Religious beliefs that have, throughout history, been the cause of persecution and intolerance, have been important sources of toleration as well. From Israelite injunctions of the stranger and fellow-human, to the Sermon on the Mount, to Islamic edicts on the zakat (poor-rate), religion has universally provided an openness to the other and an idiom within which to discuss and mediate differences in a tolerant manner. As societies throughout the world become more diverse and pluralistic, both types of religious attitudes—of intolerance and of tolerance—are surfacing and playing an increasingly important role in the politics of different countries. From Hindu nationalists in India to evangelical Christians in the United States of America and Shi'ite Muslims in Iran, religion has reemerged as a major factor in world politics. With this global reemergence of religious identities and commitments, the problem of tolerance is also reemerging as one of the defining problems of the twenty-first century. Engagement with this challenge demands mobilizing the resources of many idioms and a wide range of traditions: not only the United Nations Universal Declaration on Human Rights of 1948, but also the pluralism of Islamic Sufi thought, the Second Vatican Council's Declaration on Religious Freedom (Dignitatis Humanae), the theology of KARL BARTH (1886–1968), and the injunction of the Torah on the stranger in our midst. All are part of the global language of toleration.

References and Further Reading

- Bejczy, Istvan. "Tolerantia: A Medieval Concept." Journal of the History of Ideas 58 (1997): 365–384.
- Grell, Ole, and Bob Scribner, eds. Tolerance and Intolerance in the European Reformation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996.
- Heyd, David, ed. Toleration: An Elusive Virtue. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- Laursen, John, and Cary Nederman, eds. Beyond the Persecuting Society: Religious Toleration Before the Enlightenment. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998.
- Lecler, Joseph. Toleration and the Reformation. New York: New York Association Press, 1960.
- Locke, John. A Letter Concerning Toleration. Indianapolis, IN: Bobbs-Merrill, 1955.
- Mendus, Susan, ed. Justifying Toleration: Conceptual and Historical Perspectives. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Mill, John Stuart. On Liberty and Consideration on Representative Government. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1948.
- Moore, R.I. The Formation of a Persecuting Society. Power and Deviance in Western Europe, 950–1250. New York, NY: Blackwell, 1987.
- Nederman, Cary, and John Laursen, eds. Difference and Dissent: Theories of Tolerance in Medieval and Modern Europe. New York, London: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.
- Remer, Gary. Humanism and the Rhetoric of Toleration. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1996.
- Seligman, Adam. "Tolerance and Tradition." Society 36 (1999): 47–53.
- Stanton, Graham, and Guy Stoumsa, eds. Tolerance and Intolerance in Early Judaism and Christianity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Walzer, Michael. On Toleration. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997.

ADAM B.SELIGMAN

TONGUES, SPEAKING IN

Tongues in the New Testament

“Speak in tongues” is a phrase based on three passages in the New Testament: Mark 16:17, Acts 2, and I Corinthians 12–13 as found in the Authorized (King James) Version of the BIBLE of 1611 and in some other more recent English translations. Tongues renders the Greek word glossa, used in the New Testament for both tongue (in one’s mouth) and language, but in the English version of the epistle it may reflect the translators’ compromise in dealing with a phenomenon that appeared different from speaking natural languages. Although some interpreters of Paul’s words maintain that he was writing about real languages—but ones that were not known to the participants in a religious event—others believe that the speech was fundamentally different from human language. Translations, therefore, have reflected these two views, based partly on philological and partly on theological grounds: for example, new, unknown, and ecstatic languages.

The linguistic issue is not problematic in Acts 2. The miracle that took place in Jerusalem on the Day of Pentecost, as reported, was that the apostles were able to speak “different languages” that the audience recognized as “their own [ethnic] languages” and were able to understand what was being said about “the wondrous works of God.” This alleged phenomenon—being able to speak in a language one has never learned or even heard—is known as xenoglossia, and has been reported in contexts that are not religious at all, being used to defend the belief that there are paranormal phenomena that SCIENCE has not yet been able to account for.

In Corinth, by contrast, it would appear that the speech events were of common occurrence in Christian gatherings, some of which were unruly enough to be criticized by Paul. The speech, moreover, according to some interpretations of the text, was incomprehensible. The utterances were nonetheless considered by Paul in this pastoral letter to be languages in the common sense and the ability to speak in them one of the “gifts” granted by the Holy Spirit. What was more important than uttering something incomprehensible, however, was for it to have meaning, either for oneself or for other believers as well. One was advised, therefore, to pray for understanding of what one had said, but there were also in a fellowship persons gifted in providing the meaning of an otherwise incomprehensible utterance.

The Corinthian speech events have been explained by non-Christians and even by some Christians as having an origin in Greek or eastern cults in which participants sought ecstatic, out-of-this-world (dissociative, altered) states of being, explanations that are considered speculative by serious historians.

Subsequent History

Very little is known—but much speculated—of the subsequent history of the occurrence and distribution of the use of “unknown” languages in Christian communities. Although there are some reports of unusual behavior—sometimes accompanied by gibberish—among fringe groups of Christians, that may in some cases have been concurrent with dissociation (see some of the patristic writings, Montanism, the prophets of Cevennes, and Les convulsionnaires, for example), nothing credible can be said about what people were doing from the perspective of scientific linguistics, given the wide range of possibilities for articulatory, psychological, and cultural reasons. These occurrences in any case have been occasional, revealing no continuity whatsoever throughout the centuries, and cannot be corroborated with samples of what was actually uttered, as one must in linguistics. People may have exclaimed in gibberish or produced anything in a rather wide range of verbal (or just oral) phenomena but incomprehensible without having produced pseudolanguage of the recent and contemporary kind. There has, indeed, been no uninterrupted tradition of charismatic religion in canonical and popular Christianity in any of its varieties.

Although emotional behavior is better documented in Protestantism since disestablishmentarianism, the proliferation of denominations and sects, and the emergence of mass popular EVANGELISM, again nothing can be said about the use of speech except that it might be exclamatory or allegedly incomprehensible. In any case, such behavior apparently was idiosyncratic: it had not become part of a community’s TRADITION or dogma; it was not theologized.

Tongues and the Pentecostal and Neo-Pentecostal Movements

Speaking in tongues did not emerge as behavior of religious significance until it was associated with the revivalist “second blessing” that had been preached as an advanced stage in one’s Christian maturity: one had to be born again first, and then one had to be filled with the Holy Spirit (although the two experiences might occur concurrently). Although profound piety had been preached since at least the seventeenth century in English-speaking communities, and although seeking it and ostensibly achieving it were frequently emotional in public meetings, it was not until the dogmatization of tongues as the experiential, necessary evidence of being filled with the Holy Spirit that this linguistic phenomenon acquired supreme importance in new communities of Protestants.

Tongues, the phrase now being abbreviated, arose in the UNITED STATES early in the nineteenth century and very soon became the hallmark of the Pentecostal movement, which was most successful at first in rural and lower-class North America. It was preached that one should seek the filling of the Holy Spirit and that one could have it. Large meetings to facilitate this experience were emotional and so frequently characterized by dissociative behavior that the people were called “holy rollers” because of their falling to the floor, “slain” by the Holy Spirit. For many leaders in the movement such behavior was not sufficient evidence: one had to speak in tongues. Moreover, because of the belief that these were real languages and that languages could be prayed for, Pentecostals of various kinds joined the modern missionary movement with the confidence that they would be able to preach the Gospel in any language.

Reports from the last century by believers and by critics about tongues, although considerable, are too vague to allow a scientific linguist to characterize what must have been a wide range of vocal behavior. It is not until the rise of the neo-Pentecostal (or charismatic) movement, once again in the United States, in the 1960s that we can attest empirically to a single phenomenon that could be studied as one would any unknown language of the world, thanks to the availability of tape recorders. It is not unreasonable to suppose that, given (1) the lively existence of old-fashioned Pentecostals and (2) the doctrinal similarity between the old and the new believers, the new tongues were modeled on the pattern of the old. At the apogee of the charismatic movement internationally, when Roman Catholic and Orthodox Christians became involved in large numbers in the 1960s and 1970s, there undoubtedly were several millions of glossolalists—and, of course, many more Pentecostals and charismatics who are not tongues speakers. The number has most certainly decreased because of the waning of the movement and, among glossolalists themselves, disillusionment, disbelief, or disuse.

However, the beliefs of the new charismatics were not exactly like those of the old, partly because many arrived at their own appreciation and critique of their lingual experience. Many, if not most, people believed—as had their predecessors—that they were speaking in real languages (demonic ones, their critics declared). Indeed, reports of a tongue's having been identified as “classic” Hebrew or “perfect” Hawaiian by a native speaker in the assembly spread by word-of-mouth, were proclaimed from the pulpit, or published in the literature. These alleged miracles would be instances of xenoglossia. No reports have been scientifically authenticated. Other neocharismatics, coming from conservative (and even anti-Pentecostal) traditions and being better educated than their predecessors, considered their tongues to be divine gifts for personal use in private events of worship, praise, and intercession. From glossolalists in the ecumenical charismatic movement also came the belief that speaking in tongues was just one of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, not the very one that validated a new and better religious experience. Many others believed that they were engaging in “expressive language,” alluding to nonrealistic art.

Tongues as a Linguistic Phenomenon

The serious discussion of glossolalia is facilitated by recognizing all utterances or discourse that fail to meet the criteria posited for natural languages. The fundamental one is that there be a systematic correlation between, on the one hand, phonological units, and, on the other hand, cognitive units (i.e., units of meaning). It follows from this characterization of human language that even before knowing what the meaning of a stretch of language might be, one will identify (a) a restricted set of sounds and (b) sequences of sounds that are distributed in a patterned way, the latter assumed to be carriers of meaning, like roots, affixes, and words. (Even ancient Mayan hieroglyphics have been decoded on this premise with help from contemporary Mayan languages.)

Although samples of glossolalia can be transcribed from tape recordings as all languages can be, they are exotic (a) in having a limited number of consonants and vowels, which are (b) almost always sounds borrowed from the speaker's native language. Here is one sample simplified of phonetic details, including stress (or accent), typical of standard North American English, pauses being real:

kolamasiando, labokatohoriamasi, lamosiando, labokatahandoria

Words of different lengths could be created with these strings of syllables, but they would be subjective and arbitrary, not being correlated with units of meaning. Also illustrated in this sample is (c) repetition—syllables, for example, being rearranged linearly as if they were blocks of sound: labo/lamo and kato/kata.

It has been argued linguistically that these characteristics of glossolalia make it possible for a person to improvise a stream of sound that resembles language in superficial ways, drawn profoundly, however, from material learned early in childhood. Everyone who has acquired a language (even—perhaps, especially—children), according to this argument, can produce glossolalic utterances, depending on a willingness or ability to do something out of the ordinary, the reasons for doing so, and the contexts. In this sense, therefore, glossolalia is a perfectly natural linguistic phenomenon while being culturally uncommon in the world through time. (The word “natural” is used as in scientific discourse; theologians might quibble about what is and is not “natural.”)

Learning to Speak in Tongues

Ignoring the linguistic data themselves, others have speculatively suggested different explanations. (1) Only certain kinds of people are able to speak in tongues: (a) the intellectually and socially deprived, and (b) those who are susceptible to the influence of an authority figure. (2) Glossolalia is always an effect of an altered state of consciousness (dissociation, trance, etc.). Such explanations do not satisfy linguists because they fail to demonstrate that these independent variables are necessary (i.e., causal). With respect to these views, critics have demonstrated that some glossolalists learn from each other: many will have heard short or long stretches of tongues in public meetings even before they are “filled with the Holy Spirit.” (There have even been manuals and tape recordings to teach people to speak in tongues.) Many others subsequently and unconsciously adopt bits of what they hear, a regularly meeting prayer group thereby producing its own “dialect.” A favored word has been found in different locations in North America and Europe in slightly varying forms: shanda, possibly derived from santa.

Tongues Defined

Glossolalia, now, can be narrowly defined as a vocal act believed by the speaker to be language and showing rudimentary languagelike structure but no consistent word-meaning correspondences recognizable by either speaker or hearers, attributed in Christianity to the Holy Spirit (the human being just a channel of communication), who can intervene in its interpretation. Used loosely, however, even by psychologists, anthropologists, and others, the word is synonymous with gibberish, but contemporary glossolalists do not consider poorly articulated vocalizations authentic tongues. Although a wide range of speech that is not typical of human language is found in different cultures, usually in a religious context, contemporary glossolalia is different in kind. In play or pretense, of course, people are at liberty to say what they want of their glossolalic utterances.

Glossolalia, however, is fundamentally similar to certain kinds of vocalizations that appear in English and other languages, as in song, play, spells, chants, and so forth. Thus, abracadabra (or abra ka dabra) is glossolalic in nature, easily becoming the source of kabra dabra kakada brakada adaka.

Because Christians believe that what they utter is a real language, glossolalia is used for different purposes: in PRAYER, song (in a group, each person producing different lyrics), exorcism, and “prophecy,” the latter meaning a “word from the Lord”—at which time a speaker brings a message from God to the gathering, and is considered authentic only if its meaning is given to the others in the human language they have in common.

See also Bible, King James Version; Evangelicalism; Pentecostalism; Revivals

References and Further Reading

- Forbes, Christopher B. Prophecy and Inspired Speech in Early Christianity and its Hellenistic Environment. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997.
- Goodman, Felicitas D. Speaking in Tongues: A Cross-Cultural Study of Glossolalia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.
- Kildahl, John P. The Psychology of Speaking in Tongues. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.
- Malony, H. Newton, and A. Adams Lovekin, eds. Glossolalia: Behavioral Science Perspectives on Speaking in Tongues. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Mills, Watson E. Glossolalia: A Bibliography. New York: E. Mellen Press, 1985.
- Samarin, W.J. “Glossolalia as Learned Behavior.” Canadian Journal of Theology 50 (1969):60–64.
- . “Evolution in Glossolalic Private Language.” Anthropological Linguistics 13 (1971):55–67.
- . Tongues of Men and Angels: The Religious Language of Pentecostalism. New York: Macmillan, 1972.
- . “Review of Kildahl 1972.” Sisters Today (St. John’s Abbey, Collegeville, MN) 44 (1972):41–44.
- . “Variation and Variables in Religious Glossolalia.” Language in Society 1 (1972):121–130.

- . “Sociolinguistic vs. Neurophysiological Explanations for Glossolalia.” Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 11 (1972):293–296.
- . “Religious Motives in Religious Movements.” International Yearbook for the Sociology of Religion 8 (1973): 163–174.
- . “Glossolalia as Regressive Speech.” Language and Speech 16 (1973):77–89.
- . “The Language of Religion.” In Language in Religious Practice, edited by W.J.Samarin, 3–13. Rowley, MA: Newbury House Publishers, 1976.
- . “The Functions of Glossolalic Nonsense.” In L’analyse du Discours/Discourse Analysis, edited by Pierre R.Léon and Henri Mitterand, 37–47. Montreal, Quebec: Centre Éducatif et Culturel, 1976.
- . “Making Sense of Glossolalic Nonsense.” Social Research 46 (1979):88–105.
- Stevenson, Ian. Unlearned Languages: New Studies in Xenoglossy. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1984.
- Williams, Cyril G. Tongues of the Spirit: A study of Pentecostal Glossolalia and Related Phenomena. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1981.

WILLIAM J.SAMARIN

TORREY, REUBEN ARCHER (1856– 1928)

American congregationalist minister. Torrey, born in Hoboken, New Jersey, played a pivotal role in the development of FUNDAMENTALISM and DISPENSATIONALISM. After graduating from Yale College (1875) and Yale Divinity School (1878) and gaining an introduction to what he considered the troubling field of HIGHER CRITICISM at Leipzig and Erlangen universities in Germany (1882–1883), Torrey pastored several churches and served as superintendent of the Chicago Evangelization Society and the MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE (1889–1908), and as dean of the Los Angeles Bible Institute (1912–1924). One of Torrey’s foremost concerns was training students for “soul winning service,” and especially for urban missionary work. He supported the HIGHER LIFE MOVEMENT, believing that after CONVERSION inbred sin was progressively subjugated but never eradicated. He interpreted baptism with the Holy Spirit as a distinct second experience that endowed the Christian with power for witness, sacrifice, and service. He wrote more than a dozen books and conducted worldwide evangelistic campaigns, sometimes in conjunction with DWIGHT L. MOODY, in Europe, North America, Asia, and Australia. Torrey supported conservative theology against what he considered the “infidelity” of LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM, MODERNISM, and the SOCIAL GOSPEL, most influentially through his coeditorship of The Fundamentals, a twelve-volume series of ninety tracts that championed Biblical inerrancy, the divinity of Jesus Christ, the virgin birth, substitutionary atonement, and the bodily, physical second coming of Christ.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Torrey, Reuben Archer, ed. The Fundamentals: A Testimony to the Truth. vols. 11–12. Chicago: Testimony, 1910–1915.

Secondary Sources:

Harkness, Robert. Reuben Archer Torrey: The Man, His Message. Chicago: Bible Institute Colportage Association, 1929.

Martin, Roger. R.A. Torrey: Apostle of Certainty. Murphreesboro, TN: Sword of the Lord, 1976.

Staggers, Kermit L. “Reuben A. Torrey: American Fundamentalist, 1856–1928.” Ph.D. dissertation, Claremont Graduate School, 1986.

CANDY GUNTHER BROWN

TOTALITARIANISM

The term totalitarian first appeared in 1923, when Benito Mussolini refused to allow his political opponents to present election lists for that year. The term has helped focus debate in Europe and the UNITED STATES on the central issues of the twentieth century. The logic of totalitarianism is designed to counter the modern ideal of emancipation as well as the Protestant concept of freedom.

Totalitarianism is rule by force rather than by consent and has as its goal the eradication of political freedom, democratic process, and legality. Pronouncements of the political leader and party theoretically exercise control over all the institutions of the state and society. Totalitarians also violate freedom of conscience and attempt to politicize all aspects of life, including those that liberalism and Christianity would relegate to the private sphere. Thus totalitarianism can be viewed as an outgrowth of modernity (see MODERNISM) and as countering the anomie that is occasioned by the critical process of emancipation, by the modern rationalization and instrumentalization of culture and society, by the democratization of society (see DEMOCRACY), and by the secularization of daily life.

Totalitarians historically have tried to restore a world of meaning, but have created a dilemma. On the one hand, alienated persons seem temporarily to find a degree of comfort in a totalitarian response. On the other, meaning cannot be restored without reneging on the modern commitment to the freedom and self-determination of the individual in matters of conscience. The political and religious predicament emerging since the FRENCH REVOLUTION revolves around how to establish a sense of spiritual value and of meaningfulness to the world without succumbing to totalitarian tendencies.

Religion and Identity

The persuasiveness of a theological system also hinges on its ability to provide a broad system of relationships to as many as possible in a given community. Religion is supposed to provide an explanation of reality and to establish coherent relationships among the varied elements of human experience. Religion is not exclusively about happiness, but rather about constructing an understanding of diverse realities. In one sense religion and totalitarianism have the same identical goal of creating relationships on a level larger than that of the family. For religion the key task is to provide a satisfactory resolution to the essential problems of the human condition by responding to issues of self-identity and place. Similar to community identity, religion strives to maintain a continuity between the past and present as well as to develop an interrelationship among those within the religious belief system.

Both religious and political ideologies historically have striven to organize the human world around unifying ideals (see AUTHORITY). NATIONALISM has tried to cement large groups together socially, culturally, and politically, and religious worldviews have also strenuously tried to construct their own integrated worlds. In the twentieth century Protestantism has had to negotiate identity and alienation issues as it has confronted Nazism and COMMUNISM. German Protestantism offers one example of how the church has engaged totalitarianism.

Protestantism and National Socialism

In modern GERMANY, at least until 1945, Protestants continued their ongoing agenda of freeing the “German spirit” from Rome. From this perspective, to be Protestant was to be German. In its anti-ultramontane version, German Protestantism was seen as reinforcing national identity by appealing to an exclusive and marginalizing vision of what it meant to be German. Such Protestant spokespersons as Willibald Beyschlag, for example, imagined German history to be the history of Protestantism and Germany’s future destiny to be the completion of the REFORMATION.

The Nazi Reich and its relationship to Protestantism must be placed in the context of the tension existing between religion and nationalism in the twentieth century. The record of how the churches attempted to use their theological doctrines (see CHRISTOLOGY) to justify political practices is replete with instances of contradiction and ambivalence. Theology itself was all too frequently employed to provide ideological justifications that could nurture the dominant political stances toward societal issues. German Protestant churches were not unique. From the beginning of the twentieth century virtually all of the Christian churches became caught up in organizational and spiritual crises that exerted an impact on how the churches in Germany and elsewhere could respond to the rise of populist totalitarian dictatorships. Protestant theology, for example, had justified nationalistic war efforts in 1914–1918. The theologians depicted the war in spiritual terms and insisted that personal sacrifice could be seen as moral regeneration. The spiritual leadership of Protestants as they demonized their enemies had already been so gravely compromised that the Nazi years really brought few surprises. The teachings of Jesus and the hideous message from the battlefields produced a widespread disillusion that warped European church life for decades (see KARL BARTH).

Facing the chaos in Europe after 1918, the wounded Protestant message could not counter the hatred that kept Europe in turmoil for decades. At least until 1945 the churches lacked a theology potent enough to support a critical stance toward totalitarianism. Christians adapted to Nazism, convinced by the arguments that political cooperation was crucial. Protestants accepted a dualistic worldview, in which “good” could be equated with the völkisch-nationalist agenda and “evil” with JUDAISM, materialism, and liberal internationalism.

Hitler appealed to national unity as well as self-sacrifice and service. He was hostile toward Bolshevism and launched a campaign against political corruption and vice, while promising to uphold Christianity. Through his German Christian Movement (see GERMAN CHRISTIANS), he hoped to create one Reichskirche. Almost immediately, however, a surprising opposition emerged. The CONFESSING CHURCH worked to create its own parallel arrangements, that is, councils of brethren. The BARMEN DECLARATION (1934) reaffirmed that there can exist nothing higher than the power of God, a view that would be foundational for any real resistance against totalitarianism. After 1934 several Lutheran bishops, including Hans Meiser in Munich and Theophil Wurm in Stuttgart, added a more institutional dimension to the controversy. Even though the totalitarian state restricted options, these men and the ecclesial forces that they represented negotiated with and at various levels confronted the regime on the local and national level until 1945. Although some resistance arose, the Protestant churches were not really prepared to prevent or even meaningfully to mitigate the criminal acts of war and the genocidal policies of the Third Reich. Under the Nazi assault the failure of the Protestant churches to articulate standards of moral responsibility became a serious obstacle to Christianity's credibility in the postwar world.

Despite the heroism of MARTIN NIEMÖLLER and DIETRICH BONHOEFFER as well as others in the Pastors' Emergency League, the lack of effective resistance was rooted in the euphoria of 1933, when members of the Protestant churches rejoiced in the expectations for national renewal and regeneration offered by Nazi promises. Protestant theological dissent was often combined with fervent approval of the regime's secular goals of anti-Bolshevism. National renewal and ANTI-SEMITISM can be seen, for example, in the theological work of Emanuel Hirsch. Basically, Protestant church leaders were reluctant to oppose the regime on issues beyond the impinging church struggle that revolved around state interference in church affairs (see CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW). Except for such leaders as Bonhoeffer, their nationalism generally trumped their Christianity. Bonhoeffer, for example, drew attention to the church's adaptations to the nationalist, authoritarian, and militaristic conditioning of the German people.

Even when the ecclesial leaders saw the dangers of accommodation, they possessed no credible theological criteria to deal with politically oppressive policies. They assumed, therefore, a defensive stance resting on an irrelevant past, and could not critically address totalitarianism while trying to preserve the purity of the gospel. This retreat into Protestantism's core milieu was deadly. By limiting those in their community of obligation, Protestants abandoned others, especially the Jews (see HOLOCAUST), to the brutalization of Nazi terror and racist ideology. Such adaptation weakened the Protestant churches that now had to confront communism.

Protestantism and the German Democratic Republic

After its establishment in 1949, the Communistdominated Socialist Unity Party clearly expressed its atheistic hostility to the churches, which were perceived as the outmoded pawns of both capitalism and Nazism. Communist propaganda and persecution seemed to be a repetition of the oppression that Protestants had suffered under the Nazis. By the end of the 1950s, however, the regime had begun to appreciate that the persecution of the churches was counterproductive and that strategies would have to be changed. Governmental contacts were established with “friendly” churchmen, which were designed to mobilize support for the regime’s goal of the international recognition of the German Democratic Republic.

For their part, church leaders tried to accommodate to the communist regime in different fashions. Minimal support existed for the idea that the churches should assume the role of watchdogs in the state as they had unsuccessfully attempted during the Third Reich. One attractive approach, therefore, was political neutrality with a commitment to avoiding confrontation with the state, a practice particularly successful in Saxony, and very much in the Lutheran tradition of the Two Kingdoms. Albrecht Schoenherr, bishop of Berlin (1972–1981), supported this notion of the “churches in Socialism.” Some ecclesial leaders appealed for a carefully defined level of critical solidarity with the Democratic Republic. They hoped to integrate Christianity with socialism. The chief exponent of this approach was Heino Falcke, the Lutheran Dean of Erfurt. Impressed by Karl Barth’s reflections, Falcke developed the idea of “improvable socialism.” Other church leaders in East Germany in the 1960s began to seek a more constructive relationship to the Communist state. They rejected giving the state limited and critical support and tried to avoid being enlisted into a Western-sponsored anti-Communist crusade. They adopted a perspective more akin to Bonhoeffer’s theology. Protestantism should relinquish, they insisted, its traditional privileges and its theological justification for militarism and nationalism. The church, they were convinced, should become the “church for others” as a community of service and witness within socialist society, not beside it, and not against it, while avoiding the risk of legitimating the regime.

The events in POLAND, perestroika in the Soviet Union, and economic problems in the German Democratic Republic (GDR, or East Germany) produced in the second half of the 1980s an expansion of the social role of the churches as they mediated between nonreligious groups and the state. Increasingly the CLERGY courageously now concerned themselves with a whole range of HUMAN RIGHTS issues. When Protestantism supported the service of civil society and its concerns, it did so within the accepted framework of socialist reality. It was not the Protestants, however, who spearheaded the peaceful revolutionary movement that would lead to the collapse of the GDR. The sociopolitical forces of society used the church’s means of communication to realize their goal.

The church had sought to serve God in a Marxist land. To do so Protestant leaders had to deal with an ambivalence in modern communist theory as to whether the CHURCH should be seen as an ideological opponent or as a potential partner in building a socialist society. “Progressive” churchmen hoped to construct a theologically attractive CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. More radical leaders sought the freedoms enjoyed by their colleagues in the West. Pragmatic church leaders, however, sought to enlarge the “free space” theoretically guaranteed by the constitution. In the process they also sought to repudiate the long Lutheran tradition of subordination to the state, nationalism, and the capitulation to authoritarian political leaders. Even though in the religious sphere the churches lost membership and support, they paradoxically attracted adherents because they were the only ideological and political alternative to the regime. By finally seeking to define themselves as “within socialism,” the churches tried to adopt a position of “critical solidarity” toward Communism. The churches upheld a theology powered by democratic impulses and provided a potent support network for opposition groups. They played a pivotal role in the 1989 end of Communism in Europe.

At the time of the Wende (1989–1990) the role the Protestant leaders played in the development of democratization and their influence on the masses seemed to suggest that they were the leaders in this upheaval. Within two years, however, revisionist interpretations were introduced. Members of the opposition to the communist state complained that they had not been really supported enough by the church. The opening of the Stasi (State Security Office) archives also convincingly illustrated that the “free” space of the churches was not as extensive as many had thought. Protestant leaders were accused after 1990 of having been co-opted by the regime because their ecclesial offices had been extensively infiltrated by the Stasi. Almost immediately the churches lost the prestige gained in 1990 and were accused of collaboration as well as collusion with the regime. The tentacles of the Stasi had penetrated the church with scores of informers. The churches’ heroic opposition to the regime had to be rethought. Critics thought that the church leaders may even have prolonged the nefarious hold of the regime.

Why did Protestants in the German Democratic Republic seem to learn nothing from the Nazi experiences of their church? What happened to the Protestant tradition of prophetic witness? What conclusions should be drawn about the character of German theology in light of these traumatic experiences? Such questions revolving around the proper relationship between Christianity and totalitarianism have delayed dealing with the Nazi past and critiquing the communist regime in East Germany. The debates on the controversial issue of which political values (see POLITICAL THEOLOGY) are theologically sustainable as Christians face regimes powered by brutalizing and/or secularizing ideologies continue. Protestantism’s former claim to being the sole agent for moral guidance in political and social affairs may no longer be tenable, unless a sensitivity to human dignity as such can now be grounded on a theological foundation capable of engaging the political aspirations that are shaping the political order in the new millennium.

References and Further Reading

- Chandler, Andrew. The Moral Imperative: New Essays on the Ethics of Resistance in National Socialist Germany, 1933–1945. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1998.
- Conway, John. “Coming to Terms with the Past: Interpreting the German Church Struggles, 1933–1990.” German History 16 (1998): 377–396.
- Eckardt, Alice. “How Are the Protestant Churches Responding 50+ Years After?” In Remembering for the Future: The Holocaust in an Age of Genocide, edited by John K. Roth and Elisabeth Maxwell. vol. 2, 533–543. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
- Halberstam, Michael. Totalitarianism and the Modern Conception of Politics. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1999.

Smith, Helmut Walser. German Nationalism and Religious Conflict: Culture, Ideology and Politics, 1870–1914. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995.

DONALD J. DIETRICH

TRACTARIAN MOVEMENT

See Oxford Movement

TRACTARIANISM

See Oxford Movement

TRADITION

The place and role of tradition in the life and teaching of the church is crucial to the question of AUTHORITY. Few issues come closer to the heart of Protestantism than that of authority. Authority was ultimately at stake in MARTIN LUTHER'S reform and was endlessly debated in Roman Catholic-Protestant polemic in the centuries that followed the REFORMATION.

Authority questions fall into three groups: dynamics, structures, and sources. The Reformation was concerned with all three. The reformers challenged the way that authority was exercised in the Church (dynamics): they believed that it should be pastoral and fraternal, not dictatorial and oppressive. The Reformers made changes (not always intended) to the structures that mediated authority in the Church. Notably they rejected the jurisdiction of the pope and in some cases awarded oversight of the church to civil rulers (the prince or magistrate). They regarded episcopacy (see BISHOP) as dispensable if the gospel was at stake. More profoundly, the reformers reconstructed the sources of authority—scripture, tradition, and reason—to give uncompromising priority to scripture, to critique tradition in the light of scripture, and to bring the new scholarly methods of Renaissance humanism to bear on both (reason). Our concern here is with Protestant attitudes to tradition, and our main focus is on the magisterial reformers of the sixteenth century (this enables us to include Anglican theology within the category of Protestantism).

Sixteenth-Century Presuppositions

It is important not to read back into the sixteenth century modern concepts of tradition. The reformers did not operate explicitly with the distinctions that have passed into the ecumenical consensus between three senses of the word: "Tradition" as the essential faith or gospel; "tradition" as the living stream of belief, worship, and spirituality that conveys Tradition and elucidates it in the history of the church; and "traditions" as diverse specific practices on which churches differ. The reformers did not use the modern ecumenical language of tradition. This may explain why some standard expositions of Luther's theology have no index entry for tradition.

Some of the animus that the Reformers evinced against tradition should be attributed to the scholar's contempt for outmoded academic methods. The Aristotelian logic-chopping of the universities and the layers of interpretation typical of the Sentences of Peter Lombard, a widely used textbook approach, were equally repugnant to men who had imbibed Erasmus's Greek New Testament and worked with what they believed to be authentic texts of St. Augustine and other Fathers. Even here, however, we should note that the reformers invoked authentic (original) tradition against more recent corruptions.

Against Oppressive Human Traditions

When the reformers spoke of tradition, the overtones were generally pejorative. Tradition was suspect for them and called for a hermeneutic of suspicion. Matthew 15:6 was ringing in their ears: “for the sake of your tradition you make void the word of God.” The negative tone that the Reformers adopted with respect to tradition should not mislead us: the reference was specific and limited. What they had in mind was certainly not everything that they shared with the Latin church: the canon of scripture, the Our Father, the creeds, and other teachings of the early councils (Luther and the reformers generally insisted that councils could err and had done so), the ordered ministry, the need for structures of worship, and oversight and for church law.

The magisterial reformers (as opposed to the radicals including the ANABAPTISTS) honored the Fathers of the early Church and studied them assiduously, appealing to their authority in confirmation of scriptural arguments or where Scripture was reticent. They regarded them as biblical theologians par excellence, as the witnesses who stood closest to the revelation inscribed in Scripture. At the least, as in the case of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, they employed their authority ad hominem, against opponents who relied on them.

The reformers’ polemic against “tradition” or “traditions” is directed at particular human practices (“human traditions”) that the late medieval Roman church had made binding on the faithful. What roused the reformers’ indignation was not the fact that church authorities (such as the pope) made laws or insisted on certain practices: the church was bound to do this in the interests of good order and unity. What they objected to was the imposition of rules on the consciences of the faithful and as necessary to SALVATION. What belonged to human right was elevated to divine right. What belonged in the earthly forum was falsely situated coram deo (before the face of God), and what belonged to “things indifferent” (adiaphora—making no difference to one’s salvation) was made necessary to salvation.

For the reformers all things necessary to salvation were to be found expressed clearly in the text of Scripture, and the Bible did not need the assistance of tradition to convey its saving message. It nowhere stated that auricular confession to a priest, confirmation, indulgences, obedience to the papacy, and so forth were conditions of salvation. (Luther’s generation did not have to contend with the Council of Trent’s decree of 1546 that appeared to place unwritten traditions on a par with Scripture, twin channels of divine revelation, although JOHN CALVIN among others later attacked it.)

The criterion the reformers applied in this context as elsewhere was that of JUSTIFICATION. The keeping of human rules, rites, and ceremonies could never justify the sinner in the sight of God. On the contrary, some of these requirements could not be kept without committing sin (AUGSBURG CONFESSION XXVIII). In his Apology of the Augsburg Confession (XV, 20–21) PHILIPP MELANCHTHON made this distinction abundantly clear:

Although the holy Fathers themselves had rites and traditions, they did not regard them as useful or necessary for justification. They did not obscure the glory or work of Christ but taught that we are justified by faith for Christ's sake, not for the sake of these human rites. They observed these human rites because they were profitable for good order, because they gave the people a set time to assemble, because they provided an example of how things could be done decently and in order in the churches, and finally because they helped instruct the common folk.... For these reasons the Fathers kept ceremonies, and for the same reasons we also believe in keeping traditions. We are amazed when our opponents maintain that traditions have another purpose, namely to merit the forgiveness of sins, grace and justification.

Melanchthon added on behalf of the churches of the reform in Germany: "We gladly keep the old traditions set up in the church because they are useful and promote tranquillity, and we interpret them in an evangelical way, excluding the opinion that holds that they justify" (38). Such opinions were "doctrines of demons."

Similarly in the INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION (IV, X) Calvin attacked as "human traditions" various decrees regarding forms of worship that lacked biblical authority, but he made it clear that he supported lawful, useful church constitutions. Where liberty of conscience was flouted and human regulations were made necessary to salvation, "a kind of Judaism" had been introduced. The same point occurs, for example, in Calvin's The Necessity of Reforming the Church (1544).

Ambivalence about Tradition

Tradition in its etymological New Testament sense (paradosis) means the act of handing on from one person to another for safekeeping, not the act of handing down from one generation or one century to another, like passing on the baton in a relay race. This distinction suggests that the reformers' relation to tradition was marked by a certain ambivalence about historical continuity.

On the one hand, the driving force of the Reformation was the attempt to retrieve in its integrity what had been handed on to the church by Christ and the Apostles. The true gospel in the true church had been rediscovered. It was the true treasure, the pearl of great price, the one thing needful. To safeguard it one must be willing to die a martyr's death. The act of rediscovering, safeguarding, and handing on to faithful men leapfrogged the centuries and had little to do with ideas of succession (although some of the more radical Protestants elaborated an alternative apostolic succession, located in the dissident movements of late medieval Europe). Unbroken continuity was not a virtue in itself. The received historical structures of papacy, episcopacy, and canon law were dispensable. Saving faith was a timeless moment, so to speak.

On the other hand, the reformers found themselves necessarily involved with matters concerning the handing down of truth, of authority, of forms of church life. They were adamant that they were not setting up a new church. Their aim, on the contrary, was to renew the face of the one church (as Calvin put it). They were not, they insisted, inventing new doctrines, but rather reinstating the apostolic teaching that had been held since the beginning but had become obscured. In sacramental theology and practice they were clear that they were not innovating. In reforming the mass (e.g., giving communion in both kinds: the wine as well as the bread) they were restoring ancient practice. They insisted that authority to minister word and sacrament was not to be seized by the individual but had to be given by constituted authority.

In defending infant baptism the magisterial reformers were of course perpetuating long-standing tradition. Luther and Melancthon claimed that it came down from the Apostles, from the pure time of the church, before the rise of heresies. If infant baptism had not been true BAPTISM, there would have been no church for all those centuries because the church always remains, by the promise of God, and without baptism there is no church. On their own premises Zwingli and Calvin could not appeal to tradition for something as vitally connected with salvation as infant baptism, but found sophisticated biblical warrants for it.

The English Reformation

Like their continental counterparts, from whom they tended to take their lead theologically, the English reformers (whose views are embodied in the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES) held that Scripture contained all things necessary to salvation and that those human traditions that innovated against the teaching of Scripture were to be abolished. Other practices could be maintained on their merits provided they were not imposed on the conscience or made necessary to salvation. These practices need not be the same everywhere; particular (i.e., national) churches had authority to legislate for themselves, but not for others, in rites and ceremonies.

The approach that is typical of the English Reformers is clearly seen in JOHN JEWEL'S Apologia Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1562) and in his extensive Defence of the Apology. Jewel's chosen field of battle, on which he prevailed, was the testimony of the early church to scriptural truth. English reformers such as Jewel felt themselves at one with the primitive church, appealed to the consent of the Fathers, and claimed that the Romanists had forsaken the fellowship of the holy Fathers and blessed martyrs.

ANGLICANISM gives early tradition a place in deciding matters concerning the outward ordering or POLITY of the church, provided that they are "not repugnant" to Scripture. This distinctive theme becomes pronounced in RICHARD HOOKER (1554–1600). Hooker attacked the contention of the PURITANS in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND that nothing could be done in worship and church government that did not enjoy explicit biblical warrant (therefore, e.g., no surplices and no bishops). In place of “things indifferent” Hooker spoke of “things accessory” (i.e., to salvation). Although what was necessary to salvation was revealed only in Scripture, nothing in the life of the church was entirely neutral.

The role of tradition is only one element in Hooker’s argument: sanctified reason and a sense of what is appropriate to the circumstances also play a part in clarifying God’s will where Scripture does not inform us. Tradition is a rather crude term for what Hooker has in mind: collective practice and experience and the expressed mind of the church together with the consent of its members are all involved. Hooker’s balanced, integrated approach was distorted by some Anglican divines of the next century who took the appeal to “antiquity” to an extreme.

The uniformitarian assumptions of Western culture, unchallenged until the Romantic and historical movements of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries and common to Protestants and Roman Catholics, are evident in these debates. What enjoyed universal consent was right for all times and places. Oldest was best. The golden age lay in the remote past. Therefore Hooker has a prejudice against change, which should always be contemplated reluctantly and only when urgently called for. One could not improve on ancient wisdom and well-tried practice. In his thinking on the scope of tradition, Hooker is not far removed from Luther’s “freedom of a Christian man,” although it is a more urbane, sapiential approach to the considerable area where God has placed responsibility for ordering its own life firmly in the hands of the church itself.

References and Further Reading

- Avis, Paul. Authority in the Church: An Anglican and Ecumenical Approach. Edinburgh: T. & T.Clark/Continuum, 2004.
- Fraenkel, Peter. Testimonia Patrum: The Function of the Patristic Argument in the Theology of Philipp Melancthon. Geneva: Librairie E.Droz, 1961.
- McAdoo, Henry R. The Spirit of Anglicanism. London: A. & C. Black, 1965.
- McGrath, Alister E. The Intellectual Origins of the European Reformation, ch. 5. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1987.
- Middleton, Arthur. Fathers and Anglicans: The Limits of Orthodoxy, part 1. Leominster Herefordshire, UK: Gracewing, 2001.
- Oberman, Heiko. The Dawn of the Reformation, 269–296. Edinburgh: T. & T.Clark, 1986.
- Pelikan, Jaroslav. Obedient Rebels: Catholic Substance and Protestant Principle in Luther’s Reformation. London: SCM Press, 1964.
- Tavard, George H. Holy Writ or Holy Church: The Crisis of the Protestant Reformation. London: Burns & Oates, 1959.

PAUL AVIS

TRANSCENDENTALISM

Transcendentalism was an intellectual reform movement, centered in the Boston area, during the 1830s and 1840s. Although the term covered a wide range of diverse thought, its fundamental idea was a belief in the superiority of intuitive knowledge over sensory knowledge (the empiricism of the ENLIGHTENMENT). Looking to Plato, IMMANUEL KANT, and ROMANTICISM as spiritual ancestors, transcendentalism began to formalize in 1836 when RALPH WALDO EMERSON published his manifesto of the movement, Nature, and ORESTES BROWNSON wrote his social critique, New Views of Christianity, Society and the Church. In addition to Emerson and Brownson, the names belonging to this group constitute a hall of fame in U.S. intellectual, cultural, and reform history: WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING, Charles Dana, MARGARET FULLER, Nathaniel Hawthorne, THEODORE PARKER, Elizabeth and Sophia Peabody, George Ripley, Henry David Thoreau, and many others.

Many of those who played leading roles in the transcendental movement were Unitarian clergymen who believed that the source of religious truth was not to be found in the BIBLE, the CHURCH, Jesus, or TRADITION, but rather in intuition, which they deemed to be the internal voice of an immanent God. Some of these Unitarian ministers, such as Emerson and Ripley, left the church because they believed the institution was incapable of reform. Others, however, such as Channing and Parker, remained in the church and became instrumental in ecclesiastical change. At first most Unitarians considered Parker to be heretical, although 3,000 people each week came to hear the gifted and controversial preacher. Over time, however, Unitarianism became what Parker advocated, and he is often credited as marking the emancipation of Unitarianism from all semblance of Christian ORTHODOXY.

Because all people were capable of receiving intuitive revelation, all people, regardless of race, ethnic background (see ETHNICITY), or station in life, were to be valued. This caused the transcendentalists to be heavily involved in social reform, opposed to anything in society that devalued human worth and impeded human potentiality. Various transcendentalists emphasized different reforms, which included opposition to intemperance, PROSTITUTION, WAR (especially the Mexican War, which was perceived as an attempt to extend the boundaries of SLAVERY), a corrupt judicial system, and unjust economic practices that caused the rich to become richer and the poor to become poorer. Many transcendentalists were in the forefront to make EDUCATION available to all. The greatest contribution to social reform was the transcendentalists' opposition to slavery. Parker, one of the early American preachers to take an uncompromising stand against slavery, toured many of the northern states addressing the evils of slavery. Thoreau went to jail rather than pay taxes to support the Mexican War and wrote his still famous treatise, "On the Duty of Civil Disobedience." Intuition for the transcendentalists was "higher law," a standard that eclipsed judicial and ecclesiastical laws, even the U.S. Constitution.

Although short in duration as a formal movement, transcendentalism has had an enormous impact on American thought. Individuals such as Walt Whitman, EMILY DICKINSON, Charles William Eliot, John Dewey, MARY BAKER EDDY, and MARTIN LUTHER KING JR. have all acknowledged their indebtedness to various transcendentalists.

See also Slavery, Abolition of; Unitarian Universalist Association

References and Further Reading

Hutchinson, William R. The Transcendental Ministers: Church Reform in the New England Renaissance. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1959.

Miller, Perry, ed. The Transcendentalists: An Anthology. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1950.

DAVID B.CHESEBROUGH

TRANSUBSTANTIATION

According to the Agreed Statement on Eucharistic Doctrine issued by the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (1971), communion with Christ in the Eucharist “presupposes his true presence, effectually signified by the bread and wine which, in this mystery, become his body and blood” (paragraph 6). The word transubstantiation occurs only in a footnote: “The word transubstantiation is commonly used in the Roman Catholic Church to indicate that God acting in the eucharist effects a change in the inner reality of the elements. The term should be seen as affirming the fact of Christ’s presence and of the mysterious and radical change which takes place. In contemporary Roman Catholic theology it is not understood as explaining how the change takes place.”

Paschasius Radbertus (c. 790–c. 860) composed the first surviving Latin monograph on the Eucharist: the real presence of the flesh born of Mary, which suffered on the cross and rose from the dead, is miraculously multiplied by divine power, in a spiritual mode, at each consecration. His colleague Ratramnus in the ninth century introduced a distinction between presence in figura and in veritate.

Berengar of Tours (c. 1010–1088) emphasized the fact of the real presence, acknowledging no physical change in the bread and wine. Lanfranc of Bec (c. 1010–1089) maintained the presence of the invisible body of Christ, identical with the body born of Mary, but hidden under the species of bread and wine. Between 1073 and 1078 Guitmond of Aversa wrote of the elements being “substantially transmuted” (PL 149:1467).

An anonymous treatise dated to about 1140, originating probably in Paris and perhaps by the Oxford master Robert Pullen (d. 1146), contains what reads like an innovation: “not a transformation of a quality but, if I may say so, a transubstantio [sic] or transmutatio of one substance into another” (cf. Goering). By 1170 the word is widely used, as a noun as well as in verbal and adverbial forms.

The word first appears in a conciliar text at Lateran IV (1215), in the verbal form: “by divine power bread and wine having been transubstantiated, transsubstantiatis, into the body and blood.” This is not, and was not intended to be, a dogmatic definition. Three different understandings of the concept continued to be regarded as orthodox (cf. Jorissen): the substances of the bread and wine coexist with the substances of Christ’s body and blood; they are annihilated; and they are converted into the substances of Christ’s body and blood.

By the 1260s Thomas Aquinas was arguing that the third of these meanings is the only acceptable one. He wanted to secure the presence of Christ’s body and blood in the sacrament secundum veritatem, not solely secundum figuram or sicut in signo (Summa Theologiae 3.75.1). He knows that some have held the coexistence position, but argues that it should be avoided “as heretical”: none of his four arguments involves Aristotelian philosophy (75.2). He knows that others held that the substances of the bread and wine are annihilated and replaced by those of Christ's body and blood: this view is "false," he says, because it depends on a mistaken analogy with local motion (75.3). Citing Eusebius of Emesa (as he thinks), Ambrose, and John Chrysostom, thus deliberately reaching back to patristic authorities, he holds that this conversio, unlike all "natural changes," is "totally supernatural, effected by God's power alone"; "can be called by a name proper to itself: transubstantiation" (75.4). In his study of Lateran IV for Giffredus of Anagni (Vives 27:424–438), Aquinas holds that the first view was condemned and the third (his own) defined by the Council.

In 1306/07, in his Opus Oxoniense, John Duns Scotus, contending that coexistence and substitution made better sense, concluded nevertheless that Lateran IV had defined the less "reasonable" position: God, after all, was free to effect the eucharistic presence as he willed. Invoking Lateran IV, the Council of Trent upheld transubstantiation against what was understood as MARTIN LUTHER'S doctrine of consubstantiation. Whether this left Aquinas's view as the only alternative is unclear; the substitution view seems to have remained the preferred option for many (cf. Wohlmuth). Luther himself seems not to have objected to any one else holding Aquinas's view, stupid as he thought it was.

Elucidating the miracle of the eucharistic change, Aquinas argues that, after the consecration, the accidents of the bread and wine remain (75.5), with no subject in which to inhere (77.1–2). This is Aristotelian terminology; yet Aquinas bases his theory on the first theorem of the Neoplatonist Liber de Causis: the first cause can suspend a second cause, and thus keep accidents in existence in the absence of the substance of which they were the accidents (cf. Imbach).

Although John Wycliffe (c. 1330–1384) certainly taught a version of the coexistence view ("true bread naturally and Christ's body figuratively"), his principal objection was to the "madness" of the "accidents without a subject" thesis. Again, in article 28 of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND (1563), the word transubstantiation is rejected because it is taken to mean a metaphysical explanation in terms of the separability of accidents from substance.

In the seventeenth century and since, Descartes, Malebranche, and others sought to account for the eucharistic change in terms of natural SCIENCE. Such efforts continued in the twentieth century (M.M.De Munynck, A.Mitterer, and B.Krempel since 1928; F. Selvaggi and C.Colombo since 1948). In the 1960s, turning to phenomenology, linguistic philosophy, and so forth, theologians reinterpreted transubstantiation in such terms as transfinalization and transignification (J.de Baciocchi, P.Schoonenberg, E.Schillebeeckx).

According to the authoritative Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992), the mode of Christ's eucharistic presence is "real" inasmuch as it is "a substantial presence by which Christ, God and man, makes himself wholly and entirely present" (§1374). This involves a "conversion of the bread and wine into Christ's body and blood," as attested by John Chrysostom and Ambrose of Milan (§1375). Finally, recalling the Council of Trent, "this change the holy Catholic Church has fittingly and properly called transubstantiation" (§1376). In effect philosophical explanations are tacitly set aside, and the word transubstantiation is equated with its patristic antecedents.

See also Catholicism, Protestant Reactions; Lord's Supper

References and Further Reading

- Armogathe, J.R. Theologia Cartesiana: L'explication physique de l'eucharistie chez Descartes et dom Desgabets. The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1977.
- Clark, J.T. "Physics, Philosophy, Transubstantiation, Theology." Theological Studies 12 (1951):24–51.
- Goering, J. "The Invention of Transubstantiation." Traditio 46 (1991):147–170.
- Imbach, R. "Le traits de l'eucharistie de Thomas d'Aquin et les averroistes." Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Theologiques 77 (1993):175–194.
- Jorissen, Hans. Die Entfaltung der Transsubstantiationslehre bis zum Beginn der Hochscholastik. Münster: Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie, 1965.
- Kidd, B.J. The Thirty-nine Articles: Their History and Explanation. London: Rivingtons, 1899.
- Macy, Gary. Treasures from the Storeroom: Medieval Religion and the Eucharist. Collegeville, MN: The Liturgical Press, 1999.
- Wohlmuth, Josef. Realpresenz und Transubstantiation im Konzil von Trient. Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1975.

FERGUS KERR

TRAVELS AND PILGRIMAGES

Travels and pilgrimages have taken many forms in the history of Protestantism, and have often involved varied combinations of missionary activity, cultivation of personal piety, and spiritually motivated use of leisure time. While travel has been viewed as a means of self-improvement, Protestants have tended to be wary of treating particular places as especially holy. Pilgrimage practices carried out by Roman Catholic or Orthodox Christians are sometimes criticized as being idolatrous because they are said to involve worship of specific objects as opposed to submission to an omnipresent and omnipotent God. Sacred journeys are likely to be seen by Protestants as means of cultivating both personally meaningful religious experience and deeper engagement with Scriptures. Pilgrimage has also been viewed in metaphorical ways as symbolizing movement towards salvation and union with the divine.

Reformed and Puritan Origins

Opposition to pilgrimage was an important part of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century. Reformers objected to offering prayers to dead saints or going on pilgrimages in order to gain miraculous cures and salvation. These forms of worship appeared to mix the spiritual and the material in ways that were considered to be misdirected, not least because they attempted to confine an infinite God within finite and humanly constructed forms. MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) felt that indulgences (grants of remission of sin), often gained through pilgrimage, reflected the corruption of the church and the papacy. JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) claimed that miracles had ceased at the end of the time of the Apostles. As the scholar Erasmus (c. 1466–1536) had done before him, Calvin attempted to expose the worship of relics and images as both superstitious and naïve. Part of his aim was to move religious focus from physical objects toward the development of an inner piety, thus allowing the Holy Spirit to operate through the Word. The REFORMATION in Europe frequently led to iconoclasm, abandonment of old sites of worship, and even the outlawing of pilgrimage.

Nonetheless, the notion of the spiritual journey took hold as an influential part of Protestant thought. JOHN BUNYAN'S (1628–1688) Pilgrim's Progress, first published in 1678, became a classic text for Puritans and has remained an important source of inspiration for Protestants (and other Christians) ever since. Bunyan wrote at a time of personal and political turbulence, in an ENGLAND marked by civil war as well as persecution against nonconformists. His book documents the search for truth and salvation by the central character, called Christian, who overcomes worldly temptation, doubt, and despair on the long road from a city of destruction to a celestial city. Bunyan drew on biblical and Calvinist imagery, including the constant battle between forces of light and darkness. He combined realistic details of everyday life with religious allegory as he depicted the lonely Puritan struggle with the self as well as the external world. The linking of salvation with sacrifice and self-denial is also emphasized, with Christian running away from his family at the beginning of the story as he cries out his longing for “Life, life, eternal life.”

Similar themes were evident in the thinking of Puritans and Pietists in the early years of settlement in North America. The whole of life could be seen as a symbolic journey, an exile in the wilderness that might ultimately lead to dwelling permanently with God. Existence in the world involved much toil, but was also an inner quest of the individual (located within the church) toward death or perhaps potential salvation. Pioneers learned to view their situation through language and metaphor derived from both the New and the Old Testaments. They sometimes saw themselves as akin to Israelites, close to Zion—the hill where Israel’s altar had been placed, which came in Christian thought to represent the church and the route toward salvation for God’s people. INCREASE MATHER (1639–1723), the leading Puritan theologian of the late seventeenth century, licensed the first American reprint of Pilgrim’s Progress, and indeed talked of his own life as a pilgrimage on earth. A folk image of pilgrimage was linked to travel across the new land, and pioneers frequently gave the name Zion to newly founded settlements.

From Mission to Tourism

The sense of Christianizing and domesticating the wilderness was also evident in the actions of sectarian groups such as the Mormons as they moved westward across the landscape in the nineteenth century. Followers of this movement likened themselves to Pilgrims crossing the Atlantic in the Mayflower. They gave the name of Jordan to a river flowing near Salt Lake in Utah, and that of Zion to a nearby canyon. In addition, the pilgrimage metaphor could be adapted for the purposes of missionaries who played an important part in European colonialism. Such evangelical travelers again invoked Bunyan’s text (as well as the wandering imagery derived from Exodus) as they constructed narratives of their own journeys into the wilderness. Thus the apparent savagery of local people in AFRICA, the so-called “Dark Continent,” was juxtaposed with the enlightenment of imperial mission, just as the African landscape could be seen as akin to a biblical desert. Eventually, dissenting black Christians would themselves appropriate biblical imagery of wandering toward a Promised Land as a symbol of potential liberation from colonial bonds.

Improvements in systems of communication and transport evident in the nineteenth century proved to be of benefit to many types of travelers. They were instrumental in the emergence of new forms of leisure associated with journeying, at least among those who could afford to pay for passage by rail or steamship. Often, travel was perceived to be self-improving as well as an opportunity for pleasure, reflecting influences from the European Grand Tour as well as a characteristically Protestant mistrust of mere idleness.

An example of the combining of secular enjoyment with spiritual edification was provided by the development of Laurel Hill Cemetery by the Quaker John Smith (1798–1881). The site not only provided a final resting place for notable figures in the Protestant world, but was also a semirural location, suitable for excursions from nearby Philadelphia. Contemporary guidebooks to the cemetery suggested that visitors might see themselves as pilgrims, and in the absence of a Catholic cult of the saints, the place could prompt meditations on the achievements and exemplary character of those who had passed away.

For more ambitious travelers, the Victorian era saw the development of the package tour and the beginnings of organized movement around the globe. Thomas Cook (1808–1892) had been a preacher and secretary of a temperance society in England before he started to arrange group tours on a commercial basis. Among his many activities, he provided the opportunity for thousands of travelers to visit the HOLY LAND as part of a more extensive tour around the Middle East. Increased British presence in the area, prompted by the weakness of the Ottoman Empire and the desire to maintain a Western presence in important trade routes, meant that access to Palestine was much easier than before. Cook's illustrious customers included Mark Twain and, in 1890, Kaiser Wilhelm, grandson of Queen Victoria, but his main achievement was to provide reliable, safe transport to people of varying economic means.

Many Victorian visitors to the Holy Land were evangelical in outlook. On their journeys they would bring BIBLES and hymn books in order to hold services at holy spots. Visits often confirmed such pious tourists in their assumption that Western culture and Protestantism were superior to other forms of belief, and at times the journey was seen as an opportunity to convert the local populace and even redeem the Holy Land itself. Their visits reflected their religious convictions in other ways. In Jerusalem, Protestants might walk along the Via Dolorosa but would not incorporate the Stations of the Cross as would Roman Catholics. In addition, Protestants were frequently highly suspicious of certain sites as mere tourist traps and fraudulent representations of the Bible. They attempted to avoid any tendency to see special grace or sanctity as being inherent in particular places. The Holy Land was ideally regarded not as holy in and of itself, but as a powerful catalyst for the cultivation of spiritually powerful experiences rooted in the interaction between believer and Bible. Thus the Sea of Galilee was a favorite spot for Protestant visitors, not only because Christ had taught and preached there, but because the site constituted a landscape rather than a church or monastery that had been filled with alien religious paraphernalia. Similarly, the rocky topography of the Garden Tomb allowed evangelicals to imagine that they were viewing a biblical place uncluttered by later distractions. Conviction in the lasting truth of the Bible was reinforced by such visits at a time when the historical validity of Scripture was being placed under question by new techniques of textual analysis and wider forces of secularization evident in the Western world.

The Present

Despite many predictions of the end of religion that have been made since the nineteenth century, both Protestantism and pilgrimage continue to flourish. Volume of travel in general has of course increased dramatically. Although many shrines of medieval devotion did not survive the ravages of the Reformation in Europe, they were often restored in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Today, such sites frequently reflect the ecumenical relations between faiths that are a feature of modern spirituality. Thus in England, the site of Walsingham provides a good example of the complex pluralism evident in much contemporary religion. Situated in the rural county of Norfolk, in eastern England, it contains both an ANGLO-CATHOLIC and a Roman Catholic shrine as well as an Orthodox presence. The site has mythic origins in pre-Norman, eleventh-century England, and the modern restoration of pilgrimage is a revival of links with a past spirituality that was evident before the Reformation. In common with many pilgrimage shrines, a connection is made with the landscape of the Holy Land, as the village is sometimes called England's Nazareth. Visitors include tourists as well as devout representatives of a variety of Christian denominations, while on occasion the site plays host to vocal demonstrations from Protestant evangelicals who accuse high Anglicans of idolatry. The site of Glastonbury in southwest England is equally complex in its historical and contemporary associations. It has become the site of a revival of medieval Christianity alongside the flourishing of New Age spirituality. Pilgrimage badges have been reintroduced by local clergy in an effort to echo ancient tradition, and since 1986 the main Anglican and Roman Catholic pilgrimages have been held simultaneously in order to express unity. As at Walsingham and many other pilgrimage sites around the world, the boundaries between tourism and pilgrimage, secular and sacred travel, have become hard to define. For Mormons, who have spread throughout the world since the nineteenth century, visits to the American "homeland," and Utah in particular, represent the opportunity to combine holiday travel with overtly religious activity.

Protestant evangelicals may shy from the associations of the word pilgrimage, yet they have continued to engage in travel for sacred purposes. Africa and LATIN AMERICA in particular have proved to be fertile missionary fields over the past century and more, and in many cases Protestants have competed with Islamic and Catholic presences in contexts that have received waves of missionary activity over hundreds of years. In addition, travel closer to the pilgrimage model has been evident among such Christians. Pilgrimage motifs can be discerned in North American Protestant rural and kinship-based revivalist gatherings and prayer meetings, as well as annual evangelical gatherings such as "Spring Harvest" in England. Primitive Baptists in the United States have maintained the Calvinist tradition of seeing themselves as pilgrims and strangers in a barren land. The image of the traveling pilgrim fits the actual movements of elders and laity as they move from one church to another. It echoes in many Protestant hymns, including the famous lines "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah, Pilgrim through this barren land." Meanwhile, the Christian Zionist movement has refocused attention on Jerusalem as a key location for millenarian and apocalyptic predictions of Christ's Second Coming. The International Christian Embassy, based in Jerusalem, organizes annual Feast of Tabernacles pilgrimages to Jerusalem. These occasions are meant to enact the "coming up of the nations to Jerusalem" as described in Leviticus. Drawn from around the globe, Christian Zionists not only visit the sites of Christ's historical life and death, but also see their actions as contributing to the divine redemptive plan for the future of the world.

Other developments in the Protestant world reflect contemporary processes of globalization as well as the ability of Christians to take advantage of new communications technologies. During the 1990s the "Toronto Blessing" entailed many thousands of Protestant charismatics visiting Toronto Airport Christian Fellowship in the hope of gaining access to a large-scale manifestation of the Holy Spirit. The phenomenon of the blessing itself spread through ministries and congregations around the world, and news of its diffusion was relayed by word of mouth, television images, faxes, and the Internet. Some devotees described the journey to Toronto as akin to a pilgrimage experience. Although apparently highly contemporary and specific to a certain branch of Protestantism, the Toronto Blessing revealed characteristics evident in much of the history of Protestant travel and pilgrimage. Specific objects were not deployed as the focus of worship and the locale of the Toronto Fellowship was not considered to be special or holy in itself.

Despite frequently voiced overt opposition to pilgrimage, both literal and metaphorical travel have proved to be important aspects of many forms of Protestantism throughout the centuries since the Reformation. Journeying for pious purposes has provided opportunities for sacrifice as well as spiritual development, spreading of the Word to the unconverted, and furthering personal union with God. In common with many forms of pilgrimage and travel carried out by people of different cultures and faiths, moving temporarily away from home can be seen as a rite of passage that has important effects on individual and collective identity.

References and Further Reading:

- Coleman, Simon, and John Elsner. Pilgrimage Past and Present in the World Religions. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995.
- Comaroff, Jean, and John Comaroff. Of Revelation and Revolution: Christianity, Colonialism, and Consciousness in South Africa. Vol. 1. Chicago: Chicago University Press, 1991.
- Covey, Cyclone. The American Pilgrimage: The Roots of American History, Religion and Culture. New York: Collier Books, 1961.
- Eire, Carlos. War Against the Idols: The Reformation of Worship from Erasmus to Calvin. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Hummel, Ruth, and Thomas Hummel. Patterns of the Sacred: English Protestant and Russian Orthodox Pilgrims of the Nineteenth Century. London: Scorpion Cavendish, 1995.
- Neville, Grace. Kinship and Pilgrimage: Rituals of Reunion in American Protestant Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Peacock, James L., and Ruel W. Tyson. Pilgrims of Paradox: Calvinism and Experience Among the Primitive Baptists of the Blue Ridge. Washington: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1989.

Percy, Martyn. "The Morphology of Pilgrimage in the 'Toronto Blessing'." Religion 28 (1998):281-288.

SIMON M.COLEMAN

TRIBAL MOVEMENTS (INDIA)

The great majority of Christians in INDIA (90 percent at the time of the 1991 census) were equally divided among three groups: the ancient community of St. Thomas Christians in the southwestern state of Kerala, the dalits (the people formerly identified as outcastes or untouchables) found throughout the country, and the tribals found everywhere in the country but concentrated in the central, eastern, and northeastern regions. The great majority of St. Thomas Christians belong to the Oriental Orthodox and Roman Catholic traditions. The earliest numerically significant responses to the Protestant missionaries who began working in India came from among the dalit peoples of Tamil Nadu and Andhra Pradesh in the midnineteenth century. The scale of this response led to a new MISSIOLOGY. Instead of prioritizing work among the higher caste peoples on the theory that they would then be responsible for the evangelization of the lower classes, Protestant missions began to emphasize work among the marginalized groups. By the end of the nineteenth century this had come to include the tribal peoples. At the beginning of the twenty-first century Christianity was growing more rapidly among the tribal peoples than any other group. Although they represent only 8 percent of the Indian population, they now constitute one third of the Christians.

The first historically significant movement of tribal peoples to Christianity took place in Jharkhand. The Gossner Evangelical Lutheran Mission began work there among the Munda and Oraon tribes in 1850. The legal aid provided by the missionaries to the people who were being dispossessed of their ancestral lands by outsiders led to large-scale movements to Christianity. By the end of the century there were over 50,000 Protestant Christians in this area. At that time they were divided among Lutheran and Anglican churches. A later movement to Christianity led by Belgian Jesuits resulted in the emergence of a large tribal Christian community. The tribes of Jharkhand represent those Indian tribals collectively referred to as “adivasis” (original inhabitants). These tribes are concentrated in an area stretching across the center of India from Orissa in the east to Maharashtra in the west.

Although there are many adivasi Christians, the great majority (approximately 75 percent) of tribal Christians belongs to the Indo-Mongolian tribes of North East India (NEI). Tribals are either in the majority or are significant minorities in the eight states of the region. The Christian movement there was begun by American Baptist and Welsh Presbyterian missionaries in the 1830s and 1840s, first in the Assam plains and then in the hills of what is today Meghalaya. During the nineteenth century Christian communities began to be established by them in Nagaland, Manipur, and Mizoram. There were also significant migrations of Lutherans from Jharkhand. They came to work as contract laborers in the tea gardens of Assam and stayed on as permanent settlers.

The largest church in the region is the Council of Baptist Churches in North East India (CBCNEI), with some 900,000 communicant members distributed through the states of Assam, Meghalaya, Nagaland, Manipur, and Arunachal Pradesh. The second largest Protestant church is the Presbyterian Church of India (PCI) with congregations in Meghalaya, Mizoram, Assam, and Manipur. A constituent member of the PCI, the Presbyterian Church of Mizoram, spends half of its annual income on missionary work outside its own area—including missions in Nepal and Taiwan. These and the smaller Protestant denominations work cooperatively in the North East India Christian Council. The Roman Catholic church began significant work in the region in the third decade of the twentieth century. It began to grow rapidly after the constraints imposed by the British government were removed after Indian Independence in 1947.

Although the rapid growth of Christianity among the tribal peoples of Northeast India is the result of the convergence of a number of different historical developments, the free church Protestantism of the pioneer MISSIONS was an important contributing factor. It was relatively easy to adapt the traditional lay- and village-based polities of the tribes to the Christianity that these missionaries introduced. The Protestant emphasis on the centrality of the BIBLE in the language of the people coupled with the evangelical emphasis on EDUCATION as a means of bringing about religious and social change created effective means for the people to maintain their distinctive identities in the modern world to which they were increasingly exposed. Because the tribal languages had no written form, a written language had to be created for them. Protestants were responsible for putting the languages of over fifty different tribes into written form. The creation of a standard language for an entire tribe, the introduction of the first literature of which first portions and then the whole of the Bible was the most important part, the opening of schools, and the establishment of ecclesiastical organizations brought into existence a new POLITY through which distinctive tribal identities could continue to be expressed.

See also Baptists; Bible Translation; Lutheranism; Missionary Organizations; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Downs, Frederick S. History of Christianity in India: North East India in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. vol. 5, part 5. Bangalore, India: Church History Association of India, 1992.
- . Essays on Christianity in North-East India. Edited by M.S.Sangma and D.R.Syiemlieh. New Delhi, India: Indus Publishing Co., 1994.
- . “Christian Conversion Movements among the Hills Tribes of North East India.” In Religion in South Asia, edited by G.A.Oddie. 2nd rev. ed. New Delhi, India: Manohar Publications, 1991.
- Sa, Fidelis de. Crisis in Chota Nagpur. Bangalore, India: Redemptorist Publications, 1975.
- Swavely, C.H., ed. The Lutheran Enterprise in India. Madras, India: Federation of Evangelical Lutheran Churches in India, 1952. [Useful for both Jharkhand and Assam.]

FREDERICK S. DOWNS

TRIBULATIONISM

Generally, “tribulation” refers to the suffering of God’s people during life on earth. The basic Christian confessions of faith look forward to the return of Christ to judge the living and the dead, bringing an end to this period of suffering, persecution, distress, and trouble.

A more specific use of “tribulation” is found within some Protestant eschatological positions. Jesus’s reference to “great tribulation” (Matthew 24:21; cf. Revelation 7:14) is interpreted by some as a reference to a specific period of time. Perspectives on the tribulation generally are connected to millennial views (see MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM). Amillennialists and postmillennialists tend to interpret even this language of “tribulation” as a description of the suffering characterizing the present age, perhaps with an escalation in intensity as the return of Christ approaches.

Although agreeing that people of God have always endured suffering, premillennialists expect a period of severe and unparalleled tribulation immediately before the return of Christ. For some this period is of indeterminate length. For others, particularly evangelical Protestant premillennialists, the length of this period is delineated in Daniel’s vision of “seventy weeks” (Daniel 9:24–27). The “weeks” or “sevens” in this vision are interpreted as weeks of years, thus the “seventy weeks” are 490 years. The first sixty-nine years conclude with the death of the Messiah. Then there is an indeterminate gap of time until the fulfillment of the seventieth week, the seven years of great tribulation. Many of these premillennialists take a futurist approach to the Apocalypse described by John, also interpreting Revelation 4–19 as describing this tribulation period.

Evangelical Protestant premillennial eschatological perspectives can also be delineated according to belief in the RAPTURE of the CHURCH in connection with the tribulation. Primarily on the basis of I Thessalonians 4, 1,63,000 many believe that the second coming of Christ occurs in two stages. According to the pretribulation rapture view, before the seven years of tribulation the church will be “caught up” (raptured) to escape this period of divine judgment because God has promised believers deliverance from wrath (I Thessalonians 1:10; 5:9). Other premillennialists hold to a post-tribulation rapture, believing that the rapture occurs after the tribulation, immediately before the second coming of Christ. A variety of mediating views are found among premillennialists, some seeing the rapture at the midpoint of the tribulation or at some other point before the end.

Although differences exist among premillennialists concerning the rapture of the church and the tribulation, all agree that the church age is marked by persecution and suffering and that the blessed hope of all Christians is the return of Christ to establish an eternal kingdom of righteousness and peace (Titus 2:13).

See also Eschatology; Evangelicalism

References and Further Reading

- Archer, Gleason L. Jr., et al. Three Views on the Rapture: Pre-, Mid-, or Post-Tribulational? Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1996.
- Gundry, Robert H. The Church and the Tribulation. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1976.
- Ladd, George Eldon. The Blessed Hope. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1956.
- Walvoord, John F. The Rapture Question. Revised and enlarged edition. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1979.

G.R. KREIDER

TROELTSCH, ERNST (1865–1923)

German sociologist and theologian. Troeltsch was born near Augsburg in 1865 and studied THEOLOGY in Erlangen, Berlin, and Göttingen. At Göttingen he was impressed by the teachings of ALBRECHT RITSCHL and his attempt to conceptualize Protestantism in terms of modernity. No sooner had he begun to study theology than Troeltsch asked how one could justify adherence to the Christian faith in a world marked by the scientific discourse. Troeltsch taught systematic theology in Bonn from 1892 to 1894 and then in Heidelberg from 1894 to 1915. In 1910 he began teaching in the Arts and Sciences faculty as well. There he encountered MAX WEBER, with whom he developed a true intellectual kinship, and Heinrich Rickert who, after Wilhelm Dilthey, helped to establish the scientific character of cultural studies. Noted theologian, philosopher, sociologist, and intellectual, Troeltsch died in Berlin in 1923.

In 1915 Troeltsch received the professorial chair of philosophy at the University of Berlin, considered at the time the most important professorship in GERMANY. This chair allowed him to pursue his work free of any ecclesiastic constraint. Considered the “theologian of the history of religions school,” one fundamental question permeated his entire work, which is how to reconcile the relativism of historical research with the absoluteness of Christianity. Troeltsch, who was politically and culturally active in the Germany of his time, was a member of the German Democratic Party. As a parliamentary undersecretary of state in the Prussian ministry of culture from 1919 to 1920 he contributed to the formulation of Prussia’s ecclesiastical policy upon the reorganization of Germany in 1919.

The scope of his work went beyond the field of Protestant theology and dealt with the philosophy of history and the sociology of religion. This is why his work involved the social and cultural sciences. Today his thoughts on the confrontation between Christianity and the modern world offer the opportunity to rediscover his ideas. By pointing out that the “European world is made up of Antiquity and modernity” and that Christianity, while setting them apart, unites both legacies, Troeltsch invites the attention of anyone thinking about European culture and the role of Christianity.

In 1912 Troeltsch published a socio-history of Christianity as the account of the social doctrines of Christian churches: Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches). According to him, no Christian era can be considered as normative. Each one has its own relationship with the proclamation of Jesus, which can itself be considered as the first typical period of Christianity. Next came Pauline Christianity, ancient Christianity, medieval Christianity, LUTHERANISM, CALVINISM, and ascetic Protestantism. These typical periods themselves must be linked with three main types of religious organizations: the Church, the Sect, and the Mystical. The Church type is an institution that precedes its members and integrates all the faithful, no matter the degree or quality of their religiosity. The religious organization of the Church type, established worldwide, maintains positive relations with its sociocultural environment. The Sect type corresponds to the voluntary grouping of believers who are said to be breaking away from society, while the Mystical type corresponds to the fluid network of individuals who are sharing their direct religious experience, beyond ritual mediations and dogma. Troeltsch's Christianity itself, by taking the shape of free and pure individual religiosity that fully partakes in the questions of its time, approximates the latter type. His theology may be spiritualistic, as he himself admitted, but his attention to the history and types of religious organizations made him acknowledge the importance of the organization for religious transmission. This typology, similar to the Church/Sect typology of Max Weber, was debated by many sociologists of religions who speak of "Weber-Troeltschian" typology. H. RICHARD NIEBUHR drew from it in his famous study, The Social Sources of Denominationalism (1929). Besides his interest in the Mystical type, Troeltsch's originality is found in his insistence on a "Free-Church" model, an intermediary religious organization that, although having the sectarian characteristics of voluntary groupings of converts, is nonetheless strongly integrated and involved in society.

Troeltsch, like Weber, believed that Protestantism contributed to the rise of the modern world's ideals. While pointing out the great differences between LUTHERANISM and CALVINISM in this relation to modernity, he especially insisted on the ruptures between what he called "old Protestantism" (Lutheran and Calvinist Protestantism at the beginning, which he perceived as still very much limited by medieval culture) and "modern Protestantism." Since the end of the eighteenth century the latter had given up trying to subordinate state and CULTURE to the criteria of revelation. It accepted the existence of an autonomous secular world by its side, thus making religion a matter of personal conviction and personal initiative. According to Troeltsch ascetic Protestantism practiced by Puritans and BAPTISTS embodies this modern Protestantism (see PURITANISM). Along those lines he pointed out its historical importance as creator of civilization as he compared its impact to that of medieval Catholicism.

While demonstrating that, similar to other religions, Christianity was at different times in its history a purely historical and conditioned phenomenon, Troeltsch sought to explain that because it was the "strongest and most intense revelation of a personalist religiosity," it represented the "highest religious truth that we know."

See also Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Sociology of Protestantism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Troeltsch, Ernst. Gesammelte Schriften. 4 vols. Tübingen: J.C.B. Mohr, 1912–1915. Reprinted Aalen, Germany: Scientia Verlag, 1961–1966.
- . The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches. New York and Evanston, IL: Harper Torchbooks, 1960 (Midway reprint paperback, 2 vol. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976).
- . Protestantism and Progress. Boston: Beacon Paperback/Beacon Press, 1958.
- . The Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religions. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1971.

Secondary Sources:

“Bibliographical Focus: Ernst Troeltsch.” Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion I no. 1/2 (1961–1962).

“Ernst Troeltsch ou la religion dans les limites de la conscience historique.” Revue de l’Histoire des Religions 214 no. 2 (1997):131–266.

Coakley, Sarah. Christ without Absolutes. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Drescher, Hans-Georg. Ernst Troeltsch. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993.

Morgan, Robert, and Michael Pye. Ernst Troeltsch: Writings on Theology and Religion. London: Duckworth, 1977.

Pauck, Wilhelm. Harnack and Troeltsch. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Smart, Ninian. Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Steeman, Theodore M. “Church, Sect, Mysticism, Denomination.” Sociological Analysis 36 no. 3 (1975):181–204.

JEAN-PAUL WILLAIME

TUTU, DESMOND MPILO (1931-)

South African churchman and statesman. Tutu was born in Klerksdorp, Transvaal (now Gautheng), SOUTH AFRICA on October 7, 1931. The son of a teacher, he was greatly influenced as a boy by the missionary priest TREVOR HUDDLESTON. Tutu became a teacher and, while so working, studied for the B.A. degree at the University of South Africa. Thereafter he entered St Peter's College, Rosettenville, to study for the Anglican ministry, being ordained deacon in 1960 and priest in 1961. Further theological study in Britain brought the B.D. and M.Th. of the University of London and parish experience in ENGLAND. He returned to South Africa to teach at the Federal (i.e., ecumenical) Theological Seminary, and then to Lesotho to teach at the University of Botswana, Lesotho, and Swaziland from 1970 to 1972.

From 1972 to 1975 he was associate director of the Theological Education Fund of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and responsible for grants to universities and SEMINARIES in AFRICA to improve their theological education resources. Before his term with the fund was complete, he was back in South Africa as dean of Johannesburg. He now became one of the most prominent voices in the country raised against the suffering created by the policy of apartheid. This prominence was briefly interrupted by his election as bishop of Lesotho in 1976. By 1978, however, he was back as general secretary of the South African Council of Churches. Under his leadership the Council became one of the most effective legal organs of opposition to government policy. Although trenchant and outspoken, Tutu always spoke in Christian terms and from Christian premises, with emphasis on the meaning of the Cross, never advocating violence, so that it was hard to find grounds to silence him. His public activity continued after his election as bishop of Johannesburg in 1985 and as archbishop of Cape Town and metropolitan of the Church of the Province of South Africa the following year. His reputation abroad, his eloquence, and charismatic presence gave potency to his calls for boycotts of South African exports to Europe and North America and for a ban on investments in South Africa. The personal impact he had was indicated in the award of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1984.

As apartheid and white minority rule crumbled, Tutu became a mediating figure; the meeting between F.W. de Klerk and Nelson Mandela that inaugurated the new South Africa in 1994 took place in the archbishop's garden. He called for reconciliation based on full acknowledgment of past horrors, repentance, and forgiveness. Before he retired as archbishop in 1996, he had secured the embodiment of these ideas in a national Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which he chaired, taking evidence from those who had suffered and those who had inflicted suffering, and "opening wounds to cleanse them." It is one of the most striking modern examples of the application of Christian thinking in the public sphere. It has been imitated in other areas of endemic violence, but not usually with such rigor or such coherent Christian thinking.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Tutu, Desmond. Crying in the Wilderness: The Struggle for Justice in South Africa. London: Collins, and Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans 1982.
- . Hope and Suffering: Sermons and Speeches. London: Collins, and Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1983.
- . Rainbow People of God: The Making of a Peaceful Evolution. New York and London: Doubleday, 1994.
- . No Future without Forgiveness. New York and London: Doubleday, 1999.

Secondary Sources:

- Du Boulay, S. Tutu, Voice of the Voiceless. Grand Rapids, MI: Doubleday, 1988.
- Thlagale, B., and I.J.Mosala. Swords into Ploughshares: Essays in Honor of Archbishop Desmond Tutu. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1986.

ANDREW F.WALLS

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (c. 1494–1536)

English reformer. Tyndale can justly be said to be the founder of the REFORMATION in England among the people. In the early sixteenth century the church continued to forbid the reading of even a few words of the BIBLE in English, under the direst penalties (including that of being burned alive). Tyndale set out to give all English-speaking people the whole Bible printed in English, from the original languages of Greek for the New Testament and Hebrew for the Old Testament, instead of the Church's Latin. He did it at the cost of his life.

Initiated by him, the complete English Bible, in various versions owing almost everything to his work, became the most widely read and studied text in the English language. Such new knowledge rapidly revolutionized national religious thinking, removing many of the church's practices and doctrines (such as Purgatory), which were not found in the Bible, and allowing each believer to meet God without any intermediary priest or hierarchy—guided by the entire Gospels and Epistles of St. Paul.

Eighty-three percent of the New Testament in the famous King James Version of 1611 is pure Tyndale, and only a little less in the Old Testament. The global effect of that version is incalculable.

Life

Tyndale was born around 1494 in Gloucestershire, England. As a schoolchild he learned the new, good Humanist Latin. He attended the University of Oxford where, after his B.A. and M.A., he learned Greek, then beginning to be taught more widely. He may have gone on to Cambridge, where Desiderius Erasmus had been teaching Greek.

Back in Gloucestershire, as tutor to the children of Sir John and Lady Walsh, he recognized his life's vocation, to translate and print the Bible in English. An ignorant cleric at the Walsh's table had remarked that "we were better without God's law than the Pope's." To this Tyndale famously replied that if God spared his life he would "cause the boy that driveth the plough to know more of Scripture than thou dost."

In 1516 the original Greek New Testament had been printed for the first time by Erasmus. Tyndale in around 1522 sought permission of the bishop of London, Cuthbert Tunstall (a friend of Erasmus), to translate it into English and print it. Tunstall snubbed him, and Tyndale soon left for Germany, where in 1523 MARTIN LUTHER'S first German New Testament (from the Greek) was already a bestseller. In Cologne Tyndale worked with a good local printer, but he was betrayed and fled up the Rhine to the safe Lutheran city of Worms. There in 1526 he produced one of the great treasures of Western culture, his first English New Testament. Pocket-size, it was smuggled down the Rhine in bales of cloth, and into English and Scottish ports. Within eight years nearly 20,000 copies (with piracies from Antwerp printers) had been bought. Only two of the original survive.

Antwerp

Somewhere in Germany, Tyndale learned Hebrew, which was virtually unknown in England. He moved to Antwerp, a port with thriving trade with England and many printers. In 1530, copies, also pocket-size, of his translation of the Pentateuch (the first time that Hebrew had ever been translated into English) reached English ports and were snapped up. At Creation God was seen and heard to say not Fiat lux et lux erat, but “Let there be light: and there was light.”

His printer in Antwerp, Marten de Keyser, produced four or five other books by Tyndale, notably his Obedience of a Christian Man (1528). This, also smuggled into England, was, like his New Testament and Pentateuch, immediately banned, with copies hunted by the English bishops, and the owners punished (sometimes with death). In Obedience, Tyndale countered the lie being put about (principally by Thomas More) that reformers (such as Luther) preached sedition and bloody rebellion. Tyndale showed from the New Testament that a Christian’s obedience was to the ruler, who had also to be obedient to God. King Henry VIII himself, shown a copy by his wife-to-be, Anne Boleyn, approved.

Tyndale revised his New Testament in 1534, this time with prologues to the books (especially Paul’s Epistle to the Romans) and a few explanatory notes. This was also widely read (Queen Anne’s personal copy has survived). He also at this time translated the second quarter of the Old Testament, again the first time the Hebrew text was translated into English.

Tyndale’s enemies were led apparently by the new bishop of London, the ruthless John Stokesley, and were under the banner of the gross attacks on “heretics” by Thomas More (whose treatment of them makes an ugly blot on his reputation) at first in Latin, and then by permission in English. Attacked in print at length by More, Tyndale was again betrayed. He was arrested, charged with heresy, and imprisoned in a dark, dank cell in Vilvoorde Castle, outside Brussels, for sixteen months, without proper clothing or a light. On October 6, 1536, before a large self-congratulatory assembly of churchmen, he was taken out and burned. Because he was a scholar, he was allowed to be strangled as the fire was lit.

Tyndale died ignorant of his tremendous influence. First, the language he had created (unusual for the time) fed into English-speaking consciousness forever after, so that many of his phrases are still in common speech (e.g., “the spirit is willing” and “the powers that be”). Second, his friend John Rogers completed publication of his work, and within twelve months of his death it was licensed by King Henry VIII: this went on to be the basis of all the great English Bible translations that followed, even until today. Third, what he opened has never been shut up.

See also Bible Translation; Bible and Literature; Bible Societies

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Tyndale, William. The Obedience of a Christian Man. London: Penguin Classics, 2000.

———. Tyndale's New Testament. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1989.

———. Tyndale's Old Testament. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1992.

Secondary Source:

Daniell, David. William Tyndale: A Biography. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1994.

DAVID DANIELL

This page intentionally left blank.

U

ULSTER

Ulster is the most northern of Ireland's four provinces and the only province in which a majority of the population has ever been Protestant. This was attributed to colonization from Britain, chiefly in the seventeenth century, differentiating Ulster from the rest of Ireland and leading to partition in 1921 when six of Ulster's nine counties remained part of the United Kingdom as Northern Ireland, but with a hostile Catholic and Irish nationalist minority. The identification of religious and political loyalties spawned violent sectarian conflict, and whereas the main churches are committed to reconciliation, popular Protestantism remains notoriously anti-Catholic.

The Reformation in Ireland

Protestantism was never an indigenous growth in IRELAND but a transplant from ENGLAND. Ireland was an English colony from the twelfth century, and the Irish Reformation, establishing the Church of Ireland on the model of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, was an act of state without popular support. It was perceived as an aspect of English colonization, resisted by Gaelic Ireland which was claiming religious legitimacy in the name of Catholicism, supported by the pope and CounterReformation Spain. In the last decade of ELIZABETH I's reign, Ulster's Gaelic chieftains led a nine-year rebellion ending in defeat, leaving Ulster devastated and depopulated, ripe for fresh colonization.

Protestantism in Ulster

Colonists from SCOTLAND and England brought Protestantism to Ulster in the seventeenth century. Many of the Scots were Presbyterians and a religious revival, anticipating similar REVIVALS in colonial America a century later, strengthened their PRESBYTERIANISM. Originally Presbyterians were accommodated within the established Church of Ireland but when CHURCH AND STATE combined to bring the Irish church into closer conformity with the Laudian Church of England, Presbyterians were expelled as nonconformists. NONCONFORMITY was illegal but a Scots army came to Ulster in 1642 in response to a Catholic rebellion in 1641, and its chaplains formed a presbytery in Carrickfergus, beginning the institutional history of Ulster Presbyterianism. During the subsequent Cromwellian interregnum, other Dissenters, including Independents, BAPTISTS, and Quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), arrived in Ireland, although their numbers remained small. The restoration of monarchy and of the established Church of Ireland after 1660 brought difficulties for Dissenters as well as Catholics but the Irish colonial government could not afford to alienate Ulster's Scots settlers completely and TOLERATION was gradually extended to Presbyterians who joined with their fellow Protestants in supporting William III against James II and Catholic Ireland in 1689. From 1690 onward a Synod of Ulster met annually as the Presbyterians' governing body but in the eighteenth century they suffered fresh disabilities under penal legislation aimed primarily at Catholics.

The Eighteenth Century

Presbyterians also suffered conflicts in the eighteenth century between conservative Calvinists (Old Lights) and liberals (New Lights), and the successful advance of New Light brought Presbyterian dissenters from Scotland, Seceders and Covenanters who established congregations and presbyteries in Ulster. Large numbers of Presbyterians, suffering economic hardship as tenant farmers, as well as religious disabilities, emigrated to colonial America in the eighteenth century in the footsteps of Francis Makemie, the Ulster Presbyterian minister who is honored as the Father of American Presbyterianism.

Inspired by the American and FRENCH REVOLUTIONS, Ulster Presbyterians were in the vanguard of a movement to unite Protestant, Catholic, and Dissenter in Ireland to establish an independent nonsectarian Irish state. The disastrous failure of their rebellion in 1798 led to the Act of Union in 1801, which replaced the Irish parliament and government by direct rule from Westminster.

The Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Conflict came in the nineteenth century when the restoration of the Irish parliament, Home Rule, became the political objective of Catholic Ireland and Protestants resisted, insisting the Home Rule would be Rome Rule, following the concession of full civil rights to Catholics. Political tensions were exacerbated by religious friction as EVANGELICALISM inspired a Protestant crusade to evangelize Roman Catholics, provoking their resentment as they experienced their own renewal movement in Ultramontaniam, emphasizing papal AUTHORITY and devotion to Mary. In Ulster evangelicalism exploded in the revival of 1859, intensifying Protestant anti-Catholicism, with Baptists and PLYMOUTH BRETHREN growing in numbers and mission halls and evangelical agencies proliferating.

When Home Rule became an imminent prospect in 1912 Ulster Protestants prepared to resist in arms, with the result that Ireland was partitioned in 1921. The Catholic and nationalist minority in Northern Ireland resented partition and their subjection to its Protestant and Unionist parliament, which regarded them as subversive and discriminated against them in various ways. A Catholic civil rights movement in the 1960s increased tension, which erupted in violence by extremists on both sides. Protestants and Catholics have been involved in ventures for reconciliation like the Corrymeela Community and Protestant and Catholic Encounter (P.A.C.E.), whereas the Orange Order, Presbyterian (336,891); Church of Ireland, a member of the Anglican family (279,280); and Methodists (59,517), to the Rev Ian Paisley's fundamentalist Free Presbyterian Church (12,363), with a growing but still small number of charismatic churches and fellowships. (Numbers are from the 1991 census.) One Pentecostal church, the Elim church, originated in Ulster in 1915. Although Protestant churches remain strong and influential in Ulster, SECULARIZATION is advancing rapidly, particularly in the twenty to forty-five age group.

References and Further Reading

- Bowen, Desmond. History and Shaping of Irish Protestantism. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 1995.
- Ford, A., J.McGuire, and K.Milne, eds. As by Law Established. The Church of Ireland since the Reformation. Dublin: Lilliput Press, 1995.
- Hempton, David, and Myrtle Hill. Evangelical Protestantism in Ulster Society, 1740–1890. New York: Routledge, 1992.
- Holmes, Finlay. The Presbyterian Church in Ireland. A Popular History. Dublin: Columba Press, 2000.
- Livingstone, David N., and Ronald A.Wells. Ulster-American Religion. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1999.
- Richardson, Norman, ed. A Tapestry of Belief. Church Traditions in Northern Ireland. Belfast: Blackstaff Press, 1998.
- Westerkamp, Marilyn J. Triumph of the Laity: Scots-Irish Piety and the Great Awakening. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

FINLAY HOLMES

UNDERHILL, EVELYN (1875–1941)

English theologian. Born December 6, 1875 and died June 15, 1941, Underhill was based in London throughout her life. She married Hubert Stuart Moore in 1907, and they had no children. As an adult Underhill studied in the “Ladies” department of King’s College, University of London, which made her their first woman “Fellow” in 1927. Although baptized and confirmed, it was not until 1921 that she publicly identified herself as a member of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, by which time she had established herself as an independent thinker and writer. She was the first woman to lecture in religion under the auspices of the University of Oxford faculty of theology, and was offered an honorary degree of doctor of divinity by the University of Aberdeen in 1938, a very rare honor for a woman, but which she was too ill to travel to receive. She became a semiprofessional conductor of retreats, to CLERGY as well as LAITY, breaking through ecclesiastical tradition against women’s speaking and teaching theology to do so. She published two major books, both of them now considered classics.

Rather unusually for a Protestant she became an expert on the lives and work of the mystics of the church, prompting much further research in the twentieth century. Mysticism (1911; many reprintings) explains her view of the evidence that many persons have experienced such a depth of intimacy with God that they were transformed into persons of exemplary effectiveness. In Worship (1936) she revealed her profound appreciation of what was at stake in different forms of WORSHIP. By World War II she had become a pacifist, and exemplified her own high expectations for the laity’s life of PRAYER, especially prayer of intercession. Significant here are such works as The Golden Sequence (1932), The School of Charity (1934), The Mystery of Sacrifice (1938), and Abba. Meditations on the Lord’s Prayer (1940).

References and Further Reading

- Greene, Dana. Evelyn Underhill Artist of the Infinite Life. London: Mowbrays, 1991 [includes extensive bibliography].
- Loades, Ann. Evelyn Underhill London: Fount, 1997.
- Underhill, Evelyn, and Thomas Samuel Kepler. The Evelyn Underhill Reader. New York: Abingdon Press, 1962.
- Underhill, Evelyn. The House of the Soul; Concerning the Inner Life. Minneapolis, MN: Seabury Press, 1984.
- Underhill, Evelyn. The Fruits of the Spirit. Light of Christ, with a Memoir by Lucy Menzies. Abba: Mediations Based on the Lord’s Prayer. London and New York: Longmans, Green, 1956.
- Underhill, Evelyn. Worship. Westport, CT: Hyperion Press, 1979.

ANN LOADES

UNIFICATION CHURCH

The Unification Church can be grouped under the rubric of New Religious Movements. It is thus not altogether clear if it is properly subsumed under the heading of a Protestant tradition. The Unification Church has gone through several incarnations and telling transformations. In spite of vociferous vilifications from many circles, the religious movement continues to be the harbinger of the good news for millions of people all over the world. The Unification Church has been mired in controversy since it was founded by SUN MYUNG MOON in 1954 in Seoul, KOREA. He was born on January 6, 1920 in North Korea. Christianity was practiced in deep secrecy during the Japanese occupation of Korea. Christians met underground for fear of persecution by Japanese authorities. Moon's parents eventually converted to Christianity. Moon claims that in 1935, while he was fervently praying in the mountains, Jesus appeared to him in a vision. Jesus gave him a divine injunction: to complete the assignment of establishing God's kingdom on earth. Moon later developed the "Unification Principle," according to which God established the universe to manifest true love.

According to the Unification Principle, Adam and Eve were meant to develop into a level of perfection. Then they would have been blessed by God in Holy Matrimony and established what is known as the Four Position Foundation of the Ideal Family. In this setting they would have a loving relationship with God, with each other, and as True Parents, with their children. This wonderful vision did not come into fruition because of the diabolical activities of archangel Lucifer. Rev. Moon was given the divine injunction to restore the world to the pristine model originally designed by God.

Moon traces the human predicament to the story of the fall of Adam and Eve. In Moon's theological analysis Eve lost her position and purity because of an unlawful relationship with Lucifer, symbolized as a serpent, and she subsequently seduced Adam. They never achieved the spiritual maturity whereby they could have attained true love. The story will even turn more devastating: their son Cain killed his brother Abel because he inherited a bogus and self-centered form of love from his parents. According to Moon this was how false love has been passed down from one generation to the other. This problem has infected the entire human race.

The family is seen as the basic institution for the growth of God's love in the world. The spiritual and moral teachings within the family structure must prepare people to live for the sake of all others in all situations. However, according to Moon, people do not live according to God's design; personal aggrandizement prevails in interpersonal relationships and in relationships between ethnic groups and nations. Moon proclaims that God commanded him to teach in North Korea, where communist leaders were against all forms of religious organizations. He has survived many arrests, incarcerations, and unsavory conditions. In the 1970s there was a rapid global growth in membership in the Unification Church. Young people put aside their careers, gave up all their possessions, left their families, and dedicated themselves to activities and mission of the Unification Church. They saw their new religious calling as a blatant rejection of the materialistic worldview, especially in the West.

The Unification Principle of one human family and world peace has been spread through massive international activities reportedly engineered to change the world. Through conferences, seminars, consultations, service projects, and publications the Unification Church has left an indelible mark on the global religious landscape.

An interesting aspect within the Unification Church is the massive wedding ceremonies in which people from all over the world are “matched” by the church or already married couples seeking to dedicate themselves to “live for the sake of others” and ultimately create an ideal world family are blessed by Moon and his wife. Millions of couples have been blessed in public weddings all over the world. Unificationists see these mass weddings as an ideal way to create one human family, with couples from all races and nation-alities being incorporated into God’s plan of true love. Unificationists also believe that couples who are blessed by Moon through the Holy Wine ceremony that precedes the blessing ritual have been purified and cleansed of original SIN and, as a result of this act, their children are free from the burden of original sin.

The entire human history, according to the Divine Principle, has been a passionate attempt by God and certain important people to reinstate the world to the state originally designed by God. To accomplish this task, the sins that have been committed in the past need to be “worked backwards” so that bad actions are cancelled out by good actions. These acts of “indemnity” are carried out as a preparation for the only definitive solution to human sin: the coming of a Messiah who will accomplish the role that Adam should have finished by not succumbing to sin. Jesus came as the Messiah, and he lived a great and sinless life. The Divine Principle claims that the death of Jesus was not planned by God, but through this ultimate sacrifice, Jesus was able to offer redemption and SALVATION to humankind.

The Unification Church is a movement with a robust theology, philosophy, and social theory. A litany of accusations has been leveled against Moon and his followers. Some of these accusations have been documented by John Biermans in The Odyssey of New Religious Movements: A Case Study of the Unification Church. Biermans’s extensive study examines the persecution and struggles of the members of the Unification Church, although young people are still attracted to Moon’s message of love and world peace. One of the central issues that will affect the future of the Unification Church is how the church continues to respond to what Moon describes as “three major headaches of God”: inter-religious conflicts, increasing immorality, and the rise of atheism. The Unification Church has endeavored to address some of these issues through its programs and global outreach.

See also Moon, Sun Myung

References and Further Reading

- Biermans, John T. The Odyssey of New Religious Movements. Lewiston, NY/Queenston, Canada: The Edwin Mellen Press, 1986.
- Fitcher, Joseph H. The Holy Family of Father Moon. Kansas City, MO: Leaven Press, 1985.

Grace, James H. Sex and Marriage in the Unification Movement: A Sociological Study. New York: Edwin Mellen, 1984.

Matczak, Sebastian A. Unificationism: A New Philosophy and Worldview. New York: Learned Publications, 1982.

Sontag, Frederick. Sun Myung Moon and the Unification Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1977.

AKINTUNDE E.AKINADE

UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION

Unitarian Universalist churches claim their origin in theological and doctrinal disputes of early Christianity. Unitarians find an early affinity with Arians and others who resisted the doctrine of the Trinity as it developed in the West after the Council of Nicaea in 325 C.E. Universalists trace their origin to early debates concerning the ultimate destiny of humanity. Universalists affirmed that the love of God is irresistible, that it is not God's will that any should perish and therefore, in the end, all of creation will be restored to harmony with God because an eternity of punishment in hell would constitute an unthinkable frustration and defeat of God's plan.

Although both movements have roots in European religious thought, the Unitarian Universalist movement is largely a North American phenomenon, the result of the 1961 merger of the AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION (founded in 1825) and the Universalist Church of America (founded in 1793). The Unitarian Universalist Association maintains close relations with indigenous Unitarian movements in Romania, Great Britain, and the Kassai Hills of INDIA, with an indigenous Universalist movement in the Philippine Islands and with scattered Unitarian movements in such varied parts of the world as The Czech Republic, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, and SOUTH AFRICA. Recently the Canadian Unitarian Council established itself as independent of, although allied with, the Unitarian Universalist Association, headquartered in Boston, Massachusetts.

Unitarian Universalist churches are creedless and congregational in polity. This has produced a movement theologically diverse, varied in its WORSHIP practices, and significantly distanced from much of Protestantism. Thinking of themselves as religious liberals, Unitarian Universalists are frequently to be found engaged in liberal social and political causes and identify this stance as a religious imperative.

Sociologically Unitarian Universalist churches in the UNITED STATES largely consist of suburban well-educated, middle- and upper-middle-class Euro-American professionals. In recent years the Unitarian Universalist Association has sought ways to break out of this limited demographic and welcome racial, economic, and social diversity.

European Unitarianism

Although Unitarians trace their origins to the Arian CHRISTOLOGY that was rejected by the Council of Nicaea, specific Unitarian churches emerged as a consequence of anti-

Trinitarian thought that was part of the left wing of the Protestant REFORMATION. In the years after the Northern European rebellion against the Roman Church religious thinkers used their new freedom to examine scripture to evaluate and judge the teachings and practices of the CHURCH. This attempt resulted in rejection of infant baptism, the doctrine of the Trinity, and the concept of a state church, thus producing a Protestantism far more radical than that of mainstream reformers.

Unitarians trace themselves to the work of MICHAEL SERVETUS (1511–1533), Spanish theologian, physician, and reformer. While studying law in Toulouse Servetus began a secret study of the New Testament and the writings of the early Church Fathers. He hoped to find a convincing way to explain the doctrine of the Trinity so that Jews and Moors in his homeland might embrace the essential truth of Christianity and escape the persecution of the Inquisition. In the process of his study Servetus became convinced that the doctrine of the Trinity has no real basis in the scriptures or in the writings of the early Church Fathers. Failing to persuade major figures in the Reformation of the accuracy or the importance of his conviction, Servetus produced a book entitled On the Errors of the Trinity. The work was received with such hostility that Servetus went into exile, living quietly under an assumed name in FRANCE. Goaded by the publication of JOHN CALVIN'S INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, Servetus produced a second work, Christianismus Reinstitutio (The Restoration of Christianity). His identity discovered, Servetus fled France, was recognized in Geneva, arrested, tried for HERESY, and, in 1553, burned at the stake in Calvin's Protestant Geneva.

Although Servetus did not convince the major reformers, he deeply influenced a number of the radical reformers. As a consequence of his writings three major Unitarian (or proto-Unitarian) movements came into existence on the continent. The shortest-lived of these emerged in Northern ITALY, in and around Venice. By 1550 there were some sixty secret congregations where anti-Trinitarian and Anabaptist views predominated (see ANABAPTISM). Two years later the movement was betrayed to the Inquisition and its members scattered—some to Eastern Europe, some to Protestant Geneva, some to the Moslem East.

A major haven for Italian refugees was the kingdom of POLAND. A large, liberal nation with a weak central government and church, Poland provided a refuge for religious radicals from all over Europe. LUTHERANISM had penetrated the kingdom early and was soon followed by Calvin's Reformed Church. Within the reformed church there was substantial theological fluidity—a situation that provided significant opportunity for refugees from Northern Italy to pursue their anti-Trinitarian agenda. Among them was Georgeo Biandrata (c. 1515–1588), physician to the Italian queen Bona of Poland. Biandrata, a religious radical, invited other Italian radical reformers to Poland and thus moved the Reformed Church in a more radical direction. Eventually the Reformed Church of Poland split over the doctrine of the Trinity.

The anti-Trinitarians were known as the Minor Reformed Church of Poland, or more simply, The Polish Brethren. They are better known to history as the Socinian Church, taking its name from its most influential theologian, FAUSTO SOZZINI (Socinus) (1539–1604), an Italian refugee who had fled to Poland from Italy to escape the Inquisition. Socinus developed a theological system that viewed Christ as an exemplar and denied the traditional doctrines of the Trinity and of ATONEMENT, insisting that SALVATION comes as a consequence of following the example of Jesus. Therefore correctness of doctrine is less important than correct living. Socinus taught that, although the scriptures contained a revelation from God, those scriptures must be read and interpreted by human reason. Like many groups in the radical reformation, the Minor Church of Poland advocated separation of CHURCH AND STATE, questioned the validity of infant baptism, and placed great emphasis on pious living. Under Socinus's leadership the Minor Church embraced tolerance as a religious value, insisting that people ought not be persecuted because of disputed doctrines.

At its height the Minor Church of Poland counted more than 300 congregations. It had established a press that produced more than 500 titles by 1600, and a school at Rakow, its principal city, that drew students from all over the continent. Shortly before his death Socinus held several synods in which the teachings of the church were consolidated and reaffirmed. In 1605 the church issued the Racovian Catechism, a concise statement of its faith, and began publishing the works of Socinus.

However, a Catholic resurgence in Poland, and the failure of the various Protestant bodies to unite in their own defense resulted in the destruction of the Minor Church and, eventually, of the Protestant movement in Poland. In 1660 the Minor Church of Poland was banned and its adherents forced to convert or go into exile. Many fled to Transylvania, Prussia, or Holland. For several generations some observed their faith in secret, ministered to by clergy who made secret returns to the country. The history of the Minor Church of Poland, however, had come to an end.

Concurrently with the events in Poland a similar movement was emerging independently in Transylvania. About two-thirds the size of the state of Maine, in the sixteenth century Transylvania consisted of the eastern quarter of the kingdom of HUNGARY. After the Turks defeated the Hungarians at the battle of Mohacs (1526), killing much of the Hungarian nobility, a struggle for the Hungarian throne resulted in an independent Transylvania. For a century the Transylvanians maintained independence by exploiting the conflict between neighboring world powers—the Moslem East and the Christian West.

John Zapolya, the first independent ruler of Transylvania, married Isabella, daughter of the queen and king of Poland. Shortly after the birth of their son, John Sigismund (1540–1571), Zapolya died, leaving the throne to his infant son, with Isabella as queen regent. During a period of turmoil after the death of her husband Isabella fled with her son to Poland. When she returned to Transylvania in 1555 she found a nation now predominantly Protestant. In an effort to avoid religious conflict, Queen Isabella issued a decree of religious TOLERATION in 1557, in which she affirmed the right of individuals to follow the faith of their choosing, provided that they bring no harm or injury to others because of differing religious opinion.

Lutheranism had been imported into Transylvania by Saxon elements in the Transylvanian society as early as 1520. The Calvinist Reformed church also established itself in Transylvania and became a focus of theological debate and dispute, particularly around the doctrine of the Trinity.

Two men played a major role in the emergence of Unitarianism in Transylvania. Georgio Biandrata, physician to Queen Bona of Poland, was sent to Transylvania to serve as physician to Bona's daughter Isabella and the young prince John Sigismund. In Transylvania Biandrata quickly became a trusted advisor to the royal family, and once more resumed his work in advocating a radical religious agenda. He found an accomplice in the person of FERENC DAVID (1510–1579). David, a native of Transylvania, was educated at Wittenberg. He returned to Transylvania and accepted a position as rector of a Catholic school and later as a parish priest. In 1553 he embraced Lutheranism, and by 1557 had been chosen bishop of the Hungarian section of the Lutheran Church. After a series of debates between the Lutherans and the Reformed, David resigned his position and cast his lot with the Reformed Church. Soon after, David was chosen superintendent, or bishop, of the Reformed Churches and was named court preacher by King John Sigismund, who had assumed the throne upon the death of his mother.

In 1563 John Sigismund reissued and extended the original edict of religious toleration. In this tolerant climate Biandrata and David began to examine the doctrine of the Trinity. David, influenced by Servetus's writings, had questioned the traditional teachings while still a Lutheran. He now began to raise questions publicly, both as court preacher and from his pulpit in the Great Church in Kolozsvár (Cluj Napoca) and through printed works produced by a press given to David and Biandrata by the king. As the nature of his questions became public the Reformed church was threatened with dissension and schism. King John Sigismund called for a series of public debates. In March 1558, after ten days of debate, David triumphed over his theological opponents. The king, the court, and the majority of the country embraced David's Unitarian theology. In 1571 the king and the Diet provided legal recognition to Unitarianism, proclaiming Unitarianism, CALVINISM, Lutheranism, and Catholicism the four received faiths of the kingdom.

Two months later John Sigismund died, leaving no heirs to his throne. The subsequent rulers of Transylvania were not favorably inclined to the Unitarian faith. As a condition of their elevation to the throne they were required to swear to abide by the edict of toleration. However, toleration was defined as the religious situation as it existed in 1571. Any deviation from that standard was to be dealt with harshly.

David was dismissed as court preacher, but he was elected superintendent, or bishop, of the Unitarian Churches. A restless spirit, David was not yet finished with reforming the church. He began to preach publicly that prayers to Christ and adoration of Christ were inappropriate because only God is entitled to that devotion. He abandoned infant BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER. He was charged with innovation, tried, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment. He died in the dungeon at Deva in 1579.

Georgio Bindrata continued as a royal counselor for John Sigismund's successor. He engineered a conservative statement of faith for the Unitarian Church and the selection of an administrator as bishop. Although he may have secured the survival of the church, he earned the contempt of his fellow Unitarians, who saw him as a traitor to the memory and faith of Ferenc David.

Unitarianism continued to exist in Transylvania, despite hostility, pressure, and outright persecution by Catholic, Protestant, Nazi, and Communist rulers. Most of Transylvania is now within the borders of modern ROMANIA, and the oldest Unitarian Churches in the world are to be found there. These churches still identify strongly with their historic Hungarian culture. After the fall of COMMUNISM a new and vital relationship was created between these churches and the Unitarian Universalist Churches in the West. A Partner Church Council arranges relationships between North American congregations and Transylvanian congregations, and facilitates the flow of financial aid and mutual interaction. In recent years the Transylvania Church has revised its constitution, making its structure more democratic. New leadership, including a significant number of women ministers, has reinvigorated the movement (see WOMEN CLERGY).

Western Europe was influenced by Socinian works from the press at Rakow and to a lesser degree by books from Transylvanian Unitarians. Much of this influence came to focus in Holland after the expulsion of the Socinians from Poland. Earlier the Polish Brethren had provided refuge for Dutch radicals fleeing persecution. The Dutch returned the favor when the Polish Church was exiled. Although no Socinian movement, as such, was established in Holland, it was there that the definitive collection of Socinian works was published—the Biblioteca Fratrum Polonorum (The Library of the Polish Brethren)—in 1668. Socinian thought was part of the ferment of ideas that ultimately made Holland one of the most religiously tolerant countries in Europe. It was from Holland that Socinian thought entered ENGLAND.

The Reformation in England was originally a political rather than doctrinal issue, as HENRY VIII sought to secure the Tudor dynasty by producing a legitimate male heir to the throne. Henry thought of himself as “defender of the faith,” a title bestowed on him by the pope, rather than as reformer. However, the politics of the situation drove England into alliances with Protestant states, making the island nation a haven for Protestant scholars and refugees and opening it to divergent theological positions, including ANTI-TRINITARIANISM.

One source of theological diversity was The Strangers’ Church, established by Henry VIII in 1550 to serve the religious needs of the more than 3,000 Protestant refugees in London. Despite its theological heterodoxy, the church survived until the reign of Queen Mary. In her effort to return the nation to the Catholic faith, Mary disbanded the Strangers’ Church, although ELIZABETH I reestablished the church in 1560. This institution became a vector through which Socinian influence flowed quietly into England.

This Socinian influence may have “prepared the ground,” although the “father of British Unitarianism” had no direct contact with continental SOCINIANISM. John Biddle (1615–1662), the son of a tailor, was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. His study of Scripture convinced him that the doctrine of the Trinity was unsupported by Scripture or reason. These views brought him into conflict with the authorities. Biddle spent much of his adult life in prison for his heretical convictions. He spent the time in jail writing tracts and treatises outlining his faith and arguing its scriptural and rational basis. In those intervals when he was not in prison Biddle gathered a congregation of like-minded followers for worship and the study of scriptures. After Biddle died, after another lengthy imprisonment, his followers scattered.

Theophilus Lindsey (1723–1808) founded the first permanent Unitarian Church in England, the Essex Street Chapel in London in 1774. Unable to accept the creeds of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, Lindsey had resigned his position as an Anglican priest. Although many sympathized with Lindsey and shared his discomfort with the creeds, few followed his example and the leadership of the nascent Unitarian movement fell to liberal Dissenters. Here and there, across England, congregations of Separatists, BAPTISTS, Independents, and Non-Subscribing Presbyterians moved toward Arian, Arminian, Socinian, and Unitarian theological positions, but there was little sense of a common identity among them.

The man who welded these disparate and independent groups together was JOSEPH PRIESTLEY (1733–1804). Priestley, best known as the discoverer of oxygen, considered himself a clergyman whose hobby was natural science. Priestley served several Unitarian congregations, wrote tracts and books outlining a radical Unitarianism, and published magazines and educational materials, all of which functioned to create a sense of common identity among the dispersed and disparate Unitarian congregations in the country.

After Priestley fled England to escape persecution for his radical religious and political views, the mantle of leadership fell to Thomas Belsham (1750–1829), who continued the work Priestley had begun and gave Unitarianism an institutional form. Under his leadership the Unitarian Book Society was founded and a new version of the New Testament based on recent criticism of the Greek text was published.

In 1825 the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was organized. Bringing together several groups created to secure Unitarian interests, the new organization marked the institutional establishment of the Unitarian Church in England. Throughout its history the Unitarian movement in Great Britain has combined a liberal theological stance with a consistent concern for liberal social causes. Unitarians were instrumental in establishing schools and academies, were active in efforts to abolish SLAVERY, were concerned with women's rights and with the conditions of the poor and the destitute—seeing all of these as religious imperatives. Many of these concerns are reflected in the writing of Charles Dickens, perhaps the best known of the British Unitarians.

As the name of the organization created in 1825 implies, Unitarians in Great Britain maintained relationships with Unitarians in New Zealand, CANADA, and especially in India. The British Unitarian movement continues to be a small but vital part of the religious life of Great Britain.

Unitarianism in North America

In Poland, Transylvania, and England, Unitarianism emerged independently, shaped by the needs and circumstances of specific times and places. The same can be said of Unitarianism in the United States. With the exception of one congregation in upstate New York, which was founded under Socinian influence; and the two congregations founded by Joseph Priestley in Pennsylvania; and Kings Chapel, an Anglican congregation in Boston that became Unitarian in 1785, Unitarianism in the United States is the outgrowth of developments within the Congregational churches of New England. (It should be noted that Canadian Unitarianism, although closely tied to Unitarianism south of its borders, has always maintained a closer identification with British Unitarianism.)

In 1648 the churches of New England, seeking a formal structure of governance, created the CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM—a plan that protected the independence of each local congregation, while offering a vision of interdependence in which autonomous congregations might support and strengthen each other. The Platform was programmatic rather than creedal in purpose. Most of the congregations in New England were defined by local covenants rather than by adherence to specific creedal or doctrinal statements.

With no episcopal structure to define, monitor, or enforce ORTHODOXY, congregations—under the leadership of strong and long-serving ministers—often drifted into local variations of the PURITANISM that had brought them to New England. These differences provoked occasional concern over growing laxity from religious leaders, but there was little to be done to halt the perceived drift toward Arianism, ARMINIANISM, and various other forms of heterodoxy.

Theological differences between various churches became a matter of public concern after the Great Awakening of the 1730s and 1740s (see AWAKENINGS). The emergence of a highly emotional, evangelical religious movement served to make visible the chasm between the conservative and liberal wings of the Congregational churches of New England. Liberal churches and their ministers found the practices of the Awakening to be little more than emotionalism and fanaticism run rampant. They refused to participate in the groundswell of religious enthusiasm and often closed their doors to itinerant preachers who carried the revival from place to place (see REVIVALS). The itinerants responded by denouncing the settled clergy as “dumb dogs, half devils and half beasts, spiritually blind and leading people to hell.”

The Great Awakening created two self-conscious parties within the Standing Order of Congregational Churches in Massachusetts and throughout New England. The conservative party saw itself as defending the faith from forces that would erode it from within and attack it from without. The liberal party argued for latitude in matters of belief—especially doctrines not well supported in scripture like the doctrine of the Trinity—and for a more optimistic view of human potential than the doctrine of original sin would allow.

These two wings of the Congregational Church remained in uneasy relationship through the remainder of the eighteenth century. The final separation came in 1805, in a struggle over whether a liberal or a conservative would be appointed to the chair of divinity at Harvard College and be given responsibility for the education of future ministers. The liberal candidate, Henry Ware, was elected. The conservatives withdrew from Harvard, founded a seminary in Andover, and the Unitarian Schism was under way. In time most of the oldest, wealthiest congregations in eastern Massachusetts became Unitarian.

Early Unitarians were reluctant to adopt a sectarian mantle, preferring to think of themselves as Liberal Christians. In 1819, however, WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING (1780–1842), minister of the Federal Street Church in Boston, and the acknowledged leader of the liberal churches preached an ordination sermon entitled “Unitarian Christianity.” This “Baltimore sermon,” quickly reprinted and widely distributed, became the program for the Unitarian Movement in the United States. Unitarian Churches were founded in Baltimore, New York, Washington, D.C., Charleston, South Carolina, and in the new cities of the Midwest. In 1825 the American Unitarian Association was founded for the purpose of publishing Unitarian works and spreading Unitarianism by way of the printed word. From this institution has evolved subsequent denominational structures.

Channing’s Unitarianism was based on a strong faith in reason and the ability of reason to interpret scripture and apply it to a continuous process of self-perfection. This biblically based Unitarianism was challenged by the next generation of Unitarians. In 1838 RALPH WALDO EMERSON (1803–1882) addressed the Harvard Divinity School, challenging his listeners to free themselves from slavery to the BIBLE and to explore the sources of revelation in their own lives. Their task, Emerson insisted, was to show that God lives, not lived; speaks, not spake. Reliance on scripture and its miracles blinded people to the living miracles of their own lives. Emerson's Divinity School Address would echo throughout subsequent Unitarian history. In 1841 THEODORE PARKER, one of those who had listened to Emerson at Harvard, delivered an ordination sermon entitled "The Permanent and the Transient in Christianity," in which he suggested that Christianity is but one of the transient forms assumed by Eternal Truth and that true religion consists in serving that eternal truth rather than the forms it takes from time to time.

Over time Emerson's and Parker's influence moved Unitarianism beyond liberal Christianity and toward a radical religious reconstruction. Over the course of the next century Unitarianism would reconceive itself as a religious alternative, centered on ETHICS and moral living rather than on scripture or DOCTRINE. It would open its doors to non-Christians and eventually to nontheists, insisting that unity of spirit and a desire to live an ethical and moral life were more important than unity of doctrine.

This shift would produce a religious body tolerant and diverse in matters of religious faith, and committed to a liberal social vision. Unitarians became strong advocates for public education, child labor laws, prison reform, civil rights, and women's rights.

Universalism in America

Although faith in universal SALVATION was an early element in Christian thought, and was frequently present among radical reformers of the sixteenth century, except for a few sporadic efforts in England, UNIVERSALISM would first take institutional form in the United States in the late eighteenth century. A number of Protestant groups had brought universalist convictions with them to the new world, especially the German Pietists who emigrated to Pennsylvania in the mid-eighteenth century. Dr. George DeBenneville (1703–1790) preached universalism among the German settlers and the indigenous peoples from his arrival in 1741 until his death. Although he influenced many, he left no institutional legacy.

The man who is known as the father of Universalism was John Murray (1741–1815), who became convinced of the truth of Universal Salvation while still a Methodist lay preacher in England. In 1770 Murray came to North America and took up a career as itinerant preacher of the "greater gospel" of Universal Salvation. A sympathetic group in Gloucester, Massachusetts established a church in 1779 and invited Murray to become the settled minister. This was the first permanent Universalist church in the United States, perhaps the world.

Murray served congregations in Gloucester and in Boston, strongly supported by his wife, Judith Sargent Murray, a member of the original congregation, a writer, and strong advocate for Universalism and for women's rights. Under his leadership the movement grew rapidly. In 1793 in Oxford, Massachusetts the New England Universalist Convention was organized—a body that, with several name changes, would continue to exist until it consolidated with the American Unitarian Association to form the Unitarian Universalist Association in 1961.

Murray's theology was conservative in most aspects, including acceptance of the doctrines of original sin and of the Trinity. More radical ministers who had found Universalism in the frontier country of Vermont and New Hampshire and who were strongly influenced by the rationalism of Ethan Allen challenged his leadership of the movement. The leader who emerged from this group was Hosea Ballou (1771–1852), who published A Treatise on Atonement 1805. This work set forth a consistent Universalist theology that affirmed the key role of reason in interpretation of scripture, that subjected the doctrines of eternal punishment, predestination, and atonement to scornful analysis and presented a unitarian understanding of the relation of Jesus to God. Within a decade Ballou's theology had replaced Murray's more conservative views.

Universalism was, from the start, an evangelical faith. Lacking formal education, its itinerant preachers were filled with zeal. They carried the Universalist Gospel to the frontier, establishing hundreds of churches and preaching posts in New York state, and west into the Northwest Territories (see FRONTIER RELIGION). So rapid was its expansion that Universalism was labeled "the reigning heresy of the day."

Universalists eagerly engaged in theological and ethical debate throughout the nineteenth century. In some ways they were so successful that it proved the movement's undoing. By the early twentieth century much of mainline Protestantism had dropped its insistence on the existence of a literal hell and had embraced much of the Universalist gospel (see HEAVEN AND HELL). As a consequence Universalism lost the monopoly on its central message. As demographic shifts brought decline to small-town and rural America—the center of Universalist strength—Universalism began a serious decline.

In response the Universalists began a theological reconstruction, reconceiving their movement as more than a corrective of Christian error, but as a religion for one world—with a message that was larger than Christianity and addressed to a larger audience. They adopted a new symbol for the movement—a off-center cross in a circle, symbolizing that although recognizing their Christian roots, they no longer thought Christianity central to what was being called "the larger Universalism."

Universalism, from its beginnings in the 1790s, combined its wider gospel with a strong social vision. As early as 1790 Universalists in Philadelphia had opposed slavery. Massachusetts Universalists were among the early advocates for separation of church and state. Believing that God never gave up on any of his children, Universalists became early and persistent advocates for prison reform and for the end of CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. They established academies and colleges across the continent, and published a number of papers, magazines, and journals. Universalists were the first to ordain WOMEN with full denominational authority, when Lydia Jenkins was ordained in 1860 and Olympia Brown in 1863. Whitney Cross has said that the impact of Universalists "on reform movements and upon the growth of modern religious attitudes might prove to be greater than that of either the Unitarians or the freethinkers. And their...warfare upon the forces fettering the American mind might be demonstrated to have equaled the influence of the transcendentalist philosophers" (Cross 1957:27).

In 1961, after decades of negotiation, the Universalist Church of America and the American Unitarian Association consolidated into the Unitarian Universalist Association. In subsequent years the movement has continued the heritage of the two preceding bodies—a commitment to freedom, reason, and tolerance within an open and diverse community, and a strong social justice witness. Unitarian Universalists were strongly represented in the CIVIL RIGHTS and antiwar movements of the mid-twentieth century, in the struggle for women's rights, in the struggle for gay, lesbian, and transgendered people (see HOMOSEXUALITY), and in issues of ecological and economic justice.

References and Further Reading

- Bumbaugh, David E. Unitarian Universalism, A Narrative History. Chicago: Meadville Lombard Press, 2000.
- Cassara, Ernest. Universalism in America, A Documentary History. Boston: Beacon Press, 1971.
- Cross, Whitney. The Burned Over District. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1957.
- Howe, Charles A. The Larger Faith. Boston: Skinner House, 1993.
- Hughes, Peter, ed. "Dictionary of Unitarian Universalist Biography." Unitarian Universalist Historical Society, <http://www.uua.org/uuhs/duub/>
- Miller, Russell. The Larger Hope. 2 vols. Boston: Unitarian Universalist Association, 1979, 1985.
- Parke, David. The Epic of Unitarianism. Boston: Beacon Press, 1957.
- Robinson, David. The Unitarians and the Universalists. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1985.
- Wilbur, Earl Morse. A History of Unitarianism, Socinianism and its Antecedents. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1945.
- . History of Unitarianism in Transylvania, England, and America. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1952.
- Wright, C. Conrad, ed. Three Prophets of Religious Liberalism: Channing, Emerson and Parker. Boston: Beacon Press, 1964.

DAVID E. BUMBAUGH

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

The founding of the United Church of Canada stands as one of the most important and controversial episodes in Canadian religious history. The inaugural ceremony in Toronto on June 10, 1925 brought together the Methodist Church (of Canada, Newfoundland, and Bermuda), the Congregational Union of Canada, and all but one-third of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. A number of local congregations already operating as union churches, most of them in western Canada, were also formally received into the new organization. The United Church of Canada began with approximately 8,000 congregations, 600,000 members, and 3,800 ministers. Since then it has remained the largest Protestant denomination in CANADA.

By bringing together METHODISM and two varieties of the Reformed tradition (Presbyterians and Congregationalists; see PRESBYTERIANISM, CONGREGATIONALISM), the United Church of Canada was the first modern experiment in union across confessional lines in western Christianity. Despite much enthusiasm for Christian unity in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, this “organic” type of union was rarely consummated in other places. However, it was a model well suited to the Canadian context. Divisions were easier to overcome than in many other countries because the uniting parties had already succeeded in consolidating along denominational lines by the time serious union discussions were underway. The prospect of creating a church that would relate in a special way to the young nation of Canada, which had been confederated in 1867, was an alluring one at a time when national identity was fragile. Church leaders also saw union as the most effective way to take care of the religious needs of new immigrants who were arriving in large numbers. Western Canada was a particular challenge; attempts to reach new settlements in the prairies stretched competing denominational resources.

Even under these propitious circumstances, church union was accomplished only after a long and bitter round of negotiations drawn out over a period of nearly three decades. After hearing exhortations from denominational leaders urging greater cooperation for over a decade, representatives of the three traditions began work on a “Basis of Union” in 1904. Four years later it was ready for consideration by the courts of the three churches and their members.

Support for union among Methodists and Congregationalists was solid, and approval was quickly secured, with only Methodists in Newfoundland voting to reject it. The story was different in the Presbyterian Church, which saw the organization of an effective resistance movement to oppose union at the local level after the General Assembly approved it. Under the provisions of legislation passed in federal parliament in 1924, a congregational vote was held in each Presbyterian congregation to determine whether it would join the new church. A commission was appointed to distribute the general denominational assets. Dissenting congregations who rejected the recommendation of the General Assembly to enter union thus continued to hold property as the “Presbyterian Church in Canada.” The issue of whether the dissenters could legally carry that name was contested until it was resolved by the Supreme Court of Canada in their favor in 1939.

Religious life in Canada was thus left less united than the founders had hoped. Their anticipation of the 1925 union, as the first of more to follow, has also gone largely unrealized, although the Evangelical United Brethren became part of the United Church of Canada in 1968. Over the years other denominations, notably the Anglicans (see ANGLICANISM), BAPTISTS, and Christian Church (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST) have considered amalgamation, but no such discussions are currently underway. Particularly disappointing was the termination in 1975 of discussions with the Anglicans to create the Church of Christ in Canada. However, the United Church of Canada remains a leader in ecumenical activity (see ECUMENISM), with mutual recognition of ministries emerging as the main expression of its commitment to Christian unity. It provides leadership in ecumenical affairs nationally as well as at the international level. It was instrumental in organizing the Canadian Council of Churches in 1944 and was a charter member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES in 1948. It retains its relationship with the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES and the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Characteristics

During the controversy over church union, those who objected to forming the United Church of Canada claimed that it was liberal to the point of being apostate and more interested in politics than spirituality. Such charges obscured the importance of its evangelical heritage and the commitment to transformation of both individuals and institutions, which was central to the evangelical piety of the founding traditions.

The articles of faith adopted in 1925 as part of the Basis of Union reflected the liberal evangelical perspective of its early twentieth-century formulation. Those who prepared it regarded it as a statement of the “common faith” of the uniting denominations and an articulation of the theological convictions of their own generation. Because formulation of a CONFESSION of faith in meaningful language for the times was viewed as the ongoing task of each generation, a committee soon began work on the Statement of Faith, approved in 1940. What is referred to as the New Creed has been in use since 1968, with a few modifications over the years. In response to calls for a new confession of faith, the General Council requested in 2000 that the Committee on Theology and Faith begin work on a document that would honor the church’s theological diversity and acknowledge its place in a pluralistic world.

The church also proudly celebrates the influence of the SOCIAL GOSPEL, which was evidenced in its impulse to serve as the “conscience of the nation.” It has claimed that aspect of its heritage when taking positions on political and social issues viewed at the time as risky or controversial. Its theological schools and congregations have been receptive to biblical criticism, an openness reflected in PREACHING and educational projects, notably the New Curriculum introduced in the 1960s. Some decisions, such as its positions on remarriage of divorced persons in the early 1960s (see DIVORCE) and ordination of gay and lesbian persons in 1988 (see HOMOSEXUALITY), generated controversy at the time but later have been adopted with less fanfare by other denominations. It continues to study, issue statements, and make efforts to influence governments and other agencies responsible for shaping policy on issues such as ABORTION, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT, racial equality, land use, refugees, and poverty.

Being the “conscience of the nation” has not always been a comfortable role. The apology to native peoples issued by the denomination in 1986 was accompanied by an experiment to provide their congregations with greater autonomy and responsibility through creation of the All Native Circle Conference in 1988. The church continues to wrestle with the financial and moral implications of the residential schools set up and supported by those who saw assimilation of native children to mainstream CULTURE as their best hope of inclusion in modern industrial society. This proved to be an experiment with tragic consequences for many native families. The church’s involvement in helping the federal government to operate the schools was an entanglement for which the General Council apologized in 1998.

Leadership

The church’s leaders have set the tone for its work from the outset. One of the memorable moments of the first General Council in 1925 came when former Methodist general superintendent S.D.Chown (1872–1991), the architect of church union and considered the leading candidate for the moderator’s position, stepped aside in favor of George Pidgeon (1892–1971), the principal spokesperson for the uniting Pres-byterians. The position of moderator has since recognized the gifts of distinguished men and women in the church, while providing the church with a way to highlight its mission and ideals in the selection.

Other executive positions have provided the incumbent with opportunities to put the social and spiritual agenda of the church before the public. James Endicott, a missionary to China, caught the attention of the public and gained notoriety as a “public enemy” for his outspoken support for the Communist Revolution. In the early years, the secretaries of the Board of Evangelism and Social Service were particularly effective in using press and pulpit. In the 1950s James R. Mutchmor opposed the three B’s: “betting, beer, and bingo,” while in the 1960s Ray Hord’s condemnation of the Vietnam War and support for draft dodgers created headlines. Medical missionary Robert McClure was an effective public spokesperson for overseas work, and in 1968 became the first lay member to serve as moderator.

The United Church of Canada was the first DENOMINATION in Canada to ordain women (Lydia Gruchy in 1936) and has since elected WOMEN to other prominent positions (see WOMEN CLERGY). In 1980, Lois Wilson became the first woman to serve as moderator, and in 1994, Virginia Coleman was elected as secretary of General Council, the denomination’s chief administrative office.

Structure, Key Organizations, and Publications

The United Church of Canada is organized at four levels: local congregations or pastoral charges; ninety-one district Presbyteries, which exercise oversight of twenty to fifty pastoral charges; thirteen regional conferences that meet annually; and the national General Council, which meets on a biennial or triennial basis to make decisions in areas of program and administration concerning the whole church. The work of the divisions of General Council is supported through contributions from local congregations through the Mission and Service Fund. The four-court structure of the church was reviewed in 2000. The General Council approved a restructuring plan that will be voted on by all presbyteries and pastoral charges and the results considered by the next General Council. The proposed changes would combine the responsibilities and powers of current presbyteries and conferences into a single entity.

The United Church of Canada relates to a variety of educational institutions including thirteen theological schools and programs, five educational centers, and six liberal arts colleges and universities. The educational work of the denomination is also carried on in congregations through organizations for children, youth, and gender-specific associations for adults. Centralized coordination at the national level was evident in the 1940s and 1950s in organizations such as Canadian Girls in Training, which began in 1915 and continued after union, Trail Rangers for boys twelve to fourteen, Tuxis Boys for fifteen and up, an Older Boys Parliament, and the Young People's Society. "As One That Serves" was an idea for a Methodist men's club in Vancouver just before church union, which then spread across Canada. At the time of church union, the VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES organized by women in the nineteenth century emerged as the Woman's Missionary Society and the Woman's Association, which in turn amalgamated in 1962 as the United Church Women (UCW).

Since the 1970s the church's special-purpose groups have experienced loss of membership and dwindling support for volunteer activities. This has spurred a number of efforts to loosen national coordinating structures to see what new forms emerge. The most striking move was a decision in 2000 to adopt the name "Women of the United Church of Canada" to refer collectively to the church's programming for women. Whereas the focus of United Church Women was fundraising, hospitality, and study, the new organization will incorporate UCW units as well as spirituality and support groups that have emerged as alternatives.

The publication of The Hymnary (1930) and The Book of Common Order (1932) gave definition to the worship traditions of uniting congregations. A new Service Book was published in 1969. The Hymn Book, published jointly with the Anglican Church of Canada in 1971, was followed a generation later by Voices United in 1996, a work that has received a more enthusiastic reception than its predecessor (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The United Church Observer is the official publication of the denomination.

Places It Was and Is Practiced

The United Church of Canada operates primarily in Canada, although a few Methodist congregations in Bermuda comprise a presbytery related to the Maritime Conference. The denomination has also been involved in overseas missions since its founding (see MISSIONS). The churches joined to form the denomination had established missions in such places as Angola, CHINA, INDIA, JAPAN, KOREA, and Trinidad. This work continued and at first expanded after union. The largest mission in the whole of China before the Communist Revolution was its West China Mission. Reflecting a changed concept of world outreach from foreign missions to an emphasis on working with ecumenical partners around the world, the United Church of Canada now works under the direction of indigenous ecumenical partners in overseas countries at the request of churches and agencies, providing funding and personnel for projects.

Expansion or Decline

Since its founding, the United Church of Canada has followed a trajectory similar to mainstream churches in the United States during the same period: it enjoyed something of the status of a voluntary (though never legal) establishment for the first few decades; suffered a decline in membership and financial resources during the depression years; experienced a postwar revival of religious interest that included new congregational development in the suburbs; and has recently seen lower rates of membership and participation with the first reported loss of membership in 1966. Although in 1999 it reported the number of confirmed members as 668,549, the most recent census data (1991) indicate that 3,093,120 Canadians consider themselves to be affiliated with the denomination.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional

References and Further Reading

- Airhart, Phyllis D., and Roger C. Hutchinson, eds. Christianizing the Social Order: A Founding Vision of the United Church [special issue]. Toronto Journal of Theology 12, no. 2 (1996).
- Anderson, Daphne J., and Terence R. Anderson. "United Church of Canada: Kingdom Symbol or Lifestyle Choice." In Faith Traditions and the Family. Edited by Phyllis D. Airhart and Margaret Lamberts Bendroth. Louisville, KY: WJKP, 1996.
- Chalmers, Randolph Carleton. See the Christ Stand: A Study in Doctrine in the United Church of Canada. Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1945.

- Chambers, Steven. This Is Your Church: A Guide to the Beliefs, Practices and Positions of the United Church of Canada. 3rd ed. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1993.
- Clifford, N.K. The Resistance to Church Union in Canada. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1985.
- Grant, John Webster. The Canadian Experience of Church Union. London: Lutterworth Press, 1967.
- Manson, Ian. "'Fighting the Good Fight': Salvation, Social Reform, and Service in the United Church of Canada's Board of Evangelism and Social Service." Th.D. dissertation, Emmanuel College of Victoria University, University of Toronto, 1999.
- Silcox, C.E. Church Union in Canada: Its Causes and Consequences. New York: Institute of Social and Religious Research, 1933.
- The United Church of Canada. <http://www.uccan.org> (November 5, 2001).
- White, Peter Gordon, ed. Voices and Visions: Sixty-Five Years of the United Church of Canada. Toronto: United Church Publishing House, 1990.

PHYLLIS D.AIRHART

UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST

Established in 1957 as the organic union of the Congregational Christian Churches and the EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH, each itself the product of an earlier merger, the United Church of Christ (UCC) is widely recognized as the most theologically and socially progressive among those American denominations historically called “mainline.” The heritage of the UCC is essentially orthodox: its trinitarian presuppositions, its claiming “as its own” the ancient creeds and the reformulations of the Protestant Reformation, its reliance on Scripture, and its recognition of two SACRAMENTS—all affirmed in the denomination’s Constitution and Bylaws—place the UCC firmly in the tradition of historic Protestantism.

There are several denominations worldwide that are called “United Church of Christ,” for example, in those in JAPAN and the PHILIPPINES. These groups are not, however, organically related. The United Church of Christ (USA) is not an international body, although it has numerous ecumenical partnerships worldwide.

Multiple Traditions

Congregationalism

The largest and oldest of the UCC’s four constituting traditions is CONGREGATIONALISM, which arose in the late 1500s as a movement of protest against perceived abuses and limitations, both theological and structural, within the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. The Pilgrims, who advocated total separation from the Anglican Church, and the Puritans, who hoped to change and purify it, migrated to New England in the first part of the seventeenth century and there established autonomous, local bodies of believers (see PILGRIM FATHERS; PURITANISM). Gathered by consent and covenant among the presumed regenerate, these congregations—rather than any national or regional body—were understood to define the true church.

Both Pilgrim and Puritan Congregationalists looked to the teachings of Genevan reformer JOHN CALVIN, adapting his ideas to the American environment. In particular, Massachusetts Bay Puritans developed and elaborated a “COVENANT” THEOLOGY, in which (1) the covenant of GRACE was understood as the means by which God works in the human heart and enables saving FAITH; (2) a careful balance between local church autonomy and regional church interdependence was maintained; (3) God was assumed to be in COVENANT not only with individuals, but with the group as a whole; (4) religious homogeneity in church and community was considered essential. Under the leadership of layman John Winthrop, the MATHER FAMILY, John Cotton, and others, the Puritans anticipated forming a unique godly common-wealth—a “city on a hill”—that would be imitated elsewhere.

Revivals, migration, pressure from other religious bodies, political changes in ENGLAND and America, and, in the early 1800s, a schism that resulted in formation of the AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: all these gradually altered the nature of historic Congregationalism. Although New England continued to be the primary locus of Congregational churches, post-Revolutionary settlers gathered new congregations in the upper midwest and, eventually, in California and the far west. Between 1865 and 1913 three national gatherings produced a basic denominational structure—albeit one that recognized local autonomy as fundamental—for churches that had previously been essentially unrelated. Theologically, although some members continued to self-identify as Calvinists until the end of the nineteenth century, Congregationalism as a whole had become vastly more liberal. The broadly ecumenical Burial Hill Declaration of 1863 eliminated references to CALVINISM, affirmed the need for social amelioration, and asserted the fellowship of all those who hold “one faith, one Lord, one baptism.”

The Christians

Smallest of the UCC’s four traditions, the Christian Churches (sometimes called the “Christian Connexion”) emerged as an indigenous, populist movement in the early 1800s in rural and frontier America. Arriving at similar conclusions about the nature of church and faith, defectors from three distinct groups—BAPTISTS in New England, Methodists in Virginia, and Presbyterians in Kentucky—gathered small churches of the like-minded. Eschewing creeds, confessions, and the formalities of both church life and traditional theology, they held to the BIBLE alone as the rule of right faith and practice, rejected the divisiveness caused by “sectarian” denominationalism (hence their preference for the simple name “Christian”), and insisted that right action, rather than right belief, is the most important factor in a Christian’s life. These ideas resulted in a widely diverse—and often misunderstood—fellowship that embraced theological positions ranging from unitarian to evangelical. The Christians’ beliefs—and their initial discomfort with the idea of ordination—led them as early as 1815 to accept the validity of women’s preaching and evangelistic activities.

Although the Christian founders had no desire to become a DENOMINATION, renegade ministers and disorders in newly gathered frontier churches quickly led to the establishment of annual conferences for mutual support. Some Christians in the south eventually aligned themselves with Thomas and Alexander Campbell (see CAMPBELL FAMILY), whose similar ideas produced today’s Christian Church (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), with which the UCC has a formal ecumenical partnership. Divided by the issue of SLAVERY in 1850, other northern and southern Christians eventually came together at the end of the century to form a unified, congregationally structured national body that included a number of black churches from the old Afro-Christian Convention of the south (now the largest regional body of African American churches within the - United Church of Christ). An early antipathy toward creeds, confessions, and all rules and regulations that might abridge the right of private judgment continued throughout the century, and as a group Christians remained committed to the ideal of tolerance for theological diversity. Drawn together by POLITY as well as by common commitments to church unity and theological openness, the General Convention of Christian Churches merged with the National Council of Congregational Churches in 1931 to become the Congregational Christian Churches.

The German Reformed Church

The Reformed Church, second largest tradition in the United Church of Christ, had its origins in the Palatinate area of GERMANY, and was transplanted to America's southeastern and mid-Atlantic region, especially Pennsylvania, as early as 1710. A second wave of immigrants in the 1830s settled primarily in the Midwest. Unlike the Puritans, the Reformed came not for religious reasons nor to undertake a social experiment, but to escape war, poverty, and social unrest in their homeland.

Nurtured in an area where both Reformed and Lutheran influences prevailed, the German Reformed were a people whose lives were shaped by the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM of 1563, with its distinctive ecumenical thrust. Along with the Bible this devotional and educational document enabled them initially to sustain their faith in the absence of formal pastoral leadership, a lack that was not addressed until church planter John Philip Boehm was ordained by the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH in 1728. By this act the Reformed initiated an organizational and supervisory relationship with the Dutch church that lasted until 1793, when the American body became independent.

During the nineteenth century new immigration, as well as issues of ETHNICITY and Americanization, language, and revivalism, caused tensions within the Reformed fellowship, although these continued to be mitigated by the unifying influence of the Heidelberg Catechism. Under the leadership of JOHN WILLIAMSON NEVIN and PHILIP SCHAFF the influential Mercersburg movement stressed the centrality of LITURGY and sac-rament in devotional life, critiqued the prevailing American ethos of revivalistic individualism, and asserted the essential unity of the Christian Church across history, the latter a "Romanizing" view that was both prescient and, at the time, highly controversial.

Structurally the German Reformed Church was connectional. Governed internally by ministers and "consistories" of elected elders and deacons, congregations were united in regional classes, and eventually in larger synods; a national General Synod was formed in 1863, when the name "German" was dropped from the denomination's title. Unlike Congregationalists, the Reformed understood "church" to be most perfectly defined not by individual local congregations, but by the aggregate of many congregations, unified by common worship, practice, and organizing structure.

The German Evangelicals

Youngest of the four traditions, the Evangelical Church represents a second wave of German immigration to America. Beginning in the third decade of the nineteenth century, settlers from northern Germany migrated to the midwestern frontier of Missouri and southern Illinois, bringing with them a tradition of “unionistic” Protestantism that had flourished in their homeland. Finding neither Reformed nor Lutheran churches in America to their taste, the Evangelicals were influenced not only by their isolation in a frontier setting, but also by Swiss missionaries whose PIETISM emphasized the importance of religious experience rather than acceptance of a confession as the foundation of church membership. With the latter’s help the German Evangelical Church Society of the West (Der Deutsche Evangelische Kirchenverein des Westens) was formed in 1840. Reflecting the independent and antiauthoritarian stance of these Evangelicals, the Church Society was at first a loosely organized pas-tors’ conference, with minimal ecclesiastical authority. By the end of the century basic denominational structure was in place, with a national German Evangelical Synod that united churches in the West, Midwest, and Northwest.

Theologically, Evangelicals were independent and open-minded, and like the Christians, they were often indifferent to doctrinal particularities, believing that creeds are “testimonies, not tests” of faith. Nevertheless both a CATECHISM—used with liberty of conscience regarding interpretation—and a CONFESSION were quickly developed, and a seminary was founded by 1850. The motto of that school—now Eden Theological Seminary—articulates the Evangelical perspective, as well as that of today’s United Church of Christ: “In essentials, unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity.” Strong ecumenical commitments and ties of history and ethnicity among both Evangelicals and Reformed led the General Convention of the Evangelical Synod to unite with the Reformed Church in 1934, becoming the Evangelical and Reformed Church.

Other Traditions

In addition to these four constituting strands, other regional and ethnic traditions significantly inform and influence the contemporary United Church of Christ. These include Armenian Evangelical, German Congregational, African American, Hispanic, Native American, Hungarian Reformed, and various Asian and Pacific Island traditions. Although numerically none of these traditions is large, the commitment of the United Church of Christ to become a “multicultural, multi-racial” denomination is evidenced in the highly visible role members of these groups play in leadership.

A New Denomination

Beginning with informal conversations in 1937 the union of the Congregational Christian Churches and the Evangelical and Reformed Church took twenty years to complete. Although the “Basis of Union with Interpretations” was approved in 1949, a lawsuit filed by the Cadman Memorial (Congregational) Church of Brooklyn, New York questioned the right of the General Council to take such action. At issue were matters of Congregational polity that continue to be debated in the UCC: are agencies of the wider church (such as the General Council or today’s General Synod) accountable to and under the control of local churches, or are they accountable only to themselves? A court decision in 1953 removed barriers to union, and the merger was consummated June 25, 1957, in Cleveland, Ohio, now the site of denominational headquarters. Two years later a trinitarian Statement of Faith, understood as “testimony rather than creed” and emphasizing God’s saving acts and the church’s call to mission, was adopted. In 1961, four years after merger, a Constitution and Bylaws was finalized. Both have been revised and amended regularly. An “inclusive language” version of the Statement of Faith and a doxological version are also official.

The polity of the United Church of Christ contains both congregational and connectional elements. At the insistence of denominational founders from the Congregational tradition, the Constitution and Bylaws ensures that “the autonomy of the local church is inherent and modifiable only by its own action.” Thus local congregations are the “basic unit” of the Church, possessing all those things necessary for both spiritual needs and good order: ministry, the Word, sacraments, and structure, as well as property, fiduciary responsibilities, and other legal rights and privileges. Local churches, however—even in the traditions of Congregationalism—were historically bound together, both formally and informally, in relationships of mutual accountability for matters of order, discipline, and mutual nurture. In the United Church of Christ these churches are grouped in presbytery-like Associations, with responsibilities for ordaining, installing, and disciplining CLERGY; receiving (and dismissing) churches; and caring generally for the welfare of local congregations in the area.

Associations are subunits of Conferences, which meet annually and provide services, counsel, and administrative support to churches and Associations within their boundaries. The General Synod, the national representative body, meets biennially. Although it sets missional and financial priorities for the denomination and issues pronouncements about matters of broad social concern, it is understood to speak “to, not for” the churches: it “recommends” and “urges,” rather than “directs.” A major denominational restructure in 2000 changed the composition of the General Synod to include not only elected conference delegates, but also voting members of four “covenanted ministries” (the Office of General Ministries, Local Church Ministries, Wider Church Ministries, and Justice and Witness Ministries), which serve both internal needs and mission. The Executive Council, meeting semiannually, serves as Synod ad interim. Use of “covenantal” language in the restructure was deliberate, implying the voluntary but important task of each setting of the church—local, regional, and national—to attend prayerfully to the concerns, actions, and pronouncements of the others. (Internally, the UCC’s polity itself is often described as “covenantal.”) In keeping with the denomination’s commitment to inclusivity, each of the several governance or mission instrumentalities is mandated to include “underrepresented constituencies,” including racial and ethnic minorities, WOMEN, persons under 30, and gays and lesbians (see HOMOSEXUALITY).

Defining Theological and Other Characteristics

Paragraph 2 of the United Church of Christ's Constitution and Bylaws reads:

The United Church of Christ acknowledges as its Head, Jesus Christ, Son of God and Savior. It acknowledges as kindred in Christ all who share in this confession. It looks to the Word of God in the Scriptures, and to the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, to prosper its creative and redemptive work in the world. It claims as its own the faith of the historic Church expressed in the ancient creeds and reclaimed in the basic insights of the Protestant Reformers. It affirms the responsibility of the Church in each generation to make the faith its own in reality of worship, in honesty of thought and expression, and in purity of heart before God. In keeping with the teaching of our Lord and the practice prevailing among evangelical Christians, it recognizes two sacraments: Baptism and the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion.

This brief statement indicates the denomination's theological ORTHODOXY as well as its liberalism. No other doctrinal test or universally held dogma exists, no systematic or comprehensive theology, nor is there a magisterium from which theological pronouncements are issued. Theological perspectives—often lively and varying widely across the spectrum from evangelical to neo-orthodox—may be found in the widely used Statement of Faith, in occasional papers sponsored by denominational initiatives, in pronouncements of Conferences and Synod, in scholarly writings, on the denominational website, and in the pages of Prism, the seminary-sponsored theological journal for the denomination. This theological freedom is a function both of the original need to mediate differences among the four constituent traditions and of existing convictions within these traditions and their inheritors. Commitment to theological openness and diversity is today a widely held and defining conviction for the United Church of Christ.

The United Church of Christ has no "official" ecclesiological statement, and, as with doctrinal matters, perspectives about the essential nature of the church vary widely. However, members generally understand that the church is founded on the acts of God named in the Scriptures and interpreted through the ancient creeds, the writings of the Protestant reformers, and the inspired understandings of each new generation. By confessing Jesus Christ as sole head of the church, they affirm, first, that all human leadership is radically equal, and second, that all who confess Christ are bound covenantally, sharing common Christian experience and responsibility for mission in the world. The church's basic purposes are four: to proclaim the gospel through scripture, sacrament, and witness; to gather and support communities of faithful men and women for celebration and mission; to manifest more fully the unity of church, humankind, and the whole creation; and to work for the furtherance of God's realm of justice, peace, and love.

The latter two purposes are especially significant. Born out of the passionate desire for church unity among its founders, and formed in an era of massive social upheaval that included the struggle of African Americans for civil rights (see CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT) and the Vietnam War, the United Church of Christ is distinctively animated by concerns for the wider church and world. An early commitment to church unity led founders to choose a broadly inclusive name, without historical antecedent—“United Church of Christ”—that signaled their willingness for the denomination “if need be, to die” for the sake of future unions. Today the UCC participates widely in both national and international ecumenical discussions (including the National and World Councils of Churches, Churches Uniting in Christ, and the WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES), and has numerous ecumenical relationships globally. A full communion partnership with the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) since 1985 includes periodic joint synodical meetings and the sharing of staff for global ministries. The UCC also is part of a full-communion agreement with the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, USA; the REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA; and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA.

The UCC is widely known as one of the most socially active among American Protestant churches, with an unwavering commitment to pursue justice and peace for all persons. Believing that “the love of God in Christ cannot ever be expressed except in a just society,” the denomination has taken strong and often controversial stands and actions against numerous perceived injustices, in particular racism, WAR (the UCC understands itself as a “just peace church”), and economic oppression in its various forms. The General Synod, as well as individual Conferences and local churches, regularly takes action and issues formal pronouncements about dozens of social issues, ranging from accessibility for “differently abled” persons to equitable taxation and the civil rights of all, regardless of sexual orientation. The United Church of Christ is the only Protestant denomination that routinely, if not universally, accepts gays and lesbians into the ordained ministry and other leadership positions. Because ordination is handled by regional Associations, in some areas gays and lesbians may not be accepted for ordination; however, the church in its national setting has strongly advocated regarding this matter, and all seven denominational SEMINARIES admit homosexual persons without reservation into the ordination track. Members typically summarize the warrant for “prophetic” stands that challenge existing practices with the words of Pilgrim pastor JOHN ROBINSON, nearly 400 years ago: “God has yet more light and truth to break forth from his holy Word.”

Like other historically “mainline” denominations, the United Church of Christ suffered significant membership losses in the late twentieth century. Presently it consists of roughly 1.4 million members.

See also Dialogue, Interconfessional; Ecumenism

References and Further Reading

- Book of Worship*. New York: United Church of Christ Office for Church Life and Leadership, 1986.
- Dunn, David, ed. A History of the Evangelical and Reformed Church. Philadelphia: The Christian Education Press, 1961.
- Gunnemann, Louis H. The Shaping of the United Church of Christ: An Essay in the History of American Christianity. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1977.
- . United and Uniting: The Meaning of an Ecclesial Journey. New York: United Church Press, 1987.
- Horton, Douglas. The United Church of Christ: its origins, organizations, and rate in the world today. New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons, 1962.
- Johnson, Daniel L., and Charles E. Hambrick-Stowe. Theology and Identity: Traditions, Movements, and Polity in the United Church of Christ. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1990.
- Morrill, Milo True. A History of the Christian Denomination in America 1794–1911 A.D. Dayton, Ohio: Christian Publishing Association, 1912.
- Newman, William M. “The Meanings of Merger: Denominational Identity in the United Church of Christ” In Beyond Establishment: Protestant Identity in a Post-Protestant Age, J.W.Carroll, ed. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox, 1993.
- Nordbeck, Elizabeth C., and Clyde J.Steckel. The Unfinished Church: Theology and Polity in the United Church of Christ. Cleveland, Ohio: United Church Press, 2003 (forthcoming).
- Rohr, John von. The Shaping of American Congregationalism 1620–1957. Cleveland, Ohio: Pilgrim Press, 1992.
- Shinn, Roger L. Confessing Our Faith: An Interpretation of the Statement of Faith of the United Church of Christ. New York: Pilgrim Press, 1990.
- Zikmund, Barbara Brown, ed. Hidden Histories in the United Church of Christ. vols. 1 and 2. New York: United Church Press, 1984, 1987.
- , series ed. The Living Theological Heritage of the United Church of Christ. Vols 1–7 (Ancient and Medieval Legacies, Reformation Roots, Colonial and National Beginnings, Consolidation and Expansion, Outreach and Diversity, Growing Toward Unity, United and Uniting). Cleveland, Ohio: Pilgrim Press, various dates.

ELIZABETH C.NORDBECK

UNITED CHURCH OF INDIA

see North India, Church of; South India, Church of

UNITED METHODIST CHURCH

The United Methodist Church (UMC) was created on April 23, 1968 in Dallas, Texas, when The Methodist Church (MC) and the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH (EUB) united. Both churches were products of predecessor unions. The MC was formed in 1939 by a merger of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1946 the Evangelical Church and the Church of the United Brethren in Christ consolidated to become the Evangelical United Brethren Church. At the time of union, the UMC had approximately 11,000,000 members, 40,000 local churches, and 35,000 clergy, making it the largest Protestant DENOMINATION in the UNITED STATES. It also had congregations in AFRICA, Asia, INDIA, and Europe.

The MC and the EUB had historic ties reaching back to their predecessors' earlier years. Jacob Albright (1759–1808), the founder of the Evangelical Association (later Evangelical Church) had a high regard for METHODISM, and following his conversion in 1791 was nurtured in a ME class meeting. Philip William Otterbein (1726–1813), German Reformed pastor and co-founder of the United Brethren, along with a reformed Mennonite, Martin Boehm (1725–1812), assisted at the ordination of FRANCIS ASBURY (1745–1816) at the celebrated Christmas Conference in Baltimore in December 1784 (see BALTIMORE CONFERENCE). Although there were Reformed elements in the theology of both churches, the Evangelicals and United Brethren before their union were heavily influenced by Wesleyan thought and Methodist polity.

Theology

The UMC is basically Wesleyan in its theology although within this broad framework there is considerable theological diversity in the denomination (see WESLEYANISM). At the time of union it was agreed that the denomination's official theological position would include four documents referred to as "doctrinal standards." They include JOHN WESLEY'S (1703–1791) standard sermons, his Explanatory Notes Upon the New Testament, Articles of Religion sent by Wesley to America in 1784 and based on the Church of England's THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of Religion, and the Confession of Faith of the EUBC. The complete texts of the Articles and Confession are published in the denomination's Book of Discipline.

At the 1972 UMC General Conference, the church adopted a document titled "Our Theological Task," the chief architect of which was Albert C. Outler (1908–1989), theologian, ecumenist, and Wesley scholar. The document emphasizes John Wesley's use of scripture, TRADITION, reason, and experience (referred to by some as the “Wesleyan quadrilateral”) as sources for understanding and practicing the faith. It urges United Methodists to use these sources for their theological reflection. The document is published in the UMC Discipline, its principal ecclesiological guide, and has appeared in every Discipline since 1972 (although it was revised substantially in 1988). The revised document makes clear that the BIBLE is the primary source for Christian belief and life.

United Methodism has been a leading force in renewing interest in the life and thought of John Wesley, Methodism’s founder, who more than anyone has left his imprint on the theology, structure, and mission of the denomination. The United Methodist Publishing House has regularly published interpretive studies of Wesley’s theology and ministry, and is publishing a critical and authoritative 35-volume edition of Wesley’s works.

Polity

The UMC is governed by a constitution and is organized as a connectional system maintained by a system of conferences. Every congregation is affiliated with a local charge conference. Charge conferences elect delegates to a regional annual conference. Every four years annual conferences choose delegates to attend the denomination’s Jurisdictional (U.S.) or Central (outside the U.S.) conferences and the church’s General Conference.

The General Conference is the supreme legislative body of the church and is the only entity that may speak officially for the church. The General Conference meets every four years and is composed of approximately 1,000 lay and clergy delegates in equal numbers representing various nations, but mostly from the United States. It revises The Book of Discipline, which describes the church’s mission and structure, and adopts a number of positions on social issues that are published as “Social Principles” in the Discipline and in The Book of Resolutions. Legislation adopted by the General Conference provides direction for every level of the connectional structure.

The denomination has an Episcopal form of government in which bishops, elected and assigned by Jurisdictional or Central Conferences, ordain men and women as deacons and elders and generally superintend the church’s work. They preside at the sessions of annual, Jurisdictional or Central, and General Conferences. UMC pastors serve in an itinerant system in which they are annually appointed by a bishop to serve local churches or other ministries. Bishops are assisted in administration and receive advice on appointments from district superintendents who supervise groups of churches in the annual conference.

General agencies composed of several councils, boards, and commissions amenable to the General Conference are an important feature of the connectional system. They provide services and ministries beyond the local church and annual conference in such areas as EVANGELISM, stewardship, social issues, global mission, finance, HIGHER EDUCATION, publishing, and communications. Each agency has voting members who represent the wider church and who employ staff to do the agency’s work.

The UMC uses a carefully defined system of judicial administration described in its Discipline. A Judicial Council, constitutionally created, is the denomination's highest judicial body. It determines the constitutionality of legislation and rules on the legality of actions taken by any entity created or authorized by the General Conference.

Worship and Liturgy

Worship practices in local UMC churches vary. Almost all local churches have Sunday services, though they may also have other gatherings for WORSHIP during the week. Some congregations prefer a more formal LITURGY that does not vary much from week to week. Others choose more spontaneous worship allowing for liturgical freedom. In almost all congregations, however, the elements of worship include hymns, prayers, scripture readings, and a sermon. United Methodism recognizes two sacraments, BAPTISM and holy communion, or the LORD'S SUPPER. Baptisms of infants and adults are held occasionally in congregational worship as is needed. Baptism is required for church membership. Celebrations of Holy Communion are usually held monthly, but in some churches weekly.

Worship is guided by hymn books (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS), including The United Methodist Hymnal, which was last revised in 1989, and The United Methodist Book of Worship (1992), although these resources are not utilized in every congregation. Supplemental collections of hymns and worship materials have also been published, including the African American Songs of Zion (1981), the Asian American Hymns from the Four Winds (1983), the Hispanic American Celebremos (1983), and the Native American Voices (1992).

Ministries and Institutions

A wide variety of ministries and institutions are supported by the UMC. Local churches support denominational work in their annual conferences and other parts of the world through a system of giving known as "apportionments." In addition to their apportionment giving, many congregations sponsor scouting programs, soup kitchens, clothing banks, and other ministries pertinent to their local communities. Among the denomination's most important ministries are health and welfare institutions, including hospitals, retirement homes, agencies to aid children and families, and shelters for the homeless.

The UMC and its predecessor denominations have been at the forefront of Protestant educational endeavors. Every local church is expected to have a SUNDAY SCHOOL for training children, youth, and adults. United Methodist Women, the church's principal women's organization, carries on an effective mission education program in local churches and annual conferences. The church is also involved in secondary and higher education. A network of colleges and universities, including several black colleges, is related to the church. In 1992 the denomination opened Africa University in ZIMBABWE for the education of students across that continent. UMC theological schools in the United States and Europe train its CLERGY and also enroll students from other denominations.

The UMC is a vigorous supporter of ecumenical institutions. At the denominational level it is an active member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, two of the world's principal ecumenical organizations. United Methodism also provides substantial financial and organizational support to the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL, which links the family of Methodist and related United Churches in more than 100 countries.

Caucuses

UMC denominational life has been significantly influenced by a number of unofficial caucuses, some of which were formed in the years immediately following the church's inception. Among them are four racial/ethnic caucuses that have been effective advocates for racial inclusiveness in the leadership of the denomination (see ETHNICITY). Black Methodists for Church Renewal (BMCR), a national forum of black United Methodists, was founded in 1968. BMCR was especially successful in promoting the establishment of a general agency, the General Commission on Religion and Race, in 1968 to advance the goal of a racially inclusive church. In 1970 the Native American International Caucus was formed, and that same year Hispanics began to form Methodists Associated Representing the Cause of Hispanic Americans (MARCHA). The National Federation of Asian American United Methodists was founded in 1975. Racial/ ethnic people are significantly represented in the membership of the UMC in the United States, and their caucuses have been powerful forces in the choice of denominational leaders, including bishops.

Other caucuses have been voices on theological and social issues. The Methodist Federation for Social Action, which had its origins in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1907, has been an advocate for liberal social change, including racial and GENDER inclusiveness and the complete acceptance of gay and homosexual people in the denomination. Its counterpart, Good News, formed in 1966, is a representative of the evangelical party in the church and advances a conservative theological agenda (see EVANGELICALISM). A caucus of gay and lesbian United Methodists, Affirmation, was organized in 1975. United Methodist charismatics formed United Methodist Renewal Services in 1977. The caucuses, racial/ethnic or otherwise, are well organized and publish newsletters or magazines on a more or less regular basis. Their lobbying efforts are especially visible at the sites of the General Conference.

Issues and Controversies

The UMC struggles with a number of issues that have occupied its attention since its creation. Among these issues are sexism, racism, HOMOSEXUALITY, membership decline, and the global nature of the church.

WOMEN have always been prominent in the life of the denomination. But although women have represented much more than half its membership, it took a considerable time for them to be regularly chosen as delegates to conferences, to serve as clergy in local churches, and to become leaders in the connectional structure (see WOMEN CLERGY). Their situation has changed considerably. In 1972 there were fewer than 300 active female clergy, but by 2000 their numbers had grown to approximately 8,000. In 1980 the UMC elected its first female bishop, Marjorie Swank Matthews (1916–1986). While increasing numbers of women occupy leadership positions in the local church, annual conference, and other levels of the denomination, they still wrestle with gender bias in many areas of denominational life.

Racial diversity has been an issue in the UMC since its inception. While the church affirms commitment to racial inclusiveness, this remains an unfulfilled goal in many areas of denominational life. Racial/ethnic diversity is often represented in annual conference and general church leadership. However, local church memberships generally do not reflect racial diversity, even in communities where the population is multiracial. The denomination has a general agency, the General Commission on Religion and Race, which monitors and advocates racial inclusiveness.

Homosexuality has been a very controversial issue in the denomination. UMC General Conferences have discussed the issue since 1972. Although the church affirms the civil rights of homosexuals, it declares homosexuality incompatible with Christian teaching and prohibits avowed and practicing homosexual people to be ordained and appointed to its ministries. At the 2000 General Conference, the church also took a position that its clergy may not perform ceremonies that celebrate homosexual unions. Many believe that changing the church's position on homosexuality may cause a schism in the denomination.

Declining membership in the United States and Europe has been troubling. In its first three decades UMC membership in the United States decreased approximately 25 percent, dropping it from the first to the second-largest Protestant denomination in the United States. Meanwhile, the church's membership in Africa and the PHILIPPINES, its two other geographical regions increased steadily during the same period. For this reason, African and Filipino United Methodists have asked for a larger role in the denomination's life and ministry. As it becomes more conscious of its international character, the church is working on ways to insure that it does not understand itself as simply a North American denomination.

See also Bishop and Episcopacy; Methodism, North America

References and Further Reading

- Behney, J. Bruce, and Paul H. Eller. The History of the Evangelical United Brethren Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1979. The Book of Discipline of the United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: The United Methodist Publishing House, 1968-. The Book of Resolutions of The United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: The United Methodist Publishing House, 1968- .
- Frank, Thomas E. Polity, Practice, and the Mission of The United Methodist Church. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1997.
- McEllhenney, John G. United Methodism in America: A Compact History. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1992.
- Richey, Russell E., William B. Lawrence, and Dennis M. Campbell, eds. Questions for the Twenty-First Century Church. United Methodism and American Culture, vol. 3. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.
- Richey, Russell E., Kenneth E. Rowe, and Jean Miller Schmidt, eds. The Methodist Experience in America: A Sourcebook. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 2000.
- Yrigoyen, Charles Jr. Belief Matters: United Methodism's Doctrinal Standards. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 2001.

CHARLES YRIGOYEN, JR.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

So closely was Protestantism identified with the early years of America's history that the country was regarded as manifestly a Protestant one in the minds of many. This was particularly true through roughly the first half of the nineteenth century. When immigration patterns shifted dramatically from northern to southern and eastern Europe, heroic efforts to "convert" newly arriving immigrants to Protestantism revealed the depth of the earnest conviction that this was a Protestant nation—and must remain so. By the early years of the twenty-first century, however—and indeed well before—this article of faith could no longer be maintained as pluralism dethroned the Protestant hegemony in virtually every part of the country, although for more than two centuries, Protestant spokesmen saw their denominational and their political loyalties as calling them toward a common goal.

Colonial Foundations

The first permanent English settlement on American soil, Jamestown (1607), saw itself as a mere extension of the mother country and of her political structures and religious institutions. Naming the tiny settlement in honor of the reigning monarch, King James I, pointed to this unquestioned orientation. Where England's flag flew, England's church (ANGLICANISM) must take root. Not until 1619 was the CHURCH OF ENGLAND officially established in Virginia, not because of any hesitation or doubt, but because only then was any legislative body in a position to declare what all had been intended from the beginning.

Bold intentions, however, had a way of running aground onto geopolitical realities that often mocked the earlier visions. The first legislators conceived a Virginia that would recreate modest English towns and cohesive English parishes. A local church would be established (that is, officially supported by tax monies) and a proper clergyman would be imported from ENGLAND. His salary would be paid by the colonial government just as all Anglican clergymen back home drew their income from the state. Then settlers would naturally erect their primitive homes near the church; the town would grow; schools would be built; and soon an English village—hardly distinguishable from one left behind—would miraculously appear.

It simply never happened this way. Virginians, desperately searching for some means of survival and some source of income, found their economic salvation in tobacco. Tobacco, however, required land, large quantities of land, so plantations arose alongside such major rivers as the James and the Rappahannock. These plantations might be only two or three miles in width, back from the river, but they could be twenty or thirty miles in length. Among such widely scattered plantations, where could one build the town—and the church? In fact, colonial Virginia never had towns of any significant size, and colonial churches there never drew large congregations.

Anglican CLERGY of necessity became itinerants, traveling to outlying plantations, along impassible roads or on the river to be pestered by sudden storms and ever-present mosquitoes. Religious services, particularly christenings, weddings, and funerals, were more often held in homes than in the rural churches, thus giving a special sanctity to the plantation manor and even to the land. So far did the religious life of early Virginia differ from that of the English village that attracting clergy to the colony proved difficult. Some who did come, escaping a troublesome debt or a nagging wife, did Anglicanism no great favor. Nonetheless Anglicanism grew more powerfully in Virginia than anywhere else in America. As it spread well beyond the borders of that one colony, the Church of England by the end of the colonial period had emerged as one of the two great denominational powers in early America.

The other and even more powerful denomination found its base in New England, especially in Massachusetts and Connecticut. Here CONGREGATIONALISM (earlier known as PURITANISM) took deep root, and towns and schools and parish churches did look more like the English villages left behind. The churches were locally “owned and operated” (which is the force of the word “congregational”), but with the blessing and support of the colonial governments. Tax monies built churches and paid salaries for the Congregational churches in Massachusetts just as tax monies did for the Anglican churches in Virginia. In both instances government did all that it could to preserve a religious monopoly for its respective established churches: that is, it actively discouraged any competing DENOMINATION, even resorting to persecution (whips, jails, fines, executions) where deemed necessary.

Not dependent on England for its supply of ministers (Harvard and Yale early served as ministerial training grounds), Congregationalism grew with a steadiness that resulted in New England’s being the most thickly churched area of America by the end of the colonial period. Each parish church provided real cohesion in the town, but beyond that, a theological rigor provided unity in the region as a whole. One can speak of a “New England way” that gave distinctive intellectual character to all the institutions of the area: educational, political, social, and of course ecclesiastical. This cohesion endured not only through the colonial period but well beyond; and as westward migrations later moved across the country, it shaped a good deal of institutional life all the way to the West Coast.

However, Anglicanism and Congregationalism did not divide all of early America between them. Despite efforts to keep all alternative religious options far away, other denominations managed to infiltrate, even in the seventeenth century. BAPTISTS found refuge in Rhode Island, a colony created in reaction against the cozy church-state alliance elsewhere in New England. The SOCIETY OF FRIENDS (Quakers) also flourished initially in Rhode Island, but even more dramatically in Pennsylvania, founded in 1682 (so much so that Pennsylvania even came to be called the “Quaker State”). Swedish Lutherans established a tiny and precarious foothold along the shores of the Delaware River, near the present site of Wilmington, Delaware. New York and New Jersey, for two generations under Dutch control (New Amsterdam), was dominated to a fair degree by the national church of Holland, the DUTCH REFORMED. Even after the English conquered the Dutch in 1664 the national church of the latter continued to give a distinctive cultural coloration to that area. Presbyterians from Scotland, later from northern Ireland (“Scotch-Irish”), migrated to America where they settled chiefly in the middle colonies of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

In their earliest years all these Protestant groups concentrated on their own survival. Nevertheless some efforts to reach out to the NATIVE AMERICANS and the African Americans can be seen. Although tiny in number, Swedish Lutherans translated the catechism of MARTIN LUTHER into the “American-Virginian” tongue to evangelize the Delaware Indians. Much larger in number, Congregationalists in New England established mission stations for the Indians on Martha’s Vineyard and elsewhere; one missionary, JOHN ELIOT, won enduring fame by producing an Indian Bible in 1663 in the Algonkian tongue (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). Hostility often frustrated missionary efforts among the Native Americans, just as SLAVERY limited evangelical inroads among colonial blacks. Some argued on the one hand that “gospel liberty” might undermine the institution of slavery itself, whereas others argued that slaves were subhuman, beyond the reach of Christianity. Not until blacks assumed a major role themselves in the propagation of the Christian religion did African Americans flock in large numbers to the religion of their masters.

Denominational Development

In the eighteenth century Anglicanism had one element working in its favor, but a second element working against it. The SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, founded by THOMAS BRAY in 1702, greatly assisted the Anglican Church in its spread throughout the American colonies. Missionaries sent out from London established their preaching stations with particular force in the middle colonies and in New England, where they met much resistance. The Society paid the salaries, provided books, and offered advice if not assistance in the building of churches. The correspondence flowing back and forth between America and England offers eloquent testimony to the vigor and effect of the Society’s labors.

The missionary labors had their downside as well. The men sent out from London remained English in their loyalties and their affections. They did not normally bring families with them and did not normally set down deep roots in the communities where they lived. In short, they did not become Americans. When tensions began to grow between the mother country and her colonies, notably in the second half of the eighteenth century, the Society’s employees remained largely Loyalist, often vociferously so. By 1776 the position of the missionaries had become intolerable, as Thomas Barton reported from Lancaster, Pennsylvania: “Every clergyman of the Church of England who dared to act on proper principles was marked out for infamy and insult; in consequence of which the Missionaries have suffered greatly.”

One issue in particular roiled the Anglican waters: that is, the matter of Bishops (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY). Anglican church polity, of course, required the presence of bishops—bishops to ordain, to confirm, to maintain discipline in the church. So why did England decline to send bishops to America? The answer lay in the deep distrust of many Americans, including some Anglicans themselves (especially in the South), of what powerful bishops might do to disrupt the religious scene in America. Memories were too fresh of persecuting bishops and archbishops of the WILLIAM LAUD stripe. Such men, it was widely assumed, would bring not peace but a sword, if allowed to settle on American soil. So inflamed did this issue of episcopacy become that it can be reasonably argued that the anxieties and fears associated with it helped to bring about the American Revolution.

Congregationalism in the eighteenth century continued to solidify its position in New England, although that position had been shaken by the witchcraft episode in and around Salem, Massachusetts, at the end of the previous century (see WITCHCRAZE). It had also been enraged, though not seriously shaken, by the forced introduction of Anglicanism into Boston in 1689. This action was so clearly political and intrusive that it initially made Congregationalism even stronger. Other religious bodies, notably Baptists and Quakers, made slow but steady inroads into New England, although none of these encroachments seriously threatened the strong alliance between church and state in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire. Of more concern to the Congregational churches were their internal difficulties in polity or dilutions of piety.

So far as the governance of these churches was concerned, theory called for each church to be autonomous, each congregation invested with the full authority to hire and fire its clergy, to receive or expel its members. This theory when put into practice raised some concerns. Autonomy began to look too much like anarchy, as each local parish ran its affairs indifferent to the interests of the colony as a whole. So in 1705 several ministerial associations in Massachusetts met to consider proposals for tightening the connections between the churches, to create a standing committee “which shall consult, advise and determine all affairs that shall be proper matter for the consideration of an Ecclesiastical Council.” These steps, widely interpreted as a “presbyterianizing” of pure Congregational polity, were successfully resisted in Massachusetts, but more closely followed by Connecticut’s Saybrook Platform adopted in 1708.

On the matter of personal piety, successive generations in New England kept comparing themselves unfavorably with their forebears in the first generation of settlers. A Reforming Synod in 1680, for example, complained of the “visible decay in the power of godliness,” of “sinful hearts and hatreds,” and of a general decline in “public spirit.” Then, in the following century, what came to be called the Half-Way Covenant made it easier for persons to become members of the church without necessarily being able to relate their own experience of divine grace. The denomination’s (and the country’s) greatest colonial theologian, JONATHAN EDWARDS, helped recall New England to a deeper piety. Despite internal quarrels or compromises, Congregationalism continued to thrive and in 1750 had more churches (465) by far than any other denomination in America.

By that same year PRESBYTERIANISM had become a major denominational force, in third place after Congregationalism and Anglicanism. This Calvinist body was especially powerful in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, but it also had a significant presence in New York. The creation of the College of New Jersey (later Princeton) in 1746 was one measure of this denomination’s growing influence and vigor. Its rapid rise resulted chiefly from immigrants leaving Ulster and landing at the port of Philadelphia—some 200,000 in the half-century between 1710 and 1760. In this same time period, other immigrants, now from Germany, swelled the ranks of LUTHERANISM and GERMAN REFORMED. Pennsylvania offered these two groups, as it had the Presbyterians, the most fertile soil for settling and maturing.

Two major events of the eighteenth century require notice here: the upheaval of religious revivalism known as the Great Awakening (1720–1770) (see AWAKENINGS), and the outbreak of political passion known as the American Revolution. The Awakening was largely a Calvinist affair, at least in its initial stages. It pervaded the parishes of the Congregationalists, the Presbyterians, and the Dutch Reformed. Baptists, drawn to it in large numbers, turned Calvinist in their theological orientation. Indeed, the great growth of the Baptists dates from roughly the middle of the eighteenth century forward; before that time Baptists were withdrawn, introverted, and not conspicuously evangelistic. After 1750, however, this picture changed dramatically.

The Church of England held itself aloof from the Awakening, this despite the fact that the most powerful preacher of the movement, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, was himself an Anglican. However, the Church of England was being reborn or revitalized from within. Small reforming societies and Bible study groups, associated with the names of JOHN and CHARLES WESLEY, strove to bring a higher level of personal piety into England's national church. The Wesleys did not initially envision a rupture with that church, but when the break came, it gave America yet another denomination, METHODISM. This body, not formally organized until 1784, proved to be a powerful evangelistic engine. Methodists, together with Baptists, would in the next century radically change the face of American religion.

The other great public event of the eighteenth century, the Revolution, did not produce new denominations, but it did shift the relative strengths of the religious bodies already present. Some Protestant bodies prospered, some suffered. Anglicanism suffered most. A long American war against the nation of England could not but bring harm to England's church. As noted earlier, Anglican missionaries returned home in droves; those who remained found churches locked against them and liturgies—especially if they included prayers for the king—rudely interrupted. Moves to disestablish this national church began as early as 1776 in Virginia, and soon thereafter elsewhere. By the time the Church of England could reorganize itself in 1789 into the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America, this denomination was in total disarray and near collapse (see EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES). It would take decades for it to regain some of its footing, although it would never again enjoy the numerical superiority of an earlier day.

Congregationalists and Presbyterians, who shared a close theological connection, supported the Revolution in overwhelming numbers. An American victory was their victory. Despite serious schisms introduced during the Great Awakening, both denominations continued to prosper, with Presbyterians gaining an edge. Profiting particularly from schisms among the Congregationalists, Baptists flourished, even though a good deal of Baptist loyalty could be found in the middle colonies. Pacifist groups (Quakers, MENNONITES, Moravians, and others) suffered some public disdain, especially in Pennsylvania where they were so numerous. In an effort to ameliorate the situation Benjamin Franklin encouraged the pacifists to be conspicuous in their noncombatant duties: evacuating aged men, women, and children, digging trenches, and carrying “off wounded men to places where they may receive assistance.” The greatest impact of the Revolution, however, lay in the charting of a broad new path to religious liberty.

The New Nation

Delegates from the thirteen colonies, now states, gathered in Philadelphia in the summer of 1787 to draw up a new constitution. By 1789 a sufficient number of states had voted (often by quite narrow margins) to ratify the document and bring a new form of government into being. The Constitution itself said virtually nothing about religion, only asserting that “no religious test shall ever be required as qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.” This single declaration about religion reassured some that religious tests would not play the kind of role in America that they continued to play in much of Europe. However, the assertion alarmed others who thought that the office of President, for example, should certainly be limited to Christians, and most likely to Protestants. Still others—a majority, as it turned out—worried that the Constitution carried no guarantee of religious liberty, so they hedged their ratification of the document until receiving assurance that the First Congress would remedy this oversight.

That Congress, gathered in 1789, did just that when it drew up the first ten amendments to the Constitution, these collectively known as America’s BILL OF RIGHTS. The first clause of the First Amendment stipulated that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” It would be too much to declare that these sixteen words made everything perfectly clear in the intersections between CHURCH AND STATE, but it would not be too much to observe that a wide door had been opened to religious liberty on the national level.

What was immediately clear to some denominations, and only gradually became clear to others, was that religion now entered the free market place. Competition would henceforth determine the winners, not state patronage or social position. In that competition, newly invigorated Baptists and newly organized Methodists proved to be the most successful market managers. Neither denomination concerned itself too much over formal educational qualifications or rigorous theological precision; rather, each concerned itself with reaching the people, wherever they were and of whatever background. The chief requisite for the preacher was a “call,” a sense that God had chosen one for the ministry and, if chosen by God, that minister would certainly be blessed by God. With this call came a spiritual certainty and passionate excitement that made the gospel come alive to thousands, then to millions.

On the rapidly expanding western frontiers, Baptists employed, as much by accident as by design, the farmer-preacher model. In any given locality, where neither church nor school might be found, one farmer might feel God’s call. This could result in little more than his taking the initiative to gather a few neighbors together for Bible study, WORSHIP, or some modest homily. Because Baptist POLITY was strictly congregational, no outside AUTHORITY had to approve or oversee or regulate this activity. This was grass roots religion, and it grew as plentifully as the grasses themselves. African Americans were among those attracted in large numbers to a denomination that demanded no supervising authority, white or black, and to a mode of worship that could be as spontaneous and joyous as one wished. Religious liberty meant not only the freedom to propagate one's faith, but also, within Baptist confines, the freedom to worship largely as one pleased—and it worked. Between 1750 and 1850 the number of Baptist churches in America spurted from 132 to nearly 10,000.

Methodists had a tighter organizational structure, at least in theory. Bishops (or superintendents) did ordain and appoint, but often on the basis of little more than a warm heart. These bishops employed the technique of the circuit rider, with the young nation's most vital Methodist leader, FRANCIS ASBURY, setting the pattern. Methodist CIRCUIT RIDERS covered great expanses of territory, lived with hardship and deprivation, but often were the very first voices of comfort and instruction to be heard on the frontiers. The number of miles traveled, the number of sermons preached, the number of souls touched by the circuit riders stagger the imagination. One might well question the reports as exaggerations or boasts, except that the results cannot be denied. In 1750 Methodists had no churches, but by 1850 they had well over 13,000, surpassing even the Baptists. Although phenomenally successful on the frontier, Methodists also had a major impact back East—notably in Delaware and Maryland. Methodism adapted marvelously to the frontier and its CAMP MEETINGS, but it also adapted successfully to the urban centers, filling any spiritual vacuum that might momentarily appear.

In sparsely settled western lands, new denominations arose, conspicuously the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST (see CAMPBELL FAMILY) and the CHRISTIAN CHURCHES (BARTON STONE). These two groups, merging in 1833, could reach the west because they were of the west. Ohio and Kentucky were early strongholds, but soon the message of a restored New Testament church reached Tennessee, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and beyond. Restoring primitive Christianity was the vision, adopting only the New Testament and rejecting all man-made creeds was the method. The fond hope, to move beyond all denominational labels and to become simply "disciples," struck responsive chords on the frontier (see FRONTIER RELIGION). However, the movement ended, ironically, in contributing even more denominational diversity to an already crowded American field.

Religious liberty meant, among other things, a freedom to experiment, to create something fresh and new. Utopian adventures sprang up in the first half of the nineteenth century: for example, John Humphrey Noyes and his Oneida Community. Far more successful was MORMONISM, which under the leadership of JOSEPH SMITH moved from a tiny knot of believers in upstate New York to a larger group in Nauvoo, Illinois, and then, under the leadership of BRIGHAM YOUNG, to a utopian success story in Salt Lake City, Utah. Mormons, officially the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, took seriously the millennial teachings of a second coming of Christ, and in this regard, they were far from alone. WILLIAM MILLER, lecturing to large, eager audiences, predicted the end of the world in 1843. When this did not occur, those surviving the Great Disappointment regrouped, none more successfully than the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS who made a name for themselves in medical missions and in the promotion of healthy foods and healthy habits.

Meanwhile, back East, what of the two colonial powerhouses, Anglicanism (now Episcopalians) and Congregationalism? The Episcopalians, still recovering from the weakness resulting from abrupt disestablishment, found themselves losing out to the Methodists, even in such strong centers as Virginia and South Carolina. Congregationalists held on to their establishments, in Connecticut until 1813 and in Massachusetts until 1833. However, they suffered from internal schism in the form of Unitarianism, which divided churches and parishes, especially in eastern Massachusetts. If the American ENLIGHTENMENT had a denominational expression, it would be Unitarianism, a religion that emphasized the role of reason and minimized the place of miracles and mystery. THOMAS JEFFERSON at one point thought that Unitarianism would become the prevailing religion of the new nation. This, of course, did not happen because powerful countervailing forces were at work.

If the Enlightenment seemed to challenge many of the assumptions on which Protestantism rested, the defenders of a "Protestant empire" were not ready to surrender. What has come to be called the Second Great Awakening (1810–1860) constituted the counteroffensive. Its warriors fought back with new agencies, new educational institutions, and new techniques of recruitment.

In the early decades of the nineteenth century, a host of voluntary organizations arose to provide whatever was required to Protestantize America. The AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, formed in 1818, provided inexpensive Bibles for a growing population, east and west. Where necessary, it would also undertake translations for Native Americans and for newly arriving immigrants. In 1824 the American Sunday School Union reached children as well as adults, offering Christian instruction and, where required, the fundamentals of reading and writing. As lay institutions, SUNDAY SCHOOLS did not require an ordained ministry; it could therefore utilize the talents of men and women, especially the latter, to be a valued adjunct to the church and, on occasion, an outpost before the church arrived. So also the American Tract Society (1825), the American Education Society (1826), and a plethora of other Protestant voluntary efforts would turn back the tide of French infidelity and frontier barbarism (see VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES).

Although states were taking major steps to provide HIGHER EDUCATION to their citizens, the churches still saw education as falling very much in their domain. Protestant clergymen still served as college presidents, even of state institutions. Denominations such as the Congregationalists and Presbyterians that long had an interest in an educated clergy worked together in a Plan of Union (1801) to create several colleges in the opening West: Western Reserve (1826) in Ohio, Knox (1837) in Illinois, Grinnell (1847) in Iowa, and Ripon (1851) in Wisconsin. Baptists and Methodists, who placed less emphasis on formal ministerial preparation, also busied themselves in founding many schools: the Methodists, with McKendree (1835) and De Pauw (1837) in Indiana, and Ohio Wesleyan (1842); the Baptists, with Denison (1832) in Ohio, Shurtleff (1835) in Illinois, and Baylor (1845) in Texas. These four denominations accounted for about one half of all colleges established before 1860, although such smaller Protestant bodies as Quakers, German Reformed, and Lutherans also founded new institutions. The education of American youth would not be left to the enemies of religion (see CHRISTIAN COLLEGES).

The Second Great Awakening also utilized revivalism as a recruiting technique for new members and a revitalization program for current members CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY of Oberlin College (1833), another of those “presbygational” institutions, emerged in the years before the CIVIL WAR as the leading practitioner of and apologist for revivalism. Revivals worked on the frontiers of the West, but they also worked in the cities of the East. Said Finney: one need not passively wait for a revival to come, like dew falling on the grass. One could labor to promote REVIVALS and reap a harvest of saved souls, just as surely as through appropriate efforts one could reap a harvest of corn. Churches had lost sight of the simple connection between cause and effect, he argued, with the result that “more than five thousand million have gone down to hell, while the church has been dreaming, and waiting for God to save them.”

All of these instruments—the societies, the colleges, the revivals—illustrated what had come to be the guiding characteristic of religion in America: the voluntary principle. In an early treatment of American religion, designed principally for foreign consumption, Presbyterian minister Robert Baird in 1843 rhapsodized about the voluntary principle. By means of this principle, one could defeat immorality, promote TEMPERANCE, abolish slavery (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF), even turn away the gods of war. This principle, he wrote, “seems to extend itself in every direction with an all-powerful influence.” For Baird voluntarism stood forth as the essence of evangelical religion, and evangelical Protestantism was, for him, the essence of America.

Protestantism Torn and Challenged

In the 1830s and 1840s two issues threatened the unity of Baird’s evangelical Protestantism: first, the growing presence of Roman Catholicism; second, the intensifying discord over slavery. Immigration chiefly from Ireland swelled the ranks of Catholics in America, so much so that by 1850 America had more Roman Catholics than either Baptists or Methodists. If this trend continued, what would become of the evangelical empire? The Protestant response to this influx of Catholic immigrants was first alarm, then organized resistance and hostility (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS).

In 1840, for example, the “American Society to Promote the Principles of the Protestant Reformation” took shape in New York City, its stated purpose being to call attention to the dangers of “popery” and “to arouse Protestants to a proper sense of their duty in reference to the Romanists.” For members of this society, and for many other Protestants of that era, the principles of the U.S. Constitution and of the Vatican were irreconcilable; if a citizen believed in the first, he or she must in good conscience strongly resist the second. In the 1850s this religious NATIVISM took a political turn in the creation of the Know-Nothing Party whose aim was to elect only Protestants to public office. Although that party was short-lived, the anti-Catholic sentiment on which it was based lasted well into the twentieth century.

Evangelical Protestants could unite in their dread of Catholicism, but they could not unite in their positions regarding slavery. Indeed, the deep and bitter divisions in such denominations as Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians in the 1840s and 1850s pointed to the inevitable divisions in the nation itself that resulted in the tragedy of the Civil War. In 1844 the Methodists were the first to divide into two halves: the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Both sides accused the other of having abandoned the gospel of Christ, the Northerners arguing that slavery was “a great evil” to be eradicated as soon as possible, the Southerners denouncing those who substituted POLITICS for theology and social reform for DOCTRINE.

The very next year the Baptists followed suit, with Baptists in the north arrayed against a SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION. When the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions refused to appoint an Alabama clergyman and a slaveholder as a missionary, Baptists in the south resolved to withdraw from the national body to form their own mission society and, ultimately, their own agencies of every kind. As with the Methodists, both sides appealed for patience and understanding, thinking that once slavery was no longer the issue, the two sides could come together again; however, that proved a false hope. Recriminations and even denunciations made reunion impossible for the Methodists for nearly one hundred years, and for Baptists far beyond that.

Last of the large denominations to divide, the Presbyterians in 1857 separated along lines not theological but geographical. Both sides appealed to the Bible, of course. The North argued that to use the Bible in defense of slavery was to bring ridicule and calamity to Christianity itself; the South argued that to turn the Bible into an antislavery tract was to pervert it beyond recognition. Not only did these denominational divisions anticipate the brutal war to come, they also weakened Protestantism’s public voice. Protestant clergy appealed to the same Bible and prayed to the same God but somehow ended up on opposite sides of the most urgent moral issue of the time. How could this be? Did Protestantism guide the CULTURE, or did the culture determine the direction that the Protestant witness would take?

Protestantism presented no united front on other critical questions in the nineteenth century. Charles Darwin’s Origin of the Species, published in 1859, shook both the theological and the scientific worlds on both sides of the Atlantic. Evolution was not a new idea, but evolution as a credible theory if not a scientific proposition was new. The Protestant responses were now not geographical but theological. An eastern journalist and Congregational clergyman Lyman Abbott saw evolution as compatible with Christian understandings. Creation was a process, not a “once upon a time” event of the past. God’s method was growth, development, progress—“What Jesus was, humanity is becoming.” On the other hand, Princeton theologian and professor Charles Hodge saw in Darwin’s hypotheses a direct challenge to everything that Christianity stood for. If chance is king, God no longer sits on his throne. If SCIENCE is the source of all truth, then we might as well, thought Hodge, shelve our Bibles and scuttle our creeds. If the war over evolution seemed noisiest in the nineteenth century, all the smoke of battle had by no means cleared in the twentieth.

Both the institution of slavery and DARWINISM raised questions about how one reads the Bible and what authority the Bible has—not just in religion, but in politics, science, and history. The questions grew more intense as Protestant scholars, first in GERMANY, then in England and America, examined the biblical manuscripts as to authorship, date, editorial revision, and mutual agreement. They also looked to the manuscript traditions to see whether, for example, the King James Version of the Bible was based on the best and most authentic manuscripts. It was not, and this led to new scholarly translations and biblical editions, the English Revised Version of 1885 being the first in a long line of “modern” Bibles. If Protestantism had cast its lot in the sixteenth century very much on the side of Scripture as opposed to Tradition, then any challenge to the biblical foundation was bound to shake the institutional superstructure—as it did.

Protestant churches also reacted with something less than unanimity to the growing leadership roles exercised by WOMEN. Antoinette Brown Blackwell was ordained as a Congregational minister in 1853, although this was hardly the first rumble of a grand tidal wave. FRANCIS E. WILLARD directed the fortunes of the Women’s Christian Temperance Union, organized in Ohio in 1874, giving her and her followers more visibility in public life than women in America had heretofore enjoyed. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, who in 1848 joined with Quaker preacher LUCRETIA MOTT in organizing the famous Seneca Falls gathering on behalf of women’s rights, turned her talents a half century later to the production of The Woman’s Bible. All of these nineteenth century efforts did little more than suggest what in the succeeding century would more fully capture the attention of Protestant and political institutions.

Meanwhile, the country continued to grow, with much immigration from eastern and central Europe (Catholic and Jewish), as well as with some immigration from Scandinavia (Lutheran). The country gradually moved from a predominantly rural population to a heavily urban one. Major cities, long a feature of the Atlantic coast, now sprang up in the Midwest: Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Kansas City, and Omaha. Urbanization together with its close companion, INDUSTRIALIZATION, presented Protestant leaders with new circumstances for which their earlier and simpler piety now seemed inadequate, if not irrelevant.

Especially in the northern half of the country, where industrialization had advanced further, Protestant clergy searched for fresh answers to growing problems of slums, poverty, crime, child labor, economic exploitation, rootlessness, and hunger. Protestants developed new institutions, notably the Young Men’s and Young Women’s Christian Associations (YMCA, YWCA) to address some of these concerns, whereas another Protestant entity, the SALVATION ARMY, found its special ministry among the urban destitute and demoralized. Pastors and theologians constructed what came to be called the SOCIAL GOSPEL in an effort to move beyond the issue of personal redemption and personal SALVATION: was it perhaps possible to redeem the social order itself?

Congregational clergyman WASHINGTON GLADDEN of Columbus, Ohio, spoke and wrote widely on behalf of a gospel relevant to labor and capital, civic corruption, and municipal reform. Baptist WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH of Rochester, New York, took his cue from ancient prophets of Israel who overthrew dynasties, condemned SIN in high places, fomented rebellion, and “rebuked to their faces kings who had robbed the plain man of his wife or tricked him out of his ancestral holdings.” Academician Richard T. Ely, first Presbyterian and then Episcopalian, declared that the church must turn its attention from the world to come to the world at hand. “I take this as my thesis,” he wrote in 1899, that “Christianity is primarily concerned with this world, and it is the mission of Christianity to bring to pass here a kingdom of righteousness and...redeem all our social relations.”

In the face of radically new circumstances and inescapable new challenges, Protestantism spoke in different tones and addressed different issues. Protestants also saw before them a disturbingly different country. When Congregationalist Josiah Strong in 1885 published his Our Country, the “our” referred to an Anglo-Saxon way of life and predominantly Protestant culture that he saw rapidly disappearing. He intended to raise enough alarms and order enough redirection to set “our country” again on its proper course, but Protestantism in the decades ahead had even more turbulent waters to navigate.

Protestant Advances, Protestant Retreats

For American Protestantism the twentieth century opened on a daringly optimistic note. Methodist layman and visionary organizer, JOHN R. MOTT, published a book in 1900 whose title spoke to and further invigorated that optimistic spirit: The Evangelization of the World in This Generation. The dream was breathtaking, but it was more than an idle dream. Mott himself had organized thousands of college students in the Student Volunteer Movement, starting in 1886, which in the space of only a dozen or so years had, in Mott’s words, “spread from land to land, until it has now assumed an organized form in all Protestant countries.” By the time of World War I, Mott’s organization had sent out more than five thousand volunteers.

The mission dream was even broader than that, however. Congregationalist, Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist churches all had their own mission boards, and the role of women in each case had increased dramatically over the years. Again, by the time of World War I something more than three million American women were involved in the missionary enterprise: as fund raisers, as publicity agents, and often themselves as volunteers abroad in the role of teachers, nurses, doctors, and selfless spouses of officially appointed missionaries. Although World War I interrupted some of these efforts, that international conflict only drove others to greater labors in bringing healing and understanding to injured nations.

In 1919 Presbyterian missionary executive Robert E. Speer sounded every bit as urgent as Mott had in 1900. In his book, The New Opportunity of the Church, Speer urged a redoubled effort on the part of the missionary movement, “an agency of righteousness.” Western civilization, Speer readily conceded, had been guilty of great crimes against humanity: the slave trade, the traffic in alcohol and opium, and many others. Against all this, however, the one element in the West protesting man’s inhumanity to man was the missionary enterprise. “As the years have gone by,” Speer wrote, “it alone has represented in many non-Christian lands the inner moral character of the Western world.” Newer denominations such as the Mormons, the Seventh-day Adventists, and JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES displayed equal if not greater vigor in taking their messages to lands far beyond America’s borders.

Of course the “world” was not evangelized in Mott’s generation or in any other. By the 1930s some in the mainline denominations began to question the emphasis on personal conversions, seeing more justification for the enterprise in the educational and medical benefits it brought to needy countries. Some missionaries, notably Methodist E. Stanley Jones, even spoke of MISSIONS as a two-way street: one learned from the host country (India, in his case) no less than one gave to that country. In a major reevaluation of the whole ambitious effort, WILLIAM E. HOCKING, professor of philosophy at Harvard, chaired a “Layman’s Inquiry” into the previous hundred years of Protestant missions. His report concluded that it was appropriate to give even greater emphasis to Christian service in the form of hospitals, schools, tractors, inoculations, and the like. Personal EVANGELISM was not to be forgotten, Hocking wrote in 1932, but neither should it stand alone.

At least from the time of John Mott, missionaries recognized that denominational labels had little meaning abroad. Often, in fact, they became obstacles to the spread of Christianity. In the first half of the twentieth century, many Protestant clergy concluded that the same was true at home: denominational divisions had become a scandal and a stumbling block. In an effort to reverse the trends toward schism—so evident in American Protestantism—the ecumenical movement got under way in 1908 with the creation of the Federal Council of Churches. Some thirty denominations joined together to give Protestantism a stronger voice, especially when confronted with opposition forces so much better organized than the churches were. Our enemies, said the Federal Council, “so confidently faced a derided Church...because they faced a divided one.” A NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS was born in 1942, bringing greater cooperation among conservative elements not in the Federal Council, and in 1948 the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES appeared on the international scene.

In 1950 the Federal Council was superseded by an even stronger NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE USA, an agency that spoke for a membership of some forty million, although this “speaking” often represented the pulpits more faithfully than the pews. Although largely a Protestant entity, the National Council included some Eastern Orthodox bodies (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN), and invited Roman Catholics to join in its deliberations as “observers.” Then in 1960 a CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION explored the possibility of actual union among such Protestant bodies as Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists (all branches), Disciples, and Episcopalians. By the end of the twentieth century a good deal of steam had gone out of both of these engines of ECUMENISM; nonetheless, denominational families executed some of the broader ideals of the bodies named above.

The northern and southern halves of Methodism had managed to reunite as early as 1939. This body then absorbed a German Methodist group to become in 1968 the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. Congregationalism had united with a small entity in 1931 to become the Congregational Christian Church, then merged with an EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH in 1957 to form the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST. In 1983 the two segments of Presbyterians, divided over slavery, joined to create the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, USA. Lutheranism, badly separated into national groups—for example, German, Swedish, Norwegian, Finnish—began to transcend those national labels in the 1960s; by 1988 this ecumenical evolution led to the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA, by far the largest Lutheran body in the United States. Besides all this merger activity within single denominational families, many serious conversations explored unions that transcended specific ecclesiastical traditions.

Some observers interpreted all of this ecumenical busyness as a sign of weakness rather than of strength, and it is true that among many of these older denominational families membership in the final decades of the twentieth century had declined. For centuries it had appeared that Protestantism in America knew only one direction in which to move: that is, up—to ever larger memberships, ever expanding budgets, ever more impressive architectural achievements. In many elements of the Protestant community that steady upswing had by the year 2000 clearly changed. Yet other Protestant groups showed no signs of waning energies. Pentecostal and Holiness bodies, for example, continued to surge. Southern Baptists, years after others experienced a decline, also peaked in their steady growth. African American denominations generally did better than their white counterparts, whereas the “electronic church” through TELEVANGELISM introduced another element in church growth that is difficult to measure. Whatever the final figures in any given year, Protestants do not speak as confidently as they once did of “our country.”

In the public square Protestants compete with other religious entities, and even more with secular forces, for their share of attention or influence. Protestant clergy no longer serve as presidents of the major educational institutions of the country, nor do they regularly rate as opinion makers on the national scene, as once men like HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK or REINHOLD NIEBUHR did. In the evangelical community BILLY GRAHAM occupies a unique niche, but it is difficult to see a replacement for him on the horizon.

In the political realm, the conservative religious right received much notice for its active involvement in the final decades of the twentieth century. Earlier, in the bruising and brutal battles between FUNDAMENTALISM and MODERNISM of the 1920s and 1930s, the more conservative forces withdrew from political participation. Thus the “religious right” dropped from public view, only to reemerge rather dramatically one-half century later. Of course the Protestant “religious left” had been much in evidence through most of the twentieth century, although it did not arouse the kind of anxieties and fears often associated, legitimately or not, with the “right.” In the twenty-first century some signs appeared that the “right” was once more reverting to its earlier status of a withdrawn, inward-looking, personal purifying spiritual force.

In the new millennium Protestant churches in America found themselves divided on such major questions as vouchers in private schools, prayers in public schools, women in the pulpit (see WOMEN CLERGY), HOMOSEXUALITY, pluralism, PACIFISM, CREATION SCIENCE, BIBLICAL INERRANCY, LITURGY, ecstasy, and the delicate balance between proselytizing and TOLERATION. Protestants no longer thought of empire, but of witness; they no longer spoke with one voice (if they ever did), but with many voices, sometimes in harmony, sometimes in discord.

References and Further Reading

- Baird, Robert. Religion in America. [A critical abridgment with Introduction by Henry Warner Bowden.] New York: Harper & Row, 1970.
- Balmer, Randall. Grant Us Courage: Travels Along the Mainline of American Protestantism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

- Bonomi, Patricia U. Under the Cope of Heaven: Religion, Society, and Politics in Colonial America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.
- Gaustad, Edwin S., and Philip L. Barlow. New Historical Atlas of Religion in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Goen, C.C. Broken Churches, Broken Nation. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1985.
- Handy, Robert T. A Christian America: Protestant Hopes and Historical Realities. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
- Hatch, Nathan O. The Democratization of American Christianity. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Hudson, Winthrop S. The Great Tradition of the American Churches. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953.
- Hutchison, William R. The Modernist Impulse in American Protestantism. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976.
- Marsden, George M. Fundamentalism and American Culture. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Marty, Martin E. Second Chance for American Protestants. New York: Harper & Row, 1963.
- May, Henry L. Protestant Churches and Industrial America. New York: Harper & Row, 1949.
- Noll, Mark A. Between Faith and Criticism: Evangelicals, Scholarship, and the Bible in America. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1986.
- Schmidt, Leigh E. Consumer Rites: The Buying and Selling of American Holidays. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995.
- Stout, Harry S. The New England Soul: Preaching and Religious Culture in Colonial New England. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

EDWIN S. GAUSTAD

UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA

The Uniting Church in Australia was inaugurated in 1977, the result of nearly a century of ecumenical reunion plans among Protestant churches in AUSTRALIA, and the direct result of a variety of renewal emphases that swept through those churches from 1940 to 1970. It combined Methodist, Congregational, and many Presbyterians in Australia into a “uniting” ecumenical church structure that seeks to bring about a larger “united” Church of Australia.

Early twentieth-century Church Union efforts in Australia reflected that country’s involvement in larger globalizing movements for international postal, economic, imperial, and other forms of federation. At the same time as the various Presbyterian churches in Australia were negotiating Federation in the 1880s political federation of the various colonies was also being planned. Models were provided for the union by (to name only the models influential on Australia) GERMANY, IRELAND, INDIA (1947), and Presbyterians had also united in SCOTLAND (1929). Missions work on a cooperative basis was occurring around the world, laying the basis for the global strategies of the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE in Edinburgh in 1910, and the rise of formal ECUMENISM in the International Missionary Committee (1921), the Faith and Order (1927), and Life and Work (1925) movements, and eventually the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1948). For postmillennialists, union seemed the prerequisite for the last great push that would see the world evangelized in this generation. For premillennialists the darkening situation in European and North American cities indicated the need for common action, particularly in the light of the human disaster that was World War I and the rapidity of moral, theological, and cultural change through the 1920s. Close links to the Canadian churches provided models for both negotiation and successful Union and anti-Union activities. The bitterness of the Canadian division inspired Australian Christians to wait for a more auspicious day, and so Union negotiations failed in 1924.

Another Attempt

A number of causes underlay the recommencement of negotiations for Union after World War II: the need for strong church participation in postwar reconstruction; the relativization of denominational differences through common war experiences, declining ethnic homogeneity (see ETHNICITY), and church affiliation, under the pluralizing effects of mass postwar migration; the “moral and spiritual condition of Australia”; and declining public influence of the churches in a period marked by supradenominational problems (the Cold War, the Korean War, political and economic crises in former missionary-receiving countries, Australia's engagement with Asia, etc.). With the rise of neo-orthodox theology (see NEO-ORTHODOXY) defusing the liberal-modernist debates of the 1920s and 1930s, and Vatican II undermining Catholic-Protestant differences, united action in an urbanizing, pluralizing secular Australia seemed increasingly plausible. "Mission" was the consistent theme amid a plethora of more particular reasons as to why the churches should unite, "the hermeneutical key to the Basis of Union and the most important pointer to the Uniting Church's way of being Reformed" (Dutney 1996:32). Issues of social justice (poverty, women's rights, indigenous rights, human identity, etc.) seemed more important than DOCTRINE or even form. A number of institutions gave form to these ecumenical aspirations: the long-standing Australian Student Christian movement; foundation of a national council of churches in Sydney (1946) mediating the continuing international pressure for increased unity of action through the World Council of Churches (1948); a variety of interdenominational agencies such as the Christian Youth Conference, the Australian Commission for Inter-Church Aid, and Australian Frontier; and the United Nations Organization and its various branches, all provided training grounds for future ecumenical leaders, including people such as K.T.Henderson, Malcolm McKay, Gordon Dicker, Davis McCaughey, Alan Walker, and others.

In the increasingly difficult postwar atmosphere, formal negotiations began again in 1954 leading to the appointment of a Joint Commission on Church Unity (JCCU, 1957), including representatives from all three churches. Negotiations were slowed by divergent traditions and theologies. The Presbyterians were a more strongly doctrinal and polity-based church, and negotiators knew that bringing the various state assemblies into the Union would require carryover of this content at least in name, and a strong Basis of Union. Presbyterian objections to "weak theology" in the JCCU's first report (The Faith of the Church, 1961) and proposed episcopacy (see BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY) in its second (The Church—Its Nature, Function and Ordering, 1963) slowed the process. After much wrangling a final version of the Basis of Union was published in 1971, which acted as the basis for voting, by congregation in the Congregational Union (about 90 percent for adherence to Union); in the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Australasia (a majority vote requiring 100 percent adherence); and in state assemblies and the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Australia (leading to a more divided vote, approximately 64 percent of congregations and 69 percent of the membership, choosing to go into Union). The Presbyterian Church of Australia legally reaffirmed its continued existence, and a small number of Congregational churches remained out of the Union in "The Congregational Fellowship." At Union the "new church" (an appellation it denied) and its constituents represented some 12.5 percent of the Australian population. Although figures are difficult to ascertain, census returns suggest that church membership has continued to decline by between 2 and 4 percent every five years, and in 1996 stood at 1,334,900 (7.5 percent of the population). Despite its ethnic congregations, it remains one of the most highly Anglo-Celtic of all denominations, has one of the highest defection rates of youth, and has a comparatively high percentage of its membership over the age of 60 (Bentley and Hughes 1996:ca. 55). Nevertheless there is some evidence that this post-Union shakeout is now stabilizing.

Living with Union

Most partners to union had issues to work through once it was achieved. Property wrangles continued with the PCA for more than a decade, and considerable feeling was generated between old friends and former fellow Congregationalists. It was only with the rise of a post-Union generation that self-definitions that did not rotate around “not being Presbyterian” or “not being Methodist” have begun to arise. The UCA recognized eldership, although not entirely in the form developed among Presbyterians, and the SACRAMENTS of BAPTISM and Communion (see LORD’S SUPPER). Most DEACONESSES of the constituent traditions chose to unite, but access to ordained ministry has since made this order obsolete (see WOMEN CLERGY). The UCA is trinitarian, and the Basis of Union recognized the ancient creeds and the reformational confessions as “instructive,” although not legally binding. It has encouraged equal opportunity at all levels of ministry, as well as supporting links to large Korean, Melanesian, Polynesian, and other ethnic constituencies, and a semiautonomous Aboriginal and Islander Christian Congress (from 1985).

Although adopting the polities of its constituent denominations (hence its executive Standing Committee and triennial national Assembly, based on synodal, presbytery, and parish underpinnings) the UCA has worked hard to shift decision making away from parliamentary procedures toward consensus forums developing out of discussion documents. This has been possible only by the establishment of a significant ecclesial bureaucracy, consisting of more than twenty different agencies (commissions, committees, boards, etc.) of Assembly. Membership consists of adherents, baptized members, members in association, and confirmed members, and ministry consists of “ministers of the Word” and “deacons” ordained by the regional presbytery. Ministers are trained at or through state colleges, the largest of which is the United Theological College in North Parramatta, Sydney, and the Uniting Church Theological Hall at Ormond College, Melbourne. Distance education occurs through Coolamon College in Brisbane, and indigenous training through Nungalinga College (Darwin). It has a very large welfare and community services arm, being perhaps the largest provider of nongovernment community and welfare programs in Australia, operating more than 1,000 property centers in operations ranging from Aged Care to schools to drug rehabilitation and community hospitals.

With other ageing denominations, the UCA has wrestled with identity, a state of flux endemic to an open church that some constituents have felt is better at posing questions than answering them. The UCA was designed as an interim structure in which the old traditions would “die to live again” so that all Australian Christian churches might eventually join in a single Catholic church. Dutney points out that there are no doctrines peculiar to the Uniting Church. Its theology has not essentially been doctrinal but an inevitably conciliar process of dialog (captured in the phrase “A Pilgrim People”) over particular issues mediated by the continuance of older traditions (Wesleyan, Calvinist, evangelical, liberal, etc.) within the church at the local level. The emphasis is on the trajectory from the past rather than on the doctrines established by the (particularly Reformed) past of the church’s traditions. This was a “new way of being Church.” “Doctrine divides” was the old catchcry, “service unites,” and subsequently the UCA has found it easier to provide social services than to come to common understandings on critical issues such as homosexual clergy (see HOMOSEXUALITY), drug policy, and other moral issues. Inevitably the teaching ministry of the church has been in tension with its membership, which was described by the Assembly Commission for Mission in 1994 as “largely pre-critical [and] semi-literalist.” The conclusion reflects considerable disillusion within an intellectualist leadership over their “inflexible” constituency, or the “antiintellectualism” of Australians (McCaughy 1997:7). These are not issues isolated to the UCA, however, and in 2001 the church reentered negotiations toward union with the Anglican Church in Australia, indicating the pivotal role the UCA continues to play in Christian reunion in Australia.

See also Congregationalism; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Methodism; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Bentley, P., and P.J.Hughes. The Uniting Church in Australia. Canberra, Australia: AGPS, 1996.
- Breward, I. “Evangelicals in the Uniting Church.” Uniting Church Studies 2 no. 2 (August 1996):1–7.
- Dutney, A. “Is there a Uniting Church Theology?” Uniting Church Studies 2 no. 1 (March 1996):17–35.
- Engel, F. Times of Change, 1918–1978: Christians in Australia. vol. 2. Melbourne, Australia: Joint Board of Christian Education, 1993.
- Joint Constitution Commission. The Uniting Church in Australia: constitution and regulations (interim) including the Basis of Union. Melbourne, Australia: Joint Board of Christian Education, 1976.
- McCaughy, Davis. “If I had known then what I know now.” In Marking Twenty Years: The Uniting Church in Australia, 1977–1997, edited by W.Emilsen and S.Emilsen. North Parramatta, Australia: UTC Publications, 1997.
- Owen, M., ed. Witness of Faith: Historic Documents of the Uniting Church in Australia. Melbourne, Australia: Uniting Church Press, 1984.
- Being an Elder in the Uniting Church of Australia: A Study Paper*. Sydney, Australia: UCA, 1977.
- Faith and Renewal*. Melbourne, Australia: Joint Board of Christian Education, 1985.
- Synod of South Australia. Charismatic Renewal: A Theological Statement. Adelaide, Australia: UCASA, 1986.

MARK HUTCHINSON

UNIVERSALISM

Universalism, “the belief or the hope that the consummation of all things will be the restoration of all intelligent beings to the image and favour of God[,] has found advocates in every age” (according to William Burt Pope, Wesleyan Methodist theologian, in his Compendium of Theology, revised edition, 1880, Vol. III, p. 129). Origen of Alexandria in the third century hoped that even Satan would be finally converted, and thus “God will be all in all” would be entirely true. Usually, the issue is confined to the final salvation of human beings.

Although there were Universalist congregations in ENGLAND by 1750, there was no DENOMINATION as such professing universalism until the end of the eighteenth century in the UNITED STATES. Universalist churches, growing out of Congregational and Baptist roots, were committed to the independence of local congregations. Local Associations were loose federations, and the Conventions, which began in 1790 at Philadelphia, were consultative rather than regulatory gatherings, although they developed conditions of association and even Articles of Religion. These Articles underwent continuing adaptation. Universalist declarations increasingly expressed sympathy with humanism. The Universalist Church of America elected as its president in 1951 and its General Superintendent in 1953 Brainard F.F.Gibbons, who in 1949 had addressed the General Convention to the effect that Universalism had now passed beyond Christianity and had disavowed many essential Christian doctrines. Having joined with other liberal churches in the 1935 Free Church Fellowship, and then the 1955 Council of Liberal Churches (Universalist-Unitarian), the Universalist Church of America united with the Unitarians in 1961 to form the UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION.

The Universalist theology, in its variant forms, is probably influential far beyond any church. The Universalist question confronts every person responsible for funerals at least throughout the English-speaking world: in the majority of cases of funerals for the unchurched, the mourners expect to be assured, unconditionally, that the deceased is eternally safe.

The first classic of universalist theology is Chauncey’s Salvation of All Men (its later popular title). He begins (Proof 1) with admitting the reality of Original Sin in Adam, but adds that in the New Adam, Christ, all may attain eternal happiness. In Proofs 2 and 3, Christ’s perfect obedience includes his dying for all. For Proof 4, Chauncey argues from the New Testament, especially Romans 5 and Colossians 1, that God’s will is for the full salvation of all creation. Therefore (Proof 5), either in this present state of existence or in the following state, God will finally reduce all things to obedient subjection to the divine will. In Proof 6, Christ’s “mediatory interposition” is all comprehending. This scheme of argument is clearly still markedly biblical, and leans heavily on a Protestant understanding of SIN and redemption. With succeeding writers, especially Hosea Ballou, Universalists move away from any Trinitarian concept of ATONEMENT or of traditional Protestant or Roman Catholic assumptions about original sin or depravity.

The Universalist issue presents Protestantism with several problems that are inherent in the very essence of classical Protestant tenets: GRACE, freedom, FAITH, salvation, witness. The subject may be set out in a series of questions.

Is there a SALVATION? And a salvation from what? Although Balzac was wrong in saying of Protestantism that it “examines beliefs and kills them,” it is true that the questioning of TRADITION on which Protestantism insists does for some lead to skepticism—for example, doubt whether there is a need for salvation, for anything more than decency and toleration. Such a view is a sort of universalism, because these ideals might be thought to be equally open to all humanity. Classical Protestant ORTHODOXY sees humankind as fallen and in need of redemption, and finds the key to that salvation in divine forgiveness to which access is opened by the sacrifice of Christ.

But how universal is that salvation, and on what terms is it available? The controversy between extreme predestinarianism (that God from eternity created some humans who would be granted saving faith and the rest of humanity, who would not believe and be eternally lost), and ARMINIANISM (that God created all humankind able freely to choose to believe and knew from eternity who would freely believe and who would not) is not dead, even if most specialist theologians avoid it. Classic Protestantism is found in KARL BARTH’S suggestion that in the first archetypal human (Adam), all humans are under condemnation, and that in the second Adam (Christ), all are accepted by God.

If salvation (as Protestantism has classically taught) is by means of faith, is this only faith in the Jesus of Nazareth as found in the Gospels? And what degree of knowledge of the historical or scriptural Jesus is required in such faith? Universalism raises the question of whether all religions are the same, or of the same value? It argues that Christianity is absolute only for Christians. The traditional Protestant exposition of revelation, CHRISTOLOGY, and redemption is challenged by the reality of all religious traditions, although this requirement does not entail any assumption that these are all equal in truth or insight. Some theologians have suggested that in Christianity, in its proclamation of a divine-human Savior, we see a fulfillment of both those religions that center on deity and those that center on the self-realization of humanity. Vernon White and others maintain that all of these concerns are brought together by understanding the work of Christ as the core of a universal restorative work of God.

Universalism is also concerned with the question of whether there can be repentance and CONVERSION after DEATH. Thought on these matters is in the end reflection on the moral character of God; that reflection is in turn informed by human self-perception. A major factor in Universalism is the need not to be selfish about “our” salvation.

References and Further Reading

Cameron, Nigel M. de S., ed. Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell: Papers presented at the Fourth Edinburgh Conference in Christian Dogmatics 1991. Carlisle, U.K.: Paternoster Press and Grand Rapids, MI: Baker Book House, 1992.

- Cassara, Ernest, ed. Universalism in America: A Documentary History, Boston, MA: Beacon Press and Toronto, Canada: Saunders, 1971.
- Chauncy, Charles. The Mystery Hid from Ages and Generations, made manifest by the Gospel-Revelation: or, The Salvation of All Men, the Grand Thing aimed at in the Scheme of God; As opened in the New Testament Writings, and entrusted with Jesus Christ to bring into Effect (originally published in London, 1784). New York: Arno Press, 1969.
- Farrer, Frederic W. Eternal Hope: Five Sermons preached in Westminster Abbey, November and December, 1877. London: Macmillan, 1883 (and other editions).
- Punt, Neal. Unconditional Good News: Toward an Understanding of Biblical Universalism, Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1980.
- White, Vernon. Atonement and Incarnation: An Essay in Universalism and Particularity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

DAVID H. TRIPP

UNIVERSITIES

See Higher Education; Seminaries

This page intentionally left blank.

VAN DER KEMP, JOHANNES THEODORUS (1747–1811)

Dutch missionary. A pioneering missionary to the Khoikhoi (Hottentot people) of SOUTH AFRICA, van der Kemp was born in Rotterdam on May 7, 1747. After fourteen years in the Dutch Dragoon Guards he decided to study medicine in Edinburgh, graduating in 1782. In 1791, after the accidental death of his first wife and daughter, van der Kemp underwent a CONVERSION experience. Contact with a MORAVIAN CHURCH congregation aroused his interest in MISSIONS and he was sent by the London Missionary Society to South Africa in 1799. In Cape Town he founded the South African Missionary Society and after moving to Graaff Reinet began work among the Khoikhoi population.

A land grant from the governor of the Batavian Republic in 1803 enabled van der Kemp to establish a missionary settlement called Bethelsdorp. Conflict with the Boers and later, the Batavian government, was precipitated by van der Kemp's antislavery views (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF), his critique of colonial policy, and his illegal education of Khoikhoi and Xhosa children. In 1804 van der Kemp compiled and printed a Khoikhoi CATECHISM—the earliest work printed in an indigenous South African language. Van der Kemp's relationship with the white community deteriorated further upon his marriage in 1806 to Sara van de Kaap, a fourteen-year-old ex-slave.

In 1811 van der Kemp traveled to Cape Town to provide evidence concerning the abuse of the Khoikhoi by white settlers and government administrators. He died there on December 15 after a brief illness, while awaiting the results of the government investigation.

See also Colonialism; Missionary Organizations; Missions, British; Philip, John

References and Further Reading

Enklaar, Ido H. Life and Work of Dr. J. Th. Van der Kemp 1747–1811: Missionary Pioneer and Protagonist of Racial Equality in South Africa. Capetown, South Africa and Rotterdam, The Netherlands: A. A. Balkema, 1988.

Freund, William M. "The Career of Johannes Theodorus van der Kemp and his Role in the History of South Africa." Tijdschrift Voor Geschiedenis 86 no. 3 (1973): 376–390.

JEFF CROCOMBE

VAN DUSEN, HENRY PITNEY (1897– 1975)

North American educator. Born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1897, “Pit” Van Dusen received a B.A. from Princeton University in 1919, a B.D. from Union Theological Seminary in 1924, and a Ph.D. from Edinburgh University in 1932. After completing seminary he worked in the student department of the YMCA and was ordained to the ministry by the Presbytery of New York in 1924, after surviving a challenge based on his unwillingness as a life-long member of the Episcopal Church to affirm or deny the Virgin Birth, thanks in large part to a statement on his behalf by John Foster Dulles, later to become a member of Union’s board of directors and U.S. secretary of state. After traveling the country for two years to visit and study the practices of other schools, Van Dusen began teaching at Union as an instructor in 1926, became dean of students in 1931, Roosevelt professor of systematic theology in 1936, and was elected Union’s tenth president in 1945. He retired in 1963 at the age of 65.

Leader and Educator

Van Dusen was considered one of the major leaders in theological education in the twentieth century. Under his presidency, Union Theological Seminary experienced unprecedented growth and the greatest expansion in its history. Beginning with a faculty of twenty-two, the school had fifty-four faculty members when he retired, and the student body doubled from 300 to 600. The school’s budget quadrupled, and a number of major building projects were undertaken. Even more significantly, Union attained worldwide significance as a center for theological study, with a faculty that included such seminal twentieth-century theologians as REINHOLD NIEBUHR, JOHN BENNETT, and PAUL TILLICH. Van Dusen’s contributions were praised by Union’s faculty and board of directors in their final tributes. “In the long history of the Seminary,” the Faculty declared, “Van Dusen’s presidency stands out as the high-water mark of its achievement. He...enlarged not only the personal and physical resources of the Seminary, but above all, its spirit and its outreach.” He was described by the Board as “one of the first World Churchmen of our era, a scholar, a statesman, a leader, and—not least—a friend.”

Van Dusen also made contributions to theological education through a two-year presidency of the American Association of Theological Schools and by founding the Boston Institute of Theology after his retirement from Union. He also led the Union Settlement Association. His commitment to general education was reflected in his service as trustee of many institutions, including Princeton University, Vassar College, Smith College, and The Rockefeller Foundation. His book God in Education contributed to the debate on religion and the schools. He received honorary degrees from twenty universities, including Edinburgh University.

In 1953 a new kind of scholarship program for theological education was developed by Van Dusen and Nathan Pusey, president of Harvard University, who believed that the quality of those entering the Christian ministry was declining. To remedy the problem they obtained a grant from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund to support a program offering an exploratory year of theological studies for qualified college graduates considering but undecided on a ministerial career. Created in close cooperation with the American Association of Theological Schools, the Rockefeller Brothers Theological Fellowship (also known as the “Trial Year” program) offered five scholarships for the 1954–1955 academic year and forty-six awards the following year. This was the initial program of the Fund for Theological Education (FTE). Scholarships to help African American doctoral students intending to teach in seminaries and other scholarships followed in the years to come.

As one of the driving forces in the ecumenical movement of the early to mid-twentieth century, Van Dusen played a dominant role in the formation of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, in particular in paving the way for the union of the International Missionary Council with that body. His impact also was felt through his leadership of the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia and the Foundation for Theological Education in South East Asia (Dong nan Ya shen xue jiao yu ji jin hui), which was established in 1963 as the successor organization to the Board of Founders of Nanking Theological Seminary, founded in 1937. Van Dusen served as the president of that seminary’s Board of Founders and was the first president of the Foundation from 1952 to 1970.

A Liberal Theology

Van Dusen’s theology was liberal. A student of William Adams Brown, he followed Brown’s christocentric liberal theology. Explaining his belief in the necessity of the Incarnation in an article in Liberal Theology, he stated that if God be thought of in abstract metaphysical categories—infinity, immutability, impassability, substance, essence—incarnation is impossible. But if God be thought of as intelligent, holy, purposeful Personality, he [sic] may become incarnate within the persons of men [sic].... This is the highest if not the only proper meaning of the immanence of God, incarnation.... In Jesus of Nazareth, God himself was present, as fully present as it is possible for him to be present in a truly human life. The identity of Jesus with God was of outlook, of purpose, of will, of compassion. The Christ of Christian history and of present experience should never be thought of except through the clear lineaments of the words, deeds, mind, spirit, [and] faith of the man, Jesus of Nazareth [who] ever afresh lays constraint upon his Movement in the world, holding it more or less true to his mind and faith, and impelling it to new advances for fulfillment of his purposes. This is the most important fact about the Christian religion as an historic reality.

Van Dusen's personal journey of faith was shaped by a number of influences: the evangelical fervor of his early days with the YMCA, his early interest in the fledgling field of Clinical Pastoral Education (he was a close associate of its founder, Helen Flanders Dun-bar), his deep commitment to the ecumenical movement, and in his daily devotions in the chapel services of Union Seminary.

One of Van Dusen's lesser-known but nonetheless highly influential contributions was his indirect role in the development of the Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous (A.A.), written in 1938 by the cofounder of A.A., Bill Wilson, based on Wilson's earlier A.A. "Six Steps." Historians of the recovery movement suggest that these Six Steps were themselves based on six points outlined in a 1934 Atlantic Monthly article by Van Dusen, where he synthesized the findings of thirty Canadian church leaders who had studied and identified six central assumptions of the Rev. Frank N.D. Buchman's Oxford Group movement (later renamed MORAL REARMAMENT), of which A.A. was the major outgrowth. (Van Dusen's exposure to Buchman came through the work of Van Dusen's Princeton mentor, Dr. Samuel Shoemaker, who worked closely with Buchman from the 1920s through the 1930s and was the primary theological guiding force in the formation of Alcoholics Anonymous.) The six assumptions of the Oxford Group were:

- Men are sinners
- Men can be changed
- Confession is a prerequisite to change
- The changed soul has direct access to God
- The Age of Miracles has returned
- Those who have been changed must change others.

To these six Van Dusen added a seventh point, that "the greatest single secret of the Movement's effectiveness [is] the absolutely central place which 'the Group' holds in its mediation of religion."

Death

Ill since 1970 after a stroke, Van Dusen entered into a suicide pact with his wife, Betty (Elizabeth Coghill Bartholomew Van Dusen), who herself suffered from increasingly painful arthritis. Although neither had a terminal illness, both felt themselves to be on a downward course of increasingly poor quality of life. The suicide ended Mrs. Van Dusen's life immediately and Van Dusen's two weeks later due to a sudden, unexpected, acute cardiac arrest, after he had been physically improving. He died on February 13, 1975 at the age of 77. In a letter the Van Dusens left for their three sons and other relatives and friends, they wrote: "Nowadays it is becoming more difficult to die. We feel that the way we're taking will become more acceptable as the years pass." They concluded with this prayer: "O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us. O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, grant us Thy peace." After the couple's deaths Dr. Cyril Richardson eulogized Van Dusen at Union Seminary as "a man of strong personality and inexhaustible energy" who had "what the Germans call 'Unternehmungsgeist,' the spirit, that is, to engage in large enterprises and never to flag in his devotion to them...[who] gave himself to causes with unstinted vigor, and had an unbending sense of duty, but these were mellowed by a rich heart of Christian compassion and forgiveness."

See also Bennett, John; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism; Moral Rearmament; Niebuhr, Reinhold; Seminaries; Temperance; Tillich, Paul; World Council of Churches; YMCA

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Van Dusen, Henry P. God in These Times. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1935.
- . For the Healing of the Nation: Impressions of Christianity Around the World. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1940.
- . What is the Church Doing? New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1943.
- . World Christianity: Yesterday and Tomorrow. Nashville, TN: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1947.
- . Life's Meaning: The Why and How of Christian Living. New York: Association Press (Haddam House), 1951.
- . God in Education: A Tract for the Times. New York: Scribner's, 1951.
- . Spirit, Son and Father: Christian Faith in the Light of the Holy Spirit. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1958.
- . One Great Ground of Hope: Christian Missions and Christian Unity. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1961.
- . The Vindication of Liberal Theology. New York: Scribner's, 1963.
- Van Dusen, Henry P., Robert Lowry Calhoun, Joseph Perkins Chamberlain, et al. Church and State in the Modern World. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1937.
- Van Dusen, Henry P. and David E. Roberts, eds. "The Significance of Jesus Christ." In Liberal Theology: An Appraisal. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1942.

Secondary Sources:

- Brown, Robert McAfee. "Robert McAfee Brown remembers Henry Pitney Van Dusen." Journal of Presbyterian History, 56 (1978):62–78.
- Hammar, George. Christian Realism in Contemporary American Theology; a Study of Reinhold Niebuhr, W.M.Horton, and H.P.Van Dusen. Uppsala, Sweden, Lundequistska bokhandeln, 1940.
- Leitch, Alexander. A Princeton Companion. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Pass It On: The Story of Bill Wilson and How the AA Message Reached the World*. New York: Alcoholics Anonymous World Services, 1984.
- Thompson, Dean K. Henry Pitney Van Dusen: Ecumenical Statesman. Thesis. Richmond, VA: Union Theological Seminary, 1974.

———. “Henry Pitney Van Dusen and the Ecumenical Crossroads at Union Theological Seminary in New York.” Affirmation 6 (1993):147–164.

PAUL WILLIAM BRADLEY

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, RALPH (1872–1958)

English composer. Vaughan Williams is generally regarded as England's greatest composer of the twentieth century. Of mixed English and Welsh ancestry, he was born October 12, 1872 in the village of Down Ampney, Gloucestershire, where his father, Arthur, was vicar of the parish church. His mother, Margaret, was related to the Wedgwood and Darwin families. Ralph (he pronounced the name Rāfe) studied at the Royal College of Music and CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, where he studied history. His teachers included some of the finest musicians of his time: Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Charles Villiers Stanford, Charles Wood, and Alan Gray. He also spent some time in Berlin working with Max Bruch and in Paris, where he became a close friend of Maurice Ravel. In 1897 he married Adeline Fisher, the daughter of a prominent lawyer and tutor to the prince of Wales.

After service in World War I, Vaughan Williams was appointed professor of composition at the Royal College of Music. From 1921 to 1928 he was director of the London Bach Choir. The earliest of his several symphonies, A Sea Symphony, was first performed in 1910. A London Symphony followed in 1914 and A Pastoral Symphony in 1922. The 1930s and 1940s were his most prolific decades and saw the premier of a number of symphonies and works for the stage. In 1935 he was appointed to the Order of Merit, the highest honor bestowed by the British monarchy. His wife died in 1951 and two years later he married Ursula Wood, daughter of Major General Sir Robert Lock and widow of Lt. Col. Michael Forrester Wood. His last symphony, No. 9, was completed in 1958. He died in his sleep, without any long illness, on August 16, 1958.

During his school days at the Charterhouse Vaughan Williams had insisted that he was an atheist. Later, as his second wife said, he drifted into a cheerful agnosticism. He was never a professing Christian, and he left an early position as organist of St. Barnabas church in Lambeth because he was unwilling to comply with the vicar's demand that he receive communion (see LORD'S SUPPER). Nevertheless much of his finest work is religious in character. This includes the "Five Mystical Songs" setting of poems by George Herbert (1911); the "Fantasia on Christmas Carols" (1915); a Mass in G Minor (1922); "Sancta Civitas," a choral work based on texts from the Book of Revelation (1926); a Te Deum (1928) and Magnificat (1932); the anthem "O how amiable" (1934); and a Christmas cantata, "Hodie" (1954). He was active in collecting English folk songs and carols, some of which were incorporated in his choral works, and in the compilation of the English Hymnal (1905), Songs of Praise (1924), and the Oxford Book of Carols (1928). His hymn tunes include "Sine nomine" ("For all the saints"), "Down Ampney" ("Come down, O Love divine"), and "King's Weston" ("At the name of Jesus"). Works for organ include "Preludes on Three Welsh Hymn Tunes," one of which is the popular “Rhosymedre.” His compositions were frequently performed at the Three Choirs Festival and were often directed by the composer himself.

See also Hymns and Hymnals; Music; Music, English Church

References and Further Reading

Foss, Hubert. Ralph Vaughan Williams: A Study. London: Harrap & Co., 1950.

Kennedy, Michael. The Works of Ralph Vaughan Williams. Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Vaughan Williams, Ursula. R. V. W.: A Biography of Ralph Vaughan Williams. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1964.

STANFORD LEHMBERG

VESTMENTS

Vestments are special clothes worn by religious leaders and liturgical ministers that designate their status in the community and their role in the liturgical assembly. Protestants inherited the clerical garb and liturgical vestments that had evolved in the Western Church during the Middle Ages and had to decide whether to retain this vesture. This article traces the development and types of liturgical vestments in the ancient and medieval church, and reviews which vestments were retained or discarded in the Reformation churches. In the course of subsequent Protestant history further decisions were made by churches with regard to clerical garb and liturgical vestments in response to changing tastes and expectations.

Clerical Attire and Liturgical Vestments in the Ancient and Medieval Church

Dress for Worship

As the offices of BISHOP, presbyter, and DEACON developed in the early church, the bearers of these offices were not at first distinguished from other Christians either in everyday dress or in the liturgical assembly other than their social rank. The first pronouncements in the writings of the church fathers on what to wear to worship applied to all Christians. Clement of Alexandria (d. c. 215) called for clothes that are clean and bright. Jerome (d. 420) stated that "We ought not to enter into the holy of holies in our everyday garments, just as we please, when they have become defiled from the use of ordinary life, but with a clean conscience and in clean garments hold in our hands the sacraments of the Lord" (Commentary on Ezekiel 44:17ff.)

The wearing of one's "Sunday best" applied especially to the newly baptized who were to be vested in a clean white garment when they emerged from the pool. The Letter of John the Deacon to Senarius (c. 500) reported that the newly baptized "wear white garments so that, although the ragged dress of ancient error has darkened the infancy of their first birth, the garment of the second birth may symbolize the garment of glory, so that attired in a wedding garment the [newly baptized] may approach the table of the heavenly bridegroom as a new person" (7). In addition to the white garment (alba) the newly baptized wore a linen cloth over their heads to symbolize their priesthood in Christ (the later amice). By the fifth century they wore these baptismal robes during the week of white robes after Easter Day when they attended the mystagogical homilies given by the bishops. Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) admonished the newly baptized on the Octave of Easter not to revert to the old way of the life when they removed their baptismal robes and blended into the congregation.

Clerical Attire

What applied to the LAITY applied all the more to the CLERGY. Origen (d. 253) advised the bishop to wear one set of clothes when performing “the ministry of the sacrifices” and another when going out among the people (Homily on Leviticus 4:6). Jerome added that it does not dishonor God if the clergy wear white tunics at the LITURGY more handsome than the rest (Against Pelagius 1:4). The Canons of Hippolytus prescribe that clergy and lectors “be dressed in white vestments more beautiful than the rest of the people” (Canon 37).

Two factors affected the development of special clerical garb and liturgical vestments. The first was the legalization of Christianity by the emperor Constantine in the fourth century when the emperor honored the bishops with the status and insignia of civil magistrates. Senatorial sandals, the dalmatic (a sleeved coat worn over the tunic), and the ceremonial pallium (a kind of scarf or stole draped over the left shoulder, around and under the right arm, crossed over the breast and then laid over the left arm, leaving the right arm free) became signs of their office. Second, there was a dramatic shift in the style of men’s clothing during the fifth and sixth centuries when the trousers and short tunics of the Germanic peoples replaced the long, flowing tunics of the Romans. Clergy adapted to the changing styles in their everyday dress but retained the older clothing to wear for the liturgies. As a matter of convenience it became the custom to wear the liturgical vestments over one’s street clothing.

A basic clerical garment worn on the streets, but over which the liturgical vestments were donned, is the cassock. It seems to have derived from the barbarian tunic or coat, open in the front but secured with clasps and reaching down to the knees. As emperors wore longer coats reaching to their ankles, clergy followed suit. Although black remained a basic color of clergy cassocks, they could be in other colors as well. Some colors designated ecclesiastical rank: white for the pope, purple for bishops, red for cardinals. Cathedrals and prominent churches sometimes chose their own color for cassocks. Cassocks were worn by lay choir members, vergers, sacristans, and acolytes as well as clergy.

Over the cassock, clergy of the late Middle Ages who were scholars wore an academic gown. These gowns could function as an overcoat and were often fur-lined. They were worn not only by clergy but by scholars, lawyers, magistrates, and other public functionaries. As universities adopted distinctive academic hoods and scarves, these were also worn with the gown on ceremonial occasions, especially in ENGLAND.

Bishops who rode horses when making visitations of parishes adopted a sleeveless cloak called a chimere (perhaps derived from the Spanish zamarra), which would also be worn over the cassock and, in time, over the white tunic also. Doctors of divinity could wear a red chimere, and bishops were usually awarded a doctor of divinity degree because they were teachers of the faith. Hence, the color of the episcopal chimere was red.

Clergy also acquired distinctive headgear for outdoor wear. By the eleventh century the mitre had emerged as the distinctive hat of the bishop. It is so called because of its mitred shape, although it may have originally been a conical cap. Two lappets or fanons hang down the back. Clergy who wore academic gowns on the streets also wore academic caps. Although hats may have been worn indoors for ceremonial purposes, they were removed for prayer.

Liturgical Vestments

The basic liturgical vestment remained the white Roman tunic, or alb. By the eleventh century two developments occurred with the alb. One was that it ceased to be plain and was embroidered with rich apparel around the collar of the amice or neckerchief and on the bottom hem. Second, the wearing of fur or wool cassocks in northern countries required a larger neck opening and slits or billowy sleeves so that it could be donned over the cassock. This style of alb came to be called the surplice, from superpelliceus (“over the fur”). It was worn without an amice or girdle (cincture). A still further variant on the alb was the rochet, which was a sleeveless, ankle-length tunic worn up until the thirteenth century by choristers, sacristans, and servers who had to have their arms free. After that it was designated for bishops, cardinals, and canons regular, and the sleeves were added but gathered at the wrist. The close-fitting alb continued to be worn for the celebration of the Eucharist or mass, whereas the surplice or rochet was used as a choir vestment for the prayer offices or occasional services.

The other major item of clothing that survived from Roman times is the chasuble, which originated from the Roman paenula. This was a poncholike outdoor cloak actually favored by the lower classes that was made of skins or wools and reached down to the calves. Conically shaped, its folds had to be gathered up over the arms when moving about. The nearly universal wearing of this garment by the clergy reflects the places of liturgical assembly: in the catacombs and cemeteries at night, in processions through the streets, and in the cold churches in the lands north of the Alps. As time went on the folds that would have to be gathered over the arms were cut away to allow the arms to be free for handling books, vessels, and other objects. The chasuble became heavily decorated with a large cross embroidered on the back. The cope was a variation on the chasuble in which the conical shape was retained but cut from the neck to the foot and closed in the front with a clasp. Because it was like a cape worn for ceremonial functions, the cope became heavily embroidered and the hood became a kind of shield hung on the back. Chasubles were worn by the celebrant at the Eucharist or Mass, whereas copes were worn by officiants at solemn prayer offices, in processions, and for occasional services. Whereas any officiant, clergy or lay, could wear the cope, only priests and bishops wore the chasuble. Deacons continued to wear the dalmatic and subdeacons wore a slight variation of the dalmatic called a tunicle.

The origin of the stole is uncertain. It probably derives from the Roman orarium, a long towel worn over the left shoulder. The Council of Braga (Spain, 563) associated it with deacons who wore it like a waiter’s towel when preparing gifts for the Eucharist. The Fourth Council of Toledo (633) prescribed the stole to be worn around the neck by bishops just as archbishops would wear the pallium. The Council of Mainz (813) extended the wearing of the stole to the priests. A similar vestment with a practical origin that acquired a symbolic significance was the maniple (mappula), which originated as a ceremonial napkin or hand towel worn over the wrist by officials. It was worn by deacons from the fourth century on to cover their hands when handling eucharistic gifts and vessels. During the early Middle Ages the wearing of the maniple was extended to all major orders of clergy, to be worn from the left wrist only when celebrating the Eucharist.

By the high Middle Ages chasubles and copes, stoles, and maniples were made in various matching colors to symbolically reflect the days and seasons of the church year. A color system was codified for the local Church of Rome by Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) that exerted great influence on later liturgical color schemes: white for feasts of the Lord and saints; red for Pentecost, Holy Cross Day, and feasts of apostles and martyrs; black or purple for penitential seasons (Advent and Lent); and green for ordinary days.

Vestments in the Reformation Churches

The Attitude of the Reformers

MARTIN LUTHER (1483–1546) expressed an indifference toward vestments. In his German Mass and Order of Service (1526) he wrote: “Here we retain the vestments, altar, and candles until they are used up or we are pleased to make a change.” In a humorous letter to George Spalatin, the chaplain to the Elector Joachim II of Brandenburg, who wanted to retain albs and chasubles and processions, Luther wrote that if the elector would allow the gospel and put away superstitious practices, “then in God’s Name, go along in the procession, and carry a silver or golden cross, and a chasuble or an alb of velvet, silk, or linen. And if one chasuble or alb is not enough for your lord the elector, put on three of them, as Aaron the high priest put on three, one over the other.... For such matters, if free from abuses, take from or give to the gospel nothing: only they must not be thought necessary to salvation, and the conscience dare not be bound to them....” In the Lutheran tradition vestments came under the category of ADIAPHORA, or “indifferent things,” matters not of the substance of faith, that could be left free as long as the conscience was not constrained by a required use of them.

The Reformed tradition, on the other hand, took a much more negative attitude toward liturgical vestments and abandoned them entirely, especially those associated with the sacrifice of the Mass. Such vestments were regarded not merely as an object of superstition but had been associated with a sacrilege. In the summer of 1524, partly under pressure from the Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM), HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531) had vestments, along with other costly ornaments, service books, and vessels removed from the churches of Zurich. These iconoclastic actions were replicated in other places where a more radical REFORMATION was implemented, including in England during the Edwardian Reformation.

The Black Gown, Cap, and Scarf

Luther's own practice, when PREACHING, was to wear his doctor's gown (Talar). Although much has been made of the fact that he and other reformers were preaching in their street clothes, given that the gown was not a liturgical vestment, it should be remembered that friars and monks in the late Middle Ages customarily preached in their habits. The only change Luther's practice represents, therefore, is from his monk's habit to the university attire. It is likely that when Luther went to the altar he donned liturgical vestments.

At first both Lutheran and Reformed pastors wore the cassock under the gown, which would have been the conventional street attire of the clergy. In the course of time Reformed pastors abandoned the cassock for ordinary lay clothing, but the gown was still worn in the pulpit. In a process similar to that of the ancient church, therefore, ordinary clothing became a vestment. The academic gown emphasized the concern of the Reformation churches for an educated clergy who were capable of studying the Scriptures and church fathers in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin.

Lutheran clergy did not at first give up wearing the cassock, but during the seventeenth century it was combined with the gown as one vestment in northern GERMANY, DENMARK, and NORWAY. In the seventeenth century it became customary for public officials to wear ruffled collars, and this included clergy. These collars remained a part of clerical attire in Denmark and Norway into the twentieth century. During the eighteenth century in other places, the elaborate ruffs gave way to simpler bands of two strips of white linen (Beffchen) hanging from the neck. The bands were worn by all members of learned professions, not only clergy. King Friedrich Wilhelm I of Prussia made the gown with bands the uniform of Protestant clergy in his realm in 1733 and abolished the chasuble and cope. The combination of cassock and gown with bands, three-cornered hat (chapeau), scarf (tippet), and buckled shoes became the formal court dress of priests and deacons in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The academic cap went with the academic gown and varied in style from place to place. In Germany it took the style of a circular beret. In SWEDEN it took the form of a low-crowned cylindrical cap. In England it was a square cap (the precursor to the mortarboard). Up until modern times these caps often had ear flaps for protection against the cold and could be worn in the churches as well as outdoors.

The academic scarf (tippet) was generally worn only by clergy in England and Norway. In England it was worn hanging around the neck and down the front like a stole, although it is not a stole. In Norway it became a thinner black strip that was sewn onto the cassock-gown. The 1549 BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER-recommended also the academic hood as "seemly" for preachers and the 1604 Canons ordered it for all graduate ministers.

Alb, Surplice, and Rochet

The basic liturgical vestment is a white linen tunic in the style of the alb, surplice, or rochet. The close-fitting alb, with amice-collar and secured at the waist with a cincture, was gradually displaced by the knee-length slit-sleeved surplice or the ankle-length gathered-sleeve rochet in Lutheran use during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The latter was favored for use with the chasuble.

The 1552 Book of Common Prayer of King Edward VI of England abolished the use of chasuble and cope (permitted in the 1549 Prayer Book) but prescribed that the white linen surplice be worn by officiating clergy at all services. This directive was short-lived because of the death of Edward VI and the return of Catholicism under Queen Mary I (1553–1558), although it returned with the restoration of the Book of Common Prayer under ELIZABETH I in 1559. Because the queen as supreme governor of the church demanded conformity in all indifferent matters, Archbishop MATTHEW PARKER published some “Advertisements” in 1566 that were a call to strict conformity. This precipitated the Vestiarian Controversy in which nonconformists (see NONCONFORMITY) within the Church of England protested the binding of consciences by the required wearing of “outwarde apparell.” The Puritans (see PURITANISM) who emigrated to New England discontinued wearing the surplice, but it remained a staple vestment of Anglican clergy worn over cassock or gown with tippet and hood. Bishops wore an ankle-length rochet with sleeves gathered at the wrist by a band over which they wore a red chimere and tippet, which has remained standard Anglican episcopal dress to this day. Cassocks and surplices continued to be worn by choirs in cathedral and collegiate churches.

Chasuble and Cope

Chasubles and copes were retained by Lutherans in northern Germany and in the Nordic countries long after the stole and maniple were allowed to fall into disuse or were officially abolished. This use of alb or surplice and chasuble for Holy Communion (LORD’S SUPPER) and cope for processions survived in northern Germany until the end of the eighteenth century in such local churches as Dresden, Leipzig, Magdeburg, and Nuremberg. In 1733 King Friedrich Wilhelm I of Prussia officially abolished both vestments in his expanded realm, which included Reformed as well as Lutheran populations. In 1740, however, the more tolerant king Frederick the Great permitted their restoration in a number of Berlin parishes, and they were used in St. Nicholas Church until after 1787. By the end of the eighteenth century these vestments were being discarded in favor of the black gown favored by the ENLIGHTENMENT. Chasubles and copes survived, however, in the Churches of Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and FINLAND. The 1685 Rituale of the church in the united Kingdom of Denmark and Norway directed the priest to vest in a black undergarment, a white vestment, and a chasuble at the altar when the bell tolled for the start of the service and to unvest during the closing hymn. The chasuble was to be removed whenever the pastor left the altar (e.g., to go to the font, the pulpit, or the litany desk). At Ante-Communion the priest would not resume wearing the chasuble after the sermon. The Gothic vestments in use in the fifteenth century, knee-length front and back with material on the side cut away to allow arm movement and with a large gold cross embroidered on the back, continued to be the style in Germany, Denmark, and Norway after the Reformation. The “fiddle-back” style of chasuble favored in Baroque Catholicism was introduced in Sweden by King Gustav III. Swedish and Finnish bishops continued to wear the cope with matching stole and mitre and pectoral cross as episcopal dress. They also continued to carry a crozier (shepherd's crook) in their own diocese.

In England chasubles and copes, which had been permitted in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer, were generally discouraged and were definitively abolished in 1552. Such vestments were either confiscated by sheriffs or remade into paraments for the new communion tables that replaced the old stone ALTARS. Copes were allowed again in 1559 because they were not associated with the Mass, and were probably worn for the Holy Communion as well as the Ante-Communion in some places. Canon XXIV in 1604 ruled that the principal minister of Holy Communion in cathedral and collegiate churches should wear a colored cope over a plain alb.

No Vestments

As a matter of principle the sixteenth-century Anabaptists and seventeenth-century BAPTISTS es chewed all vestments. Few Anabaptist or Baptist leaders were university educated, so not even the black gown was worn by their pastors. As a matter of practicality, those pastors and preachers who tended scattered congregations on the North American frontier on horseback seldom packed gowns or vestments in their saddlebags.

The Revival of Vestment

In Anglicanism

The neo-medievalism of the Cambridge Ecclesiological Movement in England (not to be confused with the more theological OXFORD MOVEMENT) fostered the revival of Gothic architecture as the most appropriate form of church architecture. Allied with the Victorian neo-gothic revival, Ritualists advocated the restoration of the Gothic chasuble with matching stole and maniple for the celebration of Holy Communion. The mass production of these vestments in the late nineteenth century and their marketing by church supply companies promoted their rapid acquisition in parishes as the principles of the Oxford and Cambridge movements made inroads in ANGLICANISM in Great Britain and North America. The solemn celebration of Mass in Anglo-Catholic parishes also led to the restoration of matching dalmatics and tunics for the roles of the deacon and subdeacon. Interestingly, acolytes, crucifers, thurifers, and even choristers sometimes wore the shorter cottas of the Roman style rather than the knee- or ankle-length surplices of northern Europe.

In Lutheranism

The romantic revival did little to affect vestments in European LUTHERANISM. The alb and chasuble never made a comeback in Germany, although surplices or rochets continued to be worn over gowns in Saxony and in the Slavic countries. The chasubles retained in the Nordic Churches continued to be Gothic-style vestments, although these became more fulsome in the twentieth century and matching stoles were restored.

An interesting evolution occurred in North American Lutheranism. Where vestments were worn at all, they tended to be black clergy gowns, with ruffs or tabs (bands) in the Scandinavian synods. Where choirs were vested, they also wore academic-type black gowns. In Swedish and Finnish congregations pastors wore the knee-length frock coat with white tabs typical of the street wear of their European counterparts. In lieu of a gown they might wear the long black preaching cape also worn for non-Communion services by their European counterparts. By the beginning of the twentieth century colored stoles were being introduced that were worn over the gown, although by the 1920s cassock, surplice, and colored stole began to become popular, and by the middle of the twentieth century this combination had become the most common form of vesture in all branches of American Lutheranism (see LUTHERANISM, UNITED STATES). The use of cassocks also required the wearing of Roman collars. As in Episcopal parishes, choirs and servers in Lutheran congregations were also turning to cassocks and cottas. Albs and chasubles began to appear in a few American Lutheran congregations in the 1950s and 1960s.

In Mainline Protestantism

The conditions of church life in frontier American discouraged the wearing of vestments or even formal clergy streetwear. Still, as churches became more respectable there was an expectation that clergy would wear formal men's attire to conduct Sunday morning services. In the late nineteenth century this meant the Prince Albert coat, which was an old-fashioned cutaway coat with tails, and striped trousers. By the 1920s the black "Geneva gown" (combined cassock and gown) sometimes with tabs (attached to Roman clerical collars) was making a comeback in Presbyterian and Reformed Churches. Methodist clergy (see METHODISM) also wore a black clergy gown, but without tabs. By the middle of the twentieth century many Methodist clergy were wearing colored stoles over their gowns. This became typical also of Congregationalist pastors (see CONGREGATIONALISM), who brought such vesture into the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

The Renewal of Vestments

The most remarkable development of the late 1960s to early 1970s was the use of the cassock-alb in those churches in which clergy wore the basic white tunic. This all-purpose vestment was adopted almost overnight by Roman Catholic priests and American Lutheran pastors. A practical vestment, it is usually put on like a coat rather than over the head. The amice as such was discarded, although it survives in the collar of the alb. In an effort to recapture the long flowing character of the ancient Roman tunic, cinctures were sometimes also discarded. The next development was the chasuble-alb, which was a fulsome vestment worn in place of both with the stole placed over it. In another development, a simple, unadorned, but fulsome chasuble in a lighter version of the liturgical color was worn over the alb but with the stole in the contrasting liturgical color worn on top of it. An attempt to revive the ancient conicle chasuble proved unsuccessful. The more prevalent and traditional use has been to wear the stole under the chasuble, held in place by being slipped through loops in the cincture. Some Methodist, Presbyterian, and United Church of Christ clergy have also adopted the cassock-alb and stole as standard vesture. It has thus acquired a kind of ecumenical appeal. In churches in which the clergy wear the cassock-alb, assisting ministers, servers, and choirs have followed suit.

The Geneva gown is still the preferred vestment in Reformed Churches, although in an age of liturgical renewal in which the celebrative character of Christian worship has been emphasized, there has been objection to its dark, somber color. As a result, it has been replaced with softer-colored academic gowns (e.g., blue or white) with hoods (usually red for a degree in theology). The use of academic hoods and gowns with doctoral bars (because of the prevalence of doctor of ministry degrees) still emphasizes the academic expectations of Reformed clergy. Sometimes in an effort to distinguish preaching gowns from regular academic gowns, crosses are stitched onto the breasts or sleeves of the garment. Choirs have also retained the use of academic-type gowns, but often in bright colors with ersatz satin hoods or stoles, especially in the African American Churches.

In many Protestant traditions the use of vestments for clergy continues to be rejected. Pastors in these churches wear a plain dark business suit in which to lead worship. In churches that offer contemporary worship or SEEKER services (see SEEKER CHURCHES), the pastor might not wear a suit at all, but casual slacks and sport shirt. Nor would the musicians be vested.

The Meaning of Vestments

In the Middle Ages there was a tendency to give an allegorical meaning to all vestments. Those worn at Mass were interpreted in the medieval commentaries on the mass (Expositiones missae) in the light of the overall interpretation of the Mass as a dramatic reenactment of the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary. Thus, the chasuble represented the cross, in view of the large crosses embroidered on the back of the chasuble; the alb signified the gown given to Christ after his scourging; the amice symbolized the crown of thorns. This kind of interpretation undoubtedly contributed to the Reformed rejection of all vestments associated with the Mass.

Some symbolic interpretation of vestments that survive from antiquity is inevitable. Perhaps less farfetched than the interpretations in medieval commentaries, but still allegorical, is the symbolism of the alb as the baptismal robe put on by the newly baptized to signify their putting on of Christ and being covered with his righteousness, the stole as the yoke of Christ, and the chasuble as the seamless robe of Christ. However, the basic meaning of vestments is that they signify continuity with the church down through the ages. This is why if vestments are worn they ought to be those that evoke a memory of the church in its formative age.

Vestments serve to diminish the personality of the minister and to emphasize his or her role in the assembly. This suggests different vestments for different ministers. All ministers, lay and ordained, might wear the alb as the baptismal vestment of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS, but only ordained ministers should wear the stole. Any presiding minister, lay or ordained, might wear the cope in processions or at solemn prayer offices, but only ordained ministers should wear the chasuble at the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper. On the other hand, the fact that some ministers do not wear vestments, such as those who serve as ushers or gift-bearers or communion ministers, is also significant because it witnesses to the fact that the divine liturgy remains connected with everyday life in this world. Because vestments cover personality, wearing jewelry, including pectoral crosses, is inappropriate, except for bishops for whom the pectoral cross is a symbol of office.

Vestments serve to indicate the different character of the different services. The tight-fitting alb was worn for the Eucharist or Holy Communion, which requires more preparation. The looser-fitting surplice was worn for the daily prayer offices because the ministers or choir could come from other activities and slip it on more easily than the alb. The chasuble was reserved for wear only at the Eucharist. The stole has become the sign of ordination and therefore it is appropriately worn by ordained ministers for all liturgical functions exercised by the minister of word and sacrament, such as preaching, BAPTISM, CONFESSION, and Communion as well as at MARRIAGE, ordination, and funeral liturgies. However, it need not be worn at liturgical offices that do not usually require ordained leadership, such as the daily prayer offices.

Vestments add beauty, dignity, and festivity to the liturgy. The beauty of vestments derives from their material rather than from lavish ornamentation. Natural materials such as linen, silk, and wool are preferred. Vestments themselves are symbols and do not need other symbols added to them. In view of the association of the chasuble with the mass-sacrifice in the medieval commentaries, Protestants avoid having large crosses embroidered on them—or crowns of thorns, doves, or flames of fire. The plain fabric should have a dignity of its own. The colors of the outer vestments are bold: deep blue for Advent, gold on white for Christmas and Easter, unbleached earthen color or purple for Lent, deep red for Passion Sunday and Holy Week, fire red for Pentecost, and bright green for the time after the Epiphany and after Pentecost.

References and Further Reading

- Cope, Gilbert. "Vestments." In The Westminster Dictionary of Worship, edited by J.G.Davies, 365–383. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1972.
- Dearmer, Percy. The Ornaments of the Ministers. London: AR Mowbray, 1920.
- Laurance, John D.S.J. "Vestments, Liturgical." In The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship, edited by Peter E. Fink, S.J., 1305–1314. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1990.
- Piepkorn, Arthur Carl. The Survival of the Historic Vestments in the Lutheran Church after 1555. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Seminary, 1956.

Pocknee, E.E. Liturgical Vesture. Westminster, MD: Canterbury Press, 1960.

Reed, Luther D. Worship, 298–310. Philadelphia, PA: Muhlenberg Press, 1959.

FRANK C.SENN

VISSER'T HOOFT, WILLEM ADOLF (1900–1985)

Ecumenical Statesman Visser't Hooft epitomized the tensions in global religious developments during the twentieth century. Born in the Dutch town of Haarlem, Visser't Hooft earned a doctorate in theology from the University of Leiden in 1928 and contributed to the development of global ECUMENISM.

Three influences shaped Visser't Hooft's THEOLOGY. The Dutch Student Christian Movement introduced the dynamics of God's calling on individual lives; JOHN R. MOTT (1865–1955) inclined him toward MISSIONS and global evangelization; and KARL BARTH (1886–1968) contributed a foundation for truth that validated the other two influences in an increasingly relativistic era.

Between 1924 and 1966 Visser't Hooft held numerous leadership positions with the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), the World's Student Christian Federation, and finally the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. As global ecumenical trends developed, his speaking, lecturing, and travels increased, and his friendship with JOSEPH H. OLDHAM (1874–1969) proved mutually beneficial.

Visser't Hooft affirmed christocentric pluralism for Christian engagement of world religions. He worked to effect a unified Christendom to produce a vital witness of Christ's uniqueness in an increasingly syncretistic world. Effective Christian communication, Visser't Hooft sensed, required Christians to excise the cultural beliefs thrust upon them by their own cultures' assimilation processes, especially in the West, and to proclaim a Christ free from imposed values who exists cosmically for the entire world. He considered this a worthy revitalization of Christian theology.

The antinomy in his thought was to affirm an absolute and unique Christ with the need for global evangelization to stem chaotic religious drift on the one hand, while adopting the dialectical and relativistic theology of contemporary neo-orthodox thinkers on the other. For Visser't Hooft, the Archimedian point of truth he affirmed when he encountered Barthian theology ironically proved to aid naturalistic assumptions regarding cultural determination of religious experience in a closed universe rather than renewing Christ's uniqueness in a syncretistic age.

References and Further Reading

Selected Primary Sources

Memoirs. London: SCM Press, 1973.

No Other Name: The Choice Between Syncretism and Christian Universalism. London: SCM Press, 1963.

None Other Gods. London: SCM Press, 1933.

The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1982.

Secondary Sources

Gérard, François C. The Future of the Church: The Theology of Renewal of Willem Adolf Visser't Hooft. Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series; Pittsburgh, PA: Pickwick Press, 1974.

Moulder, D.C. "'None Other Gods'—'No Other Name.'" Ecumenical Review 38 (1986): 209–215.

Visser't Hooft, Willem Adolph, and A.J. Van der Bent. Voices of Unity: Essays In Honour of Willem Adolf Visser't Hooft on the Occasion of His 80th Birthday. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1981.

KEITH E.EITEL

VOCATION

In Protestant belief and practice, vocation is not limited to the work of the clergy, but includes every activity that fulfills the design of God's creation. All have divine vocations that enables them to live out the calling that comes with BAPTISM.

Before the sixteenth century religious tasks of contemplation and priesthood took a privileged place in society. In the Middle Ages vocation would be ordinarily pursued in places specially set aside for that purpose, and monasteries and convents were the places where religious life was to be lived.

Protestantism expanded the perimeters of the meaning of vocation beyond the walls of religious establishments to include all pursuits of livelihood. Now all jobs came under the category of vocation, inasmuch as they participated in God's care of the created world, whether they were conducted in a bakery, a shop, or a cathedral. One was no longer called out to serve God, but was called in the world to serve God. Vocation was no longer determined by the service one rendered to the CHURCH, and came to mean whatever one did for a living. It was a way in which God provided the daily bread. Historians commonly attribute this extended meaning of the term "vocation" to MARTIN LUTHER, who formulated the theology of work in terms of the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS.

The traditional notion of a higher calling in ecclesiastical duties may have enhanced the AUTHORITY of the church in medieval times, but Luther called the distinction between spiritual estate and temporal estate a church-sponsored deceit. Other Protestant leaders went as far as to caricature it as timorous flight from the world.

JOHN CALVIN added a new dimension to the democratic notion of vocation, as he redefined calling as what the believer chooses to do for the glory of God. One was not simply called to carry out a function ordained for him or her in the society; God's creature was to identify the work through which she or he could glorify God.

Vocation in Relation to Baptism and Ordination

Prior to the sixteenth century, the concept of vocation was associated with either entry into monastic life or ordination to the priesthood. Protestant theology, as it regards lay people's work as valuable in God's sight as that of the CLERGY, has shifted the liturgical context of recognizing vocation from ordination to baptism. In baptism one is called to live a life that builds up the body of Christ, and the baptized pursue their vocation for the well-being and health of the community of faith.

In the actual practice among the Protestants, however, the newly recognized value of the common people's work did not necessarily downgrade the role of religious workers. Most Protestant traditions continued celebrating ordination as a communal event in which the believing community recognized the calling of teaching, PREACHING, and preserving the purity of the church, even though none listed it as one of the traditional seven SACRAMENTS. Only a few Protestant traditions discontinued the practice of ordination of the clergy, given that the ritual seemed to communicate residual distinction between religious vocations and nonreligious tasks. The Anglican tradition maintained the clear distinction between religious priesthood and everyday work, but have embraced the Protestant notion of vocation and affirmed the value of secular jobs as equal to that of the clergy. In the Protestant theology of work, the ordained office was no longer the only form of vocation, but the clergy's work had a special role in the sense of enabling the members of the body of Christ to fulfill their own form of serving the creator.

As one serves God's calling in what God has created him or her to do in life, LITURGY is no longer an event of the sanctuary; rather the entire world becomes the sanctuary. Interestingly enough, the Protestant emphasis of the vocation of people restores the root meaning of the word liturgy, which came from a Greek word leitourgia, meaning "the public service."

Vocational Ethics

Sociological studies have often linked the Protestant view of vocation with productivity. In the early twentieth century, MAX WEBER identified the entrepreneurial INDIVIDUALISM of Protestant ethics as a major force behind modern capitalism. Protestantism may have indeed offered an ambience in which capitalism grew in the twentieth century; however, the modern secularized form of entrepreneurialism could not be further away from the Protestant notion of vocation because it defines the value of a person in terms of how much he or she produces. The value of vocation does not lie in production, but in service.

Luther maintained that a Christian person was given freedom to serve all, while being a servant to none but God. Vocation was the context in which one put the freedom of service into practice. Luther displayed a great deal of confidence in the symbiotic relationship of the kingdom of God and the kingdom of the earth as two compatible arenas of Christian vocation, but Calvin regarded it necessary for the believer to assess the value of each work that one does in the sinful world. For Calvin, the world was a place that needed God's work of SALVATION, and human work had to be evaluated in terms of one's service for the neighbor.

Vocation in the New Millennium

Vocation in Protestantism has the potential of realizing the truly democratic world in which every form of productive lifetime work is valued as God's design and desire, instead of having a certain form of work as divinely privileged. The affirmation of all forms of labor has imparted heavenly meaning to earthly endeavors.

The Protestant THEOLOGY of vocation faces a serious challenge, however, when it is used to support the status quo, as if social locations are part of God's immutable design. PURITANISM has often been cited as an example for a strand in Protestantism that believed each person had a preordained role in his or her post in the community. One was to make austere efforts in order to carry her or his vocation apart from how he or she may feel about it. One was required to be happy about the work God assigned for each member of the community. While the Puritan view envisioned a community of the willing under all circumstances and evoked energy and dedication to work with gladness in hardy places like wilderness, the conservative work ETHICS was not equipped to address issues of institutional exploitation in the world where labor turned into a commodity.

The tendency toward conservatism in the theology of vocation made its most crude appearance in the nineteenth-century hymn of "All Things Bright and Beautiful." Originally it had the following refrain, which has been left out in modern hymnals: "The rich in his castle, the poor at the gate, God made them high and lowly and ordered their estate." In such an interpretation of Protestant vocation one was consigned, or even condemned to his or her social location.

The historical legacy of Protestantism offers a corrective to the misunderstanding of the doctrine of vocation as an endorsement of the status quo because the theology of vocation as originally envisioned by the reformers was meant to bring down the wall of separation of the privileged religious work and the faithful life of service. JOHN CALVIN noted that the faithful practice of vocation seeks justice in God's creation. Labor that pursues God's desire for justice is to be considered in consonance with the Protestant theology of vocation.

References and Further Reading

- Froehlich, Karlfried. "Luther on Vocation." Lutheran Quarterly 13 (Summer 1999):195–207.
- Klein, Krista R. "The Lay Vocation: At the Altar in the World." In Being Christian Today: An American Conversation, 197–210. Washington, D.C.: Ethics and Public Policy Center, 1992.
- Kolden, Marc. "Work and Meaning: Some Theological Reflections." Interpretation 48 no. 3 (1994):262–271.
- Marshall, Paul A. A Kind of Life Imposed on Man: Vocation and Social Order from Tyndale to Locke. Toronto, Canada/ Buffalo, NY: University of Toronto Press, 1996.

Volf, Miroslav. Work in the Spirit: Toward a Theology of Work. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991.

JIN HEE HAN

VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES

Historians and sociologists, echoing the French politician ALEXIS DE TOCQUEVILLE'S (1805–1859) observations during the 1830s, have long recognized the centrality of voluntarism in American religious and cultural life. The separation of CHURCH AND STATE inscribed religious choice in the nation's legal framework, and denominations themselves constitute essentially voluntary organizations. Almost immediately following the adoption of the Constitution, a bewildering array of voluntary societies appeared on the American landscape. Organizations dedicated to distributing Bibles and tracts, reforming morals, establishing SUNDAY SCHOOLS, encouraging TEMPERANCE, supporting missionaries, and promoting myriad other causes emerged in the nation's villages, towns, and metropolises. Although these societies flourished within the UNITED STATES, they actually owed much to a transatlantic evangelical impulse. Many American organizations explicitly modeled themselves on European predecessors, receiving their initial inspiration and funding from abroad. Several matured into enduring national institutions and continue to exert an important influence on religious life. Others rededicated themselves to more secular purposes. By the early twentieth century, voluntary societies constituted a critical component of the nation's charitable and benevolent infrastructure. These organizations increased and diversified as the twentieth century wore on. Evangelicals and fundamentalists (see EVANGELICALISM; FUNDAMENTALISM), often isolated within the established denominations, proved especially successful in establishing a broad range of parachurch agencies to promote their perspectives. Many mainliners followed suit, and some sociologists have argued that special-purpose voluntary associations remain the most important religious groupings in the late twentieth century.

Antebellum Societies

Alexis de Tocqueville's influential and shrewd analysis of American antebellum CULTURE laid much of the framework for later scholarly discussions. Writing in the 1830s, he noted the propensity for Americans of all ages, classes, and dispositions to gather themselves into associations for a variety of social and reformist purposes. De Tocqueville argued that the peculiarities of democratic life, the absence of fixed classes, and the lack of state-supported churches produced a unique environment that stimulated voluntary activity. Citizens gathered together to reform morals, monitor deviance, establish educational institutions, and dispense CHARITY. Subsequent social observers, ranging from English historian James Bryce (1838–1922) to German scientist MAX

WEBER (1864–1920), have echoed these observations and characterized America as a nation of joiners. Historians have often emphasized the quintessentially Protestant aspects of voluntarism, arguing that the heterogeneous and competitive American religious milieu encouraged like-minded people to gather together in societies and denominations in order to promote their particular views. Many studies linked voluntary religion with Protestant revivalism (see REVIVALS), noting the correspondence between intense evangelical activity and the founding of social reform agencies.

Contemporary scholarship has modified earlier assumptions about antebellum voluntary societies and broadened the discussion in several ways. First, the traditional emphasis on the uniquely American nature of voluntarism seriously understated international influences. Recent literature has underscored the extent to which antebellum American evangelicals operated within a well-defined transatlantic context, as people and ideas traveled back and forth between the European and American continents. Many of the most successful early nineteenth-century voluntary agencies explicitly modeled themselves on European precedents. The AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY (1816), for example, copied its constitution, administrative structure, and distribution policies virtually verbatim from the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY (1804). Sunday school organizers in Philadelphia and Pawtucket during the 1790s drew heavily on the work and philosophy of ROBERT RAIKES (1735–1811) and other British evangelicals. The Young Men's Christian Association (see YMCA, YWCA) actually originated in ENGLAND in 1841, and was only introduced in Boston, New York, and Montreal a decade later. A broadly cosmopolitan outlook and participation in a transatlantic world of business, benevolence, and philanthropy informed the founders and early managers of all of these new national voluntary institutions.

Second, although antebellum societies found fertile ground throughout the entire United States, they appeared especially prolific among individuals and groups affected by the Second Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) and its theological currents. Several community studies that have examined religious life in the evangelically charged region of upstate New York uncovered full-blown association fever in the early 1830s. Dynamic and prosperous cities like Rochester and Albany, thriving canal towns and sleepy villages in Oneida County, and country hamlets in Cortland County all boasted their share of BIBLE, tract, temperance, and moral reform societies. Larger cities proved particularly hospitable venues as well. New York City Christians established independent associations to support Protestant missionary work overseas, distribute Bibles among the poor, circulate religious tracts, combat PROSTITUTION, expose sexual immorality, promote total abstinence from alcohol, advance both the abolition of SLAVERY and the cause of African colonization in LIBERIA, mandate proper observance of the Sabbath, and advocate all manner of social causes. Individuals often participated in several organizations, but each society carefully cultivated its own autonomy. In subtle ways, the voluntary associations sometimes competed with churches for moral influence and monetary contributions, thus fragmenting religious AUTHORITY and encouraging heterogeneity in many communities.

Third, voluntary societies played an important role in the formation of an aggressively activist and increasingly self-conscious middle class. Although reformers rarely achieved all of their goals or satisfied their lofty expectations, membership in voluntary crusades often produced or reinforced transformations in the lives of the participants. Volunteers typically pledged to uphold the virtues, subscribe to the moral tenets, and exercise the self-restraint that scholars associate with modern middle-class life. Prohibitionists and teetotalers, for example, won few legislative victories in antebellum America, but members of such organizations as the American Temperance Union (1836), Washington Temperance Society (1840), and the Sons of Temperance (1843) publicly proclaimed their own virtues through parades, personal testimonies, and participation in the movement. Voluntary societies offered them the opportunity to assert their piety and institutionalize their values.

Finally, membership in these organizations ranged across the entire social spectrum, but individual societies often remained segregated by class, race, and GENDER. Some organizations catered specifically to working-class whites, while others attracted upwardly mobile country boys who recently arrived in the city. Free blacks established their own institutional infrastructure, and the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (AME) promoted a full range of voluntary societies among its members. Evangelical WOMEN played an especially important role in inventing, administering, and financing many charitable and benevolent organizations. Religious societies provided a socially acceptable outlet for wealthy women wishing to exert and enhance their public influence. Some women's societies functioned merely as auxiliaries and remained subservient to male-dominated benevolent boards. Others exhibited considerable independence and challenged gender roles. In sum, an astounding array of organizations dedicated to addressing specific local problems, reforming broad societal ills, and promoting the spread of Christianity established themselves within American culture by the 1850s.

Disintegration, Institutionalization, and Change

The subsequent histories of these antebellum societies reveal widely varied patterns. Some single-issue associations died out rapidly. The New York Female Moral Reform Society, established by middle-class Christian women in 1834 and boasting auxiliaries in Boston and throughout New England, offers one example. Members organized sidewalk patrols, stationed themselves outside brothels to embarrass potential patrons, supported a Magdalen Asylum designed to rescue prostitutes and train them for work as domestics, and published the names of males who frequented bawdy houses. Despite an initial wave of publicity and popularity, the movement quickly declined and virtually suspended operations by the late 1830s. Prostitutes proved resistant to reform, some religious leaders blanched at open discussion of sexual issues, and surveillance techniques proved more effective in theory than in practice.

Other voluntary societies successfully institutionalized, becoming important and enduring presences on the Protestant landscape. The American Tract Society (ATS), for example, was founded in New York City in 1825 as a centralized federation to coordinate the work of dozens of local and regional organizations. It quickly emerged as one of the largest and most innovative publishing houses in the United States, printing and circulating a diverse product line of moral reform pamphlets, children's stories, and Christian classics. The ATS implemented the most modern printing technology, replaced volunteer local distributors with a committed corps of traveling paid colporteurs, formalized its managerial structure, centralized its operations, and carefully managed its growing endowment. Despite social strains and periodic tensions within its pandominational coalition, the tract society survived and prospered by altering its mission at key moments. It established a close working relationship with the Freedman's Bureau and produced educational literature for emancipated slaves in the late 1860s, and revived its fortunes again in the late 1940s by forging closer ties with evangelical and fundamentalist Christians. Although its core purpose remained relatively constant, the ATS adapted its practices and procedures to thrive and prosper.

The YMCA pursued a different path, yet also successfully negotiated social change to survive and persist. Initially, the founders promoted a series of moral associations and programs designed to attract a particular audience: anonymous young men from the countryside who flocked to major urban centers in the mid-nineteenth century seeking fame and fortune. YMCA administrators hoped that reading rooms, Christian dormitories, Bible study programs, and street EVANGELISM might counteract the more dubious lures of saloons and morally disreputable boarding-houses. By the late 1860s, YMCA executives believed that they could reach young men most effectively through a structured program of wholesome leisure activity. Gymnasiums, body-building equipment, bowling alleys, and swimming pools soon became synonymous with the urban "Y." The organization founded Springfield College to train YMCA executives and secretaries, institutional theorists invented basketball to promote cooperative values and morally upright recreation, and outdoor camping became a staple of the organization's programs. Christian critics in the late twentieth century complained that institutional administrators had removed the "C" from YMCA, and that evangelicalism had taken a back seat to professionalization within the movement. Clearly, the organization did aggressively cultivate new constituencies among women and non-Protestants, downplay evangelical activities in favor of general social and recreational functions, and emphasize building programs in its effort to influence youths and young men. Some viewed this as diluting Christian intent; others saw it as broadening the institutional mission in response to altered circumstances. The conflict illustrated tensions that often surfaced within voluntary societies as they matured and responded to historical change.

New voluntary societies, often with explicitly charitable and philanthropic purposes, continued to appear throughout the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Many responded explicitly to INDUSTRIALIZATION and the widening economic disparities that characterized modern American life. Important broadbased organizations often emerged from somewhat narrower religious roots. The Volunteers of America (VOA) was founded by Maud (1865–1948) and Ballington Booth (1859–1940) in 1896 as a result of familial and institutional schisms within the SALVATION ARMY. Storefront missions that dispensed warm clothes and hearty meals along with the message of personal salvation characterized early VOA relief efforts for the poor. The Booths also hoped to uplift their middle- and upper-class supporters by promoting an ethic of volunteerism and bridging their social distance from poorer Americans. Eventually, the VOA evolved into a more comprehensive agency that focused on providing quality affordable housing, advocating programs for abused and neglected children, offering services for the homeless, and operating nursing facilities and residential assisted-living complexes. Over 11,000 employees and 300,000 volunteers contributed to an agency whose budget exceeded $450,000,000 by the turn of the twenty-first century.

Recent Trends

Voluntary societies exercised an even greater influence within late twentieth-century American Protestantism. Special-purpose groups expanded in size and scope, even as many denominations contracted and struggled to maintain their traditional audiences. Several distinctive features of twentieth-century religious associational life deserve notice. First and perhaps foremost, fundamentalist and evangelical movements have established and created many of the most dynamic new societies. Beginning in the late 1920s, the modernist triumph within major mainline denominations caused many religious conservatives to look elsewhere for institutional support (see MODERNISM). Fundamentalists and evangelicals created their own networks of parachurch organizations, independent ministries, educational institutes, youth groups, and missionary agencies that transcended denominational lines. By the 1950s, distinctive evangelical and fundamentalist subcultures existed, grouped largely around these new institutions. Many contained a global focus. A few enduring examples convey the flavor of the movement. WORLD VISION (1950) developed an international evangelization program, supported child sponsorship efforts for Korean War orphans, and eventually created wide-ranging emergency relief programs in AFRICA and LATIN AMERICA. YOUTH FOR CHRIST emerged from a series of independently sponsored rallies into a tightly coordinated program that sponsored Bible clubs and evangelized young people throughout the nation. The BILLY GRAHAM Evangelistic Association (1950) drew unprecedented numbers of supporters, pioneered in developing broad-based Christian crusades, carried out wide-ranging world ministries, sponsored important international conferences, and eventually institutionalized into a powerful and enduring organization that redefined evangelicalism for many Americans.

Second, governmental policies have stimulated contemporary Christians to establish voluntary societies around single issues and crusades. School PRAYER, ABORTION rights, CREATION SCIENCE, the peace movement, environmentalism, civil rights, poverty, women's liberation, and church/state issues all mobilized Protestants. Robert Wuthnow, who has studied special purpose groups in great detail, has argued that members tend to fall into two general clusters. One set of overlapping organizations consists of healing and prison ministries, Bible study groups, charismatics, and Christians concerned with world hunger. A second cluster includes protest organizations, antinuclear coalitions, holistic health enthusiasts, positive thinking advocates, and therapy groups. As denominational loyalties have disintegrated, Protestants divide sharply into these social and spiritual groupings, thus reflecting a new and deep Christian chasm in contemporary America. From the pacifist Fellowship of Reconciliation (1915) through Focus on the Family (1977), such groups exercised a potent political and social influence on twentieth-century American life.

Finally, the philanthropic and voluntary impulse within American Protestantism remains a key component of the nation's independent sector of nonprofit institutions. AIDS ministries, homeless advocacy, soup kitchens, shelters for battered women, substance abuse support groups, and counseling centers in local communities throughout the United States rely heavily on religiously motivated volunteers for staffing and funding. During periods of government austerity such as in the 1980s, religious organizations assumed increasing responsibility for performing vital social service functions. Many receive public funding, thus illustrating the interpenetration and close relationship between the public, corporate, and nonprofit sectors of American life. Perhaps uniquely among Western democratic cultures, Protestant voluntary societies have carved out a highly visible and generally accepted public role.

See also Missionary Organizations; Missions; Philanthropy; Social Gospel

References and Further Reading

- Boyer, Paul. Urban Masses and Moral Order in America, 1820–1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1978.
- Carpenter, Joel A. Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Cherry, Conrad, and Rowland A. Sherrill, eds. Religion, the Independent Sector, and American Culture. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1992.
- Foster, Charles I. An Errand of Mercy: The Evangelical United Front, 1790–1837. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1960.
- Hewitt, Nancy A. Women's Activism and Social Change: Rochester, New York, 1822–1872. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1984.
- Ryan, Mary P. Cradle of the Middle Class: The Family in Oneida County, New York, 1790–1865. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981.
- Smith, Timothy L. Revivalism and Social Reform: American Protestantism on the Eve of the Civil War. New York: Harper & Row, 1957.
- Wuthnow, Robert. The Restructuring of American Religion: Society and Faith Since World War II. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1988.
- Wuthnow, Robert, Virginia A. Hodgkinson, et al. Faith and Philanthropy in America: Exploring the Role of Religion in America's Voluntary Sector. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 1990.

PETER J. WOSH

W

WALES

Protestant emphases on the priority of scripture and SALVATION by GRACE through FAITH, filtered through Episcopalianism and, more significantly, NONCONFORMITY, have deeply influenced Welsh CULTURE and national identity. During the twentieth century, Pentecostal and charismatic expressions of Protestantism emerged, although it remains to be seen whether any of these groups can contribute to national renewal and stem the tide of decline and secularization that took hold in Welsh religious life after World War II.

Protestantism came to Wales as the result of a political policy after HENRY VIII's break with Rome. There was little zeal for the new form of faith until the reign of Henry's daughter ELIZABETH I, when legislation was passed securing devotional literature in the Welsh language. By 1567 Bishop Richard Davies (c. 1510–1581) and the renaissance scholar William Salesbury (c. 1520–1584) had translated the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER and the New Testament into Welsh, the Welsh BIBLE becoming available in 1588 after the tireless labor of William Morgan (c. 1541–1604). Morgan's Bible, revised by Richard Parry (1560–1623) and John Davies (c. 1567–1644), was the means by which generations of Welsh people learned to read and became familiar with the Christian story (see BIBLE TRANSLATION). The result was a literate and religious populace.

During Elizabeth's reign an ultra-Protestant Puritan movement emerged. Although it did not initially penetrate Wales, one of its prominent representatives and martyrs was the Welshman John Penry (1563–1593). PURITANISM was the antecedent of religious DISSENT, which interpreted the CHURCH as a gathering of believers separate from the government of the state and from pan-ecclesiastical and geographical bureaucracy. The first Independent (Congregational) church was established in Llanfaches, southeast Wales in 1639. Others followed at Wrexham, Cardiff, and Swansea, established by zealots such as William Wroth (1576–1641), Walter Cradock (c. 1610–1659), William Erbury (1604–1654), Vavasor Powell (1617–1670), and Morgan Llwyd (1619–1659). For two generations it was difficult to differentiate between Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and free-communicating BAPTISTS because all could be found worshipping in the same congregations (see PRESBYTERIANISM; CONGREGATIONALISM). Nevertheless, the first Particular (strict) Baptist church was founded at Ilston, southwest Wales in 1649 by John Miles (1621–1683).

Although numerically modest, dissent remained a significant expression of Protestantism for almost a century. It was popularized during the eighteenth-century Evangelical Revival led by the churchmen Daniel Rowland (1713–1790), Howell Harris (1714–1773), and William Williams of Pantycelyn (1717–1791), whose legacy to Welsh hymnody is abiding. METHODISM in Wales was Calvinistic rather than Arminian and created the only indigenously Welsh DENOMINATION, the Calvinistic Methodist Connexion (later Presbyterian Church of Wales) when Thomas Charles of Bala, northwest Wales (1755–1814) ordained men to its ministry in 1811, thus seceding from the Anglican church. Wesleyan Methodism arrived in 1800.

In the Religious Census held in March 1851, 12.7 percent of the population attended the parish churches, whereas as many as 43 percent attended a chapel belonging to one or the other of the Nonconformist denominations. Protestant Nonconformity had thus become a movement of the people. Its CALVINISM was moderated under the influence of men such as the Congregationalist Edward Williams (1750–1813) and the cultured Calvinistic Methodist Lewis Edwards (1809–1887). Its pulpit became renowned for preachers of the caliber of the Baptist Christmas Evans (1766–1838), the Calvinistic Methodist John Elias (1774–1841), and the Congregationalist William Williams of Wern (1781–1840), while a peculiarly Welsh PREACHING style, known as “hwyl,” developed. Nonconformity became associated with the freedom of individual conscience before God and the freedom of the market to be self-regulating. Its political ally was the Liberal Party and ministers such as David Rees (1801–1869) and William Rees—“Gwilym Hiraethog”—(1802–1883) were renowned for their radicalism. Alternatively, laymen such as the Calvinistic Methodist David Davies of Llandinam, mid-Wales (1818–1890) were able to use laissez-faire liberalism to amass a fortune from investment in railways, coal, and in the building of Cardiff docks, and to use it in support of religious causes.

While Welsh Nonconformity was consolidating its position among the ordinary people and its political influence through the bourgeoisie of the Industrial Revolution, ANGLICANISM was also undergoing a renewal. Although ostensibly Protestant through its Prayer Book and THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, this rejuvenation stemmed mainly from Catholic emphases and the development of Tractarianism. Its perception as a foreign imposition on a “nation of Nonconformists” gave rise to the bitter campaign to disestablish the Church in Wales, which began in earnest in 1889 and culminated in the Act that was passed on the eve of World War I in 1914, although it did not come into effect until 1920. After disestablishment the Church in Wales developed into a truly national institution whose bishops were at times able to exercise a political as well as pastoral role. Among the more prominent were Timothy Rees (1874–1939), Glyn Simon (1903–1972), and Rowan Williams (b. 1950).

The revival of 1904–1905 and its association with the charismatic, if enigmatic, Calvinistic Methodist layman Evan Roberts (1878–1951) resulted in a short-lived increase in membership of the Protestant denominations and also contributed to the long-term development of international PENTECOSTALISM, particularly in the form of the Apostolic Church whose headquarters remain at Penygroes in southwest Wales. Nevertheless, the twentieth century was marked by relentless decline in religious observance suffered by all the traditional Protestant denominations. Neither the theological liberalism of the early decades, associated with men such as Thomas Rees (1869–1926), John Morgan Jones (1873–1946), D.Miall Edwards (1873–1941), and J.Oliver Stephens (1880–1957), nor the Barthian NEO-ORTHODOXY of the middle years, associated with J.E.Daniel (1902–1962), J.D. Vernon Lewis (1879–1970), and Lewis Valentine (1893–1986), could stem the tide of SECULARIZATION and religious ambivalence. An evangelical renewal associated with the battle for Welsh cultural and linguistic survival achieved some success in the 1970s, as did the HOUSE CHURCHES and charismatic groups in the 1990s, but these were exceptions in a downward trend that has shown no signs of abating.

Protestant understanding and expression of Christian faith offer a vital key to unlocking the mysteries of Welsh history in the modern period, which gives meaning to the past and helps understand the present.

References and Further Reading

- Bassett, T.M. The Welsh Baptists. Swansea, Wales: Ilston Press, 1977.
- Evans, Eifion. Daniel Rowland and the Great Evangelical Awakening in Wales. Edinburgh: Banner of Truth Trust, 1985.
- Jenkins, Geraint H. Protestant Dissenters in Wales, 1639–89. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1992.
- Morgan, D.Densil. The Span of the Cross: Christian Religion and Society in Wales 1914–2000. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1999.
- Pope, Robert. Building Jerusalem: Nonconformity, Labour and the Social Question in Wales, 1906–39. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1998.
- . Seeking God's Kingdom: The Nonconformist Social Gospel in Wales, 1906–39. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1999.
- Tudur, Geraint. Howell Harris: From Conversion to Separation, 1735–50. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 2000.
- Williams, Glanmor. Wales and the Reformation. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1997.

ROBERT POPE

WALTHER, CARL FERDINAND WILHELM (1811–1887)

German American church leader. Walther was born October 25, 1811 in Langenchursdorf, southeast of Leipzig, GERMANY. At the University of Leipzig, where he studied theology, Walther observed the prevailing rationalism and PIETISM but instead embraced orthodox Lutheran confessionalism. Unhappy with the prevailing THEOLOGY in Germany, he emigrated to the United States in 1839 with 800 other Saxons and settled in Perry County, Missouri, 100 miles south of St. Louis. When the group's bishop, Martin Stephan, was expelled from the church on moral grounds, some questioned whether they remained a Christian church, and urged a return to Germany. Walther, however, championed the position of MARTIN LUTHER that the means of saving GRACE (Word preached and SACRAMENTS of BAPTISM and LORD'S SUPPER) were held by baptized believers as the PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS who themselves could put men into the ministry. The Saxons stayed, providing ministers by continuing Concordia Seminary, which they had started in 1839.

Walther was called from his Perry County congregation to St. Louis in 1841 where, along with parish duties, he began to publish Der Lutheraner in 1844, a periodical that rallied like-minded conservative Lutheran immigrants in Midwest America. Preliminary meetings led to the 1847 formation of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and Other States, with Walther elected president. He is thus known for being instrumental in the founding of what became THE LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD. When Concordia Seminary was transferred to this synod and moved to St. Louis, Walther became its president. Walther met criticism of supposed democratic tendencies in the synod's view of the ministry with the publication of Church and Ministry, reasserting Luther's views.

A prolific writer, Walther's major efforts included The Proper Distinction of Law and Gospel, The Congregation's Right to Choose Its Own Pastor, and numerous sermons and homiletical abstracts. He also edited Lehre und Wehre (Teaching and Defense), a periodical for laypeople.

Walther died in St. Louis May 7, 1887.

See also Lutheranism, United States

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Walther, C.F.W. Church and Ministry: Witness of the Evangelical Lutheran Church on the Question of the Church and the Ministry. Translated by J.T.Mueller. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1987.

———. The Congregation's Right to Choose Its Pastor. Translated by Fred Kramer. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Seminary Publications, 1997.

———. The Proper Distinction between Law and Gospel. Translated by W.H.T.Dau. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 1986.

Secondary Source:

Suelflow, August R. Servant of the Word: The Life and Ministry of C.F.W.Walther. St. Louis, MO: Concordia Publishing House, 2000.

ROBERT ROSIN

WALTON, ISAAC (1593–1683)

English author and biographer. Walton was born in Stafford, ENGLAND in September 1593, son of Gervase and Anne Walton. He was educated in Stafford and in his fifteenth year, he left to be apprenticed to Thomas Grinsell, a linen-draper, in the parish of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, London. Between 1608 and 1613 he discovered poets and poetry, finding his way into a literary circle that included Ben Jonson.

In 1618 Walton became a freeman of the Ironmongers' Company, and owned "half a shop" in Chancery Lane. Sometime after 1624 he met and grew friendly with JOHN DONNE—and a number of his circle—when Donne was preferred as vicar to Walton's parish.

In 1626 he married Rachel Floud. They had several children but none survived to adulthood. In addition to these family deaths, Donne died in March 1631. Walton's intimacy with Donne is implied in his involvement with his posthumous publication. In Poems, by J.D... (1633) appears an elegy by Walton; in its 1635 edition further verses by Walton appear.

In 1638 Walton published complimentary verses before Lewis Roberts's Merchants Mappe of Commerce. In 1640 he became verger at St. Dunstan's in the West, his wife died, and he published his Life of Donne as a preface to Donne's work. He was to revise and expand it in 1658, 1670, and 1675. In it he made extensive use of Donne's own written work, artfully juxtaposed and paraphrased to stress the post-1615 "clerical"—and thus exemplary—Donne. Yet his Donne is also passionate and changeable, figured in Walton's prominent use of Augustine in his typology—a performer in pulpit and deathbed. The "Character" with which it concludes is perhaps his finest piece of writing.

An unwavering royalist, Walton is likely to have left London in 1643, although not altogether or permanently. Walton himself says that he saw WILLIAM LAUD'S execution in 1645. In 1642 his complimentary verses appeared before Edward Sparke's Scintitullula Altaris, and he probably wrote the preface for Francis Quarles's 1646 Shepherds Oracles. He married his second wife, Anne Ken, in 1647. They had three children, two of whom lived to adulthood.

In 1651 The Life of Sir Henry Wotton appeared, again as a preface. This is a genial memorial that stresses their common loves for Donne and for angling; it depicts an orderly life whose "Circumference" was "closed up" by a serene and exemplary death. Four more revised editions of the Life of Wotton were to appear in Walton's lifetime: in 1654, 1670, 1672, and 1675. He also wrote the preface for Sir John Skeffington's translation of Morales's Heroe of Lorenzo, which appeared in 1652.

Walton's third and most enduring work was The Compleat Angler of 1653. This pastoral has gone through over 400 editions since its publication in that year. In a manner reminiscent of other poets of the Commonwealth, Herrick or Marvell, the disorder of the present times received muted comment in its scenes of harmony. Walton revised The Compleat Angler four times in his lifetime, in 1655, 1661 (there was a second issue in 1664), 1668, and 1676. Its last edition was so much expanded from its first as to be almost a different text.

Walton celebrated the Restoration with a celebratory eclogue printed in Alexander Brome's Songs and Other Poems of 1661. The same year he provided verses for Christopher Hervey's The Synagogue and joined, belatedly, the flurry of elegists for the conservative William Cartwright (d. 1643). Much later (1676) he was to write dedicatory verses for Cartwright's nephew Jeremiah Rich, promoter of Cartwright's shorthand system.

Walton seems to have had some connection with a number of the Great Tew circle, and most intimately with Bishop George Morley of Winchester, who made Walton his steward. Walton's wife Anne died in Winchester in April 1662 and was touchingly commemorated by her husband. Morley—along with Bishop Gilbert Sheldon—also encouraged him to pen his Life of Hooker, which appeared first in 1665, and then in 1666 as a preface to RICHARD HOOKER'S works.

This was essentially a loyalist commission to provide a conservative biographical gloss on Hooker's work. The moderate bishop of Exeter, John Gauden, had published for the first time the fiercely contentious "last three books" of Hooker's Lawes of Ecclesiasticall Politie. Walton accordingly wrote a biography that characterized Hooker as prophesying the "unity" of the Restoration. The backdrop against which this was drawn was a highly biased parallel picture of the squabbles of the 1580s and 1590s, seen through a filter defined by the Civil Wars (see CIVIL WAR, ENGLAND).

In 1670 the Life of Mr George Herbert appeared. This, too, is full of Herbertian paraphrase and quotation. Yet every word is deployed to insist on the essential nobility of the priesthood (particularly the country priesthood) as a VOCATION, and the events are transformed and marked by edifices (the churches GEORGE HERBERT is narrated as restoring, for example). This underscores Walton's belief in the beauty of holiness and transforms Herbert's own handbook, The Country Parson, into "factual" example and his poetry into an untroubled version of a spiritual autobiography.

The four Lives were issued together in 1670 and 1675, with further revisions and expansion. Walton made some notes, too, for a Life of John Hales, another of the Great Tew circle. He produced an anonymous piece of polemic, Love and Truth (1680), which in its stress on lay obedience echoed the concerns of the Life of Hooker; and finally he was persuaded by Morley into his last considerable work, The Life of Dr Robert Sanderson.

Sanderson was a stern Calvinist yet an eminent casuist; he had been chaplain to Charles I, yet was also the last preacher on PREDESTINATION at Pauls Cross in 1627. He was made bishop of Lincoln at the Restoration. Walton had known him; yet the Sanderson he narrates is a pure ceremonialist. It appeared in 1678 and was revised in 1681.

Walton continued authorial work; his letter to John Aubrey on Ben Jonson was written in 1680, and in 1683, the year of his death, he wrote the preface to a verse pastoral, Thealma and Clearchus, attributed to John Chalkhill. He died in Winchester on December 15, 1683.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- The Compleat Angler*, edited with an introduction and commentary by Jonquil Bevan. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1983.
- Keynes, Geoffrey, ed. The Compleat Walton. London: Nonesuch Press, 1929.
- “The Life of Dr. John Donne.” In John Donne, LXXX Sermons, edited by John Donne the younger. London: 1640.
- Martin, Jessica, ed. Izaak Walton, Selected Writings. Manchester, UK: Carcanet, 1997.
- Poems, by J.D...* London: 1633.
- Saintsbury, George, ed. Walton's Lives. Oxford, UK: Oxford World's Classics, 1927.
- Shepherd, Richard Herne, ed. Waltoniana: Inedited Remains in Verse and Prose of Izaak Walton. London: Pickering, 1878.

Secondary Sources:

- Lein, C.D. “Art and Structure in Walton's Life of Mr. George Herbert.” University of Toronto Quarterly 46 (1976/7): 162–176.
- Martin, Jessica. Walton's Lives: Conformist Commemorations and the Rise of Biography. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Novarr, David. The Making of Walton's Lives. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1958.
- Stanwood, P.G. Izaak Walton. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1998.

JESSICA MARTIN

WANG, MING DAO (WANG MINGDAO) (1901–1991)

Chinese evangelist. An independent Chinese Protestant pastor in Beijing, a nationally acclaimed evangelist and church leader, Wang Mingdao's ministry, like that of WATCHMAN NEE, coincided with the most tumultuous years within twentieth-century CHINA history. Born in 1901, educated in missionary schools, Wang became a self-conscious believer in 1920 and received believers' BAPTISM. Beginning a prolific PREACHING career in 1923, Wang promoted the establishment of an independent Chinese Christian church, later establishing one independent congregation in Beijing. He opposed liberal theological groups' critiques of the BIBLE, and later stood adamantly against the Communist-supported Three-Self Movement, although he remained a Chinese citizen.

Wang's teachings circulated by lengthy evangelistic tours throughout the Chinese mainland and by the Spiritual Food Quarterly, making him a nationally recognized conservative Christian spokesman. Like MARTIN LUTHER, whose works Wang selectively studied, he refused SECTARIANISM while seeking spiritual purity based on teachings from revealed scriptures and opposing any compromise with secularism. This principled attitude compares with KARL BARTH'S attitude in opposition to Nazism, but without its theological sophistication. Wang's subsequent trials were endured with the belief that "some of God's promises" are written with "invisible ink," becoming understandable only when "placed in the flame of suffering."

Wang's teachings follow three major themes: calling seekers to repentance and CONVERSION; calling Chinese Christians to holy living; and resisting theological MODERNISM and compromised political alignments. Conversion to Christ for Wang comes only by FAITH, and holiness does not require ecstatic confirmation, but both require the miraculous inner work of God the Spirit.

Wang's uncompromising opposition to the ThreeSelf Movement led in 1955 to his being publicly condemned in Beijing as a counter-revolutionary. Suffering lengthy propagandistic self-criticism, Wang later recanted these as being produced under duress and untrue. Consequently he ended up spending twenty-three years in Chinese prisons. Released in 1979, Wang remained a stern opponent of Communist-attached Christian communities until his death in 1991.

See also Communism; Liberal Protestantism and Liberalism

References and Further Reading

Harvey, Thomas Alan. Acquainted with Grief: Wang Mingdao's Stand for the Persecuted Church in China. Grand Rapids, MI: Brazos Press, 2002.

Shi, Meiling. Liushisan nian—yu Wang Mingdao xiansheng zhailu tongxing (Sixty-three Years—Walking Together on the Narrow Road with Mr. Wang Mingdao). Hong Kong: Spiritual Rock Publishers, 2001.

Wang, Mingdao. Wang Mingdao wenke (Literary Treasures of Wang Mingdao). Edited by C.C.Wang. 7 vols. Taichung, Taiwan: Conservative Baptist Press, 1996.

Wickeri, Philip Lauri. Seeking the Common Ground: Protestant Christianity, the Three-Self Movement and China's United Front. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Press, 1988.

LAUREN F.PFISTER

WAR

From its beginnings, the Christian church has had to wrestle with questions about war. Historically, Christian attitudes toward war have been classified in an ascending order of violence: PACIFISM, just-war theory, and the Crusade or Holy War. In response to the enormous destruction of World War II and the threat of nuclear war, a fourth ethic has arisen, just-peace-making theory.

Just-War Theory

Just-war theory is explicitly affirmed in several REFORMATION creeds and confessions, including the Lutheran AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530), the CHURCH OF ENGLAND'S THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES (1571), and the Presbyterian WESTMINSTER CONFESSION (1648). MARTIN LUTHER'S Two-Kingdom doctrine restricted the Christian love of enemies, as commanded by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, to individual relations. He followed Augustine in seeing the Christian soldier as motivated by love in using force to restore civil order and peace. JOHN CALVIN presumed that Christians normally would refrain from violence, but that war is justifiable as self-defense against hostile aggression. He appealed to wars fought at God's command in the Old Testament.

As it has developed historically, just-war theory has criteria for discerning the legitimacy of a particular war (jus ad bellum). A just war must be fought for a just cause—stopping the massacre of large numbers of people, or stopping the systematic and long-term violation of the human rights of life, liberty, and community. The war must be announced by a legitimate authority, the legal authority within a given nation. The devastating nature of war with modern weapons leads many to require checks and balances by the United Nations or widespread international agreement. War must have just intent, ending the evil conditions that caused the war and restoring international civil order, rather than revenge, NATIONALISM, or conquest of territory. There must be a reasonable chance of success in meeting the just aims of the war. War must be the last resort after all other means of resolution have been tried.

Jus in bello provides criteria for just conduct once a war begins. Proportionality requires that the destruction must not be disproportionate to the good ends to be achieved. This applies to the initial decision to make war and to the tactics used within the war. Discrimination requires that war be waged only against military targets. Unintentional killing of noncombatants is allowed (unless the amount violates proportionality), but all reasonable efforts must be made to insure “noncombatant immunity.” Torture or mistreatment of prisoners, rapes, massacres, and terrorist violence—deliberately aimed against civilians—are ruled out.

Just-war theory requires guarding against an ends-justifies-the-means ethic that focuses only on just cause. It is wrong to kill large numbers of people in the name of a just cause if another alternative, such as negotiation, international intervention, or nonviolent direct action, could bring resolution without war's destruction. War is wrong if the killing will not succeed in achieving the cause, or if it will be waged by unjust means. Churches espousing just-war theory must teach members its principles and prepare them to oppose a war if it is unjust; too few Protestant churches do this.

Crusade or Holy War

Because the medieval Crusades happened before the Protestant Reformation, many have thought the Holy War ethic has had little or no influence in Protestantism. However, Lisa Sowle Cahill has shown that the Puritan revolution in ENGLAND shared many characteristics with the earlier Crusades (see PURITANISM). The post-Reformation Wars of Religion between Catholics and Protestants, and the European colonial wars of conquest in Asia, AFRICA, and the Americas, conducted by both Catholics and Protestants, often took on Holy War characteristics, and the crusade spirit often infects contemporary Protestants.

Roland Bainton and Charles Kimball judge a war to be a “crusade” or “holy war” when it exhibits the following characteristics:

- The war is fought in God's name. In our more secularized era, war may be fought for nontheistic substitutes—DEMOCRACY, freedom, justice, or the nation's good.
- God or righteousness is viewed as completely on one side, whose sins or crimes are downplayed, denied, or excused.
- The enemy is viewed as demonic, of diminished worth, or beyond redemption—described as evil, animalistic, or less than fully human. Common ground is not recognized.
- Unjust tactics—massacres, torture, the deliberate killing of noncombatants—are condoned in order to ensure the triumph of God against the forces of darkness.

Protestants often gave explicit biblical grounding for such attitudes by appealing to Israel's wars of conquest of Canaan, as depicted in Joshua and Judges. In colonial New England, Puritan divines often referred to their colonies as a “new Israel” and to the NATIVE AMERICAN inhabitants as “Canaanites” whose idolatry must be exterminated by either CONVERSION or genocide.

At least since the end of World War II, the holy war model has been nearly universally condemned by Christian ethicists. But the attitude remains and is even preached from some Protestant pulpits (usually without openly acknowledging it), especially in authoritarian circles.

Pacifism

The early Christian Church was pacifist in the first and second centuries, and the early Christian writers taught pacifism as Christian duty. John Howard Yoder has distinguished numerous varieties of Christian pacifism. A minimal definition might be the refusal to use lethal violence against other humans or to participate in or give support to any war. During the sixteenth century, most of the Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM) and many of the spiritualists and evangelical rationalists among the radical reformers espoused pacifism. The SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION of 1527, for instance, relegated “the sword” to those “outside the perfection of Christ.” MENNO SIMONS taught his followers to be pacifist. Later Christian leaders such as Quaker (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) founder GEORGE Fox also renewed the pacifist impulse of the early church. Since the end of World War II, the dramatically increased destructiveness of war, increased knowledge about how to prevent war, and increased attention to Gospel teachings in Christian ethics, have contributed to an increase of pacifism among Protestants.

Just-Peacemaking Theory

In the midst of the nuclear buildup of the 1980s, Methodist, Presbyterian, Lutheran, UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, Roman Catholic, and historic peace church denominations wrote substantial official statements on war and peace, calling for a reversal of the buildup. They reaffirmed the need for either pacifism or just-war theory, but recognized their inadequacy for shaping an ethic of active peacemaking for the churches. They called for an active “theology of peace” or “just-peace theory.” Accordingly, twenty-three interdisciplinary and interdenominational scholars, after extensive work and dialogue, developed a consensus on a new ethic: just-peacemaking theory. The ten practices of just peacemaking are taken to be not ideals, but practices that proved their effectiveness in history since World War II in preventing wars and building conditions of peace. They are supported both by empirical political science and by biblical teaching. These ten practices are as follows:

1. Support nonviolent direct action in movements for justice or social change.
2. In situations of tension or conflict, take independent initiatives to reduce the threat to the adversary.
3. Talk with the enemy, using methods of conflict resolution.
4. Acknowledge responsibility for conflict and injustice and seek repentance and forgiveness.
5. Advance democracy, human rights, and religious liberty. The church’s push for human rights has removed causes of war and spread democracy. No democracy with HUMAN RIGHTS directly engaged in war with another democracy in the twentieth century.

6. Foster just and sustainable economic development. Economic deprivation has been demonstrated by political science to be a major cause of intrastate war, and just and sustainable economic development decreases the likelihood of war.
7. Work with emerging cooperative forces in the international system. Empirical political science has demonstrated that the dramatically growing international networks decrease the frequency of war.
8. Strengthen the United Nations and international efforts for cooperation and human rights. Empirical political science research shows that nations actively interacting with UN agencies make fewer wars than nations with unilateralist policies that disengage from UN organizations. Neglect of such international institutions promotes an anarchic international system that makes war more likely.
9. Reduce offensive weapons and the weapons trade. Arms build-ups increase the chances of war, the destructiveness of wars fought, and the economic cost devoted to military expenditures rather than to sustainable economic growth and human need.
10. Encourage grassroots peacemaking groups and voluntary associations. Grassroots groups working for justice, human rights, and peacemaking foster the things that make for peace.

The just-peacemaking ethic is gaining attention both within and beyond Protestant circles. Neither just-war theory nor pacifism can stop the momentum of a determined government to make war. Realism suggests that churches not simply oppose a war, but also point to practices of just peacemaking that have proved effective in achieving resolution without war and that are related more closely to Jesus's teaching on peacemaking. Just-peacemaking theory says that Jesus taught initiatives to prevent war more directly than he taught whether or not to make war.

Just-peacemaking theory is supported by both just-war theorists and pacifists. Just-war theory and pacifism are still needed to judge whether or not a war is moral. But without just-peacemaking theory, pacifists and just-war theorists have difficulty articulating the alternatives to war.

See also Colonialism; Ethics; Peace Organizations; Politics

References and Further Reading

- Bainton, Roland. Christian Attitudes Toward War and Peace. New York: Abingdon, 1960.
- Cahill, Lisa Sowle. Love Your Enemies: Discipleship, Pacifism, and Just War Theory. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress, 1994.
- Gros, Jeffrey, and John D. Rempel, eds. The Fragmentation of the Church and Its Unity in Peacemaking. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2001.
- Kimball, Charles. When Religion Becomes Evil. New York: Harper, 2002.
- Potter, Ralph. War and Moral Discourse. Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1969.
- Stassen, Glen H., ed. Just Peacemaking: Ten Practices for Abolishing War. Cleveland, OH: Pilgrim, 1998.
- Walzer, Michael. Just and Unjust Wars. New York: Basic Books: 1977.
- Yoder, John Howard. Nevertheless: The Varieties of Religious Pacifism, rev ed. Scottsdale, PA: Herald, 1992.

GLEN STASSEN AND MICHAEL WESTMORELAND WHITE

WATCHTOWER SOCIETY

See Jehovah's Witnesses

WATTS, ISAAC (1674–1748)

English hymn writer. Watts was born in Southampton, ENGLAND on July 17, 1674. At the time of his birth, his father, a deacon in the Independent (Congregational) Chapel, was incarcerated for his NONCONFORMITY. The boy attended a grammar school run by the local rector, and showed such an aptitude for learning that a group of prominent gentlemen offered to underwrite an Oxford education for a career in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Instead the sixteen-year-old Watts enrolled in a school at Stoke Newington, London, headed by an Independent minister, Thomas Rowe. In 1694 he returned to Southampton and over the next two years wrote the first of his hymn texts for the Independent congregation there.

In 1696 he moved back to Stoke Newington as a private tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp. On his twenty-fourth birthday, Watts preached his first sermon and shortly thereafter was ordained assistant pastor of the Independent Chapel in Mark Lane, where Hartopp and his family worshiped. In March of 1702 he succeeded Isaac Chauncy as pastor of that prominent congregation; however, Watts's health failed, and in 1703 Samuel Price was appointed to assist him, taking on most of his duties. When the congregation moved from Mark Lane to its new building in Bury Street in 1713, Price was named copastor, and Watts withdrew to the home of Sir Thomas Abney in Stoke Newington, where he continued to write but otherwise lived the remainder of his life as a semi-invalid. The University of Edinburgh conferred the doctor of divinity degree on him in 1728. He died November 25, 1748, at Stoke Newington.

Christian Hymns

Isaac Watts's principal historical significance rests with the approximately 600 hymn texts and psalm paraphrases he published in Horae Lyricae (1706), Hymns and Spiritual Songs (1707), Divine Songs for Children (1715, expanded and reissued as Divine and Moral Songs for Children in 1720), and Psalms of David Imitated in the Language of the New Testament (1719). During Watts's time, such texts were restricted to private devotions. Both the established church and most dissenting groups restricted congregational singing to metrical translations of the psalms, generally taken from the Tate & Brady Psalter of 1696, known as the New Version to distinguish it from the earlier Sternhold and Hopkins translation, or Old Version.

Watts's hymns reflected his conviction that congregational praise should be personal and experiential, as exemplified in such well-known texts as "When I survey the wondrous cross.” Similarly, Watts considered the Old Testament psalms in literal metrical translation inadequate to the needs of New Testament faith and WORSHIP. Accordingly, he maintained that congregational psalmody should be altered to reflect a Christian context, “[in] the language of our Time and Nation [and] the Spirit of the Gospel.” Hence, for example, his similarly well-known paraphrase of Psalm 98, “Joy to the world, the Lord is come.”

Among the Anglicans such texts were dismissed as “Watts’s whims,” even though it had been an Anglican clergyman who first attempted what Watts succeeded so well in doing. As early as 1679 John Patrick had composed Christianized paraphrases of the psalms. Watts not only acknowledged his debt to Patrick, but even went so far as to incorporate passages from Patrick’s work into his own lyric.

Well into the nineteenth century the official position of the established Church of England—and the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the United States—prohibited the use in public worship of “hymns of human composure,” as they were termed, including paraphrases of psalms, although among his fellow dissenters, Watts’s texts, both the hymns and psalm paraphrases, quickly gained a measure of acceptance and use in public worship. The EVANGELICALISM of eighteenth-century England as well as the Great Awakening in America (see AWAKENINGS) secured many of Watts’s devotional lyrics and psalm paraphrases a lasting place in Protestant hymnody.

Theological Writing

Watts also authored a number of theological and philosophical studies, as well as didactic religious works for the LAITY. Although these writings have fallen into obscurity for the most part, they were highly regarded during his lifetime and issued in a collection after his death. Watts’s Logick (1724) went through numerous printings in England and abroad and was used as a text at English and American universities well into the nineteenth century. Philosophical Essays (1733) contained writings spanning some thirty years and demonstrating a clear understanding of such thinkers as JOHN LOCKE and GOTTFRIED LEIBNIZ.

Watts’s theological works included such studies as the World to Come (1721) and Essays toward a Proof of Separate States for Souls (1732); however, it was his speculations on the Trinity that drew the most attention. In his Christian Doctrine of the Trinity (1722) Watts attempted to bridge Arianism and ORTHODOXY by speculating that the soul of Christ was created before the world and subsequently joined with the Godhead. He expanded on the position in Dissertations (1724), A Faithful Inquiry (1745), The Glory of Christ as God-Man Unveiled (1746), and Useful and Important Questions (1746). Watts also held liberal views on reprobation, maintaining that God creates and maintains the soul as a thinking entity with particular responses to objects and situations. This liberalism, together with the psalm paraphrases, of which he disapproved, provoked COTTON MATHER to dismiss Watts in a diary entry dated January 28, 1726/7 as “a very Disqualified person.” Other writings included a Catechism (1730) and Scripture History (1732) for children; an Essay toward the Encouragement of Charity Schools (1728), and essays on other subjects that interested him, including astronomy and psychology. Watts's late papers were destroyed by his literary trustees, and comparatively little critical research on him has been published in recent years.

See also Congregationalism; Dissent; Hymns and Hymnals

References and Further Reading

Davis, Arthur P. Isaac Watts. London: Independent Press, 1962.

Escott, Henry. Isaac Watts: Hymnographer. London: Independent Press, 1962.

Fountain, David. Isaac Watts Remembered, Worthing: Henry E. Walter, Ltd., 1974.

Hood, Paxton. Isaac Watts, His Life and Writings, His Homes and Friends. London: Tract Society, 1875; reprinted as Isaac Watts, His Life and Hymns. Greenville, SC: Emerald House, 2001.

Manning, Bernard. The Hymns of Wesley and Watts. London: Epworth Press, 1942.

JOHN OGASAPIAN

WEATHERHEAD, LESLIE DIXON (1893–1976)

British Methodist minister and apologist. Weatherhead was born in 1893 in London, ENGLAND. He trained for the Wesleyan Methodist ministry at Richmond College, interrupted by war service as an army chaplain, and served in circuits in Surrey and Madras, INDIA, as a missionary. In 1922 he returned, serving three years in Manchester, where his PREACHING and engagement with students marked him out for a significant ministry. He developed an interest in psychology and its relationship with the healing ministry of the church, tackling the impact of Freudian views of religion and the self. From 1925 to 1936 he had an outstanding ministry in Leeds, where he developed a Christian counseling service. He published a groundbreaking book on The Mastery of Sex through Psychology and Religion (1931).

In 1936 he moved to the City Temple, a Congregational chapel (see CONGREGATIONALISM), where he became a national figure attracting vast crowds to services to hear his distinctive preaching style. He developed the ideas of his London doctoral thesis in a book Psychology, Religion and Healing (1951) where he addressed the paralyzing effect of guilt on individuals, stressing the unconditional unchanging love of God for all. His preaching and winsome personality won over many admirers, although aspects of his ministry and his pacifist stance in the 1930s made him a figure treated with suspicion by others. This “prodigal son of METHODISM” came home in 1955 when the Methodist Conference elected him as its president. His last great book, The Christian Agnostic, stirred up more controversy, including attacks on him by Dr. Ian Paisley. He died in 1976.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Weatherhead, Leslie. After Death. London: J. Clarke and Co., 1928.
 ——. Psychology and Life. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1934.

Secondary Source:

Weatherhead, Kingsley. Leslie Weatherhead: A Personal Portrait. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1975.

TIM MACQUIBAN

WEBER, MAX (1864–1920)

German sociologist and economist. Weber was born in 1864 in Berlin and died in 1920 in Munich. He was professor of economics at the University of Heidelberg, as well as holding other positions, including administrator of hospitals for the German army during World War I. He is considered one of the founders of sociology. The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism was part of a larger work, Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie. This work attempted to show how values and psychology, derived from Calvinistic Protestantism, shaped the world, which Weber saw as an “iron cage” driven by capitalism. The Protestant Ethic, Weber argued, derived from an effort to gain some assurance that one was of the elect predestined for salvation. Evidence of such election included ascetic capitalism—that is, work for the sake of work itself as a way of demonstrating that one was serving God’s purpose. Weber argued that the incessant striving and reform deriving from the Protestant Ethic transformed the Western world, in contrast to Asian religions, which either affirmed the status quo (clans in China, castes in India) or offered escape through mysticism. While this so-called Weber thesis is controversial in its specific historical argument, it is influential in diagnosing sources and directions of recent contemporary values and culture, including extensions globally.

Weber’s vast spectrum of writings included a second major work, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft (Economy and Society), which was more abstract than the above work and provided a framework for social and cultural analysis. This included such concepts as bureaucratic, traditional, and charismatic authority and the notion of “action” (handlung), which presume that human behaviors are meaningful, hence to understand them, one must grasp what they mean to the actors. Weber developed methods (e.g., the “ideal types” and “Verstehen”) to grasp these, thus creating a stream of thought in social sciences and humanities viable today.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Weber, Max. The Theory of Social and Economic Organization. Translated by T.Parsons and A.M.Henderson. New York: Oxford University Press, 1947.
- . “The Meaning of ‘Ethical Neutrality’ in Sociology and Economics.” In The Methodology of the Social Sciences. Edited by E.Shils and H.Fich. New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1949, 1–47.
- . The Religion of China: Confucianism and Taoism. Translated and edited by H.H.Gerth. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press, 1951.

- . The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. Translated by T.Parsons. New York: Scribners, 1958.
- . The Sociology of Religion. Translated by E.Fischer, Boston: Beacon Press, 1964.
- . The Religion of India: The Sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism. Translated by H.H.Gerth and D.Martindale. Glencoe, IL: The Free Press, 1967.
- . Economy and Society, Translated by E.Fischhoff, edited by G.Roth and C.Wittich. New York: Bedminster Press, 1968.

Secondary Sources:

- Parkin, Frank. Max Weber. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Behnegar, Nasser. Leo Strauss, Max Weber, and the Scientific Study of Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Ekstrand, Thomas. Max Weber in a Theological Perspective. Leuven, Belgium: Peeters, 2000.
- The Cambridge Companion to Weber*. Cambridge, UK; New York: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Schöllgen, Gregor. Max Weber. München: Beck, 1998.
- Schluchter, Wolfgang. Paradoxes of Modernity: Culture and Conduct in the Theory of Max Weber. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press, 1996.
- Lindt, Andreas. Friedrich Naumann und Max Weber; Theologie und Soziologie im wilhelminischen Deutschland. München: Chr. Kaiser, 1973.

JAMES L.PEACOCK

WEIGEL, VALENTIN (1533–1588)

German radical spiritualist Lutheran pastor. Weigel was born in Naundorf in Saxony in 1533. He attended university at Leipzig and Wittenberg before being appointed pastor of Zschopau (1567), a post he held until his death. He signed the Formula of Concord (1576) but grew increasingly angry at the oppressiveness of Lutheran CONFSSIONALIZATION. Weigel owed much to late medieval mysticism; spiritualists such as THOMAS MÜNTZER, SEBASTIAN FRANCK, and CASPAR SCHWENCKFELD; and the cosmology of THEOPHRASTUS PARACELSUS. He was an important conduit of their thought into the seventeenth century, although he was also quite innovative. His pantheistic vision of the universe and his belief that Christ was to be found within all humans as a divine spark would be shared and developed by JAKOB BOEHME. He also employed a thoroughgoing allegorical interpretation of Scripture in support of his teachings. Interestingly, having read most of his sources while at university, his spiritualist vision remained fairly constant throughout his works. Weigel defended his orthodoxy in A Booklet of the True Salvific Faith in 1572, but the extent of his departure from Lutheran orthodoxy became clear only with the publication of his other works after his death. His writings enjoyed a wide audience in the seventeenth century among Pietists, Rosicrucians, disciples of Jakob Boehme, and free thinkers of many stripes.

See also Pietism

References and Further Reading

- Koyré, Alexandre. Mystiques, spirituels, alchimistes du XVIe siècle allemand. Paris: Gallimard, 1971.
- Maier, Hans. Der mystische Spiritualismus Valentin Weigels. Gütersloh, Germany: C.Bertelsmann, 1926.
- Ozment, Steven E. Mysticism and Dissent: Religious Ideology and Social Protest in the Sixteenth Century. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1973.
- Weeks, Andrew. Valentin Weigel (1533–1588). German Religious Dissenter, Speculative Theorist, and Advocate of Tolerance. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2000.

R.EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

WELD, THEODORE DWIGHT (1803– 1895)

American abolitionist and educator. Weld, born at Hampton, Connecticut in 1803, early forsook his conservative Congregationalist origins for the tenets of the evangelical revivalist and reformer CHARLES GRANDISON FINNEY. Following Finney's advice to study for the ministry, Weld and several reform-minded friends matriculated at Lane Seminary in 1833, where they soon confronted president LYMAN BEECHER and others on the subject of immediate abolition of SLAVERY. When seminary authorities refused to countenance this radical doctrine, Weld and his followers left Lane. This "Lane Rebellion" garnered significant publicity for abolitionism, and greatly strengthened nascent Oberlin College, where many of the rebels subsequently enrolled, making it a hotbed of radical reforms.

After leaving Lane, Weld became an abolitionist orator and writer. His The Bible Against Slavery (1837) and American Slavery As It Is (1839) were widely read, the latter even providing material for HARRIET BEECHER STOWE'S Uncle Tom's Cabin. In the early 1840s Weld labored for John Quincy Adams and his allies as they fought gag rules that prevented discussion of slavery in Congress. In 1838 he married fellow reformer Angelina Grimke, a pioneering feminist who shared his passion for immediate abolition (see WOMEN).

In 1844 the self-effacing Weld retired from abolitionist leadership. Becoming an educator in New Jersey, he promoted progressive education that featured liberal Christianity, stimulating academics, and robust physical exercise. He moved to Boston in 1863, where he occupied himself mainly with local and familial affairs, although he did speak out on Reconstruction. He died there on February 3, 1895.

See also Congregationalism; Education, Overview; Education, Theology: United States; Slavery, Abolition of

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Barnes, Gilbert H., and Dwight L. Dumond, eds. Letters of Theodore Dwight Weld, Angelina Grimke Weld and Sarah Grimke, 1822–1844. New York: D. Appleton-Century Co., 1934.

Secondary Source:

Abzug, Robert H. Passionate Liberator: Theodore Dwight Weld and the Dilemma of Reform. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.

DONALD L.HUBER

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707–1788)

Methodist hymn writer. Wesley was the third surviving son of Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth, and his wife Susanna Annesley, who was the daughter of Samuel Annesley, a noted dissenting minister (see DISSENT). Born prematurely on December 18, 1707 (O.S.), he received rigorous and disciplined training in the home from his mother, despite his somewhat frail constitution. At age eight he went to Westminster School, where his oldest brother Samuel was an usher (teacher). After five years he became a king's scholar, and during his last year in residence, 1725–1726, he was head boy. He then went up to Christ Church, Oxford, where his brother JOHN WESLEY was a fellow of Lincoln College. There Charles received his B.A. degree in 1730 and became a student (fellow) of Christ Church. Before accompanying his brother to the American colony of Georgia in the fall of 1735 he was ordained deacon and priest in two successive weeks in September by the bishop of London.

Oxford

During his early years at Oxford, Charles was, by his own admission, not a serious student, responding to his brother's entreaties with the plea, "would you have me be a saint all at once?" However, sometime in 1728, while John (then a fully ordained priest) was in Epworth assisting their father Samuel with his parish duties, Charles experienced a "reformation of character" that left him desiring to follow John's recently adopted pattern of holy living. He petitioned his brother for suggestions of books to read, habits to develop, and methods to use (especially for diary keeping). By the spring of 1729 he was well into a pattern of study and devotion that impressed John, who returned to the university for a visit in the summer and to resume his duties as a fellow in the fall.

The combination of the two Wesley brothers and one or two other friends extended John's pattern of holy living into the germ of a movement. Within three years the group's public activities, such as visiting local jails, helping widows, and teaching poor children, brought attention to them, along with several epithets such as Supererogation Men, Holy Club, and Bible Moths. By 1732 they were known as Methodists, partly because of their "new method" of theology (a brand of ARMINIANISM) and their various "methods" for implementing Christianity in the individual and corporate existence. The name Methodist soon found its way into the national print media and eventually persisted as a denominator for the Wesleyan movement in and beyond the eighteenth century.

John Gambold, a friend of both Charles and John at Oxford, described Charles as being "deeply sensible" of John's seniority—"I never observed any person have a more real deference for another than he constantly had for his brother.” Gambold felt that Charles imitated his older brother so much that, as he said, “could I describe one of them, I should describe both.” In some cases, chronologically, the older brother John had precedence over his younger brother. In other matters, however, Charles preceded his older brother, such as in his evangelical spiritual experience and his marriage.

Georgia and London

Charles was appointed as secretary to James Oglethorp, founder and governor of the American colony of Georgia. His ordination was intended to allow him to assist his brother John with the priestly duties in Savannah and Frederica. In preparation for his duties Charles copied several of his brother’s sermons while the brothers were sailing to America. Once there, however, Charles appears not to have fared well with either the colonists or their leaders, and within five months of his arrival he returned to ENGLAND, purportedly to recruit help for the religious enterprise in the colony. In that, he was somewhat successful, helping to recruit his friend and younger Oxford colleague, GEORGE WHITEFIELD, who eventually replaced John Wesley in Savannah, beginning in 1738.

Having encountered German Pietists in Georgia, Charles fell under their continuing tutelage in London, especially that of Peter Böhler and John Bray, both Moravians (see PIETISM; MORAVIAN CHURCH). Although Charles was not fully inclined toward their perspective, he experienced a sense of spiritual assurance on Whitsunday, May 21, 1738, which has at times been described as his “CONVERSION.” His description of the moment, “I felt a strange palpitation of heart,” presages his brother’s comment three days later that his heart was “strangely warmed.”

Charles’s experience seems to have inspired his poetic muse. Within days, brother John went through a similar experience and, to mark the occasion, the brothers sang a new hymn that Charles had written to celebrate his newfound faith (either “Where Shall my Wondering Soul Begin” or “And Can it Be that I Should Gain”). Charles noted the first anniversary of this experience by writing one of his most beloved hymns, “Oh for a Thousand Tongues to Sing.” This outpouring of the spirit represented the beginnings of a lifelong habit of letting his spirit sing through his pen.

Hymns and Poems

Charles’s output of poems over the following years is estimated at nearly nine thousand, including some of the most familiar hymns in Christendom, such as “Hark! the Herald Angels Sing,” “Love Divine All Loves Excelling,” and “Christ the Lord is Risen Today.” Of Charles’s hymn “Wrestling Jacob” (sometimes known by its first line, “Come, O Thou Traveler Unknown”), ISAAC WATTS reputedly felt that “that single poem was worth all the verses he himself had written.” The Wesleyan hymns remain favorites in most Christian denominations and appear throughout their hymnals.

Most of Charles’s poetry was never set to music. His published collections include verses that paraphrase every chapter in the BIBLE, works on the Trinity, and poems for nearly every special occasion in the church year. Many of the publications he jointly produced with his brother John, who usually had the final editorial word. John was not a totally uncritical admirer of his brother’s work. He refused to print the now-familiar “Jesus, Lover of my Soul” in the Methodist collection of hymns in 1780 because it leaned too much in the direction of Moravian sentimentality. On several occasions Charles produced hymn pamphlets independently to avoid his brother’s editorial pen.

Charles’s writings unpublished during his lifetime included poetry that criticized the British military effort during the American Rebellion. A special target was General William Howe, whose actions were summarized in the lines, “His Sovereign basely disobey’d; /His trust perfidiously betray’d;/His Country sold, his duty slighted.” Charles also produced a series of poems that castigated the American “patriots” and defended the colonists who remained loyal to the king. This collection is typified by the poem “Written in October 1782, For the Loyal Americans,” in which Charles gave high praise to those martyrs who “lost their all from Principle” in a place “where Treason and Rebellion reign.”

Methodist Revival and Theology

As the Methodist revival gained momentum in the late 1730s, Charles continued to work with John in spreading the gospel. In fact he also continued to preach some of his brother’s earlier sermons for several years, as his own theology developed. By mid-1739 both Wesley brothers were PREACHING at times to thousands of people: Charles saw this as God having “set his seal on my ministry.”

Although not identical, the THEOLOGY of the Wesley brothers was similar: during this early period John unhesitatingly included Charles’s sermon, “Awake, Thou that Sleepest” (1742) in his own first collection of published sermons (1746). Minor differences on ideas and approaches did arise over the years. In 1766 John suggested to Charles that “in connection, I beat you” but that Charles was better in “strong, short, pointed sentences.” John also encouraged Charles to proceed in the directions that God had “peculiarly” called him: to “press the instantaneous blessings” while John enforced “the gradual work.” As for the process of SALVATION, Charles seems to have had an earlier sense that the “almost Christian,” the one who is struggling with the faith, should be taken seriously as having the “faith of a servant.” John seems to have persisted longer in the sense that the “almost Christian” was no Christian at all. The focus and goal of their messages was in both cases essentially the same—to spread scriptural holiness across the land.

As the movement grew in size and John began to use more lay preachers to provide leadership in the Methodist societies, Charles became concerned about this practice. By the 1750s he tried to force John to rely less on the lay preachers and to be more selective in his choice of who was “set apart” to preach. In the ongoing dispute over this matter Charles tended to emphasize the need for gifts of intelligence and oratory in preaching, whereas John was more concerned about whether the preachers evidenced the GRACE of God. During the 1750s John appointed Charles as the monitor and examiner of the preachers. Charles took his job seriously, ferreting out the “counterfeiters and slackers” and sending several preachers back to their earlier trades.

Marriage and Family

In the mid-1740s Charles became enamored of Sarah Gwynne, a Welsh woman from a prominent family. Their marriage in 1749, somewhat grudgingly approved by brother John, included an arrangement whereby Charles would receive £100 per annum from the proceeds of the Methodist book trade. In spite of some beginning tensions between the brothers over the matter, Charles and Sally maintained a happy marriage throughout their years together. They survived the sadness of losing several children in childbirth and infancy, holding to the joys that their surviving daughter (also named Sarah) and two sons brought them. Charles Jr. and Samuel (who brought Bach’s music back into view) both became trained musicians and perpetuated the musical heritage of the family into the successive generations (including another Charles Wesley and Samuel Sebastian Wesley, noted organist and composer).

When John decided to marry Grace Murray, Charles intervened in a manner that has often been considered inappropriate and unkind: he hurried his brother’s fiancée off to Newcastle and married her to John Bennett, who was both a previous suitor and one of Wesley’s preachers. Although the brothers were quickly reconciled, the matter left a scar on their relationship that never quite seemed to heal.

The Wesley home in Bristol became a haven to which Charles happily returned at the end of his preaching tours, which became less frequent as time went on. In 1771 Charles moved his family to London, partly to be closer to the headquarters of the movement, partly to enjoy the culture of urban life. He traveled very little around the Methodist connection after this move, but continued to preach in and around London.

Tensions with John

Charles also continued to disagree with his brother over matters that seemed to increase the strain between Methodists and the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. Charles once said that his brother was a “Methodist first” and then a Church of England man; Charles himself claimed to be a “Church of England man first” and then a Methodist. He banded with other “Church Methodists” and Anglican CLERGY to keep his brother from taking irregular actions such as registering chapels as dissenting, allowing lay administration of the SACRAMENTS, ordaining unqualified preachers, and engaging in other actions that would bring separation from the church. Charles was not simply a footdragger, but he represented the loyal opposition to some of John's actions that seemed to many to compromise the Methodists' position within the Church of England. At the same time Charles was always the younger brother. John at times exercised a grating control over some of Charles's actions. Nevertheless, Charles was frequently able to forestall several of John's less fortunate inclinations. They constantly inspired and assisted each other in many crucial ways.

When John Wesley took the decisive step after the American Revolution of ordaining ministers for the new Methodist body in the UNITED STATES, Charles considered that John had gone beyond the prerogatives of an Anglican priest, and also blamed THOMAS COKE for wrongly influencing John. He expressed his sentiments about this "pretended Episcopal action" in a couplet that has become a familiar epithet on this matter: "Wesley his hands on Coke hath laid,/but who laid hands on him?"

As a result of the many tensions between the Wesley brothers, Charles became less active in the leadership of the Methodist movement. After 1765 Charles did not even attend the annual conference of preachers, in spite of the rhetoric about the conference being those preachers in connection with "the Rev. Messrs. John and Charles Wesley," as the title of the document continued to state for several years. In 1785 John Wesley wrote a wrenching letter to him, pleading for at least a show of unity: "Do not hinder me if you will not help," the older brother scolded. "Perhaps, if you had kept close to me, I might have done better. However, with or without help, I creep on."

Death

When Charles contracted what became his final illness John was traveling in the North country. At first, not realizing the seriousness of the illness, John suggested that Charles get more outdoor exercise: "You must go out every day or die." By that time Charles was unable and, in fact, died on March 29, 1788, before John could return to London. In the days immediately after hearing of his brother's death, John was moved to silence and tears when singing his brother's hymn, "Come, O Thou Traveler Unknown" when he came to the words of the third and fourth lines, "My company before is gone, and I am left alone with thee."

Charles was buried in the churchyard at Marylebone Church, his parish church. John, who had established a nonconsecrated cemetery behind the Methodist preaching house on City Road, had earlier mocked Charles's concern about "proper" burial, asking how deep the ground was consecrated and what would happen to the souls of those who might be buried deeper. In spite of the tensions between the brothers during their later years, John missed his brother, who at one point he had assumed would succeed him in the leadership of the Methodist movement.

Why Charles was not more involved in the social mission of the Methodist movement, especially in his later years, is something of a mystery. Nevertheless, his lasting contribution to the hymnody of the age carried these concerns on the wings of music composed by others. He therefore helped to fix the message and mission of the Wesleyan movement in the consciousness of believers in all ages.

See also Hymns and Hymnals; Methodism; Methodism, England; Methodism, North America; Wesleyan Church; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Baker, Frank. Charles Wesley's Verse: An Introduction. London: Epworth Press, 1988.

———. Charles Wesley as Revealed in his Letters. Madison, NJ: Charles Wesley Society, 1995.

Beckerlegge, Oliver, and S.T.Kimbrough. The Unpublished Poetry of Charles Wesley. 3 vols. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1988–1992.

Osborn, George. The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley. 13 vols. London: Wesleyan Methodist Conference Office, 1868–1872.

Tyson, John. Charles Wesley; A Reader. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Secondary Sources:

Berger, Teresa. Theology in Hymns. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1995.

Kimbrough, S.T., ed. Charles Wesley, Poet and Theologian. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1992.

Newport, Kenneth. The Sermons of Charles Wesley. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Tyson, John. Charles Wesley on Sanctification. Grand Rapids, MI: Asbury Press, 1986.

RICHARD P.HEITZENRATER

WESLEY, JOHN (1703–1791)

Founder of the Methodist movement. John was the fourteenth or fifteenth child and second surviving son of Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth, and his wife Susanna Annesley, who was the daughter of Samuel Annesley, a noted dissenting minister. His early training in the home was a combination of Puritan discipline (see PURITANISM), high-Church religion, and academic rigor. At age ten he went to Charterhouse School, London (1713–1720), after which he matriculated at Christ Church, Oxford University. He received his B.A. degree in 1724 and pursued an academic career, taking the requisite steps in the following four years by being ordained DEACON, receiving a fellowship at Lincoln College, graduating M.A., and being ordained priest.

Oxford

While studying for his ordination exam Wesley embraced holy living in the tradition of Thomas a Kempis, JEREMY TAYLOR, and WILLIAM LAW. His life took on a style that could best be described as a “meditative piety” that focused on the virtues in an attempt to imitate the life of Christ. In this approach he measured his developing spirituality through disciplined self-examination and diary keeping, similar to the method prescribed by Ignatius Loyola in the introduction to his Spiritual Exercises. In 1729, upon his return to the university from a short period of service as curate for his father in Epworth, John was joined in this venture by his brother CHARLES WESLEY and two other friends. Within a year one of the friends, William Morgan, suggested adding to their agenda of study and piety a more public program of social service, such as schooling orphans and visiting prisoners. This program of social concern was visible in the town and earned the group a variety of nicknames, including “Godly Club,” “Holy Club,” and “Supererogation Men.” At this point Wesley’s Arminian theology was viewed by some critics, especially Calvinists, as a “new method” of doing theology, and combined with his living strictly by method and rule (there was a method for everything from reading to visiting), his followers became known as “Methodists.” This name became fixed on them by the publication of a descriptive pamphlet, The Oxford Methodists, in early 1733.

By the following year the Methodists numbered about four dozen (including Benjamin Ingham and GEORGE WHITEFIELD), in a network of small groups throughout several colleges of the university. At least one associated group met in the town and was led by a woman, Miss Potter. The groups took their pattern of life and thought from the small group of six or eight students that met with John Wesley. This structure of small groups, with subdivisions into even smaller bands, follows the pattern set by his father’s religious society at Epworth at the turn of the century and prefigures the basic pattern of Methodist organization later.

Wesley’s sermons and other writings from this period illustrate his own theological journey, strongly grounded in his Anglican background but influenced by the teachings of the Early Church, the thinking of the Puritans, the discipline of the late medieval and English Pietists (see PIETISM), and the introspection of the mystics. His voracious reading during this period set the pattern for his subsequent theological development; a large proportion of works that he quotes during his later years come from works that he read at Oxford. Some of his distinctive theological ideas, such as prevenient GRACE and Christian perfection (see SANCTIFICATION), have their roots in his thinking and writing during this period. Given the similarities between the organization, theology, and mission of the Oxford Methodists and the characteristics of his later movement, it is not surprising that, in his later historical reflections on the movement, Wesley referred to this Oxford period as “the first rise of METHODISM.”

Georgia

In 1732 Wesley, like his father Samuel earlier, had become a corresponding member of the SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE. When his father died in 1735, John answered the Society's invitation to become a volunteer missionary to the new North American colony of Georgia, recently founded by his father's friend, colonel James Oglethorpe. Subsequently assigned by the Georgia Trustees and supported by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, Wesley became parish priest of Savannah, where he served with some limited success. Attendance at Morning Prayers and Communion increased during his tenure, which was marked by a strict adherence to the rubrics of the church. While serving the diverse membership of his parish he also sharpened his language skills in German, Italian, French, and Spanish. In 1737 he published in Charleston A Collection of Psalms and Hymns, the first English hymn book printed in America.

In April 1736 Wesley discovered from one of his fellow missionaries, Benjamin Ingham, that a small religious society was meeting in Savannah, having begun the previous summer under the leadership of the parish clerk, Robert Hows. Although they agreed to support the work of that group, such assistance did not begin until half a year later. In the meantime, in June 1737, Wesley himself began a small society in Frederica along Methodist lines (meeting extracurricular to the church services). Combined with his subsequent association with the growing Savannah religious society, Wesley looked back on this period as "the second rise of Methodism."

Very early in his Georgia venture, Wesley fell in love with Sophey Hopkey, eighteen-year-old niece of the chief magistrate, Thomas Causton. Wesley's High Church inclinations, combined with an inept courtship of Sophey, served to sharpen the edge of his criticism of Causton and Oglethorpe for mismanagement. Accusations flew in both directions. The magistrate finally seated a biased grand jury that indicted Wesley on ten trumped-up charges that led to his hasty departure from Georgia in 1737.

England

Back in ENGLAND, Wesley reported his Georgia experience to the trustees of the colony. He resumed his activities within the religious society movement, especially in London and Oxford. He also continued to pursue his spiritual search for assurance of SALVATION, which had been spurred by his acquaintance with the German Pietists in Georgia, especially August Hermann Spangenberg. His quest was heightened in London by his friendship with a Moravian, Peter Böhler (see MORAVIAN CHURCH), with whom he formed a society in Fetter Lane in May 1738, an event that he later called the "third rise of Methodism." Although he was indeed present on that occasion, in his recounting of the events he tended to portray himself as having a more central role than is evident from other accounts. Nevertheless, with Böhler's departure from London, Wesley soon assumed more of a leadership role within the group.

On Pentecost Sunday of that year, John's brother Charles had an experience of the assurance of faith that the Moravians had been emphasizing as prerequisite to salvation or calling oneself Christian. Charles characterized the moment as causing a "strange palpitation of heart." Three days later, on May 24, John Wesley had a similar experience in a society meeting in Aldersgate Street. In his journal account of the event he claimed that his "heart was strangely warmed" and that he felt "an assurance that Christ had died for me." He then adopted the Moravian stance of saying that he was now a Christian, "justified by FAITH alone," whereas previously he had been trusting in his own righteousness. Although he had been preaching "salvation by faith" since March 1738 at Peter Böhler's suggestion, his PREACHING now took on a new sense of confidence. Little changed in the response to his ministry, however, until a self-proclaimed "new era" in his life began the following year. In response to George Whitefield's suggestion, he started preaching this theology of "faith alone" and "free grace" in the out-of-doors at Bristol in April 1739 to thousands of people at a time. Their positive reaction to this message, seen by him as the action of the Holy Spirit, verified his own experience and stance.

For the next several years Wesley tested and rejected many of the Moravian assumptions that had led him to see faith as the only requirement for salvation. His maturing theology embraced the necessity of both faith and ("in some sense") good works, both undergirded by a pervasive theology of grace. His emphasis on free grace, along with his espousal of the Arminian emphasis on free will, led him also to challenge directly the teaching of the "eternal decrees" (PREDESTINATION) espoused by George Whitefield and other Calvinists (see CALVINISM).

Wesleyan Revival

The Methodist revival was part of a larger "evangelical revival," in America often called the Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS). Not all Methodists were Wesleyans; some of his early friends did not stay within his movement. Whitefield's Calvinist leanings, for instance, led him to associate with Lady Huntingdon's movement, a separate parallel Calvinist Methodist revival. Until the mid-1740s, in fact, Whitefield was the main target of most anti-Methodist literature, his notoriety growing from his exuberant preaching style. Although Wesley's preaching could not match the oratorical mastery of Whitefield, his preaching in the out-of-doors often attracted thousands of listeners. His style was apparently devoid of the bombast one might expect from an evangelist: one eyewitness even observed that Wesley might be mistaken for a talking marble statue if he had not moved one hand to turn the pages of his sermon. However, like JONATHAN EDWARDS, whose writings influenced Wesley, the content of his message moved his listeners far beyond the manner of his preaching.

The spread of the Wesleyan revival entailed in part the amalgamation of several local REVIVALS. The increasing organization of the movement beginning in the 1740s resulted from not only the wide traveling of the Wesley brothers but also the networking of local revivals, often started and led by lay preachers who wanted to associate with the Wesleyans. By the 1760s the movement had attracted over 20,000 members, and the organization had developed a local and national structure that required annual meetings (conferences) and printed handbooks of doctrine and discipline (minutes). John viewed this movement as a manifestation of divine providence and asserted that God had raised up the Methodist preachers “to reform the nation, especially the Church, and to spread Scriptural holiness across the land.”

Doctrine and Discipline

Wesley felt that the proper development of the United Societies of the People Called Methodists depended on uniformity of DOCTRINE and disciplined Christian living (see CHURCH DISCIPLINE). To these ends he called the preachers together for annual conferences to promote doctrinal integrity and uniform practices. The published minutes of these meetings began to provide the handbook of Methodist thought and organization. Although the only requirement for joining a Methodist society was the desire “to flee from the wrath to come and [to be] saved from sin,” Wesley’s “General Rules” outlined the specific ways the members should demonstrate their desire for salvation, by (1) doing all the good they could, (2) avoiding evil of every kind (the main ones listed), and (3) attending to the means of grace. Quarterly examinations of members, with the award of “class tickets” to those who passed muster, enforced these rules. Largely because of this strict discipline, the Methodist movement in England never grew very fast during the eighteenth century. They were a noticeable but small minority: the 72,000 British members at the time of Wesley’s death represented less than one percent of the population.

Unlike Whitefield, Wesley spent as much time organizing his followers into societies as he did preaching to the masses, so that the people would have spiritual fellowship and nurture, and not become “a rope of sand.” The LAITY provided much of the leadership for the societies: preachers, class leaders, band leaders, stewards, trustees, visitors of the sick. For these he not only developed rules and methods for their groups, but also furnished educational and devotional publications for their edification. Wesley published over four hundred books and pamphlets for his people, including a fifty-volume Christian Library with abridgements and extracts of what he thought were the most important works of divinity in the history of Christian thought. His eight volumes of published sermons (1787–1788) were largely written treatises on Christian theology, nurture, and edification rather than transcripts of his more anecdotal style preaching; Sir Walter Scott remembered Wesley’s preaching for the stories. His collected Works (1772–1774) constituted thirty-two volumes and included some abridgements of other authors. He also published textbooks for history, science, logic, languages, classics, and other subjects that he thought a wellfurnished mind should master. The school he guided at Kingswood, near Bristol, provided a curriculum for children and a course of “academical learning” that he thought surpassed the quality of an Oxford or Cambridge baccalaureate degree.

Although most elements of Wesley’s movement were intentionally designed to renew the CHURCH OF ENGLAND, these same developments gave the Methodists a sense of distinctive self-identification that eventually led to their separation from the church after Wesley's death. During his lifetime he constantly reiterated his intention "not to separate," but many people, including his brother Charles, read his actions as spelling de facto separation by the 1780s. Since mid-century the movement had spread into SCOTLAND, IRE-LAND, and the American colonies. With the revolt of the colonies and the return to England of the Anglican clergy, Wesley ordained his own leaders to provide sacramental services and episcopal leadership for the American Methodists who became organized into a separate church, the Methodist Episcopal Church. He refused to ordain Methodist preachers in countries where the Church of England persisted.

The Methodist "connection," organized around those preachers "in connection with" John Wesley, was an identifiable phenomenon on the religious scene in the early 1740s. Their detractors included not only those, such as Calvinists and Moravians, who disagreed with some of their theology, but also satirical writers whose portrayals of Wesley's ideas and actions fed on popular distrust of religious enthusiasm and fanaticism. The shortcomings of his private life largely escaped public notice, however, especially his aborted engagement to Grace Murray in 1749 (who his brother Charles married to one of his preachers while John was out of the country), and his failed marriage to a wealthy London widow, Mary Vazeille, in 1752 (who left him after a few years out of jealousy, spite, and perhaps loneliness). His attention was always directed to the work of renewing the church to which he saw God directing him.

Practical Theology

Wesley's theology was forged in the midst of controversy and tempered by his understanding and experience of "the Scripture way of salvation." Although his theological pilgrimage took him through several spheres of influence, including Pietism, Puritanism, mysticism, and the early church, his basic theological framework persistently reflected his Church of England heritage. His attempt to hold divergent positions in tension produced a "mediating" theology, although his occasional forays into controversy led him at times to stress one or another side against a position leaning to the other side of the spectrum. Taking his mature theology as a whole, he can be seen as holding to both sacramentalism and EVANGELISM, free will and free grace, faith and good works, without any inconsistency in his stance. Although he was probably not as unchanging through his lifetime as he sometimes claimed, there is probably more continuity between the young and the old Mr. Wesley than has usually been noticed.

His preaching centered upon what he termed "the three grand scriptural doctrines—original sin, JUSTIFICATION by faith, and holiness consequent thereon." This formulation occasionally varied in its terminology, such as one instance when he refers to the main doctrines of Methodism as (1) repentance, which he called the "porch of religion"; (2) justification by grace through faith, the "door of religion"; and (3) sanctification or holiness, "religion itself." The possibility of experiencing entire sanctification, or Christian perfection, in this lifetime was an essential Wesleyan doctrine that prevented most clergy of the Established Church from joining his revival. This also distinguished him from the generality of Lutherans (see LUTHERANISM) and many Calvinists. His major theological detractors never seemed to get beyond the terminology to hear his explanation that this doctrine did not assert “perfectionism” or “works-righteousness” but simply claimed as a gift the gracious possibility in this lifetime of loving God and neighbor to the fullest. Additionally, Wesley’s conviction that one could know an assurance of salvation (both forgiveness or justification, and holiness or sanctification) created tension with the clergy, even though it was a lifelong emphasis that shaped his own spiritual pilgrimage. Exaggerated perversions of his doctrines by his own preachers, such as the perfectionists Thomas Maxfield and John Bell, did not help his cause.

Wesley’s use of uneducated lay preachers to supply the pulpits of his connection led him to require that they preach “no other doctrines” than those contained in his collection of published sermons and his commentary on the New Testament. These doctrines, distinctively evangelical but in accord with the Church of England standards of doctrine (THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, and Book of Homilies), were also impressed on the people’s spirits through hundreds of popular hymns written and published by the Wesley brothers (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). The tendency of many evangelical preachers to focus entirely on CONVERSION led Wesley to criticize the popular “gospel preacher,” so-called, whom he saw as but “a pert, self-sufficient animal, that has neither sense nor grace.” Their habit, he pointed out, was simply to “bawl out something about Christ, or his blood, or justification by faith, and his hearers cry out, ‘What a fine Gospel sermon!’” His criticism was grounded in a firm conviction that in overemphasizing grace, these preachers neglected the obligations of the law, which the grace of God in Christ has not totally obliterated but rather has helped us to fulfill. In this sense Wesley always linked justification with sanctification, faith and good works, and love of God and love of neighbor as prerequisites for the Christian life.

Christian practice typically outweighed doctrinal ORTHODOXY, both in Wesley’s thought and in the Methodist ethos. True religion was summed up in the Great Commandment to love God and neighbor. Wesley felt strongly that the gospel was contrary to solitary religion, especially as exemplified in mysticism. For Wesley there is no true holiness but social holi-ness, manifest in the fellowship of believers. An important part of the Christian life within the committed community was the expression of a faith that works through love. He taught that works of piety and works of mercy were both necessary for the Christian and that both represented “means of grace” or channels of God’s active presence and power.

Mission

On this theological base Wesley developed an array of programs to assist his people. He organized schools for both girls and boys, most prominent that at Kingswood, which still functions. At his preaching houses in London, Bristol, and Newcastle he began medical clinics for the indigent. Supported by donors with means, he provided loan funds for small business ventures and furnished subsidized housing for widows and children. He organized a system of pension funds for “tired and worn out preachers, their widows and children.” For the poor of his societies he collected clothes, food, and money.

The focus of Wesley’s mission remained primarily on the British Isles. When asked by THOMAS COKE in the 1780s to support a mission to the West Indies, Wesley responded that there was more to do at home than they could handle at the moment and that there was no apparent call from God in that direction. The major exception to Wesley’s focus on the British work was his interest in America. In response to a request from New York he began sending preachers to the New World in 1769. For a few years he thought seriously about returning to the colonies himself to supervise the work there. Eventually the leadership of Thomas Rankin and FRANCIS ASBURY convinced him that his personal presence was not needed. The outbreak of the Revolution, which he came to deplore, sealed his inclination to stay in England. His continuing interest in and support of the work in America, providing a plan for a separate organization there after the Peace of Paris, resulted in a significant Wesleyan stamp on the continuing mission of Methodism in the new UNITED STATES.

Wesley’s published Journal is a monument to and apologia for Methodism rather than a simple autobiography. Its pages are filled with a description of the developing organization, theology, and mission of Methodism. It is an unabashed propaganda piece for his movement, filled with accounts of pious lives and holy deaths, earthly enemies and divine retribution. Through it all, however, his personal attributes shine forth, at times somewhat exaggerated by his own pen in spite of his aversion to self-aggrandizement. The reader can see in these pages both the evolution of the movement and the growth of Wesley’s own spiritual and theological perspective, in spite of his protests of unchanging constancy. His own habit of broad reading reflects his wide range of interests from theology to poetry, science to philosophy, travel to novels, classics to best-sellers. He became a model of Christian activity; or, as one contemporary Swedish observer, Prof. J.H.Liden, noted, “He is the personification of piety.”

Nevertheless, Wesley was the target of persistent attack, especially during the first generation of the Methodist revival. He did, however, outlive most of his early detractors and became somewhat of a respected phenomenon of human and spiritual energy in his old age. For over half a century he traveled the countryside for an estimated quarter million miles, preaching over 40,000 times, while publishing over 400 items. He was not afraid to challenge government explanations of poverty; he was not slow to attack English support of the slave trade. One of his last letters was to the young WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, M.P., asking him to move Parliament toward abolishing that “vile abomination,” SLAVERY in America (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

Person

In his mature years Wesley became, as one obituary noted, the most famous private person in England. More than one observer during his lifetime noted a “venerableness” in his manner that was heightened in his later years. From age forty onward, he was the subject of many portrait painters, including several Fellows of Royal Academy, such as

Sir Joshua Reynolds, Nathaniel Hone, and William Hamilton. Pottery busts of him were crested by Staffordshire craftsmen Enoch Wood and Josiah Wedgwood. One contemporary, Thomas Haweis, described Wesley as “of the inferior size, his visage marked with intelligence, singularly neat and plain in his dress; a little cast in his eye, observable on particular occasions; upright, graceful, and remarkably active.” From an early age he saw himself as a “brand plucked out of the fire,” but always disclaimed any sense of special destiny. He has often been viewed as an autocratic leader, but his friends recognized his ability to listen. One colleague noted that Wesley possessed a fund of history and anecdote that “rendered his company as entertaining as instructive.”

Wesley’s physical stature was diminutive: height five foot three inches and weight about fourteen stone (about 126 pounds). As a preacher, he was outshined by George Whitefield; as a hymn-writer, he was surpassed by his brother Charles. As a theologian, he was more synthetic than original; as an organizer, he shaped a movement that never included even one percent of the population of his homeland. Nevertheless, the energy that he exhibited well into his eighties, as well as the total impact of his person and message on Great Britain, has given rise to a reputation that belies his diminutive physique and often portrays his influence in nearly epic proportions.

Wesley died in his eighty-eighth year. To avoid a public commotion, his body was buried privately at 5:00 A.M. on the morning of his public funeral service. His obituary in the Gentleman’s Magazine (1791) noted that he was “one of the few characters who outlived enmity and prejudice, and received, in his latter years, every mark of respect from every denomination,” and added that “he must be considered as one of the most extraordinary characters this or any age every produced.”

See also Anglicanism; Arminianism; Methodism, England; Methodism, North America; Wesleyan Church; Wesleyan Holiness Movement; Wesleyanism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wesley, John. The Bicentennial Edition of the Works of John Wesley. 35 vols. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1976-.

Secondary Sources:

Baker, Frank. John Wesley and the Church of England. London: Epworth, 2000.

———. A Union Catalogue of the Publications of John and Charles Wesley. Stone Mountain, GA: Zimmerman, 1991.

Campbell, Ted A. John Wesley and Christian Antiquity; Religious Vision and Cultural Change. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1991.

Collins, Kenneth J. The Scripture Way of Salvation; The Heart of John Wesley’s Theology. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1997.

Heitzenrater, Richard P. Wesley and the People Called Methodists. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1995.

———. The Elusive Mr. Wesley. 2d edition. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 2003.

Jennings, Theodore W. Good News to the Poor: John Wesley’s Evangelical Ethics. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1990.

- Jones, Scott J. John Wesley's Conception and Use of Scripture. Nashville, TN: Kingswood, 1995.
- Maddox, Randy L. Responsible Grace; John Wesley's Practical Theology. Nashville, TN: Kingswood, 1994.
- Outler, Albert O. John Wesley. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964.
- . Theology in the Wesleyan Spirit. Nashville, TN: Tidings, 1975.
- Rack, Henry, Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism. 3rd ed. London: Epworth, 2002.
- Weber, Theodore R. Politics in the Order of Salvation: New Directions in Wesleyan Political Ethics. Nashville, TN: Kingswood, 2001.

RICHARD HEITZENRATER

WESLEYAN CHURCH

The Wesleyan Church originated in a 1968 merger of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America and the Pilgrim Holiness Church. Both the antecedent bodies had been major participants in the nineteenth-century holiness revival movement within the Protestant churches. This common history in the HOLINESS MOVEMENT became the focus of the union. The church is categorized within Protestantism as a Wesleyan/ Holiness denomination (see WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT).

The failure of METHODISM to respond favorably to the call of abolitionist pastors Orange Scott, Luther Lee, and others for the church to acknowledge the moral evil of SLAVERY and support the reformers' call for its immediate end led to the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist denomination in 1843 (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). Many Presbyterian, Congregational, and Quaker abolitionists also joined the new Methodist body. After the CIVIL WAR many of the Wesleyan Methodist reformers returned to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Others remained with the newer Methodist body and turned their energies and resources more toward EVANGELISM and promotion of Christian holiness and less to continuing reform issues such as equality of the sexes, especially the ordination of WOMEN CLERGY, and prohibition.

When former Methodist Episcopal pastor Martin Wells Knapp and Quaker evangelist Seth Cook Rees founded the Apostolic Holiness Union and Prayer League in 1897, a majority of its members, like the Wesleyan Methodists before them, had deep roots in traditional Methodism. By the end of the century, however, the original nondenominational Union and Prayer League constituents consisted of significant numbers not only of members of Methodist and other established churches, but also of large numbers of nonchurched converts that the movement had garnered from its vigorous revivalism in the UNITED STATES and CANADA and its mission stations around the world. The chief loyalty of these constituents was more to the Holiness movement than to any of the established denominations. Eventually the Pilgrim Holiness Church, as the Union finally became known, became one of a number of new denominations, which provided institutional organization to the Wesleyan/ Holiness revival at the turn of the twentieth century (see CHURCH OF GOD, ANDERSON, INDIANA; CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE; Free Methodist Church; BRETHERN IN CHRIST; SALVATION ARMY). Knapp and Rees had been closely associated with A.B.Simpson of the CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE, and consequently had incorporated his doctrines of divine healing and premillennialism into their Wesleyan/Arminian theology.

The Wesleyan Church emphasizes CONVERSION, holiness of heart and life, belief in divine healing, and the imminent return of Jesus Christ, but does not explicitly define a millennial position. The Wesleyan Church's membership in the Christian Holiness Partnership (formerly the Christian Holiness Association) continues the church's commitment to the Wesleyan/ Holiness movement's doctrinal and experiential understanding of Christian Perfection (see SANCTIFICATION). The Wesleyan Church's membership in the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL acknowledges its Protestant ORTHODOXY and Wesleyan/Anglican roots. Its membership in the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS represents its biblical and evangelical stance.

Although Wesleyans share a conservative theological stance with other evangelical churches, the more experientially oriented Wesleyan/Arminian theology creates tensions with other evangelicals on several issues. Their expectations of GRACE with its possibilities for personal and social holiness are too optimistic for many in the Reformed tradition. Furthermore, the Wesleyan/Arminian understanding of the freedom of the human will with its implication for the nature of Christian assurance clashes sharply with the classical understanding of perseverance in the Reformed tradition. This is especially true in the Wesleyan/Holiness churches' relation to the fundamentalist movement (see FUNDAMENTALISM) within EVANGELICALISM. The former's application of theological presuppositions to the life and mission of the church often differ sharply with that of the latter. This may be seen especially in the Wesleyan emphasis on Christian experience, the centrality of the Pentecost event, and the doctrine of the Holy Spirit in salvation history and the life of the church. At this latter point, less obvious differences distinguish Wesleyan/Holiness churches from other evangelicals in the Pentecostal Movement, especially Pentecostal/Holiness churches. The understanding of life in the Spirit of both groups often runs parallel with the other, but Wesleyans' rejection of PENTECOSTALISM'S affirmation of glossolalia (or speaking in TONGUES) as the unique sign of the baptism of the Holy Spirit remains the defining difference between the two movements. Wesleyan teaching also has tended to stress the power of the Spirit to produce a holy life, whereas the tendency in Pentecostalism has been to stress the Spirit's power in the spiritual gifts and miracles.

The church has a total membership of 315,000; 129,000 of these are in the United States and Canada. The North American General Conference shares with the Philippine General Conference and the Caribbean Provisional General Conference in maintaining churches, educational institutions, hospitals, and social agencies in more than forty countries.

See also Arminianism; Faith Healing; Friends, Society of; Methodism, North America; Millenarians and Millennialism; Presbyterianism, Congregationalism

References and Further Reading

Caldwell, Wayne E, ed. Revivalists and Reformers: A History of the Wesleyan Church.

Indianapolis, IN: Wesley Press, 1992.

Dieter, Melvin E. "The Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century." In Studies in Evangelicalism, no. 1. Metuchen, NJ and London: The Scarecrow Press, 1980, 1995.

Jones, Charles E. "A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement." In ATLA Bibliography Series, no. 1. Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1974.

MELVIN E. DIETER

WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT

The Wesleyan Holiness Movement rose out of a renewed concern for the promotion of Christian holiness and social righteousness in the revivalism of the early decades of the nineteenth century. METHODISM'S doctrine of Christian perfection as taught by JOHN WESLEY became the theological and experiential focus of the movement. It called all Christian believers to consecrate themselves wholly to God and, through FAITH, to seek a second crisis of God's GRACE in their hearts that would cleanse them from their innate bent toward SIN and fill them with a whole-hearted love for God and others by the power of the Holy Spirit. This call to "Christianize Christianity" quickly spread throughout revivalistic Protestantism. Many anticipated a new Pentecostal baptism and dispensation of the Holy Spirit. Toward the end of the century many holiness adherents left their churches to organize new churches and agencies more favorable to the movement's concerns. The continuing growth of these Wesleyan Holiness churches, and other movements rooted in the holiness revival, such as the HIGHER LIFE MOVEMENT, the Pentecostal, and the Charismatic movements, have significantly changed evangelical Protestantism's demographics, theology, and praxis.

History

Through her energetic lay EVANGELISM in parlor meetings, CAMP MEETINGS, and publications throughout the Northeast and Canada, Methodist PHOEBE WORRALL PALMER became the leading voice in the pre-Civil War REVIVALS. By 1839 believers in Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopalian, Quaker, Mennonite, and other churches also professed to be sanctified wholly. Oberlin College's CHARLES G.FINNEY and Asa Mahan accommodated the Methodist movement's Wesleyan/Arminian understanding of a "second blessing" to their New School CALVINISM and SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM to form a companion HOLINESS MOVEMENT. In 1867 a group of Methodist pastors under John Inskip gave more organized leadership to the movement. Their National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness garnered thousands of supporters for the hundreds of local holiness associations and the flood of holiness publications that kept the revival flourishing throughout the century.

The Holiness Churches

By the closing decades of the nineteenth century, denominational disciplinary restrictions on holiness CLERGY became more common. In response large numbers of pastors and laypersons who supported the revival joined thousands of its unchurched converts to organize more than a dozen new Wesleyan/Holiness denominations and agencies, including several black denominations, whereas other adherents maintained their membership in the older churches but still supported the movement. Out of a series of realignments and mergers the larger of the holiness organizations and agencies are: the SALVATION ARMY, the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, the CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA), the WESLEYAN CHURCH, the FREE METHODIST CHURCH, the Evangelical Friends Church, and the BRETHREN IN CHRIST CHURCH. The latter two accommodated the theology and spirituality of the holiness movement revival to their respective Quaker (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF) and Anabaptist traditions (see ANABAPTISM) as A.T.Pierson, A.J.Gordon, and A.B. Simpson did to their revivalistic Calvinism. The revival became especially formative in the new Pentecostal and the subsequent Charismatic traditions. In spite of often severe tensions among these children of the revival as they brought the diverse forces of the revival into organized Protestantism, their historic roots in the antecedent ecumenical holiness associations that nurtured and shaped them facilitated their later cooperation in the renewal of twentieth-century EVANGELICALISM. Churches related to the Wesleyan Holiness movement, the Higher Life Movement, and PENTECOSTALISM played a significant role in the organization of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS. The Wesleyan Holiness churches continue to cooperate with one another by their participation in the Christian Holiness Partnership and The Wesleyan Theological Society. Most of them also associate with the National Association of Evangelicals and some with the WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Influence of the Movement

The revival not only both expanded and divided the American churches that gave it birth, but significantly influenced the churches of ENGLAND and Europe through the ministry of Robert Pearsall and HANNAH WHITALL SMITH, prominent in the KESWICK MOVEMENT. They inspired the organization of the Keswick (England) Convention for the Promotion of Holiness, which became a center for holiness adherents in both the established and free churches to reinvigorate evangelical mission agencies and student movements around the world. In GERMANY the Wesleyan holiness message revived the old pietistic centers of the REFORMATION churches and the social concerns of the Inner City Movement. Although the Wesleyan Holiness Movement has always been theologically orthodox and conservative, significant segments within it were persistent advocates for some of the more radical changes that came to the fore only much later in Protestantism in general. Two of the earliest holiness churches, the Wesleyan Methodist Church and the Free Methodist Church, wedded their perfectionism to their call for the immediate abolition of slavery (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). The growing significance of the Pentecost event within the movement supported the public ministry and leadership of WOMEN such as FRANCES WILLARD, CATHERINE BOOTH, and black evangelist Amanda Smith, as well as Palmer, more than half a century before established Protestantism accepted such innovations. The movement also challenged Protestantism to reconsider its theologies of spiritual gifts and of divine healing. Its focus on life in the Spirit and personal and social holiness strongly influenced the spirituality of evangelical Protestantism. The hymns and gospel songs of FANNY CROSBY and other composers within the movement constitute a major segment of evangelical hymnody (see HYMNS AND HYMNALS). Wesleyan/Holiness devotional works such as Hannah Whitall Smith's The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life and Oswald Chamber's My Utmost for His Highest have become classics in Protestantism.

References and Further Reading

- Dayton, Donald Wilber. Discovering an Evangelical Heritage. New York: Harper and Rowe, 1976.
- Dieter, Melvin Easterday. The Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century. 2nd ed. Lanham, MD: The Scarecrow Press, 1995.
- Jones, Charles Edwin. Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement. Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1974.
- Kostlevy, William. A Guide to the Sources of the Wesleyan Holiness Movement in the United States and Canada. Metuchen, NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1994.
- Smith, Timothy Lawrence. Revivalism and Reform in MidNineteenth Century America. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1957.

MELVIN E. DIETER

WESLEYANISM

Wesleyanism is the broad term referring to the overall movement that includes most traditions of METHODISM, the WESLEYAN HOLINESS MOVEMENT, and PENTECOSTALISM. Although these traditions represent varying expressions of Wesleyanism, they hold a common heritage in the life, thought, and ministry of JOHN WESLEY (1703–1791).

Although Wesley never saw himself as anything other than a staunch Anglican, he freely incorporated many different influences into his distinctive articulation of Christian faith and practice. In addition to his obvious CHURCH OF ENGLAND heritage, there were strands of inspiration from Eastern Orthodoxy (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN), Roman Catholicism (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS), MARTIN LUTHER, JOHN CALVIN, JACOBUS ARMINIUS, the Moravians (see MORAVIAN CHURCH), and German PIETISM. That is, Wesleyanism represents a wider range of Christian thought than was found in either the continental reformers or the English reformers. However, this is not to say Wesleyanism is simply an eclectic amalgamation of all other traditions. It is, rather, a distinct expression of Protestant EVANGELICALISM that carries certain identifying features. Wesley was willing to glean from all Christian traditions those elements of their doctrines that he understood to be clearly in keeping with scriptural teaching, but never did he see himself as adopting any position that was contrary to official CHURCH OF ENGLAND doctrine.

It is for these reasons that Wesleyanism has sometimes been rejected by a wide range of groups on the one hand, while simultaneously being embraced by an equally wide range of other groups on the other hand. It also helps to explain why there are so many different contemporary expressions of Wesleyanism, ranging from liberal sociopolitical action to holiness revivalism to Pentecostalism. Each lays valid claim to its Wesleyan heritage, although each tends to emphasize different aspects of that heritage. In spite of often contrary appearances, there is a common doctrinal core of Wesleyanism that eventually gave rise to all these expressions.

Basis of Authority

Wesleyan faith and practice are first of all grounded on a foundation of AUTHORITY known as the Wesleyan Quadrilateral. Wesley used this four-point filter to ensure that his theological understandings were thoroughly orthodox. The quadrilateral was composed of scripture, tradition, reason, and experience.

Scripture was the first and primary source of authority. Any doctrinal concept judged to be contrary to scripture in any way was immediately rejected. In spite of his Oxford education and his wide breadth of reading, Wesley considered himself a man of one book. He immersed himself in the BIBLE as the unquestioned source of divine authority. He believed the scriptures were to be read prayerfully and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. He strove to interpret all passages within their context and in their simplest and most obvious sense, unless this approach led to absurd or self-contradictory conclusions. If a theological concept passed the test of scripture, then it was subjected to the remaining points of the quadrilateral.

The filter of TRADITION referred primarily to the first few centuries of the Christian church, which Wesley held in very high regard. He believed the historical proximity of the Early Church Fathers to the New Testament church gave them the most accurate understanding of the pure Christian faith. He also held strongly to his own Anglican heritage, which he believed to be the best representation of scriptural Christianity.

Wesley was a man of his time, and that time was the Age of Reason. He believed orthodox doctrine would always be supported by sound reason. He was aware that reason taken to its extreme was detrimental to religion, but he did not believe reason and religion were inherently incompatible. In fact, he went so far as to assert that religion void of reason was not true religion at all. He insisted that because God is a God of order and logic, religious dogma and practice must pass the scrutiny of sound reasoning.

Wesley's emphasis on reason was, however, balanced out by his emphasis on experience. They were the two sides of the same coin, each dependent on the other. Reason makes DOCTRINE lucid and guards it from abuse, but experience gives doctrine meaning and vitality. His doctrines of assurance, holiness, and lay preachers serve as examples of some of his understandings that were profoundly affected by his willingness to let experience inform reason. Wesley sought to maintain a fine balance between these two points of his quadrilateral.

Concept of Sin

The distinction between SIN as an inherited condition and sin as a personal act is kept clearly in focus in Wesleyan theology. Wesley followed the traditional Christian view that the Fall of Adam had placed within humanity an inherently corrupted nature. He was not overly concerned with exactly how this sinful nature is "inherited" or spread throughout the human family; he simply accepted its presence as fact. Being the practical theologian that he was, he was more interested in the effects of original sin than its mode of transmission. Like Augustine and Calvin before him, Wesley too understood the corruption of inherited sin in terms of total depravity. He saw that it is systemic and universal, affecting every facet of humanity's being. It instilled within humanity an abnormal egocentrism that manifests itself as an irresistible inclination against the Creator and toward evil.

Although Wesley understood that original or inherited sin was the root of humanity's problems, he also understood that it takes personal acts of sin to give shape to the true face of evil in the world. Original sin in itself does not actually cause hatred, murder, and greed. These and other sins are caused by specific actions and attitudes of people as they give expression to their inherent moral depravity. For Wesley the real problem of sin revolves around the willful decisions of people to commit individual acts of sin. He therefore defined sin as any deliberate violation of God's known law.

The Wesleyan definition of sin is generally more restrictive than the standard Reformed definition. Wesley agreed that the natural limitations of fallen humanity are examples of humanity's inability to live up to the Adamic Law of original perfection. However, he disagreed that these limitations are truly sin. Because of the systemic effects of the Fall on humanity, it is impossible for any post-Fall person to live up to the standard of perfection in which Adam was first created. However, because this state of imperfection is attributed to an inherited condition rather than a personal choice, Wesley could not reconcile himself to see this as sin in the full biblical sense. He believed the only sins for which an individual is held accountable before God are "voluntary sins" (to use his term). That is, conscious awareness and willful intent must be involved for an act or omission to be properly called sin.

Wesley did not see unintentional sins or "involuntary sins" in the same light as voluntary sins. They may be called sin in the technical sense of violating God's law, but because they lack willful intent Wesley did not believe they fulfilled the usual scriptural definition of sin.

Wesley's view of sin is sometimes criticized as being dismissive of the full reality and responsibility of sin. Nevertheless, even though Wesley saw unintentional sin quite differently than intentional sin, he still took it very seriously. He insisted that it still requires the atoning work of Christ. The difference is in how the ATONEMENT of Christ is applied. Wesley believed unintentional sins need divine mercy and intercession, but not necessarily forgiveness because there is no personal culpability attached to them.

Wesleyanism teaches that humanity enjoyed a perfect beginning and an original state of holiness. However, through the Fall of Adam the world was subjected to the universal domination of sin and the total corruption of the human race. Along with Augustinianism and CALVINISM, Wesleyanism takes a pessimistic view of humanity in its fallen state. Wesleyanism does not stop there, however, because it takes an optimistic view of God's response of GRACE.

Grace and Free Will

Wesleyanism affirms that humanity's only deliverance from sin comes from God's grace. Grace is the unmerited mercy that God grants to people. Prevenient grace refers specifically to the grace that God extends even before people ask for it. The Wesleyan understanding of prevenient grace centers on two dimensions—forgiveness and enabling.

Wesley believed God's prevenient grace provided for the forgiveness of original sin. Wesley accepted the prevailing view that the entire human race bore the guilt of Adam's sin. However, he believed this guilt was universally pardoned through God's prevenient grace. Individuals would still need to seek God's forgiveness for their personal acts of sin, but they would not need to seek forgiveness for the guilt associated with original sin. This was already gone by God's mercy. The debilitating effects of the Fall remained, but the guilt associated with it was cancelled.

The enabling aspect of prevenient grace is seen in the fact that, despite its fallen condition, humanity is now enabled by God to recognize its fallen state and to turn toward God. Wesley maintained that through God's act of prevenient grace human nature was partially renewed to the extent that individuals could hear and respond to God's call. This meant that God had enabled fallen humanity to grasp basic spiritual concepts, to respond to God, and to make a willful choice for or against God.

Wesley accepted the traditional view that sin's introduction into the human experience had rendered the human heart incapable in itself of either knowing or responding to God. He agreed with Augustine's teaching that the Fall had reduced all of humanity to a hopeless state of sin. So thorough was this corruption that humans could not even be aware of God's existence, let alone take an initial step toward God.

This understanding of total depravity, however, presented a logical dilemma. If humanity was so hopelessly lost, how could one account for the fact that some actually do turn to God and are saved? Actually, the dilemma was not that there is a way of SALVATION, but that salvation is only realized by some rather than all. If God had chosen to leave humanity in its sin, then all would remain lost. Likewise, if God had chosen to exercise divine sovereignty over the power of evil by saving the human race, then all would be saved, although Wesley, like Augustine, recognized that neither of these scenarios was the case. Instead, only some are saved and only some are lost. Augustine's solution to this problem was the doctrine of PREDESTINATION. In this he was able to affirm that some are saved while also upholding the cardinal doctrines of total depravity and divine sovereignty.

Wesley also upheld the doctrines of total depravity and divine sovereignty, but he did not believe this led inevitably to a doctrine of predestination. Rather, he looked to the thought of Arminius to bring understanding to the apparent conflict between the doctrines of total depravity and divine sovereignty. The Arminian view of predestination was not that God had chosen some individuals for salvation, but that God had predetermined that all who accept Christ would be saved. What God predestined was the means of salvation, not individual destinies. Wesley embraced the Arminian view that predestination of individuals existed only in the sense that God could foresee who would and would not believe.

Wesley's adherence to the Arminian understanding of predestination meant that he also held an Arminian view of free will. He accepted that fallen humanity had lost the capacity to choose righteousness. After the Fall humanity was capable of choosing only from the options of evil. Choices for good were beyond reach. However, Wesley's ARMINIANISM instilled within him the conviction that the restoration of free will was one of the chief benefits of God's prevenient grace. As an act of divine sovereignty God had restored to humanity the freedom to choose between good and evil, even though the corrupted human nature was still bent toward evil.

Implicit within the Arminian Wesleyan concept of predestination is the conviction that individuals can choose to move between states of belief and unbelief. In other words believers can choose to become unbelievers and thus forfeit their salvation. Wesley rejected the doctrine of perseverance of the saints as taught by Calvin. Wesleyanism does not teach that one can “lose” salvation through some unknown sin, or even a specific act of known sin, although Wesleyanism does teach that salvation can be forfeited through conscious and deliberate abandonment of faith in Christ.

The Wesleyan concepts of a partially restored human nature and free will often led to charges of Pelagianism. Wesleyanism, like Arminianism before it, has always denied this charge. Arminian Wesleyanism affirms the Augustinian understanding of divine sovereignty, original sin, and total depravity. However, it rejects the conclusion that these doctrines must result in a doctrine of individual predestination. In that sense Wesleyanism may fairly be identified as semiAugustinian. Likewise, Arminian Wesleyanism embraces the Pelagian regard for free will, but utterly rejects the Pelagian denial of original sin. Therefore, because Wesleyanism simultaneously embraces divine sovereignty, human depravity, and human free will, it may accurately be stated that Wesleyanism is neither purely Augustinian nor Pelagian, but is in fact both semi-Augustinian and semi-Pelagian. Wesleyans do not see this as a contradiction, but as a biblical and logical balance between two extremes.

The Wesleyan concept of Christian faith and experience is rooted in its understanding of God’s grace. It is this high regard for grace that allows Wesleyanism to affirm without any sense of incongruence that (1) humanity is lost in sin, (2) humanity is absolutely powerless to save itself in any way, and (3) through the gift of prevenient grace human beings are awakened to God’s presence and enabled to respond.

Christian Conversion

Wesleyanism views the overall experience of Christian CONVERSION in two categories: what happens to the believer and what happens in the believer—that is, justification and regeneration. When an individual responds to God’s grace by placing faith in the atoning work of Christ and repenting of sin, God extends forgiveness. The new believer is no longer judged by God as guilty of sins committed, but now stands forgiven. Therefore, guilt is removed and the consequences of judgment withdrawn. This is God’s gift of grace to the believer; however, Wesleyanism believes there is more to conversion than mere forgiveness. There is also regeneration, or new birth. The new believer is made new in the image of Christ. Therefore, the new believer is not just viewed differently by God, the believer actually is different. This is the Wesleyan understanding of imparted righteousness.

Wesley did not believe the Reformed teaching of imputed righteousness went far enough. He believed in a type of imputed righteousness, but not in the same way as the reformers. He granted that human salvation was made possible through Christ’s righteousness, but he denied that Christ’s righteousness was merely placed over the new believer. He was not satisfied with the notion that God called the new believer righteous when in fact God knew the believer was not righteous. Wesley believed God viewed the believer as righteous because God had actually made the believer righteous. Whereas justification speaks of a relative change, regeneration speaks of a real change. This is the sense in which Wesleyanism affirms that the righteousness of Christ is both imputed and imparted in the new believer.

Wesley thought of humanity in three states that he identified as the natural, the legal, and the evangelical. Those who live with no regard to God are in the natural state. Individuals in this state are characterized by their apathy toward God. They may hate God, deny God, or simply ignore God. The legal state refers to those who acknowledge God and have some sense of their need for God. They often desire to live for God, but have not yet realized the need to trust Christ alone for forgiveness and salvation. The evangelical state includes those who have consciously turned to Christ and now belong to him in the full sense.

The early Wesley, under the influence of Peter Bohler, did not believe saving faith existed in degrees. One either did or did not have it. However, the post-Aldersgate Wesley came to see that faith does sometimes come in degrees. He saw this most clearly in the distinction between those in the legal state and those in the evangelical state. He expressed this by indicating that those in the legal state had the faith of a servant, whereas those in the evangelical state possessed the faith of a son. Those in the natural state are unconverted. Those in the legal state may be said to be in the process of conversion. Those in the evangelical state have been fully converted.

Assurance

One of the most important features of Wesley's own spiritual life and one of his greatest contributions to eighteenth-century Christianity was his doctrine of assurance. By assurance he meant the confirmation of the Holy Spirit to the believer of God's acceptance. This sense of assurance comes both directly and indirectly.

Direct assurance is the inaudible communication from the Holy Spirit to the heart of the believer. It is the inner peace that brings confidence of one's acceptance before God. The idea of such intimacy with the Holy Spirit was strongly resisted by most people of Wesley's day. It was widely believed that such personal encounters with the Holy Spirit had ended with the New Testament era. Furthermore, if such experiences were promoted, it was feared that all manner of abuses and excesses would quickly follow. This was the charge of "enthusiasm" that was frequently levied against the early Wesleyans. Although this term was used to imply religious fanaticism or extremism, Wesley maintained that assurance of salvation should be a normal feature of the Christian life. He saw it as neither extraordinary nor extremist, but completely ordinary and biblical.

Indirect assurance comes through practical evidence and rational deductions that the believer is able to objectively evaluate. For Wesley the Fruit of the Spirit (Galatians 5:22–23) was one of the most reliable sources of indirect assurance. Others included corporate worship, private prayers, scripture reading, and the general presence of Christian qualities in daily life. The more rationalistic nature of indirect assurance rendered it much more palatable to the Christian establishment.

Wesley was passionate about the doctrine of Christian assurance. This stemmed in many ways from his own personal struggles for assurance in his earlier life. Just as the early Wesley thought there could be no degrees of faith, so he also thought there could be no degrees of assurance. He desperately longed for the assurance of God's acceptance, but he was always left disappointed and frustrated because of his faulty concept of assurance. His early expectations were unrealistic, and therefore self-defeating. However, these expectations changed after Aldersgate and Wesley came to see fluctuations in one's sense of assurance as a normal feature of spiritual development. As his understanding of the work of the Holy Spirit matured he was able to gain perspective and insight. He then came to believe that a healthy understanding of assurance was essential to spiritual vitality. So strong was his passion for this doctrine that he was convinced that the promotion of its revival was one of the primary reasons why God had raised up the Wesleyan movement.

Sanctification

The doctrine of SANCTIFICATION, or holiness, is a theological hallmark of Wesleyanism. Wesley saw the sanctification of believers as God's ultimate purpose in salvation. This means not only forgiving sins, but releasing people from the power of sin. God's plan is to free people from sin and thereby restore them to the state of fellowship with God that they were originally created to enjoy.

The specific point at which Wesley created controversy was in his insistence that the biblical commands for holiness of heart and life were intended for the present life. The fact of these commands is not disputed by the different Christian traditions. What is disputed is the exact manner and timing of when the biblical call to holiness is intended to be realized. The main point of disagreement is whether holiness is for this life or for the life to come. Wesley took the holiness mandate in the literal sense of holiness here and now. It is this emphasis on the present call to holiness that has resulted in sanctification being identified as the most distinctive doctrine of Wesleyanism.

Wesleyans readily accept that sanctification is their distinctive doctrine, but they refute any notion that it is a unique doctrine of Wesley's creation. They point to its long history of development all the way back to the Early Church Fathers. Although the focus of the early church was on issues of CHRISTOLOGY, the initial roots of the Wesleyan concept of sanctification were clearly present in such leaders as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Gregory of Nyssa. Other views compatible with the Wesleyan understanding of the doctrine were later expressed by such varied thinkers as Thomas a Kempis, CASPER SCHWENKFELD, THOMAS MUNTZER, Arminius, PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER, GEORGE Fox, JEREMY TAYLOR, and WILLIAM LAW. Wesley abhorred the very idea of theological novelty. He insisted that Wesleyan teachings be squarely in keeping with traditional orthodox positions and official Church of England dogma. He did not see his concept of holiness to be in violation of that principle. Rather, he saw this teaching as simply a revival of one of the grand old themes of scriptural Christianity and historic Anglicanism.

Perfection

Wesley stirred further controversy through his use of the term perfection. This was a frequent point of misinterpretation among his opponents. Actually, Wesley did not like to use the word, for he fully understood the faulty connotations that could be attached to it. However, he felt compelled to retain the word for the simple reason that it was the biblical term. He thought it better to properly teach it than to ignore it.

To be certain, the Wesleyan understanding of Christian perfection has nothing to do with absolute perfection. Wesleyanism affirms that only God is absolutely perfect and only Jesus lived a perfectly sinless life. Wesley never taught that the biblical commands to be perfect were in any way commands to be what it is impossible to be. In explaining what Christian perfection is, Wesley first described what it is not. He identified five general ways in which Christians cannot be perfect. Perfection does not mean freedom from ignorance, mistakes, “infirmities” (by which he seemed to mean confusion of mind and improper judgments in thinking), temptation, or growth.

What Wesley did mean by Christian perfection was essentially freedom from the bondage of sin and freedom to love God. Freedom from sin means abandonment of the old life of willful sinning. This is made possible by the purifying and empowering presence of the Holy Spirit. This understanding assumes a Wesleyan concept of sin in which intentional and unintentional sins are clearly distinguished. Any attempt to view the Wesleyan concept of Christian perfection through the lens of a non-Wesleyan definition of sin is doomed to misunderstanding. The Wesleyan teaching of Christian perfection remains valid only if it is approached specifically from the Wesleyan understanding of sin. This is often the fundamental point of breakdown in dialogs between Wesleyans and non-Wesleyans on the doctrine of perfection.

Freedom to love is seen by Wesleyanism as essentially the fulfillment of the great command of Moses in the Old Testament (Deuteronomy 6:5; 10:12) and Jesus in the New Testament (Mark 12:30). To love God with all our heart, soul, mind, and strength; and to live out that love toward others is to fulfill the law of love. This is what Wesleyanism means by perfect love. It was also Wesley’s most succinct and consistently used definition for Christian perfection, or holiness of heart and life.

Wesley’s concept of Christian perfection is sometimes cited as proof that Wesleyanism teaches sinless perfection. Here again, the interpretations are largely determined by the presupposed definitions. It may be said that Wesley taught a form of sinlessness, but this is a relative concept that must be understood in the context of his intended meaning. There are two different senses in which it may accurately be stated that Wesley believed in sinless perfection.

First, it was Wesley’s understanding from scripture that all believers are called to forsake the former life of sin and to take on new life in Christ. He understood freedom from willful sin to be the normal pattern for the Christian life. In that sense Wesley would acknowledge teaching sinless perfection, although he would also insist that this is a fundamental teaching of the Bible and of all Christian traditions that merited no opposition.

Second, it was Wesley’s understanding that through God’s work of sanctification in the believer, the sin inherited from Adam’s fall is cleansed from the believer. This too Wesley understood to be scriptural teaching. This cleansing was not seen as the removal of temptation or the possibility of sin. Rather, it was understood to be the realignment of the human spirit and will back toward God. That is, although sin always remains a possibility, it is no longer a necessity. Again, however, it must be emphasized that Wesley was speaking only of conscious, willful sins. He did not teach freedom from unconscious or involuntary sin, such as “sins” of ignorance, mistake, and human limitation. This is why Wesleyanism can on the one hand embrace a doctrine of relative sinlessness, whereas on the other hand denying any teaching of absolute sinlessness.

Social Responsibility

Wesley carried a profound sense of social responsibility throughout his ministry. This commitment to the welfare of others was not benevolence merely for the sake of benevolence. It was deeply rooted in his theology. Wesley’s evangelical theology was not just a theology of personal salvation; it was a theology of practical love for others. He was especially aware of the link between holiness and social ETHICS. He insisted that Christians are morally obligated to be salt and light, not just to the world as a whole, but more importantly to the particular community where they live. That meant making positive contributions to society rather than making demands of it.

As with several aspects of his theology, Wesley’s true understanding took on a significantly different perspective after his Aldersgate conversion. The focus of Wesley’s social action before Aldersgate was the salvation of his own soul, but after Aldersgate, when he understood the nature of personal salvation differently, he came to see social action differently as well. No longer a means of striving to earn his own salvation, benevolence then came to be an expression of love for God and others; that is, it came to be a practical expression of holiness. The Wesleyan social ethic was transformed from merely doing good to profoundly living out one’s love for God and neighbor.

Throughout his life Wesley carried on a tireless campaign of compassionate ministries to prisoners, orphans, widows, the uneducated, the unemployed, and the sick. He referred to such deeds as “works of mercy.” They included feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, assisting the stranger, visiting the imprisoned, comforting the sick, educating the ignorant, confronting the wicked, and encouraging the faithful. The last letter he wrote before his death was a message of encouragement to the abolitionist WILLIAM WILBERFORCE in his fight against the slave trade (see SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF).

In the two centuries since Wesley’s death Wesleyanism has spread and taken on various forms. The broad spectrum of Methodist, Holiness, and Pentecostal groups that identify themselves as Wesleyan in one way or another gives some indication of the broad appeal and diversity of Wesley’s legacy. Liberal expressions of the movement tend to emphasize Wesley’s social and benevolent concerns. Evangelical expressions tend to emphasize his theology of Christian conversion and holiness. A revival of both scholarly and practical interest in Wesley’s unique contributions to the Christian church has brought many circles of Wesleyanism back to Wesley’s original position of balance between these two variant expressions.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Wesley, John. John Wesley's Sermons: An Anthology. Edited by Albert C. Outler and Richard P. Heitzenrater. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1991.

———. The Works of John Wesley. Edited by Reginald W. Ward and Richard P. Heitzenrater. Bicentennial edition. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1988.

Secondary Sources:

Baker, Frank. John Wesley and the Church of England. London: Epworth Press, 2000.

Collins, Kenneth J. A Real Christian: The Life of John Wesley. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.

———. The Scripture Way of Salvation: The Heart of John Wesley's Theology. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1997.

Coppedge, Allan. Wesley in Theological Debate. Wilmore, KY: Wesley Heritage Press, 1987.

Hattersley, Roy. A Brand from the Burning: The Life of John Wesley. London: Little Brown, 2002.

Heitzenrater, Richard P. Wesley and the People Called Methodists. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1995.

Lindstrom, Harald. Wesley and Sanctification: A Study in the Doctrine of Salvation. Nappanee, IN: Francis Asbury Press, 1996.

Maddox, Randy L. Responsible Grace: John Wesley's Practical Theology. Nashville, TN: Kingswood Books, 1994.

McGonigle, Herbert Boyd. Sufficient Saving Grace: John Wesley's Evangelical Arminianism. Carlisle: Paternoster Press, 2001.

Oden, Thomas C. John Wesley's Scriptural Christianity: A Plain Exposition of His Teachings on Christian Doctrine. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1994.

Outler, Albert C. John Wesley. New York: Oxford University Press, 1964.

Rack, Henry D. Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism. London: Epworth Press, 1992.

Stone, Ronald H. John Wesley's Life and Ethics. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 2001.

Thorsen, Donald A.D. The Wesleyan Quadrilateral. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Publishing House, 1990.

DANIEL L. BURNETT

WESTCOTT, BROOKE (1825–1901)

English biblical scholar. Westcott was born in Bloomsbury, Birmingham, ENGLAND on January 12, 1825. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and then served as canon of Peterborough (1869–1883) and Westminster (1883–1890). For twenty years (1870–1890) he was Regius professor of divinity at CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY. On May 1, 1890 Westcott was consecrated bishop of Durham and served in that position until his death. Westcott, with Fenton John Anthony Hort and JOSEPH BARBER LIGHTFOOT, were known as the Cambridge Triumvirate, the three leading Cambridge scholars of the nineteenth century who stressed the scientific study of the BIBLE, especially the New Testament.

Westcott's major biblical writings were History of the New Testament Canon (1855), Introduction to the Study of the Gospels (1860), History of the English Bible (1868), and with Hort, The New Testament in Modern Greek: Being the New Testament of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ: Newly Translated Direct from the Accurate Greek (1881). These volumes brought the critical study of the Bible to a higher level and helped bridge the divide between FAITH and criticism.

Westcott was also an advocate of CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM. He helped to found and was the president of the Christian Social Union, which based its social concern on the Incarnation. His belief in the Incarnation was the basis for his desire to work for the brotherhood of man and justice for all God's creatures. He was committed to improving theological education for CLERGY and founded the Cambridge Training School, now known as Westcott House. Westcott died at Durham on July 27, 1901.

See also Higher Criticism; Modernism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Westcott, Brooke F. A General View of the History of the English Bible. London: Macmillan and Co., 1905.
- . The Incarnation and Common Life. London/New York: Macmillan, 1893.
- . The Gospel of Life: Thoughts Introductory to the Study of Christian Doctrine. London/New York: Macmillan, 1892.
- . The Bible in the Church: A Popular Account of the Collection and Reception of the Holy Scriptures in the Christian Churches. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1885, 1979.

Secondary Sources:

- Clayton, Joseph. Bishop Westcott. London: A. R. Mowbray, 1906.

Olofason, Folke. Christus Redemptor et Consummator: A Study in the Theology of B.F. Westcott.

Translated by Neil Tomkinson. Uppsala, Sweden: University of Uppsala, 1979.

DONALD S.ARMENROUT

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY

Called by Parliament on June 12, 1643, the Westminster Assembly was a gathering of theologians to address reform of the English church during the CIVIL WAR between royal and parliamentary forces, it produced documents that shaped PRESBYTERIANISM in the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND and throughout the world. These statements included the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION of Faith, WESTMINSTER CATECHISMS (Larger and Shorter), Directory for the Public Worship of God, and Form of Church Government. The thirty lay and 121 minister commissioners began by revising the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the Anglican church. Eight commissioners of the Church of Scotland were received with voice in the Assembly, after the acceptance of the Scottish Solemn League and Covenant by Parliament and Assembly (September 25, 1643). The agenda then shifted to debating a church order with Scriptural warrant, and seeking uniformity with the Church of Scotland. Civil War and national politics formed the background for a “Grand Debate” on the order and government of the church. The Assembly met for 1,163 sessions, and was never officially dismissed; the last mention of Scottish participation was on November 9, 1647.

Members represented diverse views: the majority were conservative Puritans (see PURITANISM), with a minority of Independent Puritans, some Erastians (see ERASTUS, THOMAS), and a small group of Episcopalians who did not participate in the Assembly. The Scots insisted on their Presbyterian views, and the majority of conservative Puritans came to favor a “presbyterian” uniformity against the minority Independents’ stress on gathered congregations of visible saints. Although its church standards were of little effect in ENGLAND, the Assembly had a profound consequence for the future of the Reformed tradition, in the refining of Presbyterian and Congregational ecclesiologies, and by the heightening of issues of uniformity versus tolerance and spiritual versus judicial AUTHORITY in the ministry of the church.

References and Further Reading

- Carruthers, S.W. The Everyday Work of the Westminster Assembly. Philadelphia, PA: Presbyterian Historical Society, 1943.
- Leith, John H. Assembly at Westminster: Reformed Theology in the Making. Atlanta, GA: John Knox Press, 1973.
- Mitchell, A.F. The Westminster Assembly. 2nd ed. Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, PA: 1897.
- Paul, Robert S. The Assembly of the Lord: Politics and Religion in the Westminster Assembly and the “Grand Debate.” Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1985.

STANLEY R.HALL

WESTMINSTER CATECHISM

The “Longer” and “Shorter” Catechisms were composed by the Westminster Assembly (1643–1653) to provide theological resources for pastors and LAITY in churches of the Reformed tradition. The CATECHISMS were approved by the English Parliament on September 15, 1648, having been completed a year before. They were part of the Westminster Standards, the documents produced by the assembly of “divines” who were initially gathered to advise the Long Parliament about a religious settlement in ENGLAND and to revise the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES as a doctrinal standard for the English church. A Scottish alliance with Parliament made it advisable to compose a new confession of faith, and so the Westminster Assembly produced the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION of Faith (1646), the Larger and Shorter Catechisms (1647), the Directory for the Public Worship of God with a Psalter (1644), and the Form of Government (1644).

Structure

The Larger Catechism is composed of 196 questions and answers and is basically a restatement of the Westminster Confession in a more didactic form. The catechism is partly based on James Ussher’s Body of Divinitie (1645) and was crafted to a great degree by Anthony Tuckney (1599–1670), who was very active in the work of the Assembly. Tuckney is particularly credited with the section on the Law of God in the Larger Catechism and was also the most influential writer of the Shorter Catechism. The Larger Catechism, because of its elaborate answers, functioned especially as a resource for CLERGY in the preparation of sermons.

The Shorter Catechism enjoyed a much wider usage and functioned primarily for the instruction of children. It is composed of 107 questions with much shorter answers. Its usefulness for teaching was enhanced by its method of using answers that included the language of the question and then formed a complete sentence in itself. An example is the famous first question and answer:

Q. 1. What is the chief end of man?

A. Man’s chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever.

This catechism has been widely used by Presbyterians as well as by Congregationalists and BAPTISTS (see PRESBYTERIANISM; CONGREGATIONALISM).

The Larger Catechism is divided into two main parts after a five-question introduction. Part One is “What Man Ought to Believe Concerning God” (qq. 6–90). Part Two is “Having Seen What the Scriptures Principally Teach Us to Believe Concerning God, It Follows to Consider What They Require as the Duty of Man” (qq. 91–196). The overall movement is from theological understanding to Christian action.

Theology

The order of the issues with which the catechisms deal follows that of the Confession of Faith. The THEOLOGY presented is a developing form of CALVINISM, influenced by JOHN CALVIN and also by continental theologians. The Westminster Standards sought to expound a generic Reformed theology that could be accepted by Reformed Christians everywhere. Yet some doctrinal emphases in the catechisms stand out (citations here refer to questions of the Shorter Catechism).

The Scriptures are where the Word of God is contained and “principally teach what man is to believe concerning God, and what duty God requires of man” (2–3). Thus the BIBLE has a theological purpose. God is defined as “a Spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth” (4). God issues “decrees” that are God’s “eternal purpose, according to the counsel of his will, whereby, for his own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass” (7). These decrees are carried out in God’s works of creation and providence (8). A strong DOCTRINE of providence emerges in the catechisms whereby God’s works of providence are his “most holy, wise, and powerful preserving and governing all his creatures, and all their actions” (11). Thus God exercises a divine sovereignty over all of nature and history.

The fall into SIN brought humanity into “an estate of sin and misery” (17). This resulted in humanity’s loss of communion with God and its resting under God’s “wrath and curse,” ultimately bringing DEATH (19). But God has established a “redeemer of God’s elect,” Jesus Christ (21), who through his work as prophet (24), priest (25), and king (26) brings SALVATION to those whom God has effectually called by the Holy Spirit (30–31). They are justified (33), adopted (34), and participate in SANCTIFICATION (35). These theological realities bring believers “assurance of God’s love, peace of conscience, joy in the Holy Ghost, increase of grace, and perseverance therein to the end” (36), whereas through the resurrection of Christ believers are “made perfectly blessed in the full enjoying of God to all eternity” (38).

Those who receive the benefits of salvation have as their duty “obedience” to God’s “revealed will” (39). God’s will is revealed through the moral law, summarized in the Ten Commandments (40–41). For each of the commandments, the catechisms ask both what is “required” and what is “forbidden” (45–81). This recognition that the commandments also entail positive duties was a feature of Calvin’s theology as well.

Because humans are incapable of keeping the law of God perfectly, the only path to salvation is through FAITH in Jesus Christ. This faith is “a saving grace, whereby we receive and rest upon him alone for salvation, as he is offered to us in the gospel” (86). The benefits of redemption come through “the Word, SACRAMENTS, and PRAYER, all which are made effectual to the elect for the salvation” (88). These are discussed (88–99) before questions on the Lord’s Prayer (100–107), which is “the special rule of direction” in prayer that “Christ taught his disciples” (99).

The Westminster catechisms made the theology of the CONFESSION of faith memorable and known to pastors and laity. They continue to be used as a means of instruction and a resource for understanding the Reformed faith.

References and Further Reading

- Book of Catechisms: Reference Edition.* Louisville, KY: Geneva Press, 2001.
Leith, John H. Assembly at Westminster. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1973.
Rogers, Jack. Presbyterian Creeds. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1985.
Torrance, Thomas F. The School of Faith. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1959.

DONALD K.MCKIM

WESTMINSTER CONFESSION

One of the documents produced by the WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1643–1653), the Westminster Confession is regarded as a sterling statement of Reformed theology. It has been used continually throughout the world by churches in the Reformed tradition. It features clarity of thought, precise use of theological language, and is a comprehensive statement of theological belief. Because of political circumstances, the Confession—although written for the English church—was never adopted by the established CHURCH OF ENGLAND. It did, however, become the official confession of Scottish PRESBYTERIANISM. Its influence in English-speaking countries has been significant and for over three hundred years it was the sole doctrinal standard of British and American Presbyterianism. It has also had a useful history among Congregational and some Baptist bodies (see CONGREGATIONALISM; BAPTISTS). It formed the basis for the Congregationalist Savoy Declaration (1658) and the Particular Baptist Confession (1677), as well as the General Baptist Orthodox Creed (1678).

Background

The Westminster Confession was written at a tumultuous time in ENGLAND. It was composed by an assembly of “divines” who were called to meet by the Long Parliament in 1643 with the mandate to revise the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of Religion in a more “Puritan” direction (see PURITANISM). The Westminster Assembly was composed of 121 Puritan ministers of the Church of England. The majority were Presbyterian in their views, although some Congregationalists and a small group favoring Episcopal church government also served. Additionally, thirty lay members were present, as well as six Scottish advisors.

When the Assembly reached the sixteenth of the Thirty-nine Articles, the political situation changed with the onset of the English CIVIL WAR. Parliament was at war with King Charles I. The parliamentary forces enlisted the help of SCOTLAND. In return for their support the Scots insisted that the Solemn League and Covenant, which Parliament had accepted in 1643 to provide for a Presbyterian church in England, Ireland, and Scotland, be followed. Scottish commissioners were sent to London to advise the Parliament and some of these sat as commissioners to the Westminster Assembly (with the right to debate but not to vote).

For the next several years the Assembly deliberated with an average of sixty commissioners in daily attendance. Eleven men did the majority of writing on the Confession of Faith. Seven were English divines and four were Scottish clergy. The Confession was completed and presented to Parliament in December 1646. The Assembly also produced a Larger and Shorter Catechism (1647), the Directory for the Public Worship of God (1644) including a Psalter, and the Form of Government (1644). These are collectively called the Westminster Standards. Scripture proof texts were added to the Confession of Faith in 1647, the same year in which the confession was approved by the Church of Scotland. Parliament was purged by OLIVER CROMWELL in 1649, and for the next several years the members of the Assembly met to examine and license ministers. In December 1653, Cromwell was proclaimed Lord Protector and the Assembly ceased to function, although it was never officially dissolved.

Structure

The Westminster Confession was composed of thirty-three chapters. Its theological views represented the emerging Reformed tradition that looked initially to JOHN CALVIN (1509–1564) as a shaping influence. Although the influence of continental Reformed thinkers was also formative, the immediate sources of the Westminster Confession were the Irish Articles (1615) and A Body of Divinitie (1645), both written by James Ussher (1581–1656), archbishop of Armagh and primate of IRELAND.

The confession was structured to deal with nearly every topic of divinity. Its first chapter was on Holy Scripture and like other Reformed confessional statements featured a listing of the canonical books that serve as “the Word of God written” (chap. 1). Chapters two through five dealt with the doctrine of God as the Holy Trinity (2), as the author of divine “eternal decrees” (3), as creator of the world (4), and as involved in and with the world through divine providence (5). Chapter six speaks of humanity’s fall into SIN and its punishment, whereas chapter seven expounds God’s covenants with humanity—found first in a “covenant of works” and then in a “covenant of GRACE.” This sets the stage for discussion of the work of Jesus Christ as “the only mediator” between God and humanity who carries out his work as prophet, priest, and king (8). Further chapters are careful expositions of the way of SALVATION in Christ for those who have lost their “free will” to choose to “will any spiritual good accompanying salvation” (9). God has “effectually called” some (10; the “elect”) and has justified (11), adopted (12), and sanctifies them (13). The way of salvation in Jesus Christ is by “the grace of FAITH” through the work of God’s Holy Spirit (14), which is expressed through repentance (15) and good works whereby believers “manifest their thankfulness” among other things (16). Those “effectually called and sanctified” by God’s Spirit persevere in faith and are “eternally saved,” (17) receiving a certain assurance in this life that they are in a “state of grace, and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God: which hope shall never make them ashamed” (18). Believers follow the moral law of God, which informs them of God’s will as the rule for their lives—not to gain salvation but to be in obedience to the way God wants them to live (19). From here the confession moves on to consider elements of the Christian life such as Christian liberty (20), WORSHIP and the Sabbath Day (21), oaths and vows (22), the civil magistrate (23), and MARRIAGE and DIVORCE (24). Theological treatments of the CHURCH (25), the communion of SAINTS (26), the SACRAMENTS: BAPTISM and the LORD'S SUPPER (27–29) are presented before the final chapters on church censures (30), synods and councils (31), the resurrection of the dead and the last judgment (32–33).

Some church bodies that adopted the Westminster Confession have added additional chapters or modified the original 1647 edition. American churches changed the chapter on the civil magistrate to reflect belief in the separation of CHURCH AND STATE. In the twentieth century the two major Presbyterian bodies in the UNITED STATES added a chapter on the Holy Spirit and “Of the Gospel of the Love of God and Missions” (1903 by the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH in the United States of America; 1942 by the Presbyterian Church in the United States). These sought to show that the confessions’ doctrine of God’s sovereignty is not in conflict with God’s love for all persons and thus that the church has a missionary imperative. In the 1950s both of these Presbyterian bodies amended the confession’s chapter on marriage and divorce to remove the prohibition of divorce and remarriage (except on grounds of adultery or desertion) and to permit remarriage of divorced persons.

Although the Confession is precise and theologically articulate, nearly two-thirds of the document deal with practical issues of the Christian life rather than speculative theological questions. This reflects the essential convictions of the Westminster divines—and Reformed theology in general—that THEOLOGY is a science focused on Christian existence in its personal and social dimensions rather than on theoretical dimensions only.

Theological Emphases

The Westminster Confession is a transitional document from the REFORMATION era to that of the highly developed scholastic theologies that marked the later seventeenth century. The writings of Calvin were frequently published in England by the end of the sixteenth century and were highly influential among the Westminster Divines. Attributed primarily to the English Civil War, the period of the scientific revolution that marked the beginnings of modern science and that had already commenced on the European continent did not begin in England until the 1660s. This meant that many of the scientific and philosophical questions affecting Continental theologians were not presenting problems to the writers of the confession. In this regard the confession may be seen as moving beyond Calvin in many of its formulations but not as reflecting the highly scholastic theology of later continental Reformed theologians, such as Francis Turretin (1623–1687) for example.

A number of important theological emphases are characteristic of the Westminster Confession as a document illustrating the Reformed theology of Calvin and his successors.

The article on Holy Scripture (1.4) indicates that the BIBLE gains its AUTHORITY from God and not from humans or from any church. Its divine authority is established by “the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the Word in our hearts” (1.6). The confession speaks of the “light of nature,” which in the Reformed tradition refers to the innate knowledge of God implanted in every human but which is suppressed by sin. God's works of creation and providence serve to reinforce this knowledge of God. Because of human sin this knowledge serves only to render humans inexcusable and is "not sufficient to give that knowledge of God, and of his will, which is necessary unto salvation" (1.1).

A hallmark of the Westminster Confession is its third chapter on "God's Eternal Decree(s)." The confession states:

God from all eternity did by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass; yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures, nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established. (3.1)

God's decree is God's action, the expression of the divine will. God has willed, through the "decree," for "the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death" (3.3). These statements are the Reformed emphasis on ELECTION and PREDESTINATION. God's election is God's free choice to save those whom God decides to save. Predestination is the expression of election in relation to salvation.

In the broader context of the confession, this decree of God is worked out through God's "effectual call" by the Word and Spirit, "out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ" (10.1). Predestination is necessary if any are to be saved because according to the confession, humanity's fall into sin has meant that the "original righteousness and communion with God" that human beings were created to enjoy has now been lost. Humanity, through the sin of our first parents, has now become "dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body" (6.2). Humanity's original "freedom and power to will and to do that which is good and well-pleasing to God"—the human condition before the fall into sin—has been lost. This pervasive power of sin means that humans are not by their own strength able to convert themselves or prepare themselves to be converted by God (9.3).

The confession testifies that God has reached out to humans in their sin first by a "covenant of works" whereby humans could obtain life "upon condition of perfect and personal obedience" to God (7.2). Because of the fall into sin, however, humans have made themselves "incapable of life by that COVENANT" (7.3). So God was pleased to establish a "covenant of grace" whereby sinners are offered "life and salvation by Jesus Christ, requiring of them faith in him, that they may be saved, and promising to give unto all those that are ordained unto life, his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe" (7.3). This then is the reason that predestination is key for human salvation: without God's ordaining salvation, no human could ever achieve it. Sin has left humans powerless, by their own will, to turn to God in obedience and live as God desires. Through divine predestination God provides a salvation that is unattainable by human activities or achievements.

The means by which this salvation for God's elect is accomplished is through Jesus Christ. The confession affirms the early church's orthodox view of Jesus as the second person of the Trinity who is fully divine and fully human. This enables him to be the mediator of salvation. Christ fulfills the offices of prophet, priest, and king. Through his “perfect obedience and sacrifice of himself” he has satisfied divine justice and brought reconciliation between God and the sinner (8).

This redemption is applied to those whom God has effectually called through justification through which God pardons sin and accepts them “by imputing the obedience and satisfaction of Christ unto them.” They receive this righteousness of Christ by faith, “which faith they have not of themselves” but as a gift of God (11.1). SANCTIFICATION is the outworking of the new heart and spirit created in believers and their growth in holiness throughout their whole lives. Believers will never be perfect in this life because there will always remain “some remnants of corruption” in them. However, the sanctifying spirit of Christ enables the saints to “grow in grace, perfecting holiness in the fear of God” (13). Good works done by believers are “the fruits and evidences of a true and lively faith” (16.2).

It is in the context of redemption and the assurance of grace and salvation (18) that the law of God is introduced (19). The confession here echoes Calvin’s view that the moral law of God is given as a guide for believers, as “a rule of life, informing them of the will of God and their duty” (19.6). Obedience to the law is not a means of salvation but an expression of God’s sanctifying work in believers that leads them to seek God’s will and obey it.

The confession maintains the Augustinian distinction between the “visible” (outward) church and the “invisible” church (true believers, known only to God; 25). It sees the sacraments as “holy signs and seals of the covenant of grace” (27) and indicates that only baptism and the Lord’s Supper are sacraments “ordained by Christ our Lord in the gospel” (27.4).

The ultimate states of humans after DEATH either are to have their souls “made perfect in holiness” and be “received into the highest heavens” or have their souls “cast into hell, where they remain in torments and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day” (22.1). Ultimate judgment belongs to God who has appointed a day wherein “he will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ” (23.1).

The Westminster Confession presents a comprehensive picture of God who in divine providence “doth uphold, direct, dispose, and govern all creatures, actions, and things, from the greatest even to the least” (5.1). Humans are responsible for their actions but in matters of salvation can only look to God’s covenant of grace in Jesus Christ.

References and Further Reading

- Hendry, George S. The Westminster Confession for Today. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1960.
 Leith, John H. Assembly at Westminster. Richmond, VA: John Knox Press, 1973.
 Mitchell, A.F. The Westminster Assembly: Its History and Standards, 1883.
 Paul, Robert S. The Assembly of the Lord. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1985.
 Rogers, Jack. Presbyterian Creeds. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1985.
 ———. Scripture in the Westminster Confession. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1967.

DONALD K.MCKIM

WHEATLEY, PHILLIS (c. 1753–1784)

African-American poet. Born in AFRICA in the early 1750s, transported to North America, and sold to John and Susannah Wheatley in Boston in colonial New England, Phillis Wheatley, a five-year-old African child of unknown origin, became a slave. In the middle to late 1750s, when she arrived in the colony, SLAVERY, although marginal to the regional economy, had become a fixed feature of the colony's labor system. Many slaves like Wheatley worked as household servants.

Wheatley learned English very quickly and benefited from the Wheatleys and their children, who taught her to read and write and exposed her to the classics. She became proficient enough in Latin that she translated Ovid as an adolescent. The family also encouraged her poetic talents and supported Wheatley's publication in 1773 of Poems on Various Subjects. Newspapers in both Boston and Philadelphia took note of her book and acknowledged its quality. In several public presentations in America and ENGLAND Wheatley became known and lauded as an able poetess. George Washington, Thomas Paine, John Hancock, and others in Revolutionary America became acquainted with her.

The Wheatleys later manumitted Phillis and she married John Peters, a free black. She died in 1784 in her early thirties.

Writing in the context of the American Revolution, Wheatley's poetry echoed themes that colonists used to explain their revolt against Great Britain. Similarly Wheatley's works showed the same religious influences that affected Lemuel Haynes, Absalom Jones, RICHARD ALLEN, and other black Christian contemporaries. She viewed "Almighty Providence" as the divine master of NATURE and humankind and she saw the soul as divinely directed and free. Although nurtured in the rhetoric of liberty and in scriptural SALVATION, Wheatley still recognized that slave trading had seized her "from Afric's distant happy seat," and she prayed that "others may never feel tyrannic sway."

See also Literature

References and Further Reading

Graham, Shirley. The Story of Phillis Wheatley: Poetess of the American Revolution. New York: Julian Messner, 1949.

DENNIS C. DICKERSON

WHISTON, WILLIAM (1667–1752)

English anti-trinitarian theologian. Whiston was born on December 9, 1667 in Norton-Juxta-Twycross, Leicestershire. Whiston's father and maternal grandfather were clergymen, and his father left provisions in his will for his son's university training to become "an able minister of the New Testament." Whiston enrolled at Clare Hall, Cambridge in 1686, earning a B.A. in 1689 and M.A. in 1693. He became a fellow of the college in 1691. He served as chaplain to Bishop John Moore (1646–1714) from 1694 to 1698, and was parish priest at Lowestoft, Suffolk from 1698 to 1701.

In 1701 he succeeded ISAAC NEWTON (1642–1727) as Lucasian professor of mathematics at CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY, but was expelled from this post in October 1710 after publicizing his antitrinitarian views, which came in part from Newton. At the end of 1710 Whiston and his family relocated to London, where he endured four years of intermittent but ultimately inconclusive HERESY proceedings initiated by the Anglican Convocation of Clergy. During this period he published the manifesto of his Arian creed, the five-volume Primitive Christianity reviv'd (1711–1712). In London he took up a career as a public lecturer on experiment and astronomy, thereby playing a leading role in the dissemination of the new Newtonian philosophy. He also continued his prodigious output of prophetic, theological, and natural philosophical works. Objecting to the reading of the Athanasian Creed in Anglican liturgy and long an advocate of believers' BAPTISM, from 1747 Whiston worshiped with the General BAPTISTS. He died at Lyndon Hall, Rutland on August 22, 1752.

Through his numerous publications Whiston's influence was felt in several disparate areas of eighteenth-century Protestantism. His first book, A new theory of the earth (1696), is an early example of flood geology and one of the first attempts to reconcile the Genesis creation account with science, which for Whiston was Newtonian physics (see CREATION SCIENCE). His Essay on the Revelation (1706) is a historicist interpretation of the Apocalypse in the tradition of Joseph Mede and was cited by prophetic exegetes into the nineteenth century. In his 1707 Boyle lectures on the fulfillment of biblical prophecy (published in 1708) and later works, Whiston advocated the use of prophecy as an argument for the divine origin of the BIBLE. Although he set his own mark on the THEOLOGY he obtained from Newton, Whiston played a pivotal part in publicizing the heterodox theology of the secret heretic Newton. He also contributed to the development of Unitarianism. A confident expression of the design argument in Newtonian terms, Whiston's Astronomical principles of religion, natural and reveal'd (1717) remains a milestone in natural theology. Although a controversial figure, by pushing the limits of British heresy laws, he also helped advance TOLERATION for antitrinitarian dissent. Whiston's most enduring legacy is his translation of Josephus, a translation that found its way into countless Anglo-American Protestant homes in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and is still in print at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

See also Anti-Trinitarianism; Deism; Dissent

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Whiston, William. The accomplishment of Scripture prophecies. Cambridge, 1708.
———. An essay on the Revelation of St. John. Cambridge, 1706.
———. Astronomical principles of religion, natural and reveal'd. London, 1717.
———. The genuine works of Flavius Josephus, the Jewish historian. London, 1737.
———. Memoirs of the life and writings of Mr. William Whiston. London, 1749, 1753.
———. A new theory of the earth. London, 1696.
———. Primitive Christianity reviv'd. n.p., 1711–1712.

Secondary Sources:

- Farrell, Maureen. William Whiston. New York: Arno Press, 1981.
Force, James E. William Whiston: Honest Newtonian. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

STEPHEN D.SNOBELEN

WHITE, ELLEN GOULD (1827–1915)

American church founder. Ellen Gould was born in 1827 near Gorham, Maine and grew up as a Methodist in Portland. In 1840 she accepted WILLIAM MILLER'S teaching that Christ would return in 1843 or 1844. In December 1844 Gould experienced a vision, through which she learned that the Millerites must maintain their faith in Christ's imminent return. While spreading this message, she met James S.White, whom she married in 1846. Soon after, the couple began observing the seventh-day Sabbath.

Conferences in the Northeast during 1848 formulated the doctrines of Sabbatarian Adventism. With Ellen's encouragement James published papers, including the Review and Herald (1850), and her first pamphlet in 1851. After the Whites moved from Rochester, New York, to Battle Creek, Michigan (1855), Ellen's book Spiritual Gifts (1858) was published. The Whites and Joseph Bates, a former Millerite, helped form the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH (1863) with a membership of about 3,000. Ellen also promoted health reform, which led to the establishment of what became Battle Creek Sanitarium (1866), encouraged the creation of Battle Creek College (1875), and urged denominational mission activity abroad, which officially began with the arrival of John Nevins Andrews in Europe (1874).

Among Ellen White's books are The Great Controversy (1888), Steps to Christ (1892), and The Desire of Ages (1898). In the 1890s and early 1900s she promoted changes in the DENOMINATION'S organizational structure, expansion into the American South, and continued international development of educational, health, and PUBLISHING institutions. When she died in St. Helena, California in 1915 the Seventh-day Adventist Church had about 130,000 members.

See also Sabbatarianism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

White, Arthur L. Ellen G. White. 6 vols. Takoma Park, MD: Review and Herald Publishers Association, 1982–1986.

White, Ellen Gould. The (New, Illustrated) Great Controversy. De Land, FL: Laymen for Religious Liberty, 1990.

———. The Desire of Ages. Mountain View, CA/Portland, OR: Pacific Press Publishers Association, 1940.

———. The Great Controversy between Christ and Satan: The Conflict of the Ages in the Christian Dispensation. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press Publishers Association, 1870, 1950.

———. Steps to Christ. Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald Publishers Association, 1921.

- . The Triumph of God's Love: The Story of the Vindication of the Character of God and the Salvation of Mankind. Mountain View, CA: Pacific Press Publishers Association, 1957.
- . Counsels on Diet and Foods: A Compilation from the Writings of Ellen G. White. Takoma Park, MD: Review and Herald Publishers Association, 1976.
- . Health and Happiness. Phoenix, AZ: Inspiration Books, 1973.
- . God's Amazing Grace. Washington, D.C.: Review and Herald Publishers Association, 1973.

Secondary Sources:

- Douglass, Herbert E. Messenger of the Lord: The Prophetic Ministry of Ellen G. White. Mountain View, CA/Portland, OR: Pacific Press, 1998.
- Numbers, Ronald L. Prophetess of Health: Ellen G. White and the Origins of Seventh-day Adventist Health Reform. Knoxville, TN: University of Tennessee Press, 1992.

GARY LAND

WHITE, WILLIAM HALE (ALSO MARK RUTHERFORD) (1831–1913)

Victorian writer. Also known under the pseudonym of Mark Rutherford, White was born in Bedford, ENGLAND, the son of William White, a dissenter and doorkeeper at the House of Commons (see DISSENT). He was educated at the English School, Bedford, at the Countess of Huntingdon's College, Cheshunt, and at New College, St. John's Wood. He was highly influenced by the writings of JOHN BUNYAN, and, while in Bedford, attended the Bunyan meeting as did his father before him. He originally intended to become an independent minister, but changed vocational pursuits because of increasing disillusionment and religious doubt. This decision was solidified by the fact that he was expelled from New College, St. John's Wood, for voicing doubt over the authenticity and inspired nature of the BIBLE.

In 1854 he joined the Civil Service, where he eventually established himself as assistant director of contracts at the Admiralty. Although he wrote various pieces for journals over many years, it was not until 1881 that his literary career came to fruition with the publication of his The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford (1881), followed a few years later by Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885). In these works one finds a penetrative insight into nineteenth-century spirituality, religious doubt, and disillusionment. Indeed, these works are in large part a record of White's own spiritual pilgrimage through the height of nineteenth-century disillusionment with religion. He never attempted to proselytize for any particular religious position, but rather aimed simply to chart his own religious experience through the life of his pseudonym.

Although it is principally for his first two books that he has earned his place in literary and religious history, he wrote several subsequent works; these include: The Revolution in Tanner's Lane (1887); Miriam's Schooling (1893); Catherine Furze (1893); and Clara Hopgood (1896).

References and Further Reading

Maclean, Catherine. Mark Rutherford: A Biography of William Hale White. London: MacDonald, 1955.

ALEC JARVIS

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714–1770)

English revivalist. The pioneer evangelist in the Great Awakening of the eighteenth century (see AWAKENINGS), Whitefield was born at Gloucester, ENGLAND on December 16, 1714. He died at Newburyport, Maryland on September 30, 1770. The sixth child of an innkeeper, in 1732 he gained a place at Oxford University and there attended the “Holy Club” or “Oxford Methodists,” led by JOHN WESLEY, and experienced evangelical CONVERSION and a sense of forgiveness in 1735. He was ordained to the Anglican diaconate in June 1736.

Whitefield’s subsequent life had two sides, one in America, the other in Great Britain. His American experience began with his appointment as a chaplain to the Georgia Company and his inspiration for an orphan home in Georgia. On his second tour Whitefield’s PREACHING stimulated the so-called First Evangelical (or Great) Awakening. Intense emotion and sharp criticism did not disturb him. Although an Anglican, he associated with prominent Dissenters (see DISSENT) and adopted their CALVINISM. Seven further tours of America took place, and a ritual pattern of revival preaching developed (see REVIVALS). He did much to give American religion its own sense of purpose and character. Whitefield faced huge criticism at various periods, but survived to become an American icon, inspiring even the skeptical Ben Franklin to support him.

Whitefield’s British ministry was also controversial. It was his outdoor preaching near Bristol in 1739 after Anglican churches refused to invite him into the pulpit that forced METHODISM into the popular world. Yet leadership of the new movement was assumed by Wesley, who introduced to it an Arminian theology (see ARMINIANISM). As a result Whitefield led a schism and thereafter associated closely with Welsh and Scottish Calvinists, but remained in cordial contact with John Wesley. Because of his frequent absences he increasingly depended on the sponsorship of a strongwilled aristocrat, Selina, countess of Hastings (see HASTINGS, LADY SELINA). His influence in England was greatest among “New” Dissenters, although he never left the established church.

Whitefield was essentially a preacher. Typically his sermons focused on “the new birth,” communicated in a dramatic preaching style, with personal anecdotes, dramatization of the biblical narrative, and theatrical bodily gestures. He excelled in open-air settings, and was much admired by actors. The journal of his experiences led to accusations of “enthusiasm,” that he was controlled by the dictates of an inner spirit. As he became more Calvinist he became more cautious, but his theology remained pragmatic. Unlike Wesley his weakness was in organization, although this mattered less in America. Moreover, Whitefield evidenced some insecurity in the face of better-bred aristocrats and properly licensed CLERGY. None of these factors inhibited the work in America, where Whitefield’s converts found their place in Congregational and Presbyterian churches.

Recent studies have focused on the conscious way in which Whitefield viewed religion as a commodity, “worked” his market, distributing publicity, promoting himself and his ministry, and stimulating religious debate. Whitefield reveled in opposition, although he appreciated support in high places. Although he failed to found a separate DENOMINATION, his values lie at the heart of modern EVANGELICALISM and made him known as a pioneer evangelist in the eighteenth-century Great Awakening.

See also Congregationalism; Nonconformity; Presbyterianism; Wesleyan Holiness Movement

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Whitefield, George. The Works of the Reverend George Whitefield M.A. 6 vols. London: Edward & Charles Dilly, 1771.

Secondary Sources:

Dallimore, A.A. George Whitefield. 2 vols. Edinburgh: Banner of Truth, 1970, 1979.

Lambert, Frank. Pedlar in Divinity: George Whitefield and the Transatlantic Revivals 1737–1770. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994.

Stout, Harry S. The Divine Dramatist: George Whitefield and the Rise of Modern Evangelicalism. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B.Eerdmans, 1991.

PETER LINEHAM

WHITGIFT, JOHN (c. 1530–1604)

Archbishop of Canterbury. Whitgift was born in Lincolnshire about 1530, and his career led him from CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY to Lambeth Palace where, as archbishop of CANTERBURY (1583–1604), he was one of queen ELIZABETH I's closest advisors. Whitgift's unwavering conviction that the monarch stood as the sole and rightful head of the CHURCH OF ENGLAND put him in frequent conflict with those who desired reforms beyond those stated in the Elizabethan Settlement.

Whitgift at Cambridge

Whitgift not only received his education at Cambridge University, he also spent a significant portion of his career there. Upon receiving his B.D. in 1563 he was named Lady Margaret professor of divinity, a post he held until he earned a D.D. in 1567, whereupon he was named Regious professor of divinity and master of Trinity College. In 1570 Whitgift became vicechancellor.

Whitgift's time at Cambridge coincided with a period of religious conflict at the university, and Whitgift quickly established himself as a defender of the status quo. When Cambridge became the center of a controversy concerning prescribed clerical VESTMENTS, Whitgift saw those who objected to donning "popish dress" as unjustly challenging the AUTHORITY of the Crown and Canterbury to fix church policy. The conflict between those who supported the establishment and those who argued for limits to royal and episcopal power would prove a recurring issue in Whitgift's career.

One of the most high profile dissenters at Cambridge was THOMAS CARTWRIGHT. Cartwright's name became almost synonymous with PURITANISM, and Whitgift stood as his committed and continuing opponent. When Cartwright gave a series of lectures in which he overtly criticized the ecclesiastical polity of the church, Whitgift joined with other heads of the university to deny Cartwright his degree. Shortly thereafter Whitgift succeeded in getting Cartwright expelled from the university. The two clashed again during a literary debate known as "The Admonition Controversy." The dispute centered on "things indifferent," that is, notions of correct liturgical and ecclesiastical procedures not mentioned specifically in the BIBLE. Whitgift's writings reveal that his position stemmed not from an intrinsic antipathy for Cartwright's PRESBYTERIANISM, but from a conviction that the church's system of governance was necessarily shaped by the larger political system in which it was situated.

Bishop and Archbishop

Not surprisingly, Whitgift's views found favor with Queen Elizabeth, and in 1576 she awarded him the bishopric of Worcester. He stayed until 1583 when Elizabeth nominated him as archbishop of Canterbury. No doubt the nomination was proof of Elizabeth's enduring good opinion of Whitgift, but it also revealed Elizabeth's desire to fill the post with someone who shared her zeal for conformity. Edmund Grindal, Whitgift's predecessor, had displeased Elizabeth mightily when he refused to suppress "prophesyings," that is, meetings where CLERGY rehearsed their PREACHING skills and facility with scripture. Grindal was placed under house arrest, and for the rest of his term was prohibited from carrying out any but the most minor of tasks.

Consequently, when Whitgift became archbishop, the church had been without effective metropolitan leadership for over five years. He rose to the challenge, proving quickly he would tolerate no opposition to the order and constitutions of the church. He issued articles that prohibited prophesyings and other private religious gatherings, allowed no compromise on questions of vestments, and demanded that all ministers of the church acclaim that the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER contained nothing contrary to the word of God. Moreover, he required that all clergy affirm Elizabeth's dominion over all persons in her realm, over and above any other temporal, ecclesiastical, or spiritual power.

Whitgift championed the royal authority and the episcopacy throughout his career as archbishop. He supported RICHARD HOOKER during Hooker's tenure at Temple Church, and helped him acquire a more quiet living when Hooker began to write The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity (the fifth volume is dedicated to Whitgift). He succeeded in passing stringent anti-Puritan laws in 1593, and successfully kept those with strong presbyterian leanings from holding important office (see PURITANISM; PRESBYTERIANISM).

Whitgift's unyielding attitude combined with his predilection for the pomp and ceremony of his position earned him many detractors. The Marprelate Tracts, a series of Puritan pamphlets published during the 1590s, labeled him "John Kankerbury, the Pope of Lambeth." Interestingly, despite their disagreement over issues of church POLITY, Whitgift and the Puritans agreed on two significant issues: the need for an educated clergy and the wisdom of the doctrine of PREDESTINATION as explicated by JOHN CALVIN. As archbishop, Whitgift refined a system he had designed in Worcester to put in place a practical and efficient method by which licensed preachers tutored unlearned clergy. Concerning predestination, Whitgift once chided Cartwright for not giving proper weight to this important principle. In 1595 a controversy at Cambridge University prompted Whitgift to form a committee that produced "The Lambeth Articles," nine statements supporting Calvinist tenets. Elizabeth was not apprised of this committee, and evidently expressed her disapproval to Whitgift. The Articles were never formally adopted.

This episode notwithstanding, Whitgift and Elizabeth enjoyed a close relationship to the end. She is said to have referred to him as "her little black husband," and he attended her at her deathbed. Elizabeth died in 1603; Whitgift survived his queen by little less than a year. He lived to crown James I, and to attend the Hampton Court Conference where his protégé and successor Richard Bancroft championed the conformist position so long defended by Whitgift. Whitgift died February 29, 1604 in London and is buried in Croyden.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Whitgift, John. The Works of John Whitgift. Edited by Rev. John Ayre, The Parker Society. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1851–1853.

Secondary Sources:

Dawley, Powell Mills. John Whitgift and the English Reformation. New York: Scribner, 1954.

Lake, Peter. Anglicans and Puritans? Presbyterianism and English Conformist Thought from Whitgift to Hooker. London: Unwin Hyman, 1988.

Paule, George. Life of the Most Reverend and Religious Prelate, John Whitgift. London: 1612.

Porter, H.C. Reformation and Reaction in Tudor Cambridge. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1958.

KAREN BRUHN

WICHERN, JOHANN HEINRICH (1808–1881)

German reformer. Wichern was born on April 21, 1808, the eldest of seven children, and died on April 7, 1881. He is generally and correctly considered “the father of the Inner Mission”—although not because he founded many diaconal institutions, but because he brought them together for the first time and because his notion of “Inner Mission” as the primary idea behind social Protestantism in GERMANY has had a substantial impact to the present day.

Wichern came from a modest home. His father was a scrivener for a notary public until he himself became a notary public in 1806 and rose to the bourgeois middle class. He sent the ten-year-old Johann to Hamburg’s Johanneum School, a prominent German high school. But Johann had to leave the school before earning his diploma. His father had died suddenly in 1823 and left behind a widow and seven children without income except what the musically talented Johann could earn by giving private piano lessons and later as a teaching assistant in a Christian school. In the years 1826–1827 he joined an ecclesiastical party in Hamburg that fought against the theological rationalism to which most CLERGY in Hamburg subscribed. Influential politicians supported evangelical religious practice. They encouraged the young Wichern and eventually provided the financial support enabling him to study THEOLOGY.

Wichern completed his theological studies at Göttingen with the professor of practical theology Friedrich Lücke, and then moved to Berlin where he studied under FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER and JOHANN AUGUST NEANDER. In Hamburg in 1832 he failed his first round of exams, and being thirtieth on the list of aspiring clergy at a time when the profession was overcrowded, he had little hope of finding a position in the church. While teaching SUNDAY SCHOOL he seized the opportunity to take over the direction of a newly established Salvation House, a place that provided rootless young men a home and a practical education. Wichern formulated a concept of EDUCATION along the lines of existing models in Weimar, Germany (Johannes Falk), and Beuggen, SWITZERLAND (Samuel Zeller). These models sought to shape individuals into a family-like group structure in which youths could experience love and trust as well as religious instruction in an environment free from repression. As a matter of principle Wichern refused financial subsidies from the state to keep the institution, dubbed the “rough house,” independent of political pressures. Older assistants—soon called “brothers”—led the groups, and Wichern took responsibility for their education in a “brothers’ house.” From this institution evolved the diaconal brotherhood: a female counterpart was established by the diaconal minister Theodor Fliedner in Kaiserswerth near Düsseldorf in 1836.

Wichern’s work in Hamburg was based on his conviction that what alienated the underclasses from Christianity and from the CHURCH was rooted in their social conditions. Mass poverty in the years before the March Revolution of 1848 had resulted from the collapse of proto-industrialization in Germany and the migration from the agricultural areas of the east to the big cities (Hamburg, Berlin) and to the regions along the Rhine River, the Ruhr valley, and Upper Silesia. These upheavals severed traditional religious connections, and the church did not know how to react effectively. Wichern outlined a program of re-Christianizing the unchurched masses and made social aid for the poor a precondition for the PREACHING of the Word of God. Wichern did not trust the state church of his day to complete the double task of providing social aid based on Christian responsibility and of ministering the gospel to the poor. So he set up independent religious unions, which—because of their independence from the church hierarchy and the limitations of individual congregations as were found among regional churches—formed a network of socially engaged diaconic groups. He called this network the “Inner Mission.” In 1848 in Wittenberg, Wichern took the opportunity to present his ideas before an assembly of German Protestantism. Those present welcomed the possibilities in Wichern’s ideas and decided to establish a committee that could coordinate the work in Germany. Out of this came in 1849 the Central-Ausschuss für Innere Mission (Central Committee for the Inner Mission) in Berlin, which still exists today as the Diakonisches Werk der Evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland, with its center in Stuttgart.

Wichern was no social reformer and no promoter of state-sponsored social welfare, although the notion of cooperation in social work between state and independent religious and philanthropic groups goes back to his idea. Above all he aimed to invigorate the church and win back all those classes of society that had become increasingly alienated after the Congress of Vienna. Included among them were not only the “poor” but also the educated and the working middle class. Inner Mission, as the link between social work and the preaching of the gospel, was for him a broad cultural phenomenon that society should embrace. In 1857 he joined the Prussian Ministry of Justice with the task of reforming prisons. He undertook the first attempts toward resocializing prisoners after their release. He was also a member of the supreme council of the Protestant church, the highest administrative body in the Prussian church.

The Inner Mission and its counterpart, the Caritas Union, founded in 1897—together with the big cities and the social-welfare departments of regional states—shaped the German model of the modern social-welfare state that is characterized by a “mixed economy of welfare” (Christoph Sachsse). Independent groups, religious organizations (nongovernmental organizations or NGOs), and state institutions serve the social sector together and do so by mutual agreement. The Inner Mission led by Wichern and his followers had an essential role in its development. For its impact and for the reputation of German Protestantism, this remains tremendously important, even to this day.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wichern, J.H. Sämtliche Werke I-X, edited by P. Meinhold and G. Brakelmann. Hamburg, Berlin, and Hannover: 1958–1988.

Secondary Sources:

Gerhardt, M. Ein Lebensbild. 3 vols. Hamburg: Agentur des Rauhen Hauses, 1927–1931.

Herrmann, V., J.C.Kaiser, and Th. Strohm, eds. Bibliographie zur Geschichte der dt. ev. Diakonie im 19. u. 20. Jh. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1997.

Kaiser, J.C., ed. in collaboration with V.Herrmann. Handbuch zur Geschichte der deutschen Inneren Mission im 19. u. 20. Jh. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 2003.

———. “Sozialer Protestantismus und ‘Zweitkirche’: Entstehungskontext und Entwicklungslinien der Inneren Mission,” in Karl Gabriel ed., Der herausgeforderte Sozialstaat und die kirchlichen Wohlfahrtsverbände in Deutschland. 27–47. Berlin: 2001.

Röper, U., and C.Jüllig, eds. Die Macht der Nächstenliebe: Einhundertfünfzig Jahre Innere Mission und Diakonie, 1848–1998: Katalog zur Ausstellung im Deutschen Historischen Museum. Berlin: Jovis, 1998.

Sturm, S. “Sozialstaat und Christlichsozialer Gedanke: Agentur des Rauhen Hauses Sozialtheologie und ihre neuere Rezeption in system-theoretischer Perspektive.” Ph.D. dissertation, Westf. Wilhelms Universität, Münster, 1999.

JOCHEN-CHRISTOPH KAISER

WILBERFORCE, SAMUEL (1805–1873)

English bishop. Wilberforce was born on September 7, 1805 at Clapham, London, the third son of WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, the emancipationist, who was at the time a leader of the CLAPHAM SECT of Evangelicals, and Barbara Anne Spooner. After a private education he was matriculated at Oriel College, University of Oxford, in 1823 as a commoner and, under the influence of his father, began to develop his considerable debating skills. He graduated in 1826 with first-class honors in mathematics and a second in classics, and on June 11, 1828 married Emily Sargent, daughter of the rector of Lavington, Sussex. In the same year he was appointed curate of Checkendon, near Henley, Oxfordshire. In 1830 his father gained him the patronage of the bishop of Winchester who presented him to the rectorship of Brightstone, Isle of Wight where he immediately began to make a name for himself as preacher and writer.

Wilberforce was throughout his career a High Churchman in the sense of holding the CHURCH OF ENGLAND central to English life, politics, and society. His early published works included Note Book of a Country Clergyman, an edition of the Letters and Journals of Henry Martyn, with his brother Robert he wrote the Life of William Wilberforce (1838), and in 1840 the Correspondence. These were joined by Agathos and other Sunday Stories (1839), University Sermons (1839), and Rocky Island and other Parables (1840). In 1844 he published History of the American Church. However, by 1838 his writing was sufficiently opposed to the Tractarians that JOHN HENRY NEWMAN refused to publish any more of his essays (see OXFORD MOVEMENT). Over the next few years his reputation and influence grew so that in 1839 Wilberforce became archdeacon of Surrey and in 1840, canon of Winchester and rector of Alverstoke, Hampshire. The following year he was made chaplain to Prince Albert and in 1843 the archbishop of York appointed him sub-almoner to the queen. In May 1845 he was made dean of Westminster and then in October 1845, bishop of Oxford, where he stayed for twentyfive years.

At Oxford Wilberforce's career was marked by a devotion to his pastoral duties, particularly the cause of improving clerical education, but was also touched by controversy. The see at Oxford, with its close connections to the university through Christ Church, was something of a poisoned chalice for someone of Wilberforce's politics, who would be attacked on the one side for being too close to the Catholics and by the Tractarians as being too conservative. He was also cordially detested by the Evangelical wing of the church. In 1843 EDWARD PUSEY had been banned by the university from preaching for two years and in 1845 he took Newman's place as leader of the Tractarians, Newman himself just having been received into the Catholic Church. Wilberforce was not helped by the fact that over the next twenty years his brother-in-law, sister-in-law and her husband, his brothers Robert and William, his own daughter, and her husband were all received into the Catholic church.

Wilberforce quickly established himself as a powerful speaker in the House of Lords and it was there that he earned the sobriquet of “Soapy Sam”—a man with a fearsome reputation for debate but almost too clever and slippery a rhetorician. He soon became embroiled in controversy when in 1847 the prime minister offered the Hereford see to Renn Dickson Hampden, Regius professor of divinity at Oxford, whose writing was considered unorthodox by the Tractarians. Pressured by JOHN KEBLE and Pusey, Wilberforce demanded Hampden’s trial if he would not recant his writings, only to be accused of weakness when, a few weeks later, he withdrew the charges thinking Hampden to have been misrepresented.

The Wilberforce-Huxley Debate

SCIENCE and religion come newly into conflict in 1860, first with the publication of the liberal Essays and Reviews, several of the authors of which were Oxford colleagues. Wilberforce condemned the book in the Quarterly Review and pursued its authors as far as the House of Lords. Then came the event that fixed his name and sealed his reputation forever in the public eye: the so-called Wilberforce-Huxley debate with T.H. Huxley at the University Museum (June 30, 1860). Wilberforce was prominent among the ardent foes of the theories of evolution expounded by Robert Chambers in Vestiges of Creation (1844) and then by Charles Darwin in On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection (1859). In this he had a particular ally in Richard Owen, the London zoologist (later first director of the Natural History Museum in Kensington). The University of Oxford had just completed its brand new museum as a monument to natural theology and the British Association for the Advancement of Science held its annual meeting there, with DARWINISM the topic overshadowing all others. Before the assembled who’s who of British science (except for Darwin himself), Wilberforce delivered a comprehensive rebuttal of the theory (the text, showing Owen’s influences, was later published anonymously in Quarterly Review). He famously concluded with the rhetorical flourish that he “had been informed that Professor Huxley had said that he didn’t care whether or not his grandfather was an ape.” The myth has been perpetuated over the years that he had demanded of Huxley whether “it was through his grandfather or his grandmother that he claimed descent from an ape” but that (particularly “grandmother”) would have been far too crude a jibe. Huxley famously ended his response by turning Wilberforce’s rhetoric against him: “If then the question is out to me whether I would rather have a miserable ape for a grandfather or a man highly endowed by nature and possessed of great means of influence and yet employs those faculties and that influence for the mere purpose of introducing ridicule into a grave scientific discussion, I unhesitatingly affirm my preference for the ape.”

Having been passed over for London, in 1869 Wilberforce attained the bishopric of Winchester and devoted much effort to revision of the New Testament. On July 19, 1873 he was killed in a riding accident.

See also Creation Science

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Wilberforce, Samuel. A History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. London: J.Burns, 1844.

———. The Note Book of a Country Clergyman. New York: Harper, 1979, 1833.

———. A Reproof of the American Church. New York: W. Harned, 1846.

Wilberforce, Samuel, R.K.Pugh, and John Frederick Arthur Mason. The Letter-Books of Samuel Wilberforce, 1843–68. Aylesbury: Buckinghamshire Record Society and the Oxfordshire Record Society, 1970.

Secondary Sources:

Burgon, John W. Lives of Twelve Good Men. London: John Murray, 1888.

Meacham, Standish. Lord Bishop: the Life of Samuel Wilberforce. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970.

Thomson, Keith W. “The Huxley, Wilberforce and the Oxford Museum.” American Scientist 88 (2000):209–213.

Wilberforce, Robert I. The Life of Samuel Wilberforce. Rev. ed. London: J.Murray, 1888.

KEITH STEWART THOMSON

WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM (1759–1833)

English politician. Wilberforce was active in Parliament from 1780 to 1825. Converted as a young man to an Evangelical faith, he dedicated himself to campaigns for the moral improvement of the country and, supremely, for the abolition of the slave trade. He was an influential supporter of the various Evangelical causes of his day.

Career

Born in Hull, Yorkshire, on August 24, 1759, Wilberforce lost his father when he was only eight and his grandfather, a wealthy merchant, when he was fifteen. Inheriting a substantial private income, the young man went up two years later to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he became a close friend of William Pitt, later prime minister. In 1780 he was elected member of Parliament (MP) for Hull, and four years later for the vast constituency of Yorkshire, which he retained for twenty-eight years. Although he gave steady support to Pitt in the House of Commons and was considered for government office, he was thought to be too slack in his attention to business. He suffered from persistent ill health and the effects of the opium prescribed for its cure, but in 1797 he married Barbara Spooner, with whom he had four sons. After Pitt's death in 1806, Wilberforce remained loyal to his friend's principles, defending the established Constitution and insisting on the enforcement of measures designed to maintain public order. Although this stance aligned him with those subsequently called Tories, he favored moderate parliamentary reform, full civil rights for Roman Catholics, and the abolition of hanging. In 1812 he left his Yorkshire parliamentary seat because of the pressures of defending it, becoming instead MP for the small borough of Bramber in Sussex until his final retirement from parliament in 1825. He died in London on July 29, 1833 and was buried in Westminster Abbey on August 5.

Evangelicalism and Its Campaigns

The fame of Wilberforce rests on his commitment to Evangelical Christianity (see EVANGELICALISM) and the causes it sponsored. While traveling on the continent during 1784 and 1785, the young politician read Philip Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, which was crucial in making him realize that his faith had been only nominal, and gradually he emerged from a spiritual crisis as a believer in “vital Christianity.” On the advice of John Newton, the former slave trader who was now an Evangelical clergyman, Wilberforce determined to remain in politics to advance Christian causes. One major preoccupation became “the reformation of manners.” In 1787 he persuaded King George III, through Pitt as prime minister, to issue a proclamation urging magistrates to enforce existing laws against blasphemy, drunkenness, and similar misdemeanors. Wilberforce was a driving force behind the subsequent creation of a Proclamation Society, which stirred supporters into calling for local action against wrongdoing. This campaign has been interpreted as an exercise in social control in the interests of the ruling classes, but Wilberforce was concerned with reform of the whole of society. His Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians (1797) censured the upper and middle classes for neglect of their responsibilities. Diagnosing their fundamental weakness as formal rather than convinced adherence to the gospel, Wilberforce commended “real Christianity” to them. The politician’s book achieved a wide readership and contributed to bringing about many conversions similar to his own.

The most celebrated campaign undertaken by Wilberforce was the effort to suppress the slave trade (see SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF). Although he had shared the growing public aversion to that trade since his youth, the politician drew his inspiration for abolition from his faith. He worked in cooperation with fellow Evangelicals, many of whom formed the group that was in retrospect to be called the CLAPHAM SECT because they lived in the London suburb of that name. In 1789 Wilberforce carried a set of resolutions against the trade in the House of Commons and over the next few years, in the teeth of opposition from planters and merchants, he sustained his humanitarian pressure. In 1806 a bill for partial abolition was carried; in the next year total abolition followed. In the same year he set up an African Institution to promote civilization in the continent, to persuade other countries to suppress the slave trade, and to improve the conditions of the slaves. In 1823 Wilberforce published An Appeal...on behalf of the Negro Slaves in the West Indies, although it was not until later years that he supported a younger generation in pressing for the emancipation of the slaves. That was to be achieved in British territories in 1833, the year of Wilberforce’s death.

The politician was able to promote the Evangelical cause in a variety of ways. He supported many of the burgeoning Evangelical societies of the day such as the Church Missionary Society (1799) and the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY (1806). He obtained posts for promising Evangelical clergy in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND. He defended the Methodists from attempts by the authorities to suppress their activities. In 1813 he led a movement to ensure freedom for missionaries to enter INDIA at the time of the renewal of the East India Company charter. Wilberforce was one of the circle of Anglican Evangelicals who contributed to their periodical, The Christian Observer, in the early years after its foundation in 1802, submitting, for example, a critical review of WILLIAM PALEY’S classic statement of the argument from design. Theologically Wilberforce was originally a moderate Calvinist whose CALVINISM gradually became more diluted until it virtually disappeared. His life was a supreme example of the extraordinary energy in good causes unleashed by the Evangelical movement.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wilberforce, William. A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians. London: T.Cadell, jun., and W.Davies, 1797.

Secondary Sources:

Howse, Ernest M. Saints in Politics: The "Clapham Sect" and the Growth of Freedom. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1952.

Pollock, John. Wilberforce. London: Constable, 1977.

Wilberforce, Robert I., and Samuel Wilberforce. The Life of William Wilberforce. 5 vols. London: John Murray, 1839.

D.W.BEBBINGTON

WILLARD, FRANCES ELIZABETH CAROLINE (1839–1898)

American social reformer. Willard was a TEMPERANCE reformer, a supporter of ECUMENISM, women's suffrage, and women's rights within Protestant churches. She was born in Churchville, New York in 1839. In her youth her family joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. Willard was a teacher, an evangelist for DWIGHT L. MOODY, and a founder and the national president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union (WCTU) from 1879 until her death in 1898.

Willard was concerned with reforming the ills of society and encouraged her organization to begin the task. She advocated suffrage as the leader of WCTU and as the editor of their periodical, Our Union. In her Woman in the Pulpit, she advocated a place for WOMEN within her religious tradition by providing an exegesis of biblical passages that discussed women's religious participation. Many consider Willard the most important laywoman in the Methodist Episcopal Church of the nineteenth century. However, she also caused controversy within her denomination over a "woman's place" when she wanted to address the Methodist General Conference about WCTU, and in 1887 she became an elected delegate to this conference. Willard is an important figure in Protestantism not only because of her support of reform, but also because of her desire to find a place for women in Protestant denominations.

See also Methodism; Methodism, North America; Social Gospel; Women Clergy

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Willard, Frances E. Women and Temperance. Hartford, CT: Park Publishing Company, 1883.
 ——. Women in the Pulpit. Chicago: Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, 1889.
 ——. Writing Out My Heart: Selections From the Journal of Frances E. Willard. Edited by Carolyn De Swarte Gifford. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Secondary Sources:

- Bordin, Ruth. Frances Willard: A Biography. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
 Earhart, Mary. Frances Willard: From Prayers to Politics. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944.

KELLY J. BAKER

WILLIAMS, ROGER (1603?-1683)

Radical puritan and founder of Rhode Island. Williams deserves to be remembered chiefly for his unflinching embrace of religious liberty.

Born in London, probably in the first year of the reign of James I, the young Williams found an invaluable patron in the person of the famed jurist, Sir Edward Coke (1552–1634). With the latter's advice and support, he finished a preparatory education that qualified him for admission to Pembroke College of Cambridge University. Receiving his Bachelor of Arts degree in 1627, Williams stayed on in Cambridge for postgraduate work, then accepted ordination in the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1629.

Williams quickly identified himself with the Puritan party of that national church, joining others in urging this institution to become more rigorously and consistently Protestant.

Williams and Massachusetts Bay Colony

In the midst of vigorous agitations and intense examinations of both hearts and scripture, many Cambridge graduates resolved to leave ENGLAND and its heavy-handed bishops in order to create a true and purer church in England's lands across the Atlantic Ocean. In 1630 the lawyer JOHN WINTHROP (1588–1649) led a large contingent of Englishmen, women, and children to Massachusetts Bay, where they, in faithful covenant with God, created a holy commonwealth and a New Testament church. Before the decade of the 1630s ended, thousands followed in Winthrop's wake, setting the course for much of America's religious history to come. One of the early followers, Roger Williams, set sail from Bristol late in 1630 arriving, with his new wife, off Nantasket on February 5, 1631.

Much attention had to be given to the demands of survival in a bitterly cold, barren, and unforgiving wilderness, but even in the midst of these basic human challenges, one could neither forget nor neglect the religious urgencies that brought the Puritans to the colonies in the first place. In recognition of his piety, education, and zeal, Williams was asked to lead the newly formed church in Boston. He declined the honor, however, because he recognized that the majority of the congregation still saw themselves as members of the Church of England. They intended to complete their program of reform, unhindered, until they could show England what a model New Testament church looked like. And then, they confidently believed, their mother country would see the light, purify the national church, and be a beacon of a purer Protestantism to all the Western world.

Williams was dismayed by what he regarded as hypocrisy. How could the Puritans radically reform the national church, all the while pretending to still be members of it?

How can one, Williams plaintively asked, build a square house of God on the keel of a ship? The only honest and honorable course to take, Williams asserted, was to scrap all tradition and begin afresh with only the New Testament as a guide. In this way, the cause of Christ would be magnified and the true church would be made manifest.

Williams had other concerns as well that prevented him from finding complete comfort in the civil and ecclesiastical patterns of Massachusetts Bay. The Puritans had rejected bishops, but they had not rejected all mingling of the church and the state. The civil magistrates in Massachusetts continued to enforce religious duties and to punish dissent. They even required unbelievers to swear an oath in court, “so help me God,” which Williams saw as a travesty and a plain violation of conscience. Beyond all this, Williams, who had early studied the languages of the Indians and sympathetically observed their culture, complained that the Massachusetts Bay Colony had done nothing to compensate NATIVE AMERICANS for lands that had suddenly been claimed as the private property of Englishmen.

In the space of a mere four years, Williams had raised enough objections and thrown down enough challenges to completely unnerve the authorities of the Bay Colony. In October 1635, the General Court of Massachusetts Bay passed a sentence of exile against Williams for his “new and dangerous opinions.” He was given six weeks to leave.

Williams and Rhode Island

Williams readily recognized that he could neither remain in Massachusetts Bay nor return to England. His alternatives were limited. The Dutch in New Amsterdam were too far away and might be even less hospitable than his own countrymen. But between the claims of the Dutch and those of Massachusetts, much empty territory lay. Williams set out, with the help of the American Indians, to create a colony of his own, with a line clearly drawn between the civil and the ecclesiastical orders, and with sensitive regard for the tender consciences of all humankind.

Making his way on foot through winter snows, Williams, after some six weeks of not knowing “what bed or bread did mean,” arrived at the headwaters of the Narraganset Bay, where he created a small settlement that he called Providence—“in a sense of God’s merciful Providence to me in my distress.” Slowly and never too surely, the colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations gradually came into being. Here Williams spent most of the remainder of his life (returning to England for a time)—nearly half a century—trying to give stability to his colony and life to his vision of a full liberty in all matters of the human soul.

In 1638 Williams joined with twenty other settlers in creating a BAPTIST church, the first on American soil. The distinguishing feature of this church was its rejection of infant baptism, replaced by a “believer’s baptism” extended to those who made a voluntary profession of faith. Religion was viewed as personal, and the commitment to it as necessarily wholly free. Williams did not long remain a Baptist, as he soon concluded that no church could be fully loyal to the New Testament. Williams continued to defend the Baptists as being the closest that one could come to New Testament Christianity in the present age.

By 1640, with thirty-seven families in residence, the Providence settlers drew up formal articles of agreement. One article made clear the uniqueness of this new urban experiment: "We agree, As formerly hath been the liberties of the Town, so still to hold forth Liberty of Conscience."

To insure the survival of his tiny colony, Williams went to London in 1643 to obtain a charter. This trip enabled him to get some of his writings into print, for Providence did not have a printer and Boston had no interest in promoting his radical views. His first book, A Key into the Language of America (1643), proved to be his most popular. A sensitive study of the language, culture, and religion of New England American Indians, this work won an immediate audience in England and an enduring one in America. The situation was otherwise with his second book, The Bloody Tenant of Persecution, for Cause of Conscience (1644). This book was burned in London almost as soon as it appeared, and was widely excoriated in America, nowhere more vigorously than in Massachusetts.

The strong message of The Bloody Tenant was that the church and the state must be separated for the sake of the church, for the sake of humanity, and for the cause of Christ. Williams argued that the joining of these two institutions, ever since the days of the Emperor Constantine, had resulted not in the purity of religion but in the horror of bloody persecutions and even bloodier religious wars.

Anticipating English philosopher John Locke (1632–1704), and very probably influencing him as well, Williams argued that all civil power comes from the people. The "divine right of kings" was a fiction, a costly myth. Governments "have no more power" than the people "consenting and agreeing shall betrust them with." Churches, on the other hand, had a "divine right" or at least a divine origin. Ordained by God, chartered by Christ, they have a status quite apart from that of the civil order. It therefore made no sense, according to Williams, to put this divine institution in the hands of "natural, sinful, inconstant men, and so consequently (of) Satan himself."

Because England was in the midst of a civil war and had no king, Williams abandoned hope of receiving a royal charter and instead appealed to Parliament for some legal foundation. In March 1644 the relevant Parliamentary committee voted (with two votes to spare) for a "Free Charter of Civil Incorporation and Government for the Providence Plantations in the Narragansett Bay in New England."

In the late summer of 1644, Williams arrived back home in Rhode Island, where he was soon elected "chief Officer" of the colony, a position he would retain for the next three years. Now he faced the difficult task of demonstrating how religious liberty operated. Some citizens, of course, were ready to treat liberty as a synonym for licentiousness, while others thought the logical corollary of liberty in religion was anarchy in politics. To the end of his life, Williams repeatedly contended with these perversions of a genuine "soul liberty."

Because of continuing quarrels over authority, a second trip to London became necessary. Joining with John Clarke (1609–1676), leading citizen and Baptist pastor in Newport, Williams in 1651 had to leave his family and friends to labor once more on behalf of Rhode Island. Conferring with OLIVER CROMWELL (1599–1658) on theological issues and working with Parliament on political ones, Williams returned home after two years, leaving Clarke behind to conclude the tortuous negotiations for a new charter. Because the monarchy was restored in 1660, the new charter, granted in 1663, was a royal one, more enduring, more authoritative than a mere vote of Parliament. The charter granted to the people of Rhode Island “a full liberty in religious concerns.”

While in London, Williams published a tender love letter to his wife, encouraging her in her periods of melancholy or spiritual doubt. This small book, called Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health (1652), reveals Williams’s profound and personal piety—a side of his career too often obscured or forgotten. For him, this life was a mere shadow of the glories to be revealed in the life to come. We should think of ourselves, Williams wrote, as passengers on a ship, destined for a heavenly harbor. When persecuted or defeated or despondent, we must “sometimes warm and revive our cold hearts and fainting spirits with the assured hope of those victories, those crowns, those harvests, those refreshings and fruits...which God hath prepared for them that love him.”

In his old age, Williams rowed from Providence to Newport (about thirty miles) in order to contest against the Quakers, whose theology he rejected. Although he believed firmly in religious liberty, Williams did not advocate religious indifference. He argued for many days trying to convince the Quakers that they were wrong, but would never permit the hand of the state to be raised against them to the slightest degree.

Williams suffered many disappointments, perhaps none so severe as the “Indian uprising” of 1675, known as King Phillip’s War. All of Williams’s years of delicate negotiation, of careful cultivating of friendships, of scrupulous avoidance of forced conversions, came to a brutal end in the furies of New England’s bloodiest war. Williams’s own house went up in flames, as did his dreams of an intercultural harmony between the American Indians and the English. In his last years he also suffered the loss of his wife and one of his six children. With ever deepening sorrow he found himself writing once more to his friends and neighbors in Providence in 1682, begging them to behave as good citizens should and reminding them that “Our Charter Excels all in New England, or the World, as to the Souls of Men.”

The next year, Williams died. The exact date of his death, like that of his birth, is unknown. Instead, America’s commitment to a “full liberty in religious concerns” stands as his enduring monument.

References and Further Reading

- Gaustad, Edwin S. Liberty of Conscience: Roger Williams in America Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1999.
- Gilpin, W.Clark. The Millenarian Piety of Roger Williams. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Hall, Timothy L. Separating Church and State: Roger Williams and Religious Liberty. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1998.
- LaFantasie, Glenn W. The Correspondence of Roger Williams. 2 vols. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1988.

Morgan, Edmund S. Roger Williams: The Church and the State. New York: Harcourt, Brace, & World, 1967.

Williams, Roger. The Bloody Tenant of Persecution. Edited by Richard Groves. Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2001.

EDWIN S.GAUSTAD

WILSON, THOMAS WOODROW (1856–1924)

Twenty-eighth president of the United States. Wilson, the twenty-eighth president of the United States (1913–1921), was born in a Presbyterian manse in Staunton, Virginia. Among his ancestors were Presbyterian ministers on both sides of his family, and the family of his first wife, Ellen Axson Wilson, also included Presbyterian ministers. His father, Dr. Joseph Ruggles Wilson, was one of the founders of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America in 1861, and after the CIVIL WAR he became the Stated Clerk and one of the foremost leaders of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, the southern branch of American PRESBYTERIANISM.

Wilson was raised in the South and imbued deeply the ethos of southern Presbyterianism. Many contemporaries and subsequent biographers have argued that a crucial key to understanding Wilson's personality and politics was his religious faith. "My life would not be worth living," he declared as president, "if it were not for the driving power of religion, for faith, pure and simple."

Wilson attended Davidson College for one year and graduated from Princeton University in 1879. He attended the University of Virginia Law School but did not receive a degree, and after briefly practicing law, entered the new Ph.D. program in politics at the Johns Hopkins University. After receiving his degree, he taught at Bryn Mawr College and Wesleyan University and then returned to Princeton. After twelve years on the faculty, he became the university's president in 1902. Amidst the theological controversies in American Presbyterianism, Wilson tried to keep Princeton above the fray, though personally he had little regard for the archconservatives in his denomination.

Wilson resigned and was elected governor of New Jersey in 1910. Quickly establishing himself as a reformer and a progressive Democrat, Wilson was elected president in 1912 and reelected in 1916. In both foreign and domestic policy, he sought to use the power of the state and the influence of the presidency to bring new order to American society and the postwar world. His speeches reflect the missionary spirit of Protestantism; for example, he said America's role in World War I was "to make the world safe for democracy." When he formulated "the Covenant of the League of Nations," the title itself revealed the impact of the covenant theological tradition in Presbyterianism. The philosophical principles of twentieth-century American foreign policy were largely forged by Wilson—with both positive and negative consequences—and the influence of his Protestant and Presbyterian heritage helped shape his assumptions about society and politics.

References and Further Reading

Cooper, John Milton. The Warrior and the Priest: Woodrow Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1983.

Link, Arthur S., et al., eds. The Papers of Woodrow Wilson. 69 vols. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1966–1994. [This is the definitive collection of Wilson's writings, including those on religion.]

Link, Arthur S. The Higher Realism of Woodrow Wilson and Other Essays. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1973.

Mulder, John M. Woodrow Wilson: The Years of Preparation. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.

Mulder, John M., Ernest M. White, and Ethel S. White, eds., Woodrow Wilson: A Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1997.

JOHN M. MULDER

WINSTANLEY, GERRARD (c. 1609–c. 1675)

English church leader. Winstanley was born near or in Wigam, Lancashire, ENGLAND in about 1609. After he completed his apprenticeship as a merchant-tailor in London in 1637 he struggled in business and went bankrupt during the Civil Wars (1643). Winstanley and his wife, Susan, tried to reestablish themselves in Cobham, Surrey during the 1640s but failed. During this period Winstanley claimed to have had a deeply spiritual experience that led to his involvement with a group called the Diggers.

Winstanley became a leader of the Digger movement in 1649–1650. Forty to fifty people tried to cultivate the common land at St. George's Hill in Walton-on-Thames and then in the neighboring parish of Cobham. Harassed by the local population at both sites, these experiments in communal living failed by Easter 1650. His life afterward is cloudy, but it seems that his first wife predeceased him; he remarried, fathered two sons, and became a corn chandler and Quaker before his death in London in 1675 (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF).

Like most Christians, Winstanley believed that humanity had fallen from its original state of grace. However, little else in his writings is orthodox. He thought private property as well as commerce were negative outcomes of the Fall or perhaps even the cause of the Fall. He thought that Christ would usher in a communal society upon his return, but Winstanley's millenarianism is open to interpretation: did he believe in Christ's literal return or would Christ's Spirit bring about personal and societal regeneration? Winstanley denounced the mainstream Christian churches, their CLERGY, and doctrines as a hindrance to SALVATION. He equated God the Father with Reason; God would help bring the victory of the spirit over flesh. Conversely, the DEVIL was not a separate being but was the spirit of flesh that tried to rule humanity. Winstanley thought God would ultimately save everyone.

Gerrard Winstanley was a radical religious thinker and "communist" who published prolifically from 1648 to 1652. He was heavily influenced by the radicalism of the Protestant REFORMATION and the English Revolution. However, his impact on his own day was minimal and he received little attention from scholars until the end of the nineteenth century. Since then he has increasingly been recognized as a visionary and a gifted socioeconomic theorist, although his works have yielded very different interpretations.

See also Civil War, England; Communism; Millenarians & Millennialism

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Hill, Christopher, ed. Winstanley: The Law of Freedom and Other Writings. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1973.

Secondary Sources:

Bradstock, Andrew, ed. Winstanley and the Diggers, 1649–1999. London: Frank Cass, 2000.

Hill, Christopher. "The Religion of Gerrard Winstanley." Past & Present Supplement 5 (1978).

Mulligan, Lotte, John K. Graham, and Judith Richards. "Winstanley: A Case for the Man as He Said He Was." Journal of Ecclesiastical History 28 (1977): 57–75.

Petegorsky, David W. Left-Wing Democracy in the English Civil War. London: Victor Gollancz, 1940.

CHERYL FURY

WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD

Third largest of the three major Lutheran church bodies in the United States, after the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (ELCA) and the LUTHERAN CHURCH-MISSOURI SYNOD (LCMS), the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod (WELS) is the most conservative theologically and least involved in interconfessional dialogue. It is not a member of ecumenical organizations, such as the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, or the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION. Organized in 1850 by pastors with roots in the nineteenth-century German AWAKENINGS and in several German mission societies, WELS initially exhibited a relaxed Lutheranism. Influenced by C.F.W. WALTHER and the LCMS, WELS grew increasingly conservative, joining the LCMS and other conservative, confessional Lutheran synods in forming the LUTHERAN SYNODICAL CONFERENCE (LSC) in 1872. When a bitter controversy over PREDESTINATION disrupted the LSC in the 1880s, WELS remained allied with the Missouri Synod in the Conference. In 1917 WELS formally merged with several largely German conservative Lutheran synods in the upper Midwest. Where midwestern WELS and LCMS memberships overlapped, local associations were often jointly formed to create auxiliary institutions, such as high schools and homes for the elderly and for the handicapped.

In 1961 WELS severed its relationship with the LCMS, charging that by moving into closer relationships with the AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH, the LCMS had changed and no longer exhibited consistency in doctrine and practice. Because worship, including prayer, with those who are not in full agreement with WELS, including other Lutherans, is proscribed as "unionism," WELS pastors may not serve as military chaplains. WELS prohibits participation in Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts, and most fraternal organizations; condemns abortion; and excludes women from the pastorate. The Bible as the inspired, inerrant Word of God and the BOOK OF CONCORD constitute WELS's doctrinal foundation. Since the 1950s WELS has channeled its energies into the development of parochial schools, secondary and post-secondary institutions, and the expansion of domestic and foreign outreach.

See also Biblical Inerrancy; Doctrine; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

Braun, Mark. A Tale of Two Synods: Changes within the Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of North America that Led to the Exit of the Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern Publishing House, 2003.

Fredrich, Edward C. The Wisconsin Synod Lutherans: A History of the Single Synod, Federation, and Merger. Milwaukee, WI: Northwestern Publishing House, 1992.

Website: <http://www.wels.net/>

JAMES W. ALBERS

WITCHCRAZE

Belief in witchcraft is—like magic and religion—a universal phenomenon, and so is the persecution of suspected witches. In Europe a number of clear-cut definitions have drastically challenged traditional notions of witchcraft. Each of these interpretations is rooted in a specific intellectual environment, and the starting point causes surprise even after centuries: Christian demonology equated black and white magic. Founded on the thought of the church father St. Augustine (354–430), any kind of magic, and even superstitious customs like the wearing of amulets or watching the stars for astrological purposes, was thought to rely on a contract between a human being and a demon, the DEVIL, either explicitly or implicitly, because the magician expected an effect from a ceremony or a thing that in itself could not work. In the wake of the Roman sorcery scares, and inspired by monotheism, any kind of magic seemed equal to witchcraft (De doctrina christiana, II:30–40). Magicians and witches were seen as allies of the devil; they belonged to the civitas diaboli. As offenders of the law, biblical (Exodus 22:18) as well as Roman, they were to be killed.

Witches: Real or Not

In contrast, for theologians of the early and high Middle Ages, like Bishop Burchard of Worms (965–1025), author of an influential penitential, whose formulations would become part of Canon Law, witches were individuals who believed they possessed powers that in reality did not exist. Devils were equated with pagan gods, which were not too powerful in comparison to Jesus Christ, and witches were merely considered to be deceived by devilish illusions. They were not to be killed, but corrected and educated (Corrector Burchardi, Decretorum libri viginti, in Patrologia Latina 140, cols. 491–1090). The rise of heretical movements changed the perspective. Some late medieval theologians, like the Dominican inquisitor Heinrich Kramer/Institoris (1430–1505), author of the Malleus Maleficarum (“The Witches’ Hammer”), imagined witches to be members of a conspiracy, directed against Christian society, which was allowed by God to cause immense physical and spiritual hardship. The witches’ power, although supported by the devil with God’s permission, was real. Witches therefore had to be physically eradicated, according to both divine and secular law, hammered out by virtually any means because exceptional crimes require exceptional measures (Malleus Maleficarum, Speyer 1486).

Opponents of witch-hunting generally disapproved of the atrocities, and equated them with the persecution of Christians in ancient Rome, although it took Johann Weyer (1515–1588), the court physician of duke of Jülich-Kleve, to find a nonreligious reason. The author of the most influential early modern book against witchcraft persecutions, Weyer was an Erasmian Protestant, who—like presumably his English counterpart Reginald Scot (1538–1599)—became attached to the “Family of Love” and considered so-called witches to be melancholic females who needed leniency, love, and medical care to cure their mental illness. These “witches” were not strong, but weak; not evil, but sick; and they needed help, not punishment. Their killing could not be justified under any circumstances, but was to be seen as a “massacre of the innocents” (De Praestigiis Daemonum, Basel 1563, preface).

The European denial of witchcraft is firmly rooted in this pre-Cartesian opposition to atrocity, adopted by the representatives of European SPIRITUALISM, rationalism, and ENLIGHTENMENT. Because they no longer believed in the existence of witchcraft, for them witch killings were an ardent injustice committed by the authorities, “judicial murder.” Only a few decades later, however, when the execution of witches already had moved into the past, a completely new, postrationalist interpretation turned up, inspired by ROMANTICISM. Witches were reinterpreted as personifications of popular CULTURE, or even of popular resistance, emphasizing the important role of WOMEN. Jacob Grimm (1785–1809), the godfather of language and folklore studies, redefined witches as wise women, bearers of ancient wisdom, unjustly persecuted by the Christian churches to destroy European national cultures (Deutsche Mythologie, Heidelberg 1835). The Romantic Paradigm culminated in the fantasies of the French historian Jules Michelet (1798–1874), who reinterpreted the witches as heroines of folk medicine, victims of feudal suppression, and predecessors of the FRENCH REVOLUTION (La Sorciere, Paris 1862).

Rationalism, however, remained the dominant ideology among academics during the period of INDUSTRIALIZATION. Joseph Hansen (1862–1943), the most influential protagonist of the rationalist interpretation and editor of an essential source collection, considered witchcraft to be a nonexistent crime, and his interpretation has molded historical research up to the present day. Nevertheless, it must have been evident for everyone reading the trial records that some of the accused had indeed experimented with magic, worked as healers, experienced ecstasies, or even dared to invoke demons, very much like their educated male contemporaries, or witches outside Europe. The European approach to witchcraft over the last two millennia has thus been characterized by “invention of tradition.” Augustine, Burchard, Kramer/Institoris, Weyer, Grimm, and Michelet were founders of distinctive traditions, the latter two, for instance, of feminist and neo-pagan witchcraft. Because of the rise of social theory, the interpretation of witchcraft underwent a leap of abstraction around 1900. Since Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), hidden desires of omnipotence and aggression, suppressed into the subconsciousness, are seen as a driving force of witchcraft fantasies, and witches as objects of projection for anxieties and aggression. Émile Durkheim’s (1858–1917) idea that societies define norms by deviance has molded social anthropology’s doctrine that witchcraft should be considered to be a means of securing norms, and therefore identity. MAX WEBER’S (1864–1920) historical sociology linked the process of rationalization in Europe to complex changes in mental as well as economic structures, leading to a disenchantment of the world. Bronislaw Malinowski (1884–1942) interpreted witch fears and antiwitchcraft movements as symptoms of a crisis in society. European rationalism generally considered magic to be a product of the imagination, a consequence of deficient technology, and lack of insight into the laws of nature in a primitive society.

Protestant Response

Keith Thomas tried to link the rise of witchcraft persecutions in the sixteenth century to the REFORMATION, with its emphasis on the gospel (sola scriptura). MARTIN LUTHER'S teachings concerning JUSTIFICATION by FAITH alone, and the Calvinist doctrine of PREDESTINATION, devaluated and indeed forbade traditional and Catholic countermagic. This in turn led to rising fears of bewitching, and therefore to increasing witchcraft accusations. According to Thomas, Protestantism forced its adherents into the intolerable position of asserting the reality of witchcraft, yet denying the existence of an effective and legitimate form of protection or cure. However, the relationship between witchcraft and Protestantism is more complex, and yet difficult to define. Pre-Reformation persecutions, it seems now, were by far more intensive than formerly assumed. Throughout the Middle Ages we can find the burning of witches, with occasional witch panics leading to the execution of groups of evil conspirators, in archaic Northern societies as well as in urbanized centers of Europe. Because of lack of sources, the size of these prosecutions, or persecutions, remains guesswork. Clearly there was an increasing concern about witchcraft from 1400, when witchcraft and heretical conspiracy were amalgamated into a novel supercrime, probably first acknowledged in the "novas sectas," consisting of Jews, heretics, diviners, and sorcerers, mentioned in a papal bull of 1409 for a Franciscan inquisitor in Savoy (ed. Hansen 1900:16f.). During large-scale persecutions with many hundreds of victims in the late 1420s and 1430s in Savoy, the Dauphiné, and the Valais, five contemporary texts report the characteristics of the new heretical sect: apostasy, the contract with the devil, sealed by sexual intercourse between humans and demons, explaining the witches' capacity of evil sorcery (maleficium), of flying through the air, the witches' dance (labeled with Jewish terms, first as "synagogue," later as "sabbat"), shape-shifting, and other supernatural abilities. From then numerous demonologies added substance to these ideas. During a wave of persecution in the 1480s the Malleus Maleficarum (Speyer 1486) summarized the knowledge about witchcraft, trying to provide a convincing theological fundament and practical advice to support the hunting of witches, who were now conceived as being primarily female. The Malleus, based on Augustinian theology and Aquinas, remained an authority also for Protestant demonologists.

Renaissance opposition to witch-hunting, it is usually argued, brought the burnings to a halt. In Northern Italy the mass burnings did indeed stop in the early 1520s, and papal inquisitors disappeared from Northern Europe. The Reformation made the break definitive and contributed to the decline of witch-beliefs because Protestant theologians attacked magic and supernatural agencies in general. In the eyes of Luther, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, or JOHN CALVIN, Catholic piety and Catholic rites—the veneration of SAINTS, the expectation of miracles, the mass, the performance of pilgrimages, and the use of sacramentals—were not really different from rural superstitions, and Protestant pamphlets employed terms like “popish sorcery.” Radical reformers even denied the physical power of the devil, thus questioning the demonological concept of witchcraft altogether. The focus of the debates shifted away from witchcraft in a decade of revolutionary uprisings and world-historical decisions. The flow of demonological literature stopped. The “Malleus,” best-seller of the previous generation with nineteen Latin editions in GERMANY, ITALY, and FRANCE, disappeared from the market. Some contemporaries harbored the hope that the period of witch persecutions was definitively over, and were—like Johann Weyer—appalled to find that they started anew where they had it least expected—in Protestant territories.

It was indeed the hothouses of the Reformation—Wittenberg and Geneva—that were shaken by witch panics. In Wittenberg four people were executed as witches in 1540, and these burnings were part of a first wave of witch-burnings in Saxony. Luther was not involved in any of these trials, but also felt no necessity to curb them. This attitude must have bewildered Protestants as much as similar occurrences in Geneva. Calvin’s Godly City had formerly been part of the witch-ridden Duchy of Savoy, and after its secession in the 1530s, followed by religious Reformation, it remained haunted by all kinds of strange fears, particularly the idea that the plague was being spread by a hidden conspiracy of poisoners, which were gradually transformed into diabolical sorcerers, or witches. Shortly after Calvin’s arrival, several men were burned, and the Reformer himself literally called for the “extirpation” of the “race” of the witches. Likewise there were witch burnings in the Protestant Swiss Cantons of Zurich, Bern, and Basle. The most surprising case was DENMARK, which had gone through a tumultuous period of civil war and rapid political and religious reforms. For the first time in a Protestant territory the panic turned into a large-scale persecution, with peasants hunting witches in the open fields “like wolves,” in the approving report of Peder Palladius (1503–1560), the leading Danish churchman of his age. Neither Luther, nor Zwingli, nor Calvin denied the existence of witches, and Calvinist theologians in particular, like JOHN KNOX or Lambert Daneau, perceived the witches’ pact with the devil as being diametrically opposed to the believers’ covenant with God.

Resurgence of Persecution

After 1560 the large-scale persecution became the decisive new style of witch-hunting, indicating a shift of paradigm from medieval “leniency” to the “Malleus” point of view. But why such a sudden change of mind? Researchers have pointed to the hardening of the confessional boundaries after the impact of CALVINISM and, simultaneously, post-Tridentine Catholicism, or COUNTER-REFORMATION. Furthermore, the process of state formation or nation building was speeding up in Europe, allowing for a tighter grip on the religious or superstitious beliefs of the subjects, and state formation and confessionalism were intertwined in the process of CONFESSIONALIZATION. Concerning criminal procedure, the introduction of inquisitorial law was emphasized as one of the most important results of the reception of Roman Law. From then on, a public prosecutor would “ex officio” act on behalf of the state, with torture as a legal instrument to obtain information or confessions from the suspects. This was particularly dangerous in conjunction with the idea of a witches' sabbat because suspects were asked to name their accomplices. However, the social environment also changed dramatically, with more frequent mortality crises, which can be related to the climatic deterioration of the Little Ice Age.

It is telling that within the Lutheran camp a sharp controversy on weather and weather-making witches was conducted during the 1560s, involving major Lutheran reformers like JOHANN BRENZ, Johannes Alber, Wilhelm Bidembach, and Weyer. Full-fledged Protestant demonologies started with the hunger crisis of 1570, partly in reaction to widespread witch panics from Geneva to Zurich, partly resulting from the necessity to reshape the old teachings of the "Witches' Hammer" for Protestant purposes. Zwingli's successor HEINRICH BULLINGER (1504–1575) published the first Reformed demonological advice "On Witches" in 1571. Calvin's successor Lambert Daneau (1530–1596) followed one year later (Les Sorciers, 1572), as well as the leading German Calvinist THOMAS ERASTUS (1524–1583) (Disputatio de lamiis seu strigibus, Basel 1572). The first Danish demonology was published in 1575 by Nils Hemmingsen, who inspired the demonological writings of King James VI of SCOTLAND (Demonologie, Edinburgh 1598) during the king's wedding trip to Copenhagen.

Post-Reformation witch-hunting started within the Protestant camp, but from 1580 massive persecutions in the Spanish Netherlands, in Luxembourg, the Franche-Comté, in Lorraine, and in some prince-bishoprics of the Holy Roman Empire (Trier, Mainz, Cologne, Eichstätt, Würzburg, and Bamberg) clearly outstripped the Protestant territories in terms of witch burnings. All of these territories saw many hundreds of executions, and Cologne, Mainz, Lorraine, and the Spanish Netherlands as many as 2,000 in the decades between 1580 and 1630, when witch-hunting climaxed in Europe. Some Protestant authors sought to use these atrocities and branded them as popish. However promising, this perspective proved unsustainable, given that the most important Catholic countries like Spain and Portugal (including their vast colonies), the papal and other Italian States, France, Austria, and Bavaria executed only few witches. On the other hand, some Protestant countries saw massive persecutions. In Pays de Vaud, subject to the reformed Swiss Canton of Berne, no less than 970 individuals were burned for witchcraft between 1581 and 1620, scattered across ninety-one local jurisdictions. It is quite likely that more than 1,200 people were sentenced to death in the Pays de Vaud in more than 2,000 trials. The Bernese government explained in a decree that the peasantry was "driven by poverty, despair...envy, hatred, spirit of revenge."

Influence of Institutions

Recent surveys have narrowed down the overall numbers of suspects legally killed for witchcraft to 50,000 to 60,000 in Europe between 1400 and 1800, certainly not less, or more. This is by far less than previously assumed, but we must bear in mind that this is the tip of an iceberg, with at least twice as many people tried in court, and even more informally threatened with denunciation or slander. Recent research has arrived at the conclusion that not confession, but the strength or weakness of (political, legal, social, and religious) institutions determined the treatment of witchcraft during the crucial decades around 1600. Wealthy and powerful countries with established institutions, like ENGLAND, the NETHERLANDS, or the Palatinate, could suppress popular protest and religious zeal, with the exception of brief periods of anarchy, such as during the English CIVIL WAR. To take an example from the Holy Roman Empire, where presumably half of all European witches were killed, the government of the Electoral Palatinate (about 300,000 inhabitants) held a strong grip on the lower courts, which were threatened with immediate punishment for any irregularities. Because the privy councilors in Heidelberg did not believe in witchcraft, much like the members of the law faculty and the medical faculty at the university, they would not permit witch trials. The Palatine Privy Council strictly forbade the use of torture, and ordered the release of the prisoners if there was not sufficient circumstantial evidence—which there rarely was in witchcraft accusations. The result is striking: no witches were executed in the Palatinate.

It is an interesting question whether the Palatine attitude toward witchcraft had anything to do with Calvinism at all, given that the Calvinist clergy fiercely opposed the government's attitude. Erastus as its most eminent member pointed firmly to Geneva and asked for systematic persecutions. On the other hand, some of the staunchest Calvinist opponents of witch-hunting sought refuge in the Palatinate, such as Herman Witekind (1524–1603) and Anton Prätorius (c. 1560–1614), who both denied the existence of witches. What we can learn from the example of the Palatinate is that a number of convenient stereotypes do not really work. Certainly its subjects suffered from the usual crises, and as vine growers they were vulnerable to climatic hardship. The Electorate, politically almost as fragmented as Electoral Mainz, was surrounded by hotspots of witch-hunting. The government's determined attitude, however, made no concessions to either populace or clergy, and managed to avoid the execution of witches. Territories with weak institutions and difficulties in guaranteeing survival in years of hardship, were certainly more likely to be prone to moral entrepreneurs, or to pressure from the populace. Except for Swiss Calvinist Cantons like Vaud and Grisons, this was the case in middle-sized earldoms where state formation had failed, as for instance the various territories of the Counts of Nassau, the relatives of Maurice of Nassau-Orange (1567–1625), where 400 witches were burned. In a similar position were the related counts of Isenburg-Büdingen, with another 400 victims; the counts of Schaumburg and of Lippe, with about 300 witch burnings each; and the Landgraviate Hessen-Kassel, a larger territory with more elaborate structures, which still saw a surprising 250 victims. Scotland was politically consolidated but economically marginal. As in Central Europe, there had been a rising awareness of witchcraft from the early 1560s and a peak in the 1580s; but twice in the 1590s, again in the late 1620s, and once more in the 1660s Scotland was shaken by waves of frenzied witch persecution, with about 1,350 executed in something like 2,300 trials between 1560 and 1700, in a country of roughly 900,000 inhabitants.

If we look at Lutheran Europe, we can again find that states with rudimentary institutions saw many witch trials. The Duchy of Mecklenburg, a territory of roughly 200,000 inhabitants with fragmented jurisdiction, saw close to 4,000 witch trials between 1560 and 1700, with an estimated 2,000 victims between 1600 and 1670, as many in as in the most affected Catholic principalities. In the neighboring Duchy of Pomerania, another frequently divided territory, there were at least 1,000 trials, and maybe twice as many, with at least 600 victims. Similarly in the twin duchies of Schleswig and Holstein, the former under Danish, the latter under Imperial law, there were at least 600 victims. The persecutions in Denmark flared up in the 1570s and again in 1590, remaining endemic after 1600, apparently adding up to about 1,000 victims. For the territories in Thuringia, fragmented between dozens of Saxon lines and other counts and princes, the estimates come to between 1,000 and 1,500 trials, with at least 500 victims, distributed over dozens of independent territories. There were more than 100 burnings alone under the dukes of Saxe-Coburg, famous for their dynastic connections all over Europe. In curious debates the Lutheran clergy tried to stimulate more severe persecutions, pointing to the Franconian prince-bishops as an example, whereas the lawyers referred to Catholic Bavaria in their attempt to restrain the clerical zeal. The superintendent Johann Matthäus Meyfahrt (1590–1642) probably published the most emotional pamphlet against witch trials ever in 1635.

There are only vague suggestions about the extent of the persecutions for some major Lutheran territories, such as the Electorate of Brandenburg, whose ruler adopted Calvinism in 1613, but left the Lutheran orthodoxy intact. The territory's university at Frankfurt/Oder issued about 269 legal opinions in cases of witchcraft. Consolidated, strong Lutheran territories like Electoral Saxony had, despite its harsh laws, a surprisingly low death toll, probably because of a tight supervision of the lower courts by the central government, very much like in the Lutheran Duchy of Württemberg. Although Saxony and Württemberg were larger and more densely populated than other German territories, the number of victims seems to have remained under 300 in both of these states. If it is correct that 350 witches were killed in Lutheran NORWAY and another twenty-two in ICELAND, this could mean that the persecution was by far more intensive there. The persecution was less severe in SWEDEN, FINLAND, and Estonia, and generally ended by the end of the seventeenth century.

English Events

How closely witch scares were connected to extraordinary situations can be seen from the persecutions of the self-appointed Witch Finder General, Mathew Hopkins (?–1648), who managed to use the turmoil of the English Civil War to launch the greatest ever witch persecution in England, in a situation where apocalyptic and millennial fears and hopes were mushrooming. This son of a Calvinist minister felt disturbed by the prevalence of witches in his region in the winter of 1644–1645, and his concerns were obviously shared by others, as he outlined himself (The Discoverie of Witches, London 1647). The imperfect nature of the surviving records makes any reconstruction difficult, but estimates suggest that at least 250 individuals were tried, and a minimum of 100, but perhaps considerably higher numbers, were executed for witchcraft during these persecutions, which also demonstrate that fantasies of demonic witchcraft were anything but absent from England. There were earlier occasions that had the potential for a large-scale persecution—for instance, the Lancashire trials of 1633–1634, where at least nineteen witches were executed—whereas another sixty were under suspicion, and some jailed, with several dying in prison. The confessions show the fully developed fantasy of a witches' sabbat, reveal ideas about a permanent meeting point in the forest of Pendle, where the witches flew for feasting and dancing, shape-shifting and having sexual intercourse, where they adored the devil, and practiced harmful magic. This persecution, stopped by the Privy Council, brought to light a remarkable divide between Puritan zealots (see PURITANISM) and Anglican moderates (see ANGLICANISM), reminding us of the fact that all major English demonologies were published by Puritan divines (George Gifford, Henry Holland, WILLIAM PERKINS, James Mason, Alexander Roberts, Thomas Cooper, Richard Bernard), whereas those advocating moderate skepticism after the Restoration, like Joseph Glanvill (1636–1680) and Meric Casaubon (1599–1671), were Anglican ministers, inclined to restore unity and order, and more concerned about atheism than witchcraft. It may be premature to draw parallels to the differences between moderate Lutherans and zealous Calvinists in Central Europe, but it seems psychologically likely that those who aspired to a Godly Republic would be more easily tempted to adopt the role of moral entrepreneurs, whether they were Presbyterian divines like James Carmichael or Catholic zealots like Peter Canisius. For both, the devil's pact was an inversion of the covenant with God and, again for both, witch-hunting served as an instrument to raise attention for their cause.

Because of the diversity of development, it is impossible to say that witch trials stopped earlier in Protestant countries. Certainly in England and the Netherlands, however, the general rejection of witch beliefs as a political issue gained momentum during the second half of the seventeenth century and infested the culture of enlightenment all over Europe. Protestant debates on witchcraft, launched by radical denials in England (John Wagstaffe, The Question of Witchcraft Debated, London 1669), the Netherlands (Balthasar Bekker, De Betoverde Weereld, Amsterdam 1691), and Northern Germany (CHRISTIAN THOMASIIUS, De crimine magiae, Halle 1701) effectively terminated witch trials in these areas, and served to curb high-flying churchmen. When witch burnings kept on in Southern Germany, Austria, and even Northern Italy, Protestants consoled themselves that all of these countries were Catholic, and therefore backward by definition. However, these stereotypes, or certainties, were fragile, given that the last legal killings of witches took place in Calvinist Swiss Cantons like the Grison and Glarus. As late as 1782 the scandalous trial of Glarus against the maidservant Anna Göldi (1734–1782) took place. Although her indictment was veneficium, this was clearly a witch trial, emphasizing the devil's pact and harmful magic against her employer's children, who served as accusers. Her execution took place on June 18, 1782, and triggered a storm of protest. Protestant intellectuals were horrified. The enlightened Lutheran historian August Ludwig Schlözer (1735–1809) coined the term judicial murder (Justizmord) on this occasion (Abermaliger Justizmord in der Schweiz, in Stats-Anzeigen, Bd. 2 [1783]: 273–277).

Modern Witchcraze

Disbelief in witchcraft became a marker of the European civilization. Modern skepticism can be traced back to early modern attempts to build on the medieval perception that witchcraft was illusionary. Applied to her colonies in America, AUSTRALIA, Asia, and AFRICA, this European attitude usually caused discontent among indigenous peoples because it seemed as if the colonial authorities were aiming at protecting the evildoers. Throughout the nineteenth century, illegal witch killings were conducted in RUSSIA, and among indigenous peoples in MEXICO and the UNITED STATES. Throughout the twentieth century, before and after decolonization, violent anti-witchcraft movements swept through sub-Saharan Africa, with about 10,000 victims in Tanzania alone. Only recently the “modernity of witchcraft” has been emphasized—the adaptive capacities of witch beliefs to the challenges of a globalized world. Some Protestant sects capitalize on the tremendous fears of witchcraft, as for instance the Zionist Christian Church in SOUTH AFRICA. With witchcraft and related purification rites moved to the center of its activities, “African” churches are gaining ground in the competition with traditional main currents of Protestantism, becoming the fastest growing churches in the world. Witches and witch-hunts are no closed chapter in history, and the witch craze will continue to haunt us in the future.

References and Further Reading

- Bengt, Ankarloo, and Stuart Clark, eds. The Athlone History of Witchcraft and Magic in Europe. 6 vols. London: The Athlone Press, 1999–2002.
- Behringer, Wolfgang. Witches and Witch-Hunts. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 2003.
- Geschiere, Peter. The Modernity of Witchcraft. Politics and the Occult in Postcolonial Africa. Charlottesville: Virginia University Press, 1997.
- Golden, Richard M., ed. Encyclopaedia of Witchcraft. The Western Tradition. 4 vols. Austin, TX: ABC-Clio, 2004.
- Hansen, Joseph, ed. Quellen und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Hexenwahns [Bonn 1901]. Reprint Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1963.
- Haustein, Jörg. Luthers Stellung zum Zauber- und Hexenwesen. Stuttgart, Germany: Kohlhammer Verlag, 1990.
- Ralushai, Victor, et al. “Report of the Commission of Inquiry into Witchcraft, Violence and Ritual Murders in the Northern Province of the Republic of South Africa.” Pietersburg, South Africa: Unpublished official report, 1996.
- Thomas, Keith. Religion and the Decline of Magic. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1971.
- Walker, Deward E., and David Carrasco, eds. Witchcraft and Sorcery of the American Native Peoples. Moscow, ID: University of ID Press, 1989.
- Watson, C.W., and Roy Ellen, eds. Understanding Witchcraft and Sorcery in Southeast Asia. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1993.

WOLFGANG BEHRINGER

WITHERSPOON, JOHN (1723–1794)

Scotch-American presbyterian theologian. John Witherspoon was a notable Presbyterian leader in both Scotland and the United States during the eighteenth century, but he was even more important for the history of Protestantism as an intellectual mediator—first, between ENLIGHTENMENT and Protestant forms of thought, and second, between evangelical Protestant theology and revolutionary whig politics. The complexity of Witherspoon’s eventful life is suggested by the fact that he began his public career as an embattled spokesman for the marginalized “little people” of patronage-ridden Scotland, but by his death on November 15, 1794 he had become an honored founding father of the new United States of America.

Personal History

Witherspoon was born in Gifford, Scotland, a few days before February 10, 1723, the date his baptism was recorded. His father, who was the parish minister, joined his mother Anne (Walker) in training the young Witherspoon in general Christian piety as well as the specific tenets of the CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. Witherspoon was an eager learner and received an M.A. from the University of Edinburgh when he was only sixteen years old. After further theological study, he was licensed for the ministry in 1743, and in January 1745 began service as the Church of Scotland minister in Beith, Ayrshire. By the time he moved in June 1757 to the larger, more prosperous Laigh Kirk in Paisley, Witherspoon had begun to make a mark in Scottish public life as a champion of the anti-patronage faction in the Church of Scotland. Witherspoon spoke, against those who adjusted Kirk’s historic Calvinism to upper-class social norms and the more secular learning of the Scottish ENLIGHTENMENT, for a “popular party” that sought veto power for local congregations when they disliked the minister selected for them by a hereditary patron. Witherspoon’s best-known work on behalf of the popular party was a satire entitled Ecclesiastical Characteristics, which ridiculed the moderates for preferring polite respectability to Scotland’s traditional people’s Calvinism. Witherspoon’s other noteworthy polemics included an attack on the stage, a fast-day sermon linking religious uprightness and national prosperity, and an exhortation assaulting clerical meddling in public affairs.

While he was poking fun at the moderates, Witherspoon was also publishing constructive theological works on the relationship between justification and holy living (1756) and on regeneration (1764). Printed sermons also brought him wider attention at home, and soon abroad. A 1753 contribution to The Scots Magazine, in which he defended the reliability of physical and moral perceptions, was the first of his writings to be read in America. In this article, Witherspoon's defense of the common perceptions of ordinary people was close enough to arguments later advanced by Thomas Reid (1710–1796) and other philosophers of “SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM” to at least partially justify Witherspoon's claim to have anticipated the major principles of their work.

When the trustees of the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University) were faced with a vacancy as president in 1766, they asked Witherspoon to fill the position. Their hope was that he might revive the fortunes of the college, but also help reunite America's Old Light and New Light Presbyterians, who had divided as a result of the colonial Great Awakening. Almost as soon as he arrived in America in 1768, Witherspoon was an immediate success as educator, churchman, politician, and thinker. At the college he reorganized instruction around lectures and placed fresh emphasis on public speaking. Witherspoon added to a rapidly expanding reputation through the fundraising tours he made to New York, Philadelphia, Virginia, and New England. Soon Princeton was attracting nearly as many students as Yale; in the five years before 1776, it produced more graduates (25 per year) than ever before in its history. The destruction of the CIVIL WAR, with Princeton itself a battle site, delivered a great setback to the college's fortunes, but Witherspoon's reputation guaranteed its survival through desperate days.

As the trustees had hoped, Witherspoon also became a leading figure in the expansion and then reorganization of the PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. Under Witherspoon's tenure, the number of Princeton students entering the Presbyterian ministry did decline, but Witherspoon still personally trained about one-third of the ministers, who in 1789 created a new general assembly to organize Presbyterian efforts in the new country. In addition, Witherspoon's moderate evangelical theology and his reputation as a patriot won approval from New Lights and Old Lights alike. Witherspoon served on several of the committees that prepared the way for a national general assembly. When that general assembly met for the first time in 1789, he drafted several of the constituting documents and he was selected to preach the opening sermon.

Politics and Religion

For broader Protestant purposes, Witherspoon's leadership in joining Christian interests to the republican foundations of American politics was a major achievement. The Scottish minister who had spoken out against arbitrary ecclesiastical power in his native country soon became a spokesperson against arbitrary political power in his adopted land. James Madison's father, in fact, sent his son to study at Princeton because he was so impressed with Witherspoon's defense of liberty. When, in response to the perception of British tyrannical acts, New Jersey began to organize in defense of its freedoms, Witherspoon was a leader in that process, too. In 1774 he became a member of his local county's Committee of Corre-spondence, and on June 22, 1776, he was selected as a New Jersey delegate to the Continental Congress. Shortly after arriving in Philadelphia to take that position, he voted in favor of independence and so became the only clergyman to sign the Declaration. Witherspoon remained a representative in Congress for most of the rest of the war, during which time he served on over one hundred committees. On behalf of the Congress he wrote pamphlets attacking the inflationary use of paper money and also penned recantations for two Loyalist printers whom the Congress wanted to silence. After the war he was elected to the New Jersey legislature in 1783 and 1789, and in 1787 was a member of the New Jersey convention that approved the Constitution.

Before military conflict began with the British, Witherspoon had rallied citizens of New Jersey to the patriot cause through newspaper essays. After the start of the war, he preached a memorable sermon on May 17, 1776, which was entitled “The Dominion of Providence over the Passions of Men.” This sermon praised God for turning British acts of tyranny into good for the colonies; its published version also included a powerful appeal to Witherspoon’s fellow immigrants from Scotland to join the patriot cause. With such efforts, Witherspoon was among the few orthodox or evangelical Christians of the 1770s to emerge as leaders in the patriot movement. (The UNITARIANISM of THOMAS JEFFERSON [1743–1826] and John Adams [1734–1826], or the extreme reticence about expressing personal religious opinions characteristic of George Washington [1732–1799] and JAMES MADISON [1749–1812], were far more common among the major founders.) Yet in the wake of Witherspoon’s efforts, many leaders in later generations would continue his work of linking traditional Christianity to the republican verities of the American founding.

Enlightenment and Theology

For the history of theology, Witherspoon’s importance lay in his reorientation of intellectual activity at Princeton away from the pietistic idealism associated with earlier colonial revivalism toward the commonsense and scientific principles of the Scottish Enlightenment. One of Witherspoon’s first actions as president of Princeton was to banish what he called the “immaterialism” of Irish Bishop George Berkeley (1685–1753) along with the theocentric ethics of American minister JONATHAN EDWARDS (1703–1758), both of whose books were being read at Princeton before he arrived. For his own lectures on moral philosophy and divinity, Witherspoon drew heavily on the ideas of his former moderate opponents in Scotland, especially the moral philosophy of Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), who made the natural moral sense the keystone of his ethics.

As Witherspoon expounded it, the philosophy of common sense became the foundation for useful knowledge of many kinds. Common sense defended the reality of the physical world and so allowed a wholehearted commitment to natural philosophy (i.e., science). It defined human relationships after the model of the physical sciences and so demonstrated the rationality of politics. It drew an analogy between external and internal sensations and so facilitated a science of morals. It pictured theology as dependent upon reason and so paved the way for an apologetic of scientific respectability.

Where the leading Calvinists in colonial America had based true virtue on the workings of divine grace, Witherspoon (at least after arriving in the New World) was able to find a ground for virtuous behavior in the naturally given moral capacities (the “common moral sense”) of all humanity. Witherspoon’s lectures on divinity assured students that reason contained no inherent criticism of revelation, and that the positive teachings of scripture reflected both sound reason and “the state of human nature.” In his formal lectures Witherspoon seemed as interested in demonstrating the reasonableness of Christianity as in exploring the standard themes of Calvinistic theology.

By providing Princeton with a philosophical basis derived from Scottish moral philosophy and by replacing a New England tradition strongly under the influence of Jonathan Edwards, Witherspoon brought Presbyterians into the mainstream of eighteenth-century British-American theology. From the newer perspective, Witherspoon could demonstrate through reason and science the truthfulness of revelation instead of presupposing revelation as the foundation for science and reason. Witherspoon’s new moral philosophy lacked the harmony of theology, ethics, and epistemology that Edwards had provided, but by compensation Witherspoon avoided the taint of immaterialism carried by Edwards’s intense theocentrism. The fact that Witherspoon championed both divinity and science as compatible forms of truth, and that he was a pious subscriber to the WESTMINSTER CONFESSIO of faith, testified to his links with historic Calvinism. Yet beneath a common commitment to broadly Calvinistic theology, a significant move was occurring from idealism, metaphysics, and conversion to realism, ethics, and morality.

Witherspoon was a key figure in later Presbyterian theological history. His immediate successor at Princeton, Samuel Stanhope Smith (1751–1819; president 1795–1812), carried Enlightenment commitments even further in the direction of a reasonable Christianity. However, Witherspoon had other students, like the influential Philadelphia minister, Ashbel Green (1762–1848), who construed Witherspoon’s influence in more traditional terms. When a faction under Green’s leadership ousted Smith from the College of New Jersey and founded Princeton Theological Seminary (both in 1812), that faction made more of Witherspoon’s Calvinism than of his commonsense rationality. Witherspoon’s combination of commitments to the eighteenth-century Enlightenment and to historic Calvinist orthodoxy continued to shape—sometimes confusedly—American Presbyterian theology for more than a century.

Witherspoon was a complex figure. In the Scottish part of his career his piety tended to be apolitical, and his polemical interests made him an opponent of Francis Hutcheson and the era’s new moral philosophy. By contrast, in America he became an eager supporter of a political revolution; in his labors as college teacher and publishing minister he also borrowed liberally from Hutcheson in building his own version of common-sense ethics. The consistency in this career was Witherspoon’s resistance to power (whether the moderate direction of the Scottish church or Parliament’s designs for the American colonies). Witherspoon’s own religious convictions—sincere Calvinism adjusted to his era’s new forms of ethical reasoning—also remained relatively stable throughout his career, even if those convictions played out somewhat differently in America than they had in Scotland. As the only clergyman among the American founding fathers, and as a leader in education, church, and theology, Witherspoon was one of the key bridging figures in a rapidly changing age.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Miller, Thomas, ed. The Selected Writings of John Witherspoon. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990.

Scott, Jack, ed. An Annotated Edition of Lectures on Moral Philosophy by John Witherspoon. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1982.

The Works of the Rev. John Witherspoon. Philadelphia: William W. Woodward, 1802.

Secondary Sources:

Collins, Varnum Lansing Collins. President Witherspoon: A Biography. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1925.

Landsman, Ned C. "Witherspoon and the Problem of Provincial Identity in Scottish Evangelical Culture." In Scotland and America in the Age of Enlightenment. Edited by Richard B. Sher and Jeffrey R. Smitten. Edinburgh: University of Edinburgh Press, 1990.

Noll, Mark A. Princeton and the Republic, 1768–1822. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1989.

MARK A. NOLL

WOLFF, CHRISTIAN (1679–1754)

German theologian. Wolff was born in Breslau on January 24, 1679 and died April 9, 1754 in Halle. One of the most influential German philosophers of the eighteenth century, his literary output was immense, with extensive series of books, covering the entire range of philosophical topics in addition to the natural sciences, in both Latin and German.

Wolff studied THEOLOGY, mathematics, and philosophy in Jena beginning in 1699. With the help of GOTTFRIED WILHELM LEIBNIZ he secured a position at HALLE, then a stronghold of PIETISM, teaching first mathematics and then philosophy. Wolff was a moderate rationalist. This means that, although remaining within the bounds of theological ORTHODOXY as he perceived it, he valued the use of reason as a means of defending and elucidating truths that he believed to be amenable to rational inquiry. Although early in his career he held that revelation does not include truths that human reason can discover, eventually he adopted the strategy of separating religious truths into two classes: revealed truths that can be neither discovered nor comprehended by human reason (in his terminology, “pure” revealed truths) and revealed truths that can be discovered and comprehended by reason (“mixed” truths, the subject of natural theology). An example of the first sort is the Trinity. Wolff did not doubt that this DOCTRINE is revealed in the BIBLE; however, the philosopher cannot go beyond acknowledging it as revealed because the doctrine transcends reason’s powers. The second sort of revealed truths have to do with God as creator and preserver and with our moral duties toward God.

This distinction yielded several results. First, Wolff believed firmly in the agreement of reason and revelation. As noted, this did not mean that all revealed truths could be comprehended by reason. In the case of pure revealed truths human reason must, he held, submit to revelation. Nonetheless, although revelation might transcend reason, it would never contradict reason. Pure revealed truths were not, he argued, irrational. Second, this distinction meant that the methods of philosophy and natural theology on the one hand were quite different from those of revealed theology on the other. Wolff was thus careful to establish a firm demarcation between philosophy and revealed theology.

Wolff’s philosophical intent was quite conservative. He had no intention of subverting orthodox theology and in fact sought, where appropriate, to support it philosophically. Certainly many of his students believed his was the best philosophical defense of the Christian faith available. However, his conviction that reason and revelation do not conflict was inevitably taken to mean that human reason functions as the standard by which doctrines are evaluated. Further, his attempt to demarcate philosophy from theology tended to make philosophy an autonomous discipline, loosed from orthodox theological moorings. The possibility of academic philosophy free of ecclesiastical doctrine was disconcerting to many in his day.

Pietist Opposition

Wolff ran afoul of certain Pietist theologians, notably AUGUST HERMANN FRANKE (1663–1627) and Joachim Lange (1670–1744), while at Halle. There were several points of dispute. For one, Wolff understood philosophy to encompass the entire range of essences, that is, of entities insofar as they are logically possible. The Pietists felt that this made philosophy into a more comprehensive and hence more significant science than theology. They also objected to his elevating God's understanding over God's will (because the range of possible being known by God is more extensive than the range of actual being created by God). Representing God primarily as an understanding mind seemed to suggest too great a similarity between God and the human mind. They were further bothered by the fact that God's omnipotence seemed compromised, given that God's will cannot, in Wolff's view, change eternal truths and the essences of things. They were also disturbed by his view of human good as being centered in happiness instead of in the moral familiar and evangelical framework of SIN and redemption.

Controversy with the Pietist theologians at Halle broke out in earnest in 1719 on the appearance of the German version of his book on metaphysics. Students were warned against attending his lectures and were used as informants to report on his lectures. The situation came to a head in 1721 when Wolff gave a lecture on Chinese ethics. In it he asserted the agreement between the wisdom of the Chinese and his own philosophy, thus arguing for a natural and universal basis of human ETHICS and implicitly denying that ethics rests on revelation. The Pietists went on the offensive and, after a considerable amount of political maneuvering, both inside and outside the university, they persuaded the king, Friedrich Wilhelm I, in 1723 to banish Wolff on pain of death.

Wolff taught at Marburg until 1740. Here he composed a series of philosophical works in Latin parallel to his German works. As a result of his experiences in Halle he became something of a cause célèbre and he received numerous invitations to accept teaching positions. Meanwhile the controversy in Halle sparked a debate throughout the German universities about the merits and dangers of Wolff's philosophy. After some initial setbacks Wolff's followers began to win the war of public opinion by presenting Wolff's philosophy not only as orthodox but as a valuable apologetic tool. National pride also entered into the issue because in 1733 Wolff was made a member of the French Academy, the first German since Leibniz to be so honored. At length, after more political maneuvering and a public relations campaign to convince the king that Wolff's philosophy was an important defense against atheism, Wolff was recalled to Halle, and study of his philosophy was made virtually mandatory. In 1745 he was made a prince of the Holy Roman Empire.

Assessment

Wolff is not considered to have been a first-rate philosopher on the order of Leibniz or IMMANUEL KANT. His place in history is secured by two contributions. First, he created a vocabulary of German philosophical terms and thus contributed to the development of German philosophy. Second, he conveyed to the German academic world the importance of methodological rigor in philosophy. Consequently his importance lies more in his influence than in his ideas. As the most influential German philosopher in the period between Leibniz and Kant, Wolff's moderate rationalism issued a challenge to the assumptions and methods of orthodox theology while providing a rigorous but also conservative alternative to the destructive brand of rationalism found in FRANCE and ENGLAND.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wolff, Christian. Gesammelte Werke. Edited by J.École, et al. Hildesheim, Germany: Georg Olms Verlag. 1962-.

Secondary Sources:

Casula, Mario. "Die Theologia Naturalis von Christian Wolff: Vernunft und Offenbarung." In Christian Wolff: 1679–1754. Interpretationen zu seiner Philosophie und deren Wirkung. Edited by Werner Schneiders. Studien zum achtzehnten Jahrhundert, vol. 4, 129–138. Hamburg, Germany: Felix Meiner Verlag, 1983.

Ching, Julia, and Willard G.Oxtoby. Moral Enlightenment: Leibniz and Wolff on China. Monumenta Serica monograph series, no. 26. Nettetal, Germany: Steyler, 1992.

Gawlick, Günter. "Christian Wolff und der Deismus." In Christian Wolff: 1679–1754. Interpretationen zu seiner Philosophie und deren Wirkung. Edited by Werner Schneiders. Studien zum achtzehnten Jahrhundert, vol. 4, 139–147. Hamburg, Germany: Felix Meiner Verlag, 1983.

Hinrichs, Carl. Preußentum und Pietismus: Der Pietismus in Brandenburg-Preußen als religiös-soziale Reformbewegung. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1971.

SAMUEL M.POWELL

WOLLASTON, WILLIAM (1660–1724)

English deist. Wollaston was born on March 26, 1660, at Coton-Clanford, Staffordshire, England. He was educated at Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge, where he took an M.A. in 1681, after which he became an Anglican priest. He married into a London merchant family and began to write on moral philosophy. By far his most significant work was The Religion of Nature Delineated (1722), in which he considered the relationship between morality and nature. Wollaston stated that his “fundamental maxim” was “that whoever acts as if things were so, or not so, doth by his acts declare, that they are so, or not so; as plainly as he could by words, and with more reality.” Moral goodness consists in acting in a natural way, whereas immorality is out of sync with NATURAL LAW. To Wollaston, “Truth is but a conformity to nature...” His book was widely read in Britain and the American colonies, and reflects a broader trend in eighteenth-century ANGLICANISM toward theorizing a simpler, more moralistic Christianity that did not rely on special revelation.

Like JOHN TILLOTSON, Wollaston did not deny biblical revelation but hoped that Christians could turn toward a reasonable moralism that would defuse many of the previous century’s church conflicts. Some have labeled Wollaston a deist, and although his work may seem to have deistic implications, he did not directly question any orthodox Christian precepts, nor did his failure to appeal to divine revelation imply a denial of such (see DEISM). The Religion of Nature Delineated was published in 1724, and Wollaston died on October 24 the same year. He was buried at Great Finborough, Suffolk, England.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wollaston, William. The Religion of Nature Delineated. London: B.Lintot, 1724.

Secondary Source:

Feinberg, Joel. “Wollaston and his Critics.” Journal of the History of Ideas 38 (1977):345–352.

THOMAS S.KIDD

WOMANIST THEOLOGY

Womanist theology articulates the reality of living in relationship with divinity and humanity as a woman and as a person of color. In broad terms, womanist theology affirms the full personhood and divine image of all humanity and combats oppression on multiple fronts in response to the presence and activity of God in the cosmos. Black LIBERATION THEOLOGY and FEMINIST THEOLOGY provide both conversation partners and earlier, formative space for womanist theology. The combination of the overwhelming majority of male black liberation theologians and predominately white feminist theologians of the 1960s and 1970s failed to consistently and coherently address the spiritual and social reality of black women in the continental UNITED STATES. Emerging in the 1980s, womanist theology is in part a response to sexism in black liberation theology and racism in the feminist movement. Womanist theologians affirm that women of color have a unique perspective of and on human experience and divine matters, which cannot be replicated and without which human consideration of the divine mystery is incomplete and inadequate. Womanist theology is particularly communal, with the primary locus the black church in North America; however, the global church also functions as a site of womanist theology. Womanist theologians are ordained pastors, preachers, and lay church leaders and members, Protestant and Catholic, as well as scholars and community activists. Womanist theologians are concerned with the health and wholeness—spiritual, social, economic, educational, and ecological—of all people of color.

“Proto-Womanism”

Religious and intellectual work of women of color negotiating the intersection of GENDER and ETHNICITY within the context of the divine-human encounter born out of the historic marginalization of women of color in history and society did not begin with the 1980s. Women of color have been reflecting on their spiritual and social circumstances in the world, in Christendom, and in the North American context before they gained regular access to the tools of literacy and eventual admission to institutions of higher education. The black church has been a sustaining shelter for women of African descent since their arrival, by whatever means, on this continent. Even as black women in the Americas and CARIBBEAN sought shelter in the church from inhumane indignities visited upon them in the slave-holding, allegedly reconstructed and Jim Crow South and the less-than-free North with its lack of occupational educational opportunities for black women, they worshipped in a context that adopted, without question in most circumstances, the gender roles of their oppressors and exploiters. Yet African-American women did not reject the religious component of their historical identity. Prior to the birth of the contemporary womanist movement, black women in America insisted on being recognized as the sole legitimate arbitrators of their knowledge and experiences. Nineteenth-century writers, speakers, and thinkers such as Maria Stewart, Anna Julia Cooper, and Ida B. Wells-Barnett, and many others, advocated forcefully for the rights and responsibility of black women to form and articulate their identity or experiences without being forced to choose between being a woman and being of African descent.

Womanist/Womanism

The term “womanist” was initially introduced in a 1980 essay “Coming Apart” by Alice Walker, who coined the term in response to the racism, classism, and elitism she found in the feminist movement. Her initial proposition was that womanism was an overarching category that included feminism, which she equated with white women. For Walker, womanists were “pro-woman,” which meant that womanist discourse was intentionally antiracist, anticlassist, antielitist, antiheterosexist, and antidiscriminatory in every particularity. Walker’s subsequent expansion on the definition in In Search of Our Mother’s Gardens (1983) is perhaps the most widely cited definition of womanism. This definition has four parts:

1. A womanist is a feminist of color who is responsible and mature, “sassy” and “audacious.”
2. A womanist loves women and men, irrespective of her or their sexual orientation, but has a special love for women’s culture.
3. A womanist is a lover of music, dance, the Spirit, food, all things round including the moon, struggle, the entire community, and herself.
4. “Womanist is to feminist as purple is to lavender” (Walker 1983:xi).

Womanist thought in general is a broad umbrella under which womanist theology can be understood. Related disciplines include womanist discourses in LITERATURE and ETHICS that can be, but are not always, intentional theological reflections. Katie Geneva Cannon was the first scholar to articulate a theology that was specifically womanist. Her 1985 essay “The Emergence of Black Feminist Consciousness” was a contribution to an anthology on feminist interpretation of the BIBLE. In the section on “Womanist Theology,” Cannon argues that womanist theology is a interpretive practice that uses the reading, writing, and reflecting of black women to engage the systemic effects of white supremacy and sexism that afflict black women in the market, institutional church, academy, and home.

The Union Theological Seminary in New York nurtured the emergence of the earliest published voices in womanist theology. Katie Cannon, Kelly D. Brown, Jacqueline Grant, and Delores Williams articulated womanist theological responses to the liberation theology of JAMES HAL CONE.

Womanist Theology and Black Liberation Theology

As a community-specific response to social, ethical, and moral dimensions of racism, particularly in the Americas, AFRICA, and the Caribbean, womanist theology formally challenged black liberation theologians to account for the inherent paradox in proclaiming divinely mandated liberation to oppressed peoples while at the same time insisting that women were subordinate to men in the home, church, and CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. Black women in the church, academy, and political movements identified with the attempts of black theologians to articulate shared understandings of blackness, as well as different and overlapping experiences of class and CULTURE within the construct of blackness. However, they found that the androcentrism of those religious leaders in the academy and the church prevented them from accurately analyzing the oppressive experiences of the entire African-American community and therefore developing inadequate and inappropriate responses to their shared experiences of oppression. Both women and men in the black church and blacks in the academy wrestled with the legacy of slave-holding Christianity as the space in which Africans in the Americas became Christian themselves and the implications for the differing construction of Christian identity that necessarily followed.

The marginalization of women in the black church was identified as a challenge to the long-standing proclamations of liberation issued from the majority of African-American congregations from slavery forward. The contradiction inherent in the vehement insistence that black men be recognized as full members of the human race while black women were required to mediate their experiences with the divine through male hierarchical leadership led some black women to the egalitarian promise of the women's rights movement.

Womanist Theology and Feminist Theology

The feminist movement in North America was rooted in the abolitionist and women's suffrage movements. A white affluent leadership characterized both of these movements; eventually the movements separated, with suffragists abandoning a platform that would have enfranchised black women and men along with white women. African-American women experienced feminist theology as class-privileged and overwhelm-ingly white, even as they identified with feminist discourses that battled the injustice and immorality of sexism in the Western world from the nineteenth century onward. Early womanist theologians critiqued feminist theologians for not addressing the history of race relations between black and white women. Later womanist theologians would identify the vocabulary, class, theoretical practices, and practical objectives that differed between black and white feminists and between white feminists and black womanists.

Early African-American feminists disenchanted with the white supremacist ideologies perpetuated by the feminist movement began to question the methodologies as well as the motivations of the movement. One result was that womanists inherited a wariness of using the resources of the establishment and strategies conceived in and valued by dominant culture to effect any real change in the status quo. This led to one clear point of demarcation from the feminist movement in general and feminist theology in particular—a deep valuation of ancestral, nonacademic oral discourses, knowledge, and coping skills. Another point of departure is the relationship that womanist theologians have with the institutional church; they are much more likely to critique the church from inside rather than from without.

Methodologies

There is no singular womanist theological creed, canon, or communal practice. Womanist theological thought varies as widely as do the contexts in which women of color live, work, and worship. Some generalities can however, be observed:

1. Womanist theological approaches are regularly multidimensional; they can be interdisciplinary, collaborative, and/or multicontextual.
2. They emphasize and prioritize women's experience in general and the social location of the reader/interpreter in particular.
3. A (if not the) goal of womanist theological discourse is the eradication of all forms of human oppression.
4. The fruit of womanist theological reflection must be accessible to the wider, nonspecialist, worshipping community.

In LATIN AMERICA, muherista theology corresponds to womanist theology on the North American and African continents, while feminista theology corresponds to North American feminist theology. However, each theology is also a unique response to the unique cultural context from which it emerges. Caribbean and African womanism is in active dialogue with the postcolonial legacy of missionary Christianity and empire building.

Ongoing Conversations

One topic of conversation among womanist theologians is whether or not embracing sexual plurality is a prerequisite for womanist identity. Given that the option of loving sexually or nonsexually either women or men was a key component of the definition and affirmation of womanism, and the fact that sexual diversity has been a pillar of the feminist movement embraced by many womanists, some thinkers question the insistence in many black churches that heterosexuality is the only intimate relational norm, while others celebrate the African-American communal value of monogamous heterosexual MARRIAGE. Another concern is the economic disparity among women of color in the world. Many womanist theologians are published, are tenured, and have adequate health insurance and child care, whereas the vast majority of women of color throughout the world lack the adequate nutrition, clean drinking water, basic health care, and the basic tools of literacy. There is some concern that the voices that are most frequently heard in womanist theology are not representational of the larger concerns of women of color in the so-called “third world” (better, “two-thirds world”), that those who have access to print, electronic, and digital media are careful to speak with and not for women whose voices have not been heard.

Other contemporary womanist theological concerns include WORSHIP (LITURGY, PREACHING, translation, interpretation and application of biblical texts); EDUCATION (curriculum formation, hiring and tenuregranting processes, canon formation); health and welfare of all people, particularly the destitute; economic inequity; ECOLOGY (stewardship of the environment and natural resources); POLITICS (the domestic and international policies of the United States, globalization, the digital divide, CAPITAL PUNISHMENT); and diversity (cultural, religious, sexual). Changing the world is a womanist agenda.

While Alice Walker’s early definitions of the term “womanist” named all black feminists as womanists, not all black women self-identify as womanists; some, such as bell hooks and Musa Dube, preferentially identify themselves as feminists. Some identify as neither. Additionally, there are black men who center the experience of black women in their work (e.g., Randall Bailey and Peter Paris), as well as white women who privilege the readings of women of color in their work (e.g., Alice Ogden Bellis). The question of whether the term “womanist theologian” discloses personal identity or political affiliation has yet to be answered.

Katie Cannon’s original womanist theology construct wrestled with the role and implication of the Bible in the life of black women. Her current work interrogates the intersection of THEOLOGY and ethics. Other contemporary scholars bringing womanist theological concerns to bear on the scriptures from the vantage of biblical studies include Cheryl Anderson, Clarice J. Martin, Madeline McClenney-Sadler, and Renita Weems. Scholars whose ongoing work claims the space of theology and ethics as the site of womanist reflection include Cheryl Townsend Gilkes and Cheryl Kirk-Duggan. Other celebrated contemporary womanist theologians include Karen Baker-Fletcher, M. Shawn Copeland, Toinette Eugene, and Diana Hayes.

Womanist theologians negotiate the tension inherent in articulating shared identity markers with white women and men of color by affirming arenas of overlapping identity while nuancing difference. Although black male sexism and white female racism and classism delineate an obvious perimeter of womanist discourse, women of color have reflected on their whole identities in relationship with men and other women, children, and adults, within and across culture, social and economic lines for as long as those distinctions have been applied. Womanist theology is one vehicle by which black women engage in “God talk” for themselves and on behalf of others.

See also African Theology; Biblical Interpretation; Education, Theology, United States; Higher Criticism; Homosexuality; Human Rights; Post-Colonialism; Prayer; Preaching; Sexuality; Theology, Twentieth Century; Theology, Twentieth Century, Global; Theology, Twentieth Century, North American; Women; Women Clergy

References and Further Reading

- Brown, K.D. "God Is as Christ Does: Toward A Womanist Theology." Journal of Religious Thought 46 (1989):7–16.
- Cannon, Katie G. "The Emergence of Black Feminist Consciousness." In Feminist Interpretation of the Bible. Edited by Letty M. Russell. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1985.
- Cone, James, and Gayraud Wilmore, eds. Black Theology: A Documentary History Volume II 1980–1992. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1993.
- Grant, J. "White Women's Christ and Black Women's Jesus: Feminist Christology and Womanist Response." Harvard Divinity Bulletin 21 no. 1 (1989):17.
- Miller-McLemore, Bonnie J., and Brita L. Gill-Austern. Feminist And Womanist Pastoral Theology. Nashville, TN: Abingdon Press, 1999.
- Mitchem, Stephanie Y. Introducing Womanist Theology. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2002.
- Sanders, Cheryl J., ed. Living the Intersection: Womanism and Afrocentrism in Theology. Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1995.
- Townes, Emilie M., ed. Embracing The Spirit: Womanist Perspectives On Hope, Salvation, and Transformation. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1997.
- Walker, Alice. "Coming Apart." In Take Back the Night. Edited by Laura Lederer. New York: Morrow, 1980.
- . 1983. In Search of Our Mother's Gardens: Womanist Prose. San Diego, CA: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich.
- Williams, D.S. Sisters In The Wilderness: The Challenge Of Womanist God-Talk. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993.

WILDA C.M.GAFNEY

WOMEN, UNITED STATES

Throughout almost four centuries of the Protestant experience in the UNITED STATES, women have pushed the boundaries to bring leadership to the churches that had been restricted to men. Women have shaped their own religious space as they moved from the constricted roles allotted them in the home to their rightful lay and clergy positions in the public spheres of religion. The evolution of women's journey in American Protestantism is revealed through an analysis of the ways they claimed their due places and voices alongside men from colonial times to the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Constriction and Liberation: Colonial and Revolutionary Beginnings

The prescriptions for white women in Protestantism throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were basically the same from New England to the middle and southern colonies. Women were given the divinely assigned social role within the home to be wives and mothers. The home was to be a little church or a little seminary in which the husband held primary authority and the wife shared with him the supervision of children, servants, and slaves. She was the primary religious educator of her husband and children, particularly to train the men of the family to be virtuous decision makers and leaders in the public sphere. It was believed that women were given qualities, set forth in scriptures by God, to especially fit them for this function: they were nurturing, sensitive, and subordinate by nature, leading them to be obedient wives, indulgent mothers, and kind and charitable mistresses to the poor and needy.

During the era of the American Revolution, this God-given role assigned to white women became defined as "republican motherhood." Training men in the family in religious and ethical precepts to be worthy public leaders became a political and patriotic function, an increasingly exalted role for women. It gave women a public purpose within the home, al-though they were still meant to be subordinate and submissive to CLERGY and lay male authorities both in the church and household.

From the early colonial days of the mid-seventeenth century, women began to quietly stretch the boundaries of this constricted role. They formed small groups "for women only" that met in their homes to study the BIBLE and raise money for benevolent causes in their churches and towns. By the First Great Awakening of the early eighteenth century, they were even supplying funds for foreign MISSIONS. These women became "Daughters of Liberty" during the American Revolution, gathering to make clothing and medical supplies for patriot soldiers. Besides the good these communities of women did for others, they created social outlets for themselves and became the first women's support groups.

From the initial colonial settlements, a liberating stream of women in Protestantism ran alongside this mainstream-constricting tradition. Some women read Scripture, such as Galatians 3:28, Titus 2:3–4, and Acts 2:17–18, gaining courage to speak in their own voices in church and society. The consequences were tragic for both ANNE HUTCHINSON and Mary Dyer, two bold New England Protestant women. Hutchinson was banned by church and civil authorities from the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1630 because she claimed the AUTHORITY of the Holy Spirit to interpret scripture and teach men and women together in her home. Dyer was deported and later brought back to be hung in the Boston Commons because she sought to convert others to the Quaker faith (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF). However, they began a tradition of women who, over almost four centuries, have been confident in their God-given gifts and right to freedom of speech.

The revivalism of the First Great Awakening (see AWAKENINGS) also had liberating consequences for both black and white women. Little effort had been made during the seventeenth century to spread Christianity among slaves and to baptize them. White colonists feared that God did not approve of SLAVERY and that BAPTISM would grant slaves full personhood necessary for their freedom. Further, slaves clung to their native beliefs and were not so interested in joining churches that permitted slavery. However, the revivalists held that the immediate work of the Holy Spirit in one's CONVERSION gave the individual power to discern the state of her or his own soul. Intervention by the clergy was not necessary, a doctrine heretical to early PURITANISM. Black as well as white women were particularly drawn to this message that broke down the rigid boundaries constricting white and black women's public role and gave them authority to pray and witness to their faith in groups and services of both men and women.

The True Woman and the New Woman: The Nineteenth Century

During the nineteenth century, the terms "True Woman" and "New Woman" characterized the evolving constriction and expansion of women's place in the home, church, and society. The qualities defining the "True Woman" were domesticity, purity, piety, and submission to husbands and other males. Most white Protestant women continued to live out this role limiting them to the home, still divinely prescribed and grounded in the theology and experience of colonial America. The corporate nature of these qualities placed on women, holding sway during the first half of the century, was defined by the terms "the Cult of True Womanhood" or "The Cult of Domesticity."

The evangelical dominance during the first half of the nineteenth century, which was promoted by the Second Great Awakening, continued to expand the boundaries of women's lives, even of women who saw themselves faithful to the True Woman's role. Evangelical emphases of personal conversion, fruits of the spirit, religious activism, and social responsibility for the poor and oppressed provided a strong base to encourage women to pursue their own ministries beyond the spiritual nurture of men and children in their homes. Barriers were broken down, empowering them to share the gospel by going outside their homes to bring persons to Christ and to improve the lives of those in need. Separatist BAPTISTS, Methodists, and New Light Presbyterians were revivalist supporters opening doors for women (see METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA; PRESBYTERIANISM). The Baptist self-governing congregations allowed women to vote and hold positions of elderess and DEACONESS.

Religiously motivated separatist groups of women continued to bring these true women together in their local communities. Missions were the most popular cause of church women. By the 1830s peer groups, determined by age, ETHNICITY, race, and social standing, began to form. Consistent with women's maternal nature and a natural extension of the True Woman, they also provided appropriate responses to Jesus's command to go into all the world and spread the gospel. Within these separatist groups, women took their first steps outside their homes as teachers, evangelists, social workers, physicians, midwives, and nurses.

By the second half of the nineteenth century the New Woman of Protestantism began to appear, first in secular society and then in the churches. Within their denominations, these women claimed public roles, long the sole province of men, as their God-given rights as women, not simply because they possessed extraordinary gifts. The distinction between the True Woman and the New Woman was not always apparent in practice. Most Protestant women did not overtly question their primary functions in the home, but they wanted to expand their lives to find greater purpose and service in wider fields of usefulness. They brought together the rationale of the True Woman with their Christian commitment to make socially needed and personally meaningful contributions to their churches and society.

Expansion of gender-separate societies, particularly for missions, beyond the local scene to regional and national levels was the largest movement bringing together church women outside their homes. The Women's Union Missionary Society, the first national women's mission society in the United States, was interdenominational and began in 1860. However, the interdenominational structure soon broke down, and women's societies were formed in all mainline white Protestant denominations, including the Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, Christians, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and Lutherans (see LUTHERANISM, UNITED STATES). African-American women formed strong societies in the AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION, and NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION churches, as did Hispanic women in their Baptist and Methodist churches.

Consistent with the ideology of true womanhood, the women in these missionary societies did not preach in mixed assemblies including both women and men. However, they did break down strictures placed on women's public participation. In their women's organizations, from the local congregation to national levels, thousands of women gained their first experience in leading meetings, administering programs and financial resources, and speaking and praying in public. The women's missionary outreach was designed to bring all persons, men and women, to Christ, but their special emphasis was on women's work for women and children. Their particular concern was to send female missionaries and supplies to countries they deemed heathen and benighted. The missionaries taught the native women of these countries to read the Bible, improve women's health, and educate and empower women to fight against oppressive customs. They built orphanages, hospitals, and dispensaries, both in North America and in foreign lands, and became evangelistic partners with indigenous women.

By the 1880s most Protestant denominations began to develop orders of deaconesses. The Protestant equivalent of Roman Catholic nuns, in function though not in numbers, deaconesses were single women who took vows to give full-time Christian service, usually in home and foreign mission work, as evangelists, teachers, medical personnel, and social workers. As the first professional women in churches, they were seen by some lay and clergy, who did not approve of ordination, as acceptable substitutes for women who sought a church profession alongside of men. The lines blurred between the true woman and the new woman in the deaconess movement. Lucy Rider Meyer, founder of the Chicago Training School, the first institution for the training of deaconesses in the Methodist Episcopal Church, justified the deaconesses' work by saying that the world needs mothering and her trainees were taking that function to the world's needy. She also described the deaconess as the New Woman of Protestantism, whose field was as large as the world of women and the need of that work.

That same blurring was created in the origins of colleges and SEMINARIES, providing the equivalent of high school training for women after the mid-nine-teenth century. Most female schools for women were initiated by Protestant denominations and, like the deaconess institutions, provided an environment of sisterhood and support among pioneer women teaching and training in HIGHER EDUCATION. Justification for seminary and college training began with the ideology of true womanhood and republican motherhood, to give education to young women leading them to create better home environments. The ideology was easily stretched to sanction the education of the New Woman: rigorous academic study, development of leadership skills, commitment to the Christian faith, preparation to teach in SUNDAY SCHOOLS and public schools, and training to be physicians.

The religious enthusiasm of EVANGELISM in the Second Great Awakening in the first half of the nineteenth century opened the doors for the first time for women to preach at CAMP MEETINGS and REVIVALS, although not at regular worship services. Seeking to preach, but not to be ordained, they claimed that their special and extraordinary abilities given them by God granted them the freedom to do what God called them to do. By the mid-century, in 1853, Antoinette Brown became the first woman to be ordained in the Protestant tradition in the United States. She was ordained by the Congregational Church in South Butler, New York, a single congregation and not a connectional denominational system. A decade later, Olympia Brown and Augusta Chapin were the first women ordained in a connectional structure, the Unitarian Universalist Church (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION). Justification began to shift to ordination as a right because of gender equality of the New Woman of Protestantism by 1880. Resistance was strong, with lone women being identified as ordained by the African Methodist Episcopal Zion, National Baptist, and Methodist Protestant churches in the 1880s and 1890s.

Finally, new women of Protestantism, motivated by their religious convictions, moved outside of church structures into social reform movements in the late nineteenth century. Some entered reform movements because they were denied the opportunity to preach and to be ordained and others because they were not permitted to work alongside men in denominational missionary organizations and other lay governing bodies. Similarly, women first sought to work with men in social reform societies, such as abolitionist and peace organizations, before the CIVIL WAR. Because they were most often denied the opportunity for shared leadership but shunted to form auxiliaries, they began to form women's separatist reform groups.

Growing out of the SOCIAL GOSPEL imperative to bring the KINGDOM OF GOD on earth, the post-Civil War era became the heyday of volunteerism in social service and social justice movements. Women's organizations advanced reforms to improve life for women and children, particularly working conditions, decreasing hours in factories and sweatshops, compulsory education, temperance, and low-income housing. The Young Women's Christian Association (see YMCA, YWCA) and settlement houses were exemplary of women's social reform movements.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union, which became the largest women's organization of the nineteenth century, was representative of the socioreligious nature of Protestant women's work for the Social Gospel. Organized in 1887 it brought women together in a sisterhood of reform to work for TEMPERANCE and a host of other reforms, including peace, the double sexual standard, women's health and dress, ordination, urban problems of poverty, and working conditions for women. Some barriers of religion, GENDER, and class were broken down, enabling women to grow in leadership skills and lay the groundwork for the next generation of women who entered professional life. Lesser gains were made in breaking down barriers of race. Many white women's societies would not admit African-American women, who, in turn, joined together to form the black women's club movement, manifest in such organizations as the National Association of Colored Women and the National Council of Negro Women.

As they worked together to improve conditions for women, children, and society at large, women's reform leaders also sought to reconstruct the ideal of womanhood. They upheld aspects of true womanhood, including their belief in women's higher moral nature and the need to expand the mothering role into society. At the same time, they groomed strong and independent women who would not accept gender limitations to their sphere of action and who developed powerful networks of support and vocational motivation for their sisters.

Legacy for the Future: The Twentieth Century and the Beginning of the Twenty-First

Simultaneous with expansion of women's space in church and society, the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries also brought a significant loss of women's separate societies in Protestant denominations. National women's missionary organizations were dismantled and merged into larger church agencies, justified as efficient and progressive moves to integrate women and their work into wider church bureaus. Gains by women in building autonomous networks of support, control of financial expenditures, and commissioning of their own missionaries were lost or at least receded in most denominations. The one exception among denominations was in the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH, where the Women's Division of the Board of Global Ministries maintains independence and power today.

Ordination has been the major gain for women in mainline Protestant churches in the twentieth century. By the 1950s, barriers were broken down in most denominations. However, it took longer for women to be ordained in most churches than it did for females to gain the right to vote in national elections. It took seventy-two years, from the first women's rights convention in Seneca Falls, New York in 1848 to the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment granting women the national franchise in 1920. Comparatively speaking, the first women sought to be ordained in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1880 and did not gain ordination in the Methodist Church until seventy-six years later in 1956.

Two African-American denominations, the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1948 and the Christian Methodist Episcopal Church in 1954, ordained women shortly before more mainline, predominantly white denominations did. The PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH USA followed in 1955, the Methodists the following year, and two Lutheran denominations, the LUTHERAN CHURCH OF AMERICA and the AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH, in 1970. The EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES allowed diocesan bishops to ordain women at their discretion in 1976, and twenty-one years later mandated ordination in all dioceses. Increasing numbers of women have been ordained in the ten largest Protestant denominations in the last quarter of the twentieth century. However, as late as 1977, only 17 percent of the clergy in these denominations were women. Over 50 percent of the women ordained by then were in Holiness, Pentecostal, evangelical, and militarily styled denominations such as the SALVATION ARMY (see HOLINESS MOVEMENT; EVANGELICALISM).

Greater success came in decentralized denominations in which individual congregations made their own decisions to ordain women. The Congregational Church, predecessor of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST, ordained the first woman in the Protestant Church in 1853. The conservative SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION granted the right to its local congregations in 1964, with over 1,000 women being ordained since then. By 1979, the DENOMINATION became increasingly fundamentalist, discouraged ordination, and refused to approve women in positions of authority.

In the Salvation Army the struggle between emancipation and constriction of women was lively in the early years of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Initially women were fully commissioned as preachers, pastors, and administrators, and sent into saloons and other settings that contradicted the traditional norms of feminine behavior. As the century progressed, the concern for continuity of the organization led the Army to restrict women to more socially acceptable scenes.

Three movements in the conservative arm of Protestantism struggled with the same tension between emancipation and constriction in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. PENTECOSTALISM, founded in 1906, initially empowered women as "11th Hour Laborers" to exercise their spiritual gifts for conversion of the world and individuals. As the new denomination grew up and concerns for authority and order became predominant, women's work was constricted to the support of male pastors. Openness to women as preachers and leaders has continued in the Trinitarian branch of the Latino Pentecostal movement, whereas their role has become limited to support of male leaders in the Oneness branch. The same pattern has followed in fundamentalist churches where women were initially accepted as evangelists in the late nineteenth century. However, the antifeminist bias and belief in the divinely ordered hierarchy, prohibiting women to speak in religious assemblies and to exercise authority over men, took hold by the end of the 1920s. Finally, in the Charismatic movement, the natural legacy of Pentecostalism and FUNDAMENTALISM, women outnumbered men by a ratio of ten to one in exercising spiritual gifts of healing and speaking in tongues at its founding in the second half of the twentieth century. Today, in Aglow International, the major women's arm of the movement, women are admonished to submit to husbands and pastors through their gracious choice.

Evaluating the overall position of women at the opening of the twenty-first century, the same tensions are still present that have been at the heart of gender differences in Protestant churches since colonial times. They include spiritual equality vs. social equality, male dominance vs. female submission, and the True Woman vs. the New Woman. Overall the story is more one of breakthroughs for and by women than of constriction.

Today, women have gained their own voices even in conservative denominations such as the Disciples of Christ, where the number of WOMEN CLERGY continues to grow and one-third of the students who are training for ordination in Master of Divinity programs are women. On the far left of the spectrum, Unitarian Universalist women in ordained and lay leadership slightly surpass men and the ratio of women in denominational seminaries is three to one. Steady gains by women in mainstream Protestantism are highlighted by the election of the first female bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 2000 and a woman as moderator of the 211th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church USA in 1999. Further, in the United Methodist Church, eleven women, three of whom are women of color, serve among the fifty-one bishops, and 36 percent of the delegates at the 2000 General Conference were female. Changing demographics in the 243 seminaries in the North American Association of Theological Schools show that 35 percent of the students are women, a gain from 10 percent in 1972. Numbers of women in top administrative positions of presidents and deans have grown slowly, but they are outpaced by greater gains of women in faculty positions.

Women have sought other ways to take responsibility for themselves and to gain support of collegial males to change long-held traditions. Among African-American and Hispanic congregations, women are creating public space to resist cultural domination by predominantly white churches and social institutions. In the radical Hispanic Protestant evangelical movement, women, along with men, are resisting ways of preaching and worship that they believe have been pressed upon them by white churches. Creative new forms of WORSHIP throughout Protestant churches are often the result of feminist interpretations. Further, women have been the strong champions of inclusive language, by transforming the use of words for God and human beings, so that women, persons of color, handicapped, gays and lesbians, and others, who have been excluded by traditional patriarchal patterns, are fully represented.

The gains of greater space and more articulate voices of women over four centuries of American history have been evolutionary, not revolutionary. Both liberation and constriction are experienced today. However, the breakthroughs have been steady and deep enough that they will not be lost, but will continue to characterize the history of Protestantism in the United States.

See also Congregationalism; Missionary Organizations; Peace Organizations; Sexuality; Tongues, Speaking in; Voluntary Societies

References and Further Reading

- Andrews, William L., ed. Sisters of the Spirit: Three Black Women's Autobiographies of the Nineteenth Century. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1986.
- Brekus, Catherine A. Strangers and Pilgrims: Female Preaching in America, 1740–1845. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1998.
- Cott, Nancy F. The Bonds of Womanhood: "Woman's Sphere" in New England, 1780–1835. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977.
- . The Grounding of Modern Feminism. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1987.
- Lindley, Susan Hill. "You have Stept out of your Place": A History of Women and Religion in America. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1996.
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford. Christianity and the Making of the Modern Family. Boston: Beacon Press, 2000.
- , and Rosemary Skinner Keller, eds. In Our Own Voices: Four Centuries of American Women's Religious Writing. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 2000. [Originally published by Harper Collins, San Francisco, 1995.]
- . Women and Religion in America: A Documentary History. 3 vols. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981, 1983, 1986.
- Scott, Anne Firor. Natural Allies: Women's Associations in American History. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

ROSEMARY SKINNER KELLER

WOMEN CLERGY

Understandings of “clergy” differ dramatically in the history of the CHURCH. Although Protestantism radically changed the nature of priesthood and expanded opportunities for women’s leadership, it was not until the mid-nineteenth century that some of the more congregationally ordered Protestant denominations, like Congregationalists (see CONGREGATIONALISM) and Universalists, began ordaining women. Not until the latter half of the twentieth century did more institutionally ordered denominations, like Methodists, Presbyterians, Lutherans, and Episcopalians/Anglicans, actually grant full clergy status to women (see ANGLICANISM; EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES; LUTHERANISM; PRESBYTERIANISM). During the same time period, women preachers and evangelists became common in the HOLINESS MOVEMENT, and with the rise of PENTECOSTALISM, many women leaders simply went out and founded their own churches. Arguments for and against women clergy are complex, involving biblical, historical, theological, biological, social, political, cultural, practical, and ecumenical concerns. By the late twentieth century, however, a large number of Protestant denominations affirmed the growing importance of women clergy. Although new FEMINIST THEOLOGY supports women clergy, many Christians in traditional societies continue to resist. Furthermore, as church leaders have worked to reach an ecumenical consensus about ministry, the issue of women clergy has remained a big stumbling block. In the end, Protestants on all sides have simply agreed to recognize their differences and wait for guidance from the Holy Spirit.

Traditions Around Ordination

For more than 2,000 years, Christians have argued about how and who ought to be “ordained”—younger or mature persons, well-educated or especially pious persons, married or celibate persons, males or females, heterosexuals or homosexuals. In these debates, ordination is almost always understood to be more than a functional arrangement to get the work done. Persons who are ordained (known as CLERGY) are acknowledged to be especially gifted by God. After ordination, they carry an “indelible mark” that sets them apart for life from ordinary Christians (known as LAITY). All contemporary understandings of ordained ministry are grounded in the tradition that clergy are “called” by God, as well as the church, to assume “holy” or “priestly” responsibilities, such as sharing God’s message through PREACHING and officiating at the sacramental rites of the church (ministries of word and sacrament). Clergy may have different responsibilities in various denominations, but despite great diversity almost all Christians practice some rite or LITURGY that sets apart church leadership by PRAYER and laying on of hands. Most traditions call this process “ordination.” It emphasizes the fact that ordained ministry is a sacred trust.

In the early Christian church, before practices and liturgies around ordination were formalized, many types of people held leadership positions. Ancient and medieval church records show that women exercised key responsibilities for oversight, discipline, liturgy, teaching, and service in the emerging Christian community. Gradually, however, as ecclesiastical power consolidated and aligned itself with political and economic forces, and theological judgments were codified around the relationship of SEXUALITY to SIN, the clergy role became the exclusive prerogative of unmarried men. There were women who were revered as leaders of nuns, or mystical visionaries, but no women clergy.

During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the expanding economic and intellectual climate of west-ern Europe generated new attitudes about women. Renaissance humanists promoted the superiority of women over traditional Christian understandings of women as the source of sin and evil. Soon thereafter, sixteenth-century Protestant reformers challenged prevailing views about ordination, arguing for married and highly educated clergy. These Protestant thinkers insisted that celibacy was actually a problem, and that married clergy were needed to minister to the needs of families. Rather quickly, MARTIN LUTHER and the other reformers, many of whom had been celibate priests, sought out wives and argued for a more holistic view of ordained ministry. They felt that God had blessed MARRIAGE and that clergy would be able to serve Christians more effectively if they were married. At that time, however, few of them even entertained the idea that women should be priests.

Initially Protestantism stressed the intellectual leadership of the clergy. Clergy were not merely sacramental functionaries, they were preachers and teachers. Protestants wore the Geneva gown, worn by professors and students in the university, rather than ornate vestments. Clergy needed to “know” the BIBLE, and only those with scholarly credentials were accepted for ordination. In Protestantism, ministry became a “learned” profession open only to those who completed a rigorous academic program.

Protestantism also changed the relationship between clergy and laity. Although most Protestant denominations continued to have clergy, Protestant theology emphasized the “PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS,” which challenged basic assumptions about the powers of clergy. In Protestantism, ordination ceased to have some of the theological weight that it carried in the Roman Catholic Church. It was no longer a sacrament; it simply recognized gifts and determined who would carry out the functions of ministry. Among Protestants, ordained ministers were not considered more holy than the laity; rather, they were persons recognized as having certain talents and empowered to “function” as religious teachers and pastors for and on behalf of the whole community. Protestants still believed that ordination was a special or “holy” calling. Clergy, however, were accountable to the whole people of God (the priesthood of all believers). Although some denominations retained the ecclesiastical office of BISHOP, most of them did not believe that clergy AUTHORITY was literally conveyed by apostolic succession through a sequence of ceremonies (or hands) linking one ordination ritual to the next one. When Protestant clergy were ordained they made promises to carry on the collective legacy of Christian faithfulness through the ages.

By the seventeenth century, charismatic female leaders were found among many groups in the “left-wing” of the Protestant Reformation. Anabaptists (see ANABAPTISM), the English Puritans and Separatists (see PURITANISM), and later leaders within the eighteenth-century Wesleyan revival encouraged and followed women leaders. Protestant women were revered as martyrs, wives, mothers, and virgins. Grassroots Protestant piety took women very seriously.

The changing understandings of ordination in Christian history, combined with actual experiences of strong women leaders, eventually shaped and reshaped the issue of women’s ordination. By the early nineteenth century, many Protestants wondered aloud: If all persons were called to ministry by their baptism, and if there is neither Jew nor Greek, male nor female in Christ Jesus (Galatians 3:28), why not ordain women? If, as the apostle Paul put it, the Christian community is a royal priesthood carrying out God’s ministries, women are part of that priesthood. If Christian discipleship requires all Christians, female and male, to study the Bible and share their witness and faith with their children, women can do that as well as men. And if every Christian has received the universal promise of a “baptism of the Spirit” or a “second blessing,” then women have received that promise, and therefore women may be blessed with as much power as men to lead others to SALVATION.

Contemporary Protestant denominations still argue over this legacy. Within Protestantism, especially since the 1970s, many groups have changed their practice and now ordain women. At the same time, large Protestant groups, such as the Southern Baptists in the United States (see SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION), continue to cite scripture to defend their refusal to authorize the ordination of women. Officially, the Roman Catholic church remains steadfast in its judgment that women have no claim to the priesthood.

The First Women Clergy

In colonial North America women exercised more political, social, and religious freedom than many European women. The well-known story of a seventeenth-century colonial Puritan woman named ANNE HUTCHINSON, who was tried and condemned for HERESY for holding meetings in her Boston home to discuss the sermons of her pastor, indicates that women’s religious leadership was an increasingly important issue. By the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century, Protestant women in the United States discovered new talents, took on new roles, and sought more public visibility and political power. Women from many religious traditions began to challenge their churches to move beyond unexamined assumptions about the maleness of clergy.

The first Protestant groups to ordain women formally were from the so-called “FREE CHURCH” denominations—Protestants that vest a great deal of ecclesial authority in the local congregation. In these denominations, all decision making takes place in local congregations and does not require regional or national approval. Congregations may seek the fellowship and the advice of other congregations or leaders, but they do not need external permission to do what they feel God is calling them to do—such as ordaining a pastor. In many of these congregationally governed churches, women were allowed to exercise significant lay citizenship privileges by the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century. The Congregationalists (now the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST), the Universalists (see UNIVERSALISM), the small frontier Christian movement that eventually developed into the Christian Church (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST), and the Unitarians (see UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION) were some of the first Protestant denominations to recognize and formally authorize the ministries of women. It was easy for them to move from recognizing female lay leaders, itinerant female preachers, and female educational or medical missionaries, to giving full ordination to women.

But even though women were preaching and teaching in colonial America throughout the eighteenth century, historians believe that the first woman formally ordained to the Christian ministry in a major Protestant denomination in the United States was Antoinette L. Brown (later Blackwell). She was ordained by the Congregationalists in a small church in upstate New York in 1853. Within the next several decades, the Universalists ordained Olympia Brown (no relation to Antoinette) in 1863, the Christian Churches (General Convention) ordained Melissa Timmons (later Terrill) in 1867, and the Unitarians ordained Celia Burleigh and Mary Graves in 1871. Many of these early women clergy were viewed as “exceptions to the general rule.” There was no great support for their ministries, and most “proper women” still considered public preaching of the Gospel unseemly for women. Male clergy jokingly warned their parishioners to “beware of petticoats in the pulpit.”

One of the most dramatic changes in attitudes about ordination occurred among the Society of Friends. An offshoot of English radical Protestantism, the Quakers rejected all titles and class distinctions, arguing that everyone was blessed with the Divine within, and therefore either everyone should be ordained or no one should be ordained. Women exercised major leadership in local Quaker “meetings,” but because Quaker nonliturgical worship was so unusual, Quaker women preachers were usually only called “clergy” by those who were not Quakers. A very famous American Quaker woman, LUCRETIA COFFIN MOTT, was formally recorded as a Quaker minister in 1821. Despite the fact that the Quakers did not support any distinction between clergy and laity, Mott was known far and wide as a “lady minister.”

Another sectarian group that refused to make distinctions between male and female leadership was the SHAKERS. Founded by an English woman named ANN LEE, who came to North America at the end of the eighteenth century, the Shakers rejected marriage for men and women alike. Officially, Shakers did not have clergy, but Elders and Eldresses ruled each community of Shakers who lived in communal fellowship waiting for Christ’s second coming. During the first half of the nineteenth century, Shaker communities spread throughout the North American frontier. Many women exercised extraordinary religious freedom and leadership within the Shaker movement.

In Europe a similar pattern emerged, but more slowly. Protestant groups that were organized congregationally, such as Congregationalists and BAPTISTS in Great Britain and MENNONITES in the NETHERLANDS, began ordaining women in the nineteenth century. But most of the Protestant churches in Europe, where church and state are often intertwined, did not debate or grant ordination to women until well into the twentieth century.

Generally speaking, women in more institutionally ordered Protestant denominations like Anglicans, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Methodists, and Presbyterians did not consider the question of ordination until the end of the nineteenth century or the first half of the twentieth century. It is important to realize that the issue of women's ordination was variously understood. In those denominations where laity are ordained as elders—for example, in some Presbyterian groups—women were ordained as lay elders in 1930. Women in that same denomination, however, were not ordained as teaching elders (clergy) until 1956. Within METHODISM, one denomination actually began ordaining women clergy in 1927. These women were technically “clergy,” but they were not members of the annual Methodist Conference, and therefore they did not have rights and privileges equal to those of male clergy. Full Conference membership in the Methodist Church in the United States was not gained by women until 1956.

Even as European-rooted denominations wrestled with tradition and the ministries of women, numerous new Protestant denominations that emerged out of the Holiness movement of the mid-nineteenth century, and the Pentecostal movement of the early twentieth century celebrated women's leadership and had no problem ordaining women. CATHERINE BOOTH, a key leader in the SALVATION ARMY in the United States, wrote a widely distributed pamphlet titled Female Ministry: Woman's Right to Preach the Gospel in 1859. In many of the Holiness denominations, such as CHURCH OF GOD (ANDERSON, INDIANA) and the CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE, there were hundreds of ordained women by the 1930s. Unfortunately, as the biblical literalism of the conservative evangelical or fundamentalist movement infiltrated these denominations, the numbers of women clergy declined. Not until the 1980s and 1990s did the ranks of ordained women in many of the Holiness denominations reach levels equal to the 1930s. Within Pentecostalism there was a similar pattern; early in Pentecostalism, women were affirmed as preachers, and even ordained, but later they were ignored.

Arguments For and Against

Arguments for and against women clergy have been debated among Protestants for well over 200 years. Yet it has only been since the mid-twentieth century that a critical mass of ordained women have been authorized by various denominations and a significant body of literature developed to defend their status. Biblical, ecclesial, and cultural issues are all intertwined in the arguments.

Those who believe that women should not be ordained appeal to the authority of biblical texts. They argue that God's creation of women and men in Scripture has made women subordinate to men. They quote the second creation story in the Bible (Genesis 2:18–23) where Eve is created second as Adam's “helper.” Her secondary status is further reinforced by the story of the Fall, where Eve is cast as the weaker partner and the temptress (Genesis 3:1–6). In that text, Eve is punished and condemned to bear children in pain and be ruled over by her husband (Genesis 3:16). This dominate/subordinate ordering of creation is affirmed, goes this argument, by the apostle Paul when he writes to the early church (I Corinthians 11:3–15) that woman's role is to “glorify man.” This argument supports traditional marriage and upholds historic patterns of male-only leadership in the church.

Those who believe that women should be ordained also appeal to the Bible. They reject the hierarchical assumptions of many biblical texts, arguing that such primitive anthropology does not connect with modern world views. They quote from the first creation story in the Bible (Genesis 1:26–31), where women and men are created together in God’s image and share the inheritance of creation. They argue that Jesus preached about a new creation and that he treated women with great respect. They furthermore note that when the apostle Paul focuses on the power of Jesus Christ to change things, Paul insists that there are no significant ethnic, racial, or gender differences in the Christian church, because “all are One in Christ Jesus.” (Galatians 3:27–28).

In addition to the biblical arguments, Protestant denominations with strong links to the legacy of the medieval church and the historic defense of apostolic succession (i.e., a literal linear connection between contemporary clergy and the life and ministry of Jesus Christ) maintain that because a priest mediates the ongoing presence of Christ in worship, that priest must be male. Jesus was a man, and therefore the male gender of the priest functions as an icon of Christ, the new Adam.

Others insist that the manner in which the priest embodies Christ is through his representative humanity, not through his masculine sexuality. The “persona Christi” may be even better represented by having both women and men, rather than just men, in leadership. Still other Protestants reject the “persona Christi” argument and insist that only the whole community of the church, the gathered faithful, can mediate Christ’s presence. Priesthood represents the community of the faithful and gives expression to the unity of all Christians.

Debates about women clergy sometimes get into arguments about the “nature of women.” God created male and female with complimentary functions and different gifts. The role of priesthood is particularly suited for men, just as the role of motherhood is suited for women. The issue is not one of inequality between women and men, but distinct differences that are grounded in creation and God’s plan for salvation.

Others insist that God has given women and men (especially Christian women and men) equal talents, making them equally capable and equally equipped for ordained ministry. There are biological differences between men and women, but there is only one human nature. Unfortunately, women have been subordinated for years and hindered from fully developing themselves. The church is the poorer. It is time for women clergy to challenge the masculine captivity of the priesthood and enable the church to benefit from the leadership of women.

Arguments about the “nature of women” may also focus on women’s reproductive cycle. In ancient times, women were considered unclean during menstruation and after childbirth. Cleansing rituals were more demanding if they had a female child rather than a male child. These traditions are sometimes still used to argue that it is inappropriate for menstruating, married, or pregnant women to preside at worship.

Beyond the biblical, theological, and biological arguments, there are social, political, and cultural arguments for and against women clergy. Although those opposed are fearful that acquiescing to such arguments will lead to a further SECULARIZATION of the church—damaging tradition and corrupting the church’s inner life others insist that new so-called “secular” trends may be calling the church into a new future. Advocates for women clergy note that modern science has given us all new understandings of GENDER roles. Equality is a basic principle of justice, and the ordination of women embodies that principle. It is time for the patriarchal patterns in the church to be left behind and for Christians to embrace the radical message of the Gospel. In the past, women have been primarily the receivers, responders, and implementers of male power and decision making; now women can help the church reclaim its radical mandate.

Some arguments for women clergy are very pragmatic and practical. In certain parts of the world there is a shortage of male priests. Women are already doing most of the work, so they should be ordained. Women have many of the nurturing, healing, and peacemaking skills that the world needs. Male clergy brought their unique gifts to earlier eras—now it is time for the church to benefit from the leadership of female clergy.

The Ecumenical Movement

Finally, arguments for and against women clergy are being shaped and reshaped by the ecumenical movement (see ECUMENISM). During the early twentieth century, as various Protestant denominations sought reunion and tried to build new bridges to Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS), the issue of women's ordination surfaced again and again. At the founding meeting of the Faith and Order movement in Lausanne, SWITZERLAND in 1927, there were only seven women among the 400 delegates. The women graciously argued that the place of women in the church and in the councils of the church needed to be in the "hearts and minds of all." In 1948, when the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC) was organized in Amsterdam, it was decided that the issue of women's ordination needed further study. "The churches are not agreed on the important question of the admission of women to the full ministry. Some churches for theological reasons are not prepared to consider the question of such ordination: some find no objection in principle but see administrative or social difficulties; some permit partial but not full participation in the work of the ministry; in others, women are eligible for all offices in the Church" (Parvey 1985). This judgment eventually led to the establishment of a WCC Commission on the Life and Work of Women in the Churches and a report titled The Service and Status of Women in the Churches (Bliss 1952).

During the last half of the twentieth century, the ordination of women has remained a volatile issue. From the 1950s through the 1970s, many major Protestant denominations in all parts of the world officially opened the way for the ordination of women. Feminist theology provided theological support for the practice. The percentages of women in theological studies increased dramatically. At the same time, many conservative evangelical Protestants continue to reject the idea of women clergy, and social and cultural values in more traditional societies keep women in the younger churches of AFRICA, Asia, and LATIN AMERICA from serving as clergy. Yet growing numbers of women are serving the churches. Around the world, surveys and interviews of women leaders (many of whom are clergy) support this fact, even as considerable resistance remains.

Ecumenical debates keep the issue alive. Many Protestant denominations active in the WCC and members of the Faith and Order Commission (which includes an even wider range of Protestants and Roman Catholics) look deeply into the nature of all Christian ministry and conclude that Christians will continue to differ on the issue of women clergy. The Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry document (a product of fifty years of ecumenical work on three crucial issues that divide Christians) states that “some churches ordain both men and women, others ordain only men. Differences on this issue raise obstacles to the mutual recognition of ministries.... Openness to each other holds the possibility that the Spirit may well speak to one church through the insights of another. Ecumenical consideration, therefore, should encourage, not restrain, the facing of this question” (1982, par. 54). On the one hand, the ordination of women seems literally to threaten the unity of the church. Christians believe that when some churches ordain women, they diminish the possibility of Christian consensus around the mutual recognition of ministries. Others argue that any consensus about ministry that fails to embrace the fullness of male and female ministry is unacceptable anyway. Each is willing to admit, however, that the Spirit may well speak to one church through the insights of another.

References and Further Reading

- Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry*. Faith and Order Paper 111, Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1982.
- Bliss, Kathleen. The Service and Status of Women in the Churches. London: SCM Press, 1952.
- Chaves, Mark. Ordaining Women: Culture and Conflict in Religious Organizations. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1997.
- Lawless, Elaine. Handmaidens of the Lord: Pentecostal Women Preachers and Traditional Religion. Philadelphia, PA: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1988.
- McKenzie, Vashti M. Not Without a Struggle: Leadership Development for African American Women in Ministry. Cleveland, OH: United Church Press, 1996.
- Nesbitt, Paula. The Feminization of Clergy in America: Occupational and Organizational Perspectives. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Parvey, Constance, ed. Ordination of Women in Ecumenical Perspective. Faith and Order Paper 105. Geneva, Switzerland: World Council of Churches, 1980.
- . “Appendix 2. Stir in the Ecumenical Movement: The Ordination of Women.” In The Force of Tradition: A Case Study of Women Priests in Sweden by Brita Stendahl. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress Press, 1985.
- Schneider, Carl J. and Dorothy Schneider. In Their Own Right: The History of American Clergywomen. New York: Crossroad Publishing, 1997.
- Tucker, Ruth A. Daughters of the Church: Women and Ministry From New Testament Times to the Present. Grand Rapids, MI: Zondervan Press, 1987.
- Wessinger, Catherine, ed. Religious Institutions and Women’s Leadership: New Roles Inside the Mainstream. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.
- Zikmund, Barbara Brown, Adair T. Lummis, Patricia M.Y. Chang. Clergy Women: An Uphill Calling. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox Press, 1998.

BARBARA BROWN ZIKMUND

WOOLMAN, JOHN (1720–1772)

American Quaker clergy. Born October 19, 1720, in Northampton, New Jersey, Woolman spent his early life on his family's plantation in the Delaware valley. One of thirteen children, Woolman attended Quaker school and learned to read very early "through the care" of his parents. Woolman left the plantation in 1740 to work as a store clerk and began his ministry soon afterward, making the first of many missionary trips in 1743. Often these journeys were extremely long and difficult: on one trip into the South in 1757 he rode on horseback more than 1,100 miles in two months. The difficulties were not simply physical. Woolman found himself greatly uneasy when enjoying hospitality made possible by slave labor, distressed at the way slaveholding prevented "sound uniting" between Southern Friends and himself, and appalled both at the condition of the slaves and by the institution itself.

Woolman opened his own shop in Mount Holly in 1748, and according to his Journal, had both an inclination for, and success in, the business. However, just as "the road to large business appeared open," he "felt a stop" in his mind. After prayer and resignation to the "holy will" of God, Woolman gave up his business, in part to avoid participating in an economy where the pursuit of superfluities by some caused a burden of labor for others that he felt was greater than God intended for his creatures. In 1761 Woolman gave up dyed clothing because he was convinced that indulgence in luxury oppresses labor and encourages the "spirit of self-exaltation and strife," a spirit Woolman links in his Journal specifically to war.

Woolman married Sarah Ellis in 1749, and the following year the couple had a daughter, Mary. A son, William, died in 1754 at three months of age. After the French and Indian War, Woolman became an advocate for the rights of Native Americans, whose villages he had visited in western Pennsylvania. He died of smallpox on October 7, 1772, in England where he had gone to preach.

Best known for his abolitionism and his advocacy for the poor, Woolman frequently appears in American literary studies as a precursor of the Transcendentalists or an early representative of the libertarian conscience. Such interpretations tend to obscure the scriptural and Christological emphases of Woolman's thought. Woolman's Considerations on Pure Wisdom (1768) grounds wisdom and what he called "the Light" clearly in Christ and the Scriptures. The pure wisdom from above derives from such "true obedience" that one comes to a "state of inward purity" in which he "may love mankind in the same love with which our Redeemer loveth us." Without singleness of eye directed to Christ, "selfish desires, and an imaginary superiority, darken the mind; hence injustice frequently proceeds; and where this is the case, to convince the judgment, is the most effective remedy." For Woolman the Light is not simply a principle of inner judgment and inspiration, roughly equal to the Transcendentalists' intuition or soul, as is too often implied by American studies that treat the Quakers as forerunners of Emerson, Thoreau, and Whitman. Inseparable from Christ, the Light, as Woolman conceives it, acts to search out our motives and strivings, revealing these, more often than not, to be the results of self-will.

The Journal is Woolman's account of his attempt to live in radical obedience to God. Early in the work he suggests the movement of his heart as he "lived under the cross": "While I silently ponder on that change wrought in me, I find no language equal to it nor any means to convey to another a clear idea of it. I looked upon the works of God in this visible creation and an awfulness covered me; my heart was tender and often contrite, and a universal love to my fellow creatures increased in me." Love and justice are rooted, for Woolman, in awe before creation and a sense of absolute dependency. No doubt remembering his vivid childhood experience of wantonly killing a robin, Woolman now understands "that as by [God's] breath the flame of life was kindled in all animal and sensitive creatures, to say we love God as unseen and at the same time exercise cruelty toward the least creature moving by his life, or by life derived from him, was a contradiction in itself." It is difficult not to distort Woolman's thought by addressing him through the classically American paradigm of the individual versus the collective. Woolman understands himself always as a creature living in mutual and reciprocal dependency with other creatures in a world created by God and redeemed through the cross.

Woolman's sense of humanity's shared creaturely dependency on God provides the theological basis for his abolitionism and commitment to peace. Isaiah's language of eschatological gathering and Christ's "tasting death for every man" led to a deep sense in Woolman of community with people of color as well as inspiration for prophetic criticism of social arrangements, such as slavery, so obviously at odds with the universalizing pressure of Scripture. Peace is a fruit of the regeneration of the person in Christ. For Woolman Quaker nonviolence is grounded in the work God has done "in sending his son into the world" to "repair the breach made by disobedience, to finish sin and transgression that his kingdom might come and his will be done on earth as it is in heaven." The Spirit has "set up" a "spiritual kingdom...which is to subdue and break in pieces all kingdoms that oppose it, and shall stand for ever." Friends, Woolman continues, should thoroughly acquaint themselves with the truth and the "safety, stability, and peace there is in it," as to "be qualified to conduct [ourselves] in all parts of our life as becomes our peaceable profession." Woolman's peace witness is a way of living out what God has accomplished in the cross and resurrection: the overcoming of the powers of the world, the logic of violence and coercion, and the need to secure and justify our own lives.

See also Peace Organizations; Slavery; Slavery, Abolition of; Society of Friends in North America; Transcendentalism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Woolman, John. Some Considerations on the Keeping of Negroes (Pt. 1). New York: Grossman Publishers, 1754.

———. Considerations on Keeping Negroes (Pt. II). New York: Grossman Publishers, 1762.

———. A Plea for the Poor. 1763.

———. Considerations on Pure Wisdom and Human Policy. 1768.

———. Considerations on the True Harmony of Mankind. 1770.

———. A Journal of the Life, Gospel Labours, and Christian Experiences of That Faithful Minister of Jesus Christ, John Woolman. Philadelphia: Joseph Crukshank, 1774.

Secondary Sources:

Cady, Edwin. John Woolman. New York: Twayne, 1965.

Oehlschlaeger, Fritz. "Taking John Woolman's Christianity Seriously." Renascence 48 (1996):191–207.

Sox, David. John Woolman: Quintessential Quaker. Richmond, IN: Friends United Press, 1999.

Stewart, Margaret. "John Woolman's 'Kindness Beyond Expression': Collective Identity vs. Individualism and White Supremacy." Early American Literature 26 (1991):251–275.

FRITZ OEHLSCHLAEGER

WOOLSTON, THOMAS (1670–1733)

English deist. Born in Northampton, ENGLAND in 1670, Woolston is best known for his attack on the literal reading of biblical miracles. He was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge and elected a fellow there in 1691. Ordained and known as a scholar of the early church fathers, he wrote An Apology for the Christian Religion (1705) in which he argued that biblical miracles should be understood allegorically rather than historically. Woolston was quickly silenced by his colleagues, but he resumed his attack on biblical literalism in 1720, which led to his dismissal from the college in 1721.

From 1720 to 1729 Woolston released numerous polemical works attacking the CLERGY (e.g., Four Free Gifts to the Clergy, 1722–1724), whom he held responsible for the perversion of Christianity and the historicity of biblical miracles. Woolston's A Moderator between an Infidel and an Atheist and Supplements to a Moderator (1725) provoked Bishop Edmund Gibson to bring blasphemy charges against him, but these were dropped for fear of winning him sympathy. Woolston's most notorious publication was a series of six discourses On the Miracles of our Saviour (1727–1729). In his characteristic scathing satire, he denounced the miracles of Jesus through his rhetorical tools of insult and ridicule. Woolston argued that one cannot use miracles as proof of the Messiahship of Jesus, which is what Jesus claimed; instead, he aimed to provide a rational foundation for Christianity independent of superstition and supernaturalism. Woolston's method advocated allegorical interpretation of biblical miracle stories, using in support the allegorical interpretations of early church fathers.

Woolston's assault on the resurrection of Christ again brought on charges of blasphemy, for which he was put on trial on March 4, 1729, and sentenced to a fine and one-year imprisonment. Thomas Woolston died of stomach cancer on January 27, 1733.

See also Deism; Higher Criticism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

- Woolston, Thomas. A discourse on the miracles of Our Saviour: in view of the present controversy between infidels and apostates. London: Printed for the author, sold by him, 1727.
- . A fifth discourse on the miracles of Our Saviour: in view of the present controversy between infidels and apostates. London: Printed for the author, and sold by him, 1728.
- . A fourth discourse on the miracles of Our Saviour: in view of the present controversy between infidels and apostates. London: Printed for the author, and sold by him, 1728.
- . A free-gift to the clergy, or, The hireling priests of what denomination soever, challeng'd to a disputation on this question: whether the hireling preachers of this age, who are all ministers of the letter, be not worshippers of the apocalyptic beast, and ministers of Anti-Christ. London: A.Moore, 1722.

———. Mr. Woolston's defence of his discourses on the miracles of our Saviour: against the Bishops of St. David's and London, and his other adversaries, part I. London: Printed for the author, and sold by him, 1729.

Secondary Sources:

Herrick, James A. The Radical Rhetoric of the English Deists: The Discourse of Skepticism, 1680–1750. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.

Trapnell, William. Thomas Woolston: Deist and Madman? Bristol, UK: Thoemmes, 1993.

G.SUJIN PAK

WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM (1770–1850)

English poet. Few poets have been hailed as profound religious thinkers with so many misgivings as Wordsworth. For many Victorians he, above all, had shown how head and heart, science and emotion, rationality and belief could be integrated into a satisfactory personal synthesis. Yet many of those whom he had most helped—John Stuart Mill, for instance, or Matthew Arnold—were most critical and skeptical of his philosophy and the kinds of religious experience he was credited with. As Mill reveals in his Autobiography, it was Wordsworth who had given him back a sense of wholeness and meaning to life after his disastrous adolescent breakdown in 1828. Yet Percy Bysshe Shelley, he argued, was the greater poet because he expressed “pure feeling”—which is what a poet should do. Although the Immortality Ode contained some “grand imagery,” it was nevertheless “bad philosophy.” Arnold, although more sympathetic to Christianity, was equally unsympathetic to Wordsworth’s religion and his philosophy: “we cannot do him justice until we dismiss his formal philosophy.... However true the doctrine may be, it has...none of the characters of poetic truth, the kind of truth we require from a poet...” (Arnold 1888:149–150).

Yet for many other Victorians Wordsworth was preeminently a religious poet. From natural dissenters like George MacDonald and Mark Rutherford (see WILLIAM HALE WHITE); to Christian Socialists (see SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN), like CHARLES KINGSLEY, J.M. Ludlow, or John M.F. Hughes; nonparty men like FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE; Americans like RALPH WALDO EMERSON; and through JOHN KEBLE (perhaps the greatest Wordsworthian of them all) to the whole OXFORD MOVEMENT, including EDWARD B. PUSEY and JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, Wordsworth’s poetry reached out to every sector of the nineteenth century’s otherwise divided religious life. If Arnold assured readers that Wordsworth’s influence was already waning after his death mid-century, others repeatedly assumed that Wordsworth’s great affirmations of value in NATURE also reveal a transcendent God who was all-powerful, loving, and moral.

Twentieth-century criticism has been no less contradictory. Although some have continued to find in him religious inspiration, others have seen in him at best a vague pantheism, or even little that can be described as “religious” at all. A few have even suggested that his love of Nature led not to the love of humanity, but its rejection. Wordsworth, it is darkly hinted, took refuge in the pieties of conventional ANGLICANISM only to avoid the path of the Marquis de Sade (Ferry 1959; Hartman 1964). According to this view, having failed to find the solace he sought in Nature, Wordsworth flees from it to religion in disillusion and even terror.

There is nothing new in such diverse attitudes. His greatest contemporary admirers, WILLIAM BLAKE, SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, John Keats, or (later) MacDonald, were all uneasily aware of what seems to be curious contradictions in Wordsworth’s thought. In 1826, on reading The Influence of Natural Objects in calling forth and strengthening the Imagination..., Blake scribbled in the margin of his copy of Poems 1815: “Natural Objects always did and now do weaken, deaden and obliterate Imagination in Me. Wordsworth must know that what he Writes Valuable is Not to be found in Nature.” Later he told Crabb Robinson that reading the Introduction to Wordsworth’s Excursion had made him ill. Nevertheless, he added, Wordsworth was “the greatest poet of the age.” On page one of the Poems he wrote “I see in Wordsworth the Natural Man rising up against the Spiritual Man Continually, & then he is No Poet but a Heathen Philosopher at Enmity against all true Poetry or Inspiration.” By the concluding essay (on p. 341) he concludes wearily, “I do not know who wrote these Prefaces: they are very mischievous & direct contrary to Wordsworth’s own Practise” (Blake 1966:783). If elsewhere Blake had feared Wordsworth was no Christian but a heathen Platonist, now his fear was that he was no Platonist either, but a mere worshipper of Nature (Robinson 1938:1, 327).

Blake’s puzzled reaction may stand for many. Was Wordsworth a “naturalist,” finding values inherent in Nature itself? Was he a Platonist, perceiving through the fleeting appearances of Nature shadows of eternal supernatural values? Was he a Pantheist, finding not a personal God, but an impersonal divinity distributed throughout the universe? Was he an orthodox Christian, seeing even in fallen Nature vestiges of the divine love that had animated all Creation?

Relation to Church

Wordsworth himself had originally intended to become an Anglican clergyman—although never with great enthusiasm. His stay in FRANCE in the early 1790s seems to have been to learn French to become a clergyman-tutor in some wealthy family. His support for the early days of the Revolution, together with his love affair with the Catholic and royalist Annette Vallon, which resulted in an illegitimate French daughter, also meant a profound revolution in his own sense of VOCATION. After a period of near despair (later movingly memorialized in Tintern Abbey) Wordsworth emerged with strengthened sense of the healing power of Nature and his poetic vocation to record that recovery. His subsequent theology and even relationship with his own church was to baffle both critics and sometimes his own family. “I would die for the Church of England,” he once remarked on passing Grasmere Church. His sister Dorothy replied that he would die if he ever went inside one. “That,” said the poet, “is because the Curate is usually drunk.” According to another authority Wordsworth’s aversion to his local church was because two of his children were buried in the graveyard there.

Wordsworth himself, who was an inveterate reviser of his own work, clearly had no problems with the poem that offended Blake, incorporating it into the 1850 version of The Prelude unaltered:

Wisdom and Spirit of the universe!
 Thou Soul that art the eternity of thought,
 That giv’st to forms and images a breath

And everlasting motion, not in vain
 By day or star-light thus from my first dawn
 Of childhood didst't thou intertwine for me
 The passions that build up our human soul;
 Not with the mean and vulgar works of man,
 But with high objects, with enduring things—
 With life and nature, purifying thus
 The elements of feeling and of thought,
 And sanctifying, by such discipline,
 Both pain and fear, until we recognise
 A grandeur in the beatings of the heart.

[Prelude, 1805, 1, 427–40]

The problem begins with the language itself: is the overtly religious vocabulary—“spirit,” “soul,” “sanctifying,” and so forth—metaphorical, metonymical, or literal? Similar imagery occurs later in The Prelude, when Wordsworth has reached the summit of Snowdon by moonlight and stands looking out over a “sea of mist” concealing the lower part of the mountain—including the route (at once spatial and historical) to that point of vision:

Meanwhile, the moon looked down upon this shew
 In single glory, and we stood, the mist
 Touching our very feet; and from the shore
 At distance not the third part of a mile
 Was a blue chasm, a fracture in the vapour,
 A deep and gloomy breathing-place, through which Mounted the roar of waters, torrents, streams
 Innumerable, roaring with one voice.
 The universal spectacle throughout
 Was shaped for admiration and delight,
 Grand in itself alone, but in that breach
 Through which the homeless voice of waters rose,
 That deep dark thoroughfare, had Nature lodged
 The soul, the imagination of the whole.

[Prelude, 1805, XIII, 52–65]

The word “soul,” paralleling that key Romantic word “imagination,” appears to come from a very different mental set. However, what appears the loose conjunction of religious and aesthetic terms here provides something new—an image that is neither, but primarily psychological. This “image of a mighty mind” (1.69) provides one of the earliest, and certainly one of the most graphic models of the unconscious in all literature: a mountain whose summit is illuminated by moonlight but whose roots, beneath the mist, are shrouded in darkness. Even Wordsworth's own term for this, "an underpresence" (1.71), uncannily anticipates later psychoanalytic terminology.

Any apparent disjunction between "soul" and "imagination" results more from fractures in our own mental maps than from the intellectual climate of the period. It had been the total integration of the spiritual and the psychological in the scheme of Wordsworth's mentor, David Hartley, that had appealed to many Romantics. Yet the two words are not tensionless synonyms; both have semantic baggage and belong to markedly different historical contexts.

The Romantic attempt to integrate feeling and thinking was more than a quest for internal unity. Starting with human subjectivity Wordsworth believed that we actively reshape—"half-create"—our perception both of the external environment and individual identity, affecting past as much as present. Autobiography was for Wordsworth an integral part of understanding his identity as a poet. Past and present were creative acts of consciousness—expressions, as it were, of becoming "a living soul" in this new sense. Telling "the story of the man, and who he was" is not confined to the major poems, but is central in some way to all his lyrics. This new inwardness, characteristic of the Romantic idea of the soul, stressing imagination, empathy, and feeling as adjuncts to personal integration, was both distinctively Protestant and essential to the Romantic consciousness of history.

For Wordsworth the description of Snowdon completes what has amounted to nothing less than the struggle for his soul. Retelling his life's story through its significant "spots of time" reaches its climax with that final image of the mist-covered mountain, and only after that do we see the full significance of the earlier meditations:

Oh mystery of man, from what a depth
Proceed thy honours! I am lost, but see
In simple childhood something of the base
On which thy greatness stands—but this I feel,
That from thyself it is that thou must give,
Else never canst receive. The days gone by Come back upon me from the dawn almost
Of life; the hiding-places of my power
Seem open, I approach, and then they close;
I see by glimpses now, when age comes on May scarcely see at all.

[Prelude, Book XI, 1805, 328–337]

If the mountain is the self, with mist allowing only tantalizing and fragmentary glimpses of the past, the rift in those clouds, "that deep dark thoroughfare" where conscious and unconscious meet, locates the soul. But there is also a historical dimension to this retrospective survey of the psyche. As much as childhood experiences, Wordsworth's poetic consciousness had been shaped by the turmoil of the French Revolution and its aftermath. If, as he invites us, we read his story in terms of moral conflict, the experiences in France, and his subsequent despairing return to ENGLAND, provide the central conflict eventual triumph.

Perception of History

Although Wordsworth's own private sense of history was always part of a broader public sense of history-in-the-making in the Revolution, affecting in different ways Edmund Burke, Fanny Burney, William Hone, Richard Price, Charlotte Smith, and others including, later, Thomas Carlyle, what makes this passage significant is neither its role in the construction of Wordsworth's poetic identity, nor its direct relation to the world of public events, but rather the author's very Protestant sense that this "soul," whether considered as integrating power or as moral identity, is not a free-floating and autonomous faculty but (in a wholly unconscious parallel with FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER) something related both to immediate perception and to past events—and is thus very much part of the historical process. Moreover such perceptions are at once both subjective and creative—or, to use a later terminology, the poetic process is also by its very nature a hermeneutic activity.

For previous generations, the meaning of history lay in past events themselves. However militantly secular DAVID HUME and Edward Gibbon might be, they, like their religious predecessors, regarded the writing of history as an exemplary activity. Whether demonstrating the just wrath of God or the complex natural laws of human behavior, history held a discoverable and universally valid meaning. For the Romantics and post-Romantics, however, including Wordsworth, history was concerned less with deducing objective meanings (whether divine or natural) from the past as with the nature of our understanding of the material itself. Wordsworth is central to this shift from an exemplary to a hermeneutic mode of understanding.

Yet there is another element to Wordsworth's vision from Snowdon that, however allied with this sense of history, seems almost to contradict it, so that he seems torn between asserting the subjectivity of his insight and simultaneously proclaiming its universality. At one moment we find Nature compelling not just the poet to understand her meaning, but even "the grossest minds must see and hear/And cannot chuse but feel" (Prelude, Book XIII, 1805, 1.71–83). Only a few lines later, however, we find the same certainties being attributed not to "Nature" but to the creative—and even divine—subjectivity of poets themselves:

They from their native selves can send abroad
 Like transformation, for themselves create
 A like existence, and when'er it is Created for them, catch it by an instinct.
 ...They need not extraordinary calls
 To rouze them—in a world of life they live,
 By sensible impressions not enthralled,
 But quickened, rouzed, and thereby made more fit
 To hold communion with the invisible world.
 Such minds are truly from the Deity...

This is the most overtly religious confession to be found in Wordsworth's poetry to that time. Clearly his discovery of the divine is closely associated with his perception of self, and the growth of personal self-consciousness. This, at times almost solipsistic personal religion, certainly constitutes an extreme Protestantism—although always tempered by his artistic vocation and the need to communicate. Yet Wordsworth himself often seems unsure how to square the contradictions of his own argument, and it is probably symptomatic of his dissatisfaction with it that, of all the key spots of time in The Prelude, this Snowdon section was the most heavily revised for the 1850 version—with increasing emphasis on its theology. Here, in its most acute form, is the classic Romantic dilemma: how to claim universal validity for perceptions that are both historically conditioned and personally subjective? This, the central problem of Protestant ROMANTICISM, was eventually to drive Newman from Anglicanism to the Catholic Church, and then to attempt to remake that institution to conform to his own answer.

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wordsworth, William. Poetical Works. Edited By E. de Selincourt. 5 vols. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1940–1949.

Secondary Sources:

- Arnold, Matthew. "Wordsworth." In Essays in Criticism, Second Series. New York: Macmillan, 1888.
- Blake, William. Complete Writings. Edited by G.Keynes. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Ferry, David. The Limits of Mortality. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1959.
- Hartley, David. Observations on Man, his Frame, his Duties and his Expectations. London, 1749.
- Hartman, Geoffrey. Wordsworth's Poetry 1787–1814. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1964.
- MacDonald, George. "Wordsworth's Poetry." In A Dish of Orts. London: Sampson Low, 1893.
- Mill, J.S. Autobiography. Oxford: Oxford University Press/ World's Classics, 1924.
- Prickett, Stephen. Coleridge & Wordsworth: the Poetry of Growth. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970.
- . England and the French Revolution. New York: Macmillan, 1988.
- . Romanticism & Religion: the Tradition of Coleridge and Wordsworth in the Victorian Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Robinson, Henry Crabb. Henry Crabb Robinson on Books and their Writers. Edited by E.J.Morely. London: Dent, 1938.

STEPHEN PRICKETT

WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC) is a worldwide fellowship of over 200 national churches with roots in that part of the sixteenth-century REFORMATION that was centered in Geneva, a reforming movement led by JOHN CALVIN and his colleagues in many European countries. Most of these churches today are called Presbyterian, Reformed, or Congregational; collectively they are called the Reformed family of churches. The Alliance also includes some churches, like the Waldensians in ITALY with their daughter churches abroad and the Czech Brethren, which originated in reforming movements prior to the sixteenth century but later allied themselves with the Reformed family. Also included in the Alliance membership are many united churches stemming from unions of Reformed churches with those of other traditions, such as the CHURCH OF SOUTH INDIA. This broad Reformed family represents more than 75 million Christians in over 100 countries; about three-fourths of the member churches are located in the countries of the southern hemisphere. The WARC was formed in 1970 in Nairobi, Kenya as a union of the former Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian Order and the International Congregational Council.

General Councils of representatives of all the member churches, held about every seven years, govern the WARC. The General Councils elect an executive committee that directs the work between General Council meetings. The headquarters with the general secretariat is located in Geneva at the Ecumenical Center.

The Department of Theology fosters theological work in the Reformed tradition, reflecting on the meaning of Christian faith in the many cultural contexts in which Reformed churches live. The Department also carries responsibility for ecumenical dialogue and work for Christian unity (see ECUMENISM). Since the 1960s the Alliance has been in dialogue with all the world Christian communions and with some traditions that are not organized as world communions, seeking mutual understanding and collaborative relationships. Working relationships of the WARC with the LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION have become intentionally close since 1989.

The Department of Cooperation and Witness focuses on the role of the church in promoting human rights, emerging democracies and civil society, economic justice, and ecological sustainability. The Department of Partnership of Women and Men promotes full partnership in church and society and seeks to eradicate sexism in theology and practice.

There are also regional councils of the WARC in Europe, the CARIBBEAN and North America, LATIN AMERICA, Southern Africa, and Northeast Asia.

Alliance of Reformed Churches (ARC)

Irish, Scottish, and American Presbyterian initiatives brought about the formation in London in 1875 of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System (later, Presbyterian Order). The first General Council met in Edinburgh in 1877 with an Alliance membership of forty-nine churches from the British Isles, America, Europe, SOUTH AFRICA, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, Ceylon, and the New Hebrides. Beginning with that first meeting the Alliance has worked periodically on the question of a common CONFESSION of faith. The Alliance has also been concerned with world mission and Christian unity, stressing the need for cooperation, not only among Reformed churches, but with all Christian churches, and also the need to help newly established churches become truly indigenous and self-governing members of the Alliance as quickly as possible. A third constant theme is the concern for HUMAN RIGHTS. The Alliance monthly journal, The Catholic Presbyterian, from 1879 called for aid to Waldensian pastors and to the exploited laboring classes and protested inhumane treatment of NATIVE AMERICANS in the UNITED STATES. A general secretary, Rev. Dr. G.D. Mathews, was appointed in 1888. He traveled widely in Europe, the Middle East, RUSSIA, and South Africa, especially in support of “younger churches” and religious freedom for minority churches. These concerns continued, most notably in World Alliance’s deep engagement with the movement against apartheid in South Africa.

Leaders of the Alliance worked for the establishment of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES and early gave leadership in it. Since its beginnings the Alliance has tailored its structure to collaborate ecumenically wherever possible.

International Congregational Council (ICC)

From the 1870s on there were discussions among British and American Congregationalists about bringing together the whole Congregational family in an international council, including churches in the colonies and mission fields. The first Council meeting in London in 1891 and four subsequent Councils between 1899 and 1930 discussed the life and theology of CONGREGATIONALISM, its relation to the state and to social problems, its relation to other Christian traditions and the unity of the church, and its worldwide mission. Representation from ENGLAND and America was heavier than had been originally planned, with fewer delegates from the colonies and the mission fields. Beginning with the second Council meeting, a few women were present and occasionally were among the speakers. There was little activity between the meetings of the Councils.

Close cooperation between British and American Congregational churches during World War II and excitement about the planning for the inauguration of the World Council of Churches in 1948 spurred fresh thinking about the role of a confessional body like the ICC in the ecumenical movement. A planning committee decided in 1947 to establish an international office in London and to appoint as its first secretary Dr. Sidney M. Berry, acting moderator of the Council and the secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. The sixth Council at Wellesley, Massachusetts in 1949 confirmed a permanent international organization with a full-time “Minister and Secretary,” Dr. Berry, and adopted a constitution.

Between 1953 and 1966 four more councils were held, and the connection between the ICC and the Alliance of Reformed Churches grew steadily. In 1957 the Alliance officially proposed talks between the two world bodies about areas of agreement, leading to close working relationships and a decision in 1968 to unite. In Nairobi in 1970 both bodies voted to merge as The World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Presbyterian and Congregational), joining in an act of Covenant.

See also Calvinism; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Presbyterianism

References and Further Reading

- Njoroge, Nyambura J. “Women in the World Alliance of Reformed Churches: Building an Inclusive Community.” In With Love and With Passion: Women’s Life and Work in the Worldwide Church, edited by Elisabeth Raiser and Barbara Robra, 111–114. Geneva: WCC Publications, 2001.
- Peel, Albert, and Douglas Horton. International Congregationalism. London: Independent Press Ltd., 1949.
- Pradervand, Marcel. A Century of Service: A History of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches 1875–1975. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1975.
- Sell, Alan P.F. A Reformed, Evangelical, Catholic Theology: The Contribution of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 1875–1982. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1991.
- . “World Alliance of Reformed Churches.” In Encyclopedia of the Reformed Faith, edited by Donald K. McKim, 403–407. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1992.
- Council Proceedings of ARC, ICC, and WARC. <http://www.arc.ch/> <http://www.warc.ch/>
- JANE DEMPSEY DOUGLASS

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

The World Council of Churches (WCC) was formally established August 23, 1948 in Amsterdam with 351 delegates, representing 147 church bodies from forty-four countries and all continents participating. This culminated a long process to create a structure that would promote unity and cooperation among Orthodox, Anglican, and Protestant churches. A group of Roman Catholic observers was invited to this first assembly, but the Vatican forbade their attendance. From the beginning the WCC has been headquartered in Geneva, SWITZERLAND.

Background

When the WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE met at Edinburgh in 1910, leaders were aware of the growing church outside the West. Unfortunately, the historical and theological divisions that marked the churches in the West were being transferred to the churches in Asia, AFRICA, and LATIN AMERICA. Bishop Charles H. Brent, Episcopal Church in the Philippines, addressed the WMC on the urgent need to mitigate these historic divisions and foster Christian unity.

World War I (1914–1918) temporarily interrupted efforts toward an ecumenical organization. The founding of the League of Nations at the urging of President WOODROW WILSON in 1919 offered a model for international cooperation. In 1919 the Holy Synod of the Church of Constantinople issued an encyclical proposing that all Christian churches form a “League of Churches” to promote Christian union. Also in 1919 Archbishop NATHAN SÖDERBLOM of Uppsala proposed that an ecumenical council be founded. In 1920 JOSEPH H. OLDHAM, secretary of the Continuation Committee of the 1910 World Missionary Conference, submitted a memorandum to a group of missionary leaders at Crans, Switzerland outlining a structure for the International Missionary Council, although he predicted that it would soon “give way to something that may represent the beginnings of a world league of Churches.”

In addition to well-established international Christian organizations such as the YMCA, YWCA (see YMCA, YWCA), and World Student Christian Federation, in the 1920s new initiatives were carried forward along three lines: International Missionary Council (IMC), Faith and Order, and Life and Work. The need for an “International Christian Council” was evident but the time was not yet ripe. Gradually it became clear that these multiple parallel and overlapping organizations were impediments to structural unity. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary in New York, chair of Life and Work, took the lead in 1933 to convene leaders of international Christian organizations to discuss how coordination might be achieved. An Ecumenical Consultative Group was appointed to take extensive soundings of the churches.

In July 1937 the Committee of Thirty-Five met at Westfield College, London to develop a proposal to be laid before Life and Work meeting in Oxford later that month, and Faith and Order in Edinburgh in early August, concerning the future of the ecumenical movement. Four men were delegated the task of drawing up a plan: Archbishop WILLIAM TEMPLE, Oldham, Samuel McCrae Cavert, and William Adams Brown. Cavert, general secretary of the U.S. Federal Council of Churches, suggested the name "World Council of Churches." Life and Work, and Faith and Order would be integrated into the new structure immediately. (The relationship of the IMC to the WCC would be worked out later.) Equally important, the proposal established the principle that the WCC should not have the power to legislate for the member churches. The Council could propose, but decision making rested with member churches. The work of the Council would be conducted through a General Assembly to be held every five to seven years and a Central Committee that met annually. The Committee of Thirty-Five also recommended appointment of W.A. VISSER 'T HOOFT, World Student Christian Federation, as general secretary of the new World Council of Churches.

The Oxford and Edinburgh conferences responded favorably and appointed seven members each to implement the plan. The next step was to conduct consultations with the constituent member. The main sticking point was the constitutional question of the relation of the Council to its member bodies. Archbishop Temple clarified this point: "It is not a federation as commonly understood, and its Assembly and Central Committee will have no constitutional authority whatever over its constituent churches. Any authority that it may have will consist in the weight it carries with the churches by its wisdom." Equally important was the theological basis of membership in the Council. It was agreed: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of Churches which accept the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour." This formulation did not prove to be satisfactory and finally in 1960 was revised to say: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit."

In spite of mounting international tensions, preparation for launching the WCC went forward and the first Assembly was scheduled for August 1941. The growing threat of war forced an indefinite postponement. During World War II the World Council of Churches (in Process of Formation) maintained offices in Geneva, London, and New York and its leaders played an active role on behalf of member churches throughout the war years by seeking to maintain communications with all regardless of their political situation. The end of the war brought a flood of new work. In addition to emergency relief and reconstruction in war-torn areas of Europe, the WCC was concerned with reconciliation among the churches, especially in relation to GERMANY, as well as opening the way for the churches of Asia, Africa, and Latin America to become full participants.

Nature of WCC and Basis of Membership

The provisional committee met in 1946 and 1947 to complete preparations for the inaugural assembly in 1948. One question that had to be settled was the ecclesiastical status of the Council and the basis of membership in it. It was agreed that the WCC was not a “world church” or “super church.” Indeed, it was not a church; rather it was an instrument that enabled member churches to “bear witness together...and cooperate in matters requiring united action.” It was acknowledged that unity arises from God’s action in Jesus Christ rather than at the initiative of the church. Each church is bound to Jesus Christ and thus to all others who make up the body of Christ. The Amsterdam Assembly declared: “Christ has made us his own, and he is not divided. In seeking him we find one another. Here at Amsterdam we have committed ourselves afresh to him, and have covenanted with one another in constituting the World Council of Churches. We intend to stay together.” The WCC Constitution states the raison d’être succinctly: “The primary purpose of the fellowship of churches in the World Council of Churches is to call one another to visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and common life in Christ, through witness and service to the world, and to advance towards that unity in order that the world may believe.”

The WCC understood itself to be a means by which member churches would discover and realize more fully the unity of the whole body. The first of repeated attempts to clarify the nature and role of the WCC was made by the Central Committee at Toronto, CANADA in 1950. The Toronto Statement emphasized that the WCC “deals in a provisional way” with the ecclesiastical and theological differences that exist between the churches. It is not the responsibility of the WCC to espouse any particular theory or view of the church nor “to negotiate union between churches.” All such matters were to remain the responsibility of the churches.

With regard to the basis of membership, it was finally agreed that only autonomous churches were eligible for membership. National councils of churches that had been organized in various parts of the world after Edinburgh 1910 were recognized as affiliates. Similarly, organizations representing confessional families could not be members of the WCC. The WCC was to be a council of churches.

Organization

The WCC organization has been revised periodically to fit changing needs. In 1948 the new organization consisted of twelve departments: Faith and Order, Study, Evangelism, Laity, Youth, Women, Interchurch Aid/Refugees, International Affairs, Ecumenical Institute, Publications, Library, and Finance. At the Evanston Assembly in 1954 the structure was changed. Four divisions were established with program departments under each. Then in 1961 the International Missionary Council was integrated with the WCC and the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME) set up. In 1972 a plan systematically to internationalize the WCC staff in Geneva was instituted more adequately to reflect the constituent churches. This included a uniform pay scale.

That same year a substantial reorganization was instituted with three program units replacing the five program divisions. Each program unit was mandated to carry out specific areas of work through subunits. This pattern had the advantage of allowing new subunits to be added as new needs arose and WCC program continued to expand into the 1980s. This organizational pattern was kept intact until the 1990s when another round of restructuring was instituted.

Finance

As of the 1990s, some 75 percent of WCC income came from member churches and their mission and service agencies. However, 96 percent of these monies came from thirteen countries in the West. The Council has no fixed membership fee. Although each member church is encouraged to make an annual contribution to the WCC according to their ability, one-third of the members contribute nothing. With its support coming from various countries, the WCC is acutely affected by fluctuations in the international money markets. The continuing decline in membership of many churches in Europe and North America, traditionally strong supporters of the WCC, has meant declining revenues for these churches with adverse consequences for causes they have supported in the past.

Assemblies

WCC assemblies take place approximately every seven years. Eight have been held since Amsterdam 1948: Evanston 1954, New Delhi 1961, Uppsala 1968, Nairobi 1975, Vancouver 1983, Canberra 1991, and Harare 1998. Constitutionally the general assembly is “the supreme legislative body” of the World Council of Churches. Practically speaking such a group is too unwieldy to serve as an effective decision-making body. Much of the work of an assembly is done by sections or work groups that meet for intense deliberations of draft statements that have been prepared by unit members and staff. These drafts are then brought to the full assembly for plenary debate and approval.

At Amsterdam 1948, the 147 member churches were represented by 351 delegates. This number has grown over the past fifty years. By 1991 the number of member churches had reached 317, with 842 delegates. At the Harare 1998 Assembly the 355 member and associate member churches were represented by 991 delegates.

WCC assemblies serve an important symbolic purpose. The coming together of several thousand Christians from all over the world to spend two weeks in worship and deliberations creates a statement. Frequently WCC assemblies have been accompanied by controversy when WCC leaders have spoken out on sensitive political or social issues or interest groups have tried to bring their concern into the assembly.

In addition to general assemblies, the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, in the tradition of the IMC, continued to hold assemblies every five to seven years. WCC program units have sponsored numerous consultations over the years.

Impact

For fifty years the WCC has been a symbol of ecumenical efforts to promote unity among Orthodox, Anglican, and Protestant churches. Since Vatican Council 2, 1962–1965, cooperation between the WCC and Roman Catholics has grown greatly.

Rather than being an instrument for negotiating church unions, the WCC's role has been to keep alive the vision of a united body of Jesus Christ. This has stimulated theological and ecclesiological explorations of the meaning of koinonia and how it is to be actualized in the life of the church at all levels.

The WCC has sometimes been called an “ecclesiastical United Nations.” The WCC came into existence amid war and international conflict. From its beginning the WCC has taken a strong interest in social and political issues that impinge on church and society and has maintained a staff with expertise in international affairs. Throughout the Cold War the WCC had to walk a fine line. It had member churches located in the Soviet bloc as well as in the West. Many Christians in Asia, Africa, and Latin America did not want to be identified with either bloc—Western or Soviet.

J.H.Oldham, a principal architect of the WCC, insisted that the Christian movement had to enlist the help of “first-class” minds in the study and interpretation of the most important issues of the day. From the beginning the WCC has placed a priority on study and publication. This has created a climate of openness to issues and trends that will influence the future of the church as well as society. For example, the WCC created a Programme to Combat Racism in the early 1970s aimed specifically at regimes in SOUTH AFRICA and ZIMBABWE where minority white governments were denying equal rights of citizenship to black citizens. This proved to be a highly controversial initiative but was consistent with the view that Christians ought to be proactive in addressing injustice. It was during this time that the Unit on Dialogue was established to study and promote dialogue with people of other faiths.

The WCC has continued to address a range of political and social issues. At the 1998 Harare Assembly the report on “Issues of Current Global Concern” included draft sections on international debt, globalization, child soldiers, the status of Jerusalem, and a draft statement on human rights. United Nations secretary general Kofi Annan addressed the assembly by video to enlist continued support by the churches for the human rights movement.

The WCC has experienced persistent tension with two ecclesiastical traditions, the Orthodox and conservative Protestants. On the one hand, Conservative Protestants, including many from churches that are constituents of WCC as well as those that reject such membership, have criticized what they perceive as the WCC's ambivalence toward the Christian mission. Contrary to expectations in 1961 when the WCC absorbed the International Missionary Council, mission and EVANGELISM appear not to have been treated as a priority. On the other hand, the Orthodox Churches have criticized what they see as the WCC's eroding commitment to its original christological basis. In his message to the Harare 1998 Assembly, the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople urged that the WCC address basic theological issues and return to a consideration of the meaning of koinonia in Christ.

See also Ecumenism

References and Further Reading

- Fey, Harold E., ed. A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1948–1968. vol. 2. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1970.
- Hooft, W.A. Visser't. The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1982.
- . Memoirs. Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1973.
- Kessler, Diane, ed. Together on the Way: Official Report of the Eighth Assembly of the World Council of Churches. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1999.
- Rouse, Ruth, and Stephen Charles Neill, eds. A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948. vol. 1, rev. ed. London: SPCK, 1967.
- VanElderen, Marlin. Introducing the World Council of Churches. Geneva, Switzerland: WCC Publications, 1990.

WILBERT R. SHENK

WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL

Heir to the Oecumenical Methodist Conferences, which met at roughly ten-year intervals from 1881, the World Methodist Council (WMC) was founded as a permanent institution in 1951. Its membership consists of some eighty denominations of Methodist origin or, in the case of united churches, having Methodist participation; these denominations include about 70 million adherents worldwide. The Council meets in full session every five years; representation is allotted according to a combination of historical, geographical, and numerical factors. The Council has no legislative authority over the member churches, which retain an autonomy exercised through their own "conferences." It serves mutual consultation and support in theological and practical matters, with standing committees in the areas of ecumenism, education, evangelism, family life, social and international affairs, worship, and youth; it facilitates the short-term exchange of pastorates across national and cultural lines. The Oxford Institute of Methodist Theological Studies meets regularly under the Council's aegis, and other affiliated organizations are the World Federation of Methodist and Uniting Church Women and the World Methodist Historical Society.

At its Rio de Janeiro meeting in 1996, the WMC adopted a statement of "Wesleyan Essentials of Christian Faith," consisting of a concise description of "our beliefs," "our worship," "our witness," "our service," and "our common life." The Council appoints the commissions for bilateral doctrinal dialogue with other world Christian communions and receives their reports. "The Church: Community of Grace" (1984) provided a framework for Lutheran and Methodist churches in several countries to enter into fellowship of word and table. "Together in God's Grace" (1987) assured Methodists and Reformed that their theological differences were not sufficient to justify ecclesial division between them. "Sharing in the Apostolic Communion" (1996) has not so far led to unity between Methodists and Anglicans. The most sustained dialogue is that since 1967 between the WMC and the Roman Catholic Church, which has produced significant statements on the Holy Spirit (1981), the Church (1986), the Apostolic Tradition (1991), Revelation and Faith ("The Word of Life," 1996), and Teaching Authority ("Speaking the Truth in Love," 2001).

The general secretariat of the WMC, with minimal administrative staff, is housed at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina.

See also Anglicanism; Catholic Reactions to Protestantism; Dialogue, Interconfessional; Lutheranism; Methodism

References and Further Reading

- Wainwright, Geoffrey. Methodists in Dialogue. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1996.
- World Methodist Council Handbook of Information 2002–2006*. Lake Junaluska, NC: World Methodist Council, 2002.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE

Commonly called the EDINBURGH MISSIONARY CONFERENCE OF 1910, the World Missionary Conference (WMC) met at Edinburgh, SCOTLAND June 12–23, 1910. It was attended by more than 1,200 delegates, including seventeen Asian representatives. Most were sent as delegates of missionary societies. The WMC was not the first such missionary conference but marks a watershed in the modern mission movement. It brought into focus issues raised by earlier conferences, took steps to address the need for more permanent structures, and set in motion actions that would shape the nature and direction of Protestant MISSIONS for much of the twentieth century. Until 1900 British missions dominated the mission movement by virtue of their experience, number of missionaries, and financial resources. Edinburgh 1910 marked the transition from British to American dominance. Around 1907 the total number of American missionaries serving overseas surpassed the British. The American missionary statesman JOHN R. MOTT was a key initiator of the conference, chaired the planning committee for Edinburgh 1910, and presided at most of the sessions.

Background

From the beginning Protestant foreign missions were characterized by a lack of centralized direction. Missionary initiative typically came from highly motivated individuals or groups without benefit of official sanction. Once they arrived in the field, missionaries quickly discovered the need to cooperate with one another, regardless of DENOMINATION. Missions therefore became a primary engine of Christian unity.

A seminal initiative was the movement called the Concert for Prayer first introduced by a group of clergy in Scotland in 1744. The American theologian JONATHAN EDWARDS took up the idea in his book, An Humble Attempt To Promote Explicit Agreement And Visible Union Among God's People, In Extraordinary Prayer for the Revival of Religion, And the Advancement of Christ's Kingdom On Earth (1747). Edwards's book had widespread influence on both sides of the Atlantic well into the nineteenth century. It stimulated the formation of local prayer groups in support of missions through united Christian action.

Several streams of influence came together in the WMC. First, intermission conferences began to be held on the Continent, starting in Basel in 1837, setting a pattern that would be followed elsewhere. The second stream starts with the EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE (EA) that was organized in 1846 and met periodically thereafter. The EA fostered cooperation and fellowship across denominational lines but did not advocate structural unity. The Union Missionary Conference took place in New York May 4–5, 1854 with famed Scottish missionary Alexander Duff as the main attraction. One hundred fifty-six men were present. Later that year a similar conference was held in London. The Liverpool Conference on Missions in 1860 was better prepared than the previous conferences and the proceedings led to policy recommendations that would guide the administrators of missions for the next generation. This conference laid out a comprehensive agenda concerning the missionary enterprise that future conferences largely followed.

The 1888 London “Centenary Conference” was the first truly international missionary gathering. Approximately 1,600 people attended. Two important ideas resulted. First, it was proposed that a system of comity be introduced that would govern intermission relations in the field to avoid overlap and foster cooperation. Second, the delegates urged that an international missionary conference be held every ten years; however, no mechanism was set up to implement this recommendation.

The New York Ecumenical Missionary Conference in 1900 was seen as a response to this request. It was designed, however, as a public demonstration of support for missions. Held in Carnegie Hall, New York 1900 attracted some 200,000 people between April 21 and May 1. The speakers included former U.S. President Henry Harrison, President William McKinley, and Governor Theodore Roosevelt, along with mission leaders such as John Mott, Sherwood Eddy, and Robert E. Speer. Missionary leaders from Europe participated, but Americans dominated. It was geared to promoting missions rather than grappling with the issues of the day. The Protestant international missionary movement still lacked an organization that might provide continuity by planning regular meetings, working at policy issues, and coordinating joint programs.

Field conferences held in INDIA, CHINA, JAPAN, INDONESIA, AFRICA, and LATIN AMERICA constituted the third stream. In India these conferences were held in North India starting in 1855 and from 1858 in South India. In addition, the India-wide Decennial Conferences were introduced in 1862. These field conferences stimulated awareness of the need for coordination among the missions and helped focus the theological and policy issues that missions were facing.

The fourth stream of influence was the surging Student Volunteer Movement (SVM) that was attracting young people to missionary service in North America, Europe, and Asia. Although some Europeans objected to the SVM slogan, “The Evangelization of the World in this Generation,” it galvanized an entire student generation to missionary action, and Edinburgh 1910 was seen as contributing to fulfillment of this vision.

Conference Organization

The first formal proposal that a major missionary conference be held in 1910 came from William Henry Grant, secretary of the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, when he laid the proposal before British mission secretaries in late 1906. Responding with dispatch, in January 1907 the Scottish group agreed to host such an event. Mott and JOSEPH H. OLDHAM, who were already acquainted through their staff positions in the SVM, quickly became the main architects of the conference, with Mott as chairman and Oldham as secretary of the steering committee. It was agreed that this conference should not follow in the path of New York 1900. Instead, this would be a working consultation based on “masterly” documents prepared from field surveys that would become the basis of concrete action. The planners faced a Herculean task. To accomplish this goal required that a research program be launched immediately to gather data from a broad range of sources. The international steering committee agreed on eight topics and set up commissions to oversee the work of preparing a study volume for each one. A recognized authority in that particular field headed each commission. The process required canvassing widely among missionaries and scholars who possessed expert knowledge in a given topic, getting written responses, distilling key findings, and then writing a synthesis. All of this had to be completed to allow a published volume to be ready for purchase by May 1, 1910, six weeks before the start of the conference.

The eight subjects selected were: Carrying the Gospel to all the Non-Christian World; The Church in the Mission Field; Education in Relation to the Christianisation of National Life; The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions; The Preparation of Missionaries; The Home Base of Missions; Missions and Governments; and Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity. These became the titles of the eight preparatory volumes of Edinburgh 1910. Although the WMC has been characterized as focusing primarily on the means of carrying out the missionary mandate, this is not an entirely fair assessment. Edinburgh 1910 put the focus on the church more than on missions. The second report declared that “The Church in the Mission Field” is “itself now the great mission to the non-Christian world.” This brought a theological breadth to the theology of mission hitherto lacking. The report went on: “The whole world is the mission field, and there is no church that is not a church in the mission field.” This theme would be picked up with new urgency at the International Missionary Conference (IMC) at Madras in 1938.

The fourth preparatory volume, The Missionary Message in Relation to Non-Christian Religions, devoted chapters to five different religious traditions: Chinese, Japanese, Islam, Hindu, and animistic religions. To treat the latter theme, replies to an extensive questionnaire from twenty-five missionaries, representing several continents, were analyzed and summarized by a committee of three experts. The replies fell into five discrete models. The quality of the material demonstrates the intellectual engagement of field missionaries with their contexts. Analysis also shows the way a missionary’s ecclesiastical heritage, theological tradition, anthropological theory, facility in the language of the host culture, and intellectual interaction with cultural issues shaped theory. The general conclusions to this volume emphasized “we have here much that casts light on the New Testament period and on the early centuries of the Christian Church.” Consequently, it was argued, these findings are essential to an understanding of “the inner course of the New Testament thought.” In other words, the West stood in need of the insights to be gained through intercultural studies.

Three of the preparatory volumes spoke to the theme of Christian unity and contributed to the emergence of the conciliar movement. The first report emphasized the fact that the missionary mandate was as yet unfulfilled and that a united response was called for. The second report drew attention to “a growing spirit of love and unity among Christians” and the imperative to “seek fellowship with all Christians.” The eighth report was devoted entirely to a review of relations among missions and churches and in the conclusion noted that the "Church in the mission field" may be leading the way in healing the divisions of the church in the West. Bishop Charles H. Brent, of the Episcopal Church in the Philippines and a delegate to Edinburgh 1910, was deeply impressed with the need to work for Christian unity and urged that a conference on Faith and Order be convened to guide the churches toward this goal.

The outstanding quality of these reports provided, for the first time, a reliable basis for decision making concerning the future of the missionary enterprise. This accounts for the impact these reports had on the conference as well as their long-term influence. The process also established a model for future ecumenical consultation and formulation of common issues.

One hundred fifty-six mission societies from fourteen countries sent delegates to Edinburgh 1910. Fifty-nine American societies were represented. The International Committee encouraged societies to include in their delegations some of their "leading missionaries" as well as "one or two natives" if practicable. No discussion of doctrinal questions was to be allowed and the word "ecumenical" would not be used because it was subject to misinterpretation and might divert attention from the basic purpose of the conference.

Edinburgh 1910 stood in the line of missionary conferences that had been held since 1854, but it broke new ground. This conference was limited to societies that had missionaries at work in the field among non-Christian peoples. (This excluded missions sending workers to Europe, the Middle East, and Latin America.) Representation was proportional to the size of budget of each society. By this time many of the leading mission societies were either a part of their denominational structures or closely related. This gave the conference a strong ecclesiastical dimension.

One Indian delegate was present at the 1860 Liverpool Conference and made a contribution to the theme of BIBLE TRANSLATION. Several Asians attended subsequent conferences, but not as official representatives. By contrast seventeen Asians came to Edinburgh 1910 as delegates and exerted influence out of proportion to their numbers. Especially memorable was the address by Bishop V.S. Azariah, who pleaded for a new basis of relationship between the emerging churches of Asia and Africa and the Western churches.

Significance and Results of Edinburgh 1910

The World Missionary Conference was a seminal event. Earlier conferences were devoted to discussion of common issues and educating the Christian public. This conference was probably the most comprehensive ecclesiastical gathering to date. Earlier meetings had been influenced by their relationship to the Evangelical Alliance, whereas Edinburgh 1910 attracted the full spectrum of Protestants engaged in foreign missions. It was consultative and geared to formulating a possible common course of action in the future. It brought into focus themes and issues that had been raised by previous international missionary conferences, dealt with them in some depth, and then decided on further steps. The specific results fell into three groups.

First, it was agreed to establish an international coordinating council. The first step was to elect a Continuation Committee, with John Mott as chair, to develop a proposal. Significantly, three of the committee members were Christian leaders from India, China, and Japan. It was anticipated that such a council would sponsor continuing study and research into missions practice. Although the International Missionary Council was not formally organized until 1921—delayed in part by World War I—the International Review of Missions was launched in 1912 with Oldham as editor. Oldham was the ideal person for this role. He possessed a wide-ranging intellect, keen perception of the leading issues, and a wide network of contacts. He used the IRM to encourage scholarly exploration and discussion.

The second outcome was clarification of the principle on which such an international body would operate. It was determined that this council would serve the member bodies without requiring that they surrender their own integrity and relationships to their constituent churches. The principle, proposed by the Americans and Germans, was that a council is servant of its member bodies; and operating policies are determined by each of the members. The council's work would depend entirely on the wisdom and resources brought to it by its member bodies and reflected back in the form of policy positions and recommended actions. The council could not compel compliance; it could only commend for consideration.

A third outcome of the WMC was the important impetus Edinburgh 1910 gave to the creation of the infrastructure of the Protestant conciliar movement. Between October 1912 and May 1913 Mott traveled to Asia where he held eighteen regional and three national conferences in Burma [Myanmar], Ceylon [Sri Lanka], China, India, Japan, KOREA, and Malaya [Malaysia]. Both national church leaders and missionaries were included in these consultations. These "situation conferences" were designed to highlight the issues being faced by the churches in that nation or region, encourage indigenous responsibility, and identify issues that affected comity, cooperation, and unity among Christian groups. Although the momentum Mott's visits had generated was interrupted by World War I, ultimately he laid the groundwork for the organization of Christian councils in most of these countries. These would be indispensable in the development of the conciliar movement.

Subsequently the Life and Work (1925) and Faith and Order (1927) movements were also organized. In 1948 several of these strands were brought together in the founding of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In 1961 the IMC was integrated into the WCC and renamed the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism.

References and Further Reading

- Askew, Thomas A. "The 1888 London Centenary Missions Conference: Ecumenical Disappointment or American Missions Coming of Age?" International Bulletin of Missionary Research 18 no. 3 (1994):113–118.

———. “The New York 1900 Ecumenical Missionary Conference: A Centennial Reflection.”

International Bulletin of Missionary Research 24 no. 4 (2000):146–154.

Friesen, J. Stanley. Missionary Responses to Tribal Religions at Edinburgh 1910. New York: Peter Lang, 1996.

Gairdner, W.H.T. “Edinburgh 1910”: An Account and Interpretation of the World Missionary Conference. Edinburgh and London: Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 1910.

Hogg, W. Richey. Ecumenical Foundations: A History of the International Missionary Council And Its Nineteenth Century Background. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1952.

Rouse, Ruth, and Stephen Neill, eds. A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948. 2nd ed. London: SPCK, 1967.

World Missionary Conference. 8 preparatory vols.; 1 vol. of records and plenary addresses. Edinburgh and London: Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 1910.

WILBERT R. SHENK

WORLD VISION

World Vision is a Christian humanitarian organization whose mission is “To call people to a life-changing commitment to serve the poor in the name of Christ.” World Vision was founded in 1951 by Dr. Bob Pierce as an effort to help children abandoned in the Korean War. It was in this early stage of development in 1953 that World Vision initiated its first child sponsorship program in KOREA. The sponsorships program invited Americans to provide necessary financial support for the education, health assistance, and nutrition for the child. In the 1990s World Vision began a family sponsorship program. Both child and family sponsorships have also been operating in other Asian countries and in LATIN AMERICA and AFRICA.

World Vision also began incorporating vocational and agricultural training for families into its sponsorship efforts, and parents began learning to farm and earn money through small enterprises. These efforts to affect self-sustainable change evolved into World Vision’s community development efforts. Long-term development has proven central to bringing lasting hope to the people. After meeting immediate survival needs, World Vision works with communities to help them move toward self-reliance. While communities work toward self-sufficiency World Vision often provides fresh water wells and sanitation facilities, supplemental food, farming tools and seeds, loans for small businesses, and medicine. Local leaders actively participate in determining the future of their communities. In this way dignity is restored and a new cycle of hope inspires communities in their efforts for a better future. Most of World Vision’s financial support for these efforts come from the UNITED STATES. In an effort to reach more resources, and to expose more individuals to the needs of others, World Vision formed World Vision International (WVI) in 1980. Today this partnership oversees sponsorship, relief, rehabilitation, and community development projects in 103 countries.

References and Further Reading

- Andrade, Susana. Vision Mundial: Entre el Cielo y la Tierra: Religión y Desarrollo en la Sierra. Quito, Ecuador: Ceplaes, 1990.
- Paeth, Scott, Max L.Stackhouse, and Tim Dearborn, eds. The Local Church in a Global Era: Reflections for a New Century. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 2000.
- World Vision International-Christian Relief and Development Organization.
<http://worldvisioninternational.org/>

MAUREEN KELLY

WORLD'S PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS

The World's Parliament of Religions of 1893, a part of the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, was hailed as the greatest interreligious assembly in history. During its seventeen days, about 170 religious leaders representing some twenty-five Christian sects and denominations and ten different religious traditions presented 200 papers, sermons, and speeches, addressing philosophy and theology, race issues, the role of women in religion, the future of world missions, and the prospects for universal human progress. For several years, the parliament generated controversy as concerned parties attempted to discern in it the signs of the time. By the opening of the twentieth century, however, the event had been largely forgotten, except by those who warmly recalled the roles played there by prominent Buddhist and Hindu delegates from Asia. In the 1980s the approaching centennial of the parliament renewed interest in it, leading to a large-scale commemoration of the event, once again in Chicago, called a Parliament for the World's Religions.

Anglo-American Protestants played a key role in conceiving and organizing the original parliament. Charles Carroll Bonney, a Chicago lawyer and Swedenborgian, conceived of it as capstone of the World's Congress Auxiliary, a series of international conferences devoted to humanities, sciences, law, medicine, business, and other professions. John Henry Barrows (1847–1902), pastor at Chicago's First Presbyterian church, led the auxiliary's Department of Religion. Under his direction, fourteen local Protestant ministers, a Chicago rabbi, and the diocesan Catholic archbishop coordinated meetings for some forty denominational, interdenominational, and special interest groups, all of which were designed to culminate in the parliament.

Issues articulated by Protestants also set the tone for the gathering. Henry Harris Jessup (1832–1910), a Presbyterian missionary, succinctly expressed the ethnic, geopolitical, and theological foundations for America's domestic and global missions, a recurrent leitmotif at the Parliament. The discussion of women's contributions to religion was much noted, but of the eighteen women present, fifteen represented Protestant denominations or movements. George Dana Boardman, an American Baptist, closed the assembly on a powerful postmillennial note, capturing a progressive and visionary current that ran throughout the assembly.

Religious Liberalism Ascendant

Infused with an optimistic mood contemporaries called “the Columbian spirit,” the parliament often masked conflict with consensus rhetoric. Within Protestantism itself, there was ample evidence of growing tensions between progressives and conservatives that would soon lead to the liberal-fundamentalist schism. The much-noted presence of New England celebrities such as Edward Everett Hale (1822–1909), Thomas Wentworth Higginson (1823–1911), and Julia Ward Howe (1819–1910) led some conservatives to dismiss the parliament as a Unitarian affair, but Lyman Abbott (1835–1922), Theodore Munger, and WASHINGTON GLADDEN (1836–1918; Congregational), Charles Briggs, (1841–1913; Presbyterian) and Richard T.Ely (1854–1943; Episcopalian) lent the proceedings an authority both religiously liberal and specifically Protestant Christian. Conservative Protestants, among them Joseph Cook (Congregational) and James Dennis and George Pentecost (1842–1920; Presbyterian), also gave forceful presentations, but their remarks, while warmly received in many quarters, did little to correct the impression that the parliament signaled the ascendance of Protestant liberalism.

This ascendance was underscored by presentations made by Jews and Catholics who echoed the liberalism of Protestant speakers. Emil Hirsch (1851–1923), Kaufmann Kohler (1843–1926), and Isaac Meyer Wise spoke for the progressive spirit of Reform Judaism, while Archbishop John Gibbons and Bishop John Keane, two leading “Americanizers,” represented forms of Catholic liberalism that would subsequently draw criticism from Rome. While Jews, Catholics, and Protestant liberals emphasized theological and institutional propositions unique to their respective traditions, their friendly rivalry at the parliament anticipated the “triple-melting pot” popularized by Will Herberg in the 1950s.

The parliament’s liberalism gained additional strength from the prominent role played by the emergent field of comparative religion. European scholars such as F.Max Müller, J.Estlin Carpenter, and Jean (1794–1861), and Albert Réville (1826–1906) sent papers promoting it as a new science and introducing a humanistic interpretation of religion into discussions at the assembly. As importantly, comparative religion was invoked by many delegates in the form of an applied science supporting the idea that Christianity was the most highly evolved of all religions and, as such, fulfilled other traditions. This “fulfillment thesis” was a powerful apologetic tool favored by liberals who scorned the more conservative, exclusionary approach that dismissed non-Christian religions outright, especially those from Asia.

An Enduring Legacy

With good reason, the parliament became identified with the well-received presentations by Asians such as Protap Chunder Majumdar and Vivekananda (1863–1902) (Hinduism) and Anagarika Dharmapala (1864–1933; Buddhism). By casting their traditions in a modernist, progressive mode, they underscored the liberal spirit of the parliament. More importantly, they set into motion the Hindu and Buddhist missions to the West, which eventually resulted in the broad interest in interreligious dialogue and in Asian religions, which marked the twentieth century.

The Asians' success, along with the prominence of Jews and Catholics at the parliament, was a source of great concern to many conservative Protestants who saw the assembly as an assault on evangelical America, one fostered by liberal coreligionists. They also saw in the parliament an incipient alliance of new forces they feared would redefine the American religious mainstream in the twentieth century. The World's Parliament of Religions was an important event in its day and remains of symbolic importance to American Protestantism and American religion generally. It marked the rise to prominence of religious liberalism and of interreligious dialogue and the growing complexity of America's religious landscape. It also recalls a time when Anglo-American Protestantism confidently defined the American religious mainstream.

References and Further Reading

- Kitagawa, Joseph. "The World's Parliament of Religions and Its Legacy." Eleventh John Nuveen Lecture. Chicago: University of Chicago Divinity School, 1983.
- Seager, Richard Hughes. The Dawn of Religious Pluralism: Voices from the World's Parliament of Religions, 1893. LaSalle, IL: Open Court Publishing Company, 1993.
- , ed. The World's Parliament of Religions: The East/West Encounter, Chicago, 1893. Religion in North America Series. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1995.
- Ziolkowsky, Eric J., ed. A Museum of Faiths: Histories and Legacies of the 1893 World's Parliament of Religions. AAR Classics in the Study of Religion Series. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1993.

RICHARD HUGHES SEAGER

WORMS, DIET OF

The most celebrated of the long series of imperial diets held at Worms, at which MARTIN LUTHER defended his teaching before emperor Charles V, took place from January 27 to May 25, 1521. After his coronation in Aachen, Charles V had announced on November 1, 1520 his first diet to be convened in Worms on January 6, 1521. The emperor arrived in Worms on November 28, 1520, but the diet did not open until January 27, 1521. At its conclusion, the imperial assembly was one of the most significant in the history of the empire in the sixteenth century.

In his announcement for the diet, the emperor proposed an agenda that included the maintenance of law and public peace, public and constitutional order, regulations for the execution of imperial affairs in times of the emperor's absence, financial assistance for the emperor's journey to Rome, and the recovery of lost imperial territories. These topics reflected, in the view of the German territorial ruler, the hope that power and responsibilities would be reallocated in the empire. The emperor, meanwhile, professed the monarchical character of his rule and endeavored to strengthen his authority and centralize power. The ensuing deliberations of the diet were affected by the growing conflict between Charles V and FRANCE, the tensions between Charles and Pope Leo X, the renewed Turkish threat, the Comunero uprisings in Spain, general considerations regarding the governance of those territories bound to Charles through personal fealty, and, finally, by the "Luther affair."

On May 26 the emperor promulgated the recess of the diet with provisions pertaining to governmental administration, judicial procedures, public order, and an imperial tax authority for financing the emperor's formal journey to Rome as well as the support of governmental administration and the courts. The new judicial procedures and the imperial taxation registration proved to be permanent institutions. Regulations pertaining to safety and public order did not come into being because no agreement could be reached on central economic questions. In its results the diet of Worms ended the imperial reform movement and strengthened the emperor's power and authority through various compromises. For example, the longstanding demand for an imperial governance structure involving the estates was honored only with respect to times when the emperor was absent; this structure, moreover, was to be presided over by the emperor's representative, the archchancellor of the empire, the archbishop of Mainz. The decisions of this Imperial Regiment (Reichsregiment) on key issues had to be approved by the emperor.

The papal legate Girolamo Aleander arrived at Worms on November 30, 1520 and put the case against Luther forward on February 13, 1521. The "Luther case" (causa Lutheri), which originally had not been a matter for consideration, was placed on the agenda at the insistence of the Saxon Elector Frederick III (called "the Wise"), who had support from the estates. On February 19, 1521 the estate refused to approve an imperial mandate against Luther and discussions began about giving Luther a hearing before the diet.

Luther was subsequently granted safe passage to Worms. The assembled members of the diet were scarcely aware that, with the official declaration of the centrality of conscience of one individual, the course was set for the division of Western Christendom into various confessions. Luther arrived in Worms on April 16. On April 18 he declared his final refusal to recant his teachings, according to an early but unreliable tradition. Charles V announced the following day his resolve to take firm measures against him. After additional discussions with him, Luther departed from Worms on April 26. Later the “EDICT OF WORMS” against Luther and his followers, dated May 8, was signed by Charles V on May 26, 1521. This edict, which was not part of the formal recess of the diet, had been drafted by the papal legate Aleander but had been reworked by the imperial court with the intent of strengthening the authority of the emperor and claiming authority for the German rulers.

Another agenda item at Worms was the discussion of grievances against Rome and the church (gravamina nationis germanicae) as advocated especially by Duke George of Saxony. The estates had threatened—in case these grievances were not considered—to ignore the emperor’s wishes and to block the recess. The difficulty lay in the fact that the emperor’s advisers, headed by Chièvres and Gattinara, were influenced mainly by foreign-policy concerns, whereas the estates were chiefly motivated by political and legal considerations regarding ecclesiastical affairs, but also by their concern over the possibility of a mass movement in support of Luther.

Luther’s statement and refusal to revoke during the hearing of April 17–18 proved to be the reason that the diet took on world-historical significance. With his appearance at the diet of Worms, the question of AUTHORITY was no longer an inner ecclesiastical dispute but a question that touched the basis of late medieval church and society.

See also Lutheranism; Reformation

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Balan, P., ed. Monumenta Reformationis Lutherana ex Tabulariis S. Sedis Secretis, 1521–1525. Ratisbonae (Regensburg), Germany, 1883.

Brieger, Theodor. Aleander und Luther, 1521 Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte 1. Gotha, Germany, 1884.

———. Deutsche Reichstagsakten. Jüngere Reihe 2: Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Kaiser Karl V. [Der Reichstag zu Worms 1521]. Edited by Adolf Wrede. Gotha, Germany: 1896 [reprint Göttingen, Germany, 1962].

Iserloh, Erwin, and Peter Fabisch, eds. Dokumente zur Causa Lutheri (1517–1521). 2 vols. Münster, Germany: Aschendorf, 1991.

Kohler, Alfred, ed. Quellen zur Geschichte Karls V. Darmstadt, Germany: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1990.

Secondary Sources:

Borth, Wilhelm. “Die Luthersache (causa Lutheri) 1517–1524.” In Die Anfänge der Reformation als Frage von Politik und Recht. Lübeck, Germany: Matthiesen Verlag, 1970.

Kalkoff, Paul. Depeschen und Berichte über Luther vom Wormser Reichstage 1521. Halle, Germany: Niemeyer, 1898.

———. Der Wormser Reichstag von 1521. Biographische und quellenkritische Studien zur Reformationsgeschichte. Munich, Germany, 1922.

Lutz, Heinrich. Das Reich, Karl V. und der Beginn der Reformation. Bemerkungen zu Luther in Worms 1521. In Heinrich Fichtenau and Erich Zöllner, eds. [Beiträge zur neueren Geschichte Österreichs.] Vienna, Austria: Böhlau, 1974.

Olivier, Daniel. Der Fall Luther. Geschichte einer Verurteilung 1517–1521. Stuttgart, Germany: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1972.

Reuter, F., ed. Der Reichstag zu Worms von 1521: Reichspolitik und Luthersache. Worms: Norberg, 1971.

Rupp, E.G. Luther's Progress to the Diet of Worms, 1521. New York, 1964.

MARKUS WRIEDT

WORMS, EDICT OF

With the edict of Worms, the ecclesiastical and secular process against MARTIN LUTHER formally came to an end. The papal bull “exsurge Domine” of June 15, 1520 had called on Luther to obey the church and to revoke forty-four incriminating sentences. Although the Wittenberg theologian refused to do so and publicly demonstrated his resistance by burning the papal document together with other books of ecclesiastical law and a scholastic handbook, Pope Leo X (1513–1521) excommunicated him January 3, 1521 with the bull “Decet Romanum pontificem.” Following the routine of late medieval law against heretics, the secular authority had to step in and execute the sentence. Thus the papal legate, Girolamo Aleander, arrived at Worms on November 30, 1520 to convince the emperor and the territorial rulers to pass an edict against Luther and his followers.

The Luther case (causa Lutheri) originally had not been a matter for consideration of the diet. It was placed on the agenda because the ruler of Saxony, Frederick III (“the Wise” [1486–1525]) hindered the routine process and forced the emperor to give Luther a hearing at Worms, a notion supported by many German estates. On February 19, 1521 the estates refused to approve an imperial mandate against Luther. Luther was subsequently granted safe passage to Worms and arrived in Worms on April 16. On April 18 he refused to recant his teachings, unless convinced by the testimony of Scripture, and, according to an early but unreliable tradition, by the logical evidence of reason. Charles V announced on the following day his resolve to take firm measures against Luther. In a formal statement that was read in French to the rulers he offered both a pious statement of his catholic belief and a public declaration of his future politics with regard to the reform grievances. He claimed AUTHORITY for the whole of Christianity (corpus christianorum), whose unity must not be destroyed by a single individual.

Luther departed from Worms on April 26. A few days later the draft of an edict against Luther and his followers, dated May 8, was introduced to the assembly in Worms by Girolamo Aleander. Because of the resistance of several German estates including Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz, this draft statement did not become part of the formal recess of the Diet. Instead it was reworked by the imperial court in the direction of strengthening the authority of the emperor and claiming authority for German rulers. Charles V signed it belatedly by May 26, 1521. In it he claimed authority as the protector of the Christian faith in the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation and referred extensively to the history of Luther’s process. Partially the edict reformulated passages of Charles’s confession and the speech of the papal legate Aleander of February 13, 1521. The edict also noted the united forces of ecclesiastical and secular authorities as prescribed in medieval law against heretics.

Because many German estates did not accept the edict, it was executed only occasionally and did not thwart the reform in Wittenberg or electoral Saxony. On the contrary; even though it was the strongest means for the persecution of reformers in the German Empire for the emperor and his followers, it was not successful. The estates used their resistance to reach compromises in financing the imperial administration and the war against the Turks. Charles V did not want to battle against the estates, but the unity of the Holy Roman Empire had been disrupted. Thus the elector of Saxony asked Charles V not to bother him with the edict of Worms. It seems that the emperor heeded his request. The question of religion focusing on the edict of Worms came on the agenda of future diets. The final solution came in 1555 at the diet of Augsburg and was strengthened nearly a century later by the Peace of Osnabrück in 1648.

See also Lutheranism; Reformation

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Brieger, Theodor. Aleander und Luther. 1521.

———. Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte. vol. 1. Gotha, Germany: Perthes, 1884.

———. Deutsche Reichstagsakten. Jüngere Reihe 2: Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Kaiser Karl V. (Der Reichstag zu Worms 1521). Edited by Adolf Wrede, 643–661. Gotha, Germany: Perthes, 1896 [reprint Göttingen, Germany, 1962].

Iserloh, Erwin, and Peter Fabisch, eds. Dokumente zur Causa Lutheri (1517–1521). 2 vols. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff, 1991.

Kohler, Alfred, ed. Quellen zur Geschichte Karls V. Darmstadt, Germany: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1990.

Secondary Sources:

Borth, Wilhelm. Die Luthersache (causa Lutheri) 1517–1524. Die Anfänge der Reformation als Frage von Politik und Recht. Lübeck, Germany: Matthiesen Verlag, 1970.

Bäumer, Remigius, ed. Lutherprozeß und Lutherbann. Münster, Germany: Aschendorff, 1972.

Kalkoff, Paul. Der Wormser Reichstag von 1521 Biographische und quellenkritische Studien zur Reformationsgeschichte. Munich, Germany: Oldenbourg, 1922.

Lutz, Heinrich. “Das Reich, Karl V. und der Beginn der Reformation. Bemerkungen zu Luther in Worms 1521.” In Beiträge zur neueren Geschichte Österreichs, edited by Heinrich Fichtenau and Erich Zöllner, 47–70. Vienna, Austria, 1974.

Olivier, Daniel. Der Fall Luther. Geschichte einer Verurteilung 1517–1521. Stuttgart, Germany: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1972.

Reuter, F., ed. Der Reichstag zu Worms von 1521: Reichspolitik und Luthersache Worms. 2nd ed. Cologne, Germany: Böhlau Verlag, 1981. Supplement: Luther in Worms. Worms, Germany, 1973.

Rupp, Gordon. Luther's Progress to the Diet of Worms, 1521. New York: Harper & Row, 1964.

MARKUS WRIEDT

WORSHIP

Christian worship is addressed to the triune God. It is the objective articulation in ritual form of the beliefs or confession of a particular group of Christians, and it is also the subjective enactment or embodiment of the faith that is believed. The theologies of worship of the Protestant denominations show different nuances and emphases, yet most emerge from the identifiably Christian theological markers established by the ecumenical creeds. Worship practices may vary by DENOMINATION and even within a particular denomination, because theological and confessional perspectives help shape the structure, content, and style of worship, as do, to at least some extent, cultural context and local dynamics. Even from the early days of the REFORMATION, it was clear that there would be divergences in the theologies and practice of Protestant worship: the thirteenth of the Marburg Articles (1529) acknowledged that “what is called tradition or human ordinances in spiritual or ecclesiastical matters, provided they do not plainly contradict the word of God, may be freely kept or abolished in accordance with the needs of the people...” Protestants regard Scripture as the principal AUTHORITY for their worship, although a range of interpretations exist on precisely what does and does not “contradict the word of God.”

What Worship Is

In reaction to what has been perceived as the human “work” of the Catholic mass, Protestants have preferred to emphasize worship as an act of faith offered in grateful response to the generous GRACE and mercy of God. God grants the gift of FAITH by which worship is made possible; and consequences of worship include the growth and strengthening of faith as well as a deeper union with God. This dialogue in worship, discernable as a pattern of “call” and “response,” MARTIN LUTHER recognized in the German word for worship, Gottesdienst, which can simultaneously mean God’s service to us and our service to God. God speaks, especially in and through scripture, but also by the entire history of SALVATION. Christians then speak to God in their common language with praise, PRAYER, and sometimes, lament, by the aid of the God’s own Spirit (Romans 8:26). God is the first actor in worship, who in turn expects a reply. Worship is thus not only a conversation, but also an encounter with the living God.

By God’s grace, faith is instilled in the individual and in the assembly called the CHURCH, resulting in an outpouring of worship. Indeed, some Protestants would claim that God created human beings and the church for worship, and that worship therefore is their principal reason for existence. Humanity’s chief and highest end, says the Westminster Shorter Catechism (1647) (see WESTMINSTER CATECHISM), is “to glorify God and to enjoy him forever.” According to JOHN CALVIN in his Commentary on Psalm 33:1, God made the church by adoption “for the express purpose that his name may be duly praised by witnesses suitable for such a work.” The “more closely and diligently” God’s people consider God’s works, remarked Calvin on Psalm 33:3, “the more will they exert themselves in his praises.” Numerous Protestant doctrinal statements and CATECHISMS over the generations have defined the church mainly in terms of worship. The AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530/1540) that would influence Lutheran congregations and other Protestant bodies identified the church as “the congregation of saints [the assembly of all believers] in which the Gospel is rightly taught [purely preached] and the SACRAMENTS rightly administered [according to the Gospel].”

Who Is Worshipped

Protestants have regarded the first and second commandments of the Decalogue (or Ten Commandments) as definitively restricting worship to God revealed as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Neither worship nor invocation is to be made to angels, any other creature, or SAINTS; Christ alone is mediator and intercessor. “We love [the saints] and also honor them; yet not with any kind of worship but by an honorable opinion of them and just praises of them” (Second HELVETIC CONFESSION, 1561). Exemplary Christians who have gone on to the nearer presence of God may, however, serve as models for faith and charitable works, and in some Protestant communities, both the faithful and newcomers are explicitly invited to imitate them.

Alliance is given to the triune God through prayer formulations, by, for example, the classical and broadly Christian offering of prayer to the Father, through the Son, and in the Holy Spirit and by trinitarian doxological ascriptions (e.g., the “Gloria Patri”). Eucharistic prayers sometimes take on a trinitarian shape and content, such as those prayers produced since the mid-twentieth century that are based on fourth-century Antiochene models. However, some denominations in their worship may give emphasis to one particular person of the Godhead. Although Protestants in general recognize that “at the name of Jesus every knee should bend” (Philippians 2:10) and that worship is made “in the name of Jesus,” some independent evangelical denominations interpret that al-most Christomonistically. Other groups, notably Pentecostals (see PENTECOSTALISM) and quakers (see FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF), wait on the outpouring of the Spirit as the defining feature of their worship.

Time for Worship

Like other Christians, Protestants organize their times for worship according to daily, weekly, and annual cycles. Following the instruction of the fourth commandment in the Decalogue, Protestants have determined to “remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy.” The vast majority have observed the first day of the week (Sunday), the day of resurrection, as the Lord’s Day or Christian Sabbath and regarded it as the primary occasion for congregational worship. To varying degrees of intensity, and less so overall among more recent generations, Protestants strove to reserve this day for the Lord alone. The fifty-sixth of the Irish Articles of Religion (1615) instructed, “the Lord’s day is wholly to be dedicated unto the service of God; and therefore we are bound therein to rest from our common and daily business, and to bestow that leisure upon holy exercises, both public and private.” The Church Order of the Free Reformed Churches of North America (2003) called for assembling on the Lord’s Day for “at least” two worship services in which the Word of God is preached. Sabbatarians (see SABBATARIANISM) in different times and places have tried to enforce ecclesiastical and civic laws to preserve the sanctity of the Lord’s day, with the Puritans of England and New England (see PURITANISM) perhaps among the best known.

A handful of denominations, among them the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, have preferred to worship on Saturday on account of their understanding Exodus 20:8 to mean that the seventh day, not the first, is the biblical Sabbath commanded by God.

Because of the biblical injunction to pray without ceasing, and because Christians believe that they ought to avail themselves of every opportunity for meeting with God and with other faithful, Protestant Christians have always advocated worship during the course of the week in the congregation, in small groups or societies, in families, and individually in private. Some Reformation churches from their origins took up portions of the Roman Catholic LITURGY of the hours in formal rites, and, after periods of decline, rediscovered the rhythm of prayer throughout the day. THOMAS CRANMER, for his BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, conflated five offices to produce the services of morning prayer (from Matins, Lauds, and Prime) and evening prayer (from Vespers and Compline) that became the standard for later revisions across the Anglican communion (see ANGLICANISM). As a result of the twentieth-century liturgical renewal, new interest in structured texts for prayer at different times of day arose in denominations with no or a weak tradition of formal daily offices. Yet even in those denominations lacking authorized ritual texts for daily prayer, morning and evening prayer was strongly encouraged, particularly in families. To aid family and private devotions, guides or models or prepared texts for prayer were published by private authors and denominational presses, even in denominations that ordinarily frowned on the use of printed prayers in corporate worship and preferred instead “spirit-led” extemporaneous or spontaneous prayer.

For many Protestants, historically and more recently, weekly corporate prayer outside of the main Sunday service has often taken the shape of an informal gathering on Sunday night or midweek. Prayer meetings may be led either by CLERGY or LAITY, and can comprise all-comers or be divided by some criteria, most often age, gender, or spiritual maturity. Evangelical Protestants in particular have found great benefit from these gatherings and from extended prayer and preaching or testimony sessions called “REVIVALS” or protracted meetings. Stories abound from the American frontier on how prayer meetings helped to both Christianize and civilize an unruly population.

With the Protestant Reformation, yearly temporal calendars for the liturgical days and seasons and sanctoral (saints’) calendars were either modified (e.g., Lutherans and Anglicans) or expunged (e.g., Anabaptists and some Reformed). Early Lutherans kept festivals and fasts that had a christological dimension and that highlighted persons and salvation events portrayed in Scripture. The Scottish Book of Discipline (1560), on the other hand, forbade the observance of “papist” and unscriptural holy days, including Christmas. Such extremes in perspective have continued across Protestantism, though some denominations that previously deplored the liturgical calendar have come (sometimes with hesitation) to embrace it. Protestants, especially Reformed and “FREE CHURCH,” have been much more reticent in introducing saints’ calendars, though in the twentieth century some denominations began to do so. The UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA (a union in 1977 of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Methodists) included in its first worship book a “Calendar of Other Commemorations” that listed ninety-five names, among them biblical figures and apostles and Christian thinkers, reformers, pioneers, and witnesses with representatives from the early church to the end of the twentieth century. Free church Protestants in some places have been more willing instead to integrate denominational or congregational observances (e.g., Bible Sunday, “blanket Sunday,” or the yearly revival) as well as civic festivals (e.g., Mothers’ Day) into an annual cycle.

Places for Worship

Protestants, it seems, have always been opportunists regarding places for worship, because of the conviction that the worship of God does not require a particular location or structure. Sixteenth-century Protestants did not immediately worry about church construction; they simply occupied already available ecclesiastical edifices or met in private buildings or homes. The CHURCH OF ENGLAND was confronted for the first time with a demand for buildings following the great fire of London in 1666 that destroyed sixty-seven parishes churches and St. Paul’s Cathedral; the architectural skills of Sir CHRISTOPHER WREN were then engaged for reconstruction. As new Protestant denominations or communities emerge, they meet in whatever space is available to them: foundries, warehouses, storefronts, boats and docks, schoolhouses, courthouses, barns, open fields, brush arbors.

Despite the view that the worship of God cannot be limited to a particular space, the physical configuration of the place for worship is extremely important and directly shapes and gives meaning to what occurs there. Typically as a denomination becomes more established, it seeks a more “churchly” venue (however defined) set apart for its worship. A group’s theology of worship plays a direct role in the configuration of a worship space: a simple meeting house and an ornate, high-ceilinged Gothic structure convey different perspectives on the human encounter with the divine. Popular architectural trends in the wider society also impact the construction of Protestant places of worship, positively and negatively. CHURCH ARCHITECTURE thus signals a definition of worship as well as a group’s self-understanding within the wider culture, including its economic viability. Changes in theology of worship or self-perception may create conflicts with an already existing space and may require renovation of the premises or a completely new building.

For example, the spatial location of reading desk (ambo or pulpit), altar table, and baptistery or baptismal font in relationship to each other and to the gathered congregation has changed as perspectives on worship have changed, leading sometimes to a reconfiguration of the space.

Because of the emphasis on the word of God and PREACHING, across Protestantism the reading desk has usually been given a central location within the space. The reading of the BIBLE and its exposition may occur at a single furnishing, or the two actions may be carried out at separate desks identified as pulpit (for preaching) and lectern (for scripture reading and other liturgical readings). The altar table (see ALTARS) carries the double meaning of a place of sacrifice (altaria) and place of fellowship (mensa); Protestants have differed on which meaning is to receive the most emphasis. The sacrament of the LORD'S SUPPER is celebrated at the altar table, which may be located centrally near the congregation or placed at the far end (historically the east end) of the space. The size and location of the baptistery or baptismal font depend on the theological interpretation given to BAPTISM and on the mode of baptism that is preferred. Those denominations that build an indoor facility for immersion or submersion baptism have pools long and deep enough to accommodate an adult. These pools may be located at one end of the building or, as in the case of some English Baptist structures, in the floor near or underneath the pulpit (and covered with boards when not in use). Late twentieth-century experiments with baptisteries often located them on a sight line with the reading desk and altar table, sometimes offset at the side or at the entrance to the worship space as a sign of entry into the community of faith.

The placement of the congregation in the space identifies a denomination's understanding of the role of the people in worship. Protestant buildings usually have been configured either as a single room for laity and clergy or as a divided room in which the people and the worship leaders (clergy and choir) are separated by a high barrier (e.g., the rood screen in Gothic and Gothic revival churches) or low barrier. The people may be seated in chairs, pews, or even enclosed box pews. Some denominations have a history of pew rentals by which persons paid for the privilege of sitting in a specified location, thereby generating income for church coffers. Seating may be arranged to allow the people to see one another, but more typically Protestant congregations have sat so that the eyes are directed toward the reading desk and the altar table. When choirs and musical instruments are used to assist congregational singing, their location in the space most often has been the result of visual and acoustic considerations.

Other furnishings may be used depending on the denomination and the particular congregation. In general, Protestant worship spaces have included at least one cross, more typically the bare cross rather than a crucifix. Candles may be found in communities where they are not deemed "too Catholic." Among the more well-to-do, stained glass windows may be present; the latter provide a device for teaching as well as a memorial to the faithful dead. The tablets of the law (Ten Commandments) may be posted on one wall as a reminder of the necessity of Christian obedience to God. An altar rail may surround the altar table, and it has been the preferred place of evangelicals for prayer, repentance or confession, and recommitment (see EVANGELICALISM).

Components of Protestant Worship

Protestants have disagreed on what are essentials in Christian worship and what rites or ceremonies fall into the category of ADIAPHORA or “things indifferent.” The Formula of Concord (1577) was adopted as a means of resolving the Lutheran adiaphoristic controversy of 1548, and concluded in the tenth article that while churches have the right to change ceremonies for the sake of edification, taking care not to offend persons or jeopardize the consciences of the weak in faith, yet “in times of persecution, when a clear and steadfast confession is required of us, we ought not to yield to the enemies of the Gospel in things indifferent.” While Lutherans were more willing to permit in worship those things both commanded and not explicitly forbidden by God in Holy Scripture, the Reformed sought to conform their worship more fully to that alone which God had provided. John Calvin, in his INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION (IV.x.30), noted that because God did not will in outward discipline and ceremonies to prescribe in detail what we ought to do (because he foresaw that this depended upon the state of the times, and he did not deem one form suitable for all ages), here we must take refuge in those general rules which he has given, that whatever the necessity of the church will require for order and decorum should be tested against these.

Two of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES approved by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND in 1562 appear to show that church’s attempt to strike a middle ground on this issue; the Twentieth Article on the church’s authority states that the church has the power to decree rites and ceremonies that are not “contrary to God’s Word written,” and the Thirty-fourth Article concedes that because traditions and ceremonies “may be changed according to the diversities of countries, times, and men’s manners, so that nothing be ordained against God’s Word” and “every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish, ceremonies or rites of the Church ordained only by man’s authority, so that all things be done to edifying.”

Echoing the WESTMINSTER CONFSSION of Faith (1646), the 1689 London Baptist Confession recorded, “the reading of the Scriptures, preaching, and hearing the Word of God, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, singing with grace in our hearts to the Lord; as also the administration of baptism, and the Lord’s supper, are all parts of religious worship of God, to be performed in obedience to him, with understanding, faith, reverence, and godly fear.” Despite the various avenues that Protestants might take to determine what is essential to worship, in practice most Protestant services will invariably include those components named in the Baptist Confession, although prayer should be added and the sacraments may not be a standard feature.

Because sola scriptura was the watchword of the Reformation and remained a key Protestant concept, it is not surprising that the reading of scripture has been a key component of Protestant services of worship. However, different theological understandings of Scripture’s function may be operative: emphasis may be on “hearing”

God's word, on the "readings" for catechesis or thoughtful reflection, or on the "text" for the sermon. The amount of Scripture read in a single service differs widely. At one end of the spectrum, selections from the Old Testament, Book of Psalms, Epistles, and Gospels all may be set forth, sometimes in accordance with the design of an established lectionary (in one-, two-, or three-year cycles) that links the readings thematically, usually based on the Gospel. Rather than a lectionary, continuous readings from beginning to end throughout a book, letter, or Gospel may be used (lectio continua). At the other end of the spectrum, some communities read a single verse preceding the sermon, most often from the Gospels; others have no separate reading, but interweave direct quotations from Scripture throughout the preaching.

In Concerning the Order of Public Worship (1523?), Luther claimed that the worst abuse of the medieval church was that "God's Word has been silenced," with the result that "faith disappeared." The remedy, he maintained, was that a "Christian congregation should never gather together without the preaching of God's Word and prayer." With a few exceptions, Luther's medicine has been duly applied; preaching is a staple of Protestant liturgical practice and is certainly present in the principal weekly service, although it may not appear at prayer services. The history of Protestant preaching chronicles developments in theological interpretations of the role of the sermon and the preacher, changes in biblical exegesis and hermeneutics, and trends in rhetoric and elocution. Who may preach has been a subject for debate across the years. In some evangelical groups during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, women were given the opportunity to preach in public; some, however, were permitted only to exhort, to give testimony, but not to "take a (Scripture) text." Women came to have a more prominent role in preaching, although in some denominations their opportunities for public speaking (and leadership) remain more circumscribed.

The reading of Scripture and the preaching there-upon are understood to be an ordinary means by which God communicates with the community of faith and offers salvation. How is God's Word effectual? According to the one hundred fifty-fifth question of the Westminster Larger Catechism (1648), the Spirit of God makes the reading, but especially the preaching of the Word, an effectual means of enlightening, convincing, and humbling sinners; of driving them out of themselves, and drawing them unto Christ; of conforming them to his image, and subduing them to his will; of strengthening them against temptations and corruptions; of building them up in grace, and establishing their hearts in holiness and comfort through faith unto salvation.

Although prayer has been indisputably present in services, there have been disagreements within the Protestant family about whether prayers can be scripted in advance or should be left to the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Even the Lord's Prayer, regarded as the "perfect" prayer dictated by the Lord himself and quoted regularly in services of worship, is seen by some denominations as too formulaic and hence inappropriate for recitation, although it may serve as a model for prayer. One of the reasons that the English Puritans challenged the "scriptural" quality of the Book of Common Prayer from 1549 onward was that the printed prayers were deemed to lack a "spiritual" quality, they were “read” rather than “prayed,” and they did not reflect the changing circumstances of local congregations. In answer to Puritan objections, JOHN WESLEY’S revision of the 1662 Prayer Book (The Sunday Service of the Methodists, 1784) allowed for both written prayers and extemporary prayer. Many Protestants before and after Wesley have embraced both these approaches to prayer.

The prayers used in a given service of worship may be of different types and may be organized in a particular sequence congruent with the desired theological and liturgical shape of the service. Prayers of adoration focus on the qualities and majesty of the triune God. Prayers of CONFESSION acknowledge the sinfulness of the one (personal confession) or ones (general confession) praying. Examples of prayers of confession abound in Scripture, and Psalm 51 often finds a place in worship as a confession, particularly during the season of Lent. Prayers of petition ask God for something that is desired. Of petitions, supplications are requests for one’s self, and intercessions are for others. Corporate and personal expressions of gratitude for God’s goodness are framed in prayers of thanksgiving. All of these types may be found in a single service and even in a single “long” prayer.

Following the scriptural injunction that Christians are to sing psalms, HYMNS, and spiritual songs (Ephesians 5:19; Colossians 3:16), Protestants from the time of the Reformation almost uniformly have been avid supporters of congregational singing. There has not been consensus, however, on whether harmonized singing is permissible, whether choirs may also be used in corporate worship, and whether singing may be bolstered by the accompaniment of musical instruments (and if such is possible, there is a range of opinion on which instruments may be used). Differences are also evident in regard to what may be sung in worship: most narrowly, only that which God has provided, namely, psalms and scriptural canticles set to old and new melodies associated exclusively with the church, or, most broadly, texts from Scripture and even of “human composure” sung to secular or popular tunes. Such variation in opinion and performance existed in the sixteenth century and continued into the twenty-first. Typically a Protestant service of worship includes multiple opportunities for a congregation to offer praise and proclamation in song. British Methodists of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries structured their Sunday service, dubbed a “hymn sandwich,” around five congregational hymns considered normative components for their worship.

Most Protestants celebrate baptism and the Lord’s Supper or Holy Communion out of the conviction that the Lord himself established these as sacraments or ordinances. Baptism may take place in the congregation’s usual location for worship if there are appropriate facilities present for the mode or method desired, and occurs as need requires. The Lord’s Supper may be a regular component of a congregation’s weekly service, or it may be offered less frequently according to denominational or local custom. In a unique configuration, the DISCIPLES OF CHRIST (Christian Church) from their founding have practiced believer baptism by immersion and served Holy Communion each Sunday, sometimes administered by a lay leader of the congregation. A minority of Protestants at times in their histories, among them certain BAPTISTS, BRETHREN, MENNONITES, Moravians (see MORAVIAN CHURCH), and Pentecostals, have given foot-washing (see FEET, WASHING OF) a status of ordinance or sacrament.

The giving of alms for the poor and the collection of monetary offerings for the upkeep of the congregation’s building and ministries found a place in many Protestant services of worship as an ethical expression of service to God and as a practical opportunity. The action could be subtle, as with the private placement of monies in a box or vessel, or it might be dramatic and public, such as the passing of a receptacle from person to person or the procession or dance of individuals and their gifts (as in some African-American congregations) to a place where they are received.

Services of Worship

The components of worship may be shaped in myriad of ways depending on the operative theological, liturgical, evangelical, and cultural factors. Fear of formality may prompt a more spontaneous sequence of actions, although over time these may take on a stable or familiar pattern. Some denominations have sought to find an order for worship delineated within Scripture itself; Isaiah's vision in the temple (Isaiah 6) has sometimes been given as warrant for a sequence of adoration and praise, confession and pardon, the hearing of God's word, and commitment to discipleship. Others have recognized a primitive paradigm in the narrative of the Emmaus encounter (Luke 24:13–35) for the unity of word ("he interpreted to them the things about himself in all the scriptures") and sacrament ("how he had been made known to them in the breaking of the bread") and have striven for a weekly practice of preaching and communion. Orders of service and standard texts may be codified in a denomination's liturgical resource to which church law requires adherence to greater or lesser degrees, or a pastor and congregation may be free to develop a service according to local needs.

Certain occasions for worship may necessitate some variation in the standard or familiar pattern of worship. Formal and informal services (or rubrics in a worship directory) for life-cycle events may address the circumstances of infertility and stillbirth, birth and adoption, adolescence and maturity, MARRIAGE, sickness, advancing age and infirmity, and DEATH. Other events may call for special services, such as the laying of a cornerstone for a building or the installation of a new pastor.

Theological, philosophical, and ideological trends may impinge on the shape and content of worship among those groups bound up with or sensitive to the climate of the wider culture. LUTHERANISM in Europe and elsewhere during the eighteenth to twentieth centuries, for example, experienced shifts as a consequence of the successive influences of rationalism, PIETISM, revivalism, and ROMANTICISM. Not only was the substance of worship affected, but the design of the space in which worship was held was also affected. In the twentieth century, ecumenical and liturgical movements helped to widen the theological and liturgical dialogue among Protestants, but beyond that to Catholics (see CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS) and Orthodox (see ORTHODOXY, EASTERN). Shared conversations and the recognition of common resources in historic and scriptural materials resulted in striking similarities within the liturgical texts of some Protestants that also showed affinities with Catholic texts produced after Vatican II.

Advances in technology impact worship as well. Protestantism from the outset reaped the benefits of moveable type, and over the years has been willing to adopt new innovations for use with worship (e.g., electric lighting, mimeograph printing on site, and multimedia equipment) while at the same time recognizing the capacity of such inventions to distract or deter persons from worship attendance. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, numerous Protestant groups experimented with electronic and Internet communications as a means of EVANGELISM to the unconverted and spiritually uniformed but technologically literate. Such methods kept the historic Protestant emphasis on faithfully proclaiming the word of God while considering the needs of the people.

References and Further Reading

- Allmen, Jean Jacques von. Worship: Its Theology and Practice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1965.
- Bradshaw, Paul, ed. The New SCM Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship. London: SCM, 2002. Also published as The New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy & Worship, Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2002.
- Brunner, Peter. Worship in the Name of Jesus. Translated by M.H.Bertram. St. Louis, MO: Concordia, 1968.
- Cuming, G.J. A History of Anglican Liturgy. 2nd ed. London: Macmillan, 1982.
- Davies, Horton. Worship and Theology in England. 3 vols. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1961–1962.
- Old, Hughes Oliphant. Worship. Guides to the Reformed Tradition. Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1984.
- Reed, Luther D. The Lutheran Liturgy. Rev. ed. Philadelphia, PA: Fortress, 1947.
- Schaff, Philip. The Creeds of Christendom. Rev. ed., 3 vols. Grand Rapids, MI: Baker, 1985.
- Senn, Frank C. Christian Liturgy: Catholic and Evangelical. Minneapolis, MN: Augsburg Fortress, 1997.
- Thompson, Bard. A Bibliography of Christian Worship. ATLA Bibliography Series No. 25. Metuchen, NJ: ATLA and London: Scarecrow Press, 1989.
- Vajta, Vilmos. Luther on Worship. Philadelphia, PA: Muhlenberg, 1958.
- West, Fritz. Scripture and Memory: The Ecumenical Hermeneutic of the Three-Year Lectionaries, Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1997.
- Wainwright, Geoffrey. Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine and Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1980.
- Webber, Robert. The Complete Library of Christian Worship. Nashville, TN: Star Song, 1993–1994.
- White, James F. Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition. Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 1989.
- . The Sacraments in Protestant Practice and Faith. Nashville, TN: Abingdon, 1999.

KAREN WESTERFIELD-TUCKER

WREN, CHRISTOPHER (1632–1723)

Architect. Wren was born into a prominent clerical family on October 20, 1632. His father, Christopher Sr., was rector of the parish of East Knoyle, Wiltshire, and later dean of Windsor and registrar of the Order of the Garter. His uncle Matthew also held significant positions, serving ultimately as bishop of Ely. The whole family had close contact with the court of Charles I (these Royalist, High Church associations remained with Wren, although he personally never suffered much because of them). Wren received his Bachelors degree from CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY in 1650. Three years later he earned his Masters and was made a Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford.

As a scholar Wren was interested in all facets of mathematics and science, and turned that fascination into practical results. He translated mathematical texts into Latin. He was a pioneer in anesthetics, blood transfusion, and intravenous injections. He devised a language for the deaf and mute using hands and fingers. He invented a device for writing with two pens at once, as well as a “way-wiser” (an early precursor to the odometer). He was fascinated by the heavens, puzzling over the problem posed by Saturn’s rings. He constructed a “Lunar Sphere” for Charles II, showing the surface of the moon in relief. This work in astronomy resulted in Wren’s appointment as professor of astronomy at Gresham College in 1657, and, three years later, as the Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford. During these years Wren and many of his friends (including astronomer Seth Ward and scientist ROBERT BOYLE) formed the “Philosophical Society of Oxford,” which in 1661 received its charter from the king as the Royal Society.

These years also saw Wren’s interests extend to the theoretical and geometric bases of architecture, including its classical roots, of which there were few examples in England; thus in 1665 Wren went to Paris, where he met with Gian Lorenzo Bernini and, possibly, François Mansart. It was in Europe that Wren was introduced to the dome, of which there were no examples in England. Shortly after his return to England, however, came the event that possibly “made” Wren as England’s preeminent architect: the Great London Fire of September 1666. The five-day conflagration destroyed the Royal Exchange and the Guild Hall, eighty-seven churches (including St. Paul’s Cathedral), and 13,000 private houses; little was left except the Tower of London. Wren quickly produced a brilliant plan for rebuilding the city. The design allowed for twenty-four parish churches, each to be conspicuous, many on major thoroughfares. He clearly wanted to restore the spiritual life of a destroyed London, as well as meet the material needs of the people. Although the king favored the proposal, the City Corporation needed a quick restoration and rejected the plan as too time-consuming. Wren, however, was soon appointed Surveyor of the King’s Works (1669) and was given the task of rebuilding the city’s churches, including St. Paul’s Cathedral.

St. Paul’s (completed in 1708) was Wren’s architectural masterpiece. The building process was not without controversy because the final product did not exactly match any of the original plans or models. “Deception,” as some contemporaries charged, also describes some of the cathedral's most important architectural features—and Wren's most significant achievements. From the exterior, for example, the viewer is deceived into assuming that the massive walls remain vertical without the help of flying buttresses; in fact, the upper portions of the exterior walls are false, hiding the buttresses. The dome, visible for miles, appears effortlessly to support the great stone lantern at the top—it too is a deception. Within the outer thin shell is a brick cone, situated over an internal dome (visible from within the cathedral); it is the brick cone that supports the lantern.

Although St. Paul's somewhat represented Wren's thinking about a different architecture required by the CHURCH OF ENGLAND'S BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, the other fifty-two churches of rebuilt London are better examples of Wren's response to this relatively recent religious sensibility. Before the REFORMATION, worship was characterized by active participation of the CLERGY and passive participation of the LAITY; its focus was on the ALTAR. Reformed worship, on the other hand, was centered on the pulpit. Prayer Book worship was different still, requiring both active lay and clergy participation, and with dual foci: altar and pulpit.

What were Wren's architectural ideals? Because worshippers were expected to pay attention to the service, ensuring that everyone could both see and hear became paramount. The congregation was expected to have in hand the Prayer Book; light was necessary for its reading, so windows and lanterns were abundant. Ideally no one should be more than fifty feet away from the preacher; benches should replace pews if possible; pulpits should be elevated; screens, if used at all, should be very open; optimal sizes of congregations would be small (St. Paul's, as a cathedral, necessarily was an anomaly). There would be no liturgical "center." The resulting "auditoriums" that Wren designed conformed to two basic types, depending on the available site (oblong buildings with nave and aisles, and squarish buildings arrayed variously); beyond that, there was little structural consistency. Most of the churches were relatively small. Indeed, many were identifiable as churches only by their carefully designed spires (the walls, on the contrary, were mostly continuous masonry, not much divided by piers or columns). Those churches that have survived wars and reconstruction remain, therefore, a lasting legacy to Wren's brilliant solutions to both the constraints of site and the demands of Church of England liturgy.

Sir Christopher Wren was knighted in 1673 and died in London on February 25, 1723. He is buried in St. Paul's, where his epitaph reads (in Latin): "Reader, if you seek his monument, look around."

See also Architecture, Church

References and Further Reading

Primary Source:

Wren, Christopher (II). Parentalia: Memoirs of the Family of Wrens. London: 1750 (facsimile reprint London 1965).

Secondary Sources:

Downes, Kerry. The Architecture of Wren. Reading: Redhedge, 1988.

Fürst, Viktor. The Architecture of Sir Christopher Wren. London: Lund Humphries, 1956.

Whinney, Margaret. Wren. London: Thames and Hudson, 1971.

GARY R.BROWER

WU, Y.T. (WU YAO-TSUNG, WU YAOZONG) (1893–1979)

Chinese pastor. Born in Guangzhou (Canton) CHINA in 1893 to a non-Christian family, Wu became a Christian through his reading of the Sermon on the Mount and was baptized in Beijing in 1920. He left his lucrative job in the customs service and joined the work of the YMCA (see YMCA, YWCA). Subsequently, Wu studied at New York's Union Theological Seminary and Columbia University, where he received an M.A. degree in 1927. Upon his return to China he was active in the YMCA movement in China and internationally.

Wu gradually abandoned the PACIFISM of the Fellowship of Reconciliation and became increasingly committed to progressive and patriotic causes. In 1947 he wrote "The Present Day Tragedy of Christianity in China," an essay that foreshadowed LIBERATION THEOLOGY in its social and political critique of Christianity for its identification with capitalism and imperialism. Y.T.Wu began to advocate the support of Christians for the Chinese revolution and was the principal author of the 1950 "Christian Manifesto," which called on the Protestant churches to sever their links with Western imperialism.

Wu was the leading spirit behind the Chinese Christian Three-Self Patriotic Movement (TSPM) from its formative period in 1950. In 1954 he became the Chairman of the TSPM Committee at the First Chinese National Christian Conference and remained in the movement until his death, after the end of China's Cultural Revolution era. He died in Shanghai in 1979.

Through the power of his personality, his commitment to Christian social involvement, and his writings, Y.T.Wu inspired the men and women who were to become the core leadership of the TSPM for the next fifty years. However, he remained a controversial figure in the churches because of his unwavering support for the program of the Communist Party in China. Y.T.Wu leaves an important legacy for Christianity in China, but a thorough evaluation of his life and thought has yet to be written.

See also Asian Theology; Colonialism; Communism; Post-colonialism

References and Further Reading

- Chen, Chi-rong. Wu Yao-Tsung: ein Theologe im sozialistischen China, 1920–1960. Münster, Germany: Lit. Verlag, 1992.
- Ng, Lee-ming. "A Study of Y.T.Wu." Ching Feng 15 (1972).

Shen, Derong. A Short Biography of Y.T. Wu (in Chinese). Shanghai, China: TSPM Committee, 1989.

Yamamoto, Sumiko. History of Protestantism in China: The Indigenization of Christianity. Tokyo: Toho Gakkai, 2000.

PHILIP L. WICKERI

WÜNSCH, GEORG (1887–1964)

German ethicist. Wunsch was one of the first theologians of social ethics in GERMANY. From 1931 to 1945 and then from 1950 to 1955, he held the professorial chair of social ethics at Philipps University, Marburg, the first ever position in social ethics at a department of evangelical theology in Germany.

ERNST TROELTSCH and Johannes Weiß were decisive influences on Wunsch's later interest in social-ethical questions. Troeltsch focused his understanding of theology's relationship to (social) reality; Weiß and the history of religion school provided Wunsch with the principle of an eschatological hope transcending all reality that Wunsch adopted for the cause of radical change.

Beginning in 1912 Wunsch served as a Protestant minister in Baden, Germany. He understood THEOLOGY as the task of shaping the world out of a sense of ethical responsibility, and he was an advocate of unqualified support for the marginalized and weak members of society. After World War I he joined the religious socialists, gave up his position as pastor in 1921, and soon thereafter received his doctorate from the University of Marburg. In 1931 the faculty of theology at Marburg elected him to the newly created position of professor of social ethics. By the time he published Evangelische Wirtschaftsethik (Protestant Economic Ethics) in 1927 he had already written a significant body of work on ETHICS and values.

Although a social democrat, Wunsch fell in with the National Socialists with astonishing speed. Not without some opportunism, he began to combine socialist ideas of community taken from both left-wing and right-wing ideologies. In 1936 he published Evangelische Ethik des Politischen (The Protestant Ethic of the Political), a work filled with national socialist content that led to the temporary loss of his university position after the war.

Wunsch is credited with establishing social ethics as a special discipline within theology. The question remains whether one can trace his entanglement in National Socialism to his theological ideas or whether his involvement was a result of individual error. However, the fact of his association with National Socialism did limit the impact of his work.

References and Further Reading

Kaiser, Jochen-Christoph, Andread Lippmann, and Martin Schindel, eds. Marburger Theologie im Nationalsozialismus: Texte zur Geschichte der Evangelisch-Theologischen Fakultät im Dritten Reich. Neukirchen-Vluyn, Germany: Neukirchener Verlag, 1998.

Wolfes, Matthias. "Wünsch." In Biographisch-Bibliographisches Kirchenlexicon (BBKL). vol. XIV, 103–156. 1998 [including a Wünsch bibliography and secondary literature].

Ziesche, Frank. Evangelische Wirtschaftsethik: Eine Untersuchung zu Georg Wünschs wirtschaftsethischem Werk. Frankfurt am Main, Germany: Peter Lang, 1996.

JOCHEN-CHRISTOPH KAISER

WWJD

WWJD—the acronym for “What Would Jesus Do?”—gained prominence after an evangelical youth group adopted it as a slogan in the 1990s. However, the underlying question predates the creation of the acronym by nearly 100 years, having been popularized in the late nineteenth century by the pastor and novelist CHARLES M.SHELDON.

Sheldon (1857–1946) was born in Wellsville, New York into the family of a respected Congregationalist minister (see CONGREGATIONALISM). After completing his education at Boston University and Andover Newton Seminary, he became a Congregationalist minister in Topeka, Kansas. Sheldon’s brief novel, In His Steps, was written in 1896 and is most remembered for its provocative ethical question: “What would Jesus do?” In Sheldon’s novel, as in his activist life, Jesus was assumed to promote the social causes of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century progressive Christianity. Sheldon was active in the TEMPERANCE movement, antiwar campaigns, child labor issues, and struggles against racism and poverty. In spite of the novel’s tremendous sales, Sheldon retained no legal rights to royalties from the book’s sale because of a copyright error. (When a few publishers voluntarily paid Sheldon royalties, he donated the money to charity.) Ironically, publishers’ wide-scale pirating of the book promoted both the book’s sales and Sheldon’s literary reputation.

Sheldon published over twenty books and edited a periodical, The Christian Herald, but only In His Steps (which sold 23 million copies in his lifetime) enjoined soaring popularity during his lifetime and in subsequent generations. After his death Sheldon’s novel was “rediscovered” in 1950 when Glenn Clark published a volume on a new generation’s discovery of In His Steps. Such rediscoveries occurred regularly throughout the twentieth century and into the twenty-first century. The most important rediscovery of Sheldon’s novel occurred in the early 1990s and coincided with two other events in popular CULTURE: the emergence of the World Wide Web and the popular advertising slogan “Just do it.”

A youth group at Calvary Reformed Church in Holland, Michigan read Sheldon’s novel and created the acronym WWJD as a countercultural Christian alternative to the secular advertising slogan “Just do it.” The youth group began producing and distributing cloth bracelets emboldened with the WWJD acronym. The bracelets were popularized through several Web sites (by 1999 over 50,000 Web sites were offering WWJD merchandise and promoting related discussions). Zondervan Publishing, an evangelical publisher in central Michigan, began promoting and extending the WWJD phenomenon with a full line of complementary products, including a study BIBLE, devotional and inspirational books, T-shirts, board games, SUNDAY SCHOOL curricula, calendars, and jewelry. By 1999 over 14 million WWJD bracelets had sold.

The evangelical WWJD movement has deemphasized the socially progressive Christian agenda promoted by Sheldon and thus incurred criticism from some non-Evangelicals for usurping Sheldon's theological agenda.

See also Evangelicalism

References and Further Reading

Clark, Glenn. What Would Jesus Do? Wherein a New Generation Undertakes to Walk in His Steps.

St. Paul, MN: Macalester Park Publishing, 1950.

Sheldon, Charles M. In His Steps. New York: Hurst, 1896.

<http://www.whatwouldjesusdo.com/> (Accessed March 17, 2003).

<http://www.wwjd.com/> (Accessed March 17, 2003).

THOMAS E.PHILLIPS

WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS

Founded in 1934 by William Cameron Townsend, the Wycliffe Bible Translators (WBT), with approximately 6,000 members worldwide, is now the largest nondenominational Protestant missionary organization in the world. The WBT originated with the vision of Cameron Townsend to undertake indigenous language ministry in all the Indian tribes of LATIN AMERICA. Today the WBT is an organization of linguists dedicated to translating the Scriptures into every language of the world. The WBT and its field organization, the Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL), have completed the translation of the New Testament into almost 500 languages with linguists working in 1,100 others. The WBT was founded as a “faith mission” that, in the twentieth century, overtook denominational boards as evangelical missions of choice. Townsend’s new approaches, including indigenous language ministry, linguistic education for missionaries, contracts with host countries, and the use of airplanes in jungle travel, dramatically altered the faith mission enterprise.

Townsend in Guatemala

In 1917, bored with college and inspired by his membership in the Student Volunteer Movement, Townsend went to Guatemala as an itinerant evangelist for the Bible House of Los Angeles. Townsend spent the next fifteen years in Guatemala, first with the Bible House, but primarily with the Central American Mission (CAM). Townsend’s traveling companion during his year as a colporteur was Francisco Díaz, a Cakchiquel Indian. Díaz convinced Townsend that the Indians of Central America had been overlooked by American missions, which carried on their work in Spanish, a language little understood by the Indian tribes that made up the majority of the region’s population. When Townsend joined the CAM, he determined to focus his work on Díaz’s tribe. He created a Cakchiquel department within the CAM complete with schools for Indian children, conducted his ministry in the Indian language, and translated the New Testament into Cakchiquel. At every point he fought established mission policy that, along with current governmental policies, sought to incorporate the Indians into the broader political life of the republic by teaching them only in Spanish.

The Founding of the Summer Institute of Linguistics

Eager to pioneer where no other missionary had gone before, Townsend soon turned his attention to the small Indian tribes deep in the jungles of Amazonia. He envisioned an “Air Crusade to the Wild Tribes” in which “hydroplanes” would fly missionaries to isolated tribes. When the CAM would not support his scheme, he left, intending to devote himself to his “Air Crusade.” His project, however, also required missionaries trained in linguistics who could create written languages where none existed and then translate the Scripture. To meet this need he opened the first “Camp Wycliffe” in 1934. From a rather crude beginning Townsend’s summer linguistic training camp, along with a “Jungle Camp” that provided experience in rugged frontier living, helped to revolutionize evangelical missionary training. Before the creation of Townsend’s school, missionaries entered faith missions with little more than a high school education and a year or two of Bible school. Townsend, however, sent his best students to earn advanced degrees in linguistics. As they returned to teach at what became known as the SIL, they demanded more from the new recruits. Today it often requires several years beyond college for recruits to complete the rigorous training provided by SIL. Where once typical WBT recruits were fervent young missionaries who chose a linguistic focus to win converts, typical WBT recruits are now well-educated linguists who choose missionary work as an avenue for uniting their career goals with their sense of Christian calling.

The Summer Institute in Mexico

Townsend was initially deterred from his goal of an “Air Crusade” to Amazonia by the suggestion of Leonard Legters, a barnstorming preacher and crusader for Indian causes, that the Indian tribes in MEXICO were both larger and easier to reach. In 1935 Townsend took his first group of SIL translators to Mexico. (The WBT was not actually incorporated until 1942, when the SIL had grown so large that the missionaries needed an organization in the UNITED STATES to manage their home affairs.) There Townsend forged a close friendship with Mexican president Lázaro Cárdenas who, despite his own government’s antireligious agenda, permitted Townsend to bring in as many workers as he could recruit. Townsend’s experience with Cárdenas, as well as WBT’s status as an academic missionary organization, led to the mission’s unique approach to government relations, whereby WBT/SIL seeks to operate under a contract with the host country. SIL provides the host country with linguistic analysis of the languages of indigenous groups, and in turn is permitted to use its knowledge to translate the Scriptures into those languages.

To Peru and Beyond

In 1943 the Peruvian government asked the WBT to undertake linguistic work with its indigenous groups. In Peru Townsend finally realized his vision of an “Air Crusade” when he founded the Jungle Aviation and Radio Service (JAARS) in 1948. The use of airplanes bypassed weeks of hard travel through the jungle and, together with radios, made the daily life of missionaries much safer.

From Peru WBT entered Guatemala in 1952; Ecuador and the PHILIPPINES in 1953; Bolivia in 1955; then Colombia, BRAZIL, and INDONESIA in rapid succession. By the end of the twentieth century, WBT linguists operated in virtually every country of the world. In addition to attracting many members from developed countries outside the United States, the movement has spawned indigenous Bible translation organizations. In some countries WBT linguists operate only as consultants to national Bible translators.

Controversy

As a very high-profile Protestant mission in the twentieth century, the WBT has often been a lightning rod for criticism. In addition to battles with anthropologists over approaches to indigenous cultures, the mission’s access to and perceived influence over isolated tribal groups has led to accusations that the mission is in league with American business interests or government organizations, such as oil companies or the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). The organization has rejected these accusations, and no direct evidence of such complicity has come to light. Townsend, at least, supported Mexican national interests against those of the United States during the Cárdenas administration (Townsend was investigated by the FBI because of his loyalty to Cárdenas), and throughout his life insisted that the U.S. government and business not interfere in Latin American affairs.

In addition the mission has often been accused of deceiving governments about its true intent, posing as a scientific organization rather than a missionary one. The use of two names for what is essentially one organization, and government contracts that call obliquely for the translation of “works of high moral content” have tended to support this suggestion of duplicity. There is some truth to this charge, in that before the SIL became a groundbreaking academic training organization, many WBT recruits could only marginally be called linguists. The accusation, however, assumes the ignorance of host governments, most of which investigated the WBT before extending their invitations and knew that SIL linguists entered their countries with missionary intent. The governments themselves, which, especially in Latin American countries, were often beholden to the Catholic Church, tried to slip SIL in “under Catholic radar.” Ironically in the 1970s and 1980s, when several WBT contracts were severely contested by academics and nationalist groups, it was at times the Catholic Church, which over the years had grown to appreciate SIL’s linguistic help as well as passage to its own mission stations on JAARS airplanes, that worked behind the scenes to preserve SIL’s status.

See also Bible Translation; Missionary Organizations; Missions, North American

References and Further Reading

Colby, Gerard and Charlotte Dennett. Thy Will Be Done, the Conquest of the Amazon: Nelson Rockefeller and Evangelism in the Age of Oil. New York: HarperCollins, 1995.

Steven, Hugh. Wycliffe in the Making: the Memoirs of W. Cameron Townsend, 1920–1933. Wheaton, IL: Harold Shaw, 1995.

———. Doorway to the World, the Mexico Years: the Memoirs of W. Cameron Townsend, 1934–1947. Wheaton, IL: Harold Shaw, 1999.

Stoll, David. Fishers of Men or Founders of Empire?: the Wycliffe Bible Translators in Latin America. London: Zed Press, 1982.

Svelmoe, William L. "A New Vision for Missions: William Cameron Townsend and the Wycliffe Bible Translators in Latin America." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Notre Dame, 2001.

<http://www.wycliffe.org/>

WILLIAM L.SVELMOE

This page intentionally left blank.

Y

YMCA, YWCA

The Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) and the Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA) both began in London and quickly spread internationally, both reaching their largest membership numbers in the UNITED STATES. George Williams founded the YMCA in London in 1844 as a prayer group for young men new to the city. Likewise, the YWCA resulted from the union of two London-based women's organizations, both devoted to encouraging evangelical Protestant virtues. Although the YMCA and YWCA have continued to consider their official missions to be based on Christian principles, their specific connection to Christian churches have lessened as they opened their doors to members of all religious traditions and encouraged interfaith dialogue. The missions of the YMCA and YWCA have expanded over time to include issues of human justice, racial relations, HIGHER EDUCATION, physical fitness, and war relief.

Beginnings of the YMCA

The YMCA was founded in London in 1844 by George Williams, the son of a farmer, and eleven of his friends. Williams and his friends wanted the organization to serve men who were new to the city, by helping them to feel God's GRACE. The founders of the association were evangelical Protestant and early activities included PRAYER and study of the BIBLE. To join the YMCA young men had to either belong to a Christian church or show evidence of being converted to Christianity.

Other YMCAs were quickly established throughout ENGLAND with the aim of protecting respectable young men from the vices of the city, and the movement soon began to spread internationally. By 1850 the movement had reached AUSTRALIA. In Paris in 1855 all of the national associations combined to form the World Alliance. Their headquarters are now located in Geneva, SWITZERLAND. Five thousand associations were established in twenty-four countries by 1905.

In 1851 at the World's Fair in London, Americans were first exposed to the YMCA, and the first North American club was founded in Montreal later that year. On December 29, 1851 sea captain and missionary Thomas Valentine Sullivan introduced the YMCA to the United States, forming the first U.S. YMCA in Boston at the Old South Church. By 1852 there were organizations in New York; Washington, D.C.; Buffalo; Detroit; and Springfield, Massachusetts. At these YMCAs activities included prayer meetings, Bible class, and lectures. In addition the YMCAs often provided libraries and reading rooms for their members.

As early as 1856, student YMCAs were organized at universities in Tennessee, Virginia, and Wisconsin. By 1900 there were 628 student YMCAs that served 32,000 students. In addition the YMCA founded colleges and schools throughout the United States, and by 1950 there were twenty YMCA colleges in Boston, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Seattle, and other cities (see CHRISTIAN COLLEGES). For instance, Golden Gate University began in 1881 as a night school operating out of the San Francisco YMCA, and Northeastern University grew out of a series of informal law courses offered by the Boston YMCA in 1897. After World War II most of the colleges founded by the YMCA became freestanding institutions, but two universities—Springfield (Massachusetts) College and Aurora (Illinois) University—have retained their affiliation.

When the national YMCA in the United States convened in 1869 in Portland, Maine, the delegates adopted the Portland Basis/Test to establish the requirements for membership. At this time membership was extended only to members of evangelical Christian churches. Although this move upset people who felt that it was too exclusionary, it did signal that the YMCA would not attempt to establish a separate Christian church. Although the policy was not always followed by individual YMCAs, it was not officially changed until 1933, when individual YMCAs were given the freedom to open their membership as they saw fit.

Beginnings of the YWCA

The YWCA resulted from the merging of two Christian organizations in London. These organizations, both founded in 1855, were the Prayer Union, founded by Emma Roberts, and the General Female Training Institute, founded by Mary Jane Kinnaird. In 1877 Roberts and Kinnaird met over tea and combined their organizations to establish the YWCA. From the beginning, they emphasized practical social action as an outgrowth of religious belief. In 1884 the organization adopted its first constitution.

In the United States the YWCA was also a result of various movements that eventually combined under one name. The religious REVIVALS in the eastern United States in 1857–1858 helped to pave the way for these women's organizations. Women in big cities recognized the need for safe housing for single young women and by 1860 residences were set up in New York and Boston. These young women, new to the city or without family ties, often turned to churches for help, and these Christian residences were a natural solution.

In 1866 thirty women met in Boston to write the constitution for their new organization, which they called the YWCA. This group was concerned not just with women's housing, but also with job training and physical recreation. In the 1870s a YWCA in New York established the first typewriting instruction for women, the first sewing machine classes, and the first employment bureau for women. In response to the growth of student YMCAs, a student YWCA was established at Normal University in Normal, Illinois in 1873.

The YWCA encountered some problems that parallel YMCAs did not. In particular, many people were reluctant to donate money to the YWCA because they doubted the organizational skills of women. However, the YWCAs succeeded, in part because of the strong conviction by many of these women that Christian women were obligated to help others, including in their spiritual development. The YWCA acted as an outlet for women to help other women and provide whatever service was needed in the community. Part of the particularly Christian motivation of the YWCA was to win souls for Christ, but the members saw the YWCA as the “handmaiden” of the church, not as an organization directly tied to the church.

YWCA's were growing throughout the world, not just in England and the United States: 1894 saw the formation of the World YWCA. Recognizing their commonalities, the YWCA's of England, the United States, SWEDEN, and NORWAY organized in London. Their headquarters were later located in Geneva, Switzerland.

Finally, in 1906, the various local branches and student branches in the United States combined to create a national YWCA. At this time the YWCA had 186,000 members, 22 percent of whom were students. Their first president was Grace Dodge, who was also one of the founders of the Columbia Teacher's College and a member of the Women's Labor Council. The organization established a national board and hired a staff. The first executive director—then called “secretary”—was Mabel Cratty.

Urban Culture and Physical Development

From their beginnings, the YMCA and YWCA were envisioned as urban organizations, designed for the benefit of young men and young women who felt lost in the city. The industrial revolution drove people from their farms and small towns into the cities to work in factories. This transition could often be very difficult, and the YMCA and YWCA were developed to help ease this change, both by providing valuable services, such as housing and job placement, and by providing a Christian community where young adults could feel at home.

From the 1860s YMCAs in the United States offered hotel-like rooms as housing opportunities for young men who were new to the cities, until they could find more permanent housing. Chicago's Far-well Hall—the first YMCA dormitory—was erected in 1867 with forty-two rooms, although it burned down three months later. From the early twentieth century until the late 1950s dormitory rooms were designed into every YMCA building. Emergency dormitories for the unemployed and homeless were also an occasional feature of YMCAs. By 1940 YMCAs offered more rooms than any hotel chain of the era, at 100,000 rooms.

Scholars have suggested that the same conditions that provided security against corruption for young Christian men new to the city—especially the anonymity and personal freedom—also allowed for the flourishing of an underground gay culture there. The all-male culture of YMCA residences was a place of fertile sexual experimentation from the 1980s onward. Although the YMCA's establishment as a “home away from home” was meant at least in part to protect young men from sexual immorality and encourage self-restraint and celibacy, what actually occurred in the YMCAs was at odds with that vision. Gay cruising at public places was often subject to police surveillance, but at the YMCA such regulation was relatively rare. The YMCAs may have been safe from police raid because of the public perception that such activities could not occur at a Christian institution, especially once the YMCAs expanded to suburbs and became known as catering to families. Although the YMCAs were known throughout the gay male community as an ideal place to cruise, not all of the men who participated in sexual activities at the YMCA identified as homosexual or associated themselves with gay community institutions.

In addition to their concern about the spiritual wellbeing of young men and women, middle-class Protestants also worried about the physical health and development of these young Christians in cities. Whereas working on farms had provided physical exercise for these young workers, their new jobs and long hours in factories prevented this exercise. By 1869 YMCA buildings with gymnasiums had opened in San Francisco, Washington, D.C., and New York. Robert J. Roberts of the Boston YMCA developed “body building” classes in 1881. By the 1890s physical fitness had been officially established as an essential component in YMCA work. This association between the YMCA and physical fitness was a response to contemporary debates over the relative benefits of “brain work” versus physical exercise. Whereas some physicians prescribed relaxation therapy to cure exhaustion, others believed that what middle-class people, especially men who were occupied in sedentary work, needed was physical exercise to complement their mental work. The YMCA took the latter view and championed a philosophy of “Muscular Christianity,” wherein physical development was essential to Christian salvation. “Muscular Christianity” also developed in response to fears that muscular southern and eastern European immigrants would steal jobs from the physically weaker white Protestant middle class.

A number of SPORTS owe their existence and development to the YMCA. Among these, the most well known may be basketball. In Springfield, Massachusetts, students at the International YMCA Training School enjoyed playing rugby and football during warm months, but they were not as pleased with their indoor winter sports options, among them leapfrog and tumbling. To rectify this situation, the school’s director, Luther Gulick, asked teacher and minister James Naismith to develop an indoor game for the students to play. The resulting game was basketball, which was then played with hanging peach baskets. In January of 1892 Naismith published the rules of the game and the game quickly spread among young men and women. Naismith never made any money from his invention, even refusing compensation for his public speaking about the sport. Many inventors of other YMCA sports followed Naismith’s example, giving their sport to the participants without remuneration. Other YMCA inventions include volleyball, group swimming lessons, lifesaving classes, and racquetball.

Race and Ethnicity

In 1853, just two years after the YMCA came to the United States, the first black YMCA was opened in Washington, D.C., by former slave Anthony Bowen, and the annual YMCA convention included African American delegates as early as 1867. However, it was not until 1890 that the national YMCA office opened its “Colored Men’s Department” and appointed William Hunton, son of a slave, to serve the African American community. In part this delay can be explained by considering that before the CIVIL WAR many African American men were slaves and thus not free to join the YMCA. Once the slaves were liberated, they were encouraged to join on a separate-but-equal basis. Ohio black minister Jesse E. Moorland, who joined Hunton in 1898, encouraged the growing class of black businessmen to join the association and benefit from the focus on developing the body, mind, and spirit.

African American men involved in the YMCAs had a very particular understanding of how to implement racial uplift, contra Booker T. Washington and W.E.B. DuBois. History professor Nina Baym has suggested in her work that black YMCA leaders stressed an ideal of "true manhood" that united Victorian gentility with muscular Christianity. Thus, these black leaders encouraged the same virtues that white Christian men at the time were espousing, with the belief that individual African Americans could advance in society by displaying masculine virtues. Urban middle-class black men who were not accepted fully as men in society could express their masculinity at the black YMCAs to which they belonged.

As was the case with the nation as a whole, the YMCA long remained segregated, but by the mid-1920s there were 128 black college chapters of the YMCA and fifty-one city YMCAs, with membership totaling 28,000. Although early black YMCAs had some difficulty raising funds, the black YMCAs in the 1920s usually cooperated with white YMCA boards and received some financial support from them. Individuals such as George Foster Peabody, John D. Rockefeller, and Julius Rosenwald also contributed to the cause.

By 1946 YMCAs were encouraged to eliminate discrimination, and they officially desegregated in 1967. During the CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT of the 1960s leaders of the movement met at black YMCAs. Leaders, such as Dr. MARTIN LUTHER KING JR., Rev. Andrew Young, Vernon Jordan, and U.S. Supreme Court justice Thurgood Marshall grew up involved with their local YMCAs.

Although the YWCA in the United States was early populated with African American women, especially in its black student organizations, the official leadership of the YWCA did not always encourage and support its black members. It was not until 1914 that a secretary for the advancement of African American women in cities was added to the YWCA structure. The cause of African American women was further advanced in 1919 when the first YWCA building designed specifically for black women was opened in New York, offering the separate-but-equal facilities that the YMCAs had been offering for men.

For the women of the YWCA the debate over whether to include African American women was theological in nature. The mission of the YWCA was specifically designed to extend to all women of the same Christian faith who wanted to provide service to other women throughout their communities. However, black women were excluded from many of the social institutions of the time, and the YWCA may have had less success in accomplishing its mission without the money and social support that could have been difficult to attain if they included black women in their organization. In some ways the separation between black and white YWCAs may reflect this difficulty.

Although the black-white divide was perhaps the most salient racial divide in both the YMCA and YWCA in the United States (perhaps because African Americans were more likely than some other racial groups to be Protestant), African Americans were by no means the only racial groups involved in the movements. NATIVE AMERICANS were one of the earliest groups to become involved in both the YMCA and the YWCA. The YMCA foray into work with Native Americans began in 1879 in the Dakota Territory. Chief Little Crow's son, Thomas Wakeman, organized the first Sioux YMCA. Eventually, there were sixty-six Sioux associations, with membership reaching 1,000. The YMCA also worked with other tribes in the United States, especially in the areas of EDUCATION, health, and Christian development.

The YWCA first began its work among Native American girls in 1897 at the Haworth Institute in Chilocco, Oklahoma, and other associations for Native American girls soon followed. At least in part the women of the YWCA wanted to help these Native American girls to adjust to new situations, especially when placed on reservations and in government schools. By 1930 the YWCA was operating in forty-one schools and serving 2,600 girls. The YWCA and YMCA worked together and closely with the government in their work with Native Americans both on the reservations and off.

Like African Americans, Chinese Americans and Japanese Americans also founded YMCAs separate from the white YMCAs, especially in San Francisco. The first Chinese American YMCA was founded in San Francisco's Chinatown in 1871, with the name Ki-Tuk Yau Hok Ching To Ui (Young Christians Learning Upright Doctrine Society). Because of the prevalence of gambling among the Chinese of the community, one of the most strictly enforced rules was the stricture against playing games like dominos or chess. A Japanese branch of the San Francisco YMCA opened in 1918, but because of a more dispersed population and difficulties raising money, the Japanese were never as successful in their YMCA efforts in San Francisco as were the Chinese. There were also separate "Oriental" branches of the YWCA in San Francisco and Los Angeles. The YWCA also provided services for Japanese Americans in relocation camps during World War II, which may have helped familiarize them with the YWCA.

War Relief

In 1865 the YMCA of the United States began working with soldiers of the Civil War, especially in the North. The U.S. Christian Commission, designed to aid soldiers on the battlefield, was created by the combination of fifteen northern YMCAs and eventually included 5,000 volunteers. In part these numbers reflect a recruiting effort spurred on by a meeting with President ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Volunteers in the Christian Commission, forty-three of whom lost their lives in the war, wrote letters, delivered supplies and food, and kept a record of the dead. Although the Northern YMCAs were hurt by the war, they fared better than the southern YMCAs, and only two Southern YMCAs remained after the war.

YMCA volunteers helped American soldiers from the first days of World War I. Small voluntary contributions by YMCA members to the war work totaled $235 million. Praised by U.S. Commanding General John J. Pershing, the YMCA volunteers provided morale and welfare services to the troops and operated 1,500 canteens in the United States and FRANCE. In addition the YMCA volunteers, ninety-three of whom died during their service, set up 4,000 huts—many on the front lines—for recreation and religious service. It was mainly through the efforts of these YMCA volunteers that baseball, basketball, and volleyball were first given mass exposure in Europe. The YWCA also operated canteens during World War I and mobilized women for war work.

During World War II both the YMCA and the YWCA helped the soldiers. Once President Franklin Delano Roosevelt had declared a state of emergency, six national organizations—including the YMCA and the YWCA—joined forces to form the United Services Organizations for National Defense (the USO), which was formally incorporated on February 4, 1941. YMCA volunteers also worked with six million prisoners-of-war held in thirty-six foreign countries and several thousand prisoners-of-war held in the United States. World War II brought changes to the lives of women irrespective of whether they went to the front lines to help. Many women who stayed in the United States had to leave their homes and work in factories to produce goods for the war, and the YWCA provided housing and support for women who had difficulties in the transition.

Later Developments

At the Sixth World Council of YMCAs, which met in Kampala, Uganda in 1973, one of the major concerns was to determine how best to retain the Christian character of the YMCA. The membership and leadership of YMCAs throughout the world has expanded to include a broad political and religious spectrum. The YMCA in Jerusalem, which opened in 1933, for instance, is considered to be one of the few places in that city where Christians, Jews, and Muslims are able to mingle peacefully. However, many people within the organization fear that it will be difficult to retain the Christian nature of the association if YMCA leaders, especially full-time directors, are no longer required to be committed Christians. The Kampala Principles, established during this conference, give new interpretation to the nature and mission of the World Alliance. It was decided by the delegates that, although it is important to reaffirm the Christian ideals of the 1855 “Paris Basis,” open membership—regardless of faith, age, sex, class—is also a fundamental principle of the YMCA. Local YMCAs were encouraged to review their own policies in relation to this new interpretation of the ecumenical character of the YMCA.

Although the world YMCA is concerned with its Christian character, the YMCA of the United States has increasingly moved away from Christian activities. In 2001 the YMCA celebrated 150 years in the United States, and they reaffirmed that their mission, although based on Christian principles, was applicable to people of all faiths, both men and women. With half their membership under the age of eighteen in 2001, YMCAs continued to work with youth, serving one in ten teenagers and working especially with teens in high-risk communities. The focus on youth could be seen especially in camping programs, which began in 1867. Summer camps began in the United States with a YMCA trip in 1885, and by 2001 the YMCA claimed 1,600 day camps that served 500,000 children each summer. With half their population over the age of eighteen, however, YMCAs could not focus solely on youth. With the development of Jazzercise and dance exercise classes in the late 1960s the YMCA helped to pioneer the exercise craze that served adult members. Many YMCAs even included special programming for senior citizens, focusing on serving the physical and social needs of the older members.

After delegates to the World Council of the YWCA held the annual conference in Cairo in July 1999, they released their resolutions and recommendations. Their chief issues, in keeping with the mission of the World YWCA, included justice, peace, and the environment, and the ways in which women's leadership could contribute to the solutions. At that time the key goals of the YWCA Global Campaign included encouraging the continuation of current programs, raising awareness of the YWCA movement, and establishing funds for leadership development programs for women and girls. By 2003 the World YWCA included 25 million women from at least 100 different countries.

In August of 2000 the YWCA of the United States, which then numbered 316 local associations, released a report entitled "A Century of Change." According to the report the advocacy issues on which the YWCA planned to focus included childcare, violence prevention, women's health, and voter outreach. Annual events had included a YWCA Week Without Violence, and a YWCA National Day of Commitment to Eliminate Racism, which included a Racial Justice Awards Dinner and a Race Against Racism.

See also Evangelicalism; Gender; Homosexuality; Voluntary Societies; War; Women

References and Further Reading

- Binfield, Clyde. George Williams and the Y.M.C.A.: A Study in Victorian Social Attitudes. London: William Heineman, Ltd., 1973.
- Creedy, Brooks Spivey. Women Behind the Lines: YWCA Program with War Production Workers, 1940–1947. New York: Women's Press, 1949.
- Drury, Clifford M. San Francisco YMCA: 100 Years by the Golden Gate, 1853–1953. Glendale, CA: The Arthur H. Clark Company, 1963.
- Hopkins, C.Howard. History of the Y.M.C.A. in North America. New York: Association Press, 1951.
- Limbert, Paul. "World YMCA Meets in Uganda, Reaffirms its Christocentric Character." The Christian Century 90 no. 31 (1973):860–862.
- Mjagkij, Nina, and Margaret Spratt, eds. Men and Women Adrift: The YMCA and the YWCA in the City. New York: New York University Press, 1997.
- Philips, Kay. "YWCA History—Highlights." YWCA Online Manual. September 1999. http://www.geocities.com/%20ywca_berkeley/historyhl.html.
- Sims, Mary S. The Natural History of a Social Institution—The Young Women's Christian Association. New York: The Women's Press, 1936.
- Wilson, Elizabeth. Fifty Years of Association Work Among Young Women, 1866–1916: A History of Young Women's Christian Associations in the United States of America. New York: National Board of the Young Women's Christian Association of the United States, 1916.
- Winter, Thomas. Making Men, Making Class: The YMCA and Workingmen, 1877–1920. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- . YMCA in America, 1851–2001: A History of Accomplishment Over 150 Years. Chicago: National Council of Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States of America, 2000.

“A Century of Change: Annual Report, September 1, 1999– August 31, 2000.” YWCA of the U.S.A. July 2001. <http://www.ywca.org/docs/AnnRepor.pdf>.

KELLY THERESE POLLOCK

YOUNG, BRIGHAM (1801–1877)

American church leader. Young was born in Whittingham, Vermont on June 1, 1801, the eighth of eleven children of John and Abigail (Nabby) Howe. He died August 29, 1877 in Salt Lake City, Utah from an abdominal disease then called cholera morbus.

The Young family moved to Western New York in 1804 and relocated several times during Brigham's childhood. His mother died when he was 14 years old. In 1817 Brigham apprenticed himself in Auburn, New York, to learn carpentry, painting, and glazing. He did carpentry work at the local prison, the local theological seminary, and at private homes.

In 1823 Young moved to Bucksville (later called Port Byron) on the Erie Canal, where he again worked as a carpenter and helped organize the Bucksville Forensic and Oratorical Society. He married Miriam Angeline Works (1806–1832) in 1824, and they settled in Aurelius, New York until early 1828 when they moved to Oswego. Later that year they moved to Mendon, where a number of his family had already located.

Brigham grew up in a devoutly religious Methodist family. His brothers Phinehas and Joseph served as Methodist ministers. As a youth Brigham listened to the preaching of CIRCUIT RIDERS and attended Methodist CAMP MEETINGS. In 1824 Brigham and Miriam joined the Methodists, apparently attracted by their emphasis on GRACE, free will, the witness of the Spirit, Christian perfectionism, and rejection of the Calvinist doctrine of ELECTION. Local people remembered Young for his "deep piety and faith in God."

Events in 1830 changed the Youngs' lives. In 1830 JOSEPH SMITH of Palmyra, New York published the Book of Mormon and founded the Church of Christ, later renamed the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The church is not Protestant in the narrow sense of that word, but members, who are often called Mormons or Latter-day Saints (LDS), believe their religion to be the restoration of primitive Christianity.

In April 1830 Samuel H. Smith, a brother of Joseph Smith, came to Mendon where he gave Phinehas Young a Book of Mormon. Phinehas read the book and passed it on to the remainder of the family. In April 1832, Brigham, Miriam, and eleven other family members were baptized into the LDS Church. Young began preaching in Western New York and in CANADA.

In MORMONISM Young and his family found answers to troubling questions. The Latter-day Saints believed in continuing revelation, Christ's ATONEMENT, universal SALVATION, and priesthood ordination for all righteous men. They rejected infant BAPTISM and original SIN.

Early in their marriage Young's wife Miriam contracted tuberculosis, from which she died in 1832. Her disability left Brigham to care for the household and children while continuing to work as a carpenter and farm laborer. In the fall of 1833 Brigham moved to Kirtland where Smith had established the LDS church's headquarters. There, Young worked as a builder, and he continued preaching. On February 18, 1834 he married Mary Ann Angell (1803–1882), who helped rear his two children by Miriam and bore six other children.

Brigham joined Zion's Camp, an expedition organized by Smith on May 5, 1834, to travel to Jackson County, Missouri to restore Mormons to homes from which mobs had driven them. The expedition failed, but participants developed a close relationship with Smith and with each other.

In February 1835, at age 34, Young was called as a member of the original Quorum of Twelve Apostles. Smith assigned the Twelve to preach throughout the world and to preside outside the seat of the First Presidency. At first Young and others in the Twelve preached in Ohio, New York, Ontario, and New England. Young also worked on the construction of the Kirtland Temple of the Latter-Day Saints, and he participated in temple ordinances and in Pentecostal experiences such as singing, prophesying, and speaking in tongues.

Shortly thereafter a number of prominent members of the Kirtland temple rebelled against Joseph Smith. Young rejected the dissenters and supported Smith, although fearful of personal injury. Young left for the Mormon settlements in Northern Missouri in late December 1837.

After most Mormons had settled in Missouri, conflicts between them and other Missourians led to the defection of a number of prominent Mormons and the killing of apostle David Patten. By late 1838 these events had made Young the senior apostle. Missouri officials imprisoned Joseph Smith, and Young helped organize the Mormon exodus from Missouri to Illinois.

Young moved his family to Montrose, Iowa in 1839, and then, with most of the Twelve, left on a mission to Great Britain. The Twelve converted hundreds of people before their return to the Mormon settlement of Nauvoo, Illinois in April 1841.

In the spring of 1844 Smith announced his candidacy for the presidency of the United States. Young and others went to the northeastern United States to proselytize and campaign. While there they learned of Smith's assassination. In a special conference in Nauvoo on August 8, 1844 the members voted to accept Young and the Twelve as their leaders.

Continued internal and external conflict led the Mormons to abandon Nauvoo early in 1846, and Young led the exodus. After wintering on the Missouri, the Mormons moved to Utah. Young arrived in the Salt Lake Valley on July 24, 1847. He designated the site for Salt Lake City on July 28, then returned to Council Bluffs, Iowa in August 1847. In a conference at Council Bluffs in December 1847 the members elected him church president and prophet, seer, and revelator. Young returned to Utah in 1848 and remained there the rest of his life.

In presiding over the church, Young recognized no division between the secular and sacred. He directed the establishment of nearly 400 settlements in Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, Arizona, Nevada, Washington, and California. To preside over ecclesiastical and secular work in the settlements Young called bishops with two counselors to lead each congregation, called a ward. Young organized the wards in each county into units called stakes, presided over by a stake president, two counselors, and a twelve-man stake high council. People in the settlements carried out normal tasks such as apportioning land and constructing irrigation works.

Young also presided over the economic development of the territory. He called people on missions to mine gold, iron, lead, and coal. He supervised the establishment of a telegraph line, cooperated in building the transcontinental railroad, directed the construction of local railroads, and founded cooperative stores. In the 1870s he supervised the organization of communitarian United Orders.

Elected governor of the provisional State of Deseret in 1849, he was appointed governor and superintendent of Indian affairs of Utah Territory in 1850. He remained in the position until his removal in 1858. As governor he directed the resistance to an invasion by federal troops in 1857–1858.

Meetinghouses were constructed in the various settlements. To provide for sacred ordinances, Young began the construction of temples in Salt Lake City, St. George, Manti, and Logan, Utah and an endowment house in Salt Lake City. He dedicated the endowment house in 1855 and the St. George Temple in 1877. In the late 1860s Young reestablished the women's Relief Society, which Joseph Smith had inaugurated in Nauvoo. He also organized an auxiliary for young women called the Young Women's Mutual Improvement Association, and he approved a general SUNDAY SCHOOL organization.

He continued the practice of plural marriage, which Joseph Smith had instituted in Nauvoo. Young married at least twenty-three women in addition to his first two wives, Works and Angell. By fourteen of them he fathered forty-nine children.

Young promoted the organization of the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir, encouraged painting and sculpture, and supervised the erection of the Salt Lake Theater.

His principal accomplishments include extensive and successful proselytizing activity, maintaining the integrity of the LDS Church after Joseph Smith's death, supervising the settlement of a large region of the American West, and promoting Christianity, economic development, and a spirituality among the people.

References and Further Reading

- Arrington, Leonard J. Brigham Young: American Moses. New York: Knopf, 1985.
- Black, Susan Easton, and Larry C. Porter, eds. Lion of the Lord: Essays on the Life & Service of Brigham Young. Salt Lake City, UT: Deseret Book, 1995.
- Cornwall, Rebecca, and Richard F. Palmer, "The Religious and Family Background of Brigham Young." BYU Studies 18 (Spring 1978): 286–310.
- Palmer, Richard F., and Karl D. Butler. Brigham Young: The New York Years. Provo, UT: Brigham Young University Press, 1982.

THOMAS G. ALEXANDER

YOUTH FOR CHRIST

This evangelistic organization targeting teenagers emerged during World War II, when young preachers like Torrey Johnson in Chicago and Jack Wyrzten in New York began to hold youth rallies that featured upbeat music, testimonies from servicemen, and sermons tied to current events. By the end of the War “Victory” rallies drew 20,000 to Madison Square Garden in New York and 70,000 to Soldier Field in Chicago, prompting favorable comment in the national press. BILLY GRAHAM was associated with Youth for Christ early in his career. Leaders sold the organization to adults as the solution to juvenile delinquency. They conveyed to teenagers that CONVERSION to Christ held the secret to a fun and fulfilling life. Like their peers in the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS, YFC leaders worked closely with a wide variety of churches and Christian businessmen in an attempt to escape the negative reputation and charge of separatism that lingered from their roots in FUNDAMENTALISM. The organization was international from the beginning, achieving a presence in 100 countries by the early twenty-first century.

In the 1950s YFC leaders experimented with high school BIBLE clubs, Christian films, games, skits, popular music styles, talent contests, and Bible quiz competitions. In the 1960s and 1970s they added ministries to juvenile offenders, urban youth, and teen mothers. YFC provided a training ground for prominent leaders of EVANGELICALISM such as Billy Graham and Bob Pierce who founded WORLD VISION, an international relief organization. YFC pioneered the use of popular culture styles to communicate a traditional evangelistic message and helped popularize such techniques in the larger evangelical movement.

References and Further Reading

Carpenter, Joel A. Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Hefley, James C. God Goes to High School Waco, TX: Word Books, 1970.

Pahl, Jon. Youth Ministry in Modern America. Peabody, MA: Hendrickson Publishers, 2000.

THOMAS E.BERGLER

Z

ZIMBABWE

Zimbabwe is a landlocked country located north of SOUTH AFRICA, east of Zambia and Botswana, and west of Mozambique. San hunter-gatherers, who arrived from the North c. 8000 B.C., were absorbed by Bantu invaders after 500 A.D. The Shona (Bantu) word “Zimbabwe” means “houses of stone” and dates from the fifteenth- to sixteenth-century Munhumutapa kingdom. The Great Zimbabwe, an impressive collection of stone buildings, began to rise on a site in central Zimbabwe in the eleventh century after the gold-mining, cattle-ranching Bantu groups had begun to arrive from the north. Great Zimbabwe was a trading center, fortress, and shrine to the preeminent god Mwari. In the fifteenth century Great Zimbabwe’s control over the region began to decline and centers of political and economic activity became more diverse.

Before the 1890 arrival of Cecil Rhodes’s British South Africa Company (BSAC), the Shona and Ndebele, a Zulu subtribe that migrated from the south, ruled Zimbabwe. Portuguese traders and Catholic missionaries visited the area from Mozambique.

British rule began in 1890 and ended in 1980. The BSAC (1890–1927) defeated the Ndebele and put down a Shona-Ndebele rising (Chimurenga) in 1896. Rhodes detested African culture and stole African land and minerals. The British government ceded political control to Rhodes. Although the BSAC came for gold, not god, Protestant MISSIONS followed the Union Jack into “Rhodesia.” Rhodes allowed white farmers and miners to rule while he aggrandized wealth.

The British termed the blessings and curses they brought to Africa “Western Civilization.” This included capitalism, imperial rule, and the Christian faith. As the BSAC gained wealth, Rhodes allowed missions to supply Western “Christian” culture in schools, clinics, and churches. For these purposes he provided land grants to mission societies and stipends for missionary teachers and doctors. Christian culture meant not only religion, but also Western dress, marriage customs, English language, and deference to whites. Anglo-Americans christened virtually everything African as “heathen” and referred to almost everything Western, including capitalism, as Christian, as they attempted to form a little England in the heart of Africa. The BSAC, British government, and Protestant missions married acquisition of wealth to imperialism and faith.

The London Missionary Society (LMS) was the first Protestant mission in Ndebeleland. In 1859 ROBERT MOFFATT acquired land from Ndebele King Mzilikazi. Mzilikazi’s son Lobengula gave the LMS a second site, although the LMS did not make a single convert in three decades. Land acquisition and friendship with kings were the LMS’s achievements. In 1885 CHURCH OF ENGLAND Bishop George W. KnightBruce from South Africa visited Ndebeleland and gained King Lobengula’s permission to establish a mission. In 1891 South Africa’s DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH set up a mission at Morgenster, and British Methodists and the SALVATION ARMY arrived at Fort Salisbury in Mashonaland. In 1893 the AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS opened a station at Mount Selinda. SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS founded a station at Solusi in 1894. In 1898 Bishop

J.C.Hartzell's American Methodist Episcopal Church opened Old Umtali Mission, and the BRETHREN IN CHRIST founded Matopo Mission.

In the late 1890s other Protestants scrambled into Rhodesia, including the South African General Mission; Church of Christ; Presbyterian Church of South Africa; Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland; Church of Sweden; Swedish Free Church Mission; Free Meth-odist Church; and South African Baptist Missionary Society. Jesuits had set up the first Catholic mission at Empandeni in 1885.

Historian C.J.M.Zvobgo argues that Christian missions in Mashonaland and Ndebeleland shared two understandings between 1859 and 1898. First, as a result of early London Missionary Society and Jesuit experiences, they believed that success depended on breaking Ndebele power in Rhodesia by force. Second, they were indebted to Rhodes for land on which to set up their stations. By 1925 the BSAC had given missions 325,730 acres. The missions purchased an additional 71,085 acres, much of it without the permission of African chiefs or people.

No mission succeeded with the rough white South African miners whose interest was material, not spiritual gain. Thus most missions readily accepted work among Africans, especially when BSAC land grants accompanied their cooperation. Few missionaries raised issues of land confiscation and denial of franchise to Africans with European or American mission boards. Few sought advice of Africans on church policy. Paternalistic notions held that Africans were incompetent in matters of church management. On the whole, deaths of missionaries were seen as "martyrdom" with no connection to land theft or denial of rights.

In 1923 white settler government replaced BSAC rule. In 1965 the settlers declared their independence from Britain to avoid majority African rule. African guerrillas fought a twelve-year war for independence to gain one-person-one-vote democracy. United Nations sanctions, support from a WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES' (WCC) Program to Combat Racism, and the work of other international humanitarian agencies, as well as weapons from Communist states, helped bring majority rule under Robert Mugabe's government in 1980.

Protestants divided over the war. The Salvation Army, Irish Presbyterians, and South Africa's Reformed Church broke with the WCC over grants to "Marxist" insurgents. The Salvation Army, Zimbabwe's fourth largest church, had ninety-eight percent African members who supported independence. However, a 1978 killing of two of its missionary teachers turned its American branch against the WCC. After a brutal war against Nkomo's Ndebele, Mugabe sealed an alliance between Shona and Ndebele that held through the late 1990s turmoil over Mugabe's increasingly autocratic rule.

Zimbabwe's population of eleven million is 71 percent Shona, 16 percent Ndebele, 11 percent other African, and 2 percent Asian and white. The predominant religion is Christian, including African Christian sects. African religions persist, led by shamans who contact ancestors for advice and healing. Christianity has an African flavor in missionary sects and those founded by Africans.

See also Africa; Colonialism

References and Further Reading

- Banana, Canaan, ed. Turmoil & Tenacity: Zimbabwe, 1890–1990. Harare: College Press, 1989.
- Beach, D.N. War & Politics in Zimbabwe, 1840–1900. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1986.
- Murdoch, Norman H. “The World Council of Churches & The Salvation Army, 1978–85.” Association of Third World Studies Conference Proceedings (1996):68–78.
- Ranger, T.O. Revolt in Southern Rhodesia, 1896–97. Evanston, IL: Northwestern University Press, 1967.
- Samkange, Stanlake. Origins of Rhodesia. London: Heinemann, 1968.
- Zvobgo, C.J.M. A History of Christian Missions in Zimbabwe, 1890–1939. Gweru, Zimbabwe: Mambo, 1996.

NORMAN H.MURDOCH

ZINZENDORF, NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON (1700–1760)

Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf (1700–1760) was a theologian and leader of the renewed MORAVIAN CHURCH (Herrnhuter Brüdergemeine) and one of the most original thinkers in eighteenth-century German Protestantism.

Background

Born in Dresden, Saxony, as a descendent of Austrian Protestant nobility, Zinzendorf was raised by his grandmother Henriette von Gersdorf on pietistic principles, and showed early on a lively interest in religious matters. In 1710 he entered the famous Paedagogium of August Hermann Francke (1663–1727) at HALLE, closely observing Francke's missionary and pedagogical projects. In 1716 he was sent to the university, the center of Lutheran ORTHODOXY, to study law. His grand tour (1719–1720) took him to the NETHERLANDS and FRANCE and brought him into close contact with other confessional groups, including Roman Catholicism, through a friendly acquaintance with Cardinal Louis de Noailles. Having entered a position at the Saxon Court, he purchased the Berthelsdorf estate in Upper Lusatia in 1722 and married Erdmuth Dorothea, countess of Reuss (1700–1756).

Herrnhut

Decisive for Zinzendorf's life and theological development was his founding of HERRNHUT in 1722, when Protestant refugees from Moravia sought shelter on his estate. The growth of Herrnhut into a vibrant Pietist colony called for his leadership and gave his evangelistic impulse a specific focus. From 1727 on, when Zinzendorf quit his government post in order to devote himself fully to the Herrnhut community, his career became closely intertwined with the colony's development as an interdenominational renewal movement and mission church. Eager to maintain his ties to the Lutheran confession, Zinzendorf passed a theological examination in 1734 at Stralsund and then assumed the status of a Lutheran minister at Tübingen. Continuing conflicts with Lutheran orthodoxy led to his banishment from Saxony from 1736 to 1747. He spent the following years organizing Moravian communities throughout Europe, was ordained a Moravian bishop in 1737, and traveled to the West Indies (1739) and to Pennsylvania (1741–1743) in order to support the Moravian missionary effort and to evangelize among the Pennsylvania Germans. The newly built Herrnhag settlement near Frankfurt, model for all subsequent Moravian settlement congregations, became the center of Zinzendorf's activities between 1743 to 1749, and saw the most exuberant but also most controversial period of his theology. He lived in London from 1750 to 1755 and spend his last years at Herrnhut. After the death of his wife Erdmuth Dorothea in 1756, he married Anna Nitschmann (1715–1760) in 1757, the eldress of the Moravian single sisters. In 1760 he died at Herrnhut.

Living at the dawn of the modern era, Zinzendorf developed his theology in critical response to Lutheran orthodoxy, ENLIGHTENMENT rationalism, and moralistic PIETISM. The core of Christian faith, according to Zinzendorf, is to know the wounded Christ in one's heart as Lord and Savior. This view combines the emphasis on intuitive and emotional spirituality ("heart-religion") with a christocentric focus on the atonement at the cross ("blood and wounds theology"). God can only be known through the crucified Christ, who is both the creator of human souls and their heavenly bridegroom. At the same time, Zinzendorf stresses Christ's full earthly humanity and suggests that his incarnation has sanctified all human states and experiences, including sexuality, insofar as marital relations reflect and anticipate the mystical union between Christ and the church. This nuptial imagery is complemented with allegorical references to the Trinity as "divine family" and to the Holy Spirit as "mother."

While it is often said that Zinzendorf was not a systematic theologian, his purposeful way of organizing the Moravian communities suggests very precise notions at least in some areas. His concept of the church, for example, distinguishes between the heavenly Communion of Saints, the historical denominations, and the possibility for true believers to come together in interdenominational fellowship. The Moravian community is intended as just such a fellowship, uniting within itself members of many different denominational backgrounds. Denominations, for Zinzendorf, are designed to lead people to God according to their specific insights. This understanding enables him to value the established churches for their particular traditions while maintaining a vision of Christian unity beyond denominational boundaries. A second example is the Moravian mission work, which illuminates Zinzendorf's eschatological emphasis on "first fruits" (cf. Revelations 14:10). Because Christ is Lord over the whole earth, the Moravians are called to go to the most remote and neglected places and sow the seeds of the gospel in preparation for his second coming. The goal is not to convert the masses, but only to make a beginning among those whom the Holy Spirit has prepared as "first fruits" for their people.

Zinzendorf's significance for the Protestant world goes far beyond his leadership among the Moravians. His pioneering efforts in Christian MISSIONS, ECUMENISM, and EDUCATION have long been recognized, and his contributions in other areas—for example, Trinitarian theology, liturgical AESTHETICS, and biblical interpretation—are attracting increasing attention. Zinzendorf had a direct influence on English cleric JOHN WESLEY'S (1703–1791) religious development and paved the way for German theologian FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER'S (1768–1834) concept of religious intuition. In addition, Zinzendorf has often been regarded as a stalwart defender of MARTIN LUTHER'S (1483–1546) theology of the cross against the theological dogmatism and moralism of his time. Just how much his theology really represents Luther's position, however, remains a matter of scholarly debate.

See also Herrnhut; Moravian Church; Lutheranism

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von. Hauptschriften (plus Ergänzungsbände and Materialien und Dokumente). Multivolume reprint edition of Zinzendorf's works edited by Erich Beyreuther and Gerhard Meyer. Hildesheim, Germany: Olms, 1962ff.

. Nine Public Lectures on Important Subjects in Religion, Preached in Fetter Land Chapel in London in the Year 1746. Translated and edited by George W. Forell. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1973.

Secondary Sources:

Beyreuther, Erich. Die große Zinzendorf Triologie. Marburg, Germany: Francke, 1988.

Freeman, Arthur J. An Ecumenical Theology of the Heart: The Theology of Count Nicholas Ludwig von Zinzendorf. Bethlehem, PA: Moravian Church in America, 1998.

Meyer, Dietrich. Bibliographisches Handbuch zur Zinzendorf-Forschung. Düsseldorf: Blech, 1987.

Meyer, Henry H. Child Nature and Nurture According to Nicolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf. New York: Abingdon, 1928.

Lewis, Arthur J. Zinzendorf, the Ecumenical Pioneer: A Study in the Moravian Contribution to Christian Mission and Unity. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1962.

Unitätsarchiv Herrnhut. Graf ohne Grenzen: Leben und Werk von Nikolaus Ludwig Graf von Zinzendorf. Herrnhut, Germany: Comeniusbuchhandlung, 2000.

Weinlick, John R. Count Zinzendorf: The Story of His Life and Leadership in the Renewed Moravian Church. New York: Abingdon Press, 1956.

PETER VOGT

ZION CHURCHES

See African Methodist Episcopal Zion Churches

ZÖLLNER, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1753–1804)

German theologian. Born in Neudamm/Neumark on April 24, 1753, Zöllner studied theology and philosophy in Frankfurt/Oder. He lived first as an independent scholar, becoming connected with the baron Hans Ernst von Kottwitz, who was later the leader of the Erweckungsbewegung (revival movement) of Berlin. In 1779 Zöllner quickly began a prominent church career. First as pastor at the Charité in Berlin and the Marienkirche, he was appointed in 1788 as senior pastor (Propst) of the Nikolaikirche and Oberkonsistorialrat by King Frederick William II. His most important fields of work, engaged on behalf of the king with whom he had close contact, dealt with questions of reform of the public educational system and of the aims of education (Ideen über Nationalerziehung, 1804). Zöllner died in Berlin September 12, 1804.

Two influences determined Zöllner's thinking: the ENLIGHTENMENT and the religiousness of the free-masons. In 1779 Zöllner became a member of a free-masons lodge, and he later became a grand master of the freemason movement in Berlin. Zöllner considered himself a philosopher of Enlightenment, and as a pastor and writer he promoted IMMANUEL KANT'S philosophy (Über spekulative Philosophie, 1789). He was criticized particularly by the theologian Johann Christoph Woellner (1732–1800), whose work Religionsedikt in 1788 was directed against the theology of the Enlightenment.

In addition to his theological, philosophical, and educational work, Zöllner published travel descriptions and popular writing on scientific topics. In Berlin he was a member of the Academy of Sciences (Akademie der Wissenschaften) and the society of nature-exploring friends (Gesellschaft der naturforschenden Freunde).

See also Education, Overview; Freemasonry

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Massey, Charles Carleton, George Stuart Fullerton, and Emma Hardinge Britten. Zöllner: an open letter to Professor George S. Fullerton of the University of Pennsylvania, member and secretary of the Seybert Commission for Investigating Modern Spiritualism. 1887.

Zöllner, Johann Karl Friedrich, Charles Carleton Massey, and Milton Arlanden Bridges.

Transcendental physics: an account of experimental investigations from the scientific treatises of Johann Carl Friedrich Zöllner. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1881.

Zöllner, Johann Karl Friedrich, and Charles Carleton Massey. Transcendental physics: an account of experimental investigations from the science treatises of Johann Carl Friedrich Zöllner. Pomeroy, WA: Health Research, 2000.

Secondary Sources:

Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, vol. 45, 423–425. Leipzig: Duncker & Humblot, 1900.

Maser, Peter. Hans Ernst von Kottwitz. Studien zur Erweckungsbewegung des frühen 19.

Jahrhunderts in Schlesien und Berlin. Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1990.

Schmidt, Valentin Heinrich, and Daniel G.G.Mehring. Neuestes gelehrtes Berlin. vol. 2, 280–288.

Berlin: 1795.

NORBERT FRIEDRICH

ZWINGLI, HULDRYCH (1484–1531)

Swiss theologian. When Zwingli arrived in Zurich in December of 1518, he was an Erasmian humanist. Soon thereafter he came to an evangelical understanding of the Christian message and became the reformer of Zurich. Although Zwingli's fully developed THEOLOGY included similarities with MARTIN LUTHER'S theology, the two men differed on several important doctrines. Zurich was the cradle of Reformed Protestantism, and Zwingli's theology was its foundation. Zwingli's theology continued to influence the Reformed tradition throughout the sixteenth century and beyond.

Early Life

Zwingli was born January 1, 1484, into a well-to-do peasant family in Wildhaus, in the high Toggenburg valley, east of Zurich, Switzerland. He began his university studies at Vienna in 1498, but transferred to the University of Basel in 1502, where he received his bachelor and master of arts degrees in 1504 and 1506. Zwingli's very traditional university education was grounded in the via antiqua—the Aristotelian tradition of Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus.

During the next decade Zwingli became an accomplished humanist. After his ordination as a priest in September 1506 he became pastor at Glarus, not far from Wildhaus, where he taught himself Greek, read widely in the classical and patristic authors, and corresponded with humanist friends. In 1516 Zwingli met the Dutch scholar Desiderius Erasmus (c. 1466–1536), and that same year he was appointed priest at the Benedictine Abbey at Einsiedeln in Schwyz, south of Zurich. There, he continued his humanistic studies, engaging in an intensive study of the Greek New Testament and learning Hebrew.

From Humanist to Reformer

The influence of Erasmus and biblical humanism was evident when Zwingli arrived in Zurich to assume his new responsibilities as common preacher (Leutpriester) at the Great Minster (Grossmünster). In his first sermon, on January 1, 1519, he began to preach consecutively through the Gospel of Matthew, and then through Acts and Paul's epistles to Timothy. In these sermons he focused on the moral purity of the church during the early years of Christianity. However, because he suffered a severe bout with the plague and because his opponents began to criticize his preaching, Zwingli's Erasmian optimism soon began to fade. During the year 1520 Zwingli moved beyond Erasmian humanism and came to a Pauline understanding of human nature and divine grace.

Zwingli claimed that his evangelical understanding of the Christian message began to develop in 1516, but it appears that the crucial process of change from an optimistic humanist to a realistic reformer did not actually begin until late in 1519. Although Zwingli viewed Luther as a fellow humanist in attacking indulgences, tithes, and invocation of the SAINTS, he was unaware of Luther's new distinctive doctrines, such as JUSTIFICATION by faith, until late 1520. Zwingli's new evangelical theology ensued from his own study of the Gospel of John and the writings of Paul and Augustine. There is no evidence that Luther was a profound influence.

When several people broke the Lenten fast by eating sausage during the Lenten season of 1522, Zwingli made his first step toward becoming a reformer. Zwingli did not participate, but he did preach a sermon defending those who broke the fast. He proclaimed that ecclesiastical rules on fasting cannot overrule Christian freedom and that according to Scripture, Christians are free to fast or to eat. Then, in July 1522 Zwingli and ten other priests petitioned the bishop of Constance to abolish CELIBACY, asserting that the ecclesiastical rules on celibacy were fallaciously based only on ecclesiastical authority and had no basis in Scripture. Zwingli himself had already publicly married Anna Reinhard. In August Zwingli publicly rejected the authority of the hierarchy of the church over matters of DOCTRINE and church order, and he condemned the bishop for opposing reform. In September Erasmus wrote a letter to Zwingli, severely criticizing him for his attack on the authority of the church hierarchy.

In each of his attacks on ecclesiastical regulations Zwingli appealed to biblical authority; however, he did not fully explain his position on Scripture until September 1522 when he published On the Clarity and Certainty of the Word of God, where he affirms the exclusive authority of Scripture, which became a hallmark of Protestantism. Although he does not deny the usefulness of church fathers and councils, he clearly states that they cannot add to the authority of Scripture, but only confirm it. The BIBLE is God's word and can be understood correctly only when the believer is taught by God through the Spirit.

Late in 1522 Zwingli was accused of HERESY and treason by the Diet of the Swiss Confederation. Consequently, the Zurich council convened the First Zurich Disputation on January 29, 1523, where Zwingli summarized his theology in the Sixty-seven Articles, or conclusions, which he had prepared for the disputation. The council absolved Zwingli of the charge of heresy and gave him permission to continue his PREACHING from the Bible.

Zwingli the Reformer

In mid-July 1523, Zwingli published his Exposition and Basis of the Conclusions, which expanded on and defended his sixty-seven articles. This comprehensive statement of his reformed theology demonstrates that Zwingli was no longer an Erasmian. He clearly states that the Scripture, inspired by God, stands on its own authority and that the individual needs the Holy Spirit to interpret it. He asserts that one finds SALVATION through faith in Christ, by divine grace. He sees the Eucharist (see LORD'S SUPPER) as a memorial of Christ, a view that became a distinctive doctrine within Reformed Protestantism. In another distinctive doctrine of the Reformed tradition, Zwingli declares that the moral law is a revelation of God's will and has never been abrogated. Finally, asserting that the church exists both as a spiritual body of all the faithful and as local congregations, he contends that the civil government is sovereign over the local Christian community and that it includes everyone, even infants. This is Zwingli's doctrine of the "single sphere" that became a distinctive feature of later ZWINGLIANISM.

Two weeks later Zwingli published On Divine and Human Righteousness to demonstrate that his views were neither politically nor socially subversive and to justify the authority of the Christian magistracy. Zwingli asserted that divine righteousness, as expressed by the love commandment, concerns only the inner person, because humans are incapable of fully loving their neighbors as themselves. For that reason God gave other commandments, the moral law, which is expressed in the laws of the civil magistracy. This is human righteousness, a "poor weak righteousness," which concerns only the outer person. Everyone is obliged to obey these commandments and laws of the Christian government. Nonetheless, Zwingli urged the government to bring its laws (human righteousness) into harmony with the law of God (divine righteousness) as much as possible.

In late October of 1523, because many of the LAITY were dissatisfied with the pace of reform, the council convened a Second Disputation to meet to discuss images in the churches and the essence of the Mass. The council decided to keep images in the churches and to maintain the Mass for a period of time, until it was clear what should be done. Some of Zwingli's more radical followers now began to deny that the government had any authority over the church; images should be removed and the Mass abolished immediately. Zwingli, however, true to his doctrine of the single sphere, asserted that the civil magistrate is responsible for the implementation of reform measures. Finally, in June 1524, the council ordered the removal and destruction of pictures and images from the churches, although the reformed Lord's Supper did not replace the Mass until Easter week 1525.

In March 1525 Zwingli published A Commentary on the True and False Religion, a crucial work in which he contends that the true religion—as opposed to the false religion of the church of Rome—is derived from Scripture. Zwingli rejects monastic vows, purgatory, and the invocation of the saints, and he denounces the pope as the ANTICHRIST. Moreover, he accepts only BAPTISM and the Eucharist as sacraments. Furthermore, he clearly states his evangelical doctrine of salvation by faith through God's grace and specifically rejects the semi-Pelagianism of Roman Catholicism. Finally, Zwingli assures the reader that the true religion does not promote civil disorder, but rather supports a godly ruler. In short, this treatise touches on all of the basic points that became an enduring part of Reformed doctrine.

During the year 1525 Zurich became a reformed city and canton, when the council secularized the monasteries and created a new marriage court to replace the bishop's court in Constance. Zwingli, now the acknowledged reformer of Zurich, defended the right of the civil government to implement the reform at every step.

The radicals, however, completely rejected the doctrine of the single sphere when they asserted that the Bible did not support infant baptism and expressed their ideal of a congregation of committed Christians, separate from the state church and free of governmental control. Baptism, they said, symbolizes the faith and commitment of adults. Early in 1525 they challenged Zwingli's status as a reformer by baptizing each other as adults and forming their own self-disciplining congregation. In May 1525 Zwingli denounced ANABAPTISM and defended his own understanding of baptism in On Baptism, Anabaptism, and Infant Baptism. He declares that baptism is a sign or a symbol that the infant belongs to God; it is a sacrament of the new COVENANT, which has replaced circumcision, the sacrament of the old covenant. Again, in 1527, he rebutted the Anabaptist teachings' point by point, in his Refutation of the Tricks of the Anabaptists. Clarifying his doctrine of the covenant, he asserts that the new covenant with Christians is simply the renewal of the old covenant that God made with Abraham. Throughout his writings against the Anabaptists, Zwingli stresses the authority of the Christian government over the Christian community. Zwingli conceived of his doctrine of the covenant in conjunction with HEINRICH BULLINGER (1509–1575), who succeeded Zwingli as leader of the Zurich church. Bullinger further developed the doctrine that became an integral part of the theology of Reformed Protestantism.

In the midst of his confrontation with the Anabaptists, Zwingli also became involved in a controversy with Luther over the Eucharist. Zwingli held a symbolic view of the Eucharist: the bread and the wine signify the body and blood of Christ, but Christ is not physically present in these elements. Nor is the Eucharist itself a means of grace; rather, it is a sign pointing to salvation. In February 1526 Zwingli specifically attacked Luther's teaching of the real presence in his Clear Explanation of the Supper of Christ. He also explained that Christians celebrate the Lord's Supper as a communal meal in memory and thanksgiving, much as the Jews observed the Passover Feast in the old covenant. This publication resulted in a bitter controversy, waged in print, between Zwingli and Luther concerning the proper interpretation of the Eucharist. Early in October 1529 the two men met in person, for the first and only time, at the MARBURG COLLOQUY, to discuss the theological issues of the day. Although they were able to come to an agreement on fourteen doctrines, Zwingli and Luther could not resolve their differences on the Eucharist. This event marks the genesis of the Reformed tradition within Protestantism. It was the initial division of Protestantism into confessional parties.

The Final Years

After Marburg, Zwingli wrote three important treatises: Account of the Faith (July 1530); On the Providence of God (August 1530); and Exposition of the Christian Faith (July 1531). All of these works are intensely anti-Lutheran, particularly in their treatment of the Eucharist. Zwingli also unequivocally disagreed with Luther on the matter of gospel and law. Zwingli did not oppose gospel and law, as Luther did; nor did Zwingli believe that the moral law has been abrogated for Christians. Rather, he asserted that the moral law is the revelation of the will of God for the Christian. Zwingli included the law within the gospel; he tied faith and works together and taught that the law continues to inform the Christian of the duty to live according to God's will. The Christian, justified by faith, must evidence faith through the new works of faith. Zwingli's close connection between gospel and law informed Reformed Protestantism well into the seventeenth century.

In the treatise on providence, Zwingli dealt with PREDESTINATION, asserting that only the elect will come to Christ through faith. Faith is a sign of ELECTION; without election faith is impossible. Because children of Christians are in the covenant, they must be seen as elect persons until they evidence lack of faith. Moreover, according to Zwingli, children of believing parents who die as children are of the elect. Zwingli even included virtuous pagans—such as Socrates—among the elect because God is sovereign and his election is free. When discussing predestination Zwingli always stressed election over reprobation. He did not develop a doctrine of “double predestination”; he spoke only of the decree of election to salvation. This moderate view of single predestination was one of the doctrines that later distinguished Zwinglianism from CALVINISM within Reformed Protestantism.

Political tensions were high within the Swiss Confederation in June of 1529 when war between the Catholic and Reformed states was narrowly avoided. By that time several other Swiss states, including Bern and Basel, had joined Zurich in the Reformed faith. However, when the Catholic Swiss states did declare war on Zurich on October 9, 1531, none of the Reformed states came to Zurich's aid. The Catholic forces attacked at Kappel, south of Zurich, on October 11, and in less than an hour the Reformed forces were defeated. Five hundred Zurichers were killed, including Zwingli, himself a combatant.

Even though Zwingli died, Zwinglianism continued to thrive under the leadership of Bullinger. As Zwingli's successor at Zurich, Bullinger fostered and cultivated the Zwinglian doctrines of the single sphere, the covenant, the Eucharist, the moral law, and predestination.

References and Further Reading

Primary Sources:

Egli, Emil, and Georg Finsler. “Huldreich Zwinglis sämtliche Werke.” In Corpus Reformatorum. Berlin: Schwetschke, 1905-.

Furcha, E.J., and H.Wayne Pipkin, translator. Selected Writings of Huldrych Zwingli. 2 vols. Allison Park, PA: Pickwick Publications, 1984.

Jackson, Samuel Macauley, ed. The Latin Works and the Correspondence of Huldreich Zwingli. 3 vols. New York: Putnam, 1912–1929.

Secondary Sources:

Gäbler, Ulrich. Huldrych Zwingli: Eine Einführung in sein Leben und sein Werk. Munich: C. H. Beck, 1983; translated by Ruth C.L.Gritsch as Huldrych Zwingli: His Life and Work. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1986.

- Locher, Gottfried W. Huldrych Zwingli in neuer Sicht. Zurich: Zwingli Verlag, 1969; translated by Milton Aylor and Stuart Casson as Zwingli's Thought: New Perspectives. Leiden, Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1981.
- Potter, G.R. Zwingli. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Stevens, W.P. The Theology of Huldrych Zwingli. Oxford, UK: Clarendon Press, 1986.
- Walton, Robert C. Zwingli's Theocracy. Toronto: Toronto University Press, 1967.
- Wandel, Lee Palmer. Always Among Us: Images of the Poor in Zwingli's Zurich. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

J.WAYNE BAKER

ZWINGLIANISM

Reformed Protestantism began with Zwinglianism, named after the Swiss theologian HULDRYCH ZWINGLI (1484–1531). Nevertheless, Zwingli's successor HEINRICH BULLINGER was equally responsible for the development of Zwinglian THEOLOGY. Zwinglianism spread from Zurich to other Swiss states and to most areas in Europe, but it was particularly influential in ENGLAND and the NETHERLANDS. The Zwinglian doctrines on the COVENANT, the Eucharist (or LORD'S SUPPER), and the moral law became part of the established theology of Reformed Protestantism; however, by the early seventeenth century, the Zwinglian positions on PREDESTINATION and the relationship of the church to the state were, for the most part, overshadowed by orthodox CALVINISM.

The Formation and Spread of Zwinglianism

The death of Zwingli and the defeat of Zurich in the battle of Kappel in 1531 were severe setbacks for Reformed Protestantism. However, Zwinglianism entered a second phase when Bullinger was chosen to replace Zwingli as the leader of the Zurich church. Bullinger's great influence in the spread of Zwingli-anism beyond the Swiss Confederation was attributed to his voluminous correspondence (more than 12,000 extant letters) and his prodigious publications (119 separate works in German and Latin). His Second HELVETIC CONFESSION—published in Latin in 1566 and translated into German, French, English, Dutch, Italian, Polish, and Hungarian—is a manifestation of his widespread importance. However, Bullinger's most crucial work for the spread of Zwinglianism was his Decades, a collection of fifty didactic sermons arranged topically into five groups of ten sermons. First published in Latin from 1549 to 1551, the Decades went through six additional editions in Latin by the end of the century, including one published in London in 1587. Moreover, the Decades was published in four German, three French, three English, and ten Dutch editions. Many of Bullinger's other works were also translated into French, Dutch, and English.

In these works, Bullinger clarified the theology of Zwinglianism. One of his first endeavors as leader of the Zurich church was to defend Zwingli's orthodoxy, which was being challenged by both Catholics and Lutherans. Against them, Bullinger declared that Zwingli died as a MARTYR and a prophet, not as a heretic; military defeat did not imply false DOCTRINE. Throughout his long tenure as leader of the Zurich church, Bullinger maintained that he was continuing the work of Zwingli, but, in reality, Bullinger established his own interpretation of Zwingli. Therefore, the term Zwinglianism encompasses the thought of both Bullinger and Zwingli.

Distinctive Doctrines of Zwinglianism

Five distinctive Reformed doctrines emerged from the theology of Bullinger and Zwingli. First and foremost, the concept of the covenant became a key doctrine in Reformed Protestantism. Zwingli used the doctrine of the covenant in his writings against ANABAPTISM, but he did not develop it as thoroughly as Bullinger did. Bullinger made the covenant a pervasive doctrine in his theology; he was the father of Reformed COVENANT theology. Bullinger maintained that there is only one covenant in human history, which was first made with Adam, then renewed throughout Old Testament times, and, finally, renewed and fulfilled by Christ. This is a mutual, bilateral covenant, in which God promises to be all-sufficient. The covenant conditions for humans are faith and love of one's neighbor. For Bullinger the entire Scripture is the record of the covenant.

A carefully stated doctrine of single predestination was the second distinctive teaching of Zwinglianism. Both Zwingli and Bullinger affirmed God's ELECTION of those who will have faith, although neither of them developed a doctrine of reprobation. Bullinger taught that the offer of the gospel is universal and that those who reject God's grace do so willingly and freely. Those who have faith are the elect; they are saved by God's free grace. For Bullinger election means inclusion in the people of God, in the covenant, but it does not threaten exclusion. Bullinger never acceded to JOHN CALVIN'S doctrine of "double predestination," which became the generally accepted point of view in Reformed Protestantism by the early seventeenth century.

The third distinctive doctrine of Zwinglianism was its doctrine of the Eucharist. Zwingli and Bullinger viewed the Lord's Supper as a remembrance of the sacrificed body and blood of Christ. They taught that both the Eucharist and Baptism as sacraments are visible signs of God's invisible grace and reminders to God's people of their responsibilities to fulfill the covenant conditions. BAPTISM enrolls the infant into the covenant and obligates the individual to keep the conditions of the covenant, just as circumcision did in the Old Testament. The Eucharist is a spiritual, sacramental eating, through faith, in memory of the single sacrifice of Christ, reminding the individual of the responsibility of living a pious life and loving one's neighbor. Bullinger and Calvin were initially at odds on the Eucharist, but they were eventually able to forge an agreement in the Zurich Consensus (Consensus Tigurinus) of 1549. There, they concurred that the Lord's Supper is not simply a simile for the spiritual meal; rather, the sacrament functions as the external sealing of an inner, invisible work. Without admitting that he had done so, Bullinger thus relinquished Zwingli's position because Zwingli never would have agreed to such a connection between the external and the internal.

The Zwinglian affirmation of the continuing importance of the moral law in the life of the Christian was its fourth distinctive doctrine. Bullinger agreed with Zwingli's teaching that the moral law is God's will for the Christian, but Bullinger made a more direct connection between the moral law and the conditions of the covenant. The moral law, as stated in the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments, is a paraphrase of those conditions; the Love Commandment is a summary of the Decalogue and thus a concise statement of the covenant conditions of faith and love of one's neighbor. Therefore, the moral law continues to play an active role in the life of a Christian. This Zwinglian emphasis on the continuing importance of the moral law became a fundamental feature of Calvin's theology and within Reformed Protestantism generally.

Finally, Bullinger built on Zwingli's doctrine of the single sphere. There is a single Christian community—the church and the civil community are coterminous. At baptism an individual becomes a member of the covenanted community, which is ruled by the civil magistracy. The pastors, like the Old Testament prophets, make the conditions of the covenant (God's will) known to the people. Similarly, the rulers, like the Old Testament kings, enforce the conditions of the covenant. Calvin, however, held to the two kingdoms theory, distinguishing between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions and maintaining that CHURCH DISCIPLINE must be put in the hands of a CONSISTORY made up of pastors and elders.

The breach between Bullinger and Calvin over predestination and the nature of the Christian community ensured a rift over these issues between Zwinglianism and Calvinism throughout the sixteenth century.

The Struggle over Discipline

By the middle of the sixteenth century, the differences between the Zwinglians and the Calvinists over the nature of the Christian community began to become apparent. In 1553 the Genevan city council confronted Calvin over the role of the Consistory, insisting that only the council had the right to excommunicate and rejecting the claims of the Consistory to that right. Calvin sought Bullinger's assistance, and, despite his aversion to an independent ecclesiastical court, Bullinger came to Calvin's aid by convincing the Zurich city council to give support to Calvin. In their letter to the Genevan authorities, the Zurich magistrates judged that, given the circumstances in Geneva, Calvin's form of church discipline was not utterly improper.

The issue of church discipline soon erupted again, in the Vaud, which had been conquered by Bern in 1536. In 1558 THEODORE BEZA attempted to establish an autonomous Calvinist Consistory at Lausanne, but the Bernese magistrates, who embraced the Zwinglian doctrine of the single sphere, would not allow a discipline separate from governmental control. Consequently, Beza left Lausanne and joined Calvin in Geneva. After Calvin's death Beza remained committed to the idea of an independent church discipline in the hands of a Consistory.

One particularly important struggle over discipline involved both Bullinger and Beza. In 1563 Friedrich III, elector of the Palatinate, aligned his church with Zwinglianism with a Zwinglian type of church discipline. The Calvinists, however, agitated for a church court with independent powers of discipline, and in 1568 a public debate over the issue took place. The Calvinists were victorious when a new system of discipline, including a church court, was introduced in 1570.

During the controversy THOMAS ERASTUS (Lüber) was the leading defender of the Zwinglian doctrine of the single sphere. Erastus prepared a treatise attacking the Genevan two kingdoms theory and sent a copy both to Bullinger and to Beza. In reply, Beza defended the Calvinist two kingdoms theory. Although Bullinger fully supported Erastus, in the interest of peace he persuaded both Beza and Erastus not to publish their treatises. Nonetheless, in 1589, six years after Erastus's death, his treatise was published in London, and it continued to influence Reformed Protestantism, especially in England.

Zwinglianism in England

Zwinglianism had an early and continuing impact in England. In the early 1530s, during the reign of HENRY VIII, WILLIAM TYNDALE was among the first to be influenced by Zwingli's teaching on the Eucharist and by Bullinger's doctrine of the covenant. In 1541 MILES COVERDALE translated two of Bullinger's writings, The old fayth and The Christen state of Matrimonye, into English.

John Hooper, bishop of Gloucester and Worcester under Edward VI, spent two years in Zurich absorbing the Zwinglian doctrines of the single sphere, the covenant, and the Eucharist. Hooper's Zwinglian doctrine of the Eucharist is reflected in the Second Book of Common Prayer (1552). Several prominent English churchmen, including JOHN JEWEL, bishop of Salisbury under ELIZABETH I, had sought refuge in Zurich during the reign of Catholic Queen Mary. Moreover, Elizabeth's second archbishop of Canterbury, Edmund Grindal, was converted to Reformed Protestantism by the writings of Bullinger.

Hundreds of letters were exchanged between Bullinger and the leaders of the Elizabethan church, and a total of forty English editions involving twenty of Bullinger's works were published between 1538 and 1587. During the 1570s and 1580s the English version of his Decades (three editions: 1577, 1584, and 1587) became required reading for the theological education of many English ministers.

By the 1590s the Zwinglian view of the single sphere was well known in England, but the competing Genevan two kingdoms theory—expressed by the Presbyterians—was also a powerful factor in England by the end of the century. JOHN WHITGIFT was the principal apologist for English Erastianism against PRESBYTERIANISM. Hundreds of times in his writings, he invoked the words of Zwingli, Bullinger, and other Zwinglians to buttress his own arguments.

Whitgift was the patron of RICHARD HOOKER, whose Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity also show evidence of the influence of Zwinglianism. The Erastians in the Long Parliament and the Westminster Assembly during the 1640s were similarly influenced by Zurich. Finally, THOMAS HOBBS'S Leviathan shows that the sixteenth-century Erastians were his forebears as well, although he departs from the earlier Erastians when he states that religious truth is whatever the civil sovereign determines it to be.

Zwinglianism in the Netherlands

Zwinglianism had a profound influence in the Netherlands. Bullinger's Decades first appeared in Dutch in 1563 and soon became one of the most widely read devotional books in the Netherlands. The Decades was also used by preachers in the DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH and was even read from the pulpit along with biblical passages. Furthermore, beginning in the early seventeenth century, the chaplains on the ships of the Dutch East India Company were required to read from Bullinger's Decades, thus making it a basic source for Christian education in the Dutch colonies.

However, sixteenth-century Dutch thinkers—forerunners of the REMONSTRANTS, who taught a conditional covenant in tandem with either a doctrine of single predestination or outright universalism—also appealed to the Decades. Early in the seventeenth century, the Remonstrants declared that Bullinger was in complete agreement with them and that he disagreed with Calvin's doctrine of double predestination. However, the Counter-Remonstrants disagreed, claiming that Bullinger's doctrine of predestination was in complete accord with Calvin's doctrine. In 1618 Johann Jacob Breitingering, the leader of the Zurich church, addressed the Synod of Dort, arguing that Bullinger agreed fully with Calvin on predestination. Although Bullinger himself would not have agreed with either side at Dort, his name was nonetheless sullied by the Remonstrants and his influence in the Netherlands dwindled. Of the forty-four different editions of Bullinger's works published in the Netherlands, only seven were published after Dort—one in 1619, four in 1621 and 1622, one in 1645, and one in 1665.

The Remonstrants and Calvinists also disagreed on the relationship of the church with the government. The Calvinists insisted on an independent church discipline by a Consistory to ensure that only true Christians would partake of the Lord's Supper. The Remonstrants desired a comprehensive church, under the authority of a Christian government, with the Eucharist open to all who wished to participate. They thus followed the Zwinglian model, in keeping with the thirty-sixth article of the BELGIC CONFESSIO, which gave the magistrate authority over the church. As a consequence of the Calvinists' triumph at Dort, Calvinism became the official religion and was favored politically and economically by the government. Nonetheless, the civil authorities, who argued that the Reformed church now existed under a Christian government, continued to exercise authority over the church in the Netherlands.

Conclusion

The Zwinglian doctrines on the Lord's Supper and the moral law endured as characteristic doctrines in all Reformed churches. The Zwinglian doctrine of the covenant also persisted in Reformed theology, as evidenced in the WESTMINSTER CONFESSIO of Faith (1647), Scottish covenant theology, and the covenant thought of JOHANNES COCEJUS. Moreover, the new federal political theory of JOHANNES ALTHUSIUS was founded partially on Zwinglian covenant theology. Even the Zwinglian moderate view of predestination endured as a Reformed alternative to orthodox Calvinism in the thought of such men as Moise Amyraut. However, the Zwinglian doctrine of the single sphere was replaced in the Reformed tradition by the two kingdoms theory of Presbyterianism and CONGREGATIONALISM.

References and Further Reading

- Baker, J.Wayne. Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant: The Other Reformed Tradition. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980.
- . “Faces of Federalism: From Bullinger to Jefferson.” Publius: The Journal of Federalism 30 no. 4 (2000):25–41.
- . “Erastianism in England: The Zurich Connection.” In Die Zürcher Reformation: Ausstrahlungen und Rückwirkungen (The Zurich Reformation: Influences and Consequences), 327–349. Bern: Peter Lang, 2001.
- Duke, Alistair. Reformation and Revolt in the Low Countries. London: The Hambledon Press, 1990.
- Gäbler, Ulrich, and Erland Herkenrath. Heinrich Bullinger, 1504–1575: Gesammelte Aufsätze zum 400 Todestag (Heinrich Bullinger, 1504–1575: Collected Essays for the 400th Anniversary of His Death). vol. 2. Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1975.
- Hollweg, Walter. Heinrich Bullingers Hausbuch (Heinrich Bullinger’s Housebook). Neukirchen, Germany: Verlag der Buchhandlung des Erziehungsvereins, 1956.
- Locher, Gottfried W. Die Zwinglische Reformation im Rahmen der europäischen Kirchengeschichte (The Zwinglian Reformation within the Framework of European Church History). Göttingen, Germany: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979.
- McCoy, Charles, and J.Wayne Baker. Fountainhead of Federalism: Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenantal Tradition. Louisville, KY: Westminster/John Knox Press, 1991.

J.WAYNE BAKER

APPENDIX

Statistics of Global Protestantism in a Variety of Contexts

- Table 1. Worldwide adherents of all religions by six continental areas, mid-2000.
Table 2. Religious adherents in the United States of America, AD 1900–2000.
Table 3. Protestant-affiliated church members in the world’s 238 countries and six continents, in the context of the five other major Christian traditions.
Table 4. Organized Protestantism and its core global membership ranked by its 27 ecclesiastico-cultural major traditions or families, AD 1970–2025.
Table 5. Statistics describing each of the 45 ministries of evangelism.

Sources: All data in the statistical tables are courtesy of David B.Barrett and Todd M.Johnson, Center for World Evangelization Research and Center for the Study of Global Christianity, Richmond, Virginia. Tables 1 and 2 are reprinted from the Encyclopedia Britannica Book of the Year 2003, with permission. All data in Table 3 may be seen in wider and fuller contexts and formats in D.B.Barrett, G.T.Kurian, and T.M.Johnson, World Christian Encyclopedia: A Comparative Survey of Churches and Religions in the Modern World, 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001; and World Christian Trends, AD 30-AD 2200: Interpreting the Annual Christian Megacensus. Pasadena, CA: William Carey Library, 2001.

Definition of “Protestants”: As explained in this Encyclopedia’s article “Statistics,” there are two usages of the term. (1) The more common usage accepted by most observers restricts the term “Protestants” to those denominations and confessions using the term to describe themselves. In the aforementioned article we describe them by the term “Core Protestants.” (2) A less common but still widespread usage includes Anglicans, Independents, and Marginal Christians as Protestants although these three reject the term; for clarity, we describe all four as making up “Wider Protestants.” The four tables in this Appendix use only this first usage of “Protestants” and for rapid access all their statistical lines and columns are given here in boldface type. Readers wanting totals of “Wider Protestants” can readily obtain them by adding all four categories (columns 3, 4, 5, and 6 in Table 3).

Table 1. Worldwide adherents of all religions by six continental areas, mid-2000

	Africa	Asia	Europe	Latin America	Northern America	Oceania	World	%	Number of Countries
Christians	360,232,000	312,849,000	559,643,000	481,102,000	260,624,000	25,110,000	1,999,560,000	33.0	238
Affiliated Christians	335,116,000	307,288,000	536,832,000	475,659,000	212,167,000	21,375,000	1,888,437,000	31.2	238
Roman Catholics	120,386,000	110,480,000	285,978,000	461,220,000	71,035,000	8,228,000	1,057,327,000	17.5	235
Protestants	89,001,000	49,967,000	77,529,000	48,132,000	69,978,000	7,392,000	341,999,000	5.6	233
Orthodox	35,304,000	14,113,000	158,105,000	558,000	6,342,000	706,000	215,128,000	3.6	135
Anglicans	42,542,000	727,000	26,637,000	1,090,000	3,244,000	5,409,000	79,649,000	1.3	166
Other Christians	86,268,000	157,218,000	29,288,000	46,301,000	90,769,000	1,966,000	411,810,000	6.8	223
Unaffiliated Christians	25,116,000	5,561,000	22,811,000	5,443,000	48,458,000	3,735,000	111,124,000	1.8	236
Non-Christians	424,213,000	3,369,701,000	169,244,000	38,036,000	49,007,000	5,283,000	4,055,484,000	67.0	238
Atheists	420,000	121,945,000	22,922,000	2,757,000	1,680,000	365,000	150,089,000	2.5	161
Baha'is	1,733,000	3,475,000	130,000	873,000	786,000	110,000	7,107,000	0.1	218
Buddhists	134,000	354,651,000	1,547,000	647,000	2,701,000	301,000	359,981,000	5.9	126
Chinese folk religionists	32,000	383,408,000	255,000	194,000	854,000	64,000	384,807,000	6.4	89
Confucianists	0	6,264,000	11,000	0	0	24,000	6,299,000	0.1	15
Ethnic religionists	96,805,000	128,298,000	1,263,000	1,288,000	444,000	268,000	228,366,000	3.8	142
Hindus	2,351,000	805,120,000	1,416,000	768,000	1,327,000	355,000	811,337,000	13.4	114
Jains	66,000	4,145,000	0	0	7,000	0	4,218,000	0.1	10
Jews	214,000	4,429,000	2,527,000	1,142,000	6,024,000	97,000	14,433,000	0.2	134
Mandeans	0	39,000	0	0	0	0	39,000	0.0	2
Muslims	317,374,000	832,879,000	31,566,000	1,672,000	4,450,000	301,000	1,188,242,000	19.6	204
New-Religi	28,000	100,639,000	158,000	623,000	842,000	66,000	102,356,000	1.7	60

onists
Shintoists	0	2,699,000	0	7,000	56,000	0	2,762,000	0.0	8
Sikhs	53,000	22,421,000	239,000	0	528,000	18,000	23,259,000	0.4	34
Spiritists	3,000	2,000	133,000	12,039,000	151,000	7,000	12,335,000	0.2	55
Zoroastrians	1,000	2,463,000	1,000	0	78,000	1,000	2,544,000	0.0	24
Other religiousists	5,092,000	611,262,000	107,076,000	16,026,000	29,079,000	3,306,000	771,841,000	12.7	76
Non religious	5,024,000	608,594,000	106,841,000	15,928,000	28,473,000	3,298,000	768,158,000	12.7	236
Total population	784,445,000	3,682,550,000	728,887,000	519,138,000	309,631,000	30,393,000	6,055,044,000	100.0	238

Continents. These follow current UN demographic terminology, which now divides the world into the six major areas shown above. See United Nations, World Population Prospects: The 1998 Revision (New York: UN, 1999), with populations of all continents, regions, and countries covering the period 1950–2050. Note that “Asia” now includes the former Soviet Central Asian states and “Europe” now includes all of Russia extending eastward to Vladivostok, the Sea of Japan, and the Bering Strait.

Countries. The last column enumerates sovereign and nonsovereign countries in which each religion or religious grouping has a numerically significant and organized following.

Adherents. As defined in the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a person’s religion is what he or she says it is. Totals are enumerated for each of the world’s 238 countries following the methodology of the World Christian Encyclopedia, 2nd ed. (2001), using recent censuses, polls, literature, and other data.

Christians. Followers of Jesus Christ affiliated with churches (church members, including children: 1,888,437,000) plus persons professing in censuses or polls to be Christians though not so affiliated. Figures for the subgroups of Christians do not add up to the totals in the first line because some Christians adhere to more than one denomination.

Other Christians. This term in the table denotes Catholics (non-Roman), marginal Protestants, independents, postdenominationalists, crypto-Christians, and adherents of African, Asian, Black, and Latin American indigenous churches.

Atheists. Persons professing atheism, skepticism, disbelief, or irreligion, including the antireligious (opposed to all religion).

Buddhists. 56% Mahayana, 38% Theravada (Hinayana), 6% Tantrayana (Lamaism).

Chinese folk-religionists. Followers of traditional Chinese religion (local deities, ancestor veneration, Confucian ethics, Taoism, universalism, divination, and some Buddhist elements).

Confucianists. Non-Chinese followers of Confucius and Confucianism, mostly Koreans in Korea.

Ethnic religionists. Followers of local, tribal, animistic, or shamanistic religions.

Hindus. 70% Vaishnavites, 25% Shaivites, 2% neo-Hindus and reform Hindus. Jews. Adherents of Judaism. For detailed data on “core” Jewish population, see the annual “World Jewish Populations” article in the American Jewish Committee’s American Jewish Year Book.

Muslims. 83% Sunnites, 16% Shi’ites, 1% other schools. Until 1990 the Muslims in the former U.S.S.R. who had embraced communism were not included as Muslims in this table. After the collapse of communism in 1990–91, these Muslims were once again enumerated as Muslims if they had returned to Islamic profession and practice.

New-Religionists. Followers of Asian 20th-century New Religions, New Religious movements, radical new crisis religions, and non-Christian syncretistic mass religions, all founded since 1800 and most since 1945.

Other religionists. Including 70 minor world religions and more than 10,000 national or local religions and a large number of spiritist religions, New Age religions, quasi religions, pseudoreligions, parareligions, religious or mystic systems, and religious and semireligious brotherhoods of numerous varieties.

Nonreligious. Persons professing no religion, nonbelievers, agnostics, freethinkers, or dereligionized secularists indifferent to all religion.

Total Population. UN medium variant figures for mid-2000, as given in World Population Prospects: The 1998 Revision.

Table 2. Religious adherents in the United States of America, AD 1900–2000

	Year 1900	%	1910				Annual change, 1990–1995				2000
			mid-1910	%	mid-1910	%	Natural	Conversion	Total	Rate (%)	mid-1995	%	mid-2000	%
Christians	73,270,000	96.4	191,182,000	91.0	217,719,000	85.7	2,218,400	-245,000	1,973,400	0.89	227,586,000	85.2	235,742,000	84.6
Affiliated Christians	54,425,000	71.6	153,299,000	73.0	175,820,000	69.2	1,791,400	-107,000	1,684,400	0.94	184,242,000	69.0	191,828,000	68.8
Roman Catholics	10,775,000	14.2	48,305,000	23.0	56,500,000	22.2	575,700	-532,700	43,000	0.08	56,715,000	21.2	58,000,000	20.8
Protestants	35,000,000	46.1	58,568,000	27.9	60,216,000	23.7	613,500	-151,700	461,800	0.76	62,525,000	23.4	64,570,000	23.2
Anglicans	1,600,000	2.1	3,196,000	1.5	2,450,000	1.0	25,000	-26,000	-1,000	-0.04	2,445,000	0.9	2,400,000	0.9
Orthodox	400,000	0.5	4,163,000	2.0	5,150,000	2.0	52,500	11,900	64,400	1.22	5,472,000	2.0	5,762,000	2.1
Independents	5,850,000	7.7	35,645,000	17.0	66,900,000	26.3	681,600	527,000	1,208,600	1.74	72,943,000	27.3	78,550,000	28.2
Marginal Christians	800,000	1.1	6,126,000	2.9	8,940,000	3.5	91,100	21,300	112,400	1.23	9,502,000	3.6	10,080,000	3.6
Multiple affiliation	0	0.0	-2,704,000	-1.3	-24,336,000	-9.6	-248,000	43,200	-204,800	-0.83	-25,360,000	-9.5	-27,534,000	-9.9
Evangelicals	32,068,000	42.2	31,516,000	15.0	37,349,000	14.7	380,600	12,400	393,000	1.03	39,314,000	14.7	40,640,000	14.6
Evangelicals	11,000,000	14.5	45,500,000	21.7	87,656,000	34.5	893,100	267,100	1,160,200	1.29	93,457,000	35.0	98,662,000	35.4
Unaffiliated Christians	18,845,000	24.8	37,883,000	18.0	41,899,000	16.5	426,900	-137,900	289,000	0.68	43,344,000	16.2	43,914,000	15.8
Non-Christians	2,725,000	3.6	18,929,000	9.0	36,357,000	14.3	370,400	245,000	615,400	1.64	39,434,000	14.8	42,915,000	15.4
Atheists	1,000	0.0	200,000	0.1	770,000	0.3	7,800	28,200	36,000	4.29	950,000	0.4	1,150,000	0.4
Baha'is	3,000	0.0	138,000	0.1	600,000	0.2	6,100	10,300	16,400	2.60	682,000	0.3	753,000	0.3
Buddhists	30,000	0.0	200,000	0.1	1,880,000	0.7	19,200	34,800	54,000	2.72	2,150,000	0.8	2,450,000	0.9
Chinese folk religionists	70,000	0.1	90,000	0.0	76,000	0.0	800	-600	200	0.26	77,000	0.0	78,000	0.0
Hindus	1,000	0.0	100,000	0.0	750,000	0.3	7,600	28,400	36,000	4.40	930,000	0.3	1,032,000	0.4
Jews	1,500,000	2.0	6,700,000	3.2	5,535,000	2.2	56,400	-43,400	13,000	0.23	5,600,000	2.1	5,621,000	2.0
Muslims	10,000	0.0	800,000	0.4	3,560,000	1.4	36,300	16,700	53,000	1.45	3,825,000	1.4	4,132,000	1.5
Black Muslims	0	0.0	200,000	0.1	1,250,000	0.5	12,700	17,300	30,000	2.29	1,400,000	0.5	1,650,000	0.6
New-Religionists	0	0.0	110,000	0.1	575,000	0.2	5,900	17,100	23,000	3.71	690,000	0.3	811,000	0.3
Sikhs	0	0.0	1,000	0.0	160,000	0.1	1,600	4,800	6,400	3.71	192,000	0.1	234,000	0.1
Ethnic religion	100,000	0.1	70,000	0.0	280,000	0.1	2,900	18,500	21,400	6.69	387,000	0.1	435,000	0.2

nists
Other religi onists	10,000	0.0	450,000	0.2	757,000	0.3	7,700	1,100	8,800	1.1	801,000	0.3	1,141,000	0.4
Nonreli gious	1,000, 000	1.3	10,070, 000	4.8	21,414, 000	8.4	218,200	129,000	347,200	1.57	23,150, 000	8.7	25,078,000	9.0
Total popula tion	75,995, 000	100.0	210,111, 000	100.0	254,076, 000	100.0	2,807, 000	129,000	2,936, 000	1.00	267,020, 000	100.0	278,657, 000	100.0

Methodology. This table extracts and analyzes a microcosm of the world religion table. It depicts the United States, the country with the largest number of adherents to Christianity, the world's largest religion. Statistics at five points in time across the 20th century are presented. Each religion's Annual change is also analyzed by Natural increase (births minus deaths, plus immigrants minus emigrants) per year and Conversion increase (new converts minus new defectors) per year, which together constitute the Total increase per year. Rate increase is then computed as percentage per year.

Structure. Vertically the table lists 27 major religious categories. The major religions (including nonreligion) in the U.S. are listed with largest (Christians) first and Other religionists and Nonreligious last. Indented names of groups in the "Adherents" column are subcategories of the groups above them and are also counted in these unindented totals, so they should not be added twice into the column total. Figures in italics draw adherents from all categories of Christians above and so cannot be added together with them. Figures for Christians in 1970, 1990, and 1995 are built upon detailed head counts by churches, often to the last digit. Totals are then rounded to the nearest 1,000. Because of rounding, the corresponding percentage figures may sometimes not total exactly 100%. Figures for AD 2000 are projections based on current trends.

Christians. All persons who profess publicly to follow Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. This category is subdivided into Affiliated Christians (church members) and Unaffiliated (nominal) Christians (professing Christians not affiliated with any church). See also the note on Christians under Table 1.

Evangelicals/evangelicals. These two designations—italicized and enumerated separately here—cut across all of the six Christian traditions listed above and should be considered separately from them. Evangelicals are Protestant churches, agencies, and individuals that call themselves by this term (for example, members of the National Organization of Evangelicals); they usually emphasize 5 or more of 7, 9, or 21 fundamental doctrines (salvation by faith, personal acceptance, verbal inspiration of Scripture, depravity of man, Virgin Birth, miracles of Christ, atonement, evangelism, Second Advent, et al.). The evangelicals are Christians from all traditions who are committed to the evangel (gospel) and involved in personal witness and mission in the world.

Independents. Members of churches and networks that regard themselves as postdenominationalist and neo-apostolic and thus independent of historic, organized, institutionalized, denominationalist Christianity.

Marginal Christians. Members of denominations on the margins of organized mainstream Christianity (Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, Christian Science, Religious Science).

Non-Christians. Followers of non-Christian religions or, in the case of Nonreligious, no religion.

Jews. Core Jewish population relating to Judaism, excluding Jewish persons professing a different religion.

Other categories. Definitions are as given above under Table 1.

Table 3. Protestant-affiliated church members in the world's 238 countries, in the context of the 5 other major Christian traditions

This table gives a worldwide overview of Protestantism in all countries of the world, arranged as follows: column 1=short name of country, in English; column 2=population of country in AD mid-2000; column 3 (shown in bold type)=total Core Protestants in country (Protestantisms' total Christian community, being total affiliated church members including their children and infants; in many cases, total baptized community; column 4=total Anglicans (affiliated, including children); column 5=total Independents (affiliated church members and children; including Postdenominationalists and independent Charismatics); column 6=total Marginal Christians (adherents and members of nontrinitarian or antitrinitarian churches, defining themselves as outside or on the margins of mainstream Christianity); column 7=total Orthodox (affiliated to Orthodox patriarchates, including their children); 8=total Roman Catholics (all baptized members including children).

1 Country	2 Population 2000	3 Protestants	4 Anglicans	5 Independents	6 Marginals	7 Orthodox	8 Roman Catholics
Afghanistan	22,720,416	2,000	100	3,000	200	100	1,497
Albania	3,113,434	20,000	0	17,000	12,000	500,000	521,390
Algeria	31,471,278	3,400	200	65,000	200	1,800	20,277
American Samoa	68,089	35,800	190	1,780	8,000	0	9,470
Andorra	77,985	140	0	80	450	0	69,535
Angola	12,878,188	1,930,238	4,000	880,000	120,000	0	8,000,000
Anguilla	8,309	4,126	2,650	0	100	0	310
Antigua	67,560	21,000	22,613	1,200	1400	0	7,800
Argentina	37,027,297	2,295,000	19,000	2,050,000	500,000	158,000	33,750,000
Armenia	3,519,569	12,000	0	28,000	1,200	2,752,493	160,000
Aruba	102,747	7,500	750	1,350	1,300	0	84,341
Australia	18,879,524	2,630,000	4,060,000	840,000	220,000	700,000	5,400,000
Austria	8,210,520	413,570	3,100	73,000	65,000	155,000	6,200,000
Azerbaijan	7,734,015	1,400	0	3,600	0	345,302	7,500

Bahamas	306,529	167,171	27,300	19,000	5,000	380	48,000
Bahrain	617,217	5,100	3,000	27,058	40	2,500	25,000
Bangladesh	129,155,152	160,490	0	536,000	90	160	235,000
Barbados	270,449	85,158	77,300	17,500	5,600	300	11,000
Belgium	10,161,164	125,000	10,800	40,000	72,000	48,500	8,222,396
Belize	240,709	39,500	10,500	5,200	5,000	0	136,939
Belorussia	10,236,181	130,000	0	110,000	8,000	4,986,077	1,350,000
Benin	6,096,559	230,000	0	175,000	13,000	0	1,266,195
Bermuda	64,590	19,500	24,200	7,000	1,650	0	10,384
Bhutan	2,123,970	3,200	0	5,849	0	0	600
Bolivia	8,328,665	530,000	1,100	145,000	135,000	3,100	7,350,000
Bosnia-Herzegovina	3,971,813	2,700	0	750	1,300	700,000	681,135
Botswana	1,622,220	178,000	10,500	498,253	4,200	120	60,000
Bougainville	198,495	22,650	0	14,000	280	0	148,401
Brazil	170,115,463	30,200,000	125,000	25,500,000	1,420,000	170,000	153,300,000
Britain	58,830,160	5,050,000	26,278,000	2,140,000	550,000	370,000	5,620,000
British Virgin Is	21,366	9,792	2,800	1,000	600	0	700
Brunei	328,080	6,000	4,592	8,300	100	0	5,600
Bulgaria	8,225,045	95,000	0	580,000	6,500	5,886,450	90,000
Burkina Faso	11,936,823	799,000	0	54,000	2,000	0	1,129,078
Burundi	6,695,001	800,000	500,000	23,000	900	1,400	3,827,541
Cambodia	11,167,719	21,500	40	74,708	150	0	22,000
Cameroon	15,084,969	3,120,000	900	590,000	60,000	1,200	3,989,401
Canada	31,146,639	5,350,000	820,000	1,680,000	450,000	580,000	13,017,945
Cape Verde	427,724	15,500	0	12,800	4,800	0	417,000
Cayman Islands	38,371	20,690	500	4,050	380	0	200
Central African Rep	3,615,266	520,800	0	418,000	5,560	0	664,639
Chad	7,650,982	782,756	0	152,000	1,100	0	502,158
Channel Islands	152,898	10,500	67,511	0	270	200	22,300
Chile	15,211,294	382,000	12,000	3,820,000	420,000	23,750	11,800,000
China	1,262,556,787	640,000	23,000	80,708,347	29,000	55,000	7,500,000
Colombia	42,321,361	1400,000	3,600	535,000	275,000	7,200	40,670,000
Comoros	592,749	900	0	400	10	0	5,751
Congo-Brazzaville	2,943,464	500,000	0	370,000	11,300	400	1,451,178
Congo-Zaire	51,654,496	10,485,000	440,000	12,050,000	360,000	8,100	26,300,000
Cook Islands	19,522	14,200	100	60	1,650	0	3,650
Costa Rica	4,023,422	330,000	1,600	108,000	75,000	0	3,660,000
Croatia	4,472,600	26,000	0	11,386	9,000	250,000	3,960,000
Cuba	11,200,684	190,000	3,600	135,000	125,000	1,400	4,367,909
Cyprus	600,506	4,600	3,300	400	8,200	525,294	9,800
Czech Republic	10,244,177	320,000	1,200	270,000	32,000	60,000	4,135,936
Denmark	5,293,239	4,639,710	4,800	36,000	36,000	1,400	33,200 ,
Djibouti	637,634	240	0	200	0	18,900	8,854
Dominica	70,714	11,200	1,320	2,100	750	0	56,300
Dominican	8,495,338	360,000	4,400	130,000	60,000	0	7,522,305

Republic
Ecuador	12,646,068	240,000	1,600	225,000	185,000	1,800	11,900,000
Egypt	68,469,695	550,000	2,500	225,000	900	9,317,066	225,000
El Salvador	6,276,023	530,000	400	710,000	110,000	0	5,723,000
Equatorial Guinea	452,661	15,200	0	18,000	1,200	0	391,000
Eritrea	3,850,388	22,000	0	7,800	0	1,774,558	130,000
Estonia	1,396,158	240,000	0	46,000	8,000	230,000	5,875
Ethiopia	62,564,875	8,510,000	800	860,000	12,500	22,837,859	450,000
Faeroe Islands	42,749	38,860	0	400	200	0	130
Fiji	816,905	375,000	8,300	86,000	15,000	0	85,000
Finland	5,175,743	4,635,000	170	77,700	38,000	55,900	6,400
France	59,079,709	910,000	13,200	1,325,000	330,000	660,000	48,600,000
French Guiana	181,313	7,000	90	1,700	5,500	0	145,000
French Polynesia	235,061	110,000	0	4,800	25,000	0	100,000
Gabon	1,226,127	233,000	0	180,000	7,500	0	745,000
Gambia	1,305,363	3,670	2,800	8,950	90	450	31,238
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8
Country	Population	Prote	Anglicans	Indepe	Mar	Ortho	Roman
	2000	stants		ndents	ginals	dox	Catholics
Georgia	4,967,561	24,000	0	42,000	1,000	2,886,814	55,000
Germany	82,220,490	30,420,000	27,000	728,000	540,000	680,000	28,700,000
Ghana	20,212,495	3,360,000	250,000	2,920,376	210,000	1,600	1,925,000
Gibraltar	25,082	380	1,900	0	240	0	21,200
Greece	10,644,744	21,400	3,600	228,000	40,000	9,900,000	62,000
Greenland	56,156	38,880	0	120	240	0	110
Grenada	93,717	19,100	14,400	3,700	1,400	0	52,700
Guadeloupe	455,687	22,500	0	1,120	19,700	0	433,000
Guam	167,556	17,500	900	2,900	4,300	0	139,400
Guatemala	11,385,295	1,450,000	1,800	1,030,000	160,000	0	9,600,000
Guinea	7,430,346	69,182	1,400	43,000	740	0	117,000
Guinea-Bissau	1,213,111	9,500	280	31,000	70	0	141,000
Guyana	861,334	168,636	77,000	27,000	6,100	8,800	86,500
Haiti	8,222,025	1,440,000	105,000	430,000	50,000	0	6,520,000
Honduras	6,485,445	425,000	6,000	180,000	70,000	7,200	5,590,000
Hungary	10,035,568	2,560,000	0	165,000	40,000	90,000	6,330,000
Iceland	280,969	250,459	0	11,000	900	0	2,900
India	1,013,661,777	16,826,000	0	34,200,000	50,000	3,100,000	15,500,000
Indonesia	212,107,385	12,125,000	3,400	8,436,000	48,000	100	5,752,358
Iran	67,702,199	13,800	1,200	80,000	300	202,290	16,400
Iraq	23,114,884	1,400	200	315,547	30	139,485	268,000
Ireland	3,730,239	31,500	134,000	19,000	9,500	1,550	3,159,896
Isle of Man	79,166	11,200	33,588	210	640	0	6,800
Israel	5,121,683	19,000	2,200	85,000	1,000	46,878	140,000
Italy	57,297,886	446,000	10,600	415,000	420,000	91,000	55,680,000

Ivory Coast	14,785,832	760,000	0	1,373,000	18,000	20,000	2,182,882
Jamaica	2,582,577	643,413	103,000	232,000	30,000	3,300	110,000
Japan	126,714,220	570,881	60,000	1,600,000	720,000	26,000	460,000
Jordan	6,669,341	9,822	7,200	77,000	170	131,330	48,000
Kazakhstan	16,222,563	25,000	0	650,000	5,000	1,401,803	510,000
Kenya	30,080,372	6,375,000	3,000,000	6,607,000	30,000	740,000	7,000,000
Kirgizstan	4,699,337	30,000	0	70,500	500	363,065	1,600
Kiribati	83,387	37,000	50	1,300	1,700	0	44,100
Kuwait	1,971,634	1,100	200	64,000	50	7,000	175,185
Laos	5,433,036	34,400	200	45,613	350	0	32,000
Latvia	2,356,508	560,000	0	115,000	2,500	555,000	490,000
Lebanon	3,281,787	20,000	200	118,000	8,000	535,000	1,395,000
Lesotho	2,152,553	279,000	102,000	254,000	3,800	0	806,529
Liberia	3,154,001	430,000	34,500	538,500	8,000	0	150,000
Libya	5,604,722	4,500	150	14,000	60	106,642	45,000
Liechtenstein	32,843	2,520	0	40	110	0	24,381
Lithuania	3,670,269	44,000	0	32,000	4,300	114,000	3,105,000
Luxembourg	430,615	7,500	600	2,200	3,000	1,100	407,000
Macedonia	2,023,580	7,000	0	8,192	1,400	1,200,000	70,600
Madagascar	15,941,727	4,090,000	320,000	510,000	27,500	4,400	3,662,363
Malawi	10,925,238	2,140,000	230,000	1,830,000	130,000	4,400	2,697,860
Malaysia	22,244,062	660,000	205,000	178,000	4,000	2,300	721,889
Maldives	286,223	258	0	20	0	.0	80
Mali	11,233,821	82,000	0	16,300	500	0	125,565
Malta	388,544	1,000	1,100	750	900	130	367,501
Marshall Islands	64,220	67,431	0	8,100	2,500	0	5,250
Martinique	395,362	23,700	0	4,349	8,000	0	366,000
Mauritania	2,669,547	600	0	1,700	10	0	4,216
Mauritius	1,156,498	110,000	5,000	3,400	2,500	0	310,000
Mayotte	101,621	350	0	160	100	0	1,256
Mexico	98,881,289	3,280,000	187,800	2,900,000	1,950,000	100,000	92,770,000
Micronesia	118,689	47,000	0	1,700	3,300	0	74,578
Moldavia	4,380,492	78,000	0	670,000	27,000	1,950,558	73,000
Monaco	33,597	681	330	0	0	90	30,000
Mongolia	2,662,020	21,573	0	10,000	70	1,400	350
Montserrat	10,629	5,500	3,100	1,050	130	0	1,400
Morocco	28,220,843	4,100	450	147,000	110	740	22,076
Mozambique	19,680,456	1,750,000	110,000	1,422,033	68,000	500	3,110,000
Myanmar	45,611,177	2,511,664	58,000	575,000	6,800	0	590,000
Namibia	1,725,868	820,000	31,000	187,000	5,000	0	306,211
Nauru	11,519	5,840	320	380	40	0	2,920
Nepal	23,930,490	14,561	0	551,000	1,000	2,500	7,000
Netherlands	15,785,699	4,238,853	8,600	490,000	88,000	7,400	5,450,000
Netherlands	216,775	23,000	2,550	2,100	6,400	0	150,862

Antilles
New Caledonia	214,029	30,000	160	11,000	4,500	0	116,019
New Zealand	3,861,905	931,219	825,000	190,000	115,000	6,000	495,000
Nicaragua	5,074,194	590,000	8,300	155,000	51,000	0	4,320,000
Niger	10,730,102	13,000	0	25,000	600	0	19,670
Nigeria	111,506,095	14,050,000	20,070,000	23,975,000	600,000	3,100	13,400,000
North Korea	24,039,193	10,000	0	432,413	2,800	0	55,000
Northern Cyprus	185,045	0	0	2,236	0	13,870	0
Northern Mariana Is	78,356	6,500	0	6,660	1,870	0	69,300
Norway	4,461,033	4,200,000	2,000	136,000	24,000	1,600	45,000
Oman	2,541,739	5,700	2,800	43,916	0	16,500	53,000
Pakistan	156,483,155	1,796,000	0	850,000	1,245	0	1,165,000
Palau	19,426	5,600	0	4,100	650	0	8,600
Palestine	2,215,393	3,900	3,500	103,349	1,400	48,140	28,000
Panama	2,855,683	340,000	23,500	73,000	42,000	1,400	2,210,000
Papua New Guinea	4,608,145	2,610,000	308,000	270,000	15,400	400	1,380,000

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8
Country	Popu- lation 2000	Prote- stants	Ang- licans	Indepe- ndents	Mar- ginals	Ortho- dox	Roman Catholics
Paraguay	5,496,453	200,000	17,600	70,800	26,000	2,000	4,950,000
Peru	25,661,669	1,480,000	2,000	456,000	330,000	5,500	24,550,000
Philippines	75,966,500	3,775,000	120,000	14,330,000	670,000	0	62,570,000
Poland	38,765,085	195,000	0	330,000	200,000	1,030,000	35,743,059
Portugal	9,874,853	135,000	3,050	277,000	98,000	1,200	8,970,000
Puerto Rico	3,868,602	505,000	12,400	249,000	95,000	1300	2,900,000
Qatar	599,065	4,000	8,000	10,235	0	1,300	36,100
Reunion	699,406	31,500	0	700	6,000	0	611,000
Romania	22,326,502	2380,000	450	290,000	150,000	19,000,000	3,237,000
Russia	146,933,847	1,630,000	3,300	7,800,000	200,000	75,950,000	1,500,000
Rwanda	7,733,127	1,619,822	600,000	165,000	8,000	2,000	3,942,000
Sahara	293,357	0	0	347	0	0	140
Saint Helena	6,293	520	4,412	160	200	0	40
Saint Kitts & Nevis	38,473	22,270	9,700	1,500	510	0	4,850
Saint Lucia	154,366	20,500	4,400	3,239	1,400	0	116,000
Saint Pierre & Miquelon	6,567	70	0	0	40	0	6,465
Saint Vincent	113,954	33,854	19,715	13,300	1,500	70	10,000
Samoa	180,073	128,000	450	2,000	17,000	0	39,500
San Marino	26,514	0	0	0	270	0	23,509
Sao Tome & Principe	146,775	5,450	0	15,500	600	0	110,553
Saudi Arabia	21,606,691	38,000	2,000	85,000	110	36,000	625,875
Senegal	9,481,161	9,800	160	14,000	2,300	0	441,031

Seychelles	77,435	1,950	5,200	50	270	0	70,000
Sierra Leone	4,854,383	171,000	25,000	165,000	2,700	610	169,140
Singapore	3,566,614	126,536	34,000	94,000	4,000	1,400	143,000
Slovakia	5,387,191	600,000	0	23,000	20,000	21,000	3,660,186
Slovenia	1,985,557	32,000	0	31,000	2,800	12,000	1,659,006
Solomon Islands	443,643	159,000	169,503	22,500	4,200	0	48,000
Somalia	7,264,500	1,100	30	5,500	0	91,753	200
Somaliland	2,832,677	330	320	3,300	0	4,400	31
South Africa	40,376,579	12,410,000	2,660,000	18,500,000	190,000	150,000	3,350,000
South Korea	46,843,989	8,870,000	110,000	7,700,000	850,000	5,000	3,700,000
Spain	39,629,775	120,000	12,000	320,000	200,000	2,250	38,080,000
Spanish North Africa	130,000	650	0	800	0	0	102,874
Sri Lanka	18,827,054	102,000	55,000	331,120	7,000	0	1,260,000
Sudan	29,489,719	796,000	2,320,000	150,000	900	155,000	3,148,593
Suriname	417,130	71,334	800	2,800	4,400	0	93,000
Swaziland	1,007,895	153,200	40,000	460,000	5,500	0	54,000
Sweden	8,910,214	8,420,000	2,880	60,000	56,000	120,000	175,000
Switzerland	7,385,708	3,040,000	13,300	160,000	122,000	26,000	3,260,000
Syria	16,124,618	30,040	4,000	100,000	400	798,269	325,000
Taiwan	22,401,000	400,000	1,650	451,093	27,000	0	300,000
Tajikistan	6,188,201	17,000	0	15,000	200	93,000	4,412
Tanzania	33,517,014	5,530,000	2,650,000	638,000	18,000	12,500	8,283,000
Thailand	61,399,249	303,000	450	778,717	8,000	0	255,000
Timor	884,541	47,000	0	0	0	0	796,000
Togo	4,629,218	480,000	0	110,000	36,100	0	1,122,995
Tonga	98,546	42,320	660	20,798	14,350	0	13,900
Trinidad & Tobago	1,294,958	179,000	154,000	42,000	14,500	8,500	397,865
Tunisia	9,585,611	670	100	30,413	50	270	19,000
Turkey	66,590,940	32,500	2,100	78,000	2,400	227,655	30,500
Turkmenistan	4,459,293	2,800	0	19,000	400	74,583	2,100
Turks & Caicos Is	16,760	8,112	2,000	2,000	400	0	750
Tuvalu	11,719	12,000	0	250	290	0	95
Uganda	21,778,450	596,000	8,580,000	815,000	6,000	32,000	9,130,000
Ukraine	50,455,980	1,340,000	0	8,500,000	135,000	27,400,000	5,578,901
United Arab Emirates	2,441,436	12,800	8,600	47,000	0	70,000	124,345
USA	278,357,141	64,570,000	2,400,000	78,550,000	10,080,000	5,762,000	58,000,000
Uruguay	3,337,058	110,000	1,200	52,500	95,000	26,500	2,608,000
Uzbekistan	24,317,851	44,000	0	120,000	1,400	188,934	40,000
Vanuatu	190,417	102,254	34,500	16,500	1,400	0	29,400
Venezuela	24,169,722	500,000	600	350,000	300,000	27,000	22,816,000
Viet Nam	79,831,650	580,000	3,100	640,000	24,000	0	5,320,822

Virgin Is of the US	92,954	40,000	13,800	12,800	1,500	0	29,000
Wallis & Futuna Is	14,517	40	0	0	45	0	13,936
Yemen	18,112,066	4,476	180	8,000	0	12,000	6,000
Yugoslavia	10,640,150	99,000	400	185,000	8,600	6,046,000	546,557
Zambia	9,168,700	2,705,000	220,000	1,580,000	375,680	6,400	3,070,000
Zimbabwe	11,669,029	1,440,000	320,000	4,700,000	64,000	6,000	1,120,000
*11 minicountries	23,079	5,343	2,128	730	520	779	4,598
Africa	784,445,039	88,999,928	42,541,902	83,840,642	2,426,550	35,304,168	120,386,235
Antarctica	4,500	970	300	700	0	30	1,400
Asia	3,682,550,093	49,969,501	727,212	154,732,021	2,485,605	14,113,465	110,480,013
Europe	728,886,951	77,528,973	26,637,479	25,723,708	3,563,880	158,105,154	285,977,773
Latin America	519,138,048	48,131,716	1,089,611	39,706,358	6,595,300	557,500	461,220,001
Northern America	309,631,093	69,978,450	3,244,200	80,237,120	10,531,930	6,342,000	71,034,904
Oceania	30,393,391	7,392,067	5,408,938	1,504,858	456,965	706,400	8,227,767
Global Total	6,055,049,115	342,001,605	79,649,642	385,745,407	26,060,230	215,128,717	1,057,328,093

Notes to table.

* 11 Minicountries. Smallest countries with population each under 5,000 are: Antarctica (4,500), British Indian Ocean Territory (2,000), Christmas Island (3,424), Cocos (Keeling) Islands (726), Falkland Islands (2,255), Holy See (5,000), Niue Island (1,876), Norfolk Island (2,075), Pitcairn Islands (47), Svalbard & Jan Mayen Islands (3,676), Tokelau Islands (1,500).

Table 4. Organized Protestantism and Its Core Global Membership Ranked by 27 Ecclesiastico-Cultural Major Traditions or Families, AD 1970-AD 2025

Tradition Code	Name	Congs 1995	Adults 1995	Affiliated		Denominations				Countries Count
				1970	1995	1970	1995	2000	2025
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
CORE		947,000	195,757,000	210,037,000	318,027,000	5,621	8,844	8,973	9,490	231
PROTESTANT
P-Adv	Adventist	34,000	5,966,000	4,189,000	11,011,000	195	214	218	233	199
P-Bap	Baptist	125,400	31,520,000	27,726,000	48,133,000	266	313	322	360	163
P-CBr	Christian Brethren (Plymouth Brethren; Open only)	16,700	1,341,000	1,535,000	2,798,000	120	124	125	128	113
P-Con	Congregational, Congregationalist	11,500	1,385,000	1,893,000	2,438,000	81	85	86	89	55
P-Dis	Disciple, Restorationist, Restorationist Baptist, Christian	6,700	1,053,000	2,455,000	1,919,000	13	17	18	21	18

Appendix 916

P-Dun	Dunker (Tunker), Dipper, German Baptist, Brethren	2,100	322,000	465,000	603,000	10	10	10	10	7
P-EBr	Exclusive Brethren (Plymouth Brethren, Closed, Strict)	2,500	107,000	175,000	211,000	20	20	20	20	18
P-Eva	Anglican Evangelical, Indepen dent Evangelical	20,100	2,842,000	1,824,000	5,482,000	112	138	143	164	89
P-Fun	Fundamen talist	2,600	122,000	67,000	211,000	13	16	17	19	14
P-Hol	Holiness (Conser vative Methodist, Wesleyan, Free Methodist)	43,600	3,978,000	4,111,000	7,387,000	283	339	350	395	117
P-LuR	Lutheran/ Reformed united church or joint mission	10,800	11,626,000	18,525,000	15,041,000	23	24	24	25	22
P-Lut	Lutheran	81,900	39,853,000	54,717,000	60,696,000	231	249	253	267	122
P-Men	Mennonite, Anabaptist (Left Wing or Radical Reform ation)	9,500	1,166,000	1,117,000	2,009,000	99	123	128	147	59
P-Met	Methodist (mainline Methodist, United Methodist)	89,500	13,860,000	21,933,000	22,902,000	113	121	123	129	108
P-Mor	Moravian (Continental Pietist)	1,200	302,000	478,000	582,000	27	29	29	31	27
P-Non	Nondeno minational (no church or anti- church groups)	11,800	1,938,000	886,000	3,434,000	166	191	196	216	76
P-Pel	Oneness- Pentecostal or Unita rian- Pentecostal: Jesus only	11,600	1,326,000	939,000	2,463,000	57	80	85	103	74

P-Pe2	Baptistic-Pentecostal or Keswick-Pentecostal	232,000	30,284,000	12,006,000	49,420,000	311	382	396	453	174
P-Pe3	Holiness-Pentecostal: 3-crisis-experience	28,800	3,219,000	2,322,000	5,650,000	167	233	246	299	118
P-PeA	Apostolic, or Pentecostal Apostolic (living apostles)	11,500	762,000	706,000	1,597,000	29	31	31	33	30
P-Pen	Pentecostal (pluralist)	20	1,000	0	3,000	0	1	1	2	1
P-Qua	Friends (Quaker)	4,900	222,000	348,000	403,000	50	53	54	56	43
P-Ref	Reformed, Presbyterian	97,700	26,318,000	33,121,000	43,902,000	269	295	300	321	141
P-Sal	Salvationist (Salvation Army)	14,100	1,467,000	2,910,000	2,378,000	79	85	86	91	84
P-Uni	United church (union of bodies of different traditions)	50,300	12,348,000	13,608,000	22,266,000	49	53	54	57	45
P-Wal	Waldensian	200	31,000	37,000	41,000	2	2	2	2	2
P-com	Community church or union congregation	50	12,000	19,000	20,000	20	23	24	26	18

Meaning of columns.

1–2. Each's major constituent ecclesiastical traditions, listed in their codes' alphabetical order. First comes a 4-letter code then the full name of each tradition.

3–4. Congregations (worship centers) and adult church members (all referring to the year 1995).

5–6. Affiliated church members (total Christian community) in 1970 and 1995.

7–10. Denominations. A denomination is defined as an organized aggregate of worship centers or congregations of similar ecclesiastical tradition within a specific country; i.e. as an organized Christian church or tradition or religious group or community of believers, within a specific country.

11. Countries. Number of countries (out of 238) where this tradition exists.

Table 5. Statistics Describing Each of the 45 Global Ministries of Evangelism

45 Modes of Evangelism	Evangelism hours originated per year	Media factor	Total offers received per year
1. Intercession	17.2 billion	1	17.2 billion
2. Inner renewal/spirituality	19.5 billion	1	19.5 billion
3. Christian lifestyle	18.3 billion	1	18.3 billion
4. Audiovisual ministries	3 billion	25	76 billion
5. Plays/concerts/ operas/shows	2.4 billion	20	48.7 billion
6. Jesus films	548 million	100	54.8 billion
7. Audio scriptures	18 million	1,000	18.3 billion
8. Scripture leaflets/ selections	4.1 billion	5	20.5 billion
9. Every-home campaign visits	160 million	50	8 billion
10. New Reader Scriptures	76 million	50	8 billion
11. Braille Scripture	2 billion	5	10 billion
12. Signed/deaf Scriptures	600 million	5	3 billion
13. Christian suffering	260 million	10	2.6 billion
14. Personal evangelism	59.1 billion	3	177.4 billion
15. Martyrdoms	1.6 million	1,000	1.6 billion
16. Full-time home church workers	3.7 billion	2	7.5 billion
17. Foreign missionaries	307 million	20	6.1 billion
18. Evangelists	110.5 million	100	11.1 billion
19. Short-term missionaries	146 million	10	1.5 billion
20. Part-time evangelizers	5.8 billion	2	11.7 billion
21. Mission agencies	21 million	100	2.1 billion
22. Portions/Gospels	808 million	6	4.8 billion
23. Near-Gospels	480 million	6	2.9 billion
24. New Testaments (300 pages)	3.6 billion	8	29 billion
25. Near-New Testaments	1.4 billion	8	10.8 billion
26. Bibles (1,300 pages)	7 billion	10	69.9 billion
27. Near Bibles	1.2 billion	10	12 billion
28. Lingua franca Gospels	200 million	3	600 million
29. Lingua franca New Testaments	1.4 billion	4	5.6 billion
30. Lingua franca Bibles	3.0 billion	5	15 billion
31. Denominational materials	1.9 billion	1	1.9 billion
32. Local church output	3.8 billion	1	3.8 billion
33. Outside Christian literature	10 million	10	100 million
34. Church-planting output	58 million	10	600 million
35. Institutional	1.8 billion	1	1.8 billion ministries/records

36. Christian books (100 pages)	35 billion	2	70 billion
37. Christian periodicals (30 pages)	150 million	10	1.5 billion
38. Tracts (2 pages)	2.5 billion	1	2.5 billion
39. Other documentation	1.2 billion	1	1.2 billion
40. Programmed training	180,000	10,000	18 billion
41. Christian radio programs	1 million	50,000	50 billion
42. Christian TV programs	200,000	100,000	20 billion
43. Urban media (cable TV, etc.)	450,000	12,000	5.4 billion
44. Christian-owned computers	98.1 million	350	34.3 billion
45. Internet/networks/e- mail	2 billion	30	58.5 billion

This table provides the statistics discussed in the article “Evangelism, Overview.” (Article begins on page 715.)

Contributors

Adam, Margaret B.

Evanston, Ill.

Articles contributed: HOMESCHOOLING.

Aguilar, Mario I.

Saint Mary's College, University of Saint Andrews (Scotland)

Articles contributed: AFRICA.

Airhart, Phyllis D.

University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA.

Akinade, Akintunde E.

High Point University, High Point, N.C.

Articles contributed: MARANKE, JOHN; UNIFICATION CHURCH.

Albers, James

Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind.

Articles contributed: WISCONSIN EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD.

Alexander, Bobby C.

The University of Texas at Dallas

Articles contributed: FALWELL, JERRY.

Alexander, J.Neil

Episcopal Diocese of Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: LAMBETH CONFERENCE.

Alexander, Thomas G.

Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah

Articles contributed: YOUNG, BRIGHAM.

Ames, Frank Ritchel

Colorado Christian University, Lakewood, Colo.

Articles contributed: BENGEL, JOHANN ALBRECHT; PEDERSEN, JOHANNES PEDER EJLER.

Anderson, George M.

America Press, Inc., New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: FRY, ELIZABETH.

Anderson, Mary

Luther Seminary, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: SPEYER, DIETS OF.

Angell, Stephen W.

Earlham School of Religion, Richmond, Ind.

Articles contributed: FRIENDS GENERAL CONFERENCE; FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE.

Antonio, Edward P.

Illiff School of Theology, Denver, Colo.

Articles contributed: AFRICAN THEOLOGY.

Arand, Charles

Concordia Seminary, Saint Louis, Mo.

Articles contributed: CATECHISMS.

Ariel, Yaakov

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Articles contributed: JEWS FOR JESUS; MISSIONS TO JEWS.

Armentrout, Donald

University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn.

Articles contributed: BLAIR, JAMES; BRAY, THOMAS; CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS; JEWEL, JOHN; ROBERTSON, FREDERICK WILLIAM; SYNOD; TAYLOR, JEREMY; TOLAND, JOHN; WESTCOTT, BROOKE.

Armour, Rollin

Mercer University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: HOFMANN, MELCHIOR.

Arseneau, Mary

University of Ottawa, Canada

Articles contributed: PRE-RAPHAELITES; ROSSETTI, CHRISTINA.

Aston, Nigel

University of Leicester (England)

Articles contributed: FRENCH REVOLUTION.

Atwood, Craig R

Moravian Theological Seminary, Bethlehem, Pa.

Articles contributed: HERRNHUT.

Aune, Kristin

King's College, University of London (England)

Articles contributed: HOUSE CHURCHES.

Avis, Paul

Council for Christian Unity, Church of England

Articles contributed: ANGLICANISM; CHURCH; ECCLESIOLOGY; TRADITION.

Bach, Jeff

Bethany Theological Seminary, Richmond, Ind.

Articles contributed: BRETHERN, CHURCH OF THE.

Badham, Paul

University of Wales, Lampeter

Articles contributed: ABORTION.

Baker, Kelly J.

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: FULLER, MARGARET; WILLARD, FRANCES ELIZABETH CAROLINE.

Baker, J. Wayne

University of Akron, Ohio

Articles contributed: BULLINGER, HEINRICH; ZWINGLI, HULDRYCH; ZWINGLIANISM.

Ball, Les

Queensland Baptist College of Ministries (Australia)

Articles contributed: BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

Bangs, Jeremy

The Leiden American Pilgrim Museum (Netherlands)

Articles contributed: PILGRIM FATHERS; REMONSTRANTS.

Barrett, David B.

Center for World Evangelization Research, Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: EVANGELISM, OVERVIEW; STATISTICS.

Bassett, Paul Merritt

Nazarene Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Mo.

Articles contributed: ARMINIANISM; CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE.

Bayer, Oswald

University of Tübingen (Germany)

Articles contributed: HAMANN, JOHANN GEORG.

Bays, Daniel H.

Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Articles contributed: CHINA; CHINA INLAND MISSION; SUN YAT-SEN.

Bebbington, David W.

University of Stirling (Scotland)

Articles contributed: BAPTISTS; DISSENT; SPURGEON, CHARLES; WILBERFORCE, WILLIAM.

Beck, Albert R.

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: CHURCH AND STATE, OVERVIEW.

Becker, Dieter

Augustana-Hochschule Neuendettelsau (Germany)

Articles contributed: GERMANY.

Behringer, Wolfgang

University of York (England)

Articles contributed: WITCHCRAZE.

Bendroth, Margaret

Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Articles contributed: FAMILY; GENDER.

Bergen, Doris L.

University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: GERMAN CHRISTIANS; HOLOCAUST.

Bergler, Thomas E.

Huntington College, Ind.

Articles contributed: REVIVALS; YOUTH FOR CHRIST.

Berry, Stephen R.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BLAKE, EUGENE CARSON; DELANY, MARTIN; HOGG, JAMES; TENNENT, GILBERT.

Bertie, David M.

Arbuthnot Museum (Scotland)

Articles contributed: EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SCOTLAND.

Bevis, Kathryn

Regent's Park College, University of Oxford (England)

Articles contributed: HARTSTHORNE, CHARLES.

Bexell, Oloph

University of Uppsala (Sweden)

Articles contributed: SÖDERBLOM, NATHAN.

Bielfeldt, Dennis

South Dakota State University, Brookings, S. Dak.

Articles contributed: BRENZ, JOHANNES; CASTELLIO, SEBASTIAN; KARLSTADT, ANDREAS RUDOLF BODENSTEIN.

Biggar, Nigel

University of Leeds (England)

Articles contributed: NATURAL LAW.

Binfield, Clyde

Sheffield University (England)

Articles contributed: NONCONFORMITY.

Bird, Michael

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: MATHIIS, JAN; THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, BRITISH.

Bireley, S.J., Robert

Loyola University, Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: COUNTER-REFORMATION.

Birkel, Michael L.

Earlham College, Richmond, Ind.

Articles contributed: JONES, RUFUS MATTHEW.

Blanchard, Kathryn D.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: SOCIALISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bliese, Richard H.

Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS.

Blossom, Jay S.F.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BIBLE CAMPS AND CONFERENCE CENTERS; SUNDAY, BILLY.

Blowers, Paul

Emmanuel School of Religion, Johnson City, Tenn.

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

Blumhofer, Edith

Wheaton College, Wheaton, Ill.

Articles contributed: CROSBY, FANNY; EVANGELISTIC ORGANIZATIONS; FUNDAMENTALISM; HIGHER LIFE MOVEMENT; INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE FOURSQUARE GOSPEL; KESWICK MOVEMENT; MCPHERSON, AIMEE SEMPLE; MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE; PENTECOSTALISM; RAMABAI, PANDITA.

Bolt, John

Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Articles contributed: KUYPER, ABRAHAM.

Bouteneff, Peter

Saint Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, Crestwood, N.Y.

Articles contributed: ORTHODOXY, EASTERN.

Bowden, Henry Warner

Rutgers University, Red Bank, N.J.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN SOCIETY OF CHURCH HISTORY; BRAINERD, DAVID; MAYHEW, JONATHAN; SCHAFF, PHILIPP.

Boyd, Stephen

Wake Forest University, Winston-Salem, N.C.

Articles contributed: MARPECK, PILGRAM.

Boyer, Paul S.

College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.

Articles contributed: ANTICHRIST; APOCALYPTICISM; ESCHATOLOGY; NATIVISM.

Brachlow, Stephen

Baptist Theological Seminary at Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: BROWNE, ROBERT.

Brackney, William

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: BAPTISTS, EUROPE.

Bradley, Paul William

Union Theological Seminary, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: BEECHER, HENRY WARD; VAN DUSEN, HENRY P.

Brand, Eugene L.

Lutheran World Federation (retired)

Articles contributed: LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION; LUTHERANISM, GLOBAL.

Brandt, James M.

Saint Paul School of Theology, Kansas City, Mo.

Articles contributed: SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH.

Bremer, Francis J.

Millersville University of Pennsylvania

Articles contributed: MATHER, COTTON.

Breward, Ian

Ormond College, University of Melbourne, Department of History, University of Melbourne (Australia)

Articles contributed: PERKINS, WILLIAM.

Brock, Peter

University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: PACIFISM.

Bromley, David G.

Virginia Commonwealth University, Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: RUSSELL, CHARLES TAZE.

Brooks, Joanna

University of Texas at Austin

Articles contributed: CIRCUIT RIDER; GEORGE, DAVID; MARRANT, JOHN.

Brower, Gary

Berkeley Canterbury Foundation, Berkeley, Calif.

Articles contributed: ANDREWES, LANCELOT; WREN, CHRISTOPHER.

Brown, Stewart J.

University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: CHALMERS, THOMAS.

Brown, Candy Gunther

Saint Louis University, Saint Louis, Mo.

Articles contributed: SLAVERY; SLAVERY, ABOLITION OF; TORREY, REUBEN ARCHER.

Brown Zikmund, Barbara

Doshisha University (Japan)

Articles contributed: WOMEN CLERGY.

Bruhn, Karen

Arizona State University, Tempe, Ariz.

Articles contributed: COVERDALE, MILES; WHITGIFT, JOHN.

Bullock, Steven C.

Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Worcester, Mass.

Articles contributed: FREEMASONRY.

Bultmann, Christoph

University of Erfurt (Germany)

Articles contributed: HERDER, JOHANN GOTTFRIED.

Bumbaugh, David E.

Meadville Lombard Theological School, Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION.

Bundy, David

Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: FREE METHODIST CHURCH OF AMERICA; MOFFATT, JAMES; PENTECOSTAL ASSEMBLIES OF THE WORLD.

Bunge, Marcia J.

Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind.

Articles contributed: CHILDHOOD.

Burlein, Anne

University of North Carolina at Charlotte

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN RIGHT.

Burnett, Daniel L.

Oxford Institute for Wesleyan Studies (England)

Articles contributed: WESLEYANISM.

Bushman, Richard Lyman

Columbia University, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: SMITH, JOSEPH.

Butler, Anthea

Loyola Marymount University, Los Angeles, Calif.

Articles contributed: NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION OF AMERICA; NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION, U.S.A.

Cardoza, Carlos

Columbia Theological Seminary, Decatur, Ga.

Articles contributed: MACKAY, JOHN ALEXANDER.

Carey, Patrick W.

Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis.

Articles contributed: BROWNSON, ORESTES; EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: UNITED STATES.

Carrigan, Jr., Henry L.

Trinity Press/Morehouse Group, Harrisburg, Pa.

Articles contributed: BIBLE; LITERATURE, OVERVIEW; MCFAGUE, SALLIE; PUBLISHING, MEDIA; ROYCE, JOSIAH.

Carter, Grayson

Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR; SEABURY, SAMUEL.

Carter, David

Carshalton, Surrey, England

Articles contributed: METHODISM.

Carter, Robert Lee

North Chapel Hill Baptist Church, N.C.

Articles contributed: GOODSPEED, EDGAR JOHNSON.

Castleberry, Joseph L.

Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, Springfield, Mo.

Articles contributed: BIBLE COLLEGES AND INSTITUTES.

Cavanaugh, William T.

University of Saint Thomas, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: LOCKE, JOHN.

Chamberlain, Ava

Wright State University, Dayton, Ohio

Articles contributed: HUTCHINSON, ANNE.

Chancellor, James D.

Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION; SUDAN INTERIOR MISSION.

Chapman, James

Regent's Park College, Oxford University (England)

Articles contributed: HUDDLESTON, TREVOR; RAMSEY, ARTHUR MICHAEL; SWABIAN SYNGRAMMA.

Chesebrough, David B.

Illinois State University, Normal, Ill.

Articles contributed: PARKER, THEODORE; TRANSCENDENTALISM.

Cheyne, Alexander C.

University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: BAILLIE, JOHN.

Claydon, Tony

University of Wales, Bangor

Articles contributed: GLORIOUS REVOLUTION.

Clements, William M.

Arkansas State University, Jonesboro, Ark.

Articles contributed: AZUSA STREET REVIVAL; CARTWRIGHT, PETER; LEE, ANN; MCGUFFEY READERS.

Cobb, Jr., John B.

Claremont School of Theology, Claremont, Calif.

Articles contributed: PROCESS THEOLOGY.

Coffman, Elesha

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: CADBURY, GEORGE; ELIOT, GEORGE; JACKSON, SHELDON.

Coggins, James R.

Mennonite Brethren Herald, Canada

Articles contributed: SMYTH, JOHN.

Cohen, Charles L.

University of Wisconsin at Madison

Articles contributed: HOOKER, THOMAS.

Cohn-Sherbok, Dan

University of Wales, Lampeter

Articles contributed: JUDAISM.

Coleman, Simon M.

Durham University (England)

Articles contributed: TRAVELS AND PILGRIMAGES.

Conser, Jr., Walter H.

University of North Carolina at Wilmington

Articles contributed: NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS.

Conway, John S.

University of British Columbia, Canada

Articles contributed: CONFESSING CHURCH.

Cook, Christopher M.

University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: BOSCH, DAVID JACOBUS; HOLINESS MOVEMENT; SHEPPARD, RICHARD; TAYLOR, JAMES HUDSON.

Cornwall, Robert

First Christian Church, Santa Barbara, Calif.

Articles contributed: BLOUNT, CHARLES; HERBERT, GEORGE; JOWETT, BENJAMIN; STONE, BARTON W.

Corts, Thomas E.

Samford University, Birmingham, Ala.

Articles contributed: DRUMMOND, HENRY.

Crocker, Robert

University of South Australia

Articles contributed: MORE, HENRY.

Crocombe, Jeff

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: ADVENT CHRISTIAN CHURCH; VAN DER KEMP, JOHANNES THEODORUS.

Crosby, Donald A.

Colorado State University, Fort Collins, Colo.

Articles contributed: BUSHNELL, HORACE.

Crouse, Eric R.

Tyndale University College, Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: FULL GOSPEL BUSINESSMEN'S FELLOWSHIP.

Cusic, Don

Belmont University, Nashville, Tenn.

Articles contributed: Music, POPULAR.

Daniel, William Harrison

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: ITINERACY; METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH CONFERENCE.

Daniell, David

Hertford College, Oxford University (England)

Articles contributed: TYNDALE, WILLIAM.

Davidson, Allan

Saint John's College (New Zealand)

Articles contributed: PACIFIC ISLANDS.

Davie, Grace

University of Exeter (England)

Articles contributed: FRANCE.

Davies, Douglas J.

University of Durham (England)

Articles contributed: MORMONISM.

Davis, Edward B.

Messiah College, Grantham, Pa.

Articles contributed: BOYLE, ROBERT.

Dean, William D.

Hliff School of Theology, Denver, Colo.

Articles contributed: EMPIRICAL THEOLOGY.

de Groot, Aart

Zeist, Netherlands

Articles contributed: NETHERLANDS.

de Gruchy, John W.

University of Cape Town (South Africa)

Articles contributed: NAUDE, CHRISTIAAN FREDERICK BEYERS.

DeNeef, A. Leigh

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: DONNE, JOHN.

Dickerson, Dennis C.

Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.

Articles contributed: WHEATLEY, PHILLIS.

Dickson, Neil

Troon, Scotland

Articles contributed: PLYMOUTH BRETHREN.

Dieter, Melvin E.

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: INTERNATIONAL PENTECOSTAL HOLINESS CHURCH;
PRIMITIVE METHODIST CHURCH; WESLEYAN CHURCH; WESLEYAN
HOLINESS MOVEMENT.

Dietrich, Donald J.

Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Articles contributed: TOTALITARIANISM.

Dixon, Jr., John W.

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Articles contributed: HICKS, EDWARD.

Doan, Ruth Alden

Hollins College, Roanoke, Va.

Articles contributed: MILLER, WILLIAM.

Donahue, Mark

University of Oregon, Eugene, Oreg.

Articles contributed: LEWIS, SIR SAMUEL.

Donnelly, Fred

University of New Brunswick, Saint John, Canada

Articles contributed: ARNOLD, THOMAS; BLAKE, WILLIAM; SALT, TITUS.

Douglass, Jane Dempsey

Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

Articles contributed: WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES.

Dowland, Seth

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: MORAL MAJORITY.

Downs, Frederick S.

United Theological College (Bangalore, India)

Articles contributed: TRIBAL MOVEMENTS (INDIA).

Dreisbach, Daniel L.

American University, Washington, D.C.

Articles contributed: BILL OF RIGHTS; MADISON, JAMES.

Duke, Debra L.

Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

Articles contributed: EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH.

Duke, James

Texas Christian University, Fort Worth, Tex.

Articles contributed: COTTON, JOHN.

Durden, Robert

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: DUKE UNIVERSITY.

Durnbaugh, Donald F.

Juniata College, Huntington, Pa.

Articles contributed: IONA COMMUNITY.

Dyson, Erika White

Columbia University, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION; NEVIN, JOHN W.

Eire, Carlos M.N.

Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Articles contributed: ICONOCLASM.

Eitel, Keith E.

Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, N.C.

Articles contributed: VISSER'T HOOFT, WILLEM ADOLF.

Elliott, Mark R.

Samford University, Birmingham, Ala.

Articles contributed: ALL UNION COUNCIL OF EVANGELICAL CHRISTIANS-BAPTISTS.

Ellis, Christopher J.

Bristol Baptist College (England)

Articles contributed: BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE.

End, Thomas van den

Articles contributed: BATAK PROTESTANT CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF INDONESIA; INDONESIA.

Endy, Jr., Melvin B.

Saint Mary's College of Maryland

Articles contributed: PENN, WILLIAM.

England, Richard

Salisbury University, Salisbury, Md.

Articles contributed: DARWINISM.

Eriksen, Robert

Pacific Lutheran University, Tacoma, Wash.

Articles contributed: BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH.

Eslinger, Ellen

DePaul University, Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: FRONTIER RELIGION.

Essamuah, Casely B.

Park Street Church, Boston, Mass.

Articles contributed: AMISSAH, SAMUEL HANSON; CASELY-HAYFORD, JOSEPH EPHRAIM; OPPONG, KWAME SAMPSON.

Evans, Christopher H.

Colgate Rochester Crozer Divinity School, Rochester, N.Y.

Articles contributed: SOCIAL GOSPEL.

Fackre, Gabriel

Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass.

Articles contributed: BIBLICAL INERRANCY.

Farley, Helen

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: FISHER, GEOFFREY FRANCIS; GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS; MORRISON, CHARLES; OSHITELU, JOSIAH OLUNOWO.

Farwell, James W.

The General Theological Seminary, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: BISHOP AND EPISCOPACY; MAURICE, FREDERICK DENISON; SALVATION.

Faupel, D. William

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: CHURCH OF GOD, ANDERSON, INDIANA; IRVING, EDWARD; MÜLLER, GEORGE; ROBERTS, GRANVILLE ORAL.

Fensham, Charles J.

Knox College, University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: CULTURE; LAUSANNE COMMITTEE ON WORLD EVANGELIZATION; MASS MEDIA.

Ferguson, Oliver W.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: SWIFT, JONATHAN.

Ferré, John P.

University of Louisville, Ky.

Articles contributed: BEST SELLERS IN AMERICA, RELIGIOUS.

Findlay, James

University of Rhode Island, Peace Dale, R.I.

Articles contributed: MOODY, DWIGHT LYMAN; NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Finkenbine, Roy E.

University of Detroit Mercy, Mich.

Articles contributed: PETERS, THOMAS; RUSSWURM, JOHN BROWN.

Fishburn, Janet Forsythe

Drew University, Madison, N.J.

Articles contributed: DALE, ROBERT WILLIAM; RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER.

Flipper, Joseph

University of Dallas, Tex.

Articles contributed: NIEBUHR, H. RICHARD.

Flynn, Jr., Tyler

Penn State University, University Park, Pa.

Articles contributed: MORAL REARMAMENT.

Flynn, William T.

University of Leeds (England)

Articles contributed: BRITTEN, BENJAMIN; PRAETORIUS, MICHAEL;
TELEMANN, GEORG PHILIPP.

Foster, Douglas A.

Abilene Christian University, Abilene, Tex.

Articles contributed: DISCIPLES OF CHRIST.

Frank, Thomas Edward

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: POLITY.

Freeman, Curtis W.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BAPTIST BIBLE UNION; BAPTISTS, UNITED STATES;
BLISS, PHILIP P.

Freston, Paul

Federal University of Sao Carlos (Brazil)

Articles contributed: BRAZIL; CHILUBA, FREDERICK; LATIN AMERICA; POLITICAL PARTIES.

Friedman, Jerome

Kent State University, Bowling Green, Ohio

Articles contributed: SERVETUS, MICHAEL.

Friedrich, Norbert

Ruhr-Universitat Bochum (Germany)

Articles contributed: BAUMGARTEN, OTTO; KIRCHENTAG; LAGARDE, PAUL DE; NAUMANN, FRIEDRICH; RADE, MARTIN; ZÖLLNER, JOHANN FRIEDRICH.

Friesen, Abraham

University of California at Santa Barbara

Articles contributed: HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR; MENNONITES.

Fulop, Timothy E.

King College, Bristol, Tenn.

Articles contributed: BREECHES BIBLE; COLLINS, ANTHONY; INDEPENDENT FUNDAMENTAL CHURCHES; KIMBANGU, SIMON.

Fulton, John

Saint Mary's College, University of Surrey (England)

Articles contributed: IRELAND.

Fury, Cheryl

University of New Brunswick, Saint John, Canada

Articles contributed: WINSTANLEY, GERRARD.

Gafney, Wilda

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: WOMANIST THEOLOGY.

Galli, Mark J.

Christianity Today, Carol Stream, Ill.

Articles contributed: GIDEONS INTERNATIONAL.

Gaustad, Edwin

University of California at Riverside

Articles contributed: BERKELEY, GEORGE; JEFFERSON, THOMAS; UNITED STATES; WILLIAMS, ROGER.

Geldbach, Erich

Ruhr-Universität Bochum (Germany)

Articles contributed: EVANGELICALS, GERMANY.

Gerrish, Brian A.

Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: LORD'S SUPPER.

Gibson, Scott

Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Mass.

Articles contributed: GORDON, ADONIRAM JUDSON.

Gill, Sean

University of Bristol (England)

Articles contributed: MASCULINITY; SPORTS.

Gill, Robin

University of Kent at Canterbury (England)

Articles contributed: EUTHANASIA.

Gillespie, Michael Allen

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH.

Goff, Philip

Indiana University—Purdue University, Indianapolis, Ind.

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN AND MISSIONARY ALLIANCE.

Gordon, Bruce

University of Saint Andrews (Scotland)

Articles contributed: SWITZERLAND.

Graber, Jennifer

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: CHURCH WORLD SERVICE; PURCELL, HENRY; SANKEY, IRA DAVID.

Grace, Fran

University of Redlands, Calif.

Articles contributed: TEMPERANCE.

Granquist, Mark

Gustavus Adolphus College, Saint Peter, Minn.

Articles contributed: AUGUSTANA EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN.

Grayson, James Huntley

University of Sheffield (England)

Articles contributed: KOREA.

Greenleaf, Floyd

Independent scholar, Lake Suzy, Fla.

Articles contributed: SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS.

Greschat, Martin

Giessen University (Germany)

Articles contributed: BODELSCHWINGH, FRIEDRICH C.C.; BUCER, MARTIN; CALIXT, GEORGE; DIBELIUS, FRIEDRICH KARL OTTO; HOLL, KARL; PRUSSIAN UNION; RITSCHL, ALBRECHT BENJAMIN; SPALDING, JOHANN JOACHIM; STAHL, FRIEDRICH JULIUS.

Gros, Jeffrey

US Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Articles contributed: CATHOLIC REACTIONS TO PROTESTANTISM; CATHOLICISM, PROTESTANT REACTIONS.

Grovier, Kelly

Christ Church, Oxford University (England)

Articles contributed: BOUCHER, JONATHAN; BUTLER, JOSEPH.

Guelzo, Allen

Eastern College, St. David's, Pa.

Articles contributed: LINCOLN, ABRAHAM.

Guenther, Bruce L.

Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, British Columbia, Canada

Articles contributed: EVANGELICALISM.

†Gunton, Colin

King's College (London, England)

Articles contributed: ATONEMENT; CHRISTOLOGY.

Guretzki, David

Briercrest College and Seminary, Caronport, Canada

Articles contributed: CARNELL, EDWARD.

Haemig, Mary Jane

Luther Seminary, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: DIBELIUS, MARTIN; THOLUCK, FRIEDRICH AUGUST GOTTREU; THOMASIUS, CHRISTIAN.

Hall, Amy Laura

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: ETHICS.

Hall, David D.

Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

Articles contributed: PURITANISM.

Hall, Douglas John

McGill University, Montreal, Canada

Articles contributed: NEO-ORTHODOXY.

Hall Jr., Lloyd M.

Historian, National Association of Congregational Christian Churches, Oak Creek, Wisc.

Articles contributed: CONGREGATIONALISM.

Hall, Stanley R.

Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Tex.

Articles contributed: WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY.

Hamm, Thomas D.

Earlham College, Richmond, Ind.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE; SOCIETY OF FRIENDS IN NORTH AMERICA.

Hammond, Guyton B.

Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Va.

Articles contributed: TILLICH, PAUL.

Han, Jin Hee

New York Theological Seminary, N.Y.

Articles contributed: ART; VOCATION.

Hanciles, Jehu J.

Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: CROWTHER, ARCHDEACON DANDESON; JOHNSON, JAMES; LIVINGSTONE, DAVID.

Hanley, Mark Y.

Truman State University, Kirksville, Mo.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS; TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS DE.

Hansen, Gary Neal

University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Iowa

Articles contributed: CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH; INSTITUTES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION; PREDESTINATION.

Hardage, Jeanette

Charleston, S.C.

Articles contributed: SLESSOR, MARY.

Hardman, Keith

Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa.

Articles contributed: TAYLOR, NATHANIEL WILLIAM.

Harinck, George

Vrije Universiteit (Netherlands)

Articles contributed: DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

Harley, Jason C.

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: FAITH.

Harp, Gillis

Grove City College, Pa.

Articles contributed: BROOKS, PHILLIPS; CUMMINS, GEORGE DAVID; KINGSLEY, CHARLES; SIMEON, CHARLES.

Harrell, David E.

Auburn University, Auburn, Ala.

Articles contributed: ROBERTSON, PAT.

Harrison, Peter

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: SCIENCE.

Harrison, Wes

Ohio Valley College, Vienna, W. Va.

Articles contributed: HUTTER, JAKOB; HUTTERITES; SOCIETY OF BROTHERS.

Hart, Darryl G.

Intercollegiate Studies Institute, Wilmington, Del.

Articles contributed: MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM.

Harvey, Paul

University of Colorado at Colorado Springs

Articles contributed: GENERAL BAPTISTS; NATIONAL PRIMITIVE BAPTIST CONVENTION; PRIMITIVE BAPTIST CHURCHES; STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH.

Harvey, Van A.

Stanford University, Calif.

Articles contributed: FEUERBACH, LUDWIG.

Hauschild, Wolf-Dieter

University of Muenster (Germany)

Articles contributed: BUGENHAGEN, JOHANNES.

Hawkins, Jr., Merrill M.

Carson-Newman College, Jefferson City, Tenn.

Articles contributed: FREE WILL BAPTISTS.

Hawn, C. Michael

Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex.

Articles contributed: Music, GLOBAL.

Hedlund, Roger E.

Mylapore Institute for Indigenous Studies (India)

Articles contributed: NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF.

Heininen, Simo

University of Helsinki (Finland)

Articles contributed: AGRICOLA, MICHAEL; FINLAND.

Heitzenrater, Richard P.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: WESLEY, CHARLES; WESLEY, JOHN.

Hensley, Jeffrey

Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.

Articles contributed: LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM AND LIBERALISM;
ORTHODOXY.

Hequet, Suzanne S.

Luther Seminary, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: AUGSBURG INTERIM.

Herd, Jennifer A.

University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: HUME, DAVID.

Herring, George

University of Bradford, University of Leeds, and University of York (England)

Articles contributed: OXFORD MOVEMENT.

Hewitt, T. Furman

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BACKUS, ISAAC.

Hillerbrand, Hans

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: ARNOLD, EBERHARD; ANTI-SEMITISM; BAUER, BRUNO; BIBLE, KING JAMES VERSION; BRAGHT, TIELEMAN JANSZ VAN; DAVID, FRANCIS (FERENC); DIPPEL, JOHANN CONRAD; DISTLER, HUGO; EBERHARDT, W.; ERASTUS, THOMAS; EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE; FELGENHAUER, PAUL; FRANCKE, AUGUST HERMANN; GERHARDT, PAUL;
GRUNDTVIG, NICOLAJ FREDERICK SEVERIN; LAESTADIUS, LARS LEVI; LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL; MACKENZIE, JOHN; SERPENT HANDLERS; SHEPPARD, WILLIAM HENRY; STRONG, JOSIAH.

Hilliard, David

Flinders University (Australia)

Articles contributed: AUSTRALIA.

Hillier, H. Chad

Wycliffe College, University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: BAPTIST GENERAL CONFERENCE; CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST; EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH OF AMERICA.

Himes, Michael J.

Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Articles contributed: MOHLER, JOHANN ADAM.

Hodder, Alan D.

Hampshire College, Amherst, Mass.

Articles contributed: EMERSON, RALPH WALDO.

Hofmeyr, J.W.

University of Pretoria (South Africa)

Articles contributed: SOUTH AFRICA.

Holifield, E.Brooks

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: COVENANT THEOLOGY; EDWARDS, JONATHAN.

Holmes, Finlay

Union Theological College (Northern Ireland)

Articles contributed: COOKE, HENRY; ULSTER.

Holmes, David L.

College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Va.

Articles contributed: EPISCOPAL CHURCH, UNITED STATES.

Homan, Roger

University of Brighton (England)

Articles contributed: FAITH HEALING.

Howes, Graham A.K.

Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: RICHARDSON, HENRY HOBSON.

Huber, Donald L.

Trinity Lutheran Seminary, Columbus, Ohio

Articles contributed: BEECHER, LYMAN; BURNED-OVER DISTRICT; STOWE, HARRIET BEECHER; WELD, THEODORE DWIGHT.

Hunt, Stephen

University of the West of England

Articles contributed: HUMAN RIGHTS.

Hunt, Robert

English-Speaking United Methodist Church (Austria)

Articles contributed: BIBLE TRANSLATION.

Hunter, George

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: MEGA-CHURCHES.

Hunter, Harold

International Pentecostal Holiness Church Archives and Research Center, Oklahoma City, Okla.

Articles contributed: CHURCH OF GOD OF PROPHECY.

Hutchinson, Mark

Southern Cross College (Australia)

Articles contributed: ITALY; UNITING CHURCH IN AUSTRALIA.

Ion, A.Hamish

Royal Military College of Canada, Ontario, Canada

Articles contributed: JAPAN.

Jacobsen, Douglas

Messiah College, Grantham, Pa.

Articles contributed: LATTER RAIN REVIVAL.

James III, Frank A.

Reformed Theological Seminary, Oviedo, Fla.

Articles contributed: ELECTION; JUSTIFICATION.

Janet, Richard J.

Rockhurst University, Kansas City, Mo.

Articles contributed: TEMPLE, FREDERICK.

Japinga, Lynn

Hope College, Holland, Mich.

Articles contributed: REFORMED CHURCH IN AMERICA.

Jarvis, Alec

Regent's Park College, Oxford University (England)

Articles contributed: BLOMFIELD, CHARLES; MACLEOD, NORMAN; MARTINEAU, JAMES; WHITE, WILLIAM HALE.

Jauhiainen, Peter D.

Kirkwood Community College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa

Articles contributed: HOPKINS, SAMUEL.

Jeffrey, David Lyle

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: BIBLE AND LITERATURE.

Jeyaraj, Daniel

Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, N.J.

Articles contributed: INDIA.

Johnson, Todd M.

Gordon Conwell Theological Seminary, South Hamilton, Mass.

Articles contributed: HOUSE CHURCHES (ASIA); STATISTICS.

Jones, Norman L.

Utah State University, Logan, Utah

Articles contributed: ELIZABETH I (ELIZABETH TUDOR).

Jones, Arun W.

Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Tex.

Articles contributed: BRENT, CHARLES; INDIAN THEOLOGY.

Jones, Ken Sundet

Luther Seminary, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: CAPITO, WOLFGANG.

Jones, Gareth

Canterbury Christ Church University College (England)

Articles contributed: BRUNNER, EMIL; THEOLOGY.

Jongeneel, Jan

Bunni, Netherlands

Articles contributed: KRAEMER, HENDRIK.

Kaiser, Jochen-Christian

Philipps-Universitaet Marburg (Germany)

Articles contributed: WICHERN, JOHANN HEINRICH; WÜNSCH, GEORG.

Kalme, Guntis

Luther Academy of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Latvia (ELCL)

Articles contributed: LATVIA.

Kaplan, Benjamin J.

University College London (England)

Articles contributed: ARMINIUS, JACOBUS.

Karthaus, Ulrich

Giesse, Germany

Articles contributed: GOETHE, JOHANN WOLFGANG; LITERATURE, GERMAN;
SCHILLER, JOHANN CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH.

Kazin, Michael

Georgetown University, Washington, D.C.

Articles contributed: BRYAN, WILLIAM JENNINGS.

Keck, David

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: PHILIPPINES.

Kee, Alistair

University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: DEATH OF GOD.

Keen, Ralph

University of Iowa, Iowa City, Iowa

Articles contributed: HEIDELBERG CATECHISM OF 1563; HELVETIC CONFESSION; MELANCHTHON, PHILIPP.

Keller, Rosemary S.

Union Theological Seminary, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: HARKNESS, GEORGIA; WOMEN, UNITED STATES.

Kelly, Maureen

Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Articles contributed: WORLD VISION.

Kemeny, P.C.

Grove City College, Pa.

Articles contributed: INTERVARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP.

Kerfoot, Donna

McMaster Divinity College, Ontario, Canada

Articles contributed: BAPTIST FAMILY OF CHURCHES.

Kerr, Fergus

Blackfriars Hall, University of Oxford (England)

Articles contributed: TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Kerr, Nathan

Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.

Articles contributed: SACRAMENTS.

Kidd, Thomas S.

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: WOLLASTON, WILLIAM.

Kilde, Jeanne Halgren

Macalester College, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: ALTARS; COMMUNION TABLES.

King, John N.

Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio

Articles contributed: FOXE, JOHN.

King, William M.

Albright College, Reading, Pa.

Articles contributed: ECUMENISM; GLADDEN, WASHINGTON; INTERCHURCH WORLD MOVEMENT; SMITH, W. ROBERTSON.

Kingdon, Robert

University of Wisconsin at Madison

Articles contributed: CALVIN, JOHN; CONSISTORY; ECCLESIASTICAL ORDINANCES.

Kirchhoff, Karl-Heinz

Münster, Germany

Articles contributed: ROTHMANN, BERNHARD.

Kirkley, Evelyn A.

University of San Diego, Calif.

Articles contributed: MOTT, LUCRETIA COFFIN; STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY.

Kittelson, James

Luther Seminary, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: AUGSBURG CONFESSION.

Klaassen, Walter

Conrad Grebel College, British Columbia, Canada

Articles contributed: GREBEL, CONRAD.

Klassen, William

University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: ANABAPTISM.

Knudsen, Jon P.

Nordregio, the Nordic Centre for Spatial Development (Sweden)

Articles contributed: HAUGE, HANS NIELSEN.

Kolb, Robert

Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Mo.

Articles contributed: BOOK OF CONCORD; FLACIUS, MATTHIAS; LUTHER, MARTIN; LUTHERANISM; MARTYRS AND MARTYROLOGIES.

Koop, Karl

Canadian Mennonite University, Manitoba, Canada

Articles contributed: SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION.

Kort, Wesley A.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: DEVRIES, PETER; LEWIS, C.S.

Kraftchick, Steve

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: JESUS, LIVES OF.

Kraybill, Donald B.

Elizabethtown College, Pa.

Articles contributed: AMISH.

Kreider, Glenn R.

Dallas Theological Seminary, Tex.

Articles contributed: DARBY, JOHN NELSON; DISPENSATIONALISM; TRIBULATIONISM.

Kreitzer, Beth

Saint Vincent College, Latrobe, Pa.

Articles contributed: MARY, VIRGIN; PARACELSDUS, THEOPHRASTUS.

Labode, Modupe

Colorado Historical Society, Denver, Colo.

Articles contributed: LIBERIA.

Lagerquist, L.DeAne

Saint Olaf College, Northfield, Minn.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN LUTHERAN CHURCH.

Lamberth, David C.

Harvard Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass.

Articles contributed: JAMES, WILLIAM.

Land, Gary

Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Mich.

Articles contributed: WHITE, ELLEN GOULD.

Landes, Richard

Boston University, Mass.

Articles contributed: MILLENARIANS AND MILLENNIALISM.

Larsen, Timothy

Wheaton College, Ill.

Articles contributed: COLENZO, JOHN WILLIAM.

Laughlin, Jay

College of Charleston, S.C.

Articles contributed: BENNETT, JOHN; PUFENDORF, SAMUEL.

Lausten, Martin Schwarz

Kobenhavns Universitet (Denmark)

Articles contributed: DENMARK.

Leaver, Robin A.

Westminster Choir College of Rider University, Princeton, N.J.

Articles contributed: ANGLICAN CHANT; HYMNS AND HYMNALS; Music, AMERICAN; Music, NORTHERN EUROPEAN.

Lechner, Frank J.

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: SECULARIZATION.

Legood, Giles

University of London (England)

Articles contributed: CHAPLAINCY.

Lehmann, Hartmut

Max-Planck-Institut Für Geschichte (Germany)

Articles contributed: ABSOLUTISM; NATIONALISM.

Lehmberg, Stanford

University of Minnesota, Minneapolis

Articles contributed: CIVIL WAR, ENGLAND; LAUD, WILLIAM; Music, OVERVIEW; Music, ENGLISH CHURCH; VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, RALPH.

Leonard, Bill J.

Wake Forest University, Winston-Salem, N.C.

Articles contributed: KU KLUX KLAN; SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION.

Lettinga, Cornelis H.

Bethel College, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: BOESAK, ALAN; DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH IN AFRICA.

Lewis, Bonnie Sue

University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, Iowa

Articles contributed: NATIVE AMERICANS.

Lindberg, Carter

Boston University, Mass.

Articles contributed: REFORMATION.

Lineham, Peter

Massey University at Albany (New Zealand)

Articles contributed: ANTINOMIANISM; CHILIASM; NEW ZEALAND; SUNDAY SCHOOL; WHITEFIELD, GEORGE.

Lippy, Charles

University of Tennessee at Chattanooga

Articles contributed: CHRISTADELPHIANS; SOUTHERN PROTESTANTISM.

Little, David L.

University of Queensland (Australia)

Articles contributed: GARRISON, WINFRED; HIGHER EDUCATION; RESTORATIONISM.

Little, Geoffrey A.

Church Mission Society, New Haven, Conn.

Articles contributed: CHURCH MISSION SOCIETY.

Liu, David U.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: CHERBURY, EDWARD LORD HERBERT OF; FELLOWSHIP OF SOUTHERN CHURCHMEN; MODERNISM.

Loades, Ann

University of Durham (England)

Articles contributed: FEMINIST THEOLOGY; UNDERHILL, EVELYN.

Loades, David

University of Sheffield (England)

Articles contributed: ACTS AND MONUMENTS; CRANMER, THOMAS.

Lochman, Jan Milic

University of Basel (Switzerland)

Articles contributed: HROMADKA, JOSEF.

Long, Kimberly Bracken

Drew University, Madison, N.J.

Articles contributed: LITURGY.

Long, Thomas G.

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: FUNERARY RITES.

Longenecker, Steve

Bridgewater College, Va.

Articles contributed: OBERLIN, JOHANN FRIEDRICH; SCHMUCKER, SAMUEL SIMON.

Lorion, Amy E.

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

Lotz-Heumann, Ute

Humboldt- Universität (Germany)

Articles contributed: CONFESSIONALIZATION.

Lovegrove, Deryck W.

Saint Mary's College, University of Saint Andrews (Scotland)

Articles contributed: LAITY.

Luman, Richard

Ottumwa, Iowa

Articles contributed: ICELAND.

Lund, Eric

Saint Olaf College, Northfield, Minn.

Articles contributed: BERGGRAV, EIVIND; LUTHERANISM, GERMANY; LUTHERANISM, SCANDINAVIA; LUTHERANISM, UNITED STATES.

Lundin, Roger

Wheaton College, Wheaton, Ill.

Articles contributed: DICKINSON, EMILY.

Macquiban, Tim

Sarum College (England)

Articles contributed: BOURNE, HUGH; CHUBB, THOMAS; COOK, THOMAS; FISK, WILBUR; FREEMAN, THOMAS BIRCH; GLADSTONE, WILLIAM EWART; HASTINGS, LADY SELINA; MACLEOD, GEORGE FIELDEN; METHODISM, ENGLAND; WEATHERHEAD, LESLIE.

Maddox, Marion

Victoria University of Wellington (New Zealand)

Articles contributed: COCCEJUS, JOHANNES.

Mallampalli, Chandra S.

Westmont College, Santa Barbara, Calif.

Articles contributed: MASS MOVEMENTS (INDIA); SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF.

Malpezzi, Frances

Arkansas State University, Jonesboro, Ark.

Articles contributed: LEADE, JANE WARD.

Mamiya, Lawrence H.

Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

Articles contributed: AFRICAN AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM.

Manetsch, Scott M.

Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Ill.

Articles contributed: BEZA, THEODORE.

Marcuse, Deborah K.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: ASCETICISM; LATIMER, HUGH; OCHINO, BERNARDINO; POISSY, COLLOQUY OF.

Marini, Stephen

Wellesley College, Mass.

Articles contributed: AWAKENINGS; SECTARIANISM.

Marino, Gordon

St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minn.

Articles contributed: KIERKEGAARD, SOREN A.

Martin, Jessica

Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: WALTON, ISAAC.

Martin, Sandy

University of Georgia, Athens, Ga.

Articles contributed: AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH; AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH; AMERICAN COLONIZATION SOCIETY; PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL BAPTIST CONVENTION.

Martin, William

Rice University, Houston, Tex.

Articles contributed: GRAHAM, BILLY.

Martinich, A.P.

University of Texas at Austin

Articles contributed: HOBBS, THOMAS.

Mason, Roger A.

University of St. Andrews (Scotland)

Articles contributed: KNOX, JOHN.

Massanari, Ronald L.

Alma College, Mich.

Articles contributed: STOECKER, ADOLF.

Mathers, Helen

University of Sheffield (England)

Articles contributed: BUTLER, JOSEPHINE.

Matson, Mark A.

Milligan College, Tenn.

Articles contributed: CHURCHES OF CHRIST, NONINSTRUMENTAL.

Maughan, Steven S.

Albertson College, Caldwell, Idaho

Articles contributed: MISSIONS, BRITISH.

Mayer, Thomas F.

Augustana College, Rock Island, Ill

Articles contributed: HOOKER, RICHARD.

McArver, Susan Wilds

Lutheran Theological Southern Seminary, Columbia, S.C.

Articles contributed: LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA.

McCormick, Kelley Steve

Mount Vernon Nazarene University, Mount Vernon, Ohio

Articles contributed: ASBURY, FRANCIS.

McCrossen, Alexis

Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex.

Articles contributed: HOLIDAYS AND FESTIVALS; SABBATARIANISM.

McCulloh, Gerald W.

Loyola University, Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: MARHEINEKE, PHILIPP KONRAD.

McDermott, Gerald R.

Roanoke College, Salem, Va.

Articles contributed: DEISM.

McGee, Gary B.

Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, Springfield, Mo.

Articles contributed: ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

McGinnis, Scott

Samford University, Birmingham, Ala.

Articles contributed: CARTWRIGHT, THOMAS; MELVILLE, ANDREW.

McIntire, C.T.

University of Toronto (Canada)

Articles contributed: BUTTERFIELD, HERBERT; ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES; SABATIER, AUGUSTE; SABATIER, PAUL.

McKim, Donald K.

Westminster John Knox Press, Germantown, Tenn.

Articles contributed: BERKHOF, HENDRIKUS; CALVINISM; WESTMINSTER CATECHISM; WESTMINSTER CONFESSION.

McLaughlin, Emmet

Villanova University, Villanova, Pa.

Articles contributed: CELIBACY; CLERGY; CLERGY, MARRIAGE OF; FRANCK, SEBASTIAN; MÜNTZER, THOMAS; SCHWENCKFELD, CASPAR; SPIRITUALISM; WEIGEL, VALENTIN.

McLeod, Hugh

University of Birmingham (England)

Articles contributed: INDUSTRIALIZATION.

Meeks, M.Douglas

Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn.

Articles contributed: MOLTSMANN, JÜRGEN; THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, NORTH AMERICAN.

Megivern, James J.

University of North Carolina at Wilmington

Articles contributed: CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

Mellers, Wilfrid

Professor Emeritus, University of York (England)

Articles contributed: BACH, JOHANN SEBASTIAN.

Mentzer, Raymond A.

University of Iowa, Iowa City

Articles contributed: BELGIC CONFESSION OF 1561; COLIGNY, GASPARD; DORT, CANONS OF; GALLICAN CONFESSION; HUGUENOTS; LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, LOUIS-SEBASTIEN; RESTITUTION, EDICT OF.

Michalson, Jr., Gordon E.

New College of Florida, Sarasota, Fla.

Articles contributed: KANT, IMMANUEL.

Miller, Glenn T.

Bangor Theological Seminary, Maine

Articles contributed: KINGDOM OF GOD; SEMINARIES.

Moeller, Eric

Concordia University, River Forest, Ill.

Articles contributed: SOCIOLOGY OF PROTESTANTISM.

Morgan, David

Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind.

Articles contributed: AESTHETICS; ICONOGRAPHY.

Morgan, Robert

Oxford University (England)

Articles contributed: BULTMANN, RUDOLF.

Moses, Wilson J.

Penn State University, University Park, Pa.

Articles contributed: CRUMMELL, ALEXANDER.

Mühling, Andreas

Universität Bonn (Germany), Universität Trier (Germany), and Universität Luzern (Switzerland)

Articles contributed: BARTH, HEINRICH; CONVENTICLES; GOMAR, FRANZ; GOMARIANS; HARNACK, ADOLF VON; SCHWEITZER, ALBERT; SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL.

Mulder, John

Louisville Seminary, Ky.

Articles contributed: WILSON, WOODROW.

Mullett, Michael Anthony

Lancaster University (England)

Articles contributed: BUNYAN, JOHN; Fox, GEORGE; FRIENDS, SOCIETY OF.

Mullin, Robert Bruce

The General Theological Seminary, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: BROAD CHURCH; DENOMINATION; PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE.

Mumm, Susan

The Open University (Milton Keynes, England)

Articles contributed: SISTERHOODS, ANGLICAN.

Murdoch, Norman H.

University of Cincinnati, Ohio

Articles contributed: PHILANTHROPY; ZIMBABWE.

Murdock, Graeme

University of Birmingham (England)

Articles contributed: HUNGARY; ROMANIA.

Murray, Michael J.

Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa.

Articles contributed: LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM.

Nestingen, James Arne

Luther Seminary, Saint Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA;
GNESIO-LUTHERANS; PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS.

Newberry, Warren B.

Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, Springfield, Mo.

Articles contributed: ALLEN, ROLAND; MALAWI.

Newman Brooks, Peter

Robinson College, Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER; PARKER SOCIETY;
THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

Ng, Maria N.

University of Alberta, Canada

Articles contributed: KINGSLEY, MARY.

Nixon, Jude V.

Oakland University, Rochester, Mich.

Articles contributed: LIDDON, HENRY PARRY.

Noll, Mark A.

Wheaton College, Ill

Articles contributed: BOUDINOT, ELIAS; WITHERSPOON, JOHN.

Nordbeck, Elizabeth

Andover Newton Theological School, Newton Centre, Mass.

Articles contributed: UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

Oakley, Francis

Williams College, Williamstown, Mass.

Articles contributed: RICHER, EDMOND.

O'Connor, Daniel

University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: ANDREWS, CHARLES FREER; MONASTICISM; SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE; SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.

Oehlschlaeger, Fritz

Virginia Tech, Blacksburg, Va.

Articles contributed: WOOLMAN, JOHN.

Ogasapian, John

University of Massachusetts at Lowell

Articles contributed: WATTS, ISAAC.

Olbricht, Thomas H.

Pepperdine University, Malibu, Calif.

Articles contributed: CAMPBELL FAMILY; CAMPBELL, JOHN.

Olson, Jeannine E.

Rhode Island College, Providence, R.I.

Articles contributed: DEACONESS, DEACON; FAREL, GUILLAUME; GENEVA BIBLE.

Olson, Roger E.

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: EVANGELICALISM, THEOLOGY OF; THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY, GLOBAL.

O'Malley, J. Steven

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: EVANGELICAL UNITED BROTHERS CHURCH; GERMAN GROUPS IN AMERICA; SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB.

Omenyo, Cephas N.

University of Ghana

Articles contributed: ATTOH-AHUMA, SAMUEL RICHARD BREW; BAETA, CHRISTIAN GONCALVES KWAMI; BASEL MISSION; DuBois, W.E.B.; REINDORF, CARL CHRISTIAN.

O'Neill, J.C.

The University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: HIGHER CRITICISM; LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM; OVERBECK, FRANZ CAMILLE.

Osborn, Robert

Duke Divinity School, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BARMEN DECLARATION; DEATH AND DYING.

Ostwalt, Conrad

Appalachian State University, Boone, N.C.

Articles contributed: MOVIES.

Pädam, Tiit

Eesti Evangeelne Luterlik Kirik (Estonia)

Articles contributed: ESTONIA.

Pak, G.Sujin

Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, Evanston, Ill.

Articles contributed: AMSDORF, NIKOLAUS VON; MOON, SUN MYUNG; TINDAL, MATTHEW; WOOLSTON, THOMAS.

Pasquier, Michael

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: CALVERT FAMILY.

Paz, D.G.

University of North Texas, Denton, Tex.

Articles contributed: ANGLO-CATHOLICISM.

Peacock, Jim

University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill

Articles contributed: WEBER, MAX.

Peay, Steven

First Congregational Church, Wauwatosa, Wisc.

Articles contributed: CONGREGATIONALISM.

Peel, J.D.Y.

University of London (England)

Articles contributed: NIGERIA.

Pember, Sherry

Wilfrid Laurier University, Ontario, Canada

Articles contributed: ADIAPHORA.

Peters, Melvin K.H.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: CARIBBEAN.

Peters, Ted

Pacific Lutheran Theological Seminary, Berkeley, Calif.

Articles contributed: NEW AGE MOVEMENTS.

Peterson, Kurt W.

North Park University, Chicago, Ill.

Articles contributed: MCINTIRE, CARL.

Pfister, Lauren

Hong Kong Baptist University

Articles contributed: LEGGE, JAMES; NEE, WATCHMAN (NI TUOSHENG); WANG, MING DAO (WANG MINGDAO).

Phillips, Thomas E.

Colorado Christian University, Lakewood, Colo.

Articles contributed: COKE, THOMAS; MATHEWS, SHAILER; SANCTIFICATION; WWJD.

Pierard, Richard V.

Gordon College, Wenham, Mass.

Articles contributed: BAPTIST MISSIONS.

Pinches, Charles R.

University of Scranton, Pa.

Articles contributed: ECOLOGY.

Piper, John

Lycoming College, Williamsport, Pa.

Articles contributed: COFFIN, HENRY SLOANE; FOSDICK, HARRY EMERSON; FREE CHURCH FEDERAL COUNCIL; PEALE, NORMAN VINCENT; ROBINSON, HENRY WHEELER.

Plunkett, Stephen W.

Saint Andrew Presbyterian Church, Denton, Tex.

Articles contributed: CONVERSION.

Pointer, Richard W.

Westmont College, Santa Barbara, Calif.

Articles contributed: ELIOT, JOHN.

Pointer, Steven R.

Trinity International University, Deerfield, Ill.

Articles contributed: HENRY, CARL F.H.

Pollock, Kelly Therese

University of California at Santa Barbara

Articles contributed: YMCA, YWCA.

Pope, Robert

University of Wales, Bangor

Articles contributed: WALES.

Porter, Andrew

King's College, University of London (England)

Articles contributed: COLONIALISM.

Porterfield, Amanda

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: EDDY, MARY BAKER.

Powell, Samuel M.

Point Loma Nazarene University, San Diego, Calif.

Articles contributed: HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH; NEOLOGY; SCHELLING, FRIEDRICH VON; WOLFF, CHRISTIAN.

Pratt, Dorothy O.

University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION.

Prickett, Stephen

Baylor University, Waco, Tex.

Articles contributed: BROWNING, ROBERT; COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR; ELIOT, T.S.; ROMANTICISM; TENNYSON, ALFRED, LORD; WORDSWORTH, WILLIAM.

Rabin, Sheila J.

Saint Peter's College, Jersey City, N.J.

Articles contributed: KEPLER, JOHANNES; NEWTON, ISAAC.

Ramírez, Daniel

Arizona State University, Tempe, Ariz.

Articles contributed: MEXICO.

Raser, Harold E.

Nazarene Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Mo.

Articles contributed: PALMER, PHOEBE WORRALL.

Rast, Jr., Lawrence R.

Concordia Theological Seminary, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Articles contributed: LUTHERAN CHURCH—MISSOURI SYNOD, THE.

Remillard, Arthur J.

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: BENTHAM, JEREMY; CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY.

Rex, Richard

Queens' College, Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: HENRY VIII.

Richardson, James T.

University of Nevada, Reno, Nev.

Articles contributed: JESUS MOVEMENT.

Richardson, R.C.

King Alfred's College (England)

Articles contributed: LEVELLERS.

Rieger, Joerg

Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex.

Articles contributed: LIBERATION THEOLOGY; POLITICAL THEOLOGY; THEOLOGY, TWENTIETH-CENTURY.

Ringenberg, William C.

Taylor University, Upland, Ind.

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN COLLEGES.

Robert, Dana L.

Boston University, Mass.

Articles contributed: MISSIONS; PIERSON, ARTHUR TAPPAN.

Roberts, J.Deotis

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BLACK THEOLOGY; CONE, JAMES HAL.

Rodgerson Pleasants, Phyllis

Baptist Theological Seminary at Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: BAPTISTS, GLOBAL.

Roebuck, David

Lee University, Cleveland, Tenn.

Articles contributed: CHURCH OF GOD, CLEVELAND, TENNESSEE; PENTECOSTAL CHURCH OF GOD; PENTECOSTAL/ CHARISMATIC CHURCHES OF NORTH AMERICA; PENTECOSTAL WORLD FELLOWSHIP.

Rosin, Robert

Concordia Seminary, Saint Louis, Mo.

Articles contributed: KRAUTH, CHARLES PORTERFIELD; LUTHERAN SYNODICAL CONFERENCE; OSIANDER, ANDREAS; WALTHER, CARL FERDINAND WILHELM.

Ross, Andrew C.

University of Edinburgh (Scotland)

Articles contributed: MOFFAT, ROBERT; PHILIP, JOHN.

Ross, Kenneth R.

Church of Scotland (Edinburgh, Scotland)

Articles contributed: BOOTH, JOSEPH; CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; ETHNICITY.

Roth, John D.

Goshen College, Ind.

Articles contributed: SATTLER, MICHAEL.

Rubinstein, William D.

University of Wales, Aberystwyth

Articles contributed: PHILO-SEMITISM.

Rumrich, John

University of Texas at Austin

Articles contributed: MILTON, JOHN.

Rumscheidt, Martin

Atlantic School of Theology, Nova Scotia, Canada

Articles contributed: GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH; NIEMOLLER, MARTIN; RAGAZ, LEONHARD.

Ruse, Michael

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: CREATION SCIENCE.

Russell, Colin A.

The Open University (England)

Articles contributed: BACON, FRANCIS; FARADAY, MICHAEL; NATURE; PRIESTLEY, JOSEPH.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton

University of California at Santa Barbara

Articles contributed: DEVIL; HEAVEN AND HELL.

Russell, William R.

Bethel Lutheran Church, Porter, Minn.

Articles contributed: NYGREN, ANDERS; OECOLAMPADIUS, JOHANNES; SCHMALKALDIC ARTICLES; SCHMALKALDIC LEAGUE.

Ruth, Lester

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: CAMP MEETING.

Rylaarsdam, David

Calvin Theological Seminary, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Articles contributed: CHRISTIAN REFORMED CHURCH IN NORTH AMERICA.

Sachs, William

Episcopal Church Foundation, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: CAMBRIDGE PLATFORM; CROMWELL, THOMAS; KEBLE, JOHN; LAW, WILLIAM; NEILL, STEPHEN CHARLES; NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY; RAIKES, ROBERT.

Saillant, John

Western Michigan University, Kalamazoo, Mich.

Articles contributed: ALLEN, RICHARD; CARY, LOTT; DOUGLASS, FREDERICK.

Samarin, William J.

University of Toronto, Canada

Articles contributed: TONGUES, SPEAKING IN.

Sauter, Gerhard

University of Bonn (Germany)

Articles contributed: GRACE.

Schattauer, Thomas H.

Wartburg Theological Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa

Articles contributed: LOHE, WILHELM.

Scheick, William J.

University of Texas at Austin

Articles contributed: ADAMS, HANNAH; BRADSTREET, ANNE; JEREMIAD; MATHER, INCREASE.

Schildgen, Robert

Sierra Club, San Francisco, Calif.

Articles contributed: KAGAWA, TOYOHICO.

Schilson, Arno

University of Mainz, (Germany)

Articles contributed: REIMARUS, HERMANN SAMUEL.

Schmid, Alois

Universitat München (Germany)

Articles contributed: MARBURG, COLLOQUY OF.

Schneider, Robert

Temple University, Philadelphia, Pa.

Articles contributed: ANDERSON, RUFUS.

Scholer, David M.

Fuller Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN BAPTIST CHURCHES; GENERAL ASSOCIATION OF REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCHES; JUDSON, ADONIRAM.

Schuler, Rhoda

Concordia College, Moorhead, Minn.

Articles contributed: CONFIRMATION.

Schwanke, Johannes

University of Tubingen (Germany)

Articles contributed: BAUR, FERDINAND CHRISTIAN.

Schwinge, Gerhard

Independent scholar (Durmshheim, Germany)

Articles contributed: BLUMHARDT, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH; JUNG-STILLING, JOHANN HEINRICH; KUTTER, HERMANN; NEANDER, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM.

Scott, Alana Cain

Morehead State University, Morehead, Ky.

Articles contributed: CROMWELL, OLIVER.

Seager, Richard

Hamilton College, Clinton, N.Y.

Articles contributed: WORLD'S PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

Sedgwick, Peter

Board for Social Responsibility, Church of England (London, England)

Articles contributed: ECONOMICS.

Seligman, Adam B.

Boston University, Mass.

Articles contributed: TOLERATION.

Senn, Frank C.

Immanuel Lutheran Church, Evanston, Ill.

Articles contributed: PRAYER; VESTMENTS.

Shenk, Wilbert R.

Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: MISSIOLOGY; MOTT, JOHN RALEIGH; WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES; WORLD MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

Sheveland, John

Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Articles contributed: SIN.

Shore, Paul

Saint Louis University, Mo. Articles contributed: BOEHME, JAKOB.

Shriver, George H.

Georgia Southern University, Statesboro, Ga.

Articles contributed: AMERICANS UNITED FOR THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE; CAREY, WILLIAM; HERESY.

Shuck, Glenn W.

Rice University, Houston, Tex.

Articles contributed: TELEVANGELISM.

Shults, F.LeRon

Bethel Theological Seminary, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: PANNENBERG, WOLFHART.

Sidwell, Mark

Bob Jones University, Greenville, S.C.

Articles contributed: BIBLE CONFERENCES.

Siker, Jeffrey S.

Loyola Marymount University, Los Angeles, Calif.

Articles contributed: HOMOSEXUALITY.

Skarsten, Trygve R.

Trinity Lutheran College, Issaquah, Wash.

Articles contributed: PETRI, LAURENTIUS; PETRI, OLAUS; SWEDEN; TAUSEN, HANS.

Smith, Harmon L.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: ETHICS, MEDICAL; TEMPLE, WILLIAM.

Smith, Ruth

Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: HANDEL, GEORGE FRIDERIC.

Smylie, James

Union Theological Seminary and Presbyterian School of Christian Education, Richmond, Va.

Articles contributed: PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH U.S.A.; PRESBYTERIANISM.

Snobelen, Stephen D.

University of King's College, Nova Scotia, Canada

Articles contributed: WHISTON, WILLIAM.

Snyder, Howard A.

Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Ky.

Articles contributed: MISSIONS, NORTH AMERICAN.

Sonderegger, Katherine

Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va.

Articles contributed: BARTH, KARL.

Song, Choan-Seng

Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, Calif.

Articles contributed: ASIAN THEOLOGY.

Spargo, Tamsin

Liverpool John Moores University (England)

Articles contributed: PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

Sprunger, Keith L.

Bethel College, North Newton, Kans.

Articles contributed: MENNONITES, GENERAL CONFERENCE OF.

Stackhouse, Jr., John G.

Regent College, Vancouver, Canada

Articles contributed: CANADA.

Stange, Mary Zeiss

Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

Articles contributed: BRANCH DAVIDIANS.

Stassen, Glen H.

Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, Calif.

Articles contributed: NIEBUHR, REINHOLD; PEACE ORGANIZATIONS; WAR.

Stein, Stephen J.

Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind.

Articles contributed: SHAKERS.

Stenmark, Mikael

Uppsala Universitet (Sweden)

Articles contributed: SCIENTISM.

Sterk, Andrea

University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: COMENIUS, JOHN.

Stevenson, Kenneth

Bishop of Portsmouth, Church of England (England)

Articles contributed: CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Stewart-Robertson, J.C.

University of New Brunswick, Saint John, Canada

Articles contributed: SCOTLAND; SCOTTISH COMMON SENSE REALISM.

Stjerna, Kirsi

Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, Pa.

Articles contributed: AUGSBURG CONFESSION, APOLOGY OF.

Stockdale, Nancy L.

University of Central Florida, Orlando, Fla.

Articles contributed: POST-COLONIALISM.

Stout, Harry

Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Articles contributed: CIVIL WAR, UNITED STATES.

Streiff, Patrick

United Methodist Church Europe (Switzerland)

Articles contributed: METHODISM, EUROPE.

Strom, Jonathan

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: HALLE; MOSHEIM, JOHANN LORENZ; PIETISM; SEMLER, JOHANN SALOMO.

Stunt, Timothy C.F.

Wooster School, Danbury, Conn.

Articles contributed: MERLE D'AUBIGNE, JEAN HENRI; REVEIL.

Suiter, David E.

Iliff School of Theology, Denver, Colo.

Articles contributed: PERIODICALS, PROTESTANT.

Sunquist, Scott W.

Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pa.

Articles contributed: EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: ASIA; SUNG, JOHN (SONG SHANGJIE); TAIWAN.

Sunshine, Glenn

Central Connecticut State University, New Britain, Conn.

Articles contributed: CHURCH DISCIPLINE.

Surin, Kenneth

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: POSTMODERNITY.

Svelmoe, William L.

Saint Mary's College, Notre Dame, Ind.

Articles contributed: WYCLIFFE BIBLE TRANSLATORS.

Swatos Jr., William H.

Association for the Sociology of Religion, Holiday, Fla.

Articles contributed: SEEKER; SEEKER CHURCHES.

Swierenga, Robert P.

Hope College, Holland, Mich.

Articles contributed: DUTCH PROTESTANTS IN AMERICA.

Sydnor, Jon Paul

Boston College, Chestnut Hill, Mass.

Articles contributed: BAUMGARTEN, SIEGMUND JAKOB.

Szasz, Ferenc Morton

University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, N. Mex.

Articles contributed: SHELDON, CHARLES.

Szczucki, Lech

Polish Academy of Sciences (Poland)

Articles contributed: ANTI-TRINITARIANISM; KECKERMANN, BARTHOLOMEW; LASKI, JAN; MODRZEWSKI, ANDREIJ; POLAND; SOCINIANISM; SOZZINI, FAUSTO (SOCINUS).

Tait, Edwin R.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: GENEVA CATECHISM; REGENSBURG COLLOQUY.

Táíwò, Olúfémi

Seattle University, Wash.

Articles contributed: AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES.

Tamcke, Martin

Georg-August-Universität (Germany)

Articles contributed: MISSIONS, GERMAN; MOLANUS, GERHARD WOLTER.

Taylor, Eugene I.

Saybrook Institute, San Francisco, Calif. and Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

Articles contributed: JUNGIANISM.

Teply, Alison J.

Cambridge University (England)

Articles contributed: LATITUDINARIANISM.

Thatcher, Adrian

College of Saint Mark and Saint John (England)

Articles contributed: MARRIAGE.

Thomas, Joseph L.

Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Ill.

Articles contributed: DAVIES, SAMUEL.

Thompson, David

University of Cambridge (England)

Articles contributed: BRITISH COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Thomson, Keith S.

Oxford University Museum (England)

Articles contributed: WILBERFORCE, SAMUEL.

Thorkildsen, Dag

University of Oslo (Norway)

Articles contributed: NORWAY.

Tinsley, Barbara Sher

Stanford University, Calif.

Articles contributed: BARNES, ROBERT; BAYLE, PIERRE; CAPPEL, LOUIS; JURIEU, PIERRE.

Tipton, Steven Michael

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: INDIVIDUALISM.

Tripp, David H.

Rolling Prairie United Methodist Church, Rolling Prairie, Ind.

Articles contributed: ARNDT, JOHANN; BELL, GEORGE; BENTLEY, RICHARD; CHARITY; CHURCH LAW; DAVIDSON, RANDALL THOMAS; FEET, WASHINGTON; FREE CHURCH; JOHNSON, SAMUEL; OBSERVANCES; PARKER, MATTHEW; TILLOTSON, JOHN; UNIVERSALISM.

Tseng, Timothy

American Baptist Seminary of the West, Berkeley, Calif.

Articles contributed: ASIAN-AMERICAN PROTESTANTISM.

Tucker, Karen Westerfield

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BUXTEHUDE, DIETRICH; DIVORCE; METHODISM, GLOBAL; WORSHIP.

Underwood, Grant

Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah

Articles contributed: PLURAL MARRIAGE.

Upson-Saia, Kristi

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: COMMUNISM.

Van Die, Marguerite

Queen's University, Ontario, Canada

Articles contributed: ALLINE, HENRY.

Varvis, Stephen

Fresno Pacific University, Calif.

Articles contributed: CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM.

Visser, Derk

Ursinus College, Collegeville, Pa.

Articles contributed: COVENANT.

Vogt, Peter

Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.

Articles contributed: MORAVIAN CHURCH; ZINZENDORF, NIKOLAUS LUDWIG VON.

Wainwright, Geoffrey

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BAPTISM; CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION (COCU); DIALOGUE, INTERCONFESSIONAL; DOCTRINE; NEWBIGIN, J.E. LESSLIE; WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL.

Waite, Gary K.

University of New Brunswick, Canada

Articles contributed: MENNO SIMONS.

Walker, Pamela J.

Carleton University, Ontario, Canada

Articles contributed: BOOTH, CATHERINE; BOOTH, WILLIAM; SALVATION ARMY.

Wallace, Jr., Dewey D.

George Washington University, Washington, D.C.

Articles contributed: AMES, WILLIAM; BAXTER, RICHARD; ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS.

Walls, Andrew

Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies, University of Aberdeen (Scotland)

Articles contributed: AZARIAH, V.S.; CLAPHAM SECT; CROWTHER, SAMUEL; GHANA; HARRIS, WILLIAM WADE; INCULTURATION; JABAVU, DAVIDSON DON TENGO; KILHAM, HANNAH; KOELLE, SIGISMUND W.; LIANG A-FA (LIANG FA; LEANG A-FA); LUTHULI, ALBERT JOHN; MATTHEWS, Z.K.; PILKINGTON, GEORGE LAWRENCE; SCHON, JAMES FREDERICK; SHARP, GRANVILLE; SIERRA LEONE; STUDD, CHARLES THOMAS; TUTU, DESMOND.

Wasmuth, Jennifer

University of Erlangen (Germany)

Articles contributed: RUSSIA.

Waterman, A.M.C.

University of Manitoba, Canada

Articles contributed: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY; PALEY, WILLIAM.

Weaver-Zercher, David L.

Messiah College, Grantham, Pa.

Articles contributed: AMANA; BRETHERN IN CHRIST.

Webb, Stephen H.

Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind.

Articles contributed: EDUCATION, OVERVIEW.

Weber, Timothy

Northern Baptist Theological Seminary, Lombard, Ill.

Articles contributed: CONSERVATIVE BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

Weddle, David L.

Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colo.

Articles contributed: JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Weigelt, Horst

University of Bamberg (Germany)

Articles contributed: LAVATER, JOHANN KASPAR.

Welch, Thomas A.

McGill University, Quebec, Canada

Articles contributed: Du PLESSIS, DAVID JOHANNES.

Wentz, Richard

Arizona State University, Tempe, Ariz.

Articles contributed: MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY; MUHLENBERG, HENRY MELCHIOR.

Wenzke, Annabelle S.

Pennsylvania State University, York

Articles contributed: DWIGHT, TIMOTHY.

Westermeyer, Paul

Luther Seminary, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: SCHUTZ, HEINRICH.

Westmoreland-White, Michael

Louisville, Ky.

Articles contributed: WAR.

White, James F.

Notre Dame University, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: ARCHITECTURE, CHURCH.

Whitford, David M.

Claflin University, Orangeburg, S.C.

Articles contributed: CANTERBURY; CANTERBURY AND YORK, CONVOCATIONS OF; FONTAINEBLEAU, EDICT OF; GALLUS, NIKOLAUS; TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION.

Wickeri, Philip L.

San Francisco Theological Seminary, San Anselmo, Calif.

Articles contributed: CHAO, T.C. (ZHAO ZICHEN); TING, K.H.; WU, Y.T. (WU, YAOZONG).

Wiesner-Hanks, Merry

University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee

Articles contributed: PROSTITUTION; SEXUALITY.

Willaime, Jean-Paul

École pratique des hautes études (France)

Articles contributed: ENLIGHTENMENT; NANTES, EDICT OF; TROELTSCH, ERNST.

Williams, Howell

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: FINLEY, ROBERT; KRUDENER, BARBARA.

Willimon, William H.

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: PREACHING.

Willis, III, Lee L.

Florida State University, Tallahassee, Fla.

Articles contributed: FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON.

Wills, Anne Blue

Davidson College, N.C.

Articles contributed: SMITH, HANNAH WHITALL.

Wilson, James A.

Vorys, Sater, Seymour, and Pease LLP, Columbus, Ohio

Articles contributed: PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Witte, Jr., John

Emory University, Atlanta, Ga.

Articles contributed: DEMOCRACY; POLITICS.

Woodward, Kenneth L.

Newsweek, New York, N.Y.

Articles contributed: SAINTS.

Wosh, Peter J.

New York University, N.Y.

Articles contributed: AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY; AMERICAN BIBLE UNION; BIBLE SOCIETIES; SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE; VOLUNTARY SOCIETIES.

Wriedt, M.

Institut fuer Europaeische Geschichte (Mainz, Germany)

Articles contributed: EDUCATION, THEOLOGY: EUROPE; WORMS, DIET OF;
WORMS, EDICT OF.

Wright, William J.

University of Tennessee, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Articles contributed: PHILIP OF HESSE.

Wyduckel, Dieter

der Technischen Universitat Dresden (Germany)

Articles contributed: ALTHUSIUS, JOHANNES.

Yates, Nigel

University of Wales, Lampeter

Articles contributed: ENGLAND.

Yates, Timothy

Author, lecturer, and parish priest (Derbyshire, England)

Articles contributed: LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER; MIDDLETON, THOMAS FANSHAW; OLDHAM, JOSEPH H.; TAIT, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL.

Yong, Amos

Bethel College, St. Paul, Minn.

Articles contributed: RAPTURE.

Yrigoyen, Jr., Charles

Drew University, Madison, N.J.

Articles contributed: CONFERENCE; METHODISM, NORTH AMERICA; UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

Zachman, Randall C.

University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind.

Articles contributed: CONFESSION.

Zele, Adam

Duke University, Durham, N.C.

Articles contributed: BALTIMORE CONFERENCE; BLACK METHODISTS.

Zepp, Jr., Ira G.

McDaniel College, Westminster, Md.

Articles contributed: CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT; KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR.

Ziegler, Philip G.

Atlantic School of Theology, Nova Scotia, Canada

Articles contributed: AUTHORITY.

Ziolkowski, Eric

Lafayette College, Easton, Pa.

Articles contributed: CULTURAL PROTESTANTISM.

Index

Page numbers in boldface indicate entry titles.

- Abandonment, as grounds for divorce, 603, 605
- Abbot, George, death of, 1071
- Abbott, Francis Ellingwood, formation of Free Religion Association, 52
- ABC Book*, by Agricola, Michael C., 24–25
- Abernathy, Ralph, 1569
 - in SCLC, 453
- Abineno, J.L.Ch., 947
- Abolitionism. see Slavery, abolition of
- Abortion, 1–2
 - definition, 1
 - legalization of, 696
 - Protestant opinion on, 1–2
- Abrahamic covenant, 526
- Absolution, 1416
- Absolutism, 2–3
 - aspects in European history, 2–3
 - Christian churches in Europe and, 3
 - definition and chronology, 2
 - in Norway, 1407
- Accountability, age of, 741
- Accrediting Association of Bible Colleges (AABC), foundation of, 237
- Achebe, Chinua, biblical influence on, 231
- Act of Conformity of 1662 (England), 1580
- Act of Six Articles of 1539 (England), 1599
- Act of Uniformity
 - Book of Common Prayer* and, 275
 - episcopacy and, 209
- Acts and Monuments, 4–5
- Adamites, formation of, 1236
- Adams, Hannah, 5
- Adams, John, 876, 1515
- Addams, Jane, 1366
- Addison, Joseph, 1574
 - impact of, 1103
- Adiaphora, 6, 2060
 - doctrine of, 1194
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1065
- Adiaphorist controversy, 800, 824–825
- Adorantist controversy, 557

- Adoration, prayers of, 2061
- Adultery capital punishment for, 604, 1721
 as grounds for divorce, 603–605, 1721
- Advancement of Learning* (Bacon), 158, 1670
- Advent Christian Church, 6
- Adventist churches
 Latvia, 1070
 Russia, 1630–1631
- Aesthetic Movement, 1545
- Aesthetics, 7–8
 Coleridge on, 477
- Affair of the placards, 329
- Africa, 8–12, 16.
 See also South Africa;
 specific countries
 Attoh Ahuma, Samuel Richard Brew, 127
 Baptist diaspora, 194–195
 Christian and Missionary Alliance in, 397
 Church of God in Christ in, 441
 Dutch Reformed Church in, 625–626
 Free Methodist Church of America in, 770 geographical distribution, 12 house churches in, 890
 just wars in, 512
 Kilham in, 1021–1022
 Kimbangu movement in, 1022
 Kingsley in, 1032
 Koelle in, 1035
 Lutheranism in, 1140–1142
 models of inculturation in, 933–935 nineteenth-century expansion, 9–10
 Pentecostalism in, 1700
 Pilkington in, 1494 polygamy in, 1497
 postcolonialism in, 1526
 Presbyterianism in, 1554
 Protestantism growth in, 1774
 Protestant universities in, 869
 religious affiliation statistics in, 2088
 revivals in, 1610
 slavery in, 1735
 twentieth-century consolidation, 10–12 twentieth-century theology in, 1882
 witchcraze in, 2021
 World Council of Churches in, 2048
- African American hoodoo/voodoo, 1738
- African American Protestantism, 12–16.
 See also Civil Rights Movement
 after Civil War, 461–462
 Church of God in Christ as, 439–442 preaching tradition of, 1538, 1539

- in slave community, 1737–1740
- Social Gospel and, 1755
- in South, 1792–1793
- worship characteristics in, 1737
- African Americans
 - in colleges, 479
 - as Freemasons, 775–776
 - on soteriology, 1646
 - in white denominations, 15
 - womanist theology of, 2026–2029
 - at YMCA/YWCA, 2071–2072
- African American traditions
 - Baptist churches and, 172
 - National Baptist Conventions and, 174
- African Baptist church (Bluestone), 13
- African Independent Churches. see African-Instiuted Churches
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- African Instituted Churches, 11, 16–19, 23–24, 818, 849, 935, 1022, 1526, 1700
 - in Malawi, 1157
- African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, 13, 19–21, 1737, 1968
 - Allen, Richard, first bishop, 27–28
 - and blacks in colleges, 479
 - in Caribbean, 356
 - foundation of, 255, 1210, 1224
 - Martin Delany in, 574
 - role of, 1220
 - women clergy in, 2032–2033
- African Methodist Episcopal Zion (AMEZ) Church, 13, 20, 21–22
 - in Caribbean, 356
 - creation of, 256
 - foundation of, 1210, 1224
 - role of, 1220
 - in United States, 617
- African National Congress (ANC)
 - Luthuli and, 1151
 - Z.K. and, 1184
- African theology, 11, 23–24
 - Amissah, Samuel Hanson, 59–60
 - churches of, 23–24
 - definition, 23
 - Protestantism, 23
 - Reformation and, 23
- Afro-American group of the Protestant Episcopal Church, 541
- Age of Reason, Wesleyanism in, 1992
- Aglow International, 2033
- Agreement of Sandomierz, 1502
- Agricola, Michael
 - Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 - Finnish reformer, 24–25
 - Johann, Luther and, 1600

- Lutheran reforms and, 1130
- Ahlstrom, Sydney, 1575
- Ainsworth, Henry, 912–913, 1616
- Aizan, Yamaji, 973
- Alabama Resolutions*, 171
- Aladura (prayer-people), 11
- a'Lasco, John, debates with Menno, 1200
- Alaska Natives, Jackson's work with, 970
- Alb
 - in late twentieth century, 1963
 - origins of, 1959
 - in Reformation, 1961
 - symbolism of, 1963–1964
- Albania
 - Baptist Union in, 186
 - Methodism in, 1217
- Albright, Jacob, 813
 - Evangelical United Brethren Church and, 708
- Alcohol, Baltimore Conference stand on, 160
- Alcoholics Anonymous
 - foundation of, 1308
 - Twelve Steps of, 1956–19574
- Alexander, Archibald, 1548
- Alighieri, Dante, Divine Comedy, 1099–1100
- Aline, Henry, American evangelist, 29
- All Africa Baptist Fellowship, size of Baptist church in Africa, 190
- Allegemeine Missionszeitschrift*, publication, 1252
- Allegory, Scripture as, 1671–1672
- Allen, A.A., 1464
- Allen, Ethan, on deism, 572
- Allen, Horace N., 1036
- Allen, Richard, 13
 - ACS opponent, 42
 - creation of the AME church, 255–256
 - first bishop, AME, 27–28
 - leader of AME Church, 20
 - problems encountered by, 1224
- Allen, Roland, English missionary, 28–29
- Allen, William, 1439
- Allenites, 13
- Alliance of Reformed Churches, 2044–2045
- Alline, Henry
 - Baptist movement and, 182
 - New Light revival of, 344
- Allred, Rulon, Mormonism and, 1314
- All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists (AUCECB), 25–27, 1630
 - glasnost* and perestroika, 26
 - origins, 25
 - Soviet era, 25–26
- Alphabetical Compendium of the Various Sects*, 5
- Alsted, J.H., 382
- Altar call, 1788

Altars, 29–31

- architecture of, 30–31
- changing significance of, 30–31
- pre-Reformation, 30
- during the Reformation, 30
- significance of, 2059

Alternative medicine, origins of, 639

Alternative Service Book, 277

Althusius, Johannes

- German political theorist, 31–32
- on politics and covenants, 527

Altizer, Thomas, on death of God, 566

Alves, Rubem, 1527

Amana, 32–34

- origins, 33

Amana Church Society, 1490

Ambrose, Edict of, 1345

Amerding, Hudson, Lausanne Covenant and, 1073

America. See United States of America

American and Foreign Bible Society (AFBS), establishment of, 39

American Baptist Association (Landmarkers), 173–174, 197–198

American Baptist Churches (ABC-USA), 34–37, 172, 1568

- background, 34–35
- distinctives, 37
- history, 35–36
- related organizations and denominational data, 36–37
- size of, 192

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

American Baptist Convention.

- see also* American Baptist Churches (ABC-USA)
- organization of, 172

American Baptist Foreign Mission Society (ABFMS), 513

American Baptist Home Mission Society, 35, 1351, 1352

American Baptist Men, ABC-USA, 35

American Baptist Publication and Sunday School Society, 35

American Baptist Publishing Society, 35, 1351, 1352

American Baptist Theological Seminary, 1352

American Baptist Women, ABC-USA, 36

American Bible Society (ABS), 37–39, 819–820, 1547, 1945

- American Bible Union (ABU) and, 39
- Apocrypha affair and, 242
- formation, 239
- history of, 728
- mission work, 243
- support services for Protestant denominations, 38
- work of, 241–242

American Bible Union (ABU), 39–40

- formation of, 242

American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (ABCFM), 40–41, 998, 1360–1361, 1435, 1553

- Anderson, Rufus, 64
 - early missions, 40–41
 - foundation, 1280
 - function of, 1261
 - growth and conflict, 41
- American Christian Missionary Society (ACMS), origins of, 595–596
- American Civil Liberties Union, on teaching Creationism, 532
- American Colonization Society (ACS), 42, 1095, 1554
 - Delany opposition to, 574
 - Finley in, 754
 - Lott Cary in, 359
 - on slavery abolition, 1743
- American Conference of Udenominational Churches, 935
- American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC), 935, 1348
 - formation of, 1190
- American Episcopal Church, permanent deacons in, 564
- American Equal Rights Association, Lucretia Mott and, 1320
- American Evangelical Lutheran Church (ALC), 46
- American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), 42–45, 994, 1446, 1449
 - antiwar activities, 44–45
 - criticism of U.S. foreign and domestic policies, 44
 - organizational change, 43–44
 - origins of, 42–43
- American (Know Nothing) Party, 1364
- American Lutheran Church, 45–47
 - formation, 1135, 1150
- American Missionary Association (AMA), 47–48
 - Amistad trial and, 1732
 - on slavery abolition, 1743
- American National Baptist Convention, 1351
- American Peace Society, 1439
- American Protective Association, 1364
- American Protestant Association, 1363
- American Religious Identification Survey, 2001, 117
- American Revolution
 - denominations and, 582–583, 1943
 - Dutch Reformed Church in, 620
 - Episcopal Church in, 676–677
 - Freemasonry on, 775
 - sectarianism and, 1695
 - secularization and, 1704
 - women during, 2029–2030
- American Society for Colonizing the Free People of Color in the United States. see American Colonization Society
- American Society of Church History (ASCH), 48–49
- American Society of Missiology, foundation, 1253, 1284
- American South, Free Will Baptists in, 772–773
- Americans United for the Separation of Church and State (AU), 53–54
- American Temperance Society, 1852–1853
- American Tract Society, 1968
- American Unitarian Association (AUA), 49–52, 373, 1544
 - challenge from transcendentalism, 51

- foundations, 49–50
- origins of, 1934
- revitalization and consensus, 51–52
- Twentieth Century and Universalist Renaissance, 52
- Unitarian controversy and Unitarian christianity, 50
- Unitarian Universalist Association merger with, 1924
- American War Resisters' League, 1439
- Amerindian peoples, Protestantism and, 1062
- Ames, William, 1492, 1616
 - English Congregationalist and Calvinist, 54–55
- Amice, symbolism of, 1963
- Amish, 55–59, 736–737
 - J. Ammann and, 1197
 - marriage and family, 58
 - in movies, 1321
 - occupations, 58–59
 - Protestant origins and beliefs, 55–56
 - religious beliefs, 56
 - religious services and rituals, 57
 - rules of conduct, 56–57
 - technology, government, and community, 59
 - youth and education, 57–58
- Amisshah, Samuel Hanson, African church leader, 59–60
- Amistad trial, 1732
- Ammann, Jacob, 812
 - Amish and, 1197
 - Anabaptist founder of Amish, 55–56
- Amsdorf, Nickolaus von, 824, 825
 - protestant reformer, 60
- Anabaptism, 60–64, 803, 812, 859
 - agenda, 61–62
 - Amish, 55–56
 - Antitrinitarianism and, 80–85
 - architecture, 89–90
 - on baptism, 164–165
 - Baptists and, 185
 - Bugenhagen's objections to, 314–315
 - Bullinger on, 2084
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - on church and state, 420–421
 - church discipline in, 423
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- clergy in, 458
- communism in, 485
- concept of baptism, 1416, 1596
- concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
- current picture and historical models, 63
- deacons in, 561
- democracy and, 575
- on divorce, 604

- eschatology in, 681, 1692
- on ethics, 690–691
- executions of, 1168–1169
- funerary rites in, 797
- Grebel and, 833–834
- Hapsburg persecution of, 1692
- history until 1600, 60–61
- Hofmann and, 873
- Hubmaier and, 891–894
- Hutterites and, 905–907
- identity and name calling, 63
- Karlstadt and, 1013
- on the Lord's Supper, 1118
- millennialism and, 1237–1239
- modern response, 62–63
- monasticism and, 1301
- in the Netherlands, 1384, 1437
- origins of, 1197–1198
- pacifism in, 510
- pacifism of, 1437, 1512
- Philip of Hesse's policy toward, 1477
- in Poland, 1501
- politics of, 1511–1512
- polygamy in, 1719
- prayer of, 1533
- principles of, 510
- radicalism of, 1692
- relation to the Reformation, 62
- restorationism and, 1608
- Rothman and, 1623–1624
- Schleitheim Confession of, 1437, 1511–1512, 1596
- sectarianism in, 1692
- songs of, 913
- on true church, 418
- Tyrolean, 1692
- Zwingli on, 2082
- Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed* (Butler), 323
- An Anglican-Methodist Covenant*, 2001, Church of England and Methodist Church of GB, 69
- Ancient church
 - on clergy marriage, 470
 - clerical attire and liturgical vestments in, 1959–1960
- Anderson, Benedict, 1356
- Anderson, Perry, 1529
- Anderson, Rufus, 933
 - Church Missionary Society and, 1250
 - Congregational minister and foreign mission official, 64
 - Corresponding Secretary, ABCFM, 41
 - three-self theory, 1261
- Andreae, Jakob
 - Lutheran Concord and, 282
 - Lutheran unity and, 1138
- Andreae, Johann, 1027

- Andreae, Johann Valentin, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Andreae, Laurentius
 Reformation in Sweden, 1130
 Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
- Andrew, James O., abolitionism and, 1224
- Andrewes, Lancelot, 1534, 1537
 English theologian, 64–65
 influence on Laud, 1071
- Andrews, Charles Freer
 English missionary in India, 65 work in India, 1270
- Anfechtung*, 1860
- Angelus Temple, 954
 McPherson and, 1190
- Anglican chant, 65–66
 popularity of, 1326
- Anglican Communion
 as church law, 429
 Church Mission Society in, 430
- Anglicanism, 66–69.
See also Church of England; Episcopal Church entries
 absolutism and, 3
 Allen, Roland, 28–29
 altars in, 30–31
 architecture, 90
 Articles of Religion, 1165
 in Australia, 134–136
 authority in, 66–67
 Azariah, Vedayagam Samuel, bishop, 150
 Book of Common Prayer, 1112
 Broad Church and, 307
 calendar reform and, 875
 on church and state, 420–421
 clergy in, 458
 clerical structure of, 464
 in Colonial America, 1941
 colonialism and, 482
 confirmation in, 501, 503–505
 deism in, 568
 on divorce, 605–606
 in Ecumenical movement, 363
 ecumenism, 69
 Elizabeth I and, 660
 funerary rites in, 797
 Hooker's contributions to, 885
 hymnody of, 916–917
 iconoclasm and, 923
 in Ireland, 958–959
 Keswick Movement and, 1017
 Lambeth Conference and, 1057–1058
 Liberal Catholic strand of, 435

in New Zealand, 1392
 Orthodox Church and, 1426
 Oxford Movement and, 1428–1434
 politics and, 1513
 Protestantism and, 68–69

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

sabbatarianism conflict with, 1635
 sectarianism of, 1692–1693
 Shaker condemnation of, 1726
 sisterhoods in, 1734–1735
 in South Africa, 8
 spirituality of, 67–68
 statistics on, 1810 theology, Andrewes, Lancelot, 64–65 tradition in, 1908
 in United States, 676
 on vestments, 1962
 view of justification, 1004
 views on predestination, 1544
 on visible and mystical church, 418
 worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092

Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC), 69, 589

Anglican Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, creation of, 1264

Anglo-Catholicism, 69–73

Allen, Roland, 28–29

British foreign missions and, 1263

divorce in, 606

history of, 677–678

origin, 70

ritualism and culture, 70–71

social reform and, 71

spread around the globe, 71–72 survival, 72

twentieth century, 72–73

in twentieth century Britain, 1876

Anglophone Canada, 345

Angola, Lutheranism in, 1142

Anhalt-Köthen, Ludwig Fürst von, writings, 1107

Animal magnetism, in Christian Science, 406–407, 639

Anima Mundi (Blount), 263

Annihilationalism, 6

Annual Baptist Register, 809

Annulment of marriage, 602

Antebellum period, denominations in, 583

Antebellum sectarianism, 1696

Antebellum societies, voluntary, 1967–1968

Anthony, Susan B., 1498

Anti-Apartheid Movement, 895

Anti-Catholicism, AU and, 53

Antichrist, 73

- Apocalypticism and, 86
 - belief in late twentieth-century American Protestantism, 76
 - belief in Protestantism, 74–75
 - in eschatology, 681–682
 - origins of belief, 73–74
 - popes as, 382, 762, 2082
- Antinomianism, 77–78, 874, 888, 899, 905, 1581, 1721, 1847
 - dispensationalism as, 597
 - millennialism and, 1238–1239
- Anti-Saloon League, 1855
- Anti-Semitism, 78–79, 996–997, 1816
 - in Holocaust, 879–881
 - of Ku Klux Klan, 1043
 - of Luther, 1482
 - millennialism and, 1241
 - nationalism and, 1358
 - nativism and, 1365
 - in Nazi Germany, 1483
- Anti-Slavery Societies, 1743
- Antitrinitarianism, 80–85
 - Apennine Peninsula and Switzerland, 80–81
 - neology and, 1377–1378
 - Newton and, 1396
 - in Poland, 1502
 - post-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 81–83
 - Rhineland Palatinate, 84
 - Servetus and, 1597
 - in sixteenth-century Hungary, 902
 - in Transylvania, 1617
 - Transylvania and Hungary and, 83–84
- Antwerp Bible*, publication of, 247
- Apartheid, 1527
 - chosen people and, 525
 - Huddleston and, 895, 1527
 - just war against, 512
 - Naudé and, 1372
 - predestination and, 1544
- Apennine Peninsula and Switzerland, Antitrinitarianism and, 80–81
- Apess, William, 1361
- Apocalypse, Swedenborg on, 1834
- Apocalypticism, 85–88
 - Anabaptism and, 61
 - in Christadelphians, 393–394
 - in the contemporary age, 87–88
 - date setting in, 1696
 - dispensationalism in, 597
 - England and America, 85–86
 - Millennialism and, 1234, 1235–1236
 - Modernism and, 1293
 - Premillennial dispensationalism, 86–87
 - Reformation era, 85
- Apocrypha, Bible society disagreements over, 727

- Apocrypha affair, 242
 Apocryphal books, 1415
 Apostles, original, 463
 Apostolic era
 congregationalism in, 507
 deacons in, 559–560
Apostolic Faith, 1459, 1460, 1461, 1463
 Apostolicity of church, 417–418
 Apostolic Lutheran Church, Laestadius' influence on, 1047
 Appasamy, Aiyadurai Jesudasen, 938, 941–942
 Appenzeller, Henry G., 1036
 Aquinas, Thomas, 1366
 on salvation, 1645
 on transubstantiation, 1910
 Archbishop of Canterbury, Anglicanism, 66
 Architecture, Church, 88–92, 2059–2060, 2063–2064
 Arens, Edmund, 1509
Areopagitica (Milton), 1101 doctrinal uncertainty and, 1245

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Argentina
 Lutheranism and, 1143
 Protestantism in, 1061
 Arians, Christology of, 1924–1925
 Ariès, Philippe, on childhood, 379
 Aristotelian science, 1671
 Arminianism, 92–101, 828, 872, 1385, 1550.
 See also Wesleyanism
 AUA philosophy and, 49–50
 contemporary, 99–100
 definition, 100–101
 Dutch Reformed Church and, 622–623 early, 97–98
 in English Civil Wars, 456
 Hooker and, 885
 Hopkins' rejection of, 888
 human rights and, 899
 Latitudinarianism and, 1064
 Laud and, 1071
 nineteenth century, 99
 orthodoxy and, 1423–1424
 outside The Netherlands, 98–99
 Presbyterianism and, 1544
 Remonstrants for, 1604
 Arminius, Jacobus, 1385, 1423–1424, 1604
 doctrine of election and predestination, 92–101 on double predestination, 657
 Dutch reformed theologian, 101–102
 on faith, 734
 Gomar's disputes with, 828

- theology, 95–97
 - views on predestination, 1543
- Armstrong, Annie, missionary activities, 173
- Armstrong, Karen, 1575
- Arndt, Johann, 1486, 1534
 - Lutheran divine and author, 102–103
- Arndt, Johann, Lutheranism and, 1138–1139
- Arnim, Achim von, poetry, 1109
- Arnold, Eberhard, German church reformer, 103
- Arnold, Gottfried, 1489–1490
- Arnold, Matthew
 - biblical influence on, 232
 - writings, 1103
- Arnold, Thomas, 1432
 - English educator, 103–104
- Art, 104–110
 - alternative imagination, 109–110
 - iconography, 926–927
 - language of theological disclosures, 107–108
 - painting by faith alone, 108–109
 - protest in protestantism, 109
- Arthur, William, 1459
- Articles of Religion, marriage and, 1165
- Artificial insemination, ethics of, 697
- Art of the Fugue* (Bach), 156
- Asambleas de Dios*, in Mexico, 1232
- Asbury, Francis, 452, 965–966
 - on camp meetings, 785
 - conferences and, 1227
 - Hosier and, 255
 - lay leadership and, 1051
 - Methodist bishop, 110–112
 - Methodist work by, 1223
- Asceticism, 112–113, 943
 - Calvin on, 632
 - Calvin's theory of art, 106
 - origins and definitions, 112–113
 - Protestant, 113
 - Reformation debate, 113
 - sports versus, 1803
 - worldly, 1689
- Ashmun, Jehudi, Lott Cary work with, 359
- Ashram Movement, 938
- Asia.
 - See also* specific countries
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
 - models of inculturation in, 934, 935
 - Protestant universities in, 868
 - religious affiliation statistics in, 2088
 - theology education in, 1865–1868
- Asian-American Protestantism, 117–120
 - contemporary issues, 120

- first wave, 118–119
- history of immigration, 118
- second wave, 119–120
- Asians, in World's Parliament of Religions, 2054
- Asian theology, 114–117
- Aslakssen, Cort, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Asmussen, Hans, Barmen Declaration and, 199, 1140
- Assemblies of God (AG), 15, 120–124, 1457, 1464
 - in Brazil, 295, 296
 - divorce in, 606
 - doctrine, 121–122
 - educational institutions, 122
 - formation of, 121
 - identification with Evangelicals, 123
 - in Italy, 964
 - in Latin America, 1062
 - missions, 122
 - organizational development, 122
 - origins, 120–121
 - in South Africa, 10
 - women in ministry, 122–123
- Assemblies of God Foreign Missions, size, 1286
- Association of International Mission Services, foundation, 1257
- Association of Women in Theology, 1868
- Assurance, Christian, in Wesleyanism, 1995
- Astruc, Jean, 866
- Athanasius, 1542
- ATLA Religion Database*, 1470
- Atonement, 124–127
 - British debates on, 1877–1878
 - in Canons of Dort, 614
 - General Baptist understanding of, 188
 - liberalism and beyond, 126
 - orthodoxy and its aftermath, 125–126
 - twentieth century, 126–127
- Attoh Ahuma, Samuel Richard Brew, African reformer, 127
- Atwood, Margaret, Handmaid's Tale, 229
- Audiovisual ministry, 720–721
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Augsburg, Diet of, 1596, 1597
- Augsburg Confession, 128–131, 800, 850, 859, 902, 1426, 1427, 1477, 1502, 1535, 1562, 1596, 1600, 2057
 - (Confessio Augustana), content of, 279–280
 - contents of, 495, 706
 - in Danish Lutheran church, 577
 - doctrinal authority of, 608–609
 - on justification, 610
 - reactions to, 496
 - rejection by Charles V, 1138
 - on role of call, 611

- Augsburg Confession, Apology of the, 131
 Augsburg Interim, 799–800, 824, 131132 purposes of, 1138
Augustana, 128–130
 Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church, 132
 Augustana Synod. see Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church
 Augustine, 1366, 1542
 City of God, 382
 on conversion, 518–519
 on demonology, 2016
 on election, 654–655
 on ethics, 687–688
 on original sin, 741
 on salvation, 1644–1645 on sex and celibacy, 368
 on sin, 1733
 Augustine of Hippo, 1026
 Aulén, Gustaf, Lutheran revival and, 1147, 1378, 1381
 Au Sable Institute, 1372
Australasian Religion Index, 1470
 Australia, 132–136
 colonial religion, 133–134
 industrialization in, 951
 Lutheran Church in, 1135, 1143
 Presbyterianism in, 1554
 twentieth-century Protestantism, 134–136
 Uniting Church in, 1949–1952, 2058
 Austria, Methodism in, 1217 Authority, 136–139
 in African-instituted churches, 17
 in Anglicanism, 66–67
 challenge to, modern thought, 137–138
 Reformation era, 136–137
 Awakenings, 139–150
 American colonial women in, 2030 antebellum societies and, 1967–1968
 art and, 107
 Baptist membership and, 193 camp meetings and, 340
 in Colonial America, 1943
 democracy and, 575–576
 denominations and, 581–582
 Dutch Reformed Church Americanization in, 619 electronic church and, 1849
 Episcopal Church in, 677
 evangelistic associations with, 727–728
 First, 558, 581
 interpretive issues, 147–150
 John Wesley and, 1227
 ministerial education in, 650
 North American Unitarianism and, 1928
 Second, 357, 1695

- sectarianism in, 1694–1695
- slave conversions and, 1736–1737
- slavery and, 1725
- Social Gospel and, 1752
- in Sweden, 1831
- voluntary societies and, 1831
- Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk*, 1363
- Azariah, Vedayagam Samuel, 938
 - Indian church leader, 150
 - ordination, 1271
 - Telugus conversion and, 1180
- Azusa Street Revival, 15, 150–151, 439–441, 451, 955, 964, 1452, 1453, 1454, 1457, 1460, 1610, 1793
 - impact on Mexico, 1232
 - rise of, 1284

- Babel, 516–517
- Babylonian Captivity of the Church* (Luther), on baptism, 161
- Bach, Anna Magdalena, J.S. Bach and, 155
- Bach, Johann Sebastian, 153–157
 - Saint Matthew Passion by, 721
- Backus, Isaac, 157–158
 - on Baptist contributions, 171
 - First Amendment rights and, 182
 - ministry, 193
- Bacon, Francis, 158
 - empiricism of, 663
 - on Reformation, 1670
 - views on nature, 1369
- Baëta, Christian Goncalves Kwame, 158–159
- Baier, Johann Wilhelm, writings, 1132
- Bailey, Alice, 1389
- Baillie, Donald, 1379
- Baillie, John, 159, 1379, 1534
- Baillie, Robert, 996
- Baird, Charles W., 1549
- Baker, Frank, on connectionalism, 1229
- Baker, Moses, Baptist work, 177
- Baker, Sir Henry W., 917
- Bakker, Jim, 1465
 - Praise the Lord and, 1177
 - scandals, 1177
 - and Tammy Faye, 1699, 1850
- Bakker, Tammy Faye, 1465
 - scandals, 1177
- Baldaeus, Philip, 937
- Bale, John, martyrology, 1171
- Ballagh, James, 972
- Baltic republics, Baptist Union in, 186
- Baltimore Conference, 159–161, 474
 - Methodism in America and, 1210

Methodist Episcopal Church foundation at, 487
 Baltimore sermon, 1928
 Banda, Hastings Kamuzu, presidency of Malawi, 1156
 Banerjea, Krishna Mohan, 934, 940

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Banerjee, Kali Charan, 1405
 Bangert, Mark P., Laudamus supplement and, 1336 Baptism, 161–168, 1415–1416
 in Africa, 18
 African slaves, 12
 Anabaptism and, 1198
 believer's, 1751
 Bullinger on, 2084
 in Calvinism, 337
 in catechisms, 360
 Catholic, ecclesial reality of, 365 of Christadelphians, 393
 Church of the Brethren and, 301
 confirmation link with, 506 with the Holy Spirit, 1459–1460 immersion, 427
 of infants (See Infant baptism) of Jehovah's Witnesses, 981
 polity and, 1520
 rebaptism as, 429
 in Schleithem Confession, 1661
 Second Diet of Speyer, 1197
 Stone-Campbell Movement and, 594–595 unity of church in, 417
 vocation and, 1965–1966
Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, 588, 636
Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (BEM), episcopacy and, 254 Baptist Bible Fellowship, 180
 foundation, 197
 size of, 192
 Baptist Bible Union, 168–169, 793, 804
 formation, 172
Baptist Bulletin, 804
 Baptist convention, schism in, 1699
 Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, 175
 Baptistery, size and location of, 2059
 Baptist Evangelical Church of Grande Ligne, merger, 174
Baptist Faith and Message (BFM), 173
 Baptist Family of Churches, 169–176
 Baptist Foreign Mission convention, foundation, 1254
 Baptist General Conference, 176
 Baptist General Tract Society, 35
 Baptist Historical Society, 35
 Baptist Missionary Association of America, size, 174
 Baptist Missionary Society, 9

- organization of, 1260
- Baptist Missions, 176–181
- Baptist Peace Fellowship of North America, 1449
- Baptists, 181–184.
 - See also* Conservative Baptist Association;
 - Southern Baptist Convention
 - in Africa, 10
 - African American churches and denominations, 13–14
 - American (see American Baptist Churches (ABC-USA))
 - in Brazil, 1061
 - in Caribbean, 356
 - on church and state, 422
 - Civil Rights Movement and, 455
 - in Colonial America, 1941
 - in Denmark, 580
 - in Estonia, 686
 - Free Will, 806
 - as gathered church, 417
 - General, 770–771, 805–807
 - in Latvia, 1070
 - major branches, 185
 - ministerial education in, 651
 - on morality of slavery, 1739
 - Particular, 770–771
 - Primitive, 1354–1356, 1565–1566
 - in Russia, 1630
 - Seventh-Day, 1634
 - on slavery, 1697, 1946
 - in South Africa, 1780
 - in Sweden, 1831–1832
 - on vestments, 1962
 - Williams and, 2013
 - women clergy in, 469
- Baptists, Europe, 184–188
- Baptists, Global, 188–191
- Baptists, United States, 191–198
 - music of, 1327
- Baptists Around the World: A Comprehensive Handbook* (Wardin), 175, 190
- Baptist Teacher*, 1349, 1351
- Baptist Way-Book* (Bogard), 173
- Baptist World Alliance, 175, 198
 - roots, 185
 - size of, 188
- Barbour, Nelson H., 978, 1626
- Barclay, Robert
 - on faith, 781
 - Quaker beliefs of, 781–782
 - on sanctification, 782
- Barmen Declaration, 199–201, 1380, 1549, 1552
 - on church and politics, 421, 1904
 - on German Christian support of Nazis, 497, 611
 - Nazism and, 1140

- on unity of church in Christ, 699
- Barna, George, 1575
- Barnes, Robert, 201–202
- Baro, Peter, 1471
- Barratt, Thomas Ball, 1455
- Barrow, David, on slaveholding, 196
- Barth, Heinrich, 202
- Barth, Karl, 202–205, 831, 878, 891, 1021, 1029, 1041, 1042, 1044, 1371, 1388, 1397, 1441, 1549
 - on baptism, 165
 - Barmen Declaration and, 199, 1140
 - on biblical inspiration, 224
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - christology of, 414–415, 657
 - on church and state, 421
 - on covenant, 525
 - on conversion, 519–520
 - on Cultural Protestantism, 542–543
 - on death of God, 566
 - dialectical theology of, 1883–1884
 - ecclesiology of, 628, 630
 - on ecology, 631
 - Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046; Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 - on education, 645
 - on election, 657–658
 - on epistle to Romans, 1880
 - on eschatology, 683
 - on ethics, 687, 692
 - on evil, 587
 - on faith, 734
 - Liberal Protestantism and, 1086
 - on missions, 1250–1251
 - on natural theology, 1892
 - Nazi regime and, 488, 490
 - Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1378–1381
 - on otherness of God, 1873
 - on Overbeck, 1428
 - recovery of narrative and, 1293
 - on salvation, 1646
 - on Schleiermacher, 1657
 - on Scripture as Word of God, 337
 - on sin, 1734
 - on Social Gospel, 1756
 - theology of, 1139
 - view of justification, 1006–1007
 - views on natural law, 1368
 - views on predestination, 1544
- Base Communities, in Latin America, 1060
- Basel Mission, 205–206, 818, 1422, 1603–1604, 1609, 1839–1840
 - foundation of, 1261
 - missionary institute and, 1274

- Basketball, origins at YMCA, 2071
- Batak Protestant Christian Church of Indonesia, 206–207, 947
- Batenburg, Jan, Menno and, 1201
- Batory, Stephan (King of Latvia), Livonian Order and, 1068
- Baudrillard, Jean, on media and communications, 1179
- Bauer, Bruno, 854
- Bauer, Ferdinand Christian, 994, 1029
- Baumgarten, Alexander, 7
- Baumgarten, Otto, 207–208
- Baumgarten, Siegmund Jakob, 208, 837, 838
- Baur, Christian, on historical origins of Christianity, 790–791
- Baur, Ferdinand Christian, 208–209, 1373, 1612
- Bavinck, H., 1387
- Baxter, Richard, 209–210
 role of the laity and, 1051
- Bayle, Pierre, 210, 1386
 on Enlightenment, 672
- Bayly, Albert, 918
- Bayly, Lewis, 915
 Practice of Piety, 1340
- Bay Psalm Book*
 impact of, 1102
 publication, 1342
 simplicity of, 1327
- Beaton, David Cardinal, 1033
- Bebbington, David, 1016–1017
- Beck, Johan Vilhelm
 Church Home Mission Society and, 1145
 Pietism in Denmark, 1133
- Becket, Thomas
 in church and state conflict, 347–348
 death of, 430
- Becon, Thomas, models of marriage, 1162
- Beecher, Henry Ward, 210–212, 916, 951, 1483
- Beecher, Lyman, 212–213, 1363, 1548, 1852
- Beissel, Conrad, 812
 the Brethren and, 302
- Beissell, Conrad, compositions by, 1328
- Bekenneide Kirche. See Confessing Church
- Bekker, B., 1386
- Belgian Congo, Mennonite missionaries to, 1204
- Belgic Confession of 1561, 213, 334, 496, 1384, 1423, 1550, 1601
- Believers. See Shakers
- Believer's baptism, 1751
- Bell, George, 1421
- Bell, George Kennedy Allen, 213–214
- Bell, Joh, Wild Goose Resource Group and, 1337
- Bellah, Robert, 943, 1574–1575
- Bellamy, Edward, 1592
- Bellamy, Joseph, 888
- Bellows, Henry W., unified Unitarianism, 51–52
- Bender, Carl, missionary work, 178

- Bender, Harold S., Anabaptism Vision, 62
- Bengel, Johann Albrecht, 214, 814, 1490, 1628
 Pietism and, 1133, 1139
- Benn, Gottfried, writings, 1111
- Bennett, John Coleman, 214–215, 1381
- Benson, Louis, 1549
- Bentham, Jeremy, 215
- Bentley, Richard, 215–216
- Beretta, Giuseppe, 963–964
- Berggrav, Eivind, 216, 1411
 opposition to Nazism, 1146
- Bergson, Henri, 1388, 1567
- Berkeley, George, 216–217
- Berkhoff, Hendrikus, 217–218
- Berkouwer, G.C., 1388
- Berlin Conference, 9
- Berlin Society
 in China, 1275
 foundation of, 1261
- Berlin Woman's Missionary Society for China, 1276
- Bermondsey settlement, social mission, 1214
- Bernoulli, C.A., 1428
- Best-Sellers in America, Religious, 218–221
- Bethel Bible School, start of, 236
- Bethel Seminary, formation, 176
- Bethel Ship Mission, 1216
- Beza, Theodore, 221–222, 911, 1423, 1578, 1598
 Arminianism and, 93, 101
 Bible publication by, 247 at Colloquy of Poissy, 1500
 on discipline, 2085
 on divorce, 604
 views on Judaism, 995
 views on predestination, 1543
- Bhangis, conversion of, 1180
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Bible.
See also specific translations in African-instituted churches, 16 authority of, 1861
 Battle for, 197–198 in Braille, 722
 on children, 379
 on clergy marriage, 469–470 conversion in, 517–518 covenants in, 523, 526 criticism, 225–227
 Darwinism and, 554–555
 dispensationalism and, 597
 distribution by Gideons, 819–820

- on ecology, 631
- higher criticism of, 1819
- inductive method of study, 236
- inerrancy of, 337, 1790
- infallibility, 224–225
- inspiration, 224–225
- interpretation of, 473
- interpretation, 225–227
- Kingdom of God in, 1025–1026
- literal interpretation of, 531–532, 586
- Reina y Valera* version, 1230
- sales statistics, 218
- in sign language, 722
- as sole source of doctrine, 607–608
- translation into Latvian, 1068
- translations by Agricola, Michael C., 24–25
- verbal inspiration of, 328
- as Word of God, 1415
- Bible, King James Version, 239
 - Elizabeth I and, 276
 - impact of, 223, 228
- Bible, New International Version, support for, 243
- Bible and Literature, 227–232
- Bible Belt. See Southern Protestantism
- Bible Camps and Conference Centers, 232–234
- Bible colleges and institutes, 234–238
 - Assemblies of God (AG), 122
 - dispensationalism in, 600
 - evangelicalism and, 710, 729
- Bible Conferences, 238–239
- Bible Institute of Los Angeles (Biola), interdenominational views, 236
- Bible Presbyterian Church, formation of, 1189
- Bible Societies, 239–246, 727
 - American Bible Society (ABS), 37
 - American Bible Union (ABU), 39–40
 - Bible translations and, 249
 - in Latin America, 1061
- Bible Students movement, 1626–1627
- Bible translations, 222–224, 246–250, 723–724
 - at Cambridge, 1230
 - by Coverdale, 1598
 - cultural equivalents in, 545
 - Danish, 577
 - by Goodspeed, 829
 - by Judson, 998
 - by Kilham, 1021
 - by Luther, 815
 - by Martin Luther, 1918
 - Masoretic markings in, 351
 - by Miles Coverdale, 527
 - publishing and, 1573

- by Sebastian Castelleo, 359
- Statenbijbel* as, 622
- by Tyndale, 1598
- by William Carey, 352
- by William Tyndale, 1918
- by Wycliffe organization, 2066–2067
- Yoruba, 540
- into Yoruba, 1261
- Bible translations, ABU, 39–40
- Biblical inerrancy, 250–251
 - dispensationalism on, 597
 - in evangelical theology, 711, 713
- Biblical law, abortions, 1
- Biddle, John, on Trinity, 1927
- Biedermier Period, in German literature, 1110
- Biel, Gabriel, influence on Luther, 1119
- Biestkens Bible*, first printing of, 247
- Billings, William, compositions by, 1327
- Bill of Rights, 1547
 - in America, 1944
 - American Constitution, 251–252
 - AU and, 53–54
 - Free Church and, 768
 - freedom of religion and, 196
- Bill of Rights and Toleration Act of 1689 (England), 1513
- Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, 832
 - missions supported by, 1285
- Bingen, Hildegard of*, monasticism and, 1299
- Biomedical technology, ethics in, 695–696
- Birck, Sixtus, plays of, 1106
- Bishop and Episcopacy, 252–255
- Bishops' Wars in Scotland, 457
- Bitzius, Albert. see Gotthelf, Jeremias
- Black Awareness: A Theology of Hope* (Jones), 259
- Black churches, 12–13
- Black Messiah* (Cleage), 258, 259
- Black Methodists, 255–258
- Black Methodists for Church Renewal, 1939
- Black power, 455
 - Cone on, 486–487
 - Crummell on, 541
 - movement, 1354
- Black Religion and Black Radicalism* (Wilmore), 258, 259
- Blackstone, William, 1484
- Black theology, 258–260, 1885
 - Allen, Richard, 27–28
 - womanist theology and, 2026–2029
- Black Theology and Black Power* (Cone), 258, 259
- Black YMCA, 2071–2072
- Blair, Hugh, 1685
- Blair, James, 260–261
- Blake, Eugene Carson, 261, 1354, 1549, 1556

in Consultation on Church Union, 637

Blake, William, 261–262, 1620, 1621 on Wordsworth, 2041–2042

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna, 1389

Bliss, Philip Paul, 262–263

Bloch, Ernst, 1031

Blomfield, Charles, 263

Blond, Phillip, 1530

Blood of the Lamb (De Vries), 588

Blood transfusion, 736 prohibition by Jehovah's Witnesses, 981

Bloom, Harold, 1575

biblical influence on, 231

Bloody Tenant of Persecution, for Cause of Conscience (Williams), 2013

Blount, Charles, 263–264

on deism, 570

Blow, John, compositions by, 1332

Blue laws, 345

Blumhardt, Christoph Friedrich, 264, 1044

Basel Mission and, 205

influence on Karl Barth, 203

missionary institute and, 1274

Blyden, Edward Wilmot, black nationalism and, 1095

Boardman, George Dana, 998

missionary work, 179

Boardman, Mary, 1016

Boardman, Richard, 966

Boardman, Sarah Hall, 998

Boardman, William, 870, 877, 1016

Bob Jones University, 404

Bobrowski, Johannes, writings, 1111

Bodelschwingh, Friedrich Christian Carl, 264–266

Bodenstein von Karlstadt, abolishment of art in religion, 105

Bodmer, Johann Jakob, writings, 1108

Boehm, John Philip, 812

Boehm, Martin, 813

influence among Mennonites, 300

Boehme, Jakob (also Boehm, Böhm, Behme, Behmen), 266–267

influence on Leade, 1075

Boekbinder, Gerard, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199

Boer, Harry R., 1543

Boesak, Alan Aubrey, 267–269, 1527

Boff, Leonardo, 990, 1031

Bogard, Ben M., American Baptist Convention and, 173

Bohemian Brethren, 908

Comenius in, 483–484

Böhme, Jakob, 1621

Bohse, August, writings, 1107

Bolsec, Jerome, 1597

- Bombay Native Christian Church, 1405
- Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 269–273, 881, 1368
 christology of, 415
 on death of God, 565–566
 on ethics, 692
 execution of, 1140, 1170
 on faith, 735
 on Nazi regime, 1904
 Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1379, 1381 process theology and, 1293 on reality of God, 1873
 religionless Christianity of, 1881
 as saint, 1642
- Bonino, José Míguez, 1527
 liberation theology and, 1091
- Bonino, Miguez, 990
- Bonn Agreement, 589
- Book of Acts, Stephen martyrdom in, 1640
- Book of Common Prayer*, 273–278, 335, 432, 875, 917, 1513, 1532–1533, 1578, 1584
 Anglican chant, 65–66
 Anglican spirituality, 67–68
 baptismal rite, 163–164
 Calvinism in, 668
 Cambridge Platonists acceptance of, 339
 confirmation in, 501, 504–505
 Cranmer, 273, 1113
 funerary rites in, 797
 John Bunyan's views on, 320
 liturgy, 1112
 Oliver Cromwell on, 536
- Book of Common Worship*, liturgy, 1112
- Book of Concord*, 278–283, 334, 825, 1407, 1423
 German Lutheranism and, 1131
 Lutheranism defined in, 498, 1662
- Book of Martyrs*.
see also Acts and Monuments
- Foxe, 762–763
- Book of Mormon*, 1313
 Mormonism and, 1314–1315
 Smith, 1697, 1747–1748 translations, 250
- Books
 American religious best-sellers, 218–221
 Bible and Literature, 227–232
- Booth, Catherine, 283–285
- Booth, Joseph, 285
- Booth, L. Venchael, 1569
- Booth, William, 285–288, 1610
 Methodism and, 1214
- Booth, William and Catherine, Salvation Army founding by, 1646–1648
- Borg, Marcus, 990
- Borgeois family, 740–742

- Born again, speaking in tongues and, 1900
- Bornkamm, Gunter, 989
- Bosch, David Jacobus, 288–289
 LCWE and, 1073–1074
- Bosnia, Baptist Union in, 186
- Boswell, James, 900, 993
- Bote, Herman, writings, 1105
- Boucher, Jonathan, 289
- Boudinot, Elias, 289–290, 1547
- Bourne, Hugh, 290, 1566
- Bouwens, Leenaert, Menno and, 1201
- Boxer Rebellion, 1846
- Boxer Uprising, 387
- Boyd, R.H. (Rev.), 174, 1349–1352
- Boyd Convention, 1350
- Boyesen, H.H., 1364
- Boyle, Robert, 291
 views on nature, 1369, 1371
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Boyle Lectures, purpose of, 215
- Boy Scouts, founding principles of, 1724
- Brabourne, Theophilus, on sabbatarianism, 1635
- Bradbury, William, 916, 918
 on music, 1328
- Bradford, William, 1492, 1616
- Bradstreet, Anne, 291
 poetry of, 1102
- Brady, Nicholas, 913–914
New Version of the Psalms, 1327
- Braght, Tieleman Jansz Van, 292
- Braide, Garrick, 1401
- Braille, Bible in, 722
- Brainerd, David, 292–293
 missionary work of, 1280
- Bramhall, John, 872
- Branch Davidians, 293–294, 1699
- Brandenburg, Christian Ludwig of, J.S. Bach and, 155
- Brandt, Gerard, 1605
- Branham, William, 1613
- Brant, Sebastian, rhymes of, 1106
- Braught, Tileman Janszoon van, martyrology, 1172
- Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel, Heinrich Julius von, plays of, 1106
- Bray, Thomas, 294, 1942
- Brazil, 294–298
 antislavery movement in, 1741
 Bible society work in, 243
 Lutheran Church in, 1135, 1143
 Mennonites in, 1202
 Methodism in, 1222
 Presbyterianism in, 1554–1555

- Protestantism in, 1060, 1061
- Brecht, Bertolt, writings, 1111
- Breeches Bible, 298.
see also Geneva Bible
- Breit, Thomas, Barmen Declaration and, 1140
- Breitinger, Johann Jakob, writings, 1108
- Bremen Society
 in New Zealand, 1275
 in South Africa, 1274
- Brent, Charles Henry, 298–299
- Brenz, Johannes, 299, 814
 Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 ecclesiastical ordinances of, 627
- Brès, Guy de, Belgic Confession and, 213
- Brethren, Church of the, 301–304
 pacifism of, 510
- Brethren Assemblies, size, 1286
- Brethren in Christ, 299–301, 812
- Brethren Movement, in Latvia, 1069
- Brethren Peace Fellowship, 1449
- Brethren Revival Fellowship, goals of, 304
- Brewster, Percy S., 1455
- Brewster, William, 1492, 1616
- Brief Outline on the Study of Theology* (Schleiermacher), 1659
- Briessman, Johan, Latvian Lutheranism and, 1068
- Briet, Thomas, Barmen Declaration and, 199
- Briggs, Charles, 1549
- Briggs, Charles Augustus, 866
 on biblical inspiration, 224
- Bright, Timothy, 5
- Brightman, Thomas, 1028
- Brinkman, George C., 1453
- British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS), 304–306, 727, 963, 1414
 Apocrypha affair and, 242
 formation, 239
 foundation, 1256
 mission work, 243
 modern trends, 245
 work in Wales, 241
- British Broadcasting Corporation, religious broadcasting, 1177
- British Council of Churches, 306, 1404, 1552
- British Honduras, Bible society work in, 243
- British Missionary Society, foundation, 189
- British Network of Christian Peace Organizations, 1449
- Britten, Edward Benjamin, 306–307
- Britto, John de, in India, 1179–1180
- Broad Church, 307, 1032
 history of, 678
- Broadman Bible Commentary* (Davies), 197
- Brochmand, Jesper Rasmus, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Brockes, Barthold Hinrich, writings, 1108
- Brook, John P., 878

- Brookes, James H., bible conferences and, 238
- Brooks, Phillips, 307–308, 1589, 1611
- Brooks, William H., 1351
- Brotherhood of the Kingdom, 1592
- Brotherly Agreement, 864
- Brown, Ford Madox, 1545
- Brown, R.S., 972
- Brown, William, the AMEZ Church, 21–22
- Browne, Robert, 308
- Browning, Don, critical familism and, 1165
- Browning, Robert, 308–309, 1403
- Brownlee, William C., 1363
- Brownson, Orestes Augustus, 309
- Brown University, history of, 651
- Bruderhof (Society of Brothers), 1764
- Brully (Bruly), Pierre, 333, 1384
- Brunn, Nicolaus von, Basel Mission and, 205
- Brunner, Emil, 309–311, 831, 1029, 1041, 1042, 1549
 - Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1378, 1381
 - on Schleiermacher, 1657
 - theology of, 1880
 - views on natural law, 1368
- Bryan, Andrew, 13
 - ministry, 194
- Bryan, William Jennings, 311–312, 1549
- Bucer, Martin, 312–313, 808, 814, 910, 1477, 1500, 1533, 1578, 1597, 1602
 - on baptism, 163
 - on church discipline, 423–424
 - Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 - concept of justification, 1004
 - concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 - on confirmation, 501, 504

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

 - on divorce, 604
 - episcopacy and, 254
 - preaching by, 1536
 - views on polygamy, 1495
- Buchanan, Claudius, 938
- Buchman, Frank, Moral Rearmament and, 1307
- Büchner, Georg, writings, 1110
- Buck, Pearl S., 1555
- Buckle, H.T., 1681, 1685
- Buddeus, Johann Franz, Lutheranism and, 1133
- Buddhism, in movies, 1321
- Bugenhagen, Johannes, 314, 814, 1472, 1599, 1623
 - ecclesiastical ordinances of, 627
 - power of princes and, 1137
 - Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
- Bulgaria
 - Baptist Union in, 187

- Methodism in, 1217, 1219
- Bulkeley, Peter, 229
- Bullinger, Heinrich, 314–316, 856–857, 910, 1383, 1578, 1597
 concept of justification, 1004
 on covenant, 523, 526
 on the Lord' s Supper, 1118
 on Marian devotions, 1173
 preaching by, 1536
 in Swiss Reformation, 1838
 views on predestination, 1543
 Zwinglianism leadership by, 2083–2085
- Bultmann, Rudolf, 986, 989, 1012, 1021, 1029, 1030, 1378, 1388, 1441
 christology of, 415
 theology of, 1873
- Bultmann, Rudolf Karl, 316–319
- Bunting, Jabez, mission work of, 1213
- Bunyan, John, 319–321, 928, 1036, 1493, 1534, 1574, 1580, 1620, 1911
 Bible translation, 228
 on healing, 736 incarceration of, 1053
Pilgrim's Progress, 1102
 on sin, 779–780
- Burch, Robert, creation of the AME church and, 256
- Burchell, Thomas, Baptist work, 177
- Bürger, Gottfried August
 Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
 writings, 1110
- Burial Traditions. see Funerary Rites
- Burlamacchi, Fabrizio, 962
- Burma, Baptist missions to, 179
- Burned-Over District, 321–322
- Burne-Jones, Edward, 1546
- Burnet, Gilbert, Latitudinarianism and, 1064, 1065
- Burpee, Laleah, missionary activities, 174
- Burpee, Richard E., missionary activities, 174
- Burritt, Elihu, 1439
- Burroughs, Nannie Helen, 1351
- Bursche, Juliusz, 1504, 1505
- Bush-meeting Dutch, 813
- Bushnell, Horace, 322, 1459, 1592
 on childhood nurturing, 380
 on education, 648
 on sports and Protestantism, 1805
- Bushyhead, Jesse, 1361
- Butler, Bishop Joseph, 901
- Butler, Joseph, 322–323, 1375
 on deism, 571
 Latitudinarianism and, 1066
- Butler, Josephine Elizabeth, 323–325, 1751
- Butterfield, Herbert, 325
- Buttlar, Eva von, 1490
- Buttrick, George A., 1534

- Butzer, Martin. see Bucer, Martin
- Buxtehude, Deitrich, 326
- Buxton, Thomas Fowel, humanitarian work of, 1266
- Byrd, William, compositions by, 1331
- Byzantine icons, 926
- Cadbury, George, 327
- Caedmon, "Hymn," 1099
- Cain, Richard Harvey, AME Church, South Carolina, 21
- Calendar reform, 874–876
- Calixt (Callisen), Georg, 327–328
 Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Called to Common Mission*, 2001, Episcopal Church of the USA and Evangelical Lutheran Church, 69, 705–706
- Calov, Abraham, 1424
 writings, 1131
- Calvert family, 328
- Calvin, John, 7, 328–331, 807, 1578, 1609 altar controversy, 30
 art in religion, 105–106
 atonement and, 125
 on baptism, 163
 on Biblical inspiration, 224
 on capital punishment, 349
 catechism of, 361, 380
 christology of, 410–411
 on church and state, 419–420
 on church discipline, 424
 on components of worship, 2060
 concept of justification, 1001, 1003
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 concept of Lord's Supper, 1596–1597 condemnation of Servetus by, 1714
 on confirmation, 165–166, 502–503
 on conversion, 519
 on corruption of human mind by Fall, 1671
 on divorce, 604
 on doctrinal authority of scripture, 607
 on double predestination, 656
 ecclesiastical ordinances of, 627–628
 on education, 643, 647–648
 episcopacy and, 254
 establishment of Geneva Academy by, 867
 on ethics, 691–692
 on faith, 733
 on free will, 585
 Geneva Catechism of, 807–809, 855
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Heinrich Bullinger and, 315
- influence on Presbyterianism, 1547, 1550, 1557

- Institutes of the Christian Religion* by, 952–953, 1423, 1535, 1543, 1547, 1550, 1597 on justification, 781–782
 on just war, 511
 on the Lord’s Supper, 1117–1118
 on Marian devotions, 1173–1174
 on marriage, 1162, 1720
 millennialism and, 1239
 on miracles and relics, 1911 on original sin in children, 380
 preaching by, 1535, 1536, 1537
 on private confession, 494 on Reformed confessions, 496 on sabbatarianism, 1634–1635
 on sacraments, 1638
 on saints, 1641
 on salvation, 1645–1646
 on sanctification, 1652
 on sexuality, 1719
 on socialism, 1762
 on sports, 1804
 on true church, 418
 “unexpected conversion” of, 1597
 use of music by, 910, 911
 views on iconoclasm, 923, 924
 views on Judaism, 995
 views on music, 1338
 views on natural law, 1366
 views on nature, 1369
 views on predestination, 1543, 1597
 work ethic of, 632
- Calvinism, 331–338, 814–815
 Ames, William, 54–55
 art in, 106
 AUA philosophy and, 49–50
 Baptists and, 185
 beliefs, 170
 church discipline in, 424–425
 in Church of Scotland, 445, 1681–1685
 clergy in, 467–468
 confessionalization in, 498
 Consistent, 888
 consistory in, 515
Day of Doom and, 218
 deacons in, 561
 democracy and, 575
 on discipline, 2085
 Edwards on, 653
 in France, 763–764
 in French Revolution, 776–777
 Hobbes’s views and, 872
 Hume and, 900
 in Hungary, 902–903

- iconography and, 928
- Kuyper and, 1044–1045
- literature and, 230
- in the Netherlands, 1384
- New Divinity school of, 888–889
- politics and, 1512–1513
- Puritanism and, 1579
- regeneration process in, 929
- revoked by Edict of Nantes, 756
- role of the laity in, 1050–1051
- in sixteenth-century France, 895–897
- Weber on, 1771
- witchcraze and, 2018–2020
- Calvin Theological Seminary, 403
- Cambridge Platform, 338, 1580–1582, 1928
- Cambridge Platonists, 338–339, 664, 1605
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1063–1064
 - publications, 1312
- Cambridge University, 339–340, 867–868
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1063–1064
- Cameroon
 - Baptist work in, 177–178
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
- Campbell, John McLeod, 343–344
- Campbell family, 343
 - in Stone-Campbell Movement, 594–595
- Campbellism controversy, 171
- Campion, Edmund, execution of, 1168
- Camp meeting, 340–343, 966, 1458, 1610
 - Cane Ridge (See Cane Ridge Revival)
 - circuit riders and, 452, 785
 - evangelicalism in, 709
 - Holiness Movement and, 877
 - hymnody of, 916
 - in Kentucky, 785
 - Millerites and, 1242
 - sectarianism in, 1696
 - Southern Protestantism and, 1791–1792
 - urban, 754
 - women preaching at, 2031
- Camp Meeting Manual: A Practical Book for the Camp Ground* (Gorham), 341
- Campus Crusade for Christ, 730
- Canada, 344–347
 - AMA work in, 47
 - Baptist churches in, 174–175
 - Calvinism in, 335
 - China Inland Mission in, 392
 - Mennonites in, 1202
 - Native American children boarding schools in, 381
 - Presbyterianism in, 1553
 - United Church of, 346, 1930–1933
- Canada Baptist Missionary Society, merger, 174

- Cancionero Abierto* (Open Songbook), 1336
- Cane Ridge Revival, 547
 sectarianism in, 1696
 Stone-Campbell Movement and, 594, 1817
- Canning, George, 960
- Canonization, 1640–1641
- Canon law, 1510–1511
- Canon of biblical books, 1415
- Canons of Dort, 829, 1601
- Canstein Bible Institution, formation, 240
- Cantate Domino*, publication, 1335
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Canterbury, 347–348
- Canterbury and York, Convocations of, 348–349
- Canterbury Tales* (Chaucer), 1099
- Cantwell v. Connecticut* (1940), 1517
- Cape, South Africa, colonizing of, 1777–1778
- Capitalism
 Christianity and, 632–633
 sectarianism and, 1690
- Capital punishment, 349–351
 for adultery, 604, 1721 for homosexuality, 421
 Universalism on, 1930
- Capitein, Jacobus, 9
- Capito, Wolfgang, 351, 1623
- Cappel, Louis, 351–352
- Capuchins, social concerns, 1301
- Cardanus, Hieronymus, accusations against, 1080
- Cardenas, Lázaro, missionaries and, 1232
- Carey, Lott
 black nationalism and, 1095
 missionary efforts, 1254
- Carey, William, 352–353, 868, 938, 998, 1404 Baptist Missionary Society and, 1260 on chiliasm, 383
 evangelical views, 177
 missionary work of, 171, 182, 1254, 1280
- Caribbean, 353–357
 Lutheranism in, 1143
 slavery in, 1735
- Carlson, Edgar, 1562
- Carlson, Paul, execution of, 1169
- Karlstadt, Andreas Rudolf Bodenstein von. see Karlstadt, Andreas Rudolf Bodenstein von
- Carmichael, Aimee, 1017
- Carnell, Edward John, 357
- Cartford, Gerhard, Laudamus supplement and, 1336
- Cartwright, Peter, 357
- Cartwright, Thomas, 358–359

- Puritan party under, 1692
- Cary, Lott, 359
- Cashwell, Gaston Barnabas, 955, 1460–1461
- Caspari, Carl Paul, confessional revival, 1134
- Cassian, John, monasticism and, 1299
- Cassock
 - in ancient and Medieval church, 1959
 - in late twentieth century, 1963
 - worn by Lutheran clergy, 1961
- Castellio, Sebastian (Castalio, Castellion), 359–360, 1443, 1597–1598
 - Thomas More and, 1312
- Castro, Emilio, 1527
- Caswall, Edward, 917
- Catechism of the Church of Geneva*, 807–809
- Catechism(s), 360–363
 - in confessionalization, 499
 - Lutheranism and, 1130
 - of sixteenth century, 807–808
 - slave instruction in, 1736
 - state-sponsored education and, 647–648
 - teaching of, 424
- Catholic Apostolic Church, 960
- Catholic Charismatic Renewal, in Latin America, 1060
- Catholic Church
 - authority of, 429
 - Church of Scotland reactions to, 446
 - clerical structure of, 464
 - confirmation in, 502–503
 - consistory in, 514–515
 - deacons in, 562, 564
 - on divine healing, 737
 - Early Modern, 522
 - Episcopal Church cooperation with, 678
 - on euthanasia, 700
 - missions, 1252, 1255
 - organization of, 417
 - Protestant interconfessional dialogues with, 589–591
 - sacraments in, 502
 - statistics on, 1810
 - worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092
- Catholic Counter-reformation. See Counter-Reformation
- Catholicism
 - absolutism and, 3
 - African theology rituals and, 1735–1736
 - AU and, 53–54
 - homosexuality and, 1163–1164
 - in Latin America, 1060
 - in Mexico, 1229–1233
 - missiology and, 1249–1250
 - in movies, 1321
 - scientific contributions from, 1674
 - seminaries, 1252

- view on abortion, 1–2
 - Catholicism, Protestant reactions to, 365–366, 499–500
 - on divorce, 602
 - in nineteenth century America, 1946
 - Catholicity of church, 417–418
 - Catholic reactions to Protestantism, 363–365, 734
 - secularization and, 1704
 - Catholic Reformation, 522
 - Caughey, James, 877
 - Cause of God and Truth* (Gill), 182
 - Cavalli, P., 963
 - Cavendish, William, 871
 - CBInternational, 180
 - Cecil, William, 4, 868
 - Celebremos*, publication, 1336
 - Celibacy, 366–371
 - clerical sacrality and, 465
 - as detractor to entering priesthood, 469
 - Luther on, 467
 - marriage and, 1161
 - Martin Luther and, 1137
 - Shakers on, 1727
 - St. Paul on, 464
 - Zwingli on, 2081
 - Censura* (Brucer), baptismal rite, 163
 - Census, of religion, 1813
 - Central America, Bible society work in, 243
 - Central Jurisdiction, 15
 - Chad, Lutheranism in, 1142
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Chakkarai, Vengal, 938, 941
 - Chalmers, Thomas, 371–373, 960, 1537
 - on economics, 632
 - Chamars, conversion of, 1180
 - Chambers, T.M., 1569
 - Chanler, Isaac, ministry, 193
 - Channing, William Ellery, 373, 1544
 - Unitarian, 50, 1928
 - Chao, T.C. (Chau Tzu-Chen), 373–374
 - Chaplaincy, 374–376
 - ELCA in, 704
 - Chapman, George, translations by, 1100
 - Character of a Methodist*, impact of, 1213
 - Charismatic Christians, 714
 - worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092
 - Charismatic movement, 1464–1465
 - See also* Pentecostalism
 - Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship and, 788
 - in Ghana, 818–819
 - speaking in tongues in, 1900–1901

- women clergy in, 2033
- Charismatic Renewal, American missions and, 1285
- Charity, 377–378, 1473.
 - See also* Philanthropy
 - Darby on, 550
- Charlemagne, education system of, 641
- Charles, Pierre, on missiology, 1249
- Charles II of England, 875, 1028, 1577
 - Oliver Cromwell and, 535
- Charleston Association, formation, 171
- Charles V, 824–825
 - Lutheranism and, 1138
- Charles V of France, 1596, 1602
- Charm* (Bliss), 262
- Chasuble
 - origins of, 1960
 - in Reformation, 1961–1962
 - symbolism of, 1963–1964
- Chateaubriand, R.F. A. de, 1620
- Chateillon, Sebastian. See Castellio, Sebastian
- Chatillon, Sebastian. See Castellio, Sebastian
- Chaucer, Geoffrey
 - Canterbury Tales*, 1099
 - on monasticism, 1300
- Chauncy, Charles
 - Arminian minister, 49
 - on universalist theology, 1952
 - views on the Bible, 1186
- Chautauqua, New York, bible camps, 233
- Chautauqua movement, 342
- Cheek, Landon N., missionary work by, 180
- Chefoo Convention, 1846
- Chelcicki, Piotr, 1437
- Chemnitz, Martin
 - Examination of the Council of Trent*, 1131
 - Lutheran unity and, 1138
 - on Melanchthon's views, 281
- Chenciah, Pandipeddi, 938, 941
- Cherbury, Edward Lord Herbert of, 378–379
- Chesser, H.L., 1457
- Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral. see Lambeth Quadrilateral
- Chicago School, 1883
- Chicken Soup for the Soul*, 1575
- Childbirth, death in, in Christian Science, 407
- Childhood, 379–382
 - age of accountability in, 741
 - confirmation in, 501
- Children
 - abuse of, 379–380
 - healthcare of, in Christian Science, 408–409
 - illegitimate, 1722
 - Reformation attitude toward, 740

- in United States Civil War, 461
- Children of God, 983–985
- Chile, Protestantism in, 1061–1062
- Chiliasm, 382–383, 1025–1026, 1043
 - Labadie and, 1487
- Chillingworth, William, 383–384, 871
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1064
- Chiluba, Frederick, 385
- Chimere, origins of, 1959
- China, 385–391
 - Baptist missionary work in, 178
 - Bible society work in, 243
 - Bible translation, 248
 - colonialism in, 483
 - first Protestants in America, 118–119
 - German missions in, 1275
 - history of immigration, 118
 - house churches in, 890
 - James Legge in, 1076–1077
 - Lutheranism in, 1143
 - martyrs in, 1170
 - Mennonite missionaries to, 1204
 - missions to, 1261, 1271–1272
 - models of inculturation in, 934
 - Presbyterianism in, 1555
 - Protestantism growth in, 1774
 - Protestant universities in, 868
 - theological education in, 1866
 - trade with, 1266–1267
- China Bible Society, administration, 243
- China Christian Council (CCC), 390–391, 1893–1894
- China Inland Mission (CIM), 391–393
 - foundation, 1256, 1268
 - fundamentalism and, 792
 - history of, 731
 - size of, 386
 - Taylor work with, 1845–1846
- Chinese Americans, at YMCA/YWCA, 2072
- Chinese revolution, Christian support for, 2064
- Chinese theology, Chao influence on, 373
- Choan-Seng Song, liberation theology and, 1091, 1093
- Chosen People Ministries, missions to the Jews, 1288
- Chrism, in confirmation, 502
- Christadelphians, 393–394, 1696–1697
- Christaller, J.G., 1604
- Christian and Missionary Alliance, 394–398, 1610
- Christian and Missionary Alliance Church, 1866–1867
- Christian and Missionary Alliance in Canada, size, 1286
- Christian assurance, in Wesleyanism, 1995
- Christian Baptist* (Campbell), 343

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Christian Beacon* (newspaper), 1189
 Christian Broadcasting Network, 1615
 Christian calendar, 1418–1419
Christian Century, 800, 860, 1468
 Morrison, 1318
 Christian Churches (Churches of Christ), 398–401
 Christian Coalition of America, 1615
 in politics, 404
 Christian colleges
 Calvin Theological Seminary, 403
 in Churches of Christ, 428
 in Church of God, 438
 Christian Congregation, in Brazil, 295, 296
 Christian Connexion, in United Church of Christ, 1934
Christian Faith (Schleiermacher), 334, 1659–1660
Christian III Bible, first printing of, 247
 Christian Institute of South Africa, 1372
Christianity and the Social Crisis, 1592, 1593
Christianity as Old as the Creation (Tindal), 1893 Christianity in Asia
 accommodation and adaptation, 115 adoption and imitation, 114–115 contextualization and indigenization, 115–116 deconstruction and reconstruction, 116
Christianity Today, 832, 860, 1468
Christianizing the Social Order, 1592, 1593
 Christian Manifesto, in China, 390
Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, 938
 Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, women clergy in, 2032
Christian Newsletter, 1421
Christian Nurture (Bushnell), 322
 Christian Peacemaker Teams, 1449
 Christian perfection, 877–878, 955
 in Wesleyanism, 1996
Christian Periodical Index, 1470
 Christian Reformed Church in North America (CRCNA), 402–403, 1348, 1543, 1601
 divorce in, 606
 history of, 620–621, 624
 Christian Restoration Association, 399
 Christian Right, 403–404, 1518 on creationism, 533
 on Darwinism, 554, 556
 Full Gospel Business Men’s Fellowship aligning with, 787
 secularization and, 1706
 in Southern Protestantism, 1794
 in televangelism, 1851
 Christian Rural Overseas Program, 452
 Christian Science, 404–410, 804
 on healing, 736

- sectarianism and, 1697–1698
- Christian Science Monitor*
 - foundation of, 405
 - journalistic awards of, 409
- Christian socialism. See Socialism, Christian
- Christian Socialist Workers Party, 951, 1032, 1816
- Christian's Secret of a Happy Life*, 870, 877, 1016
- Christmas, 875–876
 - religious broadcasting on, 1177
- Christmas Conference. see Baltimore Conference
- Christoffel, Ernst Jakob, missions, 1275–1276
- Christology, 410–416
 - Anabaptism and, 61
 - of Ariens, 1924–1925
 - of Barth, 414–415, 657
 - in Calvinism, 336
 - deist rejection of, 569
 - of Emerson, 662
 - feminist, 629
 - of friendship, 931
 - Jesus in New Age Spirituality, 1390
 - kenotic, 411–412, 566
 - lives of Jesus, 986–991
 - Moltmann and, 1298
 - of Quakers, 780
 - of Schleiermacher, 1659–1660
 - of Schwenckfeld, 1669
 - in third to fifth centuries, 465
 - of William Temple, 1857
- Chrysostom, John, 1366
- Chubb, Thomas, 416, 986
 - on deism, 570
- Chubbock, Emily, 998
- Chuhras, mass conversions, 1180
- Church, 416–419
- Church and state
 - AU and, 53–54
 - Bullinger on, 2084–2085
 - in Canada, 346
 - in Estonia, 685
 - human rights and, 899
 - Kirchentag*, 1032–1033
 - Luther on, 1773
 - overview, 419–422
 - political parties, 1507–1508
 - politics, 1509–1519
 - in Prussia, 1656
 - Pufendorf and, 1576
 - Puritanism and, 1514–1515
 - regulation of philanthropic foundations, 1476
 - sabbatarianism and, 1637
 - in Schleithem Confession, 1662

in Scotland, 371–372
 secularization and, 1703
 sociology of, 1773–1774
 Stahl on, 1808
 in Sweden, 1833
 Thomas Becket in, 347–348
 in United States, 876
 Zwingli on, 2081

Church architecture, 88–92, 2059–2060, 2063–2064

Church discipline, 422–425
 in confessionalization, 499
 Elizabeth I and, 660
 polity and, 1519–1522
 in Schleithem Confession, 1661
 slavery and, 1737

Church Dogmatics (Barth), 203, 204–204, 628, 1880

Church Dutch, 812–813

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Churches for a Middle East Peace, 1448

Churches of Christ.

See also Christian Churches (Churches of Christ)
 noninstrumental, 425–428
 (See also Stone-Campbell movement)

Church Growth Today, 1191

Church law, 428–430

Church Missionary Society (CMS), 16, 430, 869, 938, 992, 1035, 1391, 1401, 1499

in Africa, 17
 Anderson, Rufus, 64
 conversions in India and, 1180
 formation, 1265
 foundation, 1255
 missionary work, 1261
 Samuel Crowther and, 539
 in Sierra Leone, 1731–1732

Church of Central Africa Presbyterian, 1156

Church of Christ, Scientist. See Christian Science

Church of England, 430–436

in Africa, 17
 Anglican chant, 65–66
Book of Common Prayer (Cranmer), 1113
 Broad Church and, 307
 Calvert family conversion to, 328
 in Canada, 345
 in Caribbean, 353–354
 clergy in, 458
 Common Worship Marriage Service, 1161
 confirmation in, 501 congregationalism in, 507, 1933
 deacons in, 561–562, 564
 denominations and, 581

- dissent from, 600
- on divorce, 604–605
- doctrinal authority in, 609
- ecumenical agreements with, 633
- on election, 657
- Elizabeth I as Supreme Governor of, 660
- evangelicalism in, 709
- Free Church separation from, 767
- on healing, 738
- in India, 1783
- Methodism's split from, 1209–1210
- missionaries to South Africa from, 1779
- National Assembly, 1053
- Oliver Cromwell on, 536
- Protestant churches outside of, 668
- Puritan attempt to control, 339
- Simeon influence on, 1733
- sisterhoods in, 1734–1735
- Thomas Cartwright view of, 358
- vestments in, 1961
- views on abortion, 1
- Church of England Purity Society, 1571
- Church of God, 878
 - in Latin America, 1062
- Church of God (Anderson, IN), 437–439, 1698
- Church of God (Cleveland, TN), 436–437
- Church of God in Christ (COGIC), 15, 439–442, 1457, 1460
- Church of God of Prophecy, 442–443
- Church of Ireland, 959
 - General Synod, 1052–1053
- Church of Jesus Christ, in Africa, 11
- Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. see Mormonism
- Church of Jesus Christ on Earth Through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu, 1022
- Church of North India, 939, 1404–1405, 1555
- Church of Norway, 1406
- Church of Scotland, 444–446, 1551, 1681
 - deacons in, 561
 - disruption of, 371–372, 1681–1682
 - in English Civil Wars, 457
 - Free Church separation from, 767, 1683
 - Hume and, 900
 - Iona Community and, 958
 - Irving and, 960
 - Stone-Campbell Movement and, 594
 - Witherspoon in, 2022
- Church of South India, 938, 939, 1394, 1555, 1782–1784
 - Azariah, Vedayagam Samuel, 150
- Church of the Nazarene, 447–452, 878
 - reaction to the Connexion, 1210
- Church of the Prussian Union, 814
- Church Order of de Mist, 1779
- Church World Service, 452, 1353

- Circuit riders, 357, 452, 785
 among Native Americans, 1361
 Methodist, 1210
 in post-Revolutionary America, 1944
- Cistercian order, foundation of, 1299
- City of God (Augustine), 382
- Civil Religion, national holidays and, 876
- Civil Rights Movement, 452–456, 900, 1518
 AME Church and, 21
 capital punishment and, 350
 ecology and, 630
 Episcopal Church in, 679
 Fellowship of Southern Churchmen in, 746 interracial bus rides in, 747
 Joseph Jackson and, 1352, 1568
 King and, 1022–1025, 1030, 1352
 Ku Klux Klan and, 1043
 liberation theology and, 1090
 National Council of Churches and, 1354
 Pentecostal Assemblies of the World and, 1452 political theology and, 1508, 1509
 Progressive National Baptist Convention and, 1568–1569
 secularization and, 1706
 Southern Baptist Convention and, 1788
- Civil War, America, 459–462, 899, 951 dissent development after, 601
 Episcopal Church in, 677 fundamentalism in, 790
 just war concept in, 512
 Quaker divisions after, 1765
 sectarianism after, 1697 slavery abolition after, 1744–1745 slavery abolition debates before, 1740
Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 Southern Baptist Convention during and after, 1785
 YMCA war relief during, 2072
- Civil War, England, 456–459
 Church of the Brethren and, 301–302
 democracy and, 575
 Levellers and, 1082–1084
 Puritans versus Arminians in, 668 sports during, 1804
 witch executions in, 2020–2021
- Clapham Sect, 430, 462–463, 2011
 Sierra Leone Company and, 1729–1731
 social action by, 1052
- Clarissa* (Richardson), 1102
- Clark, Sidney J.W., Allen, Roland and, 28
- Clarke, Adam, influence of, 1213
- Clarke, John

- arrest, 192
- evangelical views, 177
- Newport congregation, 171
- Clarke, Samuel, 900
- Clausnitzer, Tobias, 915
- Clavis Scriptorum*, 825
- Cleage, Albert, Jr., Black Messiah, 258, 259
- Clement of Alexandria, adiaphoristic ideas, 6
- Clemmons, Ithiel, 1458
- Clergy, 463–469
 - confessionalization effect on, 499
 - homosexual, 883, 885, 900
 - laity and, 1048–1057
 - marriage of, 469–472, 1161
 - (See also Celibacy)
 - in early Christianity, 368
 - Luther on, 367
 - ordination of women, 1147
 - reputation of, in Schleithem Confession, 1661–1662
 - women as (See Women clergy)
- Clerical attire, in ancient and medieval church, 1959
- Clifford, John, social gospel and, 183
- Clifton, Richard, 1492
- Clowes, William, 1566
 - Primitive Methodists and, 290
- Coates, Gerald, 889
- Cobb, John B., Jr., 1509
- Coccejus, Johannes (Cocceius, Johannes), 472–473, 526, 829, 1385, 1486
- Cochlaeus, Johannes, accusations against, 1080–1081
- COCU (Consultation on Church Union), 515–516
- Codpiece, 1722
- Coethen, Leopold of (Prince), J.S. Bach and, 155
- Coffin, Henry Sloane, 473–474, 1549
- Cohabitation, marriage and, 1164
- Cohn, Norman, 393
 - millennialism and, 1239–1240
- Coke, Thomas, 414, 965
 - appointment by Wesley, 160
 - in Caribbean, 355
 - conferences and, 1227
 - Hosier and, 255
 - Methodist Episcopal Church and, 1223
 - mission to France, 1216
 - Wesleyan Methodist Connexion and, 1221
- Coker, Daniel
 - antislavery pamphlet published by, 257
 - black nationalism and, 1095
- Cokesbury College, creation of, 160
- Cold War, pacifism in, 512
- Colenso, John William, 414–475, 866, 933
 - Lambeth Conference and, 1057
- Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, 475–477, 1031, 1432, 1620, 1621

- writings, 1103
- Coligny, Gaspard de, 477–478
 - execution of, 1168
- Collective conscience, 1770
- College of William and Mary, history of, 651
- Colleges, Protestant, 478–481
 - in Canada, 345–346
 - of Church of the Nazarene, 447
 - in confessionalization, 499
 - Lexington Theological Seminary, 399
 - Milligan, 400
 - Nyack, 396
- Colley, William W.
 - missionary work, 197
 - missionary work by, 180
- Collin, Rudolf, Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
- Collines, Simon, Bible publication by, 247
- Collins, Anthony, 481
 - on deism, 570–571
- Collins, Charles Allston, 1545, 1546
- Collinson, James, 1545, 1546
- Collinson, Patrick, on Laud, 1071
- Colloquy of Poissy, 1345, 1500, 1598
- Colombia, Protestantism in, 1061
- Colonialism, 481–483
 - culture in, 544
 - politics and, 1513
 - Presbyterianism and, 1552
 - Puritanism and, 1580–1582
 - Reinhold Niebuhr on, 1874
 - revivals and, 1610
- Colonial period
 - in America, 1941–1942, 2029–2030, 2035
 - American women in, 2029–2030, 2035
 - Canadian Protestantism in, 344–345
 - Episcopal Church in, 676
 - sexuality during, 1722–1724
 - sports and Protestantism in, 1805
 - women clergy in, 2035–2037
- Colonization, history of, 42
- Colonna, Vittoria, 961
- Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, 14, 257
- Colporteurs, in Latin America, 1061
- Columbia Broadcasting System, religious broadcasting, 1176
- Comber, Thomas, missionary work, 178
- Comenius, John (Komensky, Jan), 483–484
 - on education, 644, 648
- Come-outer sects, on slavery abolition, 1743
- Commentarii Rerum in Ecclesia Gestarum*, 4
- Commercialization of Christian holidays, 875–876
- Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, 2047
- Committee for the Abolition of the Slave Trade, 9

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Common sense in deism, 569
 Scottish, 1686–1687, 2022–2023
- Common Service, The, Lutheran order for worship, 46
- Communal living, Amana Society, 32–34
- Communion.
 see also Lord's Supper
 Book of Common Prayer and, 276
 Formula of Concord and, 282
- Communion of saints, 1640
- Communion tables, 485
- Communism, 485–486
 Christianity as, 2015
 Methodism and, 1219
 Protestantism and, 1904–1905
- Communist Manifesto (Marx and Engels), 1759–1760
- Community of goods, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Community of True Inspiration, 811
 Amana Church Society as descendant of, 32–33 decline, revival, and migration, 33
- Complutensian Polyglot Bible*, 247
- Components of worship, 2060–2061
- Computers, use of, 1178
- Comte, Auguste, on scientism, 1675
- Concentration camps, 880
- Concept of Cologne, Mennonites and, 1201–1202
- Concert for Prayer, 2049–2050
- Conciliar Movement, Anglicanism and, 67
- Concordat of Bologna, 1598
- Concord Baptist Church, 14
- Cone, James Hal, 486–487
 AME Church, 21
 black theology and, 258
 Black Theology and Black Power, 258–259
 liberation theology and, 1092
- Conference, 487–488
- Confessing Church, 488–491, 814, 838, 881, 1030, 1358, 1399, 1587
 ethnicity and, 699
 formation of, 1140
- Confessio Belgica*. see Belgic Confession of 1561
- Confessio Marpurgiana*, 1159
- Confession
 Amish public meeting, 57 prayers of, 2061
- Confession, Instruction, and Warning of the Pastors and 'Preachers of the Christian Church in Magdeburg*, 800
- Confessionalization, 497–500, 1595
 Anglicanism and, 69
 education in, 644

- Lutheranism and, 1131–1133
 - revival, 1134–1135
 - Weigel on, 1980
 - witchcraze and, 2018
- Confession of faith, 494–497
 - in confirmation, 501
- Confession of Faith of La Rochelle, 799
- Confession of sin, 491–494
 - in catechisms, 360
- Confirmation, 501–507, 1416
 - baptism's relationship to, 165–166
 - church discipline and, 424
 - in church law, 429
 - Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
 - polity and, 1520
- Confutation*, 129–130
- Congregational Church, women clergy in, 2033
- Congregational Church of England. See Congregationalism
- Congregational discipline, 1521–1522
- Congregationalism, 507–510
 - Aline, Henry, 29
 - AMA and, 47
 - American, 820, 888, 914–915
 - Ames, William, 53
 - church order in, 582
 - in Colonial America, 1941–1943
 - Edwardseanism and, 888
 - in English Civil Wars, 456
 - International Congregational Church and, 2045
 - Pentecostalism and, 1454
 - Pilgrim fathers in, 1751
 - of Pilgrims, 1492
 - Randall in, 771
 - sectarianism in, 1695
 - synods in, 1841
 - Toleration Act and, 335
 - of United Church of Christ, 1933–1934
 - Watts and, 914
- “Congregational Way,” 1581, 1583
- Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), 454
- Connecticut Bible Society, territorial disputes, 242
- Connectionalism, Methodist, 1229
- Connexional Principle*, 1210
- Conscience, collective, 1770
- Conscientious objection, 510–513, 1438, 1439, 1447
 - of Hutterites, 906
- Consensus helveticus*, 1424
- Consensus quinquesaecularis*, 327–328
- Consensus Tigurinus, 1597
- Conservative Baptist Association, 513–514
- Conservative Baptist Foreign Mission Society (CBFMS), 180, 513
 - formation, 172

- Conservative Baptist Home Mission Society (CBHMS), 513
 Conservative Grace Brethren Church, formation of, 304
 Consistent Calvinism, 888
 Consistory, 494, 514–515, 1503, 1609
 Geneva, 424–425
 as marriage court, 1720
 Consolidated American Baptist Missionary Convention, 1351
 Constantine, episcopacy after, 253
 Constitution, American, 1944
Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, publication, 1335
 Constructive theology, 1885
 Consultation on Church Union (COCU), 515–516, 1549
 ecumenism in, 637
 Contarini, Gasparo, 961
 views on natural law, 1366
 Contemporary Christian Music, global music and, 1337–1338
 Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Contextualization, 546
 Contraception, acceptance of, 1162
 Controversial theology, of Georg Calix, 327
 Conventicles, 516–517, 1385
 Puritan, 1751
 Conversion, 517–520
 African slaves, 12
 as camp meeting goal, 340
 in Churches of Christ, 427
 in Danish Protestantism, 578
 Douglass on, 615
 Edwards on, 653
 in evangelicalism, 709–711
 family and, 741
 Hooker on, 887–888
 ministerial education and, 650
 of Schwenckfeld, 1668
 in Wesleyanism, 1994
 Convocations, of Canterbury and York, 348–349
 Cook, Charles, 1609
 Cook, Fred, attack by Hargis, 1177
 Cook, James, 1435
 Cook, Thomas, 520
 Cooke, Henry, 520–521
 Coolen, C.L., 946
 Coolhaes, Caspar, Arminianism and, 93
 Cooper, Anthony Ashley, 1483
 Cooperative Baptist Fellowship, formation, 180, 198
 Coornhert, Dirck Volckertz, 1384 Cope
 origins of, 1960
 in Reformation, 1961–1962
 Copeland, Kenneth, 1850–1851

- Copenhagen Confession, 1845
 Copernican Revolution, 1370
Coram deo, 1861–1862
 Cornish, Samuel, 1548
 Cortese, Gregorio, 961
 Costa Rica, Lutheranism and, 1143
 Cotterill, Thomas, 916
 Cottesloe Conference, Z.K. Matthews and, 1184
 Cottesloe Consultation, 1372
 Cotton, John, 521, 904, 1492, 1581
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1028
 Coughlan, Lawrence, preaching by, 1225
 Council of Churches in Indonesia, 947–948
 Council of Federated Organizations (COFO), 455 Council of Trent, 961, 962, 991, 1495, 1600
 Catholic, 365
 view of justification, 1004
 Counter-Reformation, 365, 521–523
 catechisms of, 362
 in Poland, 1502–1503
 in Sweden, 1829–1830
 witch-hunting in, 2018–2019
 Covenant, 523–526
 dispensationalism in, 599
 salvation as, 1644 sin as revolt against, 1733
 Thomas Bray and, 294
 Zwingli on, 2082, 2086
 Covenant of the League of Nations, 2015, 2046
 Covenant theology, 526–527, 1933–1934
 Ames, William, 53
 in congregationalism, 508
 democratic constitutional theory and, 575 in Dutch Reformed Church, 619
 work and grace in, 473
 Coverdale, Miles, 4, 527–528, 911, 1598
 Cowper, William, 916
 Cox, Frances Elizabeth, 917
 Cox, Harvey, 1574–1575
 Craddock, Fred, 1540
 Cranach, Lucas
 art in religion and, 105–106
 millennialism and, 1240
 Cranmer, Thomas, 528–531, 858, 868, 911, 1432, 1443, 1444, 1550, 1599
 Anglican spirituality, 67–68
 Book of Common Prayer, 273–278, 1113
 Book of Homilies, 1537
 execution of, 1168
 Forty-two Articles of Religion and, 1886–1887
 Henry VIII and, 348, 431
 on the Lord's Supper, 1118
 in moving England toward Protestantism, 668

- on prayer, 1532–1533
- Thirty-nine Articles of Religion and, 1886
- on times for worship, 2058
- Crawford, Florence, 1463
- Crawford, T.P., missionary work, 179
- Creation science, 531–534, 1673–1674
 - flood geology and, 2003
 - secularization and, 1706
- Credible real, Scottish, 1686–1687
- Creed, in catechisms, 360–362
- Creeley, Robert, 1529
- Crespin, Jean, martyrology of, 1171
- Cressy, David, 876
- Critica Sacra* (Cappel), 351
- Croatia, Baptist Union in, 186
- Crocus, Paul, martyrology, 1171
- Cromwell, Oliver, 534–537, 959, 961, 996, 1028, 1483, 1493, 1513, 1551, 1577, 1580
 - on church and state, 420
 - in English Civil Wars, 456–458
 - Leveller movement and, 1082
- Cromwell, Thomas, 537–538, 857–859, 868, 1598–1599
 - Henry VIII and, 431
- Crosby, Fanny, 918, 1017
- Crosby, Frances Jane (Fanny), 538–539
- Crossan, John Dominic, 990
- Crossroads movement, 426
- Crouch, Paul, 1465
 - TBN and, 1177
- Crouch, Paul and Jan, 1850
- Crowther, Dandeson Coates, 539
- Crowther, Dandison, resistance to racism, 1271
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Crowther, Samuel Adjai (Ajayi), 539–540, 869, 1401
 - Bible translation by, 1261
 - in Sierra Leone, 1731–1732
- Crucicentricity, of evangelicalism, 710–711
- Crucified God* (Moltmann), 1297
- Crüger, Johann, 915
- Crumley, James R., Lutheran Church in America and, 1126
- Crummell, Alexander, 540–542
 - black nationalism and, 1095
- Crumpler, Abner Blackman, 955–956
- Crusades, 1976
 - capital punishment and, 349
- Crypto-Philippists, beliefs, 281, 282
- Crypto-Socinianism, 1767
- Cudworth, Ralph, Latitudinarianism and, 1066
- Cult of saints, 1640
- Cultural Protestantism, 542–544
 - in Europe and North America, 1872–1873

- Cultural relativity, 544
 Culture, 544–547
 in absolutism, 3
 Cumberland Presbyterian Church, 547, 1544, 1547, 1552
 Cummins, George David, 547–548
 Curcellaeus, Steven, 1605
 Curione, Celio, 962
 Cutts, Peter, 918
 Cyril, Bible translation by, 246
 Czech Brethren, 1437
 in Poland, 1501, 1503
 Czech hymns, 908 Czechoslovakia
 Baptist Union in, 186
 Methodism in, 1218
 Czech Protestantism, 891
- Dagg, John L., Manual of Theology, 183
 Dahlemites, 490
 Dale, Robert William, 549
 Dali, János Tolnai, 903
 Dalit groups, conversion of, 1180
 Dalit Theology, 942–943
 Damascus (Pope), Bible translation ordered by, 246
 Danaeus, Lambertus, Arminianism and, 93
 Dancing, condemnation of, 1722
 Dando, Eric C., 1455
 Danish Church Ordinance, church and state in, 419
 Danish-Halle Mission, foundation, 1255
 Danish People's Church mission and ecumenism of, 579–580 state relationship with, 577–578 theology and church life in, 578–579
 Dannhauer, Johann Conrad, writings, 1131
 Darby, John Nelson, 549–551, 977, 1030, 1499 Darbyism and, 1216
 on dispensationalism, 598, 682, 1590–1591
 leader of Plymouth Brethren, 86–87
 Darío, Rubén, 1529
 Dark, Sidney, 1484
 Darwin, Charles, 1371
 fundamentalism and, 790
 Darwinism, 551–557, 1371, 1625, 1883
 Christianity and, 533
 Christian Right and, 403 conflict myth in, 1673
 Protestant divisions over, 709, 1946
 Samuel Wilberforce on, 2009
 secularization and, 1706
 d'Aubigné, Agrippa, 1347
 d'Aubigné, Jean Henri Merle, 1609

- Daugherty, Billy Joe, 1458
 Daughters of Liberty, 2030
 David, Christian, 864
 Dávid, Ferenc, 1617
 Dávid, Francis (Ferenc), 557
 Davidson, Randal Thomas, 557–558
 Davidson, Samuel, 866
 Davies, G. Henton, Broadman Bible Commentary, 197
 Davies, Samuel, 558–559, 1523, 1547
 Davis, Charles, 1509
 Dawes Severalty Act of 1887 (United States), 1361
 Day, John, 4 on sainthood, 762
 Day, Lal Behari, 940
 Day, Samuel S. ministry in Canada, 174
 missionary work, 179
Day of Doom (Wigglesworth), 218
 Day of the Lord, 1643
 Deaconess/Deacon, 558–564
 origins of, 2031
 Deaconess Movement
 German Methodism and, 1217 growth of, 1225
 Deacons, 1522
 Death, salvation as deliverance from, 1644
 Death and dying, 564–565
 Samuel Davies on, 558
 Death of God, 565–567
 development of, 1881
 in England, 1876
 Death penalty. See Capital punishment
 de Brito, John, 937
Decades (Bullinger), 2084, 2086
 Declaration of Independence (United States), 1547
De dementia (Seneca), 329
Deed of Declaration (Wesley), impact of, 1213 “Defence of Poesie” (Sidney), 1100 de Haan, Galenus Abraham, 1605
 Dehmel, Richard, writings, 1111
 Deism, 568–574, 1371 authority and, 138
 Collins in, 481
 Darwinism and, 553
 Devil in, 586
 English, 378
 Enlightenment and, 672
 Hume and, 900
 individualism and, 944
 neology and, 1375–1376

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Tindal on, 1893
 Toland on, 1895
Dei Verbum, 244
 Dekker, Harold, 1543
 de Labadie, J., 1385
 Delany, Emma B., missionary work by, 180
 Delany, Martin, 574
De libero arbitrio, 6
 Delitsch, Franz, confessional revival, 1134
 Deloria, Vine, liberation theology and, 1093
 Delph, Ronald Keith, 961
 Delta Ministry, 1354
 de Médiçi, Catherine, 1500 de Menezis, Dom Alexis, 937
 Democracy, 574–576
Democracy in America (de Tocqueville), 1895
 Democratic populism, Baptists and, 195–196
 Demonologies, 2019
 Denck, Hans, Hofmann and, 1198
 Denmark, 577–580
 Baptist Union in, 186
 confessional revival, 1134
 Grundtvig in, 834
 Reformation in, 921, 1130, 1599–1600, 1830
 Dennis, James S., on missions, 1249 Denomination, 580–584
 as obstacle, 1948
 Denominational constitutions, 1524–1525
 Dent, Arthur, 1579
 de Onís, Frederico, 1529
 Depression, Great, Baptist missionary work during, 180
 Derham, William, 1371, 1372
 Derrida, Jacques, 1528, 1531
 biblical influence on, 231
 de Santa Ana, Julio, 1527
 Descartes, Rene, 1385
 Descartes, voluntarism and, 1670–1671
Descent of Man (Darwin), 552, 555
De servio arbitrio, 6
 d'Étaples, Jacques Lefèvre, 1595
 Deutsch, Karl W., 1356
Deutsche Messe (German Mass) (Luther), 1112
 Devanandan, Paul David, 938, 942
 Developmental psychology, Coleridge in, 476
 Deverell, Walter, 1545 Devil, 584–587
 witchcraze and, 2016
 Devotional literature. See Publishing media
 De Vries, Peter, 587–588

- Dewey, John, 1567
 on education, 648
 on empiricism, 666
- Dey, Lal Behari, 1405
- Diakonia, 563
- Dialectical theology, 1873.
 See also Neo-orthodoxy
 Cultural Protestantism and, 543
 in North America, 1883–1884
 in twentieth century, 1880
- Dialogue, interconfessional, 588–591.
 See also Ecumenism
 confirmation in, 505
 doctrine in, 612
- Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion*, 901
- Dialogues on Natural Religion* (Hume), 555
- Diangienda, Joseph, 11
- Diary of Private Prayer* (Baillie), 159
- Diatribes de Mille Apocalypticus* (Alsted), 382
- Diaz, Porfino, rule of, 1231
- Dibelius, Friedrich Karl Otto, 591–592
- Dibelius, Martin, 592–593
- Dibelius, Otto, on communism and the church, 1140
- Dickinson, Emily, 593
- Dictionary of All Religions and Religious Denominations*, 5
- Didache, on abortion, 1
- Diet of Augsburg, 1596, 1597
 protestation at, 1138
- Diet of Speyer, 1477, 1596
 protestation at, 1138
 Second, 1197
- Diet of Worms, 128, 1599
- Dietrich, Conrad, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Dietrich, Suzanne de, 1379
- Diggers, 2015
- Diodati, Giovanni, 962
 Bible translation by, 247
- Dippel, Johann Conrad, 1490
- Disciples of Christ, 593–597
 Apocalypticism and, 86
 in Caribbean, 356
 history of, 398, 400, 425–426
 sectarianism in, 1696
 on slavery, 1697
- Discipline, Zwinglians versus Calvinists on, 2085
- Discrimination, in just-war theory, 1975–1976
- Disinterestedness, 7
- Dispensationalism, 346, 597–600, 1030–1031
 Baptists and, 514
 eschatology in, 682
 Plymouth Brethren and, 1499 premillennial, 86–87

- rapture and, 1590–1591
 - in Scofield Reference Bible, 1678–1679
- Dispensations, for divorce, 602
- Disraeli, Benjamin, Coleridge influence on, 476–477
- Dissent, 600–602
 - Oliver Cromwell on, 536–537
- Distler, Hugo, 602
- Divine Comedy* (Alighieri), 1099–1100
- Divine healing, 735–736
- Divine-Human Encounter* (Brunner), 309–310
- Divine Principle* (Moon), 1924
- Divorce, 602–607
 - Luther on, 1720
 - remarriage after, 1931
 - vs. polygamy, 1495, 1496
- Dix, Gregory
 - on confirmation, 505
 - impact of, 1293
- Dixon, Richard Watson, 1546
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Dixon, Thomas, 1043
- Dober, Leonard, Moravian Church and, 1310
- Doctrine, 607–613
 - in Africa, 19
 - in Canons of Dort, 614
 - definition of, 429
 - purity in confessionalization, 499
- Doctrine and Covenants*, Mormonism and, 1315
- Dodd, C.H., 1415
 - on biblical inspiration, 224
- Doe, Samuel, role in Liberia, 1096
- Dogmatics in Outline* (Barth), 204
- Dohnanyi, Hans von, opposition to Nazism, 269, 270
- Dolby, Martha Cunningham, ministry of, 303
- “Dona nobis pacem,” meaning of, 156
- Donne, John, 613, 871, 1534, 1537
 - influence on Laud, 1071
 - themes, 1101
- Doomsday Cult* (Lofland and Stark), 1708
- Doopsgezinde*
 - center of, 1202
 - Menno and, 1197, 1201
- Dordrecht, Synod of, on election, 657
- Dorner, I.A., christology of, 413–414
- Dorsey, Thomas A., gospel music and, 1343
- Dorsey, Thomas (Georgia Tom), 14
- Dort, Canons of, 613–615
 - Dutch Protestants in America and, 618
 - Dutch Reformed Church and, 622
- Dort, Synod of, 1423–1424, 1471, 1543, 1550

- Dostoyevsky, Fyodor, biblical influence, 231
- Double covenant, 523
- Double predestination
 Augustine on, 655
 in Reformation, 655–657
- Douglas, Jim, Lausanne Covenant and, 1073
- Douglass, Frederick, 14, 615
 ACS opponent, 42
 AMEZ exhorter, 22
- Dow, Lorenzo, 1566
- Dowie, John Alexander, 1461
- Down-Grade Controversy, 1807–1808
- Draper, J.W., 1371
- Dreamers, 1720
- Dresden Missionary Union, split from Basel, 1274
- Dress for worship, 1958–1959
- Drummond, Henry, 615–616, 1371
- Dryer, Emma, Moody Bible Institute and, 235, 1302
- DuBois, William Edward Burghardt, 616–617
- Duchrow, Ulrich, on capitalism as demonic, 632–633
- Dudley, Mary, Quaker evangelicalism of, 783–784
- Duff, Alexander educational strategies, 1267
 mission to India, 1261
- Duke University, 617–618
- Dulles, John Foster, 1353
- Dunkers, 811. see Brethren, Church of the
- Dunster, Henry, resignation, 181, 192
- du Plessis, David Johannes, 616, 1465
- Durand, Marie, 898
- Durham, William, 1453, 1454, 1461, 1462
- Durkheim, Emile, on sociology of Protestantism, 1769–1770, 1773
- Dürrenmatt, Friedrich, writings, 1111
- Dutch Calvinists, secularization resistance of, 1705
- Dutch East India Company, 1843–1844
- Dutch East Indies, theology education in, 1865
- Dutch immigration to America, 618–619
- Dutch Missionary Society, 1386
- Dutch Protestants in America, 618–622
- Dutch Reformed Christians, 333
- Dutch Reformed Church, 622–625, 1044, 1384–1388, 1601
 in Africa, 625–626
 colleges founded by, 480
 CRCNA joining, 402
 founding of, 619
 Naudé in, 1372
 in South Africa, 10, 1777–1782
- Dwight, Theodore, 1363
- Dwight, Timothy, 626, 1547
- Dymond, Jonathan, 1439

- Eagle Scouts, 1724
- Early Christianity, celibacy in, 369
- Easter, 875, 876
- Eastern Orthodox Church, 1424–1427, 1616, 1628
- East India Company, 937–938
- Ebeling, Gerhard, 989
- Ebeling, Johann Georg, 915
- Ecclesiastical Association and Home Mission in Denmark, 578
- Ecclesiastical Ordinances (Calvin), 329–330, 627–628
- Ecclesiology, 429, 628–630
- in Africa, 18
 - British house churches and, 889
 - congregationalism and, 508
 - Mackay's writings on, 1154
- Eck, Johan, Latvian Lutheranism and, 1068
- Eck, John, 891, 1602
- Luther and, 1120
- Ecology, 630–632, 1372
- Darwinism and, 555
 - theology and, 1188
- Economics, 632–633
- in absolutism, 2–3
- Ecotheologies, 631
- Ecuador, Lutheranism and, 1143
- Ecumenical agreements, 633–634
- Ecumenical Institute, Chicago, monasticism and, 1301
- Ecumenical Movement
- American missions and, 1283
 - Mackay's influence on, 1154
 - missions and, 1255–1256
- Ecumenism, 363, 634–639.
- See also* Dialogue, interconfessional
 - the AMEZ Church, 21
 - chaplaincy and, 376
 - confirmation in, 505–506
 - of congregationalism, 509
 - covenant in, 525
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- deacons and, 564
 - denominations and, 583
 - doctrine in, 612
 - ecclesiology and, 629
 - ELCA in, 705
 - Evangelical and Reformed Church and, 702
 - in Finland, 753
 - Free Will Baptists and, 771–772
 - hymns of, 918
 - National Council of Churches, 1353–1354
 - sacraments and, 1638
 - of Schaff, 1654

- in Second Vatican Council, 364
- Social Gospel and, 1752
- Söderblom in, 1776
- in Sweden, 1832–1833
- in twentieth century America, 1948–1949
- in twentieth century Britain, 1878
- in twentieth century North America, 1885–1886
- United Church of Canada and, 1931
- views of justification and, 1007–1008
- women clergy and, 2038
- Eddy, Mary Baker, 639–640, 804
 - early influences on, 405
 - on sickness as mental error, 736
 - Spiritualism of, 1697–1698
- Edict of Ambroise, 1345
- Edict of Fontainebleau, 1347
- Edict of Grace d'Alès, 1347
- Edict of Nantes, 895–897, 1345–1348, 1598
- Edict of Restitution, 1606–1607
- Edict of Toleration, 335, 898
 - Nicholas II, Russia, 25
- Edict of Toleration (France), 1598
- Edict of Worms, 1596
- Edinburgh Mission Conference, 1556
- Edinburg Missionary Conference of 1910. See World Missionary Conference
- Edmunds-Tucker Act, 1498
- Education
 - Europe, 640–646
 - homeschooling, 881–882
 - of Jesuits, 468
 - Mission schools, 1267
 - overview, 646–650
 - of Protestant clergy, 468–469
 - Protestant higher education, 867–870
 - sports in, 1805
 - theology: United States, 650–653
- Edwards, Jonathan, 7, 653–654, 831, 888, 1028, 1030, 1523, 1547, 1943
 - beliefs, 182
 - christology of, 414
 - on Concert for Prayer, 2049–2050
 - on deism, 571
 - on empiricism, 664–665
 - on eschatology, 682
 - evangelical views, 177
 - missionary work of, 1280
 - preaching of, 1537
 - protestant aesthetics, 107
 - role of the laity and, 1052
 - on spiritually formed reason, 650–651
 - theology of, 1847
 - views on predestination, 1544
 - writings, 1103

- Edwards, Morgan, ministry, 193
Edwardseanism, 888
Edward VI (King of England), 4, 911
Ehrenpreis, Andreas, 906, 907
Eich, Günter, writings, 1111
Eichendorff, Joseph Freiherr von, Romanticism and, 1109
Eichhorn, Johann Gottfried, 866–867, 1583
Eikonoklastes (Milton), publication, 1245
Eilson, Elling, Lutheranism in America and, 1149
Einhorn, Paul, Latvian hymns and, 1068
Eisenmenger, Johann Andreas, 996
ELCA. See Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
Elders, 1522
Election, 654–658.
 See also Double predestination;
 Predestination
 Augustine on, 518
 Bullinger on, 2084
 in Calvin catechism, 361
 in Canons of Dort, 614
 covenant and, 523
 in Dutch Reformed Church, 622
 Randall on, 771
 Zwingli on, 733, 2083
Electronic Church, 1849–1852.
 See also Televangelism
Electronic words, in evangelism, 715, 717, 719, 725–726
Elements of Moral Science (Wayland), 183
Eliot, Frederick May, Unitarian Renaissance, 52
Eliot, George, 658, 987, 1621
 writings, 1104
Eliot, John, 658–659, 1360
 Bible translation, 248
 missionary work of, 1260, 1280
Eliot, T.S., 659
Elizabethan Settlement of Religion, 335, 365, 660
Elizabeth I, Queen of England, 4, 868, 875, 1027–1028, 1598, 1599
 Book of Common Prayer and, 276
 English church music under, 1330–1331 executions ordered by, 1168 hymns during reign of, 912
 Puritanism during reign of, 1577–1579
Elizabeth I (Elizabeth Tudor), 660–661
 Canterbury Protestantism under, 348
 on church and state, 420
 Reformation under, 432, 668
 Whitgift and, 2007–2008
Elliot, Ralph, Message of Genesis, 197
Ellis, E. Earle, 867
Elmore, Robert, in church institutional realignment, 399
El Salvador
 Lutheranism and, 1143

Protestantism in, 1062
 Ely, Ezra Stiles, 1570
 Ely, Richard, 1592, 1754

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Embury, Philip, 965
 Methodist work by, 1223
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 229, 661–663, 994, 1909
 on Unitarianism, 1928–1929
 Empirical theology, 663–668
Encomium moriae (In Praise of Folly) (Erasmus), 1105
 Engel, Jacob, Brethren in Christ and, 300
 Engels, Friedrich, 486, 1595, 1759–1760
 England, 668–671
 baptismal rites, 163–164
 Baptist churches in, 170
 Bill of Rights in, 899
 Calvinism in, 335
 camp meetings in, 340
 Christian socialism in, 1760–1761
 civil wars in (See Civil War, England)
 deism in, 570–571
 house churches in, 889–890
 industrialization in, 949–951
 Medieval clerical attire in, 1959
 Protestant political parties in, 1507–1508
 Protestant universities in, 867–868
 Puritanism, 192–193
 Reformation in, 1598–1599, 1908
 Romanticism in, 1620
 Salvation Army origins in, 1647
 sectarianism in, 1692–1693
 secularization in, 1702
 seminary education in, 1710
 slavery abolitionist movement and Protestants in, 1742–1743
 Social Gospel in, 1754
 socialism in, 1758–1759
 Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in, 1763
 Society for the Preservation of the Gospel in, 1763
 Socinianism in, 1767–1768
 Sunday School origins in, 1824
 twentieth century theology in, 1875–1879
 Universalism in, 1952
 vernacular prayers, 166
 YMCA origins in, 2069
 YWCA origins in, 2070
 Zwinglianism in, 2085–2086
 English Puritanism, on church and state, 420 English Reformation family in, 740
 of Henry VIII, 420

Enlightenment, 671–674

- Anglicanism in, 66–67
 - authority and, 137–138
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - christology of, 411
 - Church of England in, 433
 - concepts of justification and, 1005–1006
 - confirmation in, 501
 - Cultural Protestantism in, 543
 - Danish churches during, 577
 - democracy and, 576
 - Devil concept in, 586
 - doctrine in, 611
 - Dutch Reformed Church in, 623
 - education and, 648, 651
 - in England, 672
 - on faith, 734
 - family in, 741
 - Freemasonry in, 774–775
 - in Halle, 837–838
 - Hamann and, 838–839
 - Herder and, 861–862
 - Hopkins and, 888
 - influence in South Africa, 1777
 - Jefferson and, 975
 - Judaism and, 997
 - just war concept in, 511–512
 - Kant and, 1010–1012
 - Lutheranism during, 1133–1134
 - medical ethics in, 694
 - in the Netherlands, 334, 1386
 - Nordic, 752
 - in Norway, 1407
 - orthodox Christianity effects of, 1882
 - in Poland, 1503
 - Protestant and Catholic resistance to, 363
 - quietism in, 782–783
 - rationalist tendencies of, 333
 - Remonstrants during, 1605
 - scientism roots in, 1675
 - sectarianism and, 1693–1695
 - Swiss Reformation and, 1839–1840
 - vestments in, 1962
 - witchcraft and, 2017
- Enstrom, Eric, 930
- Enzina, Francisco de, Bible translation by, 247
- Ephrata. See Brethren, Church of
- Ephrata Cloister, 812
- Episcopacy
- of Cambridge Platonists, 339
 - restoration in England, 669
- Episcopal Church.

- See also* Anglicanism
 Catholic cooperation with, 678
 ELCA agreement with, 634, 637 on hymns, 1978
 Scotland, 674–676
 Seabury in, 1687
 synods in, 1841
 United States, 676–680
 views on predestination, 1544
- Episcopal Peace Fellowship, 1449
- Episcopus, Simon, 1604, 1605, 1616
- Epistemic scientism, 1676
- Epistle to the Romans* (Barth), 204
- Erasmus, Desiderius, 807, 1595.
 see also Erasmus of Rotterdam
 Bible translation by, 247
- Erasmus of Rotterdam
 adiaphoristic ideas, 6
 Anabaptism and, 1197
 attack on Luther, 1121–1122
 on education, 642–643
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- influence on Jan Laski, 1059
 on monasticism, 1300
- Erastianism, 419
- Erastus, Thomas (Lüber), 680–681, 1385
- Eritrea, Lutheranism in, 1141
- Ersatzreligion, 1675
- Esch, Johann van, martyrdom of, 1168
- Eschatology, 681–684.
 See also Apocalypticism;
 Chiliasm
 Apocalypticism relation to, 88
 in Church of God, 438
 dispensationalism in, 597
 Dodd on, 1877
 Edwards on, 653
 God of history in, 1881
 Irving and, 960
 Plymouth Brethren on, 550
 published material on, 683, 795
 Schweitzer on, 1667
 sectarianism and, 1696
 tribulationism in, 1915
- Escobar, Samuel, Lausanne Covenant and, 1073
- Esquivel, Adolfo Perez, 1448
- Essay Concerning Human Understanding* (Locke), 1114
- Essay on the Principle of Population* (Malthus), 551–552
- Essence of Christianity* (Feuerbach), 749–750
- Estienne, Robert, Bible publication by, 247

- Estonia, 684–687
 Lutheran reforms, 1130
 Methodism in, 1217
 Protestant political parties in, 1507
- Ethics, 687–693
 abortions, 1 medical, 693–698
 social, 1690, 2065
 vocational, 1966
- Ethics* (Bonhoeffer), 271
- Ethiopia, Lutheranism in, 1141
- Ethiopian* churches, 11
- Ethnicity/race, 698–700
 in United Methodist Church, 1939–1940
 at YMCA/YWCA, 2071–2072
- Eucharist.
see also Lord's Supper
 Colloquy of Marburg and, 1157–1159
- Euro-Asian Federation of Unions of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, 26
- Europe
 religious affiliation statistics in, 2088
 secularization in, 1704
 Unitarians in, 1924–1927
- European Baptist Federation cooperation within, 187
 roots, 185
- Eusebius, martyrology of, 1170
- Euthanasia, 700–701
- Evangelical Alliance, 395, 702, 1364, 1549, 1593, 2050
 denominations and, 583
 in Germany, 714
 Josiah Strong and, 731–732, 1821
- Evangelical and Reformed Church, 702–703
- Evangelical-Augsburg Church, 1504–1505
- Evangelical Christians-Baptists (ECB), Soviet Union, 26
- Evangelical Church in Germany, ecumenical agreements with, 633 in Germany, Friedrich Dibelius and, 592 in United Church of Christ, 1935
 of West Africa, 1823
- Evangelical (Evalgelisch), 701–702
- Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, 346–347
- Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies, member agencies, 1284
- Evangelical Foreign Missions Association, 1348
 formation, 1257
- Evangelical Free Church of America, 703–704
- Evangelicalism, 709–711
 AMA and, 47
 American, 193–194
 American missions and, 1284–1285
 in Australia, 133
 Awakenings in, 139–140

- British foreign missions and, 1263
 - camp meetings in, 340–341
 - in Canada, 345–346
 - in Canterbury, 348
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - denominations and, 581
 - ecumenism in, 635
 - in France, 763–764
 - human rights and, 899
 - hymnody and, 915–916
 - iconography and, 929
 - in Indonesia, 947
 - InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and, 957
 - ministerial education and, 651
 - politics and, 1515–1516
 - preaching and, 1537
 - publications on, 1574
 - of Quakers, 783–784, 1766
 - relation to Anglo-Catholicism, 70
 - of Shakers, 1726–1727
 - of slaves, 1736–1737
 - theology, 711–714
 - in twentieth century Britain, 1876–1877
 - in twentieth century North America, 1883
 - Wesleyanism and, 1992
 - William Wilberforce in, 2010–2011
 - Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA), 45, 46, 704–707
 - divorce in, 606
 - Episcopal Church agreement with, 634, 637
 - formation, 1126, 1135, 1150
 - Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
 - Evangelical Lutheran Church in Russia and Other Countries, 1629
 - Evangelical Lutheran Mission, Harms and, 1274
 - Evangelical Missiological Society, foundation, 1253
 - Evangelical movement, missions, 1256–1257
 - Evangelical Press Association, 1348
 - Evangelical revival, in England, 669
 - Evangelicals, Germany, 714–715
 - Evangelicals, identification of Assemblies of God with, 123
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Evangelicals for Middle East Understanding, 1448–1449
 - Evangelical theology. See Evangelicalism, theology
 - Evangelical Theology Society, 1031, 1348
 - Evangelical United Brethren Church (EUBC), 15, 707–709, 813, 1491.
 - See also* United Methodist Church
 - foundation, 1217
 - Methodism and, 1221
 - United Methodist Church and, 1211
 - Evangelism
 - the AMEZ Church, 21

- overview, 715–726
 - in Salvation Army, 1649–1650
 - by Southern Baptist Convention, 1786–1787
 - urban, 754
 - women in, 2031
- Evangelistic organizations, 726–732
- Evangelists, 723
 - Graham, 832
 - Hastings, 848–849
 - Henry, 860–861
 - McPherson, 954–955
- Evans, Christmas, preaching by, 183
- Everson v. Board of Education* (1947), 1517
- Every Church a Peace Church, 1447
- Every-home campaign visits, 721
- Evolution, 1390
 - fundamentalism and, 793
 - historical acceptance of, 532
 - Samuel Wilberforce on, 2009
- Ewald, J.H. A., 1035
- Examination of the Council of Trent* (Chemnitz), 1131
- Exclusive Brethren, 1499–1500
 - rejection of the clergy, 1056
- Excommunication, Amish, 57
- Exercise, YMCA and, 2071, 2073
- Existentialism, 1021, 1029–1030
 - Heideggerian, 1884
- Expansionism, scientific, 1675
- Explanation of the Creed*, 807
- Explicato* (Erastus), 680
- Eyman, Peter, the Brethren and, 302

- Fabri, Johann, 893
- Fabricius, Johann Philip, 938, 1602
- Fackenheim, Emil, 881
- Faerie Queene* (Spenser), 1100
- Faith, 733–735
 - Barclay on, 781
 - confession of, 494–497
 - reason and, 1862–1863
 - Schleiermacher on, 1658
- Faith and Order movement, 588
 - ecumenism in, 636
- Faith and Values Channel, launch, 1178
- Faith Gospel, sectarianism and, 1700
- Faith healing, 735–738
 - Shakers and, 1726
- Faith missions, 731
- Fall, corruption of human mind by, 1671
- Falwell, Jerry, 738–739, 795, 1518
 - Liberty University of, 1850

- Moral Majority, 1306, 1699
 Reagan election and, 404
 in Southern Protestantism, 1794
 on sports and Protestantism, 1806
- Families of God Pentecostal Group, 11
- Family, 739–743.
See also Marriage
 patriarchal, 471
 in Unification Church, 1923
- Family values, 370–371
 Christian Right in, 403
 sexuality and, 1725
- Faraday, Michael, 743–744
- Farel, Guillaume, 332, 744–745, 1596, 1597
- Farel, William, in Geneva, 329
- Farquhar, John Nicol, 940–941
- Fasting, 1418
 Zwingli on, 2081
- Fedde, Elizabeth, Lutheran deaconess movement, 46
- Federal Communications Commission, Mayflower Decision, 1176
- Federal Council of Churches, 1348, 1353, 1354, 1549, 1593. see National Council of Churches
- Federal theology, 473
 in congregationalism, 508
 covenant n, 524
- Feet, washing of, in Church of God in Christ, 440
- Feige, Johann, Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
- Feldmanis, Roberts, Latvian National Church and, 1069
- Felgenhauer, Paul, 746, 1483
- Felinus, Aretius. see Bucer, Martin
- Fellowship Movement, 714
- Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches, formation of, 304
- Fellowship of Missions, formation, 1257
- Fellowship of Reconciliation, 1439, 1446–1448. See Peace organizations
- Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 746–747
- Female Moral Reform Society, 1571
- Feminist theology, 801–802, 817, 1031, 1869–1872
 ecclesiology and, 629
 ecology and, 630–631
 Harkness and, 843–844
 in North America, 1885
 soteriology in, 1646
 views on prostitution, 1571
 womanist theology and, 2026–2028
 women clergy and, 2034
- Feminization, 803
- Ferdinand II, Austria, confessional phase of absolutism, 2
- Fessenden, Reginald, broadcasts by, 1176
- Festivals, 874–877
- Fetal development, abortion and, 1–2
- Fetish, sexual, 1724
- Fetter Lane Society, Moravian Church and, 1310
- Feuerbach, Ludwig, 747–750, 854, 1381, 1621

- Liberal Protestantism and, 1089
 translation by Eliot, 1104
Few Sighs in Hell (Bunyan), 320
Fides quaerens Intellectum (Barth), 204
Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
Fifteen Articles, 849
Fifteen Sermons (Butler), 322
 Fifth Monarchy Men, 682
 Financial scandals, of televangelists, 1850–1851
 Finland, 751–754
 confessional revival, 1134
 Reformation in, 1600
 Finley, Robert, 754
 founder of ACS, 42
Finnegans Wake (Joyce), God and freedom in, 1289
 Finney, Charles
 missionary work of, 1280
 role of the laity and, 1052
 Finney, Charles Grandison, 754, 870, 899, 1353, 1544, 1547 evangelicalism methods of, 709
 Holiness Movement and, 877
 preaching of, 1537–1538
 radio revivals and, 1849
 revival meetings of, 1610
 Fiore, Joachim of, apocalyptic millennialism and, 1236
 Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schüssler, 990, 1869–1870
 First African Baptist, Savannah, Georgia, 13
 First Amendment. See Bill of Rights
 First Bryan Baptist, Savannah, Georgia, 13
 First Great Awakening, 1610
 Fischart, Johann, writings, 1106
 Fisher, Geoffrey Francis, 755
 Fisk, Wilbur, 755
 Fisk Jubilee Singers, gospel music and, 1343
 Five Points of Calvinism, 334
 Five Points of Fundamentalism, 792
 Flacius, Matthias, 824, 825, 855
 Augsburg Interim and, 1138
 German Lutheranism and, 1131
 martyrology, 1171
 Flacius, Matthias Illyricus, 755–756
 on doctrinal authority of scripture, 608
 Flaminio, Marcantonio, 961
 Flavel, John, 929–930
 Husbandry Spiritualized, 219
 Fliedner, Theodore, deaconess movement and, 562
 Flood, Noah's, 532
 Flower, Roswell, 1457
 Folk hymns, 916
 Folk poetry, in Germany, 1109

- Fontainebleau, Edict of, 1347
 Fontane, Theodor, writings, 1110
 Fontanini, Benedetto, 962
 Footwashing, 745
 Ford, Leighton, Lausanne Covenant and, 1073
 Fore, William F., on media and communications, 1179
 Foreign Mission Baptist Convention, foundation, 197
 Foreign Mission Conference of North America, John Mott and, 1319
 Foreign Mission Convention of the United States, 1351
 Formosa, Christian presence on, 1844
 Formula of Concord, 607–608, 1423, 1428, 1542, 1562, 2060 composition, 281–283
 on election, 655–656
 Forsyth, Peter Taylor, 756–758, 864
 christology of, 414
 Forty-Two Articles of Religion, 1599, 1886–1887
 Fosdick, Harry Emerson, 758–759, 918 on fundamentalism, 793
 preaching by, 1538, 1540
Foulard, in French schools, 765–766
 Fontainebleau, Edict of, 756
 Fourah Bay Institution, 540
 Foursquare Churches, 954–955
 Foursquare Gospel, McPherson and, 1190
 Fowler, Edward, Latitudinarianism and, 1064
 Fox, George, 759–762
 on Catholicism, 780
 pacifism of, 1438
 on Quaker beliefs, 779–780
 Society of Friends foundation by, 601, 1764–1765
 Foxe, John, 4, 762–763, 1578, 1579, 1599
 martyrology, 1171
 France, 763–766
 AFSC work in, 43
 antislavery movement in, 1740–1741
 Calvinism in, 333
 deism in, 571
 Edict of Nantes in, 1345–1348
 Enlightenment in, 671–672
 medical ethics in, 694
 Methodism in, 1216, 1218, 1219
 monasticism in, 1299
 nationalism in, 1356, 1357
 Reformation in, 1598
 réveil in, 1609
 Romanticism in, 1620–1621
 socialism in, 1759
 Francescon, Fuigi, 964
 Franciscanism, Spiritual, apocalyptic millennialism and, 1236
 Francis of Assisi, Saint, 1026, 1634
 Franck, Sebastian, 766
 on Spiritualism, 1801

- on toleration, 1897
- Francke, August Hermann, 766–767, 814, 837–838, 898, 915, 1028, 1485, 1488, 1609
 - assignment of missionaries by, 1273
 - on education, 644
 - on fallen nature of children, 380
 - influence on Bengel, 214
 - missionary activity and, 1260
 - Pietism and, 1133, 1139
 - role of the laity, 1051
 - seminary education and, 1710
 - Wolff opposition to, 2025
- Franklin, Benjamin
 - on deism, 572
 - writings, 1103
- Franz, Frederick W., 979–980
- Fraternalism, Freemasonry and, 775–775
- Frederick IV of Denmark, missionary activity and, 1260
- Frederick the Great, Moravian Church and, 1310
- Free African Society of Philadelphia, 13
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Free Church, 601, 767–768, 1404
 - funerary rites in, 797
 - in Poland, 1505
 - prayer in, 1533
 - in Scotland, 372, 1551, 1683–1684
- Free Church Federal Council, 769
- Freedom of a Christian* (Luther), 683, 1053
- Freedom of Religion. See Bill of Rights
- Free labor ideology, of economics, 1741
- Freeman, Thomas Birch, 774, 818
- Freemasonry, 774–776
 - Christian Reformed Church rejection of, 620–621
 - on Enlightenment, 671, 2080
 - Evangelical United Brethren Church and, 708
 - in United States, 672
- Free Methodist Church, formation, 1224
- Free Methodist Church of America, 769–770
- Free Religion Association (FRA), radical Unitarians, 52
- Free Religious Association, Lucretia Mott and, 1320
- Free Soil Party, 1744
- Free Wesleyan Church of Tonga, membership, 1222
- Free will
 - devil and, 585
 - in Dutch Reformed Church, 619
 - Hobbes's views on, 872
 - John Smyth on, 1751
 - Mennonites on, 1751
 - in Wesleyanism, 1990, 1993–1994
- Free Will Baptists, 770–774, 806, 1461
 - Benjamin Randall and, 171

- formation, 172
- history of, 173–174
- sectarianism in, 1695
- Fregoso, Federigo, 961
- Frelinghuysen, Theodorus, 1601
- French Baptist Federation, foundation, 185
- French Confession, 496
- French Confession of Faith, 333
- French Huguenots, 895–898
- French Revolution, 776–778, 898, 1357
 - Dutch Reformed Church after, 623–624
 - Freemasonry in, 775
 - Protestantism in, 764
 - religious activities by laymen and, 155
 - secularization and, 1704
 - South African effects of, 1777
- French Wars of Religion, 1598
- Freud, Sigmund, 998–1000, 1381
- Freylinghausen, Johann Anastasius, 915
- Freytag, Walter, theological studies, 1277–1278
- Fridesleven, Conrad Trew von. see Bucer, Martin
- Friedrich Wilhelm III, 1572
- Friends, Society of, 779–784
 - architecture, 90–91
 - beliefs of, 1693
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - in Caribbean, 354
 - in Colonial America, 1941
 - as dissent movement, 601
 - Fox as founder of, 759–760
 - Jones and, 993–994
 - millennialism and, 1239
 - on morality of slavery, 1739
 - in North America, 1764–1766
 - Oliver Cromwell on, 536–537
 - pacifism of, 510, 1438–1439
 - Penn and, 1451
 - philanthropic activity of, 1475
 - philo-Semitism of, 1483
 - prayer and, 1533
 - sacrament elimination in, 1638
 - on sexuality, 1721
 - on slavery abolition, 1742–1743
 - values of, 327
 - Williams rejection of, 2014
 - women clergy in, 2036
- Friends Committee on National Legislation, 1449
- Friends General Conference, 778
- Friends Missionary Prayer Band, 939
- Friends National Service Committee, 42
- Friends World Committee for Consultation, 778
- Frisch, Max, writings, 1111

- Frischlin, Philipp Nicodemus, plays of, 1106
- Frontier Church, architecture, 91
- Frontier religion, 784–786, 1944–1945
vestments in, 1963
- Froude, Richard Hurrell, 917, 1429–1431
- Fry, Elizabeth Gurney, 786, 786
- Fry, Franklin Clark
Lutheran Church in America and, 1126
Lutheran World Federation and, 1150
- Frye, Northrop, biblical influence on, 231
- Fuchs, Ernst, 989
- Fulkerson, Mary McClintock, liberation theology and, 1092
- Fuller, Andrew beliefs, 182
evangelical views, 177
theology, 1264
- Fuller, Daniel, 1031
- Fuller, Joseph Jackson, missionary work, 177
- Fuller, Margaret, 789–790
- Fuller, Richard, on slavery, 171
- Fuller, W.E., 956
- Fuller Theological Seminary, foundation, 1252
- Full Gospel Business Men's Association, 1614
- Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship, 786–789
- Full Gospel Businessmen's Fellowship International, 1464
- Fulton, E.J., 1457
- Fundamentalism, 790–795
American missions and, 1283
Baptist, 172
beliefs in, 709–710
British house churches and, 889
doctrine in, 612
evangelical theology and, 711
on faith, 734
Fallwell on, 738
family and, 742–742
on Freemasonry, 776
image of, 169
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Independent Fundamentalist Churches, 935–936
- Mormonism and, 1314
- National Association of Evangelicals and, 1348
- sectarianism in, 1691, 1698–1700
- secularization and, 1705
- sexuality and, 1724–1725
- in Southern Protestantism, 1793–1794
- in twentieth century, 1879–1880
- in twentieth century North America, 1883
- vs. restorationism, 1608
- Wesleyan Church on, 1990

- William Jennings Bryan and, 311–312
Fundamental Principles, in Seventh-Day Adventist theology, 1716
Fundament of Christian Life (Menno), 1196
 Funerary rites, 796–798, 1418
 Funk, Robert, 990
 Funk, Ulrich, Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 Fürecker, Christofer, Latvian hymns and, 1068
 Furly, Benjamin, 1605
 Furman, Richard, on slaveholding, 196
- Gaebelein, A.C., Sea Cliff Bible Conference and, 239
 Gallican Confession, 799, 1598, 1841 of 1559, Belgic Confession and, 213
 Gallicanism, absolutism and, 3
 Gallus, Nikolaus, 799–800, 825
 Galphin, Jesse, ministry, 194
 Gandhi, Mohandas K., 1783 on Christian conversions, 1180
 Gano, John, ministry, 193
 Gardiner, William, 916
 Garrison, William Lloyd, 1439
 on slavery abolition, 1743
 Garrison, Winfred, 800
 Gassendi, Pierre, 871
 Gassmann, Günther, Lutheran ecumenical movement and, 1136
 Gaussen, Louis, 1609
 Gaustad, Edwin, 1575
 Gay Christians, 882–885
 Gee, Donald, 1455
 Gellert, Christian Fürchtegott, writings, 1108
 Gellner, Ernest, 1356
 Gender, 801–804
 homosexuality and, 882–885
 household codes and, 1164–1165
 liberation theology and, 1090, 1091
 machismo and poor women, 1062
 Margaret Fuller on, 790
 role of the laity and, 1054
 General Association of Regular Baptists, 804–805
 formation, 172, 180
 formation of, 169
 General Baptists, 770–771, 805–807
 American (see American Baptist Churches (ABC-USA))
 understanding of atonement, 188
 General Baptists (Arminians), beliefs, 170, 185
 General Protestant Missionary Society, in China, 1275
Genesis Flood (Whitcomb and Morris), 532
 Geneva
 Calvin in, 329–331
 church discipline in, 424–425
 Declaration of, 695

- as printing center, 331
- Geneva Academy, 867
- Geneva Bible*, 247, 807, 867, 1444, 1578
- Geneva Catechism, 497, 807–809, 855
- Geneva consistory, 515
- Geneva gown, 1963
- Genischen, Hans-Werner, on missions, 1278
- George, David, 809
 - missionary efforts, 1254
- George, Henry, 1592
- George Stefan, writings, 1111
- Georgia Test Case*, 171
- Gereformeerde Kerk. See Dutch Reformed Church
- Gerhard, Johann, 1486, 1534
 - Lutheranism and, 1138
 - writings, 1131
- Gerhardt, Paul, 809–810, 915, 1486
 - Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
 - songs of, 1106
- German Baptist Brethren, 811
 - size of, 303
- German Catechism*, 807
- German Catholics, 813
- German Christians, 810–811, 827
 - Barmen Declaration and, 497, 611
 - on church and state, 421
 - ethnicity and, 699
 - Holocaust and, 880–881
 - Nazi support by, 488–489, 497, 1873, 1903
 - Protestant folk church and, 1140
 - support of Hitler by, 488–489, 497, 1873, 1904
- German Democratic Republic, Protestantism and, 1904–1905
- German Evangelical Missionary Council (Deutscher Evangelischer Missionsrat), 1277
- German Evangelicals, in United Church of Christ, 1935
- German groups in America, 811–813
- German philosophy, Wolff contribution to, 2025
- German Reformed Church, 812–813
 - in United Church of Christ, 1934–1935
- Germany, 813–818
 - AFSC work in, 43
 - Baptists in, 186
 - Barmen Declaration, 199–201
 - Calvinism in, 334
 - civil divorce laws in, 603
 - deism in, 571–572
 - education system in, 641
 - Enlightenment in, 673
 - fifteenth century, 153
 - Halle, 837–838
 - Herrnhut, 864–865
 - literature of, 1105–1111
 - Lutheran church moral influence in, 576

medical ethics in, 694
 Methodism in, 1216–1217, 1218, 1219
 nationalism in, 1356–1358, 1816

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

pietism in, 577, 1485–1492
 political theology in, 1508, 1881
 Protestant universities in, 867
 Reformation in, 1595–1596, 1617
 revivals in, 1889
 Romanticism in, 1620, 1622
 salon society in, 1657
 seminary education in, 1709
 socialism in, 1759–1760
 Thuringia, 153

Gerstenberg, Heinrich Wilhelm von, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
Geystliches gesangk Büchlein (Spiritual Song Book) (Walter), 1105

Ghana, 818–819

Basel Mission in, 206
 Oppong in, 1422
 Reindorf in, 1603–1604

Gibbons, Orlando, compositions by, 1331

Gideons International, 819–820

Gilbert, Nathaniel, background, 1220
 Gill, John, Cause of God and Truth, 182
 Gladden, Washington, 820–822, 1475, 1753
 Gladstone, William Ewart, 822, 1570
Glasnost, freedoms granted under, 26

Glastonbury, England, 1913

Globalism, education and, 649

Globalization of non-Protestant faiths, 1810 of Protestantism, 1774–1775, 1810

Global Praise Project, 1336

Glorious Revolution, 328, 822–824, 1551

sectarianism in, 1693

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge founding in, 1762–1763

Glossolalia, 1901–1902. See Tongues, speaking in Glück, Ernst, Bible translation by, 1068

Gnadenhütten, 785

Gnesio-Lutherans, 756, 824–826, 1542

Amsdorf, Nikolous von, 60
 views of, 1138

Wittenberg heritage and, 281

Gnomen Novi Testamenti (Bengel), 214

Gnosis, 1390

Gnosticism, salvation and, 1643

Gobat, Samuel, 1608

Goble, Jonathan, 972

God

death of, 565–567

- self-restriction of, 713
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 826–827, 1000
 - influences on, 1108
 - Lessing and, 1082
- Goeze, Johann Melchior, Lessing and, 1081
- Gogarten, Friedrich, 827–828, 1029, 1378
- Göhre, Paul, 951
- Goldberg Variations (Bach), 156
- Gomar, Franz, 828, 1385, 1604
- Gomarians, 828–829
 - vs. Remonstrants, 1604–1605
- González, Justo, liberation theology and, 1091
- Good News Bible*
 - ABS, 38
 - publication of, 245
- Goodspeed, Edgar Johnson, 829–830
- Goodwin, Martha, witchcraze and, 1181
- Good works, Formula of Concord and, 282
- Gorbachev, freedoms granted under, 26
- Gordon, Adoniram Judson, 830
 - Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Gordon, George A., 1589
- Goreh, Nehemiah, 940
- Gospel, Social. See Social Gospel
- Gospel hymnody, 918
- Gospel Hymns and Sacred Songs* (Bliss), 262
- Gospel liberty, 1696
- Gospel Mission Care movement, 520
- Gospel music, 14
 - impact of, 1343
- Gospel Trumpet*, 438
- Gossner Society, in Indonesia, 1275
- Gotthelf, Jeremias, poetry of, 1110
- Göttingen Dogmatics* (Barth), 204
- Gottsched, Johann Christoph, writings, 1108
- Goulart, Simon, martyrology, 1171
- Govertsz, Joost, martyrology, 1172
- Grabau, J.A. A., The Missouri Synod and, 1125
- Grabbe, Dietrich, writings, 1110
- Grace, 830–832
 - in Canons of Dort, 614
 - in covenant theology, 473, 523, 525–527
 - sacraments and, 1638
 - in Seventh-Day Adventist theology, 1715
 - in Wesleyanism, 1993–1994
- Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners* (Bunyan), 319
- Grace d'Alès, Edict of, 1347
- Graf-Welhausen Documentary Hypothesis, of biblical study, 236
- Graham, Billy, 731, 795, 832–833, 1348, 1610
 - crusades of, 1850
 - evangelist movement and, 1073
 - Lausanne Committee for World Evangelism foundation, 1257

preaching by, 1540, 1541
 sectarianism and, 1699
 seeker churches and, 1709
 on sports and Christianity, 1806 television broadcasting, 1177–1178 volunteers in, 1969
 in Youth for Christ, 2076

Grant, Charles, 938

Grant, Jacquelyn

AME Church, 21

White Woman's Christ and the Black Woman's Jesus, 259–260

Graul, Karl, on missions, 1249

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Graves, James R., American Baptist Convention and, 173

Gray, Asa, on Darwinism and God, 552–553

Gray, James, Moody Bible Institute and, 236

Great Awakening, 139–150, 1547.

See also Awakenings

African slaves, 12

Evangelical Revival in Britain and, 140

second, 143–144

Great Bible, 247

Greatest Thing in the World (Drummond), 615

Great Tew circle, 1974

Great Tew group, Latitudinarianism and, 1064

Grebel, Conrad, 833–834, 1437, 1596

Anabaptism and, 1197

on baptism, 164

Greece, Baptist Union in, 186

Greek mystery religions, salvation in, 1643

Green, Fred Pratt, 918

hymns by, 1214–1215

Gregor, Christian, Moravian Church and, 1311

Gregorian Reform, clergy in, 466

Gregory, Pope, on culture and Christianity, 545

Gregory of Nyssa, on salvation, 1644–1645

Grenfell, George, missionary work, 178

Grief, funerary rites and, 798

Griffith, Benjamin, 1351

Grill, Filippo, 964

Grimm, Jacob Ludwig Karl, tales by, 1109

Grimm, Wilhelm Karl, tales by, 1109

Grimmelshausen, Hans Jakob Christoph von, writings, 1107

Grinbergs, Teodors, Latvian National Church and, 1069

Grindal, Edmund, 4, 868

Großgebauer, Theophil, 1486

Gropper, Johannes, Bucer and, 313

Grotius, Hugo, 1028, 1367, 1386

Groves, Anthony Norris, 1499

Grubb, Edward, 1439

- Gruber, Eberhard Ludwig, founder of Community of True Inspiration, 33
- Grundtvig, Nicolaj Frederick, 834
 confessional revival, 1134
 Danish Protestantism and, 577–578
 Kierkegaard and, 1146
- Gryphius, Andreas, writings, 1107
- Guatemala
 Lutheranism and, 1143
 Protestantism in, 1061
- Guideposts*, 1450
- Guide to Holiness*, 877
- Guizot, François, 1609
- Gundert, Hermann, research by, 1276
- Gunnarson, Gunnar, biblical influence on, 231
- Gunning, J.H., Jr., 1387
- Günther, Johann Christian, writings, 1108
- Gurneyite Quakers, 1765–1766
- Gustavus Adolphus (Sweden), 835–836, 1607
 Latvian rule by, 1068
- Gutiérrez, Gustavo, 1030
 liberation theology and, 1090, 1092
- Guttmann, Bruno, 934
- Gützlaff, Karl, 396, 1036
 mission to China, 1274
- Habsburg-Valois Wars, 1596
- Hackett, Maria, musical reform movement and, 1333
- Haeckel, Ernst, on Darwinism, 553
- Haemstede, Adriaan Corneliszoon van, martyrology, 1171
- Hagedorn, Friedrich von, writings, 1108
- Halbe, Max, writings, 1110
- Haldane, James, on plurality of elders, 183
- Haldane, Robert, on plurality of elders, 183
- Haldanites, 185
- Hale, Edward Everett, 1589
- Hales, John, Latitudinarianism and, 1064
- Hallart, Magdalen von, Brethren Movement and, 1069
- Halle, University of, missionary activity and, 1260
- Halle (Germany), 837–838
- Hallesby, Ole Kristian, 1411
 opposition to Nazism, 1146
- Hamann, Johann Georg, 838–839, 862
 influence on Goethe, 1108
- Hamarkjold, Dag, as saint, 1642
- Hamilton, William, on death of God, 566
- Hampden, R.D., 1430, 1432
- Handel, George Frideric, 839–843
 compositions by, 1332
 “Messiah” by, 721
- Handmaid’s Tale* (Atwood), 229
- Hands, imposition of, in confirmation, 503

- Happel, Eberhard Werner, writings, 1107
- Hardcastle, Thomas, imprisonment, 182
- Hardwick, Charles, influence on James Legge, 1076
- Harford Seminary, foundation, 1252
- Hargis, Billy James, attach on Fred Cook, 1177
- Harkie, Keir, 950
- Harkness, Georgia, 843–844, 1381
- Harlan, John Marshall, 1548
- Harless, Gottlieb Christoph Adolf, confessional revival, 1134
- Harling, Per
 - as animateur, 1335
 - song collections, 1336
- Harmony Society, 1491
- Harms, Claus
 - arguments by, 1139
 - confessional revival, 1134
- Harms, Ludwig
 - confessional revival, 1134
 - Hermannsburg Mission Society and, 1274
- Harms, Theodor, confessional revival, 1134
- Harnack, Adolf von, 844–847, 878, 1428, 1587
 - influence on Karl Barth, 203
 - Liberal Protestantism and, 1086, 1087, 1089
 - liberal Protestantism of, 1879
 - theology of, 1139
- Harris, Catherine, 14
- Harris, Howell, influence in Wales, 1212
- Harris, Samuel, 1364
- Harris, William Wadé, 818, 847–848, 1422
 - opposition to Americo-Liberian rule, 1096
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Harsdörfer, Georg Philipp, writings, 1107
- Hart, Julius, writings, 1110
- Hart, Oliver, Charleston Association and, 193
- Hartshorne, Charles, 848, 1567
- Harvard University
 - founding of, 234
 - history of, 478, 651
- Harvey, A.E., 990
- Hassinen, Leino, 1629
- Hastings, Lady Selina, 848–849
- Hastings, Thomas, 916
 - on music, 1328
- Hauerwas, Stanley, views on natural law, 1368
- Hauge, Hans Nielsen, 849, 1409, 1491
 - imprisonment of, 1145
 - Pietism in Norway, 1133
- Haugianism, 849
- Hauptmann, Gerhart
 - biblical influence on, 231

- writings, 1110
- Haury, Samuel S., missionary work of, 1204
- Haury, Susie K., missionary work of, 1204
- Hausa language, Schön and, 1664–1665
- Hauser, Joseph, Moravian Hutterites and, 1198
- Havergal, Frances Ridley, 1017
- Hawkins, Edler, 1549
- Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 229, 1581
- Hayes, Carlton J., 1356
- Hayes, James, 1361–1362
- Hayford, Jack, 955
- Hayford, Joseph Ephraim Casely, 849–850
- Haywood, Garfield Thomas, 1452
- Healing
 - divine, 735–736
 - faith and, 737
 - mental, 736
 - in Pentecostalism, 735
 - rejection of worldly medicine in, 736–737
 - shamanism in, 735–736
- Health, Seventh-Day Adventists and, 1717
- Heaven and hell, 850–851
- Hebbel, Christian Friedrich, writings, 1110
- Heber, Reginold, 938
- Hebrew Bible, Masoretic markings in, 351
- Heck, Barbara, Methodist work by, 1223
- Hedberg, Fredrick Gabriel, confessional revival, 1134
- Hedge, Frederic Henry, Transcendentalist, 52
- Hearing, G.J., 1606
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 826, 839, 851–854, 994, 1020, 1029, 1378, 1567, 1612, 1625
 - christology of, 413
 - on death of God, 565
 - on education, 645
 - Feuerbach on, 748–749
 - on Lutheranism, 1139
 - Schelling as alternative to, 1655
 - views on natural law, 1367
 - Zeitgeist*, 110
- Hegelianism, in Life of Jesus, Critically Examined (Strauss), 1818–1821
- Heidegger, Martin, 1029, 1530–1531
- Heideggerian existentialism, 1884
- Heidelberg Catechism, 334, 361–362, 497, 1384, 1423, 1549, 1550, 1552, 1601
 - of 1563, 808–809, 812–813, 854–856, 903
 - Althusius, Johannes, coauthor, 31
 - on covenant, 524–525
 - doctrinal authority of, 609
 - in Dutch Reformed Church, 619, 622
 - United Church of Christ and, 1934
- Heifer Project, popularity of, 303
- Heine, Heinrich
 - biblical influence, 231
 - conversion of, 1109

- writings, 1110
- Heinrich, Dichter, writings, 1110
- Hell, 850–851
- Helsinki, Declaration of, 695
- Helvetic Confession, 335, 856–857, 902, 1549, 1550, 1552, 1617, 1838–1839
 contents of, 496
- Helvetic Consensus Formula, 332–333
- Helwys, Thomas, 1751
 on adult baptism, 169
 General Baptists and, 181
- Hemenway, Mary, 1589
- Hemmingsen, Niels, dismissal, 1145
- Henkel Family, Lutheranism, 46
- Henry, Carl F.H., 860–861, 1468
 in evangelical theology, 711–712
- Henry, Patrick, support for teachers, 1156
- Henry IV of France, 1598
- Henry of Navarre (Henry IV), Calvinism under, 333
- Henry VI, 896
- Henry VIII, King of England, 857–860, 868, 875, 1495, 1598–1599.
See also Thirty-nine Articles of Religion
Book of Common Prayer and, 273 break with Rome, 430, 538
 on celibate clergy, 370
 Convocations of Canterbury and York under, 349 divorce of, 603
 English Reformation and, 420, 668 execution of dissidents, 1168
 hymns during reign of, 911
 Robert Barnes and, 201–202
 Thomas Cromwell and, 537–538 wives of, 528–529, 537
- Henschel, Milton G., 980
- Hensel, Luise, Romanticism and, 1109
- Hepburn, James C., 972
- Herbert, Edward Lord, five common notions of, 568, 570
- Herbert, George, 861, 1534
 Anglican spirituality, 67–68
 themes, 1101
- Herbert of Cherbury, Latitudinarianism and, 1064
- Herder, Johann Gottfried, 826, 861–862
 on education, 644
 influence on Goethe, 1108
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Heresy, 862–864
 Hobbes and, 873
 Hutchinson and, 904–905
 Irving and, 960
- Heretics, prosecution of, 1168
- Hermannsburg Mission Society

- in America, 1275
- Harms and, 1274
- Herrenhut community, Moravian Church and, 1310
- Herrmann, Wilhelm, influence on Karl Barth, 203
- Herrnhut (Germany), 864–865
 - origins of, 2078–2079
- Herzog, Frederick, 1509
 - Civil Rights Movement and, 1090
 - liberation theology and, 1092
- Heshusius, Tilemann, 855
- Hesse, Hermann, writings, 1111
- Heyne, Christian Gottlob, 866
- Hickey, James, missionary work, 1230
- Hicks, Edward, 865
- Hicksite Friends, 1765
- Hidalgo, Miguel, populist revolt, 1230
- Hidden words, in evangelism, 715–716, 718, 720
- Higginbottom, Sam, 1555
- Higher Christian Life*, 870, 877, 1016
- Higher Criticism, 866–867, 1415, 1537
 - Kant and, 1010–1012
- Higher education, 867–870
 - ELCA on, 704
 - in nineteenth century America, 1845, 2031
 - in theology, 650–653
 - for women, 2031
- Higher Life Movement, 870–871, 877, 1016, 1902
 - Pentecostalism and, 1453, 1454, 1457
- Higher self, 1390
- Hill, E.V., 1352
- Hill, Grace Livingstone, themes of, 1104
- Hill, Karl, 827
- Hill, Samuel, 819
- Himes, Joshua V., millennialism and, 1242
- Hinduism, in movies, 1321
- Hinn, Benny, 1850
- Hippocratic oath, 693–694
- Historical critical method
 - of Bible study, 1819
 - in theological disciplines, 1711–1712
- History of New England* (Backus), 157
- History of the English Church* (Bede), 430
- History of the Jews*, 5
- Hitler, Adolf, 879
 - Confessing Church and, 488–491
 - German Christian Church and, 488–489, 497, 1873.1903–0904
 - National (Reich) Evangelical Church and, 199
 - Protestant folk church and, 1140
- Hobbes, Thomas, 871–873
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1064
- Hobsbawm, Eric, 1356
- Hochmann von Hochenau, Ernst Christoph, 1490

- Hocking, William E., 1041, 1553
- Hodge, A.A., on biblical inspiration, 224
- Hodge, Charles, 1548
 on Darwinism, 553, 790
 Mercersburg theology and, 1205
 views on predestination, 1544
- Hoebel, E.A., on culture, 544–545
- Hoenderdaal, G.J., 1606
- Hoffman, Ernst Theodor Amadeus, works of, 1109
- Hoffmann, Christoph, Jerusalem Union and, 1275
- Hoffmann, Nelly, marriage to Karl Barth, 203
- Höfling, Johann Friedrich Wilhelm, confessional revival, 1134
- Hofmann, Melchior, 873, 1383, 1624
 Anabaptism and, 61
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 Dutch Anabaptism and, 1198
 millennialism and, 1238–1239
- Hofmannsthal, Hugo von, writings, 1111
- Hofmannswaldau, Christian Hofmann von, writings, 1107
- Hogg, Alfred George, 941
- Hogg, James, 873–874
- Hohenheim, Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus von, 1442–1443
- Hölderlin, Johann Christian Friedrich, writings, 1109
- Holidays and festivals, 874–877
 pre-Reformation songs of, 908
- Holiman, Ezekiel, conversion of Roger Williams, 192
- Holiness Movement, 14, 877–878, 1016
 British missions and, 1268–1269
 Church of God in Christ and, 439–441
 Church of the Nazarene and, 447
 evangelicalism from, 710
 on faith, 734
 fundamentalism and, 791
 ministerial education in, 652
 music and, 1343–1344
 Palmer in, 1440–1441
 Pentecostalism and, 1453, 1454, 1457, 1458
 Pentecostalism roots in, 342
 Phoebe Palmer and, 1225
 sectarianism and, 1698
 serpent handlers in, 1712
 Simpson in, 395 styles of, 451
 teachings of, 438
- Holiness of church, 417
- Holiness theology, in Salvation Army, 1648
- Holism, 1390
- Holl, Karl, 878–879, 1595
- Holmes, John Haynes, 1484
- Holmes, Obadiah, punishment of, 192
- Holocaust, 879–881, 997, 1874, 1897, 1904

literature of, 1291
 nativism and, 1365

Holsinger, Henry, Church of the Brethren and, 303

Hölty, Heinrich Christoph, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108

Hölty, Ludwig Heinrich Christoph, writings, 1110

Holy Communion. See Lord's Supper

Holy days, 874–875

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Holy Land, tours of, 1912–1913

Holy rollers, 1900

Holy Roman Empire

absolutism and, 3

confessionalization in, 498–499

witch executions in, 2019

Holy Spirit

baptism with, 1459–1460

transformation by, 1639

Holy War, 1976

Holy War (Bunyan), 228

Holz, Arno, writings, 1110

Home Rule, in Ulster, 1922

Homeschooling, 649, 881–882

by Jesus Movement groups, 985

Homiletics. See Preaching

Homosexuality, 882–885, 900, 1031

death penalty for, 421

as deviance, 1725

liberal Protestants on, 1719

ordination of, 346, 469, 679, 1931

as romantic nondeviant friendships, 1724 same-sex marriages and, 1163–1164 in United Methodist Church caucuses, 1939–1940

in YMCA, 2070–2071

Honduras, Lutheranism and, 1143

Hong Kong, Lutheranism in, 1143

Hoodoo, 1738

Hoof, Willem Adolph Visser't, 1379, 1388

Hoogerbeets, Rombout, 1605

Hooker, Richard, 885–887, 1599, 1974

Anglican spirituality, 67–68

Latitudinarianism and, 1064

on the Lord's Supper, 1118

on tradition, 1908

view of justification, 1004

views on natural law, 1366

views on predestination, 1544

Hooker, Thomas, 887–888

Hooper, John, execution of, 1168

Hooykaas, R., 1370

Hope, Christian, mission to Denmark, 303

- Hope, Mary, mission to Denmark, 303
- Hopkins, Dwight N., liberation theology and, 1091
- Hopkins, Evan, 1017
- Hopkins, John, 911–913
- Hopkins, Mark, President, ABCFM, 41
- Hopkins, Samuel, 888–889
 on missions, 1250
 role of the laity and, 1052
- Horn, Johann, 908
- Hort, F.A., 994
- Hort, F.J. A., influence on Lightfoot, 1097
- Hosier, Harry, preaching by, 255
- Ho Tsun-Sheen, James Legge and, 1076
- Hottentots, van der Kemp ministry to, 1955
- Hour of Power, 1850–1851
- House churches
 British, 889–890
 international, 890
- Household codes, 1164
- Household prayer, 1534
- Houteff, Victor, Branch Davidians and, 293
- Howell, Vernon, Branch Davidians and, 293
- How to Bring Men to Christ* (Torrey), in biblical study, 237
- How to Reach the Masses with the Gospel* (Booth), 287
- Hromádka, Josef Lukl, 891
- Huber, Samuel, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Hubmaier, Balthasar, 891–894
 on baptism, 164–165
- Huddleston, Trevor, 894–895
 Anglo-Catholic, 71–72
- Hugh Bourne's Primitive Methodist Church, 1694
- Hughes, Arthur, 1546
- Hughes, Charles Evans, Freewill Baptist churches and, 172
- Hughes, Hugh Price, 1403
- Hughes, John, 1363–1364
- Hughes, Sarah Ann, AME Church and gender issues, 21
- Huguenots, 881, 895–898, 962, 1500, 1598
 in Caribbean, 354
 covenant and, 527
 democracy and, 575
 in Enlightenment, 673 on French Revolution, 776 massacre of, 333, 1168
 rallying of, 765 religious freedom in Denmark, 580
 in South Africa, 1777–1778
 St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre of, 1598
- Humanism
 education in, 642–643
 in German literature, 1105
 Melanchthon and, 1193
- Humanist, Zwingli as, 2081

- Humanity, religion of, 1675
 Human rights, 898–900, 1031
 Hume, David, 900–901, 1551
 on deism, 571
 on Devil, 586
 on empiricism, 663–664
 impact of Joseph Butler on, 232
 Hungary, 901–904, 1617–1619
 Baptist Union in, 186
 Calvinism in, 334–335
 Lutheran reforms, 1130
 Methodism in, 1217
 Unitarians in, 1925–1926
 Hunnius, Aegidius, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
 Hunt, William Holman, 929–930, 1545, 1546
 Hurgronje, Christiaan Snouck, 1041
 Huria Kristen Batak Protestant. see Batak Protestant Christian Church of Indonesia Hus, Jan, 908
 martyrdom of, 1167
Husbandry Spiritualized (Flavel), 219
 Huszár, Dávid, 903
 Hutchinson, Anne, 888, 904–905, 1581, 2030
 Hutchinson, John, work in Tonga, 1222
 Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 Hutten, Ulrich von anti-Roman reform and, 1105
 on monasticism, 1300
 Hutter, Jakob, 905, 907–908, 1692
 Hutterite community, 61, 1197
 monasticism, 1301
 Hutterites, 905–907, 908
 communism in, 485
 J.Hutter and, 1197
 pacifism of, 1437
 Society of Brothers and, 1764
 Huxley, T.H., 1371
 Samuel Wilberforce debate with, 2009–2010
 Huxley, Thomas, on Darwinism, 553
 Huxtable, John, 1404
Hymnal: A Worship Book, 1337
 “Hymn” (Caedmon), 1099
Hymns Ancient and Modern, publication of, 1333
 Hymns and hymnals, 908–920, 1418
 Crosby authorship of, 538
 in worship services, 2061
 Hyperius, Andreas Gerhard, 1536

 Ibsen, Henrik, writings, 1110
 Iceland, 921–922
 Iconoclasm, 922–926

- elimination of art from religion, 104
- Iconography, 926–932
- Identity Crisis in Black Theology* (Wayne), 259
- Idolatry, 924–925
- Idowu, E.B., 1401
- Igbo language, Schön and, 1664
- Iglesia Apóstolica*, in Mexico, 1232
- Iglesia de Dios in la República Mexicana*, influence of, 1232
- Illiad* (Homer, Chapman's translation), 1100
- Illuminati, 775
- Immermann, Karl Leberecht, writings, 1110
- Immigration Act of 1924 (United States), 1365
- Immigration Restriction League, 1364
- Imperial Diet of Augsburg, 128–131
- Inational Interreligious Service Board for Conscientious Objectors, 1447
- Incarnation
 - as paradox, 1877, 1880
 - Tillich on, 1892
- Inculturation, 932–935
- Independent Fundamentalist Churches, 935–936
- Index of Forbidden Books, 333
- Index Theologicus*, 1470
- India, 936–939.
 - See also* South India, Church of
 - Baptist missionary work in, 178
 - Basel Mission in, 206
 - Basel Society in, 1274
 - Bible translation, 248
 - Church of North India, 1404–1405
 - Church of the Brethren missionaries to, 303
 - Clapham Sect and, 432
 - history of immigration, 118
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
 - missions to the Tamils, 1249
 - models of inculturation in, 934
 - monasticism in, 1301
 - Presbyterianism in, 1555
 - Protestant universities in, 868
 - rise of nationalism in, 1783
 - tribal movements in, 1914–1915
 - William Carey in, 351–352
- Indian Evangelical Mission, 939
- Indian Missionary Society (IMS), 938
 - Azariah, Vedayagam Samuel, founder, 150
- Indian Reorganization Act of 1934, 1362
- Indian theology, 939–943
- Individualism, 868, 943–945
 - Amish, 56
 - corrosive, 649
 - doctrine in, 611
 - Enlightenment and, 672
 - human rights and, 899

- role of the laity and, 1056–1057
 - voluntaristic Protestantism and, 1769–1770
 - Indonesia, 945–949
 - Batak Protestant Christian Church, 206–207
 - Gossner Society in, 1275
 - Kraemer in, 1041
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
 - Protestant political parties in, 1508
 - Indonesian Baptist Alliance, 947
 - Indonesian Bible Institute, 947
 - Indre Mission, in Denmark, 579
 - Inductive method, of Bible study, 236
 - Indulgences
 - Luther on, 1641
 - from pilgrimages, 1911
 - Industrialization, 949–952
 - Devil concept during, 586
 - in England, 669
 - family effects of, 741
 - in France, 1759
 - fundamentalism and, 791
 - nationalism and, 1356
 - secularization and, 1146
 - Social Gospel as response to, 1752–1753
 - sociology and, 1769
 - sports and Protestantism in, 1802, 1804–1805
 - in Sweden, 1832
 - theology and, 1873
 - witches and, 2017
 - YMCA/YWCA and, 2070–2071
 - Industrial Revolution
 - chaplaincy in, 374–375
 - education and, 648
 - Inerrancy, biblical, 250–251
 - Infant baptism, 395.
 - See also* Baptism
 - as analogous to circumcision, 526
 - confirmation and, 503
 - in Reformation, 740
 - Stone-Campbell Movement and, 595
 - Infanticide, 1722
 - Infralapsarianism, 1543
 - Inge, Dean, 994
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Inglesia de Jesús*, formation, 1230
 - In His Steps* (Sheldon), 1729, 1753, 2065
 - In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins* (Fiorenza), 1870
 - Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth* (Barclay), 779
 - Inner Mission
 - deacons in, 562

- Wichern as father of, 2007–2008
- Inner renewal, 720
- Innocent, III (Pope), crusade against the Balts, 1067
- Inquisition, flight from, 1230
- Inspirationists. see Community of True Inspiration
- Institutes of the Christian Religion* (Calvin), 7, 329, 332, 952–953, 1423, 1535, 1543, 1547, 1550, 1597
 - on confirmation, 503
- Institutions, chaplaincy in, 374–376
- Institutio theologiae elencticae* (Turretini), 332
- Intelligent Design, 532–533
- Intercession, 720
- Interchurch World Movement, 953–954
 - Northern Baptist Convention and, 172
 - Social Gospel decline and, 1756
- Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association, formation, 1257
- International Churches of Christ, history of, 426
- International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, 954–955, 1464, 1849
- International Congregational Church, 2045
- International Congress on World Evangelism (ICWE), roots of, 1073
- International Council of Christian Churches, formation of, 1190
- International Fellowship of Reconciliation, 1446
- International Missionary Alliance, 396
- International Missionary Conference (IMC), ecumenism in, 636–637
- International Missionary Council, 2052
 - formation, 1283
 - foundation, 1262
 - work of, 1257
- International Pentecostal Holiness Church, 955–956
- International Review of Missions*, 1421
 - publication, 1252
- Internet media, use of, 1178
- InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, 730, 956–958
- InterVarsity Press, 958
- Invitation to Pilgrimage* (Baillie), 159
- Iona Community, 446, 958
 - MacLeod and, 1155
 - monasticism and, 1301
- Irbe, Anna, Latvian National Church and, 1069
- Irbe, Karlis, Latvian National Church and, 1069, 1070
- Ireland, 958–960
 - Reformation in, 1921
- Irving, Edward, 960
 - christology of, 414
- Irwin, Benjamin, 878, 956, 1459
- Islam, in movies, 1321
- Islamic countries
 - secularization in, 1706–1707
 - slavery in, 1735
- Israel
 - covenant with, 526
 - creation of, 1484

- Israelites
 as chosen people, 525
 conversion of, 517
- Italy, 961–965
 Unitarians in, 1925
- Itineracy, 965–967
 Asbury, Francis, 110–112
 Methodist preachers, 1227
- I-to Loh
 as animateur, 1335
 publications, 1337
- Ives, Charles, compositions of, 1329
I will Pray with the Spirit (Bunyan), 320
- Jabavu, Davidson Don Tengo, 969–970
- Jabavu, John Tengo, 969
- Jablonski, Daniel collaboration with Leibniz, 1079
 Moravian Church and, 1310
- Jackson, J.H., civil rights movement and, 174
- Jackson, Jesse, 455
- Jackson, Joseph Harrison, 1352, 1568–1569
- Jackson, Samuel, Secretary of ASCH, 48
- Jackson, Sheldon, 970, 1548
- Jacob, Henry, 1492, 1616
- Jacobite Church, 937
- Jacobs, Frances, the AMEZ Church, 21–22
- Jaffray, R.A., 946
- Jamaica, Baptist work in, 177
- Jamaican Assembly, missionary silencing by, 356
- James, Thomas, Rev., 14
- James, William, 970–972, 994, 1389, 1473, 1567, 1625
 on empiricism, 665
- James I, 959, 1028, 1577, 1579, 1599, 1604
- James II, 822–823
- Jameson, Fredric, 1529–1530
- Jansenism, absolutism and, 3
- Japan, 972–975
 AFSC work in, 43
 Bible society work in, 243
 first Protestants in America, 118–119
 German missions in, 1275
 history of immigration, 118
 models of inculturation in, 934
 rule of Korea by, 1037–1038
- Jaredites, Mormonism and, 1314
- Jefferson, Thomas, 975–977, 1516
 on deism, 572
 Enlightenment and, 673
 on religious freedom, 195, 196
 on supernatural, 543

- Jehovah's Witnesses, 977–982, 1517 beliefs of, 511
 on healing, 736
New World Translation of the Holy Scriptures, 250
Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 pacifism of, 511, 513, 1439
 Russell and, 1626–1627
 in Sweden, 1833
- Jemison, D.V., 1352
- Jemison, Theodore Judson, 1352
- Jenkins, Jerry B., Left Behind series, 218
- Jensen, Gustav, 1410
- Jenson, Robert, christology of, 415–416
- Jeremiad, 983, 1582
- Jernigan, John C., 1457
- Jerome, Bible translation by, 223, 246
- Jerusalem, Jhann Friedrich Wilhelm, 1375, 1377
- Jerusalem Union, foundation, 1275
- Jessup, Henry H., 1553
- Jesuits
 educational standards of, 468, 643–644
 in India, 937
- Jesus
 covenant and, 523
 films about, 721
 as healer, 735
 iconography of, 931 lives of, 986–991
 on marriage, 470
 modes of contact used by, 715 supernatural versus scientific view of (Strauss), 1818–1821
- Jesus and the Word* (Bultmann), 317
- Jesus Film*, 730
- Jesus Movement, 983–986, 1574
- Jesus People, 1465, 1610
- Jesus People USA, 983
- Jesus Seminar, 990
- Jewel, John, 885, 991, 1599
- Jewish Peace Fellowship, 1447
- Jewish traditions, Christadelphians and, 393–394
- Jews, missions to, 1286–1288
- Jews for Jesus, 991–992
 missions to the Jews, 1287
- Joachim of Fiore, 1026
- Johannes Althusius Gesellschaft*, 32
- John of Saxony, the Reformation and, 1130
- John Ray Initiative, 1372
- Johnson, Elizabeth A., on language of God, 1871
- Johnson, Francis, 1616
- Johnson, Gisle, 1409, 1410

- confessional revival, 1134
 - influence of, 1145
- Johnson, James, 992–993
 - resistance to racism, 1271
- Johnson, Samuel, 993, 1574
 - impact of, 1103
- Joint Christian Council, opposition to Nazism, 216
- Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ)
 - opposition to, 634
 - participants in, 364, 590, 612, 705
- Jonas, Justus, 995
- Jones, Absalom, 13
- Jones, Bryn, 889
- Jones, Edward E., Sr., 1350
- Jones, Inigo, influence on Laud, 1071
- Jones, Jim, People's Temple of, 1699
- Jones, Major, Black Awareness: A Theology of Hope, 259
- Jones, Rufus Matthew, 993–994
 - origin of AFSC, 42
- Jones, Stanley E., 938
- Jonson, Ben, plays by, 1101
- Jordan Lewis G., missionary work by, 180
- Joris, David, 913
- Jowett, Benjamin, 994, 1584
- Joyce, James, writings of, 1289
- Juárez, Benito, Catholic Church and, 1230
- Jud, Leo, simplified baptismal rite by, 162
- Judaism, 995–998
 - Christianity conversion from, 1713
 - clergy marriage in, 469–470
 - deist hostility toward, 569–570
 - Holocaust and, 879–881, 997
 - Jews for Jesus, 991–992
 - medical ethics in, 694
 - in movies, 1321
 - Philo-Semitism, 1482–1484
 - toleration for, 465
 - views on abortion, 1
 - views on almsgiving, 1474
- Judeo-Christian ethic, denominations and, 583
- Judex, Matthaëus, Magdeburg Centuries, 1131
- Judson, Adoniram
 - Luther Rice and, 196
 - missionary work, 171, 178, 183
 - service in Burma, 189
- Judson, Ann Haseltine
 - Luther Rice and, 196
 - missionary work, 178, 183
 - service in Burma, 189
- Judson Family, 998
 - Baptist overseas missionary enterprise, 34–35
- Judson Press, ABC-USA, 35

- Juhász, Peter Méliusz, 1617
- Jung, Carl Gustav, 998–1000
- Jungianism, 998–1000
- Jung-Stilling, Johann Heinrich, 826, 1000, 1414, 1491, 1628
 Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
- Jurieu, Pierre, 1001
- Justification, 831, 856, 1001–1008
 Catholic and Lutheran joint declaration on (See Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ))
 in Church of God, 437
 ethics and, 688
 Luther on, 1860
 as material principle of doctrine, 609–610 of orthodox Lutherans, 328
- Just-peace-making theory, 1976–1977
- Just-war theory, 1975–1976
- Kaan, Fred, 918
- Kaftan, Julius, Liberal Protestantism and, 1088
- Kagawa, Toyohiko, 974, 1009
- Kähler, Martin, 838
 christology of, 414
- Kahnis, Karl Friedrich August, confessional revival, 1134
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Kalley, Robert Reid, 1554
- Kalnins, Harald, 1629
- Kam, Joseph, 946
- Kansas City Prophets, 1465
- Kant, Immanuel, 8, 839, 1009–1013, 1612 arguments on reason, 1139
 on capital punishment, 350
 christology of, 412–413
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1029
 on Cultural Protestantism, 543
 on death of God, 565
 on deism, 573
 on empiricism, 664
 on Enlightenment, 671–673
 on faith, 734
 Liberal Protestantism and, 1086–1087
 on morality, 1891
 views on natural law, 1367
- Kanzo, Uchimura, 934
- Karlstadt, Andreas Rudolf Bodenstein von, 494, 892, 923, 1013–1014, 1596
 Hofmann and, 1198
 iconoclism and, 1137
 on the Lord's Supper, 1117
- Károlyi, Gáspár, 903
- Käsemann, Ernst, 9899
- Kazantzakis, Nikos, biblical influence on, 231

- KDKA (Pittsburgh, Pa.), Christian broadcasting on, 1176
- Keach, Elias, Baptist church in Pennsylvania, 192
- Keble, John, 917, 1014–1015, 1429–1432
 Anglo-Catholicism and, 69
- Keckermann, Bartholomew, 1015
- Kee, Alistair, 1509
- Keeping Body and Soul Together*, 1163
- Keller, Gottfried, writings, 1110
- Kellogg, John Harvey, health beliefs of, 1717
- Kelly, Leontine, appointment as bishop for, 258
- Kelpius, Johann, 811
- Kemp, J.M. van der, 1386
- Kennedy School of Missions, foundation, 1252
- Kenotic christology, 411–412, 566, 689
- Kepler, Johannes, 1015–1016, 1370
- Kerk, Gereformeerde. See Dutch Reformed Church
- Kerner, Justinus Andreas Christian, influence on Hoffman, 1109
- Kerri, Hanns, 489
- Kershner, Frederick in Disciples of Christ unity, 400 on verbal inspiration of Scripture, 399
- Kester, Howard Anderson, in Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 747
- Keswick Conferences, Salvation Army and, 1268
- Keswick Movement, 395, 870, 1016–1018, 1374, 1458
 Holiness Movement and, 877, 1016
 hymnody of, 1017–1018
 Pilkington and, 1494
 Wesleyan Holiness Movement and, 1991
- Ketcham, Robert T. “Fighting Bob,” campaign against liberalism, 169
- Kettler, Gothard, Livonian Order and, 1068
- Keysser, Christian, 934
- Khoisan, 1777
- Khrushchev antireligious campaign, Soviet Union, 26
- Kierkegaard, Sören Aabye, 1018–1021, 1029
 christology of, 413
 on Cultural Protestantism, 543
 Danish Protestantism and, 577
 on ethics, 692
 Grundtvig and, 1146
 on incarnation as paradox, 1880
 on sin, 1733
- Kiernander, John Zecharias, 938
- Kilham, Alexander, Methodist New Connexion and, 1213
- Kilham, Hannah, 1021–1022
- Kimbangu, Simon, 11, 1022
 Mormonism and, 1313–1314
- Kimbanguist Church, 11
- Kimbrough, S.T., Jr., Global Praise Project, 1336
- King, Joseph Hillary, 956
- King, Martin Luther, Sr., 1569
- King, Martin Luther Jr., 14, 1022–1025, 1043, 1352, 1569
 Bible in speeches of, 229

- on black power, 455
- Black Theology and, 259
- in Civil Rights Movement, 453
- concept of Kingdom of God, 1030
- preaching of, 1538
- promotion of nonviolence by, 1439
- King, Thomas Starr, Transcendentalism and Unitarianism, 51
- Kingdom of Christ* (Maurice), 1185
- Kingdom of God, 988, 1025–1031
 - in America, 626
 - Cultural Protestantism and, 542
 - on earth, 741–742
 - nearness of, 518
 - Pentecostalism and, 1454–1455
 - Ragaz and, 1588
 - Rauschenbusch and, 1591, 1592, 1593
 - Ritschl and, 1613
 - Social Gospel and, 1755
- King Henry IV of France, Edict of Nantes proclaimed by, 1345–1348
- King James Version. see Bible, King James Version
- King Phillip's War, 2014
- Kingsley, Charles, 1031–1032, 1371, 1475
 - on muscular Christianity, 1175, 1804–1805
- Kingsley, Mary, 1032
- Kino, Eusebius, missionary efforts, 1254
- Kirchentag*, 1032–1033
- Kirchhoff, Karl-Heinz, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Kirk. See Church of Scotland
- Kirkeligt Centrum*, in Danish Protestantism, 579
- Kirschbaum, Charlotte von, Karl Barth and, 203
- Kissack, Rex, on unity, 1212
- Klaj, Johann, writings, 1106–1107
- Kleist, Heinrich von, writings, 1109
- Klepper, Jochen, writings, 1111
- Kliefoth, Theodore, 1532
- Klinger, Friedrich Maximilian, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1109
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb, writings, 1108
- Knibb, William
 - Baptist work, 177
 - missionary work of, 1266
- Knights of Columbus, 775
- Knipperdolling, Berndt, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Knoghts, W.J., 819
- Knopken, Andreas, influence of Luther on, 1068
- Knorr, Nathan Homer, 979
- Know Nothing (American) Party, 1364
- Knox, John, 912, 959, 962, 1033–1034, 1547, 1550, 1557, 1597
 - on church and state, 420
 - on divorce, 604

- emphasis on church discipline, 332
- episcopacy and, 254
- millennialism and, 1239
- in Scottish Reformation, 335, 444
- Köbner (Koebner), Julius Wilhelm
 - confessionalization, 184
 - Dutch Union and, 186
 - missionary work of, 189
- Koelle, Sigismund Wilhelm, 1035
- Kohn, Hans, 1356
- Køhn, Rosemarie, 1411
- Koinonia*, 2048
- Kolbe, Maximilian, execution of, 1170
- Komendant Grigori, leader of AUCECB, 26
- Komensky, Jan. See Comenius, John
- Köpfel, Wolfgang. See Capito, Wolfgang
- Korea, 1035–1041
 - history of immigration, 118
 - industrialization in, 951
 - Methodism in, 1222–1223
 - missions to, 1281
 - Presbyterianism in, 1555
 - Protestantism growth in, 1774
 - Protestant universities in, 868, 1037, 1039
- Korean Methodist Church, conference structure in, 488
- Koresh, David.
 - See also* Howell, Vernon
 - Branch Davidians of, 1699
- Koyama, Kosuke, on culture and faith, 546
- Kraemer, Hendrik, 938, 946, 1041–1042, 1381, 1388
- Kraft, Charles, on Christ as cultural transformer, 545
- Kraft, John Ludwig, 9
- Krapf, Johann Ludwig, missionary work of, 1266
- Krauth, Charles Porterfield, 1042–1043
 - General Council and, 1148
- Krechting, Bernard, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Krüdener, Barbara, 1043, 1628
- Kruyt, A.C., 946
- Kubler-Ross, Elisabeth, 565
- Kuenen, Abraham, 1387, 1606
- Ku Klux Klan, 1023, 1043–1044, 1352
 - Church of God of Prophecy on, 443
 - nativism and, 1365
 - Pentecostalism and, 1463
- Küng, Hans, 1007
- Kunze, Reiner, writings, 1111
- Kuruvars, conversion of, 1180
- Kushner, Harold, 1574
- Kutter, Hermann, 1044
- Kuukauppi, Aarre, 1629
- Kuyper, Abraham, 1044–1046, 1387
 - on church and state, 421

- in CRCNA, 402, 621, 624
- on Darwinism, 553
- secularization resistance of, 1705
- views on predestination, 1543

- Labadie, Jean de, 1486, 1487, 1489
- Ladd, George Elton, 1031
- Ladd, William, 1439
- Laestadius, Lars Levi, 1047–1048
 - Lutheran revival movement and, 1146
 - Pietism and, 1133
- Lagarde, Paul Anton De, 1048
- Lagerkvist, Par, biblical influence, 231
- Lagerlof, Selma, biblical influence, 231
- LaHaye, Tim, Left Behind series, 218
- Laïcité*, 764–766
- Laissez-faire* capitalism, 1759
- Laity, 1048–1057
 - in Africa, 18
 - Lutheran Missouri Synod and, 1125
 - mega-churches and, 1192
 - Passion Plays and, 1099
 - preaching by, 1223
 - Priesthood of all Believers, 1139
- Lamanites, Mormonism and, 1314–1315
- Lamb, Matthew, 1509
- Lambeth Articles, 1544
- Lambeth Conference, 589, 1057–1058, 1843
 - Anglican bishops, 67
 - Christian socialism and, 1761
 - ecumenism in, 635
 - on euthanasia, 701
 - history of, 435
 - on polygamy, 74
- Lambeth Quadrilateral, 1058
 - Anglicanism and, 1057
- Landmark Baptists, 1697
- Landmarkers (American Baptist Association), 173–174, 197–198
- Landmarkists, 1788–1789
- Landstad, Magnus B., 1410
- Lane Rebellion, 1980
- Lang, Cosmo Gordon, 1483
- Langenfeld, Friedrich Spee von, writings, 1106
- Langland, William, “Vision of Piers Plowman,” 1099
- Language of God, in feminist theology, 1871
- La Roche, Sophie von, writings, 1108
- Lasco, Johannes A.
 - See also* Laski, Jan
 - Menno and, 1196
- Laski, Jan (Joannes A Lasco, John A Lasco), 1058–1059, 1501
- Lassus, Orlando di, work of, 1339

Læstadius, Lars Levi, 1409

Last Judgment, Swedenborg on, 1834

Late Great Planet Earth (Lindsey), 684, 795

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;

Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Lateran Councils, on education, 641

Latimer, Hugh, 868, 1059–1060, 1432

execution of, 1168

Latin America, 1060–1063.

See also specific countries

Liberation Theology in, 1526–1527

liberation theology in, 1881, 1885

Lutheranism in, 1143

Pentacostalism in, 1258

Presbyterianism in, 1554–1555

Protestantism growth in, 1774–1775

Protestant political parties in, 1508

religious affiliation statistics in, 2088

womanist and feminist theology and, 2028

Latitudinarianism, 1063–1067, 1876

Latter Day Saints. See Mormonism

Latter Rain Revival, 1067

Latuihamallo, P.D., 947

Latvia, 1067–1070

Baptist Union in, 186

Lutheran reforms, 1130

Methodism in, 1217–1218

Protestant political parties in, 1507

Laubach, Frank C., 1534

Laud, William, 5, 1070–1073

Latitudinarianism and, 1065

resacramentalizing under, 348

views on predestination, 1544

Laudamus, publication, 1335–1336

Lausanne Committee on World Evangelization, 1073–1074

foundation, 1257, 1262

Lausanne Conference, 1556

Lausanne Covenant, 638

drafting of, 1073

Lavater, Johann Kaspar, 1074, 1491

Law, William, 1074–1075, 1534

Law on Religions of 1997 (Russia), 1627, 1628

Lawrence, Edward A., on missions, 1248

Lawry, Walter, work in Tonga, 1222

Laws, Curtis Lee, on the Northern Baptist Convention, 168

Lawson, Robert C., 1452

Lazareth, William, Lutheran ecumenical movement and, 1136

Leade, Jane Ward, 1075, 1489

Leaflets on Scripture, 821

League of Nations, 2015, 2046

Covenant of, 2015

- League of Torgau, formation of, 1138
 League of Universal Brotherhood, 1439
 Lecler, J., 1386
Lectio continuo, 330, 332
 Lee, Ann, 1075–1076
 Shakers and, 1725–1726
 Lee, Francis, Philadephian Society and, 1075
 Lee, Jarena, preaching by, 257
 Lee, Luther, abolitionism and, 1224
 Lee, Mother Ann, 803
 Leenhardt, Maurice, 934
 Leeuw, G. van der, 1388
 Lefèvre, Jacque, New Testament publication by, 247
Left Behind series (Jenkins and LaHaye), 218, 683, 795
 Legge, James, 1076–1079
Legibus absolutus, 2
 Lehmann, Gottfried Wilhelm, missionary work of, 189
 Leibniz, Gotfried Wilhelm, 1079–1080, 1375, 1602
 Enlightenment and, 1139
 Lutheranism and, 1133
 Leiden, Jan van, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
 Leile, George, ministry of, 194
 Leimena, J., 947
 Leipzig Interim, 755, 824–825
 Leisewitz, Johann Anton, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1109
 Leland, John
 Isaac Backus and, 182
 James Madison and, 195–196
Lemon v. Kurtzman (1917), 1518
 Lenin, Vladmir, religious persecution under, 486
 Lenz, Jakob Michael Reinhold, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1109
 Lesbian Christians, 882–885
 Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, 852, 986, 1080–1082, 1378 criticism of Reimarus, 1139
 on deism, 572
 writings, 1108
 Lessing, Gottlhold E., christology of, 412
Letter Concerning Toleration (Locke), 1114–1115
Letters and Papers from Prison (Bonhoeffer), 271
Letters of the Martyrs, 4
Letters on the Gospels, 5
 Leuenberg Agreement, 419, 589, 633, 637.
 See also Ecumenical Agreements
 Levellers, 1082–1084, 1693
Leviathan, 871–873
 Levinas, Emmanuel, 881
 Lewis, C.S., 1084–1085
 Lewis, Sir Samuel, 1085
 Lexington Theological Seminary, 399
 Leydekker, Melchior, 248
 Liang A-Fa (Liang FA, Liang A-FA), 1086
 Liberalism

- human rights and, 899–900
- Kant and, 1012
- theological, camp meetings and, 342
- in twentieth century Britain, 1876
- in World's Parliament of Religions, 2053–2054
- Liberal Protestantism, 468–469, 1086–1090
 - Calvinism versus, 373
 - on Darwinism, 554
 - Fosdick in, 759
 - fundamentalism and, 791
 - hymns of, 918
 - as infidelity, 1902
 - Shailer Mathews and, 1183
 - in twentieth century, 1879–1880
- Liberal Theology
 - Social Gospel and, 1753, 1883
 - in twentieth century North America, 1883
 - of Van Dusen, 1956–1957
- Liberation and Reconciliation* (Roberts), 259
 - Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 - Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Liberation Theology, 1030–1031, 1090–1095, 1881
 - in Latin America, 1060, 1885
 - Lutheranism and, 1143
 - Moltmann and, 1298
 - on Pentecostalism, 1775
 - political theology and, 1509
 - postcolonialism and, 1526–1528
 - publications on, 1574
 - in twentieth century Britain, 1878
 - views on prostitution, 1571
 - womanist theology and, 2027
 - Wu as forerunner of, 2064
- Liberia, 1095–1096
 - Harris in, 847–848
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
 - Presbyterianism in, 1554
 - Russwurm in, 1631–1632
- Liberty Party, 1744
- Liddon, Henry Parry, 1096–1097
- Lidgett, John Scott, Bermondsey settlement, 1214
- Liele, George, 13
 - Baptist work, 177, 355–356
- Life and Work movement, ecumenism in, 637
- Life of Jesus, Critically Examined* (Strauss), 1818–1821
- Lifestyle, Christian, 720
- Lightfoot, Joseph Barber, 1097–1098
- Lighthouse of Foursquare Evangelism, 954
- Liguori, St. Alphonsus, 370
- Lilbourne, John, Leveller movement and, 1082
- Limbo, Aquinas on, 741

- Lincoln, Abraham, 1098
 as preacher, 460
- Lindbeck, George, on doctrine, 611
- Lindsay, Freda, 1464
- Lindsay, Gordon, 1464
- Lindsey, Hal, 1031, 1574
 on eschatology, 683, 795
- Lindsey, Theophilus, Unitarianism and, 1927
- Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe* (Lewis), 1085
- Lisle (Leile), George, work in Jamaica, 189
- Literary criticism, of scripture, 226
- Literature, 1099–1105
 in evangelism, 715, 717, 719, 724–725
- Literature, German, 1105–1111
- Lithuania, 1502–1503
 Methodism in, 1217
- Lithuanian Brethren, 1692
- Lithuanian Reformed Church, 1501
- Littell, Franklin, 881
- Liturgical vestments.
See also Vestments
 in ancient and medieval church, 1959–1960
- Liturgy, 1112–1113
 Anglican, 67–68
 influence of Vatican II, 1335
 Lutheranism and, 1130
 Methodism and, 1211–1212
 music and, 1326
 vernacular in, 647
- Liverpool Conference on Missions, 2050
- Living Bible*, 1574
- Livingston, John Henry, 1601
- Livingstone, David, 9, 933, 1113–1114, 1551
 missionary work of, 1268
 work in Malawi, 1156
- Livingstone College, foundation of, 257
- Living Will, 700
- Livonian Order, Plettenberg and, 1068
- Locke, John, 900, 994, 1005, 1028, 1114–1115, 1605 biblical understanding, 228
 on Cultural Protestantism, 543
 on empiricism, 663–665
 Enlightenment and, 673
 Latitudinarianism and, 1065–1066, 1066
 views on natural law, 1367
- Loescher, Ernst Valentin, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Logau, Friedrich von, writings, 1107
- Log College, founding of, 234
- Løgstrup, K.E., 1368
- Löhe, Wilhelm, 1115–1116, 1532
 confessional revival, 1134
 on Marian devotions, 1174

- The Missouri Synod and, 1124
 Pietism and, 1139
- Lohenstein, Daniel Casper von, writings, 1107
- Lollards, 4
 dissent by, 600–601
 persecution of, 668
- Lombardi, Giacomo, 964
- London Baptist Confession, 2060
- London Centenary Conference, 2050
- London Missionary Society (LMS), 9, 508, 1393, 1435, 1478
 conversions in India and, 1180
 missions, 1260–1261
 in Zimbabwe, 2077–2078
- London Peace Society, 1439
- London Society for Promoting Christianity Among the Jews, 1287
- Longley, C.T. (Archbishop), Lambeth Conference and, 1057
- Loomer, Bernard, 1568
 on empiricism, 667
- Lord's Prayer, in catechisms, 360–362
- Lord's Supper, 1116–1119, 1415, 1416.
See also Communion
 Amish fall and spring communion, 57
 Bullinger on, 2084
 in Calvinism, 337
 Calvin's concept of, 1596–1597
 at camp meetings, 340 in Christian Churches (Churches of Christ), 401
 in Churches of Christ, 427 confirmation as gateway to, 501–502, 504–505
 in ELCA, 704
 Emerson on, 661–662
 leadership for, 464
 Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
 Luther on, 2082
 Marburg Colloquy on interpretation of, 1596
 Oecolampadius views on, 1421 racial issues in, 625
 Real Presence in (See Real Presence)
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- ritualization of, 464
 in Schleithem Confession, 1661
 Schwenckfeld on, 1668–1669
 temperance and, 1853
 Tractarian concept of, 1432, 1433
 transubstantiation in, 1909–1911
 Zwingli on, 1596–1597, 2081–2082
- Löscher, Valentin Ernst, 1489
- Lott Cary Baptist Foreign Missions Convention, 14, 180, 1350, 1351
- Loughlin, Gerard, 1530
- Louguen, Jermain, Rev., 14

- Louis IX of France, confessional phase of absolutism, 2
- Louis XIV, 897, 961
- Loukaris, Cyril, 1426
- Love, Emmanuel K., 1351
- Lower Criticism, 866
- Lowman, Moses, 1028
- Lowry, Eugene, 1540
- Loyola, Ignatius, 1600
 - foundation of the Society of Jesus, 1254
 - Society of Jesus and, 1301
- Lubertus, Sibbrandus, 1604
- Lucas Cranach the Elder, 928
- Lücke, Friedrich, mission theory, 1278–1279
- Ludensian Theology, 1832–1833
- Ludlow, John Malcolm, 1475
- Ludwig, Karl, Peace Church of, 154
- Luithold, Waremund. see Bucer, Martin
- Lukás of Prague, Moravian Church and, 1309
- Lumbantobing, Pontas, 946
- Luther, Martin, 8, 799, 813–814, 827, 837, 1119–1124, 1550, 1609.
 - See also* Schmalkald articles
 - adiaphoristic ideas, 6
 - altar controversy, 30
 - Amsdorf, Nikolous von, 60
 - anti-Semitism of, 1482
 - apocalyptic time and, 1237
 - art in religion, 104–106
 - atonement and, 124–125
 - on baptism, 161–165
 - Bible translation by, 246–247
 - on capital punishment, 349, 419
 - catechisms, 280–281, 361
 - on charity, 377
 - chrisotology of, 410
 - on church discipline, 423
 - on clergy, 466–467
 - on clerical celibacy, 367, 369–370, 471–472
 - Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 - concept of justification, 1001–1003
 - concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 - concept of priesthood of all believers, 1561–1562
 - on confession and absolution, 492–494
 - on confession of faith, 494–495
 - on confirmation, 165
 - conflict with Zwingli, 332
 - on conversion, 519
 - on corruption of human mind by Fall, 1671
 - on Cultural Protestantism, 542–543
 - Deutsche Messe*, 1112
 - in diet of Worms, 2054–2055
 - differences with Müntzer, 1325
 - on divorce, 603, 1720

on double predestination, 656
 ecclesiology of, 630
 in edict of Worms, 2055–2056
 on education, 154, 380, 642–644, 646–648
 episcopacy and, 253
 on ethics, 687–690
 on faith, 733, 750
 on family, 739
 Fox opinions versus, 761
Freedom of a Christian, 1053
 on free will, 585
 on funerary rites, 796
German Catechism of, 807
 German Mass of, 824
 German vernacular Bible, 223
 Henry VIII's opposition to, 857–858
 as heretic, 863
 Holl's studies of, 878–879
 on Holy communion, 1116–1117
 Hubmaier's studies of, 891
 iconography and, 928
 on indulgences, 1641 interpretation of the Book of Revelation, 382
 on just war, 511
 Karlstadt and, 1013
 laity and, 1049–1050
 letter to Henry VIII, 201
Little Prayer Book of, 1534
 on Lord's Supper, 410
 on Marian devotions, 1172–1173
 on marriage, 471–472, 1719–1720, 2035
 on monasticism, 1300
 Ninety-five Theses of, 813, 1510, 1595 on order of public worship, 2060 on pilgrimages, 1911 on Platonism, 1801
 on prayer, 1532, 1534
 preaching by, 1535
 professorship of, 867
 Protestant protest of, 1691
 Reformation and, 1130, 1595
 on the role of the laity, 1053–1054
 on sacraments, 1638
 on saints, 1641–1642
 on salvation, 1645
 on sanctification, 1651–1652
 on scriptural authority, 607, 642
 sectarianism of, 1691
Shorter Catechism of, 808, 923
 on sin, 1733
 Smalkald Articles, 280
Small Catechism of, 1534

on socialism, 1762
 on sports, 1803–1804

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

on temptation, 1860
 theology of, 1860–1861
 on transubstantiation, 1910 use of vernacular hymnody by, 908–910
 on vestments, 1960
 views on free will, 872 views on holy days, 874–875
 views on iconoclasm, 923
 views on Judaism, 995
 views on music, 1338
 views on natural law, 1366
 views on polygamy, 1495
 on vocations, 632, 1771 on worship, 2057

Zwingli, controversy with, 1838, 2082

Lutheran Book of Worship, liturgy, 1112

Lutheran Church

architecture, 89
Book of Concord and, 278–279
 Bugenhagen and, 314 conservatism, 154

Lutheran Church in America (LCA), 46, 1126–1128

deaconesses in, 563

Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod (LCMS), 45, 1124–1126

deaconesses in, 563
 foundation of, 1973
 international services of, 705
 isolationism of, 706

Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod and, 2015–2016

Lutheran clergy, vestments worn by, 1961–1963

Lutheran Hour, ministry, 1125

Lutheranism, 1130–1137

absolutism and, 3
 adiaphoristic ideas and, 6
 American Lutheran Church (ALC), 44–46
 antirevivalism in, 1664
 Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church, 132
 christology of, 410–412, 415
 on church and state, 419, 421
 church discipline in, 423 church governance in, 705
 in Colonial America, 1941–1942
 confessionalization in, 498
 confirmation in, 501, 504
 consistory in, 515
 deacons/deaconesses in, 561, 563
 in Denmark, 577–578, 1599–1600

diets of Speyer and, 1798–1800
 divorce in, 471, 606
 double predestination in, 655
 early funerary rites in, 796
 ecumenical agreements with, 633–634 educational emphasis of, 707
 in Estonia, 685–686
 evangelical, 701–702
 in Finland, 752
 Formula of Concord in, 334
 in France, 763–764
 in French Revolution, 776–777
 German universities and, 867
 Germany, 1137–1140
 in Germany, 813–816, 837
 Global, 1140–1144
 Gnesio-Lutherans, 824–826, 1542
 Gustavus Adolphus and, 835
 Harnack and, 844–845
 Hauge and, 849
 history of, 706–707
 human rights and, 898
 in Hungary, 902–904
 in Iceland, 921–922
 iconoclasm and, 923
 immigration to North America, 706
 in Italy, 961 justification doctrine of, 328, 364, 590, 610
 kenotic theory in, 411
 Krauth and, 1042–1043
 L.Petri and, 1472
 in Latvia, 1068, 1070
Lutheran Book of Worship, 1112
 martyrs in, 1168
 Missouri Synod, 812
 during Nazi regime, 489
 in Norway, 1407–1408
 O.Petri and, 1472–1473
 orthodoxy and, 1422–1424
 personality characteristics in, 707
 Philip of Hesse and, 1477
 Pietism influence on, 1693–1694
 in Poland, 1501–1502
 politics and, 1511
 predestination and, 1542–1543
 in Russia, 1627, 1629
 Scandinavia, 1144–1147
 in South Africa, 1780
 on sports, 1803–1804
 statistics on, 1810, 1811
 in Sweden, 1830–1831
 synods in, 1841

- in Transylvania, 1617
- unification of, 1948–1949
- United States, 1147–1150
- in United States, 1353
- vocation in, 525
- Weber on, 1771
- witch executions in, 2020
- women clergy in, 2032–2033
- Zwingli on, 2083
- Lutheran Peace Fellowship, 1449
- Lutheran Synodical Conference, 1128
- Lutheran World Federation, 1007, 1128–1130, 1412
 - formation of, 1135, 1150
 - Laudamus*, 1335–1336
- Lutheran World Relief, 705
- Luthuli, Albert John, 969–970, 1151
- Lux Mundi* (Gore), 1877
- Luz del Mundo*, in Mexico, 1232
- Lyons, Henry C., 1352
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Lyons, James, publications, 1328
- Lyotard, Jean-François, 1529

- MacArthur, Terry, as animateur, 1335
- Macedonia, Methodism in, 1217
- Macfarlane, John, 1391
- Machen, John Gresham, 1153, 1348, 1549, 1553
 - influence on C.McIntire, 1189
 - on liberalism, 793
- Macintosh, Douglas Clyde, on empiricism, 666
- Mack, Alexander, 1490
- Mackay, John Alexander, 1153–1154, 1549, 1555
 - death of, 1269
- Mackenzie, C.F., murder of, 1268
- Mackenzie, John, 1154–1155
 - new imperialism and, 1269
- Macleod, George Fielden, 958, 1155
- Macleod, Norman, 1155–1156
- Madagascar, Lutheranism in, 1141
- Madan, Martin, 915, 1496
- Madero, Francisco, presidency of, 1231
- Madigas, conversion of, 1180
- Madison, James, 944, 976, 1156, 1547
 - Bill of Rights and, 251
 - John Leland and, 195–196
- Magdeburg Centuries* (Flacius), 524, 825
- Mahan, Asa, 877
- Maier, Walter A., radio ministry of, 1125
- Maitland, F.W., 1510
- Major, Sarah Righter, the Brethren and, 302

- Makemie, Francis, 1547, 1552
- Malan, Henri Abraham César, 1608
- Malas, conversion of, 1180
- Malawi, 1156–1157
 William's Booth's ministry in, 285
- Malay, Bible translation, 248
- Malay Archipelago, Bible translation, 248
- Malleus Maleficarum (Witches' Hammer; Kramer/Institoris)*, 2016, 2018
- Malory, Thomas, Morte D'Arthur, 1099
- Malpan, Abraham, 938
- Manalo, Felix, 1480
- Mancelius, Georg, Livonian Order and, 1068
- Mandela, Nelson, 1527
- Mangs, Frank, 1411
- Manhood. see Masculinity
- Manila Manifesto, 638
- Maniple, origins of, 1960
- Mann, Heinrich, writings, 1111
- Mann, Thomas
 biblical influence on, 231
 writings, 1111
- Manning, Henry, 1430
- Mansfield Judgment, 1729
- Mantz, Anabaptism and, 1197
- Manual of the Mother Church* (Eddy), 408
- Manual of Theology* (Dagg), 183
- Manuel, Nikolaus, plays, 1105
- Manz, Felix, drowning of, 1169
- Maranke, John, 1157
- Marburg Articles, 2057
- Marburg Colloquy, 332, 495, 1157–1159, 1420, 1477, 1596, 2082
 doctrine in, 612
 on the Holy Communion, 1117–1118
 Luther at, 1138
- March First Movement (Korea), 1037–1038
- Marginal Christians, worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092
- Marheineke (Marheinecke), Philipp Konrad, 854, 1159
- Market model, of economics, 1741
- Marlow, Christopher, “Tragical History of Doctor Faustus,” 1100
- Maroons, in Sierra Leone, 1731
- Marot, Clement, 911
- Marpeck, Pilgram, 1160
- Marrant, John, 1160–1661
- Marriage, 1161–1166
 to Christ, 689, 768 clandestine, 739 contract-oriented model of, 739 as covenant, 524
 interracial, 1723–1724
 Luther on, 471–472, 1719–1720, 2035
 Mormonism on, 1749
 plural, 1495–1499, 1719, 1749

- rites of, 1418
- same-sex, 883–885
- Marshall, Daniel, Sandy Creek Baptists and, 193–194
- Marshall, Robert J., Lutheran Church in America and, 1126
- Marshman, Joshua, 939939
 - mission to India, 177
- Marsiglio of Padua, 1049
- Martensen, Hans, on Jakob Boehme, 267
- Martineau, James, 1166–1167, 1403
- Marty, Martin, 1575
- Martyn, Henry
 - Bible translation, 248
 - missionary work of, 1280
- Martyrdom, 722
 - of early Christians, 1640
- Martyrs and Martyrologies, 4, 1167–1172
- Martyr's Synod, 1692
- Marx, Karl, 486, 1381, 1759–1761
 - on religion, 1169
- Mary, Virgin, 1172–1174
- Maryland colony, Catholic founders of, 328
- Mary (Queen of England), 4
- Masaryk, T.G., 891
- Masculinity, 1175–1176
- Masculinization, 803
- Mason, Charles Harrison, 1460, 1461, 1462
 - in Church of God in Christ, 439–441
- Mason, Charles Harrison, Elder, 15
- Mason, George, Bill of Rights and, 251
- Mason, Lowell, 916
 - on music, 1328
- Masons. See Freemasonry
- Masoretic markings, in Hebrew Bible, 351
- Massachusetts Bay Colony, Williams and, 2012–2013
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Massee, J.C., on Modernism, 168
- Massey, William F., 1392
- Mass media, 1176–1179
- Mass Movements (India), 1179–1181
 - Pickett, J.Waskom on, 1251
- Masturbation, 1724
- Mather, Cotton, 12, 875, 1181–1182
 - on healing, 737
 - literature by, 1102
- Mather, Increase, 983, 1182–1183, 1582
 - concept of Kingdom of God, 1028
 - work of, 1181
- Mathews, Shailer, 1183
- Mathijs, Jan, 1183–1184, 1624
 - millennialism and, 1238–1239

- Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Matlack, Lucius C., abolitionism and, 1224
- Matsikenyiri, Patrick, as animateur, 1335
- Matthean exception, to divorce, 602
- Matthew Bible*, 247
- Matthews, Zachariah Keodirelang, 969, 1184–1185
- Maurice, Frederick Denison, 1031, 1185–1186, 1475, 1590, 1592, 1760–1761 influence on James Legge, 1076
- Mayflower Compact, 1492
- Mayflower Decision, FCC, 1176
- Mayhew, Jonathan, 49, 1186–1188
- Mayhew, Thomas, Jr., 1360
- Mayland, David Wesley, Latter Rain Revival and, 1067
- Mays, Benjamin, 1569
- Mazel, Abraham, 898
- Mazhabi Sikhs, conversion of, 1180
- McBeth, Sue, missionary work of, 1280
- McClure, W. Don, execution of, 1169
- McClurkan, J.O., 450
- McConnell, Francis J., 954
- McCosh, James, 1683–1685
- McCoy, Isaac, missionary work, 178
- McCray, Trinetta, first female clergy president of ABC-USA, 36
- McFague, Sallie, 1188–1189
- McGavran, Donald A.
 Church Growth Movement and, 1252
 on missions, 1251
- McGready, James, 1547
- McGuffey, William, 1548
- McGuffey Readers, 649, 1189
- McIntire, Carl, 1189–1190, 1348
- McKee, William T., Educational Ministries, ABC-USA, 36
- McKendree, William, appointment policy, 1227
- McLean, Archibald, on plurality of elders, 183
- McLuhan, Marshall, media criticism by, 1176
- McPherson, Aimee Semple, 954, 1190–1191, 1462–1463
 radio revivals and, 1849
- McPherson, Rolf, 955
- Measure for Measure* (Shakespeare), 228
- Mede, Joseph, 996, 1028
- Medgyesi, Pál, 903
- Media. see Mass media
- Medical ethics, 693–698
- Medical missions, 1276–1277
- Medieval church
 Aristotelian science and, 1671
 capital punishment and, 349
 celibacy in, 369
 chaplaincy in, 374
 charity in, 377
 clergy in, 465–466
 clergy marriage in, 470–471

- clerical attire in, 1959
- confessionalization in, 498
- deacons in, 560–561
- in Finland, 751
- Freemasonry and, 774
- nonconformists and, 768
- on salvation, 1645
- Scripture as allegory in, 1671–1672
- symbolism in, 1672
- vestments in, 1959–1960, 1963–1964
- vocation in, 1965
- Meeks, M.Douglas, 1509
- Mega-churches, 1191–1192
 - preaching in, 1541
 - sectarianism and, 1699
 - seekers in, 1708
- Meier, J., 990
- Meill, Stephen Charles, publications of, 1272
- Meinecke, Friedrich, 1356
- Meisen Agreement, 1991, Church of England and Evangelical Church in Germany, 69
- Melanchthon, Philipp, 799, 814, 824–825, 1015, 1192–1195, 1370, 1407, 1623
 - Apology of the Augsburg Confession*, 131
 - Augsburg Confession and, 279–280, 495–496, 1596
 - Augsburg Interim and, 1138
 - on capital punishment, 350
 - christology of, 411
 - concept of justification, 1003
 - on confession and absolution, 494
 - on covenant, 523
 - on divorce, 603
 - on double predestination, 655–656
 - ecclesiology of, 630
 - on educating children, 380
 - on education, 643
 - Luther and, 1122
 - on Marian devotions, 1173
 - on the Pope, 280
 - professorship of, 867
 - the Reformation and, 1130
 - at Regensburg Colloquy, 1602
 - on tradition, 1907
 - views on polygamy, 1495
 - views on predestination, 1542
 - on Zwingli's followers, 1158
- Meland, Bernard Eugene, 1568
 - on empiricism, 666–667
- Melanesia, 1435–1436
- Melanesian Brotherhood, monasticism, 1301
- Melchizedek priesthood, 1746, 1748

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Melville, Andrew, 1195, 1551
 in Church of Scotland, 444
- Melville, Herman, 229
- Memoir of Miss Hannah Adams*, 5
- Memphis miracle, 441
- Mendelssohn, Felix, music of, 1341
- Mendelssohn, Moses, Lessing and, 1081
- Menists, Menno and, 1201
- Menno Simons, 812, 1195–1197, 1384, 1437, 1692
 Anabaptism and, 61
 on church and state, 420–421
 church of, 1200–1201 early development of, 1199–1200
- Mennonites, 811, 812, 834, 1384
 Amish and, 56
 Anabaptism and, 60–63
 in AUCECB, 25–26
 on church and state, 421
 Free Will Baptists and, 770
 General conference of, 1203–1204 higher education in, 480
 history of, 16982
Hymnal: A Worship Book, 1337
 influence of Martin Boehm, 300
 pacifism of, 511, 1437–1438, 1449
 in Russia, 1630
 songs of, 913
- Mennonite World Conference, in Basel, Switzerland, 1202
- Mensa*, in altars, 29
- Mercersburg Theology, 336, 1204–1208, 1389, 1653–1654
- Meriam Report, 1362
- Merle, D'Aubigné, Jean Henri, 1208
- Merrick, Joseph, Bible translation, 177
- Merritt, Timothy, 877
- Merton, Robert, 1370, 1583
- Merton thesis, 1670
- Mesmer, Anton, influence on Mary Baker Eddy, 405, 639
- Mesmerism, in Christian Science, 406–407, 639
- Message of Genesis* (Elliot), 197
- Messiah (Handel), 721
- Metaphysical naturalism, 533
- Metaphysical religion, 640
- Methodism, 1208–1212.
See also United Methodist Church
 African American churches and denominations, 13–14
 in America, 965
 Amissah, Samuel Hanson, 59–60
 architecture, 91
 Asbury, Francis, 110–112

- Attoh Ahuma, Samuel Richard Brew, 127
 Black Methodists, 255–258
 in Brazil, 1061
 camp meetings in, 340, 452, 785
 in Canada, 345
 in Caribbean, 355
 on charity, 377
 circuit riders in, 452 conferences in, 487–488
 confirmation in, 505
 deaconesses in, 563
 democracy and, 575
 in Denmark, 580
 dissent in, 601
 divorce in, 606
 doctrinal authority in, 609 doctrine and discipline of, 1986–1987
 Duke University and, 617–618
 England, 1212–1215
 conference structure in, 488
 Europe, 1215–1220
 foundation of, 1981
 funerary rites in, 797
 in Ghana, 818
 Global, 1220–1223
 global song and liturgy, 1336
 Holiness Movement and, 877–878
 human rights and, 900
 hymnody of, 915
 in Italy, 963
 itineracy and, 965–967
 in Korea, 1035–1036
 in Latvia, 1070
 in Mexico, 1231
 ministerial education in, 651
 missionaries in China, 386
 on morality of slavery, 1739
 in New Zealand, 1393
 North America, 1223–1226
 philanthropy and, 1475
 in post-Revolutionary America, 1944
 prayer and, 1533
 in prevention of English social revolution, 1689
 in South Africa, 1779–1780
 in Sweden, 1832
 United Methodist Book of Worship, 1112
 in United States, 1353
 views on predestination, 1544
 West African, 774
 women clergy in, 2036
 Methodist Episcopal Church
 Church of the Nazarene and, 449

- Crosby in, 538
 foundation of, 160
 on slave ownership, 1739
 women clergy in, 2032
- Methodist Episcopal Church Conference, 1226–1229
 AME Church and, 19–20
- Methodist Episcopal Church (MEC)
 formation of, 1210
 foundation, 1223
- Methodist Episcopal Church South, 966
- Methodist Federation for Social Service, 1755–1756
- Methodist militia, 357
- Methodist New Connexion, 1021
 Kilham and, 1213
- Methodist Protestant Church, formation, 1227
- Methodists Associated Representing the Cause of Hispanic Americans, 1939
- Methodist Service Book*, 1214
- Methodist Worship Book*, 1214
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Methodius, Bible translation by, 246
- Metz, Johannes Baptist, 1508–1509
- Mexico, 1229–1233
 Presbyterianism in, 1553
 Protestantism in, 1061, 1062
 Townsend's Summer Institute in, 2066
- Meyer, Conrad Ferdinand, writings, 1110
- Meyer, F.B., 1017
- Miall, Edward, 1403
- Michaelius, Jonas, 1601
- Micron, Martin, debates with Menno, 1200
- Middle Ages. See Medieval church
- Middlemarch* (Eliot), 658
- Middleton, Thomas Fanshaw, 1233–1234
- Milbank, John, 1530
- Mildmay Conventions, 1016
- Miles, Henry, Colored Methodist Episcopal Church and, 257
- Miles, Jack, 1575
- Miles, John, Baptist congregation in Wales, 181–182
- Miles, William H., 14
- Military
 in absolutism, 3
 American, Episcopalians in, 678
 chaplaincy in, 374–376
- Millais, John Everett, 1545, 1546
- Millenarians and Millennialism, 1234–1241
- Millennial Laws, of Shakers, 1727
- Millennial Harbinger* (Campbell), 343
- Millennialism, 1025–1026
 rapture and, 1590–1591
 tribulationism in, 1915

- Millennialist. See Chiliasm
- Miller, William, 6, 931, 934, 941, 977, 1241–1244, 1945
 the AMEZ Church, 21–22
 apocalyptic date setting by, 682, 1696, 2004
 Apocalypticism and, 86
- Millerite movement, 1714, 2004.
See also Seventh-Day Adventists
 Apocalypticism and, 86
 foundation of, 1241
- Milligan College, 400
- Mills, John, 1484
- Milne, William, Liang A-Fa and, 1086
- Milton, John, 1244–1247, 1580 advocacy of plural marriage, 1496
 on divorce, 605
 on eschatology, 681
 impact of the King James Version on, 228
 poetry of, 1101
- Ministerial education, 650–653
- Ministerium of Pennsylvania, unification of Lutheran churches, 46
- Ministry, polity and, 1522–1524
- Miracles, Woolston on, 2040
- Miracles* (Lewis), 1084
- Miskotte, K.H., 1388
- Missiology, 1247–1254
 Allen, Roland, 28
 ecclesiology and, 628–629
 in India, 1914
- Missionaries, 723
 Africa, 9–10
 in China, 385–390
 William Carey as, 352–353
- Missionary movement, of twentieth century America, 1947–1948
- Missionary Organizations, 1254–1259
 Anderson, Rufus, 64
- Missionary Register*, Josiah Pratt and, 1252
- Missionary Review of the World*, publication, 1252
- Missionary societies, women in, 2031–2032
- Missionary Training Institute, 396
 foundation of, 234
- Mission Covenant Church, in Sweden, 1832
- Missions, 1259–1262
 the AMEZ Church, 21
 Assemblies of God (AG), 122
 Baptist, 176–181
 British, 1263–1273
 culture in, 544
 dispensationalism in, 599–600
 ELCA in, 704
 Germany, 1273–1279
 in India, 937–941
 in Indonesia, 945–947

- InterVarsity Christian Fellowship and, 957
 in Italy, 962–963
 in Japan, 972–975
 in Korea, 1035–1037
 in Latin America, 1061
 in Liberia, 1095–1096
 Mormonism and, 1316
 North American, 1279–1286
 Pentecostalism and, 1463
 in the Philippines, 1479–1480
 polity and, 1524
 Presbyterian, 1553–1555
 role of the laity, 1053
 in South Pacific, 1436
 Tappan and, 1485
 of United Church of Canada, 1932–1933
- Missions To Jews, 1286–1288
- Missouri Synod, Walther and, 1135, 1149
- Mitchell, W.J. T., 927
- Mitzner, Herman D., 1457
- Modernism, 1288–1294, 1528.
See also Enlightenment
 Darwinism and, 553
 ecclesiology and, 629
 fundamentalism and, 1608
 in German literature, 1111
 human rights and, 899
 Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1379–1381
 sectarianism and, 1697
- Modernity, 1528
 deism and, 573
 Puritanism and, 1583
- Modrzewski, Andrzej Frycz (Andreas Fricius Modrevius), 1294–1295
- Moffat, James, 1295–1296
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Moffat, Robert, 1295, 1551
 missionary work of, 1266
- Moghila, Peter, 1426
- Möhler, Johann Adam, 363, 1296
 views on Protestantism, 209
- Molanus, Gerhard Wolter, 1296–1297
- Mo Letters, 985
- Molkani*, Orthodox schismatics in AUCECB, 25
- Molnár, Albert Szenczi, 903
- Moltmann, Jürgen, 854, 1297–1298, 1508–1509
 christology of, 415
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1030
- Momberume, Muchabaya. see Maranke, John
- Monasticism, 1298–1302
 Martin Luther and, 1137

- Moncey, George, 1613
- Monism, 1390
- Monk, William Henry, 917
- Monod, Adolphe, 1609
- Monod, Frédéric, 1609
- Monod, Theodor, 1017
- Montanism, Spiritualism in, 1800–1801
- Montanists, 1026
- Monteiro, Simeí, as animateur, 1335
- Montgomery, Helen Barrett
 - missionary work, 179
 - president of NBC, 35
- Moody, Dwight Lyman, 791, 830, 930, 1016, 1304–1306, 1353, 1459
 - bible conferences and, 238
 - conference organized by, 233
 - influence of music, 1342–1343
 - Moody Bible Institute and, 1302
 - preaching of, 1538
 - radio revivals and, 1849
 - revival meetings of, 1610
 - in revivals, 1652
 - on sanctification, 1652
 - Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Moody Bible Institute, 729, 791, 930, 1302–1304
 - Dwight Moody and, 1305
 - foundation of, 234
- Moody Radio Network, Moody Bible Institute and, 1303
- Moomaw, B.F., Weir and, 302
- Moon, Charlotte “Lottie” Diggs, missionary activities, 173, 183
- Moon, Irwin, Moody Bible Institute and, 1303
- Moon, Sun Myung, 1396
 - Moonies, 1700
 - sectarianism and, 1700
 - seeker in, 1708
 - Unification Church founding by, 1923
- Moore, Joanna P., missionary work, 178
- Morales, Arcadio, 1553
- Morality
 - education integration with, 649
 - religion as, 569
- Moral law, in Zwinglianism, 2084
- Moral Majority, 738, 1306–1307, 1518
 - in politics, 1851
 - Reagan election and, 404
 - sectarianism and, 1699
 - in Southern Protestantism, 1794
- Moral Rearmament, 1307–1308, 1855
- Moral Science, 405
- Moravian Church, 812, 915, 1308–1312, 1360, 1386, 1491, 1609
 - in Brazil, 1061
 - in Caribbean, 355
 - communism in, 486

- in Denmark, 577
- episcopacy and, 254
- formation of, 1139
- in Herrnhut, 864–865
- John Wesley and, 434, 1985–1986
- marital lottery in, 1719
- mission work of, 1260
- sectarianism and, 1694
- on sexuality, 1721
- Zinzendorf organization of, 2079
- Moravian Mission, foundation, 1255
- More, Henry, 1312
 - Latitudinarianism and, 1064, 1065, 1066
- More, Thomas, 857–858
 - execution of, 1168
- Morelos, José, populist revolt, 1230
- Morgan, Thomas, 1603
- Mörrike, Eduard, writings, 1110
- Morison, John, influence on James Legge, 1076
- Moritz, Karl Philipp, 7
 - writings, 1108
- Mörlin, Joachim, preaching by, 1130
- Mormonism, 1313–1317
 - Book of Mormon*, 250
 - Brigham Young involvement with, 2074–2075
 - church organization in, 1748
 - eschatology in, 682
 - in frontier religion, 785
 - history of, 1945
 - opposition to, 1748–1749
 - polygamy and, 1496–1498
 - secularization and, 1706
 - in Sweden, 1833
 - teachings of, 2074
 - United States westward movement of, 1911–1912, 2075
- Moroni, Mormonism and, 1314
- Morris, E.C., Rev., 14
- Morris, Edmund C., 1349–1352
- Morris, William, 1546
- Morris Brown College, foundation of, 257
- Morrison, Charles Clayton, 1317–1318, 1468
- Morrison, H.C., 878
- Morrison, Robert, 385
 - Bible translation, 248
 - Liang A-Fa and, 1086
- Morrison, William M., 1554
- Morse, Samuel F.B., 1363
- Mortal sin, 492

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Morte D'Arthur (Malory), 1099

- Morton, Harry, 1404
- Morton, Nelle, in Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 747
- Morton, Tony, 889
- Mosheim, Johann Lorenz, 1318–1319
 on church polity, 1132
- Mother Bethal African Methodist Episcopal Church, 13
- Mott, John Raleigh, 1041, 1319–1320, 1553 International Missionary Council and, 1262
 on missions, 1947–1948
 Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
 YMCA and, 1282
- Mott, Lucretia Coffin, 1320–1321, 1439, 1765, 1947
- Moulton, Ebenezer, ministry in Canada, 174
- Movies, 1321–1322
- Mpadi, Simon, 11
- Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior, 812, 1322–1324
 Lutheranism in America and, 1148
 Lutherans, 45
- Muir, Gladdys, peace studies major and, 304
- Mulia, T.S. G., 947
 Batak Protestant Christian Church and, 207
- Müller, Friedrich, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
- Müller, George, 1324, 1499
- Munck, Kaj, execution of, 1170
- Munro, Sir Thomas, 938
- Münster, Thomas, on Spiritualism, 1801
- Münster Colloquy, Rothmann and, 1199
- Münsterite fiasco, Anabaptism and, 61
- Müntzer, Thomas, 834, 837, 1324–1326, 1596
 Antichrist, 74–75
 apocalyptic time and, 1237
 on baptism, 164
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 Luther and, 1122
 politics of, 1055
- Murch, James DeForest, in church institutional realignment, 399
- Murdock, George P., 1497
- Murray, Andrew, 1017
- Murray, John, Universalism and, 1929
- Murton, John, 1616
- Musaeus, Johann, writings, 1132
- Muscular Christianity camping and, 233
 English nationalism and, 1804–1805 modern, 1805–1807 sexuality in, 1725
 spiritual prowess and, 1802–1803
 YMCA and, 2071
- Music, 908–920, 1326
 American, 1326–1330
 English Church, 1330–1334
 Global, 1334–1338

- Northern European, 1338–1342
 Popular, 1342–1344
- Musil, Robert, writings, 1111
- Mxadana, George, as animateur, 1335
- Mystery of Iniquity* (Helwys), 181
- Mysticism, 1922
 Weigel on, 1980
- Mysticism type, seeker as, 1708
- Nababan, S.A. E., 947
- Nadars, conversion of, 1180
- Namibia, Lutheranism in, 1141
- Nantes, Edict of, 333, 756, 1345–1348, 1598
 principles of, 764
- Napoleon, as Antichrist, 383
- Nast, Thomas, 1364
- National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), 453–454
- National Association for the Promotion of Holiness, 342
- National Association of Evangelicals (NAE), 794, 935, 1348–1349, 1455, 1457 Assemblies of God as founding member, 120
 missions, 1257
- National Association of Free Will Baptists (NAFWB), 773
- National Baptist Convention, 174
- National Baptist Convention of America, 14, 1349–1350, 1352
 size of, 192
- National Baptist Convention Unincorporated, 1350, 1352
- National Baptist Convention U.S.A. (NBM, USA), 14, 1349, 1350–1353, 1568
- National Baptist Education Convention, 1351
- National Baptist Evangelical Life and Soul-Saving Assembly, foundation, 174
- National Baptist Publishing Board, 1349–1351
 foundation, 174
- National Bible Society of Scotland, mission work, 243
- National Black Evangelical Association, 1349
- National Broadcasting System, religious broadcasting, 1176
- National Camp Meeting Association, 14
- National Childrens' Homes, foundation, 1214
- National Christian Council (Japan), 974
- National Christian Council of India, 938
- National Council of Churches, 1348, 1353–1354, 1556
 on capital punishment, 350
 NBC membership in, 35
- National Council of the Churches of Christ, USA, 1464
- National holidays and Civil Religion, 876
- Nationalism, 1356–1359
 British foreign missions and, 1263
 in India, 1404
 totalitarianism and, 1903
- National Laymen's Movement, ABC-USA, 35
- National literature, education and, 648
- National Missionary Baptist Convention of America, 1350
 size of, 192

- National Missionary Society (India), 938
 National Primitive Baptist Convention, 1354–1356, 1565
 National Religious Broadcasters, 1348, 1349
 National Socialism (Nazi Reich).
 See also Nazi Germany;
 Nazism
 German Christian support of, 497, 611, 1873, 1903–1904
 Protestantism and, 1903–1904
 social ethics and, 2065
 National Urban League, 454

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- National Vigilance Association, 1571
 National War Tax Resistance Coordinating Committee, 1447
 Native Americans, 1027, 1359–1363 attempts to convert, 785 children, Canadian boarding schools for, 381
 Holy War against, 1976
 Jackson's work with, 970
 John Eliot work with, 659 liberation theology of, 1093, 1885
 Mennonite missionaries to, 1204
 Quaker treatment of, 510
 Williams and, 2013
 Woolman on rights of, 2039
 at YMCA/YWCA, 2072
 Nativism, 1363–1366
 negative view of Catholicism in, 366
Natural History of Religion, 901
 Naturalism
 in German literature, 1110–1111
 scientific, 1675–1676
 Natural Law, 1366–1368, 1512
 education and, 649
 Enlightenment and, 672–673
 homosexuality and, 883
 Hooker and, 885
 in Middle Ages, 1671
 Pufendorf and, 1576
 social ethics versus, 1690
 Wollaston on, 2026
 Natural religion, 1893
 neology and, 1376
 Natural selection, in Darwinism, 1673
 Natural theology, 1371, 1892
Natural Theology (Paley), 1672
 Darwinism and, 551–552, 555
 Nature, 1369–1372
 covenant of, 526
 symbolic view of, 1671–1672
 Wordsworth on, 2041–2044

- Nature and Destiny of Man* (Reinhold Niebuhr), 1880–1881
Nature (Emerson), 661
Nature of Doctrine (Lindbeck), 611
 Naudé, Christiaan Frederick Beyers, 1372
 Naumann, Friedrich, 1373, 1587
 Nazareth Baptist Church, in South Africa, 10
 Nazi Germany, 810–811, 814, 827, 1399, 1483
 Holocaust and, 879–881, 997
 Nazism
 Bonhoeffer's opposition to, 269–273
 Confessing Church and, 488–491
 Freemason persecution by, 775
 Friedrich Dibelius on, 592
 Joint Christian Council opposition to, 216
 just war against, 512
 Karl Barths' opposition to, 204
 Lutheran resistance to, 1136
 Methodism and, 1219
 Neale, John Mason, 917
 Neander, Johann August Wilhelm, 1373–1374, 1583
Nederlandse Hervormde Kerk. See Dutch Reformed Church
 Nee, Watchman, 1374
 Neff, Felix, 1609
 Neill, Stephen Charles, 1374–1375
 Neology, 1375–1378
 authority and, 138
 Semler on, 1712
 Spalding in, 1796–1797
 Neo-Orthodoxy, 1378–1383, 1396
 on faith, 734
 Forsyth on, 757
 Social Gospel decline and, 1756–1757
 theology of, 1873
 Neo-Reformation Theology, 1381
 Nephites, Mormonism and, 1314
 Netherlands, 1383–1389
 antislavery movement in, 1741
 Calvinism in, 333–334
 Council of Churches, 217
 Dutch Union (Baptist), 186
 Protestant political parties in, 1507
 Remonstrants in, 1604–1606
 secularization in, 1702
 Socinianism in, 1767
 Zwinglianism in, 2086
 Network of Christian Peace Organizations, 1446
Neuchâtel Bible, 247
 Nevin, John Williamson, 1389
 on the Lord's Supper, 1118
 Mercersburg theology and, 1205–1207
 Schaff association with, 1653–1654
 Nevius, Helen, mission work of, 1281

- Nevius, John, 1036, 1555
 mission work of, 1281
- New Age Movements, 1389–1391
- New Atlantis* (Bacon), 158
- New Baptists, 1490
- Newbiggin, J.E. Lesslie, 1394
- New Call to Peacemaking, 1447
- New Connection General Baptists, missionary work, 178
- New Divinity, 888–889
- New England, Free Will Baptists in, 771–772
- New England Nonresistance Society, 1439
- New-England Primer*, impact of, 1102
- New Evangelicalism, 832
- Newfoundland, immigration to, 344
- New Frontiers International, 890
- New Hampshire Confession of Faith, 804
- New Harmony, 812
- New International Version of Bible, 224, 1348
- New Jerusalem Bible*, basis for, 250
- New Light Congregationalists, beliefs, 171
- New Light revival, 344
- “New Lights,” 193
- Newman, John Henry, 917, 1032, 1394–1395, 1429–1433, 1443, 1584
 Anglo-Catholicism and, 69
 view of justification, 1005
- Newman, Junius E., work in Rio, 1222
- New Religious Movements, 1390
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- New Testament
 the bishop in, 252
 Devil in, 584
 salvation in, 1643–1645
- New Testament: An American Translation*, 829
- Newton, Benjamin Wills, 1499
- Newton, Isaac, 1371, 1395–1396
 Enlightenment and, 673
 on eschatology, 682
- Newton, John, 830, 916, 1610
- Newton, Sir Isaac, 1028
- New Tribes Mission, size, 1286
- New Version of the Psalms* (Tate and Brady), 1327
- New Woman, 2030–2032
- New World Translation of the Holy Scriptures*, 250
- New York Bible Society, foundation, 243
- New York Ecumenical Missionary Conference, 2050
- New York Female Moral Reform Society, 1968
- New York Sabbath Committee, 1636–1637
- New Zealand, 1391–1394
 Bremen Society in, 1275
 Lutheranism in, 1143

- Presbyterianism in, 1554
 - Protestant political parties in, 1508
- Niagra Bible Conference, 233
- Nicean-Constantinopolitan Creed, 417
- Nicene Creed, 855
- Nicholson, John, 819
- Niclaes, Hendrick, 1384
- Nicolai, Friedrich, writings, 1108
- Nicolai, Philipp, 1486, 1534
- Niebuhr, H. Richard, 1030, 1379, 1396–1397, 1518, 1549
 - on Christ and culture, 545, 1874, 1884
 - on cultural Protestantism, 542–543
 - on denominationalism, 583
- Niebuhr, Reinhold, 1021, 1024–1025, 1030, 1397–1399, 1439, 1518, 1549, 1594
 - on colonialism, 1874
 - on evil, 587
 - in Fellowship of Southern Churchmen, 746
 - Liberal Protestantism and, 1086
 - liberal Protestant theology of, 1880–1881, 1884
 - Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1379–1381
 - on sect-church typology, 1772–1773
 - on sin, 1734
 - on Social Gospel, 1756–1757
 - views on natural law, 1368
- Niemöller, Martin, 1399
 - Nazi regime and, 488, 490–491
 - “Pastors Emergency Defense League” and, 199
 - Pastor’s Emergency League and, 1140
- Nietzsche, Friedrich, 1029, 1381, 1399–1401, 1428
 - on death of God, 566–567
 - writings, 1111
- Niger Crisis, 539
- Nigeria, 1401–1402
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
 - Methodism in, 1222
 - Oshitelu in, 1427
 - Presbyterianism in, 1554
- Nihilism, 567
- Niles, D.T., publications, 1337
- Nilsson, Frederick. O., 176
- Ninety-Five Theses, 1510, 1595
- Nitschmann, David, Moravian Church and, 1310
- Ni Tuosheng, 1374
- Nobili, Robert de, 937
 - in India, 1179
 - missionary efforts, 1254
- Noll, Richard, 999
- Nomensen, Ludwig Ingwer, mission work of, 206, 946
- Nonconformity, 767, 1402–1404
 - Anglicanism in, 418
 - congregationalism in, 507
 - development of, 601

- in England, 669
- origins of, 600–601
- Puritanism and, 1577, 1580
- of Puritans, 339
- William Carey conversion to, 352
- Nondenominational Protestants, worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092
- Non-Jurors, William Law and, 1074
- Noordmans, Oepke, 1388
- Nordic Enlightenment, 752
- Normative scientism, 1676
- Norris, J. Frank
 - BBU and, 168–169
 - World Baptist Fellowship and, 172, 197
- Norris, Kathleen, 1575
- North America
 - Baptist beginnings in, 170–171
 - Baptist churches in, 170, 171–172
 - Baptist migration to, 170
 - Calvinism in, 335
 - camp meetings in, 340
 - literature, 229–230
 - missions among slaves in, 1736
 - religious affiliation statistics in, 2088
 - Society of Friends in, 1764–1766
 - twentieth century theology in, 1882–1886
 - Unitarianism in, 1928–1929
- Northern Baptist Convention (NBC), 35, 168
 - fundamentalist-modernist controversy in, 513
 - organization of, 172
- Northfield, Massachusetts, conference, 233
- North India, Church of, 1404–1405, 1555
- North Korea, suppression of churches, 1170
- Norway, 1406–1412
 - Baptist Union in, 186
 - Haugianism in, 849
 - Protestant political parties in, 1507
- Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Free Church, Evangelical Free Church of America from, 703–704
- Novalis, 1620
- Nova Scotia, immigration to, 344
- Novum Organum* (Bacon), 158
- Nozeman, Cornelis, 1605
- Nuremberg Code, 695
- Nuremberg Edict, 892, 893
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Nyack College, history of, 396
- Nyberg, Anders, song collections, 1336
- Nygren, Anders, 1379, 1412
 - Lutheran World Federation and, 1147
- Öberlin, Johann Friedrich, 1413, 1491, 1609

- Enlightenment and, 673
- Observances, 1414–1419
- Occasion of sin, 492
- Occom, Samson, 1360
missionary work of, 1260
- Oceana, religious affiliation statistics in, 2088
- Ochino, Bernardino, 1419
- Ockenga, Harold John, 1348
- O'Donovan, Oliver, 1368
- Odunlami, Sophia, 11
- Odyssey* (Homer, Chapman's translation), 1100
- Oecolampadius, Johannes, 1004, 1420–1421, 1442
Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
on Lord's Supper, 1826–1827
preaching by, 1536
in Swiss Reformation, 1837–1838
- Oetinger, Friedrich, 7, 1490
- Of the Lawes of Ecclesiastical Politie*, 885–886
- Oke, Janette, themes of, 1104
- O'Kelly, James, challenge to bishops, 1223
- O'Kelly, Thomas, 966
- Old Baptists. see Primitive Baptists
- Oldham, Joseph H., 1421–1422, 1556
ecumenism and, 1270
- Old Testament, Devil in, 584
- Olevian, Caspar, 855
- Olivetan, Robert, Neuchâtel Bible, 247
- Olsen, Howard S., song collections, 1336
- Olson, Charles, 1529
- Oncken, Johann Gerhard
baptism of, 185
German Baptist church and, 189
missionary work, 179
work in Germany, 183
- On Death and Dying* (Kubler-Ross), 565
- 101 Ways to Help Save the Earth* (National Council of Churches), 631
- Oneida Community, practices of, 1696
- Open Brethren, 1499–1500
- Open theism, 713
- Operation Sweden, 1829–1830
- Opitz, Martin, 915
music of, 1106
- Oppong (Oppon, Opon), Kwame Sampson, 818, 1422
- Oracl'es of Reason* (Bount), 263
- Ordass, Lajos, imprisonment of, 1136
- Order of the Brothers of the Sword, crusade against the Balts, 1067
- Ordination, 1417
of homosexual clergy, 883, 885, 900 traditions concerning, 2034–2035
vocation and, 1965–1966
of women (See Women clergy)
- Ordnung*, Amish values, 56–57

- Original sin
 in Calvinism, 337
 in children, 379–380
 devil and, 585
 empirical science and, 1670
 in Wesleyanism, 1993
- Origin of Species* (Darwin), 552, 1673, 1946
- Origins of Modern Science* (Butterfield), 325
- Orme, William, on missions, 1248
- Ortega, Rubén, conversion of, 1232
- Orthodox Presbyterian Church, formation, 1153
- Orthodox Protestantism, worldwide affiliation statistics on, 2090–2092
- Orthodoxy, 1422–1424
 in Africa, 18
 art and, 107
 atonement and, 125–126
 dispensationalism in, 597
 doctrine in, 607
 German Lutheranism and, 1138
 Lutheran, justification doctrine in, 328
 Lutheranism and, 1131–1133
 Reformed, 332
 Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144–1145
 Soviet era, 25–26
- Orthodoxy, Eastern, 1424–1427, 1616, 1628 affinity of Anglicanism with, 67
 clerical structure of, 464
 missions, 1257–1258
 persecution of, 1169
- Osborne, Daisy, 1464
- Osborne, T.L., 1464
- Osei-Mensah, Gottfried, LCWE and, 1073
- Oshitelu, Josiah Olunowo, 1427
- Osiander, Andreas, 825, 995, 1427–1428
 christology of, 411
 Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
 concept of justification, 1003
- Ostwald, Wilhelm, on Ersatzreligion, 1675
- Otterbein, Philip William, 813
 Evangelical United Brethren Church and, 707
- Otto, Lepoldold, 1503
- Ottolini, Pietro, 964
- Out Country* (Strong), 1753–1754
- Outerman, Jakob, martyrology, 1172
- Overbeck, Franz Camille, 1428
 Swiss Reformation and, 1839
- Overton, Richard, Leveller movement and, 1082
- Owen, John, christology of, 412
- Oxford Group, Frank Buchman and, 1308
- Oxford Movement, 346, 1032, 1411, 1428–1434, 1443
 in America, 677
 Anglo-Catholicism and, 69

British foreign missions and, 1263
 Danish Protestantism and, 579
 Darwinism and, 553
 deaconesses in, 562
 English church music and, 1333
 Evangelical Alliance and, 702
 Huddleston and, 894

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

hymnody of, 917
 industrialization and, 669–670
 Keble and, 1014
 Newman and, 1394–1395
 Parker Society and, 1443
 Pusey and, 1584
 Rossetti and, 1623
 in Scotland, 675
 sermon initiating, 434
 Society for the Preservation of the Gospel and, 1763
 Tractarians in, 348
 view of justification, 1005
 Oxford University, 867–868
 Oyer, Mary, study of African music, 1337
 Ozman, Agnes, baptism of, 1284

Pacific Islands, 1435–1436

Pacifism, 1436–1440, 1976.

See also Conscientious objection;
 Peace organizations
 Amish beliefs, 56
 Fosdick on, 758
 of George Cadbury, 327 of King, 1022–1024
 Shakers and, 1726

Pagan Greek gods, Trinity doctrine as, 1713

Paine, Thomas, 899, 1574

on deism, 572
 on Devil, 586

Paine College, foundation of, 257

Pakianathan, Solomon, 946

Paleario, Aonio, 962

Palestine, Protestant missions to, 1287

Palestinians, Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology movement of, 1528

Paley, William, 1371, 1440

Latitudinarianism and, 1066
 on physico-theology, 1672

Palladius, Niels, 1600

Palladius, Peder, 1600

Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144

Palmer, Elihu, on deism, 572–573

Palmer, Paul

- churches founded by, 193
 - Free Will Baptists and, 173
 - in Southern Free Will Baptists, 772
- Palmer, Phoebe Worrall, 449, 877, 1440–1441
 - Booth and, 284
 - Holiness message, 1216
 - Holiness movement and, 1225
- Palmquist, Gustaf, 176
- Palmyra Manifesto, origins, 1224
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart, 854, 1441–1442, 1673
 - concept of Kingdom of God, 1030
 - on systematic theology, 611
- Panofsky, Erwin, 927
- Pansophism, Comenius in, 484
- Pantheism, hegelian, 749
- Papua New Guinea, Lutheranism in, 1142
- Paracelsus, 1442–1443
- Paradise Lost* (Milton), 228, 1101–1102
 - composition, 1244
 - impact, 1247
- Parham, Charles Fox, 1454, 1457, 1459–1460, 1462
 - Pentecostal movement and, 236
- Parker, Daniel, on missions, 196
- Parker, Joseph, 1403
 - in Southern Free Will Baptists, 772
- Parker, Matthew, 868, 1443, 1444–1445
- Parker, Theodore, 1445
 - on Unitarianism, 1928–1929
- Parker Society, 1443–1444
- Parkes, James, 1484
- Parrinder, Geoffrey, 1401
- Parsons, Robert, compositions by, 1331
- Particular Baptists (Calvinists), 770–771
 - beliefs, 170, 181, 185, 188
 - John Bunyan and, 319
- Pashkov, Vasilii A., AUCECB, 25
- Pashkovites, AUCECB, 25
- Passavant, William A.
 - Lutheran leader, 46
 - Pittsburgh Synod and, 1149
- Passion Plays, themes of, 1099
- Pastor, Adam, ordination of, 1201
- Pastoral character, theology and, 1863
- Pastor's Emergency League, formation of, 1140
- Pastors for Peace, 1447
- Patmore, Coventry, 1545
- Patrick, Simon, Latitudinarianism and, 1063, 1064
- Patteson, J.C., missionary work of, 1268
- Paul, Apostle, on
 - celibacy, 366–367, 464
 - church structure, 464
 - culture and faith, 545

- gender and status, 761
- transformation by Holy Spirit, 1639
- Paul, Joseph, missionary efforts, 1254
- Pauline privilege, for divorce, 602, 604
- Paulus, Heinrich, 986
- Payne, Daniel (Bishop), 13
 - Wilberforce University position, 257
- Payne, Ernest, 1404
- Payton, Alan, biblical influence on, 231
- Peabody, Lucy W., missionary work, 179
- Peace Action, 1448
- Peacemaking, just-peace theory in, 1976–1977
- Peace of Augsburg, 814, 824, 837, 1511, 1562, 1596, 1597, 1606, 1607
- Peace of Passau, 824
- Peace of Westphalia, 1511
- Peace organizations, 1445–1450.
 - See also* Pacifism
 - Woolman on, 2040
- Peace Pledge Union, 1439
- Peale, Norman Vincent, 1365, 1450, 1850
 - preaching by, 1540
- Pearl of Great Price*, Mormonism and, 1315
- Pearsall, Robert, 870
- Peasants Revolt, Luther and, 1122
- Peasants' War (Germany), 1595, 1596

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Peck, John Mason, missionary work, 178
- Peck, M.Scott, 1574
- Pedagogical education, 484
- Pedersen, Johannes Peder Ejler, 1451
- pedobaptists, 165
- Peel, Robert, 1430
- Peerless Pioneer Readers* (McGuffey), 1189
- Peirce, C.S., 1567
- Pelagian controversy, 654–655
- Pelagianism, in Wesleyanism, 1994
- Pelagius, on conversion, 518–519
- Penance, as major sacrament, 465
- Penn, William, 1438, 1439, 1451–1452, 1487, 1605
 - English Quakers and, 510
 - in North America, 1765
 - Quaker beliefs of, 781
- Pennefather, William, bible conferences and, 238
- Pennington, James, Rev., 15
- Penn-Lewis, Jessie, 1018
- Pentecostal Assemblies, size, 1286
- Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, 1452, 1464
- Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America, 123, 1457–1458, 1464
- Pentecostal Church, architecture, 91
- Pentecostal Church of God, 1452–1454

Pentecostalism, 1458–1466

- in Africa, 11
 - American missions and, 1284
 - Assemblies of God and, 123
 - in Brazil, 295–296
 - British house churches and, 889
 - in Caribbean, 356
 - Christian Science effect on, 640
 - in Church of the Nazarene, 451
 - David Koresh in, 1699
 - in Denmark, 580
 - du Plessis in, 616
 - in England, 670
 - in Estonia, 686
 - evangelicalism shaped by, 710
 - Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship from, 786–789
 - in Ghana, 818
 - globalization of, 1774–1775
 - in Indonesia, 946, 947–948
 - International Church of the Foursquare Gospel, 954–955
 - International Pentecostal Holiness Church, 955–956
 - in Italy, 963–964
 - Jim Jones's People's Temple in, 1699
 - in Latin America, 1061–1062
 - missions, 1258
 - in New Zealand, 1393
 - in Nigeria, 1402
 - origins in dissent, 601
 - prayer and, 1534
 - Prosperity Gospel of, 952
 - racial integration in, 442
 - restorationism and, 1608
 - Roberts and, 1613–1614
 - roots in Holiness Movement, 342
 - in Russia, 1627, 1631
 - sectarianism and, 1698–1700
 - secularization and, 1705–1706
 - serpent handlers in, 1712
 - in Sierra Leone, 1732
 - in South, 1793
 - in South Africa, 8
 - speaking in tongues in, 396, 1900–1901
 - in Sweden, 1832
 - Wesleyan Church on, 1990
 - Wesleyan Holiness Movement and, 1991
 - women clergy in, 2033
 - worldwide membership of, 1700
- Pentecostal Movement
- music and, 1343–1344
 - start of, 236
- Pentecostal Peace Fellowship, 1449
- Pentecostals, in AUCECB, 25–26

- Pentecostal World Fellowship, 1454–1457, 1464
- People's Pulpit Association, 1627
- People's Temple, of Jim Jones, 1699
- Percival, Thomas, on medical ethics, 694–695
- Perestroika*, freedoms granted under, 26
- Perfection, Christian, in Wesleyanism, 1996
- Perfectionism
 - sectarianism and, 1696
 - on sexuality, 1719
- Periodicals, Protestant, 1466–1470
- Perkins, William, 1470–1472, 1578, 1579, 1616
 - role of the laity and, 1051
 - tutor of Ames, William, 54
 - views on predestination, 1544
- Perks, Sir Robert, 951
- Perrinists, in Geneva, 330
- Perseverance of Saints, 334, 337
- Personal words, in evangelism, 715–716, 718, 722
- Peru
 - Protestantism in, 1062
 - Townsend's Summer Institute in, 2067
- Peters, Jesse (Jesse Galphin), 13
- Peters, Thomas, 1472
- Peter the Great, invasion of Riga, 1069
- Pethrus, Lewi, 1455
- Petition, prayers of, 2061
- Petri, Laurentius, 1472, 1600
 - Reformation in Sweden, 1130
 - Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
- Petri, Olaus, 1472–1473, 1600, 1828
 - Reformation in Sweden, 1130
 - Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
- Petrine Confession, 401
- Pétursson, Hallgrím, 922
- Peukert, Helmut, 1509
- Pfaff, Christoph Matthaeus, on church polity, 1132
- Pfander, K.G., 1035
- Phelps, Wilbur Franklin, 1365
- Philadelphia Association, formation, 182
- Philadelphia Bible Society, territorial disputes, 242
- Philadelphia Seminary and the General Council, Lutheranism, 46
- Philadelphian Society, foundation of, 1075
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Philanthropy, 1473–1476
- Philip, John, 1478
 - missionary work of, 1266
- Philip II, Hapsburg ruler, confessional phase of absolutism, 2
- Philip of Hesse, 867, 1476–1478, 1495, 1596
- Philippine Association of Bible and Theological Schools, 1868
- Philippines, 1478–1481

- Bible society work in, 243
- history of immigration, 118
- Philippism, 825, 837
- Philippists, beliefs, 281–282
- Philippo, James, Baptist work, 177
- Phillips, J.B., religious paraphrases by, 250
- Phillips, Jeremiah, missionary work, 179
- Philo-Semitism, 1482–1484
 - millennialism and, 1240–1241
- Photocopying, use of, 1178
- Physical fitness, YMCA and, 2071, 2073
- Physician-assisted suicide. See Euthanasia
- Physico-theology, 1672–1673
- Pickett, Clarence, executive secretary of AFSC, 43
- Pickett, J. Waskom
 - on missions, 1251
 - study of mass movements, 1180
- Pickstock, Catherine, 1530
- Piepkorn, Arthur Carl, 1562
- Pierson, Arthur Tappan, 830, 1485
 - Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Piers Plowman* (Langland), on monasticism, 1300
- Pietism, 7, 380, 811–814, 826, 929, 1485–1492
 - absolutism and, 3
 - Amana's roots in, 33
 - Arndt, Johann as forerunner of, 102
 - authority and, 137
 - Calvinism in, 334
 - on confirmation, 166
 - confirmation and, 501
 - democracy and, 575
 - in Denmark-Norway, 1407
 - denominations and, 581
 - ecumenism in, 635
 - education in, 644
 - empiricism and, 665
 - in England, 669
 - Enlightenment and, 672
 - evangelistic organizations and, 726–727
 - Finnish church in, 752
 - German evangelicals and, 714
 - German Lutheranism and, 1138
 - in Germany, 577
 - Great Awakenings and, 140
 - in Halle, 837–838
 - Hermann in, 767
 - in Herrnhut, 864
 - hymnody of, 915–916
 - in India, 937
 - Karlstadt as forerunner of, 1013
 - Lutheranism and, 1133
 - missionary work and, 1260

- in missions to Sierra Leone, 1731
- missions to the Jews and, 1286–1287
- Muhlenberg and, 1323
- during Nazi regime, 489
- neology and, 1376
- pilgrimages in, 1911
- role of the laity, 1051
- Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144–1145
- sectarianism and, 1693–1695
- in seventeenth-century Hungary, 903
- Spener in, 1797
- sports in, 1805
- in Sweden, 1831
- Swiss Reformation and, 1839
- theological programs of, 1710
- theology and, 1863–1864
- Thomasius on, 1890
- view of afterlife, 851
- vs. orthodoxy, 1424
- Wolff opposition to, 2025
- Pilgrimages, 1911–1914. See Travels and Pilgrimages
- Pilgrim fathers, 1492–1493, 1751
 - on congregationalism, 507–508
- Pilgrims, 1693
- Pilgrim's Progress* (Bunyan), 228, 319, 320, 928, 1036, 1102, 1911, 1493, 1574, 1580, 1620
- Pilkington, George Lawrence, 1494
- Pilmore, Joseph, 966
- Pineda, Juan Pérez de, Bible translation by, 247
- Piper, William, 1461
- Pittenger, Norman, 1568
- Pitts, Fountain E., Methodism and, 1222
- Plain Dutch, 812
- Plan of Separation, Methodist, 1228
- Platonism
 - Crummell on, 541
 - Spiritualism in, 1800
- Platz, Elizabeth, Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
- Pleiades, formation of, 1145
- Plessy v. Ferguson* (1896), 1548
- Plettenberg, Wolter von, Livonian Order and, 1068
- Pluetschau, H., 937
- Pluralism
 - heresy and, 863
 - human rights and, 899
 - toleration and, 1897
- Plural marriage, 1495–1499, 1719, 1749.
 - See also* Polygamy
 - in Africa, 18
- Plütschau, assignment of, 1273
- Plymouth Brethren, 346, 792, 1016, 1374, 1499–1500
 - Apocalypticism in, 86–87
 - Darby and, 550

- on dispensationalism, 598, 682
- sectarianism in, 1694
- Plymouth Colony, 1492–1493
- Pobedonostsev, Konstantin P., repression of Slavic Protestants, 25
- Poetry
 - Anne Bradstreet, 291
 - Bible translations, 228
 - Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046; Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 - biblicism, 230–231
 - Christian, by Dickinson, 593
 - folk, 1109
 - Robert Browning, 308–309
 - of William Blake, 261–262
- Poissy, Colloquy of, 1500, 1598
- Poland, 1500–1506
 - Baptists in, 186
 - Lutheran reforms, 1130
 - Methodism in, 1218
 - Socinianism in, 1766–1767
 - Sozzini in, 1795–1796
 - Unitarians in, 1925
- Pole, Reginald, 961
- Polite Protestantism, 1684
- Political parties, 1507–1508
- Political theology, 1508–1509, 1881
- Politics, 1509–1519
 - in absolutism, 2–3
 - Christian Coalition in, 404
- Politics*, Althusius, Johannes, 31–32
- Polity, 1519–1525
 - African American Baptist and Methodist churches, 13
 - AME church, 20
 - of Presbyterian church, 1556–1558
- Polyander, Johannes, 1492, 1604
- Polygamy, 803, 1495–1499, 1719, 1749.
 - See also* Plural marriage
 - Lambeth Conference on, 74
 - Mormonism and, 1314
- Polynesia, 1435
- Pontifical Confutation, 495
- Pontoppidan, Erik
 - Pietism and, 1133
 - writings, 1145
- Pontormo, Jacopo, 961
- Pope, Alexander, writings, 1103
- Pope Paul IV, 962
- Popoff, Peter, scandals, 1177
- Pornography, 1724
- Portrait of an Artist as a Young Man* (Joyce), God and freedom in, 1289
- Portugal, Baptist Union in, 186

- Porvoo. See also Ecumenical Agreements
 Porvoo Agreement, 436
 1996, British and Irish Anglican Churches, 69
 Danish rejection of, 580
 doctrine in, 612
 participants in, 633
 Postcolonialism, 1525–1528
 mission work and, 1262
 Post-Lithuanian Commonwealth, Antitrinitarianism and, 81–83
 Postmillennialism, 1028
 Postmodernity, 861, 1528–1531
 culture in, 545
 empiricism and, 667
 Poststructuralism, 1528–1529
 Potentiality, 1390
Power of Positive Thinking, 1450
 Practical syllogism, 657
 Practical theology, of John Wesley, 1987
Practice of Piety (Bayly), 1340
 Praetorius, Michael, 1531–1532
 work of, 1339
 Pratt, Josiah, Missionary Register and, 1252
Praxis pietatis, conventicles and, 516
 Prayer, 1417–1418, 1532–1535
 in worship services, 2061
 Preaching, 1535–1541
 Lutheranism and, 1137
 monasticism and, 1299
 by Robert Strawbridge, 1223
 Precious Stones fellowship, 11
 Predestination, 1542–1545.
 See also Double predestination;
 Election
 Ames, William, 53
 Arminianism and, 1423–1424
 AUA philosophy and, 49–50
 Barth's concept of, 1007
 in Calvinism, 337, 361
 in Canons of Dort, 614
 Coccejus on, 473
 covenant and, 523
 devil and, 585
 double, 1007
 Gomar's defense of, 828
 Hobbes's view of, 872
 Hooker's rejection of, 887
 Penn on, 781
 in Scotland, 1684
 Sebastian Castellio views on, 359
 in Wesleyanism, 1994
 Westminster Confession on, 2002
 Zwingli on, 2083

Premillennial dispensationalism, Apocalypticism and, 86–87
 Premillennialism, 383, 426
 Gordon and, 830
 Prenter, Regin, 1562
 Pre-Raphaelites, 1545–1546, 1623
 Presbyterian Alliance, 1781
 Presbyterian church government, 1556–1558
 Presbyterian Church U.S.A., 1547–1550, 1552–1553

Book of Order, 1519 elders in, 1522
 formation of, 1189
 Keeping Body and Soul Together, 1163
 missions to the Jews, 1287
 views on predestination, 1544

Presbyterianism, 1550–1556
 Alliance of Reformed Churches in, 2044–2045
 in Australia, 1950
 Book of Common Worship, 1112
 in Brazil, 1061
 camp meetings in, 340
 on church and state, 421
 church order in, 582
 in Colonial America, 1943
 colonialism and, 482

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

confirmation in, 504–505
 democracy and, 575
 Elizabeth I and, 660
 in English Civil Wars, 456
 Fosdick in, 758
 French Confession and, 333
 in Ireland, 959
 in Korea, 1035–1036
 in Mexico, 1231
 ministerial education in, 651
 on morality of slavery, 1739
 in New Zealand, 1392, 1393
 Nonconformity and, 1402, 1403
 Old and New Lights in, 2022 ordered church life in, 332
 Orthodox Presbyterian Church, 1153 political, 535
 prayer and, 1533
 in Scotland, 1681
 Scottish Episcopal Church and, 674
 in seventeenth-century Hungary, 903
 on slavery, 1946
 in South Africa, 1779–1781
 Thomas Cartwright in, 358
 Toleration Act and, 335

- in Ulster, 1921–1922
- unification of, 1948
- views on predestination, 1544
- women clergy in, 2032
- Presbyterian Peacemaking Program, 1449–1450
- Preus, J.A.O., Lutheran Church Missouri Synod and, 1150
- Price, Richard, 1620
- Price, Robert M., 867
- Prierias, Sylvester, Luther and, 1120
- Priesthood of All Believers., 815, 898, 909, 944, 1417, 1474, 1550, 1558–1563, 1803, 1964, 2035
 - in African-instituted churches, 16
 - education and, 647
 - ethics and, 690
 - Lutheranism and, 1139
 - vocation in, 1965
 - Walther on, 1972
- Priestley, Joseph, 1371, 1563–1565, 1611, 1686–1687
 - Unitarianism and, 1927–1928
- Priests
 - deist attitude toward, 569
 - laicized, 472
 - shortage of, 472
 - supernatural character of, 466
 - in third to fifth centuries, 464–465
 - universal Christian, 1798
- Primitive Baptists, 1354–1356, 1565–1566, 1696
 - views on missionaries, 196
 - views on missions, 189
- Primitive Christianity* (Bultmann), 317
- Primitive Methodist Church, 1566–1567
- Primitive Methodists
 - in Britain, 1210
 - foundation, 290
- Princeton Theological Seminary, history of, 651
- Princeton Theology, 336
- Princeton University, founding of, 234
- Principles of Geology* (Lyell), Darwinism and, 551
- Prinsterer, Guillaume Groen van, 1387
- Printed words (literature), in evangelism, 715, 717, 719, 724–725
- Printing press, 1573
- Prison ministry, of Elizabeth Fry, 786
- Private prayer, 1534
- Privatization
 - secularization as, 1705–1706
 - toleration and, 1897
- Problem of Pain* (Lewis), 1084
- Process theology, 1567–1568, 1673, 1881, 1884
 - Darwinism and, 554
 - ecology and, 630–631
 - empiricism and, 667
- Proclaimed words, in evangelism, 715–716, 718, 722–723
- Progressive National Baptist Convention (PNBC), 14, 1352, 1568–1569

- foundation, 174
- size of, 192
- Prohibition Party, 1854–1855
- Projection theory of religion, 750
- Promise Keepers, 743
 - on sports and Christianity, 1806
- Property Gospel, 952
- Prophecy, Whiston on, 2004
- Proportionality, in just-war theory, 1975
- Prostitution, 1569–1572, 1724
 - transcendentalism and, 1909
- Protestant Dissenters, 767
- Protestant Ethic, 943
- Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism* (Weber), 1770–1772, 1803, 1979
- Protestant higher education, 867–870
- Protestant Principle, 455, 1658
 - Tillich on, 1891
- Protestant protest, of Luther, 1691
- Protestant Reformation, baptism in, 161–165
- Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State (POAU), 53
- Protestant Scholasticism, 1422
- Proto-womanism, 2026–2027
- Prudential Committee, Anderson, Rufus, 64
- Prussia, church and state in, 1656
- Prussian Union, 1572–1573
 - ecumenism in, 635
 - Evangelical and Reformed Church and, 702
- Psalmody, 908–920
- Ptolemy Philadelphus, translation of the Bible ordered by, 222
- Publishing, 1573–1576
 - denominations and, 582
 - dispensationalism in, 600
 - eschatology in, 683–684, 792
 - iconography and, 928
 - InterVarsity Press, 958
 - in Korea, 1036
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Protestant periodicals, 1466–1470
 - in Reformation, 1026
- Pufendorf, Samuel, 1576
 - defense of Lutheranism, 1132
- Punshon, Morley, influence of, 1214
- Purcell, Henry, 1576–1577
 - compositions by, 1332
- Purgatory, mass for souls in, 492
- Puritanism, 1577–1583, 1609.
 - See also* English Puritanism
 - absolutism and, 3
 - in American literature, 229–230
 - Ames, William, 53

- architecture, 90
- Arminians versus, 668
- art and, 107
- calendar reform and, 875
- Calvinism in, 334
- in Colonial America, 1941
- colonialism and, 482
- conventicles and, 516, 1751
- on discerning state of soul, 2030
- on election, 657
- empirical science and, 1670
- English, 192–193
- in English Civil Wars, 456
- on faith, 734
- Holy War characteristics of, 1976
- Hooker's arguments against, 887
- human rights and, 898
- John Milton and, 1244
- on marital sex, 1720
- millennialism and, 1239
- music and, 1326
- politics and, 1514–1515
- Richard Baxter and, 209
- sabbatarianism in, 1635–1636
- science and, 1370
- sectarianism of, 1692–1693
- on spiritual pilgrimage, 1911
- on sports, 1804
- sports and, 1803
- view on conjugal sex, 370
- witch executions and, 2020
- Puritanism Civil War, William Law in, 348
- Puritan party, in England, 335
- Pursuit of the Millennium* (Cohn), 393
- Pusey, Edward, influence on Liddon, 1097
- Pusey, Edward Bouverie, 917, 1429, 1583–1584
 - Anglo-Catholicism and, 69
- Puseyism, 1584
- Putney Association, practices of, 1696
- Pyrrhonism, 1898

- Quakers.
 - See also* Friends, Society of
 - AFSC and, 42
 - architecture, 90–91
 - on the Lord's Supper, 1118
 - Shaking, 1725–1728
- Quaker State, 1942
- Quaque, Philip, 9
- Quebec Act of 1774, 1363
- Quenstedt, Johann Andreas, 1424

- Lutheranism and, 1138
 - writings, 1131
- Quest for a Black Theology* (Roberts), 258, 259
- Quietism, 782–783
- Quiet Revolution, in Quebec, 346
- Quimby, Phineas Parkhurst, influence on Mary Baker Eddy, 405

- Raabe, Wilhelm, writings, 1110
- Rab, Christoph, martyrology, 1171
- Rabus, Ludwig, martyrology, 1170–1171
- Racism, Northern, 460
- Rade, Martin, 1587
 - influence on Karl Barth, 203
- Radio
 - Christian broadcasting, 1176–1177
 - fundamentalism on, 793–794
- Radstock, Lord, AUCECB, 25
- Radziwill, Mikolaj, 1501
- Ragaz, Leonhard, 891, 1029, 1044, 1587–1588
- Rahner, Karl, 863–864
- Rahtmann, Hermann, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132
- Raikes, Robert, 1551, 1588
 - as founder of Sunday School, 1824
- Ramabai, Pandita, 1588–1589
- Ramabai Association, 1589
- Ramm, Nicolaus, Latvian Lutheranism and, 1068
- Ramsay, Arthur Michael, 1589–1590
- Ramus, Peter, in Arminianism, 92–95
- Randall, Benjamin
 - Fee Will Baptists and, 171
 - in New England Branch of Free Will Baptists, 771–772
- R1 and R2 churches, 889–890
- Ranke, Leopold von, 1594–1595
- Rankin, Melinda, missionary work, 1230
- Ranson, Reverend C., AME Church, 21
- Rapp, George, 812
- Rapp, Johann Georg, 1491
- Rapture, 792, 1590–1591
 - Darby on, 582, 598
 - in dispensationalism, 597
 - Plymouth Brethren on, 550
 - tribulationism and, 1915
- Rarrant, Richard, compositions by, 1331
- Rationalism
 - Tholuck on, 1889
 - witches and, 2017
- Ratke, Wolfgang, on education, 644
- Rauch, Friedrich, Mercersburg theology and, 1205
- Rauschenbusch, Walter, 1030, 1398, 1475, 1516, 1591–1594, 1755, 1758, 1873, 1947
 - concept of Kingdom of God, 1029
 - on ecology, 630–631

Liberal Protestantism and, 1086 on market economy, 632
 social gospel and, 183
 Social Gospel of, 1879–1880, 1883

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Ray, John, 1371

Realism

in German literature, 1110–1111
 Scottish common sense, 1686–1687

Real Presence.

See also Transubstantiation
 Calvinism on, 467
 of historical Jesus, 1909
 Luther on, 467
 in Middle Ages, 410
 Stone-Campbell on, 401
 Zwingli on, 332

Reason

faith and, 1862–1863
 in Wesleyanism, 1992

Reasonableness of Christianity (Locke), 1114

Rebhuhn, Paul, plays, 1106

Rebmann, John, 9

Redeemed Captive Returning to Zion (Williams), 218–219

Redfield, John Wesley, Free Methodist Church and, 1224

Red-letter days, 875

Reformation, 868, 1594–1600.

See also Thirty-nine Articles of Religion
Acts and Monuments as defense of, 4 adiaphoristic ideas during, 6
 African-instituted churches, 16
 African theology and, 23 altars, controversy, 30
 Antichrist belief, 73
 Apocalypticism in, 85
 art and, 104–107
 Asceticism and, 113
 atonement and, 124–125
 authority in, 136–137
 Calvinism and, 813–815
 catechisms of, 360–362
 Catholic Church evaluation of, 363
 Catholic reactions to, 365
 celibacy in, 369–370
 Church of Scotland in, 444–445, 1682
 on clergy marriage, 471–472
 Colloquy of Poissy and, 1500 concept of priesthood of all believers and, 1561–1562
 concepts of justification and, 1001–1003
 confirmation in, 502

congregationalism in, 507
 Cranmer in, 528
 Cultural Protestantism in, 542–543
 deacons in, 561–562
 in Denmark, 921, 1830
 devil in, 585–586
 double predestination in, 655–657
 economics after, 632 education during, 642–644, 646–648
 in England, 431–433, 581, 668, 1927
 English church music during, 1330–1331
 episcopacy and, 253–254
 in Estonia, 684–685
 ethnicity in, 699
 evangelicalism in, 709, 712–713
 family in, 739–740
 feminist theology in, 1870
 in Finland, 752
 footwashing in, 745
 Fox and, 760–761
 funerary rites in, 796–797
 gender roles and, 802
 Huguenots and, 895–898
 in Hungary, 901–902
 hymnody and, 909–919
 in Iceland, 921
 iconoclasm and, 922–925
 in Ireland, 1921
 in Italy, 961–962
 Judaism and, 995
 just-war theory in, 1975
 liturgical year calendar after, 2058
 Lutheranism in Germany and, 1137–1138
 martyrs in, 1168–1169 masculinity and, 1175
 monasticism and, 1298
 orthodoxy and, 1422–1423
 pacifism in, 510
 pilgrimages and, 1911
 in Poland, 1501–1502 politics during, 1510–1513
 preaching in, 1535–1537
 Presbyterianism during, 1550–1551 principles of music, 1338–1339 prostitution during, 1570 reform of calendar after, 874–875 relation of Anabaptism to, 62 and rise of science, 1669 saints in, 1639, 1641–1642 salvation concepts in, 1645–1646
 Scandinavian, 1144
 Schleiermacher on, 1656

- Schwenckfeld on, 1668
- sectarianism in, 1691–1693
- secularization after, 1703
- seeker churches roots in, 1709
- Servetus intellectual contributions to, 1713
- sexuality attitudes during, 719–17221
- Spiritualism in, 1691, 1801–1802
- sports and Protestantism in, 1803–1804
- in Sweden, 751–752, 1827–1830
- in Switzerland, 1836–1838
- synod meaning in, 1841
- Tetrapolitan Confession and, 1859
- Tillich on, 1891
- tradition in, 1906–1908
- Tyndale role in, 1918
- vestments in, 1960–1962
- views on predestination during, 1543
- Westminster Confession as transition document from, 2001
- witch-hunting in, 2017–2019
- Zwingli in, 2081–2082
- Reformed Church
 - architecture, 89
 - atonement in, 124–125
 - Calvin in, 329
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- christology of, 412
- discipline in, 422–423
- Westminster Confession and, 2000
- Reformed Churches of France, Gallican Confession of, 799
- Reformed Churches of the Netherlands, 828
- Reformed Church in America, 1600–1602
 - CRCNA separation from, 402
 - history of, 622–623
- Reformed Church of Hungary, 902–904
- Reformed orthodoxy, 332
- Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, history of, 620
- Reformed tradition, 331–332
- Regensburg Colloquy, 1003, 1600, 1602
 - ecumenism in, 635
- Reichelt, K.L., 934
- Reiendorf, Dinah, as animateur, 1335
- Reimarus, Hermann Samuel, 986, 1375, 1602–1603
 - christology of, 412
 - on deism, 582
 - Lessing and, 1081, 1139
- Reimarus fragments, Semler and, 1712
- Reina y Valera* Bible, 1230
- Reincarnation, 1390
- Reindorf, Carl Christian, 1603–1604
- Reis, Hans de, Waterlanders and, 1202

Relics

- Calvin on, 1911

- collecting, 1641

Religion of nature, 1893

Religion of Nature Delineated (Wollaston), 2026*Religion of Protestants: A Safe Way to Salvation* (Chillingworth), 383

Religious affiliation, changes in, 1814

Religious Right, 833

Religious Sects: A Sociological Study (Wilson), 1690

Religious Society of Friends, AFSC and, 42

Religious Tract Society, 728

- British and Foreign Bible Society and, 240

Remonstrance of 1610, Arminianism, 97, 101

Remonstrants, 828, 1385, 1604–1606, 2086

- Canons of Dort and, 613–614

- history of, 614

Renaissance

- witch-hunting in, 2018

- women clergy in, 2035

Renal dialysis, ethics of, 697

Renan, Ernst, 986, 988

Renewed United Brethren, 1694

Republican Methodist Church, 966

- formation, 1224, 1227

Resen, Hans Poulsen, Lutheran orthodoxy and, 1132

Restitution, Edict of, 1606–1607

Restoration

- Church of England in, 433

- Church of God of Prophecy in, 443

- English church music during, 1332

- in German literature, 1110

Restorationism, 889, 1608

- sabbatarianism in, 1635

- sectarianism in, 1696

- Southern Free Will Baptists and, 773

Restorationists, 889

Resurrection after death, Christadelphians and, 394

Rethinking Group, 938

Reuilly Agreement, 2000, British and Irish Anglican Churches and French Lutheran churches, 69

Reuther, Rosemary Radford, liberation theology and, 1090

Réveil, 1608–1609

Reveil movement, Dutch Reformed Church and, 623

Revised Standard Version, of the Bible, 224

Revival, African slaves, 12

Revivalism

- Dwight Moody and, 1304

- music and, 1342–1343

- urban, 1849

- view of men, 1175

Revivalist piety, divine beauty and, 653

Revivals, 966, 1353, 1360, 1609–1611

- in Church of Scotland, 446

- evangelical theology and, 711
 Evangelical United Brethren Church and, 707
 Great Awakenings, 139–150
 Holiness Movement and, 1225
 in Nigeria, 1402
 in nineteenth century America, 1945–1946, 2031
 Palmer and, 1440
 slavery abolition and, 1742
 televangelism as, 1849
 women preaching at, 2031
 Revolutionary War in America. See American Revolution
 Revolution of the Saints, 899
 Reyna, Cassiodoro de, Bible translation by, 247
 Reynolds, Joshua, 1545
 Rhee, Syngman, 1549, 1555
 Rhegius, Urbanus, 1536
 Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
Rheims-Douai Bible, 248
 Rhineland Palatinate, Antitrinitarianism and, 84
 Rhode Island, Williams and, 2013–2014
 Ricci, Matteo, missionary efforts, 1254
 Rice, John Holt, 1548
 Rice, Luther
 General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination, 34
 Judson family and, 196
 missionary work, 178
 mission work, 171
 service in Burma, 189
 Richard, Timothy, 934 missionary activities, 178, 183
 Richardson, Henry Hobson, 1611
 Richardson, Samuel, Clarissa, 1102
 Richer, Edmond, 1611–1612
 Richter, Jean Paul, influences on, 1109
 Ridley, Nicolas, 868, 1168
 Riedemann, Peter, 907
 Ries, Hans de, martyrology, 1172
 Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 Rigdon, Sidney, Mormonism and, 1313
 Righteousness, imputed, 1994
 Right Sharing of the World's Resources (RSWR), 778
 Riley, William Bell, 1365
 fundamental Baptists and, 183
 World's Christian Fundamentals Association and, 168
 Rilke, Rainer Maria, writings, 1111
 Rinckhart (Rinckart), Martin, 915, 1534
 Ritschl, Albrecht Benjamin, 878, 1592, 1612–1613, 1872
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1029
 on Cultural Protestantism, 543
 Liberal Protestantism and, 1086, 1087, 1088

- Social Gospel of, 1883
 theology, 1139
 view of justification, 1006
- Ritual impurity, sex and, 459–470
- River Brethren, Brethren in Christ and, 300
- Roberts, Benjamin T., Free Methodist Church and, 769, 1224
- Roberts, Granville Oral, 1464, 1613–1614 broadcast beginnings of, 1850 in Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship, 787–788
 sectarianism and, 1699
 seed faith of, 1851
- Roberts, James Deotis, 1509
Liberation and Reconciliation, 259
Quest for a Black Theology, 258
- Robertson, Frederick William, 1592, 1614
- Robertson, Pat, 1518, 1615
 in politics, 404
 presidential campaign, 1307
 sectarianism and, 1699
 in Southern Protestantism, 1794
 televangelism of, 1850–1851
 television broadcasting, 1177
- Robinson, Henry Wheeler, 1615–1616
- Robinson, John, 1492, 1616
 on congregationalism, 507
- Robison, James, Moral Majority and, 1306–1307
- Rochet, in Reformation, 1961
- Rock, Johann Friedrich, founder of Community of True Inspiration, 33
- Rockefeller, John D., Jr., 954
- Rodeheaver, Homer, Billy Sunday and, 1343
- Roden, Ben, Branch Davidians and, 293
- Roden, George, Branch Davidians and, 293
- Rodgers, John, 1552
- Roger, Abraham, 937
- Rokycana, Jan, Moravian Church and, 1309
- Roll, Hendrick, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Rollenhagen, Georg, plays, 1106
- Rolvag, O.E., biblical influence on, 231
- Roman Catholic Church.
See also Catholic Church biblical revival movement within, 244–245
 in Brazil, 296
 views on homosexuality, 884–885 views on justification, 1007–1008
- Romania, 1616–1620
 Baptist Union in, 187
 Unitarians in, 1926–1927
- Roman Inquisition, foundation of, 522
- Romantic era, in German literature, 1108–1109
- Romanticism, 1016, 1620–1623
 Anglicanism and, 669–670
 art and, 107–108

- music of, 1341
- witches and, 2017
- Wordsworth images and, 2042–2043
- Roosevelt, Franklin D., 1365
- Rosen, Moishe, 992
 - missions to the Jews, 1287
- Rosenius, Carl Olaf
 - Lutheran revival movement and, 1146
 - Pietism and, 1133
- Ross, Donald, 1499
- Ross, John, 1036
- Rossetti, Christina, 1545, 1623
- Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, 1545–1546, 1623
- Rossetti, William Michael, 1545
- Rotermund, Wilhelm, Lutheran Church in Brazil and, 1135
- Rothe, Richard, 1612
- Rothman, Bernard, 1623–1624
 - Mennonites and, 1198–1199
 - millennialism and, 1238–1239
- Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 1625
 - on children, 741
 - on deism, 573
 - on education, 644, 648
 - Enlightenment and, 673
- Routley, Erik, 918
 - Cantate Domino* and, 1335
- Rowlandson, Mary, story of, 1102
- Roy, Ram Mohan, 939–940, 1266
- Royal Supremacy, Cranmer on, 529
- Royce, Josiah, 1024, 1625–1626
- Roz, Francis, 937
- Rule of St. Benedict*, monasticism and, 1299
- Ruler, A.A. van, 1388
- Rump Parliament, 535–536
- Rumspringa*, Amish youth, 58
- Rush, Christopher, AMEZ Church leader, 22
- Ruskin, John, 1545
- Russell, Arthur Tozer, 917
- Russell, Charles Taze, 977–978, 1626–1627
- Russell, Conrad, on English Civil War causes, 457
- Russell, Letty M., liberation theology and, 1091
- Russell, Robert, Seven Sermons, 218
- Russia, 1627–1631
 - AUCECB in, 25
 - Baptist Union in, 186
 - Basel Mission in, 206
 - Finnish church in, 752–753
 - Mennonites in, 1202
 - Methodism in, 1217–1218
- Russian Federation of Evangelical Christians, 1630
- Russwurm, John Brown, 1631–1632
- Rutherford, Joseph Franklin, 978–979, 1627

Rutherford, Mark (William Hale White), 2005

Ruyl, Corneius, 248

Ruyter, Michael de, 903

Ryrie, Charles, on dispensationalism, 599

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;

Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Sabatier, Auguste, 1633–1634

thoughts on authority, 138

Sabatier, Paul, 1634

Sabbatarianism, 1634–1638

in Canada, 345

in Seventh-Day Adventist theology, 1715

Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Movement, 1528

Sach, Scholem, biblical influence on, 231

Sachs, Hans, plays, 1105

Sack, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried, 1375

Sacraments, 1415–1417, 1638

church discipline and, 423–424

in confessionalization, 499

polity and, 1520–1521

Saddleback Church, mission, 1191

Sadoleto, Giacomo, 961

Sagittarius, Henricus (Schütz, Heinrich), 1664–1666

Saint Bartholomew's Day massacre, 896

Sainte-Chapelle, Paris, secularization of, 1702

Saint Francis of Assisi, 1634

Sainthood, Day on, 762

Saints, 1638–1642

in Canons of Dort, 614

Francis of Assisi, 1634

Saints' days, 874–875

Saint Thomas Christians, 1914

Saker, Alfred, missionary work, 177

Sallman, Warner, 930, 931

Salmasius, Cadius, Milton's reply to, 1246

Salon society, in Germany, 1657

Salt, Titus, 1642–1643

Saltaire, 1643

Salvation, 1643–1646

in Calvinism, 337

in Churches of Christ, 427

in Seventh-Day Adventist theology, 1715

in Universalism, 1952–1953

Westminster Catechism on, 1999–2000

Westminster Confession on, 2002

Salvation Army, 1415, 1610, 1646–1651

in Canada, 346

Catherine Booth and, 283–285

history of, 670

Keswick Conferences, 1268

origins in dissent, 601

- in Rome, 963
- in Sweden, 1832
- William Booth and, 285–288
- women clergy in, 2033, 2037
- in Zimbabwe, 2078
- Salvation history, covenant and, 524
- Salvation of All Men* (Chauncey), 1952
- Salvific scientism, 1676
- Samartha, Stanley, 942
- Samkange, Thompson, Luthuli and, 1151
- Samson, Herman, in Latvia, 1068
- Samuel, William, 912
- Sanctification, 855, 1651–1652
 - as camp meeting goal, 340
 - entire, 451
 - Holiness Movement and, 877–878
 - individualism and, 943
 - slavery abolition and, 1742
 - in Wesleyanism, 1995–1996
 - Westminster Catechism on, 1999
 - Westminster Confession on, 2002
- Sand Creek Declaration, 426
- Sandemanian Church, 744
- Sanders, E.P., 990
- Sandford, Frank, 1459
- Sankey, Ira David, 918, 929, 1016, 1393, 1592, 1610, 1652–1653
 - Dwight Moody and, 1304
 - hymns by, 1342–1343
- Saravia, Hadrian, on missionary activity, 1260
- Satan. See Devil
- Sattler, Michael, 1653
 - on ethics, 690
 - Schleitheim Confession of, 495, 1661, 1692
- Scaliger, Joseph Justus, 996
- Scandinavia
 - Baptist Union in, 186
 - Methodism in, 1216, 1219
- Schaff, Philip, 1389, 1549, 1556, 1653–1655
 - founder of ACSH, 48
 - Mercersburg theology and, 1204–1205
- Schartau, Henrik
 - Lutheran revival movement and, 1146
 - Pietism in Sweden, 1133
- Scheffler, Johannes. see Sielsius, Angelus
- Scheibel, Johann Gottfried, confessional revival, 1134
- Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, 852, 1019, 1655
- Schelwig, Samuel, on the role of the laity, 1055
- Scherer, James A., on American missiology, 1249
- Schilder, K., 1388
- Schiller, Johann Christoph Friedrich, 826, 1655–1656
 - Sturm und Drang movement and, 1109
- Schjelderup, Kristian S., 1411

Schlaf, Johannes, writings, 1110

Schlatter, Michael, 812

Schlegel, Friedrich von, 1621

on poetry, 1109

Romanticism and, 1109

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, 864, 866, 944, 994, 1373, 1387, 1572, 1583, 1592, 1620, 1656–1661

on Biblical authority, 1861

on capital punishment, 350

on childhood nurturing, 380

christology of, 412–413

concept of justification, 1006

concept of Kingdom of God, 1029

on confirmation, 166

on Cultural Protestantism, 543

on deism, 573

on dependence in religion, 1891

on Devil, 586

on dogmatic theology, 610

ecclesiology of, 630

on education, 645, 648

on faith, 734

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;

Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Liberal Protestantism and, 1086–1087

on miracles, 1658

on missions, 1247

Moravian Church and, 1311

seminary education and, 1710

sermons of, 1537

theology, 1139

thoughts on authority, 137

views on natural law, 1367

views on predestination, 1544

writings, 1103

Schleithem Confession, 1437, 1511–1512, 1596, 1661–1662

of 1527, clergy and, 1050

contents of, 495, 1653, 1692

ethics and, 690

pacifism in, 1976

reasons for, 496

Schmalkald Articles, 1427, 1662–1663.

See also Luther, Martin

presentation, 1123

Schmalkald League, 1477, 1596, 1663

formation of, 1138

Livonian order and, 1068

Schmalkald War, purposes of, 1138

Schmidlin, Joseph

Catholic missiology and, 1249

missiology and, 1248

- Schmidt, Georg, mission work of, 1273
- Schmucker, Samuel Simon, 812, 1042, 1664
 General Synod and, 1148
- Schnabel, Johann Gottfried, writings, 1108
- Schnitzler, Arthur, writings, 1111
- Scholte, Hendrik, 1601
- Schön, Jakob Friedrich (later, James Frederick), 1664–1665
- Schön, James Frederick
 in Sierra Leone, 1731
 thesis, 1278
- Schoonrewoerd, Hendricks van, martyrology, 1171
- Schuller, Robert, 1540–1541, 1850–1851
- Schultze, Benjamin, 938
- Schumaker, Samuel S., unification of Lutheran churches, 46
- Schurman, Anna Maria van, 1385–1386
- Schütz, Heinrich, 1665–1666
 Thirty Years War and, 153–154
- Schwartz, Christian Frederick, 938
- Schweckfeld, Caspar von, on the body of Christ, 1198
- Schweitzer, Albert, 988, 1029, 1388, 1666–1668
 on eschatology, 1877
- Schwenckfeld, Caspar, 1623, 1668–1669
 on Spiritualism, 1801–1802
- Schwenckfelders, 811
- Science, 1669–1675
 religion and, 533
 sectarianism and, 1697
 sexuality and, 1724
 transubstantiation in, 1910
 twentieth century theology and, 1882–1883
- Science of Health* (Eddy), 405–409, 639.
- Scientific expansionism, 1675
- Scientific Revolution, 1369
- Scientism, 1675–1677
- SCLC (Southern Christian Leadership Conference), 453, 455
- Scofield, Cyrus Ingerson, 1030
 Moody Bible Institute and, 1303
 Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Scofield Reference Bible, 1485, 1591
 publication, 1281
- Scofield Reference Bible*, 1030, 1677–1680
 on Bible inerrancy, 792
 on dispensationalism, 599, 682
- Scopes Trial, 531–532, 554, 709, 793, 1883
- Scotland, 1680–1686
 Calvinism in, 335
 Church of (See Church of Scotland)
 sectarianism in, 1694
 seminary education in, 1710
- Scots Confession, 335, 1550, 1552
- Scott, Job, 783
- Scott, Orange, abolitionism and, 1224

- Scottish Common Sense Realism, 1547, 1551, 1686–1687, 2022–2023
- Scottish Episcopal Church, 674–676
- Screwtape Letters* (Lewis), 1084, 1085
- Scripture
 literalism of, 1672
 Westminster Catechism on, 1999
 Westminster Confession on, 2001
 in worship services, 2060–2061
 Zwingli on, 2081
- Scriver, Christian, Lutheranism and, 1138–1139
- Scudder, John, 929
- Seabury, Samuel, 1687–1689
- Sea Cliff Bible Conference, foundation of, 239
- Second Great Awakening, 1360, 1610
 African slaves, 12
- Second Vatican Council on celibate clergy, 371, 472
 ecumenism in, 364
- Sectarianism, 1689–1701
 Community of True Inspiration (Amana Society), 33
- Sect-church typology, 1769, 1772
- Secularization, 1701–1707
 culture in, 544
 Darwinism and, 554
 industrialization and, 1146
 sociology and, 1774
 toleration and, 1897
 women clergy and, 2038
- Seed faith, 1851
- Seeker churches, 1708–1709
- Seekers, 759, 1708
- Selessor, Mary, missionary work of, 1269
- Selwyn, George Augustus, 1392, 1435
- Seminaries, 1709–1711.
 See also Theology education
 dispensationalism in, 600
 founding of, 729
- Semler, Johann Salomo, 837, 838, 1375, 1490, 1711–1712
 on deism, 571–572
- Semple, Robert, death, 1190
- Sen, Keshub Chander, 940
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Sensus communis*, 7
- Separatists, 767
- Septuagint Bible, 222
- Septuagint Canon, 1415
- Sermons, 1535–1541
- Serpent handlers, 1712–1713
 in South, 1793
- Servetus, Michael (de Villeneuve, Michel), 1597, 1713–1714

- Antitrinitarianism and, 80–81
 - Unitarian origins and, 1925
- Services of worship, formality of, 2062
- Settlement House movement, 1754
- 700 Club, 1850–1851
- Seven Sermons* (Russell), 218
- Seventh Commandment Society, 1571
- Seventh-Day Adventists, 1714–1719
 - Apocalypticism and, 86
 - on creation science, 532
 - on eschatology, 682, 1945
 - on healing, 737
 - millennialism and, 1242
 - sabbatarianism of, 1634
 - sectarianism of, 1696
 - work in Malawi, 1157
- Seventh Day Baptists, beliefs, 185
- Sexism and God-Talk: Towards a Feminist Theology* (Ruether), 1871
- Sex scandals, of televangelists, 1850–1851
- Sexual experience, marriage and, 1162–1163
- Sexuality, 1719–1725.
 - See also* Celibacy
 - church discipline regarding, 423
 - homosexuality, 882–885
 - of Jehovah's Witnesses, 982
 - muscular Christianity in, 1725
 - of Shakers, 1727
 - sin relationship to, 2034
 - in womanist theology, 2028
- Seymour, William Joseph, 15, 964, 1457, 1459–1460, 1462
 - Azusa Street Revival and, 1284
- Shadare, Joseph B., 11
- Shadowlands* (Lewis), 1085
- Shakarian family, in Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship, 787–788
- Shakers, 5, 1725–1728
 - on chastity, 1719
 - communism in, 485
 - foundation, 1075
 - gender beliefs of, 803–804
 - sectarianism in, 1695
 - women clergy in, 2036
- Shakespeare, John Howard, 1404
 - Baptist World Alliance and, 170
 - unification work, 183
- Shakespeare, William
 - impact, 1100–1101
 - Measure for Measure*, 228
- Shamanism, 735–736
- Shamdasani, Sonu, 999
- Sharp, Granville
- Sierra Leone and, 1730–1731
 - on slavery abolition, 1742

- Shaw, William J., 1352
- Sheen, Bishop Fulton J., television broadcasts of, 1850
- Sheldon, Charles Monroe, 1729, 1753, 2065
- Sheldon, Gilbert, Book of Common Prayer and, 277
- Shelley, Mary, 1621
- Shepherd's Crusades, apocalyptic millennialism and, 1236
- Sheppard, H.R. L. "Dick," 1439
- Sheppard, Richard, 1729–1730
- Sheppard, William Henry, 1554, 1730
- Shields, T.T.
 - antimodernism view, 175
 - Baptist Bible Union position, 168
 - fundamental Baptists and, 183
- Shome, J.G., 1405
- Shorter Catechism*, 808
- Shrovetide plays, development, 1105–1106
- Shtundists*, in AUCECB, 25
- Shuck, Lewis, missionary work, 179
- Shunning, 423
 - Amish ritual, 57
 - in Mennonites, 1692
- Siddal, Elizabeth, 1546
- Sidney, Philip, "Defence of Poesie," 1100
- Sienkiewicz, Henryk, biblical influence on, 231
- Sierra Leone, 1730–1733
 - Clapham takeover of, 1729
 - evangelization of, 1664
 - Lutheranism in, 1142
- Sign language, Bible in, 722
- Sihler, Wilhelm, The Missouri Synod and, 1124
- Sihombing, Justinus, Batak Protestant Christian Church and, 206
- Silesius, Angelus, music of, 1106
- Silver Bluff Baptist Church, 13
- Simatupang, T.B., 947
 - Batak Protestant Christian Church and, 207
- Simeon, Charles, 1733
 - Church Missionary Society and, 1265
- Simmonds, William J., 1351
- Simmons, Thomas, on revivalism, 193
- Simmons, William J., 1043
- Simons, Menno. See Menno Simons
- Simonton, Ashbel Green, 1554
- Simpson, Albert Benjamin
 - in Holiness Movement, 395
 - Missionary Training Institute and, 234
- Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281–1282
- Sin, 1733–1734.
 - See also* Original sin
 - confession of, 491–494
 - sexuality relationship to, 2034
 - in Wesleyanism, 1992–1993
 - Westminster Catechism on, 1999

Sinai covenant, 526
 Sincerity, of true religion, 569
 Singing, 1418
 Sino-foreign Protestant establishment, 387–389
 Sisterhoods, Anglican, 1734–1735

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Sixth Commandment, case against abortion and, 1
Sixty-Seven Articles (Zwingli), role of the laity, 1052
 Sjarifuddin, Amir, Batak Protestant Christian Church and, 207
 Skepticism, toleration and, 1898
 Slavery, 1735–1740

abolition of, 1740–1745
 AMA agenda, 47
 American Colonization Society, 42
 Bible institutes and, 729
 in Caribbean, 356
 Clapham Sect and, 432
 Douglass in, 615
 Evangelical United Brethren Church on, 708
 Freemasonry on, 775
 Free Methodist Church of America and, 769
 Granville on, 1729
 Methodist conference debate on, 487–488
 Quakers in, 511
 Weld on, 1980
 Wesleyan Church and, 1989
 Wesleyan Holiness Movement and, 1991
 William Wilberforce in, 2011
 Woolman on, 2039–2040

AME fight against, 20
 American Civil War and, 899
 American Protestant divisions on, 1946
 Baltimore Conference stand on, 160 baptism and, 354–355
 Baptists against, 171
 Black Baptist identity and, 194–195
 in Caribbean, 353–354, 356
 civilization models of inculturation and, 933 Episcopal Church and, 677
 Finley on, 754
 forbidden by Quakers, 511
 Hopkins' opposition to, 889 legacy of, 12–13
 Methodists and the issue of, 1224
 Protestant divisions over, 709 quietism and, 782
 racial intermarriage in, 1723–1724
 sectarianism and, 1697
 Southern Protestantism and, 1792–1793
 United Church of Christ on, 1934

- Slenczka, Reinhard, Latvian Lutheran Church and, 1070
- Slessor, Mary Mitchell, 1032, 1554, 1745–1746
- Slovenia, Baptist Union in, 186
- Smalkald Articles, 496
 - definitions of faith in, 280
 - doctrinal authority of, 608–609
- Smith, Adam, 1551, 1758–1759
- Smith, Amanda Berry, preaching by, 257
- Smith, Hannah Whittall, 870, 877, 1016–1017, 1746
- Smith, Henry Boynton, 1548
- Smith, Hezekiah, ministry, 193
- Smith, John, Latitudinarianism and, 1065
- Smith, Joseph, 1496, 1697, 1746–1749.
 - See also* Mormonism
 - on eschatology, 682
 - Kirtland Temple rebellion against, 2074–2075
- Smith, Joseph, Jr., Mormonism and, 1313
- Smith, Robert, 1016–1017
- Smith, Sydney, on missionaries, 1265
- Smith, William Robertson, 866, 867, 1552, 1750
- Smits, Janis, Latvian Baptist Church and, 1070
- Smyth, John, 806, 1492, 1616, 1750–1752
 - on adult baptism, 169
 - in Free Will Baptists, 770
- Snake handlers, 1712–1713
 - in South, 1793
- Social conservatism, role of the laity, 1054
- Social ethics, 2065
- Social Gospel, 632, 951, 1029, 1516, 1752–1758
 - in Episcopal Church, 678–679
 - eschatology in, 682–683
 - Fellowship of Southern Churchmen and, 746–747
 - Fosdick on, 759
 - Gladden and, 820–821
 - human rights and, 899
 - as infidelity, 1902
 - just war concept in, 512
 - King and, 1024–1025
 - Methodism and, 1211
 - Modernism and, 1292
 - National Council of Churches and, 1354
 - philanthropy and, 1475
 - Rauschenbusch and, 1591–1594
 - sectarianism and, 1697
 - Shailer Mathews and, 1183
 - in Southern Protestantism, 1794
 - theology and, 1864–1865
 - in twentieth century, 1879–1880, 1883
 - of United Church of Canada, 1931
 - in United States, 1030
 - William Jennings Bryan and, 311–312
 - women's role in, 2032

- of World Council of Churches, 2048
- Socialism, Christian, 1758–1762
 - Communism and, 1905
 - philanthropy, 1475
 - Social Gospel and, 1754
 - Tillich on, 1890–1891
 - Westcott on, 1998
- Socialism, Community of True Inspiration (Amana Society), 33
- Social responsibility, in Wesleyanism, 1997
- Social services, of Salvation Army, 1650–1651
- Social Teaching of Christian Churches* (Troeltsch), 1872–1873
- Social welfare, Inner Mission and, 2008
- Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1491, 1762–1763
- Society for Promoting Working Men's Associations, 1761
- Society for Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), in Caribbean, 354
- Society for the Preservation of the Gospel, 1763
- Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge, Middleton and, 1233

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts (SPG), 12
 - Anglicanism and, 676
- Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (SPG), 9, 1687, 1942
 - Allen, Roland, 28
 - Anglo-Catholicism and, 71
 - anti-slavery efforts of, 1736
 - conversions in India and, 1180
 - creation of, 1264
 - missionary work of, 1280
- Society of Brothers (Bruderhof), 1764
- Society of Friends in North America, 1764–1766.
 - See also* Friends, Society of
- Society of Jesus (Jesuits)
 - foundation, 1254
 - Ignatius Loyola and, 1301
- Society of the Sacred Mission, Anglo-Catholicism and, 71
- Socinianism, 1646, 1766–1769
 - christology of, 411
 - clergy in, 458
 - in Poland, 1503
 - Priestley and, 1564
 - Tillotson on, 1892
 - Unitarianism and, 1926–1927
- Sociology of Protestantism, 1769–1776
- Sociology of Religion: A Study of Christendom* (Stark), 1690
- Söderblom, Nathan, 1776–1777
 - Ecumenism and, 1147
 - Lutheran ecumenical movement and, 1136
- Sohm, Rudolf, 1373
- Sola fide*, in art, 108–109
- Solemn League and Covenant, 535
- Sölle, Dorothee, 1508

- Solokhov, Mikhail, biblical influence, 231
- Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr, biblical influence, 231
- Some Gospel-Truths Opened* (Bunyan), 320
- Sosa, Pablo
 as animateur, 1335
 Cancionero Abierto, 1336
- Soteriology, 1643
 in evangelicalism, 714 medieval developments in, 1645
 in twentieth century, 1646
- Soul, Wordsworth on, 2042–2043
- Soul sleep, 6
- South Africa, 1777–1782
 Apartheid in, 1527
 confessional revival, 1134–1135
 ethnicity in, 699
 Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship in, 788
 Huddleston in, 894–895
 Jabavu in, 969–970
 Liberation Theology in, 1527
 Lutheranism in, 1141
 Naudé in, 1372
 Philip in, 1478
 Presbyterianism in, 1554
 Protestant political parties in, 1508
 theologies of, 23–24
- South African Council of Churches, 1372
- Southeast Asia Graduate School of Theology, 1868
- Southern Baptist Convention (SBC), 1568, 1574, 1784–1791
 beliefs, 173
 Cooperative Baptist Fellowship and, 180 founding in 1845, 35
 history of, 773
 missions to the Jews, 1287
 size of, 173, 192
 women clergy in, 2033
- Southern Baptist International Mission Board, size, 1286
- Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), 453, 455
- Southern Protestantism, 1791–1794
- Southern United States, Protestantism and slavery in, 1738–1339
- South India, Church of, 1394, 1555, 1782–1784
- Soviet Union
 amalgamation of Protestant groups, 26 evangelical growth in, 25–26
 Lutheranism in, 1136
 pacifist movement in, 1439
 suppression of churches, 1169–1170
- Sozzini, Fausto Paolo (Socinus, Faustus), 1794–1796.
 See also Socinianism
 salvation and atonement doctrines of, 1925
- Spain, control in Caribbean, 354
- Spalding, Johann Joachim, 1375, 1796–1797

- Spangenberg, August Gottlieb, Moravian Church and, 1311
- Spangenberg, Johann, the Reformation and, 1130
- Speeches on Religion* (Schleiermacher), 1657–1658
- Speer, Robert E., 1553
- Board of Foreign Missions and, 1282
 - fundamentalism and, 1283
 - on missions, 1248
 - Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Spener, Philipp Jakob, 814, 864, 898, 915, 1485, 1486–1489, 1609, 1797–1798
- on confirmation, 166, 504
 - on conversion, 519
 - pietism of, 1139, 1693–1694
 - renewal movement, 1133
 - role of the laity, 1051
 - views on orthodoxy, 1424
- Spenser, Edmund, Faerie Queene, 1100
- Spenser, John, 886
- Speyer, diet of, 363, 1596, 1798–1800
- origin of term “Protestant” at, 1809–1810
- Spini, Giorgio, 963
- Spiritual Franciscanism, apocalyptic millennialism and, 1236
- Spiritual gifts, 1522
- Spiritualism, 1800–1802
- authority and, 137
 - of Eddy, 1697–1698
 - in Reformation, 1691
 - of Shakers, 1727
 - witchcraft and, 2017
- Spirituality
- New Age, 1389–1391
 - in popular culture, 1575
- Spitta, Philipp, writings, 1110
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Spittler, Friedrich, St. Chrischona Mission and, 1275
- Sports, 1802–1807
- YMCA and, 2071
- Springfield Baptist Church, Augusta, Georgia, 13
- Spurgeon, Charles Haddon, 822, 1393, 1403, 1807–1808
- preaching of, 1537
- Spurling, Richard, 436–437
- St. Bartholomew’s Day Massacre, 1598
- St. Chrischona Mission, work of, 1275
- St. Engenas Zion Christian Church, in South Africa, 10
- St. John Apostolic Faith Mission, in South Africa, 10
- St. John’s Passion* (Bach), 155–156
- St.-Martin-in-the-Fields Anglican Church, religious broadcasting, 1177
- St. Paul’s Cathedral, London, 2063
- St. Thomas African Episcopal Church, 13
- St. Thomas Christians, in India, 936–938
- Stahl, Friedrich Julius, 1808–1809

- Stainer, John, 917
- Stair, Lois, 1549
- Stalin, Joseph, persecution of Protestants, 26
- Stancaro, Francesco, theology of, 1294
- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady, 1548, 1809, 1869, 1947
- Stark, Werner, 1690
- State in Its Relations with the Church*, 822
- Statenbijbel*, 622
- Statistics, 1809–1816
- on United States religious affiliations, 2089
 - on worldwide Protestant affiliations, 2090–2092
 - on worldwide religious affiliation, 2088
- Statute of Charitable Uses, 1474
- Staupitz, Johann von, influence on Luther, 1119
- Stearns, Shubal, Sandy Creek Baptists and, 193–194
- Steele, Anne, Trinitarian convictions, 182
- Steele, Richard, 1574
- impact, 1103
- Steere, Douglas, in Quaker intervisitation, 778
- Steiner, George, biblical influence on, 232
- Steiner, Leonard, 1455
- Stephan, Martin, The Missouri Synod and, 1124
- Stephen, saint, martyrdom of, 1640
- Stephens, F.G., 1545
- Stephenson, T.B., foundation of Children's Homes, 1214
- Sternhold, Thomas, 911–913
- Stewart, John, 1361
- Stiefel, Michael, 1624
- Stillingfleet, Edward, Latitudinarianism and, 1064, 1065, 1066
- Stockholm Bloodbath, 1828
- Stoecker, Adolf, 951, 1373, 1816–1817
- Stokes, George, 1443
- Stole
- in late twentieth century, 1963
 - origins of, 1960
- Stone, Barton, 1817
- Stone-Campbell Movement, 398, 401.
- See also* Churches of Christ, noninstrumental
 - American origins of, 593–594
 - baptism in, 595
 - Campbell family in, 594–595
 - contemporary organization of, 596–597
 - division of, 596
 - joining forces in, 595–596
- Stone house argument, in Darwinism, 555–556
- Storm, Theodore, writings, 1110
- Storrs, George, 6, 978
- Stott, John R.W., Lausanne Covenant and, 1073
- Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 929, 1548, 1739, 1744, 1817–1818
- Strang, James J., Mormonism and, 1313
- Stranger Churches, Laud and, 1072
- Strasbourg Prophets, Hofmann and, 1198

- Strausbourg reforms, 351
- Strauss, David Friedrich, 854, 987–988, 1818–1821
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1029
 Liberal Protestantism and, 1088 radical Hegelianism of, 413
 translation by Eliot, 1104
- Strauss, Friedrich A., Jerusalem Union and, 1275
- Strawbridge, Robert, 965
 preaching movement, 1223
- Stricker, Johannes, plays of, 1106
- Stromata*, adiaphoristic ideas, 6
- Strong, Josiah, 731–732, 1364, 1753–1754, 1821–1822
 publications, 1281
- Stuart, Martinus Cohen, 1606
- Studd, Charles Thomas, 1822
 holiness movement and, 1269
- Student Leadership Journal*, 958
- Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), 454, 1354
- Student Volunteer Movement, 480, 2050
 foundation, 1257
 influence of, 1269
 John Mott and, 1319
 mission work of, 1281–1283
- Sturm, Johannes, Colloquy of Marburg and, 1158
- Sturm und Drang movement, representatives of, 1108–1109
- Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt, 881
- Suarez, Pedro, song collections, 1336
- Sudan Interior Mission, 1401, 1822–1824
- Suicide, physician-assisted. See Euthanasia
- Suicide* (Durkheim), 1769–1770
- Summary History of New-England*, 5
- Summer camp, YMCA and, 2073
- Summer Institute of Linguistics, 2066–2067
- Sunday, Billy, 1549, 1825, 1849
 music and, 1343
- Sunday laws, 1637
- Sunday Schools, 1588, 1824–1825
 Bushnell and, 648
 Mennonites and, 1203
 Schmucker and, 1148
 for slaves, 1160
 supports for, 728–729
- Sunday Service of the Methodists in America*, 160
- Sundermeir, Theo, on convivence, 1278
- Sung, John (Sung Shangjie), 1826
- Sun Yat-sen, 1824
- Supralapsarianism, 1543
- Supremacy Act of 1534 (England), 1513

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Surplice, in Reformation, 1961

- Surprised by Joy* (Lewis), 1084
 Survey Application Trust (SAT), World Dominion Press, 28
 Swabian Syngramma, 1826–1827
 Swaggart, Jimmy, 1850–1851
 scandals, 1177
 Swalm, E.J., imprisonment, 300–301
 Sweden, 1827–1833
 Baptist Union in, 186
 confessional revival, 1134
 Methodism in, 1216
 Reformation in, 751–752, 1130, 1600
 Swedenborg, Emanuel, 1833–1835
 Swedish Baptists, foundation, 176
 Swedish Church, Söderblom in, 1776
 Swedish Evangelical Free Church, Evangelical Free Church of America from, 703–704
 Swendenborg, Emanuel, 970
 Swift, Jonathan, 1835–1836
 writings, 1103
 Swinburne, Algernon Charles, 1546
 Swiss Brethren, on grace through faith, 1691–1692
 Swiss Confederation, 1836–1837
 Switzerland, 1836–1840
 Anabaptist movement in, 1691–1692
 baptismal rites, 162–163
 Calvinism in, 332–333
 Methodism in, 1216, 1219
 monasticism in, 1299
 Reformation in, 1596–1598
 réveil in, 1608–1609
 Seventh-Day Adventists in, 1717
 Symbolists, 1633
 Symmes, Thomas, on music and worship, 1327
 Synod, 1840–1841
 Synodical Council, Lutheran confessional body, 46
 Synod of Dort, 333, 334, 1423–1424, 1471, 1543, 1550
 Synoptic gospels, Kingdom of God in, 1025
 Syrian Christians, mass movement in India, 1179
Systematic Theology (Tillich), 1881
Systema Universæ Theologiæ (Brouchmand), 578
System of Doctrines, 889
- Taborites, formation of, 1236
 Taiping Rebellion, 385
 Tait, Archibald Campbell, 1843
 Taiwan, 1843–1844
 Lutheranism in, 1143
 Tambunan, A.M., 947
 Tamils, missions to, 1249
 Tammany Hall, 1364
 Tanzania
 Lutheranism in, 1141

- monasticism in, 1301
- Tao Fong Shan Centre, 934
- Tappan, Arthur, 1363
- Tate, Nahum, New Version of the Psalms, 1327
- Tate, Nathan, 913–914
- Taufbüchlein* (Luther), 162
- Tauler, Heinrich, influence on Luther, 1120
- Tausen, Hans, 1600, 1844–1845
 - Reformation in Denmark and, 1130
 - Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
- Taylor, Charles, role in Liberia, 1096
- Taylor, Dan, New Connection of General Baptists and, 182–183
- Taylor, Edward
 - on Holy Communion, 1101
 - poetry, 1102
- Taylor, Gardner, 14, 1352, 1569
- Taylor, J.Hudson, in China Inland Mission, 391–392
- Taylor, J.Randolph, 1549
- Taylor, James, Jr., rejection of the clergy, 1056
- Taylor, James Hudson, 1845–1846
 - China Inland Mission and, 1268
- Taylor, Jeremy, 1846–1847
- Taylor, John, 1498
 - on missions, 196
 - Mormonism and, 1314
- Taylor, Kenneth, religious paraphrases by, 250
- Taylor, Mark C., 1530
- Taylor, Nathaniel William, 1847
- Teague, Collin, missionary work, 179
- Tegetmayer, Sylvester, in Latvia, 1068
- Telemann, Georg Philipp, 1848–1849
- Televangelism, 1849–1852
 - Christian Broadcasting Network, 1615
 - Christian Right in, 403
 - dispensationalism in, 600
 - eschatology in, 683
 - preaching and, 1540
 - programming, 1177
 - sectarianism and, 1699
- Televangelists, healing by, 737
- Television, religious broadcasting, 1177–1178
- Telugus, conversion of, 1180
- Temperance, 1746, 1852–1856
 - as camp meeting goal, 342
 - in Canada, 345
 - Frances E. Willard and, 1225
 - Methodism and, 1211
 - sabbatarianism and, 1636
 - secularization and, 1706
 - Seventh-Day Adventists and, 1715
 - voluntary societies and, 1968
- Temple, Frederick, 1856

Temple, William, 1371, 1757, 1856–1858
 Temptation, Luther on, 1860
 Ten Articles, 1886
 Tennent, Gilbert, 1547, 1858
 on conversion, 650
 Tennent, William, Jr., 1547
 Tennent, William, Sr., 1547, 1552
 Tennyson, Alfred, 1858–1859
Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (Milton), publication, 1245
 Terminology in Protestantism, 1811–1812
 Terrorism, eschatology and, 684
 Tersteegen, Gerhard, 1534
 Tetrapolitan Confession, 351, 1859
 Tetzl, Johann, Luther and, 1120

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Tewfik, Ahmed, 1035
 Textual criticism, of scripture, 225
Textus Receptus, 247
 Thadden-Trieglaff, Reinold von, 1033
That Hideous Strength (Lewis), 1084
 Theater, Christian, 720–721
Theatre of God's Judgment (Beard), 534
 The Family, 983
 Theism, open, 713
 Theological Students Fellowship, 957
 Theology, 1859–1865.
 See also Covenant theology;
 Feminist theology;
 Liberation theology;
 Process theology
 Arminius, Jacobus, 95–97
 Asian, 114–117
 natural, 1371, 1892
 political, 1508–1509, 1881 practical, of John Wesley, 1987 process, 1567–1568
 Social Gospel, 1592–1593
 twentieth century, 1872–1875
 British, 1875–1879
 global, 1879–1882
 North American, 1882–1886
 of vocation, 1966 of Westminster Catechism, 1999–2000
 womanist, 2026–2029
 Theology education, 650–653.
 See also Seminaries in Asia, 1865–1868
Theology for the Social Gospel, 1592, 1593
Theology of Hope (Moltmann), 1297
Theology of the New Testament (Bultman), 318

- Theology of the Pain of God* (Kitamori), 1881–1882
- Theophrastus Paracelsus, Erastus on, 680
- Third-Eye Theology* (Song), 1882
- Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, 365, 383, 871, 1429, 1430, 1444, 1544, 1550, 1599, 1886–1889
- Calvinism in, 668
 - on components of worship, 2060
 - history of, 432, 660
 - Scottish Episcopal Church adoption of, 674
 - Westminster Catechism and, 1998–1999
- Thirty Years' War, 835–836, 837, 902, 906
- devastation during, 153
 - German music composition during, 1665
- Tholuck, Friedrich August Gottreu, 838, 852, 1583, 1609, 1889–1890
- Thomas, John
- in Christadelphians, 393–394
 - mission to India, 177
 - work in Tonga, 1222
- Thomas, Madathiparampil Mammen, 938, 942
- Thomas, Robert Jermain, 1036
- Thomasius, Christian, 837, 1488, 1890
- on responsibility of princes, 1132
- Thomist view, 1671
- Thompson, Thomas, 9
- Thornwelll, James Henley, 1548
- Thoughts on Death and Immortality* (Feuerbach), 748
- Three Choirs Festival, 1332
- Three-Self Patriotic Movement, 390–391, 1893–1894, 1975
- Wu role in, 2064
- Thuma Mina: Internationales Ökumenisches Liederbuch*, 1335
- Thurneysen, Eduard, 1044
- Tideman, Johannes, 1606
- Tieck, Ludwig
- Romantic movement and, 1109
 - writings, 1108
- Tiele, C.P., 1387, 1606
- Tillich, Paul, 815, 999, 1012, 1021, 1388, 1890–1892
- art of alternative imagination, 109–110
 - correlation theological method of, 1884
 - on eschatology, 683
 - on evil, 587
 - liberal Protestant theology of, 1881
 - Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1379, 1380, 1381
 - Protestant Principle of, 1658
 - on salvation, 1646
 - Schelling impact on, 1655
 - on sin, 1734
 - views on sacraments, 1417
- Tillotson, John, 1892–1893
- Latitudinarianism and, 1064, 1065
- Time for worship, 2058–2059
- Tindal, Matthew, 1603, 1893
- on deism, 570

- Ting, K.H. (Ding Guangxun), 1893–1894
- Tocqueville, Alexis de, 944, 1045, 1563, 1895
 on voluntary societies, 1966–1967
Today's English Version, 250
- Togo, Bremen Society in, 1275
- Toland, John, 1005, 1603, 1895–1896
 on deism, 570
 Latitudinarianism and, 1066
- Tolbert, William R. Jr., Liberian presidency, 1096
- Toleration, 1896–1899
 in African-instituted churches, 17
 democracy and, 574
 Edict of, 764
 edict of, 335
 human rights and, 899
 Samuel Davies and, 558
 in seventeenth-century Hungary, 903
- Toleration Act, United Kingdom, 182
- Toleration Act of 1689, Calvinism and, 335
- Tomkins, Thomas, compositions by, 1331
- Tomlinson, Ambrose Jessup
 in Church of God, 437
 in Church of God of Prophecy, 442
- Tommasini, Bernardino “Ochino,” 962
- Tongues, speaking in, 954, 955–956, 1899–1902
 in Church of God (Cleveland, TN), 437
 in Church of God in Christ, 440
 in Church of God of Prophecy, 443
 in Church of the Nazarene, 451
 du Plessis and, 616
 Irving and, 960
 Pentecostalism and, 1458, 1459, 1461, 1465, 1610
 in Pentecostal movement, 396, 1698
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- as sanctification, 1652
 sectarianism and, 1698–1699
- Tonna, Charlotte Elizabeth, 1483
- Toplady, Augustus, 916
- Toronto Airport Vineyard, 1465
- Toronto Blessing, 1465, 1913
- Torrance, T.F., christology of, 415
- Torrey, Reuben Archer, 1459, 1902–1903
How to Bring Men to Christ, 237
 Moody Bible Institute and, 1302
- Tosari, Paulus, 946
- Totalitarianism, 1903–1906
- Townsend, Cameron, Wycliffe Bible Translators and, 249
- Townsend, William Cameron, 2066–2067
- Toy, C.H., resignation, 183
- Toynbee, Arnold, 999, 1529

- Tractarianism, 917, 1014, 1430–1434.
See also Oxford Movement
- Tractarians, 348
 Samuel Wilberforce and, 2009
- Tractarian theology, Anglo-Catholicism and, 69–70
- Tracts, 725, 728
- Tradition, 1906–1908
- “Tragical History of Doctor Faustus” (Marlow), 1100
- Transcendentalism, 661, 1908–1909
 challenge to Unitarian doctrine, 51
- Transforming Mission* (Bosch), 288
- Translations, of the Bible, 222–224
- Transplantation, ethics of, 697
- Transubstantiation, 859, 1801, 1909–1911.
See also Real Presence
 Beza and, 1598
 Church of England on, 432
 Elizabeth I on, 660
 Fox on, 780
 Marburg Colloquy and, 1596
 Reformation criticism of, 485
 Swabian Syngramma on, 1826
 Wycliffe on, 668
- Transylvania, 1616–1620
 Unitarians in, 1926–1927
- Transylvania and Hungary, Antitrinitarianism and, 83–84
- Trautwein, Dieter, Thuma Mina: Internationales Ökumenisches Liederbuch, 1335
- Travels and pilgrimages, 1911–1914
- Treatise on Human Nature*, 900–901
- Treaty of Passau, 1607
- Treaty of Trianon, 1616, 1619
- Trent, Council of, 1495, 1600
- Tribal movements (India), 1914–1915
- Trible, Phyllis, 1869
- Tribulationism, 792, 1915
- Triennial Convention
 Baptist, 178
 cause of, 196
- Tri-Federation Council, foundation of, 257
- Trinity
 in Calvinism, 336 debates on, 1877
 disbelief in, 1927
 Servetus on, 1713
 Swedenborg on, 1834
 Unitarians on, 1925
 Watts on, 1978
 Whiston on, 2003
- Trinity Broadcasting Network, 1850 success of, 1177
- Trinity College, history of, 617–618
- Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, foundation, 1252

- Triumph of Infidelity* (Dwight), 626
 Triune God, worship of, 2057–2058
 Troeltsch, Ernst, 827, 943, 1396, 1397, 1594–1595, 1872–1873, 1915–1917
 Liberal Protestantism and, 1086 mysticism type identified by, 1708
 on sectarianism, 1689–1690
 on sect-church typology, 1769, 1772
 theology of, 1139
 thoughts on authority, 138
 True Woman, 2030
 Truth, Sojourner, 14
Truth and Excellence of the Christian Religion Exhibited, 5
 Tubman, Harriet, 14
 Tucker, A.R., 1494
 Tucker, J.W., execution of, 1169
 Tudor, Mary
 death of, 1168
 persecutions by, 432
 Protestant executions under, 348
 TULIP (Total Depravity, Unconditional Election, Limited Atonement, Irresistible Grace, and Perseverance of the Saints), 334
 Turkey
 Baptist Union in, 187
 German missions to, 1275–1276
 Turner, Frederick Jackson, frontier thesis of, 784
 Turner, Henry M, AME Church, Georgia, 20–21
 Turner, Nat, rebellion of, 1738–1739
 Turretini, Francis, systematic theology of, 332
 Turretini, Francesco, 962
 Turretini, François, 1424
 Turs, Gustavs, Latvian National Church and, 1070
 Tutu, Archbishop Desmond, 895
 Tutu, Desmond, 1527, 1917–1918
 Anglo-Catholic, 71–72
 Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous, 1956–1957
Twentieth-Century Reformation Hour (radio program), 1189
 Tye, Chrisopher, compositions by, 1331
 Tyndale, William, 1598, 1918–1919
 Bible translation by, 223, 247
 on divorce, 604
 Zwinglianism effect on, 2085
- Uhland, Ludwig, ballads of, 1110
 Ukraine, Baptist Union in, 186
 Ulanov, Ann, 999
 Ulfilas, Bible translation by, 246
 Ullmann, K.Kr. (Bishop), 1069
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Ulster, 1921–1922
 Presbyterians in, 1835

- Ultramontanism, 1922
- Unamuno, Miguel de, mentorship of Mackay, 1153
- Uncle Tom's Cabin* (Stowe), 1739, 1744, 1817–1818
- Underhill, Evelyn, 994, 1922–1923
 - impact of, 1293
- Underwood, Bernard E., 1457, 1458
- Underwood, Horace G., 1036
- Unification Church, 1923–1924
 - Sun Myung Moon and, 1396
- Unification Principle, 1923
- Union Missionary Conference, 2050
- Union Missionary Society
 - foundation, 1254
 - women and, 1281
- Union Theological Seminary, 1955–1956
- Unitarianism, 1371
 - in American Enlightenment, 1945
 - AUA as primary organizing body, 49–52
- Unitarian Renaissance, Eliot, Frederick May, 52
- Unitarian Universalist Association, 1924–1930
- Unitas Fratrum* (Comenius), 484, 1260
- United Bible Societies
 - Bible translations and, 249
 - formation of, 305
 - trends, 244–246
- United Brethren, sectarianism and, 1694
- United Brethren in Christ (UBC), foundation, 1217
- United Christian Missionary Society, history of, 398
- United Church of Canada, 346, 1930–1933
 - formation, 1221
- United Church of Christ, 813, 1353, 1933–1937, 1948
- United Church of Christ Justice and Peace Action Network, 1450
- United Church of Czech Brethren, 891
- United Kingdom
 - Abortion Act of 1967, 1
 - Act of Uniformity (1662), 209
 - Bible, King James Version, 239
 - Puritan Separatists, 184–185
 - Toleration Act, 182
- United Lutheran Church, 46
- United Lutheran Church in America, formation, 1135, 1150
- United Methodist Book of Worship*, liturgy, 1112
- United Methodist Church, 15, 813, 1937–1940, 1948
 - Book of Discipline*, 1519
 - constituency of, 1220
 - creation of, 1214
 - Evangelical United Brethren and, 1211
 - formation, 1225
 - The Upper Room*, 1534
- United Methodist Free Church, creation of, 1214
- United Norwegian Lutheran Church, The, 46
- United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing. see Shakers

- United States of America, 1940–1949
- American Baptist Churches (ABC-USA), 34–37
 - Baptists, 191–198
 - Calvinism in, 336
 - China Inland Mission in, 392
 - Christian socialism in, 1761
 - Civil War in (See Civil War, United States)
 - colonialism in, 482
 - Darwinism in, 556
 - deism in, 571–573
 - denominations in, 581–584
 - Dutch immigration to, 618–619
 - homeschooling in, 881–882
 - human rights in, 899
 - hymnody in, 916
 - industrialization of, 951
 - Jesus Movement in, 983–986
 - medical ethics in, 694
 - Mennonites in, 1202
 - national holidays and civil religion in, 876
 - Northern, disputes on morality of slavery, 1739–1740
 - Protestant universities in, 868–869
 - religious affiliation statistics in, 2089
 - sectarianism in, 1695–1698
 - secularization in, 1706
 - slavery abolition and Protestants in, 1743–1744
 - Social Gospel in, 1754
 - Southern, Protestantism and slavery in, 1738–1339
 - Sunday Schools in, 1825
 - Swedenborg followers in, 1834
 - theological education in, 1710–1711
 - Unitarian Universalist Association in, 1924
 - Universalism in, 1929–1930
 - women in, 2029–2034
 - YMCA origins in, 2069–2070
 - YWCA origins in, 2070
- United Zion Church, Brethren in Christ and, 300
- Uniting Church in Australia, 1949–1952, 2058
- Unity of church, 417
- Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, in Brazil, 295, 296, 297
- Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches, 884
- Universalism, 1952–1953
- Colenso on, 475
 - sectarianism and, 1695
- Universalist Church of America, AUA merger with, 52
- Universities, Protestant, 867–870
- Universities' Mission to Central Africa, Anglo-Catholicism and, 71
- Untereyck, Theodor, 1486–1487
- Uppsala Bible*, first printing of, 247
- Urbana Missions Convention, 957
- Urban camp meetings, 754
- Urban culture, YMCA/YWCA and, 2070–2071

Urban nondenominational congregations, 791
 Urban revivalism, 1849
 Ursinus, Zacharias, on covenant, 524, 526, 855–856
 Ursulines, social concerns, 1301
 Ussher, James, 886, 1028
 Utilitarianism, foundation of, 215
 Utraquists, formation of, 1236
 Uytenbogaert, Johannes, 1604, 1605

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Valdes, Juan de, 961
 Valdesi, 961
 Valenzuela, Romana Carbajal de, Pentecostal movement and, 1232
 Valla, Lorenzo, Bible comparison published by, 247
 Vanderherst, Richard, Colored Methodist Episcopal Church and, 257 van der Hoeven, Abraham des Amorie, 1606
 Vanderhorst, Richard H., 14
 van der Kemp, Johannes Theodorus, 1955
 Van Dusen, Henry Pitney, 1465, 1549, 1955–1957
 Van Dyke, Henry, 1549
 Van Limborch, Philippus, 1605
 Van Oldenbarnevelt, Johan, 1604, 1605
 Van Raalte, Albertus, 1601
 in Dutch Reformed Church, 402
 Varick, James, 13
 AMEZ Church and, 22, 256
 Vasa, Gustav
 Reformation in Sweden, 1130
 Scandinavian Reformation and, 1144
 Vasco de Gama, 936
 Vasey, Thomas, ordination, 160
 Vatican Council, Second. See Second Vatican Council
Vatican Decrees, 822
 Vaughan, John, Church Growth Today, 1191
 Vaughan Williams, Ralph, 1958
 Venial sin, 492
 Venn, Henry, 933, 1035
 African missionary, 17
 Church Missionary Society and, 1250
 three-self theory, 1261
 Venn, John, Church Missionary Society and, 1265
 Verbeck, Guido F., 972
 Vermigli, Pietro Martyr, 962, 1543
 concept of justification, 1004
 on double predestination, 656–657
 Vestments, 1958–1964, 2035
 Vicedom, Georg, 934
 Vicinage Council, in congregationalism, 508–509
 Vietnam War
 Bennett's opposition to, 214
 King's opposition to, 1024

- Vilmar, August Friedrich Christian
 confessional revival, 1134
 on Marian devotions, 1174
- Vincent, Thomas, 983
- Vindiciae contra tyrannos*, 525, 527
- Vinet, Alexandre, 1387, 1609
- Vineyard Movement, 1465
- Vio, Thomas de, Luther and, 1120
- Virgin Mary, perpetual virginity of, 369–370
- Virgo, Terry, 889, 890
- Visible and invisible church, 418–419
- Vision Interfaith Satellite Network, launch, 1178
- “Vision of Piers Plowman” (Langland), 1099
- Visser’t Hooft, Willem Adolf, 1964–1965
- Visual words, 715–716, 718, 720–722
- Vocation, 1955–1966
 Luther on, 1771
 Wordsworth on, 2042
- Voes, Heinrich, martyrdom of, 1168
- Voetius, Gisbert, 829, 1385, 1487
 conventicles and, 516
 role of the laity and, 1051
- Volkerzoon, Jan, execution of, 1198
- Volney, Constantin-François Chasseboeuf de, 1621
- Voltaire, on deism, 571
- Voluntary societies, 1966–1970
 empirical science and, 1670
 of students, 2050
 women in, 2032
- Volunteers of America, 1969
- von Goethe, Johann Wolfgang, on education, 645
- Von hardenberg, Friedrich, 1620
- von Harnack, Adolf, on faith, 734
- von Humboldt, Wilhelm, on education, 644–645
- von Merlau, Johanna Eleonora, 1489
- von Welz, Justinian, mission of, 1273
- Voodoo, 1738
- Vorstius, Conrad, 1604
- Voss, Johann Heinrich, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
- Vulgate Bible, 223
- Wackenroder, Wilhelm Heinrich
 Romantic movement and, 1109
- Wackenroder, William Heinrich, 1620
- Wackernagel, Philipp Karl Eduard, writings, 1110
- Wagner, Heinrich Leopold, Sturm und Drang movement and, 1108
- Waite, Linda, on marriage
- Wakefield, Edward Gibbon, 1391
- Waldeck, Franz von, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Waldensian Bible Society, 963
- Waldensian Evangelical Church, 961, 963

Waldenström, Paul Peter, Lutheran revival movement and, 1146
 Wales, 1971–1972

- British and Foreign Bible Society in, 241
- Calvinistic Methodism, 1212
- first Baptist congregation, 181–182

Walker, Alice, on womanism, 2027

Walker, Andrew, 889

Walter, Johann, Geystliches gesangk Büchlein (Spiritual Song Book), 1105

Walters, Alexander, NAACP and, 258

Walther, C.F.W., 812, 1543, 1972–1973

- Missouri Synod and, 1135, 1149
- The Missouri Synod and, 1125

Walton, Isaac, 1973–1974

Walwyn, William, Leveller movement and, 1082

Wandering Jew legend, 997

Wang, Ming Dao (Wang Mingdao), 1974–1975

War, 1975–1977

- just, pacifist advocacy of, 511–513

War Cry, beginnings of, 287

Ward, Graham, 1530

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

Ward, Harry F., 1592

Ward, William, mission to India, 177

Wardin, Albert W., 175

- Baptists Around the World: A Comprehensive Handbook*, 190

Wardley, James, influence on Ann Lee, 1075–1076

Wardley, Jane, influence on Ann Lee, 1075–1076

Warfield, B.B., on biblical inspiration, 224

Warneck, Gustav

- Allgemeine Missionszeitschrift*, 1252
- missiology and, 1248, 1252–1253
- mission studies by, 1278

Warner, Daniel S., as Church of God founder, 437–438

Warren, Max, publications of, 1272

Warren Baptist Association, formation, 158

Wars of Religion, in France, 333

Washingtonians, 1853

Watchtower Society, 978–982

Watchword, 830

Waterbuffalo Theology (Koyama), 1882

Waterlanders, Menno and, 1201, 1202

Waterloo Declaration, The, 2001, Anglicans and Lutherans, Canada, 69

Waterworth, W.G., 1422

Watson, Richard, influence of, 1213

Watts, Isaac, 913–915, 1418, 1551, 1552, 1610, 1977–1979

- hymns by, 1327

Wayland, Francis

- Elements of Moral Science*, 183
- missionary efforts, 171
- Triennial Convention and, 196

- Wayne, Cecil, Identity Crisis in Black Theology, 259
- Wealth of Nations* (Smith), 1758–1759
- Weatherhead, Leslie Dixon, 1979
- Webb, Thomas, 965
- Weber, Max, 815, 943, 950, 962, 1373, 1396, 1482, 1583, 1595, 1979–1980
 on Calvinism, 1771
 on Cultural Protestantism, 543 innerworldly asceticism, 112
 on Lutheranism, 1771
 millennialism and, 1241
 on Protestant ethic and capitalism, 632, 1803
 on sectarianism, 1689
 on sociology of Protestantism, 1769–1771
- Weber-Tawney thesis, 1670
- Weber Thesis, 950
- Wedekind, Frank, writings, 1111
- Weelkes, Thomas, compositions by, 1331
- Weibe, Rudy, biblical influence on, 231
- Weigel, Valentin, 1980
- Weimar, Wilhelm Ernst of (Duke), J.S.Bach and, 154
- Weir, Samuel, the Brethren and, 302
- Weiss, Johannes, 988, 1029
- Weld, Theodore Dwight, 1980–1981
- Welfare Reform Act of 1996 (United States), 1476
- Wells, Emmeline B., 1498
- Wells, Kenneth, 1037
- Welsh Revival, 1017, 1018
- Welz, Justinian Ernst, missionary interest, 1276
- Wendall, Jonas, 1626
- Werkzeug*, inspired minister in the Community of True Inspiration, 33
- Werner, Zacharias, writings, 1109
- Wertheimer, Samson, 996
- Wesley, Charles, 1418, 1610, 1981–1984
 Anglican spirituality, 67–68 conversion experience of, 1985 hymns, 915, 1333
 Methodism and, 1209
 theology of, 1264
- Wesley, John, 814, 865, 1028, 1418, 1440, 1610, 1620, 1984–1989
 on Anglican Articles of Religion, 609 Baltimore Conference and, 159 on Christian conference, 487 Church of England and, 434 conferences and, 1226–1227
 on dissent, 601
 on doctrinal authority of scripture, 608 on ecumenism, 635
 on educating children, 380–381
 episcopacy and, 254
 on grace, 440, 448–449, 831
 on healing, 737
 house churches of, 890

- hymns of, 915
- itineracy of, 965
- Methodism and, 1208–1209, 1213
- missionary work of, 1280
- on prayer, 1532, 1533
- preaching of, 1537
- on predestination, 657
- on sanctification, 1652
- on slavery abolition, 1742
- tensions with brother Charles, 1982–1983
- theology of, 1264, 1982
- view of justification, 1004–1005
- views on predestination, 1544
- Wesley, Samuel Sebastian
 - on English church music, 1333
 - the Willis organ and, 1333
- Wesleyan Church, 1989–1990
- Wesleyan Holiness Movement, 1990–1992
 - reaction to the Connexion, 1210
- Wesleyanism, 1992–1997
 - on conversion, 519
 - of United Methodist Church, 1938
- Wesleyan Methodist Church
 - formation, 1220
 - foundation of, 159
 - view of slavery, 255
- Wesleyan Quadrilateral, 712, 1211, 1992
- Wesleyan revival, 1986
- West, Cornel, on black theologians, 260
- Westcott, Brooke Francis, 994, 1997–1998
 - influence on Lightfoot, 1097
- Westen, Thomas von, Pleiades and, 1145
- Westerberg, Gerhard, Münster Anabaptists and, 1199
- Western Health Reform Institute, Battle Creek, 1717
- Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
- Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
- Western India Native Christian Alliance, 1405
- Westerphal, Joachim, quarrel with Jan Laski, 1059
- Westminster Assembly, 888, 1579–1580, 1998
- Westminster Catechism, 1998–2000
- Westminster Confession, 335, 497, 1004, 1544, 1547, 1549, 1551, 1557, 1580, 2000–2003, 2060
 - Cambridge Platform adoption of, 338
 - Campbell doctrines contradictory to, 344
 - congregationalist acceptance of, 508
- Westrup, Thomas, missionary work, 1230
- Wettstein, J.J., 1386
- Weyrich, Paul, Moral Majority and, 1306
- Whatcoat, Richard, ordination, 160
- What Would Jesus Do? (WWJD), 1729, 1753, 2065
- Wheatley, Phillis, 2003
- Wheelock, Eleazar, 1360

- Whichcote, Benjamin, Latitudinarianism and, 1064
Whig Interpretation of History (Butterfield), 325
- Whiston, William, 1371, 2003–2004
- Whitby, Daniel, 1028
- Whitby, Hilda of, monasticism and, 1299
- White, Andrew, 1371
- White, Ellen Gould, 1715–1716, 2004–2005
- White, K.Owen, views, 197
- White, Thomas, 871
- White, Victor, 999
- White, William Hale (also Mark Rutherford), 2005
- White Cross Society, 1571
- Whitefield, George, 12, 915, 1028, 1353, 1544, 1547, 1610, 2005–2006
 Calvinism of, 669
 preaching of, 1537
 on predestination, 657
- Whitehead, Alfred North, 1567
 on empiricism, 665
- White Wing Messenger*, 443
- White Woman's Christ and the Black Woman's Jesus* (Grant), 259–260
- Whitgift, John, 868, 885, 1443, 2006–2007
 views contrary to Thomas Cartwright, 358
- Whittingham, William, 911
- Wiberg, Anders, work in Sweden, 183
- Wichern, Johann Heinrich, 1028, 2007–2009
- Wickram, Jörg, plays of, 1105–1106
- Wieland, Christoph Martin, writings, 1108
- Wieman, Henry Nelson, 1568
 on empiricism, 666
- Wigand, Johannes, Magdeburg Centuries, 1131
- Wigglesworth, Michael (Rev.), 218, 1102
- Wilberforce, Robert, 1430, 1432, 1433
- Wilberforce, Samuel, 2009–2010
 on Darwinism, 553
- Wilberforce, William, 1430, 2010–2011
 anti-slavery debates, 1265
 British and Foreign Bible Society and, 305
 on slavery abolition, 1742
 social action by, 1052
- Wilberforce-Huxley debate, 2009–2010
- Wilberforce University, 13
- Wilde, Oscar, biblical influence on, 231
- Wilder, Grace, Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Wilder, Robert, Student Volunteer Movement and, 1281
- Wilder, Royal G., Missionary Review of the World and, 1252
- Wild Goose Resource Group, publications, 1337
- Wilkins, John, Latitudinarianism and, 1066
- Willard, Frances Elizabeth Caroline, 1589, 1947, 2011–2012
 temperance movement and, 1225
- William, John, missionary work of, 1266
- William III, 822–823
- Williams, Amos, missionary efforts, 1254

- Williams, Daniel Day, 1568
- Williams, Delores, liberation theology and, 1091, 1092
- Williams, Isaac, 1430
- Williams, John, 1435
Redeemed Captive Returning to Zion, 218–219
- Williams, Lacey Kirk, 1352
- Williams, M., 972
- Williams, Peter, 13
 the AMEZ Church, 21–22
- Williams, Roger, 1563, 1580, 1581, 1693, 2012–2014
 opinions of, 171
 views, 192
- Williamson, Alexander, 1036
- Willis, Henry, organ made by, 1333
- Willow Creek Association, 1708–1709
- Willow Creek Community Church, mission statement, 1191
- Willmore, Gayraud S., Black Religion and Black Radicalism, 258, 259
- Wilson, Bill, Frank Buchman and, 1308
- Wilson, Bryan R., 1690
- Wilson, Thomas Woodrow, 2014–2015, 2046
- Wilson, Woodrow, 1029
- Wimber, John, 1465
- Winckelmann, Johann Joachim, writings, 1108
- Windet, John, 885
- Wingren, Gustaf, 1368
- Winkworth, Catherine, 917
- Winona Lake, chautauqua program, 233
- Winrod, Gerald, 1365
- Winslow, Edward, 1493
- Winstanley, Gerrard, 1693, 2015
- Winthrop, John, 904
- Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran Synod, 2015–2016
- Wishart, George, 1033
- Witchcraze, 1943, 2016–2021
 Cotton Mather and, 1181
- Witherspoon, John, 1515, 1523, 1547, 2021–2024
- With God in the World* (Brent), 298
- Witness for Peace, 1448
- Witte, John, models of marriage, 1161–1162
- Wittenberg Movement, 1013
- Wittenberg sermons, 1860–1861
- Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 1021
- WJBT (Chicago, Illinois), Christian broadcasting on, 1176
- Woelfkin, Cornelius, 168
- Wolf, Friedrich August, 866
- Wolfe, George II, the Brethren and, 302
- Wolff, Christian, 838, 1375, 1602, 2024–2025
 views of Leibniz and, 1079
- Wollaston, William, 2026

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

- Wolmar, Melchior, influence on Beza, 221
 Wolsey, Cardinal, Thomas Cromwell and, 537–538
 Womanist theology, 2026–2029
 Woman's American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, 35
 Woman's Christian Temperance Union, 1754, 1854
 Woman's Crusade, 1853–1854
 Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, foundation of, 1281
 Woman's Missionary Union, 1785–1786
 Women
 American missions and, 1282
 in Anglican sisterhoods, 1734–1735
 in Baptist affairs, 184
 Booth on female ministry, 283–284
 British missions and, 1269
 Deaconess Movement, 1225 gender roles in churches, 801–804 in German churches, 817
 household codes and, 1164–1165
 lay ministry of, 1051
 liberation theology and, 1090
 Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
 Lutheran ordination of, 1147 machismo and, 1062
 monasticism and, 1299
 New, 2030–2032
 preaching by, 1539
 prostitution of, 1569–1572
 Separate Baptists and participation by, 194
 True, 2030
 United States, 2029–2034
 violence against, 1165
 White Woman's Christ and the Black Woman's Jesus, 259–260
 Women clergy, 2034–2039
 in Canada, 346
 in Episcopal Church, 679
 Lutheran Church in America and, 1127
 Presbyterian, 1548, 1551
 in Protestant denominations, 469
 Remonstrant, 1606
 in twentieth and twenty-first centuries, 2032–2034 in Unitarian Universalist Church, 2031–2032 in United Church of Canada, 1932 Women's Christian Temperance Union
 in Canada, 345
 Social Gospel in, 2032
 Women's Missionary Movement, foundation, 1254
 Women's organizations, Social Gospel and, 1754, 2032 Women status
 industrialization and, 741

- Salvation Army holiness theology and, 1648–1649
- Woodruff, Wilford, 1496, 1498
 - Mormonism and, 1314
- Woolman, John, 2039–2040
 - as Quaker leader, 1765
 - social action by, 1052
 - Universalism of, 782
- Woolston, Thomas, 2040–2041
- Wooman, John, 1438
- Wooner, Thomas, 1545
- Word of God (Logos)
 - incarnate, 338
 - Scripture as, 337
- Words about Jesus
 - electronic, 715, 717, 719, 725–726
 - hidden, 715–716, 718, 720
 - personal, 715–716, 718, 722
 - printed (literature), 715, 717, 719, 724–725
 - proclaimed, 715–716, 718, 722–723
 - visual, 715–716, 718, 720–722
 - written (Scripture), 715, 717–718, 723–724
 - (See also Bible)
- Wordsworth, William, 1432, 1620, 1621, 2041–2044
 - writings, 1103
- Work ethic, 632
 - empirical science and, 1670
- Works, in covenant theology, 473, 525, 527
- World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 336, 891, 1527, 1549, 1556, 2044–2045
 - in South Africa, 1781–1782
- World Baptist Fellowship, 180
 - foundation, 172, 197
- World Congress on Evangelism, roots of, 1073
- World Council of Churches, 816, 832, 843, 891, 918, 942, 1041, 1353–1354, 1388, 1421, 1426, 1446, 1549, 1556, 1874, 2045–2049
 - on baptism, 167
 - on ecumenism terminology, 634
 - episcopacy and, 254–255
 - foundation of, 1262
 - influence on music, 1335
- World Dominion Press, Survey Application Trust (SAT), 28
- World Evangelical Alliance, 732
- World Evangelical Fellowship (FEP)
 - foundation, 1257
 - roots of, 1073
- World Methodist Council, 2049
 - composition of, 1210
- World Missionary Conference, 366, 935, 938, 969, 1421, 1426, 2049–2052
 - ecumenism in, 636
 - Edinburgh, 1262
 - on missions, 1248
- World Parliament of Religions, Schaff participation in, 1654
- World religions, saints in, 1639

World's Christian Fundamentals Association and, foundation, 168

World's Parliament of Religions, 2053–2054

World's Student Christian Federation, John Mott and, 1319

World's Student Christian Foundation, 1257

World Vision, 732, 1969, 2052–2053

World War I, 1029

Neo-Orthodoxy and, 1379

World War II

Church of the Brethren during, 303

Holocaust during, 879–881, 997

Japanese Christian church during, 975 nationalism after, 1358–1359

the Netherlands in, 1388

Poland in, 1505

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

World Wars

theology and, 1873–1874

YMCA war relief during, 2072–2073

World Wide Web. see Internet

Worms

diet of, 1599, 2054–2055

edict of, 1596, 2055–2057

Speyer diets and, 1798–1799

Worship, 2057–2062

Amish, 57

dress for, 1958–1959

monasticism and, 1299

Wrede, William, 988

Wren, Brian, 918

Wren, Christopher, 2062–2064

Wren, Matthew (Bishop), Book of Common Prayer and, 277

Wright, J.Elwin, 1348

Wright, N.T., 990

Written words (Scripture).

See also Bible

in evangelism, 715, 717, 719

Wu, Y.T. (Wu Yao-Tsung, Wu Yaozong), 2064

Wulung, Tunggul, 946

Wünsch, Georg, 2064–2065

Wutaunashe, R., Dr., 11

WWJC (What Would Jesus Do?), 1729, 1753, 2065

Wycliffe, John, 4, 1027, 1550

on congregationalism, 507

dissent by, 601

English Bible translation by, 223

martyrdom of, 1167

on monasticism, 1300

on transubstantiation, 668, 1910

on the Vulgate Bible, 246

Wycliffe Bible Translators, 2066–2067

- of Canada, size, 1286
- foundation, 249
- history of, 728
- USA, size, 1286
- Wyneken, F.C.D., The Missouri Synod and, 1124

- Xavier, Francis
 - mass movement in India, 1179
 - missionary efforts, 1254
- Xenoglossia, 1899, 1901

- Yale Divinity School, history of, 651
- Yale University, founding of, 234
- Yokohama Band, 972–973
- Yorba Bible translation, 540
- York, Convocation of, 348–349
- Young, Brigham, 1497, 1697, 2074–2075.
 - See also* Mormonism
- Young, Carlton R., Global Praise Project, 1336
- Young Men’s and Young Women’s Christian Associations
 - Dwight Moody and, 1304
 - Frank Buchman and, 1307
 - influence of, 1269
- Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA)/Young Women’s Christian Association (YWCA), 2069–2074
 - in China, 387
 - in colleges, 480
 - sexuality and, 1724–1725
 - in social change, 1968–1969
- Youth for Christ, 731, 795, 832, 1348, 2075–2076
- Youth work, 730
- Yugoslavia, Methodism in, 1217

- Zabarelli, Giacomo, 1015
- Zaire, Lutheranism in, 1142
- Zamora, Nicholas, 1480
- Zeisberger, David, 1360
- Zeitgeist*, Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 110
- Zeller, Eva, writings, 1111
- Zesen, Philipp von, writings, 1106
- Zichen, Zhao. See Chau, T.C.
- Ziegenbalg, B., 937
- Ziegenbalg, Bartholomäus, 1404
 - assignment of, 1273
 - missionary activity and, 1260
- Zigler und Klipphausen, Heinrich Anshelm von, writings, 1107
- Zimbabwe, 2077–2078
- Zinzendorf, Nikolaus Ludwig von, 812, 814, 864–865, 915, 1360, 1386, 1534, 1609, 2078–2080
 - Moravian Brethren and, 1273
 - Moravian Church and, 1139, 1308
 - Pietism and, 1490, 1491

- Zion Christian Church, in South Africa, 10
 Zion Methodists, 21–22
 Zion's Watch Tower Tract Society, 1626–1627
 Zola, Emile, writings, 1110
 Zöllner, Johann Friedrich, 2080
 Zopfi, Jakob, 1455
 Zurich, Reformed Church in, 331
Zurich Consensus, reactions to, 496
 Zweig, Stefan, writings, 1111
 Zwick, Johannes, 1536
 Zwickau Prophets, 1691
 Zwingli, Huldrych, 814, 833–834, 856, 1383, 1596–1597, 2080–2083
 altar controversy, 30
 Anabaptism and, 1197
 art in religion and, 105
 on baptism, 162–163
 christology of, 410
 on church discipline, 423
 on clergy marriage, 471
 on communion tables, 485
 concept of justification, 1004
 concept of Kingdom of God, 1027
 concept of Lord's Supper, 1596–1597 conflict with Luther, 332
 on divorce, 603
 on faith, 733
 Heinrich Bullinger and, 314
 on Holy communion, 1116
 Hubmaier and, 891–893
Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
 Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195
 as leader of Reformed Church in Zurich, 331
 on Lord's Supper, 495, 1826
 on Marian devotions, 1173
 preaching by, 1536, 1537
 on predestination and election, 656 sacramental theology of, 1691
 on sacraments, 1638
 on saints, 1641
 on sexuality, 1719
 Sixty-Seven Articles, 1052
 on sports, 1804
 in Swiss Reformation, 1837–1838
 use of music by, 910–911
 views on iconoclasm, 923, 924–925
 views on music, 1338
 views on predestination, 1543
 Zwinglianism, 2083–2086
 Zwinglian Protestantism, in Bern, 329

Volume Key: Volume 1, pages 1–548; Volume 2, pages 549–1046;
Volume 3, pages 1047–1632; Volume 4, pages 1633–2195

