOCIAL GOSPEL, including the founders of the Federal Council of Churches. In Europe, LEONHARD RAGAZ (1868–1945), the translator of Rauschenbusch into German, taught a similar doctrine as did the editors of the influential periodical Christliche Welt.

The intellectual challenge to Ritschlean theology came from the historical study that helped to make it influential. In 1892 Johannes Weiss published Die Predigt Jesus vom Reiche Gottes. The book argued convincingly that Jesus' understanding of the Kingdom of God was typical of Jewish apocalyptic thought. ALBERT SCHWEITZER'S (1875–1965) Quest for the Historical Jesus (1906) built on Weiss's insights and argued that Christ died believing that his death would end history.

World War I and the Depression

While intellectual criticism did not destroy Ritschlian theology, human experience made it difficult to affirm. In 1914 a general European war erupted that was followed by a worldwide depression of epic proportions and yet another world war. In this context, the Ritschlian celebration of the Kingdom seemed naïve and irrelevant to social problems.

When the Great War began, many national leaders identified their country's causes with the Kingdom. The most effusive was Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924), a master of Protestant rhetoric. The Great War, he argued, would end with a just peace and the establishment of a League of Nations that would make future wars impossible. Unprecedented carnage, shameless war profiteering, and a draconian peace exposed the hollowness of Wilson's words. In SWITZERLAND, a young Protestant pastor, KARL BARTH (1886–1968), published The Epistle to the Romans (1919), a commentary that stressed the discontinuity between God and human activity. Barth's new direction in theology quickly caught the attention of younger European theologians, including FRIEDRICH GOGARTEN (1887–1968), EMIL BRUNNER (1889–1966) and RUDOLF BULTMANN (1884–1976).

Many turned to the existential philosophy of SØREN KIERKEGAARD (1813–1855), FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE (1844–1900) and Martin Heidegger (1889–1976) to address the post-World War I world. Existentialism was a philosophic stance or orientation that made few objective truth claims. Instead, existentialists recognized that science had made traditional metaphysics unbelievable. Knowledgeable people, after all, knew that atoms, not some ethereal substance, constituted reality, but the existentialists did not want to relinquish metaphysical language altogether because philosophy illuminated the deeper problems of human experience. Many theologians saw traditional Christian doctrine in the same way. Although few believed these teachings literally, they provided a fruitful way to understand human life. Rudolf Bultmann's (1884–1976) essay, "The New Testament and Mythology," suggested that contemporaries might best understand Jesus's eschatological Kingdom as a radical call to decision or commitment.

In Germany the defeat in World War I led to social disillusionment. The 1920 political struggles pitted different secular millenniums against each other. National Socialism, for example, promised to construct a new one-thousand-year Reich on the basis of racial purity. This millennium would come after a titanic struggle between good and evil. The Communists, flush from their victory in Russia, pressed for an ideal workers' state that might restore prosperity and dignity. The German churches, which lost many legal and constitutional privileges after the war, had difficulty addressing these conflicts. However, the new eschatology enabled some church leaders, especially in the CONFESSING CHURCH, to protest against any identification of the secular and divine order (see GERMAN CHRISTIANS). The Kingdom was as powerful in its absence as in its presence.

The world war accelerated the UNITED STATES' loss of innocence. The Social Gospel movement declined. In its place, such American theologians as REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) and H.RICHARD NIEBUHR (1894–1962) proposed a realist theology that stressed sin and ambiguity as part of life. American realism, however, was not European neo-orthodoxy, although it drew on similar sources. Much of the older Social Gospel interest in direct Christian action continued, even as the Kingdom language was critiqued.

Theologian H.Richard Niebuhr summarized the American theological tradition in his Kingdom of God in America (1937). Niebuhr described American Protestant thinking as moving from a Kingdom that was dependent on sovereignty (the Puritans) through a Kingdom within individuals and movements (EVANGELICALISM) to a more social Kingdom (the Social Gospel). Ever the careful dialectician, Niebuhr refused to privilege any of these positions. Jonathan Edwards (1703–1758) and Walter Rauschenbusch were both part of the American dialogue.

During the 1920s American Protestant conservatives lost the Modernist-Fundamentalist controversy, and many withdrew from their churches to establish their own institutions. Many advocated premillennial DISPENSATIONALISM, an interpretation of prophecy that had been popular in the nineteenth century. Dispensationalism began with the British millenarian, JOHN NELSON DARBY (1800–1882), whose teachings were modified in American prophecy courses, Bible study programs, and Bible schools. To stabilize this theology, Cyrus Scofield (1843–1921) asked a committee to help him edit the SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE. Reading Jesus' teachings about the Kingdom in a literal way, Scofield concluded that Jesus believed that the Kingdom would follow shortly after his resurrection. Instead, God inserted a great parenthesis into prophetic history that would end with the Rapture. After Jesus appeared to take his people home, the fulfillment of prophecy would resume and, after a great tribulation, the saints would reign with Christ in the millennium. The Kingdom was, like a Christian America, a hope radically deferred.

Late Modernity

Not surprisingly, the nuclear age has been a period of intense interest in eschatology. In Germany the two most influential postwar theologians were WOLFHART PANNENBERG(1928–) and JÜRGEN MOLTMANN (1926–), who published influential studies of the Kingdom in the 1970s. Although both began with an eschatological understanding of Jesus' teachings, they diverged at significant points. In the Theology and the Kingdom of God (1969), Pannenberg stressed the intertwining of the present and future Kingdom of God. Thus, the coming Kingdom effects the present, which already contains the future. In contrast Moltmann, in the Trinity and the Kingdom (1980), saw the Kingdom as the work of the Trinity, which keeps the world's future open for the future Kingdom of glory.

In the United States, MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. (1929–1968), an African American civil rights leader, made important contributions to the discussion of the Kingdom of God. A complex thinker, King combined elements of American religious liberalism, African American religion, and his Baptist tradition. In addition, King believed that Gandhi's nonviolence was the way for an oppressed people to confront their opponents. King assumed leadership of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT during the Montgomery Bus Boycott (1955), and his theology was contained in the documents that he prepared for that public task. His 1963 speech at the Washington monument, "I Have a Dream," summed up his vision of the coming Kingdom.

The theology of liberation was a theological response to the grinding poverty of the Third World (see LIBERATION THEOLOGY). Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutierrez's (1928–) Teología de la liberación (1971) was an attempt to bring together insights from Marxism, particularly as expressed through such thinkers as Ernst Bloch (1885–1977), the concrete situation in Latin America, and the need for political action. To further their understanding of the Kingdom, liberation theologians established comunidades eclesiales de base or base communities. These small lay-led communities provided a place for ordinary people to develop their religious and political concerns.

Among Roman Catholics, liberation theology has become less influential. In 1985, Brazilian theologian Leonardo Boff (1938–) was summoned to Rome to explain his Igreja: Carisma e poder (1981). Boff was silenced and the pope's new appointments in Latin America were conservative. In North America, however, liberation theology sparked the development of a number of theologies concerned with human rights, including feminist and gay theology (see FEMINIST THEOLOGY; HOMOSEXUALITY). These new theologies began with the particular group's religious and theological insights as sources of action and reflection. Feminist theologians, although generally supportive of the broader liberation emphasis on the Kingdom, have critiqued that language as gender specific. In their place, they have suggested substitutes, such as the Dominion of God.

Popular religion, particularly in the United States, also saw an expanding interest in apocalyptic theologies. Unlike earlier dispensationalists, such authors as Hal Lindsey, who wrote The Late Great Planet Earth (1970), pointed to contemporary events, including the threat of nuclear war, as signs that God was about to act.

Despite its popularity, many conservative theologians questioned dispensationalism. Fuller Seminary's George Elton Ladd, for instance, published a series of thoughtful conservative works, beginning with his Blessed Hope (1956), that questioned the doctrine's biblical basis. His colleague, Daniel Fuller, criticized the teaching from a more systematic perspective. Despite extensive controversy in the Evangelical Theological Society, Fuller Seminary and other evangelical schools rejected dispensationalism as an institutional norm, although those faculties continued to include some advocates. At Dallas Theological Seminary, long the dispensational flagship, a younger generation of scholars moved toward a “progressive dispensationalism” that removed many of the harsher elements of the traditional system.

Present

The collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of the Cold War has apparently coincided with the beginnings of another period in theology. Throughout the 1990s, both theology and popular faith moved away from the apocalyptic and social concerns of the late modern period. In their place there is a new interest in the personal apprehension of religion. Interest in mysticism, eastern religions, and nontraditional spiritual disciplines is common. There is increasing concern with how people will manage, not social deprivation, but the considerable economic blessings of current Western and American life. Perhaps this theology will allow the Kingdom to lie fallow for a season until a new band of prophets summons it again to deal with the perpetual crises of society.

References and Further Reading

- Frostin, Per. Luther's Two Kingdom Doctrine: A Critical Study. Lund, Sweden: Lund University Press, 1994.
- Glasson, T.F. Jesus and the End of the World. Edinburgh: St Andrew Press, 1980.
- Humphries, Michael L. Christian Origins and the Language of the Kingdom of God. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, c. 1999.
- Kwon, Hyuk Seung. The Zion Traditions and the Kingdom of God: A Study on the Zion Traditions as Relevant to the Understanding of the Concept of the Kingdom of God in the New Testament. Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1998.
- Moltmann, Jürgen. Trinity and the Kingdom of God, Translated by Margaret Kohl. New York: Harper & Row, c. 1981.
- Niebuhr, H.Richard. The Kingdom of God in America, Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1988.
- Oort, Johannes van. Jerusalem and Babylon: A Study into Augustine's City of God and the Sources of His Doctrine of the Two Cities. Leiden, New York: E.J.Brill, 1991.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart. Theologie und Reich Gottes. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus G.Mohn, c. 1971.
- Perrin, Norman, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus. London: SCM Press, 1963.
- Ragaz, Leonhard, Signs of the Kingdom: A Ragaz Reader. Edited and translated by Paul Bock. Grand Rapids, MI Eerdmans 1984.
- Schweitzer, Albert. The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede. New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Weber, Timothy, Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming: American Premillennialism, 1875–1982. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Weiss, Johannes. Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God. Translated by Richard Hyde Hiers and David Larrimore Holland. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1971.

GLENN T.MILLER

KINGSLEY, CHARLES (1819–1875)

Anglican clergyman, Christian Socialist, and Victorian novelist. Son of a Devonshire vicar, Kingsley studied at King's College, London, and Magdalene College, Cambridge. While a student at Cambridge, Kingsley struggled with his own Christian beliefs and read SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, F.D. MAURICE, and others. He was not, however, a disciplined student, and he immersed himself in college sports. He graduated and was ordained to the priesthood in 1842, eventually obtaining appointment to a living at Eversley, Hants.

His reaction to the emergent OXFORD MOVEMENT was sharply negative; he dismissed ASCETICISM of any sort and was no admirer of the medieval church. A critical aside about JOHN HENRY NEWMAN led to the latter's Apologia Pro Vita Sua. Kingsley became a keen follower of Maurice and called for the church to address the needs of the poorer classes. Indeed, he became a leader of the Christian Socialist Movement for which he was often the target of harsh criticism. Kingsley tended, in fact, to be apolitical, seeking to improve the lot of the disadvantaged through education and cooperative reforms. Kingsley was not a systematic thinker but is considered one of the early leaders of the liberal BROAD CHURCH Movement within ANGLICANISM.

He was also a prolific poet and novelist, his most notable novels being Yeast (1850), Westward Ho! (1855), and the children's book, The Water-Babies (1863). By the time of his death, he had gained a degree of acceptance in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, serving as canon of Chester (1869–1873) and Westminster (1873–1875) and as one of Queen Victoria's chaplains in ordinary (appointed 1859).

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Kingsley, Charles. The Works of Charles Kingsley. 28 vols. London: Macmillan, 1880–1888.

Kingsley, Mrs. Charles. Charles Kingsley: His Letters and Memories of His Life. 2 vols. London: Henry S. King, 1877.

Secondary Sources:

Chitty, Susan. The Beast and the Monk. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1974.

Martin, Robert B. The Dust of Combat: A Life of Charles Kingsley. London: Faber & Faber, 1959.

GILLIS J.HARP

KINGSLEY, MARY (1862–1900)

English missionary theorist. As a champion of West African CULTURE in the late nineteenth century, Mary Kingsley's contribution to the missionary project in that area is best known for her antipathy toward and criticism of the MISSIONS. Born October 13, 1862, in Islington, London, Kingsley died in SOUTH AFRICA on June 3, 1900, while nursing Boer prisoners. Her uncle was the famous CHARLES KINGSLEY, Christian Socialist and novelist. After the death of her parents Mary Kingsley went on two extended journeys to what are now Angola, Cameroon, Gabon, NIGERIA, and SIERRA LEONE. These journeys lasted respectively from August to December 1893, and December 1894 to November 1895.

Kingsley's travels resulted in three books: Travels in West Africa (1897), an ethnographical work; West African Studies (1899); and The Story of West Africa (1900), a historical overview of the area. However, it is Kingsley's first publication, "The Negro Future," a letter to the Spectator in 1895, that announced her sympathy for the West Africans and her hostility toward the missions. In this letter Kingsley refuted beliefs that the Africans were drunken idiots—a portrait she claimed was perpetrated by Protestant missionaries. In "The Development of Dodos," published in National Review in March 1896, she asserted that Protestant missionaries failed in West Africa because they tended to regard the African minds as so many jugs to be emptied only to be refilled with Protestant DOCTRINE.

Although Kingsley was opposed to Protestant missions, by which she meant Anglican, she made friends with French and American missionaries in Gabon and became an admirer of MARY SLESSOR, the Scottish Presbyterian who established a mission in the Okoyong region in Nigeria. Kingsley's attitude toward mission culture was unusual for a woman brought up very much with Victorian values, and certainly accounts partially for the originality in her writing.

See also Anglicanism; Christian; Colonialism; Missionary Organizations; Presbyterianism; Socialism

References and Further Reading

- Birkett, Dea. Mary Kingsley: Imperial Adventuress. Basingstoke, UK: Macmillan, 1992.
- Brown, Don. Uncommon Traveler: Mary Kingsley in Africa. Boston: Houghton-Mifflin, 2000.
- Frank, Katherine. A Voyager Out: The Life of Mary Kingsley. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986.
- Gikandi, Simon. Maps of Englishness: Writing Identity in the Culture of Colonialism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1996.
- Howard, Cecil. Mary Kingsley. London: Hutchinson, 1957.
- Lindquist, Suen. The Skull Measurer's Mistake: And Other Portraits of Men and Women Who Spoke Out Against Racism. New York: New Press, distributed by W.W.Norton, 1997.

MARIA NOËLLE NG

KIRCHENTAG

German Protestantism knows of three different movements that are called Kirchentage. Between 1848 and 1872 church notables met once a year to discuss questions of church policy or theological problems. In the Weimar Republic the Kirchentag was the highest official committee of the Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund, which united the individual regional churches in a loose federation. Since 1949 the church conferences are lay meetings and a large public manifestation of Protestantism in Germany.

In view of the revolution of 1848, which threatened the traditional position of the churches and against the background of long-standing issues, the first Kirchentag took place in September 1848 in Wittenberg. The aim was to achieve a closer union of the individual regional churches and the splintered Protestantism. As a renewal and unification movement, it integrated large parts of Protestantism with the exception of the confessional Lutherans and die-hard liberals. However, the Kirchentage could not achieve its aims, and after the Reichsgründung (founding of the German Empire) in 1871 the movement came to an end.

Nonetheless, as a result of some sixteen conferences, important impulses for theological discussion and for the movement of church constitutions went out. The Kirchentage are connected with what is called Inner Mission, that is, evangelism and social work and their yearly meetings. The speech of Johann Heinrich Wichern at the Kirchentag in Wittenberg 1848 stands as the beginning of this charitable movement.

With the end of the landesherrlichen Kirchenregiment (territorial church government) and the beginning of the politics of separation of CHURCH AND STATE, the churches were forced to reorganize their constitutions. The first Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchentag in Dresden in September 1919 initiated the process of reconstruction. The Kirchentag became an official institution of the Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund, which was founded in 1921. Three times (1924, 1927, 1930) the church parliament met. Each time a special topic was the central point of the meetings: 1924 in Bethel (Bielefeld) the social question (soziale Frage), 1927 in Königsberg the patriotic or national question (völkische Erage), 1930 in Augsburg the denominational question. The adopted statements and the discussions can be regarded as important manifestations of Protestantism in the Weimar Republic.

In 1949 Reinold von Thadden-Trieglaff organized the Deutsche Evangelische Woche in Hannover, which originated the Kirchentags movement. In spite of the strong resistance of leading persons of the church in the beginning, the Kirchentag developed into a public forum where religious, theological, social, and political challenges of the present could be broadly discussed. The topics, such as the relationship to DEMOCRACY, the problem of WAR and peace, the ecological movement, and Jewish-Christian dialogue, determined German Protestantism and were themes of the meetings.

These lay meetings, taking place every two years, became a sign of German Protestantism during the postwar period. Until 1961, the year of the building of the Berlin wall, the meetings were focused on the Cold War problem and German separation. Up to 650,000 persons have participated in the meetings. After a crisis in the 1960s the Kirchentage are today a fixed component of public life, in which young people in particular look for religious experiences and social challenges.

References and Further Reading

- Kreft, Werner. Die Kirchentage von 1848–1872. Frankfurt/ Main: Peter Lang Publishing, 1994.
- Nowak, Kurt. Evangelische Kirche und Weimarer Republik. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981.
- Rogge, Joachim. "Kirchentage und Eisenacher Konferenz." In Die Geschichte der Evangelischen Kirche der Union, edited by Joachim Rogge and Gerhard Ruhbach, vol. 2, 42–55. Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1994.
- Schröter, Harald. Kirchentag als vorläufige Kirche. Der Kirchentag als besondere Gestalt des Christseins zwischen Kirche und Welt. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1993.
- Steinacker, Peter. "Kirchentage." In Theologische Realenzyklopädie, edited by Gerhard Müller, vol. 19, 101–110. Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1990.
- Wright, Jonathan R.C. "Above Parties": The Political Attitudes of the German Protestant Church Leadership 1918–1933. London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

NORBERT FRIEDRICH

KNOX, JOHN (C.1514–1572)

Scottish reformer. Born around 1514 in Haddington, near Edinburgh, Scotland, John Knox was probably educated at St. Andrews University before being ordained a Catholic priest in 1536. The date and circumstances of his CONVERSION are unknown, but by 1544 he was associated with George Wishart, whose Protestant ministry in SCOTLAND led David Cardinal Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrews, to have him burned as a heretic in March 1546. Two months later Beaton was himself assassinated, and his murderers were besieged in the Episcopal castle at St. Andrews. There Knox joined them, and, in April 1547, he was persuaded that his vocation lay as a Protestant preacher. His ministry, however, had inauspicious beginnings, for in July 1547 St. Andrews' castle fell to the French, and Knox spent the next nineteen months as a French galley slave.

Released from captivity in March 1549, Knox settled in Edward VI's ENGLAND. It was there that he established his reputation as a leading light of the radical wing of the English church. His dogmatic biblicism, focused initially on the idolatry of the Catholic Mass, led him to oppose the stance of the moderate leadership of the Protestant establishment in England over kneeling at communion. This rift was to become more pronounced after the accession of Catholic Mary Tudor in 1553 and the flight of English Protestants to the Continent. Appointed minister of the English congregation at Frankfurt in 1554, Knox's hard-line stance on liturgical issues caused such bitter disputes that in 1555 he was forced to take refuge in Geneva.

Although Knox found his stay in Geneva a formative experience, it was initially short-lived, for in the winter of 1555–1556 he returned secretly to the north of England and from there embarked on a clandestine PREACHING tour of Scotland. Thereafter, his close identification with the English church and people was diluted by a reawakened concern for the fate of Scottish Protestants. His early writings from exile were addressed exclusively to his former English congregations, but by 1558, notably in his notorious First Blast of the Trumpet Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, his vision was self-consciously British. Hence, when on the accession of ELIZABETH I in 1558 Knox was prevented from returning to England, his disappointment was allayed by the opportunity to effect radical reform in his native land.

On Knox's return to Scotland in May 1559, his iconoclastic preaching triggered a Protestant rebellion against the Catholic French regent, Mary of Guise, whose daughter Mary Queen of Scots had married the French dauphin in April 1558. While the rebellion was poorly supported, a Protestant settlement was eventually secured in 1560 through the intervention of England. However, plans for closer union between the Protestant British kingdoms were dashed by the decision of the Catholic Mary Stuart to return to Scotland in August 1561. Knox's fury with the Protestant nobles who acquiesced in Mary's return, and who defended her right to practice Catholicism privately, proved fruitless. Knox was politically marginalized, and, although he railed against the queen's Mass from the pulpit, he played little role in the events that led to Mary's overthrow in 1567. While he preached at the coronation of the infant James VI in July 1567, and supported the anti-Marian party in the civil war that followed Mary's escape from captivity in 1568, age and ill health increasingly curtailed his activities. He died in Edinburgh on November 24, 1572.

Knox was not a systematic thinker and left no body of theological work. Although he helped shape the defining documents of the Scottish Reformation—the reformed Confession of Faith and the First Book of Discipline—most of his surviving writings are polemical tracts written in response to specific circumstances. Effectively sermons, distinguished by their pungent and often prophetic rhetoric, they display Knox's close identification with the Old Testament prophets on whom he modeled his public persona. This is particularly apparent during the period of the Marian exile, when Knox wrestled with the problem of finding scriptural AUTHORITY for resistance to Catholic tyranny. For all their prophetic fury, however, Knox's writings are less politically radical than is often assumed. While the First Blast was a sweeping indictment of female governance, his other key tracts of 1558—the Appellation and the Letter to the Commonalty—fall some way short of the revolutionary populism subsequently ascribed to them. Yet Knox did develop the remarkably powerful and enduring idea that, like Old Testament Israel, the peoples of Scotland and England were bound by a COVENANT with God to promote and defend the “true religion.”

It was fear and despair in the face of a broken covenant that both fuelled the abusive language of the 1558 tracts and shaped what was to be Knox's most lasting memorial, the History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland. The History began life as a record of the events of the Scottish Reformation of 1559–1560, but in the course of Mary Queen of Scots' short reign evolved into an extended sermon on Scotland's covenanted status and the folly of breaching God's law by tolerating a Catholic sovereign. Brilliantly written, and inevitably highlighting Knox's own role in contemporary events, the History is an invaluable source for historians of the Scottish Reformation. Above all, however, it provides unique insights into the mind of a self-styled instrument of God whose influence on the course of the British Reformation was profound and long lasting.

See also Calvinism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Knox, John. The Works of John Knox. Edited by David Laing. 6 vols. Edinburgh: Wodrow Society, 1846–1864.

———. John Knox's History of the Reformation in Scotland. Edited by W.C. Dickinson. 2 vols. London: Thomas Nelson and Sons, 1949.

———. On Rebellion. Edited by Roger A.Mason. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

Secondary Sources:

Kyle, Richard G. The Mind of John Knox. Lawrence, KS: Coronado Press, 1984.

Mason, Roger A., ed. John Knox and the British Reformations. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate Publishing, 1998.

Ridley, Jasper. John Knox. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1968.

ROGER A.MASON

KOELLE, SIGISMUND WILHELM (1823–1902)

Missionary linguist. Koelle was born in Kleebron, Württemberg, Germany, on July 14, 1823. He was one of many young Würtemberger Pietists recruited by the (Anglican) CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) through the Basel Mission Seminary. After study there he entered the CMS College at Islington in 1845 and was ordained DEACON in 1846 and priest in 1847. Having displayed exceptional academic gifts, he was sent to Tübingen to study Semitic languages under J.H.A.Ewald.

Developments in West Africa were opening the possibility of reaching the peoples of the interior, but this was conceivable only with the large-scale involvement of African missionaries, who must therefore be trained and equipped. SIERRA LEONE was the most eligible source of potential African missionaries, and its Fourah Bay Institution was the obvious place to concentrate their training. Koelle was accordingly appointed to the institution in 1847 to teach Hebrew and Arabic (the latter in expectation of encounters with Muslim peoples). He worked there until 1853 and, with the encouragement of the CMS Secretary Henry Venn, laid the foundations of comparative African linguistics. He identified well over a hundred languages, belonging to a vast area of West and Central Africa, that were still being spoken in Sierra Leone, and in his massive Polyglotta Africana produced materials for their analysis and comparison, as well as revealing something of their richness. He also produced substantial grammars of two of them, Vai (Liberia) and Kanuri (northeast Nigeria).

In 1853 Koelle returned to Britain to see his works through the press, and married Charlotte Elizabeth Philpot, daughter of a prominent clergyman. In impaired health, instead of returning to West Africa, he served briefly in Cairo, and then, from 1856 to 1859, in Haifa, employing his Arabic, and developing a learned but confrontational approach to Islam. In 1862 he was appointed to Constantinople, where K.G. Pfander (1803–1865), the best-known contemporary Christian apologist to Islam, was already stationed. Here Koelle turned his attention to Turkish and other Turkic languages, producing a large amount of material, much of it never published, both original and translated. Left as the sole missionary, heavily circumscribed by the authorities, he saw minimal response in terms of converts. In 1877 the CMS, in a financial crisis, closed the unviable mission and retired Koelle. However, he refused to leave Constantinople and worked independently on a Turkish translation of the Anglican prayer book. In 1879 he and a Muslim scholar, Ahmed Tewfik, who was assisting him were the center of a diplomatic incident, where the British government made a robust response to their arrest. Koelle had to leave; Tewfik was banished, escaped, went to ENGLAND, and was eventually baptized there, the prelude to an extraordinary career. Koelle retired to England and continued to write, including the erudite but highly polemical Mohammed and Mohammedanism (1889). He died February 18, 1902, in London.

Koelle, prodigiously learned, angular, and somewhat eccentric, remains a pivotal figure in African linguistics, which he always saw in terms of its relevance to the spread of the gospel. The Polyglotta Africana and the Vai and Kanuri grammars all appeared in new editions in the 1960s. Earlier they brought Koelle an honorary doctorate from Tübingen and the Volney Prize of the Institut de France. The same missionary dedication marks his later, less illustrious work on Turkish, Turkic languages, and Islam, and his theological and devotional volumes.

See also Africa; Basel Mission; Missions; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Koelle, S.W. Polyglotta Africana. 2d edition, with biographical introduction by P.E.H.Hair and linguistic commentary by David Dalby. Graz, Austria: Akademische Druck und Verlagsanstalt, 1963.

Secondary Sources:

Church Missionary Society Register of Missionaries. London: CMS, 1904.

Stock, Eugene. History of the Church Missionary Society. vols. 2 and 3. London: CMS, 1899.

ANDREW F.WALLS

KOREA

Introduction

Protestantism in Korea, which largely descends from North American Methodist and Presbyterian MISSIONS of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, has been typified since its inception by four characteristics: initial self-evangelism, an association with Korean nationalism and concepts of progress, a strong theological conservatism and pietism coupled with social involvement, and rapid and significant increases in membership. In spite of the presence of denominations, there is such general uniformity in Protestant practice and the structure of the denominations that a uniquely Korean Protestantism may be said to have emerged in which METHODISM and PRESBYTERIANISM have mutually influenced each other. Without question this Korean Protestantism was the most dynamic religious force in twentieth-century Korean society, having a significant impact on the development and growth of Roman Catholicism, Buddhism, and new religious movements in Korea. Its development has also been shaped in key respects by the core values of Korean society and CULTURE. Korea under the Chosun dynasty (1392–1910) became the most thoroughly Confucianized society of East Asia. Concepts and core values such as filial piety, loyalty, an emphasis on EDUCATION, concepts of AUTHORITY and social hierarchy, and the application of moral values in society and government have all come to shape the life and practical theology of the Korean Protestant community.

The Advent of Protestantism: 1882–1910

From the middle of the nineteenth century, there had been several missionary probes to the “Hermit Kingdom” of Chosun, which like JAPAN had closed itself to significant outside contact from the late seventeenth century. Early missionary explorations were conducted by the Dutchman Karl Friederich August Gützlaff (1803–1851), who explored the Manchurian and Korean west coasts in 1832, by the Welshman Robert Jermain Thomas (1839–1866), who was aboard the American trading vessel the General Sherman in September 1866 when it ventured up the Taedong River to P'yŏngyang, and the Scotsman Alexander Williamson (1929–1890), who visited the customs barrier between Manchuria and Korea in 1867. None of these attempts had any long-lasting impact on the religious scene in Korea.

The first Protestant missionary who had an impact on Korea was John Ross (1842–1915) of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland mission to Manchuria who, with a group of Korean merchants in Manchuria acting as a team of translators, made the first translation of the New Testament into Korean. In 1882 the first portions of this translation were printed and circulated. The entire New Testament was translated, bound, and distributed as a single volume in 1887. The Ross Translation introduced key theological terms that are still in use, such as Hananim (Ruler of Heaven) for God, and—because it used exclusively the Korean alphabet Han' gŭl—was a significant factor in the revival and widespread use of this script.

Koreans who had been converted to Christianity through reading Ross's translation were responsible for the establishment of Christian communities in northwestern Korea, in the capital, and in the communities along the northern bank of the Yalu River, which was nominally Korean territory at that time. The existence of these communities before the arrival of the first foreign missionaries in 1884 and 1885 is an eloquent testimonial to Ross's conviction that Christianity was spread best by convinced converts rather than by foreign missionaries. Korean Protestantism was self-evangelized from the beginning—EVANGELISM through the distribution of Scripture.

From the mid-1880s foreign missionaries began to arrive, including Horace N. Allen (1858–1932) of the Northern Presbyterian Church in 1884, Horace G. Underwood (1859–1916) of the same mission, and Henry G. Appenzeller (1858–1902) of the Northern Methodist mission in 1885, followed almost immediately by several other missionaries. By the end of the ninth decade of the nineteenth century, a foreign mission enterprise was well under way, building on the foundations that had been laid by Ross's converts. By the end of the 1880s several of modern Korea's major institutions had already been established, such as three Western-style medical institutions including Severance Hospital and Ehwa Woman's University Hospital, and leading schools such as Paejae Boys' High School, and Ewha Girls' High School. At the same time the Religious Tract Society for the distribution of Scriptures and religious materials was created as the Tri-Lingual Press, the first Western-style publishing house (see PUBLISHING MEDIA).

The 1890s saw continual growth in the numbers of converts and the creation of Christian literature, including dictionaries, manuals of the Korean language, and translations of devotional works, such as JOHN BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. At the same time the question of how to create independent church institutions was also widely debated. In 1890 John L. Nevius (1829–1893), a Presbyterian missionary in Shantung, China, was invited to come to Korea to explain to the missionaries there his mission methods (now called the Nevius Method) for creating a self-propagating, self-governing, and self-supporting church, which became the universally accepted policy of Protestant missions in Korea. By the beginning of the twentieth century the prospects for Korean Protestantism seemed bright.

The rise of Protestantism in Korea must be set against the drama of the decline in political and economic power of the Chosŭn dynasty, the search by progressive young intellectuals for a way to revitalize their nation, and growing Japanese imperial encroachment on the Asian continent. Young, nationalist Christians saw in the model of institutional mission work—particularly education and the creation of schools—a way to restore Korea to its rightful place on the world stage. Today many Korean schools claim a Christian, but not a mission, foundation because of the efforts of these Christians during the first decade of the twentieth century. The success of the Protestant churches in the twenty-five years after the arrival of foreign missionaries was attributed to the association of Christianity with the “progressive” West, and the emphasis that the first generation of missionaries placed on the responsibility of local Christians for the growth and support of their churches. Kenneth Wells in New God, New Nation: Protestants and Self-reconstruction Nationalism in Korea stresses the importance of the mixture of religious faith and nationalism at a time when the nation was facing a political crisis.

The numerical growth in the churches’ membership in the decade before the annexation of Korea by the Japanese Empire in 1910, is often attributed to the Great Revival of 1907 in P’yŏngyang, the effect of which quickly spread throughout the peninsula, and into both the Korean and Chinese communities in Manchuria. Although the event has to be seen against the background of the political uncertainties of the time, it cannot be gainsaid that this revival, which combined a concern for personal purity and potential national demise, unleashed a great spiritual energy among Koreans for the evangelization of the nation. At the time of the annexation in 1910, 1 percent of the population adhered to Protestantism. The Japanese Protestant Church today, which is at least a generation older than the Korean church, has yet to equal this achievement.

By 1910 the institutional church was well established—the first SEMINARIES had been founded, the first seminarians had graduated, and the first Korean ministers had been ordained. In 1908 all Protestant missionaries, except the High Church Anglicans, had accepted a comity agreement that divided the peninsula into mission spheres, which would avoid unnecessary competition by authorizing the presence of only one DENOMINATION in a particular region. A vote taken among the missionaries at the same time to create a United Church of Christ in Korea was rejected by the home churches in North America. Nonetheless the comity agreement, the use of a single translation of the BIBLE, a common hymnal, and other pan-denominational activities have helped to create a sense of a common Protestant Christianity in spite of the contemporary presence of many denominations.

Colonial Subjugation: Korea under Japanese Rule, 1910–1945

Throughout the colonial era there was continual growth in membership, and the extension of social and political engagement. In 1914, in the first decade of Japanese rule, there were 196,000 Korean adherents representing 1.1 percent of the population. By the end of Japanese rule in 1945, Protestant adherence had quadrupled to 740,000 persons, representing over 3 percent of the population. This numerical growth was paralleled by involvement in Korean society, the extent of which may be symbolized by four political events: (1) the Conspiracy Trial of 1912; (2) conflict over “patriotic” schools; (3) involvement in the March First Movement of 1919; and (4) the Shintō Shrine Controversy.

In 1912, 124 persons were accused of attempting to assassinate the governor-general, Terauchi Masatake (1852–1919), of whom ninety-eight were Christians, a sign that the colonial regime perceived Christians to be a section of the population that represented an organized challenge to their domination of Korea. In the end, the cases against all but six of the alleged conspirators were thrown out for lack of evidence. This trial, more than any other event, had the effect of creating a link in the popular imagination between Korean nationalism and Christianity. In Korea, imperialism was Japanese, not Western.

Korean Christians and Christian missions continued to found schools throughout Korea during the second decade of the twentieth century. To secondary-level institutions, the mission bodies added tertiary-level institutions such as Sungsil College (Union Christian College, 1905) in P’yŏngyang, and Ewha Woman’s College (1910), and Yŏnhŭi College (Chosen Christian College, 1915) in Seoul, forming a complete nonstate educational system. Conflict between the Protestant community and the colonial government became acute when the Government-General announced in 1915 that all private schools would be required to use Japanese as the national language, and also that they would be forbidden to provide religious instruction or conduct religious worship. These edicts caused great consternation among both the mission community and the Korean Christian community, and for the latter became one of the principal reasons for their involvement in the Korean Independence Movement in 1919.

The March First Movement, which effectively created the sense of modern Korean nationhood, was largely the work of Korean religious leaders. Thirty-three persons signed the Declaration of Independence from Japan, of whom fifteen signatories were Christians. The principal Christian influence they had on the character of the movement came from their insistence on nonviolent behavior during the demonstration. The Japanese colonial regime harshly suppressed the movement, in which thousands were killed and injured. Christians in particular were persecuted. Churches were burned down by Japanese troops, many Christians were executed, and in one spectacular incident villagers were herded into a local church that was then set alight. In spite of a Japanese news blackout, the suppression of the movement became known because a few missionaries went to CHINA and cabled their mission boards at home, which in turn lobbied Western governments to condemn Japanese brutality. Christian involvement in the organization of the movement, Christian suffering in the suppression of the movement, and foreign Christian condemnation of Japanese brutality strengthened the link made between Protestant Christianity and Korean nationalism in the minds of both Koreans and Japanese.

Two strands of Protestant Christianity emerged in the aftermath of the suppression of the March First Movement—a more theologically liberal and socially active strand, and a more theologically conservative strand concerned largely with “church” affairs. This split took root during the 1920s at a time when the Government-General took a more culturally (but not politically) permissive attitude toward its Korean subjects. Great numerical gains in church membership were made with the theologically more conservative strand coming to dominate the churches. However, during this same period, the government of Japan itself came to be dominated by xenophobic groups supporting a Shintō-based nationalism that required the participation of all of the nation's citizenry in rites conducted at State Shintō shrines.

The erection in 1925 of the principal Shintō shrine for Korea, the Chosen Jingu, set the stage for a conflict with the church that was to last for twenty years and had ramifications far after independence from Japan had been achieved. Although attendance at Shintō rituals was said to be a "patriotic" rather than a "religious" act, Korean Christians saw participation in them to be both idolatrous and offensive to their own sense of nationality. After 1930 Japanese rule became increasingly harsh as the colonial regime tried to create a forced conformity with Japanese practices. Korean Christian resistance to shrine worship led the colonial regime to take increasingly harsh measures against the churches. In 1938 the colonial regime used force to make the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, the General Conference of the Methodist Church, and other Christian bodies pass resolutions stating that shrine worship did not contravene Christian faith. Between 1938 and 1945 about 2,000 Protestants were arrested for noncompliance in shrine worship, of whom at least fifty people died as a result of their incarceration and torture. Missionaries were deported for their refusal to support the shrine edicts. The Presbyterian missions closed their schools rather than permit their students to attend shrine rituals. Methodists, on the other hand, turned their schools over to Korean control, which often meant compliance with government regulations.

The Government-General attempted to "Japanize" the denominations by merging them with their Japanese equivalent denominations, and by controlling the content of WORSHIP. In the dying days of the colonial regime in 1945, all Protestant churches were merged into a single institution that was a branch of the Japanese Protestant church, the Kyotan. The Government-General forbade the reading of the Old Testament or the Revelation of St. John the Divine in the New Testament because of the prophetic revelation in these books of God's condemnation of the powers of this world. Churches were closed, their property sold off, and on one occasion a church was made into a Shintō shrine. These actions demonstrated both the fear and scorn with which the authorities held the Christian churches, and further confirmed the link between Korean nationalism and Christianity. Although the Shintō Shrine controversy demonstrated the tenacity of Korean Christians in the face of political oppression, their movement was principally religious and not political.

Divided Nation/Industrial Nation: Korea after Liberation, 1945–

After liberation from Japanese rule at the conclusion of the Pacific War in August 1945, the Protestant churches faced three problems: (1) the different policies regarding religion in the American and Soviet zones of occupation; (2) questions of complicity with Japanese rule by church leaders; and (3) the legacy of the Japanese-imposed church union. In northern Korea, the Soviet zone of influence, Christians formed political parties including the Kidokkyo sahoe minjudang (Christian Social Democratic Party) and the Kidokkyo chayu-dang (Christian Liberal Party), which were soon suppressed. Conflict arose in 1946 when Christian leaders wanted to commemorate the uprising of March 1, 1919, which was seen by the regime as bourgeois. There was yet another early clash of Christians with the Communist authorities over the holding of elections for a People's Assembly on a Sunday, which ran counter to the strong Sabbatarian views of many Christians.

Control or suppression of the Christian community in the north was important not only because Christians represented a separate voice on social and political matters, but also because of the size of the Christian community. In the late 1940s the center of Christianity in Korea was in the north, not the south, an irony of history considering the current size of the Christian Church in South Korea. Objections made by the Joint Presbytery of the still-unified Protestant church were countered by the authorities with the formation of the Kidokkyo kyodo yunmaeng (Federation of Christians), which all church officers were required by law to join. All those who refused to join were arrested for belonging to an illegal organization. Churches were confiscated and put to secular uses. Large numbers of Christians fled to the south, whereas many of those who had remained in the north were rounded up shortly before the onset of the Korean War in June 1950 and executed en masse. Little was heard about the state of Protestantism in the north until the mid-1980s when it was announced that a hymnal and a translation of the New Testament had been published in 1983 and a translation of the Old Testament in 1984. In the late 1980s delegations representing North American and European churches reported taking part in worship in the homes of individual Christians. In 1988 the government of North Korea announced that it had built and opened a new Roman Catholic and a new Protestant church for use by their respective religious communities. Subsequently officials designated as leaders of the Christian community in North Korea have met with various Western and South Korean church leaders to discuss national unification. However, the church organizations in North Korea are not freely formed associations but are the creations of the government, their representatives being government-approved personnel.

In southern Korea the laissez-faire policy of the American Military Government (1945–1948) left the church free to handle its own affairs. Two issues emerged: the continuation of the Japanese-created unified church, and the question of complicity by church leaders with the Japanese colonial regime. By late 1945 a bloc of Methodists had bolted from the union church to reform the Methodist Church, which effectively ended the union church. Conflicts over attendance at Shintō rituals, and the perversion of the use of Scripture were more difficult to resolve. In 1947 some Methodists claimed that those who wanted the union to continue in fact were the same people who had collaborated with the Japanese. The Presbyterians similarly were split when a group left the Presbytery to form the Koryū Group. This group, claiming descent from those Christians who had made a COVENANT against shrine worship, took a hard line against any one who had attended a shrine ritual. The split over shrine worship is one of the most significant and long-lived controversies in Korean church history and is indicative of the extent to which THEOLOGY has determined the course of the church's history.

During the Korean War (1950–1953) church institutions, such as the universities, were forced to seek a temporary location in the southeastern part of the peninsula around the port of Pusan. After the conclusion of hostilities in 1953 most of the churches' efforts were spent on the provision of social services to a war-weary population and on repairing the material damage done to churches and church institutions. Housing, transportation for refugees, emergency medical aid, distribution of clothing and food, and the establishment of orphanages were all undertaken in the immediate postwar period. These activities were heavily supported by foreign church mission bodies. Mission support also was provided for the maintenance of Yonsei University, Severance Hospital, and Ehwa Woman's University. By 1957 the church had grown to 844,000 adherents representing 3.7 percent of the national population. Thus, although there had been significant numerical growth in church membership, the percentage of Christians within the national population had remained fairly constant over a twenty-year period.

Following postwar economic stabilization, the decade the 1960s stood at the threshold of the period of Korea's rapid urbanization and INDUSTRIALIZATION, and was also the time when the ideas of "Church Growth" (kyohoe sùngjang) became the theme for the evangelization of the nation. In the decade 1957–1968 the Protestant community both doubled in numbers of adherents to 1,900,000 persons, and doubled in percentage representation within the national population from 3 to 6 percent. The 1960s also saw greater social and evangelistic outreach in projects for people within Korea who were considered to be suppressed members of society, such as prostitutes and new industrial laborers, as well as international outreach through overseas missions and the provision of relief supplies to foreign nations. A new national evangelistic tool was created with the establishment of a nationwide radio network, the Christian Broadcasting System.

In the 1970s, after the proclamation of the Yushin (Revitalizing Reforms) Constitution, which entrenched President Pak Chùnghùi (Park Chung Hee, 1917–1979) in power, Christian political movements emerged, pressing for a more democratically based, representative system of government. This phenomenon represented a reemergence of the liberal, politically active strand of Protestantism, which had lain virtually dormant since the 1920s. It is important to note that it was politically liberal laymen and -women, not the leadership of the Protestant churches, who called for the restoration of democracy, for social justice, and for fairness in dealings with the workers of the new industrial state. Many Christians were imprisoned and tortured during this period for their political opinions. For nearly twenty years the political opposition to undemocratic government came largely from the Christian community, including Roman Catholic LATTY and CLERGY. During the same twentyyear period, Christians were also active in a variety of social movements, which may be typified by the movement for women's rights in terms of inheritance and marital relations. Led by Christian laywomen such as the Methodist Yi T'aeyùng (Lee Tai-young, 1914–1998), the battle was enjoined largely with the Yudo-hoe (Confucian Association) and conservative legislators who saw these developments as a threat to the Confucian moral structure of Korean society.

Although criticized for maintaining unnecessary Western cultural characteristics, Korean Protestantism has accommodated itself at certain key points with Korean culture, the most outstanding example of which is the practice of the ch'udo yebae (mourning ceremony) rituals. Filial piety (hyo in Korean), reverence for ancestors and obedience to parents, is one of the core values of Confucian thought and practice. Visible expression of this moral value was seen in the performance of the Confucian ancestral or chesa ceremonies. Korean Christians from the beginning emphasized the teaching of the fifth of the Ten Commandments to honor one's father and mother as a Christian reflection of this Confucian ethic. From at least the first decade of the twentieth century Korean Protestants have performed Christianized ancestral memorial rituals called ch'udo yebae, which are now found in the liturgy books of every Protestant denomination. Normally performed for one's immediate relatives such as parents and grandparents, there is no formal prohibition against remembering more distant relatives.

Minjūng sinhak (Theology of the People), which emerged in the mid-1970s, is a further reflection of the indigenization of Protestantism in Korea. Parallel in some ways with Latin American LIBERATION THEOLOGY, sinhak uses two key concepts—the minjūng (the people) and han (enmity, grudge). Minjung theology says that the minjung are the proper subject of history and that to understand history one must understand how God has worked to overcome the han of the people. Using the example of the liberation of the Hebrew slaves from Egyptian bondage, these theologians argue that God acts in response to the suffering of the people. From the 1990s this theology, perhaps because it was perceived to be too intellectual, has ceased to be popular in Korea.

Other features of Korean Protestant practice reflect the indigenization and localization of Christianity. Tongsūng kido, joint congregational prayer conducted out loud in the middle of a service, is far more fervent than congregational prayers in other national churches such as in Japan or North America. In the post-Korean War period Protestant churches have adopted two American Protestant practices—the revival meeting (puhūng-hoe) and the retreat center (kido wūn, often mistakenly called a prayer mountain). Frequently the conduct of a revival meeting will move into being a gathering for healing by the evangelist in charge (see REVIVALS; FAITH HEALING). Likewise, the retreat centers often are not places for meditation, but venues for obtaining spiritual healing of physical ailments. Both of these practices reflect the role that Korean shamans played as the principal healer in traditional times.

A considerable degree of mutual influence of the denominations on each other can be shown in the great similarity in ecclesiastical practice. All churches in Korea have small group meetings of ten or so of their members (called kuyūk-hoe by the Presbyterians and sūk-hoe by the Methodists), which are modeled on Methodist class meetings. Likewise, Methodism, which elsewhere does not have lay elders appointed for life but stewards elected for a fixed term, in Korea has lay elders on the model of the Reformed churches. These features combined with the use of a common hymnal, a common translation of the Bible, and a similar liturgical format have created a common Korean Protestantism in spite of the existence of denominationalism.

Protestant Christianity has been the most dynamic religious factor in Korea during the twentieth century. Protestantism has influenced the development of modern medicine, modern education, concepts of equality between classes and genders, and also has had an impact on post-Korean War new religious movements. Thirty-one Korean universities claim a Christian origin, of which three are considered among the top five universities in the country. Unlike Japan where new religious movements are often a mixture of Buddhism and Shintō, Korean new religious movements are a mixture of Christianity and native traditions.

The 1995 Korean National Population Household Census, the last quinquennial census to ask for information about religious adherence, reveals some interesting characteristics about Korean Protestantism at the end of the twentieth century. First, 19.7 percent of the population claimed to adhere to a Protestant denomination. Second, of those people who self-identified themselves as belonging to an organized religion, 51.8 percent claimed to belong to a Christian denomination (39.1 percent to a Protestant denomination) or 6 percent more than the 45.7 percent of the respondents who claimed adherence to a form of Buddhism. Third, Protestantism shows a slight female predominance in membership because 53.3 percent of Protestants were female compared with 46.7 percent who were male. Fourth, Protestantism is young. Of self-identified Protestants 72.5 percent are between the ages of fifteen and forty-four years. Fifth, the largest single group of self-identified adherents is found among the youngest group, persons aged between fifteen and twenty-four years, accounting for more than a quarter of all self-identified Protestants. Sixth, the census also revealed that nationally where Protestantism is strong, Buddhism tends to be weaker and vice versa. In the region of the nation's capital, Protestantism accounts for a quarter of the population, or 50 percent greater than the size of the Buddhist groups in the same area. That is, Protestantism is typically stronger in those areas that are more highly urbanized and undergoing the greatest social change, whereas Buddhism is strongest in the culturally more traditional regions.

See also Asian Theology; Bible Translation; Communism; Ecumenism; Evangelism; Missionary Organizations; Women Higher Education

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Donald L. "Christianity 'Koreanized.'" In Nationalism and the Construction of Korean Identity, edited by Hyung II Pai and Timothy R. Tangherlini. Berkeley: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California, 1998.
- Clark, Allen D. A History of the Church in Korea. Seoul: Christian Literature Society of Korea, 1971.
- Clark, Donald N. Christianity in Modern Korea. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1986.
- . "History and Religion in Korea: The Case of Korean Christianity." In Religion and Society in Contemporary Korea, edited by Lewis R. Lancaster and Richard K. Payne. Berkeley: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California, 1997.
- Grayson, James Huntley. "Dynamic Complementarity: Korean Confucianism and Christianity." In Religion and the Transformations of Capitalism: Comparative Approaches, edited by Richard H. Roberts. London/New York: Routledge, 1995.
- . Early Buddhism and Christianity in Korea: A Study in the Emplantation of Religion. Leiden, The Netherlands: E.J. Brill, 1985.
- . Korea: A Religious History, rev. edition. Richmond, VA: Routledge Curzon, 2002.
- Paik, L. George. The History of Protestant Missions in Korea, 1832–1910. (1927 reprint). Seoul: Yonsei University Press, 1971.
- Shearer, Roy E. Wildfire: Church Growth in Korea. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdsman, 1966.
- Soltau, T. Stanley. Korea: the Hermit Nation and its Response to Christianity. London: World Dominion Press, 1932.
- Vos, Frits. Die Religionen Koreas. Stuttgart, Germany: W. Kohlhammer, 1977.
- Wasson, Alfred W. Church Growth in Korea. New York: International Missionary Council, 1934.
- Wells, Kenneth M. New God, New Nation: Protestants and Self-reconstruction Nationalism in Korea, 1896–1937. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1990.

JAMES HUNTLEY GRAYSON

KRAEMER, HENDRIK (1888–1965)

Dutch scholar and missiologist. Kraemer was both an excellent scholar in linguistics and religious studies and an outstanding lay theologian and missiologist. In and outside the NETHERLANDS he came to the fore in the tumultuous transition period from colonialism to postcolonialism. In INDONESIA he paved the way for a process that is well described in the title of his book From Mission Field to Independent Church (1958). Moreover, he pleaded for the transformation of missionary work done by Western missionary societies into common missionary work done jointly by the churches in the East and West. Christian mission, he argued, is not the duty of Western “free enterprise” organizations but the responsibility of the universal instituted church as the body of Christ.

Kraemer was born May 17, 1888. After his stay in an orphanage in Amsterdam (1900–1905) and his training at the Mission House in Rotterdam (1905–1909), Kraemer studied Indonesian languages at Leiden University (1911–1921). Here the famous Islamologist Christiaan Snouck Hurgronje supervised his Ph.D. study and awarded it cum laude. After a short stay in Egypt (1921) Kraemer served the Netherlands Bible Society in INDONESIA (1922–1937). Next he was appointed professor of the history and phenomenology of religion at Leiden University (1937–1947). Finally he moved from the Netherlands to SWITZERLAND to serve as the first director of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES’ newly established Ecumenical Institute at Château de Bossey, Céligny, near Geneva (1948–1955). After retirement he returned to the Netherlands. He died November 11, 1965.

In Indonesia Kraemer did Bible translation work, although he engaged himself in other work as well: theological education, visiting various mission fields, leading indigenous churches into independence, and studying Javanese culture, nationalism, Islam, and church growth. In 1928 he attended the Jerusalem meeting of the International Missionary Council and established cooperation with JOHN R. MOTT and other missionary leaders. In 1928–1933 he published two volumes of Islam studies in Indonesian language, which were banned by the government after Indonesia’s independence. In 1934 he established the major Indonesian theological seminary, Sekolah Tinggi Theolo-gia (STT), at Jakarta. Kraemer’s book The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (1938), published with a foreword by the archbishop of York and thoroughly influenced by the dialectical theologians KARL BARTH and EMIL BRUNNER, pleaded for “biblical realism” as a tool to understand, approach, and evaluate non-Christian religions. In opposition to William E. Hocking, main compiler of the influential inquiry Rethinking Missions (1932), Kraemer emphasized discontinuity between Christian faith and the non-Christian religions. His exclusivistic THEOLOGY of MISSIONS and religions was strongly opposed by both Western liberals and Indian inclusivists at the 1938 Tambaram (Madras) International Missionary Council meeting and thereafter.

In 1936 Utrecht University celebrated its 300th anniversary: Barth and Brunner as well as Kraemer were awarded honorary doctorates. A year later Kraemer moved to Leiden University. His inaugural address dealt with the problem of syncretism. He lectured on all religions but showed a special interest in Islam. His book Islam as a Religious and Missionary Problem (1938) is a good compendium of his view on Islam. It was heavily criticized by other scholars in religious studies because they disliked his connecting religious studies with missions. Before, during, and after World War II Kraemer engaged in the revitalization of his own church, the Netherlands Reformed Church. During the war he opposed the Nazi ideology, supported the Messianic Jews, and was temporarily imprisoned. In 1945 he participated in the establishment of the Socialist Party.

After retirement and return to the Netherlands, Kraemer published several books. The two major works of this period, Religion and the Christian Faith (1956) and World Cultures and World Religions: The Coming Dialogue (1960), are modifications of his 1938 views: the key issues of his prewar views are indeed maintained but the term “biblical realism” is no longer used and the term “dialogue” is introduced for the first time. His popular work Why Christianity of All Religions? (1962) makes it even more evident that his prewar and postwar views cannot be played off against each other. Other influential English books also translated into various languages are The Communication of the Christian Faith (1956) and A Theology of the Laity (1958).

From Tambaram (1938) to New Delhi (1961) Kraemer thoroughly dominated the missionary and missiological scene. Johannes Verkuyl and other Western and Eastern missiologists continued Kraemer’s thinking in one way or another, but Indian theologians such as Stanley J. Samartha pleaded for a “post-Kraemer theology.” In 1988 Tambaram was revisited and Kraemer’s heritage reviewed again. On that occasion Bishop J.E. Lesslie Newbigin opposed theological pluralists such as W. Cantwell Smith and Samartha, and found himself compelled to stand with Kraemer.

References and Further Reading

- Hallencreutz, Carl F. Kraemer towards Tambaram: A Study in Hendrik Kraemer’s Missionary Approach. Lund: Gleerup, 1966.
- Perry, Tim S. Radical Difference: A Defence of Hendrik Kraemer’s Theology of Religions. Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 2001.
- Retnowinarti, et al. Hendrik Kraemer: Bibliografie en Archief. Leiden-Utrecht, The Netherlands: Interuniversitair Instituut voor Missiologie en Oecumenica, 1988.
- “Tambaram Revisited.” Special issue of International Review of Mission 78, no. 307 (July 1988).

Van Leeuwen, Arend Th. Hendrik Kraemer: Dienaar der Wereldkerk. Amsterdam: Ten Have, 1959. German translation: 1962.

Yates, Timothy. Christian Mission in the Twentieth Century. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

JAN A.B.JONGENEEL

KRAUTH, CHARLES PORTERFIELD (1823–1883)

American Lutheran theologian. Krauth was born March 17, 1823, in Martinsburg, Virginia, and died January 2, 1883, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The son of a Lutheran pastor, Krauth studied at Gettysburg College and Seminary, and became a licensed missionary and then Lutheran pastor in and around Baltimore, Maryland. He also served in West Virginia, Virginia, the West Indies (for a Reformed congregation without a pastor), in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and finally in Philadelphia. Krauth resigned from his last parish to edit the Lutheran and Missionary, opposing the “Americanizing” of LUTHERANISM, a growing trend in his General Synod.

“Americanizing” was epitomized by SAMUEL SIMON SCHMUCKER, whose Definite Platform greatly minimized Lutheran confessional commitment in order to attain common ground with Reformed theology. Once more tolerant and irenic, Krauth’s studies of the Lutheran Confessions fostered a more conservative attitude, although he sought to balance firm theological conviction with a generous spirit on a personal level. When the General Synod opened its Philadelphia Seminary in 1864, Krauth became professor of dogmatics. There he helped organize the General Council, a new association reflecting a more traditional and conservative Lutheran stance.

Krauth wrote to address challenges in the increasingly complicated denominational scene in America. His Fundamental Articles of Faith and Church Polity formed the basis for the General Council’s constitution. Facing church fellowship questions, Krauth wrote fourteen articles for The Lutheran, material later recast as Theses on Pulpit and Altar Fellowship. For the sake of confessional THEOLOGY Krauth urged Lutherans to avoid unionism and syncretism, terms that especially connoted Reformed Calvinist theology in various forms, a theology that appeared similar to Lutheranism yet in Krauth’s eyes had significant differences. While serving on the seminary faculty Krauth also became a philosophy professor at the University of Pennsylvania. In addition to works mentioned, he also wrote The Conservative Reformation and Its The-ology and edited Berkeley’s Principles of Human Knowledge.

See also Calvinism; Confession; Lutheranism, United States

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Krauth, Charles Porterfield. The Conservative Reformation and Its Theology. Philadelphia, PA: General Council Publication Board, 1913; reprint, Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1963.

Secondary Source:

Spaeth, Adolph. Charles Porterfield Krauth. 2 vols. First edition, New York: Christian Literature Company, 1898; Second edition, Philadelphia, PA: General Council Publication House, 1898–1909; reprint (2 vols. in 1), New York: Arno Press, 1969.

ROBERT ROSIN

KRÜDENER, BARBARA (1764–1824)

Latvian mystic. Born in Riga, Latvia, in 1764, Barbara Juliane von Krüdener devoted twenty-two years of her life to PREACHING, traveling, and prophesying throughout central Europe. She married a Russian diplomat at age 18, but separated from him a few years later. After briefly living in Paris, Krüdener published an autobiographical and sentimental romance novel entitled Valerie in 1804. Returning to Riga the same year, she was shocked by the DEATH of an acquaintance and sought comfort for her disordered nerves. Confiding in her shoemaker, a Moravian, Krüdener found spiritual peace after she converted to his faith. She once again fell ill upon his death. As remedy, her doctor ordered her to German spas for treatment. During these travels, she met Queen Louise of Prussia and a prophet of CHILIASM, a belief in the millennium. Throughout her journeys, Krüdener's religious development was influenced by the contacts she made on her travels.

After a short visit with the Moravians at HERRNHUT, Krüdener met a pietistic priest who instructed her in the mysteries of the supernatural world. She also sought instruction at the Protestant parsonage of Sainte Marie-aux-Mines, and she traveled throughout GERMANY and SWITZERLAND holding BIBLE classes and warning of the approaching millennium. She had identified Napoleon as the angel in the Book of Revelation (9:11). In 1815 her eccentricity and exuberance attracted the attention of Czar Alexander I of RUSSIA, who attended her meetings. Krüdener relocated to St. Petersburg, from where she was exiled in 1821 for promoting the cause of Greek revolutionaries and the formation of the Holy Alliance. After fleeing St. Petersburg, Krüdener joined a Pietist colony in the Crimea, where she died there in 1824.

See also Millenarians and Millennialism; Moravian Church; Pietism

References and Further Reading

“Krotoschin, R., Barbara Julian, Baroness Von (1764–1824).” 1911 Edition Encyclopædia.

Pagewise Inc. 2002. <http://www.39.191%20encyclopedia.org/K/KR/KROTOSHIN.htm>

Ley, F. “The Baroness Julie de Krüdener in Paris (1802–1804).” Revue D’Histoire Litteraire De La France 99 no.1 (Jan-Feb 1999): 99–108.

HOWELL WILLIAMS

KU KLUX KLAN

The Ku Klux Klan (KKK) is a secret, Anglo-Saxon terrorist organization begun after the U.S. CIVIL WAR (1861–1865) and continued into the twenty-first century. The Klan flourished briefly during the postwar Reconstruction period as an attempt by southern whites to undermine the political influence of blacks and Republicans. It resurfaced as a Protestant society in 1915 through the work of William J. Simmons, an ex-Methodist minister. The movement spread throughout southern society as a white, nativist (see NATIVISM) order with Protestant orientation in its many secret rituals. Promoting itself as the defender of American values, white supremacy, and traditional religion, the Klan offered violent opposition to the presence of “outsiders” including African Americans, Jews, and Roman Catholics (see ANTI-SEMITISM; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS TO). Its most infamous symbol, the burning cross, probably originated from Thomas Dixon’s 1906 book, The Clansman, a novel promoting the inferiority of blacks. During the 1920s the order spread throughout the United States with a membership that may well have included one out of ten white Protestant males. The increasing use of violence led to a decline in its membership by the 1930s.

With the rise of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT in the 1950s and 1960s, the KKK was revived in perhaps its most virulent forms. Civil rights workers, including MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., were frequent targets of Klan threats and attacks. The Klan instigated violence against the Freedom Riders in Alabama in 1961, opposing integration and extension of voting rights. The society offered strenuous opposition to integration, the extension of voting rights, and all efforts to abolish “separate but equal” facilities in the South.

Although reduced in membership, the Klan has continued to function into the twenty-first century, promoting white supremacy and associations with the antigovernment “militia” movements.

References and Further Reading

Chalmers, David. Hooded Americanism: The History of the Ku Klux Klan. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1987.

Encyclopedia of Religion in the South. Macon, GA: Mercer, 1984.

Garrow, David J. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr. and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morrow, 1986.

BILL J.LEONARD

KUTTER, HERMANN (1863–1931)

Swiss theologian. Kutter was born in Bern into a pietistic family. He studied Protestant THEOLOGY and philosophy, especially Plato and German Idealism, in Bern, Basel, and Berlin. After serving as minister of a Reformed congregation in a rural Swiss parish for eleven years, he was elected minister of the important Neumünster Church in Zurich in 1898 and remained there until he retired in 1926. He died in St. Gall, SWITZERLAND, in 1931. Kutter was one of the pioneers of the Religious-Social Movement in Switzerland and a forerunner of dialectical theology.

Incisive for his life and work was the influence of and contact with Christoph Blumhardt after 1889. He argued that the main task of the CHURCH was the proclamation of the KINGDOM OF GOD and the commitment to ameliorate the social situation of the working class. Besides many printed sermons, which often focused on social issues such as Die soziale Frage (The Social Problem) or Geld und Geist (Money and Spirit), both published in 1906, and other publications on church history and systematic theology, after 1903 he published several polemical books on the foremost social, political, and religious issues of the time. Most of them appeared in more than one edition and also were translated in other languages (Chicago 1908, England 1910). Kutter's important books were Sie müssen (They Must, 1903), Gerechtigkeit (Justice, 1905), Wir Pfarrer (We Clergy, 1907), Die Revolution des Christentums (The Revolution of Christianity, 1908).

Kutter helped many young theologians to overcome the difficulties in their ecclesiastical duties. He was in contact with other contemporary representatives of religious socialism, such as LEONHARD RAGAZ, and he influenced younger Swiss theologians such as Eduard Thurneysen and KARL BARTH. Nonetheless he was a loner, as in his relationship with the Social Democratic Party, because of his radical and prophetic message to preach, first and exclusively, the gospel of the unrestricted presence of God in Jesus Christ among humankind.

See also Neo-Orthodoxy

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Kutter, Hermann Jr. Hermann Kutter's Lebenswerk. Zurich, Switzerland: EVZ, 1965.

Secondary Source:

Nigg, Walter. Hermann Kutters Vermächtnis. Bern, Switzerland: 1941.

GERHARD SCHWINGE

KUYPER, ABRAHAM (1837–1920)

Dutch Reformed theologian. Kuyper, a Dutch Reformed theologian, church reformer, journalist, educator, and politician, was the major force behind the rise and development of a modern Dutch pluralist society in the twentieth century. In the mid-nineteenth century NETHERLANDS, the Dutch National Reformed Church and the Dutch state were still closely linked and governed by an elite group that enjoyed the privileges of a restricted franchise based on wealth. By law the affairs of the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH were regulated by a state bureau of religion. With the state paying ministers' salaries, the government demanded a say in the placement of clergy as well as in appointments to the faculties of theology in the state universities. Consequently Roman Catholics and dissenting Protestants were effectively marginalized, especially in the nation's schools, which were increasingly dominated by a secular and liberal ideology. Although the new Dutch Constitution of 1848 permitted alternative schools, the bureaucratic obstacles placed in the way made it virtually impossible to establish them.

In response to this situation Kuyper led a sizeable group out of the National Reformed Church, founded a new independent Christian University (Free University of Amsterdam), started and led the first modern Dutch political party mobilizing the "common folk" into a politically significant group (the Antirevolutionary Party), formed a coalition government with Roman Catholics, and inspired a renaissance of Calvinist thought eventually known as neo-Calvinism.

Kuyper was born October 29, 1837, into a clerical family in the theologically liberal Dutch National Reformed Church and received his own education at the University of Leiden, completing a doctorate in 1862 with a dissertation on the Polish reformer Jan a Lasco. By his own account Kuyper's theology at this point was moderately liberal, a judgment echoed by his devoutly Calvinist peasant parishioners in the Reformed Church of Beesd, the small village in the southern Dutch province of Gelderland that was Kuyper's first pastoral charge. It was here in fulfilling his minister's duties that Kuyper was "converted" to a more orthodox version of CALVINISM and began to identify with the cause of the Reformed dissenters, particularly their protest against compulsory statecontrolled education (see ORTHODOXY, DISSENT).

Kuyper's reform work began with efforts to broaden the franchise in the church by giving greater authority to local church officials who could be selected and elected by the church members themselves. Beyond the formal, procedural challenges to the church authorities, Kuyper also led the protest against doctrinal indifference in the national church, calling for a return of fidelity to the traditional confessions and THEOLOGY as established by the Synod of Dort (1618–1619). The culmination of these efforts led in 1886 to the second major secession from the National Reformed Church in the nineteenth century (the first took place in 1834). Important for the Dutch nation as a whole, the eventual union of these two groups along with their public legitimation played a significant role in establishing the Netherlands as a pluralist nation.

As Kuyper's efforts moved beyond church reform into the area of education he realized that an effective political movement required not only energetic and sophisticated organization but a public voice. From 1872 on, several years before the founding of the Antirevolutionary Party in 1879 or the establishment of the Free University of Amsterdam in 1880, Kuyper started and edited a weekly (The Herald) and daily newspaper (The Standard) as the voice of this new Calvinist movement. His tireless journalistic efforts and political organizing finally paid off in 1901 when the Antirevolutionary Party together with the Roman Catholic political party acquired a majority of seats in the Dutch parliament. Kuyper became prime minister of the new government, a position he held for four years. This cooperative alliance was the dominant governing party during the twentieth century in the Netherlands until the 1960s.

Kuyper's neo-Calvinist vision began with the conviction of divine sovereignty. This sovereignty begins with the grace of regeneration in individual believers but then extends organically to culture and society. In Kuyper's characteristic language, God is sovereign over all "spheres" of life—politics, business, labor, education, and the arts, as well as church and family. From this primordial principle Kuyper derived four secondary ones: antithesis, common grace, sphere sovereignty, and a distinction between the church as institution and as organism.

For Kuyper Calvinism was more than a churchly, confessional tradition. It was a Weltanschauung, a world-and-life-view, a life system antithetically opposed to other life systems such as paganism and, particularly, modernism. The spirit of modernism, captured in the French Revolution's slogan Ni Dieu, ni maitre, came to expression especially in the political sphere where an idolatry of the state replaced God's ordinances. Kuyper's political ideology was antirevolutionary as well as antistatist. However, Kuyper did not take his antithetical stance to imply a rejection of all non-Christian culture. Like Augustine's metaphor of Israel plundering the gold of the Egyptians, Kuyper too believed that there was much valuable even in pagan culture. This value was not to be credited to human cleverness or goodness but to the universal or common grace of God whereby God bestows gifts on all people indiscriminately and also actively restrains their evil, sinful impulses.

God was sovereign not only of the church but of the world. Kuyper's most famous saying is: "There is not a square inch of all creation over which Christ the Lord does not say, Mine!"

Kuyper drew important social implications from this doctrine. In his view divine sovereignty was seen to be exercised directly over such sovereign spheres as the school and the family rather than through the mediation of either the church or the state. This conviction led Kuyper to advocate a principled pluralism that honored both structural and religious diversity. One of his major political accomplishments was the eventual legal establishment of a religiously plural education system.

For Kuyper it was important that Christian communion come to expression not only in the institutional church gathered around Word and SACRAMENTS but as a unified organism in public life. His ambition was to inspire conservative Dutch Calvinists to leave behind pietist and sectarian withdrawal from civic, social, and political life and thus to re-Christianize the Dutch nation, not by maintaining institutional, ecclesiastical privilege but through the voluntary activity of Christians in free churches and distinctly Christian organizations. Hence his profound appreciation for the spirit of American voluntarism so eloquently described by ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE in his Democracy in America. Kuyper died November 8, 1920.

See also Calvinism; Ecumenism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Bratt, James D., ed. Abraham Kuyper: A Centennial Reader. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998.
(A helpful collection of occasional essays.)
- Kuyper, Abraham. Principles of Sacred Theology. Translated by John Hendrick De Vries. New York: Scribners, 1898; reprint Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1965.
- . Lectures on Calvinism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1931.
- . The Work of the Holy Spirit. Translated by J.Hendrick De Vries. New York and London: Funk & Wagnalls Co., 1900.
- . The Problem of Poverty. Translated by James W. Skillen. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1991.

Secondary Sources:

- Bolt, John. A Free Church, A Holy Nation: Abraham Kuyper's American Public Theology. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2001.
- Heslam, Peter S. Creating a Christian Worldview: Abraham Kuyper's Lectures on Calvinism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1998.
- Langley, McKendree R. The Practice of Political Spirituality: Episodes in the Public Career of Abraham Kuyper. Jordan Station, Ontario: Paideia, 1984.
- McGoldrick, James E. Abraham Kuyper: God's Renaissance Man. Auburn, MA: Evangelical Press, 2000.
- Praamsma, Louis. Let Christ Be King: Reflections on the Life and Times of Abraham Kuyper. Jordan Station, Ontario: Paideia, 1985.

JOHN BOLT

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 3
L – R

HANS J. HILLERBRAND
EDITOR

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

Editorial Board

Martin Greschat

*Justus-Liebig-University
(Germany)*

L.Gregory Jones

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

David Martin

University of Lancaster (UK)

Assistant Editor

James H.Thrall

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Hugh McLeod

University of Birmingham (UK)

Grant Wacker

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Andrew F.Walls

Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies University of Aberdeen (Scotland)

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF
PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 3 L-R

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

EDITOR

Routledge
New York London

Published in 2004 by Routledge 29 West 35th Street New York, NY 10001-2299 <http://www.routledge-ny.com/>

Published in Great Britain by Routledge 11 New Fetter Lane London EC4P 4EE <http://www.routledge.co.uk/>

Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Books, Inc.

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2006.

“To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge’s collection of thousands of eBooks please go to <http://www.ebookstore.tandf.co.uk/>.”

Copyright © 2004 Routledge

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilized in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of Protestantism/Hans J.Hillerbrand, editor. p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index. ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (set) 1. Protestantism—Encyclopedias. I. Hillerbrand, Hans Joachim. BX4811.3.E53 2003 280'.4'03-dc21 2003011582

ISBN 0-203-48431-2 Master e-book ISBN

ISBN 0-203-57509-1 (Adobe e-Reader Format)

ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (Print Edition)

Contents

Volume 3, Entries L–R

1047

L

LAESTADIUS, LARS LEVI (1800–1861)

Swedish reformer. Laestadius was born January 10, 1800, in Jakkvik, in the northern region of SWEDEN. His father was a Lutheran pastor. While still in high school (Gymnasium), he showed his interest in THEOLOGY and philosophy as well as in botany, the latter triggered by his half-brother Carl Erik. His industrious collection of specimen plants in Lapland during his summer vacations soon earned him a reputation as an outstanding botanist. A published report of one of his first field trips earned him the recognition of the Swedish Academy of Sciences and Letters, which supported his subsequent research.

In 1820 he matriculated at the University of Uppsala, where he studied theology, languages, and botany. He was ordained in 1825 and was appointed pastor in Kaaresuvando, where he continued until 1849. On the occasion of a ministerial visitation to Lapland he met a Sami woman after church on New Year's Day 1844 who not only impressed him with the need for personal religious regeneration as the hallmark of authentic Christian existence but also was instrumental in triggering Laestadius's own CONVERSION. From then on, Laestadius's PREACHING included similar exhortations to repent and be converted. He gained converts and worshippers from other towns and villages flocked to hear his sermons. A revival began to sweep over northern Sweden and, before long, over neighboring FINLAND as well. To deal with the consequences of an increasingly widespread awakening, Laestadius commissioned laymen to assist him in his work (see REVIVALS; AWAKENINGS).

Laestadius always affirmed his Lutheran orientation. The awakening, brought about by his preaching, therefore focused not so much on theology as on personal commitment, sobriety, temperance, devotional meetings, and Bible study—all hallmarks of eighteenth-century German Lutheran PIETISM.

Immigrants brought the Laestadian Lutheran revival to the UNITED STATES; the first Laestadian worship was held in Cokato, Minnesota, in 1863, among immigrants from northern NORWAY. Given the ethnic bifurcation of religious immigrant traditions in North America, the Laestadian immigrants to the United States soon evolved their own separate church structures, something that had not occurred in Finland. In North America the Apostolic Lutheran Church stands in the Laestadian tradition.

The use of the term "apostolic" denotes the principle that only the BIBLE is the source of AUTHORITY and that the Apostle's Creed—that is, the belief of the Apostles—summarizes the teachings of the Bible. The Lutheran confessional documents of the sixteenth century, such as the Formula of Concord or the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, are not rejected but seen as belonging to a different category of authoritative sources. Laestadian theology is conservative, assumes the inerrancy of the Bible, stresses conversion, and insists on the sanctified way of life for believers who confess their sins to one another. This is understood as the faithful application of MARTIN LUTHER'S teaching on the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. In addition, again in close adherence to Luther's notions, Laestadians see the local congregation as the place of SALVATION and the living fellowship of believers. Laestadians emphasize missionary activity, education, and music, usually sung a capella.

See also Biblical Inerrancy; Sanctification

References and Further Reading

- Hallencreutz, Carl F. "Lars Levi Laestadius' Attitude to Saami Religion," in Saami Religion. Åbo, Finland: Donner Inst, 1987.
- Esala, Philip J. "American Laestadianism Schismatic." Concordia Historical Institute Quarterly 58 (1985):183–189.
- Gothóni, René, and Kirsti Suolinna. "The Religious Message in Action: A Case Study," in New Religions. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1975.
- Heikkinen, Jacob W. "Lars Levi Laestadius." Lutheran Quarterly 8 (1956):360–362.
- Laestadius, L.L. The new postilla of Lars Levi Laestadius. Hancock, MI: Finnish Lutheran Book Concern, 1925.
- . Evangeliepostilla. Stockholm: Svenska Kyrkans Diakonistyrelses Bokförlag, 1957.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

LAGARDE, PAUL ANTON DE (1827–1891)

German theologian. Lagarde was born Paul Botticher, the son of a classical secondary school teacher in Berlin on November 2, 1827. He studied THEOLOGY in Berlin and HALLE and received a doctoral degree in 1849 and the universal teaching license in oriental languages at the philosophical faculty. While he was a student Lagarde escaped the piety of his parents and became estranged from traditional Protestantism, which he would later criticize fundamentally. After research stays in London and Paris, where he copied particularly Eastern manuscripts, he worked for many years as a teacher in Berlin schools. After several attempts he became professor for Eastern languages in Göttingen in 1869.

Lagarde's most important field of work was in critical editions. He edited Coptic, Greek, Latin, and Arab texts of the church fathers and the BIBLE. His special attention was the publication of a critical edition of the Septuagint. Theological questions engaged Lagarde his entire life. He required a strict separation of state and church and an abolishing of theological faculties at state universities.

His ideal was a national church (nationale Kirche) and a national religion, in which the traditional denominations and theological disputes are removed. Lagarde was particularly critical of Pauline theology. Lagarde's opinion was that Paul had falsified the message of Jesus with the help of the Old Testament. His conceptions of a national church, the result of an exaggerated sense of nationalism, were connected with his ANTI-SEMITISM. Even if he was not a racial anti-Semite, his speeches and publications, which placed before the Jews the alternatives of complete assimilation or the deprivation of citizenship, exerted a long-term influence on the anti-Semitic movement. Lagarde asserted that JUDAISM prevented the internal unification of GERMANY. Thus the Nazis, Nationalsozialisten engaged the writings of Paul de Lagarde.

See also Church and State, Overview; Education, Theology: Europe

References and Further Reading

- Gottheil, Richard J.H. Bibliography of the Works of Paul Anton de Lagarde. Washington, D.C.: reprinted from the Proceedings of the American Oriental Society, 1892.
- Heiligenthal, Roman. "Paul de Lagarde." In Theologische Realenzyklopädie, edited by Gerhard Müller. Vol. 20, 375–378. Berlin/New York: de Gruyter, 1990.
- Lougee, Robert Wayne. Paul de Lagarde, 1827–1891. A Study of Radical Conservatism in Germany. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1962.
- Rahlf's, Alfred. Paul de Lagardes wissenschaftliches Lebenswerk im Rahmen einer Geschichte seines Lebens. Berlin: Weidmann, 1928 [with bibliography].
- Stern, Fritz. The Politics of Cultural Despair. A Study in the Rise of the Germanic Ideology. Berkeley: University of California, 1974.

NORBERT FRIEDRICH

LAITY

Biblical Origins

The term laity is a collective description commonly applied to those church members who are not part of the ordained CLERGY. Unlike the Greek noun laos, meaning "people," the derivative term laikos (Lat. laicus, "laity") is not found in the New Testament. Where the Greek Septuagint version of the Old Testament uses laos to refer to Israel as the chosen people of God, the New Testament applies the term to the New Israel, the community of Christian believers. Although both uses presuppose a theocratic context, the New Testament term, at least in its early, Pauline form, lacks the institutional and cultic overtones found in Israelite worship. Instead the early Christians as the people of God constitute the CHURCH, which is regarded as an organic rather than an institutional entity. In the Apostle Paul's teaching (I Corinthians 12), the metaphor of the human body is used to demonstrate the conviction that each believer has a distinct yet essential function to exercise within the community of faith for the good of the whole and under the headship of Christ. The human leadership of this new community is found within the laos. Its rudimentary distinctions appear to center more on functional matters than issues of status.

Both in the Pauline figure of Jesus as the heavenly intercessor and, more explicitly, in the image of the eternal high priest of the New Covenant presented by the Epistle to the Hebrews, the theology of some of the earliest Christian writings depicts Christ as the perfect fulfillment of the Israelite priesthood. Recalling the words of Jeremiah, all members of the new laos are seen as enjoying direct, personal knowledge of God. The new people of God, the adelphoi (“brothers”) or kletoi (“called ones”), whom Christ represents in heaven, are collectively called to act as prophets, priests, and kings in the service of God irrespective of whether they have a specific ministerial designation. As a redeemed and forgiven company of people they proclaim the gospel of Jesus Christ to the world by means of word and deed, they intercede for mankind through prayer and self-sacrifice, and they exercise the privileges of royal status as sons and daughters of the living God.

The quintessential expression of early DOCTRINE concerning the laity is found in the Petrine epistles (I Peter 2:9–10) in the concept of the royal priesthood, or as it is more commonly known, the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. This doctrine of the corporate priesthood of the laity was carried decisively into the sphere of Protestant thought by the early theological writings of MARTIN LUTHER. In his 1520 address To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation he argued passionately against the prevailing understanding within the church of the laity as being restricted to a subordinate role in relation to the ordained priesthood.

Historical Development: Early and Medieval Church

The seeds of the subordination of the laity can be traced, even within the canonical writings, because the Pastoral Epistles afford evidence of an incipient hierarchy, although at that stage ecclesiastical leadership is still firmly located within the all-embracing concept of the laos. The earliest use of the more specialized term “laity” is found outside the future canon of scripture (c.96 A.D.) in the First Epistle of Clement (40:5). Writing from Rome, the author of Clement accepts an organizational pattern for the church that mirrors the religious structures of Israel, with a differentiated clergy analogous to the Old Testament priesthood. One hundred and fifty years later the correspondence of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, reveals the church in North Africa operating with a clear hierarchy of BISHOPS, presbyters, and DEACONS. Although the laity were still participating in church councils their contribution was rapidly being eroded. By the Middle Ages the emphasis had switched from the original common inheritance and calling of believers, including those with particular leadership responsibilities, to an understanding of the church where a strong juridical distinction was drawn between clergy and laity. Unlike the Eastern church, which maintained the possibility of an active and significant role for the nonordained, the Western church from the fall of the Roman Empire relegated its ordinary members to a position of marginal importance. As the function and status of the clergy became formalized so the laity came to be regarded in an increasingly negative light, defined more by the areas from which they were proscribed, especially PREACHING and the administration of the SACRAMENTS, than by anything positive.

From the twelfth century the fortunes of the laity began to change with the growth of civic pride and the wider availability of education. Popular piety deepened, partly in response to the work of the newly founded mendicant orders. In this changing climate a mood of assertiveness appeared among sections of the laity encouraged by new theological ideas. In 1324 Marsiglio of Padua challenged the professional exclusivity of the priesthood, arguing that discipline and spirituality belonged to the whole church, not simply to the clergy, and that the claim of the latter to a hierarchical AUTHORITY had no scriptural basis. Fifty years later John Wycliffe went even further, rejecting the traditional feudal understanding of relationships within the church and arguing that by virtue of God's GRACE to the individual believer all Christians were equal, whether pope or layman, prince or peasant. Over the following century his lay followers, the "Poor Preachers," put this principle to the test by taking to themselves the right to propagate the teachings of the Bible read in the vernacular and publicly to attack those aspects of the late medieval priesthood that appeared to contradict scripture. By the dawn of the REFORMATION the laity were showing that they were no longer prepared meekly to accept their traditional passive role within the church. Their resistance took various forms, but was expressed most notably in the spread of lay-led HERESY, the general growth of dissatisfaction with the clergy, and the popular sense of grievance against tithe and other ecclesiastical exactions.

The Reformation

When Martin Luther launched his assault on the traditional distinction between the clergy and the laity his words resonated with this popular anticlericalism. With considerable adroitness he sought to enlist the support of the German princes, building on a rivalry between the secular and spiritual leaders of Western society that had troubled the Holy Roman Empire in varying degrees since the Lay Investiture Controversy of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. The essence of Luther's complaint against the church was that under papal leadership the Roman clergy had erected three defensive walls around themselves, thereby protecting the so-called spiritual estate against reform. These protective measures robbed the members of the temporal estate, whether prince or peasant, of any spiritual role, and reserved to the papacy the rights of pronouncing on the interpretation of scripture and of summoning a general council of the church. None of these measures in Luther's opinion had any justification. Appealing to scripture he insisted that all Christians belonged to the spiritual estate by virtue of their BAPTISM. Consequently all were consecrated priests and in the absence of ordained clergy could elect one of their number to preach and administer the SACRAMENTS. By the same token where the papacy was itself the cause of offense the temporal rulers as fellow Christians had a duty to convene a true reforming council of the church. Luther's 1520 analysis of the true position of the Christian laity was confirmed in still more striking terms the following year by the high degree of spiritual autonomy claimed for the individual believer in his famous appeal to the scriptures before the imperial Diet at Worms. Yet within four years he had begun to realize the less-attractive social implications of the new doctrine of the laity, as popular unrest spread across GERMANY using ideas uncomfortably similar to his own. Although the mature Luther did not renege on the universal priesthood, preserving the new emphasis implicitly in his encouragement of lay understanding of FAITH and WORSHIP through popular hymns, vernacular preaching and LITURGY, and full participation in the sacraments, it no longer constituted a subject for discussion and was modified to suit the structures and norms of German princely and civic society. Elsewhere within the Reformation the role and status of the laity received varying degrees of attention. In general the Magisterial Reformers, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, MARTIN BUCER, and JOHN CALVIN, did not address the subject with the same directness as Luther, but they showed by their emphasis on assurance of faith, the work of Christ as sole mediator between the individual and God, and the centrality of the vernacular scriptures a similar concern to develop the spiritual life of all believers.

It was left to the Radical Reformers to implement most fully the essential equality of all Christians. In a conscious attempt to refashion the church according to a literal reading of the New Testament, the barriers created by sacramental theology disappeared and the concept of Christian leadership underwent a fundamental revision. In the most typical ecclesiological statement produced by the moderate wing of the Radical Reformation, the SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION of 1527, the division between clergy and laity was virtually eradicated. Article 5 of the CONFESSION depicts the pastor as a person of good repute chosen and supported by the congregation to teach, discipline, and conduct prayer and the breaking of bread “for the advancement of all the brethren and sisters.” Such a leader would be subject to discipline by the congregation if necessary (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE) and if he were removed by banishment or martyrdom another would immediately be ordained in his place for the preservation of the group of believers.

The direction taken by the Swiss and South German Anabaptists at Schleithem and by other contemporary Radicals by no means indicated a dramatic change for most early Protestants. The Radicals were a small and largely ephemeral force because of their social attitudes and the strength of the persecution that befell them. For the non-Radical majority the survival of the term “laity” into the post-Reformation era gives some indication of the power of theological conservatism when it came to the relationship between the Protestant communities of northern Europe and their religious leaders. It is perfectly possible to argue that the term “laity” as a juridical concept, which flourished under medieval Catholicism, had no place in the Reformation reconstruction of the church. However, the historical manifestation of Protestantism was broad-ranging, extending from the modified Catholicism of Luther and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, through the broad spectrum of Reformed churchmanship, which traced its origins to Zürich and Geneva, and arriving ultimately at the relatively simple congregational structure of ANABAPTISM and the later Separatists. In churches possessing an episcopal or quasiaepiscopal structure and a relatively high sacramental doctrine, the separation between clergy and laity, although diminished, continued to have practical substance. In the remainder the term “laity” was retained with varying degrees of emphasis as a convenient shorthand indicating differences in function within the overall body of church members.

Although the changes in the status and role of the laity proposed by Luther were by no means reversed, they were implemented only gradually over the succeeding centuries.

Many strands of continuity can be found between late medieval Catholicism and Magisterial Protestantism, especially in the century of religious upheaval after the Reformation. Many aspects of the former clerical mentality survived within the new ecclesiastical structures, to the extent that the new Reformed presbyters often appeared surprisingly similar to their medieval priestly counterparts as far as their relationship to the laity was concerned. According to the 1587 English “Book of Discipline” printed in 1644, active involvement in the church was a wholly clerical matter, with ruling elders and deacons counted as part of the body of ministers. Ecclesiastical hierarchy may have disappeared among the Reformed leadership but old professional attitudes appeared to be flourishing.

When the clerical leadership of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century scholastic CALVINISM is subjected to careful scrutiny, however, a different picture begins to emerge. In areas such as ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, where Calvinist ideas had begun to shape territorial churches, the empowerment of the individual believer was certainly subordinate to the need to fill the void left by the Roman clergy. A new and purified leadership had to be found—one that was confident of its calling and capable of arresting any slide into SECTARIANISM. From the outset the Reformed tradition set great store by clerical EDUCATION. Within the universities the continuation of the scholastic approach to theological studies reflected the need of the emerging national churches for ministers adequately trained in the skills of reasoning vital to the defense of Protestantism. Yet the availability of university-educated clergy, able to read the scriptures in their original languages and to expound them from a sound theological basis, was intended to aid the spiritual development of the laity rather than foster elitism. A succession of leaders like WILLIAM PERKINS and RICHARD BAXTER in England and Gisbertus Voetius in Holland combined significant scholarship with a strong pastoral concern for lay piety. Not only did the spiritual writings of Perkins and Baxter affect generations of English readers but, in translation along with the works of other Puritan writers (see PURITANISM), they provided a rich stimulus to lay development in Germany during the following century. More locally, individual Puritan ministers in England and in the early American colonies encouraged members of their congregations to keep journals in which they charted their own personal process of CONVERSION. These early signs of lay expression also manifested themselves in less conventional ways. Groups of Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) began to appear: men and women who pursued simplicity and truthfulness, and who sought guidance from the Inner Light rather than the customary authorities of scripture or church. With their egalitarianism and rejection of the ministry and sacraments they established considerable local influence in parts of England as well as the eastern seaboard of America.

In the Lutheran Church the impetus toward scholasticism had a less favorable outcome. After the Peace of Westphalia (1648) and the end of the bitter three-sided religious conflict in Germany, many Lutheran clergy became entrenched in a formal professionalism whose fashion was to impress the largely passive congregations under their care with pedantic theological discourses. Against this trend the Pietist movement under the leadership of PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER began from the 1660s to discover a more active role for the laity. Spener’s collegia pietatis, his groups for private devotion, together with the Christian Institute founded by his disciple AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE at Glauchau near HALLE transformed the situation for the Lutheran laity.

The latter were encouraged in their active form of Christianity by a stream of Pietist clergy, which began to emerge after 1692 from the new University of Halle.

Popular Evangelism

In the English-speaking world the first appearance of an active lay leadership is widely, if not entirely accurately, associated with the work of the eighteenth-century clergyman JOHN WESLEY. Early METHODISM drew on Reformation, Puritan, and Anglican influences as well as the contemporary example of German PIETISM. Its cellular structure, which owed a strong organizational debt to Moravianism, provided an ideal setting for the employment of considerable numbers of lay Christians and for the development of their skills. As a movement outside conventional religion and directed at the neglected sectors of society it offered the freedom to experiment with new forms of lay leadership. Laymen and women became class leaders, exhorters, and SUNDAY SCHOOL teachers. Individual believers were expected to offer spiritual counsel to their peers. Still more revolutionary was the widespread use of men as lay preachers who had received neither seminary education nor ordination. During Wesley's lifetime the social scandal created by these novelties was made even worse by his willingness to overlook the crossing of the preaching boundary by certain gifted WOMEN such as Sarah Crosby and Mary Bosanquet. Wesley's friend and contemporary GEORGE WHITEFIELD showed a similar inclination to ignore the traditional barrier established by ordination in the interests of missionary religion, but in his case his relative disinterest in creating organizational structures among his converts meant that his empowerment of the laity was less obvious.

As opportunities for lay leadership began to diminish among British Methodists in the climate of conservatism that followed the death of Wesley, the rapid expansion of the movement in newly independent America created new scope for the gifted layperson. In the UNITED STATES the Methodist circuit system created by FRANCIS ASBURY soon employed hundreds of young unmarried men but the call of women to public ministry was not recognized (see CIRCUIT RIDERS; ITINERACY). Of the small number of white women deeply involved in the spread of early American Methodism most confined their activities to the semiprivate sphere of the class meeting. Yet for one small but significant group of black African American women, the coming of Methodism created an unprecedented opportunity for leadership. A handful of emancipated slaves and free-born women entered into a public itinerant ministry that defied the conventions of nineteenth-century society, challenging existing denominational structures and attesting to the dangerous and unpredictable force of a vocation attributed to the Holy Spirit. Although the focus in the new ecclesiastical structures created by EVANGELICALISM may have remained with the community of believers, increasingly the traditional practices of corporate Christianity appeared to be at variance with the expectations of post-Enlightenment INDIVIDUALISM.

Social Action

The increasing opportunities for lay involvement can also be seen in the church's handling of matters that extended beyond the narrowly religious. In the Franckesche Stiftungen, the network of facilities built around the orphanage at Halle, lay Pietists as well as theological students worked together to a degree unprecedented in earlier Protestantism, caring for widows and the poor, educating children across the social spectrum, printing and circulating a wide range of improving literature, and producing medicines. This German example provided a model for features that were subsequently reproduced elsewhere on both sides of the Atlantic.

A second great social impetus issued from JOHN WOOLMAN and his fellow American Quakers during the eighteenth century in their determined opposition to the institution of SLAVERY. In the British context the leadership of this struggle, initially directed against the degrading and cruel trade in human beings that operated between West Africa and the New World, was in the hands of a small but formidable group of lay Anglicans known derogatorily as the CLAPHAM SECT, whose parliamentary spokesman was WILLIAM WILBERFORCE. In this ultimately successful campaign, an interdenominational lay-led Christian movement pitted itself against entrenched economic interests, national policies, deep-seated social conservatism, and, in many cases, clerical complacency.

The third significant strand of lay action came with the massive expansion of the voluntary society system seen in Britain and America during the Second Evangelical Awakening (see VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES; AWAKENINGS). In both countries during the first three decades of the nineteenth century a host of national and regional societies came into being as an expression of the contemporary concern that EVANGELISM would be ineffective if practical action were not taken to alleviate prominent social ills. As single-issue agencies they addressed a range of serious deficiencies including extreme poverty, PROSTITUTION, exploitive employment practices, and lack of basic education. At all structural levels they used a range of lay talent in a way that permanently transformed expectations concerning the role of the ordinary church member. In America, building on Calvinist ideas derived from JONATHAN EDWARDS and SAMUEL HOPKINS as well as more general considerations of the nature of virtue, the influential evangelist CHARLES FINNEY taught a generation of converts to believe that the sincerity of their Christian conversion would prove itself in subsequent commitment to practical "benevolence."

Church Administration

Increasingly, involvement in the wider moral and practical issues of society led to a desire for a greater say in the administration of the church. The growth of this desire accompanied both extensions to the political franchise and the development of universal systems of education across the Western world. At the level of civic and political leadership, interference by the laity in the affairs of the church was as old as Christendom. Nor did this change with the coming of the Reformation. Not only did Luther base his defiance of Rome on the baptized status of his princely supporters, and Zwingli require the consent of the Zürich burghers to introduce his Sixty-Seven Articles of religion, but also Calvin, as a second generation reformer, still found himself circumscribed in important ecclesiastical matters by what the city councils in Geneva were prepared to allow. In general, territorial Protestant churches had to accept their livings and pulpits being treated as tools of the social and political hierarchy, and the funds necessary for the maintenance of church and ministry being subjected to lay depredations and meanness. In the Reformed churches from the outset elders cooperated with the clergy in ecclesiastical government but, even if that eldership can be regarded as part of the laity, its presence within the higher courts until comparatively modern times was scarcely representative of the general membership.

By the nineteenth century lay ambitions began to extend beyond control of the church for selfish or essentially secular purposes. Nonordained members increasingly sought an active voice in policy determination and administration. Among the nonterritorial connexional churches the process of change was set in motion by the small Methodist New Connexion established in 1797, which, more than half a century before the mainstream Methodist denominations in either America or Britain, insisted that at every level its governing bodies should be composed of equal numbers of ministers and lay representatives, the latter being chosen freely by the membership. Within the bodies constituting the Anglican Communion the initiative was seized most boldly by the Church of Ireland, which from its unsought disestablishment in 1869 created a General Synod composed of twice as many lay as clerical representatives. Elsewhere within the Episcopal communion lay representation proceeded more cautiously. The mother church acquired a properly constituted House of Laity only in 1919 with the passing of parliamentary legislation that created a National Assembly for the Church of England.

Overseas Missions

In one final aspect the nineteenth century was to prove decisive for the laity: the expansion of the faith into parts of the world not previously exposed to Christianity. Protestant overseas interest had begun a century earlier with the establishment of Pietist and MORAVIAN CHURCH missionary groups in places as widely separated as Tranquebar, Surinam, and Georgia. The main phase of missionary growth commenced with the founding of a wave of new societies in Britain and America during the Second Evangelical Awakening. One of the earliest, the London Missionary Society, launched its South Seas operations using lay personnel from a predominantly artisan background but as the movement developed the general focus shifted toward a requirement for college or seminary training linked to ordination. Not until the rise of specialized medical MISSIONS after 1843 did absolute clerical dominance begin to lessen. As medicine became professionalized, staff in the new missionary hospitals became increasingly unwilling to defer to nonmedical missionaries whose principal claim to leadership was the possession of ordination. By the end of the century lay participation had been broadened still further by the appearance of female doctors and by the widening of the professional presence within missionary ranks to include teachers, engineers, and other young people drawn from the burgeoning student volunteer movement. Through the subsequent influence of ecumenical cooperation this trend toward a full and active role for the laity has become a permanent feature of modern international Christianity.

Controversy: Absence of Major Conflict

Over the centuries few important aspects of THEOLOGY or ECCLESIOLOGY have remained untouched by disagreement. History is littered with religious debates that have proved serious and intractable. Yet, at first sight, the developing theory of the laity seems to offer a notable exception. Since the Reformation there have been no disputes in this area to match the divisiveness of the Sacramentarian Controversy between Luther and Zwingli. There has been nothing to approach the deep philosophical differences of the Deist debate within early Hanoverian Anglicanism, or the hatred that characterized the Fundamentalist-Modernist struggle in early twentieth-century America. Nevertheless until comparatively modern times the doctrine of the laity has afforded one of the most fertile breeding grounds within Protestantism for low-level tensions and undercurrents. In most cases the hostility generated has been limited to ridicule, polemical over-statement, and manipulation of influence. However, in one notorious period, that of the English Restoration, those who wielded ecclesiastical power applied a policy of penal legislation and imprisonment. During the reign of Charles II one of the most famous lay preachers of the seventeenth century, JOHN BUNYAN, spent much of the period 1660 to 1672 incarcerated in a Bedford jail. The same years also witnessed the deaths of perhaps as many as 450 Quakers. In parts of Germany and in SWEDEN, where Lutheran ORTHODOXY was strong, the early eighteenth century saw a similar if less severe pattern of repression and expulsion directed at groups of lower-class laypeople who sought to practice their own biblically based understanding of the Christian community. Although the punishments meted out in Restoration England, as later in Germany, stemmed from the unacceptability of religious DISSENT, the changing character of lay religion constituted an additional factor. The more the issue was debated, the more it exposed the complex relationship that existed between clergy, laity, institutional church, and Christian society. The debate ceased to have meaning only when organized Christianity was compelled for the sake of survival to come to terms with the secular, pluralist, and democratic forces of the new industrial age (see INDUSTRIALIZATION).

Hermeneutical Debate

Almost every historical dispute about the role of the laity has resorted at some point to New Testament hermeneutics. Not only did Luther justify his opposition to the Roman hierarchy in August 1520 with a general denial of scriptural support for its exclusivist pretensions and an appeal to the Petrine text concerning the royal priesthood, but also in his later tract entitled The Freedom of a Christian he expounded more fully the scriptural obligations laid on the individual believer. The Christian was both the perfectly free lord of all, who was subject to no other person, and at the same time the servant of all, who was, therefore, subject to everyone. Referring to various Pauline passages, Luther argued that the believer's kingly freedom belonged like his priesthood to the spiritual sphere and consequently did not impinge on the province of kings, princes, and those set in positions of civil authority. Nor did the functions of true Christian priesthood—"to pray for others and to teach one another divine things"—trespass on the rights of the so-called clergy. Such titles as "priest," "cleric," "spiritual," "ecclesiastic," when they were erroneously applied to a minority within the Christian community, were manifestly unscriptural. The New Testament terms for the Christian leadership—"ministers," "servants," "stewards" (cf. I Corinthians 4:1)—all indicated a differentiation based on function rather than status. Although Luther's argument struck deep roots within Protestantism, some aspects of the medieval division between clergy and laity remained, and subsequent adjustments to this mode of thinking prompted further reference to the biblical text. As late as the nineteenth century opponents of lay evangelism argued from the Acts of the Apostles and the Pastoral Epistles for the absolute necessity of ordination. By way of contrast, those who advocated greater freedom in the deployment of lay personnel pointed to other scriptural passages that seemed to indicate the primary importance of spiritual gifts. As a means of resolving debates, appeals to scripture tended to be inconclusive and merely served to reinforce existing prejudices. Resolution came if anything from more practical considerations such as the need to bring greater flexibility into the ministry of the church.

Social Conservatism

Behind the allegedly scriptural resistance to an active laity there often lay considerable social conservatism: a concern that laypeople who found an independent voice would threaten the natural hierarchy based on birth, education, and wealth. Luther appears not to have been concerned about this possibility because of the clear distinction he drew between the Christian's spiritual realm and the temporal sphere where the normal conventions of social leadership operated; however, later spokesmen for mainstream Protestantism were not so sanguine. To the Lutheran consistorial authorities of the Electorate of Hanover during the 1730s the groups of radical Pietists, who publicly criticized their establishment pastors, blaming them for a lack of humility and brotherly love, and depicting them as spiritually unregenerate, far exceeded the liberty allowed by Luther's priesthood of all believers. The bounding self-confidence of these lower-class laymen offended the Lutheran hierarchy, eliciting condemnation and repression. Their popular restiveness also spilled over into the civil sphere where they found themselves in many cases struggling against their employers.

In Britain the public ministry of Methodists and other unauthorized lay preachers and catechists aroused the indignation and fury of those who sought to defend eighteenth-century patterns of deference. The interlopers were seen as manifestly unsuited to their self-appointed religious tasks, a point that often seemed to be supported by their relatively humble origins. Drawn predominantly from the ranks of tradesmen, they lacked significant education and were, their critics argued, forced to rely on a dangerous mixture of novelty and anticlericalism to attract attention. The parish clergy by contrast were trained in scriptural exegesis and the biblical languages and were charged with the welfare of every person within their bounds. The natural alliance between landowner and resident clergyman was seen to place the temporal and spiritual care of the general population into the hands of those whose social position best fitted them to offer sound leadership.

In the spread of American popular religion during the same period the challenge to existing social conventions was extended still further by the issues of GENDER and race. The appearance of women in unauthorized leadership roles from the 1750s onward by no means proved generally acceptable, even among the independent churches to which many belonged. Some were seen as troublemakers: their work appeared to lead to scandal and division. Although many were praised for the quality of their prayers and testimonies, even at times by ordained clergymen, ambivalence remained. Despite the existence of considerable numbers of female preachers and exhorters at the end of the eighteenth century, the trend in the infant republic was away from female leadership. Similar problems arose in connection with race. In the context of reviving economic fortunes for the institution of slavery, the American churches in the pre-Civil War period enshrined leadership values that, although softening the old rigid boundary between clergy and laity, nevertheless reflected the contemporary secular focus on citizenship as something essentially white and Anglo-Saxon.

Political Fears

At certain strategic points in modern history the continuance of a stable Christian society has appeared to be threatened politically by the activities of the laity. In Luther's reforming career that point was reached very quickly. As early as the period of concealment in the Wartburg after the Diet of Worms it became obvious that some of his followers were steering the ecclesiastical reforms in dangerous directions. Armed rioting took place in Wittenberg in December 1521 in an attempt to enforce the new practices. Subsequent acts of ICONOCLASM coincided with the arrival of a group of lay prophets from Zwickau who claimed direct inspiration by the Holy Spirit and preached about the coming millennium. When Luther realized that these developments were threatening the stability of the infant reform process and were compromising the position of his own protector, the elector Frederick, he emerged from hiding and sought to end the violence. Part of the reason, however, for the success of Luther's church-reforming message lay in its resonance with deeper political aspirations among the German populace. Although he was able to calm the immediate circumstances in Wittenberg, he was powerless to stop the spreading wave of political unrest over the following months. He could neither restrain the maverick clergyman THOMAS MÜNTZER, who used apocalyptic passages from scripture to incite popular revolution, nor could he prevent a gathering such as the "Parliament" at Memmingen from incorporating biblical ideas into the Twelve Articles of the Swabian Peasants, which it issued in March 1525 against the unreasonable exactions of the landowners. When gentle rebuke failed, Luther resorted to a violent condemnation of the mounting popular rebellion in his notorious tract Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants. With the appearance of this work in May 1525 calling for draconian measures by rulers, even by those who would not "tolerate the gospel," he acknowledged the political dangers implicit in the popular appropriation of religious ideas and drew a veil of silence over his own earlier emphasis on the laity.

Later crises tended to revive this specter of the politicized layman. During the English Interregnum of the 1640s and 1650s the agents of several independent sects promulgated their innovatory ideas, challenging what remained of political stability in the wake of the Civil Wars (see CIVIL WAR, ENGLAND). Even in the comparatively tolerant climate created by Cromwell, where alternative religious ideas and lay initiative were able to flourish and there was an absence of strong clerical supervision, the behavior of groups such as the LEVELLERS and Fifth Monarchists was treated as being subversive of an orderly Christian society. With the return of the monarchy and the established church at the Restoration any such opportunity for lay improvisation disappeared entirely.

In Britain the FRENCH REVOLUTION and the threat of invasion produced one final period of tension in which the religious activities of laymen again aroused in establishment minds the fear of political machinations. Given the ideological potency of republicanism and the apparent willingness of Revolutionary FRANCE to export its values and institutions, the apparent threat was all too credible. The unfortunate individuals who were tried and punished for taking part in secular republican gatherings and demonstrations seemed to many church leaders in the 1790s to have their counterparts in the wave of unknown individuals who at much the same time began to conduct religious meetings in barns and cottages, to organize children into unauthorized Sunday schools, and to penetrate even the remotest villages. For a year or two political paranoia gripped the bench of English bishops as well as the General Assembly of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND but, when the leading politicians declined to act and the threat of invasion began to recede, this final political crisis involving the laity evaporated.

Heterodoxy and Ecclesiastical Order

The other major area in which arguments arose was that of religious belief and order. In the eighteenth century accusations against the laity ranged from heterodoxy to enthusiasm, but the latter caused particular concern to those who espoused the values of the ENLIGHTENMENT. With the decline of interest in formal theology the charge of heterodoxy was not widely employed against the emerging laity, but in orthodox LUTHERANISM the older preoccupations seem to have lingered longer than elsewhere. In a catalog of heresies compiled and published by Samuel Schelwig, a senior clergyman at Dantzic, the erroneous teachings of the Pietists, both moderate and radical, clerical and lay, were classified in the clear conviction that they formed a natural and interdependent corpus of error. More common, however, was the offense caused to contemporary clerical sensibilities by the pretensions of the new generation of publicly active laymen to "an extraordinary measure of the Holy Spirit's influence." To most critical observers of the evangelical Awakenings the dangerous and unseemly combination of enthusiasm and the uneducated mind was the inevitable outcome of laxity in the official control of popular religion.

Whereas the concept of ministry inherited from the medieval church centered on the sacraments, Protestantism was altogether more equivocal, emphasizing from the outset the fundamental importance of preaching. Traditionally the Christian sacraments had conveyed a powerful sense of mystery. Their celebration by the clergy had been surrounded by a mystique that was inseparably connected with ordination. Preaching by contrast belonged to the realm of explanation and understanding, and as such was accessible to clergy and laity alike. The Protestant flexing of lay muscles in areas such as group leadership, exhortation, catechizing, and even preaching itself raised serious questions about the nature and distinctness of the church's ministry. Few if any of those who favored these developments wanted to see unsupervised activity; most emphasized the importance of careful selection based on the requisite spiritual and moral qualities as well as the recognition of God-given abilities. However, for those sections of Protestant opinion that were closest to the Catholic traditions of the past, any widening of the ministry to include individuals who lacked regular ordination endangered their belief in the sacramental basis of Christianity. Such actions threatened the unity of the church and raised the destructive possibility of schism. In practice mere encroachment on clerical prerogatives did not give rise to serious and lasting divisions within Protestantism. When schism came to a number of established churches in the nineteenth century its causes lay in the growing secularism and indifference of the modern state.

Rejection of the Clergy

One important response to changing circumstances was the development of entirely lay movements such as the Brethren, which—like the Quakers before them—rejected the concept of a professional and ordained ministry. The Brethren appeared in the late 1820s as a breakaway from Irish Episcopalianism. In their early polemic they accused the Irish clergy of opposing the work of God by refusing to work with laymen in the task of EVANGELISM. As an alternative to the complex structures of the traditional church, the new movement embraced a primitivist ecclesiology in a conscious attempt to re-create the forms of worship and relationship found in the New Testament. Yet even this restorationist approach was not immune from the natural tendencies toward elitism that the need for leadership encouraged. After the movement split into two wings in 1848, the Exclusive Brethren developed a structure that allowed for collective decision making at the level of the local assembly but at the same time looked to guidance from a leader who achieved overall prominence within the movement. Ultimately this led the Exclusives into the dictatorial period of leadership under James Taylor Jr. during the 1960s. Although the movement as a whole, both in Europe and America, resisted such blatant distortions of the democratic impulse, it relied on a system of eldership that, especially in its most developed form within the Churches of God, subordinated the original concern for the priesthood of all believers to the needs of a nonordained but nevertheless self-perpetuating oligarchy.

The Laity in Modern Protestantism

In the changing ecclesiastical landscape of the present day one of the most significant features affecting almost all traditional denominations is the general decline apparent in vocations to the ordained ministry. In some of the longer-established bodies the shortage of clergy is beginning to threaten the future viability of congregations and to prompt both the pooling of ministerial expertise and the creation of permanent teams that combine lay talent of various types with that of ordained personnel. In some of the youngest and most rapidly growing churches the scarcity of trained ministers has reached the point where it threatens the ability to teach converts effectively.

Elsewhere in modern Protestantism other factors are eroding the traditional importance of the clergy. Within America's vast Southern Baptist community the theological emphasis on "soul competency" and belief in the spiritual autonomy of the individual has produced a climate where the Christian believer stands essentially alone in his relationship to God. The implications of this spiritual INDIVIDUALISM are various and far-reaching. Not only has the scriptural doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, with its appreciation of the corporate action of the Christian community, metamorphosed into the strikingly different concept of the "priesthood of the believer," but important challenges to ecclesiology have also ensued. The rise of the self-sufficient soul has been accompanied by a rejection of any form of mediation, whether human or divine. The new outlook has little place for a ministry concerned with anything beyond preaching and its related functions; nor are the corporate intercessions of the church given the importance once assigned to them. Most serious of all has been its challenge to historical orthodoxy in the practical relegation of Christ from his unique role as the mediator between man and God. In this strikingly individualistic vision of Christianity the lay believer seems finally to have come of age.

Since the 1960s the existence of the Charismatic Movement has appeared to challenge the hitherto subordinate position of the laity. Just as the moving frontier of charismatic practice has militated against other ecclesiastical conventions, so the centrality of the individual's encounter with the Holy Spirit seems to have rendered customary distinctions between clergy and laity irrelevant. Yet analysis of the movement by no means supports this conclusion. Although the charismatic approach has dramatically widened participation in worship and ministry, there is little evidence to suggest that professional leadership has declined in importance. On the contrary, the movement is well known for its propensity to throw up strong leadership figures who enjoy among their following an authority that is virtually episcopal. Charismatic worship may have given greater scope to the laity but any fundamental change to their status is probably more imaginary than real.

What then does the future hold for the laity? In an age when secondary education is almost universal and large numbers of citizens have access to university, the effect on the church is necessarily profound. Within its ranks the clergy no longer constitute the principal repository of educated opinion and this in itself raises important questions about the lay-clerical relationship. No longer can it be assumed that the leadership of the church is better equipped or more able than the general membership. Even in respect of theological expertise educated lay opinion is making an important contribution to many congregations. Although these trends are clear and the former state of impotence has disappeared for good, the nonordained majority of believers seems likely to retain its differentiation from the ordained leadership for as long as organized Christianity exists.

See also Ecumenism; Education, Theology: Europe/ United States/Asia; Higher Education; Missionary Organizations

References and Further Reading

- Bulley, C. The Priesthood of Some Believers: Developments from the General to the Special Priesthood in the Christian Literature of the First Three Centuries. Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 2000.
- Christensen, Michael J. and Carl E. Savage. Equipping the Saints: Mobilizing Laity for Ministry. Nashville: Abingdon Press, 2000.
- Eastwood, C. The Royal Priesthood of the Faithful: An Investigation of the Doctrine from Biblical Times to the Reformation. London: Epworth, 1963.
- . The Priesthood of All Believers: An Examination of the Doctrine from the Reformation to the Present Day. London: Epworth, 1960.
- Jacob, W.M. Lay People and Religion in the Early Eighteenth Century. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Laici in ecclesia. An ecumenical bibliography on the role of the laity in the life and mission of the church*. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1961.
- Lovegrove, D.W., ed. The Rise of the Laity in Evangelical Protestantism. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Weber, Hans Ruedi. Living in the Image of Christ: The Laity in Ministry. Geneva: WCC Publications, 1986.

DERYCK W. LOVEGROVE

LAMBETH CONFERENCE

The Lambeth Conference is an international conference of the bishops of the Anglican Communion that meets approximately every ten years. The first such conference was called by Archbishop C.T. Longley, the archbishop of Canterbury, in 1867, and met at Lambeth Palace, the London residence of the archbishop, from which the conference takes its name. The 1867 conference included seventy-six Anglican bishops principally from ENGLAND, IRELAND, CANADA, and the UNITED STATES.

The desire for establishing the conference first emerged in North America more than a decade before the first meeting. The original impetus for such a conference came from the need for regular consultation among the bishops of an increasingly diverse, international church with very little centralized AUTHORITY. Before such a conference could be organized, the Canadian bishops appealed to the archbishop of Canterbury to convene the bishops to deal with the crisis precipitated by Bishop JOHN WILLIAM COLENZO, an English priest who had been appointed bishop of Natal. Serious concern developed over what was perceived to be the laxity with which Colenso dealt with ecclesiastical discipline in the cultural context of Natal, especially with respect to DIVORCE in a polygamist CULTURE (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). Colenso's critical biblical scholarship also made many uneasy. Attempts to establish the conference as an Anglican magisterial authority to establish and judge the DOCTRINE and practice of the member churches met with strong opposition, however, and the conference adjourned after only four days.

A second conference was held in 1878, and a third conference met in 1888 at the call of Archbishop Edward White Benson. This third conference focused its conversations largely on matters of church unity both within ANGLICANISM and with respect to Anglicanism's role in the reunion of the churches. The major document that emerged from the 1888 conference is the LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL, more generally referred to as the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral, one of the defining documents in the history of Anglicanism.

The four articles were first formulated and agreed upon by the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States (see EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES) meeting in Chicago in 1886, and were slightly revised and promulgated by the bishops at Lambeth two years later. The articles set forth the Anglican-Episcopal position on the nonnegotiable requirements for church union: "(1) The Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, as containing all things necessary to salvation, and as being the rule and ultimate standard of faith; (2) the Apostles' Creed, as the Baptismal Symbol; and the Nicene Creed, as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith; (3) the two Sacraments ordained by Christ Himself—Baptism and the Supper of the Lord—ministered with unfailing use of Christ's Words of Institution, and of the elements ordained by Him; (4) the Historical Episcopate, locally adapted in the methods of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the Unity of His Church." The Quadrilateral remains the definitive Anglican position statement with respect to ecumenical conversations (see ECUMENISM; DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL).

Church unity was among the major topics of consultation at all succeeding conferences to the present day. The early conferences of the twentieth century (1908, 1920, 1930) generally engaged the topic from the perspective of Anglicanism's role in world Christianity, while more recent conferences have been concerned with the unity of Anglicanism itself. Social issues began to take center stage in the conferences that followed World War II. MARRIAGE and Divorce, family planning, racism, WAR and peace, women's ordination (see WOMEN CLERGY), and SEXUALITY, particularly HOMOSEXUALITY, have been among the major issues considered.

A particularly important Lambeth Conference was that of 1968 when, in the wake of the Second Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic Church, the world's Anglican bishops turned their attention to the renewal of the life and faith of the church and to new initiatives in ecumenical relations. By 1968, the number of bishops at the conference had grown to 462. Among the more important initiatives of the meeting was the establishment of the Anglican Consultative Council, a representative body of BISHOPS, CLERGY, and lay persons from the member churches of the Anglican Communion that acts as a source of communication, consultation, and mutual support among Anglicans worldwide.

The Anglican Communion is composed of 38 self-governing churches that share a common Anglican heritage and recognize the archbishop of Canterbury as the symbol of its unity. Because the member churches of the Anglican Communion are fully autonomous and have the full authority to establish their own WORSHIP, doctrine, and canon law, the Lambeth Conference, the Anglican Consultative Council, and the archbishop of Canterbury serve as important sources of Anglican unity but have no legislative or executive authority to exercise over member churches. Resolutions and decisions of the Lambeth Conference are not binding on the member churches of the Communion, but are generally received as having significant moral and spiritual weight, because they originate from the bishops of the church.

A total of 749 bishops attended the 1998 Lambeth Conference. Although many important topics were before the assembly, the conference was deeply divided over issues of human sexuality. This conference also represented a turning point in the makeup of the Anglican Communion because of the large number of bishops from parts of the world other than Western Europe and North America. Reflecting the evolving realities of the Anglican Communion is a proposal that the 2008 Lambeth Conference be held not in England, but in Cape Town, South Africa, in conjunction with an international Anglican Gathering of clergy and laity.

References and Further Reading

Lytle, G.F. Lambeth Conferences Past and Present. Austin, TX: Historical Society of the Episcopal Church, 1989.

Stephenson, A.M.G. Anglicanism and the Lambeth Conferences. London: SPCK, 1978.

J.NEIL ALEXANDER

LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL

Part of the LAMBETH CONFERENCES, the periodic meetings of the bishops of the Anglican Church, the term refers specifically to the statement endorsed by the conference of the bishops of the Anglican Communion, held at Lambeth (the official residence of the archbishop of Canterbury in London) in 1888. At that conference the Anglican involvements in conversations with other churches about possible fellowship and union were discussed. A statement made two years earlier by the convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in North America was adopted in revised form and is known as the Lambeth Quadrilateral. It expressed the fundamental commitments of the Anglican Church under four headings. The Scriptures of the Old and the New Testament are declared to contain everything necessary for salvation and declared the rule and standard of the faith. The Apostles Creed and the Nicene Creed are affirmed as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith. Two sacraments are affirmed—baptism and the Lord's Supper—accompanied by the words of institution and the elements of water, bread, and wine. Finally, the Lambeth Quadrilateral affirmed the historic episcopacy, that is, the unbroken succession of bishops from apostolic times to the present, albeit with the proviso that there may be local adaptations of how this historic succession is expressed.

See also Anglicanism

References and Further Reading

- Communion and Episcopacy: Essays to Mark the Centenary of the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral*. Oxford, UK: Ripon College Cuddesdon, 1988.
- Haskell, C.W. (Charles Williams). The Plan and the Lambeth Quadrilateral. Nelson: Selwyn Publications, 1973.
- Morris, Edwin (Alfred Edwin). The Lambeth Quadrilateral and Reunion. [London]: Faith Press, 1969.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

LASKI, JAN (JOANNES A LASCO, JOHN A LASCO) (1499–1560)

Religious reformer. Laski was born in 1499 to an aristocratic family in POLAND. His father Stanislas was palatine of Sieradz, while his uncle Jan was chancellor, archbishop of Gniezno, and primate of Poland. Destined to occupy a high position in the clerical hierarchy—his uncle obtained numerous advantages for him—Laski studied in Bologna between 1515 and 1518, and in Padova between 1518 and 1519. In 1524 he stayed in Paris and in 1525 traveled to Basel, where he came to know the philosopher Erasmus of Rotterdam. Erasmus exerted a great influence on Laski who helped him materially and even purchased his library, which he gave to Erasmus for lifelong use.

After his return to Poland in summer 1526, Laski occupied clerical positions. At that time he became close to the reformer PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, whom he met in April 1537.

In the second half of 1539 he left Poland, probably disaffected with Catholicism. During a stay in Louvain he approached the Brethren of the Common Life. Early in 1540 he married and moved to Emden in Eastern Friesland. The news about his MARRIAGE quickly reached Poland and led to his forced resignation from his clerical functions (see CLERGY, MARRIAGE OF). He returned to Poland in 1542 because of his brother's terminal illness, and on February 6 he abjured his Protestant beliefs. As a result, he was restored to his clerical functions. However, in May 1542 Laski returned to Friesland, definitively ending his relation with the Catholic Church. Probably his abjuration was a tactical maneuver that enabled him to take care of his interests in Poland.

In 1543 Laski was appointed head of the Eastern churches that were reorganized in the Reformed mode. At that time he gave evidence of his organizational skills and his irenic attitude toward MENNONITES and Spiritualists (see SPIRITUALISM).

In London King Edward VI appointed Laski super-intendent of the churches of foreign communities, the latter being organizationally independent from the English churches. The development of this well-organized and managed international community came to an end with the death of Edward VI and the effort to reinstitute Catholicism in ENGLAND by Mary Tudor. The adherents of the foreign church—including Laski—were expelled from England and left in September 1553.

Whereas in DENMARK exiles were not given asylum because of the resistance of orthodox Lutherans, Laski managed to obtain asylum in Eastern Friesland. He again obtained his old office as superintendent, although his position was unstable because of Spanish pressures on one side and the attacks of orthodox Lutherans on the other. Laski was finally dismissed and left for Frankfurt am Main in 1555, where many English exiles resided. Here Laski vigorously quarreled with Lutherans, particularly with Joachim Westphal. In Frankfurt he published one of his main works: Forma ac ratio tota ecclesiastici ministerii in peregrinorum...ecclesia, instituta Londini in Anglia..., 1555 (The Form and Principle of the Ecclesiastic Service in the Church for Foreigners Established in London, England).

Invited to return to Poland by the leaders of the Calvinist church being established there, Laski arrived on December 3, 1556. Realizing that King Sigmund August did not actively support reform, Laski wanted to unify all Polish Protestants in order to efficiently oppose Catholicism. He counted on a victory during the next national diet to persuade the king to establish Protestantism formally as the religion in Poland.

His intentions were not realized because of the resistance of both Lutherans and the Czech Brethren to his unification plan and because of the lack of visible threats to the Reformed confession in Poland. Finally Laski's stay in Poland was too short to have enabled him to have a great impact. Laski died on January 8, 1560.

Laski was the only Polish figure of lasting significance in the history of the classical REFORMATION. Outstanding organizer, practical theologian, and efficient polemicist, he enjoyed the esteem and friendship of the leaders of the European Reformation, such as MARTIN BUCER, THOMAS CRANMER, JOHN CALVIN, and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON.

See also Calvinism; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Church of England; Lutheranism;

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Lasco, Joannes a. Opera tam edita quam inedita. Edited by Abraham Kuyper. T I-II. Amsterdam: Frederic. Muller: 1866.

Secondary Sources:

Bartel, Oskar. Jan Laski. Berlin: 1981.

Dalton, Hermann. John a Lasco. His Earlier Life and Labours: A Contribution to the History of Reformation in Poland, Germany and England. London: 1886.

Hall, Basil. John a Lasco 1499–1560. A Pole in Reformation England. London: 1971.

Kowalska, Halina. Działalność reformatorska Jana Laskiego w Polsce 1556–1560 (Jan Laski's Activity in Poland 1556–1560). Warsaw: 1999.

Rodgers, Dirk Wayne. John a Lasco in England. New York: Peter Lang, 1994.

LECH SZCZUCKI

LATIMER, HUGH (C.1485–1555)

English reformer. Latimer, a leading figure of the English Reformation, is best known not so much for his theological writings but for the sermons he preached between his CONVERSION to the Protestant cause around 1524 and his martyrdom in 1555. Latimer was born at Thurcaston in Leicestershire, the son of a yeoman farmer, and the plight of that class became a topic of his later sermons. Trained at Cambridge and ordained in 1515, Latimer was initially opposed to Lutheran ideas. Under the influence of Thomas Bilney, however, Latimer was converted around 1524 to the Protestant cause and began PREACHING in support of an English BIBLE and against the veneration of the SAINTS.

Latimer's fortunes over the next two decades rose and fell with the changing religious and political landscape in England. He was appointed bishop of Worcester in 1535 but had to resign in 1539. After the death of HENRY VIII in 1547 Latimer returned to prominence as a preacher at the court of Edward VI until 1550. Many of his best-known sermons stem from this period, during which Latimer also took a more distinctly Protestant position on matters of DOCTRINE, rejecting TRANSUBSTANTIATION in 1548. Latimer's lifelong interest in social welfare and economic injustice surfaced again in his later sermons, for which he has been counted among the "commonwealth" thinkers of his generation in ENGLAND. After the accession of Queen Mary, a Catholic, in 1553, Latimer became a target of the new regime and in 1555 was burned at the stake along with Nicholas Ridley. Immortalized by JOHN FOXE for his martyrdom, Latimer is widely acknowledged as the foremost preacher of his generation in the English Reformation.

See also Acts and Monuments; Bible Translation; Martyrs and Martyrologies

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Corrie, G.E. The Works of Hugh Latimer (1844–1845). Reprint, New York, Cambridge, UK: Printed at The University Press, 1144–45:1968.

Secondary Sources:

Chester, A.G. Hugh Latimer. Reprint, New York: Octagon Books, 1978.

Loades, David. The Oxford Martyrs. London: B.T.Batsford, 1970.

DEBORAH K.MARCUSE

LATIN AMERICA

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, the religiosity of Latin America was in flux. The Catholic monopoly of colonial and early postindependence times, and even the secure hegemony of the early twentieth century, were under threat in most countries. The traditional Catholic claim to be an essential part of Latin American identity had lost plausibility as pluralism increased and Protestantism became deep-rooted. Catholic structures were too tied to a rural Christendom mentality. The chronic shortage of national priests in most countries highlighted the gap between “official” churchly Catholicism and “popular” or “folk” Catholicism. LIBERATION THEOLOGY and Base Communities were important from the 1960s to 1980s but were then overtaken by phenomena such as the Catholic Charismatic Renewal. In many countries Afro-Latin American religions (far from limited to blacks) or revived indigenous Amerindian religions also competed for followers, whereas the main new phenomenon among the middle-class was esoterical and extrainstitutional.

In this context Protestantism rose to prominence, marked by a strongly “oppositional” identity in relation to Catholicism (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). It had entered Latin America in the nineteenth century as an effectively sectarian variant of the dominant religion, but in tandem with the political and economic liberalism brought by the Anglo-Saxon powers. Except in BRAZIL, growth was slow until the mid-twentieth century, but by the 1980s it was possible to talk of a regionwide phenomenon, attracting the interest of academics, the concern of Catholic hierarchs, and the puzzlement of the media.

In colonial times Protestantism was excluded from Spanish and Portuguese America by the Inquisition. The exceptions were temporary: failed colonization projects, whether reluctantly tolerated by the Iberian powers (German Lutherans in Venezuela from 1529 to 1546, linked to Spanish indebtedness to the Welser banking house) or in opposition to them (French HUGUENOTS in Rio de Janeiro, 1555–1567; the Dutch in North-Eastern Brazil, 1624–1654); and the occasional presence of individual Protestant laymen (pirates, merchants). A permanent presence was established only around or after independence in the early nineteenth century.

The first tolerated Protestant communities were composed of foreigners linked to the commercial interests of Protestant countries. To break the closed colonial system Britain had supported independence and made commercial treaties with the new republics (or, in Brazil, initially with the exiled Portuguese monarchy), which included freedom of WORSHIP for its citizens. Anglican churches were built in Rio de Janeiro in 1819 and in Buenos Aires in 1825.

More important than these tiny trading communities were the Protestant immigrants who arrived in several countries from the 1820s. Immigration as a means of peopling territories and Protestant immigration as a means of bringing progress and weakening Catholic political power were defended by liberal anticlerical elites. Brazil, the Southern Cone, and Costa Rica received such immigrants; the largest group were the German Lutherans of southern Brazil. Although Latin American constitutions still recognized Catholicism, Protestant churches could not have the external appearance of a temple and their services could not be in the vernacular. The religious impact of immigrants was therefore minimal, but their presence created a precedent that later helped the introduction of missionary churches. Although immigrant churches now represent a small minority of Protestants in Latin America, they are still important in areas such as southern Brazil; now using the national language and sometimes attracting members from outside their ethnic group (see ETHNICITY), they contribute to the Protestant world with their solid institutions.

The first Protestant organizations to see Latin America as a mission field were the BIBLE SOCIETIES. The creation of mission churches was often preceded by circulation of the Scriptures; sometimes churches were founded autonomously, before the arrival of missionaries. The colporteur (itinerant Bible-seller) sometimes made no attempt at founding churches; mere BIBLE distribution was either seen as all that was politically possible, or was a strategy aimed at a reformation of the national church, with separation from Rome and doctrinal reform. Colporteurs were often initially well received by elites and even Catholic clergy, but this changed as the nineteenth century wore on.

Churches for Latin Americans appeared only from the 1850s onward, as a late fruit of the worldwide Protestant missionary effort. The delay was partly attributed to the legally dubious status of such churches, and also to the feeling among some Protestant sectors that Latin America had already been Christianized. Even at the famous MISSIONS conference at Edinburgh in 1910 (see WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE), the region was regarded as off-limits. (The reply to this was a congress in Panama in 1916, which defended the validity of Protestant missions in Latin America and planned their advance.) Thus, most missions were not European but American, and were linked to the PIETISM of FRONTIER RELIGION in the UNITED STATES. Denominations from the U.S. South predominated: revivalist, anti-intellectualist, and individualist. Protestant missions have often been regarded as carriers of a liberal critique of traditional Latin society, associated with Anglo-American economic interests and a civilizing pathos. However, some missionaries defended the rights of Latin American countries, as in the Mexican Revolution; and the belief that Protestantism meant EDUCATION and progress was common to many liberals among the Latin American elites. Protestants allied with liberals and Freemasons in many countries to gain freedom of religion and diminish Catholic political power.

The relative intellectual poverty of the missions made it difficult to win converts among the elite, even though many put their children in the considerable number of Protestant schools that sprang up (often with educational methods that were innovative in the region).

In Brazil the first Protestant church (Congregational) using Portuguese was opened in 1855. Presbyterians (1859), Methodists (1867), and BAPTISTS (1882) followed (see BAPTIST MISSIONS). Presbyterian work in Spanish began in Chile in 1868 (see PRESBYTERIANISM); METHODISM reached Argentina by 1867. Protestantism was only effectively introduced to Bolivia and Ecuador after the liberals gained power in the 1890s. As late as 1900 the only denomination working in Colombia were the Presbyterians. In Nicaragua, although the Moravians had worked on the Atlantic Coast among indigenous and blacks since 1847 (see MORAVIAN CHURCH), the rest of the country saw Protestant churches only after the liberals took power in 1894.

In a few countries liberal governments went further than TOLERATION. To restrict the enormous influence of the Catholic Church, the Juárez government in Mexico went beyond anticlericalism and encouraged a religious revolution in the 1860s, at first by supporting an independent national church and then by encouraging Protestant missions and Mexican non-Catholic groups. In Guatemala the first missionaries from the United States were invited and escorted by the president in 1882. They were showered with privileges, but growth was slow.

Historical Protestantism (as the first mission churches are known) remained distant from the masses and achieved modest success only in Brazil. Protestantism became truly “popular” (numerically successful among the lower classes) only with the advent of PENTECOSTALISM. The rapid international expansion of pentecostalism was attributed to American missionaries in contact with home, and immigrants in the United States in contact with their homelands and with compatriots elsewhere. Chile, MEXICO, and Brazil illustrate these routes.

In 1907 a Methodist missionary in Chile, informed of the novelty by friends in the States and elsewhere, began to teach pentecostal DOCTRINE. His followers were expelled from the Methodist Church two years later and founded a denomination that later became Chile’s largest Protestant group. The same year saw conversions in Argentina through an Italian artisan from Chicago. In Brazil the same man inaugurated in 1910 the Christian Congregation among Italians in São Paulo. The early 1910s saw beginnings in Central America (through independent U.S. or Canadian missionaries) and in Mexico (partly by returning emigrants). The remaining republics were slower off the mark, the last being Ecuador (1956). Initial fortunes were modest, but by the 1950s Brazil and Chile had rapid growth, which by the 1980s covered virtually the whole of Latin America.

Latin American pentecostalism today is organized in a huge number of denominations, a few of which originated abroad (such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD), whereas the majority are homegrown (such as Brazil for Christ and the Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, from Brazil; or the Pentecostal Methodist Church and the Pentecostal Evangelical Church in Chile).

Pentecostalism shows regional diversity in denominational composition and degree of nationalization. Brazil’s first historical churches did fairly well, and some bred early movements for autonomy. The subsequent historical/pentecostal divide did not correspond to a missionary/nationalist one, although Chilean historicals never made a serious impact. The pentecostal schism in the Methodist Church of Chile marked the break between missionaries and nationals, between middle class cultural forms and the popular classes. Chilean pentecostalism is accentuatedly national in origin. Chile’s Protestantism is more pentecostal, and its pentecostalism more national, than anywhere else in Latin America.

Peru is different. Pentecostalism is a minority within Protestantism, and only really took off in the 1970s. It is dominated by the Assemblies of God, which resulted from American missionary work.

El Salvador differs again. Its large pentecostalism is divided between two large churches (Assemblies of God [AG] and Church of God) and a plethora of neo-pentecostal groups of American or Guatemalan origin. It was almost totally rural until recently. The main groups illustrate a pattern. The AG’s origins go back to an independent Canadian missionary in the 1910s; the American church took over in 1930. The Church of God began in 1940 by a similar process. This pattern, of groups started by independent missionaries or breakaway nationals later seeking affiliation to a U.S. DENOMINATION, is typical of countries where Protestantism was weak, but is unknown in Chile or Brazil.

The general picture is that most pentecostal churches (unlike historical ones) were founded by Latin Americans or by independent missionaries, and only rarely by a foreign pentecostal denomination. A different phenomenon is that of middle-class pentecostalized groups (known in some countries as “neopentecostals” and in others as “charismatics”). There were charismatic breakaways from historical denominations in the 1960s, although recent Protestant expansion in middle and even upper classes has been mainly attributable to charismatic “communities,” part of an international trend in which traditional denominations lose importance. They have been especially successful in Guatemala. A significant minority of the Guatemalan elite has converted to such churches (whether of U.S. origin, such as the Church of the Word, or local initiatives such as El Shaddai).

In the last decades of the twentieth century, Protestantism (especially in pentecostal forms) made considerable headway among Amerindian peoples in southern Mexico, Central America, and the Andes. Its initial context is often the breakdown of communities. It may deepen existing divisions or create new ones, or it may help to reconstitute community (voluntary, rather than ascribed). It is too early to say what new ecclesiastical and doctrinal forms may emerge from this large-scale adoption of Protestantism by indigenous peoples.

By 2000, Protestantism was the religion of perhaps 12 percent of Latin Americans. In the largest country, Brazil, the 2000 census showed 15.5 percent Protestant; growth in the 1990s had been especially quick. However, the highest percentage is probably in Guatemala (20 percent plus), although growth seems to have stagnated in the 1990s. The 2002 census in Chile showed 15.1 percent Protestant, up from 12.4 percent in 1992. At the other end of the scale, Uruguay is still below 5 percent. The middle range embraces the Andean countries at the top end and Argentina, Mexico, and Colombia at the lower end. David Martin gives as a rule of thumb that Protestantism’s chances of growth have been higher where the Catholic Church was politically weakened by liberalism in the nineteenth century but the culture remained unsecularized. Where secularization took hold, or where the Catholic Church retained great political power, growth has been slower.

Although studies have revealed a considerable number of nonpracticing pentecostals in Chile, in Brazil levels of practice among Protestants remain high (over three-quarters attend church weekly). With variations, one can say that Latin American Protestantism is characterized by being highly practicing and fast-growing, predominantly lower class, and organized in a plethora of nationally run and even nationally created denominations. Perhaps 60 to 70 percent of Latin American Protestants are pentecostals, and this percentage is increasing. Protestantism is most pentecostalized in Chile (perhaps 80 percent) and least in the Andean countries (under half).

In some countries there is still discrimination at certain social levels against Protestants as individuals, as well as legal discrimination against churches. Although official separation of CHURCH AND STATE, effectuated in some countries in the nineteenth century and in others only in the 1990s, is now almost universal (only Bolivia, Argentina, and Costa Rica still have an official religion), there are countries where Protestant churches do not enjoy the same legal rights as the Catholic Church. Even where tolerance and freedom of worship are secure, there is often some way still to go before full equality takes hold in public life and civil society.

In social composition, Protestants in most countries are disproportionately from the poorer, less educated, and darker sectors of society. However, there is growing social diversification (greater presence among, for example, entrepreneurs, sportsmen, artists, and policemen). Membership is predominantly female, although leadership positions are largely male (some pentecostal denominations, however (see WOMEN CLERGY), were founded by WOMEN and accept female pastors). Some recent authors have spoken of pentecostalism's reconciliation of GENDER values that serves the interests of poor women, resocializing men away from machismo.

Another focus of recent study has been the economic effects of CONVERSION. Latin American pentecostalism does not have the classic Protestant work ethic, and operates in a different economic context. Evidence for mobility is scarce, and for a macroeffect on economies, even scarcer (see ECONOMICS). At the individual level, however, the transformative effect on the disorganized lives of many poor (and not so poor) people is evident.

Political involvement by Protestants is not recent (they were disproportionately active in the Mexican Revolution), but since the 1980s this trend has increased, especially with the involvement of many previously apolitical pentecostal denominations. Two Protestant presidents have governed Guatemala, and there have been large Protestant congressional caucuses in several countries, notably Brazil. Over twenty political parties of Protestant inspiration have been founded in the Spanish-speaking republics, although none has achieved great success. Much Protestant political activity has been conservative and/or oriented to institutional aggrandizement, leading to a worsening of the public image of Protestants as a whole in some countries. Another factor in this is the lack, in most countries, of a strong representative Protestant body; an exception is in Peru, where the National Evangelical Council (CONEP) has had a notable role in the defense of HUMAN RIGHTS since the 1980s.

In the early twenty-first century, the multiple and highly fragmented Protestantisms of Latin America seem destined for further numerical growth and deeper penetration of their national societies. The social and political implications of this are debatable, as is the extent to which Latin America will eventually become Protestant. In Brazil and Chile, for which reliable data are available, only half of all those who cease regarding themselves as Catholics become Protestants. This suggests the region is becoming religiously pluralist rather than Protestant, and it may be hard for Protestants to become the majority in any Latin American country.

References and Further Reading

- Boudewijnse, Barbara, André Droogers, and Frank Kamsteeg, eds. More Than Opium: An Anthropological Approach to Latin American and Caribbean Pentecostal Praxis. Lanham, MD, and London: Scarecrow Press, 1998.
- Cleary, Edward, and Hannah Stewart-Gambino, eds. Power, Politics and Pentecostals in Latin America. Boulder, CO: Westview, 1997.
- Corten, André, and Ruth Marshall-Fratani, eds. Between Babel and Pentecost: Transnational Pentecostalism in Africa and Latin America. Part II. London: Hurst, 2001.
- D'Epina, Christian Lalive. Haven of the Masses. London: Lutterworth Press, 1969.

- Freston, Paul. Evangelicals and Politics in Asia, Africa and Latin America. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- . “Pentecostalism in Latin America: Characteristics and Controversies.” Social Compass 45 (September 1998):335–358.
- Garrard-Burnett, Virginia, and David Stoll. Rethinking Protestantism in Latin America. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1993.
- Martin, David. Tongues of Fire: The Explosion of Protestantism in Latin America. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1990.
- . Pentecostalism: The World Their Parish. chaps. 3 and 4. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2002.
- Stoll, David. Is Latin America Turning Protestant? Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990.

PAUL FRESTON

LATITUDINARIANISM

Latitudinarianism is the term used to describe a collection of certain values held by seventeenth- and eighteenth-century clerics within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The term “Latitude-men” was first employed by one of their number, Simon Patrick, in his “Brief Account of the new sect of Latitude-men” (1662), to describe some theologian-philosophers at CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, later termed the “CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS.” Such “latitude men,” claimed Patrick, stressed the importance of Reason, “a deduction from the light of nature, and those principles which are the candle of the lord, set up in the soul of every man that hath not wilfully extinguished it...” (Patrick 1662:10). The Latitudinarian Gilbert Burnet (1643–1715), a theologian and historian, in his famous “History of His Own Time,” claimed that the early latitude men “studied to assert and examine the principles of religion and morality on clear grounds and in a philosophical way...” (Burnet 1991:45). A belief in liberty of conscience along with an emphasis on virtue and a stress on the complementary nature of FAITH and works gave Latitudinarian THEOLOGY a strongly Arminian tendency.

However, the term “Latitudinarian” was in no sense complimentary. An affronted Edward Fowler (1632–1714) wrote that “very lovely” and “moderate divines” were “abusively” termed Latitudinarians (Fowler 1671:37). Such clerics were often criticized by their Anglican contemporaries for placing too much emphasis on morality in religion at the expense of GRACE and for their tolerant attitude toward other Christian denominations and relaxed, liberal outlook regarding “indifferent” rites and ceremonies.

The rational ARMINIANISM of RICHARD HOOKER (1553/4–1600) was a significant early influence on the formation of Latitudinarianism. His antivoluntarist “Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity” (1604) had proclaimed the glorious light of reason as a necessary aid to deciphering the truths inherent in Scripture. Other significant ideas originated from the Great Tew group, the pre-English Civil War Oxfordshire movement stressing reason and tolerant unity of Reformed Protestantism. Among the Great Tew group’s members were such early preachers of rational tolerance as John Hales (1584–1656) and WILLIAM CHILLINGWORTH (1602–1644), whose “Religion of Protestants” (1638) was an important influence on Latitudinarian thought.

There appear to have been two distinct phases of Latitudinarianism. The first was that of the Cambridge Latitude men, the second was that of those “BROAD CHURCH” Anglicans whose influence reached a zenith during the 1690s when JOHN TILLOTSON (1630–1694) was appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1691. Significantly the later group of Latitudinarians incurred royal favor because they were closely involved in the replacement of the Roman Catholic James II as king with William of Orange. Gilbert Burnet even acted as William’s chaplain on his journey to ENGLAND in November 1688. The earlier Latitudinarians, the more mystical Cambridge Platonists, are not always considered as fully part of the movement. However, Benjamin Whichcote (1609–1683) in particular, often described as the leader of the Cambridge Platonists and with his strong emphasis on reason, clearly displays many of the intellectual qualities strongly characteristic of Latitudinarianism.

Key Latitudinarian Tenets

Perhaps the belief most associated with the Latitudinarians is that of the role of reason in religion. All the Latitudinarians, and particularly the Cambridge Platonists of the mid-seventeenth century, considered it vital to highlight the complementary nature of reason and revelation. The contemporary background was one of extremes regarding reason; during the turbulent days of the English CIVIL WAR and Interregnum there existed on the one hand an irrational, spiritual “enthusiasm,” as expressed by the many radical sects such as the Ranters, and on the other hand the atheistic, calculative reasoning as espoused in THOMAS HOBBS’S “Leviathan” (1651). Hobbesian reasoning was particularly attacked by the Latitudinarians for its relativism rather than being anchored in the unchanging, objective reason of God. Therefore the Latitudinarians attempted to use reason to confront both extreme (sometimes heretical and antinomian) Protestantism as well as Hobbesian “atheism” (see HERESY; ANTINOMIANISM). HENRY MORE (1614–1687) confronted the former in his “Enthusiasmus Triumphatus” (1656), as did Simon Patrick in his “Friendly Debate betwixt...a Conformist (and) a Nonconformist” (1669), whereas Edward Stillingfleet’s “Origines Sacrae” focused on attacking the atheist threat he saw in the work of Hobbes and others.

The later Latitudinarians were especially conscious of the threat provided by DEISM. Ever since the publication of HERBERT OF CHERBURY’S (1583–1645) precursor to deism, “De Veritate” (1625), the deist idea of human reason as contrary to Christian revelation had become more and more prevalent as the century went on and as the eighteenth century dawned. Works by Latitudinarians, such as Edward Stillingfleet’s “Letter to a Deist” (1675), argued in reply to such beliefs the case for the compatibility of reason and Christian DOCTRINE. Reason, the Latitudinarians claimed, was of divine origin, and in fact was, in the words of Proverbs 20:27, the “candle of the Lord.” It was Benjamin Whichcote who most frequently employed this favorite phrase and also most impressively argued for the rationality of religion, claiming that “to go against Reason is to go against God” (Whichcote 1930:11). The candle of the Lord was the divine spark within one, through which it was possible to become united with God. Humans were fallen, but the candle’s spiritual reason enabled something of God to be discerned. The very fact that this divine reason was in all people fitted with the unchanging law of morality, the universal tenets of which are known as a result of this NATURAL LAW from God. Therefore even rational “heathens” such as Plato and Socrates saw something of the divine, thanks to the “candle of the Lord” within them leading them toward God. In this way not only faith and reason, but also theology and philosophy became complementary.

The idea of the “candle of the Lord” within each person naturally led to the Latitudinarians’ espousal of human free will. This belief in the divine rationality in all complements the notion of individual free will. Such an Arminian view can therefore be contrasted with Calvinist PREDESTINATION.

During the latter half of the seventeenth century TOLERATION became a pressing issue confronting the English Church. The persecution of DISSENT in the early days of the Restoration was officially ended in 1689 by the Toleration Act, which applied to all Trinitarian Protestants. The Latitudinarians are considered to be a group espousing a tolerant stance in religious matters, but they would have held mixed feelings regarding this Act. Therefore it would be most accurate to describe the Latitudinarians as being in favor of comprehension, in which the church was broadened to accommodate various doctrines, instead of favoring the toleration of all dissenting groups outside the church. The 1668 Bill for Comprehension was unsuccessful, but it had been prepared by a group including the Latitudinarians John Tillotson (the future archbishop of Canterbury) and Edward Stillingfleet. Additionally Gilbert Burnet’s 1699 work “Exposition of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES” defended the idea of comprehension. For the most part then, Latitudinarians stressed the unity of orthodox, Trinitarian Christians within the Church of England, rather than the toleration of the many religious groups outside it. However, the Latitudinarian clerics were opposed to Roman Catholicism on the grounds of its “super-additions” as they saw it, to the plain Gospel truth, and because of its still-perceived political threat as a consequence of its allegiance to the pope.

The issue of ADIAPHORA was a significant one, and closely tied to toleration; were such “things indifferent” within religious rites and ceremonies to be prescribed by the state, or instead left to individual congregations to decide? Earlier in the century the Cambridge Platonists had witnessed much conflict and disagreement over matters such as bowing at the name of Jesus, kneeling at communion, and the wearing of VESTMENTS, during the widely unpopular and strict decrees by Archbishop WILLIAM LAUD. As a whole the Latitudinarians believed that such matters should not be prescribed, given that they had not been specifically appointed by God, but left to the individual conscience, for what was most important for them was the unity and moral goodness of Christians, rather than petty squabbling over outward affairs.

In the same attitude of simplicity the Latitudinarians considered that the Christian message should be presented in as plain and comprehensible style as possible, for the Christian faith as presented in Scripture was plain and sufficient for all people to gain SALVATION. Therefore Latitudinarian sermons were distinctive for their commonsense approach and application of images familiar to their congregations. Christianity’s saving message could be expounded simply in a few key doctrines, clear enough for all people to understand.

The third earl of Shaftsbury declared Whichcote to advocate good morals. Whichcote maintained religion to involve a “good mind, and a good life” (Whichcote 1930:50). All the Latitudinarians stressed the importance of morality and living a virtuous life in their PREACHING, to such an extent that they were sometimes criticized for downplaying the importance of grace and revelation. However, in a somewhat Platonic vein, they believed that to know God one should try to be Godlike, or “deiform.” For them, grace was intricately entwined with virtue because there could never truly be one without the other. Therefore faith was entirely inseparable from works.

Gilbert Burnet reminded clergymen that the Christian religion called one to “great purity and virtue...humility and self denial, to a contempt of the world and heavenly mindedness, to a patient resignation to the will of God...” Christian clergy should be able to “state right the grounds of our hope, and the terms of our salvation...” (Burnet 1997:150–162).

Key Latitudinarians

Of all the Cambridge Platonists it was Whichcote who is most easily aligned with the Latitudinarians, given that he lacked the mystical strain found in Cambridge Platonist colleagues such as More and John Smith (1618–1652). Although he wrote nothing during his lifetime, some sermons were published posthumously, and his collections of “Aphorisms” clearly convey his rational, tolerant spirit. Whichcote entered the Puritan Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1626 where he became a fellow. His hugely popular lecture series at Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge, began in 1636 and flourished for many years. Whichcote became provost of King’s College in 1645, and in 1650 he became vice chancellor of the University of Cambridge. After his ejection from King’s at the Restoration, and brief spells as a clergyman in Somerset, his career again flourished in London where he was vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry from 1668 to 1683. St. Lawrence Jewry was a highly significant center of Latitudinarianism, and Latitudinarians such as Tillotson and Stillingfleet were among Whichcote’s congregation there. Interestingly, the philosopher JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704), who himself had Latitudinarian tendencies, was a member of the church from 1667 to 1675.

Simon Patrick (1626–1707), a friend and contemporary at Queens’ College, Cambridge, of the Cambridge Platonist John Smith, was an early chronicler of Latitudinarianism, and he excellently displays the rational, spiritual, moral nature of the movement. In his “Sermon preached on St. Mark’s Day, 1646” he stressed reason’s importance, yet not merely as a natural, human faculty but as dependent on divine grace. After the Restoration in 1660 Patrick became the much-loved rector of St. Paul’s, Covent Garden, London where his unselfish dedication was particularly noted when he continued to minister to his congregation even during the Great Plague of 1665, when many other clergy left the city. His various PRAYER manuals, which contained special prayers for a variety of occasions, were widely read and highly useful aids in the furthering of private devotion.

Stillingfleet (1635–1699) was a key leader of Latitudinarianism during the latter half of the seventeenth century and was renowned for his learning. He entered St. John’s College, Cambridge, in 1649, and spent many years as a clergyman in London before eventually becoming bishop of Worcester in 1689. Stillingfleet’s “Irenicon” (1659), which stressed the need for a strong, united national church in which Anglicans and Presbyterians could worship in harmony, apparently contributed in the following century to persuading JOHN WESLEY to remain in the Church of England. Work such as “Origines Sacrae” (1662) also highlighted the significance of universal, natural theology as a common TRADITION shared by all. Stillingfleet’s well-known criticisms of John Locke’s so-called unorthodoxy and Locke’s possible influence on the deist JOHN TOLAND (1670–1722), highlight his own ORTHODOXY regarding reason and revelation. Reason may be important, as his “Rational Account of the Grounds of Protestant Religion” (1665) showed, but it must never be elevated to the extent as to cast doubt on divine revelation and miracles.

Assessment

It is often considered that John Locke was a Latitudinarian. Certainly he had many links with the movement, was a friend of Tillotson and an admirer of Whichcote, and owned a considerable number of Latitudinarian works. However, his thought differed from that of the movement. In his “Reasonableness of Christianity” (1695), Locke called reason the “candle of the Lord” and wrote that the Gospel was full of clear, easily intelligible truths, and yet he cast Christ’s incarnation, resurrection, and miracles in a Socinian light (which discounted the divinity of Jesus Christ, see SOCINIANISM).

Latitudinarians have been variously attacked by their own contemporaries and in subsequent years for being teachers of morality instead of preachers of Christ’s incarnation and ATONEMENT. Association with men such as Locke and the Latitudinarians’ emphasis on reason led some Anglicans and Nonconformists (see NONCONFORMITY) to condemn Latitudinarianism for ANTI-TRINITARIANISM. Such charges are inaccurate. The Latitudinarians were not Socinians because their message was an orthodox Christian one. Their emphasis on reason and the moral life went hand in hand with a constant appreciation of God’s divine grace and Christ’s revelation and consequent gift of Salvation. Therefore reason and revelation, faith and works all coexisted in harmony, with problems arising only when one aspect was exalted too highly above the other.

Religion and SCIENCE were seen by the Latitudinarians to be mutually supportive, and many Latitudinarians had links with the emerging scientific interests of the day. Men such as Henry More and Ralph Cudworth (1617–1688) were fellows of the young Royal Society. John Wilkins’s (1614–1672) study on the classification system was published by the Society in 1668. EDUCATION was important too; later Latitudinarians, such as Thomas Tenison (1636–1715), became interested in furthering education particularly among the poor, and Tenison founded a number of schools.

During the eighteenth century the Church of England arguably lost the vital spirit and moral power of the latitude men amid dry High Church rationalism and emphasis on the beauty, ceremony, and rites of holiness. However, it seems that the irenic and spiritual candle of the Lord burned on in significant areas of theological thought, particularly that of JOSEPH BUTLER, bishop of Durham (1692–1752), and in the work of the natural scientist and archdeacon of Carlisle WILLIAM PALEY (1743–1805). The influence of the Latitudinarians on later ANGLICANISM has been on the whole underestimated, yet undoubtedly it is there.

References and Further Reading

- Beiser, Frederick C. The Sovereignty of Reason: The Defense of Rationality in the Early English Enlightenment. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Burnet, Gilbert. Discourse of the Pastoral Care. Lewiston, NY: E. Mellen Press, 1997.
- . History of my Own Time. Abridged by Thomas Stack-house, introduced by David Allen. London: J.M.Dent, 1991.
- Fowler, Edward. The Principles and Practices of certain moderate Divines of the Church of England, abusively called Latitudinarians... In A Free Discourse between two Intimate Friends. London: 1671.
- George, Edward Augustus. Seventeenth-century Men of Latitude. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1908.
- Gibson, William. The Church of England 1688–1832: Unity and Accord. London: Routledge, 2001.
- Griffin, Martin I.J. Latitudinarianism in the Seventeenth-Century Church of England. Leiden/New York: E.J.Brill, 1992.
- Kroll, Richard, Richard Ashcraft, and Perez Zagorin. Philosophy, Science and Religion in England 1640–1700. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Patrick, Simon. A Brief Account of the new sect of Latitudemen. London: 1662.
- Rivers, Isabel. Reason, Grace and Sentiment—A Study of the Language of Religion and Ethics in England, 1660–1780. vol. I, Whichcote to Wesley. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Spellman, W.M. The Latitudinarians and the Church of England 1660–1700. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993.
- Whichcote, Benjamin. Moral and Religious Aphorisms. Introduced by W.R.Inge. London: E.Mathews and Marrot, 1930.

ALISON J.TEPLY

LATTER RAIN REVIVAL

The Latter Rain Revival was a phrase frequently used to describe the pentecostal movement during the early twentieth century. The term was found attractive because it linked PENTECOSTALISM both to the New Testament account of Pentecost and to the end-time revival that many American Protestants believed would precede the return of Jesus Christ. The phrase was drawn from the Old Testament, which mentioned two wet periods in the climate cycle of ancient Palestine. Interpreted prophetically, those two rainy periods were identified by pentecostal theologians with the original charismatic outburst on the day of Pentecost and with the reappearance of the baptism of the Spirit and spiritual gifts in the modern pentecostal movement.

Of the many pentecostal spokespersons who used the phrase, the most articulate was David Wesley Myland. His The Latter Rain Covenant and Pentecostal Power (1910) argued that, in addition to the symbolic foreshadowing of the pentecostal latter rain revival in the Old Testament, climate changes in Palestine during the late nineteenth century also paralleled the return of the Spirit's latter rain to the church. For him, the physical history of the world mimicked spiritual developments. Myland was also attracted to latter rain imagery because it preached so well. He implored non-pentecostal Christians to put down their old umbrellas of theological ORTHODOXY and human inhibition and to let God's new cloudburst of Holy Ghost power soak them to the bone.

The use of latter rain imagery declined somewhat after the mid-century. About 1950 a spiritual protest movement emerged within pentecostalism that called itself the New Order of the Latter Rain—a title often shortened to simply the Latter Rain. The more well established pentecostal denominations, especially the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, denounced this new movement and since then the use of latter rain terminology has fallen into relative disuse within mainstream pentecostalism.

See also Assemblies of God

References and Further Reading

- Faupel, D. William. The Everlasting Gospel: The Significance of Eschatology in the Development of Pentecostal Thought. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996.
- Myland, D. Wesley. The Latter Rain Covenant and Pentecostal Power, with Testimony of Healings and Baptism. Chicago, IL: Evangel Publishing House, 1910.
- Riss, Richard Michael. A Survey of 20th Century Revival Movements in North America. Peabody, MA.: Hendrickson, 1988.

DOUGLAS JACOBSEN

LATVIA

Latvia's location between East and West has made it geopolitically a natural battleground, and thus, determined its fate. So has its situation between the Roman and Orthodox churches. The REFORMATION introduced a third force of Protestantism, creating a three-point religious struggle.

By the twelfth century the Baltic was the only pagan region left in all Europe. The Christianization of Latvia occurred in three periods. The first, the eleventh-century Danish mission, had no enduring success. Second, the Orthodox mission accompanying Russian invasion in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was likewise short-lived. Lasting influence was established with a German invasion in the twelfth century. Augustinian Meinhard of Holstein arrived in 1180, built a church in Ikšķile on the Daugava, consecrated a bishop in 1186, and set up a mission for the Livs. His successor Bishop Berthold employed a policy of militant proselytism and persuaded Pope Innocent III to mount a crusade against pagan Balts. The third bishop, Albert (1165–1229), consecrated March 29, 1199, an energetic leader, founded Rīga, made it his episcopal see in 1201, and persuaded Innocent to proclaim a crusade against Livonia. The pope established the Order of the Brothers of the Sword (1202) to help missionize the Baltic people. By 1230 the Roman curia decided to establish an ecclesiastical state in Livonia under papal jurisdiction. As the largest Roman church state, under the archbishop of Riga, Livonia was plagued by civil war among the archbishop, the city of Riga, and the Order. The Christianization of the Latvians was superficial, formal, and slow, with minimum catechization, attributed to language and cultural barriers and the incompetence of the clergy, as well as the Germanization of local Christianity as a part of colonial efforts (Drang nach Osten). The result was a syncretistic mix of previous pagan practice with medieval Christianity. This colonization introduced a new socioeconomic structure and integrated the Balts into the western European civilization.

The violent Christianization allowed nineteenth- and twentieth-century Latvian authors and Marxists to criticize Christianity in tendentious ways for usurping political power and colonizing the people. Only after 1918 did Latvian history emerge as a history of the Latvian people and its church, not as a province of occupying cultures (mainly German).

Ecclesiastical Latin provided the basis for the Latvian alphabet. The Livonian state guarded Latvians against the Russian expansion, abolished tribal strife, and forcefully promoted the consolidation of the Latvian nation by a policy of not assimilating into the German upper classes so primitive in Latvia.

The Reformation

Latvia was the first country to accept the Reformation outside of GERMANY. It began in Rīga, more through converted priests than through MARTIN LUTHER'S writings. The chaplain at St. Peter's church, Andreas Knopken (1468–1539), studied Luther's teachings in Germany. He soon found followers among the city councilors. A public debate on June 12, 1522, over twenty-four theses prepared by Knopken at St. Peter's focused on JUSTIFICATION by FAITH and the critique of medieval ecclesiastical practices. The city council appointed him archdeacon of St. Peter's October 23, 1522, effectively introducing the Reformation among German merchants and artisans. Knopken published a commentary on Romans in 1524.

Sylvester Tegetmayer (d. 1552) arrived in Rīga in September 1522 and was placed in St. James' church. Luther wrote To the Christians in Riga, Revell, and Dorpat (1523), Exposition of Psalm 127 for the Christians of Riga and Livonia (1524), A Christian Exhortation to the Livonians Concerning Public Worship and Concord (1525), and fourteen letters to support his Livonian followers. Latvian preachers Nicolaus Ramm and Johan Eck established a Latvian Lutheran congregation in 1524; Riga's workers were the first Latvians to accept the Reformation. Wolter von Plettenberg, the master of the Livonian Order guaranteed toleration of the reform in 1525, which was reaffirmed by the Diet of Valmiera in 1554. In 1538 Rīga joined the German Protestant SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE. Representatives of the Order signed the Religious Peace of Augsburg (1555).

Johan Briessmann (1488–1549), superintendent and pastor at the Rīga cathedral, composed a Brief Order of Divine Worship (1530). The first widespread book in Latvian was Luther's Small Catechism, published in 1586. Twenty-eight of his hymns were included in the first Latvian hymnal (1587). Apart from city dwellers, however, Latvians were little touched by the Reformation. From the partition of Livonia (1562), Courland and Semigallia in the west and Vidzeme in the north (after 1629) remained Lutheran under Swedish suzerainty; Latgallia under Poland became Roman Catholic.

The Counter-Reformation and Lutheran Orthodoxy

The last master of the Order, Gothard Kettler (1559–1563) abolished the Order, giving Vidzeme to the Poles (1562) and becoming a Polish vassal. King Stephan Batory gave two of Rīga's churches to the Jesuits, who arrived in great numbers, learned Latvian, and actively converted people. The Livonian constitution of 1582 tolerated LUTHERANISM but gave Roman Catholicism a superior position. In 1585 Canisius's Catechism was translated into Latvian. Germans in Rīga revolted in the "Calendar Rebellion" (1587–1591).

Kettler cultivated Lutheranism in Courland and Semigallia, restoring or rebuilding churches, building schools, teaching pastors Latvian, and publishing Small Catechism in Latvian. Georg Mancelius (1593–1654) edited it with supplements (1631) and composed a Postil (sermon book) in Latvian (1654). A notable Orthodox theologian and superintendent was Paul Einhorn (1636–1655). Christofer Fürecker (died c.1681) composed rhythmically accurate Latvian hymns.

Swedish Times

During the Polish-Swedish War, in 1621, GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS took Rīga. Catholic services were forbidden. Swedish rule, considered the "brightest times" in Latvian history, supported Latvian peasants against the landlords and improved their legal and social situation and their education. Energetic Herman Samson (1579–1643) was placed in the position of superintendent of Vidzeme (1622). Swedish church law was introduced (1686). Pastors vigorously combated Latvian pagan traditions. Ernst Glück (1652–1705) translated the Bible into Latvian (New Testament 1685; entire Bible 1689).

Russian Times

The Swedish-Russian "Great Northern" War (1700–1720) destroyed Vidzeme. Peter the Great invaded Rīga in 1710; the peace of Niestadt (1721) awarded Vidzeme to Russia. The privileges of the German nobility were recognized, continuing peasant dependency on them. Swedish traditions and church law, which continued in force until 1832, helped perpetuate church life.

Both PIETISM and RATIONALISM spread their influence from the universities of Rostock and Königsberg. The faculty of theology at the University of Dorpat (founded 1632) was dominated by Rationalism from 1802. Latvians studied there but clergy had difficulty obtaining parishes within Latvia.

Pietism and the Brethren Movement (Hernhuter)

The clericalism, intellectualism, didacticism, and harsh discipline of the Orthodox period failed to foster peasant piety. The German pastor and the Latvian peasant were separated socially and ethnically. The old mixture of Christianity and paganism lay barely below the surface.

The Brethren Movement among Latvians grew from the Teacher's College founded by Magdalen von Hallart (1738) and visitors from HALLE (Christian David, 1729–1730, 1738–1740; Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF, 1736), creating renewal in Valmiera and environs in 1739. The diet attempted suppression (1742); Empress Elizabeth's ban (1743) interrupted the progress of the movement, but ultimately its adherents multiplied, led by Latvians Šķesteris Pēteris (1702–1787) and Ķīšu Pēteris (c.1698–1771).

The Hernhuter (see HERRNHUT) movement brought Latvians into the evangelical faith through Pietism, strengthened Christian morality, promoted diligence, taught management skills, welfare, literacy, and a sense of nationhood but also produced sanctimoniousness. The Christianization of the Latvians was completed by the mid-nineteenth century.

The Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries

By 1890 Courland, Vidzeme, and Riga each had its own CONSISTORY and its own specific traditions (e.g., hymnals: Courland's in 1836, Vidzeme's in 1846; a common Agenda in 1843 and 1900). In 1839 a Teachers Seminary was established in Valmiera under Jānis Cimze. Native pastors were educated at Dorpat. Bishop K.Kr.Ullmann, vice-president of the general consistory, organized evangelical social help through Russia (1859). In 1897, 1,009,994 Latvians in 189 congregations and 113,011 Germans in eighteen congregations composed the Lutheran church in Latvia. Very few Latvian pastors filled higher offices, and the number of Latvians placed within Latvian congregations was limited.

Conversion to Russian Orthodoxy was seen as a way for peasants to eliminate the pressure of German nobility; in 1846–1847 some 120,000–125,000 Latvians converted, against the opposition of German nobles and pastors, who were in turn severely punished by the Russian government.

Nineteenth-century Latvian households had religious books, practiced daily prayer, and attended worship regularly. Christian upbringing of children and moral life became an organic part of Latvian life. Economic consolidation and an increase in the educational level of peasants and burghers created tensions with the German governing class. A nascent Latvian intelligentsia urged Latvians to move up the social ladder through education and cultivate their own culture. Awakened national consciousness demanded native pastors; however, the church remained the possession of the nobility, eliciting attacks on the nobility during the Revolution of 1905. The deep social and ethnic breach between Germans and Latvians was incurable.

The Latvian National Church

The conditions after World War I were difficult. The “nobility's church” disappeared with the collapse of the Russian Empire and the abolition of the nobility's privileges. A theological faculty was begun in 1920 and followed prewar currents in German theology, leading to tensions between faculty and church leadership, which founded its own Theological Institute under Ādams Mačulāns (1923). In 1922 a synod elected a supreme Consistory, its president, and a bishop, Kārlis Irbe (1861–1934). A new hymnal appeared in 1922, a choral book in 1924, and an order of worship in 1928. The Foreign Mission started in 1924, with the work of Anna Irbe (1890–1973), daughter of K.Irbe, in South India; and in 1939 with the support of secretary Roberts Feldmanis (1910–) expanded through all of Latvia. In 1934 Teodors Grīnbergs (1870–1962) succeeded Irbe. In 1936 the church had 272 Latvian and 52 German congregations. The twenty years of Latvian independence (1920–1940) were a period of a productive work and a success in many respects.

The War and Occupations

The “Year of Horror”—1940—brought invasion and active sovietization of the nation and the churches, and deportation of 15,424 people on June 14. German invasion (June 22, 1941) prevented a second round of Soviet deportations aimed at destroying the nation’s spiritual and intellectual leadership. National Socialist (Nazi) control of the church limited theological studies and acted against those, like Rīga Dean Pauls Rozenbergs, who protested anti-Semitic policies. Archbishop Grīnbergs also publicly opposed the killing of Gypsies before his forced deportation to Germany (1944), although church life continued during the Nazi occupation.

Renewed Soviet occupation eliminated the leadership of the church, headed by Dean Kārlis Irbe, a nephew of the former archbishop, in 1946. One hundred five pastors were serving 305 congregations, and only sixty churches of 190 remained undamaged by the war. March 24, 1949, saw the deportation of 47,332 Latvians to Siberia, including many Lutheran laity. Thirty pastors were arrested and deported. Local Soviets took over twenty-two church buildings; in 1959 the Rīga cathedral was seized. By 1961 the church claimed 24 percent of the population (214 congregations, 115 pastors) and had twenty theological students. From 1963 oppressive taxation further undermined the church’s ownership of property.

Archbishop Gustavs Turs, known as the “red bishop” skillfully accommodated Soviet wishes while striving to maintain the integrity of the church against harsh oppression. In 1954 permission to conduct theological training was obtained; the academic standing of the program of the Theological Seminary was confirmed in 1969. The “Decree on Religious Associations” of 1975 reconfirmed all previous Soviet restrictions, depriving churches of all rights and limited their activities to public worship.

In 1987 a group of pastors organized “Rebirth and Renewal,” demanding that the church be made self-governing. One pastor was killed and two exiled. However, members were elected to the Consistory, and one, Kārlis Gailītis (1936–1992), was elected archbishop in 1989. In 1990 the seminary program became a faculty of theology at the University of Riga.

Throughout the Soviet period a significant church in exile had continued Latvian church life in Germany, Sweden, Australia, Canada, Latin America, and the United States. In 2002 it had 89 pastors in 132 congregations.

The Latvian Lutheran Church elected Archbishop Jānis Vanags, D.D., in 1993. One hundred twentyseven pastors served in 295 congregations. A Diaconia Center was started in 1994, St. Gregor's Christian Ministry School in 1995 (thirty students), Luther Academy in 1997 (sixty pastoral, forty-five pedagogical students), under Rector Dr. Hab.Reinhard Slen czka (as of 2002). Other denominations, such as Baptist congregations, first organized in 1860, currently united in the Union of Baptist Congregations of Latvia (seventy-six congregations, 6,200 members), under Bishop Jānis Šmits. Adventist churches have existed since 1896 (currently forty-four congregations, 4,000 members in the Union of Adventists of the Seventh Day, President Viesturs Reķis). The Union of Pentecostal Congregations, organized 1931, has seventythree congregations (6,000 members) under Bishop Jānis Ozolinkēvics. The Lutherans of the Augsburg Confession, organized in 1997, have nine congregations with 400 members. The United Methodist Church began work in 1910 and has ten congregations with 480 members under Superintendent Ārijs Vīksna (as of 2002).

References and Further Reading

- Adamovičs, A. Raksti par Latvijas Baznīcas Vēsturi. Latviešu ev.-lut. Baznīca Amerikā. 1978.
- Andersons, E. Latvijas Vēsture, 1914–1920. Stockholm, 1967.
- Arbusow, L. Jr. Die Einführung der Reformation in Liv-, Est-, und Kurland. 1921. Reprint, Aalen, Germany: Scientia Verlag Daugava, 1964.
- Dunsdorfs, E. Latvijas Vēsture, 1600–1710. Uppsala, 1962.
- . Latvijas Vēsture, 1710–1800. Sundbyberg, 1973.
- , and A.Spekke. Latvijas Vēsture, 1500–1600. Stockholm, 1964.
- Grislis, E. "Recent Trends in the Study of the Reformation in the City of Riga, Livonia." Journal of Baltic Studies 7 (1976):145–169.
- Hoerschelmann, D.F. Andreas Knopken, der Reformator Rigas: Ein Beitrag zur Kirchengeschichte Livlands. Leipzig, 1896.
- Johansons, A. Latvijas Kultūras Vēsture, 1710–1800. Stockholm, 1975.
- Ķiploks, E. Latvijas ev.-lut. Baznīca 1918–1968, Cēla Biedrs 1968, vol. 9, 1970.
- Plakans, A. The Latvians. A Short History. Stanford, CA.: Hoover Institution, Stanford University Press, 1995.
- Šilde, A. Latvijas Vēsture, 1914–1940. Stockholm, Daugava 1976.
- Spekke, A. History of Latvia: An Outline. Stockholm: M. Goppers 1951.
- Švābe, A. Latvijas Vēsture, 1800–1914. Uppsala: 1958.
- Talonen, J. Church Under the Pressure of Stalinism. Jyväskylä, Finland: Historical Society of Northern Finland, 1997.
- Wittram, R., ed. Baltische Kirchengeschichte. Göttingen, Germany, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1956.

GUNTIS CALME

LAUD, WILLIAM (1573–1645)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Laud is probably the most controversial archbishop of Canterbury in the history of the Anglican Church. A favorite of King Charles I, he was hated by Puritans who opposed his religious policies. In later years he was admired by leaders of the OXFORD MOVEMENT like JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, who respected his attempts to restore Catholic liturgies and practices abandoned at the time of the REFORMATION, but denounced by such twentieth-century historians as Patrick Collinson, who called him “the greatest calamity visited upon the English church” (1984:90). He is the only archbishop to have been tried for treason and publicly executed.

Early Life

Laud was born on October 7, 1573, in the town of Reading, west of London. His father was a member of the merchant class, a relatively well-off clothier; because of this ancestry Laud was sometimes ridiculed in later life because he was not a member of the gentry. His mother’s relatives, the Webbs, were also clothiers, but several of them prospered and married into prominent families. One became a lord mayor of London.

Laud was educated at Reading Grammar School and at the age of sixteen proceeded to St. John’s College, Oxford, which had ties with the Grammar School. He became a fellow of the College in 1593, a year before he completed the B.A. In 1601 he was named a senior fellow and soon became a lecturer in divinity and a university proctor. In 1611 he was elected president of St. John’s, a position he held until being appointed a bishop. As president he beautified the college chapel, commissioned anthems from such composers as Orlando Gibbons, and took steps to improve the college finances. In later years he was responsible for the addition of a beautiful new quadrangle to the college. While at Oxford, Laud was greatly influenced by the distinguished scholar and theologian LANCELOT ANDREWES.

Preferment in the church came during the later years of the reign of James I (d. 1625). In 1621 Laud was named dean of Gloucester cathedral. The king had told Laud that “there was scarce ever a church in England so ill governed, and so much out of order.” Laud immediately undertook the repair of the edifice and “the redress of other things amiss” (Works, VI, Pt. 1, 239). It was at Gloucester that Laud’s concern for medieval TRADITION became manifest because he restored the high ALTAR to its original place at the east end of the church. During the reign of Edward VI stone altars had been removed from many cathedrals and other churches—smashed up or hidden away—on the grounds that they were superstitious reminders of the doctrine of the mass as a sacrifice, a Catholic view no longer accepted in the reformed church. Instead “honest wooden tables” had been set up “table-wise” (east and west), not “altar-wise” (north and south), and placed in the main body of the church, so that worshipers might see the actions of the minister and participate more directly in the service. The more moderate Elizabethan Injunctions of 1559 returned the table to its traditional position against the east wall. Canons promulgated in 1604 anticipated Laud's insistence on traditional altars; in fact he was enforcing them, not bringing forth a novelty.

In 1621 Laud was appointed a prebend of West-minster Abbey. His hopes of becoming dean of the Abbey were thwarted, but in 1621 the king named him bishop of the Welsh diocese of St. David's. Here again he reinstated a stone altar.

The Reign of Charles I

With the accession of Charles I in 1625 Laud became the recognized leader of the English church because Charles respected his abilities and shared many of his views. In 1626 Laud became dean of the Chapel Royal and was translated to the English bishopric of Bath and Wells. In 1627 he was designated a member of the king's Privy Council. A year later he was named bishop of London; to make this place available the king promoted the previous bishop to the archbishopric of York. Here Laud worked with the dean of St. Paul's, JOHN DONNE, and the architect Inigo Jones to repair and restore the fabric of the cathedral, which had become ruinous. He also issued orders prohibiting the use of the cathedral for secular purposes, demanding that no business be transacted there and that children not be allowed to play in the church.

When the see of CANTERBURY became vacant through the death of George Abbot in 1633 Laud gained the position of archbishop and primate, a recognition of the influence that he had been exercising for nearly a decade. At Canterbury Cathedral he again refitted the choir with a high altar adorned with candlesticks and a rich carpet. Some other specific matters that concerned him were the buildings that encroached on the church, the fair that was held in the churchyard, and the necessity for multiple locks to the muniment room, as specified in the statutes. The archbishop's relations with members of the staff were not always pleasant; as he said, "one peevish difference or another" always seemed to be arising, generally caused by mere "spleen" (Works, VII, 215–216, 349–352).

Both Laud and Charles I are often referred to as Arminians. In fact they were not true followers of the Dutch theologian JACOBUS ARMINIUS, who is best known for his opposition to the doctrine of PREDESTINATION and his belief in free will (see ARMINIANISM). They did, however, agree that a number of meaningful beliefs and practices of the medieval church had been abandoned in England after the Reformation, at the urging of Archbishop THOMAS CRANMER and as a re-sult of the influence of Continental Calvinists and English Puritans. As Laud often said, he loved the beauty of holiness and the solemnity of church buildings and liturgies. In addition to restoring stone altars to their traditional locations and railing them in so that they could not be defiled by dogs, he favored elaborate music provided by trained choirs, genuflecting and kneeling, stained glass windows, and traditional VESTMENTS with a white linen chasuble as the minimum garb for the priest. He regarded the SACRAMENTS as being more important than PREACHING. He once complained that "'tis superstition now-a-days for any man to come with more reverence into a church, than a tinker and his bitch come into an ale-house" (Works, VI, Pt. I, 57). He curtailed the activities of the so-called Stranger Churches that ministered to Protestant immigrants to ENGLAND, especially the group of French HUGUENOTS that met in the crypt of Canterbury cathedral, evidently because he thought, erroneously, that they were allied with the Puritan nonconformists. He was also concerned to improve church finances so that the clergy might receive reasonable stipends. He attempted to see that tithes were properly collected, especially in London, although his efforts were not very successful.

During the years of Charles I's personal rule without Parliament (1629–1640), Laud worked with the king and his chief minister, the earl of Strafford, to enforce a policy often characterized as “Thorough.” Laud sought to achieve unity in the church by strict enforcement of existing canons. He was determined to eliminate slackness and inefficiency, to see that churches were kept clean and in good repair, and to ensure that CLERGY not be allowed to neglect their duties. He was willing to use the law courts to secure obedience to the bishops and strict conformity to the services of the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. He also proceeded against Puritan pamphleteers, including the notorious William Prynne, Henry Burton, and John Bastwick, who had their ears cut off for writing scurrilous tracts denouncing the established church.

The Growth of Opposition

It is not surprising that these policies were unpopular with both laymen and clergy, many of whom believed them to be popish and superstitious. Some said that Laud was moving in the direction of the Roman Catholic Church, despite his refutation of the views of the Jesuit John Fisher and his statement that he would not accept a cardinal's hat if one were offered to him. The tragedy of Laud's life, indeed a tragedy for the entire church, lay in his inability to appreciate the genuine piety of those who disagreed with his elevated views. He had few friends and little sympathy for common people.

Although he had no AUTHORITY over the church in SCOTLAND, Laud helped the king formulate the new service book, which so displeased Scots Presbyterians when it was introduced in Scotland in 1637 that a riot at St. Giles Cathedral in Edinburgh led to the outbreak of the Bishops' Wars and the English CIVIL WAR. These hostilities necessitated the summoning of the Short Parliament (1640) and Long Parliament (1640–1660), both of which were dominated by Puritan opponents of the religious policies of Charles and Laud.

In 1640 the Long Parliament impeached the archbishop on a charge of treason. He was sent to prison in the Tower of London in 1641 but was not brought to trial until 1644. After he presented a dignified defense of his actions before the House of Lords it proved impossible to obtain a guilty verdict, so in the end he was condemned by a bill of attainder, which like any other piece of legislation required only a simple majority vote in both houses of Parliament. He was beheaded on Tower Hill on January 10, 1645. Four years later, on January 30, 1649, the king himself would be executed.

William Laud's unmarked coffin was originally interred at the church of All Hallows, Barking, not far from the Tower, but after the Restoration of the monarchy and state church in 1660 it was moved to Oxford. The archbishop's remains now lie, appropriately, before the altar in the chapel of St. John's College.

See also Architecture, Church; Calvinism; Nonconformity; Puritanism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Laud, William. The Works of the Most Reverend Father in God, William Laud. Edited by W.Scot and James Bliss. 7 vols. Oxford: John Henry Parker, 1847–1860.

Secondary Sources:

Carlton, Charles. Archbishop William Laud. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1987.

Collinson, Patrick. The Religion of Protestants. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Davies, Julian. The Caroline Captivity of the Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1992.

Hill, Christopher. Economic Problems of the Church. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1956.

Lehmberg, Stanford E. Cathedrals under Siege: Cathedrals in English Society, 1600–1700.

University Park, PA.: Penn State University Press; Exeter: University of Exeter Press, 1996.

Moorman, J.H.R. A History of the Church in England. London: A. & C.Black, 1953.

Trevor-Roper, H.R. Archbishop Laud, 1573–1645. 2d edition. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1940, 1962.

STANFORD LEHMBERG

LAUSANNE COMMITTEE ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION

The Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization (LCWE) defines itself as “an international movement for the purpose of encouraging Christians and churches everywhere to pray, study, plan and work together for the evangelization of the world.” It is a global evangelistic movement that grew out of an initiative taken by the American evangelist BILLY GRAHAM. The motivation for its origins can be traced to the ecumenical movement and internal theological tensions that developed within Protestantism during the twentieth century. A series of missionary conferences were held during the twentieth century, starting with the 1910 conference in Edinburgh, Scotland (see WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE). The participants in the missionary conferences consisted of both institutional church representatives and representatives of para-church missionary organizations. The 1910 conference in Edinburgh established the International Missionary Council (IMC). The IMC provided a strong impetus for the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) in 1948. The IMC was integrated into the WCC as part of its Division of World Mission and Evangelism (DWME) at the New Delhi Assembly in 1961. With the integration of the DWME, many missionary organizations that were not denominationally based lost their representation previously held in the IMC.

There was also a growing theological concern among some of the organizations and denominational representatives that the emphasis of the WCC had moved away from a central focus on EVANGELISM and mission. Some of these concerns were related to the theological split, particularly in North America, between those in the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement and those who held theological views more focused on the importance of personal SALVATION. An organization called the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF) represented these concerns on a global level with the focus on personal salvation and conservative views of scriptural inspiration. The WEF also traces its roots to the first ecumenical initiatives formed as the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE in 1861 in London, England, which eventually led to the establishment of the IRM in 1910. Despite the existence and efforts of the WEF to which Billy Graham was sympathetic, he and likeminded people felt that a new global initiative for evangelism was needed to build a broader base of cooperation in evangelism. In 1960, Billy Graham assembled a group of Christian leaders in Montreux, SWITZERLAND, which led to the World Congress on Evangelism held in Berlin, GERMANY, in 1966. Several regional conferences were held leading up to the International Congress on World Evangelism (ICWE) in Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1974. More than 4,000 delegates from 150 nations attended the ICWE in Lausanne, with more than half of the participants coming from third world countries. During the congress, a steering committee was struck under the leadership of John R.W.Stott to draft a document based on the proceedings of the congress. The draftees also included Hudson Armerding and Samuel Escobar, aided by Leighton Ford and Jim Douglas. This document, which became known as the Lausanne Covenant, was signed by congress leaders and delegates in a ceremony on the last day of the gathering. The Lausanne Covenant became an important document within evangelical circles; many organizations adopted it as an additional statement on evangelism. Even before the congress, arrangements were being made to harness the energy that would arise out of such a gathering. Out of this planning came the LCWE in 1976.

Initially, forty-three people were elected by the congress to continue arranging consultations under the leadership of Leighton Ford as chair and Gottfried Osei-Mensah as secretary. The LCWE focuses on being a motivational source and a clearinghouse for information on evangelization throughout the world. It continues to organize conferences, consultations, and publish newsletters worldwide. After the 1974 Lausanne Congress, the LCWE arranged to develop the ideas of the congress further through the Consultation on World Evangelization, which held a meeting in Pattaya, Thailand in 1980. This consultation resulted in an important series of occasional papers on issues concerning world evangelization. Between 1977 and 1985, many regional study consultations, focused on particular themes, were held. This process culminated in a full plenary conference held in Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1989.

In 2004 the LCWE will be hosting the Forum for World Evangelization in Thailand. The LCWE and the Lausanne Covenant are important phenomena of current Protestantism. The organization has enjoyed strong participation from organizations and churches in the third world, and it represents a movement of evangelicals that is more broad-based than other organizations. Through the Lausanne Covenant, it is linked to a new emphasis on theological reflection within the evangelical movement on the place of social action and social justice in relation to the task of evangelism and mission. It also represents a commitment to unity and cooperation in action. DAVID BOSCH has argued convincingly that there has been an in-creased influence within the LCWE and its consultations on emphasizing social concern, as well as a growing awareness within the WCC of issues related to evangelism. There has also been a conscious effort by the LCWE and the WCC to coordinate conferences and themes. These are signs of convergence despite clear differences between those represented by the LCWE and those involved in the WCC Committee on World Mission and Evangelism.

See also Ecumenism; Evangelicalism; Evangelicalism, Theology of; Missionary Organizations; Missions to Jews; Missions

References and Further Reading

Bosch, D.J. “Ecumenicals and Evangelicals: A Growing Relationship?” The Ecumenical Review 40 (1988):458–472.

———. “Your Will Be Done: Critical Reflections on San Antonio.” Missionalia 17 (1989):126–138.

———. Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission. New York: Orbis Books, 1991, pp. 405–407, 412, 418–419, 438, 452, 461, 505.

Howard, D.M. The Dream that Would not Die: The Birth and Growth of the World Evangelical Fellowship 1846–1986. Sydney, Australia: Paternoster, 1986.

“The Lausanne Covenant.” <http://www.gospelcom.net/lcwe/covenant.html>.

“Records of the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization—Collection 46,” revised January 23, 2002. <http://www.wheaton.edu/bgc/archives/GUIDES/046.htm>.

Stott, John R.W. “The Lausanne Covenant: An Exposition and Commentary.”

<http://www.gospelcom.net/lcwe/LOP/lop03.htm>

CHARLES J.FENSHAM

LAVATER, JOHANN KASPAR (1741–1801)

Swiss philosopher and writer. Lavater was born in Zürich to a well-respected family on November 15, 1741. After studying THEOLOGY and traveling through GERMANY (1763–1764), which increased his attraction to moderate forms of ENLIGHTENMENT thought, he worked as a writer in his native city.

In 1768 Lavater experienced a complete religious transformation. Christ became central to his thought and works, and Lavater wanted to demonstrate the imminence of Christ’s presence on Earth. Thus he sought contact with people who were gifted as mediums and “faith healers.” Lavater believed that through Christ, the divine powers inherent in every human being could be given an earthly presence, but that complete likeness to Christ could come only in the afterlife. Because he accepted these notions of manifest transcendental experience, Lavater was especially criticized by Enlightenment thinkers.

In 1769 Lavater became the deacon of the Waisenhauskirche, a church related to the orphanage in Zürich, and in 1775 became a minister there. He became the deacon of Peterskirche in 1778 and its minister in 1786. He explored theology and philosophy, poetry and art, psychology and pedagogy, and politics and societal issues. From his extensive literary output, three works are of special significance: Aussichten in die Ewigkeit (Prospects for Eternity) (1768–1778), Geheimes Tagebuch (Secret Diary)

(1771), and Physiognomischen Fragmente (Essays on Physiognomy) (1775/1778, published in numerous English editions). The great breadth of his interests and the aura of his personality, as well as his many travels to Germany, DENMARK, and western SWITZERLAND all provided him personal contacts and correspondence with many of his famous contemporaries, including JOHANN WOLFGANG, VON GOETHE, JOHANN GOTTFRIED HERDER, and JOHANN HEINRICH JUNG-STILLING. Many of these friendships he also destroyed. After the FRENCH REVOLUTION—which he at first heralded and later condemned—Lavater vigorously engaged political and patriotic issues in Switzerland. Because of his criticism of the Swiss Republic, he was deported to Basel. During the French occupation of Zürich (1799), he was wounded by a bullet that eventually took his life on January 2, 1801.

Lavater's ideas about physiognomy were incorporated in works of literature (e.g., Dickens) and art. His emphasis on sensitivity and subjectivity influenced PIETISM, as well as ROMANTICISM and early Idealism.

See also Transcendentalism

References and Further Reading

Guidaudeau, Oliver. Jean-Gaspard Lavater. Étude sur la vie et sa pensée jusqu'en 1786. Paris: Alcan, 1924.

Sauer, Klaus Martin. Die Predigtätigkeit Johann Kaspar Lavater (1741–1801). Darstellung und Quellengrundlage. Zürich, Switzerland: Theologischer Verlag Zürich, 1988.

Weigelt, Horst. Johann Kaspar Lavater. Leben, Werk und Wirkung. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1991.

———, ed. Das Anlitz Gottes im Anlitz, des Menschen. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, 1994.

HORST WEIGELT

LAW, WILLIAM (1686–1761)

English theologian. Born in 1686 in Northamptonshire, ENGLAND, William Law was a graduate of CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY in 1708; he subsequently earned an M.A. (1712) and was ordained in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By 1727 he had found stable employment as tutor to the Gibbon family, which had strong Tory connections.

Law's theological views became associated with those of the Non-Jurors, and he declined to take the oath of allegiance at the accession of George I. Re-reflecting a theological position characteristic of the High Church party, he wrote in aggressive defense of the Christian life as an embodiment of virtue. He confronted laxity in the church's leaders, and he attacked such popular amusements of the day as the stage. By the 1720s the distinctiveness of Law's out-look was becoming apparent. His noted work, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, appeared in 1728. Its appearance made plain his increasing interest in mystical writers and brought him to the attention of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. As the Methodist movement gained momentum, the Wesleys and Law launched an intense and mutually respectful but ultimately brief conversation. Yet there were parallels between Law's intention and the Wesleys' achievement. In 1739 Law published The Grounds and Reasons of Christian Regeneration, or the New Birth, a work that early Methodists found congenial. He also founded a school at which he promoted a religious, disciplined life. Another immensely popular work of his was The Nature and Design of Christianity, published in 1748, which saw over fifteen editions.

Law died after a brief illness on April 9, 1761. As a teacher and author on the religious life, he influenced succeeding generations of religious reformers in METHODISM and in the OXFORD MOVEMENT.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Law, William. Christian Perfection. Carol Stream, IL: 1975.

Secondary Sources:

Baker, Eric W. A Herald of the Evangelical Revival. London: Epworth, 1948.

Clarkson, George E. The Mysticism of William Law. New York: Peter Lang, 1992.

Walker, Arthur Keith. William Law: His Life and Thought. London: SPCK, 1973.

WILLIAM SACHS

LEADE, JANE WARD (1623–1704)

English writer. Born in 1623 in Norfolk, England, Jane Ward became a well-known Protestant visionary, millenarian, and spiritual autobiographer. When she was fifteen years old, a whispering voice urged her to turn from frivolity at a Christmas celebration to participate in a spiritual dance. This aural religious experience initiated an inner crisis, which ended three years later with a vision of pardon. At the age of twenty-one, financial circumstances necessitated her marriage to William Leade, a distant relative. Widowed at forty-six, she committed herself to a life of spiritual virginity, mysticism, prophecy, and prolific writing.

Introduced to the philosophy of JAKOB BOEHME in English translation, Leade was profoundly influenced by his work with its emphasis on mystic revelation and a feminine divine principle. Her four-volume spiritual autobiography, A Fountain of Gardens (1696–1701), records her visions, many focusing on Sophia or Wisdom, a figure central to Boehme's work. Leade published more than a dozen other books, including a spiritual guide, The Heavenly Cloud (1681), and a commentary on Apocalypse, The Revelation of Revelations (1683). Her following grew with the German and Dutch translations of her writings.

With her adopted son, Dr. Francis Lee (who later married her daughter Barbara), Leade founded the Philadelphian Society, a forerunner of the Theosophists. With Leade as its prophet, the society was active in England, GERMANY, and Holland.

Struggling financially in her old age and blind, Leade continued to write by dictating her material to Lee until shortly before her death in 1704. Her prose, often embedded with poetry, emphasizes the inner light of spiritual intuition that guides the soul to its divine origin. Although her work is generally unavailable in print except for excerpts in anthologies, much is accessible electronically at the website <http://www.sigler.org/shofar/janeleade>.

References and Further Reading

- Shawcross, John T. "Jane Ward Leade." In Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 131, Seventeenth-Century Nondramatic Poets edited by M. Thomas Hester, 120–122. Detroit, MI: Gale, 1933.
- Smith, Catherine F. "Jane Leade: The Feminist Mind and Art of a Seventeenth-Century Protestant Mystic" In Women of Spirit: Female Leadership in the Jewish and Christian Traditions edited by Rosemary Ruether and Eleanor McLaughlin, 183–203. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1979.
- . "Jane Leade's Wisdom: Women and Prophecy in Seventeenth-Century England." In Poetic Prophecy in Western Literature, edited by Jan Wojick and Raymond-Jean Frontain, 55–63. Rutherford, NJ: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1984.

FRANCES M. MALPEZZI

LEE, ANN (1736–1784)

English church reformer. Founder of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, or SHAKERS, Ann Lee was born in Manchester, England, in 1736. A millworker since her early teens, she came into contact with James and Jane Wardley, former Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), whose enthusiastic manner of WORSHIP had earned them the nickname "Shakers" and who prophesied the imminence of Christ's return. Against her will, Lee married Abraham Standerin in 1762 and gave birth to four children, all of whom died in infancy.

Convinced that her children's deaths were punishment for what she perceived as her own carnality, Lee began a life of ASCETICISM and became convinced that sexual relations were the source of all evil. She and the Wardleys began to spread her gospel of chastity and were twice imprisoned for desecrating the Sabbath. While confined in the Manchester Infirmary, Lee experienced a vision of Adam and Eve's original sin. She proclaimed that Christ was dwelling in her—a claim that her followers recognized as the Second Coming.

In 1774, "Mother Ann" or "Ann the Word," as she was now called, migrated to North America to proclaim her revelation in an environment more hospitable than Manchester. She and other Shakers eventually settled near Albany, New York, where a religious revival had produced an audience receptive to her message that the millennium had already begun (see REVIVALS). Though her PACIFISM resulted in imprisonment for aiding the British in 1780, Lee attracted a considerable following and, after her release, she successfully proselytized throughout New York and into New England. Although she died in 1784, her labors laid the foundation for eleven Shaker communities, some of which endured into the twentieth century.

See also: Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

Marini, Stephen A. "A New View of Mother Ann Lee and the Rise of American Shakerism."

Shaker Quarterly 28 (1990): 47–62, 95–111.

Stern, Stephen J. The Shaker Experience in America: A History of the United Society of Believers.

New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1992.

WILLIAM M. CLEMENTS

LEGG, JAMES (1815–1897)

Scottish dissenter. Born into a Congregationalist merchant family, James Legge was the last of four sons. As did his eldest brother, George, he graduated from King's College in Aberdeen, Scotland, and from the Congregationalist seminary in London, Highbury College. Both James and George became noted Christian leaders. After serving with the London Missionary Society among Chinese people in Malacca (1840–1842) and Hong Kong (1842–1873), Legge retired in SCOTLAND. Yet after he received international honors for his outstanding sinological achievements, supporters urged Anglican academics in Corpus Christi College, Oxford, to take this nonconformist as the university's first professor in Chinese language and literature, a position he held from 1876 until his death in 1897.

Scottish Dissenter Orientation

In Aberdeen, Legge excelled in Latin and philosophy, being deeply impressed by the writings of Dugald Stewart (1753–1828), a second-generation philosopher of SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM. This NeoAristotelian empirical philosophy argued against DAVID HUME (1711–1776) for proofs of the existence of God by means of natural theology, an approach deeply influencing the American theologian, WILLIAM PALEY (1743–1805). In addition, it pressed on readers their duties first to God and then to humans, while also providing a wide-ranging account of various levels of warranted beliefs that common-sense understandings also supported. When added to the rigorous training Legge received as a child from the WESTMINSTER CONFESSIONS and the disciplined spiritual form of Congregational life that bordered on SABBATARIANISM, this Scottish philosophy provided an intellectual framework for a comprehensive view of CULTURE and a flexible theistic worldview. Recognizing that there were other kinds of theism beside Christianity, Legge in 1835 began studying Christian scriptures seriously in his typically thorough manner and was quietly converted, joining a local Congregational church in 1836. One year later he applied for seminary studies, specializing in MISSIONS.

Other significant theological influences came from his elder brother's theological writings and the extensive publications of his future father-in-law, John Morison (d. 1858), a Director of the London Missionary Society and editor of that society's periodical, The Evangelical Magazine and Missionary Chronicle. Both of these men supported a "moderating" CALVINISM, supported by a postmillennial view of salvation history. This particular form of millennialism promoted the belief that Christ's Spirit would use the efforts of Christians within the world to create a millennial kingdom; their creative efforts reaching a threshold, whole nations were expected to become filled with humane virtues and spiritual excellences informed by Protestant Christian values. Although not unaware of many ideological hindrances and intellectual challenges to this particular ESCHATALOGY, George Legge (1802–1861) in particular promoted a harmonious vision linking together a humble rationality, systematic scientific discovery, and Christian THEOLOGY. James Legge adopted all of these theological positions as his own, as manifest in his published sermons and more than four hundred extant sermon manuscripts.

Initial Chinese Cultural Challenges

Following in the trail of two notable Protestant pioneer missionaries to CHINA, Robert Morrison (1782–1834) and William Milne (1785–1822), Legge became the principal of the Anglo-Chinese College in Malacca soon after arriving there. This small school he transferred to the newly established British colony of Hong Kong in 1842, teaching Chinese students there until the college closed in 1856. During this period, Legge built up a friendship with the slightly younger Ho Tsun-Sheen (1817–1871), first his Cantonese teacher and later a career evangelist and copastor under the aegis of the London Missionary Society. Together, these two men faced the immensely important problem of how to translate theological terms for "God," "Holy Spirit," "human spirit," and other terms into Chinese. Initially taking a position promoted by Morrison early in his career, Legge ploddingly pursued related studies and was profoundly influenced by Ho Tsun-Sheen's commitment, coming ultimately in 1848 to adopt an alternative position. Already critically informed through Protestant writings in comparative religious study produced by FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE (1805–1872) and Cambridge's Charles Hardwick (1821–1859), Legge became intensely involved in public debates over this translation problem. Using Scottish Realist philosophy and extensive studies in canonical and popular Chinese writings to argue for adopting terms found in the Ruist ("Confucian") scriptures, Legge's final book-length essay of 1852 manifested an informed awareness of much Chinese literature and a generally accommodating strategy for BIBLE TRANSLATIONS. Although for other historical and institutional reasons, his arguments did not convince the publishers of Chinese Bibles in the BIBLE SOCIETIES in Britain or the UNITED STATES, this study became the intellectual foundation for his future missiological developments.

Other matters of basic cultural importance also had to be addressed among Chinese persons. The Chinese had no religious precedents for a “Sabbath culture” which Legge’s Scottish Dissenter background and training especially emphasized, so these concepts had to be addressed in sermons and pamphlets. In this realm, Legge remained a convinced Congregationalist in ecclesiastical POLITY, a Reformed Protestant in supporting the LORD’S SUPPER and BAPTISM as the main ordinances, accepting the BAPTISM of infants, and promoting a soberly reflective Christian experience of WORSHIP. With Ho Tsun-Sheen, Legge willingly adapted all of these elements of Sabbath culture into the Chinese context, filling it with Ruist-style terms and ritual sensitivities, and so together the two men promoted a Ruified form of Chinese Christian life.

Throughout his more than thirty years of missionary work, Legge never felt moved like JAMES HUDSON TAYLOR (1832–1904) to live among Chinese persons by assuming their style of life, even though Chinese students lived in Legge’s Hong Kong home and Legge was involved daily with Chinese people in their local settings. Nevertheless, the irony remains that Taylor’s missiology was based on confrontational apologetic methods that Legge grew to oppose, preferring instead an accommodationist missiology.

Protestant Literature in Chinese

Both Legge and Ho wrote and published in Chinese, with Legge developing a variety of Protestant LITERATURE in this linguistic media. This included evangelistic and Christian educational literature in several different linguistic ligatures and with different intended audiences: novellas about Joseph and Abraham in a fairly literary Chinese, more popular stories about the Prodigal Son and the Prophet Daniel’s companions written in demotic Cantonese, as well as sermon outlines for evangelists and spiritual handbooks filled with advice and guidance for coolies making dangerous trips on ship to work in gold mines. Regularly woven into the stories were moral and spiritual challenges, often highlighting important passages in the Ruist canon that supported Christian values.

Dissenter Challenges to British Imperialism and Victorian Values

British COLONIALISM had its unseemly side, which Legge, as a Dissenter, felt obliged to expose. Already in 1844, Legge and Ho had published their criticisms of the opium trade, a battle Legge continued to fight throughout his long life. In Hong Kong he took a public stand against mercantile greed and its excesses, challenged the legitimacy of the coolie trade as just another form of SLAVERY, and led a temporarily successful public campaign against gambling. Once settled in Hong Kong, he established with other missionaries a Union Chapel that sought to embody a Protestant ECUMENISM, while he remained a committed opponent to Roman Catholic traditions.

All of these prophetic stances were consistent with Legge’s understanding of the process of SALVATION: a person must repent from sins, be saved by divine GRACE through an initial act of converting FAITH, and then be sustained through faith in pursuing the KINGDOM OF GOD by means of a regenerating practice of Christian virtues. This he taught in a series of sermons presented in Hong Kong in 1872 under a title borrowed from JOSEPH BUTLER (1692–1752), “The Four-fold State of Man.” Believing that the Christian life should be growing in sanctity under regenerating grace, Legge expected that this striving toward excellence in all realms of cultured life would be the human means by which the divinely intended millennium would be realized.

Once resituated in Oxford, Legge continued his association with Dissenter churches and missionary institutions. In addition to supporting anti-opium lobbying of Parliament and participating actively in seeking British responses to famine relief for Chinese victims, Legge also promoted educational developments reflecting Nonconformist values. He served on committees that created the first WOMEN’S highereducation institution at Oxford, Somerville College, and supported the establishment of a distinguished Dissenter institution there called Mansfield College.

Protestant Scholarship Engaging China’s Religions

Legge’s greatest missiological and scholarly contributions appeared in his extensive publications related to Ruist and Daoist canonical literature. While working extensively in Chinese original sources and their commentarial traditions, Legge not only addressed relevant sources in European sinological traditions, but also wove theistic and Christian evaluations in generally critical and prudential ways into his translations and interpretations. His initial evaluation of Master Kong (“Confucius,” 551–479 B.C.) in 1861 in the Chinese Classics was decidedly negative and uncharitable. But in the same year he publicly delighted in the philosophical debates on human nature promoted by Master Meng (“Mencius,” c. 372 B.C.—289 B.C.), comparing his doctrines favorably with those of JOSEPH BUTLER. Later he carefully weighed differences between “myths,” “legends,” “traditions,” and justifiable “historical facts” to decipher ancient Ruist historical texts and begin a process of relieving Master Kong from many damaging legendary claims against his character. Although textually a critical exegete, Legge could still admire certain heroic Chinese within Ruist scriptures and their commentators, but was only able to resolve his scholarly and religious criticisms of Master Kong after making pilgrimages in 1873 to the altar of Heaven in Beijing and to the sage’s home town.

Always a confirmed Christian advocate, Legge afterward formulated new ways to address religious themes in Ruist traditions, and so after 1877 he became a controversial advocate of an accommodationist missionary approach to that tradition. Once adopting this position after careful considerations, Legge maintained it to the end of his days, emphasizing it in his partially revised evaluation of Master Kong in the Chinese Classics of 1893.

In this regard, Legge also reflected on Christian Scriptures and their status as revealed and historical texts, particularly as he related comparative religious study to missiology. In an unpublished lecture of 1884 Legge, having been trained in biblical redaction criticism, still considered the BIBLE to be divinely revealed and inspired, comparing its claims about Jesus the Messiah to be historical rather than mythical, especially in comparison to Ruist, Daoist, and Buddhist claims about their founders.

Legge's scholarly corpus of translations and commentaries of the Ruist canonical literature extends through eight volumes of the Chinese Classics and the first four volumes of Sacred Books of China (published between 1861 and 1885). In addition to these, Legge produced renderings in classical Daoism (1891) and a few minor Buddhist texts (1886–1888), always adding to them his reflective Nonconformist and critical Scottish realist assessments. His scholarly interest in “Nestorian” Christians who lived in China during the Tang dynasty (seventh to ninth centuries) was also addressed in an annotated translation and accompanied by an interpretive commentary.

The sum of Legge's assessment of Chinese religious traditions was summarily expressed in 1880 in the first university textbook that he published on Chinese religions, but some of its most important arguments were summarized and argued more concisely a few years later in a pamphlet dealing with “the whole duty of man” in Confucianism and Christianity. There he claimed that though there was much that was admirable in Ruist accounts of human morality, there were notably no similarly general claims related to humans' duties to the supreme being, and so the quality of even the human relationships was at times weakened by a lack of divine motives for sustaining and renewing these relationships. Ultimately Legge sensed that Ruist traditions would fail to survive the progressive encroachment of international foreign powers. Though disappointed at the end of his life that millennial hopes had not been realized, Legge remained faithful to his Christian calling. Calling the Chinese sage his “master” in the mid-1880s, Legge held Jesus Christ as his “master and Lord,” and so his missiologic aim remained essentially what it was in 1872: to lead Chinese persons to “look away from Confucius to another Teacher.”

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Dissent; Kingdom of God Missionary Organizations; Millenarians and Millennialism; Nonconformity;

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Legge, James. The Notions of the Chinese Concerning God and Spirits, with an Examination of the Defense of an Essay on the Proper Rendering of the Words Elohim and Theos, into the Chinese Language by William Boone, D.D. Hong Kong: Hong Kong Register Office, 1852.
- . “The Sacred Books of China.” In The Sacred Books of the East, Vols. 3, 16, 27–28, and 39–40, edited by F. Max Müller. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1879–1891.
- . The Religions of China: Confucianism and T'foism Described and Compared with Christianity. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1880.
- . “Christianity and Confucianism Compared in Their Teaching on the Whole Duty of Man” In Non-Christian, Religions of the World. Edited by William Muir, New York: Fleming and Revell, 1884, pp. 3–36.
- . Christianity in China: Nestorianism, Roman Catholicism, Protestantism. London: Trübner, 1888.

Secondary Sources:

- Girardot, Norman J. The Victorian Translation of China: James Legge's Oriental Pilgrimage. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.

Legge, George. Lectures on Theology, Science and Revelation. Edited by James Legge and John Legge. London: Jackson, Walford and Hodder, 1863.

Pfister, Lauren F. Striving for "The Whole Duty of Man": James Legge and the Scottish Protestant Encounter with China. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 2003.

———. "The Mengzian Matrix for Accommodationist Missionary Apologetics." Monumenta Serica 50 (2002):1–25.

LAUREN F. PFISTER

LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM (1646–1716)

German writer and theologian. Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz was a Lutheran philosopher, mathematician, and theological irenic who spent most of his career in the diplomatic service of the Hannoverian royalty. During his life, Leibniz spearheaded numerous efforts, all ultimately unsuccessful, to secure reunion between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and later between Lutheran and Reformed churches. In addition, Leibniz's philosophical views, popularized through the work of CHRISTIAN WOLFF (1679–1754), were a centerpiece of the German ENLIGHTENMENT of the early eighteenth century.

Leibniz was born into a noble academic family on July 1, 1646 in Leipzig, Germany. His father was professor of moral philosophy at the University of Leipzig, where Leibniz went on to study law and philosophy from 1661 to 1666. He completed his education in 1667, receiving his Doctorate of Law from the University of Altdorf.

After receiving his degree, Leibniz was offered a university post in Altdorf, which he refused in favor of a diplomatic position under the elector of Mainz, Philipp von Schönborn, accepted at the urging of the Schönborn's influential minister, Johann Christian von Boineburg. During this period Leibniz began an active intellectual career, publishing treatises in law, philosophy, the natural sciences, and mathematics. His primary diplomatic mission during the period, however, was to seek ways in which to diminish the unsettling military threat to GERMANY by FRANCE and its king, Louis XIV (1638–1715). To that end he was sent to Paris in 1672 to present a plan to the French king proposing a military conquest of Egypt. Leibniz was not able to present the plan and, after the deaths of Schönborn and Boineburg, returned to Hannover in 1676, where he entered into diplomatic service under Duke Johann Friedrich.

The remainder of Leibniz's career was spent in the service of a succession of Hannoverian rulers, concluding with Elector Georg Ludwig (1660–1727), later King George I of England. Initially hired to serve as the Hannoverian librarian, Leibniz was later commissioned as councilor to the duke, thus assuming oversight for a variety of projects. His primary official task during his years in Hannover was to compile a history of the House of Brunswick for his Hannoverian employers. Despite expending a great deal of effort on the project, Leibniz's efforts yielded only a single volume, much to the frustration of his patrons.

Although he published a number of essays in scholarly journals on a variety of topics, Leibniz published only a single book-length monograph during his life, the Essais de Theodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme et l'origine du mal of 1710. In this wide-ranging treatise in philosophical theology, Leibniz responds to the problem of evil by defending the thesis, famously satirized in Voltaire's Candide, that this world is the "best of all possible worlds." Leibniz's reasoning for the claim was grounded in his belief in the so-called Principle of Sufficient Reason. According to the principle, every event, including God's creation of the world, has a sufficient reason explaining why it occurs rather than not. When considering God's perfect goodness, Leibniz thought it clear that the only reason for God's choosing to create one world over another was its relative perfection, and thus, the world actually created must be the best of all possible worlds.

Leibniz's philosophical and theological ideas became influential in pre-Kantian Germany primarily by way of the popularizing work of Christian Wolff, professor of mathematics and philosophy at HALLE and Marburg.

Beyond Leibniz's philosophical contributions to the German enlightenment of the eighteenth century, he is widely noted for his irenic attempts at reunion, first between Protestants and Roman Catholics and later between Calvinists and Lutherans. Beginning in the early 1680s, the Hannoverian court assembled a panel including Leibniz, GERHARD MOLANUS, and Frederick Calixt, son of GEORGE CALIXT, to frame a proposal for reunion to present to the chief Roman Catholic reunion representative, Cristobal de Rojas y Spinola.

The key to Protestant reunion for Leibniz, as well as for Rojas and the theologians at Hannover, was finding an agreeable way to set aside the canons of Trent and to submit the disputed questions to a future council composed of clergy from both Protestant and Roman flanks. Leibniz argued that Trent was not properly an ecumenical council, and thus its declarations and any affirmations of it based on its status as an ecumenical council could be set aside.

The Hannoverians believed that such a position might be well received, especially among the French Roman Catholic clergy. Leibniz thus undertook to send a proposal for reunion directly to the influential French bishop Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet (1627–1704), Leibniz's hopes were buoyed when Bossuet responded initially in encouraging terms.

By 1691, however, the plans for reunion were failing. Bossuet had since made it clear that he was not to be moved on the matter of the ecumenicity of Trent. Leibniz realized that such a position was tantamount to bidding "adieu la réunion." With the death of Rojas, in March of 1695, any hopes of reunion were effectively dashed.

Shortly afterwards Leibniz took up in earnest the formidable project of reunion among Protestant sects. He contended that reunion would require three steps: civil unity, ecclesiastical toleration, and finally, unity of theological belief. Leibniz expressed some doubts about the prospect for this third step, noting that doctrinal differences on predestination and the Eucharist seemed to be especially recalcitrant.

Between 1700 and 1705 Leibniz and Daniel Jablonski, Brandenburg Court Chaplain, collaborated on a project that outlined a theological compromise based largely on the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. In June of 1706, however, an unrelated political dispute flared between Hannover and Brandenburg, leading Georg Ludwig to order Leibniz to cease all negotiations on Protestant union.

Although no sustained effort was spent on reunion efforts after this point, Leibniz's mature writing shows a sustained interest in irenic theology. Leibniz died on November 14, 1716.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Leibniz, Gottfried. Sämtliche Schriften und Briefe. Darmstadt: O.Reichl, 1923–. Also: Berlin: Akademie, 1950.

Leibniz, Gottfried. Philosophical Papers and Letters. Translated by Leroy Loemker. Dordrecht: D.Reidel, 1976.

Secondary Sources:

Aiton, E.J. Leibniz: A Biography, Bristol: Adam Hilger Ltd., 1985.

Broad, C.D. Leibniz: An Introduction. London: Cambridge University Press, 1975.

Courdert, Alison, Gordon Weiner, and Richard Popkin, eds. Leibniz, Mysticism, and Religion. Dordrecht: Kluwer Academic Publishers, 1998.

Jolly, Nicholas, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Leibniz, New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Jordan, G.J. The Reunion of the Churches. London: Constable & Company, 1927.

Loemker, Leroy. Struggle for Synthesis. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1972.

MICHAEL J.MURRAY

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729–1781)

German playwright and author. Lessing was born on January 22, 1729, in Kamenz, Saxony, the eldest surviving son of an orthodox Lutheran pastor, one of the first translators of Tillotson. His mother was daughter of a pastor. Kamenz is near HERRNHUT, the estate of Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF who settled the Moravian Brethren there in 1722. Lessing's Thoughts on the Moravians (1750, posthumously published in 1784) praised the Pietist wish to take religion out of the head and put it into the heart (see PIETISM).

From 1741 to 1746 he attended the St. Afra boarding school founded by the duke of Saxony in Meissen in 1543. In September 1746 he went to the University of Leipzig to study THEOLOGY, which he soon neglected to devote himself to the theater. At Leipzig, he published his first poems and stories (1747). In 1748 he transferred to medicine, but abandoned that to go to Berlin, resolved to live by his pen. He completed his Master's degree at Wittenberg in 1752, in preparation for which he worked on his Rettungen (1753–1754), vindications of thinkers whose writings had been condemned as heterodox. Subjects included the natural scientist Hieronymus Cardanus (1501–1576), accused of atheism for comparing Christianity with Islam and Judaism; [of an Ineptus Religiosus (1652),] whose book contained the famous sentence, “Read the Bible just as you read Livy”; and Johannes Cochlaeus (1479–1552), the strongest and most prolific Roman Catholic critic of MARTIN LUTHER, concerning what Lessing ironically called the “small matter” of indulgences. Later he published other vindications: Berengar of Tours’ lost reply to Lanfranc on the LORD’S SUPPER (1770), which to his amusement was welcomed by orthodox Lutherans; a defense of GOTTFRIED LEIBNIZ on eternal punishment (1773); and a work on Adam Neusner, a Unitarian who fled to Constantinople to escape persecution and became a Muslim (1774). In 1756 Lessing translated A System of Moral Philosophy (1755) by Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), which extolled the moral sense, and A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728) by William Law (1686–1761).

Lessing wrote four great plays: Miss Sara Sampson (1755), the first German domestic tragedy; Minna von Barnholm (1767), the first truly modern German comedy; Emilia Galotti (1772); and Nathan the Wise (1779). He wrote a book on aesthetics, Laocoon, An Essay on the Limits of Painting and Poetry (1766), and theater criticism, Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767–1768).

In December 1769 Lessing was appointed librarian of the duke of Brunswick’s huge library at Wolfenbüttel, with permission to publish without censorship. In 1771 he became a freemason and was engaged to marry Eva Kšnig, widow of an old friend from his Hamburg days, but he could not afford to marry her until 1776. Thereafter followed a blissfully happy year, but on December 25, 1777 their son was born and died some hours later, and Eva herself died in January 1778.

In 1774 Lessing had published the first Fragment of an Unknown, which he pretended to have found in manuscript in the library but which was really part of a large Apology or Defense for Rational Worshippers of God by HERMANN SAMUEL REIMARUS (1694–1768), professor of oriental languages in the Hamburg Academic Gymnasium. The manuscript had been entrusted to Lessing by Reimarus’s daughter Elise. The first installment from the manuscript, or fragment, “The Toleration of Deists,” passed without comment.

In 1777, during the happiest year of his life, he published five further extracts (“On the Decrying of Reason from the Pulpit”; “On the Impossibility of a Revelation which all Men can Believe in a Well-Founded Way”; “The Passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea”; “That the Books of the Old Testament were not written to Reveal a Religion”; “On the Resurrection Narrative”). To these Lessing appended the counter-theses of the editor (including paragraphs 1–53 of The Education of the Human Race [1780] as though the work of someone else). Lessing argued that the fragments might embarrass the theologian, by knocking down the arguments with which he thought to buttress Christianity, but not the Christian. For Christians their religion is simply there: the paralytic does not care whose theory about the electric spark that cured him was correct. Objections to literal details and to the BIBLE were not objections to the spirit and to religion. Lessing warned against Bibliolatry (a term he found in English). He claimed to be following Luther’s spirit if not Luther’s writings. Revealed religion contained all the truths taught by reason, but supported them with different argumentation.

The orthodox reaction to the publication of the fragments was fierce. Lessing answered these attacks with a series of pamphlets: On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power, with an appendix The Testament of John, a dialogue in which the anonymous author of the main pamphlet asks an objecto, "...which of the two is the more difficult? To accept and confess the Christian dogmas, or to practice Christian love?"; A Rejoinder to a defense of the resurrection story; and, in reply to Johann Melchior Goeze (1717–1786), a large number of pamphlets beginning with A Parable, followed by Axioms, If There Are Any in Such Matters, which provoked a reply from Goeze, who challenged Lessing to explain what the Christian religion would be if the Bible were lost. Lessing answered in G.E.Lessing's Necessary Answer to a very Unnecessary Question of Herr Hauptpastor Goeze in Hamburg, stating that the Christian religion was contained in the creeds of the first four centuries.

In 1778 Lessing published the longest fragment from Reimarus, "On the Intentions of Jesus and his Disciples," sharply distinguishing between the intentions of Jesus and those of the disciples. In July of that year the duke of Brunswick intervened to rule that Lessing would now have to submit his writings on religion to the censor, and in November 1780 Lessing was arraigned by an ecclesiastical court for publishing this pamphlet. Lessing turned back to the theater. In Nathan the Wise (1779) he pleaded for tolerance of all religions, provided they show love to all. He drew on his friend Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), whom he first met in 1753, for his portrait of Nathan, the Jew. This play initiated Germans into the world of theater for over a century.

Lessing made a contribution to the study of the Gospels in New Hypothesis concerning the Evangelists regarded as merely human Historians (1778, published posthumously). The first Christians, lawobservant Jews, collected narratives of Jesus written in Hebrew or Aramaic. Matthew extracted material from this collection and translated it into Greek; Luke made his own arrangement of order and translated it into Greek; and Mark drew on a less complete copy. John had to write his Gospel to prevent Christianity from dying away as a mere Jewish sect; he alone showed the Godhead of Jesus and gave Christianity its true consistency so that it would survive "as long as there are men who think they need a mediator between themselves and the Deity; that is, for ever" (para. 63).

The Education of the Human Race (1777; published in 1780, the year before his death) proved to be immensely popular among educated Germans, enabling the Protestant churches to retain the nominal loyalty of a high proportion of the population. The author (whom Lessing introduces as though he were another than himself) "has set himself upon a high eminence from which he believes it possible to see beyond the allotted path of his present day's journey." God (i.e., Nature, para. 84) has used revelation (as well as reason) to bring humanity from the age of the Old Testament, which taught the unity of God, to the age of the New Testament, in which Christ taught the immortality of the soul, to the age of the new eternal gospel, in which right will be done because it is right, not because of any reward. The doctrines of the Trinity (cf. The Christianity of Reason [1752–1753, published 1784]), of Original Sin, and of the Son's satisfaction could be given a rational reading. Finally, why should not every individual have been present more than once in this world? Dubious historical facts of alleged revelation have led to reasonable truth sooner than the necessary truths would otherwise have come to be understood. The ugly broad ditch, not to be leapt over by reason, from accidental truths of history to necessary truths of reason (On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power, written the same year), was bridged by the process of history in this best of worlds (Leibniz).

In 1785 F.H.Jacobi claimed that when he showed Lessing JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE'S unpublished fragmentary drama Prometheus, less than a year before Lessing's death, Lessing said he concurred with Goethe's view as a result of his own reading of Spinoza: it was not possible to believe in the creator-God, for the Deity is One and All. Humans have no need of free will. Jacobi's book led to a lively argument in which Moses Mendelssohn defended Lessing against the charge of Spinozism.

Lessing died on February 15, 1781 in Brunswick. He influenced SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN BAUR, DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS, and SØREN KIERKEGAARD.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Chadwick, Henry. Lessing's Theological Writings: Selections in Translation with an Introductory Essay. A Library of Modern Religious Thought. London: Adam & Charles Black, 1956.

Trillhaas, Wolfgang. "Zur Wirkungsgeschichte Lessings in der evangelischen Theologie," Germany In Das Bild Lessings in der Geschichte, edited by Herbert G.Göpfert, 57–67. Heidelberg, Germany: Lambert Schneider, 1981.

Secondary Source:

Fick, Monika. Lessing-Handbuch: Leben-Werk-Wirkung. Stuttgart/Weimar, Germany: J.B.Metzler, 2000.

J.C.O'NEILL

LEUENBERG

See Ecumenical Agreements

LEVELLERS

In the heat of CIVIL WAR in ENGLAND and the destabilization that accompanied it, the Levellers emerged in the years 1644 to 1649 as one of the most conspicuous and noisy "left-wing" popular movements. (The derogatory label, apparently, was first coined by Charles I.) A great deal of their history is elusive—there are no membership lists of Leveller groups—although much is clear. Not exclusively plebeian—they had supporters higher up the social scale and their rank and file, it seems, was swelled with disgruntled, cast-off younger sons of the gentry—and not the most extreme of the radical wings of the 1640s, the Levellers drew their following primarily from London and the New Model Army. As references in their publications to trades and other occupations make clear, Levellers were chiefly an urban phenomenon. Leveller leaders like John Lilbourne (1614–1657), Richard Overton (1642–1663), and William Walwyn (1600–1680) wrote prolifically about the inequalities of wealth, about the sovereignty of the people, about the reform of Parliament and parliamentary representation, the extension of the franchise, about the need for regular elections that would increase the dependency of members of parliament on the electorate, about reform of the legal system and the CHURCH, about free trade, and about religious TOLERATION. Trenchant Leveller voices were plainly heard in the famous Putney Debates of 1647 when army officers and ordinary soldiers came together to air their views on England's post-Civil War future. Leveller publications like The Case of the Armie Truly Stated and An Agreement of the People offered popular rallying cries. For a time they had their own “newspaper.” Levellers, in short, had a propaganda machine at their disposal.

OLIVER CROMWELL and other army leaders who had led these men into battle and admired their spirit and bravery for a time, found Levellers politically useful as a battering ram against both King Charles I and Parliament. Yet in truth Levellers were never as influential as they seemed. They were easily sidelined in the swiftly changing events of early 1649, when the king was put through a brisk public trial and then speedily brought to execution. Desperate but small-scale Leveller mutinies in London, Wiltshire, and Oxfordshire were, with no great effort, suppressed and the ringleaders put to death. (Burford church in Oxford was the most famous setting of Leveller defeat.) However, there were relatively few martyrs and that fact perhaps in itself is an index of their real weakness: a few executions were enough. Cromwell carried the day. Lilburne, Overton, and Walwyn were arrested and imprisoned but released after taking an oath of loyalty to the republic.

By the end of 1649 Levellers had clearly been overcome and although memories of their brief-lived successes of the previous few years may have provided models for the deployment of mass propaganda and mass movements after the Restoration, they soon went into eclipse. With isolated exceptions, they had to wait until the twentieth century to be rediscovered and widely celebrated by liberals and Marxists, the English and Americans, alike. Hailed as democrats ahead of their time, farsighted progressives, the first real socialists in England, protagonists of universal suffrage, Levellers and their leaders were emphatically rehabilitated, although such plaudits frequently went over the top. Levellers were indeed “democrats” but they believed firmly in a property-owning, not total, democracy in which the rights of small property owners were upheld against the oppressive claims of the rich and powerful. Those who had a dependent status—laborers, servants, apprentices, beggars, and all WOMEN (together constituting a numerical majority of the population of the day)—were pointedly excluded from the Leveller franchise. Moreover, Levellers held back from interfering with the rights attached to private property. Diggers, not Levellers, were the proto-communists of mid-seventeenth-century England.

Leveller politics—their manifestos, the tracts of their leaders, their contributions to the Putney Debates—have almost always tended to occupy center stage in discussions of the movement. Yet in a period in which politics and religion were inseparable, Leveller insistence on equity and equality clearly took shape within a Christian/Protestant framework. The historian Christopher Hill indeed has connected the Levellers with a trajectory of underground ideas going back to the Lollards of the fifteenth century (Hill 1979:49–66). Religious liberty and political liberty for them went hand in hand. For Levellers the BIBLE, which spoke freely and directly to all people, provided overarching truths on all things. Leveller religion was a kind of “ARMINIANISM of the left,” which rejected the exclusivity of Calvinist DOCTRINE in favor of the encouraging belief in the universalism of God’s GRACE, demonstrated by believers in genuine social concern and good works. It helped underpin their convictions about the “natural rights” of humankind. What good was religion if it meant no more than formal observance, pious utterances, psalm singing, private prayer, listening to sermons, and keeping the Sabbath? “Pure and undefiled religion,” declared Walwyn—and he spoke for many Levellers—meant “feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting and comforting the sick, relieving the aged, weak and impotent [and] freeing a commonwealth from all tyrants, oppressors and deceivers” (McMichael and Taft 1989:80, 269, 324). For Levellers, many of the clergy were included among these entrenched “obstacles” to social justice. The very titles of Walwyn’s writings are eloquent expressions of his practical Christianity—“The Power of Love” (1643), “The Compassionate Samaritane” (1644), “Toleration Justified and Persecution Condemned” (1645/6), and “A Still and Soft Voice from the Scriptures” (1647). Christopher Chisman or Cheeseman, a Leveller soldier and later Quaker, echoed Walwyn and went even further in his claims for the necessity of “practical Christianity.”

The religion of the great ones of our age is a mere shadow, and all their pulpit-prattling is nothing; they are only wolves in sheep’s clothing; they are devils transformed into angels of light. But pure religion and undefiled is to visit the fatherless and widows, and to keep ourselves unspotted in the world, which the great professors of our time will not I am sure; for they add house to house, land to land, nay thousands to thousands, while the poor of the kingdom are ready to starve. (Chisman, The Lamb Contending with the Lion, 1649)

Such fundamental convictions underlay all that Levellers said and strove for in politics and for which they have become chiefly famous. For them reformed politics was the natural outcome of true religion. They had fought valiantly in the Civil Wars in the New Model Army—“God’s Army,” no less—to bring about both. Their experience of defeat after 1649 was thus all the more poignant.

See also Communism; Socialism, Christian

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Aylmer, G.E., ed. The Levellers in the English Revolution. London: Thames & Hudson, 1975.
- Haller, W., and G.Davies, eds. The Leveller Tracts 1647–1653. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944.
- McMichael, J.R., and Barbara Taft, eds. The Writings of William Walwyn. Athens, GA: University of Georgia Press, 1989.
- Wolfe, D.M., ed. Leveller Manifestos of the Puritan Revolution. New York: Columbia University Press, 1944.
- Woodhouse, A.S.P., ed. Puritanism and Liberty. Being the Army Debates, 1647–1649. London: J.M.Dent, 1938.

Secondary Sources:

- Brailsford, H.N. The Levellers in the English Revolution. London: The Cresset Press, 1961.
- Gregg, Pauline. Freeborn John. A Biography of John Lilburne. London: Harrap, 1961.
- Davis, J.C. "The Levellers and Christianity." In Politics, Religion and the English Civil War, edited by B.Manning, 125–160. London: E.Arnold, 1973.
- Hill, C. The World Turned Upside Down. Radical Ideas in the English Revolution. London: MT Smith, 1972.
- . "From Lollards to Levellers." In Rebels and Their Causes. Essays in Honour of A.L.Morton, edited by M. Cornforth. London: Lawrence & W., 1979.
- Lindley, K. Popular Politics and Religion in Civil War London. Aldershot, UK: Scolar Press, 1997.
- Manning, B. "The Levellers and Religion." In Radical Religion in the English Revolution, edited by J.F.McGregor and B. Reay, 65–90. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Mendle, M., ed. The Putney Debates of 1647. The Army, The Levellers and the English State. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Robertson, D.B. The Religious Foundations of Leveller Democracy. New York: King's Crown Press, 1951.

R.C.RICHARDSON

LEWIS, C.S. (1898–1963)

A literary and cultural historian, theorist, and critic, a poet and novelist, a moral philosopher, and a Christian apologist, Clive Staples "Jack" Lewis is widely esteemed, especially among Protestants in the United States, for combining academic stature with an ability both to communicate to a wide and diverse audience and to advocate a Christian worldview in opposition to prevailing secular alternatives.

Lewis promoted continuities between post- and pre-war cultures, unlike many Protestant theologians writing after the First and Second World Wars, and he posited continuities between poets and critics and their social and cultural contexts, unlike many of his literary contemporaries. Lewis's principal achievement lay in bridging the gaps between his own culture and the past, between academic and popular cultures, between scholarly and creative writing, and between intellectual rigor and religious belief. He countered the negative mood of his own culture and of prevailing Protestant theologies by redeploying a Romantic interest in the reenchantment of the world, by advocating childlike attitudes as antidotes to contemporary despair, and by restoring joy, pleasure, and celebration as integral parts of a Christian worldview. His principal philosophical point concerned the relational character of human living, from which he argued for the continuity between subjective and objective aspects of human experience and the formation of cultural and religious identity primarily in and through relationships.

Born in Belfast, IRELAND, Lewis received his early education mostly in ENGLAND. He saw action in FRANCE during WORLD WAR I and then returned to University College, Oxford, to complete his education in philosophy, history, and English. He became a fellow and tutor of English at Magdalen College in 1925 and continued in that position until he moved to Magdalene College, Cambridge, in 1955 as professor of medieval and renaissance literature. He lived from 1930 until his death in Headington Quarry outside Oxford with his older brother Warren (d. 1973) and, first, with Mrs. Janie Moore (d. 1951) and then with Joy Davidman (d. 1960), whom he married in 1956.

Cultural Critique

As a cultural critic, Lewis addressed three dominant characteristics of MODERNITY. He argued that the cultural sense of a break with the past was caused not primarily, as many believed, by urbanization and war but by the increasing dependency of society on machines. Beginning in the early nineteenth century, he maintained, advances in technology, by which earlier machines are superseded, were shaping the culture's general attitude toward the past. He further argued that the disenchantment of the world was caused not so much by rationality, as many of his contemporaries believed, as by a shift in AUTHORITY from the external world to individual consciousness. Moreover, he argued that the pervasive feeling of alienation in modern literature and culture was created not by social and economic conditions but by the assumption of discontinuity between the mind and reality, values and facts, and individuals and society.

Lewis viewed bureaucracy as epitomizing the abstraction, depersonalization, and self-preoccupation that plague modern culture, and he viewed obsession with individuality (see INDIVIDUALISM) in the culture as a reaction to the pervasive force of bureaucracy in modern society. Bureaucracy, for example, provides the power structure of Hell (see HEAVEN AND HELL) in his The Screwtape Letters (1942) and shapes the political and academic authority in his dystopic narrative of England's future, That Hideous Strength (1945). In contrast to the reduction and homogenization of human relationships characteristic of bureaucracy, Lewis advocated the fulfillment of individual potential within a common culture that relates the present to the past and carries moral directives for the future.

Beginning with his return to Christianity in 1929, which he narrates in his autobiography Surprised by Joy (1955), Lewis articulated in poems, essays, novels, books, and radio broadcasts his belief that Christianity offers an account of the world that is more complex, capacious, and humanly satisfying than that offered by its primary secular rivals, materialism and narcissism. In such books as The Abolition of Man (1943), Mere Christianity (1952), and The Four Loves (1960), Lewis argued that religious worldviews in general and Christianity in particular meet the needs and desires of human life and actualize its potentials as secular alternatives do not. In The Problem of Pain (1940) and Miracles (1947), Lewis addressed the two principal modern objections to Christianity, its inability to answer the problem of human suffering (see EVIL) and its reliance on miracles.

Along with his standing as a religious advocate and Christian apologist, Lewis secured academic stature with work in medieval studies, such as The Allegory of Love (1936), in Renaissance studies, such as English Literature in the Sixteenth Century Excluding Drama (1954), and in cultural and literary criticism and theory with numerous essays, such as An Experiment in Criticism (1961). In addition, Lewis achieved popular acclaim in the early 1940s with the publication of The Screwtape Letters and the radio broadcasts that, during the early years of the Second World War, recalled English people to Christian belief. This popular standing was extended during the next decade by the success of his novels for children, the Narnia Chronicles, a set of seven separable but related narratives about an alternative world to which visitors from England, particularly children, are called to help in times of difficulty. The Chronicles narrate Narnia's history from its creation in The Magician's Nephew (1955) to its destruction in The Last Battle (1956). The novels, especially The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe (1950), the first in the series, include figures such as Aslan the Lion as well as events that are similar to those basic to the Christian story. Lewis also gained popular recognition by the BBC production in 1985 of Shadowlands, a play based primarily on the relationship of Lewis with Joy Davidman and starring Joss Ackland and Claire Bloom. After its successful run as a stage play in New York City, Shadowlands, in an altered version, became a major Hollywood production in 1993 starring Debra Winger and Anthony Hopkins.

References and Further Reading

Hooper, Walter. C.S.Lewis: A Companion and Guide. London: Harper Collins, 1996.
 Kort, Wesley A. C.S.Lewis Then and Now. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
 Sayer, George. Jack: C.S.Lewis and His Times. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row, 1988.

WESLEY A.KORT

LEWIS, SIR SAMUEL (1843–1903)

West African statesman. Sir Samuel Lewis is best known for being the first West African to be knighted by the British Crown (1896). He was born on November 13, 1843, in Freetown, the capital city of the British colony of SIERRA LEONE, and grew up in the second generation under British rule. His upbringing was a successful fusion of native Aku virtues such as loyalty, persistence, and obedience to group hierarchy with Wesleyan METHODISM. Lewis studied law in London, and was the third native Sierra Leonean to become a barrister. He quickly acquired a reputation for fairness and objectivity, successfully arguing for the defense or prosecuting as Queen's advocate, as duty and conscience demanded.

Although reluctant to work for the Colonial Government, Lewis joined the Legislative Council in 1882. He supported the annexation of the interior of Sierra Leone, with the intention of spreading the Wesleyan Mission of civilization, SALVATION, and economic self-sufficiency to the unconverted and often economically exploited tribes. His already impressive reputation was enhanced when ENGLAND established the Protectorate from 1890 to 1896, which accomplished exactly what Lewis had envisioned. Following the dictates of his conscience he fought for the elimination of state subsidies for the Wesleyan and Anglican churches in 1892, on the grounds that it was unfair not only to other denominations, but also to the Protectorate's 26,000 pagans, and 9,000 Muslims.

For his unceasing public service and unquestionable integrity, Sir Samuel Lewis was knighted in 1896, and was the first West African Knight in Her Majesty's Empire. He was elected mayor of Freetown in both 1895 and 1899. By 1900 ventures into coffee and kola farming had failed, forcing Lewis to return to the practice of law, where he took on many unpaid cases for the Wesleyan community. In 1901 he was diagnosed with cancer, but financial concerns kept him working until 1902. He sailed to London for surgery, but died on July 9, 1903.

See also Africa; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

Hargreaves, J.D. A Life of Sir Samuel Lewis. London: Oxford University Press, 1958.

Kabba, Muctaru R.A., ed. consultant. Sierra Leonean Heroes: Fifty Men and Women Who Helped to Build Our Nation. 1988. Commissioned by the Sierra Leone government. <http://www.sierra-leone.org/heroes3.html> (Accessed April 29, 2003).

MARK C.DONAHUE

LIANG A-FA (LIANG FA, LEANG A-FA) (1789–1855)

Chinese churchman. Liang was born Gao He, in the region of Canton (Guangdong), and died in Canton. He came from a farming family and had four years of Confucian schooling. Poverty forced him to give up his education and move to Canton in 1804, where urban vices overcame him and he became a confirmed gambler. His work was cutting the wooden blocks for printing Chinese characters, and he was employed to cut those for the translation of the New Testament prepared by Robert Morrison. Impressed by his work, Morrison invited Liang to be the Chinese printer for the mission press in Malacca, where Christian literature was produced for distribution in CHINA at a time when missionaries could not normally operate there. Liang began work in Malacca in 1815.

Distressed at his moral impotence and decline from the Confucian moral teaching of his youth, Liang sought a remedy in Pure Land Buddhist practice, but in vain. Further study of the Chinese New Testament gradually convinced him of the truth of the evangelical message he was hearing from William Milne, who headed the Malacca mission. In 1816, Liang was baptized. Three years later, he visited his family in China and prepared a tract to explain Christian faith to them and their neighbors. He was arrested, imprisoned, and beaten, and the copies of his tract and the printing blocks were destroyed. After his release, Liang returned to Malacca eager to prepare himself for PREACHING, leaving for China again after Milne's death.

After further study with Morrison, Liang was ordained in 1823, becoming the first Chinese Protestant pastor. For more than thirty years he served as evangelist and pastor in Canton, Macao, Singapore, and Hong Kong. He was also a prolific writer; more than 20 books and tracts of his are listed, including a commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, a paraphrase of the letter to the Romans, and an exposition of the Ten Commandments. His long tract with a title usually translated as “Good Words to Admonish the Age” was particularly influential, not least in introducing the leaders of the Taiping Movement to Christian teaching. The tract demonstrates that Liang never abandoned the Confucian moral teaching he imbibed in youth. For him, Christian faith, with its teaching of one fatherly God, divine Savior, and active Holy Spirit, provided a framework that made Confucian ideals attainable.

See also Asian Theology; Bible Translation; Missions

References and Further Reading

- Bohr, P.R. “Liang Fa’s Quest for Moral Power.” In Christianity in China: Early Protestant Missionary Writings, edited by S.W. Barnett and J.K. Fairbank, 35–46. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Lovett, R. History of the London Missionary Society, Vol. 2. London: Oxford University Press, 1899.
- McNeur, G.H. China’s First Preacher. Liang A-Fa 1989–1855. Shanghai: Kwang Hsueh Publishing House, 1934.
- Milne, William. Retrospect of the First Ten Years of the Protestant Mission to China. Malacca: Anglo-Chinese Press, 1820.
- Spence, Jonathan. God’s Chinese Son: The Taiping Heavenly Kingdom of Hong Xiuquan, New York: Norton, 1996.
- Wylie, Alexander. Memorials of Protestant Missionaries to the Chinese, Shanghai 1867. Taipei: Ch’eng-wen Publishing, 1967 (lists Liang’s publications, probably incompletely).

ANDREW F. WALLS

LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM

“Liberal Protestantism” is a notoriously vague and loose designation for a broad range of Protestant Christian thought unified less by specific theological claims or doctrines than by a shared liberal approach to certain common themes that arose within Christian theology during the modern period (see MODERNISM). This shared spirit of liberalism is characterized by (1) an open-mindedness toward and respect for new modes of thought in human and natural science; (2) a confidence in the power of human reason guided by experience; (3) a radical emphasis both on freedom from traditional dogmas and creedal formulations and on toleration of doctrinal differences; (4) an ethical optimism and social idealism grounded in the benevolence of God and the social nature of human existence; and, finally, (5) a search, amid the ever-changing cultural and historical context, for the abiding essence of Christianity based in the life, teachings, and person of Jesus Christ.

Liberal Protestantism had its beginnings in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century in the thought of IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804) and FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) but reached its fullest expression in the theologies of ALBRECHT RITSCHL (1822–1889), ADOLF VON HARNACK (1851–1930), and ERNST TROELTSCH (1865–1923), and the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement exemplified by WALTER RAUSCHEN-BUSCH (1861–1918) in the United States. It continued to have significant influence within German, French, English, and American THEOLOGY until it went into decline during the decades immediately preceding the Second World War. Its eclipse was largely attributed to criticisms brought by KARL BARTH (1886–1968) and REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) among others that it was too accommodating to modern CULTURE, too optimistic in its view of human nature and social progress, and too reductive in its account of the es-sence of Christianity. Although its enduring legacy remains a topic of considerable debate, especially in regard to its relationship with the REFORMATION, it continues to influence any contemporary theological movement that is interested in bringing the Christian faith critically into some degree of reconciliation with contemporary thought and culture.

Historical Development

Liberal Protestantism finds its roots in the critical philosophy of Kant and the systematic theological response to Kant by Schleiermacher. Kant's attack on classical metaphysics called into question the validity of much of the natural theology tradition, not only of the premodern period but also of the eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT. Traditional arguments for the existence of God, for knowledge of the nature of God's being or human immortality, and so forth, claimed—according to Kant—a knowledge of reality that was not sustainable under criticism, and thus for theology to have meaning, theologians must look for alternative ways of grounding theological claims than in traditional metaphysics. Kant proposed such a grounding in moral or what he called “practical” reason wherein claims for the existence of God and immortality functioned as the necessary postulates for ethics.

Schleiermacher, generally acknowledged as the father of Liberal Protestantism, took up Kant's theological challenge. Yet while agreeing with Kant's critique of speculative natural theology, Schleiermacher nevertheless sought to ground theological claims elsewhere—in what he called the “religious self-consciousness.” The essence of Christian piety, he argued, consists in particular religious affections based on humanity's awareness of its absolute dependency on God, the “Whence” of its original and continuing existence. Theological statements thus are read off these affections and represent their verbal, conceptual, and didactic articulation. This reorientation of theology's ground of meaningfulness from traditional metaphysics to an account of human consciousness allowed Schleiermacher to reinterpret his inherited Reformation faith in ways that both maintained continuity with the theological claims of the Reformation (e.g., an emphasis on the sovereignty of God and redemption in Christ) and yet allowed him to radically transform certain of these claims in light of his modern context (e.g., a social rather than biological conception of original sin and an understanding of the divinity of Christ as constituted not by a divine nature per se but by Christ's perfect God-consciousness).

Ritschl, although critical of Schleiermacher at points, maintained Schleiermacher's quest for the essence of Christianity and thereby established the basic outlines of Liberal Protestantism as it flourished from the 1860s to 1918 with the conclusion of World War I.

Following Kant, Ritschl argued that Christian theology should be freed from all metaphysical speculation and should rather be understood as an attempt to express judgments of value, especially of the saving significance of Jesus of Nazareth. As the archetypal human, Jesus, although threatened by hostile adversaries, trusted absolutely in God's love and power, and in so doing revealed to humanity through his moral perfection humanity's proper response to God. Through following Jesus' example, modern humans can overcome the threat of social and natural evolution, increased INDUSTRIALIZATION and SECULARIZATION, and impersonal, mechanistic NATURE by recognizing the infinite value or worth imparted to humanity by God through Jesus. Collectively those who follow Jesus constitute the KINGDOM OF GOD whose task is progressively to redeem and transform ethically the culture and society in which they exist.

Post-Ritschlian liberalism was thus characterized by an emphasis on the supreme moral and religious example of Jesus, the essential goodness or worth of humanity, and its seemingly infinite capabilities of growth in reason and freedom. This characterization amounted to what Harnack famously summarized in his Das Wesendes Christentums (What Is Christianity?) as the essence of Christianity: "firstly, the Kingdom of God and its coming; secondly, God the Father and the infinite value of the human soul; thirdly, the higher righteousness and the commandment of love." With this essence, moreover, came the duty of doing something to correct those conditions—whether through ignorance or social injustice—that stultified the full actualization of the Kingdom of God, of those capacities in humans that promoted human flourishing. For example, in the UNITED STATES, the religious education movement, strongly influenced by the philosophical liberalism and pragmatism of John Dewey, was an expression of the interaction of Liberal Protestantism with the growing religious ignorance of modern culture. Moreover, the Social Gospel movement became the most characteristic expression of Liberal Protestantism in North American Christianity. Its primary leader, Rauschenbusch, developed concepts of social SIN and social SALVATION, harking back to Schleiermacher, in rejection of the late-nineteenth-century tendencies toward INDIVIDUALISM at the expense of community and quietism in the place of social transformation. Thus a movement that was born out of modern challenges to old ways of thinking theologically reached its zenith in the quest to trans-form that very modern culture into the Kingdom of God.

Before turning to a discussion of the overarching characteristics of Liberal Protestantism, it is important to note a deep and important irony in its historical development. For although Liberal Protestantism came into its own during the late nineteenth century, few theologians during that time actually claimed to be "liberal." In fact, according to Hans-Joachim Birkner, the term "liberalism" was an ideological construct of the antiliberal theologians of the 1920s, who needed a clear picture of the trends in theology over the last century, so that they could put an end to liberalism's growth and perpetuation (Birkner 1976:33f.). For example, such leading exponents of Liberal Protestantism as ALBRECHT RITSCHL, along with his students Wilhelm Herrmann (1846–1922) and Julius Kaftan (1848–1926), claimed to be thoroughly orthodox and sought not to reduce Christianity to whatever an increasingly secular age could accept, but to maintain Christian truth in its integrity, as testified to by nearly four centuries of Protestant faith and piety. Thus, for Ritschl and his followers, the Reformation's fundamental assertion of the right of the individual believer to judge religious truth for him- or herself under no external AUTHORITY but the Spirit's guidance was something that could never be wholly expunged by the unfortunate biblicism and dogmatism to which Reformation theology itself had succumbed, or so they argued, during the period of Protestant ORTHODOXY in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. In a sense, then, these "liberal" Protestant theologians understood themselves to be attempting both to regain the true spirit of the Reformation that had been muted by subsequent developments and to continue that spirit in a modern world quite different from its original, early-sixteenth-century context. Certainly, as they readily acknowledged, there were many differences between the Reformation and Liberal Protestantism—for example, the original Reformers often disparaged "natural" reason in light of their adherence to "scripture alone" and at times supported religious authoritarianism despite their initial resistance to Roman authority. Nevertheless, for theologians like Ritschl, the principle that the believer's own inward experience is a final criterion of FAITH provided the bridge of continuity (and not discontinuity) between the Reformation and Liberal Protestantism.

General Characteristics

Despite its theologically and culturally diverse historical development, Liberal Protestantism can be accurately described as exhibiting the following general characteristics.

1. Openness to New Modes of Thought

Liberal Protestantism maintained the organic unity of truth and thus pursued it wherever it was found. There could be no discontinuity between the truths of SCIENCE or the humanities, on the one hand, and the truth of Christianity, on the other. For example, as HIGHER CRITICISM emerged within the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, Liberal Protestantism embraced its application to the BIBLE so that biblical narratives might be interpreted within the historical context in which they originated. Thus critics such as Schleiermacher's student DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS (1808–1874) in his famous Life of Jesus applied such higher criticism to the gospel narratives to separate out the historical or "natural facts" of the stories of Jesus from the nonhistorical, "mythical" material, which represented for him early church interpretations of Jesus' life and significance (see JESUS, LIVES OF). By the early twentieth century, the History of Religions School (religionsgeschichtliche Schule) emerged as yet another example of the way in which Liberal Protestants used the disciplines of history and the emerging social sciences to reconstruct the development of Christianity within the plurality of religions. Various strands of JUDAISM and Christianity were revealed in the biblical narratives and in subsequent religious history, so they claimed, and this pluralism of traditions indicated the radical degree to which Christianity was only one religion among others. Thus Troeltsch, one of the most articulate History of Religions critics, went so far as to entertain the possibility that Christianity might be superseded, as it had done to Judaism, by a higher form of religion.

2. Reason and Experience

Liberal Protestants held that Christianity, to speak to the modern world, must be willing to discard old orthodox forms if they were judged to be irrational in the light of modern knowledge or irrelevant to what was regarded as the central core of religious experience. Following the lead of Kant, Liberal Protestants were generally careful to acknowledge the limits to achieving certain knowledge of ultimate reality, yet this epistemic tentativeness was also accompanied by a strong suspicion of dogmatic theological formulations that did not also acknowledge their own tentative status. Moreover to the minds of most Liberal Protestant theologians, their criticisms of received orthodoxy were not only held to be more responsive to the needs of the present time but also more in keeping with the original spirit of the Reformation. The Reformer's insistence on the experiential roots of theological reflection (e.g., in John Calvin's dictum, "We shall not say that, properly speaking, God is known where there is no religion or piety" or Luther's sola experientia facit theologum, which stands alongside and informs his sola scriptura) was crucial for making theological claims living convictions, born of experience, rather than dogmas received on the basis of some external authority. In this respect, Liberal Protestantism acknowledged its debt to seventeenth- and eighteenth-century PIETISM.

3. freedom and Toleration

Perhaps one of the most fundamental characteristics of Liberal Protestantism was its insistence on freedom from all external authority in matters of thought, conscience, and religion. This freedom was grounded in the Reformation's claim to a universal priesthood (see PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS) and to the ever-reforming nature of the church. Thus the Roman Catholic sense of infallible and unchanging dogma was replaced by a more fluid, Protestant sense of DOCTRINE, and this in turn contributed to a general sense of tolerance of doctrinal difference that pervaded Liberal Protestantism throughout its history (see TOLERATION). Moreover this tolerance tended to minimize within Liberal Protestantism the relative importance of denominational difference from what it had been for the sixteenth-century Reformation. For most liberals, denominational differences were important for locating one's perspective in one's history but were no longer grounds for mutual recrimination and lack of cooperation. In fact many Liberal Protestants saw themselves as thinking, speaking, and acting for all of Protestantism, not just their own denominational tradition within Protestantism.

4. Ethical Optimism and Social Idealism

The ethical optimism and social idealism of the late nineteenth century grew with and was nurtured by Liberal Protestantism. From the perspective of the twentieth century, this optimism looks perhaps naïve. Nevertheless, the relative peace in Europe, the rapid industrialization and growth of trade, the rising standard of living, the emerging democratic forms of government, and notions of the progressive evolution of culture fit well in that time with various liberal emphases on the infinite worth of humanity, the goodness of creation, and the benevolence of God for God's creation. Moreover the renewed appreciation within Liberal Protestantism of the social or corporate nature of the Christian life (as found, e.g., in Schleiermacher) combined with an ethical focus to the character of Jesus' teaching concerning the coming Kingdom of God (as, e.g., in Ritschl and Harnack) raised the consciousness of the Protestant church's responsibility for the righting of social wrongs and for bringing the social structure itself in line with the ideal of the Kingdom of God on earth.

5. Essence of Christianity and the Centrality of Jesus

Finally, as a response to the emerging historical consciousness of modernity, Liberal Protestants sought to define the perduring essence of Christianity amid the contingencies of history and culture. LUDWIG FEUERBACH'S Das Wesen des Christentums (The Essence of Christianity) (1841) and, a half-century later, Harnack's What Is Christianity? (1900) both represent such influential attempts at removing the layers of husk to get at the essential kernel, in Harnack's phrase. What emerged from this quest was a focus on the life and teachings of Jesus and his significance as the founder of Christianity as distinct from the layers of interpretation placed on him by subsequent generations of his followers. The goal, consequently, was to recover the kernel of Jesus' life and teachings and then to use that kernel as the standard by which all the doctrines of the church are to be judged. As Harnack put it, the essence of Christianity is nothing else than Jesus Christ and his gospel.

Assessment and Legacy

Soon after World War I, Liberal Protestantism as a movement went into decline as the ethical optimism and social idealism of nineteenth-century Europe collapsed. Theologians such as Barth in Europe and Reinhold Niebuhr in the United States began to challenge the credibility of Liberal Protestantism. Liberalism, they argued, was too accommodating to the modern culture in which it lived, too willing to reduce its account of the essentials of Christianity to the values and ideologies of modern society, and thereby, it sacrificed the prophetic voice that characterized Protestantism during the Reformation. This CULTURAL PROTESTANTISM, as it became known by its detractors, ignored the ways in which the Christian faith, with its doctrines of sin and God's judgment of it, calls into question the values of an age and any moral confidence humans might find in notions of social progress.

Whether these criticisms have merit, Liberal Protestantism has continued to decline as the basic assumptions of modernity have eroded. With the advent of POSTMODERNITY, very few theologians would wish to describe themselves as Liberal Protestants, at least not in the way that Harnack would have done a century earlier. Liberal talk about universal "religious experience," its concern for the rights of critical reason, and its belief in human civilization as itself an expression of the divine purpose have all come under attack as modernity itself has been criticized.

If this is so, then is Liberal Protestantism dead? Perhaps one could suggest that whereas Liberal Protestantism as an identifiable theological movement is dead (or at best on its last breath), its liberal spirit in theology still remains. It points to the fact that theologians must be keenly aware of the difficulties of adhering to the thought forms and language of traditional Christian belief within their particular times, cultures, and conceptualities. What theologians say—liberal or otherwise—will inevitably be influenced by the assumptions of their day. What matters, however, is how they are taken up within theology, whether this is done reflectively and critically, with attention to possible losses as well as gains. The legacy of Liberal Protestantism thus might be its recognition that this difficulty must be faced if Christianity itself is finally to survive.

References and Further Reading

- Barth, Karl. Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1973.
- Birkner, Hans-Joachim. "Liberale Theologie." In Kirchen und Liberalismus im 19. Jahrhundert, edited by Martin Schmidt and George Schwaiger, 32–42. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976.
- Chapman, Mark. Ernst Troeltsch and Liberal Theology: Religion and Cultural Synthesis in Wilhelmine Germany. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Dillenberger, John, and Claude Welch. Protestant Christianity Interpreted Through Its Development. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1954.
- Dorrien, Gary. The Making of American Liberal Theology: Idealism, Realism, & Modernity 1900–1950. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2003.
- . The Making of American Liberal Theology: Imagining Progressive Religion 1805–1900. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2001.
- Frei, Hans. "Niebuhr's Theological Background." In Faith and Ethics: The Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr, edited by Paul Ramsey, 9–64. New York: Harper & Row, 1957.
- Gerrish, Brian A. The Old Protestantism and the New: Essays on the Reformation Heritage. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
- . Tradition and the Modern World: Reformed Theology in the Nineteenth Century. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Hutchison, William. The Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Rupp, George. Culture-Protestantism: German Liberal Theology at the Turn of the Twentieth Century. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977.
- Van Dusen, Henry. The Vindication of Liberal Theology: A Tract for the Times. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1963.

JEFFREY HENSLEY

LIBERATION THEOLOGY

Liberation theology is often seen primarily as a Roman Catholic phenomenon, pioneered by Latin Americans in the late 1960s and early 1970s. This view has popularized two fundamental and pervasive misunderstandings of liberation theology, one historical and the other theological. Viewing liberation theology from a broader perspective that gives attention to Protestant contributions will therefore lead to a more appropriate understanding of the phenomenon.

From a historical perspective various liberation theologies emerged at the same time and independently of each other. Even the term liberation was used initially without direct connection. One of the very first articles that made use of the term “liberation theology” in the UNITED STATES was authored in 1970 by Frederick Herzog, a white Protestant North American theologian whose work took shape initially in the context of the social tensions of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT, focusing on political and economic forms of oppression. African American liberation theology, resisting oppression along the lines of race, was in the making at the same time. JAMES HAL CONE, an African American Protestant theologian in the United States, hit upon the notion of liberation in his own context and began to use the term in his publications. A book on liberation theology by Rosemary Radford Ruether, written in the United States from a feminist Roman Catholic perspective and adding more sustained attention to resisting oppression along the lines of GENDER in addition to matters of race and class, followed only a short time later. The work of these theologians runs parallel to the work of the Latin American priest and Roman Catholic theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez, commonly acknowledged as the “father of liberation theology.” The different strands encountered each other only later, not without serious challenges and questions.

From a theological perspective it is important to realize that liberation theology did not develop out of one center, as a great idea or a unified theological school that made its way from the top down. Liberation theology developed in specific settings, independently but simultaneously, from the bottom up where theologians began to reflect on the suffering and hope of people in poverty, of ethnic minorities, of WOMEN, and others, in relation to traditional and newly developing images of God. Even though specific dates can be given, from a theological point of view there is not much use discussing who was “really first.” These theologies are not written as accomplishments of individual scholars but in close relation with severe suffering and pressure in many shapes and forms.

The View from the Underside

Modern theology since the ENLIGHTENMENT has generated a new openness for the context of theological reflection. Rather than thinking about God in Godself, modern THEOLOGY explores God in relation to humanity, to the world, and to history and the major events of the time. Liberation theologies differ from this approach in that they pay attention not only to the context as such but also to its underside, its dark side. How does God relate to the large part of humanity that is never noticed by those in power? How does God relate to the world that is exploited and subdued? How does God relate to the histories of the excluded, the histories of minorities, of women, and of people living in poverty? Rather than searching for the correspondences between God and the often rehearsed achievements of MODERNISM, an approach that has usually led to the sanctification of the status quo in one way or another, liberation theologies are concerned about the ruptures and breaks and the forms of SIN manifested in them. Without addressing how God differs from the powers that be and without addressing the reality of sin no real change will take place.

In LATIN AMERICA close encounters with the reality of widespread poverty and economic oppression have set the tone of the debate. Together with their Roman Catholic colleagues, Protestant liberation theologians like José Míguez Bonino came to realize already in the late 1960s and early 1970s that large systemic structures of injustice cannot be corrected by well-meaning efforts of either CHARITY or economic development. Those larger structures that maintain and even enlarge the gap between rich and poor are part of a theological crisis because they separate us not only from our neighbors but also from God. More recently Latin American liberation theologians have developed these concerns further, going beyond the dependency between North and South and pointing out that much of humanity is simply excluded from the gains that the global markets have created for the rich.

In a completely different setting, African American theologians realized that, long after SLAVERY was abolished, their people were still not free. Even well-meaning efforts to become color-blind were no longer an option in a situation where oppression is tied to the color line. The renewed struggle against racism continues in different forms all the way into the present, involving increasingly closer attention to resources from African American culture, as for instance in the work of Dwight N. Hopkins. The various forms of racism are also perceived as a theological problem because, as Cone has pointed out, “Christianity is essentially a religion of liberation,” and “any message that is not related to the liberation of the poor in a society is not Christ’s message” (Cone 1986:vii).

Feminist theologians, understanding themselves as partners in liberation theology, have reminded us of the ongoing discrepancy between the place of men and women in church and society. Theology is in crisis, they found, because it has not paid attention to God’s walk with half of humanity. Well-meaning efforts of integrating women into the world created by men will not change this situation. One of the pioneers in the Protestant camp, Letty M. Russell, points out that for this reason feminist theologians take “the via negativa and describe the contradictions of our past and present social, political, economic, and ecclesial experiences.” Out of this awareness of contradiction, women “live out of a vision of God’s intention for a mended creation” (Russell 1987:18). Womanist and mujerista theologians—women writing from the perspective of African American and Hispanic communities—have subsequently refined the feminist analysis, adding the unsettling experience of close encounters with issues of race and class because minority women often suffer from various forms of oppression. Mirroring the demographic profile of those communities, Womanist theologians such as Delores Williams are generally Protestant and most mujerista theologians, such as Ada María Isasi-Díaz and Yolanda Tarango, are Roman Catholic.

More recently Hispanic theologians have zeroed in on issues of identity and CULTURE. In the United States, they point out, Hispanic Americans are often marginalized on grounds of different cultural practices and racial difference. The standard North American image of the melting pot leaves no room for appreciating difference. In response Hispanic Protestant theologians have stressed the validity of a diverse set of Hispanic experiences and cultures and have shown how these perspectives from the margins contribute to a broader understanding of Christianity, God, and the world, promoting community in diversity. “Reading the Bible in Spanish,” a phrase coined by Justo González, leads to a specific Protestant way of engaging life and transforming the powers that be.

African and Asian theologians, going beyond typically Western perspectives, have broadened the spectrum of liberation theologies further. Choan-Seng Song, for example, a Protestant theologian born in Taiwan who is writing and teaching both in the United States and in Asia, has argued that theology is not complete unless it includes an account of God's Spirit at work in the long suppressed stories of darkness, suffering, and hope told by the people of Asia. Merely translating traditional concepts into new situations without paying attention to God's presence with the people will no longer do. The liberating power of God will become manifest when the barriers between the sacred and the profane are transcended from the underside of Asian life.

God and the Option for the Excluded

Liberation theologies maintain a deliberate option for people at the margins. Latin American liberation theologians, for instance, have made famous the idea of a "preferential option for the poor," an option that needs to be made not only by those who are not poor but also by the poor themselves. Yet this and other preferential options have frequently been misunderstood. First of all, what is their basis? What motivates theologians to go against the grain of church and society and opt for those that are commonly overlooked by the powers that be? Second, does a preferential option for people at the margins comply with our commonsense understanding of fairness? Does an option for people at the margins mean that liberation theologies have nothing to say for those who are not marginalized?

In response to the first set of questions it must be pointed out that all liberation theologians agree in their own ways that opting for the poor and excluded is closely related to the nature and work of God. Such options are not primarily based on political or ideological assumptions but on theological reflection. Here we are at the very heart of the various theologies of liberation. The point of departure of liberation theology is not primarily social ETHICS—a moral appeal not to forget those who are neglected—or general political or economic assumptions of the common good, but a new vision of God.

Few liberation theologians have made this clearer than Frederick Herzog. Emphasizing that liberation theology starts with God's own walk with humanity, Herzog prefers to talk about "theopraxis," "Christopraxis," and "Spiritpraxis," rather than "orthopraxis," a term frequently used by others to express the practical concern of liberation theology. In this way Herzog addresses a specific problem with North American Protestantism where—on grounds of modern notions of agency and the self—it is often assumed that people can and should pull themselves up by their own bootstraps. God's work with the marginalized everywhere provides a different model: walking with God and with each other, people are enabled to overcome self-centeredness, to build new relationships, and to develop resistance to the oppressive structures of empire.

From the Latin American perspective Gustavo Gutiérrez has emphasized over and over again that liberation theology starts with the specific forms of God's love and God's GRACE manifest throughout the BIBLE. The preferential option for the poor is a theocentric option, centered on the theological conviction that God is at work in the liberation of the "least of these." Jose Míguez Bonino and other Protestant Latin Americans, although putting more emphasis on human commitment and responsibility for liberation, would agree.

James Cone's statements are equally strong. He maintains that the "sole reason" for the existence of black theology is "to put into ordered speech the meaning of God's activity in the world, so that the community of the oppressed will recognize that its inner thrust for liberation is not only consistent with the gospel but is the gospel of Jesus Christ” (Cone 1986:3). This close relation between God’s work and the lives of the oppressed is supported by the biblical paradigm of the Exodus where God becomes known as the God of the oppressed, a pattern that is broadened in the New Testament by the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which is taken to indicate God’s commitment to all oppressed people.

Letty Russell points feminists to God’s future action, which is already present in the action of God through the people of Israel and through Jesus Christ. In this vision the marginalized have a special place. Mary McClintock Fulkerson, a Protestant feminist theologian of the second generation, has argued for what she calls the “theo/acentric character” of feminist theology. Unlike modern theology, this theo/acentric emphasis is not interested in defending the existence of God. From a liberation perspective the question of the existence of God has always been of lesser interest than the question of who God is and what God is doing. The feminist experience of God, not unlike the experience of God in most liberation theologies, grows out of encounters with God in the tensions of life and in new encounters with God that include those who have been marginalized in society and church.

Womanist theologian Delores Williams describes the encounter with God in terms of the situation of black women who are facing “near-destruction situations.” God is not an abstract category or ultimate principle but the one who is with the people. God is simply the one who helps them “make a way out of what [they] thought was no way” (Williams 1993:108). The focus of womanist liberation theology is on God: unlike modern middle-class people, the persons who face “near-destruction situations” point away from themselves.

In agreement with other approaches to the theology of liberation, Hispanic theology maintains that the fundamental theological question is what God we affirm. Protestant Hispanic theology, strongly based on biblical images, affirms God’s concern for those in need in its own ways. Justo González points out that “Scripture does not say that God can be found equally wherever we please to look.” Hispanic theologians agree with other theologies of liberation that “ours is a God who, having known oppression, shares with the oppressed in their suffering” (González 1990:93, 95).

From the Asian perspective Choan-Seng Song levels the charge that mainline theology has virtually forgotten that “God is a God full of surprises.” All liberation theologies would agree on this point. Immersed in the Asian context Song and others have become aware that God is present in the midst of the struggles of the people, and that “theology begins with God’s heartache on account of the world.” Theology is distorted, therefore, when it tries to think about God in a vacuum or only in regard to God’s glory. God needs to be seen first of all in confrontation with “the darkness that poses as a real threat to the birth, growth, and fruition of life” (Song 1991:10, 56). The biblical image that is at the core of this vision is God’s creation of the world as victory over darkness.

One more perspective merits to be added here. Vine Deloria, writing from the perspective of Native American religions and thus from beyond the Protestant-Roman Catholic divide, worries that “religion has become a comfortable ethic and comforting aesthetic for Westerners.” On the basis of the Native American traditions Deloria argues that God is different: “God is red.” This God is in touch with the realities that mainline America has repressed—nature, trees, animals, and birds, and the “voices and places of the land” (Deloria 1994:284, 292). Deloria’s vision adds an important impulse to the spectrum of liberation theologies because its focus extends beyond oppressed people to the land and the cosmos as a whole.

In light of this common focus on God in liberation theology, the problem with the second set of questions becomes clearer and thus the response can be brief. In the encounter with God and those who suffer, abstract notions of fairness will no longer do. God is not a machine that distributes goods and services according to predetermined input but establishes relationships with humanity. Even where humans hurt each other and push large groups of people into oblivion, God does not forget about those who get hurt.

God’s option for the poor, the marginalized, the hurt—the fact that God does not overlook those rendered invisible by the powers that be—does not mean that God does not care about the wealthy and the powerful—those who inflict pain often without being aware of it, although the relationship takes on different forms. God’s care—not unlike parental care—also includes a challenge to those who destroy others and therefore also themselves. Jesus’s own ways of acting as portrayed in all four Gospels mirror such challenges in many ways. In addition, because the powerful defy relationships with people who are different, their own relationship with God is easily distorted. In this situation a call to restore relationship with nonpersons might help to find a way back into a more productive communion with God as well. Liberation theology is thus a challenge for all of theology to examine whether it opens up the worth of other persons. Respect for God and respect for others are closely connected.

Context Is What Hurts

On the cover of one of his books, Choan-Seng Song is characterized as “the master of contextual theologies.” In similar fashion liberation theologies in general are often classified as “contextual theologies.” From here it is only a small step to collate liberation theologies with modern liberal theology and the attempt to adapt theological reflection to one’s own personal setting, centering theological reflection around the personal interests of various groups. In this perspective liberation theologies are seen as nothing more than an ever-expanding set of special interest theologies, at best relevant to specific groups of people, at worst just another outgrowth of postmodern pluralism and relativism. The language of “advocacy scholarship” has at times contributed to the confusion. Liberation theologies thus are seen as catering primarily to the interest of specific groups of different ethnic, gender, or class origins. This view gives permission for the rest of theology to go on with business as usual.

Yet this has not much to do with the dynamic that created the theologies of liberation. Their themes were developed not in relation to the special and private interests of self-contained groups but in relation to deep suffering and pain that, although most strongly felt at the margins and the peripheries, also affects the centers. The point is to understand the deep roots of the common predicament in which both the marginalized and those in power share, without neglecting the obvious differences. Liberation theologies in their own ways embody Paul’s well-known insight in I Corinthians 12:26 that if one member suffers, all suffer together. Unlike the various perspectives of privilege that feel they can afford to tend to their own context, the view from the underside of suffering always reflects the whole body. Suffering can ultimately not be limited to one member only. Liberation theologies thus search for the best interest of all, seeking the liberation of both oppressors and oppressed by paying attention to where the pain is greatest. If this is seen, the rest of theology can no longer continue with business as usual. All of theology needs to join in listening to the common pain.

Liberation theologies are therefore not special interest theologies but address the common good from new angles, which now include the underside of his-tory and a new vision of God. In this perspective the context of theology is not what is immediately obvious or closest to home: Context is that which hurts (Rieger 1998b:129–130). In taking another look at the underside of history, liberation theologies start to notice certain aspects of reality that modern liberal theologies will never see. This does not mean that modern liberal theologies are completely unaware of suffering, pain, and structures of oppression, although they tend to see those structures as exceptions, anomalies, merely deviations from the normal course of things. Liberation theologies, on the other hand, understand that suffering, pain, and oppression are not merely accidental but point to a deeper truth about the dominant context itself. Conflicts and tensions do not appear out of nowhere but are produced by the powers that be, and as such point to their unconscious truth that must be constantly repressed to preserve the way things are (Rieger 1998a:75–88).

The true nature of the contextual reality of the underside is not immediately self-evident, surprisingly not even to those who live there. It takes some effort to cut through the covers and to understand. Gutiérrez has insisted with good reason that even the poor must make the option for the poor—many make the option to be rich. At the beginning of the twenty-first century liberation theologies need to add more layers to their current understanding of context in terms of the underside of history. What are the concerns of people on the underside now? What progress has been made in the last thirty years? What are the setbacks? What difference do globalization processes make? There is a certain degree of consensus among liberation theologians that economic challenges will have to be analyzed more closely in relation to all forms of oppression (see the essays in Rieger 1998b).

Here a curious reversal takes place that has not yet reached the level of consciousness of mainline theology. Despite claims to universality, the approaches developed in the centers of theology shape up as special interest theologies if they pay no attention to the deeper malaise that affects us all, oppressors and oppressed alike. We need to realize that, rather than addressing the special interests of one group only, the suffering of people at the margins points to an important part of reality in which, even though often repressed and made invisible, we all participate. Liberation theology is therefore not special interest theology but poses a challenge to all of theology.

Implications

At this point the process of theological reflection changes profoundly. Theology as a whole benefits from listening more closely to voices on the under side. Theology is freed from its long-term captivity to the context of the modern middle class and from traditionalist appeals to the biblical and traditional texts of the church that forget precisely about the suffering and pain of people on the underside. Liberation theologies serve as a reminder that theology cannot escape the pervasive narcissism of the modern and postmodern worlds without developing genuine respect for God, a project inextricably tied up with developing genuine respect for other persons as well.

Theology indeed begins with the relationship of God, humanity, and the world, as modern theology knows so well, although this relationship needs to be broadened so as to include those who are left out, those who fall through the cracks in a world that prides itself on moving closer together in global connectedness. Liberation theologies thus serve as an invitation to search for new encounters with God in places where theologians and church people hardly bother to look. At a time when theology is becoming more and more a matter of life and death—the poor become poorer, the rich become richer, and over 30,000 children are dying every day from preventable causes—new relationships with God and with humanity need to be built, from the bottom up. Where is God? This question will make a difference only if it no longer avoids the reality of dying children.

See also African Theology; Asian Theology; Black Theology; Ethnicity; Feminist Theology; Liberal Protestantism; Modernism; Native Americans; Political Theology; Postmodernity; Slavery, Abolition of; Womanist Theology

References and Further Reading

- Cone, James. A Black Theology of Liberation. Second edition. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1986 (first published 1970).
- Deloria, Vine. God Is Red: A Native View of Religion. The Classic Work Updated. Golden, CO: Fulcrum Publishing, 1994 (first published 1973).
- Fulkerson, Mary McClintock. Changing the Subject: Women's Discourses and Feminist Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1994.
- González, Justo. Mañana: Christian Theology in Hispanic Perspective. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1990.
- Gutiérrez, Gustavo. A Theology of Liberation: History, Politics, and Salvation. Revised 15th anniversary edition. Translated by Sister Caridad Inda and John Eagleson. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1988 (first Spanish edition 1971).
- Herzog, Frederick. God Walk: Liberation Shaping Dogmatics. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1988. [Herzog's first essay using the term liberation is "Theology of Liberation." Continuum 7 no. 4 (Winter 1970).]
- Hopkins, Dwight N. Down, Up, and Over: Slave Religion and Black Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000.
- Isasi-Díaz, Ada María, and Yolanda Tarango. Hispanic Women: Prophetic Voice in the Church. Toward a Hispanic Women's Liberation Theology. San Francisco, CA: Harper & Row, 1988.
- Míguez Bonino, José. Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1975.
- Rieger, Joerg. Remember the Poor: The Challenge to Theology in the Twenty-First Century. Harrisburg, PA.: Trinity Press International, 1998a.
- , ed. Liberating the Future: God, Mammon, and Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1998b.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Liberation Theology: Human Hope Confronts Christian History and American Power. New York: Paulist Press, 1972.

- Russell, Letty. Household of Freedom: Authority in Feminist Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1987. [Russell's first book on feminist liberation theology is Human Liberation in a Feminist Perspective: A Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1974.]
- Song, Choan-Seng. Third Eye Theology: Theology in Formation in Asian Settings. Revised edition. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1991 (first edition 1979).
- Williams, Delores. Sisters in the Wilderness: The Challenge of Womanist God-Talk. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993.

JOERG RIEGER

LIBERIA

The predominance of Protestant denominations and the influence of the United States are characteristics of Christianity in Liberia. In the early nineteenth century, white Americans, concerned about the presence of free African Americans, formed a society to encourage African Americans to emigrate from the United States to a colony in West Africa. The American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color in the United States (later known as the AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY or ACS) was founded in 1816. The ACS was controversial because its members included both abolitionists and supporters of slavery who wished to rid the United States of free blacks (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

Many African Americans opposed the ACS because of its conservative stance on slavery and civil rights for freed people. However, some immigrants were motivated by a desire to return to AFRICA and escape racial oppression in the United States. Others believed that they were enacting God's plan for converting Africans to Christianity. According to a providential reading of history, God had allowed Africans to be enslaved and taken to the United States so that they could be converted to Christianity. The descendants of these Africans had the responsibility of bringing Christianity and Western civilization to their African brothers and sisters.

The first group of settlers arrived in Liberia in 1822. The settlers formed the independent republic of Liberia in 1847. From 1822 to 1866 approximately 12,000 people emigrated from the United States to Liberia. These immigrants included freeborn people, former slaves, and people who were freed by their masters only for the purpose of emigration. A steady stream of African Americans continued to immigrate to Liberia throughout the nineteenth and into the twentieth century. These settlers formed the core of the ruling Americo-Liberian society.

Africans freed from slave ships also contributed to Liberia's population. In 1819 the United States Congress passed a law to resettle in Liberia Africans who were recaptured by the U.S. Navy from slave ships. Many of the recaptives, popularly known in Liberia as "Congoes," eventually assimilated into Americo-Liberian society.

The settlers brought with them their Protestant denominations, including the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (AME), the Baptist (see BAPTISTS), and Presbyterian (see PRESBYTERIANISM) Churches. Organizations associated with these churches, such as mutual aid societies, fraternal organizations, and charities, became important parts of the Americo-Liberian culture. Many Americo-Liberians used Christianity and “civilization” as markers to distinguish themselves from the majority of indigenous Liberians.

Several of the prominent black clergy and intellectuals of the nineteenth century became associated with Liberia and considered the state an important symbol of black NATIONALISM. Reverends Daniel Coker of the AME Church and LOTT CAREY of the Baptist Church were among the first group of settlers. Both ALEXANDER CRUMMELL and Edward Wilmot Blyden worked in Liberia for several years.

Missions in Liberia

Despite the importance of Christianity in their lives, few Americo-Liberians worked as missionaries among indigenous Liberians. United States-based missionaries took up this task. Liberia was overwhelmingly a field for Protestant missionary work; the Roman Catholic Church did not establish a permanent mission until 1906 (see MISSIONS; MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). By the end of the nineteenth century, missionaries from the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopal, and Lutheran churches worked in Liberia. Many African American denominations, such as the AME Church, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL Zion Church, and the NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, also sent missionaries to Liberia. Missions provided schools and hospitals for indigenous Africans and promulgated new forms of economic, gender, and social relations among the converts.

Relations between the Americo-Liberians and the indigenous Africans were often uneasy. The Americo-Liberian government assumed the relationship of a colonizer to the indigenous Africans. Despite the significant division between Americo-Liberian society and the indigenous people, the groups interacted and shaped each other. Americo-Liberian families took in indigenous foster children as apprentices, and some Americo-Liberian men had indigenous wives and children in “the country.” As Mary Moran has demonstrated, many indigenous Liberians adopted the idea of being “civilized,” that is, being Western-educated and Christian.

Many Liberians became involved in the independent church movements of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. WILLIAM WADÉ HARRIS, an indigenous, mission-educated Liberian, was an important evangelist in West Africa. While Harris was imprisoned for opposing Americo-Liberian rule, he received a vision that compelled him to preach the word of God. He encouraged his listeners to abandon their traditional religions, be baptized, and become active Christians. Harris was active in Côte d’Ivoire and the Gold Coast. After French officials expelled him from Côte d’Ivoire in 1915, he continued to preach in Liberia and SIERRA LEONE.

Throughout the period of Americo-Liberian political dominance, which lasted until 1980, the Protestant churches’ ministers and institutions largely supported the social order. Many of the ruling elite were leaders within their churches. For example, President William R. Tolbert Jr., who ruled from 1971 to 1980, was also the president of the Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention.

By the twentieth century, many of Liberia’s churches were self-supporting. However, a steady flow of missionaries, largely from the United States, continued to flow into Liberia. In addition to missionaries from mainline churches, missionaries from evangelical churches also worked in Liberia. The missions established radio stations, schools, hospitals, and other social services in the country.

The military coup, which brought Samuel Doe to power in 1980, broke the close relationship between the Protestant churches and the ruling institutions. Paul Gifford has noted that many of Liberia's Protestant churches, unlike churches in other parts of Africa, criticized neither the unequal social order before the coup nor the wide-scale abuse of human rights during Doe's regime. During the 1980s the number of Liberians espousing Christianity and the number of missionaries increased dramatically. Many of the missionaries preached a form of FUNDAMENTALISM and used technology such as video broadcasts to spread their teachings (see PUBLISHING MEDIA).

From 1989 to 1997 a brutal civil war engulfed Liberia. Charles Taylor, a guerilla fighter during the war, became president in 1997. Some preachers interpreted the chaos of the war as a sign that Liberians had to choose between the forces of God and Satan. Other Liberians turned to Christianity as a source of healing and rebirth after the ravages of warfare.

See also African American Protestantism

References and Further Reading

- Ellis, Stephen. The Mask of Anarchy: The Destruction of Liberia and the Religious Dimension of an African Civil War. New York: New York University Press, 1999.
- Gifford, Paul. Christianity and Politics in Doe's Liberia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Jacobs, Sylvia M., ed. Black Americans and the Missionary Movement in Africa. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1982.
- Moran, Mary H. Civilized Women: Gender and Prestige in Southeastern Liberia. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1990.
- Sanneh, Lamin. Abolitionists Abroad: American Blacks and the Making of Modern West Africa. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Shick, Tom W. Behold the Promised Land: A History of Afro-American Settler Society in Nineteenth-Century Liberia. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1977.

MODUPE G.LABODE

LIDDON, HENRY PARRY (1829–1890)

English theologian. Born in Hampshire on August 20, 1829, Liddon greatly influenced nineteenth-century Protestant life and thought. At seventeen, he attended Christ Church, Oxford, returning there in 1859 as vice-president of St. Edmund Hall after having been forced by the bishop of Oxford, SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, to resign as vice-principal of Cuddesdon because of his Romish practices. Anglican ordinands at Cuddesdon were being trained to confront theological Liberalism, so-called Germanism or NEOLOGY. Liddon influenced undergraduate religious life at Oxford with his New Testament lectures, Sunday evenings “tea-and-toast-and-testament” soirées that attracted devotees, including the Victorian Jesuit poet, Gerard Manley Hopkins. Liddon challenged the growing liberalism centered at Balliol under BENJAMIN JOWETT. His Anglo-Catholic influence—“Liddonism”—was unrivaled. Students crowded St. Mary’s to hear Liddon’s Bampton lectures, along with his inspiring sermons published in Sermons Preached before the University of Oxford (1864) and Some Elements of Religion (1872).

Neglecting a literary career, Liddon devoted himself to teaching, pastoral care, and church life. His notable publication is The Divinity of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (1867), eight Bampton lectures defending the divinity of Christ under assault from Renan, DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS, and Seeley. A distinguished theologian he assailed Essays and Reviews (1860) and Lux Mundi (1889), which questioned the CHRISTOLOGY and historicity of the Old Testament. Liddon’s abiding interest in the Anglican priesthood occasioned The Priest in His Inner Life (1856), and his Assize Sermon of 1869 refuted Disraeli’s move to legislate ritualism. An EDWARD PUSEY protégé, Liddon chronicled the Life of Edward Bouverie Pusey (1893–1894), celebrated leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, canon of Christ Church, and Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford. Liddon helped to found Keble College, named for JOHN KEBLE, in 1870 and Pusey House in 1884, institutions he saw as fundamental to maintaining Oxford’s historical ties to ANGLICANISM. He was elected three times to the hebdomadal board, Oxford’s governing body.

Liddon was appointed canon of St. Paul’s (1870–1890), where he reformed the role of the minor canon, supervised the construction of the largest crucifix in an Anglican church, rejected modern settings of old HYMNS, and excluded female choir members (he also opposed WOMEN matriculating to Oxford). Under Liddon’s leadership, St. Paul’s became synonymous with high churchmanship. He was also named Dean Ireland Professor of Exegesis at Oxford (1870–1882). In “The Place of the Senses in Religion,” a sermon preached at St. Paul’s in April 1882, three days after the death of Charles Darwin and published as “The Recovery of St. Thomas, with a Prefatory Note on the Late Mr. Darwin,” Liddon wanted to accommodate SCIENCE to Anglicanism, an accommodation manifesting a deep anxiety with rather than an acceptance of DARWINISM. An inveterate traveler, Liddon vacationed in SCOTLAND, ITALY, and the Continent; RUSSIA (accompanied in the latter by the mathematician turned novelist C.L. Dodgson, known as Lewis Carroll); Egypt and the Holy Land, copiously recording geography, architecture, and impressions of people and religious practice. Near the end of his career Liddon was denied a bishopric because his supporter and Tractarian sympathizer, prime minister W.E. Gladstone, presumed that he would not have received the support of the Queen. Liddon became ill in July, died on September 9, 1890, and was buried at St. Paul’s.

See also Germany; Liberal Protestantism; Theology

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Liddon, Henry Parry. The Divinity of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: Eight Lectures Preached before the University of Oxford in the Year 1866, 14th ed. London: Longmans, 1890.
Liddon Papers. Oxford: Pusey House.

Whitley, W.M., ed. Henry Parry Liddon 1829–1929: A Centenary Memoir. London: A.R.Mowbray, 1929.

Secondary Sources:

Chadwick, Owen. The Victorian Church. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.

Chandler, Michael. The Life and Work of Henry Parry Liddon. Herefordshire: Gracewing, 2000.

Johnston, John O. Life and Letters of Henry Parry Liddon. New York: Longmans, 1904.

Nixon, Jude V. Gerard Manley Hopkins and His Contemporaries: Liddon, Newman, Darwin, and Pater. New York: Garland, 1994.

JUDE V.NIXON

LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER (1828–1889)

New testament scholar and bishop of Durham. Lightfoot was born at 84 Duke Street, Liverpool to an accountant father. The family moved to Birmingham where he was educated at King Edward's School with E.W. Benson, later archbishop of Canterbury, under the headmastership of James Prince Lee who taught the Greek New Testament. BROOKE FRANCIS WESTCOTT, another product of this school, became Lightfoot's tutor as an undergraduate at Trinity College, Cambridge, from 1847.

Lightfoot taught at the UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE for many years as fellow, tutor, and professor. He became Hulsean professor of divinity in 1861 and Lady Margaret professor in 1875. His lectures on the Pauline epistles were so widely attended that the hall of Trinity College had to be used. He published commentaries on Galatians (1865), Philippians (1868), and Colossians and Philemon (1875). The first of these contained a celebrated essay on "The Christian Ministry" and its development in the early CHURCH. In company with Westcott and F.J.A.Hort he gave English New Testament scholarship a high international standing. His work on the postapostolic writings in Clement of Rome (1869, 1890) and Ignatius (1885, 1889) caused the prevailing theories of the Tübingen school of New Testament scholarship to be revised, and he also established the authenticity of all of the Ignatian letters previously questioned. In 1879 he was appointed bishop of Durham.

Lightfoot showed himself to be practically effective as a bishop, securing the division of his very large diocese in 1882 to make it more manageable, and raising large sums of money for church building and the development of parsonages and church halls. He encouraged the use of lay ministries and evangelists of the Church Army. He strengthened the ordained ministry in the diocese by using Auckland Castle, the bishop's residence, to train a number of men for ordination at his own charge. He was a supporter of the entry of WOMEN into HIGHER EDUCATION and into the church's ministry. A portrait by Richmond hangs in Auckland Castle where he is buried in the chapel.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Lightfoot, Joseph B. "Eusebius of Caesarea." In The Dictionary of Christian Biography. 1880.
 ——. The Apostolic Fathers. London: MacMillan, 1890.
 ——. Leaders of the Northern Church. London: MacMillan, 1890.
 ——. Ordination Addresses. London: MacMillan, 1890.

Secondary Sources:

- Eden, G.R., and F.C.Macdonald, eds. Lightfoot of Durham. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1932.
 Edwards, D.L. Leaders of the Church of England 1828–1944. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1971.
 Hort, F.J.A. "Lightfoot, Joseph Barber." In Dictionary of National Biography. vol. 33. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1893.
 Robinson, J.A.T. Joseph Barber Lightfoot. Durham, UK: Durham Cathedral, 1981.

TIMOTHY E. YATES

LINCOLN, ABRAHAM (1809–1865)

United States president. Lincoln was born near Hodgenville, Kentucky, the son of Thomas and Nancy Hanks Lincoln, who were farmers. Lincoln's parents were members of the ultrapredestinarian Separate Baptist Churches. From them the young Lincoln picked up a strong sense of the absolute divine control of all human events, as well as a suspicion of formal religious institutions. His increasingly distant relations with his father helped alienate him even from the Separates, and when Lincoln settled in New Salem, Illinois, in 1832 as a clerk and farm laborer, his reading of Thomas Paine, Volney, and other ENLIGHTENMENT critics of Christianity gave him a reputation as an "infidel." In 1837, after a period of self-study, he began practicing law in Springfield, Illinois, where his friends recalled that he "was Enthusiastic in his infidelity." He married Mary Todd in 1842, but neither of them developed a strong religious identity.

After the death of his second son, Edward, in 1850, and his father in 1851, Lincoln showed a noticeable softening in his criticism of Christianity. Partly because of political calculation and partly because of being genuinely "perplexed and unsettled on the fundamentals of religion," Lincoln became willing to acknowledge "a simple faith in God," and the Lincoln family rented a pew in Springfield's First Presbyterian Church (although Lincoln himself was infrequent in attendance). He remained, however, convinced of "the doctrine of necessity" and described himself as a "fatalist" who believed more in the mechanistic necessity of all events rather than divine ordination of them.

His election as the sixteenth president of the United States in 1860 and the outbreak of the American CIVIL WAR in 1861 at first brought little change in this. By 1862, however, the frustrating course of the war forced Lincoln to deeper speculation on the personality of God and God's intervention in human affairs. Lincoln's decision to issue the Emancipation Proclamation in September 1862 was prompted in part by a conviction that God had deliberately prevented the war from coming to a quick conclusion so that Lincoln, as president, would have to confront the need for abolishing SLAVERY. Lincoln's last great speech, delivered at his inauguration to a second term as president in March 1865, stressed in eloquent terms the inscrutability of God's purposes and the need for personal humility and mutual charity on the part of humankind in discerning those purposes at the close of the war. He was assassinated in Washington, D.C., by John Wilkes Booth, one week after the surrender of the major rebel army, on April 15, 1865.

Lincoln represents a blending of the skepticism of the late Enlightenment, the predestinarian sensibility of radical sectarian Protestantism, and an ethical uprightness that survived the washing away of its Protestant theological substance. Like many other Protestant Victorian doubters, he could not believe, but could not be comfortable in his unbelief. Although never a member of a church, his public utterances are informed by greater depths of religious speculation than any other American president. As a Republican, he broke with the refusal of Democratic presidents to give public sanction to religious practices by issuing calls for public PRAYER and thanksgiving and dramatically expanding the United States military CHAPLAINCY during the Civil War.

See also Baptists; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln. 9 vols. Edited by Roy P. Basler. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1953.

Secondary Sources:

Barton, William E. The Soul of Abraham Lincoln. New York: George Doran, 1920.

Guelzo, Allen C. Abraham Lincoln: Redeemer President. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999.

Temple, Wayne C. Abraham Lincoln: From Skeptic to Prophet. Mahomet, IL: Mayhaven Publishing, 1995.

ALLEN C. GUELZO

LITERATURE

In several ways Protestantism is responsible for the rise of vernacular literature. First, Protestants are people of the book in ways that Catholics are not. That is, the BIBLE is the centerpiece of the Protestant faith, and Protestantism encourages both individual and communal readings of biblical stories. Second, the REFORMATION was accompanied by a rise in literacy in Europe. As indicated by its very etymological roots, literature is possible only when people are literate. Although numerous oral tales, legends, and poems circulated before the Middle Ages, individuals depended on poets and storytellers to tell these stories in various gatherings. In addition, the number of extant texts of these stories, such as Beowulf (eighth century) and the “Dream of the Rood” (date unknown), was small so that access to the written texts would have been limited. Third, the invention of the printing press in the fifteenth century made it possible for a greater number of texts to be disseminated to the population at large. Simply put, the printing press gave rise to a reading public. Fourth, by the time of the Protestant Reformation, literary texts—foremost among them the Bible—began to be translated in vernacular language. Now, for the first time in history, individuals in GERMANY or FRANCE could read their own copies of the Bible in a language they could understand rather than having the Bible read to them in a language they no longer understood. Thus, not only did the Protestant Reformation revolutionize the religious landscape of Europe but it also gave birth to literature.

To be sure, many of the poems, plays, and tales that circulated before the late sixteenth century had religious themes and some even arose explicitly out of a church setting. Poems such as the “Dream of the Rood” represent the early Middle Ages’ fascination with the heroes of pagan religions. At the same time, the poem places Christ and Moses in the guise of these heroes. In Caedmon’s “Hymn” (657–680) the poet, most likely a lay worker in a monastery, depicts God as his prince whom he obeys. In the “Hymn” Caedmon also depicts a pilgrim, St. Helena, who journeys to the Holy Land in search of the true cross. The motif of the search for Christ’s true cross will also dominate Middle English literature and will find its most famous expression in Sir Thomas Malory’s Morte D’Arthur (1405–1471), the retelling of the King Arthur legend of the search for the Holy Grail, or the cup of Christ. In addition the poet who wrote Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (1375–1400) also produced one of the finest early religious poems in Pearl, an eloquent elegy for a child that probes the differences between HEAVEN and earth. “The Vision of Piers Plowman” by William Langland (1330–1387) introduces the method of allegory in dealing with the themes of sinfulness—“The Confession of Envy,” “The Confession of Gluttony”—and pilgrimage, “Piers Plowman Shows the Way to Saint Truth.”

As the dominance of the church began to be challenged in the late Middle Ages, a religious literature flourished that enabled the populace to interpret the mysteries of their religion in their own way. Whereas the church retold the death and resurrection of Christ in its annual Passion Plays, the LAITY developed cycles of mystery plays that they would perform every year around the times of the festivals of Whitsuntide or Corpus Christi, both of which came seven to eight Sundays after Easter. These plays—the most famous of which are the Wakefield Cycle and the Chester Cycle—emphasized the mystery of Christ’s redemption of humankind. Because this redemption had been prophesied in the events of the Old Testament, the action of such plays moved in a cycle from the Creation and the Fall of Humankind to the Flood and to New Testament events such as the Nativity, the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment. Rather than being performed in churches, these play cycles were performed in streets, and various trade unions or religious guilds often performed one of the plays in the cycle as the cycle moved from one town to the other. The mystery play cycles indicate the desire of the laity to move away from the dominance of the church and to begin to interpret these religious mysteries in their own way.

The most famous collection of religious tales of the fourteenth century is Geoffrey Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales (1386–1400). The setting for the telling of the tales is a pilgrimage to CANTERBURY. Although Chaucer completed only twenty-two of the projected 120 tales, the tellers represent a wide spectrum of society from the elite to the poor. The pilgrimage seems merely an excuse to tell these tales, and the trip turns into a carnival in which these pilgrims' world is turned upside down. During this trip they have the opportunity to be their own religious authorities and to question the ways of the church. The Canterbury Tales was one of the most popular poems of its time, and more extant manuscripts of Chaucer's poem exist than of any other poem of the time. Chaucer's creation of a vernacular poem that questions much of the church's teachings indicated how deeply the church's AUTHORITY was eroding and how strongly the laity wanted to have their own authority for reading and understanding religious ideas.

Dante Alighieri (1265–1321) had already paved the way for Chaucer, however, in the early fourteenth century in ITALY. The Italian poet's Divine Comedy (1308) followed the pilgrimage of Dante the pilgrim from the depths of Hell to the pinnacles of Paradise. He wrote his poem in Italian in rhyming couplets so that his audience would have access to his religious and political message. Although Dante himself was exiled for his work, the Divine Comedy received an enormous popular response. The poem was recited in taverns and public rooms by ordinary Italians, who were no doubt eager to learn the fate of various members of the church and certain political parties whom Dante had placed in various circles of Hell. Although Dante's poem takes its structure from the theology of Thomas Aquinas, his commedia functions essentially as a political commentary on his society and the church.

The Sixteenth Century

In 1517 MARTIN LUTHER drafted his ninety-five theses in Wittenberg. Seventeen years later in England HENRY VIII had established himself as the head of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and as the primary religious authority in that country. By 1603 King James I had commissioned a new translation of the Bible to replace the standard Catholic translation of the Bible. In the sixteenth century the religious tide had begun to turn, and the monolithic authority of the Catholic Church began to crumble as Protestantism slowly made its way through Europe. In addition the sixteenth century continued the era of great exploration that had begun with Columbus in the late fifteenth century. By the time of Shakespeare's late plays in 1611, Spain, FRANCE, and ENGLAND had begun to colonize the New World. The sixteenth century also witnessed the flowering of Renaissance, a rebirth of letters and arts focusing primarily on the recovery of ancient Greek and Latin texts. Renaissance values focused on the dignity of human life and the value of earthly society. The art of Botticelli, Michelangelo, and da Vinci emphasized the beauty of the human body, as Greek art had done, as well as the potential of humankind to discover the secrets of the universe and God. SCIENCE and philosophy flourished in the Renaissance, and the literature of the age, influenced by the Reformation, focused on topics ranging from politics to education.

Christian humanists of the sixteenth century focused on EDUCATION and classical learning. Whereas they emphasized writing in Latin and translation into English, these writers and teachers also used Terence's plays, Virgil's and Horace's poems, and Cicero's rhetoric to teach philosophical and moral truth. Some of these teachers—chief among them Roger Ascham (1515–1568), who was PRINCESS Elizabeth's tutor, and Sir John Cheke (1514–1557)—taught at Cambridge and influenced writers from Edmund Spenser to JOHN MILTON. The emphasis on vernacular languages that arose with the Reformation and the reverence for Latin and Greek classics gave rise to eloquent translations during this period. The most famous are George Chapman's translations of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, which John Keats would later immortalize in his sonnet, "On First Looking into Chapman's Homer." In addition to producing these distinguished translations, these humanists also produced the first treatises of literary criticism since Aristotle, Horace, and Longinus. Philip Sidney's (1554–1586) "The Defence of Poesie" offers a powerful apologia for the beauty and utility of poetry.

Trained at Cambridge, Edmund Spenser (1552–1599) produced the greatest poem of the sixteenth century, The Faerie Queene. Like much other poetry of the time, Spenser's poem celebrates the sensuous beauty of NATURE and the glorious splendor of the physical world. Yet, the poem is also virulently anti-Catholic, and depicts the Roman Catholic Church as a villain in the poem (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). The Faerie Queene functions as a moral guidebook for its readers. An allegorical tale of quest and discovery, each of the poem's six books teaches the reader the way to learn a particular Christian virtue: holiness, temperance, chastity, friendship, justice, and courtesy.

Drama also takes center stage in the sixteenth century. Christopher Marlowe (1564–1593) retells the well-known story of a doctor who sells his soul to the devil to possess more knowledge in "The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus." Marlowe's tale of good and evil offered theatergoers a dramatic portrait that transcended the mystery play cycles of an earlier era. Faustus told a cautionary tale about the consequences of pride in everyday life, and although his play drew on the church's teachings, it did not have to reenact them explicitly to teach its message.

The greatest poet and playwright of the sixteenth century was William Shakespeare (1564–1616). He was a master of the English language, and his plays, along with the King James Version of the Bible, introduced more new words into the English vocabulary than had ever been present in the language before or since. His plays have been divided into the categories of histories, comedies, and tragedies. Shakespeare was primarily concerned in many of his plays not with religion but with politics. In the histories he offers a dramatic retelling of British history by focusing on the lives of the kings. The comedies, such as a Midsummer Night's Dream, provide a sly retelling of ancient stories in a modern setting. Like Spenser, Shakespeare glorifies nature in many of his comedies, and in both his comedies and his sonnets he is a poet of love. In the tragedies Shakespeare turns his attention to the shortcomings of human nature and the consequences of human pride, ambition, and hatred. Although not a religious play, Shakespeare's King Lear (1604–1605) offers one of the greatest in-depth examinations of the power of redemptive love as it overcomes hatred born of pride and overweening ambition.

The other great literary achievement of the sixteenth century was the King James Bible (see BIBLE, KING JAMES VERSION). This version of the Bible used the original Greek and Hebrew of the Old and New Testaments to produce a more reliable and accessible translation than previous English translations. The Bible's stylistic and linguistic influence can be traced from Milton to twentieth-century poets such as Randall Jarrell and James Dickey. The historical and literary achievements of the sixteenth century opened the way for the enormous flowering of literature that occurred in later centuries in the Protestant era.

The Seventeenth Century

If England changed rapidly during the sixteenth century, the pace of change increased from the ascension of James I in 1603 to the CIVIL WAR of 1642 to the Restoration of political order in 1660. During these years, increasing religious conflict between Anglicans and Puritans drove many Puritans to seek refuge in the New World. John Winthrop and others had visions of the New World as a new Jerusalem, a "city set upon a hill," which would enable them to begin a new life in a new holy place. Two issues dominated the world during the seventeenth century. One focused on how far the reformation of the church should extend. For most people the extent to which this reform was carried out was almost limitless. Another issue focused on the limits and authority of government. As the monarchy and the Parliament debated about their respective realms of authority, more and more of the populace supported the version of representative government that Parliament offered. In their eyes the monarchy should have no authority independent of the Parliament. Just as the seventeenth century stressed diversity and TOLERATION in religious matters, a tremendous diversity of literature appeared during this century.

Ben Jonson (1572–1637) continued the dramatic tradition begun by Marlowe and Shakespeare. Many scholars still contend that Jonson had a hand in writing some of Shakespeare's plays. Chiefly Jonson's plays, or masques, are political satires and have little to do with religion. Jonson was also a poet who is commonly associated with a group of poets—known as the Cavalier Poets—that included Robert Herrick (1591–1674) and Richard Crashaw (1613–1649). The theme of these poets' works is often expressed in a line taken from Herrick's "To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time": Carpe diem! "Seize the day!"

Another group of poets commonly called the Metaphysical Poets examined religion and religious themes in their works. JOHN DONNE (1572–1631) and GEORGE HERBERT (1593–1633) are the most famous of this group. In his early career Donne wrote satirical poems on topics ranging from MARRIAGE to sex. In 1615 Donne became an Anglican priest and the subjects of his poetry changed dramatically. He produced a series of Holy Sonnets in which he announces his total devotion to God and declares his repentance. However, even in his religious poems Donne retains some of his sensuous imagery. In the holy sonnet 14, Donne uses the sexual imagery of ravishing to describe his request to God to take over his heart and soul completely. George Herbert's poetry, unlike Donne's, captures the mystery of the church's LITURGY and DOCTRINE in the form of the poetry as well as in its content. In his book of poetry, The Temple (1633), Herbert conducts the reader on a tour of a church in poems like "The Altar" and "The Windows." The physical temple becomes the body as the temple of the Holy Spirit in poems such as "Discipline" and "Denial." Herbert emphasizes the topic of his poems by structuring the poem itself in the shape of the object of study. Thus in “The Altar” the poem’s words are shaped like a church ALTAR. Herbert’s poetry had its greatest influence on the American Puritan poet Edward Taylor (1642–1729), whose poems are his preparations for taking Holy Communion.

The Metaphysical Poets’ concern with religion and religious themes culminates in the magisterial combination of classical and Christian learning found in the poetry of John Milton (1608–1674). Milton found himself embroiled in the politics of the Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century, and his many poems and pamphlets offer a glimpse of the tremendous diversity of his writing. He produced a treatise on the relationship of CHURCH AND STATE, Areopagitica, that took its name from the hill in Rome where Paul of Tarsus argued for the virtues of Christianity against the power of the state. His sonnets, at least one of which was addressed to OLIVER CROMWELL, range over political topics and meditations on his blindness. His tract on DIVORCE illustrated his struggles with his own marriage, and the poems on sadness (“Il Penseroso”) and happiness (“L’Allegro”) offer his ruminations on human nature. Out of his great range of writing, Milton wrote the greatest Christian epic poem of all time, Paradise Lost (1674). In the poem Milton retells the biblical story of the Fall of Humankind. Adam and Eve struggle with God’s command not to eat from the tree of knowledge. In Milton’s poem Satan is depicted as one of God’s angels who is ousted from Heaven in a great battle. Satan realizes that God loves Adam more than Satan, so Satan forms a plan to invade Eden and trick the first humans. Paradise Lost presents Satan as an attractive creature whom humans cannot help but follow in their misguided state. Milton’s epic poem introduced the idea into THEOLOGY that Satan fell from heaven, a view that many Protestants attribute to a mistranslation of Isaiah 14:12 in the King James Bible.

JOHN BUNYAN’S (1628–1688) THE PILGRIM’S PROGRESS combines the pilgrimage theme of Dante’s The Divine Comedy and the allegory of Spenser’s Faerie Queene to depict the journey of a soul (Pilgrim) struggling to reach the Celestial City (Heaven). As with any quest narrative, Pilgrim must overcome great obstacles on his journey. The difference between a standard quest narrative and Bunyan’s work is that the obstacles arise out of Pilgrim’s own sinfulness and that God providentially directs Pilgrim’s journey. Bunyan’s work expresses the Protestant notion of the responsibility of every human for sinfulness and the inability of our works to save us from despair. Only God’s providence and our faith in God, in Bunyan’s little morality tale, can lead us to the Celestial City.

In the New World, literature was beginning to take shape in the seventeenth century. Although much of the colonists’ reading came from England, new voices rose in the colonies that expressed the religious sentiments of the colonists as well as the frustrations and challenges of this new geographical setting. The poets ANNE BRADSTREET (1612–1672) and Edward Taylor carried forth much of the work of the Metaphysical Poets in their own work, although Taylor’s work was not discovered and published until the twentieth century and Bradstreet was reluctant to have her work published in her own lifetime. Bradstreet’s poems offer glimpses of a Puritan woman struggling to live her faith in a new setting and to express her faith through poems devoted to everyday events in her life. Taylor’s poems reflect the life of a minister striving to incorporate his faith into his professional life. Michael Wigglesworth’s (1631–1705) poem “The Day of Doom” casts an apocalyptic glance at the souls of New England who refuse to accept Christ (see APOCALYPTICISM). Perhaps the most effective ways of transmitting faith in seventeenth-century New England were the Bay Psalm Book (1640) and The New-England Primer (1683). The Book of Psalms provided solace and comfort to colonists confronting the dangers and challenges of the New World. The Primer, on the other hand, offered a way of inculcating religion and morality in children as they learned the alphabet through various didactic tales about people who failed to follow the virtues of the Christian religion. The primer teaches religious lessons as the child learns each letter of the alphabet: “In Adam’s fall, We Sinned All.”

A literary genre peculiar to colonial America first appeared in 1682. The Indian captivity narrative presented stories of men and women who had been captured by local tribes of NATIVE AMERICANS but who had eventually been saved by God’s gracious providence. The most famous of these narratives is Mary Rowlandson’s “A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson.” She tells the story of her captivity as a series of removes from her town. These removes are not only physical moves away from her family and friends but also signify her being removed from God. As she retells the story, the Indians are mostly vicious irreligious savages who have no hope of redemption. By the end of the tale God providentially restores her to her husband and her town, and she has a new view of God in light of her experience.

Another American writer, COTTON MATHER (1663–1728), a theologian and preacher, produced a theological history of New England, Magnalia Christi Americana; or, The Ecclesiastical History of New England. Mather’s primary purpose was to indicate the ways in which God had delivered the Puritans to this new Christian kingdom and how this new experiment had worked.

Literature of all kinds flourished in the seventeenth century. By the eighteenth century literature produced by Protestants was much less visible than it had been in the previous centuries.

The Eighteenth Century

Very little literature in the Protestant tradition remains from the eighteenth century. The eighteenth century in Europe and America was dominated by political and philosophical revolution. As in the Renaissance, the ENLIGHTENMENT emphasized classical learning and the poetry, drama, and fiction of this century modeled itself on the writings of the Greeks and Romans of antiquity. Because of the various political revolutions occurring in Europe and America, the pamphlet and the newspaper became major literary forms. The eighteenth century also witnessed the rise of the novel in English, and many still argue whether Daniel Defoe’s Robinson Crusoe or Henry Fielding’s Tom Jones was the first English novel. Apart from Defoe’s novel, though, the fiction of the eighteenth century transmitted genteel ideals and secular virtues in their pages. Although Samuel Richardson’s Clarissa involves the education of a young woman, her education is conducted not according to religious ideals but according to philosophical truths. In general the eighteenth century witnessed the rise of philosophy as a way of thinking about the world that did not include religion. Philosophy challenged religion on all fronts, and Protestant Christianity was especially challenged with some of the early lives of Jesus that questioned the historicity of Jesus (see JESUS, LIVES OF). In the eighteenth century the world was changing for Protestant Christians, given that no longer was their impetus to reformation the most important idea on the Continent. The rights of persons, equality, liberty, and reason became paramount concerns in the eighteenth century. Reason, not revelation, became the primary way of talking about the human capacity to think about the world. Religion took a back seat to philosophy, a circumstance that would change literature for centuries to come.

The English literary scene was dominated by SAMUEL JOHNSON (1709–1784), the periodicalists Joseph Addison (1672–1719) and Richard Steele (1672–1729), the poet and critic Alexander Pope (1688–1744)—who remarked that the “proper study of mankind is man”—and novelist and social satirist JONATHAN SWIFT (1667–1745). The focus of these writers’ works was strictly literary and social; if religion ever came into the discussion, it was because someone wished to make fun of it.

In America, literature reflected much of what was happening in England. DEISM had taken hold both in America and in England, so the view that God’s providence ruled the world God created was being challenged by a view of God as a watchmaker who started the world going and was letting it wind down on its own. Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) was the most vocal American proponent of this position, and Franklin wrote about his position in various works, including his Autobiography. There he developed a chart of virtues that he told himself he must follow every day. His dictum, “Imitate Socrates and Jesus,” indicated the influence of both rational and religious thought on his life.

Perhaps the most famous American Protestant writer of the eighteenth century was JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758). A pastor in Connecticut, Edwards participated in a number of AWAKENINGS around the Connecticut Valley in which he urged those who had fallen away from PURITANISM to return to their faith. His most famous sermon, “Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God,” depicts sinful humankind dangling like a spider over the flames of hell. No human works can save us, Edwards writes, only God’s GRACE. Apart from Edwards’s sermons and his account of the Great Awakenings, little in the way of literature from a religious perspective exists in America in the eighteenth century.

The focus on rationalism of the eighteenth century gives way by the nineteenth century to a renewal of a focus on the workings of the supernatural in the natural world.

The Nineteenth Century

If the eighteenth century seemed devoid of any focus on religion, the nineteenth century brought religion back into cultural discussions. ROMANTICISM led the way in reintroducing the supernatural to the natural world. FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) contended that religion imbued all of CULTURE, and SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE (1772–1834) argued that the human imagination replicated the act of God’s creation in this world. Moreover the natural world was imbued with God’s supernatural power, and God was revealed through the book of nature just as strongly as God was revealed through the Bible. By the end of the nineteenth century—in the period known as the Victorian Age—religion still functioned as a guide to human life and as an animating force in the natural world. However, the late nineteenth century witnessed more conflicts between religion and culture than in the Romantic Age, with poet Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) declaring the end of religion and the replacement of religion with poetry. In fact, according to Arnold and others, the close of the nineteenth century will mean the end of Christianity, a prophecy that literature and religion in the twentieth century did not fulfill.

Foremost among the major writers of the early nineteenth century are Coleridge and WILLIAM WORDS-WORTH (1770–1850). Each in his own way rejected the artificial poetic style of the eighteenth century and tried to demonstrate that poetry reflected the organic whole that the natural world showed forth. The two poets agreed to work together to establish some principles for poetry, and Wordsworth announced his in his “Preface” to his Lyrical Ballads. Coleridge announced his principles in his critical work, Biographia Literaria. Wordsworth believed that the subject and language of poetry should be simple; thus he writes about rustic settings and simple people. For Wordsworth “poetry is the powerful overflow of spontaneous emotions.” Coleridge argued that the poet is like God, and that the imagination is the primary human faculty. Many of Coleridge’s poems deal with the supernatural. Each of these poets believed that nature was infused with the supernatural and poetry provided a way of gaining access to the supernatural. Coleridge more than Wordsworth participated in the work of organized religion and wrote a series of lay sermons on theological topics.

By the later part of the nineteenth century England had begun a series of changes once again. The Industrial Revolution had altered the economic landscape of the country and the gap between rich and poor had widened (see INDUSTRIALIZATION). The pastoral rural settings that the Romantics could talk about so freely were changing with the advent of the railroad and the cities were becoming choked with immigrants from the countryside. In 1859 Darwin’s theory of evolution challenged the religious view of creation and offered a new way for humans to think about themselves.

Into this setting came GEORGE ELIOT (1819–1880), an educated woman who had translated DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS’S biography of Jesus, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, and LUDWIG FEUERBACH’S The Essence of Christianity, both of which challenged traditional Protestant notions of biblical history and theology. Eliot’s novels captured an England that was changing and the effects of those changes on various classes of people. In Scenes of Clerical Life (1858), Eliot’s first novel, she struggles to preserve what she views is the best of Christian religion even as she searches for a religion that overcomes the Christian religion. In her finest novel, Middlemarch (1871–1872), Eliot presents a woman whose idealism finds no outlet in marriage to an idealistic man. As Dorothea Brooke searches to fulfill her own ideals in Mr. Causabon’s plan to gather all the world’s myths into one book, she realizes that she lacks the emotional fervor to sustain the marriage. When he dies she marries his cousin, Will Ladislaw, and is able to fulfill her ideals only through his work. At best, Eliot’s work offers an important critique of the role of Protestantism in the late nineteenth century.

The Twentieth Century and Beyond

What role has literature played in the development of Protestantism in the twentieth century and beyond? The century has witnessed some of the world’s greatest poets and novelists—James Joyce, Marcel Proust, Thomas Mann, William Faulkner, Ernest Hemingway, F.Scott Fitzgerald, John Updike. The literature of the twentieth century has been developed against a backdrop of wars and suffering, political upheavals, religious uncertainty, and unprecedented scientific advances. Some of these novelists have used religion mainly as a target for their criticism. Others, like Updike, have depicted Protestant ministers and laypeople trying to come to terms with the inadequacies and the strengths of their religion.

One of the most interesting developments in the Protestant use of literature in the twentieth century has been the emergence of Christian fiction. Beginning in mid-century, a number of books by romance writer Grace Livingstone Hill were published. These genre novels contained simple situations involving people of the Protestant faith who were called on to make decisions about their faith. Generally, they were intended to be uplifting books that could inspire women, primarily, in their daily walks with God. By the latter part of the century, around 1980, some evangelical Protestant religious publishers began to publish fiction modeled after the novels of Hill. The novels were successful, and the publishers had found a new literary product to sell to their readers. The most famous of these Christian novelists is Janette Oke, a Canadian author who sold well over two million books between 1995 and 2003. For the most part, these Christian novels are didactic and depict situations in which one sinful character must find God. However, various genres of this fiction have been developed so that readers can choose from Christian romances, biblical fiction, apocalyptic fiction, mysteries, and thrillers. The evolution of this popular writing represents the most significant development in the Protestant use of literature in the twentieth century and beyond. The authors writing these novels are attempting to be faithful to the visions of Protestants of the Reformation who desired to present the message of the faith in a form accessible and understandable to individuals and communities.

See also Bible Translation; Literature, German; Publishing, Media;

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, M.H. Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature. New York: W.W.Norton, 1971.
- , ed. The Norton Anthology of English Literature. 6th edition. 2 vols. New York: W.W.Norton, 1993.
- Altick, Richard. Victorian People and Ideas. New York: W.W. Norton, 1973.
- Aue, Pamela Willwerth, and Henry L.Carrigan Jr. What Inspirational Literature Do I Read Next? Detroit, MI: Gale, 2000.
- Baugh, Albert C. A Literary History of England. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1948.
- Bredvold, Louis I., ed. Eighteenth Century Poetry and Prose. New York: The Ronald Press Company, 1973.
- Eliot, George. Middlemarch. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Lamson, Roy, and Hallett Smith, eds. Renaissance England: Poetry and Prose from the Reformation to the Restoration. New York: W.W.Norton, 1956.
- Lauter, Paul, ed. The Heath Anthology of American Literature. vol. 1. Lexington, MA: D.C.Heath and Company, 1990.
- Milton, John. Paradise Lost. Norton Critical Editions. New York: W.W.Norton, 1975.
- Parrott, Thomas Marc, ed. Shakespeare: Twenty-Three Plays and the Sonnets. New York: Scribner's, 1966.

Perkins, David, ed. English Romantic Writers. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, Inc., 1967.

Trilling, Lionel, and Harold Bloom, eds. Victorian Prose and Poetry. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.

Watt, Ian. The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1957.

HENRY L. CARRIGAN JR.

LITERATURE, GERMAN

The relationship of German literature to the Reformation begins with the spread of humanism, an influence found throughout Protestant literature from the beginning of the modern era to the present day.

Fourteenth-century Humanism was a fundamental precondition for the German REFORMATION. Humanism opposed the dogmatic views of church scholasticism and embraced ancient literature and philosophy (Plato, Cicero). Originating in Italy this movement is closely associated with such figures as Dante Alighieri (1265–1321), Petrarch (1304–1374), and Coluccio Salutati (1331–1406). Humanism braced itself against the political disintegration of the northern Italian city-states and through its profound engagement with the literary achievements of ancient Rome fought the church's rigid scholasticism. With the decline and fall of the eastern Byzantine Empire in the first half of the fifteenth century, Byzantine scholars fled the newly established Ottoman state and turned to the West. They influenced the development of humanism and expanded its study of Greek literature. In GERMANY, where there existed a close relationship to ITALY during the Middle Ages, Humanist circles were more explicitly Christian in orientation than their Italian counterparts but also tended to be more anti-clerical. A number of authors contributed significantly to the growth of sixteenth-century humanism. Erasmus of Rotterdam (known after 1496 as Desiderius Erasmus; 1466–1536) wrote Encomium moriae (In Praise of Folly), a satire directed against the scholasticism and worldly materialism of the church. He also published the first Greek edition of the New Testament (1516), which was the basis for MARTIN LUTHER'S translation of the BIBLE into German. Ulrich von Hutten (1488–1523), an opponent of the papacy after his stay in Rome between 1515 and 1517, wrote Gespraech Buechlin Herr Ulrichs von Hutten (Dialogue of Master Ulrich von Hutten, 1521), which denounced the CLERGY and outlined an anti-Roman reform program. Hutten also played an important role in the publication of Epistolae obscurorum virorum (Letters of Obscure Men), an anonymous polemic that defended the humanist Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522) against the Dominicans of Cologne.

The movement of Renaissance humanism brought a surge of popular forms of literature, aided—as was the polemical literature of the Reformation—by the invention of movable type printing. Among these were books such as Ein kurtzweilig Lesen von Dyl Ulenspiegel geboren uss dem Land zu Brunswick (The Interesting Story of Till Eulenspiegel, from the Regiae of Brunswick, 1515) by Hermann Bote (ca. 1465–1520), “a mirror of human stupidity” that depicted the lives of “ordinary people,” and the anonymous Historia von D.Johann Fausten: Dem weltbeschreyten Zauberer und Schwartzkünstler (History of Dr. Johann Faust, the World-Famous Magician and Master of Black Art, 1587), a work that inspired JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE's Faust.

Beginnings

The Reformation initiated by Luther in 1517 contributed two decisive factors toward the development of German literature. The translation of the Bible (New Testament, also called the September Testament, September 1522, the complete translation—Biblia, das ist, die gantze Heilige Schrift, Deusch. D.Mart. Luth.—1534) gradually spread the official language of the early High German-speaking area of Saxony and made it the standard for written and spoken German. Luther enriched the German language with new word constructions and phrases drawn from common speech. Moreover his German-language sermons and biblical exegesis were essential in overcoming long-standing regional language barriers. In addition to translating the Bible, Luther contributed to the first hymnbook of the Reformation, Geystliches gesangk Büchlein (Spiritual Song Book) by Johann Walter (1496–1570). This invigorated hymnody, derived its tunes often from folk music, and was also one of the century's most important achievements in poetry.

These achievements in language and literature had an indirect influence on Protestantism in that they facilitated the development of CULTURE in the homes of the Protestant clergy. No less than half of the great German cultural figures—that is, those included in the Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie (published by the historical commission of the Royal Academy of Sciences, Leipzig, from 1875 to 1912)—were sons or daughters of Protestant ministers. Among them are important poets like Andreas Gryphius, Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz, Jeremias Gotthelf, Gottfried August Bürger, and Gottfried Benn. The clerical profession afforded individuals the opportunity to rise socially and so had a way of attracting talented youth, and the atmosphere of learning and meditation fostered their talents. By the middle of the sixteenth century Protestantism had already had a decisive influence on German literature. Representative of this trend are Nikolaus Manuel (c. 1484–1530), who performed comic Shrovetide plays during the Swiss Reformation; Hans Sachs (1494–1576), the Meistersinger and dramatist from Nuremberg; and Jörg Wickram (ca. 1595-before 1562), a Protestant forced to leave his birthplace in the Catholic city of Colmar who published collections of farcical tales and anecdotes in addition to Swiss Shrovetide plays. The flourishing of such plays demonstrates that they were well received by the common people.

Gradually the Shrovetide plays turned into pedagogical theater. Sixtus Birck (1501–1554) wrote the first German-language plays in this literary genre. Paul Rebhuhn (c. 1505–1546), a school principal, performed pieces in classical verse form. The content eventually expanded, and historical elements were added to religious and moral themes. In 1579 Philipp Nicodemus Frischlin (1547–1590) performed Frau Wendelgard: Ein new Comedi oder Spil, ausz glaub-würdigen Historien gezogen (Lady Wendelgard: A New Comedy or Play, Drawn from Credible Historical Chronicles), a play that presented characters from the lower social classes. The development of social realism on the stage was furthered by Johannes Stricker (1540–1598) with the everyman drama Die deutsche Schlömer (1584) and by Georg Rollenhagen (1542–1609) with the didactic epic Froschmeuseler, featuring animal characters, a play that was heavily indebted to the ancient Betrachomyomachia (c.500 B.C.E.). At the time of the COUNTER-REFORMATION in the mid-sixteenth century, pre-Baroque literature first appeared in court theaters, influenced by the Italian commedia dell'arte and the English theater troupes. The most celebrated author was Herzog Heinrich Julius von Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel (1564–1613).

Narrative also shed the traditional style of the Middle Ages. Das Narrenschiff (Ship of Fools) (1494) was a satire of contemporary life and customs written in rhyming couplets by Sebastian Brant (1458–1521). Prose emerged as a narrative art form in the early sixteenth century. Johann Fischart (1546–1590) filled his novels, verse satires, and treatises with a Calvinist ethos, and his powerful prose made him the most popular writer of his day. His novel Affenteurliche und ungeheurlche Geschichtschrift... (1533) marks a further development in pre-Baroque literature.

Baroque

Associated with the image of literature that is disordered, free from style, and contrary to rules, the term “Baroque” has become the standard description of seventeenth-century literature. The attributes of the Baroque were first defined in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and they reflected the tripartite division of Germany, where Lutherans, Calvinists, and Catholics were the three established forms of religion. A series of tensions characterize the Baroque style: the conflict between order and chaos, between lust for life and fear of DEATH, between affirmation of the world and nostalgia for the passing of time, and between a divine plan for human SALVATION and human sinfulness. The trauma of the Thirty Years’ War (1618–1648), a religious and political war fought on German soil, thoroughly scarred seventeenth-century cultural life and contributed to the tension.

During the Reformation the hymn changed significantly. Luther had emphasized in his compositions the communal world of Christians, and so the Jesuit Friedrich Spee von Langenfeld (1591–1635) adopted in the hymn both the form of popular song and the emotionally intense natural spirit it contained. In the 1994 edition of the Evangelische Gesangbuch, the hymnal of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Germany, one can still find many of the hymns from his collection of songs Trutznachtigal (posthumously published in 1649), including the well-known O Heiland, reiss die Himmel auf. The most important composer of Protestant hymns in the seventeenth century was the Lutheran PAUL GERHARDT (1607–1676). He wrote hymns of devotion and prayer intended to be sung by the individual. His Passion O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden (Oh, Sacred Head, Now Wounded) can be found in both Catholic and Protestant hymnals. In other hymns, such as Geh aus mein Herz und suche Freud, NATURE is portrayed as the creator’s picture book in which one can find the soul of Christ. The hymns and brilliantly formulated epigrams of the Cherubinischer Wandersmann (Cherubic Pilgrim) (1657/1674), written by the mystic Angelus Silesius (actual name, Johannes Scheffler, 1624–1677), who converted in 1635 to Catholicism, emphasized the relationship of the individual to God. Similarly the hymns of Christian Knorr von Rosenroth (1636–1689), a minister's son who popularized Jewish mysticism in his Latin translation Kabbala denudata (The Cabala Unveiled, 1677/1678 and 1684), were also heavily influenced by the mystical literature of the age.

During this century lyricists concentrated on refining popular German language. Martin Opitz (after 1627 known as Opitz von Boberfeld, 1597–1639), who came from the Protestant middle class, introduced a poetic innovation with his Buch von der deutschen Poeterey (The Manual of German Poetry, 1624). It enabled poets to apply ancient verse forms to the German language. Instead of measuring meter by long and short stresses, he called for the counting of accented and unaccented syllables. The majority of poets were also scholars, and in the wake of Opitz's book many of them also published books on poetics. Among these were Philipp von Zesen (1619–1689), a son of a Lutheran minister, who published Hochdeutscher Helikon oder Grund richtige Anleitung zur hochdeutschen Dicht- und Reimkunst (1640); Johann Klaj (1616–1656), who published Lobrede der Teutschen Poeterey (1645); and Georg Philipp Harsdörfer (1607–1658), who published Poetischer Trichter (three volumes, 1647–1653). The impact of Opitz's poetics was also felt in the scholarly societies that set out to cultivate the German language by purifying it of foreign words and by establishing a standard orthography. In 1617 Ludwig Fürst von Anhalt-Köthen founded the first of these organizations, Die Fruchtbringende Gesellschaft (The Fruitful Society), also known as the Palmenorden. The most famous was Löbliche Hirten- und Blumenorden an der Pegnitz, founded by Harsdörfer and Klaj. They emphasized the cultivation of poetry in society over the standardization of the German language. The richness and diversity of lyric poetry from the Baroque period—by writers such as Friedrich von Logau (1604–1655), Simon Dach (1605–1659), Andreas Gryphius (1616–1664), and Christian Hofmann von Hofmannswaldau (1617–1679)—usually confuse the reader of today, but closer examination reveals a lyric that follows strict poetic rules. The sonnet was refined, Alexandrine verse was modeled from Roman verse, and rhetorical forms of argument and ornamental phrasing were used. The epigram also achieved its first flourishing moment in German literature. The epigram had a deliberate and formal structure and usually pronounced at its climax a thoughtful, antithetically formulated conclusion. This poetic form stood in contrast to the period's inclination for contradictory formulations, found, for example, in the sonnet. A typical element in Baroque literature is the emblem, an art form constructed of both image and text that contains an (allegorical) image or icon, a title (lemma, motto, or inscription), and a caption (usually an epigram). It reveals a hidden meaning that often concerns a moral, religious, or erotic theme. Without an understanding of the emblem, one can hardly make sense of Baroque dramas and novels.

The most broad-ranging dramatist of the Baroque period was Andreas Gryphius, the son of a Protestant archdeacon. He wrote martyr plays such as Catharina von Georgien (1657), historical tragedies such as Ermordete Majestät oder Carolus Stuardus König von Gross Britannien (1657 and 1663) and Grossmütiger Rechts—Gelehrter/Oder Sterbender Aemilius Paulus Papinianus (1659), and comedies such as Absurda Comica: Oder Herr Peter Squentz (1658) and Horribilicriifax: Teutsch (1663). In Germany at the beginning of the seventeenth century there were no permanently established theaters or theater ensembles as we know them today, and amateurs performed plays only on special occasions. English theater troupes came to Germany for the first time in the 1680s and began to popularize Shakespeare. They also brought the notion of the professional theater. This development was useful to Gryphius, as were his studies and the experiences he gained from his numerous travels throughout Europe.

In the seventeenth century the novel underwent a distinct development. The history of the novel in Germany begins with the reception of foreign-language novels translated by Opitz, von Zesen, Harsdörfer, and Johann Michael Moscherosch (1601–1669). Among these works were Amadisroman (probably of Portuguese origin), Daphnis und Chloë by Longos (third century B.C.), Satyricon by Petronius (first century B.C.), and Aithiopika by Heliodorus (third century B.C.). In contrast to these earlier romantic novels, the courtly historical novel arose in Germany in the seventeenth century. The plots in these novels usually involve the protagonist in many entanglements and temptations in the imperial court, which he in the end influences to the benefit of all its subjects. The most formally well-knit novel of this type is Grossmütiger Feldherr Arminius (two volumes, 1689) by Daniel Casper von Lohenstein (1635–1683), and the last great expression of its kind is Die Asiatische Banise oder das blutig—doch mutige Pegu (1689) by Heinrich Anshelm von Zigler und Kliphausen (1663–1696), one of the most famous works of the age, which by 1766 had gone through nine printings and countless serial editions, reworkings, and dramatizations. It plays a role in Goethe's novel Wilhelm Meister. Hans Jakob Christoph von Grimmelshausen (1622–1676) had an even more powerful impact with his Der abentheuerliche Simplicissimus teutsch (1668–1669), the first important picaresque novel in German literature. It was based in large part on the author's life and describes the world of the Thirty Years' War with rich observations, knowledge, and fantasy. Heroic, political novels of court affairs and picaresque novels continued to be published from the turn of the seventeenth century to the eighteenth century. A late form of the courtly novel was refined by Eberhard Werner Happel (1647–1690), also a minister's son; with this came the so-called gallant poetry, a transition from the Baroque to ENLIGHTENMENT literature. In addition to the short form of the lyric, this new poetic expression gave rise to the gallant novel that emphasized a love story over the political and heroic plot; the creator of this new genre was August Bohse (pseudonym Talander, 1661–1730), and its premier example was the novel Amor am Hofe of 1689.

The Eighteenth Century and the Enlightenment

In 1719, when The Life and Strange Surprizing Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner was published (in Germany as Das Leben und die gantz ungemeynen Begebenheiten des berühmten Engelländ-ers Mr. Robinson Crusoe, 1720), the literary genre of Robinson stories spread throughout Europe, the most important of which was Wunderliche Fata einiger See-Fahrer, published in four parts from 1731 to 1743 by Johann Gottfried Schnabel (1692–1760), also a minister's son. Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853) published a new form of this kind of novel with the title Die Insel Felsenburg (1828), which expanded the utopian theme. Johann Christian Günther (1695–1723), who had attended a newly founded Protestant high school in the city of Schweidnitz, was in his day the only true poetic genius, a forebear of the Sturm und Drang literary movement, although he tends to be treated in literary histories as a wastrel student of poetry. His poems combine biography with poetry and were influenced by the formal structure of the Protestant hymn. The Old Testament here replaced Mount Olympus as poetic inspiration.

In the eighteenth century court culture lost its importance as the center of literary activity. Protestant states in Germany assumed leadership of literary culture, just as a cultural rift began to appear between the progressive Protestant north and the Catholic south. Central to this development were the universities in Leipzig, HALLE, and Heidelberg as well as intellectual social circles in Hamburg, Bremen, Zurich, and Berlin. In Hamburg, Barthold Hinrich Brockes (1680–1747) composed his Irdisches Vergnügen in Gott (nine volumes, 1721–1748), a collection of poems inspired by the Christian spirit of the Enlightenment that praised the perfection, beauty, and purposeful design of God's creation, and Friedrich von Hagedorn (1708–1754) wrote fables and Anacreontic lyrics in the ranging and worldly spirit of Horace. After 1770 Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock (1724–1803) also lived in Hamburg. Inspired by JOHN MILTON'S Paradise Lost, he composed the verse epic Der Messias (1748–1773) in an attempt to create a German national epic. In Leipzig, Christian Fürchtegott Gellert (1715–1769) wrote fables, comedies, and hymns (which are still sung to this day) that combined Pietistic religiosity with didacticism (see PIETISM). Also in Leipzig was the literary reformer Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700–1760), who in the spirit of the early ENLIGHTENMENT attempted to transpose onto German literature the aesthetic principles of French classicism. In Bremen his followers were associated with the newspaper Neue Beyträge zum Vergnügen des Verstandes und des Witzes (1744–1748). In Zürich, the city of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, Johann Jakob Bodmer (1698–1783) and Johann Jakob Breitinger (1701–1776) formulated a literary theory heavily influenced by Paradise Lost that placed primary importance not on the imitation of the real but on the representation of the possible. In Berlin the writer and bookseller Friedrich Nicolai (1733–1811) developed an antireligious form of Enlightenment thought, a tendency traceable to his upbringing in an orphanage at Halle that estranged him from religion. In his novel Das Leben und die Meinungen des Herrn Magister Sebaldus Nothanker (1773–1776) he discusses the question of eternal damnation. Karl Philipp Moritz (1756–1793) also suffered through a pietistic-quietist upbringing, which he describes in Anton Reiser: Ein psychologischer Roman (published in four parts from 1785 to 1790).

One of the most important writers of the eighteenth century was Christoph Martin Wieland (1733–1813), a minister's son. His novel Die Abderiten (1774) is a satire of the simpleminded narrowness and righteousness of SECTARIANISM. Sophie von La Roche (1731–1807), a close friend of Wieland's, chose a different path and became well known as the writer of sensitive epistolary novels, the most famous of which is Geschichte des Fräuleins von Sternheim (1771). Counted among these authors of the preclassical era is the art theorist Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717–1768) from the Protestant city Altmark, who converted to Roman Catholicism in 1754; he saw in Greek art the perfect imitation of nature's beauty. The greatest achievements in German literature of the Enlightenment era are found in works by GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM LESSING.

From the Sturm und Drang Period to the Romantic Era

The literary revolution initiated in 1770 is called Sturm und Drang. The theories of JOHANN GEORG HAMANN and JOHANN GOTTFRIED VON HERDER had a formative influence, and the works of the young Johann Wolfgang von Goethe stand as the central poetic achievements of the movement. The era is characterized by increasing secularization as well as greater personal sensitivity and secular pietistic devotion. The most important representatives of the Sturm und Drang movement were Heinrich Wilhelm von Gerstenberg (1737–1823), a dramatist and Anacreontic poet of occasional poems, and the writer JOHANN HEINRICH JUNG-STILLING (1740–1817)—both influenced by Pietism. Also significant were the dramatist Heinrich Leopold Wagner (1747–1779), the poet Gottfried August Bürger (1747–1794), and the poet Ludwig Heinrich Christoph Hölty (1748–1776), the son of a minister, whose sensitive lyrics were set to music by composers such as Johannes Brahms. Friedrich Müller, also called Maler Müller (1749–1825), wrote poetic idylls, and Johann Heinrich Voss (1751–1826), whose Protestant cast of mind in old age took on a pugnacious demeanor, translated Homer. Also counted among the important figures of the period are the dramatist Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz (1751–1792), the son of a Baltic general superintendent; Johann Anton Leisewitz (1752–1806); Friedrich Maximilian Klingler (1752–1831); and JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH VON SCHILLER. Nearly all came from Protestant families. During the Sturm und Drang period German literature underwent a decisive transformation in which the poet's subjectivity, not knowledge drawn from outside of literature, determined the truth of a poetic creation. Poetry thus shed its 2,000-year-old ties to philosophy and THEOLOGY. The years between 1779 and 1787 (the year Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris was published) on through to 1805 (the year of Schiller's death) show this very clearly. Because of its orientation toward ancient Greece, it is also called the classical period under the dominant influence of Herder, Goethe, and Schiller. Today this epoch is generally considered the high point in German literary history.

At the same time, in 1793–1795, ROMANTICISM emerged as a protest against the rigid rationalism of the Enlightenment. Its philosophical roots lie in the idealism of philosophers such as IMMANUEL KANT, Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762–1814), FRIEDRICH ERNST DANIEL SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH WILHELM JOSEPH VON SCHELLING, and GEORG W.F. HEGEL, whose thought is Protestant in origin. The movement began in Jena among the circle of friends surrounding the sons of a minister—August Wilhelm von Schlegel (1767–1845) and Friedrich von Schlegel (1772–1829)—that included Schelling, Fichte, Schleiermacher, and Novalis (actual name, Georg Philipp Friedrich von Hardenberg [1772–1801]), who was deeply influenced by Pietism. The Romantics' point of departure is the central experience of disunity between the self and the world. The individual seeks identity with himself or herself, often at night, while sleeping and dreaming, and ultimately finds it in death. The Romantic movement spread quickly. During this time two friends born in the Protestant city of Berlin, Wilhelm Heinrich Wackenroder (1773–1798) and Ludwig Tieck, who had studied theology, brought to light the art of the German lyric in the Middle Ages (Herzensergiessungen eines kunstliebenden Kloster-bruders, 1797), which would come to influence the emerging literary culture. The mixing of literary genres is typical of the poetic and theoretical identity of the movement. For example, Friedrich von Schlegel called for “a progressive, universal poetry,” and the poetic genius of Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann (1776–1822) brought together the musical and the painterly; among Hoffmann's notable works are the collection of fairy tales Undine (1812–1814) as well as the novel Lebensansichten des Katers Murr (two volumes, 1820–1822) and the narrative cycle Die Serapionsbrüder (1819–1821). Hoffmann also had an interest in medical questions and in the doctor Justinus Andreas Christian Kerner (1786–1862), whose research on SPIRITUALISM and occultism surfaces in Hoffmann’s fiction (for example, in Die Seherin von Prevorst, 1829).

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the fascination with folk poetry—a genre that first attracted Herder and Goethe—greatly increased. Achim von Arnim (1781–1831) and Clemens Brentano (1778–1842) published the collection of folk songs Des Knaben Wunderhorn (1806–1808); the brothers Jacob Ludwig Karl Grimm (1785–1863) and Wilhelm Karl Grimm (1786–1859) published their Kinder- und Hausmärchen (1812–1815). The Romantics—in painting as well as in literature—cultivated a yearning for the infinite in both a temporal and a spatial sense. They discovered the dream and the power of intuition. The novel Ahnung und Gegenwart (1815) and the novella Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts (1826) by Joseph Freiherr von Eichendorff (1788–1857) have these typical characteristics. Romanticism valued the Middle Ages, and this led in late Romanticism to the so-called romantic CONVERSION: Friedrich von Schlegel became Roman Catholic in 1808 and Clemens Brentano in 1817; Brentano’s close friend Luise Hensel (1798–1876), daughter of a minister and author of the famous Müde bin ich, geh zur Ruh, converted in 1818. Counted among the Romantics is the Jewish lyricist, satirist, and essayist Heinrich Heine (1797–1856), who converted in 1825 to Protestantism and as an exile in Paris (after 1831) worked to mediate hostilities between Germany and FRANCE.

Three of the most important poets from the turn of the nineteenth century are difficult to describe as either classical or Romantic. The minister’s son Jean Paul (actually Johann Paul Friedrich) Richter (1763–1825), a writer rooted in German idealism, combined in his novels influences from Laurence Sterne and Henry Fielding with elements of sentimentalism and the rococo. Johann Christian Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843), who befriended Hegel and Schelling while studying theology, is considered the originator of a new understanding of ancient Greece and was one of the most important poets of German idealism. Heinrich von Kleist (1777–1811), second only to Schiller, is seen as one of the most important dramatists of his age. In his story Michael Kohlhaas (1810), Kleist created one of the few convincing characters modeled on Martin Luther in the literature of the Napoleonic era and also stylized the reformer as a forerunner of German nationalism. The Catholic convert Zacharias Werner (1768–1823) wrote the drama Martin Luther oder die Weihe der Kraft (1807), a work now fallen into oblivion.

The Restoration and the Biedermeier Period

With the end of the Napoleonic age in 1815 and the Vienna conference of 1814–1815, the era of restoration began and signaled the transition from the Romantic to the Biedermeier period in German culture. The Karlsbad resolutions of 1819 attempted to turn back nationalizing and liberalizing efforts with strict censorship measures. For historians this period is significant because of the importance of Romanticism and the emerging NATIONALISM of the time. The poet Ludwig Uhland (1787–1862) from Protestant Swabia, himself a politically engaged liberal, describes these changes in his ballads. In literature the Protestant theologian Wilhelm Hauff (1802–1827), inspired by Sir Walter Scott, wrote Lichtenstein (1826), the first German historical novel. Also at this time the Swiss minister Jeremias Gotthelf (actually Albert Bitzius, 1797–1854) gave moral and didactic depictions of peasant life (for example, Die schwarze Spinne, 1842; and Uli der Knecht, 1846). The Protestant minister Eduard Mörike (1804–1875) is important as a poet of musical and pictorially vivid lyrics and as a writer of such works as Maler Nolten (1832) and Mozart auf der Reise nach Prag (1856). Other writers, such as Heinrich Heine and the dramatist Georg Büchner (1813–1837), were inspired to provide penetrating social and political criticism of the restoration before the Revolution of 1848. Büchner's play Dantons Tod (1835) presents a historically pessimistic interpretation of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, and his fragmentary tragedy Woyzeck (posthumously published in 1878) combines the social and pathological perspectives of naturalism. In this period of transition from idealism to realism appeared the work of the dramatists Christian Dietrich Grabbe (1801–1836) and Christian Friedrich Hebbel (1813–1863). In his theory of Pantragismus Hebbel develops a secularized form of original SIN, and he enriched the historicism of the nineteenth century with biblical and historical-mythological plays. Making keen observations in works critical of society and of the period (for example, Die Epigonen, 1836; and Münchhausen, 1838–1839), the writer Karl Leberecht Immermann (1796–1840) also pointed new directions for the novel.

The hymn of the eighteenth century—most famously represented in the poetry of Gellert and Klopstock—was considered a form of moral instruction, although these songs were never as popular as hymns from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The decline of the hymn continued through the nineteenth century, and only a few Romantic poets, such as Novalis, created spiritual poetry in the form of traditional folk songs, but no hymns by any standard definition. The Biedermeier period often had a tendency toward sentimentality, exemplified by such works as Psalter und Harfe (1833) by Philipp Spitta (1801–1859), a minister from a Huguenot family (see HUGUENOTS). Interest in history during the nineteenth century did inspire a number of hymn collections that even now are considered important sourcebooks; exemplary of these is the work of the hymnologist Philipp Karl Eduard Wack-ernagel (1800–1877) Das deutsche Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des 17. Jahrhunderts (The German hymn from ancient times to the beginning of the seventeenth century; five volumes, Leipzig, 1864–1877).

Realism and Naturalism

At mid-century, with the failure of the Revolution of 1848, there arose in Germany a poetic, bourgeois realism already dominant in other European countries. The most important representatives of realism are Theodor Storm (1817–1888); Gottfried Keller (1819–1890); Theodor Fontane (1819–1898); and Wilhelm Raabe (1831–1910), who was born a Protestant but became a self-described convert to philosophical materialism, measured agnosticism, and human skepticism. An exception to this trend is the Calvinist poet and novelist Conrad Ferdinand Meyer (1825–1898), whose ballads and stories are set in the Renaissance and in the period of religious warfare during the Thirty Years' War. In the decades between 1850 and 1900 the novella (for example, Keller's Die Leute von Seldwyla, 1856, and Das Sinngedicht, 1882; and Storm's Der Schimmelreiter, 1888) and the novel (for example, Keller's Der grüne Heinrich, four volumes, 1854 edition/1879 edition; Fontane's Effi Briest, 1895, and Der Stechlin, 1899; and Raabe's Der Schüdderump, three volumes, 1870, and Das Odfeld, 1889) achieved a high point. In literary history, epic works of poetic realism found in lyrics by Keller, Storm, and Fontane are too often overlooked. This was also a rich period for the ballad, a genre initiated by Gottfried August Bürger and Ludwig Heinrich Christoph Hölty in 1770, one that reaches its zenith with Goethe and Schiller and is continued by Ludwig Uhland and Heinrich Heine. Fontane created ballads in the realistic mode.

Reacting to the triumph of scientific positivism, INDUSTRIALIZATION, and the creation of an industrial proletariat, Dichter Heinrich (1855–1906), Julius Hart (1859–1930), Gerhart Hauptmann (1862–1946), Johannes Schlaf (1862–1941), Arno Holz (1863–1929), and Max Halbe (1865–1944) embraced the epic and dramatic naturalism of the French writer Emile Zola (1840–1902) and the Norwegian playwright Henrik Ibsen (1828–1906). Naturalism created a style that called for social analysis written in the language of the lower classes; it is based in precise description of sensually experienced reality and the economic and moral suffering of people, which is combined with a criticism of bourgeois society. The literature of naturalism was inspired no longer by theological problems but by scientific theories, physiology, the theory of evolution (see DARWINISM), philosophical positivism, and theories of environmental determinism. However, in many works from this period one can recognize impulses associated with Protestantism, especially in the ethical sincerity of criticism that targets the moral decline of the bourgeoisie and in early works by Hauptmann (Der Apostel, 1892; Hannele, 1894), which were influenced by the MORAVIAN CHURCH.

Modernism

In 1890, with the prime of naturalism over, literary modernism begins. Its characteristic features are the reception of the literary and philosophical works of FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE and a pluralism of various and competing styles. Among these are symbolism, Jugendstil, decadence, regional art, neo-Romanticism, impressionism, and, after 1910, expressionism. Many of the important authors in the years from 1890 to 1914 came from Protestant backgrounds, including Richard Dehmel (1863–1920), Frank Wedekind (1864–1918), Stefan George (1868–1933), Heinrich Mann (1871–1950), Thomas Mann (1875–1955), and Hermann Hesse (1877–1962); others from assimilated Jewish families converted to Christianity, such as Arthur Schnitzler (1862–1931) and Stefan Zweig (1881–1942). The SECULARIZATION of religious questions was typical in works published in the years around 1900. Authors no longer sought religious confession and theological interpretation to answer the problem posed by death; they considered mortality within concrete, isolated instances of dying. Many novels deal with problems of schooling and family upbringing as well as suicide, such as Buddenbrooks (1901) by Thomas Mann, Unterm Rad (1906) by Hermann Hesse, and Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless (1906) by Robert Musil (1880–1942). If clergymen appear in novels from this decade, they are usually treated very critically. This stems from the conviction that religious forms of devotion have had their day and are no longer believable. Many works of the early twentieth century often contain secularized mysticism, especially those written by Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929), Rainer Maria Rilke (1875–1926), and Musil (Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften, 1930–1942), a mysticism that provides an alternative form of life and consciousness within the anonymity and mechanization of the modern world. With the advance of industrialization and the alienation of urban populations from religion, the culturally formative power of the Protestant minister's house recedes, and literature completely renounces religious themes. Individual fate and the dialectic of life and death step into the foreground. An example of this trend is Gottfried Benn (1886–1956), one of the most important poets of the twentieth century, in whose work religious and metaphysical questions abound but remain unanswered.

In the novels of Max Frisch (1911–1991) the insistent question of self-identity can be seen as a late form of the Protestant questioning of conscience, for example, in Mein Name sei Gantenbein (1964). Friedrich Dürrenmatt (1921–1990), the son of a Swiss clergyman, takes this one step further in his dramas (most famously, Der Besuch der alten Dame, 1955) by using a radical but logical style to represent the moral destruction caused by two world wars. An exception to this is Mann, the most significant novelist of the twentieth century, who in his later work presented Lutheran religious convictions behind a mask of irony and humor (for example, in Joseph und seine Brüder, 1926–1942; Doktor Faustus, 1947; and Der Erwählte, 1951). The World War and the Nazi dictatorship inspired a few authors to write Christian poetry, for example, Jochen Klepper (1903–1942) and Johannes Bobrowski (1917–1965), an author greatly influenced by Hamann. Nevertheless, the Bible in Luther's translation remained a source of linguistic and poetic power, as shown in the work of the Marxist author Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956) and in younger poets like Günter Eich (1907–1972), Eva Zeller (born in 1923), and Reiner Kunze (born in 1933). After poetry reached a high point in the works of Rilke and Stefan George, it gained renewed importance after 1945. At the same time the second half of the twentieth century witnessed a renaissance of the Protestant hymn, the full appreciation of which is still to come.

See also Calvinism; Literature; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

- Bartel, Klaus J. German Literary History, 1777–1835. New York: P.Lang, 1976.
- Batts, Michael S. A History of the Histories of German Literature, 1835–1914. Montreal, Canada: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1993.
- Beutin, Wolfgang, et al. A History of German Literature. New York and London: Routledge, 1993.
- Emmel, Hildegard. History of the German Novel. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1994.
- Vivian, Kim, ed. A Concise History of German Literature to 1900. New York: Camden House, 1992.
- Watanabe-O'Kelly, Helen, ed. The Cambridge History of German Literature. Cambridge and London: Cambridge University Press, 2000.

ULRICH KARTHAUS

LITURGY

The term “liturgy,” derived from the Greek leitourgia (laós, people, and érgon, work), referred originally to public services performed on behalf of the people. By New Testament times, however, the word was used to describe acts of Christian WORSHIP. In contemporary parlance, it is used most commonly by Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, and Lutheran churches to refer to the words and acts of worship. Other mainline Protestant denominations sometimes employ the term as well, but FREE CHURCH traditions do not usually speak of their worship practices as liturgy. Among Roman Catholic and Orthodox Christians, the term may be used to describe a particular order of worship, a collection of worship services or rites, or the eucharistic (or communion) service alone. Protestant usage of the term refers to the words and acts that constitute the public worship of God, as well as to written services that are provided in officially sanctioned books of worship. Liturgy, then, may refer to the whole pattern of a service of worship, including the specific words said and the acts performed, or it may refer to the printed texts used in those services.

Ranges of Meaning and Use

All assemblies gathered for worship have a liturgy, or a pattern that they follow, but not all churches use the term liturgy to describe what they do in worship. Although Quakers adhere to a set of expectations about what happens when they gather, they would not describe what they do as a liturgy; nor would Baptists, Pentecostals, historically African American churches, or other free church traditions usually use the term. Likewise, those churches are less likely to use liturgical books, placing high value instead on extemporaneous PRAYER and holding to a particular understanding of the movement of the Holy Spirit in worship. In some cases, however, ministers may consult manuals in conducting services of BAPTISM, communion, MARRIAGE, and funerals.

On the other hand, Protestant denominations with traditions of using written texts in their services of worship often describe their worship patterns as liturgies. Churches in the Anglican Communion around the world follow the order for worship set forth in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER or similar prayerbooks that have been adapted in content and/or language for other cultural contexts. Fairly strict adherence to the texts and rubrics (directions) provided is expected. Similarly, congregations in the various Lutheran churches throughout the world make use of liturgical books such as the North American Lutheran Book of Worship.

Churches with Reformed and Methodist roots are provided with books of worship services that are officially sanctioned by their denominations and recommended, but not required, for use. These churches exercise a balance between form and freedom, following a pattern for weekly worship that incorporates both written texts from service books as well as locally written and spontaneous prayers. In the UNITED STATES, for example, the United Methodist Book of Worship and the Presbyterian Book of Common Worship provide liturgies for congregations to use or adapt. Denominations that are the result of mergers between denominations, such as the UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA and the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA, also provide service books that may be used as local congregations see fit. In some churches it is considered appropriate to use experimental liturgies or prayers produced by individuals or groups other than denominational officials. Other churches depend most heavily on hymnals, which may include brief orders of worship, ecumenical creeds, and/or services for communion, baptism, and ordination, to provide some measure of liturgical uniformity.

Elements of Liturgy

Generally speaking, Christian liturgy is understood to include prayers spoken by a presider (worship leader) as well as those said by the people, the reading of scripture, the PREACHING of a sermon or homily, congregational singing, baptism, and the LORD'S SUPPER. Liturgical texts provide an outline of a worship service and include the prayers, blessings, and other elements such as calls to worship and declarations of forgiveness. In some cases guidelines are given for extemporaneous prayer, instructions regarding gestures, movements, and the performance of ritual acts. The use of symbols (such as candles or crosses, for example), visual art, processions, dance, and other forms of MUSIC are also understood to be part of liturgical celebration.

Many Protestant churches provide resources for daily prayer as well as for the weekly assembly. These liturgies center around the reading of scripture, common prayer, and the singing or reading of psalms and canticles. Orders of worship may also be provided for services of healing.

Development of Protestant Liturgies

Although the last five centuries have seen a broad emergence of liturgical practice among Protestants, many contemporary denominations can trace their roots to one of the major reformers, most of whom held to the use of some sort of printed form of worship. In his Deutsche Messe (German Mass) of 1526 MARTIN LUTHER adapted the Roman mass by putting it into the vernacular and including German hymns along with other sung parts of the liturgy. The basic word-table structure of the mass was retained, although he did make significant changes to the eucharistic prayer to reflect his rejection of the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

JOHN CALVIN sought to retain the basic pattern of the Roman mass in the liturgy he created for the Reformed churches in Strassburg and Geneva, the Form of Prayers (1540 and 1542). His order offered a selection of prayers from which the presider could choose and also made provisions for extemporaneous prayer. Calvin, too, championed congregational song in the form of metrical psalmody.

THOMAS CRANMER'S liturgy for the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, The Book of Common Prayer (1549 and 1552), most closely followed the form and content of the Roman mass, although the eucharistic theology expressed in the liturgy showed the influence of other Reformation thought. Nearly two centuries later, JOHN WESLEY would commend THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER to the emerging Methodist church, although American Methodists would soon adopt a less formal liturgical program, relying instead on a brief outline of worship and extemporaneous prayer. The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries saw Reformed churches follow the same trend, in spite of the intentions of Calvin. The heirs of the Anabaptist traditions perpetuated their Reformation ancestors' aversion to ceremony, sacramental objects, and the liturgical year, shunning formal liturgies in most cases.

In the twentieth century the liturgical renewal movement inspired a broad range of Protestant denominations to rediscover worship practices of the early church and to study anew the liturgical instincts of the reformers, resulting in the production of new liturgical resources. Consequently, a number of Protestant traditions have adopted liturgies that reflect the word-table pattern of the historic CHURCH, and many have returned to using denominationally sanctioned service books. At the same time, a broad approach to the use of liturgical resources prevails across Protestant denominations, and even traditions that historically have adhered strictly to prescribed liturgies have expanded the sources from which material can be drawn. This approach to worship stresses a high level of participation among worshipers through word, ritual, and song, thus recapturing the sense of liturgy as the "work of the people."

See also Anabaptism; Anglicanism; Baptists; Friends, Society of; Hymns and Hymnals; Lutheranism; Methodism; Orthodoxy, Eastern; Pentecostalism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Bradshaw, Paul, ed. The New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2002. [First published in Great Britain in 2002 under the title The New SCM Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship.]
- Fink, Peter E., S.J., ed. The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1990.
- Jones, Cheslyn, Geoffrey Wainwright, Edward Yarnold S.J., and Paul Bradshaw, eds. The Study of Liturgy. Rev. edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992. [First published in Great Britain in 1992.]
- Senn, Frank. Christian Liturgy. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1997.
- Thompson, Bard. Liturgies of the Western Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1980.
- White, James F. Protestant Worship: Traditions In Transition. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1989.
- . The Sacraments in Protestant Practice and Faith. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.

KIMBERLY BRACKEN LONG

LIVINGSTONE, DAVID (1813–1873)

Missionary-explorer, scientist, abolitionist, and geographer. Livingstone was born in Blantyre, SCOTLAND to a deeply religious but impoverished family. About age eighteen he experienced personal CONVERSION and embraced the novel idea of becoming a medical missionary. Studious and resourceful, he funded his own medical education at Anderson College (Glasgow) and gained acceptance for missionary service with the nondenominational London Missionary Society. He sensed a call to go to AFRICA, and arrived there in 1841.

A few years after his arrival, he rejected a sedentary missionary life and embarked on extensive explorations of the unevangelized African interior. His “discoveries” and exploits—notably the epic transcontinental journey from Luanda to Quelimane (1853–1856)—earned him fame and a brief consulship. Then followed an exploration of the Zambezi-Shire region (1858–1864) and the search for the source of the Nile (1866–1873). Livingstone was impelled by an allconsuming vision of missionary expansion and a passionate conviction that opening up Africa to the twin benefits of legitimate commerce and Christianity was the most effective solution to the pernicious slave trade and key to the continent’s material development. His celebrity served as a useful platform for his unflagging antislavery campaign, and his lofty idealism galvanized a new phase of Protestant missionary effort in central and east Africa. An indomitable personality and a remarkable capacity for physical endurance fostered a myth of indestructibility, and his famed meeting with H.M.Stanley in 1871, having been presumed dead, did nothing to reduce it.

At his death Livingstone was extolled as “the greatest man of his generation” and for long his life and legacy were enshrouded in legend. With access to new material, recent scholarship has focused sharply on his failures (as a missionary, explorer, geographer, husband, and father), his personality flaws, and his contribution to British imperial expansion. However, few did more to advance the cause of Protestantism in Africa. By the time of his death, in the village of Chitambo (in present day Zambia), he had preached the gospel to more African tribes than any previous missionary and transformed European views of Africa and Africans. Still, he remains a complex figure, perhaps best thought of as a giant with feet of clay.

See also Slavery; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Livingstone, David. Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa. London: John Murray, 1857.

———, and Charles Livingston. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and Its Tributaries. London: John Murray, 1865.

Secondary Sources:

Jeal, Tim. Livingstone. London: Heinemann, 1973.

Mackenzie, John M., ed. David Livingstone and the Victorian Encounter with Africa. London: National Portrait Gallery, 1996.

Makenzie, Rob. David Livingstone: The Truth Behind the Legend. Eastbourne, UK: Kingsway Publications Ltd., 1993.

Ransford, Oliver. David Livingstone: The Dark Interior. London: John Murray, 1978.

JEHU J.HANCILES

LOCKE, JOHN (1632–1704)

English philosopher. Locke was born at Wrington, a village in Somerset, to an Anglican family with Puritan sympathies. Though his father fought in the parliamentary army during the CIVIL WAR, Locke himself welcomed the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. Much of Locke's work can be read as a reaction to the religious and civil strife that gripped ENGLAND in the late seventeenth century.

Career

Three years after graduating from Christ Church, Oxford, in 1656, Locke was appointed tutor there, later receiving a dispensation that would allow him to keep that position without being ordained. Locke's chief interests at this time were experimental science and medicine. Although lacking a degree in medicine, Locke became the personal physician of Lord Ashley (later the first earl of Shaftesbury) in 1666, and soon became Shaftesbury's advisor on political, personal, and business affairs. The two shared interests in a Protestant succession, TOLERATION in religion, and economic expansion. When Shaftesbury became involved in trade with the American colonies, Locke helped to draft a constitution for Carolina that included freedom of worship for all except atheists.

Locke's personal fortunes ebbed and flowed with those of Shaftesbury. After Shaftesbury's fall from the position of Lord High Chancellor in 1675, Locke spent four years in FRANCE, coming under the influence of Gassendi's empiricism and hedonism. Upon return to England Locke became associated with Shaftesbury's attempt to exclude the Roman Catholic James II from the succession to the throne. In 1683 Locke followed Shaftesbury into exile in Holland where he formed friendships with many of those preparing the GLORIOUS REVOLUTION. When the Protestant William of Orange seized the English throne from the Catholic James II in 1688, Locke himself crossed back to England in the party of the new Queen Mary II. Locke spent the last fifteen years of his life publishing the works that would give him a significant place in the development of Western thought.

Thought

The breakdown of consensus on government and religion in the seventeenth century compelled Locke to focus on epistemology. Locke believed that establishing the limits of human knowledge would make claimants to truth more modest and therefore more tolerant. His Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689) can be read as an attempt to secure agreement and tolerance against what he considered the excesses of Puritan SECTARIANISM and enthusiasm. Locke held that limited human reason must be supplemented by belief in propositions revealed by God, but reason must determine the probability that a given proposition really is a revelation of God. Locke's The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) is thus dedicated to showing that God's revelation in Scripture is consonant with what human reason can know immediately, although revelation is still necessary to deliver what could not be reached by reason alone. As a good empiricist Locke gathered bits of evidence to support, for example, belief in Jesus's miracles, based on the credibility of the apostles, whose chief function was to gather data to support Jesus's claim to messiahship. If Locke thus sought to counter the fanaticism of unsubstantiated belief, he also stressed the limits of human faculties and our failure to apply them, thus making toleration of others' views imperative. In his famous Letter Concerning Toleration (1689), Locke defined the CHURCH as a voluntary association and advocated the toleration of religious practice that does not impinge on the duty of the state. Excluded from this toleration, however, were atheists and those who owed obedience to a foreign power, by which Locke meant Roman Catholics. Locke's epistemology and views on toleration were one with his political vision of a united nation-state whose chief purpose was the defense of individual property rights and not the enforcement of theological truth.

Locke believed in an established church that allowed for a broad range of practices and beliefs. Like the LATITUDINARIANS, with whom he was acquainted, Locke sought to achieve peace by reducing the requirements for being a Christian to the simple and reasonable propositions that God exists and Jesus is Messiah. Locke was accused of SOCINIANISM, although he published a defense of himself against this charge. Nevertheless, Locke steadfastly refused either to affirm or deny the DOCTRINE of the Trinity. In his day Locke was also accused of DEISM, a charge he also denied. He claimed that his The Reasonableness of Christianity was written to refute Deists who believed either that revelation was unnecessary or that the fundamental doctrines of Christianity were contrary to reason. However, many historians consider Locke a forerunner to Deism.

Influence

Locke was not an orthodox Christian by the standards of his day, and he found his theological views shared by very few of his contemporaries. He explicitly denied the doctrine of original SIN, and was at the opposite pole from MARTIN LUTHER'S and JOHN CALVIN'S emphasis on the need for God's GRACE to overcome the depravity of the human person. Locke used the Scriptures extensively but opposed those Protestants who relied on the unexamined AUTHORITY of the BIBLE. Nevertheless, Locke has exerted an enduring influence on Protestant thought and practice in several indirect ways. Locke's insistence that religious belief should answer to standards of evidence external to religion itself appears both in liberal Protestant efforts to demythologize religious belief and correlate it with findings of the natural and social sciences, and in conservative Protestant efforts to find scientific proof of the historicity of the biblical narratives. Locke has also influenced the general Protestant acceptance of religious toleration, and the definition of the church as a voluntary association essentially distinct from the interests of the state and commerce.

See also Anglicanism; Church and State, Overview; Puritanism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Locke, John. An Essay Concerning Human Understanding [1689]. Edited by Peter H. Nidditch.

Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1975.

———. A Letter Concerning Toleration [1689]. Edited by Patrick Romanell. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1950.

———. The Reasonableness of Christianity, as Delivered in the Scriptures [1695]. Edited by John C. Higgins-Biddle. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1999.

Secondary Source:

Chappell, Vere, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Locke. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.

WILLIAM CAVANAUGH

LÖHE, WILHELM (1808–1872)

German Lutheran pastor. Born on February 21, 1808, in Fürth near Nuremberg, Löhe took his theological training at the University of Erlangen and was appointed to the Neuendettelsau parish near Nuremberg in 1837. While serving this village parish, he supported a mission to German immigrants in North America, founded a DEACONESS community, and led many efforts to renew the church. He served there until his death on January 2, 1872.

Löhe's theological and pastoral work focused on the CHURCH, its life and mission. Influenced in his early years by a Pietist movement (see PIETISM), Löhe became a leader in the struggle to establish a confessional Lutheran church in Bavaria. He called his developed perspective "sacramental Lutheranism," a theology and practice characterized by the centrality of the LORD'S SUPPER. Based on his study of Lutheran and early church sources, Löhe worked to restore historic forms of WORSHIP. His work parallels that of other churchly movements in the nineteenth century such as the MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY and the OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Beginning in the early 1840s Löhe organized the preparation of pastors and schoolteachers to serve German immigrant communities in the American Midwest (see LUTHERANISM, UNITED STATES) and encouraged a mission to NATIVE AMERICANS. This work expanded after Löhe's lifetime to include similar efforts in BRAZIL and AUSTRALIA as well as a mission to New Guinea (see MISSIONS, GERMAN). In 1854 Löhe founded a deaconess house that, in its common life, its worship, and its service of those in need, was to model the apostolic community the whole church was called to be.

Löhe's extensive writings include an ecclesiological treatise, Drei Bücher von der Kirche (1845), a manual on pastoral life and practice, Der evangelische Geistliche (1852–1858/1866), orders for worship in his Agende (1844/1853–1859), and numerous devotional works.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Löhe, Wilhelm. Gesammelte Werke. 7 vols. Edited by Klaus Ganzert. Neuendettelsau, Germany: Neuendettelsau FreimundVerlag, 1951–1986.
 ——. Three Books about the Church. Translated and edited by James L.Schaaf. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1969.

Secondary Sources:

- Ratke, David C. Confession and Mission, Word and Sacrament: The Ecclesial Theology of Wilhelm Löhe. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 2001.
 Weber, Christian. Missionstheologie bei Wilhelm Löhe: Aufbruch zur Kirche der Zukunft. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1996.

THOMAS H.SCHATTAUER

LORD'S SUPPER

During the Reformation era, the second of the two “evangelical” SACRAMENTS instituted (it was supposed) by Christ became the subject of endless controversy. The various names by which the sacrament was called, most of which could claim biblical warrant, reflected the diversity of interpretation, or at least of emphasis, in the rival doctrines; besides “Holy Communion,” it was “the Mass,” “the sacrament of the altar,” “the Eucharist,” “the Lord's Supper,” or “the breaking of bread.” The Protestant reformers were agreed in their rejection of the medieval mass but were divided over the true meaning of the rite. MARTIN LUTHER and HULDRYCH ZWINGLI defended sharply opposed views of the sacrament as, respectively, an oral reception of the body and blood of Christ, or a remembrance of his DEATH on the cross. A mediating view championed by JOHN CALVIN and others represented the sacrament as an efficacious sign of communion with the ascended Lord: that is, a sign by which the Holy Spirit actually brings about the communion, or increases it. The inner-Protestant divisions and the Protestant critique of the Roman Catholic mass have remained controversial to this day. The history of the sacrament in the Protestant churches has been marked in particular by both a drift toward a simple memorialism and repeated attempts to retrieve the more cryptic meanings discovered in the holy communion by the critics of memorialism. Despite the legacy of acrimonious polemics, recent ecumenical pronouncements and new or revised service books have shown a measure of convergence between what were once supposed to be mutually exclusive views of the sacrament.

Holy Communion in Luther and Zwingli

In LUTHER'S first extended treatment of the sacrament, A Treatise Concerning the Blessed Sacrament of the Holy and True Body of Christ (1519), Luther took it to be a sign of incorporation, by which believers are made one body with Christ and the SAINTS. He understood the conversion of the elements of bread and wine into Christ's natural body and blood (TRANSUBSTANTIATION) as an analogue of the conversion of believers into his spiritual body, the CHURCH. Although he wanted the cup as well as the bread to be given to the LAITY and stressed the need to receive the sacrament in faith, there was nothing here to suggest that at this time, two years after the outbreak of the indulgences controversy, Luther considered the medieval mass to be an abuse. But in his next thoughts on the sacrament, in A Treatise on the New Testament: That is, the Holy Mass, published soon afterward (1520), a remarkable change called for a frontal assault on the Roman Catholic mass. "Testament" replaced "incorporation" as the cardinal term, and to say that the mass is a testament means, Luther concluded, that it is not a priestly sacrifice. By "testament" he understood a promise made by someone who is about to die (cf. Hebrews 9:16–17). At the Last Supper, Christ declared his last will and testament to his disciples; he promised them forgiveness of sins and added to the promise, as a sign and seal of his testament, his own true body and blood under the elements of bread and wine.

Luther's Prelude on the Babylonian Captivity of the Church, which appeared the same year (1520), repeated and broadened his case against the medieval mass. The Church of Rome, he now said, had subjected the sacrament to three captivities: the withholding of the cup from the laity, the theory of transubstantiation, and the interpretation of the mass as a good work and a sacrifice. For Christ's body and blood to be included in the bread and wine, it is not necessary to imagine that the elements undergo a change of substance. But a much worse error is the misrepresentation of the sacrament as a priestly sacrifice; for a sacrifice is something we offer, a promise, something we receive—by faith. Luther's critique of what he took to be Roman Catholic errors did not lead him to abandon descriptions of the sacrament, when rightly understood, as "the mass" or "the sacrament of the altar." But his rejection of the sacrificial mass was complete, and it had far-reaching consequences for the WORSHIP and ministry of the church.

Other reformers who were in agreement with his critique found Luther's own view of Christ's bodily presence in the elements no improvement over the dogma of transubstantiation. Some of them saw the best clue to the sacrament's true meaning, not in Christ's words, "This is my body," but rather in his directive, "Do this in remembrance of me." Luther's colleague ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN VON KARLSTADT argued that the Lord's supper is an occasion for recollection or remembrance, in which the worshiper meditates on Christ's death. In Luther's eyes, this was another variety of the Roman Catholic error: turning the Lord's gift into a human work, this time not a priestly sacrifice, but rather a devotional exercise. Zwingli, too, in his Commentary on True and False Religion (1525), understood the sacrament as an activity of remembering. For him, however, it was more than an occasion for private devotion: it was a public celebration, in which the church returned thanks for the one and only redeeming sacrifice of Christ on the cross. To eat Christ's flesh (John 6:51–59) is to believe in his saving death, and his words "This is my body" must mean "This signifies my body." The very term "eucharist" shows what the Lord's supper is: "the thanksgiving and common rejoicing of those who declare the death of Christ" (Latin Works, 3:200). In the last year of his life, in his Exposition of the Faith (published in 1536), Zwingli did suggest that the outward eating of the elements parallels an inward "feeding" on Christ by faith. But he could not speak of God as giving the inward through the outward without jeopardizing his fundamental principle that the Holy Spirit works directly, not through means. Sacramental signs, for Zwingli, were not instrumental but indicative or declaratory; and their proper subject—the subject that does the signifying—was not God or Christ, but rather the Christian or the congregation. Zwingli liked to point out that a sacramentum in ancient Roman military usage was an oath of allegiance to the commander-in-chief. Just as in BAPTISM the Christian takes his or her stand with the church and pledges to be a soldier of Christ, so in the Eucharist the entire congregation declares its commitment to Christ and the SALVATION he won on the cross. In a series of impassioned treatises (1526–1528), Luther denied that he meant a crude, local presence of Christ's body and blood in the elements of bread and wine. As God, Christ is present everywhere, and his divine nature imparts its supernatural presence to his humanity; but in the sacrament he is there—by his word—for me. Zwingli, Luther thought, missed the point of the sacrament, which is, by offering the communicant Christ's body and blood, to apply to the individual the promise of forgiveness proclaimed generally and to all in the preached word. Indeed, Zwingli reduced the sacrament to a sign of something absent—Christ's body on the cross. But Luther did not attempt to counter Zwingli's mistake with a sounder view of signs. In Luther's view, the bread does not strictly signify Christ's body; rather, the words of Christ bring a single new entity into being out of the bread and the body—"fleshbread"—and to speak of either one separately is to speak improperly. Hence even the wicked receive the body and blood of the Lord into their mouths, although they do it to their own destruction.

Calvin and the Mediating Position

The MARBURG COLLOQUY (1529) seemed to demonstrate that the Lutherans and the Zwinglians had arrived at a final impasse. But a different, more Augustinian conception of signs opened up the possibility of a mediating position, which, in essentials, came to be held in common by MARTIN BUCER, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Calvin, and others. Zwingli thought of a sacramental sign as a pointer to a GRACE that lies in the past;

Luther, accordingly, was suspicious of any attempt to distinguish sign from reality in the sacrament of the ALTAR. But a third alternative was to argue that although the signs are not the reality, they are bearers of the reality, which is communion with Christ or participation in his life-giving flesh. The broken bread and the poured wine are not empty signs (nuda signa), but efficacious (signa exhibitiva). The consecrating words bring about a change in the elements—not of substance, but of use. And Calvin could ask: “Why should the Lord put in your hand the symbol of his body, except to assure you of a true participation in it?” (Institutes, 4.17.10). The sacrament is an actual means or instrument by which the Holy Spirit imparts or nurtures union with Christ, raising us up and overcoming the distance between the ascended Lord in HEAVEN and ourselves below, so that we receive the power or virtue of his life-giving flesh. Calvin did not profess to understand how this elevation of the believer works but was content to leave it as a mystery. “In his Sacred Supper Christ bids me take, eat, and drink his body and blood under the symbols of bread and wine. I do not doubt that he himself truly presents them, and that I receive them” (ibid., 4.17.32).

The mediating view differed sharply from the main lines of Zwingli’s sacramental THEOLOGY. Holy Communion, in this view, is the actual giving of a gift, not recollection of a gift. The “reality” (res) of the sacrament, for Calvin, was not a past event to which believers have access through memory, as they call to mind the benefits Christ’s death won for their salvation. He certainly agreed that the LITURGY as a whole includes the thankful response of the congregation for the gift of Christ’s benefits. This is the true eucharistic sacrifice, which defines the entire life of Christians—also outside of the liturgy. But the first movement is from the living Christ to the congregation; he is the primary subject of the sacramental action, offering them his crucified and risen body. Moreover, what was at stake for Calvin was not just the correct interpretation of the sacrament, but a total conception of how believers are related to Christ. Zwingli explained that “eating” is simply “believing.” But Calvin felt, and argued forcefully, that there is more than that to feeding on the bread of life: being a Christian is a matter not solely of beliefs about Christ, but also of a mystical (that is, mysterious) union with Christ by which we become “flesh of his flesh and bone of his bones.”

Obviously, the mediating view, as Calvin represents it, was not free from difficulties of its own. HEINRICH BULLINGER, Zwingli’s successor in Zurich, told Calvin bluntly that he could not see how Calvin’s doctrine differed from that of the papists, who taught that the sacraments actually confer grace. But patience and determination led eventually to the Zurich Consensus (1549), which brought harmony between the French- and German-speaking reformed churches of SWITZERLAND. Sadly, the consensus lost Calvin much of his support among the Lutherans, who had previously believed him to be on their side. No doubt, very few of the evangelicals in GERMANY or Switzerland were able to grasp the intricate polemics that followed between Calvin and his Lutheran critics. But it must not be overlooked that at the practical level of congregational worship the Lutherans and the Calvinists had between them brought about radical changes that were evident to the eye and the ear. The medieval mass was from beginning to end a priestly action conducted in Latin. The people were urged to “communicate” (receive the wafer) once a year, at Easter. But their presence at the mass was not essential; if present, they were left to their private devotions, save when the host was elevated and the bell sounded to indicate that the miracle of transubstantiation had been effected. In contrast, for Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin, despite their differences, reception of the elements by the people was essential to the meaning of the sacrament. Calvin in particular insisted that the sacrament is a banquet, and he faulted the medieval mass for robbing the holy banquet not only of its character as a gift, but also of its essentially corporate nature: “[The Lord has] given us a Table at which to feast, not an altar upon which to offer a victim; he has not consecrated priests to offer sacrifice, but ministers [i.e., servants] to distribute the sacred banquet” (Inst., 4.18.12). It followed for Calvin that no gathering of the church should take place without partaking of the Lord’s Supper, and he called for communion once a week at the very least.

Holy Communion in the Protestant Churches

Alongside the types of eucharistic doctrine represented by Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin were others that relativized, diminished, or rejected the place of the Holy Communion in Christian worship. Zwingli had already discarded the idea of a means of grace and retained the word “sacrament” only in an unconventional sense. The Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM), who shared his memorialist interpretation of the Lord’s Supper, spoke of the sacrament as one of Christ’s “ordinances.” Belief in the inwardness of the Spirit’s working led others to abandon the outward ceremony altogether, as the Quakers did in ENGLAND (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). The Socinians, though they believed Christ intended the rite to be a perpetual memorial of his death, so denuded it of the old meanings that it lost importance for them, and the English Socinians, too, were chided for not observing it at all (see SOCINIANISM). But the Quakers and the Socinians stood outside the mainstream of the English churches.

In sixteenth-century England, the influence of the mediating eucharistic theology prevailed: THOMAS CRANMER and RICHARD HOOKER both described the holy communion in language that has clear affinities with Calvin’s. In the following century, echoes of Calvin can still be heard not only in Puritan writings on the sacrament (see PURITANISM), but also in the writings of Anglican divines who had no taste for Calvin’s predestinarianism (see PREDESTINATION). Across the English Channel, in the heyday of Protestant ORTHODOXY, Lutherans and Reformed continued to define themselves in conscious differentiation from each other. But in the eighteenth century sacramental theology throughout Protestantism had to contend with the Enlightenment mentality, which saw in the very concepts of a “means of grace” and a “real presence” idle, if not dangerous, superstitions. In such a world of thought, a simple memorialism had an obvious advantage over CALVINISM and LUTHERANISM alike. The “high church” movements in the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican communions during the nineteenth century took the form of protests against apostasy, not least in the DOCTRINE of the holy communion. When the Mercersburg theologian John Williamson Nevin (see MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY) picked up the fallen banner of the Calvinist doctrine of the real presence, not only the Presbyterians, but Episcopalians and Lutherans, too, decried his efforts to revive old “superstitions.” Nonetheless, continuing efforts at liturgical renewal in the twentieth century have combined with greater openness between the churches to maintain an interest in the classical types of eucharistic THEOLOGY, to supplement them where they seem lacking, and to stress agreements between old adversaries. The revised service books of the main-line Protestant denominations and such ecumenical statements as the much-discussed document Baptism, Eucharist & Ministry are among the fruits of recent reflection on liturgy and the holy communion.

See also: Presbyterianism; Anglicanism

References and Further Reading

- Baptism, Eucharist & Ministry.* Faith and Order Paper No. 111. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Brooks, Peter. Thomas Cranmer's Doctrine of the Eucharist: An Essay in Historical Development. New York: Seabury Press, 1965.
- Calvin, John. Calvin: Institutes of the Christian Religion. Edited by John T. McNeill; translated by Ford Lewis Battles. Library of Christian Classics, vols. 20 and 21. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Clark, Francis. Eucharistic Sacrifice and the Reformation. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.
- Gerrish, Brian A. Grace and Gratitude: The Eucharistic Theology of John Calvin. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press; Edinburgh, U.K.: T. & T. Clark, 1993.
- Luther, Martin. Luther's Works (American Edition). Edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and Helmut T. Lehmann. 55 vols. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House; Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1955–1986.
- McLelland, Joseph C. The Visible Words of God: An Exposition of the Sacramental Theology of Peter Martyr Vermigli, A.D. 1500–1562. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1957.
- Rempel, John D. The Lord's Supper in Anabaptism: A Study in the Christology of Balthasar Hubmaier, Pilgram Marpeck, and Dirk Philips. Studies in Anabaptist and Mennonite History, no. 33. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1993.
- Sasse, Hermann. This Is My Body: Luther's Contention for the Real Presence in the Sacrament of the Altar. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1959.
- Stephens, W.P. The Theology of Huldrych Zwingli. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- White, James F. The Sacraments in Protestant Practice and Faith. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.
- Wisløff, Carl F. The Gift of Communion: Luther's Controversy with Rome on Eucharistic Sacrifice. Translated by Joseph M. Shaw. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing House, 1964.
- Zwingli, Ulrich. The Latin Works of Huldreich Zwingli. Edited by Samuel Macauley Jackson et al., 3 vols. New York: G.P. Putnam's Sons, 1912; Philadelphia, PA: Heidelberg Press, 1922–1929.
- B.A.GERRISH

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483–1546)

German reformer, professor of Bible at the University of Wittenberg, regarded as the initiator of the Protestant Reformation.

Luther as Student and Professor

Luther was born November 10, 1483, in Eisleben, the son of a copper processor on the rise out of the peasantry, Hans Luder, and his wife, Margarete, nee Lindemann, who was from an Eisenach bourgeois family. Luther began his schooling in Mansfeld, the family residence since 1484. In 1497 his secondary school commenced in Magdeburg, in circles related to the Brethren of the Common Life, and continued in Eisenach. At the University of Erfurt he earned a B.A. in 1502, an M.A. in 1505, and in accord with his father's aspirations, began the study of law. His sensitive conscience drove him into a spiritual crisis, however, after lightning terrified him as he returned to Erfurt in June 1505. He entered the Observant Augustinian monastery there despite parental objections. He dedicated himself totally to the strict regimen of monastic life, from which he hoped to gain merit in God's sight and thus SALVATION. Against his own wishes, his superiors promoted his monastic career, requiring further study in theology, which led to his doctorate in Bible (1512) and his ordination as a priest (1507). The terror of God's presence in his first celebration of the mass was but one sign of his continuing spiritual crisis. His professors taught "in the modern way"—the "via moderna" or nominalism, as represented by Gabriel Biel (c. 1413–1495). Although he rejected Biel's teaching that good works must merit grace, Luther never abandoned certain fundamental presuppositions of his nominalist teachers. His order's vicar for Germany, Johann von Staupitz, recognized his abilities and moved him to the infant university of Wittenberg (founded 1502) to teach (1508–1509, 1511–1546).

His doctoral oath pledged Luther to search the Scriptures and defend their truth at all costs. He began his biblical lecturing with the Psalms (1513–1515), developing his theology through lectures on Romans (1515–1516), Galatians (1516–1517), Hebrews (1517–1518), and Psalms (1519–1521). Later lectures treated Deuteronomy (1523–1524), the Minor Prophets (1524–1526), Ecclesiastes (1526), I John, Titus, Philemon, and I Timothy (1527–1528), Isaiah (1528–1530, 1543–1544), Song of Solomon (1530–1531), Galatians (1531), Psalms (1532–1535), and Genesis (1535–1545). His students also used his postils and several published sermon series as commentaries (e.g., Genesis, 1523–1524; John, 1528–1529, 1530–1532, 1537–1538; I Peter, 1522). Scholars disagree on his precise relationship to biblical humanism, but from his first lectures on he employed linguistic aids and commentaries of humanist scholars such as Johannes Reuchlin and Jean Lefevre d'Etaples. PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, a leading representative of humanist scholarship, became his Wittenberg colleague in 1518 and profoundly influenced Luther's interpretation of the biblical text.

Although his PREACHING always employed "allegorical" illustrations, Luther led a hermeneutical and exegetical revolution in biblical studies as he laid aside the fourfold analysis of Scripture practiced throughout the Middle Ages and sought always to determine the "literal-prophetic" sense of the text. For him that meant that prophecies concerning Christ formed the heart of the Old Testament. His interpretative principles centered on the distinction between the condemning law and the life-restoring gospel, centered on salvation in Christ.

The Beginnings of Luther's Reformation

A variety of duties fell to the able young monk. He represented his monastery on a mission to Rome (1510–1511), served as preacher in the Wittenberg town church (from 1514) and vicar of the Saxon Observant Augustinians (1515–1518). His reading of Augustine and the mysticism of Heinrich Tauler and the Theologia Deutsch shaped his developing thought, although he soon abandoned the spiritualizing aspects of their theologies. As professor he composed disputations for academic promotions or supervised students' preparing their own theses for such debates; those of Bartholomew Bernhardi (1516) and Franz Günther (1517) advanced Luther's new ideas regarding sin and grace and the use of Aristotle in theology. In October 1517 abuses connected with the sale of indulgences to raise funds for Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz provoked Luther's protest. Unaware of the intricate financial context of the indulgence sale, he was moved by pastoral concern for those who believed they could purchase release from purgatory for themselves and others and thus failed to take seriously the remorse and trust in Christ that Luther defined as the heart of penance. Therefore he called for public disputation on the practice through his "Ninety-five Theses." Although the first thesis, that the whole life of the Christian is a life of repentance, summarizes an enduring element of his thought, these theses are theologically insignificant. Written for public disputation, they did not necessarily reveal the author's convictions but rather posed critical questions for debate. However, their printing and distribution to large audiences in Germany and beyond constitute the first modern media event and propelled Luther to center stage in European Christendom.

Albrecht and his indulgence preacher, Johann Tetzel, reported Luther's remonstrance to Rome. Tetzel's fellow Dominican, Sylvester Prierias, an important advisor of Pope Leo X, pursued charges of heresy against Luther. A fierce polemic against him erupted from the papal court. In April 1518 Staupitz had him present his views to fellow Augustinians at the regular meeting of the order's Saxon province in Heidelberg. The theses of Luther's "Heidelberg Disputation" sketched his "theology of the cross." Although he abandoned use of this term, the concepts of the Hidden and Revealed God, the bondage of the sinful will, and the centrality of Christ's cross (I Corinthians 1:18–2:16) mark his teaching throughout his career. The distinction between Deus absconditus, God in his glory, beyond human grasp, whose wrath is perceived as sinners seek to define God, and Deus revelatus, God revealed in Scripture and especially in Christ, emphasizes total human dependency on God's self-disclosure and Christ's self-sacrifice to atone for sin.

In October 1518 papal legate Thomas de Vio (Cardinal Cajetan) met Luther at the imperial diet in Augsburg and attempted to elicit Luther's recantation of his views without a real exchange of ideas. Luther fled after unfruitful meetings with Cajetan, fearing a repetition of the imperial-papal execution of another reformer, John Hus, a century earlier. Subsequent political maneuvering between Luther's prince, Elector Frederick the Wise of Saxony, and papal diplomats also produced no settlement.

The leading German Roman Catholic theologian of Luther's generation, John Eck of Ingolstadt, challenged Luther's doctoral supervisor and colleague, ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON KARLSTADT, dean of Wittenberg's theological faculty, to debate the critical issues raised by Luther's call to reform (Leipzig, June-July 1519). Luther also came to the podium, and Eck led him to confess his conviction that popes and councils could err, that both stand under the authority of Scripture. Controversy over these ideas swirled around the reformer, who in 1520–1521 issued five treatises detailing his proposal for reform of the church: (1) On Good Works introduced his faith-based ethic: good works flow from trust in Christ; (2) To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation concerning the Reform of the Christian Estate called for the nobility (and implicitly city councils) to institute many specific reforms in church and society; (3) On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church assessed the church’s sacramental teaching and life, proposing a return to biblical teaching regarding Word and sacrament; (4) On the Freedom of the Christian sketched Luther’s understanding of salvation through faith in Christ and its implications for daily living under two theses: God’s pronouncement of righteousness in the forgiveness of sins frees believers from all enemies (Satan, sin, the law, death, hell) and binds them to love their neighbors; (5) On Monastic Vows, an affirmation of the Christian life as the fruit of faith apart from monastic religious exercises (considered to be a preferable way of life in medieval theology) performed to merit salvation on the basis of vows.

By 1519 Luther had developed the core of his thinking in his concept of the justification of sinners before God through faith in Christ. Nominalist presuppositions regarding the power of God’s Word and the complete dependency of sinners on God’s revelation shaped this doctrine. It presupposed the distinction between passive righteousness in God’s sight (the righteousness given without condition by God, consisting solely in God’s favor, which regards his chosen people as beloved children) and active righteousness toward other creatures (the performance of love in obedience to God’s commands). Key elements of this view of salvation included:

1. Justification as an action of God’s Word, whereby the Creator creates a new child of God out of a sinner through the promise of the forgiveness of sins, which bestows Christ’s righteousness on believers.
2. Faith as trust in Christ and his death and resurrection as the source of forgiveness.
3. Assurance for believers of their salvation on the basis of the promise contained in the means of grace (God’s Word in oral, written, and sacramental forms).
4. Recognition that God’s Word makes believers completely righteous in God’s sight even though they experience their sinfulness throughout their lives (simul justus et peccator).
5. Application of this Gospel only to the repentant (with corresponding application of the crushing, condemning law to the unrepentant).
6. A life lived according to God’s commands in the fruits of faith.

Throughout the twentieth century scholars debated the precise time and nature of his “evangelical breakthrough” and formulated various explanations of his “tower experience,” a reference to the tower in the cloister where his study was located. In 1545 (preface to volume 1 of his Latin works) Luther dated his breakthrough 1518. By that time he had come to understand faith as fiducia (trust), the distinction of the two kinds of righteousness, and the proper distinction of law and gospel as a hermeneutical and pastoral tool.

Emperor Charles V summoned Luther before the imperial diet in Worms in April 1521. Already excommunicated by Pope Leo in January, he was outlawed by a rump session of the diet after his appearance, in which, according to reports a generation later, he said, “Here I stand. I can do no other.” Reports from 1521 recorded his words, “I am bound by the Scriptures...and my conscience has been taken captive by the Word of God, and I am neither able nor willing to recant since it is neither safe nor right to act against conscience.” After he left Worms, knights in the employ of Elector Frederick seized and brought him to the Elector’s castle, the Wartburg, where he remained for ten months. In his absence his Wittenberg colleagues proceeded with reforms, thereby arousing popular unrest. Luther returned in March 1522 to preach his “Invocavit” sermons, urging pastoral sensitivity in dealing with the consciences of adherents of the old faith.

Guiding reform demanded a variety of competences, and Luther rose to the challenge, assisted by able co-workers and by the rapidly developing printing industry. At the Wartburg he had prepared his translation of the New Testament, the first German version based on Greek manuscripts, from Erasmus’s new edition, which he used along with the Latin text. Over the following twelve years he completed translation of the Old Testament. Recognizing the need for pastors to have model sermons for proclaiming the Gospel, Luther also began the first of a series of sermon collections on the pericopes for the church year at the Wartburg. These “postils” provided a program of continuing education for priests wanting to incorporate Luther’s reform into parish life; most people came to Luther’s way of thinking through oral proclamation of the message. In treatises over the following years Luther treated various doctrinal and practical topics—justification by faith, the sacraments, marriage and family, schooling, obedience to governmental authority and rulers’ responsibilities, trade and usury—and also prepared popular devotional literature. In 1523 his revision of the Latin liturgy, the Formula Missae, appeared; in 1526 he completed the Deutsche Messe, a service that replaced traditional Latin chants with German hymns while retaining the Catholic form of worship.

The Maturing of Luther’s Reformation

Four critical episodes between 1524 and 1525 determined vital features of Luther’s Reformation. Younger biblical humanists provided the “shock troops” for his cause, but in 1524 the leading northern European humanist, Desiderius Erasmus, acceded to Rome’s pressure and attacked Luther, choosing the issue of the freedom or bondage of human choice in relation to God as the crucial difference between them. In 1525 Luther replied to Erasmus’s De libero arbitrio with De servo arbitrio (On Bound Choice). Written largely on Erasmus’s philosophical turf, and thus not completely clear on his own pastoral, law/ gospel approach to the disputed questions, this work, counted by Luther among his best, defended his belief that human salvation rests alone on God’s gracious decision to choose his own and that sinners cannot trust and obey God apart from the Holy Spirit’s turning and re-creating the human will.

Luther also clearly distinguished his program from a tradition of old-style reform, embodied in different ways by his colleague Karlstadt and a former student, THOMAS MÜNTZER. Karlstadt embraced Luther’s call for reform enthusiastically but could place it only within the framework of a conceptualization of protest against the ecclesiastical establishment a half millennium old. This approach to reform was biblicistic, moralistic, anticlerical, antisacramental, and millennialistic. Luther and Karlstadt differed in each of these areas, particularly on the literal interpretation of Christ's Words of Institution of the LORD'S SUPPER.

Luther's objections to the mystic spirituality of Müntzer focused on the student's denial of God's working his saving will through the external means of the Word in written, oral, and sacramental forms. The revolt of peasants in many German regions (1524–1525) afforded Müntzer opportunity to pursue his aspirations as an apocalyptic prophet but ended with his execution by victorious princely forces. He remained a symbol for Luther of theological and civil disorder.

Luther's role in the Peasants Revolt was determined by the horror of civil disorder he shared with most Germans with societal responsibilities. His Admonition to Peace, a Reply to the Twelve Articles of the Swabian Peasants (May 1525) sharply criticized princely tyranny as well as the peasant appeal to Scripture on behalf of temporal goals. Throughout his career his call to government officials to repent of various abuses belie his reputation as a "toady of princes." As he heard accounts of peasant atrocities and experienced himself the rowdy mob while touring his native Thuringia to calm troubled waters, he also attacked the peasant leadership and its use of Scripture. Convinced that Satan was using peasant violence to discredit and damage the Reformation in what he believed to be the final days before Judgment Day, he called on the inactive Saxon government to take action against the peasants in Against the Robbing and Murdering Hordes of Peasants. His harsh words earned him much criticism, although evidence seems to support the minority of scholars who appraise the loss to his Reformation from peasant resentment because of this stand as relatively minor.

In October 1524 Luther laid aside his monastic garb, probably not anticipating that a step taken by many of his monastic followers would also take place in his own life. The next June, Luther married a former nun, Katherine von Bora. This marriage provided a lasting model for Christian marriage and life in the parsonage. Käthe and Martin came to love and exercise spiritual care for each other. She managed their household efficiently and offered theological insight and counsel to her husband and the students who lived with them in the Augustinian cloister given to them by the elector. Of their six children (Johannes, Elizabeth, Magdalena, Martin, Paul, Margareta) two died young. Particularly poignant are Luther's expressions of sorrow at the death of Magdalena at age 13 in 1542.

In May 1525 Duke John assumed the electorate of Saxony at the death of his brother, Frederick the Wise. Admiration and friendship bound Luther with John and his son John Frederick, who succeeded to the throne in 1532. Under John's direction Luther and Melanchthon assumed leadership of a visitation of Saxon parishes in 1527; with Luther's suggestions at hand, Melanchthon issued Instructions for the Visitors of Parish Pastors, a handbook of pastoral care, in 1528.

Encountering the disorder of peasant life on the visitation, Luther and Melanchthon reacted theologically with an increased emphasis on preaching repentance through the crushing force of the law. This aroused protests from their former student, Johann Agricola, school rector in Eisleben. He attacked Melanchthon for views both Wittenbergers held; Luther negotiated a settlement, but Agricola's refusal to take seriously Luther's distinction of law and gospel led him a decade later to reassert his view that the law has no place in the Christian life and that the gospel works repentance for believers. That dispute (1538–1540) led to a final breach between teachers and student.

Agricola's publication of his views in catechetical works (1527) moved Luther to assume a task he had long urged colleagues to undertake, composition of a children's CATECHISM. Since 1518 he had followed the medieval practice of preaching on the fundamental elements of the church's ancient program of instruction, the Ten Commandments, the Creed, and the Lord's Prayer; in 1528 and 1529 he held three series of catechetical sermons. From them he published in 1529 a wall-chart catechism, his Small Catechism for parents' use in instructing children, and his German or Large Catechism, an instructors manual for pastors and parents. The Small Catechism placed the traditional catechetical elements in a new order, introducing children to the law (Ten Commandments) before the gospel (Creed) so that they could understand why they needed Christ as Savior. After the response of faith (the Lord's Prayer) came brief treatments of BAPTISM and the Lord's Supper (supplemented by instruction on the conduct of CONFESSION and absolution), followed by biblical direction for daily meditation and PRAYER and for the conduct of the godly life within the social structures of the time, the household (family and economic activities), the political community, and the church. As a handbook for Christian living, this primer shaped the lives of Luther's followers to the present.

Luther's piety called for the practice of biblical virtues within the responsibilities to which God calls his people in the household, the state, and the church on the basis of God's gift of new life through God's Word. Inherited in part from his nominalist instructors and formed by his study of the Old Testament, Luther's concept of God's Word led him into conflict with fellow reformers as well as with theologians of the old faith. Against the latter he argued that God's Word does not function ex opere operato (automatically, as a magical incantation), but that it operates as a Word of promise that is valid as God's pledge but effective only through faith. Against biblical humanists such as the Swiss reformers HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS, whose views of reality had been shaped by platonic presuppositions, Luther argued that God's Word in Scripture, preaching, absolution, and the sacraments creates the reality of which it speaks. God actually changes sinners into his faithful children through his Word.

Luther's teaching on the sacraments (baptism and the Lord's Supper, occasionally also absolution) reflects this ontology of God's Word. His nominalist presupposition that God could form reality in any way God pleases according to God's absolute power led him to believe that God had endowed human words that convey the Gospel of Christ with the power to save (Romans 1:16), that God's baptismal promise creates a new child of God (Romans 6:3–11), and that the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper convey Christ's body and blood for forgiveness of sins (Matthew 26:26–29). He insisted that this body and blood are received through the mouth by all who receive, whether believers or unbelievers, because the presence of Christ's body depends on the Word of God, not on the faith of the recipient; thus, unbelievers also receive, to their judgment (I Corinthians 11:29). (See especially That These Words of Christ, "This Is My Body" etc. Still Stand Firm [1527] and Confession concerning Christ's Supper [1528].) In 1529 one of Luther's princely patrons, Philip of Hesse, brought him and some of his supporters together with Zwingli, Oecolampadius, and others who shared their position in a colloquy at Marburg. The two sides agreed on fourteen of fifteen doctrinal articles but remained in disagreement over the Lord's Supper. MARTIN BUCER of Strasbourg led attempts to reconcile the two in the 1530s. In 1536 Melancthon composed the "Wittenberg Concord," to which both Bucer with other mediating southern German reformers and Luther and his Wittenberg colleagues agreed. It taught that "with the bread and wine the body and blood of Christ are truly and essentially present, distributed, and received." In 1544 Luther reasserted his teaching against Zwingli's successor Heinrich Bullinger and others in his Brief Confession concerning the Holy Sacrament.

The teaching of Luther and his Wittenberg colleagues was brought together in a public statement of faith in 1530 when Melancthon composed the AUGSBURG CONFESSION as an explanation of the Lutherans' catholic teaching and the reform measures they had undertaken. Melancthon's work reflected Luther's influence, and he used several items to which Luther had contributed. These included the third section of his 1528 Confession concerning Christ's Supper, the "Marburg Articles," the "Schwabach Articles" (a confession issued by several Evangelical governments in 1529), and memoranda regarding reform of ecclesiastical practices (dubbed since the eighteenth century the "Torgau Articles"). From 1536 to 1537 Luther prepared his own confession regarding issues separating him from Roman Catholicism, his SCHMALKALDIC ARTICLES. Composed for use in presenting Evangelical teaching to the papally called council, which finally met in Trent 1545 at the behest of Elector John Frederick who wanted the reformer's doctrinal last will and testament in print, this summary of Luther's thought served to guide his followers' public teaching, along with the Augsburg Confession, its Apology, and his catechisms.

Illness, increasing irritability, but also productive work marked Luther's last fifteen years. His second lectures on Galatians (1531; printed 1535) presented in clear, dramatic fashion his doctrine of justification by the forgiving Word of God, which creates and elicits the believer's faith in Christ. His lectures on Genesis (1535–1545) are filled with discourses treating the whole range of biblical teaching. In polemics against Roman Catholic theologians and princes he delineated his doctrine of the church as a creation and agent of God's Word (On the Councils and the Church, 1539; Against Hans Wurst, 1541).

His writings against the Jews in this period reflect an ugly aspect of medieval culture. Although he had hoped to win Jews to the gospel, a goal outlined in That Jesus Christ Was Born a Jew (1523), the absence of Jewish conversions led him to give credibility to anti-Jewish slanders and join in the common critique of Jewish religion and the call for their exile from Christian society in his last years.

As counselor of princes he offered advice and criticism to many governing officials. His grudging approval of the bigamy of Philip of Hesse (1540) rested on pastoral as well as political concerns. An invitation to mediate a dispute among the counts of his native county of Mansfeld in early 1546 drew him back to his birthplace, where he fell ill and died February 18.

At the beginning of Luther's career none other than Zwingli had heralded him as a prophet sent by God to restore the gospel. His students and adherents used his opinions as a secondary authority, replacing popes and councils as the authoritative interpreter of Scripture. After his death his writings proved to be too extensive and varied to continue exercising such authority, but Luther remained, along with the BOOK OF CONCORD, a source for teaching and also a symbol for Lutheran doctrine and the Reformation itself.

Succeeding epochs made different uses of his person and thought. The initiation of a model modern edition of his works, the Weimar Ausgabe, in 1883 set the scene for intensive research into his life and work throughout the subsequent century, much of it focused in the “Luther Renaissance” of Karl Holl and others in the first half of the century. Luther’s theology continues to provide inspiration and provocation to further theological exposition by theologians in all churches.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Luther, Martin. Dr. Martin Luthers Werke. Weimar: Böhlau, 1883.

———. Luther’s Works. Saint Louis, MO, and Philadelphia, PA: Concordia and Fortress, 1958–1986.

Secondary Sources:

Aland, Kurt. Hilfsbuch zum Lutherstudium. Fourth revised edition. Witten: Luther Verlag, 1996.

Althaus, Paul. The Ethics of Martin Luther. Translated by Robert C.Schultz. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1972.

———. The Theology of Martin Luther. Translated by Robert C.Schultz. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1966.

Bainton, Roland H. Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther. New York: Abingdon-Cokesbury, 1950.

Bornkamm, Heinrich. Luther in Mid-Career, 1521–1530. Translated by E.Theodore Bachmann. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1983.

Brecht, Martin. Martin Luther. 3 vols. Translated by James L. Schaaf. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1985–1992.

Ebeling, Gerhard. Luther: An Introduction to His Thought. Translated by R.A.Wilson. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1970.

Edwards, Mark U. Luther and the False Brethren. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1975.

———. Luther’s Last Battles: Politics and Polemics, 1531–1546. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1983.

———. Printing, Propaganda, and Martin Luther. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994.

Hendrix, Scott H. Luther and the Papacy: Stages in a Reformation Conflict. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1981.

Junghans, Helmar, ed. Leben und Werk Martin Luthers von 1526–1546. 2 vols. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983, Second edition, 1985.

Kolb, Robert. Martin Luther As Prophet, Teacher and Hero: Images of the Reformer, 1520–1620. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1999.

Lohse, Bernhard. Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Work. Translated by Robert C.Schultz. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1986.

———. Martin Luther’s Theology, Its Historical and Systematic Development. Translated by Roy A.Harrisville. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1999.

Oberman, Heiko A. Luther: Man Between God and the Devil. Translated by Eileen Walliser-Schwarzbart. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.

Schwiebert, Ernest G. Luther and His Times: The Reformation From a New Perspective. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1950.

Siggins, Ian D.Kingston. Martin Luther’s Doctrine of Christ. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1970.

ROBERT KOLB

LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD, THE

Constituted on April 26, 1847, in Chicago, Illinois, as The German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and Other States, the synod was a thoroughly German body. In 1911 The English Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri and Other States joined the synod as a nongeographical district. During World War I the synod omitted the title “German,” and in 1947 changed its name to The Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. From twelve pastors and four lay delegates representing fifteen congregations with approximately 3,000 members at its inception, it grew to number 1,564 pastors and 1,986 congregations with 687,334 members by the end of the nineteenth century. At its sesquicentennial in 1997 it numbered 2.6 million members in 6,145 congregations served by 8,389 pastors. It also has a large system of parochial schools served by 9,951 teachers.

As its name implies, the synod’s area of greatest strength in its early history was the American Midwest. The Rev. F.C.D. Wyneken (1810–1876) arrived in northeastern Indiana in 1838 and discovered that many German immigrants were either going without Lutheran pastoral care or were leaving LUTHERANISM for other denominations. He later issued a call for help from GERMANY for more Lutheran pastors and missionaries, which captured the attention of the Rev. WILHELM LÖHE of Neuendettlesau, Bavaria, Germany. Löhe supplied pastors for the American field and, with the aid of Wyneken and Dr. Wilhelm Sihler, established Concordia Theological Seminary in Fort Wayne, Indiana, in 1846. In 1844 Wyneken became aware of a group of Saxon Lutheran immigrants who had settled in the St. Louis and Perry County areas of Missouri. In 1838–1839 this group had followed their bishop, the Rev. Martin Stephan of Dresden, Saxony, Germany, out of the Saxon state church, which they viewed as irredeemably corrupt because of rationalism, to the UNITED STATES to form a pure Lutheran Church. They established a log cabin college in Altenburg, Missouri, in 1839, which later grew into Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Missouri. In the spring of 1839 Stephan was deposed and the colony struggled with the question of identity, eventually adopting a DOCTRINE of church and ministry formulated by the Rev. CARL FERDINAND WILHELM WALTHER (1811–1887) that affirmed both the divinity of the pastoral office and the priesthood of all believers. Its polity ensured the right of the local congregation to choose its own pastor. Walther vigorously asserted that this doctrine was based on the Scriptures and the Lutheran Confessions. This perspective on Lutheranism, which the Saxons circulated in their paper, Der Lutheraner (first published on September 7, 1844), appealed to Wyneken and, when other Löhe colonies in the state of Michigan (Frankenmuth, Frankentrost, Frankenlust, and Frankenlief) also sought a relationship with Wyneken and the Saxons, things quickly moved toward unity. Meetings in 1845 and 1846 solidified newly formed alliances, and in 1847 the synod was formally constituted.

The new synod devoted itself to “the preservation and furthering of the unity of pure confession,” stood against separatism and SECTARIANISM, sought to protect and preserve the rights and duties of pastors and congregations. Its POLITY was democratic in form, and the synod was advisory in nature in matters not touching doctrine. Yet, the synod required unconditional subscription to the BOOK OF CONCORD (1580) of its pastors, teachers, and congregations quia (“because”), they believed, the Lutheran Confessions were the faithful exposition of the Holy Scriptures (see CONFSSION). This vigorous confessional subscription, coupled with an insistence on uniformity in doctrine and practice before union, led to tension with other Lutheran bodies throughout its early history, and made it difficult for it to enter into the Lutheran union movements in the twentieth century. At its founding Missouri critiqued what it saw as extremist positions on either side of itself. On the one hand it rejected the “American Lutheranism” of SAMUEL SIMON SCHMUCKER (1799–1873), professor at the Lutheran Seminary at Gettysburg and leader in the Lutheran General Synod, which subscribed only to the AUGSBURG CONFSSION and that insofar as it taught the “fundamental doctrines of Scripture in a manner substantially correct.” Missouri rejected this moderate form of confessional subscription as having accommodated itself to American evangelical Protestantism. On the other hand Missouri rejected what it believed were the “romanizing tendencies” of J.A.A.Grabau and his Buffalo Synod (a synod formed by Prussians in 1845), as well as the Iowa Synod, founded by their former colleague Wilhelm Löhe. Walther and the Missourians feared a return to the “tyranny” of their hierarchical colonial experiment under Stephan.

Later controversies erupted between Missouri and other confessional Lutherans regarding the doctrine and practice, for example, of ELECTION and CONVERSION and pulpit and ALTAR fellowship. In the 1880s divergence of opinion ultimately led to a rupture within the Synodical Conference, which had been formed in 1872 largely under Missouri’s lead. Consisting of immigrant midwestern synods that shared a quia subscription to the entire Book of Concord, Missouri had hoped that the Synodical Conference would provide the means to achieve Lutheran unity in the United States.

Even in the midst of controversy, however, the synod grew. By 1872 the synod had a membership of 72,120 baptized members, 485 congregations, 428 pastors, and 251 teachers. Between 1887 and 1932 membership grew from 531,357 to 1,163,666. Immigration drove this growth, as the synod worked hard to meet the spiritual needs of the arriving German immigrants.

The twentieth century, with its limited immigration and two world wars, forced the Missouri Synod to grapple with the issue of its German character. World War I forced the synod to anglicize more rapidly than might otherwise have been the case. Yet the transition to English occurred simultaneously with another period of significant growth. By 1962 the synod had 6,192 pastors and 2,456,856 baptized members. Through the radio ministry of Walter A.Maier, the Lutheran Hour reached thousands (see MASS MEDIA; PUBLISHING, MEDIA) and the lay-oriented organizations devoted to EVANGELISM, the Lutheran Laymen’s League (1917) and the Lutheran Women’s Missionary League (1942), enabled the synod to reach previously unreached populations.

Controversy continued, however, this time both with other Lutherans, as well as within the synod. With the language shift, Missouri was increasingly drawn out of what many perceived to be its overly narrow parochial boundaries. In the 1930s the synod explored fellowship with the newly formed AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH, which consisted of several of Missouri’s nineteenth-century adversaries, including the Buffalo, Iowa, and Ohio Synods. A fissure began to emerge within Missouri as it struggled anew with the question of Lutheran identity. One group urged faithfulness to the synod’s historic doctrine and practice. A second group called for more openness to Christians within other traditions. In 1945 a group of forty-four leaders in the synod, representing this second perspective, issued A Statement, arguing that “fellowship is possible without complete agreement in details of doctrine and practice which have never been considered divisive in the Lutheran Church.” Beginning in the 1950s the synod’s seminary at St. Louis added to the tensions by introducing certain elements of HIGHER CRITICISM. The combined issues of ecumenical posture, biblical AUTHORITY, and biblical interpretation ultimately brought the controversy to its peak in 1974 when most of the faculty and students “walked out” of Concordia Seminary and formed Christ Seminary in Exile, or Seminex. During the next few years the synod suffered a schism as slightly more than 100,000 of its members withdrew to form the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches (AELC), which soon became the catalyst in the formation of the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH in America (1988), the largest Lutheran denomination in the United States.

Nevertheless, membership in the synod has remained relatively stable since the 1970s. The synod continues to support its two SEMINARIES, along with a university system that features schools in Ann Arbor, Michigan; Austin, Texas; Bronxville, New York; Irvine, California; Mequon, Wisconsin; Portland, Oregon; River Forest, Illinois; St. Paul, Minnesota; Selma, Alabama; and Seward, Nebraska. CLERGY and lay delegates representing the synod’s congregations meet together triennially in convention to conduct the church’s business. Its current president, the Rev. A.L. Barry, has served since 1992.

References and Further Reading

- Baepler, Walter A. A Century of Grace: A History of the Missouri Synod 1847–1947. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1947.
- Dau, W.H.T., ed. Ebenezer: Reviews of the Work of the Missouri Synod during Three Quarters of a Century. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1922.
- Forster, Walter O. Zion on the Mississippi: The Settlement of the Saxon Lutherans in Missouri, 1839–1841. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1953.
- Hochstetter, Christian. Geschichte der Evangelische-lutherische Missouri Synode in Nord-Amerika, und ihrer Lehrkämpfe von der sächsischen Auswanderung in Jahre 1838 an bis zum Jahre 1884. Dresden, Germany: Verlag von Heinrich J.Naumann, 1885.
- Marquart, Kurt E. Anatomy of an Explosion: A Theological Analysis of the Missouri Synod Conflict. Fort Wayne, IN: Concordia Theological Seminary Press, 1977.
- Mundinger, Carl S. Government in the Missouri Synod: The Genesis of Decentralized Government in the Missouri Synod. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1947.
- Rudnick, Milton L. Fundamentalism and the Missouri Synod: A Historical Study of Their Interaction and Mutual Influence. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1966.

LAWRENCE RAST

LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

The Lutheran Church in America (LCA) was formed in 1962 by a merger of the United Lutheran Church in America (ULCA), the AUGUSTANA EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH (Augusta Synod), the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church (Suomi Synod), and a Danish body, the American Evangelical Lutheran Church. From its offices in Philadelphia and New York, the LCA's membership extended from the East Coast and the CARIBBEAN to CANADA, Alaska, and Hawaii, combining Lutherans of German, Swedish, Finnish, Norwegian, Icelandic, Slovak, and African descent. Twenty-five years later, in 1988, the LCA merged with the AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH (ALC) and the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches (AELC) to form the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (ELCA). At its height in 1967, the LCA contained 3.2 million baptized members. By 1988, when it became part of the ELCA, membership had declined to 2.9 million.

Institutional Life

In its POLITY, the LCA balanced the more centralized experience of its Swedish, Danish, and Finnish founders with the more regional expression characteristic of the predominantly German ULCA. In its theology, standard generalizations describing the LCA as the more liberal branch of American Lutheranism, as opposed to the orthodox LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD (LCMS) and the more moderate American Lutheran Church are only partially accurate, although as a body the LCA did stand committed to ECUMENISM, further Lutheran unity, and the findings of modern biblical scholarship.

Early in its history, the LCA became a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, the Lutheran Council in the USA (LCUSA), and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, and stood as the only American Lutheran member of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The LCA's choice of former ULCA president Franklin Clark Fry (who provided significant active leadership in many of these organizations) as its first president from 1963 to 1968 both reflected and encouraged these wider commitments. Under Fry and his successors, the Rev. Robert J. Marshall (president from 1968 to 1978), and the Rev. James R. Crumley (1978 to 1988), the LCA continued long-standing dialogues with the Reformed tradition and Roman Catholics, developed guidelines for interim sharing of the Eucharist with Episcopalians, and reached out to the leaders of the Orthodox communion. In 1980, the LCA Convention changed the title of its President to "Presiding Bishop."

A "Comprehensive Study of the Doctrine of the Ministry" in 1970 recommended after careful study that LCA bylaws be amended to substitute the word "person" for the word "man" in its description of the qualifications for an ordained minister. Unlike the bitter experience of some churches, the LCA Convention that year approved the ordination of WOMEN by a simple voice vote (see WOMEN CLERGY). Elizabeth Platz became the first woman ordained in the LCA on November 22, 1970.

The LCA responded to the tumultuous events of its time with both theological reflection through its many “social statements” and direct action through its many agencies. Outreach in the area of mission eventually moved from the traditional home and foreign fields to newer fields among the poor and marginalized in society. Two particularly significant efforts included the World Hunger Appeal, which raised nearly 65 million dollars by 1987, and the work of the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service. Both of these efforts continued into the ELCA.

As part of the long-standing commitment of Lutherans to an educated CLERGY and LAITY, the LCA supported a number of denominational colleges and SEMINARIES (see HIGHER EDUCATION; CHRISTIAN COLLEGES). While the LCA actually warned of an over-supply of clergy as late as 1980, by the late 1980s seminary enrollments illustrated the clear trends of other mainline denominations: a decline in the overall number of candidates and a student population including more women and second-career candidates (see EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: UNITED STATES).

The Lutheran served as the official magazine of the LCA, and during most of the life of the LCA, it reportedly stood as the most widely circulated denominational periodical in North America. Circulation peaked at 601,000 and dropped slowly to just over 536,000 by 1987.

Congregational Life

In 1964, the LCA Parish Education Curriculum created a coordinated curriculum for use across all ages and programs of the church. This ambitious curriculum also introduced an entire generation of congregational teachers to the findings and contributions of contemporary biblical scholarship, perhaps helping the LCA avoid the schisms experienced in other denominations over issues of biblical literalism. At one time, over 90 percent of all LCA congregations used the program. The Word and Witness curriculum, introduced in 1977, combined in-depth adult BIBLE study with EVANGELISM and provided new energy in many congregations.

In 1970, the report of the Joint Commission on the Theology and Practice of Confirmation recommended a fundamental shift in long-standing Lutheran practice, urging that reception of first communion be lowered to approximately grade five and that this reception no longer be tied to the rite of CONFIRMATION, a rite renamed the “Affirmation of Baptism.”

The LCA began its congregational life using the Service Book and Hymnal, a worship resource developed in the 1950s by several Lutheran bodies, including the ALC and the four churches that ultimately formed the LCA. The 1978 introduction of the Lutheran Book of Worship (LBW), also used in the ALC, led to an increased emphasis on the role of BAPTISM in the life of the believer, the increased use of lay men and women in positions of worship leadership, and a gradual increase in the frequency of communion, or LORD’S SUPPER. By 1981, 85 percent of LCA churches used the LBW.

Of the three traditional auxiliaries for men, youth, and women, the church-wide women’s group proved most active and enduring. At the church-wide level, Lutheran Church Women (LCW) increasingly redefined its traditional mission to encompass the realm of social justice. The church ended its church-wide auxiliaries for men in 1966, and, in a controversial decision in 1968, also eliminated its youth auxiliary in an effort to emphasize a more holistic approach to youth ministry. A number of significant “youth gatherings,” including inter-synodical Lutheran gatherings in 1973 and 1976, drew thousands of Lutheran young people together for Bible study, WORSHIP, and fellowship.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America

The Canadian synods of the LCA completed longstanding plans to merge with the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Canada in 1986. Responding to the invitation of the AELC, a group that split off from the LCMS in 1976, the LCA (2.9 million members), ALC (2.3 million members), and the AELC (109,000 members) came together in 1988 as the ELCA. The new church officially began its life on January 1, 1988, with 5.3 million members, 11,000 congregations. and 16,600 pastors.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Episcopal Church, USA; Lutheranism; Lutheranism, United States; Orthodoxy, Eastern

References and Further Reading

Gilbert, W.Kent. Commitment to Unity: A History of the Lutheran Church in America. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1988.

Lagerquist, L.DeAne. The Lutherans. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1999.

Nelson, E.Clifford. “The New Shape of Lutheranism, 1930–.” In The Lutherans in North America, edited by E.Clifford Nelson. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1974.

SUSAN WILDS MCARVER

LUTHERAN SYNODICAL CONFERENCE

Called the Lutheran Synodical Conference when it disbanded in 1967, this federation of American-based synods began in 1872, changing name and membership along the way. As Lutherans, especially Germans, came to America, some confessional-minded sought to gather to maintain THEOLOGY and deal with practical issues held in common, especially MISSIONS and EDUCATION. To sort through theological variations transplanted from Europe and developed in America and to be sure of a common theological position, various Lutherans held free conferences from 1856 to 1859.

Free conferences presumed no official representation, only open discussion using Scripture and the Lutheran Confessions as a benchmark. The General Council took in some groups in 1866, but others considered it lax on altar-pulpit fellowship, lodge membership, and millennialism. The Missouri, Ohio, and Norwegian synods declined participation, whereas the Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, and Michigan synods joined but then withdrew. Subsequent discussions by these synods brought some bilateral fellowship agreements, and in 1871 talks began for multilateral cooperation. In 1872 these resulted in the Lutheran Synodical Conference, officially the Evangelisch-lutherische Synodal-Conferenz. Members pledged themselves to the Scriptures and confessions in the BOOK OF CONCORD to promote FAITH and true DOCTRINE and to avoid error as they worked together. Only an advisory body, this federation proposed a common seminary and a common teachers college but abandoned those plans.

Other efforts included work among African Americans in American and Nigerian missions and through colleges. PUBLISHING was sometimes done jointly, as with hymnals, for example. Over the years members left: the Ohio Synod (1881–1882) over PREDESTINATION, and the Norwegian Synod (1883) with internal dissent. The Evangelical Lutheran Synod (Norwegians) and the Wisconsin Synod broke with the Missouri Synod over fellowship and worship issues in 1955 and 1961 and withdrew from the Conference in 1963. The Conference dissolved in 1967.

See also Christian College; Hymns and Hymnals; Lutheranism, United States; Millenarians and Millennialism

References and Further Reading

- Braun, Mark E. "Changes within the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of North America That Led to the Exit of the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod." Ph.D. dissertation, Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, 2000.
- Schuetze, Armin W. The Synodical Conference: Ecumenical Endeavor. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern Publishing House, 2000.

ROBERT ROSIN

LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION

The Lutheran World Federation (LWF) was founded in Lund, SWEDEN in 1947 by forty-nine churches, all but two of which were in Europe and North America. It is the result of earlier efforts, at first national—the General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America (1867) and the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference in GERMANY (1867)—and then international to bring together churches that have a common confessional allegiance. These efforts led to establishing the Lutheran World Convention (LWC) by an assembly of Lutheran personages in Eisenach in 1923. At its third session, 1935 in Paris, the LWC laid the groundwork for a more permanent confederation of churches. World War II did not stop continuing efforts to realize the Paris plan; indeed efforts toward fellowship intensified in caring for orphaned missions and aiding European Lutherans to overcome the war's devastation. That effective relief program for Europe shaped the work of Lutheran World Service that involves a major portion of LWF staff and financial resources.

Member churches subscribe to Lutheranism's confessional basis as stated in the LWF constitution (revised in 1990): "The Lutheran World Federation confesses the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the only source and norm of its doctrine, life and service. It sees in the three Ecumenical Creeds and in the Confessions of the Lutheran Church, especially in the unaltered Augsburg Confession and the Small Catechism of Martin Luther, a pure exposition of the Word of God" (Art II).

The constitution also states the functions of the LWF: "The Lutheran World Federation:

- Furthers the united witness to the Gospel of Jesus Christ and strengthens the member churches in carrying out the missionary command and in their efforts towards Christian unity worldwide;
- Furthers worldwide among the member churches diaconic action, alleviation of human need, promotion of peace and human rights, social and economic justice, care for God's creation and sharing of resources;
- Furthers through cooperative study the self-understanding and the communion of member churches and helps them to act jointly in common tasks" (Art III).

By 2000 membership in the LWF had increased to 131 churches (including three associate members) and twelve recognized congregations in seventy-three countries, with churches in AFRICA accounting for the greatest growth. Approximately 60 million of the 64 million Lutherans across the globe are included. It is the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod in the UNITED STATES and some of its associated churches that remain outside the LWF.

Periodic international assemblies are the highest authority of the LWF, and their official reports archive the Federation's history: 1947 Lund, 1952 Hannover, 1957 Minneapolis, 1963 Helsinki, 1970 Evian, 1977 Dar es Salaam, 1984 Budapest, 1990 Curitiba, 1997 Hong Kong, and the tenth assembly 2003 Winnipeg.

Although the ecclesial nature of world LUTHERANISM was already being debated, the LWF in Lund followed the lead of the LWC and described itself as "a free association of Lutheran churches." As the debate intensified, churches increasingly found themselves in pulpit and altar fellowship. This heightened sense of church manifested itself at Dar es Salaam when the LWF took the step of declaring status confessionis regarding the effects of apartheid at the LORD'S SUPPER. Then at Budapest two African white churches were suspended because of their attitude toward apartheid, a suspension lifted at Curitiba, BRAZIL. Increasing ecumenical involvement repeatedly put the ecclesial question to world Lutheranism, adding to the pressure to go beyond the "free association." This led, in Budapest, to two precedent-setting assembly actions: (1) amending the constitution by adding "The member churches of the LWF understand themselves to be in pulpit and altar fellowship with each other," and (2) adopting statements on self-understanding and unity, both of which used the terminology "Lutheran Communion."

In Curitiba the assembly adopted a new constitution that embodied a more ecclesial self-understanding of the LWF. It defines the LWF as "a communion of churches which confess the triune God, agree in the proclamation of the Word of God and are united in pulpit and altar fellowship." A council of forty-eight persons was established to carry responsibility for the Federation between assemblies. Reflecting the concept of communion, membership on the council is divided equally between representatives of member churches from the northern and southern hemispheres, and at least 40 percent of its members are WOMEN.

Communion language is also consonant with the fundamental ecumenical commitment of the LWF. It is engaged bilaterally with other Christian World Communions (CWCs) but is also fully committed to multilateral ECUMENISM as exemplified in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). This ecumenical priority finds typical expression in the Institute for Ecumenical Research, established in Strasbourg in 1963. Strasbourg research professors have been key participants in both multilateral and bilateral dialogues. The LWF has or has had bilateral dialogues with the Anglican Communion, the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE, the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, the Orthodox churches (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN), the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, and the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. In many cases these bilateral relationships extend also to joint efforts in witness and service.

The oldest LWF bilateral relationship, begun in 1957, has been with the Roman Catholic Church. In view of REFORMATION history, this dialogue has enjoyed a high priority, and at the turn of the century it had all but completed four phases, producing many joint study papers. At a 1999 ceremony in Augsburg the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, one of the most significant documents of consensus Ecumenism, was signed by official representatives of the Roman Catholic Church and the LWF. In addition to affirming a basic consensus on JUSTIFICATION, the document declares the mutual condemnations of the sixteenth century to be no longer applicable and thus not church-dividing. Subsequently the two bodies are in conversations with various Christian World Communions in the hope that the effect of the Joint Declaration can be broadened.

The LWF staff is divided among three programmatic departments: World Service, Mission and Evangelism, and Theology and Studies. The secretariat includes offices dealing with ecumenical relations, political affairs and human rights, and communication services. In 1995 the LWF and the WCC together formed Action of Churches Together (ACT) to enable them to respond more immediately and effectively to major global emergencies. The LWF shares the Geneva headquarters of the WCC and other CWCs, and presently has regional offices in AFRICA, Asia, Europe, and North America. The Geneva staff numbers approximately one hundred persons and there are approximately 4,000 field staff in service, relief, and development projects.

References and Further Reading

- Brand, Eugene L. "Toward a Lutheran Communion: Pulpit and Altar Fellowship." LWF Report 26 (1988).
- Grundmann, Siegfried. Der Lutherische Weltbund: Gründung, Herkunft, Aufbau. Cologne, Germany: Böhlav, 1957.
- Nelson, E.Clifford. The Rise of World Lutheranism. An American Perspective. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1982.

- Schjørring, Jens Holger, Prasanna Kumari, and Norman A. Hjelm, eds. From Federation to Communion. The History of the Lutheran World Federation. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1997.
- Schmidt-Clausen, Kurt. "Vom Lutherischen Weltkonvent zum Lutherischen Weltbund." Die Lutherische Kirche, Geschichte und Gestalten, 2. Gütersloh, Germany: Gütersloh Verlagshaus, 1976.
- Vajta, Vilmos. "From Generation to Generation: The LWF 1947–1982." LWF Report 16 (1983).
- Wadensjö, Bengt. "Toward a Lutheran World Communion: Developments in Lutheran Cooperation up to 1929." Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis, Studia Historico-Ecclesiastica Upsaliensia 18. Uppsala, Sweden. 1970.

EUGENE L.BRAND

LUTHERANISM

The term refers to the churches that stem from MARTIN LUTHER'S reform efforts. His study of Scripture and struggle with guilt focused Lutheran thought and life on concern for proper, clear biblical teaching; effective pastoral comfort and care; disciplined intellectual work across the spectrum of learned disciplines; and appreciation and use of Music and LITERATURE.

The Reformation

With his colleague PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, Luther guided a REFORMATION centered on doctrinal reform, in contrast to earlier medieval renewal efforts that sought moral and institutional change. These Wittenberg theologians created a paradigm change for Western THEOLOGY in the Religious Peace of Augsburg (1555) by defining the question of the sinner's identity in God's sight as the center of a biblical teaching (although inferior) church within the German Empire.

Their prince, Elector John of Saxony, enlisted Luther and Melanchthon in a princely led equivalent of a medieval episcopal parish visitation in 1527–1528. Their Visitation Articles cultivated pastoral care through the distinction of law (God's commands for human life, which condemn SIN) and gospel (the restoration of life through forgiveness in Christ) and guided the organization of parish life in line with Luther's reform. Luther was willing to permit Christian princes to take a leadership role in church life as "emergency bishops" in the absence of bishops committed to reform. The organizational principles of the Wittenberg Reformation spread to other cities and principalities as those won to Luther's cause composed constitutions or church orders (Kirchenordnungen) for WORSHIP, EDUCATION, social welfare, and other areas of church life. Especially influential were those drafted by the Wittenbergers' colleague JOHANNES BUGHENHAGEN.

Luther's Reformation preserved the structure of the medieval LITURGY, removing the canon of the Mass, which Luther regarded as a perversion of the LORD'S SUPPER. He retained the pericopal system. Postils on the traditional Sunday and festival texts, modeled after Luther's own, became important tools for continuing education of CLERGY and family devotion. Followers, beginning with Johann Spangenberg (1484–1550) in 1541, took Luther's advice to develop further tools to supplement his CATECHISMS. Among the most popular pattern was that created by student Joachim Mörlin (1514–1571), who copied Luther's outline of law, gospel, and godly living to provide fundamental instruction in the faith. Family use of devotional literature supplemented PREACHING and catechesis for LAITY. Ethical instruction occurred in homiletical and other forms, including imaginative Teufelbücher (devil books), which used personification to promote Christian virtue through calls for repentance of specific sins.

Luther and Melancthon skillfully employed the printing press; however, their students and others disseminated their message by preaching, in GERMANY, Scandinavia, central Europe, ENGLAND, and FRANCE. In the latter two countries, independent reform movements developed, but Danish and Swedish monarchs were won for Lutheranism by pastors from their lands, some of whom were former Wittenberg students. Christian III employed HANS TAUSEN and Bugenhagen to introduce the Reformation in DENMARK in 1536. Opposition remained strong in Danish-ruled NORWAY for more than a generation before preaching and catechesis cultivated a strong Lutheran popular piety. In SWEDEN the independence movement led by the nobleman Gustav Vasa and Lutheran reform led by former Wittenberg student OLAVS PETRI, his brother LAURENTIUS, and Laurentius Andreae, found mutual support. In Swedish-ruled FINLAND, MICHAEL AGRICOLA, also a Wittenberg student, established Lutheran reform as publicist, school rector, and bishop. Beginning in the 1520s, German students from central European domains as well as Poles, Slovaks, Hungarians, and others also brought the Wittenberg message back from the university to their own lands, where printed works had kindled commitment to Luther's ideas. In Latvia and Estonia, Lutheran preachers were using Luther's Small Catechism in the native languages by 1550. After 1550 some in HUNGARY and POLAND became Calvinists and some of them in turn Anti-Trinitarians, but strong Lutheran churches re-mained in Siebenburgen, Hungary, Slovakia, and Poland into the triumph of the COUNTER-REFORMATION in the seventeenth century and beyond.

Confessionalization and Orthodoxy

The process by which the Reformation was consolidated and adapted to political, social, and ecclesiastical structures has been called CONFSSIONALIZATION by scholars since about 1980. For Lutheranism this process began soon after Luther's death (1546) when controversy arose among his and Melancthon's students over the proper interpretation of their legacy in an atmosphere embittered by the imperial defeat of Lutheran princes in the War of Schmalkald (1546–1547) and Emperor Charles V's attempt to force their people back to Roman Catholic obedience. Melancthon's efforts to save Saxon pulpits for Lutheran preachers were regarded as betrayal of the gospel by some of his best students; his feeling that they were betraying him in turn led to bitter recriminations. A quarter century of contention ended with the Formula of Concord (1577) and BOOK OF CONCORD (1580), which brought two-thirds of the German Lutheran churches together in doctrinal agreement.

This period witnessed fruitful intellectual activity in the Wittenberg circle. Italo-Croatian student and colleague MATTHIAS FLACIUS (Illyricus), who broke with Melancthon over a series of doctrinal issues, synthesized Protestant hermeneutics in his ground-breaking Clavis Scripturae sacrae (Key to the Sacred Scriptures, 1567) and planned the first Protestant church history, the eight-volume Magdeburg Centuries (1559–1574), actually written by Johannes Wigand (1523–1587) and Matthaeus Judex (1528–1564). Braunschweig pastor Martin Chemnitz (1522–1586) issued a four-volume Examination of the Council of Trent, a sharp critique of Tridentine theology and clear presentation of Lutheran thought. It is important for its emphasis on (1) the AUTHORITY and reliability of Scripture as the sole source of teaching and the proper use of the Christian TRADITION, especially patristic writings; (2) the “excluding expressions,” such as “by grace alone,” “by faith alone,” and “apart from the works of the law,” in defining the JUSTIFICATION of sinners; (3) Luther’s understanding of original sin as “a turning away from God and hostility toward him”; (4) the SACRAMENTS as forms of God’s Word that convey God’s favor; and (5) the necessity of the good works that faith produces. These accents are also found in Chemnitz’s commentary on Melancthon’s master work on biblical teaching, Loci communes theologici (editions 1521, 1535, 1543), one of many such formulations of DOCTRINE by Melancthon’s students. Chemnitz’s Loci provided a bridge to and model for later Lutheran dogmatic textbooks. Rich devotional literature arose in the period as well, from Frankfurt/Oder professor Andreas Musculus (1514–1581), Silesian pastor Martin Moller (1547–1606), and many others. Nikolaus Herman (c.1500–1561) and Philip Nicolai (1556–1608), among others, continued the hymnodic tradition begun by Luther (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS).

After the publication of the Book of Concord the established churches of Lutheran Germany and Scandinavia experienced a long period of societal dominance. “Orthodox” theologians set the tone for church life from 1580 to 1700, synthesizing the thought of Luther, Melancthon, JOHANNES BRENZ, Chemnitz, and other Lutheran predecessors with patristic theology and elements of medieval scholasticism as they addressed the issues of their day in massive dogmatic works. Jakob Heerbrand (1521–1600) and Matthias Haffenreffer (1561–1619) at Tübingen and Leonhard Hutter (1563–1616, Wittenberg) composed doctrinal textbooks that led to the work of Johann Gerhard (Jena), the master of Lutheran dogmatists, with his Loci theologici (nine volumes, 1610–1622) and Confessio catholica (1634–1637). His contemporaries Cornelius (1568–1621) and Jakob (1570–1649) Martini had introduced Aristotelian metaphysics into Lutheran theology at Helmstedt and Wittenberg. Thus, Gerhard constructed his dogmatics on an analytic basis, abandoning Melancthon’s philological-rhetorical synthesis of biblical materials, presented with the help of patristic insights and Aristotelian logic; Gerhard adopted the Aristotelian metaphysical approach of J. Zabarella. Gerhard defended biblical authority on the basis of Scripture’s divine verbal inspiration. He made fruitful use of the ancient church fathers. The doctrine of justification by GRACE through FAITH in Christ alone remained the center of his teaching, along with God’s working his saving will through the “means of grace.” Gerhard directed his tightly argued analyses of doctrinal topics toward their “practical use” in parish life. His devotional handbook, Sacred Meditations (1606), demonstrates that these dogmaticians preached and taught a warm piety at the same time they constructed their Aristotelian-biblical theology. Like Melancthon, Gerhard and other Orthodox theologians incorporated ethical instruction into their dogmatic works (see ETHICS).

Gerhard's provided the framework for the systems of Johann Conrad Dannhauer (1603–1666, Strasbourg); Abraham Calov (1612–1686, Wittenberg), whose opus embraced biblical exegesis as well as dogmatics; Johann Andreas Quenstedt (1617–1688, Wittenberg), whose Didactic-Polemical Theology, or System of Theology (1685) served as a comprehensive summary of his predecessors' insights and his own biblical study; and Johann Wilhelm Baier (1647–1695, Jena and HALLE). Johann Musaeus (1613–1681, Jena) initiated the Lutheran critique of Enlightened thinkers such as HERBERT OF CHERBURY and Bernard Spinoza. Sebastian Schmidt (1617–1696, Strasbourg) contributed to Talmudic studies and wrote massive biblical commentaries. At Copenhagen, Hans Poulsen Resen (1561–1638), Cort Aslakssen (1564–1624), and Jesper Rasmus Brochmand (1585–1652) represented Lutheran ORTHODOXY effectively. With the work of Pomeranian pastor David Hollaz (1648–1713) and Ernst Valentin Loescher (1673–1749, Wittenberg), a fierce critic of PIETISM, the age of Orthodoxy came to an end.

Although widespread agreement in teaching marked this era, controversies did arise. Wittenberg colleagues Samuel Huber (1547–1624) and Aegidius Hunnius (1550–1603) contended over Huber's view of universal ELECTION; Hunnius nudged Orthodoxy in a "synergistic" direction with his view that election takes place "on the basis of foreseen faith." Danzig pastor Hermann Rahtmann's (1585–1628) spiritualizing views of the Holy Spirit's work provoked new treatment of God's Word as the means of grace that effects God's saving will from outside the believer. Theologians from Tübingen and Giessen disputed over Christ's kenosis, "emptying himself" (Philippians 2:7), in the 1620s. Helmstedt professor Georg Calixt aroused criticism from Calov and others with his call for Protestant reconciliation on the basis of the "consensus antiquitatis" of the first five centuries (Vincent of Lerin) in the "syncretistic controversy." His opponents believed his proposal abandoned the integrity of the Lutheran CONFESSION.

The Orthodox era also witnessed further development of Lutheran catechetics, in the theory and actual catechetical texts of Giessen professor and pastor in Ulm, Conrad Dietrich (1575–1639), who incorporated elements of Aristotelian analysis into his questions and answers that interpreted Luther's catechisms. Gerhard's Sacred Meditationes and JOHANN ARNDT'S (1555–1621) Four Books on True Christianity (1605–1610) and Garden of Paradise (1612), among others, enriched popular devotional life. Lutheran hymn-writers, including Paul Gerhardt, enlivened parish life. Württemberg court preacher Johann Valentin Andreae (1586–1654) cultivated social concern and piety.

General Baroque developments shaped modest Lutheran contributions in ART and ARCHITECTURE in this era. Lutheran composers, including MICHAEL PRAETORIUS, Heinrich Schütz, Johann Hermann Schein (1586–1630), Samuel Scheidt (1587–1654), DIETRICH BUXTEHUDE, and JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH, appropriated Italian developments to create new standards for organ and chorale, cantatas, and the like.

Like their Roman Catholic and Calvinist counter-parts, early modern Lutheran secular rulers pursued absolutist ideals in attempting to extend their powers over the CHURCH, usually with success, although the often-ignored Lutheran tradition of defiance of and resistance to governments bent on undermining the church's integrity continued into the seventeenth century (e.g., in the resistance to Calvinist princes in Anhalt, Lippe, and Brandenburg where Paul Gerhardt opposed Elector Frederick William's anti-Lutheran program in the 1660s). More typical of the attitudes of theologians and governmental officials is the defense of ABSOLUTISM by the ducal Saxon counselor Veit Ludwig von Seckendorf (1626–1692), author of a skillful defense of Lutheranism, Historical and Apologetical Commentary on Lutheranism (1688–1692), who affirmed that princes held power as God's stewards for society in The German Princely State (1656) and The Christian State (1685).

SAMUEL FREIHERR VON PUFENDORF, professor of law and princely counselor, defended Lutheran positions against CALVINISM and forged a theory of NATURAL LAW that defined it as rational, agreeing with Christian revelation because it stems from God's design, but not dependent on revelation. With Christian commitment declining at European courts, he formulated a view of church POLITY that challenged the "Episcopal" theory (that God had given princes the responsibility to care for the religion of their people), which had supported princely administration of churches, largely through consistories (see CONSISTORY), since the Reformation. Pufendorf and Christian Thomasius (1655–1728), professor of law in Leipzig and Halle, advanced the increasingly predominant view, "territorialism," holding that by natural law princes bear responsibility for all institutions that support the welfare of the state, including the church (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). Christoph Matthaeus Pfaff (1686–1760, Tübingen and Giessen) and JOHANN LORENZ VON MOSHEIM (1694–1755, Helmstedt and Göttingen) advanced a third definition of church polity, "collegialism," that characterized the church as a community formed by the free association of individuals with the same rights as other institutions within society; princely administration of the church is conducted in behalf of this community.

In the seventeenth century, Roman Catholic authorities harshly persecuted Lutheran and other Protestant communities in central European lands, attempting to exterminate them as churches. Pastors were sentenced to life imprisonment in the galleys, churches confiscated, Lutheran worship and literature forbidden. In Slovakia and other areas the Lutheran percentage of the population was reduced from 85 to 15 percent during the century of suppression. In Hapsburg territories the Patent of Toleration (1781) restored minimal rights to the congregations of those who had preserved their faith with the BIBLE, catechism, and hymnbook.

Pietism

The need for renewal, particularly within established Lutheran churches charged with religious care and supervision of the entire population of a country, became ever clearer in spite of strong programs for cultivating piety in the preaching and devotional literature of Orthodoxy. Several programs for improving church life have borne the label "pietist" since the late seventeenth century. They reflected concerns of sixteenth-century Lutheran theology as well as Arndt's and Gerhard's, and English Puritan and Dutch Reformed devotional literature, with variations introduced in focus and formulation. PHILIPP

JAKOB SPENER launched an influential renewal movement. As pastor in Frankfurt/Main he composed a preface for Arndt's sermons on gospel pericopes that became a separate publication, Pia Desideria, an effective call for active lay and clerical discipleship. He organized small groups, the collegia pietatis, to foster pious living in the midst of the established congregations, with their indifferent majorities, through emphasis on Bible study, the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, the practice of obedience to God, and improved preaching and theological education. From the Saxon court (Dresden) and later in cooperation with Brandenburg's government, as pastor in Berlin, Spener encouraged the growth of PIETISM.

Its chief organizer was AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE, whose Stiftung in HALLE, centered around an orphanage, modeled provision of social services, influenced theological students at Halle's university, distributed Bibles and devotional literature, and supported the first serious Protestant attempts at mission outside Europe, among non-Christians in INDIA (Bartholomaeus Ziegenbalg [1682–1719] and Heinrich Plütschau [1677–1746], 1706, Tranquebar) and German emigrants (HENRY MELCHIOR MUHLENBERG, Pennsylvania). NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF founded the ecumenical Herrnhuter Community (see HERRNHUT) with the aid of persecuted Moravian refugees and influenced Lutheran preaching and piety in central Europe and many foreign lands. Württemberg pietism, focused on biblical study, the practice of discipleship in daily life, and eschatological speculation, is aptly reflected in the work of biblical scholar JOHANN ALBRECHT BENGEL (1687–1752), particularly his New Testament commentary, Gnomen Novi Testamenti (1742).

German Pietist influences combined with native traditions of piety to create a series of Bible-centered movements for godly living in Scandinavia and central Europe. In Sweden, Henrik Schartau (1757–1825), pastor in Lund, combined a strong commitment to the Lutheran confessions with concern for pious life and a rejection of SECTARIANISM. His use of confession and absolution and his printed sermons shaped popular Swedish piety for generations. Among the important nineteenth-century Swedish revival preachers were lay preacher Carl Olof Rosenius (1816–1868) and pastor Lars Levi Laestadius (1800–1861), whose followers in Sweden and Finland, sometimes given to ecstatic experiences, rely largely on lay leadership and therefore use Absolution as their chief sacrament (see REVIVALS). Other Swedish pietists with spiritualizing tendencies separated from the established church. In Denmark and Norway they remained largely within the established churches. Danish court preacher, bishop, and professor Erik Pontoppidan (1698–1764) directed pietistic renewal, composed an explanation to Luther's Small Catechism that remained in use for two hundred years in Scandinavia and North America, and issued a new hymnal. Lay preacher HANS NIELSEN HAUGE traveled across Norway organizing CONVENTICLES and cultivated both a pious life, on the basis of a certain CONVERSION, and economic growth through his preaching. His criticism of rationalistic and immoral church leaders, as well as their fear of separatism, earned him imprisonment. His influence spread far beyond the groups he formed.

His reading of Luther and SØREN KIERKEGAARD moved Johan Vilhlem Beck (1829–1901) to found an Inner Mission society that brought a biblically based proclamation of Christ and encouragement for pious living to the Danish population.

Lutheranism in the Enlightenment

Pietists and Orthodox alike resisted Enlightened thought, which grew out of Orthodox metaphysics in part but increasingly set aside fundamental elements of Lutheran theology, including original sin, Christ's vicarious ATONEMENT, and sacramental teaching. Some early ENLIGHTENMENT thinkers regarded themselves as Lutherans; for example, GOTTFRIED WILHELM LEIBNIZ worked for reconciliation of the Lutheran churches with others, particularly the Reformed, but abandoned central concerns of Lutheran theology. The transitional thought of post-Orthodox theologians, Pfaff, Mosheim, and Johann Franz Buddeus (1667–1729), physicotheology (Johann Albert Fabricius [1668–1736]), Wolffian theology (SIGMUND JAKOB BAUMGARTEN), and NEOLOGY (JOHANN SALOMO SEMLER), represented differing approaches to reconciling reason with Scripture, setting aside specific aspects of Luther's thought while heralding him as an apostle of freedom and enlightened thinking. In Sweden, Orthodox theologians, such as Petrus Munck (1732–1803), worked to counter those influenced by German Enlightenment thinkers (e.g., Nils Vallerius [1706–1764], Uppsala).

The Confessional Revival

Reaction grew to "Enlightened" thinkers' shallow approaches and critical attacks on biblical authority and traditional Christian teaching. In 1817 Claus Harms (1778–1855), pastor in Kiel, posted a new "Ninetyfive Theses," calling for renewed commitment to biblical authority and the theology of the Lutheran confessions, with emphasis on the use of the Lord's Supper and Confession and Absolution. From his work and other factors grew a Confessional Revival and "Neo-Lutheranism."

Prussian King Friedrich Wilhelm III's imposition of a union of Reformed and Lutheran churches in 1817, reinforced in 1830, aroused a strong Lutheran consciousness that resulted in fresh expressions of traditional Lutheran emphases within the United Church (e.g., by Ernst Wilhelm Hengstenberg [1802–1869]), and in the organization of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Prussia (1841) by followers of Breslau professor Johann Gottfried Scheibel (1783–1843).

Within other Lutheran churches the Confessional Revival grew. When Bavarian King Ludwig I commanded that all soldiers kneel before the sacramental elements, the opposition of Erlangen professor Gottlieb Christoph Adolf Harless (1806–1879), a leader of renewal of confessional theology, cost him his position. After teaching in Leipzig and serving as Saxon court preacher he returned to Bavaria as president of the Lutheran Consistory. His program for theological renewal included certainty of personal rebirth through the power of the gospel and commitment to Scripture and the Lutheran confessions. The school that followed him and his colleague Johann Friedrich Wilhelm Höfling (1802–1853) strove to adapt the theology of the Lutheran confessions to nineteenth-century thought and refute the liberal theology of ALBRECHT RITSCHL and others (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). It included Luther scholar Theodosius Harnack (1817–1889), exegete (Heilsgeschichte) Johann Christen Konrad von Hofmann (1810–1877), and dogmaticians Gottfried Thomasius (1802–1875) and Franz Hermann Reinhold Frank (1827–1894). The confessional tradition at Erlangen continued in the twentieth century with Ludwig Ihmels (1858–1933), Werner Elert (1885–1954), Paul Althaus (1888–1966), and Hermann Sasse (1895–1976), the latter moving to Australia in the early 1950s.

