- Foster, Lawrence. Women, Family, and Utopia: Communal Experiments of the Shakers, the Oneida Community, and the Mormons. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1991.
- Frassetto, Michael, ed. Medieval Purity and Piety: Essays on Medieval Clerical Celibacy and Religious Reform. New York: Garland, 1998.
- Kitch, Sally. Chaste Liberation: Celibacy and Female Cultural Status. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1989.

- Lea, Henry C. The History of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church. New York: Russell & Russell, 1957.
- Robson, John M. Marriage or Celibacy?: The Daily Telegraph on a Victorian Dilemma. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1995.
- Schillebeeckx, Edward. Celibacy. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1968.
- Vogels, Heinz-Jürgen. Celibacy: Gift or Law?: A Critical Investigation. Kansas City, MO: Sheed & Ward, 1993.

R.MMET MCLAUGHLIN

CHALMERS, THOMAS (1780–1847)

Scottish presbyterian minister, theologian, and political economist. Thomas Chalmers is best known for his pioneering efforts to revive the parish ministry in industrial society, and for his leading role in the Disruption of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND in 1843. He was born on March 17, 1780, in the small coastal burgh of Anstruther, in Fife, where his father was a merchant and his mother was active in charitable work. Here young Chalmers grew up amid the close communal culture of preindustrial SCOTLAND, in which a sense of mutual responsibility united the social orders. Educated at St. Andrews and Edinburgh Universities, he was ordained to the ministry of the Church of Scotland in 1803. His early ministry of the rural parish of Kilmarnock in Fife was not a success. Influenced by the ethos of the ENLIGHTENMENT, he neglected his pastoral duties while he pursued, unsuccessfully, a university appointment in mathematics or natural science. Then in 1810–1811, after a prolonged illness, he experienced a conversion to an intense Evangelical piety (see EVANGELICALISM). He soon established a reputation as a fiery preacher, proclaiming the vanity of worldly ambition when set against the prospect of eternal life.

In 1815 Chalmers was appointed to the Tron parish in the industrializing city of Glasgow. Distressed by the poverty he encountered in Glasgow, he became convinced that the main cause of urban deprivation was the breakdown of community in the overcrowded urban parishes. His response was to work to revive the traditional parish system in the urban environment. His urban parish work included two main principles: first, what he termed “aggression,” or regular house-to-house visiting among the parishioners; and second, “territoriality,” or the subdivision of crowded urban parishes, many of which had populations of 10,000 or more, into small neighborhood districts of about 400 inhabitants, in which pastoral supervision would be more feasible. His aim was to re-create in the new industrial environment the communal culture that he had known in his youth in Anstruther. In 1819 he became minister of a newly formed working-class Glasgow parish, St. John’s, where the civic authorities gave him a free hand to pursue his parish plans. Subdividing the large parish into twenty-five districts, he recruited an activist parish agency of elders and deacons, and assigned an elder and deacon to visit regularly in each district. The elders were to promote moral and religious values, and encourage regular church and school attendance. The deacons were to oversee social welfare. In particular, deacons were to reduce dependency on legal poor relief among the laboring orders by promoting thrift, delayed marriage, and communal sharing. Chalmers also established a system of Sunday and weekday schools (see SECONDARY SCHOOLS), for the education of the parish youth, and held Sunday evening services, which laboring people were encouraged to attend in their work clothes. His St. John's "experiment" in urban ministry had considerable success in promoting social responsibility, and it attracted widespread interest.

In 1823 Chalmers left the parish ministry for an academic career, becoming first professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews University and then, after 1828, professor of divinity at Edinburgh University. In his lectures and voluminous writings in social theology, he sought to demonstrate the workings of providence in social and economic organization. From about 1831 he was the acknowledged leader of the Evangelical party, and under his leadership the Evangelicals in 1834 gained the ascendancy in the Church of Scotland. Chalmers now worked to revive the parish system on a national level, seeking to transform Scotland into a "godly commonwealth" of close-knit parish communities modeled on his St. John's experiment. Between 1834 and 1841 he led a national church extension campaign, which collected voluntary donations and erected over 220 new churches in Scotland, mainly in the new towns and cities. Chalmers combined this church-building campaign with petitions to Parliament to provide endowments to the new churches. Endowments, he insisted, would be necessary to enable the new churches to pursue a pastoral mission among the poorest inhabitants of the industrializing districts. However, in 1838 Parliament refused to provide the endowments, and his church extension campaign waned.

In the later 1830s his efforts to revive the established church were also overshadowed by a bitter dispute between church and state over lay patronage in the appointment of parish ministers (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). According to the civil law of Scotland, patrons, mainly the monarch or large landowners, had the right to appoint ministers to vacant parish churches. In 1834 the Evangelical-dominated General Assembly had acted to give parishioners a voice in ministerial appointments, by permitting a majority of male heads of family in a parish to veto a patron's candidate, if they conscientiously believed that the candidate would not be acceptable as their minister. The civil courts, however, proclaimed this "veto" to be an illegal encroachment on the civil rights of patrons. The courts threatened the clergy of the Church of Scotland with fines and imprisonment unless they ignored the wishes of parishioners and participated in the ordination of patrons' candidates, whereas Parliament gave its support to the courts. Chalmers and the Evangelicals refused to back down, insisting that a Christian people must have a voice in the selection of their ministers.

The struggle of church and state culminated at the Disruption of 1843, when Chalmers led over a third of the clergy and perhaps half the lay membership out of the Church of Scotland to form the FREE CHURCH. They gave up the endowed incomes, churches, manses, and parish schools of the established church, and undertook to build a free national church through voluntary contributions. Chalmers played a leading role in the financial organization of the Free Church, which within five years of the Disruption had erected over 730 churches, 500 schools, and 400 manses. He also served as the principal and professor of divinity of New College, the Free Church seminary for the training of ministers, and continued his urban mission work in a deprived district of Edinburgh. Chalmers died on May 30, 1847. His Christian social vision, and above all his conscientious stand in 1843 for the independence of the church from state control, have continued to influence Protestantism in the North Atlantic world.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Chalmers, Thomas. Collected Works. 25 vols. Glasgow: Collins, 1835–1842.

———. Posthumous Works. 10 vols. Edinburgh: Sutherland and Knox, 1849.

Hanna, William. Memoirs of Dr. Chalmers. 4 vols. Edinburgh: Thomas Constable, 1849–1852.

Secondary Sources:

Brown, Stewart J. Thomas Chalmers and the Godly Commonwealth in Scotland. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Cheyne, A.C., ed. The Practical and the Pious: Essays on Thomas Chalmers. Edinburgh: Saint Andrew Press, 1985.

Roxborough, W. John. Thomas Chalmers: Enthusiast for Mission. Carlisle, Cumbria: Paternoster Press, 1999.

Voges, Friedhelm. Das Denken von Thomas Chalmers im Kirchen- und Sozialgeschichtlichen Kontext. Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang, 1985.

Watt, Hugh. Thomas Chalmers and the Disruption. Edinburgh: Thomas Nelson, 1943.

STEWART J. BROWN

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY (1780–1842)

North American Unitarian. William Ellery Channing played an important role in developing New England Unitarianism during the early to mid-nineteenth century. He was born into a wealthy family in Newport, Rhode Island on April 7, 1780. After graduating from Harvard in 1798, he returned there in 1802 to prepare for the ministry. From his ordination in 1803 until his death on October 2, 1842, Channing held a pastorate at the Federal Street Church in Boston.

Channing's sermons and writings epitomized the controversial LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM of his era. In his 1819 ordination sermon, "Unitarian Christianity," Channing categorized human nature as essentially good; thus conflicting with orthodox Calvinists who saw humanity as helplessly flawed due to original sin. In "A Moral Argument against Calvinism" (1820), Channing argued against the traditional Trinitarian doctrine. He posited that Jesus was not God, but rather a spiritual and moral exemplar sent by God to those craving the Holy Spirit.

Channing's theological statements found support from many like-minded ministers. In 1820 he organized the Berry St. Conference of Ministers, which eventually gave birth to the AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION in 1825. Channing also assisted in developing the Christian Register (est. 1821), a Unitarian journal. Besides making some important theological contributions, Channing also addressed the arts. In "Remarks on National Literature" (1830), he declared that American writers needed to create a unique style. Channing's thoughts influenced the Transcendentalists, such as RALPH WALDO EMERSON and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. "Self-Culture" (1838) typified Channing's later work, which focused keenly on social matters, such as abolition of slavery, labor reform, and public education.

See also Arminianism; Slavery, Abolition of; Calvinism; Orthodoxy; Sin

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Robinson, David, ed. William Ellery Channing, Selected Writings. New York: Paulist Press, 1985.

Secondary Source:

Mendelsohn, Jack. Channing: The Reluctant Radical. Boston: Little, Brown, 1971.

ARTHUR J. REMILLARD

CHAO, T.C. (CHAO TZU-CHEN, ZHAO ZICHEN) (1898–1979)

Chinese theologian. T.C. Chao was China's outstanding Protestant theologian of the first half of the twentieth century, as well as a leading educator and church leader. He was also a prominent ecumenical figure and was elected one of the first presidents of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) at Amsterdam in 1948. T.C. Chao resigned that position in protest over the WCC's stance on the Korean War. In the mid-1950s, he came under political attack in China, and fell into obscurity until after the end of the Cultural Revolution.

Born in Deqing, China, in 1898, Chao received a classical education and graduated from Soochow (Dongwu) University in 1910. He studied at Vanderbilt University from 1914 to 1917, where he received both a B.D. and an M.A. On his return to China, he taught first at Soochow University and then moved to Yenching (Yanjing) University in Beijing, where he served as professor of theology and dean of the School of Religion from 1928 to 1952. He was ordained an Anglican deacon and priest in Hong Kong in 1941.

Chao was a pioneer in the contextualization of Chinese theology, and he challenged the church by continuing to question the relevance of Christian faith to society and CULTURE. His work moved from the liberalism of his earlier writings, such as Life of Jesus (1935), to the influence of NEOORTHODOXY in An Interpretation of Christianity (1947), to the personal or even mystical reflections in My Experience in Prison (1948). Chao's theological writings—a dozen books and hundreds of essays, speeches and poems—reveal his classical education and Buddhist upbringing, as well as a hopeful response to the political and social movements of his time.

In his last years, Chao distanced himself from his earlier Christian beliefs and wrote that he had failed as a theologian. But by the twenty-first century, he was again being studied in China and the West, and a complete collection of his writings is being prepared in Beijing. Chao died in Beijing in 1979.

See also China; Theology, Twentieth Century Global; Anglicanism

References and Further Reading

Gluer, Winfried. Christliche Theologie in China: T.C.Chao, 1918–1956. Gütersloh, Germany: Mohn, 1979.

Luo Zhenfang, "T.C.Chao's Last Letter to Me." Chinese Theological Review (1986):75–78.

Ng Lee-Ming. "An Evaluation of T.C.Chao's Thought." Ching Feng 21 (1979).

Yamamoto, Sumiko. History of Protestantism in China: The Indigenization of Christianity. Tokyo, Japan: Toho Gakkai, 2000.

PHILIP L. WICKERI

CHAPLAINCY

Introduction

Chaplaincy has been variously defined, but for our present purpose it is Christian ministry that takes place primarily in or is related to an institution. It is a ministry therefore that does not take place within the normal parochial or congregational setting, but it is carried out largely, though not wholly, by ordained members of the church.

The word we use for CLERGY working in such settings, "chaplain," is derived from the Latin capella meaning cloak. Tradition holds that the fourth-century saint, Martin of Tours, divided his cloak to share with a beggar one cold night. After Martin's death his half of the cloak became a relic and the priests who guarded it became known as "capellani" or chaplains in English. What is especially interesting in this story for contemporary chaplains, is that etymologically the word comes from a situation of pastoral care, driven by religious devotion, directed toward one in need.

History of Chaplaincy

There is a long history of clergy working full-time, in a stipendiary capacity, outside the parochial or congregational systems. In the United States the parochial system owes much to the heritage of the church in ENGLAND and other European countries. The parochial system was first sketched out in England by Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury (died c. 690), drawing on patterns already established on the Continent. Theodore's plan was to establish that defined geographical areas should each have a parish church and a resident priest (ibi ecclesia et presbyter). Since the beginnings of the formation of the parish system, clergy have served outside parishes or regular congregations as cathedral staff, archdeacons, bishops' chaplains, domestic chaplains to families, and as chantry priests amongst others. None of these clergy, however, could easily be described as “chaplains” in the sense used above. Nevertheless, their existence does remind us that parochial or congregational clergy have not been the only expression of the church’s ordained ministry.

In addition to these ordained ministers, other clergy for centuries have also ministered in three particular settings: the army and navy; hospitals; and prisons. The larger medieval households contained regular garrisons of soldiers and these often required the attention of a designated cleric to act as chaplain. Although there was a long history of bishops, priests, and other clergy engaging in wars as combatants, priests also accompanied armies into battle as noncombatant pastors as early as the Battle of Crecy (1346) and on ships of the English fleet at Cadiz (1597). Clergy, especially the monastic orders, were intimately involved in setting up medieval institutions that ministered to the sick and the dying. Many charitable foundations, such as almshouses or lazah houses (dedicated to caring for those with leprosy), had nonparochial clergy working in them. In all such places the boundaries between physical care and spiritual care were blurred. Chaplains were also appointed to the newly built British prisons of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries where they ministered to the condemned, administered the sacraments, and organized welfare and education programs. They also exercised a statutory function where they were required to meet all prisoners on their entry to and exit from jail.

The range and numbers of clergy working outside the parochial system was not insignificant. Nevertheless, for the most part people in Europe, and later in other places in the world, were ministered to by a member of the parish clergy who lived among them and whose own life was thus closely linked to theirs. This was the pattern of pastoral care that most people experienced most of the time. The parish system lasted without much alteration, despite the REFORMATION, until the onset of the Industrial Revolution in the late eighteenth century. Until this time it was quite usual for a person to receive the occasional offices of the church: BAPTISM, MARRIAGE, and funeral (see FuNERARY RITES), in the church of the parish where they were born, lived, worked, and died. Although there was some degree of mobility, people lived fairly static lives. An examination of the marriage registers from the beginning of the nineteenth century, when the effects of INDUSTRIALIZATION began to be felt, shows that marriage partners were drawn from a much wider area than had hitherto been the case. The urbanization and mechanization that the Industrial Revolution brought had obvious consequences for the church. As a significant part of the population shifted from small, intimate villages to the new, impersonal cities and towns the attachment of the people to the local parish church weakened. Links with a particular church building and with a particular member of the clergy were damaged. As the century progressed attachment to the church diminished still further. By the beginning of the twentieth century large swathes of the population had little or no contact with the church or its ordained representatives.

The experience of the First World War (1914–1918), however, profoundly affected the religious mood of North America, Europe, and elsewhere. Few chaplains were recruited at the start of the war, as the expectation was that the conflict would soon be over. Although many of the men thought that the “Godbotherers” had no place in the trenches, many others had fond affection for chaplains such as Philip “Tubby” Clayton and Geoffrey Studdart-Kennedy (known as “Woodbine Willie” because of his distribution of cigarettes to the troops). Because of such experiences many of the armed forces around the world came to feel that there was a need for greater, permanent provision of chaplains to meet the needs of the military community. By the conclusion of the Second World War (1939–1945) such provision was regarded as commonplace, and when peace was declared many former service personnel and church leaders thought that the experience of having chaplains involved in every aspect of the life of an institution might be replicated in a civilian environment.

Expressions of Chaplaincy

In the last sixty years, in addition to the historic spheres of chaplaincy (armed forces, hospitals, prisons), new expressions of Christian ministry in and to particular institutions have emerged both within Protestantism (including ANGLICANISM), Roman Catholicism, and to a lesser extent Orthodoxy (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Chaplains are now established in a wide variety of institutions and in various sectors of society. Chaplains are to be found in such areas as schools, universities, industry (either generally or in specific parts of it), agriculture, airports, the emergency services, railways, SPORTS, and the legal profession. Although this is by no means an exhaustive list of the current areas of activity it does at least give a flavor of the range of spheres in which chaplains carry out their Christian ministry. However, just as it might be regarded as a mistake to talk of parochial or congregationally based ministry as if it were a single, homogeneous whole, talking of “chaplaincy” generically is even more complex given the wide range of provision. Nevertheless, as thumbnail sketches the following points do warrant particular mention.

One important consideration when looking at chaplaincy is the differences between the work of full-time and part-time chaplains. Full-time chaplains work solely outside the parochial or congregational ministry. Chaplains who work in an institution or in a particular sector of society see their ministry as being both to the institution and to the individuals who work within it. Some chaplains may feel that it is easier for them to understand the structures and more fully appreciate the life of the institution if they work in the institution full-time. They may feel that this increases their identification with those who work there and gives greater opportunity for chaplains to be accepted as part of the institution. Other chaplains, however, may feel that being part-time brings its own merits, such as allowing the chaplain to make significant links with the wider community or ensuring that the chaplain does not get institutionalized and fail to relate primarily to the church. Some ministers who work full-time as chaplains may work part-time in more than one institution or work in a sector (such as industry) where they visit more than one place each week. They may therefore see themselves as full-time chaplains but be perceived by others as part-time.

The naming of chaplaincy has caused some difficulties. Some chaplains feel that the title of nonparochial or noncongregational ministry means that their work is defined by what it is not rather than by what it is. Some such chaplains have chosen therefore to call themselves “sector ministers” because they minister to a sector or segment of society. Other chaplains feel that such adoption limits the scope of this ministry and that chaplains can fall into the trap of seeing their ministry as restricted to only one part of the people of God. Some chaplains and some church documents have called chaplaincy a “specialized” ministry; what is meant here is that chaplaincy often calls for a particular body of knowledge or skill if one is to minister adequately. It might be difficult, for instance, to be a good chaplain in a prison if one did not know enough of the workings of the penal system to be able to relate effectively to staff and inmates. Other clergy, who do not work as chaplains, naturally feel that the labeling “specialized” demeans their own work, given that it suggests that parish- or congregation-based ministry is not itself specialized or particular.

It is interesting to note that even chaplains’ labeling within their sphere of work may sometimes reveal something about how the chaplains perceive their work or how they are regarded by others. A chaplain described as chaplain to an institution might indicate that the position is funded by the church and the chaplain may thus be seen as a guest within the institution. A chaplain described as chaplain of an institution may well be paid by the institution itself and may thus be seen in the institution as “one of us.” Increasingly chaplains are choosing to adopt the more neutral term chaplain at an institution. Such labeling is widely used by others in institutions. It is more likely, for instance, that nurses at a hospital would describe themselves as nurses at the hospital, than nurses of the hospital.

Some Issues Arising from Chaplaincy

One major issue that chaplains have to face (or at least should face) is that of identification with the institution. The question of who pays the chaplain, although giving some indication as to the value the chaplain’s role is given, also raises the question of allegiance. Chaplains might, for instance, feel that “he who pays the piper calls the tune” and thus give primary allegiance to the institutions that pay them, be it the church or institution in which they work. Even if the acknowledgment is not as obvious as this, chaplains can succumb to what we might call creeping institutionalization. Here, over time chaplains may become so inculcated into the life and work of the institution that they fail to see its faults and become unable to offer an adequately Christian critique of the institution’s working practices.

The fine balance between identification with and unquestioning acceptance of an institution is related to the possible tensions that chaplains can experience in this role. Chaplains might feel that they should be whistle-blowers against individuals or the institution in certain situations and this will obviously have implications for the position of neutrality that some chaplains feel they should have. Indeed, neutrality itself has been questioned and there are some who believe that chaplains should ask, “Whose side are we on?” If a chaplain in a mental health hospital sees abuse taking place, for instance, or a military chaplain witnesses a potential war crime, what should the chaplain do? Is remaining quiet really an option? Related to this, some have argued that the holding of rank in military situations compromises the work of chaplains because there is immediately a stronger identification with the officer class than other ranks. Indeed, even the presence of chaplains, paid by the state, confuses the separation of church and state where this is constitutionally required. Similarly, chaplains in educational settings may feel that a teaching role, although adding to full participation in the life of an institution, means that their pastoral effectiveness is compromised because they also are part of student assessment.

One certain benefit that many chaplains experience from their work is the greater intimacy ministers feel they have with those among whom they work. Because the numbers of people in many of the institutions are relatively small when compared to the numbers who live within areas that are defined in parochial or congregational settings, chaplains can become better known than might otherwise be the case. Chaplaincy can offer the prospect of daily contact with the same group of people and this may well have pastoral benefits.

ECUMENISM and interfaith relations are often more easily established and built on within chaplaincy than in other areas of the church's ministry. Many institutions that have a chaplaincy provision draw the chaplains from a range of denominational backgrounds and, increasingly, from other faith backgrounds too. Daily work with such colleagues helps foster a greater understanding of the other's faith and its expression. Those in a parochial or congregational setting may not be so fortunate as this. Dialogue with those of another denomination or faith opens up exciting possibilities for the chaplain, the institution, and the wider church and society.

Conclusion

Clergy working outside the normative structures of parochial or congregational ministry have a long and distinguished history in the life of the church. Although there have been chaplains in some spheres for centuries, much of contemporary chaplaincy is in part a response to the changing circumstances and increased SECULARIZATION of the modern world. The fragmentation of modern living (we live in one place, work in another, and take our leisure in others) has meant that attachment to the local church has weakened. At its best, however, the work of chaplaincy helps the church to more easily engage with the challenges of the society the church seeks to serve. Chaplaincy represents the church to the world and the world to the church and thus it helps ensure that the church is fully enmeshed in the complexities and intimacies of the modern society.

References and Further Reading

- Beckford, James A., and Sophie Gilliat. Religion in Prison: Equal Rights in a Multi-Faith Society. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Budd, Richard M. Serving Two Masters: The Development of Military Chaplaincy, 1860–1920. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2002.
- De Revere, David W., Wilbert A. Cunningham, Tommy Moberley, and John A. Price. Chaplaincy in Law Enforcement: What it is and How to do it. Springfield, IL: Charles C. Thomas, 1989.
- Gibson, William. A Social History of the Domestic Chaplain: 1530–1840. London: Leicester University Press, 1997.
- Holst, Lawrence E. Hospital Ministry: The Role of the Chaplain Today. New York: Crossroad, 1985.
- Legood, Giles. Chaplaincy: The Church's Sector Ministries. London: Cassell, 1999.

Rogerson, John W. Industrial Mission in a Changing World. Sheffield, UK: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996.

Shockley, Donald G. Campus Ministry: The Church Beyond Itself. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1989.

GILES LEGOOD

CHARITY

Terminology and Origin

Definitions of “charity” include (1) older synonym for Christian love, (2) specific act of kindness, (3) organization devoted to assistance of the needy and amelioration of society, (4) ethical criterion of behavior, (5) major aspect of Christian character/theological virtue/sanctification, (6) characteristic of the Church, and (7) the divine nature. “Charity” is the early modern English translation of New Testament agape (see the precepts of charity in Mark 12:28–31, Matthew 22:36–40, Luke 10:25–28, I Corinthians 13), by way of the Latin Vulgate’s caritas. As distinct from other Greek terms (philia, eros, storge), the New Testament term avoided overtones of lust, mere comradeship, or familiarity, but in English the word “charity” came to have equally negative associations of institutional beneficence without humane personal respect; hence the proverbial expression, “as cold as charity,” or “I don’t want to depend on charity.” Nineteenth-century and later Bible versions, and devotional literature since at least the eighteenth century, prefer the expression “love.”

Works of Charity, Individual and Institutional

Even in English, “charity” has survived also in a more positive sense of works of individual kindness for the needy, and of organizations for the relief of need. The medieval Church’s commitment to care of the poor and enslaved continued through the Reformation into all churches, Roman Catholic and Protestant. The nineteenth century in particular saw a vast growth in Christian charitable organizations in most churches, to meet the needs of increasingly industrialized and urbanized society in Europe and America. Among Protestant churches, these organizations often took the form of new religious orders (Sisters of the People, Sisters of the Children, in British Methodism, for instance), on lines comparable with the vowed communities of Roman Catholicism, but with a different understanding of vows, and no suggestion that the vowed life is necessary to evangelical perfection. Combined with these moves went the rediscovery of diaconal ministry, and of the Order of Deacon as a vocation in its own right and not merely as an obligatory career stage preparatory to the presbyterate—this rediscovery was pioneered in the German Evangelical Churches (for example, by the Lutheran Wilhelm Löhe at Neuendettelsau in Hessen).

Charity as a Divinely Commanded Criterion of Behavior

The Commandments of Charity have already been mentioned. They feature both in the Hebrew Bible (Leviticus 19:18, 34), and next, as “the first and great commandment in the law, and the second...like to it,” in the New Testament, (Romans 13:9; Timothy 1:5, as well as the cited Gospel verses). Paul’s comment is that the second commandment covers all the prohibitions of wrong and hurtful behavior. Charity guides decisions by looking to the best results of our plans; by treating the neighbor as our equal or superior in need, and by pointing away from revenge or resentment to forgiveness.

Charity as a Hallmark of Christian Character, Theological Virtue, Essence of Sanctification

I Corinthians 13 describes charity not as a discrete act or series of acts, but as an enduring feature of personal character, together with faith and hope (some Protestant moral theology continues the medieval categorization of these as the three “theological” virtues, as distinct from the “cardinal” virtues of the Aristotelianbased scholastic theology). All Protestant moral teaching requires a vision of Christian maturation in which charity, springing from faith, is paramount (Luther’s quellende Liebe, “love springing up like a fountain”): this charity, like faith itself, is a grateful response to redeeming love, and; also like faith, is itself a divine gift, not a human achievement. Charity is a reflection in the redeemed creature of the character of the Creator-and-Redeemer, and is therefore an aspect of the divine image, intended by the Creator from the beginning, lost in the Fall, and restored in redemption. Lutheran and Reformed (and Methodist) views differ in emphasis at this point: Lutherans are careful to insist that the believer never passes the need for justification, while Methodists and Reformed traditionally assert that God works an inherent sanctifying change in the believer. Methodist and other Holiness theologies see the essence of this change as a gift of transforming love, and that it is possible even in this life for God so to transform a personality that no motive other than love may become dominant in that person—although the gift may be forfeited by loss or relinquishment of faith, and require renewal.

Charity: The Vocation and Nature of the Church

From New Testament times, the Christian Church has known itself to be called to be a community of mutual charity, an instrument of charity for society in general, for unbelievers as well as believers. In all traditions, ministry and local structures have been defined by purposes of charity: Protestant examples are churchwardens and care of the poor, Methodist Poor Stewards, prison visitors, and grief support groups. Charity is, in Protestant understanding, the overriding purpose of CHURCH LAW and the sole basis of ecumenism.

Charity: The Divine Nature

In individual and corporate sanctification, in the Church, and in all creation, charity is the response to divine redemptive mercy, which response is itself possible only as the gift and self-bestowing act of the Trinity, whose very nature is the mutual indwelling of love.

References and Further Reading

- Durnbaugh, Donald F., ed. Every Need Supplied. Mutual Aid and Christian Community in the Free Churches 1525–1675. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1974.
- Flew, Robert Newton. The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology, Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1937.
- Gassmann, Günther. “The Church Is a Communion of Churches,” in The Catholicity of the Reformation, edited by Carl F. Braaten and Robert W. Jensen, 93–105. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996.
- Hirst, Edward W. Studies in Christian Love. London: Religious Book Club, 1944.
- Kreutziger, Sarah Sloan. “Going on to Perfection. The Contributions of the Wesleyan Theological Doctrine of Entire Sanctification to the Value Base of American Professional Social Work Through the Lives and Activities of Nineteenth Century Evangelical Women Reformers,” PhD dissertation, Tulane University, 1991.
- Nygren, Anders. Agape and Eros. Translated by Philip S. Watson. Philadelphia, PA: Muhlenberg Press, 1953.
- Williams, Daniel Day. The Spirit and the Forms of Love. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.
- Ziemke, Donald C. Love for the Neighbor in Luther’s Theology. The Development of his Thought 1512–1539. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg, 1969.

DAVID H. TRIPP

CHERBURY, EDWARD LORD HERBERT OF (c. 1582–1648)

English philosopher. Recognized as the father of English DEISM, Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury (born March 3, ca. 1582, at Eyton-on-Severn, Shropshire and died August 1648 in London) was in his lifetime far more noted—as a politician, diplomat, and author—than his younger brother GEORGE HERBERT, the poet and country priest. Despite the latter’s greater fame today, the influence of Edward’s Deist thought has remained considerable on religion and politics of the subsequent centuries.

Educated at Oxford in classics and languages, Herbert began his maturity as parliamentarian, then soldier, traveler, frequent dueler, and lover on the Continent. In 1619 he became ambassador to FRANCE, a post that embroiled him in religious conflicts between Protestants and Catholics. Although loyal to the Protestant cause throughout,

Herbert's motivations were political rather than religious. Nevertheless, his thought arose from his experience with these "wars of religion."

The main notions of Herbert's religious philosophy are stated in his De Veritate (Concerning Truth) of 1624, written with the inspiration of Hugo Grotius, who had just written a De Veritate Religionis Christianae (Concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion), and published partly at his instance, partly by divine sanction, as Herbert himself claimed. Although Hugo's work was a plea for peace and tolerance among Christians—and in its nonsectarian THEOLOGY a forerunner of C.S. Lewis's Mere Christianity—Edward's book extended the common denominator to all religions. Instead of arguing for a universal Christianity, he advocated natural religion not only as preparation for revealed religion, but the whole of truth indeed. Herbert's work draws from ancient skepticism revived in sixteenth-century religious debates, but in an opposite direction from fideism, which replaces reason with FAITH: What cannot be agreed upon as certain truth, he argued, cannot be affirmed DOCTRINE. Herbert makes "common notions" the basis of religion. These are the fruit of "natural instinct," which is much more reliable and universally valid than "discursive reasoning"—the source of much gratuitous error. Only what is common to all is easily believed and should be taken as essential truth for all. For Herbert this truth constitutes five elements: (1) the existence of God, (2) the rightful worship thereof, (3) consisting principally of virtuous living, (4) the default of which requires repentance, (5) and the success of which determines the afterlife. As for special revelation, Herbert views it under the category of TRADITION and history—separate from truth—in the realm of probability. Only revelation to oneself, like individual reason, holds as valid.

In his later writings Herbert expands these fundamental views. In De Religione Laici, he blames priests for propagating religious errors and counsels their correction by reasonable lay thinking. Then in De Religione Gentilium he salvages from the pagan religions the five essential points of religion from his first book, whereas in the Dialogue he explicitly attacks revealed religion. In sum Herbert's thought was a secular development on earlier discussions of Nikolaus Cusanus, Guardano Bruno, and Hugo Grotius, and became foun-dational, through his follower CHARLES BLOUNT, in ENLIGHTENMENT Deism and beyond.

See also Collins, Anthony; Hobbes, Thomas; Kant, Immanuel; Jefferson, Thomas; Tindal, Matthew; Toland, John; Toleration

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Herbert, Edward Lord of Cherbury. De veritate. 1624.
- . De Religione Laici. After 1630.
- . De Causis Errorum.
- . The Life and Reign of King Henry the Eighth.
- . A Dialogue between a Tutor and His Pupil.
- . Autobiography.

Secondary Sources:

- Hill, Eugene D. Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1987.

Rossi, Mario. La vita, le opere, i tempi [The life, works and times] di Edoardo Herbert di Cherbury. 3 vols. Firenze: Sansoni, 1947.

Stroppel, Clemens. Edward Herbert von Cherbury, Wahrheit Religion-Freiheit. Tübingen: Francke Verlag, 2000.

DAVID LIU

CHILDHOOD

The study of children and childhood is a growing area of inquiry in a number of academic disciplines. It has developed well beyond those fields that have typically devoted attention to children, such as education and child development, to include history, political science, law, sociology, anthropology, philosophy, religious studies, and theology. Rising interdisciplinary interest in children and childhood was prompted in part by the influential study by Philippe Ariès, originally published in French in 1960 and translated two years later as Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life. Ariès convincingly showed that conceptions of childhood and even the experience of being a child vary and change over time. Although historians have challenged many of his specific findings, his work has motivated scholars in several fields to reexamine the development and experiences of children and to explore conceptions of children and childhood in various periods of history and within diverse cultures.

Biblical Perspectives

Christian conceptions of childhood and attitudes and behaviors toward children are also complex and diverse, reflecting the particular historical, cultural, and theological contexts in which they develop. These varied attitudes and behaviors are also based in part on the diverse and sometimes paradoxical notions about children found in the Bible. Some biblical texts speak of children as gifts of God, signs of God's blessing, and sources of joy. Others depict children as ignorant and capricious and in need of instruction and discipline. Several biblical passages command parents to teach their children the faith. Other passages address obligations of the community to children, especially the poor and orphans. In New Testament epistles, children are commanded to obey their parents, and fathers are urged not to provoke their children to anger but to "bring them up in the discipline and instruction of the Lord" (Ephesians 6:1–4). In the Gospels, children are depicted in striking, even radical ways. At a time when children occupied a low position in society, Jesus receives children, blesses them, touches them, and heals them. He is indignant toward those who have contempt for them. He even equates welcoming a little child in his name to welcoming himself and the One who sent him. Furthermore, he depicts children as models for adults of entering the reign of God, as models of faith, and as vehicles of revelation. The ways in which Christians have wrestled with these diverse biblical texts and the particular texts that they eventually either incorporate into their theology or neglect determine in part their particular perspectives on childhood and their understanding of their obligations to children themselves.

Historical Perspectives

In the history of Protestantism, childhood has been viewed both as a stage in life before adulthood as well as a metaphor for spiritual maturity. In regard to the former, almost all Protestant theologians have emphasized that children are sinful and in need of instruction. However, their particular conceptions and treatment of children vary. The notion that children are sinful is deeply tied to Protestant understandings of the fall and original SIN. Some scholars have assumed that regarding children as sinful inevitably leads to the punishment and even abuse of children. Yet this is not the case. Although some Protestants in the past and even today emphasize that because children are sinful they should be physically punished and their “wills must be broken,” and although there are dark chapters in the history of Christianity of the brutal treatment and abuse of children, other Protestants who have also viewed children as sinful have treated children with compassion and have created positive social and ecclesiastical reforms on their behalf. Thus, any view of children as sinful must be examined within the larger framework of any given theology and in relation to the actual treatment of children themselves.

For example, although the Protestant reformer JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) viewed children as affected by original sin, and although his views have been used at times to justify the harsh treatment of children, he did not recommend physically punishing children. He did emphasize the depth of human depravity and claims the nature of infants is a “seed of sin.” However, he did not dwell on evidences of corruption in children. Furthermore, building on biblical passages, he claimed that infants are gifts of God and can proclaim God’s goodness. He also underscored the duties of parents to teach their children godliness and the obligations of society to provide for the educational and physical needs of children. He himself wrote two CATECHISMS and supported school reforms in Geneva.

August Hermann Francke (1663–1727), a German Lutheran Pietist (see PIETISM), also believed that children are born with a fallen nature and even claimed that their “self-will” must be “broken.” However, his particular understanding of “breaking the self-will” within the context of his major theological convictions led him not only to treat children with respect and kindness but also to pay attention to the needs of poor children. In contrast to many contemporaries in his highly class-conscious period, Francke showed a concern for children that extended to orphans and children of the poor, and he built an extensive complex of charitable and educational institutions to address their needs. He even allowed gifted poor students and orphans to prepare for a university education alongside children of the upper and middle classes. His notion of original sin provided a kind of positive, egalitarian framework of thought that opened a door to responding to the needs of poor children, seeing them as individuals with gifts and talents to be cultivated, and positively influencing educational reforms in GERMANY.

Some Protestant theologians have devoted little attention to the sinful nature of children and have focused instead on elements within contemporary culture or family life that influence children. For example, HORACE BUSHNELL (1802–1876) and FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) both stressed proper nurture for children in the home, the church, and the community. Bushnell claimed children “by nature” do not need to choose evil, but they often do because parental sins and unjust social structures negatively influence them. Thus, in his popular book, Christian Nurture (1861), he emphasized the importance of daily rituals and practices in the home for positively influencing children and nurturing their faith. Schleiermacher claimed that children are born with as much potential for salvation as for sin and that it is the duty of parents to nurture their children’s “higher self-consciousness,” which connects them to the transcendent and thereby opens their hearts to love of others. Influenced by Moravian Pietists (see MORAVIAN CHURCH), he understood the family to be the center of a child’s religious formation. Nevertheless, he also recognized that efforts within the home must be supported by the church. He thereby worked to strengthen religious education and preached a series of “Sermons on the Christian Household.” Finally, more than many other theologians, he emphasized the ways in which children are models for adults.

Throughout the history of Protestantism there has been an emphasis on the need to educate and to care for children. Protestants in the past and today have established schools, orphanages, and hospitals for children. They have also written catechisms and religious educational materials for the home and created educational programs in the church. In general, Protestants have provided education for their children not only to enable them to read the Bible but also to prepare them for service to church and society. They have also emphasized the role of parents in the religious formation of children, and they have outlined particular obligations of the church and state for education and child welfare.

For example, MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) wrote catechisms for use in the home and encouraged parents, especially fathers, to take responsibility for the moral and spiritual formation of their children. He also believed that well-educated citizens would serve both church and society. Thus, he urged both parents and civil authorities to provide children with a strong education so that they could read the BIBLE and gain the skills and knowledge necessary for them to use their gifts and talents to serve others. At a time when education was viewed as unnecessary for most children and educational opportunities were limited, Luther and his colleague PHILIPP MELANCTHON stressed the significance of education and training in the liberal arts. They also proposed several reforms that influenced German schools and universities, including public education for all children.

JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791), the founder of METHODISM, supported several educational and charitable institutions for children and established his own schools. The goal of education, for Wesley, was to join knowledge with piety and to help children to know and to love God and to serve others. Wesley was concerned for all children, including the poor. In his schools he therefore mixed students from different socioeconomic backgrounds. He also offered food, clothing, and medical and financial support to poor families. His attention to the poor inspired Methodists from that time to today to care for the poor and to establish a number of institutions and initiatives to serve them.

Wesley’s reforms follow a general trend in eighteenth century Europe and North America toward greater attention to children’s emotional, physical, and intellectual welfare. Although childhood was certainly not “discovered” in the eighteenth century, as some have claimed, during this period several movements both inside and outside the church initiated social and educational reforms on behalf of children. Orphanages and schools were built. The Sunday School movement flourished. Publishers marketed a host of children's literature and Bibles. States adopted new child labor and welfare laws. More attention was given to the developmental importance of children's play, which was linked to a burgeoning toy industry. Aspects of this general shift in approaches to children were informed by the ideas of the French philosopher, JeanJacques Rousseau (1712–1778), who believed that children are naturally innocent and can learn through play and that negative social influences can spoil their natural goodness.

Despite many positive initiatives on behalf of children, the church throughout its history has not consistently cared for the needs of children or treated them with respect and dignity. For example, the history of boarding schools for NATIVE AMERICAN children in CANADA reveals disturbing accounts of child abuse and neglect by both Catholics and Protestants. In this case, the state also played a role in establishing the schools. Much more scholarly research needs to be pursued to provide an adequate account of conceptions of childhood and the treatment of children in the history of Christianity and in diverse communities of faith around the world today. This kind of research requires the exploration of a range of issues, including theological statements regarding children, the legal status of children, educational policies, family structures, literary and artistic representations of childhood, the material culture of childhood, and the treatment of children. Most difficult to uncover in any research regarding children are the experiences and ideas of children themselves.

Ethical and Theological Concerns

Children today continue to face numerous challenges in many countries, and Protestant communities of faith are working to address these concerns. Although one might argue about whether the overall situation of children is “better” or “worse” than in the past, most people agree that children today face real and serious problems that need to be addressed. Several studies and reports have outlined in detail the kinds of problems experienced by children and young people around the world, such as poverty, abuse, neglect, malnutrition, inadequate educational opportunities, teenage pregnancy, drug and alcohol abuse, suicide, and depression. Protestant communities of faith today are responding to the needs of children in a variety of ways. Many have established day care centers and after-school programs. Most traditions offer religious education programs for children. Churches have also tried to incorporate children more fully into the worship service. Furthermore, a number of churches are serving poor children and families and are working to change economic and social policies that negatively affect the lives of children.

Although communities of faith offer these and other kinds of services to children and their families, there is little serious theological and ethical reflection by either contemporary Protestant or Catholic theologians on childhood, children, and obligations to children. Although theologians have highly developed teachings on other issues, such as ABORTION, women's ordination (see WOMEN CLERGY), biblical AUTHORITY, and economic justice, they have not offered welldeveloped and historically and biblically informed teachings about children. Certainly, issues regarding children have sometimes been addressed in theological reflection on the family. However, little is said beyond encouraging parents to teach children the faith and to help the poor. Contemporary systematic theologians and ethicists have generally viewed issues regarding children as “beneath” the serious theologian, and have left attention to children primarily to those in the areas of religious education and pastoral care. Perhaps as literature regarding children develops in a range of disciplines outside theology, children and childhood will play a more significant role in the way that systematic theologians and ethicists think about central theological themes, such as the human condition, the nature of faith, the task of the church, and the nature of religion. They will also perhaps devote more attention to a number of significant ethical issues affecting children, such as children’s rights, the moral and spiritual development of children, the responsibilities of parents, and the obligations of church and state to children.

See also Baptism; Confirmation; Education Overview; Family

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Herbert, and Susan B.W.Johnson. Regarding Children: A New Respect for Childhood and Families. Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994.
- Ariès, Philippe. Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life. Translated by Robert Baldick. New York: Vintage Books, 1962.
- Bunge, Marcia J., ed. The Child in Christian Thought. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2001.
- Cunningham, Hugh. Children and Childhood in Western Society since 1500. New York: Longman Publishing, 1995. “Gottes Kinder.” In Jahrbuch für Biblische Theologie. vol. 17 (Special issue: 2002).
- Greven, Philip J., Jr. The Protestant Temperament: Patterns of Child-Rearing, Religious Experience, and the Self in Early America. New York: Alfred A.Knopf, 1977.
- Hawes, Joseph M., and N.Ray Hiner, eds. Children in Historical and Comparative Perspective: An International Handbook and Research Guide. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Ozment, Steven. The Loving Family in Old Europe. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Whitmore, Todd David, with Tobias Winright. “Children: An Undeveloped Theme in Catholic Teaching.” In The Challenge of Global Stewardship: Roman Catholic Responses, edited by Maura A. Ryan and Todd David Whitmore, 161–185. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1997.
- Wood, Diana. “The Church and Childhood.” In Studies in Church History, vol. 31. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers, 1994.
- MARCIA J.BUNGE

CHILIASM

Chiliasm refers to the belief in a literal one thousand year rule of the saints at the close of history, particularly where it inspires an altered approach to the present age. Based on the Greek word for 1,000, chiliasm thus bears close resemblance to the movements known as millenarian or millennialist, based on the equivalent Latin word. The distinction between the usage of these terms is understood in different ways by different scholars, but loosely chiliasm is regarded as the belief in the millennium, widely held within general Christian opinion, whereas millennialism refers specifically to separatist sectarian movements.

That chiliast views were widely held in the early church is now generally acknowledged. Some scholars have suggested that first-century Christians expected Christ to return within their lifetime. Chiliast beliefs were suggested by the Book of Revelation, which implied that there would be a future period when Satan would be bound and the CHURCH would flourish. This led to the view that the initiation of the millennium would come only after the appearance of the ANTICHRIST. Augustine's City of God emphatically rejected this view. What was later called the postmillennial interpretation came to view the millennium as a description of the latter and triumphant part of church history, which would be followed by the return of Christ and the day of judgment.

Chiliast views seem to have been an important influence on early Protestant thought. Identifying the popes as the Antichrist, Protestant reformers expected a crisis before the appearance of the millennium. MARTIN LUTHER went partway along this path in his view that the Roman Catholic church was the harlot of the Book of Revelation and the pope of his day the Antichrist. JOHN FOXE'S immensely influential Book of Martyrs (see ACTS AND MONUMENTS) subscribed to a chiliast interpretation of the Marian martyrs who died under the reign of Queen Mary, and as a result identified Elizabethan England as the "elect nation," localizing the millennium in a manner not dissimilar to the nineteenth-century Mormons. The best-known advocates of this position were some of the Anabaptists in South Germany in the sixteenth century. Hans Hut and his HUTTERITES were one key group; MELCHIOR HOFMANN'S followers were another, making the "Melchiorites" an important chiliast strand within the German Reformation. Melchiorist views initially inspired the Anabaptists at Münster in the 1530s.

Such views reached their culmination with the appearance in ENGLAND during the Commonwealth period of the "Fifth Monarchy men" who proposed to launch a war against Rome to force the coming millennium. The Muggletonians and some of the early Quakers were some of those among the Fifth Monarchy men.

Yet the chiliast position never received widespread support. Calvinists in particular abominated chiliasm, dismissing it as a childish fantasy. Establishment Protestants in general were uneasy about the potential that such views would unsettle attitudes toward the state church. Yet the chiliast position was able to claim some scholarly support, notably in the writings of the Lutheran seventeenth-century scholar, J.H. Alsted in his Diatrise de Mille Apocalypticis (1627). This work staunchly advocated a future millennium in which the church will experience an unfamiliar epoch of blessing. This work, translated into English as The Beloved City in 1643, deeply influenced religious thinking during the Commonwealth. Joseph Mede was a reader of Alsted, and in his Clavis Apocalyptica (1642) he saw the Book of Revelation as explaining the crises of history up to the REFORMATION and beyond. He expected historical events that would complete the outpouring of the vials described in Revelation before the coming judgment. HENRY MORE, one of the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS, was profoundly influenced by his reading of the last book of the Bible. In a different way Sir ISAAC NEWTON defended such a view, according to recent scholarship. Chiliasm was maintained even in the untroubled circumstances of the eighteenth century by the English scholar, bishop Thomas Newton, in his Dissertation on the Prophecies (1754) and by the Pietist German expositor, JOHANN ALBRECHT BENGEL.

Such millennialism did not, of course, need to emphasize the preceding time of tribulation. Postmillennialists could be chiliasts too. Some of the early evangelicals, including JONATHAN EDWARDS, believed that revival would bring about the millennium. This was a key to the argument of his Humble Attempt to promote Agreement...for Revival and the Advancement of the Kingdom of God (1748). A similar approach was a factor in the development of the missionary movement in the late eighteenth century. WILLIAM CAREY interpreted scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to explain a great day of Christian domination coming to the world. Confident expectation of the blessings of the “latter days” inspired a fresh missionary vision.

A new form of chiliasm, known as premillennialism, developed in the nineteenth century through the advocacy of J. Hatley Frere, who in 1813 published his interpretation of Napoleon as the Antichrist who would shortly trigger the tribulation that preceded the millennium. Such views were taken up by a number of extremists, among them HENRY DRUMMOND, the Evangelical Anglican; EDWARD IRVING, the prominent Scottish minister in London and founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church; and JOHN NELSON DARBY who seceded from the Anglican Church of Ireland to form the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. The premillennial position gained strong support within the conservative wings of the established churches. This was even more the case in North America, where the pre-millennial view was almost universally embraced by fundamentalist Protestants from the late 19th century onward. Evangelical Anglicans, notably Henry Venn, J.C. Ryle, and Lord Ashley, for this reason supported the evangelization of the Jews and the Jerusalem bishopric, which was shared with the Prussian Lutheran Church.

Study of this topic has often been distorted with fascination with millenarian sects. For all its rich and fascinating dimensions, Norman Cohn’s famous book, The Pursuit of the Millennium, explores chiliasm with an assumption that believers were necessarily psychologically disordered. Anthropologists and sociologists have used the concept in a loose sense to explain religious adaptations to changing social conditions. However, chiliasm needs to be seen first as a theological position, albeit one with powerful social and cultural appeal in troubled times.

See also Anabaptism; Devil; Friends, Society of; Millenarians and Millennialism; Mormonism

References and Further Reading

- Capp, Bernard. The Fifth Monarchy Men: a Study in Seventeenth-century English Millenarianism. London: Faber, 1972.
- Cohn, Norman. The Pursuit of the Millennium. 3d edition, London: Granada Publishing, 1970.
- Firth, Katherine R. The Apocalyptic Tradition in Reformation Britain 1530–1645. London: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Haller, William. Foxe’s Book of Martyrs and the Elect Nation. London: Jonathan Cape, 1963.
- Hempton, D.N. “Evangelicalism and Eschatology.” Journal of Ecclesiastical History 31 no. 3 (1980): 179–194.

- Hillerbrand, Hans J., ed. Radical Tendencies in the Reformation: Divergent Perspectives, Sixteenth Century Essays & Studies. vol. IX. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1988.
- O'Leary, Stephen. Arguing the Apocalypse: A Theory of Millennial Rhetoric. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Oliver, W.H. Prophets and Millennialists: The Uses of Biblical Prophecy in England from the 1790s to the 1840s. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Toon, Peter, ed. Puritans, the Millennium and the Future of Israel: Puritan Eschatology, 1600 to 1660: a Collection of Essays. Cambridge, UK: James Clarke, 1970.
- Wilson, Bryan R. Magic and the Millennium. London: Heinemann, 1973.

PETER LINEHAM

CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM (1602–1644)

English theologian. Chillingworth was the son of a mayor of Oxford, England and godson of WILLIAM LAUD (1573–1645), archbishop of Canterbury. In 1618 he became a scholar and in 1628 a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, where he had earned a reputation as a learned and tenacious debater. In 1630 he made a celebrated conversion to Roman Catholicism and spent some months in Douai, France, the town that was the center of English Catholics; he then returned to Oxford and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1631, eventually subscribing with reservations to the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES and receiving a living in the church. During the 1630s he stayed at the country estate of Lucius Cary, Second Viscount Falkland, Great Tew near Oxford, where he became respected as the most important theologian of the Great Tew circle, and wrote his single major work, The Religion of Protestants, A Safe Way to Salvation (1638). A moderate royalist, he served as chaplain and military engineer during the early battles of the CIVIL WARS, was captured, and died at Chichester of disease contracted while a prisoner. He was badgered by his Presbyterian jailer/ chaplain for his Arminian theology (see ARMINIANISM) and was accused of Socinianism. During the restoration, his works were reprinted and respected by those who led the latitudinarian church (see LATITUDINARIANISM), and by thinkers such as JOHN LOCKE.

The Religion of Protestants is a work of controversy in response to the Jesuit, Edward Knott, and in defense of an Oxford colleague, Christopher Potter. Chillingworth attempted to chart a path between the Roman Catholic claim to infallibility, Laudian authority based on administration of the SACRAMENTS, and the constricting of Reformed doctrine at Dordt. To do this he appealed to the BIBLE as the religion of Protestants, as the source of teaching for the way of life of Christians, and as the source for doctrine that must be believed for salvation. He was concerned with the breakup of Christendom into multiple contending churches and polities, with multiple interpretations of scripture and doctrines, and the potential violence of prophetic and millenarian teaching (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM). Scripture requires interpretation that must rely on reason, he argued; some of its difficult, if not contradictory passages, must be interpreted through those that are simpler and plainer.

TRADITION only partly supplies a resource, given that the Church Fathers disagreed with each other, as did the Councils, and the reformers of the sixteenth century. He outlined only tentatively where those simple, clear statements of belief and a universal tradition might be found.

His conversion to the Roman Catholic church was in part motivated by a search for an infallible religious authority, although he was disappointed not to find within the intellectual circles of Catholicism tolerance and room for a reasoned and skeptical theology. He argued that desire for infallibility does not require that there exist such an AUTHORITY. The best one can hope for are probable arguments, and this requires tolerance and charity in religious belief and ongoing debate as the method of theological development. We might be required to believe in mysteries, in articles of faith beyond reason, but not against it. Religious commitments and assent must be freely given; this is a moral necessity that God allows for. To assume otherwise would be to believe in a God who is not good. There is no infallible authority, and when someone or an institution claims it, it becomes a tyranny that destroys a person's moral responsibility and sensibility. Sufficiency, not certainty, is provided by the Bible, our use of reason in interpreting it, and the witness of tradition and the church.

Chillingworth did not always reveal his sources, and he used them for his own purposes. He was in touch with the humanist tradition exemplified by Erasmus, though in the more Tacitean (skeptical and stoical) form of later Humanism, rather than the Ciceronian form of the earlier Renaissance. He quoted the theologian RICHARD HOOKER (1554–1600), although his argument does not have the breadth of Hooker's understanding of reason, scripture, and tradition. His use of reason was less constructive and more critical than that of Hooker, and than that of the Cambridge Platonists, who shared with him an appeal to reason and toleration. He was deeply influenced by skepticism and by Hugo Grotius, who was discussed at Great Tew, although there is debate about the extent of Grotian influence in Chillingworth's writings. He was part of the Arminian movement in the Church of England, with Falkland, LANCELOT ANDREWES, JEREMY TAYLOR, and Laud. In the seventeenth century, the accusation of Socinian sympathies might be directed at reliance on reason in religious understanding, or for an adoption of Arianism and Unitarianism. Regarding the former, the label is justified, although Chillingworth did not limit religion solely under the authority of reason. Regarding Arianism, he left the question open, which did not comfort his critics.

Chillingworth's writings were collected and reprinted during the restoration, and portraits of him and the Great Tew circle were written by Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, in his Life. His work has been criticized for its repetitiveness, digressions, and organization, which follows the arguments of his opponents. However, the fullness of his quotation of them and his thoroughness in response provide a balanced and complete compendium of the issues he faced, and the method of controversy in his day. He reveals himself in these writings as a well-read, fair, and balanced controversialist. THOMAS HOBBS noted that sometimes he criticized his friends as well as his opponents. His theological construction was not, and could not be, final. It flowed from historical circumstances that were dangerous and eventually issued in bloodshed. He raised and formulated issues and responses that have remained with the Protestant tradition to the present. He is frequently discussed in histories and theologies of biblical interpretation and ecclesiology today, and is sometimes noted as an example of the plain style in preaching.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Chillingworth, William. The Works of William Chillingworth. 10th ed. 1742; reissued in a three-volume English edition of 1838, and a single volume American editor. Brooklyn, NY: AMS Press, 1844.

Secondary Sources:

“Chillingworth, William.” In J.A.Garraty et al., eds. The Dictionary of National Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999.

Cragg, Gerald R. Freedom and Authority: A Study of English Thought in the Early Seventeenth Century. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975.

Orr, Robert R. Reason and Authority: The Thought of William Chillingworth. Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1967.

Trevor-Roper, Hugh. Catholics, Anglicans and Puritans: Seventeenth Century Essays. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988.

Weber, Kurt. Lucius Cary, Second Viscount Falkland. New York: Columbia University Press, 1940.

STEPHEN VARVIS

CHILUBA, FREDERICK (1943–)

Protestant president of Zambia. Born 1943 in Kitwe, Chiluba became chairman of the Zambian Congress of Trades Unions, leading it into opposition to Kaunda's one-party state. He was imprisoned in 1981. With redemocratization, he became the opposition presidential candidate. His victory seemed to symbolize a new democratic era for AFRICA.

Soon, however, Chiluba was perceived as reintroducing authoritarianism (persecution of opposition leaders, HUMAN RIGHTS abuses, alteration of the constitution to guarantee reelection in 1996), and practicing corruption. The economy declined. In 2001 he attempted an unconstitutional third term, but foundered on resistance from inside and outside Zambia.

In politics Chiluba gave visibility to his FAITH. Raised in the United Church of Zambia, he had a “born-again” experience in prison. Close to charismatic groups, he received prophecies that he would be president. After victory he had the State House “cleansed” of evil spirits, organized an “anointing” modeled on that of King David, and then declared Zambia “a Christian nation.” The declaration was included in the 1996 constitution, despite opposition from Catholic bishops and the Christian Council, and ambiguous reactions from evangelicals. Some pastors gained cabinet appointments, and churches that supported him received benefits, although some church leaders were disappointed that all government posts were not occupied by “born-again” and that other religious measures were not taken. However, other evangelical leaders were critical of the “Christian nation” declaration, on principle or because scorn for government extended to them. Eventually Chiluba lost much church support with his third-term bid.

See also Evangelicalism; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism

References and Further Reading

Freston, Paul. Evangelicals and Politics in Asia, Africa and Latin America. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Gifford, Paul. African Christianity: Its Public Role. London: Hurst, 1998.

Phiri, Isabel. “Zambia: Christian Nation and Democracy.” In a forthcoming book, edited by T.Ranger.

PAUL FRESTON

CHINA

Whereas Chinese Catholicism dates continuously back to the late 1500s, Protestantism came to China less than 200 years ago. On the surface, the first century and a half of the Protestant scene was dominated by the foreign missionary presence, but in fact a Chinese church was growing strong roots at the same time. Since 1950, Chinese Christians have survived restrictions and persecution under COMMUNISM, and since the late 1970s, the Protestant community has grown at an exponential rate. Protestantism is also well established in Taiwan and in overseas Chinese communities around the world.

Protestant Beginnings, 1807–1860

From the arrival in 1807 of the first Protestant missionary, Robert Morrison (1782–1834) of the London Missionary Society, the first generation of China missionaries labored under severe restrictions of residence and movement on the fringes of China, alternating their activities between Guangzhou (Canton), Macao, and the Chinese communities of Southeast Asia. Christianity was still prohibited in China, as it had been since the early 1700s, and Chinese converts to Protestantism were very few. The Manchu-ruled Chinese imperial state, as well as the native Chinese scholar-elite class, considered Christianity to be a dangerous and subversive sect.

The prospects for Protestant evangelism in China seemed to brighten considerably after China’s defeat by Britain in the Opium War of 1839–1842 and the resulting “unequal treaties” between China and the Western nations, led by the British. This new framework of China's intercourse with the West, in addition to granting extraterritoriality and expanded residence in five coastal cities for foreigners, also lifted the prohibition on Christianity. At the same time it tied Christianity closely to the imperialist treaty system, establishing a linkage between Christianity and Western military and diplomatic rights in China that lasted until the mid-twentieth century. Through the 1840s and 1850s, Protestantism grew slowly in and around the five port cities permitted to foreign residence; the number of missionaries remained well under 100. In the meantime, after 1850, central China was convulsed by the throes of the Christian-inspired Taiping Rebellion (1851–1864), one of the largest and most destructive civil wars in world history. There were many reasons for the emergence of the Taipings and their quixotic leader Hong Xiuquan, who on the basis of spotty exposure to Protestantism believed himself to be the younger brother of Jesus, and it is highly debatable whether the movement was truly Christian (foreign missionaries for the most part considered it rank heresy). But the Chinese government and the nation's elite class certainly viewed it as Christian, considering it to be confirmation of their suspicions that Christianity meant subversion and rebellion. The efforts and image of Protestant as well as Catholic missions for decades in the late nineteenth century were hampered by Chinese memories of the Taipings, although the foreign missionaries were only dimly aware of this liability.

In the two decades before 1860, we can detect theseeds of an indigenous Chinese Protestantism. Because foreign missionaries could not go beyond the five authorized port cities, Bibles and other literature were carried into the interior by colporteurs and Chinese evangelists, who often worked quite autonomously. Karl Friedrich August Gutzlaff (1803–1851), a flamboyant and controversial independent Prussian missionary, organized the Chinese Union in the 1840s and sent many such Chinese agents into south China. The scheme collapsed with Gutzlaff's death, but many decades later the independent agency of Chinese Christians was revived.

Expansion and Institution Building, 1860–1905

Another round of wars with the West and new sets of treaties in 1858–1860 created the final elements of the system defining China's relations with the West until the 1940s. As in 1842, diplomatic terms dictated by the victors defined the nature of the Protestant presence in China. For Christian missions, including Protestants and Catholics alike, the key element of these treaties was the provision that missionaries could now travel anywhere in China and could buy property and erect buildings outside the designated coastal and riverine "treaty port" cities. This opened the floodgates to the spread of Christian evangelism and institutions throughout the entire Chinese empire, although the increases in Chinese Protestant converts remained modest.

The four decades after 1860 witnessed a remarkable spurt of Protestant missionary activism and institutional development. Mission outposts spread to every province and even to distant hinterlands. The number of Protestant missionaries soared from barely more than 100 in 1860 to almost 3,500 in 1905. They were products of increasingly professionalized mission societies at home in Europe and North America, motivated by the high confidence of the Victorian era that the gospel to be preached in fulfillment of the Great Commission included not only Christianity, but also the basics of Western civilization. The number of Protestant mission societies represented in China grew to several dozen by 1900, and China became the major focus of many mission societies' endeavors, with extensive publicity and often romantic depictions of events and claimed successes. In 1905 the nondenominational CHINA INLAND MISSION (CIM), originally British but increasingly international, had more than 800 missionaries in China, almost three times the next largest group, the British Church Missionary Society. The only American group with more than 200 missionaries was the Methodists (see METHODISM, GLOBAL; PRESBYTERIANISM); the Presbyterians were the next-largest denomination. Single women, not permitted on the field in the early 1800s, came to constitute a significant portion of the Protestant missionary force.

This was a generation of high achievers and strong personalities among Protestant missionaries in China. Several served well over a half-century, including Hudson Taylor of the CIM, Griffith John of the London Missionary Society, U.S. Presbyterian Hunter Corbett, Chauncey Goodrich of the American Board, and others. Many were indefatigable institution builders. Under their direction, coordinated from mission headquarters in the coastal cities, mission compounds arose in hundreds of locations, usually complete with residences, a hospital or dispensary, and a school. Preaching chapels manned by Chinese evangelists were established in thousands more towns and villages. Protestant missionaries also threw themselves into the translation and publication of Christian literature, as well as secular works on science, geography, and other subjects. An imposing edifice of institutions, constituting a substantial investment of human and financial resources, was in place by the early 1900s. The missionary school system is representative. In 1906 there were 57,000 students in more than 2,500 Protestant schools, with the larger denominations having a hierarchy culminating in secondary schools and with fledgling "colleges" that later in the twentieth century would become important institutions of modern higher education in China. By the early 1900s, more and more missionaries were coming to the China field as professionals, to serve as educators in the mission schools or elsewhere in the institutional structures of the mission, not as evangelists.

Despite the growing size and complexity of the Protestant establishment by 1900, and differences of opinion among individuals and groups, the essential unity of the missionary "force" was clearly visible in the large nationwide conferences of 1877, 1890, and 1907, the records of which still make useful reading today. No mission society in China failed to attend these conferences.

In Protestant missionary reports and literature of the late 1800s, the foreign missionary took center stage. For example, the nationwide Shanghai conference of 1907, with 1,100 delegates, included fewer than 10 Chinese. But Chinese collaboration and assistance in the Protestant mission effort was absolutely crucial, even in these decades when the Chinese did not figure prominently in the formal record. Protestantism was a joint Sino-foreign partnership from the earliest stage. Chinese colleagues played key roles in religious activities as preachers and translators, and they staffed the thousands of mission stations with no resident missionaries. Chinese personnel also staffed the schools, hospitals, and publishing houses supervised by Protestant missionaries, and in many cases they shared top decision-making roles; all in all, they did most of the real work of the mission. This emergence of a cadre of Chinese institutional personnel points to the fact that by the turn of the century, a number of Chinese, especially in the coastal cities, had found in Protestantism not only a religious faith, but also an avenue of upward mobility, from an education in the mission schools to careers in mission institutions. This group of educated urban converts would become even more important later in the twentieth century. Other groups of converts, typically in more rural areas, originally entered the church for reasons of social solidarity within an ethnic or clan community in a context of competition for local resources. Still other converts were attracted by clearly religious factors, finding a faith that to some resonated with traditional Chinese popular religion.

Protestant foundations were thus firmly laid by 1900, although the number of Chinese converts was still small; in 1905 there were about 250,000 Protestants. This indicates the continued resistance of Chinese society, especially the elite class, to Christianity in the last part of the nineteenth century. Indeed, the same years that saw the steady expansion of mission operations were consistently punctuated with acts of violent resistance to missionaries' arrival and continued presence in many communities. This resistance was often led by the local elite (or "gentry class"), to whose local cultural, social, and political hegemony the missionaries posed a profound threat by their privileged status and access to officialdom under the treaty system. Although some segments of the rural population were attracted to Protestantism, as noted earlier, the elite class and the most conservative elements of the imperial court in Beijing remained basically anti-Christian and more broadly anti-foreign. These sentiments erupted in the dramatic events of 1900 known as the Boxer Uprising, in which hundreds of foreigners, almost all of them missionaries, and perhaps 30,000 Chinese Christians were killed. This was a discouraging time for the Christian movement in China.

The Golden Age of Missions and the Sino-Foreign Protestant Establishment, 1905–1925

Ironically, the tragic events of the Boxer violence and the national humiliation that China suffered in the foreign military retribution that followed ushered in an age of rapid growth and respectability for Protestants. Obscurantist resistance to reform having proven disastrous, the Qing dynastic government embarked on an ambitious reform program during the decade after 1900. This included abolition of the old examination system and promotion of modern education, which put the mission schools temporarily in the vanguard of the quest for modernity and vastly increased their popularity. In education and other areas of institutional reform, including political constitutionalism, foreign missionaries and Chinese Protestants alike had a new status and reputation, which carried well into the 1920s.

On the surface, the Protestant movement went from one success to another during these two decades. When revolution toppled the Qing dynasty in 1911–1912, a Christian, Sun Yat-sen (1866–1925), became the first president of the new Republic of China. The number of Protestant missionaries increased rapidly, reaching 8,000 in 1925, and the number of Protestant converts reached a half million by then as well. In North America, the Student Volunteer Movement directed a stream of idealistic college graduates to Protestant work in China, where they staffed the rapidly expanding network of YMCAs and YWCAs (see YMCA/YWCA) and taught in the growing number of Christian colleges strategically placed in major cities. There were 13 such colleges, most of them union efforts of several Protestant denominations, with 3,500 students in 1925. They crowned a Protestant educational system, which by the mid-1920s had 250,000 students. During these decades, the Protestant school system and other church-related institutions remained the foremost area in Chinese society where Chinese girls and women could receive a modern education, including college-level work, and also develop their own careers (in, e.g., teaching, medicine, and social work) and personal autonomy. Protestantism seemed for a time both modern and progressive. Just before World War I, JOHN MOTT and Sherwood Eddy made remarkably successful evangelistic tours of China, speaking to packed houses of mainly young urban middle-class Chinese, many of whom responded favorably.

The worlds of both the missionaries and Chinese Protestants were changing early in the twentieth century. The impressive increase in foreign missionaries came largely from the proliferation of new, small, often nondenominational faith missions and many independents who differed from the established missionary pattern. Theologically, many of these were at the fringes of the traditional evangelical consensus that had characterized Protestants until the early 1900s. SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS, Holiness groups (see HOLINESS MOVEMENT), and Pentecostals all stretched the Protestant spectrum, and fast-growing established conservative missions, such as the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE and of course the CIM, weighted that spectrum much more toward the conservative/fundamentalist pole. Seemingly inevitably, in retrospect, the Chinese Protestant missionary community was sorely riven in the 1920s by the acrimonious fundamentalist-modernist controversy; indeed, protest against the perception of “MODERNISM” on the China mission field was one of the opening salvos of the great controversy.

These two decades were of crucial importance for the Chinese Protestant community, as it developed its own leaders and began to mark out its priorities more independently of (yet for the most part in continued cooperation with) foreign missionaries. The term “Sino-foreign Protestant establishment” is meant to convey this much more visible collaboration between missions and Chinese Protestant leaders. Its socioeconomic foundation was in the continued development of well-educated and moderately prosperous Chinese Protestant communities in several coastal cities. In Fuzhou on the southeast coast, for example, Chinese Protestant leaders not only emerged more as partners and less as subordinates of foreign missionaries in church affairs, but also responded to the national issues of the day by becoming active in politics and social reform issues quite independently of the church.

The new Sino-foreign partnership seemed apparent in the big 1922 National Christian Conference, the first since the Centennial Conference of 1907, which had had such a paltry representation of Chinese. In contrast, the 1922 conference had a majority of Chinese members, as did its institutional follow-up, the National Christian Council, which was formed in 1924 as an ecumenical coordinating body among Protestants. These representatives, and the ordained and lay Chinese leaders of many of the individual denominations, constituted a new generation of Chinese Protestant leaders. These leaders included pastors and theologians like Cheng Jingyi (1881–1939) and Zhao Zichen (1888–1979), professors at Christian colleges such as Liu Tingfang (1890–1947), respected YMCA leaders such as Yu Rizhang (David Yui, 1882–1936), and Protestant doctors, lawyers, and businessmen. They were highly respected and were in many ways almost equal partners with the foreign missionaries. The latter, however, tended to retain practical control, mainly through their continuing control of the finances necessary for the large institutional operations of the Protestant world in China. In retrospect, this period from the early 1900s to the mid-1920s was a missed opportunity for foreign missions to devolve real power to their Chinese colleagues within the established Protestant structures.

An unprecedented new development in these years, one that pointed to important trends for the rest of the century, was the emergence of several Chinese Christian movements that were wholly independent of foreign missions. One of these movements was the formation after 1910 of two federations of economically self-sufficient former missionary-led denominational congregations, many of them Presbyterian, in the Shanghai and Beijing areas. Others were products of the radical sectarian currents new to the twentieth century, with talented and dynamic Chinese evangelists as leaders. These included the True Jesus Church and the Jesus Family, both shaped by PENTECOSTALISM as well as by native Chinese elements, and the “Little Flock” of WATCHMAN NEE (Ni Tuosheng, 1903–1972), with Brethren (see BRETHREN, CHURCH OF THE) and Holiness inputs. These movements were all still quite small in the 1920s.

The Multiple Crises of Chinese Protestantism, 1925–1950

If the first quarter of the twentieth century was basically an optimistic time for Protestantism in China, the second quarter was a time of trauma and uncertainty. As powerful new nationalistic political forces began to target Christianity as part of the imperialist presence in China that needed to be demolished, a beleaguered mood settled on Protestants, one which in many ways was not lifted until the late 1970s.

This reversal occurred with striking rapidity. After the patriotic May Fourth Movement of 1919, and the ensuing rise of the Guomindang (Nationalist) Party and the Chinese Communist Party, by the mid-1920s Christianity was on the defensive. The continuing foreign missionary domination of many aspects of the Protestant movement made it hard for Chinese participants in the Sino-foreign Protestant establishment to rebut the charge of cultural imperialism brought against Christianity. Indeed, it put Chinese Protestant leaders in an untenable position, caught between loyalty to their foreign colleagues and their own patriotic instincts. Much of the self-confidence of the missionaries was eroded by the violence of the nationalistic forces in the civil warfare of 1926–1927, when almost all of the foreign-missionaries fled interior China to the coast, or left China altogether. Never again would foreign missionary numbers ever approach the level of the mid-1920s. This did result in greater responsibility for Chinese Christians to take over local work, but it put the Sino-foreign sector of Protestantism even more on the defensive.

By the early 1930s, most missionaries had returned to their posts; the most virulently anti-Christian political element, the Communists, had been suppressed; and Chiang Kai-shek, paramount leader of the Guomindang and of the new Nationalist government at Nanjing, had married into a prominent Chinese Protestant family (the Sung family) and had been baptized. But these positive trends were swamped by the double blow of the decimation of China mission budgets by the Great Depression and the issuance in 1933 of the Laymen's Report on Foreign Missions under William Ernest Hocking, which, by questioning many of the traditional assumptions of the whole foreign missions enterprise, further sapped the morale of many missionaries. To add further liabilities to the Protestant movement, civil war between Nationalists and Communists resumed in the early 1930s, and then rising tension between China and JAPAN overrode that civil conflict with full-scale war as Japan launched its devastating invasion of China in 1937, plunging China into eight years of desperate warfare that ended only with the conclusion of the Pacific War in 1945. The Chinese pillars of the denominational and Sino-foreign Protestant sectors tended to be liberal and pacifist in their stance, and, although quite patriotic, they were not in the forefront of any national political movement, including the movement to fight back against Japan, in the 1930s and wartime years.

Thus Protestants in effect retreated yet further from leadership on the central national issues that China seemed to be facing after the 1920s. Communists had the social revolution issue, the Nationalists had (until 1945) the card of patriotic resistance to Japan, and Chinese Protestants were figuratively out in the cold, with their ally, the foreign missionary establishment, both materially weakened and a political liability in the sense that a continuing large foreign role in the Chinese church was offensive to Chinese nationalism. This was true despite the fact that many foreign missionaries stood bravely with the Chinese people in the first stages of the war with Japan from 1937 to 1941, and some continued to make great sacrifices to serve in unoccupied areas throughout the wartime years, whereas others were interned by the Japanese under harsh conditions in civilian concentration camps from 1942 to 1945. Despite the foreign contribution, however, the age of foreign leadership, or even partnership, was gone.

Of course, some Chinese Protestant groups did not have the liability of foreign connections. Thus, those Protestant movements whose beginnings were barely noted earlier in this article grew steadily in these decades of national turmoil. These movements now included not only the organized networks of congregations in the True Jesus Church, the Jesus Family, and the "Little Flock," but also followers of several dynamic independent evangelists. All of their leaders were theological conservatives and effective revival speakers; examples include Wang Mingdao (1900–1991) and Song Shangjie (John Sung, 1901–1944). These groups avoided the burden of foreign connections, and they likewise were not bedeviled by the issue of patriotism because they avoided it, stressing repentance, personal SALVATION, miracles, and a millenarian doomsday conviction in the imminent end of this world. They attracted tens of thousands who were beset by war, political turmoil, and impossible conditions of daily life.

The story of Protestantism in the wartime years, 1937–1945, is not well known. It awaits its chronicler. What we do know is that the partial exodus of foreign missionaries after the war began in 1937, and then the total elimination of missionaries of the Allied nations after December 1941 in those parts of China occupied by the Japanese, resulted in an extended period of Chinese Christians being in charge of their own affairs in the difficult circumstances of wartime. After Japan's defeat, foreign missionaries began to return to China in 1946, but there were far fewer of them than in the prewar era. As Protestant missions and denominational Chinese leaders grappled with the task of rehabilitating and rebuilding Christian institutions, China beginning in 1946 was engulfed in civil war between the Communists and Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalists. Although some Chinese Protestant leaders such as Wu Yaozong (Y.T.Wu, 1893–1979) and Jiang Wenhan (1908–1984) were inclined favorably toward the radical social programs of the Communists, most Protestants with political opinions, including almost all missionaries, were pro-Nationalist. Many of the indigenous Pentecostal or sectarian evangelical groups avoided politics altogether and occupied themselves with the repentance and salvation of the lost. As the civil war ended in 1949 with a Communist victory, Protestants, amidst uncertainty, hoped for the best: that the new government would finally bring stability and basic social equity, and that perhaps national unity and peace might even facilitate Christian growth.

Protestants Controlled and Suppressed, 1950–1978

Chinese Protestantism in 1950 was very different from what it had been in 1900. It was much more diverse, with a whole range of independent churches and evangelical sects having joined the traditional denominational churches derived from the missionary movement. It was also much more under Chinese leadership and much more dependent on its own resources. It was still not very large, however, with about 800,000 or at most 1 million adherents, and its staying power was uncertain.

In the successes and failures of the previous halfcentury, one factor that had not influenced the course of the Protestant movement was the existence of a strong Chinese central government in control of all of society. No such government existed in those decades. Such a government—a thoroughly secular, avowed Marxist one with a pronounced antireligious bias—came into existence after 1950, of course, and heavily impacted the churches. The status of the remaining foreign missionaries, already precarious because of the Communist Party's perception of them as anti-Communist and as imperialists, was determined decisively by the Korean War in late 1950. In the anti-Western mood that then prevailed, they were all expelled, except for a handful jailed as spies. Likewise, the Korean War brought heightened suspicion of Chinese Protestants, many of whom naturally had close foreign connections. There were no moves to abolish religion or the churches; however, the impetus of the new state apparatus and the organizational network of Communist Party control created pressure to unify the Protestant movement and put it under state supervision. Humiliating orchestrated public mass denunciations of a few Chinese Protestant leaders were examples of the fate that awaited any who failed to cooperate with the new regime.

Between 1950 and 1954, a series of governmentdirected measures, implemented through a group of Protestant leaders trusted by the Party (foremost among whom was Y.T.Wu), created the structures officially defining the arena within which Protestantism would be permitted to exist. First, all Protestants were urged to sign the "Christian Manifesto," which denounced foreign imperialism and capitalism, and pledged loyalty to the new regime; about 400,000 did so. Then, all nonreligious Protestant institutions, such as schools and medical/social service facilities, were taken over by the state. Finally, parallel to what occurred with other religions, a more politically dependable Protestant organization, the Three-Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM; i.e., self-supporting, self-governing, self-propagating) was created for the purpose of interfacing between the political regime, in particular, the newly created state Religious Affairs Bureau (RAB), and all of the Protestant entities. The TSPM was “ratified” by delegates at the first National Christian Conference in 1954, at which the old National Christian Council and all of the individual denominational structures were abolished. It should be said that the abolition of old denominational distinctions was not a wholly unpopular policy. As early as 1927, the Church of Christ in China had been formed out of elements from the major mainline denominations, indicating a desire on the part of many Protestants to erase foreign-derived denominational lines. This was accomplished in the 1950s by coercion, however.

During the remainder of the 1950s, the TSPM attempted to bring all of the disparate elements of the Protestant scene under its aegis, with partial success. Some stubbornly uncooperative evangelical leaders, such as Wang Mingdao, resisted and were jailed. Other strong-willed small Protestant groups withdrew to private religious life. Remaining public churches were drastically amalgamated and reduced in number, as were SEMINARIES, and most pastors and religious personnel were put into the work force. Sermons were politicized, and church attendance steadily declined. By the 1960s, very few churches were open, and the only remaining seminary was in Nanjing, under Bishop K.H. TING (Ding Guangxun, 1915–). With the Cultural Revolution in 1966, all Protestant churches, along with all other places of religious worship or activity, were closed, and they would remain closed to Chinese believers until 1979. It was during this long period that the resilience of Chinese Protestants and the extent to which the Christian faith had become rooted in their hearts and spirits was tested. The faith survived surprisingly well in the small groups or “house churches,” where it was lodged during these years. Their decentralized pattern of local leadership served Protestants well in this situation, and actual growth occurred in some areas where the Cultural Revolution had paralyzed or destroyed the local authority structures that normally would have suppressed Christian activities.

Protestantism in Recent and Contemporary China

Protestantism returned to public visibility beginning in 1979, as part of the overall liberalization and regularization of many policy areas under the post-Mao national leadership group around Deng Xiaoping. Since then, it has achieved perhaps the most remarkable growth within the general pattern of resurgence of all religious groups and the establishment of several new ones in the past twenty years. In doing so, it has seemingly finally overcome the negative historical legacy of association with the Western presence in China and has become contextualized in Chinese society and culture.

In 1979 and 1980, the old TSPM structure was re-established to link Protestants to the RAB and the government as before, and it was complemented by a new organization, the China Christian Council (CCC), designed to deal with the internal religious affairs of the churches. Thus in many ways the system of the 1950s was rebuilt, with several of the same individuals from that era, including Bishop K.H.Ting, in the TSPM/CCC leadership. This, and continued wariness toward the authorities on the part of the autonomous Protestant groups (house churches) that were already well established by 1980, has resulted in two different tracks of Protestantism today, both growing rapidly.

There are more than 13,000 churches, tens of thousands of smaller “meeting points,” more than twenty seminaries and Bible schools, and at least 15 million believers in the government-sanctioned TSPM sector, which enjoys a certain amount of security from harassment. There are many more gatherings in the autonomous non-TSPM sector, especially in the countryside, and probably more believers as well, even though Protestants in this sector can have no formal public institutions and are vulnerable to persecution. Thus a good estimate of total Protestants in 2001 is 30–35 million, although some foreign observers think the figure is much higher. Although in some localities the lines between the two sectors are blurry, in many others they are very distinct and even antagonistic. Clearly, the government’s hope to be able to monitor all Protestant activity through the TSPM has not materialized, and it is uncertain how much longer the TSPM will retain its monopoly of officially representing the Protestant community.

Although the church is supposedly “post-denominational,” there is an immense variety of currents on the Protestant scene today. Vestiges of the old Western denominations are visible in many urban churches, and pre-1950 Chinese churches, such as the True Jesus Church and the Little Flock, still command followings. In the countryside, quasi-Christian sects that have incorporated elements of folk religion exist alongside orthodox Protestant groups. Several ethnic minority groups have undergone widespread conversion to Christianity, and a certain number of Chinese academics and intellectuals have been attracted to Protestant ideas of ETHICS and public morality, as well as (for some of them) to personal faith. All in all, although there is no organized public voice for Protestants, they constitute a dynamic force in society. Protestantism is malleable and adaptable, in localized forms appealing to many in the urban educated business-related classes as well as to the peasantry. Indeed, the size, resources, and virtually nationwide presence of the Protestant movement make it one of the most important nongovernmental entities in China today. It seems a permanent feature of the Chinese scene.

Protestantism in Greater China

There are active and firmly established Protestant movements in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Singapore, and also in the minority Chinese communities of Malaysia, INDONESIA, the PHILIPPINES, and North America. In fact, Chinese churches exist anywhere that communities of “overseas Chinese” can be found. Protestant congregational associations have proven important as a focus of Chinese identity and social networks in places where Chinese are a minority. Many collegeeducated businesspeople, entrepreneurs, and professionals in these Chinese communities, including places with a majority of Chinese (e.g., Singapore), are evangelical Protestants or Pentecostals. Chinese Protestantism, both inside and outside of China, thus seems to be taking the pattern of wider worldwide trends, stressing both salvation and pragmatic results, manifesting sectarian diversity within a context of disintegrating old denominational affiliations, showing indigenous cultural traits, and adapting well to a market economy. Insofar as it is part of that newly emerged majority of Protestants in the non-Western world, Chinese Protestantism in the twenty-first century and beyond will probably best be analyzed as part of this new center of gravity outside Europe and North America, as well as a part of the legacy of Western missions.

See also Asian Theology; Evangelicalism; Evangelism; Fundamentalism; Millenarians and Millennialism; Missions; Missionary Organizations Bible Translation; Bible Colleges and Institutions Communism

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Suzanne Wilson, and John King Fairbank, eds. Christianity in China: Early Protestant Missionary Writings. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Bays, Daniel H., ed. Christianity in China, From the Eighteenth Century to the Present. Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Brown, G.Thompson. Earthen Vessels and Transcendent Power: American Presbyterians in China, 1837–1952. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1997.
- Dunch, Ryan. Fuzhou Protestants and the Making of a Modern China, 1857–1927. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2001.
- Hersey, John. The Call: An American Missionary in China. New York: Knopf, 1985.
- Hunter, Alan, and Kim-Kwong Chan. Protestantism in Contemporary China. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Whyte, Bob. Unfinished Encounter: China and Christianity. London: Collins, 1988.
- Wickeri, Philip L. Seeking the Common Ground: Protestant Christianity, the Three-Self Movement, and China's United Front. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1988.

DANIEL H.BAYS

CHINA INLAND MISSION

The China Inland Mission (CIM) was founded in 1865 by J.HUDSON TAYLOR (1832–1905). It rapidly became the largest of the Protestant missions in China, and was a prototype for later faith missions around the world. In the early twentieth century, the CIM became a multinational voluntary association. It continues today as one of the world's largest evangelical missions agencies under the name Overseas Missionary Fellowship (OMF).

The Early CIM

Born in Yorkshire, ENGLAND, Taylor was raised a Methodist, but as a young man he joined the BRETHREN Movement (see BRETHREN, CHURCH OF THE), which stressed lay leadership. He had an early fascination with CHINA and served a term as a missionary in southeast China from 1853 to 1860. Taylor was also married in China in 1858, to Maria Dyer (1837–1870), who had been born in Penang, Malaya, of London Missionary Society parents.

Taylor had to return to England in 1860 because of poor health, but he continued to plan for the evangelization of the vast interior of China beyond the coastal cities. His sense of urgency was acute, fuelled by a premillennialist focus on rapidly evangelizing the world. He also believed that the best missionary method was the mobilization of laymen and women from various Protestant denominations as workers. In 1865 he articulated his ideas in China's Spiritual Need and Claims, and also founded the CIM. The first group of twenty-two CIM missionaries, including Hudson and Maria Taylor, went to China in 1866. From the first they were unique on the China field. Not only were they laypersons, but also they were guaranteed no salary. Thus the faith mission model was laid down.

Maria Taylor died in 1870, after bearing eight children in twelve years of marriage (all four who survived childhood became CIM missionaries). In 1871 Hudson Taylor married Jenny Faulding (1843–1904), a member of the first CIM group of 1866, who bore him three more children and played an important role in the organization both in China and back in England, including editorial work on the CIM's magazine, China's Millions.

Expansion of the CIM

Besides the use of laypersons and the faith principle in finances, the CIM was also innovative in its extensive use of single WOMEN and in requiring its members to wear Chinese dress (while at the same time after the late 1870s insulating mission children from Chinese society at its own boarding school). In the 1880s, as the CIM expanded rapidly and extended its recruitment to North America and AUSTRALIA as well as to continental European evangelical groups, an important strategic decision moved the administrative headquarters of the mission from London to China itself. The CIM was then operated for decades by its China Committee in Shanghai. The China Committee in turn was dominated by a strong leader; Taylor himself was general director of the CIM until 1901, when Dixon E. Hoste (1861–1946) succeeded him and served until the 1930s.

Hoste was one of the famed "Cambridge Seven" of 1885, emblematic of the extension of the recruiting attraction of the CIM beyond the British lower-middle class to higher levels of society. Much of the success in building an attractive public image for the CIM derived not only from Hudson Taylor's own charisma, but also from the organizational genius and extensive personal networking of Benjamin Broomhall (1829–1911), who directed CIM operations in London. Broomhall married Amelia Taylor, Hudson's sister, in 1859; of their ten children, five became CIM missionaries. He became general secretary of the CIM in 1878 and served until 1895. He also edited China's Millions and overall did much to make the CIM a respected and leading component of the British evangelical establishment. Broomhall's son Marshall (1866–1937) in turn edited China's Millions, and directed the very effective CIM editorial and publishing efforts for most of the first four decades of the twentieth century.

The Twentieth Century

At the time of Taylor's death in 1905, the CIM was by far the largest Protestant mission in China, with 825 missionaries in more than 300 mission stations. Meanwhile, from the 1880s onward, the CIM exploded in growth in CANADA and the UNITED STATES. In 1889 Taylor appointed Henry W. Frost (1858–1945) as secretary-general (later home director) of the CIM for North America. Frost established a branch council in Toronto on equal footing with the London council, and in 1901 he moved the North American headquarters to Philadelphia. Frost built a sophisticated support network all through Canada and the United States and in effect engineered much of the internationalization of the CIM during the first three decades of the twentieth century. By the 1930s, North America provided one-third of the CIM missionary force of well over 1,000, as well as one-half of the total budget.

Despite its large size, however, the CIM had only a thin institutional apparatus. It had no colleges and only a few middle schools for Chinese, and only a small number of hospitals and clinics. It remained true to its primary calling of EVANGELISM. Accordingly, it attracted the great majority of its members from among conservative evangelicals and fundamentalists (see EVANGELICALISM, FUNDAMENTALISM). Thus many CIM missionaries were suspicious of social reform as a substitute for the Gospel, though some distinguished themselves in local humanitarian endeavors when faced with crises of famine or war.

The CIM still had several hundred missionaries in China in the late 1940s, despite the upheavals of the Pacific War after 1937 and the Chinese Civil War after 1945. But after the new Communist government was established in 1949, CIM missionaries, like others, were forced to leave China, and all were gone by 1953 (see COMMUNISM). In the early 1950s, the CIM adapted quickly and became the OMF, sending both its China veterans and new recruits to several other Asian countries. Today the OMF remains a leading international evangelical missions enterprise, organized in national offices in more than ten countries around the world.

See also Millenarians and Millennialists; Publishing, Media

References and Further Reading

- Austin, Alvyn J. "Blessed Adversity: Henry W. Frost and the China Inland Mission." In Earthen Vessels: American Evangelicals and Foreign Missions, 1880–1980, edited by Joel A. Carpenter and Wilbert R. Shenk. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1990. 47–70.
- "Pilgrims and Strangers: The China Inland Mission in Britain, Canada, the United States and China, 1865–1900." Ph.D. dissertation, York University, 1996.
- Broomhall, A.J. Hudson Taylor and China 's Open Century. 7 vols. Sevenoaks, UK: Hodder and Stoughton, 1981–1989.
- Taylor, Howard, and Mary Geraldine Taylor. Hudson Taylor and the China Inland Mission: The Growth of a Work of God. London: Morgan & Scott, 1919.

DANIEL H. BAYS

CHRISTADELPHIANS

The Christadelphians emerged in the mid-nineteenth century from the wing of the Restorationist movement associated with Alexander Campbell (see RESTORATIONISM). John Thomas (1782–1871), an English physician, immigrated to the UNITED STATES in 1832 and quickly became associated with Campbellite Adventism, serving for a time as editor of Campbell's early paper, the Apostolic Advocate. Moving to Richmond, Virginia, in 1835, Thomas broke from Campbell two years later because Thomas argued that persons who were members of another Christian body before accepting Restorationist belief needed to be rebaptized. Thomas began to preach his own Adventist message to a small group of followers, and in 1846 he relocated to the New York City area, then a center of Adventist expectation. Except for several preaching tours among American followers and some lengthy stays in Britain, where he successfully planted his version of the Adventist gospel, Thomas remained based in the New York area until his death.

Basic to Christadelphian belief is a lively expectation that the Second Coming of Christ is imminent. Hence, Christadelphians evidence a keen interest in biblical prophecy and a conviction that current events, correctly interpreted, correlate with biblical prophecy to signal the nearness of the end. Christadelphians thus place great emphasis on having correct knowledge of biblical prophecy, simply called "the Truth," and baptize by immersion in running water only mature persons who testify to their knowledge of this Truth (see BAPTISM).

Because much of biblical apocalyptic prophecy is grounded in the Hebrew scriptures, and because they believe that those who possess biblical truth are adopted into Israel, Christadelphians identify strongly with the nation of Israel and the Jewish tradition (see JUDAISM; PHILO-SEMITISM), looking especially to events in the Middle East for clues indicating Christ's impending return. At the same time, Christadelphians link Roman Catholicism with the false teaching of the ANTICHRIST (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

Despite reading the import of current events as indicators of Christ's imminent return, Christadelphians have remained aloof from engagement in public affairs. Refusal to bear arms has long marked Christadelphian teaching; John Thomas actually adopted the name Christadelphian ("brothers of Christ") at the time of the U.S. CIVIL WAR to secure exemption from military service for his followers. Most Christadelphians do not vote, although they acknowledge the legitimacy of civil authority.

The Christadelphians have defied the expected pattern of gradually developing denominational structures, remaining more of a stable sect. There are no CLERGY or headquarters. Local fellowships that own their own buildings refer to them by the Greek term "ecclesia" rather than "church," to signal a rejection of institutionalization. Like some other Restorationist groups, the Christadelphians have nurtured bonds among believers through an array of periodicals, locally sponsored BIBLE conferences, and weekend gatherings where men regarded as adept at communicating biblical teaching lecture to those attending. Such occasions also offer opportunities for the faithful to reinforce a common identity and to meet potential spouses. Women do not lecture at such gatherings, because Christadelphians insist that the New Testament mandates the subordinate status of women. Baptized Christadelphians are strongly encouraged to marry fellow believers.

In their sense of continuity with the Jewish tradition, keen APOCALYPTICISM, eschewing of clergy and formal structures, and desire to remain separate from a corrupt society, Christadelphians believe that they have captured the essence of New Testament Christianity of the apostolic era and replicated it in their own belief and practice.

Never attracting large numbers of Americans, Thomas had somewhat greater success gaining a following in his native ENGLAND, where the area around Birmingham has been the center of Christadelphian activity. Robert Roberts (1839–1898), an early convert to the Christadelphian message, became the unofficial leader of the movement there and also served as editor of the Christadelphian, a periodical that remains vital to the movement in Britain. In turn, Roberts also visited believers in the United States after Thomas's death. Roberts himself died in San Francisco while on a preaching tour of AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, and then North America.

Concern for the purity of the truth, however, has led to dissension in the Christadelphian ranks, with the most serious rifts emerging while Roberts was still alive. Debates arose over the nature of the resurrection and last judgment that would come after Christ's return, what Christadelphians called "resurrectional responsibility." Whereas virtually all believed that persons who died simply remained "asleep" rather than entering some eternal state at death, some argued that only those baptized into the Christadelphian truth would be resurrected for judgment, with not all being found worthy of everlasting life. Others insisted that all would be resurrected for judgment. So divisive were these debates that many local ecclesias refused to remain in fellowship with those whose perspective was different; consequently two historic statements of faith developed to reflect the differences. Over the years, additional differences have caused some ecclesias to sever fellowship with others, but none has caused as much ongoing controversy and sparked so many fruitless efforts at reunion as the debate over resurrectional responsibility.

Most American Christadelphians adhere to what is called the "Unamended Statement of Faith," which insists that only believers will be resurrected for judgment. Most British Christadelphians—and those in other English-speaking areas like Australia—accept an Amended Statement of Faith that proclaims that all humanity will face final judgment after a general resurrection.

In North America, ties among Christadelphians adhering to the Unamended Statement of Faith were cemented by Thomas Williams (1847–1913), a Welsh immigrant who traveled widely among the various local communities as an itinerant teacher and preacher (see ITINERANCY), wrote several treatises explaining Christadelphian belief and edited the Christadelphian Advocate, the primary periodical serving the Unamended community.

The lack of formal structure to the Christadelphian movement makes an accurate count of members impossible. Estimates suggest that at the beginning of the twenty-first century, probably not more than 6,000 identified with either the Amended or Unamended fellowships in North America, whereas the number in Britain was likely about three times as large. A few international missions have planted small clusters of Christadelphians in other countries, but the numbers are very small. In addition, a handful of other Adventist-oriented groups reflect the influence of Christadelphian teaching; among these are the Church of God of the Abrahamic Faith and the Megiddo Mission Church.

See also Campbell Family; Eschatology

References and Further Reading

- Lippy, Charles H. The Christadelphians in North America. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1989.
- Roberts, Robert. Dr. Thomas: His Life and Work. 3rd ed. Revised by C.C. Walker and W.H. Boulton. Birmingham, UK: The Christadelphian, 1954.
- Thomas, John. The Faith in the Last Days. Edited by John Carter. Birmingham, UK: The Christadelphian, 1965.
- Wilson, Bryan R. Sects and Society. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961.
- . Religious Sects: A Sociological Study. New York: McGraw Hill, 1970.

C.H.LIPPY

CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE

The Christian and Missionary Alliance (C&MA) is a North American-based evangelical denomination, one of the few turn-of-the-century Holiness groups that did not follow Wesleyan thought. Initially two late-nineteenth-century parachurch organizations that merged in 1897 to create a DENOMINATION emphasizing personal SANCTIFICATION and world EVANGELISM, the Christian and Missionary Alliance reflected a number of intellectual streams within the larger evangelical movement. This “evangelical ecumenism” was largely the result of its founder, Albert Benjamin Simpson (1843–1919), a Presbyterian minister who was deeply affected by KESWICK MOVEMENT doctrines of holiness that accompanied his beliefs in divine healing, Christocentric THEOLOGY, premillennialism, and global evangelism.

This ability to synthesize different aspects of evangelical Christianity and cooperate with disparate groups made the Christian and Missionary Alliance far more influential in twentieth-century EVANGELICALISM than its numbers might indicate. Although hardly a major player on the American scene, with under 200,000 members and 400,000 total adherents in 2001, the missionary spirit it has maintained has produced nearly ten times that many members globally. Working with a variety of denominations and parachurch groups, the Christian and Missionary Alliance has established a reputation for commitment to its influential “fourfold gospel” (Christ as savior, sanctifier, healer, and coming king) and dedication to the task of world evangelism.

The spiritual journey and personality of A.B. Simpson shaped the denomination’s beliefs, practices, and organization. The product of a strict Presbyterian upbringing on Prince Edward Island, CANADA, Simpson prepared for the ministry at Knox College in Toronto. Renowned for his oratory, he landed the prestigious pulpit at Knox Church in Hamilton, Ontario immediately after graduation. During his eight years there the membership rolls doubled. In 1874 he took the challenging pulpit at the Chestnut Street Presbyterian Church in Louisville, Kentucky, whose divided congregation had undergone lawsuits for control of the church soon after the American CIVIL WAR. Simpson’s liberal spirit helped heal many of the wounds left by the conflict. Despite five flourishing years there, Simpson felt called to a greater ministry, one that corresponded to what had been happening within.

Over the preceding decade Simpson had developed a growing interest in and dedication to many of the principles of the Evangelical Alliance, an English organization that sought to create a worldwide fellowship of evangelicals for cooperation. Having participated in the revivalist campaign of D.W. Whittle and PHILIP BLISS in Louisville (see REVIVALS), he saw firsthand how conversions could be affected through cooperative efforts at evangelism. Moreover Simpson had been influenced by the Reformed wing of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, particularly its emphasis on the “deeper life” or the “higher life,” as compared to the more Wesleyan ideas of perfect sanctification. Simpson sought a place of ministry where he could live out these two inner drives—evangelism and a deeper spiritual life—and found it in New York City.

As the pastor of the prestigious Thirteenth Street Church, Simpson had the attention and support of New York City’s elite Presbyterians. He launched an illustrated missionary periodical, The Gospel in All Lands, soon after his arrival in 1880, editing the publication and writing all the major articles. He also began holding meetings for the unchurched in less-desirable areas of the city. On top of that he continued the strenuous pace of his duties to his parishioners. After only one year in New York, his health collapsed. Various treatments and sabbaticals from work failed to strengthen his weak heart, and soon he suffered from deep depression.

Simpson found relief in the message of Charles Cullis, a Boston physician who preached that the BIBLE promised physical healing to believers. Hearing Cullis at the convention grounds at Old Orchard Beach, Maine, Simpson studied the issue for himself and concluded that Cullis was correct. Tied to the idea of healing, in Simpson’s mind, was the promise of a deeper Christian life that came with the empowering of the Holy Spirit, virtually a second (although ongoing) religious experience available to Christians after their initial CONVERSION experience. Simpson claimed the newfound truth for himself and set off again on his busy schedule, only now convinced that the Holy Spirit empowered him not only for great preaching but also for physical exertion far beyond what doctors suggested.

This strand of the Holiness Movement differed from Wesleyan notions and came to characterize the Christian and Missionary Alliance, the organization that grew from Simpson’s activities over the next four decades. Rather than teaching a sanctification distinguished by the eradication of SIN, the Keswick Movement—the Reformed, non-Arminian brand of Holiness—taught the suppression of sinful desires and the empowerment for service that came from the indwelling of the Holy Spirit (see ARMINIANISM). Although Simpson cooperated generously with those of the Wesleyan persuasion, and even welcomed speaking in TONGUES in Christian and Missionary Alliance congregations when it occurred in the early-twentieth century, he remained committed to the “deeper life” wing of the larger Holiness Movement.

Feeling called and empowered by God to renew his efforts in New York, Simpson sensed his support slipping within the well-heeled congregation. His new emphasis on healing brought derision from the press, and his attempts to move beyond pew rents so outsiders might be brought into the church occasioned illfeelings among influential congregants. A crisis of conscience over the issue of infant BAPTISM, which concluded in Simpson’s immersion baptism in an Italian Baptist church, proved to be the last straw.

Clearly open to sanctions by the presbytery, Simpson chose to resign the prominent pulpit to begin a new work. His final sermon there in 1881 was based on Luke 4:18: “The Spirit of the Lord is upon me because he has anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor.”

He started the Gospel Tabernacle, which he hoped would replicate the London churches of Newman Hall and CHARLES SPURGEON, “comprising thousands of members of no particular class, but of the rich and poor side by side.” Holding meetings every night and three on Sunday, Simpson and his band of workers built a dedicated congregation that kept moving to ever larger facilities. Armed with a constitution of only eight articles and five hundred words, the congregation purposefully eschewed doctrinal debates for the simple gospel of SALVATION they felt nonchurchgoers most needed.

The following decade saw an impressive array of activities as Simpson aligned himself with those who appreciated his “radical and aggressive measures.” In 1882 he started the Missionary Training Institute (now Nyack College) to prepare people for overseas evangelism. He started a new missionary magazine, The Work, The Word, and the World (later The Alliance Witness, now The Alliance Life), having sold the previous one. He created a “healing house” ministry called Berachah (Hebrew for “blessing”), where those in need of physical or spiritual healing could come for counseling during extended stays. The congregation created its own Missionary Union for the Evangelization of the World, which effectively combined into one concern the education, publication, and healing emphases of Simpson. The Union supported missionaries trained at the Tabernacle’s Institute as well as other faith missionaries who sought their support.

All of Simpson’s far-flung efforts came to a head in 1887, when directing a deeper life and missionary convention at the Old Orchard Beach campgrounds. Having made so many strides outside the usual strictures of denominational polity, Simpson and his closest colleagues determined to create two parachurch organizations that could more effectively push American Christians of all denominational stripes toward a deeper Christian life and greater interest in global evangelism. There they constituted both the Christian Alliance (which emphasized holiness and evangelism, much like the English Evangelical Alliance) and the International Missionary Alliance (which emphasized greater understanding and support for missionary activity). Both of these organizations encouraged believers to remain in their own congregations, but to attend the respective Alliance branches to learn more about the deeper Christian life or world missions and then carry those messages back to their home churches.

By 1897 it was apparent that the two organizations needed to merge. Virtually the same individuals sat on both boards and both were presided over by Simpson. The newly constituted “Christian and Missionary Alliance” did not roll off the tongue easily, but it did reflect the cooperative efforts of many toward a higher Christian life and world evangelism. Its purpose remained to educate and inspire Christians in North America in matters of spirituality and missions through a system of “branches” in urban centers of population—some 300 by 1897—to help support over 200 missionaries in a dozen countries.

Disagreements with the fledgling Pentecostal movement in the early twentieth century moved the Christian and Missionary Alliance toward a denominational structure. Because of Simpson’s emphasis on the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit, many seeking sanctification trained in his Missionary Training Institute. When glossolalia (tongues speaking) came to characterize this second experience for many, Simpson and many of his colleagues were open to the possibility. Many leaders of Alliance branches throughout the country spoke in tongues and taught, alongside other Pentecostal founders, that the experience was the sign of the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Simpson, unable to experience the gift despite years of seeking it through PRAYER, concluded that, although glossolalia was of God in many instances, it did not constitute the sign Pentecostals claimed. Rather Simpson emphasized selections in the Pauline epistles that enumerate many “gifts of the Spirit,” tongues being but one of them.

This rift between Simpson and the New York leadership and many of the branches throughout the country resulted in the loss of many Alliance branches, many of which became leading Pentecostal congregations. Consequences of this episode were significant for both sides. Pentecostals borrowed many of the Christian and Missionary Alliance’s ideas and means, including the fourfold gospel, the three-year Bible institute as the primary tool for education, many of Simpson’s hymns, and the use of the title “Gospel Tabernacle” for local congregations. The Christian and Missionary Alliance, on the other hand, sought protection from further loss of branches by reorganizing itself beginning in 1912 to place more AUTHORITY in the annual Councils. By 1930 most local branches of the Christian and Missionary Alliance operated like churches—with pastors, boards, and bylaws—but they still rejected the term.

Not until 1974 did the Christian and Missionary Alliance officially vote itself as a Protestant DENOMINATION, after years of discussion between the home and foreign departments of the organization, each of which had operated rather freely until that time. This was preceded by an attempt to write an official statement of faith. Having for eighty years eschewed doctrinal debates that might divide Christians’ attention from the purpose of world evangelism, this was no easy task. They studied a Christian and Missionary Alliance 1928 doctrinal statement written at the height of the fundamentalist-modernist battles, but this document merely attached the fourfold gospel to the nine articles of the Christian Fundamentals Association. The 1965 statement, however, attempted to go beyond that by affirming beliefs long held by the organization. The product, hammered out by leaders and LAITY, adheres closely to the historic fundamentalist doctrines (divinity of Jesus, virgin birth, ATONEMENT through Christ’s death, inerrancy of scriptures) as well as Christian and Missionary Alliance distinctives, including sanctification as “both a crisis and progressive experience” marked by the indwelling Holy Spirit “for holy living and effective service,” “the healing of the mortal body...in this present age,” the Great Commission of the Church to “preach the gospel to all nations,” and the “imminent,...personal, visible, and premillennial” return of Christ.

Trendsetters in the area of world missions among evangelicals, the Christian and Missionary Alliance has held tightly since its founding to the “indigenous church” ideal. In 1927 the annual Council adopted a policy of self-support, self-government, and self-propagation. The expectation was that Christian and Missionary Alliance missionaries would enter a country to build the initial foundation for a self-sustaining national church. At times this caused difficulties for missionaries who believed they needed to keep tighter control on the developing churches; but tough sanctions against missionaries, beginning in the mid-1950s, kept the Christian and Missionary Alliance from the charge of COLONIALISM that other evangelical missions have suffered. The goal is always to found a series of churches and schools to train pastors so that, in time, the local converts would control their own national church. The Alliance World Fellowship, created in 1975, meets every four years to renew and sustain the bonds among the various national churches around the globe—with the UNITED STATES and Canada as but two of many.

By the beginning of the twenty-first century the Christian and Missionary Alliance was enjoying two decades of record growth. During the 1990s missionaries and national workers in AFRICA reported over 400,000 conversions. Christian and Missionary Alliance national churches could be found in seventy-five countries, fiftytwo of which employed nearly 1,100 North American missionaries in hospitals, seminaries, and church-planting ministries. However, most of the work being done was by the nearly 20,000 national workers (5,000 ordained), clearly marking the success of the “indigenous church” movement the Alliance propounded. Missionaries and national workers worldwide cooperated in numerous ventures of evangelization and Christian education, including 365 weekly radio broadcasts in forty languages and dialects, and 110 full-term theological schools with nearly 10,000 students. In 2001 the Christian and Missionary Alliance reported 2.73 million inclusive members worldwide. Proof of the Christian and Missionary Alliance’s commitment to MISSIONS, the denomination’s membership in the United States virtually tied for third worldwide: both Vietnam (540,000 baptized members) and Côte d’Ivoire (256,500 baptized members) surpassed the United States (191,318), with INDONESIA (188,072 baptized members) set to overtake the States.

That is not to say that the Christian and Missionary Alliance has seen slow growth in North America. Cutting against the grain of other historic Holiness denominations in the late twentieth century, which have seen precipitous declines in membership, the Alliance has continued nearly to double each decade since 1980. Some observers believe that this growth has not come without a price. Clearly today’s congregations, dominated by those new to the movement, are less familiar with the traditional beliefs and practices of the denomination. In many respects, local congregations appear no different from those of other evangelical denominations. Whether the Alliance’s distinctive Christocentric theology and emphases on personal sanctification, divine healing, and worldwide evangelism will be the casualty of such growth remains to be seen.

Clearly, though, one reason for the denomination’s recent success in North America is its familiarity with global cultures, many of which have made their way to the United States and Canada in recent decades. By concentrating on immigrant populations, even to the degree that national districts dedicated to ethnic groups were created to sit alongside the traditional regional districts, the denomination put to use its international experience at home in the United States. New districts include: Cambodian; Haitian North and South; Hmong; Korean; Laotian; Native American; Spanish Central, Eastern, and Western; and, of course, Vietnamese. Together these churches constituted more than one-fifth of the U.S. congregations by 2001.

The Christian and Missionary Alliance in the United States is served by its four historic colleges: Nyack College (New York), Toccoa Falls College (Georgia), Crown College (Minnesota), and Simpson College (California), with graduate programs at the New York, Minnesota, and California campuses (see HIGHER EDUCATION). The Alliance Theological Seminary is also in Nyack, New York, which was the Alliance’s headquarters for nearly 100 years (see SEMINARIES). The Christian and Missionary Alliance is presently headquartered in Colorado Springs, Colorado. The autonomous Canadian Christian and Missionary Alliance is centered in Toronto and is served by Canadian Bible College and Canadian Theological Seminary in Regina.

See also Bible Colleges and Institutes; Faith Healing; Fundamentalism; Pentecostalism; Tongues, Speaking in; Biblical Inerrancy

References and Further Reading

Niklaus, Robert L., John S.Sawin, and Samuel J.Stoesz. All For Jesus: God at Work in The Christian and Missionary Alliance Over One Hundred Years. Camp Hill, PA: Christian Publications, Inc., 1986.

Pardington, George P. Twenty-five Wonderful Years. New York: Christian Alliance Publishing Co., 1914.

Thompson, A.E. The Life of A.B.Simpson. New York: The Christian Alliance Publishing Co., 1920.

Tozer, A.W. Wingspread. Harrisburg, PA: Christian Publishing, Inc. 1943.

PHILIP GOFF

CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST)

See Disciples of Christ

CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, CHURCHES OF CHRIST

Rooted historically in the Stone-Campbell reformation movement on the trans-Appalachian frontier in nineteenth-century America, the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) gradually emerged as a distinctive body of congregations protesting the perceived liberal drift of the mainline DISCIPLES OF CHRIST in the early and mid-twentieth century. That separation was consummated amid the restructure of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in the 1960s and 1970s. Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) committed, by and large, to the pursuit of Christian unity through restoration of the “ordinances” of apostolic Christianity enshrined in the New Testament (baptism of believers by immersion; weekly observance of the Lord’s Supper; congregational polity; etc.), though there has arisen significant diversity among the churches over the interpretation and applicability of the restoration agenda. The churches remain networked by support of international missionary and educational endeavors, and participation in a national (non-delegate) convention, but not by any permanent denominational infrastructure.

Overview

The reform movements of Barton Stone and Thomas and Alexander Campbell on the trans-Appalachian frontier merged in 1832, and the conglomerate Disciples of Christ rapidly expanded through the middle and latter decades of the nineteenth century, principally in North America, Britain, Australia, and New Zealand. Subsequent division among the Disciples resulted from divergent appropriations of the first-generation Stone-Campbell appeal for Christian unity, conservatives embracing a strict restoration of the ancient apostolic order, and liberals embracing a more ecumenical and accommodationist agenda. Longstanding hermeneutical and organizational differences induced the departure of the (acappella) Churches of Christ, a division that was virtually effective long before its formal recognition in the 1906 religious census. The second major division within the Disciples of Christ, with the emergence of the so-called independent Christian Churches (some of which have opted for the title Churches of Christ), was a long process of ideological alienation and institutional realignment beginning in the 1920s and consummated by the denominational restructure of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in the late 1960s.

Historical Perspective

Early on, a cluster of interrelated ecclesiological issues helped consolidate the conservative resistance that birthed the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ). Posturing toward the Ecumenical Movement was an early test. When certain Disciples progressives began actively participating in church federation endeavors as early as 1902, conservative leadership disputed the compatibility of cooperative or “federal” unity with restorationist principles. After the Federal Council of Churches was established in 1908, a gradually increasing number of Disciples congregations began practicing open membership, admitting persons who had been sprinkled as infants but not immersed as conscientious believers—clearly an overture toward mutual denominational recognition. Once the practice achieved approval of the Disciples’s premier agency, the United Christian Missionary Society, as well as their international convention, reaction was swift from conservatives insistent that believers’ immersion had been a nonnegotiable principle of apostolic Christianity and, for the founders of the Stone-Campbell movement, an indispensable rallying point for Christian unity. Institutional reconfiguration and consolidation of the Disciples, mainly the merger of six separate agencies to form the United Christian Missionary Society (est. 1919), further sparked the fears of conservatives that too much power was being concentrated in the hands of denominational executives of questionable loyalty to restoration principles, and that such a massive agency would enforce its theological positions and missiological policies in a way that violated the free networking of individual local congregations. The transformation of the Disciples' General Convention into a delegate convention in 1914 had likewise provoked conservative suspicions of an increasing politicization and denominationalization of the Disciples of Christ.

Ideologically, conservatives decried the perceived modernist drift of the Disciples of Christ as manifested in the emergence of the Disciples Divinity House (est. 1894) at the University of Chicago, the liberal tilt of new journals like The Christian Century, and the commitment to biblical higher criticism in Disciples academic institutions such as the College of the Bible in Kentucky (now Lexington Theological Seminary). Yet it would be an oversimplification to identify the conservative dissent within the Disciples of Christ in this period purely as a "Fundamentalist" reaction. To be sure, there is evidence in the 1920s that various conservative Disciples leaders and journals, when faced with modernist enthusiasm for the monumental paradigm shift in the natural sciences and in biblical studies, sympathized with the Fundamentalist defense of biblical inerrancy and creationism. Numerous spokesmen defended the Virgin Birth, divinity of Christ, and verbal inspiration of the Scriptures as "restoration" principles. But Disciples conservatives at this time were theologically insulated from the Reformed theological tradition underlying FUNDAMENTALISM, and, even among themselves, admitted some significant diversity of perspective. For example, Frederick Kershner (1875–1953), for many years the dean of the Butler University School of Religion in Indianapolis and a key moderate conservative, repudiated the doctrine of plenary verbal inspiration of Scripture (as had American cleric Alexander Campbell [1788–1866]), and articulated an ecclesiology upholding the sacramental character of the church and repudiating "mechanical" restorationism as a means to Christian unity. Another moderate, Edwin Errett, editor of the conservative journal the Christian Standard from 1929 to 1944, opposed compromises of the restoration ideal of unity, yet, like Kershner, remained open to ecumenical involvements and even participated actively in the early Faith and Order Movement.

Institutional Realignment

The more strident conservatives, however, were largely responsible for the institutional realignment that paved the way for a separate body of independent Christian Churches. Two crucial activists were James DeForest Murch (1892–1973), first president of the Christian Restoration Association (est. 1925), and Robert Elmore (1878–1968), long-time editor of its journal The Restoration Herald. The Christian Restoration Association was both a conservative brain trust and a clearinghouse for mission agencies and other ministries operating independently of the United Christian Missionary Society. Elmore was the single most vocal critic of that society. Murch, meanwhile, became the architect of the free church ecclesiology, devoted to congregational integrity and the prerogatives of local congregations to work in voluntary cooperation to sponsor direct support missions and educational initiatives, which largely shaped a sense of corporate identity among disaffected churches in the period leading to the denominational reorganization of the Disciples of Christ. Murch championed the view that authentic "New Testament Christianity" was historically carried on through a lineage of steadfast restoration movements that had survived the rise of Catholicism and centuries of ecclesiastical strife and persecution. Accordingly, faithful Disciples of Christ stood in that heritage. Murch fervently criticized mainline Protestant liberalism and encouraged conservative Disciples to find common cause with other evangelical bodies; he was himself a cofounder of the National Association of Evangelicals and one-time managing editor of Christianity Today.

Three other important developments in the institutional consolidation of independent Christian Churches stand out. One was the ever-increasing editorial reorientation of the Christian Standard, an influential journal originally founded in 1866 and published by the Standard Publishing Company in Cincinnati, as a mouthpiece of conservative Disciples causes. In 1919 the journal, obviously countering the inclinations of progressive Disciples publications like the Christian-Evangelist and The Christian Century, editorially committed itself to "The Rescue of the Restoration Movement," and by 1943 had conscientiously postured itself as an advocate for conservative churches opposing the leftward, denominationalizing drift of the Disciples of Christ. This policy would continue well into the 1950s. A second development was the burgeoning of conservative Bible colleges from the 1920s on. Though not the first of such schools, Cincinnati Bible Seminary, founded in 1924, led the way of restorationist fundamentalism and worked out a Bible-centered curriculum thoroughly resistant to modernist influences and biblical higher criticism. In subsequent decades, more than thirty such Bible colleges were founded in North America, some of which were financially burdened out of existence; these schools have been pivotal in the training of ministers and missionaries for the emerging independent Christian Churches (Churches of Christ). A third significant development was the organization of the North American Christian Convention in 1926 and 1927 by a committee of individuals frustrated by the policies of the Disciples's International Convention in concert with the United Christian Missionary Society. This new open (nondelegate) convention first met in Indianapolis in 1927, but only became a regular national assembly from 1950 on. Apologists for this convention argued that its purpose was principally to foster evangelism and promote fellowship among Disciples at a time of increasing institutional strife. Frederick Kershner, who had served as a president the Disciples's International Convention while still supporting the North American Christian Convention, insisted that the latter was not schismatic. Once the convention began gathering annually, however, Disciples critics viewed it as clear evidence of a developing separatist coalition.

Perhaps the last best hope for averting a second schism in the Disciples of Christ was the Commission on Restudy appointed by the Disciples's International Convention in 1934 to evaluate polarization in the denomination's ranks. In its fifteen-year duration, the commission ultimately boasted a broad ideological representation, including such committed liberals as Edward Scribner Ames (1870–1958; premier liberal theologian of the Disciples of Christ) and C.C. Morrison (first editor of The Christian Century), and such committed conservatives as P.H. Welshimer (minister of the Disciples's largest congregation in Canton, Ohio) and James DeForest Murch. Frederick Kershner served as chair of the commission for most of its duration. In its final report to the Disciples's International Convention in 1948, the Commission on Restudy, having identified the major differences alienating conservative and liberal Disciples, nevertheless by its own consensus recommended a course of action to maintain solidarity within the ranks. The report was subsequently ignored by the convention and had little impact on the churches. The commission's failure to avert division foreshadowed further estrangement. By 1955 a national "Directory of the Ministry" for independent churches, Bible colleges, mission organizations, and other ministries, was published. Further impetus for separation appeared in the wake of the Disciples's inauguration of a plan for denominational restructuring in the 1960s. Efforts at reconciliation were few and far between. A Consultation on Internal Unity met from 1959 to 1966 and exchanged papers of concerned Disciples and "Independents," but to no ultimate avail. Most independent Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) had already declared independence, at least from supporting Disciples denominational agencies, by the time the restructuring was consummated, at which time as many as 3,000 congregations officially requested to be removed from the register of the Disciples of Christ Yearbook.

1970 to the Present

From 1970 to the present, the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) have experienced continued institutional expansion and moderate growth in membership. Their heaviest geographical concentration is in the American Midwest, west coast, southwest, and southeast, and primarily in suburban and rural settings. Ethnic diversity within the United States is minimal (the vast majority of adherents are Caucasian and middle class); yet Christian Churches have made significant inroads of late among Hispanic, Filipino, and Portuguese communities on the east coast, and among Asians on the west coast. The increasing number of overseas mission-based churches in AFRICA and Asia has also broadened the ethnic base internationally. Statistics from the early 1990s suggest a total of around 5,200 Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) with upwards of 677,000 actual members and 1,200,000 adherents, making this body approximately the thirteenth largest religious communion in the United States. It has no centralized structure and continues in principle to repudiate a "denominational" status in favor of what some insiders have called a fraternal relationship or brotherhood, and others a "free church catholicism." The annual North American Christian Convention remains a nondelegate assembly aimed primarily at encouraging evangelism, missionary outreach, and congregational ministry. No formal intercongregational accountability structures exist among the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) such as are found in the regional ministry system of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Individual congregations are self-ruling bodies normally under the pastoral supervision of a group of elected elders who do not report to synods or other structures beyond the local congregation. Ordination to pastoral ministry is itself congregationally based, and the screening process rests on institutions of ministerial education and on the congregations themselves.

International Activities

Christian Churches have continued to sponsor substantial international mission work, usually through minimally bureaucratic mission organizations supported by, and accountable to, congregational networks that often have a wide geographical distribution.

The largest mission agency of the Christian Churches, the Christian Missionary Fellowship (established in 1949 and headquartered in Indianapolis), operates extensive missions in Europe, Africa, and Asia, yet disclaims any political representation of the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) as a whole. As of 1999 the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) operated some thirty-one Bible colleges in North America, some of which developed liberal arts curricula either internally or in association with adjacent state universities. Milligan College in Tennessee remains the only fully accredited liberal arts college. The churches also support three major graduate seminaries within the United States. Overall, evangelistic, missionary, and educational initiatives of the independent Christian Churches have not been matched by commitment to ecumenical activities. There is no membership in the World Council of Churches, and no formal representative participation in Faith and Order. Concern for reconciliation with (acappella) Churches of Christ helped inaugurate annual restoration forums in 1984, and in 1989 a group of Christian Church leaders and scholars began cooperating in a bilateral open forum with representatives of the Church of God (Anderson, Indiana), resulting in the publication of substantial studies of the ecclesiological and soteriological compatibilities and incompatibilities between the two traditions. The result was a nonbinding Consensus Statement of Faith, published in 1996. One other important initiative of late is the trilateral Stone-Campbell Dialogue, bringing together representatives of Churches of Christ, Christian Churches (Churches of Christ), and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Like the Commission on Restudy of the 1940s, this working group devotes itself to rethinking differences and common concerns of the Stone-Campbell churches with a view to more irenic relations.

Confessional Theology

Historically, the Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) have resisted developing a well-defined confessional theology. The ecumenical creeds are not, in most cases, used in worship or in catechesis, though in some limited quarters there is a renewed interest in using the creeds doxologically but not as tests of communion. The classic Stone-Campbell resistance to Reformed (Calvinist) orthodoxy has strongly shaped these churches. Divine grace is understood not as the actualization of eternal decrees but as a free personal and ecclesial relationship of believers to Christ enacted through faith, repentance, and baptism (Acts 2:38). Christian Churches hold up the Petrine Confession (Matthew 16:16) as the basic declaration of faith and expect penitent believers to submit to immersion for the remission of sins and for membership in the church. The highly sacramental view of baptism has typically not been paralleled by a sense of the LORD'S SUPPER as sacrament. Alexander Campbell himself resisted theories of the Real Presence and claims that the supper bestowed a unique grace. Christian Churches (Churches of Christ) have dwelt more on the "ordinance" of weekly observance of the Lord's Supper and on its memorialistic character, though again, in some quarters, there has been a marked renewal of emphasis on the sacramental dimension of the eucharist, in sympathy with classic Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican views. On the whole, the worship of the Christian Churches has been nonliturgical, centered on preaching and the Lord's Supper, with differences of complexion between the poles of traditional Disciples worship and newer contemporary modes directed toward evangelistic outreach.

Diversification

Recent studies have demonstrated an increasing diversification of theological and ecclesiological orientation among Christian Churches (Churches of Christ). Three broad categories are observable: (1) quasi-evangelical churches tending to minimize indebtedness to the Stone-Campbell tradition and drawn toward the mainstream of American Evangelicalism or toward identification as "Bible churches" or independent fellowships; (2) restoration fundamentalists, strongly resistant to affiliations with other denominations and devoted wholeheartedly to the original Stone-Campbell plea to restore the ordinances of the apostolic church; and (3) moderates or progressives, sometimes calling themselves "classic Disciples," who seek a reinterpretation and reappropriation of the restoration agenda through constructive engagement with the church at large, and most immediately with the two other major branches of the Stone-Campbell tradition.

References and Further Reading

- DeGroot, A.T. Church of Christ Number Two. Birmingham, UK: privately published, 1956.
- . New Possibilities for Disciples and Independents. St. Louis: Bethany Press, 1963.
- Garrison, W.E., and A.T.DeGroot. The Disciples of Christ: A History. St. Louis: Christian Board of Publication, 1948.
- Johnson, H.Eugene. The Christian Church Plea. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1975.
- Kragenbrink, Kevin. "The Modernist/Fundamentalist Controversy and the Emergence of the Independent Christian Churches/Churches of Christ." Restoration Quarterly 42 (2000): 1–17.
- Murch, James DeForest. Christians Only: A History of the Restoration Movement. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1962.
- . The Free Church. Louisville, KY: Restoration Press, 1966.
- North, James. Union in Truth: An Interpretive History of the Restoration Movement. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1994.
- Phillips, G.Richard. "From Modern Theology to a Post-Modern World: Christian Churches and Churches of Christ." Discipliana 54 (1994):83–95.
- Richardson, William, ed. Christian Doctrine: "The Faith Once Delivered...". Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1983.
- Smith, Rondal. "The Independent Christian Churches Face a Multicultural Twenty-First Century," Discipliana 57 (1997): 35–46.
- Toulouse, Mark. "Practical Concern and Theological Neglect: The UCMS and the Open Membership Controversy." In A Case Study of Mainstream Protestantism: The Disciples' Relation to American Culture, 1880–1989. Edited by D. Newell Williams. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991, 194–235.
- Watkins, Keith. "Shifting Left/Shifting Right: Changing Eucharistic Practices in Churches of the Stone-Campbell Tradition," Discipliana 56 (1996): 35–48.
- Webb, Henry. In Search of Christian Unity: A History of the Restoration Movement. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1990.

Yeakley, Flavil. "Recent Patterns of Growth and Decline Among Heirs of the Restoration Movement," Restoration Quarterly 37 (1995): 45–50.

PAUL M. BLOWERS

CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA

The Christian Reformed Church in North America (CRCNA) is a DENOMINATION in the Reformed tradition consisting of approximately 280,000 members in 1,000 congregations spread throughout the UNITED STATES and CANADA, with concentrations in Michigan, California, Iowa, and Ontario. Denominational headquarters are located in Grand Rapids, Michigan. The CRCNA began in 1857 when it separated from the REFORMED CHURCH OF AMERICA. However, the roots of the CRCNA lie in two nineteenth-century secession movements from the State Church of the NETHERLANDS. In the twentieth century, the CRCNA's identity has been shaped by three periods of struggle over the denomination's identity and its theology of GRACE, Scripture, and ecclesiastical office.

Early History

In 1834, a number of groups of Reformed Christians seceded from the State Church of the Netherlands. These groups sought to be free of government control; they returned to the Church Order of the Synod of Dort (1618–1619), to the singing of Psalms only (not hymns), and to the Word of God as interpreted by the three Reformed CONFESSIONS (the BELGIC CONFESSION, the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, and the CANONS OF DORT). One of the secessionist pastors, Albertus Van Raalte, led his family and a few dozen followers to the United States in 1846. This group settled in and around what is now Holland, Michigan, and in 1850 it joined the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH, later known as the Reformed Church of America. In 1857, four congregations seceded from this union and formed the CRCNA. Among the reasons cited for this move were a perceived lack of sound doctrinal teaching and piety among American pastors, the use of hymns by the Americans, and the perceived lack of solidarity on the part of the Americans with the secessionist cause in the Netherlands.

Between 1880 and 1915, the CRCNA's membership swelled dramatically due to immigration. The views of these new members were shaped largely by the Dutch statesman and theologian ABRAHAM KUYPER and his Doleantie movement, which separated from the State Church of the Netherlands in 1886. Kuyper's vision was to claim Christ's lordship over all of life. Believers were called to use Christian schools, institutions, and organizations to extend God's kingdom into all parts of society. Carrying this vision to America, Dutch immigrants spurred the infant CRCNA to engage its CULTURE. Thus, at the turn of the century, the CRCNA slowly began the transition from the Dutch language to English, and its members became increasingly Americanized.

Theological Struggles

After World War I, the CRCNA had difficulty defining itself. It wanted to become American but also clung tenaciously to its Reformed beliefs and Dutch heritage. In the 1920s, this identity crisis was the background for theological disagreements about Scripture and grace. Ralph Janssen was deposed as Professor of Old Testament at Calvin Seminary in 1922 after undergoing numerous investigations for his alleged “history of religions” approach to Scripture. Janssen’s supporters charged pastors Herman Hoeksema and Henry Danhof with misconstruing Janssen’s views because they denied common grace and therefore violated the Reformed confessions. Hoeksema and Danhof were deposed from the CRCNA and, in 1926, were leaders in forming the Protestant Reformed Churches in America.

During the next two decades, the CRCNA was a fortress of Reformed distinctiveness. World War II further Americanized the CRCNA and caused its membership to swell as Dutch Calvinists emigrated from the Netherlands to Canada. By the 1960s, the denomination’s identity and relationship to its culture again formed the context of theological debates related to Scripture and grace. Missions-minded theologians sparked debates on limited ATONEMENT and double PREDESTINATION, two doctrines articulated in the Reformed confessions. After decades of conservative dominance, power in the CRCNA shifted to the progressives in the 1960s. This shift is clearly seen in a 1974 denominational report on biblical AuTHORITY, which argued that Scripture’s truthfulness lay in its redemptive message not in the accuracy of its statements in domains such as geology, biology, and history.

From the early 1970s to the mid-1990s, the CRCNA struggled over the role of WOMEN in ecclesiastical office. In the end, women’s ordination was permitted, but more than 40,000 members had left the denomination (see WOMEN CLERGY).

Denominational Characteristics

The CRCNA still holds to the three historic Reformed confessions, but it is no longer as distinctively Dutch as it has been through much of its history. Twelve different languages are used in worship. The CRCNA’s POLITY recognizes the offices of minister, elder, deacon, and evangelist (see CLERGY). Each congregation is governed by a council. Classes (36 in the United States, 11 in Canada) are composed of congregations in geographical proximity to each other, and they meet two or three times each year. A general SYNOD, made up of two ministers and two elders from each classis, meets annually.

The denomination has many agencies, including Calvin Theological Seminary, Calvin College, three MISSIONS agencies, a television and worldwide radio ministry (“The Back to God Hour), a publishing house, and denominational offices related to abuse prevention, chaplaincy ministries, disability concerns, pastor church relations, social justice, and race relations. Six other colleges or universities are affiliated with the CRCNA.

See also Christian Colleges; Seminaries; Higher Education; Publishing Media

References and Further Reading

- Bratt, James D. Dutch Calvinism in Modern America: A History of a Conservative Subculture. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984.
- . “Wars of Words, Wars of Grace: A Brief History of the Battles That Have Shaped the CRC.” Banner (Dec 20, 1999):14–17.
- DeKlerk, Peter, and Richard De Ridder, eds. Perspectives on the Christian Reformed Church: Studies in Its History, Theology, and Ecumenicity. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1983.
- Kromminga, Dietrich H. The Christian Reformed Tradition: From the Reformation to the Present. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1943.
- Schaap, James C. Our Family Album: The Unfinished Story of the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: CRC Publications, 1998.
- Van Dyk, Wilbert M. Belonging: An Introduction to the Faith and Life of the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: CRC Publications, 1982.
- Zwaanstra, Henry. Reformed Thought and Experience in a New World: A Study of the Christian Reformed Church and Its American Environment, 1890–1918. Kampen, Netherlands: J.H.Kok, 1973.
- . Catholicity and Secession: A Study of Ecumenicity in the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991.

DAVID RYLAARSDAM

CHRISTIAN RIGHT

Also referred to as the “Religious Right” or the “New Christian Right,” the Christian Right is a conglomeration of organizations and individuals that emerged in U.S. politics in the latter half of the 1970s. Drawing on the well-developed subculture of fundamentalist and evangelical churches, Christian academies and home-schooling organizations, BIBLE COLLEGES, and TELEVANGELISM media networks, the Christian Right overcame denominational divisions to ally with Pentecostals and charismatics, conservative Catholics, and some conservative Jews. Common to these groups was the argument that the U.S. in the 1960s had forsaken its roots in the BIBLE, losing its Christian identity and therefore its strength. These concerns often crystallized around children, whom many on the Christian Right believed to be the target of a secular humanist onslaught (enacted through multicultural education, sex education programs, and the MASS MEDIA) seeking to control the nation by reprogramming its children, particularly regarding SEXUALITY, MARRIAGE, and the FAMILY (see CHILDHOOD). Issues around which the Christian Right mobilized include opposition to ABORTION, feminism, HOMOSEXUALITY, pornography, affirmative action, and welfare. The Christian Right campaigned for mandatory school PRAYER, schools supported Bible clubs, the teaching of CREATION sciENCE, and school vouchers. As these issues indicate, the Christian Right is often analyzed as protesting MODERNISM or modernity, not in the sense of eschewing modern technologies (its leaders have pioneered TV, video, and internet ministries), but rather in the sense of protesting concomitant cultural changes. Seen by the Christian Right as “permissiveness,” these changes are analyzed by sociologists under the term “SECULARIZATION.” In addition to cutting across denominational lines, the Christian Right cuts within religious identifications. Not all fundamentalists, evangelicals, or conservative Christians would identify with the Christian Right, either its politics or beliefs. Indeed, the main controversy surrounding the Christian Right concerns the degree to which its elites represent a grass-roots constituency.

History

Although evangelical religion has long been an important force in U.S. political life, the Christian Right’s emergence into politics in the mid-1970s reversed decades of withdrawal by conservative Protestants (who in the 1920s felt forced out of public life by Liberal Protestants). Yet unlike nineteenth-century EVANGELICALISM, which sought such progressive reforms as the abolition of SLAVERY and WOMEN’S suffrage, this “return” was marked by a more defensive and reactionary agenda, as evidenced by its catalyst (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

In 1976, Jimmy Carter, a Southern Baptist who proclaimed himself “born again,” was elected President. Many Bible-believing Protestants (particularly in the South) were at first encouraged by his leadership, only to feel betrayed later by Carter’s liberal Democratic party politics. For some, the turning point occurred when Carter’s administration announced plans to revoke the tax exemptions of private schools that practiced racial segregation. Although continuing practices begun before his presidency (particularly regarding Bob Jones University, a fundamentalist school in South Carolina), Carter was perceived as attacking fundamentalist values. In response, and aided by political conservatives like Paul Weyrich (a founder of the Heritage Foundation), JERRY FALWELL formed the “Moral Majority” in 1979, just in time for the 1980 presidential election. Falwell took credit for registering millions of new voters who helped elect President Ronald Reagan.

For others, the turning point was the White House Conference on the Family held by Carter’s administration in 1980. Conservatives like Connie Marshner and Beverly LaHaye saw the Conference as an attempt to broaden the accepted definition of the family beyond the white middle class heterosexual norm. Although the Moral Majority is the most well known, other Christian Right organizations include Concerned Women for America (founded by Beverly LaHaye in 1979), the Traditional Values Coalition (founded by Louis Sheldon in 1980), Focus on the Family (founded by James Dobson in 1977 and which developed a large international division), the Council for National Policy (founded by Tim LaHaye in 1981 as an invitation-only forum to network Christian Right leaders with funders like Richard DeVos of Amway and the Coors family), and the Christian Coalition.

The Christian Coalition was founded by PAT ROBERTSON in 1989, one year after Robertson's run in the Republican presidential primaries. With Ralph Reed as executive director, the Coalition became an influential force in Republican politics, thanks in part to its "voter guides." In 1992, both Robertson and Pat Buchanan spoke at the Republican National Convention. Throughout the decade, Christian Right issues influenced the Republican Party agenda, dismaying some Republican regulars, as well as, ultimately, some Christian Right activists (such as James Dobson), who accused Republicans of using the Christian Right to get elected only to neglect their issues afterward.

Reception

The increasingly high profile of the Christian Right did not go unchallenged. In the religious realm, in 1996 politically liberal evangelicals (including Jim Wallis and Tony Campolo) formed Call to Renewal to contest the Christian Right's claim to speak for all evangelicals. Politically, the Christian Right was opposed by organizations like AMERICANS UNITED FOR THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, as well as the Fight the Right Initiative of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force.

Controversy

Analysts seeking to understand the Christian Right are divided concerning the degree to which it represents a grass-roots constituency. Sociologist Christian Smith, for example, argues for a gap between the political agenda of Christian Right leaders and the actual (more tolerant) views of ordinary evangelicals. Although evangelicals seek to be engaged with the public sphere, their preferred method of engagement is not politics, but rather personal relationships. In contrast, it may be argued that the narratives disseminated by the media ministries of the Christian Right shape individuals at a level more profound than individual consciousness or will, because the conservative narrative evokes and builds on mainstream cultural memories.

See also Abortion; Darwinism; Fundamentalism; Liberal Protestantism & Liberalism; Pentecostalism; Publishing Media; Televangelism

References and Further Readings

- Burlein, Ann. Lift High the Cross: Where White Supremacy and the Religious Right Converge. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Martin, William. With God on Our Side: The Rise of the Religious Right in America. New York: Broadway Books, 1996.
- Smith, Christian. Christian America?: What Evangelicals Really Want. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 2000.

ANN BURLEIN

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, Protestants were deeply divided over the relationship of religion and SCIENCE. Although fundamentalists were adamant that science is factual only insofar as it accommodates the BIBLE, modernists accepted scientific developments—such as evolutionary theory—and interpreted the Bible to accommodate their findings (see DARWINISM). In 1875 MARY BAKER EDDY (1821–1910) introduced a new variety of Protestantism with a radical rendition of the modernist position: not only can Christianity accommodate science, it is science.

The Early Years

In 1875 Eddy published the first edition of her principal work, Science and Health, in which she explained “Moral Science,” her metaphysical understanding of the Bible’s teachings as scientific—coherent, objective, verifiable, and containing the methodology for eradicating disease. Eddy had developed this understanding over a period of years, perhaps beginning with her poor health as a child in a Calvinist household (see CALVINISM). Eddy, whose ill health followed her into adulthood, experimented with many of the healing treatments in vogue in the mid-nineteenth century, but found the most relief when she visited Phineas Parkhurst Quimby (1802–1866) in 1862.

Quimby based his treatment on Anton Mesmer’s (1734–1815) work, which, building on EMANUEL SWEDENBORG’S (1688–1772) theory that an invisible substance connects all NATURE and spirit, demonstrated a way for one person to affect another by manipulating that substance. Quimby used Mesmer’s technique, mesmerism, to heal, but believed that it changed a person’s mind, not body: people are sick because they believe they are sick; correct their beliefs and the maladies disappear. Eddy became one of Quimby’s students after he treated her illness, and they remained correspondents until his death in 1866.

Shortly after Quimby’s death, Eddy took a serious fall on an icy sidewalk. Still bed-bound three days later, she read New Testament stories of Jesus’s healing and, particularly, of his raising Lazarus from the dead. She observed that he did not treat symptoms but demonstrated the unreality of sickness and death, and, at this discovery, rose from bed fully cured. She believed that the change in her thought and the accompanying healing demonstrated the science of Jesus’s teachings and began to study the rest of the Bible in this light.

By the end of 1868 Eddy had taken a small cadre of students under her wing, teaching them Moral Science through The Science of Man, a textbook she fashioned by adapting Quimby’s technique to her revelation. Practitioners of her Science corrected patients’ false beliefs in illness, but Eddy taught them that this health was restored through the power of the Divine Mind, as she called God, not the human mind as Quimby had believed. Eddy fleshed out her understanding of Moral Science over the next few years, incorporating it into an expanded treatment, Science and Health, in 1875. Beginning in 1883 Eddy included biblical exegesis according to Moral Science, republishing the text as Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. This work was Eddy’s explanation of her revelation, and she continually fine-tuned it to ensure its clarity, producing over 200 editions by her death in 1910, while writing other books and numerous hymns, prayers, sermons, newspaper articles, and letters.

Eddy also continued to promote her Moral Science on several other fronts. In 1879 she founded a church based on its principles, the Church of Christ, Scientist. With this name, she depicted her religion as distinctly Christian and proclaimed Jesus as the Scientist—the one who fully understood Moral Science. Two years later, in 1881, she opened the Massachusetts Metaphysical College, where students could take courses and earn a degree, either Bachelor of Christian Science or Doctor of Christian Science. By the time Eddy closed the college in 1889 nearly 1,000 students had crossed its threshold. Eddy's students, at her behest, also formed the National Christian Science Association in 1886, which she disbanded in 1892. Eddy began the Christian Science Publishing Society in 1898, and the Publishing Society's trademark periodical, the Christian Science Monitor, in 1908.

Beliefs

Christian Science THEOLOGY derives from Mary Baker Eddy's conviction that God is good and, as such, would not have created anything that is not good. Hence, disease is not God's creation but human fallacy. As she explained in Miscellaneous Writings, 1883–1896, “good being real, evil, good's opposite, is unreal” (63). From this premise, Eddy derived what she called the “Triune Principle of all pure theology”: Life, Truth, and Love. Recognition of this triad's reality brings about realization of the unreality of its opposite—sickness, sin, and death—and remedies the latter's ills. Sin is error, creating the illusion of matter, and belief in this false world furthers that error.

Christian Science is more than a healing system, but disease provided Eddy with the most concrete examples of error—and of error compounding error—while its cure provided her with the most powerful demonstrations of her Truth. For instance, many might reject Eddy's contention that disease is illusion caused by false beliefs, but even her critics had to concede that there are times when one's belief in the immanence of disease, such as after forgetting to wear a hat in a snowstorm, produces the very symptoms one expects. Similarly, Eddy recognized the fashionable-ness that accompanied new diseases, blaming the press for providing information on illnesses because, as she wrote in Science and Health, “A new name for an ailment affects people like a Parisian name for a novel garment. Every one hastens to get it” (197). Likewise, medical students often see symptoms in themselves or those around them that resemble diseases about which they are studying; for Eddy this process is exactly how illness spreads, whether one reads about diseases in a medical journal or the daily newspaper, or hears about them in a medical consultation. Accordingly, not only do non-Christian Science practitioners treat patients incorrectly, but they produce the illness in the first place by examining symptoms, diagnosing illnesses, and treating patients accordingly. Better that the patient, practitioner, and family members not think about the illness, much less talk about it.

Eddy explained relapses as former patients falling back into SIN, and slow recoveries as patients needing time to “overcome” their faith in illness and medication. Eddy recommended the use of surgeons when cases were clearly organic, as with broken bones. Such cases, and illnesses in seemingly good Christian Scientists, proved that no one in this lifetime has sufficiently advanced in Science to transcend mortal mind completely, an advance that remains for a future millennium, when Christian Science is realized universally and, therefore, illness, pain, and death are no more.

Stopping short of a doctrinal creed, Eddy encapsulated Christian Science into six tenets, listed in Science and Health:

1. As adherents of Truth, we take the inspired Word of the Bible as our sufficient guide to eternal Life.
2. We acknowledge and adore one supreme and infinite God. We acknowledge His Son, one Christ; the Holy Ghost or divine Comforter; and man in God's image and likeness.
3. We acknowledge God's forgiveness of sin in the destruction of sin and the spiritual understanding that casts out evil as unreal. But the belief in sin is punished so long as the belief lasts.
4. We acknowledge Jesus' atonements as the evidence of divine, efficacious Love, unfolding man's unity with God through Christ Jesus the Way-shower; and we acknowledge that man is saved through Christ, through Truth, Life, and Love as demonstrated by the Galilean Prophet in healing the sick and overcoming sin and death.
5. We acknowledge that the crucifixion of Jesus and his resurrection served to uplift faith to understand eternal Life, even the allness of Soul, Spirit, and the nothingness of matter.
6. And we solemnly promise to watch, and pray for that Mind to be in us which was also in Christ Jesus; to do unto others as we would have them do unto us; and to be merciful, just, and pure. (497)

Although some of these tenets resemble those of other Protestant religions, their phrasings demonstrate distinctive beliefs. For instance, the first tenet positions the Bible as a guide to "Eternal Life," whereas the second emphasizes humanity's shared image and likeness with God. According to Eddy, God is a spiritual rather than a physical being who created humans in the divine image; therefore, they must be spiritual beings as well. Human error, or sin, creates the material world and its attending maladies, and therein lies the third tenet: this sin creates its own punishment, the illnesses and death humans believe exist; yet, God forgives this sin and provides the remedy—understanding of the unreality of sickness, sin, and death. The fourth and fifth tenets emphasize Jesus's role as Scientist, depicting human unity with God—the oneness of all that is real—as well as demonstrating the way out of the sin that creates matter, sickness, and death. In addition to affirming the Golden Rule, the sixth tenet vows effort to emulate Jesus, to destroy the sin that keeps people invested in the material world they create.

Controversies I: Animal Magnetism

Once she developed Christian Science, Mary Baker Eddy fought to distance herself from Phineas Quimby's mesmerism. He was her most influential teacher and her theology is clearly indebted to his system. This led some critics to claim that Christian Science is Quimby's work repackaged, overlooking the new direction in which she had taken his ideas. Her critics likely missed this because, although she believed that it was dangerously misguided, Eddy also believed that mesmerism worked.

Mesmerism, or animal magnetism as Eddy called it after discovering Christian Science, is human manipulation of another's mind. Used as a medical treatment it could change a person's belief of sickness into a belief of health; used another way it could change a person's belief of health into one of sickness. A practitioner of animal magnetism could even make a devout Christian Scientist sick by introducing doubts or thoughts of sickness into that person's mind. Eddy reviled even the well-intentioned, healthful uses of animal magnetism as invasions into another's mind, but she saved her greatest condemnations for malintended, or "malicious," animal magnetism. The line between mesmeric and Christian Science treatments was thin, but for Eddy and her followers it was vitally important. Once a practitioner began to correct beliefs of illness by manipulating the patient's mind rather than appealing to Divine Mind, that practitioner had violated the patient, and stepped on the slippery slope to malicious animal magnetism.

Eddy accused many former students of practicing animal magnetism, or "mental malpractice," and increased their ranks by accusing other students of stepping onto that slippery slope. When students exhibited doubts—whether vocally or through botched healings—Eddy was just as likely to attribute the doubts to a former student's malicious animal magnetism, working to undermine her in their minds, as she was to attribute them to the current students' false belief. She also blamed malicious animal magnetism for her continuing illnesses and the 1882 death of her third husband, Asa Gilbert Eddy.

Eddy believed that animal magnetism posed a public threat and fought to expose it. In 1878 her lawyer, a student named Edward Arens, filed suit against one of Eddy's former students, Daniel Spofford, for maliciously injuring another student, Lucretia Brown, through animal magnetism. Brown refused to appear in court, but gave Eddy power of attorney to appear on her behalf. Although the judge dismissed the suit, it made a sensation in the press, particularly because Arens had filed it in Salem, Massachusetts, historic site of the infamous witch trials. Eddy quickly revised Science and Health with an expanded section warning of animal magnetism's dangers.

Controversies II: Leadership

Questions of leadership arose in the church's early years and continued for a decade after Mary Baker Eddy's death. Students often chafed under Eddy's critical eye, particularly when Eddy blamed their failures on their wrong beliefs. A number of practitioners treated patients according to Science and Health without training—or sanction—from Eddy. Yet, of those who did study with her, many left, often becoming her most vocal critics, and others tried to undermine her AUTHORITY from within.

Most apostates maintained—or modified—what Eddy had taught them, either practicing on their own or creating new organizations. Perhaps the most notable of these apostates was Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), whom Eddy excommunicated in 1885. With the assistance of Mary Plunkett, another former student, Hopkins founded the Emma Curtis Hopkins College of Christian Science in 1885 and the Hopkins Metaphysical Association in 1886. Through these organizations, and an allied publication called Christian Science, founded by former student Ida Nichols, Hopkins expanded New Thought from a lay healing movement based on Quimby's work to a religious congregation with ordained clergy. Hopkins's background in Christian Science and her use of similar terminology led many to confuse New Thought and Christian Science, and with regard to both movements' indebtedness to Quimby. Yet, there are key differences between them: New Thought emphasizes the power of human mind, whereas Christian Science emphasizes the power of Divine Mind; New Thought advocates mind over matter, whereas Christian Science professes that there is only mind, no matter.

Hopkins's defection may have been the most influential with its resulting development of New Thought, but significant strife among Eddy's adherents first threatened her leadership in 1888, after Massachusetts authorities charged one of her students, Abby Corner, with manslaughter. Corner, who had taken classes with Eddy, attended to her daughter's premature labor with a non-Christian Science nurse-midwife's assistance. After several hours, at her daughter's request, Corner sent for a medical doctor. Mother and infant died before he arrived, however, and, believing that not having called for him sooner was criminal, the doctor alerted the authorities. The state agreed and charged Corner with her daughter's death. Local newspapers printed the story and the public was outraged. Eddy wrote an open letter to the Boston Globe and the Boston Herald denouncing Corner, and Christian Scientists were outraged. Eddy had blamed practitioners for failed healings before, but this public disavowal crossed the line for many who thought it disloyal. Enough Christian Scientists agreed with Eddy and blamed Corner—her use of a nonbelieving assistant posing an inherent danger to her daughter even if Corner's own beliefs were correct—that Eddy maintained control. Those Christian Scientists who could not accept Eddy's leadership left, including a group of thirty-six who took the church's records, holding them hostage until Eddy agreed to let the students leave without excommunication.

Eddy held onto her leadership, but made several changes. In 1889 she closed the Massachusetts Metaphysical College, although the church continued to award degrees under the college's charter. That year she also resigned as pastor of the Boston congregation—while dissolving it as a legal entity—and as president of the National Christian Scientist Association; the association's local Christian Scientist Association disbanded on her recommendation, and the national one followed in 1892, again on her recommendation. These changes led to more defections, but they also allowed Eddy to centralize the church, reorganizing it around the Mother Church in Boston, with a five-person board of directors she appointed to oversee church affairs.

Eddy further solidified her leadership in a series of bylaws she published in 1895's Manual of the Mother Church. Through this and succeeding editions of the Manual, Eddy standardized the Church of Christ, Scientist and its services. For instance, Eddy abolished the ordained CLERGY and named the BIBLE (KING JAMES VERSION) and Science and Health the pastor, limiting the clerical position to that of lay "reader." Each congregation has two of these readers, usually a woman and a man, who, instead of a sermon during Sunday services, read passages from the pastor—the Bible and Science and Health. The church administration in Boston chooses the passages, listing them in the Christian Science Quarterly since its publication in 1890. As per the bylaws, readers cannot comment on the passages, nor answer questions, allowing congregants to concentrate on the pastor's words. The bylaws allow some interpretation outside of these services, however, particularly in a SUNDAY SCHOOL for the under-twenty crowd and in practitioner training. Traveling lecturers, appointed by Eddy until her death, then by the directors, visit each congregation and speak to its members, often in a public hall. Their lectures reinforce the link among local, or "branch," churches and between them and the Mother Church, and allow a representative of the Mother Church to address local concerns and, perhaps, attract converts. Eddy also continued the popular practice of Wednesday evening testimonial meetings, at which Christian Scientists, particularly those who have been healed, share their stories.

This meticulous centralization and standardization successfully staved off another leadership crisis until after Eddy's death. Christian Scientists minimize the importance of death, including Eddy's, stressing its unreality, but her passing in 1910 caused substantial problems for church administration. Eddy had vested the board of directors with administrative powers, but according to the Manual, the board needed her consent for any significant action it might take. In the years after her death the board substituted its judgment for hers in proxy, greatly increasing its powers.

Many Christian Scientists were displeased, but the board easily quashed each challenge until the "Great Litigation." When Eddy had established the Christian Science Publishing Society in 1898, she had done so under her own aegis. Yet, after her death, the board of directors tried to stand in for her there as well, replacing trustees and making policy decisions. The Publishing Society rebelled. From 1918 to 1921 the trustees and directors brought their differences to court. The long legal battles took their toll, and the membership split between the factions. The largest group, backing the directors, boycotted the Publishing Society and stopped enough subscriptions to endanger it. The trustees won the first battles, but the directors held out and eventually won in a Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts decision. Accepting this, the majority of Christian Scientists buried their differences, and the board's expanded powers—reaching across all church interests—minimized further power struggles. Dissension reemerged among the ranks in the 1990s when the church found itself in financial trouble, and when rumors circulated about financial mismanagement, but the controversies that have caused the most trouble for the church have been those surrounding failed healings of children.

Controversies III: Treatment of Children

There have been critics of Christian Science since its beginnings, but they are never as vocal as when a child dies in a Christian Science practitioner's care. Just as the 1880s public was outraged after Abby Corner's daughter and her infant died during childbirth, the 1980s public was outraged after Robyn Twitchell died of a bowel obstruction and Amy Hermanson died of juvenile diabetes. Rennie Schoepflin has identified thirty-two cases between 1887 and 1990 in which Christian Science practitioners were charged with crimes for their treatment of children, ranging from practicing medicine without a license to second-degree murder, yet among recent cases the Twitchell and Hermanson cases received the most media attention, and roused the most vocal backlash against the church (see MASS MEDIA).

Boston authorities arrested David and Ginger Twitchell for manslaughter after Robyn, aged two and a half, died in 1986; Sarasota County, Florida authorities arrested William and Christine Hermanson for felony child abuse and third-degree murder when Amy, aged seven, died the same year. Opponents such as Children's Healthcare is a Legal Duty, Inc. (CHILD) had long fought Christian Science parents' right to choose religious practitioners for their children's care, but the Twitchell and Hermanson cases visibly boosted their campaigns against the church. Although the parents lost their original cases, both state supreme courts overruled the verdicts—three years later for the Twitchells, in 1993, and five years later for the Hermansons, in 1992. The sensational media attention the cases received and the original guilty verdicts, however, revived old criticisms.

Christian Scientists' critics often accuse them of child abuse for their refusal to allow medical doctors to treat their children, but for many Christian Scientists the opposite is true: submitting their children to medical treatment would be abuse. Sickness is error, illusion—whether created by the child or a parent—and acknowledging it exacerbates that illusion, making the child worse, even to the point of death. To heal, patients must be surrounded by those who believe and can help them realize the disease's unreality. Doubts and thoughts about the symptoms affect patients and worsen their conditions. Yet, although most Christian Scientists uphold this position, others have interpreted their theology to allow medical treatment, at least for children, or have left the church.

Membership

The Mother Church, built to hold 1,000 in 1894, quickly became too small for its purposes, causing Mary Baker Eddy to order a 3,000-capacity annex built alongside it, allowing the use of both facilities after its completion in 1906. By 1907 there were 652 Christian Science branch churches in the United States and another fifty-eight abroad; today there are over 2,000 worldwide. Although Eddy prohibited publication of church statistics in 1908, some numbers are available. According to the 1890 U.S. Census, 8,724 Americans identified themselves as Christian Scientists, followed in 1906 with the U.S. Census of Religious Bodies' count of 40,011, although this number is somewhat exaggerated because of Christian Scientists' practice of joining both their local branch church and the Mother Church, as is required for those in leadership positions. Church authorities reported a membership of 268,915 in 1936, the last year for which they publicized the report. This number likely reached 500,000 by the 1950s, but has been on the decline since then.

The Church of Christ, Scientist controls its membership as well as its membership figures. Those over twelve years old who are interested in joining the church must apply for membership, attesting to belief in Christian Science as laid out in Science and Health and denying membership in another denomination. Applicants must submit a completed application to a Christian Scientist willing to sponsor them. Sponsors send the applications to a teacher for a signature, then to the clerk of the Mother Church for consideration. The church admits new members twice yearly, in early June and November.

Although Eddy's earliest students were primarily working-class, by 1910 the majority of her followers were middle-class, a trend that continues today. Her earliest students also included a balance of men and WOMEN but, although Eddy tended to appoint men to positions of power, women quickly dominated the ranks of Christian Scientists, as they do today. Christian Science caught on most quickly in urban areas in the Northeast, Midwest, and California, with important centers in Boston, New York, and Chicago by the end of the nineteenth century, although it progressed more slowly in the South, taking root there only in the later years of the twentieth century.

Christian Science Today

Despite the controversies that have plagued the church, Christian Science remains a vital religion for many, and the Church of Christ, Scientist continues to reach out to non-Christian Scientists as well. The Christian Science Monitor has won a number of journalism awards, including seven Pulitzer prizes, and the church's reading rooms, where one can read the Monitor and other Christian Science Publishing Society materials, are regular fixtures in downtowns across the United States. The church also has a growing international population, and offers all of its publications in a number of languages. The Christian Science Plaza in Boston—Mother Church, Mother Church Sunday School, Christian Science Publishing Society, Church Administration Building, Mary Baker Eddy Library for the Betterment of Humanity, and a reflecting pool—remains a popular site for visitors touring downtown Boston, and many visitors take advantage of free tours of the Mother Church. Since its public opening on September 28, 2002, many also have explored the Mary Baker Eddy Library's exhibits and research room. The church's population is aging, but such outreach may well rejuvenate the Church of Christ, Scientist as it approaches the centennial of its founder's death. Christian Science has captured many imaginations over the years, and promises to continue that tradition for the foreseeable future.

See also Faith Healing

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Eddy, M.B. Manual of the Mother Church; The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Massachusetts. Boston: The Christian Science Publishing Society, 1889.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: Speaking for Herself. Boston: Writings of Mary Baker Eddy, 2002.
- . Miscellaneous Writings, 1883–1896. Boston: Trustees under the Will of Mary Baker G.Eddy, 1896.
- . Prose Works Other Than Science and Health. Boston: Trustees under the Will of Mary Baker G.Eddy, 1925.
- . Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Reprint. Boston: The First Church of Christ, Scientist, 1994.

Secondary Sources:

- Anonymous. A Century of Christian Science Healing. Boston: The Christian Science Publishing Society, 1966.
- Conkin, P.K. American Originals: Homemade Varieties of Christianity. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- DesAutels, P., M.P.Battin, and L.May. Praying For a Cure: When Medical and Religious Practices Conflict. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 1999.
- Fuller, R.C. Alternative Medicine and American Religious Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- . Mesmerism and the American Cure of Souls. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.
- Gill, G. Mary Baker Eddy. Radcliff Biography Series. Cambridge MA: Perseus Books, 1998.
- Gottschalk, S. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Knee, S.E. Christian Science in the Age of Mary Baker Eddy. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1994.
- Meyer, D.B. The Positive Thinkers: A Study of the American Quest for Health, Wealth and Personal Power from Mary Baker Eddy to Norman Vincent Peale. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965.
- New York City Christian Science Institute. Vital Issues in Christian Science: A Record of Unsettled Questions which Arose in the Year 1909, Between the Directors of the Mother Church, the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Boston, Massachusetts, and First Church of Christ, Scientist, New York City, Eight of its Nine Trustees and Sixteen of its Practitioners. New York: G.P.Putnam's Sons, 1914.
- Peel, R. Christian Science: Its Encounter with American Culture. New York: Henry Holt & Company, 1958.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Authority. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1977.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Discovery. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Trial. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1971.
- Satter, B. Each Mind a Kingdom: American Women, Sexual Purity, and the New Thought Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999.
- Schoepflin, R.B. Christian Science on Trial: Religious Healing in America. Baltimore MD: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 2003.
- Smith, C.P. Historical Sketches, from the Life of Mary Baker Eddy and the History of Christian Science. Boston: The Christian Science Publishing Society, 1941.
- Thomas, R.D. "With Bleeding Footsteps": Mary Baker Eddy's Path to Religious Leadership. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.
- Ward, G.L., ed. Christian Science: Controversial and Polemical Pamphlets. New York and London: Garland Publishing, 1990.

AMY E.LORION

CHRISTOLOGY

Christology is the doctrine of the person of Christ: of who and what kind of being he is. Its basis is in the New Testament's attributing to Jesus of Nazareth both human and divine characteristics and actions, and as a central discipline of Christian theology it is concerned with elaborating and explaining the meaning of those claims. In all of its main streams, early Protestant christology adopted the teaching of the orthodox Christian tradition, and Catholic accusations of heresy did not, for the most part, touch on this aspect of its teaching. The tradition taught that Jesus Christ is the eternal Son of God made flesh for human salvation—the doctrine of the incarnation—and that his historic person was a unity—“one Christ” made known in two natures. By “natures” was meant not separate entities but ways in which Christ was at once one in being (homoousios) with God the Father—as truly God as he—and one in being with human beings—as truly human, sin apart, as they. The Chalcedonian Definition of 451 set its face against two distortions of this, the “Nestorian,” which divided the person by separating the human and the divine, and the “monophysite,” which tended to submerge Christ’s humanity within the “one nature” of his divinity. All christology tends to one of those distortions, and it is said to be characteristic of Lutheran christology to tend to the monophysite, and of Reformed theology to tend to the Nestorian. This article will both illustrate and qualify that scholarly commonplace.

The Legacy of the Reformers

Differences between the leading Reformers took shape not in controversies about christology itself so much as about its bearing on the doctrine of the Lord’s Supper. Luther’s concern was to maintain the real presence of Christ in the bread and wine and his views were developed particularly in controversy with HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531), whom he believed to deny it. His position involved a strong doctrine both of the divinity of Christ and of the communication of attributes, a doctrine holding that anything predicated of Christ’s divinity must also be predicable of his humanity, although the reverse was not at first taught. We shall see that this teaching has had an immense long-term effect. It enabled MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) to argue that because divinity implies omnipresence, the human body of Christ could be present in the eucharistic elements by virtue of its participation in the divine nature. The Formula of Concord (1577) attributed to Christ’s manhood the power of being present simultaneously in many places. Thereafter, Lutheran christology, while not denying the full humanity of Christ, has tended to experience some of the problems consequent in a monophysite position.

The view of JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) and the Reformed, in contrast, was that humanity implied spatial location and this was denied by Lutheran omnipresence. Christ’s body was therefore, by virtue of his ascension, in heaven, and worshippers were enabled to participate in his benefits by the work of the Spirit who brought them into union with him. Calvin also directed criticism against the christology of ANDREAS OSIANDER (1496?–1552) with its tendency to imply the transfusion of divine substance into the human being. Calvin’s christology was not Nestorian, and has recently been shown to owe much to that of Cyril of Alexandria, a primary influence on the Chalcedonian Definition. Reformed christology has, however, sometimes tended in a Nestorian direction because of lingering suggestions that the two natures should be treated almost as entities to be balanced rather than as principles of Christ’s being. Another aspect of Calvin’s christology, which has proved crucial for later developments, is his return to another patristic theme, that the Son remains outside the universe while also becoming incarnate, the so-called Calvinist “extra.” This enabled later Reformed thought to maintain a distinction between God and the world, which is sometimes endangered in recent Lutheran thought. A further influential development was Calvin’s exposition of the relevance of christology by appeal to the three “offices” of Christ as prophet, priest, and king. The ascended Christ exercises his continuing saving activity in the present from the right hand of the Father in the three ways suggested by the offices.

It would be no exaggeration to say that all Protestant christology has thereafter been decisively shaped by the difference between Luther and Calvin. Much of the work of succeeding Protestant theologians, especially on the Reformed side, was dominated by the elaboration and defense of the dogmatic implications of this fundamental divide. The so-called Protestant scholastics were not, however, as that sometimes pejoratively intended description suggests, concerned with abstract elaborations of theological topics, for many of their central concerns arose from a need to respond to objections raised by early modern criticism. At the heart of christological controversy was a renewed concern for the humanity of Christ, supposedly neglected by earlier theology. Faustus Socinus (1539–1604) who could perhaps be called the first modernist Protestant, began the assault by questioning the doctrine of the Trinity and conceiving Jesus as a man endowed with divine powers who was, after his resurrection, endowed with a power equal to God’s (see SOCINIANISM). Later and more radical versions of this approach were to stress Jesus’s humanity at the expense of his divinity, moving toward an assertion of the incompatibility of the divine and human, so that to claim that someone was both divine and human amounted to a logical contradiction. Charges of the inconsistency were reiterated by the philosophers of the ENLIGHTENMENT, building on Benedict Spinoza’s (1632–1677) assault on the credibility of the historical narratives of scripture and the Deists’ denial of the credibility of divine interaction with a mechanistic universe (see DEISM).

Lutheran and Reformed Christology

The supposed failure of Lutheran christology to give space for a truly human Christ attracted criticism in two main forms. According to JOHANNES BRENZ (1499–1570), the incarnate Christ fully exercised divine powers, albeit in a hidden manner, so that his humanity is fully ubiquitous. The position of Martin Chemnitz (1522–1586) was that while Christ had the power to be present in many places at once, he suspended its exercise during his incarnation. To opponents this appeared to be so total an identification of the Word with the human flesh of Jesus that effectively he had no existence outside the flesh. This involved a strong doctrine of the communication of attributes, which was in this case taken to imply that the divine qualities of the Word were transferred to the man Jesus. This came into conflict with modern streams of thought that stressed the humanity of Jesus. Suggestions that qualities such as omnipotence and omniscience were to be attributed to the incarnate Word appeared to contradict the picture presented in the Gospels. This led, in the nineteenth century, to forms of kenotic theory (still largely within the Lutheran tradition) justified by appeal to “he emptied himself” of Philippians 2:7. Kenotic christology represents the development of a distinction sketched by PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560), the first to attempt to provide a handbook of Lutheran teaching, between Christ's being and his state of humiliation, and especially suffering and death, when "his power is not in this moment manifested" (Melancthon 1982:35).

In later development, the idea that Christ suspended the use of the attributes was radicalized to teach that he renounced them at the incarnation. It was taught that in order to be truly human the eternal Son of God divested himself of those divine attributes that appeared to be inconsistent with humanity. It was sometimes held that God's immanent attributes, love for example, could not be altered (note here the line of CHARLES WESLEY'S well-known hymn: "emptied himself of all but love") while the relative attributes, those consequent upon God's relation to the world, could. Christian Thomasius spoke of the finitization rather than alienation of deity, in an act of will according to which the divine consciousness in Jesus became "latent." Notice that the reference to "consciousness" shifts the discussion into characteristically modern terms, for ancient conceptuality was concerned with ontological status rather than some internal characteristic. While Thomasius taught a divesting of the relative divine attributes in order that the immanent attributes—power, truth, holiness, love—might be revealed, more radical exponents rejected the distinction between different forms of attributes, and taught the complete depotentiation of the Word.

The mythological overtones of the teaching of the depotentiation of deity and the criticism that salvation requires the presence and action of one who is truly God, effectively ended the movement in GERMANY. In the twentieth century, the Scottish Congregationalist PETER TAYLOR FORSYTH (1848–1921) so revised the theory that it was scarcely kenosis at all. According to him, the attributes were not renounced but exercised in a new mode of their being. Christ is the Godhead, self-reduced but real, an expression rather than retraction of the infinite God whose infinity contains a capacity for the finite, and whose kenosis leads to a plerosis, a fulfillment. While versions of kenotic theory lingered into the twentieth century, they have suffered damaging criticism, particularly for their mythological form and for appearing to suggest that Christ can only become incarnate by being in some way less than fully divine.

The approach of some of the Reformed to the challenge of Socinianism was rather different. Rather than using kenosis as a theory to bring the human and divine into logical consistency, John Owen (1616–1683) sought a solution in a strong doctrine of the humanity of Christ understood with the help of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. His Son was indeed self-emptied into the flesh, but remained fully the Word. After the incarnation, however, which is indeed the act of the divine Word (that is to say, in the hypostatic union of divine and human in Jesus) it is the Spirit rather than the Word who is the motive force of Jesus' actions. We have Christ as God incarnate, and so fully both human and divine, but maintained in his human integrity by his relation to the Father through the Spirit. Similarly, mainstream Reformed christology on the continent of Europe, as summarized in Heinrich Heppes' compendium of 1861, was classically patristic in form. The divinity of Christ is not that of the divine nature, but of the Word, who did not take to himself a ready-made human being, but added human nature to his eternal and infinite being, a human nature subject in its servant form to all its attendant weaknesses, although in a sinless way. Like Owen, the Reformed dogmatists taught that the Holy Spirit was the agent of Christ's human formation and sanctification.

Enlightenment and Liberalism

In sum: at the center of the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed christology lay the treatment of the communication of attributes, according to which divine and human attributes are, so to speak, transferable. For Lutherans, what is at stake is the relation between the two natures, so that their monophysite tendency derives from a Nestorian question. The Reformed position, by contrast, takes the doctrine, after Cyril of Alexandria, to mean that both divine and human predicates are attributable to the person of Christ by virtue of the union of divine and human in the incarnation. Both christologies, however, were subjected to radical critique in the Enlightenment. Different aspects of the critique can be found in the work of HERMANN S. REIMARUS (1694–1768), GOTTLHOLD E. LESSING (1729–1781), and IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804). In a work published posthumously by Lessing, Reimarus contended that the resurrection of Jesus and the subsequent dogmatic teaching of his divinity was a deliberate invention to mask the failure of his ministry. Rejecting such a simplistic thesis on the grounds of the moral integrity of the writers and the conflicts to be expected in eyewitness accounts, Lessing’s challenge was essentially hermeneutic. For him, between the present and the past lay an “broad ugly ditch” separating modernity from the Jesus of history and epistemologically denying the capacity of historical events, even the Resurrection, to found the certainties of religious belief. Kant’s rationalist and more radical refusal to base christology on anything traditional or historical led him to an essentially moralistic interpretation. The significance Jesus had was as the teacher of a pure rational ethic, of which he accordingly served as an example of what might be discovered by reason, but no more.

Conceding Kant’s case against an objective christology derived from transcendent revelation, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), influenced as he was also by both Moravian piety and Romantic reaction against rationalism (see MORAVIAN CHURCH, ROMANTICISM) sought to expand beyond Kant’s restrictive limits. His was a historical Jesus whose uniquely real experience of God represented the virtual existence of God within him, and so was constitutive and not merely exemplary for succeeding generations. This involved the rejection of two polar considerations that had been definitive for orthodox Protestant theology until that time. On the one hand, the concept of a transcendent redeemer who became incarnate is displaced by an immanent divine force welling up from within history; Jesus’ significance derives from his supreme and unclouded God-consciousness. On the other, the rejection of the Resurrection and ascension as definitive for christology meant the loss of a present Christ—“at the right hand of the Father”—mediated by the Spirit (Calvin’s position), in favor of a form of redemptive experience mediated historically from the past Jesus through the experience of the Christian community transmitted through time. Schleiermacher is one of the first to attempt to base his christology on a historical quest for Jesus, in an attempt to subvert the criticism of Reimarus, Lessing, and Kant. In the appeal to consciousness and to history he is definitive for Protestant christology thereafter. In his hesitancy to accept the full reality of Jesus’ temptation in favor of a concept of “unclouded blessedness,” there is evidence that his historical quest in practice subverted the full humanity of Christ. This is also represented by his marginalizing of the Jewishness of Jesus, something being increasingly corrected in christology after the Second World War.

The other main founder of nineteenth-century Protestant christology, G.W.F. HEGEL (1770–1831), sought to break free from the limits of Kantian rationalism, not by an appeal to experience but by an altered conception of rationality. At the root of his christology is an attempt to mediate between Vorstellung (representation), which referred to the historical and imaginative form in which biblical truth was expounded, and Begriff (concept), which he took to be its inner rational meaning. The essential modernity of Hegel's christology is shown in its tendency to theological immanence, conceiving christology as the realization of divine realities within general history and consequently giving an essentially subjective account of the unique incarnation of the Son of God at a particular time. Christianity is an absolute revelation as the realization of the consciousness of Godmanhood rather than its unique historical instantiation. Here the Lutheran communication of attributes is radicalized. Before this, despite the occasional rhetorical reference to God's death on the cross, the conception had not been reversed because the doctrine of the immutability of God prevented the attribution of human characteristics to God. Hegel, however, not only promotes a strong version of the identity of the divine and human (for him the divine nature is the human), but also develops a christology of the death of God that is of both cultural and theological significance. Earlier theologians had said that God was crucified but construed that in terms of the death of the incarnate Word. Hegel moves a step further, at least suggesting that God simpliciter so dies. Culturally this was later used to argue—for example in Nietzsche—that God has died in our history and is no longer significant for human life. Theologically, it suggests a revised christology according to which the locus of divine action is immanent rather than transcendent. Ultimately, in combination with the cultural trend, it founded an irreversible movement from Vorstellung to Begriff such that it is the human race that is now the only divine Christ. The Lutheran tendency to suggest that what can be attributed to one nature must also be attributable to the other thus leads inexorably to modern secular and “death of God” theologies.

That was not, however, Hegel's position, which was, rather, ambiguous: it remains unclear whether the historical Christ remains “elevated” to a higher philosophical level, or is “abolished” (the two meanings of Hegel's Aufhebung) in favor of a merely immanent cultural process. After Hegel there was a division between the “right” and “left” Hegelians, the former concentrating on the historical, the latter on the conceptual aspects, and this led ultimately to the atheism of Karl Marx (1818–1883) and others. An important transitional figure is DAVID F. STRAUSS (1808–1874), whose radical Hegelianism involved the rejection of all theological interpretation of Jesus on the grounds that it was myth, by which was meant the projection of primitive minds untutored in modern philosophical sophistication. This is another way in which an atheist “christology” became a paradoxical development of the monophysite Lutheran strain in Hegel, according to which the divinity of Jesus becomes the divinity of all.

SÖREN KIERKEGAARD (1813–1855) believed that such general divinizing of the human was but the logical development of Hegel's theory of Begriff, which transmuted the unique divinity of Jesus of Nazareth into something quite different. According to him, Christianity teaches that one man only is divine, while to transmute that into a general human divinity is to revert to paganism. In reaction against it, he returned to the orthodox tradition and proclaimed its essential paradox: the infinite and the finite being contraries, the intellectual and moral offense of christology could not be thought away but only solved practically by living the faith. Only for those who appropriate the truth does its logic become intelligible. Kierkegaard actively welcomed Lessing's challenge because it demonstrated that the logic of christology is equally difficult for any age, including Christ's contemporaries who thus have no advantage over those facing the challenge of belief in the modern age. This was a relatively lone voice, but was to bear fruit in the twentieth century.

Christological immanence tended to rule the day in the nineteenth century, though there are exceptions, which we shall meet. Within a wide range of variations, the following tendencies were prominent. (1) A basis was sought in a more or less modified Hegelianism, according to which history is seen as the locus for divine action, centrally in Jesus. Notable here was the work of I.A.Dorner, who combined elements of Hegel, Schleiermacher, and the classical christological tradition. (2) A basis for christology was sought in historical research, oriented either to a (Kantian) moralism, as in ALBRECHT RITSCHL (1822–1889), or a more experimental approach deriving from Schleiermacher (Rudolf Herrmann). Using a method now characterized as "christology from below," an attempt was made to ground Jesus' divinity in features of his historical career. As with Schleiermacher, however, this method often failed to produce the human Jesus that was so desperately sought, tending to a christology of a divinized man by so elevating the religious or moral qualities of the human being that a Hegelian divinization of the human was reproduced. Paradoxically, an attempt to emphasize the humanity of the savior led to its etherialization.

A Return to Transcendence

At the end of the century, the quest for the historical Jesus came under two-pronged attack. Biblical scholars, prominently Johannes Weiss and Albert Schweitzer, indicated the bourgeois character of the figure presented, and argued that Jesus was a (failed) eschatological preacher rather than a moralist or conveyor of religious experience. Hermeneutical and dogmatic criticism was supplied by Martin Kähler (1835–1912), whose importance lies also in the fact that he influenced KARL BARTH (1886–1968), PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965), and RUDOLF BULTMANN (1884–1976). For him, the gospel writers portrayed the Christ of the gospel proclamation and were wrongly quarried for merely historical information. Unlike Bultmann, however, Kähler was not a historical sceptic, for he believed that the gospel portrayals presented an essentially credible picture. He rather sought a properly theological interpretation of the texts. In America, christology followed a similar course, but under rather different impulses. Defenses of the faith against Arianism and Socinianism in the generations after Jonathan Edwards's strongly trinitarian christology gave way before the influence of unitarianism. During the nineteenth century a rational defense of orthodox Calvinist christology was attempted by Charles Hodge (1797–1878), J.W.Nevin developed a christology with central orientation to the church and the eucharist, while HORACE BUSHNELL (1802–1876) based one on symbol and an appeal to feeling rather than to objective dogmatic truth.

Theological immanentism was not, however, the only direction of nineteenth-century christology, and the example of the Scottish Presbyterian, EDWARD IRVING (1792–1834), is significant for his seeking another route than historical research to establish an adequate doctrine of the humanity of Christ. Apparently, for he does not reveal his sources, building upon Puritan theologians like Owen, Irving argued that the incarnation represented a complete self-emptying of the eternal Son into the human being, Jesus, not at the expense of but as the expression of his divinity. This identification involved his sharing what Irving rashly, for he was convicted of heresy by a church court, called his sinful humanity. His point was not that Christ was sinful, but that the Holy Spirit subdued the sinful tendencies of the flesh to enable the eternal Son to redeem it as truly man through the course of his life and the offering of his death. Like Owen, Irving builds upon Calvin's appeal to the importance for the believer of the human priesthood of Christ as it was expressed in the Letter to the Hebrews.

Another exception to the liberalizing tendency was provided late in the century by P.T.Forsyth, a Scottish pupil of Ritschl teaching in London, who experienced an evangelical conversion on the basis of which he returned to a dogmatic christology. Still influenced by Ritschl, however, he sought a "moralized" dogma from which metaphysics was excluded. Forsyth's Anglican contemporaries—and if some of them were more Catholic than Protestant in orientation, they were affected by and, in turn, helped to shape liberal Protestantism—were mostly exercised with another problem, that of evolution. Following Charles Darwin's (1809–1882) challenge to Christian belief (see DARWINISM), they (particularly J.R.Illingworth) sought to show that the incarnation represented a qualitatively new development of a universal immanence of the Logos in the world. More conservative Anglicans saw in this too much of an accommodation to the intellectual currents of the day, and much twentieth-century English christology did indeed move away from Illingworth's strong hold on the patristic tradition, via the kenoticism of Gore, into scepticism about the orthodox position.

The early Karl Barth changed the direction of much Protestant christology by (1) rejecting as inconsistent his teacher Rudolf Herrmann's combination of experience and historical christology; (2) accepting the eschatological christology of recent New Testament interpretation, which he took to be a virtue rather than a problem; and (3) adding a liberal dose of Kierkegaardian paradox. This was not, however, a dogmatic christology as much as one of event, according to which in Jesus Christ the unknown God breaks "vertically," and so, according to this conception, eschatologically, on to the horizontal plane of history. Dogma was held at bay by what Barth later believed was an excessive appeal to existentialist—and so subjectivist—conceptuality. Although he replaced this with a trinitarian theology of revelation to which God the Son's revelatory incarnation in space and time was central, his later dogmatic christology remains one of event, according to which Jesus Christ is God taking place in time in order to bring about his purposes of universal reconciliation. This was, however, by no means a straightforward return to classical christology, for Barth sought to transcend the static conceptuality of the tradition by weaving together, in a single multivolume development, both what dogmatics had distinguished as the person and work of Christ and the Reformed notion of Christ's three offices as priest, king, and prophet (notice the change of order). Jesus Christ is at once God's priestly condescension to the human condition, the "Royal Man" brought by God to authentic human action and the "Victor," the prophet who overturns evil by the revelation of divine reconciliation achieved in him. In its tendency to identify Jesus as God's self-giving in time, Barth's christology is, in many respects, more Lutheran than Calvinist in shape, with a heavy stress on the incarnation as God's self-humiliation to the human condition. This was a successful way of overcoming the kenotic approach, for God's very divinity is not renounced but revealed and expressed in his capacity to become human. However, there is a price to pay in the fact that Barth is more successful in characterizing the humanity of God (as he later summed up his approach) than the humanity of Jesus, which tends to fade into the background.

Barth and Beyond

Widespread influence was also exercised by two of Barth's contemporaries, who maintained a more positive orientation to existentialism. Rudolf Bultmann eschewed all historical and dogmatic basis for christology, centering on the rise of the Resurrection faith in the church and the appeal of the proclaimed Christ. Where Kähler had said that the real Christ is the proclaimed Christ, Bultmann made it only the preached Christ. Tillich is more difficult to characterize. His christology in his Systematic Theology 2 was widely greeted as a modern version of orthodox christology, but both rejected patristic conceptuality and marginalized the historical Jesus in an inverted kenotic christology according to which Jesus is conceived to empty himself of his particular humanity in order that the New Being might be realized through him.

Of Barth's pupils, the first to make a major impact was DIETRICH BONHOEFFER (1906–1945), to whose legacy there are two sides. His early lectures, published in English as Christology, focused on the question of who, rather than what, is Jesus, and were strongly oriented to the Chalcedonian tradition. Under the impact of his later criticism of Barth, his christology took on a more Lutheran character, strongly identifying God with the one who died on the cross in a suggestion that on the cross God allows himself to be driven out of the world for the sake of a "religionless" Christianity. Though clearly not intended by Bonhoeffer, this later helped to give rise, especially in America, to death of God christologies, with their Hegelian suggestion that God immolates himself in the death of Jesus on the cross.

More directly in line with Barth in the later twentieth century is T.F. Torrance (1913-) who, however, injected a more directly patristic note. For Torrance, Athanasius's concept of the homoousios—God the Son as "one in being" with God the Father—serves several purposes. It establishes a positive relation between God and the created realms of time and space and enables parallels to be drawn between patristic theology and the epistemology of modern science. At the same time, it provides the basis for a strong reassertion of the classical teaching of the divinity of God the Son and his unique, revelatory, and saving historical incarnation. While Torrance's strong objectivism and appeal to rationality represent developments beyond Barth, albeit within a similar framework, two of his German successors have proved more critical. Wolfhart Pannenberg (1928–) critical of Barth's subjectivism (his irrational appeal to revelation) sought to base christology not in credal assertions from above, but from below in the findings of historical research, where he sought also to undermine Bultmann's historical scepticism. Combining an argument for the historicity of the resurrection with a conception of history adapted from Hegel, he argued that Jesus is, by virtue of the Resurrection, retroactively confirmed in oneness with God. In his Systematic Theology, Pannenberg bases this on the trinitarian notion of the Son's self-distinction from the Father, a self-distinction taking form in the incarnation and confirmed by the Resurrection to be such. In some contrast, while sharing an eschatological orientation, JÜRGEN MOLTMANN (1926–) developed a christology whose orientation was political and apologetic. Taking his starting point from the problem of Auschwitz, he developed a concept of Jesus as the “crucified God” redeeming the suffering of the world by sharing it. This was expanded into a “messianic” christology whose political implications are prominent.

The latter half of the twentieth century opened with the reassertion in the English-speaking world of christologies, some of them atheist, owing much to Bultmann and Strauss. More recently it has become common to encounter theologies of the incarnation that are undefensively articulated as intrinsic to any Christian theology. Most striking is the christology of the Lutheran Robert Jenson, who makes appeal to the christology of Brenz in developing a doctrine strongly oriented to church and Eucharist, and teaching that Jesus is raised from the dead into, almost as, the church. Jenson is relatively uninterested in the lineaments of the human life and sinlessness of Jesus, and thus his work is in marked contrast with recent developments in Reformed christology, which take up the appeal to the Spirit in Owen and Irving, and to the notion of recapitulation in Irenaeus of Lyons. According to this, Jesus of Nazareth is the eternal Son of God who does the work of God as one who is fully human, recapitulating the human story and offering to God the Father, through the Spirit, a truthful, free, and obedient gift of his whole life on behalf of others.

References

- Heppe, Heinrich. Reformed Dogmatics. Translated by G.T. Thomson. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1978, 371–509.
- Mackintosh, H.R. The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000.
- McCormack, Bruce. For Us and Our Salvation. Incarnation and Atonement in the Reformed Tradition. Princeton: Princeton Theological Seminary, 1993.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart. Jesus—God and Man. Translated by L. Wilkins and D.Priebe. London: SCM Press, 1968.
- Schweitzer, Albert. The Quest of the Historical Jesus. Translated by W.Montgomery. London: Adam and Charles Black, 1954.
- Stevens, B.M. The Prism of Time and Eternity. Images of Christ in American Protestant Thought from Jonathan Edwards to Horace Bushnell. Lanham and London: Scarecrow Press, 1997.
- Thompson, John. Christ in Perspective in the Theology of Karl Barth. Edinburgh: St. Andrew Press, 1978.
- Welch, Claude, ed., God and Incarnation in Mid-Nineteenth Century German Theology. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.

COLIN GUNTON

CHUBB, THOMAS (1679–1747)

Radical Deist. Chubb was born September 29, 1679 in Salisbury, ENGLAND. He was self-taught, working as a glover and then a tallow-chandler. His reading of WILLIAM WHISTON'S Primitive Christianity Revived inspired his own writing, in an Arian frame, of the Supremacy of the Father Asserted (1711), the first of a long line of books, which appeared in the 1730s and 1740s, discussing the relationship of reason and revelation and the personhood of God. In this he had the financial support of Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls, and others. Chubb claimed to be a Christian and a believer.

His works were noted by Alexander Pope (who described him as “a wonderful phenomenon of Wiltshire”) and other admirers for the radical way in which they popularized Edward’s Deist views and challenged older theological and philosophical assumptions. He merited a direct challenge from JONATHAN EDWARDS in treatise “On the Freedom of the Will” (1754). Chubb proclaimed the supremacy of reason over scripture. The New Testament was called the “fountain of confusion and contradiction” that required verification and restoration to its primitive simplicity. In his book The True Gospel of Jesus Christ Asserted...morality alone can make men acceptable to God (1738), Chubb maintained that following the teaching of Jesus Christ, exemplified in Jesus’s life-words, was sufficient for SALVATION. He considered Jesus a unique person, fully human but subordinate to the Father.

He remained single and went regularly to his parish church in Salisbury. After his death on February 8, 1747 several of his writings appeared as Posthumous Works. His work continued to be read widely in the UNITED STATES.

See also Deism

References and Further Reading

Hillerbrand, Hans J. A Fellowship of Discontent. New York: Harper and Row, 1967.

TIM MACQUIBAN

CHURCH

According to the Christian understanding the church is found in the Old Testament as well as in the New. In both Testaments, the church means the “gathered people of God” (literally, “the assembly”). A common thread—the verb “to call”—links the Hebrew and the Greek meanings. The church is the community called by the covenant-making and covenant-keeping God from among the nations to worship God and to be the instrument of God's purpose in the world. In the New Testament, ekklesia (assembly=church) is used in three senses: of the local congregation, the community where spiritual gifts are exercised; of the church generically, wherever it is found; and of the mystical church, the body that has Christ as its head. The Latin equivalent ecclesia gives us the English words "ecclesiastical" and "ecclesiology." (The word "church" for a building comes from a different word, related to the Scots "kirk" and meaning "belonging to the Lord.")

Forms of the Church

All Christian traditions acknowledge at least two fundamental expressions or instantiations of church: the church in a parish or neighborhood and the universal church. The REFORMATION emphasized the idea of "particular" churches, which were coterminous with nations, countries, or cities (e.g., the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the Church of Geneva), while also acknowledging the universal visible church, made up of particular churches. The reformers claimed that these churches had the AUTHORITY and duty to reform themselves, even when the universal church could not act as one. The notion of particular churches is important for the Reformation principle of diversity of traditions and practices (as opposed to centrally enforced global uniformity). In modern terms, it promotes the inculturation of the Gospel in diverse contexts.

The Roman Catholic Church is a globally organized church, with its symbolic and administrative center in Rome, made up of dioceses led by their bishops and referred to as "local churches." Episcopally ordered churches understand the diocese ecclesologically, not merely functionally or administratively, and see it as an authentic expression of church. There is an unresolved disagreement in Roman Catholic thought over the question of whether the local church or the universal church is primary. Does the diocese exist because there is already a universal church, or is the universal church possible because it is made up of dioceses? The question can be translated into congregational—universal terms for non-Episcopal churches.

In today's culture, the ecclesial center of gravity rests with the local church, and it is not easy to persuade Christians to invest ecclesial value in more remote structures. The notion of the "gathered church," which belongs to the Congregationalist strand of ecclesiology and is found among BAPTISTS and Pentecostals, is the image of church that is most congenial to postmodern CULTURE, which looks for an eclectic convergence of the like-minded. Christians today find it hard to see that they could be part of something on a regional, national, or global scale, or that they could be accountable to a "higher" level of oversight for what is done locally. The territorial understanding of church, based on the parochial and diocesan structure that remains important to the historic churches of Europe, is an opaque concept to many modern Christians. Its mission potential, involving the offer of pastoral ministry to all in the community, is seldom appreciated.

One, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church

In the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, Christians confess that they believe in “one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church.” In its creedal context, this statement is clearly an affirmation of faith. Its reference is eschatological, looking to the fulfilment of the purposes of God, rather than empirical, looking at the church as we know it. Churches shaped substantially by the Reformation (the Protestant churches) or touched significantly by it (the Church of England and the other churches of the Anglican Communion) are careful not to identify their institutions with the “one church” of the creed, though they believe their churches to be expressions of the one church or to participate in it. The Roman Catholic Church articulates an ambiguous relation to the “one church”, holding that the latter “subsists in” the former, but not identifying the two without remainder. It is the Orthodox churches, however, that come closest to identifying themselves with the church of the creed in an exclusive sense. They do not recognize any other church—not even the Roman Catholic Church—as “the church.”

The four dimensions or attributes of the church that are affirmed in the creed are widely interpreted along the following lines. They are to be seen as both gift and task; they belong to the realm of GRACE, yet they entail a human responsibility to actualize them. Ordained ministers and especially bishops (in churches that have them) are particularly entrusted with this responsibility.

The unity of the church is grounded confessionally in the apostolic faith, to which the Scriptures testify and that the creeds articulate. It is grounded sacramentally in BAPTISM and comes to fuller expression in the Eucharist (see LORD’S SUPPER). The unity of ministry and oversight also belongs to the oneness of the church. Whereas Christian history contains a sorry tale of division and fragmentation, doctrinal disagreement, and formal schism, the ecumenical movement has begun to reverse this inveterate trend, and relations between churches have been transformed during the twentieth century. Church unity is not an all-or-nothing matter and should not be identified with some hypothetical future “crunch point.” It is inherent in the existence of the church and comes to expression in a graduated and progressive way.

The holiness of the church does not refer primarily to the actual purity of its members, for they remain imperfect and do not entirely avoid sin; rather, it refers to the sanctifying purpose of God. It is God who chooses, calls, justifies and sanctifies the church and will in the end glorify her and make her perfect in Christ. However, the church is progressively made holy in each generation by the ministry of the Word and of the SACRAMENTS, combined with pastoral care and oversight.

The catholicity of the church refers to its universal scope. (MARTIN LUTHER substituted “universal” for “catholic” in the Creed: he brought out the meaning but sacrificed a precious Christian term.) The church catholic is intended to meet the needs and embrace the aspirations of all humankind. As the mother of Christians, the church catholic embraces all God’s children. As with the other creedal attributes of the church, catholicity is often impaired and lacks credibility, especially when particular marginalized groups feel themselves excluded.

The apostolicity of the church refers to its foundation in the teaching and witness of the apostles as we find it in the New Testament, and to the imperative of continuing their mission. The marks of apostolicity consist of all of the permanent characteristics of the church of the apostles as these have been perpetuated in the church in visible continuity, especially the ministry of the Word, of the sacraments and of oversight. The reformers stressed that apostolicity resided in faithfulness to the apostles' DOCTRINE, not in a chain of ordinations. However, ecumenical dialogue has tended to recognize that episcopal succession can be a sign, though not a guarantee of the continuing apostolicity of the church, because bishops have a particular (but not exclusive) responsibility for teaching and defending the apostolic faith. As with unity, holiness, and catholicity, the church often fails to be completely faithful to its apostolic foundation and falters in its mission. This makes it all the more important that she should confess the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church as an act of faith and commitment.

The Reformation and the Church

The reformers may be said to have concentrated single-mindedly on the christological center of the church—on what makes the church the church—and to have been fairly unconcerned with the circumference of the visible church and with patrolling the boundary. Sixteenth-century Christians agonized over the question of the true church, the assumption being that one was true and others were false; in one, SALVATION was to be found; in the other, it was not. Luther and JOHN CALVIN found the marks of the true church in word and sacrament truly taught and practiced according to Christ's institution. But John Calvin, a second generation reformer added the mark of discipline (effective pastoral oversight that required the cooperation of the magistrate) to the word and sacrament. The Anabaptists insisted on forming the true church, composed of conscious beliefs, a church "without spots or wrinkles." Some on the radical wing of the Reformation took an intense interest in the doctrinal and liturgical (or rather nonliturgical) purity of the congregation and reveled in the power of excommunication.

The popular rhetoric of the Reformation condemned the Roman Catholic Church, in its incorrigibly unreformed state, as ANTICHRIST, but Luther, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, and Calvin were more judicious. The papacy was one thing—it persecuted the reform—but the community of the baptized faithful, with all its ignorance, was another. True Christians were to be found in every time and place. The Roman Church contained vestiges of the Church of Christ. Certain reforms that were resisted by the Roman Catholic Church in the sixteenth century, such as the vernacular liturgy, communion in both kinds (the wine as well as the bread), and promoting the study of Scriptures throughout the church, were implemented four centuries later by the Second Vatican Council. Other issues were partly resolved or at least clarified by ecumenical dialogue, notably the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION and the ministry of the Bishop of Rome. Relations between the Protestant (and Anglican) churches on the one hand and the Roman Catholic Church on the other hand have been transformed by the ecumenical movement.

Anglican Developments

In Anglican ecclesiology at the turn of the sixteenth century, RICHARD HOOKER and Richard Field placed more emphasis than the continental reformers did on the universal visible church and on the profession of baptismal faith taken at face value. Hooker affirmed that pre-Reformation Christians had been saved. He rejected the term “the invisible church” and spoke instead of “the church mystical.” Field saw the Council of Trent as the watershed when the Roman Catholic Church decisively rejected the reform and canonised false doctrine.

For two centuries after the Reformation, the Church of England saw itself as a sister church of the Lutheran and Reformed churches. Anglican divines, however High Church, recognized non-Episcopal Protestant ministries on the Continent, though they condemned nonconformists in England for schism (see NONCONFORMITY). After 1662, the Church of England required Episcopal ordination for all her clergy. The influence of the Nonjurors (from 1688) and then of the OXFORD MOVEMENT (from 1833) soured the Anglican view of non-Episcopal churches until Anglican ecclesiology came back into balance in the late twentieth century. Agreements such as MEISSEN, PORVOO, and Called to Common Mission made possible various degrees of communion between Anglican and Lutheran churches in Europe and North America.

Visible and Invisible

For Luther, the empirical church, even when reformed, was deceptive; it could never be revelatory of the real church, which was a mystery that was hidden and could be glimpsed only by the eyes of FAITH. Calvin also stressed the mystical dimension of the church and located it in the union of believers with Christ through the Holy Spirit, by means of the instrumentality of faith, BAPTISM, the Lord’s Supper, and the local fellowship. Calvin’s emphasis on the means of grace indicates that he had a stronger doctrine of the institutional fabric of the church than Luther did.

The relationship between the visible and the invisible (mystical) dimensions of the church is an index of Catholic and Protestant emphases (albeit dealing in simplifications and stereotypes). Precisely in this area, the Leuenberg Fellowship document The Church of Jesus Christ reveals both development and tension in modern Protestant ecclesiology. For all the gains of the ecumenical movement, including basic agreement on a range of disputed doctrines (not least justification), Roman Catholics, Orthodox, Protestants, and Anglicans have not succeeded in reaching solid agreement about the nature or being of the church.

See also Anglicanism; Bishop and Episcopacy; Ecclesiology; Ecumenism; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Lutheranism; Pentecostalism; Orthodox, Eastern

References and Further Reading

- Avis, P. The Anglican Understanding of the Church, London: SPCK, 2000.
- . Anglicanism and the Christian Church: Theological Resources in Historical Perspective, revised and expanded ed. London and New York: Continuum/T. & T.Clark, 2002.
- . The Church in the Theology of the Reformers, Eugene OR: Wipf and Stock Publishers, 2002b.
- , ed. The Christian Church: An Introduction to the Major Traditions. London: SPCK, 2002.
- Carter, D. Love Bade Me Welcome: A British Methodist Perspective on the Church, Peterborough, UK: Epworth Press, 2002.
- Küng, H. The Church, London: Search Press, 1971.
- Leuenberg Church Fellowship Main. The Church of Jesus Christ: The Contribution of the Reformation Towards Ecumenical Dialogue on Church Unity. Frankfurt, Germany: Otto Lembeck, 1996.
- Preston, G. Faces of the Church: Meditations on a Mystery and Its Images. Edinburgh, UK: T. & T.Clark, 1997.
- Schwöbel, C. The Creature of the Word: Recovering the Ecclesiology of the Reformers, in On Being the Church: Essays on the Christian Community, edited by C.E.Gunton and D.W. Hardy. Edinburgh, UK: T. & T.Clark, 1989, pp 110–155.

PAUL AVIS

CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW

Protestants have adopted varying understandings on church-state issues, ranging from an advocacy of theocracy (the church controlling the state) to Erastianism (the state controlling the church). Many Protestants have favored an established church, where the church receives governmental support, but many Protestants have also advocated the separation of church and state. The disparity in Protestant church-state views arises from the multitude of theological, cultural, and historical factors that have influenced the development of differing church traditions.

Martin Luther and Lutheranism

Early in its history the Western church sought to delineate the roles played by church and state. In The City of God Augustine of Hippo argued that the City of God (roughly, the church) and the City of Man (roughly, the state) were two separate kingdoms with different loves and different organizing principles. MARTIN LUTHER sought to preserve the Augustinian distinction of the two kingdoms, but over time, he granted the state greater control over the life of the church. He eventually went so far as to declare that it was incumbent on the magistrate to root out HERESY and ensure proper church order. In 1528 Luther was instrumental in giving legitimacy to the visitations, a program in which the rulers sent out visitors to inquire and correct errors in the Protestant churches. Luther also abandoned his early opposition to persecution of heretics, and by 1530 he consented to the imposition of the death penalty for Anabaptists.

The determinative role played by the state in Lutheran church affairs was codified in law as LUTHERANISM spread. The Danish Church Ordinance of 1539 declared that the Christian monarch should supervise the PREACHING of the word, the administration of the SACRAMENTS, and the Christian care and upbringing of children and the poor (see CHILDHOOD; CHARITY). Other Scandinavian countries that embraced the Lutheran REFORMATION passed similar ordinances. The Peace of Augsburg of 1555, a settlement between the territorial rulers of GERMANY and the emperor, stipulated that princes were to determine whether their territory would embrace Lutheranism or Catholicism, giving the ruler the supreme right to determine religious affairs within its borders.

John Calvin and the Reformed Churches

JOHN CALVIN'S social vision was of a holy commonwealth united under God wherein state and church remained institutionally separate but worked together to transform society. As with Luther, Calvin declared that only spiritual tools were available to the church's ministry. The state, on the other hand, was charged with maintaining order and enforcing outward conformity to the Ten Commandments and other biblical precepts. Calvin appealed to the biblical example of Old Testament kings who were "much praised in Scripture for restoring the worship of God when it had been corrupted and overturned."

Some commentators have labeled Calvin's churchstate program a theocracy, but this term is misleading. A theocracy is literally a governmental system in which God rules the nation, but the word is used loosely to describe a government in which clergy hold the reins of power. Calvin never advocated such a system and insisted that the church was not to be a territorial power. Calvin even declared that Jesus Christ himself "intended to debar the ministers of his word from civil domination and worldly powers."

An important church-state idea that emerged in Calvin's writing was the doctrine of interposition. Lesser magistrates had the right and Christian duty to restrain the wickedness of a tyrannical king, even to the point of deposing him. JOHN KNOX, a disciple of Calvin and a leader of early Scottish PRESBYTERIANISM, went beyond Calvin regarding the right to revolution. Whereas Calvin limited the right of interposition to lesser magistrates, Knox declared it the duty of all Christians to overthrow a tyrant. For Knox silence in the face of tyranny implied complicity with injustice.

Anglicanism and the English Reformation

The English Reformation of HENRY VIII was marked by the Erastian tendency in most forms of religious establishment, that is, the priority of the state over the church. Henry VIII severed his nation's ties to the papacy when the pope refused to annul Henry's marriage to Catherine of Aragon. Henry made himself the head of the English church, and Parliament issued the Supremacy Act of 1534, which declared the monarch to be “the supreme head in earth of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND,” with “full power and authority from time to time to visit, repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, and amend all such errors, heresies, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities,” within the church. He and his successors sought to establish a single, uniform religious policy for all of ENGLAND. Every aspect of church life—DOCTRINE, sacraments, vestments, education, and charity work—came under the purview of the crown. When Queen ELIZABETH I came to the throne, the Supremacy Act was reaffirmed in 1559 with only slight alteration, and all church officials were required to swear that the monarch was “the only supreme governor of this realm.”

English Puritanism

In doctrine and temperament Henry and most of his heirs were not truly interested in reforming their church along Protestant lines, but their break from Rome opened the door for more thoroughgoing Protestants to push for greater ecclesiastical reform. Calvinistic Puritans, the largest group of Protestant dissenters, wanted to do away with the trappings of Roman Catholicism that remained in the Anglican church (see CALVINISM; PURITANISM; ANGLICANISM). Their agitation for a more thoroughly Protestantized church threatened to undo the complex via media, or middle way, established by Queen Elizabeth to placate moderate Catholics and Protestants. When James I came to the English throne, he sought to stamp out the Puritan challenge and forced many of them to flee to relative safety in the New World. Later King Charles I appointed WILLIAM LAUD as archbishop of Canterbury, and Laud’s zealous pursuit of Puritan dissenters caused growing popular unrest. By 1642 Puritans in Parliament presented the king with their “Grand Remonstrance,” a statement of grievances and suggested solutions, but it was then too late. Puritan militants and other opponents of the crown rebelled, and in the wake of this CIVIL WAR, the king was executed and a Puritan commonwealth formed in 1649. Under the leadership of OLIVER CROMWELL, the commonwealth sought to advance Protestant interests, and Protestants of all stripes were given a fair degree of toleration. Cromwell urged Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Independents to learn how to coexist. When Cromwell died in 1658, however, the monarchy granted TOLERATION to both Puritans and Catholics, but such toleration came at the price of periodic persecution and the removal of certain rights. The Test Act of 1673, for example, excluded all nonconformists (i.e., non-Anglicans) from holding civil, ecclesiastical, or military posts.

Anabaptists and the Radical Reformation

Perhaps the most important Protestant reinterpretation of church-state relations was promoted by the Anabaptists. Unlike other Protestants, these “Radical Reformers” rejected any state-established church and sought to create a pure church made up of only sincere believers. Most Anabaptists embraced a dualistic theology that highlighted the disjunction between the church and the world. The SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION, an early Anabaptist statement of faith, declared that all people are “in but two classes, good and bad, believing and unbelieving, darkness and light, the world and those who have departed the world, God's temple and idols, Christ and Belial; and none can have part with the other." This dualism, when combined with a principle of nonresistance, led most Anabaptists to withdraw from all association with the government. Anabaptists neither sought nor accepted aid from the state. Whereas Luther and Calvin saw the two spheres of temporal and spiritual power as harmonious in the plan of God, the Anabaptists tended to see them at war with each other. MENNO SIMONS, a leader of Dutch ANABAPTISM, declared: "No, no, Christ Jesus and His powerful Word and the Spirit of God are the caretakers and defenders of the church, and not, forever not, the emperor, king, or any worldly power!"

Menno Simons became the spokesperson for the movement after Protestant and Catholic magistrates had martyred most of the early Anabaptist leaders. Menno recognized the state as an institution established by God, but he insisted that it lay outside the perfection of Christ. Most Anabaptists therefore disavowed that a Christian could serve in civil government and refused to pass judgment in civil disputes with unbelievers.

Contemporary Protestant Developments

Each of the church-state positions that developed during the Reformation continues to provide the foundation for current Protestant ideas on this subject. Most Protestants, especially in the UNITED STATES, have moved away from the exclusivist forms of religious establishment that emerged in the Reformation, although a few Protestant communities continue to advocate a closer union between church and state.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Lutheran establishment continued relatively unchanged in most countries. Although church and state were separated in Germany in 1919, many Protestants supported the "German Christian" movement, which favored a close alliance between the church and Hitler's Third Reich (see GERMAN CHRISTIANS). Those who opposed this attempt to establish a Nazified church formed the CONFESSING CHURCH movement, whose BARMEN DECLARATION proclaimed Jesus Christ alone as Lord of his church. After World War II most Lutheran nations in Europe retained some form of church establishment, although SWEDEN officially disestablished the Lutheran church in 2000. In America Lutherans have embraced the separation of church and state inherent in America's constitutional system.

The Anglican church-state model has also remained relatively unchanged, although this may change in the early years of the twenty-first century. The British state takes a less active role in church affairs, but Parliament must still give approval to important clerical decisions and appointments. At the end of the twentieth century, there have been repeated calls for full disestablishment of the Church of England. Already, the English government funds schools across religious lines, including Anglican, Jewish, Muslim, Catholic, Sikh, and Adventist schools. Prince Charles, the presumptive heir to the throne at the turn of the twenty-first century, indicated that he would prefer to be called the Defender of the Faiths, rather than the Defender of the Faith.

A diversity of views marks the contemporary state of Reformed Protestant understandings of church and state. Mainline Presbyterians and Congregationalists in the United States have been among the strongest supporters of church-state separation. Barry

Lynn, the executive director of AMERICANS UNITED FOR SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, is an ordained minister in the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, a progressive denomination with Calvinistic roots. On the other hand, some conservative Presbyterians have become strong proponents of greater cooperation of church and state (see PRESBYTERIANISM). In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Calvinistic Dutch theologian and prime minister ABRAHAM KUYPER helped formulate the doctrine of sphere sovereignty, which declared that society was made up of various institutions like church, state, and FAMILY that exercised authority in clearly defined social spheres. Because such structural pluralism is normative, each social sphere is able to safeguard society from lapsing into some form of authoritarianism. According to this doctrine, church and state support each other in an attempt to promote wholesome community life. KARL BARTH, a Reformed theologian and important advocate of NEO-ORTHODOXY in the middle part of the twentieth century, stressed that the state was not outside of Christ's dominion and that the church had an obligation to oversee and, when necessary, criticize the state whenever government sought to establish itself as an absolute power.

In America the Christian Reconstructionist movement has taken the emphasis on God's moral law found in the thought of John Calvin and turned it into a theological system advocating the reconstruction of civil society according to the dictates of Old Testament civil and moral law. Reconstructionists have gone so far as to advocate the reestablishment of the death penalty for such infractions as blasphemy or HOMOSEXUALITY. Christian Reconstructionism has had an impact outside of traditional Reformed circles, and a number of charismatic churches have adopted part of the Christian Reconstructionist theology under the rubric of "Dominion Theology."

Modern Anabaptists have remained true to their view of the disjuncture between church and state. Many conservative Anabaptists such as the AMISH in North America have adopted a "come-outer" mentality of withdrawing from all aspects of society, including participation in government. Other MENNONITES have sought to walk a finer line concerning the amount of participation they should have in the state. Anabaptist theologian John Howard Yoder argued quite persuasively in his book, The Politics of Jesus, that Anabaptist principles should play an important role in modern society. Although not confusing the kingdoms of this world with the KINGDOM OF GOD, Yoder and similar Anabaptists like Ronald Sider of Evangelicals for Social Action have sought to bring the ETHICS of the Sermon of the Mount into play in the political arena.

Although the churches of the Radical Reformation are relatively small today, Anabaptists' church-state views have had a great impact on the large and growing Baptist church movement. Most contemporary Baptist groups are not directly related to the Anabaptist movement of the Reformation, but they have historically embraced the Anabaptist emphasis on the separation of church and state. BAPTISTS of the eighteenth century like ISAAC BACKUS and John Leland were at the forefront for disestablishment in colonial America. Today, such organizations as the Baptist Joint Committee on Public Affairs and the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE remain strong advocates of religious liberty worldwide. Nevertheless, with the rise of the CHRISTIAN RIGHT in the United States in the last quarter of the twentieth century, many conservative Baptists have moved to a more accommodationist perspective in church-state matters. Although still wishing to promote religious liberty for all, groups like the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION have sought to counter a perceived trend toward secularism in public life. Conservatives like Richard Land, the head of the Southern Baptist Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, see themselves as moderate separationists who remain vigorously opposed to religious coercion but are unwilling to accept perceived government hostility toward religion. Some independent, fundamentalist Baptists have gone beyond accommodation and embraced parts of the Christian Reconstructionist agenda developed by conservative Calvinist theologians (see FUNDAMENTALISM).

Liberal Protestantism, a term that covers the “Mainline” Protestant churches represented in the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, has adopted a position that embraces a transformational role for the church in society (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM & LIBERALISM). Emphasizing the prophetic need for social justice, the World Council of Churches has stated that the church must make common cause with oppressed people around the globe, even to the point of supporting mass political movements and revolution.

References and Further Reading

- Baylor, Michael G., ed. The Radical Reformation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Cromartie, Michael, ed. Caesar's Coin Revisited: Christians and the Limits of Government. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 1996.
- Feldman, Stephen M. Law and Religion: A Critical Anthology. New York: New York University Press, 2000.
- Hankins, Barry. “Principle, Perception, and Position: Why Southern Baptist Conservatives Differ from Moderates on Church-State Issues.” Journal of Church and State 40 (1998):343–370.
- Holloway, James Y., ed. Barth, Barmen, and the Confessing Church Today. Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen Press, 1995.
- Hopfl, Harro. Luther and Calvin on Secular Authority. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Kelly, Douglas F. The Emergence of Liberty in the Modern World. Phillipsburg, NJ: P & R Publishing, 1992.
- Maclear, J.F., ed. Church and State in the Modern Age: A Documentary History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Sanders, Thomas G. Protestant Concepts of Church and State: Historical Backgrounds and Approaches for the Future. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1964.
- Smith, Gary Scott, ed. God and Politics: Four Views on the Reformation of Civil Government. Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1989.
- Villa-Vicencio, Charles. Between Christ and Caesar: Classical and Contemporary Texts on Church and State. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1986.
- Yoder, John Howard. The Politics of Jesus. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1972.

ALBERT BECK

CHURCH DISCIPLINE

The term “church discipline” was used among sixteenth-century Protestants in a variety of interlocking ways. Its principal meanings include proper polity and moral and social control exercised by the CHURCH.

In one usage, church discipline denotes proper polity. This was particularly common in francophone areas, where discipline and police were used nearly interchangeably to convey the notion of proper ordering of church government. "Discipline" in this sense is listed as the third mark of the true church (along with proper preaching and administration of the sacraments) in THEODORE BEZA'S Confession, where the Latin disciplina translates the French police; it also appears in this sense in the Discipline ecclésiastique (the church order for the French Reformed Churches), the Police de l'Eglise Réformée de Bayeux (1563), and the Police et Discipline de l'Eglise de Saint-Lô (1563), both local church orders, as well as in the Presbyterian Church's Book of Discipline.

The primary and better known meaning of church discipline, however, involves enforcement of Christian morality and behavior. Although church discipline in this sense is frequently considered a characteristic of Reformed Protestantism, communities across all the confessional divides in early modern Europe shared a concern about improving public and, in many areas, private morality. The late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries saw an increase in legislation intended to raise the moral standards of society. This could take a variety of forms, ranging from prohibitions of begging, to restrictions on WOMEN'S participation in public life, to shutting down brothels. Many scholars associate this development with the beginnings of ABSOLUTISM, noting that it coincides with the growing centralization of the state and its increasing reach into people's lives. In this context church discipline has been seen as the tool used by the state to claim moral authority and exert social control over their communities, particularly in Protestant regions where the church was itself a branch of the state. Yet some of the most extreme views of church discipline came not from state churches but from sectarian groups that self-consciously separated themselves from the state. A complete explanation of the rise of church discipline must therefore take into account elements unrelated to incipient absolutism; one particularly significant influence seems to have been economic uncertainty caused by the Price Revolution, which led to a growing anxiety about moral standards in society similar to the call to return to traditional values that arises in times of economic uncertainty in American history.

Church discipline has been part of Christianity from its earliest days. The early church insisted on its right to oversee and enforce standards of faith and practice within the community. Over time this developed into the penitential system of the medieval church. There were two basic approaches to discipline in this period, one for the LAITY and secular clergy, and the other for the regular CLERGY. The laity and secular clergy were subject to discipline by the episcopal hierarchy, administered by parish priests through the sacrament of penance, episcopal courts, and the papal court; bishops also ordered visitations to oversee the morals of the laity and clergy in their diocese. Sanctions included prohibition from participating in the SACRAMENTS (minor excommunication), complete exclusion from the Christian community (major excommunication), and eventually cutting off all sacraments from a region whose ruler was in rebellion against papal authority (interdict). For the regular clergy the rule of life under which they lived was ideally at the heart of their discipline: it both governed their external behavior and ordered their inward life, creating an interior discipline that was far different from what was expected of secular clergy and the laity.

Both secular and regular forms of discipline carried through in different ways into Protestantism. MARTIN LUTHER repudiated much of the monastic concept of discipline, arguing that one's inner life should be shaped by PREACHING and teaching, whereas external discipline was a matter of rules and regulations rather than the Spirit. Luther himself tended to leave institutional matters to laymen and the civil government. Although some of his followers attempted to introduce disciplinary institutions, these were generally unsuccessful: ecclesiastical involvement in social control was seen as a return to “papal tyranny,” and thus regulation of morals was typically left in the hands of the government with limited involvement of pastors. For HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and the Reformed tradition, on the other hand, internal and external discipline were connected. The church had a responsibility to enforce Christian standards of behavior both for the sake of the sanctity of the community and for shaping the internal life of the believer. Thus Zwingli and the Zurich city council established a marriage court whose provenance included not simply betrothals, marriages, and the regulation of SEXUALITY, but other moral issues such as gambling, profligacy, drunkenness, gluttony, and sumptuary laws. The involvement of the civil government tended to overshadow the church’s role in discipline in Zurich and most other Zwinglian areas, however. Nonetheless, one particularly important contribution to the development of Reformed concepts of discipline came from JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS in Basel. He attempted to establish courts in each parish composed of a group of lay elders plus the pastor to enforce Christian standards of behavior. Although he met with only limited success, these courts would become the prototype for disciplinary institutions in much of the Reformed world in the coming decades.

Neither the Lutheran nor the Reformed approaches to social discipline were strict enough for some, notably many of the Anabaptists and other sectarian groups (see ANABAPTISM). These groups typically rejected the idea of a state church and condemned the lax moral and spiritual standards of the churches of their day. Instead, they saw themselves as an elite minority, the pure and spotless Bride of Christ, living in a sinful world. They insisted that the church be a voluntaristic organization, one in which the members chose to become a part. This led directly to their rejection of pedobaptism as an initiation rite into the church in favor of adult BAPTISM. Standards for entry into the community were strict, as were standards of conduct for the members. Discipline was maintained by severe sanctions against those who failed to live up to the group’s expectations. One Anabaptist practice that was particularly controversial was the ban, also called shunning. This was akin to the medieval concept of major excommunication and involved complete social exclusion from the community, including prohibiting family members from speaking to the banned individual.

Largely in response to Anabaptist criticisms of the church, MARTIN BUCER developed a view of church discipline drawn from the monastic union of internal and external discipline. Although Bucer agreed with the Anabaptists regarding the problem of laxity within the church, he and the other mainstream reformers viewed the Anabaptists’ use of the ban and other disciplinary practices as excessively harsh. Thus Bucer’s approach to discipline not only emphasized enforcement of proper behavior, but also included a comprehensive program of Christian formation as well: as in the monasteries, discipline was connected to discipleship. Because Christ commanded the church to make disciples, Bucer saw discipline as an essential mark of the true church (along with proper preaching and administration of the sacraments), and identified it with the power of the keys (Matthew 18:19–20). At its most basic level Bucer’s view of discipline involved religious education, both through teaching CATECHISM and in private confession, which Bucer viewed as a form of counseling. In each of these there was a twofold emphasis on doctrinal formation and on learning how the believer should live in response to the Gospel.

The second aspect of discipline was a “public profession of faith and obedience to the church and its ministers” on the part of the catechized; he saw this as a reformed CONFIRMATION ceremony stripped of medieval Catholic superstitions and restored to the purity of the practice of the early church. The emphasis on the promise of obedience to the church leads into the third element of discipline: mutual, fraternal admonition on the part of all church members, together with oversight on the part of the pastors and elders of the church—the “ministers” to whom obedience was particularly promised. Only at this point did discipline in the sense of enforcement of morality enter the picture. The goal of mutual admonition, and indeed discipline in general, was to get sinners to repent. Whenever possible, admonition was to be done privately, then with a few supporting witnesses, and finally with the leadership of the church, following the outline in Matthew 18:15–18. Only if the sinner refused to repent were ecclesiastical penalties, up to and including excommunication, to be invoked. Even if the sinner did repent, it might be necessary to demand proof of that repentance by having the penitent perform some act of public penance, such as abstaining from the LORD’S SUPPER for a time, fasting, and so forth. If this was refused it was to be taken as a sign that the repentance was not genuine, and the process outlined in Matthew 18 was to continue. These ideas led Bucer to propose a number of disciplinary institutions in Strasbourg, although opposition from the magistrate prevented them from being implemented for the most part.

Despite the failure to fully implement them in Strasbourg, Bucer’s ideas on polity and the responsibilities of church officers had a profound effect on JOHN CALVIN’S ecclesiology. Although Calvin never listed discipline as a mark of the church, he clearly saw it as an essential element of the church’s ministry: his insistence on the church’s right to excommunicate the unrepentant resulted in his exile from Geneva in 1538. On his return to the city, he devoted quite a bit of time and attention to the CONSISTORY, the moral and religious court of Geneva. This was the most important institution Calvin created and became a model for disciplinary institutions wherever Calvinist churches were established. The Genevan consistory was headed by First Syndic of the city and was composed of the pastors plus a group of lay elders chosen from the city councils. Initially its work focused on religious belief and practice and was primarily aimed at teaching the people how to act as Protestants. This included not only the elimination of prayers for the dead, the Ave Maria, and other Catholic practices, but also condemned the use of magic and charms, failure to attend or participation in amusements during Sunday services, and other religious crimes and misdemeanors. The consistory also handled other sorts of cases that generally did not involve criminal charges. Particularly common were quarrels that had become public enough to cause a scandal, including wives nagging husbands (and occasionally vice versa), husbands beating their wives excessively (and occasionally vice versa), elder abuse, brawling, loud arguments among neighbors, and the like. Next came various types of marital or sexual irregularities. The most common of these cases involved determining whether a promise of marriage had been made and enforcement of such promises; the category also included less frequently fornication, adultery, and the like. The consistory also dealt with other moral issues, such as public drunkenness and gambling.

The principal goal of church discipline in Geneva as in the rest of the Reformed world was to encourage the sinner to repent and to sin no more. Because most problems of mistaken belief or religious practice could be solved by better religious education, the most common “sanction” in these cases was an admonition to hear more sermons. For moral and social lapses, penalties were aimed more at the person’s ego: a severe scolding in most cases, followed in more serious cases by a public confession of sin at the main church service on Sunday. Such public confessions not only shamed the sinner, thereby discouraging the person from repeating the behavior, but also provided a warning against those who might be tempted to similar sins. Particularly serious issues could be sent to the civil magistrate for further action. Finally those who refused to acknowledge their faults (or to recognize the authority of the consistory) could be excommunicated, that is, banned from participating in the sacraments, both the Lord’s Supper and baptism. This could have serious social consequences, given the importance of godparentage in establishing ties between families in the period.

The Genevan consistory was the first successful attempt to establish church discipline in the Protestant REFORMATION. It changed in profound ways the moral climate in Geneva, as evidenced by the vast reduction in the rate of illegitimacy as well as by the testimony of visitors to the city. Because of these results, the consistory had many imitators: wherever CALVINISM spread, the consistory generally followed. These consistories proved remarkably effective in promoting an austere lifestyle characterized by strict morality, rejection of superstition, and obedience to the civil magistrate within the boundaries of God’s Law and of conscience, all of which were typical elements of Calvinist piety. They were thus instrumental in promoting “puritanical” approaches to morality and social life and were critical to the propagation of Calvinist ideologies (see PURITANISM). At the same time, their success also made them very attractive to Protestant governments as an effective tool of social control. Consistories and governments worked closely together, and frequently the consistory would include local magistrates and members of town councils. In Roman Catholic territories with Calvinist minorities, however, consistories functioned independently of the government to whatever extent was necessary or possible. Where the magistrate supported the church, church discipline supported the magistrate; where the magistrate opposed the church, church discipline reinforced the boundaries of the elect community in opposition to the magistrate. Calvinist churches typically called for obedience to the powers that be whenever possible, but they insisted on obedience to God above all—even if this should mean civil disobedience or outright rebellion. In Calvinist churches ecclesiastical discipline thus not only served the religious functions of helping believers grow in godliness and restraining the wicked, but also had important political implications by defining the elect community and its relationship to the civil powers.

See also Church and State, Overview

References and Further Reading

- Burnett, Amy Nelson. The Yoke of Christ: Martin Bucer and Christian Discipline. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Publishers, 1994.
- Hsia, Ronnie Po-chia. Social Discipline in the Reformation: Central Europe, 1550–1750. Reprint, London and New York: Routledge, 1992.

- Kingdon, Robert M. "Calvin and the Establishment of the Consistory Discipline in Geneva: The Institution and the Men who Directed It." Nederlands Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis 70 (1990):158–172.
- Mentzer, Raymond A., ed. Sin and the Calvinists: Morals Control and the Consistory in the Reformed Tradition. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Publishers, 1994.
- Schilling, Heinz. "Between the Territorial State and Urban Liberty: Lutheranism and Calvinism in the County of Lippe." In The German People and the Reformation, edited by R.Po-chia Hsia, 263–283. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1988.
- Sunshine, Glenn S. "Discipline as the Third Mark of the Church: Three Views." Calvin Theological Journal 33 (1998):469–480.

GLENN S.SUNSHINE

CHURCHES OF CHRIST, NONINSTRUMENTAL

The Churches of Christ, Noninstrumental are a group of churches within the Stone-Campbell Movement (CHURCHES OF CHRIST and DISCIPLES OF CHRIST). These churches emphasize a reliance on the New Testament for POLITY and practice. This effort to focus on the New Testament is often understood as a return to the original form of practice in the earliest church and thus implicitly is a rejection of practices that developed in the medieval and REFORMATION periods. Thus the churches embrace a "restorationist" ideology, and the movement is often called the "Restoration Movement." There is no central denominational structure for this fellowship; a strong emphasis on congregational autonomy is dominant, although certain standards of faith and practice are maintained through informal mechanisms.

History

The nineteenth-century movement for restoring the New Testament church, which had significant leadership from Alexander Campbell (see CAMPBELL FAMILY) and BARTON W. STONE, originated primarily as a reformation movement within Presbyterian churches (see PRESBYTERIANISM). This movement, often called the Disciples of Christ, generally named individual churches either a "church of Christ" or a "Christian church." These churches emphasized a rejection of creeds, a reliance on the New Testament alone for matters of faith and practice, and a call for Christian unity around a return to the original practices of the church.

After the American CIVIL WAR, the movement began to fracture over ecclesiology and sociologic issues. The specific ecclesiology issues involved cooperative societies (primarily missionary societies) and instrumental music in WORSHIP. Missionary societies, in which multiple congregations banded together to support missionary efforts, were viewed by some as an innovation that could not be supported by the New Testament practice and furthermore that violated the priority of congregational autonomy. Instrumental music was seen as an innovation not supported by New Testament practice.

The concern about the introduction of “innovations” in the life of the church culminated in the Sand Creek Declaration in 1889, which stated that nothing be introduced into the practice of the church that was not based on a clear “thus saith the Lord” statement from Scripture. Thus the conservative wing of the movement increasingly adopted a restrictive hermeneutical approach to silence of the Scripture; silence on a matter is taken to be a ban on such practices.

In addition to the ecclesiology concerns, sociologic differences resulting from the Civil War aggravated a deepening schism in the movement. The churches in the South were often poor and developed a simple perspective to church life, one that viewed the introduction of organs and missionary societies as evidence of a departure from the original emphasis of the movement. The concerns of the conservative wing of the Disciples were originally voiced by Benjamin Franklin in his popular journal the American Christian Review, and by David Lipscomb in his journal the Gospel Advocate, which continues to this day. These views were countered by the Christian Standard, founded by Isaac Errett, which took a decidedly progressive stand. Thus these competing journals tended to develop significantly different perspectives on a number of theological and practical issues. By the end of the nineteenth century, the tensions between various factions in the movement had led to a de facto split. In 1906, those churches that rejected organs and missionary societies consented to be listed separately in the U.S. census, thus explicitly recognizing the split. Those churches that rejected instruments in worship and societies called themselves simply “Churches of Christ,” often with a small “c” in “churches” to indicate their rejection of denominational status.

The Churches of Christ (a cappella) grew rapidly during the first part of the twentieth century and rapidly established congregations not only in the South, but also in the West and Midwest. (The body tends to be weakly represented in the Northeast.) The Churches of Christ established a number of colleges, which have become centers of support for the movement. The Churches of Christ also began to develop strong African-American congregations, especially as a result of the evangelistic efforts of Marshall Keeble and G.P. Bowser. These black churches have developed their own strong subculture, often noted for their powerful evangelists.

The Churches of Christ have suffered internal divisions over certain issues that create tension within the body of churches. A minor division occurred in the early twentieth century over the issue of premillennialism. A popular preacher named Foy Wallace, Jr. actively opposed premillennial interpretations of the Scripture, and “mainstream” Churches of Christ today oppose such interpretations; however, a rather distinct subgroup of Churches of Christ were and remain “premillennial” Churches of Christ. There are other subgroups within the movement; some churches resist SUNDAY SCHOOLS, others resist any cooperation, others believe in single cups for communion. These subgroups tend to communicate among themselves and resist the main tendencies in the Churches of Christ.

The latter part of the twentieth century saw a new emphasis within the Churches of Christ that came to be called the “Crossroads movement.” This new group emphasized formal “discipleship” of members by elders, with strong control of individuals by the elders, and a very intrusive pattern of EVANGELISM. This unique group of churches was dubbed the “Boston Church of Christ” because of the dominant role the church in Boston played, a controlling role that violated the central ethos of congregational autonomy of the movement. This new group, which now calls itself the “International Churches of Christ,” is shunned by the mainstream Churches of Christ and is not now considered part of the main movement.

Polity

Churches of Christ emphasize a strict pattern of congregational autonomy. There is no denominational structure, and there are no official conventions or formal conferences to coordinate activities. The local church’s leadership ideally rests with lay elders, of whom there is always a plurality, and deacons, who are also a plurality. Most churches have elders appointed permanently, although some have regular elections. Most congregations have paid ministers who are selected by the local congregations and are always subject to the oversight of the local eldership. In most cases the elders are responsible for the hiring of ministers and key financial matters, although some congregations delegate these issues to the deacons or to a vote of the entire congregation. The paid ministry is increasingly well-educated, many at graduate SEMINARIES, although formal ordination is not widely practiced and carries no special status. Increasingly, congregations have a variety of paid ministries; youth, education, and worship ministers are commonly found in addition to the senior or preaching minister. Churches of Christ never use the title “Reverend” and rarely call their ministers “Pastor,” reserving that title for their elders. Most paid ministers are called “Minister” or “Evangelist.” In most Churches of Christ, WOMEN cannot serve as ministers, elders, or deacons, although a few churches allow women to serve as deacons or on committees with significant ministerial responsibility.

The strict congregational polity generally means that missionary activity and other parachurch activities (such as retirement homes and sometimes preaching schools) are sponsored under the leadership of a single congregation and subject to oversight by elders of that congregation. Under that sponsorship, financial support might be solicited from members of other congregations, although rarely from other congregations as such.

Practices

Several distinctive practices are consistently found in Churches of Christ. All Churches of Christ practice adult immersion BAPTISM and do not accept sprinkling or infant baptism as valid. Baptism is available to anyone on a simple statement of repentance and a declaration of faith in Jesus. Rebaptism by immersion of those baptized as infants is common. Local membership in churches is open to all immersed believers, and membership is automatically accorded to a person who is immersed. Most churches have baptisteries in their church buildings, and frequently baptisms are done at the close of worship services following an open invitation to respond to the Gospel.

All Churches of Christ celebrate the LORD’S SUPPER each Sunday. The Lord’s Supper is usually open to any who want to participate without proof of membership or even baptism, although baptism is usually expected of participants. The Lord’s Supper is usually administered by elders and deacons, although often any baptized believer can officiate. Most congregations use individual cups and wafers, although a few believe that only a single cup is authorized by Scripture.

Worship services in the Churches of Christ are a cappella, without any musical instruments. Congregational singing is usually a significant part of the worship services. The a cappella emphasis has resulted in extensive use of musical parts and harmonies in hymns and songs. Many congregations follow a fairly fixed pattern of worship, although this is not universal. In the vast majority of Churches of Christ, women do not participate in leadership or speaking roles, although this is changing in a few congregations.

Beliefs

In general, the Churches of Christ are organized around issues of practice, not THEOLOGY. The overriding concern is to replicate within the life of the church the worship, structure, and community as believed to have been practiced in the early church. As a result, the New Testament serves as a blueprint for practice and beliefs; in particular, the Book of Acts serves as an important model for church patterns and behavior. No creeds or confessions are accorded any value within the individual churches, these being seen as later developments of the church. Moreover, creeds and confessions are viewed as potentially divisive. Theoretically at least, members of the Churches of Christ are free to develop theological beliefs as long as these beliefs are supported by Scripture. Thus one can find persons within the individual churches who hold to significantly divergent beliefs, as long as these are opinions or conclusions derived from Scripture and do not violate an express statement found in Scripture. Historically, for instance, the Churches of Christ have used orthodox language to speak of the Trinity, but a minority has held reservations about this concept because it is not expressly addressed in the New Testament. Barton Stone, one of the earliest leaders of the movement, was skeptical of the concept of the Trinity because it was not used in Scripture. There is a strong undercurrent of rationalism within the belief structure of the churches and little interest in the effects of emotion on CONVERSION or practice.

One can say that the prevailing approach within the Churches of Christ is Arminian. In general, the churches believe that all people can respond to the Gospel by belief and baptism. There is broad skepticism about PREDESTINATION and of the role of the Holy Spirit in leading individuals to accept the Gospel. SALVATION in the Churches of Christ is inextricably tied to baptism, which is linked directly to the confession of Jesus as the Christ. The act of CONVERSION is thus defined as a process that includes belief in Jesus Christ, public confession of this belief, repentance, and baptism. All of these aspects are considered parts of a single act of conversion, and efforts to distinguish the point at which salvation occurs in this process are rejected. Few accept any idea of the impossibility of apostasy; just as an individual can come to believe, he or she can fall away from belief or from salvation. The role of the local church in sustaining an individual's belief is important. The importance of baptism and church involvement could be seen as emphasizing a form of "works" righteousness, but this is firmly rejected by the churches. Instead, salvation is viewed as a gift of GRACE, but it is received when one believes and demonstrates that by confession, repentance, baptism, and subsequent involvement in the local church.

There is no official recognition of CLERGY in the Churches of Christ. In concept, every believer is a “priest” and has equal access to God through prayer and communion. This rejection of clergy as having a special status means that local churches often have significant involvement by members in the worship services. Members often lead singing, lead prayers, officiate and serve at the Lord’s Supper, and even preach and conduct baptisms. This broad participation in the congregational worship is usually restricted to male members, however; women generally do not have leadership roles in the worship service based on the passages in the New Testament stating that women should keep silent in the assembly. But there is usually a distinction between the formal worship assembly and other meetings of the church, where women are allowed significant, albeit informal, roles.

Connective Ties in the Fellowship

While the Churches of Christ have no formal denominational structure, a fairly well-established system of connections ties the local congregations together and provides a remarkable consistency across the movement. The formative mechanisms for these linkages were magazines and journals, and these still remain influential. However, the role of colleges supported by members of the Churches of Christ has superseded the importance of the journals and now provides the primary mechanism for connectivity.

In the early stages of the movement, journals such as the Gospel Advocate helped develop and accentuate the Churches of Christ’s attitudes and beliefs, often in distinction from other segments of the StoneCampbell Movement. In fact, the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries could probably be seen as a period of competing journals that shaped emerging groups within the Restoration Movement. Other journals and magazines, including The Firm Foundation, were also very influential, especially in the early part of the twentieth century. Various smaller journals, often espousing divergent editorial stances within the movement, continue to be published, but these have less significance than previously. The Christian Chronicle, a newspaper published by Oklahoma Christian University, has a wide distribution and presents news about the Churches of Christ.

A number of directories of the Churches of Christ have been published, most notably Churches of Christ in the United States, compiled by Mac Lynn. These listings are often a way of determining whether a church is considered part of the Churches of Christ (a cappella) or lies outside this circle of churches (e.g., an instrumental Church of Christ). Many of these listings provide information about subgroupings within the churches (e.g., one cup or premillennial).

Colleges and universities in the Churches of Christ undoubtedly provide the major source of linkages between congregations today, both through their education of members and ministers and through lectureships. A high percentage of members of the Churches of Christ send their college students to colleges affiliated with the body. Most of these colleges strongly emphasize the practices and beliefs of the movement; many require that all faculty members belong to the Churches of Christ. The primary colleges servicing the movement are Abilene Christian University, David Lipscomb University, Freed Hardemann University, Harding University, and Pepperdine University. There are, however, a number of additional colleges that are clearly affiliated with the Churches of Christ. Some of the colleges, such as Abilene Christian University and Pepperdine University, host lectureships wherein members from churches across the country come to listen to preachers, attend workshops, and worship, thus providing a strong sense of cohesiveness to the churches.

See also Arminianism; Higher Education; Restorationism; Music; Millenarians & Millennialists; Publishing, Media; Christian Colleges

References and Further Reading

- Allen, C.Leonard, and Richard T.Hughes. Discovering Our Roots: The Ancestry of the Churches of Christ. Abilene, TX: ACU Press, 1988.
- Casey, Michael, and Douglas Foster, eds. The Stone-Campbell Movement: An International Religious Tradition. Knoxville, TN: University of Tennessee Press, 2002.
- Childers, Jeff W., Douglas A.Foster, and Jack R.Reese. The Crux of the Matter: Crisis, Tradition, and the Future of Churches of Christ. Abilene, TX: ACU Press, 2002.
- Garrett, Leroy. The Stone-Campbell Movement: The Story of the American Restoration Movement. Joplin, MO: College Press, 1994.
- Hughes, Richard T. Reviving the Ancient Faith: The Story of Churches of Christ in America. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1994.
- Lynn, Mac. Churches of Christ in the United States: Inclusive of Her Commonwealth and Territories. Nashville, TN: 21st Century Christian Publishing, 2003.
- North, James B. Union in Truth. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1994.
- Webb, Henry. In Search of Christian Unity. Cincinnati, OH: Standard Publishing, 1990.
- West, Earl. The Search for the Ancient Order. 4 vols. Indianapolis, IN: Religious Book Service, 1950.

MARK A.MATSON

CHURCH LAW

Church law comprises the constitution, discipline, requirements, legislative, administrative and judicial structure and procedures, governing membership and officers, acquisition and administration of finance and property in, and the external as well as internal relationships of any Christian community. It varies in scope, form, and style according to each community's understanding of God and of human relations with God, and each community's size and self-definition.

Protestant church law generally differs from Roman Catholic Church law in the degree and character of AUTHORITY claimed for the church as an institution. The statutory style also differs from ancient Eastern and Latin legislation in most Protestant churches, although the form of canons survives in the Anglican Communion, which also traditionally appeals to patristic precedent in its legal thought. However, all churches are obliged by the realities of experience to legislate on the same issues, however much the respective laws may vary. These issues also overlap; for example, questions about membership are distinct from, but inevitably overlap with, rules about church officials, and ecumenical policy affects and is affected by both of those areas.

The basic issue in all church law is the definition of DOCTRINE: What do we teach, and on what authority? (The second part of the question is also inherent in the first). At one extreme are the few communities that insist that they have no stated doctrine at all. Some Protestant churches (Lutheran, Anglican, some Reformed, some Methodist) agree that the creedal decisions of the early councils (Nicaea, Constantinople, Chalcedon) are still binding on the modern church, and that REFORMATION decisions (confessions, catechisms, articles) are similarly normative, whereas other Protestant denominations claim that only the BIBLE has claim to allegiance. (The confessional churches may observe that the definition of the Biblical canon is itself a tacit acceptance of the early church's informal process of decision, or an acceptance of Reformation decisions, or of a late Reformation reversion to the rabbinic decisions of 70 A.D.). Also diverse are the effective statuses given to the admitted standards: binding on all teaching programs and their contents, or normative of the character of those programs, or "articles of peace" (i.e., not to be disowned or opposed), or "landmark documents"; the last may mean that the past decrees mark vital and lasting decisions (like the admission of the Gentiles) or fascinating and venerable irrelevancies. Equally variable, among churches and in all churches through time, is the important legal distinction between what must be policed and enforced and ADIAPHORA, the things that can be tacitly tolerated.

Church law reflects differing Protestant ecclesiologies, that is, differing understandings of the church: if the church is the Body of Christ, and essentially one, may or must it have a single governmental system, or are the different gatherings of Christians to be autonomous (not, that, literally self-governing, but discerning and applying the will of Christ through more local instruments? In the Reformation period Protestant churches were national churches or separatist congregations, whose interdependency, even if adjudged to be divinely mandated, was voluntary and nonbinding. This range of ecclesiologies and structures survives to the present day (see ECCLESIOLOGY). Each church has its appropriate constitution, from the national establishment to the COVENANT of a Congregational or Baptist congregation. Protestant churches have developed international jurisdictions, although in most cases "third world" provinces, dioceses, presbyteries, or conferences have been granted autonomy. International denominational bodies have become consultative and not legislative. Ecumenical bodies, international, national, or regional, are likewise consultative—but the growth of ECUMENISM has obliged churches to examine their membership and ministerial criteria. If BAPTISM and ordination are valid in one church, on what terms may or must those baptisms and ordinations be acceptable in another?

Who is a member of a particular church, or of the Church Catholic (the Christian body as a whole)? Nearly every Protestant church prescribes BAPTISM (and its matter and form), its ministers, and its conditions: for children of families professing (practicing?) Christianity, or on personal profession. Most churches forbid rebaptism. Confirmation is more disputed, as to its necessity, ministers (bishops? episcopally ordained clergy?), its terms, and its nature and content (imposition of hands? public affirmation?), and repeatability. Churches also legislate on transfer of membership, on continuing duties of members and the resultant criteria for continued good standing, on discipline of members, on the offenses and penalties, on excommunication or the ban (or the Amish Meidung, or shunning), and the conditions and procedures for restoration.

Churches legislate on WORSHIP, whether or not they admit it. Legislation may be informal (local preference, custom, historic tradition, recorded or remembered—these concepts are logically distinct, but in application readily confused), or by statute (especially in reference to SACRAMENTS), or by recommendation, especially through approved service books and hymnals. Hans Dombois has argued that the essence of worship (PREACHING, sacraments) creates a distinctively Christian concept of law as an instrument of the outworking of grace, so that the church grows as image of the Trinity.

Each church law system, in growing, must seek its priorities of purpose: the glory of God by means of the purity of the church, its apostolic effectiveness, the stewardship of the Gospel, the restraint of power, healing, and the CHARITY that may make the Church a means of SANCTIFICATION.

References and Further Reading

- Bayne, Stephen F.Jr., ed. Mutual Responsibility and Interdependence in the Body of Christ, with Related Background Documents. London: SPCK; New York: Seabury Press; Toronto: Anglican Book Centre, 1967.
- Brouwer, Arie. "Some Reformed—and Reforming—Perspectives on Church Order," Reformed Review, 38 (Spring 1985):196–203.
- Dombois, Hans. Das Recht der Gnade: Ökumenisches Kirchenrecht (The Law of Grace: Ecumenical Church Law), vols. 1–3. Witten, Germany: Luther-Verlag 1961/1969, 1974, 1983.
- Long, Edward LeRoy Jr. Patterns of Polity: Varieties of Church Governance. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 2001.
- Noll, Mark A., ed. Confessions and Catechisms of the Reformation. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1991.
- Reuver, Marc. Faith and Law: Juridical Perspectives for the Ecumenical Movement. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 2000.
- Roberts, Tom Aerwyn. "Law, Morality and Religion in a Christian Society." Religious Studies, 20 (March 1984):79–98.
- Sehling, Emil et al., eds. Die Evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des XVI. (The Evangelical Church Orders). Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B.Mohr, vols. I–XV. 1970–1977.
- Völker, Alexander. "Hans Dombois," unpublished manuscript.

DAVID TRIPP

CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY; CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY

The Church Mission Society, or Church Missionary Society (CMS), is a voluntary mission movement within the worldwide Anglican Communion. It consists of loosely networked sister organizations in ENGLAND, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, IRELAND, the Czech Republic, and the UNITED STATES. Other mission agencies closely affiliated with CMS, and whose origins are tied to the work of CMS missionaries, include the Mid-Africa Ministry, the Mar Thoma Evangelistic Association, and the Church of Nigeria Missionary Society.

CMS was founded in Britain in 1799 during the Evangelical revival that had arisen under the influence of early English PURITANISM and the Methodist movement of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY. Among the key figures who started The Society for Missions to Africa and the East (the original name) were John Venn, WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, CHARLES SIMEON, and Other members of an Evangelical group loyal to the CHURCH OF ENGLAND known as the CLAPHAM SECT. Societies outside England were founded as the missionary movement expanded: Australia (1825); New Zealand (1892); Ireland (1976); United States (1998); Czech Republic (2001).

The ministry of CMS missionaries contributed to the rapid expansion of the Anglican Communion into many parts of AFRICA and Asia, mostly in tandem with the growth of the British Empire throughout the 1800s. The first missionaries of CMS-Britain were German Lutherans sent to SIERRA LEONE in 1804. Henry and William Williams, CMS missionaries to New Zealand, were pioneers in bringing the gospel to the Maoris. Under the leadership of Henry Venn (clerical secretary, 1841–1872) CMS adopted the ThreeSelf Principle for church planting whereby missionaries sought to raise up self-promoting, self-governing, and self-supporting indigenous churches. The application of this principle resulted in the consecration of SAMUEL AJAYI CROWTHER as Africa's first Anglican bishop in 1864. The work of CMS greatly increased as a result of the East African Revival of the 1930s. CMS missionaries also played a supporting role alongside Bishop V.S.AZARIAH in the foundation of the united CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA in 1947.

In the modern era CMS affiliate organizations support more than 500 mission personnel in Africa, Asia, LATIN AMERICA, the Middle East, and Eastern Europe, as well as scores of non-Western missionaries located in Britain and North America.

References and Further Reading

Martin, John, ed. 200 Years of the Church Mission Society. London: CMS, 1999.

Murray, Jocelyn. Proclaim the Good News: A Short History of the Church Missionary Society. London: Hodder and Stoughton Ltd., 1985.

Taylor, John V. "The Church Missionary Society." In Concise Dictionary of the Christian World Mission, edited by Stephen Neill, Gerald H. Anderson, and John Goodwin. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1971.

GEOFFREY A.LITTLE

CHURCH OF CHRIST, SCIENTIST

See Christian Science

CHURCH OF ENGLAND

Roots

The roots of the Church of England go back to the time of the first Christian presence during the Roman Empire. Reestablishment took place from 597 onward under Augustine, first archbishop of Canterbury, which gradually brought about an English Church under papal authority but often independent in mind. The break with Rome under HENRY VIII in 1534 and consolidated under his successors resulted in a church that kept much of the old diocesan structure and liturgical features but whose THEOLOGY combined elements of European Reformed thinking. By the following century it could no longer contain all Protestants within its wide bounds, but it remained “established” with the monarch as “Supreme Governor” (i.e., leading lay figure). Subsequent centuries brought the break with METHODISM, the Evangelical, and High Church movements. The twentieth century saw it gaining almost total self-government, with new liturgical texts and benefiting from ecumenical convergence, while at the same time retaining a position to challenge prime ministers on social issues in an age of increasing secularism.

British bishops attended the Synod of Arles, which the Emperor Constantine summoned in 314, and archaeological evidence points to the survival of a native British (Celtic) Christian presence as the pagan Anglo-Saxon invaders pressed westward in the following centuries. Knowledge of this situation prompted Pope Gregory the Great’s mission in 596 to rebuild the English Church, with an archiepiscopal seat at London, a task that he entrusted to Augustine, who was the prior of St. Andrew’s Abbey in Rome. On arrival a year later he could get no further than CANTERBURY, capital of the East Saxons, whose pagan King Ethelbert was married to a Frankish Christian princess, Bertha. The success of his mission can be shown in Ethelbert’s conversion to Christianity, and the way he established other episcopal sees, including at York, as well as slowly gaining the confidence of the bishops and leaders of the British Church, spread through the various kingdoms. However, there were significant differences that persisted, notably over how to calculate Easter, the cause of considerable confusion. A SYNOD was called at Whitby in 664 that, although not as immediately definitive as it has been represented by the Venerable Bede (ca. 673–735) in his History of the English Church, judged in favor of the Roman method, which eventually won the day. York was made into a separate archbishopric in 735, with Canterbury remaining the senior.

By the time Duke William of Normandy (“The Conqueror”) defeated King Harold at the Battle of Hastings in 1066, ENGLAND was a kingdom that had been united against the Viking invasions of the preceding centuries; and the archbishop of Canterbury William brought with him, Lanfranc, a learned Benedictine monk, had to take care with the native saints in the liturgical calendars. Church and state came into direct conflict when Henry II had his chancellor, Thomas à Becket, made archbishop of Canterbury, hoping to control a church that was showing marked signs of independence; Henry had him murdered in his cathedral on December 29, 1170. Bishops were taking on governmental roles in advising the monarch; this found expression in their presence in the House of Lords as “Lords Spiritual,” which continues to this day. Liturgical practice which although loyal to Rome included its own traditions, gave rise to the Sarum Use, which from the thirteenth century onward gradually made the Salisbury LITURGY more or less standard throughout England. However, the impressive edifice of the medieval church could not conceal real tensions under the surface. John Wycliffe, who died in 1384, is often seen as a harbinger of the REFORMATION. He wanted the BIBLE available in the English tongue; he questioned the theology of eucharistic transubstantiation proclaimed in Rome by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215; and his writings influenced the Bohemian reformer Jan Hus. Perhaps the greatest reforming teacher on the eve of the Reformation was John Colet, who studied in Paris and Italy, and who gave a series of lectures on the Pauline Epistles about 1497 onward back in Oxford. He inveighed against the worldliness of the church, calling it back to the simplicity and discipline of the primitive church.

Reformation

When Henry VIII came to the English throne in 1509 he was already married by papal dispensation to Catherine of Aragon because she had previously been married to Henry’s older brother, who had died. Henry’s initial response to the ideas of the European Reformation coming to England was a show of loyalty to Rome, asserting the verity of the seven SACRAMENTS in a theological treatise drafted by others for which Pope Leo X gave him the title “Defender of the Faith.” Henry soon realized, however, that to ensure a male heir he would need to find another wife, and he was already in love with Anne Boleyn. There was little enthusiasm on the part of Pope Clement VII to grant a DIVORCE. Henry’s hand was strengthened when he was able to secure the appointment of THOMAS CRANMER as archbishop of Canterbury in 1533, and the following year he married Anne in secret. During this time Henry had been passing measures in Parliament undermining papal authority, so that when the Act of Supremacy was passed in 1534, declaring him head of the Church of England, the break was finally made with Rome, with the concurrence of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, representative bodies of the BISHOPS and CLERGY of the two Provinces that had met for synodical purposes since the thirteenth century.

Henry had considerable support for reforming the church beyond the administrative and financial. Convocation was now under the control of the king and the monasteries and religious houses had been dissolved, amply filling the coffers of the king, and his courtiers. He walked a careful tightrope, allowing the avowedly Protestant THOMAS CROMWELL, adviser in ecclesiastical affairs and main link with Parliament, to advance the cause by issuing injunctions in 1536 and 1538 that in every parish church there should be a copy of the Great Bible, the translation by MILES COVERDALE. We have to wait, however, until the reign of Edward VI, Henry's only surviving son by Jane Seymour, his third wife, before the Church of England took a decisive theological and liturgical move away from the Catholicism in which Henry had left it. Edward, whose mother had died giving birth to him, came to the throne at the age of ten in 1547. He was surrounded by Protestant advisers, including a cooperative archbishop, Thomas Cranmer, who was wellread in European Reformed theology.

The first move came in 1548 with a form of corporate confession and distribution of communion—in both kinds—that was to be inserted into the Latin mass. This proved a preliminary to the Book of Common Prayer that appeared in the following year. A literary masterpiece reputed to be largely the work of Cranmer himself, it was by Reformed standards a conservative service-book. The eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER) is still celebrated with the priest facing east at the ALTAR and many liturgical VESTMENTS are retained; the shape of the liturgy remains that of the mass, although much of the language of sacrifice has been abolished, and the departed are commemorated but no longer explicitly prayed for; and where the priest once elaborately offered the bread and wine at the altar, the people are now expected to make their offering of money. MARTIN BUCER, the Strasbourg reformer who at Cranmer's invitation took refuge in England and became a professor at Cambridge, made a detailed critique of the 1549 Prayer Book, much of which was incorporated into the Second Prayer Book, in 1552. Where the 1549 texts are altered, they are simplified; only the surplice is to be worn, the table is to be set lengthwise in the chancel when it is required for Holy Communion, and the eucharistic prayer is now split up into different parts, the people receiving the elements immediately after the institution narrative, which, however, is still part of a prayer, unlike the liturgies of JOHN CALVIN and MARTIN LUTHER. Morning and Evening Prayer begin with a lengthy penitential rite, and the few remaining signings with the cross were reduced to one at BAPTISM. To accompany this still elaborate (by Reformation standards) liturgical project, forty-two "Articles of Religion," largely the work of Cranmer, were issued in the following year, which contain distinct signs of circumspection; for example, Article 28 on the eucharist condemns TRANSUBSTANTIATION but manages to come up with a formula that could embrace both a doctrine of the real presence and of a spiritual/memorial presence.

Cranmer's work in the short term was not to last. Edward died and Mary Tudor, Catherine of Aragon's daughter and a Catholic, came to the throne in 1553 and reigned until her death in 1558. During that time, England officially returned to the Catholic fold and the leading reformers were either burned (like Cranmer) or they fled (like JOHN JEWEL to Frankfurt, Strasbourg, and finally Zurich). On the accession of ELIZABETH I, Anne Boleyn's daughter, in 1558, the Reformation position was reasserted, but with slight nuances. No longer "Head" of the church, Elizabeth was "Supreme Governor," and although 1552 was the basis of the Elizabethan Prayer Book, there were small significant changes that indicated a less Reformed position, including the words of distribution of communion. The (now) THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, a moderate revision of the "Forty-Two," were issued in 1563. Theologians such as Jewel, bishop of Salisbury and author of the Apology of the Church of England (1562), and RICHARD HOOKER, parish priest and author of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (in eight books, published in 1593, 1597, and the last three posthumously in 1648 and 1661) defended the Church of England against her critics. Jewel countered the claims of Roman Catholics, a continuing political threat for much of the reign, whereas Hooker answered the rising tide of PURITANISM, which wanted a Genevan form of service and Presbyterian form of church government, although there were Puritans, like the popular preacher and writer, WILLIAM PERKINS, who found ways of staying within the national church.

When Elizabeth died in 1603 she was succeeded by James VI of Scotland. Anxious to promote further the notion of the divine right of kings, episcopacy and monarchy were for him closely tied together, although his efforts to secure an episcopally ordered Scottish Church were unsuccessful. However, in the face of pressure from all sides, Presbyterian and Puritan included, he instigated a new translation of the Bible, which would replace both those of Coverdale and WILLIAM TYNDALE, as well as the versions of the GENEVA BIBLE in common use through Elizabeth's reign. Begun in 1607 it was completed in 1611; once again, careful nuancing can be detected, for example in the use of "Church" instead of "Congregation" and "Baptism" instead of "Washing." Among those who worked on the Old Testament was LANCELOT ANDREWES, who as dean of Westminster prepared James for his coronation, and who as bishop successively of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester was one of the foremost preachers and theologians of the reign. Among the other luminaries of this time were JOHN DONNE, dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, and GEORGE HERBERT, country parish priest, both of them famous poets.

James, once referred to as "the wisest fool in Christendom," was succeeded in 1626 by his son, Charles I. He tried to impose a Prayer Book on the Scottish Church in 1637, which led to riots and—aided and abetted by his dishonest handling of the English Parliament—CIVIL WAR; he was executed in 1649. Unlike his father, whose theological position was moderate Calvinist, Charles held a more Arminian position (see ARMINIANISM), not unlike that of Andrewes, but ag-gressively expressed, and imposed on the church by his archbishop of Canterbury, WILLIAM LAUD, who was executed as a result of calls from Parliament in 1645. That year saw the abolition of episcopacy in England, the imposition of the Westminster Directory (forms of worship) and Confession of Faith, with OLIVER CROMWELL eventually made "Lord Protector" in 1653. The Church of England was now officially an amalgam of PRESBYTERIANISM and CONGREGATIONALISM; clerics associated with the monarchy and the Prayer Book (e.g., John Cosin) lived in exile, mainly in FRANCE, or else they remained at home, in an internal exile (e.g., JEREMY TAYLOR) or survived in relative quiet (e.g., Simon Patrick).

Restoration

Charles II's return in 1660 heralded a new era. Many popular aspects of community life that had been outlawed under the Commonwealth were back, like HOLIDAYS and SPORTS, as well as joyful Music in church. The Prayer Book of 1662 included the introduction of such terms as "the prayer of consecration" in the eucharist and a stronger indication that episcopacy was a separate order from the presbyterate. There were attempts to make the Restoration Church inclusive; some were successful, such as the appointment of the Presbyterian John Reynolds as bishop of Norwich, others less so; the Puritan leader RICHARD BAXTER was offered the bishopric of Worcester but instead refused to “conform” and spent the rest of his years as a freelance preacher and writer.

The Restoration brought with it a renewed enthusiasm for Prayer Book services. Cathedrals and collegiate churches started having choirs again and liturgical vesture returned. Taylor and Patrick wrote devotional manuals, with a strong theological and moral bent, on the importance of regular Communion. Samuel Crossman wrote poems among which numbered “My song is love unknown,” which was to become a popular hymn in the twentieth century. Among those who captured the mood of the era was JOHN TILLOTSON, like Reynolds an ex-Presbyterian, whose PREACHING combined the biblical basis of the Puritans with a practical application that took the heat out of recent unhappy religious controversies. Returning exiles from France such as John Cosin had to face the question of mutual eucharistic hospitality with the French Reformed Church; he brought with him two Channel Islanders, Jean Durel who as dean of Windsor translated the Prayer Book into French, and Daniel Brevint whose treatise on eucharistic theology (1673) was to have a profound effect on JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY when they produced their eucharistic hymns in 1745.

Charles II died in 1685 and was succeeded by his brother, James II, who was a Roman Catholic. His short reign ended in a confrontation with Parliament and the church in 1689, when William of Orange invaded the country in an almost bloodless revolution. The new joint monarchy of William and Mary pricked the consciences of many traditional monarchists, resulting in the resignation of a number of bishops, including Archbishop Sancroft, who refused to crown them. Although many of these “Non-Jurors” kept in touch with the Establishment it was nonetheless a loss, and they were joined by others in 1714, when George of Hanover became king rather than one of the Stuarts. King William was frostily received by the Scottish bishops, whose rejection of him ensured that the episcopalians in Scotland would long be identified with the Stuart cause and become a small minority in consequence; they made contact with the Non-Jurors in England. The overall effect of the Restoration and its aftermath was that the Church of England was no longer a “national” church; it could no longer contain within its confines every single Christian community, although it was still “established”; those who did not conform joined one or other of the Nonconformist churches, the Presbyterian, Congregationalist, or Baptist (see NONCONFORMITY). Roman Catholics were only slowly tolerated because of the stigma of being antipatriotic, which went back to the threat of invasion by Spain under Elizabeth I, and the “Gunpowder Plot” on November 5, 1605, when a group of Roman Catholics attempted to blow up the Houses of Parliament.

As part of overseas English interests and for the benefit of foreign merchants residing in London the Prayer Book was translated into several other languages including Spanish (1707) for use at Gibraltar, Portuguese (1695) for the East Indies, Dutch (1710) for New York City, as well as German (1704), this latter partly as an ecumenical gesture to Lutherans and Reformed in Prussia and also for the six Germanspeaking congregations in London during the early Hanoverians. Translations such as these formed the very first step in a development that was to see a worldwide Anglican Communion of independent provinces in communion with Canterbury. This era also saw a small number of WOMEN writers, who had to publish their work anonymously: Mary Astell published her Christian Religion as Profess'd by a Daughter of the Church of England (1705).

Enlightenment

The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were once seen as contrasting eras, with the first holding the Church of England in the spell of staid dullness, in which a God of order and beauty was preached, wait-ing to be awakened by the Evangelical and Catholic Revivals that were to come. That view has been shifted considerably. The eighteenth century began with signs of real hope, with a scholarly archbishop of Canterbury, William Wake, in correspondence with the French Roman Catholic Church about prospects of reunion. On the other hand, theological controversy surrounding the liberal views of Benjamin Hoadly in 1717 led to the suspension by the bishops of the Convocations of Canterbury and York, which were dominated by High Church clergy. There was indeed an understandable reaction to the conflicts of the preceding century, but the spirit of the Restoration theologians lived on in writers like WILLIAM LAW, a layman whose Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728) was aimed at those whose religion was outwardly dry because it seemed to many to have no heart, no prayerful background.

By mid-century, however, the Evangelical Revival was coming to life. John Wesley, whose "heart was strangely warmed" on May, 24, 1738, when attending a MORAVIAN CHURCH service in London, set out to preach the gospel to those many people who had no opportunity to hear it. Wesley himself was a mixture of a strong sacramentalist (he believed in constant communion, several times a week, if possible) and a strong Puritan (he was ready to preach in the open air, and he did). Although his followers, soon nicknamed "Methodists" because of the methodical strictness of their way of life, were exhorted not to leave the Church of England, they became so great in number, both in England and in America, that a break became inevitable. His brother Charles, also a priest of the Church of England and collaborator with him in writing those many hymns that bear the Wesley name, was opposed to any such move (see HYMNS & HYMNALS). However, it finally took place in 1784 when John ordained THOMAS COKE as the first bishop or superintendent for the Methodists in North America, and in the same year, he compiled a simplified version of the Prayer Book for his American followers that was soon taken up in England as well; in that year also SAMUEL SEABURY, the first American bishop, was consecrated in Aberdeen by Scottish Bishops, England not being allowed to do so after American Independence. If blame is to be laid for the Wesleyan schism, however, part must be placed before the Church of England, which was unable to respond to the growing need for more churches, more social and educational work, as the Industrial Revolution gathered pace. There were those in the Established Church who tried to cooperate with Wesley, like Bishop George Horne of Norwich who allowed him to function as an itinerant preacher in his diocese, unlike some other of his episcopal colleagues. Moreover there were evangelicals in the Church of England, like Samuel Walker, a country parish priest in Cornwall, who corresponded with him, although they found Wesley's inclusive preaching insufficiently demanding and his increasingly anti-church stance unacceptable. Walker and others like William Cowper and John Newton remained firmly in the Church of England, where their fervor and preaching helped to bring new life. They understood—like the Methodists—the potential of hymn-singing as a vehicle of EVANGELISM and popular piety, of which Augustus Toplady’s “Rock of Ages, cleft for me,” written in 1775, is an example. Nonetheless the gospel had to be applied as well as preached, and WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, a prominent evangelical and Member of Parliament, tirelessly campaigned against SLAVERY, persuading Parliament to outlaw the slave trade in 1807 and the practice of slavery altogether in 1833 (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

The nineteenth century in many ways opened with the continuation of the trends of the eighteenth. High Church bishops like Robert Horsley taught what could now be seen as a traditional ANGLICANISM that was open to new discoveries, and evangelicals like CHARLES SIMEON influenced generations of students at Cambridge with his biblical preaching. Questions about the identity of the Church of England, however, came to a head in the OXFORD MOVEMENT, which began in 1833 with a sermon by JOHN KEBLE, an Oxford theologian, on “National Apostasy.” For Keble and his colleagues, who included EDWARD PuSEY and JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, the Established Church was in danger of becoming no more than a vehicle of the government, which was at the time planning to suppress a number of Irish bishoprics, and which had recently abolished religious tests for state office. They set about writing a number of “Tracts for the Times,” hence their nickname “Tractarian,” holding a firmer line on TRADITION than many of the older High Churchmen of the previous centuries. A different generation of CLERGY who were suspicious of churchstate relations took this renewal of Catholic heritage into the parishes, which resulted in a higher standard of liturgical setting, ARCHITECTURE, and music, and placing a renewed stress on baptismal regeneration and the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Some of the Tractarians, including Newman, eventually joined the Roman Catholic Church, whose hierarchy was restored in 1850.

One of the many challenges of the time was the need for better education, and to that end the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church had been formed in 1811, which ensured that the Church of England was in the forefront of building schools in the new centers of population. This is a legacy that has per-sisted down to the present time. Another issue was the need for more churches and in this quest the church soon had to learn that the government was not going to provide the money; the nineteenth century saw an immense amount of church building, many by private patronage, together with the founding of new dioceses. Theological tensions, too, continued; “Essays and Reviews” (1860) brought together a number of liberal scholars who were keen to interpret such questions as biblical inspiration in the light of scientific knowledge, and another collection, “Lux Mundi” (1889), represented a more modest but trenchant attempt by a later generation of Tractarians in what came to be called the Liberal Catholic strand of ANGLICANISM. Indeed, the very word Anglicanism is a nineteenth-century term, first used in England by Newman in 1838 and since then projected back into the preceding centuries as a way of expressing what the Church of England’s theological tradition embodied. The first LAMBETH CONFERENCE of bishops in communion with Canterbury, which by now included SCOTLAND, the UNITED STATES, CANADA, and INDIA, was called together in 1867 and has met regularly since that time, usually every ten years. The Church of England had responded—not always with great speed—to the demands of a changing world.

Ferment

In 1906 the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Discipline reported the need for Prayer Book revision. It was certainly overdue because many clergy working in the new parishes were finding that the 1662 Book needed adaptation or enrichment (or both). The response of the Church of England to World War I was of a Christian community unable to cope with the questions of the men in the trenches who witnessed needless suffering on a scale hitherto unknown and who went back home to an economically wounded nation. To deal with this new situation the church needed to travel lighter, and part of that process involved a measure of self-government. Parliament had neither the time nor the interest to govern the church in detail, and the Church Assembly was set up in 1919, modeled on the old Convocations, but with lay representation. Unfortunately, when a new Prayer Book was proposed, Parliament threw it out twice—in 1927 and 1928. This action left a legacy of resentment that was only met by the formation of the General Synod in 1970, a legislative development of the Church Assembly, and the passing of the Worship and Doctrine Measure in 1974, which gave the church the power to authorize alternative forms of service, but without altering the Book of Common Prayer of 1662.

Secularization proceeded throughout the twentieth century, with the numerical decline of most of the Christian Churches. This produced a theological ferment, in which the Church of England continued to feed not only on its own tradition but on other churches as well. Strangely, however, whereas European Protestantism was strongly influenced by the radical dialectical theology of KARL BARTH before and after World War II, in England the 1930s represented the apogee of the liberal “Modern Churchman’s Union” under an Oxford theologian, Henry Major, along with the Anglo-Catholic Movement, under the leadership of theologians such as Kenneth Kirk and the liturgical scholar, the Anglican Benedictine monk, Dom Gregory Dix, whose Shape of the Liturgy (1945) had an influence on postwar liturgical renewal and reconstruction far outside the confines of the Church of England. Indeed old controversies about eucharistic faith and practice were beginning to diminish in the wake of new discoveries about antiquity, ecumenical dialogue, and the growth of a single, mid-morning Sunday Holy Communion, which many saw as what the reformers had intended anyway. Influential women writers like EVELYN UNDERHILL, a convert from agnosticism, and Dorothy L. Sayers, a daughter of the vicarage, began to make their mark. Before and during World War II, however, the dominant figure was WILLIAM TEMPLE, archbishop of Canterbury, whose blend of philosophical idealism and social concern helped to give the Church of England a wider acceptability and prophetic edge. Bishop GEORGE BELL of Chichester, however, proved one of the most controversial leaders, making a speech in the House of Lords during the war condemning area bombing on GERMANY in a manner that was said to have made Prime Minister Winston Churchill refuse to have his name mentioned again in his presence. Archbishop MICHAEL RAMSEY, like Temple a keen ecumenist and a weighty theologian (see ECUMENISM), visited Pope Paul VI in 1966 and laid the groundwork for the first Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission; but he also took an unpopular stand against apartheid in SOUTH AFRICA. The archiepiscopate of Robert Runcie coincided with the prime ministership of Margaret Thatcher, resulting in a number of controversies, including the “Faith in the City” Report of 1985, commissioned by Runcie himself, which unearthed a maze of issues about urban life. After its hostile reception, the report soon proved its worth and helped to pave the way for urban regeneration.

Many of the old theological tensions regarding the limits of ORTHODOXY began to shift in new directions. The revival of EVANGELICALISM brought a renewed stress on biblical preaching, together with a mixture of conservatism in DOCTRINE and a radical openness about ways of being the church, which walked uneasily with that part of mainstream Anglicanism that is more comprehensive in theology but at the same time more traditional on questions of liturgy and ECCLESIOLOGY. The Alternative Service Book (1980), the Church of England’s late twentieth-century response to liturgical revision, in company with many new service-books, placed considerable emphasis on font and altar. It was in turn superseded by Common Worship (2000), with its richer language and greater attention to structure. After some heartache, women were ordained priests in 1994 but not yet as bishops, in spite of pressure from elsewhere in the Anglican Communion. Ecumenical progress brought about the “Porvoo Common Declaration” of 1994 whereby the Anglican Churches of the British Isles entered into communion with Nordic and Baltic Lutherans. All in all the Church of England lives with the creative tensions of being both Catholic and Reformed; of being English in a multicultural nation (its first black bishop, Wilfrid Wood, was consecrated in 1985) yet part of the Anglican Communion; of being a responsible ecumenical partner with Roman Catholics as well as Methodists; and of responding to the spiritual paradoxes of a postmodern society. The death of the princess of Wales in 1997 demonstrated the durability of folk religion; a Royal Commission on the Reform of the House of Lords in 1999 recommended the retention of bishops in the nation’s Second Chamber of Parliament; and the Labour Government in 2001 produced an education policy that envisaged a substantial increase in the number of church schools. The journey that started with Augustine at the capital of the East Saxons has been long, rich, and at times tortuous. How the Church of England responds to these new opportunities, and the work of theological reconstruction involved, remains to be seen.

References and Further Reading

The Book of Common Prayer. 1662.

Carpenter, Edward. Cantuar: The Archbishops and their Office. London: Mowbrays, 1971, 1988, 1997.

Chadwick, Owen. The Victorian Church. Pts I and II. London: A. and C.Black, 1970.

Common Worship: Services and Prayers for the Church of England. London: Church House Publishing, 2000.

Cuming, G.J. A History of Anglican Liturgy. London: Macmillan, 1969, 1982.

Hastings, Adrian. A History of English Christianity, 1920–1985. London: Collins, 1986.

MacCulloch, Diarmaid. Thomas Cranmer. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1996.

Rowell, Geoffrey, Kenneth Stevenson, and Rowan Williams, eds. Love’s Redeeming Work: The Anglican Quest for Holiness. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Spurr, John. The Restoration Church of England, 1646–1689. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1991.

Wilkinson, Alan. The Church of England and the First World War. London: S.P.C.K. 1978, S.C.M., 1996.

KENNETH W. STEVENSON

CHURCH OF GOD (CLEVELAND, TN)

The Church of God (COG) is a Holiness-Pentecostal denomination that traces its roots to the formation of the Christian Union on August 19, 1886. Founded by Baptist ministers Richard and R.G. Spurling, who rejected the exclusivity of the Landmark Baptist movement, the DENOMINATION became part of the WESLEYAN HOLINESS mOVEMENT in 1896 and a participant in the PENTECOSTALISM movement by 1908. Early pastor and general overseer A.J. Tomlinson transformed the denomination to an Episcopal form of polity. In 2002, the COG had a total of 6.5 million members, with about 1 million of those in the UNITED STATES.

Call for Reformation

Richard Spurling (1810–1891) and his son Richard Green Spurling (1857–1935) were missionary Baptist clergymen in eastern Tennessee. After two years of prayer and study of the BIBLE and the history of Christianity, they came to believe that Protestant churches needed further reformation. The church had fallen after the Council of Nicea in 325 A.D. because it relied on creeds rather than the New Testament. According to the Spurlings, creeds were fallible human statements used to divide Christians and often used to justify violence against other Christians.

The Spurlings taught that a further reformation was needed to eliminate creeds and the divisions creeds caused. For R.G. Spurling, the Baptist churches in east Tennessee were an ongoing example of the need for reformation as their Landmark exclusive ecclesiology prohibited him from ministering in other denominations and eventually led to his being excluded from the Baptist Church. Thus, on August 19, 1886, the Spurlings arranged a meeting near their grist mill on Barney Creek in Monroe County, Tennessee, to further the reformation. R.G. Spurling called for the forsaking of creeds, taking the New Testament as the “only rule of faith and practice,” giving one another the right to interpret scripture according to individual conscience, and covenanting together as the church of God. The Spurlings named their movement the “Christian Union” because they believed that an emphasis on Christ’s command to love God and neighbor would bring about the union of all Christians.

A Holiness Revival

Over the next 10 years R.G.Spurling organized several congregations. But his greatest success came as pastor of a holiness congregation in nearby Camp Creek, North Carolina. Previously, in 1896, four holiness preachers had held a revival at the Shearer Schoolhouse in Camp Creek. They preached that after JUSTIFICATION, one should experience a second work of GRACE that sanctified the believer. This doctrine infuriated the BAPTISTS of the area, and many of the holiness converts were excluded from the Baptist churches. Meeting in homes and temporary structures for SUNDAY SCHOOL and WORSHIP, the persecuted holiness band also experienced an extraordinary outpouring of the Holy Spirit. According to the earliest history, many people spoke in TONGUES and experienced divine healing (see FAITH HEALING). William F. Bryant, Jr. emerged as the leader of this holiness group and held an organizational meeting in his home on May 15, 1902. The organizing presbyters were R.G.Spurling and R.Frank Porter, who had previously been a ruling elder in the Fire-Baptized Holiness Association. The newly formed congregation named themselves the Holiness Church and called R.G. Spurling as their pastor.

The next year, Ambrose Jessup Tomlinson joined and was selected as pastor. Tomlinson was from the Quaker community of Westfield, Indiana (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). After his conversion, he began visiting the mountains of western North Carolina as a “missionary evangelist.” In 1899 he settled in Culberson, North Carolina, where he established a school and clothing distribution center. Following his call as pastor of the Holiness Church, he established congregations in Georgia and Tennessee. In 1904 Tomlinson moved to Cleveland, Tennessee, which became the home of the movement.

A Developing Movement

In 1906 the Holiness Churches held an Assembly to discuss developing practical and theological issues. The General Assembly became the primary means of government at the international level. The name “Church of God” was selected at the second Assembly in 1907 based on Paul’s letters to the “church of God” in Corinth.

Under Tomlinson’s leadership, the movement developed an Episcopal polity (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY). Tomlinson became general overseer in 1909; he appointed state overseers in 1911; and the Assembly approved an Elders Council in 1916 and an Executive Council (now Committee) in 1922. The denomination quickly developed a variety of ministries, including world MISSIONS (1909), publication of a periodical called the Church of God Evangel (1910), and the founding of a Bible school, now known as Lee University (1918).

Although perhaps 130 people experienced a Spiritbaptism, including speaking in tongues, in 1896, early members apparently had no doctrine of the Holy Spirit that could be considered Pentecostal until about 1907, when Tomlinson began to preach that the sanctified Christian should seek a baptism of the Holy Spirit with the “Bible evidence” of speaking in tongues (see PENTECOSTALISM).

Differences between Tomlinson and some members of the Elders Council, questions about financial irregularities, and a growing diversity within the movement led to the exclusion of Tomlinson from office in 1923. Flavius J. Lee then served as the second general overseer until his death in 1928.

In 2002 the COG was in 163 countries worldwide. The general overseer is the presiding bishop; administrative bishops serve at state and national levels. The International General Assembly meets biennially; the International Executive Council meets between Assemblies. The COG is a participant in the Pentecostal/ Charismatic Church of North America, the Pentecostal World Fellowship, and the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS.

References and Further Reading

- Conn, Charles W. Like a Mighty Army, definitive edition. Cleveland, TN: Pathway Press, 1996.
- Crews, Mickey. The Church of God: A Social History. Knoxville, TN: The University of Tennessee Press, 1990.
- Roebuck, David G. “Restorationism and a Vision for World Harvest: A Brief History of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee).” Cyberjournal for Pentecostal-Charismatic Research 5 (April 14, 2003): <http://www.pctii.org/cyberj/%20index.html>.
- Tomlinson, A.J. The Last Great Conflict. Cleveland, TN: Press of Walter E. Rogers, 1913; reprint Cleveland, TN: White Wing Publishing House and Press, 1984.

DAVID G. ROEBUCK

CHURCH OF GOD, ANDERSON, INDIANA

Like most bodies bearing this name, The Church of God with headquarters in Anderson, Indiana, understands itself to be a reformation movement rather than a DENOMINATION. The church dates its existence to 1881, when its founder, Daniel S. Warner, was expelled from the Churches of God (General Eldership), a German pietist group, for teaching the Wesleyan doctrine of “entire sanctification” as a second definite work of GRACE in the life of a Christian believer. Through a weekly journal, The Gospel Trumpet, and his work as an independent evangelist, Warner quickly gathered a growing number of local congregations together in a loose association that was initially known as “The Evening Light Saints.”

Warner taught that the experience of entire SANCTIFICATION in the Christian believer led to an identification with the visible CHURCH, the concrete embodiment of the spiritual body of Christ. This body of believers should be known only as The Church of God. Because he believed that God alone knew who had truly been sanctified, no membership roll was taken. Indeed, in the early years, membership to a denomination was considered sinful. Rejecting any formal creed, Warner taught that the Holy Spirit was the sole overseer of the church and that the BIBLE was its only statement of FAITH. He envisioned that the mission of the movement was to restore unity and holiness to the church universal. Promoting primary allegiance to Jesus Christ, he felt, was the way to transcend sectarian divisions created by denominationalism.

Although having no formal creed, adherents held to a theological consensus of the broader HOLINESS MOVEMENT that dominated North America in the nineteenth century. The leadership taught that the Bible was the inspired word of God; the orthodox view of the Trinity; the divinity of Christ; the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the regenerate believer; the universal fall of human kind through the SIN of the first parents, Adam and Eve; and the vicarious ATONEMENT in Christ through his death and resurrection. Breaking with the Holiness consensus, the leadership taught an amillennial view of ESCHATOLOGY. Equating the millennium with the church age, adherents believed that Christ would return to earth once the Church's divisions had been transcended and its DOCTRINE fully reformed. Adherents practiced three ordinances: BAPTISM by immersion, the LORD'S SUPPER, and foot washing. Although emphases have changed through the years, the early theology and practice have remained largely intact.

The church uses a congregation form of government, teaching that this is the only model that enables the AUTHORITY of God to function. As noted earlier, no membership is held in a formal way; there is no formal initiation rite for members, and membership lists are not kept. Local churches are organized in state and regional associations. Each year the representatives of the entire body meet in a General Assembly in connection with an International Convention.

In the absence of a governing body, The Gospel Trumpet Company and its editor assumed the body's leadership function during the early years of the church. The company issued ministerial credentials, functioned as the teaching magisterium, created a mission sending board, and established a Christian education agency to produce church school curricula. Publication offices of The Gospel Trumpet, which had moved several times during Warner's lifetime, permanently settled in Anderson, Indiana, in 1906 under the leadership of the second editor, Enoch E. Byrum. The third editor, F.G. Smith, established a Bible training school in 1917 that eventually became Anderson University. In that same year he created the General Ministerial Assembly mentioned earlier. Under the leadership of the fourth editor, Charles E. Brown, in the 1920s, the church instituted structures that are still largely intact. In response to growing criticism over the charismatic leadership of a single person, Brown sought to democratize the church, shifting much of the governance to the general, regional, and state assemblies.

With its origins rooted among the socially margin alized, the church moved quickly to reach out to several immigrant groups, including Germans, Greeks, Hispanics, Scandinavians, and Slovaks. Adherents were especially active within the African American community. As in other holiness churches, WOMEN were free to preach and exercise leadership; more than one-third of the ordained ministers were women until well into the twentieth century. Overseas MISSIONS were also an emphasis from the outset. By the end of the twentieth century, congregations were found in eighty-nine countries, including CHINA, DENMARK, ENGLAND, Egypt, GERMANY, Greece, INDIA, IRELAND, JAPAN, Kenya, KOREA, Lebanon, MEXICO, SWITZERLAND, and nations throughout the CARIBBEAN and all of Central and South America. Although formal membership rolls are still not allowed, the church can make a fairly accurate estimate of its adherents. According to figures available for 1999, the membership was 234,311 in 2,353 congregations in North America, and 385,000 in 4,310 congregations throughout the rest of the world.

In addition to Anderson University and School of Theology, the church operates five other institutions of higher learning in North America: Bay Ridge Christian College (Kendleton, TX), Gardner College (Camrose, Alberta, Canada), Mid-America Bible College (Oklahoma City, OK), Warner Pacific College (Portland, OR), and Warner Southern College (Lake Wales, FL). Countless training centers are operating throughout the world.

Like other denominations that began as movements promoting the unity of the church, both exclusive and inclusive tendencies have been readily apparent in the membership over the years and have been the source of some divisions within the body. Overall, the inclusive tendency has prevailed, resulting in the church working closely with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It is also a long-time member of the Christian Holiness Partnership, the association of WESLEYAN HOLINESS denominations.

See also Bible Colleges and Institutes; Christian Colleges; Feet, Washing of; Millenarians and Millennialism; Pietism

References and Further Reading

- Callen, Barry L. It's God's Church: The Life and Legacy of Daniel Sidney Warner. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1995.
- Croze, Lester A. Passport for a Reformation: A History of the Church of God's Reformation Movement's Missionary Endeavors Outside North America. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1981.
- Smith, John W.V. Quest for Holiness and Unity: A Centennial History of the Church of God. Anderson, IN: Warner Press, 1980.

D.WILLIAM FAUPEL

CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST

The largest African American Pentecostal denomination in the world and the second largest Pentecostal denomination in North America, the Church of God in Christ (COGIC) is rooted in the lines of a humble preacher and his fellow Holiness preachers in the mid-southern United States.

Founder and Origins

The name “Church of God in Christ,” as the story goes, was revealed to the young Holiness preacher Charles Harrison Mason (1866–1961) while he walked the streets of Little Rock, Arkansas, in 1897, the official incorporation year of COGIC. The son of Missionary Baptist parents, who also were former slaves, Mason was born just outside Memphis on September 8, 1866. Said to have an attraction to religion early in his life, Mason’s desire was to preserve the vibrant “slave religion” he saw in his community. From this passion Mason came to believe that God gave him unique spiritual characteristics, particularly dreams and visions. Soon after an experience of divine healing in 1880, in which he claimed to have been spontaneously cured of a severe illness, the charismatic Mason began to travel southern Arkansas as a lay preacher, planning to be ordained into the Missionary Baptist Church.

In November 1893 after a short, unsuccessful marriage, Mason entered Arkansas Baptist College, only to withdraw after three months. He found that the promotion of HIGHER CRITICISM in the college did little to preserve the slave religion he longed to safeguard. It is during this time that Mason came under the influence of the WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT, particularly the tenet that a believer can be completely sanctified through an act of divine GRACE, which he soon claimed to have experienced. It is also during this time that he came to befriend another Arkansas Baptist College alumnus, Charles Prince Jones, a Missionary Baptist minister in Selma, Alabama, who had also experienced entire SANCTIFICATION. The holiness preaching of these two ministers created church divisions and their eventual expulsion. After this expulsion Jones began an annual convention for fellow Holiness ministers in 1896, which led to the incorporation of the Church of God in Christ in 1897.

This new DENOMINATION, one of the first Americanborn African American denominations, expanded quickly. Mason nevertheless believed that his inability to heal the sick and exorcise demons hindered his ministry. Consequently, in early 1907 after Mason heard reports of the AZUSA STREET REVIVAL, the revival that sparked the American Pentecostal movement (see PENTECOSTALISM), he and two other COGIC ministers traveled to California, where they claimed to have experienced the Pentecostal teaching of Baptism in the Holy Spirit evidenced by speaking in TONGUES. After their five-week visit Mason and his companions returned eager to testify to this new teaching and found that another Azusa Street graduate, Glen A. Cook, had been laying the groundwork in their own church. With Cook’s help Mason began to transform COGIC into a Wesleyan-Holiness Pentecostal church. C.P.Jones, Mason’s cofounder, disagreed with this new teaching, and in the summer of 1907 left the denomination with the faction of ministers and congregations that supported him. [They later reorganized as the Churches of Christ (Holiness) U.S.A.] Mason regrouped what remained in 1907, keeping the name “Church of God in Christ,” and included a Pentecostal clause in the denomination’s statement of beliefs.

Mason led the denomination until his death in 1961, and under his leadership the denomination grew phenomenally. So influential was Mason that the FBI created a file on him, tracking his pacifist (see PACIFISM) and interracial activities. In 1945 Mason dedicated Mason Temple, the denomination's new headquarters in Memphis, and the largest African American-owned auditorium at the time. Its pulpit has supported historic speeches by preachers and leaders, such as MARTIN LUTHER KING JR.'S final "Mountain Top" speech and President Bill Clinton's "Memphis Speech." COGIC has been, without debate, a dominant force in AFRICAN AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM. This influence can be seen in its pioneering work in Gospel music and its leadership in African American ECUMENISM. C.H.Mason Seminary is one of the seven-member consortium of African American sem-inaries that constitute the International Theological Center of Atlanta, Georgia.

Doctrine and Ordinances

Doctrine

The Church of God in Christ holds to a conservative evangelical Trinitarian DOCTRINE that includes belief in the inerrancy of Scripture, the original sin of humanity, the existence of angels and demons, the need for EVANGELISM, the need for a personal CONVERSION experience, and the second coming of Jesus. COGIC is also found within the Pentecostal family, particularly the Wesleyan-Holiness branch of this family. This meant that the church maintained, and somewhat still maintains, a number of distinct doctrines.

Historically the Church of God in Christ has promoted a holy life, maintaining conservative social values and modest dress. As a Wesleyan-Holiness church, however, COGIC has emphasized the doctrine of sanctification, where the Holy Spirit delivers the believer from the pollution of SIN. During Mason's tenure the denomination officially affirmed the Wesleyan-holiness doctrine of entire sanctification. Here, based on a doctrine established by JOHN WESLEY, the believer experiences an additional work of divine grace, besides JUSTIFICATION, where they are entirely and instantaneously delivered from the pollution of sin. Wesley taught that, although divine justification forgave the sinner of sins of commission, the stain of Adam's original sin remained. God thus provided as a second gift of grace that cleaned the person of sin. A believer then had some physical manifestation that testified to this experience. After Mason the denomination officially moved away from the doctrine of entire sanctification, although it is still widely held. Officially COGIC maintains that the Spirit's deliverance from sin is a continuous process.

As a Pentecostal denomination COGIC maintains that God is dynamically active in the world and within the believer's life. This can be seen, first, in the doctrine of the Baptism of the Holy Spirit, understood as a third distinct crisis experience of divine grace in which the believer is given spiritual power for the purpose of doing supernatural service for the church. This gift is believed to be "evidenced" by speaking in unknown tongues (Acts 2), which is a consequence of Spirit baptism and a manifestation of the "fruit of the Spirit" (Galatians 5). Second, the Pentecostal aspect of COGIC is seen in the affirmations of spiritual warfare against Satan, divine healing (see FAITH HEALING), and miracles. According to official and popular teaching, Satan and demons (see DEVIL) can be subdued and conquered by believers, through the power given to believers by Jesus (Mark 16:17). The acts of divine healing and miracles are believed to be visible acts of divine power that prove the authority of God's word and support the mission of the church.

Ordinances

For COGIC members, the only ordinances that are valid are those they believe originate in Christ himself. They are believed to be signs of divine grace that represent, seal, and apply the COVENANT made between God and believer biblically. The Church of God in Christ exercises three ordinances: water BAPTISM, the LORD'S SUPPER, and foot washing (see FEET, WASHING OF). Water baptism, for COGIC, is a full-immersion believer's baptism. In other words, although water baptism alone does not provide SALVATION, it is a step within a process where a person outwardly demonstrates his or her inward conversion. Because baptism symbolizes the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, COGIC asserts that water baptism must involve the full immersion of the believer in water. The Lord's Supper, or Holy Communion, symbolizes Christ's death and suffering as seen in the last meal Jesus had before crucifixion. Furthermore it symbolizes the believer's identification and participation with the death of Christ and provides spiritual union with Christ and fellow believers. Foot washing, an ordinance not exclusive to COGIC, is believed to have been ordained by Jesus when he washed his disciples' feet (John 13:1–20). It is an act that characterizes the humility of service expected by those who are members of the Kingdom of God.

Early Racial Controversy

The Church of God in Christ held a unique position in 1907, being the only incorporated denomination to have become officially Pentecostal. Many of the early Pentecostal ministers, both black and white, were ordained into ministry under elder Charles H. Mason. The value in obtaining ordination for Pentecostal preachers was discounted railroad fees and the ability to perform marriages. For the period, then, between 1907 and 1914 COGIC was largely interracial. This position echoed the interracial characteristic of early Pentecostalism and the Azusa Street Revival, a value that ran counter to the culture of the southern United States where Pentecostalism was born. This did not mean that racial issues were absent, or that COGIC somehow transcended its time and culture. A number of white ministers who attended the Azusa Street Revival were appalled by the racial mixing in Christian worship. Additionally the Church of God in Christ did have a racial divide, in which white and black congregations and ministers largely operated independently, having denomination name alone in common.

The issue of entire sanctification, however, became a dividing line among the largely northern and white Pentecostals, who denied this Wesleyan-holiness doctrine and felt the need to organize with like-minded independent Pentecostal churches for the purpose of missions and ministerial education. Furthermore the southern white Pentecostals were feeling the pressure of cultural norms that expected segregation. In December 1913, therefore, William Durham and COGIC ministers E.N. Bell and H.A. Goss issued calls and invitations for a general assembly of "all Pentecostal saints and the Churches of God in Christ,” to be held the following April in Hot Springs, Arkansas. The invitations went out to white Pentecostals only. During this General Assembly a new denomination was formed, called the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, and E.N.Bell was elected its first chairman. Elders William Seymour and Charles Mason were the only African Americans invited, Mason preaching a sermon on the Thursday evening to bless the new denomination. It is believed that Mason understood this move as something white Pentecostals needed in order to work in a racially segregated culture, and never spoke ill of the split. In October 1994, however, in an event know as the “Memphis Miracle,” a number of Pentecostal denominations gathered in Memphis to publicly reconcile the racial rift created between COGIC and other groups in 1914.

Expansion and Organization

Expansion

After the 1914 divide the Church of God in Christ reverted to its African American roots. Initially held together by Mason’s leadership, the annual General Convention, and a periodical (the Whole Truth), it rapidly grew to become one of the largest denominations in the world. In 1934 COGIC claimed 345 churches in twenty-one states, consisting of 25,000 members. By 1962, a year after Mason’s death, the denomination numbered 382,679 members. In 1991 the COGIC global membership was reported to be five and a half million members, with more than 15,000 churches and 30,000 clergy. Published statistics after the year 2000 have placed the global membership to be approximately eight million members.

Although still largely African American in the United States, the modern COGIC stands as a multinational and multicultural denomination, largely as a result of its missionary endeavors. During the 1920s COGIC moved out from the UNITED STATES into MEXICO, Panama, the CARIBBEAN (Jamaica, Turk Islands, Trinidad, Haiti), and CANADA. The denomination had its largest success within the Caribbean, particularly Haiti, where it has established more than 150 churches, schools, and an orphanage. Moreover, in the 1930s COGIC began its work in AFRICA through a former Assemblies of God missionary to LIBERIA, Elizabeth White, who remained in the country as a COGIC missionary. Liberia became COGIC’s main African mission until it entered SOUTH AFRICA in 1952 and then Ghana and Nigeria in the 1960s. COGIC is now found in eighteen African countries, with churches led primarily by African nationals. After World War II, COGIC moved into Europe and Asia, initially through establishing churches to serve American military personnel in JAPAN, the PHILIPPINES, GERMANY, and ITALY. Then, with freer movement of British Commonwealth citizens, the denomination established congregations in ENGLAND and INDIA. The large success of COGIC in African and Latino/a communities is attributed to the perception that this denomination does not spread the “white man’s religion,” but a Christianity that is free from past European imperialism.

Organization

Church governance and POLITY are important ongoing issues for the Church of God in Christ. Conflicts have arisen between the denominational leadership, local elders, bishops, and local congregations that have led, at times, to secular courts cases. Initially the organization and governance of the denomination were guided by Mason's charisma. During this time COGIC's ECCLESIOLOGY followed a congregational model of church governance, with independent congregations and state overseers who worked with Mason and the national government. Additionally a gender-separated leadership created particular offices for men and women, following a more traditional African American spirituality. (It is important to note that each male leadership office has a female counterpart.) Mason's death led to a difficult transitional time for the denomination concerning issues of leadership. During the 1960s, however, COGIC adopted a hybrid of congregational and Episcopal governing models, which has served the denomination better.

Ministry within the denomination follows a specific chain of leadership. The local congregation is the foundational element of the denomination. The ordained minister, or "elder," governs the local congregation. Although a trustee board is established, which primarily monitors finances, the church's power is entrusted to the largely autonomous elder. A group of churches, normally no less than three and no more than fifteen, constitute a "district." Each district is presided over by a district superintendent (male) and a district missionary (female). The district leaders are responsible for serving the needs of their ministers and churches in general. From there, a group of districts constitute a "jurisdiction," which historically encompassed one state, although jurisdictions now may overlap states or countries. Each jurisdiction, which also has gender-specific leadership, formally deals with the affairs of its districts, provides annual meetings, develops ministerial education opportunities, and ordains its CLERGY.

Policy decisions for the international body are made through a governing structure similar to that of the United States government. First, the "General Assembly," which represents the entire denomination, constitutes the legislative branch and has the ultimate political authority in the denomination. Meeting twice as year—most importantly during the annual "Holy Convocation" meeting in November—clergy and LAITY representatives from each jurisdiction monitor denominational affairs. Second, when not in session, the General Assembly is represented by an elected twelve-person executive branch, known as the "presidium." The presidium is headed by the "presiding bishop," the formal representative head of the denomination, although meetings of the General Assembly are managed by a chair and vice chair. Decisions made by the presidium are ratified by the legislative branch at its meetings. Third, the judiciary branch, which consists of members elected from the General Assembly for seven-year terms, is responsible for settling disputes between churches, members, and clergy.

References and Further Reading

Anderson, Robert Mapes. Vision of the Disinherited: The Making of American Pentecostalism. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1985.

- Clemmons, Ithiel C. Bishop C.H.Mason and the Roots of the Church of God in Christ. Bakersfield, CA: Pneuma Life, 1996.
- Daniels, David. "Church of God in Christ." In Religions of the World, edited by J.Gordon Melton and Martin Baumann, vol. 1, 318–320. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Jones, C.E. "Church of God in Christ." In Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, edited by Stanley M. Burgess and Gary B.McGee, 203–204. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan, 1988.
- MacRoberts, Iain. The Black Roots and White Racism of Early Pentecostalism. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 1988.
- Paris, Arthur E. Black Pentecostalism: Southern Religion in an Urban World. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1982.
- Shannon, David T., and Gayraud S.Wilmore, eds. Black Witness to the Apostolic Faith. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 1988.
- Synan, Vinson. The Holiness-Pentecostal Movement in the United States. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1971.
- Wacker, Grant. Heaven Below. Early Pentecostalism and American Culture, Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.

H.CHAD HILLIER

CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY

The faith community that came to be known (in 1952) as the Church of God of Prophecy (CGP) has been captive to the spiritual journey of founder A.J.Tomlinson, an Indiana Quaker. Nowhere is this more evident than in the distinction that CGP is the only Pentecostal denomination in the United States that has always been racially integrated. This stands in stark contrast to the axiom that most Pentecostal groups failed at interracialism within a decade of the fabled 1906 AZUSA STREET REVIVAL.

The CGP often claims to share the history of the early years of the CHURCH OF GOD (Cleveland, Tennessee). As a result of sociological, theological, historical, and personal factors, the Church of God of Prophecy came into existence in 1923. The CGP has laid considerable emphasis on several CG events before 1923 when A.J.Tomlinson was general overseer. In fact the CGP counts among its binding politics those decisions of the general assemblies from 1906 onward, unless later clarified or reversed by the CGP. Also, the home that hosted the first general assembly of 1906 is owned by the CGP. An annual service is held by the CGP in this house to commemorate the first assembly and to honor its participants, activities, and resolutions.

A.J.Tomlinson served as general overseer of the CGP until his death (1943), at which time his youngest son, Milton A.Tomlinson, was chosen for the position. M.A.Tomlinson oversaw international departments that directed prayer groups, organized MISSIONS, worked with young people, utilized modern media, sought out military personnel, and encouraged BIBLE study and EVANGELISM. CGP still maintains the multi-million-dollar, 216-acre biblical theme park in western North Carolina known as the Fields of the Wood.

Under the Tomlinsons the term “theocracy” was employed to describe a POLITY that proclaimed the annual general assembly to be the highest tribunal, whereas the entire ecclesiastical structure collapsed on the office of the general overseer. All of the general assembly resolutions, which were projected to be unanimous decisions of all male members of the 20,000 attendees, were predicated on Holiness Pentecostal thought (see HOLINESS MOVEMENT, PENTECOSTALISM). Various ministries of evangelism, missions, and Christian education were prompted at these assemblies by the international departments, accompanied by much fervent PREACHING (some delivered in Spanish and everything translated into Spanish and French) and praying, whereas the doctrinal and business concerns were held to a minimum. The greatest attendance at each assembly was during the annual address by the general overseer. Much time was devoted to state and national marches (started in 1925), which were swept along by the Bahamas Brass Band until discontinued in 1988.

In terms of officially determined doctrinal propositions, at the center stands an Arminian version of the ordo salutis with an emphasis on SANCTIFICATION (see ARMINIANISM). It culminates with a doctrine of Spirit baptism that regards TONGUES-speaking as the initial evidence. Other prominent teachings from the onefixed list of twenty-nine include an imminenceoriented ESCHATOLOGY that involves a premillennial return of the risen Jesus; a call for the sanctity of the nuclear family, which includes denial of a multiple marriage of an adulterous person and fornication (as related to a person who can remarry) is defined as a single person marrying a person who has a living married companion; the practice of water BAPTISM by immersion and rebaptism after “reconversion”; the LORD’S SUPPER (with grape juice) and the washing of the saints’ feet (see FEET, WASHING OF); total abstinence from intoxicating beverages and tobacco; a concern for modesty in all dimensions of life; and an emphasis on nine Holy Spirit charisms with special attention given to divine healing (see FAITH HEALING). For the most part the formulas have positively influenced adherents’ lives, but there have been some aberrant results as well. Included in the failure column has been the refusal to purchase life insurance, opposition to formal education, opposition to medicine to the extent that pain and death were accepted rather than seek medical treatment, and dissolution of existing marriages.

The restorationist impulse was manifested, until recent years, in an exclusive body ECCLESIOLOGY (see RESTORATIONISM). The latter influenced the fact that the CGP has had a high percentage of female pastors and may be the Pentecostal church most consistent in working toward racial reconciliation. African Caribbeans, African Americans, and Latin Americans are charged with the leadership of states whose composition includes European Americans as the majority. Bible Training Camp opened in 1941 with an integrated student body. In some states the CGP may have been the first church to defy Jim Crow laws in their worship services and they have long opposed the Ku KLUX KLAN. WOMEN ministers may administer SACRAMENTS but are excluded from the elevated rank of presbyter (see WOMEN CLERGY). Yet the international headquarters has a long tradition of female executives.

Billy D.Murray was chosen to fill the position of general overseer when M.A.Tomlinson resigned in 1990. The church experienced rapid changes such as the closing of Tomlinson College, financial restructuring with an emphasis on local churches, plurality of office of general overseer, and relaxing of some previous taboos. Fred

S.Fisher followed Murray in 2000 and quickly embraced sister pentecostal bodies. CGP is active in the PENTECOSTAL CHARISMATIC CHURCHES OF NORTH AMERICA (PCCNA), the PENTECOSTAL WORLD CONFERENCE, and the International Charismatic Consultation on World Evangelization (ICCOWE). Starting with the Third Quinquennium (1985–1989) of the International Pentecostal—Roman Catholic Dialogue, CGP was among the first Pentecostal denominations to send an official representative. Various ministers attend functions organized by the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS (NAE), whereas a few have engaged with the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC).

The official mouthpiece remains the monthly periodical White Wing Messenger. The magazine is published in eight languages and has 6,500 subscribers. The CGP reported in 2002 a membership of 77,609 in the UNITED STATES with 1,876 churches, whereas 125 countries outside the United States had an aggregate membership of 514,000 with 5,590 churches. In the earlier decades the membership was almost exclusively from a low socioeconomic stratum. Yet the working poor have been increasingly replaced by the middle class in the industrialized West. Accompanying the social upward mobility of the membership has been a moderation of many of the sectarian idiosyncrasies and a concomitant lack of membership gains in the United States. The organization at large continues its anti-intellectual tradition, while the official doctrinal formulas fade in significance for the emerging middle-class constituency.

References and Further Reading

Cyclopedic Index of Assembly Minutes and Important Business Acts of the Church of God of Prophecy: 1906 to 1974. Cleveland, TN: White Wing Publishing House, 1975.

Davidson, C.T. Upon This Rock. 3 vols. Cleveland, TN: White Wing House & Press, 1974–1976.

HAROLD D.HUNTER

CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS

See Mormonism

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND

“The Kirk,” as it is known in SCOTLAND, is the national church of Scotland, but not a state church. It is Presbyterian in government and Reformed in doctrine. In 2001 the church had 590,824 communicant members organized in forty-nine presbyteries and 1,543 congregations served by 1,090 ministers and 43,499 elders. In the 2001 national census, more than two million adults identified themselves with the Church of Scotland, suggesting that almost half the population would regard the Kirk as “their church.” It has exercised significant international influence.

History

Tracing its roots to the missionary work of Ninian and Columba in the fifth and sixth centuries, the Kirk adopted a Protestant and Reformed identity with the sixteenth-century Scottish REFORMATION. Through the leadership of JOHN KNOX the movement for reform in Scotland took the distinctively Calvinist form that is evident in the Scots Confession and the First Book of Discipline, both completed in 1560. Building on Knox’s work, ANDREW MELVILLE developed the presbyterian form of church government and the broad social vision that have been at the core of the Kirk’s identity. During the seventeenth century the Stuart kings attempted to impose an episcopal polity on the Kirk. Resistance found expression in the National Covenant of 1638 and in armed struggle against the Stuarts. In 1647 the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION of Faith was completed and became the principal subordinate standard of the church. Under the Revolution Settlement of 1690, the Kirk was established by law as presbyterian. When the Scottish and English Parliaments united in 1707 the Treaty of Union secured the presbyterian government of the Church of Scotland.

From the struggles of the seventeenth century there emerged in Scotland a passion to uphold the spiritual independence of the Kirk. The restoration of patronage, whereby the initiative in the appointment of ministers lay with civil rather than ecclesiastical authority, was seen by many as a breach of the Treaty of Union. This led to several secessions during the eighteenth century, most of the seceding bodies entering the United Presbyterian Church that was formed in 1847. Meanwhile the early nineteenth century had seen growing tension between the Evangelical Party that was determined to uphold the spiritual independence of the Kirk, and the civil courts, which asserted the rights of the patrons in ministerial appointments. This led to the Disruption of 1843 and the formation of the Free Church of Scotland. Almost half of the ministers and members of the Kirk, “came out” of the Established Church to form what they understood to be the true—that is, Free—Church of Scotland. Compelled to choose between state connection and spiritual independence they opted for the latter.

The Church of Scotland was therefore split into three streams for the remainder of the nineteenth century and a feature of many Scottish towns is three church buildings in close proximity. The Free Church and United Presbyterian Church united in 1900 to form the United Free Church. A conservative minority of the Free Church declined to enter the union and remained separate, seeking to be loyal to the doctrines and principles on which the church was founded in 1843. In 1929 the “Auld Kirk” and the United Free Church united as the Church of Scotland. A minority of the United Free Church declined to enter the union, fearing that it brought the church too close to the state without securing its spiritual independence. However, the great majority of Presbyterians were once again united in the national church.

An important part of the preparation for the 1929 union was the composition of the Articles Declaratory of the Constitution of the Church of Scotland in Matters Spiritual. These were recognized by Parliament in 1921 and made clear that church government in spiritual matters is derived from the Lord Jesus Christ and is not subject to civil authority. Thus the Kirk resolved its long struggle to secure the spiritual independence of the church while maintaining its character as a national church. At its annual General Assembly a throne gallery is provided for the monarch (usually represented by a Lord High Commissioner) who is invited to address the Assembly but not entitled to intervene in its business. This symbolizes the mutual recognition of church and state while making clear the independence of the church in its own government. The General Assembly consists of ministers and elders in equal numbers, commissioned by presbyteries. In the absence of the Scottish Parliament between 1707 and 1999, the Assembly often functioned as a national debating chamber and a means of giving voice to concerns of the Scottish people.

Leading Features

Throughout its history the Church of Scotland has been inspired by the ideal of the “Godly Commonwealth”—the Calvinist vision that not only spirituality and personal morality but the whole life of society ought to be subject to the Lordship of Christ. It played a major role in the provision of education and social welfare until the state took over this responsibility in the late nineteenth century. Whereas the Kirk had once represented the faith of the people of Scotland, in the twentieth century it came to recognize that it was one voice in a pluralist society. Nevertheless it continued to engage prophetically with all aspects of national life, as well as offering a range of social services in partnership with the state. Eschewing the privileges of Establishment, the Kirk sees its national role in terms of service and witness to every part of Scottish life. Human and material resources are channeled to particularly needy and strategic areas.

Its national character finds expression in a commitment to bring the ordinances of religion to the people in every part of Scotland through a territorial ministry. An aspiration since the REFORMATION has been to place a church building and the services of an ordained minister within easy reach of every community in the country. The nineteenth century saw the realization of this ideal but twentieth century decline has led to many church buildings being closed and a sharp reduction in the number of ministers. This unprecedented slump presents a major challenge to the Kirk and, at the turn of the millennium, it was endeavoring to find ways to reconnect with the community.

Since the abolition of patronage in 1874 the appointment of ministers to parishes is by the free election by all the members and registered adherents of the vacant charge, subject to the call being sustained by Presbytery. Although elders play a prominent role, it is the minister who has been the face of the Kirk in Scottish society, leading public worship and often being a guiding influence in many aspects of community life. More team ministries and lay leadership suggest that a different pattern of church life may emerge in the twenty-first century.

The Kirk has aimed to maintain an educated ministry and an informed LAITY; in practice theological education has concentrated on the former. Ministers receive their theological training at one of the four ancient universities: Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and St. Andrews. In terms of theological persuasion the church is characterized by diversity. From those who adhere strictly to Westminster CALVINISM the spectrum stretches across to those with very liberal views, with most ministers and members somewhere in the middle. The Declaratory Acts of 1879 (United Presbyterian) and 1892 (Free Church) allow liberty of opinion on such points of DOCTRINE as do not enter into “the substance of the faith.” What constitutes the substance and how great is the liberty permitted have never been defined. The Articles Declaratory, which were recognized as constitutive by the Church of Scotland Act of 1921, contain a brief statement of doctrine in the First Article, which is declared to be “essential to the continuity and corporate life” of the church and which may never be altered.

The Kirk’s theological tradition is predominantly Evangelical and Reformed, with a succession of thinkers who were prepared to work creatively within that tradition to meet the challenges of their times. John Knox and Andrew Melville laid foundations in the Reformation era. Samuel Rutherford, George Gillespie, and David Dickson were exponents of the high Calvinism of the Westminster Confession (see COVENANT THEOLOGY). Resisting any descent into legalism in the early eighteenth century, Thomas Boston and Ebenezer Erskine championed the priority of God’s GRACE. A century later JOHN McLEOD CAMPBELL controversially challenged the doctrine of limited ATONEMENT in favor of an emphasis on God’s universal fatherhood and grace, which has come to be widely accepted. The nineteenth century witnessed a galaxy of outstanding scholars, many associated with the Free Church, such as THOMAS CHALMERS, John “Rabbi” Duncan, William Cunningham, A.B. Davidson, HENRY DRUMMOND, James Denney, James Orr, George Adam Smith, and H.R. Mackintosh. None was more brilliant than WILLIAM ROBERTSON SMITH, who introduced HIGHER CRITICISM to the Free Church at the cost of his own chair. In the twentieth century JOHN BAILLIE and T.F. Torrance expounded the apostolic and Reformed faith in relation to the post-ENLIGHTENMENT world of thought, whereas the biblical commentaries of William Barclay enjoyed wide influence.

Worship in the Kirk has been distinguished by the central place accorded to the PREACHING of the Word. Typically erudite, evangelical, and delivered with quiet intensity, the sermon has had a unique place in shaping Scottish life and character. Traditionally Holy Communion, or LORD’S SUPPER, is celebrated infrequently but solemnly. The twentieth century saw greater frequency and less formality in the celebration of Communion. With the Reformation came metrical psalms, which were sung for centuries until, from the later nineteenth century, increasingly supplemented by hymns (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The simple, biblical worship of the Reformers precluded observance of the Christian Year but it has found increasing acceptance in modern times.

After the Scottish Reformation the national church was maintained by a system of tax. Landowners were required to construct and maintain a church and manse and to provide a stipend for a minister. The eighteenth-century Secession Churches introduced a “voluntary” system, the expenses of each congregation being met by the freewill offerings of its members. The nineteenth-century Free Church operated by the same method, although with a more centralized system. The work of the Kirk since the 1929 union has been financed almost entirely by the freely given offerings of its members. The demands of an affluent society and the realities of a declining membership put pressure on the Kirk budget.

Commitment to a territorial ministry within a parish system has ensured that the presence and witness of the Kirk is spread fairly evenly across the country. Historically, Reformed worship began in urban and lowland areas of the south and east and it was not until the eighteenth century that it took root in the Gaelicspeaking communities of the Highlands to the north and west. Revival movements (see REVIVALS) brought a deep piety and Highland Christianity took on a distinctive character, perhaps drawing on the mystical tradition of its people. Highland churches have mostly remained conservative in doctrine and WORSHIP and, as a result, several Presbyterian denominations maintain separation from the Kirk.

Architecturally the Kirk is a major feature of Scottish life, with its church buildings among the most prominent and beautiful in both urban and rural areas. After the Reformation transepts were often added to the nave and chancel of medieval times, making the T-shape with pulpit and communion table at the center a common church design. The nineteenth century was a great period of church building with the Classical Revival creating churches of restrained elegance and the Gothic Revival producing more elaborate buildings, often with impressive spires.

Movements of renewal in modern times have drawn on a variety of sources. The Church Service Society has contributed to liturgical renewal within a broadly Reformed tradition, whereas the Scottish Church Society has aimed to influence worship from a "high church" perspective. The IONA COMMUNITY, founded by GEORGE MACLEOD in 1938, restored Iona Abbey as its base and promoted urban mission, which integrated innovative spirituality and radical social commitment. Meanwhile a Conservative Evangelical movement, drawing inspiration from the Aberdeen ministry of William Still after World War II, promoted systematic expository preaching and a return to the essentials of Christian FAITH. The membership of the Woman's Guild, founded in 1887, peaked at over 160,000 in the 1950s. Its nationwide network provided a fellowship for WOMEN to deepen and extend their Christian commitment.

The immigration of Irish Roman Catholics in the nineteenth and early twentieth century was greeted initially by suspicion and hostility from the Church of Scotland, a reaction that contributed to the formation of a sectarian environment in the west of Scotland. In the late twentieth century the Church of Scotland took the initiative in cultivating good relations with the Roman Catholic Church and played a leading role in the creation of Action of Churches Together in Scotland, an ecumenical instrument including the Catholic Church, in 1990 (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

Scots migrants founded Presbyterian Churches in IRELAND, the UNITED STATES, CANADA, SOUTH AFRICA, AUSTRALIA, and NEW ZEALAND. In the nineteenth century the Church of Scotland played a leading role in the missionary movement (see MISSIONS). JOHN R. MOTT declared that Scotland sent more missionaries overseas per head of population than any other country in the world. Alexander Duff of Calcutta, William Chalmers Burns of China, Robert Laws of Livingstonia, David Clement Scott of Blantyre, John Ross of Manchuria, MARY SLESSOR of Calabar, David Torrance of Tiberias, and J.E.LESSLIE NEWBIGIN of south India are among those who exercised great influence. Through the work of such missionaries many new churches were planted, notably in Jamaica, INDIA, Pakistan, CHINA, NIGERIA, Ghana, MALAWI, Zambia, Kenya, and South Africa. Scots such as J.H.Oldham played a leading role in the development of mission theory, as seen at the epochal WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE OF 1910, held in Edinburgh. Thus a national church became part of a movement of faith that spans the continents. Through partnership links with churches overseas and its membership in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES, this international dimension remains integral to the life of the Church of Scotland at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

References and Further Reading

- Blakey, Ronald S., ed. The Church of Scotland Year Book 2002/2003. Edinburgh: St. Andrews Press, 2002.
- Burleigh, J.H.S. A Church History of Scotland. London: Oxford University Press, 1960.
- Cameron, Nigel M.de S., ed. Dictionary of Scottish Church History and Theology. Edinburgh: T. & T.Clark, 1993.
- Cheyne, A.C. The Transforming of the Kirk. Edinburgh: St. Andrews Press, 1983.
- Hewat, Elizabeth G.K. Vision and Achievement 1796–1956: A History of the Foreign Missions of the Churches United in the Church of Scotland. London: Thomas Nelson, 1960.
- Kirk, James. Patterns of Reform: Continuity and Change in the Reformation Kirk. Edinburgh: T. & T.Clark, 1989.
- , ed. The Second Book of Discipline. Edinburgh: St. Andrews Press, 1980.
- Murray, Douglas. Rebuilding the Kirk: Presbyterian Reunion in Scotland 1909–1929. Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 2000.
- Records of the Scottish Church History Society*. Edinburgh, 1923ff.
- Weatherhead, James L. The Constitution and Laws of the Church of Scotland. Edinburgh: Board of Practice and Procedure, 1997.

KENNETH R.ROSS

CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE

General Description

The Church of the Nazarene is a Wesleyan/Holiness denomination with a total constituency of 3.7 million and a membership of 1.35 million in about 13,000 congregations in 120 nations (see WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT). Just under half of the constituency live in the United States and CANADA. It is served by about 13,000 ordained elders, 400 ordained deacons, and 5,500 licensed ministers. From its beginnings, the denomination has received and ordained women into its ministry (see WOMEN CLERGY). Its headquarters are in Kansas City, Missouri.

From its earliest days the denomination has maintained both liberal arts colleges and schools for clergy preparation. Currently it operates fifty-one postsecondary educational institutions in thirty-two countries (see COLLEGES, PROTESTANT). These include two postbaccalaureate theological seminaries, nine liberal arts institutions offering baccalaureate degrees (eight offer graduate degrees as well), and baccalaureate-level theological colleges in a dozen countries. It operates a number of Bible institutes at the primary and secondary levels (see BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTIONS).

It also runs two schools of nursing, a hospital, and a number of medical clinics. Its independently incorporated international relief agency may take its own initiatives and also works with a variety of humanitarian agencies.

The denomination also maintains Nazarene Publishing House (publishing under its own and Beacon Hill Press of Kansas City imprints) and a music publishing subsidiary (Lillenas Publishing Company imprint). Both of these institutions service all of the major language groups in the denomination and in the holiness movement at large (see PUBLISHING, MEDIA). The Nazarenes are attempting to remain one international denomination rather than to develop a federation or association or alliance.

Polity

The polity of the Church of the Nazarene mixes Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Congregational forms.

Strictly speaking, the local congregation is the church. Congregations of twenty-five or more members have the right to make their own pastoral arrangements and to control the disbursement of their own funds. Each congregation annually elects an official board that oversees the finances, properties, personnel, and programs of the congregation. Most congregations also elect councils and principal officers for the major auxiliaries, such as religious education and youth work.

Each local congregation is incorporated into one of 350 districts. Most districts are geographically defined. Formally, the district's work is administrative and promotional, aimed at helping congregational growth and development, and at the establishment of new congregations. In addition, many districts hold annual camp meetings and youth camps, which are primarily evangelistic in purpose. The policy-making body of a district is the annual district assembly, to which each congregation elects delegates in proportion to its membership. This assembly elects the district's principal executive officer, the district superintendent, who may be reelected indefinitely. It also elects standing committees, other district officers, and trustees to the board of regents or trustees that serves that district's region. Local congregations are not legally bound by a district assembly's decisions, but generally understand themselves to be honor bound to meet them. Generally, title to all local church property is held by the district to which it belongs.

In addition to carrying out assembly directives and initiatives, the district superintendent works with congregations to maintain appropriate pastoral arrangements.

A still-developing level of organization is that of "region," each region consisting of a varying number of districts. Its principal executive officer is the regional director. This officer is appointed by and reports directly to the denominational Director of World Mission and is responsible for all phases of the denomination's work in all of the districts in a given geographical area. Current "regions" with directors are AFRICA, Asia-Pacific, Canada, CARIBBEAN, Eurasia, MEXICO and Central America, and South America.

The USA—Canada is an anomaly. It is divided into nine regions, each with its liberal arts college or university, but these regions do not have regional directors.

The supreme governing body of the Church of the Nazarene is the General Assembly, eighty percent of which is a district-elected, delegated body, half lay and half clergy. The additional twenty percent are ex officio: district superintendents, and regional- and general-level administrators. Between meetings of the General Assembly, the denomination's governing body is the General Board, a half lay—half clergy body elected by the entire assembly and answerable to it. This board meets annually.

General Assembly decisions concerning policy, polity, and doctrine are binding on the entire denomination. However, those that involve the basic Articles of Faith of the denomination and the denomination's Constitution require ratification by two-thirds of the 350 annual district assemblies before they are binding.

The principal executive officers of the General Assembly are the general superintendents (currently six), who are clergy individually elected to four-year, renewable terms by the General Assembly. The general superintendents constitute themselves as a board. Their principal tasks are to execute the decisions of the General Assembly, to oversee all denominational policies and programs, to ensure denominational fidelity to its written polity and doctrinal statements (contained in the Manual, the denomination's official written constitution and collection of rituals), to preside over district assemblies and to preside over the ordination of ministers at district assemblies (or to delegate persons to do so in their absence), and to approve or disapprove nominations from the appropriate entities for various denominational offices and institutions. They are also the ultimate interpreters of the Manual.

Doctrinal Description

The basic requirement for church membership is confession of faith in Jesus Christ as personal Lord and Savior, agreement with the sixteen "Articles of Faith," consent to abide by the "General Rules," and a vow to seek grace of entire SANCTIFICATION if one is not already in the experience. Confession of faith in Jesus Christ and entire sanctification are understood in terms developed by WESLEYANISM and revivalism (see REVIVALS). The sixteen articles of faith are directly related to the "Twenty-five Articles of Religion" of the United Methodist Church (USA) and the "THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of Religion" of the Anglican tradition. The "General Rules" also clearly relate to historic METHODISM: avoidance of the appearance of evil; doing good to all; and not inveighing against the polity and practices of the denomination.

In its "Historical Statement," the Church of the Nazarene confesses as its own the history of the people of God recorded in the Old and New Testaments, and that same history as it has extended from the days of the apostles to our own. It embraces as its own the people of God through the ages, those redeemed through Jesus Christ in whatever expression of the one church they may be found. It receives the ecumenical creeds of the first five centuries as expressions of its own faith.

Recent rulings have allowed that the Nicene Creed may be said with or without the “filioque” in traditionally Orthodox areas, and that in those areas Easter may be celebrated according to the Orthodox calendar (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Some congregations omit the “descensus.” The “Articles of Faith” are clearly Protestant, upholding the doctrines of SALVATION by grace alone through FAITH alone, Scripture (the sixty-six- book canon) as the sole rule for faith and practice, and the priesthood of all believers.

A significant minority of Nazarenes are fundamentalists regarding the Scripture. The Articles of Faith themselves speak of “plenary inspiration” and focus on the soteriological function of biblical inspiration and “inerrancy.” This allows for both Fundamentalist and non-Fundamentalist approaches to the Bible.

The Nazarenes retain two sacraments: Baptism and the Lord’s Supper. They celebrate them in compliance with the basic traditional requirements as to material used (in the Lord’s Supper, unfermented wine), the form of words, and sacramental intention. They practice both paedobaptism and believer’s baptism by any of the traditional modes. The rather common practice of rebaptism of those coming to them from paedobaptist traditions is increasingly discouraged. The Lord’s Supper is open to all who confess Christ as Savior, regardless of denominational affiliation, but must be presided over by a duly (but not necessarily Nazarene-) ordained clergy person. Congregations must celebrate quarterly. Many celebrate more frequently.

Anointing of the sick for healing is commonly practiced, and modern medical care is also fully encouraged.

Distinguishing Tenet

Theologically the Church of the Nazarene is rooted in JOHN WESLEY’S doctrine of Christian perfection; ideologically, it is rooted in nineteenth-century North American revivalism. Wesley (1703–1791) believed that Christ’s atoning work makes available to believers a grace-given unconditional love for God and neighbor in this life, which begins in the cleansing of the heart from all that is not love, hence the term “Christian perfection,” a perfection in love. In a strict sense, this experience is a second basic work of grace, justification being the first. Wesley insisted that although both works are receivable only by faith, both come sola gratia. The atonement provides for both and is continually necessary for maintaining both. Both are entire or complete or full in themselves and are instantaneously received, but these characteristics do not foreclose on spiritual growth or “growth in grace.” Rather, growth in grace is one of their most marked concomitants. In fact, refusal to grow in grace may ultimately frustrate the gifts of grace and in their loss. Assurance that either experience has been granted comes from the Holy Spirit in the Spirit’s own good time.

The distinguishing tenet of the Church of the Nazarene is almost precisely this Wesleyan doctrine of Christian perfection—also referred to as “entire sanctification,” “holiness,” “full salvation,” “the baptism of the Spirit,” “the second blessing,” “heart purity,” and “perfect love,” among other terms. Nazarenes diverge from Wesley at only one basic point. They tend to believe that assurance comes with the gift of entire sanctification itself. Many also diverge at two ancillary points: Wesley was not so sure as they that the gift should be equated with “the baptism of the Holy Spirit,” and they place much greater emphasis on its instantaneousness than he did.

History

In nineteenth-century Methodist revivalism, emphasis fell on the instantaneousness of both justification and entire sanctification. (The terms “holiness” and “entire sanctification” had come to more prominent use than the term “Christian perfection.” Formally, nuances were recognized; practically, the terms were synonymous.) By the 1830s Methodists were debating the relationship between the instantaneousness of entire sanctification and the gift of assurance. All agreed that assurance was a gift of divine grace and had no specific or universally recognizable marks. All agreed that it was simply a matter of the Holy Spirit witnessing to the seeker’s spirit. However, did assurance, the “witness of the Spirit,” come with the work of entire sanctification, or might it come later?

Also in the 1830s perfectionist Methodists began to debate whether there was any necessary prerequisite to receiving the grace of entire sanctification aside from already having been justified and regenerated by grace through faith. Some argued that entire consecration must precede entire sanctification. It seemed to others that this put the doctrine of sola gratia, sola fide at risk, making consecration and faith over into good works.

By the 1860s most revivalist perfectionists, which now included many who were not Methodists, held that complete consecration must precede entire sanctification and that assurance comes with the work of entire sanctification, for assurance depends on one’s personal appropriation of the biblical promises concerning the work.

The principal figure in propagating this understanding throughout this period was PHOEBE WORRALL PALMER (1807–1874). She and her husband Walter Palmer, a physician, through publishing, writing, and speaking, led a large number of persons within and outside both British and American Methodism into the experience of entire sanctification and encouraged yet many others in “the way of holiness,” as she called it. These included a significant number of American bishops and bishops-to-be.

In 1867 a handful of prominent Methodist Episcopal (ME) pastors in the Middle Atlantic states (see METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH CONFERENCE), all of them deeply influenced by Phoebe Palmer, sponsored an ecumenical, but Methodist-run campmeeting for the “promotion of holiness” in Vineland, New Jersey. It was to respond to three issues: the coarsening of moral and ethical standards produced by the CIVIL WAR, the growing neglect of “holiness” in Methodist faith and practice, and the surrender of the campmeeting to emotionalism. The ME bishops unofficially approved it and at least one participated in it. So successful was the Vineland meeting that the sponsors formed themselves into the National Campmeeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness.

The “National,” as it was called, then held “holiness” camp meetings across the country for about two decades. It encouraged an ecumenical spirit but was itself punctiliously episcopal Methodist. It always carefully secured bona fide invitations and permissions from bishops in jurisdiction, presiding elders, and local Methodist pastors, and local support. The success of these campmeetings led to the formation of large numbers of regional, state, and county holiness associations in the 1870s to 1890s, each with its (annual) campmeeting. The majority of their members were ME, but they also attracted and accepted significant numbers of Wesleyan and Free Methodists, a significant number of persons affected by CHARLES FINNEY'S preaching and Oberlin perfectionism (developed by Finney and Asa Mahan), a smaller proportion of Restorationists (see RESTORATIONISM), and scatterings of Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) and others. This more ecumenical base placed an ever-increasing proportion of the holiness movement beyond the reach of episcopal Methodist polity, policy, etiquette, and discipline. By the mid-1870s, deep tensions between the "National" (still mostly ME, but now including some Methodist Episcopal, South [MES], ministers) and several of the more regional associations became obvious, and intra-Methodist tensions in and between the ME and MES, in large part over "holiness," were also becoming obvious.

The aggressiveness of the holiness evangelists, Methodist and otherwise; their disregard for the "National's" model of etiquette and sensitivity to hierarchical concerns; and the revivalist enthusiasm and apparent behavioral phariseism of the holiness advocates made for often chilly receptions in their own local congregations. Moreover, it created a sort of homelessness for those who now sought congregational affiliation in consequence of having been converted or sanctified wholly in a holiness meeting. The "National" itself faced accusations of temporizing. It seemed to many holiness people, Methodist and otherwise, that episcopal Methodism had given itself over to the quest for social status and acceptability. Such were the makings of the "church question."

By the late 1870s the "church question" had taken firm root: should the holiness people create their own denomination(s)? Sociological factors, such as social location, did and do play some role in the way in which holiness people have formed responses to the "church question," although it may be argued that doctrine and piety have been a more basic element.

The Church of the Nazarene arose as one of several responses, a later one, to that question, and it was a more pervasively urban, middle-class response than some others. Its original leadership generally retained closer relationships to the "National," and to Methodism, than did the leadership of the various regional holiness associations. Some hoped (a few feared), in fact, that the Church of the Nazarene would serve to gather most of the holiness "forces" in the United States and become the principal expression of Wesleyan revivalist perfectionism.

Phineas F. Bresee (1838–1915), a distinguished ME pastor and presiding elder in Iowa and Southern California, and a member of the "National," along with Joseph P. Widney (1841–1938), prominent educator, ME lay preacher, and first president of the University of Southern California, established the First Church of the Nazarene, Los Angeles, California, in mid-October, 1895. Widney gave the congregation its name. (In 1898 he returned to Methodism and then moved into theosophy.)

From its beginnings this congregation sought to propagate holiness doctrine and experience and to relieve the socially distressed in central Los Angeles, but Bresee clearly envisioned a denomination from the very first. By 1905 there were twenty-six Nazarene congregations, among them ten in southern California, five in Washington and Idaho, and five in Illinois.

The denomination that emerged even by 1915 is the product of a long series of mergers and aggressive evangelism, with some of the merging partners having longer histories than that of Bresee's congregation, but it was Bresee's active commitment to his vision and his unique capacity for attracting and uniting people that were the principal forces facilitating those mergers. The retention of the name of the Los Angeles organization as the denominational name reflects the depth of Bresee's influence and the long-held prominence of that first Nazarene congregation.

The first merger occurred in 1907, creating the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. The Nazarenes' partner in this union was the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America, itself the project of mergers in New York state and New England (see PENTECOSTALISM). Its oldest congregation had formed in 1894, in Providence, Rhode Island. The Association's principal leader was H.F.Reynolds (1854–1938), an ME pastor; however, a number of others—predominantly, but not at all exclusively, disaffected Methodists, clerical and lay—played significant roles in the Association and in the merger.

In 1908, at Pilot Point, Texas, the Holiness Church of Christ, the product of earlier mergers in Oklahoma, Texas, and the old South, and influenced by restorationism and the holiness movements in both the ME and MES churches, united with the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. This group had no central or galvanizing figure such as Bresee or Reynolds; and at the time of the merger, it still had not completely resolved some of its own major internal issues. Nonetheless, many consider the date of this merger, October 12, 1908, to be the founding date for the denomination. The occasion was actually the Second General Assembly of the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene.

With this merger the denomination became nationwide, with more than 10,000 members in 228 congregations. Several of the west coast congregations were predominantly Oriental; at least one on the east coast was Portuguese-speaking; as many as two dozen had African-American members.

J.O.McClurkan (1861–1914), a Cumberland Presbyterian clergyman, had founded the Pentecostal Alliance in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1898. By 1901 it had become the Pentecostal Mission. By 1915, when it merged with the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, it had congregations in all of the larger cities of Tennessee, in Columbia, South Carolina, and in Atlanta, Georgia. This group brought with it strong Cumberland Presbyterian, Christian and Missionary Alliance, and MES influences. Perhaps more important, it brought to the merger strong social-work institutions and missionaries working abroad. Also in 1915 the Pentecostal Church of Scotland, formed in 1909 by four holiness congregations, merged with the Nazarenes. Its principal leader was George Sharpe (1865–1948), former pastor of the Parkhead (Congregational) Church in Glasgow. This body, too, carried on a strong program of social service and had sent missionaries to Africa before merger with the Nazarenes.

Each of the groups in this string of mergers brought to the union at least a school for the education of the ministry, if not a nascent liberal arts institution. Each merging group also brought missions enterprises. As early as 1908 the Nazarenes had congregations in Mexico, the Cape Verde Islands, INDIA, JAPAN, and southern Africa. They only slowly accepted the notion of indigenized administrative leadership, but from their earliest days, they had developed indigenous preachers and teachers. "National workers (or preachers)," as they were called, outnumbered missionaries five to one by the early 1930s.

Modern American Pentecostalism made an exponential leap into public awareness with the well-publicized Azusa Street (Los Angeles) Revival in 1901. Its roots lay in much the same soil that had produced the Holiness Movement three decades earlier. In fact, on into the 1910s, many thought the two movements to be but two styles of the Holiness Movement. Adherents of one freely mingled in revival services, if not in congregations, with adherents of the other. Their primary contention had to do with whether glossalalia (usually called “tongues”) was the necessary evidence of entire sanctification. By the mid-1910s, however, non- and anti-Wesleyan factions had arisen in Pentecostalism, and a strong antiglossalalic faction had arisen among the holiness people. In 1919 the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene dropped the adjective “Pentecostal” from its name and the names of a number of its academic institutions. It was now, simply, the Church of the Nazarene, and it generally opposed the idea that “tongues” was a contemporary gift of the Spirit.

Still, the process of merging continued. The Laymen’s Holiness Association in the Dakotas and Minnesota, led by J.G.Morrison (1871–1939), an ME clergyman, joined the Church of the Nazarene in 1922. The Association was predominantly ME, but it included significant numbers of adherents to the Evangelical Association, a group tracing its origins to the work of Jacob Albright (1759–1808), a Lutheran-become-Methodist in Pennsylvania.

The 1950s brought both gain and loss by way of merger and secession. Four small holiness denominations joined the Church of the Nazarene. In the early 1950s the Hepzibah Faith Missionary Association, founded in 1893 and centered in Tabor, Iowa, joined the Nazarenes, bringing with it missionary work in six countries. In 1952 the International Holiness Mission, founded as the Holiness Mission, in the Clapham area in London, in 1907, brought into the Church of the Nazarene a strong commitment to social work and a very active missionary presence in sub-Saharan Africa, and about two dozen congregations across England. Three years later, the Calvary Holiness Church, formed in 1934 by itinerant evangelists in the International Holiness Mission, joined the Nazarenes as well, nearly doubling the Nazarene constituency in ENGLAND and WALES. In 1958 the five congregations of the Gospel Workers Church of Canada, a denomination founded in 1918, with its work concentrated in Ontario, merged with the Nazarenes.

Other mergers have occurred since the 1950s, the largest being that of 1988, with a Wesleyan/Holiness group in NIGERIA already calling itself the Church of the Nazarene. This merger brought thirty-nine congregations and 6,500 members with it.

A secession in the mid-1910s, rooted in both doctrine and polity but also entangled in personalities, almost destroyed the denomination. The doctrine in question was premillennialism; the political issue was the authority of the district superintendency over a local congregation. Many of the dissidents eventually joined another holiness body. The Nazarenes continued to refuse official endorsement to any particular form of millennialism and to uphold a strong superintendency (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM).

The secessions of the 1950s and 1960s generally arose from the conviction that the denomination had lost much of its evangelistic fervor and was surrendering to American popular culture. The specific points of critique, which were akin to HOLINESS MOVEMENT critiques of episcopal Methodism eighty years earlier, were the failure of the Nazarene General Assemblies of 1952 and 1956 to condemn television and the critics' perceptions that Nazarenes had become too ready to accept contemporary styles of dress, cosmetics, and jewelry; and had developed a tendency to rely on administrative structures and programs at the cost of spiritual dependency on God. None of the dissident groups departed with more than 500 members, although their exodus removed certain concerns for piety at a time when the denomination was indeed concerned with gaining social acceptability. Perhaps most significant was the formation of the Bible Missionary Union in 1956, which in 1957 became the Bible Missionary Church. The most recent of significant secessions was that of the Church of the Bible Covenant in 1967. Its rationale for secession paralleled that of the Bible Missionary Church.

From its beginning, whether 1908, 1907, or 1895, the Church of the Nazarene has understood its principal mission to be the propagation of the doctrine and experience of entire sanctification, or holiness, or Christian perfection. To engage in this mission, Nazarenes have generally developed a strong set of common mores and pieties, such as commitment to regular attendance at worship, tithing, teetotalism, and to their regional educational institutions; and heavy giving to world mission and compassionate causes. They have also usually avoided debates over the nature of biblical inspiration, baptism, millennialism, divine healing, and forms of worship, among other things. However, since the late 1970s, emphasis on following the sociological principles developed by the Church Growth Movement, coupled with a decreasing emphasis on the mores and pieties noted earlier, has tended to dull the sharp edge of holiness evangelism in favor of a socially more acceptable, less doctrinaire evangelicalism.

See also Evangelicalism; Wesley, Charles

References and Further Reading

- Jones, Charles Edwin. Perfectionist Persuasion: The Holiness Movement and American Methodism, 1867–1936. ATR Monograph Series, no. 5. Methuen, NJ: Scarecrow Press, 1974.
- Purkiser, W.T. Called Unto Holiness. Volume 2: The Second Twenty-Five Years, 1933–1958. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1983.
- Smith, Timothy L. Called Unto Holiness. The Story of the Nazarenes: The Formative Years. Kansas City, MO: Nazarene Publishing House, 1962.

PAUL MERRITT BASSETT

CHURCH WORLD SERVICE

The Protestant, Orthodox, and Anglican traditions that compose the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES support ecumenical humanitarian relief through the Church World Service (CWS). In 1946 the Federal Council of Churches, Foreign Missions Conference, and American Committee of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES established CWS in response to the proliferation of church relief endeavors during the Second World War. The new organization represented ecumenical Protestant efforts to address issues of hunger, reconstruction, and displacement in postwar Europe and Asia.

In its early years CWS worked in the areas of food relief and refugee resettlement. A network of Christians from across the United States formed the Christian Rural Overseas Program (CROP) to donate food and funds for CWS programs. CWS grew into a global organization, creating partnerships with local Christians in Southeast Asia, Latin America, and AFRICA to sponsor development projects. Throughout the 1960s CWS expanded its assistance to refugees through its work in Vietnam, Palestine, and Cuba. In the 1970s CWS created offices to respond to international and domestic disasters.

CWS's work with relief and development reflects a theology of compassionate response to all human need. In the 1970s its leaders added the emphases of global education and public advocacy to the agency's original goals of providing for physical necessity, assisting refugees, and supporting development projects. CWS has also added a focus on the root causes of poverty and powerlessness.

CWS includes thirty-six member denominations. Headquartered in New York City, CWS works with local partners in more than eighty countries. Two thousand local CROP events raise funds for CWS programs each year. In 2002 CWS operated on a budget of $69,000,000.

References and Further Reading

Fey, Harold E. Cooperation in Compassion: The Story of Church World Service. New York: Friendship Press, 1966.

Stenning, Ronald E. Church World Service: Fifty Years of Help and Hope. New York: Friendship Press, 1996.

JENNIFER GRABER

CIRCUIT RIDER

Circuit riders were itinerant ministers who advanced the rapid growth of Wesleyan METHODISM in the UNITED STATES during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries (see ITINERANCY). A system of traveling Methodist preachers was first envisioned by JOHN WESLEY as a means of propagating and servicing Methodist Society class meetings in rural ENGLAND. After the founding of the American Methodist Episcopal Church at the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, in 1784, FRANCIS ASBURY organized American Methodist societies or churches into circuits. Pastoral circuit riders were appointed to travel the circuits on horseback: their responsibilities included visiting each church at least once a year and reporting back to the conference, as well as preaching extemporaneously, holding CAMP MEETINGS, and organizing new Methodist churches along the way. This efficient and effective organizational system contributed to the populist appeal of Methodism and enabled the church to grow with the westward territorial expansion of the United States. Especially in the American South and West and among African Americans, circuit riders were instrumental in building Methodism from fewer than 1,000 adherents in 1770 to more than 250,000 by 1820.

Despite the hardships of wilderness travel and occasional anti-Methodist violence, Asbury himself was a devoted itinerant who traveled more than 270,000 miles during his career. Other well-known circuit riders include PETER CARTWRIGHT (1785–1872), Freeborn Garrettson (1752–1827), and the African American Harry Hosier (1750?–1806).

See also Evangelicalism; Methodism, North America; Methodist Episcopal Church Conference.

References and Further Reading

Andrews, Dee. The Methodists and Revolutionary America, 1760–1800: The Shaping of an Evangelical Culture. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2000.

Wigger, John. Taking Heaven by Storm: Methodism and the Rise of Popular Christianity in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.

JOANNA BROOKS

CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

The modern civil rights movement, usually placed in the middle of the twentieth century from the mid 1950s to the late 1960s, was a coalition of organizations and leaders with the primary goal of eradicating racial injustice from American society. This movement, however, had its roots in nineteenth-century slave rebellions, abolitionists, and a post-CIVIL WAR proactive congress that passed destiny-determining (for African Americans) amendments to our Constitution: the 13th Amendment (1865), which freed the slaves; the 14th Amendment (1868), which guaranteed equal protection, due process, and full citizenship for freed slaves; and the 15th Amendment (1870), which gave them the right to vote.

This modern movement also had significant twentiethcentury roots with the pre-World War I founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and The National Urban League; the Marcus Garvey “Back to Africa Movement” in the 1920s; President Franklin Roosevelt’s 1941 executive order to prohibit discrimination in federal employment (as a result of pressure by A. Philip Randolph of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters—the largest black labor union); the formation of CORE (Congress of Racial Equality) by James Farmer in 1943; President Harry Truman’s executive order to desegregate the armed services in 1948; and Thurgood Marshall’s successful argument of the Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kansas case (1954) before the U.S. Supreme Court to integrate public schools. This landmark case overturned Plessy v. Ferguson (1896), which had declared that separate facilities were equal, a judicial endorsement of Jim Crow laws. In reversing Plessy, Brown stated that “separate was not equal” and made a full circle back to the 14th Amendment on which Marshall’s argument heavily depended.

Combine this rich historical context with the immediate sense of horror in the black community over the murder of teenager Emmett Till in the summer of 1955 in Mississippi and one can see how Rosa Parks, often called the Mother of the Civil Rights Movement, was ready and willing to deny her seat to a white man on December 1, 1955, in Montgomery, Alabama. The courageous act of this black seamstress from Montgomery gave birth to the Montgomery Improvement Association that, in turn, sponsored the year-long Montgomery Bus Boycott (December 1955 to December 1956), which saw, as well, the emergence of a new black leader, Dr. MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. For all intents and purposes, that year ignited the new civil rights movement and became a turning point in American history.

Soon after the success of this boycott, in 1957, several civil rights leaders including King, Ralph Abernathy, Bayard Rustin, Ella Baker, Harris and Clare Wofford, and Stanley Levison formed the Southern Negro Conference on Transportation and Nonviolent Integration with the primary purpose of integrating buses. The name was soon changed to Southern Negro Leaders Conference and, to be as clear as possible about its source and expanding mission, it received its final designation as Southern Christian Leadership Conference—the SCLC became the virtual center of the movement, and its first president, Dr. King, was the heart of that center. Upon King's death, the mantle of leadership was passed to Abernathy, King's close friend and associate. After a decade with Abernathy at the head, SCLC became a weaker organization and lost its effective voice. In 1977 Joseph Lowery, a Methodist, took the reins and for the next twenty years returned the SCLC to its original vibrant witness for civil rights. Nonetheless, every preceding civil rights group would join with SCLC in all the major campaigns (from Birmingham to Selma to Memphis to the Poor Peoples Campaign). Other groups and leaders spawned by SCLC would, in one form or another, take their cue from SCLC.

The modern civil rights movement, in its several manifestations, wanted social justice and equality for America—that is, political, social, and economic freedom. Each organization would contribute its unique emphasis to achieve these goals and each director would share his or her own gifts of leadership. Their protests were directed mainly at the deep South, but the consequences reverberated throughout the country.

One way to view the accomplishments of the civil rights movement is to survey the work done by the various organizations and their leaders and suggest how their specific gifts contributed to the overall success of what the movement achieved. These goals were achieved by different methods, but always nonviolently.

1. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) was founded in 1909 by an interracial group, which included W.E.B. Dubois, to advance the struggle for civil and political liberty. It is the oldest, most enduring civil rights organization and is always there, directly or indirectly, when an advance is made for minorities. Its Legal Defense and Education Fund with lawyers trained in civil and constitutional law has served the African American constituency well for almost a century. The high water mark of their history of litigation on behalf of minorities was the Brown decision in 1954. The NAACP supported every campaign for social justice before, during, and after the 1950s and 1960s, with Roy Wilkins as president. Their members were critical to the success of the African American cause, including for example, Rosa Parks, Medgar Evers, and the college students who sat in at the Woolworth lunch counter in Greensboro, North Carolina, in 1960. It is active today under the leadership of Kweisi Mfume (who became president in 1996), with many branches in small communities throughout the United States.

2. The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) was founded in 1942 by James Farmer in Chicago. It was a nonviolent direct action group that organized demonstrations and educated volunteers in various forms of civil disobedience. This activist stance found them in the famous Freedom Rides that tested interstate commerce public transportation in the early 1960s, the March on Washington in 1963, in all the major campaigns, especially the one in Birmingham in 1963. When Farmer left the directorship in 1966, Floyd McKissick replaced him and turned CORE into a more segregated, militant advocacy group for black people with his championing of Black Power. When Roy Innis became head in 1988 he further moved CORE toward a conservative path, becoming critical of traditional civil rights groups and affirmative action.
3. The National Urban League was formed in 1911, dedicated to caring for the increasing number of blacks migrating to northern cities. The League was instrumental in helping new, often low-income city dwellers find employment in an industrial setting, rent and buy houses, and understand real estate terminology. The League provided financial aid and assistance with child care, and interpreted the rights and responsibilities of home ownership—in short, prepared the urban poor to live selfconfidently and with as much economic wellbeing as possible in cities. Edmund Haynes was the first director of this necessary community service agency; Whitney Young was its successful director during the civil rights era and worked closely with Martin King and SCLC campaigns.
4. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) grew out of the student sit-ins in Greensboro, North Carolina, and Nashville, Tennessee, in February of 1960. Ella Baker, a Shaw University graduate, community organizer, trusted advisor, and a progressive in social and political affairs, was a key figure in initiating this student-operated arm of the movement. She wanted to create a network of communication for all students throughout the South to avoid duplication of their effort and to keep the students' esprit de corps alive.

By the end of February 1960 it was an active group with a membership from which would come some of the most well-known leaders the movement was to produce. They were “the children” made famous by David Halberstram in a well-known book by that name. The early leaders were James Lawson, a Vanderbilt seminary student and Gandhian pacifist (see PACIFISM), Diane Nash, a Fisk University student from Chicago who became a civil rights activist and educator; and John Lewis, an American Baptist seminary student who was involved in the Selma campaign and became a Georgia congressman. Membership in the early years of SNCC also included Bernard LaFayette, Marion Barry, Stokely Carmichael, Julian Bond, and Robert Moses, among others—all of whom have become national figures. SNCC saw itself as a second generation, a more impatient and aggressive organization than the traditional civil rights groups. It was difficult for them to wait for the Urban League's social service, SCLC's well-thought-out campaign strategy, and the NAACP's lengthy court battles. SNCC's voter registration drives (the trio of Schwerner, Chaney, and Goodman were killed in Mississippi in 1964 working for SNCC), their continual sit-ins and other acts of civil disobedience kept the fire of the movement burning in between the major and nationally televised campaigns. Nevertheless, SNCC supported those more publicized crusades as well.

In the mid-1960s, noticing that young black men were disproportionately drafted and subject to a higher percentage of casualties from the Vietnam war, SNCC issued an articulate and passionate antiwar position paper, asking, "Where is the draft for freedom fighters in the USA?" They combined the civil rights movement and the antiwar movement with much the same rationale King used later in his infamous 1967 antiwar sermon: "I've been around segregation too long now to segregate my moral concerns."

The impact of SNCC is largely overlooked, but the civil rights movement would never have been as successful without the energy and vision of the many youth who made their distinctive contribution to help blacks achieve self-determination.

5. The Council of Federated Organizations (COFO) was founded in 1962 as a coordinating agency for the several civil rights groups working in Mississippi. Its most significant leader, Robert Moses, had come to Mississippi soon after receiving a master's degree in philosophy to work with SNCC's voter registration drives. Its main contribution was the formation of the Freedom Summer of 1964 in Mississippi. That summer's achievements were many, despite overwhelming local odds. Some of the results were black voter registration drives, the organization of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party with Fannie Lou Hamer as its delegate to the 1964 convention, and the providing of places ("freedom schools") for black children to learn basic educational skills and to aid adult blacks with legal, medical, and work needs.

The most disturbing fissure in the movement came as a result of the growing impatience of young blacks with the civil rights' establishment and the perceived undue influence and co-opting of the movement by "privileged" black leaders and affluent white liberals. The turning point came in Greenwood, Mississippi, on June 16, 1966, when SNCC member Stokely Carmichael, standing on a flatbed truck, began to shout "We want black power!" This cry for dignity and respect in the name of black people's humanity and for black political and economic power made an indelible imprint on the movement, so much so that Martin King devoted a whole chapter to "black power" in his book Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community? King's dialectical understanding of this new tone was instrumental in the eventual incorporation of its more positive aspects into the larger movement.

Jesse Jackson, one of the many young black clergy supporters of King, became the most nationally famous alumnus of the movement. He ran for president of the UNITED STATES in 1984 and 1988 and is the founder and president of Rainbow/Push, a Chicagobased organization currently active in advocating for minority contractors and business people.

The civil rights movement was an extension of the black, mostly Baptist, church. It could not have been sustained without its energy and leadership. The introduction of "Christian" in the final name of SCLC was an intentional reminder that it was anchored in the tradition of the black church. Oppressed people tend to see religion, as indeed Israel's prophets did, as a praxis—the unity of faith and action, prayer and politics. So it was natural for Martin King to call the work for justice of the civil rights coalition "a spiritual movement," or for Joseph Lowery to say "if the earth is the Lord's, it includes economic and political aspects as well as spiritual aspects.” The roll call of movement leaders consists primarily of young black clergy or those whose primary influence was from the church, for example, James Lawson, Bernard LaFayette, Fred Shuttlesworth, Wyatt Tee Walker, John Lewis, Ralph Abernathy, Julian Bond, Floyd McKissick, and others.

The black church also produced a large and significant band of women who played a central, indispensable role in the movement. We have mentioned Rosa Parks, Diane Nash, Ella Baker, and Fannie Lou Hamer. There were many others. Dorothy Cotton was cofounder of SCLC and its education director for twelve years; Septima Clark was very involved in the network of Citizenship Schools and an activist who exposed the rather pervasive sexism in the movement. SNCC was heavily dependent on women’s leadership, especially in the aforementioned Citizenship Schools and voter registration drives. The most famous are Gloria Richardson Dandridge, Ruby Smith, Colia LaFayette, Ruth Howard Chambers, Eleanor Holmes Norton, Ruth Harris, Bernice Johnson Reagon, and Ethel Minor. Two SNCC workers, Casey Hayden and Mary King, following the lead of Septima Clark, wrote a revealing statement about gender discrimination in the movement that has been considered one of the founding documents of the feminist movement.

These leaders represent the best of what PAUL TILLICH called an essential religious impulse—the Protestant (Prophetic) Principle. This is the necessity to call into question, to say a Divine “no,” to all attempts at absolutizing historical, finite, relative authorities, for example, race, patriarchy, class, war, wealth, and other forms of entrenched power and privilege. Although the movement included Jewish, Roman Catholic, and other ecumenical support, those young clergy were embodying “pro-testare,” their unmediated Protestant vocation to speak truth to power on behalf of God, to testify for, to witness to justice and peace.

All these extraordinary and often very ordinary people succeeded in achieving the original goals of the movement and advancing the cause of minority populations. Their work in the movement helped realize a more politically just and economically equitable society. Some concrete examples include: federal legislation and Supreme Court decisions on behalf of civil rights, the large number of current elected black officials, a much larger black middle class, universal suffrage, and a more fully integrated society. However, in the interest of full intellectual disclosure and honesty, Martin Luther King Jr., the unifying, if not mythical, center of the movement would say, “We still have a long way to go.”

See also Ecumenism; Slavery; Slavery, Abolition of; Womanist Theology

References and Further Reading

- Branch, Taylor. Parting the Waters: America in the King Years, 1954–63. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1988.
- . Pillar of Fire: America in the King Years, 1963–65. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1998.
- Carson, Clayborne. Martin Luther King, Jr., Papers Project. www.stanford.edu/group/king.
- Fairclough, Adam. To Redeem the Soul of America: The Southern Leadership Conference and Martin Luther King, Jr. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1987.

Garrow, David. Bearing the Cross: Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. New York: William Morrow and Co., 1986.

———. Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Civil Rights Movement. 18 vols. New York: Carlson Publishing, 1989.

Halberstam, David. The Children. New York: Random House, 1998.

IRA G.ZEPP JR.

CIVIL WAR, ENGLAND

During the 1640s ENGLAND was wracked by Civil War. The conflict had a number of causes, of which religion was one of the most important. Many Puritans (see PURITANISM) believed that the church, led by King Charles I and WILLIAM LAUD, the archbishop of Canterbury, had adopted objectionable popish and superstitious practices and beliefs, and they were willing to fight to preserve Protestantism as they understood it. After six years of fighting, with large armies on both sides, the royalist Anglicans were defeated by the parliamentary Puritans, who insisted on the execution of the king and archbishop. During the Interregnum (1649–1660) England was governed without a king, first by parliament and then by the Lord Protector OLIVER CROMWELL. After Cromwell's death the monarchy and state church were restored in 1660, much as they had been before the conflict.

The hostilities can be separated into the First Civil War (1642–1646), the Second Civil War (1647–1648) and the Third Civil War (1649–1651). Some writers have used other terms to refer to these disruptions. Edward Hyde, earl of Clarendon, called it the Great Rebellion in his history written during the seventeenth century itself, whereas the twentieth-century historian Christopher Hill preferred to term it the Puritan Revolution.

Causes and Historiography

Historians have argued about the causes of the English Civil War ever since its outbreak and are not likely ever to reach agreement. Their views are to some extent a reflection of their own times—it is often said that each age rewrites the past according to its own interests, and the generalization is particularly apt with reference to the great conflict of the seventeenth century.

During the period itself the war was widely viewed as a religious conflict led by those who opposed the increasingly high-church policies of King Charles and Archbishop Laud. These included greater emphasis on the Eucharist, more elaborate ceremonial, VESTMENTS, and music, and railed altars. The movement is often referred to as ARMINIANISM, although the belief in free will, which characterized the views of Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius himself, was not an important aspect of it. Both the Independents or Congregationalists (see CONGREGATIONALISM), who opposed a state church altogether, and the Presbyterians (see PRESBYTERIANISM), who favored a state church but one without bishops, joined in opposing the established CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Oliver Cromwell once said that although he did not originally regard religion as the principal issue in the war, he was driven to that opinion as the hostilities progressed.

During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the war was generally regarded as a protest against Charles I's arbitrary Personal Rule without parliament (1629–1640). The popular Whig interpretation of history looked on earlier events in England as leading inevitably to the ideal form of representative government and liberal democracy that reached its peak during the reign of Queen Victoria. The Civil War, then, was a necessary stage in reducing the power of the monarch, enhancing the role of parliament, and making the case for broader representation of the people in government. The brief account of the war that prefaces Thomas Babington Macaulay's famous History of England (1848) is one example of such an interpretation. Another can be found, as late as 1904, in England under the Stuarts by his great-nephew George Macaulay Trevelyan.

Trevelyan himself helped initiate the study of social history, and a number of twentieth-century writers have attempted to analyze the war as an example of social conflict. Because seventeenth-century England was not yet divided into social classes, at least in the sense that the Marxists used the terminology, the war could not satisfactorily be viewed as a class conflict, although more than one Russian historian attempted to do so and such an explanation could still be encountered in CHINA in the 1980s. However, more acute historians, among them Christopher Hill, were able to discern more subtle social divisions, with the "godly" and "industrious sort" asserting their rights in opposition to the entrenched privilege of monarchy and nobility. Lawrence Stone, approaching the matter from a different angle, chronicled a "crisis of confidence" in the aristocracy and a loss of faith in their leadership.

A number of mid-twentieth-century writers saw the war in terms of regional divisions, sometimes arising from local conflicts between leading families. John Morrill held this view when he published his study of Cheshire in 1974 and his more general Revolt of the Provinces in 1976, but his more recent work emphasizes religious considerations and can be thought of as completing a circular development by reverting to opinions like those of Cromwell and the Puritans or, on the other hand, those Anglicans who supported king and church. Stanford Lehmborg's study of Cathedrals under Siege (1996) emphasizes the fact that those who cherished the established church, with its beautiful buildings and liturgies, fought to preserve the monarchy as well.

The most important recent discussions of the issue have come from the pen of Conrad Russell. Both his brief account The Causes of the English Civil War and his massive narrative The Fall of the British Monarchies stress the fact that the Civil War was not a single event and thus had no single cause. At one point Russell separates the complex into seven specific problems: the Bishops' Wars between England and SCOTLAND; England's defeat in that conflict; Charles' inability to secure a settlement with Scotland; his failure to dissolve or prorogue the Long Parliament; his subjects' choice of sides; the failure to negotiate; and the matter of "the king's diminished majesty." Russell shows the ways in which Charles's own personality contributed to the conflict. More important, he concludes that there were three long-term causes. The first, the problem of multiple kingdoms, arose from the fact, hitherto insufficiently appreciated, that Charles was king of Scotland and IRELAND as well as England; he faced different difficulties in each of these realms and had insufficient understanding of the convictions of his Scottish and Irish subjects. The second cause, the problem of religious division, affected the several realms in differing ways. The Scots Covenanters rebelled against the king's attempt to make the church in Scotland more like the Church of England and to increase the power of bishops. The Irish inevitably clung to Catholicism, whereas in England the gulf between Puritans and Arminians deepened during the years of Personal Rule. Finally, old financial and political systems broke down in the face of inflation and the rising costs of warfare. The conjunction of these problems in all three realms was no doubt partly fortuitous, but the long-term causes were sufficiently persistent that they were bound to result in an eventual conflict.

A variety of further views have been expressed. The distinguished narrative historian C.V. Wedgwood renounced any attempt to tease out general causes, believing that only particular events and personalities can explain the flow of history. Sir Geoffrey Elton used to argue that the war should not have occurred because none of the causes propounded by others was an adequate explanation. If pressed to account for the fact that it did take place he sometimes took refuge in blaming the personal ineptness of the king and his advisors.

If a general explanation or synthesis is ever achieved it is likely to admit the partial validity of all the causes identified in the past. A theory of multiple, rather than unitary, causation would acknowledge that the English Civil Wars were a series of conflicts involving three realms and motivated by differences of opinion about religion, political and constitutional issues, and social and economic conditions, with due allowance for the role of regional divisions and personalities. Religious disagreements, however, may emerge as the irreconcilable underlying issue.

Events

The outbreak of Civil War in England was prefaced by the Bishops' Wars in Scotland, a protest against Charles I's desire to make the Scottish kirk more like the Church of England. The necessity of raising money for a Scottish war led to the summoning of the Long Parliament, which was not officially dissolved until 1660. Charles's attempt to arrest the five members of the House of Commons whom he blamed for opposition to his policies (January 1642) probably spelled the end of any possibility of compromise between the king and parliament. Throughout the spring both sides raised armies. Charles's order to hoist the battle standard at Nottingham on August 22 was the sign that hostilities had commenced.

The royalists, often called Cavaliers, enjoyed initial advantages and might have won the war had it lasted only a year or two. They had a single army, already well organized and disciplined, and an experienced cavalry force; the role of the king as commander-in-chief ensured a unified chain of command. Charles's nephew Prince Rupert, who had come to England after growing up in the midst of the Thirty Years' War on the Continent, also proved himself an excellent military leader. The king's opponents suffered from divisions. Leadership was theoretically provided by a committee of parliament. After parliament and the Scots joined in the Solemn League and Covenant (1643) a Committee of Both Kingdoms was placed in charge; it was an inherently inefficient arrangement. In addition, several separate armies fought for parliament, and their leaders often failed to communicate or cooperate with each other. Robert Devereux, third earl of Essex, was initially appointed the parliamentary general and instructed to raise a force of 20,000 foot soldiers and 5,000 horse soldiers. The most important of the other parliamentary armies was the so-called Ironsides of the Eastern Association, commanded by the earl of Manchester with Oliver Cromwell as his aide. More than the other contingents, this army was dominated by those who supported Independency in religion and the abolition of the state church. Parliament's chances of victory were enhanced by the Solemn League and Covenant, which brought the Scottish army into the field alongside the English "Roundheads" and by the creation of a single New Model Army in 1645. Parliament eventually fielded a larger army than that of the king, and as its leaders, especially Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell, acquired experience they proved themselves equal or superior to Charles's officers. The religious zeal of many of the fighting men finally tipped the scales in favor of the king's opponents.

The chief engagements of the First Civil War were the battle of Edgehill (October 1642), a draw or perhaps a royalist victory presenting opportunities that Charles failed to seize; parliament's success in turning back the king's soldiers marching on London at Turnham Green (November 1642); battles at Newbury in Berkshire (September 1643 and October 1644), both indecisive but favoring the parliamentarians; Marston Moor, near York, where the royalists were routed and lost control of northern England (July 1644); Lostwithiel in Cornwall, where the parliamentary infantry led by the earl of Essex into an untenable position were forced to surrender to the king's men (September 1644); and Naseby, near Northampton, a great triumph for the New Model Army and the determining disaster for the royalists (June 14, 1645). In June 1646 the king's headquarters at Oxford surrendered. Charles had already slipped away incognito; he gave himself up to the Scottish forces at Newcastle, thinking that they would treat him better than his English foes.

The First Civil War was thus won by a coalition including parliament, the army (theoretically under the control of parliament but now often acting independently), and the Scots. Each of these groups attempted to negotiate a settlement that would end the hostilities. Parliament's Propositions of Newcastle were not accepted by the king, nor were the army's Heads of the Proposals, although in December 1647 Charles and a group of Scottish leaders did enter into an agreement called the Engagement. In it the Scots committed themselves to reopen the war, now fighting for the king rather than against him, on condition that he establish the Presbyterian church in both Scotland and England, at least for a trial period, and extirpate Independency in religion.

The only significant battle of the Second Civil War was fought at Preston in Lancashire in August 1648. Here Oliver Cromwell, with only 9,000 men, triumphed over a Scottish army more than twice as large. Cromwell regarded this victory as a sign of God's providence and favor toward his cause.

After the king's second defeat the army demanded his execution. When parliament was reluctant to take action against him a group of soldiers led by Colonel Pride blocked the doors of the parliament house, excluding those who opposed the army's demands. This came to be known as Pride's Purge of the Commons (December 1648). The House of Lords had already been abolished on the grounds that it was not elected and thus unrepresentative. The so-called Rump Parliament that remained in session established an irregular commission to try the king, the charge being that he had committed treason by making war on his subjects. A small group of men, known as the Regicides because they were responsible for killing the king, found him guilty and signed his death warrant. He was beheaded outside the Banqueting House in Whitehall on January 30, 1649. The date is still commemorated by those who regard Charles as a martyr for the sake of the state church.

The Scots soon proclaimed his son Charles II as their new king. Parliament then resolved to force Scotland into compliance with its orders. In what is sometimes known as the Third Civil War an English army was sent to Scotland. Commanded by Cromwell, this force crossed the border in July 1650 and routed the Scottish army at Dunbar on September 3. The young Charles, who had gone to Scotland and had been crowned by the Scots, was able to make his way across the border into northeastern England, where he thought he had many friends, although he too was defeated at Worcester on September 2, 1651, a year to the day after Dunbar. When he succeeded in fleeing to FRANCE the Civil Wars were finally at an end.

After the execution of Charles I England embarked on the eleven-year Interregnum, the only period in its history when there was no monarch. Parliament attempted to run the government as a Commonwealth from 1649 to 1653. When it became evident that a single leader was needed, Oliver Cromwell became Lord Protector. The Protectorate lasted from 1653 until Cromwell's death in 1658. His son Richard Cromwell succeeded him but soon resigned, leaving the country in a state of virtual anarchy during 1659. Finally the Long Parliament was reassembled and offered the throne to Charles II. His return to England in 1660 brought about the Restoration of both the monarchy and the state church.

References and Further Reading

- Ashton, Robert. Counter Revolution: The Second Civil War and its Origins. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1994.
- Burne, Alfred H., and Peter Young. The Great Civil War. London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1959.
- Fissel, Mark Charles. The Bishops' Wars: Charles I's Campaign against Scotland, 1638–1640. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994.
- Hibbert, Christopher. Cavaliers and Roundheads. London: HarperCollins, 1993.
- Morrill, John. The Nature of the English Revolution. London and New York: Longman, 1993.
- Russell, Conrad. The Causes of the English Civil War. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990.
- . The Fall of the British Monarchies. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991.
- Stone, Lawrence. The Causes of the English Revolution. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1993.
- Wedgwood, C.V. The King's War. London: Collins, 1958.

STANFORD LEHMBERG

CIVIL WAR, UNITED STATES

By virtually any historical account, the Civil War is the defining event in American history. Statistics often seem cold and abstract, but numbers count and the Civil War brings some impressive statistics that were sufficiently horrendous to have involved virtually every living American, North and South.

Although Civil War enlistments and casualties cannot be known exactly, there are several reliable approximations. In compiling his indispensable chronology of the Civil War, E.B. Long estimates that total enlistments in the Federal forces numbered 2,778,304, including about 189,000 African Americans, in a population of 18,810,123. Confederate forces numbered 1,400,000 in a white population of 6,500,000. In addition there were slightly less than four million slaves. Of these soldiers 623,026 died and 471,427 were wounded, for a total casualty count of 1,094,453. In breaking the numbers down by each "nation," Federal army deaths totaled 360,222 of which 110,100 were killed in battle and 224,580 of disease in camp. Confederate deaths totaled 94,000 killed in battle and 164,000 from disease for a total of 258,000 dead. These casualty totals combined, in a total population of only thirty million, almost equal losses from all other American wars (see WAR). If translated into an equal proportion of the current U.S. population, the casualty rate would total ten million American soldiers and countless civilians. From another perspective, there were more killed in three days at Gettysburg (60,000) than in all eight years of the Revolution or War in Vietnam. Without exaggeration one can say that in terms of the kill ratios the Civil War was America's most appalling act of human destruction.

For later professional historians and popular history writers alike, the Civil War is a cottage industry that probably rivals all other American history combined in output, sales, and general interest. There have been over 100,000 books, articles, and dissertations written by professional scholars together with easily that number in the popular fiction and nonfiction markets. There are Civil War Roundtables and reenactments that draw thousands. America's best-selling novel and movie remains Gone With the Wind, and television documentaries abound.

Yet in all of this ferment and unending fascination there are some remarkable gaps and silences. Most notably there is no comprehensive history of Protestantism's role in the Civil War. A moment's reflection suggests that the unwritten religious history of the Civil War is not because religion was unimportant. To the contrary, Christianity was the most powerful cultural system in the antebellum North and South, and the great majority of these Christians were evangelical Protestants. On the eve of the Civil War the country had one church for every 580 people and could seat three-fifths of the population at one time. As C.C. Goen observed, "no other organization in the country was in closer direct touch with more people." Of these, the vast majority were evangelical Protestants, in particular BAPTISTS and Methodists and, as Goen shows, the bitter divisions of Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist churches over SLAVERY and secession prefigured the political divisions to follow. To a significant extent then, we can say that the Civil War represented a Protestant bloodletting.

The reason there is such silence on Protestantism's role in the Civil War is largely because of the almost complete co-option of the churches by politicians on both sides of the conflict. Instead of offering a prophetic voice independent of their "nations"—one that could be framed in a compelling narrative—Protestant churchmen were awash in a sea of patriotism and, if anything, accelerated the blood lust by proclaiming God's blessing on the respective "cause" of North and South.

When news of the firing on Fort Sumter reached Northern and Southern audiences, all quibbles disappeared and in both nations, patriotism displaced religious and partisan loyalties. As flags flew everywhere and even became the subject of sermons, the center of Northern and Southern religiosity shifted decisively toward their nations. Individual sectarian life continued alongside an undoubted personal piety, but now it was a Union piety or a Confederate piety that transcended any common personal faith the two nations might share. The cultural captivity of churchmen and churches explains why the greatest sermon produced in the Civil War was delivered by a politician, not a minister, and in far fewer words than most ministers then preferred. President ABRAHAM LINCOLN was not only America's greatest politician, he was its greatest preacher, and in the Gettysburg Address and Second Inaugural, he offered a gospel for the republic that has proved enduring.

Of course Protestants continued to preach sermons and commented on the war (see PREACHING). The favored time for religious commentary was the "Thanksgiving" and "Fast" Days proclaimed by Congress and the executive in both North and South. In all Lincoln would proclaim three national fasts throughout the war while, in the same period, Jefferson Davis would proclaim ten. In addition there were multiple state and local fasts in the Confederacy, and even more important, ongoing fasts and REVIVALS in the Confederate army.

In looking at the content of the political sermons preached on these occasions (and expanded on in the religious press), what is most striking is the extent to which both present their cause as a "sacred cause" and a "just war." Both would employ interchangeable language to invoke the Puritan categories of "COVENANT," "divine protection," and "New Israel," and both would portray themselves as a "redeemer nation."

At the outset of war leaders in the Union and Confederacy assumed a quick and bloodless victory filled with heroism and martial valor. One writer for the Richmond Daily Dispatch casually observed that, "The nations most favored by God have been baptized in the crimson lever of battle, and the holiest of saints have not worn the crown until they have borne the cross."

By September 1862, however, it became apparent on both sides that this would be no ordinary baptism in blood. The battlefield at Sharpsburg (Antietam Creek) would put to permanent rest all notions of approving smiles and splendid little wars. On the evening of that warm autumn day, after the fifth Federal drive was repulsed, 26,193 soldiers lay dead, wounded, or missing. The scale was unprecedented, impelled, James McPherson observes, by "a sort of fighting madness...a superadrenalized fury that turned [men] into mindless killing machines heedless of the normal instinct of self-preservation." For the press no less than the pulpit, nothing but religion could justify so demonic a fury. In the following week's letters to the editor, the Richmond Enquirer printed an address to the shell-shocked "soldiers of the Confederate Army" under the pseudonym "Peter the Hermit":

What are we fighting for? You will answer my question by saying, "we fight for the liberties and independence of our country—for the safety of our wives and children—for the inheritance our fathers left us, and the graves where their bones are buried." Noble objects are these.... But, fellow soldiers, I am impressed by the belief that we are battling for a higher and nobler cause than any and all of these combined, and one that can and ought and will bring out the highest energies of our natures. I mean the cross of Christ and the purity of Christianity. (Richmond Enquirer, September 22, 1862)

The notions of “separate spheres” or “the spirituality of the church,” which insisted that ministers not “preach politics,” were reduced to empty rhetoric during the course of the war. In fact the CLERGY followed the politicians’ lead at almost every juncture, leaving transcendent morality at the footstool of a sacralized patriotism. It is true that even more than the politicians, and certainly more than the secular Northern press, the Northern clergy trumpeted the virtues of universal emancipation and the sin of slavery, and on this count deserve praise. Some even went so far as to protest racism in the North as Moses Smith did in a Thanksgiving sermon to his Plainville, Connecticut, Congregational church:

[A]s to the black man, he is as really, and I have sometimes believed more terribly enslaved at the North than at the South. He knows that he is a slave there, and expects a slave’s reward. But here he is tantalized with the name of freedom, but denied its privileges.... Do what he will and be what he will, he is hated everywhere at the North, banished from society, denied often so much as a seat in the cars.... We talk of liberty? Of all galling bondage, this bondage to social feelings, this servitude to caste, this being a “nigger” in society, and “a nigger” at the communion table is probably the most heartless and unrelenting slavery beneath the skies. It may not shackle the body, but it crushes the mind and kills the heart. (Our Nation Not Forsaken, Hartford 1863:10–13)

As heroic as these rare voices were, however, they were not saying anything that the relatively small number of abolitionists were not also saying inside and outside of the church; and they met the same deaf ear (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). As for the conduct of the war and protection of innocents, silence prevailed.

The crusading spirit was not limited to the North. One Confederate chaplain, caught up in his own country’s civil religion, wrote in The [Richmond] Central Presbyterian in December 1862: “we should add to the prayer for peace, let this war continue, if we are not yet so humbled and disciplined by its trials, as to be prepared for those glorious moral and spiritual gifts, which Thou designest it should confer upon us as a people, and upon the Church of Christ in the Confederacy, and upon mankind.”

In Northern churches and denominational publications, patriotism and morbid fascination with destruction often eclipsed serious moral inquiry. In an unprecedented reach, children were not exempted from the blood lust of war. Children were co-opted early on in the war effort and encouraged to wear uniforms and play war games. Parents would have photographs taken of their children with guns and swords. Patriotic songs and “panoramas” brought home the nobility of war to children on a dramatic scale. Awed children learned to revere the war and the warriors of Christ who prosecuted it. There was nothing to learn of right conduct or just cause, let alone acceptable scales of suffering or the protection of innocents. Only a romanticized glory endured. In a column entitled “The children at home,” the New York Evangelist provided a “Chapter about Heroes,” which began with a conversation between two brothers:

“Is it not grand to hear about all these brave men? I am so glad that I live in these war times!” said George. “So am I,” said his brother William. “We did not think that the men who live now-a-days could be such heroes. It seems like reading the histories of old times.” “Don’t you wish, Will,” said George, after a pause, “that we were men and could do such things?” (June 26, 1862, April 3, 1862, Presbyterian Historical Society)

Northern clergy and denominational publications were hardly alone in fueling the blood lust. Stonewall Jackson’s aide-de-camp and chaplain, Robert Dabney, took the occasion of a funeral sermon for a fallen soldier to urge his young hearers to be Christlike in fighting to the end:

Let me exhort the young men of this community to be “followers of him as he also was of Jesus Christ.” And especially would I now commend by his example, the sacred and religious duty of defending the cause for which he died.... Surely [his] very blood should cry out again from the ground, if we permitted the soil which drank the precious libation, to be polluted with the despot’s foot! Before God, I take you to witness this day, that its blood seals upon you the obligation to fill their places in your country’s host, and “play the men for your people and the cities of your God,” to complete the vindication of their rights. (Central Presbyterian, March 12, 1863)

James M. McPherson suggests that the religious intensity for war and unquestioning patriotism may well have succeeded in extending the war for the last—and bloodiest—year.

With war’s end churchmen on both sides of the conflict struggled to find meaning. Divided Protestant churches would not reunite until the twentieth century. “Union” and “Confederate” continued to define their identity more than a common faith. In the South, Protestant churchmen played the lead role in enobling the memory of fallen soldiers and the Confederate cause. The Confederacy would live on in defeat, as Charles Regan Wilson has shown in his book Baptized in Blood, through the “Religion of the Lost Cause.” The vanquished Confederate nation, Wilson observes, “never resurrected, but it survived as a sacred presence, a holy ghost haunting the spirits and actions of post-Civil War Southerners.” Jim Crow segregation and the politics of white supremacy would encapsulate the innermost meaning of that Southern way.

In the North some noble Protestant ministers and educators strove nobly to uplift the freed slaves and the SOCIAL GOSPEL may have been their greatest legacy. For many others, however, war’s victory meant a return to business as usual, that is, the business of a “gospel of wealth.”

All was not gloom though. There was a great Protestant success story coming out of the Civil War and that was to be found in the black church. Here there were no divided denominations, as Protestant African Americans from all regions came together and led the struggle for spiritual and civil equality. All of the major African American denominations (AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION, National Baptist Convention, Colored Methodist Episcopal Church) evidenced growth rates between 40 and 70 percent in the decades between 1865 and 1900. Among Protestants the biggest gainer was the National Baptist Convention, which displaced the Methodists as the largest African American denomination, claiming over 2.2 million communicants in 1900. In monetary terms the African American church was the dominant “industry” in the black community, with combined assets of over $26 million by 1890. The National Baptist Convention was the single largest black organization in the world.

Clearly these are prodigious figures and do not begin to plumb the full measure of African American Protestant achievements. Besides organizing the spiritual life of the community and sustaining material needs through mutual aid societies, the black church would pave the way for African American education and literacy. They would succeed to an astounding degree, lifting literacy rates from at most 5 percent during slavery, to rates as high as 70 percent in some states.

Whether through worship, aid, or education, the African American church proclaimed a message of solidarity and pride that would sustain freedom in their arduous journey from freedom to equality. It is a journey that is still incomplete, and a journey that continues to look to the church and the clergy for leadership and inspiration. Here we see the greatest prophetic legacy of Protestant churches in the Civil War era.

References and Further Reading

- Blight, David W. Frederick Douglass' Civil War: Keeping Faith in Jubilee. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1989.
- Chesebrough, David B., ed. God Ordained This War: Sermons on the Sectional Crisis, 1830–1865. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.
- Faust, Drew Gilpin. The Creation of Confederate Nationalism: Ideology and Identity in the Civil War South. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1988.
- Goen, C.C. Broken Churches, Broken Nation: Denominational Schisms and the Coming of the Civil War. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1985.
- Marten, James. The Children's Civil War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- McPherson, James M. For Cause and Comrades: Why Men Fought in the Civil War. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Miller, Randall M., Harry S. Stout, and Charles Reagan Wilson, eds. Religion and the American Civil War. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Moorhead, James H. American Apocalypse: Yankee Protestants and the Civil War, 1860–1869. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1978.
- Noll, Mark A. America's God, from Jonathan Edwards to Abraham Lincoln. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Shattuck, Gardomer J. A Shield and Hiding Place: The Religious Life of the Civil War Armies. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987.
- White Ronald C. Jr. Lincoln's Greatest Speech: The Second Inaugural. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2002.
- Wills, Garry. Lincoln at Gettysburg. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992.

Wilson, Charles Reagan. Baptized in Blood: The Religion of the Lost Cause, 1865–1920. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1980.

HARRY S. STOUT

CLAPHAM SECT

The Clapham Sect was a loose association of parliamentarians and others concerned with religious, moral, and humanitarian issues in British public life, especially active from about 1790 to 1820. The name was first given pejoratively by the essayist Sydney Smith, who accused them of “patent Christianity.” It was not a sect in any ecclesiastical sense; its members were generally loyal adherents of the established church, of a strongly evangelical persuasion [although one, William Smith (1756–1835), had Unitarian leanings]. The link with Clapham (then a quiet suburb of London) came from several of the group having houses there, or regularly visiting. There was no fixed membership; the group functioned through shared outlook and personal friendship, strengthened in some cases by kinship or marriage relations. It included WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, the best-known evangelical layman of his day and an outstanding parliamentary figure; Henry Thornton (1760–1815), a wealthy philanthropist who financed many of their concerns; Smith, Member of Parliament for Norwich; Thomas Gisborne (1758–1846), moralist and writer; Thomas Babington (1758–1837), Member of Parliament for Leicester; James Stephen (1758–1832); and Zachary Macaulay (1768–1838).

The two last, who had seen Caribbean SLAVERY first hand, were the chief researchers and publicists, and Macaulay edited the Christian Observer, a periodical that normally reflected the Clapham outlook and views. Associated with them in Indian affairs were Charles Grant (1746–1822), a high official of the East India Company, and Lord Teignmouth (1751–1834), who as Sir John Shore had been governor-general in INDIA. GRANVILLE SHARP, a generation older and somewhat different in outlook and churchmanship, shared their concerns about slavery and AFRICA, whereas John Venn (1759–1813), rector of Clapham and secretary of the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, was a friend.

The principal Clapham cause was opposition to slavery (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). From 1791 Wilberforce and his colleagues made almost annual attempts to outlaw the British slave trade by parliamentary legislation, eventually succeeding in 1807. The cruelties of the trade were carefully documented and economic and strategic arguments against slavery used to bolster the moral and theological arguments. The group appealed beyond Parliament to public opinion and in particular mobilized Christian opinion, with skillful use of literature, the press, and public meetings. Evangelicals in particular rallied to the antislavery cause. After the act abolishing the trade, the Clapham group worked to enforce and extend the ban and to seek the end of slavery itself. Wilberforce handed over leadership of this campaign to Thomas Fowell Buxton in 1821; slave emancipation in the British dominions was declared in 1833. Long before this their desire for economic answers to slavery led the Clapham group into projects to develop African agriculture and trade, to participation in the African Institution, and above all to the establishment and early oversight of the colony of SIERRA LEONE. Of all the antislavery forces in Britain, Clapham was probably the most effective.

Their second major concern was India. The goal of the reformers was to end the East India Company's ban on missionaries in the territories it controlled and its obtaining tax revenue from Hindu temple worship; to legislate against cruel and oppressive customs (increasingly documented by missionaries); and to secure explicit acknowledgment of Christianity by the Company, which represented the British administration in India. The renewal of the Company's charter in 1813 gave opportunity for parliamentary debate on these issues, with partial success for the reformers.

Clapham domestic concerns included the provision of schools for the poor, reform of prisons, relief of urban hunger, and action against dueling, the national lottery, and manifestations of vice in general, with vigorous support for Bible, tract, and missionary societies (see BIBLE SOCIETIES, MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). "The Saints," as they were often called, were moral rather than political radicals, contrasting, in Wilberforce's words, "the prevailing religious system of the upper and middle classes of this country with real Christianity." They brought EVANGELICALISM in a disciplined, morally earnest, and socially engaged form into the mainstream of British political, social, and intellectual life, deeply influencing the accepted values of the early Victorian period.

Several of the children of the Clapham group continued the same concerns into the next generation. Other descendants are more noted for their literary activity: Lord Macaulay, Leslie Stephen, Virginia Woolf, and E.M.Forster all came from Clapham families.

References and Further Reading

Anstey, Roger. The Atlantic Slave Trade and British Abolition, 1760–1810. London and Atlantic Heights, NJ: Macmillan, 1975.

Bradley, Ian. The Call to Seriousness. London: Jonathan Cape, 1976.

Embree, A.T. Charles Grant and British Rule in India. London: Allen and Unwin, 1962.

Hennell, M.M. John Venn and the Clapham Sect. London: Lutterworth Press, 1958.

Howse, E.M. Saints in Politics. Toronto, Canada: Toronto University Press, 1952.

Ingham, Kenneth. Reformers in India. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956.

ANDREW F.WALLS

CLERGY

Although charismatic prophets and apostles initially dominated the Christian clergy, by the second century three offices had developed: bishop, presbyter, and deacon. During the third century, the growth of the church and the extent of its charitable activities required the additional offices of the minor clergy. Bishops and presbyters also took on the character of priests and the liturgy became ever more elaborate. The conversion of the Roman emperor Constantine and the adoption of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman Empire by later emperors raised the power and status of the clergy, but also subsumed the church and the clergy into the imperial government. The church developed the complete hierarchical structure that the Catholic Church retains today. The early Middle Ages saw the conversion of most of Europe, but also a decline in the quality of the clergy. The Gregorian Reform beginning in the eleventh century raised the standards, but also claimed for the clergy an elevated status and power. The rise of the universities in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries helped raise the educational level of the clergy during the later Middle Ages. The Protestant Reformers were usually the products of the universities.

The REFORMATION redefined the character and activity of the clergy. Emphasis switched from the sacraments to the preached word, and ministers, preachers, and pastors were deprived of the privileges of the medieval clergy. Despite the “priesthood of all believers,” the clerical position of AUTHORITY was revived, but was based on education, not on sacramental status. More open to the world, the Protestant clergy has contributed significantly to Western culture, but it has also been more vulnerable to changing historical developments.

The First Two Centuries

The first clergy predate the death of Jesus. Jesus personally chose the Twelve (the early church would add “Apostles” after that office developed) as his closest disciples, and as eschatological judges over the twelve tribes of Israel. The need to maintain that number explains the replacement for Judas (Acts 1:20–25). However, no successors were chosen for the Twelve in later less eschatological times. Jesus sent the Twelve to preach and heal the sick during his lifetime, but they had no “apostolic” role immediately after the Resurrection. Instead they remained in Jerusalem, awaiting the return of the Lord. In the 50s, Paul mentions only Peter as the “Apostle” to the Jews, while claiming the apostleship to the Gentiles (Galatians 2:7,8). The Twelve governed the Jerusalem church initially, but Paul later lists only two, Peter and John, along with James, the brother of Jesus, as “pillars” of the church (Galatians 2:9). James played the leading role. Apostles (from Greek apostolos, meaning messenger) were sent by local churches as messengers to carry the Gospel. It was one of Paul’s distinctive claims that he that had been commissioned directly by the risen Lord. However chosen, there were a number of other Apostles, some mentioned by Paul, and the office continued to be exercised at least until the early second century.

In addition to peripatetic apostles, prophets and deacons provided continuous stationary leadership in the earliest decades. Prophets were charismatic figures, and we do not know whether there was any process for recognizing and acknowledging them. DEACONS (servants, ministers), on the other hand, are traditionally associated with the Seven (Acts 6:3–6), although the Seven seem to have had apostolic and prophetic functions as well. The Apostles chose the Seven from a list proposed by the community. They were charged with the daily administrative tasks of the community, especially CHARITY. The Apostles ordained the Seven by the laying on of hands, a rite that remained central to ordination for all clerics throughout the early church. Despite Paul’s preference of CELIBACY for all (I Corinthians 7:25–39), there is no evidence that it was usual for the clergy.

Paul’s letters describe a less structured church with a rich diversity of gifts and offices. Reliance on the direct guidance of the Spirit made a clerical order unnecessary. This allowed for a more egalitarian church order in which women and those of lower social station took prominent roles. Worship was nonhierarchical. Paul mentions no leader for either the LORD’S SUPPER (I Corinthians 11:17–34) or the worship service (I Corinthians 14:26–33). He also mentions no sermon or homily. Presumably, prophetic utterances from the congregation sufficed. However, Paul also reveals an interest in a more ritualized Lord’s Supper, a development that would lead to formal liturgical leadership.

We do not know how this early group of apostleprophet—deacon was replaced with a new one, bishop—presbyter—deacon, by the second century. Presbyters (elders) usually formed a “college” that presided over the community but did not administrate. Their relationship to the episcopacy in the earliest period is still debated. In the New Testament there are combinations of bishop and deacon (Philippians 1:1) or presbyter and deacon (I Timothy 3:8, 4:14, 5:17) or bishop and presbyter (Titus 1:5–7). The office of bishop (overseer) may have developed out of the presbytery as individual presbyters were given administrative responsibility and authority; or the episcopacy and presbyteries may have initially been alternative forms of organization that were combined. In any event, by the second half of the second century the monarchical episcopate presided over the presbytery, supervised the deacons, and ruled over the community. To the present, this remains the clerical structure of the Roman Catholic, Anglican (see ANGLICANISM), and Orthodox Churches (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN).

The bishop, assisted by his presbyters, assumed liturgical leadership, including preaching. Presbyters taught neophytes and prepared candidates for BAPTISM. In the Letter of James (James 5:14–16), the presbyters anoint and pray over the sick. The primary role of deacons was the administration of church wealth and charity, both of which took on enormous proportions with the passage of time. The clergy were usually married. Some individuals may have assumed a celibate life as had Paul, but it was by no means required or even expected. Election of clergy by the community was the norm. With time clerics were increasingly drawn from the economically and socially prominent in the community.

These developments were not unopposed. Some continued the more egalitarian pneumatic practices of the Pauline churches. For them prophecy remained crucial, and women had a public prominence. Celibacy may also have been more common in such groups. The struggle is apparent in the deutero-Pauline letters, which sought to suppress the earlier practices and replace them with the hierarchical and patriarchal bishop or presbyter and deacon model (Titus 1:6–9; I Timothy 3:1–13, 5:17–22). Opposition was marginalized and then hereticized (see HERESY).

Third to Fifth Centuries

The third to fifth centuries were pivotal for the formation of the Christian clergy. The number of Christians grew dramatically despite spasmodic brutal persecutions. Charitable activities and the administration of cemeteries burdened the clergy with greater economic responsibilities. As a result, the clerical hierarchy expanded to include “minor orders,” lesser ministries (e.g., cemetarius, gravedigger) that were finally fixed at four: subdeacon, acolyte, exorcist, and doorkeeper. The “major orders” were increasingly absorbed in church service. In the larger cities and communities their offices became their sole profession and the church provided for their support. The liturgy, increasingly formal and elaborate, achieved written form for the first time. However, throughout the period some clerics remained illiterate. No schools similar to the modern seminaries and divinity schools existed, but learned bishops and presbyters provided training and some measure of education. The catechetical school in Alexandria and Origen’s school in Antioch achieved scholarly distinction, but whether they taught the clergy is not clear. They may have been similar to the pagan philosophical “schools” in which upper-class disciples gathered around famous thinkers. If clergy participated, their education would have been limited to biblical exegesis and theological speculation. There was no “practical” component to train clerics in the LITURGY or PREACHING.

In the liturgy the bishop assumed a sacerdotal role. The originally separate services of the Word (Paul’s worship service) and Lord’s Supper had been combined in the second century and the unified liturgy, the Mass, assumed the character of a sacrifice. Bishops resisted the title of “priest” until the third century because of its association with pagan practice. The Old Testament priesthood, however, provided precedent, and the belief that Christ’s death replaced the Temple sacrifices made the priestly title more acceptable. This was an important step in the sacralization of the clergy, a process that continued in the Middle Ages. The detailed and elaborate instructions for the ordination of clergy in the early liturgies reflect this development well. The creation of a sacred clerical estate, however, took place only after the conversion of the Emperor Constantine and the Christianization of the Roman Empire.

Constantine’s (280–337) Edict of Milan (313) granted toleration only to the church, but Theodosius the Great (347–395) outlawed paganism. JUDAISM was allowed an uncertain toleration. For the rest of the population, Christianity was the sole legal religion. The emperors lavished privilege, wealth, and status on the church and its clergy. Imperial facilities, for example, the imperial post system, were made available. Taxes were reduced or eliminated. The clergy were exempted from the many military and civic duties that burdened the rest of the population. In a rigidly hierarchical society, bishops were accorded the status of high government officials, a fact that was reflected in their official garb. Until this point clergy had had no distinctive clothing. Now, during the liturgy and on important occasions, bishops adopted forms of imperial court costume. Some elements of liturgical VESTMENTS derived from this source remain in use in the modern world. Daily attire would remain indistinguishable, however, from that of the upper classes until the late Middle Ages.

The social promotion of the clergy was part of a larger process that turned the clergy into a body separate from and superior to the LAITY. In imitation of the Roman cursus honorum by which one rose through the ranks to ever higher government office, there were efforts, never completely successful, to require clerics to climb the rungs of the clerical hierarchy. This promoted better-trained clerics, but it reinforced the sense of a closed corporation with its own interests and esprit de corps. The papal decision to impose celibacy upon bishops, presbyters, and deacons had the same effect. Celibacy heightened clerical sacrality required by the priestly character of the bishops and presbyters, but also demanded a visibly higher level of commitment than that found among the laity. Realizing the worldly advantages of Church membership, and the disadvantages of loyalty to the old gods, many converted for worldly reasons. These new Christians lacked the fervor and commitment of their persecuted predecessors. A similar concern with lowered standards led to the development of monasticism.

The learned elite had steadfastly resisted Christianity as a pernicious superstition that threatened the stability and moral character of society. In the fourth century, however, some of the leading intellectuals were Christian, and often they belonged to the clergy, for example, Basil the Great (329–379), Gregory of Nyssa (335–394), Jerome (347–420), and Augustine (354–430). They produced a sophisticated theology that defined fundamental Christian doctrine: the Trinity and the nature of Christ (see CHRISTOLOGY). In ecumenical (universal) Councils called by the emperors, the bishops and learned clergy argued and promulgated dogma for the whole church. Battles over Christ’s divine and human natures were particularly violent, spilling over out of the council chambers into the streets.

Because the wealth of the church, the influence of the clergy upon the urban masses, and the ability to call on imperial support often made the bishops the most powerful officials in their cities, there was intense competition whenever a bishop died. In Rome and elsewhere this led to division, disputed elections, and even street fighting between adherents of competing candidates. This would remain a problem during the entire Middle Ages.

By the fourth and fifth centuries there had developed not only an impressive Eucharistic service, but also an elaborate baptism. A third major SACRAMENT, Penance, involved public penitential exercises (e.g., fasting, special clothing, exclusion from services) and, perhaps, public confession of major sins (murder, adultery). Such penance could be undergone only once, however.

All three sacraments, and most other rituals and liturgies, were performed by the bishop, often assisted by presbyters and deacons. As the church grew, it became impossible for bishops to retain sole competence. Presbyters were delegated to say Mass, perform baptisms, and, more rarely, administer Penance. As a result, some theologians (e.g., Jerome) developed a “presbyterian” ecclesiology that argued for the sacramental equality of presbyters and bishops, although conceding a primacy of institutional authority to the bishops. This ecclesiology remained an option in the theological tradition, although social conditions in the centuries after Jerome elevated the authority of the bishops far above that of the presbyters.

Early Middle Ages

The imperial church created the basic clerical organization of the Catholic and Orthodox Churches that continues to this day. After the collapse of the Western Roman Empire in the fifth century, that structure ensured the church’s survival. Germanic kings exercised much effective power over the church. Under Charlemagne (742–814), the reestablishment of the Roman Empire in the West brought renewed imperial control. The church was feudalized. Bishops became great magnates and servitors of the crown. Local churches came to be “owned” by secular landlords. The expansion of the church north of the Alps created a network of parishes even in the rural areas, leaving some parish clergy at the mercy of the powerful. Lay nobles also founded on their estates churches that they considered to be their property. The bishops lost the authority to appoint, or even discipline, the clergy of such churches.

The quality of the lower clergy plummeted. Many took wives and engaged in secular business. Indistinguishable from their lay parishioners they provided baptism, the Eucharist, Christian burial, and other liturgical services. Preaching was not expected, not only because the clergy often lacked education, but also because the bishop had a monopoly on preaching. Presbyters could be delegated, but few were, because the laity did not expect or particularly desire preaching.

The Gregorian Reform

The Gregorian Reform (so named for Pope Gregory VII [1020–1085]) and the Investiture Crisis marked a turning point. (Investiture was the ceremony by which a secular ruler “invested” a bishop with his bishopric.) Clerical and lay reformers sought to elevate the quality and status of the clergy, and they targeted clerical marriage (concubinage) and the buying and selling of church offices (simony). Although the emperors helped initiate the reform, they eventually came to oppose it because a thoroughgoing abolition of simony would strip the emperors of their control of the bishops. The emperors had given great wealth and power to the bishops in an effort to counterbalance the often unruly secular magnates. The resulting Investiture Crisis affected all of Europe, not just the empire. Although never completely successful, the Gregorian Reform did limit lay “ownership” of churches and made clerical celibacy an often ignored, but universally recognized, requirement for deacons, presbyters, and bishops.

High and Later Middle Ages

From the twelfth to fifteenth centuries, the functions of the clergy achieved the form that Roman Catholic priests still retain. The common practice of calling presbyters “priests” reflects the exaltation of the sacrifice of the Mass (Eucharist). The traditional belief in a real presence of Christ in the bread and wine received precise theological definition and authoritative promulgation at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215) (see TRANSUBSTANTIATION). The council required that all Christians receive the eucharist and confess to a priest at least once a year. Public penance had evolved into private repeatable confession, absolution by the priest, and an often nominal penance (e.g., prayers, fasts, charity). University-trained clerics produced a flood of increasingly sophisticated manuals for confessors. The ability of the priest to transubstantiate the bread and wine in the Eucharist and to absolve sins was ascribed to ordination. This sacrament of Holy Orders impressed a supernatural indelible “character” on the soul of the priest that endowed him with sacramental power. Its irremovability reinforced the difference separating and elevating the clergy above the laity. Tax exemption and immunity from secular courts for clergy found widespread, if not uniform and universal, acceptance.

The expectation that priests and bishops preach on a regular basis comes from this period. During the Gregorian era, clergy and laity demanded frequent preaching in imitation of the Apostles. Religious orders such as Franciscans and Dominicans made it central to their mission. Competition from the friars encouraged parish clergy to preach as well. Although preaching would be required of Catholic clergy thereafter, the focus of their activity and function remained the sacraments.

The enhanced power and prestige of the clergy raised expectations concerning their education, sanctity, and zeal that were not, and probably could not be, met. A rising lay anticlericalism resulted, but the most biting critiques of the clergy came from within the clerical ranks. Paradoxically, the clergy on the eve of the REFORMATION was better educated than any previous generation, and it would be from its most committed members that the Protestant reformers would be drawn. In some ways, the medieval church was the victim of its own success.

Martin Luther

With the posting of the ninety-five theses, MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) began a process that ultimately redefined the clergy. Catholic clergy who sought to reform the church by rethinking their own function as clerics began the reformation. Anticlericalism provided popular support, but it was the theological agenda of the reformers that allowed this reform to transcend the limits of medieval reform and rebellion. The reformers joined the anticlerical populace in criticizing the abuses of the Catholic clergy. They went on to reject the theology on which the Catholic clergy was based. The reformers did not just condemn the failure of the clergy to live up to the high standards placed on them by both hierarchy and laity; they also attacked the very standards by which the anticlerical populace had judged the clergy to be wanting.

Martin Luther's critique of the Catholic understanding of the clergy became normative for Protestantism. Luther rejected Catholic teaching on (1) the "character" or definition of the clergy as a separate estate, (2) clerical celibacy, and (3) the sacrificial function of the "priest." Under the slogan "priesthood of all believers," Luther abandoned the Catholic clergy's claim to be supernaturally distinct from the Christian laity. He repudiated the "indelible character" that Catholic theology taught was impressed on the priest's soul during ordination. The value of ordination was hotly debated in the early Reformation, but Luther was content merely to deny its status as a sacrament and its ability to empower the priest to celebrate the Eucharist/Lord's Supper and to absolve sins in confession.

Luther argued that all Christians were made "priests" by their baptism. The clergy differed from the laity solely by their office. Once chosen, the clergy had the right and the responsibility to preach, administer the sacraments, and exercise pastoral care. However, neither before, during, or after their tenure of that office were they supernaturally different from the laity. The lack of such a distinction allowed Luther to reject clerical celibacy, which had been intended to protect the inherent sacrality of Catholic priests by preventing the so-called pollution contracted by sexual intercourse.

Luther also challenged Catholic doctrine concerning the sacrament most crucial to the Catholic priesthood—the Eucharist. Luther rejected opus operatum, which taught that Christ’s saving presence in the bread and wine unfailingly occurs when the priest intoned the correct form of words with the correct intention to confect the Eucharist. Instead Luther argued that the recipient’s FAITH made the objectively present Christ effectually present as grace and forgiveness. Luther’s denial of a sacrifice in the Eucharist had the greatest impact on the clergy. Luther made unnecessary a “priestly” character for the clergy because it was the sacrificial function of the mass that required an officiating priest. The denial of the sacrifice also reduced the numbers of clergy dramatically by eliminating the many priests solely employed in offering the mass for the dead. In Geneva it took only nine Protestant ministers to replace hundreds of Catholic priests. The disappearance of the minor orders, for which there was no biblical warrant, further reduced the clerical estate. Clerical nomenclature made clear the difference between Catholic and Protestant clergy. Whereas Catholic clergy remained “priests,” most Protestant clerics became “ministers,” “pastors,” and “preachers.”

Luther’s theology represented a fundamental shift not only in the character of the clergy, but in their function and in the religiosity of the churches they served. The Catholic clergy was, and is, primarily a sacramental entity both in form and office. Protestant clergy are constituted by their relationship to the Word, preaching foremost. Luther’s reduction of the number of sacraments to two, his emphasis on faith in the sacraments, and his teaching of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone had achieved this shift. The primary goal of the Protestant cleric was to help evoke faith, not to convey grace. Public worship would center on the sermon, not on the Lord’s Supper. The Protestant preacher primarily proclaimed God’s Word; the Catholic priest primarily mediated the grace of God and the real presence of Jesus Christ.

The fundamental changes in the clergy had social and political consequences. The clergy assimilated to the other learned professions as part of secular society. Urban and princely governments absorbed the clergy into the body politic as citizens and subjects, no longer enjoying the canon law tax exemption and judicial immunity. Instead, in most states the government absorbed the church and made the clergy civil servants. The prince or urban magistracy usually appointed, oversaw, and disciplined them. Luther’s Saxony was the model. Luther initially accorded the Elector of Saxony only the role of “emergency Bishop.” However, Luther recognized that the prince, by virtue of the “priesthood” he had in common with all other Christians, and the position of leadership that he occupied within Saxon society, had the responsibility to govern and protect the inchoate Lutheran state church as a “Godly Prince.”

Calvin and the Reformed Tradition

Disagreements concerning the Lord’s Supper caused the acrimonious division of Protestantism into Lutheran and Reformed (primarily Calvinist) Churches (see CALVINISM; LUTHERANISM). However, the two traditions also had differing visions of the clergy. Unlike Luther, the Reformed tradition rejected the real presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the Lord’s Supper. This further desacramentalized their clergy, although the structure of the clergy, their role in discipline, and the relationship of church and clergy to secular authority were also distinctive. JOHN CALVIN proposed three offices alongside the pastor: deacon, presbyter, and teacher. The diaconate administered charity; the teacher educated both clergy and laity. The presbyters, unlike the Catholic presbyter-priests, were lay elders (Greek presbyteros, elder) who, along with the pastor, ran the church by administering, overseeing, and representing it. Consistories composed of pastors and presbyters governed the community in faith, morals, and social welfare. The resulting discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE) often enforced by excommunication, public chastisement, and, where possible, civil penalty, is common to most of the Reformed tradition. Collective leadership and incipient ecclesiastical self-sufficiency often made for tensions with the secular government, even in lands where the Reformed was the official church, such as SCOTLAND, Geneva, and the NETHERLANDS. In Protestant England and Catholic FRANCE, Calvinist resistance to government dictates and even open warfare resulted.

The Free Church Tradition

Beginning with the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century, the understanding of the ministerial office among the Anabaptists, Socinians, and (in the seventeenth century) the various English separatists was to see the minister first as expositor, that is, teacher, of Scripture. Since these traditions eschewed the notion of sacraments and saw baptism and the Lord's Supper not as vehicles of divine grace but as memorial and confessional acts, the role of the Anabaptist clergy was that of a presider at baptisms and the Lord's Supper. While the Polish Socinians, formally structured in the Minor Reformed Church of Poland were able to establish training institutions for clergy, the Anabaptists as an underground movement had to wait for a measure of formal tolerance in the Netherlands in the seventeenth century before they were able to offer training for future clergy. Also, Anabaptists chose their clergy from their own ranks, frequently by lot, a practice which among the Amish has survived into the twentyfirst century. The disposition among the churches of the Free Church tradition to see little theological significance between clergy and laity allowed such churches as the Baptists to make substantial gains in nineteenth century North America, since they were not as dependent on a trained and ordained clergy.

England and Anglicanism

Unlike almost all Continental Protestant churches, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND kept the full episcopal hierarchy with the exception of the pope. Retention of the bishops was thought to give the monarch practical control over the church and to lend religious legitimization to the social hierarchy that supported the monarchy itself. As James I (1566–1625) argued: “No bishop, no king.” The episcopacy became the flashpoint for more rigorous Protestants of dissatisfaction with the degree of church reform. By the end of the seventeenth century two visions of the church and the clergy competed, that of “church” and “chapel.” The state “church” remained staunchly episcopal. “Chapel” referred to a non-Episcopal ecclesiology and a less liturgically rich religiosity (Low Church) than that of the dominant episcopal party (High Church). The unbroken apostolic tradition of episcopal consecration made easier an eventual rapprochement with the Catholic Church, both for individual clerics and the Anglican Church itself. The High Church tradition (see ANGLO-CATHOLICISM) favored a priestly understanding of the clergy and the use of the term “priest.” Celibacy remained an option, though not a requirement.

Early Modern and Modern Clergy

The centrality of preaching and the exclusive authority of Scripture brought to completion the late medieval movement toward an educated clergy. University training was required of most aspiring ministers, and governments often provided financial support for those studying for the ministry. The Protestant clergy was distinguished from the laity by education as once the Catholic clergy had been by their indelible character. The authority of the preacher in the pulpit replaced that of the priest at the altar. The clergy were seen and saw themselves as agents of “civilization” in the rural parishes, where the differences of class and education isolated the cleric in a way usually not seen in the Middle Ages. The medieval parish priest was often indistinguishable from his parishioners and may have felt more solidarity with his local community than with the international church. Both Protestant and Catholic reformers sought to give the clergy a new position of power and respect from which they could more effectively rule and instruct their congregations. The high educational standards of the Jesuits and the Council of Trent’s (1545–1563) mandate that every diocese have a seminary to train priests served this purpose. The Catholic seminary proved to be a more effective instrument than the Protestant university, given that the seminary drew aspirants to the priesthood out of the larger lay intellectual community. While ensuring theological conformity and moral rectitude, however, the seminaries also limited the intellectual growth of the seminarians. By contrast, the university-trained Protestant clergy was a crucial part of the intelligentsia and provided philosophers, scientists, writers, and other thinkers to the larger society. The Protestant parsonage became an important seedbed of intellectuals and culture.

The Protestant clergy was more exposed to the winds of change in the early Modern and Modern eras. Their Christianity often reflected the latest and the best that Western culture had to offer. The result was a form of Christianity (often called Liberal Protestantism) that was well adapted to modern culture, but which had little in common with the concerns of Luther and the other Reformers.

In Europe, despite revolution and secularization, the Protestant state churches and the Catholic Church determined the form of the clergy. The United States, with its separation of church and state (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW), experienced a proliferation of churches that re-created all the earlier clerical types. Prophets, priests, presbyters, and preachers peopled the religious landscape. Without government backing, the clergy had to cater to the laity, even in the mainline denominations. The clergy sometimes transmuted into a social welfare service as love of neighbor appeared to eclipse love of God. Tradition and theological systems gave ground to the concerns and values of a secularized society, and clergy assumed roles as psychologists, social workers, philosophers, or inspirational speakers. The ordination of women constitutes undoubtedly the most significant development in midtwentieth century; virtually all Protestant denomination—the major exception in the United States is the Southern Baptist Convention—have endorsed the ordination of women. Unresolved in the early twentieth century is the ordination of openly homosexual individuals.

Conservative churches do not face this challenge, but their dissonance with modern culture marginalizes their clergy. The Catholic Church faces the additional hurdle of attracting men to the priesthood in an age when celibacy is viewed as aberrant. Paradoxically, however, it is precisely those churches that maintain a higher clerical profile that many laity seem to favor. The forces that created the Christian clergy in the first centuries of the church continue to operate.

References and Further Reading

- Benson, Robert Louis. The Bishop-Elect; a Study in Medieval Ecclesiastical Office. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1968.
- Campanhausen, Hans Freiherr von. Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries. Translated by J.A.Baker. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1969.
- Collins, John N. Diakonia: Re-interpreting the Ancient Sources. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Ferguson, Everett, ed. Church, Ministry, and Organization in the Early Church Era. New York: Garland, 1993.
- Harnack, Adolf von. Sources of the Apostolic Canons, with a Treatise on the Origin of the Readership and Other Lower Orders. London: A. and C.Black, 1895.
- Lécuyer, Joseph. What is a Priest? New York: Hawthorn Books, 1959.
- Nichol, Todd, and Marc Kolden, eds. Called and Ordained: Lutheran Perspectives on the Office of the Ministry. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1990.
- Osborne, Kenan B. Priesthood: A History of Ordained Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.
- Pettegree, Andrew, ed. The Reformation of the Parishes: The Ministry and the Reformation in Town and Country. New York: Manchester University Press, 1993.
- Sheils, W.J., and Wood, Diana, eds. The Ministry: Clerical and Lay. [Papers read at the 1988 Summer Meeting and the 1989 Winter Meeting of the Ecclesiastical History Society.] Oxford, UK: B. Blackwell, 1989.
- Smith, Ralph F. Luther, Ministry, and Ordination Rites in the Early Reformation Church. New York: P.Lang, 1996.
- Spijker, W.van 't. The Ecclesiastical Offices in the Thought of Martin Bucer. New York: E.J.Brill, 1996.

R.EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

CLERGY, MARRIAGE OF

The prohibition of marriage for Catholic deacons, priests, and bishops is one of the differences separating Protestant and Catholic Churches. St. Paul advocated CELIBACY for all who could maintain it, but he recognized the right of other Apostles to have wives. Deutero-Pauline letters show marriage to be expected or perhaps required. Clerical marriage was the norm in the first centuries of the church, although some individuals followed Paul's advice. In the fourth century the papacy began to require an oath of celibacy from the upper clergy. Those who married before their ordination were to practice abstinence, but were not separated from their wives. The Eastern Orthodox Church (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN) allowed marriage to priests, but not to bishops. In the early Middle Ages priests in the West were often married. Attempts in the eleventh and twelfth centuries to reinforce the requirement and to make it more stringent faced opposition. In practice, many clerics were husbands and fathers. Protestant reformers condemned clerical celibacy. Ministers were encouraged to marry. The minister's family was a model for the rest of society and a source for new clerics.

The Bible

The Old Testament and the later rabbinic tradition hold MARRIAGE in high esteem. The command to be fruitful and multiply (Genesis 1:28), the definition of Israel as descendants of the patriarchs, and the fundamental importance of the patriarchal FAMILY to society and religion made marriage central. Even more than later Protestant Christianity, JUDAISM remains a familycentered religion both in the definition of its membership and its most fundamental rites. The Old Testament expected the temple priesthood to be married because the priesthood was hereditary in the families of Levi and Aaron. Because sexual intercourse made one ritually impure, however, priests served the altar in alternate weeks during which they abstained. Some prophets and their disciples may have practiced a temporary celibacy. This may have been the case for John the Baptist and Jesus.

Jesus's attitude toward marriage was equivocal. Some of his sayings emphasize an antagonism between discipleship and the bonds of marriage and family (see Mark 3:21, 31–35; Matthew 8:21–22, 19:29; Luke 8:19–21). This reflected the eschatological expectation of the Gospels. However, Jesus nowhere forbids marriage, not even for the Twelve Apostles.

Because the Apostle Paul also expected the imminent end of the world and return of Christ, he urged celibacy for all able to maintain it (I Corinthians 7:25–38). However, he conceded marriage to the weak. He also recognized that other apostles had married and traveled with their wives (I Corinthians 9:5). The house-churches of the early period were often the homes of married Christians who exercised leadership. It is against this background that Titus's and Timothy's injunctions should be understood. Eager to achieve respectability in Greco-Roman society, the church embraced the patriarchal family in private life and the church (I Timothy 2:2, 3:7, 6:1; Titus 2:9, 10). Those who accepted Paul's preference for celibacy were accused of forbidding marriage (I Timothy 4:3). Bishops and deacons were expected to be husbands and fathers because the qualities needed to rule the church were the same as those of a successful pater familias (I Timothy 3:1–13; Titus 1:6–11). Patriarchy demanded subordination of wives, children, and slaves to the authority of the father. This model for marriage and family remained even after clerical celibacy was introduced. The patriarchal model created a paternalistic relationship of the clergy to the laity. The use of the honorific “Father” for Catholic priests continues that tradition. Movements that challenged the authority of the clerical hierarchy often accorded women unusual authority and placed the family under pressure.

The Ancient Church

The church’s attitude toward clerical marriage began to change in the third century. At the beginning of the century Tertullian (c. 155 to after 220), a presbyter, was not self-conscious about his marriage, although he praised the many clerics who were celibate. Cyprian (d. 258), the bishop of Carthage, remained unmarried, perhaps because of the threat of persecution. Origen (c. 185–c. 254) went so far as to emasculate himself. The Spanish Council of Elvira (between 295 and 302) forbade married clerics to have sexual relations with their wives. In the fourth century, the papacy imposed celibacy on deacons, priests, and bishops. Married men who were ordained need not separate from their wives, although sexual abstinence was more difficult if the couple remained together. Many clerics were older men who had raised families and no longer suffered the sexual desires of the young. Wives welcomed their husband’s promotion because it raised their social status. Some wives were referred to as “priestess” and “bishoress.” But there is also evidence that some were “priests” in their own right. Nonetheless, the social pretensions of the wives caused complaint wherever clerical marriage was allowed.

The Middle Ages

The fall of the Roman Empire prevented the effective enforcement of celibacy. Many early medieval clerics were married, especially in the rural parishes where supervision was absent. Aside from sexual desire, practicality also played an important role. It was simply impossible for a man to maintain a premodern household alone. The skills required and the tasks involved were traditionally woman’s work.

Clerical marriage was the source of new clerics because, as in other trades, sons followed fathers. In the later Middle Ages there is evidence that many priests were themselves the sons of priests. This relationship explains how many new priests learned their craft. When clerical celibacy was reestablished new methods would be required.

Clerical families posed a problem. Clerics often provided for their offspring out of the church’s wealth. In the Middle Ages, that wealth was usually land that could be sold, given, or bestowed as dowry. Even when celibacy was successfully enforced, the extended family of a cleric were often the beneficiaries. Families put members in clerical positions to exploit the church’s power and wealth to the family’s advantage. Emperors and kings placed sons, nephews, and other relatives on the episcopal throne. They were imitated on every level of society.

Clerical marriage anchored the cleric in the community that he served. The concerns of the local community came to outweigh those of the universal Church. Caught up in local feuds and rivalries, clerics were often unable to minister to the entire congregation. They lacked the distance from the laity that celibacy provided the Catholic priest and that education gave the Protestant minister. The clergy assimilated to their surroundings. In the early Middle Ages, when paganism was still a recent memory, Christianpagan hybrids resulted. At the very least, clerical marriage hindered the esprit de corps that professions need to maintain their identity and standards.

In an effort to reform the church, clergy and laity attacked clerical marriage during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Severe laws were passed to prevent such unions and to break up the ones that already existed. The Second Lateran Council (1123) went further than earlier legislation by arguing that marriage and clerical office were simply incompatible. As a result, no marriage contracted by a cleric could be recognized. Despite vocal resistance on the part of many clergy, clerical marriage became a contradiction in terms; it became “concubinage.” In certain areas (e.g., Spain and Scandinavia) clerical marriages continued. Some laity preferred a married clergy because unmarried priests were perceived as threats to the honor of wives and daughters, although the mass of the population valued celibacy as a mark of holiness. Although many clerics maintained relationships that were marriages to all intents and purposes, it was clearly considered to be a failing, if an understandable one. Even the most radical heresies (see HERESY) accepted the value of celibacy as they targeted clerical misbehavior in their condemnation of the church.

Nonetheless, the hierarchy had to recognize the reality of clerical marriage under whatever name. Whereas in many dioceses (e.g., in ENGLAND) the rules were rigorously enforced, in some dioceses (e.g., Constance) priests paid a yearly fine in order not to separate from their wives. In effect the bishop levied a tax on married clergy. The papacy also profited. It did not dispense from celibacy, but it did sell dispensations allowing the sons of priests to become clerics, despite canon law, which refused ordination to the illegitimate.

The fifteenth century saw the beginning of a change, however. Some reform proposals, for example, the Reformatio Sigismundi, advocated clerical marriage and, to avoid scandal, Pope Pius II may have favored it and predicted its eventual acceptance. On the eve of the REFORMATION, Erasmus of Rotterdam also supported clerical marriage.

The Reformation

Nonetheless, it required the theological innovations of the Protestant Reformation to overturn a millennium of tradition and to undermine the religious assumptions that lay at its base.

One of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI’S earliest reform efforts was a petition in 1522 to the bishop of Constance requesting permission for priests to marry. Zwingli married in 1524. MARTIN LUTHER initially did not focus on the question and resisted marriage until 1525. Having discovered the joys of sex and married life, he went beyond mere opposition to celibacy to praise and recommend marriage. Few Protestant writers would be as openly positive about sex, but the promotion of marriage became central to Protestant social teaching.

The Protestant rejection of celibacy implied a major reevaluation of what constituted the sacred. For Catholics, sexual purity was an important element in the sacral status of the clergy. This objective physical sacrality went beyond mere morality. It contributed to the supernatural aura that also accompanied the SACRAMENTS, church buildings, and saints' relics. Like the Old Testament Temple or Ark of the Covenant, such people and objects were viewed as extensions of the sacred or the divine into the profane world. Protestant theology all but eliminated it. Although God was spiritually present to believers everywhere, God was not present in the world anywhere. God's power and knowledge simply extended to everything and everyone. For Luther the one exception was the Eucharist, but most other Protestants denied the real presence. The denial of the sacral status of the clergy secularized them. They might achieve a moral holiness, but so could the laity.

The arguments for clerical marriage drew upon core Protestant teachings to question the feasibility of celibacy. Given humanity's fallen condition, few could aspire to it. Only the grace of God could make it possible, and Protestant theologians did not think such grace was widely shed. The Catholic Church was more sanguine about both human ability and the extent of God's grace in this regard.

Protestants and Catholics also interpreted Titus 1:6 and I Timothy 3:2, 12 differently. The Catholic Church understood Titus/Timothy to specify that if a bishop or a priest or a deacon were to be married, he be married only once. It did not require or even urge marriage; it limited it. Luther agreed that Titus/Timothy did not require marriage of the clergy, but it did establish marriage as the normal condition for the clergy. Luther and the Protestant tradition praised marriage as the preferred sexual arrangement for all Christians. Where once celibacy was required of the clergy, now the unmarried cleric was the object of grave suspicion. Marriage became, in effect, obligatory. Protestant theologians rejected the Catholic claim that marriage was a sacrament, but they anchored marriage in the order of creation. Although divorce was now possible in theory, in practice it was as difficult to divorce in Wittenberg or Geneva as it was in Rome.

The patriarchal family became both the center of religious instruction—a little church as it were—and the basic building block of secular society. The effects of these changes on women were mixed. On the one hand, the Protestant position elevated the status of marriage and the roles of wife and mother. On the other, it eliminated any legitimate alternative to marriage, family, and subordination. Feminist historians have seen it as a setback for women.

Having advocated clerical marriage, Protestant clergy required guidance. The marriage and family life of Luther and Katherine von Bora was held up as a model for clergy and for all Christians. An innovative literature detailing the responsibilities of husbands and wives, parents and children, flowed from the printing presses. The medieval church had dealt with marriage primarily in a penitential setting in which limits and failings were emphasized. Protestant literature retained those concerns, but placed a greater emphasis on positive injunctions for behavior and attitudes. Protestant authors also put more weight on the companionate nature of marriage. The mutual support and consolation of spouses, more than sexual satisfaction, were the greatest loss for the celibate clergy. Of course, with marriage and family came business and cares. St. Paul had warned of this and the entire philosophical tradition had made the harridan wife of Socrates, Xanthippe, a standing warning against marriage.

The Modern World

Clerical marriage remains one of the most visible markers distinguishing Protestantism and Catholicism. However, modern Catholic theology has promoted a deeper appreciation for the married state that is at odds with traditional understanding of clerical celibacy. After the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), many priests were “laicized” (i.e., ceased to function as priests) and allowed to marry. Despite hopes for an end to the requirement, Pope Paul VI (1963–1978) and Pope John Paul II (1978–) forcefully reaffirmed it. However, unlike the ordination of women (see WOMEN CLERGY), which the hierarchy holds to be divinely prohibited, clerical celibacy is a purely disciplinary matter that lies within the competence of the church. As the shortage of Catholic priests in the Western world becomes ever more pressing, the Catholic Church has been urged to rethink the ban on clerical marriage. The Second Vatican Council’s reinstatement of married deacons may serve as precedent.

See also Celibacy; Judaism; Luther, Martin; Orthodoxy, Eastern; Zwingli, Huldrych

References and Further Reading

- Barstow, Anne Llewellyn. Married Priests and the Reforming Papacy: The Eleventh-Century Debates. New York: E. Mellen Press, 1982.
- Brennan, Brian. “‘Episcopae’: Bishops’ Wives Viewed in Sixth-Century Gaul Church.” History 54 (1985):311–323.
- Brooke, Christopher. “Gregorian Reform in Action: Clerical Marriage in England, 1050–1200.” In Medieval Church and Society. Collected Essays, 69–99. New York: New York University Press, 1972.
- Cocke, Emmitt W., Jr. “Luther’s View of Marriage and Family.” Religion in Life (1973): 103–116.
- Hardwick, Julie. The Practice of Patriarchy: Gender and the Politics of Household Authority in Early Modern France. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1998.
- Kokkinakis, Athenagoras T. Parents and Priests as Servants of Redemption; an Interpretation of the Doctrines of the Eastern Orthodox Church on the Sacraments of Matrimony and Priesthood. New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1958.
- Ozment, Steven E. When Fathers Ruled: Family Life in Reformation Europe. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
- Parish, Helen L. Clerical Marriage and the English Reformation: Precedent, Policy, and Practice. Burlington, VT: Aldershot/Ashgate, 2000.
- Prior, Mary. “Reviled and Crucified Marriages: The Position of Tudor Bishops’ Wives.” In Women in English Society, 118–148. London/New York: Methuen, 1985.
- Sipe, A.W. Richard. Sex, Priests, and Power: Anatomy of a Crisis. New York: Brunner/Mazel, 1995.
- Yost, John, “The Reformation Defense of Clerical Marriage in the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI.” Church History 50 (1981):152–165.

R.EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

COCCEJUS, JOHANNES (1603–1669)

Reformed theologian. A seminal figure in COVENANT THEOLOGY, particularly as subsequently developed by the English Puritans, and a significant contributor to the development of historically and linguistically based biblical theology, Coccejus was born Johannes Koch, in Bremen, in 1603. Federal both in theology and politics, the republican city was a significant influence on Coccejus's thought. At Bremen's gymnasium he studied Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic with Matthias Martini, who had been a leading moderate against the High Calvinists in the controversy over the Articles of Remonstrance at the Synod of Dort. After completing his studies with Martini, Coccejus undertook rabbinical studies at Hamburg, and then went to Franeker to study under the Orientalist Sixtinus Amama and with Maccovius and WILLIAM AMES. Between 1630 and 1636, Coccejus taught sacred philology at Bremen. He then returned to Franeker, teaching biblical languages and exegesis. In 1643 he was appointed professor of both Hebrew and THEOLOGY, and the focus of his work shifted from exegesis to DOCTRINE, although his theology always remained strongly biblical. In 1650 he was appointed professor of theology at Leiden, where he remained until his death in 1669. His major works include an exposition of his federal theology, Summa Doctrinae de Foedere et Testamento Dei, and the exegetical Summa Theologiae ex Sacris Scripturis Repetita.

Coccejus's exegesis was shaped by his linguistic studies. Locking horns with Reformed scholasticism, he vehemently opposed proof-texting and extrascriptural philosophizing in exegetical method (although he was not fully immune from either in his own work). Instead, he advocated applying the best available linguistic, archeological, and historical evidence to gain the most accurate possible reading of a biblical text. Each text was to be understood by grasping its author's intention, and by understanding it through both its textual and historical context. Truth was found not by amassing individual passages, but rather in the whole biblical witness.

At the same time, faithful reading meant not being limited by the written word. Although scripture preceded TRADITION and provided the yardstick for doctrine, Coccejus derided narrow literalism that "put Scripture in place of the Pope." To Coccejus, the biblical text was written with the inspiration of the Holy Spirit and must be read with the same inspiration. The words are accessible to "carnal man," but only a reader of faith can encounter the transforming "spiritual truth" of the Word, Jesus Christ. Nor is any one interpretation or system exhaustive. God speaks to different people and different parts of the church in different ways, through the same scripture. Plural interpretations may point to different aspects of the divine will.

Coccejus stood in the tradition of federal theology and political thought stemming from such figures as HEINRICH BULLINGER and Kaspar Olevianus. COVENANT formed the key to Coccejus's understanding of the relationships between human beings, between individuals and their communities, between humans and God, and between God and the world.

In keeping with his evolutionary view of salvation history, the idea of successive covenants allowed Coccejus to draw a sharp distinction between the First and Second Testaments. This structured his entire theology. For Coccejus, covenant precedes creation: the Father and Son freely enter a pretemporal covenant binding the Son to become sponsor of the covenant between God and human beings, realized at creation. The ensuing “covenant of works” (or “covenant of nature”) between God and humans has three aspects: law (setting out the way for people to learn God’s love), promise (pertaining to God’s love and mercy), and threat (ruling out all other paths and showing the inevitability of punishment for sin). The covenant of works is abrogated in five stages. First, it is broken by human disobedience. Second, it is replaced through the inauguration of the “covenant of grace,” which itself has two stages, of the Old Testament (anticipating Christ) and New Testament (fulfillment). Thus, the third abrogation of the covenant of works is the incarnation of Christ as Testator, fulfilling the covenant of GRACE. Fourth, the death of the body marks the end of the struggle against sin. In the resurrection of the body, the consequences of the covenant of works are swept away—its fifth abrogation—by the consummation of the covenant of grace.

Coccejus’s stages retain the Reformed emphasis on divine sovereignty and PREDESTINATION. The covenant is entirely a divine initiative, which humans receive as an unmerited gift and to which they respond in FAITH. At the same time, his schema importantly returns significance to history and to human response to divine grace, avoiding High Calvinism’s tendency to mechanistic determinism.

The covenant theme permeates Coccejus’s thought, issuing in a political as well as theological vision. Scripture is to be read in the community of faith; individuals are to perceive themselves as the products of, and participants in, communities of all levels, from family to the entire Christian community. Theology is done in conversation with others and under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Magistrates are to enact the will of Christ (collaboratively understood) and, if they fail, may be resisted. One may find the roots of American political federalism and an anti-individualist republicanism in Coccejus’s federalism (McCoy and Baker 1991).

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Coccejus, Johannes. Summa Doctrinae de Foedere et Testamento Dei. 1st ed. 1648 (subsequent editions 1653, 1660).

Secondary Sources:

Faulenbach, Heiner. Weg und Ziel der Erkenntnis Christi: Eine Untersuchung zur Theologie des Johannes Coccejus. Neukirchen-Vluyn, Germany: Neukirchener Verlag, 1973.

McCoy, Charles S. “Johannes Coccejus: Federal Theologian.” Scottish Journal of Theology 16 (1963):352–370.

McCoy, Charles S., and J.Wayne Baker. Fountainhead of Federalism: Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenantal Tradition. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991.

Schrenk, Gottlob. Gottesreich und Bund im Älteren Protestantismus Vornehmlich bei Johannes Coccejus. Giessen: Brunnen Verlag, 1985 (1923).

MARION MADDOX

COFFIN, HENRY SLOANE (1877–1954)

American theologian. Coffin was a Presbyterian minister, liberal theologian, advocate for the SOCIAL GosPEL, promoter of foreign MISSIONS and ECUMENISM, and educator. He was one of the most important Protestant leaders in the UNITED STATES in the first half of the twentieth century and a shaper of the Protestant establishment in his generation.

Coffin was born January 5, 1877, and he was educated at Yale. After a call to ministry he attended New College, Edinburgh, in SCOTLAND and the University of Marburg in GERMANY. He returned to the United States and earned his B.D. at Union Theological Seminary in New York.

Ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. by the New York Presbytery in 1900, he accepted a call to the Bedford Park Presbyterian Church in the Bronx. Five years later he became the minister of Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church in New York City and led that church into a period of expansion of its ministry and influence.

Coffin began to teach part time at Union Seminary in 1904. Soon his teaching and PREACHING attracted widespread attention. The periodical The Christian Century conducted a poll in 1924 to identify the twenty-five most respected and influential clergymen in America, and Coffin made the list. In 1926 Union Seminary elected him president. He led the seminary into a rich period of expansion and leadership. Both REINHOLD NIEBUHR and PAUL TILLICH joined the faculty. WOMEN were admitted as students, and he helped create the School of Sacred Music.

From the beginning of his ministry he was a leader in the informal movement for theological liberalism and MODERNISM. He became involved in the fundamentalist-modernist controversy at the national Presbyterian level between 1924 and 1927, and he hailed the decision of the General Assembly of 1927 when it decided to tolerate a diversity of theological positions. He served the Presbyterian Church as its representative at a number of ecumenical meetings in the 1930s and 1940s, and he was elected moderator in 1943.

Henry Sloane Coffin died November 25, 1954. His papers are in the Burke Library of Union Theological Seminary in New York City.

See also Fundamentalism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

Handy, Robert T. A History of Union Theological Seminary in the City of New York. New York: Columbia University Press, 1987.

Longfield, Bradley J. The Presbyterian Controversy: Fundamentalists, Modernists, and Moderates. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Niebuhr, Reinhold, ed. This Ministry: The Contribution of Henry Sloane Coffin. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1946.

Noyes, Morgan Phelps. Henry Sloane Coffin: The Man and His Ministry. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1964.

JOHN PIPER

COKE, THOMAS (1747–1814)

Methodist bishop. One of the first two Methodist bishops in America, Thomas Coke was the most important early proponent of Methodist MISSIONS outside of ENGLAND and UNITED STATES. Born in WALES in 1747, Coke earned a doctorate in law from Oxford before becoming an Anglican priest. After six years of parish ministry, Coke was dismissed from his parish in 1777 due to his Methodist sympathies, and began serving as the primary assistant to JOHN WESLEY. In 1784, Wesley appointed Coke the first superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church and sent him to America to appoint FRANCIS ASBURY as his co-superintendent. The Christmas Conference in Baltimore elected Coke and Asbury joint superintendents of the Methodist Episcopal Church. (To Wesley's dismay, each later assumed the title of "bishop.")

Coke's frequent travels between America and Britain (18 crossings of the Atlantic) maintained ties between the Methodists in America and Britain despite the hostilities created by the American Revolution. Although Coke spent only three years in America and never renounced his British citizenship, he significantly expanded Methodism's geographical reach by appointing missionaries to the Channel Islands, SCOTLAND, IRELAND, the West Indies, north Wales, AFRICA, Ceylon, and INDIA. Coke assumed almost singlehanded financial responsibility for these missionaries, exhausting his personal fortune and those of his two wives. He died and was buried at sea while traveling to India in 1814.

A prolific author, Coke penned a BIBLE commentary, tracts, and sermons. He was instrumental in establishing Methodism's POLITY with bishops and superintendents.

See also Baltimore Conference; Methodism, England; Methodism, North America; Methodism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Coke, Thomas. A Commentary on the Holy Bible. London: George Whitfield, 1801.

———. Extracts of the Journals of the Late Rev. Thomas Coke, L.L.D. Dublin, Ireland: R. Napper, 1816.

Lloyd, Gareth. Catalogue of the Thomas Coke Papers. Manchester, UK: The Centre, 1991.

Secondary Source:

Vickers, John A. Thomas Coke: Apostle to Methodism. Sussex, UK: World Methodist Historical Society, 1969.

THOMAS E. PHILLIPS

COLENZO, JOHN WILLIAM (1814–1883)

Anglican bishop of Natal. Colenso was born at St. Austell, Cornwall, ENGLAND on January 24, 1814. He studied at Cambridge, becoming a Fellow of St. John's. In 1846 he became vicar of Fornsett St. Mary, Norfolk. Theologically he was a liberal and a disciple of his friend, FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE.

Colenso was appointed to the new bishopric of Natal in SOUTH AFRICA in 1853, a task that was essentially a missionary one. In 1861 he published a controversial commentary on Romans in which he argued for UNIVERSALISM. Many Broad Churchmen at that time pursued Pauline studies as a way of asserting their Protestantism. Their forthright Protestantism, in turn, was a way of being anti-Tractarian and, as Colenso described his own work, of fighting “for a great principle—no less than the essential principle of Protestantism—free enquiry.” In 1862 Colenso published the first volume of his The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined in which he baldly asserted that the events narrated in these books were unhistorical. A public sensation ensued. His High Church metropolitan, Bishop Gray of Capetown, held a somewhat dubious ecclesiastical trial in 1863, found Colenso guilty of erroneous teaching, went on to pronounce him deposed, and ultimately excommunicated him (1866). Colenso won an appeal on technical grounds and thus he retained the legal right to be the bishop of Natal, although most of his fellow bishops, and the archbishop of Canterbury himself, considered him spiritually deposed.

As a missionary Colenso contributed to the study of the Zulu language and is remembered for denouncing unjust treatment of Zulus by the colonists. He died in Natal on June 20, 1883.

See also Broad Church; Colonialism Oxford Movement; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

Guy, Jeff. The Heretic: A Study of the Life of John William Colenso 1814–1883. Pietermaritzburg, South Africa: University of Natal, 1983.

Hinchliff, Peter. John William Colenso: Bishop of Natal. London: Nelson, 1964.

Larsen, Timothy. “Bishop Colenso and His Critics: The Strange Emergence of Biblical Criticism in Victorian Britain.” Scottish Journal of Theology 50 no. 4 (1997):433–458.

TIMOTHY LARSEN

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR (1772–1834)

English poet. Although Coleridge's reputation as a poet has rarely been in question, the problem of his status as philosopher and theologian has always been equivocal. For contemporaries like Carlyle and De Quincey, or twentieth-century philosophers like Rene Wellek and Mary Warnock, or critics like Norman Fruman, his religious thinking could either be "explained," ad hominem, in terms of his own psychological problems, or seen as an extension of his unphilosophical rehash of contemporary German philosophy, mostly plagiarized, and assembled without any insight into the "essential incompatibility of different trends of thought" (Wellek 1931:67). Thus even by the time H.D. Traill came to write Coleridge's biography in 1884 he could safely be dismissed as a "legend which has only slowly died out."

The actual truth I believe to be that Coleridge's position from 1818 or 1820 until his death...was in no sense one of the highest, or even of any considerable influence.... A few mystics of the type of Maurice, a few eager seekers after truth like Sterling, may have gathered, or fancied they gathered, distinct dogmatic instruction from the Highgate oracles; and, no doubt to the extent of his influence over the former of these disciples, we may justly credit Coleridge's discourses with having exercised a real if only a transitory directive effect upon nineteenth century thought. But the terms in which his influence is sometimes spoken of appear, as far as one can judge the matter at this distance of time, to be greatly exaggerated. (Traill 1884:205,207)

Yet, in the century since, Coleridge's reputation has consistently grown—and it is the Protestant theologian who has come, retrospectively, to dominate the Coleridgean "legend."

As early as 1856, F.J.A. Hort, the Anglican theologian, saw that Coleridge's attempt to find a unity between philosophy, theology, and aesthetics was not merely unique for his time, but had made him that much more difficult to appreciate as a whole.

Classification is our pride and pleasure; and woe be to that which refuses to be classified. An author whose opinions will not range with those of any recognised party, or whose works never seem quite rightly lodged in any one division of a well-regulated library, occupies in general estimation what was once the place of a zoophyte or platypus—an uncanny creature, possibly of demonical origin. Such a divine monster was Coleridge. (Hort vol. II:292)

Granted that much of what his detractors said was true about his opium addiction, his propensity to plagiarism, and the exaggeration of his claims, it is remarkable that many of his greatest admirers were themselves philosophers of opposing schools, like John Stuart

Mill, or theologians and historians like Hort and Julius Hare, who had studied his German sources. “I rejoice to think,” wrote FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, “that those who have most profited by what he has taught them, do not and cannot form a school” [Maurice 1838 (4th ed. 1891):xi]. The originality most valued by his successors was, rather, a unity and width of vision perhaps historically unique—and certainly approached only by such later theologian-poets as JOHN HENRY NEWMAN and T.S.ELIOT. Although he first gained a reputation as a poet with the copublication with WILLIAM WORDSWORTH of the Lyrical Ballads (1798), and it was only later that he developed a career as political journalist, literary critic, philosopher, social commentator, and theologian, such a rough chronological list fails to reveal how much all these activities ran in parallel throughout his relatively long life. The myriad-mindedness, only fully revealed to the late twentieth century with the full publication of his massive correspondence and notebooks, had already been shown in the mid-1790s by lectures on politics and religion in relation to the Revolution then in progress in FRANCE, and by his aptly named, but then unique, hybrid form of “lay sermons.”

The importance of Coleridge’s theology lies not in particular doctrines, but in its development. The son of an Anglican priest, educated at Christ’s Hospital, he was attracted to the rationality of Unitarianism as a student at Cambridge, under the influence of his tutor. Essential to this stage of his thought was Observations on Man (1749) by David Hartley—after whom Coleridge named his eldest son. Although not explicitly Deist (see DEISM) or Unitarian, Hartley’s so-called philosophy seemed to many the logical epitome of both. It was, in effect, a theory of developmental psychology that allowed for the growth of the mind in seven stages from simple sensation to what Hartley called “theopathy” and finally “moral sense.” An essentially physical system, working by means of “vibrations” in the nervous system, Hartley’s psychology had little room for SIN and none for evil. Occasionally the normal progression from one level to another was interrupted or blocked, so that some individuals failed to fulfill their potential, and, not having reached moral sense, behaved in antisocial ways, although such problems for Hartley were no more than “shadows” in the light of God’s beneficence.

The first blow to this eighteenth-century “optimism” came with the failure of the French Revolution to produce peace and universal brotherhood. If it was only with the discovery of IMMANUEL KANT and the German idealists while in GERMANY from 1798 to 1800 that Coleridge began to formulate a new THEOLOGY philosophically, such works as The Ancient Mariner already show as early as 1797 a sense of original sin and mysterious evil unaccounted for by Hartley. As the name of his second son, Berkeley, indicated, Coleridge remained rooted in English as well as German thought at this period, but, with the progressive development of his opium addiction and the failure of his marriage in the early years of the new century, it was clear that no theology that did not give due weight to human frailty and depravity would serve. A journey to Malta and ITALY from 1805 to 1807 gave Coleridge firsthand experience, and a deep dislike, of contemporary Catholicism that was to last throughout his life.

Despite some important publications, including the first version of a philosophical periodical entitled The Friend, and his Lectures on Shakespeare, other personal disappointments, including, most seriously, a quarrel with Wordsworth and his wife (mostly over his drug addiction) gave his middle years, from 1807 to 1817, a growing sense of a life and opportunities wasted. In 1816–1817 came the two Lay Sermons, together with his greatest critical work, Biographia Literaria. Although few could detect the binding theological thread joining this mixture of literary and political work, it was to become clearer in the next decade.

In 1817, too, Coleridge's personal life was dramatically altered by his move to the house of Dr. Gilman of Highgate, where he was freed from his previous financial worries, and deprived of the drugs that had so hampered his creativity in the past. In the 1820s there followed the Philosophical Lectures, Aids to Reflection, and Church and State—works of sometimes confusing originality. Thus, whereas the former show little that is new philosophically, they convey with peculiar clarity the development of ideas—in particular the process of “desynonymy,” by which new ideas claim new terms in separating from their linguistic matrix. Similarly Aids, purportedly a manual on meditation, also reveals a radical theological and psychological agenda—insisting that it is need, rather than argument, that draws the individual toward God. Church and State, apparently an eccentric sociological or political work on the balance of forces within society, occasioned by Coleridge's obstinate and futile opposition to the Catholic Emancipation Bill of 1828, was to prove seminal in later nineteenth-century politics—inspiring such unlikely Coleridgeans as Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli and the Conservative welfare reforms of his Home Secretary Richard Cross.

Only in retrospect can be seen behind this succession of apparently occasional pieces an overall unifying theological theme, in which the possibilities of incremental change are explored in areas as seemingly diverse as history of ideas, devotional meditation, and social organization. Critics describing this later thought as “conservatism” or “orthodoxy” miss its radicalism in the prevalent context of Romantic Spinozistic thought, where the closing of the gap between God and NATURE implied the ultimate perfectability of mankind—an idea taken up by GEORG W.F. HEGEL, and through him LUDWIG FEUERBACH, and Karl Marx. Coleridge's insistence on traditional Trinitarian notions of fallen Nature, redeemable only by divine action, prevented him from ever embracing the facile optimism that in the twentieth century inspired such tyrannies as fascism, COMMUNISM, and various terrorist “liberation” movements such as the Irish Republican Army, the Red Brigades, or ETA.

Coleridge's unpublished notebooks of the period reveal a similar radicalism in biblical criticism and hermeneutics, and it is here, if anywhere, that the common charge of uncompleted work is most justified. Few thinkers, let alone theologians, up to this time had seriously engaged with the idea of human consciousness as in a process of continual growth and development, or had considered the implications of such growth to AESTHETICS, politics, or religious experience without losing a corresponding sense of human fallibility. The question of Coleridge's theology, therefore, has to be considered less in terms of his treatment of specific doctrines (important as these are) than in the way he relates all parts of human experience to a single fluid and developmental unity—a process as much aesthetic as philosophic.

Although little noticed at the time, the influence of these late works was to prove enormous and lasting—for a time even eclipsing his poetic achievement. Two of Hare's Cambridge students, Maurice and James Sterling, introduced to Coleridge's ideas (by a process described by Disraeli in one of his novels in terms of the spreading of arcane secrets) founded the “Apostles” (or Cambridge Conversazione Society) whose avowed aim was “Coleridgean.” In addition to Hort and Maurice himself, Coleridge was read by ALFRED LORD TENNYSON (a later Apostle), F.C. Robertson, and, with obligatory reservations, by the Arnolds—THOMAS, Matthew, and Mary Augusta (Mrs. Humphry Ward). Perhaps even more surprisingly there is evidence that Coleridge influenced his German contemporaries—astonishingly, even Schelling, from whom Coleridge had himself plagiarized key passages for his Biographia Literaria. Through Charles Kingsley, who was taught at Helston Grammar School by Coleridge's third son, the Reverend Derwent Coleridge, much of his political thought was channeled into the Christian Socialist movement, and thence into the modern British Labour Party (see SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN). Through RALPH WALDO EMERSON, whose meeting with Coleridge is described in English Traits, a different tradition of Coleridgean ideas passed through the New England Transcendentalists in American thought. Even while he was dismissed as practicing “a liberty of speculation no Christian could tolerate”—other aspects were taken up by the OXFORD MOVEMENT from EDWARD B. PUSEY and JOHN KEBLE to Newman, and by novelists from George MacDonald to GEORGE ELIOT, G.K. Chesterton, and even Disraeli. In the twentieth century he was no less influential on T.S. Eliot, the Oxford “Inklings” like C.S. LEWIS and J.R.R. Tolkien, Dorothy Sayers, and Owen Barfield.

Few, if any, Romantic thinkers have done more to change the way in which not merely the nineteenth but even the twentieth century was to discover and understand itself. If this was initially based on an essentially Protestant sense of individuality, those ideas were to become through Newman no less characteristic of later Catholic thought.

See also Romanticism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Individualism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. Aids to Reflection London 1839.
- . Biographia Literaria. 1817.
- . On the Constitution of Church and State. Church and State, 1830.
- . Lay Sermons, edited by R.J. White. Routledge, 1972.
- . Philosophical Lectures. London: Routledge, 1950.
- . Shakespeare Criticism. London: Athlone, 1989.

Secondary Sources:

- Ashton, Rosemary. The German Idea. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.
- Fruman, Norman. Coleridge: the Damaged Archangel. London: G. Allen and Unwin, 1972.
- Hedley, Douglas. Coleridge, Philosophy and Religion: Aids to Reflection and the Mirror of the Spirit. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Hort, F.J. A. “Coleridge.” In Cambridge Essays, 2 vols. London: John W. Parker and Son, 1856.
- Maurice, F.D. The Kingdom of Christ. London: Macmillan, 1838.
- Prickett, Stephen. Coleridge and Wordsworth: the Poetry of Growth. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.
- . Romanticism and Religion: the Tradition of Coleridge and Wordsworth in the Victorian Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- . Words and the Word: Language, Poetics, and Biblical Interpretation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Traill, H.D. “Coleridge.” In English Men of Letters Series. London: Macmillan, 1884.

Warnock, Mary. Imagination. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.

Wellek, Rene. Immanuel Kant in England. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1931.

STEPHEN PRICKETT

COLIGNY, GASPARD DE (1519–1572)

French Protestant political figure. Gaspard de Coligny was a key Protestant military and political leader during the first decade of the religious wars in sixteenth-century FRANCE. Born to a powerful noble family, he initially pursued a military career. In 1552 he was named admiral of France, a post that conferred prestige but—despite the name—was not associated with naval command. Captured by the Spanish in 1557, he spent two years in prison. Observers have long regarded this confinement as critical to Coligny's CONVERSION to Protestantism. After his release, he endeavored in vain to mediate the mounting tension between the crown and emerging Protestants.

With the eruption of outright hostilities in 1562, Coligny became a principal commander of the Protestant army. He fought in defense of the HUGUENOTS, as French Protestants were known, even as he counseled them to pursue political negotiation. By the early 1570s, Coligny urged King Charles IX and Queen Mother Catherine de Médicis to instigate war against the Spanish as a means to deflect bellicose energies and reconcile their subjects. Coligny's association with the project further angered staunch Catholic opponents, who regarded Spain as a confessional ally. When he and other Huguenot leaders gathered in Paris for the marriage of the Protestant Henry of Navarre and the king's sister, Coligny's enemies attempted unsuccessfully to assassinate him on August 22, 1572. Two days later, the king ordered the slaughter of the Huguenot nobles lodged in the Louvre Palace and nearby private residences. Soldiers loyal to the extreme Catholic Duke of Guise murdered Coligny in the opening act of the infamous Saint Bartholomew's Day Massacre.

References and Further Reading

Crété, Liliane. Coligny. Paris: Fayard, 1985.

Hotman, François. La vie de Messire Gaspar de Colligny admiral de France (c. 1577). Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1987.

Shimizu, J. Conflict of Loyalties: Politics and Religion in the Career of Gaspard de Coligny, Admiral of France, 1519–1572. Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1972.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

COLLEGES

See Colleges, Protestant; Higher Education

COLLEGES, PROTESTANT

The American Protestant institutions of higher education developed from three types of institutions: (1) the medieval European monastic and cathedral schools; (2) the late medieval European societies of masters and students that, beginning in the thirteenth century, evolved into universities; and (3) more specifically, the models provided by the early modern British universities at Oxford, Cambridge, and Edinburgh and the fledgling dissenting academies in England and Scotland.

During the Colonial era, very few young men and essentially no women attended the largely Christian-oriented colleges in British North America. These institutions graduated fewer than 10,000 baccalaureate students before 1800. Of the “Colonial nine” institutions, only Benjamin Franklin’s University of Pennsylvania professed largely secular purposes. For most of the seventeenth century the Puritans/Congregationalists operated the only college, Harvard (founded 1636). Reluctantly, the oldest colony, Virginia, finally established William and Mary (Anglican) in 1693. Conservative Congregationalists opened Yale (founded 1701) in reaction to non-Calvinist and even Unitarian tendencies at Harvard. Five denominations began colleges when inspired by the First Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS): Princeton (1746, New Light Presbyterian), Kings/Columbia (1754, Anglican), Brown (1765, Baptist), Queens/Rutgers (1766, Dutch Reformed), and Dartmouth (1769, New Light Congregationalist).

Although ministers and other religious leaders were the primary founders of the colonial schools, established primarily to educate a native supply of future ministers, these early colleges never operated exclusively for that purpose. The institutions also sought to provide breadth of thought for other societal leaders including lawyers, doctors, teachers, and even country gentlemen. The percentage of ministerial graduates at seventeenth century Harvard was approximately fifty percent, but the percentage of ministerial graduates from Harvard, Yale, and Dartmouth combined before 1850 and at Princeton in the late eighteenth century was about twenty-five percent.

The first two generations of the newly independent United States witnessed arguably the most significant period of college growth in the history of the country. Between the Revolution and 1800, the number of new permanent colleges to appear was twice the colonial nine, and the total number of permanent colleges reached 180 by the CIVIL WAR. Meanwhile in the 1800 to 1860 era, the college student population grew four times faster (to 30,000) than did the general population (which increased from 5,300,000 to 31,400,000).

The major factors that contributed to this pre-Civil War growth included: (1) the spirit of the Second Great Awakening, especially as it affected two rapidly growing denominations, the Methodists (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA) and the Baptists; (2) the westward expansion; (3) the growing spirit of democratization and the resultant movement toward popular education; and (4) the growing tendency for local communities to want to have their own colleges for the general cultural advantages for all their people as well as the readily accessible educational opportunities (on the secondary as well as the higher level) for their youth.

The typical college to appear in the early nineteenth century was founded less often by a denomination than by individual preachers working with community leaders. It then operated less as a denominational institution than as a Christian community college that gained support from the members of a variety of denominations as well as the primarily affiliated one. Most often the large majority of the enrollees studied on the secondary level. The colleges welcomed this arrangement, as it generated enough income to warrant supplying college-level instruction for a limited number of students, and it helped to ensure a supply of college-ready students in this period when few communities operated secondary institutions.

After the Revolutionary War, individual states, beginning with Georgia in 1785, founded public colleges and universities; there were 22 major state universities in existence by the Civil War. With very few exceptions (most notably THOMAS JEFFERSON'S Virginia), these universities operated as primarily Protestant Christian institutions through much of the nineteenth century. Similarly, one could not sharply distinguish the private and public institutions of this period on the basis of the amount of public financing they received or how they were controlled. The contrasting features between the public and private institutions in the twentieth century appeared only gradually.

The curriculum of the old-time college emphasized the Greek and Latin languages and classics, mathematics, and, after the colonial period, some science. Typically the most popular courses throughout most of the nineteenth century were the senior-level set of classes, usually taught by the president, in what we now would call philosophy, religion, and the social sciences. The courses assumed such labels as mental philosophy, moral philosophy, intellectual philosophy, natural philosophy, evidences of Christianity, logic, and ethics. Surprisingly, a college almost never offered a course in biblical literature; the assumption was that the students learned the Scriptures on their own in study and worship groups. Essentially the curriculum was prescribed, and all students who matriculated together studied in the same set of classes for four years.

By far the most influential extracurricular activity in the antebellum period was the literary society. From its origins in the eighteenth century until its demise in the early twentieth century, the literary society provided the one major campus activity that the students controlled and operated. Most colleges had at least two societies that competed in a host of activities, intellectual no less than social. They vigorously recruited members, decorated their sometimes elegant halls, collected libraries that sometimes excelled over the college library, enforced their own set of rules and regulations, provided student services, and above all, competed with the rival society or societies in a set of public performance literary contests that included debate, oral declamation, and oral criticism. The emphasis on developing public persuasion skills served a practical purpose when such a high percentage of the students were preparing for careers in politics, law, the ministry, and teaching. Many of the students prepared for the contests with more intellectual rigor than they did for their classroom activities. The popularity of the literary societies declined when their social and competitive functions were replaced by intercollegiate athletics and fraternities and sororities, and when new generations of students began to prepare for a broader range of careers including those that relied less on the development of oral persuasion skills.

The post-Civil War period witnessed the founding of new schools to serve constituencies that previously had rarely attended college, that is, women, African Americans, and immigrant groups. Pre-twentieth century colleges begun for women and blacks operated almost without exception as strongly committed Christian colleges.

Noteworthy of the few colleges to admit African Americans before the Civil War were Wilberforce in Ohio and Berea in Kentucky. Most of the original students at Wilberforce were mulatto children of southern planters. After the war, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH acquired the institution, thus making it the first black-controlled college in America. Berea became the first college in a slave state to admit both blacks and whites. After the war, Northern American missionary societies opened more black Protestant colleges in the South than have been founded in all other periods (see MISSIONS, NORTH AMERICA; MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). The most effective of these church groups was the AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION of the Congregational Church, which opened, for example, Atlanta, Fisk, Hampton, Howard, Talladega, and Tougaloo. Before 1900 almost all African-American colleges were private Protestant institutions.

The eastern elite "Seven Sisters" colleges included Vassar (founded 1865), Wellesley (1870), Smith (1871), Radcliffe (1879), Bryn Mawr (1885), Barnard (1889), and Mount Holyoke (1893). Meanwhile in the South, Spelman opened in 1881 as the first college for black women. In contrast to the East and South, higher education for women in the more egalitarian West was coeducational, beginning in the early to middle part of the century. By 1873 the majority of coeducational colleges were in the western states. Most of the African-American colleges also operated as coeducational institutions.

Ethnic groups outside of the mainstream culture who founded colleges after the mid-nineteenth century included the Dutch Reformed groups (see DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH)—Reformed and Christian Reformed, especially in western Michigan; the Swedes and Norwegians, largely in the northern prairie and Plains states; and the German Brethren and the MENNONITES in the mid-Atlantic and midwestern states. The Dutch and the Scandinavians recognized the need for higher education, especially for their preachers and teachers, but the Brethren and Mennonites, although having been longer in the country, were very slow to accept the idea of higher education for any reason.

By the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the United States had become the leading industrial producer in the world. Some of the nouveaux riches used their wealth to found new or greatly enhanced institutions that had been founded by churches. These included Vanderbilt, Duke, and Emory with Methodist connections; Chicago by the Northern Baptist oil magnate, John D. Rockefeller; and Stetson, Baylor, and Wake Forest by the Southern Baptists.

Between approximately 1880 and 1960 American higher education in general changed its religious orientation to the point that by the late twentieth century it exerted primarily a negative effect on the spiritual orientation of its students. Whereas during the late nineteenth century nearly all institutions of higher education included religious goals among their aims for their students, by the early twentieth century perhaps only half did, and by mid-century, studies showed that the commitment to religious values by the average college student actually declined during the undergraduate years. The process of secularization followed this course: (1) the major state universities and some of the elite private institutions began the secularization process in the late nineteenth century; (2) the secondline state universities and more of the elite private schools followed in the early twentieth century; and (3) after 1920 most of the colleges of the mainline denominations began to follow the trend. During this intellectual revolution, American higher education changed from being a force that was much more Christian in nature than society in general, to the place where it is now—more secular than is the overall population.

Christian students, denominations, and parachurch organizations sought to counter the secular revolution in higher education through a variety of organizations, including the student-led Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) and Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA) chapters, the denominational foundation houses, and the Bible institutes and colleges. Between 1875 and 1940 the student Y's served as the single most significant religious presence in the lives of students in the majority of colleges and universities of all types. Originally a social and spiritual agency to serve the needs of city youth in an era of rapid industrialization and urbanization, the movement began funding chapters on college campuses on the eve of the Civil War and then grew rapidly to 40 chapters in 1877, 181 in 1884, 345 in 1891, 628 in 1900, and 731 with nearly 100,000 members in 1920. The campus chapters provided a variety of services for the students in a period before the development of the modern student activities offices; these included freshman orientation, book-exchange services, student employment and financial aid programs, and tutorial assistance.

The best known "Y" activities, however, included Bible study, mission promotion (especially through the Student Volunteer movement), and both on- and off-campus evangelistic activity.

The "university pastorate" or denominational student centers brought the major denominations to the campus where they provided a variety of services (e.g., worship, counseling, and fellowship) especially to help the students of their specific faiths to grow spiritually while the professors helped them to grow intellectually. Originating at the turn of the century, these denominational houses by 1930 operated on over 100 state and independent private campuses, and the movement continues to the present.

Since World War II, the most prominent intercollegiate and interdenominational student religious organizations have been INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP, Campus Crusade, and the Navigators. They continue the spirit of the Y movement even if they attract a much smaller percentage of the students.

Arising in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the Bible college movement for Christ began after the Y's but before the denominational student centers. This development was less a reaction to secularization in higher education than a result of three factors: (1) a response to the late nineteenth century revivalism of DWIGHT LYMAN MOODY and others (the Third Great Awakening); (2) an element in the movement toward popular education; and (3) a reaction against liberalism in American Protestantism. The Bible colleges primarily served a constituency that had not attended the secularizing schools. As undergraduate, theological institutions that have varied greatly in quality, Bible colleges sought to train Christian workers from the working classes to serve the underserved in Christian ministry—the lower classes in the American cities and remote areas and the neglected peoples on the mission field. By 1950 the Bible colleges provided a majority, and by 1980 the large majority of Protestant missionaries from this country. These twentieth-century American missionaries have inspired the founding of hundreds if not thousands of Bible colleges in Third World countries, thus making the Bible college one of the primary educational exports from America.

Meanwhile the small, denominational liberal arts colleges reached their low point of morale between the world wars, especially in the 1930s. Added to the secularizing effect in many of them were the travails of the nation's worst economic depression. Recovery began in the late 1940s as the GI Bill brought record numbers of students to colleges of all types. Also, by 1960 most of the church colleges that were going to secularize had already begun to do so; however, the secularizing church colleges tended to be the more affluent ones. Steadily the recovery process continued through the second half of the twentieth century to the point where the Christian colleges today are as strong economically and academically as they have been at any time since the secular revolution. The reasons for the recovery include factors that have aided higher education in general (e.g., a strong economy, the mounting popularity of attending college, increasing financial aid packages). In addition, since the 1950s the evangelical/conservative groups of the churchattending public (the segment that would be most likely to send its youth to the continuing Christian colleges) have grown faster than have the mainline churches. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, continuing Christian colleges numbered approximately 200 liberal arts institutions plus the Bible colleges.

References and Further Reading

- Brereton, Virginia L. Training God's Army: The American Bible Schools, 1880–1940. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Holmes, Arthur F. The Idea of a Christian College. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1975.
- Marsden, George. The Soul of the American University. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Ringenberg, William C. The Christian College: A History of Protestant Higher Education in America. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1984.
- Rudolph, Frederick. The American College and University. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990.
- Shedd, Clarence P. Two Centuries of Student Christian Movements. New York: Association Press, 1934.

WILLIAM C. RINGENBERG

COLLINS, ANTHONY (1676–1729)

English Deist. A freethinker and philosopher, Collins was born at Hounslow in Middlesex on June 21, 1676 of well-to-do parents, and was educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge before training in law at the Temple. In addition to serving for many years as justice of the peace and deputy lieutenant in Middlesex and in Essex, Collins was a man of letters and wrote extensively on theological and philosophical issues of the day, an interest that was nurtured in part through his friendship with JOHN LOCKE for two years until Locke's death in 1704. Collins accepted Locke's arguments for the reasonableness of Christianity and added the right and necessity to inquire into all subjects, including religion, freely and without fear, which he argued was the genius of the Protestant REFORMATION.

In his Essay Concerning the Use of Reason (1707), he argued that reason is "that faculty of the Mind whereby it perceives the Truth, Falsehood, Probability or Improbability of Propositions." Consistent with most Deists of the eighteenth century, Collins, in his Priesthood in Perfection (1710), attacked religious dogmas that were contrary to reason and argued that an appeal to mystery or AUTHORITY would not suffice. In A Discourse of Free-Thinking (1713) he championed the right to think freely and pointed out how the new science, the new philosophy, and the Reformation had exposed superstitions and pretenders to divine revelation. Collins advocated the application of historical-critical methods to the BIBLE as in any text in The Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724) and The Scheme of Literal Prophecy Considered (1725). Collins' argument was that since Jesus was understood as messiah, miracles were inadequate to sustain his messianic claim. Prophecy, the other traditional ground for proving the claims of Jesus, was also problematic since the notion of a literal fulfillment in Jesus could not be sustained. Despite a lifetime of controversy and attacks on his writings Collins died in 1729 as one of high personal repute and was buried in Oxford chapel.

See also Deism; Locke, John

References and Further Reading

Stephen, Leslie. History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century. London: Smith, Elder & Co., 1902.

Torrey, Norman. Voltaire and the English Deists. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1930.

TIMOTHY E.FULOP

COLONIALISM

Colonialism, often a loosely used term of abuse, is properly applied to a system of social, economic, political, and intellectual relationships in which one or several nations, states, or peoples are ruled by and their interests subordinated to another. Colonial systems, or empires, have been important features of the early modern and modern worlds. They have embodied various forms of institutional and cultural control, associated with Protestantism in four much-debated ways. Protestantism has influenced the establishment and consolidation of colonialism; it has played a part in colonialism's development, as forms of colonial administration and control have changed; and it has often shaped the conditions of life under colonialism as experienced by colonized people. Protestantism has also contributed to the progressive subversion and termination of colonialism since the eighteenth century, beginning with the American Revolution and War of Independence.

Protestant THEOLOGY and beliefs initially offered no obvious encouragement or sanction for either a general state-sponsored colonial enterprise or popular involvement in colonization. It was rather the fragmentation of Protestantism, religious conflict at home, and instincts of self-preservation that prompted the first Puritans in 1620 (see PURITANISM) and many others later to emigrate from ENGLAND to form their new, religiously disciplined and tight-knit communities in what became New England. But North American colonial settlement, like settlement in many other parts of the world, brought encounters with local peoples. Temporary alliances could not disguise the general pattern of misunderstandings, hostility, conflict, and dispossession that spawned an aggressive settlerdriven colonialism. Finding itself spurned by local inhabitants, Protestant Christianity was readily identified with white settler notions of civilization, as against the "savagery," "barbarism," and probable inconvertibility of indigenous people. Settlers, including the Germans and Dutch from continental Europe no less than the British, endorsed this intertwining of colonialism and Protestantism, which was also a potent source of solidarity in the face of Catholic FRANCE and Spain.

Early settlers were largely obliged to fend for themselves in matters of religion. However, formation of the SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (1699) and the SOCIETY FOR PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (1701) illustrated the Anglican wish within Britain's governing circles to provide ecclesiastical support for colonial societies. At first, this entailed providing libraries, schools, and colonial CLERGY; after the 1780s, it involved the establishment of colonial bishoprics. Other denominations in the eighteenth century also steadily developed trans-Atlantic networks in which preachers, funds, and literature moved to and fro. With its growing denominational rivalries, its powerful Protestant institutional and cultural cement, its varying degrees of religious indifference, and its authoritarian and exclusive attitudes towards indigenous peoples, this pattern of European settler colonialism was replicated elsewhere throughout the nineteenth century—in CANADA, SOUTH AFRICA, the Australian Colonies (see AUSTRALIA), and NEW ZEALAND.

From the mid-eighteenth century, there also developed a clear Protestant missionary commitment to the CONVERSION of the extra-European world. It was pushed on at first by the pietist revivalism of the Moravian Brethren and Wesleyan evangelicals (see MORAVIAN CHURCH; EVANGELICALISM METHODISM). It was informed by a fresh sense of obligation and providential direction, evident in the expansion of knowledge, communication, and trade symbolized in Captain James Cook's Pacific voyages of the 1770s. It was taken up by the principal denominations—BAPTISTS, Congregationalists, Anglicans, Presbyterians, and Methodists—and from the 1790s was systematically organized chiefly by voluntary lay societies, not only in Britain, but also from Boston to Basel and Berlin (see CONGREGATIONALISM ANGLICANISM; PRESBYTERIANISM). Still lacking any specific colonial commitment, Protestant MISSIONS were also kept at arm's length by colonial authorities. Often with good reason, West Indian planters, Cape colonists, and East India Company officials in INDIA all saw Protestant EVANGELISM and church or chapel building as seriously disruptive of colonial control, hierarchy, and the good order essential to commerce.

Protestant expansion nevertheless carried with it not only religious ideas, but also aspects of Western culture—the printing press, books, schools, GENDER relations, technology, and medicine. Indigenous peoples, both governments and individuals, and gradually colonial rulers as well learned to appreciate the value of missionary activity for its secular attributes. Missions in turn saw the advantages of negotiating a place for themselves with local rulers and colonial officials. Protestant influence thus spread widely, not only in formal colonies (especially those belonging to Britain), but also beyond their borders. Converts were always fewer in number than those who had been affected in other ways by Protestant teaching or example, but already by the mid-nineteenth century, local “native” evangelists and pastors rather than Western missionaries were the mainstay of Protestant expansion and the developing churches.

Explicit support from Protestants for colonialism has nevertheless varied greatly in time and place. It has fluctuated with the shifting balance between belief in the fundamental equality of humankind (strong in the late eighteenth and mid-twentieth centuries) and fears (especially between 1850 and 1914) that racial character and cultural attainment were biological constants. The former led Protestants to question both the necessity for colonialism and its likely duration; the latter, pessimistic in its assessment of the possibilities for “progress,” encouraged the view that colonialism was indispensable. Support has perhaps been strongest in those territories—for example, many parts of late nineteenth-century AFRICA or CHINA—where missions and converts felt in sore need of security and protection, and where Western governments looked to the presence of their own nationals in asserting colonial claims against rivals.

The extent to which the impact of a Protestant presence and following can be equated with colonialism has long been hotly debated. From the mid-nineteenth century onward, Protestant missionaries themselves were often anxious to separate Christianity from Western civilization and CULTURE. Some came to see in Christianity the fulfillment of local religious belief and custom, or avoided altogether operating within the formal structures of colonialism. Others emphasized the role of Protestants as intermediaries between colonial rulers and the ruled, as defenders of indigenous rights at law and to land or labor, and as moderating influences on otherwise secular societies. Equally contested, especially by anthropologists and historians, has been the degree to which Protestant Christianity has either undermined indigenous cultures or has subverted colonial domination. Have they weakened the traditional bonds of local communities by questioning customary ways, and so opened the door to an intensified colonialism? Or have they facilitated the adaptation of local societies—through literacy, education, and new forms of social organization—to the point where Protestantism and resistance to colonialism have become not synonymous but often inseparable? In China from the late 1890s to the 1930s, the enormous growth of American Protestant interests provoked powerful expressions of Chinese religious independence and DISSENT. From John Chilembwe to Julius Nyerere, indigenous Protestants have certainly been prominent, above all in colonial Africa, both as political leaders and as vocal minority communities in the twentieth-century political struggle for independence. In part as a consequence of this involvement, especially since the 1920s and 1930s, Protestantism has flourished where colonialism in any formal political sense has long since disappeared.

References and Further Reading

- Comaroff, Jean, and Comaroff, John. Of Revelation and Revolution: I, Christianity, Colonialism and Consciousness in South Africa; II, The Dialectics of Modernity on a South African Frontier. 2 vols. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1991, 1997.
- Fieldhouse, D.K. The Colonial Empires: A Comparative Survey From the Eighteenth Century. London: Macmillan, 1966; reprint 1982.
- Hastings, Adrian. The Church in Africa, 1450–1950. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Louis, William Roger, ed. The Oxford History of the British Empire. 5 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998–1999.
- Neill, S.C. Colonialism and Christian Missions. London: Lutterworth, 1966.
- Osterhammel, Jürgen. Colonialism: A Theoretical Overview. English translation. Princeton, NJ: Markus Wiener; Kingston, Jamaica: Ian Randle, 1997.
- Stanly, Brian. The Bible and the Flag: Protestant Missions and British Imperialism in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Leicester, UK: Apollon, 1990.

ANDREW PORTER

COMENIUS, JOHN (KOMENSKY, JAN AMOS) (1592–1670)

Czech pedagogue and theologian. Comenius is best known for his innovations in methods of pedagogy. Comenius served as the pastor and last bishop of the Unity of Brethren (Unitas Fratrum), a small Czech Protestant group inspired by the Hussite movement of the fifteenth century and later revived as the MORAVIAN CHURCH under Count NIKOLAUS VON ZINZENDORF (1700–1760).

Life

Born in the Moravian village of Nivnice on March 28, 1592, Comenius lost both parents to the plague at the age of twelve. He began his formal education at the age of sixteen at the Latin school of P_erov. His scholarly abilities won him the recognition of the Moravian noble Charles the Elder of Žerotin, who had himself studied with Theodore Beza (1519–1605) in Geneva and was eager to send capable Czech students abroad to study in Calvinist centers of learning. With Žerotin's patronage, Comenius matriculated at the Reformed gymnasium of Herborn in 1611, where he studied with several leading continental scholars, most notably Johann Heinrich Alsted (1588–1638). Alsted's anti-Aristotelian approach to learning, his chiliasm, and his work as an encyclopedist significantly influenced Comenius's own thought and future endeavors. Continuing his studies at Heidelberg, Comenius benefited from the irenic and ecumenical spirit of the Reformed scholar David Pareus (1548–1622).

He returned to Moravia in 1614, taught for two years at P_erov, and in 1616 was ordained a minister in his church. With the outbreak of the Thirty Years War in 1618 and the Hapsburg victory at the Battle of White Mountain in 1620, Protestant leaders were forced to flee. Comenius himself went into hiding, and under trying circumstances began writing The Labyrinth of the World and the Paradise of the Heart (1623), a masterpiece of Czech literature and Protestant spirituality. In 1628 Comenius led a band of the Bohemian Brethren into exile in Leszno, POLAND, where he served as pastor of this refugee community and di-rector of the local gymnasium. As Protestants had been officially expelled from Bohemia and Moravia, he never returned to his homeland but spent the remainder of his life as a wandering scholar in several European countries. Comenius died on November 15, 1670.

Educational and Pansophic Endeavors

Comenius was a polymath who worked in many different fields, but he is best known as a pedagogical reformer. He criticized the educational methods of his day, especially the emphasis on rote memorization and recitation, and proposed instead a system that drew analogies from the natural world and favored the concrete over the abstract. Many of his pedagogical principles were presented in his treatise The Great Didactic (). His Janua linguarum reserata (1631) attempted to implement some of his innovations in teaching and his Orbis sensualium pictus (1658) was one of the first illustrated schoolbooks for children. Both these textbooks were soon translated into many European languages, and the Orbis was popular for the next two centuries.

These pedagogical works were expressions of a broader vision to reform all of human society through education. Comenius was a leading representative of the late Renaissance movement known as pansophism, which sought the underlying harmony of the universe and attempted to unite all science, philosophy, and religion on that basis. He spelled out his program for the unification of knowledge and a universal system of education in a seven-volume work entitled A General Consultation Concerning the Improvement of Human Affairs (). Emphasizing both human rationality and divine revelation, Comenius sought truth on both an empirical and mystical level. This approach to knowledge brought him into conflict with the French philosopher Rene Descartes (1596–1650), whose strict division between mind and matter Comenius found unacceptable. His pedagogical and pansophic proposals drew the attention of many other leading intellectuals and rulers of his era. He accepted an invitation from ENGLAND to establish a pansophic college there, but his plans were thwarted by the outbreak of the English civil war. The American Puritan John Winthrop, Jr. (1606–1676) seems to have hoped that the noted Czech educator-theologian would accept a position as the first president of Harvard College. Comenius was also involved in educational initiatives in SWEDEN and in Sárospatak, HUNGARY.

Theology and Religious Leadership

Comenius's untiring dedication to pedagogical reform stemmed partly from his conviction that education would pave the way for an ecumenical religious settlement in a confessionally fractured Europe. He perceived all his educational and pansophic endeavors as part of his broader calling as a theologian. Central to his theology and spirituality and bracketing his long career are the Labyrinth (1623) and Unum necessarium (1668). While these works reveal a Christocentric spirituality akin to that of the early Pietists and a biblicism indebted to the German Reformed tradition in which Comenius was educated, they also reflect the theology of the Unitas Fratrum. In keeping with elements of his own tradition, Comenius stressed the importance of a personal relationship with Christ, the need for an ecumenical reformation, and a theology of hope. The development of this last theme was most problematic for Comenius's reception because it was intertwined with his chiliastic views. These have led some interpreters to dismiss Comenius as a fanatic.

As a religious leader Comenius helped maintain the faith and vision of his church through its final days. The 1648 Peace of Westphalia, which marked the end of the Thirty Years War, was a bitter disappointment for the Bohemian Brethren, for it dashed their hopes of religious liberty in their homeland. In the same year Comenius was consecrated as the last bishop of the Unitas Fratrum, but his church would soon fall prey to the political intrigues of the day. Comenius foresaw and reflected on its imminent demise as a unified body in The Bequest of the Unity of Brethren, a short treatise reflecting many of the beliefs of the Brethren as well as his own theological and ecumenical vision. War between Poland and Sweden led to Comenius's final exile at age sixty-four. He ended his prolific career as a refugee in the NETHERLANDS, where he continued to promote educational reforms as well as political and confessional peace, until his death November 15, 1670.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Comenius, John. The Labyrinth of the World and the Paradise of the Heart. Translated and introduced by Howard Louthan and Andrea Sterk. New York: Paulist Press, 1998.

———. The Bequest of the Unity of Czech Brethren. Translated and edited by M.Spinka, Chicago: National Union of Czechoslovak Protestants, 1940.

Secondary Sources:

Bløkestad, Milada. Comenius. Versuch eines Umrisses von Leben, Werk und Schicksal des Jan Amos Komensky. Oslo: 1969.

Spinka, Matthew. John Amos Comenius: That Incomparable Moravian. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1943.

ANDREA STERK

COMMUNICATION

See Best Sellers in America, Religious; Mass Media; Publishing, Media; Televangelism

COMMUNION

See Lord's Supper

COMMUNION TABLES

In Protestant tradition, this is the table at which the Communion meal (Lord's Supper) or sacrament is served. The use of COMMUNION tables developed early in the REFORMATION period as Protestant reformers lambasted the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION and notions of the sacrament as a reenactment of Christ's sacrifice, views closely associated with the use of a consecrated ALTAR. Among the first of the Protestant reformers to substitute a table for the altar was HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, who in 1525 served a Communion meal at a table placed between the nave and the choir during the Maundy Thursday service in the Great Minster, Zurich. This table was intended to approximate the original Passover meal at which Christ initiated the Communion ritual and to demonstrate the understanding of the sacrament as symbolic of Christ's gift of GRACE and the gathering of the spiritual community of the CHURCH.

Protestants widely adopted the COMMUNION table in the late sixteenth century, and placed it as near the congregation as possible, abandoning the chancel as the location for the sacrament. In ENGLAND, Archbishop WILLIAM LAUD reversed this process by stipulating that COMMUNION tables be located in the chancel and enclosed by rails, a directive that stirred significant controversy, as Puritans (see PURITANISM) argued that the sacrament of community affirmation required that participants sit as equals around a table (rather than kneel at an altar rail), breaking the bread themselves and passing it on.

Communion tables emulate domestic tables, are typically made of wood, and feature no overt religious symbols. Easily moved and stored when not in use, wooden tables suited the Reformed Christian reduction in the frequency of the sacrament, which was celebrated between four and twelve times each year. Scottish Presbyterians set up tables outdoors during sacramental festivals or placed several down the center aisle of churches. Congregationalists in New England devised hinged tables attached to pews and pulpits that could be lowered when not in use. Telescoping tables were used in England during the Commonwealth. Tables with drawers were used in the UNITED STATES during the Federal period. Presbyterian and Puritan sacramental services included a rhetorical segment called "fencing of the table," in which the minister warned the unworthy to abstain from Communion. A variety of cloths have been used to cover Communion tables.

In Reformed denominations, the permanent placement of the table beneath the elevated pulpit became popular in the eighteenth century. But with the development of the raised pulpit platform in the nineteenth century, the table again became peripatetic, appearing sometimes in front of the platform and, in the case of platforms with moveable pulpits, sometimes centered on the platform.

With the rise of ECUMENISM in the twentieth century and renewed emphasis on Christian community, the table gained wider use as the center of liturgical space. Many Catholics, following suggestions made by the Vatican II Council, and some Lutherans and Episcopalians substituted tables for their altars. Reformed groups joined them in rearranging WORSHIP space, often placing a large table in the center of the room and arranging the seats around it in a ring.

See also Architecture, Church; Liturgy; Sacraments; Presbyterianism; Congregationalism; Lutheranism; Anglicanism

References and Further Reading

- Benes, Peter, and Phillip D. Zimmerman. New England Meeting House and Church: 1630–1850. Boston: Boston University and The Currier Gallery of Art for the Dublin Seminar for New England Folklife, 1979.
- Cox, J. Charles, and Alfred Harvey. English Church Furniture. London: Methuen, 1907.
- Potter, G. R. Zwingli. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Schmidt, Leigh Eric. Holy Fairs: Scottish Communion and American Revivals in the Early Modern Period. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.

White, James F. Protestant Worship and Church Architecture: Theological and Historical Considerations. New York: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Zimmerman, Philip D. "The Lord's Supper in Early New England: The Setting and the Service." In New England Meeting House and Church: 1630–1850, edited by Peter Benes for the Dublin Seminar for New England, 124–134. Boston, MA: Boston University Press, 1979.

JEANNE HALGREN KILDE

COMMUNISM

Communism is the communal ownership of goods with the concomitant abrogation of private property. Two forms of communism may be distinguished: religious communism and political communism. In Protestantism, religious communism made its appearance among the adherents of the "Radical Reformation" such as Thomas Münster or the Münster Anabaptists. The HUTTERITES made the abrogation of private property one of their principal tenets. Subsequent representatives of Protestant groupings disavowing personal property can be found in 17th century England and later (Moravian Brethren, Shakers, etc.). In all instances, the argumentation rests on the precedent of the earliest Christian community as described in the Book of Acts and on Jesus's strictures against money and wealth. Political communism, likewise of long history, is expressed in modernity primarily in terms of the thought of Karl Marx (1818–1883). Marx and his successor Friedrich Engels advocated economic reforms to liberate workers from capitalist exploitation by abolishing private property and redistributing resources according to need. According to Marxism, religion justified the exploitation of the masses; the oppressed turned to religion to explain their tragic situation and to anticipate future rewards. Marxist economic reform, therefore, eliminates the need for religion.

Marxist religious and economic principles were translated into the first Communist party in RUSSIA in 1917. Vladimir Lenin was the first to implement a program of religious persecution. Church-owned property was seized, religious teaching ceased, the authority of the Orthodox Church was limited, and religious leaders (Orthodox, Catholic, and Baptist) were harassed, imprisoned, and killed.

Other Communist states replicated Russia's religious persecution. Christians in these countries responded variously to atheistic state policies; some complied with compulsory registration, whereas others formed "underground" churches and resistance movements (notably the Baptist Iniatsiivniki). Western visitors were shown only registered churches, and thus misinformation regarding the extent of persecution spread. Many ecumenical groups and mainline denominations remained silent, while parachurch organizations (mostly Protestant) and research institutes (e.g., Keston College) revealed and boldly criticized persecution and aided underground Christians.

With the Communist reform policy of glasnost, and eventually the fall of Communism in Russia and Eastern Europe in the 1980s and 1990s, religious groups saw more freedom, and the degree of persecution was globally exposed.

See also China; Socialism, Christian; Orthodoxy, Eastern; Baptists

References and Further Reading

- Boase, Paul H. The Rhetoric of Christian Socialism. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Bourdeaux, Michael. The Gospel's Triumph Over Communism. Minneapolis, MN: Bethany House, 1991.
- Christensen, Torben. Origin and History of Christian Socialism, 1848–1854. Aarhus: Universitetsforlaget, 1962
- Dombrowski, James. The Early Days of Christian Socialism in America. New York: Octagon Books, 1966.
- Elliott, Mark, ed. Christianity and Marxism Worldwide: An Annotated Bibliography. Wheaton, IL: Institute for the Study of Christianity and Marxism, 1989.
- Friedmann, Robert. The Christian Communism of the Hutterian Brethren. Espanola, WA: Paul S.Gross, 1971.
- Murchland, Bernard. The Dream of Christian Socialism: An Essay on Its European Origins. Washington, DC: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, 1982.
- Ramet, Sabrina Petra, ed. Protestantism and Politics in Eastern Europe and Russia. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1992.

KRISTI UPSON-SAIA

CONCORD, BOOK OF

See Book of Concord

CONE, JAMES HAL (1938-)

Theologian. James Hal Cone was born in Fordyce, Arkansas, on August 5, 1938 to Charles M. and Lucille Cone. In 1958 he received a B.A. from Philander Smith College, in Arkansas. He then attended Garrett Theological Seminary in Evanston, Illinois, where he received a B.D. degree in 1961. Four years later Cone was awarded a Ph.D. from Garrett- and Northwestern jointly. His dissertation focused on the doctrine of man in the theology of Karl Barth.

Cone married Rose Hampton and they had four children. His teaching career began at Philander Smith College as assistant professor in 1964. He also served as assistant minister at the Woodlawn African Methodist Episcopal Church. He became assistant professor at Adrian College in Michigan in 1966, and in 1969 went to Union Theological Seminary in New York, where he became assistant professor of systematic theology.

In the summer after Martin Luther King, Jr.'s death, Cone wrote his landmark volume, Black Theology and Black Power (1969). This book marked his radical break with white European theology. He introduced the term “black theology” into religious discourse. This book was quickly followed by a more systematic statement of theology in the spirit of the Black Power Movement and the pronouncement of black church leaders (The National Committee of Black Churchmen). The latter volume was entitled A Black Theology of Liberation (1986).

Cone stressed the “liberation from oppression” theme religiously and culturally. Jesus and the Bible were called as witnesses to his liberation motif theology. God, in Jesus, a Jew, was identified in history with the oppressed. God, through Christ, demonstrated a willingness to suffer for liberation of op-pressed humanity. Blackness became the ultimate symbol of this suffering God who would liberate the oppressed.

Cone’s theology was readily received by black religious leaders. It was the proper articulation of the Gospel of freedom in the black church and community. It set off a serious dialogue within and without black religious and academic circles, stimulating much discussion by other black religious thinkers.

Cone’s book, Martin and Malcolm and America: A Dream on a Nightmare (1991) is representative of his mature theology. From the outset, the influence of Malcolm X and Martin Luther King, Jr. on Cone was evident. However, the volume is helpful in revealing these influences on his decades of reflection. Cone’s Risks of Faith (1999) sums up his witness as a theo- logian.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Cone, James Hal. My Soul Looks Back. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1982.
 ——. Speaking the Truth: Ecumenism, Liberation and Black Theology. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1986.
 ——. A Black Theology of Liberation. 2nd Edition, Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987.
 ——. God of the Oppressed. Rev. ed. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1987.
 ——. For the People: Black Theology and the Black Church. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1994.

J.DEOTIS ROBERTS

CONFERENCE

Conference is a POLITY concept that has been effectively used by Methodists since their beginning in the eighteenth century. Many Methodist denominations are structured as connectional systems of conferences. For example, in the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, the largest Methodist denomination, every congregation is affiliated with a local charge conference. Charge conferences send at least one delegate to a regional annual conference. Annual conferences send delegates to a Jurisdictional or Central conference and to the denomination’s General Conference.

The conference concept is rooted in the thought of Methodism’s founder, JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791). Wesley identified “Christian conference” as one of the principal means by which God’s GRACE is conveyed to Christian people. He was convinced that Christians need to associate with other Christians to become and remain mature in their faith. Fellowship and conversation are gifts made possible by divine grace to assist them. The early Methodist societies and their small groups (bands and classes) were designed to provide Christian conference.

As a structural feature of METHODISM, “conference” usually refers to the manner in which the various Methodist denominations have organized to consider mission, determine policy, and set strategy. Wesley initiated this type of conference structure in June 1744 when he gathered a few sympathetic Anglican clergymen and his lay preachers in London to consult on fundamental theological and ministerial issues. They considered, “1. What to teach; 2. How to teach; and 3. What to do....” (Davies 1988:IV,67). Wesley met annually thereafter with most of his preachers, and this conference became the predominant means of managing the Methodist movement. Among its most important functions were the selection, training, and appointment of preachers to their ministries. After Wesley’s death, the conference became more powerful and remains the principal governing body in British Methodism. In the nineteenth century, lay people were given voice and vote in the British conference.

Shortly after his arrival in America, Thomas Rankin (1738–1810), one of the lay preachers Wesley dispatched to the colonies, convened the first annual conference of Methodist preachers in June 1773 in Philadelphia. Like its British counterpart, this was a spiritual brotherhood that managed the fledgling movement. American Methodists have held annual conferences ever since.

With Wesley’s blessing, the American Methodist preachers held a “Christmas Conference” in Baltimore, Maryland, in December 1784, (see BALTIMORE CONFERENCE) at which they formally organized the Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC). As the new church grew, geographical considerations prompted the MEC to organize regional annual conferences of its preachers, each presided over by a bishop (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY). In 1792 the MEC held its first General Conference, to which all of its ordained preachers in full connection with annual conferences were invited. Among its other actions, the General Conference claimed authority to legislate for the church, to revise its official book of DOCTRINE and discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE), and to meet every four years thereafter.

At the 1796 General Conference, the boundaries of six geographical annual conferences (New England, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Virginia, South Carolina, and Western) were fixed. As the church continued to grow, the 1808 General Conference adopted a plan for a delegated General Conference to which the various annual conferences sent elected representatives. As the supreme legislative body of the MEC, the General Conference was often the scene of bitter and divisive debate. For instance, the 1844 MEC General Conference debate over SLAVERY resulted in a denominational schism and the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

The quadrennial General Conference remains the preeminent legislative body of the larger Methodist denominations, that is, United Methodist, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION, and Christian Methodist Episcopal churches. The General Conference authorizes revisions to the denominations’ official Books of Discipline. With the exception of The United Methodist Church, the General Conference of these churches also elects bishops who serve as their chief executive officers. United Methodists elect bishops at their quadrennial Jurisdictional (U.S.) or Central (outside the U.S.) conferences. All four denominations are also organized into regional annual conferences. After considerable discussion and negotiation, mostly in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, each of these churches granted lay people (see LAITY) the right to serve as delegates at General Conference in equal numbers with the CLERGY. They have also sought lay/clergy voting parity in their annual conferences.

Many Methodist or Methodist-related denominations in nations other than the UNITED STATES also utilize a conference structure. British Methodism holds an annual delegated conference that serves as its supreme legislative body (see METHODISM, ENGLAND). The Korean Methodist Church is organized with a General Conference and annual conferences. Other denominations may have a General Conference and annual conferences or their equivalent that may bear a different name, for example, archdiocese and diocese (Methodist Church Nigeria) or regions (Methodist Church in Brazil).

Conferences, whether local, annual, or denominational, usually produce reports of their ministries. Most annual conferences publish annual journals of their work that include reports, a record of proceedings, and a list of the names and addresses of their churches, clergy, and representative lay people. Thorough records of General Conferences are also published. These records and publications serve as primary historical documents of the denomination's ministry.

References and Further Reading

- Baker, Frank. "The People Called Methodists: 3. Polity." In A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, vol. 1. Edited by Rupert Davies and Gordon Rupp. London: Epworth Press, 1965.
- Davies, Rupert, A. Raymond George, and Gordon Rupp. A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, vol. 4. London: Epworth Press, 1988.
- Frank, Thomas E. Polity, Practice, and the Mission of The United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1997.
- Kirby, James E., Russell E. Richey, and Kenneth E. Rowe. The Methodists. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1996.
- Richey, Russell E. The Methodist Conference in America. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1996.
- CHARLES YRIGOYEN

CONFESSING CHURCH

Confessing Church (Bekennende Kirche) was the name adopted in the spring of 1934 by one section of the German Evangelical Church. The group mobilized support from both pastors and laity in opposition to the rival section that called itself the "Faith Movement of German Christians" and insisted on a Christianity purged of all semitic influences. The feud between these contenders for the allegiance of German Protestants lasted through the Nazi era.

Origins and Establishment

The “GERMAN CHRISTIANS” welcomed Adolf Hitler’s advent to power in January 1933 and supported the Nazi political platform, including the purging from German society of all Jewish elements. They wanted to adopt similar goals in the life and structures of the German Evangelical Church. In the church elections of July 1933 they gained control of most of the administrative positions in a majority of the provincial branches of the church. Under the leadership of Hitler’s appointee as Reich Bishop, Ludwig Müller, they planned to remove pastors of Jewish origin from their offices, at the national synod to be held in September 1933.

However, such a challenge to the church’s autonomy, especially when drawn from an outside political source, prompted a vigorous response. The beginnings of what became the Confessing Church occurred when a group of Berlin pastors, under the leadership of MARTIN NIEMÖLLER, formed the Pastors Emergency League, whose aim was to defend ORTHODOXY in doctrine and the autonomy of the church structures, and to prevent the adoption of measures drawn from ideological movements, such as National Socialism.

During the winter months of 1933–1934 opponents of the Nazification of the church recognized the need for a theologically defensible manifesto. At the Synod of Barmen in May 1934, under KARL BARTH’S leadership, they produced the Barmen Confession (see BARMEN DECLARATION), which was to become the main platform of the Confessing Church for the remainder of the Nazi period. The six articles of the Barmen Confession affirmed both the independence of the Church from any politically influenced interference, and the need to uphold the supremacy of Christian witness over against alternative ideologies. They specifically rejected the totalitarian claims of the state both over the church (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW) and in the political field.

The significance of the Barmen Confession lay in its successful definition of Christian involvement in politics and the limits of Christian loyalty to the state. By rejecting the heretical ideas and practices of the “German Christians,” the Confessing Church steadfastly maintained the view that it alone constituted the “true Church.”

The result was a complex and often confusing situation. In the majority of provinces, particularly the largest, Prussia, the Confessing Church formed a minority, refusing to acknowledge the authority of the now “German Christian”-controlled bureaucracy. Instead, a rival structure, claiming to be the true inheritor of past traditions, gained support from those parishes willing to pay the price of defiance. Only in three provinces, Hannover, Bavaria, and Württemberg, was the Confessing Church in a majority, and so retained control of the church administration. De facto, if not de jure, there were now two German Evangelical Churches, which led to incessant conflicts within parishes at the local level. Personal, local, and political differences frequently reinforced the basic theological disagreements. The strength of the Confessing Church lay in its refusal to compromise. Its pastors, for example, rescinded their loyalty to “German Christian” bishops, refused to accept communications from diocesan offices, and resolutely defended their own congregations from unwanted interference. They formed local, provincial, and national Councils of Brethren (Brüderräte), which exercised doctrinal and practical authority and which were organized on a presbyterian model, drawn from the Reformed tradition.

Political Implications

In the eyes of the Confessing Church leadership, their stance was adopted solely for theological reasons. At no time did the Confessing Church seek to play the role of leading opposition to the secular goals of the Nazi Party, nor to organize resistance to the increasing tyranny that was to engulf the whole country. Their more limited ambition was to defend the autonomy and doctrine of the church against evident distortion and heresy by the “German Christians.” Later criticized as short-sighted, it was principally attributed to three factors. First, these men were theologians, not politicians, and they often sought to draw a strict line between theological definitions and political controversy. Throughout the Confessing Church, loyalty to Hitler was professed by both CLERGY and LAITY. The vast majority did not recognize, nor were they prepared to admit, that these political loyalties were incompatible with their church professions.

The second factor was the Lutheran tradition of respect for the ruling power (see LUTHERANISM). There was no history of organized DISSENT. The third factor was the no less inhibiting condition that most of the Evangelical clergy refused to be committed to any political involvement, either with the “German Christians” or with the Confessing Church. The ingrained tradition of PIETISM maintained the belief that “politics do not concern the church,” whose goal was the search for personal, not political, salvation. As a result, the Confessing Church leaders were unsuccessful in mobilizing the majority of church members to a critical opposition to the Nazis’ authority except on matters directly affecting church life and doctrine. Basically, no part of the German Evangelical Church, including the Confessing Church, had a theology adequate to mount any sustained attack on the actions of its political rulers, and for that reason, even at the end of the Nazi era, there was no more than what has been called a “reluctant resistance.”

This position was easily and often deliberately misunderstood. The political authorities, from Hitler downward, interpreted the Confessing Church’s stance as a political act of disobedience. The fulsome declarations of national loyalty made by Confessing Church leaders and supporters were regarded as hypocritical dissimulation. So, too, the “German Christians” regarded the Confessing Church pastors’ and parishes’ defiance as insubordination, motivated for church-political reasons. They sought to bring these dissenters to heel, using the highly political argument that the church must show its dedication to and unity with the National Socialist state and its leaders. Refusal to endorse such a platform was regarded as political treachery rather than theological obduracy.

The Nazis’ expectation that the German Evangelical Church would willingly allow itself to be “coordinated” into the new regime’s totalitarian plans was shattered by the determined opposition of the Confessing Church. In 1934 it became clear that this recalcitrance would not be overcome by the hamhanded activities of the “German Christian” authorities. In 1935 Hitler ordered the creation of a new Ministry of Church Affairs under a Nazi stalwart, Hanns Kerrl, although his plans for a more positive relationship seemed to presage yet another breach of the church’s autonomy. Furthermore, Kerrl’s policies were known to be continually under attack from his own more radical colleagues, who successfully undermined his authority. By 1938 the dominant Nazi policy toward the Confessing Church was one of confrontation and suppression. At the outbreak of the war in 1939 Hitler ordered the cessation of all antichurch moves, although this did not stop the Gestapo from continuing its campaign to destroy the influence of the clergy, and especially of the Confessing Church. Had the war ended with a Nazi victory, there can be little doubt that the staunch defiance of the Confessing Church would have been ruthlessly eliminated.

For their part, the members of the Confessing Church were to become increasingly divided in their opinions about the moral and political legitimacy of the Nazi state and its policies. Already in 1935 this division could be observed between the “moderates,” particularly in the so-called intact provinces of Bavaria, Hannover, and Württemberg, and the more “radical” wing, especially in the “destroyed” province of Prussia, under the leadership of the “Dahlemites,” so called from the name of Niemöller’s parish in Berlin. The former continued to uphold their traditional obedience to the existing political authorities, refused to encourage open acts of defiance, and instead sought accommodation by working within the limits of the Nazi system. The latter, or “Dahlemite” group, even though maintaining their patriotic loyalty to the German nation, came to see the Nazi policies in the church sphere as unacceptable, and were, if necessary, prepared to accept the consequences of dissent. However, only a handful of these Confessing Church supporters were ready to recognize that the regime they served was determined to implement criminal policies of military aggression and racial persecution and genocide without regard to established law or ethics. Hence only a few far-sighted opponents of the regime, such as Pastor DIETRICH BONHOEFFER, were to become actively involved in the Resistance Movement, and eventually to pay the price of its failure.

Conflicting Dilemmas and Witness in the Face of Persecution

The Confessing Church’s ambivalence toward the Nazi regime was well illustrated in 1935 when 700 pastors, mainly in Prussia, were arrested for defying Nazi regulations. In 1936 the radical wing prepared, and sent privately to Hitler, a strong protest against the regime’s policies, such as the extension of the concentration camp system and the increasing persecution of the Jews. By some error, this document was publicized in a Swiss newspaper. The authors were at once accused of national treachery and forced to retreat. Such actions reinforced the Gestapo’s repressive intentions. In July 1937 Martin Niemöller was arrested together with some fifty other leading Confessing Church figures. Despite worldwide intercessions for his release, he was held without bail for nine months until a show trial was held, heavily orchestrated by Joseph Goebbels’s Propaganda Ministry. The judges, however, returned a verdict of not guilty on the major charges, and declared that Niemöller’s minor infractions of the law had been fully expiated by his months in prison. Hitler was not to be defied, however. Niemöller was immediately rearrested and remained incarcerated until the end of the war.

The subsequent wave of intimidation by the Gestapo saw numerous pastors arrested for various alleged breaches of Nazi ordinances. Most sentences were short, designed to compel submission in the future, although a few pastors paid a stiffer price, such as Paul Schneider, who was sent to Buchenwald concentration camp in November 1937 and put to death there eighteen months later, the first pastor of the Confessing Church to lose his life as a result of Nazi persecution.

With the loss of its most pugnacious leader, Niemöller, and the enforced exile of its most distinguished theologian, Karl Barth, the Confessing Church inevitably suffered grave doubts about its future. Both the desire to maintain political loyalty and the pragmatic pressures to conform counseled an opportunistic compromise with the official church authorities. Others, however, remained staunch in their witness to the Gospel. In September 1938, on the occasion of the Sudetenland crisis and with the threat of imminent war, the Confessing Church leaders wrote a special Peace Liturgy, calling on the church members to repent, and asking for God's forgiveness of the personal and corporate sins of all nations, including their own. The Munich Conference was then announced and this liturgy was never circulated. However, a copy fell into Nazi hands and was seen as final and irrefutable proof of the Confessing Church's political treachery against Hitler's leadership. Cowed and intimidated by such virulent attacks, the Confessing Church made no response two months later to the outrageous and very public crimes of the anti-Jewish Crystal Night pogrom.

The constant threat of Gestapo surveillance and interrogation, or even of imprisonment in a concentration camp, and the unpredictability of such repressive attacks, lay heavily upon all Confessing Church members. To be sure, gestures of solidarity were made, such as the intercessory reading out during the Sunday services of the names of those members arrested, banished, or forbidden by the Gestapo to preach, although even these "Fürbittenlisten" were problematic in that it was virtually impossible to distinguish between those punished for purely theological protests and those accused of political agitation. This menacing repression created almost irreconcilable and paralyzing dilemmas for the pastors affected. Their desire to serve their congregations without conflict with the authorities, and their continuing national ties, were in reality incompatible with their theological insights and obligations, although only a small handful were prepared to recognize this fact.

In this atmosphere of doubt and uncertainty, the Confessing Church took no action as the clouds of war gathered in 1939. The same conflict of loyalties increased when the outbreak of war led to the escalation of violence and the perpetration of atrocities. The Nazi campaign during 1939–1940 for the so-called euthanasia of the mentally ill met with the same ambivalent response from the Confessing Church as had been the case earlier. Their refusal to challenge the Nazi state publicly, and their preference for private remonstrances, even if ignored, was a truly frustrating situation for the few who called for more decisive action based on Christian moral imperatives.

This crisis of conscience only increased as the news began to percolate about the atrocities committed on the eastern front and against the Jews. At a time of unprecedented challenge to their moral courage and conscience, all save a handful of Confessing Church members continued to turn a blind eye on events, or retreated into apathetic indifference as bystanders. Not until 1943 did Bishop Theophilus Wurm of Württemberg protest privately to the Nazi authorities against the ongoing breaches of God's moral commandments. In October 1943 the Confessing Church's Prussian Synod, more publicly, wrote to all its congregations to say: "Terms like 'eradication,' 'liquidation,' or 'unfit to live' are not known in the laws of God. The murdering of men solely because they are members of a foreign race, or because they are old, or mentally ill, or the relatives of a criminal, cannot be considered as carrying out the authority entrusted to the State by God.”

Such an appeal to the ethical standards of earlier years was doomed to fail; but so too, in the circumstances of total war, were efforts to mobilize public opinion in protest against the crimes of their leaders. The abortive July 20, 1944, attempt on Hitler’s life was greeted with shock and dismay by the majority of Confessing Church members.

The military defeat of the National Socialist regime in May 1945 forced a reevaluation of the Confessing Church’s stance. Only a few months later, the surviving leaders met in Stuttgart to consider their past failings and their future opportunities. Largely inspired by the newly released Martin Niemöller, the Declaration of Guilt issued on this occasion aptly summarized the Confessing Church’s experience of the previous twelve years: “We know ourselves, with our people, to be not only in a community of suffering, but also in a solidarity of guilt. With great anguish we state: through us inestimable suffering was inflicted on many peoples and lands.... We have struggled for many years in the name of Jesus Christ against the spirit which found its terrible expression in the National Socialist regime of tyranny, but we accuse our selves for not witnessing more courageously, for not praying more faithfully, for not believing more joyously, and for not loving more ardently.”

It was a fitting epitaph.

References and Further Reading

- Bergen, Doris. The Twisted Cross: The German Christian Movement in the Third Reich. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Besier, Gerhard. Die Kirchen und das Dritte Reich. Spaltungen und Abwehrkämpfe 1934–1937. Berlin: Propyläen Verlag, 2001.
- Bethge, Eberhard. Dietrich Bonhoeffer: A Biography. Revision by V.J.Barnett. Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 2000.
- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich. Letters and Papers from Prison. London: Collins, 1959.
- Cochrane, Arthur C. The Church’s Confession under Hitler. Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962.
- Conway, John S. The Nazi Persecution of the Churches, 1939–1945. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1968.
- Ericksen, Robert P. Theologians under Hitler. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1985.
- Gerlach, Wolfgang. And the Witnesses Were Silent: The Confessing Church and the Persecution of the Jews. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2000.
- Helmreich, Ernst C. The German Churches under Hitler: Background, Struggle and Epilogue. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1979.
- Kershaw, Ian. Hitler: A Biography. 2 vols. New York: W.W. Norton, 1999.
- Schmidt, Dietmar. Pastor Niemöller. London: Odham Press, 1959.
- Scholder, Klaus. The Churches and the Third Reich, vol. 1: 1918–1934; vol. 2: 1934. London: SCM Press, 1987.

JOHN S.CONWAY

CONFESSION

The term “confession” had two distinct meanings in the REFORMATION period: the confession of SIN and the confession of FAITH. One might say that the controversy generated over the nature of the confession of sin led in large part to the development of confessions of faith that expressed the nature of true faith over against the teaching of the Roman Church.

I. Confession of Sin

The confession of sin was directly related to the practice of private penance because that had first developed in the Celtic monasteries of the Carolingian period. The canonical penance of the patristic period had consisted of contrition for sin, public confession of sin before the bishop and the congregation, satisfaction to manifest the sincerity of contrition, and finally public absolution by the bishop. Private penance reversed the last two parts, so that satisfaction followed absolution. Thus when Peter the Lombard defined penance as one of the seven SACRAMENTS in his Sentences of 1150, he defined penance as contrition, confession, and satisfaction. In this understanding of penance confession to the priest both manifests the sincerity of contrition and reveals the circumstances of each sin, so that the priest can both “loose” the sinner by absolution and “bind” the sinner with the appropriate remedy and punishment for sin by satisfaction.

The Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 mandated private confession for all Christians and made clear the close connection between the confession of sin and the willingness to perform the satisfactions imposed by the priest. “All believers of both sexes shall after coming to the age of discretion faithfully confess all their sins at least once a year in private to their own priest, and strive to fulfill to the best of their ability the penance imposed upon them.” The only sins that had to be confessed were those that elicited the consent of the will against the love of God, even when no external deed resulted from such consent. However, when the consent of the will was lacking, and the root of love was left intact, then the sin was venial, or forgivable, because the love that remained was thought to cover a multitude of sins (I Peter 4:8). Any thought or desire that did not elicit the consent of the will was seen to be the remnant of original sin in the form of concupiscence, and such concupiscence was not thought to be sin, but rather the “tinder” or “occasion” of sin, which only became sin by the consent of the will.

The practice of private confession was closely associated with another mandate of the Fourth Lateran Council, that of the yearly reception of Communion, usually at Easter. To prepare for their annual confession penitents were encouraged to use the season of Lent as a period of penitential introspection, to bring to mind all the mortal sins that had been committed in the past year, so that all such sins could be fully confessed to the priest, usually during Holy Week, and ideally on Holy Saturday. The priest, on the other hand, was seen to be like a physician “diligently inquiring into the circumstances both of the sinner and of the sin, so that he may wisely understand what advice he should give him and what remedy he should apply, trying different tests to heal the patient.” The failure to confess a sin of which the penitent was aware, or to confess all the circumstances of the sin, resulted in the lack of forgiveness for the penitent. On the other hand, the disclosure of sin confessed in private to the priest resulted in the priest being “dispatched to a monastery of strict discipline to do penance for the rest of his life.”

Upon hearing the full confession of sin, the priest made two judgments regarding the sinner. On the one hand, the priest judged that the contrition of the penitent was sincere; and because it was contrition that removed sin, the priest could pronounce a judgment of absolution. On the other hand, given that satisfaction now followed absolution, the priest also determined the requisite punishments, remedies, and satisfactions for sin, after the traditional penitential remedies of PRAYER, fasting, and alms. However, for what would one be making satisfaction after one had been absolved of sin? To answer this question the church developed a distinction between the eternal guilt and penalty of sin, which was fully satisfied by Christ, and the temporal guilt and punishment that remained, that the penitent must satisfy by his or her own efforts, in cooperation with Christ. Unlike BAPTISM, which was a full participation in the satisfaction of Christ needing nothing to complete it, the commission of mortal sin grieved the Holy Spirit and forfeited the GRACE received at baptism, so that penance was seen to be a “laborious baptism” that required the efforts of the penitent. The church, by the authority vested in priests, bishops, and the pope, had the ability both to discern and to assign the temporal punishments and satisfactions remaining after absolution; and were the penitent to die before the completion of these satisfactions, then they would have to be completed after death in purgatory before eternal life could be fully enjoyed.

In their desire to lighten the burden of satisfactions as much as possible, lay people turned to two major spiritual resources to help them make appropriate satisfaction: the monks and the sacrifice of the mass. Because monks were seen voluntarily to obey the “counsels of perfection” taught by Jesus, especially poverty, chastity, the renunciation of self-defense, and obedience, they were thought to perform works over and above those required by the law, which could therefore be applied to the satisfactions of others. Moreover, beginning in the Carolingian period, it became increasingly common for monks to be ordained as priests, so that they might say private masses on behalf of others. Because the mass was seen to be both a sacrifice offered by the priest to God and a sacrament offered by Christ to his people, the priest could offer the sacrifice of Christ in the mass for the benefit of those on whose behalf it was being offered, including not only those present during the mass in a spirit of devotion, but also those not present, and possibly even deceased and thought to be in purgatory. The endowment of monasteries by LAITY, both for the benefit of their works of supererogation and for the saying of masses on behalf of the patrons, became an increasingly common way for those patrons with means to make satisfaction for their sin.

MARTIN LUTHER was a lifelong devotee of private confession, and his understanding of the gospel could be said to emerge as a reform of private confession in particular, a reform that soon extended to all aspects of the Roman Church (see CATHOLICISM PROTESTANT REACTIONS; CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM). By 1507 Luther was both an Augustinian monk following the counsels of perfection and a priest offering the sacrifice of the mass. Luther initially agreed with the Roman Church that it was contrition that removed sin, a contrition made perfect by the infusion of love for God by the Holy Spirit, and that only those sins that accused the conscience needed to be confessed. Luther also sought to strengthen his conscience after confession and absolution by zealously performing the satisfaction and penance imposed on him, especially by the strict observance of his monastic vows and life. However, the more Luther strove to confess and make satisfaction for his sin, the more his conscience accused him of sin, not only for those things that had the consent of will, but also for those thoughts and desires that he fought against with all his will. Indeed, by 1515 Luther was overwhelmed by experiences of tribulation that he called Anfechtung, in which the awareness of his own sin and the wrath of God against sin overwhelmed his conscience. Luther concluded from this experience that sin can never be eradicated by contrition, confession, and satisfaction; rather, the infusion of love reveals sin and wrath in the conscience, so that we might confess that we are sinners deserving of wrath, and consign ourselves to suffer the punishments of hell with Christ, out of love for God. Such confession justifies God in God's Word, for God tells us that we all have sinned and have fallen short of the glory of God, and we acknowledge this to be true when our own consciences experience the terror of sin and wrath.

However, Luther was to be led in yet another direction because of the influence of his own confessor, Johann von Staupitz. In private confession Staupitz told Luther not to look to his own contrition and terror, but rather to Jesus Christ crucified, for he has taken our sins on himself and has given us his righteousness in a "royal marriage." In light of this growing understanding of Christ as the one who takes on himself the sin that we acknowledge to be our own, Luther came to see that it is not the grace of God, but the law of God, that reveals sin in the conscience and terrifies it with the sense of the wrath of God. The terrified conscience despairs of removing sin by its own efforts, including its own contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Once the conscience has been terrified by the knowledge of its sin, the word of absolution needs to be proclaimed to it by the priest. However, this word is not a judgment about the sincerity of the penitent's contrition, but is rather the promise of forgiveness won by Christ on our behalf by his death on the cross. Sin is removed not by our contrition and satisfaction, but by faith in the promise of forgiveness spoken to us individually by the person of the priest. By faith the penitent no longer sees his or her sin in the conscience, but in the flesh of Christ, where it is taken away and put to death; and the penitent believes that the righteousness of Christ is now his or her own. Such faith in the promise of absolution brings genuine peace to terrified consciences, especially in the context of private confession.

On the basis of this new understanding and experience of confession, inspired in large part by the spiritual counsel of Johann von Staupitz in private confession, Luther came to see the whole ministry of the church in terms of the word of absolution. Instead of limiting absolution to private confession itself, Luther claimed that Christ left us with many promises of absolution, to strengthen and comfort the terrified consciences of the faithful. The word of absolution should be proclaimed in the sermon, and is also contained in the Lord's Prayer, when we pray that we may be forgiven as we forgive others. However, Luther especially prized those forms of absolution that were addressed by Christ to the individual directly. Thus in baptism the promise of absolution is applied individually to me with the accompanying sign of the water applied to my body. In private confession the priest or pastor speaks the word of absolution directly to me individually, after having heard my own terrified conscience in confession, thereby returning me to the promise of absolution spoken to me in my baptism. In the LORD'S SUPPER the promise of absolution is spoken to me individually, confirmed by the sign of the body and blood of Christ that died for my forgiveness, which I eat and drink as I hear the word of absolution, "Shed for you and for many for the forgiveness of sin." Luther also extended the power to proclaim absolution to every faithful Christian, in light of "the priesthood of all believers." However, Luther himself tended to focus on those forms of absolution proclaimed by ordained ministers to the faithful, especially baptism, private confession, the sermon, and the Supper. Indeed the worship life of the Christian could be seen to cycle through all four forms of absolution on a routine basis. In preparation for receiving the sacrament, the faithful would go to private confession, in which the word of absolution would return them to faith in the promise made to them in baptism. They would then hear the same word proclaimed in the sermon and prayed in the Lord's Prayer, culminating in Communion, in which the promise of absolution was once again applied to them individually, to console and strength their consciences in their lifelong struggle with sin.

Luther was ambivalent about the status of private confession as a sacrament. He was never in doubt about its essential character in the life of the church, defending it vigorously in 1522 after ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN CARLSTADT had suggested that the only absolution needed by the faithful is found in the Supper. However, it lacked an accompanying sign, and hence could not really fit the definition of a sacrament as a promise of absolution with a confirming sign attached to it by Christ. By 1531 PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, who himself was decisively impacted by Luther's teaching on confession and absolution, defined both absolution and ordination as sacraments, and included this teaching in his magisterial Loci communes of 1543. Like Luther, Melanchthon especially treasured the way the promise of absolution is spoken directly to the individual by the pastor in private confession, making it the best form of absolution offered in the church, together with the Supper. Hence it is not surprising that private confession was always required by the Wittenberg Reformation before one could receive Communion, even though the requirement of yearly confession by the Fourth Lateran Council was also rejected as "tyranny."

JOHN CALVIN, on the other hand, was very suspicious of the practice of private confession to a priest. Although he always allowed that rightly understood it could be an edifying practice, he was always concerned about the lack of accountability created by the practice in the Roman Church. The priest, in conjunction with his bishop and possibly the pope (in reserved cases), was the only person who heard and judged sin, and was the only person with the AUTHORITY to excommunicate. Calvin appreciated the concern to maintain the holiness of the Supper as much as possible, but was very concerned that the priest and bishop could act tyrannically, excommunicating people over financial matters or personal grudges, as had been the case with Calvin's own father. Moreover, by the time Calvin emerged as an evangelical teacher, the study of the patristic period had uncovered the fact, unmentioned by Luther or Melanchthon, that private confession was unknown in that period, and only emerged later, in conjunction, so Calvin thought, with the emergence of the "papal tyranny." To preserve the goal of protecting the holiness of the Supper, while also avoiding the abuses possible in private confession, Calvin created an ecclesiastical senate of pastors and elders that he called the CONSISTORY. Although the Consistory made its investigations into the sins of the congregation in private, it did not allow an individual to make such inquiries, but rather pastors and elected laity together inquired into the sins and prescribed the remedies, and also kept minutes of the proceedings for the record, again to establish mutual accountability. Calvin thus moved the church away from private confession, favored so highly by Luther and Melanchthon, toward something approximating the canonical penance of the patristic period. Calvin agreed with Melanchthon that ordination could be considered a sacrament, but did not accept the idea that confession should also be a sacrament, and pointed out this disagreement in his preface to the French translation of Melanchthon's 1543 Loci, which Calvin himself sponsored.

One practice on which all evangelical reformers could agree was the establishment of prayers of general confession in worship services. Such general confession could never take the place of private confession for the Lutherans, or of the Consistory for the Reformed, but it did remind the faithful right in the heart of their worship life that the gospel is offered only to those who have first been humbled by the awareness of their own sin, and who make a genuine confession of that sin together with others in the congregation. Once private confession was no longer obligatory in the Lutheran churches, and Consistories were no longer a prominent part of Reformed communities, the only confession of sin left was the prayer of general confession in Protestant worship services.

The Council of Trent responded to the teaching of Luther and Melanchthon by reasserting the teaching of the Fourth Lateran Council concerning the necessity of confessing one's sins at least once a year to one's priest. Trent denied that the word of absolution should be sought anywhere other than in the sacrament of penance, and asserted again that it was contrition that removed sin, not faith in the word of absolution. Trent denied Luther's and Melanchthon's definition of penance as the terrified conscience and faith, and reasserted the traditional definition of penance as contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Trent also asserted that only priests and bishops had the authority to bind and loose sins, and that penitents had to be simultaneously loosed from sin by the word of absolution, and bound to satisfactions for the punishment, correction, and satisfaction of sin. Trent denied that one could know with certainty that one's sins had been absolved in the sacrament of penance. Finally Trent denied the validity of general, public confessions of sin, as lacking in the efficacy of the sacrament of penance.

II. Confession of Faith

The confession of faith was a direct outgrowth of the criticism of the Roman Church begun by Martin Luther, centering on his objections to the Roman understanding of the confession of sin. At the Leipzig Debate of 1519 Luther had claimed that both popes and councils have erred, and that only the Word of God in Scripture is without error. In The Babylonian Captivity of 1520, Luther claimed that nothing could be made into an article of faith that was not clearly taught in Scripture. Both claims had the result of casting radical doubt not only on the more recent councils such as Constance (1415) and Fourth Lateran (1215), but also on the whole of the dogmatic tradition of the church, from the Council of Nicea (325) onward. Given the need to judge all previous conciliar pronouncements on the basis of the Word of God in Scripture, it is not surprising that the various reforming movements of the sixteenth century came to develop their own public statements of authoritative teaching in the form of confessions of faith, both to distinguish the movements from what they considered to be the errors of Rome, and to bring about a public consensus about what the true teaching of Scripture really is.

The first confession of faith to emerge in the sixteenth century came from a community of reformers who rejected both Rome and the reforming agendas of Luther and Melancthon in Wittenberg and HULDRYCH ZWINGLI and JOHANNES OECOLAMPADIUS in Zurich and Basel. The SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION of 1527 was drafted by MICHAEL SATTLER the same year he was to be executed, and represented the consensus reached by members of the Swiss Brethren. The Confession makes a sharp distinction between membership in the civil world of the magistrate and the sword, and the kingdom of Christ that is governed by the gospel. The confession rejects the practice of infant baptism, insisting on faith and obedience prior to baptism. The Supper is only for those baptized upon their confession of faith, and is eaten and drunk in remembrance of Christ's death by those who are one body with Christ. The confession also rejects the use of civil authority in the church, insisting that the only disciplinary authority in the church is the ban—that is, excommunication. The baptized cannot take part in the bearing of the sword and oath taking, for Christ has forbidden his followers from so doing. The Schleithem Confession became a very effective way by which this community spread its teaching, and Zwingli and Calvin both devoted entire treatises to refuting its teaching from their interpretation of the Word of God in Scripture.

The AUGSBURG CONFESSION of 1530 was submitted to Charles V by the German rulers who had allowed evangelical teaching to take place in their territories and had allowed the reform of abuses in the churches in their lands. Drafted by Melancthon, the Augsburg Confession defended evangelical teaching on the basis of its catholicity, using the Apostles' Creed, the Creed of Constantinople, and the Definition of Chalcedon as the basis of catholic doctrine. The changes allowed by the rulers in their territories were said to be the elimination of recent abuses introduced into the church under the papacy, and hence represented a return to genuine catholic practice. Augsburg defines an abuse as any teaching or practice that is said to be a sacrifice or satisfaction for sin, or to merit anything from God, or that is made binding on conscience without the express command of God in Christ. The Roman theologians responded to the Augsburg Confession with the Pontifical Confutation, which was read aloud to the Emperor, but which was not provided in writing to the evangelicals. Although the Confutation agreed that many of the teachings of the Augsburg Confession were in fact catholic (although with some qualifications in each instance), it rejected the definition of abuses in the Confession, and asserted the catholicity of penitential satisfactions, the sacrifice of the Mass, the meriting of eternal life, and the authority of bishops to teach laws binding on conscience even when those laws cannot be found in Scripture. Melancthon defended the Augsburg Confession in light of these criticisms, and published his defense as the Apology for the Augsburg Confession (see AUGSBURG CONFESSION, APOLOGY OF) in 1531. In the Apology Melancthon for the first time teaches that both ordination and confession are sacraments, along with baptism and the Supper. Although these texts were both addressed to the Emperor in light of the Diet of Augsburg in 1530, they quickly became the foundational confessional texts of the Wittenberg reform movement.

The Augsburg Confession was submitted at the height of the disagreement between Luther and Zwingli concerning the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the bread and wine of the Eucharist. Zwingli taught that the bread and wine were the signs of the body and blood of Christ that referred us to his death out of gratitude for our redemption. Zwingli denied that the body and blood of Christ could be offered in or with the bread and wine, because his true human body is in heaven. Luther responded by claiming that the body and blood of Christ in the bread and wine are the sign that the promise of forgiveness applies to us personally. Because Christ is both divine and human in one person, his humanity is present wherever his divinity is present, especially where he offers his flesh and blood to us in his Word. The MARBURG COLLOQUY of 1539, at which Luther, Melancthon, MARTIN BUCER, Zwingli, and Oecolampadius were all present, failed to overcome the different understandings of the Supper in Wittenberg and Zurich. As a consequence, the leaders of Zurich were not signatories of the Augsburg Confession, but were instead represented by Zwingli's Account of Faith at Augsburg, which never attained the status of a confessional document. Subsequent to Augsburg, Oecolampadius drafted his own confession that was edited by Myconius after his death in 1531, which was adopted by the city of Basel as the First Basel Confession of 1534. This confession set the tone for subsequent confessions of the Reformed tradition until the latter part of the sixteenth century: they were developed by emerging Reformed churches in various cities or territories, and represented their first public teaching of the major doctrines of faith upon their emergence as organized churches. Thus, two years after the First Basel Confession, both the Geneva Confession and the First HELVETIC CONFESSION emerged, representing the teaching of the pastors of Geneva and Zurich, respectively. The emergence of Reformed churches in France, Scotland, and the Netherlands led to the publication of the French Confession of 1559, the Scots Confession written by JOHN KNOX in 1560, and the BELGIC CONFESSION of 1561.

John Calvin had a hand in helping to draft the French Confession, and liked the fact that the Reformed allowed for a wide variety of local confessions, unlike the Lutherans, who insisted that no one could be in fellowship with them unless they had signed the Augsburg Confession. Calvin had in fact signed the Augsburg Confession in 1541, although it was the Variata of 1540 drafted by Melancthon to incorporate the Wittenberg Concord of 1536 between Strasbourg and Wittenberg. The Concord taught that the body and blood are both represented and presented by the bread and wine. Calvin strove for the following decades to overcome the division between Zurich and Wittenberg by adopting the language of the Wittenberg Concord, and did in fact arrive at an agreement between the churches of Geneva and Zurich, the Zurich Consensus published in 1551. However, far from leading to a reconciliation between Zurich and Wittenberg, the Zurich Consensus was itself attacked by the Lutheran theologians Westphal and Heshusius as a betrayal of the Augsburg Confession, which even Melancthon was suspected of betraying in his 1540 Variata. The Lutherans subsequently sought to purge the "Crypto-Calvinists" from their midst, leading to the adoption of the Formula of Concord of 1577, in which Luther's writings against Zwingli in 1527 were used to interpret Melancthon's Augsburg Confession of 1530, along with the 1531 Apology, Luther's Small and Large Catechisms, Melancthon's treatise on the power and primacy of the pope, and Luther's SMALKALDIC ARTICLES of 1537.

The controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed over the Supper led to the adoption of Reformed theology by Frederick III of the Palatinate. Frederick obtained from HEINRICH BULLINGER his last will and testament for the church at Zurich, which became in Frederick's hands the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566. Like the Augsburg Confession, the Second Helvetic Confession makes the claim to teach catholic doctrine, over and against the more recent innovations of the Roman Church. This confession also reflects the Zurich Consensus, by teaching that we commune spiritually with the flesh and blood of Christ at the same time we eat and drink the bread and wine of the Supper. The Second Helvetic Confession is the closest thing the Reformed tradition has to the Augsburg Confession, as it rapidly became adopted by Reformed communities throughout eastern and western Europe, as well as in England and Scotland.

As this historical survey shows, the development of confessions of faith in the sixteenth century was necessitated by several factors all converging at once. First, there was the need to set forth truly catholic doctrine and practice, over against the more recent abuses of the Roman Church. Such an agenda is clearly reflected in both the Augsburg Confession and the Second Helvetic Confession. Both confessions establish their continuity not only with the prophets and apostles, but also with the fathers and the councils of the patristic period. The claim for catholicity was made even more urgent by the Council of Trent, which claimed to be a true ecumenical Council under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, thereby attempting to make the various reformation confessions appear to be schismatic and sectarian in nature. Second, there was the need to give an account of faith taught in various territories and cities when they first emerged as organized churches. This was the trajectory taken by all the Reformed confessions up until the Second Helvetic Confession: they were all seen to be the confession of faith of a particular church—French, Belgic, or Scots—in a particular place and time—Basel, Geneva, Zurich—that was nonetheless in communion with other churches in which the gospel was preached and the sacraments rightly administered. The Reformed explicitly resisted the attempt by the Lutherans to have the Augsburg Confession become the only confession of the reforming movement, and also resisted having any one of the locally generated confessions become binding on all churches in all times and places, although eventually this kind of role was assumed de facto by the Second Helvetic Confession. However, the emergence of two distinct evangelical confessional traditions was resisted all along the line by Melancthon, Bucer, and Calvin, who ultimately failed in their attempts to unite the increasingly separated confessional camps. Finally there was the need to come to agreement regarding the essential heads of doctrine taught by a specific reforming community. This was the primary reason for the development of the Schleithem Confession, and is one of the major impulses behind the Augsburg Confession and the many con-fessions of the Reformed tradition, culminating in the Second Helvetic Confession. The development of such confessions was often accompanied by the creation of catechisms as well, as in the case Luther's catechisms of 1529, the GENEVA CATECHISM of 1541, and the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM of 1561, making them important means for the propagation of evangelical faith in still other cities and territories.

In post-sixteenth century Protestantism, a number of confessions of faith were formulated to posit one's own belief over against that of competing churches. The driving force, in each instance, was the absence of an authoritative confession speaking to the controversial issues or the conviction that an existing confession needed to be modified.

In England, Calvinist sentiment is reflected in the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF 1647, and its accompanying catechism, which grew out of the Anglican/Puritan controversies of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. The Helvetic Consensus (Consensus Helveticus), of 1675, written by Johann Heinrich Heidegger and in use in Swiss Reformed churches until the middle of the eighteenth century, focused on several specific topics, such as the inspiration of the Bible (with the point that the Hebrew vowel marks were divinely inspired) and the various ramifications of the teaching of universal grace.

The Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition has, alongside the SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION, the Dordrecht confession of 1632 as a major confessional document. The confession grew out of the attempt to unite the two divided branches of Dutch Mennonites, the Frisian and the Flemish.

In the Baptist tradition, confessions have played a considerably more modest role in view of the insistence that the Bible itself should be the proper confession of faith.

Protestant confessions of the modern period are akin to the earlier Protestant confessions by their focus on specific issues. This holds true for the The Fundamentals articles, which were written in the late 19th and early 20th centuries in response to modernism and liberal theology. While never seen as a confession in the strict sense of the word, these articles summarized conservative (now beginning to be called “fundamentalist”) faith. The BARMEN CONFESSION 1934 likewise spoke to the specific German situation created by the Nazi government support of the GERMAN CHRISTIANS. Church mergers also called for restatements of the faith in terms of both the theological background of the merging churches and the effort to state the Christian faith in contemporary terms. This holds true for the statement of faith of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, of 1959, which in turn was preceded by the Basis for Union of 1943. The independence movement of Protestant churches in former European colonies also challenged these churches to write confessions.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources

- Book of Confessions: Study Edition.* Louisville, KY: Geneva Press, 1999.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1559. Edited by John T. McNeill and translated by Ford Lewis Battles. vol. 1, book III, chapters iii-v, 592–684. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent.* Translated by H.J. Schroeder. Rockford, IL: Tan Books and Publishing, 1994.
- Cochrane, Arthur. Reformed Confessions on the Sixteenth Century. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1966.
- Kolb, Robert, and Timothy J. Wengert, eds. The Book of Concord: the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000.
- Lambert, Thomas A., and Isabella M. Watt, eds. Registers of the Consistory of Geneva in the Time of Calvin. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 2000.
- Leith, John H., ed. “Fourth Lateran Council (1215).” In Creeeds of the Churches, 3d edition, 56–59. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press, 1982.

- Luther, Martin. "The Babylonian Captivity of the Christian Church, 1520." In Three Treatises, translated by A.T.W. Steinhauser. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1970.
- Melanchthon, Philip. Loci communes, 1543. Translated by J.A.O.Preus. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing, 1992.
- Noll, Mark A., ed. Confessions and Catechisms of the Reformation. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1991.
- The Schleithem Confession*. Translated and edited by John Howard Yoder. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1977.

Secondary Sources

- Kolb, Robert, and James A.Nestingen, eds. Sources and Contexts for the Book of Concord. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2001.
- Lualdi, Katherine Jackson, and Anne T.Thayer, eds. Penitence in the Age of Reformations. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2000.
- Rohls, Jan. Reformed Confessions: Theology from Zurich to Barmen, translated by John Hoffmeyer. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998.
- Tentler, Thomas. Sin and Confession on the Eve of the Reformation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1977.

RANDALL C.ZACHMAN

CONFESSIONALIZATION

"Confessionalization" is a concept that was developed in German historiography in the late 1970s and early 1980s. This concept aims to provide a confessionally neutral perspective on the period between ca. 1550 and ca. 1650 by describing the development of the Lutheran, Calvinist, and Catholic churches within one interpretive framework. The concept has mostly been applied to the history of the Holy Roman Empire but attempts to interpret European history in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The concept of confessionalization has been a fruitful research tool, but has also led to lively historiographical controversies.

The Historiographical Concept of Confessionalization

Traditionally historiography divided the sixteenth century in two halves, with the Protestant REFORMATION in the first half and the Catholic COUNTER-REFORMATION in the second half of the century. For the Protestant churches in the Holy Roman Empire, the terms "Lutheran orthodoxy" and "Second Reformation" (denoting the Calvinist Reformation after the first, or Lutheran Reformation) were also used. In the 1950s the German historian Ernst Walter Zeeden first suggested that all the major creeds developing out of medieval Christianity—that is, LUTHERANISM, CALVINISM, and Catholicism—started to build modern, clearly defined confessional churches during the second half of the sixteenth century. He called this process "confessionbuilding."

Two scholars of the next generation, Heinz Schilling, who focused on Protestantism, and Wolfgang Reinhard, who focused on Catholicism, developed the concept of “confession-building” into the concept of “confessionalization.”

This concept proceeds from the general observation that in the Middle Ages and in the early modern period, the religious and the secular, church and state, were closely intertwined. When medieval Christianity was broken up by the Reformation, this close connection between CHURCH AND STATE resulted in an equally close linkage between the process of confession-building and the process of state formation. According to Schilling and Reinhard, the principle cuius regio, eius religio (“whose territory, whose religion”), which was established in the Holy Roman Empire by the Peace of Augsburg in 1555, was afterward successfully enforced by the German princes in their territories, resulting in the establishment of unified confessional states.

All in all Schilling and Reinhard see confessionalization as a fundamental process in society and as a process of modernization with the following results: first, confessional homogenization of the population; second, the intensification of state formation (i.e., confessionalization as the first phase of ABSOLUTISM because the state gained control over the church); third, a general process of social disciplining resulting from the disciplining measures of church and state; fourth, the development of cultural and political identities in which the confessional factor played a key role. The concept of confessionalization thus sees the three confessional churches not from the point of view of their doctrinal differences but from a comparative perspective that stresses the “functional similarities” of the confessions, for instance, their contributions to the development of social control. The terms “Lutheran orthodoxy,” “Second Reformation,” and “Counter-Reformation” have therefore been replaced by “Lutheran/Calvinist/Catholic confessionalization.”

Periodization of the Process of Confessionalization in the Holy Roman Empire

Schilling has developed a periodization of the process of confessionalization in the Holy Roman Empire between the Peace of Augsburg in 1555 and the Thirty Years’ War. He defines the following phases:

- First, the “preparatory phase” of confessionalization from the late 1540s until the early 1570s. In this phase the Augsburg peace system was fully functioning, but Tridentine Catholicism and Calvinism entered the Empire and began to make the confessional situation more precarious. The first territorial princes, notably Frederick III of the Palatinate, converted to Calvinism.
- Second, the 1570s brought the “transition to confessional confrontation.” After the conflicts within Lutheranism after MARTIN LUTHER’S death in 1546, the Lutheran concord movement once again defined Lutheranism unambiguously through the BOOK OF CONCORD and the Formula of Concord. Lutheran ORTHODOXY was thus defined in clear contrast to Calvinism. Consequently Protestant princes were increasingly forced to chose between Lutheranism and Calvinism. In this phase Catholicism also became more dynamic because princes and prince bishops embraced the Tridentine decrees and introduced the Jesuits to their lands.

- Third, the “apogee of confessionalization” occurred between the 1580s and the 1620s. Several German princes became Calvinist during this phase and the concord movement was vibrant in Lutheran GERMANY. In Catholic territories Tridentine Catholicism was actively stopping Protestant inroads or fighting Protestant remains. All this took place against a political background that was increasingly characterized by conflicts on all levels of Imperial politics and a lacking will for compromise by a new generation of politicians. Even time became confessionalized in this period: When Pope Gregory introduced his calendar reform in 1582, Protestants in the Empire did not accept the new calendar until 1699 or 1700. (In ENGLAND the Gregorian calendar was introduced only in 1752.)
- Fourth, “the end of confessionalization under the conditions of war and on the basis of the Peace of Westphalia” began in the 1620s when people realized that confessional conflict led to destruction and devastation. As a result irenisms and new religious movements such as PIETISM were on the rise.

Methods of Confessionalization

Reinhard has identified seven methods or mechanisms of confessionalization that were used by church and state to establish confessional homogeneity.

1. The establishment of “pure DOCTRINE” and its formulation in a CONFESSION of faith. This meant distinguishing one confessional church from other churches and eliminating possible sources of confusion.
2. The distribution and enforcement of these new norms (for example, through confessional oaths and subscription). In this way, the religious orthodoxy of personnel in key positions—for instance, theologians, CLERGY, teachers, and secular officials—was to be ensured and “dissidents” were to be removed.
3. Propaganda and censure. This meant making use of the printing press for propaganda purposes on the one hand and preventing rival churches from using the printing press on the other hand. Although the propaganda weapon of scholars was controversial, THEOLOGY, CATECHISMS, and sermons were used to influence the masses.
4. Internalization of the new norms through education. By founding new educational institutions, especially universities, all confessional churches hoped to keep their flock from attending their rivals’ institutions and to “indoctrinate” future generations.
5. Disciplining the population. Visitations and CHURCH DISCIPLINE were used to create a confessionally homogeneous population. The expulsion of confessional minorities also served as a means to this end.
6. Rites and the control of participation in rites. In view of the importance of rites for the coherence of the confessional group, participation in rites like BAPTISM and MARRIAGE was ensured through the keeping of registers. Rites that served as markers of confessional difference were cultivated in particular.
7. Confessional regulation of language, to which Reinhard refers, a field in which little research has been done so far. As an example he mentions the fact that Calvinists preferred names from the Old Testament, whereas saints’ names were particularly appealing to Catholics, these in turn being forbidden in Geneva.

Controversies about the Concept of Confessionalization

From the beginning the concept of confessionalization has met with positive reception as well as strong criticism in historiography. The critique falls broadly within five different categories: (1) the discussion about the periodization of the confessionalization process; (2) the controversy about the neglect of the theological characteristics of the confessional churches; (3) macro-historical criticism of the concept of confessionalization as a fundamental process of society; (4) the critique of confessionalization as a modernization process; and (5) the debate about the “top-to-bottom approach” of the concept of confessionalization.

With regard to periodization, even Reinhard and Schilling are not in agreement. Whereas Schilling has proposed the periodization of confessionalization in Germany between 1555 and the Thirty Years’ War explained above, Reinhard has extended the confessionalization process much further, starting with the AUGSBURG CONFESSION in 1530 and ending with the expulsion of the Salzburg Protestants in 1731–1732. As a consequence there have been discussions about an early or late periodization of the confessionalization process with Harm Klueting, for example, arguing for 1525 as the end of the Reformation as a popular movement and thus the beginning of confessionalization as a state-sponsored process. Other authors like Thomas Kaufmann have completely rejected the idea of a parallel development of the confessional churches, arguing that the importance of the Protestant Reformation as an upheaval in early modern society will be underestimated if the development of the three confessional churches is regarded as parallel.

Second, both Protestant and Catholic scholars, for example, Thomas Kaufmann and Walter Ziegler, have criticized the concept of confessionalization for ignoring the specific characteristics—the so-called propria—of the confessional churches in theology, piety, and spirituality as well as the question of theological truth. The treatment of religion in the concept of confessionalization has been described as “functionalreductionist”: “functional” because the concept looks only at the function of religion within state and society and “reductionist” because the propria of the confessional churches are thus leveled.

Third, from the very beginning historians have doubted Schilling’s and Reinhard’s thesis that confessionalization was a fundamental process of society and have described phenomena and processes of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that existed independent of and uninfluenced by the process of confessionalization. Although acknowledging that religion was an important factor, historians like Winfried Schulze and Anton Schindling have identified more and more elements and developments in the age of confessionalization that were unconfessional or could not be confessionalized: Roman law and many aspects of matrimonial law, the Humanist republic of letters, the mystic-spiritual tradition, alchemy, and astrology.

Fourth, younger historians have criticized Reinhard’s and Schilling’s view of confessionalization as a modernization process. They see this particular aspect of the concept as an expression of the historiographical background of the 1970s, when German historiography proceeded on the assumption that there was a teleological process of social change, moving toward improved social and political structures. Luise Schorn-Schütte has stressed that, because this notion of modernization has been replaced in historiography by the idea of different potentials and aims of development coexisting simultaneously in history, the modernization aspect of the concept of confessionalization can no longer be maintained.

Fifth, younger historians have also expressed doubts about the close connection between confessionalization and state formation postulated by Reinhard and Schilling. This point of criticism impinges on the general debate about the relationship between macro- and micro-history, between societal history (German Gesellschaftsgeschichte) and cultural history (see CULTURE). From a micro-historical viewpoint as well as from the perspective of his research into the workings of church discipline in early modern Berne, Heinrich Richard Schmidt has severely criticized the etatistic focus of the concept of confessionalization. According to Schmidt, Reinhard and Schilling have overemphasized the role of the state in the process of confessionalization, thus interpreting it as a top-to-bottom process in which the common people appear as subjects who were controlled and disciplined by church and state. Although Schmidt does not deny that there were pressures toward confessionalization “from above,” he argues that the process of confessionalization could be successful only if it fit in with the need for regulation within society. He does not see the state but the communities and groups in society as “actors” in the process of confessionalization and therefore postulates a view “from below.” Similarly Marc Forster has drawn attention to the bishopric of Speyer, where the Catholic communities developed a Catholic identity “from below” without being influenced by Tridentine reform or confessionalization measures by the state.

The critique of the concept of confessionalization has thus shed a clear light on its more problematic aspects and “blind spots”: first, the thesis of confessionalization being a fundamental process of society and a process of modernization has been falsified by historiography. Second, it seems clear that confessionalization can no longer be regarded as a successful process “from above,” but that the concept has to be modified to allow for various attempts at confessionalization “from above” and “from below” within one political and geographical entity. Thus, conflict and resistance as major factors in the process of confessionalization have been brought into the forefront: conflicts between competing confessional churches on the one hand and forms of resistance “from below” against confessionalization, social disciplining, and early modern state-building “from above” on the other hand.

One of the fundamental questions connected with the critique of the concept of confessionalization is whether falsification in one or some points leads to a complete dismissal of the concept or whether it can still function as a useful research tool, in which modifications are discussed and accepted according to the case study to which the concept is applied. It is striking that, in spite of the criticism, the concept of confessionalization continues to inspire research and is no longer applied only to Germany, but has been discussed in relation to the confessional histories of the NETHERLANDS, ENGLAND, IRELAND, Bohemia, FRANCE, and Spain among others. It is to be expected that the historiographical interest in micro-history, the history of everyday life, and the new cultural history will lead to more research on the meaning of confessionalization for the lives and identities of the common people. Whatever the outcome of the discussion, it can already be said that the concept of confessionalization has given important impulses to historiography.

See also Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions

References and Further Reading

- Bahlcke, Joachim, and Arno Strohmeier, eds. Konfessionalisierung in Ostmitteleuropa. Wirkungen des religiösen Wandels im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert in Staat, Gesellschaft und Kultur. Stuttgart: Steiner, 1999.
- Farr, James R., Wietse de Boer, and Allyson M. Poska. "Focal Point. Confessionalization and Social Discipline in France, Italy, and Spain." Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte/Archive for Reformation History 94 (2003).
- Forster, Marc R. The Counter-Reformation in the Villages. Religion and Reform in the Bishopric of Speyer, 1560–1720. Ithaca, NY/London: Cornell University Press, 1992.
- Frieß, Peer, and Rolf Kießling, eds. Konfessionalisierung und Region. Konstanz: Universitätsverlag Konstanz, 1999.
- Kaufmann, Thomas. "Die Konfessionalisierung von Kirche und Gesellschaft. Sammelbericht über eine Forschungsdebatte." Theologische Literaturzeitung 121 (1996): cols. 1008–1025 (part 1), cols. 1112–1121 (part 2).
- Lotz-Heumann, Ute. Die doppelte Konfessionalisierung in Irland. Konflikt und Koexistenz im 16. und in der ersten Hälfte des 17. Jahrhunderts. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000.
- . "The Concept of 'Confessionalization'. A Historiographical Paradigm in Dispute." Memoria y Civilización. Anuario de Historia 4 (2001):93–114.
- Reinhard, Wolfgang. "Reformation, Counter-Reformation, and the Early Modern State. A Reassessment." Catholic Historical Review 75 (1989):383–404.
- , and Heinz Schilling, eds; Die katholische Konfessionalisierung. Wissenschaftliches Symposium der Gesellschaft zur Herausgabe des Corpus Catholicorum und des Vereins für Reformationsgeschichte. Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1995.
- Rublack, Hans-Christoph, ed. Die lutherische Konfessionalisierung in Deutschland. Wissenschaftliches Symposium des Vereins für Reformationsgeschichte 1988. Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1992.
- Schilling, Heinz, ed. Die reformierte Konfessionalisierung in Deutschland—Das Problem der "Zweiten Reformation." Wissenschaftliches Symposium des Vereins für Reformationsgeschichte 1985. Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus, 1986.
- . "Confessionalization in the Empire. Religious and Societal Change in Germany between 1555 and 1620." In Schilling, Heinz. Religion, Political Culture and the Emergence of Early Modern Society. Essays in German and Dutch History. Leiden/New York/Cologne: Brill, 1992.
- . "Confessional Europe." In Handbook of European History, 1400–1600. Late Middle Ages, Renaissance and Reformation, edited by T.A.Brady Jr., H.A.Oberman, and J.D.Tracy, vol. 2, Visions, Programs and Outcomes. Leiden/New York/Cologne: Brill, 1995.

UTE LOTZ-HEUMANN

CONFIRMATION

Although the sixteenth-century Protestant reformers rejected confirmation as a sacrament, certain churches developed a rite called confirmation that retained some continuity with medieval Catholic sacramental practice. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND was the most conservative of the reforming groups in this regard. It is the one Protestant tradition that has had a rite called "confirmation" universally practiced from the sixteenth century to the twenty-first century. The rite of confirmation in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER of 1549 and 1552 included the imposition of hands and, like the Catholic sacrament, was administered only by the bishop (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY). For all the sixteenth-century reformers, the need to provide catechetical instruction to everyone, particularly children, was of much greater importance than the need for a liturgical rite of dubious origin and purpose (see CHILDHOOD). The pattern of catechetical instruction, examination of candidates in the basic tenets of the Christian faith by the CLERGY and/or LAITY, and a profession of faith and vows by the candidate became the prerequisites for admission to the LORD'S SUPPER in many Reformation traditions. Among the sixteenth-century reformers, MARTIN BUCER was the strongest proponent of an "evangelical" rite of confirmation, influencing its practice in ANGLICANISM and LUTHERANISM. His THEOLOGY and extensive writings on the topic grew out of his attempts to reconcile certain Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) with other Protestants and out of his deep concern for a proper and effective form of CHURCH DISCIPLINE. Due to Bucer's influence in some Lutheran regions of GERMANY, a public rite of confirmation that included the imposition of hands by the pastor served as the culmination of catechetical instruction for young adolescents and as the gateway that admitted them to the Lord's Supper.

Throughout the centuries since the REFORMATION, Protestant denominations that practice infant BAPTISM have developed rites that either marked the end of catechetical instruction or admitted one to the Lord's Supper or both. By the twentieth century in most Protestant denominations, these rites also included the imposition of hands by the pastor, were commonly (although not uniformly) called "confirmation," and had become important rituals in the lives of individual Christians and congregations. Theologically, the rite of confirmation has been understood in different and sometimes contradictory ways. PIETISM stressed the need for heartfelt CONVERSION and conviction in the CONFESSION of faith on the part of the confirmand. The ENLIGHTENMENT heightened the emphasis on the vows of the confirmands as the conscious decision of the autonomous individual. In the UNITED STATES, confirmation was often associated with membership in a particular denomination in contrast to baptism, through which one became a member of the universal church. In many parts of Europe and the United States in the eighteenth and nineteenth century, confirmation coincided with end of formal education and marked the youth's coming of age.

Most commonly, confirmation has been viewed by both lay Christians and theologians as the young person's affirmation or public declaration of faith and an opportunity to renew, ratify, or affirm promises made by godparents on behalf of the child at baptism. Until the latter decades of the twentieth century, the rite of confirmation had been linked to both baptism and the Lord's Supper. The connection to baptism came through the confession of faith that is part of the rite. Confirmation and the Lord's Supper were linked, because confirmation traditionally served as the gateway to the Lord's Supper. Liturgical and patristic studies along with ecumenical dialogue and liturgical renewal in the latter half of the twentieth century affirmed the sacrament of baptism as the rite of initiation into full eucharistic fellowship in the church. This consensus called into question some aspects of the theology and practice of confirmation and, in some instances, has effected change in the practice of confirmation.

Origin, Development, Practice, and Theology of Confirmation up to the Reformation

Modern liturgical scholarship views the development of a separate rite of confirmation in the West as a disintegration of what was once a unified ritual of initiation that included baptism and anointing and the imposition of hands of the candidate by the bishop, and that then culminated in the newly baptized person's participation in the Lord's Supper. A number of factors contributed to the disintegration of this unified ritual into three independent rites, each of which would attain the status of sacrament in medieval theology. Most important among these factors were three developments: (1) the shift from adult to infant baptism, which was becoming the common practice by the end of the fifth century, and in which the priest rather than the bishop became the regular minister of baptism; (2) the continuation of the bishop as the proper minister for the postbaptismal ritual of anointing and imposition of hands, which developed into the sacrament of confirmation in the Western Christian tradition; and (3) the geographically large dioceses in most of Europe that prevented bishops from regularly participating in the baptismal rites of parishes.

By the twelfth century, the number of SACRAMENTS in the West had been fixed at seven: baptism, penance, confirmation, eucharist (Lord's Supper), MARRIAGE, ordination, and extreme unction. Because confirmation was administered by the bishop, there was no set age at which a person was confirmed. Rather, when a bishop visited a given locale, parents brought their children of all ages to be confirmed. Within the medieval Roman Catholic sacramental system, confirmation did not hold an important place in the lives of laity, and it was not associated with catechetical instruction or a person's first communion. The sacrament serving this latter function was penance. The unimportance of confirmation during the medieval period is illustrated through an account that extols one bishop for dismounting from his horse to confirm people. It seems that this practice placed him among a minority of bishops during this period.

According to medieval theologians, confirmation marked the person with an indelible character and therefore was unrepeatable; it completed baptism and conferred the Holy Spirit on the confirmand to strengthen the person for battle in the Christian life. The matter of the sacrament was the chrism, or perfumed oil, used in the anointing or signing, and the form of the sacrament was the words spoken by the bishop, "I sign you with the sign of the cross and I confirm you with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." The rite included prayers invoking the Holy Spirit, the signing on the forehead of the candidate with chrism by the bishop, and exhortations to the godparents to instruct their godchildren in good manners and works and to teach them the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Hail Mary. The imposition of hands that had been part of the unified initiation rite of the early CHURCH had evolved into a light blow on the candidate's cheek by the bishop and was interpreted as a ritual expression of the strife the person would face in living the Christian life.

This ritual and its theology were resoundingly rejected by all of the sixteenth-century Protestant reformers. First, the reformers limited the number of sacraments to those rites that clearly involved a New Testament witness of institution by Jesus Christ. Hence they concluded that only baptism and the Lord's Supper met this criterion and rejected Roman Catholic appeals to New Testament evidence for a separate rite of confirmation that used examples from the Acts of the Apostles involving the imposition of hands. Second, the reformers rejected it on the basis of Roman Catholic theology that described confirmation as the completion of baptism. The reformers viewed this claim as a denigration of baptism, which they sought to highlight and exalt in reaction against a medieval social structure that had elevated monastic life above that of the lay Christian. Third, the reformers rejected the use of chrism because of the magical quality with which it was invested by the laity. In place of superstition, the reformers sought to strengthen the faith of the laity through education in the basic doctrinal teachings of the Christian church.

Development of Evangelical Confirmation in the Sixteenth Century

MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN both wrote disparagingly about the Roman Catholic sacrament of confirmation, with Luther calling it “mumbo jumbo” and “monkey business” and Calvin describing it as “a deceptive promise of the devil.” While Luther and Calvin rejected the Roman Catholic sacrament and its ritual with chrism, they both found a basis for the custom of the imposition of hands in Scripture and in the practice of the ancient church. In his INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, Calvin suggested reviving the ancient practice in which the bishop examined the candidates in the catechism, their faith was approved, and they then received the imposition of hands. Luther proposed a similar process, carried out by the pastor, in a sermon in 1523. Yet the primary concern of most reformers was not the revision of a rite with this ritual gesture, but rather the instruction of the laity in the teachings of the church. After participating in the visitations of parishes in Saxony in 1528, Luther was so appalled by the ignorance of the faithful in the basics of Christian teaching that he wrote both his Small Catechism and Large Catechism in 1529. The former quickly became the standard for catechetical instruction of young Lutherans and is still used by Lutherans throughout the world. A host of other CATECHISMS were produced by many reformers in their mother tongues, expressing each reformer’s particular interpretation of the Christian FAITH. But it was Martin Bucer who not only wrote a catechism and advocated strongly for catechetical instruction, but also wrote extensively about and promoted a so-called “evangelical confirmation.” His views on a rite of confirmation can be found in the following documents: What We Should Believe About Infant Baptism According to God’s Scripture (1533); Ziegenhainer Zuchtordnung (Ziegenhain Discipline) and Kasseler Kirchenordnung (Kassel Church Order) (1539), church orders written after his successful compromise with Anabaptists in Hesse; Hermann’s Consultation (1543), a document prepared by Bucer and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON for Archbishop Hermann of Cologne as part of a thwarted attempt to introduce Lutheran reforms there; A Brief Summary of Christian Doctrine (1548), written in opposition to the AUGSBURG INTERIM; De Regno Christi (1550), a proposed means of introducing the Reformation in ENGLAND; and Censura (1551), his critique of the 1549 English Book of Common Prayer.

Bucer’s zeal on the subject stemmed from his defense of the practice of infant baptism along with his certainty that infants could not have faith. In 1538, Bucer was called to the territory of Hesse in Germany by the local ruler, Landgrave Philip (see PHILIP OF HESSE), to negotiate with a group of Anabaptists who had been arrested for their religious beliefs. In his theological debates with the Anabaptists, Bucer acknowledged the need for both formal religious education and a public rite of confirmation, in which persons baptized in infancy would make a public confession of faith and a vow of obedience to the church. His efforts at mediation between the ruling Lutherans and minority Anabaptists bore fruit, for about 200 Anabaptists joined the state church. In some of his writings, Bucer also stressed that the profession of faith in the rite of confirmation involved more than just rote memorization of a catechism. To ensure the genuine nature of the confession of faith, Bucer insisted that those to be confirmed exhibit signs of the fruits of faith in their lives.

The basic components of the rite of confirmation advocated and outlined by Bucer in the two church orders of 1539 used in Hesse (Ziegenhainer Zuchtordnung and Kasseler Kirchenordnung) would become standard among Protestant denominations for youth who had been baptized as infants. The rite was preceded by instruction in the catechism and was administered when children had gained the Christian knowledge necessary to be admitted to the Lord's Supper. The children were examined in the basic tenets of the Christian faith by the pastor in the presence of the elders. The rite itself included a series of questions addressed to the candidate that were understood as the profession or confession of faith and included promises or vows to remain faithful and to be obedient to the church. These questions began with a recitation of the Apostles' Creed. The profession of faith by the candidates was followed by the imposition of hands by the pastor with a blessing invoking the Holy Spirit, and the rite concluded with prayers on behalf of the congregation for the newly confirmed. Thus this early form of the rite was linked to both baptism and the Lord's Supper. In many respects, it bore little resemblance to the Roman Catholic sacrament, which was not preceded by instruction in the faith, included no profession of faith, and was not the gateway to the Lord's Supper. The primary ritual action in the Roman Catholic sacrament—anointing the forehead with chrism—was replaced in the Protestant rite with the imposition of hands. However, theologically, the Roman Catholic sacrament was said to complete baptism and to confer the Holy Spirit. Although Protestant theology did not use the language of completion, it was understood that through the rite the candidates renewed or ratified their baptismal vows. In most rites, the words spoken with the imposition of hands invoked the Holy Spirit. Thus the Protestant rite of confirmation maintained continuity with the Roman Catholic sacrament through the association with baptism and with the giving of or strengthening by the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands.

Rites of Confirmation or Affirmation of Baptism in Anglicanism, Lutheranism, Presbyterianism, and Methodism

As has already been noted, the Anglican communion is the one Protestant tradition that retained the bishop as the minister of confirmation. In other respects, the rite of confirmation in the revised Book of Common Prayer of 1552 was similar to that proposed by Bucer. It presumed instruction in the catechism before the rite; the 1549 Book of Common Prayer had placed the catechism before the rite to emphasize this connection, and subsequent revisions maintained this order and included directives for the days and times of catechetical instruction. Instruction and confirmation were required before one could receive the Lord's Supper, based on a rubric added at the end of the rite in the 1552 edition. The words spoken by the bishop with the imposition of hands asked God for the daily increase of the Holy Spirit in the candidate. Preceding the imposition of hands was a prayer for strengthening by the Holy Spirit and an increase in the sevenfold gifts of the Holy Spirit. In the 1662 Book of Common Prayer, confirmation was described as the ratification of the promises made by the godparents at baptism. In 1662, the rubric that required confirmation before receiving the Lord's Supper was amended to allow those who had received instruction and desired to be confirmed to come to the table. This change reflected the reality of situations in which the bishop served a large diocese and could not manage the required triennial visitation to all parishes. The rite of confirmation in the 1662 Book of Common Prayer and rubrics governing its administration were the standard throughout the worldwide Anglican community until the latter half of the twentieth century, when widespread liturgical experimentation began, followed by the adoption of distinct prayer books in individual provinces. The LAMBETH CONFERENCE of 1948 endorsed a set of proposals that in the case of adult baptism called for baptism and confirmation to be combined in a single service. This innovation was an attempt to show the unitive nature of baptism, confirmation, and the Lord's Supper as the complete and threefold process of initiation. The Lambeth Conference of 1968 directed each province to study baptism and confirmation and to consider one of two revisions in practice: (1) the separation of confirmation from admission to the Lord's Supper or (2) infant baptism and confirmation administered together. In the first model, younger children would be allowed to commune and confirmation would be deferred to young adulthood; in the second model, after instruction regarding the sacrament, young children would be admitted to the Lord's Supper. Since 1968, many provinces in the Anglican community have adopted a variety of practices based on the first of these two models, which breaks the long tradition of confirmation as the gateway to the Lord's Supper.

In the Lutheran tradition, through the influence of Martin Bucer, Philip Melancthon, and Martin Chemnitz, some Lutheran regions introduced a rite of confirmation in the sixteenth century. However, in those areas where Lutherans objected strongly to the Leipzig Interim, an attempt to blend essential Lutheran doctrine with some Roman Catholic practices after the political and military defeat of Lutherans by Emperor Charles V, a different practice developed. This practice included instruction in the catechism and an examination of candidates in the basic teachings of the Christian faith before admittance to the Lord's Supper, but there was no public liturgical rite and the term "confirmation" was not used. Instead, this process was called "catechetical instruction" (catechismus), "confessional examination" (beichtverhör), or "communion of children" (communiciren der kinder). Throughout the sixteenth century and most of the seventeenth century, this practice was the norm in areas of Germany influenced by GNESIO-LUTHERANS and in all of the Scandinavian countries.

A public rite of confirmation among Lutherans was only gradually accepted through the influence of PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER and the spread of German Pietism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Spener also revised the goal of catechetical instruction. No longer was its aim the worthy reception of the Lord's Supper; rather, instruction in the catechism became an opportunity for conversion of the individual. This new focus for the instruction also influenced the liturgical rite so that the confession of faith and vows or promises to remain faithful were viewed in this light as a sign of one's personal conversion rather than as a confession of the faith of the church. Lutheran rites of confirmation maintained the connection to both baptism and the Lord's Supper until the latter decades of the twentieth century and generally included the components of Bucer's rite: instruction in the catechism before the rite, some form of examination of the candidate, the confession of faith and vows, and the imposition of hands by the pastor with an invocation of the Holy Spirit. Later rites also included vows or promises that bound the candidate to the teachings of the Lutheran Church and statements indicating that the confirmand was thereby a member of the Lutheran Church. Since the 1970s, some Lutheran denominations have, like Anglicans, separated first communion from confirmation.

The development of a rite of confirmation among English-speaking Presbyterians and Methodists, both with roots in ANGLICANISM, illustrates the power of Bucer's argument for a public rite of confirmation to ratify the baptismal promises made by godparents for infants (see PRESBYTERANISM; METHODISM). Presbyterians in the UNITED STATES, with roots in English PURITANISM, accepted the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION OF FAITH, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, and a seventeenth-century Directory for Worship. In reaction against the Anglican practice, the word "confirmation" was not part of these documents, but the 1789 Directory for Worship for American Presbyterians included detailed instructions regarding instruction for children in the catechism and their examination by the session, or governing body of elders, before receiving the Lord's Supper. Because of Presbyterian suspicion toward set liturgical forms, there was no prescribed rite to mark this event. It was not until 1905 that the Presbyterian hymnal included rites corresponding to the prescriptions in the Directory for Worship and introduced the nomenclature "confirmation" with a rite titled "Order for the Confirmation of Baptismal Vows." In addition to questions about ratification of one's baptismal vows and the Lord's Supper, the rite included the imposition of hands with the same PRAYER for the increase of the Holy Spirit in the 1662 Anglican Book of Common Prayer. Throughout the twentieth century, subsequent hymnals alternately omitted and then reinstated the word "confirmation" from the title of the rite, indicating continued ambivalence regarding the use of the term while at the same time recognizing that the rite served an important purpose (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). Like Anglicans and Lutherans, American Presbyterians since the 1970s have begun to admit younger children to the Lord's Supper before the rite of confirmation.

Methodism also began without a rite of confirmation. To regulate those who were permitted at the Lord's Supper, JOHN WESLEY instituted "communion tickets" issued to those who were genuinely seeking faith and the GRACE of God; instruction in the basic teachings of the Christian faith, a prerequisite for others before confirmation and admittance to the Lord's Supper, is absent from Methodism at this point. As American Methodism evolved from a movement into a denomination, rites for membership were introduced in the middle of the nineteenth century (see METHODISM, ENGLAND; METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA). By the twentieth century, the rite for membership, although not called "confirmation," bore a marked resemblance to a rite of confirmation. The rite for membership was preceded by instruction in the faith, the questions addressed to the candidates in the rite included a confession of faith and renewal of vows, and candidates received the imposition of hands by the pastor. Not until 1964 did the Methodist church introduce the word "confirmation" into the title of the rite. At that time and later, in The United Methodist Hymnal of 1989, the rite was not explicitly tied to admission to the Lord's Supper. Nevertheless, the tradition of confirmation preceding first communion has been the practice among Methodists in some areas. The hymnals from 1964 and 1989 both interpret the rite of confirmation as a public profession of faith by those baptized in infancy.

Theological Debates and Unresolved Issues

Ecumenical dialogue (see ECUMENISM) and advances in liturgical studies in the twentieth century have sparked reflection on the meaning of confirmation within many denominations and have reshaped the theology and practice of confirmation throughout the Protestant world (see DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL). Liturgical studies have made two important and related contributions. First, the early church pattern of instruction in the Christian faith of adults, followed by a unified complex of rituals that included baptism, anointment with chrism, imposition of hands along with the invocation of the Holy Spirit, and then immediate sharing with the faithful in the Lord's Supper, is viewed as exemplary. The Roman Catholic Church, with the adoption of the Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults (RCIA) following the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), restored this model, and Protestant traditions have drawn on this pattern in their liturgical revisions. Second, increased knowledge and understanding of this early church pattern of initiation have led to an ecumenical consensus that baptism is the sacrament that joins a person to the church and the Body of Christ, and is all that is needed for participation in the Lord's Supper.

In the middle of the twentieth century, the Anglican theologian and liturgist Gregory Dix sparked debate over the meaning of confirmation in general and of the imposition of hands in the rite in particular. He argued that the New Testament showed evidence of a twostage process of initiation—baptism into the death and resurrection of Christ and the pentecostal baptism of the Holy Spirit—both of which are necessary. On the basis of this interpretation of initiation in the New Testament, Dix further argued that the then-current practice of the Anglican Church was consistent with the New Testament, and that confirmation was the rite that conferred the Holy Spirit on the individual and completed baptism. While Dix convinced some with his argument, G.W.H.Lampe challenged Dix with his own study of New Testament and patristic evidence. Lampe concluded that New Testament evidence showed that the Holy Spirit was received in the single event of baptism. He also suggested that a ritual of anointing, which has pneumatic imagery, was better as part of the baptismal liturgy than in the rite of confirmation. His conclusions were supported by the work of J.D.C.Fisher, who traced the disintegration of the unified rite of initiation in the West. It was the work of Lampe and Fisher that first influenced Anglican liturgical revisions of the rite of baptism, which in turn impacted liturgical renewal in other Protestant denominations. By the beginning of the twenty-first century, nearly all main-line Protestant denominations had revised their baptismal rites to include a postbaptismal anointing with oil and/or imposition of hands with a prayer for the Holy Spirit. This change in baptismal rites raises the as-yet unanswered question: Why, then, should the church have another rite with the imposition of hands and prayer asking for the strengthening of Holy Spirit?

Ecumenical consensus in the late twentieth century that baptism was all that was necessary for the admission to the Lord's Supper called into question the connection between Protestant confirmation and first communion, an aspect of the rite that dates to the sixteenth century. In the latter decades of the twentieth century, Anglicans and Lutherans, denominations in which confirmation and first communion had been linked for centuries, separated first communion from confirmation and lowered the age for first communion. This change can also be traced to the influence of liturgical studies and ecumenical dialogue, as well as psychosocial studies of faith development. Liturgical studies had shown that in the West, the practice of communing infants immediately after baptism continued into the eleventh century. Ecumenical dialogue brought greater awareness of the practice of infant baptism in Orthodox communities (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Finally, educators and pastoral theologians made the case that the faith of a Christian cannot be reduced to cognitive knowledge about Christian teaching. They argued that participation in the Lord's Supper, too often linked in the minds of laity as a reward for completion of an educational program, is itself a means through which a person's—even a young child's—faith can be strengthened. The severing of the connection between confirmation and first communion begs the question: Why, then, continue to practice the rite of confirmation?

The answer seems to lie in the rite's connection to baptism, especially in the confession of faith and promises or vows made by the person being confirmed. In the sixteenth century, the necessity for those baptized in infancy to make a public confession of their faith was at the core of Martin Bucer's arguments for a rite of confirmation. For Bucer, the confession of faith had to be more than recitation of knowledge learned in catechetical instruction. Spener emphasized the personal nature of the confession of faith as a sign of one's true conversion. In the twentieth century, for some Christians living under Communist rule, the rite of confirmation was countercultural, a personal and public pledge that stood in contrast to the atheistic youth dedication rites of the government. Since the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS), evangelical piety in American has resonated with language of confessing Jesus as one's personal Savior. The same language permeates the worldwide evangelical movement (see EVANGELICALISM). Such arguments, while illuminating the resilience of the rite of confirmation and its popular appeal among the laity, also pose new questions.

One serious objection that the sixteenth-century reformers had of Roman Catholic confirmation was that the bishop's action completed baptism. The reformers insisted that such language denigrated the dignity of baptism. How can Protestants of the twenty-first century avoid the notion that infant baptism is complete only by the action not of the bishop or any other minister of confirmation, but of the person's confession of faith at a later time? The ecumenical document Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, prepared by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1982, defined baptism as both a gift of God and humanity's response to that gift. Clearly, confirmation relates to the latter part of the meaning. Given its importance in terms of the rite of baptism in the lives of the laity within many denominations, does the rite of confirmation tip the balance too far toward the latter meaning and obscure the priority of the former? These issues are addressed in part through the current language of the rites, which commonly refer to the rite as an affirmation or reaffirmation of baptism rather than a renewal or ratification of baptism, and through rubrics that allow for and encourage multiple uses for the rite. These rubrics indicate that the rite should not be limited to one-time use by adolescents completing a course of Christian education. Rather, the twenty-first century rites affirming baptism can be used throughout a person's life, whenever one recognizes the grace of God active in his or her life.

References and Further Reading

- Book of Common Prayer*, 1662. http://www.eskimo.com/%20~lhowell/bcp 1662 (May 12, 2003).
- Browning, Robert L., and Roy A. Reed. Models of Confirmation and Baptismal Affirmation. Birmingham, AL: Religious Education Press, 1995.
- Burnett, Amy Nelson. "Martin Bucer and the Anabaptist Context of Evangelical Confirmation." Mennonite Quarterly Review 68 no.1 (January 1994):95–122.
- Dix, Gregory. The Theology of Confirmation in Relation to Baptism. London: Dacre Press, 1950.
- Fisher, J.D.C. Christian Initiation: Baptism in the Medieval West. London: SPCK, 1965.
- . Christian Initiation: The Reformation Period. London: SPCK, 1970.
- Kavanagh, Aidan. Confirmation: Origins and Reform. New York: Pueblo, 1988.
- Lamp, G.W.H. The Seal of the Spirit. London: SPCK, 1967.
- Pauck, Wilhelm, ed. Melanchthon and Bucer. Library of Christian Classics 19. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1969.
- Repp, Arthur C. Confirmation in the Lutheran Church. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1964.
- Sehling, Emil, ed. Die Evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des XVI. Jahrhunderts. Vol 3. Tübingen, Germany: J.C.B. Mohr, 1965.
- Turner, Paul. Sources of Confirmation From the Fathers Through the Reformers. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1993.
- World Council of Churches. Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Wright, David F., ed. Common Places of Martin Bucer. The Courtenay Library of Reformation Classics 4. Appleford, UK: The Sutton Courtenay Press, 1972.

RHODA SCHULER

CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF ENGLAND

See Congregationalism

CONGREGATIONALISM

“Congregationalism” is an ECCLESIOLOGY and POLITY with roots in the earliest Christian Churches that found its initial denominational expression in Puritan and Separatist gatherings in sixteenth-century ENGLAND. Congregational churches are marked by the autonomy of the local congregation as an expression of Christ's immediate, not mediate, headship of that gathered fellowship of believers. For churches of this orientation, the polity takes precedence over confessional concerns, each church being formed through its own Church COVENANT. The churches do, however, understand the responsibility to and for other churches of the same polity. This mutual care found early expression in local associations in counties and colonies (referred to in Congregational polity as the "vicinage"), only much later finding a national expression that began to resemble a DENOMINATION.

Origin and Development

The churches of the Apostolic era, in practice if not principle, were local gatherings composed exclusively of people who believed in Jesus as the Christ. The Book of Acts and the Pauline epistles tell us something about the concern and care expressed by one church for another. Those bases remain the underpinnings of the Congregational churches.

Later with the practical necessity for clarifying the tenets of the Christian faith in the face of heretical deviation, the church became an organization composed of all the congregations and individuals who received the SACRAMENTS from properly vested CLERGY. Nonetheless the practice of believers gathered locally and with the full authority under Christ to determine their own affairs remained alive within the church through many of the religious orders and through free spiritual associations.

The REFORMATION brought renewed opportunity for this polity to find expression and permanence. Even before MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN, John Wycliffe (1330–1384) had argued that it was both the duty and the right of the LAITY themselves to listen to the voice of God. The early Reformation polemic focused much on the AUTHORITY of the local congregation to order its own affairs. It was, however, in the milieu of the English Reformation that Congregationalism began to take shape in its modern sense.

Theologically ambivalent about the Protestant cause, King HENRY VIII began to initiate a period of religious change. Queen ELIZABETH I's settlement of religion (1559) did not satisfy, because of its moderate character, those who wanted more comprehensive reform and a "pure" church. The Puritans included those who sought both to change the CHURCH OF ENGLAND into a church based on congregational principles that was presbyterian in orientation, and those who came to believe that separation from the established church was the only viable path. Later, some Puritans argued that the church as an instrument and organ of the state—embracing all who resided within the parish, and served by incompetent and often immoral clergy—was a condition not to be tolerated (see PRESBYTERIANISM; PURITANISM).

Countless nonconforming Christians were imprisoned during Elizabeth's reign (see NONCONFORMITY). By at least 1567 a "separated Church" organized on congregational principles had been established in London under Richard Fitz. A few years later the first Congregational theorists, ROBERT BROWNE, began to write. Although he would eventually find himself back in the established church, he emerged from Cambridge University and became pastor at Norwich and an articulate voice for the developing Congregationalism. His most famous publication was the Treatise of Reformation without tarrying for Anie (1582).

John Robinson (1576–1625), also a Cambridge graduate with Norwich connections, was the critical connector between English Congregationalism and North America. In 1608, under severe pressure, Robinson's congregation from the village of Scrooby emigrated to Leyden, in Holland. Threatened by cultural absorption and pressed by economic need, many members of this church, but not Robinson, arranged to relocate in the New World and became the Pilgrims at Plymouth, Massachusetts (see PILGRIM FATHERS). Robinson also led in the development of Congregational theory, enhancing the concept of inter-church relatedness and opening the door to a view of accepting all faithful Christians in communion, regardless of denominational affiliation.

The Separatist settlement at Plymouth (1620), followed quickly by the Puritan settlements at Salem (1628) and Massachusetts Bay (1630), provided all that was required for a Congregational establishment in New England. The industry, commitment, and competence of these New England settlers and their progeny ensured that Congregational principles would not be ignored in an emerging and diverse nation.

Other early sources of Congregational growth, especially in the eighteenth century, were the English colonies throughout the world. This was particularly true of the English settlements in CANADA and AUSTRALIA, where the rugged frontier and the distance from the seat of the church necessitated a more independent way of thinking and doing. Early outreach to foreign areas was generated by the London Missionary Society (est. 1795) whose earliest efforts were indifferent as to whether the churches being founded would be Congregational, Episcopal, or Presbyterian but which soon became essentially Congregational. The American Church joined the missionary effort in 1810 with the founding of the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS with Asia as its initial field of service.

Congregationalists have been reluctant to embrace statements of faith that could be construed as confessional requirements imposed on autonomous churches and have remained suspicious of overarching ecclesiastical structure, although the historic creeds of the Christian Church have consistently been commended for whatever value is found in them. Congregationalists formally embraced the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION, apart from its Presbyterian polity, in the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM in America, and the Savoy Declaration in ENGLAND. Theological openness has limited major departures on theological grounds to the formation of the Separate Baptist Churches in the mid-eighteenth century and the more substantive Unitarian departure in the nineteenth century (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION).

Theological Contributions

Congregationalism stands in the Reformed theological tradition, along with the Presbyterians and BAPTISTS, among others. During the nineteenth century the theological position of Congregationalism became far less reliant on its Calvinist roots and increasingly liberal in theological orientation (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). From 1850 to 1950 Congregationalism, in both the UNITED STATES and Britain, produced a number of important thinkers such as HORACE BUSHNELL, NATHANIEL TAYLOR, WASHINGTON GLADDEN, PETER TAYLOR FORSYTH, R.W.DALE, C.H.Dodd, and Albert Peel. The movement was also involved in the Liturgical Movement, especially through the work of Nathaniel Micklem and others in Britain. Because of its essentially nonsectarian stance, Congregationalism has been able to embrace a broad range of theological positions and provide a platform for creative dialogue.

Congregationalism's distinctive feature is its ecclesiology, which emphasizes the completeness of the local church under the "headship" of Christ. The local church is seen as the only true, or visible, representation of the church. The Cambridge Platform makes clear that while the "Catholic Church" exists it cannot, by its very nature, have officers or exercise the true function of a church. Only in the visible church is one able to discover the classical "marks" of the church: the Word rightly preached, the sacraments rightly administered, and discipline rightly applied (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE).

For Congregationalists the church is a gathered body of believers joined in COVENANT relationship. It has been fundamental to the Congregational Way that only those who could profess a belief in the Lordship of Christ could become members of a church. The emphasis on a "gathered" fellowship stems from early Continental Anabaptist influences (see ANABAPTISM). The Church Covenant idea, likewise, comes as a result of exposure to the Federal (Covenant) Theology of HEINRICH BULLINGER, JOHANNES COCCEJUS, and others. COVENANT THEOLOGY serves as the foundational approach for the Congregational way of church life. The church, as a body of believers gathered by a Church Covenant, is central to the Puritan/Federal theologies of WILLIAM AMES, John Owen, THOMAS HOOKER, and JOHN COTTON, for example. The covenantal nature of the church carries with it a certain voluntaristic emphasis in that a level of intentionality is required of the believer. This stress on the covenant relationship had an effect on the development of the political system, particularly in the United States.

The twin foci of Congregationalism have traditionally been described as the autonomy (or independence) of the local church and the fellowship of those churches with one another. The fellowship of the churches was envisioned as a means for mutual encouragement, counsel, and, to some extent, correction. The vehicles of interchurch fellowship have been, principally, the Ecclesiastical Council of the Vicinage and the various associations entered into by the churches.

The Vicinage Council appears to be unique to the Congregational tradition and flows out of the tradition of the gathered church in broader fellowship. The same direct headship of Christ that draws believers into a church binds churches of a like mind into relationship. Through the Vicinage Council the local church calls on its "sister" churches to send ministers and delegates to meet in council, to consider the matters at hand, and to offer advice. The matter under consideration can be church business, a dispute between a minister or other member and the church, or the ordination or installation of a candidate for the ministry. The Vicinage Council recognizes and honors the autonomy of the church that calls it into existence, and carries only the authority granted to it by the call. The inviting church may ask for advice, counsel, or judgment. In cases of ordination the Vicinage Council does not itself ordain because only the covenanted community can ordain "officers." Rather, it reviews the candidate and the process and "proceeds with" the church to the ordination. The Council's concurrence grants recognition to the ministry of the individual within the context of the broader fellowship. By conferring the "right hand of fellowship" (Galatians 2:9) it confirms and legitimates the action of the calling church. The Vicinage Council also serves as the primary means for granting recognition to a church seeking to become "Congregational."

The second vehicle of interchurch fellowship is the Association (although the Saybrook Articles in eighteenth-century Connecticut promoted the development of a quasi-Presbyterian system called the "consociation"). The Association provides, in some ways, a means for covenant communities to share in a broader covenant relationship. The earliest Association, formed in Massachusetts in 1633, was not of churches, but ministers. Various forms of Association developed over time, all designed to provide means for achieving the goal of interchurch relationships for mutual benefit. The nineteenth century, which saw so many advances for the Congregational movement, witnessed the first state association, begun in Maine in 1820, and the development of various national fellowships in Britain and the United States.

National Bodies

It is not until 1832 that a highly limited national expression is found in England in the Union of Congregational Churches and Ministers in England and Wales; and in America in the 1871 formation of the National Council of Congregational Churches. The essential ECUMENISM of Congregationalism has led, especially in the twentieth century, toward efforts for merger with other Protestant bodies. Successful mergers in the American experience include the merger with the Evangelical Protestant Churches (ca. 1925) and the General Convention of the Christian Church (1931). The major portion of Congregational Churches joined the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST that was formed by merger of the General Synod of the EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH and the General Council of Congregational Christian Churches (1957).

Congregational Churches for whom classical Congregational polity took precedence over desire for organic union joined with other continuing Congregationalists in the National Association of Congregational Christian Churches or the Conservative Congregational Christian Conference or became independent. The UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA embraces the Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Methodists. Like their American counterparts, the churches in the United Kingdom are located in The United Reformed Church, whereas continuing churches find fellowship in the Congregational Federation in England, Union of Welsh Independents, and the Congregational Federation in Wales.

The International Congregational Fellowship was begun at a meeting in Chiselhurst, United Kingdom, in 1974. The International Congregational Fellowship is a nonrepresentative body consisting of Congregationalists from a broad range of nations, including Argentina, AUSTRALIA, BRAZIL, Bulgaria, Greece, Guyana, INDIA, INDONESIA, JAPAN, Kenya, KOREA, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, PHILIPPINES, Rwanda, Samoa, SOUTH AFRICA, the United Kingdom, and the United States. The Fellowship meets every four years. Through its Theological Commission it produces a twice-yearly scholarly journal, The International Congregational Journal.

The International Congregational Fellowship also has a youth movement, C-Way, which meets simultaneously with the Fellowship.

References and Further Reading

- Atkins, Gaius Glenn, and Frederick L. Fagley. History of American Congregationalism. Boston: The Pilgrim Press, 1942.
- Blake, S.L. The Separates or Strict Congregationalists of New England. Boston: The Pilgrim Press, 1902.
- Dale, R.W. History of English Congregationalism. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1907.
- Dexter, Henry Martyn. The Congregationalism of the Last Three Hundred Years As Seen in its Literature. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1880.
- Horton, Douglas. Congregationalism, A Study in Church Polity. London: Independent Press Ltd., 1952.
- Kohl, Manfred Waldemar. Congregationalism in America. Oak Creek, WI: The Congregational Press, 1977.
- Payne, Ernest A. The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England. London: SCM Press, 1951.
- Peay, Steven A., and Lloyd M. Hall Jr., eds. Congregationalism: The Church, Local and Universal. Oak Creek, WI: The Congregational Press, 2001 (1954).
- Rohr, John von. The Shaping of American Congregationalism. Cleveland, OH: The Pilgrim Press, 1992.
- Routley, Erik. The Story of Congregationalism. London: Independent Press Ltd., 1961.
- Walker, Williston. "A History of the Congregational Churches in the United States." In The American Church History Series. New York: The Christian Literature Co., 1894.
- . The Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 1991 (1893).

LLOYD M.HALL JR. AND STEVEN A.PEAY

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION

Conscientious objection is the principled repudiation of war by individuals or groups. This position has been consistently represented in a small portion of Protestant tradition. The medieval church incorporated three strands of thought regarding war, which survived in one form or another at the beginning of the Protestant REFORMATION: the crusade, the just war, and nonresistance. Although the concept of crusade, or holy war, showed signs of reemergence during the wars of religious domination in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, for the most part Protestant theology leaned heavily toward a just war theory. Nonresistance resided in the radical sects of the time, from which emerged the triad of the historic peace churches, ANABAPTISTS, QUAKERS, and BRETHREN. From the two main traditions, nonresistance and just war, evolved the foundations for conscientious objection in modern time.

Nonresistance

Radical reformers in the sixteenth century primarily wanted a more pronounced break with the old church hierarchy than did the followers of MARTIN LUTHER or JOHN CALVIN. Some of these disparate groups gathered under Menno Simons and gave rise to the first historic peace church, Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM). Nonresistance was but one of their agreed principles; others included BAPTISM of adults, separation of CHURCH AND STATE, separation from unbelievers, and refusal to swear an oath. Strict dispensationalists, they argued that the New Testament was a radical departure from the Old. Therefore, they found a new, overriding commandment in Jesus's command that they "turn the other cheek." However, the circumstances of their time also influenced other beliefs. Eschewing infant baptism and demanding rebaptism on joining their church, the Anabaptists became a threat to the established churches of the time. Under a realized threat of death from governments controlled by both Catholics and other Protestant groups, Anabaptists pulled away. Although Anabaptists affirmed that God created government and its police powers to control the ungodly, they firmly believed that as children of God they had no need for the government's police powers. Integrating this concept of a necessary and God-ordained division between church and state with their pacifist interpretations of the New Testament, the Anabaptists developed an innovative concept of nonresistance. Over time, Anabaptists split over issues of property and church discipline into MENNONITES, HUTTERITES, and AMISH, all of which have retained the basic precepts.

The next group, the Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), emerged in England in the seventeenth century. Early Friends were followers of OLIVER CROMWELL; some even participated in his army. During the years of the Cromwell protectorate some radical reformers objected both to the refined theological arguments of the Puritans (see PURITANISM) and to the rituals of Catholics and Anglicans (see ANGLICANISM). They formed a new group, renouncing theologically trained preachers and relying on an inner light of the Holy Spirit to first convict and then give joy. When PACIFISM became a part of this mix is open to dispute. Certainly by the late seventeenth century it was a fundamental part of Quaker beliefs. Early Friends may not have relished doctrinal debates like the Puritans, but they did have biblical bases for their beliefs. Their pacifism, however, appears to have been founded on the concept of inner light, equality of humankind, and a realization that killing meant permanently extinguishing another person's inner light. Unlike Anabaptists, Quakers did not despair of the world, and so were more willing to participate in politics and to assume some "inner light" within others. Therefore, their view tended more to pacifism than nonresistance. Within short decades they moved to the New World and later onto continental Europe.

The Brethren (see BRETHREN, CHURCH OF), the last of the historic peace churches, appeared in the lower Germanic states at the beginning of the eighteenth century. Their roots in the Reformation can be traced to Radical Pietists (see PIETISM) and an established Anabaptist tradition. The source of their nonviolent stance is uncertain, although most would argue that Brethren base this on scripture. Few written records of early Brethren exist and much present analysis depends on contemporary Anabaptist accounts. Most argue that church leaders were heavily influenced by local Anabaptists, but that does not explain why they chose nonresistance.

All three of the peace churches migrated to the New World, so much so that by 1770 there were no Brethren left in Europe. Most found a welcome home in Pennsylvania by invitation of WILLIAM PENN, an English Quaker of influence. Penn's new land, founded on Quaker principles of forthright and egalitarian treatment of NATIVE AMERICANS, proved hospitable, although the immigration of settlers was open to all and eventually these plain people were outnumbered. Quakers withdrew from active participation in the government. By the time of the Revolution, Pennsylvania threw itself into the war, leaving these gentle people in an untenable position. Not only was the bearing of arms a problem, but so was the payment of taxes to a state at war. Nonresistant Brethren in particular came under suspicion by their neighbors as loyalists, which to some extent was true.

Some Mennonites and other smaller pacifist churches, such as the Molokans and Doukhobors, remained in Eastern Europe, although as conscription became reality in some of these countries the issue of conscientious objection surfaced. Many fled to other nations where they hoped to find a more friendly environment. Those coming to the United States were able to avoid the issue of conscientious objection until the southern states seceded. The CIVIL WAR produced particular problems for Quakers, whose creed forbade slave ownership (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). Over the preceding decades some Friends had become more actively involved in reform issues; to ignore the largest reform issue of the century was difficult. Some Quakers did join the Union army; others, however, along with Mennonites and Brethren, used the substitution provisions to avoid military service. Most of the peace churches merely felt relieved to have the option of substitution and did not worry about the issue of morality in buying one's way out of service.

Shortly thereafter a new millennialist church arose in the United States under CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL (see MILLENNIALIST AND MILLENNIALISM). This new church, The Watchtower Bible and Tract Society or JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES, was neither pacifist nor nonresistant, for they fully planned and expected to fight at Armageddon, which they anticipated imminently. However, because of their belief in the innately corrupt nature of this world, they refused to cooperate with any government no matter how important or righteous the cause; they preferred to hasten the return of Jesus Christ by allowing events to take their course. Determining their position in a peace tradition became problematic for themselves and for outsiders, especially at the start of WORLD WAR I.

Not until the reinstatement of a draft in World War I did the peace churches have to confront the difficulty of adhering to nonresistance in conflict with a strong national government. The intervening period had been so peaceful that many of the church districts found that the new generation needed instruction as to why the churches chose nonresistance. Indeed, they also found that they needed to explain to the government and their neighbors the sincerity and reality of their beliefs. As patriotism hit a fever pitch in the United States, those not supporting the war effort found themselves called slackers, and at times painted yellow, or tarred and feathered. Those not purchasing war bonds were ostracized at best, assaulted at worst. Nonresistance men, drafted into the army and promised alternative service, found an uncertain world with no rules or regulations for either the army, the government, or the nonresistant draftee. Treatment at camps varied, ranging from gentle persuasion to outright, unapologetic abuse. Accounts differ as to how many eventually took up arms, but the number was high. Others made some accommodation. Still others, absolutists, refused all participation, and many of these, especially Jehovah's Witnesses, ended up incarcerated at Fort Leavenworth .

Two decades later storm clouds rumbled over Europe; the historic peace churches took note and decided to actively seek change in federal policy. In 1940, in an unprecedented move, representatives of the historic peace churches and their offshoots met with President Franklin Roosevelt and then with representatives from the Selective Service Board in Washington, D.C., to present a plan for an alternative service. With the full support of the churches, the government, and the military, Civilian Public Service became a reality. By the end of the war these conscientious objectors were doing important work, often taking the place of drafted orderlies and nurses in mental hospitals, volunteering as guinea pigs for medical testing, and jumping forest fires. Many of the men began to question their roles, their lack of pay, and their hidden presence in the system, although groups like the Old Order Amish and the Hutterites liked the system. Jehovah's Witnesses, for the most part, simply refused even to participate in Civilian Public Service and went to prison.

Just War Adherents

The pre-Reformation originators of the just war theory—St. Ambrose and St. Augustine of Hippo—based their understanding of moral theology on the circumstances of their world. In simplest terms these theologians felt that a just war was one fought for a just cause, justly conducted by a Christian ruler, and aimed for a just peace. During the Reformation, Martin Luther, wrestling with similar circumstances, came to a similar conclusion. John Calvin took the theory a step further when he closely identified the church with a godly state. Within the next decades most Protestants adhered to the concept of just wars, leaving nonresistance to the radical wings.

As the nations of Europe shifted from wars of religion to wars of national conquest, few Protestants worried about the morality of war, only the immediate effects. With the start of the ENLIGHTENMENT in the eighteenth century, however, others began to question the wisdom of using war to solve disputes. In his advocacy of the supremacy of human reason, Voltaire noted with interest the Quakers in England as rational, peaceful individuals. Like many Enlightenment philosophers, Voltaire was a deist, and not Christian, and certainly not Protestant, although these arguments for reliance on reason and science to produce an improving world and belief in progressively improving civilization for human kind engendered calls for civil reform. These reform movements inevitably merged with Protestant churches in Europe and America. Reform issues actively supported by Protestant churches in this period included abolition, woman suffrage, social welfare, child labor, and pacifism. Utopian societies sprouted within secular and religious communities.

Emphasis on the perfectability of humankind, or at least improvement, created a fundamental change in the nature of Protestant denominations, moving away from salvation by FAITH to an emphasis on social responsibility; this shift culminated in the SOCIAL GosPEL of the late nineteenth century. Protestant churches, however, did not limit themselves to their own nations, but moved outward across the world in missionary movements to save souls and improve social and cultural standards, according to their own views (see MISSIONS, MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS).

Reality made perfectability ephemeral. In the United States, secular and religious pacifists faced a moral dilemma in the Civil War because most who chose pacifism were also abolitionists. A similar dilemma in World War I frustrated not only pacifists in the United States, but also those in Europe. The British struggled with the intransigence of local pacifists; GERMANY resorted to putting them in mental hospitals. Caught up in war fever on both sides of the Atlantic, ministers blessed the war effort from their pulpits. After the war, in a general revulsion against the horrific events of a war to end all wars, a revival of the repugnance against all things military emerged in areas of Europe as well as the United States. WOODROW WILSON'S vision of a League of Nations may have been a well-worn joke among diplomats in Paris, but the concept caught the imagination of intellectuals and ecclesiastica. Diplomats amended their views and signed a series of arms-reduction treaties in the 1920s, capped by an effort to outlaw war at the end of the decade. Protestant churches backed this new antiwar sensitivity, but the backing tended to be superficial only, espoused by elites with advanced university degrees and college students with a rosy view of their own generation. The Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Federal Council of Churches, and the Peace Pledge Union found a constituency in the 1920s and 1930s among ecumenical Protestant churches at the time on both sides of the Atlantic. How much all of this fed into a growing isolationism in the United States is unclear, but isolationism appears to have been more prevalent at all levels of society than a nascent pacifism.

Events in Germany undermined this widely held Protestant belief in the progressively improving lot of humankind. Mainland European Protestant pacifists faced the issue faster than those in the United Kingdom, the dominion, or in the United States, but the realization came hard to many. REINHOLD NIEBUHR, originally a mainline Protestant pacifist, found the realism of Nazi Germany difficult to reconcile with a pacifism based on the assumption of the goodness of humankind. His shift toward a reinterpretation of the Augustinian position of the just war illustrates the intellectual evolution of many at the time.

Although there was initial reaction on both sides of the Atlantic to the war, and some participation in alternative military service by Protestant members of nonhistoric peace churches during the war, the relative numbers were surprisingly small, given the expressed support of a Christian or secular peace stance in the preceding decades. The war enjoyed wide support, but the events in Hiroshima shifted the dynamics once again. Although the start of the Cold War went largely unquestioned in the United States, the fervent Cold War mentality and actions created a backlash, unleashing the quiescent undercurrents of pacifism, although the foundations of this new pacifism had shifted. No longer did it depend on the assumption of the perfectability of humankind, but rather on the objection to certain wars, types of wars, and types of weaponry. The definition of a just war no longer centered on the leadership of church or state, but on the consciences of individuals.

In addition, this new pacifism among Protestants emerged not only along the traditional north Atlantic nexus, but in AFRICA and in the south Pacific. As colonies broke with their mother countries, Protestant churches established by colonial missionaries created their own identities. The definition of “just” reflected their unique circumstances. For instance, South African Protestant, non-Afrikaner churches, black and white, questioned a draft to support a government founded on the dishonorable structure of apartheid (see SOUTH AFRICA).

Throughout the world, the 1960s produced cultural and social changes within many societies. For the United States, the Vietnam War and civil rights efforts in the South engendered a cultural revolution reflected in a notable segment of society that was antiwar and pro-social justice. A typical slogan was “If you want peace, work for justice.” This amalgam of social reform spilled into unexpected areas of the country. The historic peace churches that had always maintained the need for a separation from society began to debate among themselves involvement in wider social issues, if not outright participation in government. Mennonites and Brethren found antinuclear weaponry, antiwar, antidraft, and civil rights activism based on civil disobedience easy to support. Moreover, young church members found the alternative to military service disturbingly easy because it did not involve suffering or personal witness. Growing momentum within these churches toward a proactive stance threatened to split the conservative from progressive branches, although points of doctrine were also at issue—separation from the fundamentalist movements of the earlier part of the century. Yet the movement of the historic peace churches from nonresistance toward the newer forms of pacifism exhibited in mainline Protestant churches worldwide is noteworthy. Reevaluation of church/state relations remains problematic and is certainly premature. Passive acceptance of the state with firm traditions of noninvolvement appears to have mutated into a proactive self-view of witness in an evil world. The primary exception to this shift, however, remains the Jehovah’s Witness groups worldwide, who maintain their old separation from other denominations and the state. They will not fight on behalf of any earthly, corrupt government, but wait expectantly for the imminent return of Christ, where they plan to fight at Armageddon. Not surprisingly, small numbers of the Jehovah’s Witness were found in prisons as conscientious objectors in most of the old Soviet Union satellites at the collapse of communism.

References and Further Reading

- Bainton, Roland H. Christian Attitudes Toward War and Peace: A Historical Survey and Critical Re-evaluation. New York: Abingdon Press, 1960.
- Brock, Peter, and Nigel Young. Pacifism in the Twentieth Century. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1999.
- Bush, Perry. Two Kingdoms, Two Loyalties: Mennonite Pacifism in Modern America. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998.
- Duffy, Michael K. Peacemaking Christians: the Future of Just Wars, Pacifism, and Nonviolent Resistance. Kansas City, KS: Sheed & Ward, 1995.
- Dyck, Harvey L., ed. The Pacifist Impulse in Historical Perspective. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996.
- Moskos, Charles C., and John Whiteclay Chambers II, eds. The New Conscientious Objection: From Sacred to Secular Resistance. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Stoffer, Dale R. Background and Development of Brethren Doctrines, 1650–1987. Philadelphia: Brethren Encyclopedia, Inc., 1989.

Yoder, John Howard. Christian Attitudes to War, Peace, and Revolution: A Companion to Bainton. Elkhart, IN: Goshen Biblical Seminary, 1983.

DOROTHY O.PRATT

CONSERVATIVE BAPTIST ASSOCIATION

The association of about 1,200 congregations and 225,000 members was founded in Atlantic City, New Jersey, in 1947, mainly as a result of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy in the old Northern Baptist Convention (NBC, now the AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES/USA).

In 1920, conservatives in the NBC founded the Fundamentalist Fellowship to stop the spread of theological liberalism throughout the denomination and to resist the growth of the NBC's centralized denominational bureaucracy (see FUNDAMENTALISM, LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). The fundamentalists focused their attention on the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society (ABFMS), whose "inclusive policy" of appointing both conservatives and liberals as missionaries they found especially worrisome. Conservatives objected to the society's using their contributions to support unorthodox missionaries and accused the ABFMS of being unresponsive to their complaints. To overturn this policy, the fundamentalists proposed that the NBC adopt a binding statement of faith that would necessarily drive liberals from the DENOMINATION. But they soon divided over the best way to achieve their goals. In 1923, militant fundamentalists withdrew from the Fundamentalist Fellowship to form the BAPTIST BIBLE UNION; but even its more aggressive approach failed to achieve success. In 1933, most of the militants withdrew from the NBC to establish a denomination of their own, the GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTISTS.

The moderate fundamentalists remained in the NBC but were no more successful than the militants at influencing denominational direction. In the early 1940s, conservatives again mounted a campaign against the theological inclusiveness of the ABFMS, which continued to resist the conservatives' demands for tighter theological controls over missionary appointments. After decades of trying, the conservatives finally despaired of ever reforming the ABFMS and took steps to found the Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS) in 1943. Denominational leaders, fearing adverse financial consequences, resisted the conservatives' attempt to get the CBFMS recognized as one of the approved agencies of the NBC. In retaliation, conservatives withheld funds from the NBC, which in response changed denominational bylaws in 1946 to give voting rights in the annual convention only to contributing churches to the NBC. Thus outmaneuvered and excluded from denominational influence, about 200 congregations withdrew from the NBC and founded the Conservative Baptist Association of America (CBA) in 1947.

Over the next few years, hundreds of additional congregations joined the new CBA. In Arizona and Minnesota, Conservative Baptists gained control of the NBC-affiliated state Baptist conventions. Over the next few years, Conservative Baptists founded a number of other institutions. In 1950, they established the Conservative Baptist Home Missions Society and the Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary in Denver, Colorado. The seminary was founded after both the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary in Chicago and the Eastern Baptist Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, the NBC's most conservative SEMINARIES, refused to break ties with the Convention and join the new Conservative Baptist movement. A couple of years later, Conservative Baptists also recognized Western Baptist Theological Seminary, which was founded as an NBC seminary in 1927 in Portland, Oregon. In addition, over the years Conservative Baptists founded or approved a number of other educational institutions: Southwestern Bible College in Phoenix, International College in Hawaii, Northeastern Bible College in New Jersey, and the Seminary of the East in Pennsylvania.

Despite this proliferation of institutions, Conservative Baptists insisted on remaining organizationally decentralized. From the NBC's formation in 1908, many Baptists had opposed denominational centralization because it undercut the autonomy of the local churches and their freedom to pick and choose which Baptist agency or society that they wanted to support. Thus Conservative Baptists took care to keep their various societies and schools structurally and financially independent of one another. Each entity had its own board of directors, statement of faith, and fundraising strategies. Local congregations contributed to them as they saw fit. In this way, Conservative Baptists preferred independence over efficiency.

During the 1950s and 1960s, Conservative Baptists struggled over THEOLOGY and the issue of affiliations with groups outside their movement. Many Conservative Baptists were troubled that the doctrine of premillennialism was not affirmed in all of the statements of faith adopted by Conservative Baptist organizations. The Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society included premillennialism in its founding statement of faith, but the Foreign Missionary Society did not. The Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary's doctrinal statement contained premillennialism, but some Conservative Baptists complained that the statement was not explicitly dispensational premillennialism, a distinction that many Conservative Baptists thought should be required (see DISPENSATIONALISM). In addition to this theological dispute, Conservative Baptists argued over the propriety of Conservative Baptist churches affiliating with non-Conservative Baptist organizations. Some congregations in the movement maintained an official, but low-key relationship with the NBC, while others joined the new multidenominational NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS. Many Conservative Baptists insisted on a more separatistic line that prohibited any association with those with whom there was not complete theological and denominational agreement. By the mid-1960s, several hundred separatistic Conservative Baptist congregations, mainly in the Midwest and Rocky Mountain region, withdrew to form the Fundamentalist Baptist Fellowship and other groups.

By 2000, the Conservative Baptist movement had undergone considerable change, though its overall number of churches and members had remained more or less static for decades. The CBFMS and the CBHMS changed their names to CBInternational and Mission to the Americas, respectively. In 1999 Conservative Baptist headquarters, which contained offices for the CBA and the two mission agencies, moved from Wheaton, Illinois, to Littleton, Colorado. The CBA is now organized into nine regions, whose leaders (directors) make up the CBA board. Despite early fears over centralized denominational structures, the CBA is now working to establish a sense of “denominational” loyalty and identity, and has developed the beginnings of mutual financial relationships by which the Conservative Baptist regions donate a percentage of their collections to the CBA and the CBA donates back a percentage of its collections to the regions. As with many other church organizations in the twenty-first century, the growing edge of the Conservative Baptist movement comes from new ethnic congregations as a result of recent immigration patterns in the United States.

See also Bible Colleges and Institutions

References and Further Reading

Finzel, Hans W., ed. Partners Together: 50 Years of Global Impact, The CBFMS Story. Wheaton, IL: CBFMS, 1993.

Shelley, Bruce L. A History of Conservative Baptists. Wheaton, IL: CB Press, 1971.

TIMOTHY P. WEBER

CONSISTORY

In Catholic usage, the word “consistory” refers to an assembly of cardinals presided over by the Pope called to ratify decisions of particular importance for the entire CHURCH, such as the selection of new cardinals. In Protestant usage, it came to mean a court called to make important decisions within a particular area controlled by a Protestant government. These decisions often dealt with problems of marriage, and in that respect Protestant consistories can be regarded as successors not to the Consistory in Rome but rather to the courts of Catholic bishops, which also spent much of their time handling problems of MARRIAGE, especially cases alleging breach of promise. The earliest consistories established in Saxony by MARTIN LUTHER and his associates had this as a primary function. In many Lutheran states, however, the Consistory developed into an administrative body appointed by the sovereign to supervise the church within his state. It inherited many of the powers exercised by bishops in areas that were Catholic.

A different model of the consistory developed in areas that adopted the Calvinist version of Protestantism. JOHN CALVIN emphasized the importance of discipline, on the responsibility of a Protestant church not only to establish correct belief, but also to require correct behavior (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). To this end, when he was invited to take over supervision of the Reformed Church in Geneva, he insisted on the creation there of a new disciplinary institution called the Consistory, and actually drafted himself the ECCLESIASTICAL ORDINANCES that created it. The Consistory of Geneva was technically a committee of the local city government, made up of all the pastors on the city’s payroll plus a dozen lay commissioners or “elders” selected for one-year terms in the elections in which that government was reconstituted every year. It summoned before it a high percentage (about one-fifteenth) of the entire adult population of the republic every year for questioning.

People were questioned not only on marriage and related morals problems, but also on survivals of Catholic practices, on displays of disrespect for government and church officials, and on quarrels within families or among business associates. In the area of marriage cases, the Consistory exercised the right to recommend DIVORCE with permission to remarry, a right not allowed in Catholic courts. The Consistory resolved many of these problems by itself, acting as a kind of compulsory counseling service. But it could refer behavior involving suspected violations of law to the city government for further examination and punishment. And it also claimed the right to levy sentences of excommunication, without any right of appeal to the councils governing the city, for people judged to be guilty of serious offenses who seemed unwilling to change. This claim was hotly challenged, but after an extended controversy, the Consistory won the uncontested right to use excommunication, and repeatedly did, asking for further penalties, including banishment, for people who did not display repentance sufficient to win back from the Consistory the right to receive Communion.

In every area into which CALVINISM spread, consistorial discipline went with it, and bodies modeled on the Geneva Consistory were created. In FRANCE they were called “consistories.” In SCOTLAND they were called “kirk sessions.” In the German community of Emden, the mother church for Dutch Calvinism, it was called the “presbyterium.” Local circumstances, to be sure, led to considerable changes in the operations of these bodies. In France, where Protestants were at best tolerated but distrusted minorities, a consistory was created entirely within the Reformed community, often included deacons as well as pastors and elders within its membership, and usually spent more time in resolving quarrels than in administering discipline. In the NETHERLANDS, where Calvinist Protestants were a privileged minority, consistories were again voluntary associations depending on the consent of members without assured support from local governments to enforce decisions, and thus were hesitant to use excommunication. Only in Scotland, where the entire country adopted Calvinist Protestantism, did institutions fully resembling the Geneva Consistory take root. In almost every state in which Calvinism became important, however, discipline came to be highly valued, and some sort of institution was created to help maintain it.

References and Further Reading

- Mentzer, Raymond A., ed. Sin and the Calvinists: Morals Control and the Consistory in the Reformed Tradition. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Publishers, 1994.
- Lambert, Thomas A., and Isabella M. Watt, eds. Registres du Consistoire de Geneve au Temps de Calvin. Translated by Wallace McDonald. Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 2000.
- Die Kirchenratsprotokolle der Reformierten Gemeinde Emden (1557)*, edited by Heinz Schilling and Klaus-Dieter Schreiber, 2 vols. (1989, 1992), and the works there cited, a number of which, by Schilling, have been translated into English under the title Calvinism (1991).
- Graham, Michael F. The Uses of Reform: 'Godly Discipline' and Popular Behavior in Scotland and Beyond, 1560. Leiden, Netherlands: E.J.Brill, 1996. ch. 9.

ROBERT M.KINGDON

CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION

The Consultation on Church Union (and also, for a time within that context, the Church of Christ Uniting) was known in the UNITED STATES by the acronym COCU. The project stemmed from a sermon preached in 1960 in Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, by EUGENE CARSON BLAKE, then stated clerk of the Presbyterian Church and later general secretary of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. The goal was “a church truly catholic, truly evangelical, and truly reformed.” Participating denominations have included the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH, the Christian Church (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, the International Council of Community Churches, the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH (USA), the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, and the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

COCU’s first “plan of union,” published in 1970, envisaged full institutional merger, but failed to win approval from the sponsoring bodies. Continuing discussions developed and refined a “theological consensus” (1984) that by 1989 had been accepted by the churches as an “expression in the matters with which it deals, of the apostolic faith, order, worship, and witness of the church.” Meanwhile, the form of unity envisaged had shifted to a “covenant communion” that still claimed “organic” character while stopping short of the “organizational.”

Difficulties remained, however, over questions of ministerial order, especially at the level of “oversight” or “episcopé.” Presbyterians retained a historic suspicion of bishops, whereas Episcopalians were concerned to preserve a historic succession of them (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY).

COCU stagnated for much of the 1990s, but at the turn of the century seemed to perk up again. At its plenary meeting in 1999 (the first for ten years), a recommendation was issued that called on the denominations to declare by 2002 a mutual recognition as churches that would cover the apostolic faith (as “expressed in the Apostles’ and Nicene Creeds”), BAPTISM (mutually recognized since 1978), ordained ministries (as “given by God as instruments of God’s grace”), “celebration of the Eucharist together with intentional regularity,” shared engagement in mission, and development of “structures of accountability, consultation, and decision making.” The churches would work at finding by 2007 the means for a full reconciliation of ordained ministries such as would allow complete interchangeability of service between the denominations (see CLERGY). Integral to the entire process would be a pledge to “erase racism,” particularly to “combat systematic white skin color privilege.” More broadly, there would be a commitment to “oppose all marginalization and exclusion in church and society based on race, age, gender, forms of disability, sexual orientation, and class.” The new relationship among the denominations would operate under the title of Churches Uniting in Christ.

References and Further Reading

Consultation on Church Union. Churches in Covenant Communion: The Church of Christ Uniting. Princeton, NJ: Consultation on Church Union, 1989.

Consultation on Church Union. In Quest of a Church of Christ Uniting: An Emerging Theological Consensus, rev. ed. Princeton, NJ: Consultation on Church Union, 1980.

“Consultation on Church Union,” Mid-Stream 39 (January/ April 2000).

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

CONVENTICLES

The term “conventicles” refers to groups of Christians meeting privately to pray together and study the BIBLE. Conventicles are characterized by two basic criteria. First, they are attended by people with common religious practices, whose piety and the resulting praxis pietatis is significantly different from the way of religion usually practiced. Second, conventicles distance themselves in a critical, usually separatist manner from the official CHURCH recognized by the authorities.

Although the term did not yet exist in the sixteenth century, conventicles are initially linked in Protestantism with the radical wings of the REFORMATION. From the early BAPTISTS (CONRAD GREBEL in Zurich, from 1523), through the foundations of Christian core communities (JAKOB HUTTER in Mähren, from 1533) to the ecclesologically new approaches of MENNO SIMONS, conventicles form the nuclei of new religious entities. In terms of theological history, the conventicles of English PURITANISM had a particularly significant impact. Although the early separatism of the Elizabethan period had become insignificant by the beginning of the seventeenth century, the need for a closer, voluntary community of like-minded believers continued to exist. Starting in 1616, Henry Jacob developed the model of a semiseparatist church in England, taking his example from the I Corinthians 14, which met with great popularity. The members of this church made a COVENANT with God and with each other characterized by particular religious convictions and a pointedly dedicated praxis pietatis.

English refugees in the NETHERLANDS introduced the body of Puritanic thought to the Reformed ORTHODOXY. With his reform movement Nadere Reformatie, the Dutchman Gisbert Voetius took up the Puritans demand for pious gatherings, which were termed “conventicles” in the Netherlands, for mutual strengthening and edification in FAITH. However, Voetius’s reform movement continually stressed that these gatherings should always remain within the framework of the recognized state church. But Jean de Labadie, from Middelburg, the Netherlands, opposed this demand, and in 1669 made an exodus from “Babel,” the state church, with his conventicle. This tension between the conventicles and the official church shaped the development of PIETISM and the revivalist movement in Europe (see REVIVALS). Whereas the recognized authorities of Pietism (PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER, AUGUST HERMANN FRANKE, and JOHANN ALBRECHT BENGEL) pleaded for the continued existence of the conventicles, by then mostly called Collegia pietatis, radical Pietists set up their conventicles as new communities of true believers. Of those who detached themselves from the recognized church, only NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINSENDORF’S Herrnhuter Brüderge-meine (MORAVIAN CHURCH) gained recognition from the authorities in some territories. The exodus from the European Babel became a leitmotif of a large number of pietistic conventicles. In this context, and on the basis of the personal contacts of WILLIAM PENN to European conventicles, Pennsylvania became a preferred exile land and mission area.

References and Further Reading

- Bellardi, Werner. Die Vorstufen der Collegia pietatis bei Philipp Jakob Spener. Breslau: 1930; reprint Gießen 1994.
- Brecht, Martin, ed. Geschichte des Pietismus: Der Pietismus vom siebzehnten bis zum frühen achtzehnten Jahrhundert. vol. 1. Göttingen: Vanderhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993.
- Gäbler, Ulrich, Auferstehungszeit. Erweckungsprediger des 19. Jahrhunderts. Munich: C.H.Beck, 1991.
- Goertz, Hans-Jürgen, ed. Radikale Reformatoren. Munich: C.H.Beck, 1978.

ANDREAS MÜHLING

CONVERSION

The word conversion appears infrequently in the BI-BLE, yet it is integrally related to such biblical concepts as repentance, regeneration, JUSTIFICATION, and being born anew. Conversion refers to the human turning to God that is the result of and response to divine GRACE. It is a radical turning in that it changes the very root and core of a person's life, marking a wholesale reversal of beliefs, values, and behavior, as well as a realignment of allegiances. In the Bible, conversion is a turning from SIN to the obedience God desires, from idolatry to the one true God, from darkness to light, from evil to the goodness of God. It means dying to self and rising again in Christ. Throughout church history, the nature and substance of this turning have often been debated, sparked by the question of where FAITH begins. Does faith originate within human beings as they experience a capacity for good works and then turn to God for help in attaining them? Or does it originate solely within the freedom and grace of the sovereign God to love the human family despite the fact that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Romans 3:23)? Similarly, is conversion a onetime, unrepeatable, life-changing event that grows out of a soul-shaking crisis? Or is it a gradual, lifelong process that involves many turnings in the course of one's life? To address these questions, we turn first to the Bible and then to some of the major voices in the history of the church: Saint Augustine in the fourth century, JOHN CALVIN and MARTIN LUTHER in the sixteenth, and KARL BARTH in the twentieth.

Conversion in the Bible

The Hebrew word shub, meaning "to turn back" or "to return," is used in the Old Testament to denote the change of direction by which human beings turn away from sin and radically reorient their lives in the service of God. In the New Testament epistrophe, metanoia, and their cognates denote repentance and conversion, both of which involve the total “turning around” of human life. These words signify both a physical turning and a radical reorientation of one’s inner self, emphasizing the totality of a person’s life. The English word “conversion” comes from the Latin conversio, meaning “to turn around.” Being converted is rather like making a U-turn.

In the Old Testament the turning involved in conversion is sometimes applied to God, who turns divine anger toward the Israelites in some instances and away from them in others (cf. Numbers 25:4; Joshua 7:26, 24:20). The predominant use of this idea, however, is its application to the nation of Israel. The prophets never tired of calling the Israelites to turn around—to repent and begin anew—in their relationship with God and neighbor. They were to turn away from their self-destructive fascination with foreign gods to the WORSHIP and service of the sovereign Lord who had freed them from the bonds of slavery and given them the promised land. The prophet Joel trumpets an oft-repeated prophetic theme: “Yet even now, says the Lord, return to me with all your heart, with fasting, with weeping, and with mourning; rend your hearts and not your clothing. Return to the Lord, your God, for he is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love, and relents from punishing” (Joel 2:12–13). Thus, turning to God is an act of human volition firmly rooted in the nature of God to be gracious and loving and merciful. So thoroughly committed was God to the Israelites’ return that God promised through Ezekiel, “A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and I will remove from your body the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh. I will put my spirit within you, and make you follow my statutes and be careful to observe my ordinances” (Ezekiel 36:26–27). The picture that emerges is (1) conversion is the work of God; (2) it involves a total inner change born of the Spirit of God; and (3) not only the inner life is changed, but also one’s behavior as God’s statutes and ordinances are carefully followed (cf. Jeremiah 32:39–40).

Turning to the New Testament, Paul’s Damascus road experience (Acts 9:1–27; cf. Acts 22:1–21, 26:9–23; Galatians 1:11–17; Philippians 3:2–11) is often regarded as the prime example of conversion in the Bible. Yet it has been effectively argued by Krister Stendahl that Paul was called rather than converted, and that Paul certainly did not undergo a change of religion commonly associated with the word “conversion.” Indeed, Paul continued to serve the same God, but with a new mission—that of proclaiming the gospel to the Gentiles. The moment of divine call on the Damascus road, therefore, stood in clear continuity with his religious past, a religious past that was itself prologue to the Damascus road experience. To be sure, what happened en route to Damascus was a radical turning point in Paul’s relationship with God, a relationship now centered in the person and work of Jesus Christ.

Jesus himself introduces the theme of conversion in the New Testament by announcing that the KINGDOM OF GOD has come near and, on this basis, all are called to turn to God. Jesus is likewise clear that turning to God involves the confession of sin and the conviction that God has acted decisively for the SALVATION of the world (cf. Mark 1:14–15; Matthew 3:2, 6, 8). Indeed, for Jesus such turning to God is the very fruit of God’s benevolence.

The New Testament is replete with images of this fruit of God’s dawning kingdom. At times it is the direct result of healing (cf. Acts 9:35), and at other times is descriptive of a person's radical reorientation to the attachments of this world (cf. Acts 14:15) signified in the death of the old self and rebirth in Jesus Christ (cf. Ephesians 4:22–24; Romans 6:6–8; Colossians 3:9–10). Conversion is also seen as turning “from darkness to light and from the power of Satan to God” (Acts 26:18; cf. Acts 26:20; II Timothy 2:25), and sometimes as God's universal purpose for all creation (cf. Acts 15:19—even the Gentiles are turning to God—Acts 17:30, 26:19–20; Matthew 28:19–20; Luke 24:47; II Peter 3:9). Throughout the New Testament, God's mercy in Jesus Christ is the decisive element in conversion. In fact, the wide and generous mercy of God is the only reason that human beings have the ability to make a U-turn with their lives (cf. Matthew 20:15; Romans 2:4; Luke 5:31–32), a U-turn that leads to nothing less than joy within God's own being (Luke 15:7, 10).

Yet the stab of conscience is also a crucial part of turning to God—remorse for sin, and the deep desire to pick up the pieces of one's life and begin again, confident that one is not forever held captive to past sins. Reminiscent of Joel 2, Jesus describes repentance in foreboding terms as personal sorrow for sin (cf. Matthew 11:20–21) and sounds a solemn warning of the inevitable judgment of God (cf. Matthew 3:10; Luke 13:3–5).

One of the most remarkable references, however, is Paul's claim that “when one turns to the Lord, the veil is removed” (II Corinthians 3:16), suggesting that human turning and the very self-revelation of God are bound up together. In fact, Paul goes so far as to say that only through the revelation of Jesus Christ was he able on that Damascus road to turn to God (cf. Galatians 12b).

The prophetic voice calling human beings to turn from idolatry is also present in the New Testament. Conversion is not just intellectual assent, but also loving and serving the one true God to the exclusion of all others. Nothing less than the total transformation of human life is what conversion means, and for a new creature in Christ there will be a new outlook on God and neighbor, and new ethical standards to uphold (cf. I Thessalonians 1:9; Hebrews 6:1).

Saint Augustine

The Protestant Reformers were greatly influenced by the writings of Augustine of Hippo (354–430 A.D.). Like Paul, Augustine experienced a dramatic turning point, yet it was neither sudden nor abrupt. In fact, Augustine had long struggled with the realities of faith over against a wantonly sensual life. One day, in the midst of this struggle, he overheard a child's voice across a garden wall saying, tolle, lege; tolle lege, meaning take up and read; take up and read, and he opened the Bible to Romans 13:13–14 and heard the Word of God address the demons within. Augustine understood this as a moment of divine grace flooding into his life. There was no merit on his part to pave the way, only grace; no accomplishment to his credit, only grace; no innate capacity for goodness, only grace. His turning to God was not the object of his will or desire. Instead, it came quite from outside himself and was supremely the gift of God's love in Jesus Christ.

Augustine insisted that original sin renders the human will incapable of turning to God, so conversion is totally a work of divine grace. In Adam and Eve all have sinned and are prisoners of rebellion, totally helpless to free themselves. The human will is not free of its own volition to choose God, so God breaks down the dividing wall of hostility by divine grace. To be sure, the human will is not obliterated but is completely dependent on the grace of God (cf. I Corinthians 15:10). For Augustine, however, the hinge of the whole affair is ELECTION. The debt of sin is forgiven by grace, but the giving of grace is determined by election. Furthermore, only by grace do human beings persevere in their turning to God.

One of the more significant debates in the history of the church took place between Augustine and Pelagius over these very issues. Pelagius believed that humans have the innate ability to choose what is good and then to act on their good choice. The human creature knows what God desires because of the commandments God has given. But more than that, God has also bestowed on human beings the freedom to choose whether to obey or disobey them. In other words, inherent within human beings is the free will to do good, the free will to turn to God on their own. Augustine believed that Pelagius's teaching was HERESY and accused him of elevating sinners to the position of coauthor of their own salvation. Although Augustine won the argument, some form of Pelagianism always has been alive and well within the CHURCH.

From Martin Luther to John Calvin to Later Evangelicalism

At the time of the Protestant REFORMATION, conversion often referred to the vocational calling to monastic life as distinct from the secular world. Martin Luther (1483–1546), believing that this erroneously established two classes of Christians, refused to accept any distinction between “secular” and “religious” Christians. He insisted that the total self-commitment expected of monks and nuns should also be expected of every believer. Conversion, therefore, denoted for Luther the lifelong pilgrimage to complete self-commitment to God. He spoke of conversion as an unrepeatable entrance into the Christian life through BAPTISM, but also as a repeatable event occasioned by penitence and the confession of sin. Being a lifelong pilgrimage conversion functioned for Luther as a continual participation in the divine grace given in Jesus Christ, so that each time a sinner confesses and is forgiven, he is said to be converted anew.

John Calvin (1509–1564) also believed conversion to be a lifelong process of regeneration begun in baptism, although like Augustine, Calvin emphatically insisted that everything depends on the grace of God given to the elect. Divine grace is indeed the origin of all human goodness—the unceasing theme of gratitude and joy that holds the Christian life together. Furthermore, the only hope of persevering in grace is that God personally bends, forms, and directs the human heart to righteousness, although the work of grace is begun only in the elect. If a right will, an inclination toward goodness, exists in a person, it is because of that person's election by God before the foundation of the world. Those who turn to God and are converted were chosen to do so by divine will. Notably, Calvin also uses the word conversion to describe repentance, suggesting that turning to God requires not just inner remorse but also putting off the old nature to become new creatures in Jesus Christ. Like Luther, the turning of conversion requires the total transformation of human life both in outward works and in the soul itself.

Although Luther and Calvin were of one mind concerning the lifelong process of regeneration begun in baptism, later evangelical movements soon began to speak of conversion as a single watershed event after years of discretion are reached. PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER (1635–1705), often considered the father of PIETISM, believed—true to his Lutheran heritage—that regeneration occurs at baptism in infancy. Yet he also insisted that Christians must undergo a second regeneration, and the pietists came to speak of this second regeneration as conversion. On this basis, a double standard was established whereby true Christians were distinguished from ordinary church members. Spener further believed that people may often lapse from the state of grace, requiring additional conversions, a position much in contrast with Calvin’s understanding of the perseverance of the saints.

The Wesleyan Movement (see WESLEYANISM) in England, largely influenced by German Pietists, was responsible for yet another significant departure from Luther and Calvin by dissociating regeneration from baptism. JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791) practiced the baptism of infants, yet insisted that infants could not be regenerated because regeneration must be a conscious, subjective experience. Over time the evangelical movements (see EVANGELICALISM) emphasized more and more the subjective consciousness until, for many, this became the central goal of religion. These movements understood that people cannot be said to be converted to the Christian faith until they have passed through such a subjective experience. The Calvinists believed that the certain knowledge of one’s election and regeneration, although highly desirable, does not necessarily follow. However, the Wesleyans came to believe that one’s subjective awareness of regeneration is essential to regeneration itself. If a person has not experienced and felt it, then it has not happened. These evangelical movements thus paved the way for FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) to define THEOLOGY as a systematizing of the religious selfconsciousness, which opened wide the door to a theological emphasis on having a conversion experience.

Karl Barth

The NEO-ORTHODOXY of Karl Barth (1886–1968) was a strong reaction against Schleiermacher and the emphasis on religious experience, and thereby returned to many of the central themes of Protestant theology espoused by Luther and Calvin. For example, Barth speaks of the total transformation of a person’s life and will that is involved in turning to God, and he emphatically states that the revelation of God’s love in Jesus Christ is the center of conversion, not what human beings feel through subjective experience. Barth insists that the real subject of Paul’s turning is not Paul, but the living Christ who encounters Paul on the Damascus road. God reveals not a truth or a philosophical concept that gives meaning to life, but Jesus Christ. Divine revelation therefore is the only thing that makes it possible for a human being to turn to God and be reconciled (Galatians 1:12). The crux of the matter is this: Jesus personally met Paul on the road to Damascus; Jesus made him both a witness to and a servant of the living God. Did Paul make a decision? Of course he did. However, Barth says that Paul’s was “a decision which can only follow that already made concerning him by Jesus. He knows only as one who is known by Him. This is why his knowledge has the power...radically to transform his life” (Barth 1961:198).

Open-ended Discussion

The church will always struggle with discordant views of what turning to God means. There remains a distinct tension between the Reformed view that places God at the center of conversion as an objective, redeeming presence, and the evangelical emphasis on a subjective conversion experience particularly after years of discretion are reached. Yet the voices that remain in the mainstream of the Protestant tradition are those that sustain the melodies of divine grace in ceaseless doxology for the love of God poured out on the cross.

References and Further Reading

- Saint Augustine. Confessions. Translated by Henry Chadwick. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- “Saint Augustine: Four Anti-Pelagian Writings.” In The Fathers of the Church, Volume 86. Translated by John A. Mourant and William J. Collinge. Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 1992.
- Baillie, John. Baptism and Conversion. New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1963.
- Barth, Karl. Church Dogmatics IV.3. Edited by G.W. Bromiley and T.F. Torrance. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1961.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion, II.3.6–14., II.5.9., III.3.5–6. Edited by John T. McNeill. Translated by Ford Lewis Battles. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1960.
- James, William. The Varieties of Religious Experience. Garden City, NY: Image Books, 1978.
- Kerr, Hugh T., and John M. Mulder, eds. Famous Conversions. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1983.
- Standahl, Krister. Paul Among Jews and Gentiles and Other Essays. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1976.

STEPHEN W. PLUNKETT

COOK, THOMAS

(1859–1912)

Methodist evangelist. Cook was born August 20, 1859 in Middlesborough, ENGLAND. Converted at 16 during a mission at the South Bank WM Chapel, he became a member of its mission band, leading cottage and open-air meetings. He conducted his first mission in Cumbria in 1879. Shortly after he received the blessing of entire SANCTIFICATION and offered himself for the Methodist ministry. This offer was declined but his talents were recognized by the secretary of the Home Mission Committee who appointed him to the post of lay evangelist in the Halifax and Bradford District. There his efforts were rewarded with tremendous successes. In 1882 he became a Methodist minister and was immediately appointed Connexional Evangelist, as Methodists responded to the opportunities demonstrated by James Caughey (1810–1891), Methodist revival preachers. In his first year over 5,000 adults and children were led to SALVATION through his missions.

Cook conducted many of these missions all over Britain and the world, to NORWAY (1886), SOUTH AFRICA (1892), AUSTRALIA, and Ceylon (1894–1895). He was particularly effective as an evangelist to young people, at schools and colleges, publishing Full Salvation: A Talk to Undergraduates. A Book on Soul Saving Preaching that stressed repentance to God and the offer of full and free salvation from SIN. Cook was associated with the Southport Convention (est. 1885), the Wesleyan Methodist expression of a renewed emphasis on holiness springing from a rediscovery of JOHN WESLEY'S doctrine of Christian Perfection (see HOLINESS MOVEMENT). His book New Testament Holiness (1920) was a classic of its time.

His involvement in the Gospel Mission Care movement, with rural and seaside campaigns, made him a natural successor to Thomas Champness as superintendent of the Joyful News Mission in 1903. The establishment of Cliff College as a training center for lay evangelists in Derbyshire with Cook as first principal was the apex of a career cut short by his death on September 21, 1912.

See also Evangelism, Overview; Methodism, England; Wesleyan Methodism

References and Further Reading

Wood, A.S. On Fire for God: Thomas Cook. Ilkeston, UK: Moorleys, 1983.

TIM MACQUIBAN

COOKE, HENRY (1788–1868)

Irish Presbyterian church leader and political activist. Cooke was born on May 11, 1788, the son of a county Londonderry tenant farmer. Educated for the Presbyterian ministry at Glasgow University, he emerged in the 1820s as the eloquent and relentless leader of a campaign against the theological and political liberalism that had characterized mainstream eighteenth-century Irish Presbyterianism.

The liberals, some of whom had become Anti-Trinitarian (see ANTI-TRINITARIANISM), rejected the theology of the Westminster formularies, statements that had been required for ordinands (candidates for ordination to the ministry). Politically, some liberals had been leaders in a movement to unite Irish people of all denominations to achieve radical political reform and Irish independence.

Cooke succeeded in persuading the Synod of Ulster, the governing body of mainstream Irish Presbyterianism, to reaffirm its trinitarian theology and establish a committee to test the ORTHODOXY of future ordinands. Seventeen ministers and their congregations withdrew to form a nonsubscribing synod, whereas the orthodox victory led to a union of the Synod of Ulster with the conservative Secession Synod to inaugurate the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, embracing 650,000 souls and characterized by Cooke's EVANGELICALISM and anti-Catholicism (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

He was less successful politically. Most Irish Presbyterians remained Liberals in politics until Home Rule in 1886, and rejected his efforts to draw them closer to the episcopal Church of Ireland in a united Protestant front against resurgent Roman Catholicism, including his death-bed appeal in 1868 to Protestant electors to vote Tory and save the Church of Ireland from disestablishment. They did support him, however, in his unionism and his opposition to Daniel O'Connell's campaign to repeal Ireland's 1801 parliamentary union with Britain.

He published nothing of substance, although some of his sermons and speeches were printed.

References and Further Reading

Holmes, Finlay. Henry Cooke. Belfast: Christian Journals, 1981.

Porter, J.L. Life and Times of Henry Cooke. Belfast: William Mullan, 1875.

R.FINLAY HOLMES

COTTON, JOHN (1585–1652)

Puritan theologian. Cotton was an influential Puritan preacher-theologian in ENGLAND and, after 1633, in New England's Massachusetts Bay Colony. Born in Derby, England, he embraced PURITANISM during his studies (B.A. [1602]; M.A. [1606]; B.D. [1613]) at Cambridge University. He was a Lincolnshire vicar from 1612 until 1632, when he fled to the Bay Colony to avoid arrest for NONCONFORMITY. As Teacher of Boston's First Church, he played a prominent role in church and civic affairs. Practical considerations alone prevented his participation in the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY.

Commonplaces of CALVINISM after JOHN CALVIN and particularities of Puritan reform combine in his thought. He espoused COVENANT THEOLOGY, Predestinarianism, Ramist logic, and "plain style" PREACHING. The inward experience of the Holy Spirit was his signature theme. This emphasis led him to urge limiting church membership to those giving testimony of their CONVERSION experience. It sometimes sparked disputes with colleagues over DOCTRINE, including—in the proceedings against ANNE HUTCHINSON, his devoted follower—Cotton's apparent softness on ANTINOMIANISM.

Milk for Babes (1646), his children's CATECHISM, was widely used until 1700. His ecclesiology distinguished CONGREGATIONALISM (a term he popularized and perhaps coined) from separatist independency, which he considered anarchy. Its principles shaped the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM (1648). Against ROGER WILLIAMS, he defended Puritan legislation restricting "religious liberty."

No “Cottonian school of theology” arose; no critical edition of his collected works exists. Yet his life and works have long been recognized as indispensable resources for studies of trans-Atlantic Puritanism.

References and Further Reading

- Bush, Sargent, Jr. “John Cotton’s Correspondence: A Census.” Early American Literature 24 no. 2 (1989):91–111.
- Emerson, Everett. John Cotton, rev. ed. Boston: Twayne Publishers, G.K.Hall & Co., 1990.
- Hall, David D., ed. The Antinomian Controversy, 1636–1638: A Documentary History, 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990.
- Ziff, Larzer. The Career of John Cotton: Puritanism and the American Experience. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1962.
- , ed. John Cotton on the Churches of New England. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1968.

JAMES O.DUKE

COUNTER-REFORMATION

The terms “Counter-Reformation” and its counterpart “Catholic Reform” or “Catholic Reformation” have long been employed to characterize Roman Catholicism during the early modern era. The terms represent divergent interpretations of early modern Catholicism, and define it largely in terms of its relationship to Protestantism (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM). Recent scholarship has questioned their ad-equacy and suggested alternatives, without denying their usefulness.

“Counter-Reformation” was first used by the German Lutheran historian Johann Stephan Pütter in a publication of 1776. Generally it came to connote the view that the Catholic Church was progressively declining during the late Middle Ages until something had to happen, that is, the Protestant REFORMATION. Measures subsequently taken by the Catholic Church were seen as essentially responses to the challenge of MARTIN LUTHER and the Reformers, most of them defensive and intended to counter or suppress the Protestant movements. Without the Reformation, there would have been no Catholic reforms, it was argued. “Counter-Reformation” points especially to the repressive measures taken against Protestants, such as the foundation of the Roman Inquisition (1542) and the first papal Index of Prohibited Books (1554). It constitutes the attempt of the Council of Trent (1545–1563) to clarify the Catholic position on doctrines called into question by the Protestants, and thus its decrees, for example, on the relationship between Scripture and TRADITION, JUSTIFICATION, and the SACRAMENTS. Emphasized by “Counter-Reformation” are the political and military efforts of Catholic princes and ecclesiastics to hold off Protestantism or to restore Catholicism, such as the Spanish Armada launched against England by Philip II of Spain in 1588, and the campaigns of Catholic emperors forcibly to recatholicize large areas in the Austrian lands and Bohemia in the seventeenth century. The confessional militance of the Counter-Reformation appeared prominently in the religious wars in FRANCE (1562–1598) and in the Thirty Years War (1618–1648).

Catholic Reformation

The term “Catholic Reformation,” although coined earlier, was introduced into general usage by the Protestant historian Wilhelm Maurenbecher in a publication of 1880. Along with “Catholic Reform,” it was developed in response to “Counter-Reformation.” It located the origins of the Catholic Reform in measures undertaken or attempted in the late Middle Ages, such as the Observant movement in many religious orders that called them back to a stricter observance of their rules, or the reform decrees issued for Spain by the National Council of Seville in 1478. It thus indicated a continuity between these and the more effective measures that followed the shock of the Protestant Reformation. Indeed, for some the term “Catholic Reform” implied the extreme position that the Catholic Church would have reformed itself from within even had there been no Protestant Reformation. The Catholic Reform included the reform decrees of the Council of Trent. These laid down norms for bishops and pastors of parishes, especially regarding their obligations of residence and of preaching, and they established the parish as the center of Catholic life. They outlined a program for the education and formation of parish priests, which required each diocese to establish its own seminary, and they dealt with many abuses regarding, for example, the veneration of images, indulgences, and other practices. Implementation was another matter, and it took place only gradually and to varying degrees in different areas. The foundation of new active religious orders of men and women, usually by charismatic individuals, was a major part of the Catholic Reform. Most significant was the Society of Jesus or Jesuits, founded by the Spaniard Ignatius Loyola and approved by the papacy in 1540. Among the foundations of women, who often faced considerable ecclesiastical opposition, the Ursulines stood out. Their founder was the Italian lay woman Angela Merici, and they received initial papal approbation in 1544. The Catholic Reform also resulted in a revived papacy, which peaked in the pontificate of Clement VIII (1592–1605) and, in the long run, in a greater centralization of the church.

Recent Developments

Most scholars today agree that both “Counter-Reformation” and “Catholic Reform” characterized early modern Catholicism while disagreeing about the precise weight to be accorded to each. For some the two terms taken together do not exhaust the reality. For example, one cannot easily include under either of these terms the far-reaching missionary activity in Asia, the Americas, and to a lesser degree AFRICA of the early modern Catholic Church, nor the flowering of mysticism in Saints Teresa of Avila or John of the Cross, nor the efflorescence of Baroque art. For this reason they prefer the bland but more comprehensive term “Early Modern Catholicism,” while recognizing that the two traditional terms will continue to be used, and legitimately so, provided that one realizes that a part is being used to designate the whole.

Some recent scholarship has tended to evaluate more positively the state of the Catholic Church on the eve of the Reformation and so to make it more difficult to attribute the success of the Reformation to abuses within the church. This view would tend to see in the Reformation movements and in Early Modern Catholicism competing attempts to update Christianity to the changing world and religious aspirations of the sixteenth century. Similar to this is the approach that, although not denying the differences between Protestant and Catholic, emphasizes the parallels between the Protestant movements and developments within Catholicism, such as frequent close association with the state, concern for education at all levels, a more individualist piety, and attempts to elaborate spiritualities for Christians living in the world.

References and Further Reading

- Bireley, Robert. The Refashioning of Catholicism, 1450–1700: A Reassessment of the Counter Reformation. London: Macmillan and Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1999.
- DeMolen, Richard L., ed. Religious Orders of the Catholic Reformation. New York: Fordham University Press, 1994.
- Duffy, Eamon. The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England, c.1400–c.1580. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Hsia, R.Po-Chia. Social Discipline in the Reformation: Central Europe, 1550–1750. London and New York: Routledge, 1989.
- O'Malley, John W. The First Jesuits. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- . Trent and All That: Renaming Catholicism in the Early Modern Era. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000.
- Peters, Edward. Inquisition: Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989.

ROBERT BIRELEY

COVENANT

In Christian (and Jewish) theology, covenant refers to the special relationship between God and the elect. This relationship was voluntarily engaged in by God, first in Paradise and renewed (Genesis 3:15) after Adam and Eve had disobeyed God's commandment not to eat from the tree of knowledge. This renewal was couched in the form of a promise to Adam and Eve that from their seed would be born the one who would destroy Satan. Christians understand this as referring to Jesus, the promised redeemer whose death of atonement releases the descendants of Adam and Eve from the consequences of the sin of disobedience. Because God had given Adam and Eve the commandment not to eat from the tree of knowledge, the contractual aspect of covenant with its obligations by both parties—God giving the creation and Adam and Eve obeying the commandment—was stressed by the term double covenant, which was used in Reformed theology in the seventeenth century.

Covenant historians hold that Protestant covenantal theology derives from the works of MARTIN BUCER (1491–1551), JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564), and in particular from those of HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575). Primarily because of the great Reformation debate concerning the place of good works—or obedience to God’s law—in the process of salvation, the contractual as well as the promissory nature of God’s covenant continued to be stressed. Because Protestants emphasized the gratuitous (free) character of the covenant and the inability of humans to fulfill the requirement of obedience without the work of the Holy Spirit, they preferred to speak of the covenant of grace: God not only established the contract but also enabled a person to fulfill its terms. PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560), MARTIN LUTHER’S (1483–1546) collaborator, used the promise of the covenantal relationship in his Loci communes and in his expositions on the gospel of Matthew in the early 1520s, but HEINRICH BULLINGER composed the first Protestant elaboration of the doctrine of the covenant (Baker, “Heinrich Bullinger”). Covenant historians have treated the development of that doctrine as almost exclusively the work of theologians in the REFORMED CHURCHES and in PURITANISM (Weir 1983). These Reformed Churches are generally referred to as Calvinist. The development of covenantal theology from the beginning of the Christian Church to its Reformed definitions ending with KARL BARTH (1886–1968) is treated here with summaries of the ideas of the major theologians and a critical evaluation of seventeenth-century covenantal theories by Bertus Loonstra. Loonstra also refers to Jacob Arminius’s alleged introduction of a covenant between God the Father and Jesus, the Son, but like other ideas of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century theologians taken from late medieval mystics, that pact was the subject of fifteenth-century mystery plays.

The denominational correctness that marks Protestant polemics of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries still plagues modern church historians, who often underline differences in covenantal theology by insisting on the primacy of a favorite Reformer and his independent development, or trace most subsequent development back to Bullinger, its sixteenth-century fountain (cf. Visser, “Ursinus”). The historical studies listed in the references demonstrate that covenant was (and is) a flexible concept that occasioned frequent disagreements. For example Bullinger, Melanchthon, and his student, Zacharias Ursinus, apparently saw no difficulty in integrating God’s covenant with the doctrine of God’s ELECTION (Coenen 1963:128–134). But the covenantal condition of obedience to God’s law led to questions such as those raised by Arminians that God’s PREDESTINATION (election) was also conditional and thus not, as proposed by Calvin and stressed by his followers, absolute and eternal. Some interpreters of Calvin have even argued that the doctrine of the covenant is absent from his theology, but these are in a minority (Lillback, “Conundrum”). In the sixteenth century, disagreements among Protestants had already led to increasingly precise definitions of doctrine. These generally were summed up in CONFESSIONS of territorial and national churches. These confessions often occasioned elaborate explanations in defense of a territorial Church’s right to exist. An important example of this is afforded by the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (HC), which began its life in 1563 as a confessional document establishing a purer reformation in the German palatinate. It was later adopted as an official document of the Reformed Churches at the SYNOD of Dordt in 1618. Its explanation was written by Zacharias Ursinus. He was a student and lifelong admirer of Philipp Melanchthon, a fact that is usually overlooked by Reformed scholars. Covenant historians see Ursinus as an important link between Bullinger and seventeenth-century covenant developments. Ursinus treated covenant in his explanation of Question 18 of the Heidelberg Catechism, which follows on the questions concerning Sin, God's wrath, and the believer's inability to achieve salvation. The covenant is integrated into the theology of redemption: "Covenant is so called because it is the promise of reconciliation and while we speak of the Old and New Testament, there is but one eternal covenant." This he repeats in his treatment of Gospel under Question 19, where he reproduces a play on the two Greek words Eppangelia and evangelia. These have different meanings that are often glossed over: eppangelia means the promise of a future redeemer, and evangelia (gospel) the teaching of the redeemer who is already there (Visser, "Ursinus"). Ursinus repeats the well-known usages for covenant and also discusses the chronological sequence of the covenant of creation (at the beginning of the world), the Mosaic covenant (the establishment of the Ten Commandments that replaced the moral law of nature), and the fulfilment of the law by Christ and the subsuming of the Ten Commandments in the two commandments of the Sermon on the Mount.

Antecedents

The covenantal relationship was always implicit in the writings of the fathers of the church, and occasionally received special attention in polemics against heretics. Those of the third-century Irenaeus of Lyon were edited by Erasmus and thus available to the sixteenth-century reformers. In the exegetical writings of medieval scholars, the covenantal idea was often presented by the metaphor of marriage, namely the marriage between God and the Church, for which such texts as John 3:29 and Ephesians 5:30 served as evidence. The marriage ring or wedding band (in French alliance, which is also French for covenant) was described by medieval mystics as the symbol of the indissoluble link between God and the believer. It reinforced the meaning of religion, which is derived from the Latin for "binding together." The idea came naturally to speakers of German, which translates "covenant" with the word "bund" This marriage metaphor dominated the writings of mystics such as Wessel Gansfort (1419–1489) and can also be found in those of Erasmus and Protestant reformers. Martin Luther clearly drew on Wessel Gansfort in 1520 in his On the Freedom of the Christian, and Melanchthon often spoke of marriage as an image of Christ's relationship to the church. The metaphor was still important in Samuel Willard's lectures on the Shorter [Westminster] Catechism (Boston, 1725). The believer is reminded of this bond by the two sacraments of baptism and communion as signs of the covenant at work, namely the washing away of sin and atonement through the death of Christ.

The Covenant and Salvation History

The covenantal relationship also became a vehicle for interpreting salvation history (e.g., Melanchthon and Bullinger) by focusing on God's repeated restoration of the covenant in spite of the people's frequent disobedience. The Reformers often prefaced their discussions of the covenant with an exposition of synonyms used in the Bible and by the church fathers such as treaty, contract, testament, and promise. Melanchthon stressed the consolation implicit in God's voluntary covenant and preferred the word promise. Foedus, the Latin word for covenant, became the term of choice. It gave rise to federal theology, which received its fullest treatment in the work of JOHANNES COCCEIUS, a professor of theology at the University of Leiden. He had received his preparatory education in Bremen, Germany, where the Reformed doctrine of communion had been introduced by Albert Hardenberg (1510–1574), a friend of Melanchthon's, and further defined by Christopher Pezel (1539–1564), who had set himself the task of gathering and publishing Melanchthon's works and correspondence. It is not surprising, therefore, that Cocceius based his systematic covenantal theology not only on scriptural evidence of God's love acting in salvation history, but also on events in the life of the Christian Church. This too was an elaboration of existing ideas, for example of the theory of the ages of the church and the program of Lutheran historians to write a history of the church that focused on the witnesses to faith who represented the visible church of past centuries. This project is known as the Magdeburg Centuries, the history of the church published by MATTHIAS FLACIUS.

Later Developments

In the development of covenantal theology, the debate on obedience reflects the polemics against the antinomians, who proposed that because of the salvation through Christ, the works of Mosaic law were suspended. The Reformers stressed the need for obedience to the law, not because it helped one obtain salvation, but as an act of gratitude for that salvation and as a sign by which Christians were known (cf. Büsser, in Coenen 1963:159–170). In covenantal theology, the requirements of the law, also referred to as works of gratitude (e.g., in the HC), were discussed as the covenant of works, that is, the human counterpart to God's covenant of grace. In English PURITANISM, in the desire of the strict Calvinists for a further (or second) Reformation, and especially in later PIETISM, the covenant of works led to a large volume of manuals for the Christian life (Von Rohr) or what LUTHERANISM had defined as vocation according to Matthew 20:16. The emphasis placed on obedience through works also gave rise to more polemics, for example those concerning the observance of the sabbath and what type of work was permitted on the Lord's day. Some authors referred to the Fourth Commandment as the fourth covenant (Visser). The covenantal dimension of the Ten Commandments also comes to the fore in the utopian Christianopolis (1619) by the strict Lutheran superintendent of Wurtemberg, Johann Valentin Andreae (1586–1654), who made them into the constitution of his ideal city. Once incorporated into the systematic theology of the leading Protestant churches, the covenant retained its importance in the explanation of God's special relationship to the believer. The subsequent commentaries on the Heidelberg Catechism with the Handbuch edited by Lothar Coenen at the quarcentenary (1963) of the HC may serve as examples. The ethical dimension of covenant theology that dominated Puritan writings also remains important, for example in the writings of Paul Ramsey, which he admitted he derived from Karl Barth (Werpehowski, "Christian Love”). Barth wrote that the gracious election to the covenantal community with Jesus Christ was the purpose of God’s creation, thereby recalling the socioethical consequences of covenantal theology (Barth 1958: Vol. III, pt. 1, 96, 231). In the latter part of the twentieth century, the covenant was also seen as an ecumenical tool by the various denominations interested in opposing the spread of secular ideologies in the Southern Hemisphere and for dealing with cultural pluralism in general (Mount, “The Currency of Covenant”). The ecumenical development is rather a departure, for the biblical concept of the covenant for a chosen people was exclusive, even superior (Jospe, “Chosen People”). This view also became prevalent in Reformed circles (Gerstner, “The Thousand Generation Covenant”) and is based on the covenant with Abraham (Genesis 17) and the New Testamental 1 Peter 2:9. It played a role in the opposition of Scottish Presbyterians or Covenanters to King Charles I (1600–1649), who was an Anglican. They, in common with other reformed countries, saw the nation as a new Israel. The concept of a chosen people is also one of the roots of South Africa’s system of apartheid (Smith, “Covenant and Ethics”). The ecumenical movement’s use of a universal or inclusive covenant is the focus of a series of articles in the Journal of Ecumenical Studies. Eric Mount’s review of covenant studies further reveals a continued debate on the role of covenant in political developments, in particular that of federalism including the American Revolution (Bullinger). Among these studies, that of Daniel Elazar has met with approval. He recognizes the distinction between God’s covenant and covenants engaged in between communities of equals to obtain and/or preserve their liberties, but he stresses Reformed covenantal thought as the source for a revival of ancient federalist traditions. In the second half of the sixteenth century, when rulers engaged in war to restore Roman Catholicism, numerous writings were produced to justify resistance based on the duty to obey God before a ruler who imposes erroneous (i.e., Roman) forms of worship. The arguments of these writings are summed up in the Vindiciae contra tyrannos (1579), in which the right to resist is derived from Roman and medieval contract theory. Its anonymous author wrote of a “double contract” requiring the individual to obey his contract with God before obeying that between the individual and the ruler when that ruler demands actions contrary to God’s commandments. Feudal law, notwithstanding the practice of subinfeudation, recognized the primacy of a vassal’s obligations to his liege lord, who to the believer is God. The Vindiciae addresses political exigencies created by the Reformation that might place a Protestant citizen or group of citizens under a Catholic (heretical) ruler (Visser, “Junius”).

References and Further Reading

- Baker, J.Wayne. “Heinrich Bullinger, the Covenant and the Reformed Tradition in Retrospect.” Sixteenth Century Journal 29 (1998):359–376.
- Barth, Karl. Church Dogmatics. Translated by G.W. Bromiley. Edinburgh: Clark, 1958.
- Bullinger, Heinrich. “A Brief Exposition of the One and Eternal Testament or Covenant of God.” Translated and edited by J.Wayne Baker. In Fountainhead of Federalism. Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenantal Tradition. J.Wayne Baker and Charles McCoy. Louisville, KY: John Knox Press, 1991.
- Coenen, Lothar, ed. Handbuch zum Heidelberger Catechismus [Manual of the HC]. Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchner Verlag, 1963.

- Elazar, Daniel J. Covenant and Commonwealth: From Christian Separation Through the Protestant Reformation. (The Covenant Tradition in Politics, Vol. II). New Brunswick, NJ: Publisher's Transactions, 1996.
- Gerstner, Jonathan N. The Thousand Generation Covenant: Dutch Reformed Theology and Group Identity in Colonial South Africa, 1652–1814. Leiden: Brill, 1991.
- Jospe, Raphael. "The Concept of a Chosen People: An Interpretation." Judaism: A Quarterly Journal of Jewish Life and Thought 43 (1994):127–148.
- Lillback, Peter A. "The Continuing Conundrum: Calvin and the Conditionality of the Covenant." Calvin Theological Journal 29 (1994):22–74.
- Loonstra, Bertus. Verkiezing—Verzoening—Verbond. Beschrijving en beoordeling van de leer van het pactum salutis in de gereformeerde theologie. [Election—Reconciliation—Covenant. A Description and Critique of the Doctrine of the Pactum salutis in the Theology of the Reformed Churches]. The Hague: Boekencentrum, 1990.
- Mount, Eric Jr. "The Currency of Covenant." The Annual of the Society of Christian Ethics (1996): 295–310.
- Rohr, John von. The Covenant of Grace in Puritan Thought. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986.
- Smith, David J. "Covenant and Ethics—Comments from a South-African Perspective. The Utilization of Calvinist Metaphors in the Growth of Apartheid Mythology." Annual of the Society of Christian Ethics (1996):265–282.
- Visser, Derk. "Zacharias Ursinus. Melanchthons Geist im Heidelberg Katechismus" [Melanchthons Spirit in the HC]. In Melanchthon in seinen Schülern [Melanchthon in his Students]. Edited by Heinz Scheible. Wiesbaden: Harrasowitz, 1997. 373–390.
- Visser, Derk. "Junius, the Author of the Vindiciae contra tyrannos?" Tijdschrift voor Geschiedenis 84 (1971):510–521.
- Visser, Hugo B. De Geschiedenis van den Sabbatstrijd onder de Gereformeerden in de zeventiende eeuw [The History of Sabbatarian Polemics Among the Reformed in the Seventeenth Century]. Utrecht: Kemink, 1939.
- Weir, David A. Foedus Naturale: The Origins of Federal Theology in Sixteenth-Century Reformed Thought. Ph.D. dissertation, University of St. Andrews, 1983.
- Werpehowski, William. "Christian Love and Covenant Faithfulness." The Journal of Religious Ethics 19 (1991):103–131.

DERK VISSER

COVENANT THEOLOGY

This term normally designates a mode of THEOLOGY that emerged in the second half of the sixteenth century and flourished primarily among theologians of the Reformed, or Calvinist (see CALVINISM), tradition in GERMANY, SWITZERLAND, ENGLAND, and the New England colonies of North America. Its characteristic feature was the organization of a theological system around the idea of dual covenants between God and humanity. By the mid-seventeenth century, the covenant, or "federal," theology shaped a considerable body of Reformed thought about GRACE, ETHICS, SACRAMENTS, the CHURCH, and the state.

Covenant thought represented the Protestant attempt to construct theology from scripture alone, and its adherents took their cues especially from the Old Testament narratives of God's COVENANT with Abraham (Genesis 15) and David (2 Samuel 7), which accentuated God's unconditional grant of favor; the Sinai Covenant (Exodus 19–24), which promised favor on condition of obedience; Jeremiah's vision of a "new covenant" with Israel, inscribed in the heart; and the New Testament's linkage of the new covenant with the sacrificial death of Jesus. By 1561, proponents of covenant thought began to join these ideas to a notion that God covenanted with Adam before the fall, that Adam (as humanity's representative) failed to meet the covenant conditions, and that God graciously responded through a second covenant with Abraham. One aim of the covenant theology was to hold in tension an affirmation of both divine sovereignty and human responsibility.

The Dual Covenants

JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) in Geneva and HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) in Zurich both used the idea of covenant to emphasize the continuity between the Old and New Testaments and to defend infant BAPTISM by virtue of its analogy with the circumcision that sealed the Abrahamic covenant. Zwingli's successor, JOHANN HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575), also represented the covenant as the foundation of a Christian republic. But the typical features of the covenant theology found expression only when Zacharias Ursinus (1534–1583), a professor of dogmatic theology at the University of Heidelberg, emphasized in his Catechesis, summa theologiae (c. 1561) a distinction between a "covenant of nature" (foedus naturale) made with Adam before the fall on behalf of all humankind and a "covenant of grace" providing SALVATION for the elect. The covenant of nature required perfect moral obedience as the condition of eternal happiness, a condition that Adam failed to meet. The subsequent covenant of grace required only FAITH, which Ursinus viewed as a gift of divine grace. The distinction helped explain why humanity bore the guilt of Adam's sin, why men and women remained subject to the moral demands of the natural covenant even after Adam's fall, and why they could no longer attain salvation by obedience to it.

The classic European exposition was the Summa doctrinae de foedere et testamento Dei (1648) of the German theologian JOHANNES COCCEJUS (1603–1669), who taught at the universities of Franeker and Leyden in the NETHERLANDS. The covenantal idea reached England especially through the Sacra Theologia (1585) of the English Calvinist Dudley Fenner (1558?–1587), who sharpened the concept by defining the natural covenant as a covenant of works (foedus operum). The covenant of works still obligated Adam's heirs to moral obedience, but salvation came only through the covenant of grace. Through the influence of Fenner and the Puritan preacher WILLIAM PERKINS (1558–1602), the covenant theology guided English Puritan reform, and by the end of the sixteenth century some Puritan separatists envisioned the church as a local congregation that required an explicit covenant among its members (see PURITANISM).

Some historians restrict the meaning of "covenant theology" to theological systems organized by the dual covenants of works and grace. Others extend the meaning to include any early modern theological system that made extensive use of the covenant metaphor. Some interpret the language of conditionality in covenantal thought as a softening of the Calvinist doctrine of PREDESTINATION or ELECTION. Others point out, more accurately, that covenant theologians incorporated subtle distinctions that preserved the Reformed insistence that salvation was entirely a gift of sovereign grace to God's elect, chosen from eternity. They observe that the covenant between God and humanity was both conditional and absolute, imposing conditions for salvation and pledging God's fidelity to the faithful, but also making absolute promises of saving grace to the elect, who alone would have true faith.

Political Thought

Covenantal thought had political implications that became evident as early as 1534, when Heinrich Bullinger argued that civil laws were founded in the covenant. The HUGUENOTS who resisted the Catholic monarch in France, especially the author of the Vindiciae contra tyrannos (1579), sometimes argued that the covenant with God governed the covenant between king and people. The German jurist JOHANNES ALTHUSIUS (1557?-1638) contended in his Politics (1603) that political life rested on implicit covenants, grounded in the covenant with God and logically prior to civil law, that enhanced human flourishing in families, voluntary associations, ascending levels of political governance, and a sovereign commonwealth administered by princes. Covenantal ideas inspired the Scottish Presbyterians who signed a National Covenant (1638) to resist the Prayer Book imposed by King Charles I in England and a "Solemn League and Covenant" (1648) with the English Parliament during the CIVIL WAR. A few historians have contended that covenant thought flowed into eighteenth-century political federalism.

As early as the mid-seventeenth century, Protestants outside the Calvinist tradition made use of covenantal images, continuing to use them into the nineteenth century, especially in the widely accepted definition of sacraments as seals of the covenant of grace. The twentieth century saw a recovery of covenantal thinking, evident in sources as diverse as the theology of KARL BARTH and the religious sociology of the American Robert Bellah, but the label "covenant theology" is best reserved for the early modern Reformed thinkers, who defined the covenants of works and grace as the organizing principle for theology and biblical interpretation.

See also Church and State, Overview; Congregationalism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Holifield, E. Brooks. The Covenant Sealed: The Development of Puritan Sacramental Thought in Old and New England, 1570–1720. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1974.
- McCoy, Charles S., and Wayne J. Baker. Fountainhead of Federalism: Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenantal Tradition. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1991.
- Von Rohr, John. The Covenant of Grace in Puritan Thought. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1986.
- Weir, David A. The Origins of the Federal Theology in Sixteenth-Century Reformation Thought. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1990.

E. BROOKS HOLIFIELD

COVERDALE, MILES (1488–1568)

English Bible translator and reformer. Born in 1488 in the north of ENGLAND, Coverdale died in London in 1568. Known primarily as the first translator of the entire BIBLE into English, Coverdale was ordained into the Roman Catholic priesthood in 1514, but by the early 1520s had embraced Lutheran precepts (see LuTHERANISM), attending meetings at the famous White Horse Tavern. When fellow White Horse frequenter ROBERT BARNES was charged with HERESY, Coverdale helped him mount a defense, and then fled to the continent to avoid arrest. While abroad he drew on German translations of the Bible and Apocrypha, the Zurich Bible, and WILLIAM TYNDALE'S New Testament to produce the first complete English Bible. After the Bible was introduced in England in 1535 Coverdale put forth several subsequent editions, and also provided English translations for a number of MARTIN LUTHER'S writings.

Named bishop of Exeter during Edward VI's reign, he was deprived of his title when the Catholic Queen Mary assumed power. Although never officially reinstated, Coverdale assisted at archbishop MATTHEW PARKER'S consecration in 1559. Coverdale's growing support of PURITANISM came to light when he attended this ceremony without cope and miter. After Coverdale earned a Doctor of Divinity from Cambridge, Edmund Grindal assigned him a living in a London church. Further evidence of Coverdale's Puritan leanings emerged when he resigned that living in 1563 rather than conform to a strict observance of the LITURGY. He died five years later and was buried in St. Bartholomew's Church in London.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Coverdale, Miles. Remains of Myles Coverdale. Edited by Rev. George Pearson, The Parker Society, vol. 14. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1844.

———. Writings and Translations of Myles Coverdale. Edited by Rev. George Pearson, The Parker Society, vol. 13. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1846.

Secondary Source:

Mozley, J.F. Coverdale and His Bible. London: Lutterworth Press, 1953.

KAREN BRUHN

CRANMER, THOMAS (1489–1556)

Archbishop of Canterbury and compiler of the ANGLICAN BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. The future archbishop of Canterbury was born in July 1489 into a family of minor Nottinghamshire gentry, the son of Thomas Cranmer of Aslocton and his wife

Agnes Hatfield. An uninspiring elementary education either at the hands of the parish priest or of a private tutor was followed by a period at grammar school, of which he later had dire memories. His father died in 1501, when he was twelve, and his elder brother John inherited the modest estate. Agnes decided to seek a career for her younger son and, perhaps detecting an ability that no one else had noticed, entered him at Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1503. A century later this would have been a normal rite of passage for a young gentleman, but that was not so when Cranmer was young, and it clearly signaled ecclesiastical ambitions. However, there was nothing brilliant about young Thomas, who plugged away at the arts curriculum for eight years before taking an undistinguished degree in 1511.

In 1514, at the age of twenty-five, Cranmer had received an M.A. degree. Dull as he may have found the formal curriculum, his intellectual curiosity was aroused by humanists such as Erasmus and Faber, whose influence was growing in the university during those years. Cranmer became a good classical Latinist, and began to study Greek and Hebrew. At about the time of his second graduation, Jesus College elected him to a fellowship, which was not a mark of distinction, but indicated a recognized commitment to academic life. However, shortly afterward he did something highly unconventional—he got married. This offended against no law, given that he was not in orders, but because college fellowships were designed for those intending to be ordained, he resigned in 1516. This episode later loomed large in the folklore of the English REFORMATION, but in fact it was brief and tragic. His wife's name was Joan, and they lived together at the Dolphin Inn, a circumstance that caused his enemies to claim that she was a barmaid. In fact she seems to have been of suitable status for a man in his position, and during their brief marriage he supported himself as reader at Buckingham College, which had no rule of celibacy. A year later Joan died in childbirth, taking their child with her.

We do not know how he took this blow, but his reaction was to return to his original career rather than to seek another wife. Very exceptionally, Jesus College then reelected him to his fellowship, indicating that he had become a valuable member of the college community. In about 1520 he was ordained a priest, and in 1521 received his bachelor of divinity degree. By this time he was over thirty, several heads of colleges were younger, and he showed no particular ambition. In 1525 he became reader in divinity, having rejected an invitation to move to Oxford as a founding fellow of Cardinal College, and in 1526 achieved the doctor of divinity degree. By this time he was noted in the university as a follower of the “new learning,” and as an examiner was very strict in his insistence on biblical knowledge. This made him unpopular with some of his more conservative colleagues, but there was no suggestion that he was considered unorthodox.

By 1527 this relatively obscure don was beginning to get involved in high politics. Probably the initiative came from Cardinal Wolsey (1475–1530), who had recognized his abilities two years earlier. He did not leave Cambridge but began to travel to London for consultations about KING HENRY VIII's matrimonial problems (which required experts in both theology and canon law) and even undertook some minor diplomatic missions. Clergy of his background were often used in this way, but Cranmer was unusual in that he held no benefice, and his only administrative experience was as proctor's auditor. However, these developments help to explain why he left the university in 1529 to work full time on the king's problem.

What had happened was that Henry was getting nowhere with his canon law case and was switching to scripture-based theology, on which Cranmer was an expert. In October 1529 he was summoned to see the king and left with instructions to prepare a treatise on the matter. He entered the service of the Earl of Wiltshire (Anne Boleyn's father) and took up residence at Durham House. The work that he wrote in response to this order does not survive, but we know that the king was pleased with it. In January 1530 he sent his new specialist advisor to Rome in a futile attempt to persuade Pope Clement VII to allow a public discussion of his "Great Matter."

What Cranmer did achieve during the months that he stayed in Rome was, however, almost as useful and a remarkable feat for so inexperienced an envoy. He obtained favorable judgments, or censure, from several Italian universities and papal permission for these judgments to be published. This course was not his idea, but he was the most successful of the many who were trying to follow it. In 1531 Cranmer entered the king's direct service as a chaplain, and received his first benefice, the archdeaconry of Taunton.

The following year he was sent to chase the Emperor Charles V around his vast dominions, in another futile bid to persuade Charles to relax his hostility to an annulment. This mission was a steep learning curve. It was Cranmer's first experience of purely secular diplomacy, and his first encounter with the reformed, or Lutheran churches that were springing up all over Germany. There is no evidence that he was in any sense converted to the theology of the CONFESSION OF AUGSBURG, but he was impressed by the vernacular liturgies and vernacular scriptures these churches were using. Almost incredibly, he also married again, his bride being Margaret, niece to the wife of the Lutheran divine ANDREAS OSIANDER. They did not speak each other's languages, and can have known each other only a few weeks, but it was to be an enduring and fruitful union. It was also an appalling risk. Cranmer was now a beneficed priest in the king's service, and his marriage was a serious offense in canon law. He was to keep this union secret for over fifteen years, but it was a hostage to fortune, particularly as Henry found out, and connived at the deception. Worse was to follow.

In August 1532 the aged and obstructive archbishop of Canterbury, William Warham, died, and the king needed an archbishop who would do his bidding over the most important issue in his life. The archdeacon of Taunton may not have been an obvious successor, but he had two enormous advantages: he genuinely believed in the king's cause, and he was a man of recognized learning and integrity. The summons to office was certainly a shock, and in the circumstances may well have been as unwelcome as Cranmer claimed. By January 1533 he was back in London, and his appointment was made public.

The new archbishop was not a party to Henry's secret marriage to Anne Boleyn in the same month, a move enforced by the fact that she was pregnant, but he knew from the first what he would be expected to do. On May 28, after a show of due process, he declared that Catherine was not, and never had been, Henry's wife. Like the king's, Cranmer's conscience at this point was very important. His consecration (to which Clement VII rather surprisingly raised no objection) involved an oath to the pope, which he knew he would have to break. He therefore entered a caveat, declaring that the said oath could not bind him against the laws of God, or of England. Not surprisingly he was later accused of hypocrisy, but it seems that he genuinely believed that the pope should have no jurisdiction in England, and went through the motions because Henry had not quite got to that point. Obviously, he also rejected clerical CELIBACY, but could hardly say so openly. His great strength was not only personal loyalty to the king, but a like-mindedness that did not have to be constrained. He honestly believed that God had given Henry (and indeed all kings) the authority to rule the church in his dominions, and for that reason he accepted the king's judgment in matters of jurisdiction and worship. He actively promoted the English translation of the BIBLE, finally authorized in 1539, but apart from that he supported initiatives that came from THOMAS CROMWELL or the king himself. This involved not only the formal declaration of the Royal Supremacy, which through parliamentary statute had declared the king "head of the Church of England," but also the dissolution of the monasteries. Like many orthodox Catholics by this time, he had no particular use for the Opus Dei, preferring other expressions of piety, but when he pressed for the resources to be redistributed within the church, he was ignored. When he dissolved the Boleyn marriage in 1536, in one of the more discreditable examples of his flexibility, he was obeying the king's direct orders; when he wormed the truth out of a distraught Catherine Howard, the Queen, in 1541 he was discharging a pastoral duty. Although there is no evidence that at this time he held any specifically Protestant doctrines, he was bitterly unpopular with conservatives, both clerical and lay. The rebels in 1536 denounced him as a heretic, and when Cromwell fell in 1540 many hoped that the archbishop would go as well, but Henry consistently supported him. In 1537 he became godfather to Prince Edward, and in 1539 the king excused him the painful duty of voting for the Act of Six Articles with its staunchly Catholic line. In 1543, when he was denounced by the clergy of his own cathedral, Henry gave him the commission to investigate, with the words "...now I know who is the greatest heretic in Kent."

When the old king died in January 1547, Cranmer in a sense emerged from cover. He had been experimenting with vernacular liturgy for some time, and had even used an English litany on occasion, but it is impossible to trace accurately the development of his theological thinking. He was immensely well read, not only in the Scriptures but also in the Greek and Latin fathers and the medieval schoolmen. His aim seems to have been to restore the purity of the early church, and it was not difficult to convince himself that papal authority and clerical celibacy were both comparatively late developments. By 1547 he seems to have come to the same conclusion about TRANSUBSTANTIATION, and that tipped him over into the Protestant camp. He had certainly read MARTIN LUTHER, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, and many other contemporary reformers, but his conclusions were not specifically based on any of them. Although not dramatically distinctive, his theology was sui generis. Until January 1547 Cranmer had paced himself by the king; now he became the pacesetter himself, aided and abetted by the sympathetic regime of the Lord Protector, the duke of Somerset.

In the summer he issued a set of homilies on the Eucharist and on justification that were clearly Protestant; in December the Act of Six Articles was repealed. In 1548 he wrote and issued an English order of Communion. Early in 1549 the First Act of Uniformity abolished the mass and many other traditional rites, and authorized instead the first Book of Common Prayer, Cranmer's slightly modified translation of the Sarum Use, the Roman rite for England, Wales, and Ireland. At the same time clerical marriage was legalized, and Margaret Cranmer was able to emerge from her long obscurity. Outside London these measures were not popular, and in the summer of 1549 there were widespread disorders to which the religious changes contributed. The protesters were pacified or suppressed, but in October the Regency Council decided that the Lord Protector had overreached himself; he was overthrown and imprisoned. Cranmer was caught in the middle of this, and as a close ally of the Protector, it was thought that he would be the next to go. This was particularly the case because many of those involved in the coup were religious conservatives who wanted to return to the Henrician settlement.

The archbishop survived, partly because of a close personal relationship with the young king, and partly by allying with the pragmatic Earl of Warwick, the most powerful of the councillors. After a tense struggle, Warwick became president of the Council, and the program of religious reform continued. In 1550 a reformed Ordinal (book of rites for ordination) was introduced, reflecting the Protestant view of orders, and in 1552 (after much consultation) a revised Prayer Book. Cranmer had been trying since 1548 to attract prominent continental reformers to England, and because of the uncomfortable circumstances at home, several had come. The most important were MARTIN BUCER and Peter Martyr Vermigli, and both these played an important part in reforming the liturgy, which was much more unequivocally Protestant than its predecessor (which some conservatives had been willing to use). This was enforced by a second Act of Uniformity, but by that time Cranmer was at odds with Warwick, partly over the distribution of the property from the last of the religious foundations, the chantries. Warwick began to favor more radical reformers, such as JOHN KNOX and John Hooper, and Cranmer largely withdrew from the Council. In late 1552 he tried to introduce a reformed canon law, but Warwick killed it in the parliament, on the grounds that it would give the clergy too much power. At the same time the Council pressed the archbishop to prepare a reformed CONFESSION, which he did, but nothing was done with it until the summer of 1553, when it was promulgated as the 42 Articles.

By then King Edward VI (1537–1553), whose personal convictions had allowed this whole reformation to happen, was at the point of death. His lawful heir, Mary, was Catholic and a famous conservative, and Edward did his best to set up a scheme promoting his Protestant cousin, Jane Grey, in her place. This scheme, enthusiastically promoted by Warwick (now duke of Northumberland) and reluctantly supported by Cranmer, failed within days. Northumberland was swiftly tried and executed for treason, and Cranmer was one of those similarly tried and convicted during the autumn. He had already taken the precaution of putting his affairs in order, and sending Margaret and their children to Germany. He was executed not only because Mary believed that he was entirely responsible for what had happened to her mother, Catherine, and herself, but also because HERESY was a far worse crime than treason. However, until the papal jurisdiction was restored, there was no court in England competent to try him. Along with Nicholas Ridley and HUGH LATIMER, he was paraded in Oxford in April 1554 in what was officially termed an academic disputation but was in fact a show trial. He made no concessions, and remained in prison until the autumn of 1555.

The papal jurisdiction had been restored in January, but Cranmer's archiepiscopal status meant that a special commission had to be issued to try him. This took time, and it was not until September 1555 that James Brookes, bishop of Gloucester, presided at his trial in Oxford. Brookes wisely concentrated not on THEOLOGY, where Cranmer was robust, but on jurisdiction, where his enthusiasm for the Royal Supremacy made him vulnerable. "If you believe that the Queen has authority," Brookes asked him in effect, “why do you not obey her in what she is now telling you to do?” Cranmer was inevitably convicted, and relaxed to the secular arm, but his confidence had been undermined. Under intense pressure, he signed a recantation, and then another, more explicit. Neither Mary nor Cardinal Pole was pleased. In spite of the propaganda triumph that such a submission would have represented, Mary wanted him dead, without any moral complications. She chose to regard his recantation as insincere and pressed on with the plans for his burning. Perhaps conscience smitten, or perhaps realizing he had nothing to gain, Cranmer decided that Protestantism meant more to him than the Royal Supremacy, and spectacularly withdrew his recantation at the stake. He was burned in Oxford March 21, 1556, and thus became a MARTYR. But none of this would have mattered, and his career might have languished in academic obscurity if the Edwardian church had not been restored by ELIZABETH I and taken root. Cranmer thus became a founding father of an enduring ecclesiastical tradition, which has now spread all over the world.

Thomas Cranmer was not a saint, and not even a great theologian; he was, however, an incomparable liturgist who became one of the great creators of the English language. He was also a first-class ecclesiastical statesman who made a plausible church out of the jurisdictional and doctrinal mess created by Henry VIII's conscience and its attendant needs. When he got the chance, in Edward VI's reign, Cranmer became a religious leader of stature and accomplishment. When put to the test, he managed (Just) to emerge as a Protestant hero and an example for later generations. How far this last was attributable to his own performance and how far to the evocative recreation of his life by author JOHN FOXE in The Actes and Monuments of these latter and perillous days (1563) is a subject still under discussion.

See also Calvinism; Lord's Supper; Lutheranism; Presbyterianism; Reformation; Theology; Transubstantiation; Bible Translation

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Cranmer, T., A Prologue or Preface (to the Great Bible) Made by the Reverende Father in God, Thomas Archbyshop of Cantorbury, Metropolytan Prymate of Englande. 1540.
- Cox, J.E., ed. The Works of Thomas Cranmer. 2 vols. Cambridge, UK: Parker Society, 1844, 1846.
- Foxe, John. The Actes and Monuments of these latter and perillous days. 1563, 1570.
- Ketley, J., ed. The Two Liturgies, A.D. 1549, and A.D. 1552: with other Documents set forth by authority in the reign of King Edward VI. Cambridge, UK: Parker Society, 1844.
- Nicholas, J.G., ed. Narratives of the Days of the Reformation. Camden Society, 1859.
- Robinson, H., ed. Original Letters Relative to the English Reformation. 2 vols. Cambridge, UK: Parker Society, 1846, 1847.
- Selwyn, D.G. The Library of Thomas Cranmer. Oxford, UK: Oxford Bibliographical Society, 1996.
- Surtz, E., and V. Murphy, eds. The Divorce Tracts of Henry VIII. 1987.

Secondary Sources:

- Ayris, P., and D.G. Selwyn, eds. Thomas Cranmer, Churchman and Scholar. New York: Boydell, 1998.
- Brooks, P. Cranmer in Context; Documents of the English Reformation. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress 1989.

- Bromiley, G.W. Thomas Cranmer; Archbishop and Martyr. 1955.
 ——. Thomas Cranmer, Theologian. New York: Oxford U. Press 1956.
 Loades, D. The Oxford Martyrs. New York: Stein 1970.
 ——. Thomas Cranmer and the English Reformation. 1991.
 MacCulloch, D., Thomas Cranmer. New Haven, CT: Yale U. Press 1996.
 Nicholson, G. "The Act of Appeals and the English Reformation." In Law and Government in Tudor England, edited by C.Cross, D.Loades, and J.Scarisbrick. New York, NY: Cambridge U.Press 1988.

DAVID LOADES

CREATION SCIENCE

"Creation Science" is a term adopted by American biblical literalists in the 1970s. It is part of the broader Creationist movement—that group committed to the accuracy of the account of creation as given in the first three chapters of the Book of Genesis. It is an outgrowth of American evangelical Protestantism of the nineteenth century, and continues to flourish today. The term of "Creation Science" is now subsumed under the category of "Intelligent Design."

Background History

With the enactment of Prohibition in the United States after World War One, anti-evolution religious groups were emboldened by their success in the fight against alcohol and pushed for the passage of laws forbidding the teaching of natural origins as argued by Charles Darwin. One of the states where the biblical literalists or fundamentalists were successful was Tennessee. This led, in 1925, to the notorious Scopes Trial, when a young teacher (John Thomas Scopes) was brought to task for teaching evolution. Prosecuted by three-time presidential candidate WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN and defended by the noted agnostic Clarence Darrow, Scopes was eventually found guilty, although the very light fine of $100 was overturned on appeal. The true drama of the story, however, was the defense of the BIBLE given by Bryan and the mocking of its literal interpretation by Darrow. The evolutionists lost the case but they won the battle as—thanks particularly to the savage reporting of Baltimore Sun reporter H.L. Mencken—much of America laughed at the arguments of the critics of modern science. Bryan boasted, for example, that he took his stand on the Rock of Ages rather than the age of rocks (Ginger 1958; Larson 1997).

Evolution triumphed in Tennessee, and the 1930s and 1940s were to see progress in the understanding of the evolutionary process. Paradoxically, however, in the classrooms of the UNITED STATES, teaching of evolution withered and died. Concerned about sales, publishers pressured their authors, textbooks, suppressed references to evolution, and Darwin's place as a seminal figure to Western thought was denied or ignored. This state of affairs lasted through the 1950s, when the Russian success with Sputnik spurred a push to revitalize American science education. Finally a whole new generation of evolution-friendly biology textbooks began to appear (Nelkin 1977).

Creation Science

With the textbooks however, came a revitalized opposition to evolution. The “Bible” of the anti-evolutionist movement, Genesis Flood by John C. Whitcomb and Henry M. Morris, appeared in 1961. Here was the definitive case for what now came to be called “Creationism,” a literal reading of Genesis that assumed six days of creation, six thousand years ago, with the appearance of plants and animals followed by humankind. This account also assumed a worldwide flood at some point later. By then the politics of the situation had changed from Tennessee in 1925. The U.S. Supreme Court had ruled that evolution could be taught in state-supported schools and that religion (as opposed to “Religious Studies”) could not have a place in such schools. Much therefore was made of the supposedly scientific case for Creationism, especially under the favored alternative name of “Creation Science.” Gaps in the fossil record were given prominent treatment.

In major respects Genesis Flood had its roots in the past as much as in the present because it drew heavily on the ideas of a turn-of-the-century Canadian, Seventh-day Adventist George McCready Price. A literal six days of creation (with the days of durations as experienced by us) was a crucial part of Adventists theology, given the high place Adventists gave to the final day of rest. Price had long been advocating a literal reading of the Bible, and had given much time and effort to fitting the empirical facts into the biblical account. As with many dispensationalists (those who believe in epochs ended with major upheavals), Armageddon figured highly in Adventist theology, and one finds a corresponding (and complementing) fascination with the earlier time of worldwide destruction, Noah’s Flood. For Price, as for later Creationists including Whitcomb and Morris, the progressivist fossil record is confirmation of the Flood, being not a record of life through long eons of time but an artifact of the rising waters.

The new Creationism gained an increasingly high profile. Sympathetic legislators introduced bills to mandate the teaching of Creation Science along with evolution. Arkansas in 1981 was the place and time of the ultimate showdown, when the American Civil Liberties Union—brought suit against a law that insisted on the teaching of Creationism alongside evolution. Once again the nation’s eyes were fixed on a southern United States courtroom, although this time the judge found against Creationism, ruling its aspirations to become part of biology curricula were unconstitutional (Ruse 1988; Gilkey 1985).

Intelligent Design

A new generation of supporters has attacked evolution and argued that origins, including human origins, stand outside the normal course of NATURE. Initially, today’s Creationists contented themselves with attacking evolution. They brought forward versions of the arguments that appeared in Genesis Flood, in Price and indeed in the writings of anti-evolutionists in the days of Darwin. If evolution be true, why does no one ever see it in action? How did life start? Could the inorganic really turn into flourishing life, without the intervention of a divine artificer? Why are there so many gaps in the fossil record, and where are the necessary intermediates? How could chance make the sophisticated functioning of the hand and the eye?

Perhaps spurred by the objections of the evolutionists, the new Creationists formulated and promoted an alternative notion of origins, that meshes with a literal reading of the early chapters of Genesis. In the eyes of anti-evolutionists, the adaptive complexity of the living world is too subtle to be the product of blind law. In its intricate functioning, it apparently exhibits “irreducible complexity.” If blind law is inadequate, what alternative is there? The answer given is some form of “intelligent design.” An intervention—or interventions—in the normal course of nature brought on the true marks of the living. The world shows the results of the direct intervention of a conscious intelligence.

The Intelligent Design theorists have been criticized by conventional scientists, no less severely than were the earlier generations of Creationists (Miller 1999). It is argued that the notion of irreducible complexity is conceptually confused and empirically unwarranted. The very idea of design itself, out of step with modern science, is not needed and raises as many problems as it supposedly solves. Is design something that happened in the distant past, held in check until needed? How could this holding operation have operated in any organisms, let alone those more primitive than today’s forms? Is design something that was inserted in the recent past, or even in the present, in which case why do we not have direct evidence of its occurrence?

Criticisms have also been made of the theoretical defense of Intelligent Design by William Dembski (Ruse 2003). He argues that chance processes could never produce the complex functioning of organisms. Richard Dawkins (1985) has offered more sophisticated computer models to suggest how the kinds of objections by Dembski and those before him fade away as soon as one takes into consideration the real nature of evolution.

Science and Religion

One consequence of the Creationist movement has been increased efforts by theologians and concerned scientists and others (particularly philosophers and historians) to think hard about the science/religion relationship. They are challenged to formulate an adequate account of the true connections between science and religion in general, and between DARWINISM and Christianity in particular. One thing has become very clear: the conflict model of science and religion—that the two are natural enemies—is as much a phenomenon of the nineteenth century as is Creationism. For most of the Christian era, whether in Catholic or Protestant manifestations and the greatest friend of science has been religion—Copernicus was in minor orders and Darwin trained for the Anglican priesthood, and in both cases it shows.

There is still much work to be done in articulating the various options of the science/religion relationship. Some argue that the two are essentially things apart and hence truly cannot clash. This was the position of the late Stephen Jay Gould (1999) who talked of non-overlapping “Magisteria.” Others do not see science and religion as apart and indeed argue for integration. Most famous in the twentieth century in the context of evolution was the French Jesuit paleontologist, Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1955). Although few today accept his vision outright—a vision that moves progressively from the beginning of life to humans and thence beyond to the so-called Omega Point that Teilhard identified with Christ—there are many who still find his thinking stimulating and fertile.

There are also those who think that science and religion, although different, can at least impinge, one on the other, and that some kind of mutual respect must be achieved for them to exist in harmony (Barbour 1988). A key issue, obviously, is the understanding of “mutual respect.” Some who work on the science/religion interface think that only if evolutionists are willing to temper the harshness of pure Darwinism—to soften the depiction of nature red in tooth and claw—can science and religion be harmonized. Others take the attitude that it is not for the religious to question exactly how God created the universe, but rather to reinterpret and understand faith in the light of the most modern (and prima facie uncomfortable) scientific advances.

These are intellectual matters. One must recognize, however, that these do not exhaust the issue. There is a significant political dimension. Although the arguments are scientific (or more accurately, claimed to be scientific)—what drives the anti-evolutionists of today, as the Creationists of yesterday, is as much issues of morality and culture as of anything empirical.

Underlying this kind of argument is a sense that evolution is committed to something that Creationists call “metaphysical naturalism.” In the words of Phillip Johnson

“what is ultimately real is nature, which consists of the fundamental particles that make up what we call matter and energy, together with the natural laws that govern how those particles behave. Nature itself is ultimately all there is, at least as far as we are concerned. To put it another way, nature is a permanently closed system of material causes and effects that can never be influenced by anything outside of itself—by God, for example. To speak of something as ‘supernatural’ is therefore to imply that it is imaginary, and belief in powerful imaginary entities is known as superstition” (1995:37–38).

The creationists insist on being true “theistic realists,” assuming “that the universe and all its creatures were brought into existence for a purpose by God” (p. 209). Given the ongoing social and political triumphs of the religious right (see CHRISTIAN RIGHT) in the United States, it is likely that, for all of the scientists’ refutations, we shall see the continued existence—perhaps even flourishing—of the Creationist movement for many years yet to come. It is also likely this flourishing will continue to merge the scientific and religious with the political and social (Ruse 2000).

See also Biblical Inerrancy; Darwinism; Fundamentalism; Science

References and Further Reading

- Barbour, I. “Ways of Relating Science and Theology.” In Physics, Philosophy, and Theology: A Common Quest for Understanding, 21–48. Vatican City: Vatican Observatory, 1988.
- Behe, M. Darwin’s Black Box: The Biochemical Challenge to Evolution. New York: Free Press, 1996.
- Darwin, C. On the Origin of Species. London: John Murray, 1859.
- Dawkins, R. The Blind Watchmaker. New York: Norton, 1986.

- Dembski, W. The Design Inference: Eliminating Chance through Small Probabilities. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Denton, Michael. Evolution. A Theory in Crisis. Bethesda, MD: Adler and Adler, 1985.
- Dobzhansky, T. Genetics and the Origin of Species. New York: Columbia University Press, 1937.
- Gilkey, L.B. Creationism on Trial: Evolution and God at Little Rock. Minneapolis, MN: Winston Press, 1985.
- Ginger, R. Six Days or Forever? Tennessee v. John Thomas Scopes. Boston: Beacon, 1958.
- Gould, S.J. Rocks of Ages: Science and Religion in the Fullness of Life. New York: Ballantine, 1999.
- Johnson, P.E. Darwin on Trial. Washington, DC: Regnery Gateway, 1991.
- . Reason in the Balance. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995.
- Larson, E.J. Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.
- McMullin, E., ed. Evolution and Creation. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1985.
- Miller, K. Finding Darwin's God. New York: Harper and Row, 1999.
- Moore, J. The Post-Darwinian Controversies: A Study of the Protestant Struggle to Come to Terms with Darwin in Great Britain and America, 1870–1900. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- Morris, Henry M. Scientific Creationism. San Diego, CA: Creation-Life Publishers, 1985.
- Nelkin, D. Science Textbook Controversies and the Politics of Equal Time. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1977.
- Numbers, R.L. The Creationists: The Evolution of Scientific Creationism. New York: Knopf, 1992.
- Ruse, M., ed. But is it Science? The Philosophical Question in the Creation/Evolution Controversy. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus, 1988.
- . The Evolution Wars: A Guide to the Controversies. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2000.
- . Can a Darwinian be a Christian? The Relationship between Science and Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- . Darwin and Design: Science, Philosophy, Religion. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Teilhard de Chardin, P. Le Phénomène Humaine. Paris: Editions de Seuil, 1955.
- Whitcomb, John C., and Henry M. Morris. The Genesis Flood: The Biblical Record and its Scientific Implications. Philadelphia: Presbyterian and Reformed Publishing Company, 1961.
- MICHAEL RUSE

CROMWELL, OLIVER (1599–1658)

English protestant statesman.

Early Life

Born in Huntingdon in East Anglia ENGLAND, on April 25, 1599, Oliver Cromwell was the only surviving son of Robert Cromwell and Elizabeth Steward. He became a statesman and military hero during the English CIVIL WARS and was named Lord Protector in 1653. Cromwell followed strict Puritan ideas in his early life, but propagated more radical religious views, including limited liberty of conscience, during his later years. He died in 1658.

Robert and Elizabeth Cromwell originally had ten children, but only seven survived to adulthood. Robert Cromwell was politically active at the national level, where he sat in one of Queen ELIZABETH I's parliaments, and at the local level, where he was a justice of the peace and a landlord. Both of Cromwell's parents were from gentry families and had gained influence by acquiring former monastic lands during the reign of HENRY VIII. The Cromwells came from a poor yet well-connected branch of the family. There was a tenuous blood connection to THOMAS CROMWELL, the earl of Essex, Henry VIII's lord chancellor and the mastermind of the dissolution of the monasteries.

Cromwell's education began at the local grammar school. He came under the influence of the Puritan schoolmaster Thomas Beard (d.1632). Beard's ideas closely parallel those of the mature Cromwell, though it is difficult to tell how much Beard's ideas affected him. Beard's most famous work, The Theatre of God's Judgments, acts as an important case study for strict Puritan beliefs of the period. It emphasizes God's interest in the grim aspects of human experience. Abbott notes that Beard's God was "less the loving Father than a strong avenging Deity much absorbed in the discovery and punishment of sin...intending to teach morality by fear" (Abbott 1937:4.25).

Cromwell matriculated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge University, but left after a year due to his father's death and the need to assume family responsibilities. WILLIAM LAUD, the future archbishop of Canterbury, once referred to the school as a "hotbed of Puritanism." Abbott suggests that one can see Cromwell's educational and family experiences mirrored in his later career, such as his "remarkable command" of the BIBLE, his perception of God's intervention in his English history and in his own life, and his belief in the role of the "godly" in the community (Abbott 1937:4.26).

Historians disagree over the extent of Cromwell's formal education and his military background. Some believe that he studied law at Lincoln's Inn in London and lived there for a time. In 1620 he married Elizabeth Bourchier, the daughter of a London fur merchant, after a courtship that took place in London. It is also difficult to determine where and how he obtained his military training. He possibly adapted his military style from the Dutch. However, he believed that men motivated by a cause would form a better army than regular, professional soldiers if provided with discipline and strong leadership. Such concepts affected his success at the battle of Marston Moor in June 1644 and influenced the creation of the New Model Army in 1645.

The Cromwells lived in Huntingdon after they were married; they had nine children. Though they owned land, the Cromwells frequently experienced financial difficulties. The English government made many demands for taxation throughout the 1620s, and there were some bad harvests. In 1638 Cromwell inherited property in Ely from his maternal uncle, and his financial worries ended.

Political and Military Career

Cromwell was elected to the House of Commons from Huntingdon in 1628. There he became a noted opponent of Caroline religious policy. This Parliament promoted the Petition of Right and a Remonstrance against corrupt government. The Petition of Right guaranteed civil liberties and established parliamentary AUTHORITY. It maintained the concept of due process, in particular arguing that no one could be arrested and jailed without given cause, and limited military presence by forbidding martial law and requiring a subject's approval before quartering troops on his private property.

After Charles I dissolved Parliament in 1629, it would not be called again for eleven years. During this time, Cromwell became a force in local politics. Throughout his early career, Cromwell made a name for himself by supporting the popular cause. Two notable incidents included opposition to the central government, in one case to obstruct the purging of corporations and in another to prevent the draining of the fens. He also supported several lectureships in Huntingdon.

For both the Short and Long Parliaments, Cromwell served as a MP for Cambridge. In the Long Parliament, Cromwell at first supported the reform group led by John Pym and participated in the Committee on Religion. When war broke out in 1642, Cromwell raised troops in Cambridge and became an officer in the army of the Eastern Association under the earl of Manchester. He soon distinguished himself in combat, but became critical of the military leadership, including Manchester, who wanted to force the king to settle but not defeat him completely.

In 1644, Cromwell began to separate himself from the moderate reformers in favor of more radical notions. The signing of the Solemn League and Covenant and propagation of the covenant oath undoubtedly influenced him. The Solemn League and Covenant formed the foundation for a 1643 military alliance between the opponents of Charles I in SCOTLAND and England. The major point in the treaty was England's promise to establish a Reformed church in exchange for Scottish military assistance. It also required its supporters to take an oath of allegiance to the Covenant. In 1643 and early in 1644, Scottish armies proved their worth by helping to defeat royalist forces at the battle of Tippermuir; the king agreed to treaty talks at Uxbridge.

After failing to settle with the king in 1645, Parliament renewed military opposition. Passing the New Model Ordinance to reorganize the parliamentary army, it created the Self-Denying Ordinance to separate WAR from politics. This latter ordinance, which appealed to many pious parliamentary supporters because it encouraged self-denial to curry God's favor, prohibited members of Parliament from serving as military officers. In June 1645, the battle of Naseby resulted in spectacular success for the New Model Army, which comprised large numbers of Independents and sectaries.

Believing Charles I intended to establish an absolute monarchy of the continental type, Cromwell maintained that the king was responsible for the nation's ills and committed himself to the king's military defeat. Cromwell proved willing to use the social and religious radicals shunned by the moderate reformers and considered dangerous by most parliamentarians. He believed that the state should ignore opinions when it needed men to serve. Cromwell represented a new revolutionary spirit dedicated to both religious and political reform. In addition, he had a passionate commitment to his goals. Christopher Hill has attributed this view to a "strong strand of Christian pragmatism" (Hill 1970:56–60, 77).

These ideas caused a permanent division between two groups of parliamentarians in 1647. One group, frequently termed the "political Presbyterians," saw the army as a threat to the authority of both Parliament and king; the other group, sometimes called the "political Independents," envisioned the soldiers as the true revolutionaries, those men wanting real reform. In 1649, Cromwell solidly supported the execution of Charles I. He had, in fact, encouraged the campaign to have him tried and convicted for treason, punishable by death.

The abolition of the monarchy ushered in a period of English history known as the Interregnum, which in turn was divided into the Commonwealth era, from 1649 to 1653, and the Protectorate era from, 1653 to 1660. In February 1649, setting up an alternative government became the most urgent concern for Cromwell and his associates. Power rested chiefly in two bodies, the Rump Parliament, which welcomed the return of close to 100 purged members, and the Council of State. The latter was an eclectic body consisting of army officers, peers, and members of Parliament nominated by the Rump. Though it excluded radicals such as Thomas Harrison and Henry Ireton, Cromwell and Thomas Fairfax were two of the most active members. In April 1653 the Rump Parliament was dissolved in favor of a Nominated Assembly, the so-called “Barebones Parliament” that continued to work with the Council of State as the executive body.

Through the work of the Commonwealth government, Cromwell began to implement some of his religious policies. Committees were created to supervise missionary movements abroad, and bills were passed to propagate the gospel in WALES, IRELAND, the northern counties, and New England. Other legislation enforced morality, made Sabbath observance stricter, considered adultery a capital offense, and prohibited swearing and blasphemy. The most contentious issues involved tithes and the right of lay patrons to control livings, and these concerns were bound up with interests of property and the necessity of maintaining a professional, university-educated, ordained ministry.

The ineffectiveness of the Nominated Assembly and the disillusion of its moderate members with radical proposals prompted its dissolution in 1653. Cromwell replaced it with a Protectorate grounded on the Instrument of Government; he himself was named Lord Protector. This regime succeeded where the previous two regimes had failed by providing a religious settlement, although it did not satisfy everyone. In religion, the Instrument patterned itself after the Agreement of the People, mandating public profession of Christianity and the protection of dissenting congregations as long as they remained orderly. Such toleration did not extend to Catholics or those Anglicans who still refused to accept the Directory of Worship, used by the new national Presbyterian Church established in 1645. Cromwell’s ascension to Lord Protector earned him heavy criticism, both from his contemporaries and from historians, because he seemed to assume monarchical powers without the title of king.

Cromwell died in 1658, leaving the position of Lord Protector to his son, Richard. Richard’s inability to continue his father’s leadership contributed to the fall of the Protectorate and the restoration of the monarchy, but did not precipitate it. Weaknesses in the political system and divisions over contentious issues, including religion and the reform of law, meant that the English Republic was probably doomed to failure.

Religious Impact

Examining the themes of Cromwell’s life, one is struck by its dichotomy. Cromwell was both a fearless soldier and a committed champion of Christ. Studying how he reconciled these two main aspects of his personality can be both confusing and enlightening. John Morrill has commented on the many interpretations of Oliver Cromwell, as a supporter of civil liberties and religious TOLERATION, as an “iconoclast” in both the literal and figurative senses of the term, as a murderer of the Irish people, and as a military hero (Morrill 1990:1). Examining Cromwell’s actions and words; what is difficult is reconciling all of these different personas into one.

On one hand, Cromwell’s religious beliefs reflected the Puritan influences on his education. He opposed the hierarchy of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, in particular the role of the bishops (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY). Cromwell held that the individual believer could have a personal relationship with God through PRAYER and WORSHIP, and despised the Episcopal teachings that emphasized the role of the priest as mediator. He wanted to abolish the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER and believed that PREACHING should be emphasized. Like many other members of the “godly” party, Cromwell saw himself as a member of the elect chosen both for eternal SALVATION and to be the vessel for God’s will on earth.

On the other hand, Cromwell’s religion reveals some new spiritual aspects. He referred to himself as a “seeker” who desired to know the will of God and act on it. Morrill believes that Cromwell was motivated by “a fierce commitment to a cause he believed in,” and one can see that the cause had political and spiritual implications (Morrill 1990:14). He called himself the “chief of sinners” whom God had completely saved. In a 1638 letter, Cromwell exclaims: “The Lord accept me in His Son, and give me to walk in the light...as He is the light! He it is that enlighteneth our blackness, our darkness” (Abbott 1937:101). Cromwell believed that his actions, military and otherwise, were part of God’s great purpose, and that he was an agent in the fulfillment of God’s will.

Cromwell’s influence on Protestantism cannot be overestimated. Of particular note is his position on religious toleration. Cromwell believed that no one should be constrained in religion, that there should be “no compulsion” of religion. Barry Coward nicely asserted that Cromwell’s “main aim was to erect a loose framework of state control within which individuals could find God for themselves” (Coward 1991:110). Yet there were limits to this religious toleration. Cromwell distrusted Catholics as well as radical sectarians. Although he could personally understand the spiritual perspective of some dissidents, his policy could not find a way to include them (see DISSENT). He sympathized with Quakers, yet purged them from the army and persecuted the radical Quaker James Naylor. As Coward has pointed out, Cromwell wanted not religious plurality, but rather religious unity, a way to incorporate everyone who believed in Christ and accepted the GRACE resulting from his death and resurrection. Even his readmission of the Jews into England in 1655 had a greater purpose, because he considered acknowledgment of the Jews a prerequisite to complete reformation (Coward 1991:110–112). Unfortunately, Cromwell’s most enduring legacy might be his intolerance, not his tolerance. The treatment of Irish Catholics under Cromwell’s rule exacerbated existing tensions between England and Ireland, and provided cause for long-term religious strife in the British Isles.

See also Anglicanism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Friends, Society of; Judaism; Philo-Semitism Presbyterianism; Preaching; Puritanism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Abbott, W.C., ed. The Writings and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell. 4 vols. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1937.

Gardiner, S.R., ed. Constitutional Documents of the English Revolution. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1906.

Secondary Sources:

Ashley, Maurice, ed. Cromwell. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1969.

Coward, Barry. Oliver Cromwell. New York: Longman Press, 1991.

Hill, Christopher. God's Englishman: Oliver Cromwell and the English Revolution. New York: Dial Press, 1970.

Morrill, John, ed. Oliver Cromwell and the English Revolution. New York: Longman Press, 1990.

Wheeler, James Scott. Cromwell in Ireland. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.

ALANA CAIN SCOTT

CROMWELL, THOMAS (1485–1540)

English statesman. Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex was a key advisor to King HENRY VIII of ENGLAND in the early years of the Protestant REFORMATION. His most significant contribution was an effort to cement England's identity as a Protestant country by encouraging Henry's fourth marriage to Anne of Cleves, a daughter of Protestant royalty from Flanders. The failure of this marriage, which ended in DIVORCE, fueled Henry's suspicion of Cromwell's motives and galvanized the energies of Cromwell's opponents at court. Charged with treason in June 1540, he was beheaded nearly seven weeks later, on July 28, 1540.

Cromwell's significance has been obscured. Although Foxe's Book of Martyrs (see ACTS AND MONUMENTS) depicted him as a hero of Protestantism, Cromwell's obvious political adroitness seems more characteristic of one whose motives were self-serving. Cromwell's success in his ambitious pursuits was undeniable, but his commitment to political and religious reform offers the true key to his character and his achievement.

Born sometime in 1485 at Putney, Cromwell grew up in modest circumstances. His father struggled to earn a living from a variety of occupations, including blacksmith and brewer. As a young man he was known as unruly and, apparently after a quarrel with his father in 1503, went to ITALY to serve in the French army of Louis XII. Control of Naples was contested at that time, and in this case the French forces were defeated and Cromwell went to Florence where he entered the service of a noble family, the Frescobaldi, who were bankers. Apparently Cromwell traveled widely and learned quickly to represent influential interests in complex social situations. He also became familiar with European financial and political currents and gained administrative skills. After a few years of this service he moved to Flanders where he represented English economic interests with the merchants of Antwerp. In 1510 he also successfully negotiated the renewal of a papal charter for an English religious guild, meeting Pope Julius II in the process. By 1514 he had returned to England and married Elizabeth Wykes. It appears that his wife's family had important political connections, but it was also apparent that Cromwell had begun to attract the notice of influential circles by his work on the continent. As a result Cardinal Wolsey appointed him collector of his revenues in 1514.

Cromwell attracted a variety of influential clients as he built a law career, but Wolsey became his chief benefactor. Henry VIII's principal advisor at the time, Wolsey controlled considerable patronage and bestowed it on Cromwell as he proved his mettle. In 1523 Cromwell gained a seat in Parliament, for Taunton, and in 1524 he was admitted as a member of Gray's Inn. In the same year Wolsey enlisted Cromwell's services in launching one of Henry's main reform initiatives: the suppression of the monasteries and the redirection of monastic funds for such purposes as enhancing the church's diocesan structure and education. Cromwell became immersed in auditing monastic possessions, and demonstrated both his administrative ability and his political acumen in the process. As Wolsey gave his attention to foreign affairs and the law courts, Cromwell saw an opportunity to address issues of national finance and the state of the church. He approached the suppression of the monasteries with the passion of a reformer, as intent on promoting education as he was in undercutting the fabric of medieval monasticism in England.

By 1524 the influence of several reform currents was apparent in England. In part reform of the church arose as an assertion of government and the role of lay advisors in them. Cromwell represented a new kind of policy maker whose career was built not on royal blood nor on the church, but on his own motivation and innate ability. The measure of his accomplishment was a rapid advance, eventually taking him beyond Wolsey, whose star faded. As one historian notes, Cromwell caught "the attention of a king grappling with seemingly intractable problems" by bringing to them new imagination. For a time Cromwell remained loyal to Wolsey, although he gained the king's approval and, in 1531, was made a privy counselor. He gained further responsibilities in 1533 and 1534, when he became chancellor of the Exchequer and the king's secretary. As he gained ascendancy he also established close ties with Protestants determined to create a Lutheran Church in England.

Intent on encouraging England's break with Rome, Cromwell's supreme moment came in 1534 when the king authorized him to direct the implementation of the Act of Supremacy. By this Act Henry excluded papal AUTHORITY from England and made the sovereign head of the church. In the execution of Thomas More, and other leading figures who dissented, and in the king's divorce from Catherine of Aragon and marriage to Anne Boleyn, Cromwell proved to be the loyal servant. His loyalty proved steadfast when Anne was executed on a charge of adultery and Henry married Jane Seymour who died in childbirth.

Meanwhile Cromwell set about to establish a reformed Christian nation under a well-administered government. For his loyalty to Henry, however, the power and ability he possessed, and his hopes for religious reform, Cromwell attracted powerful opponents, notably Bishop Stephen Gardiner and the Duke of Norfolk. King Henry's disenchantment with Anne of Cleves ignited a general dislike of Protestant reformers and those who befriended them. Henry's capacity for disenchantment with those he once revered sealed Cromwell's fate. His reform program faltered with his death, but the Reformation took hold in England and his example encouraged the trend toward powerful, lay advisors at court.

References and Further Reading

- Beckingsale, B.W. Thomas Cromwell, Tudor Minister. New York/London: Macmillan, 1978.
- Dickens, A.G. Thomas Cromwell and the English Reformation. London: English University Press, 1959.
- Elton, G.R. Reform and Renewal: Thomas Cromwell and the Commonweal. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973.
- . Thomas Cromwell. Bangor: Headstart History, 1991.
- The Dictionary of National Biography*. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1960.
- Wilson, Derek A. In The Lion's Court: Power, Ambition, and Sudden Death in the Court of Henry VIII. London: Hutchinson, 2001.

WILLIAM SACHS

CROSBY, FRANCES JANE (FANNY) (1820–1915)

American evangelical composer. Crosby was born March 24, 1820, in Southeast, New York, and died February 12, 1915, in Bridgeport, Connecticut. The daughter of John and Mercy Crosby, Frances (known as Fanny) came of old Puritan stock. The Crosby family traced its American roots to 1634, when Simon Crosby arrived from England to settle in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Blinded in infancy as the result of unfortunate medical treatment, Crosby manifested an alert mind, and committed long passages of the BIBLE and English poetry to memory. At fifteen years of age she entered the New York Institution for the Blind in Manhattan. There she completed her education and cultivated her musical and poetic ability. She spoke frequently on behalf of the Institution, urging state and federal support for education for the blind. She published three small volumes of poetry and collaborated with one of her teachers, George F. Root, to produce cantatas and other popular music before she left the Institution in 1858 to marry blind musician Alexander van Alstyne. Eleven years her junior, van Alstyne was a music teacher and church organist who encouraged his wife to pursue her interests and to retain her maiden name.

Crosby wrote her first hymn in 1864, and over the next 50 years she produced thousands more. Her collaboration in New York City with others interested in SUNDAY SCHOOLS, EVANGELISM, and REVIVALS resulted in the creation of the popular religious songs known as gospel hymns, and brought her to prominence at an auspicious moment. Evangelist Dwight Lyman MOODY'S songster, IRA DAVID SANKEY, popularized her music by including many of her texts in his influential Gospel Hymns. These were promptly translated and used around the world. Among her most enduring texts are “Blessed Assurance,” “Rescue the Perishing,” “To God be the Glory,” and “Safe in the Arms of Jesus.”

For most of her adult life, Crosby identified herself primarily with the METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. However, she attended with regularity many Protestant churches in Manhattan and Brooklyn and maintained an active interest in rescue mission work. A popular participant at such gatherings as Northfield Conferences, Chautauquas, and Christian Endeavor conventions, Crosby’s winsome personality endeared her to young and old. Her enduring hymns remain popular among nonliturgical Protestants.

See also Hymns and Hymnals; Music; Music, American; Music, Popular

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Crosby, Fanny J. Memories of Eighty Years. Boston: James H. Earle & Co., 1906.

Secondary Source:

Ruffin, Bernard. Fanny Crosby. Cleveland: United Church Press, 1976.

EDITH BLUMHOFER

CROWTHER, DANDESON COATES (1844–1938)

Anglican missionary. Born in SIERRA LEONE in 1844 and raised in NIGERIA, Dandeson Crowther was the youngest son of Bishop Adjai Crowther. Destined for the ordained ministry in the Anglican Church, his extensive education included a period of study at the Church Missionary Society’s (now the CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY) college at Islington in North London. He was ordained by his father in 1870 and subsequently took up superintendence of the all-African Niger Mission, which formed part of his father’s wide-ranging jurisdiction under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society (CMS). His accomplishments as a pastor-missionary led to his appointment as archdeacon of the Niger Delta in 1874.

By the mid-nineteenth century, CMS’s African policy was guided by a vision of creating a well-trained African ministry that would take the initiative in mission expansion and form the mainstay of autonomous African churches. Highly educated Africans like Archdeacon Crowther were vital to the realization of this vision. Zealous, pioneering, and by all accounts a resolute leader, he spearheaded one of the most successful evangelistic campaigns in modern African Christian history, guiding the flourishing mission through periods of mass conversions and violent persecution alike.

Revitalized European colonial expansion and the systematic introduction of Europeans into the hitherto all-African Mission were only two elements in the cocktail of events that precipitated the “Niger Crisis” of the early 1890s. This crisis marked a major turning point in Archdeacon Crowther's career. In 1892 he launched the Niger Delta Pastorate in revolt against European control. Partly as a result of his own abiding sense of loyalty to the Anglican church, the revolt lasted for only six years, although it marked one of the first significant, wholly African, attempts to establish a self-supporting, self-governing church in Western Africa. Ultimately Dandeson Crowther remains one of the most notable figures of the early Protestant encounter with AFRICA. He is perhaps best remembered for his determined, if inchoate, efforts to give substance to an African vision that inspired his generation and survived well into the twentieth century.

See also African Theology; Anglicanism; Colonialism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Crowther, D.C. The Establishment of the Niger Delta Pastorate Church. Liverpool: J.A.Thompson and Co., 1907.

Secondary Sources:

Ajayi, J.F. A. Christian Missions in Nigeria 1841–1891: The Making of a New Elite. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1965.

Ayandele, E.A. The Missionary Impact on Modern Nigeria 1842–1914: A Political and Social Analysis. London: Longmans, Green and Co., 1966.

Epelle, E.M.T. The Church in the Niger Delta. Niger Delta: Niger Delta Diocese, 1955.

Fashole-Luke, E. "Archdeacon Dandeson Coates Crowther on the Niger Delta Pastorate Church: 1892–1897." Sierra Leone Bulletin of Religion 2 (November 1981):3–32.

Tasie, G.O.M. Christian Missionary Enterprise in the Niger Delta 1864–1918. Leiden: E.J.Brill, 1978.

JEHU J.HANCILES

CROWTHER, SAMUEL ADJAI (AJAYI) (c. 1806–1891)

West African missionary and bishop. Ajayi (the modern spelling, although Crowther used Adjai) was born in Oshogun, Western Nigeria, in about 1806 and grew up while the Yoruba empire of Oyo was collapsing. Ajayi was not dedicated in infancy to any of the Yoruba divinities because of a diviner's prophecy that he would serve the supreme God. In 1821, when he was thirteen or perhaps a little older, his town was sacked by Fulani and Oyo Muslims. He was taken as a slave and sold several times before being bought by European traders for the transatlantic market. His slave ship was intercepted by the British Navy and brought to SIERRA LEONE. At a CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY (CMS) school, Ajayi became a Christian and was baptized with the name of Samuel Crowther, after an eminent English clergyman.

A promising student, Crowther was sent briefly to ENGLAND for education, and then became one of the first students of the Fourah Bay Institution, the premier CMS educational facility. He served as a CMS schoolmaster and catechist before returning to the Fourah Bay Institution as tutor in 1834. In 1841 he was appointed with the CMS missionary JAMES FREDERICK SCHÖN to accompany the expedition planned by Thomas Fowell Buxton to explore the potential for “Christianity, Commerce and Civilization” in the Niger basin. Although the expedition was generally deemed a failure, Crowther and Schoën saw great potential for missionary work by African Christians.

After studying at Islington College, London, Crowther was ordained in 1843, and in 1845 he returned to his homeland as part of the newly founded CMS Yoruba mission at Abeokuta. There he found the mother and sister from whom he had been separated by SLAVERY; they were among the earliest converts. In 1854 Crowther took part in another exploratory mission up the Niger, and in 1857 he took charge of a new CMS Niger mission covering the Delta, Igboland (Onitsha) and parts of what is now Northern Nigeria. In 1864 he became the first African Anglican bishop, with a diocese not territorially defined, and with a CLERGY entirely African. The arrival of European missionaries on the Niger from 1887 onward brought complaints about Crowther’s clergy and lay assistants. As the European presence increased, Crowther was sidelined, his authority as bishop bypassed, and his staff displaced. He died in Lagos on December 31, 1891, a broken old man, and was replaced by an Englishman. His son ARCHDEACON DANDESON CROWTHER was able to retain oversight of the mission in the Niger Delta area, which was self-supporting, but mission policy avoided placing Africans in the highest positions of leadership for several decades.

The best-known African Christian of the nineteenth century, Crowther is significant for several reasons. He helped demonstrate the importance of African languages for the future of Christianity. He was PREACHING in Yoruba in Sierra Leone at a time when services here were invariably in English. He took a major part in the Yoruba Bible translation, the first time an African mother-tongue speaker had played such a role. As a mission leader he demonstrated application to African languages, including their accumulated proverbial wisdom, and also encouraged it in others. He also developed (after some searing early experiences in Sierra Leone) a courteous and irenic dialogue with Muslims in the Upper Niger area, at a time when a deliberately confrontational style was in use elsewhere. Above all, Crowther represents African responsibility for the spread of the Christian faith in Africa and for direction of the African CHURCH. This was always the stated aim of Protestant MISSIONS, and by the middle of the nineteenth century it seemed in reach, with Henry Venn (a secretary of CMS from 1843 to 1872) articulating the principle that the object of mission was to produce self-governing, self-supporting, self-propagating churches. Crowther’s unhappy last years saw the movement away from implementation of this policy in the colonial era. The next century brought a movement back again, as sub-Saharan AFRICA became Protestant Christianity’s principal area of growth.

See also African Theology; Bible Translation; Colonialism; Nigeria

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Journals of the Rev. J.F.Schoën and Mr. Samuel Crowther, Who Accompanied the Expedition up the Niger in 1841. London: 1843; reprint, London: Cass, 1970.

Crowther, Samuel. Journal of an Expedition up the Niger and Tschadda in 1854. London: 1855; reprint, London: Cass, 1970.

———. Experiences With Heathens and Mohammedans in West Africa. London: SPCK, 1892.

Crowther, Samuel, and J.C. Taylor. The Gospel on the Banks of the Niger. London: 1859; reprint, London: Dawsons, 1968.

Secondary Sources:

Ade Ajayi, J.F. Christian Missions in Nigeria 1841–1891. London: Longmans, 1965.

———. A Patriot to the Core: Bishop Ajayi Crowther. Ibadan, Nigeria: Spectrum, 2001.

Hair, P.E.H. The Early Study of Nigerian Languages, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967.

Walls, A.F. “Samuel Ajayi Crowther.” In Mission Legacies, edited by G.H.Anderson, et al. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1994.

ANDREW F.WALLS

CRUMMELL, ALEXANDER (1819–1898)

African American church leader. Crummell was born March 3, 1819, in New York City, the child of “free Africans,” Crummell always insisted that he was of unadulterated African ancestry. The family of his mother, Charity (Hicks) Crummell, had been Long Islanders for several generations and “associated” with the Hicks family of Quakers, (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). Her husband, Boston Crummell, was descended from the Temne people in West AFRICA, and was said to have converted to Christianity before he was enslaved at around fourteen and transported to New York. On reaching maturity he refused to serve his master any longer, and established himself as an oyster vendor. The Crummells became affiliated with “the Afro-American group of the Protestant Episcopal Church,” as it was later called, and were able to provide Alexander a grammar school education, including mathematics and Latin, at New York’s African Free School.

Crummell studied briefly in the Noyes Academy, at Canaan, New Hampshire, until the school was destroyed by an anti-integrationist mob. He resumed studies at Beriah Greene’s Oneida Institute, in upstate New York, where the curriculum included biblical languages and some mechanical trades. For a short time he studied informally at Yale University, while ministering to a congregation in New Haven, Connecticut. Among his vestry men was Alexander Du Bois, the grandfather of W.E.B.Du Bois, who later wrote a short essay on Crummell’s life.

During the early years of his marriage to Sarah Crummell he served small congregations in Providence, Philadelphia, and New York. Although his candidacy for admission to the General Theological Seminary in New York was denied on racial grounds, he was ordained an Episcopal priest after a course of private studies. He then conceived the idea of studying abroad, and during five years that he spent in ENGLAND, lecturing as an abolitionist and raising funds for his church in New York, he earned the bachelor's degree from Queens' College Cambridge, graduating in 1853.

Crummell's knowledge of biblical languages was not extraordinary, but he passed Cambridge examinations on Greek literature and was able to instruct students in the Greek testament. He was apparently influenced by the revival of Cambridge Platonism that occurred under the direction of William Whewell during the 1850s. In later years he wrote disparagingly of the tendency of black leaders toward "dogmatizing theories of sense and matter as the salvable hope of the race." Contemporaries spoke of his predilection for Platonic idealism and his ability to quote extemporaneously and at length from Greek authors.

On graduating from Cambridge, Crummell sailed, almost immediately, for LIBERIA, West Africa, and from 1853 to 1872 he spent sixteen years working as a farmer, educator, small businessman, and Episcopal missionary. During two trips to the UNITED STATES during that time he maintained his commitments to abolitionism and to the cause of the newly emancipated "freedmen." From 1861 to 1863 he worked with Edward Wilmot Blyden, an ordained Presbyterian clergyman, representing the Liberian government's colonization plans to the Lincoln administration. Crummell returned to the United States for good in 1872, and after some initial uncertainties, settled in Washington, D.C., where he established St. Luke's Episcopal Church in 1879, serving as its pastor until 1894 and holding a professorship at Howard University. He spent his final years writing and lecturing widely, and in 1897 he founded the American Negro Academy as a challenge to the Machiavellian schemes and pragmatic materialism of Booker T. Washington. Crummell died September 10, 1898.

Crummell had elitist notions of black power, evidenced in his allusion to JOHN MILTON'S phrase "to be weak is miserable." His pronouncements were frequently ironic in tone and attempted to reconcile cultural assimilationism with black separatism in writings that revealed his erudition and his colorful travels and adventures on three continents. His essays and addresses, written in a style described by John Greenleaf Whittier as "clear, classic, and chaste," provide a unique, if somewhat sardonic perspective on nineteenth-century intellectual life. Although Crummell contributed substantially to the African American protest tradition, it would diminish the importance of his legacy to view him primarily as a racial protest writer. His writings, for the most part addressed to black audiences, are most often concerned with the relationship of human nature to the concept of AUTHORITY, the importance of traditions and institutions to human existence (see TRADITION), and the defense of literate CULTURE. His blend of Eurocentric and Afrocentric ideology influenced W.E.B. Du Bois and other younger persons, including Anna J. Cooper, John W. Cromwell, and the Rev. Francis J. Grimké. Two of his protégés, the autodidact John E. Bruce and the Yale graduate William H. Ferris, became senior officials in the black power movement led by Marcus Garvey in the 1920s. Ferris published an early biography of Crummell in the American Negro Academy Occasional Papers (1920).

Crummell argued vigorously for purging black Christianity and culture of the emotionalism of slave religion, which he considered vulgar, materialistic, and antinomian. A strict Episcopalian, exceedingly hostile to enthusiastic conversions, he wrote: "Sentiment, feeling, emotion...come from an inferior side of our nature. They are more allied to the physical than they are to the rational or spiritual of our being.... Easily excited, they as easily depart. And, at the best the feelings come and go, oftentimes independent of the will; dependent, not seldom upon health, or some peculiar physical condition; and hence evidently they are not the soil in which the Holy Spirit plants the seed of God's wonderful grace."

Crummell published numerous tracts and pamphlets, some of which were reprinted in the three published collections of his writings: Africa and America: Addresses and Discourses (1891); The Future of Africa: Being Addresses, Sermons, Etc., Delivered in the Republic of Liberia (1862); and The Greatness of Christ and other Sermons (1882). The quotation above is taken from "Piety, Morality, and Enthusiasm," originally published in Wilson J.Moses, ed., Destiny and Race: Sermons and Addresses by Alexander Crummell (1992). W.E.B.Du Bois published a well-known rhapsody on Crummell's life and character in The Souls of Black Folk (1903). Most of Crummell's surviving manuscripts are in the Schomburg Collection of the New York Public Library, which holds over 400 of his sermons and some of his correspondence. Additional letters are in the Library of Congress, the Archives of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the Maryland Historical Society, and Columbia University.

See also Cambridge Platonists; Colonialism; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Ejofodomi, Luckson. "The Missionary Career of Alexander Crummell in Liberia, 1853–1872."

Ph.D. dissertation, Boston University, 1974.

Moses, Wilson J. Alexander Crummell, A Study of Civilization and Discontent. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

WILSON J.MOSES

CULTURAL PROTESTANTISM

A cognate of the German compound noun Kulturprotestantismus (culture Protestantism), the term "cultural Protestantism" is of uncertain coinage. H. RICHARD NIEBUHR wrongly suggests that KARL BARTH "invented" it (Niebuhr 1951:84n.1); in fact, it had entered linguistic currency during the late nineteenth century. Often, but not always, applied pejoratively, the term has become a political-theological "cipher" (Müller 1992:21), suffering from the "ambiguities" of being used both descriptively and polemically (Rupp 1977:. 9); some scholars dismiss it as an "anachronistic" and "misleading" category (Chapman 2002:1). In general, it connotes a theological tendency to accommodate Christian faith to the currently prevailing CULTURE, and thus to deemphasize or negate discontinuities between the mundane and the divine. Cultural Protestantism is commonly identified with LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM/LIBERALISM and associated with both INDIVIDUALISM and CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. Niebuhr, construing the phenomenon within his ethical-Christological typology, equates it with the “Christ of Culture” type, or those Christians who seek to acculturate Christ and who themselves feel at home in their culture.

Antecedents

The acculturational orientation of Cultural Protestantism is adumbrated in the BIBLE. A linkage between divinity and Israelite culture is established at Sinai by the divine appointment of craftsmen and the filling of craftsmanship with the Spirit of God (Exodus 31:1– 11). Jesus, despite his dictum about rendering to Caesar what is Caesar’s and to God what is God’s, hardly disdains everything about his own surrounding culture. A carpenter’s son (Matthew 13:55) and a carpenter himself (Mark 6:3), Jesus teaches in parables that evoke sympathetically his listeners’ rustic, agrarian lifestyle. Cultural Protestants have looked back on Jesus as the consummate moral philosopher and reformer whose legacy was the preparation of human beings in their current social circumstances for the future KINGDOM OF GOD.

In Niebuhr’s typological scope, the tendency that Cultural Protestantism crystallizes finds anticipators from the Apostolic era on. Paul and those among his Jewish Christian antagonists who sought to “compel the Gentiles to Judaize” (Galatians 2:14) had in common a desire to accommodate the Gospel to a specific culture or TRADITION. But whereas the Judaizers espoused allegiance to Jesus Christ without forsaking the legal obligations of Jewish tradition, Paul’s program for “grafting” the Gentile faithful onto the “tree” of faithless Israel (Romans 11:17–24) entailed a relaxation of some of those requirements, most notably circumcision, that were alien to Greco-Roman culture. In the Hellenistic world, Gnostic Christians, such as Basilides and Valentinus, construed Christ culturally and downplayed any sense of discrepancy between him and folkways by seeking to harmonize the gospel with contemporary philosophy and science. At the time of the Constantinian settlement, Lactantius aimed his culturally attuned Christian apologetics at demonstrating the sensibleness of the new faith in a Roman context. During the Middle Ages, however, as a pronounced tension prevailed between church and world, Peter Abelard proved somewhat exceptional in expounding Christian faith as a philosophy and ethics of cultural meliorism.

From the Reformation to the Present

The defining inclination of Cultural Protestantism to remain in harmony with the mores of the culture at large emerges in MARTIN LUTHER’S doctrine that it is the duty of Christians to obey their political ruler and to carry out their divine calling (Beruf) in secular society. During and after the REFORMATION, Christian acculturation was promoted Ipsa Facto through the proliferating translations of the BIBLE into the European vernaculars (see BIBLE TRANSLATION), a development encouraged by Luther’s emphasis on sola scriptura. The basic impulse underlying Cultural Protestantism was also fostered by certain aspects of the “inner-worldly asceticism” (innerweltliche Askese) that MAX WEBER ascribes especially to the more Puritanical Protestant branches: their teaching the principle of dedicated fulfillment of worldly obligations as the sole means of proving religious merit, and their tendency to sanction, and adapt their ethic to, bourgeois capitalist pursuits.

During the ENLIGHTENMENT, efforts to accommodate the Christian religion to the current climate of hyperrationalism and scientism were made by such thinkers as JOHN LOCKE, who posited “the reasonableness of Christianity” on empirical, noncreedal grounds (which led to him to be accused of SOCINIANISM); IMMANUEL KANT, who construed religion itself “within the limits of reason”; and THOMAS JEFFERSON, who produced his own redaction of the Gospels, retaining only what he deemed Jesus’s essential moral sayings and deleting all scenes that smack of the supernatural. Nonetheless, religion had been left threatened with oblivion by the harsh criticism to which eighteenth-century thinkers had subjected it, and in that predicament it was FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER’S extremely influential Speeches on Religion (1799) that restored the religious dimension of life to intellectual respectability. Defending religion “to the educated classes (die Gebildeten) among its despisers,” Schleiermacher distinguished it from theoretical science, abstract philosophy or metaphysics, moral behavior, and theological dogma, and reinterpreted it as a type of feeling (Gefühl), that of absolute dependence. This conceptualization, which accorded with the antirationalist views of the nascent German Romantic movement, had the effect of ensuring for religion a place of primary importance in subsequent discussions of modern culture. Far from being of peripheral interest or even obsolete, as they had been for skeptics in the Age of Reason, religion and piety were for Schleiermacher—and for the countless readers he influenced—indispensable to and inseparable from scientific knowledge, moral action, and the loftiest culture.

If the whole nineteenth century became “the time of cultural Protestantism” (Niebuhr 1951:94), Schleiermacher had also set the tone for this development through his advocacy of Evangelical Protestantism over Roman Catholicism as the correct way of propounding the true CHURCH (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). A similarly antihierarchical, antiRoman conviction was shared by the prominent Lutheran and Reformed clerics and political leaders from the different states of GERMANY, who in 1863 founded the liberal Protestantenverein (Union of Protestants). Serving in effect as a Cultural Protestant agency, this association aimed at fostering the unity and advancement of the diverse Landeskirchen (established churches) of the nation in accord with the progress of culture, all in a Protestant spirit.

Among the theologians who carried the greatest sway after Schleiermacher in shaping Cultural Protestantism, ALBRECHT BENJAMIN RITSCHL stood preeminent. Interpreting Christian doctrine through the modern lenses of historical-critical BIBLE scholarship, Kantian ethics, and Hegelian idealism, Ritschl envisioned the Kingdom of God on earth, to which Jesus had beckoned humankind, as a goal realizable through the moral ordering of civilization in the manner of the modern West. The same belief in progress typified the leading perpetrators of Cultural Protestantism after him: the Germans ADOLF VON HARNACK, FRIEDRICH NAUMANN, and ERNST TROELTSCH; the Swiss LEONHARD RAGAZ; and the Americans SHAILER MATTHEWS and WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH, whose conceptualization of the SOCIAL GOSPEL heeded Ritschl’s construal of the Kingdom of God.

Assessments

Foreshadowed and considerably inspired by SØREN KIERKEGAARD'S polemics against the worldly conformism of "Christendom," the harshest criticisms of Cultural Protestantism were those made by Barth, to whose DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY it served as a foil. Reaffirming Kierkegaard's insistence on the infinite "qualitative distinction" between God and humankind, Barth denied that religion is the firm basis on which human culture securely rests; on the contrary, he contended, religion constitutes the Krisis of culture and of barbarism alike, belying all efforts to enlist it for any social, political, humanistic, or other worldly ends. In his view, the "Declaration of German Professors" favoring the militaristic stance of Kaiser Wilhelm II at the outbreak of the First World War had effectually delegitimized the liberal accommodation of Christianity to culture.

As opposed to its disparagement by Barth and his Neo-Orthodox followers, some scholars reassess more neutrally or favorably the role of Cultural Protestantism not only in Wilhelmine Germany, but also in the Weimar Republic, when Cultural Protestants defended the place of Jewish citizens in German society (Nowak 1991:35).

As imagined in a later context far removed from the traumas of German history, Cultural Protestantism can seem quaint. The American radio-show host Garrison Keillor has been called "an elegiac poet of Culture Protestantism," as his remembrances of life in the (fictive) Calvinist community of Lake Wobegon, Minnesota, "appeal to a certain complacency in our faith, a nostalgia for the days when religion and culture went hand in hand and did not need to be too closely distinguished" (Heim 1987:517).

References and Further Reading

- Chapman, Mark D. Ernst Troeltsch and Liberal Theology: Religion and Cultural Synthesis in Wilhelmine Germany. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.
- Heim, David. "Garrison Keillor and Culture Protestantism." Christian Century (3–10 June 1987):517.
- Hübinger, Gangolf. Kulturprotestantismus und Politik: zum Verhältnis von Liberalismus und Protestantismus im wilhelminischen Deutschland (Culture Protestantism and Politics: On the Relation of Liberalism and Protestantism in Wilhelmine Germany). Tübingen: J.C. B.Mohr (P. Siebeck), 1994.
- Müller, Hans Martin, ed. Kulturprotestantismus: Beiträge zu einer Gestalt des modernen Christentums (Culture Protestantism: Contributions on a Form of Modern Christianity). Gütersloh: Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 1992.
- Niebuhr, H.Richard. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper, 1951. Chap. 3.
- Nowak, Kurt. Kulturprotestantismus und Judentum in der Weimarer Republik (Culture Protestantism and Judaism in the Weimar Republic). Wolfenbüttel: Lessing-Akademie, 1991.
- Rupp, George. Culture-Protestantism: German Liberal Theology at the Turn of the Twentieth Century. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977.

ERIC ZIOLKOWSKI

CULTURE

Introduction

When we speak of culture in the context of Protestantism, faith, and religion, we are dealing with an evolving field of research and study. In terms of contemporary academic disciplines, the study of culture and religion and their relationship is a product of the ENLIGHTENMENT and MODERNISM. It involves the academic disciplines of sociology, cultural anthropology, religious studies, THEOLOGY, and MISSIOLOGY. The awareness of culture and its objectification for the purpose of description and analysis grows out of the Enlightenment ideal of understanding something by defining, describing, and analyzing it. Even though people have always been aware that different groups have different ways of life, practice, dress, music, and religion, the definition and description of this as culture are a modern phenomenon. Culture, as we understand it today, has always played a very important role in relationship to the Christian church. From its inception, the CHURCH struggled with the migration of its message and its self-expression from an Aramaic/Hebrew cultural context to a Greek and later a Latin cultural context. With the expansion of Christianity all over the world, new challenges of culture arose. It could be argued that the study of historical theology is an exercise in the study of the relationship between Christian faith and culture. Christian theology has always struggled with the unique problems represented in the translation of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures from one language to another. Language makes up a core part of what can be considered culture.

The word “culture” in the English language has become associated with two different ideas. One idea describes culture as the products of human society. This can be called the anthropological definition of culture. The other understanding of culture could be called “high” or “high-brow” culture, which has to do with those things that are valued in Western society as products of academia and the arts. In this discussion we focus on culture in the sense of cultural anthropology in relation to Christian faith and Protestantism. In this regard, we focus particularly on issues associated with the translation of texts and the understanding and role of symbols across cultures.

Definitions

E.A.Hoebel (1972:6) described culture as “the integrated system of learned behavior patterns which are characteristic of the members of a society and which are not the result of biological inheritance.” Evaluating this as a working definition of culture, it becomes clear that this is a value-neutral definition. That means that one culture is considered no better than another, simply different. This principle is known as cultural relativity. The assumption of the relativity of all cultures is largely a phenomenon of the twentieth century. Before this time, ideas of moral superiority or evolutionary superiority played an important role in thinking about cultures. Such ideas, particularly of the moral or evolutionary superiority of Western culture, were an uncritical part of the self-perception of Protestantism and its expansion all over the world during the colonial era (see COLONIALISM). Missionaries were often associated with colonial authorities and assumed that their role was to indoctrinate what they perceived to be people of “primitive cultures” into “superior” Western culture and religion (see MISSIONS). Out of this idea of the superiority of Western culture developed the concept of syncretism. The idea behind syncretism is that there is somehow a culturally pure form of Christian faith. Where this “pure form” is mixed with outside cultural elements, including religious elements, faith becomes “syncretistic” or “impure.” It was the practical experience of missionaries as well as the observations of cultural anthropologists together with the rise of secularism (see SECULARIZATION) that challenged the assumptions of cultural superiority and easy judgments of syncretism.

If religion is expressed in forms of WORSHIP and cultic practice, Hoebel’s working definition of culture also implies that religion is part of culture. Whereas some within Protestantism, such as ERNST TROELTSCH (1865–1923), shifted their view from an idea of Christianity as a superior religion to the relativity of all religions, the idea of relativity among faiths has not enjoyed easy acceptance within Protestantism. Thus the question of the relativity of culture in relation to religion has become one of ongoing debate within Protestantism.

In the study and practice of mission, definitions of culture such as Hoebel’s have provided a basis for the development of approaches for communicating the Christian message among cultures. In the process of doing so, many difficult questions are being raised. Among these are questions about the assumption of relativity and value neutrality. Are cultures that support systems perceived in Western culture as oppressive to WOMEN and the poor to be considered value neutral? Do assumptions of cultural relativity encourage uncritical acceptance of injustice and exploitation within one’s own culture, including Western culture? How does the biblical prophetic call for justice fit with a blanket acceptance of cultural relativity? Does the Christian faith have an absolute claim to truth, or is it one way among many religions? Another result of the assumption of cultural relativity has been the growing awareness of how all people are influenced and even determined by their culture and context. This awareness of cultural bias and the recognition of the role of bias have confronted Protestant theology with the development of what is called “postmodern” thought (see POSTMODERNITY). Definitions such as Hoebel’s have also been challenged in that they are not perceived as dynamic enough. More and more, it is recognized that culture is something dynamic, ever changing, and evolving. Within the global community, cultures are constantly interrelating in a process of ongoing change. The result of the recognition of this dynamism has been an increasing trend within Protestant thought to speak in terms of context and contextual theology rather than culture and cultural theology.

Culture and Faith

Paul’s sermon to the Greek city leaders in Athens (Acts 17) represents one of the earliest examples of a Christian attempt to relate faith, culture, and a non-Christian religion. The early Christian apologists also struggled with making Christian faith intelligible within Greek philosophy and culture. One classic example from church history in which cultural issues were addressed in the context of faith is represented in a letter written by Pope

Gregory the Great (540–604) and sent to Augustine of Canterbury. In this letter Gregory urges Augustine to destroy idols but to bless pagan temples with holy water for Christian use. He also instructs Augustine to maintain pagan feasts but to fill them with new Christian meaning. Within Western Protestantism, one of the key texts on the relationship between faith and culture is H. RICHARD NIEBUHR'S book Christ and Culture. Niebuhr describes the relationship between Christ and culture in terms of five possible models: Christ against culture, Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in a paradoxical relationship, and Christ the transformer of culture. In traditional Protestant theology, MARTIN LUTHER can be seen as a proponent of the paradoxical relationship model and JOHN CALVIN as a proponent of the Christ the transformer of culture model.

Charles Kraft (1979) has developed the Christ the transformer of culture model in relation to cultural anthropology into a model for communicating the Christian message among cultures. In his argument he also draws on the developing field of translation theory and the idea of dynamic equivalent translation as developed by Eugene Nida (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). The dynamic equivalent approach to translation seeks to translate ideas from one language to another by seeking words and symbols that will evoke the same meaning in the hearer in the new language and culture as it would have evoked in the source language and culture. According to this principle, the translator's task is to find words, stories, and symbols in the new language that do not necessarily literally represent what was stated in the source language. Even though this principle is very conservatively applied in Bible translations, such highly popular modern English translations as the Good News Bible were based on it. Basic to these approaches is the assumption that the Christian message consists of a husk and a kernel. The husk is the culture in which the kernel of the message is encased. The husk must be removed from the kernel to allow one to translate this universal kernel into a new cultural husk. Missionary translators of the Christian Scriptures have found this approach helpful, particularly when faced with translating images or symbols that are totally unfamiliar in a new language and culture. One of the main problems of models such as those offered by Niebuhr and Kraft is their tendency to approach culture from a static and Western analytical perspective. Protestant thinkers in the Third World have argued that culture and faith are not that easily separated. Such models, as developed by Kraft, also seem to leave little space for the prophetic call of the Christian faith to challenge culture in areas of oppression.

The Japanese theologian Kosuke Koyama offered a very different perspective on culture and faith in his book Mount Fuji and Mount Sinai: A Critique of Idols. In his approach, Koyama wrestles with his Japanese history, religious heritage, and philosophical assumptions in a critical interplay with Western theology and TRADITION. Through the difficult task of self-critique and in a dialogue with Western religious tradition, Koyama places his own culture, Western culture, Christian faith, Buddhism, Shintoism, and history in a paradoxical conversation. This process does not offer neat answers and clear categories, but renders a constant challenge for action and reflection as culture meets culture and faith meets faith. Lamin Sanneh (1989) has wrestled with similar issues from an African perspective. He traced the history of the cross-cultural expansion of Christian faith and translation throughout church history and compared this with the expansion of the Muslim faith. The results of his study are surprising in that although the cultural impact of Christian missionaries has often been destructive to local cultures, the effect of Bible translation and missionary attempts at developing vernacular literacy tended to preserve and transform culture by codifying, sometimes even creating, language and cultural forms. Such reflections from within non-Western contexts of Protestantism have contributed to a growing awareness of the complexity of the relationship between faith and culture. It has also underlined the surprising shape of interactions between Western Christianity and cultures and faiths that are different. Most of all, however, it has pointed out that viewing faith in relation to culture from the standpoint of cultural anthropology is inadequate due to the absence of sociological and economic critique that may identify injustice, exploitation, and cultural imperialism.

Faith, Culture, and Context

In 1972, a report of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) Theological Education Fund first used the term “contextualization” to describe the complex process of theological education in the changing cultural and sociopolitical situation of the world (Ukpong 1987:150). A Taiwanese theologian, Shoki Coe (1976), argued that contextualization is a term that better reflects the complex dynamic and interplay of theological and ethical factors that involves the process of communicating the Christian message in a particular situation. It is also argued that contextualization better reflects the Christian theological tradition of seeing the incarnation of Christ as a model for understanding how the Christian message relates to a particular situation. The term contextualization quickly gained ground within both Protestant and Roman Catholic circles and gave rise to an increasing number of Third World theologies (see LIBERATION THEOLOGY). These are attempts to engage the Christian tradition and Scriptures from within a particular context rather than to try to translate an essential idea from a dominantly Western perspective into a new culture. Such contextual theologies share a common commitment to do theology from the viewpoint of the marginalized in society, are suspicious of the influence of Western theology and philosophy, assume that culture and context are part of a dynamic system, emphasize commitment to the poor and community as essential to the task, and begin with experience (praxis).

Conclusion

Culture has always played a critical role in relation to the Christian faith. Since the close of the nineteenth century, culture as a phenomenon has become an object of study and has been viewed as value neutral. The Christian church and Protestantism draw on a rich history of interaction between culture and faith. Particularly in the twentieth century, as the Protestant church became a global church, issues of faith and culture have become critical. Today Christians of many cultures express and understand their faith in a rich tapestry of multifaceted perspectives. Christians in the non-Western world practice and speak of their faith in terms of their context and culture. As these many perspectives interact in the world church, there is a growing understanding of the complexity as well as the beauty of the relationship between faith and culture. The Western cultural expression of the Christian faith can no longer dictate what the Christian faith would look like in another culture and context. NonWestern perspectives have also made it impossible to practice Christian faith without recognizing the plight of the poor and marginalized and without understanding the deep complexity of the relationship between Christian faith, culture, and religions.

See also African Theology; Asian Theology; Bosch, David Jacobus; Theology; Theology, Twentieth Century, Global; Feminist Theology; Black Theology; Womanist Theology

References and Further Reading

- Bosch, D.J. Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission. New York: Orbis Books, 1991.
- Coe, Shoki. "Contextualizing Theology," in Mission Trends No. 3. Edited by G.H.Anderson and T.F.Stransky, 19–24. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1976.
- Good News Bible: Today's English Version*. New York: American Bible Society, 1992.
- Hoebel, E.A. Anthropology: The Study of Man, 4th ed. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1972.
- Koyama, Kosuke. Mount Fuji and Mount Sinai: A Critique of Idols. New York: Orbis Books, 1984.
- Kraft, C.H. Christianity in Culture: A Study in Dynamic Biblical Theologizing in Cross-Cultural Perspective. New York: Orbis Books, 1979.
- Morse, Merrill. Kosuke Koyama: A Model for Intercultural Theology. Frankfurt, Germany: Peter Lang, 1991.
- Nida, E.A. Message and Mission: The Communication of the Christian Faith. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1960.
- Niebuhr, H.R. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper & Row, 1951.
- Sanneh, Lamin. Translating the Message: The Missionary Impact on Culture. New York: Orbis Books, 1989.
- Ukpong, J. "Contextualization: Concept and History." Revue Africaine de Théologie 11, no.22 (October 1987):149–163.
- Yamamori, T., and C.R.Taber, eds. Christopaganism or Indig-enous Christianity? South Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1975.

CHARLES FENSHAM

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church was founded by Finis Ewing, Samuel King, and Samuel McAdow in the aftermath of the Cane Ridge Revival. The Cumberland Presbytery of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE U.S.A. was accused of ordaining illiterate ministers with beliefs contrary to the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION. These ministers were suspended in 1805, and the Presbytery itself was dissolved in 1806. They then formed a new Cumberland Presbytery in 1810, hoping to be readmitted. In 1813, the Cumberland Presbytery became the Cumberland Synod, comprising three presbyteries. The first General Assembly was held in 1829.

The accusation of illiteracy was false, though the men in question had not received a classical education in Eastern colleges. There were doctrinal irregularities, however. The ARMINIAN tendencies of the church were formalized in 1814 (see ARMINIANISM), when the Westminster Confession was revised to soften its Calvinistic doctrines of PREDESTINATION and ATONEMENT. A further revised Confession of Faith was adopted in 1883. In 1906, after the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. had also modified the Westminster Confession, two-thirds of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church merged with that body. The remaining Cumberland Presbyterian Church continues in a harmonious relationship with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in America, which was founded as the Colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1869 and was known as the Second Cumberland Presbyterian Church from 1960 to 1992. In 1984, they jointly adopted a new Confession of Faith shaped primarily by the doctrine of the Covenant of Grace.

See also Calvinism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Barrus, Ben M., Milton L. Baughn, and Thomas H. Campbell. A People Called Cumberland Presbyterians. Memphis, TN: Frontier Press, 1972.
- Hudson, Mary Lin. "'Shall Woman Preach?': Louisa Woosley and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church." American Presbyterians 68 (1990):221–230.
- Morrow, Hubert W. "The Confession of Faith in Cumberland Presbyterian History." Journal of Presbyterian History 76 no. 3 (1998):187–197.

NEAL HANSEN

CUMMINS, GEORGE DAVID (1811–1876)

American Episcopal churchman. Assistant bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church and founder of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Cummins was born December 11, 1811, into an affluent Delaware family near Smyrna. His Methodist mother was a significant influence, and Cummins eventually graduated from Dickinson College in 1841. He was appointed a Methodist CIRCUIT RIDER by the BALTIMORE CONFERENCE, yet came to prefer Anglican worship and was drawn to the Protestant Episcopal Church. In 1847, Cummins married Alexandrine Macomb Balch and was ordained as a priest of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Cummins served parishes in Norfolk, Richmond, Washington, D.C., Baltimore, and Chicago before being elected assistant bishop of the Diocese of Kentucky in 1866. He died on June 26, 1876.

By the time of his elevation to the episcopate, Cummins had become identified with the low-church Evangelical party within the Episcopal Church and was one of its most outspoken leaders. Cummins grew increasingly alarmed by the inroads made by followers of the OXFORD MOVEMENT within the Episcopal Church. Cummins argued that the teaching of the Tractarians and the worship of their Ritualist successors undermined the Reformation formularies of classical ANGLICANISM.

Initially, Cummins believed that evangelicals should stay and fight this threat to evangelical truth, but his views changed (see EVANGELICALISM). A controversy erupted over Cummins's participation in an ecumenical communion service at a meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in New York in the fall of 1873. Cummins was harshly criticized for joining non-Episcopal ordained clergy in the sacrament, and responded by organizing a new denomination, the Reformed Episcopal Church, at a special meeting in New York on December 2, 1873. The new body sought to preserve the Protestant face of Anglicanism in their forthright "Declaration of Principles" and subsequent revision of the American BOOK of COMMON PRAYER. The split proved to be a small secession, however, because many prominent evangelical clergy (including several bishops) declined to throw in their lot with Cummins. While the evangelical party soon withered in the Episcopal Church in the United States, the Reformed Episcopal Church preserved a distinctive, though tiny, evangelical Anglican witness within American Protestantism for more than a century.

References and Further Reading

- Aycrigg, B.A. Memoirs of the Reformed Episcopal Church. New York: Edward O.Jenkins, 1880.
 Cummins, A.M. Memoir of George David Cummins, D.D. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co., 1878.
 Guelzo, Allen C. For the Union of Evangelical Christendom: The Irony of the Reformed Episcopalians. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1994.

GILLIS J.HARP

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 2
D-K

HANS J. HILLERBRAND
EDITOR

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

Editorial Board

Martin Greschat
Justus-Liebig-University (Germany)

L.Gregory Jones
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

David Martin
University of Lancaster (UK)

Assistant Editor

James H.Thrall
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Hugh McLeod
University of Birmingham (UK)

Grant Wacker
Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Andrew F.Walls
Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies University of Aberdeen (Scotland)

THE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PROTESTANTISM

VOLUME 2 D-K

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

EDITOR

Routledge
New York London

Published in 2004 by Routledge 29 West 35th Street New York, NY 10001-2299
<http://www.routledge-ny.com/>

Published in Great Britain by Routledge 11 New Fetter Lane London EC4P 4EE
<http://www.routledge.co.uk/>

Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Books, Inc.

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2005.

“To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge’s collection of thousands of eBooks please go to <http://www.ebookstore.tandf.co.uk/>.”

Copyright © 2004 Routledge

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilized in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher.

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

Manufactured in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data Encyclopedia of Protestantism/Hans J.Hillerbrand, editor. p. cm. Includes bibliographical references and index. ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (set) 1. Protestantism—Encyclopedias. I. Hillerbrand, Hans Joachim. BX4811.3.E53 2003 280'.4'03—dc21 2003011582

ISBN 0-203-48431-2 Master e-book ISBN

ISBN 0-203-57509-1 (Adobe e-Reader Format)

ISBN 0-415-92472-3 (Print Edition)

Contents

Volume 2, Entries D–K

1

D

DALE, ROBERT WILLIAM (1829–1895)

English Congregationalist. Dale, born December 1, 1829, was a minister and theologian and was also known as a leader of social Christianity in ENGLAND. A pastor at Carr's Lane Chapel in Birmingham (1853–1895) he was an early advocate of bringing the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth through individual Christians doing the will of God. From the 1860s on he served on local civic committees, the city council, and school board. Dale died March 13, 1895.

A "gospel of civic betterment," formulated with his copastor John Angell James, remained central to his later argument that the obligation of Christians to participate in civic and political life was a law of Christ. His approach to social problems like the sacredness of property and relations between employers and employees was grounded in an incarnational theology.

Dale expected the new EVANGELICALISM to lead to a new Christian theory of the social and political organization of the state. Distancing himself from an absolute separation of CHURCH AND STATE, he urged Christians to participate in local politics and social reform. This moved him closer to a historic Reformed position on church and state at a time when most English evangelicals avoided all political and state matters.

Dale was in polemic against both the older Calvinist ORTHODOXY and the new liberalism. His views on original sin and ATONEMENT led to HERESY charges. Yet the earnest, practical Christian morality of his theology and PREACHING was deeply admired by Congregationalists in England and the UNITED STATES. He was the LYMAN BEECHER lecturer in preaching at Yale in 1877–1878 and was elected president of the first International Congregational Council in 1891. Most of his eighteen books were collections of sermons and public lectures.

See also Calvinism; Congregationalism; Liberal Protestantism & Liberalism; Socialism, Christian; Social Gospel

References and Further Reading

Dale, R.W. Laws of Christ For Common Life. 2nd edition. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1899.

JANET F.FISHBURN

DARBY, JOHN NELSON (1800–1882)

English church leader. John Nelson Darby is the most prominent of the early leaders of the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN denomination, and its most prolific writer. He is generally credited with being the father of dispensational premillennialism (see DISPENSATIONALISM; MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM). His extensive travels throughout Western Europe, the West Indies, NEW ZEALAND, and North America helped spread his theological influence throughout the fundamentalist and evangelical traditions of Protestant Christianity.

Life and Ministry

Darby was born in London on November 18, 1800 into a prominent Irish family. His father was a well-to-do landowner and merchant. Darby's uncle, Admiral Sir Henry Darby, was a friend of Admiral Lord Horatio Nelson, the young Darby's sponsor and namesake. His mother seems to have been estranged from the family when Darby was young, an absence which he felt strongly.

Darby was educated at Trinity College in Dublin, IRELAND, from which he graduated with a B.A. as a Gold Medalist in 1819. He then began the study of law and was called to the Irish Bar in 1822, although he seems to have practiced only for a short time. He was ordained by Archbishop Magee as a deacon in the Church of Ireland, which had been united with the CHURCH OF ENGLAND by the Act of Union (1801), on August 7, 1825. He was ordained as a priest on February 19, 1826. He was appointed to a poor parish in County Wicklow. Throughout his life, Darby taught and modeled CHARITY for the poor and had little tolerance for those who placed too much emphasis on material possessions and social position. In his parish ministry, Darby was particularly noted for his CONVERSION of Roman Catholics to Protestantism.

A turning point in Darby's life occurred in late 1826. He was injured in a riding accident and returned to Dublin for several months of convalescence. This period of reflection and BIBLE study seems to have crystallized some of his convictions and laid the foundation for his theological system. When he returned to his parish, he learned that Archbishop Magee was requiring all new converts to take an oath of allegiance to the crown. In protest of what he perceived to be Erastianism and clericalism, Darby resigned from his parish and left the established church.

By the late 1820s, Darby was meeting with a group of like-minded believers in Dublin, the beginning of the Brethren movement. Due to the prominence of the assembly at Plymouth, ENGLAND, this fellowship of churches is commonly designated as the "Plymouth Brethren." Although not the founder of this movement, John Nelson Darby quickly became its most effective and important leader.

Beginning in the 1850s, Darby made at least six trips to the UNITED STATES and CANADA. He founded several Brethren assemblies and taught his dispensational interpretation of Scripture. A lifelong bachelor, Darby remained active in ministry until his death on April 29, 1882.

Darby's Theological Influence

At the center of Darby's THEOLOGY was his conviction that the Scriptures, interpreted literally, must have supreme AUTHORITY, not the CHURCH. He had a life-long suspicion of ecclesiastical hierarchy. Second, Darby's view of spirituality was individualistic and personal, focusing on the believer's position in Christ. Third, Darby perceived that the CHURCH in the New Testament era was pure and unadulterated, and that the institutional church of his day was apostate. In his view, the established church was in ruins and was likely beyond reform. This led to a strict separatism in belief and practice. Finally, Darby's literal hermeneutic resulted in the expectation that biblical prophecy will be fulfilled literally. One result of this hermeneutic was that Darby saw a clear distinction between Israel and the church, a strict dichotomy between two peoples of God. Thus prophecies related to Israel, an earthly/material/this-worldly people, must be fulfilled literally on this earth. Prophecies to the church, a Gentile/heavenly/spiritual/other-worldly people, cannot be fulfilled on this earth. This separation of the two peoples of God is an eternal one. Israel's destiny is the earth while the church's is heaven.

The Brethren had a futurist premillennial ESCHATOLOGY, believing that the Apocalypse should be interpreted as prophecy, describing unfulfilled future events. They expected the return of Christ at any time, to be followed by the establishment of an earthly 1,000-year kingdom. Darby's major innovation is the DOCTRINE of the secret RAPTURE of the church. This teaching divides the second coming of Christ into two stages. In the first stage, Christ will come to earth before a seven-year period of tribulation (cf. Daniel 9:26–27) to take believers to be with him. Then, after the tribulation, Christ will come in judgment of his enemies and establish the millennium. Darby was not the first to hold this view, although the direct influence of others on his view of the rapture is difficult to ascertain. The rapture position seems to be consistent with Darby's theological development. His view of the apostate church ("the church in ruins") led to his eschatology (a pessimistic form of premillennialism), and his view of "two peoples of God" seemed to require the removal of the spiritual/heavenly people for God to judge and then to bless the material/earthly people, Israel. But Darby would also point to 1 Thessalonians 4:13–18 for scriptural support of the rapture.

With the publication of the SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE (1909) and the growth of the Bible Conference Movement, Darby's dispensationalism spread widely among American fundamentalist and evangelical Protestants. Nonetheless, Darby remains largely unknown and his works unstudied outside of Plymouth Brethren circles.

See also Apocalypticism; Evangelicalism; Fundamentalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Darby, John Nelson. The Collected Writings of John Nelson Darby. Edited by William Kelly. 34 vols. Reprint, Sunbury, PA: Believers Bookshelf, 1971.
- . Letters of John Nelson Darby. 3 vols. Reprint, Sunbury, PA: Believers Bookshelf, 1971.
- . Synopsis of the Books of the Bible. 5 vols. Reprint, Sunbury, PA: Believers Bookshelf, 1992.

Secondary Sources:

- Crutchfield, Larry V. The Origins of Dispensationalism: The Darby Factor. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1992.
- Kelly, William. John Nelson Darby As I Knew Him. Belfast: Words of Truth, 1986.
- Turner, W.G. John Nelson Darby: A Biography. London: C.A. Hammond, 1926.
- Weremchuk, Max S. John Nelson Darby. Neptune, NJ: Loizeaux Brothers, 1992.

DALLAS KREIDER

DARWINISM

This term is commonly identified with theories of biological evolution, and in particular the theory that organic life evolved from earlier forms through a process of natural selection. Darwin's discovery of this evolutionary mechanism was based on a vast body of observations and inspired by the insights of such thinkers as Charles Lyell, Thomas Malthus, and WILLIAM PALEY. While there continue to be scientific debates and discussions about the exact mechanisms and pathways of evolution, Darwin's theory of natural selection has become the central theoretical model for the study of life, uniting fields as diverse as biogeography, ecology, paleontology, animal behavior, physiology, and neuroscience. Darwinism implies that the designs of all organisms are the result of contingent, natural processes. This apparently conflicts with traditional Christian views of the relationship between God and the creation, and of the place of humans in it. Since 1859 there have been diverse Protestant responses to Darwinism. This broad spectrum of responses reflects diverging schools of Protestant theology, changes in popular impressions of Darwinism and evolution, and different political uses of science in particular contexts. This article describes the discovery and evolution of Darwinism, gives a brief history of some Protestant reactions, and examines in more detail two issues that remain controversial: the status of humans and the place of the argument from design.

The Genesis of Darwin's Theory

Charles Darwin (1809–1882) had an early love of natural history that he pursued in university to the detriment of his official studies (first, medicine at Edinburgh; later, classics at Cambridge). However, Darwin's extracurricular immersion in natural history rapidly paid dividends. He published an article on invertebrate marine biology under the guidance of a professor who embraced the evolutionary theories of French biologist Jean Baptiste Lamarck; he went on botanical and geological expeditions with the clerical science professors at Cambridge; and he read William Paley's Natural Theology (1802) with great enthusiasm and attention. By the time Darwin earned his B.A. at Cambridge, he considered himself well qualified to settle down as an Anglican parson naturalist in a country parish, despite some religious doubts about being ordained.

It was at this point that Darwin was offered an unpaid position as a naturalist on a naval vessel, the HMS Beagle, which would be mapping the South American coast and continuing on around the world. With the encouragement of his Cambridge professors and the grudging consent (and financial support) of his father, Darwin began his voyage of discovery in 1831. His collections and studies were wide ranging, and his letters to his professors were read to scientific societies and published in their journals. During the voyage he read Charles Lyell's Principles of Geology (1831–1835), a work that sought to explain vast geological changes in terms of the gradual, uniform action of normal geological processes. Darwin's theory of coral reef formation used Lyell's gradualist approach; as islands subsided corals grew upwards, eventually accumulating as circular reefs surrounding a central lagoon. The idea that small natural changes can be accumulated over vast stretches of time to create significant effects would later be applied to another mystery on which Darwin started to reflect during the voyage: What was the origin of species, and how did they come to exist where they did?

On his return in 1836, Darwin settled in London and began a series of remarkable notebooks addressing these questions. Although he was familiar with Lamarck's view that organisms inherited characteristics that their parents acquired, he felt that this theory failed to explain the origin of adaptations in NATURE. The manifold adaptations of biological structure to function had been used by Paley (and many others) to argue for the existence of a benevolent Creator. The challenge for an evolutionary theory was to explain how such a design might have arisen naturally. Darwin knew that all organisms varied somewhat from their parents, and that their progeny could inherit such variations. However, he found a key insight in Thomas Malthus's Essay on the Principle of Population (1798). Malthus had argued that humans reproduce too rapidly for growth in food supply to keep up. In nature, where no moral restraint held back reproduction, and many organisms produced hundreds or thousands of seeds or offspring every year, Darwin saw that Malthus's principle operated with "manifold force." Organisms reproduce so quickly that only a fraction of each generation can possibly survive. The struggle for existence that ensued favored those with advantageous variations and so these became more common in successive generations. When this process is repeated over many generations, favorable variations gradually accumulate to form new adaptations and ultimately new species.

Although Darwin arrived at this insight in 1838, there remained many unanswered questions about the process, particularly about hybridism and speciation. He began a series of studies to investigate these questions and sketched out various versions of his theory, which he shared with a very small circle of scientific friends. He published The Origin of Species in 1859, after another naturalist, Alfred Russel Wallace, wrote to him with a very similar theory in 1858. The Origin is an abstract of a much longer work on which Darwin was working, but it nonetheless contains a very complete defense of the theory of common descent and clearly describes both natural and sexual selection.

The theory as it appears in the Origin bears traces of the influence of Paley's natural theology. In a passage that parallels one of Paley's, Darwin compares natural selection to an imaginary being constantly scrutinizing variations and selecting those best fitted to the environment. Some of Darwin's passages on the superiority of natural adaptations to human contrivances read like rewritings of the psalms that glorify God's handiwork. As Darwin later wrote in his Autobiography, "...my former belief...that each species had been purposely created...led to my tacit assumption that every detail of structure...was of some special, though unrecognized, service."

Despite the influence of natural theology on the metaphor of natural selection, the theory itself did not require God to explain the origin of species or adaptations, and Darwin came to reject the view of his friend, the American botanist Asa Gray, which suggested that God directed variation and evolution. By 1859 Darwin had drifted into agnosticism, in large part because he found certain Christian doctrines (such as that of Hell) morally repugnant. Darwin guarded his religious opinions as part of his private life, although he put forward a model for the natural evolution of religion in his Descent of Man (1871). In successive editions of the Origin, Darwin admitted the possibility of other mechanisms of evolution, although he maintained that natural selection was the most important. Darwin died an agnostic in 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Some evangelicals claimed much later that he had renounced evolution and embraced Jesus Christ on his deathbed, and this anecdote remains popular in some circles to this day. James Moore traces the history of this rumor in his book, The Darwin Legend (1994).

The Evolution of Darwinism

The term “Darwinism” was rapidly adopted in the 1860s to denote any evolutionary theory of common descent. It was only in the 1880s that many of Darwin’s followers, lead by Alfred Wallace, began to focus on the evolutionary mechanism of natural selection as the defining criterion of Darwinism. However, by the early twentieth century, partial insights gained from studies of heredity and paleontology led to alternative mechanisms for evolutionary change. Mutationists held that species changed by sudden and large genetic alterations. Neo-Lamarckists claimed that organisms inherited characteristics acquired by their parents. Orthogenists claimed that there were indwelling tendencies for certain organisms to follow directional evolutionary trends. Darwinism was also eclipsed at this time by optimistic philosophical recastings of evolution, such as Henri Bergson’s Creative Evolution (1907)

By the 1930s and 40s, however, researchers from GERMANY, the Soviet Union, America, and Britain had developed the “new synthesis,” which brought together evidence from genetics, palaeontology, statistical biology, ecology, and systematics to show the superiority of Darwin’s key theoretical insight that natural selection was the most important evolutionary mechanism. Since then, Darwinism has been strongly identified with evolution by natural selection. The current Darwinian paradigm has produced much fruitful research in a wide range of fields. Through the late twentieth century, most biologists agreed that natural selection plays a very important role in evolution, although some controversy remains over the role of other factors, such as the rate of evolutionary change, the physiological constraints in variation, and the gradual genetic drift of characters without the influence of selective pressure.

Darwinism, then, has had diverse meanings within the scientific community, but there are close parallels between the situation in the late nineteenth and late twentieth centuries, when natural selection was the primary focus. Because of this, we will pay particular attention to Protestant responses to Darwinism from these periods.

Nineteenth-Century Protestant Responses

In the nineteenth century, biologists disagreed on the metaphysical implications of Darwinism. For example, Wallace did not believe that natural selection could explain the development of the human mind, although most others, including Darwin, held that the natural evolution of human consciousness was one of the most exciting insights of Darwinism. Other scientists, such as Darwin's American champion Asa Gray, believed that Darwinism was compatible with a view that God directed evolution, although they were strongly challenged by George Romanes, who held that there was no actual evidence of this. Darwin's German popularizer, Ernst Haeckel, used Darwinism as a foil for the "teleological" worldview of traditional religion; he claimed that Darwin had shown that design in nature was imperfect, or "dysteleological." Haeckel used "Darwinismus" as the foundation of his antitheological monistic philosophy. Some held that Darwinism could explain the evolution of human morality, but Thomas Huxley, Darwin's great early defender, later argued that moral behavior had to oppose the demands of Nature. Given that Darwinism had different implications in different contexts, it is not surprising that it gave rise to diverse Protestant responses.

Among the most famous of these responses is that of the Anglican bishop SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, who spoke against Darwin at an 1860 meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He argued that Darwin's theory fell down on several points, and stipulated that he was rejecting it because of its poor scientific merit, not because of its religious implications. However, he also jokingly asked whether Huxley, who was present, had descended from an ape on his grandmother's or his grandfather's side. Huxley implied that he would rather have an ape for an ancestor than an obfuscating cleric. Later reports of this encounter, written by Huxley and other Darwinists, magnified its importance and exaggerated its effect on the audience. Neither Huxley nor Wilberforce entirely won over the crowd.

The myth of the Huxley-Wilberforce "debate" still flourishes as an archetype of Protestant hostility to Darwinism, glossing over the substantive arguments of the participants and focusing on the dramatic exchange of punchlines. The popular imagination is still entertained by similarly dramatized struggles of critics and proponents of Darwinism. However, there were and are more subtle and influential Protestant responses.

At the same 1860 Oxford meeting at which Huxley and Wilberforce traded barbs, the BROAD CHURCH Anglican FREDERICK TEMPLE gave a sermon embracing the idea that God can act through natural laws. Temple, later archbishop of Canterbury, continued to defend the compatibility of evolutionary thought and orthodox belief through the nineteenth century (see ORTHODOXY). Although there was much variation in detail, this approach was common to mainstream clergy and theologians in Europe and North America through the late nineteenth century, particularly those who were moderate liberal Protestants. Some held that a God who could design a natural process that would result in designed organisms was an even grander conception than Paley's God, who merely designed the organisms themselves. Others, afraid that this position bordered on DEISM, insisted that Darwinism showed that God was immanent in nature and was constantly involved in the ongoing process of creation. In Germany, Rudolf Schmid argued that intelligent design could be seen in the gradual evolution of nature, and that natural order was an expression of God's presence in it. A few Protestants, influenced by MODERNISM, attempted to recast their THEOLOGY in terms of evolution. Lyman Abbott, for instance, in his Theology of an Evolutionist (1897), reframed the concept of SIN as a reversion to a lower, animal behavior.

Scientists who were Protestants also came to accept evolutionary theory through the late nineteenth century. The first naturalist to publicly endorse the theory of natural selection was an evangelical Anglican clergyman (see EVANGELICALISM). In 1859 Henry Tristram applied natural selection to explain the camouflaging coloration of Saharan birds. He later opposed materialistic readings of evolution, and agreed with Wallace that humans could not have evolved by natural selection alone. Tristram's openness to evolution was mirrored in the work of other late nineteenth-century Protestant biologists, such as the microscopist and Methodist William Dallinger and the evolutionary theorist and Congregationalist missionary John Gulick. The most influential Protestant evolutionist was Asa Gray, who battled against the anti-Darwinian biologist Louis Agassiz and promoted a theistic version of evolution.

Some older Protestant theologians and scientists were more hesitant about evolutionary theory, and they continued to publish their warnings into the 1890s. All maintained that evolutionary theory was not proven and that the Darwinian model of natural selection was particularly weak. The former OXFORD MOVEMENT leader EDWARD PUSEY denounced Darwinism applied to humans as "unscience." The Princeton Presbyterian CHARLES HODGE claimed that because Darwinism denied the existence of a designing God, it was necessarily atheistical; however, he did not rule out the possibility of evolution guided by God. A wide range of conservative theologians took up similar stances. Otto Zöckler opposed fellow German Ernst Haeckel with a similar argument. The Scottish-Canadian geologist John Dawson outlined this position in a series of books that warned against Darwinism even as they gradually warmed to the possibility of theistic evolution. Calvinist minister ABRAHAM KUYPER lectured on evolution in Holland and America, accepting a process of divine "election" while rejecting the possibility of a natural "selection." All of these powerful conservative Protestants accepted, at least in theory, the possibility of some kind of divinely guided, gradual evolution.

Whereas Protestant responses to Darwin are often divided into "for" and "against" camps, the differences between them were largely matters of emphasis. Those concerned that some Darwinians were attempting to undermine religion distanced themselves from "Darwinism" as such. Others, anxious to show that religion did not conflict with science, as some scientists were claiming, accepted "Darwinism." Still others, seeking to show that theology could gain from the increasing prestige of science, revised theological doctrines along evolutionary lines. However, all of these responses ultimately depended on (or at least allowed) a version of evolution that was somehow progressive and governed or directed by God.

The Twentieth Century: The Great Divide

Through the early twentieth century, the acceptance of some kind of evolution was common among main-stream Protestants and remained a particular feature of LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM. A providential, progressive vision of evolution was easy to maintain in light of the “eclipse of Darwinism” in the scientific community. Many alternative versions of evolutionary theory at the time left room for providential guidance and a pattern of cosmic progress (see above). In the 1920s, the process philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead inspired Protestant versions of PROCESS THEOLOGIES, which ultimately depended on an evolutionary world-view. These views were later informed by the progressive religio-scientific evolutionary model of Catholic philosopher Teilhard de Chardin. However, by the end of the century, few of these schemes seemed reconcilable with a popular neo-Darwinian view of evolution that emphasized natural, random processes and challenged the idea of upward progress. If there were any advancement in this kind of Darwinism, it was more like an undirected arms race than a gradual ascent to higher levels of being.

Such claims did not directly strike at the faith of the many Protestants influenced by the liberal theology of FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER and ALBRECHT RITSCHL, who put religious experience at the center of belief. This school played down the importance of scientific explanation in Christian apologetics. From a very different perspective, the neo-orthodox theologian KARL BARTH also discounted the possibility that science had much meaning for faith. Revelation comes through divine initiative, he argued, whereas science is simply a human endeavor that cannot bridge the gap between God and man. The strength of these positions allowed many Protestants to stop paying attention to developments in Darwinism as something important to their belief (see SCIENCE).

Nonetheless, some American Protestants did remain concerned about science. As part of their response to the SECULARIZATION of American society, some early fundamentalists identified evolution as a dangerous doctrine, used by enemies of the faith to undermine the beliefs of the young (see FUNDAMENTALISM). This movement gathered political support, and many states banned the teaching of evolution in public schools. The matter reached a head in the famous 1925 show trial of biology teacher John Scopes in Tennessee. Scopes intentionally broke the law by teaching evolution, and in the subsequent media circus surrounding the trial, Clarence Darrow mocked the anti-evolutionary views of evangelical WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN for the benefit of an increasingly liberal and secular America. The bad publicity and mockery served only to fuel hostility to Darwinism among fundamentalists. Until about 1920, there had been only a handful of creationists arguing that God had literally created the earth and its creatures over seven 24-hour days a few thousand years ago. However, this movement grew rapidly in an anti-Darwinian atmosphere to become the powerful CREATION SCIENCE movement by the 1970s (see ELLEN GOULD WHITE, SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS).

By the late twentieth century, the popularity of creationism with the CHRISTIAN RIGHT in America was matched by the rise of a popular and aggressively secular version of Darwinism, defined in books written by such leading neo-Darwinists as Richard Dawkins, Edward O. Wilson, and Daniel Dennett. These authors challenged both creationism and theistic evolution by contending that natural selection necessarily has materialistic implications. The result has been a popular feeling that Darwinism and Protestant belief are incompatible, although some eminent scientists, theologians, and philosophers have challenged this view. The subsequent discussions have mirrored nineteenth-century dialogues and debates, and the fundamental issues of a century ago—the status of humans and the question of design—remain matters of controversy.

Darwinism and Human Uniqueness

Human uniqueness is essential to traditional Christian doctrines of Creation, Incarnation, ATONEMENT, and SALVATION, and is particularly important to branches of Protestantism that emphasize the supremacy of the BIBLE and the personal relationship between God and humans. Much of the initial post-Darwinian controversy centered on the question of “ape ancestry.” If humans evolved from animals, then how could Christ’s death atone for the sins of Adam (“the first man”)? What basis was there for morality? If there was continuity between apes and humans, then why were humans alone given divine dispensation?

Some of these questions remain intractable for certain Protestants. Others find them easier to answer because they read the first chapters of Genesis as an allegory of God’s relationship with humans. Others, particularly in the nineteenth century, developed theories of pre-Adamite humanity that allowed them to accept some version of human evolution. However, Darwinism is difficult to reconcile with the notion of a literal “first pair” of humans, because this would be a genetic bottleneck normally fatal to populations of complex animals.

Late twentieth-century Darwinists have offered explanations of the natural evolution of altruism, consciousness, and religion, following Darwin’s program in The Descent of Man. Proponents of sociobiology and evolutionary psychology explain various human and animal behaviors in terms of natural selection. A central tenet of sociobiology is that humans love one another because this kind of behavior provides, and provided in the past, an advantage for the survival of human social groups.

Many Protestants simply reject this position, just as many rejected Darwin’s claims about humans in the late nineteenth century. Sociobiologists are accused of making up “just so” stories to reduce virtue to mere selfishness and of importing metaphysical assumptions into their science. However, some have argued that even if sociobiology is a true explanation of the evolution of social behaviors, those behaviors may be moral nonetheless. It may make evolutionary sense for a mother to love her children, but that does not make the love any less valuable or real. God may have worked through natural law to create in us a consciousness of right and wrong.

The question of continuity between humans and animals has been dealt with in various ways (see ECOLOGY). Some, like Wallace, argued for some kind of supernatural intervention in the creation of human consciousness. Similarly, others have claimed that the soul was breathed into a population of beings that had naturally evolved to be physically human. These approaches have been criticized as being too dualistic, because they imply that mind and body have little to do with one another. Michael Ruse has suggested that there is an affinity between the Darwinian model of mind as contained by the structure of the brain and the Aristotelian Christian notions of the soul as a formative principle that activates the body. Protestants who emphasize divine immanence in matter might well have less difficulty conceptualizing the evolution of a soul.

Although a wide range of arguments on this subject have been written in theological journals, many ordinary believers either do not think about the difficulties of reconciling Darwinian and Christian conceptions of humanity, or hold these positions to be, at some level, incompatible.

Darwinism and Design

If Darwinism destroys the argument from design, many Protestants and atheists feel that it is necessarily destructive of Christian belief. The argument from design has an ancient pedigree and is central to much natural theology. Its classic formulation is in Paley's Natural Theology (1802), where the author reflects on coming across a watch on a heath. Because the parts of the watch are well adapted to their functions, an intelligent cause, or watchmaker, must have made it. For the watch, substitute any organism packed with still more exquisite adaptations, and the intelligent cause implied must be God. Paley wrote in part to answer DAVID HUME'S skeptical Dialogues on Natural Religion (1779), which claims that although we might compare nature to a watch, it might as easily be compared to a spider web. Although we might imagine nature to have been designed by a beneficent Creator, it is quite as probable that every organism has a separate creator, or that the creators are at war, or that this is just one of a series of botched creations. By focusing on beautiful organic adaptations, Paley sought to blunt the strength of Hume's argument.

Darwin, on the other hand, offered a suggestive mechanism explaining how nature selects without intelligence and so brings about marvelous adaptations over many generations. In various writings, Darwin stressed that adaptations are not perfect, that they are made up of organs and parts that previously had other uses, and that they resemble the work of a dogged tinkerer rather than an omniscient Creator. In an effort to salvage the design argument, Darwin's friend Asa Gray suggested that God directed variations along beneficial and adaptive paths. Here Gray was taking advantage of a lack of knowledge about the causes of variation. A similar move has been proposed more recently by those who hold that because variations ultimately depend on atomic changes at the quantum level, God can intervene in variation at the level of quantum indeterminacy without violating natural law. Both moves have been criticized as attempting to locate God in the gaps of human knowledge.

Darwin responded to Gray with what has come to be known as the “stone house” argument. Imagine, he wrote, an architect building a structure from stones that have fallen from a cliff. The stones have gained their shapes from natural laws of erosion. Given an architect who could select the stones best fitted to the structure’s demands, it would be unnecessary to claim that the shape of the stones or the laws of erosion had been providentially arranged to aid the architect. Natural selection presents an analogous case, Darwin claimed. Variations are the stones, the organism is the stone house, and natural selection is the architect. Variations may be determined by natural laws, but they are essentially random when it comes to the needs of the organism. Natural selection selects those best fitted to the organism, just as the architect selects the best building stones from a pile of scree.

Darwin’s argument made it difficult to prove that God directs evolution. Those who wish to prove this have followed several paths. Some have simply rejected natural selection as the mechanism of evolution, or discounted Darwin’s interpretation of variation. A few Protestant theologians have suggested that God might well act through a contingent and seemingly random process. This position, however, seems to magnify the problem of pain in nature. Why do animals suffer, and why are there so many apparently cruel and painful interactions between organisms in nature? It is one thing to explain pain as the result of the Fall, or some imperfection in the world, and another to claim that it is an inevitable part of the process by which God creates. However, it has always been difficult to “justify the ways of God to man,” and some theologians have claimed that Darwinism at least gives pain and suffering a purpose. Without pain, natural selection would not work, and so humans would never have come into being and the creation would never have developed.

Some Protestants have backed away from the claim that it is possible to find evidence of design in nature. The Anglo-Catholic Aubrey Moore (1848–1890) claimed that the regular action of natural law seen in natural selection could be taken as a confirmation of the Christian doctrine of the divine immanence of the Logos. However, he admitted that this was merely a confirmation of, not evidence for, belief. In doing this, he sharply reduced the apologetic value of nature to Christian theology, but suggested a way in which Christians could accept a law-like, but apparently undirected and random, process of evolution.

The 1990s brought a concerted attempt to revive Paley’s argument from design by demonstrating the inadequacy of Darwinism to explain the existence of irreducibly complex adaptations. American intelligent design theorists claim that certain adaptations, such as the Krebs cycle in cellular metabolism, are too complex to have developed gradually. Alter any part of the process and it simply does not work. Although intelligent design has gained a certain popularity among a segment of American Protestants, it has met with strong criticism from many scientists and some theologians. Darwinists claim that they are constantly finding explanations for the evolution of supposedly irreducibly complex adaptations, and that these typically involve pre-existing parts changing their function. Theologians suggest that it is unwise to locate God in the gaps of human knowledge, because such gaps have a tendency to get filled in. These arguments mirror those that raged in the 1860s and 70s.

It may be asked whether the argument from design is necessary to Christian belief. After all, Paley’s argument draws an analogy between God and a human watchmaker.

Some Protestant critics of natural theology have claimed that this is an unjustifiable comparison, and that we cannot know how God and the Creation are related. The argument from design has proven a powerful analogy, however, and it continues to play an important role in some American Protestants' arguments about evolution.

Future Prospects

There are diverse Protestant approaches to Darwinism, only a few of which have been touched on here. Through the 1990s numerous attempts were made to create forums for constructive dialogue, which are supported in several countries by the Templeton Foundation. In the UNITED STATES, the loudest discussion seems to be between those who believe that Darwinism is in effect a secular religion that promotes metaphysical naturalism and those who claim that it may be compatible with Protestant religion. In the United States, at least, Darwinism has been thoroughly politicized, with the Christian Right and the secular establishment taking opposing stands on its validity and its right to dominate the science classroom in the public schools. There have been repeated claims that Darwinism is “just a theory” or that it has become a secular religion. However, these claims have been persuasively rebutted by many commentators and have not been accepted by the courts or legislatures.

There are some difficulties in reconciling Darwinism with Protestant beliefs, but these difficulties alone do not explain why the most popular perception of their relationship is one of necessary conflict. This conflict is in part a product of the political chemistry of religion and CULTURE, particularly in the United States. It also may be attributed to our human love of the inherent drama of combat. Most of us learn about the world through MASS MEDIA narratives that favor entertaining dramatic struggles as the chief relationship between worldviews. As long as this is true, for most people Darwinism and Protestantism will remain locked in battle.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Darwin, Charles. The Origin of Species. London: Murray, 1859.

Secondary Sources:

Bowler, Peter. Evolution: The History of an Idea. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1989.

Durant, John, ed. Darwinism and Divinity: Essays on Evolution and Religious Belief. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1985.

Livingstone, David. Darwin's Forgotten Defenders: The Encounter between Evangelical Theology and Evolutionary Thought. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans, 1987.

- Moore, James. The Post-Darwinian Controversies: A Study of the Protestant Struggle to come to terms with Darwin in Great Britain and America, 1870–1900. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979.
- . The Darwin Legend. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1994.
- Numbers, Ronald. Darwinism Comes to America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Roberts, Jonathan. Darwinism and the Divine in America: Protestant Intellectuals and Organic Evolution, 1859–1900. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1988.
- Ruse, Michael. Can a Darwinian be a Christian? The Relationship Between Science and Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

RICHARD ENGLAND

DÁVID, FRANCIS (FERENC) (1510–1579)

Hungarian theologian. Dávid studied at the University of Wittenberg, was appointed school principal, and converted to LUTHERANISM. In 1556 he became superintendent of the evangelical church in Transylvania. Initially a Catholic, then an ardent Lutheran, he gradually shifted his allegiance to CALVINISM. Still, until 1558 he was one of the leading Lutheran figures in Transylvania. One year later he had turned Calvinist-Reformed, and when Calvinist churches obtained legal status, Dávid served as the first superintendent of the Calvinist churches in Transylvania (1564).

The increasing influence of Socinian-Unitarian notions prompted Dávid to reevaluate his christological beliefs. This embroiled him, beginning in 1566, in bitter controversy with Calvinist theologians. When in 1568 a Unitarian church was formally established in Transylvania, Dávid became its first superintendent.

In 1571 Dávid triggered the “adorantist” controversy in the Unitarian church. The controversy had to do with the question of whether Jesus was to be adored in prayer, a question that split the Unitarian church. In 1579 Dávid and his supporters succeeded in obtaining synodical concurrence for the principle of nonadoration. Dávid’s chief antagonist, Georgio Blandrata, obtained governmental suppression of Dávid’s views. That same year, Dávid debated the issue at a SYNOD meeting with the result that he was condemned as a theological innovator and blasphemer and sentenced to life imprisonment at the fortress of Deva, where he died. Dávid’s significance lies in the fact that he delineated, with striking consistency, a thoroughgoing Unitarian CHRISTOLOGY. Dávid also warrants recognition for the fact that he is the only sixteenth-century reformer who divorced his wife.

See also Anti-Trinitarianism; Christology; Lutheranism; Socinianism; Unitarian Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

David, Francis. "Theses de non invocando Jesu Christo in precibus." In Defensio Francisci Dávidis. [Krakow: 1581]. Leiden: 1983.

Secondary Source:

Robert, Dan, and Antal Pirnat, eds. Antitrinitarianism in the Second Half of the Sixteenth Century. Leiden: 1982.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

DAVIDSON, RANDALL THOMAS (1848–1930)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Born in Edinburgh in 1848, Davidson's studies for ministry, in the precincts of the English Law Courts, readied him for realistic witness to civil officials. He served a brief assistant curacy, and became chaplain (secretary) to ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL TAIT, archbishop of Canterbury (1877–1883). As dean of Windsor (1883–1891), Davidson cared for the Royal Family and became a trusted adviser to Queen Victoria. He was consecrated bishop of Rochester in 1891, and transferred to Winchester (1895), then to Canterbury (1903), retiring in 1928. Davidson died in London in 1930.

Davidson's primacy was a time of great change in CHURCH-STATE relations, in Anglican identity, and in world affairs. The Welsh Church was disestablished. Parliament allowed the CHURCH OF ENGLAND a large measure of self-regulation (1919), but crushingly rejected its proposed Prayer Book revision in 1927 and 1928. State and churches fought over public education, over matrimonial law, over labor relations, and over war policies.

Davidson led the churches in fights for persecuted Jews and Orthodox clergy in Russia, for Abyssinian and Armenian Christians, and for abused Chinese laborers in AFRICA. He encouraged the foundation of the Save the Children Fund. He worked for national unity during the constitutional crisis over the Lords and the emergence of the Republic of Ireland, and during the General Strike.

He led cautiously in new relationships across the ecumenical spectrum. Within his church, Davidson sought moderation and mediation between Anglo-Catholics and Evangelicals. He was prepared to ordain men with creedal doubts (including a future archbishop, WILLIAM TEMPLE). A theological student (A.R. Vidler) saw him "as a very great, tactful, cautious statesman: a great pilot in these troublous times."

See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; Ecumenism; Evangelicalism; Judaism; Orthodoxy, Eastern

References and Further Reading

Bell, George K.A. Randall Davidson, Archbishop of Canterbury. 3rd ed., 1 vol. London: Oxford University Press, 1954.

DAVID H. TRIPP

DAVIES, SAMUEL (1723–1761)

American clergy. Virtually forgotten in the long shadows of such towering eighteenth-century figures as GEORGE WHITEFIELD, JONATHAN EDWARDS, and JOHN WESLEY, Samuel Davies sowed seeds of revolutionary change in colonial America. As Presbyterian pastor and leader of the Great Awakening in Virginia, published poet, America's first composer of hymns, educator of slaves, successful advocate for religious TOLERATION, and the fourth president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University), he helped shape much of the religious landscape that developed in nineteenth-century America.

Call to Ministry

Born November 3, 1723 to David and Martha Davies in New Castle County, Delaware, his mother named him after the Old Testament prophet Samuel in response to answered prayer for a son, and similarly dedicated him to the service of the Lord. He studied for the ministry in Samuel Blair's famed "log college" at Fagg's Manor, Pennsylvania. Davies appeared before the New Light Presbytery of New Castle and received his ordination in 1747.

Davies settled in Hanover County in May, 1748 to pastor four meetinghouses of Presbyterian dissenters (see DISSENT). Willing to work within the ecclesiastical system of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, the established church of Virginia, Davies sought and obtained a license to preach from the colonial governor. Unlike many New Light preachers, the temperate Davies took care to cultivate warm relations with those who belonged to the established church and colonial government. He did not openly evangelize their members, nor did he disparage the Anglican ministers. Indeed, on October 4, 1748 he married Jane Holt, the daughter of a prominent family from Williamsburg and a member of the Church of England. As a result, even those who disagreed with him found no grounds to criticize his character or actions.

Great Awakening in Virginia

The Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) solidified its hold in Virginia under the ministry of Davies. Soon the number of Presbyterian congregations was spreading beyond Hanover County. Davies found a ready audience for the gospel when he arrived in the colony. New Light evangelists before him had brought many people into the faith and prepared many for the evangelical message. Davies's own revival success was not predicated on the great emotional outbursts or physical manifestations common elsewhere during the Great Awakening (see REVIVALS). His moderate disposition and his audience's Anglican background served to restrain such behavior. For his part Davies neither encouraged nor discouraged excess emotionalism, although he did consider it to be a valid expression of the salvific experience.

The fine oratorical ability and humble demeanor of Davies received favorable responses wherever he preached. He focused the content of his sermons on the harsh reality of frontier life, especially the imminence of death. Because of his own weak physical constitution he carried the conviction that his life had been spared from premature death so that he could preach to the people of Virginia (see DEATH AND DYING). Consequently he considered his own PREACHING to be "as a dying man to dying men" (Pilcher 1971:65). He balanced such dire preaching, however, with sermons on the enjoyment and pleasure to be derived from the justified life. His sermons, which were collected and published as Sermons on Important Subjects, were still being read on both sides of the Atlantic a century after his death.

Preaching did not exhaust the means that Davies used to reach Hanover with the gospel. He also wrote poetry to explicate further the divine truths gathered from his sermon preparations and to express his own devotional feelings toward God. They appeared in the local Virginia Gazette and were collected for the private libraries of a number of Anglican planters. In 1752 over fifty of his poems were published under the title Miscellaneous Poems. He was, as well, the first colonial American to write and publish hymns, many of which he wrote to accompany his sermons and to prepare his parishioners for the LORD'S SUPPER. His "Communion Hymns" were still being used into the twentieth century.

Davies, himself a slave owner, made the evangelistic outreach to the slave population a significant priority of his ministry (see SLAVERY). By 1755 nearly three hundred slaves attended his church services. With the help of friends in ENGLAND, JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY numbered among them, Davies provided spelling books, catechetical material, and the hymnals of ISAAC WATTS for the slaves (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The slaves especially valued Watts's hymnals. Davies recounted that at times the "sundry of them were lodged all night in my kitchen; and sometimes, when I have awaked about two or three a-clock in the morning, a torrent of sacred harmony poured into my chamber and carried my mind away to heaven" (Pilcher 1971:112).

Advocate and Educator

Davies's revivalistic success brought him into frequent conflict with the colonial government. Davies pressed the officials in Williamsburg to recognize the Act of Toleration passed in ENGLAND in 1689 as having force in the British colonies. Not until his trip to England (1753–1755) did he successfully secure a declaration from the royal government that the Act of Toleration extended to the dissenters in Virginia. With the commencement of the French and Indian War, the government of Virginia found it expedient to ignore remaining restrictions on the Presbyterians to ensure their loyalty to the Crown. Davies's fight for the toleration of dissenters is recognized as laying the groundwork for the separation of CHURCH AND STATE in the United States.

In 1758 Samuel Davies became the fourth president of the College of New Jersey. He had earlier visited England with GILBERT TENNENT to raise money for the fledgling college. The funds procured on the trip built Nassau Hall and helped to put the college on sound economic footing. During his brief two years as president he raised the standard for both entrance and graduation and planned to expand the library. His untimely death came on February 4, 1761, at the age of thirty-seven.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Davies, Samuel. Letters from the Rev. Samuel Davies, & c., Shewing the State of Religion Particularly Among the Negroes. London: R.Pardon, 1757.
- . The Duty of Masters to Their Servants in a Sermon. Lynchburg, VA: William W.Gray, 1809.
- . The Godly Family. Morgan, PA: Soli Deo Gloria Publications, 1993.
- Davies, Samuel and George William Pilcher. The Reverend Samuel Davies Abroad. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1967.
- Davies, Samuel and Thomas Gibbons. Sermons. Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian Board of Publication, 1864.

Secondary Sources:

- Alley, Robert S. "The Reverend Mr. Samuel Davies: A Study In Religion and Politics, 1747–1759." Ph.D. dissertation, Princeton University, 1962.
- Bost, George H. "Samuel Davies: Colonial Revivalist and Champion of Religious Toleration." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Chicago, 1959.
- Larson, Barbara Ann. "A Rhetorical Study of the Preaching of the Reverend Samuel Davies in the Colony of Virginia from 1747 to 1759." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Minnesota, 1969.
- Pilcher, George W. Samuel Davies: Apostle of Dissent in Colonial Virginia. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1971.

JOSEPH L.THOMAS

DEACONESS, DEACON

The terms “deaconess” and “deacon” refer to a present-day office of service in the church that dates back to the first century. The terms themselves are derived from the Greek verb, diakonein, and its cognate nouns diakonos and diakonia. Diakonein meant to serve or to minister. The noun diakonos, or deacon, meant servant or minister.

The Early and the Medieval Church

The early church created the deacon out of a need to administer CHARITY. The tradition of the church held the first deacons to have been the “seven men of good repute” chosen by the apostles of Jesus Christ to serve tables and to help with the daily distribution, recorded in the Acts of the Apostles 6:1–4. These seven men included the first martyr, Stephen, considered by the church father Irenaeus (c. 135–200) as the first deacon, but nowhere does the New Testament name these seven men as deacons. The first reference to deacons as officeholders in the New Testament is in the salutation of Paul in the first verse of his letter to the Philippians. They appear also in his first letter to Timothy 3:8–13, where their expected attributes are described. In Paul’s letter to the Romans 16:1–2, he speaks of a woman, Phoebe, as a diakonos of the church of Cenchreae.

Deacons began in the first century with little if any obvious place in the liturgy and a large role with the poor. The elders or presbyters (later priests) existed alongside deacons and were not initially necessarily above them. Deacons worked closely with bishops, helping them with financial administration and with charity. The role of the deacons in the Christian congregations brought them into close proximity with other Christians. Deacons visited the sick and prepared the dead for burial. Deacons were called the eyes and ears of the bishops, conveying messages and reporting problems.

Apparently some WOMEN were deacons in the earliest Church. As the church hierarchy evolved, women were moved out of the office of deacon and, at least by the second or third century, into an office of their own as deaconesses. The deaconesses did for women what deacons did for men. This office evolved on the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea to fulfill diaconal roles among women that were thought inappropriate for men, such as anointing the naked bodies of women before BAPTISM. Deaconesses existed alongside the widows of the church who lived from the church's charity, were supposed to have been married once, and were to be over a minimum age. In the western end of the Mediterranean, widows could fulfill the deacon's functions among women.

Gradually, as assistants to the bishops, the deacons and the widows and deaconesses assumed some importance in the liturgy alongside their role in social welfare. The deacons were given functions that varied over time but included reading the Gospel and later the epistle, reciting certain prayers, and serving the wine and sometimes the bread in Communion (see LORD'S SUPPER). The deacons and deaconesses were doorkeepers and ushers during services and instructed new Christians before and after baptism. Some deacons presided over the Eucharist, particularly in churches over which the bishop had given them charge, notably with the expansion of the church in the third century. Deacons conducted catechism classes, and they sometimes preached.

Some churches, such as the Church of Rome, limited the number of their deacons to seven because of the precedent in Acts (chapter 6), but allowed the number of presbyters to expand. Churches appointed subdeacons to aid the deacons. By the third century, some churches had, as well, acolytes, readers, exorcists, and doorkeepers in an evolving expansion of church office. Among deacons, there was often a senior or principal deacon, called "archdeacon."

As the bishop's right-hand helpers, some deacons succeeded to the office of bishop directly without becoming presbyters. This practice continued right down at least to Hildebrand (Gregory VII, pope, 1073–1085), who was an archdeacon in diaconal orders when chosen pope. There was disagreement in the church in the third and fourth centuries as to the role of deacons in relation to presbyters, especially with regard to who was higher in church hierarchy, who could preside at the Eucharist, and who could preach. Although the diaconate eventually became a stepping stone to becoming a priest, this was not a foregone conclusion in these early centuries.

As Christianity became legal in the Roman Empire, however, deacons became subordinate to presbyters, deaconesses to deacons, and widows to deaconesses. The emperors Constantine and Licinius announced official toleration of Christians in the Roman Empire in 313, and in 380–382 the emperor Theodosius required the people of the empire to practice orthodox Christianity. This meant enormous change for the church. The church could now own property. Worship moved from house churches into large basilicas, and worship leaders adopted liturgical dress. Deacons served as bishops' representatives to church councils and meetings. Deacons judged with other clerics over assemblies, adjudicating quarrels among Christians. Church offices and liturgical roles developed. The role of the church in social welfare expanded. Christian emperors relied heavily on the bishops to administer relief of the poor, care for orphans, run hospitals, and oversee prison conditions.

Church office became a full-time occupation for many bishops, presbyters, and deacons, who came to depend on ecclesiastical revenues for support rather than on their own incomes, but with financial support came demands, such as CELIBACY. Just like monks in the newly forming monastic communities, bishops, presbyters (priests), and deacons in the western end of the Mediterranean were asked to be celibate. That priests and deacons not marry took a long time to make official, and longer still to enforce. It was not until the Second Lateran Council of the church in 1139 that marriages of subdeacons, deacons, and priests were invalid.

Just as the legalization of Christianity had enormous ramifications for the church, so too did the fall of the Western Roman Empire in 476. Deacons retained a role in social welfare and property management at least into the fourth and the fifth centuries, but they lost it by the seventh century, when parishes were taking responsibility for their own poor rather than relying on the bishops whose assistants the deacons had been.

As deacons lost their social welfare functions, the church emphasized their liturgical roles. By the time of Gregory the Great (pope, 590–604), deacons had become renowned for their singing in the liturgy. By the early sixth century or before, deacons blessed the paschal candle at the Easter Vigil, but monasteries helped the needy, as did religious orders as they emerged. The male diaconate became an office one occupied on the way to the priesthood.

Deaconesses and widows formed female religious communities that sometimes included dedicated vir-gins. From these female living situations emerged religious orders (see MONASTICISM). The deaconesses and the widows were absorbed into the emerging religious orders.

Some functions of the deacons continued in the hands of the archdeacons, who retained important responsibilities in the financial, judicial, and charitable work of the church. Medieval archdeacons were legal representatives of bishops and exercised jurisdiction over priests. By the twelfth century archdeacons were themselves generally also priests in the West.

By that time, governments were also taking more of a role in social welfare, and in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, confraternities or lay brotherhoods and sisterhoods began to assume these responsibilities. By the fifteenth century the deacon's role was almost exclusively liturgical, and the diaconate prepared men for the priesthood.

From the Reformation to the Nineteenth Century

The reformers of the Protestant REFORMATION of the sixteenth century found the diaconate ripe for a reform along biblical lines. The model that they advocated was that of the early church when deacons had had responsibilities for the poor. This was practical as well, for in areas that became Protestant, Roman Catholic religious orders and confraternities were abolished or gradually dissolved, leaving communities bereft of the social welfare and education services they had performed.

City councils took over the Catholic Church's endowments and properties and also the responsibility for social welfare and education. Reformers such as MARTIN LUTHER, MARTIN BUCER, and JOHN CALVIN wanted those who cared for the poor to be called deacons, but, of these three, only Calvin was able to impose the title of deacon onto those who were responsible for social welfare. Deacon was one of the four church offices in the plural ministry of the ecclesiastical ordinances of Geneva (1541) that Calvin was instrumental in writing: (1) deacons served alongside (2) pastors, (3) doctors (teachers), and (4) elders.

As for the diaconate, Calvin envisioned a "double diaconate" based on his reading of Romans 12:6–8. He interpreted these verses to imply a difference between (1) those who “serve the church in administering the affairs of the poor” (the procurators, or trustees, of the city hospital) and (2) those who care “for the poor themselves” (those who ran the hospital on a day-to-day basis). The title of deacon seems to have been seldom used in Geneva for these officials, however, at least in the city’s documents. “Deacon” more commonly referred to the administrators of the privately endowed funds for Protestant refugees to Geneva that sprang up in the city in the sixteenth century: the French Fund, the Italian fund, and the German fund. There were no female deacons in Geneva, although Calvin supported the restoration of the ancient office of widow for women in the church.

The actual organization of city welfare did not differ greatly in Protestant cities such as Geneva, Wittenberg, and Strasbourg, however. Those responsible for social welfare tended, whatever their title, to be officials as much of local government as of the church, even in Reformed churches in Switzerland. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI’S Reformed Church of Zurich did not call deacons those who worked with the poor, for instance.

There were some Lutheran regions where those responsible for poor relief were called deacons (see LUTHERANISM). JOHANNES BUGENHAGEN (1485–1558), Luther’s pastor and minister of the city church in Wittenberg, used the title of deacon for those responsible for social welfare in the church orders that he wrote or edited for Lutheran churches in north Germany and Denmark. Still, some Lutherans of the sixteenth century called those ordained clergy who were serving as assistants to parish pastors “deacons.” By the seventeenth century, among Lutherans the title deacon generally referred to assistant pastors.

This was not the case in Reformed churches that emerged from the Genevan model. Of the four offices of the church that Calvin identified, it was “doctor” rather than deacon that tended to get dropped as Reformed churches organized elsewhere. Thus the organizational manual of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, its Book of Discipline of 1561, included deacons. Deacons were found in Reformed churches of FRANCE, the Germanies (see GERMANY), the Low Countries (modern-day Belgium and the Netherlands), and even among the refugees from the Continent of Europe to ENGLAND, and deacons were actively involved in poor relief. The Reformed churches of Wessel on the Rhine allowed women as deacons of the sort who cared for the sick.

The Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) who came out of the Protestant Reformation appeared to more freely allow women service that involved a title than did Lutheran or Reformed Churches. Mennonite Anabaptists (see MENNONITES) allowed for both deacons and deaconesses in their Confession of Dordrecht or Dort (April 21, 1632).

The Church of England retained the transitional diaconate of the medieval era, however, even though those Englishmen who had lived on the Continent in Reformed cities during the Marian exile (1553–1558), or who were Puritans (see PURITANISM), preferred the Reformed model of deacons as serving the poor. When the spiritual descendants of some of these people migrated to the New World as Separatists or Puritans in the seventeenth century, they retained the office of deacon in their churches, but gradually that term was telescoped with that of elder or trustee. The Boards of Deacons became governing boards of many Congregational or Baptist churches (see CONGREGATIONALISM, BAPTISTS). Meanwhile, in the eighteenth century back in England, Methodists (see METHODISM) emerging from within the Church of England naturally retained the transitional deacon of that church.

There were, then, broadly, two models for deacons in the denominations that emerged from the Reformation and the early-modern era up to the nineteenth century: (1) The transitional diaconate in which the office of deacon was held by a clergyman on his way to becoming a priest or pastor. This was true in the Catholic Church, the Church of England, and the Methodist Church. (2) The deacon as social worker and financial officer. These deacons were chosen from the congregation and had no intention of becoming pastors. They usually worked part time at their diaconal tasks. This model was found in Reformed churches modeled on Switzerland or churches that adopted that model. Lutherans, as they came to the new world and founded congregations, used the term “deacon” in both senses. There were “congregational deacons” in some synods of Lutheranism. “Deacon” was also used to refer to men on their way to becoming Lutheran pastors.

The Nineteenth Century

The next major development in the diaconate, after the Protestant Reformation, occurred in the nineteenth century and originated in the Germanies. The Napoleonic Wars, which ended in 1815, left families disrupted, women widowed, and children orphaned. The industrial revolution, arriving later in Europe than in England, brought with it the problems of urbanization.

Germany made a unique contribution to urban work in the form of the Inner Mission, a program of social action and evangelism that began with rescue houses for children who were neglected or abandoned during the wars. In 1833, in Hamburg, Johannes Wichern founded a home for vagrant boys, educating them and training them, gathering them into groups of twelve to fourteen boys with an “older brother,” a new type of deacon. In 1839 Wichern founded a brother house and trained deacons for work in jails, slums, and places where many pastors would not go. As the movement spread in the Germanies and beyond, deacons were trained in other places, too, sometimes in conjunction with their female counterparts, deaconesses. The Inner Mission included institutions such as seamen’s missions, hostels, hospices, halfway houses, and homes to rescue women from PROSTITUTION and work such as visitation of prisons, distribution of literature, and youth work. Deacons would also work in hospitals.

The deaconess movement in the Germanies owes its origins to Theodore Fliedner (1800–1864), a parish pastor at Kaiserswerth on the Rhine River just below Düsseldorf, who was inspired by trips to England where he visited ELIZABETH FRY, the prison reformer, and to the NETHERLANDS where he became aware of Mennonite deaconesses. Fliedner established at Kaiserswerth a halfway house for women prisoners in 1833 and a kindergarten and a school for nurses in 1836, an orphanage in 1842, and a mental hospital in 1852. To staff these institutions he educated women to be nurses, teachers, and social workers, and called them deaconesses.

The Napoleonic Wars had left many women without men. Single women of rural or artisan families came to Kaiserswerth to be educated. Many became deaconesses, living together in mother houses, dressed in the blue dress and white bonnet of the Kaiserswerth deaconess, committing themselves for five years at a time, receiving no salary except pocket money and a promise that they would be cared for in their old age. From Kaiserswerth they were sent out to other parts of Germany and abroad. They founded the nursing movement in the Germanies, some of them heading up the hospitals in which they served.

The movement grew enormously both in numbers of deaconesses and of mother houses. In 1861 Fliedner organized a General Conference of deaconess mother houses. Besides Fliedner, others founded mother houses, among whom was WILHELM LÖHE of Neuendettelsau, Bavaria (1854). Some mother houses, such as Bielefeld in Westphalia (1869), built clusters of institutions for the sick, mentally ill, and elderly. Later, under Adolf Hitler, German deaconesses took heroic measures to protect these disadvantaged.

The deaconess movement spread beyond Germany to France, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, RUSSIA, Austria-Hungary, and Britain. In 1862 the first deaconess of the Church of England, Elizabeth Ferard, was set apart by the Bishop of London. Her movement continues today in the deaconesses of St. Andrew's House, London. However, the OXFORD MOVEMENT in England and its religious sisterhoods interfered with the attraction of the deaconess movement, as did the fact that nursing in England developed along secular lines, Florence Nightingale having stayed at Kaiserswerth but never having become a deaconess. British deaconesses were less involved in nursing than their Continental counterparts.

Methodists and Baptists in England also had deaconesses, and Methodism would play a prominent role when deaconesses spread to the New World, although the deaconess movement in America owes its foundation to William Passavant, a Lutheran pastor, who, after a visit to Kaiserswerth, consecrated his first deaconesses in America on May 28, 1850.

The Lutheran deaconesses movement in the New World followed the mother-house model of the Old World with centers in areas where Germans and Scandinavians settled: Milwaukee, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Brooklyn, and Omaha, for instance. In some centers there was training for deacons, too, in Colorado and Nebraska. Philanthropists and trustees founded deaconess homes and hospitals, but in the case of the Norwegians, a deaconess from Norway, Elizabeth Fedde, brought the movement to Brooklyn and Minneapolis. Lutheran deaconesses often spoke the language of the mother country to each other and in the mother house.

Although the deaconesses movement never became as large in the United States as it had been in Europe, there were deaconesses from many Protestant denominations: Reformed, Baptist, Episcopal, Congregational, Presbyterian, Mennonite, and Methodist. There were also interdenominational deaconess associations. Women of German descent were well represented, and sometimes mother houses in Europe, such as Bielefeld and Neuendettelsau, sent deaconesses to the United States. Deaconesses founded or staffed hospitals that dot the country today, some still with "Deaconess" in their titles, but it was not so much nursing that caught on among American deaconesses as the inner-city work of the Methodists.

Among Methodists in America, deaconesses got a later start than among Lutherans. Prominent Methodist women agitated for the deaconess cause, including the well-educated sisters, Jane and Henrietta Bancroft, deans of the women's colleges at Northwestern University and the University of Southern California. The General Conference of the Methodist Church recognized deaconess work as an institution of the church in 1888, and the Chicago Training School for City and Home and Foreign Missions (1885) became the first school for deaconesses in the Methodist Church, although it was not limited to deaconesses. By 1915 Methodists had founded sixty such schools across the country in cities such as Boston, New York, San Francisco, and Grand Rapids.

Methodist deaconesses were particularly active in work in the inner city, especially among immigrants. They met women arriving at train stations and found them safe housing, helped people find work, opened clubs for young people, sponsored mother's circles, and established kindergartens and nurseries. Aware of society's problems, they opposed child labor (see CHILDHOOD) and were active in the TEMPERANCE movement.

The Twentieth Century

The deaconess movement and the deacons on the inner mission model thrived into the twentieth century. In some regions, such as Europe, growth continued until after World War II, but by the 1950s the movement appeared to have peaked, although some groups modernized and fared better, switching from pocket money to salaries, making deaconess "garb" optional or modernizing it, educating deaconesses in colleges and universities, and allowing deaconesses to marry or to work part time. As more denominations accepted women pastors, deaconesses had problems with recruitment, although some DENOMINATIONS, especially if they did not ordain women pastors, had ongoing success with their deaconess movements. This was true of the LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD, which did not have deaconesses until the twentieth century, but which now has deaconesses in the Concordia Deaconess Program, founded in 1980, and from the older Lutheran Deaconess Association at Valparaiso University. The Valparaiso deaconess has members in several Lutheran synods, including some who are ordained pastors.

Deacons and deaconesses organized on a world-wide basis. After World War II, the World Federation of Deaconess Associations became the precursor to DIAKONIA, an organization intended to further ecumenical relationship among diaconal associations of various countries. There are also five regional organizations including DOTAC (Diakonia of the Americas and the Caribbean). These have regular conferences.

Denominational affiliation could create obstacles for deaconess associations, and in the case of Norwegian Lutheran Deaconess, it may be what rushed them out of existence. Denominations could mandate that women be either pastors or deaconesses but not both at the same time, for instance, as is the case for the Deaconess Community of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (see LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA) headquartered at Gladwyne, Pennsylvania. Deaconesses who became pastors were removed from the deaconess roster, although they might have preferred to continue to participate in the deaconess community. The Gladwyne Community suffered from a five-year hiatus in new deaconess consecrations from 1988 to 1993 imposed by the church when the denomination was studying ministry.

The modern tendency is for deacons and deaconesses to be subsumed under one name, usually “deacon” but sometimes diaconal minister. In some de-nominations the title of deaconess has been dropped, or deaconesses have been allowed to keep their title but admit no new deaconesses. That is the case with the Church of England. Most Church of England deaconesses became deacons after 1987 when they were allowed to do so. Those who stayed deaconesses could keep the title, but there were to be no new deaconesses. Some female deacons went on to become ordained priests in the 1990s when it was allowed, if they had had the appropriate education. Some continued to live in community.

The UNITED METHODIST CHURCH IN AMERICA has allowed Methodist deaconesses to remain and recruit, although the denomination, at its 1996 General Conference, approved the “Deacon in Full Connection,” or permanent deacon. These are men or women, with the appropriate theological and professional education, ordained as deacons. Methodist deacons can preach, but not preside at the LORD’S SUPPER. The transitional diaconate was eliminated as a stepping stone to becoming an elder (pastor) within the Methodist Church, although a probationary period was not eliminated. Diaconal ministers already in office in Methodism were given the opportunity to join the order of deacon. In the year 2000 there were 1,000 permanent deacons among United Methodists and 35,000 elders.

Long before the Methodists, the AMERICAN EPISCOPAL CHURCH affirmed the permanent deacon in 1952 by adding a provision for perpetual deacons who were not transitional to the priesthood but who served permanently, after appropriate education, as deacons. An exciting development in the acknowledgment of a permanent diaconate was that of the Roman Catholic Church. In the Second Vatican Council in 1967 it restored the permanent diaconate and allowed men thirty-five years of age or older to serve in that ordained capacity even though they were married. Catholic Permanent Deacons have liturgical roles and can preach and serve the community in various ways. However, because they cannot preside over the Mass, they have not made up for the widespread shortage of priests.

The existence of the threefold ministry of bishops, pastors, and deacons has added a dynamic to ecumenical dialogue (see ECUMENISM) that is not easily resolved among church bodies that have a more unitary concept of the ministry as embodied in the pastor. On the other hand, church bodies with a unitary concept of ministry sometimes have a proliferation of “lay ministers” or workers, performing various tasks, many of which are appropriate to a deacon. The solution of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, described in its Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry of 1982, was to encourage, for the sake of unity and because of historical precedent, consideration of the threefold ministry by denominations that did not have it.

In addition to permanent deacons, there are still, of course, congregationally elected deacons in some denominations or deacons who serve as governing boards of churches, and there are programs to train them in diaconal service such as the Order of St. Stephen, Deacon.

See also Clergy; Women Clergy

References and Further Reading

- Baptism, Eucharist & Ministry*. Faith and Order Paper no. 111. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Barnett, James M. The Diaconate: A Full and Equal Order. New York: Harper and Row, 1981.
- Echlin, Edward P. The Deacon in the Church, Past and Future. Staten Island, NY: Alba House, Society of St. Paul, 1971.
- Lauterer, Heide-Marie. Liebestätigkeit für die Volksgemeinschaft Der Kaiserswerther Verband deutscher Diakonissenmutterhäuser in den ersten Jahren des NS-Regimes. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1994.
- Martimort, Aimé. Deaconesses: An Historical Study. Translated by K.D.Whitehead. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1986.
- McKee, Elsie. Diakonia in the Classical Reformed Tradition and Today. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1989.
- . John Calvin on the Diaconate and Liturgical Almsgiving. Geneva: Librairie Droz, 1984.
- Olson, Jeannine. Calvin and Social Welfare: Deacons and the Bourse française. Cranbury, NJ: Susquehanna University Press; London and Toronto: Associated University Presses, 1989.
- . Deacons and Deaconesses through the Centuries: One Ministry, Many Roles. St. Louis: Concordia Publishing House, 1992.
- Plater, Ormonde. Many Servants: An Introduction to Deacons. Cambridge, MA: Cowley Publications, 1991.

JEANNINE E.OLSON

DEATH AND DYING

Christianity does not deny death. Jesus, it attests, “was crucified, dead and buried.” However, in Christian perspective “death” has many faces. It is “natural,” established by the Creator. It limits the time of human existence and thus makes it important, and points it beyond itself to the eternal God. Natural death is penultimate; it is death unto God, who alone is ultimate. Death is also unnatural. In this fallen, sinful world, death pretends to be ultimate, the last word, an absolute nothingness that threatens the meaning of existence and in the end would separate the individual from the world, from others, and finally from God.

As the power that separates existence from God, death is indeed the power of SIN. As a true human being Jesus suffered this sinful death; as the Messiah he did so for the SALVATION of humankind. His death was a martyr’s death—the natural and expected out-come of the life he led. The cross was also a sinful “no” to the intrusion of God into this death-defined world. On the other hand, it is the overriding divine “no” of God’s judgment on the “no” of a sinful world. In Jesus’s death God, not death, has the last word, the word of forgiveness and reconciliation unto God.

With the loss of this perspective in the early decades of the twentieth century, discourse on death was silenced. However, in the 1970s following the publication of Elisabeth Kubler-Ross’s On Death and Dying, Americans realized that after all death and dying are universal, “natural” phenomena subject to rational reflection and control. Consequently there appeared a plethora of excellent books and school courses on “death and dying,” exploring all facets of the phenomena. These have helped the church understand just “what” this phenomenon of death is, but leave questions of meaning generally unexplored.

See also Heaven and Hell

References and Further Reading

Braaten, Carl E., and Robert W. Jenson, eds. Sin, Death and the Devil. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 2000.

Fulton, Gere B., and Eileen K. Metress. Perspectives on Death and Dying. Boston: Jones and Bartlett, 1995.

Kubler-Ross, Elisabeth. On Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan, 1969.

Thielicke, Helmut. Death and Life. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1970.

ROBERT T. OSBORN

DEATH OF GOD

For theology, the concept of the death of God is associated with a movement in radical theology in the United States in the 1960s. Behind the phrase lie two philosophical traditions: that of G.W.F. HEGEL (1770–1831) and FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE (1844–1900). The death of God refers not to the death of God but to the experience of the absence of God or to the absence of the experience of God. Both of these have been features of Western culture since the 1950s, and the analyses of Hegel and Nietzsche have been revived to address these twin crises. The death of God has been, in turn, the critique of modernity and the foundation of postmodernity. The theology of the death of God is associated with the vivid imagery of Nietzsche's Madman, who proclaims the death of God, but the more suggestive and profound meaning of the movement derives from the writings of Hegel.

G.W.F.Hegel

The death of God might well be taken as the starting point of Hegel's philosophical system. During the early days in Jena, as he began to develop his own position, it was the dramatic, even nostalgic device by which he distinguished his own speculative philosophy from the alternatives of the day. The phrase appeared in The Journal of Critical Philosophy in an essay entitled "Faith and Knowledge" (1802). He had been critical of philosophy since the writings of Rene Descartes (1596–1650) with its dualism, which separates thinking and being. This tradition was exacerbated by the scepticism of philosopher IMMANUEL KANT'S (1724–1804) Critique of Pure Reason. The consequence was that God became a hypothesis, beyond the limits of the knowable. God could well be dead. The outcome was not necessarily atheism, for the loss of God was experienced as "infinite grief." The Absolute had not been rejected, but the relationship of the finite and the infinite was broken, not simply in fact but as an idea. Hegel later described the process in The Phenomenology of Spirit. In absolute subjectivity the Unhappy Consciousness succumbs to the tragic fate of becoming itself absolute and self-sufficient, finally losing even this certainty of self. It is "the bitter pain which finds expression in the cruel words, 'God is dead'."

Hegel, as a good Lutheran, accepted the truth of Christianity as a religion, but sought to supersede it in his philosophy. Even the phrase “death of God” he took from a seventeenth-century Lutheran hymn. In Christian piety it refers to the death of Christ, the incarnation of God. The death of God in this sense was a historical event, cruel but not tragic, because beyond death at Golgotha lies the resurrection. In fact, the phrase Hegel borrows is “Gott selbst ist tot.” “God himself is dead” is a philosophical, not a theological utterance. For Hegel the truth of Christianity lies in its exemplification of the universal in the particular, the idea in the event. The death of God refers not now to the death of Christ, but to the loss of the Absolute in a culture informed by ENLIGHTENMENT duality. Hegel’s entire philosophical project therefore began from this analysis. His system of Absolute Idealism was intended to lead not back to religion but on to a new identification of thinking and being. The historical Good Friday points to the Speculative Good Friday.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer

The phrase “death of God,” therefore, refers not to a historical event but to a cultural milieu of the nineteenth century that resulted not in atheism but in “infinite grief.” When this cultural milieu was replicated in the middle of the twentieth century, Hegel’s use of the phrase was revived. The milieu itself was first described by the German theologian DIETRICH BONHOEFFER (1906–1945), who was arrested and executed by the Gestapo for his part in plotting against Adolf Hitler (1889–1945). In spite of the fact that his fragmentary writings in prison were tentative, incomplete, and at times enigmatic, indeed precisely because they were not developed, they became the starting point for several post-World War II theological movements, each of which he would no doubt have disowned. In these Letters and Papers from Prison he claims that we are moving toward a time of no religion at all: people as they are now simply cannot be religious any more. God is no longer present to the believer, yet belief remains. How is this absence of God to be interpreted? God is teaching us that we must live as people who can get along very well without him. “The God who is with us is the God who forsakes us (Mark 15:34).” At Gethsemane the disciples of Jesus are called to watch. Christians are challenged to participate in the sufferings of God at the hands of a godless world. Bonhoeffer expresses the infinite grief of absence and the hope of finding an appropriate way not back but forward. It was left to others to revive the Hegelian theme of the death of God.

William Hamilton

Gabriel Vahanian was the first to announce the death of God (1961), but the two main exponents of the theology of the death of God were William Hamilton American and Theologian Thomas Altizer (1927–). Hamilton offered not logic but biography, not metaphysics but personal experience. In describing his own religious history he invites others to identify with it. Earlier in his life there was experience of God, a God to be enjoyed, celebrated, and obeyed. Now that experience has gone. Argument has played no part, least of all argument designed to disprove the existence of God. There is now a sense of loss, comparable to the death of a loved one. There is a particular kind of grieving endured when the body of the loved one is not found, so Hamilton experiences the death of God, and yet there is part of him that waits for the return of God. Clearly Hamilton is not influenced by Hegel, but themes from Bonhoeffer appear. One is “secret discipline”: paradoxically, he prays for the return of the God who apparently is dead. But it must be the return of the God who is revealed in Christ. Another is the concentration of the person of Jesus. Christians waiting for God must adopt the life-style of the “man for others.” It is in this that the true humanity of Jesus is revealed, and that true divinity is revealed. Hamilton might be better described as a secular theologian. He uses the phrase “death of God,” but does not develop it theologically.

Thomas Altizer

Thomas Altizer’s work is much more sophisticated and ambitious. If Hamilton explores his personal experience of the unhappy consciousness, Altizer launches himself into a theological reinterpretation of the doctrine of incarnation that is thoroughly dialectical. In the secular culture of the 1960s there was a widespread acknowledgement that God was absent: but only Christians knew that God was dead. The absence might be assumed to be the work of man: the death of God was the work of God himself. According to Altizer, Christians should not hold back, but should will the death of God. At the beginning and end of the period of the “death of God” theology, Altizer published on American novelist Mircea Eliade (1907–1986) in 1963 and on English poet William Blake (1757–1827) in 1967. He proposed an alternative reading to that of Eliade. It is God himself who, by the incarnation, has brought an end of the sacred in its primordial form. For Christians there is no going back. The sacred can be regained only by a dialectical negation of the profane, but it must be a sacred understood now in the light of the death of God. Nor is it simply the pre-Christian God who has died. As early as World War I KARL BARTH (1886–1968) declared that such a God is dead. Altizer pursues his dialectic in a more Hegelian vein through the doctrine of kenosis, the self-emptying of God (Philippians 2:6–11). The kenotic movement of the Incarnation sees Spirit becoming flesh, eternity becoming time, and the sacred becoming profane. Christians must not look romantically or nostalgically to the beginning, but rather with hopeful anticipation to the end. The death of God marks the epiphany of the eschatological Christ. Altizer describes this as the gospel of Christian atheism. It was not received as good news in the churches, and unlike Hamilton he did not recommend radical Christians participate in the traditional religious life. However, by pursuing his profane destiny he still hoped to find a way “to return to the God who is all in all.”

The death of God theology was short-lived, but sufficiently lively that writers in other fields of radical theology felt it necessary to relate their own movement to it. Thus feminist theology welcomed the death of the divine patriarch, while liberation theology rejected the theme as distracting from the real issue, the death of men [sic!]. But these movements were calling for a new understanding of God the liberator and did not extend the theology of the death of God.

Friedrich Nietzsche

It was assumed in the 1960s that it was Nietzsche whose influence lay behind the theology of the death of God. As we have seen, the more fruitful influences were Hegel and even Bonhoeffer. The contemporary revival of interest in Nietzsche relates not to modernity but to postmodernity. He is influential on theology, but the outcome is not a revival of the movement of the 1960s.

Even more so than for Hegel, the death of God is the starting point of Nietzsche's philosophy. But unlike Hegel, he does not appropriate it from theology, nor does he attempt to develop it in such a way as to correct or complete a theological project. The intense religious faith of his youth gave way to a loss of religious beliefs in his student days. The reasons for this are not clear and apparently do not matter. Nietzsche claims that religious faith does not come about by rational argument, nor does argument lead to the loss of belief. It is as if the possibility of belief is relative to the culture in which we live. In some epochs everyone believes in God: in other periods few share such beliefs. In this sense God has a history. In the emerging secular culture the possibility of believing in God dies out. For Nietzsche it is irrelevant to protest whether this should be so or not. As a prophet of the coming age he proclaims that God is dead. For atheism this would be the end of the story; for Nietzsche it is only the beginning. For atheism the death of God would be a conclusion; for Nietzsche it is a premise: he wishes to explore the consequences.

Throughout his works Nietzsche refers frequently to the death of God, but there are two passages in The Gay Science in which he describes the event and its consequences in some detail. In the first passage, "The Meaning of Our Cheerfulness," he describes the death of God as if it were a cosmic event that had already taken place at the edge of the universe, not caused or planned here on earth; an event that nevertheless will eventually engulf this world. He foresees a period of destruction and desolation. The whole of Western culture was based upon religious premises. The death of God means the loss of the foundations of truth, morality, and aesthetics. Some are unaware of what has happened, others choose to ignore, but a few like Nietzsche experience "this monstrous logic of terror." The abyss of nihilism opens up. Why then cheerfulness? Because those who are brave enough to accept the death of God, who are steadfast enough to accept their fate, discover that with the end of the old world, a new world beckons. Nietzsche frequently uses the metaphor of putting out to sea. Previously men set the course of their lives by looking to the heavens. Now the old religious framework has been dismantled, but instead of being tossed about in a hostile flood, the free spirits discover that they can take responsibility for the ship, for the course, indeed can declare it to be “our sea.” Some of the same themes appear in the more famous passage, “The Madman.” Now the death of God is not an event that takes place out of sight of mankind. All those who have participated in the creation of the secular culture have had a hand on the assassin’s knife that killed God. They knew not what they did. At a stroke they wiped out the horizon by which to steer a course, loosed the earth from the sun so that judgments such as higher and lower have no meaning. There is only one thing for it: they will have to become gods. They will have to take responsibility for discovering a new foundation for life, the life of meaning and significance, the truly human life.

For Nietzsche the death of God is a metaphor for the loss of the old religious foundations of life. It is the preface to his criticism of religion, particularly the Christian religion as a religion of decadence and ressentiment. Bonhoeffer was influenced by these themes in Nietzsche, as for example when he condemned the “religious premise,” the presentation of mankind as weak, incompetent, and dependent on God. However, the current revival of interest in Nietzsche relates to postmodernism. Writers on this subject begin with the dissolution of the Enlightenment project, with the loss of consensus on the conditions of truth and universal moral and aesthetic values. The death of God in this context means the end of the religious basis of modernity. Those who wish to continue theology under the condition of postmodernity must do so post mortem dei.

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Deland S. Hegel’s Speculative Good Friday. Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996.
- Altizer, Thomas J.J. The Gospel of Christian Atheism. London: Collins, 1967.
- Altizer, Thomas J.J., and William Hamilton, eds. Radical Theology and the Death of God. New York: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1966.
- Cobb, John Jr. The Theology of Altizer: Critique and Response. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1970.
- Haynes, Stephen R., and John K.Roth. Death-of-God Movement and the Holocaust. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1999.
- Kee, Alistair. The Way of Transcendence. London: Penguin Books, 1971.
- . Nietzsche Against the Crucified. London: S.C.M.Press Ltd., 1999.
- Murchland, B., ed. The Meaning of the Death of God. New York: Vintage Books, 1967.
- Ogletree, Thomas W. The Death of God Controversy. New York: Abingdon Press, 1966.
- Schiffers, Norbert, “Analysing Nietzsche’s ‘God is Dead,’” In C.Geffré, and Jean-Pierre Jossua, eds. Nietzsche and Christianity, Concilium 145, 1981.
- Schindler, David L. “On the Meaning and the Death of God in the Academy.” Communio 17 (1990):192–206.

ALISTAIR KEE

DEISM

Deism was a current of thought originating in seventeenth-century ENGLAND that formed the basis for eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT attitudes toward religion, reason, and nature in FRANCE, GERMANY, and beyond. Deists typically challenged the notion of revelation from God in a BIBLE and proposed the alternative of commonsense reason as a guide to religion and morality.

Definition

It is difficult to define “deism” because some who have been called “deists” rejected the label, and even those who accepted the term disagreed on its meaning. Two of the best-known English deists, CHARLES BLOUNT and JOHN TOLAND, for example, claimed to be fighting deism, and a third, ANTHONY COLLINS, never confessed to being a deist. No doubt this was because “deist” was something of a dirty word, which polemicists in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries used as a weapon against their opponents. The word was coined by Pierre Viret in 1564 to designate anything that fell between atheism and Christianity, and was used with similar imprecision in the early eighteenth century. Most of those given the name accepted God’s creation of the world and rejected the notion of special revelation in the Bible, while disagreeing on the existence of an immortal soul, future retribution, freedom of the will, human nature, and the possibility of divine intervention in the world.

Generally, however, these thinkers agreed that one can start with abstract reason and then proceed from an abstract (“self-evident”) principle to conclusions about goodness, justice, and God. All rejected a simple appeal to AUTHORITY (religious or political) because their understanding of what is reasonable—and on this they differed—was their criterion for truth. The location of a DOCTRINE in the Bible was not enough for it to be thought divine—it had to meet the approval of what their understanding of reason considered acceptable. In a sense, this was a development of MARTIN LUTHER’S Protestant principle that the locus of authority is not an ecclesiastical institution but a particular construal of the Bible. However, although Luther debated not the truth of the Bible but its interpretation, deists judged Scripture's veracity by its coherence with what they determined to be reason's dictates.

Origins

The first impulses of deist thinking emerged as an attempt to protect French Protestants against persecution by Catholics. EDWARD LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY (1583–1633), widely regarded as a progenitor of deism, proposed his five “common notions” (the existence of God, that God ought to be worshipped, the necessity of moral virtue and piety, sin's expiation by repentance, rewards and punishment after death) in the hope that they would help end the wars of religion. Herbert and his successors believed that appeals to religious authority, which emphasized differences rather than similarities among religions, were responsible for the intellectual and political violence of the seventeenth century. They were determined to rely on evidence from nature and reason, which all were thought to share, rather than TRADITION, which tended to divide.

The rise of deism also involved a battle for political control. Deists insisted on persons' fundamental right to understand truth for themselves—an indirect result of Protestantism's emphasis on the FAITH of the individual. Most English deists were Anglicans (see ANGLICANISM) fearful that without autonomy people would be susceptible to political control by Roman Catholics using implicit faith and papal infallibility, and by enthusiasts claiming immediate inspiration.

A third factor was the seventeenth century's burgeoning faith in the power of reason. Progress in physics (Sir ISAAC NEWTON), law (SAMUEL PUFENDORF and Baron de Montesquieu), and biblical criticism (Richard Simon) offered hope that reason could bring life and society under control. The CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS (Ralph Cudworth, Benjamin Whichcote, and HENRY MORE) appeared to demonstrate that reason could recognize and appropriate divine truth as well. They also brought morality to the fore, linking it to religion by making moral disposition a prerequisite to true spiritual experience.

Fourth, some deists were reacting against the scandal of particularity—the notion that God revealed himself to particular peoples at particular times rather than to all humans from the beginning. The orthodox Christian God who sent people to hell (see HEAVEN AND HELL) without giving them a chance to respond to the gospel seemed to be a monster, unworthy of a rational person's devotion. This reaction was strengthened by reports from voyages to the New World and East of millions of non-Christian but religious souls who often seemed more moral than their European contemporaries.

Other factors included a sense of ecclesiastical corruption, pluralism, moral turpitude in the established church, and political and theological wrangling by the CLERGY—all of which seemed to justify deists' rejection of religious authority.

Basic Themes of English Deism

Although French and German deists further developed the early thinking of the English deists, it was the latter who established the basic outlines of deist reasoning that persisted through the eighteenth century. A number of important themes originated with English thinkers in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries.

Epistemological Optimism Based on Common Sense. The English deists believed that reason was perfectly capable of discerning between good and evil, and truth and error, by appeal to what is intuitively obvious—or as deists put it, common sense. By this they meant not knowledge from everyday experience so much as abstract principles divorced from experience and traditions grounded in religious experience. For example, they thought Christ's resurrection unlikely because of the abstract principle that the course of NATURE is never altered. Confucius knew better how to treat enemies because reason shows intuitively that Jesus's command to love enemies is improper. These things can be known with a certainty akin to that produced by mathematical reasoning because truth is a set of clear propositions that can be proven, whereas traditional religion relies on authority and mystery. Therefore the rational person can determine what is true in religion by comparing religious claims to what is thought to be intuitively clear. As Toland asserted, nothing could be true of God that exceeded the limits of his understanding.

Elitism and Hostility to "Priestcraft." Truth can be understood in its full clarity only by the educated who can follow rational argument; the uneducated masses comprehend only fables and religious allegories. Like Benjamin Franklin, they thought Christianity useful for teaching the untutored hordes for the purpose of social control. Collins said he sent his domestics to church so they would learn not to rob him or cut his throat. As Tindal remarked, citing a Greek proverb, "Miracles for fools and reasons for wise men." He and other deists believed the masses were kept ignorant of "natural religion" by a conspiracy of priests who for the sake of selfish gain distorted or destroyed the original knowledge given by reason and intuition to all human beings. In a Golden Age at the beginning of creation, the first generations practiced a simple and clear religion of nature that institutional religion had subsequently suppressed.

Religion as Moralism. For deists the essence of religion is morality. According to WILLIAM WOLLASTON, "By religion I mean nothing else but our obligation to do (under which I comprehend acts both of body and mind. I say to do) what ought not to be omitted, and to forbear what ought not to be done." These moral obligations are known a priori, before and without revelation. In fact, intuition showed deists that much of what passes for revelation in the Bible is in fact immoral.

Ahistorical Religion. God and true religion were thought by deists to be absolutely invariable since the beginning of history. Because they had decided a priori that revelation must have always been available equally to all human beings from the very beginning of history, and that to admit anything otherwise would be to conceive an unjust and malevolent God, they insisted on the unchanging character of both true religion and its deity. Hence all positive religions connected to history were necessarily suspect—products of an arbitrary god who is not God.

Sincerity as the Heart of True Religion. Because no religious doctrine has been known universally, sincerity is all that matters for divine acceptance. Theological differences are insignificant, and all religions are relative expressions of divine sanctions for morality. Hence none is better than another at reconciling the individual to the divine, and each demonstrates the importance of character, not belief.

Rejection of Christian Theology. Christian doctrines were particularly noteworthy for being superfluous and downright pernicious. For example, the satisfaction theory of the ATONEMENT smacked of ancient heathen sacrifices appeasing a bloodthirsty god. Why cannot God simply forgive? asked the deists. Besides, if God requires satisfaction, he can be hurt, which implies weakness and imperfection. The person of Jesus was also controversial. He could not be central in true religion because he was a latecomer to the history of humanity and therefore inaccessible to many. To accept his central role would be to accept ORTHODOXY'S claim that some times and places were privileged over others, which in turn would make God an arbitrary god.

Hostility to Judaism. For this reason JUDAISM was execrable to most deists, who were leaders of the Enlightenment's reevaluation of Judaism. The notion of a chosen people, they felt, implies divine favoritism, and the religion as a whole is full of human ceremonialism and priestly imposture. In a way, the deists' strictures of the Old Testament were those of the New Testament, and those of the Jewish religion were those of the Christian religion. As far as the deists were concerned, "priests" had perverted the original purity of the natural religion in both instances. While the English deists left no doubt that they favored the legal emancipation of Jews in England, their disparagement of the "legalism" of the Jewish religion could easily be used to label the Jewish religion as morally and religiously inferior, especially when their analogous denunciation of the Christian religion were ignored.

The English Deists

LORD HERBERT of Cherbury published his five common notions, which he claimed were known a priori by intuition, in De Veritate, Prout Distinguitur a Revelatione, a Verisimile, a Possibili, et a Falso, first in Paris in 1624, then in London in 1633 and 1645. In Antient Religion of the Gentiles (1663) he cited heathen who had lived "innocent and commendable lives" as illustrations of why the Fathers of the church had been "too rigid and severe" to sentence the majority of humanity to damnation because they did not know Christ. He learned from Vossius's De Origine ac Progressu Idololatriae (1641) that all the wise Gentiles were monotheists.

Charles Blount (1654–1693), a disciple of Herbert, used the Jesuit travelogues from CHINA to rail against "particular religions" and stipulate that "revealed religion" cannot be true because it is not known by all. Only that which is universal is true. In Summary Account of the Deist's Religion (1693), Blount argues that reason is the first revelation of God and by the nature of things makes moral truths self-evident. It also reveals that there was no divine mediator, and that morality is far more important than any supposed mystery. Blount often attacked classical religion in his writings, but the astute reader can discern between the lines a critique of Christian orthodoxy that has been veiled for fear of legal action.

JOHN TOLAND (1670–1722) was a learned philosopher whose many writings made deism accessible to a broad audience. His most famous work, Christianity Not Mystrious: Or a treatise Shewing That there is nothing in the Gospel Contrary to Reason, Nor above it: And that no Christian Doctrine can be properly call'd a Mystery (1696), charged that truth is always clear and true religion always reasonable and intelligible. Original Christianity therefore was free of mystery, which came only with the admixture of Platonic and Aristotelian thought imported by the Fathers. Other superstitions came through gentile additions of mysteries and ceremonies from pagan religions. The clergy's greatest crime was to prevent people from thinking for themselves because self-determination is the greatest gift. Ironically, Toland, who was a materialist and pantheist, both decried mystery in Christianity and tried to rehabilitate Druidism and continental Freemasonry. Toland admired some classical authors for their elegance and disdain for superstition, but denounced Plato for his "incomprehensible" mysteries, and Epicurus, Aristotle, and Plato for their repugnant morals.

MATTHEW TINDAL (1657–1733) was the most learned of the British deists. His Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730) was not called "the Deists' Bible" without reason: it elicited more than 150 published replies. Despite having sat at Locke's feet as an admiring disciple, Tindal, like most deists, believed in a priori knowledge. His basic argument in Christianity began with the assumption that rational religion is clear, accessible, and perfect. If perfect, it cannot be made clearer. Any claim to make it clearer is therefore false. Because traditional Christianity makes that claim, it is false. Hence any pretenses to external (outside the human mind and heart) revelation owe to enthusiasm or imposture. To be governed by such revelation is to renounce reason and replace understanding with implicit faith. In the second half of Christianity, which Tindal wrote when he was seventy-five years old, the Oxford fellow systematically attacked the Bible by impugning the character of biblical heroes and the intelligence of the apostles, questioning the reliability of the prophecies and miracle stories, and challenging the limits of the biblical canon. Much of the New Testament, he declared, was hyperbolic and parabolic, so its words must be interpreted in a contrary sense to make common sense. In contrast to the confusion elicited by the Bible, the light of nature clearly shows us the way to God by repentance and moral amendment.

THOMAS CHUBB (1679–1746), a Salisbury tallow chandler and glovemaker who confessed he knew no languages but his own, was the least educated of all the deists. He began as a disciple of the Arians WILLIAM WHISTON and Samuel Clarke, then became a deist. He was able to express the currents of his age in a vigorous and accessible fashion; more than anyone else, Chubb took deism to the common people. Chubb's basic rule of thinking was that reason is or ought to be a sufficient guide in matters of religion. He taught that all persons have the divine law in their hearts, so they can easily determine whether something purporting to be divine is truly so. Religion is valuable only as it serves human morality; far from central, life after death is at best uncertain and prayer is unnecessary.

The aristocratic ANTHONY COLLINS (1676–1729) was the best educated and most sophisticated of the English deists. A friend of Locke, he argued in his Discourse of Free-Thinking (1713) for the right to think and publish freely, and charged that enthusiasm and superstition are worse than atheism. A necessitarian who argued against free will, Collins is particularly known for his criticisms of supposed New Testament fulfillments of Old Testament prophecies. Other English deists include WILLIAM WOLLASTON, THOMAS WOOLSTON, Thomas Morgan, Lord Henry St John Bolingbroke, and Peter Annet.

Attacks on Deism from England and America

The early eighteenth century was flooded with pamphlets and treatises written by orthodox divines attacking deist claims. Yet many of these attacks shared the rationalistic premises of the deists and so were not particularly effective. Bishop JOSEPH BUTLER'S Analogy of Religion (1736), however, dealt English deism a crippling blow. Butler contended that nature is just as mysterious as revelation. The deist description of nature as clear and indubitable, he argued, was more fanciful than accurate. Nature is neither uniform nor transparent in intelligibility. Furthermore, deists have no good reason to presume that the grand system of being, much of which is beyond human ken, is anything like the empirical realities that we know. So if revealed religion seems irrational at points, natural religion is not without its own dark enigmas.

Others had made similar but less compelling arguments. Philosopher and bishop GEORGE BERKELEY had asserted that some mathematical axioms are as puzzling as the Christian mysteries (The Analyst, 1734), whereas in The Case of Reason (1731) WILLIAM LAW denied the use of abstract reason in morality and religion, arguing that religion is best validated by historical evidence and implicit faith. Later in that century JOHN WESLEY proposed that inner conversion is the best argument.

The American philosopher-theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758) made the most pointed criticisms of the deist project without at the same time denying a role for reason in apprehending religious truth. In his notebooks and treatises he charged that the deist bar of common sense fails to admit truths of life even deists affirm. For life, like religion, abounds with mystery and paradox. The deist restriction of truth to propositions that can be understood comprehensively presumes a one-dimensional view of the human person. Propositions are functions of the affections, which in turn are grounded in aspects of the person that transcend thinking. Hence religious claims are borne not of mere rational perception but a complex blend of passion, interest, and ratiocination. Reason is also the product of complex forces; it is not neutral but interested. So although it can and must determine the possibility of revelation, it is no wonder that unregenerate reason cannot comprehend regenerate arguments for revelation. Edwards also challenged deist views of nature and the religions. He portrayed the world not as a giant machine but as a living organism, sustained not by laws of nature but by immediate re-creation from moment to throbbing moment. Like the deists, Edwards took other religions seriously, acknowledged their providential role in world history, and made room for the Holy Spirit in the work of pagan philosophers in China, Greece, and Rome. However, he denied a common substratum at the heart of all religions. Finally, Edwards resisted the move of deists (and a surprising number of “orthodox” thinkers) to make true religion synonymous with moral virtue. Edwards insisted instead that true religion always issues from aesthetic vision (see AESTHETICS). Hence moral sincerity is not enough, unless it is the appeal of true virtue. Unlike the deists, Edwards was more interested in internal states and sensibilities than external works.

DAVID HUME (1711–1776) had even less confidence in abstract reason. In “Of Miracles,” “Of a Particular Providence and of a Future State” (1748), The Natural History of Religion (1757), and Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779), he proposed that reason is impotent to either establish or falsify religious beliefs. His criticism of mechanism—that the idea of causation corresponds to actual fact—was devastating to the model of the universe as machine. It denied that reality was as transparent as deists claimed.

Deism on the Continent

Although deism in England dissipated by mid-century, it took on new life across the English Channel. François Marie Arouet (Voltaire was his adopted name) (1694–1778) was less a philosopher than a satirist who popularized deism in France by clear and crisp wit. After the suppression of the Encyclopédie and the execution of Huguenot Jean Calas in 1762, Voltaire raised his battle cry, “Ecrasez l’infâme” (“Crush the infamous thing.”). By this he meant orthodox, institutional Christianity, whose mysterious doctrines inspired persecuting fanaticism. Influenced by the English deists, Voltaire decried the “immorality” of Old Testament heroes such as David, and found the gospels self-contradictory: God could not have been born of a girl or died on a gibbet. Voltaire was nevertheless a theist who was convinced by the argument from design and taught a religion of praise, adoration, and moral virtue.

Deist thinking in Germany led to a new emphasis on biblical criticism. JOHANN SALOMO SEMLER (1725–1791), professor of theology at HALLE and often called the father of historical criticism of the Bible, followed Tindal in saying that the essence of biblical religion was the moral teachings of Christ. Readers should consider as revelation only what is reasonable and agrees with one’s moral experience. HERMANN SAMUEL REIMARUS (1694–1768), professor of oriental languages at Hamburg, was the most famous German deist. In his 4,000-page An Apology for the Rational Worshippers of God (published in portions by GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM LESSING), Reimarus declared that Christianity was not only unnecessary but fraudulent: there are contradictions in the stories of both the Exodus and Jesus’s resurrection, and evidence that Jesus’s disciples stole his body and created a religion foreign to his intentions when it became clear that Jesus’s prophecy of the imminent kingdom had failed.

Lessing (1729–1781) took a more nuanced approach to Christianity, but accentuated deism’s skepticism toward the Bible’s historical claims. In “On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power,” Lessing pronounced that although reason delivers truths that are a priori and therefore certain, historical claims are dependent on human testimony and therefore uncertain. Miracle stories are particularly unreliable because we no longer have experience to compare them with. Hence “accidental truths of history can never become the proof of necessary truths of reason.” The teachings of Christ teach an inward truth that existed long before the Bible, and this inward truth can be known only by “spirit and power” or personal experience. In The Education of the Human Race (1777), Lessing departed from the English deist view of religious history by suggesting progressive revelation in which historical religions are superseded by a more sublime eternal gospel—deism. In another departure, Lessing insisted that historical revelation can tell us things reason cannot, and that reason in fact develops under the tutelage of positive revelation. Thus the infinite manifests itself only through the finite, the eternal through the temporal process of becoming. The terminus of this development is moral autonomy in which one does right not for rewards but because it is right.

Deism in America

Near the end of the eighteenth century, deism borrowed from the American Revolution a passion it had previously lacked and enjoyed considerable popularity among the cultural elite. The majority of students at Yale, Dartmouth, and Princeton were said to have become skeptics under its influence. Franklin, THOMAS JEFFERSON, and other leaders of the new republic were proponents of this Enlightenment religion.

By the age of seventeen, Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) was convinced of deism after reading Collins and Tindal. He never reconciled his deist belief in comprehensive natural laws with his faith in divine intervention, but maintained throughout his life a near-obsession with the idea of moral perfection through good works. Convinced of divine benevolence by nature’s benefits, Franklin was skeptical of orthodox Christian beliefs. Shortly before his death he said he believed that Jesus was the best moral teacher ever but doubted his divinity. He affirmed immortality and retribution, and fought fervently for religious tolerance.

Dismissed by his political archrival Alexander Hamilton as an “atheist and fanatic,” THOMAS JEFFERSON (1743–1826) believed that apparent design in the universe points to a First Cause. Jefferson adopted deist insistence that ideas must be distinct before reason can act on them, and decided that the Incarnation, Jesus’s resurrection, revelation, biblical miracles, and the Trinity are indistinct if not murky. Jesus taught a rational religion of three propositions: one perfect God, reward and punishment in the future, and love for God and neighbor. Like Toland, Jefferson dismissed Christianity as hopelessly corrupted by “Platonic absurdities.” Calvinism contained the worst of these: “If I were to found a new religion, [my fundamental principle] would be the reverse of Calvin’s, that we are saved by our good works which are within our power, and not by the faith which is not within our power.” True religion, he wrote, is essentially social morality, which the man Jesus taught better than anyone. Though not a philosopher, he was the most capable proponent of deism in early America.

Ethan Allen (1737–1789), leader of the Green Mountain Boys during the Revolution, wrote America’s first systematic treatise on deism, Reason the Only Oracle of Man, in 1784. The least gifted of American deists, Allen contributed no innovations, but went to great lengths to deny the divinity of Jesus and to accuse the biblical deity of immortality and arbitrariness. Thomas Paine's Age of Reason (1794–1795), America's best-known deist treatise, was a response to the dogmatic atheism of the French Revolution. It opened with the words, "My own mind is my own church." America's leading polemicist, Paine attacked written revelation as hearsay, and miracles as portraying a deity who performed tricks to amuse.

Elihu Palmer (1764–1806), America's most sophisticated deist, was blinded by a yellow fever epidemic in 1793. In his Principles of Nature (1801) he developed a natural ethics based on "reciprocal justice" and "universal benevolence." It is utilitarian in method, appealing to whatever maximizes pleasure and minimizes pain. Palmer taught that rational investigation of the laws of nature reveals both ethics and religion, and condemns the subjugation of WOMEN, people of color, and coercion of conscience. It also points up the immorality and absurdity of Christian doctrine: eternal damnation punishes finite sins with infinite pain; original sin suggests that vice and virtue can be transferred; and the atonement is savage retaliation of evil for evil. Palmer's deist newspaper, The Temple of Reason, attacked both church and state as twin obstacles to progress.

The Corrosion of Deism

While deism was capturing the minds of many in the American cultural elite, two original minds in Europe were launching devastating salvos against a religion of reason. JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU (1712–1778), an intellectual bridge between deism and Romanticism, held to deist beliefs about God and morality but rejected deist isolation of reason from feeling and willing. His 1762 "Profession of Faith of the Savoyard Vicar" in Emile suggests that although nature (not the Bible) teaches religious truth, the way to nature's truth is through "feeling" and "conscience." The Bible is unreliable because it is founded on human testimony, and abstract reasoning is equally unable to find God. Certainty and the divine are found only at the intersection of rational evidence, religious intuition, and moral conviction. Innate sentiments of justice and virtue are the only true guides to divine truth. In a move not unlike Edwards's, Rousseau located reason in the maelstrom of human experience, and denied empirical reason's access to the divine.

IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804), in The Critique of Pure Reason (1781), agreed with Rousseau that faith is not a product of empirical knowledge, but insisted on the rationality of faith in The Critique of Practical Reason (1788) by arguing that moral reason demands a summum bonum that is possible only with a Supreme Being. Faith is moral faith, or a recognition of our moral duty as divine command. Kant agreed with deists that theology is essentially morality and moral knowledge is a priori, but disagreed on the capacity of abstract reason to prove God's existence, and suggested that moral knowledge is more certain than scientific knowledge. He rejected deists' optimism about human nature, hinting that divine assistance is necessary to break the power of an innate propensity to evil.

The Legacy of Deism

In the next two centuries after Kant there were few serious attempts to construct a religious system using abstract or empirical reason. Most concluded that the deist portrait of humanity and nature had been shallow and alienating. Humans seemed little more than animated bodies conforming to nature's laws, and the mechanistic universe of deism appeared cold and deterministic. God seemed to have been an absentee landlord, far removed from the quotidian struggles of existence. Terrifying divinity had been transmuted into an enlightened English squire. The depths of experience were flattened and the mysteries of life replaced by a bland and regular simplicity.

Yet deism's influence has been far-reaching nevertheless. The grand Enlightenment project, which has been the intellectual foundation for MODERNITY, largely stems from deist rejection of authority (both political and religious) and its stubborn devotion to the claims of empirical and abstract reason. Politically, deism played a role in the development of religious tolerance, which was expressed institutionally in the First Amendment of the United States Constitution. Theology was never the same after deism. Now it would search for God in human experience rather than the Bible or ecclesiastical institution. In response to Kant's response to deism, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) and his liberal Protestant successors found truth outside the Bible and the church, and then reconstructed God, humanity, and church accordingly. Theology could no longer ignore biblical criticism or the sciences, and in most of the next two centuries the universal was to be preferred to the historically particular. Academic study of the Bible was dominated by historicism, which was inspired by deist challenges to historical narratives in the Bible. The larger cultures of Europe and America came to adopt the deist view that religion's essence and purpose is morality. Protestantism in general has come to be increasingly marked by the deist approach to authority as located in the individual conscience. Conservative Protestants claim the authority of reason to start new churches in the name of differing interpretations of the Bible. Mainline and liberal Protestants reject parts or all of traditional doctrine because of perceived conflicts with reason. Both tendencies pay tribute to the rationalistic legacy of deism.

See also: Ethics

References and Further Reading

- Byrne, Peter. Natural Religion and the Nature of Religion: The Legacy of Deism. London: Routledge, 1989.
- Champion, J.A.I. The Pillars of Priestcraft Shaken: The Church of England and Its Enemies, 1660–1730. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Cragg, Gerald R. Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1964.
- Gay, Peter. Deism: An Anthology. Princeton, NJ: Van Nostrand, 1968.
- Harrison, Peter. Religion and the Religions in the English Enlightenment. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

- Leland, John. A View of the Principal Deistical Writers. Original edition, 1755–1757. New York: Garland Publishing, 1978.
- McDermott, Gerald R. Jonathan Edwards Confronts the Gods: Christian Theology, Enlightenment Religion, and NonChristian Faiths. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Mossner, Ernest Campbell. Bishop Butler and the Age of Reason: A Study in the History of Thought. New York: Macmillan, 1936.
- Stephen, Leslie. English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, vol. I. New York: G.P.Putnam's Sons, 1927.
- Sullivan, Robert E. John Toland and the Deist Controversy. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1982.
- Torrey, Norman L. Voltaire and the English Deists. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1930.
- Walters, Kerry S. The American Deists: Voices of Reason and Dissent in the Early Republic. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1992.
- . Benjamin Franklin and His Gods. Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

GERALD R.MCDERMOTT

DELANY, MARTIN (1812–1885)

American black nationalist and civil rights activist. Born of a free mother and enslaved father in western Virginia, Martin Delany spent most of his early life in Pennsylvania. He worked as a physician's assistant, and even attended a semester at Harvard Medical School before the protests of white students led to his dismissal. In 1848, FREDERICK DOUGLASS hired Delany as a co-editor of the abolitionist newspaper, The North Star. Delany toured the North in an anti-slavery campaign promoting moral suasion—the idea that moral and material improvement of blacks would negate the proslavery presumptions of black inferiority. Despite his membership in the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (AME) church, Delany drew little support from black churches, which rejected the materialist aspects of his message in favor of a more otherworldly focused Christianity.

Delany's mission changed dramatically with the passage of the 1850 Fugitive Slave Law, which he saw as the first step toward nationalization of SLAVERY and continued degradation of free blacks. Although he vigorously opposed the AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY, Delany now believed that the future for blacks lay outside the UNITED STATES. In The Condition, Elevation, Emigration, and Destiny of the Colored People of the United States, Politically Considered (1852), Delany argued that forming a new nation remained the only way that blacks could gain full economic and political freedom. Delany's appeal combined the biblical language of the Exodus with missionary zeal to redeem AFRICA with Christian civilization. Delany secured West African land for a colony, but his plans changed again with the outbreak of the CIVIL WAR. Delany recruited for the Union Army, served as major of a regiment of black troops in the South, and, after the war's close, worked for the Freedmen's Bureau.

See also Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Adeleke, Tunde. "Religion in Martin Delany's Liberation Thought." Religious Humanism 27 (Spring 1993): 80–92.

STEPHEN R. BERRY

DEMOCRACY

At its core, democracy means “rule” (kratein) by the “people” (demos). More fully conceived, democracy is a blend of distinct social, political, and legal ideas and institutions. Democracy embraces the ideals of liberty, equality, and fraternity, pluralism, toleration, and privacy. It insists on a limited government that is accessible and accountable to the people. It typically features a constitution and a charter of civil and political freedoms, a system of popular representation and political checks and balances, a guarantee of procedural rights in civil and criminal cases, and a commitment to majoritarian rule and minority protection, to regular popular political elections, to state-sponsored education and social welfare programs, to protection and promotion of private property and market economies, among others. Democracy, however, has no paradigmatic form. The four dozen national democracies around the world today have cast these basic ideas and institutions into widely variant forms.

Democratic ideas and institutions have an ancient pedigree. Classical Greek and Roman writers, notably Aristotle and Cicero, described democracy, alongside monarchy and aristocracy, and these discussions were echoed and elaborated by dozens of medieval and early modern Catholic writers. Small communities like the Greek polis, the medieval cloister, and the colonial township practiced various forms of direct democracy. Legal documents from the Edict of Milan (313) to the Magna Carta (1215) to the Petition of Right (1628) spoke of liberties, rights, privileges, and religious TOLERATION. Before the seventeenth century, however, these instances of democracy remained incidental and isolated. Monarchical and aristocratic theories and forms of government dominated the Western state and church. Democracy emerged as a formal theory and form of civil government and social organization only in early modern times.

Protestant Support

Protestantism helped to shape the modern rise of democracy. Although none of the leading Protestant reformers of the sixteenth century taught democracy per se, their theology was filled with democratic implications. Following MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN, many early Protestants taught that a person is at once saint and sinner.

On the other hand, each person is created in the image of God and has equal access to God. Each person is called by God to a distinct vocation, which stands equal in dignity to all others. Each is a prophet, priest, and king and responsible to exhort, minister, and rule in the community. Each is thus vested with a natural liberty to live, to believe, and to serve God and neighbor; each is entitled to the vernacular Scripture, to education, to work in a vocation. On the other hand, all persons are inherently sinful. They need the restraint of the moral and civil law to deter them from vice and drive them to virtue. They need the association of others to exhort, minister, and rule them with law and with love. Persons are thus by nature communal creatures and belong to families, churches, schools, and other associations. Such associations, which are ordained by God and instituted by human covenants, are essential for the individual to flourish and for the state to function.

In the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, various Protestant groups in Europe began to derive democratic theory from this early Protestant theology. The Protestant theology of the person was cast into democratic social theory. Because all persons stand equal before God, they must stand equal before God's political agents in the state. Because God has vested all persons with natural liberties of life and belief, the state must assure them of similar civil liberties. Because God has called all persons to be prophets, priests, and kings, the state must protect their freedoms to speak, to worship, and to rule in the community. Because God has created people as social creatures, the state must promote and protect a plurality of social institutions, particularly the church, the school, and the family. The Protestant theology of COVENANTS (see also COVENANT THEOLOGY) was cast into democratic constitutional theory. Societies and states must be created by voluntary written covenants, compacts, or constitutions, to which parties swear their mutual allegiance before God and each other in the form of oaths. These founding documents describe the community's ideals and values, delineate the citizen's rights and responsibilities, and define the officials' powers and prerogatives. The Protestant theology of SIN was cast into democratic political theory. The political office must be protected against the inherent sinfulness of the political official. Power must be distributed among self-checking executive, legislative, and judicial branches. Officials must be elected to limited terms of office. Laws must be clearly codified, and discretion and equity closely guarded. If officials abuse their office, they must be disobeyed; if they persist in their abuse, they must be removed, even if by force of arms.

Democracy and Protestant Movements

These Protestant democratic ideas were among the driving ideological forces of the revolts of the French HUGUENOTS, Dutch pietists (see PIETISM), and Scottish Presbyterians (see PRESBYTERIANISM) against their monarchical oppressors in the later sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. They inspired Anglo-Puritans in the English civil wars of 1640–1688 that truncated royal prerogatives, augmented parliamentary power and popular representation, and ultimately yielded the famous 1689 BILL OF RIGHTS and Toleration Act and their many eighteenth-century constitutional progeny. These ideas remained a perennial source of inspiration and instruction for various neo-

Lutheran and neoCalvinist political movements in Europe in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. They also had a modest place, alongside more dominant Catholic views, in the establishment of the Christian Democracy Party at the end of the nineteenth century.

These Protestant democratic ideas also helped to inspire the creation of several democratic church polities in Europe and America. Anabaptist churches (see ANABAPTISM), notably the AMISH and MENNONITES, separated themselves from secular society into small democratic communities, which featured popular election of church officers, public participation in church governance, and intensely egalitarian organizations and activities. Calvinist churches were often created as democratic polities. Church congregations were formed by ecclesiastical constitutions. Church power was separated among pastors, elders, and deacons, each of whom was elected to a limited term of office and held a measure of authority over the others. CHURCH LAW was codified and administered through a variety of public or representative bodies. Church members convened periodic popular meetings to assess the performance of church officers and to deliberate changes in doctrine, liturgy, or government.

Puritan writers in New England drew ready political lessons from this democratic understanding of the church, and these lessons were reflected in several of the new American state constitutions in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Methodists (see METHODISM), BAPTISTS, and various other smaller religious groups born of the First and Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) in America eventually made democratization a centerpiece of their political theologies and ecclesiologies—a feature that such nineteenth-century European observers as ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE, Lord Acton, and ABRAHAM KUYPER both celebrated and advocated among their coreligionists in Europe.

In eighteenth- and nineteenth-century America, many Anglicans (see ANGLICANISM), Baptists, Congregationalists (see CONGREGATIONALISM), Lutherans, Methodists, and other Protestants joined with Catholics, Jews (see JUDAISM), and ENLIGHTENMENT exponents to establish the core constitutional forms of federalism and separation of powers and to secure the constitutional guarantees of freedom of religion, speech, assembly, and press, due process, and equal protection under the law. Many of these same Protestants later also worked to abolish SLAVERY (see also SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF), to establish public schools, to reform laws of MARRIAGE and FAMILY life, to institute prohibition, TEMPERANCE and other moral reforms, and to broaden the political franchise—although these reform movements permanently splintered Presbyterian, Lutheran, Baptist, and other denominations among more conservative and progressive factions. Some of these Protestant democratic reform efforts found new life in the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement led by WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH and his allies on both sides of the Atlantic in the early twentieth century. Protestant democratic theory found later theological champions in such luminaries as H. RICHARD and REINHOLD NIEBUHR in America and KARL BARTH and DIETRICH BONHOEFFER in Europe, and enjoyed intense rejuvenation and reformation in the immediate aftermaths of both World War I and World War II.

Today, most mainline Protestant churches in Europe have only a negligible effect on mainstream democratic politics, although Lutheran churches continue to have moral influence on public policy in GERMANY and Scandinavia, and several Anglican and Evangelical intellectuals have come to public and political prominence in ENGLAND and SCOTLAND. American Protestant influence on and in democracy is also somewhat diffuse and diluted, although pockets of intense intellectual and institutional strength remain in black churches, in various Reformed and Evangelical academic, human rights, and public policy groups, and in such political movements as the Christian Coalition.

Although the political influence of mainline Protestantism waned in much of North America and Western Europe in the later twentieth century, it waxed in Latin America, AFRICA, and Eastern Europe as well as in SOUTH KOREA, JAPAN, and scattered pockets of the Indian subcontinent. Particularly in Africa, Latin America, and Eastern Europe, Protestant mission churches had for decades served as zones of liberty during the harsh reigns of fascist, socialist, or colonial authorities. These churches were organized democratically like their American and European counterparts. They served as centers of poor relief, education, health care, and social welfare in the community. They catalyzed the formation of voluntary associations, and provided a sanctuary for political dissidents and a sanction for movements of democratic reform and renewal. They also leveled indigenous social hierarchies with their insistence on vernacularizing the BI-BLE, on educating all persons for a vocation, and on relativizing all political authority to the authority of God. Protestant churches thereby provided models of democracy and bulwarks against autocracy in these long-trammeled societies, and have emerged as key leaders of the democratic movements now breaking out in these regions.

See also Church and State, Overview

References and Further Reading

- Dahl, R.A. A Preface to Democratic Theory. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1956.
- Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Huber, Wolfgang, ed. Protestanten in der Demokratie. Munich: Kaiser, 1990.
- Kingdon, Robert M., and Robert D. Linder, eds. Calvin and Calvinism: Sources of Democracy? Lexington, MA: D.C. Heath, 1970.
- Klaassen, Walter. Anabaptism in Outline: Selected Primary Sources. Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 1981.
- Nichols, J.H. Democracy and the Churches. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1951.
- Niebuhr, H. Richard. The Kingdom of God in America. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1959.
- Noll, Mark A. One Nation Under God? Christian Faith and Political Action in America. New York: HarperCollins, 1988.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness: A Vindication of Democracy and a Critique of its Traditional Defense. New York: Scribner's Sons, 1960.
- Schumpeter, Joseph. Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy. 3rd ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1962.
- Walzer, Michael. The Revolution of the Saints: A Study in the Origins of Radical Politics. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1965.

Witte, John, Jr. Christianity and Democmcy in Global Context. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1993.

———. Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment. Boulder/New York/Oxford: Westview Press, 2000.

JOHN WITTE, JR.

DEMOGRAPHY

See Statistics

DENMARK

When discussing Protestantism in Denmark, the history of the Lutheran Church is the most important. Because members of other Protestant religious communities constitute less than half a percent of the population, this article focuses on the history, theology, mission, and ecumenical relations within the Lutheran Church. Other Protestant groups are discussed at the end of the article.

History of the Lutheran Church in Denmark

In the 1520s the Carmelite provincial Poul Helgesen (Paulus Helie) was at the forefront of a humanistic Catholic MODERNISM, which was inspired by Erasmus of Rotterdam. Some of his students converted to the evangelical movement, which grew in all large towns, even though it was illegal (see EVANGELICALISM). After a civil war, King Christian III removed and jailed each and every Catholic bishop, and confiscated the bishop's estate (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY). He started an evangelical REFORMATION (1536–1537) conducted in close cooperation with MARTIN LUTHER and other reformers in Wittenberg. The fundamental law of the church, the Church Ordinance, was created on the basis of JOHANNES BUGENHAGEN'S German organization of the church and with Bugenhagen's help.

The University of Wittenberg became the model for the reestablished University of Copenhagen, and the leaders within the church and within the education system were trained in Wittenberg. The LITURGY was based on Luther's suggestions, and the first Danish translation of the BIBLE (1550) was based on Luther's Bible from 1545. The king became the actual leader of the church. The state continued to control the church following the ORTHODOXY of the seventeenth century, which included forced confessions, unification, control of the CLERGY and the LAITY, as well as persecution of reformed Christians and other non-Lutheran Protestants. During the royal absolute rule, emphasis was placed on ties to the early Christian church as well as to the Lutheran Reformation from Wittenberg. As the basis for CONFESSION, the connection was emphasized (1683) by using the Bible, the Apostle's Creed, the Nicaean and the Athanasian confession of faith, Luther's shorter CATECHISM, and the unchanged

AUGSBURG CONFESSION of 1530. Jews and reformed Protestants were given a certain amount of freedom of religion because of dynastic and trade politics.

A movement of PIETISM from GERMANY that was critical of the church gained ground in Copenhagen at the beginning of the eighteenth century, but both orthodox theologians and the government fought against it. Using legal means, the government forced on the public a Pietism that belonged to the established Church. A mission in the Danish colony of Trankebar in INDIA was established, and during this process there was close contact with the theologians from HALLE. It was the first mission in the Lutheran world and was followed by another mission in Greenland. Confirmation was also established, and compulsory mass was conducted for Jews in Copenhagen. A Royal Ordinance (1741) was characteristically put in place to promote private spiritual development, but at the same time the priests oversaw these meetings. During the Age of ENLIGHTENMENT (c. 1760–1800), a number of reforms were put in place within social and educational spheres, as well as within the church. The Moravians were allowed to establish a colony in the south of Denmark, which had religious and financial freedom. Once censorship was removed, a group of men gave voice to their opinions. They were strongly influenced by foreign philosophers critical of the church. They fiercely criticized the Protestant form of Christianity, and called instead for a “religion of reason,” inspired by the ideas of the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Some theologians, who were also influenced by the ideas of the Enlightenment, did try to produce a defense against the criticism, and the government once again limited freedom of the press.

Several popular religious revival movements came about at the beginning of the nineteenth century. They were inspired by German Pietism, the MORAVIAN CHURCH, and changes within the society. These revival movements branched out into different ecclesiastical factions. In general terms one can say that the LAITY came of age, became independent, and that the people insisted on self-determination in religious and political matters. The revival movements grew out of societal changes to a certain extent, but the movements themselves also contributed to these changes. During this period, both N.F.S.GRUNDTVIG (1783–1872) and SØREN KIERKEGAARD (1813–1855) had a great influence on Protestantism both within Denmark’s borders and abroad. At first the authorities tried to limit the laity’s insistence on evaluating the priests’ preaching, their illegal private gatherings, and their rejection of textbooks, which were produced during the Enlightenment. With the creation of the modern Danish Constitution (Grundloven) in 1849, many issues were resolved.

The Danish Constitution of 1849 (and slightly revised in 1953) maintains that the Lutheran Church is The Danish People’s Church (Folkekirke). The basis for CONFESSION is the same as during the absolute monarchy. Because freedom of religion had been established, people from other religious communities were free to practice the Protestant faith, although that did not mean that equality of religion was established. Church and state were separated, but not completely. The ruling king or queen is obligated to belong to the Lutheran Church, and it was decided that The Danish People’s Church would be the only church in Denmark to be supported by the state. The state underwrites two theological faculties, graduates from which are employed as priests in The Danish People’s Church. It also collects a church tax, and maintains a curriculum in religion in the schools, which is based on Lutheran THEOLOGY. Weddings and christenings belong to the realm of civil law. The state also gives the church a direct annual financial contribution. A common department has never controlled the internal conduct of the church within a SYNOD or a bishop's department because a planned synod constitution has never been realized. Every bishop is the leader of the church in his diocese, but there is no legal bishop's department with the AUTHORITY to speak of the behalf of the entire church.

The state's Ministry of Ecclesiastical Affairs administers The Danish People's Church, and all church-related laws are passed in the Danish parliament (Folketinget), which is religiously neutral. The church minister is politically announced and does not have to be a member of The Danish People's Church. Of a population of 5.2 million, 86 percent are members of The Danish People's Church, and around 84 percent have their children baptized within the church. Both percentages have been declining in the past few years. The yearly budget of The Danish People's Church is around five billion Danish crowns, 80 percent of which comes from church taxes paid by its members. The direct financial contribution from the state is around 11 percent.

Debates about the privileges of The Danish People's Church in relation to other Protestant religious communities and confessions have taken place in recent years within both church and political spheres. Other topics that have been discussed are the lack of common religious administration, the relationship between CHURCH AND STATE, and the finances of the church.

Theology and Church Life

The government, which introduced the Protestant Reformation in 1536–1537, decided that the theological basis for Danish Protestantism was to be a combination of the theology of Luther and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON. A few theologians held opinions about religious education that were close to those of CALVINISM, whereas other Protestant opinions were prohibited. The government came down firmly, also dismissing the traditional Lutheran Formula of Concord (Konkordieformel) of 1574 because it feared internal religious upheaval and worried about foreign policy issues. During the orthodoxy of the seventeenth century a penitential movement spread, and a CHURCH DISCIPLINE inspired by Calvinism was introduced.

Jesper Brochmand presented the theological basis for this movement in his dogmatic handbook Systema Universe Theologicæ (1633), which was partly the Lutheran theology based on the aforementioned confession writings and partly a ferocious attack on all other Protestant beliefs as well as on Catholicism. Johann Gerhard was a particularly great influence when the book was written, and English devotional writings were also translated into Danish at that time. A huge number of hymns written by Thomas Kingo reflected Lutheran orthodoxy, and these hymns are still frequently sung (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). Conditions in Germany and the pietistic movement influenced Danish theological development. Bishop H.A. Brorson wrote poetic hymns, which people still sing and appreciate, concerning the need for repentance, CONVERSION, and becoming a believer. The theologians of the Enlightenment, such as N.E.Balle and Fr.

Münter, who were both bishops, were also very influenced by the German spiritual movements of the time.

A major turning point came at the beginning of the nineteenth century, with the first popular revival movements based on both the Lutheran doctrine and Pietism from HALLE. The Ecclesiastical Association of the Home Mission in Denmark (Kirkelig Forening for den Indre Mission i Danmark) pursued this, becoming a tightly knit organization, which ran a number of schools and social institutions and whose members gathered in hundreds of mission houses. Emphasis was placed on personal conversion and a pious life, where one distanced oneself from worldly pleasures and emphasized the gap between believer and disbeliever. A number of priests joined this movement, and so it became ecclesiastical and sacramental. The organization is still very active. The influence of the American and English revival and conversion movements around the end of the nineteenth century also led to a significant religious activism, especially among the laity.

The theologian Nicolaj Frederick Grundtvig inspired the other large religious movement (Grundtvigianismen) in Denmark. Grundtvig had moved from rationalism to biblical Christianity, which again was replaced by a critical stand toward the Bible and the conviction that one found the true core of Christianity through the profession of faith and by BAPTISM. This “Living Word” existed before the Bible and was orally handed down in the congregations up until the present. Grundtvig also added a new dimension to Protestantism in Denmark when it came to the relationship between church and state. He was of the opinion that all points of view should be represented within the framework of the official church, that priests should be able to preach freely and freely conduct their rituals, and that the laity should freely be able to choose the priest they preferred. The last point of view was the only one that was realized and remains in effect. Furthermore, it was important to sharply distinguish between Christian belief and social upbringing, which was the domain of the school. Grundtvig became one of the founding fathers of hundreds of folk high schools that were established, some of which still exist. As a composer of hymns, Grundtvig was unsurpassed. His hymns make up about one third of the current Danish book of hymns. Grundtvig’s movement, which is still very active, is much more open toward contemporary art, literary CULTURE, and politics than the Home Mission (Indre Mission).

Søren Kierkegaard was the other great philosopher and theologian who in the nineteenth century added a new dimension to Protestantism in Denmark and elsewhere. In his early writing he described how humans were presented with possibilities in life. He dissociated himself from philosophers such as GEORG W.F. HEGEL from Germany and H.L.Martensen from Denmark, who thought that the truth of Christianity could be proved objectively. For Kierkegaard, Christianity existed once the individual passionately embraced the “paradox” of faith. God was not a feeling within a human being, but came from the outside through Jesus, who encouraged either faith or indignation. Kierkegaard challenged people to follow Christ’s imitation in suffering. Using very acerbic language he fought the official church during the last months of his life because he believed that it had abandoned the ideal of the New Testament. Few listened to him, and except for a few pious and anticlerical groups, nobody paid much attention to him at the time, although he became one of the founding philosophical fathers of existentialism and was behind the renewal of Protestant theology in the twentieth century.

H.L.Martensen (1808–1854), a professor who later became bishop, was very influential at the end of the nineteenth century. He in turn was influenced by Hegel's holistic view of the world, and Martensen was a great inspiration for what became the third influential ecclesiastical faction, Kirkeligt Centrum, which still exists. This ecclesiastical faction fell between the Indre Mission and Grundtvig's movement. It has a certain shared spiritual community with Indre Mission, and yet by being critically open to art and culture, it also resembles the school of thought that Grundtvig established.

Protestantism was in a deep crisis at the end of the nineteenth century. Philosophers launched heavy attacks on Martensen's harmonious way of thinking. At the same time the followers of Grundtvig launched serious accusations against the theological faculty because it did not hire their people. The fundamentalist members of Indre Mission rejected the criticism of the Bible, which the faculty taught. Georg Brandes, a man of letters, and other atheists and free thinkers mercilessly rejected the entire Christian faith and notion of culture. They demanded that the country be purged of all religion, which would be replaced by secular humanism. A few theologians from the university did try to defend Christianity by using a theology based on experience, which came from Germany. Another form of Protestant activism unfolded within the realm of a Christian-social movement, which was based on English CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. That, however, was dissolved again in 1948.

At the beginning of the twentieth century a liberal theology became popular, which was also influenced by the situation in Germany. Liberal theologians respected Bible criticism but were of the opinion that the Christian faith should be a personal experience. Jesus was to serve as the model for imitation and as a Christian, one should live morally and without straying. The American and English youth organizations were a great influence, and extensive work was initiated among Christian young people, which generated a great following. In the 1930s another movement, the Oxford Group Movement, also became popular among the previously mentioned groups. However, a group of theologians who were connected to the magazine Tidehverv launched fierce and personal attacks on so-called religious idealism. Using Luther, Kierkegaard, KARL BARTH, and RUDOLF BULTMANN as their basis, they emphasized the great distance between God and human, who in himself/herself has nothing on which to base his/her life. Humans are solely subject to the mercy of God. Any Christian morality and all forms of Christian activism were rejected. The movement, which is modest in size, has recently attacked the view of human nature, which it feels is the basis for the welfare state and it has emphasized a close connection between the national sentiment and the Christian sentiment.

K.E.Løgstrup (1905–1981) has had a tremendous influence through his writing, which is focused on philosophy and cultural criticism. However, one cannot point out any common denominators in his work and the current Protestant theology. One can be of the opinion that a form of Barthianism takes a leading place, apart from the fact that the research of Søren Kierkegaard is also very significant.

Mission and Ecumenism

The Danish People's Church cannot operate foreign MISSIONS because of a special clause in the guidelines of the church. However, a large number of private corporations, which are financed solely by private fund-raisers, help run the foreign mission. The largest is Danmission, which recently has absorbed several smaller corporations. During the past several years, the mission's purpose and goals have been discussed and work within Denmark's borders has been conducted.

Until recently The Danish People's Church was not able to participate officially in ecumenical work, but after a trial period, a board was established, Det mellemkirkelige Råd, in 1994. The minister of ecclesiastical affairs and the dioceses choose its members. This board initiates contact with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION, and the Conference of European Churches. The board also reaches out to other Danish Protestant organizations and to the Catholic Church in Denmark.

When the bishops of The Danish People's Church refused to join a formalized agreement with the Anglican Church and with Protestant churches in SWEDEN, NORWAY, and the Baltics (the so-called Porvoo Declaration [1995]), it was a source of tension between these churches. Denmark also refused to sign The Joint Declaration of Justification, which states that Catholics and Lutherans have a shared theological position on that topic. The theological reason for the refusals came after an agitated discussion among the clergy and the laity.

Other Protestant Religious Communities

In 1667 King Christian V married Charlotte Amalie from the principality Hessen-Kassel in Germany. She was a Calvinist, and as queen she was allowed to keep her faith. A few years later, the HUGUENOTS, Calvinist refugees from FRANCE, were allowed a certain degree of freedom of religion. Today Copenhagen has German, French, and Korean Reformed congregations, and in Frederica in Jutland there is a Danish congregation. The church has about 750 members.

In 1839 Julius Købner (1806–1884) founded a Baptist congregation in Copenhagen. He had become a Baptist while in Hamburg, Germany. The revival movements strongly emphasized personal conversion to religion, and a number of people went a step further and became BAPTISTS. However, they were persecuted by the government, which among other things forced them to baptize their infants. After freedom of religion had been introduced in 1849, a Danish-German Baptist congregation was organized, but from 1888 the members attached themselves to the congregation in the UNITED STATES, where a number of Danish emigrants had become Baptists. The church has operated a theological seminary since 1918. The Baptist community is internationally linked to the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE. Currently it has 5,800 members, fortyseven congregations, and fifty-five pastors.

The Pentecostal movement, Pinsevaekkelsen, gained ground after a number of meetings conducted in 1907 by the Norwegian Methodist T.B.Barratts. Today it has about 5,000 members, forty-six congregations, and forty ministers, and the movement is represented in most of the joint institutions of the church. One part branched out and created the Church of the Apostles (Den apostolske kirke), which was influenced by Evan Roberts's awakening in WALES. It counts about 2,300 baptized members, forty-one congregations, and forty-four pastors. Christian Willerup, educated and ordained in the United States, founded the Methodist Church (Metodistkirken) in Denmark in 1859. It is part of the United Methodist Church, and its ministers are educated at the church's Nordic Theological Seminary (Nordiske Teologiske Seminarium) in Sweden. It has twenty-one local churches, twenty ordained clergy, and forty lay preachers. Also to be mentioned are the Moravians, the SALVATION ARMY, and the Danish Society for Mission, part of the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches, all of which are smaller Protestant church congregations with fewer than 2,000 members.

References and Further Reading

- Allchin, Arthur Macdonald. N.F.S.Gruntvig: An Introduction to his Life and Work with an Afterword by Nicholas Lossky. Århus, Denmark: Aarhus University Press, 1997.
- Brohed, Ingmar, ed. "Church and People in Britain and Scandinavia." In Bibliotheca Historico-Ecclesiastica Lundensis. Vol. 36. Lund, Sweden: University Press, 1996.
- Grell, Ole Peter, ed. The Scandinavian Reformation. From Evangelical Movement to Institutionalisation of Reform. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995.
- Hope, Nicolas. "German and Scandinavian Protestantism 1700–1918." In Oxford History of the Christian Church, edited by Henry and Owen Chadwick. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1995.
- Lausten, Martin Schwarz. A Church History of Denmark. Translated by Frederick Cryer. Aldershot, UK: Ashgate, 2002.
- Malantschuk, Gregor. Kierkegaard's Thought. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1971.

MARTIN SCHWARZ LAUSTEN

DENOMINATION

A denomination is a religious organization (historically Protestant) that emphasizes the voluntaristic and inclusive nature of ecclesial bodies. Emerging in Europe and North America during the early modern era, the denomination has been historically the preeminent ecclesial understanding of religious bodies in the UNITED STATES. Scholars disagree as to the usefulness of the term outside of the specific American context. Students of American religion see denominationalism as largely peculiar to the religious world of the United States (although they accept its use in other cases where both ecclesiastical bodies and the larger society bear parallels with the American experience). Sociologists have been on the whole more willing to use the term in a less specific usage.

All agree that denominations stand over against the historic categories of church and sect. In the typology established by MAX WEBER and ERNST TROELTSCH, a CHURCH was understood as being coterminous with its society and inclusive in membership. A sect, in turn, was seen as a voluntary religious community at odds with the larger society and imposing strict requirements on its followers. In contrast to both, a denomination is a voluntary community, formally separate from the state, but more inclusive in its membership requirements than a sect and less antagonistic to its host society. Likewise, denominationalism presupposes a certain social parity or equality among religious communities vis-à-vis the larger society. Whereas the church/sect division historically emerged out of a milieu of established state religion, in which churches were part of the established order and sects were outsiders, denominationalism has flourished best in the absence of a state church. Finally, in contrast with both churches and sects, a denomination does not normally posit an absolute or exclusive claim to truth. A distinctive mark of denominations is that although they are competitive with each other vis-à-vis membership, they nonetheless can cooperate with one another for broader purposes. Indeed, some have argued that the very term “denomination” suggested the implicit recognition that particular religious communities are in some senses but members of a larger group “denominated” by a particular name.

Historical Origins

The idea of the religious denomination has its roots not in America but in the Puritan phase of the REFORMATION in ENGLAND, particularly during the period of the Puritan Commonwealth (1649–1660). As divisions emerged within the Puritan party over ecclesiastical polity—particularly between Presbyterians and Independents (i.e., Congregationalists)—some Independents, reacting to claims of Presbyterian exclusivism, began to suggest that divisions over POLITY were not actually schismatic divisions within the church. Communities who agreed on the fundamental doctrines of the Christian message could still see themselves as being united even though they differed concerning church order. The belief that ecclesial differences did not necessarily lead to sectarian conflict but could allow for cooperation can be seen as the beginning of the denominational principle.

The Commonwealth period ended with the reestablishment of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and with the reassertion of an established church, discussion of denominationalism largely faded away. But in the Toleration Act of 1689, which granted legal status to most non-Anglican Protestants, some elements of denominationalism reemerged (although many political proscriptions continued to be enforced on Nonconformists). The concept of denomination became important in the late seventeenth- and eighteenth-century movements of PIETISM and EVANGELICALISM. The emphasis on subjective religious experience and practical Christian living allowed Pietists to de-emphasize many traditional Christian divisions. Religious experience and practical morality marked the true Christian, and accordingly true Christianity could be found in religious communities with differing understandings of polity and particular theological formulas. The same attitude was reflected by JOHN WESLEY, who claimed that he refused to distinguish between professing believers by any category except the common principles of Christianity.

It was in eighteenth-century America that the denominational understanding began to firmly take root. The openness of the American colonial environment to differing religious communities, and the absence of any established church in many of the colonies (and the weak establishments in colonies outside of New England), set American church life in a voluntary direction and led to a spirit of comparative tolerance (see TOLERATION). Scholars have argued that denominationalism emerged out of this milieu as a fact in American life before it was worked out as a theory. The denominational impulse was particularly strong in the middle colonies (New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware). Church life developed here along the pattern of voluntary, independent communities supported by committed individuals. The free environment of these colonies proved conducive to groups like the BAPTISTS (who were ideologically committed to voluntarism), as well as to those, such as Presbyterians and Anglicans, who in Europe were established churches but in America relied on voluntary support.

In the development of the American denominational pattern, the middle years of the eighteenth century proved crucial. The great religious excitement of the mid-century (usually referred to as the Great Awakening) severely undermined the Anglican religious establishment in the southern colonies (Virginia, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia) and also weakened the established churches of New England (see AWAKENINGS). The new emphasis on an active, conversion-centered piety made many individuals both impatient with established churches and interested in a new vision of Christian unity. The American Revolution also contributed to the triumph of denominationalism. British policy between 1763 and 1776 had been to bring the colonial practices more completely into line with British models. Historians have referred to this as a policy of “anglicization.” Because of the link between the crown and the established church and the importance of the church in contemporary English legal theory, this policy of anglicization had religious as well as political implications. The campaign to establish an American Anglican episcopate during these years can be seen as an attempt to extend a more formal recognition of the place of the Church of England in the colonies. The triumph of the revolutionary forces in the Revolution of 1776 not only stymied this plan politically, but also allowed for the triumph of denominationalism. The Virginia Act for Establishing Religious Freedom (1785), which firmly rejected the idea of any religious establishment, became the model for the First Amendment to the United States Constitution and its vision of the separation of CHURCH AND STATE. By law, churches became understood as voluntary associations.

Denominationalism and the Early American Republic

During the years immediately following 1783, as the new American nation began to address the question of political organization, the colonial denominations likewise began to take on formal structure. Episcopalians (i.e., Anglicans) organized themselves nationally between 1785 and 1789. Methodists established a national organization in 1784. Presbyterians did the same in 1788, and the (historically Dutch) Reformed Church organized itself in 1792.

The situation in America during the early national period gave still a further set of characteristics to denominationalism. As organizations, these denominational bodies emphasized purposefulness, instrumentality, and nationality—all of which were key elements for survival during this period. In contrast with many forms of sectarianism that taught that the proper religious response to the social order was withdrawal, denominations were socially active in orientation and involved in their cultures. Indeed, denominational organization was often for the purpose of action. Typically it was because of the need to become involved in such tasks as home MISSIONS that denominational organization emerged. The emphasis on purposefulness also gave to denominations a self-perception of instrumentality. Church structures were tools or instruments for a higher good and not ends in themselves. Finally, no higher good was more pressing than the extension of Christian organization and influence across the new nation. As the nation poured out into the trans-Appalachian west, the churches, it was argued, needed to follow. Only through organization and cooperation could this great national need be met.

The emphasis on denominations as instruments for a purpose greater than themselves can perhaps best be seen in the celebrated Plan of Union of 1801 that united Presbyterians and Congregationalists. Both of these bodies had emerged out of the Puritan protest of the Elizabethan settlement. They differed, however, concerning the basis of church order. Congregationalists believed that the fundamental Christian unity was the individual congregation and were wary of overarching ecclesial structures. Presbyterians believed that ordained ministers and lay elders should be associated in session meetings above the congregational level and be involved with oversight. This issue of polity had divided Presbyterians and Congregationalists (see PRESBYTERIANISM AND CONGREGATIONALISM) since the middle of the seventeenth century. But the combination of a perceived need for mission, coupled with a sense of evangelical camaraderie flowing from the Great Awakening, convinced both bodies that cooperation was possible. Hence the Plan of Union, while recognizing ecclesial diversity, set forth a plan of cooperation between the two bodies for missionizing the west.

With the collapse of the Standing Order of Connecticut (which had established the Congregational church in that state) in 1818, the last major colonial religious establishment came to an end, and denominationalism became the dominant motif in American Protestantism. Denominational Protestantism was marked during these years by two attributes, both tied to the dynamics of denominationalism. The first of these was a vigorous emphasis on institution-building that included evangelization, church planting, largescale PUBLISHING, and the creation of institutions of learning. In the religious marketplace of antebellum America, denominations competed for persons and resources. The vigor and activity of this competition, and its effect on the larger society, impressed foreign observers. The German church historian PHILIP SCHAFF, in his work America (1854), famously contrasted the number, size, and strength of the independent churches of the city of New York with that of his native Berlin, where church and state were still united. A second characteristic was that, despite the competition, there was a degree of cooperation between the religious communities. In one of the earliest accounts of the state of American Protestantism, Robert Baird, in Religion in America (1843), argued that this cooperation stemmed from the fact that all of the “evangelical denominations” (by which he excluded Roman Catholics, Unitarians, Jews, Mormons, and others) were on the same social footing and were united in maintaining the religious health of the nation. This common task engendered a spirit of unity. The unwritten compact of cooperation by Protestant denominations to strengthen the role of religion in the society, joined with full sympathy for the separation between the state and any individual religious community, has sometimes been called the “voluntary establishment.”

During the nineteenth century, the denominational idea of ecclesial differences, coupled with cooperation, found an international voice in the Evangelical Alliance, an association of European and American Protestant churches. Founded in 1845, the Evangelical Alliance was the first pan-Protestant cooperative organization. As early as 1867, it sponsored prayer for Christian unity. The Evangelical Alliance was concerned primarily with cooperation. As one spokesperson at an early meeting explained, “Alliance is a well-chosen term. It solves the question immediately by force of definition. It expresses all union expedient or possible among Christians who conscientiously differ in forms of administration; while it admits full liberty of individual opinions, within a range agreed upon” (Bedell 1874:151).

The Second Denominational Arrangement

The paradox of the antebellum denominational model—vigorous activity by individual religious communities (often in direct competition with other groups) and at the same time a sense of shared cooperation in the larger task of maintaining the religious and moral health of the nation—flowed from the very idea of denomination. Denominational organizations, although independent, nonetheless shared some “common denominator” with other religious groups that allowed for compromise. In the antebellum period, this common denominator was evangelical (Protestant) Christianity. By the end of the nineteenth century, the denominational spirit, while alive and well, was transformed by the growing complexity of American society. The large-scale growth of Roman Catholics, Jews, and other religious bodies, who Robert Baird had earlier dismissed as being simply “non-evangelical” bodies, undermined the unifying principle of evangelical Christianity. By the early twentieth century, the category of denomination became refitted with a far broader unifying principle. Denominations (now including Catholics and Jews) were seen as being committed to defending certain general religious and moral values—a “Judeo-Christian ethic”—or the values of Western culture. This trend was captured by the sociologist Will Herberg in Protestant, Catholic, Jew (1955), which depicted each of these historic religious faiths as functioning in a quasidenominational fellowship, united in maintaining the “American way of life.” Some historians have referred to this reconfiguration of denominationalism as the second denominational arrangement.

The victory of denominationalism was not total, however. The period of the second denominational arrangement also saw a growing theological critique of the idea of denominationalism among Protestants themselves. H. RICHARD NIEBUHR in The Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929), condemned existing denominational divisions as reflective of the “moral failure” of the church. For Niebuhr, the panoply of denominations reflected social, racial, ethnic, and economic distinctions rather than any meaningful theological issues. Hence the source of denominationalism was social and not theological. Likewise, the emergence of an ecumenical spirit within Protestantism (usually dated from the international WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE OF EDINBURGH of 1910) began to challenge the principle of denominationalism. The twentieth-century ecumenical movement rejected the alliance model of church cooperation favored in the nineteenth century (which assumed the perpetuity of denominational existence and called simply for cooperation between denominations), and lifted up a vision of a church united in faith and order as well as life and work (see ECUMENISM). A true and visible church unity was the goal now, not simply interdenominational cooperation. From this perspective, continuing denominational divisions were seen as a scandal in the Christian life.

Recent Developments

The great social, religious, and cultural revolutions of the 1960s may be seen as largely disrupting the second denominational arrangement. Much of this affected denominationalism on the social level. During the 1960s, the unifying social appeal of a “Judeo-Christian ethic” began to receive criticism by advocates of secularist understanding of the separation of church and state, who believed that the government should be far more neutral concerning religious values than it had been in earlier eras. Another set of criticisms came from multiculturalists, who felt that the waves of new immigration from AFRICA and Asia (flowing as a result of changes in immigration law in the mid-1960s), made the old denominational compromise of “Protestant, Catholic, Jew” far too constraining. The presence of Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus, and others called for a new understanding of the place of religion in American life. The complex new religious make-up of the nation challenged all of the earlier models of denominationalism and raised anew the question of what was to be the nature of the common denominator.

If the social basis of denominationalism was being questioned, so too was the category’s continuing religious usefulness. Particularly because of the crisis in membership and identity among the older “main line” or “old line” denominations beginning in the late 1960s, critics began to claim that denominational identity was both too “high” and too “low” to describe usefully the state of American religious (and particularly Protestant) identity. Loyalty and identity, it was argued, were now more firmly entrenched in both the local community or congregation (in contrast to the large national denomination), and at the same time in broad transdenominational categories of identification. As the importance of personal identity through race, GENDER, sexual orientation, ideology, and so forth grew, denominational identification waned. A conservative evangelical Presbyterian (to use one example) displayed more loyalty to conservative and evangelical principles than to Presbyterian ones. To some, denominations are a relic of the past. The future of the idea of the denomination as it emerged in eighteenth-century America, and as it flourished for well over a century, remains unclear.

Denominations sociologically conceived as voluntary inclusive religious communities are also be found in other societies where there is no established church and freedom of religion is practiced. The degree to which these communities fit the American denominational system in all its permutations is still a matter of debate.

References and Further Reading

- Bedell, George T. “Spiritual Unity Not Organic Unity,” in The History of the Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance...., ed. by Philip Schaff and S.Irenaeus Prime. New York, 1874.
- Butler, Jon. Power, Authority, and the Origins of American Denominational Order: The English Churches in the Delaware Valley, 1580–1730. Philadelphia, PA: The American Philosophical Society, 1978.

- Greeley, Andrew. The Denominational Society: A Sociological Approach to Religious America. Glenview, IL: Scot, Forseman, 1972.
- Martin, David A. "The Denomination." The British Journal of Sociology 13 no. 1 (1962):1-14.
- Moberg, David O. The Church as a Social Institution: The Sociology of American Religion. 2nd ed. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1984.
- Mullin, Robert Bruce, and Russell E. Richey, eds. Reimagining Denominationalism: Interpretive Essays. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Newman, William M., and Peter L. Halvorson. Atlas of American Religion: The Denominational Era, 1776-1990. Walnut Creek, CA: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.
- Niebuhr, H. Richard. The Social Sources of Denominationalism. New York: Henry Holt, 1929.
- Richey, Russell E., ed. Denominationalism. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1977.
- Scherer, Ross, P. American Denominational Organization: A Sociological View. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 1980.
- Swatos, William H., Jr. Into Denominationalism: The Anglican Metamorphosis. Storrs, CT: Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, 1979.
- Wuthnow, Robert. The Restructuring of American Religion: Society and Faith Since World War II. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

ROBERT BRUCE MULLIN

THE DEVIL

The leaders of the sixteenth-century Protestant REFORMATION derived their concept of the Devil from the BIBLE and from early Christian writers, especially Augustine of Hippo (354–420), but current Protestant concepts range from the view that the Devil does not exist at all through the view that he exists as a metaphor of human evil to the view that he is a real being with enormous powers to tempt and disrupt humans, nations, and the whole earth. Traditional Protestant concepts of the Devil also borrowed from, and added to, concepts of evil in AFRICA, Asia, and elsewhere.

Origins

The word “Devil” derives from Greek diabolos (adversary or slanderer) and the Greek translation of Old Testament (OT) Hebrew satan (obstructor). In the OT, the word “satan” is either a common or a proper noun meaning different things in different contexts—sometimes a great angel as in the Book of Job, sometimes simply as “something in the way.” Two key passages often cited by Christians as references to the Devil—Genesis 3 and Isaiah 14—do not mention Satan at all, though many if not most commentators have taken “the serpent” in the first and “the bright morning star” in the second to refer to him. The first clear appearance of the Devil as the powerful leader of all the forces of evil is in the intertestamental (pseudepigraphical) literature of the second century B.C. to the first century A.D.

In the New Testament (NT), the Devil and the spiritual powers of darkness at his command are at constant war against God and the good, and the victory of Christ over evil is perhaps the main theme of the whole NT. In the Gospels, Christ frequently encounters and defeats Satan and his demons. In the Epistles, Paul warns against the Devil and other spiritual powers of darkness. A variety of names exist for the Devil in biblical literature; Satan is only the most common. The NT presents the Devil as an angel created by God who falls by rebelling against the divine will. His purpose and that of his followers—angelic and human—is to obstruct the coming of the Kingdom of God. God grants the Devil power for a time over “this world,” a common theme in John and Paul, but God never eases his control over him, so that although Satan roams the world seeking the ruin of souls, Christ's Passion and Resurrection have shaken his power. Toward the end of time, a human ruler, the Antichrist, will rise up under Satan's command and make one last effort to block the kingdom, but Christ will be victorious and will destroy Satan and his Antichrist forever.

Fifteenth through Seventeenth Centuries

Conservative Protestant Reformers such as MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) and JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) drew deeply from Augustine as well as the Bible, adopting his view that God creates the world, including angels and humans, for the purpose of extending his goodness. But if God forced his creatures to be good, they would be only puppets lacking moral choice and, therefore, goodness. So God creates angels and humans with free will, knowing in all eternity that some will choose good and others evil. The great choice between good and evil was first offered to the angels: some chose eternally to love and serve their maker; others, through pride, eternally chose to deny his will. The angels who fell, led by Satan, were cast out of HEAVEN into hell. God allows them to roam on earth and tempt humans. God created human beings in the image of Adam and Eve, completely good yet also completely free to make their own choice to love God or to prefer their own will instead. Satan could not force them, but he was permitted to tempt them, and they yielded, falling into sin through free choice. Because all humanity is present in Adam and Eve, all humanity fell with their original sin. Original sin bent humans so much that their inclination is to evil, and no human has enough power to break that inclination by himself or herself. After original sin, humanity was under Satan's power. In strict justice, God could have left humanity in this wretched state forever, but in God's mercy and love God comes to us as Christ. Christ, being completely God himself, has the strength to break Satan's power, and, being completely human, Christ can represent humanity in atonement with God.

The Reformers readily accepted these ideas because they, like other Christians, needed the Devil as a partial answer to the classical problem of evil: God is all-powerful and all-good; how, then, can there be evil in the world that he creates and maintains? One of the many strategies designed to cope with this problem involves the Devil as a powerful principle of evil in stark and powerful (though ultimately vain) opposition to God's will. Luther's and Calvin's strong belief in predestination shaped their view of the Devil. Luther argued that a corollary of the absolute omnipotence of God was God's predestination of humans to either heaven or hell: predestination could not be denied without blasphemously limiting God's sovereignty over all times and all places, and God chooses those whom he saves and those he does not. Thus free will is an illusion, and every man and woman is either under God's complete power and protection, or under Satan's.

God has direct, immediate control over every creature, including humans, angels, and the Devil, and Luther unflinchingly accepted the corollary that God causes the Devil's activity. God wills evil but uses it for the good; on another level God both wills evil and wills us to resist and oppose it. Luther's emphasis on the Devil's power derived from this idea of God's twofold will. God does not do evil himself but uses the Devil to do evil. The Devil is God's tool, like a hoe that he uses to cultivate his garden. The hoe takes its own pleasure in destroying the weeds, but it can never move out of God's hands, never weed where God does not wish, never thwart his purpose of making a beautiful garden. Christ's Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection have broken Satan's power.

Calvin expressed similar views with his own characteristic logical precision, which led him to teach double predestination. God predestines some to be saved and others to be damned, and he does so not only because he knows that they are damned but also because he wills them to be damned. As a result of original sin, human nature is completely deformed as to both reason and will, incapable of finding truth without faith and the illumination of the Bible. The Bible declares the Devil's existence, but Calvin grasped that it has little to say about it, so he focused on the central concept of the Devil: evil. Like Luther, Calvin believed that no creature, even a great angel, can act against God's will. God carries out his justice through Satan. Such beliefs had destructive consequences, especially in the religious wars and the trials for witchcraft, where all sides in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries viewed their opponents as tools of Satan.

The radical Reformers of the sixteenth-century Reformation, in their efforts to return to Biblical Christianity, tended to pay less theological attention to the Devil than the conservative Reformers. They were less interested in theory than in practice, concentrating more on reforming themselves and their own communities than on spreading their own doctrines. Such radicals as the Anabaptists, the Unitarians, and the followers of THOMAS MÜNTZER (1489–1525), JAKOB HUTTER (d. 1536), MENNO SIMONS (1496–1561), and, later, GEORGE Fox (1624–1691) lacked the power, and usually the will, to repress their opponents. They believed that the world was under the power of the Devil and that Christians had no business with worldly affairs. Muntzer viewed Christ as a moral model rather than as Redeemer, thus removing the cosmic struggle of Christ against Satan from center stage, where the conservatives had kept it. Some radicals believed in universalism: the view that every creature—even Satan—would eventually return to the Kingdom of Heaven; a few Anabaptists even denied the existence of the Devil altogether. After reaching its peak in the early seventeenth century, Protestant belief in the Devil declined toward the end of the century at the same time that prosecutions for witchcraft were declining. Protestant scholars finally discovered that there was no biblical basis for belief in diabolical witchcraft. Still, few of the seventeenth-century skeptics who denied that Satan worked through witches expressed doubt as to his existence.

Eighteenth Century and Beyond

That changed in the eighteenth century as part of a broader cultural movement characterized by the ENLIGHTENMENT. The old theological worldview shared by all Christians was challenged by the rise of natural science. Causation seemed to be mechanical, leaving no place for divine intervention or human free will, let alone the Devil. Even though logically such a view disallowed human freedom, liberal Christians and secularists increasingly insisted on human effort as opposed to divine decree, and predestinarian views, along with belief in original sin, slowly withered. Gradual moral progressivism slowly took the place of stark moral choice, and the dichotomy between good and evil—God and the Devil—closed. Deists, while denying original sin, still took the human propensity to evil seriously.

Material progressivism, which increasingly dominated thought in the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries, treated the past, and therefore both tradition and the Bible, as a positive evil to be cast off in order to establish a new order of the ages. Not only the Devil but also God became symbols of ancient repression and despotic kingship. The profoundly influential arguments of the Scottish philosopher DAVID HUME (1711–1776) against Christianity undermined its theological foundations; the rise of democracy undermined ideas of hierarchy, even those of heaven and hell. Popular revolutionary and antireligious writers such as Thomas Paine (1737–1809) derided Christian beliefs and scorned the idea of Satan as absurd. On the other hand, the Marquis de Sade (1740–1814) proved both in his writings and in his life that if there is no objective standard for evil, then there is no way of judging torturing children as worse than eating peach pie. Without a foundation for belief in good and evil, Sade demonstrated, there is no basis for rational moral judgment. Satan, in other words, is as good as Christ.

In the nineteenth century, the mechanistic theories of the previous century were made real by industrialization, with its hell-like factories and its depletion of the rural villages where the sense of Christian community had been stable for hundreds of years. From its beginning, Christianity had been communitarian; now the uprooted were forced to bear the brunt of the individualistic entrepreneurial theories of their masters. Having to confront the Devil alone, without the support of community, in hellish labor conditions, caused many impoverished Christians to abandon their faith altogether. Meanwhile, many Protestant leaders retreated from the old worldview centered on Christ's sacrifice as saving humanity from sin. Abandoning the independent epistemological bases of Christianity in experience, revelation, and tradition, they began trying to fit Christianity into the empirical, scientific framework that had begun to dominate intellectual circles, a task achieved only by gradually amputating theological limbs and eventually excising spiritual vital organs. Liberal Christians staggered back before agnostic sarcasm about the grotesque absurdity of Satan even more quickly than they did before direct philosophical attacks. As they abandoned traditional and biblical beliefs, the Devil was usually first to go as an encumbrance in their effort to make Christianity easy and optimistic in a world where secular progress was in vogue. FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), a pastor of the Reformed (Calvinist) Church, argued that it was obvious that evil existed but that displacing its origins from humanity onto Satan did nothing to explain it. Conservatives argued in response that without the Devil, the purpose of Christ's mission was lost. A third, middle persuasion, a sort of practical mysticism (for example, original METHODISM), abandoned traditional theological certainties yet affirmed the authority of the Bible and therefore the existence of the Devil.

During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, Christian beliefs were further undermined by reductionism (the belief that everything can be explained in materialist terms alone). Most weakening was biblical criticism, which sapped the authority of the Bible and the credibility of tradition. One nineteenth- and twentieth-century Christian reaction to this criticism was to dismiss it and to affirm the words of the Bible "literally"; a second was to adopt mystical and metaphorical interpretations; a third was to reject the reliability of the Bible. Modern psychology revealed the power of evil in negative projection (assigning the destructive impulses within ourselves to outsiders whom we choose as scapegoats). Disbelief in the Devil did not prevent Protestants (or others) from demonizing people. In the third view, biblical mentions of the Devil and demons in the Bible were considered the product of the primitive first-century worldview of Jesus and the NT writers. Scripture and tradition were abandoned in favor of the shifting arguments of the latest historians.

By 1800, liberal intellectual Protestants in Western civilization had abandoned the core of Christian beliefs; by 1900 more and more educated Christians had done so; by 2000, most Christians—in the West but not among newly converted peoples—had done so. The Devil had become a comic figure or a childish bogey. One result has been a peculiar defenselessness against the problem of evil. Against the flood of desecralization, a generation of theologians bred in the experience of World War II—KARL BARTH (1886–1968), PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965), and REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971)—tried to reverse the dilution of Christianity by reaffirming neo-orthodox values, expressing ancient truths in opposition to materialist reductionism, but in ways understandable to their culture. The obscene horrors of the world wars, they argued, demonstrated that radical evil (if not the Devil as a personality) was real. For a while, their ideas caught, but in Western culture they were swept away by the socially popular view that evil does not exist and that accident, fate, circumstance, genetics, and environment are all to blame for other people's actions. The term "evil" has been replaced by "disturbed," "sick," "inappropriate," or "mean-spirited" (while hatred, rage, and incivility have actually increased).

By the end of the twentieth century identifiably Protestant concepts of the Devil had become rare except among the Evangelicals. The contemporary worldview among leading intellectuals, including clergymen as well as professors and journalists, is irony. Use of terms such as "evil," "truth," "sin," "beauty," "God" (and most of all "the Devil"), have become social blunders unless set in the ironic quotation marks that let contemporaries know that we do not take them seriously. In a world where irony elides into cynicism, when any behavior is simply a matter of personal choice, when any idea is as good as any other, there are no standards by which Hitler is worse than Lincoln. In such a world, the Devil is no longer even a joke or a scary story; he simply has no place at all.

The Protestant self has been replaced by the post-modern self, a random collection of feelings, impulses, desires, and functions, a self that has no moral being at its center—indeed, no center—but only fluctuating identities that sway with cultural fashion. In such a society, Protestantism has had a variety of responses to the concept of the Devil and of radical evil. Three main strands can be traced in current Protestantism: a conservative, traditional, view; a liberal, skeptical view; and a so-called "literalist" biblical view typical of Evangelicals. The tension between liberal and conservative forces within Protestantism continues into the twenty-first century, but in broad societal terms the liberals have been successful in persuading most of the Western world (though not less devolved cultures) to disbelieve in both the Devil and hell. To many contemporary Christians the Devil seems old-fashioned and absurd in the context of the dominant materialist worldview of the time, which in fact has no room for any sort of Christianity at all, demythologized or not. What remains to be seen is whether Protestantism has the resources to give society the ability to suspend irony in the face of real suffering—in the face of the Devil.

References and Further Reading

- Delbanco, Andrew. Satan: How Americans Have Lost the Sense of Evil. New York: Farrar, Straus, & Giroux, 1995.
- Forsyth, Neil. The Old Enemy: Satan and the Combat Myth. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987.
- Pagels, Elaine. The Origin of Satan. New York: Random House, 1995.
- Russell, Jeffrey Burton. The Devil. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977.
- . Satan. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1982.
- . Lucifer. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- . Mephistopheles. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1986.
- . The Prince of Darkness. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1988.

JEFFREY BURTON RUSSELL

DEVOTIONAL LITERATURE

See Publishing, Media

DE VRIES, PETER (1910–1993)

American writer. The author of twenty-three novels, De Vries narrated the consequences of social mobility and cultural change for religious identity and community.

Life and Works

Born on the south side of Chicago of Dutch immigrant parents February 27, 1910, De Vries was raised in the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH (Calvinist), educated in its schools, reared in an ethos that judged movie attendance, dancing, card playing, and shopping or sports on Sunday as “worldly,” and graduated from Calvin College, a denominational institution, in 1931. He lived in Chicago until 1944, where he published stories in Story and Esquire, joined the editorial staff of Poetry in 1938, and published his first novel (1940). With the encouragement of writer James Thurber (1894–1961), he joined the staff of The New Yorker. He lived in Westport, Connecticut with his wife, nee Katinka Loeser (1913–1991), whom he married in 1943. They had four children, one of whom, Emily, died in 1960.

The Blood of the Lamb (1962), which narrates the protagonist’s upward mobility and the death of his daughter, is typical of De Vries’s work. It juxtaposes Midwestern and Eastern settings, religious/ethnic and secular/mobile cultures, and experiences of pain and loss with rollicking comedy. De Vries’s achievement of posing and mutually illuminating these and other contraries in his narratives and securing, at the same time, the integrity, generosity, and modesty of his main characters and/or narrators is noteworthy.

De Vries clarifies the distinction between traditional, ethnic Protestant beliefs and behaviors and those of a religiously vague or diverse American culture. He also records the tension between Reformed doctrines, particularly divine sovereignty and human depravity, and experience, particularly personal suffering and human friendship. His comedy does not ridicule, but encourages those who encounter and negotiate religious, cultural, and personal conflicts, and it affirms that experience, for better and worse, challenges expectations. De Vries died September 2, 1993, in Connecticut.

WESLEY A. KORT

DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY

See Neo-Orthodoxy

DIALOGUE, INTERCONFSSIONAL

Interconfessional dialogue designates a process aimed at settling historically and theologically divisive differences among communities that all claim to be in some sense “Christian” and “church.” Although the procedure may go back to the sixteenth century (the “colloquies” between the Saxon and the Swiss Reformers at MARBURG in 1529, between Roman Catholics and Protestants at Ratisbon/REGENSBURG in 1541, or between Lutherans and Reformed at Montbéliard in 1586), or even to the fifteenth century (as in the attempted reconciliation between Western Catholics and Eastern Orthodox around the council of FerraraFlorence), it was in the ecumenical movement of the twentieth century that the practice of such dialogue flourished, albeit with variations of pace and perhaps with different visions of the final goal. Conversations between two parties became known as bilateral dialogues, whereas several parties are said to engage in multilateral dialogue. Dialogues have taken place at national, regional, and universal levels. Particular dialogues have stretched over years and even decades.

The most comprehensive dialogues have been those characteristic of the Faith and Order movement, which dates from 1920 and has since 1948 taken institutional form as the Faith and Order commission of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. At first, the participants were Protestant (including Anglicans in prominent roles) and Orthodox, but since 1968 the 120-member commission has also included twelve official Roman Catholic members. World Conferences on Faith and Order—Lausanne (1927), Edinburgh (1938), Lund (1952), Montreal (1963), and Santiago de Compostela (1993)—were staging posts along a way of continuous study and conversation on such topics as the nature and structure of the CHURCH, its WORSHIP, and its sources and agencies of AUTHORITY. In particular the statement achieved at Montreal on “Scripture, Tradition and Traditions” provided a framework for progress toward agreement on particular issues. The most widely produced and received document was that issuing from the meeting of the commission at Lima, Peru, in 1982, under the title Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, it stated a convergence and developing consensus on those three themes. The Lima text had been fifty-five years in the making before being considered mature enough for presentation to the sponsoring churches with the request for an official response as to “the extent to which your church can recognize in this text the faith of the Church through the ages,” “the consequences your church can draw from this text for its relations and dialogues with other churches,” and “the guidance your church can take from this text for its worship, educational, ethical, and spiritual life and witness.” Although the churches were not invited to formally adopt the Lima text, its influence in all the mentioned areas has been quite considerable. Ongoing projects in Faith and Order include “the common expression of the apostolic faith today” (study document Confessing the One Faith, 1991) and The Nature and Identity of the Church (interim statement, 1998).

Although some transconfessional unions of a structural or organic kind have been achieved at the national or regional level (as between Anglicans, Methodists, and Reformed in South India since 1947; or between Methodists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists in CANADA since 1925 and in AUSTRALIA since 1977), it is more by the bilateral route that new or restored relationships have been sought and formalized between what were for a while called “world confessional families” and more recently “Christian world communions.” Dialogue between Anglicans and Old Catholics resulted in the Bonn Agreement of 1931, whereby the two communions enjoy full mutual recognition and sacramental sharing. Dialogue between Lutherans and Reformed in Europe led to the establishment of a similar mutual relationship by the Leuenberg Agreement of 1973, which has either been directly extended or had repercussions in other parts of the world, and has more recently allowed for some Methodist churches also to be brought into the Leuenberg Church Fellowship.

A global Anglican-Lutheran dialogue has provided at least a framework for the establishment of new relationships of various kinds between some Lutheran and Anglican churches at the regional or national level, as between the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the Evangelical Church in GERMANY (by the Meissen Declaration, signed in 1991), or between churches in the British Isles and in the Nordic countries (by the Porvoo Declaration, signed in 1996), or in the United States between the EPISCOPAL CHURCH and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH (“Called to Common Mission,” effective 2001). The dialogue between the LU-THERAN WORLD FEDERATION and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, with its report on “The Church—Community of Grace” (1984), supplied a context for the “fellowship of word and sacrament” subsequently established between Lutheran and Methodist churches in Germany, Austria, SWEDEN, and NORWAY. A dialogue between the World Methodist Council and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES concluded in its report “Together in God’s Grace” (1987) that there was “sufficient agreement in doctrine and practice” to justify existing unions between denominations of the two traditions and to encourage further fellowship, cooperation, and even unions elsewhere.

Although some of these dialogues began earlier, it was the official entrance of the Roman Catholic Church on the ecumenical scene with the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) that made bilateral dialogues the most prominent instrument of sustained doctrinal conversation and negotiation at the universal level. Having its own self-understanding as a universal ecclesial body composed of episcopally governed particular churches that are in a mutual communion, the touchstone of which is their respective communion with the church and bishop of Rome, the Roman Catholic Church has successfully invited into dialogue with itself a number of partners whose self-understandings and implied ecclesiologies vary among themselves. These include the Eastern Orthodox Churches, which look to Constantinople as the Ecumenical Patriarchate (see ORTHODOX, EASTERN); the various Oriental Orthodox Churches, which never accepted the council of Chalcedon 451; the Anglican Communion; the Lutheran World

Federation; the World Alliance of Reformed Churches; the World Methodist Council; the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE; the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST; the Mennonite World Conference (see MENNONITES); and several harder-to-pinpoint groups of Pentecostals and Evangelicals. By far the largest body of Christians in the world, the Roman Catholic Church, appears to have met with the agreement of the other communities to treat in distinct dialogues the issues that were controversial and divisive between Rome and each of them. On the Roman side the dialogues have been conducted under the aegis of the Secretariat (later Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity.

Among post-Vatican II dialogues between Protestant bodies and the Roman Catholic Church, it was probably the work of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) that made the early program. The first ARCIC produced “agreed statements” on “Eucharistic Doctrine” (Windsor 1971), “Ministry and Ordination” (Canterbury 1973), and “Authority in the Church” (Venice 1976), and these were incorporated—together with “elucidations” and a further statement on Authority—into a “Final Report” (1981). Although the worldwide Anglican bishops at the LAMBETH CONFERENCE of 1988 found the texts on eucharist and on ministry “a sufficient basis for taking the next step toward the reconciliation of our Churches grounded in agreement in faith,” the response from the Vatican in 1991 considered the welcome “progress” made in the dialogue as yet insufficient to permit the affirmation of “substantial agreement” in some “essential matters” in those two areas, let alone in the areas of magisterial and pastoral authority. Nevertheless a second ARCIC pursued the dialogue and issued statements on “Salvation and the Church” (Llandaff 1986), “Church as Communion” (Dublin 1990), “Life in Christ—Morals, Communion and the Church” (1993), and “The Gift of Authority” (Palazzola 1998). It is insisted that the statements of the Commission are not “authoritative declarations” by the sponsoring bodies but are published for the sake of allowing wide discussion before authoritative evaluations are made.

Contemporaneously the dialogue between the Lutheran World Federation and Rome had proceeded by way of a study commission’s work on “The Gospel and the Church” (Malta 1972) and then reports of a Joint Roman Catholic-Lutheran Commission on “Eucharist” (1978) and “Ministry in the Church” (1981) as well as texts produced around the time of the 450th anniversary of the Diet of Augsburg on “Ways to Community” and “All Under One Christ” (both 1980), themes that were pursued around the time of the 500th anniversary of MARTIN LUTHER’S birth in “Martin Luther—Witness to Jesus Christ” (1983) and “Facing Unity—Models, Forms and Phases of Catholic-Lutheran Church Fellowship” (1984). It was, however, the sharpening of the focus on the recurrent topic that Lutherans have always considered central to the REFORMATION—that is, the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION—that eventually allowed what is perhaps the most significant achievement so far of any dialogue between a Protestant body and the Roman Catholic Church. The Joint Commission’s lengthy report “Church and Justification” was completed in 1993 and stands—together with work done in national dialogues in Germany and in the UNITED STATES—as the backdrop for the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ) that was solemnly signed on behalf of the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church at Augsburg on October 31, 1999. The attainment of “consensus on basic truths of the doctrine of justification”—allowing for “differing explications” of detail—meant that the mutual doctrinal condemnations of the sixteenth century “do not apply to today’s partner” as the common and respective teachings are set forth in the JDDJ. It is expected that the JDDJ will provide “a solid basis” for “further clarification” on such topics as “the relationship between the word of God and church DOCTRINE, ECCLESIOLOGY, ecclesial authority, church unity, ministry, the SACRAMENTS, and the relation between justification and social ETHICS” and thus more generally “bear fruit in the life and teaching of the churches.” The JDDJ is not yet viewed as making possible eucharistic communion between Lutherans and Roman Catholics. In 2001 explorations began with a view to finding ways in which Methodist and Reformed bodies could become associated with the Lutheran-Roman Catholic agreement on justification.

Both the World Methodist Council and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches engaged in their own dialogues with the Roman Catholic Church in the final third of the twentieth century. The Joint Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Methodist Council treated eucharist and ministry among a plethora of themes in its reports of 1971 and 1976, but began to achieve more systematic focus with documents on the Holy Spirit (1981) and the Church (1986) before developing a series of statements in fundamental THEOLOGY that were intended to “set out theological perspectives within which more specific questions may be viewed”: “The Apostolic Tradition” (1991), “The Word of Life: A Statement on Revelation and Faith” (1996), “Speaking the Truth in Love: Teaching Authority among Roman Catholics and Methodists” (2001). The sponsoring bodies have encouraged the continuing work of the Joint Commission without yet coming to a formal evaluation of its results. The commitment to a “goal of full communion in faith, mission and sacramental life” has been repeatedly affirmed. The dialogues between representatives of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Roman Catholic Church have emphasized the location and role of the church in the world: thus “The Presence of Christ in Church and World” (1970–1977), “Towards a Common Understanding of the Church” (1984–1990, with the important theme of “a reconciliation of memories”), and “Church as Community of Common Witness to the Kingdom of God” (since 1998)—an approach found also in the Reformed dialogue with Anglicans that produced “God’s Reign and Our Unity” (1984).

In addition to these dialogues dealing with the inherited divisions in Western Christendom, not only the Roman Catholic Church but also several Protestant bodies have engaged at various levels in dialogue with the Eastern Orthodox churches and even, in some cases, with the Oriental Orthodox.

The highly complex pattern of bilateral dialogues raises the question of consistency between positions expressed and results achieved by the various participant bodies in relation to different partners. Thus the multilateral dimension cannot be ignored. Since Vatican II, a Joint Working Group has existed between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Council of Churches, and the WCC Faith and Order Commission has facilitated periodic forums to trace the progress of the various bilateral dialogues. From a positive point of view, the mutual influences and borrowings between the bilateral dialogues must be recorded.

The complexity of the ecumenical scene is compounded by the question of what a final resolution of inherited divisions would entail. The dominance of “world confessional families” or “Christian world communions” in the latter part of the twentieth century has tended to favor a goal of “reconciled diversity” or a “communion of communions” in which the diverse traditions would continue to bear a certain ecclesiological significance. Cardinal Jan Willebrands, president of the Secretariat/Council for Promoting Christian Unity (1969–1989), launched the notion of ecclesial “typoi,” which would each maintain certain theological, liturgical, spiritual, and disciplinary characteristics of their own, even while agreeing in fundamental doctrine and sharing some kind of pastoral and governmental structure. Precisely the last is the likely sticking point insofar as it involves the question of overlapping jurisdictions. In ancient, medieval, and even early-modern times, ecclesial unity has been thought to carry a certain geographical quality, whether in the primitive picture of one bishop in one church in one place reflected in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch, or in the sees and dioceses of the Constantinian era, or even in the post-Reformation settlement of cuius regio eius religio. A communion of spatially coinciding communions would presumably require some form of collegial or corporate oversight in each of an agreed and perhaps mobile set of units.

This is the developing landscape that has seen the reemergence of the question of a universal ministry of unity. Pope John Paul II took the matter up in his 1995 encyclical affirming the “irrevocable” commitment of the Roman Catholic Church to ECUMENISM. For the pope, dialogue is the appropriate, “personalist” modality in the search for full communion among Christians and their communities, involving not only an “exchange of ideas” but always an “exchange of gifts.” Mindful of “the grave obstacle which the lack of unity represents for the proclamation of the Gospel,” John Paul II in “Ut Unum Sint” invited “church leaders and their theologians to engage with [him] in a patient and fraternal dialogue” toward finding a way of exercising the primacy claimed and offered by the see of Rome in the service of truth and love that, “while in no way renouncing what is essential to its mission,” would nonetheless be “open to a new situation.”

See also Anglicanism; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Congregationalism; Lutheranism; Methodism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry 1982–1990: Report on the Process and Responses*. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC, 1990.
- Burgess, Joseph A., and Jeffrey Gros, eds. Building Unity: Ecumenical Dialogues with Roman Catholic Participation in the United States. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1989.
- Gassmann, Günther. “Nature and Function of Bilateral and Multilateral Dialogues and Their Interrelation.” Mid-Stream 25 (1986): 299–308.
- Gros, Jeffrey, Harding Meyer, and William G. Rusch, eds. Growth in Agreement II: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, 1982–1998. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC; Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 2000.
- Hill, Christopher, and Edward Yarnold. Anglicans and Roman Catholics: The Search for Unity. The ARCIC Documents and Their Reception. London: SPCK/CTS, 1994.
- Meyer, Harding, and Lukas Vischer, eds. Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC; Ramsey, NJ: Paulist Press, 1984.

Storman, E.J., ed. Towards the Healing of Schism: The Sees of Rome and Constantinople. Public Statements and Correspondence between the Holy See and the Ecumenical Patriarchate 1958–1984. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1987.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

DIBELIUS, FRIEDRICH KARL OTTO (1880–1967)

German Lutheran bishop. Dibelius was born in Berlin on May 15, 1880, the second of three sons of a high-ranking postal administrator. He died on January 31, 1967, also in Berlin where he had become an honorary citizen in 1958. He studied theology in Berlin with the church historian ADOLF VON HARNACK being the primary influence on him. After the presentation of his philological dissertation at the University of Gießen and completion of the first theological exam, Dibelius attended the seminary in Wittenberg (1904–1906), the place where the future leaders of the Prussian state church were educated. He received his Ph.D. there and a licentiate (doctor) of theology in 1906. This stage of his studies took him to SCOTLAND on a church-financed month-long trip, where he was especially impressed by the devoutness practiced in the CHURCH there.

After brief stints in several provinces (in Crossen/ Brandenburg, Danzig, Lauenburg/Pommerania, 1907–1915) Dibelius became a pastor in the German capital Berlin. He understood World War I to be a just and defensive war for GERMANY; the abolition of the monarchy at the end of the war upset him, but initially it did not threaten his nationalist mentality. His position at the Evangelical Consistory in Berlin hung in the balance with the dissolution of the royal church regiment, but the representatives of an advisory council set up to lead the church under these new conditions named him chairman. At the same time Dibelius published prolifically both on the church policy pursued by the political left and against those in the church who sought to reform a governmentally organized Evangelical Church in Prussia.

Subsequently Dibelius's career advanced quickly. In 1921 he was put in charge of the Evangelical Consistory concerned with social issues and the evangelical schools, but also with evangelical minorities abroad. In 1925 he became superintendent of the church in the Kurmark, roughly the area near Berlin. He tackled work issues with fervent energy. He bought a car to be able to visit all the pastors in his district, held regional church meetings, supported the church press, and intensely debated public issues. He developed his broader program in a book, Das Jahrhundert der Kirche (The Century of the Church), (1926, 1928). In this best-seller, he called on German Christians to use the separation of CHURCH AND STATE that had been forcibly introduced in 1919, to hold on to an evangelical-Christian and nationalist-conservative culture and morality vis-à-vis a secular Weimar Republic, and to expand and defend that culture comprehensively and forcefully.

The ecumenical conference on “Life and Work” in Stockholm (1925) had influenced this concept. Two additional books by Dibelius showed the extension of his historical compass and the degradation of his nationalism: Kirche und Völker-bund (Church and the League of Nations, 1927) as well as Friede auf Erden (Peace on Earth, 1930), the former a book that examined the subject of militarism prevalent in the church, the latter advocating the individual’s right to refuse military service for reasons of conscience.

Initially Dibelius was not at all critical of National Socialism, but sought to fend off its intervention in church matters. Subsequently, in June 1933 he was dismissed from his post of superintendent. He joined the CONFESSING CHURCH, where he participated loyally and consistently, although in a secondary position. In the sometimes divisive battles of the Confessing Church, he opted neither for the direction advocated by MARTIN NIEMÖLLER, nor for the Lutheran confessionalists who gathered around Bishop Hanns Meiser of Bavaria. Rather, Dibelius strongly supported the “Church Unity Project” of Bishop Theophil Wurm in Württemberg, who after 1941 sought to build a coalition of those with a neutral position and those who had taken a specific position within the Confessing Church. In 1945 this “Unity Project” provided the foundation for the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKD).

In 1945 he was elected bishop of the Evangelical Church in Berlin-Brandenburg—a position he held until 1966—where he contributed substantially to the integration of the evangelical churches within the EKD. His sober and pragmatic style, always geared toward the essential, never lost sight of the goal to integrate the divergent personalities and groups. It characterized his tenure as EKD council chairman; this was not a time without tension, but he was always sustained by the majority. He drew the wrath of the powers in the German Democratic Republic, however, because he refused to recognize that state and because he often drew comparisons between their policies, especially vis-à-vis the church, and the Nazi policy toward the church. Dibelius was fervent and uncompromising in this regard. Over the years, however, his position met opposition among those church groups that sought a more flexible policy in the interest of a coherence of churches and congregations in East and West; until 1968 the EKD was an all-German entity. The disagreement escalated in 1959 when Dibelius claimed in a publication entitled “Obrigkeit?” (“Authorities?”) that the government of the GDR should not be recognized as an authority ordained by God. Hence, in the eyes of many evangelical Christians in both parts of Germany, he came to be seen as a reactionary personality. Yet within the ecumenical movement, the attitude toward him was partly different. Dibelius, who was consistently active in that movement, was elected one of the six presidents of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES during the plenary at the 1954 Evanston meeting—against the forceful resistance of some German delegates. He held that office until 1961.

Along with sometimes vociferous antagonism, Dibelius also met with worldwide approval and recognition during his lifetime. The concept he advocated, that of a church and society modeled after a national church that reflects morally religious grandeur toward society, but is also partially inflected by an antiseccular, antisocialist, and, partially, anti-Semitic sense, was seen in the outlook of ADOLF STOECKER, a man Dibelius admired. It was also combined with other traits, however, especially in connection with his experiences with ECUMENISM. The evangelical theologian and bishop is one of the most important representatives of the evangelical church in Germany in the twentieth century.

See also German Christians

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Dibelius, Otto. Ein Christ ist immer im Dienst. Stuttgart, Germany: Kreuz-Verlag, 1961.

Secondary Source:

Stupperich, Robert. Otto Dibelius. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989. [Includes bibliography with publications by Dibelius.]

MARTIN GRESCHAT

DIBELIUS, MARTIN (1883–1947)

German New Testament scholar. Born in Dresden, GERMANY, Dibelius studied THEOLOGY in Neuchatel, Leipzig, Tuebingen, and Berlin. He passed his first theological exam and received his Doctor of Philosophy in 1905. After receiving his license in theology (1908) and completing his habilitation in the New Testament (1910), he became a professor at Heidelberg (1915), and remained there until his death.

The history of religions school influenced his methodology; this was evident in his early commentaries on the Pauline epistles and the Pastoral epistles. His work in form criticism was pathbreaking. See Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919, From Tradition to Gospel, tr. 1934). Dibelius understood the gospels as collections of smaller units originally transmitted orally; he traced the development of these units, classified them, and sought to discern their original function and context. He saw PREACHING as the key to understanding the formation of Christian TRADITION. He also applied form-critical principles to Acts, the canonical epistles, and other early Christian literature. Dibelius was interested in the gospel's relationship to the world, both in early Christianity and in his own time. His commentary on James (1921), one of the most influential in the twentieth century, presented James as an exhortation to live the Christian life.

Dibelius believed it the Christian's duty to be involved in public matters. He was politically involved in democratic causes from his student days. The Nazi regime curtailed his scholarly and political activities, but did not remove him from his position. After the end of World War II, the Americans sought his help in reopening and reconfiguring Heidelberg University.

See also Bultmann, Rudolf

References and Further Reading

Epp, Eldon Jay, and George W. MacRae. The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters.

Philadelphia, PA: Fortress and Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989

Geiser, Stefan. Verantwortung und Schuld: Studien zu Martin Dibelius. Hamburg, Germany: LIT, 2001

MARY JANE HAEMIG

DICKINSON, EMILY (1830–1886)

American poet. Dickinson was born December 10, 1830, and spent her entire life in the New England village of Amherst, Massachusetts. Her parents, Edward and Emily Norcross Dickinson, were members of the nineteenth century's rising professional class, and the family's life centered around Amherst College, which her grandfather founded and where her father and brother both served in various capacities.

The oldest of three children, Emily grew up in an environment that was Whiggish in its politics and modified Calvinist in its theology (see CALVINISM). Her training emphasized the benefits of prudence more than the ecstasies of the spirit and the virtues of benevolence more than the terrors of hell. Dickinson attended church regularly with her family through her twenties, but never joined the congregation and, by the age of thirty, no longer took part in its services.

Dickinson's adult years were occupied with the writing of poetry and letters and, with the help of her sister Lavinia, the managing of her family's home. Emily entertained seriously the thought of marriage only once, and that was when she was past fifty. Increasingly reclusive, she left the grounds of her family's home but once in the last two decades of her life.

Dickinson began to write poetry in her late twenties, and by the age of thirty-five had written over a thousand poems. Although her pace slackened in later years, she continued to compose works and left behind at her death almost 1,800 poems. The first edition of her poetry was published four years after her death and proved an instant success. Her reputation was quickly established, and she is now regarded as one of the finest lyric poets in the English language.

Taking the metrical patterns of the Protestant hymnal as her guide (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS), Dickinson fashioned a brilliantly eccentric poetic style, which she employed to explore the great religious themes of suffering, belief, personal identity, and the existence of God. Scientifically articulate and philosophically astute, Dickinson confronted in her poetry the crucial issues that prompted doubts about the Christian faith in the nineteenth century. To the end, she remained troubled about God the Father, who exists "Somewhere—in Silence," but found comfort in Jesus the Son, the "Tender Pioneer" who has gone before us in the way of suffering and death.

While living the most intensely focused inward life of any major figure in American history, Dickinson produced a body of work that made her the greatest of all American poets and one of the most creatively enigmatic religious thinkers American culture has ever produced.

References and Further Reading

Eberwein, Jane Donahue. Dickinson: Strategies of Limitation. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985.

Franklin, R.W., ed. The Poems of Emily Dickinson. Cambridge: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1999.

Lundin, Roger. Emily Dickinson and the Art of Belief. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1998.

ROGER LUNDIN

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST

The religious reform movement, originating in America and Great Britain at the turn of the nineteenth century, was also known as the Christian or Restoration Movement, although it was increasingly labeled the Stone-Campbell Movement in the late twentieth century after its founding leaders, BARTON W.STONE and Thomas and Alexander Campbell (see CAMPBELL FAMILY). The original impulse was to restore the primitive New Testament church as a means to effect Christian unity. The American movement suffered two divisions in the twentieth century, resulting in three church bodies: the Churches of Christ, the undenominational fellowship of CHRISTIAN CHURCHES and CHURCHES OF CHRIST—often known as independent Christian Churches—and the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Congregations with roots in this movement exist in over 160 countries.

American Origins

The movement's earliest American origins are found in the work of Barton W.Stone (1772–1844). Baptized Anglican at birth (see ANGLICANISM), Stone experienced CONVERSION in 1791 under the preaching of Presbyterian revivalists James McGready (1760–1817) and William Hodge (see PRESBYTERIANISM). He became pastor for two Presbyterian congregations near Paris, Kentucky in 1796. In spring 1801 he witnessed events of the Great Western Revival led by McGready in Logan County, Kentucky, connected with annual sacramental services (see REVIVALS). Stone organized such a gathering for his church at Cane Ridge, August 7–12, 1801. The Cane Ridge CAMP MEETING was one of the largest and most spectacular of the era in its emotional fervor and interdenominational cooperation.

Stemming partially from events at Cane Ridge, the antirevival Synod of Kentucky moved against Stone's colleague, Richard McNemar (1770–1839). At the 1803 synod meeting, Stone, McNemar, and three other ministers withdrew to form the Springfield Presbytery. In "An Apology for Renouncing the Jurisdiction of the Synod of Kentucky" (1804), the ministers stated that although they still considered themselves in communion with the Presbyterian Church, they were compelled to separate to avoid constant conflict over issues of theology and polity.

Within a year, however, the leaders of the Springfield Presbytery dissolved the body. In “The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery” (1804) they wrote, “We will that this body die, be dissolved, and sink into union with the body of Christ at large; for there is but one Body, and one Spirit....” In an attempt to avoid distinguishing themselves from other followers of Christ, they called themselves simply Christians and their churches Christian Churches, taking their cue from the Christian groups led by James O’Kelly (1757–1826) in North Carolina, and by Elias Smith (1769–1846) and Abner Jones (1772–1841) in New England. Stone became the acknowledged leader of the movement that by the late 1820s had over 12,000 members in at least ten states.

Campbell Movement

The second part of the Stone-Campbell Movement originated in Northern Ireland in the ministry of Thomas Campbell (1763–1854). Campbell was part of the Old Light, Anti-Burgher division of the Secession Church, known as the Associate Synod, itself a schism from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. He spent years trying to heal the divisions in IRELAND to no avail. When Campbell became ill under the stress, he was advised to remove himself from the situation or face continued deteriorating health, so he immigrated to the United States.

Upon arrival in Philadelphia in 1807, Campbell presented himself to the meeting of the Associate Synod—already organized in America—and received a preaching appointment in western Pennsylvania between Pittsburgh and Washington. His proclivity for unity led him to allow Presbyterians who were not members of his group to participate in the communion service. A fellow minister traveling with Campbell reported him to the Presbytery of Chartiers on their return to Pittsburgh, beginning a nearly two-year procession of accusations and trials that ended in 1809 with Campbell’s withdrawal from the Associate Synod.

Friends in western Pennsylvania continued to support Campbell’s ministry. They formed a society for the promotion of unity and evangelical Christianity named the Christian Association, and designated Campbell to write an explanation of its nature and aims. In “The Declaration and Address of the Christian Association of Washington, Pennsylvania” (1809) he described the mechanism he believed would bring about Christian unity. True Christians should abandon allegiance to denominational creeds and structures as terms of communion and recognize each other as Christians based solely on adherence to the clear teachings of scripture. Such Christians should come together in every locality to form a church of Christ, in communion with every other such body worldwide.

Thomas Campbell’s son Alexander provided substance to his father’s proposals. Alexander Campbell (1788–1866) and the rest of Thomas’s family arrived in America in 1809 in the midst of Thomas’s religious changes. The younger Campbell threw himself into the reform work his father had begun and within a few years took the lead. In 1811 the Christian Association organized itself into the Brush Run Church and ordained Alexander to the ministry the following year.

The issue of BAPTISM became crucial at the birth of Alexander Campbell's first child in 1812. Both Campbells knew of the controversies over baptism among Scottish independents, especially the division among followers of John Glas that produced the Scotch Baptists. Alexander studied the matter for some time, concluding that infant baptism was not scriptural. This led to his decision to seek immersion at the hands of a Baptist minister, Matthias Luce (1764–1831). Several others in the Brush Run Church, including his mother and father, joined Campbell, and soon the congregation was one of baptized believers.

This stance on baptism led many to view the Campbells as BAPTISTS, prompting the Redstone Baptist Association to invite their church to join. Although the Campbells made it clear they could not accept the Baptists' Philadelphia Confession of Faith, the Brush Run Church was admitted into the Redstone Association in 1815, and the Campbells did their reform work as Baptists until around 1830. From 1823 to 1830 Alexander Campbell published a religious journal named The Christian Baptist. Campbell also gained considerable fame through his debates on baptism with Presbyterians John Walker (1820), William Maccalla (1823), and Nathan Rice (1843).

Joining Forces

By the 1820s the Campbell and Stone Movements experienced increasing contact. The two groups shared anticreed, antisectarian, prounity, and Bibleonly stances, although they differed in significant ways. Stone focused on the power of scripture to transform lives, whereas Alexander Campbell emphasized the importance of discerning New Testament facts concerning belief and practice. In 1825 Campbell began a series of articles in the Christian Baptist titled "A Restoration of the Ancient Order of Things," describing beliefs and practices of the early church he believed had been lost or corrupted. These included immersion of believers, weekly observance of the Lord's Supper, congregational polity with governance by local elders, and simple worship with songs reflecting scriptural concepts, all of which became central tenets of the movement.

Although the Stone churches taught immersion of believers, they often practiced "open membership," accepting those who had been baptized as infants. The Campbell churches generally insisted on immersion as a prerequisite for membership, though not denying there were unimmersed Christians. The Stone movement preferred the name Christian; Alexander Campbell preferred disciples, partly to avoid confusion of his movement with the Smith-Jones Movement Christians who were unitarian. Stone held a premillennial eschatology and a negative view of human nature. Campbell was postmillennial and optimistic about the ability of Christians to restore the primitive church, bring Christian unity, and the conversion of the world (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM). The two leaders differed as well in their understanding of the nature of Christ, the ATONEMENT, and the role of the Holy Spirit in conversion.

Despite the differences, beginning in the early 1830s many Stone and Campbell congregations in Kentucky and surrounding states united. Individual congregations used the names Christian Church, Church of Christ, and Disciples of Christ interchangeably. By 1860 the movement in the United States claimed over 200,000 members in about 2,000 congregations. Initial evangelistic success was attributed largely to the work of Walter Scott, who developed a simple Christocentric method of teaching. Instead of a Calvinist appeal to wait for the Holy Spirit, Scott taught that anyone could hear and believe the gospel, repent of past sins, submit to baptism (immersion), and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit and eternal life (see CALVINISM). This was often referred to as the “five finger exercise” because its five points could be taught using the fingers of one hand.

Scotch Baptists who immigrated to eastern Canada in the early 1800s formed the nucleus of the movement in that country. David Oliphant Sr., James Black (1797–1886), and John McKellar were among the earliest leaders. Early contact with both the Stone and Campbell Movements in the United States led many of these Baptist congregations to affiliate with the Stone-Campbell Movement in the 1830s and following. These churches tended to be narrow and legalistic and did not experience the growth of the movement in the United States. By 1867 there were about seventy churches, with an estimated membership of 4,000.

The early movement in Great Britain had similar contours. Independent congregations practicing immersion and designated Church of Christ existed in SCOTLAND and Ireland in the late 1700s and early 1800s. Scotch Baptist minister William Jones (1762–1846) began in 1835 republishing material from Alexander Campbell’s journal the Millennial Harbinger (1830–1870), although he later repudiated Campbell’s ideas. James Wallis, also a Scotch Baptist, broke with that group in 1836 and began publishing The Christian Messenger and Reformer, which became a major force among Churches of Christ in Great Britain. By 1847 these churches numbered eighty, with about 2,300 members. British members took the movement to New Zealand in 1843, and in 1845 Thomas Magarey brought it from New Zealand to Australia.

In October 1849 the first General Convention, held in Cincinnati, Ohio, created the American Christian Missionary Society (ACMS). Alexander Campbell was elected President (in absentia), a post he held until his death in 1866. Although some opposed the society as an unscriptural organization, the issue did not become divisive until the CIVIL WAR. Many leaders in both North and South were pacifists (see PACIFISM). When the war broke out, however, the Society, now a de facto northern institution, felt pressure to make a statement of loyalty to the Union. In 1861 and 1863 the ACMS passed resolutions supporting the northern cause. Southern leaders like Tolbert Fanning (1810–1874) concluded that they could not endorse the society until it repented of this evil.

Division

The circumstances of the first division of the movement in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were not merely sectional. Economic and sociological factors stemming from the war played a part in the rejection by many southern churches of the missionary society and instruments in worship. Yet theological objections had been raised early, and many northern churches also rejected the “innovations.” In the U.S. religious census of 1906, many of the conservative churches were listed separately as Churches of Christ, with the others listed as Disciples of Christ.

The second division reflected issues of the fundamentalist-modernist controversy, including higher criticism of scripture and the controversy over evolution (see FUNDAMENTALISM, MODERNITY). The most divisive early issue, however, was that of “open membership” on the mission field. The United Christian Missionary Society (UCMS), formed in 1920 by a merger of Disciples agencies, investigated the charges and cleared the missionaries involved despite evidence it was being practiced. Congregations that stopped support of the UCMS and organized independent mission work became known as independent Christian Churches. Members of these churches began meeting in a North American Christian Convention in 1927, though not at first as a rival to the International Convention of Disciples of Christ. From 1934 to 1948 the Commission on Restudy of the Disciples of Christ attempted to work through the problems with little success. The Panel of Scholars (1957–1963), the Study Committee on Brotherhood Restructure (1958–1960), and the Commission on Restructure (1962–1966) culminated in the adoption of the Provisional Design for Restructure of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in 1968. The restructuring led many independent Christian Churches to final separation.

British Churches of Christ underwent similar divisions surrounding issues of cooperation and public worship. Many congregations organized themselves for cooperative work as early as 1842, but an “Old Paths” group resisted the organization and by 1945 was regarded as a completely separate body. In 1981 many of the churches in the “Co-Operation,” then known as the Association of Churches of Christ, joined the United Reformed Church. Those that rejected the union continued as the Fellowship of Churches of Christ. Churches in Australia and New Zealand reflected comparable tensions.

Contemporary Organization

In the United States, the largest of the three bodies at the beginning of the twenty-first century was Churches of Christ, with approximately 1.25 million members in 13,000 congregations. Extensive twentieth-century mission work, especially in AFRICA, resulted in a membership outside the United States of over one million. This stream of the Stone-Campbell Movement experienced internal tensions over issues such as worship practices and exclusivist attitudes beginning in the 1970s. Informal structures such as annual lectureships and periodicals that helped provide a coherent identity for Churches of Christ in the past have come to serve as rallying points for differing positions. A number of colleges, universities, and seminaries are affiliated with Churches of Christ in the United States, including Pepperdine University (California), Abilene Christian University (Texas), and Lipscomb University (Tennessee).

The 1968 Restructure of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) focused on three manifestations of the church: local, regional, and general. At the General level a new office of general minister and president was created, and multifaceted ministries of the denomination were coordinated into units. The national offices for the denomination in the United States are in Indianapolis, Indiana. A General Assembly meets in uneven years. The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) suffered membership losses similar to those suffered by other mainstream Protestant denominations in the late twentieth century. A small group of dissident members formed Disciple Renewal in 1985 to protest what they saw as a move away by leadership from a historic focus on Christ and biblical teaching. Disciples began the new millennium with approximately 800,000 members in 3,800 congregations in the United States and Canada. New church planting and theological discernment initiatives signaled efforts both to grow and strengthen the body in the twenty-first century.

Independent Christian Churches numbered over one million in the United States in 2000. These churches, although experiencing tensions like the other streams, have enjoyed significant growth in the early twentyfirst century through church plantings by local evangelistic associations and parachurch organizations like the Christian Missionary Fellowship. The annual North American Christian Convention, although without any delegated authority over the churches, provides a forum for networking, reports from ministries, inspiration, and fellowship that provides a sense of identity for many in these churches.

Churches historically related to the Stone-Campbell Movement exist in over 160 countries. The World Convention of Churches of Christ (WCCC), established in 1930 by Jesse M.Bader and meeting roughly every four years, serves as a forum to maintain contact between all parts of the movement in a context of Bible study and worship. In addition, yearly meetings between members of Churches of Christ and independent Christian Churches, known as Restoration Forums, were begun in 1984; and a more formal Stone-Campbell Dialogue with representatives from the three major streams in the United States began in 1999.

References and Further Reading

- Chapman, Graeme. One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism: A History of Churches of Christ in Australia. 2nd ed. Glen Iris, Victoria: Vital Publications, 1989.
- Cox, Claude E., ed. The Campbell-Stone Movement in Ontario: Christian Church (Disciples of Christ, Churches of Christ, Independent Christian Churches/Churches of Christ). New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1995.
- Foster, Douglas A. Will the Cycle Be Unbroken? Churches of Christ Face the Twenty-First Century. Abilene, TX: ACU Press, 1994.
- Garrett, Leroy. The Stone-Campbell Movement. Rev. ed. Joplin, MO: College Press Publishing Company, 1995.
- Hughes, Richard T. Reviving the Ancient Faith: The Story of Churches of Christ in America. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 1996.
- McAllister, Lester G., and William E.Tucker. Journey in Faith: A History of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). St. Louis: The Bethany Press, 1975.

- North, James. Union in Truth: An Interpretive History of the Restoration Movement. Cincinnati: Standard Publishing Company, 1994.
- Richardson, Robert. Memoirs of Alexander Campbell: Embracing a View of the Origin, Progress and Principles of the Religious Reformation Which He Advocated. Philadelphia, J.B. Lippincott & Co., 1868–1870; reprint edition, Indianapolis: Religious Book Service, 1980.
- Thompson, David Michael. Let Sects and Parties Fall: A Short History of the Association of Churches of Christ in Great Britain and Ireland. Birmingham, UK: Berean Press, 1980.
- Toulouse, Mark G. Joined in Discipleship: The Shaping of Contemporary Disciples Identity, rev. ed. St. Louis: Chalice Press, 1997.
- Webb, Henry. In Search of Christian Unity: A History of the Restoration Movement. Revised edition. Abilene, TX: ACU Press, 2003.
- West, Earl I. The Search for the Ancient Order: A History of the Restoration Movement. 4 vols. Nashville, TN: Gospel Advocate Company, 1949ff.
- Williams, D.Newell. Barton Stone: A Spiritual Biography. St. Louis: Chalice Press, 2000.

DOUGLAS A.FOSTER

DISPENSATIONALISM

Dispensationalism is a tradition within American evangelical ORTHODOXY. Thus, it has much in common with other traditions within the extended family of EVANGELICALISM, both in thought and practice. The movement has consistently affirmed the inspiration, inerrancy, and AUTHORITY of Scripture (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY). Dispensationalists argue that the BIBLE, when interpreted according to a historical-grammatical-literary-theological method, results in the conclusion that God's purpose in history is to bring glory to himself. Further, God's work in history is seen to occur in clearly distinguishable periods of time, or dispensations. The number of dispensations is not as essential to the TRADITION as the recognition that there are discontinuities in the historical administration of God's plan. This tradition has a strong ecclesiastical emphasis, believing that the CHURCH is the primary means by which God carries out God's purposes in this age. Dispensationalists have emphasized both the universal, transdenominational identity of the church and its localized form in gathered communities of faith. Believing that apocalyptic and prophetic Scriptures have relevance for the present as well as the future, dispensationalists have strongly affirmed the imminent (at any time) return of Christ and a political future for Israel in God's plan (see APOCALYPTICISM). Dispensationalism is futurist premillennial in its EsCHATOLOGY and most of its proponents have believed in the doctrine of the RAPTURE of the church before the bodily return of Christ, although there are adherents of both the mid- and post-tribulation rapture positions in this tradition.

Dispensationalists generally agree that these distinguishable periods of time include different responsibilities for humans as they relate to God. A dispensation ends in the failure of humans to fulfill their obligations to God, which brings a resulting judgment on their SIN. A new dispensation, with a different administrative relationship, replaces the former one. Some critics of dispensationalism have caricatured the system as holding the unorthodox view that these rules and regulations are differing ways of SALVATION. Dispensationalists have always emphatically denied this charge, affirming with evangelical orthodoxy that salvation is always by GRACE through FAITH. In every dispensation, salvation is a gracious gift of God. What changes in the administrative discontinuity is the content of faith and the responsibilities God places on humanity. In response to the charge that dispensationalism is Antinomian (see ANTINOMIANISM), the tradition has consistently affirmed that there is law in every dispensation, although the content of that law may be different in each period of time. None of the legal requirements God places on humans was ever intended to produce salvation; rather, they were the means by which redeemed people maintain fellowship with their God.

Biblical Defense

Critics sometimes charge that dispensationalism is an interpretive grid imposed on the Scriptures. In response, dispensationalists point to the biblical usage of the Greek oikonomia in support of their view of history. In short they claim that dispensationalism is taught in Scripture, that the biblical writers use the word essentially in the same way that dispensationalists do. The basic meaning of oikonomia, which in its various forms appears about twenty times in the Greek New Testament, is “to manage, regulate, administer, and plan the affairs of a household.” The word is rendered in various translations as “dispensation, economy, stewardship, arrangement, plan, administration.” The word appears in a nontheological sense in the parable of Jesus in Luke 16:1–13. The household steward is accountable to his master for his handling of the affairs of the household. His failure to carry out his responsibilities to the satisfaction of his master results in a change of administration. This steward or manager is relieved of his duties and, presumably, a new oikonomos will be hired. Thus, the dispensation of the former steward ends and is replaced by another. Theologically, the Apostle Paul uses oikonomia to define the responsibility that God has given to him (Ephesians 3:2–10). This dispensation is based on the work of Christ in his DEATH and resurrection (Ephesians 3:10; cf. Ephesians 2:13–18). This text seems to indicate that a dispensation preceded the Christ event, which was then replaced by one based on the work of the Messiah in his first coming. Further, Paul anticipates a future period of time, the “dispensation of the fulness of times” (Ephesians 1:10; KJV), when all things in HEAVEN and earth will be gathered together in Christ. Although some evangelicals see this as a reference to the present age, dispensationalists affirm that it is the eschatological Messianic age that is in view. Thus, dispensationalists claim, their reading of redemptive history is consistent with that of the Apostle Paul, whose writings provide biblical support for at least three dispensations.

Origins of Dispensationalism

Dispensationalism originated in the nineteenth century in the teaching of the Anglican JOHN NELSON DARBY (1800–1882) (see ANGLICANISM). Darby rejected the organized church as apostate, leading him to become part of a separatist group that later became known as the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. Darby adopted a futurist premillennial eschatology, rejecting the historicist approach popular among British millennialists (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENMALISM) of his era. Central to Darby’s hermeneutics was an anthropological dualism. In his view the true church is a heavenly people, an invisible group with heavenly citizenship, promises, and prophecies. Israel, on the other hand, is God's earthly people. All of the biblical prophecies to Israel will be fulfilled on the earth in the millennium and the eternal state. The church inherits spiritual blessings and her eternal destiny is in heaven. These two peoples never commingle. A strict separation of these two peoples of God must be maintained when interpreting promises and prophecies in Scripture. The future eschatological plan of God has both an earthly and a heavenly component.

Darby developed two distinctive doctrines related to this heavenly people. He proposed that the church age was a parenthesis between the sixty-ninth and seventieth weeks of Daniel 9:25–27. This period of time was a mystery, not revealed in Scripture before the coming of the Messiah. The seventieth week of Daniel, the Great Tribulation, was prophesied for God's earthly people (Israel), and has not yet been fulfilled. Because the wrath of God will be poured out on the earth during this time, God's heavenly people will be taken away, or raptured, before this seven-year period. Darby based his doctrine of the RAPTURE of the church before this period of tribulation on I Thessalonians 4:15–18. With the heavenly people removed from the earth, God's judgment is then unleashed on Israel and unbelieving Gentiles (see Revelation 6–19).

In Darby's view, God's promises to his earthly people, Israel, would then be fulfilled in a millennial kingdom. Although they had rejected their Messiah in his first coming, Israel would turn to him in faith during the Great Tribulation. The Messiah will destroy all of his enemies and rule over the world from the Davidic throne in Jerusalem for one thousand years (Revelation 20:1–6). After one last rebellion is quashed, a new heaven and earth are created, the former the eternal home of the church and the latter the realm of Israel.

Dispensationalism spread to North America through a series of Bible and prophecy conferences in the late nineteenth century. The most prominent of these was the Niagara Conference (1883–1897). Darby himself made several trips to America to speak at these gatherings. Through the teaching of J.H. Brookes, A.J. Gordon, and C.I. Scofield, this teaching took on a distinctive American flair. American dispensationalists generally rejected Darby's view of the organized church as apostate and focused on purifying or reviving their denominations.

This period of dispensationalism's history has been designated by historians of the tradition as the classic stage. These dispensationalists maintained Darby's anthropological dualism and his futurist ESCHATOLOGY. The failure of WILLIAM MILLER'S date-setting (1844) clearly demonstrated to them the danger of historicism. Further, dispensationalists claimed that their theology was based on a literal interpretation of the Bible. Fundamentalist in their theology, representatives of many denominations were found in their ranks, including Presbyterians and Congregationalists (see FUNDAMENTALISM; PRESBYTERIANISM, CONGREGATIONALISM). Later, BAPTISTS and nondenominational churches were represented as well.

The major teachings of this classic stage of American dispensationalism were systematized in the SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE. C.I. Scofield, a prominent spokesman in the tradition, published a King James Version of the Bible (Oxford University Press) with copious notes explaining his interpretation of much of the biblical text in successive editions in 1909 and 1917 (see BIBLE, KING JAMES VERSION). Although not all dispensationalists agreed with every one of his interpretations, Scofield's system became the major articulation of the tradition. The influence of the Scofield Reference Bible is so pervasive that in popular understanding, his sevenfold scheme of history is often assumed to be the essential statement of dispensationalism.

Scofield's disciple, L.S.Chafer, founded the Evangelical Theological College in Dallas, Texas in 1924. This institution was renamed Dallas Theological Seminary in 1936 and Chafer served as its president until his death in 1952. Chafer's eight-volume Systematic Theology (1948) is the most developed articulation of classic dispensationalism.

A Dynamic Tradition

The next generation of dispensational scholars continued to develop their own understanding of Scripture within the framework of this hermeneutical tradition. J.F.Walvoord, J.D.Pentecost, and C.C.Ryrie, all students of Chafer, each introduced modifications to classic dispensationalism. These modifications are perhaps most visible in the Revised Scofield Reference Bible (1967), in which many notes were changed and others added. This period of the tradition's history is differentiated from the previous one with the label "revised," based on the "revision" of the original Scofield Reference Bible.

In the mid-1960s, Charles Ryrie wrote an apologetic for the movement, which was intended to coincide with the revision of Scofield's study Bible. Dispensationalism Today (1965) provides one of the clearest articulations of revised dispensationalism and quickly achieved textbook status. Ryrie defended and explained the systematization and development in the movement. Gone is the strict anthropological dualism of the classic stage, although the futurist eschatology and the strong biblical emphasis remain. Ryrie defined the essence of dispensationalism in terms of three sine qua non: the consistent use of literal hermeneutics, which results in a distinction between Israel and the church, and the conviction that God's purpose in all that he does is to glorify himself.

During the latter decades of the twentieth century, dispensational scholars proposed additional modifications of this tradition. These modifications grew out of a renewed interest in studying the history of the tradition and a fresh look at biblical revelation, as well as an evaluation of the sine qua non approach to definition. There were proposals for each of the three as the essence of dispensationalism. Eventually some of these dispensationalists concluded that perhaps the attempt to articulate the essence of dispensationalism, in contrast to other orthodox traditions, was an inadequate approach to the question of definition. Some concluded that a better approach might be to focus on the major themes and emphases of the tradition. The tradition has always claimed to be committed to the task of biblical hermeneutics, and here is an illustration of how deep that commitment was.

At the heart of these modifications in dispensational thought seems to be an emphasis on more continuity or progression in the plan of God. Thus, these progressive dispensationalists stress the present inauguration of God's eschatological blessings, which will culminate in their fullness in the eternal state. The distinction between Israel and the church remains, although it is defended not on the basis of an anthropological dualism or a modified “two people of God” approach, but rather as part of the historical fulfillment of God’s COVENANT program. The church, although not revealed explicitly in the Old Testament, is an integral part of God’s plan for history, not simply a parenthesis within God’s historical scheme. There remains a future for political Israel, not simply in the millennium but in eternity as well. In the eschatological Messianic kingdom, all redeemed humanity will exist eternally on a re-created earth. In its progressive form, dispensationalism remains futurist premillennial in its eschatology, usually including a pretribulation rapture of the church, and continues to emphasize the authority of Scripture as support for its view. C.A. Blaising, D.L.Bock, and R.L.Saucy are the most prominent representatives of progressive dispensationalism.

Impact of Dispensationalism

Because of the consistent emphasis within this tradition on the authority of Scripture, dispensationalism has provided numerous contributions to Protestantism. First, the tradition has had a strong MISSIONS emphasis, which is reflected in the founding of faith mission agencies and other parachurch organizations. C.I. Scofield founded Central American Mission (now CAM International). Dispensationalists have been active in Africa Inland Mission (now AIM International), Sudan Interior Mission (now SIM), Campus Crusade for Christ, INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP, the Navigators, YOUTH FOR CHRIST, Young Life, and numerous other nondenominational missions agencies. In addition, dispensationalists serve in many capacities in denominational missions organizations (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). Through this missionary emphasis, the teachings of dispensationalism have spread throughout the world, resulting in a global presence of the movement. Second, dispensationalists have always been active in social work, including Rescue Missions, orphanages, ministry to the poor, and other service agencies. Third, dispensationalists have written biblical commentaries, usually with a particular emphasis on the practical implications of the text for life and ministry. Fourth, many have launched radio and television ministries (see TELEVANGELISM; PUBLISHING MEDIA). Charles Fuller’s “Old Time Gospel Hour,” M.R.DeHaan and Richard DeHann on “Radio Bible Class,” J.Vernon McGee’s “Through the Bible,” JERRY FALWELL’S “Old Time Gospel Hour,” Theodore Epp and Warren Wiersbe on “Back to the Bible,” and Chuck Swindoll’s “Insight for Living” are all examples of the national and world-wide influence of this tradition. Fifth, dispensationalists were involved in founding BIBLE COLLEGES and SEMINARIES. In addition to Dallas Theological Seminary, several other institutions have their roots in dispensationalism, such as MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE, Philadelphia College of the Bible, Lancaster Bible College, Grace Theological Seminary, Biola University and Talbot Seminary, and Multnomah Bible College/Seminary. In addition, dispensationalists serve on the faculties of many other Protestant educational institutions. Sixth, dispensationalists serve the church in pastoral and lay leadership capacities in many Protestant denominational and independent churches.

Dispensationalism is a dynamic tradition, developing as its adherents dialogue with other Christians around the biblical text. Although the study of its history demonstrates unmistakable paradigmatic stages in dispensational thought, this does not mean that every dispensationalist in each period was in total agreement on the understanding of Scripture. Rather, the strength of this tradition is its unity amidst diversity. Further, under the umbrella of the label dispensationalism, one today finds representatives of the various stages in its historical development. Throughout its history, dispensationalism has consistently had a strong ministry focus, serving the church and the world with the gospel in word and deed.

References and Further Reading

- Bass, C. Backgrounds to Dispensationalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1960; reprint, 1977.
- Blaising, C., and D.Bock. Progressive Dispensationalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1993.
- , eds. Dispensationalism, Israel, and the Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1992.
- Crutchfield, L.V. The Origins of Dispensationalism. Lanham, MD: University Press, 1992.
- Kraus, C.N. Dispensationalism in America. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1958.
- Marsden, G. Fundamentalism and American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Poythress, V.S. Understanding Dispensationalism, 2nd ed. Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian and Reformed, 1994.
- Ryrie, C.C. Dispensationalism Today. Chicago: Moody Press, 1965.
- . Dispensationalism. Rev. ed. Chicago: Moody Press, 1995.
- Sandeen, E. The Roots of Fundamentalism, British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Saucy, R. The Case for Progressive Dispensationalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1994.
- Weber, T. Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- G.R. KREIDER

DISSENT

The dissenting tradition of ENGLAND and WALES began with the late medieval Lollards and then the separatists who left the CHURCH OF ENGLAND under ELIZABETH I (1533–1603). The dissenters grew in the mid-seventeenth century but were persecuted between 1662 and 1689. Enjoying toleration in the eighteenth century, they polarized into rational Dissenters and Evangelicals, whose numbers were hugely expanded by the creation of METHODISM. They played a large part in Victorian public affairs, but declined in the twentieth century.

Origins

The Dissenters, or Nonconformists, were those in England and Wales who worshipped outside the established Church of England. Similar groups existed in Ireland, and for a while the term “dissent” was used for those Presbyterians who seceded from the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. Theoretically applicable to Roman Catholics, the description was normally confined to Protestants. Dissent goes back to the Lollards of the late fourteenth and fifteenth centuries who criticized clerical and papal abuses, appealing to the text of the English scriptures translated by their founder, English theologian John Wyclif (1330–1384). Putting down roots in parts of southeastern England such as Buckinghamshire, they persisted into the sixteenth century and probably into the seventeenth. Following the settlement of the Church of England under Elizabeth I, some of those Puritans who wanted further reformation began to worship separately. The early separatist leaders ROBERT BROWNE and Robert Harrison left the country for the NETHERLANDS in order to escape persecution, but Henry Barrow and John Greenwood, who both wrote in defense of separatism, were hanged in 1593. Fifteen years later a group of separatists escaped to the Netherlands under THOMAS ROBINSON, and in 1620 some of his followers crossed the Atlantic to settle as the PILGRIM FATHERS. Another group, under John Smyth, also fled in 1608 to Amsterdam, where their leader baptized himself and so began the Baptist tradition. A small number of churches followed Smyth in holding an Arminian theology of general redemption and so were called General Baptists. Other Baptists who emerged in the 1630s were known as Particular Baptists because, like the great majority of separatists, they upheld the Calvinist doctrine of particular redemption.

Development

The upheavals of the CIVIL WAR and interregnum in the 1640s and 1650s allowed an upsurge of dissent. The separatists who practiced infant baptism, now called the Independents, flourished, together with the Baptists. The SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, repudiating Calvinism in favor of guidance by the inner light, was founded by English religious leader George Fox (1624–1691) and soon earned the nickname of the Quakers. Smaller sects holding radical views—the Ranters, Diggers, Muggletonians, and others—briefly came into existence in this disturbed period. The restoration of the monarchy in 1660 was followed two years later by the “Great Ejection,” the expulsion from their parishes on St. Bartholomew’s Day of about 1,000 clergy, mostly Presbyterians, who would not agree to accept the exclusive use of the prayer book. Dissenters were subject to the penalties of the Clarendon Code of legislation that excluded them from public office, and after 1664 prohibited more than five people from meeting for non-Anglican worship. Despite a short respite between 1672 and 1673, the reigns of Charles II (1630–1685) and James II (1633–1701) were marked by serious persecution, which was terminated only by the Glorious Revolution of 1688 and the consequent passing of the Toleration Act of 1689. Henceforth dissenters were allowed to worship freely so long as their meetings were licensed.

During the eighteenth century, dissent broadened theologically under the influence of the intellectual currents of the times. Most Presbyterians and General Baptists gradually turned toward Arian beliefs and became known as rational Dissenters; most Independents and Particular Baptists retained their Trinitarian orthodoxy. By the end of the century the nominal Presbyterians, often well educated and prosperous, were increasingly Unitarian in theology. The century also witnessed, however, the transformation of dissent by the Evangelical Revival. JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791) created METHODISM as vigorous societies within the Church of England, but even before his death in 1791 it was tending to function as a separate denomination. Its status was always unclear: although technically dissenting, it did not identify with the dissenting tradition. A similar form of evangelical religion gradually transformed the Independents and Baptists into rapidly growing bodies, which, like Methodism, appealed to the poor as well as the middle classes. By the middle of the nineteenth century almost half the churchgoing population was Nonconformist.

In 1828 the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts meant that Nonconformists were no longer treated as second-class citizens. They subsequently organized campaigns demanding the removal of the remaining marks of discrimination and pressed unsuccessfully for disestablishment. The “Nonconformist conscience” around the end of the century called for the enactment of what was considered moral legislation, such as the prohibition of alcohol. Growth petered out in the middle years of the century, and from the 1880s Nonconformity went into long-term decline. The explanation has been much debated, but must include competition from new forms of recreation and a weakening of former doctrinal convictions in the chapels. Nevertheless fresh denominations were created, notably the SALVATION ARMY (1878) and the Pentecostals (from 1907). In the twentieth century, Nonconformists preferred to call themselves the FREE CHURCHES and increasingly cooperated in ecumenical activities. Although the older Free Churches went into accelerated decline from the 1960s, in the same decade new black-led denominations were organized to serve the immigrant community and charismatic “house churches,” subsequently styled the “New Churches,” started their rapid growth. Hence by the end of the twentieth century the non-Anglican Protestant bodies attracted more worshippers than either the Church of England or the Roman Catholic Church.

References and Further Reading

- Payne, Ernest A. The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England. London: SCM Press, 1944.
- Sell, Alan P.F. Dissenting Thought and the Life of the Churches: Studies in an English Tradition. Lewiston, NY: Mellen University Press, 1990.
- Watts, Michael R. The Dissenters: From the Reformation to the French Revolution. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1978.
- . The Dissenters: The Expansion of Evangelical Nonconformity, 1791–1859. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1995.

D.W.BEBBINGTON

DISTLER, HUGO (1908–1942)

German composer. Distler. One of Germany's foremost composers of sacred music in the twentieth century, was born in Nuremberg on June 24, 1908. He was brought up by his maternal grandparents, graduated from the famous Melanchthon Gymnasium in Nuremberg, and subsequently studied at the Leipzig conservatory. At the age of twenty-two he was appointed organist at the St. Jakobi Church in Lübeck. In 1937 he joined the faculty of the Württembergische Musikhochschule (Conservatory) in Stuttgart. Three years later, in May 1940, he was promoted to professor and in the same year received an appointment to the Conservatory of Music in Berlin. Early in 1942 he was also appointed conductor of the Berlin Opera and Cathedral choirs. The increasing Allied air raids on Berlin had triggered the evacuation of his family to a rural area on the Baltic Sea. Thus, alone in Berlin, Distler committed suicide on November 1, 1942.

Distler's opus consists of motets, organ preludes, and cantatas; in fact, most of his compositions are church music. Because his style combined adherence to classical forms of compositions with modern tonality, the Nazis decried his music as "degenerate," a fact that undoubtedly contributed to his youthful suicide.

References and Further Reading

Grabner, Hermann. Hugo Distler. Tutzing, Germany: H. Schneider, 1990.

Palmer, Larry. Hugo Distler and his Church Music. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1967.

HANS HILLERBRAND

DIVORCE

During the sixteenth century, a majority of Protestant authors formulated theological perspectives on divorce that reacted against the Roman Catholic doctrine of the indissolubility of consummated marriages and the accompanying prohibition against remarriage by reinterpreting the biblical testimony and texts from Christian antiquity on the subject. Divorce might be possible, but only on “scriptural grounds.” Protestant writings and ecclesiastical legislation of subsequent generations drew on the work of the reformers, but also took into account the social and political contexts of their own time, thereby gradually moving further away from the Catholic position (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). Because of the increasing secularization of divorce in the West from the seventeenth century onward, ecclesiastical opinions on divorce came to have less of a direct influence on civil laws and practices than in previous years. By the twenty-first century, most Protestant denominations acknowledged divorce to be a regrettable social reality as well as a sign of human fallibility, but nevertheless encouraged full acceptance of the divorced within the Christian community and permitted remarriage within church walls.

Early Protestant Perspectives

Because Protestant writers of the sixteenth century affirmed that MARRIAGE was a divinely ordained institution (although not a sacrament), many were reluctant to take up the topic of divorce and did so only when pressed by pastoral need. Although some Protestants held to the indissolubility of marriage, the greater number rejected the Catholic position, later set down at the Council of Trent, that a validly celebrated and consummated Christian marriage could be dissolved only by the death of a spouse. Among Protestant “dissolubilists” there were two camps: those who interpreted Matthew 5:32 and 19:9 (the “Matthean exception”) to permit divorce only for adultery, and those who allowed for other causes defensible by scripture. Protestants were also critical of the methods that Catholics used for circumventing the indissolubility of marriage by allowing for dispensations and annulments granted by ecclesiastical authorities. Annulment could be obtained, for example, in cases of marriage with an unbeliever by citing the so-called “Pauline privilege” (privilegium Pauli) of 1 Corinthians 7:15, and in marriages in which diriment (nullifying) impediments could be identified, such as a union falling within certain degrees of consanguinity or affinity, marriage by coercion, impotence, or a previous marriage or espousal. Protestants to varying degrees acknowledged that certain impediments could warrant divorce, but limited them to those with “scriptural” precedent.

The term “divorce” (divortium) was used in a variety of senses during the sixteenth century. It could refer to the legal dissolution of the marriage bond (a vinculo matrimonii) that could enable a former spouse or spouses to contract a new—and legally valid—marriage. Temporary or permanent restrictions, such as a delay of at least nine months for a woman to ensure there was no pregnancy, might be imposed on those wishing to remarry. The term could mean judicial separation literally from “bed and board” (a mensa et thoro), by which a couple legally might live apart physically although they were still married by law. Numerous Protestant commentators who were persuaded that cohabitation was essential to any definition of marriage challenged this practice. “Divorce” was applied to annulments, though the granting of an annulment assumed that the marriage never existed legally in the first place. For example, the severing of the relationship between KING HENRY VIII and Catherine of Aragon was technically an annulment because of a preexisting impediment of affinity, though the term “divorce” is sometimes used in the historic documents.

In The Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520), MARTIN LUTHER directed his comments toward divorce a vinculo matrimonii. So concerned was he to uphold the scriptural mandate that what God had joined was not to be broken apart (Matthew 19:6) that he stated he preferred bigamy to divorce, and indeed he counseled such for Henry VIII and PHILIP OF HESSE. Unscriptural impediments were no justification for annulling marriages, and those who allowed them were guilty of treason against God. Yet Luther conceded that annulments might be possible in cases of impotence, a previously contracted marriage, and a vow of CELIBACY. Despite his belief that couples ought to make every effort to be reconciled and remain together, Luther recognized that Christ himself had permitted divorce in cases of adultery (Matthew 5:32, 19:9) and that St. Paul had compelled no one, particularly the innocent person in a divorce, to remain unmarried lest that one burn (cf. 1 Corinthians 7:9). He also claimed, hesitatingly, and in reference to the Pauline privilege, that the spouse abandoned by a believer ought to be able to remarry, because the deserter was little more than an unbeliever. Two years later, in his sermon on the “Estate of Marriage,” Luther argued from the basis of Deuteronomy 22:22–24 that the innocent party of a scriptural divorce could remarry because it was as if the adulterer had died (cf. Romans 7:2–3). He also added two more grounds for divorce and remarriage: bodily or natural deficiencies, and refusal to fulfill conjugal duties (cf. 1 Corinthians 7:5). However, when the issue was unreconcilable incompatibility, Luther would allow for divorce but not remarriage.

PHILIPP MELANCHTHON followed his teacher Luther in upholding the sanctity of marriage (“an eternal, inseparable fellowship of one husband and one wife”; Loci Communes, 1555), and in permitting divorce for adultery and for desertion. He relied on Genesis 2:24 (cf. 1 Corinthians 6:16) and an interpretation of sexual chastity to bolster his argument for divorce as a consequence of adultery, and argued that the innocent party should be permitted to remarry. Following the “evidence” of Leviticus 18:29 and 1 Corinthians 6:9–10, the guilty ought to be condemned to death or banished. Justified by the Pauline privilege, he linked desertion with adultery, because those who strayed from home were usually perceived as adulterers. Disease (e.g., leprosy), however, was not a ground for divorce, but rather was to be dealt with by compassion and faithfulness.

HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, on the other hand, did consider contagious diseases to be grounds for the dissolution of the marriage bond. He viewed adultery, following Christ's words in Matthew's Gospel, as the benchmark for permitting divorce, and identified what he perceived as equally or more serious conditions, including disease, impotence, desertion, marriage with an unbeliever, and serious crime, to be sufficient causes as well. Zwingli's views were codified in a 1525 marriage law for Zurich that imposed penalties on those proven of adultery: physical punishment, excommunication, confiscation of property, and, in serious or repeat cases, even death. The marriage tribunal (Ehegericht) of Zurich investigated and considered cases individually, and if attempts at reconciliation failed, reluctantly granted the divorce and allowed the possibility of remarriage. Both the innocent and guilty (but reformed in behavior, as judged by the tribunal) parties were allowed to remarry within certain restrictions. The policy established in Zurich influenced other city-state policies in SWITZERLAND, including Basel's Ehegerichtsordnung of 1533.

Sixteenth-century civil divorce laws in Protestant GERMANY and in Nordic countries were formulated on the basis of Luther's views, although in practice they tended to be more conservative. Even if divorce and remarriage were approved on scriptural grounds, church leaders typically denied a public celebration of a new union in the church building. Adultery and abandonment were justifiable causes for divorce in Württemberg, Nuremberg, and in the Swedish church's 1572 Church Ordinance, which drew on the ordinances of Württemberg as mediated by the laws of Pfalz-Neuberg. The 1572 ordinances, which remained in effect until 1686, permitted divorce only after all avenues for reconciliation had been exhausted, and then granted that both parties could remarry; after 1686, other circumstances, including marital incompatibility, might lead to divorce. In the Kingdom of DENMARK (which in the sixteenth century included NORWAY and Iceland), the 1582 Articles of Marriage recognized under certain conditions adultery and desertion as legitimate grounds, but allowed only the innocent party of adultery to remarry, and then with restrictions. Impotence and disease, if proven to have existed and to have been concealed at the time of the wedding, might effectively nullify the marriage union.

The views on divorce proffered by JOHN CALVIN in his scripture commentaries influenced legislation in Geneva, SCOTLAND, and other Calvinist centers in Europe. In principle, Calvin held to the indissolubility of marriage because of his belief that God ties couples in an unbreakable bond. Yet, drawing on Old and New Testament texts, he made a singular exception when either party violated the union by adultery, and permitted divorce as a substitute for the old COVENANT'S penalty of death. According to Calvin's exegesis of 1 Corinthians 7, divorce might also be possible in situations where an unbelieving spouse deserted the believer by presuming that the deserter was engaged in an adulterous relationship. Other so-called "causes," such as disease or impotence, Calvin found indefensible. Calvin's successor in Geneva, THEODORE BEZA, built on Calvin's position in his Tractatio de repudiis et divortii (1569). Beza upheld the two scripturally sanctioned grounds for divorce and no other: adultery (where he allowed both the guilty and innocent parties to remarry after meeting certain conditions, with the former receiving some type of punishment); and desertion (which he expanded to include situations where both parties are believers and other than religious reasons). The Genevan Ordonnances ecclésiastiques (1561) anticipated Beza's broader understanding of desertion, but made a distinction between willful and unintentional abandonment; different processes were advised depending on the GENDER of the deserting spouse. Adultery could dissolve the marriage (but only when one party was truly innocent), but in practice, punishment was meted out more often than divorce. In Scotland, where JOHN KNOX built on Calvin's teachings, adultery was the sole ground for divorce during the 1560s, but by 1573 willful desertion of four or more years was added as a cause; with both conditions, divorce was granted only after lengthy procedures and with reluctance. Until the 1930s, adultery and desertion remained the only legal grounds for divorce in Scotland.

The radical reformers in general allowed only adultery and a strict reading of the Pauline privilege as causes for divorce. Some Anabaptists (inspired by Ezra 10:11ff) stressed the supremacy of the Christian's union with Christ over any human covenant to the extent that believers were expected to break marriages with non-Anabaptist spouses who hindered religious practices (see ANABAPTISM). Regarding such mixed marriages, the fifth article of the Wismar resolutions (1554) advised that the nonbeliever should initiate any divorce for reasons of faith. The believer could not contract a second marriage until such a time as the former spouse remarried or committed adultery, and only then after consultation with the elders of the congregation. A much more liberal view was taken up by Strassburg Reformer MARTIN BUCER, who added to these two grounds other causes as a consequence of his view that mutual benevolence and companionship were primary in marriage. If these characteristics were absent, then claimed Bucer, there was no marriage—even before the formality of divorce. Continual cohabitation was therefore essential to marriage, unless a calling of God could be discerned. In the section on divorce in De Regno Christi (translated in 1644 by JOHN MILTON as The Judgement of Martin Bucer, Concerning Divorce), Bucer contended that a marriage in which the two were no longer one flesh on account of crime, impotence, mental or physical illness, and emotional or physical abandonment could be severed by mutual consent or by repudiation. Divorce was deemed a remedy instituted by God, and as such, equal opportunity for divorce was to be given to wives and husbands. Nevertheless, the breakdown of a marriage was a serious matter; punishments of varying degrees were given to violators, although remarriage could occur later. Bucer advised church leaders to admonish all parishioners to cultivate their marriages according to godly precepts to stave off discord.

Although Bucer influenced the REFORMATION in ENGLAND, his permissive policy on divorce was not formally taken up there. Indeed, the CHURCH OF ENGLAND officially adhered to the indissolubility of marriage and would not recognize divorce (a vinculo) legislation until the mid-nineteenth century, although from the 1670s a private Act of Parliament could be granted in individual cases that dissolved the marriage bond and allowed remarriage. Despite the church's legal stance, certain English theologians, among them WILLIAM TYNDALE, Thomas Becon, and John Hooper, argued from the Matthean exception that adultery could justify dissolution of the marriage, though each interpreted the conditions and consequences required differently; Tyndale also cited the Pauline privilege (coupled with 1 Timothy 5:8) for desertion. The Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, drafted by commission in 1552 with the first printed edition in 1571, provided for divorce a vinculo in cases of adultery, desertion, hostility, and ill-treatment, and condemned as unscriptural and confusing the practice of separation a mensa et thoro. Never ratified, the Reformatio Legum nonetheless articulated the opinions of numerous bishops and divines during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Even so, the approved Canons of 1604 concerning divorce did not permit divorce a vinculo or remarriage, but did recognize judicial separation. By the end of the seventeenth century, separation a mensa et thoro granted by the ecclesiastical court was usually expected before further proceedings that could lead to dissolution by Parliamentary action.

By the end of the sixteenth century, most Protestant countries had legalized divorce for specified conditions, with adultery and abandonment most often the grounds identified. Fornication and desertion remained the only causes for divorce a vinculo until well into the eighteenth century in some locations, whereas in others civil legislation expanded the list of causes. Such was not the case in England, where the Church of England maintained its stance on the indissolubility of marriage. Lively debates continued at length throughout the seventeenth century as some theologians by tract and treatise reinforced the indissolubilist position, whereas others took the Continental dissolubilist approach that adultery alone or with desertion stood as legitimate scriptural grounds. Within the Puritan wing of ANGLICANISM, this range of opinions was evident. Robert Cleaver claimed that besides death, only adultery could sever the marriage bond, because it broke the covenant that God had witnessed. WILLIAM PERKINS added desertion, because a spouse who abandoned another was to his mind no Christian. William Whately, who in a 1617 sermon admitted the possibility for divorce on account of adultery, unchastity, and the unwillingness to perform certain marital duties, seven years later reversed his opinion and denied any grounds for divorce. John Milton published three treatises on divorce between 1643 and 1645 in addition to Bucer's text. Not surprisingly, Milton expressed views similar to Bucer, although he was not as egalitarian along the lines of gender as was the older theologian. Milton's liberal position never found legal expression in his own day. In fact, during the periods of the English CIVIL WAR and the interregnum, no legislation regarding divorce was enacted by Cromwell's government save for the 1650 Adultery Act, which made fornication a capital offense. Across the Atlantic, however, Puritans in New England legalized divorce through civil courts from the 1620s (see PURITANISM).

The Secularization of Divorce

Starting in the seventeenth century, church courts, many of which had been established during the Reformation to deal with matrimonial matters in Protestant countries and states, began to become more limited in their dealings or to be eliminated entirely. Secular civil governments and their courts increasingly determined the principles that would procure divorces for the population. In some contexts, churches and denominations were able to continue to exert an influence on legislation and policy, particularly where CLERGY were members of the legislative bodies, lay legislators brought their church's teachings to bear in civic matters, or civil governments found it politic to be attentive to churchly opinion. In other situations, no such partnership or toleration existed, or it persisted for only a short duration. Many German states in the 1870s, for example, followed the Prussian divorce code that went well beyond Luther's conditions for divorce and included such causes as incurable madness, defamation of the spouse's character, conviction for a felony, drunkenness, and extravagance.

In tandem with this shift away from ecclesiastical pressure on civil law, or perhaps as a result of it, writings on divorce relied less on the teachings of scripture and the arguments of past generations of Protestant theologians and more on interpretations of contract theory and natural law as well as on social expediency. Discourse and debate on divorce was taken up predominantly outside of the church by writers who might give a cursory nod to the biblical witness or to the prevailing theological stance of the region. Notable and influential secular authors on divorce included SAMUEL PUFENDORF and CHRISTIAN THOMASIVS in Germany and JOHN LOCKE, DAVID HUME, Daniel Defoe, and Caleb Fleming in England. Protestant theological writings on marriage and divorce continued to be produced, though in much lesser quantity than in the sixteenth century. The exception was in England, where throughout the seventeenth century writers persisted in debates. Thereafter the number of theological treatises published declined significantly, and sometimes they were included within wider discussions on canon law and on the THEOLOGY and practices of the ancient church.

Discussions regarding divorce continued in England during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries as the Church of England dealt with the reality that Parliament was granting divorces a vinculo—especially for the wealthy—in ever-increasing numbers. With successful petitions for divorce came a sense of threat to the sanctity of marriage as well as the prospect of requests for remarriages solemnized by church officiants. Dissolubilist and indissolubilist opinions by Anglicans and Dissenters (and by Catholics) circulated in essays and printed sermons as a succession of divorce-related bills were introduced to the House of Lords and House of Commons. In 1857, Parliament decreed that divorce could be obtained through a secular court of divorce for reason of adultery in the case of a wife and for adultery with aggravating circumstances (e.g., incest, bigamy, cruelty, or desertion) by the husband; no involvement in an ecclesiastical court was expected in the process. It was also determined that although an incumbent could object to solemnizing the remarriage of the guilty party of a divorce (and in such a case he should allow a willing clergyman to officiate in his stead), he could not oppose the remarriage of the innocent spouse. Not surprisingly, this decree drew mixed reactions. Numerous theologians, bishops, and clergy welcomed the Matrimonial Causes Act, among them FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, Christopher Wordsworth, and William Bright. Others raised objections to the new civil policy, including Tractarian JOHN KEBLE, who posited that distinctions existed between churchly and secular marriages (the former, as “blessed in heaven,” was indissoluble). Although most English Protestant writers approved of divorce within the bounds of the Matthean exception, the indissolubilist position was still championed, especially by Anglo-Catholics (see ANGLLO-CATHOLICISM).

At the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth century, the indissolubilist interpretation was strengthened by developments in biblical criticism that gave historical and literary precedence to the Gospel of Mark. Neither Mark (10:11–12) nor Luke (16:18) identifies adultery as a cause for divorce; this cause is found only in the Matthean exception, which some scholars came to consider a secondary gloss on the original text and hence a corruption of what was said by the Lord himself. Questions about biblical interpretation generated the publication of books and articles on the subject of divorce (and marriage) at a time that was also marked by an accelerating divorce rate that became of great concern in both ecclesiastical and civil ranks. Even into the twenty-first century, theologians and church leaders within the Church of England have continued the debate on what were (if any) legitimate grounds for divorce, and what the church's ministry should be to the divorced and to those who seek the church's blessing on a second marriage.

Ecclesiastical Perspectives and Practices

No Protestant DENOMINATION takes delight at the dissolution of a marriage. However, different responses to marital breakdown are registered among the denominations, and even within a single ecclesiastical communion. Historical and current theological reflection affect a denomination's understanding of divorce, as do contemporary approaches to biblical exegesis and interpretation. Social contexts and pressures, civil laws, and customs also have an influence, whether the denomination chooses to accommodate to them or to be countercultural.

The ASSEMBLIES OF GOD ("Divorce and Remarriage," 1973) discourages divorce because of their belief that God hates divorce (cf. Malachi 2:16) and that nothing should separate those joined in matrimony (Matthew 19:6). When both spouses are professing Christians, divorce is not an option (1 Corinthians 7:10–11). However, when one spouse is an unbeliever, divorce is possible in situations in which the unbeliever is guilty of adultery or abandonment, although reconciliation is considered the better course. Under these circumstances, the divorced believer may remarry, but only with a Christian.

Because God instituted marriage and abhors divorce, the Lutheran Church of Australia ("Marriage, Divorce, and Re-Marriage," 2001) recognizes that divorce may be possible, but only in cases of unchastity and willful separation. If a divorced person made an attempt toward reconciliation in the previous marriage, repented of his or her part in its failure, and now expresses the desire to begin a new marriage on a Christian foundation, then a pastor may officiate at the second wedding. The EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA ("A Message on Sexuality," 1996) holds to the permanence of marriage and acknowledges divorce to be the result of human sinfulness, though without specifying particular grounds. The divorced are to be cared for compassionately and given the opportunity for a new relationship by remarriage after counsel by the pastor or other professionals.

Although permanency in marriage is demanded of Christ's disciples, the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA ("Divorce," 2002) recognizes that persistent SIN may rend the union asunder. Because marital breakdown is the result of sin, the church's ministry must be one of reconciliation and, when necessary, of discipline (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). In addition, the church is called on to care for the divorced and their children. The church's stance on remarriage is situational: "The church should neither issue a clear prohibition against remarriage nor attempt to list with legal precision the circumstances under which remarriage does not conflict with biblical teaching. The church must apply biblical principles to concrete situations in the light of its best understanding of what happened in a particular divorce and what is being planned for a particular remarriage." A minister of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, at his or her discretion, may conduct the marriage of a divorced person whose former spouse still lives.

Within the Anglican community, the Church of the Province of New Zealand in 1970 permitted the remarriage of a divorced person in the church whose former spouse was still living. The General Synod of the Church of England in 2002 allowed the same but only in "exceptional circumstances," and left the decision whether or not to solemnize the new union to the individual ministers. Despite this option, marriage was still affirmed as a "solemn, public and lifelong covenant"—indissoluble, in the sense that unconditional promises are made for life.

In recognition of the need for pastoral care at the time of divorce, some denominations have proposed rituals that include one or both spouses. The UNITED METHODIST CHURCH published an experimental "Rituals with the Divorced" in 1976 that drew a largely negative response from members and nonmembers alike. However, convinced that some resource was needed, the denomination included in its 1992 Book of Worship a prayer ("...grant forgiveness for what is past and growth in all that makes for new life") and selected scripture lessons in a section on healing services. Other Protestant denominations have similarly included prayers or blessings for those with marital difficulties or for the divorced in service books published since the 1990s.

References and Further Reading

- Eells, Hastings. The Attitude of Martin Bucer Toward the Bigamy of Philip of Hesse. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1924; London: Oxford University Press, 1924.
- Ellingsen, Mark. The Cutting Edge: How Churches Speak on Social Issues. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications and Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, for the Institute for Ecumenical Research, Strasbourg, France, 1993, esp. pp. 80–86.
- Guerry, Edward B. The Historic Principle of the Indissolubility of Marriage: According to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Anglican Communion. Sewanee, TN: University Press, University of the South, 1953.
- Johnson, James Turner. A Society Ordained by God: English Puritan Marriage Doctrine in the First Half of the Seventeenth Century. New York: Abingdon Press, 1970.
- Kingdon, Robert M. Adultery and Divorce in Calvin's Geneva. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Phillips, Roderick. Putting Asunder: A History of Divorce in Western Society. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Safley, Thomas Max. Let No Man Put Asunder: The Control of Marriage in the German Southwest.

A Comparative Study, 1550–1600. Kirksville, MO: Sixteenth Century Journal Publishers, 1984.
Winnett, Arthur Robert. Divorce and Remarriage in Anglicanism. London: Macmillan, 1958.

See also doctrinal statements posted on denominational websites.

KAREN B. WESTERFIELD TUCKER

DOCTRINE

Doctrine, meaning teaching, is an elastic term: its range of use extends from the most solemn determination of ecumenical councils concerning indispensable dogma (“the doctrine of the Trinity”) through a body of tenets and beliefs characteristic of one ecclesiastical community (“reformed doctrine”) to the views of a single theologian on a particular topic (“Pannenberg’s doctrine of the last things”).

The sixteenth-century reformers sought to purify the Western Church from inherited accretions and distortions, and to concentrate, correctively and positively, on the essentials of the Gospel. In the face of tradition their formal principle of doctrine was Scripture, even though “sola Scriptura” as a formula may belong to later generations of Protestant ORTHODOXY. In the face of SALVATION as human achievement, the Reformers’ material principle of doctrine was salvation as divine gift, solely on the merits of Christ (propter Christum solum), sheerly by GRACE (sola gratia), received through FAITH alone (sola fide); these are the “exclusive particles” of which the Lutheran Formula of Concord (1580) speaks in connection with “the righteousness of faith before God” (Epitome, III.7; Solid Declaration, III).

Scripture as Formal Principle of Doctrine

In the Formula of Concord, Holy Scripture is affirmed as the sole judge (iudex, Richter), rule (regula, Regel), plumb-line (Richtschnur), and touchstone (Probersteiri) by which “all doctrines should and must be known and judged as good or evil, right or wrong” (Epitome, 3): “We believe, teach, and confess that the prophetic and apostolic writings of the Old and New Testaments are the only norm according to which all doctrines and teachers alike must be measured and judged, as it is written, ‘Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path’ (Psalm 119:105); and St. Paul says, ‘Even if an angel from heaven came and preached any other gospel, let him be accursed’ (Galatians 1:8)” (Epitome, 1). Confessions in the Reformed (“Calvinist”) line typically insist on the divine inspiration of Scripture: “We believe and confess the canonical Scriptures of the holy prophets and apostles of both Testaments to be the true Word of God, and to have sufficient authority of themselves, not of men. For God himself spoke to the fathers, prophets, and apostles, and still speaks to us through the Holy Scriptures” (Second HELVETIC CONFESSION, 1566, ch. 1).

The degree to which beliefs and practices must be explicitly revealed and authorized in Scripture has sometimes been controversial. Regarding the law of WORSHIP: whereas MARTIN LUTHER allowed hymns “of human composition,” Calvinists for long sang only biblical psalms and canticles, and the English Puritans in their “Admonition to the Parliament” of 1572 even objected to antiphonal recitation as “tossing the psalms like tennis balls.” Regarding the law of belief: JOHN CALVIN could wish that the terms “Trinity” and “person” were buried, provided that those who objected to them—as absent from Scripture and “fashioned by the human mind”—agreed on “the faith that Father, Son, and Spirit are one God, yet the Son is not the Father, nor the Spirit the Son, but that they are differentiated by their particular characteristics”; but in fact, in the face of HERESY, these terms could and should be used as “explaining nothing else than what is attested and sealed by Scripture” (Institutes I.13.3–5). JOHN WESLEY, in his sermon “On the Trinity,” declared that he “dare not insist” on others’ using those terms, although he used them himself “without scruple” and looked in substance for a fully trinitarian faith. On the whole, classical Protestantism has been content with the primacy or supremacy of Scripture, allowing for variety in “indifferent” matters (ADIA-PHORA) and for the reflective deduction of doctrines from a scriptural basis, especially where these encapsulate in summary form the complex biblical witness or are necessary to avert its misapprehension.

All Protestants assert the “sufficiency” of Scripture, in the sense that it “containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that is should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation” (Church of England, Article VI).

When read in the same Spirit as they were written, the Scriptures are considered to be in principle “perspicuous.” Nevertheless, MATTHIAS FLACIUS (Illyricus), in his Clavis Sacrae Scripturae (1567), acknowledges the difficulties that sometimes occur in the understanding of Scripture: the presence of foreign idioms and literary conventions; the occasional character of the writings; some seeming contradictions in them; the fact that in this life we see God and his mysteries only “in aenigmate” The central clue to understanding Scripture resides in knowing “our sickness and Christ as our physician.” Crucial is the relation and distinction that Scripture itself establishes between law and gospel: the law drives us to Christ as the way to the eternal life that the law could only promise but never, because of our SIN, deliver. Flacius points to the many pieces of procedural advice that the Scriptures themselves offer for their own understanding. Nor does the Holy Spirit disdain the use of exegetical rules for the sake of clarity; and, following a notion and practice that goes back at least to St. Augustine, Johann Gerhard of Jena (1582–1637), in the first volume of his Loci Theologici (1610), sets out in technical form quite a list of them in the course of 229 paragraphs “on the interpretation of Scripture.” The main points are: Scripture should be understood from within itself; all interpretation should be governed by “the rule of faith,” which consists in the Apostles’ Creed, as itself an excellent summary of sacred doctrine drawn from Scripture, and in the Decalogue, which together compose “the form of sound words in the faith and love of Christ” (cf. II Timothy 1:13); the less clear texts are to be illuminated on the basis of the clearer, on the assumption that there will be no contradiction between them; a knowledge of grammar, rhetoric, argument, and the original languages is called for; attention must be paid to the larger context and the particular circumstances of a passage as well as its aim; dogmas and requisites for salvation can be established only from the clearer passages and their proper and primary sense. Both Flacius and Gerhard insist that a fruitful reading of the Scriptures requires PRAYER, assiduous study, and spiritual discipline. Scholars have the responsibility of providing good translations and faithful interpretations for the benefit of those who lack learning (see BIBLE TRANSLATION).

So vital is the Scripture principle for self-conscious Reformation Protestants that Gerhard Ebeling, for example, could define “church history as the history of the exegesis of Holy Scripture” (1946; in idem, Wort Gottes und Tradition: Studien zu einer Hermeneutik der Konfessionen, Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht 1964:9–27). Doctrinal history is a story neither of continuous decline nor of continuous development but rather of the decisions of the church in ever renewed attempts to understand and expound Holy Scripture (W.Schneemelcher). Dogma, according to KARL BARTH, is properly “the agreement of the Church’s proclamation with the revelation to which Holy Scripture testifies” (Kirchliche Dogmatik I/1:280; Church Dogmatics I/1:304).

Subsidiary Standards

The Protestant Reformers acknowledged the utility of subsidiary standards of doctrine—“normae normatae,” themselves governed by Scripture—to safeguard the scriptural message and faith, especially on controversial points.

Thus the Formula of Concord: “Immediately after the time of the apostles, indeed already during their lifetime, false teachers and heretics arose. Against these the primitive Church composed symbols, i.e. brief and explicit confessions, which were accepted as the unanimous, catholic, Christian faith and the confession of the orthodox and true Church, namely, the Apostles’ Creed, the Nicene Creed, and the Athanasian Creed. We publicly pledge ourselves to these, and we hereby reject all heresies and all teachings that have ever been introduced into the Church contrary to them” (Epitome, 2).

Similarly, in regard to contemporary controversies, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION of 1530 and the SMALKALD ARTICLES of 1537 are affirmed as “the unanimous consensus and exposition of our Christian faith” (ibid., 3). Because these matters affected “the laity and the salvation of their souls,” the signatories of the BOOK OF CONCORD also endorsed Luther’s Small and Large Catechisms, interestingly characterized as “the Laypeople’s Bible,” in which “is briefly comprehended everything that is treated at greater length in Holy Scripture and which a Christian must know for his eternal salvation” (ibid.). Among Lutheran churches the Augsburg Confession has enjoyed a more wide-spread recognition than any other of the sixteenth-century documents, equaled perhaps only by the Small Catechism.

On the Reformed side also, subsidiary standards took shape as CONFESSIONS and CATECHISMS, each bearing strong family resemblances, even though locally formulated. The Second Helvetic Confession of 1566 may be taken as representative also of others that included the First Helvetic (1536), the GALLICAN (1559), the BELGIC (1561), the Scots (1560), and the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION (1647). Whereas the confessions used technical language, the catechisms were more pastorally oriented. Thus the first two items in the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM of 1563:

Q. What is thy only comfort in life and in death?

A. That I, with body and soul, both in life and in death, am not my own, but belong to my faithful Savior Jesus Christ, who with his precious blood has fully satisfied for all my sins, and redeemed me from all the power of the devil; and so preserves me that without the will of my Father in heaven not a hair can fall from my head; yea, that all things must work together for my salvation. Wherefore, by his Holy Spirit, he also assures me of eternal life, and makes me heartily willing and ready henceforth to live unto him.

Q. How many things are necessary for thee to know, that thou in this comfort mayest live and die happily?

A. Three things: First, the greatness of my sin and misery; second, how I am redeemed from all my sins and misery; third, how I am to be thankful to God for such redemption.

The CHURCH OF ENGLAND included catechisms in the successive versions of its BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER (1549, 1552, 1559, 1604, 1662), and considerable doctrinal AUTHORITY was vested in the Prayer Book itself as providing “an Order for Prayer, and for the reading of the holy Scripture, much agreeable to the mind and purpose of the old Fathers,” such that “nothing is ordained to be read but the very pure Word of God, the holy Scriptures, or that which is agreeable to the same” (“Concerning the Service of the Church”). The English Articles of Religion (1571) mention the two Books of Homilies of 1547 and 1571 as containing “a godly and wholesome Doctrine, and necessary for these times” (Article 35); and Article 11 declares “justification by faith alone” to be “a most wholesome Doctrine, and very full of comfort, as is more largely expressed in the Homily of Justification [no. 3 in the First Book].”

John Wesley abridged the Anglican Articles of Religion for the Methodists in North America, and his version retains its constitutional authority in the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. The most widespread subsidiary standards in worldwide METHODISM, however, are Wesley’s Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament (1755) and the first four volumes of his Sermons (1746–1770), which the 1932 constitution of the Methodist Church of Great Britain states “are not intended to impose a system of formal or speculative theology on Methodist Preachers, but to set up standards of preaching and belief which should secure loyalty to the fundamental truths of the Gospel of Redemption and ensure the continued witness of the Church to the realities of the Christian experience of salvation” (Deed of Union, clause 30). In practice Methodism, perhaps more than any other church, has treated hymnody as an informal instrument of doctrine. In his preface to A Collection of Hymns for the Use of the People

Called Methodists (1780), Wesley claimed that the hymnal contained “all the most important truths of our most holy religion, whether speculative or practical,” “a distinct and full account of scriptural Christianity (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS).”

Justification as Material Principle of Doctrine

The classical reformers all took for granted—as undisputed with Rome and as evidence of their own apostolicity and catholicity—the trinitarian and christological determinations of the ecumenical councils of Nicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, as enshrined in the early creeds and definitions (thus the Augsburg Confession, 1 and 3; Second Helvetic Confession, 3 and 11; Anglican Articles 1–2, 5, and 8). It was over the understanding of salvation—its nature, its mediation, and its location—that the crunch came with the papal church.

The Augsburg Confession, in its article 4 on justification, declares that “we cannot obtain forgiveness of sin and righteousness before God by our own merits, works or satisfactions, but we receive forgiveness of sin and become righteous before God by grace, for Christ’s sake, through faith, when we believe that Christ suffered for us and that for his sake our sin is forgiven and righteousness and eternal life are given to us, for God will regard and reckon this faith as righteousness, as St. Paul says in Romans 3 and 4.” In the Anglican Articles concerning “the office and work of Christ, or our redemption,” similar teaching on JUSTIFICATION is called “the first and chief article,” in which “nothing can be given up or compromised, even if heaven and earth and things temporal should be destroyed,” for “on this article rests all that we teach and practice against the pope, the devil, and the world.” Luther himself called justification “the lord, ruler, and judge of every kind of doctrine, which preserves and governs all Christian teaching” (WA 39/I:205), and “when this article stands, the Church stands; when it falls, the Church falls” (WA 40/111:352). Calvin considered a proper doctrine of justification “the principal article of the Christian religion,” and he stated its importance existentially: “Unless you first of all grasp what your relationship to God is, and the nature of his judgment concerning you, you have neither a foundation on which to establish your salvation nor one on which to build piety toward God” (Institutes III. 11.1).

Although none perhaps has insisted on it with such single-mindedness as the Lutherans, other Protestant churches also teach justification by grace alone through faith alone, as in chapter 15 of the Second Helvetic Confession and article 11 of the English Articles of Religion. For Lutherans, Reformed, and Anglicans alike, these articles are accompanied by teaching on original and actual sin (which call for a redemption that human beings can in no way achieve for themselves) and on the good works that are the proper fruit of justification, but never its meritorious cause (Augsburg Confession, 2 and 6, then 18–19 and 20; Second Helvetic Confession, 8–9 and 16; Anglican Articles, 9–10 and 12–14). The Second Helvetic Confession (10) and the Anglican Articles (17) also teach in this connection “predestination to life” and “election of the saints.”

Soteriology is intrinsically connected with ecclesiology. The Augsburg Confession speaks first of the ministerial function of the church: “To bring about such faith [as to receive justification], God has instituted the office of preaching [Predigtamt; ministerium ecclesiasticum], to teach the Gospel and to provide the Sacraments. For through the Word and the Sacraments, as by instruments, God gives the Holy Spirit, who works faith, where and when he pleases, in those who hear the Gospel” (article 5). Only then is “the one holy Church, which will endure for ever” defined as “the gathering [congregatio; Versammlung] of saints [sanctorum] or all believers [aller Gläubigen],” in which—precisely—“the Gospel is purely taught [docetur] or preached [gepredigt] and the Sacraments are administered rightly [recte] or according to the Gospel [lauts des Evangelii]” (article 7). Similarly, Anglican Article 19 defines “the visible Church of Christ” as “a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ’s ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same.” The Second Helvetic Confession begins its description of the church thus: “Forasmuch as God from the beginning would have men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth [1 Timothy 2:4], it is necessary that there always should have been, and should be at this day, and to the end of the world, a Church—that is, a company of the faithful called and gathered out of the world; a communion of all saints, that is, of them who truly know and rightly worship and serve the true God, in Jesus Christ the Savior, by the word of the Holy Spirit, and who by faith are partakers of all those good graces which are freely offered through Christ” (17).

According to the Augsburg Confession, “it is sufficient for the true unity of the Christian Church that the Gospel be preached according to a pure understanding of it and that the sacraments be administered in accordance with the divine Word [so the German; the Latin has: it is enough to agree (consentire) concerning the preaching of the Gospel and the administration of the sacraments]. It is not necessary for the true unity of the Christian Church that [Latin: traditions or rites or] ceremonies, instituted by men, should be observed uniformly in all places” (7). The English (Article 34) and the Swiss agree that uniformity of rites and ceremonies is not necessary: “The truth and unity of the Church consists...not in outward rites and ceremonies, but rather in the truth and unity of the catholic faith. This catholic faith is not taught us by the ordinances or laws of men, but by the holy Scriptures, a compendious and short sum whereof is the Apostles’ Creed.... The true unity of the Church consists in several points of doctrine, in the true and uniform preaching of the Gospel, and in such rites as the Lord himself has expressly set down” (Second Helvetic, 17). It is this last principle that leads the Reformers to include in their subsidiary standards teaching on the dominical sacraments of baptism and the Lord’s Supper (Augsburg Confession, 9–13, 22, 24; Second Helvetic, 19–21; Anglican Articles, 25–31).

Doctrine and Community

FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, in The Christian Faith (2nd edition, 1830–1831), famously defined “dogmatic theology” as “the science which systematizes the doctrine prevalent in a Christian church at a given time” (section 19). That definition prompts the questions of the senses in which doctrine itself may be descriptive or prescriptive or both, and of whether doctrine, even in a particular community, may shift over time.

The question of description or prescription obliges us to examine who, in the living church, are the bearers of the faith that intends conformity to the documents regarded as authoritative, both Scripture and subsidiary texts, whether these are functioning as sources or as criteria. Because the Holy Spirit is the final instance of Christian teaching (John 14:26; 16:13–15), there is a strong scriptural case to be made for all who have been anointed with the Spirit of truth (I Corinthians 2:4–16; I John 2:20f., 27). From New Testament times, however, there have also been “pastors and teachers” (Ephesians 4:11) with special responsibilities within the believing community (for “teachers,” cf. also I Corinthians 12:28f.; I Timothy 2:7; II Timothy 1:11; James 3:1), as well as “bishops (episkopoi)” (Philippians 1:1), who should be “apt teachers” (I Timothy 3:1f; cf. Titus 1:7–14), and “elders (presbyteroi)” who “oversee the flock and feed the church of God” (Acts 20:17–28) and “labor in the word and doctrine” (I Timothy 5:17).

The CONFESSION OF AUGSBURG declares that “nobody should publicly teach or preach or administer the sacraments in the church without a regular call” (14); but Lutheran churches have, on the whole, placed less constitutional significance on particular structures of ecclesiastical governance and ministry than either Anglicans or the Reformed have invested in the episcopal or presbyterian patterns they have respectively found in the New Testament. All Protestant churches in practice agree that some human instances are needed to arouse and sustain faith in the congregations, to guide their fellow believers in Christian truth, and to correct those who err. Protestant bodies have tended to synodical organization for units wider than the local congregation. Concomitant with the rise and spread of modern democracy, lay persons have increasingly participated in various ways with the ordained in the pastoral and doctrinal government of the Protestant churches, so that the sharper distinctions between the teachers and the taught have yielded in varying degrees to an interaction in which all may from the start both learn and instruct.

Although anything like “professional theologians” can scarcely be found in the earliest church, Protestantism from its beginnings inherited this medieval development from the universities and schools. Protestant churches recognize a vocation to intellectual theological work as a principal occupation, usually carried out in conjunction with teaching future pastors. Theologians are concerned for the fidelity and internal consistency of doctrine as well as the faith’s communicability. WOLFHART PANNENBERG, perhaps the most considerable Protestant theologian in the generations since Karl Barth, reckons the perennial task of systematic theology to be the critical construction of coherent models of reality that at least render plausible—without yet fully and finally proving its truth—the Christian confession of the Triune God as the creator, sustainer, redeemer, and final savior of the world. Theologians vary in the weight and roles they allow, in the interactive task, to the scriptural and ecclesiastical givens (the “message”) and to the ambient culture (the “addressees”). Tensions may occur between the intellectual freedom claimed by academic theologians as necessary to their work and the concern of the church’s pastoral governance for the stability of communal belief systems; but in principle all seek to subserve the veracity of the Christian faith and the authenticity of its proclamation. The sense of human fallibility affecting any particular instance of teaching is countered by confidence in the abiding power of God's Word to strike home.

Protestant churches have solemnly rejected what they consider false teachings, from the sixteenth-century anathemas to the "Verwerfungen" of the BARMEN DECLARATION of 1934 against the positions of the so-called GERMAN CHRISTIANS. They have sometimes deposed their own pastors and teachers for heresy, when stubbornly persisted in. Very rarely are laypeople excommunicated for mistaken beliefs. Moral discipline is seldom exercised today in the larger churches, although some smaller communities such as the MENNONITES still practice fraternal admonition and suspension from privileges.

Historical Shifts?

Suspicious of what he called "cognitive propositionalism," George Lindbeck, in his much noticed book The Nature of Doctrine (1984), put less emphasis on the substantive content of doctrines than on their function as "rules of speech" within an ecclesial community (a "cultural-linguistic" approach); he considered "dogmas" to be irreversible as long as the conditions of their original formulation obtained. History does, however, bring changes in social, cultural, intellectual, and ecclesiastical conditions, and Protestantism has certainly experienced shifts at least in theological fashion, whose effects on the interpretation of formal doctrine have been considerable, even where the official primary and subsidiary standards have remained in place.

The Protestant centuries have seen the development of certain elements that may have been present in the REFORMATION but were later joined by other factors to produce shifts in emphasis and in the overall configuration of the faith. Like the concomitant Renaissance, the Reformation may be understood in part as the contestation of inherited authorities. Thus the attention to the subjective "faith by which one believes" could turn toward INDIVIDUALISM, such that, on the ENLIGHTENMENT front, GOTTFRIED E. WILHELM LESSING could view the right to private judgment as an outworking of Luther's concerns, especially when supported by confidence in universal "reason" (Luther's attacks on reason would have really been directed only against late medieval scholasticism); and on the PI-ETISM front, the "religion of the heart" could elevate "personal experience" over a "dead orthodoxy" and lead, ecclesilogically, to the self-grouping of "real Christians" somehow distinct from the nominal. The rejection of "the authority of the past" found intellectual expression in historicism, whereby previous achievements were subjected to criticism on the basis of "modern" criteria. The "historical conditioning" of both Scripture and tradition was highlighted in such a way as to make their deconstruction possible and their reconstruction necessary: thus the rejection of "miracle" and much else in the biblical texts, and a program such as that of RUDOLF BULTMANN in favor of "demythologization" and an "existential" restatement of the Gospel; or a reading of "the history of dogma" like ADOLF VON HARNACK'S, which evaluated negatively the early "hellenization" of the Gospel and prompted attempts to "de-metaphysicalize" Christianity. Viewing these moves as reductionistic, some Protestants have swung to an extreme reaction in the form of “FUNDAMENTALISM,” reminiscent in some ways of “Scripture alone,” but now characterized by a “literalistic” reading that often fails to acknowledge the complexity of the Bible, its multiplicity of literary and rhetorical genres, and its traditionally proven openness to constructive interpretation in different senses that do not derogate from its authority and salvific functioning.

Not all developments in Protestant doctrine have stood in such problematic relation to the efforts made in the sixteenth century to reform the (Western) Church. Various movements have sought to rejoin the magisterial reformers in the advocacy of a scriptural Christianity that does not forfeit the catholicity embodied in authentic tradition. Among Anglicans, in particular, a steady stream of patristic scholarship has helped maintain continuity with early Christian doctrine. The twentieth century saw “Luther revivals” of various kinds (KARL HOLL and G.Ebeling in the first and second halves of the century in GERMANY; T. Mannermaa toward its end in FINLAND). Karl Barth, and such pupils as T.F.Torrance, revitalized the classic Reformed tradition, and Barth’s influence in particular extended through wider swathes of Protestantism and even beyond. Attention to Wesley as theologian on the part of such scholars as G.C.Cell, A.C.Outler, and C.W.Williams gave some credibility to the Methodists’ claim of him as their guide to “plain old Christianity.” A doxological approach to doctrine (E.Schlink; J.-J.von Allmen), taken in conjunction with liturgical reform and renewal, has encouraged both Protestants and Roman Catholics to find common ground in worship that is both nourished by the BIBLE and shaped according to patristic patterns. Ecumenical concerns have in fact assumed increasing prominence in Protestantism over the past several generations as part of the broader search for unity in a historically divided Christendom.

Ecumenical Dialogues

In the twentieth century ecumenically minded Protestants engaged energetically in “doctrinal dialogues (Lehrgespräche)” (see DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL ECUMENICAL AGREEMENTS). In Europe, the most significant intra-Protestant case focused on the LORD’S SUPPER, a contentious issue since the MARBURG COLLOQUY between Luther and HULDRYCH ZWINGLI in 1529: the agreement between German Lutherans and Reformed on the Arnoldshain Theses of 1957 was consolidated over a broader range of topics and on a wider geographical basis in the Leuenberg Concordat of 1973, and the Leuenberg Church Fellowship has more recently included Methodist churches also. British Anglican churches have produced in doctrinal dialogue with the Evangelical Church in Germany the Meissen Agreement (1988–1991), and with Scandinavian and Baltic churches the Porvoo Agreement (1992–1996), the latter of which was considered sufficient for the establishment of full communion. In North America doctrinal dialogues have achieved sufficient agreement for Lutherans to enter into official communion with both Reformed and Anglicans. The principal Protestant families of churches have, in many countries and globally, engaged in doctrinal dialogue with the Orthodox churches (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN) and especially, in view of Western history, with the Roman Catholic Church. In this last case, the most dramatic result was the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (1998–1999), officially signed between the Roman Catholic Church and the churches of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION: it formally states that the mutual condemnations of the sixteenth century do not touch the common and respective teachings of the two parties as they are now formulated in the document itself; and the consequences of this settlement regarding a key doctrine are awaited for other doctrinal and ecclesiological matters that have been controversial, and even divisive, between Protestants and Roman Catholics (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). In multilateral ECUMENISM, Protestant churches have engaged energetically in the Faith and Order movement, whose principal achievement was the “convergence text” on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry issuing from the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES’ commission at Lima, Peru, in 1982.

References and Further Reading

- Andresen, Carl, ed. Handbuch der Dogmen- und Theologiegeschichte. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1982 [Especially vol. 2 (“Die Lehrentwicklung im Rahmen der Konfessionalität”)].
- Barth, Karl. Kirchliche Dogmatik I/1–IV/4. Munich, Germany: Kaiser; Zurich, Switzerland: EVZ, 1932–1967.
- . Church Dogmatics. Edinburgh: T.&T.Clark, 1936–1969.
- . Die Bekenntnisschriften der Evangelisch-Lutherischen Kirche. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1930.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Edited by John T. McNeill and translated by Ford Lewis Battles. 2 vols. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster, 1960.
- Lindbeck, George A. The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster, 1984.
- McGrath, Alister E. The Genesis of Doctrine. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1990.
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart. Systematische Theologie. 3 vols. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1988–1993.
- . Systematic Theology. 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1991–1998.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav, ed. Creeds and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition. 5 vols. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003 [with an accompanying “historical and theological guide” by Pelikan entitled Credo].
- Schaff, Philip. The Creeds of Christendom with a History and Critical Notes. 3 vols. New York: Harper & Row, 1931 [Especially vol. 3. (“The Evangelical Protestant Churches”)].
- Schneemelcher, W. “Das Problem der Dogmengeschichte.” Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche 48 (1951): 63–89.
- Tappert, Theodore G., ed. and trans. The Book of Concord: The Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1959.
- Wainwright, Geoffrey. Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine and Life. London: Epworth; New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- . Is the Reformation Over? Catholics and Protestants at the Turn of the Millennia. Milwaukee, WI: Marquette University Press, 2000.

Wiles, Maurice F. The Making of Christian Doctrine. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967.

———. The Remaking of Christian Doctrine. London: SCM, 1974.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

DONNE, JOHN (1572–1631)

Anglican theologian, religious author. John Donne was brought up a Roman Catholic (it was rumored that two of his uncles on his mother's side of the family shared between them a relic from the Catholic martyr or English traitor, Sir Thomas More, Donne's greatgreat uncle) and remained keenly conscious of his Catholic heritage. His early years were spent as a student at Oxford and Cambridge, as well as Lincoln's Inn, where he seemed headed for a career as a witty young gallant and a sensual, cynical poet. He traveled broadly in FRANCE and ITALY; was a gentleman adventurer in two of the Earl of Essex's naval expeditions against Spain; worked as secretary for Sir Thomas Egerton, the Lord Keeper; and, after his romantic marriage to Ann More and subsequent disgrace, did backwork for various patrons before finally becoming ordained in 1615. In 1621 Donne was nominated Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral by King James, eventually becoming, along with Launcelot Andrewes, one of the most widely acclaimed preachers of James's reign.

Donne's religious writings fall into three general groups: The first group includes religious lyrics and satires, mostly written during the first decade or so of the seventeenth century. The most famous of these are the "Holy Sonnets," dramatic and intensely personal expressions of anguished guilt and appeals for divine grace and mercy. The second group is a series of occasional prose tracts: Biathanatos (1608), an apologia for suicide; Pseudo-Martyr (1610), a defense of the oath of allegiance; and Ignatius his Conclave (1611), a satire on the Jesuits. The third group includes sermons and other devotional writing. Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624), a series of meditations Donne wrote while dangerously ill, reveals the primary characteristics of all Donne's later religious writings: an intense and very material preoccupation with physical and spiritual sickness; an acute analysis of the often paradoxical psychological urgencies of a mind in turn dejected, turbulent, or exalted. Some 160 of Donne's sermons survive, thirtyfour of them written on the Psalms. Like his Devotions, Donne's sermons are unique in the intensity of their portrait of personal religious experience, and in the consistency of their focus on sickness and sin as the defining condition of human existence.

References and Further Reading

- Carey, John. John Donne: Life, Mind, and Art. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
- Donne, John. The Sermons of John Donne. 10 vols. Edited by George Potter and Evelyn Simpson. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953–1962.
- Shuger, Debora Kuller. Habits of Thought in the English Renaissance. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1997.

A.LEIGH DENEFF

DORT, CANONS OF

The Canons of Dort are an early and important doctrinal statement of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands. The some one hundred delegates to the Synod of Dort drafted and approved the Canons during their 180 sessions at the town of Dordrecht (English Dort) between November 1618 and May 1619. Also known as the Five Articles against the Remonstrants (see REMONSTRANTS), they were prepared in response to the theological challenge posed by the followers of JACOB ARMINIUS (1559–1609). The controversy focused above all on the question of PREDESTINATION. Yet it soon encompassed other doctrinal issues, including the character and extent of ATONEMENT, human corruption and depravity, the nature of divine GRACE, and the possibility of a total fall from grace. The dispute, which had smoldered within the Dutch Reformed community for some time, erupted in 1604. The Canons themselves were a vigorous, point-by-point refutation and response to a subsequent 1610 declaration formulated by the Arminians (see ARMINIANISM). Together with the BELGIC CONFESSION OF FAITH (1561) and the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (1563), the Canons formed a precise doctrinal standard of Dutch Reformed belief during the decisive initial period of the REFORMATION.

The gathering at Dordrecht was, strictly speaking, a national SYNOD of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands. The official deputies—pastors, elders, and theological experts—were by and large firm Calvinists. Thirteen Remonstrant theologians were also present, but their discussions with the delegates were shrill, if not acrimonious. The Remonstrants were eventually deemed obstructionists and expelled. Finally, attendance by twenty-six representatives from eight foreign countries, principally the German principalities, Swiss city-states, and British Isles, lent the synod a decidedly international flavor with concomitant significance. Altogether, the Canons enjoyed wide circulation and were the subject of extensive discussion long after their formulation.

Arminius had been a pastor at Amsterdam and later professor of theology at the University of Leiden. Although he had studied at Geneva with THEODORE BEZA, Arminius eventually broke with Calvinist ORTHODOXY on the doctrine of predestination, moderating in particular the Calvinist stance on predestination of the reprobate (see CALVINISM). His followers formalized these views in an official Remonstrance, which they presented to the Estates of Holland and West Friesland in 1610, several months after his death. In light of this petition, they were dubbed “Remonstrants.” Their Remonstrance called for a national synod to revise the Belgic

Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. More specifically, it asserted five articles of faith that the petitioners deemed a necessary revision of prevailing Calvinist understanding. Briefly, these theological views, as elaborated in the Remonstrance and elsewhere, were that (1) God has from eternity elected those who believe in Christ and persevere in their faith; (2) Christ atoned for all humanity, but only believers will be saved; (3) regeneration and CONVERSION are dependant on the gift of the Holy Spirit; (4) all good works are the result of the operation of grace in the believer, but this grace is not irresistible; and (5) all such believers will be aided in their faith, although Scripture must be examined closely to determine whether they may fall from grace.

The nature of the Remonstrance indelibly colored and shaped the character of the Canons, whose authors insisted on that which they considered proper Reformed doctrine, all the while explicitly rejecting the views contained in the Remonstrance. The structure of the Canons reflects their purpose. Drafted in Latin and replete with strong biblical language, they are divided into chapters, or Heads of Doctrine, which reply in turn to each of the five articles of the 1610 Remonstrance. But the Canons have only four chapters, having collapsed Heads of Doctrine Three and Four into one, because no controversy existed over point three of the Remonstrance. Each head provides a lengthy exposition of what its authors regarded as the correct theological position on the subject. The explanations are followed by specific repudiations of the alleged errors of the Arminians.

The first, crucial Head of Doctrine maintains divine predestination. It affirms unconditional ELECTION—the belief that election was not founded on foreseen faith or any human disposition. In addition, God has not elected all persons; some have been passed over in the eternal election. A long list of rejected errors is attached. The second head deals with Christ's DEATH and human redemption. The essential theological point is an avowal of particular or limited atonement, as opposed to what its authors regarded as the Remonstrance's position of universal atonement. The third and fourth heads are combined, and consider human corruption and conversion to God. As such, they underscore the total incapacity of humanity. Divine grace, moreover, ultimately cannot be resisted. Again, the Canons reject what the delegates to the synod took to be the Remonstrants' belief in humanity's partial depravity and the possibility of resisting God's grace. The fifth and final head discusses the perseverance of the SAINTS, ruling out any possibility of their lapse from grace, an error attributed to the Remonstrants. The Canons' concluding remarks reiterate the Synod's affirmation of orthodox DOCTRINE and vigorous rejection of Remonstrant errors.

The Canons of Dort mark a critical consensus among the resolute Calvinist ecclesiastical authorities in the NETHERLANDS. They worked jointly to draw up the Canons and affixed their signatures on completion. During the decades that followed the Synod, the Canons became the basis for an imposed unity and uniformity among the Dutch Reformed churches. Some 200 nonconforming pastors were dismissed, and the Remonstrants found themselves generally persecuted. Several were forced into exile. The result of this intense struggle was the dominance of a strict Calvinist orthodoxy within the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Acta Synodi nationalis...D ordrechtii habitae anno [M][D]CXVII et [M][D]CXIX. Dordrecht, 1620.
“Canones Synodi Dordrechtanae” (with partial English translation), in The Creeds of Christendom, 6th ed., edited by Philip Schaff, vol. 3, 550–597. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1990.

Secondary Sources:

van Deursen, Arie Theodorus. Bavianen en Slijkgeuzen: Kerk en kerkvolk ten tijde and Maurits en Oldenbarnvelt. Franeker, Netherlands: Van Wijnen, 1998.

van't Spijker, Willem et al. De Synode van Dordrecht in 1618 en 1619. Houten, Netherlands: Hertog, 1987.

RAYMOND A.MENTZER

DOUGLASS, FREDERICK (1818–1895)

American slave, freedman, abolitionist, and author. Frederick Douglass embodied African-American engagement with evangelical Protestantism. He received religious instruction from enslaved blacks and free whites. He joined a Baltimore church around 1830 and, as a runaway, was licensed in Massachusetts in 1839 to preach in the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH. He criticized American churches for tolerating SLAVERY, but his criticisms were not faithless. Central Protestant theological issues, such as the relationship between human activity and divine providence, remained important to him, and he published some important writings in evangelical periodicals.

Douglass made two significant contributions to Protestantism—culminations of trends commencing in black religion around 1770. First, Douglass articulated a standard of CONVERSION relevant to a society marred by slaveholding and racial inequity. The slaveholders' standard was manumission of their slaves; the slaves' standard was the determination to be free. African American religion by 1845 had resolved two problems in conversion in the pietistic tradition—the converts' self-centeredness and the conversion narratives' focus on the self even while recommending self-abnegation. The slaves' desire to be free, articulated in the slave narrative, could never be understood as selfish. Second, Douglass racialized the spiritual autobiography that by 1800 had become a staple of popular Protestantism. He sacralized blacks' yearning for liberation. Of global significance in religious history, Douglass confirmed the evangelical Protestantism of most black North Americans. Neither animism, Islam, nor Roman Catholicism, all known in West Africa, promoted individual freedom as vibrantly as evangelical Protestantism could or offered blacks a tradition of popular autobiographies that could justify both individual freedom and opposition to slavery.

See also Evangelicalism; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Douglass, Frederick. Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass. New York: St. Martin's, 1993.

———. My Bondage and My Freedom. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

———. The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass. New York: Crowell-Collier, 1962.

Secondary Sources:

Blight, David W. Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln: a Relationship in Language, Politics, and Memory. Milwaukee, WI: Marquette University Press, c2001.

Chesnutt, Charles Waddell, 1858–1932. Frederick Douglass edited by Ernestine W. Pickens, ; introduction by William L. Andrews. Atlanta, GA: Clark Atlanta University Press, 2001.

Stauffer, John. The Black Hearts of Men: Radical Abolitionists and the Transformation of Race. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002, 2001.

Williamson, Scott C. The Narrative life: the Moral and Religious Thought of Frederick Douglass. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2002.

JOHN SAILLANT

DRUMMOND, HENRY (1851–1897)

Scottish professor and writer. The most enduring work of Henry Drummond is his study of 1 Corinthians 13, The Greatest Thing in the World. It was first published in 1887 and has never been out of print.

Born in Stirling, SCOTLAND, August 17, 1851, to a financially comfortable, religious family, Drummond proceeded to New College (theological). In the fall of 1873, he entered the University of Edinburgh at age fifteen and 1873, he interrupted his studies for two years, assisting DWIGHT L. MOODY'S first mission to Britain in the inquiry room and speaking at follow-up meetings. Later, Moody said of his friend Drummond, "He is the most Christ-like man I ever knew."

In 1877, Drummond was made Lecturer, later Professor, of Natural Science at Free Church College, Glasgow. His effort to reconcile evolution with Christian thought, published as Natural Law in the Spiritual World (1883), and released just before he left on a ten-month exploration of central AFRICA, became a best seller and made him famous. Tropical Africa (1888) detailed his experience. Other essays circulated widely and were collected posthumously in a volume titled The Ideal Life (1897). A dapper dresser who never married, Drummond worked in the Boys Brigade movement and pioneered university student Christian work from 1884 until his final illness.

Drummond's first visit to America was an 1879 geological expedition to the Rocky Mountains. He returned in 1887 to speak at colleges, at Moody's summer conference at Northfield, Massachusetts, and to receive his only degree, an honorary doctorate, from Amherst. In America and CANADA in 1893, he lectured at Lowell Institute (The Ascent of Man, 1894), Harvard, and Chicago and visited friends.

The first stages of a debilitating disease, perhaps bone cancer, began in the spring of 1894, and Drummond died at Tunbridge Wells, March 11, 1897. He is buried in Stirling.

See also Darwinism; Nature; Creation Science

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Drummond, Henry. Natural Law in the Spiritual World, 1883.

- . The Greatest Thing in the World, 1887.
- . Tropical Africa, 1888.
- . The Ascent of Man, 1894.
- . The Ideal Life and Other Unpublished Addresses with Memorial Sketches by Ian Maclaren [pseud] and W.Robertson Nicoll, 1897.
- . The New Evangelism and Other Papers, 1899.
- . Stones Rolled Away and Other Addresses to Young Men Delivered in America, 1899.
- . The Evolution of Bible Study, edited by A. Fleming, 1901.

Christmas Booklets:

- . The Greatest Thing in the World, Christmas, 1889.
- . Pax Vobiscum, Christmas, 1890.
- . The Programme of Christianity, Christmas, 1891.
- . The City without a Church, Christmas, 1892.
- . The Changed Life, Christmas, 1893.

Henry Drummond Papers, National Library of Scotland.

Secondary Sources:

- Corts, Thomas E., ed. Henry Drummond: A Perpetual Benediction. Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1999.
- Kennedy, James W. Henry Drummond: An Anthology. New York: Harper, 1953.
- Lennox, Cuthbert (J.H.Napier). Henry Drummond: A Biographical Sketch. London: Andrew Melrose, 1901.
- Simpson, James Y. Henry Drummond. Edinburgh: Oli phant, Anderson, & Ferrier, 1901.
- Smith, George Adam. The Life of Henry Drummond. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1899.

THOMAS E.CORTS

DU PLESSIS, DAVID JOHANNES (1905–1987)

South African pentecostal leader. David Johannes du Plessis, a descendant of French HUGUENOTS and father of the charismatic or neopentecostal movement, was born in SOUTH AFRICA in 1905. There in the 1930s he was the General Secretary of the Apostolic Faith Mission, a pentecostal organization. According to du Plessis, in 1936 Smith Wigglesworth, a British pentecostal evangelist, prophesied to him that he would become a world leader in causing the pentecostal doctrine of the baptism in the Holy Spirit, evidenced by speaking in TONGUES and other supernatural gifts, to be recognized by the mainline churches.

Du Plessis was one the architects of the Pentecostal World Conference launched in 1947, and in 1949 became its first General Secretary. He believed that PENTECOSTALISM—considered an offshoot of Protestantism—was for all Christians regardless of DENOMINATION. He maintained that the work of the Holy Spirit overrode ecclesiastical boundaries and took this message to leading American universities and SEMINARIES, including Princeton and Yale.

Du Plessis became a pentecostal ambassador to the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and also to the Roman Catholic Church. He was a Protestant operating within Catholic circles, and in 1964 was an official observer at the Second Vatican Council.

David du Plessis's work has occasioned admiration and condemnation; regarded by some as a champion of Christian unity helping to bring Catholicism and also Protestantism with its evangelicals and pentecostals all together; but considered by others as having undermined the REFORMATION. The David J. du Plessis Center at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California houses his archives.

See also Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Evangelicalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Du Plessis, David J. A Man called Mr. Pentecost. Plainfield, NJ: Logos, 1977.

———. The Spirit Bade Me Go. Plainfield, NJ: Logos, 1970.

Secondary Source:

Durasoff, Steve. Bright Wind of the Spirit: Pentecostalism Today. Plainfield, NJ: Logos, 1972.

THOMAS A. WELCH

DUBOIS, WILLIAM EDWARD BURGHARDT (1868–1963)

Author, editor and educator, civil rights leader. DuBois was a towering figure among twentieth-century black leaders with a keen sense of mission to free black America. He was born in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He had a Christian upbringing and was a devoted Christian in his youthful days, accompanying his mother to a nearby Congregational Church at Great Barrington. He studied at Fisk (Nashville), Harvard, and Berlin and subsequently taught at Wilberforce and Pennsylvania universities. He also served as director of publications for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), as editor of Crisis Magazine (1910–1932), as editor of Atlanta University Studies (1897–1911), and as editor of Phylon Quarterly Review (1940–1944).

DuBois became secretary of the NAACP, but in 1948 he left the association. He advocated total elimination of discrimination and equality of all races. He was a major speaker at the All African Conference held in Accra, Ghana in 1958 where he advocated socialism over capitalism (see SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN). Three years later, at the age of ninety-three, he joined the Communist party. He was invited to Ghana by the first prime minister of the country, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah. Consequently he returned to Ghana in 1961 as a voluntary exile where he died two years later as a citizen of Ghana.

Apart from his background in the Congregational Church, his major significance for Protestantism lies in the fact that he influenced and worked in close association with the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH (A.M.E.Zion), which became strongest in North Carolina in 1820. The A.M.E.Zion Church was a religious/Christian variant of the black consciousness movement. DuBois collaborated with Bishop Alexander Walters, bishop of the A.M.E.Zion Church in the African Association in London, which held a conference in July 1900. Sylvester Williams who founded the association was the general secretary; Walters was the president while DuBois served as chairman of the Committee on Address.

See also Civil Rights Movement; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- DuBois, W.E. B. The Suppression of the African Slave Trade. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1896.
- . The Philadelphia Negro. New York: Lippencott, 1899.
- . The Souls of Black Folk. Chicago: AC McClurg & Co., 1903.
- . Negro Church. Atlanta, GA: University of Atlanta Press, 1903.
- . The Negro. New York: Henry Holt, 1915.
- . The Gift of Black Folk. Boston: Stratford, 1924.
- . Black Reconstruction. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1935.
- . Black Folk: Then and Now. New York: Henry Holt, 1939.
- . Color and Democracy. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1945.
- . The World and Africa. New York: International Publishers, 1946.

Secondary Sources:

- Logan, Rayford, ed. W.E.B.DuBois: Profile. New York: Hill and Wang, 1971.
- Partington, Paul G. W.E.B.DuBois: A Bibliography of His Published Writings. Whittier, CA: Partington, 1977.

CEPHAS N.OMENYO

DUKE UNIVERSITY

Deeply rooted in North Carolina METHODISM, Duke University has always maintained meaningful and friendly relations with the Methodist church. The university traces its origins to a primitive, one-room school that the Methodists and Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) of Randolph County, North Carolina, jointly organized in 1838. The following year Brantley York, the school's principal and a Methodist preacher, converted the school into Union Institute.

Moving on to other work in 1842, York was succeeded by his young assistant, Braxton Craven, also a Methodist preacher, and for the next forty years Craven was to be the chief sustainer of the school. Hoping, in vain as it turned out, to gain monetary support from the state, Craven arranged in 1849 for the school to be incorporated as Normal College, with the primary mission of training young men to become school teachers. Disappointed by his inability to gain financial support for Normal College from the state, Craven turned to the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and offered to give preministerial training to aspiring preachers. The church conference responded warmly to the proposal and in 1856 adopted the college as its own. Accordingly, in 1859 the school became Trinity College and sought to grow as a Methodist liberal arts institution.

Although Trinity College, unlike many similar schools, managed to survive the CIVIL WAR, it was desperately poor. Only Craven's determination and sacrifices allowed the school to survive, although gradually there developed a small body of alumni who cherished the institution. When Craven died in 1882 Trinity faced a crisis: its financial situation was so bleak that there was talk of closing the college and selling the property (which was not much). Three trustees, however, all Methodist laymen and prominent businessmen, stepped into the breach to save Trinity. They not only did that but also hired a twenty-nine year-old Pennsylvanian and Yale graduate, John F. Crowell, to become Trinity's president.

Among many revitalizing ideas that Crowell introduced, the most important was his conviction that if Trinity was serious about its ambitions, then it would have to move from its rural, isolated location in Randolph County to one of North Carolina's livelier, more prosperous manufacturing towns in the Piedmont region. Therefore, in 1892, in response to generous offers of money and land from two Methodist laymen in Durham—Washington Duke and Julian S. Carr—Trinity opened its doors there. Whereas the economic depression of 1893 only made a bad situation worse in North Carolina, Trinity had the good fortune in 1894 to name as Crowell's successor a spellbinding Methodist preacher from South Carolina, John C. Kilgo.

Responding quickly to Kilgo's charismatic leadership and impassioned preaching, Washington Duke, the patriarch of the Durham family that was growing rich in tobacco and textiles, offered Trinity $100,000 in 1896 if it would admit women on "an equal footing" with men. The college promptly agreed and Trinity became coeducational long before most of its peers. Other significant gifts to the college continued to come from Duke and two of his sons, Benjamin N. and James B. Duke. The problem of financial support that had so haunted Craven was finally solved through the generosity of the Duke family.

Long before Kilgo became a Methodist bishop in 1910 and was succeeded as president by Methodist layman William P. Few, Trinity had begun to move cautiously toward university status. Benjamin and James Duke underwrote a small but high-quality law school in 1904; there was also talk of a medical school, and the department of religion grew steadily with help from the Methodists.

In 1921 President Few conceived the idea of organizing a major research university around Trinity College and gradually sold the plan, with constant help from Ben Duke, to the wealthiest member of the family, James Duke. The dream became a reality in December 1924 when Duke University was born. The institution's ties with the Methodist church, however, continued exactly as they had been earlier—friendly and steady, but not constricting. That is, both Kilgo and Few felt deeply that, although it was important to maintain certain formal ties with the Methodist church, it was equally important that there should be a certain arm's-length aspect to the relationship. Committed church bodies, like state legislatures, sometimes responded to popular, fleeting passions and could cause serious trouble for educational institutions.

In practice this meant that first Trinity and then Duke had a self-perpetuating board of thirty-six trustees who nominated their own successors. The charter provided that the older North Carolina Conference of the Methodist church should "elect" (actually "ratify") one-third of the trustees, the newer Western North Carolina Conference another third, and the alumni the final third. Aside from some financial support to Duke's ecumenical divinity school from the Methodist conferences and a wide variety of cooperative ventures, the charter's provision about the trustees remains the historic symbol of Duke University's relationship with Methodism.

References and Further Reading

- Chaffin, Nora C. Trinity College, 1839–1892: The Beginnings of Duke University. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1950.
- Durden, Robert F. The Launching of Duke University, 1924–1949. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1993.
- Porter, Earl W. Trinity and Duke, 1892–1924: Foundation of Duke University. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1964.

ROBERT F. DURDEN

DUTCH PROTESTANTS IN AMERICA

Dutch Protestants in America are products of JOHN CALVIN'S (1509–1564) Genevan reformation, which spread to FRANCE, ENGLAND, the German Palatinate, and the Low Countries. Under Prince William of Orange, Dutch patriots rallied around the Calvinist (Reformed) faith to throw off Catholic Spanish rule and establish the Dutch Republic, with the Nederlands Gereformeerde (later Hervormde) Kerk (Netherlands Reformed Church) as the established church. This body defined its THEOLOGY and POLITY in the historic national Synod of Dort (1618–1619) (see DORT, CANONS OF). Roman Catholics held their ground in the provinces below the Rhine River, but the nine provinces north of the Rhine became overwhelmingly Protestant. In 1815, the population comprised 60 percent Reformed, 38 percent Roman Catholics, and 2 percent Jews, Mennonites, and other Protestants. In 1834, the Netherlands Reformed Church suffered a schism when a conservative minority, despite severe persecution, formed a free church, the Christian Seceded Church.

Immigration

Dutch immigrants brought this religious history as part of their cultural baggage. In the nineteenth century, 80 percent were Reformed and less than 20 percent Catholic. Of the Reformed immigrants, 20 percent belonged to the Seceded Church. In the UNITED STATES a second schism occurred in 1857, which divided the Dutch Reformed Church into two rival denominations.

The Dutch immigrated to America in three waves: the Dutch West India Company colony of New Netherland beginning in the 1620s; the nineteenth-century free migration to the Midwest; and the planned migration after the Second World War, when the Dutch government encouraged its dispirited citizens to emigrate overseas to relieve overcrowding and wide-spread deprivation.

The colonial migration brought 7,000 Dutch to the New World in the forty years before the English seized New Netherland in 1664. This number increased to 100,000 by 1790, when the Dutch comprised one-sixth of the populace within a fifty-mile radius of New York City. From 1820 to 1920, 250,000 Dutch came; most congregated within fifty miles of Lake Michigan, led by the flagship colony of Holland, Michigan. The pioneer colony of Pella, Iowa was the nest for colonies in upper Midwest, especially Orange City. In 1945–1965, another 80,000 Dutch came, many with one-way steamship tickets paid by their government. The Dutch Reformed Church in America is a direct offshoot of these immigration waves, and church life and theological debates bear the stamp of Netherlandic origins.

Founding the Dutch Reformed Church

One of the oldest American denominations, the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church (after 1867, the Dutch Reformed Church in America) was founded in 1628 in New Amsterdam (later New York City), under the auspices of the Classis of Amsterdam of the Netherlands Reformed Church, by Jonas Michaelius (1577–1646), the first ordained minister in New Netherlands. Director Peter Minuit, who purchased Manhattan Island from the Indians for $24, began Reformed worship in his home. He and his successors permitted “no other services than those of the true Reformed Religion.” Leading clerics in New Netherlands were Everardus Bogardus (1607–1647) in New Amsterdam, from 1633 to 1647; Johannes Megapolensis (1601–1670) in Rensselaerwyck (later Albany) from 1642 to 1649 and in New Amsterdam from 1647 to 1670; Samuel Drisius in New Amsterdam from 1652 to 1673; and Gideon Shaats in Beverwyck (later Albany), from 1652 to 1694.

Although only the Reformed faith was publicly funded, private WORSHIP was allowed to other Protestants and even to Catholics. However, when twentythree Dutch Jews from Brazil came seeking refuge in 1654, Governor Peter Stuyvesant and the Reverend Megapolensis wanted to throw the “godless rascals” out. This “deceitful race,” the governor declared, “must not be allowed to infect and trouble this new colony.” But the West India Company’s board of directors in Amsterdam overruled the governor and, much to his chagrin, ordered him to “connive,” that is, to allow the Jews to remain, provided that they cared for their own poor, as all non-Reformed colonists were required to do. Profit took precedence over profession.

The English government, after seizing the colony in 1664, guaranteed freedom of religion to the Dutch Reformed Church (see TOLERATION). Fresh immigration ceased and government monies were cut off, but the Dutch Reformed Church remained the dominant religion and culture. Filling the pulpits was the major challenge; only six clerics were available to serve twenty-three congregations in 1700. Aspiring colonial clerics had to cross the ocean to take seminary training and ordination in the NETHERLANDS. In 1776, the Dutch Reformed Church counted more than 100 congregations, centered in New York and New Jersey.

The Dutch language was used in worship services and catechetical instruction until 1762, when English services began. Sunday worship included Genevan psalm singing and prayers, but the focal point was the sermon, which was often doctrinal and always lengthy. One sermon each Sunday expounded on the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, one of the three Dutch Reformed confessions, called the “Three Forms of Unity.” Dutch CALVINISM was shaped theologically by its stress on the sovereignty of God and God's COVENANT with believers (see COVENANT THEOLOGY). Culturally, the Reformed stressed vocation as a "calling," which led to a strong work ethic and directing every task to the "glory of God."

Americanization

The First and Second Great Awakenings and the American Revolution greatly impacted the Dutch Reformed Church (see AWAKENINGS). Its leaders generally frowned on the New Measures, as employed by GEORGE WHITEFIELD (1714–1770) in the 1740s and CHARLES G. FINNEY (1792–1875) in the 1820s, for giving too much credence to "free will" over God's sovereign decree. But both Whitefield and Finney were quasi-Calvinists by upbringing and profession, and many Dutch Reformed Church members embraced their revivalist methods (see REVIVALS). One result was factionalism—"Old Side/New Side" factions in the eighteenth century, and "Old School/New School" parties in the nineteenth century. The Reverend Theodore Jacobus Frelinghuysen (1692c. 1747), who from 1720 served Dutch Reformed congregations in central New Jersey for twenty years, was the leading preacher of the New Birth. American revivalism thus modified traditional Dutch Reformed theology and polity as formulated in the Canons and Church Order of Dort.

Dutch Reformed teachings about human nature, covenants, and the nexus between freedom and virtue helped inspire the Whiggish American Revolution and the Constitution. (The Netherlands was the first government to recognize the new American nation in 1782.) Most Dutch Reformed Church members supported the Patriot cause, although more than one-third of the CLERGY were Tories. Internal tensions were exacerbated by depredations of the British armies, who viewed the Dutch as enemies and occupied many of their churches.

The war had a further fallout; it brought to a head a lengthy debate over whether or not the American church should remain under the Classis of Amsterdam. The progressive, pro-American party, called the "Coetus" (pronounced "seetus"), strongly demanded the right to train and ordain its own ministers in America, and they established Queens (later Rutgers) College in 1766 to do so. The traditional, pro-Dutch party, called the "Conferentie," favored the status quo under Amsterdam's control. The deeper issue was the pace of Americanization. In 1771, the Reverend Dr. John Henry Livingston managed to bring the factions together in a Union Convention, and in 1784, he helped found New Brunswick Seminary, the oldest in the nation.

In 1792, Livingston led the CHURCH to break with Amsterdam and form an American, "voluntary-membership denomination" with its own LITURGY, polity, and constitution. The document, in an echo of the First Amendment's disestablishment clause, allowed for freedom of conscience for every member, which was a weakening of the Reformed creedal basis and a sharp departure from the Dort church order. The new church constitution gave clerics greater latitude to reinterpret cardinal Reformed doctrines, such as ELECTION and limited ATONEMENT, in favor of the rising spirit of ARMINIANISM that came to full fruition in the Second Great Awakening. Weekly sermons from the Heidelberg Catechism also fell away in many churches. In 1822, under the leadership of theology professor Solomon Froeligh (1750–1827), a number of New Jersey churches seceded from the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church—the name adopted in 1819 to distinguish it from the German Reformed and other Reformed bodies—and formed the True Reformed Dutch Church.

The Reformed Protestant Dutch Church did not fare well in the new democratic religious age, with its popular revolt against Calvinist doctrines and an educated clergy. Like other denominations with Calvinist roots—Anglican, Presbyterian, and Congregational—the Dutch fed on internal growth but gained few converts on the frontier, in comparison to the “upstart” Methodists and BAPTISTS with their evangelistic efforts. “Marrying Dutch” (i.e., within the denomination) was so common as to be a cliché, and almost every Dutch Reformed cleric had a close relative in the profession. All five sons of Frelinghuysen, for example, were ordained.

True (Christian) Reformed Church

New immigration from the Netherlands, beginning in the mid-1840s, saved the day for the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church and boosted its mission efforts on the midwestern frontier. The first major accession was in 1850, when the Reverend Albertus C. Van Raalte, leader of the Holland (Michigan) Colony, founded in 1847, arranged for the nine congregations in the Classis of Holland to affiliate. Some families refused to go along, however, believing that the Reformed Church of the East was so Americanized as to have left the orthodox way in faith and practice. Some 10 percent of the member families of the Classis of Holland seceded in 1857 and formed the “True” Dutch Reformed Church (later the CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA). That year, the Noon Day Prayer Meeting at the Fulton Street Dutch Reformed Church in New York City sparked a religious revival that spread nationwide.

The two Dutch Reformed churches competed for members and their church buildings often stood within eyesight of one another. The True denomination, with its old Dutch ways, received most of the new immigrants and grew rapidly, eventually gaining parity with the senior denomination. But the Reformed Church also attracted its share of immigrants, especially in the Midwest, which created a cultural division between the old American Eastern wing and the young Western wing. The immigrant churches were more conservative theologically and culturally; they slowed the process of change and blocked merger movements with German Reformed and Presbyterian bodies that Eastern leaders orchestrated.

Two new Dutch Reformed denominations emerged in the twentieth century, both largely the result of conservative secessions from the Christian Reformed Church. These are the Protestant Reformed Church (in 1922) and the United Reformed Church (in 1995). Several smaller Reformed groups also exist. Since about 1950, a growing number of Dutch have joined Baptist, Pentecostal, nondenominational, and independent churches, some of which also espouse Reformed theology. Upwardly mobile Dutch increasingly affiliate with mainline Protestant denominations, especially Presbyterian bodies.

A significant factor in the growth of the Christian Reformed Church was its staunch refusal to accept Freemasons. The Reformed Church had long permitted such members. This prompted a second schism in the 1880s, which led several thousand Reformed Church members (10 percent), mainly in the Midwestern congregations, to switch to the Christian Reformed Church. Furthermore, the mother church in the Netherlands, which viewed FREEMASONRY through the lens of the anti-Christian French ENLIGHTENMENT, in 1882 began strongly advising its immigrating families to affiliate with the Christian Reformed Church. This decision, which coincided with the increasing immigration from the northern Netherlands in the 1880s due to a severe agricultural depression, brought thousands of devout families into the junior denomination.

Starting after 1900, the Christian Reformed Church developed a national system of Christian day schools (K-12), to raise up biblically and doctrinally literate church members. These parent-controlled schools became the feeders of the church, and led to intermarriage within the covenant community. They were modeled after Netherlandic schools that gained full public funding under Dr. ABRAHAM KUYPER, the foremost Calvinist leader in the Netherlands from 1880 to 1920. Until the 1970s, over 80 percent of Christian Reformed families enrolled their children in onze (our) schools, which are conjoined in Christian Schools International, which today includes 300 schools with 60,000 students in the United States.

In contrast, the Reformed Church in America supported public schools. The 1892 General Synod declared that the “Common School is vitally essential to the fusing of the heterogeneous elements of our population into one nation.” This resolution reflects the denomination’s three centuries of assimilation. Their youths would be “salt and light” in public schools.

Reformed Dutch liberal arts colleges include Hope (1866), Central (est. 1853, became Reformed in 1916), Calvin (1876), Northwestern (1882), Dordt (1955), and Trinity Christian (1959). Theological seminaries, in addition to New Brunswick, are Western (1866), Calvin (1876), and Mid-America (1982). Lay missionaries train at Reformed Bible College (1937) (see CHRISTIAN COLLEGES; BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTIONS; SEMINARIES).

Today the two largest Dutch Reformed denominations number about 280,000 each. The Reformed Church remains headquartered in New York City; the Christian Reformed “Zion” is in Grand Rapids, Michigan. Both bodies include Canadian congregations. Post-1945 immigrants to CANADA compose 28 percent of Christian Reformed Church membership, which strengthened its flagging “Dutchness.” The more “Americanized” Reformed Church is affiliated with the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Grand Rapids is also the national center of Christian book PUBLISHING, with four firms—William B. Eerdmans, Zondervan, Kregel, and Baker Book House—all founded by interrelated Christian Reformed immigrants.

Dutch Reformed Church groups share a common “world and life view,” rooted in a strong diaconal tradition, which has led them to establish human service institutions—“Holland homes” for the elderly, mental health hospitals (Pine Rest in Grand Rapids, Michigan; Bethesda in Denver; and Goffle Hill in Paterson, New Jersey), homes for special needs children and adults, institutions for troubled youth and women in transition, day care centers, an international child welfare and adoption agency (Bethany Christian Services), and world relief organizations.

Notables

Dutch Protestants claim three U.S. presidents: Martin Van Buren, Theodore Roosevelt, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Theodore Roosevelt cherished his Reformed Church heritage.

The Reformed Church pioneered in foreign MIS-SIONS in Asia and the Middle East, under Samuel Zwemer (1867–1952), missionary to Arabia and Egypt, and Ida Scudder (1870–1959), medical missionary in INDIA. NORMAN VINCENT PEALE (1898–1993), though non-Dutch, pastored New York City’s seminal Marble Collegiate Church for more than fifty years (1932–1984). In 1955, Robert H. Schuller (b. 1926) founded the Crystal Cathedral in southern California.

Leading Christian Reformed theologians include Gerhardus Vos (1862–1949) of Princeton Seminary, Louis Berkhof (1874–1957) of Calvin Seminary, Cornelius Van Til (1895–1987) of Westminster Seminary (Philadelphia), and Peter Eldersveld (1911–65), radio minister of the denominational “Back to God Hour” program. Christian ETHICS professors include Henry Stob (1908–2000) of Calvin College and Lewis Smedes (b. 1921) of Calvin and Fuller Seminaries. Scholars in Reformed philosophy include Alvin Plantinga (b. 1932) of the University of Notre Dame and Nicholas Woltersdorff (b. 1932) of Yale University.

Dutch Reformed denominations today stand with at least fifteen other Reformed bodies, but the combined Dutch membership of 750,000 (one-third of whom are Canadian), pales in comparison with the total of six million Reformed in America members. Dutch Reformed presses, periodicals, books, and academic and social institutions play a large role in the evangelical community (see EVANGELICALISM). In the defense of biblical AUTHORITY and commitment to cultural transformation, the Dutch Reformed Church has made a mark on American Protestantism far out of proportion to its numbers.

References and Further Reading

- Bratt, James D. Dutch Calvinism in Modern America: A History of a Conservative Subculture. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1984.
- Corwin, Charles E. A Manual of the Reformed Church in America, 1628-1922. New York: Reformed Church of America, 1922.
- De Jong, Gerald F. The Dutch Reformed Church in the American Colonies. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1978.

- Fabend, Firth Haring. Zion on the Hudson: Dutch New York and New Jersey in the Age of Revivals. Albany, NY: University of New York Press, 2000.
- Kromminga, John. The Christian Reformed Church: A Study in Orthodoxy. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1949.
- Schaap, James C. Our Family Album: The Unfinished Story of the Christian Reformed Church. Grand Rapids, MI: CRC Publications, 1998.
- Swierenga, Robert P., and Elton J. Bruins. Family Quarrels in the Dutch Reformed Churches in the Nineteenth Century. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1999.

ROBERT P.SWIERENGA

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH (GEREFORMEERDE KERK)

The Dutch Reformed Church (DRC) had its beginning in the sixteenth century and became the established church in the Protestant Dutch Republic, although Roman Catholics and Protestant dissenters enjoyed a considerable amount of freedom (see DISSENT). The DRC was Calvinist in doctrine and survived serious doctrinal conflicts. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the DRC became a pluralistic church. The NETHERLANDS lost its typical Protestant stamp after the French Revolution, and the influence of the DRC on society waned. Several schisms hampered the DRC, and the secularization of the twentieth century caused a great loss in membership. In reaction, the DRC showed a new missionary and ecumenical zeal after World War II.

Founding of the DRC

The organization and the doctrine of the Gereformeerde Kerk or Dutch Reformed Church evolved gradually during the persecution of the REFORMATION by the Spanish government and its suppression by the Roman Catholic Church. Reformed groups arose in the southern provinces of the Low Countries in the 1550s, when numerous groups from inside and outside the country had already paved the way for new religious ideas. The Reformation movement was marked by several influences, including sacramentalism, ANABAPTISM, CALVINISM, the Modern Devotion, and biblical humanism. From the start of the reign of the Spanish King Philip II in 1559, the situation deteriorated for the Dutch Reformation movement. In an attempt to explain its intentions to the government, the Reformed pastor Guido de Bres, following the French example, formulated the BELGIC CONFESSION in 1561, which was immediately given confessional status by the DRC. From 1566 Reformed people fled persecution in the Netherlands, and congregations were formed in ENGLAND and GERMANY while the Netherlands rebelled against Spain. At the Convent of Wezel (1568) and the Synod of Emden (1571), these congregations agreed on unification and certain ecclesiastical standards. The HEIDELBERG CATECHISM (1563) was adopted along with the Belgic Confession. From 1572 the DRC reappeared as a predominantly Calvinist church in the liberated parts of the Netherlands, and the first national synod was held in Dordrecht in 1578.

Established Church

The DRC became the established church in the Dutch Republic, although the government tolerated the Catholic church and other dominations, like the Lutherans (see LUTHERANISM) and the Anabaptists. A minority of the Dutch adhered to the Reformed faith and only part of this minority were confessing members of the DRC. Nevertheless, the DRC was dominant in society, especially because EDUCATION was part of its task. It was not just its confession but also its Calvinistic piety and life- and worldview that permeated Dutch society. Public offices could be held only by members of the DRC.

The first serious test for this partnership was the struggle over ARMINIANISM in the early 1600s. Arminius held the eternal election as a fruit of FAITH, whereas according to the Calvinist doctrine faith is a fruit of ELECTION. This disagreement led to serious tensions in both church and state. The matter was settled at the international synod of Dordrecht (1618/ 19), which formulated the CANONS OF DORT, rejecting the Arminian viewpoints and stressing the Calvinistic character of the DRC's doctrine. Together with the Heidelberg Catechism and the Belgic Confession, these canons were adopted as the doctrinal basis of the church, the so-called Three Forms of Unity. This synod also accepted a democratic church order, which functioned for almost two centuries. Maurits, prince of Orange and the informal head of the state, settled the dispute all over the country, replacing unwilling magistrates with loyal ones. State and church preserved unity, a unity that was fostered by the synod's decision to issue a new Dutch translation of the BIBLE, financed by the States-General of the Republic, the so-called Statenbijbel (1637). This translation exerted a unifying force with unsurpassed influence on Dutch language and culture and was replaced by a new translation only in 1951. This feat could not hide that tensions in the relationship had surfaced during the Arminian dispute. The state guarded its interests with zeal, and never again during the Dutch Republic was the DRC (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW) allowed to convene a national synod. The influence of the state included the governor's right to attend synodical meetings, the right of the local magistrates to accept or reject a minister, but also the obligation to pay him and to defend and uphold the DRC. Concord in society was the aim of the magistrates. For this reason the dominant position of the DRC included a tolerant attitude toward dissenters, Jews, and Roman Catholics and dismissal of overly strict ministers. The Republic was renowned for its freedom of conscience. Most books published in the seventeenth century were printed there, and persecuted Christians, like the French HUGUENOTS, often fled to the Republic for the sake of freedom.

The economic success of the early Dutch Republic was based on the development of Amsterdam as a stable market for international trade, organized and regulated by trade companies. At the trading posts founded in INDIA, AFRICA, and America the DRC also established congregations. The best known is the DRC founded in New Amsterdam (New York) in 1628. A full-grown American denomination developed out of this church. Known today as the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA, its congregations are located mainly in New York, New Jersey, and Michigan. Until they became independent in 1792, these churches were part of the classis of Amsterdam. In 1867 the church deleted the word “Dutch” in its name, although the Dutch language and hymns were still present in services at certain occasions until about 1900. Its constitution is still in accordance with that of the DRC and consists of the Three Forms of Unity.

New Religious Trends

Despite the prolonged dominant position of the DRC, the reformation of Dutch society was not as successful as might have been expected. Some groups argued that the Reformation in the Netherlands had stalled halfway. An international movement for ongoing reformation of personal life and society gained influence in the Netherlands as Nadere Reformatie (Further Reformation). This movement played a substantial role in the church, thanks to theologians like Voetius, the founder of the university of Utrecht (1636). These groups engaged in long-running disputes on issues like the observance of the Lord’s day with theologians like JOHANNES COCCEJUS (1603–1669), who defended a more historical interpretation of Scripture. Concern for CONVERSION, personal piety, and SALVATION took precedence over concern for social reform and the Christian life.

This emphasis on personal religion coincided with the stressing of personal convictions over authoritative opinions, as promulgated by ENLIGHTENMENT philosophers. They emphasized the need for religious tolerance. This was already practiced in the Republic, but the DRC was still the predominant public church. This historical privilege was at odds with the Enlightened theory of the equality of all people and the ideal of tolerance (see TOLERATION). In the eighteenth century, the influence of the Nadere Reformatie became entangled with the Enlightenment movement among both the Reformed and dissenters. In Enlightened fashion, theologians tried to synthesize reason and revelation. Classic Reformed theological positions were adapted to the spirit of the times: God was an impersonal primus movens, the Christian life was a matter of virtues, and Christians were rewarded for their virtues in an afterlife. Reformed theology became thin in these years and just clung to the old standards, although the DRC continued to be an important institution, mainly because its preaching upheld prudent civil behavior. The idea of the fatherland became the cohesive factor in society instead of the confession of the divine guidance of Dutch history.

After the French Revolution

In 1795 the Dutch Republic was occupied by the French and finally collapsed. A Batavian Republic was founded in which the ties between church and state were severed, according to the principles of the French Revolution. All existing churches received equal protection, and state offices were open to all. When the United Kingdom of the Netherlands was created in 1813, King William I of Orange adopted the Napoleonic idea of a uniform state supported by a uniform DRC—to which 55 percent of the Dutch people at that time belonged. The DRC—now called Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk—accepted the king’s control, which meant a fixation of the theological status quo and a loss of self-governance by the provincial and local bodies. This was the low ebb in the history of religious freedom in the Netherlands. Meanwhile, a countermovement to deistic rationalism and rigid ORTHODOXY had arisen in eighteenth-century Europe in the form of the Methodists (see METHODISM) and the MORAVIANS and of ROMANTICISM in general. The REVEIL movement gained importance within Christian circles in the Netherlands from the 1820s, whereas quite a few Reformed people gathered in CONVENTICLES on weekdays because the Sunday services did not match their doctrinal and liturgical standards. Protests of the Reformed against the new hierarchy and Enlightenment theology led to the Secession of 1834. Several ministers were excommunicated for disobedience to the church order and the small groups that left the DRC thereupon were fined and imprisoned whenever they gathered. With the new constitution of 1848, the Seceders received the right to organize their Christelijke Gereformeerde Kerk (Christian Reformed Church) freely. The DRC synod regained its freedom in church matters, but the DRC kept its link with the state, though in a less prominent way than was the case before 1795.

A Divided Church

The synod governed the DRC but did not decide theological disputes when several theological schools gained ground in the nineteenth century, from MODERNISM, with its rejection of the supernatural, to a neo-Calvinistic theology, which advocated a return to the confessional standards and to the decentralized governmental structure of the seventeenth century. Famous theologians like J.H. Scholten, P.Hofstede de Groot, and ABRAHAM KUYPER (1837–1920) tried to adapt the DRC to modern times. Their differing opinions led to serious disputes and controversies within the DRC and resulted, on the one hand, in a church without a distinct character, irreligiousness among the elite, and a massive loss of laborers to the Socialist movement and, on the other, to a rapid growth of nonestablished churches, like the REMONSTRANTS and the Reformed. In the year 1886 and following, about 10 percent of the members of the DRC left. These so-called Dolerenden (Lamenters), led by Kuypers, merged in 1892 with a majority of the Christelijke Gereformeerde Kerk and founded the Gereformeerde Kerken in Nederland (Reformed Churches). Less than half the Dutch population now belonged to the DRC.

Still claiming to be the church of the fatherland, it entered the twentieth century in a state of confusion and dismay, whereas the smaller but cohesive Reformed Churches dominated the Protestant scene for about half a century. Within the DRC, several groups organized to alter the character of the church: the Confessionals, who, inspired by Ph. J. Hoedemaker, tried to restore the church; their more outspoken Reformed allies, the Ethicals; and the Liberals. This period of confusion lasted until the 1920s, when the rise of the theology of KARL BARTH (1886–1968) and the emergence of gifted theologians like K.H. Miskotte and O. Noordmans gave a new impulse to the DRC and its theology. Under the influence of Barth's struggle against German National Socialism, the DRC looked beyond its sixteenth- and seventeenth-century standards to confess her belief anew in the face of the challenges of the twentieth century.

In the meantime, membership of the DRC had dwindled down to one third of the Dutch population in the 1930s; the percentage of Dutch nonbelievers had grown to fourteen percent in the 1930s. In these dramatic circumstances, a movement took hold in the 1920s and 1930s in the DRC for reorganization of its governmental structure and for return to its basics. This movement seemed to fail until the war and the German occupation of the Netherlands accelerated this process. Nazi terror and the spiritual and material needs of the Dutch forced the DRC to speak out for its confession and made her relevant within Dutch society as a whole. This new confidence combined with the urge to reorganize, resulting in a general synod—the first since 1619—that accepted a new church order, which was implemented in 1951. Although not a return to the Dordrecht order, several elements were retained: congregations were represented in the governmental bodies again, and a formula was agreed upon regarding the function and status of the Three Forms of Unity: “confessing in community with our forefathers.” The influence of Barth was dominant in the new church order; liberals were criticized for relying on the concept of the human being as a religious being, and the orthodox were criticized for relying on their knowledge of God's will.

New Self-Consciousness

The DRC presented itself as a church that confessed Christ for the Dutch people as a whole. This meant that, according to its understanding of the structure of the divine covenant, the DRC also included those who had not expressly left the church. This self-understanding also implied that it should have a missionary, apostolic attitude. By assuming this role, the DRC claimed a responsibility for Dutch society, not only in concord with the state, as in former days, but in its own right, over against the state, if need be. In the 1950s and 1960s the DRC formulated its opinion on social issues on a regular basis. In the 1960s the ordination of WOMEN (see also WOMEN CLERGY) was accepted, although parts of the DRC never acquiesced to this decision. When Dutch society polarized in the 1960s, polarization got hold of the church as well. The DRC lost many members as a result of growing secularization and became marginalized in Dutch society. The secularization and the internal tensions tempered the pretensions of the DRC and led to new contacts with the Gereformeerde Kerken. These churches had experienced two schisms since its formation in 1892 and had also had difficulties in coping with secularization. From the 1960s on, both churches began talking together about a possible merger, a process called Samen op Weg (Together on the Way), joined by the small Lutheran Church in 1986. Since that year the churches have been in a “state of reunion.” The strong Reformed minority of the DRC has serious concerns about the union, although the merger of the three churches will be effectuated in 2004. The new church will be called the Protestantse Kerk in Nederland (Protestant Church in the Netherlands).

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Bakhuizen van den Brink, J.N., ed. Documenta reformatoria: Teksten uit de geschiedenis van kerk en theologie sedert de hervorming. 2 vols. Kampen: Kok, 1960–1962.

Secondary Sources:

Aalders, M.J., and C. Augustijn, eds. Reformatiorica: Teksten uit de geschiedenis van het Nederlandse protestantisme. Zoetermeer: Meinema, 1996.

Augustijn, C., and E. Honée. Vervreemding en verzoening: De relatie tussen katholieken en protestanten in Nederland, 1550–2000. Nijmegen: Valkhof Pers, 1998.

Bakhuizen van den Brink, J.N., ed. De Nederlandse belijdenisgeschriften. Rev. ed. Amsterdam: Bolland, 1976.

Frijhoff, Willem. Embodied Belief: Ten Essays on Religious Culture in Dutch History. Hilversum: Verloren, 2002.

Jong, O.J. de. Nederlandse kerkgeschiedenis. Nijkerk: Callenbach, 1985.

Po-Chia Hsia, R., and F.K. van Nierop Henk, eds. Calvinism and Religious Tolerance in the Dutch Golden Age. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Rasker, A.J. De Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk vanaf 1795: Geschiedenis, theologische ontwikkelingen en de verhouding tot haar zusterkerken in de negentiende en twintigste eeuw. Kampen: Kok, 1986.

Rooden, Peter Van. Religieuze regimes: Over godsdienst en maatschappij in Nederland, 1570–1990. Amsterdam: Bakker, 1996.

GEORGE HARINCK

DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN AFRICA

The Dutch Reformed Church, or Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk (NGK), is the dominant Afrikaner church in SOUTH AFRICA. Founded in 1652, when the first Dutch settlers came to South Africa, the NGK has been the church of the Afrikaner establishment and was closely linked with the racist policies of apartheid from 1948 to 1994.

Theologically the Calvinist NGK stresses God's sovereignty, human sinfulness in a fallen world, and the redemptive work of Christ, not only in saving human souls but also transforming culture, through the work of the Holy Spirit in the Christian community.

Their stress on transforming human culture led the NGK to work on shaping a "New Jerusalem" in South Africa. The Afrikaners saw strong parallels between themselves as the people of God, and the biblical nation of Israel, which led them to focus on the Old Testament rather than the New.

In the early years the NGK was an interracial church in which whites and blacks worshipped together. Some white Afrikaners came to object to drinking out of the same cup as black Christians during the LORD'S SUPPER. The Synod (annual general meeting) of 1857 proposed that "as a concession to the prejudice and weakness of a few, it is recommended that the church serve one or more tables to the European members after the non-white members have been served." This recommendation came in spite of the church's recognition that the BIBLE taught that all Christians ought to worship together. In addition the Synod recommended that "if the weakness of some requires that the groups be separated, the congregation from the heathen should enjoy its privilege in a separate building and a separate institution." This concession soon grew into a policy of separating white and non-white churches, and eventually led to formation of separate mission churches for non-whites in South Africa.

In 1948 the NGK minister, Daniel Malan, became Prime Minister of South Africa and established apartheid, in which not only the churches but the entire society was segregated by race. The NGK supported and defended Malan's policies on theological grounds.

The NGK gradually found itself ostracized by virtually the entire Christian community, to the point that in 1986, the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES declared apartheid to be HERESY, and broke off fellowship with the NGK.

The Afrikaner community responded with a feeling that it was an embattled minority struggling to be obedient to God while faced with hostile forces all around trying to prevent it from doing so. This sense of threat—from the black majority and from the powerful English supported by liberal world opinion—led the Afrikaner churches to entrench themselves in their racist and exclusivistic ideology.

The church and South African society as a whole took an abrupt about-face in the early 1990s, when South Africa abolished apartheid and developed a multiracial government and society. The NGK has supported these developments wholeheartedly and has gradually been welcomed back into the worldwide community of Christian Churches.

References and Further Reading

- Davenport, T.R.H. The Afrikaner Bond: The History of a South African Political Party. Cape Town, London, New York: OUP, 1966.
- Elphick, Richard, and Rodney Davenport, eds. Christianity in South Africa. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1997.
- Isichei, Elizabeth. A History of Christianity in Africa from Antiquity to the Present. London: SPCK, 1995.
- Mitchener, James. The Covenant. New York: Random House, 1980.
- Moodie, T. Dunbar. The Rise of Afrikanerdom: Power, Apartheid, and the Afrikaner Civil Religion. Berkeley, Los Angeles, and London: University of California Press, 1975.

NEIL LETTINGA

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY (1752–1817)

New England theologian. Dwight was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, May 14, 1752, the son of Timothy (Major) Dwight and Mary Edwards, oldest daughter of distinguished Puritan divine, JONATHAN EDWARDS. In 1777 he married Mary Woolsey, with whom he had seven sons. In 1795 he became president, chaplain, and professor of THEOLOGY at Yale College, where he died January 11, 1817.

Like his grandfather, Dwight entered Yale at the age of twelve, and there he studied JOHN LOCKE'S philosophy, rhetoric, poetry, and the arts. When in 1771 he was appointed a tutor by the college, he worked with several colleagues, the most prominent of whom was Joel Barlow, to seek an authentic American literary style. Dwight's experiments with poetry, such as The Conquest of Canaan (1785) and Greenfield Hill (1794), fell short of his literary aspirations but communicated Dwight's feelings about America's destiny. In 1774 Dwight joined the College Church as a professing member and rededicated himself to serving God, and in 1777 he was licensed to preach by the Congregational church. That same year he became a chaplain to the Continental Army.

Accepting the invitation to Greenfield Hill in 1783 marked the beginning of Dwight's life work, advancing the cause of evangelical Christianity in the nation. He published the first of many arguments, an anonymous poem The Triumph of Infidelity, against the "infidels," whom he believed threatened the Protestant establishment of New England. These perceived enemies of Christianity were as varied as Deists, Universalists, or President THOMAS JEFFERSON. He also began the series of sermons that would be his theological statement, Theology Explained and Defended. The return to Yale gave him a pulpit to address not only New England, but also the nation. Claiming the mantle of the Edwardian TRADITION, he constructed a Christianity informed by empirical rationalism and pragmatism that was the foundation for the PREACHING of the Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). Through his students, among whom were LYMAN BEECHER and NATHANIEL TAYLOR, he declared that the Christian religion and New England CULTURE mutually supported each other and could create the KINGDOM OF GOD in America. The Protestant crusade of the nineteenth century proceeded on the basis of this claim.

See also Deism; Unitarian Universalist Association; Universalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Dwight, Timothy. Travels in New-England and New York. 4 vols. London: William Baynes and Son, 1823.

Secondary Sources:

Cunningham, Charles. Timothy Dwight 1752–1817, A Biography. New York: Macmillan, 1942.

Howard, Leon. The Connecticut Wits. Chicago, IL: University of Chicago Press, 1943.

Wenzke, Annabelle. Timothy Dwight and the Beginning of the American Evangelical Tradition. Lewiston, NY: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.

ANNABELLE S.WENZKE

E

ECCLESIASTICAL ORDINANCES

When it became clear that the earliest Protestants were not going to be able to secure the reforms they wanted within the structure of the Roman Catholic Church, they began creating new ecclesiastical institutions. To give these institutions shape, they drafted new laws or ordinances, which in effect became constitutions for reformed churches. These ecclesiastical ordinances were normally first drafted by a clergyman for a city, and then adopted, usually with a few revisions and amendments, by the city's government. Many of these ordinances were later revised and extended to cover broader areas, an entire province, even a kingdom.

Perhaps the first complete set of ecclesiastical ordinances was drafted for the Hanseatic city of Stralsund by the Lutheran theologian Johannes Aepinus (1499–1553) in 1525. It provided for the selection of clergymen whose primary function would be to preach, thus providing a significant break with Catholic parish priests whose primary function had been to administer the sacraments. It provided for schools to teach children basic skills and Scripture, with additional provision of Latin schools to prepare students for professions. It also provided for the care of the poor through the creation of a common chest. The Stralsund Council added the provision that one of the preachers would have general charge of the entire establishment, becoming its superintendent.

This pattern was duplicated again and again by clergymen all over Europe. There were some who became particularly well known for the ecclesiastical ordinances they drafted and often then implemented. One of these was JOHANNES BRENZ (1499–1570), who drafted an ordinance for the city of Hall and the surrounding territory in 1526, and then went on to become one of the leading creators and leaders of new ecclesiastical institutions in the principality of Württemberg. Another was JOHANNES BUGENHAGEN (1485–1558). He drafted ordinances for a number of leading cities in north GERMANY, including Braunschweig in 1528, Hamburg in 1529, and Lübeck in 1531. He also assisted in creating ordinances for wider territories, including Pomerania in 1535, DENMARK between 1537 and 1539, and Schleswig-Holstein in 1542. The ordinances drafted by Bugenhagen followed the same basic pattern as those of Aepinus and Brenz. They typically created an office of superintendent and provided for the selection and supervision of preaching clergy, the establishment of schools (both elementary and advanced), and a common chest to finance the church and assist the poor. They also, however, added a good deal. Bugenhagen began the practice of adding details on the rituals to be practiced by clergymen that became an ever more important feature of later Lutheran ecclesiastical ordinances. They often became liturgical manuals as much as constitutions, sometimes even appending an entire catechism or confession of faith.

A significantly different pattern was devised by JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) for the city of Geneva in 1541. Unlike the Lutheran ecclesiastical ordinances, it made no provision for a superintendent. It did include provision for selecting a first order of ministers called pastors, on the basis of their willingness to accept received theology, their skills as preachers, and their willingness to live according to strict moral precepts. The second order of ministers, called doctors, taught in schools, both on elementary and advanced levels. The fourth order of ministers, called deacons, gathered and administered assets for the relief of the poor. Its most important innovation, however, was a third order of ministers called elders. Their function was to gather with the pastors once a week in a new institution called the Consistory, to supervise the behavior of everyone in the community and to see to it that Genevans not only accepted correct belief but also behaved in a truly Christian manner—in short, to exercise discipline. The only powers they could use in enforcing their judgments were admonition and excommunication, and it took some time before their right to excommunicate was generally accepted. Once it was, however, they shaped the Genevan community in powerful ways and made it a model either feared or respected throughout Europe.

This Genevan pattern proved enormously influential. It was extended and imitated throughout those parts of Europe that turned Reformed or Calvinist rather than Lutheran and was revised to fit entire nations in books of discipline, notably one adopted for the Protestants of FRANCE in 1559 and for SCOTLAND in 1560.

Ecclesiastical ordinances thus served throughout Europe to consolidate the Protestant REFORMATION, and to give it an important ongoing structure.

References and Further Reading

- Richter, Aemilius Ludwig, ed. Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des sechzehnten. Jahrhunderts. Nieuwkoop: B.de Graaf 1846, reprinted 1967. (Complete set of ecclesiastical ordinances of the period.)
- Sehling, Emil, et al. Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des XVI. Jahrhunderts. Leipzig: O.R.Reisland 1902–.
- Rivoire, Emile, and Victor van Berchem. Les sources du droit du canton de Genève. Arau: Sauerländer, Vol. II. 1930, 377–390.

ROBERT M.KINGDON

ECCLESIOLOGY

Ecclesiology is the theological study of the nature and characteristics of the church. It is concerned primarily with the theological identity of the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church of Jesus Christ and secondarily in a derivative sense with the identities of particular churches (denominations). This article focuses on programmatic and formal aspects of ecclesiology rather than on the biblical material, the substantive issues, and the seminal theologians.

The Scope of Ecclesiology

Ecclesiology has undergone a renaissance since the 1960s, thanks to the impetus of the significantly titled Church Dogmatics of KARL BARTH, the revolution in Roman Catholic attitudes to other churches at the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), and the ecumenical movement and its stimulus to theological dialogue on the nature of the church. Ecclesiology is one of the most creative areas of theological activity today.

The term “ecclesiology” derives from Latinized forms of the Greek ekklēsia (church, assembly, congregation) and logos (reasoned discourse). As a major department of the theological enterprise ecclesiology stands alongside such traditional theological disciplines as fundamental THEOLOGY (the methods, norms, and sources of theology), anthropology (the theological study of human nature), soteriology (the theological exploration of salvation), and ESCHATOLOGY (theological reflection on the last things and the fulfilment of God’s purposes in history).

Ecclesiology embraces a wide range of subdisciplines. It may take the form of objective study of the church as an institution, an enduring, structured organization, and will then need to draw on nontheological academic approaches, such as those of sociology and statistics. Theological work on the ministry, the SACRAMENTS and LITURGY, and the forms of oversight and structures of governance in the church also fall under the purview of ecclesiology.

Ecclesiology and Missiology

The relationship between ecclesiology and MISSIOLOGY is particularly interesting. There is a sense in which missiology is a subdivision of ecclesiology, for it is the church that is mandated to mission and it is the lay and ordained members of the church who engage in it. Mission is not the act of freelance individuals who bear no relation to the church, but is an activity of the church. Mission is, therefore, an ecclesial matter. On the other hand, mission is greater than the church, taking its rise in the missio dei that springs from God's eternal being and purpose. The church plays its Godgiven part as an instrument of a purpose that transcends it.

Missiology, the study of the principles and practice of Christian mission (including EVANGELISM/evangeli-zation) is therefore a major theological discipline in its own right. However, ecclesiology and missiology should always go hand in hand. A study of the church that is not orientated to mission will tend to be inwardlooking and uncritical. Reflection on mission that is not geared to the WORSHIP, ministry, and oversight of the church is likely to be rather freewheeling, individualistic, and unaccountable. An ecclesiology for our time, an age of pluralism of faiths and consumerist materialism—as well as of spiritual searching and New Age syncretism—will be infused with mission concerns and insights. Now that the momentum of Barthianism, Vatican II, and ECUMENISM has slackened, it seems likely that ecclesiology will take its direction from missiology in the immediate future and so find fresh energy.

The fact that ecclesiology today is conducted in the context of a pluralism of world religions and secular worldviews lends it an “apologetic” dimension; it will always have one eye on the claims of alternative positions. It will need to show why the Christian vision of divine community is valid and can be justified in the face of criticism and indifference. Ecclesiology needs to be persuasive, to engage in advocacy, and to set out its credentials. It will strive to bring to light the Christian understanding of the church as the body of Christ, to lead the enquirer beyond the institutional face of the church (and of the churches), and to reveal its mystical nature.

The Ecumenical Context

Ecclesiology today also needs to take the ecumenical context seriously. On the basis of gradual growth in mutual understanding and respect through virtually a century of the ecumenical movement, the churches now stand in an unprecedented relationship to each other. Through their association in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) and national councils of churches (or equivalents) and through theological dialogue, they recognize, implicitly or explicitly and to one degree or another, the one church of Jesus Christ in each other. The churches stand in a relation of mutual reception (drawing from each other's life and theology) and mutual accountability. That is to say, they are in various degrees of communion (koinonid) with each other.

Because ecclesiology in an ecumenical age is compelled to recognize the degree of communion that exists between churches, it cannot be merely confessional. In confessional ecclesiology we tend to define our own church over against other churches, as though they were not also and equally church. Ecclesiology must be pursued in an explicitly ecumenical manner, so that different ecclesial voices are invited to participate in the discussion, and conclusions are formulated in a way that is sensitive and respectful to ecumenical partners. The fullest expression of this approach is found in the work of the World Council of Churches Faith and Order Commission, and its most fruitful outcome so far is the report Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982).

A Viable Ecclesiology

A good deal of ecclesiology in the second half of the twentieth century reflected the culture of modernity (see MODERNISM). It was optimistic, expansive, and even grandiose. Self-criticism and humility were not its most obvious characteristics. Ecumenical ecclesiology has often been conducted in the stratosphere, drawing up ideal models of a united church, without sufficiently reflecting on the ambiguities of the concept of unity itself or the intractable difficulties of implementing a strong organizational concept of unity. It has not been sufficiently grounded in practical realities, including the hard-won convictions and well-winnowed practices that help to form the identities of particular churches. As modernity gives way to post-modernity, a somewhat chastened ecclesiology—one that is pursued in a more tentative, exploratory, piecemeal, and down-to-earth way—is appropriate. It needs to find a voice that is practical and realistic and can point to incremental ways forward to greater unity in mission.

A Feminist Ecclesiology?

FEMINIST THEOLOGY has not been drawn to ecclesiology. Christian feminists tend to be ambivalent about ordination. The dominantly androcentric, patriarchal, and sexist character of historic Christianity provokes alienation from the institutional church. Feminist ecclesiology often espouses a radically alternative vision of church, one shaped by women for women. However, feminist theologians who have remained within the historic churches point out that the church has given women much as well as denying them much. Feminist ecclesiology wants to reshape the church's self-understanding and to transform its practice. This involves a critique of CHRISTOLOGY that emphasizes that it was human nature, created in the image of God, not merely the nature of the human male, that was united with the Word in the Incarnation. Feminist ecclesiology goes on to deconstruct the biblical and traditional images of the church as the body or bride of Christ, before setting about reconstructing ecclesial imagery along androgynous lines, stressing the mutuality of women and men.

Strength and Weakness

The Protestant traditions of ecclesiology are marked by a critical principle: The gospel is more important than the institution, spirit is superior to structure. Catholic ecclesiology, on the other hand, stresses that structure is necessary for the spirit to work and that the institution is the essential vehicle of the gospel. It is Protestant shorthand to say that the gospel—and only the gospel—constitutes the church. What this slogan means is that Christ constitutes the church as his mystical body through the power of the gospel, which is tangibly embodied in word and sacrament. These two concrete expressions of the gospel make Christ present in the community. Thus, Protestant ecclesiology has centered around the twin foci of Word and Sacrament. In this sense, the gospel is the radical critical principle of Protestant ecclesiology and relativizes every institutional structure of ministry and oversight.

The weakness of Protestant ecclesiology has been the tendency to equate the spiritual with the invisible and the worldly with the visible. MARTIN LUTHER and PHILIPP MELANCHTHON had to defend themselves against the charge that they were postulating a purely Platonic church, one removed from concrete reality. KARL BARTH and FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER played off the unchanging inward essence of the church against the changing outward form. To this extent Protestant ecclesiology veers toward docetism and gnosticism, whereas Catholic ecclesiology is typically in danger of idolizing the institutional expression of the church. However, institutional structures of ministry and oversight are needed in every properly constituted church. The tension between the authenticating power of the Gospel and the structures that are necessary to facilitate its work generates much of the creative energy of ecclesiology.

Of course, anyone, Christian or not, may take up ecclesiology or any other aspect of theology, but it makes a difference if one loves the church as such—and one's own church, too. Christians often need to be given permission to love the church. Then ecclesiology becomes a joy and a privilege. However, theologians, like other Christians, sometimes have a lovehate relationship with the Church/church, which can result in destructive elements creeping into ecclesiology. Ecclesiology should be constructive and conducted in an irenic, ecumenical spirit as far as possible, but without being bland and the ecclesiastical equivalent of politically correct. Only occasionally, and where necessary to maintain a lively dialogue, should it be fiercely polemical, in the spirit of the Reformers and their antagonists alike.

See also Church

References and Further Reading

- Avis, P. "Church," in Christianity: A Complete Guide. Edited by J. Bowden. London and New York: Continuum, 2004.
- . "Ecclesiology," in The Blackwell Encyclopedia of Modern Christian Thought. Edited by A.E. McGrath, 127–134. Oxford, UK and Cambridge, MA: Blackwell, 1993.
- . Christians in Communion. London: Geoffrey Chapman Mowbray; Minneapolis, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990.
- . Ecumenical Theology, London: SPCK, 1986.
- . Truth Beyond Words. Cambridge, MA: Cowley Press, 1986.
- Bosch, D. Transforming Mission, Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1992.
- Fiorenza, E.S. In Memory of Her: A Feminist Reconstruction of Christian Origins, 2nd ed. London: SCM Press, 1993.
- Healy, N.M. Church, World and the Christian Life: Practical Prophetic Ecclesiology, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Holze, H., ed. The Church as Communion: Lutheran Contributions to Ecclesiology. Geneva, Switzerland: Lutheran World Federation, 1997.
- Ward, K. Religion and Community, Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 2000.
- Watson, N.K. Introducing Feminist Ecclesiology. London and New York: Continuum/Sheffield Academic Press, 2002.
- Zizioulas, J.D. Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church. London: Darton, Longman & Todd; New York: St. Vladimir Seminary Press, 1985.

PAUL AVIS

ECOLOGY

“Ecology” etymologically derives from the Greek oikos+logos, or “study of the household.” Herein lies a clue to its modern usage: both the branch of scientific study called ecology and the popular movement regarding the proper treatment of the natural environment accent living things in relation, depending as in a household on one another.

As a recognizable social and moral movement, ecology arose in the late 1960s following the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT in the UNITED STATES. Many early writings of the ecology (or “green”) movement were secular, even antagonistic to Christianity, alleging it encouraged humankind to view the nonhuman, natural world entirely instrumentally. Development of this critique issued in the charge of “anthropocentrism” or human-centeredness. In response, the great chorus of Christian theological writing on ecology or environmental ethics in the final quarter of the twentieth century opened on a defensive note. Some theologians, drawing on PROCESS THEOLOGY or FEMINIST THEOLOGY, have pressed for a radical reform of Christianity based on the new ecological consciousness. Yet others, accenting common biblical ideas such as creation stewardship, have maintained that Christianity is inherently ecological, even if this requires rediscovery.

Historical Protestant Thought

Protestantism can claim a history of ecological concern. In prayers published in 1910, WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH confessed that “in the past we have exercised the high dominion of man with ruthless cruelty, so that the voice of the Earth, which should have gone up to thee in song, has been a groan of travail” (Rauschenbusch 1984:223). Further back, the typical pattern of classical Protestant systematic THEOLOGY opened with an exposition of “God the creator” of all things. So JOHN CALVIN speaks of the “excellence of divine art” apparent in the “whole workmanship of the universe.” Hence, ecology as the study of relations in the natural oikos is contained within the DOCTRINE of creation. Intriguingly, KARL BARTH places ETHICS there also; it concerns human work, formed on the creative work of God. For Barth, Sabbath rest locates the meaning of human and divine work in creation and redemption, because the Sabbath celebrates the completed work of God. Creation, consequently, cannot be for mere use; rather, we glory in its dizzying variety and, as in Genesis, properly steward it as gift. Indeed, the strength of the concept of stewardship preserves classical REFORMATION Theologies like Calvin's from maintaining that creation is solely for human benefit, as secular critics allege. Earthly things are "entrusted to us, and we must one day render account of them" (Calvin 1559:III,X,5).

Contemporary Ecology and the Bible

One strand of contemporary Protestant ecological thinking has continued to emphasize creation and stewardship. American evangelical Christians have favored stewardship language with its clear biblical roots. Paul Santmire has accented this biblical and Reformation legacy, attempting an "ecological reading of biblical faith." Acknowledging Christianity's ambiguous ecological record, Santmire maintains Christianity is inherently ecological and resists the radical reorganization of Christian thought according to recent trends. The ecological challenge has no quick answer—the BIBLE teaches that life's struggles are complicated and hard—but Christians can respond from within their TRADITION with thoughtfulness and care.

Biblical emphasis among Protestant fundamentalists on environmental issues has led to controversy. American Secretary of the Interior (1980–1983) and ASSEMBLY OF GOD church member James Watt publically noted that "the Lord may come soon" when speaking of ecological policy; to some this implied the environment need not be protected. Bible reading, many LIBERAL PROTESTANTS contend, can therefore hardly be sufficient; instead, theology must be radically transformed by ecology.

New Ecotheologies

Searching for "deep ecology" in theology, while yet accenting creation, thinkers such as Matthew Fox and Thomas Berry have attempted to reconstruct a "universe story" that depends on evolutionary theory but sees all created things as deeply interconnected. On both thinkers' admission, the Christian tradition, although providing insight, is inadequate to the ecological reorientation required by current knowledge about the interdependency and fluidity of the universe.

In a related reorientation, citing Alfred North Whitehead's view that the universe was a process, open-ended in its ultimate destination, process theologians such as John Cobb have advanced a speculative view of God and nature unfolding together. Such theology hopefully can empower Christians and others to live as activate participants in the rich variety of interwoven and evolving communities that make up the unfolding world.

A third set of thinkers, "ecofeminists," have linked hierarchical models of AUTHORITY to the domination and destruction of the natural environment wrought by Western cultures. An earthier, embodied feminist theology can result in revolutionized understandings of how humankind and nature relate. Catholic feminist Rosemary Ruether has directed this critique toward ENLIGHTENMENT philosophies that develop sharp distinctions between humans and NATURE. Because these philosophies sustain liberal Protestantism, ecological rethinking may need also to transcend it. Indeed, the pervasive intellectual instability of POSTMODERNISM introduces unclarity about where the radical ecological critique will lead. Perhaps fittingly, ecotheology is in flux, and likely will be for some time.

Practical Outcomes

Despite differences, the various ecological theologies agree on increased need for “green” sensitivity and on policies that protect the environment. Indeed, predominantly Protestant bodies have issued practical recommendations, such as the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES’ 101 Ways to Help Save the Earth. Theology cannot reduce to policy and recommendations, for at the heart of Christianity lies a vision of interdependencies in the oikos between human beings, God, and creation. Because Protestantism inspired the rise of capitalist modernity (as MAX WEBER maintained), it may indeed be implicated in the human abuse of creation rooted in the denial of these dependencies (see MODERNISM). However, the pragmatic orientation of Protestant thought and its commitment to reexamine cultural practices in the light of the biblical witness suggest both a deep theological/ecological reexamination and practical ecologically sensitive behavioral changes are both within its future reach.

References and Further Reading

- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1559. Translated by Ford Lewis Battles. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Cobb, John B. Is It Too Late? A Theology of Ecology. Berkeley, CA: Bruce, 1972.
- Fowler, Robert Booth. The Greening of Protestant Thought. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Fox, Matthew. Creation Spirituality: Liberating Gifts for the Peoples of the Earth. San Francisco: Harper, 1991.
- . 101 Ways to Help Save the Earth. New York: EcoJustice Working Group of the National Council of Churches, 1990.
- Rauschenbusch, Walter. Walter Rauschenbusch: Selected Writings. Edited by Winthrop S. Hudson. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Gaia and God: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.
- Santmire, H. Paul. The Travail of Nature: The Ambiguous Ecological Promise of Christian Theology. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1985.

CHARLES R. PINCHES

ECONOMICS

Protestant theology has been a fertile source of reflection on economics. Many Protestant theologians contributed to the development of the discipline and the entrepreneurial lifestyle of many Protestant church members encouraged economic growth in their societies. In the twentieth century Protestant churches engaged in dialogue about economic development worldwide, whereas in recent decades there has been great interest in the economic potential of Pentecostal congregations in the developing world.

The two great Reformation theologians who wrote on economic life were MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN. Luther developed an account of VOCATION (Beruf), although there is no single work in which he reflects on the meaning of employment. He argued that love of neighbor is fulfilled through daily work, which becomes a divine ordinance. The four orders of creation where God expresses God's will are the FAMILY, the state, employment, and the CHURCH. Any form of work can express a vocation by which we serve God and enable society to be preserved. Such an understanding of society means that vocation applies to all people and the governance of this ordering is by law and not gospel. This teaching enabled late medieval society to break free of an ethic where only religious employment was of value. In medieval teaching, praecepta were ethical maxims for all Christians but consilia were for the minority who were ordained or in religious orders. Luther swept this distinction away.

However, Calvin was to take Luther's teaching considerably further. Calvin argued that the proof of ELECTION was demonstrated by the fruits of daily life, especially in employment and one's calling. The three ethical maxims that Calvin enjoined were diligence in lawful callings, ASCETICISM in regard to consumption, and the constructive use of time. All this led to what was later called the Protestant work ethic. Calvin put it well when he wrote: "We know that people were created for the express purpose of being employed in labour of various kinds, and that no sacrifice is more pleasing to God than when everyone applies diligently to one's own calling, and endeavours to live in such a manner as to contribute to the general advantage." The Calvinist interest in stewardship created a new work-force that responded to the discipline of work. Protestant beliefs encouraged a moral and ascetic work-force.

Calvin also provided an exegesis of Deuteronomy 23:20, which enabled the restrictions on usury to be put aside. He claimed that this restriction applied only to the Hebrews. Usury should be regulated but it could be allowed. Calvin fixed the maximum rate of interest for the parishes of Geneva at 5 percent, prohibited exacting interest from the poor, and allowed ministers to invest for interest. Calvin transformed scriptural exegesis by arguing that money could be used to create wealth in the same way as land. This was not entirely a free market, however. The new technology in Calvin's day was printing and Calvin regulated the industry carefully.

In the centuries succeeding the REFORMATION the teaching of Protestantism was consistent on the nature of work. Some Protestant theologians also contributed to the study of economics, especially the nineteenth-century Scottish minister THOMAS CHALMERS.

Chalmers argued for a free market alongside a campaign of charitable giving that would replace state welfare (see CHARITY). He was deeply influential among business leaders in nineteenth-century SCOTLAND. However, it was to be the American WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH who next contributed to an analysis of the market economy. He was a Baptist pastor in New York in the 1890s who challenged both society and the churches to engage with "men out of work, out of clothes, out of shoes, out of hope." Rauschenbusch launched the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement, which argued that the moral dimension of economics must always be considered by Christians. Shortly after this, MAX WEBER wrote his famous study in 1904 in GERMANY on "The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism," in which he claimed that economic development occurred in cultures that had a strong Protestant ethic to encourage entrepreneurial behavior. These two dimensions of the moral response to economics, and the contribution Protestant values and beliefs make to economics, have shaped the debate ever since.

Contemporary debates on economics divide on the ethics of the free market and whether this is a "status confessionis" for Christians. Those who argue this include Ulrich Duchrow, a German theologian, who has published many books through the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC). He has argued for radical church protest against the involvement of the Western Protestant churches in the capitalist economy. He believes contemporary capitalism is demonic; he was a major influence at the 1983 Vancouver Assembly and the 1991 Canberra Assembly of the WCC. Another German Protestant theologian committed to socialist economics is JÜRGEN MOLTMANN, although his views differ slightly from those of Duchrow. Moltmann argues for "economic co-determination and control of economic power by the producers."

There are many Protestant theologians and churches that would disagree with any adoption of socialist, or Marxist, economic beliefs. Among the critics of this approach would be the English Anglican theologians Ronald Preston and John Atherton. In the UNITED STATES, Lutheran Robert Benne and Methodist J.P. Wogaman would have a similar debate about the free market. Lord Griffiths in England is a Protestant banker who espoused the neoclassical economics of the Conservative Government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. His books argue for the need to adopt free market economics.

Finally many Pentecostal churches in AFRICA, Asia, and Latin America, as well as in the Western world, have become agents of economic renewal in impoverished societies.

References and Further Reading

Atherton, J. Christianity and the Market. London: SPCK, 1992.

Hilton, B. The Age of Atonement: The Influence of Evangelicalism on Social and Economic Thought 1785–1865. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1988.

Stackhouse, M. Public Theology and Political Economy. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1987.

Weber, M. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. London: Allen and Unwin, 1985.

PETER SEDGWICK

ECUMENICAL AGREEMENTS

The twentieth century has been the era of ecumenism, the effort, both formal and informal, both domestic and international, to bridge the chasms that have divided not only the various Protestant churches but Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches as well. The goals of these ecumenical efforts has ranged from organizing common local activities, such as ecumenical Thanksgiving Day services in the United States, to “altar and pulpit fellowship,” where the churches involved allow exchange of clergy both for preaching and celebrating the Lord’s Supper. An important aspect of the twentieth century ecumenical momentum has been the organizational merger of different denominations, such as the merger of the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church into the United Church of Christ or the formation of the United Methodist Church. In countries such as Nigeria, Canada, or India, the ecumenical momentum has entailed the formation of “united” or “uniting” churches.

Perhaps the most important, albeit not widely known, phenomenon in this connection has been a number of ecumenical agreements reached in Europe by various churches. The Leuenberg Agreement of 1973 instituted church fellowship or “full mutual recognition” among some 85 Lutheran, Reformed, and United (Lutheran and Reformed) churches all over Europe even including five churches in Argentina and Uruguay. In 1988, agreement was reached in Meissen, Germany, between the CHURCH OF ENGLAND and the 24 Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches in Germany that comprise the Evangelical Church of Germany (EKD) with regard to pulpit and altar fellowship. The Meissen Common Statement’s six paragraphs identify ten agreements in matters of theology but acknowledge the unresolved difference over the historic episcopal succession. This latter point of unresolved disagreement prevented the mutual recognition of ministries in the Meissen Statement.

The Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Chairmen of the EKD Council and the Church Leaders’ Conference of the Federation (Bishops Kruse and Demke) solemnly signed the Meissen Common Statement in Westminster Abbey in January 1991. A second signing of the Statement took place in February 1991 in Berlin. The two parties declared their intention to “take all possible steps to closer fellowship in as many areas of Christian life and witness as possible, so that all our members together may advance on the way to full, visible unity.”

In 1993, a similar agreement to enter into fellowship was reached at Porvoo, Finland, between the Church of England, the Church of Ireland, the Church of Wales on the one side and the Scandinavian Lutheran Churches, together with the Lutheran Churches of Iceland, Estonia and Lithuania, on the other. The agreement is named Porvoo after the city in which it was signed.

The agreement covers important points of agreement under six headings. It acknowledges all signatory churches as belonging to the one holy, catholic, and apostolic church. The agreement also acknowledges that in the signatory churches the Word of God is authentically preached, and the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist are properly administered; that the signatory churches share the common confession of the apostolic faith; that oversight (episcopate) is exercised in the signatory churches in various ways in order to express continuity of apostolic life, mission, and ministry; that the episcopal office is valued in the signatory churches as a visible sign of expressing and serving the unity of the church and its continuity in apostolic life, mission, and ministry; that persons episcopally ordained in any of the churches to the office of bishop, priest, or deacon are welcome to serve, by invitation, in the same ministry in the receiving church without reordination; and that bishops from another signatory church normally be invited to participate in the laying on of hands at the ordination of new bishops as a sign of the unity and continuity of the church.

A Lutheran-Roman Catholic Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification evoked considerable controversy at its public presentation, especially in Germany, where virtually all Lutheran professors of theology signed a letter of opposition. Nonetheless, it was signed by representatives of the Vatican and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION On October 31, 1998. It summarized the sixteenth century controversies over this issue as essentially disagreements over language.

In the United States, the agreement of 2001 between the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA and the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, USA, entitled Called to Common Mission, stipulated that in return for the Episcopal recognition of the legitimacy of current Lutheran ELCA ministry, the ELCA would henceforth ordain candidates for the ministry with a bishop present, and candidates for the office of bishop with an Episcopal bishop present. A temporary Episcopal concession was here matched by a permanent ELCA concession. The Call to Common Mission statement at first did not receive the necessary majority vote by the church-wide assembly of the ELCA. The document had to be submitted to a second vote, where it was approved. The document gave rise to an opposition movement within the ELCA, the Word Alone Network, and it continues to threaten a split in the ELCA.

All in all, these ecumenical initiatives appear to have excited mainly church officials and rarely had significant or meaningful impact on the local congregational level. The explanation may well lie in the reality that on the local, personal level traditional religious antagonisms have long given way to mutual understanding and acceptance, despite continuing theological or ecclesial differences. Moreover, the various agreements have essentially involved only churches of the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican traditions. Thus, large denominations, such as the Baptists, have not been involved.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional

References and Further Reading

- Best, Thomas F., ed. Survey of Church Union Negotiations, 1988–1991. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1992.
- Best, Thomas F., ed. Survey of Church Union Negotiations, 1996–1999. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 2000.
- Bouteneff, Peter C., ed. Episkopé and Episcopacy and the Quest for Visible Unity: Two Consultations. Geneva: WCC Publications, 1999.
- Hüffmeier, Wilhelm, and Podmore, Colin, eds. Leuenberg, Meissen and Porvoo: Consultation Between the Churches of the Leuenberg Church Fellowship and the Churches Involved in the Meissen Agreement and the Porvoo Agreement. Frankfurt am Main: O.Lembeck, 1996.
- Making Unity More Visible: the Report of the Meissen Commission, 1997–2001*. London: Church House Publishing, 2002.
- Nigeria Church Union Committee. Scheme of Church Union, Including Basis of Union, Constitution of the Church of Nigeria, and Inauguration and Interim Arrangements. Lagos, 1963.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

ECUMENISM

Ecumenism is a relatively recent term for an ancient Christian commitment to both unity and mission “to the whole inhabited earth.” It was not widely embraced as a major religious imperative in Protestantism until the twentieth century, despite earlier foreshadowings. Although it seems like a simple concept, ecumenism is beset with ambiguities and tensions regarding the nature of the unity that Protestants seek.

Terminology

Ecumenism, conceived as the task of knitting together the divisions within Christianity on behalf of the entire world, may extend as far back as New Testament times and the debate concerning Gentile missions at the Jerusalem Conference. However, the term “ecumenism” is itself modern, unlike its more ancient cognate “ecumenical,” and reflects an intentionality and sense of urgency coordinate with an era of religious freedom, pluralism, and globalism.

According to a 1997 study by the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), “there is no authoritative definition of the term, and it is in fact used to characterize a wide range of activities, ideas and organizational arrangements” (“TCUV,” p. 4). Part of the terminological difficulty is that an old wineskin is being made to hold new wine. The terms “ecumenism” and “ecumenical” both derive from the Greek oikoumene, which referred to a geographical—not theological or ecclesiological—reality, that is: “the whole inhabited world.” This is the usage in scripture. During the patristic era “ecumenical” assumed a more ecclesiological connotation meaning the whole church. From the first, therefore, ecumenism was dual: concern for all humanity; concern for the unity of Christians.

The term “ecumenical” was seldom used until the nineteenth century, although a few European Protestant leaders, like the Swiss founder of the Red Cross, Henri Dunant, began speaking of an “ecumenical spirit,” apparently referring to the promotion of cooperation and unity among Christians. The specific nature of that unity was unclear.

This usage was also complicated by the fact that the task of promoting Christian unity was never conceived as an end in itself but linked to a grander mission—to witness and serve the whole world (the oikoumene). Thus the actual corporate “reunion” of divided churches expresses only a small part of what is generally meant by ecumenism.

As these terms became increasingly common in twentieth-century Protestantism—and Christianity generally—different ecumenical orientations materialized: ecclesial ecumenism, theological ecumenism, mission-driven ecumenism, and even interfaith ecumenism, which broadens the term beyond its specifically Christian content. Although useful to evaluate differences in emphasis and orientation, these orientations overlap in practice. What unites all forms of ecumenism is the divine imperative to reconnect Christians to each other and to the presence of God in the world.

History of Protestant Ecumenism before 1900

The first Protestant reformers did not intend to divide Western Christianity but to make the gospel the basis for Christian unity. JOHN CALVIN, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, MARTIN BUCER, and THOMAS CRANMER, among others, sought to reconcile their own theological differences and even explored rapprochement with Roman Catholic authorities, especially at the Colloquy of Regensburg in 1541 (see REGENSBURG, COLLOQUY). Unfortunately the hardening of doctrinal divisions and the emergent national and territorial Protestant church systems dashed such hopes. However, isolated Protestant voices—such as JAN LASKE, JOHN COMENIUS, GEORGE CALIXT, Hugh Grotius, John Dury, and many others—continued to keep alive the irenic ideal of a theologically and spiritually unified Christendom.

The roots of modern Protestant ecumenism, however, do not lie primarily in past schemes for reunion but with the Pietist and the Evangelical movements of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. These built a sense of international Christian fellowship and sympathy across the Northern European and trans-Atlantic communities. By focusing on personal experience rather than DOCTRINE or liturgical conformity, they promoted a form of Protestantism that transcended its divisions. JOHN WESLEY’S phrase, “if thy heart is as mine, give me thy hand,” exemplified this spirit.

Equally important, these movements expected a coming universal church based on a union of hearts and prayers. There was an undercurrent of apostolic and eschatological fervor in this anticipation of a global “Age of the Spirit,” and a missionary zeal. In ENGLAND the Wesleys and GEORGE WHITEFIELD, in America COTTON and INCREASE MATHER and JONATHAN EDWARDS, and in GERMANY the MORAVIAN CHURCH and Count NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON ZINZENDORF were all drawn to mission frontiers. In Pennsylvania Zinzendorf tried in vain to unite Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) and other Christians in a “Church of the Spirit.” In Massachusetts Edwards issued a “Humble Plea” for a worldwide concert of PRAYER for the arrival of the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth. In 1793 New Divinity preacher SAMUEL HOPKINS described a future world united by Christianity in global peace, justice, goodwill, racial harmony, and enlightenment.

The nineteenth century witnessed countless examples of practical interdenominational cooperation. These included reform and service agencies, like the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, the American Anti-Slavery Society, the Inner Mission in Germany, and international agencies like the YMCA/YWCA, the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE, the Student Volunteer Movement, and the World's Student Christian Federation (WSCF). The latter provided the leaders of the twentieth-century ecumenical movement: JOHN R. MOTT, NATHAN SÖDERBLOM, WILLEM ADOLF VISSER 'T HOOFT, J.H. Oldham, WILLIAM TEMPLE, and others.

Proposals for church unions proliferated. The PRUSSIAN UNION (1817) set the stage for later efforts to reunify the continental Reformation churches. Proposals for a united Protestant Church came from a variety of corners: the CAMPBELL FAMILY (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), SAMUEL SCHMUCKER (LUTHERANISM), PHILIP SCHAFF (Reformed), William Augustus Muhlenberg and William Reed Huntingdon (Episcopal), and Henry Lunn (British METHODISM). In the 1890s the Grindelwald Conferences held in SWITZERLAND brought Protestants together to explore differences and pray for unity. The LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL adopted by Anglicans (see CHURCH OF ENGLAND) in 1888 proposed using the historic apostolic episcopacy and the faith of the first Christian communities as a basis for a unity that would not only build bridge Protestantism but reach out to Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

Even the new theological trends of the nineteenth century contributed. The nascent liberalism of FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER in Germany, FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE in England, and HORACE BUSHNELL in America created an impatience with doctrinaire theological divisions and argumentation. TRANSCENDENTALISM generated an impatience with institutions; and theological ROMANTICISM and ANGLO-CATHOLICISM yearned for the experience of sacramental unity.

Within a brief span of time transnational confessional associations were formed: the LAMBETH CONFERENCE (1867), the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES (1875), the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL (1881), the International Congregational Council (1891), the BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE (1905), and the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION (1923). These created a structure that facilitated later ecumenical dialogue and cooperation.

Modern Protestant Ecumenism

By 1900 the stage was set for a worldwide ecumenical movement. Modern ecumenism was to have both a churchward and a worldward direction, consistently linking unity in matters of faith and fellowship to shared mission, witness, and service to the world at large. Many diverse strands of thought and activity fed this enterprise. Until the 1960s the overriding motivation was to stall the seeming erosion of the Christian West and revitalize the Christian presence in the world in the wake of modernization and the impact of religious freedom. This apparent convergence of interests, however, was more apparent than real, and it began to be challenged in the 1960s. By the end of the century the notion that Christian diversity and pluralism might be better signs of ecumenical health than like-mindedness was espoused openly, requiring rethinking of the nature of ecumenical unity.

In 1900 the large Ecumenical Missionary Conference, which was organized in New York City by WSCF leaders, called for a unified Protestant missionary effort. Their hopes came to fruition at the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE of 1910 in Edinburgh, in which representatives of international Protestant missionary agencies around the world spoke of unity as the key to successful global evangelization. Meanwhile major Protestant denominations in the United States—concerned about home missions, urbanization, and industrialization—collaborated in 1908 to form the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America (the predecessor of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES). Several American denominations also called for new initiatives at theological and ecclesial unification.

World War I disrupted all such plans. Rather than quenching enthusiasm, however, the war spurred it on. Protestant leaders dealt with the collapse of “Christendom” in Europe and the new realities of international politics, economics, and social thought by taking advantage of the molten situation. Three major strands of ecumenical activity emerged in the 1920s: the Faith and Order movement, the Life and Work movement, and the International Missionary Conference. All three eventually merged to form the WCC.

The Faith and Order movement, which was begun in 1927 at Lausanne, Switzerland, by American Episcopal bishop CHARLES BRENT, promoted a theological brand of ecumenism. Its immediate goal was not to construct church merger schemes but to pursue theological dialogue to clarify confessional differences and misunderstandings and prepare a path for full sacramental reconciliation and ministerial mutuality among the churches. The Ecumenical Institute at Bossy, Switzerland was particularly instrumental in promoting comparative ecclesiological studies.

In 1948 the Commission on Faith and Order of the new WCC took over this task. With the addition of Eastern Orthodox members in 1961 and official Roman Catholic members after Vatican II, Faith and Order envisioned the possibility of theological rapprochement among all the major branches of Christianity, based on common creedal principles and a core consensus on sacramental fellowship and ministerial orders. The result was the release in 1982 of the notable ecumenical document on Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry, which described the theological opportunities and obstacles to this goal.

The apparent confluence of these theological streams, however, was soon interrupted by demands to give the voices of people of color, the poor, WOMEN, and the Third World a powerful hearing. The new mandate pursued ecumenical theology pluralistically, with an eye for cultural context and nontheological factors. By the 1990s the coexistence of older and new visions of theological ecumenism in the Faith and Order movement had produced creative tensions that crisscrossed traditional confessional lines.

Mission-driven ecumenism found a home within the International Missionary Conference (IMC), the immediate successor to the 1910 Edinburgh Conference. Formed in 1921 at Lake Mohonk, New York, by Mott and Oldham, it repudiated the traditional notion of simply “exporting” Western Christianity. Rather than replicating the divisions of the West, it tried to create indigenous Christian churches that would be responsive to local cultures and local needs and flexible in worship and ministry. It shared Western resources and encouraged programs “to help unite the Christian forces of the world in seeking justice in international and inter-racial relations.” At its 1938 world conference at Tambaram, INDIA over 50 percent of the delegates were non-Western.

Ironically this ecumenical embrace of indigenous cultures and regional diversity generated more actual ecclesial unions than the Faith and Order movement. One of its successes was the formation of the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA, the first union church in which the barriers between Episcopal and non-Episcopal ministerial orders were overcome. The united churches in Northern India (see CHURCH OF NORTH INDIA) and Sri Lanka were similarly notable. In addition the IMC helped to set up many of the important local, regional, and national councils of churches throughout the mission world.

When the IMC formally merged with the WCC in 1961 as the Division (now Commission) on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME), the process of de-Westernizing Protestant ecumenism was accelerated. Over the next several decades the CWME zeroed in on the global fight against racism and apartheid, poverty and economic exploitation, restrictions on women, environmental exploitation, the dangers of globalization, and the eradication of local traditions. Such thinking created a new ecumenical agenda that situated theological and ecclesial reflection within specific cultural contexts and needs, including the need for dialogue with indigenous religious traditions. In 1976 the CWME assembled the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians and in 1982 released the important document “Mission and Evangelism—An Ecumenical Affirmation.”

A third major ecumenical player was the Life and Work movement, founded at Stockholm in 1925 under the leadership of Swedish archbishop Nathan Soderblom. It reflected Western social idealism in its urgent desire to bring a prophetic Christian moral witness to bear on the forces of modernity and secularity. In many ways Life and Work initially sought to recreate a unified Western Christian culture—to act, as Soderblom said, “on behalf of Christendom.” This bias showed up at its Second World Conference at Oxford in 1937 when only thirty delegates of 425 were from non-Western regions.

Adopting a neo-Reformation theological stance in the late 1930s, which claimed to be able to disentangle Christ from CULTURE, Life and Work recognized the benefits of mating with the Faith and Order movement. Out of this marriage came the WCC, whose vision would be “a whole church speaking the whole gospel to the whole world.” Not posing as a “super-church” nor brokering corporate mergers, the WCC created a forum, or “space,” that might function as a symbol of “visible union” by nurturing ecumenical fellowship, theological dialogue, and “mission through witness and service.”

The sense of cohesion was soon tempered, however, by calls for renewal and change coming out of the West. Starting with the 1969 “Programme to Combat Racism” and continuing through the 1974 Berlin conference on “Sexism in Church and Society,” ecumenical programs received sharp scrutiny. The “Ecumenical Decade of Churches in Solidarity with Women, 1988–1998” mandated a renewed ecumenical vision built on “solidarity” across racial, GENDER, class, and cultural divides. The WCC added SCIENCE, technology, nuclear development, bioethics, and ECOLOGY to its list of ecumenical concerns, climaxing with a program on Justice, Peace, and the Integrity of Creation.

This complicated situation was not so abnormal as it may have seemed to observers. It developed from the perennial duality of Protestant ecumenism that balanced unity and mission, witness and service, church and world. No wonder that fifty years after its founding, the WCC was still struggling with the meaning of ecumenism but now thinking in terms of pluralism, mutuality, forbearance, and “reconciling diversity.”

Additional Manifestations of Modern Ecumenism

The work of the WCC hardly exhausts the reality of ecumenism, even within Protestantism. In addition to the ecumenical work of many local, regional, and national councils of churches, formal mergers or covenant agreements between specific denominational communities were important. Between 1906 and 1968 at least twenty-six church unions took place in the UNITED STATES. Examples elsewhere were the UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA, the Evangelical Church in Germany, the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches, Church of South India, Church of North India, Church of Sri Lanka, United Church of Zambia, Uniting Reformed Church in Southern Africa, United Church in Jamaica and the Cayman Islands, and the UNITING CHURCH in Australia. According to the 1995 Consultation of United and Uniting Churches, such unions continue to provide the benchmarks for “modeling diversity within unity in communities of increasing pluralism.”

Nonetheless the fate of the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION, begun in America in 1960 by EUGENE CARSON BLAKE, reveals a growing denominational dis-interest in corporate mergers. The failure of its initial proposals for the full union of nine Protestant denominations in 1970 and later in 1988 for a “covenant communion” led to a more modest 2002 cooperative proposal, called “Churches Uniting in Christ.” The “Ecumenical Partnership” agreement of 1989 between the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST and the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST is another such cooperative scheme, as is the “Concordat of Agreement” of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA, which became effective in 2001.

In Central Europe since 1973 over 100 “Reformation” churches have formed the Leuenberg Church Fellowship, agreeing to full sacramental and pulpit fellowship with each other and “common witness and service.” Such agreements established what they termed a “communion of communions,” in which, according to the Leuenberg Agreement, “the lively plurality in styles of preaching, ways of worship, church order, and in diaconal and social action” that characterizes particular communions are preserved. As “A Protestant Understanding of Ecclesial Communion,” adopted in 2000 by the Evangelical Church of Germany, insists, “it is not the diversity that needs to be overcome, but the separation.”

The entrance of Eastern Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism into the ecumenical arena with Protestantism has also shaped the course of Protestant ecumenism. The Orthodox have brought a deep commitment to unity based on conciliar traditions and the AUTHORITY of ancient precedents. After the Second Vatican Council, Roman Catholic (RC) delegates became official members of the Commission on Faith and Order, although not full members of the WCC. The RC Church and the WCC also formed a Joint Working Group that has worked for the “restoration of the unity of all Christians” in “real and full communion.” By the 1990s nearly all programmatic units of the WCC included Catholic representation. In addition, RC delegates are full members of 35 national councils of churches and ecumenical organizations worldwide.

The bilateral dialogues between Catholics and a wide variety of Protestant faiths have been equally significant. These have removed much misunderstanding and mistrust on both sides. Especially noteworthy was the 1997 Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, in which Catholic and Lutheran theologians reached a “common understanding” of the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH.

Although many Protestant evangelicals today avoid terms like ecumenical or ecumenism, they tend to continue the nineteenth-century tradition of associational cooperation. In the United States the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS was created in 1942; in CANADA, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada in 1964. In 1951 evangelicals formed the World Evangelical Fellowship (now the World Evangelical Alliance), which resurrected the Evangelical Alliance’s tradition of uniting evangelicals in global prayer.

In 1974 the LAUSANNE COMMITTEE FOR WORLD EVANGELIZATION, an international gathering from over 150 nations, approved “The Lausanne Covenant,” affirming that God seeks “the Church’s visible unity” through “fellowship, work, and witness.” “Evangelism summons us to unity,” they said, echoing the 1910 Edinburgh Missionary Conference. Although rejecting liberal utopianism, the covenant signers affirmed that the gospel witness must not be separated from human welfare everywhere. EVANGELISM requires a “concern for justice and reconciliation throughout human society” and the “liberation of men and women from every kind of oppression.” In a phrase strikingly reminiscent of the founding statement of the WCC, though nuanced differently, Lausanne declared that “world evangelization requires the whole Church to take the whole gospel to the whole world.” Evangelicals reaffirmed this covenant fifteen years later in “The Manila Manifesto” (1989). An increased discomfort with ecumenicity, however, was apparent in its emphasis on the work of local churches and its warning that cooperation with nonevangelicals is appropriate only when biblical truths were not comprised.

Conclusion

The question remains if the past century of ecumenical enterprise would have exhilarated or disappointed its founders. Support for ecumenism continues to ebb and flow, especially within local congregations, which often prove resistant to ecumenical enthusiasms. Nonetheless global communications, technology, and cultural pluralism have all forced Christians to think and act in less parochial ways. Whether that will continue to produce an ecumenism of visible unity, as sought by the WCC, or merely one of mutual influence and cross-fertilization remains unclear. What can be said is that ecumenism has become something more complex, diverse, interactive, and organic than the simple word “unity” suggests. It is based as much on a commitment to the task of togetherness as on like-mindedness, and that has not always been characteristic of Protestant history.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional

References and Further Reading

- Brown, Robert McAfee. The Ecumenical Revolution. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1967.
- Cavert, Samuel McCrea. Church Cooperation and Unity in America: A Historical Review: 1900–1970. New York: Association Press, 1970.
- Gros, Jeffrey. Introduction to Ecumenism. New York: Paulist Press, 1998.
- Irwin, Dale. Hearing Many Voices: Dialogue and Diversity in the Ecumenical Movement. Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1994.
- Kinnamon, Michael. Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Texts and Voices. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1997.
- Lossky, Nicholas, et al. Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1991.
- Raiser, Konrad. Ecumenism in Transition. English edition. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1991.
- Rouse, Ruth, et al. A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1968. 4th edition. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1993.
- Wainwright, Geoffrey. The Ecumenical Movement: Crisis and Opportunity for the Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B. Eerdmans, 1983.
- World Council of Churches. Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the World Council of Churches. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1997.

WILLIAM M.KING

EDDY, MARY BAKER (1821–1910)

Founder of the Church of Christ, Scientist. Mary Baker was born July 16, 1821, in Bow, New Hampshire. The daughter of Mark and Abigail Baker, both descendants of New England Puritan families, Mary Baker grew up amidst the Protestant revivals, reform movements, and utopian experiments known as the Second Great Awakening. The religious idealism of the awakening exerted a lasting influence on her thought, as did the awakening's emphasis on the transformational power of religious experience. With regard to more specific elements of her theology, a nearby community of Shakers probably inspired her concept of a mother church as well as her belief that God was the mother as well as father of life.

Physical Problems

In 1843 Mary Baker entered into a short marriage with George W. Glover, who died in 1844. Chronic back pain and other maladies, many of which she had suffered since childhood, prevented her from caring for their son George, born after his father's death. She experimented with homeopathy and, in 1853, married Daniel Patterson, an itinerant dentist who shared her interest in alternative medicine but failed to help prevent her invalidism. In a state of desperation, she appealed for help to Phineas P. Quimby (1802–1866), a clockmaker, daguerreotypist, and healer in Portland, Maine, who used mental influence to treat disease.

Quimby had successfully treated hundreds of patients using a technique he developed out of his study of mesmerism, a practical philosophy named after the eighteenth-century Austrian physician Franz Anton Mesmer (1734–1815), who posited the existence of an intangible magnetic fluid permeating human bodies and their surroundings. Mesmer and his followers believed that this magnetic fluid could convey positive, therapeutic influence from an operator to a subject. Through his own experiments, Quimby discovered that ideas themselves could trigger feelings of recovery and well-being. This discovery led Quimby to dispense with belief in the existence of a ubiquitous magnetic fluid and marked an important development in the understanding of hypnosis, and of human psychology more generally.

Mary Baker Patterson recovered her health under Quimby's care and stayed on to study mental healing with him. As Quimby's student, she believed that he had discovered the scientific explanation for Jesus's power as a healer as well as the essential teaching of the New Testament. Later on, she downplayed Quimby's influence, maintaining that he practiced a form of materialistic "animal magnetism" and never grasped the true idealism of Christian Science.

Turning Point

Shortly after Quimby's death in 1866, she took a serious fall on the ice and lapsed into a hopeless state, unable to move from bed. Three days later, while reading the New Testament stories of Jesus's healing, she experienced the healing power of Christ and rose from her bed, completely cured. In 1870 she began teaching her own version of mental healing. In 1873 she divorced Daniel Patterson, from whom she had long been estranged, and married Gilbert Eddy, one of her students.

In 1875 Mary Baker Eddy published the first edition of Science and Health, her most famous writing. The fourth and final edition, published in 1906, remains the centerpiece of Christian Science life, along with the New Testament. Rejecting literal interpretations of Christian doctrine, Science and Health explains the apparent existence of disease and other forms of material reality as consequences of erroneous belief. The suffering caused by erroneous belief in material reality could be eradicated, Eddy argued, through belief in the omnipotent power of Divine Love. Ignorance of Divine Love, and the suffering entailed by this ignorance, defined mortality. Conversely, identification with the loving presence of Christ through prayer and meditation offered perfect happiness and immortality.

Eddy's Place in Protestantism

Eddy founded the Massachusetts Metaphysical College in Boston, where she taught short courses in Christian Science to hundreds of students from 1881 until 1889, when disputes with students led her to close the college. In an effort to control the interpretation of Christian Science and consolidate her own authority, Eddy established the Church of Christ, Scientist. This religious institution grew rapidly during the last decades of the nineteenth century and first decades of the twentieth. By 1906, 682 branches of the church existed across the United States, and a new mother church was erected in Boston to replace the smaller mother church built in 1884. After Eddy's death in Chestnut Hill, outside of Boston, on December 3, 1910, the church continued to grow under the guidance of a board of directors, which Eddy had assembled to conduct church business and disseminate her teachings. As a result of the effective institutionalization of her principles, no other church leader emerged to inherit the mantle of her authority.

Eddy's importance in the history of American Protestantism goes beyond her role as the founder of a denominational church. She represents the historical connection between the enthusiasm for religious experience characteristic of evangelical Protestantism in the early nineteenth century and the emergence of popular metaphysical movements in the later nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Like other advocates of metaphysical religion, Eddy focused on bridging the gap between religion and science and, more specifically, on offering experimental proof for the existence and influence of unseen spiritual forces. While other advocates of metaphysical religion looked to Hinduism, Buddhism, and other non-Christian religions to help them in their efforts to understand the power of mind over matter, Eddy stayed within Protestant Christianity and found the power of mind over matter solely within Christ.

In certain respects, Eddy's understanding of Christian Science was similar to ideas about the power of Jesus's characteristic faith healing in African-American traditions, which led to the emergence of PENTECOSTALISM in the early twentieth century. Eddy was more concerned with justifying Christian healing scientifically, while faith healers and Pentecostals have been far more straightforward in acknowledging the reality of bodily suffering, but both traditions share strong belief in the healing power of religious faith and experience. In this regard, Eddy represents the important but often overlooked connection between the rich tradition of religious experience and experimentation flowing out of nineteenth-century Protestant EVANGELICALISM and the religious approach to science characteristic of the New Age movement and other forms of metaphysical religion.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Eddy, Mary Baker. Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: First Church of Christ, Scientist, 1971; orig. 1875.
- . Prose Works Other Than Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: First Church of Christ, Scientist, 1925.

Secondary Sources:

- Gottschalk, Stephen. The Emergence of Christian Science in American Religious Life. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Peel, Robert. Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Discovery. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1966.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Trial. Boston: Christian Science Publishing Society, 1971.
- . Mary Baker Eddy: The Years of Authority. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1977.

AMANDA PORTERFIELD

EDINBURG MISSIONARY CONFERENCE OF 1910

See World Missionary Conference

EDUCATION, EUROPE

In its original sense education contains two slightly different meanings: the action of a parent or teacher to educate children or students, and the development of knowledge, rationality, and cognitive ability by certain authorities. Although in the first understanding a certain knowledge can be examined, the development of erudition turns the created being into a human being in the image and likeness of God. Thus education means in the widest sense any developing impact on human beings toward personality, knowledge, and rationality through other people or institutions, nature, and experience. In the second, more specific sense, education can be understood as the reflected rational children toward a moral/ethical understanding and responsibility. Shaping of education depends on the historical context and the contemporary impacts of mentality, social order, society, culture, and so on. Thus the understanding of the term cannot be used in the sense of a nomen universale. Education as part of the theoretical reflection within theology has its place in anthropology, doctrine of creation, sin and redemption, in Christology and eschatology. Education thus becomes the focus of the (self-)understanding of the human being and therefore has to be developed in the tension of sin/nature and grace—in the Protestant tradition within the tension of law and gospel.

Education in the Early Church

Ever since the establishment of the church as part of the state in the fourth century, tensions between secular-pagan education and Christian teaching have dominated the history of Western schooling. The responsibility for education swung like a pendulum between ecclesiastical and secular authorities. Although early medieval schools derived from classical Roman institutions, they became increasingly “Christianized”—not so much in terms of teaching methods, but certainly in subject matter. The sixth century proved an important turning point: in response to the missionary challenge posed by the pagan Germanic environment, the educational emphasis shifted toward the sacramental and liturgical life of the church. CONVERSION to Christianity, at the time, was not merely a change of religion, but a more wide-ranging conversio of lifestyle, CULTURE, and manners of speech. From this perspective it is clear that a fundamental reorientation was needed to develop a Christian educational system.

“Palace” or “court schools” (scholae palatinae) catered to the leading nobility, but their curriculum was limited to the acquisition of basic administrative skills, primarily written and spoken Latin. It was important, therefore, to supplement this level with more sophisticated clerical education. The Irish-Scottish mission tackled the task in Central Europe and a new ideal of the ministry emerged wherever British monks established their foundations. Boniface (d. 755) followed this tradition and erected schools for clerical novices in the Benedictine monasteries. This type of education, of course, was intended exclusively for members of the order (and the occasional aristocratic patron). Chrodegang of Metz (d. 766) filled the emerging gap in the education of the secular clergy through the foundation of cathedral schools.

Both school forms found their legal financial basis in the Germanic church system (Eigenkirchenweseri). Local lords not only took physical possession of churches and monasteries in their territories, but also exercised extensive spiritual supervision. It was inevitable that princes and emperors gradually extended these powers to ecclesiastical schools, and clerical education, only recently emancipated from secular influence, soon returned under worldly control. The Admonitio generalis of Charlemagne (789) ordered that every monastery and every diocese should teach psalms, musical notes, chants, the computus (i.e., calendar calculation), and grammar. In addition every school had to be in possession of dogmatically sound Catholic books, and the emperor recommended careful examination of candidates for the priesthood at annual meetings of the diocesan clergy.

Even traces of compulsory popular education can be detected. With reference to Caesarius of Arles (470/1–543) and the Synode of Baision (529), the emperor and bishops called for the establishment of parish schools. These schools were to teach reading, writing, and ecclesiastical LITURGY alongside the Creed and the Lord’s Prayer (to be expounded in the vernacular).

Charlemagne’s system, developed under the influence of Alcuin (735–804), was equally open to secular concerns. Apart from other topics, the reading of profane texts was introduced, and liberal arts were taught as preparation for studies on Holy Scripture. Ludwig the Pious, however, advised by Benedict of Aniane, refocused his educational policy on the training of clergymen. The Imperial Diet of Aachen (817) closed monastic schools to outsiders. Henceforth monasteries ceased to provide public education and limited their teaching to their own needs. At the same time the boarding school system enhanced the unity of clerical upbringing and training, a principle resuscitated in the sixteenth century by reformers of all confessional persuasions. In short the church claimed full and exclusive responsibility for education.

At the same time the level of education in kings and rulers declined so much so that cultured rulers such as Friedrich II (1194–1250) or Alfons X (1221–1284) were regarded as exceptional by their contemporaries. From the thirteenth century a growing number of observers complained about the deplorable educational standards of political leaders and about the unprecedented increase in the power of peasants and other commoners who were eager to learn.

Twelfth to Fourteenth Centuries

In a fresh educational offensive starting in the twelfth century, imperial and papal legislators began to regulate the fast expanding range of new methods of teaching and study and eventually helped to establish corporate bodies of masters and scholars in universitates magistrorum et scholarium under central control. On the secular side the Authentica habita, issued by Fredric Barbarossa (1122–1190) around 1158, provided for the safety and protection of scholars while traveling to and staying at the place of study, prohibited their arrest for crimes committed by fellow countrymen, and guaranteed them a free choice of court.

On the ecclesiastical side, a new wave of legislation, beginning with the Lateran Councils of 1123, endeavored to expand papal jurisdiction and to consolidate the church's hold over education. The main elements were (1) a commitment to the education and training of priests; (2) financial safeguards for teachers (salaries, benefices) and students (new foundations, scholarships, dispensations from residence requirements); (3) privileges of jurisdiction (universities and their members to enjoy immunity from local courts); (4) teaching licenses; (5) institutionalization of courses and curricula (limited to certain social groups); and (6) protection of scholarly communities from local authorities. This blueprint for a centrally (in fact, papal) controlled dissemination of knowledge, however, soon fell victim to the dynamics of European state development. National or princely prestige, as well as ambitions of the academic communities themselves, ensured that university expansion failed to adhere to papal planning. Eventually all institutions were allowed to offer the full range of faculties (art, medicine, law, theology) and to award their own doctorates.

The growth of the educational system from the thirteenth century, evident above all in the spread of the ability to read and write Latin beyond the clerical estate, cannot be explained by purely socioeconomic or purely religious reasons, but depended on a whole range of interconnected factors: the establishment of universities; the foundation of mendicant orders; the increasing number of towns as centers of educational institutions; the emergence of an ambitious “middle class” engaged in commerce, trade, economy, and arts; the growing need for administrative and especially legal expertise in the nascent territorial and city states; and the rising demand for educational and edifying literature among the LAITY, to name but a few. All of these tendencies combined to destroy the basic assumption that “clerici” were “litterati” and “laici” were “illitterati” albeit without revolutionizing the social order. From the fourteenth century, princes started to found universities in Central Europe, and—alongside the pope—the emperor became one of the main patrons of learning. With ever-greater frequency, universities approached them for improved charters and privileges.

Elementary schools, too, had been revived by the papal reform legislation in the twelfth century. As a result of the increasing economic and cultural importance of towns, however, magistrates started to intervene in the running of Latin schools, and to promote the establishment of German institutions.

Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries

After the thirteenth century a certain stream of intellectuals emphasized the main sources of the ancient world. This way back to the sources (ad fontes) was a diverse movement, which later on was subordinated under the label “Humanism.” As modern research has developed, this label has come into question, even though we can find some common understanding of education founded in a common anthropology focusing on the understanding of the image of God in the creation of man, homines non nascuntur, sed finguntur (Erasmus 1529). During the process of education the human being can grow and develop in the image of God. Thus education has its goal in the image and likeness of individuals to their creator.

This attempt of education became very influential. In the northern parts of Europe, Erasmus of Rotterdam (1466–1536) became the core of a large movement, which related back through the philosophers of the Renaissance to the understanding of education in Rome and Athens. Erasmus became influential not only for transferring this understanding over the Alps but also for a certain merger of Christian and pagan thoughts subordinated to an elaborated interpretation of Scripture based on the old languages. His theological focus came to the fore when he used Christ as the basis for his interpretation of the image of god. Nevertheless it is not clear how much Erasmus’s understanding of Christology had an impact on his anthropology or the other way around. Christ becomes the true model for pious behavior and the prototype of ethical orientation. In Christ, human beings find their model of true humanity and the image of God that they bear within their souls. Thus the discussion of piety and the way to SALVATION becomes more and more a discussion of true human behavior and orientation of life. Erasmus matches human activity—education, knowledge, and the struggle for more and better knowledge—with God’s GRACE and eternal mercy.

The Reformation

Even though MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) feared a certain kind of semipelagianism in this attempt, the later educational reform ideas of the Wittenberg professor and his followers take root in this development. Against the background of the Western church’s traditional knowledge of the first centuries, the Wittenberg reformer saw the Roman (i.e., papal) limitation of the church system, as well as the scholastic educational reform, as apostasy from the original norm. Because of that he feared another ecclesiastical reform, which would spoil the system of education, schooling, and teaching even further.

Thus, with his reform program Luther referred to scriptural authority as the last and ultimate AUTHORITY. It determines the critique on the scholastic but also the humanistic education and school reforms, as well as the emphasis of the future reformed teaching plan. Luther pointed out three theological arguments for a new, enforced commitment for teaching the youth: first, fighting Satan, who strives to destroy God’s good creation; second, turning to God’s mercy, which only the Germans received in this century, but will not keep forever. Third, simple obedience to God's commandment and the natural order of creation binds church and its representatives to youth education. Even though Luther makes school education part of worldly considerations and the responsibility of secular authorities, the biblical theological argumentation of this idea must still be taken into consideration. Juvenile education, school, and training are not only matters of natural reason, but part of theological contemplation. Luther closely combines this unity of ecclesiastical and worldly responsibility for education and training with medieval reform concepts on the one hand; on the other hand he clearly splits it from early modern educational endeavors of the secular authorities.

Other reformers—especially PHILIPP MELANCHTHON (1497–1560) and JOHANNES BUGENHAGEN (1485–1558) who worked out the merely practical matters of the reformed concept of teaching and schooling in church ordinances, handbooks, textbooks, catechisms and other helpful and quite successful materials—followed Luther in his theological grounding of school reform and in their efforts to deal with this problem as a consequence of their REFORMATION insights. They are basically concerned with the general education of youth, which has to be realized in omnibus civitatibus, oppidis et pagis (in all societies, towns, and villages).

Main elements of school ordinances in Wittenberg, Zurich, or other stem cells of the Reformation include the following items: the knowledge of languages (mainly Latin), a certain knowledge of science and arts (orbis litterarum), the classical artes liberales, and finally a biblically grounded knowledge of ETHICS and piety. Any content of the school ordinances influenced by Reformation thought was related and focused on a better understanding of Scripture as the revelation of God, God's love and mercy, and God's will to redeem the sinner. Thus the knowledge of God's revelation implies certain knowledge of God's will and God's orders for humankind.

Of course Luther and others refer to the education of an academic elite when they recommend special furthering of the “prodigy.” Although Luther did not concentrate on that in his early years, his reform attempts after the visitation of churches and schools in rural Saxony of 1527 more and more accentuated the education of future evangelical CLERGY and a biblically founded knowledge for the ruling elites. Improved education was seen as a tool in the apocalyptic battle between God and Satan: the study of the past as much as other disciplines would alert people to God's omniscience and help them to understand the Scriptures and the fate of the world. It thus obtained an important place in school and university education, even though profane—and especially classical—historians were to be studied in strict subordination to the overall authority of the Bible.

Even though Luther did not explicitly mention religious education, the requirement for special lessons on the Holy Book can be found in almost all school regulations and school foundations. Probably as a helpful handbook or model of biblical lessons in school or at home Luther worked out in several steps his CATECHISMS: first the Great catechism for pastors and trained clergy and later on the Small catechism for the house father (pater familias). One can hardly over-estimate the influence and importance of Luther's catechisms for the history of evangelical theological education. Even though several other handbooks for elementary education in faith and piety had been written, none of them ever became as important as Luther's two books (later included in the Book of Concord and other collections of main sources of the evangelical faith).

Whereas Luther separated the Erasmian synthesis of Christianity and Humanism by the secularization of the medieval performance of education by the church on the one hand and a strong focus on its Christian grounding, referring to a certain mystical understanding of education on the other, Melanchthon strongly accentuated the humanistic ideal. Although Luther denied a human activity to rebuild the human being after God's image and likeness, Melanchthon and JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) supported an academic education if not for the salvation of humankind then for the teaching of human beings in the will of God. Melanchthon went back to humanistic ideals as eloquentia and other virtues as described in the antique books. This concept is strengthened through his accentuation of natural law. It contains the testimonium of God's eternal justice and preforms future ethical behavior of humankind. Nevertheless Melanchthon does not understand education as a way to heaven. True Christian education develops the iustitia civilis but not iustitia christiana.

Even more, the humanistic heritage comes into the fore in the pedagogical concepts of John Sturm (1507–1589) in Strasbourg and Calvin in Geneva. The latter stressed the doctrinal character of an ecclesiastical education and focused on the training of future clergy and an ecclesiastical elite. Schools became places in which children get trained in a certain orientation of life and a biblically grounded ethical doctrine. At this point Calvin continued the pedagogical reform attempts of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) as he had performed them in Zurich and as were continued by HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575). Within this reformed concept, education became part of God's pedagogy. SIN was understood in the meaning of not knowing. As much as ignorance leads to hell, the true knowledge of God as revealed in Scripture becomes the exclusive way to heaven.

The humanistic heritage was continued in the Lutheran and the Reformed tradition but also within a large educational reform movement initiated by the Jesuits in Catholicism, where again Christian Humanism came to the fore. In their schools, Jesuits taught future soldiers of Christ, instruments of the will of God, and servants of a catholic reform, which would protect the unity of the church. Although Erasmus tried to work out the personality of human beings after the image of God, the Jesuits accentuated the giving up of personal interests and a pure obedience to the will of God represented in the orders of the superior.

Seventeenth to Twentieth Centuries

In the age of CONFSSIONALIZATION up to the Napoleonic Age, the tension between a more or less secular education and an ecclesiastically dominated teaching of the youth continued. Even though the Reformation radically secularized the question of responsibility for education, at the same time the reformers on both sides of the confessional border focused on its deeper foundation within theology and its goal to understand Scripture and to improve personal or collective piety. After the "golden age" of a confessional reform of schools and university documented in hundreds of church and school ordinances in the end of the sixteenth century, a certain kind of skepticism arose. Michel de Montaigne (1533–1592) skeptically described the human ability of cognition and knowledge. Increasingly, the educational concept focuses pragmatically on the ability for ethical decision and a more general orientation of life. The humanistic emphasis on (re-)building human beings in the image and like-ness of God fades.

JOHN AMOS COMENIUS (1533–1592), the Bohemian theologian, pedagogue, and pansophical philosopher, developed a holistic understanding of education. Deeply rooted in his theological understanding of creation, Comenius understood his pedagogical responsibility as cooperation of human beings in God's preservation of God's creation. Because of the analogy of cosmic order (nature) and individual development (human nature) Comenius's concept of education improves the human ability to continue and work out God's plans. Within a holistic concept he accentuates the teaching in native languages and natural science (realia), and the development of didactic methods.

Although Comenius's educational concept is related to his heterodox pansophic theological tradition, Wolfgang Ratke (1571–1635) developed his pedagogy from within his Lutheran setting: "Schooling and education can be justified by its meaning for salvation of souls only." Again a certain theological focus becomes important. Methods and contents of schooling following Ratke develop an ability to teach the human mind all reasonable things. This understanding is founded on the conviction of an evident analogy between nature and language (harmony of creation).

A fresh impulse came through the Pietist movement (see PIETISM); in particular AUGUST HERMANN FRANCKE (1663–1723) developed a concept of Christian education in relation to the reform of church and piety: "Change of the world by changing the humans." The center of the concept is Francke's understanding of rebirth and renewal. God's grace pours faith into the soul of a human being. This effects a total change of life and behavior that should be obvious to people from outside. Thus education focuses on the knowledge of God through certain knowledge of Scripture, practical (craftworks) and social abilities for the improvement of taking over responsibilities for church and society. Godliness, erudition, good and pious behavior to honor God and serve one's neighbors are the main topics of the Pietist tradition of HALLE impacting the Prussian General-Landschul-Reglement of 1763.

Parallel to the Pietist movement, pedagogical concepts related to the philosophy of ENLIGHTENMENT were developed. JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU (1712–1778) concentrated on the development of human beings as a process starting with CHILDHOOD. Even though some reformers had seen the need for an appropriate educational approach to children, the individual attempt was worked out a century later. Rousseau merges experience of world and self into a holistic concept of learning. Stressing his anthropological conviction that human beings are as good as God had created them, his educational theory accentuates developing moral and ethical competence toward perfection. Next to the individual education of human beings Rousseau focuses on the education of citizens. Later his concept became part of a mainstream pedagogy, which combines educational, economic, political, and legalistic efforts.

The tension between a merely secular education of citizens and a theological education of pious children of God continued even though the history of education concentrated more and more on the development of three main humanistic tendencies.

First, JOHANN GOTTFRIED HERDER (1744–1803) understood humanity in terms of historical development. Thus the idea of progress had a deep impact on his pedagogical thought: education develops progressively the humanity of humans. Herder's understanding of humanity was in agreement with humanistic and biblical ideas. Humanity is the goal of any human development. Because young people are tempted and endangered by negative forces, the pedagogue trusts in God's mercy and grace to fulfill his duty in educating them.

After Wilhelm von Humboldt (1767–1835) the individualistic approach became a critical note. Although Rousseau and his followers focused on an education to develop human ability in relation to the objective and evident needs of nature, society, and culture, Humboldt and—from another perspective—Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (1746–1827) argued that individual abilities should be improved to develop an individual performance of humanity without regard to heteronomistic orders and needs or transcendental principles. Thus the new humanistic movement stressed a critical distance from society, culture, economy, and state.

Second, the German classic education, on the contrary, tried to open its educational concept to the needs of culture and society on the one hand and to preserve and accept nature and individuality on the other. So JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE (1749–1832) understood education as a lifelong process of conscious and experienced life, as an individual performance of the development of humankind within the progress of history. The neo-humanistic movement related its ideal of humanity back to ancient traditions and the heroes of the Greek and Latin legends. Finally the Kant scholar Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762–1814) focused his understanding of education on an “axiom, it is unrelated trust in the creative and self-reflected power of the human spirit.” Although GEORG FRIEDRICH WILHELM HEGEL (1770–1831) worked out the dialectic-idealistic reconciliation of individual and society, nature and culture, rationality and self-consciousness, the term emancipation comes into the fore: Hegel stresses the need for a productive and creative distance of the human individual from collective developments. Positively this process builds the self—negatively it distorts an effective development of self-consciousness and mind (Entfremdung). Karl Marx (1818–1883) turned this idealistic concept into practical advice: Because the socioeconomic surroundings force human beings into a distorted process of non-self-determined life (Entfremdung) the historical process has to be corrected. Education has to change the socioeconomic impact into a productive support of the development of humanity and freedom.

The third tendency has its main figures in FRIEDRICH ERNST SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834) and Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911). Even though their pedagogical concepts reflect a strong relation between society and education, they do not see this relation as static as, for instance, did Karl Marx and others. Schleiermacher understands the sociocultural context as the sum of individual developments and experiences that affect each other. Education needs to improve the reflection of these individual experiences and to work out the ability to take over responsibility and innovative power for the future.

In the nineteenth century the impact of greater philosophical or theological systems on the concepts of education declined. Since then, pedagogy was secularized completely and theological principles cannot be found in its theoretical setting. Even though some reform attempts had been made, it seems that for the theological reflection of education, pedagogy was not needed. The later development of totalitarian educational reform shows that this theological reluctance was extremely dangerous and a mistake.

Within the debate for educational reform in the twentieth century, theological arguments were suspected to be doctrinal or, even worse, ideological. After World Wars I and II, totalitarian pedagogy needed to be radically corrected and its consequences avoided. Even though ideological systems still continued with their diverse types of right, Hegelian principles made their impact on indoctrination. Because these concepts showed clearly the negative side of the complete and radical secularization of education and its theory, theological reform worked out its answer focusing on the crisis of theology as a consequence of the crisis of occidental culture and society (Karl Spranger), and its critique. Educational theory performed as critique of ideology and any kind of “-ism.” Theologians still struggled with the problem of defining education as a genuine theologically reflected part of ecclesiastical work within the world. Although some Protestant educational concepts influenced by KARL BARTH (1886–1968) and his followers refused and denied any influence of secular thought and disciplines within theological discourse, other ideas related to the liberal theology of the beginning twentieth century seem to be more open to pedagogical, sociological, and psychological questions, answers, and methods (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Reform pedagogy after World War II primarily was oriented to a practical reform. The methods and ideas that seemed to be main parts of totalitarian and indoctrinating political or cultural systems were to be avoided. Whereas this critique after World War I focused on the distinction of law and gospel and accentuated pedagogy under the law, Karl Barth’s influence after World War II forced theologians to reflect education more in the light of God’s promise and the gospel. Even though the Protestant church of GERMANY, for example, still claims its responsibility for education, schooling, and teaching in universities and schools for applied sciences (synod of 1958 in Berlin, 1971 in Frankfurt/Main, and 1978 in Bethel) the dialogue with pedagogy, sociology, psychology, and other disciplines about pedagogical reform does not reflect any genuine theological contributions and ideas.

It seems that education newly becomes a challenge for theological reflection. Four main dimensions or circles of questions have to be reflected before a new concept of evangelical education can be sketched out: (1) the question of life orientation, change of virtues (Wertewandel), and an increasing discontinuity between the generations; (2) globalization or internalization of cultural change and its impacts; (3) cultural diversity and multiversity within national societies; and (4) radical and complete secularization of previously religious spheres and rooms. These problems provoke new answers to the old question of a Christian, Scripture-based, and theologically reflected education in the beginning of the twenty-first century.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Barth, Karl. Evangelium und Bildung. Zollikon b. Zürich: 1947.
 Garin, Eugenio. Geschichte und Dokumente der abendländis-chen Pädagogik. Starnberg: 1971.
 Hartfelder, Karl. Philipp Melancthon als Praeceptor Germaniae. Berlin: Hofmann, 1897.
 Schleiermacher, Daniel Friedrich Ernst. Pädagogische Schriften. 2 vols. Düsseldorf/Munich: 1966.

Vormbaum, Reinhold. Die evangelischen Schulordnungen des 16. Jahrhunderts. Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1860.

Secondary Sources:

- Asheim, Ivar. Glaube und Erziehung bei Luther. Heidelberg: 1967.
- Breen, Quirinius. Christianity and Humanism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1968.
- Catto, J. L., ed. The History of the University of Oxford I. 97–150. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1984.
- . Università e società nei secoli XII–XVI. Atti del nono convegno internazionale di studio tenuto a Pistoia nei giorni 20–25 settembre 1979. Pistoia: 1982.
- Dagron, Gilbert, Pierre Riché, and André Vauchez, eds. Histoire du christianisme des origines à nos jours IV: Évêques, moines et empereurs (642–1054). Paris: Desclée-Fayard, 1993.
- Dienst, Karl. Die lehrbare Religion. Gütersloh: 1978.
- Fraas, Hans-Jürgen. Katechismustradition. Luthers kleiner Katechismus in Kirche und Schule. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1971.
- Garin, Eugenio. L'éducation de l'homme moderne. La pédagogie de la Renaissance. Paris: Fayard, 1968.
- Grendler, Paul. Schooling in Renaissance Italy: Literacy and Learning, 1300–1600. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989.
- . Books and Schools in the Italian Renaissance. Aldershot: Ashgate, 2002.
- . The Universities of the Italian Renaissance. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 2002.
- Grethlein, Christian, Georg Zenkert, Henriette Harich-Schwarzbauer, Michael V. Fox, Hans Josef Klauck, Eckhard Reichert, Ulrich Köpf, and E. Brooks Holifield. "Erziehung." In Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, edited by Hans Dieter Betz et al., 4th edition, vol. 2, 1505–1519. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1999.
- Hahn, Friedrich. Die evangelische Unterweisung in den Schulen des 16. Jahrhunderts. Heidelberg: 1957.
- Harran, Marilyn J. Martin Luther. Learning for Life. St. Louis, Mo.: Concordia Publishing House, 1997.
- Hedtko, Reinhold. Erziehung durch die Kirche bei Calvin. Heidelberg: Quelle und Meyer 1969.
- Kittelson, James M., and Pamela J. Transue, eds. Rebirth, Reform and Resilience. Universities in Transition 1300–1700. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1984.
- Lennert, Rudolf, Pierre Riché, Ivar Asheim, Karl Dienst, and Robert Leuenberger. "Bildung I.IV–VII." In Theologische Realenzyklopädie, edited by Gerhard Krause and Gerhard Müller. vol. VI, 568–635. Berlin: de Gruyter, 1980.
- Merz, Georg. Das Schulwesen der Reformation im 16. Jahrhundert. Heidelberg: 1902.
- Nipkow, Karl Ernst. "Erziehung." In Theologische Realenzyklopädie, edited by Gerhard Krause and Gerhard Müller. vol. X, 232–254. Berlin: 1982.
- Padberg, Rudolf. Das Bildungsverständnis des Erasmus von Rotterdam und seine Bedeutung für die Gegenwart. Paderborn: Schöningh, 1964.
- Rüegg, Walter, ed. Geschichte der Universität. Munich: 1993ff.
- Schurr, Johannes. Schleiermachers Theorie der Erziehung. Düsseldorf: Schwann, 1975.
- Steffen, Hans. Bildung und Gesellschaft. Zum Bildungsbegriff von Humboldt bis zur Gegenwart. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1972.
- Stichweh, Rudolf. Der frühmoderne Staat und die europäische Universität. Frankfurt/Main: Suhrkamp, 1991.
- Woodward, William Harrison. Desiderius Erasmus concerning the Aim and Method of Education. Cambridge: 1904.
- Zenkert, Georg, Reiner Preul, Friedrich Schweitzer, and Achim Leschinsky. "Bildung." In Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, edited by Hans Dieter Betz et al., 4th edition, vol. 1, 1577–1587. Tübingen: Mohr-Siebeck, 1998.

EDUCATION, OVERVIEW

The Protestant REFORMATION cannot be understood apart from its relationship to education. The point of the Reformation, for many of its leaders, was to rejuvenate the piety and faith of the people by replacing popular belief with a purer and simpler presentation of the Gospel. MARTIN LUTHER, during his early, optimistic years, raised the expectation that most people could break through moribund TRADITION to religious transformation. It has been popular among some recent historians, however, to emphasize the extent to which this project failed in its objectives. These historians have argued that the impact of the Protestant Reformation was limited to representatives of elite CULTURE, while leaving popular culture largely unaffected. They point to the persistence of popular superstitions among the largely illiterate peasantry as evidence that the Protestant Reformation failed to penetrate and transform all levels of society.

The historical debate about the extent of religious change in the sixteenth century is difficult to resolve. Nevertheless, the question of Protestantism's ability to achieve its goals remains a viable and pressing topic of debate. If the Protestant Reformation set out to inculcate a Christian way of life grounded in claims about the proper knowledge of God, then its impact on education will be one measure not only of its practical success, but also of its historical significance and continued theological vitality.

Relationship to the New Learning

The Protestant Reformation is commonly thought to have given rise to widespread literacy among the LAITY due to its emphasis on reading the BIBLE in the vernacular. Recently, however, historians have been complicating this view by pointing to trends of increased schooling and literacy that began in the late medieval period. The call for ecclesiastical reformation, which frequently included proposals for improving education for both CLERGY and laity, long preceded the Protestant movement. Moreover, expanding opportunities in administrative and governmental careers fueled the demand for higher rates of literacy. Luther is an example of this trend: he had just begun the study of law after earning his baccalaureate and master's degrees when a storm sent him to a monastery instead.

In Luther's day, primary education typically began with vernacular lessons focused on devotional works, with some attention to Latin scripture and the Latin psalter. Boys who went on to Latin grammar school encountered a curriculum shaped by the rise of humanism. The "new learning" was first developed in the fifteenth century in northern ITALY, but it soon spread throughout Europe. The humanists emphasized the study of classic texts—the Latin poets, play-wrights, historians, and especially Cicero, with his emphasis on rhetoric—as models of good speaking and writing. The studia humanitatis dominated Western education up to the nineteenth century. Its most basic pedagogic tool was imitation, in the forms of recitation and memorization. Its goal was to cultivate moral character and promote civic responsibility.

For the study of scripture and the preparation of pastors, the Protestant reformers found the humanist emphasis on the rhetorical arts more helpful than the scholastic reliance on syllogistic logic and abstruse metaphysics. But the reformers also shaped the new learning in significant ways. Their commitment to the liberation of the Word of God led to an affirmation of the vernacular in the LITURGY and in translations of the Bible. They also took advantage of the advent of printing to mount an ambitious program for lay literacy. The publication of countless pamphlets and an enthusiasm for sermons is witness to the often-repeated observation that piety shifted from the visual and sacramental to the verbal and pedagogic. The emphasis on sermons gave many people their first opportunity to hear learned orations from men trained in university theology faculties. In contrast with these advances, Protestantism brought about the dissolution of the monasteries and the schools that they housed. Another system of education was needed to fill this void.

State-Sponsored Education and the Role of the Catechism

Early in his career, Luther defended an unlimited and voluntary access to the Bible, and he saw the FAMILY as the natural place for such instruction. Events soon made him change his mind. The Peasants' War, the rise of ANABAPTISM, and the popularity of spiritualists who rejected formal education convinced him that religious instruction needed to be in the hands of the secular authority. Luther came to think that children are a gift from God and that parents have an obligation to send them to school, regardless of the parents' own economic interests (see CHILDHOOD).

Many parents who did not intend their children to pursue one of the professions—medicine, law, or THEOLOGY—resisted Luther's call for state-sponsored education. When Luther grew impatient with the lack of progress in educating the laity, he turned to the ancient tradition of catechesis to rectify the situation. Baptismal catechesis was essential to the early church—a necessary means of instructing pagan adults, at the time of their CONVERSION, in the mysteries of the faith. Luther revived this practice by creating a new genre, the CATECHISM, which, like medieval primers, brought together the basics of the Christian faith in a question-and-answer format.

Luther's idea of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, coupled with his emphasis on each individual's particular vocation in the world, required that the laity be properly educated. The Small Catechism of 1529 illustrates these twin objectives. It includes discussions of the Ten Commandments, the creed, and the Lord's Prayer, as well as instruction about saying grace before meals. It also contains passages of scripture that outline the duties associated with various social roles. This influential text (and its equivalents in the Reformed tradition) was taught by schoolmasters, parents, and pastors and became the basis for religious education throughout Protestant GERMANY.

Luther's success in making religious DOCTRINE an essential part of the curriculum produced the first Protestant school system. Nevertheless, his training in nominalism, as well as his two-kingdom theology, made him pessimistic about the possibility, so fervently pursued by the scholastics, of integrating faith and learning. With his emphasis on the sovereignty of God, JOHN CALVIN had a more positive approach to the unity of all knowledge. All knowledge, Calvin insisted, should be for the purpose of glorifying God. Calvin founded the Geneva Academy in 1558 because he believed that the liberal arts are a gift of God and that all people are born with a desire for learning. He also organized the city of Geneva along the lines of a school that educates its citizens in a wise and eloquent piety, on the assumption that all of culture should be animated by religion.

The Teaching Task of the Ministry

The reformers were distinguished by their insistence on the teaching task of the ministry. The authority of the pastor is not given by his office, nor is it the product of personal charisma. Instead, it is to be demonstrated by his teaching abilities. The content of this teaching is to be the Gospel as it is disclosed in the Scriptures.

The role of teaching in the CHURCH was not limited to the pastor. Calvin argued that while every pastor is a teacher, not every teacher is a pastor. Teachers correspond to the ancient role of the prophets, while pastors correspond to the apostles. The task of the teacher is to instruct people in a godly way of life.

The Protestant idea that Scripture is clear and accessible to all meant that there was no need for a single AUTHORITY on its interpretation. Consequently, the reformers envisioned a pluralistic and nonauthoritarian approach to Christian education. Both Luther and Calvin, for example, accepted the teaching authority of church councils, even though they held them to be fallible and subject to the Gospel. Both also recognized the need for theological scholarship as a source of teaching authority. Finally, both acknowledged the responsibility of the congregation to check the authority of pastors, teachers, and theologians.

Modern Education

The beginning of modern education can be connected to the decline of the humanist curriculum and the catechism in religious instruction. Several factors were involved in this transformation. First, the ENLIGHTENMENT defined rationality as objectivity, which contributed to the separation of the sciences from the humanities and the subsequent fragmentation of knowledge. Consequently, the classics no longer served as the foundation for education. Moreover, the Enlightenment equated religious authority with unwarranted dogmatism and the arbitrary restriction of individual freedom. This made catechization look like rote memorization of formulaic statements.

Second, the Industrial Revolution pressured education to become more practical and functional. Under the increasing demands of complex and dynamic economies, education lost much of its coherence. The differentiation and rationalization of social systems made the religious justification of learning superfluous. As nation-states became increasingly pluralistic and secular, religion was relegated to a marginal or private role, and state-sponsored education was stripped of its moral and religious character.

Third, the growth of national literatures in the eighteenth century displaced the Latin and Greek classics. The modern version of the humanities, organized around the study of national literatures, provided a substitute for religion with aesthetic and literary ideals. This reconfiguration of the humanities gave modern education some badly needed unity as well as token spiritual values, although it is doubtful today whether the humanities, riven as they are by ideological disputes, can still provide this service.

Beginning as early as JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU'S work in the eighteenth century and climaxing with John Dewey's work in the twentieth century, modern education gives priority to the process of learning, rather than the content. Active participation thus eclipses the pedagogy of imitation. The purpose of schools is to provide the proper environment for the natural development of student potential. Perhaps it was inevitable that psychological theories that focus on childhood development would emphasize the nurturing of personal growth in opposition to the traditional goal of internalizing the style and content of the classics. What might be surprising is that much of the impetus for modern innovations in education came from within Protestantism itself.

The background to much of this pedagogic shift is the Protestant emphasis on subjectivity, which was formulated most clearly by the German theologian FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER. A decline in the reformers' understanding of original sin also contributed to modern views of education. JOHN AMOS COMENIUS, a minister of the MORAVIAN CHURCH who is often called the "father of modern education," systematized and expanded Protestant ideas by advocating a free and universal system of education that adapts the curriculum to student needs and capacities. In the United States, HORACE BUSHNELL defended the growing SUNDAY SCHOOL movement by arguing that parents and churches should work together in nurturing the natural piety of children. He rejected the revivalist idea that children are mired in SIN until their conversion.

Liberal Protestantism and secularism thus cooperated in the privatization of religious faith. The result has been a growing dissatisfaction with state-sponsored education. While the United States is an extreme example (much of Europe still permits religious education in government schools), it nonetheless is a test case of Protestantism's ability to preserve its distinctive identity. When state-sponsored education emerged in the United States in the early nineteenth century, Protestantism served as the basis for cultural and social unity. The most popular elementary school reading texts, MCGUFFEY READERS, were a kind of American catechism, using illustrated stories to teach millions of children biblical principles. By the 1960s, it was clear that American society was too pluralistic to warrant Protestant control of state-sponsored education. The dismantling of the Protestant establishment has led to an increase in HOMESCHOOLING and private schools, as well as legal battles over governmental regulation of public schools.

The Problem of Globalism

Perhaps the most pressing question for Christian education today concerns the relationship between the twin goals of educating for faithfulness and educating for citizenship. There are legitimate goals of education that are universal, namely preparation for citizenship and the acquisition of basic skills. But it is becoming increasingly difficult for educational systems to express the collective identity of a nation when globalism blurs the boundaries that give nations character. When religious traditions are commodified as alternative means of satisfying basic human needs, religious education becomes a matter of appreciating the relative truths and universal values of all religious traditions, rather than the particularities of any single faith.

Must socialization in the skills of tolerance and inclusivity, required by a global economy, be taught at the expense of commitments and traditions that are particular and local (see TOLERATION)? Given the consumerism that drives globalism, it is reasonable to assume that moral instruction will increasingly be dependent on participation in well-defined communities whose educational agendas will not necessarily coincide with the needs of nation-states. Providing schools with more local authority over educational policy is not a sufficient solution because, even within a particular geographical area, multiple moral communities will be the norm. The hard question concerns how these moral communities can be given institutional expression.

Clearly, Christian communities will have to become more active in helping to reinvent state sponsored education. Minimally, nation-states should continue to support a wide variety of educational options. Instead of thinking of public and private, state-sponsored and home-based, and secular and religious schooling as separate and opposing entities, one should see them as alternatives that can coexist in complementary and mutually reinforcing ways. Pluralism should be encouraged within schools, as well as among them. State-sponsored schools can go a long way toward promoting diverse approaches to moral education, rather than imposing a single model of moral development on all students. In a time of increasing moral complacency and the widespread assumption of moral relativism, the strong ties that bind students to their religious communities need to be protected and nurtured, in the context of weaker and yet still essential ties to the public good.

Can Education Be Christian?

What is so Christian about education? Schools today face a legitimation crisis as the lofty goals of higher education give way to the pressing demands of rapid technological transformation. Not surprisingly, then, there are a number of proposals for restoring education to its religious roots.

One set of proposals concerns the need to reintegrate education and morality. Character education has become a popular topic of reform for those worried about the ability of fragmented families to raise children in a moral tradition. Character education, however, decontextualizes moral values by disconnecting them from the religious traditions that give them meaning. The problems of moral relativism and corrosive INDIVIDUALISM are only exacerbated when students are encouraged to exercise their personal preference by selecting moral principles from a menu of options. If character is to be about belief and not just behavior, it will have to be an expression of a life-long commitment to habits of living rooted in a theological understanding of good and evil.

More significant are calls to ground education in the objective morality of the NATURAL LAW tradition. Appeals to the natural law in Protestantism are usually not as explicit or systematic as in Roman Catholicism. Nonetheless, the natural law has the advantage of being rooted in Christianity but theoretically accessible to everyone. Reason alone, some theologians argue, can illuminate the natural constraints to human behavior that promote human flourishing and the public good. The definition of NATURE, however, has never been so contentious as it is today. Moreover, Protestant theology traditionally insists that nature cannot be a source of truth beside the one revelation of Jesus Christ, so that the proper understanding of nature is, in the end, theological and not philosophical.

Another set of proposals concerns the content of education rather than its purpose. Some Protestants are among the most vocal supporters of a return to the classical texts of the humanist curriculum. While it might seem ironic that Christian schools would be at the forefront of defending the study of ancient pagan thinkers, there is a long tradition in the church of enjoying and using the liberal arts for the glory of God. Others argue for a greater role for religious texts and religious ideas in state-sponsored instruction. Still others want teachers and students alike to have more freedom to approach their material from a religious perspective.

In sum, education is not one concern among many for the Protestant churches. From birth to death, the church immerses the believer in religious formation. Christian education is thus not one kind of education, as if education is an object whose nature is well understood and “Christian” is a modifier that specifies a certain variation of that object. Christians do not use education for a specific ideological purpose. Instead, Christianity is a system of education. This means, in part, that no single institution can carry the full weight of Christian education. The church, family, and school must work together to ensure the vitality of Protestantism.

Two questions seem paramount: (1) How far can state-sponsored education be stretched to accommodate religious communities and their need to pass on their traditions to new generations; and (2) how far can Christians go in reclaiming education as a Christian enterprise while still recognizing the largely secular needs of nation-states to use the socializing effects of education for national purposes? At the point where those questions meet lies the future of Christian education.

See also Education, Theology: Asia, Europe, and United States

References and Further Reading

- Osmer, Richard R. "The Case for Catechism. Christian Century 114(1997): 408–412.
- Pazmiño, Robert W. God Our Teacher: Theological Basics in Christian Education. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Academic, 2001.
- Reed, James E., and Ronnie Prevost. A History of Christian Education. Nashville, TN: Broadman & Holman, 1993.
- Strauss, Gerald. Luther's House of Learning: Indoctrination of the Young in the German Reformation. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978.
- Webb, Stephen H. Taking Religion to School: Christian Theology and Secular Education. Grand Rapids, MI: Brazos Press, 2000.
- Williamson, Clark M., and Ronald J. Allen. The Teaching Minister. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991.
- STEPHEN H.WEBB

EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: UNITED STATES

Broadly defined, theological education in the Protestant tradition, as in that of the Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox traditions, took place in a variety of venues: the home, catechetical programs, public worship, SUNDAY SCHOOLS, denominational and BIBLE COLLEGES, ministerial apprenticeships, and in SEMINARIES and divinity schools. Although a dizzying diversity in loci and aims characterized theological education within American Protestantism from the early seventeenth to the end of the twentieth century, the primary aim of all formal theological education was to integrate learning and piety in preparation for the ministry. Protestants, though, did not always agree among themselves on what the terms learning and piety meant, and how the relationship between the two was to be understood. Protestant theological educators, particularly in the twentieth century, also promoted an empirical approach to the study of religion in state colleges and universities that gradually separated piety and learning (see HIGHER EDUCATION).

The first generation of Massachusetts Bay Puritans, the dominant religious tradition in the American colonies during the seventeenth century, built Harvard College in 1636, six years after the settlement of Boston, to provide the colony not only with an educated pulpit but also an educated pew, demonstrating the high priority they placed on theological education. A Harvard education, the primary source of formal theological education in the seventeenth century, aimed to bring intelligence, critical organization, and study into communion with genuine piety. In 1701 some CLERGY in Connecticut, believing that the theological education at Harvard suffered from the influence of rationalism and ARMINIANISM, obtained a colonial charter for the establishment of Yale College. The professors of the new school, also educated at Harvard, wanted to restore to ministerial preparation the old connection between Calvinist piety and learning.

Other attacks on formal ministerial education arose in the midst of the First Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) when GILBERT TENNENT, Presbyterian pastor in New Brunswick, New Jersey, preached on “The Danger of an Unconverted Ministry” (1740). That sermon sounded an alarm about the “Pharisee-teachers” who were “letter-learned” but unconverted, and called for a new kind of ministerial education that gave due emphasis to religious conversion as a necessary prerequisite for ministerial training. That new education, he asserted, could be had at his father William Tennent’s Log College (the future Princeton College). The revivalist emphasis on CONVERSION was not greeted with universal approval. Many at Harvard criticized the new emphasis on conversion because they perceived it as an escape from an enlightened examination of the Christian tradition. Spiritual enthusiasm without the guidance of reason, even revivalist supporters like JONATHAN EDWARDS argued, brought heat without light. A ministry, Edwards maintained, needed a spiritually formed reason, one that was guided by the biblical criteria. Other supporters of the Great Awakening, those on the radical edge, saw formal education of any kind as a hindrance to the movements of the spirit and sought to make the conversion experience itself the sole criterion for admittance into the ministry. Such a view of ministerial preparation was not widespread in the eighteenth century, but it became an increasing emphasis among the emerging evangelical Baptist and Methodist traditions in late eighteenth and early nineteenth-century America.

Not all theological education in the colonies took place in the confines of Harvard, Yale, Princeton, William and Mary (established in 1694 by Anglicans), or Brown (established in 1764 by the BAPTISTS). Nor did evangelical conversion become the sole criterion for ministry among large numbers of the old Puritan denominations or the new evangelical traditions in the eighteenth century (see EVANGELICALISM). Much theological education for the ministry took place in parsonages or on Methodist circuits where young men were apprenticed to mature pastors or seasoned itinerant preachers. In the parsonages or on the circuits young men read THEOLOGY with senior pastors and learned the art of PREACHING and pastoring by following their example. Such apprenticeship programs developed throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and into the first decades of the nineteenth century within a number of Protestant traditions, from PRESBYTERIANISM to UNIVERSALISM. Such theological preparations, though, were not universally reliable forms of education and in the nineteenth century the old Puritan traditions as well as some among the new evangelical traditions increasingly turned to colleges for theological education.

Throughout the nineteenth century the colleges became a significant locus for theological preparation for the ministry. In the antebellum period numerous new denominational colleges arose, many of them the creations of the graduates from Yale and Princeton, and a good number the result of efforts by Baptist and especially Methodist ministers. Many of these colleges were established in part to encourage vocations to the ministry. However, for Baptists and Methodists, the two largest Protestant denominations by 1830, the colleges were by no means the primary loci for theological education of the ministry. Less than half of the Baptist and Methodist ministers in the nineteenth and first half of the twentieth century had college degrees or were trained in theological schools. The antebellum Methodist Conferences, however, had prescribed a course of study for all their ministers. That course of study could be achieved through apprenticeship programs and did not have to be delivered through formal schooling.

In the early nineteenth century the seminary or divinity school became a new locus of theological education for the ministry. The seminaries arose from a variety of motivations: a desire to provide a more systematic and formal theological education than was provided in apprenticeship programs; an emerging sense of the ministry as a professional career comparable to that of other professional careers (physicians and lawyers) that needed formal education and training; and a need to preserve denominational or confessional identity in a religiously pluralistic society. The emergence of the Protestant seminary system was the result of the Unitarian takeover of Harvard University in 1805 when the liberal Henry Ware, a Unitarian, was appointed to Harvard's Hollis chair of divinity, succeeding the Old Calvinist theologian David Tappan. That appointment angered the Old Calvinists and the New Divinity Men who, realizing that they had lost control of Harvard, joined together in 1808 to establish the first American freestanding Protestant divinity school, the Andover Theological Seminary. Soon thereafter other seminaries were established, many of them associated with the major universities.

Princeton Theological Seminary (1812) was the first among the universities to create a school specifically separated from the rest of the university and dedicated solely to the theological education of the Presbyterian ministry. Harvard, too, responded to this trend by founding the Society for the Promotion of Theological Education in 1816, a society that eventually created Harvard Divinity School (1826), the training ground for over fifty years for the Unitarian ministry. Yale followed suit in 1822 when it created its own Divinity School, which became a potent theological force in the nineteenth century, developing, under the initiative of NATHANIEL WILLIAM TAYLOR, what became known as the New Haven theology. These seminaries and a number of others that were established as either freestanding or university-affiliated institutions focused on preparing a learned and pious ministry.

Although the seminaries and divinity schools fostered a relationship between piety and reason, they did not all understand or emphasize that relationship in the same way and by the 1840s and 1850s an incipient rift developed between the two. Learning could mean different things at various times: for the early seventeenth-century Puritans, learning meant following Peter Ramus and his philosophy; for some during the Great Awakening and thereafter it meant following JOHN LOCKE and ISAAC NEWTON; for Unitarians as well as Presbyterians at the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century it meant the Scottish ENLIGHTENMENT; for others in the early to mid-nineteenth century it meant ROMANTICISM and/or German critical scholarship. Protestants, too, saw learning either as an instrumental means of promoting piety or as a critical discipline that was independent of piety. That division in the Protestant understanding of the relationship between spiritual and academic education would become increasingly evident in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

Theological education in the divinity schools affiliated with major universities changed significantly in the 1880s with the rise of the modern research university. Between 1880 and 1930 those divinity schools particularly developed a theological scholarship that many considered freed from dogma and in keeping with the scientific methods of the age. The liberal evangelicals in the divinity schools saw education itself (not revivalism) as the primary means of winning Americans to the truth of Protestantism and as the chief way of enlarging Protestant influence in the country. The university divinity schools understood their roles as national agents or promoters of Christian truth, piety, and religious values in a scientific and bureaucratic age.

The development of specialized studies in the universities and in the divinity schools led to a certain fragmentation in the theological discipline as divinity school programs incorporated critical scholarship in biblical, historical, and systematic studies, and added specialties in the new sciences of sociology, psychology, and education to serve the needs of changing, multipurpose “social congregations” in urban America. Piety and religious practice continued to provide a unifying element in the divinity schools, but the demands of new doctoral and master’s level degree programs left little time for spiritual development.

Throughout the late nineteenth century and well into the twentieth century conservative evangelicals, members of the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, and fundamentalists suspected all forms of critical learning (understood as learning without faith) in the divinity schools because they believed it threatened piety and the received faith of the churches. Many conservative Protestants, therefore, developed new forms of theological education that emphasized piety and in many cases subordinated learning to piety.

The new form of learning that emerged among conservative evangelical Protestants during the last two decades of the nineteenth century and well into the middle of the twentieth century was the Bible institute and Bible colleges. These new institutions promoted inductive biblical studies over critical methods, and practical over systematic theology in the preparation of ministerial candidates. These new schools, moreover, placed little or no focus on the traditional liberal arts curriculum as a preparation for theological education. Gradually after World War II many Bible institutes and colleges emerged from their almost exclusive emphasis on Bible studies and developed into accredited colleges with a liberal arts curriculum. Seminaries, too, for conservative evangelicals and fundamentalists emerged before and after the war, developing, as was the case with Fuller Theological Seminary, into degree-granting institutions of higher learning where critical thought and conservative evangelical piety entered into dialogue. However, the split in Protestantism between critical and precritical theological education for the ministry continued throughout the twentieth century.

Although liberal Protestant theological educators were primarily interested in ministerial education, they gave increasing attention in the twentieth century to the study of religion at the undergraduate level. Throughout the nineteenth and well into the twentieth century the theological education of undergraduates was perceived as part of the Christian ministerial mission, and the divinity schools as well as freestanding seminaries prepared ministers and minister-professors for the denominational college religion programs. In 1911 Charles Foster Kent of Yale Divinity School lamented the sorry state of undergraduate religion at the denominational colleges and universities, where, in his estimation, the programs were catechetical and not focused on primary texts or the acquisition of foreign languages. In 1922 he helped found the National Council on Religion in Higher Education, a society that was devoted throughout much of the twentieth century to the improvement of the academic study of religion in undergraduate programs. By the 1940s and 1950s, undergraduate and graduate programs in religion began to develop in the state colleges and universities as well as in the denominational schools, and by the 1960s the growth of religious studies programs in these institutions forced a clear separation between teaching religion as a ministerial mission and teaching about religion from the perspective of a variety of empirical disciplines as well as from a theological perspective. The growth of these new programs also brought into existence in 1964 the American Academy of Religion to serve as a national professional organization for academic specialists in the study of religion. The impetus behind these movements to improve the study of religion came primarily from the divinity schools. The need to fill academic positions in the new religious studies programs, more-over, transformed Protestant theological education to some extent by emphasizing the academic or empirical study of religion, a study that was divorced from spiritual formation.

By the late twentieth century a number of scholars in both the liberal and conservative Protestant evangelical traditions began to call attention to the historical developments that led to an increasing split between piety and learning in Protestant theological education and called for a reexamination of the relationship. The separation of the two was not by intention because by intention many of the divinity schools and seminaries continued to speak of FAITH seeking understanding as a goal of Protestant theological education. That relationship, however, was by no means evident in the time and energy given to WORSHIP and spiritual development in the large university-affiliated divinity schools, nor was it evident in the conservative evangelical institutions that had subordinated or made learning instrumental to piety.

See also Arminianism; Calvinism; Fundamentalism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Methodism; Puritanism; Revivals; Unitarian Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

- Brereton, Virginia Lieson. Training God's Army: The American Bible School Movement, 1880–1940. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1990.
- Cherry, Conrad. Hurrying Toward Zion: Universities, Divinity Schools, and American Protestantism. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Farley, Edward. Theologia: The Fragmentation and Unity of Theological Education. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1983.
- Hart, D.G., and R. Albert Mohler Jr. Theological Education in the Evangelical Tradition. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Books, 1996.
- Kelsey, David. Between Athens and Berlin: The Theological Education Debate. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1993.
- Marsden, George. Reforming Fundamentalism: Fuller Seminary and the New Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1987.
- Miller, Glenn T. Piety and Intellect: The Aims and Purposes of Ante-Bellum Theological Education. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1990.
- Noll, Mark. The Princeton Theology: Scripture, Science, and Theological Method from Archibald Alexander to Benjamin Warfield. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1983.

PATRICK W. CAREY

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703–1758)

Colonial American theologian. Jonathan Edwards was known in his own era as a Congregationalist pastor, a proponent of Reformed THEOLOGY, a prolific biblical exegete, a theologian adept in philosophy, a proponent of Protestant missions, and a defender of revivalism. He elaborated an aesthetic vision of theology—and a conception of divine beauty—that has continued to attract the attention of historians and theologians (see AESTHETICISM).

The Divine Beauty and Revivalist Piety

Born in East Windsor, Connecticut, on October 5, 1703, Edwards was the only son of the Congregationalist pastor Timothy Edwards and Esther Stoddard Edwards. A precocious child, he entered Yale College in 1716, graduating four years later and earning a master's degree in 1722. While a graduate student, he began his essay "Of Being," in which he drew on a philosophical idealism to contend that the world could not exist apart from an omniscient consciousness. A two-year pastorate at a Presbyterian Church in New York City allowed him to begin his notes on "The Mind," in which he explained human judgments about excellence and beauty as reflections of the mind's intuitive grasp of being as a vast set of relations and proportions, which Edwards believed to be manifestations of God's own excellence or beauty. During the same period, he began his lifelong habit of puzzling over ESCHATOLOGY, attempting in his "Notes on the Apocalypse" to decipher biblical clues about the beginning of a millennial age and the timing of the final judgment. In 1724 he moved to New Haven, Connecticut to teach as a tutor at Yale, where he continued his reflections on natural and spiritual beauty.

After receiving his M.A. degree, Edwards became an assistant to his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard, at the Congregational Church in Northampton, Massachusetts. There he began "The Images of Divine Things," which proposed that the harmony of being entailed a resemblance between physical facts and spiritual truths. When Stoddard died in 1729, Edwards became the sole pastor, quickly gaining a reputation as a preacher and lecturer who combined a talent for philosophy with a Calvinist piety and theology. In 1734, his sermons sparked a revival of religion in his church and the surrounding region.

After a second wave of AWAKENINGS in 1740, Edwards defended the REVIVALS against critics who found them disruptive and divisive. His Treatise Concerning Religious Affections (1746) argued that genuine CONVERSION produced a love for the divine beauty and a selfless concern for one's neighbor. The book suggested that despite their excesses, the New England revivals displayed the presence of the Holy Spirit, and later published defenses of the revivals helped confirm generations of English-speaking Protestants in the belief that an experience of rebirth would be a mark of true faith. In 1747, Edwards published A Humble Attempt to stimulate a concert of PRAYER among Protestants throughout the world, and his correspondence with other Protestant CLERGY in America and the British Isles brought him into union with advocates of an international awakening.

Missions and Metaphysics

Edwards's zeal for converts led him to support MIS-SIONS to the Native Americans, and his 1749 account of the missionary DAVID BRAINERD would inspire later Protestant mission efforts. A dispute with his Northampton congregation over his desire for stricter membership standards led to his dismissal in 1751, but it also generated a discussion of the nature of the church that would continue for the next century. After his dismissal, Edwards became the pastor and missionary to the Housatonics and Mohawks in the outpost of Stockbridge, Massachusetts, and he also found time to enter more deeply into European philosophical and theological discussions. His treatise on The Freedom of the Will (1754) attempted to refute Arminian ideas of self-determination, while his closely argued Original Sin (1758) attempted to undercut Arminian efforts to define sinfulness as a matter of human acts rather than innate dispositions (see ARMINIANISM). His Nature of True Virtue (1765) resumed his longstanding ethical interests by arguing, in contrast to British ethicists, that only a special divine GRACE could produce a truly virtuous "love to being in general." His Concerning the End for Which God Created the World (1765) used both biblical and philosophical argument to contend that the end of creation was, as Calvinists had long maintained, the Glory of God. In 1758 Edwards became the president of the College of New Jersey (in Princeton), but he died as a result of a smallpox inoculation within three months.

Edwards had a long-enduring influence on Protestantism in America and Britain. His disciples in the Edwardean tradition—especially SAMUEL HOPKINS (1721–1803), Joseph Bellamy (1719–1790), and Nathaniel Emmons (1745–1840)—kept alive Edwards's demand for stricter church membership and his revivalist fervor while also popularizing his distinction between natural inability, or constraint external to the will, and moral inability, or the will's inability to choose against its own inclinations, for which human agents bore responsibility. The distinction reappeared in Congregationalist and Presbyterian revivalism and in English and American Baptist mission movements, but it also intensified tensions among English-speaking Protestants. Some nineteenth-century Old School Presbyterians and Calvinistic BAPTISTS distrusted Edwards as a fount of HERESY; British and American Methodists liked his revivalist piety but deplored his CALVINISM; nineteenth-century liberals relegated him to a forgotten past (see LIBERAL; PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Even many of Edwards's critics in America, however, from the Yale theologian NATHANIEL TAYLOR (1786–1858) to the Oberlin revivalist CHARLES G. FINNEY (1792–1875), bore residues of an Edwardean theological culture. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE (1811–1896), an admiring critic, used more than one of her novels to draw a broader Protestant public into the intricacies of Edwards's heritage. By the 1920s, Edwards served for progressives as a symbol of America's unfortunate Calvinist heritage, but two world wars and an economic depression, along with the rise of a neo-orthodox Protestant theology, helped spark a reassessment of a thinker who combined a sober reading of human nature with a hopeful glimpse of transcendent beauty.

See also Congregationalism; Neo-Orthodoxy; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Edwards, Jonathan. Freedom of the Will. Edited by Paul Ramsey. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1957.
- . Religious Affections. Edited by John Smith. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1959.
- . Ecclesiastical Writings. Edited by David D.Hall. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.
- . Notes on Scripture. Edited by Stephen S.Stein. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.

E.BROOKS HOLIFIELD

ELECTION

Although often identified with the REFORMATION, the doctrine of election (and its associated idea of PREDESTINATION) had a long and somewhat uneasy history in the Christian church well before the Reformation. The uneasiness of this doctrine derives from the fact that it inevitably raises the question of God's justness in choosing some and not others. As traditionally defined, the doctrine of election is the sovereign act of God in eternity past in choosing or electing some persons to be saved or rescued from the consequences of their sins and therefore being destined for eternal life. Of course, theologians have recognized that election logically raises the difficult question of the eternal destiny of those God did not elect. This nonelection is called reprobation and may be conceived passively as passing over or actively as willful rejection.

Historically the DOCTRINE of election was not a theological conviction that necessarily distinguished Protestants from Catholics. From the time of Augustine this doctrine had been part of the theological lexicon of Christian thought. Augustine forged his understanding of election in large part through the polemics of the Pelagian controversy. For him divine election begins, not with abstract speculations about God in eternity, but with fallen man who exists in a mass of perdition (massa perditionis). This miserable fact governed his understanding of this doctrine. God's rescue of some from the mass of fallen humanity lies at the heart of Augustine's conception of divine election. In Augustine's vocabulary, election and predestination are synonymous and both are employed exclusively as the positive expression of the divine will to save a specific number of sinners (praedestinatio ad vitam). God elects "not because He foreknew that we should be such, but in order that we would be such by the election of His grace" (De praedestinatione sanctorum, 19.38). According to Augustine election is an exercise of sovereign free will without any regard to what man does or does not do in the future. He occasionally referred to reprobation as a corollary to election, but it was a topic he preferred to avoid.

Although the Pelagian controversy wreaked havoc in the early church, Augustine's doctrine of election received approval at the Second Council of Orange (529). To be sure not all actually agreed with Augustine, but it represented the standard view of the medieval CHURCH. There were those who felt Augustine's avoidance of reprobation was unwarranted and thus turned it into a doctrine of double predestination (gemina praedestinatio)—the idea that in eternity past God decreed the election of some to SALVATION and reprobated others to damnation. Gottschalk of Orbais articulated this view in the seventh century and suffered imprisonment, but in the fourteenth century, the general of the Augustinian Hermits, Gregory of Rimini, and Thomas Bradwardine, the archbishop of Canterbury, advocated much the same view with impunity. Some have pointed to the existence of a late medieval school of thought (Schola Augustiniana moderna) that descended from Rimini and served as a theological resource for MARTIN LUTHER and the Protestants.

The Protestant Development of the Doctrine of Election

Reformation theologians evidence a broad acquaintance with all of the major fathers, both Greek and Latin, but it was Augustine who occupied first place in the pantheon of fathers. Although not infallible, he was the preeminently judicious and wise mentor on most theological questions, not the least of which was the doctrine of predestination. Because Protestants saw themselves as drawing on this heritage, they self-consciously appropriated an Augustinian doctrine of election.

All the major first-generation reformers (Luther, JOHN CALVIN, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI), following Augustine, affirmed unconditional election and were unafraid to go the extra step and embrace a doctrine of double predestination. Although the doctrine of election is most often identified with the Reformed branch of Protestantism, it was a vital part of early LUTHERANISM as well. Luther was no systematic theologian and never articulated a fully developed doctrine of election. However, it is abundantly clear from his work against Erasmus, De servo arbitrio (The Bondage of the Will), that he embraced a full-orbed doctrine of unconditional election and one can occasionally glimpse an underlying double predestination. For the most part Luther identified election with predestination and highlighted its pastoral benefit. It was a fundamental theological presupposition for Luther that everything flows from God's eternal decree in accordance with his sovereign will.

There is, however, a certain theological tension between Luther's emphasis on the overarching divine causality and his recognition that God desires the salvation of all. He solved this riddle by appealing to the distinction between the Deus absconditus (hidden God) and the Deus revelatus (revealed God). According to Luther the revealed will of God in the scriptures must be distinguished from the secret will of God who decrees all things including election to salvation and rejection unto damnation. In all of this Luther insists that God's ways are inscrutable and Christians must not pry into the mysteries of heaven.

Even before Luther's death in 1546 some followers of Luther began to retreat from his bold doctrine of double predestination. Leading the way was Luther's closest associate, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, who gradually moved in a synergistic direction. In the first edition (1521) of his Loci Communes, Melancthon had been a staunch defender of Luther's rigorous doctrine of election and predestination, although over time his Erasmian humanistic tendencies surfaced, leading to a significant modification of Luther's doctrine. The 1535 revision of the Loci Communes marked a turning point in Melancthon's understanding of election. His insistence that God is not the author of SIN became an overriding concern in his thought. Although retaining his conviction that election depends entirely on the mercy of God, he maintained at the same time that human beings retain some ability to accept or reject FAITH. Melancthon famously concludes “the cause must be in man that Saul is cast away and David is accepted.” Whatever else one can say about election, Melancthon insisted that humans must cooperate with God to bring about salvation, although such cooperation must not be viewed as meritorious.

Melancthon’s synergistic view of election and reprobation eventually prevailed in Lutheran confessional statements. Article 11 of the Formula of Concord (1577) acknowledges election, but all speculation about the reprobate is dismissed as “inspired by Satan.” Melancthonian synergism exercised determinative influence on later Lutheranism in two ways. First, it led to the ultimate rejection of Luther’s more rigorous doctrine of double predestination. Second, it led inevitably to what would become a constitutive difference between the Lutheran and Reformed communities and a source of much hostility.

From a distance Calvin may appear to tower over other Reformed theologians, but the intervening centuries have had a way of distorting the historical reality. In recent years it has been increasingly recognized that the origins of Reformed theology do not derive exclusively from Calvin, but rather from a coterie of theologians who were associated with Swiss reform, including besides Calvin, Zwingli, HEINRICH BULLINGER, Peter Martyr Vermigli, and Wolfgang Musculus. Although each embraced the doctrine of election, they had varying emphases, and none of them made predestination the central dogma of their theological system.

Zwingli was a first-generation magisterial reformer and the inaugurator of Swiss reform. He did not give a lot of attention to the topic of predestination until his meeting with Luther at the COLLOQUY OF MARBURG in 1529. There Zwingli preached a sermon on providence and predestination to an audience that included Luther himself. This sermon was later expanded and published as De providentia (On Providence). There can be little doubt that of all the major Protestant reformers, Zwingli articulated the most extreme doctrine of predestination. Zwingli’s De providentia reveals his strongly philosophical cast of mind. Most obviously his philosophical orientation is signaled by the constant parade of ancient philosophers across the pages of this work. Concerning the ancients Zwingli reserved his greatest praise for the last great representative of Roman Stoicism, Lucius Annaeus Seneca. The most significant impact from Seneca is found in Zwingli’s all-encompassing doctrine of providence, of which predestination is a subcategory. Following Seneca he insists there is no secondary causality: “Nothing,” he writes, “is done or achieved which is not done and achieved by the immediate care and power of the Deity.” Indeed providence looms so large that there appears to be no room for human will or human responsibility. What is more, Zwingli’s understanding of predestination as indistinguishable from providence logically inclined him to the conclusion that God is the cause of human sin. Although God is absolved of any personal culpability, yet Zwingli can assert that God is the “author, mover and instigator of human sin.” At the core of Zwingli’s thought about election and reprobation is the notion that both issue directly from the divine will. Zwingli attributed both to the divine will in the same way, constructing an absolutely symmetrical doctrine of double predestination. The cause and means of both election and reprobation are precisely the same. For Zwingli God is the exclusive and immediate cause of all things.

More than any other, Calvin is identified with the doctrine of predestination, in large part because he was called on to defend it repeatedly during his tenure in Geneva. However, the first signs of his predestinarian views became evident during the years in Strasbourg with MARTIN BUCER (1538–1541), first in his 1539 edition of the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION and then his commentary on Romans (1540). His debates with Albert Pighuis (1543) and Jerome Bolsec (1550) prompted further refinement, resulting in his De aeterna praedestinatione (On Eternal Predestination) in 1552 and reached its final expression in the 1559 edition of the Institutes. For Calvin election was most often regarded as a subcomponent of the broader category of predestination—a rubric under which the positive aspect of election is distinguished from the negative aspect of reprobation. His conception of election is part of a “double predestination” in that God willed from eternity to elect some to eternal life for his own glory and reprobated others to eternal death to display his justice. He defines predestination as “God’s eternal decree by which he compacted with himself what he wills to become of each man. For all are not created in equal condition; rather eternal life is foreordained for some, eternal damnation for others” (Institutes, II.21.5). His doctrine of predestination was asymmetrical (contra Zwingli) in that he identified a different cause for eternal life than for eternal damnation. The cause of the former was the will of God in election, but the cause of the latter was identified as the sins of the reprobate. In Calvin the salvation of the elect reveals the depth of God’s mercy, and the condemnation of the reprobate displays the severity of his justice. He acknowledges that election and predestination are an inscrutable mystery, but he insists that an inability to understand does not give one the right to reject a doctrine so clearly revealed in scripture.

Calvin’s view more or less prevailed in Reformed confessions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, although even in the Reformed branch there were various refinements. Peter Martyr Vermigli affirmed a doctrine of double predestination like Calvin. However, unlike Calvin, Vermigli tended toward a passive understanding of reprobation as a passing over, whereas Calvin seemed to conceive of reprobation as active. There were also theologians of the Reformed tradition who demurred about a full-fledged doctrine of double predestination. Bullinger of Zurich refused to accept reprobation as a necessary corollary to election, and his colleague at Zurich, Theodore Bibliander, openly opposed the rigorous predestinarianism of Peter Martyr Vermigli. So, despite the general consensus, there was some soteriological divergence.

In seventeenth-century Holland within the Reformed church, opposition to the Calvinistic teaching on predestination arose in the teaching of JACOBUS ARMINIUS. In his Declaration of Sentiments (1608) Arminius objected not only to double predestination, but also to the supralapsarian (as well as infralapsarian) conception of election. Although never normative for Reformed Protestantism, there were those whose doctrine of predestination inclined them to a supralapsarian order of the divine decrees—that is, in eternity, God’s decree of election (and reprobation) was logically before the decree to permit the fall. In effect this made the fall a means by which the decree of election and reprobation could be implemented. The majority tended to a more historic view of infralapsarianism—that is, in eternity, God decreed to permit the fall logically before God’s decree of election (and reprobation). According to this line of thinking, election was seen as a rescue of sinners. Debate over this speculative aspect of predestination sparked intense controversy in the Dutch Protestant church between the Arminians and the Reformed (see ARMINIANISM).

Along with his rejection of the supralapsarian conception of predestination, Arminius also concluded that divine election is conditioned upon foreseen faith. The theological debate became a national controversy that was resolved at the Synod of Dordrecht (1618–1619). This national SYNOD, which included representatives from various Reformed Protestant churches throughout Europe, upheld the traditional Reformed belief in unconditional election along with the other so-called four main points of CALVINISM (total depravity, limited ATONEMENT, irresistible GRACE, and perseverance of the SAINTS). The Canons of Dordrecht (or Dort; see DORT, CANONS OF) clearly favored an infralapsarian conception of predestination, although without condemning supralapsarianism. This became normative for the Reformed ORTHODOXY.

Under the influence of the continental Reformed theologians, the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of Religion of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND also embraced unconditional election (article 17). There was a good deal of resistance but never enough to excise the article. The Puritan movement within the Anglican Church continued generally to uphold unconditional election and double predestination (see PURITANISM). For many Puritans the doctrine of election took on added significance by establishing a link to the doctrine of assurance. Scholars have often noted that among English and American Puritans the doctrine of election seems to provoke a certain anxiety over the assurance of one's election. In other words, Puritans came to increasingly ask the question: "How can I be assured that I am one of God's elect?" Early reformers tended to answer this question by pointing the anxious Christian exclusively to the promises of Christ. However, later Protestants and especially the Puritans, although acknowledging the viability of the earlier Reformed answer, wanted something more tangible and began to answer the question by pointing to certain signs (signa posteriora) of spiritual fruit in the individual's life, such as regular attendance at church, partaking of the SACRAMENTS, reading the BIBLE, and PRAYER. These signs became concrete evidences of one's election and thus, it was argued, relieved the anxiety. This kind of spiritual logic became known as the practical syllogism and, following a standard pattern of spiritual argument, was based on the theological principle that the elect necessarily exhibit certain observable signs of their election. If the individual exhibits those signs, then they are among the elect. The practical syllogism, in varying forms, was manifested in the teachings of the Synod of Dordrecht as well as in the thought of the American Puritan JONATHAN EDWARDS.

One of the most public controversies among leading Protestants in the eighteenth-century centered on the doctrine of predestination. The two founders of the Methodist movement, GEORGE WHITEFIELD and JOHN WESLEY, were bitterly divided over this theological issue. In 1740 when Whitefield was preaching in the American colonies during the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS), Wesley preached and published his sermon entitled "On Free Grace," in which he labeled the doctrine of election "blasphemy." The Wesleyan Methodists followed Arminius's view that election was based on foreseen faith, whereas the Calvinist Methodists and Whitefield upheld traditional Reformed doctrine of unconditional election. This controversy led to an irreversible breach between Wesley and Whitefield as well as their followers.

Modern Developments of the Doctrine of Election

Generally the doctrine of election continued to be advocated by Presbyterians and Evangelical Anglicans, denied by Methodists and Baptists, and ridiculed by secularists during the ENLIGHTENMENT of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It was not until KARL BARTH that the doctrine of election received a new and revolutionary interpretation. For the Swiss theologian the doctrine of election was “the sum of the gospel.” In essence Barth turned the whole of theology into CHRISTOLOGY. While looking to the reformers for theological inspiration, he developed his understanding of election in a vastly different way. Where the Reformers tended to advocate a double predestination—election of some to salvation and reprobation to condemnation for others—Barth identified Christ with both the elect and the reprobate. According to his view divine predestination is properly described as a double predestination, which he understood as God making the double decision to elect all mankind to salvation in Christ as well as the decision to reprobate Christ himself in place of sinful humanity. Christ is at once the elect for all and the reprobate for all. Although Barth was unwilling to acknowledge a doctrine of apokatastasis (universal salvation), this seems to be the necessary conclusion to his unique understanding of double predestination. Thus Barth’s understanding of election is the victory over reprobation or, as he said, it is the “triumph of grace.” Barth’s distinctive approach has indeed removed the long-standing uneasiness of this doctrine, but in so doing has divorced the doctrine from its Augustinian origins.

References and Further Reading

- Berkouwer, G.C. The Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth. Translated by Harry R. Boer. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1956.
- Bloesch, Donald G. Jesus is Victor! Karl Barth’s Doctrine of Salvation. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1976.
- Bray, John S. Theodore Beza’s Doctrine of Predestination. Nieuwkoop: B.DeGraaf, 1975.
- Jacobs, Paul. Prädestination und Verantwortlichkeit bei Calvin. Reprint. Darmstadt, 1968.
- James, Frank A. Peter Martyr Vermigli and Predestination: The Augustinian Inheritance of an Italian Reformer. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1998.
- Klooster, Fred H. Calvin’s Doctrine of Predestination. 2d edition. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1977.
- McSorley, Harry J. Luther Right or Wrong? New York: Newman Press, 1969.
- Muller, Richard A. Christ and the Decree: Christology and Predestination in Reformed Theology from Calvin to Perkins. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1988.
- Steinmetz, David C. Luther and Staupitz: An Essay in the Intellectual Origins of the Protestant Reformation. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1980.
- Walser, Peter. Die Prädestination bei Heinrich Bullinger im Zusammenhang mit seiner Gotteslehre. Zurich, Switzerland, 1957.

FRANK A.JAMES III

ELIOT, GEORGE (1819–1880)

English writer. Under the pseudonym George Eliot, Mary Ann (Marian) Evans wrote eight novels that all implicitly or explicitly explore religious themes. She explored religion throughout her own life as well.

Eliot was born November 22, 1819, in Warwickshire, ENGLAND. Early in life she experienced an evangelical CONVERSION, prompted by interaction with a boarding school teacher. After a family move in 1841, she came into contact with a circle of Unitarians. She left EVANGELICALISM and began to immerse herself in the ideas of DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS (whose Life of Jesus she translated), LUDWIG FEUERBACH, Auguste Comte, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL, and Baruch Spinoza. In 1854 she entered a relationship with George Henry Lewes, whom she would have married if his wife had granted him a divorce. His death in 1878 devastated her, but she did fall in love again and marry an old friend, John Walter Cross, shortly before her death on December 22, 1880.

Some scholars have concluded that Eliot abandoned Christianity entirely, but her writing suggests otherwise. Eliot's first two works, Scenes of Clerical Life (1858) and Adam Bede (1859), feature protagonists engaged in Christian ministry, including, in the latter, a female Methodist preacher. Eliot's best novel, Middlemarch (1872), centers on Dorothea Brooke, an autobiographical character who engages in religious scholarship and social justice work. Eliot's last novel, Daniel Deronda (1876), interweaves JUDAISM, Christianity, and elements of Comte's "religion of humanity." This blend reflects the views of the author, who wrote in an 1873 letter, "Every community met to worship the highest Good (which is understood to be expressed by God) carries me along in its main current."

See also Jesus, Lives of; Unitarian Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

- Dodd, Valerie A. George Eliot: An Intellectual Life. London: Macmillan, 1990.
- Hodgson, Peter C. The Mystery Beneath the Real: Theology in the Fiction of George Eliot. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 2000.

ELESHA COFFMAN

ELIOT, JOHN (1604–1690)

New England Puritan. John Eliot was a longtime minister in Roxbury, Massachusetts, and a missionary to American Indian peoples of southern New England. He was born in Widford, Hertfordshire, ENGLAND. A graduate of Jesus College, Cambridge in 1622, he was likely converted under Puritan pastor THOMAS HOOKER in 1629. Eliot emigrated to Massachusetts Bay in 1631 to enjoy worship services characterized by New Testament purity rather than by the “human additions and novelties” that he believed plagued an insufficiently reformed CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The following year the Roxbury congregation ordained him a teaching elder, and he remained there for fifty-five years.

Eliot embraced mostly mainstream Puritan positions, although two of his works, The Christian Commonwealth (1659) and The Communion of Churches (1665), expressed unconventional political, eschatological, and ecclesiological views that he later largely abandoned (see ESCHATOLOGY, ECCLESIOLOGY). He helped translate the Bay Psalm Book (1640), a metrical Psalter that was the first book printed in New England. Eliot sought to make the Puritan church inclusive, as illustrated by his support for the Halfway Covenant and, more dramatically, his outreach to the Indians. He first preached to natives in 1646, gathered early converts into their own settlement at Natick by 1651, and published his first work in the Indians’ own Massachusett language in 1654. Eliot went on to found fourteen Indian “praying towns” and to translate the BIBLE and several Puritan devotional works into Massachusett. Such efforts earned him the title “Apostle to the Indians.” Although Eliot sought to transform the natives’ religion and much of their CULTURE, his long-term interaction with Indians in turn transformed him into a great respecter of their humanity and a great sympathizer with Indian problems. Eliot died on May 21, 1690.

See also Puritanism; Bible Translation

References and Further Reading

Cogley, Richard W. John Eliot's Mission to the Indians Before King Philip's War. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

———. "John Eliot's Puritan Ministry." Fides et Historia 31 (Winter/Spring 1999): 1–18.

Winslow, Ola E. John Eliot. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1968.

RICHARD W.POINTER

ELIOT, T.S. (1888–1965)

English poet. Because he once described himself as “a classicist in literature, a conservative in politics, and a catholic in religion,” it would seem paradoxical to include T.S.Eliot in an Encyclopedia of Protestantism. However, Eliot’s final ANGLO-CATHOLICISM was as self-conscious a personal construction as his writing and politics—the outcome of a long and complex journey, mirroring his career pilgrimage from patrician Bostonian (albeit born in St. Louis, Missouri) to enfant terrible of modernist poetry, to London publisher and arbiter of English critical taste.

Critical opinion has always been sharply divided over Eliot’s poetical and religious evolution. For some the change from the disillusioned and agnostic radical of Prufrack (1917), the early poems, and The Waste Land (1922), to the Christian poet of Ash Wednesday (1930) and the Four Quartets (1943), was a retreat as unforgivable aesthetically and philosophically as his taking of British citizenship (1927) and his subsequent conservatism was politically. Yet with hindsight, early poems like The Hippopotamus are visibly more Christian than agnostic, and essays like Tradition and the Individual Talent (1919) presented an argument about the necessity of change as applicable to THEOLOGY as to its ostensible AESTHETICS.

More important, the later self-advertised “conservatism” conceals only thinly a continued poetic and theological radicalism. The apparent mysticism of Ash Wednesday distracted many readers from the fact that Eliot’s style was even more elliptical and fragmented than The Waste Land, the Quartets—together with the four verse plays, beginning with Murder in the Cathedral (1933)—continued to break new ground aesthetically. It was, moreover, typical of Eliot to advocate adherence to the traditions of the past at the very time that he was at his most theologically innovative. For him the great Christian “tradition” of European poetry and philosophy did not involve imitation of the past, but changing it—and seeing each new work as implying a radical reappraisal of all that had gone before. Proclaimed as an aesthetic and critical creed, it was less noticed that this was also a theological principle. Eliot’s critical veneration for Dante and the Metaphysical poets, JOHN DONNE, GEORGE HERBERT, Vaughan, and Marvell, stemmed also from a desire to write poetry that would change not merely readers’ understanding of the present, but of the past—a move that reached its fullest expression in his meditations on Britain at war in Little Gidding. Similarly for his new-found ANGLICANISM to survive, it was essential that it could answer JOHN HENRY NEWMAN’S criticism that it lacked self-awareness—and part of the answer lay in changing our understanding of the tradition to which the Catholic Newman had appealed. Essays such as Notes Towards a Definition of Culture and The Idea of a Christian Society, controversial as they were to prove, were part of the same attempt to see his faith in social as much as aesthetic terms.

His encouragement of new poetic talent as a publisher, his Nobel Prize (1948), and his service in liturgical and educational developments made him a leading English public figure after World War II.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Eliot, T.S. Complete Poems and Plays. London: Faber, 1969.
 ——. Notes Towards a Definition of Culture. London: Faber, 1947.
 ——. Selected Essays, Third edition. London: Faber, 1951.
 ——. The Idea of a Christian Society. London: Faber, 1940.

Secondary Source:

- Ackroyd, Peter. T.S.Eliot: a Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.

STEPHEN PRICKETT

ELIZABETH I (ELIZABETH TUDOR) (1533–1603)

Elizabeth I was the savior of Protestantism in England, establishing it permanently as the state religion, ANGLICANISM, with the conservative Elizabethan Settlement of Religion in 1559. But Elizabeth's reluctance to permit any further religious change created the Puritan movement within Anglicanism and spawned a number of separatist churches. Elizabeth created the religious foundation for English-speaking Protestantism.

Her birth precipitated a schism between ENGLAND and Rome, and Elizabeth was educated by evangelical tutors. Spending some of her formative years in the household of Queen Katherine Parr of England, she learned the attitudes of Erasmian humanism and Protestant reform. As a youth she also learned the political necessity of cautious dissembling, appearing to be a Henrician Catholic under her father, HENRY VIII, an obedient Edwardian Protestant under her half-brother Edward VI, and a dutiful attendee of Catholic masses under her half-sister Mary.

After she took the throne on November 17, 1558, Elizabeth indicated her clear rejection of Catholicism. She repudiated TRANSUBSTANTIATION, refusing to allow the elevation of the host in her chapel services and at her coronation. By Easter 1559 her chaplain celebrated at a table rather than an ALTAR, and she received both the bread and the wine—sure signs of Protestantism. Elizabeth prudently refused to explain her personal theology, but her behaviors and writings demonstrate her to have been Erasmian, evangelical, and Lutheran in her preferences. Despite her certain Protestantism, Elizabeth was very cautious about religious change, irritating and infuriating Protestants who hoped that she would create a better disciplined, preaching church.

The Elizabethan Settlement of Religion created the Anglican Church with its prayer book LITURGY and its continued Episcopal structure of governance. Though Protestant in THEOLOGY, the church looked Catholic in structure. Its form may well have reflected Elizabeth's personal tastes in Protestantism. It certainly reflected the necessity of compromise with powerful Catholic forces in the nation. The queen, a Nicodemite keeping her religious conviction concealed, wanted political stability more than she wanted to please a jealous God, so the Act of Uniformity required all her subjects to use the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER (1552), slightly amended, and left the bishops in charge. By the Act of Supremacy, Elizabeth became Supreme Governor of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

As Supreme Governor, Elizabeth would not allow any infringement of her right to control religion. In 1562/3, when it was still expected that she would complete the reforms, the Convocation of CANTERBURY, representing the CLERGY, proposed to Parliament a set of disciplinary reforms and a statement of belief that became the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. Elizabeth exploded, making it clear that decisions about religion were not to be made without her permission. It was not until 1571 that the Thirty-Nine Articles became law, leaving the English church in a theological limbo for the first dozen years of her reign. Moreover, Elizabeth never permitted a reform of the discipline, so the church administered discipline according to the canon law (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE).

As events in the 1560s made it clear that Elizabeth was not going to allow further reformation of her church, those committed to it began to agitate for change. These "Puritans" were, in many ways, Elizabeth's direct creation, because she refused to respond to their concerns. One result was a Presbyterian movement that sought to strip the English church of its "evil" bishops and give power to congregations, but Elizabeth was not interested in sharing power with anyone. The 1570s and 1580s were dominated by the struggle between those who wanted a church more like Calvinist churches and those who defended the queen's prayer book religion and her bishops.

This caught her bishops between their queen and their consciences. In 1576, commenting that England already had enough preachers, Elizabeth ordered Edmund Grindal, archbishop of Canterbury, to suppress "prophesyings," educational exercises that encouraged PREACHING. Grindal refused, reminding Elizabeth that she was a mortal creature and would be judged by God for hindering the duties of the bishops. She suspended him as archbishop, further encouraging the belief that PRESBYTERIANISM, or even separation from the established church, was the only way for the godly to complete the REFORMATION. When Grindal died in 1583, he was replaced by JOHN WHITGIFT. Called her "little black husband" by Elizabeth, Whitgift accepted the job of forcing the Puritans into obedience to their sovereign.

Elizabeth's commitment to religious stability meant that she was unwilling to allow persecution on religious grounds, but she did practice political persecution. She demanded obedience to her law, not ideological purity. Consequently, she did not punish Catholics for their faith, but for their allegiance to a foreign power, the Pope. After the Catholic Revolt of the Northern Earls in 1569 and her excommunication by the Pope in 1570, her government squeezed Catholics harder and harder, insisting they attend church and take communion or pay heavy fines. But they were not burned for heresy. On the other hand, Catholic missionary priests working in England were frequently executed for treason against the queen. By the 1590s, Elizabeth, feeling embattled on both sides, accepted harsher and harsher measures against anyone, Catholic or Protestant, who refused to participate in the religion established by law.

Elizabeth's intransigence was her most important contribution to English-speaking Protestantism. Her religious settlement created a national church with Protestant theology and Catholic structures. Across her long reign, supporters and detractors of that settlement hardened into forerunners of recognizable denominations. If Elizabeth had been less stubborn, the religious history of the English-speaking world might have been very different.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Evangelicalism; Lutheranism; Puritanism

References and Further Reading

- Collinson, Patrick. "Windows in a Woman's Soul: Questions About the Religion of Queen Elizabeth I," Elizabethan Essays.
- Doran, Susan. Elizabeth I and Religion. London: Routledge, 1994.
- . "Elizabeth I's Religion: Clues from Her Letters," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 51 (2000), 699–720
- Haigh, Christopher. Elizabeth I. London: Longman Group, 1988.
- Haugaard, William P. "Elizabeth Tudor's Book of Devotions: A Neglected Clue to the Queen's Life and Character," Sixteenth Century Journal XII (1981), 99–106.
- Jones, Norman. The Birth of the Elizabethan Age. England in the 1560s. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1993.
- MacCaffrey, Wallace, Elizabeth I. London: Edward Arnold, 1993.

NORMAN L.JONES

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO (1803–1882)

Essayist, philosopher, and poet. Emerson was a guiding light in the movement of religious reform known as American transcendentalism. His essays also figured importantly in the emergence of a distinctively American literary tradition and the development of religious liberalism and romantic religion in the United States.

Early Years

Born May 25, 1803, in what was once the staunchly Puritan town of Boston, Emerson was the second of four surviving sons of Ruth Haskins Emerson and William Emerson (1769–1811), minister to Boston's First Church. The Emersons descended from a long line of New England clerics, but in contrast to the Calvinist faith of his Puritan forebears, Emerson's father aligned himself with the liberal Unitarian wing of the the Congregational churches. After his father died in 1811, Emerson and his brothers were raised primarily by their mother and a charismatic aunt, Mary Moody Emerson (1774–1863) who was for years her nephew's chief religious confidante and mentor.

At the age of fourteen Emerson entered Harvard College, where he was trained in the standard curriculum of the classics, rhetoric, history, English, and theology. Though only a middling student, he demonstrated some flair as an aspiring poet and essayist. It was in college, however, that he first began keeping the voluminous journal that served throughout his life as a rich resource for his essays, lectures, and addresses. Here he was also introduced to the new German school of biblical scholarship—the HIGHER CRITICISM—from the popular lecturer Edward Everett (1794–1865).

In 1825, after much indecision, Emerson resolved to enter the ministry, whereupon he began formal study at Harvard's Divinity School. Licensed to preach the following year, he served as a supply preacher for congregations in eastern Massachusetts until his ordination in 1829 at Boston's historic Second Church. Having meanwhile married a beautiful young heiress named Ellen Tucker, Emerson now seemed launched on a happy and prosperous career, but after a mere sixteen months of marriage, Ellen succumbed to tuberculosis, leaving her husband adrift and disconsolate. The next year, in protest over his church's insistence on the traditional administration of the COMMUNION rite, Emerson resigned his pastorate and embarked on his first extended journey abroad.

In the wake of Ellen's death in 1831, Emerson underwent a kind of religious transformation, of which the first fruit was the publication in 1836 of his book, Nature. Part sermon, part prose-poem, Nature was Emerson's earliest attempt to put his new romantic religious and philosophical vision into words. In the weeks following the appearance of Nature, Emerson began meeting informally with several of his friends, mostly Unitarian clergymen, to discuss recent views on art, religion, and science. The meetings soon attracted the attention of a wider association that formed the nucleus of the transcendentalist movement.

Emerson's Views Develop

Two addresses delivered in the decade of renewal following Ellen's death serve as the best gauges of Emerson's mature views on Unitarian religion and Christianity in general. The first of these, "The Lord's Supper," he presented to his parishioners in the fall of 1832 to explain his reasons for stepping down. Reviewing the history of the communion rite in Western churches and the gospel evidence concerning its origins, he concluded that Jesus never intended to establish a rite of perpetual observance and that it was not appropriate to celebrate the rite as the church was then doing. Emerson's critique of the communion rite reflected the influence of German historical methods, but was fueled by his growing dissatisfaction with the church's general adherence to what he termed "formal religion"—religion in which the outer forms of religious observance are thought to overwhelm its inner spirit.

The famous address Emerson delivered at the commencement ceremonies of Harvard's Divinity School in 1838 set out his considered theological positions even more defiantly. Here he argued that traditional Christianity had committed two grave errors: first, it had become unduly preoccupied with the person of Jesus of Nazareth, and second, it no longer gave sufficient heed to the true source of revelation—the soul itself, stronghold of the "moral nature"—what Emerson variously referred to as the Self, the Over-soul, or the God within. Here he made his Christological views explicit: Jesus was the "true man," the greatest moral exemplar and teacher in the history of the world, but he was not the son of God in any exclusive sense. Emerson's address triggered an avalanche of protest from Unitarian authorities, including Harvard's professor of biblical literature, Andrews Norton (1786–1853), who condemned Emerson's address as the "latest form of infidelity."

Following the controversy triggered by the Divinity School address, Emerson withdrew from religious polemics to dedicate his energies to various writing projects. Besides his involvement with The Dial (1840–1844), the first transcendentalist literary magazine, he worked assiduously to complete two collections of essays upon which his subsequent reputation was built: Essays: First Series (1841) and Essays: Second Series, published three years later. "Self-Reliance," perhaps America's most famous and controversial essay, appeared for the first time in the collection of 1841. Emerson's ruminations on the universal immanence of the moral law had convinced him that the human soul was itself grounded in divinity, a concept for which he found corroboration in the Quaker doctrine of the inner light, and later in his reading of the Bhagavad Gita and the Upanishads.

While continuities may be seen between Emersonian self-reliance and Quaker piety, and even with older patterns of New England faith, Emerson's theological views represented a striking departure from tradition. Quick to affirm his belief in the divinity of man and nature, he also voiced doubt about doctrines ascribing personality to God. The "Self" or divine principle in Emersonian thought was impersonal and monistic, not theistic. Also distinctive of Emersonian thought was its emphasis on process and transformation. Thus, Emersonian thought exhibited marked suspicion of traditional metaphysical or theological formulations. Good flowed from the soul's outward expansions; evil was its mere privation.

Emerson's Writings

The publication of Emerson's first two books of essays was followed in 1850 by Representative Men, and by English Traits in 1856. Before his death in 1882, several more collections followed, including The Conduct of Life (1860) and Society and Solitude (1870). By mid-century, Emerson had acquired the status of an American cultural icon. Through the popularization of his poems and essays, "the Sage of Concord" had become America's representative philosopher. Emerson died on April 27, 1882.

Although Emerson did not participate actively in the affairs of the Unitarian church after the controversies of the 1830s, by the end of the century the views of the transcendentalist ministers had become part of a normative Unitarian outlook. On the other hand, mainline Protestant denominations have tended to ignore Emerson because of his abandonment of traditional theological forms, his preference for the languages of science and philosophy, and his conception of Jesus primarily as a moral exemplar. Nevertheless, his legacy fundamentally altered the cultural landscape within which American churches have developed.

See also Romanticism; Unitarian-Universalist Churches

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Emerson, E.W., ed. The Complete Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Centenary Ed., Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1903–1904.

Ferguson, Alfred R., et al., ed. The Collected Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1971–.

Gilman, William H., et al., ed. The Journals and Miscellaneous Notebooks of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1960–1982.

Secondary Sources:

Hutchison, William R. The Transcendentalist Ministers: Church Reform in the New England Renaissance. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1959.

Richardson, Robert D., Jr. Emerson: The Mind on Fire. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1995.

Robinson, David. Apostle of Culture: Emerson as Preacher and Lecturer. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982.

Rusk, Ralph L., and Eleanor Tilton, eds. The Letters of Ralph Waldo Emerson. New York: Columbia University Press, 1939–.

von Frank, Albert J., ed. The Complete Sermons of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1989–.

ALAN D.HODDER

EMPIRICAL THEOLOGY

How is one to know what is religiously true? Dissatisfaction with poor answers to this question has led religious thinkers to examine critically their religious knowledge. Among those who have done this are empirical theologians.

In their efforts to justify their claims to truth, empirical theologians have based their religious knowledge on religious experience. Unlike most other religious thinkers, empirical theologians have understood religious experience to be a form of perception. Also, for the empirical theologians this perception refers to concrete and natural evidence rather than to supernatural events.

Empirical theologians are often called “liberals,” because they assume that people must decide for themselves whether their evidence is religiously persuasive (see LIBERAL; PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Many other theologians have disagreed with them, particularly neo-Reformation theologians, who have followed in the line of thought extending from St. Augustine (354–430), to MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546), to KARL BARTH (1886–1968). The neo-Reformation theologians argued that people are so misled by their sin and natural limitations that their evaluation of evidence is unreliable, so that God must intervene and lead them to the truth (see NEO-ORTHODOXY).

Philosophical Origins of Empirical Theology

To introduce empirical theology historically, the story of its philosophical origins will be interpreted with the bias of an empirical theologian. Empirical theology is understood to be an effort to defend religious knowledge in a new way, particularly after it had been challenged by a turn of events in European thought. Take empiricism back to its modern origins, back to Englishman FRANCIS BACON (1561–1628), who was the first major Western thinker to propose an empirical method for learning about the world. Bacon was impatient with thinkers who seemed to spin ideas out of their thought or who followed what he called the “idols” of biased perception, private predilection, commercial metaphor, and philosophical dogma. He admired the new scientists, such as Copernicus and Galileo, who looked to physical evidence in the world that stood before them.

JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704) also revolted against those who believed that good ideas could be gained by thought alone. For Locke, the mind possessed no ideas innate to itself, but began as “a blank slate,” an “empty cabinet” ready to be filled with clear and distinct ideas delivered by the five senses as they regarded the external world. The store of ideas contributed by the five senses was increased, Locke said, by additional ideas contributed by a kind of “internal sense,” whereby one reflects on the ideas gained through sensation and relates those ideas to each other through acts of reason, believing, doubting, or willing.

Locke was followed by other empiricists, principal among them the Scottish philosopher DAVID HUME (1711–1776). Hume went beyond Locke by asserting that if we have only our own impressions (“matters of fact”) and only our own ways of relating those impressions (“relations of ideas”), then we have no reason to claim that our beliefs apply to the external world. We merely have head-realities—impressions and ways of relating impressions. Accordingly, such external realities as space, time, and causality are merely our habits of speech, only customs of talking about our impressions and their logical relations. But Hume went still further. For him, religion, AESTHETICS, and ETHICS failed to refer even to matters of fact and relations of ideas. Religion, aesthetics, and ethics cannot show how they are based on facts or on the relations of ideas, so that if they are theories, then they are theories without even the weak empirical plausibility that Hume had accorded to sense experience.

Before Hume, an implicit empiricism had been Western religion’s best friend. Scriptural JUDAISM, Christianity, and Islam had all used historical evidence to justify their beliefs. God had been encountered not behind closed eyelids and not behind closed doors in dark, silent chambers, but rather in the open spaces of the desert, in the clouds on mountaintops, in the outcomes of military battles, in green pastures and beside still waters, in outdoor sermons before hungry crowds, and at a bloody execution on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

Modern philosophical empiricism could have refined sense knowledge and lent new plausibility to the implicit empiricism of the scriptures and traditions of the ancient Middle East. But Hume prevented that; even if religious language had been empirical, empirical knowledge referred to the self rather than to the world external to the self. In effect, he bent the hook of Western religious thought, so that it caught only the garments of the believer and let the fish in the sea of history swim away. He turned history’s time, space, and causality into arid customs of thought and made the mighty acts of God ghostly constructions imaginatively entertained in the private interiors of isolated individuals.

But it was not as though Hume—an elite, European, male—had single-handedly dissolved empiricism and with it the hard, time-tested reality of the masses. Hume’s argument was simply an emblem of the emerging, secular, commercial, and scientific practices and beliefs of ordinary Europeans. He and they treasured information, whatever it referred to, and began to have doubts about the supposedly factual religious stories of the ancient Middle East. They created a new, self-critical empiricism that broke the religious bed in which, for millennia, religious claims had been sleeping and exposed religious beliefs to drafts of hostile analysis. No one, certainly not the European masses, had wanted to expose religion to hostile analysis, but this happened anyway.

The well-meaning German philosopher IMMANUEL KANT (1724–1804) tried to save the West from empirical skepticism, but he only made matters worse. He first turned his attention to empirical knowledge, primarily to save SCIENCE, which had long assumed that its empirical knowledge had referred to something real. Agreeing with Hume that science's knowledge might not refer directly to the external world, Kant argued that it was nevertheless true, because it was based on universal structures of the human mind. Space and time, quantity and quality, and substance and causality were universal aspects of thought, Kant said, and it was the human mind that, with these structures, made knowledge of the external world possible, not the other way around. Using mental structures, science synthesized phenomena and thereby arrived at real truth. However, although he may have cast aside Hume's bent hook, Kant seemed also to place the fish of the sea of history in the aquarium of the human mind.

For Kant, science kept one foot in the known world of phenomena, but morality and religion were entirely removed from that world. Morality and religion depended on one's own private will to do what is good, but this will derived neither from sense experience nor from pure and universal reasons of the mind. Nevertheless, Kant argued that the moral will was thoroughly real, so that people should examine it and uncover and affirm what it presupposed. Among those presuppositions was a God who would reward moral efforts in HEAVEN as they were not rewarded on Earth. However, this God was derived from reasoning about one's internal, spiritual life and had no empirical basis.

Kant's efforts were about as helpful to religious empiricism as ocean water is to a thirsty person. Kant may have saved science's indirect access to phenomena of physical history, but at the same time he removed God from physical history. For Kant, religious meaning was derived from reasoning about the subjective human spirit, not from the social and incarnational histories so important to the ancient Israelites and Christians.

The solution offered by Kant and other nineteenth-century philosophical idealists caused the great majority of theologians of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to locate religious knowledge more in the private and spiritual events of a person's heart and mind than in the public and material events of a society's history. For these theologians, people might sit in the train of spatial-temporal history, but their religious dreams were about a world outside spatial-temporal history. These theologians were more attuned to Plato and Aristotle, whose sublime ideas existed somehow apart from historical contingency, and less attuned to the biblical worlds in which material and spiritual history were united and made up all the world there was.

Anticipations of Empirical Theology

Empirical theology was primarily an American effort to return to the world of Locke and to begin again to interrogate carefully the external world in search of concrete evidence on which to base religious experience and knowledge. Reverting to where Locke had left off, empirical theologians were blessed—some say cursed—with the naiveté of those who assumed that they perceived a world external to themselves. This recovery began with American theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS, whom historian Perry Miller has called “the first and most radical, even though the most tragically misunderstood, of American empiricists” (Miller 1948:137). Admittedly, Miller’s interpretation stands against what may be the more accepted interpretation: that Edwards was a philosophical idealist, more influenced by the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS than by Locke’s empiricism. According to Miller, the youthful Edwards obtained a copy of Locke’s Essay Concerning Human Understanding and understood in a flash why Locke had replaced understanding based on ideas innate to the human mind with ideas derived from the five senses. But Edwards became the protege who carried the master’s doctrine further than had the master; he bridled at Locke’s restriction of perception to the five senses and asserted that there were other forms of perception, specifically what he called “the sense of the heart.” The sense of the heart was not only an affection, but also a form of perception—one that, for example, went beyond the idea that God was holy or displeased and actually perceived God’s holiness or displeasure, just as the actual taste of the sweetness of honey went beyond the idea that honey is sweet. With this fuller empiricism, Edwards argued, for example, that religious words can be restored through renewing the perception on which they are based; that when SIN alienates the inclinations, one’s perception can be newly opened to God’s spirit as it is perceived in God’s works; and that sensational PREACHING (for example, revivalist preaching about damnation) can enliven the sense of the heart.

Although America had to wait more than 100 years for the next great theorist of religious empiricism, WILLIAM JAMES (1842–1910), this is not to say that empirical theology in various popular forms was absent in America from Edwards’s death in 1758 until the 1870s, when James came into his own. Pietistic evangelicals made religious affections key to religious identity, thereby centering theological truth on a religious experience that might be called “religious perception of religious evidence.” This PIETISM began at least with the first Great Awakening (1740–1742) (see AWAKENINGS); was sustained by various Congregationalist, Methodist, Baptist, Disciples, Presbyterian, and independent groups; was boosted by a series of large REVIVALS lasting until at least 1875; and grew stronger through the twentieth century and into the twenty-first century. However, connections between pietistic evangelicals and empirical theologians were seldom appreciated, because each group regarded the other suspiciously across a canyon of cultural differences.

Meanwhile, like Edwards, James carried the empiricism of Locke to a deeper level, calling it “radical empiricism.” James began as a materialistic empiricist, first as a medical student and then as the psychologist who set up America’s first laboratory for psychological research. However, his investigations led him to believe that clear and conscious sensations of medical facts were less important than the relations among the facts—the “near, next, like, from, towards, against, because, for, through”—none of which could be sensed. These relations convey the desire underlying a sensed activity, the goal that it seeks, and the dangerousness, beauty, and utility that it conveys. For James, these are “affective phenomena” or “appreciative attributes,” missed entirely by Locke (and, later, by the twentieth-century positivists, who would confine perception to reports of the five senses). Perceiving these relations, we do not just invent, guess at, or think about the feelings and values in the external world, but actually feel them.

In Varieties of Religious Experience and A Pluralistic Universe, James argued that religious experience itself could be a form of nonsensuous perception. Religion is a person's "total reaction upon life," and religious perception is "that curious sense of the whole residual cosmos as an everlasting presence, intimate or alien, terrible or amusing" (James 1985:36–37). Within that cosmos, the divine is perceived as "a wider self," "a more," escaping our exact knowledge much as human language escapes the knowledge of the cat dozing at our feet as we converse in a library. James became the first scientist to reconcile and make singular what had been two separate worlds, one religious and spiritual, the other irreligious and physical. Admittedly, James did not reach this point single-handedly, but rather with the guidance of many Europeans—perhaps most obviously the French philosopher Henri Bergson (1859–1941).

James's radical empiricism was extended by the English-American mathematician and philosopher of science Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) and by fellow pragmatist John Dewey (1859–1952). When Whitehead, already a famed mathematician and philosopher of science, came to the UNITED STATES at age 63, he published in rapid succession at least seven books, each of which gave abstract knowledge a basis in vague physical experience. For Whitehead, primitive perception became less like a pipeline for clear and distinct impressions and more a means of registering the emotional impact of surrounding circumstances. For example, he pointed to the incomprehensible sense of attraction or repulsion felt as one enters a room, making one feel like an iron filing entering a magnet's field of force. Because of this, and often against their will, people find themselves making spontaneous, half-conscious judgments that are colored in ways they cannot understand. For Whitehead, conscious, clear sense experience and thought were only the unreliable abstractions from this rich soup of feeling. Impishly, Whitehead had stood Plato, René Descartes, Locke, and Hume on their heads; for him, vague, barely conscious, physical feeling was no longer the contaminated effluvia of reliable knowledge, but rather the solid rock on which all knowledge is built.

Whitehead believed that the religious response began as a feeling, not as an idea but rather as a vague intuition of the sacred. It was a perception of the one reality that stood beyond the chaos of the mundane world—the one reality that organizes and evaluates what otherwise is "a mass of pain and mystery" and that lures the perceiver to more intense satisfactions. Calling this reality "God," Whitehead contended that it incites us to embrace, integrate, and enjoy as much of the world's diversity as we can endure, to evolve rather than to devolve or to settle for the flat plane of monotonous repetition. God is best known directly, through mostly unconscious perception rather than through any text, ritual, or institution.

Just as Whitehead, in classic empirical fashion, moved beyond the abstraction of mathematics, John Dewey moved beyond the abstractions of German idealist GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL and began to think like a Darwinian and to talk of an "immediate empiricism" (see DARWINIANISM). Organisms lived in environments, and organisms and environments changed so regularly that they would continually lose life-sustaining connections with each other. To save themselves from destruction and to attain a new synchronicity with their environments, human organisms envisioned new forms of "the whole." They imagined a new and wider universe, one capacious enough to bring changing environments and organisms back into a working relation with each other. Finally, this whole not only was imagined, but also was perceived with what Dewey called a "sense of totality," "the sense of an extensive and underlying whole," an apprehension of an "imaginative totality"—or, most simply, "a sense of the whole."

Perceived aesthetically, Dewey said in Art as Experience, this wholeness is an art object; perceived religiously, Dewey said in A Common Faith, this wholeness to the universe can be called “God,” for it accomplishes what God is said to accomplish.

Four Empirical Theologians

Here was an American intellectual heritage, philosophically rich, theologically original, and religiously suggestive; but, except for Edwards, its authors were philosophers of religion rather than theologians. Four Americans who were modern theologians took up the task of theologically enlarging this prototype for empirical theology, connecting it with biblical and traditional questions of theology as well as with the cosmologies and methods of the sciences. Their writing, as well as writings of those who have echoed and extended their work, can be grasped quickly if it is seen in the light cast by the Edwards and the new philosophers of religion.

In 1919, Douglas Clyde Macintosh’s Theology as an Empirical Science argued that theology should adopt some of the empirical methods of the natural sciences, and Macintosh proposed a genre of “new theology.” A Canadian who taught at Yale University, Macintosh (1877–1948) argued that theologians must first discern what God seems to have accomplished in the world. Only then can they arrive at concepts of God, inferring what God must be if God is to do what God has done. Subsequently, when theologians have more fully formed their concepts of God, they must apply them to the world’s evidence and test them for their truth. For Macintosh, theology was based on perception of the world, but was not radical in James’s sense or immediate in Dewey’s sense, nor did it rely on the elemental forms of physical apprehension to which Whitehead would turn. Instead, it relied on the reports of the senses to discover God’s overt effects in a world of everyday events. Nevertheless, Macintosh’s work stood squarely in the line of British ENLIGHTENMENT empiricism and of the basic American turn to empirical evidence advocated by Edwards, James, Dewey, and Whitehead. Macintosh’s concept of God also was, however, classically orthodox in making God absolute and unambiguously good.

In Religious Experience and Scientific Method, Henry Nelson Wieman (1884–1975) acknowledged that God can be more or less perceived in vague and noncognitive experiences. This meant that what we sensuously perceive is mere oil on the surface of a deep religious ocean of experience. However, because this nonsensuous experience was so ephemeral, Wieman concentrated on what was empirically more obvious: the difference between what we by ourselves are able to create and what in fact we do create. In short, we know that we are given opportunities for creativity that we have not given ourselves. Wieman called the giver of those opportunities “God” and enjoined his readers to admit that they are utterly dependent on this God. In The Source of Human Good, Wieman argued that the reality of this source of human good was so palpably obvious that atheism was absurd, so that our principal responsibility was to find ways to collaborate with it. Humans would best collaborate by doing all they could to open themselves to what is strange to them, absorb it, synthesize it, and allow it to change their lives, particularly to advance the creativity of their communities. All of this was possible, however, only because a source of creativity stood behind the process; the experience of this source of creativity was the experience of God.

Bernard Eugene Meland (1899–1993) was Wieman’s student and colleague, but, as an empiricist, he was the first major theological voice for the nonsensuous empiricism of James, Dewey, and Whitehead. Meland sought evidence for the divine in the subtle subsurface of the experienced world. Much as James held out for an experience of a “More,” Dewey for a sense of the “whole,” and Whitehead for an intuition of the sacred, Meland held out for an appreciative awareness of the “Creative Passage” experienced at the vague and indefinite margins of conscious experience. Toward the end of his career, especially in Fallible Forms and Symbols, Meland would thunder against fellow theologians, even fellow empirical theologians, who would crudely, he thought, demand precision in human thought about what was deeper than human thought. Meland’s corrective was not to invoke a judging God that would correct finite and sinful efforts to describe God, not invoke mystics of the East or West who would dismiss the world, but rather to call for more deft and sensitive ways of religiously discerning the concrete world. Meland aspired to lay hold of that which lay behind the surface of cultural, political, and scientific phenomena, without distorting it.

Bernard M. Loomer (1911–1985), like Wieman and Meland, was a professor at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, but became less rationalistic and more empirical only in the last decade of his life, after he had moved to The Graduate Theological Union in Berkeley, CA. As a disciple of Whitehead, Loomer was a nonsensuous empiricist, concentrating on the aesthetic character of specifically religious experience. He took Wieman’s lead and focused on the need to internalize and reconcile within ourselves those things that diverge most from our expectations. But he went beyond Wieman in suggesting that, in their appreciation for ambiguity, people could perceive God nonsensuously, as “the organic restlessness of the whole body of creation,” which promoted the creative diversity of the universe. In its concentration on contrast within identity, this perception was more aesthetic than moral or spiritual. Loomer wrote no books, but his essay “The Size of God,” written shortly before his death, became unexpectedly influential. There, unlike Wieman, Loomer acknowledged that God was morally ambiguous, promoting both the good and the evil that creativity makes possible.

For all their independent theological genius, the works of these most important empirical theologians (with the possible exception of MacIntosh) are best understood as extensions of the breakthroughs achieved by James, Dewey, and Whitehead. None of them seriously attempted to revise biblical interpretation, historic traditions of religious thought, or ecclesiastical symbols. Although their theological writings opened new doors and spawned an empirical style in theology, their full theological promise is yet to be realized.

The Future of Empirical Theology

At first, the wisdom of empirical theology seemed to be demonstrated by the disciples it inspired, and the realization of its full theological promise seemed imminent. But the story of the students and followers of the empirical theologians grew unexpectedly complicated, for empirical theology was made problematic in the 1980s by the new postmodernists' distrust of meta-physics and empiricism, as well as by their fondness for pluralism and relativism (see POSTMODERNITY). The postmodernists challenged empiricism's assumption that evidence could be known objectively and that religious truth could be justified by reference to its sources. Empirical theology's line of argument split into three forks, none of which simply extended the original trajectory.

Those who most closely followed that trajectory of empirical theology attempted to revise empirical theology for a new age. Some (e.g., Jerome Stone, Tyron Inbody) reconceived empirical theology. Others elaborated the empirical implications of Whitehead's philosophy of religion and formed one branch of what came to be called "PROCESS THEOLOGY." These Whiteheadians focused on naturalism and ECOLOGY (e.g., Donald Crosby, Jay McDaniel), on social justice and economic development (e.g., Marjorie Suchocki, John Donald Crosby, Jay McDaniel), on social justice and economic development (e.g., Marjorie Suchocki, John Cobb), and on the examination of parapsychology and scientific empiricism (e.g., David Griffin).

A second group, more deeply shocked by postmodern attitudes, veered away from the trajectory of empirical theology without abandoning it altogether. They found in postmodern thought new and unexpected grounds for a modest empirical theology. They acknowledged that the naturalistic metaphysics of empirical theology had been undermined. However, they found possibilities for revising empirical theology in philosophical deconstructionism, neopragmatism, and a new historicism. They focused on the empirical meanings of history (e.g., William Dean), TRADITION (e.g., Delwin Brown), and pragmatism (e.g., Sheila Davmore pluralistic revisions of empirical theology (e.g., Nancy Frankenberry, Marvin Shaw).

Later, a third group of students and friends of empirical theology (e.g., Frankenberry, Creighton Peden) took shape. They accepted the theological damage caused by the new turn away from metaphysics and toward pluralism and relativism, abandoned efforts at the revision of empirical theology, retained their affection for their former heroes, but called for the decent and complete burial of their theology.

Empirical theology had carried tantalizingly far the latent empiricism of the BIBLE and the explicit empiricism of Francis Bacon. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, a critical reaction to postmodern skepticism is setting in. If this permits the restoration of empirical theology, then its task will be, at last, to return the favor that it long ago received, changing secular CULTURE as it had once been changed by that culture.

References and Further Reading

- Dean, William. Americal Religious Empiricism. New York: State University of New York Press, 1986.
- Dean, William, and Larry Axel, eds. The Size of God: The Theology of Bernard Loomer in Context. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1987.
- Dewey, John. A Common Faith. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1934.
- Frankenberry, Nancy. Religion and Radical Empiricism. New York: State University of New York Press, 1987.
- Inbody, Tyron. The Constructive Theology of Bernard Meland. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1995.
- James, William. The Varieties of Religious Experience. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Macintosh, Douglas Clyde. Theology as an Empirical Science. New York: Arno Press, 1980.
- Meland, Bernard E. Faith and Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953.
- Miller, Perry, "Jonathan Edwards on the Sense of the Heart." Harvard Theological Review 41 (1948): 123–145.
- Miller, Randolph Crump, ed. Empirical Theology: A Handbook. Birmingham, AL: Religious Education Press, 1992.
- Stone, Jerome. The Minimalist Vision of Transcendence. Albany, NY: The State University of New York Press, 1992.
- Whitehead, Alfred North. Process and Reality: Corrected Edition. New York: The Free Press, 1987.
- Wieman, Henry Nelson. The Source of Human Good. Atlanta, GA: The Scholars Press, 1995.
- Winslow, Ola Elizabeth, ed. Jonathan Edwards: Basic Writings. New York: New American Library, 1966.

WILLIAM DEAN

ENGLAND

Protestant beliefs first began to make an impact in England during the fifteenth century, and their residual impact was a significant factor in the English Reformation and the creation of a Protestant CHURCH OF ENGLAND by 1558. Tensions between English Protestants in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries resulted in the creation of a number of Protestant churches outside the established Church of England after 1660, and there were further secessions from the established church after the evangelical revival of the eighteenth century. By the mid-nineteenth century, there were many different Protestant churches in England, but Protestantism remained the dominant religion. Although Protestantism was still the religion of two-thirds of English Christians in the late twentieth century, it had been greatly weakened by the growth of Roman Catholicism in England, the growth in the number of people following non-Christian faiths, and the overall decline of religious observance since 1850.

The Origins of Protestantism in England

The origins of English Protestantism are to be found in the teachings of John Wycliffe (c. 1330–1384) and his followers, the Lollards. Wycliffe attacked papal AuTHORITY, advocated a literal interpretation of scripture, and rejected the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION. The Lollards promoted these ideas in highly populist language. Though Lollardy was driven underground by persecution, its beliefs survived until the 1520s, when they began to be fused with the doctrines of LU-THERANISM, imported to England as a result of trade with the Dutch and North German ports. Lutheran ideas also began to be adopted by a number of university-based English theologians.

The Reformation in England

Protestant doctrines were not, however, a major element in the first phase of the English Reformation in the reign of HENRY VIII. This involved only a breach with Rome, and Catholic DOCTRINE was strictly enforced, though some leading churchmen, such as THOMAS CRANMER, clearly wished to move the English church in a more Protestant direction. This was only achieved, briefly, in the reign of Edward VI (1548–1553) and, finally, after the succession of ELIZABETH I in 1558. English Protestantism of the late sixteenth century was Calvinist rather than Lutheran in doctrine, both in the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER and the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, but the English church retained both episcopacy (see BISHOP and EPISCOPACY) and the administrative structure of the pre-Reformation church, as well as some modest elements of Catholic ceremonial in its public WORSHIP. Starting in the 1560s, an extreme Protestant lobby within the English church pressed for the abolition of bishops, of special VESTMENTS used by the CLERGY, and of the limited ceremonial permitted by the Book of Common Prayer. The late twentieth century brought a major reassessment of the impact of PURITANISM within the English church in the late sixteenth century, and it has been shown that the moderate form of CALVINISM adopted by the church leadership enjoyed widespread support throughout England.

Puritans versus Arminians

Further conflict between Puritans and non-Puritans in England took place in the early seventeenth century as a result of the deliberate rejection of Calvinism and the adoption of ARMINIANISM by many English bishops and clergy. This was combined with the introduction of more ceremony into the church services and relocation of the ALTAR from the body of the church to the east end of the chancel, where it was railed in and covered with an elaborate carpet to emphasize its sacramental nature. Puritan opposition to Arminian bishops, such as LANCELOT ANDREWES and WILLIAM LAUD, was a major factor in the English CIVIL WARS of the 1640s, which resulted in the temporary abolition of episcopacy in 1645 and of the monarchy in 1649. During the 1650s both CONGREGATIONALISM and PRESBYTERIANISM were widely adopted in England. A number of congregations of BAPTISTS had also been formed in the early seventeenth century, and these were also tolerated. More extremist Protestant groups, such as the LEVELLERS and SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, were not.

Episcopacy was re-established with the restoration of the monarchy in 1660. Although efforts were made to accommodate the different groups of Puritans, these were not wholly successful, and a number of Puritan clergy were ejected. These clergy and their followers set up their own Congregational or Presbyterian churches, all of which, together with those of the Baptists, were granted limited TOLERATION in the 1680s. Protestant dissenters from the established church, however, remained relatively few during the first half of the eighteenth century and were excluded from political and public office (see DISSENT). After the withdrawal of the more extreme Puritans, the Church of England reverted to the high church doctrines and practices favored by the Arminian bishops of the early seventeenth century, and this outlook dominated Anglican theology until the mid-nineteenth century. This THEOLOGY included a strong belief in the divine nature of monarchy and the importance of the close links between CHURCH AND STATE.

The Evangelical Revival

During the eighteenth century, both PIETISM and rationalism had a major impact on the Protestant churches in England. Pietism resulted in the Evangelical Revival, which began with JOHN WESLEY, CHARLES WESLEY, and GEORGE WHITEFIELD in the Church of England in the 1730s. Whereas the Wesleys were Arminian in doctrine, Whitefield was a Calvinist. Both groups, however, were anxious to remain within the established Church of England but gradually withdrew, in the case of the Wesleyans not until the 1790s, as a result of Episcopal and clerical opposition. METHODISM, as it was generally termed, was opposed by the bishops on the grounds that it encouraged religious enthusiasm and might lead to political radicalism and a breach in the close relationship between church and state, and also because they believed (wrongly in many cases) that Methodists were seeking to reintroduce within the Church of England the Calvinist doctrines that ANGLICANISM had rejected in the early seventeenth century. In fact, it was the Calvinist minority within Methodism that, with relatively few exceptions, remained within the Church of England and provided the core membership of Anglican EVANGELICALISM in the nineteenth century.

Rationalist influences within the Protestant churches in England had their greatest impact on NONCONFORMITY, because determined action by the bishops ensured that they made little headway in the Church of England. As a result, most English Presbyterian congregations, together with some Baptist and Congregational ones, adopted what was variously described as ARIANISM, SOCINIANISM, or Unitarianism during the second half of the eighteenth century (see UNITARIAN; UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION). However, traditional, non-Unitarian, Protestant nonconformity was stimulated by the secessions of the Methodists and some Calvinist evangelicals from the Church of England, with the result that by the religious census of 1851, the numbers of Protestant nonconformists almost equaled the number of those who attended the services of the Church of England, and in some parts of the country (e.g., Cornwall and many midland and northern towns) they greatly exceeded them.

Religious Tensions in the Early Nineteenth Century

Until the second half of the twentieth century, there was general agreement among historians that the growth of Protestant nonconformity in England had been the result of spiritual and theological stagnation in the Church of England in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. This view has now been challenged, and it is clear that, although the Church of England may not have been responding to demands for a more evangelical type of Protestantism, it was far from decadent. From about 1780, there was a major movement of ecclesiastical reform led by the bishops that anticipated parts of the reform program resulting from Parliamentary legislation in the 1830s. Nevertheless, the growth in the numbers of those who had been excluded, or who excluded themselves, from the Church of England resulted in a series of parliamentary measures in the 1820s in which many of the remaining, largely political restrictions on non-Anglicans, both Protestant nonconformists and Roman Catholics, were removed. Pressure from non-Anglicans and anticlericalists also resulted in the administrative reforms sponsored by Parliament in the 1830s, which allowed the Church of England to respond more satisfactorily to the demographic and social changes brought about by INDUSTRIALIZATION.

These same pressures also brought about a Catholic revival in the Church of England, the OXFORD MOVEMENT, determined to reassert the independence of the Church of England from state control and the authority of its bishops and clergy. This movement began with the redefinition of Anglican theology, but through its association with ROMANTICISM and its eventual desire to return to a somewhat ill-defined preReformation "golden age," by the 1840s it had resulted in significant changes to the design of Anglican churches and the presentation of Anglican worship that were widely seen as bringing the Church of England closer to the Roman Catholic Church. These changes were strongly opposed, not just by Protestant nonconformists, but also by evangelicals within the Church of England (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS). It was also opposed by a growing number of liberal or broad church theologians and their supporters, who had generally approved the parliamentary reform program of the 1830s and who wanted the Church of England to adopt both a progressive political outlook and a theology sympathetic to the less literal interpretation of scripture on which both Anglican high churchmen and Evangelicals were agreed. It is a matter of debate among historians as to whether this division of the Church of England into more clearly identified church parties was a strength, in that it promoted comprehensiveness, or a weakness, in that it shattered the broad theological consensus that had existed within the Church of England before the 1830s.

Protestantism in England Since 1850

In due course, both the Catholic and the liberal movements within the Church of England had their impact on Protestant nonconformity, and many of the divisions that existed within the established church were replicated (although usually in a less extreme form) within the various nonconformist churches. The non-conformist churches themselves became almost part of a new, more pluralist, religious establishment. During the second half of the nineteenth century, a number of new Protestant organizations, including the SALVATION ARMY, emerged to offer less structured forms of ministry and worship that had more appeal to the lower social classes, many of whom had, even by the 1851 religious census, ceased to attend services in the more traditional churches. This shift continued in the twentieth century with the establishment of and rapid growth in PENTECOSTALISM, especially among immigrant Afro-Caribbean communities in the major cities. By the early years of the twentieth century, all of the more traditional Protestant churches in England were in severe decline, as was Protestantism as a whole. Along with the growth of new Protestant churches was a significant increase in the Roman Catholic population. This increase had begun in the 1840s with conversions from the Church of England, resulting from the Oxford Movement, and immigration from IRELAND after the potato famine of the 1840s. By the 1990s, even Roman Catholicism was in decline in England, and it was generally estimated that the 10 percent of the population who were regular churchgoers were more or less evenly divided (one-third each) among the Church of England, the Roman Catholic Church, and the non-Anglican Protestant churches.

Protestantism and the English Nation

Over the four and a half centuries of its existence, Protestantism in England has closely identified itself with a strong sense of English nationalism and has seen its fortunes as being closely bound up with that of the nation as a whole. Despite the long record of religious toleration in England compared with many other European countries, a clear manifestation of militant anti-Catholicism in England was sustained until well into the twentieth century. The vestiges of this remain in the legislation that prevents the monarch from being, or marrying, a Roman Catholic. This alliance between Englishness and Protestantism is deep-rooted and frequently subconscious in a nation that has largely ceased to practice formal religion. However, during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the defense of the Protestant constitution was a matter on which all English Protestants, whether in the established Church of England or in one of the non-conformist churches, could agree. The result was that, despite some pressure from nonconformists for disestablishment in the late nineteenth century, disestablishment never really became a major nonconformist demand in England in the way that it did in WALES, where it was linked with issues of language and nationality. That Protestant bond in England, and the strength of anti-Catholicism, also led to occasions in both the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in which evangelicals within the established church and Protestant nonconformists outside it formed alliances against movements in the Church of England that critics felt were moving it closer to Roman Catholicism. As the Church of England began to recognize that religious pluralism was a reality, it became more willing to recognize Protestant nonconformity as almost a part of the Protestant establishment, and ecumenical dialogue between the mainstream Protestant churches in England took place much earlier than that between the Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church (see ECUMENISM, DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL).

Although there have been good relations between the long-established Protestant churches in England (which has not always been extended to some of the newer Protestant churches), for much of the last century this led to few examples of organic reunion. Although the different branches of Methodism came together in a formal union in 1932, and a later union between Congregational and Presbyterian churches created the United Reformed Church, attempts to unite the Anglican and Methodist churches failed in the 1960s and 1970s. However, since 1970, a growing number of Protestant churches, including the Church of England, have agreed to share a building, particularly in areas of new housing, and a few of these shared churches have included Roman Catholic participation. There have also been a number of joint initiatives between the mainstream Protestant churches in England in the field of ministerial and theological training.

References and Further Reading

- Aston, M. Lollards and Reformers: Images and Literacy in Late Medieval England. London: Hambledon Press, 1984.
- Bebbington, D.W. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s. London and New York: Routledge, 1989.
- Chadwick, W.O. The Victorian Church, 2 vols. London: Adam and Charles Black, 1966 and 1970.
- Clark, J.C.D. English Society 1688–1932: Ideology, Social Structure and Political Practice During the Ancien Regime, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Collinson, P. The Religion of Protestants: The Church in English Society 1559–1625, Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1982.
- Davies, H. Worship and Theology in England, 6 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1996.
- Hastings, A. A History of English Christianity 1920–1990. London: SCM Press, 1991.
- Rupp, E.G. Religion in England 1688–1791. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Spurr, J. English Puritanism 1603–1689. Basingstoke, UK: Macmillan, 1998.
- Tyacke, N. Anti-Calvinists: The Rise of English Arminianism c.1590–1640. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1987.
- Ward, W.R. Religion and Society in England 1790–1850. London: Batsford, 1972.
- Watts, M.R. The Dissenters, 2 vols. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1978 and 1995.

NIGEL YATES

ENLIGHTENMENT

The term “Enlightenment” refers to the vast and various trends in thought that marked the European eighteenth century and had a great sociopolitical and cultural impact in Europe and beyond. Supported by the intellectual elites of the time, the movement took on different names—Lumières, Aufklärung, Enlightenment, Iluminismo, Ilustración—and shapes depending on the different modalities brought on by the cultural and religious context of each country. Enlightenment thought questioned the legitimacy of the powers in place; examined the foundations of social, political, and religious order; developed a criticism of political as well as religious matters; and encouraged tolerance as well as free and encyclopedic knowledge. Fully confident in the powers of reason and the virtues of knowledge, advocates of the Enlightenment dreamed of a better world and chose to be optimistic. The fight was against obscurantism, ignorance, religious fanaticism, and superstitions in favor of education, separation of politics from religion, freedom of conscience, and human rights. One of the main roots of Western modernity (see MODERNISM) unquestionably grows out of the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century, even though the genealogy of this modernity may require going further back in time than this age, appropriately called “Age of Enlightenment.” To take a sociohistorical approach to the Enlightenment is to break out of the simplistic schema that opposes modernity to religion as two antagonistic and external worlds where the progress of modernity would ineluctably cause the decline of religion. The sociohistorical research shows the plurality of historical figures of the Enlightenment and its complex relationship with religion.

The Enlightenment may have been furthered by some great leaders in the fields of philosophy, science, and politics, but it also manifested itself through varied means that contributed to the social spread of ideas. The many societies of the eighteenth century (e.g., learned societies, reading societies, economic societies), the sociability of the salons, the use of French as the language of the intelligentsia at the time, the magazines and books, the relation between thinkers and politicians—all helped create an international network of influence and emulation. Thus the Royal Academy of Berlin, founded in 1701 with the participation of GOTTFRIED LEIBNIZ, became an important center of intellectual life under Frederic II from 1740 to 1770. With the establishment of the Great Lodge of England in 1717, FREEMASONRY championed the Enlightenment by relativizing the differences in faiths and by promoting tolerance and free debate. The spirit of the Enlightenment appeared in FRANCE particularly through the endeavor of the Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire Raisoné des Sciences, des Arts, et des Mé-tiers, which, under Diderot's leadership, gathered a great number of philosophers and scientists, the best known being Montesquieu, Voltaire, JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU, d'Alembert, Buffon, the Baron of Holbach, and Turgot. After many mishaps and in spite of the royal opposition (as soon as Volume II was published in 1752, a warrant from the king's counsel banned the work), the venture was successfully completed. It showed a will to further scientific knowledge, supported by a belief in progress, which had to confront all political and religious barriers that were raised against free investigation. The Jesuits saw in it "Satan's Bible."

What is the Enlightenment? IMMANUEL KANT, in his famous essay, Was ist Aufklärung? Explains: "What is the Enlightenment? It is man leaving his self-caused minority. Minority, that is inability to use his own intelligence without another's guidance. A self-caused minority since its cause resides not in a lack of intelligence, but in a lack of determination and courage to use it without another's guidance. Sapere aude! Have the courage to use your own intelligence! That is the motto of the Enlightenment" (Bahr 1974:9). Through the demand for a free use of reason the AUTHORITY principle in politics as well as religion is questioned. This questioning rests on the assertion that any human can and must exercise his or her liberty of thought on all things, together with the insistence on the universality of criticism and the affirmation of the rights of the individual (see INDIVIDUALISM). A vital moment in the emergence of the idea of tolerance, the Enlightenment combines universalism and cosmopolitanism. Thus the philosopher PIERRE BAYLE (1647–1706), author of the famous Dictionnaire Critique et Historique (1696–1697) that aimed to review in a critical fashion all positions, declared in 1700, "I am a citizen of the world, I am neither in the Emperor's service, nor in the King of France's service, but in the truth's service." It is on this universalistic base that the Age of Enlightenment would dream of a better world and generate several emancipation utopias.

This Age was more anticlerical than antireligious. Religions were to be founded rationally, with an insistence on individual conscience and the full acknowledgment of the social purpose of religion. Within this frame of thought some enlightened Christians would seek to join the philosophes by extolling a Christianity stripped of superstitions and taking its inspiration from the early centuries. The spirit of Enlightenment sought an internal transformation, an interiorization of FAITH. This Age is not only that of Reason, it is also that of feeling and subjectivity: Aufklärung and PIETISM in Protestantism (with Kant, for example), Haskala (Jewish Enlightenment) and Hasidism in JUDAISM, Enlightened Catholicism, and Jansenism kept close ties. Still the acceptance of the Enlightenment was varied and one should not sway too much in the opposite direction by emphasizing unilaterally the symbiosis between Enlightenment and religion. Not only did some religions radically oppose the Enlightenment, but the Enlightenment itself became radical in some instances and countries, which fostered conflicts with religions. This was especially the case in France, where the subsequent history would tend to accredit a fundamental opposition between Enlightenment and religion, religion and progress. By the end of the eighteenth century the French philosopher Condorcet (1743–1794) declared himself openly atheist and led an extremist fight against the Catholic CLERGY. Overall the Enlightenment's relations with Catholicism were more difficult and conflictive than they were with Protestantism (this in spite of the existence of many Enlightened Catholics).

Protestantism and Enlightenment

“Protestant churches themselves were quite receptive to adopting the ideals of the Enlightenment. The reading of the BIBLE had promoted a rational education, the use of philological means to interpret texts was usual, and the LAITY benefited from it. The plurality of faiths could be positively conceived as a plurality of means to attain SALVATION. The collegial structure of the church—especially with regards to Reformed churches—allowed for peer debate” (Im Hof 1993:175). Unlike Latin countries of Catholic culture, in Anglo-Saxon countries religion and Enlightenment closely blended rather than being opposed. The quest for a rational version of religion provided, aside from the Evangelical awakening, a stimulus for change. In Great Britain and the UNITED STATES freemasonry was a para-Protestant organization among other religious alternatives rather than a fierce opposition to the church. George Washington himself was a freemason and an Episcopalian. ENGLAND, which simultaneously was the most counterrevolutionary and the most modern country, engendered an Enlightenment that was magisterial and Christian, supported by the towns’ moderate clergy. In England social and intellectual change did not encounter a unified resistance that was politico-religious or lead to antagonistic definitions of religious Enlightenment and secular Enlightenment. In English DISSENT there is both a religious form of Enlightenment and an enlightened form of religion. In Protestant countries, such as Great Britain, Lutheran and Calvinist GERMANY, the Swiss reformed Cantons, or Geneva, the Enlightenment had less anticlerical notes than in Catholic Europe. Religious criticism aimed mainly at historical Christianity only rarely led to openly atheist statements, taking instead the shape of a DEISM advocating the return to a natural religion, bereft of mystery and revelation (in England), or of a cultural and social reformulation that would integrate the religious dimension (German Aufklärung). Protestant theologians, sensitive to the demands of the Enlightenment, developed a THEOLOGY subjected to rational control, characterized by content more ethical than dogmatic, careful to eliminate all contradiction between FAITH and reason. Within this perspective CHRISTOLOGY was to lose its central position and Christ, more and more deposed of his divine attributes, would acquire a value more exemplary than redemptory.

Numerous Protestant thinkers made key contributions to the Enlightenment. First are the theorists of NATURAL LAW, the Dutch Calvinist Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) and the German Lutheran SAMUEL PUFENDORF (1632–1694). Their influence was great in an age, the eighteenth century, that sought new bases to international law and was developing HUMAN RIGHTS; Natural Law inspired the cosmopolitan thought of the Age of Enlightenment. Within the realm of SCIENCE the leader was ISAAC NEWTON, who discovered gravitation (he developed some heterodox positions on religion, notably by calculating the date of the Apocalypse). It is mostly in the field of philosophy, however, that the contributions of Protestant thinkers were important. First of all the English JOHN LOCKE (1632–1704), celebrated by Voltaire in his Lettres Philosophiques (1734), was a master of the Enlightenment who advocated tolerance based on the differentiation between civil and religious society (Epistola de Tolerantia, 1695). In The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) he outlined a religion promoting the harmony between reason and biblical revelation and whose main dogma was the messianism of Christ. His Essay concerning Human Understanding (1690), translated in French by the Huguenot refugee Pierre Coste, would become one of the breviaries of the eighteenth century (see HUGUENOTS). Then the French Bayle reminds us that the Internationale du Refuge Huguenot represents the first generation of the Enlightenment (Huguenot refugees would contribute to the spreading of Enlightenment thought by translating key works by Pufendorf and Locke into French). Bayle vigorously championed freedom of conscience and tolerance by preaching in favor of the rights of the “wandering consciousness” (Commentaire philosophique sur ces paroles de Jésus-Christ, Contrain-les d’entrer 1686). The portrait of Bayle as a nonbeliever drawn by Voltaire does not fit the truth.

Aside from Kant, German Lutheran philosophers were key contributors to the Enlightenment, among whom were Leibniz (1646–1716), GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM LESSING (1729–1781), and CHRISTIAN WOLFF (1679–1754). Positing that CHURCH and politics were not strictly opposed while being distinctive, Leibniz, as an enlightened man, reestablishes the relationship between politics and religion. He laicized political and social exteriority while consecrating interiority, each needing to remain in its place: the church by not imposing any external obligation on the faithful, politics by not imposing any internal obligations. Through an exchange of letters with the Catholic bishop Bossuet (1627–1704), Leibniz also became the precursor of ecumenical dialogue (see ECUMENISM; DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL). Wolff, a disciple of Leibniz, distinguished himself not only by his rational thoughts on God, the world, and man (Métaphysique Allemande 1719), but most of all by his defense of Natural Law and the political influence it gave him over different schools of thoughts. He also produced school textbooks in German and Latin that presented the philosophy of the Aufklärung. As for Lessing and his investigation of a wisdom based on religious principles as well as his taste for parables (he used to call himself a “lover of theology”), he sought to further the Aufklärung within the realm of religion.

The French philosopher Rousseau (1712–1778), despite a temporary conversion to Catholicism, would remain a philosopher of the Enlightenment strongly affected by Protestantism. Against the materialistic and rationalist atheists of his time, he would become in his “Profession de foi du Vicaire savoyard” (Book IV of the Emile ou de l’Education, 1762), the apologist of a religion of the heart where sentiment allows one to apprehend God without objectifying Him. His educational ideas developed in Emile ou de L’Education, which were influenced by John Locke’s ideas, would inspire several Protestant pedagogues, including the German Johannes Bernhardt Basedow (1723–1790), the Swiss Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi (1746–1827), and the French Jean-Frédéric (or JoHANN FRIEDRICH) OBERLIN (1740–1826). Rousseau, who had returned to Protestantism, would answer the archbishop of Paris who along with many others—in particular the Synod and the Petit Conseil of Geneva—condemned the Emile, “I follow Writing and reason as the only rules of my belief; I deny the authority of men and will submit to their formulas inasmuch as I perceive the truth.” It was an opportunity for Rousseau to state his Christian identity, “I am Christian, not as a disciple of Priests, but as a disciple of Jesus-Christ” (Lettre a Christophe de Beaumont from 1763).

“In America, it is religion that leads to Enlightenment; it is the observance of the divine laws that leads man to freedom,” ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE noted in De la Démocratie en Amérique (1835). The Founding Fathers of what would become the United States, starting with THOMAS JEFFERSON (1743–1826), the main author of the Declaration of Independence, were influenced by the thoughts of the Enlightenment, and most particularly by Locke. With a thought that links, as Tocqueville had noted, the spirit of religion and the spirit of freedom, “We hold these truths to be selfevident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness.—That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed” (Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776).

Faith and Enlightenment do not oppose as reason does to superstition or intelligence to obscurantism. If the eighteenth century sanctioned the failure of an ultraconservative, authoritarian, and unitarian view of religion, it did not sanction the failure of religion in general. The eighteenth century also represented a religious mutation, an in-depth evolution that saw religion turn toward the intimacy of consciences while looking to express itself “reasonably.” The autonomy of the secular realms (politics, morality, society, etc.) became one of the greatest passions of the Age of Enlightenment, and Kant would devote himself to ensure a status of autonomy for reason. Were human autonomy set against religion as if belonging to a religious faith implied the negation of human autonomy, theologians would answer that the dependency to God is the condition of true human freedom. By speaking of theonomy, a Protestant theologian such as PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965) would place human and world autonomy within a frame that would situate and transcend it.

References and Further Reading

- Bahr, Ehrhard, ed. Was ist Aufklärung? Thesen und Definitionen (Kant, Erhard, Hamann, Herder, Lessing, Mendelssohn, Riem, Schiller, Wieland). Stuttgart, Germany: Philipp Reclam Jr., 1974.
- Brown, Stewart J. and Timothy Tackett (eds.). Enlightenment, Revolution and Reawakening. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Chaunu, Pierre. La civilisation de l'Europe des Lumières. Paris: Arthaud, 1971.
- Gusdorf, Georges. Dieu, la nature, l'homme au siècle des lumières. Paris: Payot, 1972.
- Harrison, Peter. Religion and the Religions in the English Enlightenment. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Im Hof, Ulrich. Das Europa der Aufklärung. Munich, Germany: C.H.Beck, 1993 (in English, Oxford: Basil Black-well).
- “Les Lumières et les religions (The Enlightenment and Religion).” Social Compass 44 no. 2 (June 1997).
- McDermott, Gerald R. Jonathan Edwards Confronts the Gods: Christian Theology, Enlightenment Religion, and Non-Christian Faiths. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- May, Henry F. The Divided Heart: Essays on Protestantism and the Enlightenment in America. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.

Paul, Jean-Marie. Dieu est mort en Allemagne. Des Lumières à Nietzsche. Paris: Payot, 1994.

Plongeron, Bernard. Théologie et politique au siècle des Lumières (1770–1820). Geneva, Switzerland: Droz, 1973.

Stanley, Brian ed. Christian Missions and the Enlightenment (Studies in the History of Christian Missions). Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans Publishing Co., 2001.

JEAN-PAUL WILLAIME

EPHRATA

See Brethren, Church of the

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SCOTLAND

The CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, established in 1560 at the time of the REFORMATION, alternated for nearly 130 years between Episcopal and Presbyterian forms but maintained its unity during this period. It was the inability of the Scottish bishops to renounce their loyalty to the exiled King James VII, when William of Orange was proclaimed King of Scots in 1689, that led to the disestablishment of episcopacy and the breaking into two what had hitherto existed as a single Protestant church (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). While almost all Episcopal priests in the south of SCOTLAND were immediately thrust out of their livings, many Episcopal priests in the northern half of the country held on to the parish churches until their deaths despite attempts by the Presbyterian authorities to remove them (see PRESBYTERIANISM). The Toleration Act of 1712 made Episcopal ministry legal provided that they prayed for Queen Anne. This split the Episcopali community into jurors, who prayed for Queen Anne and her Hanoverian successors, and nonjurors, who continued to pray for the exiled Stuart monarchy. The failure of the 1715 Rising, however, was followed by the first of a succession of repressive Penal Laws against episcopacy and the final removal of all Episcopal clergy from the parish churches.

It was during the period from 1720 to 1745 that the main features of the Scottish Episcopal Church were consolidated. The system of college bishops, set up as a temporary measure in 1704 to maintain the Episcopal succession, was replaced by diocesan bishops under the Concordate of 1731. From 1724, the Scottish Prayer Book began to develop along a very distinct line, drawing inspiration from the 1549 BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, the failed 1637 Scottish Prayer Book, and the studies of Bishop Rattray on the Eastern Liturgies. The emerging high sacramental DOCTRINE of the Scottish LITURGY resulted in disputes during the 1740s over the Usages, disputes that were rendered academic by the 1745 Rising.

The aftermath of the 1745 Rising saw a fresh set of penal legislation enacted against episcopacy in Scotland, resulting in imprisonment and exile for several Episcopal priests. Some Episcopal congregation members from the landed and merchant classes decided they could no longer continue to be considered non-jurors and established Qualified chapels with English or Irish clergymen. Although outright attacks on Episcopalianism largely ceased after 1760, the strong downward social pressures led to a steady decline in the church over most of the country. Against this background, Bishops William Falconer and Robert Forbes brought out a new Scottish Prayer Book in 1764.

By 1784, half of the church's priests were found in the Diocese of Aberdeen alone, as were three of its four bishops. Those three bishops laid the foundations of the worldwide Anglican Communion in Aberdeen by consecrating SAMUEL SEABURY as the first American bishop in 1784, bequeathing the Scottish Liturgy to the American Episcopal Church in the process. The American Episcopal Church also adopted the Scottish pattern of having a primus—a presiding bishop—rather than an archbishop.

The death of Prince Charles in 1788 paved the way for Scottish Episcopal Church to finally abandon its support for the exiled Stuarts and begin to pray for the Hanoverian monarchy. The primus, Bishop John Skinner, was the principal architect of the church's rejuvenation, and his efforts led to the repeal of the Penal Laws in 1792. The Scottish Episcopal Church was obliged to adopt the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, but Scottish Episcopal CLERGY were barred from ministering in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND (a bar that applied equally to American Episcopal clergy). Skinner also started the process of reuniting the Qualified churches with the Scottish Episcopal Church.

The nineteenth century brought the regeneration of the Scottish Episcopal Church. A beginning was made with the erection of new church buildings for the ancient congregations. Edinburgh Theological College was founded in 1810, the oldest such college in the Anglican Communion (followed by General Theological Seminary, New York in 1817, then Chichester Theological College, ENGLAND in 1839). During the middle of the nineteenth century, the present arrangement of seven dioceses was settled and new cathedrals were erected in Perth, Inverness, and Edinburgh. By the end of the century, almost every town in Scotland had an Episcopal congregation. Along with mission work at home, the church began to undertake foreign mission work in Chanda, INDIA and Kaffraria (St. John's) in southern AFRICA (see MISSIONS).

In 1840 an Act of Parliament was passed that allowed Scottish Episcopal clergy to minister for one or two Sundays in any church in England. The Scottish bishops succeeded in having this Act extended to include the clergy of the American Episcopal Church. Not until 1864 did the Church of England allow full communion and interchangeability of clergy with the Scottish and American Episcopal Churches.

The OXFORD MOVEMENT reached Scotland in the 1840s, where it found a measure of ready acceptance, owing to the high sacramental doctrine of the Scottish Liturgy. At the same time, there was an increasing number of Oxbridge-educated bishops, mostly with low-church tendencies, who were deeply suspicious of any deviation from the Book of Common Prayer. Bishop Forbes was subjected to an ecclesiastical trial in 1860 by his fellow bishops for his high sacramental views, and several other priests were censured or suspended for their support of the Oxford Movement. In 1863 the Scottish Liturgy was relegated to a secondary place in the life of the Scottish Episcopal Church and the Book of Common Prayer assumed dominance.

The low-church/high-church tensions within the Scottish Episcopal Church reached a rupture point in Edinburgh in 1842. What initially seemed like a local dispute between Reverend D.T.K.Drummond, who wished to hold evangelical services, and Bishop Terrot, who insisted on strict liturgical services, caused a number of congregations and clergy to withdraw from the Scottish Episcopal Church and attempt to place themselves directly under the authority of the Church of England. Within a few years, more than 20 of these "English Episcopal" chapels were in existence. They received no official support from the Church of England, and by the end of the nineteenth century most of these congregations had either died out or had united with the Scottish Episcopal Church.

In common with most denominations, the Scottish Episcopal Church reached its maximum size at about the beginning of the twentieth century. After World War I, the main mission effort was concentrated in Scotland's four cities. In 1929 a new Scottish Prayer Book reestablished the primacy of the distinctive Scottish Liturgy. Since World War II, rural depopulation and inner-city slum clearance both have led to the closure of churches. Some expansion occurred in the second half of the twentieth century in Scotland's new towns and in the suburban growth areas of the great cities, while new missions were established in the thinly populated far north and west, making use of itinerant priests. Extension of the ministry beyond full-time stipendiary priests took place in two developments: nonstipendiary clergy were appointed from 1973, while WOMEN were admitted as deacons in 1985 and to the priesthood in 1994 (see WOMEN CLERGY). After some years of experimentation, a modern language version of the Scottish Liturgy was produced in 1982. The nature of foreign mission work changed, as the Scottish Episcopal Church ceased direct involvement in Chanda, India in 1958 and the diocese of St. John's in SOUTH AFRICA became more self-reliant.

In the year 2000, the Scottish Episcopal Church had about 51,500 members (about 5 percent of all Scottish church attenders), and 320 churches and places of worship. Recent ecumenical developments have seen a move to sharing some church buildings, particularly with the Church of Scotland and the Roman Catholic Church.

References and Further Reading

- Bertie, David M. Scottish Episcopal Clergy 1689–2000. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 2000.
- Goldie, Frederick. A Short History of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. Edinburgh: St. Andrew Press, 1951.
- Luscombe, L. Edward. The Scottish Episcopal Church in the Twentieth Century. Edinburgh: Scottish Episcopal Church, 1996.
- Strong, Rowan. Episcopalianism in Nineteenth-Century Scotland. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2002.

DAVID M. BERTIE

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES

Colonial Period

The Episcopal Church in the United States began as the American branch of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. After the Revolutionary War, the church dropped all identification by name with ENGLAND. Organizing itself independently in 1789, it named itself “the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.” The name “episcopal” (Greek overseer, corrupted in Anglo-Saxon to bishop) stems from the contentious Commonwealth period in English history when CLERGY and LAITY who wanted the Church of England ruled by bishops used the title for themselves (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). In later centuries, the term Anglican (from the Latin for “English”) came into common use to describe any church that held the faith and practice of the Church of England.

The Anglican faith first appeared in North America in the sixteenth century, when Anglican chaplains accompanying English expeditions conducted services in what became California and North Carolina. With the establishment of Virginia in 1607, the Anglican faith came permanently to America. During the colonial period, the Church of England became the established church (or official state church, supported by legislation and taxes) in six colonies. Its greatest influence was in Virginia, with 250 Anglican churches by 1775. One of the two Anglican institutions of higher learning in the colonies, the College of William and Mary (which had a divinity school to train Anglican clergy), was founded in 1693 in Virginia’s colonial capital of Williamsburg.

In South Carolina Anglicanism was strong in the tidewater “low country” but was almost nonexistent in the religionless “back country.” In New York, the church’s establishment was limited to the more densely populated lower counties. The second Anglican college in the colonies (King’s College, now Columbia University) was established in Manhattan in 1754. Like the College of William and Mary, it has since become secular. Two of the three other Anglican-established churches in North Carolina and Georgia (where JOHN WESLEY and CHARLES WESLEY were the first two clergy) existed largely only on paper. With high clergy salaries and prosperous parishes, Maryland provided an exception. The church was also influential in some colonies where it was not established, particularly in Pennsylvania and Connecticut.

The principal organization that attempted to make the colonies Anglican was the London-based SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS (SPG). From 1701 through the end of the Revolutionary War, the “Venerable Society” dispatched more than 300 missionaries to America and provided funds for their support and for the construction of Anglican churches. Colonial Anglicans existed without resident bishops. Nominal supervision came from the bishop of London, who appointed clerical representatives called “commissaries.” Colonists who desired ordination took an expensive and dangerous journey to England to receive deacon’s and priest’s orders (see DEACONESS, DEACON). By the start of the Revolution, the Church of England was the second-largest denomination in America (after CONGREGATIONALISM) and the most widely diffused. Although its congregations included large numbers of the lower economic classes, its adherents came disproportionately from the economically comfortable or wealthy.

Reorganization

The American Revolution placed Anglican clergy in a unique situation, for on ordination they swore oaths to support the English monarch. Nevertheless, almost half of the colonial Anglican clergy decided to support the Revolution. Emotionally and financially dependent on England, SPG clergy generally became Loyalists; clergy paid directly by parishes typically became Patriots. The vast majority of Anglican lay people supported the Revolutionary cause. More than half of the signers of the Declaration of Independence and many of the American military leaders were Anglicans.

During or immediately after the Revolution, the Church of England was disestablished (or deprived of state support) in all colonies in which it had been established. In several meetings held in Philadelphia in the 1780s, lay and clerical delegates from Anglican parishes in most states established a constitution, drafted an American version of the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, and arranged for the American church to secure the consecration of its own bishops in England. The delegates adopted a unitary form of government headed by a General Convention (normally meeting every three years) presided over by a presiding bishop. The Convention consists of a House of Bishops in which all bishops have seats, and a House of Deputies composed of an equal number of clerical and lay delegates. Dioceses (geographical areas administered by a bishop, divided into self-supporting units called parishes) elect the delegates. Elected bodies of laypeople called vestries govern the parishes and also hire the chief minister, or rector.

The first bishops consecrated—all Patriots—came from Pennsylvania, New York, and Virginia. Preceding them was Samuel Seabury the bishop of Connecticut, a Loyalist whose consecration in 1785 at the hands of Scottish bishops was controversial. Following the consecration in 1790 of the president of the College of William and Mary, the “Protestant Episcopal Church” fulfilled its parent church’s mandate that it must have three bishops commissioned in England before it could consecrate its own bishops. These Episcopal bishops immediately began to ordain clergy and to consecrate additional bishops. But many states lacked bishops for years, and from the Revolutionary War until late in the twentieth century, the Episcopal Church suffered from a shortage of clergy.

The reorganized church confronted numerous difficulties. To many Patriots it was, in the memorable words of one Episcopalian, “a piece of baggage left on the shores by the retreating British troops.” In addition, the post-Revolutionary period was a time of decline in American religion, when many denominations—and the Episcopal Church above all—lost members to DEISM. Simultaneously, the church lost many members from its lower economic classes to the more egalitarian and emotional BAPTISTS and Methodists (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA). Once intended as an evangelical haven for Anglicanism, Methodism broke away from the Episcopal Church in 1784.

Nineteenth Century

From the second decade of the nineteenth century on, however, the Episcopal Church revived, generally (but not entirely) as a result of the Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). Bishops in New York, Massachusetts, and Virginia led the revival. Founded in 1835, the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society sent Episcopal missionaries into the new states of the expanding Union, into NATIVE AMERICAN reservations, and into such countries as JAPAN, CHINA, and LIBERIA. Two parties contended for control of the church. The evangelical party emphasized PREACHING, simple WORSHIP, and personal CONVERSION. The high-church party emphasized the SACRAMENTS, the episcopate, the priesthood, and the visible CHURCH as God’s appointed channels for GRACE.

The spread of the OXFORD MOVEMENT to America widened the divisions. Its adherents (called “tractarians”) asserted doctrinal and historical claims that the traditional high-church party did not. High churchmen, for example, accepted the title “Protestant,” while most tractarians emphasized the pre-Reformation heritage and viewed the Church of England as a national Catholic church. From the 1840s on, Episcopal Church life was marked by tensions over whether the church was a form of Catholicism or Protestantism.

The Episcopal Church avoided taking an official stand on SLAVERY, but, like several other denominations, divided into northern and southern branches. By 1866, the southern and northern dioceses had reunited. Before the CIVIL WAR, the church’s record of work with African Americans was inadequate. Most Anglican planters in the South resisted the efforts of clergy to baptize and evangelize their slaves, though the Great Awakening of the eighteenth century caused some improvement (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). By the time of the American Revolution, most slaves had still not become Christians.

The subsequent Second Great Awakening increased Episcopal work with African Americans, often under the auspices of the evangelical party. In the South, however, most converted blacks joined either Baptist or Methodist churches, where they could experience not only emotional worship, but also black leadership. Only a minority—perhaps 35,000, most of whom also departed after the war—became Episcopalians.

Those southern African Americans who remained in the Episcopal Church found themselves second-class citizens. Not until the 1950s did black members receive voting representation at General Convention in all dioceses of the Episcopal Church.

The situation was better in the North. There large congregations of African-American Episcopalians developed in major cities and often had black pastors. De facto segregation marked church life, however. Although few black leaders of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT were Episcopalians, the civil rights legislation passed in the 1960s allowed African Americans to be elected bishops of leading Episcopal dioceses and to play important roles in the life of the church.

In the later nineteenth century, ANGLO-CATHOLICISM emerged as a new and influential party in the church. Distinct from the high-church party but building on its beliefs, it advocated frequent "eucharists" or "masses," monastic orders (see MONASTICISM), voluntary private CONFESSION, the use of the title "father" for clergy, and prayers for the dead. To the formal but relatively plain ceremonial of the Episcopal Church it added candles, incense, crucifixes, ALTAR-centered churches, processions, a greater use of color, and more elaborate VESTMENTS. It also added such medieval body language as genuflecting and the sign of the cross. In church ARCHITECTURE, it revived such medieval styles as gothic and romanesque. To adherents, Anglo-Catholicism represented the forgotten Catholic heritage of the Episcopal Church, but to its Protestant-minded opponents it was mere "ritualism." Although a minority movement, Anglo-Catholicism significantly affected Episcopal teachings, practices, and church architecture.

A second church party, called the BROAD CHURCH, also emerged. This party sought truth from all sources to confront the new intellectual challenges to Christianity. It took the lead not only in introducing the HIGHER CRITICISM to Episcopalians, but also in demonstrating that the new discoveries of biblical scholars could be reconciled with Christian beliefs. The Broad Churchmen played the same role in reconciling Episcopalians to the controversial teachings of DARWINISM. Although many Episcopalians initially resisted Broad Church views, the movement was so successful that controversies over FUNDAMENTALISM and evolution quieted more quickly in the Episcopal Church than in other mainline denominations. Largely due to the work of the Broad Churchmen, the Episcopal Church became the first denomination in America to advocate the SOCIAL GOSPEL.

The Episcopal Church had long been interested in uniting divided Christianity. Shortly after the Revolution, it absorbed the remaining Swedish Lutheran churches in Pennsylvania and Delaware. Ultimately rejected by the General Convention, the Muhlenberg Memorial of 1853 advocated that bishops ordain Protestant clergy who accepted the essence of Episcopal teachings, yet allow those clergy to continue to minister in their denominations. In 1886 the General Convention did pass the Chicago Quadrilateral, which called for church union on the basis of BAPTISM, the LORD'S SUPPER, governance by bishops, and the AuTHORITY not only of Scripture, but also of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. Subsequently the church played a leading role in the Faith and Order Movement and in the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It also joined the Federal Council of Churches and later the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Although the southern dioceses struggled economically for many decades, the massive immigration from Europe that poured into the industrialized United States after the CIVIL WAR caused the northern dioceses to grow both in membership and ethnic diversity (see ETHNICITY). Episcopal parishes benefited the most from the “invisible immigration” from England, but the church also sponsored small missions to other immigrant groups.

Twentieth Century

Because Protestant services of worship at U.S. military academies had long been conducted according to the Book of Common Prayer, a disproportionate number of American military officers were Episcopalians. In World War I, the commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Force, Episcopalian John J. Pershing, appointed Bishop CHARLES BRENT as chief of the thousands of military chaplains (see CHAPLAINCY). With the exception of its evangelical wing, the Episcopal Church was little involved in the controversies over TEMPERANCE and prohibition following the war. Unlike most Protestant denominations, it continued to use fermented wine in its services of Holy Communion.

Like other denominations, the church experienced serious losses of members, staff, and buildings during the Depression. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt and his wife Eleanor were Episcopalians, as were two of his three Republican opponents and one of his vice presidents. Beginning in the 1930s, NEO-ORTHODOXY began to influence Episcopal clergy, and it continued to do so for several decades.

More than 500 Episcopal chaplains and a substantial number of laity served in the American military forces during World War II. After the war, as new Episcopal churches were constructed throughout the nation, the church’s traditional shortage of clergy increased. In 1946 the General Convention abruptly ended 17 years of negotiations for unity with the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. The rupture displayed the continued tensions between Anglo-Catholics and more Protestant-minded Episcopalians.

The 1960s and 1970s were tumultuous decades. The Second Vatican Council (Vatican II, 1962–1965) fostered increased cooperation and ecumenical dialogue between Episcopalians and Roman Catholics. In addition, it caused the Episcopal Church to make changes in its LITURGY parallel to those made in the Roman Catholic mass. Shaped by contemporary liturgical scholarship and substituting modern language for the Elizabethan original, the 1979 Book of Common Prayer was initially controversial among Episcopalians. By inspiring a new spirit of self-examination and openness toward Protestants, Vatican II had the additional effect of reducing the differences and tensions between Anglo-Catholics and other Episcopalians. When some of the ideals of Vatican II failed to be realized in succeeding decades, an increasing number of Roman Catholics not only became Episcopalians, but also rose to leading positions in the church.

The same impetus that had caused Episcopalians to be active in the Social Gospel movement prompted them to play a significant role in the civil rights movement. Led by the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity (ESCRU, organized 1959), numerous Episcopalians marched with MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. In 1964 the General Convention forbade racial discrimination in Episcopal churches. In 1965 a seminary student and ESCRU member was murdered by a segregationist in Alabama. In 1967 the convention established the highly controversial General Convention Special Program to channel millions of dollars to minority groups in American society. During the same period, the church was embroiled in controversy over the Vietnam War.

Beginning in the 1960s, the Episcopal Church began to seriously consider the role of WOMEN. The church had used the term “women’s work” to describe the unpaid volunteer work of Episcopal laywomen in SUNDAY SCHOOLS, altar guilds, and similar organizations. New opportunities for Episcopal women had opened in the mid-nineteenth century with the establishment of communities of celibate nuns. Late in the century the General Convention authorized the office of deaconess. Deaconesses (who had to be widowed or single) could teach or administer, but could lead worship only when male clergy were absent. Though always few in numbers, both the sisterhoods (see SISTERHOODS, ANGLICAN) and the deaconesses played a prominent role in the work of Episcopal orphanages, hospitals, and other institutions. The largest and most autonomous organization of women was the Woman’s Auxiliary to the Board of Missions, established in 1871.

Most vestries remained all male until the social and sexual revolution of the Vietnam era. In 1967 women gained the right to serve as lay deputies to General Conventions. In 1976 the General Convention approved their ordination to the priesthood (see WOMEN CLERGY). The first Episcopal woman bishop was consecrated in 1989. Combined with the other changes in church practice, the ordination of women caused many traditionalists to leave the Episcopal Church for “Continuing Anglican” churches or for EASTERN ORTHODOXY or Roman Catholicism. Some traditionalists remained in the Episcopal Church, but formed organizations aimed at restoring the old ORTHODOXY. From the 1960s on, a resurgent evangelical movement (often combined with charismatic elements) became a conservative and growing force in the church (see EVANGELICALISM).

When the bishop of New York ordained a lesbian in the 1970s, the Episcopal Church entered the debate over the place and role of homosexuals in the church (see HOMOSEXUALITY, SEXUALITY). Although the twentieth century ended with the General Convention failing to give explicit approval to the ordinations of practicing homosexuals, individual bishops have continued to ordain candidates in whose character and judgment they possess confidence. Homosexuals also played an increasing role in the lay activities of the Episcopal Church. In 2003, the Diocese of New Hampshire elected an openly gay bishop. The election’s subsequent confirmation by both houses of the General Convention marked a turning point, even as it prompted the possibility of schism for the Episcopal Church in the USA as well as for the international Anglican Communion.

Like most mainline denominations, the Episcopal Church began to decline in membership in the later 1960s. At the start of the twenty-first century, its baptized membership approximates 2.3 million; among church bodies in the United States, it ranks somewhere between twelfth and fourteenth in size. Although relatively small, the Episcopal Church has had an effect on American history and culture disproportionate to its size. Eleven American presidents, thirty-three Supreme Court justices, large numbers of U.S. senators, congressmen, and corporate chief executives, as well as a substantial number of influential figures in other fields have been Episcopalian.

Summation

The Episcopal Church has always been a small church in America. The large membership that occurred because of its established status in the colonial period quickly disappeared once membership was no longer obligatory. Its records in EVANGELISM, in domestic MISSIONS (where only the Congregationalists sent fewer missionaries to the new south and west), and in liturgical matters (where Episcopal services can seem daunting to newcomers) may all have contributed.

Throughout its history, the church has tended to appeal to the economically comfortable, the educated, and the cultured and aesthetically inclined. The result has been that Americans who are not economically comfortable, not educated, and not especially cultivated or inclined toward aesthetics have joined other churches. Episcopal institutional churches and inner city and mountain missions have provided major exceptions. With a growing Hispanic membership, active ministries with Native Americans, African Americans, and Asian-Americans, and with the continued involvement of “extra-territorial” dioceses in the Caribbean, Latin America and Taiwan, as well as parishes in Europe, the Episcopal Church at the start of the 21st century finds itself challenged to accommodate a greater ethnic and cultural diversity than ever before. The 73rd General Convention (2000) also launched a “20/20” evangelism and mission initiative designed to double active participation in the church by the year 2020.

The Episcopal Church has also displayed a tendency to eschew extremes and to follow a middle path. Many movements—Methodism, Evangelicalism, Anglo-Catholicism, MODERNISM, traditionalism, liberal Protestantism, the charismatic movement, and others—have tried to move the church to the left or to the right, but such movements have tended to be incorporated under the “broad tent” of the church, rather than become definitive. As a result, throughout most of its history the Episcopal Church has been typified by a moderation that weathers crises well.

Until recent decades, internal Catholic-Protestant tensions have kept the church from being as involved in church unions as many of its members have wished. One significant development was Called to common Mission (2001), which established a “Concordat of Agreement” bringing the Episcopal Church into full communion with the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (see ECUMENISM; DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL). The Episcopal Church also supports the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Despite its ties to the establishment, for more than 100 years the church has been one of the more progressive churches in terms of social matters. Above all, the Episcopal Church has been the church of liturgy and theater among the Protestant churches of the United States.

See also African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; Baptists, United States; Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Ecumenism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Methodist Episcopal Church Conference; Polity

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Owanah. 400 Years: The Anglican/Episcopal Mission among American Indians. Cincinnati, OH: Forward Movement Publications, 1997.
- Armentrout, Donald S., and Robert B.Slocum. Documents of Witness: A History of the Episcopal Church, 1782–1985. New York: Church Publishing, 1994.
- Chorley, Edward C. Men and Movements in the American Episcopal Church. New York: Scribner, 1946.
- Darling, Pamela W. New Wine. Cambridge, UK: Cowley Publications, 1994.
- Donovan, Mary Sudman. A Different Call: Women 's Ministries in the Episcopal Church, 1850–1920. Wilton, CT: Morehouse, 1986.
- Hein, David, and Gardiner H.Shattuck, Jr. The Episcopalians. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2004.
- Holmes, David L. A Brief History of the Episcopal Church. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1993.
- Mills, Frederick V., Sr. Bishops by Ballot. New York: Oxford University Press, 1978.
- Prichard, Robert W. A History of the Episcopal Church (2d ed.). Harrisburg, PA: Morehouse, 1999.
- Shattuck, Gardiner H., Jr. Episcopalians and Race: Civil War to Civil Rights. Lexington, KY: University Press of Kentucky, 2000.
- Woolverton, John F. Colonial Anglicanism in North America, 1607–1776. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 1984. <http://episcopalchurch.org/>

DAVID L.HOLMES

ERASTIANISM

See Erastus, Thomas

ERASTUS, THOMAS (LUBER) (1524–1583)

Protestant reformer. Thomas Lüber who latinized his name to Erastus, was born in Baden, SWITZERLAND, September 7, 1524, studied THEOLOGY at Basel and medicine at Bologna and Padua, and became a renowned physician who made his mark by repudiating the medical theories of THEOPHRASTUS PARACELSUS. In 1558 he was appointed personal physician of elector Otto Heinrich of the Palatinate and simultaneously professor of medicine at the University of Heidelberg. Trusted spiritual advisor to the elector, he became increasingly involved in ecclesiastical affairs in the Palatinate. In 1577 he wrote advocating the death penalty for witches. A committed Zwinglian/Calvinist, Erastus opposed the introduction of LUTHERANISM in the Palatinate and lost his position at Heidelberg in 1580. Thus forced to emigrate, he became professor of medicine at the University of Basel, where he also received a professorship in moral philosophy shortly before his death. He died in Basel on December 31, 1583.

Erastus is best known for giving his name to the doctrine of Erastianism, which was thought to be found in his book Explicatio. This was the notion that government held all sovereignty within a commonwealth and that, therefore, the political power was superior to ecclesiastical power, which in turn had to be submissive to it. In fact Erastus himself favored the Zurich model of the relationship between the political and ecclesiastical power, as introduced by HULDRYCH ZWINGLI.

See also Calvinism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Erastus, Thomas. Explicatio gravissimae questionis utrum excommunicatio quatenus Religionem. London: 1589.

———. The Theses of Erastus Touching Excommunication. London: Simpkin and Marshall 1844.

Secondary Sources:

Figgis, J.Neville. "Erastus and Erastianism." Journal of Theological Studies 2 (1901):66–101.

Wesel-Roth, Ruth. Thomas Erastus. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der reformierten Kirche und zur Lehre von der Staatsouveränität. Lahr: M.Schauenburg 1954.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

ESCHATOLOGY

The word eschatology is derived from the Greek and refers to discourse about the end times, the last events of human history, and the final destiny of the individual human being. In the Christian tradition, eschatological belief relates to the ultimate fulfillment of God's plan for humanity and the ultimate triumph of Jesus Christ and the establishment of His Kingdom. In the Hebrew scriptures, eschatological hope, found especially in the books of Daniel, Isaiah, and Ezekiel, centers on an age of righteousness associated with the coming of the Messiah. Christian eschatology is closely interwoven with millennialism or CHILIASM, the expectation of Christ's end-time return to Earth and his thousand-year reign of justice, righteousness, and peace foretold in Revelation 20 (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISTS). Christian eschatology is also closely linked to APOCALYPTICISM, a literary genre in ancient Jewish and early Christian thought through which hidden truths or spiritual realities, often dealing with the final conflict of good and evil, are apprehended by the author through a vision or divine revelation and transmitted to the reader, often in allegorical form. The Book of Revelation, a Christian apocalypse incorporated into the biblical canon, closes the New Testament.

The rich tradition of Protestant eschatological interpretation, now spanning nearly five centuries, is rooted in a still older tradition of Christian eschatological exegesis and expectation. The earliest Christians anticipated Christ's return in their own lifetime, but as Christianity won TOLERATION and then primacy in the Roman world, church leaders and theologians played down the expectations of an imminent end of history. St. Augustine historicized the Bible's prophetic and apocalyptic passages, for example, finding eschatological fulfillment in the gradual unfolding of history, rather than in a final moment of eschatological crisis.

The medieval church, with its quasi-monarchical structure, continued to discourage eschatological speculation, particularly by the LAITY. Eschatology flourished at the grassroots level, however, often implicitly challenging the papacy, as in the visionary work of the twelfth-century monk Joachim of Fiore and the fifteenth-century Hussite movement in Bohemia.

Protestant Eschatology from the Reformation through the Great Awakening

This, then, is the eschatological tradition that passed into the Protestant movement in the early sixteenth century. The early reformers held ambivalent eschatological views. On the one hand, they readily used eschatological imagery, particularly biblical allusions to the ANTICHRIST, the Beast, and the Whore of Babylon, to pursue their campaign against Rome. Numerous engravings and polemical writings identify the papacy with these demonic end-time figures, as do the hyper-Protestant marginal notes of the GENEVA BIBLE of 1560.

In general, however, MARTIN LUTHER, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, JOHN CALVIN, and other early Reformation leaders were deeply suspicious of what they viewed as a dangerous upsurge of eschatological speculation in a highly volatile religious and social situation. Calvin did not include Revelation in his commentaries. Luther declared Revelation “neither apostolic nor prophetic,” and relegated it to an appendix in his German New Testament. The early Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) and other Protestant radicals, by contrast, were intensely interested in eschatology and saw history’s final drama unfolding in their own time. During the turbulent days of the Peasants War in Germany, THOMAS MÜNTZER inspired his followers with eschatological expectations, up to their catastrophic final stand at Frankenhausen in 1525. Nine years later, in 1534, followers of a charismatic Dutch preacher named JAN MATHIIS took over the Westphalian city of Munster, proclaiming it the New Jerusalem. This eschatological experiment soon degenerated into brutality, chaos, and mass starvation, and was crushed by the authorities in 1535. Such excesses confirmed the Protestant leaders’ suspicions of excessively literalist or present-minded eschatological interpretations. Although Christ’s Second Coming is affirmed in the creed of all Protestant bodies, it has remained a muted theme in the Lutheran, Reformed, and Anglican confessions.

As in the medieval era, however, eschatological speculations periodically erupted in Protestantism’s more fervent and evangelical precincts, particularly in times of religious or social crisis. The wave of reform that followed HENRY VIII’s establishment of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, culminating in the Puritan movement, the English CIVIL WAR, regicide, and the rule of OLIVER CROMWELL, for example, was marked by intense end-time anticipation. Puritan writers found profound eschatological meaning in the movement to purify the English church. JOHN MILTON (1608–1674), the poet of PURITANISM, was only one of many who invested these events with eschatological significance.

The so-called Fifth Monarchy Men sect saw Cromwell’s rule foreshadowed in the allegorical image in Daniel 2 of a statue representing five successive world kingdoms, the last of which is an end-time reign of righteousness. The mathematician and natural philosopher Sir ISAAC NEWTON (1642–1727) devoted his final years to eschatology, examining the apocalyptic scriptures synoptically to decipher the end-time system they revealed.

The Puritan settlers of New England brought eschatology to America. Michael Wigglesworth’s New England physician and theologian Day of Doom (1662) is full of end-time anticipations, as are the writings of COTTON MATHER (1663–1728). In these New World eschatological reflections, American realities figured prominently. Sometimes the Indians and sometimes the French Catholics of CANADA were identified with the Antichrist; others speculated that America might be the site of Christ’s millennial kingdom.

Eschatological expectation in America flared brightly during the Great Awakening of the 1740s and the Second Great Awakening of the early nineteenth century. The revivalist and theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758) wrote extensively on apocalyptic themes. Espousing a position later called postmillennialism, Edwards proclaimed that through piety, prayer, and evangelism, Christians could achieve a redeemed social order in the present age, paving the way for the millennium as a prelude to Christ’s return.

Trends in Eschatology in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

In ENGLAND the Reverend EDWARD IRVING, a charismatic London minister of the 1820s, preached Christ’s imminent return. Irving’s convert HENRY DRUMMOND, a wealthy banker and Tory member of Parliament, held a series of prophecy conferences on his estate in the 1820s and 1830s. In America the United Society of Believers in Christ’s Second Coming, popularly called SHAKERS, incorporated a strong eschatological strand in their THEOLOGY. In the Book of Mormon (1830), which JOSEPH SMITH offered as a divinely inspired history and revelation of future events, American history is refigured in sacred terms, with the newly founded Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (see MORMONISM) playing a central role in God’s unfolding plan.

Beginning in the 1830s, WILLIAM MILLER of upstate New York, drawing on calculations involving various events and time sequences in the Hebrew scriptures, proclaimed the second coming of Christ “around 1843 or 1844.” Eventually, Millerite leaders pinpointed the final date even more precisely: October 22, 1843 (later revised to October 22, 1844). The movement won thousands of adherents, and attracted thousands more of the curious. When the appointed day came and went, a crisis resulted that some called the Great Disappointment. From the wreckage, however, arose the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST church, a Protestant denomination with millions of members worldwide that remains a bastion of eschatological belief, although modern Adventists carefully avoid date-setting.

Meanwhile, a system of eschatological interpretation known as premillennial DISPENSATIONALISM arose in England and spread rapidly to America. The person who systematized and promulgated this scheme, the Reverend JOHN NELSON DARBY (1800–1882), was a founder of a dissenting sect known as the PLYMOUTH BRETHREN. If rightly understood and arrayed in proper sequence, Darby taught, Bible prophecy reveals a series of divinely ordained epochs, or dispensations, each with its distinct means of SALVATION. The end of the present dispensation, the Church Age, he believed, would be signaled by a series of signs foretold by Christ, sometimes in parables, including wars and wickedness, natural disasters, and the restoration of the Jews to the promised land. Next on the prophetic calendar will come the RAPTURE, when all true believers will join Christ in the air, followed by the Great Tribulation (Matthew 24:21) and the rise of a demonic figure, the Antichrist. Antichrist's reign will end after seven years, however, when he is vanquished at the Battle of Armageddon by a triumphant Christ and the raptured saints. Hailed as Messiah by the Jews who survive Antichrist's persecution, Christ will establish his millennial kingdom in the rebuilt temple in Jerusalem.

An indefatigable writer and preacher, Darby toured widely, winning many adherents in America. One convert to dispensationalism, Cyrus Scofield, published in 1909 an annotated Bible with notes based on Darby's system. Through the popular SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE, prophecy periodicals and conferences, schools like Dallas Theological Seminary, and the preaching of dispensationalist ministers, Darby's eschatological scheme pervaded American EVANGELICALISM. The rise of PENTECOSTALISM in the early twentieth century gave further impetus to end-time anticipations.

Other eschatological perspectives gained support as well, however, including the reformist version underlying the SOCIAL GOSPEL preached in many liberal Protestant churches in the early twentieth century (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Social Gospel ministers and theologians offered a version of Edwardian postmillennialism adapted to an urban industrial age. By promoting slum-housing legislation, labor unions, worker-protection laws, the prohibition of child labor, and similar reforms, they taught, Christians could hasten the prophesied KINGDOM OF GOD. In Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917), and other works, theologian WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH translated postmillennialist eschatology into a mandate for social reform. This reformist outlook profoundly influenced the Methodist and Presbyterian churches and other main-stream Protestant denominations, as well as the ecumenically minded Federal Council of Churches (FCC). "The Social Creed of the Churches," adopted by the FCC in 1912, represents the high water mark of the Social Gospel. The young REINHOLD NIEBUHR (1892–1971) espoused the Social Gospel in his early ministry and writings, although he would later harshly criticize what he saw as its excessive optimism about the human condition.

Although the disillusionment that followed World War I undermined the postmillennialist eschatology of the Social Gospel, premillennial dispensationalism, with its darker, more apocalyptic view of history, remained strong in the evangelical, fundamentalist, and Pentecostal churches, which had continued to stress individual salvation and missionary work rather than the christianization of the social order (see FUNDAMENTALISM; PENTECOSTALISM). As the nineteenth-century evangelist DWIGHT L. MOODY memorably put it, expending one's energies on social reform was like polishing the brass fittings on a sinking ocean liner.

After World War II premillennial dispensationalism gradually emerged as the dominant eschatology of grassroots American Protestantism, taking root as a kind of folk theology promulgated more by paperback popularizers, radio preachers, and televangelists than by established church institutions or mainstream theological seminaries. The atomic bomb; the United Nations; the movement for European unity; the establishment of Israel in 1948; the Israelis' recapture of Jerusalem's Old City in 1967; and later the rise of computers, a global economy, and a worldwide communications systems all struck prophecy writers as portentous signs of the times, making plain that the present dispensation would soon end.

Although twentieth-century Protestant ministers and theologians outside the evangelical and fundamentalist subcultures displayed little interest in combing the biblical prophecies for clues to end-time events, successive generations of scholars, especially in Germany, contributed to a renewed awareness of the importance of eschatology in early Christianity. Johannes Weiss's Die Predigt Jesu Von Reiche Gottes (The Sermon of Jesus on the Kingdom of God) of 1892, and ALBERT SCHWEITZER'S Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906), published in English in 1910 as The Quest for the Historical Jesus, insisted on the urgency of the first Christians' eschatological expectations. Schweitzer contended that Jesus's entire ministry was founded on the belief that the world would end very soon. This theme was reiterated by later German theologians such as Klaus Koch, whose Ratlos vor der Apokalyptik (1970) appeared in English two years later as The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic, and Ernst Kasemann, who in an influential 1969 article declared the apocalyptic worldview "the mother of all Christian theology."

The well-known Swiss theologian KARL BARTH (1886–1968), as part of his larger reassertion of an orthodox tradition that he believed had been lost in post-ENLIGHTENMENT theology, sought to recover a renewed sense of eschatology as a central element in Christian doctrine and in the Protestant REFORMATION. Fundamental to the Christian life, Barth contended, were moments of decision confronted from an eschatological perspective. (For Barth, such a moment had come in 1935 when, teaching in GERMANY, he had refused an oath of allegiance to Adolph Hitler's Nazi regime.) The German Lutheran theologian PAUL TILLICH (1886–1965), who came to America in 1933, drew on existentialism and depth psychology in defining eschatology as "ultimate concern" in his Systematic Theology (1951–1963) and The Courage to Be (1952), which won a large readership.

Although Continental scholars reasserted the importance of eschatology in early Christianity, millions of American Protestants embraced present-day end-time speculation ever more fervently. As the nation's liberal, mainstream Protestant denominations lost ground after 1970, evangelical, fundamentalist, and charismatic denominations such as the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD and the SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION, as well as independent community churches and Bible fellowships with no strong denominational ties, surged in membership. Premillennialist eschatological belief loomed large in these churches. Bible prophecy also figured prominently in countless radio and television ministries by such figures as JERRY FALWELL, PAT ROBERTSON, Jack Van Impe, and James Hagee, a San Antonio pastor with a flock of thousands. Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network (CBN) and Paul and Jan Crouch's Trinity Broadcasting Network (TBN) frequently showcased eschatological themes (see TELEVANGELISM; PUBLISHING, MEDIA).

Paperback writers spread the end-time message as well. Hal Lindsey's The Late Great Planet Earth (1970), a popularization of premillennial dispensationalism, became an all-time bestseller and remained in print thirty years later. Many other eschatological popularizers gained prominence in late twentieth-century America. A multivolume series of novels by Tim LaHaye and Jerry B. Jenkins, launched in 1995 with Left Behind, offered a fictionalized version of Darby's system. The Left Behind series became a publishing phenomenon, with thirty million copies sold by 2001. Movies such as Donald Thompson's "A Thief in the Night" (1972), Matt Crouch's "The Omega Code" (1999), and Peter LaLonde's "Left Behind: The Movie" (2000), based on the LaHaye and Jenkins series, reached large audiences with their eschatological message. Continuing a long tradition in popular Protestant eschatology, these writers, televangelists, and filmmakers wove current events into their scenarios, from communications satellites and the Trilateral Commission to global warming, radical feminism, and Islamic fundamentalism, as signs of the end times or anticipations of Antichrist's rule.

The terrorist attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center in September 2001 pushed popular interest in eschatology to still higher levels. Within weeks prophecy books appeared on the bookshelves incorporating these events, including James Hagee's Attack on America: New York, Jerusalem, and the Role of Terrorism in the Last Days. The global reach of U.S. mass culture, including the prophecy-oriented TV programs and paperbacks, reinforced by thousands of charismatic and evangelical Protestant missionaries, spread premillennialist eschatological belief to Latin America and Africa as well.

As the twenty-first century began, eschatology remained central in the Protestant tradition. In the liberal churches, Christ's Second Coming was interpreted allegorically, residually acknowledged in the recitation of a creed, or simply viewed as a mystery whose details were best left unexplored. In the vibrant and expansive evangelical, fundamentalist, and charismatic sectors of American Protestantism, however, and in parts of the world proselytized by U.S. Protestant missionaries, eschatology was not merely a matter of credal affirmation or historical interest, but a vibrant reality, stirring fervent expectations of the approaching end and encouraging believers to search the scriptures and scan the headlines for signs that history's final climax was drawing ever nearer.

References and Further Reading

- Barnes, Robert. "Images of Hope and Despair: Western Apocalypticism, ca. 1500–1800." In The Encyclopedia of Apoca-lypticism, vol. 2, edited by Bernard McGinn, 143–184. New York: Continuum, 1998.
- Bouwsma, William J. John Calvin: A Sixteenth-Century Portrait. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Boyer, Paul. When Time Shall Be No More: Prophecy Belief in Modern American Culture. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Davidson, James W. The Logic of Millennial Thought: Eighteenth-Century New England. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Firth, Katharine. The Apocalyptic Tradition in Reformation Britain, 1530–1645. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Hill, Christopher. Antichrist in Seventeenth-Century England. London: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Moorhead, James H. World Without End: Mainstream American Protestant Visions of Last Things, 1880–1925. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1999.
- Noll, Mark L. The Scandal of the Evangelical Mind. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm.B.Eerdmans, 1994.

- Numbers, Ronald L., and Jonathan M. Butler, eds. The Disappointed: Millerism and Millenarianism in the Nineteenth Century. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
- Oberman, Heiko. Luther: Man Between God and the Devil. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Penton, M. James. Apocalypse Delayed: The Story of Jehovah's Witnesses. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1985.
- Sandeen, Ernest R. The Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970.
- Toon, Peter, ed. Puritans, the Millennium, and the Future of Israel: Puritan Eschatology, 1600–1660. Cambridge, UK: James Clark and Co., 1970.
- Tuveson, Ernest Lee. Millennium and Utopia: A Study in the Background of the Idea of Progress. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1949.
- Wacker, Grant. Heaven Below: Early Pentecostals and American Culture. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2001.
- Weber, Timothy P. Living in the Shadow of the Second Coming: American Premillennialism, 1975–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

PAUL S. BOYER

ESTONIA

The present territory of the Republic of Estonia does not correspond geographically to the area that made up Estonia at the time of the REFORMATION in the sixteenth century. A large part of what is now Estonia belonged at that time to Livonia. Therefore, it is possible to speak of the history of Protestantism in Estonia only in general terms.

The arrival of Protestantism in Estonia was marked by the religious renewal movements and churches that arrived in northern Estonia and Livonia as a result of the reformation of the church started by MARTIN LUTHER in GERMANY. Protestantism reached Estonia from Wittenberg in 1523, initially attaining a following in the larger towns, where the people tried to make use of the reformation of the church for their own economic benefit and to achieve their own political goals. The reformation movement first reached Tallinn and then spread outward to Narva, Rakvere, and Paide. A year later it reached Tartu, then in Livonia but now part of southern Estonia, and from there it continued to broaden its base to Viljandi, Pärnu, and Valga. Finally, it reached Haapsalu in western Estonia and then the islands.

Although local church leaders objected fiercely to the reforms, they spread rapidly across the country thanks to wandering preachers who taught the Gospel in this new way. The first Protestant preachers in Estonia and Livonia to have come from the center of the Reformist movement in Germany and whose names are known today were Johann Lange and Zacharias Hasse in Tallinn and Hermann Marsow and MELCHIOR HOFMANN in Tartu. The Reformist movement then spread from the towns to the countryside, where the country people (at that time the majority of the population of Estonia and Livonia) hoped that the reformation of the church would bring about an improvement in their way of life and began to actively support the reformers. As a result, the movement spread quickly throughout the whole of Estonia and Livonia. After a change in political power in the region, these developments were halted by a Catholic counterrevolution that was successful in the parts of Livonia that had fallen under Polish influence.

The triumphant march of Protestantism across Estonia and Old Livonia was sealed for good during the second half of the sixteenth century, when the period of Swedish supremacy began. Worthy of particular note during this period was the work of Johannes Rudbeckius, bishop of Västerås in SWEDEN, who led the development of a Lutheran church organization in this region. In 1694, a version of the Swedish Church Law adapted for Estonia and Livonia came into force. This laid out the structure of the CHURCH, set requirements for members of the CLERGY, and defined the basic tasks of the church in its role as proclaimer of the Gospel and educator. The Swedish era and Swedish supremacy in Estonia came to an end during the Great Northern War, when Russian forces occupied Tallinn in 1710. However, Protestantism, in the form of LUTHERANISM, had established a firm foothold in the area and had already taken the leading role in church life. In addition to the reform of the church, the most significant advance of this period was the establishment of an educational system and a network of schools for Estonians with Estonian as the common language. Estonian was beginning to spread as a written language, and this development was not even halted by the extensive Russification policies of the Russian Tsarist regime, which reigned for several centuries. One aspect of these policies was the granting of considerable economic and political advantages to the Orthodox Church and its followers (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Estonia's separation from Tsarist Russia and the establishment of an independent Estonian state in 1918 had a significant impact on the church. The Lutheran Church was no longer under the administration of the Russian Lutheran Church but had become independent. In so doing, it also became the largest Christian confession in Estonia.

The Second World War and the subsequent Soviet occupation after 1945 led to a dramatic slowing, and in many areas a complete halt, of the development of church life. Together with the political leaders, officer corps, and intellectual elite of independent Estonia, large numbers of the clergy were also deported or put to death. State and church-run institutions of theological education, where members of the clergy had also been trained, were closed down. Atheism was declared the official ideology. All church organizations were banned, and the churches themselves were subjected to strict control. The churches were prohibited from being involved in welfare work and from working with young people, WOMEN, and children. Although the churches were separated from the state, the state began to control and limit the activities of the churches (see CHURCH AND STATE OVERVIEW). Freedom of belief was retained in theory, but in practice people were not given the opportunity to exercise it.

In the last decade of the twentieth century, a breakthrough occurred in relations between the state and the churches when Estonia left the Soviet Union and re-established the independent state in 1991. There has been a steady progression from the former sense of opposition between church and state, both public and hidden, to a level of cooperation. The Estonian Constitution guarantees freedom of belief to everyone living in Estonia. There is no such thing as a state church in Estonia. All churches and associations of congregations are deemed equal and to have equal rights. The state's relations with the churches and with other religious associations are regulated by the Churches and Congregations Act, passed in 2002. To coordinate relations between the Christian churches and the state and between the Christian churches themselves, and to promote joint efforts to help advance society and proclaim the Gospel, the Council of Estonian Churches was set up in 1989 on the instigation of the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church. All of the large Christian churches operating in Estonia are members of the Council.

Of the traditional Protestant churches, only Lutheranism is represented in Estonia today. The Anglican Church and the Reformed churches do not exist. The oldest Protestant church in Estonia, the Lutheran Church has existed in various institutional forms since the arrival of the Reformation in Estonia. After Estonia's separation from Tsarist Russia and the declaration of an independent Estonian Republic in 1918, an independent church based on the Lutheran confession was created. The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (Eesti Evangeelne Luterlik Kirik) is now the largest church in Estonia. In its role as the largest church institution, it has been the carrier of national identity for centuries. This became particularly important during the years of occupation.

The church has an Episcopal-synod structure and comprises 169 congregations, divided into twelve deaneries. This network of congregations covers the whole of Estonia. The Lutheran churches tend to be situated in what were the town centers back in the time of the first Estonian Republic, because during the Soviet period it was not possible to set up new congregations or build churches in newer neighborhoods. According to state statistics, church membership currently stands at about 172,000, and the clergy numbers around 190. The church's spiritual leader is the Archbishop, who is assisted by the Bishop and under whom serve the ministers (pastors), deacons, and others who work for the church in various fields.

The focal point of the everyday life of the Lutheran Church is Sunday WORSHIP. The congregations also have SUNDAY SCHOOLS, youth groups, choirs, diaconal centers, and other organizations promoting church life and cooperation in general. The church cooperates with state institutions in areas where the interests of the state and the church meet. The church is expected to express and promote moral values, but as society develops there is an ever-increasing need for diaconal work. The church has its own university offering higher education and training for members of the clergy and church musicians; for military, hospital, and prison chaplains; and for deacons and youth workers.

The Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church has been a member of the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION since 1963. It also belongs to the European Conference of Churches (1959) and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1961).

The second largest Christian grouping in Estonia to have grown out of Protestantism is the Baptist Church (see BAPTISTS). The movement reached Estonia in the 1870s and was initially limited to western Estonia, but later spread across the whole country. A union of Estonian Baptist congregations was set up in 1900. After the Second World War, in the second half of the 1940s, the union was amalgamated with the Evangelical Christians, the Pentecostals, and the free congregations. The Union of Estonian Evangelical Christian and Baptist Congregations currently encompasses some eighty-nine congregations with around 6,100 members. The congregations are served by eighty-one members of the clergy. Since 1989, Estonian Baptists have had their own theological seminary for training the clergy for their work in the congregations.

Although the Anglican Church is not represented in Estonia, another church that grew out of the Anglican Church has been active here since 1910: the Methodist Church (see METHODISM; METHODISM, EUROPE). The Estonian Methodist Church has a Congregationalist structure. The highest decision-making body of the Methodist Church is the General Assembly, which selects a person from among the clergy to be the leader of the church (the Superintendent) for the subsequent three years. The church has 1,800 members split between twenty-four congregations and served by twenty-two members of the clergy. The church set up a theological seminary in 1994 with the aim of providing training for people working for the church.

There have been Pentecostals in Estonia since 1909, although they were forced to join the Union of Evangelical Christians and Baptists during the period of Soviet occupation (see PENTECOSTALISM). They were not given the opportunity of operating as an independent church. After the restoration of the Republic of Estonia, three “exile Estonian” Pentecostal Ministers founded an association of Estonian Congregationalist congregations that today is known as the Estonian Christian Pentecostal Church. It has 3,500 members, thirty-nine autonomous congregations, and sixty-three clergy. The church has had its own BIBLE school since 1992. Several Pentecostal congregations in Estonia have taken the decision to operate as independent congregations, and some have set up small alternative associations of congregations.

Protestantism in Estonia means the liberal theological movement and grouping of clergy that developed within the Estonian Evangelical Lutheran Church (then operating under its former name of Eesti Evangeeliumi Luteriusu Kirik) in the 1920s under the name “New Protestantism.” This movement had a significant influence on Estonian THEOLOGY and on the development of church life. Its characteristic feature was the interpretation of the didactic basis of the church in the spirit of nineteenth-century German liberal Cultural Protestantism, and it followed the same theological ideas (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). The most important exponents of the idea were Theodor Tallmeister (1889–1947) and Voldemar Kuljus (1898–1979). From 1923 until 1940, the movement published its own magazine first titled Protestantline Ilm and then Protestanlik Maailm (Protestant World).

References and Further Reading

- Arbusow, Leonid Jr. Die Einführung der Reformation in Liv-, Est- und Kurland. Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte. Band III. Leipzig, Germany: M.Heinsius, 1921.
- Au, Ilmo, and Ringo Ringvee. Kirikud ja Kogudused Eestis. Tallinn, Estonia: AS Kirjastus Ilo, 2000.
- Saard, Riho. Eesti Kirikuajaloo Bibliograafia. Viron Kirkkohistorian Bibliografia. Bibliographie der Estnischen Kirchengeschichte (1918–1997). Edited by Matti Kotiranta. Helsinki, Finland: University of Helsinki, Gummerus Kirjapaino Oy Saarijärvi, 1998.
- Sild, Olaf, and Vello Salo. Lühike Eesti Kirikulugu. Tartu, Estonia, Akadeemilise K.Kirjastus 1995.
- Võõbus, Arthur. Studies in the History of the Estonian People, vols. I–XI and XIII. Wettern, Belgium: Cultura Press, 1984.
- . Studies in the History of the Estonian People, vol. XIV. Wettern, Belgium: Cultura Press, 1985.

Wittram, Reinhard, ed. Die Reformation in Livland. Baltische Kirchengeschichte. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1956.

TIIT PAADEM

ETHICS

A vital contribution of Protestantism is to preclude the possibility of ethics as a disparate discipline, as a conversation apart from the grace that exercises dominion. Unless the Word through which we are saved perpetually conditions the word of ethics, morality can become menacingly independent. Whether tempting toward preening pride, scrupulous secularity, or nihilistic despair, ethics without constant reference to “eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” lead us astray. As Paul put it in Romans 5,

But law came in, with the result that the trespass multiplied; but where sin increased, grace abounded all the more, so that, just as sin exercised dominion in death, so grace might also exercise dominion through justification leading to eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. What then are we to say? (Romans 5:20–21, 6:1a)

One approach to Protestant ethics is through the question of soteriology. We may plausibly read Protestant ethics such that for MARTIN LUTHER, JOHN CALVIN, and MICHAEL SATTLER, ethics and soteriology are inextricably intertwined. Luther’s insistence that the study of requisite morality not become an enterprise severed from the answer of our SALVATION in Christ is a claim with which all subsequent Protestants have had to reckon. We may responsibly interpret each Protestant TRADITION to suggest that we cannot give form to an answer regarding what we are to do apart from the question of what God has done for us through Christ.

The manner of formulating the question of our salvation will lead to significantly different ethics. While some Protestant theologians might argue that “ultimately, nothing is at stake,” the ecclesial descendants of Michael Sattler might well argue that for Anabaptist ethics, everything is at stake. In The Epistle to the Romans, KARL BARTH suggests that through Christ, “all human duties and virtues and good deeds are set upon the edge of a knife.” We may fruitfully read these two strongly divergent assertions, along with the testimonies of other Protestant theologians, as turning on the knife-edge of soteriology. Here we examine a seminal text by each of four theologians key to Protestant thought: Saint Augustine, Martin Luther, Michael Sattler, and John Calvin. In each of these strands of Protestant thought, God’s radically prodigal work for us provides the requisite way to understand our own labors.

“That faith which worketh by love” in Augustine’s On the Spirit and the Letter(412)

Written in the early fifth century, Saint Augustine’s biblical commentary on II Corinthians and Romans, On the Spirit and the Letter, became an important interpretive work for Luther and other Protestant writers. All who followed Augustine in the West sought to secure their allegiance to his ORTHODOXY. On the Spirit and the Letter was crucial in establishing this important genealogy for the REFORMATION, perhaps in part because it is more obviously scriptural than some of his neo-platonic works. In Augustine’s distinction between a letter that is “inculcating and threatening” and a spirit that is “assisting and healing,” early Protestant writers found a strong emphasis on the necessity of GRACE. Although the Reformation reading of On the Spirit and the Letter is not uncontested, it serves to set a tone of humility and gratitude for a Protestant understanding of ethics. Inasmuch as some Western Christians had earlier come to see the law as either a specific task to be duly achieved or a particular failing about which properly to repent, Augustine’s words on “the holy law” served to reformulate the question.

From Chapter 9 of On the Spirit, the following passage well exemplifies the humbling and edifying use to which the Reformation put Augustine’s work:

For there was need to prove to man how corruptly weak he was, so that against his iniquity, the holy law brought him no help towards good, but rather increased than diminished his iniquity; seeing that the law entered, that the offence might abound; that being thus convicted and confounded, he might see not only that he needed a physician, but also God as his helper so to direct his steps that sin should not rule over him, and he might be healed by betaking himself to the help of the divine mercy; and in this way, where sin abounded grace might much more abound—not through the merit of the sinner, but by the intervention of his Helper.

Augustine breaks from some earlier interpretations of II Corinthians to read “the law” that heightens “iniquity” not merely as the “old law” of Israel before Christ, but any law that functions apart from God’s mercy. Reading II Corinthians and Romans together, Augustine finds a new way to interpret the relation between precept and mercy. The law, whether spoken by Christ or through Moses, becomes “the letter that killeth” if humans seek through the law’s guidance to avoid conviction and confusion and to live by their own will and their own wits. One of Augustine’s chief rhetorical aims in the treatise is therefore to create “an ardent desire to cleave to [our] Maker”—to create in us a longing for “the intervention of [our] Helper”—and he judges as fatal a use of holy precepts that allows one to eschew the aid of our maker and physician. Only through the grace of God, written by the Holy Spirit as “the finger of God” in our hearts, are we “repaired” of the effects of SIN and “liberated” to receive the law in doxological joy rather than in fear or pride.

In this way, Augustine reads Paul as striving “with much courage and earnestness against the proud and arrogant...in order that he may commend the grace of God.” This well characterizes Augustine's own task, as he continually reads Romans, II Corinthians, Galatians, and the Psalms as a commendation of grace, reading each text through a hermeneutic wrought by his own argument with those who encourage holiness without continual reference to and praise of the one who heals, writes, and liberates. In this answer to futile striving, Augustine might have placed the accent on original sin and perpetual depravity. But his stress is slightly different, as he commends, continually, the grace of God. He contrasts Pelagian pride with Christian humility not merely to force his interlocutors to bow, but ultimately to encourage doxology. The various strands of his argument in the text return, again and again, to the refrain of praise for the power of God's grace. For example, in treating a verse like Psalm 36:10—"For He extendeth His mercy to them that know Him, and His righteousness to the upright of heart"—Augustine warns that we avoid a reading whereby we might make ourselves "the chief end of living." Rather, we must continue reading that same Psalm to hear "Let not the foot of pride come against me," a word that beckons us toward "that fountain of life, from the draughts of which alone is imbibed the holiness which is itself the good life." It is to this "fountain of life" that Augustine finally returns the reader, as he considers the possibility of a Christian who lives on earth in accordance with all of God's precepts. In the closing lines of the treatise, Augustine suggests that perhaps God has a reason to not yet grant such a thing as complete compliance, for with perfection, the congregation of believers might be led astray to praise ourselves. We are called to rather open our mouths continually to praise the one by whose mercy and goodness we live.

Augustine endeavors to discredit those who would read and attempt to live the law apart from the Spirit that gives life. The alternative, doxological life to which Augustine calls his readers in On the Spirit found one bold adherent who sought to define discipleship as perpetual praise and service.

It is to Martin Luther and The Freedom of a Christian (1520) that we now turn.

Should he grow so foolish, however, as to presume to become righteous, free, saved, and a Christian by means of some good work, he would instantly lose faith and all its benefits, a foolishness aptly illustrated in the fable of the dog who runs along a stream with a piece of meat in his mouth and, deceived by the reflection of the meat in the water, opens his mouth to snap at it and so loses both the meat and the reflection. (Martin Luther, The Freedom of a Christian)

In The Freedom of a Christian, Luther begins working through I Corinthians 9:19 and Romans 13:8 with the aim of avoiding the dog's foolishness. The statements "For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a slave to all," and "Owe no one anything, except to love one another," intertwine to reveal the liberty and slavery of faithful love. For Luther, the servitude that marks Christian ethics requires a radical freedom, a freedom owing to Christ's payment for humankind's sins. Reading The Freedom of a Christian is crucial to understanding Luther's Augustinian emphasis on the centrality of grace and praise in a truly Christian life. In this treatise, Luther considers JUSTIFICATION and ethics as interwoven, indeed almost indistinguishable. What Augustine holds inextricably together—the Christian life and doxology—Luther binds again. The Christian life is distinguished as grateful praise, and all that is worthy of our doing is worthy only inasmuch as it is formed by gratitude.

Luther's rhetorical strategy in the text involves first our recognition that we have nothing, but precisely that we might receive life from another. This dire predicament of nothingness is universal, Luther insists, whether we look to the Old or the New Testament: "As we fare with respect to one commandment, so we fare with all, for it is equally impossible for us to keep any one of them." Luther's primary use of the law, what is at times called his "theological use," brings the reader to the point of sheer need:

Now when a man has learned through the commandments to recognize his helplessness and is distressed about how he might satisfy the law—since the law must be fulfilled so that not a jot or tittle shall be lost, otherwise man will be condemned without hope—then, being truly humbled and reduced to nothing in his own eyes, he finds in himself nothing whereby he may be justified and saved."

We would misread Luther to discover in his rhetoric merely condemnation without hope, for only through finding ourselves "reduced to nothing" are we prepared to receive the "one thing, and only one thing," that is "necessary for Christian life, righteousness and freedom." Luther preaches the reader into a corner so that he or she might not find a way around the Word: "For if [one] could be justified by anything else, [one] would not need the Word, and consequently [one] would not need faith." To use Luther's own metaphor, we receive all of Christ's benefits only if we run, panting with desperation, to the marital bed, and only if we remain in that bed into our old age, like an eager newlywed. As he puts it in another treatise, Concerning the Letter and the Spirit, "Grace is only given to those who long for it."

Only after longing for Christ and all his benefits do individuals receive them.. And for Luther, the benefits are not ephemera. The fable of the foolish dog (quoted earlier) provides a helpful entrée to this aspect of Luther's treatise. Found at the crux of his argument, the story of the lost meat and reflection points to a central concern for Lutheran ethics. The dog loses the steak and the image of the steak, because the image remains only inasmuch as the dog resists the urge to snap hungrily at it. The image of the meat glistening in the water is not an illusion, but neither is it real in and of itself. Works of love for one's neighbor are not illusory, but neither do they exist in and of themselves. Loving works exist as loving works only inasmuch as one perpetually recalls this and avoids the temptation to consider the reflection to be the real meat.

To put this differently, for us truly to be freed for the sake of our neighbor, we must be bound by infinite gratitude for all that Christ is giving us, "unworthy and condemned" as we are. Only as we are bound to Christ, subject to Him in humble receptivity, can we become subject to our neighbor in love. Luther here joins Paul's letter to the Romans, with which he began the treatise, to Paul's letter to the Philippians. By being bound to Christ through our condemnation before the law and through relinquishing of ourselves to Christ, we take on the form of a servant. This "emptying" is crucial if we are truly to love our neighbor as Christ intends. Our graced descent becomes the recurring pattern for our life of discipleship—our reflection, if you will, of the meat of FAITH. For us to love our neighbor, we must come to that neighbor as those who are nothing outside our marriage to Christ. As Luther puts it, we become “Christ to one another,” inasmuch as we know ourselves saved only by Christ. By this kind of faith, the Christian “descends” to love the neighbor as he or she is also in need.

The metaphors in this treatise are rhetorically rich, as Luther claims that a faithful soul does not merely “share” in the goodness of Christ, but becomes “saturated and intoxicated” with the promises fulfilled in him. There is a kind of union Luther strains to describe whereby those who wed Christ become truly embodied with Christ’s goodness. For Luther, the transformation of the faithful to obedient servants has the form of kenosis, but this emptying results in a joyful abundance that enables “the freest service, cheerfully and lovingly done.” Because Christ gives all that a soul needs, the life of a Christian is a “surplus,” an act of doxology given unreservedly. Through Christian kenosis and receptivity, life itself becomes sheer gift and hardly belonging to one individual to hoard, protect, or navigate with precision. Lutheran “ethics” are, quite literally, gratuitous; the Christian life is a life freely given. If service becomes instead a mapped plan for reward or a strategy to avoid punishment, then it is not Christian service. The Christian, “caught up beyond himself into God,” is freed to consider “nothing except the need and advantage of the neighbor.”

The whole problem of ethics is so delicate, so dubious, that the addition of one word too much is far more disastrous than the omission of one word which might have been said.

Luther insists in Freedom of a Christian that “ethics” per se is a dangerous concept, a temptation to lose faith and, paradoxically, to lose the self-giving activity reflective of true faith. Luther’s recurring emphasis is therefore on soteriology, on the gift of Christ, rather than on the particular nuances of the Christian life. But at least one aspect of his emphasis has abiding implications for Lutheran ethics: All Christians are eligible for this MARRIAGE to Christ. By liberally using the holy wedding imagery previously reserved for the cloistered, Luther both levels and elevates the life of faithful service. The barber, the midwife, and the blacksmith are all as bereft of true Christian virtue as the ordained priest—all are condemned, and all are saved, through the same Christ to whom they may be wed in faith. The previously insignificant lives of the masses are just as open to God’s holy use as the lives of those who preside over the Mass. Thus Luther brings about what William Lazareth has called “the emancipation of the common life.” The daily toils of the common Christian are sanctified through Christ; whether changing diapers, washing dishes, cutting hair, or baking bread, according to Luther each aspect of the embodied life is potentially crucial to the kingdom.

But by freeing the daily lives of the prince and the pauper for Christian service, Luther also entangles sacred living with the daily minutia of trade, community schooling, care of children, and the execution of criminals. The service for which one is joyfully freed by faith can take forms heretofore considered beneath the calling of a true man or woman of faith. How is such seemingly mundane, or even profane, work transformed by the holy freedom to love one’s neighbor? Is the difference merely formal, or does Christ’s presence in the sinner also bring a material change? In an attempt to explicate scriptural tensions, as well as tensions pressed by those living in the first generation of the Reformation, Luther tries a complicated and somewhat confusing heuristic: that of the two realms, or kingdoms. In his writings, the knife-edge of ethics rests perilously between these realms: one realm ruled by law and order, and another realm ruled by faith and forgiveness. God institutes both, Luther affirms, but the activity of God is different in each. Through one realm, God preserves the stability of creation; through the other, God saves His people, bringing them to grateful, free service for others.

Luther's writings on the interplay of these two realms in the life of the Christian are sufficiently complex to have troubled his followers since. If the Christian lives in both realms, how does this not lead to a split moral personality? How can forgiveness, grace, and mercy coexist alongside judgement, justice, and punishment? Luther's writings on such questions were occasioned by particular questions in the heat of rebellion, DIVORCE, or ecclesial crisis, and his resolutions are less than systematic. At times, the reader is reminded that Luther's true passion is soteriology, not ethics. Yet there are points of beautiful clarity, such as at the end of Two Kinds of Righteousness, where he goes into detail to answer the question: "Is it not proper [for a Christian] to punish sin?" The answer, he says, depends on whether the query comes from a private citizen or from a public servant. The public servant must at times "defend the oppressed" by punishing offenders. But the private citizen may seek the punishment of a wrongdoer only if he is certain that he is not "doing from anger and impatience that which he believes he is doing from love of justice." Luther here and elsewhere presses the faithful to suspect our quests for justice over clemency.

But some who heard Luther's call to a liberated priesthood of holy believers thought his double-edged morality a sham (see PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS). They took offense in particular to his resolution on the question of faithful service and ordered violence. Does not participation in the life of Christ preclude bodily harm of another? It is to Michael Sattler, who sought so to reform the early Reformation, that we now turn.

“Abide in the Lord as God’s Obedient Children” through the Schleitheim Confession (1527)

Eliminate from you that which is evil and the Lord will be your God and you will be his sons and daughters. Dear brethren, keep in mind what Paul admonishes Timothy when he says, The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

This document, attributed to Sattler (d. 1527), is an ecclesial epistle written for and by a group of Christian dissenters for the sake of internal hope, unity, and courage in precarious times. For these besieged reformers, The Freedom of a Christian was a call to live in uncompromising obedience to the ways of the one who wrought that freedom. These Christians read the Reformation return to Scripture alone, grace alone, and faith alone as bringing in a new, old way of following Christ: the way of peaceful, nonresistant witness to the truth, even to martyred DEATH. Rejecting what they saw as a duplicitous dualism in Luther's two kingdoms, Sattler and his brethren embraced a new, neo-Johannine dualism. True Christians must "withdraw from Babylon and the earthly Egypt" to remain “free from the slavery of the flesh.” They must maintain themselves as “fitted for service” in the “perfection of Christ.”

In this concise and clear letter, the early Anabaptists (as they were called by their persecutors) laid out the way of Christ’s perfection: (1) baptism is for those who repent and believe; (2) the faithful will practice fraternal admonition, or “the ban”; (3) only those will gather at the Lord’s table who are of the “one faith”; (4) because “all creatures are in but two classes, good and bad,” there will be a separation from all who are not of that “one faith”; (5) the pastor is to arise from among the faithful to lead among them; (6) believers will neither wield sword against one another, nor wield it against their enemy, nor orchestrate the sword by becoming a magistrate; and (7) there will be no swearing by oaths. By way of these instructions, Sattler and his brethren may “walk according to the simplicity of the divine truth.”

The form of the document itself testifies to the different world to which these Christians were called. This is a letter concerning unity, written by the faithful to encourage the faithful; it is not a treatise sent out by a rhetorically or theologically gifted vanguard. The epistle is not so much persuasive as declarative. Finally, the testimony to salvation in Christ is inextricably intertwined with the lived testimony of the faithful life of separation, PACIFISM, and martyrdom. The writers take Luther’s separation between two realms and declare themselves to be planted firmly on the only cruciform side of that divide. Because “the sword is ordained of God outside the perfection of Christ,” those who embody Christ in the world must eschew the sword for any purpose. The perfection to which Sattler and others were calling one another was not perfection subsequent to salvation, but perfection constitutive of it.

By way of their zeal for Christ’s way, the people called Anabaptist become Christ’s people (see ANABAPTISM). Ethics and soteriology are again wed in this text, but in a way that mirrors in the reverse Luther’s wedding. For Martin Luther, ethics separated from faith alone in Christ alone led to pride or despair and the loss of a union. For Sattler, faith separated from the practices of a holy, nonresistant people is a sham, a parody of the Christian life. Discipleship requires fully embodied cruciformity, as the body of the Christian and the collective body of Christ take on the bloody marks of witness. The consequences are perilous, and the knife-edge of discipleship sharpens. But there is no other way, for, as the letter closes, Christ “gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a people of his own, zealous of good works.”

We turn next to John Calvin’s “Capable of joyful obedience,” in INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION (1559).

For, as soon as Christian freedom is mentioned, either passions boil or wild tumults rise...Some, on the pretext of this freedom, shake off all obedience toward God and break out into unbridled license. Others disdain it, thinking that it takes away all moderation, order, and choice of things. What should we do here, hedged about with such perplexities?

Calvin begins Chapter 19 in Book III of his Institutes with this question. Is there doctrinal space between the dangers of libertarian ANTINOMIANISM and the pride of works righteousness? From the seeming impasse between Sattler’s brethren and the followers of Luther, we are prompted to ask this question with Calvin. Calvin’s answer involves a reformulation of Luther's freedom, a reformulation more in line with Luther's ideological brother, PHILIPP MELANCHTHON, than with Luther himself. Under Calvin, the freedom brought by justification in Christ alone issues forth in a new relationship to the law. Through Christ, we are "freed from the law's yoke" and thus enabled "willingly to obey God's will." We receive an "eager readiness to obey God," having received the assurance of righteousness through Christ. In this way, Calvin clears soteriological room for a third use, the "proper," "upbuilding," and "liberating" use of God's commands.

Calvin forges a distinction between two "very different" functions of the law, separating the movement of justification before God and of SANCTIFICATION for the chosen. Disputing ANDREAS OSIANDER'S "mixing of forgiveness of sins with rebirth," Calvin sets justification and rebirth as two related but distinct movements of grace. There is "no place" for the law "before God's judgement seat," as the believer turns only to Christ for the justification that forgives our iniquity. But the law is hardly "superfluous for believers"; it continues "teaching and exhorting and urging them to do good." The "condemnatory" use of the law brings the reprobate to search for God's forgiveness in Christ, but the "pedagogical" use is the proper use for the elect (Book II, Chapter 7). This is the use that enables the daily "progress" of the Christian SAINTS and fulfills the concentric promises of the law and the gospel. This section in Book II is often a commentary on the Psalms, as Calvin explicates the workings of the lamp that lights the paths of the faithful. Using the psalmist to interpret Paul's words on the law, Calvin exclaims, "David especially shows that in the law he apprehended the Mediator, without whom there is no delight or sweetness." Through grace, the otherwise "bitter" law becomes "sweet," and the regenerate pant after righteousness.

The disagreement between Calvin and Luther on the matter of the law's sweetness has roots in their interpretation of Romans 7:24, a passage with which Augustine also struggled. While all three agree that Paul is speaking with the anguish of a "spiritual" or "regenerate" man, Calvin tempers the heat of the verse with a rhetorical reading into the next chapter. There, he reminds us, Paul promises that "there is no more condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus (Book IV, Chapter 15). For those no longer condemned, for those "sanctified by Christ's spirit," we may "cultivate blamelessness and purity of life." As David Steinmetz has written, for Calvin "Paul's cry...is not—and can never be—the last word, not even in this life."

Calvin's vision for purity in this life has a particular setting, the city of Geneva, where the variously appointed councils vigorously pursued the progress of the regenerate. Here Calvin's vision of a regenerate people who live according to God's commandments takes on embodied life. The contours of this community, Calvin lays out in Book II, Chapter 8, where, for instance, the command not to take the Lord's name in vain charges that the faithful speak with "reverence" and "praise" for all that we "recognize as done by him." This deepening of the command is characteristic. Calvin explicates the prohibition against killing thus:

We are accordingly commanded, if we find anything of use to us in saving our neighbors' lives, faithfully to employ it; if there is anything that makes for their peace, to see to it; if anything harmful, to ward it off; if they are in any danger, to lend a helping hand.

Calvin develops each command with the narrative and teachings of Christ. The one whose death brings about the possibility of righteousness also “restored [the law] to its integrity,” and the ten dictates of righteousness become the daily works of justice and mercy. The leaders of Geneva, under Calvin’s guidance, sought to foster joyful obedience to these dictates, punishing accordingly those who did not obey. When they discovered, for instance, merchants overcharging their customers, doctors with unfair fees, or someone taking advantage of a sojourner, the councils sought justice. Through a wedding of church and polis, Calvin envisioned that the faithful might live a newly rigorous adherence to and joy of the law.

This vision inspired, among others, the life and works of JONATHAN EDWARDS, who sought to bring Calvin’s Geneva to bear on life in colonial Massachusetts. Whereas Anabaptists struggled to put their trust only in Christ and Luther’s followers recognized that Christ alone could secure a holy city, there remained among Calvin’s followers the reasonable hope for a truly holy people on earth.

The question remains whether Calvinist ethics resolves the impasse between Luther’s dangerous freedom and Sattler’s endangered discipleship by blunting the knife-edge of ethics. As Karl Barth wrote in The Epistle to the Romans, “The whole problem of ethics is so delicate, so dubious, that the addition of one word too much is far more disastrous than the omission of one word which might have been said.” To paraphrase Barth, has Calvin said one word too many?

Can Ethics Be Christian?

The interim between Calvin’s Geneva and Karl Barth’s cutting indictment of human striving in Epistle to the Romans should be noted. The road to Barth’s salvo runs through the ENLIGHTENMENT, and in particular the practical morality of IMMANUEL KANT. With Kant’s defense of morality in the Critique of Practical Reason, the matter of morality and soteriology is entirely transformed. For Augustine, Luther, Sattler, and Calvin, ethics is a variously complicated dialectic of practice and praise, of discipleship and doxology. In Kant’s wake, the “sublime and mighty name that dost embrace nothing charming or insinuating but requirest submission” is not God, but “Duty!” God, as it turns out, is a “postulate of pure practical reason”—the divine becomes a morally necessary assumption. Arguably due in part to the tragically bloody wars following the Reformation, many learned Europeans eagerly accepted a fundamental shift away from the dangerously contested realm of explicit Christianity and toward a moral order within the bounds of universal human reason. Given the flammable alliance of nation-state, warfare, and religious disagreement about the holy kingdom, it is not surprising that Western philosophy took up Kant’s summons to a merely human “kingdom of ends.”

The results reverberate throughout Protestant thought. James M. Gustafson, a leading Reformed ethicist of the twentieth century, is able to ask the question “Can Ethics Be Christian,” the title of his 1975 book, in large part due to the severing of soteriology and morality. This process spans continents and centuries, and Protestants who sought to retrieve original texts were themselves influenced by the growing separation. For example, a century after the Enlightenment, German theologian ALBRECHT RITSCHL read Luther's de-emphasis of metaphysics through Kant's emphasis on practical reason to depict the Jesus of scripture as a moral figure summoning humanity to a new level of "reciprocal moral action." Ritschl's hope for a civil state that would realize the lived gospel of Jesus found a ready adherent across the Atlantic, as WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH sought to propel a relatively new nation state toward the justice of Jesus. While neither theologian sought explicitly to banish soteriology from the field of ethics, the question had already become framed in such a way that morality was itself an end humanly pursued. As Western Europe and the UNITED STATES became increasingly secularized, questions of faith, DOCTRINE, and doxology became significantly less important than the separate task of civil, moral discourse. Thus, can ethics be Christian?

Intertwined with this trajectory are thinkers who sought anew to problematize ethics for the sake of soteriology. For Danish philosopher SØREN KIERKEGAARD, Protestant ethics is precisely the irresolvable intersection of faith, fear, and obedience. Both DIETRICH BONHOEFFER and Karl Barth sought to amplify Kierkegaard's crisis in order to summon a new generation to mind the growing gap between Protestant faith and Protestant ethics. While their response is itself ineluctably influenced by the Enlightenment, it may be a promisingly Protestant way to proceed.

See also Capital Punishment; Election; Vocation; War; Schleithem Confession

References and Further Reading

- Althaus, Paul. The Ethics of Martin Luther. Translated by Robert C.Schultz. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1972.
- Augustine. "The Spirit and the Letter." In Later Works Volume 8. Translated by John Burnaby. (Library of Christian Classics). Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1955.
- Barth, Karl. The Epistle to the Romans. Translated from the sixth edition by Edwyn C.Hoskyns. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Bretzke, James T. Bibliography on scripture and Christian ethics. Lewiston, NY: E.Mellen Press, c. 1997.
- Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. Edited by John T.McNeill; translated by Ford Lewis Battles. (Library of Christian Classics). Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1960.
- Chadwick, Owen. The Reformation. London: Penguin Books, 1990.
- Gustafson, James M. Ethics from a Theocentric Perspective. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981.
- . Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics: prospects for rapprochement. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978.
- Hauerwas, Stanley. Character and the Christian life: a study in theological ethics. San Antonio, TX: Trinity University Press, 1975.
- . Christians Among the Virtues: theological conversations with ancient and modern ethics. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1997.
- . The Peaceable Kingdom: a primer in Christian ethics. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, c. 1983.
- Hillerbrand, Hans, ed. The Protestant Reformation. New York: Harper & Row, 1968.

- Luther, Martin. Two Kinds of Righteousness. The Freedom of a Christian. Temporal Authority: To What Extent It Should Be Obeyed. All three essays in Martin Luther's Basic Theological Writings. Edited by Timothy F.Lull. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1989.
- Steinmetz, David. Calvin in Context. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Yoder, John Howard. The Legacy of Michael Sattler. Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 1973.

AMY LAURA HALL

ETHICS, MEDICAL

“Medical ethics” is one of several terms used to identify a broad set of issues and questions arising from both the practice and the research interests of medicine. The “ethics of health care,” for example, considers the principles and policies of medical practice and delivery systems, which permit or prohibit therapeutic interventions. “Biomedical ethics” typically refers to the range of life sciences dealt with under the heading “medicine,” whereas “bioethics” usually engages the “Pastoral medicine” is sometimes used to describe the ways in which a religion’s teachings inform and imfull range of life sciences as they affect persons. pinge upon medical practice. “Medical ethics” conventionally signifies the body of conventions and rules that govern professional medical behavior and the mores of physicians.

Early History

Although the present status of medical ethics dates from the mid-twentieth century, its genesis is many centuries older, and the evolutionary process that developed what we now know as medical ethics evolved gradually over many millennia. In primitive cultures the shaman or medicine man was (and continues to be) both priest and physician, whose early ethics embraced both religious virtues and medical techniques deeply rooted in vows, prayers, and codes. In modern times, however, medical ethics has become progressively autonomous and emancipated from religious presuppositions.

In medicine’s infancy, whatever comfort or relief a patient hoped for from a physician’s ministrations was not derived from a set of timeless ideals or a medical ethics in the modern sense. All the same, ancient physicians were likely aware that both patients and colleagues harbored certain expectations of them, if only in the form of the natural virtues of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude. It is reasonable to think that the emerging vocation of medicine was, therefore, not without certain self-conscious moral commitments.

As a general rule, from their inception and through evolving stages, what we now know as the “professions” were not without some inchoate sense of purpose, however dimly perceived in antiquity. That purpose contained an incipient ethics that became articulate over time, and typically took the form of principles of right and wrong that defined the character and governed the conduct of members of the profession. Whereas earlier interests in medicine as a vocation focused on its social and cultural role, modern medical ethics is largely driven by emerging innovative issues in research and practice.

There is no evidence that ancient Western physicians were required to swear an oath or accept even an informal code of professional conduct. The Hippocratic corpus, variously dated as from the sixth century B.C. to the first century A.D., is our earliest documentary expression of “medical ethics.” Although it mandated both behavior and noble aphorisms for physicians, it was not widely accepted or practiced until the advent of Christianity, whose ideals and virtues were consistent with the major features of the Hippocratic template. In the modern period, medical schools have employed solemn pledges for their graduates using either a version of the Hippocratic oath or incorporating concepts from it. While there is nothing comparable to the Hippocratic corpus in the earlier literature of classical Greece and Rome, there is a Chinese code of medical ethics developed in Sun Ssu-maiao’s The Thousand Golden Remedies, which dates from the sixth century A.D.

Several moral maxims, the origins of which cannot always be identified in Western medicine, emerged from this period. The most familiar of them is the Hippocratic precept, primum non nocere (do no harm)—do not make matters worse by your intervention. Another Hippocratic dictum holds that it is the duty of physicians to preserve (or prolong) life and to relieve pain (or suffering). The precept also requires that the physician’s duty is to his primary patient, and that medical decisions are to be made for the benefit of the primary patient without concern for spinoff benefits that might accrue to dependent populations. Yet another hoary maxim from this period is that a physician is under no obligation to offer, nor a patient under any duty to receive, treatments that are not beneficial to the patient being treated. The wisdom of these and other ancient moral maxims has been tested by twentieth-century advances in medical and bio-medical technologies, by the advent of sophisticated mechanisms (like double-blind clinical studies) for assessing treatment efficacy, by systems theory and family medicine (which challenge the exclusivity of the primary patient), and by therapies for which the preservation of life and the relief of pain are sometimes not complementary.

Religion

In the ancient world, and prior to the Christian era, primary Jewish commentary on medical topics was contained in the Mishnah and the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds. Further rabbinic responsa to questions concerning medical matters are found in various collections of Midrash. Already the ground was being prepared for an anecdotal, case-oriented medical ethics; but the full implementation of this approach was delayed for several centuries by remarkable innovations in medical technology. Meanwhile, the need for summary statements of Jewish law took the form of codes, one of which was written in the twelfth century by Moses Maimonides, who was himself a rabbi and a physician. In the centuries following, five identifiable principles important for Jewish medical ethics have emerged: human life has intrinsic value; the highest moral imperative is the preservation of human life; all human lives are equal; our lives belong to God; the sanctity of human life inheres in the human being as a whole. Over time the work of Maimonides, together with that of Christian scholastics, became the prototype for modern secular codes of medical ethics.

In the first fifteen centuries of the Christian era, the expectations and commitments within the guild of medicine were both deepened and made more explicit as Christian theologians directed interest to the etiology of diseases and the moral merits of medical interventions. In their efforts to take account of the attributes ascribed to God, they widely believed God to be both the origin of, and the remedy for, human suffering and disease: “See now that I, I am He, and besides me there is no god: I put to death and I keep alive, I inflict wounds and I heal; there is no rescue from my grasp.” (Deuteronomy 32:39) It may therefore be unsurprising that philosophies of medicine in the early Christian era variously held that medicine was an instrument of divine grace to provide relief and, conversely, that medicine demonstrated an absence of faith in its diabolic human attempt to alter the divine purpose.

Evolution of Codes

From the seventeenth century onward, the history of medical ethics took on a distinctively different look. With the advent of the rational ENLIGHTENMENT, monarchical forms of government, frequent revolutions, and a diminished role for religion in social and political life, metaphysical traditions were abandoned in favor of an experimental empirical scientific orientation that increasingly claimed both cultural ascendancy and medicine’s allegiance.

Among other notable changes, the notion was developed in GERMANY that physicians are not only agents for the sick but are also the overseers and managers of a country’s health; in FRANCE the revolutionary ideology of a right to health care took shape; and medical philosophers in Great Britain and the young UNITED STATES applied common-sense intuition in their efforts to articulate a moral philosophy for medicine that was universal in both scope and application.

Early medical ethics essays in colonial America appropriated the common-sense appeal to moral principles which claimed that each individual is endowed with an innate moral sense which, if properly maintained, could serve as an internalized moral gyroscope. The first of these essays, Samuel Bard’s (1742–1821) Discourse on the Duties of a Physician (1769), agreed with the eighteenth-century Scottish moral philosopher Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746) that duty and benevolence were the governing moral principles. In 1789 Benjamin Rush addressed some doctor-patient issues in his speech, “Observations on the Duties of a Physician and the Methods for Improving Medicine,” in which he focused on the knowledge and skills that identified the physician as a professional. Meanwhile, John Gregory of Edinburgh published his Lectures upon the Duties and Qualifications of a Physician (1817), an ambitious essay in which the author spoke to the moral qualities and temperament required of a physician, together with the kind of education suitable to qualify a physician for practice.

Although preceded by several physician-authored essays on the duties of physicians, as well as a code of ethics promulgated by the Medical Society of New Jersey in 1766, the publication of Thomas Percival's (1740–1804) Medical Ethics (1803) is generally acknowledged as the beginning of modern Western medical ethics. Percival's book actually has more to do with medical etiquette than with medical ethics. His principal claim was that a physician should be a Christian gentleman—prudent, charitable, honest, trustworthy. Percival's treatise remained the presiding reference for medical ethics into the third decade of the twentieth century, when Chauncey Leake's 1927 edition of his book was published. In sum, these early attempts at formulating a medical ethics proffered a series of benevolent duties: cure the sick; comfort the dying; serve the poor; observe confidentiality and honesty; and do all this unselfishly out of regard for others and not for self.

In 1808 an association of Boston physicians adopted a code of medical ethics that closely followed Percival's model; in 1823 the New York State Medical Society followed suit. In rapid succession codes were ratified by The Medico-Chirurgical Society of Baltimore (1832) and by the College of Physicians of Philadelphia (1843). The newly formed American Medical Association, meeting in Philadelphia and drawing largely from Percival's Medical Ethics, promulgated the first national code of ethics in 1847.

The AMA code has been revised several times, most recently as the "Principles of Medical Ethics" (1980), a document bearing little resemblance to Percival's. The seven principles perpetuate the tradition: a physician is to contribute to the community, but as a private citizen; patient care is advocated, but physicians are guaranteed the freedom to choose whom they will serve; and there is no hint that physicians, or the profession as a whole, are obligated to influence the distribution of medical resources to serve the underserved. The principles express prerogatives for self-regulation, stress the individual practitioner's autonomy, and make no affirmation of the equality of patients as persons. There is no lively sense of the common good except as this might spin off from the good one does oneself. The overall cast of this document is of a union or guild document, a statement made by craftsmen to protect themselves in which their prerogatives and rights form the central motif. In the larger cultural tradition of medical ethics, the 1980 AMA "Principles" appear to be the creatio ex nihilo (creation out of nothing) of modern doctors. To be sure, there are exceptions to this stance; the code of the American College of Physicians, together with many of the other medical specialty codes, displays a different temperament that tends to reflect an older and more traditional model of covenantal, rather than contractual, physician-patient relationship.

International concern for, and interest in, medical ethics escalated following World War II, and several global codes were adopted. In 1947 the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunal propounded 10 standards, called "The Nuremberg Code," to guide physicians in all future experiments on human subjects; in 1948 the General Assembly of the World Medical Association adopted a modified form of the Hippocratic oath known as the "Declaration of Geneva"; in 1964 the World Medical Association expanded the ethics of human experimentation and ratified the "Declaration of Helsinki," which was promptly endorsed by nine medical organizations in the United States active in clinical investigations; and, continuing this concern, the “AMA Guidelines for Clinical Investigation” were promulgated in 1966.

The Modern Period

Meanwhile, medical ethics was receiving the attention of scholars outside the medical profession as increasing numbers of theologians, philosophers, lawyers, social scientists, and others began to address the broad range of issues arising from the practice of medicine. Roman Catholic moral theologians and some papal encyclicals have been attentive to medico-moral issues for several centuries. In addition, Judaism lays claim to a lengthy tradition of rabbinic responsa, together with the dicta of religious courts, on these topics. The literature of medical ethics since the REFORMATION contains works, among those already cited, by several Protestant physicians, but deliberate and sustained cognizance of these matters in commentary by Protestant theological ethicists and moral philosophers has been comparatively recent. The tendency of Jewish medical ethics has been case oriented. Roman Catholic theologians, while utilizing carefully wrought natural law principles, have been casuistic as well. In an increasingly secular venue, both of these approaches have been labeled as “legalistic” and, in much current discussion, rejected or disregarded. The tendency among Protestant commentators, among whom are both intentional and nominal Protestants, has been case oriented as well, but without the resource of ecclesial canon or dicta.

There may be several reasons for the recent increase in serious and sustained scholarly attention to medicine and ethics: (1) increased governmental supervision of medical funding and practice following decrees by the Nuremberg Tribunal on human experimentation and other medical activities; (2) exponential advances in technologies of various sorts, but especially biomedical technologies; (3) the role of mass media in disseminating information on medical breakthroughs both large and small; (4) a decline in colonialism together with escalating competition among nations for technical achievement; and (5) increasing attention by government, the general public, and nonmedical academic specialists to the full range of issues in medical education, practice, and research. These and doubtless other developments in the last half of the twentieth century appear to have encouraged what has come to be an eruption of commentary, both verbal and written.

In the twentieth century, the first significant book by a Protestant theologian to address itself to ethical issues arising out of the practice of medicine was Joseph Fletcher’s Morals and Medicine (1954). Two other scholarly monographs appeared sixteen years later: Paul Ramsey’s (1913–1988) The Patient as Person and Harmon Smith’s (1930–) Ethics and the New Medicine (both 1970). In the decades after 1970, a deluge of articles, monographs, symposia, bibliographies, and dictionaries followed. Most prominent among the authors of these texts were religious ethicists, but there were increasingly others—philosophers, physicians, nurses, lawyers, political scientists, historians, and economists—who addressed themselves to burgeoning biomedical technology and changing medical practice. Today one must be acquainted with this wide range of commentary in order to be well-informed.

Some of these works were of general interest, treated many issues, and were frequently adopted as texts for emerging college and university courses. Among them are Edmund D. Pellegrino and David C. Thomasma, A Philosophical Basis of Medical Practice (1981); Robert M. Veatch, A Theory of Medical Ethics (1981); William F. May, The Physician's Covenant: Images of the Healer in Medical Ethics (1983); Thomas Beauchamp and James Childress, Principles of Bio-Medical Ethics (1983); Health and Human Values: A Guide to Making Your Own Decision (1983), edited by Frank Hanon, John Burnside, and Thomas Beauchamp; the multivolume report of the President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research (1983); and Leon Kass, Toward a More Natural Science (1985).

A number of essays and monographs appeared challenging traditional and conventional ways of dealing with medical ethics. Among these were Ivan Illich, Medical Nemesis: The Expropriation of Health (1976); H.T. Engelhardt, The Foundations of Bioethics (1986); Stanley Hauerwas, Suffering Presence: Theological Reflections on Medicine, the Church and the Mentally Handicapped (1986); and Harmon L. Smith and Larry R. Churchill, Professional Ethics and Primary Care Medicine: Beyond Dilemmas and Decorum (1986).

Other publications addressed particular topics and problem areas. Illustrative of these works are Robert F. Weir, Selective Nontreatment of Handicapped New-borns (1984); Karen Lebacqz, Genetics, Ethics and Parenthood (1983); Joel Feinberg, The Problem of Abortion (1984); Brian Clark's play, Whose Life Is It, Anyway (1980); Paul Starr, The Social Transformation of American Medicine (1982); and Larry Churchill, Rationing Health Care in America: Perceptions and Principles of Justice (1987).

Writings on medical ethics currently address every aspect of the practice of medicine, together with a broad range of commentary on ancillary matters related to the profession. The Encyclopedia of Bioethics (1982) is a standard reference. The Hastings Center Report (published by the Institute of Society, Ethics, and the Life Sciences), the Journal of Medical Ethics (published by the Society for the Study of Medical Ethics), Second Opinion (published by the Park Ridge Center for the Study of Health, Faith, and Ethics), the Journal of Medicine and Philosophy, and the Linacre Quarterly are among the best-known periodicals of this genre. In addition, The Kennedy Institute of Ethics at Georgetown University annually publishes a Bibliography of Bioethics, and the Hastings Center biannually produces a Bibliography of Ethics, Bio-medicine and Professional Responsibility. These bibliographies list not only entries on clinical topics from womb to tomb, but also inventories of a growing miscellany of monographs and symposia on issues extending from genetics and molecular biology to managed care to after death, out-of-body phenomena. There is, further, a growing list of publications addressing the infrastructure of the practice of medicine. These and other writings comprise a literature that appears in both the popular and professional press, and in other media as well, leaving no important issue unexamined.

Attempts to attribute the genesis of these diverse commentaries to either a single technical tour de force, such as cardiac homografts, or to a cluster of insistent events such as the allocation of a scarce, lifesaving resources, have been unconvincing. Very like its ancient history, medical ethics in the modern period has evolved from a constellation of events, some of which have to do with remarkable technical advances in medical and biomedical applications, and some of which have to do with the economic and political milieu within which modern medicine is practiced. The formative years appear to have been the two and one-half decades between the mid-1940s and the early 1980s.

In 1967 Colorado was the first state to revise its abortion statute to legalize abortions for the so-called maternal, fetal, and social indications. Several states followed suit before the U.S. Supreme Court, in its 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, provided abortion on request in the first and second trimesters and, with some state-imposed restrictions, in the third trimester. Artificial insemination issues arose in the late 1960s with several celebrated cases that challenged traditional notions about paternity, whether AID constituted adultery, and provoked child support litigation. In 1978 the first in vitro fertilization/embryo implantation baby was born. Systematic genetic screening for ethnic-specific populations, particularly for sickle-cell anemia among African Americans and Tay-Sachs disease among Ashkenazy Jews, was begun in the 1960s. After centuries of pronouncing death on the basis of cardiorespiratory criteria, the French Academy of Medicine proposed brain-function criteria in the late 1950s; the Beecher Committee refined those criteria in 1968, and in 1981 a presidential commission proposed a Uniform Definition of Death Act, which was endorsed by the American Bar Association, the American Medical Association, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. The new criteria provided that irreversible cessation of circulatory and respiratory functions, or irreversible cessation of all functions of the entire brain, were sufficient to pronounce a patient dead. In the mid-1970s the case of Karen Ann Quinlan was among the first to test the new brain death criteria. These were halcyon years.

Resident in distinct but related events are some of the controversial claims and counterclaims that gave rise to medical ethics. It became known in 1962, for example, that owing to an insufficient number of dialysis machines, candidates for chronic hemodialysis at Seattle's Artificial Kidney Center at Swedish Hospital were being selected on the basis of criteria that included social utility and were considerably broader than immediate and urgent patient need. Both professional and public response ranged from outrage to admiration. In retrospect, some have said that the committee, appointed by the county medical society and euphemistically known as the "God squad," was making life and death decisions for patients that they had no moral right to make. Others have maintained that, in view of many claims upon only a few machines, the committee was performing a responsible and unavoidable, however onerous, civic duty to both the individual candidates for dialysis and the larger society. Because Belden Scriber's invention in the 1960s of the arteriovenous shunt made chronic dialysis for renal failure a much less hazardous and far more patient-friendly clinical option, this event is seen by some to have triggered, for both the public and the professions, the increased interest in medical ethics.

Willem Kolff reported development of the first successful renal dialysis machine in 1944, but the broad moral issues regarding its availability and the clinical need for it did not arise until the 1960s, when it became clear that renal dialysis was a scarce, lifesaving resource and that more patients required dialysis than there were machines to serve them. Ultimately, the United States Congress was willing to allocate sufficient funding to guarantee dialysis to every citizen who qualified for it.

These developments laid the groundwork for the dramatic first successful renal homograft between identical twins performed by Joseph Murray and his team at Boston's Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in 1954. This surgical transplant was not only a breakthrough in biomedical technology, but a harbinger of serious moral issues: in this instance, whether it is ever right or proper to take a normal organ from a healthy person for replacement of a diseased organ in a sick person. Many believed that this procedure violated the ancient maxim that authorized intervention is only for the benefit of the primary patient.

There were, in fact, many noteworthy and morally provocative events preceding the Seattle quandary. In the early 1940s, treating World War II burn victims and building on the earlier work of Emile Holman, which showed that an immune process of some sort was at work in rejecting skin grafts, Peter Medawar confirmed Holman's hypothesis and demonstrated that the process could be inverted by injecting foreign cells into very young animals who then acquired tolerance for "foreign" grafts without rejecting them. Theoretically, human embryos could also become histocompatible with the donors of injected cells; and cyclosporine and other immunosuppressive drugs used in later tissue and organ transplantation would thus have been unneeded had donor and recipient exchanged histocompatible tissue or organs. Such a move was morally repulsive to Medawar, but there is no evidence that his decision not to demonstrate this hypothesis in human subjects generated much public or professional attention. Unlike later decisions by some hospitals not to admit and treat indigent patients, Medawar's choice clearly did not create an ethical cause célèbre.

Methodologies of Medical Ethics

Contemporary writings on medical ethics range from descriptive studies to ideologic advocacy, and the case study method is overwhelmingly popular. Narrative and literature studies have recently provided an innovative tool for both teaching and problem solving. Overall, contemporary medical ethics prefers an ethics of duty and obligation, which is called deontology, to an ethics of goals and ends, or teleology; indeed both the practice and research interests of medicine are sometimes criticized for not having a discrete and robust goal. Moreover, rejecting the older medical paternalism and reflecting increasingly popular consumer advocacy, utilitarian principles frequently claim the center of attention in current monographs, with little or no attention given to an exposition of the character requisite to being a good physician. The stress on decision procedures and utilitarian principles tends to eschew and avoid the complexity of physician self-perceptions, professional loyalties, and the subtle influences of habits of practice that have been historically at the core of medical ethics. Fear of malpractice litigation has further contributed to increasing substitution of computer and other electronic and mechanical analyses for clinical judgment. The hospital, not the bedside in a home, has come to be the principal site of care.

Whether medical ethics is a species of ethics or a genus unto itself remains an unresolved question. The greater weight of the evidence suggests that what is unique about the moral deliberations that occur within the context of medicine are data, not agreed-upon ethical principles and virtues. Ethics derives from the Greek ἠθός and morals from the Latin mores, both of which signified expected, routine, and conventional behavior. In late medieval universities, ethics came to be the study of character and virtue, of the theory of good behavior, while morals came to be the study of proper conduct, of the practice of behavior. That distinction, between an accurate description of behavior and a rational account of why it was appropriate behavior, was initiated in order to bring rationality to conduct, but rationality in modernity is elusive owing to emphasis on individual autonomy and the absence of shared intellectual and moral commitments.

Because the topics associated with medical ethics were foreign to most academic departments—philosophy departments, for example, were largely preoccupied with existentialism and formal criticism of language—most of the earlier twentieth-century commentary on medical ethics was provided by theologians and theological ethicists. It became quickly apparent, however, that for medical ethics (or bioethics or biomedical ethics) to survive and succeed in a pluralistic and increasingly secularized culture, religious/theological language would need to be superseded and replaced by a cultural speech independent of religion, and that the cherished American virtues of autonomy and private conscience could not be violated, even under the rubric of “the common good.” Attention turned, quite naturally therefore, from pre-occupation with a virtuous character to concerns for public policy and law, with the result that medical ethics, as practiced, has tended more and more to locate its raison d'être in regulations and regulatory agencies like institutional review boards and ethics advisory committees.

Among all the species, it was believed that the human species has the unique capacity to give an intelligible account of its behavior. The task of ethics was therefore to assess the congruence or incongruence, the coherence or incoherence, of behavior when measured by belief, or of belief when gauged by behavior. So ethics as ethics is not concerned with codifying behavior, or defining right and wrong conduct; its task instead is to articulate what William Temple called “basic commitments,” the beliefs and virtues that describe the character of persons. This method has been largely abandoned in contemporary discussions of medical ethics, and appeal to regulations of various sorts has taken its place.

Herein lie the grounds for an internal debate among medical ethicists: has the shift from decorum and internal conversation to publicly examined decision making been serviceable to either physicians or their patients? Should the subject matter of their consultations be entirely rule governed? Are our choices always principled? Is decision making the sine qua non of ethics? Is the democratization of medical decision making as common public property a good thing? Is there a place between physician and patient in medical ethics for character and relationship? Has the fiduciary relationship been sacrificed to a business model?

References and Further Reading

- “BioethicsLine,” the National Library of Medicine Data Base. Duncan, A.S. Dictionary of Ethics. New York: Crossroads, 1981.
- Numbers, R.L., and D.W. Amundsen, eds. Caring and Curing: Health and Medicine in the Western Religious Traditions. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- President’s Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine and Biomedical and Behavioral Research. Five reports with appendices. Washington, D.C., 1981–1983.
- Social Science and Medicine*. Pergamon Journals Ltd.
- Update*. Loma Linda University Center for Christian Bioethics. 1985ff.
- Trends in Health Care, Law and Ethics* (previously Info Trends: Medicine, Law & Ethics). UMDNJ-Robert Wood Johnson Medical School.

HARMON L. SMITH

ETHNICITY

Protestant churches are often rooted in ethnic communities but confess faith in the oneness of Christ's CHURCH, which transcends all divisions.

Definition

The Greek roots ethnikos and ethnos refer to a people or a nation. However, although ethnicity is closely related to national identity, the two are not synonymous. Some modern nation states have a high degree of ethnic homogeneity, but others contain a large number of ethnic groups. These are sometimes distinguished by language, but a sense of shared CULTURE and history can be sufficient to form a strong sense of ethnic identity. Religious profession is often one of the unifying features of an ethnic community. Through their ethnicity, people celebrate the particularity and diversity of human life. However, ethnic identity can also be evoked ideologically to mobilize a community for political or military action. Its dark side can be seen, for example, in racism and ethnic cleansing.

Protestant Churches and Ethnic Identity

Since the day of Pentecost, the Christian church has been called to transcend all barriers of language, nationality, and ethnicity. The Latin Mass of the medieval church was a powerful symbol of unity throughout Western Europe. The sixteenth-century REFORMATION appeared to disrupt this unity, first by promoting WORSHIP in the vernacular and second by organizing the church on a national basis. The principle of cuius regio eius religio ("whose region his the religion") ensured that the Protestant faith came to be identified with particular territories and peoples. To its critics, the Reformation had fragmented the church into a miscellany of ethnic religious movements.

Its defenders were at pains to stress that shared DOCTRINE and common practice expressed the unity of the church even when it was organized on national lines. Nevertheless the danger remained that the Protestant churches might be compromised by their close identification with particular nations and/or ethnic communities. As Christianity developed in North America, most immigrants adhered to the church that most closely corresponded to their ethnic origins in Europe. When the Protestant faith was taken to other parts of the world through missionary work (see MISSIONS), it tended to replicate the ethnically based divisions of the North Atlantic. These were reinforced by comity agreements, which divided territory geographically among the various missions. The result was often a series of ethnically homogeneous Protestant churches, a pattern favorable to church growth. “Indigenous principles,” wrote Donald McGavran, “lead Christians to go to their own folk, to their kith and kin, and thus to grow among their own kind of people....Men like to become Christians without crossing racial, linguistic or class barriers.” (McGavran 1970:350)

Ethnicity and the One Church of Jesus Christ

The church’s mission constantly drives it to become fully local, rooted in the native soil of each particular community. The dynamic of the incarnation means that the church grows as Christ comes to be at home in each culture. Yet this process carries the danger that Christian FAITH becomes so bound up with the interests of an ethnic group that it is easily compromised. The church can lose all critical distance from the culture in which it is set. It can put up barriers that divide it from sister churches even in the same locality. When this happens, the church needs to recover its catholic or universal character. Protestant faith requires the dialectic of affirming national and ethnic identity as the sphere within which Christ becomes known and enfleshed, while always relativizing ethnicity by pointing to its destiny in the wider purpose of God that embraces all peoples in and through Jesus Christ.

A definitive moment in the clarification of this issue came in GERMANY in the 1930s. The GERMAN CHRISTIANS argued that their ethnic and national identity was an order of creation granted by God and gave their support to Adolf Hitler’s National Socialism. The minority CONFESSING CHURCH argued that the church is constituted by hearing the Word of God—Jesus Christ—and found therein a basis for questioning Hitler’s program. Through the BARMEN DECLARATION of 1934, they affirmed the finality of the unity of the church in Jesus Christ.

SOUTH AFRICA’S apartheid system was decisively challenged in 1982 at Ottawa when the General Council of the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES affirmed that “the Gospel of Jesus Christ demands... a community of believers which transcends all barriers of race—a community in which the love for Christ and for one another has overcome the divisions of race and colour.” Apartheid in South Africa was declared to be a HERESY. It was made clear that ethnic identity, however its richness may be cherished, can never be accorded a place of ultimacy in the life of the church.

In the post-Cold War age of ethnically based conflict, the church has an urgent obligation to demonstrate the reconciliation brought by Jesus Christ. Protestant churches need to be on guard lest they be coopted by an ethnic group and reduced to functioning as a tribal religion. The migration of people groups into urban melting pots brings anew the question of whether their faith is primarily an expression of ethnic identity or whether they belong primarily to a global community of faith. Protestant faith affirms the integrity of national and ethnic identities but always deabsolutizes them and makes clear that belonging together in Christ transcends all ethnic differences among people.

References and Further Reading

- Appleby, R.Scott. The Ambivalence of the Sacred: Religion, Violence and Reconciliation. Lanham and Oxford, UK: Rowman and Littlefield, 2000.
- Cochrane, Arthur C. The Church's Confession Under Hitler, Pittsburgh, PA: The Pickwick Press, 1976.
- De Gruchy, John W., and Charles Villa-Vicencio. Apartheid is a Heresy. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983.
- Gonzales, Justo L. Out of Every Tribe and Nation: Christian Theology at the Ethnic Roundtable. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1992.
- McGavran, Donald A. Understanding Church Growth, Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1970.
- Volf, Miroslav. Exclusion and Embrace: A Theological Exploration of Identity, Otherness and Reconciliation. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1996.
- Walls, Andrew F. The Missionary Movement in Christian History: Studies in the Transmission of Faith. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1996.

KENNETH R.ROSS

EUCHARIST

See Lord's Supper

EUTHANASIA

The term euthanasia (literally “good” or “gentle” death or “dying well”) covers a wide range of issues, depending on whether the patient is conscious/competent and/or whether the physician’s conduct is active or passive. Many people distinguish simply between voluntary euthanasia (where a competent, informed person asks another to end his or her life and is not coerced into doing so) and involuntary euthanasia (where a terminally ill person, who does not have the capacity for informed choice, is killed). Because many believe that the person taking the life should be a trained physician, voluntary euthanasia is increasingly termed “physician-assisted suicide.”

However, there are other acts or omissions that may also be seen as forms of euthanasia. A physician may withdraw treatment or medical intervention knowing that this will shorten a comatose patient’s life. Or a conscious patient may refuse life-sustaining treatment even though the physician is willing to continue treatment. Or, again, a patient might leave a Living Will to the effect that he or she does not wish to be treated in the event of serious illness. Given this wide range of possibilities very few people remain wholly for or against every form of euthanasia. Even among advocates of “direct” or “active” euthanasia few recommend that the lives of all of those who are permanently comatose or have severe learning disabilities should be actively terminated.

Among Christians there is no unanimity on euthanasia. On this ethical issue, as on many others, there is a range of beliefs across denominations and within denominations. Even when a particular church takes a firm line against, say, physician-assisted suicide, some of its regular churchgoers will conclude otherwise.

This can be illustrated from opinion poll data. For example, data from British Social Attitudes surveys suggested that most people, including many churchgoers, increasingly support changes in the law that would allow physician-assisted suicide for the terminally ill. Seventy-six percent of the whole sample in the 1980s were in favor of this being allowed for the terminally ill and in the 1990s this rose to 82 percent. Support among monthly churchgoers across denominations during these two decades differed little from the sample as a whole—it was 72 and 84 percent, respectively. It was only among weekly churchgoers that a statistically significant difference emerged, with support at 48 and 45 percent, respectively. Among Anglican weekly churchgoers in the 1980s support rose to 66 percent. Clearest opposition to this form of euthanasia was among Roman Catholic weekly churchgoers: here only 39 percent supported it, although among monthly attenders this rose to 75 percent. Age was not a strong predictor of different attitudes.

Even a 1990s question about allowing for euthanasia for those who are simply tired of living showed that 6 percent of weekly churchgoers, as distinct from 12 percent of the sample as a whole, agreed to this.

From a theological perspective it might once have been sufficient simply to argue that human life is God-given and should never be taken by human beings outside a context of a just war or just punishment. However, the dilemmas created by modern medicine seem to make such a clear-cut position increasingly difficult to hold. Is withdrawing life-sustaining medical treatment or intensive nursing care from a patient whose cortex is destroyed tantamount to euthanasia or not? Is withholding life-prolonging treatment with the agreement of conscious but terminally ill patients tantamount to assisted suicide or not? Modern medicine makes such questions unavoidable.

It is often argued by theologians in this context that human life is a gift, a gift from a loving God made known in Jesus Christ. The analogy of the gift relationship finds its foundation in God's gift of the Logos and continues in the Logos's gift of life to us. We in turn should respond to this gift with gratitude, thanksgiving, and deep responsibility. In contrast, those who lack this faith may see human life, not as a gracious gift, but as a chance by-product of a world that has meaning only if we choose to give it meaning. In theory at least, this second position allows human beings to shape human life as they will. If people decide to opt for euthanasia then that is their autonomous choice: life can be shaped as they will. Conversely, for Christians life is God-given and is not simply to be shaped by humans as they will, but to be approached gratefully and responsibly.

Yet in the context of modern medicine the contrast between these two positions is not nearly so clear-cut. Christian doctors, committed to the belief that life is God-given, still face the same dilemmas about prolonging the lives of the terminally ill or permanently comatose. Gift relationships are by no means all gracious—some can be highly manipulative, especially the required gifts of submission. Gracious gifts should be treated with gratitude and responsibility, but they may not bind the one to whom they are given—it is manipulative gifts that do that. Gracious gifts can be enjoyed for a while and then shared with, or even returned with gratitude to, the giver. Gracious gifts leave both giver and receiver free. Indeed when God-given life becomes nothing but a burden, it might seem appropriate to return that life prayerfully and humbly to the giver.

The 1998 LAMBETH CONFERENCE of Anglican Bishops identified five “bedrock principles” that are crucial to these issues from a Christian perspective:

Life is God-given and therefore has intrinsic sanctity, significance, and worth.

Human beings are in relationship with the created order and that relationship is characterized by such words as respect, enjoyment, and responsibility.

Human beings, although flawed by sin, nevertheless have the capacity to make free and responsible moral choices.

Human meaning and purpose are found in our relationship with God, in the exercise of freedom, critical self-knowledge, and in our relationship with one another and the wider community.

This life is not the sum total of human existence; we find our ultimate fulfillment in eternity with God through Christ.

The bishops argued that a combination of the first, second, and fourth principles precludes either voluntary euthanasia or involuntary euthanasia. They also worried about the consequential dangers of legalizing such forms of euthanasia—especially the danger of abuse, the danger of diminution of respect for human life, and the danger of damaging the doctor/patient relationship. They summarized the dangers as follows:

- the virtual impossibility of framing and implementing legislation that would prevent abuse by the unscrupulous
- a diminution of respect for all human life, especially of the marginalized and those who may be regarded as “unproductive” members of society
- the potential devaluing of worth, in their own eyes, of the elderly, the sick, and of those who are dependent on others for their well-being
- the potential destruction of the important and delicate trust of the doctor/patient relationship

However, they argued that the following are consonant with their Christian principles:

- To withhold or withdraw excessive medical treatment or intervention (e.g., life support) may be appropriate where there is no reasonable prospect of recovery.
- When the primary intent is to relieve suffering and not to bring about death, to provide supportive care for the alleviation of intolerable pain and suffering may be appropriate even if the side effect of that care is to hasten the dying process (i.e., the doctrine of double effect).
- To refuse or terminate medical treatment (such as declining to undertake a course of chemotherapy for cancer) is a legitimate individual moral choice.
- When the person is in a permanent vegetative state to sustain him or her with artificial nutrition and hydration may indeed be seen as constituting medical intervention.

See also Ethics; Ethics, Medical

References and Further Reading

“Euthanasia.” Studies in Christian Ethics 11 no. 1 (1998): Special edition.

Gill, Robin, ed. Euthanasia and the Churches. London: Cassell, 1998.

The Lambeth Conference 1998: The Reports, Resolutions and Pastoral Letters from the Bishops. London: The Anglican Consultative Council, 1998.

ROBIN GILL

EVANGELICAL (EVANGELISCH)

The term is derived from the Greek euangelium (“good news”, i.e. the “good news” of the gospel) and came into widespread usage in the German Reformation. The German equivalent, “evangelisch” used both as noun and adjective became quickly the self-designation for the supporters of the MARTIN LUTHER, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, and the other reformers. The usage of the term thus preceded the introduction of the terms “Lutheran,” “Calvinist,” or “Mennonite”, which came into usage from the middle of the sixteenth century onward when ecclesiastical boundaries needed to be defined more sharply. “Evangelisch” was, from the beginning, an umbrella term, denoting all those who were partisans of the Reformation. In that sense, the Calvinist churches could be labeled “evangelisch” (evangelical).

In German language usage, the term continues to be used into the present. In popular usage it is considered a synonym for both “Lutheran” and “Protestant”, a practice which is understandable in light of the fact that the overwhelming majority of German Protestants are Lu-theran. Ther term is not to be understood in a theological, but an ecclesiastical sense. Accordingly, German usage speaks of the “evangelische” church and what is meant thereby is not what in American usage would be an “evangelical church”, i.e. a theologically conservative church but rather a “Protestant”, and generally Lutheran church. More precisely, the term “evangelisch” denotes the churches of the PRUSSIAN UNION, while the explicitly Lutheran churches in Germany have the designation “evangelisch-lutherisch” (evangelical-Lutheran) churches.

References and Further Reading

Schuch, Martin. Evangelisch-Katholisch. Gütersloh: Güterslo-her Verlagshaus Gerd Mohn, 2001.
HANS J.HILLERBRAND

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE

This English movement had its origin in the middle of the nineteenth century, when a number of clergy became concerned about the increasing influence and impact of the Oxford Movement effort to define the Anglican Church as catholic. A gathering in London in 1846, attended by hundreds of clergy from several countries, marked the official establishment of the Evangelical Alliance. Its goals were the “advancement of evangelical Protestantism,” which entailed the objective of affirming traditional, conservative theology in the Protestant mode. The objectives of the Alliance also spelled out the opposition to “infidelity, popery, and other forms of superstition, error, and profanes, especially the desecration of the Lord’s Day.”

The movement quickly took root in several European countries and the United States as it became clear that the goals of the movement were to affirm the common belief of Protestant Christians, while understanding and deploring the divisions within Christendom. In a way, the Alliance may be considered the forerunner of the various ecumenical efforts of the twentieth century in that its underlying premise was the notion that the challenges of modernity, such as the disregard of the Lord’s Day, could be best dealt with in concord among the various Protestant groupings.

References and Further Reading

Church Unity and Intercession. London: Evangelical Alliance, 1912.

Jordan, Philip D. The Evangelical Alliance for the United States of America, 1847–1900:

Ecumenism, Identity, and the Religion of the Republic. New York: E.Mellen Press, c1982.

Railton, Nicholas M. No North Sea: the Anglo-German Evangelical Network in the Middle of the Nineteenth Century. Leiden: Brill, 2000.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH

The Evangelical and Reformed Church (E & R Church), although in existence for only twenty-three years, exemplified the church union and ecumenical discourse (see ECUMENISM) prevalent in early twentieth-century Protestantism. The church came into existence when union discussions between several denominations resulted in the uniting of two of those denominations, the Reformed Church in the United States and the Evangelical Synod of North America. It ceased to exist as a DENOMINATION because of another church union agreement, uniting the Evangelical and Reformed Church with the Congregational Christian Churches to form the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST. The union process that created the E & R Church was distinctive among the many church mergers and unions that occurred worldwide during the first part of the twentieth century because that union was based on the assumption of a common faith and belief within the merging churches. Institutional form and procedure were deemed secondary issues to be addressed once the union was enacted. They would be discerned according to God's leading and to fit the context of the church at the time.

Union Creates Evangelical and Reformed Church

Church union was facilitated by the fact that both the Evangelical and the Reformed churches had roots in German Protestantism. As immigrants from GERMANY and SWITZERLAND came to America they founded congregations where they settled, the Reformed immigrants largely in the Central Atlantic region and those who would create the Evangelical church in the Mid-west. Eventually, the congregations within each of these traditions joined together and new denominations were founded. The SYNOD of the German Reformed Church in the United States of America was created in 1793, nearly a century after the first German Reformed congregations were gathered. Mirroring the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Prussia (see PRUSSIAN UNION), pastors of Lutheran and Reformed traditions in the UNITED STATES met in St. Louis, Missouri in 1840 to found the German Evangelical Church Society of the West, the first united church in U.S. history.

Both churches grew in number and expanded geographically, although they remained largely regional institutions. As they grew, each church changed its name to reflect its broader membership. Thus, by the beginning of the twentieth century, it was the Evangelical Synod of North America and the Reformed Church in the United States that began to discuss church union. By 1918 the Reformed Church had developed a plan for uniting all churches in the Reformed tradition. In 1925 the Evangelical church began official negotiations with other denominations toward organic union. Although other Reformed denominations, such as the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA and the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA, were a part of initial discussions, the final parties in the negotiations were the Evangelical Synod of North America and the Reformed Church in the United States. After six years of negotiating, a Plan of Union was approved by the Reformed church in 1932–1933 and the Evangelical church in 1933. On June 26, 1934, a union celebration was held and the Evangelical and Reformed Church officially came into existence.

The Plan of Union, the document in church mergers that usually spells out both the ideological terms of the agreement and the mechanics of the process, was unique. It emphasized faith and common belief as the basis for union. The institutional nature of the church was left to be worked out after the union. Protestantism had been created upon and distinguished by concern for doctrinal points and church governance. In the Evangelical and Reformed merger, however, a common faith and belief were assumed. No single statement of faith or creed was designated as authoritative in E & R churches, although all of the historic creeds of both churches were recognized as important, such as the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and HEIDELBERG CATECHISM. Emphasis was placed on looking to the Scriptures first to define Christian faith and life, and to the creeds secondarily. In both it was acknowledged that individual interpretation was appropriate and would create a range of understandings.

Once the union was enacted a committee was created to write a constitution for the new church, including a definition of its form of government. Because the polities, the governmental forms, of the two merging churches were quite different (the Evangelical church being more centralized and the Reformed church based more on congregational autonomy), it was not an easy process. After four years a hybrid polity combining some presbyterian traits and some congregational traits was agreed upon. The Constitution and bylaws were adopted in 1938 and took effect in 1940.

Union Dissolves the E & R Church

In spite of its short existence the Evangelical and Reformed church contributed in several other ways to American Protestantism. It provided several prominent twentieth-century theologians including H. RICHARD NIEBUHR, REINHOLD NIEBUHR, and PAUL TILLICH. The church cooperated ecumenically with other denominations in mission work, PUBLISHING, and further church union discussions. Even before the Constitution for the E & R Church was approved, church leaders began union discussions with leaders of the Congregational Christian Churches. In 1942 a public announcement of the discussions was made and a proposal for union was approved by both church bodies. Between 1943 and 1949 the Basis for Union underwent ten revisions. Union was initially planned for 1950, but lingering concerns within some of the Congregational Christian Churches delayed the union celebration until 1957. In June of 1957, twenty-three years after the Evangelical and Reformed Church came into existence, it ceased to exist when, in following the prayer of Jesus “that they may all be one” (John 17:22), the E & R Church merged with the Congregational Christian Churches to form the United Church of Christ.

See also Congregationalism; Lutheranism; Mercersburg Theology; Polity; Presbyterianism; Schaff, Philip

References and Further Reading

Dunn, David, ed. A History of the Evangelical and Reformed Church. New York: The Pilgrim Press, 1990.

Gunnemann, Louis H. The Shaping of the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 1977.

Hilke, Elisabeth Slaughter, ed. Growing Toward Unity. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim Press, 2001.

Keiling, Hanns Peter, and Ford L. Battles, eds. The Formation of the United Church of Christ (U.S.A.). Pittsburgh, PA: Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, 1970.

“Short History Course.” May be accessed at <http://www.%20ucc.org/aboutus/shortcourse/index.html>

DEBRA L. DUKE

EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA

The Evangelical Free Church of America (EFCA) was the result of the merger of two FREE CHURCH organizations in 1950. Born out of the nineteenth-century “evangelical” REVIVALS in northwest Europe, which resulted in organizations separate from the Lutheran church, immigrants to the UNITED STATES from these groups established a number of independent congregations. In 1884 one group of Swedish congregations formed a loose association in Iowa, named the Swedish Evangelical Free Church. A second group of Danish and Norwegian congregations formally organized into the Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Free Church in 1909. In June 1950 these two groups, representing 275 local congregations, formally merged at the Medicine Lake Conference Grounds near Minneapolis, Minnesota, becoming the Evangelical Free Church of America. The EFCA international headquarters have remained in Minneapolis since then.

The denomination’s governing structure is congregational, where each local congregation largely governs its own affairs independently. National and international organization, however, was created to manage certain cooperative endeavors, such as MIS-SIONS. There is an annual meeting where representatives from each congregation are sent to supervise these endeavors. The DENOMINATION of approximately 1,250 congregations, two universities, and a seminary is divided into twenty-two districts, each managed by a district superintendent and district leadership team. From the CLERGY membership, a president is elected to serve the denomination’s national activities, preserve its values, and create stronger unity.

Although every congregation is largely independent in its business and ministry, a change that occurred with the 1950 merger was the introduction of a twelve-point doctrinal statement that is now incorporated into each local congregation’s constitution. Evidence of the influence of the post-fundamentalist evangelical movement is witnessed in the EFCA statement of beliefs, including clear Trinitarian affirmations, belief in ATONEMENT through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ, assertion of the BIBLE being authoritative and inerrant (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY), original SIN, the second coming of Christ and human resurrection.

The EFCA has influence greater than its size in American EVANGELICALISM. First, it supports more than 500 missionaries in Asia, Europe, and LATIN AMERICA. Second, it holds membership in the World Evangelical Alliance and the International Federation of Free Evangelical Churches, two organizations that provide leadership to millions of evangelicals worldwide. Third, and most important, the EFCA maintains a seminary and two interdenominational universities in North America: Trinity Evangelical Divinity School and Trinity International University in Illinois, along with Trinity Western University in British Columbia, CANADA. Graduates from these schools have populated leadership positions in every evangelical-oriented denomination in North America.

References and Further Reading

- “About Us-History.” Evangelical Free Church of America. 2000. <http://www.efca.org/history.html> (April 6, 2003).
- Melton, J.Gordon, and Martin Baumann, eds. “Evangelical Free Church of America.” In Religions of the World. vol. 2 , 469. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Norton, W.Wilbert, et al. The Diamond Jubilee Story of the Evangelical Free Church of America. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1959.
- Olson, Arnold Theodore. Believers Only. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1964.
- . Stumbling toward Maturity. Minneapolis, MN: Free Church Publications, 1981.

H.CHAD HILLIER

THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

Originating in a 1988 merger of three previous church bodies, at the turn of the twenty-first century the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA) included some 5.1 million baptized members, making it the largest Lutheran DENOMINATION in the UNITED STATES. Slightly less than half of these numbers participate in the sacrament of Holy Communion (see LORD'S SUPPER) or contribute financially, considered marks of active membership. About 30 percent, something more than 1.5 million people, attend weekly worship services.

Approximately 10,800 congregations served by some 17,500 pastors, almost 2,000 of whom are WOMEN, provide WORSHIP as well as a range of other services. There are also somewhat more than 1,000 associates in ministry working at various levels of assistance. The congregations in turn support sixtyfive geographical synods, the largest of them in North-eastern Pennsylvania and in Minneapolis, reflecting regional concentrations in the Northeast and the Mid-west. A church-wide assembly meets every other year. The national offices are located in Chicago.

Historically, the Lutherans who formed the ELCA have put particular emphasis on four areas. One of these areas is world mission (see MISSIONS). Although the numbers have declined significantly since the merger, in 2000 there were still some 300 missionaries serving in forty-five countries around the world, with concentrations in sub-Saharan Africa and New Guinea. Another area of emphasis has been HIGHER EDUCATION. Eight SEMINARIES prepare pastors for the CHURCH; in addition, there are twenty-eight affiliated colleges and universities distributed across the country. The best known include Gettysburg College, Wittenberg University, and St. Olaf's College. A third area of emphasis is CHAPLAINCY, with more than 850 chaplains in the armed forces, another 125 and additional staff serving more than 200 state and private colleges and universities, and roughly 800 providing special ministries in counseling, prisons, and the like.

A fourth area of special emphasis in the ELCA has been social service. Earlier generations of Lutherans were among the leaders in providing for orphans and the elderly; in the 1970s, they owned more than one-third of the nation's nursing home beds, along with some notable hospitals. Lutheran Social Services, organized by state, usually but not always under that name, is one of the largest nongovernmental agencies in the nation. It continues the work with children and the aging, but also provides a broad range of counseling help and related assistance.

Lutheran World Relief (LWR), jointly funded by the ELCA and the LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD (LC-MS), provides for international services such as development and disaster assistance. It has been noted for its effectiveness around the world, generally being among the first church agencies contacted in crises. ELCA funds for LWR are contributed out of the World Hunger Appeal, a long-standing enterprise with some $16 million worth of contributions in 2000.

Since the breakthroughs of the 1960s, the Lutherans who eventually formed the ELCA have been active in ecumenical relations both nationally and internationally. Lutheranism's sixteenth-century origins in Roman Catholicism have given a strong priority to improved relations in this connection. The Lutheran-Catholic Dialogues were particularly noteworthy. They included representatives from the churches that merged to form the ELCA with those of the LC-MS in conversation with American Roman Catholic theologians. More recently, the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification approved by the ELCA, other European Lutherans, and (in a qualified way) the Vatican is said to have achieved new levels of reconciliation. The ELCA has also entered into substantial ecumenical agreements with Episcopalians, Reformed, Moravians, and others. It has solidified relations in its own tradition through the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION.

Governance

A generation ago, Sidney Earl Meade pointed to an axiomatic difference in American Christianity. In Europe, the church has been able to rely on the coercive power of the state to maintain itself financially and otherwise; in the United States, the disestablishment clause of the Constitution has limited the church's power to persuasion. This has inevitably tipped American church governance in the direction of congregationalism, in which the membership holds the last word.

Unlike other sixteenth-century reformers, MARTIN LUTHER and the others associated with the beginnings of LUTHERANISM did not propose an ideal church structure. Some of the original Lutheran documents are explicitly congregational; some are at least tacitly hierarchical. Traditionally, governance has been an issue in which Lutherans have agreed to disagree. The churches uniting in the ELCA had their own traditions; concerns about a looming hierarchicalism delayed the merger and occasioned the first major conflict.

As in other American churches, the congregations provide the basic unit of governance. Some are small, struggling to maintain membership in the aftermath of population shifts that have isolated them in inner cities, small towns, and open countryside. Other congregations are extraordinarily large, particularly in metropolitan areas, with memberships of 5,000 to 7,000. Small or large, maintaining their communities, the congregations call pastors and provide the church's funding, a total of more than $2.3 billion in 2000 (a contribution of something over $500 per communing member).

Thus dependent on the congregations, the ELCA was designed to provide some independence for other layers of authority. This has been difficult for the CLERGY. Pastors, whose responsibilities are defined by PREACHING and administering the SACRAMENTS, learn quickly the importance of responsiveness. The bishops have some constitutional authority in the calling and discipline of parish pastors, but soon learn the perils of acting without congregational support (see BISHOPS AND EPISCOPACY).

There has been relatively more success in efforts to protect other layers of structure, with provisions to give some independence to the SYNODS and the national church. The synods are the next governmental step after the congregations. They provide assistance to the local parishes through the bishops, who are elected to six-year terms, and synodical staff. They in turn pass along a portion of the funding that they receive from the congregations to the national church, termed the “churchwide.” The churchwide is responsible for providing leadership in matters such as world mission, outreach, theological education and ministry (see EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: UNITED STATES), social statements, relations with the colleges and universities, and gender- and age-specific ministries. Church-wide assemblies and the church council, which represents the assemblies between meetings, establish policies for the national church. The presiding bishop is chief executive officer of the churchwide offices, and represents the ELCA nationally and internationally. The Conference of Bishops meets twice yearly, providing advice and support.

The traditional American Lutheran ambivalence on AUTHORITY is most evident in the office of bishop. The bishops are the first source of assistance when congregations are seeking pastors or experiencing conflict. (An estimated 40 percent of the parishes were in contention at the turn of the century.) But with this, the bishops’ authority has been limited to basically that of advice and consent.

Called to Common Mission (CCM), an agreement with the Episcopal Church, USA, brought the ambivalence about church governance in the ELCA to a head. Traditionally, Lutherans have asserted their connection to the apostolic church of the New Testament through the confession of that Word preached in the New Testament and by the Lutheran reformers. In the Denver Assembly of the ELCA, the church voted to accept apostolic succession through the historic episcopate, which claims connection to the church of the apostles through the office of bishop. Approximately one-third of the ELCA’s membership objected to the CCM and similar efforts, seeing evidence of a growing hierarchicalism. The result was the largest conflict since the merger.

History

Lutheranism came to North America with waves of immigrants from GERMANY and the Scandinavian counties. Consequently, it reflects its European origins even as it has become an American DENOMINATION, showing evidence of the power of the “melting pot.” Lutherans began arriving in North America well before the founding of the American republic; there are seventeenth- and early eighteenth-century congregations in New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and the Virgin Islands. The heaviest immigrations began in the early nineteenth century with Germans who settled in Pennsylvania and other Eastern and Southeastern states, and ended with the Scandinavians, who continued to arrive primarily in the Midwest until the 1920s. In Minnesota, the Dakotas, and some other regions, Lutheran grandchildren of the most recent immigrants—German Russians, Norwegians, Swedes, and Finns—still identify with their ethnic origins.

Like others, Lutheran immigrants generally sought to perpetuate forms familiar from their native lands. Initially, the linguistic groups divided along lines that reflected matters of contention at home. The farmers and laborers who made up the bulk of the immigrants had been strongly affected by the PIETISM of Lutheran revival movements that had swept the state churches (see REVIVALISM). Middle- and upper-class immigrants, generally sent by the European churches or immigrating themselves with traditions of leadership, usually reflected more self-consciously Lutheran forms of THEOLOGY and practice. The obstacles to unity posed by these divisions were largely overcome by the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, when the linguistic groups merged to form ethnic churches (see ETHNICITY).

Lutheran immigrants brought their heritage to America in the Scriptures, the Lutheran Confessions, and their hymnals (see CONFESSIO; HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The confessions, a collection of documents that include Luther's CATECHISMS and the AUGSBURG CONFESSIO, have been considered definitive of Lutheran ism. Centered around the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by FAITH alone, they provided a framework for interpreting the new situation in America.

Immersing a European confessional tradition in the American melting pot proved a corrosive process for each wave of immigrants, eating away at already present conflicts, opening up issues with those who had arrived earlier and were already adapting. INDIVIDUALISM, a pervasive Protestantism shaped by revivalism, along with the progressivism of the American people, were some of the major challenges. Some Lutherans, notably the LC-MS and related groups, sought to protect against the confessional tradition by enclosing theologically. The ELCA brought together Lutherans who had, to varying degrees, sought to hold their Lutheranism in a critical conversation with American CULTURE, taking on its challenges.

World War II brought decisive changes for American Lutherans. Within a few years, ethnic Lutherans completed their linguistic transitions. The postwar economy along with the MASS MEDIA broke through Lutheran isolation. Traditional barriers broken, the first multi-ethnic mergers of Lutherans occurred with the AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH (ALC) in 1960 and the LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (LCA) in 1962. Cooperative work between the ALC and the LCA and, to a lesser extent, with the LC-MS, raised some hopes during the 1960s that Lutherans in America would finally be able to unite in one church. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, citing matters of biblical and confessional authority, the LC-MS began to pull back within itself. A split-off group, eventually calling itself the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in America, broke away from the LC-MS in 1976, and took a lead in merger talks between the ALC and the LCA.

In 1982, conventions of the three church bodies, listening to one another by phone hookups, voted simultaneously to form a new church. Further enriching the alphabet soup, the Commission on the New Lutheran Church (CNLC) was formed. It negotiated terms of the merger, among other things establishing a system of GENDER and racial quotas for leadership positions in hopes of opening the ELCA to the wider culture. On January 1, 1988, the new church legally succeeded its predecessor bodies.

A number of key people contributed to the mergers leading to and including the ELCA. Frederick Axel Shoitz and Franklin Clark Fry, once dubbed “Mr. Lutheran” by Time magazine, exerted shaping influences in the formation of the ALC and LCA. Successors of theirs, Kent Knutson and Robert Marshall, whose friendship was cut short by Knutson’s untimely death, set the two churches on an irreversible course toward a merger. David Preus of the ALC, James Crumley of the LCA, and Will Hertzfeld from the AELC were all critically important in the merger process. Yet to name such individuals is to ignore the collective character of efforts stretching back over generations, as well as that of those who worked more anonymously to effect the change.

In the late 1950s, surveying the massive acculturation of Protestantism in the United States, Winthrop Hudson expressed the hope that the confessional Lutheranism then emerging out of its isolation would lead the way in the recovery of a more specifically Christian identity. The 1988 merger was completed in a somewhat similar hope, that united Lutherans would have a greater impact in American public life. The distance of time has a way of sorting out hope and illusion. At the turn of the century, the ELCA continued to be divided by issues that have historically perplexed American Lutherans—authority, both theological and church-political, and the church’s position in relation to public culture. The presenting issues were the office of the bishop and sexual ethics (see SEXUALITY; HOMOSEXUALITY).

Character

Offensive as it may be in some circles, Lutherans have thrived on religious humor in which they have been the butt of the joke. They are portrayed as stolid, taciturn, family oriented, work driven, and inclined to regard potluck suppers and tuna casserole as sacramental. With some allowance for exaggeration, the joke may not be far off.

Wags in the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES once said, “Lutherans provide the foremen and the superintendents for the plants the Episcopalians own.” In fact, by origin and by immigration, Lutherans have historically been blue-collar people, the biggest percentage having small-town origins with another larger group growing up in the rust-belt cities of New York, Pennsylvania, and the Great Lakes region. The farm crisis, carrying through the later twentieth century into the twenty-first century, along with technological replacement of labor, has hit Lutherans hard.

The strong educational emphasis of Lutheranism, combined with work habits learned on farms or in skilled labor, have served Lutheran families well, however. If older Lutherans are likely to show signs of an ethnic past, shaking hands revealing years of labor, where the younger Lutherans remain, they are likely to have accredited themselves educationally for work acquiring and distributing information. The two generations have not always come together easily.

Published demographics indicate that in 2000, ELCA Lutherans were some 98 percent white, though committed to welcoming other races. Informed speculation suggested that the church had lost two generations of its young and was on the way to losing a third. The average Lutheran assembly, whether congregational, synodical, or churchwide, looked older and ready for work, as long as there was some humor on the side, but anxious about its future.

References and Further Reading

- Hudson, Winthrop S. Religion in America: An Historical Account of the Development of American Religion Life. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1965.
- Mead, Sidney Earl. The Lively Experiment: The Shaping of Christianity in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1973.
- Nelson, E.Clifford. The Lutherans in North America. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1975.
- Trexler, Edgar R. Anatomy of a Merger: People, Dynamics and Decisions that Shaped the ELCA. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Publishing, 1991.
- <http://www.elca.org/>. (website of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America)

JAMES ARNE NESTINGEN

EVANGELICAL REVIVAL

See Evangelicalism

EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH

This denomination was the result of the union in 1946 of two church bodies formed among German Americans in the early nineteenth century, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Evangelical Church (see EVANGELICALISM). The former body traces its origin to the evangelistic work of Philip William Otterbein (1726–1813), an immigrant missionary-pastor of the German Reformed Church, who established a partnership in ministry with the “converted” Mennonite, Martin Boehm (1725–1812). Otterbein was educated at the Herborn Academy in Germany, a Pietist-oriented school (see PIETISM). It was Otterbein’s embrace of Boehm, following the latter’s testimony to the new birth in Christ at a barn revival meeting in Pennsylvania on Pentecost, around 1767, that launched their common mission (see REVIVALS). It represented an eschatologically driven enterprise to form a higher unity among German Americans, based on a shared experience of personal new birth in Christ, that would transcend the barriers of adversarial church bodies of their day (see ESCHATOLOGY). Using that date as their point of origin, the United Brethren declared itself to be the first “American-born” DENOMINATION.

In actuality, Otterbein’s intent was not to found a new church, but rather to nurture a revival among German Americans that would transcend existing church structures of all sorts. However, a new denomination it would become. Despite Otterbein’s personal friendship with Methodist bishop FRANCIS ASBURY, the United Brethren would eschew the episcopally grounded Methodist ecclesial structures in favor of a more democratic, “nonpartisan” brotherhood in Christ. Their bishops were elected to quadrennial terms from among the “brothers” in conference. In Pietist fashion, the early United Brethren hoped to manifest a “more glorious state of the church on earth” (Otterbein), as an end-time community of the reborn. This brotherhood would extend conference voting privileges in church conferences to lay preachers, recognize the diverse sacramental practices of persons coming from a variety of ecclesial backgrounds, and (by 1851) begin extending preaching licenses to WOMEN. By 1889, the General Conference approved the ordination of women (see WOMEN CLERGY).

The United Brethren adopted a CONFESSION of faith and a discipline at their first General Conference in 1815 (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). Both were based on documents prepared by Otterbein for use in his Reformed congregation at Baltimore (1774–1813). Their early missionaries, led by Bishop Christian New-comer, received ordination at the hand of the aged Otterbein, after Newcomer and others had advanced into the Ohio Valley (c. 1810). Their itinerant successors reached to the Pacific Northwest by 1853 (see ITINERANCY). On peace and justice issues, the United Brethren Discipline of 1821 committed members to renounce SLAVERY and slaveholding, making them one of the earliest denominations to adopt an official antislavery position (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). A missionary presence was established in the British colony of SIERRA LEONE in West Africa that began in the 1850s and eventually flourished with the help of an African-American couple, the Joseph Gomers. This mission grew to become the largest Protestant church in that nation. The leaders of the newly independent Sierra Leone in 1960 were graduates of the United Brethren Albert Academy in Freetown. In other overseas fields, beginning with South CHINA (1889) and then JAPAN, the PHILIPPINES, and LATIN AMERICA, United Brethren missionaries were pioneers in establishing indigenous-led united churches, in cooperation with other American mission boards (see MISSIONS; MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). Home mission centers were launched among Spanish-Americans in New Mexico and Florida.

Alongside this work, Jacob Albright (1759–1808), a Pennsylvania-born farmer of Lutheran background, underwent a profound experience of the new birth and then launched an evangelistic mission among his neighbors that resulted in the formation, after his death, of the Evangelical Association (1816). Unlike the United Brethren, this body patterned itself more closely after Methodist DOCTRINE and POLITY. In fact, one of its early names, in addition to the “Albright People,” was “The Newly Formed Methodist Conference.” However, Albright’s ordination had been conferred by his lay associates, rather than by established church authorities. After their humble origin, Evangelicals prized church order and an efficient itinerancy plan. They were the first denomination in America to include in their Book of Discipline an extended essay on the doctrine of entire SANCTIFICATION. Evangelicals also labored among the succeeding generations of German immigrants to the UNTTED STATES, and so retained a longer use of that language than did the United Brethren.

By the mid-nineteenth century, both Evangelicals and United Brethren also began founding colleges and then SEMINARIES for the training of Christian workers, although neither church required seminary education for ordination (see HIGHER EDUCATION). Whereas the United Brethren followed the single-track ordination plan of the Reformed Church (elders only), Evangelicals followed METHODISM in adhering to two orders (deacons and elders). Led by their missionary bishop, John Seybert (1791–1860), their expansion beyond their Eastern Pennsylvania base was centered in the upper Midwest and Canada, whereas United Brethren missionaries favored a line of expansion in the lower Midwest.

Fittingly, Evangelicals launched their major overseas mission effort in GERMANY (1850), from where they established a strong “free church” presence throughout German-speaking Europe, including hospitals and benevolent homes operated by a deaconess society, a seminary, and numerous congregations, including locations in all major German cities. Other overseas fields included Japan (where their missionaries first translated the Old Testament into Japanese), central China, and NIGERIA, plus “home” missions in Appalachia, and among urban ethnic minorities (see ETHNICITY).

Both denominations experienced division in the nineteenth century, for which leading causes included controversies over FREEMASONRY and the revision of the original church constitution (the United Brethren in 1889), as well as disagreements over language, polity, and the interpretation of the doctrine of sanctification (the Evangelicals in 1891). The leader of the “Old Constitution” minority among the United Brethren was Bishop Milton Wright, father of the Wright brothers of aviation fame. The schism among Evangelicals was healed in 1922, resulting in the formation of the Evangelical Church. Evangelicals contributed one president of the Federal Council of Churches (Bishop John Stamm) and one president of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (Bishop Reuben Mueller). Their church united in 1946 with the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, forming a church comprising more than 700,000 members and almost 5,000 congregations in North America that would be known as The Evangelical United Brethren Church. Its overseas constituency was found in five annual conferences in Europe and West Africa, and was also distributed throughout a variety of indigenous united churches on five continents. Its strong ecumenical commitment resulted in the union of their church with Methodism in 1968, resulting in the formation of the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, which for a time was the largest Protestant denomination in North America.

References and Further Reading

- Behney, Bruce, and Paul Eller. The History of the Evangelical United Brethren Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1979.
- Naumann, William. “Theology and German-American Evangelicalism.” Ph.D. dissertation, Yale University, 1966.
- O’Malley, J. Steven. Pilgrimage of Faith: The Legacy of the Otterbeins. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow, 1973.
- . On The Journey Home: The Central Role of Missions in the Evangelical United Brethren Church. New York: Friendship Press, 2001.

J. STEVEN O’MALLEY

EVANGELICALISM

Words such as mosaic and kaleidoscope have been used to describe the bewildering diversity of groups that are associated with evangelicalism. Growing out of currents dating back to the Protestant REFORMATION, evangelicalism originated during the eighteenth century as a phenomenon within Protestantism in North America and Britain. By the end of the twentieth century it had become one of the most vibrant, global expressions of Protestantism. Often identified as “conservative” because of its consistent concern for defending certain theological doctrines, it has also been remarkably responsive and adaptable to different cultures and times, creating a dynamic, not static, movement.

The word evangelical is derived from the New Testament Greek word euangelion, referring to the “good news” of the Christian gospel. Its contemporary usage carries numerous connotations derived from its association with certain groups throughout the history of Protestantism. During the sixteenth century the word was first applied generally to Protestant reformers because of their doctrinal emphasis on JUSTIFICATION by FAITH, the priesthood of all believers, and the AUTHORITY of the BIBLE. It became, particularly in reference to LUTHERANISM in GERMANY, a synonym for Protestantism.

Second, the influence of earlier Puritans and Pietists (see PURITANISM, PIETISM) set the stage for religious REVIVALS in Britain and North America during the eighteenth century. Central figures in igniting these revivals in Britain were GEORGE WHITEFIELD, an eloquent evangelist who effectively used open-air preaching; JOHN WESLEY, an evangelist whose organizational genius led to the creation of METHODISM; and Howell Harris, an aggressive evangelist in Wales. The label “evangelical” was adopted by Protestants who wished to distinguish themselves from coreligionists who did not share the same emphasis on the necessity of a CONVERSION experience, participation in EVANGELISM, and a rigorous approach toward personal holiness. The term was also used to identify a particular party within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND that was sympathetic with the emphases of the Methodist revival. In North America the extraordinary revivals of JONATHAN EDWARDS during the 1730s, and the itinerant preaching of George Whitefield several decades later, set in motion the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). The movement spread to Nova Scotia in CANADA through the efforts of HENRY ALLINE. Known as “New Lights,” eighteenth-century evangelicals significantly shaped American culture during the Revolutionary era.

The third historical context to give meaning to the term “evangelicalism” grew out of revival fires during the nineteenth century called the Second Great Awakening. In North America the CAMP MEETINGS organized by Methodist circuit-riding preachers, the new methods of evangelism introduced by CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY, and the evangelistic activity of BAPTISTS in the southern states resulted in spectacular displays of religious enthusiasm. Common evangelical concerns often transcended denominational differences, giving rise to hundreds of cooperative initiatives in the form of VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES that furthered causes such as TEMPERANCE, SABBATARIANISM, prison reform, and the abolition of slavery (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). By the mid-nineteenth century evangelicalism had become the prevailing orientation among Protestants in North America, prompting some to designate the era as the evangelical century.

Divisions among Protestants in the United States over slavery during the CIVIL WAR were followed by a flurry of new disputes involving DARWINISM and higher criticism of the Bible. Social and economic changes created by industrialization and urbanization further fragmented the evangelical hegemony of earlier decades. A group of evangelicals particularly concerned about defending orthodox Christianity against the influence of theological Liberalism (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM) became known as fundamentalists after the publication of The Fundamentals and their involvement in the infamous Scopes “Monkey Trial” in 1925 (see FUNDAMENTALISM). These fundamentalists distinguished themselves from what they perceived as dangerous compromises among more accommodating Protestants by retaining their emphasis on personal Conversion, but adding a more rigorous stress on the inspiration of the Bible, the imminent return of Christ, and separation from “the world.” A growing sense of alienation prompted fundamentalist evangelicals to establish a network of hundreds of independent agencies promoting evangelism, global MISSIONS, Bible knowledge, publishing, youth work, radio broadcasting, Bible Schools and colleges (see BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTIONS), summer conferences, and other activities. This organizational infrastructure provided the foundation for an evangelical resurgence during the 1970s.

The influx of new immigrant groups added still more diversity to evangelicalism in North America during the twentieth century. In addition, a powerful new strand of evangelicalism emerged out of the HoLINESS MOVEMENT that had left Methodism during the 1890s. Pentecostalism, with its emphasis on the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit such as speaking in tongues and divine healing, reshaped evangelical demographics and became one of the most significant religious influences in the world during the twentieth century.

During the 1930s and 1940s those directly associated with, or influenced by, the fundamentalist network gradually emerged from their cultural isolation. Strengthened by the growing popularity of evangelist BILLY GRAHAM and the intellectual leadership of CARL F.H.HENRY, founding editor of Christianity Today, the “neo-evangelicals” formed in 1942 the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS, which became the center of a wider coalition of more ecumenically minded and cooperative evangelical organizations. The aggressive expansion of evangelical churches and organizations, the skillful use of broadcast media by radio preachers during the 1920s and TELEVANGELISTS during the 1970s (see PUBLISHING MEDIA), and the involvement of evangelicals in areas of public life such as education, professional sports, politics, and media, gave “born again” Christians more visibility and attractiveness. By the end of the twentieth century, evangelicalism was once again the largest and most robust force within Protestantism in both North America and Britain.

The multitude of branches associated with evangelicalism has prompted contemporary historians and pollsters to search for a more precise definition that accurately identifies its distinctive features, thus making it possible to measure the extent of evangelicalism. A commonly used approach is illustrated by the descriptive quadrilateral developed by David W. Bebbington. Despite the considerable diversity among evangelicals, he argues there are at least four continuities or qualities that create a kind of conceptual unity if not always an actual unity, and that define the essence of evangelicalism. None of the four characteristics is unique to evangelicals, but the emphasis placed on the combination of these particular characteristics sets them apart from other Christians. Evangelicals are conversionists, meaning that people become Christians by repenting and personally experiencing what the Protestant reformers called “justification by grace through faith.” Second, they are crucicentric; that is, at the center of their theological scheme is the understanding that ATONEMENT was made to God for human sin by the death of Jesus Christ on the cross. Third, they are biblicist, that is, they have a particularly high regard for the Bible, considering it to be inspired by God and the final authority in matters of faith and Christian practice. Fourth, evangelicals are known as activists, meaning that genuine conversion will be accompanied by a new motivation for doing good and for holy living. This explains the time and energy evangelicals devote to personal piety, to missionary efforts, and to philanthropic projects of all kinds.

According to David Barrett’s World Christian Encyclopedia (2001), approximately 34 percent of the world’s population was Christian at the end of the twentieth century. Although estimates vary depending on the definition being used, it is likely that more than one third of the world’s Christians could be considered evangelical. The massive missionary efforts during the past two centuries, and especially the rapid expansion of Pentecostal and charismatic expressions of evangelicalism in the non-Western world, have contributed toward making evangelicalism a global phenomenon.

See also Alline, Henry; Atonement; Awakenings; Baptists; Bible Schools; Camp Meetings; Christianity Today; Civil War; Conversion; Darwinism; Edwards, Jonathan; Finney, Charles Grandison; Fundamentalism; Germany; Graham, Billy; Henry, Carl F.H.; Liberalism; Lutheranism; Mass Media; Methodism; National Association of Evangelicals; Pentecostalism; Revivals; Sabbatarianism; Slavery, Abolition of; Televangelism; Temperance; Voluntary Societies; Wesley, John; Whitefield, George

References and Further Reading

- Balmer, Randall. Blessed Assurance: A History of Evangelicalism in America. Boston: Beacon Press, 2000.
- Bebbington, D.W. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s. London: Unwin Hyman, 1989.

Noll, Mark A. American Evangelical Christianity: An Introduction. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers, 2001.

———, David W. Bebbington, and George A. Rawlyk, eds. Evangelicalism: Comparative Studies of Popular Protestantism in North America, the British Isles, and Beyond, 1770–1990. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

Rawlyk, George A., ed. The Canadian Protestant Experience, 1760–1990. Burlington, ON: Welch Publishing Company, 1990.

BRUCE L. GUENTHER

EVANGELICALISM, THEOLOGY

“Evangelical” is a word with many meanings. In some contexts it is synonymous with “Protestant,” whereas in others it indicates religious enthusiasm or fanaticism. Etymologically, it means “of the Gospel.” An evangelical is one who promotes the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The early Protestants (especially Lutherans in Northern Europe) chose the term to designate their movement because of its emphasis on JUSTIFICATION by GRACE through FAITH alone. That SALVATION does not have to be earned was considered “good news” (gospel). In seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Great Britain, evangelicals were a party within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND; they emphasized the Protestant side of the Elizabethan Settlement that created ANGLICANISM. Many of them were Puritan in sympathy and theology. In eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Great Britain and North America, the label came to be used of those affiliated with the Great Awakenings (see AWAKENINGS) and other REVIVALS. In the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, evangelicals were those Protestants who promoted and attended revivals and embraced a relatively conservative theology during the rise of liberal theology in mainline Protestant denominations (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). The fundamentalist movement arose in the early twentieth century out of evangelicalism in Great Britain and North America (see FUNDAMENTALISM). It sought militantly to expose and marginalize liberal theology and higher criticism of the BIBLE in Protestant seminaries and denominations. In the 1940s, several fundamentalist leaders, including Harold John Ockenga in New England, began to use the term “evangelical” to describe a new type of conservative Protestantism that is postfundamentalist. Agreeing with much of fundamentalist THEOLOGY (e.g., inspiration of Scripture, deity of Jesus Christ, salvation through the cross of Jesus Christ alone), these newer evangelicals eschewed fundamentalist separatism and anti-intellectualism. They forged a coalition of nonfundamentalist conservative Protestants that included revivalists, Calvinists, Wesleyans, Pentecostals, Pietists (see PIETISM), and BAPTISTS. The NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS was formed in 1941 and came to include fifty denominations and thousands of churches, parachurch organizations, and individuals. Out of this new postfundamentalist movement arose evangelical theology with diverse Protestant roots.

All evangelicals (in the postfundamentalist sense) share four common features. They are intensely biblicist in that they believe the Bible to be God’s supernaturally inspired, written Word uniquely authoritative for Christian faith and practice. Their biblicism extends to a devotional use as well as a theological use of the Bible. Evangelicals emphasize Bible reading and promote love for the Bible. Evangelicals do not all agree about secondary matters related to a DOCTRINE of Scripture, such as whether it contains incidental errors. Many evangelicals believe that it is inerrant in all matters on which it touches, including history and cosmology (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY); other evangelicals believe that it is infallible for all matters related to salvation, but not inerrant. The second common feature is conversionism. Evangelical Protestants believe that every person needs to have a personal encounter with Jesus Christ in a CONVERSION experience involving repentance and faith. Some practice infant baptism, but no evangelical believes that BAPTISM is a guarantee of salvation or sufficient for full reception of salvation. Third, evangelical faith is marked by crucicentrism. The cross of Jesus Christ is the focus of evangelical piety, PREACHING, and practice. Evangelicals believe that Jesus Christ's death on the cross is the sole basis for a right relationship between persons and God, because there Christ made ATONEMENT for the sins of the world. They may disagree on the exact nature and scope of the atonement. Finally, part and parcel of being evangelical is activism in MISSIONS and "outreach" to people outside the evangelical church. All evangelicals value "witnessing" and proclamation; some add the dimension of social ministry to their activism.

Organs of Evangelical Theology and Evangelical Theologians

Evangelical theology arises out of the evangelical movement. It takes for granted the basic contours of Protestant Christian theology such as sola scriptura and justification by grace through faith alone. It also takes for granted basic Christian ORTHODOXY as expressed in the earliest Christian creeds and in the consensus of the church fathers. It is worked out by evangelical theologians in such publications as Christianity Today and The Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society, which is published by the 3,000member Evangelical Theological Society, which requires members to have advanced theology degrees and to affirm biblical inerrancy and the Trinity. The leading postfundamentalist evangelical theologian of the second half of the twentieth century was CARL

F.H.HENRY (b. 1913), who served as president of Fuller Theological Seminary and was a founding editor of Christianity Today magazine. He produced a massive, multivolume evangelical work of theology titled God, Revelation and Authority (1976–1983), and is generally regarded as the "dean of evangelical theologians." Henry is conservative in theology in that he closely follows Protestant orthodoxy; he championed the cause of biblical inerrancy while at the same time criticizing fundamentalism's naive biblicism and harsh separatism. He believes that all serious problems in modern theology arise from defection from commitment to the sole supreme authority of the Bible, which serves as the foundational presupposition of all Christian thought.

Other leading evangelical theologians include EDWARD JOHN CARNELL, Bernard Ramm, Donald G. Bloesch, Millard Erickson, Stanley J. Grenz, Miroslav Volf, and Clark Pinnock. Much evangelical theological reflection focuses on issues of religious authority, proper theological method, the nature of Scripture, God's attributes and relationship to creation, and salvation. Basic evangelical theological mental habits come from the Old Princeton School of theology led by Archibald Alexander, Charles Hodge, Archibald Alexander Hodge, and Benjamin Breckenridge Warfield in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. These Presbyterian scholars stood on the shoulders of earlier Reformed scholastic theologians, such as Francis Turretin. Twentieth-century evangelical theology borrowed from them an emphasis on the priority of special, propositional revelation over natural theology and personal experience, as well as commitment to the unique authority of the Bible as God's verbally inspired and inerrant written Word. Not all evangelical theologians are equally influenced by the Old Princeton School theology, however. Some, such as Bloesch, draw on ancient Christian sources, first-generation Reformers, PIETISM, and mediating theologians, such as PETER TAYLOR FORSYTH. Progressive evangelical thinkers, such as Ramm, have been influenced by KARL BARTH and moderate NEO-ORTHODOXY; postconservative evangelical theologians, such as Grenz and Pinnock, have attempted to update evangelical theology with help from postmodern thought and German eschatological theologians WOLFHART PANNENBERG and Jurgen Moltmann (see POSTMODERNITY). Despite this diversity of resources, all evangelical theologians are confessing Protestants who affirm the authoritative sources and norms of Christian thought and resist liberal accommodation to modern CULTURE.

Evangelical theologians may be divided into two broad camps: traditionalists and reformists. These camps agree about fundamental matters, such as the sole supreme authority of Scripture for Christian faith and practice and the necessity of personal repentance and faith for appropriation of the benefits of Christ's death in conversion (regeneration and justification). They are all heavily influenced by the Protestant reformers MARTIN LUTHER and JOHN CALVIN and by the movers and shakers of the Great Awakening of the 1730s and 1740s, JONATHAN EDWARDS and JOHN WESLEY. However, some evangelical thinkers follow Henry as defenders of orthodoxy, whereas others follow Bernard Ramm in constructive theology. The former are traditionalists, because they appeal to a "received evangelical tradition" including the ancient Christian consensus and the consensus of the firstgeneration reformers as authoritative, and guard the borders of evangelical thought against doctrinal drift, HERESY, and liberal accommodation. These theologians are not far from their fundamentalist roots in temperament and conservative outlook. They regard theology's primary tasks as critical and ignore or downplay the constructive tasks of theology. The other camp of evangelical theologians comprises reformists or progressives who view theology's constructive task as forever unfinished. For them, evangelical theology is constantly in revision as it is guided by Scripture, TRADITION, reason, and experience (the so-called "Wesleyan quadrilateral"). These two parties of evangelical thinkers often fall into conflict with each other. The former group tends to draw heavy and somewhat narrow boundaries around authentic Christianity, whereas the latter group views authentic Christianity as broad and indefinite.

Issues and Controversies in Evangelical Theology

The basic ethos of evangelical theology is Protestant, and all four major branches of the sixteenth-century Protestant REFORMATION are represented among evangelical theologians. Some are Lutheran or belong to offshoots of the European Lutheran churches, such as the EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH of America and the Evangelical Covenant Church of America. Many are Reformed and belong to Presbyterian and other churches stemming from the reforming works of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, John Calvin, and JOHN KNOX. More than a few are Anglican or Episcopalian or members of one of the many offshoots of the Church of England and the EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE U.S.A., including METHODISM and the many Holiness and Pentecostal churches (see HOLINESS MOVEMENT; PENTECOSTALISM). Quite a few are Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) or Baptists. All share a common Protestant theological ethos that is strongly rooted in Luther's principles of sola gratia et fides, sola scriptura and the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS. Some, however, embrace a sacramental spirituality, whereas others promote a pietistrevivalist spirituality. Some are deeply indebted to the Puritan heritage, whereas others are rooted in the Arminian and Wesleyan tradition (see ARMINIANISM). Many emphasize total divine sovereignty, including meticulous providence and unconditional PREDESTINATION, whereas many others prefer a more synergistic theology of the God-human relationship. All of these and other diversities among evangelical theologians give rise to tensions within evangelical theology. Such tensions are especially exacerbated by the fundamentalist heritage of evangelical theology in the late twentieth century and into the twenty-first century.

Perhaps the most enduring and divisive issue debated by evangelical theologians is the nature of Scripture's inspiration and accuracy. This is the so-called "inerrancy controversy" that waxes and wanes among evangelicals. Evangelicals look back to two theologians of Protestant orthodoxy in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries who debated the extent and nature of Scripture's inspiration and accuracy. Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield of Princeton Theological Seminary followed Charles Hodge and Francis Turretin in arguing for the "plenary verbal inspiration" of the Bible and derived its strict, detailed inerrancy from that. According to Warfield and those conservative evangelicals who follow his thinking, Scripture can be fully authoritative only if it is a supernaturally inspired (not dictated) message from God that is fully accurate in all matters, including history and cosmology. In contrast, Scottish evangelical theologian James Orr affirmed Scripture's authority and inspiration but denied strict, detailed inerrancy. For Warfield and those who follow his thinking about Scripture, it is adequate to its purpose (salvation) and therefore "infallible" even if it is not inerrant in matters not pertaining to salvation. At its founding, the Evangelical Theological Society required members to confess Scripture's inerrancy, but in the 1960s, Fuller Theological Seminary—the flagship educational institution of North American evangelicalism—dropped its inerrancy statement. In 1976, conservative evangelical theologian and editor of Christianity Today Harold Lindsell published The Battle for the Bible, which took noninerrantist evangelicals to task for undermining Scripture's authority. A furor ensued among evangelicals that continues into the twenty-first century. Traditionalist, conservative evangelical theologians insist that inerrancy is the only guard against doctrinal drift and cultural accommodation; reformist, postconservative evangelical theologians argue that every reasonable account of inerrancy kills it with the death of a thousand qualifications and that inerrancy tends to elevate Scripture to an idol or “paper pope” (EMIL BRUNNER). Inerrancy has become a fault line, if not a continental divide, within the community of evangelical theologians.

A second significant controversial issue among evangelical theologians has to do with the doctrine of God. Traditionalists tend to assume an Augustinian perspective on God as by definition and by revelation the all-determining reality. God’s primary attribute is majesty or glory. Divine power is exalted and any limitation resisted. These theologians are impressed by Jonathan Edwards’s account of God’s power and glory. Reformist evangelical thinkers draw more heavily on an Eastern Orthodox (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN) and Wesleyan (see WESLEYANISM) account of God as primarily love; they regard God as self-limiting in relation to creation and affirm human free will as a limitation on God’s power (because of God’s voluntary self-restriction). These two doctrines of God constantly give rise to tensions within the evangelical theological community. These underlying tensions came to the surface in open disruption in the late 1990s and early twenty-first century in a controversy over “open theism.” Open theism is the belief held by some reformist evangelical theologians that due to a voluntary self-restriction in relation to creation, God does not know the future exhaustively and infallibly. Open theists, such as Clark Pinnock, argue that divine foreknowledge is logically incompatible with creaturely free will and that Scripture portrays God as changing his mind and as learning in history. A number of evangelical theologians rallied around this new view, which was in turn vilified by traditionalists as incompatible with Scripture and God’s glory. In 2001, the Evangelical Theological Society passed a resolution affirming God’s absolute foreknowledge, and in 2002, it voted to investigate whether open theists may be members. A number of evangelical educational institutions decided not to hire open theists. In response, a group of 110 reformist evangelical scholars signed a manifesto titled “The Word Made Fresh: A Call for a Renewal of the Evangelical Spirit” (2002) that called for greater openness within evangelical theology.

The Future of Evangelical Theology

Evangelical theology is increasingly being accepted as a major school of theology separate from fundamentalism among the theologians of Protestantism. Nevertheless, its future is uncertain. Rifts and controversies continue to create strife among evangelical theologians in North America. At the same time, EVANGELICALISM as a popular movement is spreading throughout the world and becoming indigenous in non-Western cultures and countries. Major conventions of evangelical leaders and thinkers from around the world have taken place in SWITZERLAND (Lausanne 1 and 2) and the PHILIPPINES. These were attended by non-Western evangelicals, who played significant roles in shaping the theologies of these evangelical gatherings, especially as they related to missions and evangelistic endeavors. The future of evangelical theology may rest with the non-Western evangelical communities and their theologians, who tend not to be captivated by categories of Protestant orthodoxy and scholastic methods of doing theology. Many of them are charismatic or “third-wave” Christians, who emphasize the supernatural gifts of the Holy Spirit and “power encounters” between Christians and demonic forces. These theologies of spiritual warfare will no doubt challenge the status quo of traditional Western evangelical thought, which tends to focus on revealed propositions and coherent systems of doctrine.

References and Further Reading

- Bebbington, David, and Mark Noll. Evangelicalism: Comparative Studies of Popular Protestantism in North America, the British Isles, and Beyond. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.
- Dorrien, Gary. The Remaking of Evangelical Theology. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1998.
- McGrath, Alistair. Evangelicalism and the Future of Christianity. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1995.
- Marsden, George. Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1991.
- Noll, Mark. American Evangelical Christianity: An Introduction. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 2000.

ROGER E. OLSON

EVANGELICALS, GERMANY

The English word evangelical was originally used to translate the German word evangelisch, a practice that continues to this day. Thus the Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1974) renders Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland as “Evangelical Church in Germany.” Since the mid-1960s the new word evangelikal was introduced into the German language. The main source and advocate of such usage is the German religious news service IAllianz (IDEA). It popularized the term evangelikal as a transdenominational identifier within German Protestantism.

Most movements and church organizations that are referred to as evangelikal had their beginnings well before the mid-1960s. Before that date German evangelicals would speak of themselves as “pietists,” implying that they were legitimate heirs of eighteenth century PIETISM and claiming that there was a continuity of experience and THEOLOGY. The link between then and now is to be found in the “awakening movement,” or Erweckungsbewegung, of the nineteenth century that eventually emerged as the “Fellowship Movement,” or Gemeinschaftsbewegung, during the latter part of the nineteenth century. The Fellowship Movement, with its many organizations and suborganizations, often denoted as “Gnadauer Verband” has always been part of the established regional territorial evangelical Lutheran churches, or Landeskirchen. In its effort to evangelize the country and to bring people together for prayer and fellowship beyond denominational boundaries, the movement has more or less cooperated with the commonly named “free churches,” notably the Baptists, the Methodists (see METHODISM), and the Federation of Free Evangelical Congregations, through the Evangelical Alliance (Evangelische Allianz). Therefore, the Evangelical Alliance is the loose, transdenominational umbrella organization of German evangelicals and represents the theologically as well as politically conservative wing of German Protestantism. Because of the conservative nature of evangelicalism, the free churches have sometimes voiced their opposition to being classified as evangelikal. It is nevertheless true that evangelicals are represented within the “free churches” just as they are a part of the regional churches. Some free churches, notably the Federation of Free Evangelical Congregations, are closer to the evangelical center, whereas others, particularly the United Methodist Church (Evangelisch-methodistische Kirche), are more removed.

EVANGELICALISM emphasizes the experiential nature of the Christian faith. Through evangelistic efforts on the local level, mass media, and national or Europe-wide rallies, people are invited to make a personal commitment to Christ. Soteriology (SALVATION) is, therefore, the center of evangelicalism. Evangelism and missionary work, but also diaconical engagement (“mother houses,” hospitals, counseling centers, student work, etc.) are seen as indispensable elements of the Christian faith. Despite differences in ecclesiology among various evangelicals, a common week of prayer is organized annually in early January and a common effort is made in EVANGELISM. The BIBLE is seen as the inspired word of God, but German evangelicals have not clearly distinguished between a fundamentalist (“inerrancy”) and an evangelical approach to the Bible and in biblical scholarship (see FUNDAMENTALISM). In politics German evangelicals vehemently opposed laws on ABORTION and, as the “quiet of the land,” are generally taking a conservative or rather “disinterested” position.

References and Further Reading

Jung, Friedhelm. “Die deutsche Evangelikale Bewegung—Grundlinien ihrer Geschichte und Theologie.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Marburg, 1990. Bonn: Jahrbuch für Evangelikale Theologie, 2001.

ERICH GELDBACH

EVANGELISM, OVERVIEW

Evangelism is the organized propagation of Christian belief and practice, the “good news” described in the New Testament. Evangelism can be quantified into 45 major components, for each of which most Protestant churches, Missions, and agencies keep detailed records including elaborate annual statistics. These statistics can demonstrate how individuals and thus countries, peoples, languages, and cities and their populations receive Christian evangelism.

Protestants have long specialized in every variety of organized evangelism listed and described in this article, on all continents, in all 238 countries of the world, and in most of its 12,000 languages. In addition, Protestant evangelists have often cooperated with Anglican, Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and independent clergy, workers, and laypersons. Likewise, the recipients of all of the major forms of evangelism are in most places composed of hearers, listeners, viewers, and readers of many backgrounds, ethnicities, ages, religions, nationalities, denominations, and so on. What this means is that evangelism in practice usually operates cooperatively by all churches and Christians of any confession working together.

Origins of Evangelism

Although the theme of God’s favor arises at a number of points in the Old Testament, Christian evangelism begins with Jesus’s life, death, and resurrection. The mandate for evangelism is encapsulated first in the six New Testament accounts of Christ’s Great Commission, and then in the multiple occurrences of the Greek verb euangelizo and its vast number of synonyms.

Investigating Evangelism

Christians regard Jesus not only as the good news (euangelion), but also as the master evangelizer and evangelist bringing that same good news to the human race. Column 7 of Table 1 analyzes how Jesus converted believers in Palestine and how Christian evangelists attempt to do this today. The words Jesus used form a typology of seven distinct types of words corresponding to seven modes of evangelism. Jesus used five main modes or points of contact with people through words: (1) hidden words (his private hopes and prayers), (2) visual words (what people saw of his person, his life, his lifestyle, his deeds, and his actions), (3) personal words (face-to-face meetings with an individual or a group), (4) proclaimed words (Jesus' preaching and teaching to groups or crowds), and (5) written words (Jesus' use of scrolls of the Old Testament as the written Word of God). After his resurrection, Jesus delivered two further mandates: baptize and train. After his ascension, Jesus then expanded these last two mandates. First, he founded his church, with its church-planting imperative. Second, he launched a leadership training program, selecting, calling out, setting apart, and training a whole new age of sevenfold leadership in ministry: disciples, apostles, prophets, evangelists, healers, pastors, and teachers. He thus expanded the understanding of his Great Commission, which his disciples later expanded into two further categories: (6) printed words (literature, tracts, periodicals, books) and (7) electronic words (broadcasting, radio/TV, cassettes, computers, etc.).

Quantifying 45 Dimensions of Evangelism

Evangelism is the activity, individual or collective and usually organized, by which Christians set forth and spread their beliefs and practices. The quantification of evangelism boils down to measuring the various modes of contact that persons or populations have had with evangelizers. In short, it means enumerating the duration, quality, and intensity of all conversations and awareness resulting from this contact with Christians, Christianity, Jesus Christ, and the Gospel.

With the foregoing definitions and methodology in mind, we can reduce evangelism to 45 major areas or components, which are listed in Table 2. Here, we label them for shorthand purposes as "ministries." This article provides a brief description of each of these ministries, with relevant statistics for each placed separately in the Appendix as Table 5, giving the total number of evangelism-hours per annum that each type of ministry worldwide generates, the factor by which the media multiples these hours, and the number of persons that each type of evangelism thus reaches. These are given there as each ministry's description, as follows:

- Evangelism-hours originated per year. This is the actual number of hours put in by evangelizers of all Protestant and associated confessions, in each type of ministry each year. For example, a part-time evangelist who preaches for one hour twice a week, each week throughout the year, originates 104 evangelism-hours per annum.

- Media factor. This is a multiplying factor representing the audience exposed to one hour of each variety of ministry.

Table 1. The origins and present ministries of evangelism in (a) Christ's Great Commission, and (b) the richest biblical word Evangelize!

MANDATE IMPERATIVE			DOMINANT CHARACTERISTIC	HUMAN ROLE	SUB-TYPES OF EVANGELISM	RESULTING WORDS	OUTREACH MINISTRIES	OVERVIEW	OTHER KEYWORDS		DIMENSIONS of "evangelize"		FACETS
English	NT Greek	Usages							(related nouns) Greek, Latin (L)	Usages	Total	Key dimensions	English
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14
OVERALL IMPERATIVE
Evangelize!	evangelizo	133	Authoritative	7-P Evangelism	Platiform evangelism Evangelistic work	EVANGELIZING WORDS	45	7-P Evangelization	evangelion semeia kai terata evangelizatio (L)	76/133 77/84 41	400	Evangelize with signs following	700
MINICOMMISSION I: EVANGELIZE! CONSTITUENT MANDATES:
1. Receive!	labete	263	Spirit-dominated	Prayer	Baptism in the Spirit	HIDDEN	2	Pneumatic	parakletos	5/34	10	Accompany, Be filled,	33
	verb:			evangelism	Spirit evangelism	WORDS		evangelization	dynamis	120/331		Breathe, Cooperate,
	lambano				Pneumatization				pneumatikos	28/413		Follow, Participate,
					Renewal in the Spirit				exousia	103/107		Pneumatize, Pray,
					Intercession							Receive power,
					Power evangelism							Stay, Wait
2. Go!	poreuthentes	154	Person-implemented	Pre-evangelism	Apostolate	VISUAL	11	Preparatory	apostole missio	4/255	45	Act, Contact,	101
	verb:				Mission	WORDS		evangelism	(L)	900		Develop,
	poreuomai				Extension							Encounter, Engage,
					Outreach							Extend, Go, Help,
					Primary evangelism							Impact, Influence,
					Visitation evangelism							Itinerate, Liberate,
					Visual evangelism							Love, Make aware,
					Audiovisual							Occupy, Permeate,
					evangelism							Prepare, Reach,
												Seek, Send, Show,
												Target, Touch,
												Transmit, Visit
3. Witness!	martyres	173	Unorganized, private	Personal	Person-to-person	PERSONAL	2	Presence	martyria	57/173	60	Be martyred, Be	132
	verb:			evangelism	witness	WORDS		evangelization	praesentia (L)	120		present, Bring,
	martyreo				Personal work				justitia (L)	220		Carry, Confess,
					Individual				pax (L)	200		Dialogue, Expose,
					evangelism				dialogismos	14/43		Gossip, Inform,

					Conversational talk						Propagate, Radiate,
					Dialogue evangelism						Report, Say, Share,
					Gossiping the gospel						Shine, Sow, Spread,
					Seed-sowing						Talk, Tell, Testify,
					Prophetic evangelism						Witness
4.	Proclaim!	keryxate	72	Ordered, public	Preaching	Public evangelism	PROCLAIMED	6	Proclamation	kerygma	8/72	48	Advertise, Announce,	85
	verb:				evangelism	Mass evangelism	WORDS		evangelization	apologia (L)	8/18		Declare,
	kerysso					Demonstration							Demonstrate, Do
						evangelism							miracles, Exorcise,
						Deliverance							Explain, Expound,
						evangelism							Give a message,
						Incarnational							Give opportunity,
						evangelism							Herald, Make
						Saturation							listen, Preach,
						evangelism							Present, Proclaim,
													Prove, Publish,
													Read, Reason,
													Refute, Saturate,
													Translate
MINICOMMISSION II: DISCIPLE!
5.	Disciple!	matheteusate verb: matheteuo	266	Convert-oriented	Persuasion evangelism	Paracletic evangelism Harvest evangelism Discipling evangelism Verdict evangelism Decision evangelism Lordship evangelism Healing evangelism Power healing	WRITTEN WORDS	9	Pressure evangelization	paraklesis therismos mathetes therapeia	29/34 13/36, 261/266 3/47	63	Appeal, Catch, Compel, Confront, Conquer, Convert, Convince, Denounce, Disciple, Exhort, Forgive, Give, Harvest, Heal, Impart, Implore, Invite, Offer, Persuade, Press, Reap, Retain, Urge, Warn, Win	128
6.	Baptize!	baptizantes verb: baptizo	111	Church-oriented	Pastoral evangelism	Baptism Baptizing evangelism Evangelism that results in churches Church planting Incorporation Shepherding Celebration evangelism	PRINTED WORDS	9	Planting evangelization	baptismos koinonia ekklēsia leitourgeia eucharistia katechumēnos	23/111 19/59 115 6/15 15/54 8	35	Affiliate, Baptize, Bless, Build, Catechize, Confirm, Enroll, Feed, Grow, Incorporate, Initiate, Minister, Multiply, Plant, Praise, Sacramentalize, Serve, Tend, Worship	70
7.	Train!	didaskontes verb: didasko	212	Ministry-oriented	Programmed evangelism	Teaching evangelism Electronic	ELECTRONIC WORDS	6	Pedagogical evangelization	didache diakonia oikodome	30/212 34/101 18/59	21	Broadcast, Celebrate,	43

evangelism
Broadcasting Radio/TV evangelism

Edify,
Educate,
Follow-up,
Instruct,
Mobilize,
Nurture,
Program,
Teach, Train

This table portrays meanings and usages of terms. The columns are as follows:

1. The seven mandates of the Great Commission, as imperatives
2. The Greek New Testament verbs involved
3. Number of usages in Greek OT and NT
4. Dominant feature of each
5. Human role, in English usage
6. Other varieties of evangelistic terminology
7. Typology of resulting types of words
8. Number of related major outreach ministries
9. Theological overview terms
10. Other Greek or Latin key words
11. NT usages of these key words
12. Total dimensions of “evangelize”
13. Key dimensions
14. Total dimensions, synonyms, and facets in English usage

Table 2. Evangelism described under 7 modes of evangelizing words and 45 distinct outreach ministries.

		EVANGELIZING WORDS	Description of "words" (lines in capitals) and ministries (lines in lowercase)
Imperative	Human role	Outreach ministries	(bold type=major keywords in each ministry under one of the 7 Imperatives/Mandates)
1	2	3	4
Receive!	Prayer evangelism	HIDDEN WORDS	WORDS HIDDEN IN PRIVATE PRAYER, CHARISMATA RECEIVED.
		1. Intercession	Continuing earnestly in prayer, interceding for persons and peoples.
		2. Inner renewal/spirituality	Being filled with the Holy Spirit, waiting, then following Jesus.
Go!	Pre-evangelism	VISUAL WORDS (audiovisual)	CHRISTIANS GO, HELP, SHOW VISIBLE SIGNS PREPARING HEARERS.
		3. Christians' lifestyle	Going, meeting, bringing the love of God by Christian loving and lives.

		4. Audiovisual ministries	Sending out, speaking out, displaying, showing words and pictures.
		5. Plays/concerts/operas/shows	Shows illustrating Christian doctrine, history, ethics.
		6. "Jesus" Film shows	Portraying the incarnation, person, work, and ministry of Jesus.
		7. Audio scriptures	Making Scripture available to nonliterate, reading aloud, corresponding .
		8. Scripture leaflets/selections	Impacting whole populations with mass illustrated leaflets.
		9. Every-home campaign visits	Going, seeking, visiting, contacting, touching, encountering, giving .
		10. New Reader Scriptures	Providing pictorial literacy primers, supplying gospels for new literates.
		11. Braille scriptures	Doing miracles, giving sight to the blind.
		12. Signed/deaf scriptures	Reaching deaf persons with the gospel.
		13. Christian suffering	Showing how Christians live through sickness, suffering, even death.
Witness!	Personal evangelism	PERSONAL WORDS	CHRISTIANS WITNESS PERSONALLY BY PRESENCE, WORD, DEED, DYING.
		14. Personal evangelism	Telling others about Jesus, speaking, gossiping the gospel, introducing, informing.
		15. Martyrdoms	The witness of those who lose their lives for Christ and are martyred.
Proclaim!	Preaching evangelism	PROCLAIMED WORDS	WORDS PREACHED, PROCLAIMING THE GOSPEL IN STRUCTURED SITUATIONS.
		16. Full-time home church workers	Preaching, stating, reading.
		17. Foreign missionaries	Translating, interpreting, expounding, saturating.
		18. Evangelists	Proclaiming, announcing.

			declaring, heralding, presenting.
	19. Short-term missionaries		Demonstrating, saturating.
	20. Part-time evangelizers		Giving opportunity to many others.
	21. Mission agencies		Advertising, enabling workers to promulgate the gospel.
Disciple!	Persuasion evangelism	WRITTEN WORDS (Scriptures)	WRITTEN SCRIPTURES PERSUADING, PRESSING DISCIPLE-OPPORTUNITIES.
	22. Portions/gospels		Imparting, forgiving, offering, explaining.
	23. Near-gospels		Circulating gospels among related languages with no scriptures.
	24. New Testaments		Persuading, discipline reaping.
	25. Near-New Testaments		Distributing the whole story of Jesus to related languages with no scriptures.
	26. Bibles		Convincing, winning, converting, healing.
	27. Near-Bibles		Offering the Bible's riches to related languages without it.
	28. Lingua franca gospels		Catching, confronting scripture-less languages through lingua francas.
	29. Lingua franca NTs		Harvesting scripture-less languages through wider-communication languages.
	30. Lingua franca Bibles		Making the Bible's riches understandable to all through trade and similar languages.
Baptize!	Pastoral evangelism	PRINTED WORDS (literature)	BAPTISM, CHURCH-PLANTING, PASTORAL LIFE, PRINTED WORDS.
	31. Denominational materials		Catechizing, baptizing, confirming, incorporating new believers, pastoring.
	32. Local church output		Enrolling, affiliating, worshipping, blessing.
	33. Outside Christian literature		Helping, supporting.
	34. Church-planting output		Planting new churches, building, church growth.

Train!	Programmed evangelism	35. Institutional ministries/records	Serving, ministering.
		36. Christian books	Feeding, growing.
		37. Christian periodicals	Tending, shepherding.
		38. Tracts	Multiplying individual ministries.
		39. Other documentation	Praising, singing.
		ELECTRONIC WORDS	TRAINED BY ELECTRONIC-MEDIA PROGRAMMED WORDS.
		40. Programmed training	Instructing, teaching, educating, making people learn.
		41. Christian radio programs	Broadcasting, following-up.
		42. Christian TV programs	Telecasting teaching materials, cultivating, edifying.
		43. Urban media (cable TV, &c)	Working among all varieties of peoples, especially urban populations, uniting.
		44. Christian-owned computers	Programming the church's many activities, e-mailing, faxing.
		45. Internet/networks/e-mail	Mobilizing the vast area of Christian resources worldwide; surfing, training.

This table portrays meanings and usages of terms and components of evangelism and its related ministries and terminologies.

- Total offers received per year. The end product is this total, which is the number of offers of conversion that actually reach hearers, being the product of the preceding 2 lines. Note that “received” says nothing about the recipients’ acceptance or rejection of the message.

Hidden Words

This first mode of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Receive!” This mode refers to evangelizing words not visible to the outside world, and especially to words hidden in prayer. Thus these ministries are generally not subject to exact enumeration or precise statistics. Here we label them ministries 1 and 2.

1. Intercession. This first variety of outreach ministry is one that Christians exercise by praying for specific, named causes, situations, populations, and persons. In particular, we refer here to prayer directly related to evangelism. There are currently 30 distinct Protestant global prayer networks for world evangelization, 10 million prayer groups, 20 million Christians in full-time prayer ministry, and some 100 million laypersons who have become daily intercessors. In the 1990s, evangelicals organized a campaign known as “Praying through the 10/40 Window,” in which some 20 million evangelicals undertook six months of daily intercession for the evangelizing of the world’s 1.6 billion unevangelized persons. Many of the larger networks actually collect and publish annual statistics relevant to, if not directly enumerating, this hidden ministry. Thus Every Home for Christ (EHC) International (formerly World Literature Crusade, or Every Home Crusade) enumerates its prayer materials sent out regularly to its committed intercessors. By 1991, the EHC was distributing 2,640,449 prayer bulletins each year in 28 languages for its work in 169 countries.

2. Inner renewal/spirituality. This refers to that eventual state in which a formerly inactive, lethargic, or dormant church or denomination moves rapidly to being vibrant, enthusiastic, and active. The phrase also covers other major areas of Christian activity and impact, including spirituality, mysticism, spiritual gifts, charismata, and spiritual warfare. In the year 2000, this renewal’s active adult church members were estimated at 375 million.

Visual Words

This second mode of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Go!” This mode refers to evangelizing words directly visible or audible to all. They are visible signs preparing hearers for the gospel. This covers ministries 3 to 13.

3. Christian lifestyle. This form of evangelism seeks to commend Christian belief and practice by the day-to-day fruits and rewards it may offer. There is a direct parallel here with Jesus’ own ministry on Earth. People saw him, heard him, and observed his deeds and his lifestyle. For Jesus, the verb euangelizo meant to spread good news with signs following. Contemporary Christian lifestyle consists of myriads of phenomena of these kinds across the world. They engender vast varieties of evangelism and evangelistic ministries. Christians demonstrating a genuinely Christ-like lifestyle today probably number at least 100 million.

4. Audiovisual ministries. Although this descriptive terminology is only a couple of centuries old, it encompasses the vast range of Christian art (paintings, sculpture, tapestry, et alia). MARTIN LUTHER was firmly of the opinion that artistic representation could aid the proclamation of the Gospel. Christian art in vast profusion has appeared throughout Christian history. One ministry centers on one individual Christian whose work has resulted in a billion images of Christ. In 1940, artist Warner Sallman (1892–1968) painted the Head of Christ. It has become one of the most enduring images of Jesus in both American and global Christianity. Sallman’s version of Christ has appeared in many different media of devotional life, including Bibles, Sunday-school literature, calendars, posters, church bulletins, clocks, lamps, wallet-sized photos, pins, and stickers.

In addition to thousands of works of visual art illustrating the Gospel, there is yet another type: ARCHITECTURE. In England, Canterbury Cathedral has since the Middle Ages depicted the entire BIBLE story in its stained glass windows (originally to evangelize a nonliterate population). Today more tourists and others—more than four million—visit it each year than the total inhabitants in fourteenth-century England.

There are literally hundreds of other audiovisual ministries under this heading.

5. Plays/concerts/operas/shows. This variety of evangelism refers to a whole range of theatrical, cinematic, radio, and television epics, narratives or productions that can be described as clearly evangelistic. The range includes Christian theatre, plays, shows, opera, ballet, musicals, music performances, concerts, and motion pictures of other Bible or Christian subjects in addition to the depiction of the life of Christ. Possibly the most popular and successful evangelistic presentation of all time has been GEORGE FRIDERIC HANDEL'S oratorio "Messiah," an artistic masterpiece written in 1741. Its fifty-three sections of biblical texts are a skillfully crafted statement of Christian DoCTRINE describing the mighty drama of human redemption. "Messiah" is the most-performed major choral work in history, and most likely the single most-performed musical work around the world today. It is also a powerful evangelistic tool—professional, popular, participatory, universally acclaimed, and yet all the time biblical, Bible-quoting, Christ-centered, eschatological. Although not deliberately evangelistic, its phenomenal success in Britain is linked with the evangelical revival in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, and with JOHN WESLEY'S robust doctrine of assurance of SALVATION. Its evangelistic effect is heightened by the absence of the name "Jesus" (used only once, in section 51, from I Corinthians 15:57) and the cautious low-key use of the name "Christ."

Over the last 250 years, performances of "Messiah" have taken place at least once a year, usually at Christmas, in some 3,000 metropolises in some 20,000 churches, cathedrals, choirs, clubs, societies, festivals, colleges, and other venues across the English-speaking world. Performances have average attendances of 200 persons each and vary in length from two to four hours. Performers vary from fifty to over 5,000 at one time. Altogether, these attract four million attendees in person every year.

There are numerous other musical compositions based on the Gospel story. A widely known one is JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH'S "Saint Matthew Passion" (1729), based on the life of Christ. Going beyond this worldwide English-language coverage, there is also a vast coverage of similar musical works composed and presented in nearly sixty other global languages. Many have been hugely successful as dramas, theatre plays, musicals, and radio plays (e.g., "The Man Born to be King" in 1945).

6. Jesus films. There has been a long history of movies portraying the life of Jesus. These include Intolerance (1916), The King of Kings (1927), Ben Hur (1959), King of Kings (1961), The Greatest Story Ever Told (1965), The Gospel According to St Matthew (1966), Godspell (1973), Jesus Christ Superstar (1973), Jesus of Nazareth (1977), The Last Temptation of Christ (1988), and Jesus, the classic spread in 700 languages worldwide by Campus Crusade for Christ.

7. Audio scriptures. Another audiovisual variety that has blossomed in the twentieth century hinges on recordings (CDs, records, tapes) of the full texts of Christian Scriptures—gospels, New Testaments, Bi bles—in several thousand languages. These can then be circulated, bought, sold, copied, reproduced, translated, and—a most important development—broadcast over radio, either at talking speed (for listeners to record) or at dictation speed (for listeners to write down). By 1997, audio scriptures had been prepared and were widely circulating, through the United Bible Societies, Forum of Bible Agencies, Audio Scriptures International, and other specialist agencies, in some 4,600 languages.

8. Scripture leaflets/selections. Jesus sprinkled his teachings with visually evocative quotations from the Hebrew Scriptures varying in length from short texts to well-known narratives and exegesis of longer passages. A similar ministry is performed today through the widespread and continuous scattering, in every walk of life, of short Scripture verses or texts in leaflet form. BIBLE SOCIETIES have formalized these with their category “Selections,” defined as 4- or 8-page colorful visually appealing booklets with a number of selected Scripture passages. Scores of agencies publish large ranges and quantities of similar selections.

9. Every-home campaign visits. In his itinerations, Jesus frequently visited people’s homes and there delivered major teaching, healing miracles, or other definitive ministry. House-to-house visiting has always been an important initial stage in evangelistic strategy. Massive programs of nationwide campaigns now make this a leading form of evangelism. The first attempt by a mission organization to reach systematically every home in an entire nation took place from 1912–1917 in JAPAN, where the Oriental Missionary Society visited 10,300,000 homes. So successful was this program that it was extended to other countries, and then finally throughout the world. More recently, the major example is Every Home for Christ International (EHC). This organization was begun in CANADA in 1946 as the World Literature Crusade for radio outreach. It then expanded to systematic tract distribution through the EHC, with more than 1.85 billion booklet distributions and more than 22 million written responses for Christ over the succeeding 43 years. Since 1953, EHC has specialized in house-to-house visitation to entire populations of countries. By 1996, the total of all such visits had risen to more than 10 million per year. In addition, there are thousands of small local church or parish visitation campaigns each year.

10. New Reader Scriptures. Jesus was literate himself, accustomed to public reading and exposition of the written Scriptures. He constantly drew attention to them. He challenged skeptics: “Have you never read in the Scriptures...” (Matthew 21:42). In 1967 the United Bible Societies inaugurated a new variety of scriptures, designed especially for the newly literate or potential literates, called NRS (New Reader Scriptures). Easy to read, illustrated, attractively printed, the NRS have proven very popular.

11. Braille Scripture. In the year 1830, a teacher at a school for the blind named Louis Braille developed a raised-dot system that became standard for the English-speaking world. In 1932, Standard English Braille was adopted in the United States. Nonsighted or totally blind persons numbered some 19.3 million worldwide in 2000. In addition, another 30 million persons are legally blind. Of these 49 million, 10 million have access to a Braille Scripture in their own language.

12. Signed/deaf Scriptures. Sign languages were developed in Europe more than four centuries ago. In Britain, schools for the deaf were begun in the mid-nineteenth century. In 2000, the world contained 365 million deaf (hearing-impaired) persons, of whom 150 million are severely impaired and 23 million are totally deaf. Of these, about 15 percent use or understand a sign language. Sign languages include American Sign Language (ASL), as well as quite different systems used in more than 60 other languages. Of all deaf persons, about 30 million have access to signed Scriptures in their own sign language.

13. Christian suffering. Jesus promised his disciples that theirs would not be a life of ease but a life of hardship, persecution, and suffering. Jesus taught his disciples to redeem suffering and use it for the glory of God.

Personal Words

The third of the seven modes of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Witness!” This refers to evangelizing words at the grassroots—the day-to-day evangelism of ordinary Christians as they go about their work, home life, and social activities. These are words through which individual Christians evangelize others. This results in ministries 14 and 15.

14. Personal evangelism. Sometimes called “personal work,” this is the usually private endeavor of an active Christian to interest or enroll other persons for the faith, usually by means of one-on-one conversation. Personal evangelism is regularly monitored in public-opinion polls. In a survey dated December 1982, the Gallup Organization asked a nationwide representative random sample of Americans the carefully phrased question: “Have you ever tried to encourage someone to believe in Jesus Christ or to accept Him as his or her Savior?” Some 51 percent of all Americans answered “Yes,” 41 percent answered “No,” and 8 percent answered “No opinion/Don’t know.”

15. Martyrdoms. Jesus often warned that a disciple’s commitment could result in death. This has subsequently been the case throughout church history. In the twentieth century, martyrdoms have become well known as a result of regular and persistent reports in the media. In the light of twenty centuries of Christian history with its 70 million martyrs, it is safe to say that martyrdom has been the single most significant factor leading to the evangelization and Christianization of a people or nation. The total of all Christian martyrs since World War II has averaged 300,000 a year. This toll fell dramatically to 160,000 a year with the collapse of Communist regimes in Eastern Europe and the USSR during 1989–1992.

Proclaimed Words

This fourth of the seven modes of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Proclaim!” These are words preached by professional workers proclaiming and expounding the gospel in structured situations. This covers ministries 16 to 21. They center on the public announcement of Christian belief and practice.

16. Full-time home church workers. Full-time Christian workers are found virtually everywhere. In this analysis we divide them into home workers (dealt with here as no. 16) and foreign workers (no. 17). The term covers all employees of churches, denominations, agencies, and institutions. These workers may even be self-employed. The category usually covers ongoing employment lasting more than one year, usually long term, and excluding short-term workers (less than one year). The range of vocations covered is vast, from theologians, bishops, and clergy at one end to administrators, accountants, secretaries, and manual laborers at the other. But all may be considered part of the church’s proclamation of the Christian faith, by word of mouth, by writing, or by their service and their quality of life. In the year 2000, full-time Protestant home workers, of all confessions, were estimated at 2,100,000 worldwide.

17. Foreign missionaries. A foreign missionary is defined here as a full-time Christian worker of any age, race, or occupation, who works in a country in which he or she is not a citizen (or national) but is a foreigner (or alien). The estimated total of Protestant foreign missionaries of all confessions was 220,000 in the year 2000.

18. Evangelists. Evangelists are defined here as part-time or full-time Christian workers who specialize in the public or private proclamation of the Gospel, either structured or unstructured. The two titles “evangelist” and “catechist,” are almost interchangeable. The following list classifies them by the size of their operations into seven levels:

- Nonprofessional, part-time evangelists form the vast bulk of the category. Many denominations in developing countries use a rank or category called “evangelists.” Often no salaries are paid.
- Part-time catechists are located mainly in Asia and in sub-Saharan AFRICA.
- Full-time professional evangelists have mushroomed since 1950, each with an independent evangelistic association.
- Full-time professional missionary catechists often have graduated from SEMINARIES, BIBLE COLLEGES, or other training establishments.
- Macro-evangelists is the term that best fits those whose evangelistic organizations have grown large enough to support teams of associate evangelists undertaking multiple campaigns, crusades, and macro-crusades. There are at least 500 such macro-evangelists worldwide.
- Mega-evangelists are defined here as those evangelists who from time to time actually preach live to crowds of over one million (including both face-to face and over radio/TV). Some 30 well-known evangelists in a variety of cultures across the world fall into this category in the year 2000. German mega-evangelist Reinhard Bonnke preached in 1994 to 1.67 million people who attended six evening meetings in Kaduna, Nigeria, with 500,000 people at the culminating Saturday meeting held in Muhamed Murtala Square. More than 200,000 decision cards were signed by Kaduna citizens declaring that they had received Jesus as Savior. By 1996, Bonnke had preached face-to-face to 28,545,000 persons, of whom 6,053,190 registered decisions for Christ (see TELEVANGELISM).
- Global evangelists. This term is reserved here for any evangelist who in practice has addressed, and still can address, the entire globe at once, or who reaches live an audience of around one billion hearers at once (mostly via radio/TV). In the year 2003, only two such persons were attaining this category. The first is BILLY GRAHAM, who preached face-to-face to 180 million from 1940–2003, and over radio/TV to over a billion during Global Mission 1995. The second is John Paul II, who, although not a professional evangelist, has fulfilled this function from 1978 to the present by regularly expounding Christianity, Christ, and the Gospel to multi-million-hearer audiences. In the year 2003, the total number of evangelists worldwide was estimated at some 710,000, and catechists at 520,000.

19. Short-term missionaries. These short-term workers are usually defined as those who work abroad full-time, or in full-time church or other Christian jobs, for a period of more than one month but less than one year in length. The total of short-term Protestant workers serving abroad in the year 2000 was estimated at 400,000 at any one time.

20. Part-time evangelizers. This category is defined here as persons who have secular employment but who nevertheless put in a substantial amount of work each week as part-time or volunteer Christian workers, specializing in spreading the Gospel. This includes Methodist lay preachers, Anglican lay readers, Catholic parish assistants (when not full-time), parish visitors, and a whole variety of roles in almost all denominations. They number 20 million part-time workers.

21. Mission agencies. These are 4,000 agencies that exist specifically to implement the evangelical world mission. They undertake foreign missions and outreach and other cross-cultural mission activity.

Written Words (Scriptures)

This fifth of the seven modes of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Disciple!” This refers to evangelizing words taken from the Bible, which has been translated into 3,500 languages, and covers ministries 22 to 30. “Script” means “handwriting; written words, letters, or figures.” Jesus constantly quoted the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures, saying “It is written...,” or “Have you not read....” To this must be added the whole ministry of writing out Scripture verses by hand, especially in person-to-person correspondence, authoring manuscripts, periodicals, and even in BIBLE TRANSLATION.

Faced today with some 7,000 distinct languages with no Scripture translations yet done, translators have long recognized that a people’s access to the Scriptures may be provided, temporarily or even permanently, if translations exist in either of two indirect forms. The first form is near-scriptures, which are defined as scriptures in any closely-related language, itself defined here as one within the same language cluster; the three varieties of near-scriptures are here enumerated under ministries 23, 25, and 27. The second form is lingua franca scriptures, which are scriptures in any language in wide use among the people, especially a trade language, a lingua franca, even a national language. Using these criteria, the number of peoples with access to Scripture rises dramatically.

22. Portions/Gospels. A portion is a single book of the Bible published separately as a booklet by itself. Portions most frequently appearing vary in length from forty pages long (the Gospel of Luke) to only a page or two (Philemon, John 2, Jude). Most, however, are Gospels. Average length is twenty-five pages. The major distributors of these portions are the world’s 180 Bible societies and agencies. Thousands of other organizations, especially local churches, also engage in scripture distribution.

23. Near-Gospels. For a language into which no Scripture has yet been translated, a “near-Gospel” is a copy of a Gospel in a closely-related language within the same language cluster.

24. New Testaments (300 pages). Translation and publication of the New Testament in a new language is not simply a temporary resting-point on the journey to production of the whole Bible. For many agencies, especially the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL, also termed WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS [WBT]), the New Testament alone is a sensible end goal. Having completed the New Testament, WBT’s translators then move on to other languages that as yet have nothing at all translated. They leave local translators supported by local churches to continue by translating the Old Testament. Total New Testaments distributed by all agencies—free, or subsidized, or commercial—amount to 121 million a year.

25. Near-New Testaments. This term relates to languages in which no Scripture has yet been translated. A “near-NT” is a copy in a closely-related language within the same language cluster.

26. Bibles (1,300 pages). Translation and publication of the whole Bible is so complex a process that such translation has been achieved, so far, in only 450 languages—barely 3 percent of the world’s total. Total distribution from all sources by the year 2000 was 54 million a year.

27. Near-Bibles. Among a people with a mother tongue into which at present no scriptures have been translated or produced, a ‘near-Bible’ is a translation of the complete Bible into a closely-related language within the same language cluster. This may not be entirely satisfactory to the people concerned but since same-cluster languages share more than 80 percent of common vocabulary, it is certainly better than nothing.

28. Lingua franca Gospels. This category refers to any people who have a published Gospel available in a language distant or different from their mother tongue and which is understood by more than 50 percent of the population. Usually this is a language of wider communication (international language, lingua franca, trade language, market language, church language), but sometimes it is simply a neighboring or geographically nearby language.

29. Lingua franca New Testaments. The category refers to a people with a New Testament available in a language of wider communication understood by more than 50 percent of the population.

30. Lingua franca Bibles. This mode of evangelism is particularly powerful in that national and international languages multiply its influence far and wide.

Printed Words (Literature)

The sixth of the seven modes of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Baptize!” This encompasses the church’s duty to engage in pastoral evangelism, to initiate new believers, to catechize new converts, to plant churches, to train, worship, minister, and multiply. That Christian evangelists are obeying this mandate is evident from the current global total of newly baptized persons per year: 40 million. This results in an enormous volume of documentation. Baptism, church-planting, and pastoral life are surrounded daily by millions of printed Christian words. In all of these, the vast expansion of printed literature plays a central role. They are enumerated here under nine main varieties of evangelism, here termed ministries 31 to 39.

31. Denominational materials. There are at present some 34,000 Christian denominations in the world. The central offices of at least 10,000 of them produce specialized literature to directly assist their local churches in evangelism and outreach. These cover teaching, catechism, baptism classes, Sunday schools, and the like. Baptism candidates are particularly well served.

32. Local church output. Some 3.5 million local churches exist—parish churches, congregations, or other places of worship. All of them in open countries produce large quantities of printed materials directly supporting the church’s evangelism and outreach.

33. Outside Christian literature. A quite different form of printed material is experienced through outpeople’s territory often with their own alien congre-side languages and influences—through alien or foreign or other-culture Christians who live on the gations. But most outside literature comes in, incidentally or accidentally, via the major lingua francas.

34. Church-planting output. A vast amount of printed literature is produced and circulated concerning a whole new ecclesiastical industry—church planting. Around 2,000 denominations and 3,000 mission agencies now incorporate church growth methodology and have organized departments to promote church planting, both in their home countries and on their mission fields abroad. As one result, by the year 2000, newly planted churches each year had risen to some 60,000.

35. Institutional ministries/records. Major Christian institutions number 105,000; minor church-related or Christian-related institutions number another 376,000. Every one of these 481,000 institutions is—or is supposed to be—a center of Christian outreach, evangelism, apologetics, and training. Each produces a voluminous annual output of literature and documentation.

36. Christian books (100 pages). A printed book is defined by UNESCO as one having 48 or more pages. In 1995 the total number of all new titles produced on any subject, secular or religious, reached the astronomical figure of 900,000, and by 2000 it had risen to over 1 million per year. With reprints of older titles, this results in the printing of 30 billion copies a year. Of these, Christian titles and books account for 3 percent per year.

37. Christian periodicals (30 pages). A most important role is played in outreach, evangelism, and apologetics by the 34,500 Christian periodicals, serials, magazines, journals, newspapers and the like, with circulation of some 50 million, and in 3,000 languages.

38. Tracts (2 pages). A tract is a short, concise, self-contained, stand-alone presentation of the gospel averaging a couple of sides of a small piece of paper. There has been a long history of Christian outreach through tract distribution, which was estimated in the year 2000 to total 5 billion tracts per year. A typical example of the evangelistic creativity tracts make possible comes from Ujjain in north India. At the 1992 Kumbh Mela (Nectar Festival) with 10 million Hindus bathing in a river Ganges confluence, 225 Indian missionary workers distributed 1 million copies of the Gospel of John and 3 million gospel tracts in 33 days. At the 2001 Kumbh Mela, there were 70 million Hindu pilgrims, and similar vast increases in tract distribution.

39. Other documentation. This variety of ministry covers a vast range of activities. One of the most effective of these is placing Christian articles or stories in secular newspapers and magazines. A striking example comes from the former Soviet Union. Since 1990, Christian Agency Good News (ABC) has published evangelistic articles in more than 1.2 billion copies of Russian and Ukrainian newspapers and magazines.

Electronic Words

The seventh and last of the seven modes of evangelism has as its mandate and imperative “Train!” covering ministries 40 to 45.

40. Programmed training. Systematized Christian teaching on evangelism has followed development of secular communications. Bible correspondence courses followed the Penny Post in Britain, and radiophonic “schools of the air” came after the invention of broadcasting. After the invention and rapid expansion of distance education from 1945 in Britain and the United States, theological education by extension (TEE) and TEE and evangelism (TEEE) followed soon after. The TEE movement originated at a Presbyterian seminary in Guatemala in 1963; by 1980, there were over 200 major TEE organizations world-wide with 400 programs and 60,000 extension students in 90 countries. By 2000, virtually everything depended on electronics. Meanwhile, by 1966, Bible correspondence courses were mushrooming world-wide. Responses from individuals by then ranged from 110,000 enrolments in Morocco to 4 million a year in the United States (Catholic as well as Protestant courses). One of the largest denominational programs was that of the 12-million-member SEVENTHDAY ADVENTIST CHURCH. In 1986, they had 180 Bible correspondence schools in 77 languages with 520,167 annual enrollments and 281,345 graduating. By 2000, some 60 million persons were receiving some kind of electronic programmed instruction and training in some aspects of evangelism and mission.

41. Christian radio programs. Christian broadcasting has since its origin in 1921 reached more people for every hour of evangelism than any other variety. In LATIN AMERICA, the most-heard radio evangelist for a time was Maria Miranda, heard by 100 million per day over 537 stations in 22 countries in 1990. Hundreds of other locally produced Protestant broadcasts are heard daily, even in non-Christian countries: for example, 10 percent of the population of Yemen listens to Christian radio. One of the most influential and long-lasting evangelistic ministries has been ‘The Lutheran Hour’ over radio station KFUD operated by THE LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD since 1925. By 1931, 5 million heard its preaching each week; by 1987, there were 40 million regular listeners in 31 languages around the world.

42. Christian TV programs. TV activity has been going on in some 180 nations for many years. As an example, in October 1990, three shows were aired on Argentinian TV by CBN (Christian Broadcasting Network); more than eight million people saw the programs, and three million repeated the salvation prayer.

43. Urban media (cable TV, etc.). Urban areas and their 2.6 billion inhabitants have high exposure to the newest forms of electronic evangelism. Of 7,000 metropolises, every year some 1,400 hold citywide evangelistic campaigns featuring radio, TV, relays, satellites, video instruction, computer networks, the Internet, and other media. Results of recent campaigns are even more striking than those of 20 or 30 years earlier. The Rev. Y. Jeyaraj, general superintendent of the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD of INDIA, summed up a recent evangelistic campaign in Madras: “Conservatively, there were more than 250,000 converted.” Another new medium of communication is cable television. Urban media programs featuring evangelism are under way in some 3,000 metropolises and cities worldwide.

44. Christian-owned computers. Under this head are included internal or in-house word-processing, databasing, donor lists, accounting, desktop publishing, and other computer-related activities. Around 3 percent of all this relates to evangelism, outreach, and mission.

45. Internet/networks/e-mail. The latest mega-activity to be added to types of evangelism comes from the enormous expansion of electronic mail and online network activity, particularly over the internet with its 400 million users (150 million of whom are Protestants). Thousands of Christian organizations advertise and evangelize via their own home pages on the world wide web.

See also Colonialism; Jehovah's Witnesses; Mass Media; Mormonism; Post-Colonialism; Publishing, Media; Statistics

References and Further Reading

- Arias, M., and Johnson, A. The Great Commission: Biblical Models for Evangelism. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1992.
- Barrett, D.B. Selective Bibliography on Evangelism and Evangelization. Nairobi, Kenya: World Evangelization Research Centre, 1980.
- Barrett, D.B., and T.M. Johnson. World Christian Trends. Parts 22–25. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 2001.
- Castro, E., ed. Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation. Geneva, Switzerland: CWME, 1982.
- Coleman, R.E. The Master Plan of Evangelism. Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1963. (Published in India as The Lord's Plan to Spread the Good News. Madras, India: Evangelical Literature Service, 1963.)
- Dallimore, A.A. George Whitefield: Evangelist of the 18th Century Revival. London: Wakeman Trust, 1990.
- Friedrich, G. "Euangelizomai." In Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Nueun Testament. vol II, 707–737. Edited by G.Kittel. Stuttgart, Germany: Kolhammer, 1932.
- Gumbel, N. Telling Others: The Alpha Initiative. Eastbourne, UK: Kingsway, 1994.
- Hurd, A.E., and P.D.Peterson, eds. Missions and Evangelism: A Bibliography Selected From the ATLA Religion Database, January, 1985. rev. ed. Chicago, IL: American Theological Library Association, Religion Indexes, 1985.
- Pollock, J.C. D.L.Moody (Born 1837) and His Place in Modern Evangelism. The Evangelical Library Annual lecture, 1987. London: The Evangelical Library, 1987–1989.
- Samuel, V.K., and C.Sugden. Evangelism and the Poor. Bangalore, India: Partnership in Mission-Asia, 1983.
- Senyoni, J.M.M. "Bishop Festo Kivengere's Philosophy of Evangelism." Master's thesis, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, IL, 1992.
- Towns, E.L., ed. Evangelism and Church Growth: A Practical Encyclopedia. Ventura, CA: Regal Books, 1995.

DAVID B.BARRETT

EVANGELISTIC ORGANIZATIONS

Cooperative evangelistic associations have been a feature of Protestantism at least since seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Pietists summoned Protestants to show their FAITH by their works and to share their faith with the world around them (see PIETISM). Denominations and state churches have their own associations dedicated to evangelistic outreach, but cooperative efforts have claimed the energies of Protestants who regard cross-denominational task-oriented agencies as effective means to specific ends. Such agencies first appeared in Europe in part as an expression of the Pietist conviction that true Christianity was a matter of the heart rather than of religious affiliation. For 200 years, cooperative efforts have been a particularly vibrant feature of American Protestantism, and—despite their Protestant roots and their early anti-Catholic tenor—in the twentieth century, some have gained substantial Catholic support as well. Often interrelated, claiming support from overlapping constituencies if not institutional connection, evangelistic associations have been a prominent feature of the Protestant moral crusade to save the world. This emanated first from the West, but by the twentieth century it radiated from most places where evangelical Christianity thrived. It is impossible to catalogue all of the evangelistic associations that carry forward Christian cooperative evangelistic efforts. The most enduring tend to cluster around three tasks with evangelistic intent: PUBLISHING, educating, and proclamation.

Bible Societies

Since the Pietist impulse loomed large among those who urged cross-denominational cooperation on behalf of specific tasks, it is not surprising that BIBLE publication was one of the first tasks to which North Atlantic Protestants turned. Carl Hildebrandt von Canstein founded the world's first Bible society in HALLE, Germany's Pietist center, in 1710. In addition to his interest in Bible distribution, Hildebrand devoted himself to developing a new printing method that allowed production at unusually low cost. By 1722, he had added Bohemian and Polish editions to his German stock.

Britons established their first Bible society in 1719, though the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE (founded in 1698) also undertook the translation and publication of scripture as part of its mission, as did the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge (founded in 1709 and famous in the American colonies as the supporter of DAVID BRAINERD'S evangelism among Native Americans). The best known and most ambitious of the British BIBLE SOCIETIES, the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY (BFBS), was established in London in 1804 with the enthusiastic support of WILLIAM WILBERFORCE. From the beginning, BFBS leadership united Anglicans and Non-Conformists around their common emphasis on scripture (see ANGLICANISM; NON-CONFORMITY). During the nineteenth century, the BFBS established offices in continental European cities, for example, opening a Bible depot in Vienna in 1850. By 1811, BFBS distributors were at work in Egypt. By mid-century, the BFBS had undertaken the task of providing Bibles in all of the languages of the British Empire. It worked alongside the growing number of British missionaries, supporting their evangelistic outreach by helping translate and by printing scripture (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). By the end of the nineteenth century, the BFBS had more than 7,500 auxiliaries under its umbrella. Until 1901, English law limited the BFBS's circulation of English-language Bibles to the King James Version (see BIBLE, KING JAMES VERSION). The twentieth century brought the end of that restriction and saw the cooperative production of new Bible translations.

Cooperative efforts in SCOTLAND took a somewhat different course. The two most important local Bible societies, the Edinburgh Bible Society (1809) and the Glasgow Bible Society (1812), disassociated themselves from the BFBS after 1826 and in 1861 incorporated the National Bible Society of Scotland. The emergence of the National Bible Society of Scotland highlights some of the tensions that quickly beset cooperative Bible production. Disagreements over the inclusion of the Apocrypha contributed to the formation of a separate National Scottish Society. The National Bible Society of Scotland enabled evangelistic efforts of Scottish missionaries around the world. In IRELAND, the Dublin Bible Society, founded in 1806, participated in a loose federation of local Bible societies that adopted the name Hibernian Bible Society. Other British tensions surfaced over the refusal of the BFBS to exclude non-Trinitarians; this led to the emergence of a Trinitarian Bible Society.

The creation of European Bible societies was not confined to Britain. The same impulse surfaced in Scandinavia and on the Continent, where several societies enjoyed the patronage of royalty. An incomplete list suggests the extent of this movement, which stood at the evangelistic core of Western Protestantism: Basel Bible Society (1804), Berlin (later Prussian) Bible Society (1805), Russian Bible Society (1812), Swedish Bible Society (1814), Netherlands Bible Society (1814), Icelandic Bible Society (1815), Norwegian Bible Society (1816), and Protestant Biblical Society of Paris (1818). Cantonal Bible societies dotted SWITZERLAND. The Napoleonic Wars notwithstanding, Bible societies grew apace. Perhaps most remarkable was the Russian Bible Society, sanctioned by Czar Alexander I, one of the few that had an ecumenical Protestant base. Thanks to political pressure, representatives of Russia's many churches—Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Uniat, Armenian, and Lutheran—sat on its board, and by 1823 it had 289 auxiliaries. Nicholas I succeeded to the throne in 1825 and closed the Russian Bible Society the next year. Elsewhere as well, these societies sometimes found themselves curtailed by Catholic opposition or by political change.

In the UNITED STATES, the first evangelistic associations with national reach arose out of the Second Great Awakening in the Northeast (see AWAKENINGS). This early nineteenth-century burst of religious energy fueled determination to evangelize and civilize the west. Convinced that biblical morality assured divine favor, the supporters of these societies regarded the publication and distribution of inexpensive uplifting literature as crucial to the planting of the gospel in every western settlement. They supported missionaries to promote SUNDAY SCHOOLS and hired colporteurs to travel the countryside and sell mass-produced religious reading material. Protestants believed that the Bible was the single most important civilizing and Christianizing text. Like their European counterparts, Americans cooperated in Bible publishing and distribution, a task too large and too urgent to be left to any single DENOMINATION.

Protestants in the Northeast established the AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY (ABS) in May 1816, when representatives of thirty-five local and state Bible societies met in New York City, drafted a constitution, and vowed to work for the circulation of “the Holy Scripture without note or comment.” As in Europe, Americans called for a united Christian (read Protestant) front, deploring the “local feelings, party prejudices, and sectarian jealousies” that fractured Protestantism. On the first ABS board of 36 managers were some of the most distinguished American Protestants of the day, including the Revolutionary War statesman ELIAS BOUDINOT, the first president of the ABS. With head-quarters at Bible House in Manhattan, the ABS had for its model the already prosperous BFBS. By 1820, some 100,000 Bibles had poured from ABS presses.

By the twentieth century, Western Bible societies were at work in around the world. As the century progressed, their relationships to national Christian movements changed. More than 125 new national Bible societies emerged to take ownership of the work. Australians established a Bible Union in 1937; the Hong Kong Bible Society was organized in 1950; a Bible Society was established in Cambodia in 1968, ceased operation with the Khmer Rouges takeover in 1975, and reopened in 1993; and an Austrian Bible Society began functioning in 1970 after 23 years of planning by the country’s small Protestant minority. Bible societies were active in Chile from 1820, but Chilean Protestants organized their own Bible Society in 1972.

The proliferation of Bible societies in all continents led in 1946 to the founding of the United Bible Societies, an alliance for consultation among the 137 national Bible societies working in more than 200 countries. The ongoing work of Bible societies has been critical to the evangelistic efforts of Protestants (and, more recently, Catholics) around the world. Especially since Vatican II, Bible societies in some countries have drawn support and leadership from Roman Catholics as well as from Protestants. Bible societies offer the biblical message in many translations, forms, and sizes and, in recent decades, in nonprint formats as well.

Related to the conviction that access to the Bible was crucial for Christian evangelism was the creation of WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS. Founded in 1942, Wycliffe Bible Translators represented the vision of William Cameron Townsend, whose commitment to Bible translation was piqued during his visit to native peoples in Guatemala in the World War I era. Committed to providing the Bible to the thousands of language groups that had no Scripture, Townsend instituted the Summer Institute of Linguistics, a linguistics training program that began modestly in an Arkansas farm in 1934. By 1951, courses had spread to Australia and Britain, and a few years later, Wycliffe began enlisting the cooperation of German evangelicals. By the end of the twentieth century, Wycliffe was offering linguistic training courses on every continent, preparing people to work in partnership with native speakers of lesser-known languages. Wycliffe translators have completed at least 450 translations of the New Testament and portions of scripture in many more languages.

A flurry of other publishing agencies accompanied the determination to flood the world with Bibles, as evangelicals saw the usefulness of tracts, pamphlets, and inexpensive books for disseminating their message. In Britain, the Religious Tract Society, founded in 1799, offered cheaply produced moral and evangelistic literature by Anglicans and Non-Conformists. By 1825, the American Tract Society gave national scope to the production of texts ranging from tracts to a magazine to children's storybooks. Tract Society colporteurs soon peddled these printed wares in the remotest reaches of the United States. Such societies were managed by interdenominational boards and supported by the donations of those who shared a commitment to their goals. Noting the overlap of supporters and board members, some suggested that these earliest United States voluntary associations constituted a "benevolent empire."

Supports for Sunday Schools

An enterprise that relied on publishing to enable educational goals was the Sunday School. The growing number of Sunday schools in Britain led in 1795 to the creation of a Society for the Support and Encouragement of Sunday Schools. The London Sunday School Union, formed in 1803, was followed quickly by Sunday School associations in Ireland and Scotland. In 1862, at a meeting in London of representatives of British Sunday school unions, British Sunday school enthusiasts decided to extend their work to the Continent.

Meanwhile, in 1824 the American Sunday School Union (ASU) took shape to facilitate the onward march of the Sunday School movement in the United States and to meet the need of local Sunday School associations for adequate literature and other supplies. The ASU offered lessons, hymnals and, in time, Sunday school novels urging Christian values on the young. These were inexpensive and widely distributed, sometimes constituting the core of a community's first public library. The ASU also raised support for missionaries to establish Sunday schools in the west and in other places where children's religious instruction was neglected. Nondenominational Sunday schools sometimes became the nuclei of regular congregations.

In 1872, the British Sunday School Union and the American Sunday School Union agreed on a uniform lessons series. This marked an important step in making the movement's content, as well as its form, truly international. A World Sunday School Convention met in London in 1889. In 1907, the international Sunday school movement adopted the name World's Sunday School Association. In 1947, this became the World Council on Christian Education. This agency had units in many countries, and became affiliated with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1971, after the Sunday school movement had abandoned much of its early evangelistic impetus.

Bible Institutes

Another educational format with explicit evangelistic intent is the Bible institute (see BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTES). Nineteenth-century innovations, Bible institutes ranged from small enterprises without structured curricula to well-organized, on-the-road-to accreditation schools. Chicago's MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE enjoys an international reputation and offers an example of the institutes' objectives. Built on the premise that traditional schools educated would-be Christian workers away from the masses, evangelist DWIGHT L. MOODY opted to train evangelists, missionaries, and other types of Christian workers in the effective use of the English Bible and congregational singing. The school that bears his name (first called the Chicago Training Institute) combined classroom instruction with hands-on experience, and faculty impressed on students the urgency of the evangelistic task. Moody Bible Institute became a powerhouse of nondenominational conservative Protestantism in the United States, and over the past century has sent thousands of graduates to other parts of the world. Students also come to Moody from many countries. The Bible institute model adapts readily to other cultures, and throughout the twentieth century, Bible institutes proved their effectiveness in training an army of energetic evangelists on every continent. For those who cannot attend a Bible institute, correspondence work has long been available, and web-based instruction further expands possibilities. Bible institutes may be denominationally connected, but those that are not function like voluntary associations, depending directly on the contributions of those who share their vision for equipping workers for Christian outreach and nurturing a congeries of related evangelistic activities, including broadcasting, publishing, conferencing, and equipping seminars.

While Moody Bible Institute served both domestic and overseas EVANGELISM, the story of another Bible institute offers a glimpse of an even more direct connection between Bible institutes and foreign MISSIONS. In 1815, a small group of Reformed and Lutheran Pietists from Basel, Switzerland and nearby Wurttemberg, GERMANY applied for permission to open a missionary training institute. The first class of seven students entered in 1816 under the auspices of an interdenominational group, the Evangelische Missionsgesellschaft Basel. The school trained English and Dutch as well as German missionaries, and by 1821 recruited its own missionaries to serve in RUSSIA and AFRICA'S Gold Coast. In 1834 the first three missionaries of the BASEL MISSION arrived in INDIA with a commission to establish both schools and churches. The Basel Mission's formative years coincided with the rapid spread of Bible societies throughout Europe, as well as with the parallel founding of numerous foreign missions agencies. In Britain, the Baptist Missionary Society organized in 1792; the nondenominational London Missionary Society, in 1795; and the CHURCH MISSIONARY SOCIETY, the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and the Scottish Presbyterian Society, in 1799. The Basel Mission's training institute was open to all with a Pietist inclination, and its student body included Europeans from most northern European nations. This evangelistic association influenced many missions agencies by the training it offered, and its own missionaries played important roles in providing education and opposing SLAVERY (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

At about the same time, the Second Great Awakening stirred the west as well as the northeastern United States. Growing numbers of converts and large population shifts pressured denominations to provide pastors and evangelists to serve far-flung constituencies. The founding of SEMINARIES and the need for scholarships resulted in 1826 in the founding of the American Education Association, an enterprise that at first supplemental traditional evangelistic outreach to improve educational opportunities for clergy.

Youth Work

In the twentieth century, several evangelical voluntary associations directly targeted youth. Those associations with the widest reach continue to be active on university campuses worldwide. Bill and Vonnette Bright established Campus Crusade for Christ as an American outreach in 1953. With headquarters in Orlando, Florida, this agency, long since international in scope, has expanded beyond its original student focus. Some 65 percent of its 25,000 workers are outside of North America, in 191 countries, where more than 500,000 registered volunteers assist their efforts. In addition to its evangelistic work on university campuses, Campus Crusade has two widely known evangelistic tools: the Four Spiritual Laws (which presents the basic evangelistic message), and the Jesus Film, a movie presenting the life of Christ. Translated into 80 languages, the film has been viewed by some 850 million people worldwide.

The second influential student-oriented outreach is INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP. With roots at Cambridge University in ENGLAND, the movement began in Britain in 1877, shaped by student interest in global evangelism. In 1928, British InterVarsity helped organize a Canadian affiliate. Canadian InterVarsity director Stacey Woods met with University of Michigan students in 1938, and the first United States chapter resulted. In 1941, InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA officially organized. InterVarsity USA has more than 1,000 staff members and produces training materials used by hundreds of campus outreaches to students and faculty. Every three years it sponsors a huge missions gathering that uses the facilities of the University of Illinois-Urbana to enlist college students from across the United States in global missions outreach. Outside the west, InterVarsity groups at major university campuses mobilize and nurture Christian students and support broadly based evangelistic programs. InterVarsity Press has become a major supplier of resources that challenge and support Christian thought on contemporary issues.

Missionary Outreach

Evangelistic associations targeting university students are sustained by a broad evangelical impulse to share faith in every possible way. In the early national period in the United States, for example, the determination to be aggressive about planting the Gospel in the vast new territories of the Louisiana Purchase captured the imaginations of Congregationalists in New England, Presbyterians in the mid-Atlantic region, Episcopalians, Baptists, and Methodists as well as of newer groups like the Disciples of Christ. The era saw expanded foreign trade and the growth of the British Empire, and some Americans also felt the urge to convert the world. As in the colonial era, the first targets were the “heathen” of North America. The Connecticut Missionary Association, established in 1798, produced the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine to interest people in this work. A Congregational- Presbyterian Plan of Union in 1801 had as part of its purpose the efficient preaching of the gospel in the West. The Union accelerated efforts and contributed to the founding in New York City in 1826 of the American Home Missionary Association.

Meanwhile, a few students at Williams College in western Massachusetts expressed their interest in foreign missions. During their years at Andover Seminary in Boston, these and other students pursued this interest and gained the support of the General Association of Massachusetts. The same year (1810), Connecticut and Massachusetts Congregationalists cooperated to form the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN Missions. This society sent its first party of missionaries to India in 1812. Aboard ship, however, Adoniram Judson and Luther Rice changed their minds about Congregationalism and embraced Baptist views (see JUDSON FAMILY). This led in 1814 to the creation of the General Convention of the Baptist Denomination in the United States of America for Foreign Mission. Both societies recruited workers and expanded their global reach. Their contact with other cultures gave them influence over the American perception of other peoples, religions, and cultures and sometimes translated into influence in American foreign policy.

These early missionary societies—like the European Protestant missionary societies that preceded them—were denominational in intent (see MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS). By the mid-nineteenth century, non-denominational evangelistic associations took on specific tasks and invited a cooperative approach to missionary outreach. Representative of these groups is the Women’s Union Missionary Society of America for Heathen Lands (WUMS), established in November 1860 in New York by Sarah Doremus and women from six denominations. The first North American agency to send single female missionaries, the WUMS drew inspiration from a similar British endeavor and worked especially among WOMEN and children, and it soon had placed missionaries around the world. Part of the era’s growing interest in “women’s work for women,” the WUMS sent women to the secluded women to whom traditional missionaries seldom had access. By the end of the century, a long list of such nondenominational mission agencies recruited workers for worldwide evangelism. Between 1900 and 1920, for example, societies promoting village evangelism originated in India under the auspices of the Ramabai Mukti Mission, an agency led by Indians, and in England as The Fellowship for Evangelising Britain’s Villages. Such local agencies worked side-by-side with others that had national constituencies in view.

Faith Missions

None of these groups was better known than the CHINA INLAND MISSION (CIM). Established by the Englishman JAMES HUDSON TAYLOR in 1865, the CIM had no established support structure. Taylor expected his recruits to “live by faith” and pray for answers to their needs. This approach necessitated a network of supporters—often at home, but sometimes elsewhere—who would faithfully remember the needs of their ambassadors abroad. The CIM was an early example of a growing cluster of “faith missions” that veered sharply from the customary practices of the more familiar denominational, or “board,” missions. At the turn of the twentieth century, large numbers of conservative evangelicals found faith missions like the CIM or the Africa Inland Mission (founded in 1895 by Scotsman Peter Cameron Scott) satisfactory alternatives to traditional evangelistic organizations that were mired in disputes about the goals of missionary task and the implications of new THEOLOGY for world evangelization. Faith missions required little startup capital and promoted a direct sense of teamwork and cooperation in accomplishing evangelism. More flexible than denominational board missions, they appealed to people who hoped to get a job done quickly.

In the twentieth century, evangelistic associations of all kinds proliferated. New missions agencies represented both new approaches and new technology, and some older agencies adapted or merged to keep up with the times. With the closing of mainland China to Western missionaries, for example, the CIM regrouped and became the Overseas Missionary Fellowship. As missionaries pressed into ever more remote regions, the Missionary Aviation Fellowship arose to provide transportation, and the Moody Bible Institute developed a highly regarded pilot training program. Evangelicals have historically exploited opportunities and been responsive to change, and evangelistic associations that seize particular opportunities offer rapid adaptation to changing times. Evangelistic associations that enlist retirees, sports teams, students, bluecollar workers, health professionals, and other professionals for short-term missionary involvement have become more numerous. Evangelistic associations promote undercover work in closed countries; socalled “tentmakers” (a reference to St. Paul, who supported himself by tentmaking while sharing the gospel) teach English in China, distribute humanitarian aid in the Middle East, or coach basketball in Indonesia, quietly building relationships that they hope will blossom in conversions.

In the twentieth century, the professionalization and coming of age of revivalism combined with advances in technology to facilitate the formation of yet another cluster of evangelistic associations, these dedicated to fulfilling the goals of individuals or ministry teams. Since the 1950s, the best-known of these has been the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA). With roots in another evangelistic association, YOUTH FOR CHRIST, the BGEA incorporated early in the 1950s. Based for many years in Minneapolis, Minnesota (now in Charlotte, North Carolina as well), the BGEA has offices in cities around the world—Sydney, Buenos Aires, Winnipeg, London, Paris, Frankfurt, Hong Kong, Mexico City—and firm ties to native Christian leaders. Although the BGEA engages in evangelism through multiple media—World Wide Pictures, Decision magazine (in six languages and Braille), radio broadcasts, and books—the heart of its work is the traditional evangelistic crusades conducted by BILLY GRAHAM and his coworkers. Satellite television has multiplied the visibility of Billy Graham and a host of lesser-known evangelists. Graham's access to the leadership of nations around the world is unprecedented. The international scope of his influence has not been fully assessed. His son, Franklin Graham, has assumed the leadership of the organization.

Thousands of evangelistic associations like Graham's rely on gifts from supporters to enable outreaches around the world. Many originate in the West, but increasing numbers mobilize people in other parts of the world. The Luis Palau Evangelistic Association, for example, based in North America, conducts extensive work in LATIN AMERICA. An Argentinian by birth, Palau uses the media as well as traditional crusades to do evangelism. Headed by Ravi Zacharias, a native of India, the Ravi Zacharias International Ministries focuses its efforts on reaching those who shape the ideas of contemporary CULTURE. Some evangelistic associations outside the West now target Western populations.

Coordinating Efforts

The proliferation of cooperative societies dedicated either directly or indirectly to evangelistic outreach led early to concern in the West about duplication and inefficiency. The EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE—established in a burst of evangelical optimism in 1846 in London by 800 representatives from 10 countries—languished until the 1880s, when a dynamic American Congregationalist, Josiah Strong, took it in hand. Strong's enthusiasm for most things American and British smacked to some of racism, and his confidence in America's destiny shone through his agenda, but he breathed life into a dying entity. Large Evangelical Alliance congresses he organized in 1886 in London and in 1893 at the Chicago World's Fair built momentum, and by the time his social agenda forced him from the Alliance, Strong had given the organization a new lease on life. In Britain, its offices in London remain a hub for evangelicals of all denominations and none.

The nineteenth-century hope for evangelical cooperation gained global currency in 1951 with the formation of the World Evangelical Alliance (WEA). The WEA is an alliance of alliances. Its members include seven regional organizations: Association of Evangelicals of Africa, European Evangelical Alliance, Evangelical Fellowship of Asia, Evangelical Association of the Caribbean, Evangelical Fellowship of the South Pacific, and Latin American Evangelical Fellowship. Each of these, in turn, comprises evangelical alliances or associations in particular countries, for a total of 113 national evangelical alliances. In addition to these full members, the WEA welcomes as associate members evangelical agencies with significant international commitments. This list includes entities like the Chinese Coordinating Centre of World Evangelization, Food for the Hungry, JEWS FOR JESUS, and many Western-based missionary organizations.

Evangelicals also provide significant support and leadership for the humanitarian work of WORLD VISION INTERNATIONAL. Established in 1950, this partnership of Christians offers health care, education, and humanitarian aid in an effort to assist people to help themselves and pursue justice. While it is not directly evangelistic, World Vision attracts the support of evangelicals who believe that humanitarian aid may create the climate conducive to Gospel witness. Leprosy missions, orphanages, hospitals, adoption agencies, schools, and many other entities play vital roles in enabling and expanding the work of evangelistic associations.

Evangelistic associations channel Christian energies into proclaiming the Christian message. Their proponents exploit all available media, including print media and radio, with startling success. HCJB, the world's first missionary radio station, went on the air in Ecuador on Christmas 1931. Seventy years later, it was one of the world's largest short-wave broadcasters, sending evangelistic programming from Quito in twelve languages and twenty-two dialects and also airing programming from such far-flung places as Seychelles, Swaziland, and the United Kingdom. Another evangelistic association dedicated to radio is Trans World Radio, begun under the direction of American Paul Freed in 1952. It beamed its first broadcast to Spain from a small transmitter in Tangier, Morocco. Fifty years later, it boasted 1,800 hours of programming each week from thirteen powerful transmitters and 2,300 local stations. Its Christian programming reached 160 countries in 180 languages. Served by missionaries and local staff, such broadcast evangelistic associations are the best known of many that flourished in the twentieth century.

Evangelistic associations come and go. Some change significantly over time and modify their early evangelistic goals. The YMCA (see YMCA/YWCA) and, to some extent, the older Bible societies have shed their evangelistic edge. Other agencies disappeared because they could not sustain support, or they merged, or they adapted to altered conditions by changing name or focus. Since World War II, an enormous number of new evangelistic associations jostle with established associations for money and recruits. The communications and transportation revolutions promote global awareness and make possible evangelistic interactions unimagined by earlier generations. Evangelistic associations will certainly adapt their strategies, but they will not go away. They are deeply embedded in the core of what twenty-first-century Christians assume it means to be evangelical. And EVANGELICALISM'S entrepreneurial instincts find in the voluntary association model a flexible and efficient means to an all-consuming end.

References and Further Reading

- Bays, Daniel, and Grant Wacker, eds. The Foreign Missionary Enterprise at Home. Tuscaloosa, AL: University of Alabama Press, 2003.
- Bebbington, David. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain. London: Unwin Hyman, 1989.
- Carpenter, Joel, and Wilbert Shenk, eds. Earthen Vessels: American Evangelicals and Foreign Missions, 1880–1980. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1990.
- Hall, Peter Dobkin. Religion and the Origin of Voluntary Associations in the United States. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.
- Mott, Jon R. The Young Men 's Christian Association and the Evangelical Churches. New York: Association Press, 1921.
- Weisenfeld, Judith. African American Women and Christian Activism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.

Wosh, Peter. Spreading the Word: The Bible Business in the Nineteenth Century. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1994.

Wuthnow, Robert. The Restructuring of American Religion: Society and Faith Since World War II. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.

EDITH L. BLUMHOFER

F

FAITH

The most controversial aspect of Protestantism that emerged during the REFORMATION centered on the Protestant understanding of faith. Scholastic theology heavily influenced the prevailing Roman Catholic view on faith, creating a series of functional dualisms vastly removed from the original biblical understanding. These dualisms focused on the distinction between content of faith (in Latin fides quae) and subjective actions of faith (fides qua): the distinction between faith of laypersons in assenting to ORTHODOXY without understanding it (fides implicita) and faith of clergy in assenting to the same universal truths (fides explicita), between faith appropriated through natural means (fides acquisita) and faith incorporated into the soul alongside other virtues by supernatural means (fides infusa). The dualism drawing the Reformer's most ardent ire involved the distinction between "unformed faith" (fides informis), a faith unrelated to love and able to exist alongside mortal sin; and "formed faith" (fides caritate formatd), a faith formed by and continually active in love. These aspects of faith required meritorious works by the believer to achieve JUSTIFICATION.

MARTIN LUTHER reacted to this formulation through the notion popularly known as justification by faith alone. Luther argued against the priority of love for perfecting faith by emphasizing the free gift of GRACE from God. Luther understood the "righteousness of God" in Romans 1:17 as justifying, not punishing, the sinner. In Hebrews 11:1 he understood faith as trust in God's promises rather than faith achieved through good works. Saving faith focused on the sufficiency of Christ's work divinely imputed to the sinner. This understanding of faith was refined by Luther's contemporaries. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI heavily focused on the certainty of faith through a clear knowledge of ELECTION. For Zwingli, faith was both a pledge of the Holy Spirit that seals the believer's heart, and a trust that God will protect and guide the believer. Faith enables the believer to reconcile contradictory passages and bring understanding to Scriptural meaning. To support his assertion, Zwingli affirmed that faith and Scripture are inseparable, citing Christ's own appeal to Scripture to further demonstrate the certainty of God's guidance. Faith is a sense that God assures us inwardly with the Holy Spirit while acknowledging that external matters contribute nothing to justification. As such, Zwingli understood the LORD'S SUPPER to be little more than a liturgy of "signs." Luther and JOHN CALVIN continued to affirm the divine efficacy of the Lord's Supper and vigorously rejected this radical reappraisal of the sacrament. Unlike Zwingli, Calvin was aware that the believer's faith is always weak and requires regular strengthening through the ministries of the church and the administration of the sacraments.

While all the reformers unanimously described faith as a gift from God, relating it to the workings of the Holy Spirit and Scripture, Calvin provided the clearest exposition on the role of the Holy Spirit in matters of faith. Calvin described faith as the principal work of the Holy Spirit. Believers do not initiate faith, but faith is founded upon the “might of the Spirit.” Consequently, the Spirit is the “inner teacher” by whose effort the promise of SALVATION penetrates the believer’s mind. Like Zwingli, Calvin affirmed the inseparable relationship between faith and the Word of God and that these “can no more be disconnected from each other than rays of light from the sun” (Institutes III:2:6). And while faith is both a matter of heart and mind, Calvin stressed that “the knowledge of faith consist more of certainty than discernment” (Institutes III:2:14). For Calvin, certainty is dependent on the activity of the Holy Spirit and the restoration of right worship of God through the genuine teaching and PREACHING of Scripture by the church.

The Roman Catholic reaction to this Protestant formulation was ratified in the Council of Trent (1547), which condemned the “vain confidence of [these] heretics” (see CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM). Other reactions came from Radical Reformers such as Anabaptists and Inspirationists, or Pietists (see ANABAPTISM PIETISM). Many Anabaptists emphasized the importance of good works as testimony to the presence of faith. Pietists, like THOMAS MÜNTZER, emphasized the primacy of experiential revelatory faith as opposed to faith informed by biblical revelation.

The Post-Reformation understandings of faith took on numerous expressions. In reaction to the development of orthodox CALVINISM, JACOBUS ARMINIS began an unpretentious revival of the role of meritorious works in faith. Introducing the notion of faith as a human work upon which the pardon of SIN is suspended, Arminius reacted strongly to the claim that God damns individuals for eternity (see ARMINIANISM). Arminius linked the concept of PREDESTINATION with faith by reducing the decision of faith to a simple human possibility. While agreeing with Calvinists that there was no salvation apart from faith, Arminius accepted that faith was the basis of predestination, rather than the orthodox Calvinist’s view that predestination was the basis of faith.

PURITANISM also developed away from mainstream Reformation thought by demanding that certitude be confirmed only through the experience of holy living. The Puritan emphasis on holy living eventually influenced other expressions of Protestantism such as METHODISM and the HOLINESS MOVEMENT. These Protestant expressions accepted that faith and religious knowledge were not derived from objective theological formulation but rather blossom from the experiences of the believer’s heart.

The eighteenth-century ENLIGHTENMENT bore witness to a sustained attack on traditional categories of faith and religious dogma through the emergence of Rationalism. Popularly represented as DEISM and Protestant Scholasticism, some Protestant theologians such as Jean Aphonse Turretin sought to reduce Christianity to a core of moral principles and universally held beliefs. Faith was subsumed into an objectified natural religion. The climax of Enlightenment philosophies arrived with IMMANUEL KANT, who redirected contemporary thought by defining the limits of knowledge. Kant drew a sharp distinction between “phenomena” (knowledge which we derive from experience of the world) and “noumena” (a priori transcendental knowledge). This eventually led to the claim that knowledge of the world could not lead to knowledge of God. While Kant intended to eliminate speculative knowledge in order to “make room for faith,” he unwittingly reset the course of THEOLOGY, allowing the development of liberalism into diverse expressions (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). In the case of FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, certainty of faith was grounded in psychological and emotional experience rather than in natural theology or biblical revelation. Here faith is grounded in a feeling of absolute dependence. Late nineteenth century liberalism tended to view institutionalized religion, traditional creeds, and metaphysics with uncertainty, although this skepticism was offset by a confidence in human progress and the unhindered quest for a unified vision of truth. ADOLF VON HARNACK clearly stated these themes in his 1901 book What Is Christianity? Harnack’s approach was to define true Christianity by “stripping off the husks and lay[ing] bare the kernel [of truth].” Harnack proposed that the core of Christianity is the personality and teachings of Jesus, which could be summed up through the commandment to love. This ethic of love grounded faith into a praxis of social engagement and framework of evolutionary progress. However, the rising confidence in human progress was shattered by World War I with the theological vacuum appropriated by NEO-ORTHODOXY and FUNDAMENTALISM.

Reacting to liberalism, fundamentalism affirmed previous Protestant faith expressions and theologies within a rationalistic framework by affirming the AuTHORITY, inspiration, and inerrancy of Scripture (see BIBLICAL INERRANCY). Appropriating a form of seventeenth-century Calvinistic scholasticism, fundamentalism was committed to resisting social change in order to preserve what were considered to be the correct articles of faith. Faith was characterized as propositional assent in order to preserve certainty, an approach that has continued on into contemporary forms of conservative EVANGELICALISM.

On the other hand, liberalism heavily influenced neo-orthodoxy, which tended to emphasize the divine origin and nature of faith. Neo-orthodox faith was characterized as active assent to the elusive, mysterious and non-propositional divine prompting. Its most popular exponent was KARL BARTH, and while his views evolved over time, he nevertheless understood faith within the framework of divine immanence. This framework took the form of the “Word of God,” which was not a proposition or object but God actually speaking. The real object of inquiry was Jesus Christ, the true foundation of faith. For Barth, certainty was the result of the triumph of God’s grace rather than the results of natural theologies or human expression.

In turn, Barth significantly influenced DIETRICH BONHOEFFER who formulated the challenging question “Who is Christ for us today?” Bonhoeffer’s faith engagement between certainty and uncertainty is clearly seen in his understanding of mystery as the root of everything comprehensible. And while faith is part of mystery that cannot be transformed into knowledge, Bonhoeffer paradoxically states that “mystery does not mean merely that one does not know something...the deepest mystery is not the person farthest away but precisely the one closest to us” (Feil 1985:6). This mystery is located at the center of the distinction between faith and theologies, thus influencing Bonhoeffer to urgently define the relation between theory and praxis. As a result, Bonhoeffer placed theology and faith in the service of Christian praxis, and is remembered for such expressions as “a world come of age” and “Religionless Christianity.” Bonhoeffer’s theology eventually influenced radical theologians of the 1960s, who introduced such expressions as the DEATH OF GOD and the Ground of Being (see ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS) to explain the failure of anthropomorphic religious language in addressing contemporary religious concerns.

Today contemporary theology weaves between radicalism and new conservatism. Faith expressed in POSTMODERNITY is subject to a new openness brought out by the challenges of pluralism, poststructuralism, and ECUMENISM. While this openness to inquire into all aspects of faith may create great tension, the engagement of certainty and uncertainty within the ongoing process of redemption will continue to shape the future of Protestant expressions of faith.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Calvin, John. Institutes of the Christian Religion. 2 vols. Edited by J.T. McNeill, Translated by F.L. Battles. Philadelphia, PA: Library of Christian Classics Vols. 20–21, 1960.

Luther, Martin. Luther's Works. Vol 26, Lectures on Galatians, 1535, Chapters 1–4. Edited by J. Pelikan. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1963.

Secondary Sources:

Berkouwer, G.C. The Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth. London: Paternoster, 1956.

Dillenberger, John, and Claude Welch. Protestant Christianity—Interpreted Through Its Development. New York: Macmillan, 1988.

Feil, E. The Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer. Translated by M. Rumscheidt. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1985.

Stephens, W.P. The Theology of Huldrych Zwingli. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1986.

JASON C. HARLEY

FAITH HEALING

Diverse types of faith, or religious, healing are practiced within Protestant churches. The practices vary according to the theological accounts given of the process of healing, the sense of the miraculous, the perception of process, and the place of skills in the performance of the minister. The relationship between religious healing and conventional medicine is often one of tension. In some religious traditions there is a rejection of the world that implies a refusal to use its medical science. Elsewhere, the relationship is complementary, and there is recent evidence of a reformulated healing ministry within the pastoral role of clergy.

Definitions

Religious intervention in matters of human health takes a variety of forms, and we may distinguish a number of categories: those that are attributed exclusively to divine power, those centered on the religious healer, and those dependent on a measure of trust on the part of the individual to be healed.

Miraculous healing excludes those forms of religious healing that may be attributed to the skill of the minister or the process of therapy, including counseling or PRAYER. Within the Christian faith the archetypes of this category are the healing miracles of Jesus of Nazareth, which included the raising to life of those reported to be dead as well as relief from less terminal conditions. The notion of miraculous healing is problematic in that some would regard the effect of prayer to be a miracle, whereas others might see it as a kind of therapy. Some skeptics or demythologists might venture to explain the conditions cured by Jesus as psychosomatic and notice that they did not include, for example, the repair of broken limbs. Within the category of the miraculous, divine healing is the term applied to beneficial effects on the condition of a sufferer that are attributed to a supernatural power acting independently of the faith of the subject and of the skills of the human agent or healer. The concept of divine healing prevails among traditional Pentecostals (see PENTECOSTALISM). Faith healing, by contrast, refers to those forms in which an improvement or cure relies on the trust or confidence of the subject. This trust is typically developed in a religious context and invested in an almighty power, but in a secular sense faith can equally be a belief in the self or in the minister of healing or in a set of procedures.

Within the category of religious healing there is a much noticed and distinctive type in the form of shamanism. This is the term given to procedures that center on the skills or spiritual endowments of a healer or shaman: its classical forms have been observed in tribal communities in northern Siberia and places remote from Western Protestantism, but shamanic practices have also been recognized in the West, notably by M.B. McGuire.

Although this typology may be useful in identifying approaches to religious healing—and is indeed grounded in the perceptions of practitioners—there is an ambivalence about some cases. Those whose names and reputations are used to attract large audiences to healing meetings may insist that they have no power of their own but that God has chosen to work through them: in this way they define their practice as divine healing but the mediated construction of their practice may celebrate the person of the healer.

The Rejection of Worldly Medicine

Tensions between secular medicine and the ministrations of religious professionals have characterized the postures of a number of world-rejecting sects in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. They are, however, rooted in biblical precedents. It is reported that “the king Asa in the thirty and ninth year of his reign was diseased in his feet, until his disease was exceeding great; yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord but to the physicians. And Asa slept with his fathers, and died in the one and fortieth year of his reign” (II Chronicles 16:12–13).

The inference is that Asa might have recovered from his gout had he turned to prayer. Such is the lesson drawn from the demise of Asa by many of the faithful who distance the religious community from the wisdom of the world. In 1899 a member of a fundamentalist Christian sect in London, the Plumstead Peculiars, declined to call a doctor to his ailing newborn child and, when the child died, faced conviction for manslaughter. “I have an honest belief in the power of prayer,” said the father. “When the King was the Prince of Wales and had typhoid, prayers were offered up throughout the land, and he recovered.”

The Judge observed: “My recollection is that Sir William Gill [the royal physician] had something to do with the recovery.... It is wicked that these people should let their children die, when by taking ordinary precautions which God has placed in their power they could save them.”

These examples evidence not an explicit taboo on secular means of healing, but a conviction in the adequacy of prayer and a sense that recourse to a doctor is a sign of weakening FAITH. The reluctance to abandon religious faith for secular science is particularly pronounced in respect of the condition JOHN BUNYAN terms “the Slough of Desspond,” more popularly diagnosed as depression. In respect to such conditions, there is a sense that the individual, the religious organizations, and their God ought to be sufficient to restore health. The sense of betrayal of Christian faith and its ministers when seeking help from a doctor or psychologist is prompted partly by the concept of “wholeness” and the equation of SIN and suffering in the teaching of Jesus. He cures with the significant words, “Thy faith has made thee whole” and asks whether it is easier to say “Thy sins be forgiven thee” or “Arise and walk” (Matthew 9:5).

The notion that right belief is the key to good health is in modern times associated particularly with CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. This movement owes to earlier currents the principle of mental healing that perceives illness as a condition of the mind. Such a diagnosis may be traced in Christian practice to the theology of a Swedish scientist EMANUEL SWEDENBORG (1688–1772), founder of the religious sect that bears his name. The Swedenborgian principle was that healing could be effected by harmonizing physical and spiritual realities, adjusting the body to the mind, the mind to the soul, and the soul to the angelic order. This idea of mental adjustment was prevalent in the movement called mesmerism, which was fashionable in America in the mid-nineteenth century. It was propagated in the teachings of the mesmerist Charles Poyen, of Phineas Parkhurst Quimby, and subsequently in the writings of MARY BAKER EDDY, the founder of Christian Science. In 1875 she published her Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, citing Matthew 9:2–8 to demonstrate the central tenet that sickness and pain were delusions curable by the correction of mental error:

It is plain that God does not employ drugs or hygiene, nor provide them for human use; else Jesus would have recommended them in his healing. The sick are more deplorably lost than the sinning if the sick cannot rely on God for help and the sinning can.

JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES, by contrast, are happy to seek healing through hospitals, albeit upon certain conscientious conditions. For Witnesses, secular medicine does not contradict faith in the power of prayer. It is rather that they read in Genesis 9:4 and Acts 15:29 a taboo on consuming bloods and therefore upon blood transfusion. They have in recent years been active in exploring and documenting alternatives to blood transfusion, but there have been cases in Australia and the United States where the children of Witnesses have been made wards of the court to authorize certain treatment.

Although abstention from secular medicine per se or from particular practices has in many cases often been a dimension of a more general rejection of the world, it has not necessarily been so. In the case of the AMISH, for example, taboos on the use of motor transport and electricity are not applied against resort to medical treatment. Resistance is based on a preference for time-honored remedies, not on religious dogma. Curiously, those religious organizations within the Christian faith that have studiously refrained from secular medicine have not been those that used high profile healing events in their outreach or featured in a sensational way the cases of those who have been cured against the expectations of their doctors. Rather, their disposition has been a defensive one.

Healing in the Context of Faith

The historic relationships of religion and health may be regarded within two traditions, both attended by tensions. On one hand, there is an approval for conventional medicine, a willing resort to it, and material and moral support for its practitioners. This accord, in which clergy would deploy medical science in the fulfillment of their pastoral role, was memorably described by the Reverend COTTON MATHER (1663–1728) as the “angelical conjunction.” In the late eighteenth century, the founder of Methodism, JOHN WESLEY, published and republished a book called Primitive Physick, demonstrating and commending a knowledge of herbal remedies alongside a belief in the power of faith. In England the established church took responsibility for the provision of a number of hospitals: St. Bartholomew’s was founded in 1123 and St. Thomas’s was started in a parish church by that name in Southwark, where the original operating theater survives. The angelical conjunction was to suffer a fall and enjoy a subsequent rise. In time the differentiation of professions would relieve the clergy of many of the skills they had assumed as obligations of their Christian vocation, including architecture and finance as well as pastoral activities. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries the functions of care passed largely to the state in the name of welfare. The “conjunction” revived as the welfare state faltered. Clergy and lay persons of the mainstream Christian churches sought the skills and practiced in the role of counselors. The notion of healing was broadened to apply to the recovery not merely of a physical but of a mental or emotional condition and of satisfactory relationships. Perhaps as a response to the standard Marxist critique that the hope of a life hereafter enables the faithful to endure the discomforts of the present world, the burgeoning Pentecostal churches of Central America have kept physical dimensions of the human condition in sharp focus. R.A. Chesnut found rather less evidence in Brazil of a conviction in remote consolation than in the hope of immediate relief from the illnesses that attend poverty.

On the other hand, there is a disposition among some religious organizations to direct medical practice according to their own principles. The private hospitals in the United States belonging to, for example, the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH are administered according to the divine revelations about health received in the 1860s by its prophetess ELLEN GOULD WHITE (1827–1915).

The practice of miraculous healing in meetings of the revivalist type has recently enjoyed a resurgence through television and modern methods of communication (see TELEVANGELISTS; PUBLISHING, MEDIA). Its effects are visible and its challenge to conventional medicine is derisive. The book that records the miracles God has worked through the healing evangelist Melvin Banks shows on the front cover the picture of a woman holding aloft her walking stick in defiance of the doctors who said she would always need it. Miraculous healing in Catholicism focuses on certain shrines such as Lourdes, whereas the Protestant counterpart is focused on individuals with charismatic gifts.

The presentation of a sick or disabled person at a healing crusade may, if recovery does not follow, result in disappointment if not cognitive dissonance, although nothing else is lost unless the dependency on faith excludes the recourse to conventional therapy. Those affirming a divine plan may recognize a place within it for the secular professions, for example, "It is wonderful how God can use doctors and nurses." However, there are implications of a legal kind when conventional medicine is refused. In the last twenty years there have been a number of cases in which parents have been brought before American courts after the deaths of children whom they had entrusted to Christian Science practitioners. When prayer has not been effective, both parents and practitioners have been variously charged with child abuse, negligence, and manslaughter.

New Directions in Christian Ministry

Until recent years the practice of hands-on healing and therapy has been found rather more in the marginal sects than in the mainstream churches. However, in a much-noticed work, McGuire (1988) has documented the prevalence of healing rituals in the religious life of suburban America. In "the metaphysical movement," Maguire detects elements that derive from various nominally Christian traditions, from New Thought, mesmerism, the mind-cure groups of the 1880s, Spiritualism, Christian Science, and an experimental interest in currents of spirituality that are or were native American, Latin American, Caribbean, and Polynesian. Metaphysical healing is a syncretic movement that is open to alternative pathology and Eastern philosophy and redefines received notions of illness and dysfunction. This is a world of house-groups rather than of rallies and conventions; it is about processes rather than persons, and ritual practices are devolved rather than centralized.

The variety of life and death concerns that are addressed by hands-on therapy rituals in the religious life of the American suburb similarly occupies the ministry of healing in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. It is a pastoral movement in which healing is recognized as an easing of some problem or discomfort rather than the absolute elimination of an adverse condition. It is not spectacular; it does not celebrate its results; it is not advertised as a crowd-puller, although it is a legitimating principle in the church's mission. The ministry operates, for example, in the rehabilitation of counseling and psychotherapy within the sacred domain, in the hospice movement pioneered in Britain by Dr. Cicely Saunders, and in the provision of healing services within the regular ministrations of the mainstream churches. The purpose of ministry to the dying is to enable them to die well, not to recover to full health. Typically, a parish may designate one service a month as a healing service when those desiring healing may have hands laid on them by ministers who may be available for counsel. There is no expectation of instant cure, the congregation is not invited to behold the effect, and photographers do not stand by. Conventional medicine and the prayerful ministry of the church are perceived to be complementary, whereas in some sects conventional medicine forms are respected, if at all, as agents of the divine will. The church-type ministry looks to the Gospel for its motivation, whereas the tradition of miraculous healing looks to Pauline teachings, notably I Corinthians 12, for its authority.

If ritualized healing is directed by a literal interpretation of a biblical imperative to "Lay hands on the sick and they shall be healed" (Mark 16:18), the church's ministry of pastoral care is, in the spirit of the angelical conjunction, an endeavor to discern the meaning of the Gospel and to convey it to points of need.

References and Further Reading

- Chesnut, R.A. Born Again in Brazil. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997.
- Eddy, Mary Baker. Science and Health: with Key to the Scriptures. Boston: Trustees of Mary Baker Eddy, 1906.
- Eliade, M. Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy. Translated by W.R.Trask. New York: Bollingen Foundation, 1964.
- Maddocks, M. The Christian Healing Ministry. London: SPCK, 1995.
- McGuire, M.B. Ritual Healing in Suburban America. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Martin, D. Tongues of Fire. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1990.
- Pullar, P. Spiritual and Lay Healing. London: Penguin, 1988.
- Trotter, R.T., and J.A.Chavira. Curanderismo: Mexican American Folk Healing, 2nd ed. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1997.

ROGER HOMAN

FALWELL, JERRY (1933–)

American preacher and televangelist. Falwell was born on August 11, 1933 in Lynchburg, Virginia. He is best known as a television evangelist, or “televangelist” and founder of the Moral Majority. His significance lies in his critical leadership in shifting large numbers of fundamentalist Christians away from their historic separation of religion and politics and resulting political inactivism, to an active engagement in politics, which they previously considered to be secular. Falwell’s political organization, Moral Majority, which he formed in 1979, played a key role in mobilizing the “Religious Right,” beginning with registering new voters.

In defense of FUNDAMENTALISM, Falwell sought to restore the nation’s “Christian” underpinnings by attempting to legislate through Congress a Bible-based morality, which he claimed had been eroded by proponents of equal rights for women and homosexuals (see HOMOSEXUALITY), abortion rights, and “secular humanism.” His television program, the “Old-Time Gospel Hour,” one of the most watched religious broadcasts during the 1980s, offered a platform to the new political movement, the rise of which coincided with that of TELEVANGELISM. The National Association of Religious Broadcasters inducted Falwell into its Broadcasting Hall of Fame in 1985.

The attention he received by the media, most of it negative, while lobbying Congress and President Ronald Reagan and acting as a cultural critic made Falwell a household name through the 1980s. Unsuccessful in implementing the Moral Majority’s conservative social agenda, even with the support of the conservative Reagan, whose election the religious right had supported, and unable to raise funds needed to continue, Falwell disbanded the organization in 1989.

Pastor of one of the nation’s largest Protestant churches, Thomas Road Baptist Church in Lynchburg, Falwell is also founder and chancellor of Liberty University.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Falwell, Jerry. Strength for the Journey: An Autobiography of Jerry Falwell. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Secondary Source:

Harding, Susan Friend. The Book of Jerry Falwell: Fundamentalist Language and Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2000.

BOBBY C.ALEXANDER

FAMILY

Behind the Protestant understanding of family lies a complex history of devotion and debate. From the REFORMATION on, believers from many different times and places have idealized the human family as a school of godly character, a perfect metaphor of divine love, and a model of Christian unity. Even as the meaning and structure of family life have changed over time, the idealized visions persist—a testimony to its powerful and enduring grasp on the Protestant imagination.

Yet family has also been a potent instrument of controversy. On one level, this is not surprising, given the fact that domestic life encompasses a range of deeply sensitive human issues: SEXUALITY, childrearing, the promise of birth, and the finality of DEATH. In the five centuries since the Reformation, Protestant thinkers have produced an enormous body of work articulating church teaching on such matters, yet Protestant churches have exercised an uncertain jurisdiction over the private lives of their parishioners, often caught in the competing pressures of secular life. Just as the reformers sought to persuade their parishioners against the practice of clandestine marriage in the sixteenth century, modern evangelical leaders have struggled to enforce biblical standards of DIVORCE and remarriage within their broad and often fractious constituencies.

In an even larger sense, however, Protestant discourse about family life has played a major role in matters of religious identity. The periodic need to delineate key beliefs and practices around MARRIAGE, childrearing, and sexuality has often corresponded with some fundamental shifts in Protestant thought. The structure of this essay in fact lifts up three significant examples of this parallel process. The first section deals with the role of family in the Reformation and its importance as a means of articulating important differences between Protestants and Catholics, and as a site for instructing the faithful. The second section discusses the importance of family at another crucial juncture, the post-ENLIGHTENMENT retooling of Christian faith to meet the demands of an industrializing, urbanizing world. The third and final section describes the central role of family in the contemporary encounter between religion and the modern global world, most dramatically encapsulated in the fundamentalist response.

The Reformation

The reformers' rejection of priestly CELIBACY placed family at the center of the Protestant polemic against Catholicism. Whereas MARTIN LUTHER and his followers did not believe that an unmarried priesthood was categorically wrong, they were not willing to make it a requirement for all CLERGY, for they believed that this would lead only to hypocrisy and abuse. Celibacy, they argued, was the gift of a particular few, and marriage was the higher calling required of all believers. Thus Luther urged his fellow Protestant clergy to marry and establish households, following suit himself when he wed Katherine von Bora, a former nun, in 1525.

Although the Protestant Reformers denied that marriage was a sacrament or in any sense a direct means of sanctifying GRACE, they were convinced that marriage was ordained by God for the spiritual benefit of all Christians. For one thing, the married state saved individuals from the temptations of lust, which Luther in particular believed were a serious threat to a godly life. But even the daily give and take of domestic affairs could lead one closer to God; Luther declared that God and all his angels smiled at the sight of a father washing his baby's diapers, for even as menial and dirty a task as this might be undertaken "in Christian faith." Luther's remarkable statement adds weight to historian Steven Ozment's view that the Reformers' emphasis on family life was one of their most enduring legacies, a protest against Catholic ecclesiastical practice that over time became one of the most visible and successful of all Protestant reforms.

In some ways, however, the Protestant Reformation introduced a more secular approach to marriage as an institution regulated primarily by the state, not the church (see CHURCH AND STATE OVERVIEW). The point at issue was the problem of clandestine marriage, in which couples wed by mutual consent without the knowledge or approval of parents or church. The reformers, who wanted entry into marriage to be as easy as possible, blamed the custom on confusion generated by the complexities of canon law. Their solution was to give the state primary legal responsibility for regulating marriage. Thus secular law publicly legitimized a couple's decision to wed while the church provided moral oversight, especially in cases of infidelity or abuse. This series of reforms did not immediately amount to drastic changes in practice, because a great deal of canon law was simply transferred into state statutes, but, as historian John Witte has argued, it did lay a foundation for a more secular, contract-oriented model of marriage in the future.

Family was also an important social context for teaching and establishing the Protestant faith among new believers. It is important to remember that the reformers' assumptions about family life grew out of their sixteenth-century northern European context, in which families were considerably larger and more complex than their modern counterparts. Generalizations about sixteenth-century families are difficult, for the historical evidence has proven frustratingly elusive or incomplete, and their exact composition has been a matter of heated debate among scholars. Yet in broad terms, it is proper to speak of the Reformation era family as a household, a group of related individuals living together under one roof, but often as not including various kin and servants. A married couple formed the center of this arrangement, but the number and configuration of family members could change considerably over time as children came and went, parents aged, and various relatives took up residence, sometimes as servants to the rest of the household.

The Protestant reformers emphasized the father's role as the spiritual head of his household. Although in some ways the reformers' emphasis on the spiritual dimensions of married life elevated the role of WOMEN, Reformation teachings left Western-style patriarchy very much intact. In a voluminous list of sermons on marriage and housekeeping handbooks, Protestant leaders explicitly directed fathers to lead their households in regular times of PRAYER and in attendance at public WORSHIP. The Reformers also provided CATECHISMS for fathers to use for the doctrinal instruction of their children, as well as handbooks detailing the proper means of achieving a unified, Christian household.

Like most sixteenth-century Europeans, the Reformers did not sentimentalize CHILDHOOD, nor did they skimp on applying doctrines of original sin. Not surprisingly, their recommendations for disciplining children often sound harsh to modern ears. This did not mean, however, that sixteenth-century Protestants did not find pleasure in raising children. Most historians no longer accept the thesis developed by French scholar Philippe Aries, that in an age of high infant mortality rates, premodern families did not especially mourn the loss of a child; to be sure, sixteenth-century parents did not romanticize their children's moral capacities, but the very sinfulness of the young made careful parenting all the more critical. Most of the Reformers adopted infant rather than adult BAPTISM, and understood it as a preliminary framework for the development of an adult saving FAITH in Christ. Baptism was not in any sense a guarantee of SALVATION, and each child required a regimen of firm parental discipline, didactic instruction, and constant prayer for his or her eventual salvation.

The English Reformation added another dimension to Protestant understanding, specifically the idea of family as a church within the CHURCH. This metaphor reflected the assumption of Anglican thinkers, as representatives of England's state church, that religion was key to maintaining social order. Thus, family became a microcosm of the secular state, a little commonwealth bound together by respect for properly ordained AUTHORITY residing in the father as head of the household. The English Puritans took the metaphor in a more spiritual direction (see PURITANISM). In their view, the various members of a family constituted a church in miniature, bonded together by the mutual obligations of COVENANT. Thus, although the wife was considered both physically and spiritually the "weaker vessel" of the marriage relationship, her husband could not take advantage of his superior status. He was obliged to provide for her well-being and to live in spiritual partnership with her. Similarly, Puritan parents had covenantal duties toward their children, to provide them with daily necessities and firm discipline, but also regular opportunities for family worship, catechetical instruction, and godly example.

Family relationships provided some of the most elevated spiritual metaphors in Puritan devotional writing. Poet Edward Taylor wrote of the "ravishment" of his soul by Christ the yearning bridegroom; he likened God's work in the heart of a Christian to a woman's patient attention to her household tasks, spinning and weaving thread into a finished cloth garment. Puritan writers were also fond of comparing the believer to a baby feeding contentedly from a mother's breast.

Historian Steven Ozment has suggested that the centrality of family in Puritan life signaled a "domestication" of Protestant belief, as the otherworldly asceticism of the celibate priest gave way to the conviction that God was most clearly manifest in the happy, well-regulated home of the believer. More than just a school of godly character or a guardian against lust, the Puritan household was itself a unique conduit of divine grace. Although perhaps few individual families measured up to this spiritual ideal, in centuries to follow, the model of the Christian family would take an even deeper hold in the culture of Western Protestantism.

Protestants and the Bourgeois Family

From the sixteenth century onward through the nineteenth, families in the West became smaller and more nuclear, that is, centered around a single married couple and their children. Although historians have vigorously debated the meaning, causes, and extent of this change—which did not, of course, affect all families equally—at least part of the force behind it was practical: declining child mortality rates, increased urbanization, and INDUSTRIALIZATION meant that large, extended households were not necessarily an economic advantage. The emerging bourgeois family depended on a single wage earned by the father, who left his domicile each morning to labor in the public world of business and commerce, while mother and children lived more quietly within the private sphere of the home.

The new model identified family as central to the developing world of private life, characterized by an ordered intimacy between spouses, parents, and children. To be sure, access to a private life was certainly economically determined; few working class or rural families could demarcate their lives into separate spheres of home and work. Yet, as it developed in the nineteenth century, the domestic ideal had widespread currency. As market-driven economies made everincreasing demands on those striving for success, home became the place where morality and religion lodged most deeply.

Although historians have debated the effect of bourgeois domesticity on the status of women, it certainly marked a departure from the traditional patriarchal household of centuries past. In some ways, the bourgeois pattern increased the subordinate status of women, assuming that they would be economically dependent on a male provider and fill a submissive role in the marriage relationship as well. Moreover, in most Western legal systems, women had no independent standing before the law; the legal principle of “femme covert” meant that a man always took responsibility for his wife’s or daughter’s property and wages and represented her in the political arena. Yet in other ways, the emerging bourgeois family undercut the old assumptions of patriarchal society by emphasizing the necessity of mutual love and intimacy in marriage. By the late nineteenth century, falling birth rates among middle-class women suggest a shift in the balance of power in the bedroom as well. Indeed, in the long run, women’s ownership of the domestic sphere allowed them to assume increasingly direct responsibility for upholding social morality. The social networks that they created on behalf of TEMPERANCE and other moral causes eventually became a platform for voicing a common complaint against their legal and social disadvantages. By the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, the legal barriers against women were beginning to fall, marked by the passage of married women's property acts and suffrage amendments in most of the Western industrialized nations.

The intimacy of middle-class family life also centered increasingly on children. By the eighteenth century, and especially in the rising democratic ethos of the UNITED STATES, the feudal assumption that all children would simply inherit their parents' station in life did not reflect reality. To a degree, the "discovery of childhood" in the early modern West drew from the democratic ethos of the ENLIGHTENMENT and the optimism of Romantic thought. Emile, JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU'S archtypical child of nature, was not a stubborn sinner, but rather a young innocent with an innate potential for rational thought and an infinite capacity for good. Falling child mortality rates, paired with declining family size, also contributed to this trend, allowing parents in the urbanized middle classes to devote more specific attention to the moral and intellectual growth of each individual child.

This new ideal of family intimacy did not mesh easily with some forms of Protestant belief. On the most fundamental level, the celebration of childhood innocence came into conflict with the Augustinian doctrine of original sin. In a strictly logical sense, this teaching held that all children came into the world under its stain and were thus liable for eternal punishment, even if death came within minutes of birth. Yet from Augustine's time on, Christian thinkers had struggled against the apparent injustice; Thomas Aquinas in fact posited a "limbo" for the souls of unbaptized children. Even the Puritan divines recognized the difference between the logical implications of a DOCTRINE and the emotional needs of parents grieving the loss of a child.

The emphasis on adult CONVERSION in the evangelical REVIVALS of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries also posed a quandary for parents. To what extent were they responsible for the spiritual fate of a child not yet at the moral "age of accountability"? Moreover, to what degree could parents expect genuine faith in children who were not old enough to experience a full-fledged conversion experience? In some cases, anxiety about the unchecked sins of childhood led to the conviction that parents had a duty to "break the will" of the young rebels in their care, sometimes through sustained physical punishment. By forcefully repressing a child's sinful tendencies, parents might not save him or her from punishment, but they could limit the pull of temptation to SIN in the years before a full adult conversion was possible.

In many ways, nineteenth-century liberal Protestant thought marked a response to these parental concerns (see LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM). Instead of a transcendent God of judgment, liberals emphasized God's immanence, that is, God's embodiedness in the created world. Rejecting the idea of a depraved human nature, they saw great possibilities for progress and development in each individual person. Reflecting the optimistic spirit of their age, liberal theologians proclaimed the KINGDOM OF GOD, not as a future heavenly state, but rather as the promise of their own age, here on earth.

Two leading theologians, the American Congregationalist HORACE BUSHNELL and the German Reformed thinker FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, played a major role in developing a Protestant understanding of Christian nurture. Both men rejected the traditional evangelical view of children as desperate rebels unable to accept or understand divine love. Instead, they affirmed the authenticity of childhood faith at every stage of its development, for although a very young child might not intellectually understand Christian doctrine, he or she still had the capacity for a true faith in God. Although neither theologian romanticized childhood innocence, both emphasized the naturalness and purity of youth and saw childhood as a time of unique openness to the divine. Parents therefore played a crucial role in the child's moral outcome. Thoughtless, cruel, or dissolute treatment could harden the child's spirit toward eventual rebellion against God; in a parallel fashion, firm and gentle childrearing would implant a positive awareness of God's care for creation, and open the way for genuine faith even in a preliterate infant. To Bushnell, even the atmosphere of a Christian home was subtly salvific. A child reared in a calm, loving, peaceful environment, he believed, would have no difficulty eventually accepting God as heavenly father.

The nineteenth century thus saw the gradual identification of the Western bourgeois family as a fundamentally "Christian" institution. Family was not just a place for catechizing and disciplining the young, but itself a means of grace in the lives of parents and children. Regular household devotions were an important sign of godliness, but hardly the only one. Even more telling was the home's peaceful, controlled atmosphere—a true sign of its essentially Christian character.

The Christian home also became an important means of evangelistic outreach for European and American Protestants. In foreign missionary efforts, especially those organized and led by women, Western-style domesticity became a key means of introducing Christianity to non-Western people. By the late nineteenth century, most Western missionaries recognized that reaching native women in their homes could be far more effective in proclaiming the Gospel than simply PREACHING sermons in the public square. But the missionary emphasis on family was far more than a pragmatic strategy: for Victorian Protestants, home was so closely identified with the essence of Christianity that it was all but impossible to separate the two.

The use of family as an evangelistic tool meant, in many cases, a headlong confrontation between Western assumptions and indigenous traditions. When, for example, the Anglican LAMBETH CONFERENCE interdicted polygamy (plural marriage) in 1888, African Christians faced some difficult choices. In African society, polygamy was a sign of economic success and a means of cementing political alliances; some observant converts pointed out the multiple wives of the Old Testament patriarchs. In embracing monogamy, converts sacrificed social power and in many cases treasured personal relationships. For some, the cost was simply too high. In 1917, an act of church discipline against the polygamous marriages of several Nigerian laymen led to a mass exodus of members and, in protest, the formation of the United African Methodist Church.

Fundamentalism and Families

In recent years, family has become central to a new religious polemic, this time embodied in a wave of popular fundamentalist movements. Defining FUNDAMENTALISM is a difficult and often contentious task, a scholarly problem that reflects the rapid, complex growth of antimodern movements around the world today. In their public rhetoric, fundamentalist adherents proclaim a deep antipathy toward modern secularism in all its social, political, and intellectual manifestations. Yet in a larger sense, fundamentalism and modernity exist in a symbiotic relationship (see MODERNISM). Hardly a movement of the rural or unlettered, fundamentalism is most compelling where people feel the most powerless to combat its corrosive effects.

The term “fundamentalist” originally referred to a conservative wing within late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century American Protestantism. Although the movement was not initially successful in halting the spread of liberal theology, by the mid-twentieth century it exercised a broad influence within American Protestant evangelical culture (see EVANGELICALISM), and, by dint of energetic evangelistic work, on the larger world as well.

Family is an important symbolic battleground in the modern “culture wars” (see CULTURE). Although historians have disagreed, oftentimes fiercely, about the extent of a modern-day family crisis, there is no doubt that over the course of the twentieth century, domestic life in the modern West—and, increasingly, the rest of the world as well—has vastly changed. Although fundamentalist adherents often point to ideological movements like feminism as reason for a family “breakdown,” the sources of change are in fact much broader, reflecting some deeper shifts in modern social arrangements. Thus, rising educational and income opportunities for younger women have reduced the demands of “the family claim” on their lives. Increasing access to birth control has shortened the average couple’s child-bearing years and liberated their sexual expression both within and outside of marriage. Longer years of schooling for young children have decreased the family’s educational role and opened up a new range of possibilities for economic and geographic mobility. The transformation has not been as dramatic (nor perhaps as overwhelmingly negative) as some of the more insistent voices have claimed; yet it is clear that modernity has allowed individuals to make life decisions with far greater independence from their families than their grandparents would have ever thought possible.

The conservative emphasis on family has also arisen against a backdrop of reluctance among more liberal Protestant bodies to make binding rules about sexuality. As social scientists have argued, this development reflects broader individualizing trends in North America and Europe and the increasing privatization of marriage and childrearing relationships. Protestant denominations, no less than secular governing bodies, have become averse to regulating the intimate personal relationships of their constituents, perhaps also because they have recognized the futility of even attempting to do so.

The “pro-family” agenda, centered on the conviction that the home is the true bedrock of a moral society, has both a negative and a positive expression. On the one hand is an effort to control sexuality through opposition to ABORTION and HOMOSEXUALITY, and to situate women more emphatically in the home as wives and mothers. On the other hand, pro-family advocates have also sought to address the problem of father absence, a crisis at least as old as the industrial revolution itself. Though the language of groups like Promise Keepers is often unabashedly patriarchal, their purpose is generally much broader. By affirming the father’s spiritual responsibilities to his wife and children, they hope to reinvigorate family life and, by extension, Christianity among some of its historically weakest supporters.

The sense of social and spiritual crisis in the now post-Christian West has often obscured the vitality of the faith in other parts of the world. By the late twentieth century, religious demographers were reporting that Christianity's center of gravity had shifted to the southern hemisphere, centered in vigorous Pentecostal and indigenous movements in developing African and Latin American nations (see PENTACOSTALISM; LATIN AMERICA, AFRICA). By 1980, the "average" Christian was not a white, middle-class American, but more likely young, poor, and experiencing all of the hardships of life in a third-world country.

The new global face of Protestantism has posed unprecedented challenges to traditional Western beliefs and practices about family. Discussions on the subject have had to take into account the poverty and exploitation brought on by a rapidly globalizing economy, the sexual victimization of women and children in a world-wide market for pornography, and the ravages of the AIDS virus in Africa and Asia. Long a matter of ethical and theological debate among Western Protestants, family has become a key social concern for the faith's rising generations.

References and Further Reading

- Aries, Philippe. Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life. Translated by Robert Baldick. New York: Vintage Books, 1962.
- Bunge, Marcia, ed. The Child in Christian Thought. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2001.
- Demos, John. A Little Commonwealth: Family Life in Plymouth Colony. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Hardacre, Helen. "The Impact of Fundamentalisms on Women, the Family, and Interpersonal Relations." In Fundamentalisms and Society: Reclaiming the Sciences, the Family, and Education, edited by Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993.
- McDanell, Colleen. The Christian Home in Victorian America, 1840–1900. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 1986.
- Ozment, Steven. When Fathers Ruled: Family Life in Reformation Europe. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983.
- Perrot, Michelle, ed. A History of Private Life, Vol. IV: From the Fires of Revolution to the Great War. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1990.
- Prost, Antoine, and Gerard Vincent, eds. A History of Private Life, Vol. V: Riddles of Identity in Modern Times. Translated by Arthur Goldhammer. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1991.
- Riesebrodt, Martin. Pious Passion: The Emergence of Modern Fundamentalism in the United States and Iran. Translated by Don Reneau. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1993.
- Witte, John Jr. From Sacrament to Contract: Marriage, Religion, and Law in the Western Tradition. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1997.

MARGARET L. BENDROTH

FARADAY, MICHAEL (1791–1867)

English scientist and theologian. Faraday was born at Newington, Surrey, on September 22, 1791, to a former blacksmith and his wife who had recently moved to London from his native Westmorland. After little formal education and apprenticeship to a bookbinder, Faraday became assistant to Humphry Davy at the Royal Institution (R.I.). Here he remained for the rest of his working life, learning from Davy and eventually becoming professor of chemistry and director of the R.I.

Faraday undertook fundamental research at the R.I., working first in chemistry, where he discovered benzene and (with Davy) invented the miners' safety lamp. He soon moved into a lifelong study of electricity, discovering many basic laws in, for example, electromagnetism and electrochemistry and making possible the invention of the dynamo. John Tyndall, the British physicist and Faraday's colleague, described him as "the greatest experimental philosopher the world has ever seen." He also pioneered popular lectures at the R.I. and emerged as one of Britain's best communicators of science. His Chemical History of a Candle is still in print and cited as a model of chemical education.

Faraday was a committed member of a small Protestant denomination, the Sandemanian Church. It remained an inspiration and a consolation for the whole of his life. The church's evangelical theology assured him of the divine origin of NATURE and may even have suggested details of his unified field theory of electricity (see EVANGELICAL; EVANGELICALISM, THEOLOGY OF). Certainly it denied him the possibility of using science as an alternative way to God, and at times of crisis and approaching death it brought him "no doubtful hope." The other-worldly values of Sandemanianism were reflected in Faraday's contentment with its simple rituals, a deeply enriching though childless marriage, and his lack of financial ambition. His own extensively marked Bibles testify to the depth of his faith. Faraday died at his house at Hampton Court, which was provided by Queen Victoria for his final years, on August 25, 1867.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

James, F.A.J.L., ed. The Correspondence of Michael Faraday. London: Institution of Electrical Engineers, 1991 (continuing).

Secondary Sources:

Cantor, Geoffrey. Michael Faraday: Sandemanian and Scientist. A Study of Science and Religion in the Nineteenth Century. Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1991.

Russell, C.A. Michael Faraday, Physics and Faith. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Williams, L.Pearce. Michael Faraday, a Biography. London: Chapman & Hall, 1965.

COLIN A.RUSSELL

FAREL, GUILLAUME (1489–1565)

French reformer. Farel, an early French reformer who was later overshadowed by JOHN CALVIN, was born in Gap in southeastern FRANCE. The son of a notary, Farel studied in Paris with the humanist J.Lefèvre d'Étaples, and taught at the Collège Cardinal Lemoine. A passionate preacher, although not a priest, Farel preached in the diocese of Meaux, under the reforming bishop Guillaume Briçonnet (1521–1523) and later moved to Basel. Friendly with JOHANNES OECO LAMPADIUS, he fell out with Desiderius Erasmus. Chased out, he went to Montbéliard (1524–1525) where, without formal ordination, Farel celebrated Communion (see LORD'S SUPPER). He moved on to Metz (1525) and Strasbourg.

Farel evangelized French-speaking SWITZERLAND as a teacher in Aigle (1527), then under Berne. With his encouragement Neuchâtel accepted the REFORMATION (1530), and Pierre Viret from Orbe became a pastor (1531). Farel again fled from Geneva in 1532. Over a year later he returned, having brought the Waldensians fully into the Reformation. Farel helped accomplish the suspension of the Mass (August 1535) in Geneva, the destruction of images, and acceptance of the Reformation (May 21, 1536). That year he persuaded Calvin to stay (July) and led the deputation to the Dispute of Lausanne (1536), resulting in the acceptance of the Reformation there and in the region of Vaud.

In Geneva Farel and Calvin drafted Ecclesiastical Ordinances and a Confession of Faith (1537) but refused Bernese liturgical practices. Geneva expelled them in 1538, and Farel became pastor in Neuchâtel until his death in 1565, journeying often to other Reformed cities. He corresponded with Calvin, and despite his disapproval, married (1558) a young girl staying with her mother in his home. Their son, John (b. 1564), died (1568).

Farel's publications include Pater noster et le credo en français (1524), the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed with commentary; Sommaire et briefve declaration... (c. 1529); and Maniere et fasson... (1528?), considered the first French Reformed LITURGY. His doctrines were close to those of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, but later moved closer to those of Calvin on the spiritual communication of Christ's body and blood in Communion.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Barthel, Pierre, Rémy Scheurer, and Richard Stauffer, eds. Actes du colloque Guillaume Farel: Neuchâtel, 29 septembre-1er octobre 1980. 2 vols. Cahiers de la Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie no. 9. Lausanne, Switzerland: Imprimerie La Concorde, 1983.

Farel, Guillaume. Le Pater noster et le credo en françoys. Edited by Francis Higman. Textes littéraires français. Geneva, Switzerland: Librairie Droz, 1982. (First published 1524.)

———. Sommaire et brève déclaration, 1525. Edited by Arthur-L. Hofer. Neuchâtel, Switzerland: Éditions Belle Rivière, 1980.

Guillaume Farel, 1489–1565: Biographie nouvelle écrite d'après les documents originaux par un groupe d'historiens, professeurs et pasteurs de Suisse, de France et d'Italie. Ornée d'un portrait en couleurs et de vingt-cinq planches hors texte. Neuchâtel, Switzerland: Éditions Delachaux & Niestlé, 1930.

JEANNINE E. OLSON

FOOTWASHING

Both a liturgical act, after the example of Jesus at the Last Supper (John 13), and also a specific example and paradigm of humble service (I Timothy 6:10), foot-washing was part of the baptismal LITURGY in some areas of the early church, and became a stable part of the Maundy Thursday Mass of the Last Supper, in the ritual reenactment of that event, in the medieval Roman rite. It was also more frequently used in medieval monasteries as an expression and intensification of mutual humility and service.

Most REFORMATION churches abandoned this custom, as part of the simplification of WORSHIP. Some early Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM), however, retained it—or, rather, reinstated it—as a New Testament ordinance that had been misused. BALTHASAR HUBMAIER (1481–1528) washed the feet of the newly baptized after they received Communion, and MENNO SIMONS (c. 1496–1561) commended foot-washing as a rite of welcome to visitors from afar. The Dutch Anabaptist Dietrich Philips (1504–1568) explicitly listed foot-washing as a divinely commanded regular rite of cleansing and humility, and as a distinguishing mark of a true church. At least some MENNONITES followed Dietrich’s counsel, and under their influence English BAPTISTS followed suit for some time. The usage provoked sharp mutual insult among churches.

Mennonites have tended, especially since the nineteenth century, to relinquish the practice, partly at least because in the prosperous Western world this degree of intimacy is embarrassing, and because this service is less natural as a hygienic measure where hot water is available all the time in every home. Also, the custom has, according to some observers, shifted its meaning, and become opaque to succeeding generations.

German Baptists, led by Alexander Mack, introduced the usage as part of their celebration of the Eucharist, or LORD’S SUPPER. For the BRETHREN tradition, in its several branches (Old German Baptists, Brethren Church, Church of the Brethren, Grace Brethren, Old Order River Brethren), the celebration has three components: the Love-Feast, the Washing of Feet, and the Lord’s Supper. In Brethren understanding all three parts have the same AUTHORITY as commanded by Christ.

Some Protestant traditions (Anglican particularly), moved in part by the Roman Catholic reordering of Holy Week (1955), have revived the rite of footwashing as part of the Maundy Thursday evening Eucharist. Ecumenical contacts have made the Brethren manner of celebration more familiar to other denominations, and the difference of custom began to be seen as a complementarity of New Testament interpretation rather than an issue of conflict. In ecumenical groups the imagery of foot-washing as humble and gentle service has promoted experiments with simple rites of mutual hand-washing, such as a parent might do for a small child. Both giver and receiver are called on to act in simplicity, patience, and humble CHARITY.

The usage and the changing ecumenical relationships have drawn attention to the New Testament data, and the literature is large and growing. The shared Protestant insistence on the normative role of Scripture naturally points to shared exploration of the biblical data. Protestant scholars have felt obliged to question the historicity of John 13, but also to suggest that Luke 22:27 indicates that something like John 13 lies behind the Synoptic tradition. The foot-washing by Jesus in John is presented as an example of humble service to be followed, a revelation of the divine humility, a symbol of the believer's need humbly to accept the sacrificial love of the Savior; it may also be seen as a self-dedicatory act by Jesus himself, an act directing his own will to the sacrificial act that will be given its meaning in a few minutes in the Supper and in a few hours before Pilate and on Calvary.

References and Further Reading

- Bender, Harold S. "Footwashing." In The Mennonite Encyclopedia, vol. II, 347–351. Scottdale, PA: Mennonite Publishing House, 1956.
- Dunn, James D.G. "The Washing of the Disciples' Feet in John 13:1–20." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 61 no. 3–4 (1970): 247–252.
- Edgington, Allen. "Footwashing as an Ordinance." Grace Theological Journal 6 no. 2 (Fall 1985): 425–434.
- Edwards, Ruth B. "The Christological Basis of the Johannine Footwashing." In Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ: Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, edited by Joel B.Green and Max Turner, 367–383. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans; Carlisle, UK: Paternoster Press 1994.
- Graber-Miller, Keith. "Mennonite Footwashing: Identity Reflections and Altered Meanings." Worship 66 (March 1992): 148–170.
- Hultgren, Arland J. "The Johannine Footwashing (Jn 13:1–12) as Symbol of Eschatological Hospitality." New Testament Studies 29 (October 1982): 539–546.
- Lawless, George P., O.S.A. "The Footwashing as a Model of Ministry." Augustinian Heritage 32 (1986): 135–164.
- Thomas, John Christopher. Footwashing in John 13 and the Johannine Community. Sheffield, UK: Journal for the Study of the Old Testament Press, 1991.

DAVID H. TRIPP

FELGENHAUER, PAUL (1593–c.1677)

Protestant mystic. Son of a Lutheran pastor, Felgenhauer was born in Putschwitz, Bohemia on November 16, 1593, and studied at Wittenberg, where he became deacon at the Castle Church. Soon, however, he was forced to leave the town and returned to Bohemia, where he began a prolific writing career. In his Chronologie of 1620 he argued that the end of the world was imminent. In this work Felgenhauer echoed the notion, widespread at the time, that the duration of the world was confined to 6,000 years, of which less than 200 years remained. In a second work of the same year Felgenhauer launched a bitter attack on the Lutheran churches and their CLERGY.

Forced to leave Bohemia because of the vicissitudes of the Thirty Years' War and the concomitant dynamic Catholic COUNTER-REFORMATION, he moved to Amsterdam where he continued to publish his mystical writings. After 1638 he appears to have practiced medicine, while at the same time seeking followers for his cause. Expulsions and imprisonment overshadowed the last phase of his life, about which—including the exact date and place of death—nothing is known.

Felgenhauer stood in the tradition of the chiliastic and spiritualist tradition of Protestantism. Importantly, he expressed considerable warmth and empathy toward Jews because he understood religions to express at their core the same truths.

See also Apocalypticism; Chiliasm; Judaism; Lutheranism; Millenarians and Millennialists; Philo-Semitism

References and Further Reading

Schoeps, Hans Joachim, Barocke Juden, Christen, Judenchristen. Bern: Francke, 1965.

HANS J.HILLERBRAND

FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION

See Peace Organizations

FELLOWSHIP OF SOUTHERN CHURCHMEN

Founded in 1934 and existing as Fellowship of Southern Churchmen (FSC) from 1936 to 1963, this group of radical Protestants, both lay and clergy, men and women, black and white, sought to transform southern culture and society by fighting for justice in labor and in racial relations. Along the way it had to overcome the prejudices and lethargy of the churches themselves in bridging the gap between social justice and the Christian Gospel, as well as face the hostility of a society unwilling to change. Under the inspiration of REINHOLD NIEBUHR'S NEO-ORTHODOXY and CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM, its actions, both by individual members and as a group, ranged from meetings, conferences, investigations on lynching, racially integrated work camps and bus rides, labor organization, pamphleteering, founding of cooperatives, and rallies. Eventually, however, the larger and more aggressive wave of the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT took the historic stage, and the FSC dispersed as its members found other fields to plow.

Background and Early History

The impetus for the FSC may be seen at the intersection of the southern church and society of the period. The economy of the South from the 1920s through the 1950s was dominated by tenant farming, on the one hand, and textile and mining industries, on the other. In both sectors the holders of capital relied on the region's cheap labor. In both, employers tended to wield almost total control over the lives of the poorly paid workers who lacked recourse to air grievances or to bargain collectively. In the face of these exigencies, the Protestant establishment wavered. Officially many denominations recognized the right of workers to unionize. Because company towns and even churches were often in the dole of these employers, however, there was not only little resistance but also anti-union rhetoric from the pulpit. As to racial justice, Protestants fared no better. Jim Crow was the law of the land, and any deviation was hunted down not only by the authorities, but by the likes of the KU KLUX KLAN. Although Protestant churches at the denominational level usually denounced lynching, explicit opposition to racial violence was by no means common at the local level, even when it occurred on church property. On segregation there was so little DISSENT from the church as to make complicity the norm.

In this state of affairs, about eighty Southern Protestants from both sides of the clerical, racial, and GENDER divide gathered in May 1934 in Monteagle, Tennessee to hear Reinhold Niebuhr speak on pressing questions of the day. Under the initiator James Dombrowski they emerged as the Fellowship of Younger Churchmen, and included many ministers and teachers from the Methodist and Presbyterian folds as well as other professionals from churches high and low. North Carolina, then as later, was the best represented state. The members were influenced by the analyses of Marxism, several with a background in PACIFISM and YMCA work (see YMCA/ YWCA), but as Niebuhrian Neo-orthodox they rejected the optimistic progressivism of the SOCIAL GOSPEL and instead stared human evil in the face as they worked.

Howard Anderson Kester was elected executive sec retary. Kester, a Congregationalist who also worked for Niebuhr's Committee on Economic and Racial Justice (eventually merged with the FSC), made his home in Black Mountain, North Carolina, the headquarters of the organization until he resigned in 1943. Under Kester's leadership the FSC and its members worked mainly on questions of land and labor. They investigated labor disputes; propagated a liturgy of the Holy Earth, designed to promote Christian stewardship of land; probed and denounced lynching; and spoke out for the inclusion of black people in the welfare of the nation. In many ways the FSC not only extended the legacy of nineteenth-century Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), but also anticipated the praxis of LIBERATION THEOLOGY of the following generation.

Transformation and Peak

In 1944 Nelle Morton, a vigorous educator and champion of women's rights, took over at the helm of the FSC, and with this change the group came into its maturity and highest efficacy. First, Morton moved the headquarters to Chapel Hill, where it garnered further support from both liberal church people of the area and students of the University of North Carolina. Moreover, the Fellowship enjoyed the sympathetic patronage of Frank Graham, then head of the university and later senator. Morton also sought to promote teamwork and a stronger collegial fabric among FSC members, whose number exceeded 500 by the end of the decade. She appointed two secretaries, one black and one white.

Although involvement in labor affairs continued, the Fellowship turned increasingly to racial problems, believing them to underlie social and economic injustice in the region. In 1946 an interracial bus ride was organized to test new laws on interstate travel, but this first "Freedom Ride" ran aground when participants boarded an "intrastate" bus to Greensboro. Other efforts at racial integration included work camps in rural areas bringing the races together in cooperative work and life. These projects, however, often faced hostile opposition from white people of the surrounding communities who even coerced the force of law to break up the bold experiments. In response a donation of land in 1948 was slated for a Fellowship Center where work camps could be safely conducted, but funding and support eventually proved insufficient for full execution of the plans.

Decline, Dispersion

In 1949 Morton resigned because of ill health, and, following the short term of Charles M. Jones, distinguished for his own pastoral promotion of desegregation, Howard Kester returned in late 1951 as executive secretary. Although renewed in his enthusiasm, Kester's move of the headquarters back to remote Black Mountain had the effect of canceling the advantages of the Chapel Hill years. In this last period Neale Hughley became the Fellowship's first black president.

By 1957, however, the FSC as an organization was listing. Although its annual conference in Nashville, boldly billed as a Southwide Rally, featured as speaker the young Dr. MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., the event fell short of engendering the wide response expected. In the meantime the more confrontational civil disobedience of other groups, particularly of black membership, gained ascendancy in the struggle for civil rights. The minority of black members in the FSC was not strong enough to give the group leadership in that transformation. After several more meetings and some work camps the FSC voted in 1963 to cease as such and to merge into the new Committee of Southern Churchmen, headed by William Campbell of the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. With that formal end the members of the FSC turned fully elsewhere to continue their Christian action in the South and beyond. In the three decades of its existence, the FSC went from a vanguard Protestant movement for social witness to being submerged in newer and wider currents of protest and advocacy. If its original views and aims now seemed common, it was partly because of its very agency in making them so.

See also Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

- Burgess, David S. Fighting for Justice: The Life Story of David Burgess. Detroit, MI: Wayne State University Press, 2000.
- Donahue, Don. "Prophets of a New Social Order: Presbyterians and the Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 1934–1963." American Presbyterians 74 (1996): 209–221.
- Martin, Robert F. "A Prophet's Pilgrimage: The Religious Radicalism of Howard Anderson Kester, 1921–1941." The Journal of Southern History 48 (1982): 511–530.
- . "Critique of Southern Society and Vision of a New Order: The Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 1934–1957." Church History 52 (1983): 66–80.
- Salmund, John A. "The Fellowship of Southern Churchmen and Interracial Change in the South." The North Carolina Historical Review 69 (1992): 179–199

DAVID U.LIU

FEUERBACH, LUDWIG (1804–1872)

Protestant theologian, philosopher. Feuerbach was one of the most influential critics of Christianity in the nineteenth century. Although he began his career as a idealist, he became the advocate for a new atheistic humanism. He is best known for his view that the concept of God is an involuntary and unconscious projection of human attributes and, hence, that religion is humanity's earliest and indirect form of self-knowledge. He believed that Protestantism was the practical turning point toward this atheistic humanism in the history of the West because of MARTIN LUTHER'S (1483–1546) emphasis on the humanity of God as revealed in Christ. Throughout his life he was concerned with a theory of religion because he was convinced that only when human beings were free of this illusion could they take responsibility for their own welfare.

Early Life and Thought: 1804–1839

Ludwig Feuerbach, the fourth of eight children, was born in 1804 into an old and distinguished German family. His father, Paul Anselm, was a famous professor of jurisprudence and reformer of the Bavarian legal code. He was also a powerful advocate of liberal political reform in an repressive era; consequently, the family lived under a cloud of political suspicion. Deeply religious as a youth, Feuerbach entered the University of Heidelberg in 1823 to study theology. There he came under the influence of the Hegelian theologian Karl Daub (1765–1836) and was captured by the intellectual grandeur of Hegelian philosophy in contrast to the narrower concerns of theology. Against his father's wishes, he transferred to the University of Berlin, ostensibly to study theology but, in actuality, to study philosophy with G.W.F. HEGEL (1770–1831), whom he regarded as the originator of a "new epoch" in philosophy and culture.

For financial reasons, Feuerbach transferred to Erlangen in 1826. After graduation he became a privatedozent lecturing on the history of modern philosophy. Against his father's advice he anonymously published a book entitled Thoughts on Death and Immortality (1830), arguing that the Christian doctrine of personal immortality is hostile to true religion. To add offense to conservative injury, he appended aphorisms to the text that were insulting to conservative pietists. The book was met with hostility by his colleagues and banned by censorship. When Feuerbach refused to disclaim its authorship, he was dismissed from his post. In 1833, however, he met the daughter of a wealthy porcelain manufacturer, and married her four years later. Unable to obtain a professorship, he retired to a remote hamlet near Ansbach, where the porcelain factory was located, and devoted himself to writing.

Through the Thirties, Feuerbach's intellectual trajectory moved from an enthusiastic appropriation of Hegel's philosophical project to an outright rejection, with some vacillation in between. His dissertation (1828) argued that the divine ground and unity of the world is reason and, hence, that the logos is the essence of the human. In his Thoughts on Death and Immortality, his philosophical idealism took the form of a pantheism in which God is the all-encompassing ground of both personhood and nature. Feuerbach argued that this idealism is incompatible both with Christian theism and the doctrine of immortality, both of which had emerged only in the modern period as crucial elements of Protestant doctrine. Because God is the all-consuming love out of which multiple things appear, true religion is to surrender to this all-encompassing ground and to recognize death as total dissolution. In his repudiation of Hegel in 1838, he rejected the notion of an absolute philosophy and especially the claim that Absolute Spirit constituted the unity of both nature and spirit. He was especially critical of Hegel's identification of thought and being, and argued that the all-encompassing reality was not spirit but nature.

In the middle 1830s, a split developed among the followers of Hegel that had both religious and political implications. On the conservative side were those who argued that Hegelian philosophy was in harmony with Christian theism and justified the support of a Christian state. On the radical side were those who believed that Hegel's Absolute was incompatible with Christian doctrine and who were critical of the existing state. Feuerbach increasingly found himself allied with those like BRUNO BAUER (1809–1882), D.F. STRAUSS (1808–1874), Karl Marx (1818–1883), and Karl Ruge who held a latter view, but when these young (left-wing) Hegelians engaged in either theological or political criticism, they were censored and denied the academic positions for which they had been trained.

Middle Period: 1840–1848

Feuerbach's The Essence of Christianity (1841) made him immediately famous in Europe, and he found himself recognized, along with Bruno Bauer, as the intellectual leader of the small group of radical Young Hegelians bent on separating church and state and creating an egalitarian democracy. To do this, they believed it crucial to establish the philosophical principles of a new humanism. In 1842 and 1843 Feuerbach attempted to do this with his Voläufige Thesen zur Philosophie [Preliminary Theses Toward the Reformation of Philosophy] and his Principles of the Philosophy of the Future, both published in Switzerland because they were forbidden in Germany.

Feuerbach believed that his new philosophy was the inevitable outcome of the Protestant Reformation. Christianity, he argued, had in modern times suffered both a practical and a theoretical dissolution. On the practical side, Luther had dissolved theology into anthropology by arguing that “God in and for himself” should be of no interest to the believer but only the human “God for us” in the man Jesus. And on the theoretical side, theological speculation had moved from theism to Hegel’s pantheism, albeit a pantheism that paradoxically claimed to justify Christianity. Feuerbach argued that Hegel’s attempt to restore Christianity by identifying the finite with the infinite was only a piece of logical legerdemain in which matter had been made only a “moment” in the life of God. He also argued that the clue to understanding Hegel’s philosophy is the way in which Hegel characteristically transformed abstract predicates into subjects; for example, the abstraction “thinking” was turned into a subject “reason.” Consequently, the philosophy of the future would simply invert Hegel’s logic. Instead of construing the predicate as a subject, it would show that thinking is the activity of existing individuals. Thought comes out of being, not being out of thought.

So far as Feuerbach was concerned, Hegel had confused logic with existence. The philosophy of the future, by contrast, would be based on the insight that to be there (Da-sein) in space and time is the primary determination of being. The human being is not merely a bearer of reason but is constituted by its own unique constellation of senses that mediate the world to consciousness. The body is constituted in its mode of being as feeling, and each sense organ has its own unique need for satisfaction. Sensuousness is the link between the body and the consciousness, but because humans are also conscious they are “universal” and free, and this freedom and universality extend themselves over the entire human being. Moreover, the person, the “I,” only exists in concrete relations to another person, a “Thou.” We are social beings through and through. Hence, the highest and last principle of philosophy is the unity of person with person.

The radical Young Hegelian movement of which Feuerbach was a spokesman did not last long. By the summer of 1843 its two influential journals had been suppressed by the censors and their editors, Karl Ruge and Karl Marx, forced to emigrate to Paris. Moreover, important strategic disagreements had arisen. Marx argued that revolutionary praxis was the only way to bring about social change, while Feuerbach and Ruge insisted one must first change consciousness.

When the revolutions of 1848 swept over Europe, Feuerbach was tempted to leave his solitary life and attended the Frankfurt Assembly as an observer. While there, he received an invitation from the students of Heidelberg to give a series of public lectures on religion. Denied the use of the university, he delivered the lectures in the Heidelberg city hall.

Feuerbach was most productive between 1841 and 1848, during which he published six major works, of which the best known is The Essence of Christianity (1841). The thesis of the book is simple, although the supporting arguments are complex: The concept of God is the involuntary projection by the human mind of its own best attributes, and this projection is then made an object of worship. Just as Hegel argued that the Absolute Spirit objectifies itself in creation and then comes to self-consciousness by reconciling itself to this objectification, Feuerbach argued that humankind objectifies itself in the idea of God and then comes to self-consciousness by reconciling itself to this objectification.

The book is divided into two parts. The first attempts to show that the idea of God is simply the abstracted attributes of human nature—reason, will, and love—conceived as a single being. The argument goes something like this. Human nature is distinguished by virtue of self-consciousness. Self-consciousness is the capacity to envision oneself as a member of a species, but the attributes of this species are necessarily regarded as perfections. The imagination, under the pressure of feeling, seizes on these perfections and unifies them in the idea of a divine separate being. Human beings then fall under the sway of this projection because they desire recognition by another "Thou" and are frightened by the limits of nature and, above all, death. The idea of God promises them both loving recognition and the overcoming of death. Consequently, one can say that although religion is false, it is also the vehicle by which the human race becomes aware of its own real nature. Theology is anthropology.

The predicate of love is the most important of these attributes, and as an analysis of the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation reveals, this love is so great that God is willing to relinquish his own nature for the welfare of humankind. Feuerbach takes this to mean that in Christianity humankind has unconsciously expressed the idea that love is more important than God, that love is itself divine. It also means that insofar as God is believed to be a transcendent being with perfect love, humankind is alienated from its own loving nature. So long as God is regarded as the repository of all goodness and perfection, humankind will be regarded as imperfect and sick.

If Feuerbach considered the first part of the book to be positive because it points out the truth contained in religion, the second part is negative because it demonstrates the bad effects of theology. Feuerbach argues that Christian theology is riddled with contradictions; for example, the concept of God contains both impersonal (metaphysical) and anthropomorphic attributes. But the deepest contradiction, he argues, is between the Christian virtues of faith and love, because faith separates and distinguishes between believers and unbelievers, while love embraces all.

The first edition of The Essence of Christianity (1841) was primarily directed at the Catholic understanding of Christianity, but in 1843 Feuerbach made an extensive study of Luther and published a revised edition. Feuerbach argued that Luther differed from Catholicism by virtue of his radical idea that God is a deity "for us." Faith insists that God is by definition "for us" and does not have some mysterious purposes that transcend our welfare. To say "God is good" means "good for us." Luther also saw that the certitude of Christian belief is founded on the Incarnation because there the humanity of God becomes an object for the senses. Only a sensuous being can be a certain being. Here there can be no basis for mistrust. Moreover, the resurrection confirms this love for us because in this event God reveals that all the conditions of our finitude, especially death, have been set aside. We will become gods. In short, to believe is to make God a man and man a god.

Feuerbach came to believe that his projection theory of religion did not adequately explain how the religious folk came to feel they were in touch with a "divine other," and in 1845 he wrote still another book, Das Wesen der Religion [The Essence of Religion], in which he argued that the enduring ground and object of religion is nature, upon which we feel ourselves to be absolutely dependent. By nature, Feuerbach means the "not-I"; that is, all those forces from within and without that impinge on the "I." Human beings, he argued, are driven by the urge to happiness, and the realization of this happiness is both dependent on nature's beneficence and limited by its apparent indifference to individual well-being, especially by the fact of death. Human beings want, above all, to live, and impelled by the a urge to live they instinctively transform this desire into a being capable of granting it, a being that recognizes them, hears their complaints, and grants their desires. Religion, in short, arises out of the opposition of the urge to happiness and the limits of nature and death. This is why the belief in miracles and immortality are so often associated with religion. The tomb is the birthplace of the gods.

Final Period: 1848–1872

After the brief exciting hopes and possibilities raised by the revolutions of 1848 were dashed by the failure of the Frankfurt Assembly, Feuerbach retreated once again to his isolated existence. He worked on numerous writing projects, especially in the field of ethics, where he attempted to construct an ethic based on the urge to happiness. The only book he published during this time was another interpretation of religion, Theogony (1860). The basic argument depends once again on the notion that the gods are “for us.” The gods are the reified wishes of humankind. Conscious beings are bent on their own happiness but are aware that their needs and desires can be thwarted. Hence, every wish is accompanied by a sense of the nothingness that clings to all life. Religion arises when the person grasps the notion that there are many links between a wish and its realization, and conceives of a being that is not subject to limitation and failure. The gods represent the unity of willing and the ability to succeed. A god is simply a being who can annul the difference between the wish and its realization. Where there are no wishes there are no gods.

In 1859, when the porcelain factory of his wife’s family went bankrupt, Feuerbach, dispirited and without money, was forced to move to a small town near Nürnberg, where he lived out his life in ill health, supported only with the financial aid of friends.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Feurbach, Ludwig. The Essence of Christianity. Translated by George Eliot, with an introductory essay by Karl Barth and foreword by H.Richard Niebuhr. New York: Harper & Row, 1957.
- . Principles of the Philosophy of the Future. Translated with an introduction by Manfred H.Vogel, Library of Liberal Arts. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1966.
- . The Essence of Faith According to Luther. Translated with an introduction by Melvin Chernov. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- . Lectures on the Essence of Religion. Translated by Ralph Manheim. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.
- . Thoughts on Death and Immortality from the Papers of a Thinker, Along with an Appendix of Theological-Satirical Epigrams, Edited by One of his Friends. Translated with introduction and notes by James A.Massey. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

Secondary Sources:

Harvey, Van A. Feuerbach and the Interpretation of Religion. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

Toews, John Edward. Hegelianism: The Path Toward Dialectical Humanism, 1805–1841. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Wartofsky, Marx. Feuerbach. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977.

VAN A.HARVEY

FINLAND

The Middle Ages

The first Christian influences came to Finland from both east and west. Because some essential terms like priest (Finnish pappi), cross (risti), and Bible (Raamattu) entered the Finnish language through Slavic languages, the early eastern influence is obvious, although it was later overcome by the western. A large part of medieval ecclesiastical terminology came into Finnish through Swedish.

In the eleventh century both Novgorod and SWEDEN extended their influences into Finland. After more than 200 years of fighting, Sweden and Novgorod signed an everlasting peace treaty in 1323. Most of Finland was to remain under Swedish rule and in the Catholic Church, whereas the easternmost part was left under the domain of Novgorod. As an example of Swedish influence, the English-born bishop Henry of Uppsala in Sweden visited Finland and was killed by a Finnish peasant in 1158, becoming patron Saint of Finland. Inhabitants of the Åland Islands have always spoken Swedish. During the thirteenth century Swedish settlers inhabited large areas around the coasts of the Gulf of Finland and the Gulf of Bothnia.

